UNITED STATES v. BURR.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 493;[1] 2 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 573.]

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. Nov. 8, 1806.

CRIMINAL LAW—PROCESS, WHEN AWARDED.

Courts will not award criminal process on the mere motion and suggestion of the district attorney, unsupported by oath.

The attorney for the United States, on the 3d day of this term, having made a motion for the caption and examination of the said Burr, etc.[2]

Before INNIS, District Judge.

THE COURT this day delivered the following opinion, which is ordered to be entered of record, to wit:

The motion made by Mr. Attorney on the 3d day of this term is predicated upon the fifth section of the act of congress [1 Stat. 384] entitled an act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States: "That if any person shall within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, with whom the United States are at peace, every such person so offending shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall suffer fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court in which the conviction shall be had, so as that such fine shall not exceed three thousand dollars, nor the term of imprisonment be more than three years." The evidence in support of the motion is in the following words, viz.:

"J. H. Daviess, attorney for said United States, in and for said district, upon his corporal oath, doth depose and say, that the deponent is informed, and doth verily believe, that a certain Aaron Burr, Esq., late vice-president of the said United States, for several months past, hath been, and is now, engaged in preparing and setting on foot, and in providing and preparing the means for a military expedition and enterprise, within this district, for the purpose of descending the Ohio and Mississippi therewith, and making war upon the subjects of the king of Spain, who are now in a state of peace with the people of the United States, to wit, on the province of Mexico, on the westwardly side of Louisiana, which appertain and belong to the king of Spain, a European prince, with whom the United States are at peace. And said deponent further saith, that he is informed and fully believes, that the above charge can and will be fully substantiated by evidence, provided this honorable court will grant compulsory process to bring in witnesses to testify thereto. And this deponent further saith, that he is informed, and verily believes, that the agents and emissaries of the said Burr have purchased up, and are continuing to purchase, large stores of provisions, as if for an army, while the said Burr seems to conceal in great mystery from the people at large his purposes and projects; and while the minds of the good people of this district seem agitated with the current rumor, that a military expedition against some neighboring power is preparing by the said Aaron Burr. Wherefore, said attorney, on behalf of said United States, prays that due process issue to compel the personal appearance of the said Aaron Burr in this court, and also of such witnesses as may be necessary in behalf of the said United States; and that this honorable court will duly recognize the said Aaron Burr, to answer such charge as may be preferred against him in the premises. And in the meantime, that he desist and refrain from all further preparation and proceeding in the said armament within the said United States, or the territories or dependencies thereof. J. H. Daviess, A. U. S.

"Affirmed to in open court. (Attest.) T. Tunstall, C. K. D. C.

"November 5, 1806."

The question to be considered: Has this court power to award process against the accused, and to compel the attendance of witnesses upon this motion; and if the court has such power, is the evidence adduced sufficient to warrant the measure? Four kinds of proceeding have been known and pursued in order to convict persons of crimes and misdemeanors: 1st. By an application to a justice or judge out of court. 2d. By preferring an indictment to a grand jury. 3d. By a presentment of the grand jury. And the 4th. By information. The present application is not embraced by either of those modes of proceeding. It is a new case resting on the discretion of the court; and, as this decision may be considered a precedent in future, I have thought it my duty to take time and mature the subject; because, the proposed measure being prevention, no injury could arise by a little delay. No instance has occurred (within my recollection, since I have become acquainted with judicial proceedings, when a crime or misdemeanor has been committed) of a motion being made to a court to award process to arrest the offender in the first instance; neither have I knowledge of the existence of a law to authorize it. In any case where a court awards process, it is predicated upon some previous act already done, which gives the court cognizance of the subject, and brings the case in a legal shape before that tribunal; this being performed, the power to adopt every necessary measure to attain the object and end of the law, and to perfect justice, is vested in a court. The magnitude of this cause, not only as it relates to the community, but to the accused, requires that the proceeding be pursued with regularity, caution, and circumspection. If the facts stated in the affidavit be true, the project ought to be prevented, and the offender punished. Yet, in doing this, the regular legal steps pointed out by usage, or by law, ought to be pursued. If, on the other hand, the accused be innocent, the strong arm of power ought to be confined within its proper limits, the known rules of proceeding; and on no occasion but extreme necessity ought a judge to be induced to exercise a power which rests on discretion. The law then becomes unknown, and the best judge may be considered a tyrant, because it then depends upon his whim and his caprice. It will not be uniform, but it is liable to change with the opinion of every judge.

These reflections extend to the general principle arising out of the case. Admit, however, that they are erroneous; to award process would be improper; it would be an act of oppression, because there is not legal evidence before the court to authorize an arrest of the person accused. The evidence is the oath of a person who has been informed by one not upon oath; and the deponent believes the fact to be true. I make no doubt of the truth of the affidavit; that is, that the deponent has been informed that the fact stated is true; yet it is not legal evidence, and, not being legal evidence, the court cannot act upon it. Upon this view of the subject, I am compelled to declare, that as the cause is a new one, as no precedent has been shown to justify such a proceeding, as the law is silent upon the subject, and as there are two other modes of proceeding which are regular and well understood, viz., by applying to the judge out of court, and obtaining a warrant upon legal evidence, or by the court ordering a grand jury to be summoned instanter, and preferring an indictment, this motion is overruled.

The attorney for the United States then prayed the judge to issue his warrant to the marshal, to summon a grand jury, which was done accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. BURR.[1]

[Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 1; 4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 455.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. April 1, 1807.

[1] [This and the following cases (Cases Nos. 14,692b–14,694a) arising out of the trials of Aaron Burr, have been taken from the report by J. J. Coombs, Esq., published in 1864, rather than from the more voluminous and less readable reports of Carpenter & Robertson, published early in the century. In order to render more accessible the various opinions delivered by the chief justice, separate reports of the proceedings arising out of the commitments and trials have been made, while the proceedings from day to day, out of which the various motions arose, and the running comments of court and counsel, are shown in the main case, No. 14,693. The entire matter is thus comprehended in 10 separate reports, which, beginning with the above case, No. 14,692a, are printed in consecutive order in this volume. The proceedings were commenced March 20, 1807, by bringing the prisoner before Chief Justice Marshall as a committing magistrate, for preliminary examination. On the proofs then adduced, the chief justice refused to hold Burr to answer to the charge of high treason, but committed him on the charge of a

[2. An affidavit, used on a preliminary examination of a person charged with setting on foot a military expedition against a nation with which the United States were at peace, set out the translation of a letter originally written in cipher to the affiant, and signed with the name of the accused, describing a military enterprise, from which it appeared that the means had been provided. The affidavit averred that the letter was received from the accused, but did not aver that it was in his handwriting, nor set out a copy of the original and the cypher. Held that, taken in connection with previous declarations of the accused, showing a meditated expedition against Spanish dominions, it made out a case of probable cause.]

[3. An intention to commit treason against the United States by levying war, not carried out by the actual assembling of troops, is not punishable as treason.]

[4. The act of revolutionizing a territory of the United States, though only as a means for an expedition against a foreign power, is treason.]

[5. The engaging or enlisting of men for levying war against the United States, not followed by a future embodying of such men, is not punishable as treason.]

[6. A person will not be held to trial for treason in levying war against the United States on an affidavit that he is engaging or enlisting men for such purpose, without proof of the actual embodying of men, where ample time is given to get such proof.]

[At law. On examination of Aaron Burr for commitment. Aaron Burr was arrested by Maj. Perkins on the Tombigbee river in what is now Washington county, Ala., February 20, 1807. He was conducted to Ft. Stoddard, detained a prisoner there about two weeks, and then started for Washington City on horseback, attended by a guard of nine men, under the command of Maj. Perkins. At Fredericksburg, Va., Maj. Perkins was met by a dispatch from the president directing him to convey the prisoner to Richmond, Va., which he accordingly did.]

On Monday, March 30, 1807, Colonel Aaron Burr, who had remained under military guard in the city of Richmond since his arrival on the 26th of that month, was delivered over to the civil authorities by virtue of a warrant issued by the chief justice of the United States, founded on charges of a high misdemeanor, in preparing and setting misdemeanor, in preparing and setting on foot a military expedition against the dominions or territory of a prince (the king of Spain) with whom the United States were at peace. (See above, Case No. 14,692a.) On May 25, 1807, the grand jury being then in session to consider the charges against Burr and his confederates, the attorney for the United States made a motion in open court to commit Mr. Burr on a charge of high treason, stating that additional evidence, not available at the time of the former hearing would be presented. Objection being made to the power of the court to undertake a further investigation, particularly while the grand jury was in session, the matter was argued at length, and on May 26th, the court rendered an opinion sustaining its power in the premises. Case No. 14,692b. Evidence was then heard upon this motion. Among the proofs offered was an affidavit by Jacob Dunbaugh, which was objected to on various grounds. The objections were argued, and on May 28th an opinion was delivered excluding the affidavit for want of proper authentication. Case No. 14,692c. On June 9th Mr. Burr applied to the court for a subpœna duces tecum to be directed to the president of the United States, requiring him to produce a certain letter and certain orders issued to the army and navy in relation to Burr's expedition. This motion having been fully argued, the court, on June 13th, rendered an opinion deciding that the writ might issue. Case No. 14,692d. Afterwards a witness called to prove the authenticity and materiality of a letter in cipher, which the attorney for the United States proposed to send up to the grand jury, refused to testify, on the ground that his answers might criminate himself; and the question of his right to decline answering the questions put to him was determined by the court, in an opinion delivered on the 18th of June. Case No. 14,692e. A motion was subsequently made by the defendant to attach Gen. Wilkinson for a contempt of court, in obstructing the administration of justice and abusing the process of the law, by coercing and intimidating certain witnesses, and procuring their depositions by unlawful means. Upon this motion evidence was received and argument had, and the court, in an opinion delivered on June 27th, refused the attachment. Case No. 14,692f. In selecting the petit jury certain questions arose as to what constitutes such prejudice or partiality as will disqualify a juror; and on August 11th an opinion was delivered, considering the subject at length. Case No. 14,692g. The introduction of evidence was begun August 17th; and an objection was immediately made by the defense to the testimony of the first witness, Gen. Eaton, on the ground that the prosecution must first prove the overt act, as laid, before giving evidence of the intention and purposes of Burr in preparing the expedition. The question thus raised was determined by the court in an opinion delivered on the following day. Case No. 14,692h. The next case, No. 14,693, is the main case, comprising a report of all the proceedings in extenso (except those which have been made the subject of separate reports as herein indicated), together with the running comments of counsel thereon; also, the arguments of counsel and the opinion of the court upon the main question in the case, which was raised by defendant's motion to exclude further testimony on the grounds (1) that the evidence in relation to the overt act did not show a levying of war; and (2) that, it appearing that defendant was not present at the time, no evidence was admissible to connect him with the doings of the persons who had assembled for the purposes of the expedition. This motion was granted, and the case was thereupon committed to the jury, and a verdict of acquittal returned. Burr was immediately afterwards put upon his trial for a misdemeanor in setting on foot a military expedition against the dominions of the king of Spain. This trial also resulted in an acquittal. The proceedings therein are reported at length in Case No. 14,694. As a result of Burr's trials, a nolle prosequi was entered in respect to each of the indictments against his confederates, Harman, Blennerhassett, and Israel Smith. Afterwards a motion was made to commit all three of the prisoners "to that place for trial where the military expedition is said to have been completed." This motion was argued, and the chief justice, after delivering an opinion of some length, committed Burr and Blennerhassett to the district of Ohio, to be there held to answer the charge of setting on foot a military expedition against the dominions of the king of Spain. Case No. 14,694a. The defendants thereupon gave bail in the sum of $3,000 each, but it does not appear that any further steps were ever taken to bring them to trial in Ohio.]

on foot within the territories of the United States, a military expedition against the dominions of the king of Spain; and also of treason against the United States, in assembling an armed force with a design to seize the city of New Orleans, to revolutionize the territory attached thereto, and to separate the Western from the Atlantic states. Colonel Burr was conducted by the marshal of the district of Virginia, from his lodgings in the Eagle Hotel, to a retired room in the same house, before Chief Justice Marshall, for examination. The counsel and a witness for the United States, the counsel for the prisoner, and a few friends invited by the latter, were alone admitted. Before the examination commenced it was agreed between the counsel, with the assent of the Chief Justice, that if a discussion should become necessary an adjournment to the capitol should take place. The evidence introduced on behalf of the United States consisted of a copy of the record in the Cases of Bollman and Swartwout, in the supreme court of the United States, (containing the affidavits of General Eaton, General Wilkinson and others,) and also the verbal testimony of Maj. Perkins, who apprehended Colonel Burr in the Mississippi territory, giving an account of his arrest and conveyance to Richmond.

[The depositions were as follows:]

[2] [Deposition of James Wilkinson:

[I, James Wilkinson, brigadier general and commander in chief of the army of the United States, to warrant the arrest of Doctor Erick Bollman, on a charge of treason, misprision of treason, or such other offense against the government and laws of the United States as the following facts may legally charge him with, on my honor as a soldier; and on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, do declare and swear, that on the sixth day of November last, when in command at Natchitoches, I received by the hands of a Frenchman, a stranger to me, a letter from Doctor Erick Bollman, of which the following is a correct copy:

["New Orleans, September 27, 1806.

["Sir: I have the honor to forward to your excellency the enclosed letters, which I was charged to deliver to you by our mutual friend. I shall remain for some time at this place, and should be glad to learn where and when I may have the pleasure of an interview with you. Have the goodness to inform me of it, and please to direct your letter to me, care of or enclose it under cover to them. I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient servant, [Covering a communication in cipher from Col. Aaron Burr, of which the following is substantially as fair an interpretation as I have heretofore been able to make, the original of which I hold in my possession:

["I (Aaron Burr) have obtained funds, and have actually commenced the enterprise. Detachments from different points, and under different pretences, will rendezvous on the Ohio, 1st November. Everything internal and external favors views; protection of England is secured. Truxton is gone to Jamaica to arrange with the admiral of that station, and will meet at the Mississippi—England—navy of the United States are ready to join, and final orders are given to my friends and followers. It will be a host of choice spirits. Wilkinson shall be second to Burr only. Wilkinson shall dictate the rank and promotion of his officers. Burr will proceed westward 1st August, never to return. With him goes his daughter. The husband will follow in October with a corps of worthies. Send forthwith an intelligent and confidential friend, with whom Burr may confer. He shall return immediately with further interesting details. This is essential to concert and harmony of movement. Send a list of all persons known to Wilkinson west of the mountains, who could be useful, with a note delineating their characters. By your messenger send me four or five of the commissions of your officers, which you can borrow under any pretence you please. They shall be returned faithfully. Already are orders to the contractor given to forward six months' provisions to points Wilkinson may name. This shall not be used until the last moment, and then under proper injunctions. The project is brought to the point so long desired. Burr guarantees the result with his life and honor, the lives, the honor and fortunes of hundreds, the best blood of our country. Burr's plan of operations is to move down rapidly from the falls on the fifteenth of November, with the first five hundred or one thousand men, in light boats, now constructing for that purpose; to be at Natchez between the fifth and fifteenth of December; then to meet Wilkinson; then to determine whether it will be expedient, in the first instance, to seize on, or pass by, Baton Rouge. On receipt of this send Burr an answer. Draw on Burr for all expenses, etc. The people of the country to which we are going are prepared to receive us. Their agents now with Burr say that if we will protect their religion, and will not subject them to a foreign power, that in three weeks all will be settled. The gods invite to glory and fortune. It remains to be seen whether we deserve the boon. The bearer of this goes express to you. He will hand a formal letter of introduction to you from Burr, a copy of which is hereunto subjoined. He is a man of inviolable honor and perfect discretion; formed to execute rather than to project; capable of relating facts with fidelity, and incapable of relating them otherwise. He is thoroughly informed of the plans and intentions of ——, and will disclose to you as far as you inquire, and no further. He has imbibed a reverence for your character, and may be embarrassed in your presence. Put him at ease and he will satisfy you. Doctor Bollman, equally confidential, better informed on the subject, and more intelligent, will hand this duplicate. 29th July."

[The day after my arrival at this city, the 26th of November last, I received another letter from the doctor, of which the following is a correct copy:

["New Orleans, November 25th, 1806.

["Sir: Your letter of the 16th inst, has been duly received. Supposing that you will be much engaged this morning, I defer waiting on your excellency till you will be pleased to inform me of the time when it will be convenient for you to see me. I remain with great respect, your excellency's most obedient servant, ["Erick Bollman.

["His Excellency, Gen. Wilkinson, Fauxbourg, Marigny, the house between Madame Trevigne and M. Macarty."

[On the 30th of the same month I waited in person on Doctor E. Bollman, when he informed me that he had not heard from Colonel Burr since his arrival here, that he (the said Doctor E. Bollman) had sent despatches to Colonel Burr by a Lieutenant Spence, of the navy, and that he had been advised of Spence's arrival at Nashville in the state of Tennessee, and observed that Colonel Burr had proceeded too far to retreat; that he (Colonel Burr) had numerous and powerful friends in the United States, who stood pledged to support him with their fortunes, and that he must succeed; that he (the said Doctor E. Bollman) had written to Colonel Burr on the subject of provisions; and that he expected a supply would be sent from New York, and also from Norfolk, where Colonel Burr had strong connections. I did not see or hear from the doctor again until the 5th inst., when I called on him the second time. The mail having arrived the day before, I asked him whether he had received any intelligence from Colonel Burr. He informed me that he had seen a letter from Colonel Burr of the 30th October, in which he (Colonel Burr) gave assurances that he should be at Natchez with 2,000 men on the 20th December, inst., where he should wait until he heard from this place; that he would be followed by 4,000 men more; and that he (Colonel Burr,) if he had chosen, could have raised or got 12,000 as easily as 6,000, but that he did not think that number necessary. Confiding fully in this information, I became indifferent about further disguise. I then told the doctor that I should most certainly oppose Colonel Burr if he came this way. He replied that they must come here for equipments and shipping, and observed that he did not know what had passed between Colonel Burr and myself, obliqued at a sham defence, and waived the subject. From the documents in my possession, and the several communications, verbal as well as written, from the said Doctor Erick Bollman, on this subject, I feel no hesitation in declaring under the solemn obligation of an oath, that he has committed misprision of treason against the government of the United States.

[Second deposition of James Wilkinson:

[I, James Wilkinson, brigadier general and commander in chief of the army of the United States, to warrant the arrest of Samuel Swartwout, James Alexander, Esq., and Peter V. Ogden, on a charge of treason, misprision of treason, or such other offence against the government and laws of the United States, as the following facts may legally charge them with, on the honor of a soldier, and on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, do declare and swear, that in the beginning of the month of October last, when in command at Natchitoches, a stranger was introduced to me by Colonel Cushing, by the name of Swartwout, who a few minutes after the colonel retired from the room, slipt into my hand a letter of formal introduction from Colonel Burr, of which the following is a correct copy:] [2]

[Here was set out the letter of July 25, 1806, given above.]

[2] [Together with a packet, which, he informed me, he was charged by the same person to deliver me in private; this packet contained a letter in cipher from Colonel Burr, of which the following is substantially as fair an interpretation as I have heretofore been able to make, the original of which I hold in my possession:] [2]

[2][I instantly resolved to avail myself of the reference made to the bearer, and in the course of some days drew from him (the said Swartwout) the following disclosure: "That he had been dispatched by Colonel Burr from Philadelphia, had passed through the states of Ohio and Kentucky, and proceeded from Louisville for St. Louis, where he expected to find me, but discovering at Kaskaskias that I had descended the river, he procured a skiff, hired hands, and followed me down the Mississippi to Fort Adams, and from thence set out for Natchitoches, in company with Captains Sparks and Hooke, under the pretense of a disposition to take part in the campaign against the Spaniards, then depending. That Colonel Burr with the support of a powerful association, extending from New York to New Orleans, was levying an armed body of 7,000 men from the state of New York and the western states and territories, with a view to carry an expedition against the Mexican provinces, and that 500 men under Colonel Swartwout and a Colonel or Major Tyler, were to descend the Alleghany; for whose accommodation light boats had been built, and were ready." I inquired what would be their course. He said: "This territory would be revolutionized, where the people were ready to join them, and that there would be some seizing, he supposed, at New Orleans; that they expected to be ready to embark about the first of February, and intended to land at Vera Cruz, and to march from thence to Mexico." I observed that there were several millions of dollars in the bank of this place, to which he replied, "We know it full well." And on remarking that they certainly did not mean to violate private property, he said they "merely meant to borrow. and would return it; that they must equip themselves in New Orleans; that they expected naval protection from Great Britain; that the Capt. ——, and the officer of our navy, were so disgusted with the government that they were ready to join; that similar disgusts prevailed throughout the western country, where the people were zealous in favor of the enterprise, and that pilot boat built schooners were contracted for along our southern coast for their service; that he had been accompanied from the Falls of Ohio to Kaskaskias, and from thence to Fort Adams, by a Mr. Ogden, who had proceeded on to New Orleans with letters from Colonel Burr to his friends there." Swartwout asked me whether I had heard from Doctor Bollman; and on my answering in the negative, he expressed great surprise, and observed, "that the doctor and a Mr. Alexander had left Philadelphia before him, with despatches for me, and that they were to proceed by sea to New Orleans, where he said they must have arrived."

[Though determined to deceive him if possible, I could not refrain from telling Mr. Swartwout it was impossible that I could ever dishonor my commission; and I believe I duped him by my admiration of the plan, and by observing, "that although I could not join in the expedition, the engagements which the Spaniards had prepared for me in my front, might prevent my opposing it," yet I did, the moment I had deciphered the letter, put it into the hands of Colonel Cushing, my adjutant and inspector, making the declaration that I should oppose the lawless enterprise with my utmost force. Mr. Swartwout informed me that he was under engagements to meet Colonel Burr at Nashville the 20th of November, and requested of me to write him, which I declined; and on his leaving Natchitoches, about the 18th of October, I immediately employed Lieutenant T. A. Smith to convey the information, in substance to the president, without the commitment of names; for, from the extraordinary nature of the project, and the more extraordinary appeal to me, I could not but doubt its reality, notwithstanding the testimony before me, and I did not attach solid belief to Mr. Swartwout's report respecting their intentions on this territory and city, until I received confirmatory advice from St. Louis. After my return from the Sabine, I crossed the country to Natchez, and on my descent of the Mississippi from that place, I found Swartwout and Peter V. Ogden at Fort Adams. With the latter I held no communication, but was informed by Swartwout, that he (Ogden) had returned so far from New Orleans, on his route to Tennessee, but had been so much alarmed by certain reports in circulation that he was afraid to proceed. I inquired whether he bore letters with him from New Orleans, and was informed by Swartwout that he did not, but that a Mr. Spence had been sent from New Orleans through the country to Nashville, with letters for Colonel Burr.

[I reached this city the 25th ultimo, and on the next morning James Alexander, Esq., visited me. He inquired of me aside whether I had seen Doctor Bollman, and on my answering in the negative, he asked me whether I would suffer him to conduct Bollman to me, which I refused. He appeared desirous to communicate something, but I felt no inclination to inculpate this young man, and he left me. A few days after he paid me a second visit, and seemed desirous to communicate, which I avoided until he had risen to take leave. I then raised my finger, and observed, "Take care, you are playing a dangerous game." He answered, "It will succeed." I again observed, "Take care." And he replied with a strong affirmation, "Burr will be here by the beginning of next month." In addition to these corroborating circumstances against Alexander, I beg leave to refer to the accompanying documents, A, B. From all which I feel no hesitation in declaring, under the solemn obligation of an oath, that I do believe the said Swartwout, Alexander, and Ogden, have been parties to, and have been concerned in, the insurrection form-

[Deposition of William Eaton:

[Early last winter Col. Aaron Burr, late vice president of the United States, signified to me, at this place, that, under the authority of the general government, he was organizing a secret expedition against the Spanish provinces on our south-western borders, which expedition he was to lead, and in which he was authorized to invite me to take the command of a division. I had never before been made personally acquainted with Col. Burr, and, having for many years been employed in foreign service, I knew but little about the estimation this gentleman now held in the opinion of his countrymen and his government; the rank and confidence by which he had so lately been distinguished, left me no right to suspect his patriotism. I knew him a soldier. In case of a war with the Spanish nation, which, from the tenor of the president's message to both houses of congress, seemed probable, I should have thought it my duty to obey so honorable a call of my country; and, under that impression, I did engage to embark in the expedition. I had frequent interviews with Col. Burr in this city, and, for a considerable time, his object seemed to be to instruct me by maps, and other information, the feasibility of penetrating to Mexico; always carrying forward the idea that the measure was authorized by government. At length, some time in February, he began by degrees to unveil himself. He reproached the government with want of character, want of gratitude, and want of justice. He seemed desirous of irritating resentment in my breast by dilating on certain injuries he felt I had suffered from reflections made on the floor of the house of representatives concerning my operations in Barbary, and from the delays of government in adjusting my claims for disbursements on that coast during my consular agency at Tunis; and he said he would point me to an honorable mode of indemnity. I now began to entertain a suspicion that Mr. Burr was projecting an unauthorized military expedition, which, to me, was enveloped in mystery; and, desirous to draw an explanation from him, I suffered him to suppose me resigned to his counsel. He now laid open his project of revolutionizing the western country, separating it from the Union, establishing a monarchy there, of which he was to be the sovereign, and New Orleans to be his capital, organizing a force on the waters of the Mississippi, and extending conquest to Mexico. I suggested a number of impediments to his scheme, such as the republican habits of the citizens of that country, and their affection towards our present administration of government, the want of funds; the resistance he would meet from the regular army of the United States, on those frontiers, and the opposition of Miranda, in case he should succeed to republicanize the Mexicans.

[Mr. Burr found no difficulty in removing these obstacles. He said he had, the preceding season, made a tour through that country, and had secured the attachment of the principal citizens of Kentucky, Tennessee and Louisiana, to his person and his measures; declared he had inexhaustible resources to funds; assured me the regular army would act with him, and would be reinforced by ten or twelve thousand men from the abovementioned states and territory, and from other parts of the Union; said he had powerful agents in the Spanish territory; and, as for Miranda, said Mr. Burr, we must hang Miranda. He now proposed to give me the second command in his army. I asked him who should have the chief command. He said, "General Wilkinson." I observed it was singular that he should count on General Wilkinson. The elevated rank and high trust he now held as commander in chief of our army and governor of a province, he would hardly put at hazard for any precarious prospects of aggrandizement. Mr. Burr said, General Wilkinson, balanced in the confidence of government, was doubtful of retaining much longer the consideration he now enjoyed, and was, consequently, prepared to secure to himself a permanency. I asked Mr. Burr if he knew General Wilkinson. He answered, "Yes," and echoed the question. I said I knew him well. "What do you know of him?" said Mr. Burr. I know, I replied, that General Wilkinson will act as lieutenant to no man in existence. "You are in an error," said Mr. Burr. "Wilkinson will act as lieutenant to me." From the tenor of repeated conversations with Mr. Burr, I was induced to believe the plan of separating the Union, which he had contemplated, had been communicated to, and approved of by, General Wilkinson (though I now suspect it an artful argument of seduction), and he often expressed a full confidence that the general's influence, the offer of double pay and double rations, the prospect of plunder, and the ambition of achievement, would draw the army into his measures. Mr. Burr talked of the establishment of an independent government west of the Alleghany as a matter of inherent constitutional right of the people, a change which would eventually take place, and for the operation of which the present crisis was peculiarly favorable. "There was," said he, "no energy in the government to be dreaded, and the divisions of political opinions throughout the Union was a circumstance of which we should profit." There were very many enterprising men among us, who aspired to something beyond the dull pursuits of civil life, and who would volunteer in this enterprise, and the vast territory belonging to the United States, which offered to adventurers, and the mines of Mexico, would bring strength to his standard from all quarters. I listened to the exposition of Colonel Burr's views with seeming acquiescence. Every interview convinced me more and more that he had organized a deep-laid plot of treason in the west, in the accomplishment of which he felt fully confident, till, at length, I discovered that his ambition was not bounded by the waters of the Mississippi and Mexico, but that he meditated overthrowing the present government of our country. He said, if he could gain over the marine corps, and secure the naval commanders, Truxton, Preble, Decatur, and others, he would turn congress neck and heels out of doors, assassinate the president, seize on the treasury and the navy, and declare himself the protector of an energetic government. The honorable trust of corrupting the marine corps, and of sounding Commodore Preble and Captain Decatur, Colonel Burr proposed confiding to me. Shocked at this proposition, I dropped the mask, and exclaimed against his views. He talked of the degraded situation of our country, and the necessity of a blow by which its energy and its dignity should be restored; said, if that blow could be struck here at this time, he was confident of the support of the best blood of America. I told Colonel Burr he deceived himself in presuming that he, or any other man, could excite a party in this country who would countenance him in such a plot of desperation, murder and treason. He replied, that he, perhaps, knew better the dispositions of the influential citizens of this country than I did. I told him one solitary word would destroy him. He asked, "What word?" I answered, "Usurper." He smiled at my hesitation, and quoted some great examples in his favor. I observed to him, that I had lately traveled from one extreme of the Union to the other; and though I found a diversity of political opinion among the people, they appeared united at the most distance aspect of national danger. That, for the section of the Union to which I belonged, I would vouch, that should he succeed in the first instance here, he would within six weeks afterwards have his throat cut by Yankee militia.

[Though wild and extravagant Mr. Burr's last project, and though fraught with premeditated slaughter, I felt very easy on the subject, because its defeat he had deposited in my own hands. I did not feel so secure concerning that of disjointing the Union. But the very interesting and embarrassing situation in which his communications placed me, left me, I confess, at a stand to know how to conduct myself with propriety. He had committed no overt act of aggression against law. I could draw nothing from him in writing, nor could I learn that he had exposed his plans to any person near me, by whom my testimony could be supported. He had mentioned to me no persons who were principally and decidedly engaged with him, except General Wilkinson, a Mr. Alston, who I found was his son-in-law, and a Mr. Ephraim Kibby, late a captain of rangers in General Wayne's army. Satisfied that Mr. Burr was resolute in pushing his project of rebellion in the west of the Alleghany, and apprehensive that it was too well and too extensively organized to be easily suppressed, though I dreaded the weight of his character when laid in the balance against my solitary assertion, I brought myself to the resolution to endeavor to defeat it by getting him removed from among us, or to expose myself to all consequences, by a disclosure of his intentions. Accordingly, I waited on the president of the United States, and after some desultory conversation, in which I aimed to draw his view to the westward, I used the freedom to say to the president I thought Mr. Burr should be sent out of this country, and gave for reason that I believed him dangerous in it. The president asked where he should be sent. I mentioned London and Cadiz. The president thought the trust too important, and seemed to entertain a doubt of Mr. Burr's integrity. I intimated that no one, perhaps, had stronger grounds to mistrust Mr. Burr's moral integrity than myself; yet, I believed ambition so much predominated over him, that when placed on an eminence, and put on his honor, respect to himself would insure his fidelity. His talents were unquestionable. I perceived the subject was disagreeable to the president; and to give it the shortest course to the point, declared my concern that if Mr. Burr were not in some way disposed of, we should, within eighteen months, have an insurrection, if not a revolution, on the waters of the Mississippi. The president answered, that he had too much confidence in the information, integrity, and the attachment to the Union, of the citizens of that country, to admit an apprehension of the kind I am happy that events prove this confidence well placed. As no interrogatories followed my expression of alarm, I thought silence on the subject, at that time and place, became me. But I detailed, about the same time, the whole projects of Mr. Burr to certain members of congress. They believed Colonel Burr capable of anything, and agreed that the fellow ought to be hanged; but thought his projects too chimerical, and his circumstances too desperate, to give the subject the merit of serious consideration. The total security of feeling in those to whom I had rung the tocsin, induced me to suspect my own apprehensions unseasonable, or at least too deeply admitted; and, of course, I grew indifferent about the subject.

[Mr. Burr's visits to me became less frequent, and his conversation less familiar.

He appeared to have abandoned the idea of a general revolution, but seemed determined on that of the Mississippi; and, although I could perceive symptoms of distrust in him towards me, he manifested great solicitude to engage me with him in the enterprise. Weary of his importunity, and at once to convince him of my serious attachments, I gave the following toast to the public: The United States. Palsy to the brain that should plot to dismember, and leprosy to the hand that will not draw to defend, our Union! I doubt whether the sentiment was better understood by any of my acquaintance than Colonel Burr. Our intercourse ended here. We met but seldom afterwards. I returned to my farm in Massachusetts and thought no more of Mr. Burr, nor his empire, till some time late in September or beginning of October, when a letter from Maurice Belknap, of Marietta, to Timothy E. Danielson, fell into my hands at Brimfield, which satisfied me that Mr. Burr had actually commenced his preparatory operations on the Ohio. I now spoke publicly of the fact; transmitted a copy of the letter from Belknap to the department of state, and about the same time forwarded, through the hands of the postmaster general, to the president of the United States, a statement in substance of what is here above detailed concerning the Mississippi conspiracy of the said Colonel Aaron Burr, which is said to have been the first formal intelligence received by the executive on the subject of the conspiracy being in motion.

[I know not whether my country will allow me the merit of correctness of conduct in this affair. The novelty of the duty might, perhaps, have embarrassed stronger minds than mine. The uprightness of my intentions, I hope will not be questioned. The interviews between Colonel Burr and myself, from which the foregoing statement has resulted, were chiefly in this city, in the months of February and March, last year.

[Deposition of James L. Donaldson:

[In open court personally appears James Lowry Donaldson, who, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that he was in the city of New Orleans, in the Orleans territory, and the environs of said city, from the 15th day of October to the 10th day of December, 1806; that during the latter part of this time he was frequently in the company of General James Wilkinson, and visited the general the day after his arrival at New Orleans. On this occasion, this deponent received in confidence from General Wilkinson information to the following purport; that the general had undoubted and indisputable evidence of a treasonable design formed by Aaron Burr and others to dismember the Union, by a separation of the western states and territories from the Atlantic states; that New Orleans was in immediate danger, and that he had concluded a hasty compromise with the Spaniards, so as to be able to withdraw his troops instantly to this the immediate object of attack and great vulnerable point; that he had received a letter from Burr holding forth great inducements to him to become a party, of which he showed me the original in cypher, and another written paper purporting to be a deciphered copy of the letter. He expressed great indignation of the plot, and surprise that one so well acquainted with him as Burr should dare to make to him so degrading a proposal, and declared his determination of defeating the enterprise, or perishing in the attempt. He observed, in addition, that there were many agents of Mr. Burr then in the town, who had already been assiduous in their visits, and towards whom he was determined to act with cautious ambiguity, so as at the same time to become possessed of the whole extent of the plan, the persons engaged, and the time of its execution, and also to prevent any attempt on his person, of which he declared he had serious apprehensions. Of the number of these agents he was not aware, but mentioned the names of two of whom he was certain. Messrs. Bollman and Alexander. From time to time, as this deponent had interviews with General Wilkinson, he informed this deponent that he had received additional information respecting the movements and designs of Burr by means of these agents, of whom he considered Bollman as the principal. In the course of these transactions, this deponent was employed by General Wilkinson in the copying of certain papers and documents, and preparing certain despatches for the general government, which the general intended to forward by the brig Thetis. While thus employed at the general's lodgings, this deponent has remarked, upon two different occasions, a person knock for admittance at a door with a window in it opposite the table where this deponent was sitting, who, this deponent was informed by General Wilkinson, was Doctor Bollman. Upon these occasions the general has suddenly risen from his seat, and accompanied this person in a number of turns up and down a balcony in the front of the house, apparently engaged in deep conversation. Upon the latter of these occasions the general, on his return into the chamber, said to this deponent: "That is Doctor Bollman. His infatuation is truly extraordinary. He persists in his belief that I am with Burr, and has this moment shown me a letter from the latter, in which he says that he is to be at Natchez on the 20th December with 2,000 men, that 4,000 will follow in the course of a few days, and that he could, with the same ease, have procured double that number." General Wilkinson then observed that he had obtained all the information he wanted, and that the affair would not be kept much longer a secret from the public. When this deponent left the city of New Orleans, the inhabitants of that city were in a state of great alarm, and apprehended a serious attack from Mr. Burr and his confederates. This deponent understood that mercantile business was much embarrassed, and great fears were entertained of considerable commercial failures in consequence of the embargo which had been imposed, that General Wilkinson was taking strong measures of defense, and that 400 persons were then actually engaged in the fortifications of the city. And further this deponent saith not

[Deposition of Lieutenant W. Wilson:

[I left New Orleans on my way to this city on the 15th of December last. At that time and for some time preceding, the strongest apprehensions and belief universally prevailed among the inhabitants of that city, that Aaron Burr and his confederates had prepared an armed force, and were advancing to attack and plunder the city, in consequence of which the greatest alarms prevailed, a general stagnation of business ensued, and the danger was credited there as a matter of public notoriety; that Brigadier General Wilkinson, with the army of the United States, was at New Orleans, occupied in the most active military preparations for the defense of the place, repairing the forts, mounting cannon, collecting ammunition, etc.,—all under the firm persuasion and belief that such an attack was meditated, and about very speedily to take place, by the said Burr. This deponent knows that the general was decidedly of opinion, from the most satisfactory information, that the said Burr and his confederates were advancing with an armed force against this place. And further this deponent saith not.

[The deposition of Ensign W. C. Mead is precisely similar to that of Lieut. Wilson, except that the former states that he left New Orleans on the 19th of December.] [2]

Major Perkins testified that on the night of the 18th or 19th of February last, he was at Washington Court House. At about 11 o'clock, as he was standing at the door of the house occupied by the sheriff, he observed two men coming down the road. The moon afforded him light enough to enable him to see objects at some distance. The foremost man, who was thirty or forty yards before his companion, and who turned out to be Colonel Burr, passed near the door without stopping or speaking. Burr's companion stopped and inquired the way to Major Hinson's; the way was pointed out, but Perkins informed him that the major was from home, and that in consequence of a late rise in the waters, he would experience some difficulty in getting there that night; the stranger, however, went on. Perkins, struck with this midnight journey, the silence of the person who had first passed, the unwillingness of the travellers to stop at a public place, where they and their horses might have been accommodated, and their determination to continue their route to Hinson's after information was given that he was from home, communicated to the sheriff his suspicion that these men must be under the influence of some extraordinary motive. Possibly they might be robbers, or perhaps one of them was Burr endeavoring to make his escape. He had been informed that Burr had left Natchez. Impressed by these suspicions, he urged the sheriff, who had gone to bed, to arise and go with him to Hinson's. After some time the sheriff agreed to accompany him, and they went to Hinson's, where they found both the travellers. Burr, who had been in the kitchen to warm himself, soon came into the room where his companion and Perkins were. Perkins eyed him attentively, but never got a full view of his face. He discerned that Burr once glanced his eye at him, apparently with a view to ascertain whether Perkins was observing him, but withdrew it immediately. The latter had heard Mr. Burr's eyes mentioned as being remarkably keen, and this glance from him strengthened his suspicions. He determined immediately to take measures for apprehending him. He accordingly left the place, after mentioning in a careless manner the way he meant to take. The way he indicated was opposite to the course he thought Burr would pursue. After getting beyond the reach of observation he took the road to Fort Stoddart, and obtained the aid of the commandant and four soldiers." The commandant of the fort was Captain Gaines, (afterwards the well-known Major General Gaines.) At sunrise he and Perkins, with four dragoons, started in search of the travellers, and met them two miles from Hinson's house, about nine o'clock in the morning. Captain Gaines rode forward and addressed the suspected personage: "I presume, sir," said he, "that I have the honor of addressing Colonel Burr." "I am a traveller in the country," was the reply, "and do not recognize your right to ask such a question." Whereupon Gaines said, "I arrest you at the instance of the federal government." "By what authority do you arrest a traveller on the highway, on his own private business?" asked Burr. "I am an officer in the army," answered the captain, "and I hold in my hand the proclamation of the president and the governor directing your arrest."

[2] [From 4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 455.]

Major Perkins further testified that while they were on their way to Washington, at Chester Court House, in the back part of South Carolina, Mr. Burr, observing a small collection of people, got off his horse, went into the company, asked for a magistrate, and complained of being under an illegal arrest and military guard. Perkins, however, soon reinstated him on his horse, and directed the guard to proceed. The people manifested no disposition to interfere.

After the evidence was gone through, Mr. Hay, district attorney, submitted a motion in writing for the commitment of the prisoner on the two charges above mentioned. A discussion was then agreed, on both sides, to be necessary; and, in pursuance of the previous arrangement, Mr. Hay moved an adjournment to the capitol, to which the counsel of Colonel Burr assented. Colonel Burr was then admitted to bail in the sum of five thousand dollars, for his appearance on the following day, at ten o'clock, a. m.

Tuesday, March 31, 1807.

At ten o'clock MARSHALL, Chief Justice, took his seat on the bench, in the court room, which was densely filled with citizens. Cæsar Rodney, attorney general of the United States, and George Hay, United States attorney for the district of Virginia, appeared as counsel for the prosecution. Counsel for Colonel Burr, Edmund Randolph, Esq., and John Wickham, Esq. On the suggestion of counsel that it would be impossible to accommodate the spectators in the court room, the chief justice adjourned to the hall of the house of delegates.

Mr. Hay opened the argument on the motion to commit. He stated the first offence to be a violation of the fifth section of an act of congress passed June 5, 1794 [1 Stat. 384], entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," continued in force for limited periods by several succeeding laws, and continued without limitation by an act passed in 1797 [Id. 497]. Secondly, he insisted that there was probable cause to suspect that the prisoner had committed an act of treason; that he intended to take the city of New Orleans, make it the seat of his dominion and the capital of his empire; and that this charge was proved by the affidavits exhibited in the Cases of Bollman and Swartwout. He relied upon the opinion of the supreme court in that case as supporting the doctrine for which he contended, and went into a minute examination of the evidence to show that it brought the case within the definition of treason as laid down in said opinion. He also commented on the flight of Col. Burr from justice.

Mr. Wickham and Mr. Randolph replied, denying that there was any evidence that an overt act of treason had been committed, or probable cause to believe Col. Burr guilty of such a crime. As to the other charge, the evidence to sustain it was trivial, but if deemed sufficient to put him on his trial, it was a bailable offence; and in view of the fact that Col. Burr had been brought to a place where he had fewer friends than in almost any other part of the United States, it would be improper to require him to give bail in a large sum.

Col. Burr then addressed the court, not, as he said, to remedy any omission of his counsel, who had done great justice to the subject, but to state a few facts, and repel some observations of a personal nature. The present inquiry involved a simple question of treason or misdemeanor. According to the constitution, treason consisted in acts; an arrest could only be justified by the suspicion of acts; whereas, in this case, his honor was invited to issue a warrant upon mere conjecture. Alarms existed without cause. Mr. Wilkinson alarmed the president, and the president alarmed the people of Ohio. He appealed to historical facts. No sooner did he understand that suspicions were entertained in Kentucky of the nature and design of his movements, than he hastened to meet an investigation. The prosecution not being prepared, he was discharged. That he then went to Tennessee. While there he heard that the attorney for the district of Kentucky was preparing another prosecution against him; that he immediately returned to Frankfort, presented himself before the court, and again was honorably discharged; that what happened in the Mississippi territory was equally well known; that there he was not only acquitted by the grand jury, but they went farther, and censured the conduct of the government; and if there had been really any cause of alarm, it must have been felt by the people of that part of the country; that the manner of his descent down the river was a fact which put at defiance all rumors about treason or misdemeanor; that the nature of his equipments clearly evinced that his object was purely peaceable and agricultural; that this fact alone ought to overthrow the testimony against him; that his designs were honorable, and would have been useful to the United States. His flight, as it was termed, had been mentioned as evidence of guilt. He asked, at what time did he fly? In Kentucky he invited inquiry, and that inquiry terminated in a firm conviction of his innocence; that the alarms were at first great in the Mississippi territory, and orders had been issued to seize and destroy the persons and property of himself and party; that he endeavored to undeceive the people, and convince them that he had no designs hostile to the United States, but that twelve hundred men were in arms for a purpose not yet developed; the people could not be deceived; and he was acquitted, and promised the protection of the government; but the promise could not be performed; the arm of military power could not be resisted; that he knew there were military orders to seize his person and property, and transport him to a distance from that place; that he was assured by the officer of an armed boat, that it was lying in the river ready to receive him on board. Was it his duty to remain there thus situated? That he took the advice of his best friends, pursued the dictates of his own judgment, and abandoned a country where the laws ceased to be the sovereign power; that the charge stated in a hand-bill, that he had forfeited his recognizance, was false; that he had forfeited no recognizance; if he had forfeited any recognizance, he asked why no proceedings had taken place for the breach of it? If he was to be prosecuted for such breach, he wished to know why he was brought to this place? Why not carry him to the place where the breach happened? That more than three months had elapsed since the order of the government had issued to seize and bring him to that place; yet it was pretended that sufficient time had not been allowed to adduce testimony in support of the prosecution. He asked why the guard who conducted him to that place avoided every magistrate on the way, unless from a conviction that they were acting without lawful authority? Why had he been debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper, and not even permitted to write to his daughter? That in the state of South Carolina, where he happened to see three men together, he demanded the interposition of the civil authority; that it was from military despotism, from the tyranny of a military escort, that he wished to be delivered, not from an investigation into his conduct, or from the operation of the laws of his country. He concluded that there were three courses that might be pursued,—an acquittal; or a commitment for treason, or for a misdemeanor; that no proof existed in support of either but what was contained in the affidavits of Eaton and Wilkinson, abounding in crudities and absurdities.

Mr. Rodney, attorney general, then closed the argument on behalf of the United States.

The CHIEF JUSTICE remarked that he would deliver an opinion in writing the next day, and thereupon Col. Burr's recognizance was renewed for his appearance at the capitol on the following day at ten o'clock.

Wednesday, April 1, 1807.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. I am required on the part of the attorney for the United States to commit the accused on two charges: (1) For setting on foot and providing the means for an expedition against the territories of a nation at peace with the United States. (2) For committing high treason against the United States.

On an application of this kind I certainly should not require that proof which would be necessary to convict the person to be committed, on a trial in chief; nor should I even require that which should absolutely convince my own mind of the guilt of the accused: but I ought to require, and I should require, that probable cause be shown; and I understand probable cause to be a case made out by proof furnishing good reason to believe that the crime alleged has been committed by the person charged with having committed it. I think this opinion entirely reconcilable with that quoted from Judge Blackstone. When that learned and accurate commentator says, that "if upon an inquiry it manifestly appears that no such crime has been committed, or that the suspicion entertained of the prisoner was wholly groundless, in such cases only it is lawful totally to discharge him, otherwise he must be committed to prison or give bail," I do not understand him as meaning to say that the hand of malignity may grasp any individual against whom its hate may be directed, or whom it may capriciously seize, charge him with some secret crime, and put him on the proof of his innocence. But I understand that the foundation of the proceeding must be a probable cause to believe there is guilt; which probable cause is only to be done away in the manner stated by Blackstone. The total failure of proof on the part of the accuser would be considered by that writer as being in itself a legal manifestation of the innocence of the accused. In inquiring, therefore, into the charges exhibited against Aaron Burr, I hold myself bound to consider how far those charges are supported by probable cause.

The first charge stands upon the testimony of General Eaton and General Wilkinson. The witness first named proves that among other projects which were more criminal, Colonel Burr meditated an expedition against the Mexican dominions of Spain. This deposition may be considered as introductory to the affidavit of General Wilkinson, and as explanatory of the objects of any military preparations which may have been made. I proceed, then, to that affidavit. To make the testimony of General Wilkinson bear on Colonel Burr, it is necessary to consider as genuine the letter stated by the former to be, as nearly as he can make it, an interpretation of one received in cypher from the latter. Exclude this letter, and nothing remains in the testimony which can in the most remote degree affect Colonel Burr. That there are to the admissibility of this part of the affidavit great and obvious objections need not be stated to those who know with how much caution proceedings in criminal cases ought to be instituted, and who know that the highest tribunal of the United States has been divided on them. When this question came before the supreme court, I felt the full force of these objections, although I did not yield to them. On weighing in my own mind the reasons for and against acting, in this stage of the business, on that part of the affidavit, those in favor of doing so appeared to me to preponderate, and, as this opinion was not overruled, I hold myself still at liberty to conform to it. That the original letter, or a true copy of it accompanied by the cypher, would have been much more satisfactory, is not to be denied; but I thought, and I still think, that, upon a mere question whether the accused shall be brought to trial or not, upon an inquiry not into guilt but into probable cause, the omission of a circumstance which is indeed important, but which does not disprove the positive allegations of an affidavit, ought not to induce its rejection or its absolute disbelief, when the maker of the affidavit is at too great a distance to repair the fault. I could not in this stage of the prosecution absolutely discredit the affidavit, because the material facts alleged may very well be within the knowledge of the witness, although he has failed to state explicitly all the means by which this knowledge is obtained. Thus, General Wilkinson states that this letter was received from Colonel Burr, but does not say that it was in his hand-writing, nor does he state the evidence which supports this affirmation. But, in addition to the circumstance that the positive assertion of the fact ought not perhaps, in this stage of the inquiry, to be disregarded, the nature of the case furnishes that evidence. The letter was in cypher. General Wilkinson, it is true, does not say that a cypher had been previously settled between Colonel Burr and himself, in which they might correspond on subjects which, though innocent, neither of them might wish to subject to the casualties of a transportation from the Atlantic to the Mississippi; but when we perceive that Colonel Burr has written in cypher, and that General Wilkinson is able to decypher the letter, we must either presume that the bearer of the letter was also the bearer of its key, or that the key was previously in possession of the person to whom the letter was addressed. In stating particularly the circumstances attending the delivery of this letter, General Wilkinson does not say that it was accompanied by the key, or that he felt any surprise at its being in cypher. For this reason, as well as because there is not much more security in sending a letter in cypher, accompanied by its key, than there is in sending a letter not in cypher, I think it more reasonable to suppose that the key was previously in possession of Wilkinson. If this was the fact, the letter being written in a cypher previously settled between himself and Colonel Burr, is, in this stage of the inquiry at least, a circumstance which sufficiently supports the assertion that the letter was written by Colonel Burr. The enterprise described in this letter is obviously a military enterprise, and must have been intended either against the United States, or against the territories of some other power on the continent, with all of whom the United States were at peace. The expressions of this letter must be admitted to furnish at least probable cause for believing that the means for the expedition were provided. In every part of it we find declarations indicating that he was providing the means for the expedition; and as these means might be provided in secret, I do not think that further testimony ought to be required to satisfy me that there is probable cause for committing the prisoner on this charge. Since it will be entirely in the power of the attorney general to prefer an indictment against the prisoner, for any other offence which he shall think himself possessed of testimony to support, it is, in fact, immaterial whether the second charge be expressed in the warrant of commitment or not; but as I hold it to be my duty to insert every charge alleged on the part of the United States, in support of which probable cause is shown, and to insert none in support of which probable cause is not shown, I am bound to proceed in the inquiry.

The second charge exhibited against the prisoner is high treason against the United States in levying war against them. As this is the most atrocious offence which can be committed against the political body, so is it the charge which is most capable of being employed as the instrument of those malignant and vindictive passions which may rage in the bosoms of contending parties struggling for power. It is that of which the people of America have been most jealous, and therefore, while other crimes are unnoticed, they have refused to trust the national legislature with the definition of this, but have themselves declared in their constitution that "it shall consist only in levying war against the United States, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." This high crime consists of overt acts, which must be proved by two witnesses, or by the confession of the party in open court. Under the control of this constitutional regulation, I am to inquire whether the testimony laid before me furnishes probable cause in support of this charge. The charge is, that the fact itself has been committed, and the testimony to support it must furnish probable cause for believing that it has been actually committed, or it is insufficient for the purpose for which it is adduced. Upon this point, too, the testimony of General Eaton is first to be considered. That part of his deposition which bears upon this charge is the plan disclosed by the prisoner for seizing upon New Orleans, and revolutionizing the Western states. That this plan, if consummated by over acts, would amount to treason, no man will controvert. But it is equally clear that an intention to commit treason is an offence entirely distinct from the actual commission of that crime. War can only be levied by the employment of actual force. Troops must be embodied, men must be assembled, in order to levy war. If Colonel Burr had been apprehended on making these communications to General Eaton, could it have been alleged that he had gone further than to meditate the crime? Could it have been said that he had actually collected forces and had actually levied war? Most certainly it could not. The crime really complete was a conspiracy to commit treason, not an actual commission of treason. If these communications were not treason at the instant they were made, no lapse of time can make them so. They are not in themselves acts. They may serve to explain the intention with which acts were committed, but they cannot supply those acts if they be not proved. The next testimony is the deposition of General Wilkinson, which consists of the letter already noticed, and of the communications made by the bearer of that letter. This letter has already been considered by the supreme court of the United States, and has been declared to import, taken by itself or in connection with Eaton's deposition, rather an expedition against Mexico than the territories of the United States. By that decision I am bound, whether I concurred in it or not. But I did concur in it. On this point the court was unanimous. It is, however, urged that the declarations of Swartwout may be connected with the letter and used against Colonel Burr. Although the confession of one man cannot criminate another, yet I am inclined to think that, on a mere inquiry into probable cause, the declaration of Swartwout made on this particular occasion may be used against Colonel Burr. My reason for thinking so is, that Colonel Burr's letter authorizes Mr. Swartwout to speak in his name. He empowers Mr. Swartwout to make to General Wilkinson verbal communications explanatory of the plans and designs of Burr, which Burr adopts as his own explanations. However inadmissible, therefore, this testimony may be on a trial in chief, I am inclined to admit it on this inquiry. If it be admitted, what is its amount? Upon this point, too, it appears that the supreme court was divided. I therefore hold myself at liberty to pursue my own opinion, which was, that the words, "this territory must be revolutionized," did not so clearly apply to a foreign territory as to reject that sense which would make them applicable to a territory of the United States, at least so far as to admit of further inquiry into their meaning. And if a territory of the United States was to be revolutionized, though only as a means for an expedition against a foreign power, the act would be treason. This reasoning leads to the conclusion that there is probable cause for the allegation that treasonable designs were entertained by the prisoner so late as July last, when this letter was written.

It remains to inquire whether there is also probable cause to believe that these designs have been ripened into the crime itself, by actually levying war against the United States. It has been already observed that, to constitute this crime, troops must be embodied, men must be actually assembled; and these are facts which cannot remain invisible. Treason may be machinated in secret, but it can be perpetrated only in open day, and in the eye of the world. Testimony of a fact which in its own nature is so notorious ought to be unequivocal. The testimony now offered has been laid before the supreme court of the United States and has been determined in the Cases of Bollman and Swartwout, [4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 75], not to furnish probable cause for the opinion that war had been actually levied. Whatever might have been the inclination of my own mind in that case, I should feel much difficulty in departing from the decision then made, unless this case could be clearly distinguished from it. I will, however, briefly review the arguments which have been urged, and the facts now before me, in order to show more clearly the particular operation they have on my own judgment. The fact to be established is, that in pursuance of these designs, previously entertained, men have been actually assembled for the purpose of making war against the United States; and on the showing of probable cause that this fact has been committed, depends the issue of the present inquiry. The first piece of testimony relied on to render this fact probable is the declaration of Mr. Swartwout, that "Colonel Burr was levying an armed body of 7,000 men from the state of New York, and the Western states and territories, with a view to carry an expedition against the Mexican provinces." The term "levying" has been said, according to the explanation of the lexicons, to mean the embodying of troops, and therefore to prove what is required. Although I do not suppose that Mr. Swartwout had consulted a dictionary, I have looked into Johnson for the term, and find its first signification to be "to raise;" its second, "to bring together." In common parlance, it may signify the one or the other. But its sense is certainly decided by the fact. If when Mr. Swartwout left Colonel Burr, which must be supposed to have been in July, he was actually embodying men from New York to the Western states, what could veil his troops from human sight? An invisible army is not the instrument of war, and had these troops been visible, some testimony relative to them could have been adduced. I take the real sense, then, in which this term was used to be, that Colonel Burr was raising, or in other words engaging or enlisting, men through the country described, for the enterprise he meditated. The utmost point to which this testimony can be extended is, that it denotes a future embodying of men, which is more particularly mentioned in the letter itself, and that it affords probable cause to believe that the troops did actually embody at the period designated for their assembling, which is sufficient to induce the justice to whom the application is made to commit for trial. I shall readily avow my opinion, that the strength of the presumption arising from this testimony ought to depend greatly on the time at which the application is made. If soon after the period at which the troops were to assemble, when full time had not elapsed to ascertain the fact, these circumstances had been urged as the ground for a commitment on the charge of treason, I should have thought them entitled to great consideration. I will not deny that, in the Cases of Bollman and Swartwout, I was not perfectly satisfied that they did not warrant an inquiry into the fact. But I think every person must admit that the weight of these circumstances daily diminishes. Suspicion may deserve great attention when the means of ascertaining its real grounds are not yet possessed; but when those means are, or may have been acquired, if facts to support suspicion be not shown, every person, I think, must admit that the ministers of justice at least ought not officially to entertain it. This, I think, must be conceded by all; but whether it be conceded by others or not, it is the dictate of my own judgment, and in the performance of my duty I can know no other guide.

The fact to be proved in this case is an act of public notoriety. It must exist in the view of the world, or it cannot exist at all. The assembling of forces to levy war is a visible transaction, and numbers must witness it. It is therefore capable of proof; and when time to collect this proof has been given, it ought to be adduced, or suspicion becomes ground too weak to stand upon. Several months have elapsed since this fact did occur, if it ever occurred. More than five weeks have elapsed since the opinion of the supreme court has declared the necessity of proving the fact, if it exists. Why is it not proved? To the executive government is intrusted the important power of prosecuting those whose crimes may disturb the public repose or endanger its safety. It would be easy, in much less time than has intervened since Colonel Burr has been alleged to have assembled his troops, to procure affidavits establishing the fact. If, in November or December last, a body of troops had been assembled on the Ohio, it is impossible to suppose that affidavits establishing the fact could not have been obtained by the last of March. I ought not to believe that there has been any remissness on the part of those who prosecute on this important and interesting subject; and consequently, when at this late period no evidence that troops have been actually embodied is given, I must say that the suspicion which in the first instance might have been created ought not to be continued, unless this want of proof can be in some manner accounted for.

It is stated by the attorney for the United States that, as affidavits can only be voluntary, the difficulty of obtaining them accounts for the absence of proof. I cannot admit this position. On the evidence furnished by this very transaction of the attachment felt by our western for their eastern brethren, we justly felicitate ourselves. How inconsistent with this fact is the idea that no man could be found who would voluntarily depose that a body of troops had actually assembled, whose object must be understood to be hostile to the Union, and whose object was detested and defeated by the very people who could give the requisite information! I cannot doubt that means to obtain information have been taken on the part of the prosecution; if it existed, I cannot doubt the practicability of obtaining it; and its non-production at this late hour does not, in my opinion, leave me at liberty to give to those suspicions which grow out of other circumstances that weight to which at an earlier day they might have been entitled. I shall not therefore insert in the commitment the charge of high treason. I repeat, that this is the less important, because it detracts nothing from the right of the attorney to prefer an indictment for high treason, should he be furnished with the necessary testimony.

The CHIEF JUSTICE having delivered his opinion, observed, that as Colonel Burr would be put on his trial for carrying on a military expedition against a nation with whom the United States were at peace, his case was of course bailable. Some discussion then arose as to the amount of bail to be required. The sum was finally fixed at ten thousand dollars; and after a brief adjournment, Colonel Burr, with five sureties entered into a recognizance in that sum, for his appearance at the next circuit court for the district of Virginia, to commence on the 22d day of May following

NOTE.

Historical Sketch of Burr's Western Expedition in the Year 1806.

After his fatal duel with Hamilton, in July, 1804, Colonel Burr became a fugitive and an exile from his home, until the meeting of congress in December following. Ten days after the duel, he left New York at night, by water, landed the next morning at the residence of Commodore Truxton, in New Jersey, and thence made his way, incog., by back roads, to Philadelphia. He remained in that city until a coroner's inquest had pronounced him guilty of murder and a warrant had been issued for his arrest. Fearing that a requisition would be made upon the governor of Pennsylvania by the governor of New York, for his surrender, he secretly left Philadelphia about the middle of August, by sea, sailing for the island of St. Simons, off the coast of Georgia, where a few wealthy planters resided, among whom he had some personal friends. There he was hospitably received, and entertained for about a month. He then visited his daughter, at her home in South Carolina, where he remained until he started on his journey to Washington, to preside over the senate of the United States during the last session of his term as vice president. On reaching Washington, he learned that indictments for murder were pending against him in two states—New York, where Hamilton died, and New Jersey, where the mortal wound was inflicted. No attempt was made, however, to bring him to trial on either. He was received at Washington with the consideration due to his distinguished political position; and he presided over the deliberations of the senate with a dignity, ability, and impartiality which increased his fame as an unrivalled presiding officer. It was during this session that Judge Chase, of the supreme court, was tried on articles of impeachment preferred by the house of representatives. "The impeachment created an intense interest, and the trial attracted a concourse of people to Washington. Under the direction of the vice president, the senate chamber was fitted up in superb style, with seats and subdivisions for all the dignitaries of the nation, as well as for foreign embassadors and spectators. The senators, as judges of this high court, were placed in a grand semicircle on each side of the vice president—an awful array of judicial authority. Temporary galleries were erected and draped with blue cloth, part of which the vice president, with his usual gallantry, appropriated to the ladies. The scene presented while the trial was in progress, as described minutely in the papers of the day, must have been extremely striking. The trial began on the 4th of February, and ended, in a verdict of acquittal, on the 1st of March. The dignity, the grace, the fairness, the prompt, intelligent decision with which the vice president presided over the august court, extorted praise even from his enemies. 'He conducted the trial,' said a newspaper of the day, 'with the dignity and impartiality of an angel, but with the rigor of a devil.' There was a rising tide of reaction in his favor during the closing days of his public life, which, taken at the flood, might have led, if not to fortune, yet to an endurable existence among his countrymen." Parton's Life of Burr. On Saturday, the 2d of March, the vice president took leave of the senate in a speech which produced a profound sensation. This speech was delivered when the senate, being engaged in executive business, was sitting with closed doors, and no authentic report of it has been preserved. In an account of it published at the time in the Washington Federalist, and prepared at the editor's request, by an unknown hand, it is said to have been pronounced by those who heard it, "the most dignified, sublime, and impressive that ever was uttered." "The whole senate," says the same writer, "were in tears, and so unmanned that it was half an hour before they could recover themselves sufficiently to come to order and choose a vice president pro tem." Yet on retiring from the vice presidency, Colonel Burr was a bankrupt, both in political influence and pecuniary resources. If he returned to his home, it would be to encounter indictments for murder and executions against his body for debt. He therefore determined to seek his fortune in a new country.

During his winter's residence in Washington, many of Colonel Burr's friends and admirers had manifested a deep interest in his future, and had been busy devising schemes for retrieving his fortunes, and for bringing him again into political life as a representative from some new state or territory. Conspicuous among these was General Wilkinson, commander in chief of the army, and appointed, about the close of that session of congress, governor of the territory of Louisiana. Between Wilkinson and Burr a friendship of long standing had subsisted. They had been fellow-soldiers in the war of the Revolution—had shared together the weary march to Quebec in the winter of 1775–76, and the perils of the unsuccessful attack on that city, in which their commander, the gallant Montgomery, fell. Though seldom meeting after the war, they had occasionally corresponded, confidentially, in cipher, of which Wilkinson was the inventor. In 1787, Wilkinson, then a citizen of that portion of Virginia which is now the state of Kentucky, having laden a boat with tobacco and flour, had descended the Ohio and Mississippi rivers to New Orleans, with the ostensible purpose of making arrangements with the Spanish authorities by which to secure to the inhabitants of the upper country the free navigation of the Mississippi and a market for their products. Although, on landing, his cargo was seized by the authorities, he had the address to obtain its release, and such further privileges of trading in that city as induced him to establish himself in business there, carrying on a trade, principally in tobacco, from the upper country, for several years. In the year 1791, however, he resumed his military career, obtaining an appointment in the army of the United States, and being placed in the command of the western posts. He was now about to return to the Louisiana country, as governor of all that portion of it not included in the territory of Orleans, now comprising the state of Louisiana. In that direction it was natural that Colonel Burr should turn his eyes. Wilkinson was an arch intriguer, and some years before had been at the head of a party in the West who favored the separation of the Western territories from the Atlantic states. While carrying on trade in New Orleans he had been deeply implicated in an intrigue with the Spanish authorities, having for its object the separation of the district of Kentucky from the United States, and its annexation to the Spanish territory of Louisiana. Whether he really desired the accomplishment of this object, or was merely playing a game with the Spanish authorities for the advancement of his own selfish interests, may be doubted; but the evidence that he was deeply engaged in such an intrigue is now overwhelming. If Burr at this time contemplated any illicit enterprise, looking either to a separation of the Western states and territories from the Union, or an invasion of the Spanish dominions, or both, Wilkinson was the man, of all others, to whom he would have been most likely to disclose his views, and whose co-operation he would be most likely to seek. He was ambitious, exceedingly fond of pomp and show, extravagant in his habits, poor, and addicted to intrigue. On leaving Washington, at the end of his official term, Colonel Burr went to Philadelphia, and there remained about a month. On the 10th of April he started for Pittsburg, performing the journey on horseback in nineteen days. The next day after reaching Pittsburg, he, with a companion, acting as his secretary, embarked for the lower country in a boat which he had previously ordered to be in readiness for that purpose. "This boat was a rude floating house, or ark, sixty feet long and fourteen wide, containing four apartments; a dining room, a kitchen, with fire-place, and two bed-rooms, all lighted by glass windows, and the whole covered by a roof, which served as a promenade deck. The cost of this commodious structure, he found to his astonishment, was only one hundred and thirty-three dollars. Of propelling power it had none, but merely floated down the swift and winding stream, aided occasionally, and kept clear of snags and sand-banks, by a dexterous use of the pole." Parton's Life of Burr. The Ohio river then wound its way through a wilderness just beginning to be marked by the footprints of approaching civilization. Marietta was the most considerable town on its northwestern bank, above Cincinnati, and its vicinity was the longest settled and best improved portion of the new state of Ohio. Colonel Burr landed at Marietta on the 5th of May, where he saw houses "that would be called handsome anywhere."

Fourteen miles below Marietta is the celebrated island on which Harman Blennerhassett, an Irish gentleman of education and refinement, with his accomplished wife and two young children, then lived in a style which was regarded by the denizens of that new country as a true type of princely magnificence. This island is nearly three miles in length, and less than one-fourth of a mile in width, containing between three and four hundred acres of very fertile land. At this time it had been the residence of Blennerhassett about seven years. At a cost of some fifty thousand dollars, he had subdued the wilderness, and erected on the summit of the island, near its upper end, a mansion house of commodious proportions. He had laid out and improved a capacious lawn, planted choice fruits, and embellished his grounds with flowers and shrubbery of rare beauty. The highly-colored picture of this "Eden," drawn by Mr. Wirt in his celebrated speech on the trial of Burr, does not much surpass a description given by the Hon. Charles Fenton Mercer, in a deposition which was read during the pendency of the subsequent motion to commit Burr, Blennerhassett, and Smith for trial in another district. He had visited Blennerhassett in his "island home," and spent a night and a day under his roof, shortly before he left it to follow the fortunes of Burr in his disastrous expedition. "That evening and the following day," he says in his deposition, "I spent at the most elegant seat in Virginia, in the society of Mr. Blennerhassett and his lovely and accomplished lady." Blennerhassett "was the youngest son of a distinguished family which could trace its lineage from the time of King John. His grandfather, Robert, having emigrated from Cumberland, in the time of Elizabeth, became the head of three highly respectable branches of Irish gentry." His wife was "a Miss Agnew, daughter of the lieutenant governor of the Isle of Man, and grand-daughter of the celebrated general of that name who fell at the battle of Germantown." Safford's "Blennerhassett Papers." He was educated for the bar, but shortly after having attained the degree of barrister, by the death of his elder brother he succeeded to the family estates, and abandoned the pursuit of his profession. In 1796 Blennerhassett emigrated to the United States, and two years later established himself on the island where Colonel Burr found him. He was a man of literary tastes, exceedingly fond of music and chemistry, in both of which he was quite a proficient. Supplied with an ample library, an extensive chemical apparatus, and musical instruments, and owning a few negro slaves, he was here enjoying a life of elegant ease, and dispensing a generous hospitality to all who visited his "enchanted isle." He had, however, invested too large a proportion of his fortune (originally about $100,000) in unproductive property, which could minister only to refined tastes and luxurious habits; and he could hardly have maintained his style of living many years longer, even if he had abstained from embarking in the disastrous enterprise which precipitated his ruin. On his voyage down the river, Colonel Burr and his secretary landed on the island, with no other motive, probably, than that of strolling over the grounds. Mrs. Blennerhassett, observing them, sent a servant to invite the strangers to the house. Burr declined the invitation, sending his card. On learning the name of the distinguished visiter, the lady, in the temporary absence of her husband, came out herself to press the invitation. Burr yielded, dined with the family, remained with them till eleven o'clock in the evening, and then proceeded on his voyage. The host and hostess were equally captivated by their visiter. At Cincinnati, then a town of about fifteen hundred inhabitants, Colonel Burr spent a day at the house of John Smith, a senator of the United States for the state of Ohio, and there met his friend Jonathan Dayton, an ex-senator from the state of New Jersey, both of whom were subsequently connected with his Western expedition, and were indicted with him for treason. At Louisville, Colonel Burr left his boat and proceeded on horseback to Nashville. There he was greeted with the utmost enthusiasm, public dinners, balls, and parties being given in honor of his visit.

Before leaving Washington, one of the schemes suggested for bringing Colonel Burr into public life again was the following, proposed by Matthew Lyon, a member of congress from Kentucky, which is here given in his own words: "Let Colonel Burr mount his horse on the 4th of March, and ride through Virginia to Tennessee, giving out that he intends settling in Nashville, in the practice of the law. Let him commence the practice, and fix himself a home there. His rencontre with General Hamilton will not injure him. Let him attend the courts in that district. Let him in July next intimate to some of the numerous friends his preëminent talents and suavity of manners will have made for him, that he would willingly serve the district in congress. They will set the thing on foot, and he is sure to be elected; there is no constitutional bar in the way." This scheme, Mr. Lyon says, was suggested by him to General Wilkinson, who appeared to be highly pleased with it. It was subsequently suggested to Burr himself; but he does not appear to have very earnestly entered into it. Colonel Burr remained four days at Nashville, and was the guest of General Jackson, with whom he had contracted a warm friendship at Washington. On the 3d of June, he, with his secretary, embarked in an open boat to descend the Cumberland river, at the mouth of which they found their "ark," and resumed their voyage down the Ohio. At Fort Massac, sixteen miles below the mouth of the Cumberland, he met General Wilkinson, who was on his way to the theatre of his new official duties. According to General Wilkinson's account of this interview, the subjects of their conversations were perfectly legitimate; relating to a project for making a canal around the falls of the Ohio, to land speculations, and to a scheme for getting Burr into congress. Wilkinson fitted Burr out with "an elegant barge, sails, colors, and ten oars, with a sergeant and ten able, faithful hands," to pursue his voyage to New Orleans; and gave him letters of introduction to his friends in that city. June 25th, sixty-seven days after leaving Philadelphia, the voyager landed on the levee of New Orleans. He was strongly prepossessed in favor of the place. "'I hear so many pleasant things of Orleans,' he wrote to his daughter, 'that I should certainly (if one half of them are verified on inspection) settle down there were it not for Theodosia and her boy; but these will control my fate.' The city then contained about nine thousand inhabitants. Three hundred seagoing vessels and six hundred river flatboats arrived annually at its levees. Four forts, one at each angle of the city, half a mile apart, defended the city. Two of these were regularly constructed fortresses, with fosse, glacis, and drawbridge. The two behind the city were stockades. Since the departure of the Spaniards these fortifications had been partly dismantled, but were capable, in a few weeks, of being restored to their original strength. In 1805 the chief defence of the place was a volunteer corps of Americans and creoles, commanded by Daniel Clark, the great merchant of the city, the founder of that prodigious fortune for which his daughter, Mrs. Gaines, has so long contended in the courts. Daniel Clark had emigrated from England in 1786, and had grown in wealth with the ever-growing prosperity of the city. He had been ardent for the transfer of the province to the United States, was now the leader of the American party in New Orleans, and seemed to be a zealous friend of the Union. To him Colonel Burr presented the following letter of introduction from General Wilkinson:

"'My Dear Sir: This will be delivered to you by Colonel Burr, whose worth you know well how to estimate. If the persecutions of a great and honorable man can give title to generous attentions, he has claims to all your civilities and all your services. You cannot oblige me more than by such conduct, and I pledge my life to you it will not be misapplied. To him I refer you for many things improper to letter, and which he will not say to any other I shall be at St. Louis in two weeks, and if you were there we could open a mine, a commercial one at least. Let me hear from you. Farewell, do well, and believe me always your friend.'

"This epistle produced the effect desired. Burr became intimate with Clark, as with all the important persons of the place. He was received everywhere as the great man! Governor Claiborn (governor of Orleans territory) gave him a grand dinner, which was attended by as distinguished a company as New Orleans could assemble. Banquet followed banquet; fête succeeded fête· ball followed ball. The French air that surrounded everything, the French manner and tone of society, were as pleasing as they were novel to the traveller. The days flew swiftly by. Burr staid three weeks in New Orleans. Wilkinson said in his letter of introduction, that Burr would make communications to Clark which were 'improper to letter.' What were they? Burr was not a person to waste three weeks in mere feasting and playing the great man Wherever he was, whatever he was, he was busy. He had the quickest, most active mind that ever animated five feet six inches of mortality It is certain that he did something at New Orleans during those three weeks. What? The question has been answered, first, by Wilkinson in his ponderous memoirs; secondly, by Daniel Clark in his angry octavo, entitled 'Proofs of the Corruption of General James Wilkinson, and of his Connection with Aaron Burr'; thirdly, by Matthew L. Davis, speaking for Burr himself. Wilkinson says the reference in his letter of introduction was simply an election scheme. Clark declares that Burr confided nothing to him whatsoever. He says he liked Burr exceedingly, invited him to dinner, showed him every possible civility, but had not a syllable of confidential conversation with him. In the most positive and circumstantial manner he denies that he had then, or ever had, any participation in or knowledge of Burr's designs. Davis, on the contrary, asserts that Clark and Wilkinson were both ardently engaged with Burr; and that Clark agreed to advance fifty thousand dollars in furtherance of the great project. Other friends of Burr say that Clark made two voyages to Vera Cruz, to spy out the enemy's country. Clark admits having made the voyages, (one in September, 1805, the other in February, 1806;) admits having collected information in Mexico respecting the strength of the fortresses, the number of the garrisons, and the disposition of the people; but asserts that his voyages had none but commercial objects, and that his inquiries were only prompted by curiosity A witness deposed to having heard Clark say that he would willingly join in a private scheme for the conquest of Mexico, provided the adventurers could turn their backs forever on the United States. 'You, for example, might be a duke,' was one expression which the witness swore he had heard Clark use in the course of the same conversation. The difficulty of arriving at certainty on this subject, arises from the fact that most of the existing evidence was given after the explosion. It was amusing, says Burnet (in his 'Notes'), to see men who before the president's proclamation appeared had been loudest in Burr's praises, and deepest in his schemes, making haste after that bolt had shivered the project to atoms to denounce the traitor at every corner, and running to offer their services to the governor in defence of a distracted and imperilled country." Parton's Life of Burr.

In the latter part of July Colonel Burr left New Orleans on horseback, to return to Nashville, travelling a great portion of the way (under the direction of a guide) through an unbroken wilderness, with no better roads than mere Indian trails. He arrived at Nashville on the 6th of August, where he was again received with distinguished attention. He remained there a week, the guest of General Jackson, as on his former visit. He then made a two weeks' tour in Kentucky, visiting Louisville, Frankfort, and Lexington, at all of which he was received and entertained with great distinction. At this time the Spaniards still claimed and held possession of the country on the eastern bank of the lower Mississippi, and about the time of Burr's visit the ill feeling which had long prevailed towards them, among the American citizens of the Mississippi valley, had been greatly inflamed by some outrages committed by the Spanish troops on the American side. A war with Spain was confidently expected, and the impression got abroad in the West that Burr's presence had some reference to approaching hostilities against some portion of the Spanish dominions. A military expedition against the hated "Dons" would at that time have met great favor among the Western people From Kentucky Burr proceeded to St. Louis, where he again met General Wilkinson. It was here, according to Wilkinson's own account, that he first began to suspect Burr "to be revolving some great project, the nature of which he did not disclose." He represents Burr as speaking contemptuously of "the imbecility of the government," and saying "it would moulder to pieces, die a natural death," or words to that effect; adding "that the people of the Western country were ready for revolt." To this Wilkinson says he recollects replying, "that if he had not profited more by his journey he had better remained at Washington or Philadelphia. For surely, said I, my friend, no person was ever more mistaken! The Western people disaffected to the government? They are bigoted to Jefferson and democracy! and the conversation dropped." From this and other similar conversations, Wilkinson says he began to fear that Burr had conceived some dangerous and desperate enterprise. Nevertheless, he strove to promote his election to congress, writing a letter to General Harrison, then governor of the territory of Indiana, urgently soliciting his influence to secure his return to congress from that territory. Wilkinson alleges, however, that his great anxiety to secure the election of Burr to congress arose from his fear that he was about to embark in some dangerous enterprise, which his election to congress might induce him to abandon. In the month of October Burr left the West to return to the Eastern states. On his way he called at Blennerhassett's island, but found neither the master nor the mistress at home. He proceeded to Washington, where he was received by the principal officials with due courtesy. He dined with the president, and conversed freely with members of the cabinet, from whom he learned that there would be no war with Spain. From Washington he went South to meet his son-in-law, Mr. Alston, and his daughter, Theodosia, returning in December to Philadelphia. He made this city his headquarters until he started West the following summer, living, it is said, in a style and situation more obscure than was formerly his custom. "He sought the society of men who had cause to be dissatisfied with the government, such as Commodore Truxton, who had been struck from the navy list, and General Eaton, who could not get his claim against the government paid. To these men, as to others, he spoke in contemptuous terms of the administration; he said a separation of the Western states must come sooner or later; he unfolded his plans and urged them to unite their fortunes with his. Parton's Life of Burr.

From Philadelphia, in the month of December, Burr wrote his first letter to Blennerhassett. If, as has been said, it was "a very innocent communication," it was nevertheless a very artful one. After expressing his regret that the absence of Blennerhassett from home had deprived him of the pleasure of improving his personal acquaintance when visiting the island, he flatteringly alluded to his talents, as suited to a higher sphere than that in which they were then employed. He alluded to his gradually diminishing fortune, and the duty he owed to his children, who might be left destitute if he did not make some effort to add to his present estate. This letter produced the desired effect. Blennerhassett answered it, saying that he felt that the interests of a growing family would summon him again into active life, to the resumption of his former profession of the bar, mercantile, or other enterprise, if he could find an opportunity of selling or letting his establishment on the island. He says: "Having thus advised you of my desire and motives to pursue a change of life, to engage in anything which may suit my circumstances, I hope, sir, you will not regard it as indelicate in me to observe to you how highly I should be honored in being associated with you in any contemplated enterprise you would permit me to participate in. The amount of means I could at first come forward with would be small. You might command my services as a lawyer, or in any other way you might suggest as being most useful." During the winter of 1805-06, Burr had been busy in maturing his plans for the expedition to be set on foot the ensuing fall. He succeeded in drawing into his schemes a number of prominent men whose names are known, and others, no doubt, who were so fortunate as to keep their connection with him concealed from the public eye. Some of these must have contributed considerable sums of money towards the enterprise, although his exchequer never appears to have been very full. Among the most prominent of his confederates were the Swartwouts, of New York, Ex-Senator Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, Senator John Smith, of Ohio, Blennerhassett, Dr. Erich Bollman, a German who had distinguished himself by a gallant attempt to rescue Lafayette from prison, and Colonel Dupiester, a Frenchman, who had been sent by Burr on a confidential mission to Europe, and been employed by him in other diplomatic relations. His daughter, Theodosia, had her whole soul in the enterprise, and her husband, Mr. Alston, (a man of great wealth,) certainly furnished a portion of the means employed in setting it on foot; though he positively and indignantly denied having any connection with it, in a letter to Governor Pinckney, of South Carolina, shortly after the bubble had burst. Many prominent men in the West who were in the confidence of Burr approved, encouraged, and gave countenance to his enterprise, without, perhaps, being actually engaged in it; among whom were General Jackson, of Tennessee, and General Adair, of Kentucky.

In July, 1806, Theodosia, who had determined to accompany her father to the West, and had visited Philadelphia for that purpose, left that city for Bedford Springs, in the mountains of Pennsylvania, with her infant son, there to remain a short time for the benefit of her health. Burr soon followed after. Some time in August, Colonel Burr, with Theodosia and her child, accompanied by Colonel Dupiester, reached Pittsburg, and embarked on their voyage down the river. Burr and Dupiester occasionally left the boat to make detours in the adjacent country, for the purpose of sounding public sentiment in regard to their enterprise. It was on one of these occasions that they visited the house of Colonel Morgan, a prominent citizen of Washington county, Pennsylvania, a full account of which visit, and its results, will be found in the testimony of Colonel Morgan and his two sons, in the following pages. Here Burr committed the fatal indiscretion of expressing sentiments and indicating designs which so shocked the patriotism of his host that they led to a communication to the president, which was probably the first stimulus to any active measures on the part of the administration to fathom and defeat his objects. A few days later, (about the last of August,) the voyagers landed at Marietta. It happened to be on the day of a "general muster" of the militia. Colonel Burr, in company with Colonel Meigs, (subsequently governor of Ohio,) rode to the field, reviewed the troops, and put a regiment through a few evolutions, to the great satisfaction of an admiring multitude. "In the evening he and Theodosia attended a ball, where he completed the conquest of Marietta by the courtly grace of his manners." Proceeding to the island, and leaving his daughter with Mrs. Blennerhassett, Burr immediately commenced active preparations for fitting out the expedition. Contracts for fifteen boats, capable of carrying five hundred men, and a large keel boat for the transportation of provisions, to be built on the Muskingum, a few miles above Marietta, were entered into. Arrangements were also made for purchasing considerable quantities of pork, flour, corn meal, and whisky. These arrangements having been made, Burr left them to be carried out under the superintendence of Blennerhassett, and proceeded to Chillicothe, then the seat of government of the state of Ohio, and thence to Cincinnati, where his confederate, Senator John Smith, resided. Tarrying but a short time here, he proceeded to Kentucky, visited many prominent men, and gained many adherents to his cause. He then visited Nashville, Tennessee, and there contracted for the building of six boats on the Cumberland, and deposited four thousand dollars with General Jackson to pay for them.

Before leaving the East, Colonel Burr had contracted for the purchase of a tract of land of four hundred thousand acres, on the Washita, a branch of the Red river, at the price of forty thousand dollars. On this visit to Kentucky he completed the purchase, paying the first instalment of five thousand dollars thereon. To all persons to whom he did not see fit to disclose more, the colonization and settlement of these lands was represented to be the sole object of his expedition. While Burr was thus engaged maturing his plans in Kentucky and Tennessee, Blennerhassett was no less busy in the vicinity of his own residence, overseeing the building of the boats and the purchase of provisions, kiln-drying corn meal on the island, and obtaining recruits. To most of the young men whom he approached on the subject he represented that the object of the expedition was the settlement of the Washita lands; but to some he plainly intimated that its destination was Mexico, saying that there would undoubtedly be a war with Spain; while he took little pains to conceal the fact from any that something more than a settlement of wild lands was in view. He wrote a series of essays, which were published in a Marietta paper, over the signature of "Querist," in which he endeavored to show that the Western country would derive great advantages from a separation from the Atlantic states. Such views and sentiments, however, were not then regarded as treasonable, and had a few years previously been quite prevalent in the West. While the preparations above alluded to were going on, Comfort Tyler, of New York, was recruiting men and collecting supplies at Pittsburg and its vicinity, with which he was to embark, with several boats, at Beaver, Pennsylvania, and join Blennerhassett's fleet at the island, when the latter should be ready to move. Davis Floyd, of the Indiana territory, was similarly employed in the vicinity of the falls of the Ohio, and was to join the expedition with his boats when the fleet should come down. Some time in October Mr. Alston joined his wife and child on the island. Shortly afterwards, accompanied by Blennerhassett, they proceeded to Lexington, Kentucky, where they met Col. Burr. From this point they returned to their home in South Carolina.

Towards the latter part of October the newspapers of the West began to give out intimations that there was treason at the bottom of Burr's schemes. The Western World, published at Frankfort, Kentucky, openly denounced him as a traitor, plotting the disruption of the Union. The celebrated Joe Daviess, a rank Federalist, was then attorney of the United States for the district of Kentucky. On the 3d of November, during the session of the United States court at Frankfort, he took everybody by surprise by making a motion that Aaron Burr be required to attend the court, to answer a charge to be brought against him of engaging in an enterprise against a power with which the United States were at peace. The motion was regarded by most persons as a mere manifestation of party spite, and a large majority of the people took sides with Burr, indignantly denouncing the district attorney. Judge Innis, after deliberating on the motion two days, overruled it. The following account of what followed is taken from Collins's History of Kentucky:

"Colonel Burr was in Lexington at the time, and was informed of the motion made by Daviess in an incredibly short space of time after it was made. He entered the court-house shortly after Innis had overruled the motion, and addressed the judge with a grave and calm dignity of manner which increased, if possible, the general prepossession in his favor. He spoke of the late motion as one that had greatly surprised him; insinuated that Daviess had reason to believe that he was absent upon business of a private and pressing nature, which, it was well known, required his immediate attention; that the judge had treated the application as it deserved; but, as it might be renewed by the attorney, in his absence, he preferred that the judge should entertain the motion now, and he had voluntarily appeared, in order to give the gentleman an opportunity of proving his charge. Nowise disconcerted by the lofty tranquility of Burr's manner, than which nothing could be more imposing, Daviess promptly accepted the challenge, and declared himself ready to proceed, as soon as he could procure the attendance of his witnesses. After consulting with the marshal, Daviess announced his opinion that his witnesses could attend on the ensuing Wednesday; and, with the concurrence of Burr, that day was fixed upon by the court for the investigation. Burr awaited the day with an easy tranquility which seemed to fear no danger, and on Wednesday the court-house was crowded to suffocation. Daviess, upon counting his witnesses, discovered that Davis Floyd, one of the most important, was absent, and with great reluctance asked a postponement of the case. The judge instantly discharged the grand jury. Colonel Burr then appeared at the bar, accompanied by his counsel, Henry Clay and Colonel Allen. Colonel Burr arose in court, expressed his regret that the grand jury had been discharged, and inquired the reason. Colonel Daviess replied, and added that Floyd was then in Indiana, attending a session of the territorial legislature. Burr calmly desired that the cause of the postponement might be entered upon the record, as well as the reason why Floyd did not attend. He then, with great self-possession, and with an air of candor difficult to be resisted, addressed the court and crowded audience upon the subject of the accusation. His style was without ornament, passion, or fervor; but the spell of a great mind, and daring, but calm spirit, was felt with singular power by all who heard him. He hoped the good people of Kentucky would dismiss their apprehensions of danger from him, if any such really existed. There was really no ground for them, however zealously the attorney might strive to awaken them. He was engaged in no project inimical to the peace or tranquility of the country, as they would certainly learn whenever the attorney should be ready, which he greatly apprehended would never be. In the mean time, although private business urgently demanded his presence elsewhere, he felt compelled to give the attorney one more opportunity of proving his charge, and would patiently await another attack. Upon the 25th of November, Colonel Daviess informed the court that Floyd would attend on the 2d of December following and another grand jury was summoned to attend on that day. Colonel Burr came into court attended by the same counsel as on the former occasion, and coolly awaited the expected attack. Daviess, with evident chagrin, again announced that he was not ready to proceed; that John Adair had been summoned, and was not in attendance, and that his testimony was indispensable to the prosecution. He again asked a postponement of the case for a few days, and that the grand jury should be kept impanneled until he could compel the attendance of Adair by attachment. Burr, on the present occasion, remained silent, and entirely unmoved by anything that occurred. Not so his counsel. A most animated and impassioned debate sprung up, intermingled with sharp and flashing personalities between Clay and Daviess. Never did two more illustrious orators encounter each other in debate. The enormous mass which crowded to suffocation the floor, the galleries, the windows, the platform of the judge, remained still and breathless for hours, while these renowned and immortal champions, stimulated by mutual rivalry, and each glowing in the ardent conviction of right, encountered each other in splendid intellectual combat. Clay had the sympathies of the audience on his side, and was the leader of the popular party in Kentucky. Daviess was a Federalist, and was regarded as persecuting an innocent and unfortunate man from motives of political hate. But he was buoyed up by the full conviction of Burr's guilt, and the delusion of the people on the subject, and the very infatuation which he beheld around him, and the smiling serenity of the traitor who sat before him, stirred his great spirit to one of his most brilliant efforts. All, however, was in vain. Judge Innis refused to retain the grand jury, unless some business was brought before them; and Daviess, in order to gain time, sent up to them an indictment against John Adair, which was pronounced by the jury 'not a true bill.' The hour being late, Daviess then moved for an attachment to compel the presence of Adair, which was resisted by Burr's counsel, and refused by the court, on the ground that Adair was not in contempt until the day had expired. On the motion of Daviess, the court then adjourned to the following day. When the court resumed its sitting on the following morning, Daviess moved to be permitted to attend the grand jury in their room. This was resisted by Burr's counsel as novel and unprecedented, and refused by the court. The grand jury then retired, witnesses were sworn and sent up to them, and on the 5th of the month they returned, as Daviess had expected, 'not a true bill.' In addition to this, the grand jury returned into court a written declaration, signed by the whole of them, in which, from all the evidence before them, they completely exonerated Burr from any design inimical to the peace or well-being of the country. Colonel Allen instantly moved the court that a copy of the report of the grand jury should be taken and inserted in the newspapers, which was granted. The popular current ran with great strength in his favor, and the United States attorney, for the time, was overwhelmed with obloquy. Before Mr. Clay took any active part as the counsel of Burr, he required of him an explicit disavowal, upon his honor, that he was engaged in any design contrary to the laws and peace of the country. The pledge was promptly given by Burr in language the most comprehensive and particular."

In the latter part of July, before leaving Philadelphia, Burr had despatched Samuel Swartwout to the Louisiana country, with a packet of letters, and a communication in cipher to General Wilkinson. He was accompanied on his journey by a young man named Ogden, a nephew of Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, from whom he also bore a letter in cipher to Wilkinson. The following is a copy of the ciphered letter from Burr, borne by Swartwout, as interpreted by General Wilkinson:

"Yours postmarked 13th May is received. I (Aaron Burr) have obtained funds, and have actually commenced the enterprise. Detachments from different points and under different pretences will rendezvous on the Ohio, 1st November—everything internal and external favors views—protection of England is secured. T——— (Truxton) is gone to Jamaica to arrange with the admiral on that station, and will meet at the Mississippi———England———Navy of the United States are ready to join, and final orders are given to my friends and followers—it will be a host of choice spirits. Wilkinson shall be second to Burr only—Wilkinson shall dictate the rank and promotion of his officers. Burr will proceed westward 1st August, never to return: with him go his daughter—the husband will follow in October with a corps of worthies. Send forthwith an intelligent and confidential friend with whom Burr may confer. He shall return immediately with further interesting details—this is essential to concert and harmony of movement. Send a list of all persons known to Wilkinson west of the mountains, who could be useful, with a note delineating their characters. By your messenger send me four or five of the commissions of your officers, which you can borrow under any pretence you please. They shall be returned faithfully. Already are orders to the contractor given to forward six months' provisions to points Wilkinson may name—this shall not be used until the last moment, and then under proper injunctions: the project is brought to the point so long desired: Burr guarantees the result with his life and honor—the lives, the honor and fortunes of hundreds, the best blood of our country. Burr's plan of operations is to move down rapidly from the falls on the 15th of November, with the first five hundred or one thousand men, in light boats now constructing for that purpose—to be at Natchez between the 5th and 15th of December—then to meet Wilkinson—then to determine whether it will be expedient in the first instance to seize on or pass by Baton Rouge. On receipt of this send Burr an answer—draw on Burr for all expenses, &c. The people of the country to which we are going are prepared to receive us—their agents now with Burr say that if we will protect their religion, and will not subject them to a foreign power, that in three weeks all will be settled. The gods invite to glory and fortune—it remains to be seen whether we deserve the boon. The bearer of this goes express to you—he will hand a formal letter of introduction to you from Burr, a copy of which is hereunto subjoined. He is a man of inviolable honor and perfect discretion—formed to execute rather than project—capable of relating facts with fidelity, and incapable of relating them otherwise. He is thoroughly informed of the plans and intentions of Burr, and will disclose to you as far as you inquire, and no further—he has imbibed a reverence for your character, and may be embarrassed in your presence—put him at ease and he will satisfy you—29th July."

Burr had entrusted to Dr. Bollman another copy of the same letter, in cipher, to be delivered to Wilkinson in New Orleans. After a journey of nine weeks Swartwout reached the headquarters of General Wilkinson, at Nachitoches, his companion having previously separated from him and pursued his journey to New Orleans. Swartwout inquired for Colonel Cushing, who was second in command, and was at Wilkinson's headquarters. To Colonel Cushing he presented a letter from Jonathan Dayton, introducing Ogden to his acquaintance, but mentioning Swartwout as Ogden's traveling companion. Colonel Cushing introduced Swartwout to Wilkinson as the friend of Dayton. Swartwout observed that Mr. Ogden and himself, being on their way to New Orleans, had learned at Fort Adams that our troops and some militia were assembling at Nachitoches, whence they were to march against the Spanish army, then in the neighborhood, and that the object of his visit was to act with them as a volunteer. While Colonel Cushing was temporarily absent from the room, Swartwout delivered to Wilkinson the packet of which he was the bearer, containing the ciphered letter hereinbefore mentioned, and a letter from Jonathan Dayton, (also in cipher,) of which the following is a copy: "Dear Sir: It is now well ascertained that you are to be displaced next session. Jefferson will affect to yield reluctantly to public sentiment, but yield he will. Prepare yourself, therefore, for it. You know the rest. You are not a man to despair, or even despond, especially when such prospects offer in another quarter. Are you ready? Are your numerous associates ready? Wealth and glory, Louisiana and Mexico! I shall have time to receive a letter from you before I set out for Ohio. Ohio. Address me here, and another in Cincinnati. Receive and treat my nephew (Ogden) affectionately, as you would receive your friend, Dayton."

Wilkinson, according to his own account, on reading these letters, immediately determined to draw from Swartwout all the information he could in relation to Burr's plans. Swartwout remained ten days at headquarters, in the course of which time Wilkinson testifies that he obtained from him the following statements: That he had been despatched by Col. Burr from Philadelphia; that he had passed through the states of Ohio and Kentucky, had proceeded from Louisville to St. Louis, where he expected to find him, (Wilkinson,) but learning that he had descended the river, had procured a skiff, hired hands, and followed him down to Fort Adams, and thence to Nachitoches, under a pretence of a disposition to take part in the campaign against the Spaniards, then depending. "That Colonel Burr, with the support of a powerful association extending from New York to New Orleans, was levying an armed body of seven thousand men, with a view to carry an expedition against the Mexican provinces, and five hundred men under Colonel Swartwout and a Colonel or Major Tyler were to descend the Alleghany, for whose accommodation light boats had been built and were ready." In answer to an inquiry by General Wilkinson, he said: "This territory would be revolutionized, where the people were ready to join them, and there would be some seizing, he supposed, at New Orleans—that they expected to be ready to march about the first of February, and intended to land at Vera Cruz, and march from thence to Mexico." Wilkinson remarked that there were several millions of dollars in bank in New Orleans, to which Swartwout replied, "We know it full well." Wilkinson then observed, they certainly did not mean to violate private property; to which S. replied, "They merely meant to borrow, and would return it; that they must equip themselves in New Orleans; that they expected naval protection from Great Britain—that Captain —— and the officers of our navy were so disgusted with our government that they were ready to join—that similar disgust prevailed throughout the Western country, where the people were zealous in favor of the enterprise, and that pilot-built schooners were contracted for along our Southern coast—that he had been accompanied from the falls of the Ohio to Kaskaskias, and from thence to Fort Adams, by a Mr. Ogden, who had proceeded to New Orleans, with letters from Col. Burr to his friends there."

Whether Wilkinson, up to this time, had been as ignorant of Burr's plans as he subsequently professed to have been, and was moved by patriotic motives only to oppose them, or whether he had made up his mind that it would be more profitable to himself to betray his confederate than to betray his country, is a question about which those who examine the evidence on the subject will, perhaps, always differ in opinion. It is difficult to believe, however, that Burr could have been so fatally stupid as to send such a communication to a man whom he had not the strongest reason to regard as fully committed to his projects. However this may be, Wilkinson soon determined to take active measures for opposing and breaking up the expedition. Having taken this resolution, he hastened to make such terms with the Spanish commander on the Sabine as would obviate the hostilities which had been expected, and justify him in transferring the principal portion of his troops to the Mississippi. He sent forward an officer to put the city of New Orleans in the best possible condition for defence, and he sent a special messenger to Washington with despatches for the president. The messenger reached Washington on the 25th of November, and on the 27th President Jefferson issued a proclamation, setting forth that unlawful enterprises were on foot in the Western states, having for their object a military expedition against the dominions of Spain; that for this purpose sundry citizens of the United States were fitting out and arming vessels in the Western waters, collecting provisions, arms, and military stores, and seducing honest and well meaning citizens, under various pretences, to participate in said criminal enterprises; warning all persons engaged therein to "withdraw from the same without delay," "as they will answer the same at their peril, and incur prosecution with all the rigors of the law;" and commanding all officers, civil and military, to use their utmost exertions to bring the offending persons to punishment. The name of Burr was not mentioned in the proclamation.

On the 25th of November Gen. Wilkinson arrived in New Orleans. Doctor Bollman (who had previously forwarded to him, at Nachitoches, the ciphered letter entrusted to his care) called upon him the next day after his arrival. They had some conversation about Burr's plans, Wilkinson permitting Bollman to remain under the impression that he was connected with them. On the 5th of January, 1807, Wilkinson called on Bollman, and (the mail having arrived the day before) inquired whether he had received any intelligence from Burr. Bollman replied that he had received a letter from him of the 30th of October, in which he gave assurances that he should be in Natchez with 2,000 men on the 20th of December, where he should wait until he heard from New Orleans; that he would be followed by 4,000 men more, and if he had chosen could have raised 12,000 as easily as 6,000, but did not think that number necessary. Wilkinson then threw off his disguise, and told Bollman he should certainly oppose Burr, if he came that way. On receiving this information, Wilkinson appears to have become greatly alarmed. At all events, he succeeded in getting up a prodigious excitement in New Orleans. Martial law was proclaimed; public meetings were held, and harangued by Wilkinson and by Governor Claiborn. Volunteer troops offered their services, new defences were erected, and a detachment of troops was stationed above the city, with orders to stop and overhaul every descending boat. A secret session of the legislature was held; Governor Claiborn issued a proclamation; the alarm spread, and proclamations were issued by the governors of neighboring territories. The Spanish authorities became equally alarmed, and began to strengthen the defences of Mexico. On affidavits made by Gen. Wilkinson, Swartwout, Bollman, Ogden, and General Adair were arrested and immediately shipped to Baltimore. Bollman and Swartwout, on reaching Baltimore, were, by orders of the president, brought to Washington. They were taken before the circuit court of the district of Columbia, and upon the affidavits of General Wilkinson and General Eaton, and a few other unimportant affidavits forwarded by Wilkinson from New Orleans, were committed for treason. The supreme court of the United States being then in session, an application was made to it for a writ of habeas corpus. After full argument of the question whether that court had the power to issue the writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, in case of a commitment by a circuit court, the writ was granted. On the return of the writ by the marshal of the district, showing that he detained the prisoners by virtue of a commitment issued by said circuit court, Mr. Lee, counsel for the prisoners, moved their discharge. As all the evidence before the circuit court was in the form of affidavits, the record brought up all the facts. The case was elaborately argued for three days, by Cæsar Rodney, attorney general of the United States, and Walter Jones, United States attorney for the District of Columbia, on behalf of the United States, and by Charles Lee, F. S. Key, and Harper, for the prisoners. Chief Justice Marshall then delivered the opinion of the court which was so often referred to on the trial of Col. Burr, and which is appended hereto. The prisoners were discharged.

To go back with our narrative: In the latter part of October, 1806, the president sent a confidential agent, named Graham, to the West, "with instructions to investigate the plots going on, to enter into conferences with the governors, and all other officers, civil and military, and with their aid to do on the spot whatever should be necessary to discover the designs of the conspirators, arrest their means, bring their persons to punishment, and to call out the force of the country to suppress any unlawful enterprise in which it should be found they were engaged." Graham arrived at Marietta about the middle of November. He was at this time chief clerk of the state department, but had previously been secretary of the territory of Orleans. Blennerhassett had received the impression from Burr that Graham was one of the friends in New Orleans upon whom he relied, and when he met him at Marietta, believing him to be a confederate, disclosed to him important facts touching Burr's plans and proceedings. Graham finally undeceived him as to his own relations to Burr, and believing him to be the victim of a cruel deception, endeavored to dissuade him from further connection with the enterprise, but all to no effect. The situation of things at Marietta and the island having been asertained by Graham, he proceeded to Chillicothe, where the legislature of Ohio was then sitting, and had an interview with the governor (Tiffin). The governor communicated with the legislature, and that body, sitting with closed doors, promptly passed an act to suppress the expedition. Under the authority of this act, the governor ordered out the militia of the vicinity, under the command of the major general of the district, to whom he gave instructions to seize the boats which had been built on the Muskingum, the stores which had been collected at Marietta, and all boats of a suspicious character descending the river.

Comfort Tyler and Ireal Smith, with four boats and about thirty men, arrived at the island, from Beaver, Pennsylvania, on the evening of the 7th of December. Of the fifteen boats contracted for on the Muskingum, eleven had been completed, and were to be delivered on the Ohio on the 10th of December. On the 9th, however, they were seized by the militia, with the provisions which had been purchased and stored at Marietta. Nearly all the recruits who had been engaged in that vicinity had abandoned the expedition. They had agreed to join it under the belief that there was nothing unlawful, or at least nothing criminal in it. Although they had been given vaguely to understand that they might be required to fight the Spaniards, either in Mexico or nearer home, they had been led to believe that this would only be required of them in case of a war with Spain, then confidently anticipated by them. The impression had been made upon their minds that the expedition, if not having the express sanction of the general government, was at least connived at by the administration. The visit of Graham, the objects of which soon began to leak out, rumors of the secret proceedings of the Ohio legislature, and of the president's proclamation, in advance of its arrival, had opened their eyes. They had no idea of adhering to a cause thus denounced as unlawful and criminal. Public excitement against the adventurers began to run high on both sides of the river, and Blennerhassett, finding himself abandoned by nearly all of those whom he had enlisted in the enterprise, began to despond and to waver, and would probably have abandoned it himself, but for the influence of his wife, who was a woman of superior energy. She met all the difficulties of the situation with a spirit that never quailed, and a resolution that never relaxed.

About the time of Tyler's arrival, the Wood county (Virginia) militia were being assembled to oppose the expedition. On the same day that the boats on the Muskingum were seized, the party on the island received information that the Wood county militia was to make a descent upon them the following day. Hurried preparations were therefore made for leaving that night. It was arranged that Mrs. Blennerhassett, with her children, should remain on the island until she could obtain from Marietta a boat which had been fitted up for the special accommodation of the family. She was then to follow, with the personal effects which had been left in her care. Accordingly, a few trunks and boxes were carried on board the boats, and about midnight the little flotilla, consisting of the four boats brought down by Tyler, and one small boat added by Blennerhassett, cut loose from the shore and floated off. The next morning the militia arrived on the island, to find that the game had flown. The colonel left a small party in charge, and marched across the great "bend" of the river between the island and the mouth of the Great Kanawha, to intercept the boats at that point. The distance across, by land, being but little more than half the distance round by the river, this was an easy task. He stationed a company on the bank of the river, with strict injunctions to watch all night; but King Alcohol got the better of duty and discipline, the watchers all got gloriously drunk, and the flotilla glided by them in the darkness of the night, and pursued its voyage unchallenged. With like impunity it passed safely all the towns and villages below, although orders had been sent to all of them to arrest its progress. During the absence of the colonel on this expedition, a boat from Pittsburg touched at the mouth of the Little Kanawha, about two miles above the island, having on board fourteen young gentlemen, on their way to join the expedition among whom were Morgan Neville and William Robinson, Jr., names which have since become widely and honorably known. They were all arrested by the militia, as accomplices of Burr, and taken to the island. Three Wood county justices were sent for, and an examination was had before them, in which the prisoners, all young gentlemen of education, outwitted their accusers and the country justices, and were discharged. While this examination was going on, (Mrs. Blennerhassett being absent, at Marietta, in a fruitless endeavor to get possession of the "family boat,") a wild spirit of license and riot broke out among the militiamen at the mansion house. "First of all, the men broke into the wine-cellar, and there drank themselves into vandals. Then they ranged the house, destroying or disfiguring wherever they went; firing rifle balls through painted ceilings, tearing down costly drapery, and dashing to pieces mirrors and vases. (In 1811, the house, being built of wood, was entirely consumed by an accidental fire.) Then they rushed, like so many savages, about the grounds, destroying the shrubbery, and breaking down trellises and arbors. The ornamental fences were torn away, piecemeal, to make fires for the sentinels at night." Parton. In the midst of this riot and destruction, Mrs Blennerhassett returned, without her "family boat," the same having been denied her by the authorities. In this dilemma, the party of young men who had just been released, and were preparing to resume their journey, offered her an apartment in their boat, which she accepted, and, on the 17th of December, left her island home in possession of the rioters who had laid it desolate.

On the acquittal of Burr by the grand jury, at Frankfort, he hastened to Nashville. Graham also hastened to the same place, after rousing Ohio and Kentucky, and learning that boats for the expedition were being fitted out on the Cumberland. "An express with the president's proclamation reached the governor of Tennessee on the 19th, and preparations were immediately made for the seizure of the boats and the arrest of the men. But timely information was conveyed to Burr, and on the 22d, with two boats and a few men, armed only according to the custom of the country, he dropped down the Cumberland. The next day Graham arrived at Nashville, to find the 'conspirators' beyond his reach." At the falls of the Ohio, the party under Tyler was joined by Floyd, with three boats, and a number of men. At the mouth of the Cumberland all the different detachments met—eleven boats, with about sixty men. Here the men were drawn up in a circle on the bank of the river, and Colonel Burr addressed them briefly. He told them he had intended here to explain his designs, or his plans, but circumstances had rendered it necessary to defer doing so for the present. Here, also, Burr purchased a trading boat of one Ellis, with its cargo, consisting of "bar-iron, hoes, mattocks, and a few barrels of apples."

The principal incidents of the expedition from this point until it was broken up are thus briefly sketched by Parton: "Ignorant of Wilkinson's treachery, away went Burr with his flotilla down the Ohio, down the Mississippi, stopping boldly at forts on the banks, asking and receiving favors, and occasionally picking up a recruit or two. He wore a smiling face, and reassured every one by the cheerful serenity of his bearing. It was not until he reached Bayou Pierre, about thirty miles above Natchez, that he heard of the course which had been pursued by Wilkinson, and of the prodigious excitement which his measures had created in the lower country. There, too, he read the proclamation of the governor of Mississippi, charging him and his followers with being conspirators against their country, and calling on the officers of the government to renew their oath of fidelity to the United States, and give their best efforts towards crushing the nefarious plot. Whatever his feelings may have been at the discovery, Col. Burr never for one moment lost his self-possession, but proceeded on the very instant to grapple with this new complication of difficulties. He wrote a public letter denying the truth of the governor's allegations, and asserting that he had no objects but such as were lawful and honorable. 'If,' said he, 'the alarm which has been excited should not be appeased by this declaration, I invite my fellow citizens to visit me at this place, and to receive from me, in person, such further explanations as may be necessary to their satisfaction, presuming that when my views are understood, they will receive the countenance of all good men.' This letter he requested might be read to the militia, who were assembled for his arrest. But the excitement had risen to a height which could not be allayed by fine words. The news of Burr's arrival at Bayou Pierre reached Natchez on the 14th of January, when the whole militia force of the neighborhood, who had been for weeks expecting the summons, seized their arms and hurried to the rendezvous. In a few hours two hundred and seventy-five men were ready to embark. All one cold and dismal night they worked their way up the river to a point near where the dread flotilla was moored. There disembarking, they were joined by a troop of cavalry, and were soon in readiness to march against the foe. It was thought best, however, first to ascertain if Col. Burr was disposed to resist their formidable array, or would surrender peacefully to the lawful authorities. For this purpose, George Poindexter, the attorney general of the territory, and Major Shields, of the militia, visited the flotilla, and had an interview with its commander. A letter from the acting governor was handed to Burr, who read it, and spoke with some contempt of the public alarm to which it alluded 'As to any projects,' said he, 'which may have been formed between General Wilkinson and myself, heretofore, they are now completely frustrated by the perfidious conduct of Wilkinson, and the world must pronounce him a perfidious villain. If I am sacrificed, my portfolio will prove him to be such.' He declared that so far was he from having any design hostile to the United States, he had intended to meet the governor at the general muster at Bayou Pierre. Upon the attorney general's urging him to surrender, he demanded an interview with the governor. After some further colloquy, the parties separated, Burr agreeing to meet Governor Mead on the following day at a designated house near by. The governor came at the time appointed, and, after meeting Burr, demanded his unconditional surrender, and that of his whole party, to the civil authorities, and gave him fifteen minutes to decide. Resistance being out of the question, Burr only requested that if Wilkinson should attempt to get possession of his person by a military force, it might be resisted. He then surrendered, and was conducted to the neighboring town of Washington, where two citizens became sureties for his appearance at court on the following day, in the sum of ten thousand dollars. His men remained in the vicinity of the flotilla. A court of justice was to Aaron Burr what his native heath was to MacGregor. On that field he was invincible. It was only after warm discussions that it was concluded that he could be lawfully tried in the territory. The next step was to get him indicted for some offence. A grand jury was impanneled, and witnesses sent to them. Imagine the feelings of the attorney general when he read the result of all his toils in the following presentments:

" 'The grand jury of the Mississippi territory, on a due investigation of the evidence brought before them, are of opinion that Aaron Burr has not been guilty of any crime or misdemeanor against the laws of the United States or of this territory, or given any just cause of alarm or inquietude to the good people of the same. The grand jurors present, as a grievance, the late military expedition, unnecessarily, as they conceive, fitted out against the person and property of the said Aaron Burr, when no resistance had been made to the civil authorities. The grand jurors also present, as a grievance destructive of personal liberty, the late military arrests, made without warrant, and, as they conceive, without other lawful authority; and they do sincerely regret that so much cause has been given to the enemies of our glorious constitution to rejoice at such measures being adopted, in a neighboring territory, as, if sanctioned by the executive of our country, must sap the vitals of our political existence, and crumble this glorious fabric in the dust.'

"It was of no avail for the attorney general to declare that such presentments were a disgrace and an outrage, nor for the judge to pronounce them impertinent and useless. The people were with the prisoner. Nothing approaching or resembling a breach of the law had been committed by him; and, in short, the grand jury had made up its mind, and would not recede from its position. His companions were at perfect liberty. A Natchez newspaper of the time, commenting on this attempt to indict, says that 'Burr and his men were caressed by a number of the wealthy merchants and planters of Adams county; several balls were given to them as marks of respect and confidence.' Also, 'that the proceedings against the accused were more like a mock trial than a criminal prosecution, and that, during the trial, Judge Bruin appeared more like his advocate than his impartial judge.' All of which is extremely probable. Having, as he thought, fully complied with his recognizances, Colonel Burr demanded a legal release from the court. This was refused. Learning that farther and more arbitrary proceedings were intended against him by the government officials, and perceiving the utter hopelessness of attempting to proceed, and that his presence must embarrass, but could not assist his band, he resolved to fly. Disguising himself in the dress of a boatman, he crossed to the eastern side of the Mississippi, and disappeared in the wilderness. At the meeting of the court on the following morning, he, of course, did not present himself, and there was a great show of surprise. The governor, who, it was said, had connived at his escape, promptly offered two thousand dollars for his arrest. Two or three days passed without any tidings of the fugitive, though the surrounding country was scoured by parties in search. At length, a colored boy was seen, riding one of Burr's horses, and wearing an overcoat that had been his. He was seized forthwith, and thoroughly searched. Sewed in the cape of the coat was found a note addressed to 'C. T. and D. F.,' (Comfort Tyler and Davis Floyd,) which read as follows: 'If you are yet together, keep so, and I will join you tomorrow night. In the mean while, put all your arms in perfect order. Ask no questions of the bearer, but tell him all you may think I wish to know. He does not know that this is from me, nor where I am.' In consequence of this discovery, Burr's men were arrested and placed under guard, and kept as prisoners until the alarm was over. But no further trace of the chief was seen in the neighborhood. He had left the vicinity, and was making his way through a dismal wilderness, towards the port of Pensacola, where lay a British man-of-war, in which he hoped to find a temporary refuge."

Blennerhassett, after his discharge from custody, located his family in Natchez, and, in June following, left that place on horseback to return to his island, and look after his affairs in that vicinity. When he reached Lexington, Kentucky, he was there arrested for treason, and conveyed thence, under a guard, to Richmond. "Others of Burr's confederates, who had the means, returned to the Eastern states, and forgot the dream of glory in the pursuit of civil life. A large number of the band remained in the territory, supplying it, as the attorney general afterwards remarked, with a superfluity of school-masters, music-masters and dancing-masters, for many years. The narrative of these events, published in all the newspapers of the land, drew public attention to the southwestern territories of the Union, and attracted (says Dr. Monette, the historian of the Valley of the Mississippi) thousands of emigrants thither from the Atlantic and Western states."

The Counsel Engaged in the Trial of Colonel Burr.

Seldom has such an array of eminent counsel appeared together in any one case as participated in the great trial which constitutes the subject-matter of this volume.

The leader of the prosecution was George Hay, attorney of the United States for the district of Virginia; a man of fair ability, but hardly equal to the task imposed upon him. He was the son-in-law of Colonel Monroe (afterwards president of the United States), and a zealous Democrat of the Jefferson school. He prosecuted the case with zeal, it is true, but the charge that he displayed an "intemperate zeal" (sometimes plainly intimated by counsel on the other side) does not appear to be justified by the reports of the trial.

Mr. Hay was ably assisted by William Wirt, then thirty-five years of age, and just rising into eminence. No other lawyer in the case, on either side, so commanded the attention and won the admiration of the throng of spectators who attended the trial, as he. While his handsome person, graceful manners, pleasing wit, and brilliant declamation invariably captivated the bystanders, there was always solid matter enough in his arguments to attract the heaviest guns of his adversaries. It is said that he engaged in the prosecution at the personal request of President Jefferson.

The prosecution was also assisted by Alexander MacRae, "the son of a Scotch parson, who was distinguished in the Revolutionary war, first, for being himself a hot Tory, and, secondly, for being the father of seven sons, all of whom were ardent Whigs." He is described by Parton as "a lawyer of respectable ability and a sharp tongue—sharp from ill-nature more than wit." He was neither pleasing nor powerful in argument. At the time of the trial he was lieutenant governor of Virginia.

On the part of the defence, the real leader and principal tactitian was Burr himself. "No step was taken" (says Parton), "not a point conceded," without his express permission. He appeared in court attired with scrupulous neatness, in black, with powdered hair and queue. His manner was dignity itself—composed, polite, confident, impressive. He had the air of a man at perfect peace with himself, and simply intent on the business of the scene. It was observed that he never laughed at the jokes of counsel, which, at some stages of the trial, were numerous and good." He never lost his temper, and never, under any provocation, was betrayed into an offensive personal retort. He brought forward nearly every motion made on his side, and stated the grounds of it with remarkable brevity and clearness. He was equally happy in briefly summing up, at the close of a debate, and presenting in perspicuous order the strong points brought forward in the more elaborate arguments of his counsel. He never, in the whole course of the trial, indulged in an argument of any considerable length. Deep, abstruse, metaphysical reasoning was not his fort. He left all that to more competent hands.

Edmund Randolph, in point of age, experience, and position, deserves to be mentioned first, of the counsel who assisted in the defense. He was a dignified Virginia gentleman of the old school. He had been a member of the continental congress during the Revolution, attorney general and secretary of state under Washington, and governor and attorney general of his own state. He was a man of much learning and fair ability; but his powers were then rather on the wane.

Second among Burr's counsel should be ranked John Wickham, of Richmond, in whom was combined, more than in any one else engaged in this trial, on either side, all the elements which constitute the able and accomplished barrister. He was an Englishman by birth, and "had learning, logic, wit, sarcasm, eloquence, a fine presence, and persuasive manner."

Next should be mentioned Luther Martin, of Maryland, "who (says Parton), in the single particular of legal learning, was the first lawyer of his day. His memory was as wonderful as his reading, so that his acquirements were at instantaneous command. Burr had become acquainted with him at Washington three years before, during the trial of Judge Chase, in whose defence he greatly distinguished himself." He was coarse in his manners, ungrammatical in his language, verbose and addicted to repetitions in his style, and utterly regardless of order in the arrangement of his arguments. These defects were aggravated by an unfortunate impediment in his speech, arising from an excessive flow of saliva. Withal, he was "a mighty drinker," and though able to carry an incredible cargo of brandy, often exhibited unmistakable signs of being over-laden. Blennerhassett says of him, in his journal: "Fancy has been as much denied to his mind as grace to his person or habits. These are gross and incapable of restraint, even on the most solemn public occasions. Hence his invectives are rather coarse than pointed, his eulogiums more fulsome than pathetic." Nevertheless, he was a great and powerful man, possessing many excellent qualities of the heart as well as of the head. He entered upon the defence of Colonel Burr with all the zeal that the warmest personal friendship for his client, and intense political enmity to Jefferson and his administration, could inspire in his ardent and passionate nature.

Benjamin Botts, father of John Minor Botts, of the present generation, was another distinguished lawyer who took a prominent part in conducting the defence. He was the youngest of Burr's counsel; a ready, bold, dashing man, who always charged his adversary on the "double quick," and generally dealt effective blows. He had great power of caricaturing the arguments of his opponent, and exposing them in a ludicrous light.

Charles Lee appeared, also, as counsel for Burr at an advanced stage of the trial. He was one of the most distinguished lawyers of Virginia, had at one time been attorney general of the United States, and had been counsel for Bollman and Swartwout, before the supreme court. He did not take a very active part in the trial, but the few brief addresses he made to the court were models of terse, vigorous, and compact argument.

Last, and least, was "a certain Jack Baker," who has been described as "a lame man, with a crutch; a merry fellow with plenty of 'horse wit' and an infectious laugh; no speaker and no lawyer, but the best of good fellows." He just took part enough in the trial to get his name once or twice in the reports, and thereby save it from oblivion.

It is stated in Blennerhassett's journal that all these distinguished lawyers tendered their services gratuitously to Colonel Burr. Mr. Wickham and Mr. Botts made a similar tender of their services to Blennerhassett.

Case No. 14,692b.

UNITED STATES v. BURR.[1]

[Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 22.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May 26, 1807.

CRIMES—COMMITMENT—POWER OF COURT.

[1. The circuit court of the United States, sitting as a court, possesses the power to commit any person charged with an offense against the United States.]

[2. The court should hear a motion to commit a person for a crime notwithstanding the grand jury is in session ready to receive an indictment, and the prosecutor has evidence to support it, and the result of the motion may be the publication of evidence unfavorable to justice and the right decision of the case.]

[Cited in Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. 487.]

[At law. Motion to commit Aaron Burr on a charge of high treason in levying war against the United States. Pending the hearing by the grand jury of charges against Burr for high treason, Mr. Hay, Dist. Atty., gave notice in open court of his intention to submit a motion to commit Burr on the charge of high treason. On the previous examination (Case No. 14,692a), he said there was no evidence of an overt act, and he was committed for a misdemeanor only. The evidence is different now. The grand jury, being present, were requested to withdraw.]

Mr. Hay then stated more at large the grounds of his application, and moved to commit Mr. Burr on a charge of high treason against the United States, on the evidence formerly introduced, and on additional testimony to be now brought forward. In answer to a question from Mr. Wickham, he stated that when the witnesses were present he intended to examine them viva voce; but where they were absent to make use of their affidavits, regularly taken and certified.

This motion was discussed at length, throughout the day, by Messrs. Botts, Wickham, Randolph and Burr, in opposition, and Messrs. Hay and Wirt in support of it.

By some of Mr. Burr's counsel the power of the court to commit after the grand jury had been empannelled was called in question, while others admitted the power, but denied the expediency of exercising it. It was urged that the office of the grand jury was to perform the very duty which the court, by this motion, was called on to perform. It was denied that any precedent could be found, either English or American, for the proposed proceeding. It was argued that a public examination of the evidence the district attorney might see fit to bring forward against Col. Burr would have a tendency to increase the prejudice already existing in the public mind against him, and in spite of all precautions this testimony would reach the ears of the grand jury. Col. Burr, it was said, having appeared pursuant to his recognizance, and being ready to answer the charges against him, ought rather to be discharged therefrom than committed, if the government was not ready to proceed against him before the grand jury. The proposed proceeding was denounced as oppressive in its effects, whether so intended or not. The acts of the government towards Col. Burr, in seizing and destroying his property; in his arrest and conveyance to Richmond under a military guard, after his case had been submitted to a grand jury and no bill found; after he had been tried and acquitted, were characterized as illegal and oppressive. As to Gen. Wilkinson, it was asked why he was not present, if his testimony was so important?

In support of the motion, it was argued that the general power of the court to commit being conceded, it was incumbent on the other side to produce precedents showing that this power ceased when a grand jury was empannelled, if they so contended. The course of the government towards Col. Burr was defended with zeal, and pronounced moderate and humane. Gen. Wilkinson, it was said, was supposed to be on the way from New Orleans, but there had not been time for him to come, on a reasonable calculation. It was well known to the accused that he would be put on his trial for high treason should Gen. Wilkinson arrive. He might know of his arrival or landing as soon as the counsel for the prosecution, and would have it in his power to effect an escape by merely paying his recognizance.

At the conclusion of the argument, which was closed by Mr. Burr, the court adjourned.

Before MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice, delivered the following opinion:

In considering the question which was argued yesterday, it appears to be necessary to decide: 1st. Whether the court, sitting as a court, possesses the power to commit any person charged with an offence against the United States. 2d. If this power be possessed, whether circumstances exist in this case which ought to restrain its exercise.

The first point was not made in the argument, and would, if decided against the attorney for the United States, only change the mode of proceeding. If a doubt can exist respecting it, that doubt arises from the omission in the laws of the United States to invest their courts, sitting as courts, with the power in question It is expressly given to every justice and judge, but not to a court. This objection was not made on the part of Colonel Burr, and is now mentioned, not because it is believed to present any intrinsic difficulty, but to show that it has been considered. This power is necessarily exercised by courts in discharge of their functions, and seems not to have been expressly given, because it is implied in the duties which a court must perform, and the judicial act contemplates it in this light. They have cognizance of all crimes against the United States; they are composed of the persons who can commit for those crimes; and it is obviously understood, by the legislature, that the judges may exercise collectively the power which they possess individually, so far as is necessary to enable them to retain a person charged with an offence in order to receive the judgment which may finally be rendered in his case. The court say, this is obviously understood by the legislature, because there is no clause expressly giving to the court the power to bail or to commit a person who appears in discharge of his recognizance, and against whom the attorney of the United States does not choose to proceed; and yet the thirty-third section of the judicial act evinces a clear understanding in the legislature that the power to take bail is in possession of the court. If a person shall appear in conformity with his recognizance, and the court passes away without taking any order respecting him, he is discharged. A new recognizance, therefore, or a commitment on the failure to enter into one, is in the nature of an original commitment, and this power has been uniformly exercised.

It is believed to be a correct position, that the power to commit for offences of which it has cognizance is exercised by every court of criminal jurisdiction, and that courts as well as individual magistrates are conservators of the peace. Were it otherwise, the consequence would only be that it would become the duty of the judge to descend from the bench, and, in his character as an individual magistrate, to do that which the court is asked to do. If the court possesses the power, it is certainly its duty to hear the motion which has been made on the part of the United States; for, in cases of the character of that under consideration, its duty and its power are co-extensive with each other. It was observed when the motion was made, and the observation may now be repeated, that the arguments urged on the part of the accused rather prove the motion on the part of the United States unnecessary, or that inconveniencies may arise from it, than the want of a legal right to make it. The first is, that the grand jury being now in session ready to receive an indictment, the attorney for the United States ought to proceed by bill instead of applying to the court, since the only purpose of a commitment is to bring the accused before a grand jury. This statement contains an intrinsic error which destroys its operation. The commitment is not made for the sole purpose of bringing the accused before a grand jury; it is made for the purpose of subjecting him personally to the judgment of the law, and the grand jury is only the first step towards that judgment. If, as has been argued, the commitment was simply to detain the person until a grand jury could be obtained, then its operation would cease on the assembling of a grand jury; but such is not the fact. The order of commitment retains its force while the jury is in session, and if the prosecutor does not proceed, the court is accustomed to retain a prisoner in confinement, or to renew his recognizance to a subsequent term.

The arguments drawn from the general policy of our laws; from the attention which should be bestowed on prosecutions, instituted by special order of the executive; from the peculiar inconveniencies and hardships of this particular case; from the improper effects which inevitably result from this examination, are some of them subjects for the consideration of those who make the motion, rather than of the court; and others go to the circumspection with which the testimony in support of the motion ought to be weighed, rather than to the duty of hearing it.

It has been said that Colonel Burr already stands charged with treason, and that, therefore, a motion to commit him for the same offence is improper. But the fact is not so understood by the court. The application to charge him with treason was rejected by the judge to whom it was made, because the testimony offered in support of the charge did not furnish probable cause for the opinion that the crime had been committed. After this rejection, Colonel Burr stood, so far as respected his legal liability to have the charge repeated, in precisely the same situation as if it had never been made. He appears in court now as if the crime of treason had never before been alleged against him. That it has been alleged, that the government had had time to collect testimony for the establishment of the fact, that an immense crowd of witnesses are attending for the purpose, that the prosecutor in his own judgment has testimony to support the indictment, are circumstances which may have their influence on the motion for a commitment, or on a continuance, but which cannot deprive the attorney for the United States of the right to make his motion. If he was about to send up a bill to the grand jury, he might move that the person he designed to accuse should be ordered into custody, and it would be in the discretion of the court to grant or to reject the motion.

The court perceives and regrets that the result of this motion may be publications unfavorable to the justice and to the right decision of the case; but if this consequence is to be prevented, it must be by other means than by refusing to hear the motion. No man, feeling a correct sense of the importance which ought to be attached by all to a fair and impartial administration of justice, especially in criminal prosecutions, can view, without extreme solicitude, any attempt which may be made to prejudice the public judgment, and to try any person, not by the laws of his country and the testimony exhibited against him, but by public feelings, which may be and often are artificially excited against the innocent as well as the guilty. But the remedy, for a practice not less dangerous than it is criminal, is not to be obtained by suppressing motions which either party may have a legal right to make.

If it is the choice of the prosecutor on the part of the United States to proceed with this motion, it is the opinion of the court that he may open his testimony.

Case No. 14,692c.

UNITED STATES v. BURR.[1]

[Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 29.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May 28, 1807.

CRIMES — PRELIMINARY HEARING — AFFIDAVITS — VENUE — AUTHENTICATION.

[Cited in Re Alexander, Case No. 162.]

[2. An affidavit whose certificate does not state the place where it is taken is not admissible as evidence.]

[3. A certificate stating that a person of the same name with the one who administered the oath is a magistrate, but not stating that the person who administered it is a magistrate, is an insufficient authentication. The court will not presume any fact to sustain it.]

joined a certificate of Governor William C. C. Claiborne, dated "at New Orleans, the sixteenth of April, 1807," stating "that B. Cenas was a justice of the peace for the county of New Orleans." To the reading of this affidavit several objections were taken by the counsel for Colonel Burr, but those most relied on were the following: 1st, That an affidavit could, under no circumstances, be read, unless it were shown, that the witness could not be produced, and that the government had not had sufficient time to procure the attendance of Jacob Dunbaugh. 2dly, That though the governor of New Orleans had certified that B. Cenas was a justice of the peace, yet he had not said, that it was the same B. Cenas before whom that affidavit was taken. 3dly, That B. Cenas had not stated in the caption of his certificate, or elsewhere, that the affidavit was taken "at New Orleans," so as to show that he was acting within his jurisdiction. The argument on these points was continued to the adjournment of the court, who took time to consider the subject till the next day.

Before MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. On the part of the United States, a paper, purporting to be an affidavit, has been offered in evidence, to the reading which two exceptions are taken: 1st, That an affidavit ought not to be admitted, where the personal attendance of the witness could have been obtained. 2dly, That this paper is not so authenticated as to entitle itself to be considered as an affidavit.

That a magistrate may commit upon affidavits has been decided in the supreme court of the United States, though not without hesitation. The presence of the witness, to be examined by the committing justice, confronted with the accused, is certainly to be desired, and ought to be obtained, unless considerable inconvenience and difficulty exist in procuring his attendance. An ex parte affidavit, shaped, perhaps, by the person pressing the prosecution, will always be viewed with some suspicion, and acted upon with some caution; but the court thought, it would be going too far to reject it altogether. If it was obvious that the attendance of the witness was easily attainable, but that he was intentionally kept out of the way, the question might be otherwise decided. But the particular case before the court does not appear to be of this description. The witness resides at a great distance; and there is no evidence that the materiality of his testimony was known to the prosecutors or to the executive, in time to have directed his attendance. It is true, that general instructions, which would apply to any individual, might have been sent, and the attendance of this, or any other material witness, obtained under those instructions; but it would be requiring too much, to say that the omission to do this ought to exclude an affidavit. This exception, therefore, will not prevail.

The second is, that the paper is not so authenticated as to be introduced as testimony on a question which concerns the liberty of a citizen. This objection is founded on two omissions in the certificate. The first is, that the place at which the affidavit was taken does not appear. The second, that the certificate of the governor does not state the person who administered the oath to be a magistrate; but goes no further than to say, that a person of that name was a magistrate. That, for aught appearing to the court, this oath may, or may not, in point of fact, have been legally administered, must be conceded. The place, where the oath was administered, not having been stated, it may have been administered where the magistrate had no jurisdiction, and yet the certificate be perfectly true. Of consequence, there is no evidence before the court, that the magistrate had power to administer the oath, and was acting in his judicial capacity.

The effect of testimony may often be doubtful, and courts must exercise their best judgment in the case; but of the verity of the paper there ought never to be a doubt. No paper writing ought to gain admittance into a court of justice as testimony, unless it possesses those solemnities which the law requires. Its authentication must not rest upon probability, but must be as complete as the nature of the case admits of: this is believed to be a clear legal principle. In conformity with it is, as the court conceives, the practice of England and of this country, as is attested by the books of forms; and no case is recollected, in which a contrary principle has been recognized. This principle is, in some degree, illustrated by the doctrine with respect to all courts of limited jurisdiction. Their proceedings are erroneous, if their jurisdiction be not conclusively shown. They derive no validity from the strongest probability that they had jurisdiction in the case: none, certainly, from the presumption, that being a court, an usurpation of jurisdiction will not be presumed. The reasoning applies in full force to the actings of a magistrate, whose jurisdiction is local. Thus, in the case of a warrant, it is expressly declared, that the place where it was made ought to appear. The attempt to remedy this defect, by comparing the date of the certificate given by the magistrate with that given by the governor, cannot succeed. The answer given at bar to this argument is conclusive: the certificate wants those circumstances which would make it testimony; and without them no part of it can be regarded.

The second objection is equally fatal. The governor has certified that a man of the same name with the person who has administered the oath is a magistrate, but not that the person who has administered it is a magistrate. It is too obvious to be controverted that there may be two or more persons of the same name, and, consequently, to produce that certainty, which the case readily admits of, the certificate of the governor ought to have applied to the individual who administered the oath. The propriety of this certainty and precision in a certificate, which is to authenticate any affidavit to be introduced into a court of justice, is so generally admitted, that I do not recollect a single instance in which the principle has been departed from. It has been said, that it ought to appear that there are two persons of the same name, or the court will not presume such to be the fact. The court presumes nothing. It may or may not be the fact, and the court cannot presume that it is not. The argument proceeds upon the idea that an instrument is to be disproved by him who objects to it, and not that it is to be proved by him who offers it. Nothing can be more repugnant to the established usage of courts. How is it to be proved, that there are two persons of the name of Cenas in the territory of Orleans? If, with a knowledge of several weeks, perhaps months, that this prosecution was to be carried on, the executive ought not to be required to produce this witness, ought the prisoner to be required, with the notice of a few hours, to prove that two persons of the same name reside in New Orleans? It has been repeatedly urged that a difference exists between the strictness of the law which would be applicable to a trial in chief, and that which is applicable to a motion to commit for trial. Of the reality of this distinction, the present controversy affords conclusive proof. At a trial in chief, the accused possesses the valuable privilege of being confronted with his accuser. But there must be some limit to this relaxation, and it appears not to have extended so far as to the admission of a paper not purporting to be an affidavit, and not shown to be one. When it is asked whether every man does not believe that this affidavit was really taken before a magistrate, it is at once answered that this cannot affect the case. Should a man of probity declare a certain fact within his own knowledge, he would be credited by all who knew him; but his declaration could not be received as testimony by the judge who firmly believed him. So a man might be believed to be guilty of a crime, but a jury could not convict him unless the testimony proved him to be guilty of it. This judicial disbelief of a probable circumstance does not establish a wide interval between common law and common sense. It is believed in this respect to show their intimate union. The argument goes to this, that the paper shall be received and acted upon as an affidavit, not because the oath appears to have been administered according to law, but because it is probable that it was so administered. This point seems to have been decided by the constitution. "The right of the people," says that instrument, "to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the places to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." The cause of seizing is not to be supported by a probable oath, or an oath that was probably taken, but by oath absolutely taken. This oath must be a legal oath; and, if it must be a legal oath, it must legally appear to the court to be so. This provision is not made for a final trial; it is made for the very case now under consideration. In the cool and temperate moments of reflection, undisturbed by that whirlwind of passion with which, in those party conflicts which most generally produce acts or accusations of treason, the human judgment is sometimes overthrown, the people of America have believed the power even of commitment to be capable of too much oppression in its execution to be placed, without restriction, even in the hands of the national legislature. Shall a judge disregard those barriers which the nation has deemed it proper to erect? The interest which the people have in this prosecution has been stated; but it is firmly believed that the best and true interest of the people is to be found in a rigid adherence to those rules which preserve the fairness of criminal prosecutions in every stage, If this was a case to be decided by principle alone, the court would certainly not receive this paper: but if the point is settled by decision, it must be conformed to.

It has been said to be settled in the supreme court of the United States by admitting the affidavit of Wilkinson, to which an exception was taken, because it did not appear that the magistrate had taken the oaths prescribed by law. It is said that as by law he could not act until he had taken the oaths and he was found acting, it must be presumed that this prerequisite was complied with; that is, that his acting as a magistrate under his commission was evidence that he was authorized so to act. It will not be denied that there is much strength in the argument; but the cases do not appear to be precisely parallel. The certificate that he is a magistrate, and that full faith is due to his acts, implies that he has qualified, if his qualification is necessary to his being a complete magistrate, whose acts are entitled to full faith and credit. It is not usual for a particular certificate, that a magistrate has qualified, to accompany his official acts. There is no record of his qualification, and no particular testimonial of it could be obtained. These observations do not apply to the objections which exist. But it is said that the certificate is the same with that in Wilkinson's affidavit. If this objection had been taken and overruled, it would have ended the question; but it was not taken, so far as is now recollected, and does not appear to have been noticed by the court. It is not recollected by the judge who sat on that occasion to have been noticed. A defect, if it be one, which was not observed, cannot be cured by being passed over in silence. The case in Washington was a civil case, and turned upon the point, that no form of the commission was prescribed, and consequently, that it was not necessary to appear on the face of it that it was directed to magistrates. That it was the duty of the clerk to direct it to magistrates, and he should not be presumed to have neglected his duty in a case in which his performance of it need not appear on the face of the instrument. That the person intending to take this exception ought to have taken it sooner, and not surprise the opposite party when it was too late to correct it. But the great difference is, that the privy examination was a mere ministerial act; the administering an oath is a judicial act. The court is of opinion that the paper purporting to be an affidavit made by Dunbaugh cannot be read because it does not appear to be an oath.

Case No. 14,692d.

UNITED STATES v. BURR.[1]

[Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 37.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. June 13, 1807.

CRIMINAL LAW — SUBPŒNA DUCES TECUM — TIME OF ISSUE — TO PRESIDENT — RIGHT TO — MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

[1. Any person charged with a crime in the courts of the United States has a right, before as well as after indictment, to the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses.]

[2. A subpœna may issue to the president of the United States to compel his attendance as a witness, and an accused person is entitled to it of course.]

[3. A subpœna duces tecum may issue to the president of the United States, directing him to bring any paper of which the party praying it has a right to avail himself as testimony.]

[4. In Virginia, a motion for a subpœna duces tecum is to the discretion of the court; and as a legal means of obtaining testimony it cannot be regularly opposed by the opposite party in his character as such.]

[5. A motion to the discretion of a court is a motion not to its inclination, but to its judgment, which is to be guided by sound legal principles.]

[6. The court has no right to refuse its aid to motions for papers to which the accused may be entitled, and which may be material to his defense.]

[7. An accused person has the right, before indictment found, to compel, by way of precaution, the production of letters containing statements of his conduct written by the person who is declared to be the essential witness against him.]

[8. And in such case he is entitled to the production of the original letter, a copy not being sufficient.]

[9. Where it does not affirmatively appear that letters and executive orders in the hands of the president of the United States which may be material to the defense of an accused contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, a subpœna duces tecum will issue. The fact that such letters and orders may contain matter not essential to the defense, and which ought not to be disclosed, will appear on the return.]

[At law. Motion for a subpœna duces tecum directed to the president of the United States.]

[Tuesday, June 9, 1807. The grand jury were adjourned to the following Thursday.]

Mr. Burr then addressed the court. There was a proposition which he wished to submit to them. In the president's communication to congress, he speaks of a letter and other papers which he had received from Mr. Wilkinson, under date of 21st of October. Circumstances had now rendered it material that the whole of this letter should be produced in court; and further, it has already appeared to the court, in the course of different examinations, that the government have attempted to infer certain intentions on my part from certain transactions. It becomes necessary, therefore, that these transactions should be accurately stated. It was, therefore, material to show in what circumstances I was placed in the Mississippi territory; and of course, to obtain certain orders of the army and the navy which were issued respecting me. I have seen the order of the navy in print; and one of the officers of the navy had assured me that this transcript was correct. The instructions in this order were, to destroy my person and my property in descending the Mississippi. Now I wish, if possible, to authenticate this statement; and it was for this purpose, when I passed through Washington lately, that I addressed myself to Mr. Robert Smith. That gentleman seemed to admit the propriety of my application, but objected to my course. He informed me that if I would apply to him through one of my counsel, there could be no difficulty in granting the object of my application. I have since applied in this manner to Mr. Smith, but without success. Hence I feel it necessary to resort to the authority of this court to call upon them to issue a subpœna to the president of the United States, with a clause, requiring him to produce certain papers; or, in other words, to issue the subpœna duces tecum. The attorney for the United States will, however, save the time of this court, if he will consent to produce the letter of the 21st October, with the accompanying papers, and also authentic orders of the navy and war departments.

Mr. Hay declared that he knew not for what this information could be wanted; to what purpose such evidence could relate; and whether it was to be used on the motion for commitment or on the trial in chief.

Mr. Burr, Mr. Wickham, and Mr. Martin

[1] [For references to the various cases in this series, which, together, embrace a full report of the entire proceedings against Aaron Burr, see footnote to Case No. 14,692a.]

observed that perhaps it would be used on both, according as circumstances might require.

Mr. Hay declared that all delay was unnecessary; but he pledged himself, if possible, to obtain the papers which were wanted; and not only those, but every paper which might be necessary to the elucidation of the case.

After considerable of conversation between counsel as to the objects of applying for the subpœna, and the probability of obtaining the papers without it, Mr. Wickham remarked that as to the order from the navy department, a copy might be sufficient, but as to Wilkinson's letter, "We wish to see itself here; and surely it may be trusted in the hands of the attorney for the United States."

Mr. Hay then said: It seems, then, that copies of papers from the government of the United States will not be received! After such an observation, sir, I retract everything that I have promised; let gentlemen, sir, take their own course.

Mr. Wickham explained, disavowing any insinuation against the fairness of the conduct of the government. But he wanted the highest possible degree of evidence, and to confront General Wilkinson with his own letter.

Mr. Hay was satisfied with the explanation, and renewed his promise to apply for the papers if the court deemed them material.

After some further conversation which did not result in any arrangement satisfactory to Mr. Burr's counsel—

The CHIEF JUSTICE said: If the attorney for the United States is satisfied that the court has a right to issue the subpœna duces tecum, I will grant the motion.

Mr. Hay. I am not, sir.

CHIEF JUSTICE. I am not prepared to give an opinion on this point, and therefore I must call for argument.

After some further conversation, the court adjourned.

Wednesday, June 10, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment. The subject of the subpœna duces tecum was resumed.

The following affidavit, drawn up and sworn to by Mr. Burr, was read in support of the motion for the subpœna.

"Aaron Burr maketh oath, that he hath great reason to believe that a letter from General Wilkinson to the president of the United States, dated 21st October, 1806, as mentioned in the president's message of the 22d January, 1807, to both houses of congress, together with the documents accompanying the said letter, and copy of the answer of said Thomas Jefferson, or of any one by his authority, to the said letter, may be material in his defence, in the prosecution against him. And further, that he hath reason to believe the military and naval orders given by the president of the United States, through the departments of war and of the navy, to the officers of the army and navy, at or near the New Orleans stations, touching or concerning the said Burr, or his property, will also be material in his defence.

"Aaron Burr.

"Sworn to in open court, 10th June, 1807."

Upon this motion a protracted debate arose, occupying two entire days, and extending into the third, in which the motion was supported by Messrs. Wickham, Botts, Randolph, Martin, and Burr, and opposed by Messrs. Hay, MacRae, and Wirt. Much ability and eloquence were displayed on both sides. But few points of law were contested in the argument, and these are all clearly stated in the opinion of the court, which is here given in full. The arguments turned more upon the propriety of granting the motion, than upon any strictly legal question; although the right of the accused to apply to the court for process to obtain any testimony whatever, at this stage of the case, was denied by the counsel for the United States. The discussion took a wide range, and the course of the government towards Col. Burr, and the conduct of Gen. Wilkinson in respect to him, were animadverted upon with much severity by counsel for the defence, and zealously defended by the counsel for the United States.

On the part of the prosecution it was insisted that the subpœna was unnecessary, because certified copies of any documents in the executive departments could be obtained by a proper application. It was said to be improper to call upon the president to produce the letter of Gen. Wilkinson, because it was a private letter, and probably contained confidential communications, which the president ought not and could not be compelled to disclose. It might contain state secrets, which could not be divulged without endangering the national safety. It was argued that the documents demanded could not be material to the defence, and objected that the affidavit did not even state, in positive terms, that they would be material.

On the part of the defence it was denied that any affidavit whatever was necessary to support the motion. The proposition that the president could withhold a paper material to the defence, merely because it contained confidential communications, was denied, and pronounced wholly untenable in law. If the letter contained state secrets which it would be inconsistent with the public safety to disclose, the president could say so in the return to the subpœna; but it was not to be assumed until he did say so. Or, if the letter contained anything of a confidential character, not relating to the case, the president could point out such parts as he did not wish to have exposed, and they need not be read in court. A copy of the letter, it was said, would not answer the purposes of the defence. Gen. Wilkinson was admitted to be the witness upon whom the prosecution mainly depended. His relation to the prosecution was such, that he had the strongest possible motive for bolstering it up; and if he failed in it, he would himself sink into irreparable disgrace. When he should come upon the stand to sustain a prosecution in which he had so much at stake, it might be of the utmost importance to confront him with his letter in his own handwriting. A copy would not do, because he might deny it; and no confidence was reposed by the defence in his integrity. The contents of the letter were only known to the defence in so far as they had been divulged by the president in a communication to congress. In that communication the president had stated that he had received a letter from Gen. Wilkinson in relation to the transactions of Mr. Burr, "of whose guilt," he says, "there can be no doubt." The president was severely censured (by Mr. Randolph) for thus assuming the functions of a judge, and pronouncing judgment against Mr. Burr in transacting his executive duties. The president had stated in said communication that Gen. Wilkinson had written at large to him respecting Mr. Burr. The defence wanted this letter, and had no doubt that in some of those things which Gen. Wilkinson had stated to the president, they would be able to trip him up.

As to the orders of the war and navy departments, it was said that certified copies would answer. But the secretary of the navy had already refused to furnish copies to one of Mr. Burr's counsel, on an application to him therefor, and they could not run the risk of another refusal. One of these orders (or what purported to be one) had been published in the Natchez Gazette, and it amounted to an order calling forth a military force to attack Mr. Burr and his associates, and destroy their property. It was contended that the president had no legal or constitutional power to issue such an order as this was represented to be; and if an unconstitutional and illegal order had been issued to destroy any man and his property, that man was justified in resisting it. Authenticated copies of these orders, therefore, might be necessary to defend Mr. Burr against any attempt to prove that he had resisted, or made any preparation to resist, the military forces called forth against him. If no orders had been issued calling forth a military force to attack him, then he had a right to resist any such force as being a mere unauthorized mob. On these grounds it was of the utmost importance to the defence to know exactly what orders had been issued in relation to Col. Burr.

At the close of the discussion Mr. Hay said he had in his possession a copy of the very paper which had been so denounced by the counsel for cruelty and severity; the order issued by the secretary of the navy, which he proposed to read in order to show that there was no such thing in it. The opposite counsel desired to look at the paper, to ascertain whether it was the same they had seen in the Natchez Gazette; but Mr. Hay refused to let them take it. He finally put it up again, declaring that he believed it to be the same, but gentlemen did not want it to be read.

Before MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. The object of the motion now to be decided is to obtain copies of certain orders, understood to have been issued to the land and naval officers of the United States for the apprehension of the accused, and an original letter from General Wilkinson to the president in relation to the accused, with the answer of the president to that letter, which papers are supposed to be material to the defence. As the legal mode of effecting this object, a motion is made for a subpœna duces tecum, to be directed to the president of the United States. In opposition to this motion, a preliminary point has been made by the counsel for the prosecution. It has been insisted by them that, until the grand jury shall have found a true bill, the party accused is not entitled to subpœnas nor to the aid of the court to obtain his testimony. It will not be said that this opinion is now, for the first time, advanced in the United States; but certainly it is now, for the first time, advanced in Virginia. So far back as any knowledge of our jurisprudence is possessed, the uniform practice of this country has been, to permit any individual, who was charged with any crime, to prepare for his defence, and to obtain the process of the court, for the purpose of enabling him so to do. This practice is as convenient and as consonant to justice as it is to humanity. It prevents, in a great measure, those delays which are never desirable, which frequently occasion the loss of testimony, and which are often oppressive. That would be the inevitable consequence of withholding from a prisoner the process of the court, until the indictment against him was found by the grand jury. The right of an accused person to the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses seems to follow, necessarily, from the right to examine those witnesses; and, wherever the right exists, it would be reasonable that it should be accompanied with the means of rendering it effectual. It is not doubted that a person who appears before a court under a recognizance, must expect that a bill will be preferred against him, or that a question concerning the continuance of the recognizance will be brought before the court. In the first event, he has the right, and it is perhaps his duty, to prepare for his defence at the trial. In the second event, it will not be denied that he possesses the right to examine witnesses on the question of continuing his recognizance. In either case it would seem reasonable that he should be entitled to the process of the court to procure the attendance of his witnesses. The genius and character of our laws and usages are friendly, not to condemnation at all events, but to a fair and impartial trial; and they consequently allow to the accused the right of preparing the means to secure such a trial. The objection that the attorney may refuse to proceed at this time, and that no day is fixed for the trial, if he should proceed, presents no real difficulty. It would be a very insufficient excuse to a prisoner, who had failed to prepare for his trial, to say that he was not certain the attorney would proceed against him. Had the indictment been found at the first term, it would have been in some measure uncertain whether there would have been a trial at this, and still more uncertain on what day that trial would take place; yet subpœnas would have issued returnable to the first day of the term; and if after its commencement other subpœnas had been required, they would have issued, returnable as the court might direct. In fact, all process to which the law has affixed no certain return day is made returnable at the discretion of the court. General principles, then, and general practice are in favor of the right of every accused person, so soon as his case is in court, to prepare for his defence, and to receive the aid of the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses.

The constitution and laws of the United States will now be considered for the purpose of ascertaining how they bear upon the question. The eighth amendment to the constitution gives to the accused, "in all criminal prosecutions, a right to a speedy and public trial, and to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." The right given by this article must be deemed sacred by the courts, and the article should be so construed as to be something more than a dead letter. What can more effectually elude the right to a speedy trial than the declaration that the accused shall be disabled from preparing for it until an indictment shall be found against him? It is certainly much more in the true spirit of the provision which secures to the accused a speedy trial, that he should have the benefit of the provision which entitles him to compulsory process as soon as he is brought into court. This observation derives additional force from a consideration of the manner in which this subject has been contemplated by congress. It is obviously the intention of the national legislature, that in all capital cases the accused shall be entitled to process before indictment found. The words of the law are, "and every such person or persons accused or indicted of the crimes aforesaid, (that is, of treason or any other capital offence,) shall be allowed and admitted in his said defence to make any proof that he or they can produce by lawful witness or witnesses, and shall have the like process of the court where he or they shall be tried, to compel his or their witnesses to appear at his or their trial as is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear on the prosecution against them." This provision is made for persons accused or indicted. From the imperfection of human language, it frequently happens that sentences which ought to be the most explicit are of doubtful construction; and in this case the words "accused or indicted" may be construed to be synonymous, to describe a person in the same situation, or to apply to different stages of the prosecution. The word "or" may be taken in a conjunctive or a disjunctive sense. A reason for understanding them in the latter sense is furnished by the section itself. It commences with declaring that any person who shall be accused and indicted of treason shall have a copy of the indictment, and at least three days before his trial. This right is obviously to be enjoyed after an indictment, and therefore the words are, "accused and indicted." So with respect to the subsequent clause, which authorizes a party to make his defence, and directs the court, on his application, to assign him counsel. The words relate to any person accused and indicted. But, when the section proceeds to authorize the compulsory process for witnesses, the phraseology is changed. The words are, "and every such person or persons accused or indicted," &c., thereby adapting the expression to the situation of an accused person both before and after indictment. It is to be remarked, too, that the person so accused or indicted is to have "the like process to compel his or their witnesses to appear at his or their trial, as is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear on the prosecution against him." The fair construction of this clause would seem to be, that with respect to the means of compelling the attendance of witnesses to be furnished by the court, the prosecution and defence are placed by the law on equal ground. The right of the prosecutor to take out subpœnas, or to avail himself of the aid of the court, in any stage of the proceedings previous to the indictment, is not controverted. This act of congress, it is true, applies only to capital cases; but persons charged with offences not capital have a constitutional and a legal right to examine their testimony; and this act ought to be considered as declaratory of the common law in cases where this constitutional right exists.

Upon immemorial usage, then, and upon what is deemed a sound construction of the constitution and law of the land, the court is of opinion that any person charged with a crime in the courts of the United States has a right, before as well as after indictment, to the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses. Much delay and much inconvenience may be avoided by this construction; no mischief, which is perceived, can be produced by it. The process would only issue when, according to the ordinary course of proceeding, the indictment would be tried at the term to which the subpœna is made returnable; so that it becomes incumbent on the accused to be ready for his trial at that term.

This point being disposed of, it remains to inquire whether a subpœna duces tecum can be directed to the president of the United States, and whether it ought to be directed in this case? This question originally consisted of two parts. It was at first doubted whether a subpœna could issue, in any case, to the chief magistrate of the nation; and if it could, whether that subpœna could do more than direct his personal attendance; whether it could direct him to bring with him a paper which was to constitute the gist of his testimony. While the argument was opening, the attorney for the United States avowed his opinion that a general subpœna might issue to the president; but not a subpœna duces tecum. This terminated the argument on that part of the question. The court, however, has thought it necessary to state briefly the foundation of its opinion, that such a subpœna may issue. In the provisions of the constitution, and of the statute, which give to the accused a right to the compulsory process of the court, there is no exception whatever. The obligation, therefore, of those provisions is general; and it would seem that no person could claim an exemption from them, but one who would not be a witness. At any rate, if an exception to the general principle exist, it must be looked for in the law of evidence. The exceptions furnished by the law of evidence, (with one only reservation,) so far as they are personal, are of those only whose testimony could not be received. The single reservation alluded to is the case of the king. Although he may, perhaps, give testimony, it is said to be incompatible with his dignity to appear under the process of the court. Of the many points of difference which exist between the first magistrate in England and the first magistrate of the United States, in respect to the personal dignity conferred on them by the constitutions of their respective nations, the court will only select and mention two. It is a principle of the English constitution that the king can do no wrong, that no blame can be imputed to him, that he cannot be named in debate. By the constitution of the United States, the president, as well as any other officer of the government, may be impeached, and may be removed from office on high crimes and misdemeanors. By the constitution of Great Britain, the crown is hereditary, and the monarch can never be a subject. By that of the United States, the president is elected from the mass of the people, and, on the expiration of the time for which he is elected, returns to the mass of the people again. How essentially this difference of circumstances must vary the policy of the laws of the two countries, in reference to the personal dignity of the executive chief, will be perceived by every person. In this respect the first magistrate of the Union may more properly be likened to the first magistrate of a state; at any rate, under the former Confederation; and it is not known ever to have been doubted, but that the chief magistrate of a state might be served with a subpœna ad testificandum. If, in any court of the United States, it has ever been decided that a subpœna cannot issue to the president, that decision is unknown to this court.

If, upon any principle, the president could be construed to stand exempt from the general provisions of the constitution, it would be, because his duties as chief magistrate demand his whole time for national objects. But it is apparent that this demand is not unremitting; and, if it should exist at the time when his attendance on a court is required, it would be shown on the return of the subpœna, and would rather constitute a reason for not obeying the process of the court than a reason against its being issued. In point of fact it cannot be doubted that the people of England have the same interest in the service of the executive government, that is, of the cabinet counsel, that the American people have in the service of the executive of the United States, and that their duties are as arduous and as unremitting. Yet it has never been alleged, that a subpœna might not be directed to them. It cannot be denied that to issue a subpœna to a person filling the exalted position of the chief magistrate is a duty which would be dispensed with more cheerfully than it would be performed; but, if it be a duty, the court can have no choice in the case. If, then, as is admitted by the counsel for the United States, a subpœna may issue to the president, the accused is entitled to it of course; and whatever difference may exist with respect to the power to compel the same obedience to the process, as if it had been directed to a private citizen, there exists no difference with respect to the right to obtain it. The guard, furnished to this high officer, to protect him from being harassed by vexatious and unnecessary subpœnas, is to be looked for in the conduct of a court after those subpœnas have issued; not in any circumstance which is to precede their being issued. If, in being summoned to give his personal attendance to testify, the law does not discriminate between the president and a private citizen, what foundation is there for the opinion that this difference is created by the circumstance that his testimony depends on a paper in his possession, not on facts which have come to his knowledge otherwise than by writing? The court can perceive no foundation for such an opinion. The propriety of introducing any paper into a case, as testimony, must depend on the character of the paper, not on the character of the person who holds it. A subpœna duces tecum, then, may issue to any person to whom an ordinary subpœna may issue, directing him to bring any paper of which the party praying it has a right to avail himself as testimony; if, indeed, that be the necessary process for obtaining the view of such a paper. When this subject was suddenly introduced, the court felt some doubt concerning the propriety of directing a subpœna to the chief magistrate, and some doubt also concerning the propriety of directing any paper in his possession, not public in its nature, to be exhibited in court. The impression that the questions which might arise in consequence of such process, were more proper for discussion on the return of the process than on its issuing, was then strong on the mind of the judges; but the circumspection with which they would take any step which would in any manner relate to that high personage, prevented their yielding readily to those impressions, and induced the request that those points, if not admitted, might be argued. The result of that argument is a confirmation of the impression originally entertained. The court can perceive no legal objection to issuing a subpœna duces tecum to any person whatever, provided the case be such as to justify the process. This is said to be a motion to the discretion of the court. This is true. But a motion to its discretion is a motion, not to its inclination, but to its judgment; and its judgment is to be guided by sound legal principles. A subpœna duces tecum varies from an ordinary subpœna only in this; that a witness is summoned for the purpose of bringing with him a paper in his custody In some of our sister states whose system of jurisprudence is erected on the same foundation with our own, this process, we learn, issues of course. In this state it issues, not absolutely of course, but with leave of the court No case, however, exists as is believed, in which the motion has been founded on an affidavit, in which it has been denied, or in which it has been opposed. It has been truly observed that the opposite party can, regularly, take no more interest in the awarding a subpœna duces tecum than in the awarding an ordinary subpœna. In either case he may object to any delay, the grant of which may be implied in granting the subpœna; but he can no more object regularly to the legal means of obtaining testimony, which exists in the papers, than in the mind of the person who may be summoned. If no inconvenience can be sustained by the opposite party, he can only oppose the motion in the character of an amicus curiæ, to prevent the court from making an improper order, or from burthening some officer by compelling an unnecessary attendance. This court would certainly be very unwilling to say that upon fair construction the constitutional and legal right to obtain its process, to compel the attendance of witnesses, does not extend to their bringing with them such papers as may be material in the defence. The literal distinction which exists between the cases is too much attenuated to be countenanced in the tribunals of a just and humane nation. If, then, the subpœna be issued without inquiry into the manner of its application, it would seem to trench on the privileges which the constitution extends to the accused; it would seem to reduce his means of defence within narrower limits than is designed by the fundamental law of our country, if an overstrained rigor should be used with respect to his right to apply for papers deemed by himself to be material. In the one case the accused is made the absolute judge of the testimony to be summoned; if, in the other, he is not a judge, absolutely for himself, his judgment ought to be controlled only so far as it is apparent that he means to exercise his privileges not really in his own defence, but for purposes which the court ought to discountenance. The court would not lend its aid to motions obviously designed to manifest disrespect to the government; but the court has no right to refuse its aid to motions for papers to which the accused may be entitled, and which may be material in his defence. These observations are made to show the nature of the discretion which may be exercised. If it be apparent that the papers are irrelative to the case, or that for state reasons they cannot be introduced into the defence, the subpœna duces tecum would be useless. But, if this be not apparent, if they may be important in the defence, if they may be safely read at the trial, would it not be a blot in the page which records the judicial proceedings of this country, if, in a case of such serious import as this, the accused should be denied the use of them? The counsel for the United States takes a very different view of the subject, and insist that a motion for process to obtain testimony should be supported by the same full and explicit proof of the nature and application of that testimony, which would be required on a motion, which would delay public justice, which would arrest the ordinary course of proceeding, or would in any other manner affect the rights of the opposite party. In favor of this position has been urged the opinion of one, whose loss as a friend and as a judge I sincerely deplore; whose worth I feel, and whose authority I shall at all times greatly respect. If his opinions were really opposed to mine, I should certainly revise, deliberately revise, the judgment I had formed; but I perceive no such opposition.

In the trials of Smith and Ogden [U. S. v. Smith, Case No. 16,342], the court in which Judge Patterson presided, required a special affidavit in support of a motion made by the counsel for the accused for a continuance and for an attachment against witnesses who had been subpœnaed and who had failed to attend. Had this requisition of a special affidavit been made as well a foundation for an attachment as for a continuance, the cases would not have been parallel, because the attachment was considered by the counsel for the prosecution merely as a means of punishing the contempt, and a court might certainly require stronger testimony to induce them to punish a contempt, than would be required to lend its aid to a party in order to procure evidence in a cause. But the proof furnished by the case is most conclusive that the special statements of the affidavit were required solely on account of the continuance. Although the counsel for the United States considered the motion for an attachment merely as a mode of punishing for contempt, the counsel for Smith and Ogden considered it as compulsory process to bring in a witness, and moved a continuance until they could have the benefit of this process. The continuance was to arrest the ordinary course of justice; and, therefore, the court required a special affidavit, showing the materiality of the testimony before this continuance could be granted. Prima facie the evidence could not apply to the case; and there was an additional reason for a special affidavit. The object of this special statement was expressly said to be for a continuance. Colden proceeded: "The present application is to put off the cause on account of the absence of witnesses, whose testimony the defendant alleges is material for his defence, and who have disobeyed the ordinary process of the court. In compliance with the intimation from the bench yesterday, the defendant has disclosed by the affidavit which I have just read, the points to which he expects the witnesses who have been summoned will testify. If the court cannot or will not issue compulsory process to bring in the witnesses who are the objects of this application, then the cause will not be postponed. Or, if it appears to the court, that the matter disclosed by the affidavit might not be given in evidence, if the witness were now here, then we cannot expect that our motion will be successful. For it would be absurd to suppose that the court will postpone the trial on account of the absence of witnesses whom they cannot compel to appear, and of whose voluntary attendance there is too much reason to despair; or, on account of the absence of witnesses who, if they were before the court, could not be heard on the trial." See the trials of Smith and Ogden [supra]. This argument states, unequivocally, the purpose for which a special affidavit was required.

The counsel for the United States considered the subject in the same light. After exhibiting an affidavit for the purpose of showing that the witnesses could not probably possess any material information, Mr. Standford said: "It was decided by the court yesterday that it was incumbent on the defendant, in order to entitle himself to a postponement of the trial on account of the absence of these witnesses, to show in what respect they are material for his defence. It was the opinion of the court that the general affidavit, in common form, would not be sufficient for this purpose, but that the particular facts expected from the witnesses must be disclosed in order that the court might, upon those facts, judge of the propriety of granting the postponement."

The court frequently treated the subject so as to show the opinion that the special affidavit was required only on account of the continuance; but what is conclusive on this point is, that after deciding the testimony of the witnesses to be such as could not be offered to the jury, Judge Patterson was of opinion that a rule, to show cause why an attachment should not issue, ought to be granted. He could not have required the materiality of the witness to be shown on a motion, the success of which did not, in his opinion, in any degree depend on that materiality; and which he granted after deciding the testimony to be such as the jury ought not to hear. It is, then, most apparent that the opinion of Judge Patterson has been misunderstood, and that no inference can possibly be drawn from it, opposed to the principle which has been laid down by the court. That principle will therefore be applied to the present motion.

The first paper required is the letter of General Wilkinson, which was referred to in the message of the president to congress. The application of that letter to the case is shown by the terms in which the communication was made. It is a statement of the conduct of the accused made by the person who is declared to be the essential witness against him. The order for producing this letter is opposed:

First, because it is not material to the defense. It is a principle, universally acknowledged, that a party has a right to oppose to the testimony of any witness against him, the declarations which that witness has made at other times on the same subject. If he possesses this right, he must bring forward proof of those declarations. This proof must be obtained before he knows positively what the witness will say; for if he waits until the witness has been heard at the trial, it is too late to meet him with his former declarations. Those former declarations, therefore, constitute a mass of testimony, which a party has a right to obtain by way of precaution, and the positive necessity of which can only be decided at the trial. It is with some surprise an argument was heard from the bar, insinuating that the award of a subpœna on this ground gave the countenance of the court to suspicions affecting the veracity of a witness who is to appear on the part of the United States. This observation could not have been considered. In contests of this description, the court takes no part; the court has no right to take a part. Every person may give in evidence, testimony such as is stated in this case. What would be the feelings of the prosecutor if, in this case, the accused should produce a witness completely exculpating himself, and the attorney for the United States should be arrested in his attempt to prove what the same witness had said upon a former occasion, by a declaration from the bench that such an attempt could not be permitted, because it would imply a suspicion in the court that the witness had not spoken the truth? Respecting so unjustifiable an interposition but one opinion would be formed.

The second objection is, that the letter contains matter which ought not to be disclosed. That there may be matter, the production of which the court would not require, is certain; but, in a capital case, that the accused ought, in some form, to have the benefit of it, if it were really essential to his defence, is a position which the court would very reluctantly deny. It ought not to be believed that the department which superintends prosecutions in criminal cases, would be inclined to withhold it. What ought to be done under such circumstances presents a delicate question, the discussion of which, it is hoped, will never be rendered necessary in this country. At present it need only be said that the question does not occur at this time. There is certainly nothing before the court which shows that the letter in question contains any matter the disclosure of which would endanger the public safety. If it does contain such matter, the fact may appear before the disclosure is made. If it does contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the executive to disclose, such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the point, will, of course, be suppressed. It is not easy to conceive that so much of the letter as relates to the conduct of the accused can be a subject of delicacy with the president. Everything of this kind, however, will have its due consideration on the return of the subpœna.

Thirdly, it has been alleged that a copy may be received instead of the original, and the act of congress has been cited in support of this proposition. This argument presupposes that the letter required is a document filed in the department of state, the reverse of which may be and most probably is the fact. Letters addressed to the president are most usually retained by himself. They do not belong to any of the departments. But, were the facts otherwise, a copy might not answer the purpose. The copy would not be superior to the original, and the original itself would not be admitted, if denied, without proof that it was in the handwriting of the witness. Suppose the case put at the bar of an indictment on this letter for a libel, and on its production it should appear not to be in the handwriting of the person indicted. Would its being deposited in the department of state make it his writing, or subject him to the consequence of having written it? Certainly not. For the purpose, then, of showing the letter to have been written by a particular person, the original must be produced, and a copy could not be admitted. On the confidential nature of this letter much has been said at the bar, and authorities have been produced which appear to be conclusive. Had its contents been orally communicated, the person to whom the communications were made could not have excused himself from detailing them, so far as they might be deemed essential in the defence. Their being in writing gives no additional sanctity; the only difference produced by the circumstance is, that the contents of the paper must be proved by the paper itself, not by the recollection of the witness.

Much has been said about the disrespect to the chief magistrate, which is implied by this motion, and by such a decision of it as the law is believed to require. These observations will be very truly answered by the declaration that this court feels many, perhaps, peculiar motives for manifesting as guarded a respect for the chief magistrate of the Union as is compatible with its official duties. To go beyond these would exhibit a conduct which would deserve some other appellation than the term respect. It is not for the court to anticipate the event of the present prosecution. Should it terminate as is expected on the part of the United States, all those who are concerned in it should certainly regret that a paper which the accused believed to be essential to his defence, which may, for aught that now appears, be essential, had been withheld from him. I will not say, that this circumstance would, in any degree, tarnish the reputation of the government; but I will say, that it would justly tarnish the reputation of the court which had given its sanction to its being withheld. Might I be permitted to utter one sentiment, with respect to myself, it would be to deplore, most earnestly, the occasion which should compel me to look back on any part of my official conduct with so much self-reproach as I should feel, could I declare, on the information now possessed, that the accused is not entitled to the letter in question, if it should be really important to him.

The propriety of requiring the answer to this letter is more questionable. It is alleged that it most probably communicates orders showing the situation of this country with Spain, which will be important on the misdemeanor. If it contain matter not essential to the defence, and the disclosure be unpleasant to the executive, it certainly ought not to be disclosed. This is a point which will appear on the return. The demand of the orders which have been issued, and which have been, as is alleged, published in the Natchez Gazette, is by no means unusual. Such documents have often been produced in the courts of the United States and the courts of England. If they contain matter interesting to the nation, the concealment of which is required by the public safety, that matter will appear upon the return. If they do not, and are material, they may be exhibited. It is said they cannot be material, because they cannot justify any unlawful resistance which may have been employed or meditated by the accused. Were this admitted, and were it also admitted that such resistance would amount to treason, the orders might still be material; because they might tend to weaken the endeavor to connect such overt act with any overt act of which this court may take cognizance. The court, however, is rather inclined to the opinion that the subpœna in such case ought to be directed to the head of the department in whose custody the orders are. The court must suppose that the letter of the secretary of the navy, which has been stated by the attorney for the United States, to refer the counsel for the prisoner to his legal remedy for the copies he desired, alluded to such a motion as is now made.

The affidavit on which the motion is grounded has not been noticed. It is believed that such a subpœna, as is asked, ought to issue, if there exist any reason for supposing that the testimony may be material, and ought to be admitted. It is only because the subpœna is to those who administer the government of this country, that such an affidavit was required as would furnish probable cause to believe that the testimony was desired for the real purposes of defence, and not for such as this court will forever discountenance.

Case No. 14,692e.

UNITED STATES v. BURR.[1]

In re WILLIE.

[Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 67.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. June 18, 1807.

WITNESS — PRIVILEGE — INCRIMINATING ANSWER.

[1. In determining the right of a witness to refuse to answer on the ground that his answer might tend to incriminate him, it is the province of the court to judge whether any direct answer to the question proposed will furnish evidence against the witness.]

[Cited in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 12 Sup. Ct. 199.]

[2. If any direct answer may disclose a fact which forms a necessary and essential link in the chain of testimony, which would be sufficient to convict the witness of any crime, he is not bound to answer it so as to furnish matter for that conviction.]

[Cited in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 12 Sup. Ct. 199.]

[3. In such a case the witness must himself judge what his answer will be; and if he say on oath that he cannot answer without accusing himself, he cannot be compelled to answer.]

[Cited in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 12 Sup. Ct. 199.]

[4. The secretary of a person charged with treason cannot refuse to answer whether he has present knowledge of the cipher in which is written a letter purporting to have been written by the accused, as any direct answer could not tend to implicate him.]

[At law. The questions herein arose upon the proposition of the attorney for the United States to send before the grand jury, then in session considering the charges against Aaron Burr, a certain letter in cipher, addressed to Dr. Bollman under a fictitious name, and alleged to be in the handwriting of Mr. Willie, Burr's secretary. Mr. Willie was called to the stand to prove the authenticity and materiality of the letter.]

Mr. Williams, his counsel, hoped that no question would be put the answer to which might tend to criminate himself.

Mr. MacRae.—Did you copy this paper?

Mr. Williams, (after consulting with his client.)—He says that if any paper he has written have any effect on any other person, it will as much affect himself.

Mr. Wirt.—He has sworn in his deposition that he did not understand the cipher of this letter. How, then, can his merely copying it implicate him in a crime when he does not know its concents?

Mr. MacRae.—We will change our question. Do you understand the contents of that paper?

Mr. Williams.—He objects to answering. He says that though that question may be an innocent one, yet the counsel for the prosecution might go on gradually from one question to another, until he at last obtained matter enough to criminate him.

Mr. MacRae.—My question is not, "Do you understand this letter, and then what are its contents?" If I pursued this course, I might then propound a question to which he might object; but unless I take that course, how can he be criminated?

Mr. Botts.—If a man know of treasonable matter, and do not disclose it, he is guilty of misprision of treason. Two circumstances, therefore, constitute this crime: knowledge of the treason, and concealment of it. The knowledge of the treason, again, comprehends two ideas: that he must have seen and understood the treasonable matter. To one of these points Mr. Willie is called upon to depose. If this be established, who knows but the other elements of the crime may be gradually unfolded so as to implicate him? The witness ought to judge for himself.

Mr. MacRae.—I did not first ask if he copied and then understood it? but first, if he understood it? Had he answered this question in the affirmative, I certainly should not have pressed the other question upon him, because that might have amounted to self-crimination; but, if he did not understand it, it could not criminate him.

Mr. Hay.—I will simply ask him whether he knows this letter to be written by Aaron Burr, or by some one under his authority?

The CHIEF JUSTICE said that that was a proper question.

Mr. Williams.—He refuses to answer; it might tend to criminate him.

THE COURT were of opinion that Mr. Willie should answer upon oath whether or not he thought that answering the proposed question might have a tendency to criminate himself.

Here a long desultory argument ensued.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—Has the witness a right to refuse to answer?

Mr. Williams.—The knowledge of the treason and concealment of it, amount to a misprision of treason.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—The better question is, Do you understand it?

Mr. Williams.—He ought not to have such a question put to him, because he might be obliged to answer "Yes." He ought not to be compelled to answer, if it might possibly criminate him. The witness is to judge for himself, though the question may not seem to affect him. He referred to the case of Young Goosely [see Case No. 15,230], before referred to by Mr. Randolph.

Mr. Botts.—I will give Mr. Hay the benefit of an authority,—1 MacNal. Ev. 257, 258, —which shows that the possibility of crimination is sufficient to excuse the witness from answering.

Mr. Williams.—What the witness says here tending to his own crimination, may be used as evidence against him on a prosecution. If he answer at all, he is deprived of the privilege given by the law, not to criminate one's self.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—If he be to decide upon this, it must be on oath. He asked Willie whether his answering the question, whether he understood that letter, would criminate himself? He answered, It may in a certain case.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—I wish to consider the question until to-morrow.

GRIFFIN, District Judge, to Mr. Williams.—The Case of Goosely was not as you represented it. It was the court who knew that the witness was one of those who robbed the mail.

Mr. Hay.—The doctrine is most pernicious and contrary to the public good.

Mr. Williams.—The public good does not require the conviction of Colonel Burr so much as to dispense with the law.

It was then agreed that the point should be argued to-morrow, and Colonel Burr's counsel promised to produce their authorities to show that Willie could not be compelled to answer such questions as might, in his own opinion, tend to criminate himself.

The court then adjourned till to-morrow.

[The point was argued at some length on the two following days by Mr. Botts, Mr. Williams, Mr. Martin, and Mr. Wickham on one side, and by Mr. MacRae and Mr. Hay on the other. Mr. Martin contended that "a witness is not compelled to answer when it tends to criminate him, nor where it does not relate to the issue," and cited authorities in support of the proposition.]

Before MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. In point of law, the question now before the court relates to the witness himself. The attorney for the United States offers a paper in cipher, which he supposes to have proceeded from a person against whom he has preferred an indictment for high treason, and another for a misdemeanor, both of which are now before the grand jury, and produces a person said to be the secretary or clerk of the accused, who is supposed either to have copied this paper by his direction, or to be able to prove, in some other manner, that it has proceeded from his authority. To a question demanding whether he understands this paper the witness has declined giving an answer, saying that the answer might criminate himself; and it is referred to the court to decide whether the excuse he has offered be sufficient to prevent his answering the question which has been propounded to him.

It is a settled maxim of law that no man is bound to criminate himself. This maxim forms one exception to the general rule, which declares that every person is compellable to bear testimony in a court of justice. For the witness who considers himself as being within this exception it is alleged that he is, and from the nature of things must be, the sole judge of the effect of his answer; that he is consequently at liberty to refuse to answer any question if he will say upon his oath that his answer to that question might criminate himself.

When this opinion was first suggested, the court conceived the principle laid down at the bar to be too broad, and therefore required that authorities in support of it might be adduced. Authorities have been adduced, and have been considered. In all of them the court could perceive that an answer to the question propounded might criminate the witness, and he was informed that he was at liberty to refuse an answer. These cases do not appear to the court to support the principle laid down by the counsel for the witness in the full latitude in which they have stated it. There is no distinction which takes from the court the right to consider and decide whether any direct answer to the particular question propounded could be reasonably supposed to affect the witness. There may be questions no direct answer to which could, in any degree, affect him; and there is no case which goes so far as to say that he is not bound to answer such questions. The case of Goosely, in this court, is, perhaps, the strongest that has been adduced. But the general doctrine of the judge in that case must have referred to the circumstances, which showed that the answer might criminate him.

When two principles come in conflict with each other, the court must give them both a reasonable construction, so as to preserve them both to a reasonable extent. The principle which entitles the United States to the testimony of every citizen, and the principle by which every witness is privileged not to accuse himself, can neither of them be entirely disregarded. They are believed both to be preserved to a reasonable extent, and according to the true intention of the rule and of the exception to that rule, by observing that course which it is conceived courts have generally observed. It is this:

When a question is propounded, it belongs to the court to consider and to decide whether any direct answer to it can implicate the witness. If this be decided in the negative, then he may answer it without violating the privilege which is secured to him by law. If a direct answer to it may criminate himself, then he must be the sole judge what his answer would be. The court cannot participate with him in this judgment, because they cannot decide on the effect of his answer without knowing what it would be; and a disclosure of that fact to the judges would strip him of the privilege which the law allows, and which he claims. It follows necessarily then, from this statement of things, that if the question be of such a description that an answer to it may or may not criminate the witness, according to the purport of that answer, it must rest with himself, who alone can tell what it would be, to answer the question or not. If, in such a case, he say upon his oath that his answer would criminate himself, the court can demand no other testimony of the fact. If the declaration be untrue, it is in conscience and in law as much a perjury as if he had declared any other untruth upon his oath; as it is one of those cases in which the rule of law must be abandoned, or the oath of the witness be received.

The counsel for the United States have also laid down this rule according to their understanding of it; but they appear to the court to have made it as much too narrow as the counsel for the witness have made it too broad. According to their statement a witness can never refuse to answer any question unless that answer, unconnected with other testimony, would be sufficient to convict him of a crime. This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible but a probable case that a witness, by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself might be unavailing, but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his own bosom he is safe; but draw it from thence, and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description.

What testimony may be possessed, or is attainable, against any individual the court can never know. It would seem, then, that the court ought never to compel a witness to give an answer which discloses a fact that would form a necessary and essential part of a crime which is punishable by the laws.

To apply this reasoning to the particular case under consideration: To know and conceal the treason of another is misprision of treason, and is punishable by law. No witness, therefore, is compellable by law to disclose a fact which would form a necessary and essential part of this crime. If the letter in question contain evidence of treason, which is a fact not dependent on the testimony of the witness before the court, and, therefore, may be proved without the aid of his testimony; and if the witness were acquainted with that treason when the letter was written, he may probably be guilty of misprision of treason, and, therefore, the court ought not to compel him to answer any question, the answer to which might disclose his former knowledge of the contents of that letter.

But if the letter should relate to misdemeanor and not to the treason, the court is not apprized that a knowledge and concealment of the misdemeanor would expose the witness to any prosecution whatever. On this account the court was, at first, disposed to inquire whether the letter could be deciphered, in order to determine from its contents how far the witness could be examined respecting it. The court was inclined to this course from considering the question as one which might require a disclosure of the knowledge which the witness might have had of the contents of this letter when it was put in cipher, or when it was copied by himself; if, indeed, such were the fact. But, on hearing the question more particularly and precisely stated, and finding that it refers only to the present knowledge of the cipher, it appears to the court that the question may be answered without implicating the witness, because his present knowledge would not, it is believed, in a criminal prosecution, justify the inference that his knowledge was acquired previous to this trial, or afford the means of proving that fact.

The court is, therefore, of opinion that the witness may answer the question now propounded.

The gentlemen of the bar will understand the rule laid down by the court to be this: It is the province of the court to judge whether any direct answer to the question which may be proposed will furnish evidence against the witness. If such answer may disclose a fact which forms a necessary and essential link in the chain of testimony, which would be sufficient to convict him of any crime, he is not bound to answer it so as to furnish matter for that conviction. In such a case the witness must himself judge what his answer will be; and if he say on oath that he cannot answer without accusing himself, he cannot be compelled to answer.

Case No. 14,692f.

UNITED STATES v. BURR.[1]

[Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 72.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. June 27, 1807.

CONTEMPT—OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE.

[1. An offer of a sum of money to a witness to remove his objections to going without the jurisdiction of the court to testify, is not necessarily an attempt to contaminate the source of justice, and a contempt of the court in which it is administered.]

[2. Held, on the evidence, that no contempt was intended to the court by General Wilkinson in procuring witnesses to testify, and that he was not guilty of any intentional abuse of its process, or of any oppression in the manner of executing it.]

[At law. Motion for attachment against General Wilkinson "for a contempt in obstructing the administration of the justice of the court."]

Mr. Burr's counsel called James Knox and Chandler Lindsley, (two of the witnesses of the United States,) whose affidavits had been drawn and were intended as the ground of the motion for the attachment.

The CHIEF JUSTICE asked if the papers could not be put into his hands, and the argument take place to-morrow; he wished to consider the question before it was discussed. This led to a debate of considerable length, in which the counsel for the prosecution favored the course suggested by the CHIEF JUSTICE, and the counsel for Colonel Burr opposed all delay.

At the close of the discussion, some conversation ensued relative to the form of the motion for an attachment against General Wilkinson. The counsel for the United States insisted upon a specification of the conduct for which it was to issue; that if generally expressed as a "contempt of the court," nothing but the spirit of divination could enable him to discover the specific offence charged against him, nor to prepare for his defence; that the precise circumstances which constituted the offence ought to be particularized.

Mr. Burr and his counsel said that the specification was to be found in the two affidavits, and that it was from delicacy to gentlemen, he had not attempted to make these affidavits matter of record, by introducing them on the face of the motion. The motion reduced to writing, stated the offence to be "for a contempt in obstructing the administration of the justice of this court."

The court then adjourned.

[1] [For reference to the various cases in this series, which, together, embrace a full report of the entire proceedings against Aaron Burr, see footnote to Case No. 14,692a.]

Saturday, June 20, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment. Present: MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

Mr. Randolph rose to proceed with the motion, when he was interrupted by Mr. Hay, who communicated returns to subpœnas duces tecum (reported in the main case, No. 14,693), after which Mr. Randolph brought forward the motion. He said: The ground on which we make the motion is this: that Gen. Wilkinson, who is now before the court, in a case depending between the United States and Mr. Burr, deliberately abused the process of the law relative to a witness who has been summoned in this case. He contrived, on his own affidavit, and by his own power, to obstruct the free course of legal testimony, and to intimidate and coercively bring to this court a witness by the abuse of military authority. For this illegal proceeding it is the duty of the court to take notice of Gen. Wilkinson. As the cases ought to be kept distinct, I speak of him only; but it may be necessary to carry the principle into immediate execution as to other persons. The grounds of this accusation are the depositions of James Knox and Chandler Lindsley, which will be read to the court.

Mr. Hay objected to the introduction of these affidavits, because he understood they had been written and dictated by the counsel of Colonel Burr. He did not pretend to say that they contained anything which they did not believe to be true, nor did he know their contents. He understood that those witnesses had voluntarily gone and given information to the counsel, upon which the counsel had written or dictated the terms of these affidavits. The legal authorities showed that a court would never issue an attachment founded on affidavits taken by the agent or attorney of the party applying for it. He cited the case of the King v. Wallace, 3 Term R. 403, where the court had set aside an affidavit because it was sworn to before the attorney for the prosecution, and refused to grant an attachment.

Mr. Baker said: As to the affidavit of Knox, I know nothing; but as to the affidavit of Lindsley, it was written by himself. The facts are simply these: He called upon me with his affidavit already written, (I had never seen him before,) to know whether it was correctly written or not. I read it, corrected some inaccuracies in style, and wrote it over again. It was not sworn to when he brought it to me. After I had corrected those grammatical errors, and submitted it to Mr. Lindsley's inspection, he said that the statement was perfectly correct.

Mr. MacRae said, as the witnesses are now before the court, and can be examined viva voce, there is no inconvenience in the objection.

Mr. Wickham insisted that the regular and established practice is, that when in the course of a trial collateral points arise in which it is necessary that testimony should be heard, not to produce viva voce testimony, but affidavits in support of them.

Mr. Burr said that, if agreeable to the court, he would have no objection to the examination of the witnesses in court, although the practice is, on principles of convenience, otherwise. As to the origin of this business, it was not perfectly understood, and some unfounded insinuations had been made concerning it. James Knox had called on him, stated the usage which he had received, and asked whether any redress could be obtained. One of his counsel, who was present at the interview, had concurred with him in opinion that some notice should be taken of this proceeding. At first they thought of referring him to Mr. Hay, but on reconsideration they thought that perhaps Mr. Hay might think himself disqualified from acting. Mr. Knox's own idea was that he ought to come into court and complain himself of the treatment he had received.

Mr. Wirt spoke against receiving the affidavits, and urged that the witnesses ought to be examined before the court.

Mr. Botts observed that Mr. Burr had signified his acquiescence in that course.

James Knox was then called, when Mr. MacRae said, that as the business was of importance to General Wilkinson, it was very desirable that he should be present at the examination of this and the other witnesses who might be introduced; that he was now before the grand jury, and he had applied to the gentlemen on the other side to postpone the motion until he could be present, but they objected to any delay. He therefore found it necessary to apply to the court to suspend the examination for a short time, till the general could be present.

Mr. Martin said, the question was whether a rule should be granted to show cause, with which neither General Wilkinson nor his counsel had anything to do, and were not in fact, as much as supposed to be present. This led to some further discussion, in which Messrs. MacRae, Wirt, and Martin participated, when

The CHIEF JUSTICE observed, that if the motion were to be postponed until Monday, and the witnesses on both sides were then heard, it would answer every purpose; and it might be considered then as a motion for an attachment, not for a rule to show cause.

Mr. Randolph said, we shall move then immediately for an attachment.

The examination was then postponed till Monday, and the court adjourned to that day.

Monday, June 22, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Randolph directed that James Knox and Chandler Lindsley be called, and was proceeding to open the motion he had introduced on Saturday, when Mr. MacRae objected to proceeding until General Wilkinson could be present, who was still under examination before the grand jury. After some discussion as to the propriety of proceeding in the absence of General Wilkinson, the court adjourned.

Tuesday, June, 23, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment.

General Wilkinson appeared in court, and took his seat among the counsel for the United States.

Mr. Burr observed to the court, that as General Wilkinson was then present, he would proceed with his inquiry. He would have it, however, distinctly understood, that if the charge could not be brought home to General Wilkinson himself, so as to support the motion against him, yet it must attach according to the testimony, to any of his subordinate officers, as Mr. Gaines, or any other.

Mr. Hay objected to this extension of the motion, which he had understood to be confined to General Wilkinson alone, particularly as they had not given any intimation of such an intention before, and as no other person had any notice.

Mr. Randolph insisted that the evidence to be introduced must attach to General Wilkinson or any of his subordinate officers, or other persons, according to what the witnesses should prove. He read the charge against General Wilkinson: that he, in conjunction with others, did wilfully and unlawfully cause compulsory process to be served on James Knox and Chandler Lindsley, whilst in the city of New Orleans, whence they were transported by water to the city of Richmond, to give testimony for the United States in the case of Aaron Burr; the effect of which unlawful measures was directly and essentially tending to obstruct the free course of testimony, and of the administration of justice in this court, and to invade the privileges of witnesses.

The witnesses were then introduced. James Knox was first sworn, and testified as follows:

He says that he went to New Orleans some time in March. Soon after his arrival he received a note from General Wilkinson, making some inquiry concerning Sergeant Dunbaugh. He waited on the general, who received and treated him handsomely, took him by the hand, and asked him if he were not afraid, after what had happened, and what had been said about him? He told him that he was not afraid. He asked him whether he were at liberty to reveal what had occurred in coming down the river? The witness said he was at liberty to reveal what he knew, but did not wish to do so. He inquired whether the witness were a Freemason? He then began to take notes. The witness stopped him from taking down, and told him it was not his wish to have what he said taken down. He complained of distress; expected to be ruined. Said that there was a great force coming down the river. He asked the witness his circumstances; what money was due to him for his services in coming down? He answered, one hundred and fifty dollars. Asked him if he were in want of money, and offered to supply him which the witness refused. He said he was very unhappy; had lost his wife; but all that was nothing to his trouble on account of the state of the country. The witness said that a subpœna had been served on him about the 12th of May, by Mr. Gaines, to attend this court; that he told him he was not prepared to come round then, but he expected to get money in ten or twelve days, and would then be ready. He went to Gaines's office about four days afterwards; was taken by a sheriff on Sunday evening, who took him to Judge Hall's. The judge was from home. He went again, and was told by the judge that he must give his deposition or go round to Richmond. He answered that he had no objection to going to Richmond, but, having no counsel, would not give his deposition, lest he should commit himself. No person but the sheriff was present. The governor desired the sheriff to take his word if the judge could not be found; saw the judge, and was bailed until eleven o'clock; gave two securities, bound in five hundred dollars each, to avoid being put in gaol. When he appeared, the judge had before him a number of printed interrogatories. The witness asked the liberty of reading them. He permitted him to do so. The judge asked him if he would answer. The witness refused until he had counsel, but offered to be placed in confinement until he could procure counsel. He afterwards saw, as his counsel, Mr. Carr, who informed him that the judge had no right to demand such answers. The judge still persisted to interrogate him, to some of which interrogatories he answered in order to save trouble. The witness then related everything that passed from Meadville until his arrival in New Orleans. Mr. Fort was then sent for and interrogated. He made some observations, and refused to answer, (being, he said, about Tom, Dick, and Harry.) After which the judge gave the deputy marshal a note, who put Fort and the witness into gaol, among forty or fifty negroes and criminals. Fort was bailed by his friends; but they required bail of the witness in five or six thousand dollars, and he remained in gaol until the vessel was ready in which he embarked. He requested leave to get his clothes. Dunbaugh then came with some men with belts and side arms. The witness asked if they were a guard? He was answered no, but that they were some acquaintances. That he has since been told by Dunbaugh they were a guard. They went with Dunbaugh and himself to th water edge. The witness asked whether Lieutenant Gaines were on board? They said no, but soon would be. When Dunbaugh came to the gaol he had an order, which was handed to the gaoler. While in gaol the witness wrote to Lindsley and Doctor Mulhollon to come and see him, and told them if they came to New Orleans what they might expect. He was informed by the gaoler that they would be confined. He did not send the note. He did not see Gaines until the next day. When Lieutenant Gaines came on board the vessel, he said the witness was in a bad humor. The witness told him he was; and Gaines said that he had better be satisfied, and bear his situation with patience. He asked Gaines for leave to go on shore for his clothes; he did not care what guard was sent with him. Gaines said that it was not in his power to grant it, but the power was in General Wilkinson. The witness was not permitted to get his clothes, and came without any except what he had on at the time, and except that Lindsley brought him one of his shirts, which he had lent him. Gaines, after having told him that he might put him in irons, and bring him round in that manner, offered him forty dollars. The witness said that if he would let him go on shore he did not want it; otherwise must take it. It was paid and sent on shore; twenty dollars were paid to his landlord, and the other twenty dollars returned to him by Governor Claiborne, who came on board and went with them six or eight miles on the passage. And also, when they came to anchor in Hampton Roads, Gaines asked him if he had any objection to coming to Richmond? He answered that he never had any objection. Gaines said that he was sent by the authority of Judge Hall. General Wilkinson spoke to him next day, and asked him if he had any objection to come to Richmond. He answered he had not, if properly treated; but he had been brought off without clothes or money. General Wilkinson had not heard of his not being permitted to bring his clothes until that morning. General Wilkinson agreed he was ill treated. Told him that he (witness) must understand that he was brought round by the direction of Judge Hall. General Wilkinson proposed to let the witness go to Richmond upon his parole of honor, which was refused. Wilkinson said, if the witness wanted twenty dollars he should have it. Afterwards he talked to Mr. Lindsley, and returned to the witness, and said if he wanted fifty dollars he might have it. Witness wanting money to purchase clothes, took it. He observed, in the first conversation, that he had twice asked favors of him and Gaines, and would never ask a third favor of any person. He came to Richmond with Moxley in a pilot boat. Moxley told him that he had orders from General Wilkinson to take charge of the passengers on board the Revenge, and bring them to Richmond, and there wait his (Wilkinson's) orders.

Cross-examination by the counsel for the United States: Have you any military commission? Answer. None. Where were you born? Answer. In Maryland; left it very young; resided in Pennsylvania, and left it some time in November last. Left Pennsylvania (Meadville) for New Orleans on the 24th or 25th of November; went down the Alleghany and Ohio to Beaver; went from thence, with about twenty or thirty, to Blennerhassett's Island, where he did not recollect to have staid but two days, or a day and a half; left that place some time in December, Blennerhassett and another with them, who were the only persons who joined them there. Stopped at Shawnee Town; went with about double the number to Cumberland Island, just opposite to the mouth of Cumberland river; staid a day and a half; met with Colonel Burr and a few others; the whole number about fifty or sixty, about seven or eight boats, five fire-arms; went thence to Fort Massac; Sergeant Dunbaugh met them there with a musket, and after meeting with Colonel Burr, he considered himself under his direction; went to Natchez; Colonel Burr did not accompany them; went from Natchez to New Orleans. Some of the boats were chartered and others sold. They arrived at New Orleans on the 13th or 16th of March. The first notice he had, after seeing General Wilkinson, of the proceedings against him, was when he was carried before Judge Hall. He was said to be carried under an affidavit of General Wilkinson before Judge Hall. Captain Gaines requested him to write to him on shore, and he would get what he wanted. He was not permitted to send the letter. Never mentioned this to General Wilkinson till they arrived in Hampton Roads. That he was treated as others while on his way; that is, as well as some, not so well as some, and better than others. Arrived at Richmond on Friday evening; put up at the Bell tavern. Three days elapsed before he saw Colonel Burr. He mentioned the treatment he had received to Colonel Burr, and intended mentioning it to the court on his first appearance, but was told it was unnecessary. That General Wilkinson used no terror against him, and offered to relieve him if he wanted money. Whilst at the mouth of Cumberland river, and when Colonel Burr made his escape, he was one that took Colonel Burr in a wherry and carried him some distance, and left him in the woods; did not hear him address any one. The note written him by General Wilkinson, and sent by Dunbaugh, was left at his house sealed; the object was to obtain some information about Dunbaugh. No letters. Carried Colonel Burr's things to a Parson Bruin's as he was told. They had but few guns, which were traded for as they descended the river. The vessel sailed from New Orleans in half an hour after General Wilkinson came on board. The one hundred and fifty dollars offered him by General Wilkinson, he was induced to believe, was to bribe him to give evidence against Colonel Burr, or it might be considered as a bribe. Said he could obtain from Colonel Tyler a sufficiency to carry him home under his agreement with that gentleman. This conversation took place before the subpœna was served.

Lieutenant Gaines was then sworn. He stated that he received a letter from the attorney general of the United States, enclosing subpœnas for witnesses against Colonel Burr. That he went to New Orleans in consequence, and arrived there on the 7th of May. Called several times at the house where James Knox stayed with Mr. Lindsley and Dr. Mulhollon, and could not find them. He was told by the landlord that those gentlemen walked out whenever he approached; they supposed he had something against them. He told his business and at length saw them. They said that the reason why they endeavored to keep out of his way, was that they had belonged to Burr's party, and did not wish to appear against him. He told them that the commander-in-chief offered them a passage in the United States vessel with him. He desired Knox and Lindsley to say whether they would come or not? Knox said he could not come until he had made some money arrangements, (though Lindsley seemed disposed to come on.) That he then applied to Judge Hall; the judge directed him to obtain an affidavit of the refusal, and that he would take the proper steps. He said that the subpœna might be served by the marshal or sheriff, and proposed that he (Lieutenant Gaines) should be appointed by the marshal, a deputy. He refused, unless he could afterwards be released from any further service in that capacity. Next day the judge told him that the marshal had left a deputation for him, and asked him if he would act; he answered that he would, on the foregoing condition, and that he should not attend to Knox, at New Orleans. Knox appeared always ill-natured, which induced him to ask him if he could do anything for him. He obtained from the United States agent at that place forty dollars, and offered it to Knox, which he, after some hesitation, accepted. In reply to his inquiries, whether Knox wanted assistance, he hesitated, and then said that he wished to go on shore himself, to get some necessaries out of his trunk. He told him that as the vessel was going to sail so soon, he could not, but offered him pen, ink, and paper, and requested him to write to some friend on shore to do what he wanted done, or he would act for him himself. He was then in a very ill humor, and was so when the witness returned on board. James Knox was under no restraint from the time the vessel sailed till they arrived at Hampton Roads. To a question put by Mr. Burr's counsel, by whose authority he acted, Lieutenant Gaines answered, that in every step relative to Knox he acted under the authority of the marshal at New Orleans, except that he was authorized by the commander-in-chief to offer him a passage in a public vessel. In serving the subpœna he acted under the authority of the attorney general. When at Hampton Roads he inquired of Knox whether he had any disposition to go to Richmond? He said that he wished to come to Richmond, but wished also to leave that vessel. He told him he should leave it, but had not determined how he would be conveyed to Richmond. General Wilkinson told him all would come in a vessel, except those who would come in the stage. His getting off gave him no concern, because he supposed that Knox could be caught again in some part of the country, if he attempted to go away. Whilst the witness was on shore, General Wilkinson procured a vessel in which Knox and others were sent to Richmond. He considered Knox under his authority, not as a military officer, but as a deputy marshal. That he was committed to his charge as such, in virtue of a warrant of commitment issued by Judge Hall. He did not know the reason why the judge made such an order. That General Wilkinson never attempted to exercise any authority over Knox on his passage. That the deputation was not of his own procuring. That he had received an order from the department of war to leave the garrison at which he commanded under the direction of some other person, and to attend to the orders of the attorney general.

Question by Colonel Burr. Did you have previous conversation with General Wilkinson about this deputation? Answer. I had none. I never heard nor had any conception of such a deputation till it was mentioned by Judge Hall. He gave to Sergeant Dunbaugh an order at New Orleans to receive from prison and deliver to the commanding officer on board the United States schooner Revenge, the body of James Knox, and he was accordingly conveyed on board.

Question by Mr. Baker. Was not Dunbaugh a sergeant in the army, and did you not consider him acting as such under you? Answer. I should not have considered any citizen of New Orleans bound to obey my order; I did not consider Sergeant Dunbaugh farther bound than in compliance with his promise. He was called Sergeant Dunbaugh, but I did not consider him under my authority, as a military officer. I took no oath of office; I gave no bond to perform the duties of a deputy marshal; I do not know that I shall get any pay; I have no promise of any. General Wilkinson made his affidavit at his own quarters, before Mr. Cenas. I do not recollect whom General Wilkinson consulted; an attorney had been with him. I delivered to General Wilkinson the subpœnas received from the attorney general of the United States, and among them one for myself, another for Mr. Graham. I always considered myself bound to obey the orders of General Wilkinson. I was bound before the deputation to obey him, and I continued so. I considered General Wilkinson as having the power of controlling myself, and every person belonging to the army and navy of the United States, on board the Revenge, if he chose to exercise that control; but I do not consider that he did exercise such control. The subpœnas which I delivered to General Wilkinson came into my hands afterwards, but nothing passed between the general and myself on the subject, except that I stated to him the orders I had received, and the power I possessed. My impression was that General Wilkinson must have been privy to the whole, and perhaps recommended that I should transact this business. I communicated to him what Judge Hall had said; that an affidavit must be made of the materiality of Knox as a witness before he could take any steps to compel his attendance. General Wilkinson knew that Knox was put on board the Revenge unwillingly. On our way to Virginia we stopped at the Havana for fresh supplies of water and other necessaries. Some on board were sick; they prevailed on the officers to call. While preparing to go on shore, a shot was fired from the Moro castle, and orders given to come on shore. They went on shore at the request of the sick persons on board made to General Wilkinson and Captain Read. They did not land until after four o'clock in the afternoon, and a little after dark they set sail again. Had good provisions, &c., on board. Heard Captain Read direct the cook to let those people have their provisions regularly. To a question put by Mr. Burr's counsel, he answered that General Wilkinson pointed out the witnesses on whom the subpœnas must be served. He, on several occasions, received advice and instructions from the counsel whom he consulted how to act in executing the business in which he was engaged.

Mr. Randolph.—Upon what authority were the forty dollars received from the military agent? Answer. The money received from the military agent was applied for after several applications from Knox, and General Wilkinson advised me to consult Judge Hall as to whether it were legal to demand money for him, and was told by the judge that it was regular to advance a reasonable sum; and was also told by the military agent that General Wilkinson had advised him to advance that sum. The general advised me to consult the attorney general there, or Mr. Duncan, and the general's own idea corresponded on the subject.

Mr. Graham being sworn, gave the following testimony: A short time after the arrival of Captain Gaines at New Orleans, I was told that he had subpœnas for witnesses, and one for myself; that there was a public vessel that would carry us to Richmond. I then waited on General Wilkinson to know whether I could be accommodated in that vessel? My health was bad at that time.

General Wilkinson agreed that I should, and then said that he understood that there were several witnesses in town, some of whom were unwilling, others unable to come round, and asked me whether I knew any legal means or process by which those who were unwilling could be compelled to come? I told him I did not know, but I supposed the federal judge could inform him. As there was a misunderstanding between the general and the judge, I offered to ask the judge myself whether there were such process, and I did so. At this, or some subsequent time, General Wilkinson told me to ask the judge whether there were any impropriety in advancing money to the witnesses, and to what amount? The judge said, that so far from being improper, the witnesses had a right to demand it. The judge said, in answer to the other question, that if the witness refused to enter into recognizance, or to answer such questions as would satisfy him of the materiality or relevancy of his evidence, from the law, (which he showed me,) he would be authorized to send such witness round under the care of the district marshal. He saw, a few days after, in an outer room at the judge's, Mr. Knox talking with Mr. Keene, a lawyer. Some short time after, when these gentlemen came into the room, the judge asked Knox if he were then willing to answer questions or enter into recognizance? He declined doing either. The judge had that clause of the law before him. He pointed it out to Mr. Keene, and a Mr. Fort, who was in the same situation with Knox, and advised them to do one of the two, or he should be obliged to act rigidly towards them; that he was very unwilling to act against them, but it was his duty, and he must do it. The same gentleman had a curiosity to know what questions they intended to put to him, and then the printed interrogatories were shown to him. The judge asked Mr. Fort to answer these interrogatories, which he refused to do. The judge then sent for the marshal, and committed both of them. In the afternoon Captain Fort gave security in five hundred dollars for his appearance at Richmond, and was released. He understood Captain Fort was going in the ship Amity to New York, in order to come to Richmond; but as Fort told the witness he could not leave New Orleans without injury to his business, it was his own opinion that he would not leave that place. Mr. Keene intimated to the judge that he did not appear as an attorney; but expressed some doubt of the correctness of the proceedings, and of the power of the judge to send Knox round. The ship's stores were good, and the persons treated civilly and not restrained. They slept where he did. They called in at the Havana on account of bad winds, and being chased close in by a British cruiser, Captain Read, who commands the vessel, Mr. Gaines, Mr. Smith, and himself, went on shore to procure fruit, &c. Remained there about three hours. His impression was, that if the gun had not been fired from the fort, they should not have gone in. That part of the navy of the United States which is at New Orleans, and was formerly under the control of the government, and the officers about New Orleans, when the country was considered to be in a state of danger, was put under the command of General Wilkinson. He saw no guard on his way to New Orleans. I went, said Mr. Graham, partly by land, and partly by water. I went down the river with Captain Fort, who said that he was one of a party whose object was to go against Mexico, of which declaration he made no secret. I do not know by what authority Fort was brought before the judge, but Judge Hall said he felt himself bound to act under the law. I advised Fort not to oppose the judge, who was a very determined man. Fort replied, that Mr. Alexander said that the judge had no right to send him. The judge and Mr. Keene both requested him to request Mr. Gaines to remove Knox out of the prison to the vessel.

Lieutenant Gaines, upon being called up again, said he is an officer of the United States army; never consulted General Wilkinson about accepting the appointment of deputy marshal. He understood Fort was included in the same affidavit with Knox. He sailed from New Orleans in the Revenge; saw General Wilkinson exercise no kind of authority on the voyage.

Mr. Graham said, that General Wilkinson opposed their stopping at the Havana for two reasons: first, that it would occasion delay; and secondly, that his enemies might charge it against him as an improper act. The gun was fired from the Moro castle. I understood that the judge had requested Mr. Gaines to accept the deputation. Gaines did not wish to act. He was urged by myself and others to accept it, and he did accept it, I believe, from motives of patriotism. General Wilkinson exercised no control over the persons on board, and no restraint was used, except what has been mentioned with respect to the witness, Mr. Knox.

After the testimony was closed, a dispute arose between the counsel which side should begin the argument, both parties claiming the right. After some observations by gentlemen on both sides, it was determined that the correct distinction was, that he who obtained a rule to show cause should close, and, of course, begin the argument.

The court then adjourned till to-morrow, eleven o'clock.

Wednesday, June 24, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment.

Mr. Graham was called by Mr. MacRae, and questioned relative to the state of the public mind at New Orleans, and whether great alarms were not excited by the conspiracy. He answered, that he had not arrived at that place till the month of March, and at that time the public mind was much agitated.

To a question put by Colonel Burr, whether General Wilkinson himself had not contributed to excite those alarms by his violent measures, Mr. Hay objected as improper. Colonel Burr insisted on the propriety of his question.

THE COURT was of opinion, that the witness was only bound to answer such questions as directly applied to the subject before them.

Mr. Graham said, that there was a considerable portion of the people at New Orleans who believed that there was another portion unfriendly to the government. He did not know the measures pursued by the executive at New Orleans. He was then interrogated as to the post offices being robbed of letters. He did not recollect that General Wilkinson particularly informed him how letters of information were received by him; only he observed, concerning a letter partly in cipher, that he had received it from a house at New Orleans; (which Mr. Graham named, but it is not inserted, as he was not distinctly heard;) that the practice of opening letters, if it existed at all, had ceased when he arrived at New Orleans; that General Wilkinson showed him three or four letters. He did not know how those letters were taken from the post office, but it was generally said at New Orleans that the postmaster there had given him those letters.

Colonel Burr asked him whether a considerable number of letters directed to himself, or to others, had not been taken from the post office there? He answered that he knew not; but there was an impression on his mind that letters were improperly taken from the post office; whether by General Wilkinson or not, he knew not. He rather thought not.

Mr. Martin.—Did you not understand that General Wilkinson had placed guards on the river, and on the roads, to stop travellers and passengers from passing?

Mr. Graham.—I did understand that he had placed guards at two points, near New Orleans, for the purpose of arresting suspected characters. I had understood, also, that certain persons had been seized.

Mr. Martin.—Did General Wilkinson never tell you how he got those letters?

Mr. Graham.—He did not.

Captain Murray was then called and sworn. Being interrogated by Colonel Burr, he stated that he was stationed at Ville Grove, two miles above New Orleans. His orders from Governor Claiborne were to stop boats coming down the river and examine them; to examine papers, but break no seal; but that from his orders he would have deemed it his duty to have transmitted letters addressed to suspicious persons to the executive at New Orleans.

Colonel Burr.—Would you have obeyed the governor, since, as an officer, you are strictly bound to obey General Wilkinson?

Captain Murray.—Yes, I should. The orders from Governor Claiborne originated with and always came through General Wilkinson.

The testimony being here closed, a protracted debate ensued, occupying two days, with the exception of some intervening business, which will hereafter be noticed. Mr. Randolph opened in support of the motion, and was replied to by Mr. MacRae. Mr. Botts then addressed the court in support of the motion, and was followed by Mr. Hay on the other side. Messrs. Wickham and Martin rejoined, the latter making the closing argument.

Mr. Randolph, in opening the argument, stated that this was a motion for an attachment against General Wilkinson, to bring him before the court to answer such interrogatories as might be put to him, for a contempt. It was customary, he believed, whenever strong suspicions were excited, that an attachment should go; because it was always within the power of the party charged to purge himself upon his own oath. He commented upon the testimony at length. Great ingenuity was displayed by Mr. R. and the counsel who followed on the same side, in giving the facts testified to by the witnesses a coloring unfavorable to General Wilkinson. The acts of that aristocratic and imperious officer in inviting poor Knox to his house, offering him money, and treating him with so much apparent respect and kindness, were represented as mere arts to draw from him an ex parte deposition which might be held in terrorem over him, when he should come to testify before this court. Failing to get from him such a deposition as he desired, it was alleged that General Wilkinson had then caused him to be arbitrarily and illegally imprisoned with felons and negroes; not to secure his attendance upon this court, but because he had refused to give his deposition. Judge Hall, it was said, must be presumed to have acted under the influence of General Wilkinson, who was exercising a military dictatorship in New Orleans. Knox was taken from the jail to the "prison ship," it was contended, by mere military force. Captain Gaines was never clothed with any civil authority, under his pretended appointment as deputy marshal. The act of congress required that a deputy marshal should qualify in the same way as his principal, by giving bond and taking an oath of office. Captain Gaines had done neither, and hence had no authority to act in the capacity of a deputy marshal. He was in realty acting in his military capacity, under the command of General Wilkinson. His order to Sergeant Dunbaugh, to take the witness from the jail and put him on board the vessel, was "in true military style," and was executed by Dunbaugh as a military command from his superior officer, which he was obliged to obey. The "rifling of private papers by unreasonable and illegal search," by General Wilkinson, was also made the subject of some very severe strictures, by Mr. Botts.

Messrs. Hay and MacRae defended General Wilkinson against all these charges with zeal and ability. They contended that he had acted with great moderation and caution, considering his situation; "threatened in New Orleans by traitors without and enemies within." That so far from exercising the military power reposed in him in an arbitrary manner, to compel the attendance of witnesses before this court, he had turned the whole matter over to the civil authorities. Even admitting that Judge Hall had acted arbitrarily and illegally, (which was denied,) General Wilkinson could not be held responsible for his acts, as there was no evidence that he had exercised any influence over him. The contrary was presumable, from the fact that Judge Hall and General Wilkinson were not then on good terms, owing to a former difficulty between them. It was conceded that an attachment would lie for preventing or obstructing the attendance of a witness before the court, but denied that there could be any contempt in compelling a witness to come, in obedience to his summons, however illegal the means employed. If General Wilkinson had resorted to illegal means to compel the attendance of the witness, he might have his action against him; but it could not constitute a ground of contempt. It was also contended that the acts complained of were committed, if at all, without the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore could not be inquired into in this proceeding.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. The motion now under consideration was heard at this time, because it was alleged to be founded on a fact which might affect the justice of the case in which the court is about to be engaged, and because, while the bills were depending before the grand jury, the court might, without impeding the progress of the business, examine into the complaint which has been made. The motion is to attach General Wilkinson for a contempt of this court, by obstructing the fair course of justice, with regard to a prosecution depending before it. In support of this charge has been offered the testimony of Mr. Knox, who states a conversation between General Wilkinson and himself, previous to his being served with a subpœna, the object of which was to extract from him whatever information he might possess, respecting the expedition which was the subject of inquiry in this court; and who states also, that he was afterwards summoned before Judge Hall, who examined him upon interrogatories, and committed him to gaol, whence he was taken by order of the deputy marshal, who was a military as well as civil officer, and put on board the Revenge, in which General Wilkinson sailed, for the purpose of being brought from New Orleans to Richmond.

That unfair practices towards a witness who was to give testimony in this court, or oppression under color of its process, although those practices and that oppression were acted in another district, would be punishable in the mode now suggested, provided the person who had acted therein came within the jurisdiction of the court, is a position which the court is not disposed to controvert; but it is also believed that this mode of punishment ought not to be adopted, unless the deviation from law could be clearly attached to the person against whom the motion was made, and unless the deviation were intentional, or unless the course of judicial proceeding were or might be so affected by it as to make a punishment in this mode obviously conducive to a fair and correct administration of justice. The conversation which took place between General Wilkinson and the witness, on the arrival of the latter in New Orleans, was manifestly held with the intention of drawing from him any information which he might possess relative to the expedition which was then the subject of inquiry. In this intention there was nothing unlawful. Government, and those who represent it, may justifiably and laudably use means to obtain voluntary communications, provided those means be not such as might tempt the person making them to give an improper coloring to his representations, which might afterwards adhere to them when repeated in court. The address stated to have been employed, the condescension and regard with which the witness was treated, are not said by himself to have been accompanied with any indications of a desire to draw from him more than the truth. The offer of money, if with a view to corrupt, could not be too severely reprehended. It is certainly a dangerous species of communication between those who are searching for testimony, and the person from whom it is expected. But in this case the court cannot contemplate the offer as being made with immoral views. The witness had a right to demand from those he was expected to serve a small sum of money, sufficient to subsist him on his return to his home. He was asked whether, on receiving this sum, his objections to giving testimony would be removed. This was certainly a delicate question, but it might be asked without improper motives, and it was pressed no further. This is not shown to be an attempt to contaminate the source of justice, and a consequent contempt of the court in which it is administered.

The imprisonment of Mr. Knox, and the order for conveying him from New Orleans to Richmond, were the acts of Judge Hall. Whether his proceedings were legal or illegal, they are not shown to have been influenced by General Wilkinson, and this court cannot presume such to have been the fact; General Wilkinson, therefore, is not responsible for them. They were founded, it is true, on an affidavit made by him; but there was no impropriety in making this affidavit, and it remained with the judge to decide what the law would authorize in the case. All the subsequent proceedings were directed by the civil authority. The agents who executed the orders of the judge were indeed military men, who most probably would not have disobeyed the commander-in-chief; but that officer is not responsible, in this way, for having failed to interpose his authority, in order to prevent the execution of the orders of the judge, even if those orders ought not to have been given.

Upon a full view of the subject, the case appears to have been this: General Wilkinson was desirous that the testimony of the witness should be obtained; and aware of the accusations which had before been brought against him for the use he had made of the military power, he was desirous of obtaining the testimony by lawful means, and therefore referred the subject to a judge of the territory, under whose orders all subsequent proceedings were taken. Whether the judge did or did not transcend the limits prescribed by law, those ministerial officers who obeyed his orders cannot be supposed to have acted with a knowledge that he had mistaken his power. Should it be admitted that this would be no defence for them in an action to obtain compensation for the injury, yet it furnishes sufficient evidence that no contempt was intended to this court by General Wilkinson, that he has not been guilty of any intentional abuse of its process, or of any oppression in the manner of executing it.

It is said that Captain Gaines, the gentleman whom the marshal appointed as his deputy for this particular purpose, had not taken the oath of office, and was therefore not legally qualified to act in that character. However correct this observation may be in itself, it does not appear to the court to justify an attachment against General Wilkinson. The person who sees in the possession of another a commission as deputy marshal, and sees that others are acting under that commission, ought not to be subjected to a process of contempt for having made no inquiries respecting the oath which the law requires to be taken.

The attachment will not be awarded, because General Wilkinson cannot be considered as having controlled or influenced the conduct of the civil magistrate, and because in this transaction his intention appears to have been not to violate the laws. In such a case, where an attachment does not seem to be absolutely required by the justice due to the particular individual against whom the prosecution is depending, the court is more inclined to leave the parties to the ordinary course of law, than to employ the extraordinary powers which are given for the purpose of preserving the administration of justice in that purity which ought to be so universally desired.

Case No. 14,692g.

UNITED STATES v. BURR.[1]

[Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 127.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Aug. 11, 1807.

JURORS—QUALIFICATIONS—FORMED AND EXPRESSED OPINIONS.

[1. Persons who have deliberately formed and delivered an opinion on the guilt of an accused, are disqualified to serve as jurors.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Hanway, Case No. 15,299.]

[2. An opinion formed and delivered not upon the full case, but upon a point so essential as to go far towards a decision of the whole case, and to have a real influence on the verdict, will disqualify the person as a juror.]

[3. The forming and delivering of an opinion that a person indicted for treason entertained the treasonable designs with which he is charged, and that he retained those designs, and was prosecuting them when the act charged in the indictment was alleged to have been committed, is good cause of challenge.]

[At law. On challenge of jurors for cause on the trial of Aaron Burr. The examination of the jurors summoned and the running comments of counsel and court will be found reported in the main case, No. 14,693.]

Mr. Martin addressed the court at length on the qualifications of jurors. He insisted that the constitutional guaranty that every criminal shall be tried by an "impartial jury," required that the jurors should be perfectly indifferent and free from prejudice. He enforced with much power the position that a man who had formed an opinion as to the criminal intention of the accused, although not as to the act, could not be considered an impartial juror. He argued that Colonel Burr was not to be denied a fair trial because the public mind had been so filled with prejudice against him that there was some difficulty in finding impartial jurors. He referred to the inflammatory articles which had been published against Colonel Burr in the Alexandria Expositor and other newspapers, and inquired if he was to be held responsible for such publications. He referred, also, to the repeated declarations of the guilt of Colonel Burr by the counsel for the prosecution, at the examination in June, as tending to create "such a ferment in the public mind that the prisoner could not have a fair trial." In the course of his argument he cited the following authorities: 1 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law, p. 329; 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law, 446; Carr's English Liberties, 244, 248, 249; 2 McNally, 667; and Rex v. Dean of St. Asaph, and Rex v. Robinson, 3 Term R. 428, note.

Mr. Botts and Colonel Burr followed in some brief remarks.

Messrs. MacRae, Wirt, and Hay replied at some length They insisted that mere impressions as to the criminal intentions of the accused were not sufficient to disqualify a juror, unless he had formed an opinion of his guilt as charged in the indictment. They relied much upon U. S. v. Callender [Case No. 14,709], in which Judge Chase refused to reject a juror (Basset) who said that he had read the book, (for the publication of which the accused was prosecuted for a libel.) and had made up his mind that it was libellous, but had not made up his mind as to Callender being the publisher of the libel. Basset they insisted, had formed an opinion as to one material ingredient of the crime charged, but was not disqualified because he had not made up his mind as to the guilt of the accused, as charged in the indictment. So in this case; a juror who has merely formed an opinion as to the intentions of the accused has only made up his mind as to one ingredient of the crime charged in the indictment, and therefore is not disqualified, according to the principle settled in U. S. v. Callender [supra].

Mr. Wickham rejoined, reviewing the arguments of the counsel for the prosecution. He denied that the decision in U. S. v. Callender was a sufficient precedent to justify the swearing of the jurors whose cases were under consideration; and adverted to the fact that Judge Chase had been impeached for giving that very decision, and eighteen out of thirty-four senators had voted that the decision was erroneous and corrupt.[2]

Mr. Randolph closed the debate by a brief address.

Before MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. The great value of the trial by jury certainly consists in its fairness and impartiality. Those who most prize the institution, prize it because it furnishes a tribunal which may be expected to be uninfluenced by an undue bias of the mind. I have always conceived, and still conceive, an impartial jury as required by the common law, and as secured by the constitution, must be composed of men who will fairly hear the testimony which may be offered to them, and bring in their verdict according to that testimony, and according to the law arising on it. This is not to be expected, certainly the law does not expect it, where the jurors, before they hear the testimony, have deliberately formed and delivered an opinion that the person whom they are to try is guilty or innocent of the charge alleged against him. The jury should enter upon the trial with minds open to those impressions which the testimony and the law of the case ought to make, not with those preconceived opinions which will resist those impressions All the provisions of the law are calculated to obtain this end. Why is it that the most distant relative of a party cannot serve upon his jury? Certainly the single circumstance of relationship, taken in itself, unconnected with its consequences, would furnish no objection. The real reason of the rule is, that the law suspects the relative of partiality; suspects his mind to be under a bias, which will prevent his fairly hearing and fairly deciding on the testimony which may be offered to him. The end to be obtained is an impartial jury; to secure this end, a man is prohibited from serving on it whose connexion with a party is such as to induce a suspicion of partiality. The relationship may be remote; the person may never have seen the party; he may declare that he feels no prejudice in the case; and yet the law cautiously incapacitates him from serving on the jury because it suspects prejudice, because in general persons in a similar situation would feel prejudice.

It would be strange if the law was chargeable with the inconsistency of thus carefully protecting the end from being defeated by particular means, and leaving it to be defeated by other means. It would be strange if the law would be so solicitious to secure a fair trial as to exclude a distant, unknown relative from the jury, and yet be totally regardless of those in whose minds feelings existed much more unfavorable to an impartial decision of the case. It is admitted that where there are strong personal prejudices, the person entertaining them is incapacitated as a juror, but it is denied that fixed opinions respecting his guilt constitute a similar incapacity. Why do personal prejudices constitute a just cause of challenge? Solely because the individual who is under their influence is presumed to have a bias on his mind which will prevent an impartial decision of the case, according to the testimony. He may declare that notwithstanding these prejudices he is determined to listen to the evidence, and be governed by it; but the law will not trust him. Is there less reason to suspect him who has prejudged the case, and has deliberately formed and delivered an opinion upon it? Such a person may believe that he will be regulated by testimony, but the law suspects him, and certainly not without reason. He will listen with more favor to that testimony which confirms, than to that which would change his opinion; it is not to be expected that he will weigh evidence or argument as fairly as a man whose judgment is not made up in the case. It is for this reason that a juror who has once rendered a verdict in a case, or who has been sworn on a jury which has been divided, cannot again be sworn in the same case. He is not suspected of personal prejudices, but he has formed and delivered an opinion, and is therefore deemed unfit to be a juror in the cause.

Were it possible to obtain a jury without any prepossessions whatever respecting the guilt or innocence of the accused, it would be extremely desirable to obtain such a jury; but this is perhaps impossible, and therefore will not be required. The opinion which has been avowed by the court is, that light impressions which may fairly be supposed to yield to the testimony that may be offered, which may leave the mind open to a fair consideration of that testimony, constitute no sufficient objection to a juror; but that those strong and deep impressions which will close the mind against the testimony that may be offered in opposition to them, which will combat that testimony, and resist its force, do constitute a sufficient objection to him. Those who try the impartiality of a juror ought to test him by this rule. They ought to hear the statement made by himself or given by others, and conscientiously determine, according to their best judgment, whether in general men under such circumstances ought to be considered as capable of hearing fairly, and of deciding impartially, on the testimony which may be offered to them, or as possessing minds in a situation to struggle against the conviction which that testimony might be calculated to produce. The court has considered those who have deliberately formed and delivered an opinion on the guilt of the prisoner as not being in a state of mind fairly to weigh the testimony, and therefore as being disqualified to serve as jurors in the case.

This much has been said relative to the opinion delivered yesterday, because the argument of to-day appears to arraign that opinion, and because it seems closely connected with the point which is now to be decided. The question now to be decided is whether an opinion formed and delivered, not upon the full case, but upon an essential part of it, not that the prisoner is absolutely guilty of the whole crime charged in the indictment, but that he is guilty in some of those great points which constitute it, does also disqualify a man in the sense of the law and of the constitution from being an impartial juror. This question was adjourned yesterday for argument and for further consideration. It would seem to the court that to say that any man who had formed an opinion on any fact conducive to the final decision of the case would therefore be considered as disqualified from serving on the jury, would exclude intelligent and observing men, whose minds were really in a situation to decide upon the whole case according to the testimony, and would perhaps be applying the letter of the rule requiring an impartial jury with a strictness which is not necessary for the preservation of the rule itself. But if the opinion formed be on a point so essential as to go far towards a decision of the whole case, and to have a real influence on the verdict to be rendered, the distinction between a person who has formed such an opinion and one who has in his mind decided the whole case appears too slight to furnish the court with solid ground for distinguishing between them. The question must always depend on the strength and nature of the opinion which has been formed. In the case now under consideration, the court would perhaps not consider it as a sufficient objection to a juror that he did believe, and had said, that the prisoner at a time considerably anterior to the fact charged in the indictment entertained treasonable designs against the United States. He may have formed this opinion, and be undecided on the question whether those designs were abandoned or prosecuted up to the time when the indictment charges the overt act to have been committed. On this point his mind may be open to the testimony. Although it would be desirable that no juror should have formed and delivered such an opinion, yet the court is inclined to think it would not constitute sufficient cause of challenge. But if the juror have made up and declared the opinion that to the time when the fact laid in the indictment is said to have been committed the prisoner was prosecuting the treasonable design with which he is charged, the court considers the opinion as furnishing just cause of challenge, and cannot view the juror who has formed and delivered it as impartial, in the legal and constitutional sense of that term.

The cases put by way of illustration appear to the court to be strongly applicable to that under consideration. They are those of burglary, of homicide, and of passing counterfeit money, knowing it to be counterfeit, cases in which the intention and the fact combine to constitute the crime. If, in case of homicide, where the fact of killing was admitted or was doubtful, a juror should have made up and delivered the opinion that, though uninformed relative to the fact of killing, he was confident as to the malice, he was confident that the prisoner had deliberately formed the intention of murdering the deceased, and was prosecuting that intention up to the time of his death, or if on the charge of passing counterfeit bank notes, knowing them to be counterfeit, the juror had declared that, though uncertain as to the fact of passing the notes, he was confident that the prisoner knew them to be counterfeit, few would think such a person sufficiently impartial to try the cause according to testimony. The court considers these cases as strikingly analogous.

It has been insisted that in Callender's Case an opinion was given different from that which is now delivered. I acknowledge that I had not recollected that case accurately. I had thought that Mr. Basset had stated himself to have read the book charged as a libel, and to have formed the opinion that the publication was a libel. I find by a reference to the case itself that I was mistaken; that Mr. Basset had not read the book, and had only said that if it were such a book as it had been represented to him he had no doubt of its being a libel. This was going no further than Mr. Morris has gone, the challenge against whom has been overruled. Mr. Morris had frequently declared that if the allegations against the prisoner were true he was guilty, and Mr. Morris was determined to be an impartial juror.

With respect to the general question put in Callender's Case, the court considers it as the same with the general question put in this case. It was, "Have you made up and delivered the opinion that the prisoner is guilty or innocent of the charge laid in the indictment?" That is in substance, "Have you made up and delivered the opinion that the prisoner has been guilty of publishing a false, wicked, and malicious libel, which subjects him to punishment, under the act of congress on which he is indicted?" The same question is now substantially put. Explanatory questions are now put when they are necessary, and certain explanatory questions might have been put in Callender's Case, had they been necessary. Had the case of Mr. Basset even been such as I thought it, had he read "The Prospect Before Us," and thought it a libel, without deciding who was its author, he would have gone no further than to have formed an opinion that certain allegations were libellous, which is not dissimilar to the opinion that certain acts amount to treason. If, for example, a juror had said that levying an army for the purpose of subverting the government of the United States by force, and arraying that army in a warlike manner, amounted to treason, no person could suppose him on that account unfit to serve on the jury. The opinion would be one in which all must concur, and so was the opinion that "The Prospect Before Us" was a libel. Without determining whether the case put by Hawk. bk. 2, c. 43, § 28, be law or not, it is sufficient to observe that this case is totally different. The opinion which is there declared to constitute no cause of challenge is one formed by the juror on his own knowledge; in this case the opinion is formed on report and newspaper publications.

The argument drawn from the situation of England during the rebellions of 1715 and 1745, with respect to certain prominent characters whose situations made it a matter of universal notoriety that they were the objects of the law, is founded entirely on the absolute necessity of the case, and the total and obvious impossibility of obtaining a jury whose minds were not already made up. Where this necessity exists the rule perhaps must bend to it, but the rule will bend no further than is required by actual necessity. The court cannot believe that at present the necessity does exist. The cases bear no resemblance to each other. There has not been such open, notorious war as to force conviction on every bosom respecting the fact and the intention. It is believed that a jury may be obtained composed of men who, whatever their general impressions may be, have not deliberately formed and delivered an opinion respecting the guilt or innocence of the accused.

In reflecting on this subject, which I have done very seriously since the adjournment of yesterday, my mind has been forcibly impressed by contemplating the question precisely in its reverse. If, instead of a panel composed of gentlemen who had almost unanimously formed and publicly delivered an opinion that the prisoner was guilty, the marshal had returned one composed of persons who had openly and publicly maintained his innocence; who had insisted that, notwithstanding all the testimony in possession of the public, they had no doubt that his designs were perfectly innocent; who had been engaged in repeated, open and animated altercation to prove him innocent, and that his objects were entirely opposite to those with which he was charged—would such men be proper and impartial jurors? I cannot believe they would be thought so. I am confident I should not think them so. I cannot declare a juror to be impartial who has advanced opinions against the prisoner which would be cause of challenge if advanced in his favor.

The opinion of the court is that to have made up and delivered the opinion that the prisoner entertained the treasonable designs with which he is charged, and that he retained those designs and was prosecuting them when the act charged in the indictment is alleged to have been committed, is good cause of challenge.

Case No. 14,692h.

UNITED STATES v. BURR.[1]

[Coombs' Trial of Aaron Burr, 146.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Aug. 18, 1807.

TRIAL—TREASON—ORDER OF PROOF.

[On the trial of a person indicted for treason in levying war against the United States, the court cannot control the order of proof to the extent of requiring the prosecution to prove the overt act charged before proving the intention with which such act was committed.]

[At law. Trial of indictment of Aaron Burr for treason in levying war against the United States.]

Mr. Hay proceeded to the examination of the evidence on the part of the United States. General William Eaton was sworn, when Mr. Burr objected to this order of examining the witnesses. He said Mr. Hay had not stated the nature of General Eaton's testimony, but he presumed that it related to certain conversations said to have happened at Washington; adding that the propriety of admitting any other testimony depended on the previous proof of an overt act.

Mr. Hay.—Our object is to prove by him what is contained in his deposition, which has been published. Upon this motion, (to compel the prosecution first to prove an overt act,) a long and animated debate arose, in which Messrs. Botts, Wickham, Lee, and Martin supported the motion, and Mr. Wirt opposed it.

By Colonel Burr's counsel it was urged, that as the charge of treason could not be established without proving an overt act of war, at the place specified in the indictment, the prosecutor should be required to prove an overt act before introducing evidence of intention merely. Why, it was asked, should the prosecutor be permitted to spend days, and perhaps weeks, inquiring into the intentions of Colonel Burr, when it had not been made to appear that such evidence could have any bearing on the case? All such evidence must amount to nothing if the prosecution failed in the end to prove an overt act of war on Blennerhassett's Island; which they must fail to do, because none had been committed. On an indictment for murder, it was said, the prosecutor could not go into evidence of the evil intentions of the accused until the homicide had first been proved, unless that fact was admitted. So in a case of arson, or burglary; the burning or entry of the house must be proved (if denied) before you could introduce evidence of intentions. The argument was pressed with much force and ingenuity, and a number of authorities cited.

In opposition to the motion it was objected that the court had no authority to dictate as to the order in which the prosecution should bring forward their evidence. If competent, and material to the issue, the court could not reject it. Intention being an ingredient of the crime of treason, such evidence was material to the issue, and therefore must be received. The counsel for the prosecution thought that to begin with this evidence was the most lucid way of presenting the transaction to the jury, and they had a right to exercise their own judgment on that point. The most natural and luminous way of proceeding was to commence at the inception of the conspiracy, and trace it, step by step, to its consummation.

At the close of the argument on this motion the court adjourned.

Before MARSHALL, Circuit Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. Although this is precisely the same question relative to the order of evidence which was decided by this court on the motion to commit, yet it is now presented under somewhat different circumstances, and may, therefore, not be considered as determined by the former decision. At that time no indictment was found, no pleadings existed, and there was no standard by which the court could determine the relevancy of the testimony offered, until the fact to which it was to apply should be disclosed. There is now an indictment specifying the charge which is to be proved on the part of the prosecution, there is an issue made up which presents a point to which all the testimony must apply, and consequently it is in the power of the court to determine with some accuracy, on the relevancy of the testimony which may be offered.

It is contended in support of the motion which has been made, that, according to the regular order of evidence and the usage of courts, the existence of the fact on which the charge depends ought to be shown before any testimony explanatory or confirmatory of that fact can be received. Against the motion, it is contended that the crime alleged in the indictment consists of two parts, the fact and the intention; that it is in the discretion of the attorney for the United States first to adduce the one or the other, and that no instance has ever occurred of the interference of a court with that arrangement which he has thought proper to make.

As is not unfrequent, the argument on both sides appears to be, in many respects, correct. It is the most useful and appears to be the natural order of testimony to show first the existence of the fact respecting which the inquiry is to be made. It is unquestionably attended with this advantage: there is a fixed and certain object to which the mind applies with precision all the testimony which may be received, and the court can decide with less difficulty on the relevancy of all the testimony which may be offered; but this arrangement is not clearly shown to be established by any fixed rule of evidence, and no case has been adduced in which it has been forced by the court on the counsel for the prosecution. On one side it has been contended that by requiring the exhibition of the fact in the first instance a great deal of time may be saved, since there may be a total failure of proof with respect to the fact; and this argument has been answered by observing that should there even be such failure they could not interpose and arrest the progress of the cause, but must permit the counsel for the prosecution to proceed with that testimony which is now offered. Levying of war is a fact which must be decided by the jury. The court may give general instructions on this as on every other question brought before them, but the jury must decide upon it as compounded of fact and law. Two assemblages of men, not unlike in appearance, possibly may be, the one treasonable and the other innocent. If, therefore, the fact exhibited to the court and jury should, in the opinion of the court, not amount to the act of levying war, the court could not stop the prosecution, but must permit the counsel for the United States to proceed to show the intention of the act, in order to enable the jury to decide upon the fact coupled with the intention. The consumption of time would probably be nearly the same whether the counsel for the prosecution commenced with the fact or the intention, provided those discussions which respect the admissibility of evidence would be as much avoided in the one mode as in the other. The principal importance which, viewing the question in this light, would seem to attach to its decision, is the different impressions which the fact itself might make, if exhibited at the commencement or close of the prosecution. Although human laws punish actions, the human mind spontaneously attaches guilt to intentions. The same fact, therefore, may be viewed very differently where the mind is prepared by a course of testimony calculated to impress it with a conviction of the criminal designs of the accused, and where the fact is stated without such preparation. The overt act may be such as to influence the opinion on the testimony afterwards given respecting the intention; and the testimony respecting the intention may be such as to influence the opinion on the testimony which may be afterwards given respecting the overt act. On the question of consuming time, the argument was placed in one point of view, by the counsel for the defence, which excited some doubt. The case was supposed of only one witness to the overt act, and a declaration that it could be proved by no other. The court was asked whether the counsel would be permitted then to proceed to examine the intentions of the accused, and to do worse than waste the time of the court and jury, by exposing, without a possible object, the private views and intentions of any person whatever. Perhaps in such a case the cause might be arrested; but this does not appear to warrant the inference that it might be arrested because the fact proved by the two witnesses did not appear to the court to amount to the act of levying war. In the case supposed the declaration of war is positive, and a point proper to be referred to the court occurs, which suspends the right of the jury to consider the subject, and compels them to bring in a verdict of not guilty. In such a case no testimony could be relevant, and all testimony ought to be excluded. Suppose the counsel for the prosecution should say that he had no testimony to prove the treasonable intention; that he believed confidently the object of the assemblage of men on Blennerhassett's island to be innocent; that it did not amount to the crime of levying war—surely it would be a wanton and useless waste of time to proceed with the examination of the overt act. When such a case occurs, it cannot be doubted that a nolle prosequi will be entered, or the jury directed, with the consent of the attorney, to find a verdict of not guilty.

It has been truly stated that the crime alleged in the indictment consists of the fact, and of the intention with which that fact was committed. The testimony disclosing both the fact and the intention must be relevant. The court finds no express rule stating the order in which the attorney is to adduce relevant testimony, nor any case in which a court has interfered with the arrangement he has made. No alteration of that arrangement, therefore, will now be directed. But it is proper to add that the intention which is considered as relevant in this stage of the inquiry is the intention which composes a part of the crime, the intention with which the overt act itself was committed—not a general evil disposition, or an intention to commit a distinct fact. This species of testimony, if admissible at all, is received as corroborative or confirmatory testimony. It does not itself prove the intention with which the act was performed, but it renders other testimony probable which goes to that intention. It is explanatory of, or assistant to, that other testimony. Now it is essentially repugnant to the usages of courts, and to the declarations of the books by whose authority such testimony is received, that corroborative or confirmatory testimony should precede that which it is to corroborate or confirm. Until the introductory testimony be given, that which is merely corroborative is not relevant, and of consequence, if objected to, cannot be admitted without violating the best settled rules of evidence.

This position may be illustrated by a direct application to the testimony of General Eaton. So far as his testimony relates to the fact charged in the indictment, so far as it relates to levying war on Blennerhassett's island, so far as it relates to a design to seize on New Orleans, or to separate by force the Western from the Atlantic states, it is deemed relevant and is now admissible. So far as it respects other plans to be executed in the city of Washington, or elsewhere, if it indicate a treasonable design, it is a design to commit a distinct act of treason, and is therefore not relevant to the present indictment. It can only, by showing a general evil intention, render it more probable that the intention in the particular case was evil. It is merely additional or corroborative testimony, and, therefore, if admissible at any time, is only admissible according to rules and principles which the court must respect, after hearing that which it is to confirm.

The counsel will perceive how many questions respecting the relevancy of testimony the arrangement proposed on the part of the prosecution will most probably produce. He is, however, at liberty to proceed according to his own judgment, and the court feels itself bound to exclude such testimony only as at the time of its being offered does not appear to be relevant.

[2] Before MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

The court was opened at half past twelve o'clock, when Col. Aaron Burr appeared, with his counsel, Edmund Randolph, John Wickham, Benjamin Botts and John Baker. [Luther Martin also appeared as counsel at a later stage of the trial.]

George Hay, Dist. Atty., William Wirt, and Alexander MacRae, counsel for the prosecution.

The clerk having called the names of the gentlemen who had been summoned on the grand jury, Mr. Burr's counsel demanded a sight of the panel, which was shown to them.

Mr. Burr addressed the court, pointing out some irregularities in summoning a part of the panel. The marshal, he said, by the law of Virginia under which he acted, was required to summon twenty-four freeholders of the state to compose the grand jury. When he has summoned that number his function is completed. He proposed to inquire of the marshal and his deputies what persons they had summoned, and at what periods, to ascertain whether some had not been substituted in the place of others stricken off the panel. After some discussion as to the authority of the marshal to excuse grand jurors who had once been summoned, and to substitute others on the panel in lieu of them,

MARSHALL, Chief Justice, remarked that it was not in the power of the marshal to summon more than twenty-four, as the act of assembly authorized only that number. If he should summon twenty-five, the last would not have power to act; and the marshal would have no power to displace any one of the others, to put the last in his place. When the panel had been completed by the marshal, its deficiencies could only be supplied from the bystanders, under the directions of the court.

Mr. Burr said, the court having established the principle, we must ask their aid to come at the facts. We wish to know when certain persons were summoned, when discharged, and whether other persons were substituted in their stead.

Major Scott, the marshal, said he had not the least objection to state all the facts. A few days ago he had received a letter from Col. John Taylor, of Caroline, one of those whom he had summoned on the jury, stating that a hurricane had destroyed his carriage-house, and with it his carriages, so that he could not use them; and that indisposition would prevent him from riding to Richmond on horseback. This letter he had laid before their honors, and the chief justice had deemed his excuse reasonable. He had then summoned Mr. Barbour to serve in Col. Taylor's place. He had also received a letter from Mr. John MacRae, informing him that he was going to leave the state for his health. He had, in consequence, summoned Doctor Foushee in his place. He added, that he felt it his duty to bring twenty-four jurymen into court, and acted upon that principle.

THE COURT decided that Mr. Barbour and Dr. Foushee were not on the grand jury.

Mr. Burr said, the panel being now reduced to sixteen, he understood it to be the proper time to make any other exceptions to the panel. With regret he should proceed to exercise the privilege of challenging for favor; and in the exercise of this right he should perhaps appeal to the authority of the court to try the jurors challenged.

Mr. Hay called for the law justifying the application.

Mr. Burr said he desired it to be distinctly understood that he claimed the same right of challenging the grand jury for favor that he had of challenging the petit jury. He admitted it was not a peremptory challenge, but that he must show good cause to support it. It would, of course, be necessary to appoint triers to decide, and before whom the party and the witnesses to prove or disprove the favor must appear.

Mr. Botts argued and cited authorities in support of the motion.

Mr. Hay disavowed the intention of opposing substantial exceptions, and admitted the law to be as stated by the opposite counsel.[3]

Mr. Burr.—I shall, then, proceed to name the persons and causes of challenge. The first I shall mention is William B. Giles, against whom there are two causes of challenge. The first is a matter of some notoriety, because dependent on certain documents or records; the second is a matter of fact, which must be substantiated by witnesses. As to the first, Mr. Giles, when in the senate of the United States, had occasion to pronounce his opinion on certain documents by which I was considered to be particularly implicated. Upon those documents he advocated the propriety of suspending the writ of habeas corpus. The constitution however, forbids such suspension, except in cases of invasion or insurrection, when the public safety requires it. It was therefore to be inferred that Mr. Giles did

[3] This is in accordance with both Robertson's and Carpenter's reports. But in his speech on the motion to arrest the evidence, Mr. Hay said the challenge of grand jurors was "not warranted by any English precedent," and intimated that he had acquiesced in it because he was indifferent "whether A, B and C, or D, E and F composed a part" of the grand jury. Mr. Martin, in his reply to Mr. Hay, said, "if he had examined Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, even in the index, he would have found that grand jurors may be challenged. It is there briefly stated that any person under prosecution may, before he is indicted, challenge a grand juror, as being outlawed for felony, &c., a villein, or returned at the instance of the prosecutor, or not returned by the proper officer." He also referred to the "American Museum," where, he said, it would be seen "that in a case that came before Judge Grimke, in South Carolina, it was expressly decided that the counsel of the accused have a right to challenge, for good cause, all or any of the grand jury." These authorities do not seem to sustain Mr. Burr's position, that he had the same right to challenge the grand jury "for favor" that he had of challenging the petit jury. Hawkins says, "it seems" that grand jurors may be challenged as aforesaid, but refers to no decision on that subject. At most the authority goes no further than this: that a grand juror may be challenged for incompetency, or for being irregularly or improperly returned. This is a very different thing from a general right of challenge "for favor." It is believed that no authority, anterior to this trial, can be found extending the right to challenge grand jurors further than the citation from Hawkins goes. Later decisions and dicta may be found, admitting the right of challenge for favor; but it is believed they are all based upon the authority of Burr's Case, or on special statutory provisions. In Com. v. Clark, 2 Browne, 325, Judges Tilghman and Breckenridge allowed a challenge for favor. In U. S. v. White [Case No. 16,679], the court said that "an exception for favor which might be a good cause of challenge, cannot be pleaded to the indictment." The decision in the former case, and the implication in the latter, are both based upon the authority of Burr's Case.

suppose that there was a rebellion or insurrection, and a public danger of no common kind. It is hardly necessary to observe that with this rebellion, and this supposed danger, I myself had been supposed to be connected. Perhaps this may be a sufficient reason to set aside Mr. Giles. But if not, I shall endeavor to establish by evidence that he has confirmed these opinions by public declarations; that he has declared that these documents, involving me, contained guilt of the highest grade.

Mr. Botts.—There is no necessity of adding anything to the observations of Colonel Burr. If the right of challenge exists, the right to try the challenge exists also. But while I am up, I will declare that no reflection is intended to be made on the character or conduct of Mr. Giles. That gentleman will be candid enough to admit that there is not the least design to wound his feelings. It is with the utmost reluctance that Colonel Burr has prevailed upon himself to advance this exception. I have authorities, however, to prove that these two causes are sufficient to disqualify Mr. Giles. The first relates to his public, the second to his individual conduct.

Mr. Giles.—As to exceptions to myself personally, I can have no objection to have them tried. The court will, however, perceive the delicate situation in which I shall be placed. The triers will have to interrogate witnesses, and the result either way is ineligible. I have no objection to state to the court every impression I have ever had upon this subject. But to calling witnesses to detail loose conversations, so liable to be misunderstood, forgotten, or misrepresented, I am certainly opposed.

Mr. Hay.—I was about to make a proposition which might relieve us from all this useless embarrassment, and which might gratify the views of the accused. If the gentlemen who are challenged on the jury will consent to withdraw themselves, I can have no objection. I am content that every one who has made declarations expressive of a decisive opinion should be withdrawn from the jury. I am not disposed to spend time on such points as these.

Mr. Burr.—It will certainly save time, and I assent to the proposition.

Mr. Giles.—The circumstances which have just occurred place me in an unpleasant situation. I have no objection to disclose in the usual way, with candor, the real state of my mind in relation to the accused. But I have an objection to the introduction of witnesses to prove casual expressions, which are so liable to be misconceived. In the present state of things, expressions might be imputed to me which I never used, or expressions which I really used might be mistaken or misrepresented by the witness; or the witness might deduce inferences from my expressions which they did not justify. It was by no means agreeable to me to have been summoned on this grand jury. But for some time past I have invariably pursued this maxim: "Neither to avoid nor to solicit any public appointment; but when called to the discharge of any public duty by the proper authority, conscientiously to attempt its execution." In undertaking to serve on the present grand jury, I was influenced by the same consideration. With respect to my public conduct, I presume it is of public notoriety, and it will speak for itself. I not only voted for the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in certain cases, but I proposed that measure. I then thought, and I still think, that the emergency demanded it; that it was fully justified by the evidence before the senate; and I now regret that the nation had not energy enough to support the senate in that measure. This opinion was formed upon the state of the evidence before the senate, which, in all questions of a general nature, is of a very different character from the legal evidence necessary in a judicial investigation. My mind is, however, free to receive impressions from judicial evidence. In relation to the accused, I feel very desirous, and have often so expressed myself, that the various transactions imputed to him should undergo a full and fair judicial investigation; and that, through that medium, they should receive their just and true character, whatever in point of fact they might be, and that he should be presented in that character to the world. I have no personal resentments against the accused; and if he has received any information inconsistent with this statement, it is not true. However, as it is left to me to elect whether to serve on the grand jury or not, I will certainly withdraw.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—The court thinks that if any gentleman has made up and declared his mind it would be best to withdraw.

Mr. Burr.—A gentleman who has prejudged this cause is certainly unfit to be a juryman. It would be an effort above human nature for this gentleman to divest himself of all prepossessions. I believe his mind to be as pure and unbiased as that of any gentleman under such circumstances. But the decisive opinion he has formed upon this subject, though in his public character, disqualifies him for a juryman. But he is one of the last men on whom I would wish to cast any reflections. So far from having any animosity against him, he would have been one of those whom I should have ranked among my personal friends. The other gentleman whom I shall challenge is Wilson Cary Nicholas.

Mr. Nicholas desired that the objection against him should be stated.

Mr. Burr.—The objection is, that he has entertained a bitter personal animosity against me; and therefore I cannot expect from him that pure impartiality of mind which is necessary to a correct decision. I feel the delicacy of my situation; but if the gentleman will consent to withdraw, I will waive any further inquiry.

Col. Wilson C. Nicholas rose and addressed the court as follows: My being in this situation certainly was not a thing of choice. When I was summoned by the marshal, I urged him in the strongest manner to excuse me. I mentioned to him that it would be extremely inconvenient to me to attend the court, and that it would be very unpleasant to serve on the jury, on account of the various relations in which I had stood to Colonel Burr. I had been in congress at the time when the attempt was made to elect Colonel Burr president of the United States. My feelings and opinions on that occasion are well known. I had served three years in the senate while Colonel Burr was president of that body, and was one of those who, previous to the last election, had taken a very decided part in favor of the nomination of the present vice president, for the office at that time filled by Colonel Burr. Moreover, from the time that Colonel Burr first went to the Western country, my suspicions were very much excited as to his probable objects in that part of the United States; in consequence of which I gave early, and perhaps too great, credit to the charges which were brought against him. Such was my opinion of the importance of New Orleans, not only to the prosperity, but to the union of the states, that I felt uncommon anxiety at what I believed to be the state of our affairs in the West, and had expressed my impressions very freely in conversation, and in letters to my friends during the last winter. Under these circumstances, I doubted the propriety of my being put on the jury; but I felt no distrust of myself, as I was confident that I could discharge the duty under just impression of what I owe to my country, to the accused, and to my own character. The marshal assured me that he felt the strongest disposition to oblige me, but that he thought he could not do it consistently with his duty. He supposed there was scarcely a man to be found who had not formed and expressed opinions about Colonel Burr. That he, too, was in a situation of great delicacy and responsibility, and that without the utmost circumspection on his part, he would be exposed to censure. I renewed my application to the marshal several times, and always received the same answer. Thus situated, I determined to attend the court, both from a sense of duty and because I would not put it in the power of the malicious and those disposed to slander me to assign motives for absenting myself which had no kind of influence on me. Another reason for pursuing this course presented itself some time after I had formed this determination. I conceived that an attempt had been made to deter me from attending this court. I was informed by a friend in the city, that he had heard that one of the most severe pieces which had ever been seen was preparing for publication, if I did attend, and serve on the grand jury. From what quarter this attack was to come, I do not know. The only influence which that circumstance had was to confirm me in the determination I had made, as I was much more inclined to defy my enemies than to ask their mercy or forbearance. From the first I hesitated whether I ought not to make the same representation to the court that I had made to the marshal. As I was in doubt on the subject before I came from home, I committed to paper the substance of what I have now said, and consulted three gentlemen who were lawyers, men of honor, and my personal friends. Their advice to me was not to mention it, for they did not believe that the court would or ought to discharge me for the reasons I had mentioned. As I was in doubt myself I determined to follow their advice, and the more readily as they seemed confident that I would not be discharged, and I was not ambitious of acquiring in this way a reputation for scrupulous delicacy. I was perfectly willing that my reputation should rest on the general tenor of my life, and did not believe that my character required such a prop. At present I feel myself embarrassed how to act. I certainly was, and am, anxious not to serve on the jury, but am unwilling to withdraw, lest it should be thought that I shrink from the discharge of public duty of great responsibility, and am not willing to be driven from the discharge of that duty in a way which should lead to a belief that the objection to me is either acknowledged to be well founded or has been sustained by the court. Upon this subject, the example of Mr. Giles has great weight with me. That consideration, and a hope that my motives cannot now be misunderstood or misrepresented, will induce me to do as he has done.

Colonel Burr.—The circumstance mentioned by the gentleman, that an attempt has been made to intimidate him, must have been a contrivance of some of my enemies for the purpose of irritating him, and increasing the public prejudice against me, since it was calculated to throw a suspicion on my cause. Such an act was never sanctioned by me, nor by any of my friends. I view it with indignation, and disclaim any knowledge of the fact in question.

THE COURT established the following as being the proper questions to be put to jurors: First, have you made up your mind on the case, or on the guilt of Colonel Burr, from the statements you have seen in the papers or otherwise? and finally, have you formed and expressed (or delivered) an opinion on the guilt or innocence of Colonel Burr (or the accused?)

Mr. Joseph Eggleston asked to be excused from serving on the grand jury. He had, on reading the deposition of Gen. Eaton in the newspapers, expressed considerable warmth and indignation on the subject likely to come before the grand jury, and on that account it might be both indelicate and improper for him to serve on that body. But after being examined by the CHIEF JUSTICE as to the nature of the opinions he had formed, Mr. Burr remarked, that the industry which had been used to prejudice the public mind against him left him very little chance of an impartial jury, and that on the subject of Major Eggleston's application to be excused he should remain perfectly passive. The court did not excuse him.

The panel was here called over, and fourteen only appeared. The marshal then summoned from the bystanders John Randolph, Jr., and William Foushee. The court appointed Mr. John Randolph foreman of the grand jury. Being called upon to take the foreman's oath, Mr. Randolph asked to be excused from serving, on the ground that he had formed an opinion concerning the nature and tendency of certain transactions imputed to Col. Burr.

Mr. Burr remarked that he was really afraid they should not be able to find any man without such prepossessions.

The CHIEF JUSTICE remarked that a man must not only have formed, but declared an opinion, to disqualify him. Mr. Randolph said he did not recollect of having declared one; and he was not excused.

Mr. John Randolph was then sworn as foreman; and the rest of the panel being called to the book, when the name of Dr. Foushee was called he stated that from reading the president's message, Gen. Eaton's deposition, and other publications, he had formed an opinion of Col. Burr's guilt. After some discussion, Dr. Foushee was permitted to withdraw, and Col. James Barbour was summoned in his place.

The grand jury were then sworn, as follows: John Randolph, Junior, Foreman, Joseph Eggleston. Joseph C. Cabell, Littleton W. Tazewell, Robert Taylor, James Pleasants, James M. Garnett, William Daniel, John Brockenbrough, John Mercer, Edward Pegram, Mumford Beverly, John Ambler, Thomas Harrison, Alexander Shephard, and James Barbour.

The CHIEF JUSTICE delivered an appropriate charge to the grand jury, in which he particularly dwelt upon the nature of treason, and the testimony requisite to prove it; after which the jury retired.

Mr. Burr then stated his desire that the court should instruct the grand jury on certain leading points, as to the admissibility of certain evidence which he supposed would be laid before the grand jury by the attorney for the United States.

Mr. Hay objected to the proposition as unprecedented. After some discussion, in which Messrs. Burr, Hay, Randolph, and Botts participated,

The CHIEF JUSTICE observed that he was not prepared at present to say whether the same evidence was necessary before the grand jury as before the petit jury; whether two witnesses to an overt act were required to satisfy a grand jury. This was a point he would have to consider. That he had not made up his mind on the evidence of facts said to be done in different districts; how far the one could be adduced as evidence in proof or confirmation of the others; but his present impression was, that facts done without the district may be brought in to prove the material fact said to be done within the district, when that fact was charged.

The question was postponed for further discussion, on Mr. Hay's pledging himself that no evidence should be laid before the grand jury without notice being first given to Mr. Burr and his counsel.

Saturday, May 23, 1807.

The counsel for Col. Burr observed that, if it met the approbation of the court, the discussion of the propriety of giving special instructions to the grand jury would take place on Monday next. This proposition was assented to, and it was understood that Mr. Burr's counsel were to give due notice of the propositions they intended to submit.

The grand jury appearing pursuant to adjournment, the CHIEF JUSTICE informed them that the absence of Gen. Wilkinson, a witness deemed important by the counsel for the United States, and the uncertainty of his arrival at any particular period, made it necessary that they should be adjourned.

After some conversation between the court and bar as to the propriety of adjourning the grand jury to some future day of the term, they were finally adjourned till the Monday following.

Monday, May 25, 1807.

The grand jury appeared in court, and on its being stated by their foreman that they had been two days confined to their chambers, and had no presentment to make, or bill before them, Mr. Hay observed that he had two bills prepared, but wished to postpone the delivering of them till the witnesses were present, and until it was ascertained that all the evidence relied upon by the counsel for the prosecution could be had. He thought it probable that in the course of a week he should hear of Gen. Wilkinson, who was still absent, and whose testimony was deemed very important. After some conversation as to the propriety of adjourning the grand jury to a distant day of the term,

Mr. Hay gave notice of his intention to submit a motion to commit Mr. Burr on a charge of high treason. On the previous examination, he said, there was no evidence of an overt act, and he was committed for a misdemeanor only. The evidence is different now.

Some remarks having been made as to the impropriety of discussing the subject in the presence of the grand jury, they were requested to withdraw.

[The argument and opinion delivered on the motion to commit will be found reported as Case No. 14,692b. The opinion was delivered on Tuesday, May 26, 1807. It closed with these words: "If it is the choice of the prosecutor on the part of the United States to proceed with this motion, it is the opinion of the court that he may open his testimony."]

Mr. Hay then rose, and observed that he was struck with the observations of the court relative to "publications," and he would attempt, if possible, to make some arrangement with the counsel on the other side, to obviate that inconvenience; and he understood they were disposed to do the same.

The counsel on both sides then retired by permission of the court for this purpose. They returned in a short time, and Mr. Hay informed the court that the counsel for the United States and for Colonel Burr, not having yet been able to agree upon any arrangement which would attain his object, namely, that of having Colonel Burr recognized in a sum sufficiently large to insure his appearance to answer the charge of high treason against the United States, without incurring the inconvenience resulting from a public disclosure of the evidence at this early stage of the proceeding, wished to have further time for that desirable purpose. This was granted by the court, and it then adjourned till next day.

Wednesday, May 27, 1807.

Mr. Hay informed the court that all hopes of the arrangement which he had mentioned yesterday were at an end; for he had received a letter from Colonel Burr's counsel positively refusing to give additional bail. He therefore deemed it his duty to go on with the examination of the witnesses in support of his motion to commit Mr. Burr. He observed, that he regretted extremely that it became necessary in his judgment to pursue this course. He felt the full force of the objections to a disclosure of the evidence, and to the necessity of the court's declaring its opinion, before the case was laid before a jury; but those considerations must yield to a sense of what his engagements to the United States imperiously demanded of him; that in adducing the evidence, he should observe something like chronological order. He should first read the depositions of the witnesses who were absent, and afterwards bring forward those who were present, so as to disclose all the events, as they successively happened.

Mr. Wickham stated that there were two distinct charges against Colonel Burr. The first was for a misdemeanor, for which he had already entered into recognizance; the second was a charge of high treason against the United States, which was once proposed without success, and is now again repeated. On this charge the United States must substantiate two essential points: first, that there was an overt act committed; and secondly, that Colonel Burr was concerned in it. Everything that does not bear upon these points is of course inadmissible; the course therefore laid down by the attorney for the United States is obviously improper. He proposes to examine his witnesses in a kind of chronological order.

Colonel Burr required that the evidence should be taken in strict legal order. The court and even the opposite counsel will see the propriety of observing this order. If the attorney for the United States has affidavits to produce, let him first demonstrate that they have a right to produce them. We first call upon him to prove by strict legal evidence, that an overt act of treason has been committed. If he cannot establish that one point, all the evidence which he can produce is nugatory and unavailing.

Mr. Hay protested against the right of counsel for the accused to dictate to him the order of introducing his testimony. The two charges against Aaron Burr, he said, were naturally and intimately blended. They form distinct parts of one great design. What that great design was, in all its bearings and ramifications, he was not absolutely certain; but had always conceived that before Mexico was invaded New Orleans was to be taken. How, then, was it possible to separate these two allegations? How could the prosecution separate, line by line, and word by word, the evidence produced to prove these two distinct allegations? It appeared to him as though the counsel for the defence were determined to stop him at the very threshold of everything which he attempted to do. How could he advance if every inch of ground was to be measured out to him with such strictness and objections? The proposition was wholly unprecedented, that the counsel before an examining court should be instructed how to bring out his evidence. He claimed the right to bring it forward in its chronological order.

After some remarks by Mr. Wickham and Mr. Burr

The CHIEF JUSTICE said it would certainly be better, if the evidence was produced to prove the fact first, and that to show their coloring afterwards; for no evidence certainly has any bearing on the present case unless an overt act be proved. However, if the attorney for the United States thinks the chronological order the best, he may pursue his own course; but the court trusts to him, that he will produce nothing which does not bear upon the case.

After some further remarks by Mr. Hay and Mr. Randolph, Mr. Hay produced Gen. Wilkinson's affidavit.

Mr. Botts objected to the admissibility of the paper, on the ground that it was not competent evidence. He said on this question the supreme court were divided.

The CHIEF JUSTICE here interposed, and remarked that the supreme court were divided on the question of the competency of the letter annexed to the affidavit, not as to the admissibility of the affidavit itself.

Mr. Botts proceeded to state his objections to the competency of the affidavit in this court in the present proceeding. First, he objected that an ex parte affidavit ought not to be received when the witness himself could be produced in court. General Wilkinson could and ought to have been here, and this being the case, his affidavit ought not to be received. But the proposition which he mainly pressed was, that no evidence of any nature whatever, ought to be taken until there is indubitable proof that there was war levied in this district, (Virginia,) and until it is proved that an overt act was committed by Mr. Burr.

Mr. Hay, interrupting, observed that the gentleman was renewing a proposition which had been decided by the court.

Mr. Burr said he had understood the gentleman who spoke first apprized the court that the evidence should come forward subject to discussion, which would be made as the evidence went on. The gentleman was only going into the nature of the evidence presented.

Mr. Botts resumed. He quoted the constitutional definition of treason, and asked if it meant that, if one-half of the crime of treason was to be found in this district, you might look for the other half elsewhere? If the affidavit imported anything, it was a declaration or confession; and no declaration or confession could constitute any ingredient of an overt act, unless that confession be made "in open court." He enforced his views at considerable length.

Messrs. Wickham and Randolph followed, in support of the motion to exclude the testimony at this stage of the proceeding.

The CHIEF JUSTICE stated that the supreme court had already decided, that the affidavit might be admitted under certain circumstances; but they had also determined that General Wilkinson's affidavit did not contain any proof of an overt act; that he was certainly extremely willing to permit the attorney for the United States to pursue his own course in the order of drawing out his evidence, under a full confidence that he would not waste the time of the court by producing any extraneous matters; but where was the necessity of producing General Wilkinson's affidavit first? If there was no other evidence to prove the overt act, General Wilkinson's affidavit goes for nothing, for so the supreme court have already decided; and by that decision he should consider himself bound, even if he had dissented from it. Why, then, introduce this affidavit?

After some further discussion by counsel, the CHIEF JUSTICE said that unless there was a fact to be proved, he was of opinion that no testimony ought to be produced. The question before the court was not whether there had been a treasonable intent, but an overt act. That fact must be proved before there can be any treason, or any commitment for treason.

Mr. Hay then called Peter Taylor, who was Mr. Blennerhassett's gardener, and Jacob Allbright, a laborer, who had worked on his island, who gave their testimony. [This testimony is more fully detailed hereafter, and, in consequence, is omitted here.]

[After these witnesses were examined, the affidavit of Jacob Dunbaugh was offered. The argument on the motion to exclude it, which took up the balance of the day, and the opinion of the court excluding the affidavit, delivered the following day, are reported as Case No. 14,692c.]

Mr. Hay observed that as the examination of Colonel Burr for treason had already taken up much time without any progress in the business, and, from the disposition manifested by his counsel, it might last not only ten days, but even ten years longer, he considered it his duty, from information which he had received that morning, to suggest to the court the propriety of binding Colonel Burr in a further recognizance from day to day till the examination could be ended. He stated, on the authority of a letter just come to hand from the secretary at war, that General Wilkinson, with several other witnesses, might be expected here between the 28th and 30th of this month. This circumstance, said he, renders it essential that he should be considered in custody until he gives security that his person shall be forthcoming to answer the charge of treason against the United States. The gentlemen who appear as counsel for Colonel Burr may be, and no doubt are sincere, in the opinion they have expressed, that he will not shrink from the charges exhibited against him, and will not, in any conjuncture of circumstances which may occur, fly from a trial; but those gentlemen must pardon me for saying that I entertain a very different opinion. I must believe that his regard for the safety of his own life, would, if he perceived it in danger, prevail over his regard for the interest of his securities. I give notice, therefore, that I consider him as being already in custody to answer the motion I have made for his commitment, and that he cannot be permitted to go at large without giving security for his appearance from day to day. His situation now is the same as that when he was first apprehended and brought before a single judge for the purpose of examination. Your honor at that time considered him as in custody, and bound him over from day to day; and I only contend that the same course should be pursued at this time.

Mr. Wickham.—The gentleman thinks he has obtained the effect of his motion merely by having made it. I cannot perceive the propriety of a motion to compel Colonel Burr to give bail in any sum before the probable cause to believe him guilty of treason has been shown. When he was brought before your honor for examination, you conceived the sum of $5,000 sufficient security for his daily appearance. But a recognizance has already been given in double that sum, binding him not to depart without the leave of this court. Yet now, although no probable proof of treason has been exhibited, Mr. Hay requires the court to demand of Colonel Burr additional security! I trust that such a motion will not prevail.

Mr. Martin.—It has already been decided by the supreme court of the United States, that not a single expression in Wilkinson's affidavit amounts to any proof of the charge of treason. The motion of the gentleman amounts to this: "We have no evidence of treason, and are not ready to go to trial for the purpose of proving it; we therefore move the court to increase the bail."

Mr. Randolph. — The first motion of the counsel for the United States was to commit Colonel Burr on the ground of probable cause only. This goes a step farther, and wishes the same thing to be done on the ground of a probable cause of a probable cause; but we trust that we shall not be deprived of our liberty or held to bail on a mere uncertain expectation of evidence.

Some further remarks were made by Mr. MacRae, Mr. Wirt, Mr. Botts, and Mr. Hay.

The CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the opinion of the court, the substance of which was as follows: It is certainly necessary that a person accused should be retained in custody, or required to give security for his appearance while his examination is depending. The amount of the security to be required must depend, however, upon the weight of the testimony against him. On a former occasion, Colonel Burr was held to bail for his daily appearance in the sum of five thousand dollars only, because there was no evidence before the judge to prove the probability of his having been guilty of treason. When the examination was completed, the sum of ten thousand dollars was considered sufficient to bind him to answer the charge of a misdemeanor only, because the constitution requires that excessive bail should not be taken; but that recognizance had no application to the charge of treason. Yet, whether additional security ought to be required in the present stage of this business, before any evidence has appeared to make the charge of treason probable, is a question of some difficulty. It would seem that evidence sufficient to furnish probable cause must first be examined before the accused can be deprived of his liberty or any security can be required of him. Yet, before this could be done, he might escape and defeat the very end of the examination. In common cases, where a person charged with a crime is arrested and brought before a magistrate, the arrest itself is preceded by an affidavit, which furnishes grounds of probable cause. The prisoner therefore is continued in custody, or bailed until the examination is finished: but here there has been no arrest for treason, and Colonel Burr is not in custody for that offence. The evidence then must be heard, to determine whether he ought to be taken into custody; but as the present public and solemn examination is very different from that before a single magistrate; as very improper effects on the public mind may be produced by it, I wish that the court could be relieved from the embarrassing situation in which it is placed, and exempted from the necessity of giving any opinion upon the case, previously to its being acted upon by the grand jury. It is the wish of the court, that the personal appearance of Colonel Burr could be secured without the necessity of proceeding in this inquiry.

Colonel Burr rose and observed, that he denied the right of the court to hold him to bail in this stage of the proceedings; that the constitution of the United States was against it—declaring that no person shall be arrested without probable cause made out by oath or affirmation. But if the court were embarrassed, he would relieve them by consenting to give bail; provided it should be understood that no opinion on the question even of probable cause was pronounced by the court by the circumstance of his giving bail.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said, that such was the meaning of the court.

Mr. Martin said, for his part, he should prefer that all the evidence should be fully gone into. Instead of fearing that public prejudice would thereby be excited against Colonel Burr, he believed it would remove all the prejudices of that sort which now prevailed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—As a bill would probably be sent up to the grand jury, the court wishes to declare no opinion either way.

Some conversation then occurred relative to the quantum of bail; and Colonel Burr mentioned, that he would propose that the sum should be ten thousand dollars, if he should be able to find security to that amount, of which he expressed himself to be doubtful. Mr. Hay contended that fifty thousand dollars would not be too much. But the court finally accepted of the offer, made by Colonel Burr, who, after a short interval, entered into a recognizance with four sureties, to wit: Messrs. Wm. Langburn, Thomas Taylor, John G. Gamble, and Luther Martin; himself in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and each surety in the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, conditioned, that he would not depart without leave of the court.

Mr. Martin, when offered as surety for Colonel Burr, said, that he had lands in the district of Virginia, the value of which was more than double the sum; and that he was happy to have this opportunity to give a public proof of his confidence in the honor of Colonel Burr, and of his conviction that he was innocent. All further proceedings in the case were thereupon postponed until the next day.

On Friday, the 29th of May, and on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the 1st, 2d, and 3d of June, the court met and adjourned without taking up the case, on account of the non-arrival of General Wilkinson. On the last mentioned day the district attorney stated that he did not think it probable that General Wilkinson would arrive for ten or twelve days, and suggested an adjournment of the grand jury for that length of time. Finally, they were adjourned to Tuesday, the 9th of June.

Tuesday, June 9, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment, and all the grand jurors appeared. General Wilkinson not having yet arrived, after some conversation between the court and bar as to the probable time of his arrival, the grand jury were further adjourned to Thursday following.

[Immediately upon the adjournment of the grand jury a question arose as to the production of certain papers by the government, and was followed by a motion for a subpœna duces tecum directed to the president of the United States, which will be found reported as Case No. 14,692d. The argument consumed several days, and an opinion was delivered Saturday, June 13, 1807. After which]

Mr. Burr called up the motion for a supplemental charge to the grand jury, in support of which he had, on yesterday, submitted a series of propositions, with citations of authorities.

The CHIEF JUSTICE stated that he had drawn up a supplemental charge, which he had submitted to the attorney for the United States, with a request that it should also be put into the hands of Colonel Burr's counsel; that Mr. Hay had, however, informed him that he had been too much occupied to inspect the charge with attention, and deliver it to the opposite counsel; but another reason was, that there was one point in the charge which he did not fully approve. He should not, therefore, deliver his charge at present, but should reserve it until Monday. In the meantime, Colonel Burr's counsel could have an opportunity of inspecting it, and an argument might be held on the points which had produced an objection from the attorney for the United States.

(After some conversation between the court and bar, as to whether the arguments on the supplemental charge should be submitted in writing or orally, the subject was passed over, and it appears never to have been again called up.)

At the instance of the district attorney, four witnesses, viz. Thomas Truxton, William Eaton, Benjamin Stoddert, and Stephen Decatur, were sworn to testify before the grand jury. The clerk then proceeded to call four other witnesses to the book, but when Erick Bollman appeared, Mr. Hay addressed the court to the following effect: Before Mr. Bollman is sworn I must inform the court of a particular, and not an immaterial circumstance. He, sir, has made a full communication to the government of the plans, the designs, and views of Aaron Burr. As these communications might criminate Dr. Bollman before the grand jury, the president of the United States has communicated to me this pardon (holding it in his hands) which I have already offered to Dr. Bollman. He received it in a very hesitating manner, and I think informed me that he knew not whether he should or should not accept it. He took it from me, however, as he informed me, to take the advice of counsel. He returned it in the same hesitating manner; he would neither positively accept nor refuse it. My own opinion is that Dr. Bollman, under these circumstances, cannot possibly criminate himself. This pardon will completely exonerate him from all the penalties of the law. I believe his evidence to be extremely material. In the presence of this court I offer this pardon to him, and if he refuses, I shall deposit it with the clerk for his use. Will you (addressing himself to Dr. Bollman) accept this pardon?

Dr. Bollman.—No, I will not, sir.

Mr. Hay then observed that Dr. Bollman must be carried up to the grand jury with an intimation that he had been pardoned.

Mr. Martin.—It has always been Dr. Bollman's intention to refuse this pardon; but he has not positively refused it before, because he wished to have this opportunity of publicly rejecting it.

Several other witnesses were sworn.

Mr. Martin did not suppose that the pardon was real or effectual; if he made any confessions before the grand jury, they might find an indictment against him, which would be valid, notwithstanding the pardon; that the pardon could not be effectual before it was pleaded to an indictment in open court.

Mr. Hay inquired whether Dr. Bollman might not go to the grand jury.

The CHIEF JUSTICE suggested that it would be better to settle the question about the validity of the pardon before he was sent to the grand jury.

Mr. Hay.—I am anxious to introduce the evidence before the grand jury in a chronological order, and the suspension of Dr. Bollman's testimony will make a chasm in my arrangement. He added that, however, it was not very important whether he was sent now or some time hence to the grand jury.

Mr. Martin.—Dr. Bollman is not pardoned, and no man is bound to criminate himself.

The CHIEF JUSTICE required his authorities.

Mr. Martin.—I am prepared to show that a party even possessed of a pardon is still indictable by the grand jury, unless he has pleaded it in court.

The other witnesses were sent to the grand jury, and Dr. Bollman was suspended. Four other witnesses were then sworn.

Mr. Hay.—I again propose to send Dr. Bollman to the grand jury.

At this time the marshal entered, and Mr. Hay informed the court that the grand jury had sent for the article of the constitution and the laws of congress relating to treason, and the law relating to the misdemeanor.

Jacob Dunbaugh was sworn and sent to the grand jury.

Some desultory conversation here ensued between the bar and the court respecting Dr. Bollman, when Mr. Hay addressed the opposite counsel: Are you then willing to have Dr. Bollman indicted? Take care in what an awful condition you are placing this gentleman.

Mr. Martin.—Doctor Bollman, sir, has lived too long to be alarmed by such menaces. He is a man of too much honor to trust his reputation to the course which you prescribe for him.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—There can be no question but Dr. Bollman can go up to the jury; but the question is, whether he is pardoned or not? If the executive should refuse to pardon him, he is certainly not pardoned.

Mr. Martin.—But there can be no doubt, if he chooses to decline his pardon, that he stands in the same situation with every other witness, who cannot be forced to criminate himself.

Some desultory conversation here ensued, when Mr. Hay observed that he should extremely regret the loss of Dr. Bollman's testimony. He believed it to be material. He trusted that he should obtain it, however reluctantly given. The court would perceive, that Dr. Bollman now possessed so much zeal as even to encounter the risk of an indictment for treason. Whether he should appear before the grand jury under the circumstances of a pardon being annexed to his name, might hereafter become the object of a distinct inquiry. In the meantime he might go up without any such notification. The counsel of Mr. Burr acquiesced.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Whether he be really pardoned or not, I cannot at present declare. I must take time to deliberate.

Mr. Hay.—Categorically then I ask you, Mr. Bollman, do you accept your pardon?

Mr. Bollman.—I have already answered that question several times. I say no. I repeat, that I would have refused it before, but that I wished this opportunity of publicly declaring it.

Mr. Hay.—If the grand jury have any doubts about the questions that they put to Dr. Bollman, they can apply to the court for instructions. I assert, sir, that Mr. Bollman is a pardoned man. I wish the opposite counsel to prove that he is not. I therefore move, sir, that he be sent up to the grand jury, certified by you, that he is pardoned. I make this motion that gentlemen who wish to discuss the question may have an opportunity of adducing their arguments.

Mr. Williams appeared as counsel for Dr. Bollman, and addressed the court in his behalf, insisting he was not bound to criminate or calumniate himself, although pardoned. He claimed, however, that the pardon having been refused, the court could take no notice of it. He also insisted that no pardon except by statute could protect a party against a criminal prosecution, as a pardon under the great seal was not effectual until it had been pleaded and allowed in court. He cited numerous authorities in support of his positions.

Mr. Martin supported the same positions. He said, another reason why Dr. Bollman had refused the pardon was, that it would be considered an admission of guilt. He did not consider a pardon necessary for an innocent man. Dr. Bollman, sir, knows what he has to fear from the prosecution of an angry government, but he will brave it all. The man who did so much to rescue the Marquis La Fayette from his imprisonment, and who has been known at so many courts, bears too great a regard for his reputation, to wish to have it sounded throughout Europe that he was compelled to abandon his honor through a fear of unjust prosecution.

After some remarks by Messrs. MacRae and Hay, Dr. Bollman was sent up to the grand jury without any particular notification; the questions as to the effect of the pardon tendered to him, and how far he could be compelled to testify, being reserved for future discussion and decision.

Mr. Hay requested leave to inform the grand jury that fatigue alone had prevented General Wilkinson from attending them on that day, but that he should appear before them on Monday. The court then adjourned to Monday.

Monday, June 15, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment.

Gen. Wilkinson was sworn and sent to the grand jury, with a notification that it would facilitate their inquiries if they would examine him immediately.

Mr. Wickham reminded the court that the attorney for the United States had pledged himself to send up no papers to the grand jury which had not previously passed the inspection of the court; but it had since occurred to Col. Burr's counsel that the witnesses themselves might carry up improper papers. He submitted to the court whether they ought not to instruct the grand jury to receive no papers, except through the medium of the court.

Upon this motion a running debate of considerable length ensued.

Finally, the CHIEF JUSTICE remarked that he was not satisfied that a court ought to inspect the papers which form a part of a witness's testimony before he is sent to the grand jury. He had reduced to writing an opinion to be sent to the grand jury. It instructed them not to inspect any papers, but such as formed a part of the narrative of the witness, and proved to be the papers of the person against whom an indictment was exhibited.

At the instance of Mr. Hay, the instruction was so amended as to submit such papers as tend to justify the witness, but not to bear upon the accused.

Mr. Hay informed the court that the grand jury had sent for Dr. Bollman; that they wanted him to decipher, if he could, a ciphered letter annexed to Mr. Willie's affidavit, and which he held in his hand; that Mr. Willie, the reputed secretary of Mr. Burr, would prove the identity of the paper, and Dr. Bollman, it was expected, would interpret it.

At the suggestion of Mr. Martin, the affidavit was severed from the letter.

Mr. Willie appearing in court, Mr. Hay produced the ciphered letter annexed to his affidavit, and said: This is the letter which I wish to transmit to the grand jury. It is addressed, I understand, to Dr. Bollman, under a fictitious name, and is all in the handwriting of Mr. Willie.

Mr. Botts objected to its being sent up to the grand jury until both its materiality and its authenticity had been proved.

Mr. Hay said that was a hard proposition, as it was written partly in ciphers and partly in German. He deemed it material, because he understood it was either dictated by the accused, or first written by him and afterwards written by his secretary, and at his request. It was addressed to Henry Wilbourn, alias Erick Bollman. He wished it to be sent up while Dr. Bollman was before the grand jury.

After considerable sparring between counsel, Mr. Willie was called to the stand.

[The argument of the question of the right to compel Willie to testify took up the balance of the day, and will be found reported in Case No. 14,692e.]

Tuesday, June 16, 1807.

As soon as the court met, Mr. Hay produced and read the following letter from the president of the United States, in answer to his letter on the subject of the subpœna duces tecum, observing, at the same time, that he read it to show the disposition of the government not to withhold any necessary papers, and that if gentlemen would specify what orders they wanted, they would be furnished without the necessity of expresses:

"Washington, June 12, 1807.

"Sir: Your letter of the 9th is this moment received. Reserving the necessary right of the president of the United States to decide, independently of all other authority, what papers coming to him as president the public interest permits to be communicated, and to whom, I assure you of my readiness under that restriction, voluntarily to furnish on all occasions whatever the purposes of justice may require. But the letter of General Wilkinson, of October 21st, requested for the defence of Colonel Burr, with every other paper relating to the charges against him, which were in my possession when the attorney general went on to Richmond in March, I then delivered to him; and I have always taken for granted he left the whole with you. If he did, and the bundle retains the order in which I had arranged it, you will readily find the letter desired under the date of its receipt which was November 25th; but lest the attorney general should not have left those papers with you, I this day write to him to forward this one by post. An uncertainty whether he be at Philadelphia, Wilmington, or New Castle, may produce delay in his receiving my letter, of which it is proper you should be apprised. But as I do not recollect the whole contents of that letter, I must beg leave to devolve on you the exercise of that discretion which it would be my right and duty to exercise, by withholding the communication of any parts of the letter which are not directly material for the purposes of justice. With this application, which is specific, a prompt compliance is practicable; but when the request goes to copies of the orders issued in relation to Colonel Burr to the officers at Orleans and Natchez, and by the secretaries of the war and navy departments, it seems to cover a correspondence of many months, with such a variety of officers civil and military, all over the United States, as would amount to the laying open of the whole executive books. I have desired the secretary of war to examine his official communications, and on a view of these we may be able to judge what can and ought to be done towards a compliance with the request. If the defendant allege that there was any particular order which, as a cause, produced any particular act on his part, then he must know what this order was, can specify it, and a prompt answer can be given. If the object had been specified, we might then have had some guide for our conjectures, as to what part of the executive records might be useful to him. But with a perfect willingness to do what is right, we are without the indications which may enable us to do it. If the researches of the secretary at war should produce anything proper for communication, and pertinent to any point we can conceive in the defence before the court, it shall be forwarded to you. I salute you with esteem and respect

"Thomas Jefferson.

"George Hay, Esq."

Some conversation ensued about the specification of the papers wanted from the executive.

Mr. Hay stated that in his communication to the president, to which this letter was a reply, he had mentioned these papers in the terms by which he thought the opposite counsel would probably have described them. The president, however, did not deem this description sufficient.

Colonel Burr's counsel then stated that they had sent an express to Washington for these papers, with a subpœna to the president, and that it would appear on the return whether they could obtain them or not.

Here a desultory conversation ensued, in which Mr. Hay insisted that Dr. Bollman was a pardoned man, and ought to communicate all he knew to the grand jury, which was denied by the other side; when Dr. Bollman, addressing himself to the court, said: I have answered every question that was put to me by the grand jury.

The CHIEF JUSTICE inquired if there was any objection to asking Dr. Bollman if he could decipher the letter.

Mr. Martin said it would be time enough to discuss that question after the letter shall have been before the grand jury.

Mr. MacRae.—I wish the question now put. I asked Willie whether he understood that part of the letter which is in cipher; he could not be criminal if he did not understand it. I wish the part which is written in German now to be explained, to show that there is nothing criminal in it. I wish Bollman to translate that part

The CHIEF JUSTICE said he would prefer to proceed with the other point; how far a witness may refuse to answer a question which he thinks would criminate himself.

Mr. Botts then addressed the court at some length on that point. In the course of his remarks he intimated that the letter in question had been obtained by the robbery of the post office, and referred to the mark "25" on its back, (which he said was the only post mark of many of the country post offices,) as evidence that it had been taken from the post office.

Mr. Williams, counsel for Mr. Willie, followed Mr. Botts in support of the position that the witness was not bound to answer any question, the answer to which he believed would tend to criminate himself.

Messrs. MacRae and Hay replied at some length, after which the court adjourned.

Wednesday, June 17, 1807.

At the meeting of the court Mr. Hay referred to the insinuations that had been thrown out yesterday, that the ciphered letter in question had been taken improperly if not feloniously from the post office; and said this was evidently done to affect the character of Gen. Wilkinson. He read a note which he had just received from Gen. Wilkinson, stating that the letter was delivered to him by Charles Patton, of the house of "Meeker, Williamson & Patton," New Orleans.

Mr. Martin then addressed the court on the question of the right of Mr. Willie to decline answering the questions propounded to him by the counsel for the prosecution. He contended that "a witness is not compelled to answer when it tends to criminate him, nor where it does not relate to the issue," and cited authorities in support of the proposition.

Mr. Wickham followed in an argument on the same side

After some further desultory conversation, the CHIEF JUSTICE asked whether there were any other questions before the court.

Mr. MacRae requested a decision on Dr. Bollman's case, as he wished to interrogate him about the ciphered letter.

Mr. Williams said he was ready to discuss the question.

Mr. Burr.—There will arise some very important questions, affecting the very source of the jurisdiction of this country. I have several affidavits to produce to show that improper means have been used to procure witnesses, and thereby contaminate the public justice. When these proofs have been duly exhibited, it will be the province of the court to decide whether they will not arrest the progress of such improper conduct, and prevent the introduction of such evidence.

Mr. Botts rose to apprise the opposite counsel that there were three or four questions of importance which the counsel for Mr. Burr should bring forward as soon as possible. Two or three days ago he had commented on the plunder of the post office, and he assured the counsel for the prosecution that he should probe that subject to the bottom, as no man could be more anxious than himself that the stigma which this transaction attaches to the inferior or superior officers of the government should be wiped off.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—Unless these allegations affected some testimony that was about to be delivered, how can you introduce this subject?

Mr. Burr.—The court has very properly demanded some proof of the relevancy of our proposition. Sir, we are ready to prove the violation of the post office. We are ready to fasten it on individuals now here, and we are ready to name the post offices if the court require it, which have been thus plundered. When it comes out that evidence has been thus improperly obtained, we shall say, sir, that it is contaminated by fraud. I will name three persons who have been guilty of improper conduct, in improperly obtaining letters from the post office to be evidence against me. These are Judge Toulmin, of the Mississippi territory, John G. Jackson, a member of congress, and General Wilkinson. Two of these persons are within the reach of this court. As well as the improper manner in which they have procured affidavits and witnesses against me, I mention these circumstances for two reasons: first, that the facts may be proved to the satisfaction of the court; and second, that the court may lay their hands on testimony thus procured.

Mr. Botts.—The circumstance of the post mark proves that the post office was robbed of that letter; therefore it is not evidence.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said, let the consequences be as they may, this court cannot take cognizance of any act which has not been committed within this district. That mark is not necessarily a post mark. The court can only know the fact, in a case to which it applies, except to commit and send for trial.

Mr. Hay.—Let some specific motion be made, and the evidence procured; and if there have been any crime committed, let the offenders be prosecuted according to law. These gentlemen know the course, and I most solemnly promise to discharge the duties of my office, whether they bear against General Wilkinson, or the man at the bar. If the crime have been committed, it is not the province of the court to notice it till after an indictment has been found.

Mr. Botts.—We only wish to prove and prevent a repetition and continuance of this improper mode of proceeding. The proof will affect General Wilkinson.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—If it did affect General Wilkinson it could not prevent him from being a witness.

Some desultory conversation here ensued, when Mr. Burr observed that he was afraid he was not sufficiently understood, from mingling two distinct propositions together. As to the subject of the post offices, it might rest for the present; but as to the improper means employed in obtaining testimony, they were at this moment in actual operation. Some witnesses had been brought here by this practice, and it was one which ought immediately to be checked; he did not particularly level his observations against General Wilkinson. He did not say that the attorney for the United States ought to indict, or that such a crime, if committed out of this district, was cognizable by the court, unless it be going on while the court is in session, or the cause depending; in those cases improper practices relative to crimes committed out of the limits of this court may be examined, and the persons committing them attached. Such practices have been since I have been recognized here, and they ought to be punished by attachment.

Mr. Wirt.—I do not yet understand the gentlemen. What is the object of their motion?

Mr. Botts.—We shall hereafter make it; we have no other object by the present annunciation than to give gentlemen a timely notice of our intentions.

Mr. Burr.—We have sufficient evidence on which to found our motion.

What motion? demanded Mr. Hay.

Mr. Burr.—I thought, sir, I had sufficiently explained my intentions. I may either move for a rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue against Judge Toulmin, John G. Jackson, and General Wilkinson, or what is sometimes, though not so frequently practiced, I may directly move for an attachment itself.

Mr. MacRae.—At whose instance?

Mr. Burr.—At the public's.

Mr. MacRae.—A pretty proceeding, indeed! that the public prosecution should thus be taken out of the hands of the public prosecutor, and that the accused should supersede the attorney for the United States!

Mr. Burr.—A strange remark indeed! As if it were not the business of the injured person himself to institute the complaint.

Mr. Hay.—I wish for further explanation. Let the specific charge on which their motion is founded be clearly pointed out and reduced to writing.

Mr. Burr.—The motion will be for an attachment for the irregular examination of witnesses, practicing on their fears, forcing them to come to this place, and transporting them from New Orleans to Norfolk.

At this moment Mr. Randolph entered the court, and observed that if he had been present he would have himself opened this motion, which was intended to operate immediately upon General Wilkinson, and ultimately upon some other persons. Mr. Randolph here read the motion which he would have submitted to the court.

Mr. Hay protested against this proceeding, which, he said, was calculated to interrupt the course of the prosecution, and was levelled at General Wilkinson alone.

After some further remarks from Mr. Hay and from Messrs. Randolph and Martin—Mr. Hay said he should move to postpone the motion of the gentlemen till the prosecution was over, because it would necessarily interrupt the business before the court, because it was intended to impeach the credit of a witness, and because this inquiry could as well be conducted after as before the prosecution.

Mr. Wickham replied to Mr. Hay. He said, among other things, that General Wilkinson had brought witnesses with him from New Orleans by military force. He had taken their depositions entirely ex parte at the point of the bayonet, for the purpose of keeping their testimony straight. He would lay down the broad proposition that the man who goes about collecting affidavits upon affidavits in relation to a matter to be investigated in this court corrupts the fountains of justice. We have already seen a volume of such at this bar. He particularly referred to Mr. Jackson, who comes here with the depositions of witnesses who are thus bound hand and foot, thus tongue-tied, because their depositions had been taken. He had seen them in this very court examining witnesses with affidavits in their hands, and comparing the one with the other; depositions taken not by commissions, but ex parte. When an interested agent thus goes about collecting depositions, and with ignorant men shaping them just as he pleases, he acts contrary to law and to the spirit and genius of our government; and such acts are a contempt of this court, if done during the prosecution, by interfering with the purposes of justice. Such men are liable to attachment from the very moment that the government took possession of Colonel Burr's person; not from the moment of first arrest, but from the time when they ordered Perkins to conduct his prisoner from Fredericksburg to Richmond. It was necessary to institute this proceeding now to prevent the repetition of such practices during the progress of the trial. At the conclusion of Mr. Wickham's remarks ency of the prosecution was no objection to hearing the motion, but it was another question whether there were any grounds for it or not, and that the court would not say that a motion relating to the justice of the case ought not to be heard.

The court then adjourned.

[Thursday, June 18, 1807. As soon as the court met, the CHIEF JUSTICE delivered an opinion in the case of Willie. This will be found reported as Case No. 14,692e. After the delivery of such opinion]

Mr. Williams (counsel for Mr. Willie) stated that he had misunderstood him the other day in court, and in a subsequent conversation had obtained more accurate information. He does understand a part of that letter.

Mr. Hay requested that Mr. Willie should be called into court. When he appeared Mr. Hay interrogated him. Do you understand the contents of that letter? Answer. No. Mr. Willie afterwards said that he understood the part of the letter which is written in Dutch.

Mr. Hay.—Was this letter written by the hand or the direction of Aaron Burr?

Mr. Wickham objected to the question.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—The witness and his counsel will consult.

Mr. Hay repeated the question. Mr. Willie. Yes. Mr. Hay. Which? by his hand or his direction? Mr. Willie. By his direction. It was copied from a paper written by himself.

Mr. Hay.—I wish this paper to be carried to the grand jury. I presume there can be no objection.

Mr. Botts.—No objection! We call upon you to show the materiality of that letter.

Mr. Hay.—I deny the necessity of any such thing. Until this letter be deciphered it will be perfectly unintelligible to me and to the grand jury. It is no more than a blank piece of paper.

Mr. Wickham.—I had always understood before that the testimony which is laid before a grand jury must not only be legal in itself, but proved to be material.

Mr. Williams begged leave to interrupt the gentleman. Mr. Willie is anxious to be particularly understood. He says that this ciphered letter was first written by Colonel Burr, and afterwards copied. But it is the cipher only which has been copied from Colonel Burr's original.

Mr. Hay.—It is quite sufficient, sir. If Colonel Burr wrote the ciphered part, he will be considered the author of the whole.

Mr. Wickham.—The gentleman has stated a curious proposition indeed! I had always understood before that the whole included the part; but it seems now that the part is to comprehend the whole.

After some further discussion, in which several of the counsel participated,

The CHIEF JUSTICE said he had in some measure anticipated this question, and had reflected upon it; his opinion was, that a paper to go before the grand or petit jury must be relevant to the case, even if its materiality were not proved. Why send this paper before the grand jury, if it cannot be deciphered? If it can be deciphered before the grand jury, why not before the court? Let it, then, be deciphered, and its relevancy may at once be established.

Mr. Hay then requested Dr. Bollman to be called, that he might be interrogated as to its contents; but before he appeared, Mr. John Randolph entered at the head of the grand jury, and addressed the court as follows: May it please the court: One of the witnesses under examination before the grand jury has answered certain questions touching a letter in ciphers. The grand jury understand that this letter is in the possession of the court, or of the counsel for the prosecution. They have thought proper to appear before you, to know whether the letter referred to by the witness be in the possession of the court?

The CHIEF JUSTICE then remarked that as the letter was wanted by the grand jury, a witness having referred to it, that was sufficient to establish its relevancy, and directed it to be delivered to them.

Mr. MacRae hoped that before the grand jury retired they would be informed that a witness had proved that this letter was originally written by Aaron Burr.

Mr. Wickham hoped that they would also be informed that the superscription on that letter has not been proved to have been written by Colonel Burr. The witness did not and would not say that he knew the superscription to have been written by him. The grand jury retired and the court adjourned.

Friday, June 19, 1807.

As soon as the court met, Mr. Burr addressed them. He stated that the express that he had sent on to Washington with the subpœna duces tecum had returned to this city on Wednesday last, but had received no other than a verbal reply from the president of the United States that the papers wanted would not be sent by him, from which I have inferred, said Mr. Burr, that he intends to send them in some other way. I did not mention this circumstance yesterday to the court, under an expectation that the last night's mail might give us further intelligence on the subject. I now rise to give notice that unless I receive a satisfactory intimation on this subject before the meeting of the court, I shall to-morrow move the court to enforce its process.

[Motion was then made for an attachment against General Wilkinson "for a contempt in obstructing the administration of the justice of this court," the argument on which occupied the balance of the day. Case No. 14,692f.]

Saturday, June 20, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment. Present, the same judges as yesterday.

Mr. Randolph rose to proceed with his motion, when he was interrupted by Mr. Hay, who spoke to this effect:

I have a communication to make to the court, and to the counsel of the accused. The court will recollect the answer which I received from the president, to my letter respecting certain papers. He stated in that letter that General Wilkinson's letter of the 21st October had been delivered to Mr. Rodney, the attorney general, from whom he would endeavor to obtain it. By the last mail I have received this letter from the president on the same subject.

"Washington, June 17, 1807.

"Sir: In answering your letter of the 9th, which desired a communication of one to me from General Wilkinson, specified by its date, I informed you in mine of the 12th that I had delivered it, with all other papers respecting the charges against Aaron Burr, to the attorney general when he went to Richmond; that I had supposed he had left them in your possession, but would immediately write to him, if he had not, to forward that particular letter without delay. I wrote to him accordingly on the same day, but having no answer I know not whether he has forwarded the letter. I stated in the same letter that I had desired the secretary of war to examine his office in order to comply with your further request to furnish copies of the orders which had been given respecting Aaron Burr and his property; and, in a subsequent letter of the same day, I forwarded you copies of two letters from the secretary at war, which appeared to be within the description expressed in your letter. The order from the secretary of the navy you said you were in possession of. The receipt of these papers has, I presume, so far anticipated, and others this day forwarded, will have substantially fulfilled the object of a subpœna from the district court of Richmond, requiring that those officers and myself should attend the court in Richmond, with the letter of General Wilkinson, the answer to that letter, and the orders of the department of war and the navy therein generally described. No answer to General Wilkinson's letter, other than a mere acknowledgement of its receipt in a letter written for a different purpose, was ever written by myself or any other. To these communications of papers I will add, that if the defendant suppose there are any facts within the knowledge of the heads of departments or of myself, which can be useful for his defence, from a desire of doing anything our situation will permit in furtherance of justice, we shall be ready to give him the benefit of it, by way of deposition through any persons whom the court shall authorize to take our testimony at this place. I know indeed that this cannot be done but by consent of parties, and I therefore authorize you to give consent on the part of the United States. Mr. Burr's consent will be given of course, if he suppose the testimony useful.

"As to our personal attendance at Richmond, I am persuaded the court is sensible that paramount duties to the nation at large control the obligation of compliance with its summons in this case, as it would should we receive a similar one to attend the trials of Blennerhassett and others in the Mississippi territory, those instituted at St. Louis and other places on the western waters, or at any place other than the seat of government. To comply with such calls would leave the nation without an executive branch, whose agency nevertheless is understood to be so constantly necessary that it is the sole branch which the constitution requires to be always in function. It could not, then, intend that it should be withdrawn from its station by any co-ordinate authority.

"With respect to papers, there is certainly a public and private side to our offices. To the former belong grants of land, patents for inventions, certain commissions, proclamations, and other papers patent in their nature. To the other belong mere executive proceedings. All nations have found it necessary that, for the advantageous conduct of their affairs, some of these proceedings, at least, should remain known to their executive functionary only. He, of course, from the nature of the case, must be the sole judge of which of them the public interest will permit publication. Hence, under our constitution, in requests of papers from the legislative to the executive branch, an exception is carefully expressed, 'as to those which he may deem the public welfare may require not to be disclosed,' as you will see in the inclosed resolution of the house of representatives, which produced the message of January 22d, respecting this case. The respect mutually due between the constituted authorities in their official intercourse, as well as sincere dispositions to do for every one what is just, will always insure from the executive, in exercising the duty of discrimination confided to him, the same candor and integrity to which the nation has, in like manner, trusted in the disposal of its judiciary authorities. Considering you as the organ for communicating these sentiments to the court, I address them to you for that purpose, and salute you with esteem and respect. Thos. Jefferson."

Accompanying this letter is a copy of the resolution of the house of representatives containing the exception to which the president refers. I have also received a letter from Mr. Smith, the secretary of the navy, containing an authentic copy of the order which was wanted, precisely corresponding with the unauthenticated copy in my possession.

Mr. Wickham.—I presume that these must be considered and noted as the return to the "subpœna duces tecum."

Mr. Hay.—So far as they go. When we receive General Wilkinson's, the return will be complete. I have also received a letter from the secretary of war, which contains all the orders of his department relative to Aaron Burr. All which papers I shall deposit with the clerk of this court.

The following is the order of the navy department:

"I certify that the annexed is a true copy from the records in the office of the department of the navy of the United States of the letter from the secretary of the navy to Captain John Shaw, dated 20th December, 1806. In faith whereof, I, Robert Smith, secretary of the navy of the United States of America, have signed these presents, and caused the seal of my office to be affixed hereto, at the city of Washington, this 17th day of June, Anno Domini 1807, and in the 31st year of the independence of the said sta'es.

"(Registered.) Rt. Smith."

"Secretary of the Navy.

"Ch. W. Goldsborough,

"Ch. Clk., N. D."

"Navy Department, 20th December, 1806.

"Sir: A military expedition formed on the western waters by Colonel Burr will soon proceed down the Mississippi, and by the time you receive this letter will probably be near New Orleans. You will, by all the means in your power, aid the army and militia in suppressing this enterprise. You will, with your boats, take the best position to intercept and to take, and, if necessary, to destroy, the boats descending under the command of Colonel Burr, or of any person holding an appointment under him. There is great reliance on your vigilance and exertions. I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient,

"(Signed) Rt. Smith.

"Captain John Shaw, or the Commanding Naval Officer at New Orleans."

[Thereupon the motion for attachment was brought on and argued. The argument and opinion will be found reported as Case No. 14,692f.]

On Wednesday, the 24th of June, while Mr. Botts was speaking on the motion for an attachment, the grand jury entered, when Mr. John Randolph, their foreman, addressed the court, and stated that they had agreed upon several indictments, which he handed in at the clerk's table. The clerk then read the endorsements upon them as follows: "An indictment against Aaron Burr for treason. A true bill." "An indictment against Aaron Burr for a misdemeanor. A true bill." "An indictment against Herman Blannerhasset[4] for treason. A true bill." "An indictment against Herman Blannerhassett for a misdemeanor. A true bill." The foreman then stated that the grand jury had still other subjects for their consideration, and had adjourned themselves to meet to-morrow at ten o'clock.

[4] So in the indictment. The correct spelling is "Harman Blennerhassett."

After Mr. Botts had concluded his argument, Mr. Burr addressed the court, and observed that as bills had been found against him, it was probable the public prosecutors would move his commitment. He would, however, suggest two ideas for the consideration of the court: the one was, that it is within their discretion to bail in certain cases, even when the punishment was death; and the other was, that it was expedient for the court to exercise their discretion in this instance, as he should prove that the indictment against him had been obtained by perjury.

Mr. Hay moved for the commitment of Aaron Burr. He stated that if the court had power to bail by the 33d section of the judicial act, it was only to be exercised according to their sound discretion, and that the prisoner was not to demand bail as a matter of right.

Mr. Martin said the counsel for the prosecution had admitted the right of the court to give bail according to its discretion.

Mr. MacRae did not understand from the judicial act that the discretion was to be exercised at this stage of the business, but only at the time of making the arrest.

After some further remarks by Messrs. Martin, Wirt, and Wickham, the CHIEF JUSTICE said: Mr. Martin, have you any precedents where a court has bailed for treason, after the finding of a grand jury, on either of these grounds; that the testimony laid before the grand jury had been impeached for perjury, or that other testimony had been laid before the court, which had not been in possession of the grand jury?

Mr. Martin said that he had not anticipated this case, and had not, therefore, prepared his authorities; but he had no doubt that such existed.

Mr. Burr said, if the court have no discretion, it is unnecessary to produce evidence. That question ought, therefore, to be previously settled.

Some further discussion ensued, as to the question whether the court had any discretion, when Mr. Burr said, that if the court thought it had the power to bail in any case after bill found, it would then be necessary to show that it ought to exercise its discretion in this instance. That the finding of the jury was founded on the testimony of a perjured witness. That General Tupper would prove that there had been no such resistance of his authority as had been stated by that witness.

After same further conversation between counsel, Mr. Burr wished to know whether the court would go into testimony extrinsic to the indictment.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said he had never known a case similar to the present when such an examination had taken place.[5]

[5] The court will in no instance inquire into the character of the testimony which has influenced the grand jury in finding an indictment. State v. Boyd, 2 Hill (S. C.) 288.

Mr. Martin would produce authorities if he had time allowed him.

The CHIEF JUSTICE insisted upon the necessity of producing adjudged cases to prove that the court could bail a party against whom an indictment had been found.

Mr. Burr did not wish to protract the session of the court to suit his own personal convenience. There was no time at present to look for authorities.

The CHIEF JUSTICE observed that he was then under the necessity of committing Colonel Burr.

Mr. Burr stated that he was willing to be committed, but hoped that the court had not forestalled its opinion.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—I have only stated my present impression. This subject is open for argument hereafter. Mr. Burr stands committed to the custody of the marshal.

He was accordingly committed to the gaol, and the court adjourned.

On Thursday, the 25th of June, while Mr. Hay was addressing the court on the motion for an attachment against General Wilkinson, the grand jury entered, and their foreman, Mr. John Randolph, addressed the court as follows: "May it please the court: The grand jury have been informed that there is in the possession of Aaron Burr a certain letter, with the post mark of May 13th, from James Wilkinson, in ciphers, which they deem to be material to certain inquiries now pending before them. The grand jury are perfectly aware that they have no right to demand any evidence from the prisoner under prosecution which may tend to criminate himself. But the grand jury have thought proper to appear in court to ask its assistance, if it think proper to grant it, to obtain the letter with his consent."

Mr. Burr rose and asked whether the court were about to give an opinion?

The CHIEF JUSTICE stated that the court was about to say that the grand jury were perfectly right in the opinion, that no man can be forced to furnish evidence against himself; he presumed that the grand jury wished also to know whether the person under prosecution could be examined on other questions not criminating himself?

Mr. Burr declared that it would be impossible for him, under certain circumstances, to expose any letter which had been communicated to him confidentially; how far the extremity of circumstances might compel him to such a conduct, he was not prepared to decide; but it was impossible for him even to deliberate on the proposition to deliver up anything which had been confided to his honor, unless it were extorted from him by law.

Mr. Randolph.—We will withdraw to our chamber, and when the court has decided upon the question it will announce it to the grand jury.

The CHIEF JUSTICE knew not that there was any objection to the grand jury calling before them and examining any man as a witness who laid under an indictment.

Mr. Martin said there could be no objection.

Mr. Randolph said he was afraid that the object of the grand jury had been misunderstood by the court. The grand jury had not appeared before the court to apply for the person of Aaron Burr, to obtain evidence from him, but for a certain paper which might or might not be in his possession; and upon that paper being or not being in his possession, and upon its being possible or not possible to identify that paper, it might depend whether Aaron Burr himself were or were not a material evidence before them; and then the grand jury withdrew.

When Mr. Hay had concluded his argument, Mr. MacRae addressed the court. He was solicitous he said, to lay a communication before it, on a circumstance which had lately transpired. The grand jury had asked for a certain letter in ciphers, which was supposed to have been addressed by General Wilkinson to the accused. The court had understood the ground on which the accused had refused to put it in their possession, to be an apprehension lest his honor should be wounded by his thus betraying matters of confidence. I have seen General Wilkinson, sir, since this declaration was made. I have informed him of the communication which has thus been made, and the general has expressed his wishes to me, and requested me to express those wishes, that the whole of the correspondence between Aaron Burr and himself may be exhibited before the court. The accused has now, therefore, a fair opportunity of producing this letter; he is absolved from all possible imputation; his honor is perfectly safe.

Mr. Burr.—The court will probably expect from me some reply. The communication which I made to the court, has led, it seems, to the present invitation. I have only to say, sir, that this letter will not be produced. The letter is not at this time in my possession, and General Wilkinson knows it.

Mr. MacRae hoped that notice of his communication would be sent to the grand jury.

Mr. Martin hoped that Colonel Burr's communication also would go along with it.

The CHIEF JUSTICE was unwilling to make the court the medium of such communications.

Mr. MacRae hoped the court would notify his communication to the grand jury, and for an obvious reason. When the grand jury came into court to ask for the paper, what did the accused say? Did he declare that it was not in his possession? No: he merely said that honor forbade him to disclose it. The inference undoubtedly was, that he had the paper, but could not persuade himself to disclose it. And what then must have been the impression of the grand jury? A cloud of suspicions must have fastened itself upon their minds; suspicions unjustly injurious to the character of General Wilkinson and which the present communication may at once disperse. It is but justice, therefore, to General Wilkinson, to whom the inquiries of the grand jury may at present relate, to give them the benefit of this information.

Mr. Burr.—General Wilkinson, sir, is extremely welcome to all the eclat which he may expect to derive from this challenge; but as it is a challenge from him, it is a sufficient reason why I should not accept it. But as the remarks of the last gentleman seem to convey some reproach against me, (which no man who knows me can believe me to deserve) it may be proper to say, that I did voluntarily, and in the presence of a witness, put the letter out of my hands, with the express view that it should not be used improperly against any one. I wished, sir, to disable any person, even myself, from laying it before the grand jury. General Wilkinson knows this fact.

The CHIEF JUSTICE then reduced these communications to writing, and transmitted them to the grand jury.

Mr. Burr.—Let it be understood, that I did not put this letter out of my possession because I expected the grand jury would take up this subject but from a supposition that they might do so.

Mr. Wickham, about to speak, was interrupted by the entrance of the grand jury when Mr. Randolph, their foreman, informed the court that they had agreed upon some presentments, which he then delivered into the hands of the clerk. The clerk then read as follows:

"The grand inquest of the United States, for the district of Virginia, upon their oaths, present, that Jonathan Dayton, late a senator in the congress of the United States, from the state of New Jersey; John Smith, a senator in the congress of the United States, from the state of Ohio; Comfort Tyler, late of the state of New York; Israel Smith, late of the state of New York; and Davis Floyd, late of the territory of Indiana, are guilty of treason against the United States, in levying war against the same, to wit: at Blennerhassett's Island, in the county of Wood, and state of Virginia, on the 13th day of December, 1806."

Friday, June 26, 1807.

The court met about nine o'clock, and, about ten o'clock, the grand jury entered, and Mr. Randolph, their foreman, presented ten indictments, found true bills; that is, one indictment for treason, and another for a misdemeanor, against each of the following individuals, viz.: Jonathan Dayton, John Smith, Comfort Tyler, Israel Smith, and Davis Floyd.

The CHIEF JUSTICE then made a short address to the grand jury, in which he complimented them upon the great patience and cheerful attention with which they had performed the arduous and laborious duties in which they had been so long engaged, and concluded, by discharging them from all further attendance.

The court then adjourned till twelve o'clock. As soon as it met again, Mr. Botts requested the court to remove Mr. Burr from the public gaol, to some comfortable and convenient place of confinement. He depicted, in very strong terms, the miserable state of the prison where he was then confined. The grounds of this motion are to be found in the following affidavit made by some of Mr. Burr's counsel, and laid before the court:

"We, who are counsel in the defence of Colonel Burr, at the suit of the United States, beg leave to represent to the court, that in pursuance of our duty to him, we have visited him in his confinement in the city gaol: that we could not avoid remarking the danger, which will most probably result to his health, from the situation, inconveniences and circumstances attending the place of his confinement; but we cannot forbear to declare our conviction, that we ourselves cannot freely and fully perform what we have undertaken for his defence, if he remain in the gaol aforesaid, deprived, as he is, of a room to himself, it being scarcely possible for us to consult with him upon the various necessary occasions which must occur, from all which we believe that he will be deprived of that assistance from counsel, which is given to him by the constitution of the United States, unless he be removed. Edmund Randolph.

"John Wickham.

"Benjamin Botts.

"Sworn to in open court, by Edmund Randolph, John Wickham, and Benjamin Botts, Esquires. June 25th, 1807.

"William Marshall, Clerk."

The counsel for the prosecution were perfectly silent on the motion. After a long and desultory argument by Mr. Burr's counsel, the court determined that the prisoner should be removed to his former lodgings near the capitol, provided they could be made sufficiently strong for his safe keeping, being of opinion that the act of congress authorized it, on the foregoing affidavit, to make the order of removal.

Mr. Latrobe, surveyor of the public buildings of the United States, was requested to inspect them; and upon his report the court passed the following order: "Whereupon, it is ordered, that the marshal of this district do cause the front room of the house now occupied by Luther Martin, Esq., which room has been and is used as a dining room, to be prepared for the reception and safe keeping of Colonel Aaron Burr, by securing the shutters to the windows of the said room by bars, and the door by a strong bar or padlock. And that he employ a guard of seven men to be placed on the floor of the adjoining unfinished house, and on the same story with the before described front room, and also at the door opening into the said front room; and upon the marshal's reporting to the court that the said room has been so fitted up and the guard employed, that then the said marshal be directed, and he is hereby directed, to remove to the said room, the body of the said Aaron Burr from the public gaol, there to be by him safely kept."

Mr. Hay.—My only wish is, that this prosecution should be regularly conducted. Is it not the usual practice to read the indictment first and then move for the venire?

Mr. Burr.—I have been furnished with a copy of the indictment; I have perused it and I am ready to plead not guilty to it.

Mr. Wirt.—The usual form requires the actual arraignment of the prisoner; however, the court may dispense with it, if it think proper.

Mr. Hay was indifferent about the form, if the law could be substantially executed. He supposed that a simple acknowledgment of the prisoner was sufficient, without the customary form of holding up his hand.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—It is enough, if he appear to the indictment, and plead not guilty.

The clerk then read the indictment against Aaron Burr, for treason against the United States; which specifies the place of the overt act, to be at Blennerhassett's Island; and the time, the 10th day of December, 1806.

When he had concluded, Mr. Burr addressed the court: I acknowledge myself to be the person named in the indictment. I plead not guilty; and put myself upon my country for trial.

Mr. Hay then addressed the court on the venire that was to try the issue between the prisoner and the United States. He expressed some doubt whether the 29th section of the act of congress called the judicial act [1 Stat. 88], was still in force, which required twelve jurors, at least, to be summoned from the county where the offence was committed. If this law was still in force, it would be necessary to summon twelve petit jurors from the county of Wood, which would render it impossible to have the trial at an early day.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said he had no doubt the law was still in force.

Mr. Burr said as this law was most probably intended for the benefit of the accused, he consented to waive the right.

Mr. Wirt suggested a doubt whether consent in such a case could take away error.

The CHIEF JUSTICE believed that the provision was not absolutely obligatory, if both parties would waive the right.

Mr. Hay said he felt no disposition to delay the trial; but he could not think of pledging himself to such a measure without due deliberation. He would consult the gentlemen associated with him, and inform the court of the result.

The counsel for the prosecution then retired to consult. On their return, Mr. Hay informed the court that they could not assume the responsibility of consenting to such a proposition, as the law seemed imperative. He must therefore request the court to direct a venire of twelve men, at least, to be summoned from Wood county.

A long conversation ensued as to the time that would be necessary to summon the venire from Wood county, as it would be necessary to postpone the trial accordingly; opinions varying from twenty to thirty-five days. The court made an order for a venire of forty-eight jurors, twelve of whom, at least, were to be summoned from Wood county. Without fixing the time for the trial, the court adjourned.

On Saturday, the 27th of June, an order was made postponing the trial to the third day of August, and for the return of the venire on that day.

Monday, June 29, 1807.

Mr. Hay laid the following order of the executive council before the court:

"In Council, June 29, 1807. The board being informed that an affidavit has been filed in the circuit court of the United States, for the Virginia district, which states that the gaol for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond is inconvenient and unhealthy, and so crowded with state offenders and debtors that there are no private apartments therein for the reception of persons charged with offences against the laws of the United States, it is therefore advised that the governor be requested to tender the said court, (through the federal attorney of the district of Virginia,) apartments in the third story of the public gaol and penitentiary house for the reception of such persons as shall be directed under the authority of the United States to be confined therein.

"Extract from the minutes.

"Daniel L. Hylton, Clerk of the Council."

The following was the order of the court on this subject: "Which tender the court doth accept for the purpose above mentioned."

The final decision of the motion to commit Aaron Burr to the penitentiary was postponed until to-morrow.

Tuesday, June 30, 1807.

After the court met the motion to commit Aaron Burr to the penitentiary was renewed. It was objected to by his counsel, on the ground (and an affidavit was made by them to the same effect) that in so important a case it was essentially necessary for the most uninterrupted intercourse to subsist between the prisoner and his counsel; but that the distance of the penitentiary, combined with their own professional avocations, would necessarily narrow and interrupt this intercourse. It was also said that, by particular regulations of the penitentiary, the custody of the prisoner would be transferred from the marshal to the superintendent, and that the communications of the prisoner with his counsel would be limited to the very same short period which was allowed to the other visitants: that is, from eleven to one o'clock.

The attorney for the United States replied to these objections.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said when there was a public gaol not unreasonable distant or unfit for the reception of the prisoner, and when the court was called upon on the part of the United States to commit a prisoner to its keeping, that he conceived himself bound to comply with the requisition; that when he had given the order for his removal from the gaol to his own lodgings, it was under an expectation that the trial would be prosecuted immediately, and that the intercourse between the prisoner and his counsel would be necessarily incessant; but as a postponement had taken place, such an intercourse would not be absolutely necessary: under such circumstances, therefore, he should direct the removal of the prisoner to the penitentiary, if he were still to continue in the possession of the marshal, and if his counsel were to have free and uninterrupted access to him.

Some difficulty having thus occurred on these points, the executive council was immediately convened. In a short time the following letter was submitted to the court:

"Council Chamber, June 30, 1807.

"Sir: In pursuance of an advice of the council of state, I beg leave, through you, to inform the circuit court of the United States, now sitting, that any persons who may be confined in the gaol and penitentiary house, on the part of the United States, will be considered as in the custody, and under the sole control of the marshal of the district; that he will have authority to admit any person or persons to visit the confined that he may think proper, and that he will be authorized to select for the purposes aforesaid, any apartment in the penitentiary now unoccupied, that he may deem most conducive to safety, health, and convenience. I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

"Wm. H. Cabell.

"George Hay, Esq."

The court then made the following order: "In consequence of the offer made by the executive of apartments in the third story of penitentiary and state prison, for persons who may be confined therein, under the authority of the United States, and of the foregoing letter from the governor of this commonwealth, it is ordered, on the motion of the attorney for the United States, that so soon as the apartments in the third story of the public gaol and penitentiary shall be fit for the reception and safe keeping of Aaron Burr, that he be removed thereto, and safely kept therein by the marshal, until the second day of August next, when he shall be brought back to the prison where he is now placed, there to be guarded in like manner as at present, until the further order of the court."

Monday, August 3, 1807.

On this day the circuit court of the United States for the Fifth circuit and district of Virginia, was held according to adjournment. Present: the CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States; George Hay, William Wirt, and Alexander MacRae, Esquires, counsel for the prosecution.

The prisoner was brought into court from his apartment, near the Swan Tavern, to which he had been removed on Saturday.

Edmund Randolph, John Wickham, Benjamin Botts, John Baker, and Luther Martin, Esquires, appeared as his counsel.

The court assembled at twelve o'clock. An immense concourse of citizens attended to witness the proceedings of this important trial.

Mr. Hay observed that he could take no steps in this business until he had ascertained whether the witnesses summoned on the part of the United States were present; he therefore requested that their names might be called over; they were more than one hundred in number. Their names were accordingly called.

Mr. Hay begged leave to mention that he had nothing more to submit to the court this day. There were many of the witnesses of whose places of residence he was ignorant; several had not appeared; many had been merely pointed out to him by the attorney general of the United States. He observed that, therefore, he had not yet been able to furnish Colonel Burr with a list of the witnesses, and a statement of the places of their residence, as the law requires; that, as many of those who had been summoned and recognized had failed to appear, he was not ready to proceed with the trial immediately. He also informed the court that a list of the venire had been delivered on Saturday to Colonel Burr, but had since been discovered to be inaccurate. It became, therefore, necessary (an act of congress having directed this to be done at least three days before the trial) to deliver a correct list on this day; and, of course, the trial would be postponed until the requisite time should have elapsed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE inquired, then, to what day it would be proper to adjourn the court.

Mr. Hay could not possibly state by what day he should be able to prepare his lists.

Mr. Burr observed that it was not probable that he should avail himself of any privileges to which he might be entitled from any delay in furnishing him with the list of jurors, or of any incorrectness in the list; and therefore the court might adjourn to any day which was convenient to the attorney for the United States. If the day of adjournment depended on his own consent, he should not object to any adjournment, provided it did not extend further than Wednesday.

Mr. Hay had no objection to that day.

At the instance of Mr. Hay the names of the jurors were called, when forty-six answered to their names, two only being absent.

Mr. Burr reminded the court of the motion which he had made, on a former occasion, for a subpœna duces tecum, addressed to the president of the United States. That motion had been partly complied with. He wished to know of the court whether it were not a matter of right for him to obtain a subpœna duces tecum. If it were not, he should then lay a specific motion before the court.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not believe it to be the practice in Virginia to obtain such a subpœna upon a mere application to the clerk. The motion must be brought before the court itself.

Mr. Hay said that he would say nothing on this subject until he understood the object of the application: that if it were to obtain the letter which was not formerly furnished, he would inform the opposite counsel that he had it now among his papers, and was ready to produce it.

Mr. Burr.—That is one object of the application. Another is, to obtain a certain communication from General Eaton to the president of the United States, which is mentioned in his deposition.

Mr. Hay said that he was not certain whether he had that communication, but believed that it was among his papers. If it were there, he would certainly produce it.

Mr. Burr.—But if, after a search, the gentleman finds that he has not that paper, will he consent, out of court, to issue a subpœna to the president of the United States, under the qualification I have mentioned? I wish not, at the present exigency, to derange the affairs of the government, or to demand the presence of the executive officers at this place. All that I want are certain papers.

Mr. Hay said that he could not consent to it; he would rather that a regular application should be made for it to the court.

Mr. Burr.—Then, sir, I shall move for a subpœna duces tecum, to the president of the United States, directing him to attend with certain papers. This subpœna will issue as in the former instance. I shall furnish the clerk with the necessary specification of the paper which I require.

The court was then adjourned till Wednesday, twelve o'clock.

Wednesday, August 5, 1807.

The court met, according to adjournment. Present: JOHN MARSHALL, Chief Justice of the United States.

The names of the witnesses being called over, and many being still absent, Mr. Hay was not ready to proceed. He presumed all of the witnesses would be present in a few days.

After some conversation as to the time to which the court should adjourn, Mr. Hay proposed an arrangement as to the mode of conducting the trial, in respect to the order in which counsel should speak.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said the best mode appeared to him to be this: that the case should be opened fully by one of the gentlemen on the part of the United States; then opened fully by one of the counsel on the other side; that the evidence should be next gone through, and the whole commented upon by another of the gentlemen employed by the United States, who should be answered by the rest of the counsel for Colonel Burr; and one only of the counsel for the United States should conclude the argument.

Without coming to any arrangement, the court adjourned till Friday, twelve o'clock.

Friday, August 7, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment. Present: JOHN MARSHALL, Chief Justice of the United States, and CYRUS GRIFFIN, Judge of the District of Virginia.

The witnesses were again called over, and several who had not been present before, appeared, and were recognized to attend until discharged by the court. The counsel for the United States, however, not being as well prepared to go into the trial as they expected to be, (many of their witnesses being still absent,) the trial was farther postponed, and the court adjourned until Monday next, at twelve o'clock.

In the course of this day, a difficulty was suggested by Major Scott, the marshal of the Virginia district, as arising out of the order of the court, by virtue of which Colonel Burr had been removed from the penitentiary house to his present lodgings. He stated that he had been informed from good authority, that the secretary of the treasury had declared that he would not allow his charge of seven dollars per day, for the guards employed for the safe-keeping of the prisoner; and, therefore, he might lose that sum, which he had hitherto been advancing out of his own pocket.

The CHIEF JUSTICE declared the firm conviction of the court, that the order, heretofore made, was legal and proper; that the payments made in pursuance thereof would be sanctioned by the court, and ought to be allowed by the secretary of the treasury. He could not believe that the secretary would finally disallow those items in the marshal's account. But, as the officer of the court ought not to be subjected to any risk in obeying its directions, and if the secretary should refuse to allow him a credit for the money paid, the court had no power to compel him to do so, and the situation of the marshal was such that he dared not enter into a controversy with the secretary; the court was disposed to rescind the order, unless some arrangement could be made by Colonel Burr and his counsel, for the indemnification of the marshal.

Colonel Burr declared that an offer had already been made on his part to indemnify the marshal, and that he was still ready and willing to give him satisfactory security that the money should be paid him, in case the secretary of the treasury should refuse to allow the credit.

Some desultory conversation ensued, but nothing positive was agreed upon; but it appeared to be understood that security was to be given to Major Scott, and that Colonel Burr was to remain in his apartment near the Swan Tavern.

Monday, August 10, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment.

Harman Blennerhassett was brought into court, and Mr. Hay moved that he be arraigned for treason. Mr. Botts objected, on the ground that he had not been furnished with a copy of the indictment three days previously; and he was reconducted to his prison. Four of the venire were excused on account of indisposition. The clerk informed Mr. Burr that he was at liberty to challenge such of the venire as he might object to.

Mr. Burr begged leave to inform the jurors, who were within hearing, that a great number of them may have formed and expressed opinions about him which might disqualify them from serv'ng on this occasion. He expected that, as they came up, they would discharge the duties of conscientious men, and candidly answer the questions put to them, and state all their objections against him. The deputy marshal then summoned first, Hezekiah Bucky.

Mr. Botts.—We challenge you for cause. Have you ever formed and expressed an opinion about the guilt of Colonel Burr? Mr. Bucky. I have not, sir, since I have been subpœnæd. Question. Had you before? Answer. I had formed one before in my own mind.

Mr. Hay wished that the question of the opposite counsel could assume a more precise and definite form. If this question were proposed to this man, and to every other man of the panel, he would venture to predict that there could not be a jury selected in the state of Virginia, because he did not believe that there was a single man in the state, qualified to become a juryman, who had not, in some form or other, made up, and declared an opinion on the conduct of the prisoner. The transactions in the West had excited universal curiosity; and there was no man who had not seen and decided on the documents relative to them. Do gentlemen contend that in a case so peculiarly interesting to all, the mere declaration of an opinion is sufficient to disqualify a juryman? A doctrine of this sort would at once acquit the prisoner; for where is the jury that could try him? Such a doctrine amounts to this: that a man need only to do enough to draw down the public attention upon him, and he would immediately effect his discharge. Mr. Hay concluded with a hope that the question would assume a more definite form; he should not pretend to decide the form in which it should be proposed, for that was the province of the court; it was a privilege to which every court is entitled, and one which the court had exercised in the case of James T. Callender.

Mr. Botts considered it as a misfortune ever to be deplored, that in this country, and in this case, there had been too general an expression of the public sentiment, and that this generality of opinion would disqualify many, but he had never entertained a doubt, until the gentleman for the prosecution had avowed it, that twelve men might be found in Virginia, capable of deciding this question with the strictest impartiality. He still trusted that the attorney for the United States was mistaken, that the catastrophe was not completely fixed, and that every man in the state had not pledged himself to convict Colonel Burr whether right or wrong. He was not present at the trial of James T. Callender; but all America had heard the question which was then propounded to the juryman, and that was, whether he had made up and expressed an opinion respecting the guilt of the prisoner.

Mr. Hay said that he would put Mr. Botts right as to matter of fact. The court would recollect that on the trial of Callender, the question was, not whether the juryman had formed and expressed an opinion on that case generally, but on the subject-matter that was to be tried, and contained in the indictment. The question then in the present case should be, have you formed and expressed an opinion on the point at issue: that is, whether Aaron Burr be guilty of treason? On the trial of Callender, the court would particularly recollect that Mr. John Bassett having objected to himself, because he had read the libellous publication, was actually overruled, because it was not on the book itself, but on the subject-matter of the indictment, that he was called upon to say whether he had ever expressed an opinion?

Mr. Burr declared that there was a material distinction between that and the present case. Mr. Bassett's acknowledging that he had seen the book did not disqualify him from serving on the jury; in the same manner the person who had seen a murder committed would not be an incompetent juror in the prosecution for that crime. But if a man pretended to decide upon the guilt of a prisoner, upon mere rumor, he would manifest such a levity and bias of mind as would effectually disqualify him. Mr. Bucky, however, has not yet come out completely with his declarations. Let him be further interrogated.

Mr. Hay observed that the question would still be too general and vague, if it were even to be "Have you expressed any opinion on the treason of Aaron Burr?" for the case stated in the indictment was infinitely more specific. It was treason in levying war against the United States at Blennerhassett's Island. Unless this particular allegation be proved, it defeats all the other parts of the accusation; and it was probably on this point that the juror had never made up any opinion.

Mr. Martin contended that it was the duty of every juryman to come to the trial of any case with the most perfect impartiality, and more particularly one where life and reputation were at stake; that it was a libel upon Virginia, a blot upon the whole state, to assert, that twelve men could not be found to decide such a case, with no other knowledge that what they had picked up from newspapers; that there was a material distinction between this and Callender's Case [Fed. Cas. No. 14,709]; the libel was a book in every man's hand, but does any juryman in the present case pretend to know the testimony on which this charge depends? The gentleman proposes to ask the juryman whether he has made up an opinion on Colonel Burr's treason? But it is expressly probable that most of them knew not what treason is; and though they may decide upon the guilt of Colonel Burr, they may be ignorant whether it come under the name and description of treason.

The CHIEF JUSTICE observed that it might save some altercation if the court were to deliver its opinion at the present time; that it was certainly one of the clearest principles of natural justice, that a juryman should come to a trial of a man for life with a perfect freedom from previous impressions, that it was clearly the duty of the court to obtain, if possible, men free from such bias; but that if it were not possible from the very circumstances of the case—if rumors had reached and prepossessed their judgments, still the court was bound to obtain as large a portion of impartiality as possible, that this was not more a principle of natural justice, than a maxim of the common law, which we have inherited from our forefathers, that the same right was secured by the constitution of the United States, which entitles every man under a criminal prosecution, to a fair trial by "an impartial jury." Can it be said however, that any man is an impartial juryman who has declared the prisoner to be guilty and to have deserved punishment? If it be said that he has made up this opinion, but has not heard the testimony, such an excuse only makes the case worse; for if the man has decided upon insufficient testimony, it manifests a bias that completely disqualifies himself from the functions of a juryman. It is too general a question to ask, whether he has any impressions about Colonel Burr. The impressions may be so light that they do not amount to an opinion of guilt, nor do they go to the extent of believing that the prisoner deserves capital punishment. With respect to Mr. Bassett's opinion, it was true he had read "The Prospect Before Us;" and he had declared that it was a libel, but Mr. Bassett had formed no opinion about James T. Callender's being the author. It was the same principle in the present case. If a juryman were to declare that the attempt to achieve the dismemberment of the Union, was treason, it would not be a complete objection or disqualification; but it would be the application of that crime to a particular individual; it would be the fixing it on Aaron Burr that would disable him from serving in this case. Let the counsel then proceed with the inquiry.

Mr. Botts.—Have you said that Colonel Burr was guilty of treason? Mr. Bucky.—No. I only declared that the man who acted as Colonel Burr was said to have done, deserves to be hung. Question. Did you believe that Colonel Burr was that man? Answer. I did, from what I had heard.

Mr. Hay.—I understand then, that the question proposed in Callender's Case is to be overruled?

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—My Brother, Judge GRIFFIN, does not recollect whether it particularly went to the indictment or not.

GRIFFIN, District Judge.—I think the question was "relative to the matter in issue."

Mr. Hay.—The very position that I have laid down.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—The simple question is, whether the having formed an opinion, not upon the evidence in court, but upon common rumor, renders a man incompetent to decide upon the real testimony of the case?

Mr. Wirt (addressing Mr. Bucky).—Did I understand you to say that you concluded upon certain rumors you had heard, that Colonel Burr deserved to be hung? Mr. Bucky.—I did. Question. Did you believe these rumors? Answer. I did. Question. Would you, if you were a juryman, form your opinion upon such rumors? Answer. Certainly not.

Mr. MacRae.—Did you form and express your opinion upon the question, whether an overt act of treason had been committed at Blennerhassett's Island? Answer. It was upon other rumors, and not upon that, that I had formed an opinion.

Mr. Martin submitted it to the court, whether he could be considered an impartial juryman.

THE COURT decided that he ought not to be so considered, and he was accordingly rejected.

James G. Laidly stated that he had formed and expressed some opinions unfavorable to Colonel Burr; that he could not pretend to decide upon the charges in the indictment, which he had not heard; that he had principally taken his opinions from newspaper statements; and that he had not, as far as he recollected, expressed an opinion that Colonel Burr deserved hanging; but that his impression was, that he was guilty. He was therefore set aside.

James Compton being challenged for cause and sworn, stated that he had formed and expressed an opinion from hearsay that Colonel Burr was guilty of treason, and of that particular treason of which he stood charged, as far as he understood. He was rejected.

Mr. Burr observed, that as gentlemen on the part of the prosecution had expressed a willingness to have an impartial jury, they could not refuse that any juryman should state all his objections to himself; and that he had no doubt, in spite of the contrary assertions which had been made, that they could get a jury from this panel.

Hamilton Morrison, upon being called, said that he had frequently thought and declared that Colonel Burr was guilty, if the statements which he had heard were true; that he did not know whether they were so, but only thought, from the great clamor which had been made, that it might be possible that they were true; that he had not passed any positive opinion, nor was he certain that he had always qualified it by saying, "if these things were true;" that he does not recollect to have said that Colonel Burr ought to be punished, without stating at the same time, "if he were guilty." Mr. Morrison was suspended for further examination.

Yates S. Conwell had formed and expressed an opinion, from the reports he had heard, that Colonel Burr must be guilty of high treason. He was accordingly set aside.

Jacob Beeson declared that he had for some time past formed an opinion, as well from newspaper publications as from the boats which had been built on the Ohio, that Colonel Burr was guilty; and that he himself had borne arms to suppress this insurrection. He was therefore set aside as incompetent.

William Prince declared he had nearly the same impressions as Mr. Beeson; that he too had borne arms, as well on Blennerhassett's Island as on descending the river in search of Blennerhassett. He was set aside in like manner.

Nimrod Saunders declared that he had expressed an opinion previously to his being summoned on the jury, that the prisoner had been guilty of treason. He was therefore set aside as incompetent.

Thomas Creel had no declaration to make, and he was challenged for cause. Upon being interrogated, he stated that he had never asserted that the prisoner ought to be punished; that he had said that he was a sensible man, and if there were any hole left he would creep out of it; that he had conceived that Colonel Burr had seduced Blennerhassett into some acts that were not right; that he had never positively said that Colonel Burr was guilty; that he had said that Blennerhassett was the most blamable, because he was in good circumstances and well off in life, whereas Colonel Burr's situation was desperate, and that he had little to lose; that he had not said that Colonel Burr had directly misled Mr. Blennerhassett, but through the medium of Mrs. Blennerhassett; in short, that there was no determinate impression on his mind respecting the guilt of the prisoner.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not think that this was sufficient to set him aside, and suspended his case for further examination.

Anthony Buckner had freqnently said that the prisoner deserved to be hung. He was therefore set aside.

David Creel had formed an opinion from the statements in the newspapers, and if these were true the prisoner was certainly guilty. He had expressed a belief that he was guilty of the charges now brought against him, and that he ought to be hanged. He was therefore rejected.

The above named jurors were all from Wood county.

Jurors from the body of the district:

John Horace Upshaw declared that he conceived himself to stand there as an unprejudiced juryman, for he was ready to attend to the evidence; but that as he had formed opinions hostile to the prisoner, (if opinions they can be called which are formed from newspaper testimony,) and had, he believed, frequently expressed them, that he was unwilling to subject himself to the imputation of having prejudged the cause.

Mr. Burr.—We challenge Mr. Upshaw for cause.

Mr. Hay.—Then, sir, I most seriously apprehend that we shall have no jury at all. I solemnly believe Mr. Upshaw is an intelligent and upright man, and can give a correct verdict on the evidence; and I will venture to assert, (whatever credit my friends on the other side will allow to my assertion,) that I myself could do justice to the accused. I believe that any man can who is blessed with a sound judgment and integrity. We might as well enter at once a nolle prosequi, if he is to be rejected.

Mr. Wickham.—Then according to the gentleman's doctrine, any honest man, no matter what his impressions may be, is a competent juryman. Is this agreeable to the principles of law? Does the gentleman mean to insinuate that when we object to a juryman it is for his want of honesty? No, sir, every man is subject to partialities and aversions, which may unconsciously sway his judgment. Mr. Upshaw does no doubt deem himself an impartial juryman; but Mr. Upshaw may be deceived.

After some desultory argument between Messrs. Hay and Wickham, Mr. Wirt proceeded to ask Mr. Upshaw whether he had understood him to say that notwithstanding the hostile impressions he had taken up from newspaper reports, these impressions had not received that determinate character which might entitle them to the name of opinions? Answer. I have received impressions hostile to Colonel Burr, and have expressed them with some warmth, but my impressions have not been induced by anything like evidence They were predicated on the deposition of General Eaton and the communications of General Wilkinson, to the president of the United States. I had conceived that the prisoner had been guilty of some criminal act against the public, and ought to be punished; and I believe, also, that I went on further to vindicate the conduct of those gentlemen who would appear as the principal witnesses against him, and also of the government in the measures which it had taken to suppress his plans. After some further and animated discussion on this point, Mr. Upshaw's case was suspended for subsequent examination.

William Pope declared that his impressions were nearly the same with those of the gentleman who had preceded him; that he had thought at first, from newspaper representations, that it was Colonel Burr's intention to make his fortune in the west by the settlement of lands; that when he had afterwards understood that he had formed a union with Wilkinson to proceed to Mexico, he had regarded the prisoner's conduct in such a light that, if he had proceeded to Mexico, he would have considered it as an excusable offence; but when he had afterwards understood that there was treason mixed with his projects, it was impossible for him to view his conduct without the deepest indignation. If these impressions could be called prejudices, he trusted that he should always retain them. What other sentiments could he feel against such a crime, perpetrated against the very best government on the surface of the earth? But Mr. Pope declared that from his heart he believed that he could divest himself of these unfavorable impressions, and give Colonel Burr a fair and honorable trial. He would add that, in pursuance of the spirit manifested by the constitution which required two witnesses to an overt act of treason, he should think it necessary that the evidence for the United States should be so strong as to make the scale preponderate.

Mr. Wickham.—You will not misunderstand me, Mr. Pope, when I ask you whether you have not been a candidate for your county, and whether you be not now a delegate? Answer. Yes. Question. In canvassing among the people, have you not declared that the government had acted properly in commencing this prosecution? Answer. Yes; I believe I have said generally that I thought Colonel Burr was guilty of high treason. Mr. Pope was therefore set aside.

Peyton Randolph declared that it had never been his wish or intention to shrink from the discharge of a public duty, but that he had peculiar objections to serve on this occasion, one of which only he should state. He had been enrolled and was qualified as a lawyer in this court; and he would submit it to the court whether this did not exempt, if not disqualify, him from serving?

The CHIEF JUSTICE admitted Mr. Randolph's privilege, unless there were an express interposition on the part of the prisoner to retain him and others of the venire who had privileges; for this would call a conflicting privilege into operation.

Mr. Burr said that he should be passive.

John Bowe did not recollect to have said that the prisoner was guilty of treason, but of something hostile to the peace and happiness of the United States. Upon being interrogated, he observed that he was a delegate from the county of Hanover, that there had been a competition at the last election, that he had had occasion to speak at that time of the views of the prisoner, but had always done it cautiously; had never asserted that he ought to be hung, but that he was guilty of something unfriendly to the peace of the United States.

Mr. Wickham.—You have said that the prisoner was guilty? Answer. Yes.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Did you ever make up an opinion about his levying troops and making war against the United States? Answer. Yes; but I have never expressed it.

Mr. Burr.—Take the whole together, and it amounts to an opinion of treason. Mr. Bowe has said that Colonel Burr was guilty; and of what? Of that which in Mr. Bowe's mind amounts to the definition of treason. He was therefore set aside.

John Roberts had thought and declared, from the reports in the public newspapers, that the prisoner was guilty of treason, though he had no doubt that his opinion might be changed by the production of other testimony. He was set aside as incompetent.

Joshua Chaffin excused from indisposition.

7. Jervis Storrs observed that the state of his mind was like that of the gentleman who had gone before him, (Mr. Bowe;) he was in the habit of reading newspapers, and could not but examine their statements relative to those transactions. If he could believe General Eaton's assertion, that the prisoner had threatened to turn congress out of doors, and assassinate the president, he had said, and would still say, that Colonel Burr was guilty of treason. If General Wilkinson's letter were true, he had surely been guilty of something in the West that was hostile to the interest of the United States. He did not know whether in the multifarious conversations he had had on this subject he had always expressed this opinion of his guilt with that reservation. He had very often communicated his impressions, that he was plotting some hostile designs against the United States. Mr. Storrs confessed that he might be prejudiced against the prisoner, and that he might be judging too highly of his own mind to entertain the belief that he could divest himself of all his impressions; and upon the whole, he expressed a wish not to serve. He was then rejected.

8. Miles Selden declared that it was impossible not to have entered into the frequent conversations which had occurred on this topic, and to have declared some opinion; that he had always said that Colonel Burr was guilty of something, and that if he was guilty of treason against such a government as that of the United States, he would deserve to be hung; that he could not assert that he had always accompanied his opinions with this reservation, but that he was not afraid to trust himself in the rendering of a verdict. Upon being interrogated, he said that he had frequently jested on this subject, and particularly recollected to have said in a sportive conversation with Colonel Mayo, that this was a Federal plot, and that Burr had been set on by the Federalists. Colonel Selden was therefore suspended for further consideration.

9. Lewis Truehart had said that if the reports were correct, Colonel Burr had been guilty of something inimical to the country, and that he always qualified his opinions in that manner.

Colonel Tinsley was then called in as a witness, who stated that from a conversation with Mr. Truehart, he thought that he had discovered that he had a general prepossession against Colonel Burr. He did not expect to be called on, and had no very distinct recollection of the particulars; that this was before any of the proceedings of the trial; and when he heard that he was summoned as one of the venire, he then recollected their conversation and happened casually to mention it. Mr. Truehart suspended.

William Yancey had expressed an opinion on newspaper testimony that Colonel Burr was guilty; that he had frequently said that he would believe the statements of newspapers till the contrary was proved, but that he had no doubt he should entertain a different sentiment, if other testimony were produced. He was set aside.

Thomas Prosser was next called. He said that he had made numberless declarations about Colonel Burr; that he had believed him to be guilty of a treasonable intention, but not of the overt act; on this point he had suspended his opinion, but he was rather inclined to believe that he had not committed it.

Mr. Martin.—Can this gentleman be considered as an impartial juryman, when he thus comes with his mind made up on one half of the guilt? He was suspended for further consideration.

John Staples had been under the same impressions which had been described by others; that he dared to say that he had said Colonel Burr was guilty of levying troops and making war upon the United States. He was set aside.

Edward C. Stanard acknowledged that his prejudices against Colonel Burr had been deep-rooted; that he had no doubt of the criminality of his motives, but that he had doubts of the commission of an overt act; he regretted that a man of his talents and energetic mind should be lost to his country. Upon being interrogated, he observed that he had doubts as to the overt act, because he believed him to be a man of such deep intrigue as never to jeopardize his own life till thousands fell before him. He was rejected.

Richard B. Goode was then called. I have never seen, neither do I believe that I have heard correctly, the evidence in this prosecution. From common report and newspaper information I have formed an opinion unfavorable to Colonel Burr. That opinion has been strengthened by what I have heard from the lips of Colonel Burr in this court; but without arrogating to myself more virtue than belongs to other men, if I know myself, I have formed no opinion which cannot be altered by the evidence.

Mr. Baker.—Did you not endeavor to displace Mr. Heth as captain of the Manchester cavalry, for becoming the bail of Colonel Burr? Answer. I never did. (Here sundry witnesses were directed to be called.)

Mr. Goode.—I will state the circumstance to which you allude, unless you prefer to prove it.

THE COURT.—Do so, if you please.

Mr. Goode.—On the 4th of July, 1806, I was a member of a committee with Captain Heth, appointed to prepare toasts to be drunk on that day by the Manchester cavalry. I profess to be attached to the present administration of the general government, and wished to express such a sentiment. Captain Heth declared that he had not confidence in the executive, and rather than express such a sentiment he would resign his commission. At that time, I thought Captain Heth and myself differed only as to measures, and not as to principles; and that it was an honest opinion. But in a few months after, when I understood that Captain Heth had become bail for Colonel Burr, and was his zealous friend, with whom he was neither connected nor acquainted, but a stranger, who, three years ago, would have been consigned to the grave by Captain Heth, and those thinking with him upon political subjects, and when I recollected the charge preferred against Colonel Burr, I confess that the declaration and conduct of Captain Heth made such impressions upon my mind, that I refused to trust my person with him as a military commander, and I would do it again.

Colonel Burr.—Pray, sir, did you not write a letter to Captain Heth? Answer. I did; and I have reasons to believe that that letter is in your possession, or in the possession of your counsel. You are at liberty to show it to the court, or I will repeat that part of it which relates to Captain Heth and yourself.

THE COURT.—Do, sir.

Mr. Goode.—A few weeks past, I received a letter from Captain Heth, commanding me to appear at a certain time and place, in order to take my proper command in the troop. I wrote him, in answer, that my post as a soldier would never be abandoned, and that my duty as a citizen forbade that I should silently approve of the conduct of those who had extended a favor to a traitor, which the justice of my country denied to an unfortunate debtor, or words to that effect.

Mr. Goode was then rejected.

Nathaniel Selden stated he had formed an opinion, particularly from General Eaton's deposition, that the intentions of the prisoner were hostile to the United States, but that he had also said he had seen no evidence to satisfy him that he had been guilty of an overt act. He was suspended for further consideration.

16. Esme Smock declared that he had formed and expressed an opinion that Colonel Burr had treasonable designs.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—To what time did your opinion relate?

Mr. Smock.—I formed my opinion from newspaper publications and common report; but I have constantly conceived that Colonel Burr's intentions were treasonable throughout. Mr. Wickham.—Have you ever formed an opinion that Colonel Burr was guilty of treason? Answer. I have in my own mind. He was set aside.

Richard E. Parker said that he had, like every other person, formed an opinion on that case, on newspaper statements, but he had heard very little of the evidence that may be adduced on this occasion. He had declared that if these newspaper statements were true, Colonel Burr had been guilty of some design contrary to the interest and laws of the United States. As to the doctrine of treason, he had not formed a conclusive opinion.

Mr. Burr.—I have no objection to Mr. Parker. He is therefore elected.

A desultory argument here ensued about the propriety of swearing one juryman at a time. The counsel for the prosecution opposed, the counsel for the prisoner advocated, the doctrine. The court decided that it would adhere to the practice of Virginia, and swear four jurymen at a time.

John W. Ellis said that he had no doubt the prisoner had been guilty of having treasonable designs. Whether he had proceeded to acts, he had doubt. He was suspended.

Thomas Starke, without any expectations of being summoned as a juryman, had stated his opinion to his neighbors, who had asked him questions on the subject, that Colonel Burr had been guilty of high treason. He was set aside.

William White stated that he had been in the western country in May last, and from Colonel Burr's character, and from the representations he had received of his conduct, he had been induced to say that he was guilty of treason, and that he ought to be hanged, or that hanging was too good for him. He was set aside.

William B. Chamberlaine stated that he stood in a very peculiar situation, if, as Mr. Wickham declared, any man were unfit to be a juryman who had asserted Colonel Burr to have been worthy of death. He was ready to confess that he himself came under this restriction. He had said uniformly that he had treasonable designs; but he did not now believe that Colonel Burr had committed an overt act of treason, though he believed him to be guilty of the intention. He, however, believed that he could do him justice, and that he could conscientiously pass between him and his country. He was rejected.

David Lambert wished to be excused on account of his indisposition, but the court rejected his plea. On being interrogated, he declared that he did not recollect to have formed an opinion for or against Colonel Burr. He was elected.

William Hoomes had no hesitation in saying that he had often declared his opinion that Colonel Burr was guilty of treasonable intentions, and, perhaps he might say, of treason itself. He had imbibed his impressions from everything he had seen, heard, or read. He had understood that Colonel Burr's counsel had made preparations to prove that he had disqualified himself by his own declarations. He should thank them to develop their objections.

Mr. Burr.—I assure you, sir, no such preparation has been made. He was set aside.

24. Overton Anderson said that he had often expressed an opinion that Colonel Burr's views were inimical to the United States. These opinions he had principally formed upon newspaper statements. He did not recollect that he had ever asserted him to be guilty of treason; but he had sometimes given credit to the representations which he had heard, without particularly defining the degree of guilt in which they might involve the prisoner, and thought him guilty of the charge against him, though he would not say it was treason. He was rejected.

Hugh Mercer, upon being called, said that it was his duty to state that an opinion which he had for some time past entertained of the character of Colonel Burr was unfriendly to a strictly impartial inquiry into his case; that he was entirely uninformed as to the testimony which would be introduced, and that he did not recollect to have ever expressed a positive opinion either as to his guilt or innocence. He was elected.

Jerman Baker had entertained opinions unfavorable to Aaron Burr, which he had repeatedly expressed. He had spoken them with warmth, for it was his nature to be warm. He had no doubt that the prisoner had formed very unfriendly designs against the United States, but, from his ignorance of the evidence, he could not venture to say that they had ripened into an overt act.

Mr. Burr.—What opinion have you formed of me? Answer. A very bad one, which I have expressed often when called upon, and often when not. He was set aside.

Edward Carrington, next called, said that he had formed an unfavorable opinion of the views of Colonel Burr, but these opinions were not definitive. Some had said that Colonel Burr's object was to invade the Spanish territories; others, that it was to dismember the Union. His own opinion had not been definitely fixed. There was another subject connected with this trial on which he had also expressed his opinions, and that related to the measures taken at New Orleans. His own opinion had been that it was impossible for any one at this remote scene to determine upon the state of affairs in that city; but if General Wilkinson did seriously believe what he said had been represented to him as the views of Colonel Burr, that he ought to consider it as an extreme case, and take extreme measures, and act somewhat in the manner that General Wilkinson had done. This has been the state of his mind for twelve months.

Mr. Burr.—Have you, Colonel, any prejudice of a more settled kind and ancient date against me? Colonel Carrington.—None at all.

Mr. Burr.—He is elected.

Mr. Parker said that perhaps he had been misunderstood by the court and Colonel Burr. Perhaps he was disqualified, and he wished to be distinctly understood. He said that he had expressed no deliberate opinion on the subject, yet he had believed that Colonel Burr had some designs contrary to the interests of the United States; that he had formed no opinion of the truth of those depositions, but if they were true his designs were treasonable. Mr. Parker was retained as a juror.

The four jurymen that had been elected were then called to the Book and sworn, viz.: Messrs. Parker, Lambert, Mercer, and Carrington.

Robert Haskins had expressed an opinion that Colonel Burr was guilty, but does not recollect to what extent he went. He went so far as to say he was guilty of an intention of treason, but not of an overt act. He might have said that he deserved to be hung. He was set aside.

William R. Fleming had formed and frequently expressed an opinion that Colonel Burr was guilty of treasonable intentions, and might have made a general declaration, not only as to intentions but to acts. He was set aside.

George W. Smith suggested a right to the same exemption which had been granted to Mr. P. Randolph. The court said that this privilege would be incontestible unless the prisoner should urge his conflicting privilege. Mr. Burr then requested Mr. Smith to attend to-morrow. Mr. Smith wished to be excused, as he had some important business in another court to attend to. He should, however, attend on the trial to-morrow; but it might now be proper to state the general impressions which he had received from these transactions. He had generally been solicitous to avoid an expression of his opinions; and as in such cases, where the government commences a prosecution against an individual, there is always a preponderance of prejudice against him, he himself had not only been solicitous not to declare, but even not to form an opinion. No one can, however, avoid reading representations of these things in the public papers, and he had formed and declared his impressions that Colonel Burr had entertained designs offensive to the peace and laws of the United States. What was the species of guilt he had not pretended to define, but he had concluded from the newspaper reports and the testimony which he had heard in the other end of the capital that his designs were of a military nature, and that they might amount at least to a misdemeanor. He was suspended for further consideration.

31. Armistead T. Mason had formed no deliberate opinion in regard to the actual commission of treason. But it was his deliberate opinion that Colonel Burr had designed, if not to subvert the government, at least to divide the country. He was suspended for further consideration.

32. Dabney Minor had often said that Colonel Burr's intentions were unfriendly to the United States; he had said that if he were guilty of what was charged against him he ought to be hanged, but had heard no positive testimony. Some conversation here ensued between Mr. Minor and Mr. Botts, when Mr. Minor was suspended until to-morrow.

Thus, then, of the whole venire that appeared, four only were elected and sworn, and nine were suspended till arguments should be heard on the subject, in order to aid the court to form an opinion whether they were competent jurymen or not.

Here a discussion of considerable length took place on the propriety of confining or not confining, in the custody of the marshal, the jurors already sworn, till the other eight should be sworn.

THE COURT then decided that there was no necessity for delivering the jurymen who had been or should be sworn, into the custody of the marshal, until the whole number had been impaneled and sworn.

Adjourned till Tuesday, eleven o'clock.

Tuesday, August 11, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment.

Present: MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

The CHIEF JUSTICE informed the counsel engaged in the cause that the court was ready to hear any observations on the question before them yesterday, which they might think proper to make.

Mr. Martin.—We are ready to say something relative to the situation that a juryman ought to be in to enable him properly to pass upon the case of a prisoner.

Mr. George W. Smith was the first of the jurors suspended yesterday for subsequent examination who was called. He said that he supposed himself entitled to exemption, from his profession as a practicing lawyer in this court; that by the law of the land, as long as he behaved with respect to the court and diligence to his client, he ought not to be obstructed in the pursuit of his professional duties; that though there was no express statute exempting him, yet he was exempted by the reason of the law.

Mr. Burr observed that as some real or fictitious difficulty had occurred in the selection of jurymen, he should be extremely sorry if such as were impartial should object to themselves. If Mr. Smith, however, raised such objections, he himself should submit to the decision of the court, as he wished to be perfectly passive.

Mr. Smith did not know whether he deserved such an encomium on his impartiality; but as the arrangement of his professional business, in other courts, (though not in this court at this particular time,) would not permit him to attend the trial with any convenience, he should claim the privilege of exemption, to which, in his opinion, he was entitled by law.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said that this privilege would certainly exempt Mr. Smith, unless his attendance was claimed by the prisoner; and as Colonel Burr waived his right, Mr. Smith was excused from attending.

James Henderson, of Wood county, who was absent yesterday, was next called; he was challenged for cause. On being examined by Mr. Botts, he admitted that he was not a freeholder, and was consequently set aside.

Mr. Hamilton Morrison was the next of the suspended jurymen who was called. He declared that it was with pain he should serve on the jury; that he did not wish to serve on it; that it was still more disagreeable to him, as the defendant seemed to have such imaginary thoughts against him; that he had not meddled with the prisoner's transactions, though perhaps he might have done so, had it been profitable to him. James Henderson and Mr. Neale were both examined as to what they might have heard him say on this subject, and both declared that they had heard him say nothing material.

Mr. Burr.—Have not these rumors excited a prejudice in your mind against me? Answer. I have no prejudice for or against you.

Mr. Botts.—Are you a freeholder? Answer. I have two patents for land. Question. Are you worth three hundred dollars? Answer. Yes; I have a horse here that is worth the half of it. Question. Have you another at home to make up the other half? Answer. Yes; four of them. (Here the court said that sufficient cause had not been shown against his being a proper juror.) I am surprised why they should be in so much terror of me. Perhaps my name may be a terror, for my first name is Hamilton.

Colonel Burr then observed that that remark was a sufficient cause for objecting to him, and challenged him. Mr. Morrison was therefore set aside. This was the first peremptory challenge which the prisoner made, of the thirty-five to which the law entitles him.

Thomas Creel, another of the suspended jurymen from Wood county, was next set aside by the court, because he said that he had both formed and expressed sentiments unfavorable to the prisoner.

John H. Upshaw was next called up. He stated, before he was interrogated, that he had received strong impressions against Colonel Burr, but that he believed he could find a verdict according to testimony.

The CHIEF JUSTICE wished to know whether those impressions related to the general charge of treason against the prisoner, or to what happened before, or to what circumstances?

Mr. Upshaw answered that they related to the transactions in the Western country, and added: "My opinions have changed as the lights of evidence seemed successively to appear. It was my first impression that he had nothing more in view than the settlement of the lands on the Waschita. I next supposed that he intended to attack Mexico, but that as a means of effecting that object he intended to attack New Orleans; and last of all, that his plans were of a more complicated nature, but that he never thought, till after his leaving the mouth of Cumberland, that Burr had treasonable designs, but that he could not recollect particularly the times when he formed or changed these opinions."

Mr. Wickham asked him whether, as the result of all these impressions, he did not consider Colonel Burr a dangerous man? He answered that that was his impression.

Mr. MacRae.—Have you formed or delivered an opinion that he has committed an overt act of reason, as charged in the indictment? Answer. I have not.

Mr. Martin said that he should state whether there was any bias on his mind, although he did not believe that an overt act had been committed, for if he had such bias, he was unfit for a juryman.

Mr. Baker.—Have you not, in your own county, argued in conversation, to show that Colonel Burr was guilty, and that there was strong presumptive evidence against him? Answer. I have done so, and not only supported such opinions, but have gone on to vindicate the propriety of the measures taken by the government.

Mr. Burr said that enough had appeared to show that Mr. Upshaw had taken up strong prejudices against him.

Mr. Hay asked whether such testimony as that could disqualify him as a juryman.

Mr. Upshaw said that he had been in the habit of impressing on others his prejudices, or opinions that Burr was a dangerous man to the community.

Mr. MacRae.—I beg leave to ask whether personally you have any prejudices against him? Have you any other prejudices against him, except that he has entertained treasonable designs? He answered explicitly that he had not.

Mr. Burr.—Had you not, anterior to those transactions rumored in the Western country, formed an unfavorable opinion of me?

Mr. Upshaw answered that he had before (with other persons) formed rather an unfavorable opinion against him during the presidential election, (of 1801,) though he had no positive evidence on that subject.

Here Mr. Upshaw was suspended till the general question on the doctrine of challenges should be argued.

Mr. Martin rose to proceed with his argument. He stated that it was one of the soundest principles of law that every man had a right to be tried by an impartial jury; that this right extended to all cases, civil and criminal, but that in criminal cases it was secured by the constitution in a positive and sacred manner, so that all altercation as to the meaning of the terms was rendered unnecessary.

Mr. MacRae apologized for interrupting Mr. Martin, but suggested that it would be a saving of time, first, to know the objections to all the jurors, and then to have one general argument as to all, instead of having an argument on each particular case as it might occur; that he wished to economize time, and that the experience of yesterday showed the propriety of saving time as much as possible. Evidence is now heard as to this case, and if it be argued, the court must hear arguments in the case of every other juryman. He did not see the necessity of holding twelve arguments instead of one, where the cases were precisely similar. He did not wish to prescribe to gentlemen the course of proceeding, but he really supposed that one argument would suffice for all the cases. To this the CHIEF JUSTICE assented.

Mr. Martin.—I have been repeatedly interrupted by the gentlemen, and they have found out in their infinite wisdom that we are to hold twelve arguments on this point. They talk, sir, of economy of time. They have shown a happy instance of this economy of time, when I was here on a former occasion. I know what kind of economy they wish. They wish us to be silent. They would, if they could, deprive Colonel Burr's counsel of an opportunity of defending him, that they may hang him up as soon as possible, to gratify themselves and the government.

Mr. MacRae.—That is a most unprincipled and most unfounded assertion.

Mr. Burr said that he thought the gentlemen for the prosecution were not altogether so wrong. Generally the question was, whether those gentlemen who said that they were convinced that he had treasonable intentions were impartial and proper jurymen. They had avowed their convictions as to these intentions in court, that one argument would apply to all, and if the principle were once fixed it would not be necessary to renew it in the case of each gentleman; that they had entered into the argument because they wished the principle to be settled, and then it could be applied to the particular cases.

Mr. Hay.—We wish the argument to proceed without hearing ourselves grossly insulted; without making accusations against us that are malicious and groundless. We said nothing that could give offence to the feelings of any gentleman. The gentlemen cannot say with truth that we wish to deprive them of the right of defending their client. The charge is unjust. I wish him to have a fair trial, and justice to be done, with all my heart; but I feel myself hurt, and grossly insulted, when the gentleman on the other side charges me with feelings that are disgraceful to humanity. I trust, therefore, that the arguments will no longer be conducted with such indecorum.

The CHIEF JUSTICE had hoped that no such allusions would have been made, that the government ought to be treated with respect, and that there was a delicacy to be observed on that subject from which he hoped there would be no departure hereafter.

Mr. Burr.—I rose to stop the progress of such language when up before. I had made sufficient apologies, if any were necessary, for any expressions which had been used, and I had hoped that no allusions would have been made to the subject. It will be recollected that I have constantly manifested my displeasure at such expressions. I have carefully avoided such myself, and imposed similar restraints on my counsel, and urged that the government should be treated with the utmost delicacy, though there was great provocation from the gentlemen on the part of the prosecution, which would have justified harsh terms. I hope these things will cease. On the part of my counsel I am sure they will cease.

Mr. Martin.—I have no wish to hurt the feelings of a single individual, but they have no right to hurt our feelings, and when I am so often interrupted and charged with wasting the public time, and the gentlemen still persist in their observations, I cannot repress mine.

[Mr. Martin then addressed the court at length on the qualifications of jurors. His argument, and that of the other counsel, and the opinion of the court will be found reported as Case No. 14,692g.]

The suspended jurymen were then called. John H. Upshaw was asked by the court whether he conceived that the prisoner had pursued his treasonable designs to the time charged in the indictment. Mr. Upshaw answered in the affirmative and the CHIEF JUSTICE observed that he was not qualified to serve as a juryman.

J. Bowe, Miles Selden, Lewis Truehart, William Yancey, Thomas Prosser, Nathaniel Selden, John W. Ellis, Armistead T. Mason, and Dabney Minor were successively set aside, after having been further interrogated, because, having formed an opinion as to the criminal intentions of the accused, they came within the principle of exclusion just established by the court.

Mr. Hay moved the court to award a new venire, to consist of a sufficient number to secure a certainty of supplying the deficient jurymen. He thought the "tales" might exceed the number of the original panel, and referred to Hawkins in support of that opinion. He proposed one hundred and fifty. After some remarks by various counsel and the CHIEF JUSTICE, the court awarded a panel of forty-eight, and adjourned till Thursday.

Thursday, August 13, 1807.

As soon as the court met, Mr. Burr observed that just before coming into court he had received a copy of the panel last awarded; that it was defective, in not having the places of residence annexed to the names of the jurors; that he should, perhaps, require till the day after to-morrow to examine it, which was a less time than the law allowed him for that purpose.

Some conversation ensued respecting the subpœna "duces tecum," when Mr. Hay stated that he had found General Eaton's letter among certain papers transmitted by Mr. Rodney, and had filed it with the clerk; that he had not found among them General Wilkinson's letter of the 21st October, but would seek for it.

Three of the jury summoned on the second venire, were discharged by the court, viz: General Pegram, because he was then necessarily engaged in military business, in giving the necessary orders to the officers of his brigade to get in readiness its due proportion of this state's quota of troops required by the president's proclamation, pursuant to the act of congress: Mr. Lewis, because he owned no freehold in the state of Virginia, and Mr. Moncure, on account of his indisposition. It was understood that the marshal should summon three substitutes, and that the prisoner should accept them. So that the venire was still to consist of forty-eight.

The court then adjourned till Saturday, eleven o'clock.

Saturday, August 15, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment. The jurymen summoned by the marshal were called, and all except seven answered to their names. One juror answering was excused on account of ill health.

Mr. Burr then addressed the court, and observed that the panel was now reduced to forty; and as it would be exceedingly disagreeable for him to exercise the privilege of making peremptory challenges, to which he was entitled, he would lay a proposition before the opposite counsel which would prevent this necessity, and would save one or two hours that might be otherwise unpleasantly spent. He would select eight out of the whole venire, and they might be immediately sworn, and impaneled on the jury.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said that if no objection was made it might be done, and that they might be placed at the head of the panel.

Mr. Hay observed that there could be no utility in objecting to it, as the prisoner could challenge peremptorily, and that he had no objection to this arrangement, as it would be easy for him to examine the qualifications of the eight who were selected, when they were once known.

William S. Smith then requested to be excused on account of his indisposition.

Mr. Burr observed that Mr. Smith was one of those whom he had selected, but he would be sorry to impose such a burden upon any invalid. Mr. Smith was discharged.

When Christopher Anthony was called, he observed to the court that he had uttered some expressions since he came to town which he had been told would certainly disqualify him from serving, according to the rules said to have been laid down by the court. On being interrogated as to what words he had spoken,

Mr. Burr said, perhaps the words were used through levity. Do you think they would be sufficient to warp your judgment? Answer. No.

Mr. Burr.—Then, sir, you are not disqualified.

Mr. MacRae.—State the tenor of those expressions.

Mr. Anthony.—When I first arrived here I met with an intimate friend, to whom I observed that I had come to town with a hope of being placed on this jury, and if I were, I would hang Colonel Burr at once without further inquiry.

Mr. MacRae.—Did you say so, knowing that such expressions would disqualify you? Answer. I did not; for I never expected to be put on this panel. Question. Were you serious? Answer. Far from it. I spoke in the utmost spirit of levity. Question. Have you been in the habit of reading the newspapers? Answer. I have.

Mr. MacRae proceeded to make further inquiry of him. He asked him whether he had read the depositions of Generals Wilkinson and Eaton. He answered in the affirmative. He then asked him whether those depositions had made no impression upon his mind. Hereupon, both Colonel Burr and Mr. Martin objected to this inquiry as improper.

Mr. MacRae contended that this examination was in vindication of the rights of the United States, and perfectly proper and correct, and was no more than had been done repeatedly by the prisoner.

Mr. Martin.—You have no right to disqualify any juryman for us.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Certainly the counsel for the United States may challenge for cause.

Mr. Hay was willing to take the persons selected, for he entertained no doubt of the integrity of the gentlemen who were summoned. He was willing to take them, provided they should be asked by the bench whether they were conscious of any cause which should disqualify them from serving. If they themselves were satisfied, he should be also satisfied. No man on this panel who had definitely made up his mind would conscientiously think to lay his hand on the book, and solemnly avow himself an impartial and qualified juryman.

The CHIEF JUSTICE understoood, then, that these selected eight were to pass without challenge, unless they challenged themselves. If the court were required to say, as seemed to be the wish of the prosecution, that any impressions, however slight, were sufficient cause for challenge, he would ask where they could obtain a jury? The United States had precisely the same rights as the prisoner had, and were entitled to make the same challenges for good cause. He then addressed those eight jurymen who were placed at the head of the panel, thus: "Gentlemen, if you have made up and expressed any opinion either for or against the accused you ought to express it."

Mr. Burr.—The law presumes every man to be innocent until he have been proved to be guilty. According to the rules of law, it is therefore the duty of every citizen who serves on this jury to hold himself completely unbiased. It is no disqualification, then, for a man to come forward and declare that he believes me to be innocent.

CHIEF JUSTICE.—The law certainly presumes every man to be innocent till the contrary be proved; but if a juryman give an opinion in favor of the prisoner he must be rejected.

When Christopher Anthony was called to the book, he stated that he was in court the other day when the first venire was investigated; that it would be extremely unpleasant to serve on the jury; and that his general opinions had been precisely the same that had disqualified (as he understood) several other gentlemen. Mr. Anthony's objections were overruled.

John M. Sheppard.—I, too, feel myself disqualified for passing impartially between the United States and Aaron Burr. From the documents that I have seen, particularly the depositions of Generals Wilkinson and Eaton, I have believed, and do still believe, that his intentions were hostile to the peace and safety of the United States; in short, that he had intended to subvert the government of the United States. It would be inflicting a wound on my own bosom to be compelled to serve under my present impressions. Mr. Sheppard observed that considerations of a private nature had also borne upon his mind, for he had a child at home extremely sick.

Mr. Burr.—Notwithstanding Mr. Sheppard's impressions, I could rely upon his integrity and impartiality As to his private considerations, I do not wish wantonly to wound his feelings. I must request him, therefore, to sit down for a moment, until we shall ascertain whetner we can make a jury without him.

Mr. Hay.—Has the court understood the extent of Mr. Sheppard's declarations?

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—If the prisoner's counsel waive the right of challenge, there is an end of it.

James Sheppard was then called, who made no further declarations.

Reuben Blakeley.—I have made up no opinions either way, positively, on this subject.

Doctor John Fitzgerald.—It is incumbent on me to state to the court that I have formed and delivered an opinion unfavorable to Colonel Burr. My opinion has been founded upon the depositions of Generals Eaton and Wilkinson, and other newspaper publications, and it is that Colonel Burr's intentions were hostile and treasonable against the United States. On which account I am very unwilling to serve, lest I should possess that bias upon my mind which is unbecoming a juryman. Mr. Fitzgerald was requested to sit down for a few moments.

Miles Bott.—From the affidavits of Generals Wilkinson and Eaton, my opinion has been completely made up for several months past.

Mr. Martin.—I suppose you have only taken up a prejudice on the supposition that the facts stated were true.

Mr. Bott.—I have gone as far as to declare that Colonel Burr ought to be hanged.

Mr. Burr.—Do you think that such declarations would now influence your judgment? Would not the evidence alter your opinion? Answer. Human nature is very frail. I know that the evidence ought, but it might or might not influence me. I have expressed myself in this manner perhaps within a fortnight, and I do not consider myself a proper juryman.

Mr. Burr.—It will be seen either that I am under the necessity of taking men in some degree prejudiced against me, or of having another venire. I am unwilling to submit to the further delay of other "tales," and I must therefore encounter the consequences. I will take Mr. Bott under the belief that he will do me justice.

Four jurymen then having been selected, three were sworn. Mr. C. Anthony affirmed.

When Henry E. Coleman was called, he stated that he had conceived and expressed an opinion that the designs of Colonel Burr were always enveloped in mystery, and inimical to the United States; and when informed by the public prints that he was descending the river with an armed force, he had felt as every friend of his country ought to feel.

Mr. Burr.—If, sir, you have completely prejudiced my case—

Mr. Coleman.—I have not. I have not seen the evidence.

Mr. Burr.—That is enough, sir. You are elected.

Mr. Hay then suggested to the court the propriety of not swearing all the jury this day, as it would subject them to the inconvenience of an unnecessary confinement in their own room to-morrow (Sunday). Would it not be better for Mr. Marshall (the clerk) to swear three only out of the remaining four? The court might then impanel the whole on Monday, and proceed immediately to business.

Mr. Burr had no objections to this measure, but hoped that the court would enjoin them not to hold any conversations on the subject of the trial.

John Curd, upon being called, stated that he had no prejudices for or against the prisoner, but that he was bound in candor to inform the court that he was afflicted by a disorder (a palpitation of the heart) which was irregular in its attacks, but was sometimes very sudden and violent, and rendered him entirely incapable of business, and if he were sworn on the jury, it might interrupt and delay the progress of the cause. He was excused.

Isham Godwin had formed and declared a uniform opinion of Colonel Burr's guilt. If he were impaneled he should be under a strong impression that Colonel Burr was guilty of treason. Suspended.

Samuel Allen had for several months made up an opinion unfavorable to the prisoner. Suspended.

Benjamin Graves had not formed an opinion, and gave a long history of his domestic and family engagements to excuse himself from serving. He was asked whether he could not make some arrangements of this business between this time and Monday, calculated to remove all the inconvenience of his serving. Mr. Graves could not positively say.

Mr. Burr then observed that the two jurors who had been selected might be sworn, The other two might be selected on Monday. And Messrs. Coleman and Graves were accordingly sworn.

Mr. Burr hoped that the marshal would direct all the necessary preparations to be made for the accommodation of the jury, who would be confined to their own chamber after Monday.

Colonel Thomas Branch was then excused from serving because he was engaged in military business.

The CHIEF JUSTICE requested the jury and the remaining members of the venire to attend on Monday, at twelve o'clock, and enjoined them to hold, in the mean time, no communication on this subject with any person.

Mr. Hay stated that he was satisfied, from some expressions which he had heard from Mr. Munford, of Powhatan, at the moment of his summons, that the prisoner would himself object to him.

Mr. Burr was satisfied with the attorney's word, and Mr. Munford was accordingly discharged.

Mr. Burr was sorry to be importunate, but he was under the necessity of mentioning once more the letter of the 21st October. He wished to know whether the attorney had yet found it amongst his papers, or whether he could point to any other means of obtaining it.

Mr. Hay had examined two bundles of papers transmitted to him by Mr. Rodney, but he had not found it. There were other papers which he had yet to examine. He had, however, a copy of the original letter.

Mr. Burr.—Where is this copy from? From Washington or from General Wilkinson?

Mr. Hay.—It is from General Wilkinson. He has, however, written it from the original.

Mr. Burr.—I shall not accept of his copy; but I will state this proposition to the attorney: If he do not find this letter by Monday, will he consent that I obtain a subpœna duces tecum?

Mr. Hay.—I have no objection.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—I suppose an order may be made to issue a subpœna duces tecum addressed to the attorney general of the United States, in case the letter be not found.

Mr. Hay.—I have no objection.

The court then adjourned till Monday, twelve o'clock.

Monday, August 17, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment.

Charles Lee, appeared as counsel for the prisoner.

The names of the selected jurors and of the venire were then called over. After which, John M. Sheppard, and Richard Curd were selected to complete the panel, and sworn. The following is, therefore, a complete list of the petit jury: Edward Carrington, David Lambert, Richard E. Parker, Hugh Mercer, Christopher Anthony, James Sheppard, Reuben Blakey, Benjamin Graves, Miles Bott, Henry E. Coleman, John M. Sheppard, Richard Curd.

Proclamation then having been made in due form, the prisoner standing up, the clerk addressed the jury in the usual form, and read the indictment in the words following:

"Virginia District. In the Circuit Court of the United States of America in and for the Fifth Circuit and Virginia District. The grand inquest of the United States of America, for the Virginia district, upon their oath, do present, that Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York, and state of New York, attorney at law, being an inhabitant of, and residing within the United States, and under the protection of the laws of the United States, and owing allegiance and fidelity to the same United States, not having the fear of God before his eyes, nor weighing the duty of his said allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, wickedly devising and intending the peace and tranquility of the same United States to disturb and to stir, move, and excite insurrection, rebellion and war against the said United States, on the tenth day of December, in the year of Christ, one thousand eight hundred and six, at a certain place called and known by the name of 'Blannerhassett's Island,' in the county of Wood, and district of Virginia aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with force and arms, unlawfully, falsely, maliciously and traitorously did compass, imagine and intend to raise and levy war, insurrection and rebellion against the said United States, and in order to fulfil and bring to effect the said traitorous compassings, imaginations and intentions of him the said Aaron Burr, he, the said Aaron Burr, afterwards, to wit, on the said tenth day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and six, aforesaid, at the said island called 'Blennerhassett's Island' as aforesaid, in the county of Wood aforesaid, in the district of Virginia aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with a great multitude of persons whose names at present are unknown to the grand inquest aforesaid, to a great number, to wit: to the number of thirty persons and upwards, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, that is to say, with guns, swords and dirks, and other warlike weapons, as well offensive as defensive, being then and there unlawfully, maliciously and traitorously assembled and gathered together, did falsely and traitorously assemble and join themselves together against the said United States, and then and there with force and arms did falsely and traitorously, and in a warlike and hostile manner, array and dispose themselves against the said United States, and then and there, that is to say, on the day and in the year aforesaid, at the island aforesaid, commonly called 'Blannerhassett's Island,' in the county aforesaid of Wood, within the Virginia district and the jurisdiction of this court, in pursuance of such their traitorous intentions and purposes aforesaid, he, the said Aaron Burr, with the said persons so as aforesaid, traitorously assembled and armed and arrayed in manner aforesaid, most wickedly, maliciously and traitorously did ordain, prepare and levy war against the said United States, contrary to the duty of their said allegiance and fidelity, against the constitution, peace and dignity of the said United States, and against the form of the act of the congress of the said United States in such case made and provided. And the grand inquest of the United States of America, for the Virginia district, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present that the said Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York, and state of New York, attorney at law, being an inhabitant of, and residing within the United States, and under the protection of the laws of the United States, and owing allegiance and fidelity to the same United States, not having the fear of God before his eyes, nor weighing the duty of his said allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, wickedly devising and intending the peace and tranquility of the said United States to disturb, and to stir, move and excite insurrection, rebellion and war against the said United States, on the eleventh day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and six, at a certain place called and known by the name of 'Blannerhassett's Island,' in the county of Wood and district of Virginia aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with force and arms unlawfully, falsely, maliciously and traitorously did compass, imagine and intend to raise and levy war, insurrection and rebellion against the said United States; and in order to fulfil and bring to effect the said traitorous compassings, imaginations and intentions of him, the said Aaron Burr, he, the said Aaron Burr, afterwards, to wit: on the said last mentioned day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and six aforesaid, at a certain place commonly called and known by the name of 'Blannerhassett's Island,' in the said county of Wood, in the district of Virginia aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with one other great multitude of persons whose names at present are unknown to the grand inquest aforesaid, to a great number, to wit: to the number of thirty persons and upwards, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, that is to say, with guns, swords and dirks, and other warlike weapons, as well offensive as defensive, being then and there unlawfully, maliciously and traitorously assembled and gathered together, did falsely and traitorously assemble and join themselves together against the said United States, and then and there with force and arms did falsely and traitorously, and in a warlike and hostile manner, array and dispose themselves against the said United States, and then and there, that is to say, on the day and in the year last mentioned, at the island aforesaid, in the county of Wood aforesaid, in the Virginia district, and within the jurisdiction of this court, in pursuance of such their traitorous intentions and purposes aforesaid, he, the said Aaron Burr, with the said persons so as aforesaid traitorously assembled, and armed and arrayed in manner aforesaid, most wickedly, maliciously and traitorously did ordain, prepare and levy war against the said United States, and further to fulfil and carry into effect the said traitorous compassings, imaginations and intentions of him the said Aaron Burr, against the said United States, and to carry on the war thus levied as aforesaid against the said United States, the said Aaron Burr, with the multitude last mentioned, at the island aforesaid, in the said county of Wood, within the Virginia district aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did array themselves in a warlike manner, with guns and other weapons, offensive and defensive, and did proceed from the said island down the river Ohio in the county aforesaid, within the Virginia district and within the jurisdiction of this court, on the said eleventh day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and six aforesaid, with the wicked and traitorous intention to descend the said river and the river Mississippi, and by force and arms traitorously to take possession of a city commonly called New Orleans, in the territory of Orleans, belonging to the United States, contrary to the duty of their said allegiance and fidelity, against the constitution, peace and dignity of the said United States, and against the form of the act of the congress of the United States in such case made and provided.

"Hay, Attorney of the United States, for the Virginia District.

"Indorsed: A true bill. John Randolph.

"A copy. Teste, William Marshall, Clerk."

After the indictment was read, Mr. Hay requested that the jury should be furnished with implements necessary to enable them to take notes on the evidence, and also on the arguments if they should think proper; that as the cause was important, and would require all their attention, it would be proper to afford them this assistance. This was accordingly done.

Mr. Hay then opened the case to the jury.

After some introductory remarks exculpating himself and his associates from charges which he said had been thrown out, that they had indulged in an intemperate zeal against the prisoner, and some general observations on the obligations and duties of jurors, he proceeded to give at length his views of the law of treason, as applicable to this case. He said that in Great Britain there are no less than ten different species of treason, but in this country, where the principle is established by the constitution, there are only two descriptions of treason, and the number never can be increased by the legislature. The constitution declares that, "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." With respect to the latter description, there was no occasion to say anything, as the offence charged in the indictment was "levying war against the United States." The constitution also provided that, "no person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." The only question, therefore, which would present itself to their view at this stage of the proceeding, was, what shall constitute an overt act of levying war against the United States? What is in law an overt act of levying war? It is obvious that the interval between the first movement towards a conspiracy and actual hostilities is immense. There may be a conspiracy to "levy war;" but this is not treason. Individuals may meet together and traitorously determine to make dispositions to bring forces into the field, and levy war against their country; this is a conspiracy, but not treason. The conspirators may go a step further; they may not only project a plan for "levying war," but they may enlist troops for the purpose of prosecuting their traitorous designs; but this is not an overt act. It has been decided by the supreme court of the United States that the persons concerned in this conspiracy may yet take one step further, and be on the safe side of the line which separates conspiracy from treason. It has been adjudged that the individuals engaged in the treason may proceed to a place of rendezvous. But common sense and principles founded on considerations of national safety certainly require that the crime of treason should be completed before the actual commission of hostilities against the government. Actual force is not necessary to constitute the crime of treason. An assemblage of men convened for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable design, which force is intended to be employed before their dispersion, is treasonable, and the persons engaged in it are traitors. He claimed that this was the principle settled by the supreme court in the Cases of Bollman and Swartwout [4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 75], in which the following words occur: "It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of this crime who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, are to be considered as traitors; but there must be an actual assembling of men to constitute a levying of war."

He further insisted, that it was not only not necessary that the persons so assembled should proceed to hostilities, but it was not necessary that they should be armed, or appear in military array. Permit me, said he, to examine the question on principles of common sense; for in legal discussions we do not always carry common sense along with us, from the beginning to the end. Suppose a number of men were assembled on Blennerhassett's Island—suppose (which I believe was not the fact) that they had no arms, but that they meet there for the purpose of descending the Ohio and the Mississippi for the purpose of seizing upon New Orleans. They calculate upon meeting their leader at the mouth of the Cumberland river; and they are told that either there or at Baton Rouge they are to get arms. They have no arms on the Island, or on the river; but would it not be an absurdity, and a violation of the principles of common sense, to say that they are not traitors because of this simple circumstance? The supreme court, he said, in giving a definition of treason, had not said a single word about the necessity of arms; but if he had read the decision right, had said that arms were not necessary. He referred to English authorities to show that in Great Britain, under the statute of 25 Edw. III. in which treason by levying war is defined in the very same words used in our constitution, the crime may be committed without arms. Fost. Crown Law, 208; 1 East, Crown Law, 67. He then discussed at length the proposition, that no actual hostility, no force or violence whatever, was necessary to the consummation of an overt act of levying war. The act was complete, he contended, the moment that a number of persons assembled together with a traitorous design to attain an object, the attainment of which would be treason. He admitted that there were some expressions used by Judge Chase in the trial of Fries from which it might be inferred force was necessary to make the treason. But he thought the subject was not distinctly before the court, and therefore his opinion was extra-judicial. At all events, he was only a single judge, and his opinion could not prevail against that of the supreme court in session; and he contended that the doctrine that force or military array was necessary was not warranted by the decision of that court. He claimed that his position on this point was consistent with the English adjudications, and cited Fost. Crown Law, 211–218; 1 East, Crown Law, 67; 1 Hale, P. C. 146. He argued that there was no "constructive treason" involved in this doctrine. He then reviewed the facts as he expected them to be disclosed by the evidence, and claimed that they would show, first, that there was a treasonable design in the transactions about to be examined: secondly, that there was an assemblage of men for the purpose of effecting that object. He concluded by invoking the jury to enter upon the examination with calmness and impartiality, to do justice, and decide the case according to the evidence which would be brought before them.

On the conclusion of Mr. Hay's speech the question how long the court ought to be occupied each day was introduced, when Mr. Burr expressed a wish that the court should meet at as early and adjourn at as late an hour as possible. He referred to trials in England, in which the court sat twelve and sixteen hours every day, and proposed that the court should sit ten or twelve hours each day. This was opposed as too long, fatiguing and oppressive, in such warm weather.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said the court had no wish on the subject, but was willing to consult the convenience of the gentlemen of the bar, and the accommodation of the jury.

It was finally determined that the court should meet at nine o'clock in the morning, and sit till four in the afternoon.

Mr. Hay proceeded to the examination of the evidence on the part of the United States. General William Eaton was sworn, when Mr. Burr objected to this order of examining the witnesses.

[The argument on the question consumed the balance of the day. The chief justice rendered an opinion on the following day (Tuesday August 18, 1807), which will be found reported as Case No. 14,692h.]

General William Eaton was then called to give his evidence. He inquired whether he might be permitted to have a recurrence to his notes.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Were they written by yourself?

Mr. Eaton. They were taken and copied by me from others, which are at my lodgings.

Mr. Burr's counsel objected, unless he had the original notes.

Mr. Wickham.—At what time were they taken?

Mr. Eaton. At different times.

Mr. Burr.—What is the nature of them? Answer. They are nothing but memoranda, taken from notes which I made of the conversations between you and myself at the times when they passed.

THE COURT decided that they were not admissible.

Mr. Eaton. May I ask one further indulgence from the court? I have been long before the public. Much stricture and some severity have passed upon me. May I, in stating my evidence, be permitted to make some explanation about the motives of my own conduct?

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Perhaps it would be more correct for the court to decide upon the propriety of the explanation when the particular case occurs. Some cases may require it; and if any objection be made to your explanation, then the court will decide upon it.

Mr. Eaton. Concerning an overt act which goes to prove Aaron Burr guilty of treason, I know nothing.

Mr. Hay.—I wish you to state to the court and jury the different conversations you have had with the prisoner.

Mr. Eaton. Concerning certain transactions which are said to have happened at Blennerhassett's Island, or any agency which Aaron Burr may be supposed to have had in them, I know nothing. But concerning Colonel Burr's expressions of treasonable intentions I know much, and it is to these that my evidence relates.

Mr. Martin.—I know not how far the court's opinion extends.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—It is this: that any proof of intention formed before the act itself, if relevant to the act, may be admitted. One witness may prove the intention at one time, and another may prove it at another, so as to prove the continuance of the intention throughout the whole transaction, and therefore the proof of very remote intentions may be relevant to this particular act.

Mr. Martin.—I trust that when he speaks of a treasonable intention not applicable to this act the court will stop him.

Mr. Wickham.—If I understand the opinion of the court correctly, it relates to treason charged to be committed in Virginia, and evidence of acts out of it is inadmissible.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—The intention to commit this crime, to erect an empire in the West, and seize New Orleans, may be shown by subsequent events to have been continued; and facts out of the district may be proved, after the overt act, as corroborative testimony.

Mr. Eaton. During the winter of 1805–6, (I cannot be positive as to the distinct point of time, yet during that winter,) at the city of Washington, Aaron Burr signified to me that he was organizing a military expedition to be moved against the Spanish provinces on the southwestern frontiers of the United States; I understood under the authority of the general government. From our existing controversies with Spain, and from the tenor of the president's communications to both houses of congress, a conclusion was naturally drawn that war with that power was inevitable. I had just then returned from the coast of Africa, and having been for many years employed on your frontier, or a coast more barbarous and obscure, I was ignorant of the estimation in which Colonel Burr was held by his country. The distinguished rank he held in society, and the strong marks of confidence which he had received from his fellow citizens, did not permit me to doubt of his patriotism. As a military character, I had been made acquainted with none within the United States under whose direction a soldier might with greater security confide his honor than Colonel Burr. In case of my country's being involved in a war, I should have thought it my duty to obey so honorable a call as was proposed to me. Under impressions like these I did engage to embark myself in the enterprise, and pledged myself to Colonel Burr's confidence. At several interviews it appeared to be his intention to convince me, by maps and other documents, of the feasibility of penetrating to Mexico. At length, from certain indistinct expressions and innuendoes, I admitted a suspicion that Colonel Burr had other projects. He used strong expressions of reproach against the administration of the government; accused them of want of character, want of energy, and want of gratitude. He seemed desirous of irritating my resentment by dilating on certain injurious strictures I had received on the floor of congress on account of certain transactions on the coast of Tripoli, and also on the delays in adjusting my accounts for advances of money on account of the United States, and talked of pointing out to me modes of honorable indemnity. I will not conceal here that Colonel Burr had good reasons for supposing me disaffected towards the government; I had indeed suffered much from delays in adjusting my accounts for cash advanced to the government whilst I was consul at Tunis, and for the expense of supporting the war with Tripoli. I had but a short time before been compelled ingloriously to strike the flag of my country on the ramparts of a defeated enemy, where it had flown for forty-five days. I had been compelled to abandon my comrades in war on the fields, where they had fought our battles. I had seen cash offered to the half-vanquished chief of Tripoli, (as he had himself acknowledged,) as the consideration of pacification.

Mr. Wickham.—By whom?

Answer. By our negotiator, when as yet no exertion had been made by our naval squadron to coerce that enemy. I had seen the conduct of the author of these blemishes on our then proud national character, if not commended—not censured; whilst my own inadequate efforts to support that character were attempted to be thrown into shade. To feelings naturally arising out of circumstances like these, I did give strong expression. Here I beg leave to observe, in justice to myself, that however strong those expressions, however harsh the language I employed, they would not justify the inference that I was preparing to dip my sabre in the blood of my countrymen, much less of their children, which I believe would have been the case had this conspiracy been carried into effect.

Mr. Martin objected to this language.

I listened to Colonel Burr's mode of indemnity; and as I had by this time begun to suspect that the military expedition he had on foot was unlawful, I permitted him to believe myself resigned to his influence that I might understand the extent and motive of his arrangements. Colonel Burr now laid open his project of revolutionizing the territory west of the Allegany, establishing an independent empire there; New Orleans to be the capital, and he himself to be the chief; organizing a military force on the waters of the Mississippi, and carrying conquest to Mexico. After much conversation which I do not particularly recollect respecting the feasibility of the project, as was natural, I stated impediments to his operations; such as the republican habits of the citizens of that country, their attachment to the present administration of the government, the want of funds, the opposition he would experience from the regular army of the United States stationed on that frontier, and the resistance to be expected from Miranda, in case he should succeed in republicanizing the Mexicans. Colonel Burr appeared to have no difficulty in removing these obstacles. He stated to me that he had in person, (I think the preceding season,) made a tour through that country, that he had secured to his interests and attached to his person, (I do not recollect the exact expression, but the meaning, and I believe the words were,) the most distinguished citizens of Tennessee, Kentucky, and the territory of Orleans; that he had inexhaustible resources and funds; that the army of the United States would act with him; that it would be reinforced by ten or twelve thousand men from the above mentioned states and territory; that he had powerful agents in the Spanish territory, and "as for Miranda," said Mr. Burr, facetiously, "we must hang Miranda." In the course of several conversations on this subject, he proposed to give me a distinguished command in his army; I understood him to say the second command. I asked him who would command in chief. He said, General Wilkinson. I observed that it was singular he should count upon General Wilkinson; the distinguished command and high trust he held under government, as the commander-in-chief of our army, and as governor of a province, he would not be apt to put at hazard for any prospect of precarious aggrandizement. Colonel Burr stated that General Wilkinson balanced in the confidence of his country; that it was doubtful whether he would much longer retain the distinction and confidence he now enjoyed; and that he was prepared to secure to himself a permanency. I asked Colonel Burr if he knew General Wilkinson. He said, yes; and echoed the question. I told him that twelve years ago I was at the same time a captain in the wing of the legion of the United States which General Wilkinson commanded, his acting brigade-major, and aide-de-camp, and that I thought I knew him well. He asked me what I knew of General Wilkinson? I said I knew General Wilkinson would act as lieutenant to no man in existence. "You are in an error," said Mr. Burr, "Wilkinson will act as lieutenant to me." From the tenor of much conversation on this subject, I was prevailed on to believe that the plan of revolution meditated by Colonel Burr, and communicated to me, had been concerted with General Wilkinson, and would have his co-operation; for Colonel Burr repeatedly and very confidently expressed his belief that the influence of General Wilkinson with his army, the promise of double pay and rations, the ambition of his officers, and the prospect of plunder and military achievements, would bring the army generally into the measure. I pass over here a conversation which took place between Colonel Burr and myself respecting a central revolution, as it is decided to be irrelevant by the opinion of the bench.

Mr. Hay.—You allude to a revolution for overthrowing the government at Washington, and of revolutionizing the Eastern states.

I was passing over that, to come down to the period when I supposed he had relinquished that design, and adhered to the project of revolutionizing the West.

Mr. Wickham.—What project do you mean?

Answer. A central general revolution. I was thoroughly convinced myself that such a project was already so far organized as to be dangerous, and that it would require an effort to suppress it. For in addition to positive assurances that Colonel Burr had of assistance and co-operation, he said that the vast extent of territory of the United States west of the Allegany Mountains, which offered to adventurers, with a view on the mines of Mexico, would bring volunteers to his standard from all quarters of the Union. The situation which these communications, and the impressions they made upon me, placed me in, was peculiarly delicate. I had no overt act to produce against Colonel Burr. He had given me nothing upon paper; nor did I know of any person in the vicinity who had received similar communications, and whose testimony might support mine. He had mentioned to me no person as principally and decidedly engaged with him but General Wilkinson; a Mr. Alston, who, I afterwards learned, was his son-in-law; and a Mr. Ephraim Kibby, who, I learnt, was late a captain of rangers in Wayne's army. Of General Wilkinson, Burr said much, as I have stated; of Mr. Alston, very little, but enough to satisfy me that he was engaged in the project; and of Kibby, he said that he was brigade-major in the vicinity of Cincinnati, (whether Cincinnati in Ohio or in Kentucky I know not,) who had much influence with the militia, and had already engaged the majority of the brigade to which he belonged, who were ready to march at Mr. Burr's signal. Mr. Burr talked of this revolution as a matter of right, inherent in the people, and constitutional; a revolution which would rather be advantageous than detrimental to the Atlantic states; a revolution which must eventually take place, and for the operation of which the present crisis was peculiarly favorable. He said there was no energy to be dreaded in the general government, and his conversations denoted a confidence that his arrangements were so well made that he should meet with no opposition at New Orleans, for the army and chief citizens of that place were now ready to receive him. On the solitary ground upon which I stood, I was at a loss how to conduct myself, though at no loss as respected my duty. I durst not place my lonely testimony in the balance against the weight of Colonel Burr's character, for by turning the tables upon me, which I thought any man, capable of such a project, was very capable of doing, I should sink under the weight. I resolved therefore with myself to obtain the removal of Mr. Burr from this country, in a way honorable to him; and on this I did consult him, without his knowing my motive. Accordingly I waited on the president of the United States, and after a desultory conversation in which I aimed to draw his view to the westward, I took the liberty of suggesting to the president that I thought Colonel Burr ought to be removed from the country because I considered him dangerous in it. The president asked where we should send him? Other places might have been mentioned, but I believe that Paris, London and Madrid were the places which were particularly named. The president, without positive expression, (in such a matter of delicacy,) signified that the trust was too important, and expressed something like a doubt about the integrity of Mr. Burr. I frankly told the president that perhaps no person had stronger grounds to suspect that integrity than I had; but that I believed his pride of ambition had so predominated over his other passions, that when placed on an eminence, and put on his honor, a respect to himself would secure his fidelity. I perceived that the subject was disagreeable to the president, and to bring him to my point in the shortest mode, and at the same time point to the danger, I said to him that I expected that we should in eighteen months have an insurrection, if not a revolution, on the waters of he Mississippi. The president said he had too much confidence in the information, the integrity, and attachment to the Union of the citizens of that country, to admit any apprehensions of that kind. The circumstance of no interrogatories being made to me I thought imposed silence upon me at that time and place. Here, sir, I beg indulgence to declare my motive for recommending that gentleman to a foreign mission at that time; and in the solemnity with which I stand here, I declare that Colonel Burr was neutral in my feelings; that it was through no attachment to him that I made that suggestion, but to avert a great national calamity which I saw approaching; to arrest a tempest which seemed lowering in the West, and to divert into a channel of usefulness those consummate talents which were to mount "the whirlwind and direct the storm." These, and these only, were my reasons for making that recommendation. About the time of my having waited on the president, or a little before, (I cannot, however, be positive whether before or after,) I determined at all events to have some evidence of the integrity of my intentions, and to fortify myself by the advice of two gentlemen, members of the house of representatives, whose friendship and confidence I had the honor long to retain, and in whose wisdom and integrity I had the utmost faith and reliance. I am at liberty to give their names if required. I do not distinctly recollect, but I believe that I had a conversation with a senator on the subject. I developed to them all Mr. Burr's plans. They did not seem much alarmed.

Mr. Martin objected to the witness stating any of the observations of other persons to himself.

After some desultory conversation between the counsel on both sides, the CHIEF JUSTICE said that though more time was wasted by stopping the witness than by letting him tell his story in his own way, yet if it were required he must be stopped when he gave improper testimony. He then told the witness, "You are at liberty to vindicate yourself, but declarations of other gentlemen are not to be mentioned, because that certainly would be improper."

Mr. Eaton.—I did ask indulgence of the court to make such explanations, because perversions of my conduct were before the public. But I waive this indulgence, contented with meeting these perversions at some other time and place.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—You have used that indulgence.

Mr. Eaton.—Little more passed between Colonel Burr and myself relevant to this inquiry while I remained at Washington. Though I could perceive symptoms of distrust in him towards me, he was solicitous to engage me in his western plans. I returned to Massachusetts, to my own concerns, and thought no more of Colonel Burr, or his projects, or revolutions, until in October last a letter was put into my hands at Brumfield, from Mr. Belknap, of Marietta, to T. E. Danielson, of Brumfield, stating that Mr. Burr had contracted for boats, which were building on the Ohio.

Mr. Burr.—Have you that letter?

Mr. Eaton.—No.

Mr. Burr.—It is improper, then, to state it.

Mr. Hay.—It is immaterial. Mr. Belknap is here.

Mr. Eaton.—As to letters, I have had no correspondence with Colonel Burr. I was about to state that I had made a communication, through Mr. Granger, to the president of the United States, stating the views of Colonel Burr, and a copy of the letter from Belknap was transmitted to the department of state.

Questions by the Prosecution:

Mr. Wirt.—Was there any conversation between you and the prisoner in which you spoke of the odium attached to the name of usurper? Mr. Eaton.—That conversation was excluded by the opinion of the court, as relating to the central project.

Mr. Hay.—Did you mean to state that the honorable indemnity proposed to you by the prisoner was to be included in this plan? Mr. Eaton.—I understood it to be included in the perpetual rank and emolument to be assigned me. In his conversations he declared that he should erect a permanent government, of which he was to be the chief, and he repeated it so often that I could not have misunderstood him.

Cross-questioned:

Mr. Martin.—Do you recollect when you arrived in Washington? Mr. Eaton.—I said that I did not recollect particularly. But the principal part of these conversations must have been between the middle of February and the latter end of March, 1806. I arrived here in the latter end of November, 1805, at Philadelphia, and in December went to New England, and afterwards returned. These conversations happened after my return. Question. Did you go any remote distance till you came back? Were you as far as Baltimore? (To these questions no answers were made, or, if made, were not heard.) Question. Do you recollect any particular conduct of yours calculated to put an end to Colonel Burr's importunities? Answer. Yes. At some of our last interviews I laid on his table a paper containing the toast which I had given to the public, with an intention that he should see it, but I do not know that he did see it, but I believe it. "The United States: Palsy to the brain that should plot to dismember, and leprosy to the hand that will not draw to defend our Union." Question. Where was that toast drunk? Answer. I cannot say. This question was made to me from authority. It was sent, with other toasts I had corrected, to a paper at Springfield. I laid this paper on Colonel Burr's table. Question. Was it drunk at any distant place? At Philadelphia? Answer. I do not recollect. I thought at first it was at Philadelphia, but on reflection it could not have been there. But I had received many hospitalities throughout the Union; many of my toasts were published; and in the hurry of passing and repassing I have completely forgotten.

Mr. Burr.—Do you recollect when you left Washington? Answer. About the 5th or 6th of April. Question. Can you not be certain where this toast was drunk? At Washington or Philadelphia? Answer. I am not certain when or where it was drunk, but I am certain it was not at Washington, because I gave another there when called upon. Question. Did you say that all these conversations happened between the middle of February and the last of March? Answer. No, I did not say so. I said the principal part of these conversations passed in that interval.

Mr. Burr.—Did you say the paper containing that toast was laid on my table in March? Answer. I cannot tell. It cannot be material. From that time our intercourse became less frequent. You expressed some solicitude to keep me at your house. Question. You say that this toast was printed at Springfield? Answer. I did. Question. Have you in your possession a paper containing that toast? Answer. I have not here.

Mr. Martin.—Did you transmit the toast for publication, and to what printer? Answer. I do not recollect distinctly. Question. You mentioned something about a communication which you made to the president, through the postmaster general. Look at that paper. Is that your signature? Answer. It is; and I must give a short account of that paper. I went to Springfield, about twenty-five miles distant from my place of residence. Mr. Granger was there. I went to see him. On my arrival there, in the evening, I understood that he had gone out of town to his seat in the country, but that he had taken notes concerning those transactions. Next morning I went to his house. He put into my hands notes which he had got from Mr. Ely. Question. Whom were the notes written by? Answer. By Mr. Granger. They were subscribed by him, if I have a correct recollection. Mr. Eaton then mentioned that the notes on the two first pages were drawn up by Mr. Granger, from conversations which had passed between Mr. Granger and Mr. Ely, on certain communications made to Mr. Ely by Mr. Eaton, respecting Colonel Burr's plans; that he had seen Mr. Ely at Northampton, at the session of the court of common pleas, at the time when they had first heard of the building of boats on the Ohio. The notes on the last page, in Mr. Granger's writing, and subscribed by himself, were from subsequent conversations between him and Mr. Granger. Question. How many days' travelling is it by the stage from Springfield to Washington? Answer. Not more than five.

Mr. Burr.—You spoke of accounts with the government. Did you or the government demand money? Answer. They had no demand on me. I demanded money of them. Question. Did they state in account a balance against you? Answer. I expended money for the service of the United States when employed as consul at Tunis, an account of which being presented to the accounting officers of the treasury, they, I was told, had no legal discretion to settle it. As there was no law to authorize this adjustment, I did refer to the congress of 1803–4. A committee had reported on my claims, favorably, as I supposed. Then my accounts were left. When I went, however, to the coast of Barbary, and when I returned, after eighteen months, I renewed my claim to the congress. I found that new difficulties had occurred to prevent an adjustment. Leaving out the sums I had advanced, the government had a considerable balance against me. Some comments were made by a member from New York which I thought derogatory to my character, but the balance was in my favor. The last session of congress left them to the accounting officers to settle according to equity. It has been since settled and paid.

Mr. Martin.—Did not Colonel Burr confine his plans to attack the Spanish provinces, for the most considerable part of the time, to the event of a war with Spain? Answer. Not for the most considerable part of the time, but for some time.

Mr. Martin asked him some questions relative to his having seen him, accompanied by his step-daughter and another lady and a gentleman, at Georgetown and Alexandria, about the time he had spoken of, and whether he had given the toast then, when together in the same room. He admitted that he had seen him when so accompanied, but was not positive when or where the toast was given.

Mr. Martin.—What balance did you receive? Answer. That is my concern, sir.

Mr. Burr.—What was the balance against you?

Mr. Eaton (to the court).—Is that a proper question?

Mr. Burr.—My object is manifest; I wish to show the bias which has existed on the mind of the witness.

The CHIEF JUSTICE saw no objections to the question.

Mr. Eaton. I cannot say to a cent or a dollar, but I have received about 10,000 dollars.

Mr. Burr.—When was the money received? Answer. About March last. Question. You mentioned Miranda. Where did you understand he was gone to? Answer. On the benevolent project of revolutionizing the Spanish provinces. Question. What part of them? Answer. Caraccas. I had some reason, too, to know something of that project, because I too was invited to join in that. He, too, was to have been an emperor; he might have been troublesome to us; and of course when I asked you what was to be done with him, you observed, "hang him." Question. Did you understand that I was to do all at once, to execute the central project too as well as that in the West? Answer. I have no objection to answering that, but it will be nothing in your favor. When Colonel Burr was speaking of a central revolution, not much was said about his revolution in the West. Had the other been effected I doubt much whether you would have been willing to have separated that part. Question. You spoke of a command? Answer. You stated what I have already mentioned, that you were assured, from the arrangements which you had made, that an army would be ready to appear when you went to the waters of the western country. I recollect particularly the name of Ephraim Kibby, who had been a ranger in General Wayne's army. You asked me about his spirit. You gave me to understand that his brigade was ready to join you, and that the people also in that country were ready to engage with you in the enterprise. You spoke of your riflemen, your infantry, your cavalry. It was with the same view you mentioned to me that that man (pointing to General Wilkinson, just behind him) was to have been the first to aid you, and from the same views you have perhaps mentioned me.

Mr. Martin objected to the witness interposing his own opinions in this manner.

Mr. Hay.—Some allowance is to be made for the feelings of a man of honor.

Mr. Eaton, bowing, apologized to the court for the warmth of his manner.

Mr. Burr.—You spoke of my revolutionizing the western states. How did you understand that the Union was to be separated? Answer. Your principal line was to be drawn by the Alleghany mountains. You were persuaded that you had secured to you the most considerable citizens of Kentucky and Tennessee, but expressed some doubts about Ohio; I well recollect that on account of the reason which you gave: that they were too much of a plodding, industrious people to engage in your enterprise. Question. How was the business to be effected? Answer. I understood that your agents were in the western country; that the army and the commander-in-chief were ready to act at your signal; and that these, with the adventurers that would join you, would compel the states to agree to a separation. Indeed, you seemed to consider New Orleans as already yours, and that from this point you would send expeditions into the other provinces, make conquests, and consolidate your empire. Question. Was it after all this that you recommended me to the president for an embassy? Answer. Yes; to remove you, as you were a dangerous man, because I thought it the only way to avert a civil war. Question. Did you communicate this to me, and what did I say? Answer. Yes; you seemed to assent to the proposition. Question. What had become of your command? Answer. That I had disposed of myself. Question. Did you understand that you had given me a definite answer? Answer. No; after you had developed yourself, I determined to use you until I got everything out of you; and on the principle that, "when innocence is in danger, to break faith with a bad man is not fraud, but virtue." Question. Did you think that your proposition, as to a foreign embassy, which was so incompatible with my own plans, would be received by me with indifference had I abandoned the project? Answer. You seemed to me to want some distinguished place; as to the mode, you were indifferent; and you seemed to acquiesce in the plan of a foreign embassy.

Mr. Hay.—You said that you received about $10.000 from the government in consequence of a law passed for the purpose. The act of congress did not give you a definitive sum? Answer. The act of congress gave the accounting officers the power of settling with me on equitable principles under the inspection of the secretary of state; under whose department I had served, and the settlement was accordingly made.

Commodore Truxton was then sworn.

Mr. Hay.—Were you present when the court delivered its opinion? Answer. I was. I know nothing of overt acts, treasonable designs or conversations on the part of Colonel Burr.

Here Mr. Hay, the attorney for the United States, seemed to doubt whether the evidence of the commodore applied to this charge, and to be indisposed to examine him.

Mr. Wickham then observed that he would put two questions to him. 1st, Whether he had not frequent and considerable conversations with Colonel Burr concerning the Mexican expedition. 2d, Whether in any of those conversations he ever heard him say anything of a treasonable design.

Mr. Hay objected to his examination at this time, and Mr. Wickham insisted on it.

Mr. Wirt contended that the attorney had the right to examine the witness or not at this time, as he thought proper; that the court would recollect that there were two indictments against the prisoner: the one for high treason, now in discussion before the court, and the other for a misdemeanor (under the act of congress) for preparing an expedition against the Spanish provinces; that the witnesses were summoned promiscuously to support both charges; that the attorney could not ascertain what witnesses supported each indictment without inquiring of themselves; and what he now asked the witness, ought to be considered merely as an inquiry to which of the two indictments his evidence related; and that his evidence was deemed very material on the second indictment, though not on the first.

Mr. Hay said that on reflection he had no doubt the testimony of Commodore Truxton would have a direct bearing on the subject now before the court, when connected with the other evidence in the cause; that it would appear that there was an intimate connection between the two projects, the seizure of New Orleans and the attack on Mexico; he would therefore examine him now and propound this question. Have you not had several conversations with the accused concerning the Mexican expedition?

The commodore proceeded thus: About the beginning of the winter 1805–6, Colonel Burr returned from the western country to Philadelphia. He frequently, in conversation with me, mentioned the subject of speculations in western lands, opening a canal and building a bridge. Those things were not interesting to me in the least, and I did not pay much attention to them. Colonel Burr mentioned to me that the government was weak, and he wished me to get the navy of the United States out of my head; that it would dwindle to nothing; and that he had something to propose to me that was both honorable and profitable, but I considered this as nothing more than an interest in his land speculations. His conversations were repeated frequently. Some time in July, 1806, he told me that he wished to see me unwedded from the navy of the United States, and not to think more of those men at Washington; that he wished to see or make me (I do not recollect which of those two terms he used) an admiral; that he contemplated an expedition to Mexico, in the event of a war with Spain, which he thought inevitable. He asked me if the Havana could be easily taken in the event of a war? I told him that it would require the co-operation of a naval force. Mr. Burr observed to me that that might be obtained. He asked me if I had any personal knowledge of Carthagena and La Vera Cruz, and what would be the best mode of attacking them by sea and land. I gave him my opinion very freely. Mr. Burr then asked me if I would take the command of a naval expedition. I asked him if the executive of the United States was privy to or concerned in the project. He answered emphatically that he was not. I asked that question, because the executive had been charged with a knowledge of Miranda's expedition; I told Mr. Burr that I would have nothing to do with it; that Miranda's project had been intimated to me, but I declined to have anything to do with such affairs. He observed to me that in the event of a war he intended to establish an independent government in Mexico; that Wilkinson, the army, and many officers of the navy would join. I told Mr. Burr that I could not see how any officer of the United States could join. He said that General Wilkinson had projected the expedition, and he had matured it; that many greater men than Wilkinson would join, and that thousands to the westward would join.

Question by Mr. Hay.—Do you recollect having asked him whether General Wilkinson had previously engaged in it? Answer. He said yes, and many greater men than Wilkinson.

Question by Mr. Hay.—I will ask you whether at that time you were in the service of the United States? Answer. I am declared not to be.

Mr. Hay.—I do not wish to hurt your feelings, but merely to show to the jury the state you were in.

Commodore Truxton then proceeded: Colonel Burr again wished me to take a part, and asked me to write a letter to General Wilkinson; that he was about to dispatch two couriers to him. I told him that I had no subject to write about, and declined writing. Mr. Burr said that several officers would be pleased at being put under my command. He spoke highly of Lieutenant Jones, and asked me if he had sailed with me. I told him that he had not, and that I could give him no account of Mr. Jones, having never seen him to my knowledge. He observed that the expedition could not fail; that the Mexicans were ripe for revolt; that he was incapable of anything chimerical, or that would lead his friends into a dilemma. He showed me the draught of a periauger or kind of boat that plies between Paulus-Hook and New York, and asked my opinion of those boats, and whether they were calculated for the river Mississippi and the waters thereof; and I gave him my opinion that they were. He asked me whether I could get a naval constructor to make several copies of the draught. I told him I would. I spoke to a naval constructor and delivered it to him, but as he could not finish them as soon as Colonel Burr wished, the draught was returned to him. Mr. Burr told me that he intended those boats for the conveyance of agricultural products to market at New Orleans, and, in the event of a war, for transports. I knew and informed him that they were not calculated for transports by sea, nor for the carrying of guns; but having determined to have nothing to do with the Mexican expedition, I said very little more to him about those boats; but I very well recollect what I said to him in our last conversation towards the end of July. I told him that there would be no war. He was sanguine there would be war. He said, however, that if he was disappointed as to the event of war, he was about to complete a contract for a large quantity of land on the Washita; that he intended to invite his friends to settle it; that in one year he would have a thousand families of respectable and fashionable people, and some of them of considerable property; that it was a fine country, and that they would have a charming society, and in two years he would have double the number of settlers; and being on the frontier, he would be ready to move whenever a war took place. I have thus endeavored to relate the substance of the conversation which passed between us, as well as I can recollect; though it is very possible that I have not stated them after such a lapse of time verbatim.

Question by Mr. MacRae.—Was it in your first conversation that he told you that you should think no more of those men at Washington? Answer. It was in several.

Question by the same counsel.—Was it not in July that he told you that he wished to see you unwedded from the navy of the United States, and to make you an admiral? Answer. That conversation happened in July.

He wished to see or make me an admiral; I cannot recollect which.

Question by Mr. Hay.—Did those conversations take place after it was declared that you were no longer in the service of the United States? Answer. They did.

In answer to a question by Colonel Carrington, one of the jury, he again stated that the latter conversation was in July.

Question by Mr. Martin.—Was it not to the event of a war with Spain that these conversations related? Answer. All his conversations respecting military and naval subjects, and the Mexican expedition, were in the event of a war with Spain. I told him my opinion was there would be no war, and he seemed to be confident that there would be war.

Mr. MacRae.—Did he mention General Eaton in any of those conversations? Answer. He mentioned no person but General Wilkinson and Lieutenant Jones.

Mr. Hay.—Had you not expressed your dissatisfaction at the declaration of your not being in the service of the United States? Answer. I had. The misunderstanding between the secretary of the navy of the United States and myself took place in March, 1802.

On cross-examination, the commodore further stated that he had had several (he did not know how many) conversations with Mr. Burr; and that as well as he could recollect, it was about the latter end of July that he informed him that he was about concluding a bargain for the Washita lands, and wished also to see him unwedded from the navy of the United States. He added, Colonel Burr said that after the Mexican expedition he intended to provide a formidable navy, at the head of which he intended to place me; that he intended to establish an independent government, and give liberty to an enslaved world. I declined his propositions to me at first, because the president was not privy to the project. He asked me the best mode of attacking the Havana, Carthagena, and La Vera Cruz, but spoke of no particular force.

Question by Colonel Burr.—Do you not recollect my telling you the propriety of private expeditions, undertaken by individuals in the case of war; and that there had been such in the late war, and that there is no legal restraint on such expeditions?

Mr. Hay objected to this question as improper.

Colonel Burr insisted on its propriety, and that the gentleman for the prosecution had set an example far beyond it.

Commodore Truxton answered: You said that Wilkinson, the army, and many officers of the navy would join, and you spoke highly of Lieutenant Jones.

Colonel Burr.—Had I not frequently told you, and for years, that the government had no serious intention of employing you, and that you were duped by the Smiths? and do you not think that I was perfectly correct in that opinion? Answer. Yes; I know very well I was.

Colonel Burr.—Were we not on terms of intimacy? Was there any reserve on my part in our frequent conversations; and did you ever hear me express any intention or sentiment respecting a division of the Union? Answer. We were very intimate. There seemed to be no reserve on your part. I never heard you speak of a division of the Union.

Colonel Burr.—Did I not state to you that the Mexican expedition would be very beneficial to this country? Answer. You did.

Colonel Burr.—Had you any serious doubt as to my intentions to settle those lands? Answer. So far from that, I was astonished at the intelligence of your having different views, contained in newspapers received from the western country after you went thither. Question. Would you not have joined in the expedition if sanctioned by the government? Answer. I would most readily get out of my bed at twelve o'clock at night to go in defence of my country at her call, against England, France, Spain, or any other country.

Mr. Hay.—Did the prisoner speak of commercial speculations? Answer. He said they might be carried on to advantage. Question. Did he in his conversations speak of commercial establishments, in which he or his friends were to have an interest? Answer. He spoke of settling that country, and sending produce therefrom to different parts of the world, New Orleans particularly.

Mr. Wirt.—Did he speak of an independent empire in Mexico, having an advantageous connection with this country? Answer. I understood him so.

Mr. MacRae.—Did he wish to fill your mind with resentment against the government? Answer. I was pretty full of it myself, and he joined me in opinion.

Mr. Wirt.—On what subject did Burr wish you to write to General Wilkinson? Answer. General Wilkinson and myself were on good terms, and he wished me to correspond with him; but I had no subject for a letter to him, and therefore did not write to him.

Mr. Hay.—Suppose we were to have a war with Spain, would not New Orleans be a proper place from whence to send an expedition against the Spanish provinces? Is it not more proper for that purpose than any other place in the western parts of the country? Answer. Certainly it is; but large ships cannot come up to New Orleans; small craft or vessels must take the expedition down the river.

Question by Mr. Parker, one of the jury. Did you understand for what purpose the couriers spoken of were to be sent by Mr. Burr to General Wilkinson? Answer. I understood from him that there was an understanding between himself and General Wilkinson about the Mexican expedition.

Mr. Parker.—Was this expedition only to be in the event of a war with Spain? Answer. Yes; in all his conversations with me, he said that this expedition was to take place only in the event of a war with Spain.

Mr. Parker.—Was there no proposition made to you for such an expedition, whether there was war or not? Answer. There was not.

Colonel Burr said that enterprises by individuals are lawful and customary in cases of war, and asked whether there were not preparations making in Philadelphia now for that purpose. Answer. Preparations are making at New York as to gunboats and fortifications. The merchants of Liverpool, in expectation of war, build ships for privateers, and if there be no war they convert them into Guineamen.

Question by Mr. MacRae.—Are not the preparations going on openly at New York? Has any commander been appointed independent of the government? Answer. No.

Question by Colonel Burr.—Did I not say that I had never seen Lieutenant Jones? Answer. I do not recollect that, but you spoke highly of him.

Question by Mr. Hay.—When he proposed to make you an admiral, did not the thought strike you how he was to accomplish this?

Mr. Botts denied that Commodore Truxton had said that Mr. Burr had promised to make him an admiral.

Commodore Truxton.—Mr. Burr told me he wished to make or see me one; I do not particularly recollect which was his expression.

Question by Mr. Hay.—From what quarter of the world was the expedition by sea to go? Answer. I do not know. I did not ask him where it was to go from.

Question by the same.—Did you not understand that you were to command the expedition by sea? Answer. I declined the offer, and asked no questions particularly on the subject.

Mr. Botts.—Can ships be built secretly in a corner? Answer. No.

Peter Taylor was next sworn.

Mr. Hay asked him to state everything he knew concerning the assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island.

Mr. Botts objected to this mode of examination; and though he was willing to accommodate Mr. Hay so far as to let the witness tell his story in his own way, yet he would not consent to his introducing completely illegal testimony. He had no objection to the witness stating what Colonel Burr had said, or the facts which happened on the island, though both were, strictly speaking, improper evidence; but he would not agree to his speaking of the declarations of Mr. and Mrs. Blennerhassett.

Colonel Burr said he waived the objection at present.

Mr. Hay.—This witness will directly prove the connection of Burr with Blennerhassett, and with the assemblage on the island.

Peter Taylor.—The first information I had upon this subject was from Mrs. Blennerhassett, when Mr. Blennerhassett and Mr. Alston were gone down the river. The people got much alarmed concerning this business, and Mrs. Blennerhassett sent me to Lexington after Mr. Blennerhassett, with a letter to prevent Colonel Burr from coming back with him to the island. I went to Chillicothe, but I did not find Mr. Blennerhassett there, and I then went on to Cincinnati. I was directed to call at Cincinnati, at Mr. John Smith's, where I would find Mr. Blennerhassett. I called at Mr. Smith's store, where I saw his son. I asked if Mr. Smith was at home. He said yes. I said I wanted to speak to him. His son went and told him a man wanted to see him. When Mr. Smith came out I inquired for Colonel Burr and Blennerhassett, to see whether he could give any account of them. He allowed he knew nothing of either of them. He allowed I was much mistaken in the place. I said no, this was the right place, "Mr. John Smith, Storekeeper, Cincinnati." Says I, "Don't you recollect a young man who came here some time ago for Colonel Burr's topcoat? (great coat.)" I said, "Sir, I have lived with Mr. Blennerhassett for three years." When Mr. Smith heard me talk so, he knew me, and took me up stairs to talk with me. He wanted to know the news up our way. I told him the people had got alarmed. I told him that everything was in agitation; that they talked about new settlements of lands, as they told me. He seemed surprised. He asked what was said about General Wilkinson? I said I knew nothing about it. He asked me if I would carry a letter from him to Blennerhassett. I told him I would carry anything, so as it was not too burthensome; so he sat down and wrote a letter. He asked whether I wished to drink, for he charged me not to go to any tavern, lest they should be asking me questions. He gave me liquor, and I drank; and then he showed me a stable, and told me to go and get my horse fed by the ostler, but not to go into the tavern. I asked him where I should find Colonel Burr and Blennerhassett. He said he expected they were at Lexington. I told him I supposed at Mr. Jourdan's. He said that was the very house. When I got to Lexington it was Saturday, about 1 o'clock. Mr. Jourdan happened to be in the street, and knew me. He said, "Peter, your old master, as you call him, is not in town." But he said, before I asked him, he expected him either that night or tomorrow early. He asked me, what news in our parts, and I told him. I asked him what I was to do with my horse. He said that he was to be put at the livery stable. He then went up stairs, and he opened a door and made a motion with his hand. I suppose to Colonel Burr. I went in, and there was Colonel Burr. Colonel Burr wanted to know the news in our parts. I began to tell him that my business was to prevent Colonel Burr from going back to the island. Question. Did you know Colonel Burr at that time? Answer. I did not. He had been on the island three times, but I did not see him. When I told Colonel Burr that, says he, "I am the very man involved in this piece of business, and you ought to tell me all you know." I said, "If you come up our way the people will shoot you." I told him it was my sincere opinion that it was not safe for him to come up our way. I told him that I had heard several declare that they had rather shoot him than let it alone, if they had a good chance. He seemed surprised that they should have such a thing in their heads. I told him I could not tell why, and then I told him about the land settlement, but the people said all that was a fib, and that he had something else in view. Then Colonel Burr asked me what letters I had. I said two; one was from Mrs. Blennerhassett and the other from John Smith, of Cincinnati. He asked me if he might open the letter from John Smith to Blennerhassett, for he expected it was for him. I told him I supposed it made no difference between him and Blennerhassett, and he might. He broke the seal open, and showed me there was a letter inclosed for himself. He asked me about my wife. I asked him whether I might not go about the town. He said I might, and then I went down stairs and left the opened letter with him. I then went to Mr. Jourdan and asked him whether I was to stay at his house or go to a tavern? He said I was to go to a tavern, and he would pay for me. Mr. Jourdan wished me to go next day to Millersburg, after the saddle-bags left there by Mr. Blennerhassett. I told him I would, and I did go. I left Mrs. Blennerhassett's letter with Mr. Jourdan, expecting Blennerhassett to get there before me. I got back on Monday, by 1 o'clock, and then Mr. Blennerhassett was come and preparing to go home. We started, and came ten miles that night. We stopped at a tavern. I went to see after the horses, and he went into the house. There were people in the house who wanted to know his name. He told them his name was Tom Jones. He came out and told me the people in the house had asked, and he had told them his name was Tom Jones, and I must mind and not make no mistake, but call him Tom Jones too. So he passed by that name till we got to the Mudlicks. He then told me he was known there, and I must call him by his own name. Question. When did these things happen? Answer. All this was in October, 1806, I believe. He then began to inquire for young men that had rifles—good, orderly men, that would be conformable to order and discipline. He allowed that Colonel Burr and he and a few of his friends had bought eight hundred thousand acres of land, and they wanted young men to settle it. He said he would give any young man who would go down the river one hundred acres of land, plenty of grog and victuals while going down the river, and three months' provisions after they had got to the end. Every young man must have his rifle and blanket. I agreed to go myself, if I could carry my wife and family, but he said he must have further consultation upon that. When I got home I began to think, and asked him what kind of seeds we should carry with us. He said we did not want any; the people had seeds where we were going.

Mr. Wirt.—Of what occupation were you on the island? Answer. A gardener.

Mr. Wirt.—I put this question that the jury might understand his last observation.

I urged that subject to him several times. At last he made a sudden pause, and said, "I will tell you what, Peter, we are going to take Mexico, one of the finest and richest places in the whole world." He said that Colonel Burr would be the king of Mexico, and Mrs. Alston, daughter of Colonel Burr, was to be the queen of Mexico whenever Colonel Burr died. He said that Colonel Burr had made fortunes for many in his time, but none for himself; but now he was going to make something for himself. He said that he had a great many friends in the Spanish territory. No less than two thousand Roman Catholic priests were engaged, and that all their friends, too, would join, if once he could get to them; that the Spaniards, like the French, had got dissatisfied with their government, and wanted to swap it. He told me that the British, also, were friends in this piece of business, and that he should go to England on this piece of business, for Colonel Burr. He asked me if I would not like to go to England. I said I should certainly like to see my friends there, but would wish to go for nothing else. I then asked him what was to become of the men who were going to settle the lands he talked about. Were they to stop at the Red river, or to go on? He said, "Oh, by God, I tell you, Peter, every man that will not conform to order and discipline I will stab; you'll see how I'll fix them;" that when he got them far enough down the river, if they did not conform to order and discipline, he swore by God he'd stab them. I was astonished. I told him I was no soldier, and could not fight. He said it made no odds; he did not want me to fight; he wanted me to go and live with Mrs. Blennerhassett and the children, either at Natchez or some other place, while he went on the expedition. I talked to him again, and told him the people had got it into their heads that he wanted to divide the Union. He said Colonel Burr and he could not do it themselves; all they could do was to tell the people the consequence of it. He said the people there paid the government upwards of four hundred thousand dollars a year, and never received any benefit from it. He allowed it would be a very fine thing if they could keep that money among themselves on this side of the mountains, and make locks, and build bridges, and cut roads. About two weeks after I got home he sent me to Doctor Bennett's, of Mason county, with a letter. He wanted to know if Doctor Bennett wouldn't sell him the arms belonging to the United States which were in his charge

If he could sell them and keep himself out of danger, he'd give him a draft upon his friend in Kentucky for payment. If he could not sell them without bringing himself into a hobble, he must send him word where they were kept, and he would come and steal them away in the night. I delivered the letter. He gave me directions to get it back and burn it, for it contained high treason. I was not to give the letter to Doctor Bennett until the doctor promised to deliver it back, for me to burn it, for that it contained high treason. I did burn it. The doctor was present. The doctor read the letter, and said he was unacquainted with the plot, and couldn't join in it.

Mr. Hay.—Were you not on the island when the people were there? Answer. Yes. Question. When did the boats leave the island? Answer. It was contemplated to sail on the 6th of December, but the boats were not ready; they did not come till the 10th (Sunday). Mr. Knox and several other men were with him, and they sailed on the Wednesday night following. Question. How many boats were there? Answer. Four. Question. How many men from the boats came ashore? Answer. About thirty. Question. What did the men do who did not belong to the boats? Answer. Some were packing meat, and some were packing other things.

Mr. MacRae.—Who went off on Wednesday night? Answer. Mr. Blennerhassett and Mr. Tyler, and the whole of the party. Question. At what time in the night? Answer. About one o'clock. Question. Did all that came down to the island go away? Answer. All but one, who was sick.

Mr. Hay.—Had they any guns? Answer. Some of them had; some of the people went a shooting. But I do not know how many there were.

Mr. J. M. Sheppard (a juryman).—What kind of guns, rifles or muskets? Answer. I can't tell whether rifles or muskets. I saw no pistols but what belonged to Blennerhassett himself. Question. Was there any powder or lead? Answer. They had powder, and they had lead both; I saw some powder in a long small barrel like a churn, but I was so employed I could not notice particularly. Some of the men were engaged in running bullets, but I do not know how many.

Mr. MacRae.—What induced them to leave the island at that hour of the night? Answer. Because they were informed that the Kenawah militia were coming down there. Question. Did you carry some boxes to the boats? Answer. I carried half a bushel of candles and some brandy; several boxes were carried, but I knew not what they contained, and a great many things besides, of which I knew nothing.

Mr. Hay.—Were you on the island when they went off? Answer. Yes. They held a council at the foot of the pier, to determine which was the best way to go. Mr. Blennerhassett said that they had better go together; if he went in a canoe he would be an easy prey. I said to them, "best stick together;" and so they determined to stick together. They went off in great haste. Question. Why did they go in a body? Answer. I suppose for security.

Mr. Wickham.—You saw General Tupper and Mr. Woodbridge that night? Answer. Yes. Question. Was Colonel Burr there? Answer. No. I did not see him. Question. Did you understand whether he was in that part of the country at that time? Answer. I understood not; never saw him on the island.

The court then adjourned till to-morrow.

Wednesday, August 19, 1807.

The court met, according to adjournment, at the usual hour.

General John Morgan was then sworn, and gave the following testimony:

Some time in August last, about this time twelvemonth, my father put a letter into my hands, signed Aaron Burr, in which he said that himself and Colonel Dupiester would dine with him the following day. My father requested me and my brother to go and meet Colonel Burr, which we did about seven miles distant. After a few words of general conversation, Colonel Burr observed to me that the union of the states could not possibly last; and that a separation of the states must ensue as a natural consequence in four or five years. Colonel Burr made many inquiries of me relative to the county of Washington; particularly the state of its militia, its strength, arms, accoutrements, and the character of its officers These conversations continued some time, besides other things, which I cannot recollect because I did not expect to be called upon in this way. After traveling some miles we met one of my workmen, a well-looking young man. Colonel Burr said he wished he had ten thousand such fellows. At my father's table, during dinner, Colonel Burr again observed that the separation of the Union must take place inevitably in less than five years. Shall I give the answers that were made?

Mr. Wirt.—Perhaps it may serve to connect your narrative better.

I recollect that it was my father who answered him, God forbid! Colonel Burr, in the course of conversation at the dinner table, observed that with two hundred men he could drive the president and congress into the Potomac, and with four or five hundred he could take possession of the city of New York. After dinner he walked with me to my brother's, about one mile distant, and in the course of the walk spoke of military men, and asked me if either of my brothers had a military turn? He said he should like to see my brother George at the head of a corps of grenadiers; he was a fine, stout-looking fellow. These circumstances induced me to speak to my father; I warned him to beware of Colonel Burr, and told him that in the course of that night Colonel Burr would attempt to have an interview with him, and would make a requisition of my brother Tom to go with him, and that I suspected something was going on, but what I did not know. The next morning I rode with Colonel Burr to the town of Washington, about nine or ten miles. We had a good deal of conversation; principally on military affairs, on the state of the militia, the necessity of attending to military discipline. He told me the effect it had in New York; that in New York the militia were in good order, which was brought about by the influence and exertions of a single individual (Colonel Swartwout). Colonel Burr asked me if I thought I could raise a regiment in Washington county, or whether I could raise one with more facility in New Jersey.

Mr. Wirt.—You have lived in New Jersey? Answer. Yes. At Washington we took a walk, Colonel Burr, Colonel Dupiester and myself, down the town; and I pointed out to him the house where Mr. Bradford lived, who had been at the head of the western insurrection. He inquired about Mr. Bradford. (He was at Baton Rouge.) I told him his son was in town, and Colonel Burr expressed a wish to see him. Colonel Burr mentioned to me that he had met with several who had been concerned in the western insurrection, and particularly a major in the Northwestern Territory, (whose name I do not recollect,) who had told him that if he was ever engaged in another business of the kind, he pledged himself it should not end without bloodshed. He said that he was a fine fellow. It was on these circumstances that I advised my father to apprise the president of the United States that something was going on.

Mr. Hay.—Which way did he go? Answer. I saw him leave Washington for Wheeling.

Mr. Wirt.—Were the separation of the Union and military affairs the predominant subject of his conversations? Answer. Our conversation was very general and mixed, never very long; but these seemed to be the leading subjects.

Mr. Hay.—Do you recollect anything he said about Bradford's qualifications for conducting such an enterprise? Answer. I recollect it well. He said that Bradford was very incompetent to such an undertaking; and that in such a case there ought to be the utmost confidence in the leader.

Mr. Wirt.—At what time in the month of August was this visit? Answer. Somewhere between the 20th and 25th.

Mr. Hay.—Perhaps the date of this letter (from the prisoner to your father) may show. This letter is dated on the 21st.

Mr. Parker (one of the jury.) Did he approve or condemn that sentiment of the major's which you have just quoted? Answer. I do not recollect. Question. Did he make any further remarks respecting him? Answer. He only said that he was a fine fellow, or words to that effect; that he was very fit for business of that kind.

Mr. Burr.—You spoke of a letter from me to your father. Do you know whether he wrote me, some time before, a letter of invitation to his house? Answer. Yes; he had written about a year before to you to Pittsburg. That letter is yet unsealed, in my brother Tom's bureau.

Question by the same. Do you remember that it was communicated to me and that that was the cause of my coming to visit him? Answer. Not by myself or my brother, in my hearing.

Question by the same. Do you remember the manner in which I introduced the subject you allude to? Was it in the course of a lively conversation? Was there anything very serious in it? Answer. You only mentioned it in a lively or careless manner. Question. Did your father communicate to you, next morning, our night's conversation? Answer. Yes. Question. Before we rode? Answer. No. Question. Do you recollect of my having made several inquiries, also, about the seminaries of learning, and of one that was projected in your neighborhood, and of my suggesting the necessity of encouraging it? Answer. You spoke much, too, on that subject. Question. Did I seem to know anything of Bradford before you told me? Answer. You seemed to know a good deal about the insurrection. Question. Did you not tell me that Bradford was a noisy fellow? Answer. I did not. I have no objections to give my opinion of Mr. Bradford. I mentioned him to you as a mere lawyer. Question. Did I seem to know that Bradford lived at Washington before you mentioned it and pointed out his house? Answer. You did not seem to know it. Question. Who were at dinner at your father's? Answer. My father, mother, wife, sister, Colonel Dupiester, Mr. T. Ewell, and my brother Tom.

Colonel George Morgan was then sworn, and was proceeding, when

Mr. Burr remonstrated against this kind of evidence, consisting of conversations and previous declarations. He did not mean to interrupt the inquiry, but to prevent the time of the court from being wasted. Some desultory conversation ensued upon this point, when

The CHIEF JUSTICE said that he understood the same objections would hereafter apply as well to the consideration as to the introduction of testimony; that these objections might be hereafter urged; and that it was impossible for the court to know the nature of the evidence before it was introduced.

Mr. Hay.—If the gentlemen will only have a little patience they will find that other circumstances will come out to prove the materiality of this testimony, and will also prove the most perfect connection between the different parts of the conspiracy. This witness will prove what was the state of the prisoner's mind in August last.

Mr. Lee.—I hope, then, the jury will distinctly understand that they are not to infer from the court's declining to interfere on the present occasion that everything which drops from the witness is to pass without objection, which may be made at any time.

Colonel Morgan (the father of the last witness).—There has been a long acquaintance between Colonel Burr and myself. He had introduced to my notice two of his nephews by the name of Pollock, and a third by the name of Edwards, Pierrepont Edward's son. I had received many civilities from Colonel Burr, and many civil letters from him, from New York, in consequence of my civilities to those gentlemen. After these things had passed I had formed such an attachment to him that I never should have forgotten it had not this late business taken place. About three years ago Colonel Burr was under considerable, and, as I thought, unjust persecution. I had then a younger son (who is now here) studying law at Pittsburg. I wished to make him known to Colonel Burr, and in consequence of my friendship for him, and of the great rage of persecution against him, I invited him in that letter to come and see me at Morganza. In all probability I should have done the same thing from the attachment which I had conceived for him. Colonel Burr, however, had left Pittsburg before my letter reached it, and it remains now in my son's bureau at Pittsburg. On the 24th of last August I received a letter from Colonel Burr dated at Pittsburg, informing me that he should dine with me next day.

Here Mr. Hay handed the letter to Colonel Morgan, who said that the letter was dated on the 21st, and that he had not for some time seen it, as he had enclosed it to the president of the United States as introductory to his communication to him. This letter was handed to me by a man who called himself Count Willie, one of his attendants. I believe my son did not call on me that evening, but next morning I informed him that from my great affection for Colonel Burr, if I was able, I should certainly go and meet Colonel Burr; and I requested him and his brother to do it, with a letter of introduction, explanatory of their names and their intention. What conversation took place between him and my son I know not. Colonel Burr mentioned to me in conversation Colonel Dupiester as one of the first military characters of the age. I shall pass over the conversation and incidents during dinner. After dinner I spoke of our fine country. I observed that when I first went there, there was not a single family between the Allegany mountains and the Ohio; and that by and by we should have congress sitting in this neighborhood or at Pittsburg. We were allowed to sport these things over a glass of wine: "No, never," said Colonel Burr, "for in less than five years you will be totally divided from the Atlantic states." The colonel entered into some arguments to prove why it should and must be so. The first reason was, the produce of the sale of the western lands being carried to the Atlantic states, and that the people to the west should not be tributary to them. He said that our taxes were very heavy, and demanded why we should pay them to the Atlantic parts of the country? By this time I took an opportunity to observe, God forbid! I hoped that no such things would ever happen, at least in my time. This observation terminated the conversation as to that particular point. It then turned upon the weakness and imbecility of the federal government.

Mr. Wirt.—Who started that subject?

Answer. Colonel Burr started it. I don't recollect saying anything on the subject, but began to think that all was not right. He said that with two hundred men he could drive congress, with the president at its head, into the river Potomac, or that it might be done; and he said with five hundred men he could take possession of New York. He appealed to Colonel Dupiester if it could not be done; he nodded assent. There was a reply made to this by one of my sons, that he would be damned if they could take our little town of Cannonsburg with that force. Some short time after this Colonel Burr went out from the dining-room to the passage, and beckoned to my son Thomas. What their conversation was I cannot say. Soon after a walk was proposed to my son's mill, and the company went. When they returned, one (or both of my sons) came to caution me, and said, "You may depend upon it Colonel Burr will this night open himself to you. He wants Tom to go with him." After the usual conversation Colonel Burr went up stairs, and, as I thought, to go to bed. Mrs. Morgan was reading to me, (as is usual when the family have retired,) when about eleven o'clock, and after I had supposed he had been an hour in bed, she told me that Colonel Burr was coming down, and as she had heard my son's conversation, she added, "You'll have it now." Colonel Burr came down with a candle in his hand. Mrs. Morgan immediately retired. The colonel took his seat by me. He drew from his pocket a book. I suppose it was a memorandum book. After looking at it he asked me if I knew a Mr. Vigo, of Fort Vincent, a Spaniard. I replied, yes, I knew him; I had reasons to know him. One was, that I had reasons to believe that he was deeply involved in the British conspiracy in 1788, as I supposed, the object of which was to separate the states, and which General Neville and myself had suppressed. I called it a nefarious thing to aim at the division of the states. I was careful to put great emphasis on the word "nefarious." Colonel Burr, finding what kind of men he had to deal with, suddenly stopped, thrust into his pocket the book, which I saw had blank leaves in it, and retired to bed. I believe I was pretty well understood. The next morning Colonel Burr and Colonel Dupiester went off before breakfast, without my expecting it, in company with my son, and from that time to this I have not seen him but in this place. I well remember some explanatory circumstances. My son agreed with me that I should apprise the president of our impressions, and point out a mode by which Colonel Burr might be followed, step by step.

Mr. MacRae.—After your son's observation about the town of Cannonsburg and the subsequent conversation, did the prisoner draw any comparison between the people of the eastern and western country? Answer. He said, "keep yourself on this side of the mountain, and you'll never be disturbed;" by which I understood that there was an attempt to be made to effect a disunion. There is one more circumstance which I must state to the court. The Sunday after, the judge of our circuit court dined with me. I requested him to mention the circumstances to General Neville, and invited him to come the following Sunday to dinner with Judges Tilghman and Roberts, for I had business of the first importance to communicate. The court being longer engaged than was expected, they did not dine with me on that day; but they did on the following Sunday. These gentlemen wrote a joint letter to the president, informing him of my communications to them.

Mr. Burr.—What sort of a book was the one I had in my hand? Answer. It was a small book like this. (A pocket-book.) Question. Was it bound? Answer. It was not so large as this; I do not recollect whether it was bound, as it would not be very polite in me to take particular notice of such things when gentlemen are at my own house. Question. When you spoke of a nefarious plan, to what transaction did you allude? Answer. To Vigo's plan, which I conceived was intended to dissever the Union. Question. Who were present when Judge Tilghman saw you? Answer. General Neville, and Judge Roberts and my son. Question. Was there any other from Pittsburg? Answer. None. Question. Your conversation at dinner, then, was jocular about the moving of congress to Pittsburg. Was not part of the conversation jocular? Answer. My manner might have been jocular, but not my meaning. Question. Did you not once live on the Mississippi, or go to that country with a design to settle there? Answer. I did, with the approbation of my country, in order to take up and distribute lands to all my countrymen to the west of the Mississippi. Question. Did you acquire any lands there? Answer. I am told I have a right to some lands there. Question. Where was it that you lived on the Mississippi? Answer. At New Madrid. Question. On which side of the Mississippi? Answer. The west. Question. In the Spanish territories? Answer. With the approbation of the Spanish government. Question. How long did you live there? Answer. About forty days. I went from that place to New Orleans, where I detected a British spy. Question. In what year? Answer. In 1788.

General Morgan was then called in at the request of the prisoner.

Mr. Burr.—In what state of mind was your father when General Neville and Judge Tilghman were there? Answer. He had lately had a fall, which had done him considerable injury. Question. I mean as to his capacity. Did you not make some apology to Judge Tilghman for the state of his mind? Answer. I did tell Judge Tilghman that my father was old and infirm, and like other old men, told long stories, and was apt to forget his repetitions.

Mr. MacRae.—What was your reply to the prisoner's remark about two hundred men to attack congress, and five hundred men to take New York? Answer. When Colonel Burr said that with two hundred men he could drive the president and congress into the Potomac, I must confess that I felt myself hurt, and replied with some warmth, "I'll be damned, sir, if you could take the little town of Cannonsburg with that force." Colonel Burr replied, "Confine yourself to this side of the mountain, and it is another thing." Question. Do you recollect whether anything was said concerning the people on the eastern and western sides of the Allegany? Answer. He answered, "Confine yourselves on this side of the mountain, and it is another thing."

Mr. Baker objected to this examination by Mr. MacRae, as improper.

Question by Mr. Burr.—Do you recollect that the probability of a Spanish war was mentioned? Answer. It was a general subject of conversation between Colonel Burr and myself.

Thomas Morgan was next sworn. His evidence was as follows: On the evening of the 21st of August, my father received a letter from Pittsburg by the hands of some person, the signature of which was Aaron Burr. In that letter the writer communicated his intention of dining with my father on the following day; he also mentioned that he should take the liberty of introducing a friend. My father requested my brother and myself to meet him, which we accordingly did. Nothing of importance occurred during our ride in my presence. Colonel Burr rode generally with my brother; Colonel Dupiester was often with myself, and sometimes we were promiscuously together. Whilst we were at and after dinner Colonel Burr emphatically, as I thought confidently, and with great earnestness, said that we (meaning the people of the West) would be separated in five years from the Atlantic states, the Allegany mountains to be the line of division. He said that great numbers were not necessary to execute great military deeds; all that was wanting was a leader in whom they could place confidence, and who they believed could carry them through. This conversation occurred during dinner. He said that with five hundred men New York could be taken, and that with two hundred congress could be driven into the Potomac river. To the last observation, my brother, I think, indignantly replied, "By God! sir, with that force you cannot take our little town of Cannonsburg." Colonel Burr's reply to this observation was, "Confine yourself to this side of the mountain, and I'll not contradict you," or words to that effect. Colonel Burr withdrew from the room where we dined, and on reaching the door leading into the entry invited me, by a nod, to go with him. When we had arrived at the back door of the entry, out of hearing of any other person, Colonel Burr inquired what my pursuits were. I informed him that I was studying the law. He then said he was sure I could not find employment for either body or mind, but he did not further explain himself. He said that there were, or asked if there were not, a number of young men in Pittsburg similarly situated. He said that under our government there was no encouragement for talents; that John Randolph had declared on the floor of congress that men of talents were dangerous to the government. He asked me how or whether I would like a military expedition or enterprise. (I cannot recollect which, but it was some such expression.) My answer was, "It would entirely depend upon the object or cause for which I was to fight." I think previously, or certainly soon after, he said, "I wish you were on your way with me." After asking Colonel Burr concerning a young man (Mr. Duer) living at New Orleans, with whom I had a slight acquaintance, he said he was doing well; and he then spoke of Duer's brother, of whom I knew nothing, who was also doing well as a lawyer, but he had much rather be at the head of a military corps. Mr. Morgan then proposed to state the steps which his father had taken to defeat A. Burr's projects, when he was stopped by the court.

Mr. Burr.—Had you ever spoken to me before? Answer. Never. Question. Did you not mention, with some complaints, the neglect which your education had received? Answer. No. Question. Did you not complain about wasting your time? Answer. I recollect nothing on that subject, but your remark that I could not surely find employment for either body or mind.

Mr. Wirt.—Do you recollect your answer to Colonel Burr's observation that he would like to see you on your way with him? Answer. I do not recollect except what I have stated already. Here our conversation ended.

Mr. Hay.—Do you recollect, when you said that your liking a military life would depend on the object or cause in which you were engaged, whether anything more was said by Colonel Burr? Answer. No.

Examination of Jacob Allbright:

Mr. Hay.—Our object is to prove by his testimony the actual assemblage of men on Blennerhassett's Island, and it goes, of course, to prove directly the overt act.

Jacob Allbright. The first I knew of this business was, I was hired on the island to help to build a kiln for drying corn; and after working some time, Mrs. Blennerhassett told me that Mr. Blennerhassett and Colonel Burr were going to lay in provisions for an army for a year. I went to the mill where I carried the corn to be ground after it had been dried. I worked four weeks on that business on the island. Last fall, (or in September,) after Blennerhassett had come home, (he had been promising me cash for some time,) I stepped up to him. He had no money at the time, but would pay me next day, or soon. Says he, "Mr. Allbright, you are a Dutchman." But he asked me first and foremost, whether I would not join with him and go down the river. I told him I did not know what they were upon; and he said, "Mr. Allbright, we are going to settle a new country." And I gave him an answer that I would not like to leave my family. He said he did not want any families to go along with him. Then he said to me, "You are a Dutchman, and a common man; and as the Dutch are apt to be scared by high men, if you'll go to New Lancaster, where the Dutch live, and get me twenty or thirty to go with us, I will give you as many dollars." New Lancaster was some distance off. I went home then, and gave him no answer upon that. In a few days after the boats came and landed at the island. The snow was about two or three inches deep, and I went out a hunting. I was on the Ohio side; I met two men; I knew they belonged to the boats, but I wanted to find out; and they asked me whether I had not given my consent to go along with Blennerhassett down the river. As we got into a conversation together they named themselves Colonel Burr's men, belonging to the boats landed at the island. When they asked me whether I had not consented to go down with Blennerhassett, I put a question to them. I told them i did not know what they were about; and one of the gentlemen told me they were going to take a silver mine from the Spanish. I asked the gentlemen whether they would not allow that this would raise war with America. They replied, no. These were only a few men, and if they went with a good army they would give up the country and nothing more said about it. I had all this conversation with the two men. These men showed me what fine rifles they had, going down the river with them. Then I went to the island and Blennerhassett paid me off in Kentucky notes. People, however, did not like these notes very well, and I went over to the bank at Kanawha to change them. I got two of the notes changed, and one, a ten dollar note, was returned to my hand, for which I wished to get silver from Blennerhassett. I went to the island the day the proclamation came out. But before I went to Blennerhassett's house I heard he was not at home, but at Marietta. I went on the Virginia side, where I met three other men belonging to the boats, with three complete rifles. They made a call upon me to take them to the island in my canoe, and I accepted (excepted or refused) to it, but afterwards I carried the third man, who stood close by my canoe, over to the island. After being some time on the island, I went down to the four boats. Blennerhassett was not at home yet, and I met some of the boat people shooting at a mark. They had a fire between the bank and boats. I saw this in the daytime.

Mr. Hay.—How many boats were there? Answer. Four.

I waited at the house till Blennerhassett came home. He appeared very much scared. One of the boatmen came up to him for something, and he told him, "Don't trouble me, I have trouble enough already." He went up to his chamber and I saw no more of him. I asked an old gentlemen who was there, and with whom I was well acquainted, to go up to his chamber and change my note for silver. He did go, and brought me silver. By and by I heard that they were going to start that night. Thinks I, "I'll see the end of it." This was the night of the very day that Blennerhassett got back from Marietta. He got back before night. When night came on I was among the men, and also in the kitchen, and saw the boatmen running bullets. One of them spoke out to the others, "Boys, let's mould as many bullets as we can fire twelve rounds." After that I saw no more till after twelve o'clock at night. Then Blennerhassett came down from the chamber and called up some of his servants; he had four or five trunks. They were not trusty hands enough to carry them to the boats, and some person called after my name, and asked me to help them, and I carried one of the trunks and moved along with them. When we got down, some person, I don't particularly know who, but think it was Blennerhassett himself, asked me to stand by the trunks till they were put in the boats. When the last of them went off I saw men standing in a circle on the shore. I went up to them; perhaps they were five or six rods from me. The first thing that I noticed was their laying plans, and consulting how Blennerhassett and Comfort Tyler should get safe by Gallipolis. One Nahum Bent was called forward, and when he came Blennerhassett asked him whether he had not two smart horses. Nahum Bent answered, no; he had but one. Then Blennerhassett told him to go to Captain Dana and get his sorrel horse; and Nahum Bent told him that the sorrel horse had no shoes on; and Blennerhassett said the roads were soft and would not hurt the horse. Blennerhassett told Nahum Bent to meet him and Comfort Tyler with the horses somewhere about Gallipolis. Bent inquired how he was to find him out; should he inquire for him? "No." "Have you no friends there?" "No." Mrs. Blennerhassett then came forward, and she told Blennerhassett and Comfort Tyler that they must take a canoe and get into it before they got to Gallipolis, and sail down the stream of the Ohio, for nobody would mind a couple of men going down the stream. She said "she'd" pay for the canoe. Blennerhassett told Nahum Bent to take the two horses and pass around Gallipolis before day, and then they might surround [go around] Gallipolis. After that a man by the name of Tupper laid his hands upon Blennerhassett, and said, "Your body is in my hands in the name of the commonwealth." Some such words as that he mentioned. When Tupper made that motion there were seven or eight muskets levelled at him. Tupper looked about him and said, "Gentlemen, I hope you will not do the like." One of the gentlemen who was nearest, about two yards off, said, "I'd as lieve as not." Tupper then changed his speech, and said he wished him to escape safe down the river, and wished him luck. Tupper before told Blennerhassett he should stay and stand his trial. But Blennerhassett said no; that the people in the neighborhood were coming down next day to take him, and he would go. Next day after I saw the Wood county militia going down. The people went off in boats that night about one. Question. All? Answer. All but one, who was a doctor. All belonging to the boats had some kind of arms. Some of the boats were on the shore and some not.

Mr. Hay.—How many men were there in all? Answer. About twenty or thirty; I did not, however, count them. Every man belonging to the boats that I took notice of had arms.

Mr. Coleman (one of the jury.) What day, month, or year, was this? Answer. In the fall of the year. I don't recollect the month or particular time, but there was snow on the ground.

Mr. Hay.—Do you recollect whether it snows in September? Answer. I do not know.

Mr. Sheppard (one of the jury.) Was Tupper a magistrate or officer? Answer. I know not. Question. Where had Blennerhassett been? Answer. In Kentucky.

Mr. Wirt.—Had you seen Colonel Burr on the island? Answer. Yes. Question. Was he there before Blennerhassett went to Kentucky? Answer. He was. Question. Did you speak of the boats under the command of Tyler? Answer. I did. Question. Did the boats quit the island at the time of hearing about the proclamation? Answer. Yes. Question. Did the Wood county militia go there next day? Answer. Yes.

Question by Mr. Parker (one of the jury.) Did you hear Peter Taylor give advice? Answer. I did not.

Question by Mr. Parker. Did you see Peter Taylor converse with Blennerhassett that night? Answer. I do not recollect; I was busy about the boats.

Question by the same. How long did Aaron Burr remain on the island? Answer. I do not recollect.

Question by the same. How long had he been there before the departure of the boats? To this question he first answered that he did not know, and that Mr. Burr never returned back to the island; but after some reflection he said that he had been there about six weeks before the departure of the boats.

Mr. Sheppard (one of the jury.) How long was Blennerhassett absent? Answer. I don't know. I did not live on the island.

Mr. Burr.—Was that Mr. Tupper called General Tupper? Answer. He was. Question. Did you know General Tupper? Answer. Yes. Question. Is that the gentleman? (pointing to General Tupper, who was present in court.) Answer. Yes. Question. When the muskets were levelled at him, did they seem to have a mind to hurt him? Answer. Yes. A gentleman near me said, "I'd as lieve shoot as not."

Mr. Burr.—You said differently on a former occasion. Don't you recollect making a statement in which nothing was said about levelling guns at him, and that it looked like exercising? Answer. I do not.

A desultory conversation here ensued between the opposite counsel.

Mr. Burr professed that it was his intention to degrade the witness by invalidating his credibility.

Mr. Hay said that it was very probable if this man had at different times stated what seemed to be contradictory, he did it through ignorance; and Mr. Burr insisted that an error through ignorance might be as injurious to him as an error through immorality; he cared not which; that the consequences to him were in both cases the same.

Mr. Burr.—Have you not been examined before? Answer. Yes. Question. By whom? Answer. By Mr. Jackson. Question. Had he not printed questions in his hand? Answer. He had a paper in his hand. Question. Did he set down your answers? Answer. Yes. Question. How long after the guns were pointed at General Tupper before the men went to their boats? Answer. I do not recollect. Anything I am not certain of I cannot speak to. Question. Was Mrs. Blennerhassett there when the guns were pointed? Answer. Yes. Question. Was Tupper inside of the circle? Answer. Yes. Question. Was she too? Answer. I don't recollect. Question. Did you see Mr. Woodbridge there? Answer. I don't know him. He lived in the state of Ohio. Question. How long did you work with Blennerhassett? Answer. Six weeks. Question. At what time was it you saw me there? Answer. I do not recollect.

Mr. Burr.—The counsel for the United States know, I presume, this circumstance, and have testimony to ascertain it.

Mr. Hay.—We have not, as far as I am informed.

Mr. Burr.—If they have no objection, I will state when I was on the island.

Mr. Hay said he had not.

Mr. Burr then said that it was on the last day of August and the first of September that he was on the island.

Question. Were the boats in the stream, or close to the land, when General Tupper wished them good luck? Answer. In shore.

Mr. Anthony (one of the jury.) Did you see any powder? Answer. No.

Mr. Hay.—Were you in the boats? Answer. I was not.

Mr. Burr.—Where does General Tupper live? Answer. In Marietta. Question. Does he not belong to the state of Ohio? Answer. Yes. Question. When did you first know him? Answer. Last fall.

Question by Mr. Parker. Where did you live before you went to work on the island? Answer. About a mile from the island.

Mr. Burr then asked the clerk for the statement which he had taken of Allbright's testimony, when it was submitted to the court on a former occasion, on the motion for binding himself in a higher bail. The clerk handed him the copy, and the prisoner proceeded with the examination.

Question. You said before that the men who raised their muskets against General Tupper were not in earnest? Answer. That was a piece of my opinion. I did not know whether they were in earnest, as there was no quarrel among them, and no firing afterwards.

Mr. Carrington, (one of the jury,) reminded him of an expression of one of the party, "I had as lieve as not shoot," which showed that they were in earnest.

Mr. Burr.—I beg the court to call on the prosecution for the deposition of this witness, taken before John G. Jackson.

Mr. Hay said that he would not let gentlemen have access to his portfolio when they pleased; that he must be satisfied by reasons assigned or required by the order of the court, before he produced it.

The CHIEF JUSTICE was not satisfied that the court had a right to call for the affidavit.

Mr. Hay observed that Mr. Jackson might not have taken down the testimony of the witness in his language, but couched it in his own; hence there might be an apparent variation between the present evidence and the affidavit, but that there was no real variance; that the object of Mr. Jackson's taking his affidavit was merely to ascertain whether he ought to be summoned as a witness or not; that this was the object in taking all the testimony which had been collected; that his affidavit was therefore general; but that the man, after finding that he was to be summoned as a witness, had revolved the subject in his own mind, and recollected many circumstances which had not before occurred to him.

Mr. Burr.—We have a right to coerce this paper. If gentlemen will not surrender it, I may at all events avail myself of their refusal. My object is to prove such a diversity between the statements of the witness at different times as may destroy all faith in his recollection.

Mr. Hay.—Then, sir, although I might retain this paper, the gentlemen are welcome to make all the use of it they can. Take it.

Mr. Burr then proceeded. When you said that all had guns, did you mean to say that all in the circle, or all of them together without exception had arms? Answer. There were seven or eight who had guns, and there were other arms; but there might be more men than guns. Question. How many were in the circle? Answer. I did not count them. Qustion. What kind of guns had they? Answer. Rifles and shot guns. Question. Did you see any guns with bayonets? Answer. I saw none.

Mr. MacRae.—When did you see most arms? in the day, or in the night? Answer. I saw more arms in the day; but it was in the night that I saw most armed men.

Mr. Parker (one of the jury.) Why did you think that all of them had arms? Answer. Because I was with them almost all night. In the day I saw some of them shooting at marks, and I saw other arms at that time lying upon the beach.

Mr. Wickham.—Did you see them all with arms at once? Answer. No.

Question by the same. How many arms did you see in the whole, or at any one time and place together? Answer. I cannot tell.

Question by the same. Did you know the men who had arms? Answer. I did not.

Question by the same. Did you know the names of the other men? Answer. No.

Question by the same. Would you know any of them if you saw them? Answer. I would not. They are all strangers to me.

Question by the same. How could you distinguish the arms seen in the daytime from those seen late in the evening, or at night? Answer. I cannot answer.

Question. How, then, are you certain that you did not see the same arms at different times, in the hands of different persons? To this question he made no answer.

Peter Taylor was then called, and Mr. Hay asked him whether he had not seen Mr. Burr on the island. He answered he had not.

Mr. Burr.—If the gentlemen have done with the overt act, or when they have done, I will thank them to inform me, for then we shall have some considerations to offer to the court.

Mr. Hay.—We have other additional testimony to offer on this very point: the assemblage of men on the island.

Maurice P. Belknap was called, but did not answer.

William Love was then sworn.

Mr. Hay.—Were you on Blennerhassett's Island? Answer. Yes; but I was not there at the time when Colonel Tyler's boats arrived there. I was then at Marietta; and it was on Sunday that I went down in a skiff with two barrels of salt. Question. How many boats were at the island? Answer. Four. Question. How many men? Answer. I cannot tell you, but I suppose about betwixt twenty and twenty-five belonging to Colonel Tyler's boats. When I arrived on the island, Blennerhassett met me. Question. Did you see any arms? Answer. I saw the men and rifles. I know that Mr. Blennerhassett took away with him one brace of horse pistols, a brace of pocket pistols, and a dirk. Some fusees were put in the boat, but not more than three or four, all belonging to him. Question. And what arms had Tyler's men? Answer. Pistols, dirks and rifles, they brought there, but all were not armed with rifles. I know not whether they were armed with different things. Some of the men had guns, some had dirks. Being, as how, Mr. Blennerhassett's servant, that is, his groom, I went down the river with him. Question. Did you see Taylor and Allbright there? Answer. I knew Peter Taylor very well. I saw him there the morning of the day I went away, and I saw Allbright also. I saw Mr. Woodbridge, too. Question. What time did you set sail? Answer. We were the last to embark, and we started between twelve and one, as well as I can recollect. We parted with General Tupper in the greatest friendship, so I understood from others. I do not know that I saw him. I was the last man who went into the boat. Question. Did you see the prisoner on the island? Answer. I never saw Colonel Burr on the island. I first saw him at Natchez about two and a half years ago. Question. What took place after you left the island? Answer. That night was very cold. The next morning we stopped and made fires. Mr. Blennerhassett and Colonel Tyler went ashore and called the company together; and the best I could make out was, I understood that the governor of Ohio had uttered state warrants against Mr. Blennerhassett and Tyler, and that they wanted to make their escape as fast as possible. I went down with the party to Bayou Pierre, where——

Mr. Burr expressed a wish that the attention of the witness should be at present confined to the transactions on the island. He said that gentlemen ought to confine themselves to evidence of the overt act; that they would submit the question to the court; that it would be too late to discuss the question whether the evidence ought to be submitted to the jury, after it should have been all heard.

Mr. Martin.—Gentlemen had better confine themselves to facts within the district of Virginia. When they travel beyond the district, we shall have some important questions to bring forward. We shall object to the production of such evidence.

Mr. Hay acquiesced for the present in this arrangement.

Mr. Burr.—Were not some of Mr. Blennerhassett's clothes put up in the boats? Answer. Yes. Question. Did you not insist in putting those things in the boats? Answer. Yes. Question. Were not his books put in boxes and trunks? Answer. None that I ever saw. Question. How long had you lived with Blennerhassett? Answer. Ten or twelve days before we started. Question. How many guns had the party? Answer. I do not know; many of the young men that came down with Tyler were out a gunning. Question. Did you see anything like military appearance? Answer. The men were in a state of preparation to defend themselves, because they expected people from the mouth of Kenahwa, to attack Blennerhassett and the island. And to the best of my opinion, they did not mean to be killed without some return of the shot. It was said at Marietta that the people of Kentucky were to attack them, and I suppose they would have done their best to defend themselves. I should be sorry if a man slapped me on my face without returning the blow. Question. Was there no disturbance among the party on the island? Answer. None; I did not part with my friends in England more comfortably than in parting with the people on the island. Question. Were they in fear of being attacked when they first met together? Answer. Not till Tyler's boats came down. I do not recollect to have seen General Tupper there.

Mr. Parker (one of the jury.) Did you ever see all the men with arms? Answer. I cannot say. When I got to the mouth of Cumberland river, I saw a chest of arms opened.

Mr. MacRae.—Were any chests of arms put into the boats when you left the island? Answer. Not that I know. They might or might not have been put on board without my seeing them. Many things were put into the boats before I got in.

Mr. Parker (one of the jury.) Had you no conversation with Blennerhassett about the expedition? Answer. Only that if I did not choose to go with him, he would recommend me to some travelling gentleman as a servant, or if I went to the Washita, he would make me a present of a piece of land.

Mr. Burr.—Did you see any arms but those belonging to Blennerhassett? Answer. I did not.

Question by the same. Did you see any guns presented? Answer. I did not. Question. Were they mostly young gentlemen who came in the boats? Answer. They looked like young gentlemen in that country.

Mr. Wirt.—Why did they go away in the night? Answer. They were afraid of being taken by warrants issued by the governor of Ohio.

Mr. MacRae.—Was the chest which you saw opened at the mouth of Cumberland the same as those that you saw go from the island? Answer. No. Question. What did you think of this business? Answer. I understood the object of the expedition was to settle Washita lands.

Mr. Hay.—What kind of looking men were they? Answer. They looked like gentlemen, such as live upon their own property. Question. Did they look like men used to work? Answer. They did not. Question. When did you see Mr. Blennerhassett that night down at the beach? Answer. Late that night; it was a very cold night, raining and freezing; it was generally expected that the people would come and destroy Blennerhassett's house.

Mr. Parker (one of the jurymen.) Did you see any bullets run? Answer. Yes; but I do not know how many. I was a servant in the house, but could not mind my own business and other people's too.

Dudley Woodbridge was next sworn.

Mr. Hay.—Were you on the island when the boats left it? Answer. I slept there that night.

Mr. Wirt.—What party do you mean? Answer. I allude to the four boats with Comfort Tyler, Mr. Smith, and others. Question. Were you at the boats? Answer. I passed them about dusk. Question. Did you see any of the men? Answer. I came to the island about dusk. I saw five or six standing about the boats. I went directly up from the landing to the house, and saw fifteen or twenty men in one of the rooms of Mr. Blennerhassett's house. Question. Had they any arms in their hands when you saw them? Answer. I recollect to have seen no arms but two pairs of pistols on the bureau of the room where I slept, which were gone in the morning.

Mr. Hay.—Had you no communication with Mr. Burr or Mr. Blennerhassett about this expedition? Will you inform us what you know on this subject? Answer. About the beginning of September or last of August, Mr. Blennerhassett, (with whom I had been connected in commercial business for six or eight years past, under the firm of Dudley Woodbridge and Company,) called with Colonel Burr at our counting-house at Marietta. Mr. Blennerhassett observed that Colonel Burr wished us to purchase a quantity of provisions. I am not positive that Mr. Burr was present when he first mentioned the subject, but I think he was. Colonel Burr then went into an inquiry about the prices of different kinds of provisions, and the expense of boats best calculated to carry provisions up and down the river. After his making a number of inquiries and receiving such information as I could give him, he left a memorandum of such provisions as he wanted, and of the boats which he wished to have built. They were to be on the Schenectady model, such as are used on the Mohawk river. The number ordered was fifteen; only eleven were completed. Question. What were their dimensions? Answer. Principally ten feet wide and forty feet long; five were to be ten feet longer. Question. What provisions were ordered? Answer. Pork, flour, whisky, bacon, and kiln-dried meal; but no article was purchased but pork, the prices in our market being much higher than those limited in the memorandum. I immediately made a contract with Colonel Barker to build the boats, and proceeded to make arrangements for purchasing provisions. The boats were built up the Muskingum, about seven miles above Marietta, and were to be delivered on the 9th of December. On that morning, when they were to be brought down, (the 9th of December,) I saw six or eight armed men of the militia going to take possession of the boats. I set off for Blennerhassett's Island, but met Mr. Blennerhassett, Comfort Tyler, Mr. Smith, and some young men from Belpre, going up to take down the boats. I informed them of the proceedings at Marietta, and advised Mr. Blennerhassett not to go up. After some consultation, he determined not to go up, and returned to the island. I went back to Marietta to get some money and papers, and returned that evening to the island, after getting the papers.

Mr. Hay.—On what terms was the contract for the boats made? Answer. I made the contract for the boats with Colonel Burr, and agreed to take a draft on New York. When Mr. Blennerhassett handed me the draft, I expressed my dissatisfaction at the long sight at which it was drawn, (being ninety days,) observing that it would not become due until after the time in which the boats and provisions were to be delivered, and that I wished to run no hazard. Mr. Blennerhassett, with some warmth, asked me if I doubted Colonel Burr's honor. When I repeated that I wished to run no risk, he said that he would guarantee the draft, and be answerable himself, and that in the event of its not being paid I might charge it to him. The draft was drawn by Mr. Burr on Mr. Ogden, of New York. These were the boats which Smith, Tyler, Blennerhassett, and the young men, were going up to receive.

Mr. Hay.—Do you recollect where the boats were to be delivered by the contract? Answer. Colonel Barker undertook to bring them, but there was no contract to deliver them at any particular place.

Mr. Parker. Did you say that it was the 9th day of December that the boats were to go away? Answer. The boats were to be delivered on the 9th, but those that were at the island went away on the 10th. When Colonel Barker was bringing them to Marietta they were taken by General Buel, as I understood, by order of the governor of Ohio.

Mr. MacRae.—State what occurrences took place on the island. Answer. I arrived about dusk, and immediately inquired about Mr. Blennerhassett. I stated to him that I was ready to adjust our partnership concerns, and that I had brought down the money and papers for that purpose. We went up stairs. We were two hours engaged in the business, after settling which I set off to go across the river home, and met Mr. Belknap at the shore. He asked me to go back with him—that he had business to do. I returned with him. We went both to bed at nine o'clock at night, where I remained, and did not, as the witness Peter Taylor states, go to the shore with the party when they went off. His saying that I was there then is a mistake, as this gentleman (Mr. Belknap) can prove.

Mr. Hay.—State to the court and jury for whom the boats were built. Was the contract made for the company? Answer. Yes; it may be so considered, but it was not particularly specified. Mr. Blennerhassett first introduced the subject, and Mr. Burr then spoke. As to the use for which these boats were intended, Mr. Blennerhassett made some communications to me respecting it. Shall I now state to the court these communications? (He was requested to proceed.) Late in August, or early in September, Mr. Blennerhassett mentioned to me that he had embarked in an enterprise with Colonel Burr; that General Eaton and some others were engaged in it, and that the prospects were flattering. Our first conversation lasted but a few minutes. The next week I was at the island, when he went into further particulars. From what he stated, the inference I drew was that his object was Mexico. He did not positively say so, but I inferred it from several circumstances, particularly from a map of that country which he showed me. He spoke highly of the country—stated its advantages, wealth, fertility, and healthiness. He asked me if I had a disposition to join. I evaded his question, but could not forbear telling him that I preferred my situation to an uncertainty, (which was the same as declining it.) On the way up to Marietta, he observed that he did not wish me to say anything about his conversation on this subject. This is the substance of my testimony.

Mr. Hay.—Do you recollect any further detail of the plan or object of the expedition? Answer. I do not.

Mr. Hay.—What became of the boats and the pork you purchased? Answer. The pork was taken and sold by order of the president or government; it was sold, as I understood, by General Buel. The boats, or a part of them, were afterwards fitted out by the government for transports, to convey troops from Marietta to St. Louis.

Colonel Burr.—Do you recollect that I told you that I wanted the description of boats used in the Mohawk river; and were they not made for shoal water, and to go up the stream? Answer. You did. The boats were to be calculated for shallow water.

Colonel Burr.—You know Mr. Blennerhassett well. Was it not ridiculous for him to be engaged in a military enterprise? How far can he distinguish a man from a horse?

Ten steps? Answer. He is very near-sighted. He cannot know you from any of us, at the distance we are now from one another. He knows nothing of military affairs. I never understood that he was a military man.

Question by the same. What became of his library? Answer. Part of it was carried down by Mrs. Blennerhassett; the residue was left behind and has been since sold.

Question by the same. Do you recollect when I was at Marietta? Was it not about the last of August or first of September? Answer. I left Philadelphia about the middle of August, and on my return I saw you about the time you mention. I have never heard that you have been there since. Question. What became of the draft on Mr. Ogden for two thousand dollars? Answer. It was paid. Question. What quantity of pork did you purchase for me? Answer. About one hundred barrels. Question. At what price? Answer. It cost about twelve, and was charged at thirteen dollars per barrel. Question. What became of it? Answer. I stored it in Mr. Green's cellar, adjoining our store. It was taken and sold by General Buel, by order of the government, as already mentioned; that is, as I understood. Question. Did you demand it of Mr. Green? (The answer to this question was not heard.) Question. To whom did you consider the pork as belonging when seized? Whose loss was it, yours or mine? Answer. It may hereafter become a dispute. Question. What were the boats estimated to be worth? Answer. Colonel Barker's bill for the eleven boats amounted to twelve or thirteen hundred dollars.

Mr. Martin.—Were you at any time that evening on the water's side with Mr. or Mrs. Blennerhassett? Answer. I was not.

Mr. Wirt.—You were asked, sir, about Mr. Blennerhassett's military talents. Permit me to ask you what were his pecuniary resources? What was the state of his money matters? Answer. I believe they are not as great as was generally imagined. I gave him six thousand dollars for one-half of his profits of our business. He had about three thousand dollars in stock in our company's concern. His fortune is much less than is generally understood. He had not over five or six thousand dollars in the hands of his agent at Philadelphia. His island and improvements cost about forty or fifty thousand dollars. It would not, however, sell for near that sum, except to a person of the same cast with Mr. Blennerhassett. After building his house, his property, exclusive of the island and five negroes, amounted probably to seventeen thousand dollars.

Question by Mr. Coleman, (the juror.) Explain again, if you please. In what did that property consist, and how much money could he command? Answer. He had nine thousand dollars in my hands in stock and profits already stated, and about one thousand dollars on another account, and the money in his agent's hands, besides his island and negroes. Question. Had he no foreign funds? Answer. I think he had none. They were vested in American stock some years before. Question. What was the amount of property he had in these funds? Answer. I believe the property left him by his father amounted to twenty thousand pounds sterling, which he vested in British three per cent. stock.

Mr. Wirt.—Is he esteemed a man of vigorous talents? Answer. He is; and a man of literature. But it was mentioned among the people in the country that he had every kind of sense but common sense; at least he had the reputation of having more of other than of common sense. Question. What are his favorite pursuits? Answer. Chemistry and music.

Mr. Hay.—Was Colonel Burr to have returned to the island? Answer. I believe so; I expected him to have returned in about two months—the time for the delivery of the boats.

Mr. Hay.—Had you received any money from Burr before the presentation of the draft by Blennerhassett? Answer. The draft was at so long a sight that I objected to letting the property out of my hands till I was secured by the responsibility of Mr. Blennerhassett. The balance over the two thousand dollars (the amount of the draft on Ogden) was to be paid by Mr. Burr on his return. He was to return in two months, and to complete the payment when the property was delivered.

Mr. Hay.—Did Mr. Blennerhassett bring you the draft? Answer. He did; but Burr made the contract with me.

Mr. Hay.—Do I understand you correctly in supposing that Mr. Burr contracted to pay two thousand dollars in one draft, and the balance on his return? Answer. You do.

Mr. Lee.—How many acres of land are in the island? Answer. Mr. Blennerhassett owned about one hundred and eighty acres, which was about half of the island, and cost him about five thousand dollars; but with the house and all, cost him forty or fifty thousand dollars, as already observed.

Mr. Hay.—Was not one of the boats fitted up for Mrs. Blennerhassett and family? Answer. One of the large boats was. Mr. Blennerhassett had taken a keel boat belonging to the firm up to Colonel Barker's to be fitted up for his family; but, by Colonel Barker's advice, he concluded to have one of the large boats prepared for that purpose, on account of its superior accommodation. This was accordingly done.

Mr. Hay.—Had not the delivery of the boats been interrupted by the armed men, would they not have been delivered to Blennerhassett? Answer. I suppose they would have been delivered at Marietta, where he would have received them.

Mr. Martin.—Was not the contract made by Colonel Burr with your firm? Answer. It was.

Question by the same. Do you understand that Colonel Burr has received any consideration for this sum of two thousand dollars thus paid? Answer. I do not know.

Mr. Wirt.—If the delivery of these boats had not been prevented, would they not have been delivered to Blennerhassett or Burr? Answer. They would have been delivered to either. The company contracted for them.

Mr. Hay.—If delivered to Mr. Blennerhassett, would you not have considered yourself as delivering them to one of Burr's associates? Answer. I cannot say what I should have thought.

Colonel Burr.—How came you to suppose yourself authorized to deliver the boats to Blennerhassett, since I gave the draft? Answer. I should in any event have considered myself justified in delivering the boats to him, as he guaranteed the payment for them, and he had property to a larger amount in my hands; and besides these considerations, early in September Blennerhassett had mentioned to me his having joined Colonel Burr.

Mr. Baker.—Did you make any stay upon the beach, on the night of their departure? Answer. I did not, for I returned immediately to the house with Mr. Belknap.

Mr. Botts.—Were the people peaceable on that night? Answer. Yes.

Question by the same. Did you hear any noise like that of war, the roaring of cannon, or the rattling of small-arms? Answer. None.

Mr. Wirt.—Did you hear any alarm in the evening about the militia from the Ohio side? Answer. There was some alarm in the evening.

Mr. Parker. Did Mr. Burr leave the island before Mr. Blennerhassett communicated to you his being joined with him? Answer. I do not precisely recollect the time of the communication; but I knew that Blennerhassett had connected himself with him in the same enterprise, and I would therefore have delivered the boats to him.

Mr. Coleman. Was Mr. Blennerhassett's determination to go away the effect of your having told him of the armed men going to take the boats? Answer. That information might have operated with other circumstances.

Mr. Parker. Did you see the president's proclamation on that day? Answer. No; that was Wednesday, and it came next Friday by the mail. It was handed to me by the postmaster. I did not hear of its being sent otherwise. I might have heard of it before, but I am not absolutely certain.

Mr. MacRae.—Did you hear anything of it before? Answer. I do not recollect distinctly. I believe that the printer at Marietta, who had been to Pittsburg, had brought some information about a proclamation; I have some idea that he might have mentioned that he had seen it.

Mr. Hay.—Did you hear anything of a state warrant? Answer. No. I did hear that the legislature of the state of Ohio were sitting with closed doors, in consequence of something communicated by Mr. Graham, and that it was probable that the boats would be stopped, and that they would suppress the enterprise.

Mr. Wickham.—Did you understand that Blennerhassett's boats, or the people on the island, would be taken? Answer. I did not suppose that they would go to Virginia, but that they would only stop the boats that were built pursuant to his contract up the Muskingum.

Mr. Hay.—What was the cause of his precipitate flight? Did you hear any particular observations from any of the party on the island? Answer. Mr. Blennerhassett told me that he would go off in three or four hours; and I heard Comfort Tyler say that he would not resist the constituted authorities, but that he would not be stopped by a mob.

Mr. Wirt.—At the time he said so was the legislature of Ohio understood to be in session with closed doors? Answer. It was; and I saw the militia of Wood county assembled the next day or the day after.

Mr. Burr.—Was there not some danger of being stopped by the ice if they had not gone off as soon they did? Answer. I thought so; and that it was also hazardous for Mrs. Blennerhassett to go. Tyler was detained two days by Blennerhassett.

Mr. MacRae.—Did Blennerhassett that night communicate his apprehensions to you? Answer. He did not.

Mr. Burr.—Were Tyler's party disorderly? Answer. They were not. Question. Did they do any mischeif? Were they guilty of any misconduct? Answer. None.

The court then adjourned till the next day at the usual hour.

Thursday, August 20, 1807.

The court met at the usual hour, when a desultory discussion took place, in which

Colonel Burr and his counsel insisted that the counsel for the prosecution should produce all the evidence which they had relative to the overt act, before they attempted to offer any collateral testimony; and again reminded them that as soon as all their testimony on that point was introduced they had certain propositions to submit to the court.

The counsel for the prosecution said that they had some more evidence to introduce on this point, and Simeon Poole was then sworn.

Mr. Hay.—Be so obliging as to say what you know with respect to the men on Blennerhassett's Island.

Simeon Poole. I never was on the island at that time, but was opposite to it. I saw boats and men there, if I mistake not, on the 10th of December. I arrived opposite the island about dusk, at the distance of about one hundred and fifty or two hundred yards from it. I do not know how many boats there were. I saw people walking about in the evening, and in the course of the night they kindled a fire, and I saw some persons by the light that appeared to be armed, as if they were sentinels.

Mr. Hay.—Why did you think they were so? Answer. I don't know that they were, but they appeared so to my view. I don't know positively what they were, but they appeared to have guns, and looked like sentinels. I did not go over that night, nor did I offer to go. Boats were passing and repassing during the night, from the island to the main land. Question. To whom did these boats belong? Answer. I do not know, but I presume to the island. There were large boats at the landing, but these were small boats. I did not speak to them. I stood as much undiscovered as possible, as I was authorized by the governor of Ohio to apprehend Blennerhassett. I went for that purpose.

Mr. Hay.—Do you recollect any indications of arrangements about a watch-word? Answer. Yes. In the course of the evening I found that some boats crossed, and when a particular word was given I observed there were some that did not cross. I heard others that were hailed across and a word given. They would hail for a boat. The people on the island would ask, "What boat?" If the answer was "I's boat," the boat immediately put off.

Mr. Parker. On what occasion was the watch-word used? Answer. When the people on the Ohio side wanted to go across, they would hail or call for a boat. The people on the island would ask, "What boat?" and if the answer were, "I's boat," the boat would immediately put off.

Mr. Burr.—Till what hour did you stay out that night? Answer. I imagine it was as late as 10 o'clock. Question. Was it not cold enough to render a fire pleasant? Answer. It was. Question. Is it not usual for boats to build fires on the bank when it is so cold? Answer. It is. There seemed to be a considerable number of men on the island that evening, going up and down, to and from the house. The witness further observed that lanterns were passing during the night between the house and boats, as if there were business between them; that he could not say whether the persons whom he had called sentinels were not merely loitering around the fire; that he thought it likely that if he, too, had used the watch-word the boats would have put off for him; that he lived on the Ohio side; that he could not distinguish well, but he apprehended that some of them had guns, but most of the people were without guns.

Mr. Burr.—Do you not commonly hail boats when you wish to cross the river? Answer. It is not common to give a word. There were several boats hailed by people who did not use that word, and these people were not sent for; but there was no instance where the boat was not sent for the party hailing where that watch-word was used.

Maurice P. Belknap was then sworn.

Mr. Hay.—Will you tell us, sir, what you saw on the island? Mr. Belknap. On the evening of the 10th of December, I was at the island of Mr. Blennerhassett. I arrived there between 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening. I hailed a boat, and they asked my name. Having given it, a skiff was immediately sent over with two of Blennerhassett's servants. Having crossed, I met with Mr. Woodbridge, who returned to the house with me. When I went into the house, I observed in the room, when I first entered, a number of men, who, from the promiscuous view I had of them, might have been about twenty.

Mr. Hay.—What were they doing? Answer. The two or three I noticed near the door had rifles, and appeared to be cleaning them. These were all the arms I saw, for I merely passed through the room where they were. Near the place where I landed there appeared to be two or three boats, and people about them. It was a dark evening, and the lights in the boats was the only circumstance which made me notice them.

Mr. Burr.—Did you give a watch-word when they brought you over? Answer. I gave no watch-word; I only gave my name; but they brought me over.

Edmund P. Dana was next sworn.

Mr. Dana. I never saw Colonel Burr on the island.

Mr. Hay.—Will you state what you know about their number and arms? Answer. On the evening of the 10th of December I understood that the boats were to start with Comfort Tyler and his men down the river. Two other young men and myself were determined to cross over from Belpré, where I live, to the island. We went down to the landing opposite the island about dusk, took a skiff, and landed at the upper part of the landing. We then went up to the house. Tyler's boats lay below our own about seven or eight rods. I heard some person talking on board, but it was dark, and I could not distinguish any one. We went into the hall, a large room, where there were a number of men. I remained but a short time, and did not count them. I cannot say how many there were, but I should judge there were about fifteen or sixteen. One of them was running some bullets, and there was nothing but hubbub and confusion about the large fire. I was then introduced into a chamber, where there were Colonel Tyler, Blennerhassett, Mr. Smith, of New York, as they said, and three or four other gentlemen. I was introduced to Mr. Smith and Dr. McCassley, (or McCastle,) who had his lady, if I mistake not, there. I had been introduced to Colonel Tyler the day before.

Mr. Randolph.—Were you a perfect stranger to the people in the hall? Answer. I was.

Question by the same. Was there any alarm on your going in? Answer. They did not appear to be alarmed.

Mr. Coleman (one of the jury) addressed the court. Is it proper to ask any questions about the conversations which took place with those gentlemen?

Mr. Burr.—If any of the jury think proper, I have no objection. The inquiry was not pressed.

Before the examination of Mr. Belknap and Mr. Dana, an interesting and animated discussion took place.

Mr. Burr said: Before the gentleman proceeds with his evidence, I will suggest that it has appeared to me that there would be great advantage and propriety in establishing a certain principle founded upon the facts which have been presented to the court. He said the facts which had been presented were to be taken for granted; and yet they utterly failed to prove that any overt act of war had been committed; and it was admitted that he was more than one hundred miles distant from the place where the overt act is charged to have been committed. He denied that any evidence was admissible to connect him with other persons, in acts done by them in his absence, and even done without his knowledge; or that facts brought from distant places could be connected with those done at Blennerhassett's Island, to give to the acts done there the name of treason, when no overt act of war was committed at that place. He commented upon the opinion of the supreme court in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout, and said that it had been totally misunderstood by the counsel for the prosecution. The defence had the right here to call upon the attorney for the United States to say whether an assemblage of men merely can be called, or in any way tortured into an act of "levying war." This point must be inevitably determined at some stage of the examination, and therefore they had the right to require of the prosecutor to show that every witness will give testimony tending to prove an overt act of war, or his testimony would be irrelevant and immaterial. Another point was, whether a person not present, remote, in another district, can be considered, in any possible legal construction, to be present, and concerned in the transaction, so as to make him a principal in the guilt of it. If not, then the necessity of examining the remainder of these 135 witnesses is done away, because their testimony can have no bearing on the case. If, said he, the gentlemen mean or expect to prove an overt act; if they mean to prove that I am the source of the whole transaction, and that there was anything like an act of violence on Blennerhassett's Island, and that there was actual war waged, actual exertion of force used, a collision of arms, or the like, then to be sure the case will have a right to go on to that point; but even then there would be an absurdity, because of my being absent at that time, at a distance where I could not take a part in it. The gentlemen who are engaged with me as my counsel will enlarge on these points, and, if I am not mistaken, they will prove that this is the moment when the argument and decision will be most applicable, because upon the result will rest the future fate of the case.

Now, if my ideas are right, the gentlemen mean to argue that a bare assemblage of men, coupled with previous treasonable declarations, is treason. I understand that they mean to contend further, that a person not being present, but absent from the place where the treason is laid, he having counseled and advised the operations, should be denominated a principal in the treason. But this, I shall contend, is a species of constructive treason. Again: I shall ask what an accessory means, and prove that if it means what they think it does, resort must be had to the exploded common law of England. These questions, sir, will demand some attention from the court, and will be extremely interesting to the country at large, because every man might be affected by them. Gentlemen ought to come forward and say that they mean to charge me upon the common law: that though there was no force used in reality, yet by construction there was force used; that though I was not personally present, yet that by construction I was present; that though there really was no military array, yet by construction there was military array. Now, sir, we totally deny all these things, upon the soundest principles, and it is full time that it should be known what is, and what is not, the law on the subject.

Mr. Hay said he had no objection to any fair inquiry into these principles; but the motion was premature. He believed testimony would be introduced, and that presently, which would give a very different aspect to the transactions on Blennerhassett's Island to what had appeared. Although there was not on that island what Mr. Lee had called "open war," no "collision of arms," or "hard knocks," they would prove that there was "military array"; that the men were collected for military purposes, and that a military object was in view. It was impossible then to tell in what precise light the transactions on Blennerhassett's Island would ultimately appear, because new light was every moment coming in. He asked if the court after all that had been exposed, and with the uncertainty as to what might be brought to view, would undertake to say that an overt act of treason had not been proved. That was a fact to be ascertained by the jury. It was their province, and theirs only, to say whether the act has or has not been committed. The object of the motion was not to save time, but it was to prevent the public from seeing what they ought to see. He denied that there was any privilege or authority in this court, or in the courts of Great Britain, to arrest inquiry and tell the jury that the act had not been proved, and therefore there was an end to the case. When the whole of the testimony should be laid before the court, it would then be in the power of the accused to address to the court a motion to instruct the jury on any point of law which the circumstances of the case might require. It would then become the duty of the court to take up the subject and say what is the law upon the case; and the jury would take the facts under their views, and regulate their verdict agreeably to the law and the facts that may appear.

He did not understand what the common law had to do with any inquiry before our courts, except it was any part of it adopted by statute. He was willing to steer clear of the common law, and go entirely upon the principles of statutory law and common sense. The case was a charge for an overt act of treason in levying war. Would common sense say, or would our statutes or constitution require that the person who had produced all this commotion should be present when the battle was fought, or even when the troops were collected for the enterprise? He conceived the question to be, whether the accused was principally concerned with it—whether he did project and carry it on with a design to complete it? And how could this be ascertained, unless the prosecution were permitted to go on with the evidence?

Mr. Wickham, in answer to the allegation that it was not a proper time to bring forward such a motion, denied that, during the whole three days that had been occupied in the examination of witnesses, there had been a single word, by any one witness, that could tend in the least to support the indictment. It is proved, (said he,) and the attorney for the United States declares, that Colonel Burr was not present at the time and place charged. Now we declare that it is absolutely necessary to prove the fact of presence at once: we say the indictment must inevitably fail without it. The counsel for the accused propose now to go into this question, and I trust the court will hear them. He would give an intimation to the counsel for the prosecution, that they should take a wide and extensive range on the subject, and by which they were convinced there would be a stop put to the case at once.

Mr. Burr added: The gentlemen were about to proceed to connect me with the act. I deny, sir, that they can do so. They admit that I was not there, and therefore let the nature of the transaction be what it may, it cannot affect me. Again: I deny that there was war, at all, and no testimony can be brought to prove that there was war; and surely the article war is of imperious necessity in the charge of treason. Now, if this be true, will the court go on week after week, discovering nothing that can affect me? I was desirous that the court, the jury, and the country should know what was charged against me; this has been done, and it has been found that I cannot be connected with the facts. I demand the opinion of the court on these points.

Mr. Martin spoke of the great length of time that the trial would probably last, if the prosecutor was permitted to go on in his own way. It was a very sickly season, and the probability of sickness among some of the jury or the court was very great, which would prevent the case going on. If one of the jurors should die, however far the case may have progressed, the trial must begin anew.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said that there was no doubt that the court must hear the objections to the admissibility of the evidence; it was a right, and gentlemen might insist on it. But as some of the transactions on Blennerhassett's Island remained yet to be gone into, he suggested whether it would not be as well to postpone the motion till that evidence was gone through.

Mr. Burr.—I have no objection to that, if they do confine themselves to Blennerhassett's Island, and strictly to transactions on that island; if so, we will hear it.

Mr. Hay said that the connection was meant to be proved; that the prisoner was not only connected, but principal in it, although absent.

(Belknap and Dana were then introduced, and testified as hereinbefore stated.)

Mr. Botts moved the court to direct the marshal to make payment daily of their allowance to about twenty witnesses, summoned for the accused, most of whom were so poor that they could not subsist without it. He had hoped the marshal would have paid them without this application. Colonel Burr thought them material, and summoned them from the best information he could obtain; and when the United States even imprisoned witnesses to compel their attendance, those of the accused ought at least to be supplied with the means of subsistence.

The marshal said that as the number of witnesses was so great, and many of them were said to know nothing of the subject in controversy, he was cautioned by the attorney for the United States not to pay them till their materiality was ascertained, or till the court ordered him.

Mr. Hay said that the expenses were so enormous, that they would be felt by the national treasury, though it was full. This justified the caution alluded to; and the laws contemplated to pay the witnesses as soon as they gave their evidence.

Colonel Burr said that when the attorney cautioned the marshal, it was supposed that he had summoned between two and three hundred witnesses, whereas the truth was that they did not exceed twenty; that they were material; that some of them were summoned to repel what might be said by the witnesses for the United States; that the United States had many advantages in commanding the attendance of their witnesses, which he had not; that he would not acquiesce in the establishment of a principle that might prove injurious to others; that the witnesses ought to be paid, and he hoped that there would be no more difficulty made on the subject.

After some more desultory observations, as the witnesses were stated and considered to be material, the court directed the payment to be made by the marshal.

Mr. Wickham then renewed the subject of objecting to the evidence, and again urged the gentlemen who prosecuted to adduce, if they could, any more testimony in support of what they deemed the overt acts.

Mr. Hay objected to their course of proceeding, but added that he had only one or two more witnesses on that point, who were then absent, and if gentlemen were determined to make their motion, they might proceed.

(Subsequently, on Friday, the 21st of August, after Mr. Wickham had concluded the opening argument on the motion to arrest the evidence, the prosecution introduced the following additional testimony, which they admitted to be all they had relating to the transactions on Blennerhassett's Island:)

Israel Miller was then sworn.

Question by Mr. Hay.—Were you on the island, Mr. Miller, with Blennerhassett and his party, at the time charged in the indictment, the 10th of December last? Answer. I arrived on the island between the 7th and 10th of December last, in company with Colonel Tyler, who had four boats.

Question by the same. How many men had he with him? Answer. About thirty-two men.

Question by the same. What proportion of arms had they? Answer. Five rifles and about three or four pairs of pistols are all that I know of. I joined them at Beaver, and went down with them to Blennerhassett's Island, and there I saw one blunderbuss, two pairs of pistols, and one fusee. I do not know that there were any more.

Question by Colonel Burr.—How many bullets did you see run? Answer. I only saw one man run bullets.

Pearley Howe was then sworn.

Mr. Hay.—Will you be pleased to say what you know of the party on the island, their arms and conduct? Answer. I was not on the island during their stay on it. I was applied to by Mr. Blennerhassett to make about forty boat poles. On the evening of the 10th day of December I went to the landing (on the Ohio side) to deliver them, being called upon to do so, and Blennerhassett sent his flat to receive them. In this flat were two sentinels, being two young men, each of them armed with a rifle.

Mr. Hay.—State what you know of their arms on the island.

Mr. Howe. I flung the poles down the bank and offered them assistance, but they said they had men enough. One of my neighbors, Mr. Allan Wood, wished to go over in the flat, but they refused to take him, saying they had orders not to let any person go with them from the Ohio side.

Question by Mr. Hay.—Did you see any arms but the two rifles? Answer. None but those in the hands of these two young men. One of them laid down his rifle in the bow of the flat, and stowed away the poles as they were handed in, while the other sat on the bow and held his rifle across his thighs. I saw men on the island for three or four days, who were said to be Tyler's or Blennerhassett's men.

Question by Mr. MacRae.—Did you see those two men who were guards leave the boats? Answer. I did not; they stayed there constantly.

Question by Mr. MacRae.—Did you know these men? Were they not all strangers to you except Peter Taylor? Answer. They were.

Question by Mr. Burr to Mr. Miller.—Did you see General Tupper there? Answer. I did not see him, but I understood that he was there.

Question by the same. Did you see any disturbance there? Answer. No.

Question by the same. Were you with the boats all the time? Answer. I was.

Mr. Wirt.—Did you join this party there, or come with them? Answer. I came from Beaver with them.

The argument of this important motion, which finally put an end to the case, was commenced on Thursday, the 20th, and concluded on Saturday, the 29th of August, having occupied the attention of the court for eight days, during a session of seven hours each day. It was conducted on both sides with great ability, and elicited from Chief Justice MARSHALL, when he came to deliver his masterly opinion, the following high compliment: "A degree of eloquence seldom displayed on any occasion has embellished a solidity of argument and a depth of research, by which the court has been greatly aided in forming the opinion it is about to deliver."

The order in which the arguments were delivered was as follows: Mr. Wickham commenced the opening argument in support of the motion on Thursday, the 20th, and concluded on Friday the 21st; on which day Mr. Randolph followed on the same side. The court then, at the request of the counsel for the prosecution, adjourned till Monday, the 24th, to enable them to make preparation for answering the arguments which had been adduced. On Monday, Mr. MacRae made the opening argument on behalf of the prosecution. On Tuesday, the 25th, Mr. Wirt delivered his celebrated speech; after which Mr. Botts commenced an argument which he concluded on Wednesday, the 26th. On the same day Mr. Hay commenced an address, which he concluded on Thursday, the 27th. Mr. Lee followed in a comparatively brief but very lucid argument. Mr. Martin occupied the whole of Friday, the 28th, and the greater portion of Saturday, the 29th, in delivering the learned and searching, but ill-arranged and ungraceful argument, which, next to Mr. Wirt's, has probably obtained more celebrity than any other delivered in the case. Mr. Randolph then closed the discussion by a short address.

In giving abstracts and extracts of some of these arguments in the following pages, and omitting others altogether, no invidious distinction is intended to be made between them. But where so many counsel addressed the court at great length on the same question, as a matter of course the same ground was repeatedly travelled over; and to give abstracts of all would neither be consistent with the prescribed limits of this work, nor entertaining to the majority of readers.

Mr. Wickham, in opening the argument in support of the motion, laid down and elaborately discussed four propositions, in substance as follows:

1. That under the constitution of the United States no person can be guilty of treason, by levying war, unless he was personally present when and where an overt act of war was committed, and participated therein.

2. Even admitting this construction of the constitution to be wrong, and that a person who was not present at the committing of the overt act may be guilty of the crime of treason by relation, still the facts must be specially charged in the indictment, and proved as laid. And inasmuch as the indictment charges Mr. Burr with personally levying war with others on Blennerhassett's Island, no evidence to charge him with the act by relation, he being absent at the time it was committed, is relevant to the indictment. He should not only be charged specially with the assessorial acts imputed to him, but charged and tried in the district where said acts were committed.

3. That if aiders, abettors, and procurers in treason be considered as principals, yet their guilt is derivative, and can only be established by legal proof that the persons whose acts they are answerable for have committed treason; which legal proof can consist of nothing less than a record of their conviction.

4. That the evidence wholly failed to prove that an overt act of levying war had been committed on Blennerhassett's Island; and hence no evidence could be received to charge Col. Burr, by relation, with an act which had not been proved to have been committed.

In support of the first proposition, Mr. W. contended that the clauses of the constitution which declare that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," and that "no person shall be convicted, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act," must be construed according to the plain, natural import of the words. The constitution is a new and orginal compact between the people of the United States, and is to be construed, not by the rules of art belonging to a particular science or profession, but like a treaty or national compact, in which words are to be taken according to their natural import, unless such a construction would lead to a plain absurdity. It being new and original, and having no reference to any former act or instrument, forbids a resort to any other rules of construction than such as are furnished by the constitution itself, or the nature of the subject. Hence, artificial rules of construction, drawn from the common law and the usages of courts in construing statutes, cannot be resorted to, to prove that these words of the constitution are to be construed, not according to their natural import, but that an artificial meaning, drawn from the statute and common law of England, is to be affixed to them, entirely different.

But even if these words of the constitution are to have an artificial meaning, such as it is contended has been given them in the courts of England, he denied that even in that country the rule had practically obtained that all persons aiding and abetting others in the act of levying war against the government are guilty of treason, though not personally present, notwithstanding some dicta of the law writers to that effect.

He admitted that Lord Coke, and after him some other writers who are deservedly revered, had laid down the general proposition that there are no accessories in treason, either before or after the fact, but that all are principals. But no adjudications in the case of an accomplice in the nature of an accessory before the fact bear them out in it, except that of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, reported in 1 State Tr. pp. 63-76; and the conduct of the court on that occasion was so obviously contrary, not only to the rules of law and justice, but even to those of decency, that he persuaded himself the counsel on the other side would not rely on it as an authority. He read an account of this trial, from 4 Tuck. Bl. Comm. note B, p. 44.

He found in Tremaine's Pleas of the Crown (page 3) an indictment against Mary Speke for treason, in aiding the duke of Monmouth and others in levying war, with provisions; neither before nor after, but at the time when the treason was committed by the principals. She was not an accessory in fact, but an "aider" in the commission of the treason, and the case comes within the definition of "an aider or procurer," and belongs to the class of accessories before the fact. But neither history nor any report of the decision of the court (as far as he had been able to discover) informs us how the case was decided. It was in the fourth year of the reign of James II., when the spirit of persecution was very high, and was probably one of the cases decided by the execrable Jeffries, on the occasion of Monmouth's rebellion. Whether he carried this doctrine to the utmost length or not, he could not say, but presumed the counsel for the United States would not rely on it as a precedent, even if it applied.

He had been unable to find any other decisions that go to this point with respect to accomplices, in the nature of accessories before the fact, to treason in "levying war." As to the other great class of treasons in England, that of compassing the death of the king, the crime does not admit of an accessory before the fact, as distinguished from a principal; because the crime consists in the intention, and every person concerned is a party to the agreement, and therefore, from the nature of things, a principal.

In the lesser treasons, such as counterfeiting the coin, he had not met with any instance of a conviction of an accomplice before the fact.

He admitted that there were to be found in England a number of convictions of receivers of traitors and other aiders in the nature of accessories after the fact; and he admitted the correctness of the inference, that if these decisions were proper to be considered as precedents, the principle would apply to aiders and abettors before the fact. But before they ought to be regarded as precedents worthy of imitation, we should inquire in what times and under what circumstances these cases were decided. He had not found any of them since the revolution of 1688, when the principles of liberty and enlightened jurisprudence began to be better understood than before; and most of those previous to that event were decided by Jeffries; such as the case of Lady Lisle, 4 Whart. St. Tr. 106; John Fernley's Case, Id. 131; and Elizabeth Gaunt's Case, Id. 142. He read from Hume an account of the "atrocious legal murder" committed in the trial and conviction of Lady Lisle; also in the case of Mrs. Gaunt. He admitted that these cases and Throgmorton's were precedents, if the counsel for the prosecution chose to rely on them. They could find no other.

Since the revolution of 1688, though the doctrine has been admitted by the writers, yet all the decisions of the courts that bear upon the subject lead to a directly different conclusion. The greatest number of prosecutions for treason in levying war since that time grew out of the rebellion of 1745. We all know the history of those times, and what cruelties the late duke of Cumberland committed after the victory of Culloden. Yet there was not a single instance of a conviction for assisting or harboring traitors. History mentions the wonderful escape of the Pretender, and his concealment and protection by the unexampled courage and fidelity of Miss McDonald. Yet no attempt was made to convict her of treason, or others who aided him, or even to prosecute them.

He went into a review of the cases to show that in every instance the overt act was laid in the particular county where the accused had been present, participating in the rebellion, and that proof of his presence at the place where the overt act was charged was held to be necessary to sustain the indictment. Deacon's Case, Fost. Crown Law, 9, 10; Sir John Wedderburn's Case, Id. 22; and Lord Balmarino's Case, 9 Tr. 605,—were referred to and relied upon as sustaining this position. He read from Judge Tucker's treatise on the subject, to show how the erroneous doctrine laid down by the elementary writers, that "in treason all are principals," originated. 4 Tuck. Bl. Comm. Append. 40–47. But, (said Mr. W.,) admitting that both the theory and practice in the English courts concur in establishing the doctrine which the gentlemen contend for, and that any man connected in any manner with traitors is himself a traitor, yet I contend that it cannot be law in this country, where the constitution of the United States has pointed out and established a different rule. The statute in England, on which all the indictments are founded, is well known to be that of 25 Edw. III. It does not create any new treasons of which the punishments are pointed out, or enlarge the doctrine of treason; but on the contrary was intended to narrow the legal definition of this crime, which was punishable at common law.

In construing the statute, therefore, the judges considered it as made in affirmance of the common law, except, where the restraining clauses were permitted to operate; it was construed according to the course of the common law, and the doctrine that all are principals in treason, if it rests on any foundation, can have no other than the common law. 1 Hale, P. C., pp. 76–87, proves that this statute, 25 Edw. III., was made to confine and limit the crime of treason, "which was, before that statute, arbitrary and uncertain." In page 85 he calls it "the great boundary of treason," and shows that its object was to prevent constructive treasons. This salutary statute is also spoken of by Hume as a very popular act passed to narrow, define, and limit treasons known at common law.

Under the federal constitution, I presume, it will hardly be contended by the counsel for the prosecution that we have any common law belonging to the United States at large. I always did believe, and still believe, that we have no common law for the United States, especially in criminal cases. The only ground on which the common law becomes a rule of decision in the federal courts, is under that clause in the judiciary law (1 Stat. c. 20, § 34, p. 92), which makes the laws of the several states a rule of decision, as far as they respectively apply. The common law is part of the law of Virginia, and the act of congress has adopted the laws of Virginia as the rule of decision in cases where they apply.

With respect to crimes and offences against the United States, which must be punished in a uniform manner throughout the Union, it seems clear, for the reason already given, that none such can exist at common law, as the United States have in that character no common law, and that they must be created by statute. Unquestionably the gentlemen will not deny this uniformity; they will not contend that what is treason in Maryland is not treason in Virginia, or vice versa. If it exist at all, it must be uniform, embracing the whole of the United States. That the United States have no common law, and that offences against them must be created and prohibited by statute, is the opinion of the learned Judge Chase; and I believe that this opinion received the unqualified approbation of those who thought most unfavorably of his opinions and judicial conduct on other occasions.

Now, as there is no general common law of the United States, the act of congress must be construed without any reference to any common law, and treason is to be considered as a newly created offence, against a newly created government. In England treason and felony are classes or descriptions of offences at common law; they are generic terms; aiders and abettors are punished in the former, if you will, as principals, in the latter as accessories. It is a rule of law there that, when a statute is made in affirmance of the common law or to supply the defects of the common law, it should be expounded according to the common law. See McDaniel's Case, 10 How. State Tr. 436; Hob. 98.

It has therefore been held, that if an act, criminal at common law, be declared by a statute to be felony or treason, it being made to supply the defects of the common law, its prototype, the same consequences follow as if it were felony or treason by common law. It becomes therefore unnecessary to mention accessories, or even to define the punishment; and accordingly there are acts of parliament which go no further than to declare that the offences mentioned in them shall be felony, without even mentioning the punishment. This rule may be questioned on this ground, that penal statutes should be construed strictly; but it is generally considered as law in England, that when a felony is created by statute, accessories to it, though not named in the statute, are punishable; and that all legal consequences of felony are attached to it by the common law, except in cases where the special nature of the act leads to a different conclusion. This rule is illustrated by the decisions on the 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15, which makes piracy, an offence not punishable by common law, felony. It has been solemnly adjudged, that as this was not a common law offence, it worked no corruption of blood; that accessories to it were not punishable; in short, that the statute not being made in imitation or supply of the common law, shall not be construed according to the course of the common law.

If, therefore, I be right in my postulatum, that there is no common law of the United States, as such, it follows as a necessary consequence, that no persons can be punished for treason, or any other offence under an act of congress creating such offence, unless they come within the description of the act; that no person can be said to have levied war against the United States, where it had not been levied by himself, but by others; and that no overt act of others can, under the statute, be made his overt act. That such was the opinion of the framers of the act of congress (Laws U. S. 1 Stat. p. 100), for the punishment of treason and other offences is manifest. In sections 10 and 11 of the act, the punishment of accessories before and after the fact is defined; that of the former is death, as in the case of a principal; that of the latter, fine and imprisonment. If the English rule concerning accessories to felonies, were thought to obtain, to what purpose was the 10th section enacted? By the 10th section, the person who advises the piracy is declared to be an accessory and made punishable. If it were implied why was this provided? In section 16th, persons stealing military stores, their counsellors, aiders, and abettors are mentioned; why were they expressly mentioned if they would have been necessarily implied? In the 10th section some offences are enumerated, the accessories to which, before the fact, are expressly made punishable with death; and in the 11th section the accessories to the same crimes, after the fact, are in express terms made punishable with imprisonment not exceedings three years, and with fine not exceeding five hundred dollars; but even in this enumeration, treason is not included. In both sections the offences of murder, robbery, or other piracy, are mentioned, and in the latter felony is added. The obvious conclusion resulting from this provision in these sections is, that without it, accessories to those offences, neither before nor after, would have been punishable; and that as treason is omitted, accessories to that offence, whether before or after its commission, are not subject to be punished. The 23d section affords an argument still more directly applicable to the present question. It provides that "whoever shall by force set at liberty or rescue any person who shall be found guilty of treason, murder, or any other capital crime, or rescue any person convicted of any of the said crimes, going to execution, or during execution, every person so offending, and being thereof convicted, shall suffer death." "And if any person shall by force set at liberty or rescue any person who before conviction shall stand committed for any of the capital offences aforesaid, or if any person or persons shall by force set at liberty or rescue any person committed for or convicted of any other offence against the United States, every person so offending shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, and imprisoned not exceeding one year." This provision punishes those who rescue persons guilty of these crimes after conviction with death, but after commitment and before conviction, with fine and imprisonment only.

Now, according to the gentlemen's arguments, all are principals, as well the mere receivers after as the procurers, or the actual perpetrator of the offence. There is no distinction in the books. The English writers consider persons who rescue or set at liberty traitors as accessories after the fact; and they are said to be indictable as traitors. Why, then, was this clause inserted? A receiver of a traitor is as much a principal, according to the doctrine laid down in the English books, as a person aiding before the fact. Will the counsel for the United States contend that such a receiver is punishable as a traitor, while the person who forces open the doors of the prison, and rescues the principal out of the hands of the marshal, shall be punishable only by a fine of five hundred dollars, and by one year's imprisonment? If so, a man might rescue a traitor before conviction, and conduct him to another, who receives him. The receiver who, like Lady Lisle, only entertains him but for one night, would be punishable with death, while the rescuer and conductor, whose crime has the additional ingredient of force, and that force directly employed in opposing the administration of justice, would be only fined and imprisoned! It is so absurd and contrary to the rules of equal justice, that it is impossible that the legislature could have intended it. It proves that congress were of opinion that aiders and abettors were not, according to the constitutional definition of treason, traitors and principals. If this were an English statute, made with reference to the common law, I might with propriety contend that it was the intention of the legislature that when counsellors, aiders, and abettors of some offences are named and not those of others, those not mentioned should be considered as not within the meaning of the act according to the maxims of law. If this were not their intention, why did they mention these terms in one and not in the other?

But it will be said that in high treason it is unnecessary to mention counsellors, aiders, &c., because in treason there are no accessories; all are principals. Now this argument is founded on a total misapplication of terms. If they can be punished at all, it is as principals; but in point of fact, there may as well be aiders and abettors in treason as in other offences. Indeed, there are many instances to be found in the statute-books of these very words "aiders, counsellors, and abettors" being used and applied to treason. The statutory treasons between 25 Edw. III. and 1 Mary are collected by Lord Hale in the 24th chapter of his Pleas of the Crown, p. 258, and among others I would refer the court to 20 Hen. VI. c. 3, mentioned by him in page 270; 26 Hen. VIII. c. 13, and 27 Hen. VIII. c. 2, in page 275; 35 Hen. VIII. c. 1, in page 280; all of which, and I doubt not many more, expressly mention counsellors, aiders, and abettors. If it be not necessary to mention aiders and abettors to make them punishable, why are they inserted in these statutes? In page 275 "maliciously to wish, will, or desire, by word or writing, or by craft, to imagine, invent, practice, or attempt, any bodily harm to the king, queen, heir apparent, &c., to detain his castles," &c., is "enacted to be treason in the offenders, their aiders, counsellors, consenters, and abettors." "Counterfeiting the privy seal, privy signet, or sign manual, is made treason, and the offenders, their counsellors, aiders, and abettors, to suffer as in case of treason," &c. The statutes which are made with a reference to this law, mention aiders, counsellors, and abettors in some clauses, and not in others. Is not the inference fair that where they are not mentioned they are not intended to be subjected to punishment? And when congress took up the doctrine of treason with reference to the constitution, and did mention the aiders and abettors in some cases, but not in others, is not the conclusion equally fair that they did not intend that they should be involved in the guilt or punishment of treason, except where they are expressly mentioned? But a still better reason may be given why congress did not mean to include aiders, counsellors, &c., in the guilt or punishment of treason. It was prohibited by the constitution of the United States to enlarge the doctrine of the commission of treason, and they knew that such a provision would be void. This brings me to the consideration of the constitution itself. I have before endeavored to demonstrate that this instrument is not to be explained by the same narrow, technical rules that apply to a statute made for altering some provision of the common law; but that such a construction should be given as is consistent not only with the letter but the spirit in which the great palladium of our liberties was formed.

The object of the American constitution was to perpetuate the liberties of the people of this country. The framers of the instrument well knew the dreadful punishments inflicted, and the grievous oppressions produced, by constructive treasons in other countries, as well where the primary object was the security of the throne as where the public good was the pretext. Those gentlemen well knew from history, ancient as well as modern, that, in every age and climate, where the people enjoyed even the semblance of liberty, and where factions or parties existed, an accusation of treason, or a design to overturn the government, had been occasionally resorted to by those in power as the most convenient means of destroying those individuals whom they had marked out for victims; and that the best mode of insuring a man's conviction was to hunt him down as dangerous to the state. They knew that mankind are always the same, and that the same passions and vices must exist, though sometimes under different modifications, until the human race itself be extinct. That a repetition of the same scenes which have deluged other countries with their best blood might take place here they well knew, and endeavored as far as possible to guard against the evil by a constitutional sanction. They knew that when a state is divided into parties, what horrible cruelties may be committed even in the name and under the assumed authority of a majority of the people, and therefore endeavored to prevent them. The events which have since occurred in another country, and the sufferings under Robespierre, show how well human nature was understood by those who framed our constitution.

The language which they have used for this purpose is plain, simple, and perspicuous. There is no occasion to resort to the rules of construction to fix its meaning. It explains itself. Treason is to consist in levying war against the United States, and it must be public or open war; two witnesses must prove that there has been an overt act. The spirit and object of this constitutional provision are equally clear. The framers of the constitution, with the great volume of human nature before them, knew that perjury could easily be enlisted on the side of oppression; that any man might become the victim of private accusation; that declarations might be proved which were never made; and therefore they meant, as they have said, that no man should be the victim of such secret crimination; but that the punishment of this offence should only be incurred by those whose crimes are plain and apparent, against whom an open deed is proved.

Now let me ask the opposite counsel what security is afforded by the constitution, to the best or meanest man in this country, if the construction on which they insist be correct? and whether, instead of a safeguard to the citizen, they do not reduce it to an unmeaning phrase? According to the construction on which they must insist or abandon the prosecution, all that is wanted to fix the guilt of treason on any individual is, that an insurrection shall have existed somewhere in the United States, no matter where. Observe, sir, that I am arguing on abstract principles, and not with a particular application. But suppose the government wished to destroy any man; they find him in Georgia; an insurrection happens in New Hampshire. This will suffice for the purpose, and if this cause go on they will be obliged to contend that less will suffice; that an insurrection is not necessary; but that even a peaceable assemblage going down the Ohio is sufficient for the purpose. They merely undertake to prove the existence of an insurrection; that a number of people have committed an act of insurrection; the man who is selected to be a victim is dragged from one end of the continent to the other, before a judge who is the creature of the government, appointed at the pleasure of the government, liable to be thrown out of office if he offend the government; the cause comes on to trial; they prove an insurrection; and when once this insurrection or assemblage can be proved by two witnesses, nothing remains but to connect with it the individual thus marked for destruction; and as this may be done by evidence of his secret acts or even his declarations, he may be seized and hurried by force from New Hampshire to Georgia, or to any part of the United States which his accusers may choose as best fitted for their purpose; it is in vain that he may prove he was not present when the offence of which he is accused was committed; that he never at any period of his life had been there; that the actors and the scene were alike unknown to him; wretches who, from views of interest or revenge, are ready to further the views of his oppressors, will present themselves, and he may be convicted of treason in levying open war against the government, with people whom he never saw, and at a place where he never was. Gentlemen may say that this only shows that the citizen may be equally the victim of false accusations of other offences; that it proves nothing but that the innocent may be condemned on the testimony of perjured witnesses. In no other crime can a man be punished except in the county or district where he committed the act. Let gentlemen mention for what other offence an individual may be tried in a different district from the one in which he did the act which constitutes the essence of the crime; and admitting their principle in its full force, what becomes of the constitutional provision on this subject? where is the constitutional tribunal to try him, "an impartial jury of the state wherein the offence has been committed?" It is reduced to a mere nullity. The constitution meant something; but according to this construction it means nothing, and deceives instead of affording any security. It may be objected that treasonable conspiracies might thus go unpunished. To this it is a sufficient answer that they may be prosecuted and charged according to the truth of the case.

In support of the second proposition, Mr. Wickham said that the position of the counsel for the prosecution was, that in treason all are principals, and therefore, in construction of law, the accessory was present aiding and abetting at the time and place where the act was committed, and might be so charged, although in fact hundreds of miles away. But this was evidently a misapplication of the rule, as aiders and abettors after the fact are as much, in construction of law, principals, as those before the fact. And all the precedents show that they must be tried, not in the county where the war was levied, but where they did the accesso-rial acts which made them principal traitors by relation; and that they must be charged specially, in accordance with the facts. This rule of law was not founded on arbitrary principles, but on maxims of immutable justice and reason. The indictment should specially state the offence which is intended to be proved against the accused. He cannot otherwise be prepared to defend himself. An offence different from that which is charged against him, and which alone he can be expected to meet with his defence, is never allowed to be given in evidence. Does this indictment inform us that it is meant to be proven that Colonel Burr was not present when the overt act was committed, but that he was guilty of treason by being connected with those who perpetrated the overt act? On the contrary, the plain import of the indictment was that Colonel Burr himself committed and levied war against the United States in person. It charges that he committed the act on Blennerhassett's Island, with divers persons unknown. And it was attempted to prove this charge by holding him responsible for the acts of other persons, done in his absence, without even informing him who those other persons were who had committed the acts. He referred to the constitutional provision, that "in all criminal prosecutions, the party accused shall have a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state or district where the crime was committed;" and said this was meant to be a substantial provision, securing a trial by the vicinage; and yet according to the construction contended for it is merely illusory, and a native of Virginia, who was never out of the limits of the state,[6] may be hurried off to New Hampshire, and tried there for an offence which he never did commit, and which it is impossible he should have committed.

It must be admitted that an aider and abettor after the fact must be tried in the county and district where he committed the offence; and what sufficient reason can be assigned for a different rule in the case of an aider and abettor before the fact? The only precedent that could be found of the trial of an aider or abettor before the fact showed that the rule was the same. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was indicted for levying war against the queen, and the evidence was a connection with Sir Thomas Wiatt, who raised an insurrection in Kent, and marched towards London, but did not enter the jurisdiction of the city, which begins at Temple Bar. Yet Throgmorton was tried within the jurisdiction of the city, and the lord mayor presided at the trial, and he was acquitted. In the indictment against Mary Speke (in Tremaine's P. C.) for aiding the Duke of Monmouth and others in the act of levying war against the king, the charge is special, that she, "knowing the said James Scott (the Duke of Monmouth) to be a false traitor, and that he, with many other false traitors, to the number of four thousand, had assembled and collected, and had traitorously prepared and levied and raised war, insurrection, and rebellion against the king, &c., did cause to be conveyed and carried to the said James Scott, &c., cart loads of bread and cheese," &c. In a case of felony such an accomplice would be an accessory before the fact. There are in law but two species of accessories: one before and the other after. In the Case of Somervile, And. C. P. 106, it appears to have been settled, on great consideration, "that aiders and other procurers of the treason should be indicted specially for the procurement."

Mr. W. argued that if it is proper to charge an aider and abettor who was not present at the committing of the overt act, generally, as if he were present, in one case, it must be proper in all cases. The rule must be general, applying alike to all kinds of treason. To show the absurdity of such a rule, he referred to a statute of 28 Hen. VIII. c. 18, by which "marrying any of the king's children, or reputed children, or his sisters, or aunts of the father's part, or children of the king's brethren or sisters, without the king's license under his great seal, or deflowering any of them," is enacted to be treason. Now, said he, we may suppose a very probable case, that of a female accomplice in one of these treasons; for instance, one of the maids of honor, should be prosecuted for aiding and abetting the principal traitor; would she be indicted by her name, as a female, with the addition of spinster, for marrying the king's aunt, or deflowering his daughter? or would she be charged specially with aiding or abetting the male person who did the act? By another act of parliament of the same reign it is made treason in any woman the king shall intend to marry, thinking her to be a true maid, to marry him if she be not so. Now it is a very possible case that the paramour of such a woman (I will suppose her to be one of the maids of honor and him a lord of the bed-chamber) should aid her in imposing upon the king. She is tried, found guilty, and executed. How is he to be charged? Would he be indicted by the name of A B, gentleman, or by his title of lord, for marrying the king, not being an unspotted virgin, or to use the language of the act, a "pure and clean maid?" Mr. W. cited and commented upon other authorities in support of the position that the indictment must charge the facts specially, and that they must be proved as laid.

In support of the third proposition, Mr. W. contended that even admitting the doctrine to be true in this country, that all are principals in treason, and whatever would make a man an accessory in felony will make him a principal in treason, it is nevertheless true that the crime of a person who advises or procures an overt act of treason to be committed by others, must be accessorial in its character; and the rule that those who actually committed the deed must first be convicted, still holds good. The reason of the rule, that a man is not to be charged, by relation, with the criminal acts of others until said acts are proved in the only legal way, that is to say, by a record of the conviction of those who committed them, applied with equal force to treason as to any other crime, whether the aider, adviser, or procurer was held to be a principal or an accessory. If Blennerhassett and Tyler were not guilty of treason, then it was impossible that Colonel Burr could be guilty of treason in aiding, advising, or procuring them to commit the crime. But if this indictment can be sustained, then the guilt of Blennerhassett and Tyler may be established in a trial to which they are not parties. But, he said, it was unnecessary to rely on general reasoning, however conclusive, as express authorities may be adduced. He then cited 1 Hale, P. C. p. 613, where it is said that "as to the course of proceeding, it hath been, and indeed ought to be the course, that those who did actually commit the very fact of treason should be first tried, before those that are principals in the second degree, because otherwise this inconvenience might follow, viz.: That the principals in the second degree might be convicted, and yet the principals in the first degree might be acquitted, which would be absurd." He also cited other authorities to the same effect, viz: 2 Hale, P. C. 223; Somerville's Case, And. C. P. 106, 26 Eliz.; Fost. Crown Law, 341–347, and East, Crown Law, c. 2, § 29, p. 100. He admitted that a different rule was laid down by Sergeant Hawkins, in Hawk. P. C. (Leach's Ed.) bk. 2, c. 27, § 2, pp. 439, 440. But he gives only a general expression of the rule, goes into no detail, and does not pretend to argue the question. And Mr. Leach, his able and accurate commentator, has a note on this very passage, in which he corrects the generality of the expression, and confines it to treason in compassing the death of the king.

Mr. W. said it was possible that an objection might be made, that "the accomplice may waive the benefit of the law, and submit to a trial," and that as the accused has done so in the present instance, the objection now comes too late. A reference to the authorities and a moment's consideration will satisfy the court that there can be no force in this objection. The indictment gives us no information of the nature of the charge; it is against Col. Burr himself, who had no reason to doubt that it was meant to be proved, that he in person committed the overt act of treason in levying war as principal in the first degree. The charge that the act was committed by him, in conjunction with persons unknown, excludes the idea of a derivative treason or a responsibility for the act of any particular individual or set of men. But if it were specially charged, and the person whose acts the accused was to answer for were named in the indictment with every necessary description of time, place, and circumstances, the party going to trial according to the course of the court without a special prayer to be tried before the principal, and an express waiver of his right entered on record, could not be concluded from making this exception. The words "waive the benefit of the law," mean an express renunciation of a right, and none such certainly has been made in the present instance.

In support of the fourth proposition, Mr. W. went into an examination of the question, "What properly constitutes the crime of levying war?" He contended that force and military array were essential ingredients; neither of which had been proved at Blennerhassett's Island. He did not claim that actual force was absolutely necessary when there was a sufficient display of men and means to effect the object by intimidation. If a body of men, sufficient in number and means to take the capital, and all the property in it, should march into the city, and find no opposition, they would accomplish their object by terror of numbers and warlike appearance. This is denominated potential force; the object is accomplished without the actual exertion of force, though force sufficient to accomplish it is employed. He referred to the trial of Fries [Case No. 5,126], to show that even Mr. Rawle and Mr. Sitgreaves, the counsel for the prosecution, admitted that force of this character, at least, was necessary. He also referred to many English authorities to prove that force and military array are necessary ingredients, under the statute of 25 Edw. III, of the crime of levying war. He insisted that in so far as any expressions were to be found in the opinion of the supreme court in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout [supra], which might seem to imply that force was not necessary, they were obiter and extra-judicial. He cited other authorities which are here omitted, and insisted that the evidence wholly failed to show that there had been anything like force, or violence, or military array displayed on Blennerhassett's Island.

Mr. Wirt, after some introductory remarks, said:

This motion is a bold and original stroke in the noble science of defence. It marks the genius and hand of a master. For it gives to the prisoner every possible advantage, while it gives him the full benefit of his legal defence: the sole defence which he would be able to make to the jury, if the evidence were all introduced before them. It cuts off from the prosecution all that evidence which goes to connect the prisoner with the assemblage on the island, to explain the destination and objects of the assemblage, and to stamp beyond controversy the character of treason upon it. Connect this motion with that which was made the other day to compel us to begin with the proof of the overt act, in which from their zeal gentlemen were equally sanguine, and observe what would have been the effect of success in both motions. We should have been reduced to the single fact, the individual fact, of the assemblage on the island, without any of the evidence which explains the intention and object of that assemblage. Thus gentlemen would have cut off all the evidence which carries up the plot almost to its conception, which at all events describes the first motion which quickened it into life and follows its progress until it attained such strength and maturity as to throw the whole western country into consternation. Thus of the world of evidence which we have, we should have been reduced to the speck, the atom which relates to Blennerhassett's Island. General Eaton's deposition, (hitherto so much and so justly revered as to its subject,) standing by itself, would have been without the powerful fortification derived from the corroborative evidence of Commodore Truxton, and the still stronger and most extraordinary coincidence of the Morgans. Standing alone, gentlemen would have still proceeded to speak of that affidavit as they have heretofore done; not declaring that what General Eaton had sworn was not the truth, but that it was a most marvelous story! a most wonderful tale! and thus would they have continued to seek in the bold and wild extravagance of the project itself an argument against its existence, and a refuge from public indignation. But that refuge is taken away. General Eaton's narration stands confirmed beyond the possibility of rational doubt. But I ask what inference is to be drawn from these repeated attempts to stifle the prosecution and smother the evidence? If the views of the prisoner were, as they have been so often represented by one of his counsel, highly honorable to himself and glorious to his country, why not permit the evidence to disclose these views? Accused as he is of high treason, he would certainly stand acquitted, not only in reason and justice, but by the maxims of the most squeamish modesty, in showing us by evidence all this honor and this glory which his scheme contained. No, sir, it is not squeamish modesty; it is no fastidious delicacy that prompts these repeated efforts to keep back the evidence; it is apprehension; it is alarm; it is fear; or rather it is the certainty that the evidence, whenever it shall come forward, will fix the charge; and if such shall appear to the court to be the motive of this motion, your honors, I well know, will not be disposed to sacrifice public justice committed to your charge, by aiding this stratagem to elude the sentence of the law; you will yield to the motion no further than the rigor of legal rules shall imperiously constrain you.

I shall proceed now to examine the merits of the motion itself, and to answer the argument of the gentleman (Mr. Wickham) who opened it. I will treat that gentleman with candor. If I misrepresent him it will not be intentionally. I will not follow the example which he has set me on a very recent occasion. I will not complain of flowers and graces where none exist. I will not, like him, in reply to an argument as naked as a sleeping Venus, but certainly not half so beautiful, complain of the painful necessity I am under, in the weakness and decrepitude of logical vigor, of lifting first this flounce and then that furbelow before I can reach the wished-for point of attack.[7] I keep no flounces or furbelows ready manufactured or hung up for use in the millinery of my fancy, and if I did I think I should not be so indiscreetly impatient to get rid of my wares as to put them off on improper occasions. I cannot promise to interest you by any classical and elegant allusions to the pure pages of Tristram Shandy. I cannot give you a squib or a rocket in every period. For my own part, I have always thought these flashes of wit, (if they deserve that name,) I have always thought these meteors of the brain which spring up with such exuberant abundance in the speeches of that gentleman, which play on each side of the path of reason, or, sporting across it with fantastic motion, decoy the mind from the true point in debate, no better evidence of the soundness of the argument with which they are connected, nor, give me leave to add, the vigor of the brain from which they spring, than those vapors which start from our marshes and blaze with a momentary combustion, and which, floating on the undulations of the atmosphere, beguile the traveller into bogs and brambles, are evidences of the firmness and solidity of the earth from which they proceed. I will endeavor to meet the gentleman's propositions in their full force, and to answer them fairly. I will not, as I am advancing towards them with my mind's eye, measure the heighth, breadth, and power of the proposition; if I find it beyond my strength, halve it; if still beyond my strength, quarter it; if still necessary, subdivide it into eighths; and when, by this process, I have reduced it to the proper standard, take one of these sections and toss it with an air of elephantine strength and superiority. If I find myself capable of conducting, by a fair course of reasoning, any one of his propositions to an absurd conclusion, I will not begin by stating that absurd conclusion as the proposition itself which I am going to encounter.

Mr. Wirt then proceeded to discuss, seriatim, the four propositions laid down by Mr. Wickham, and to reply to his arguments in support of them. In many of that gentleman's general propositions he concurred: that the constitution was intended to guard against arbitrary and constructive treasons; that the principles of sound reason and liberty require their exclusion; and that the constitution is to be interpreted by the rules of reason and moral right. He found it difficult to reconcile some of the positions of Mr. Randolph with the rules of Mr. Wickham, for while one tells us to interpret the constitution by sound reason, the other exclaims, "Save us from the deductions of common sense!" Mr. Wickham having read the constitutional definition of treason, and given the rule by which it was to be interpreted, it was natural to expect that he would have proceeded directly to apply that rule to the definition, and give us the result. But while we were expecting this, even while we have our eyes on the gentleman, he vanishes like a spirit from American ground, and we see him no more until we see him in England, resurging, by a kind of intellectual magic, in the middle of the sixteenth century, complaining most dolefully of my Lord Coke's bowels. Before we follow him in this excursion, it may be well to inquire what it was that induced him to leave the regular track of his argument. I will tell you what it was. It was, sir, the decision of the supreme court in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout. It was the judicial exposition of the constitution by the highest court in the nation, upon the very point which the gentleman was considering, which made him take this flight to England, because it stared him in the face and contradicted his position. Sir, if the gentleman had believed this decision to be favorable to him, we should have heard of it in the beginning of his argument, for the path of inquiry in which he was led him directly to it. Interpreting the American constitution, he would have preferred no authority to that of the supreme court of the country. Yes, sir, he would have immediately seized this decision with avidity. He would have set it before you in every possible light. He would have illustrated it. He would have adorned it. You would have seen it, under the action of his genius, appear with all the varying grandeur of our mountains in the morning sun. He would not have relinquished it for the common law, nor have deserted a rock so broad and solid to walk upon the waves of the Atlantic. But he knew that this decision closed against him completely the very point for which he was laboring. Hence it was that the decision was kept so sedulously out of view, until, from the exploded materials of the common law, he thought he had reared a Gothic edifice so huge and so dark as quite to overshadow and eclipse it. Let us bring it from this obscurity into the face of day. We who are seeking truth and not victory, whether right or wrong, have no reason to turn our eyes from any source of light which presents itself, and least of all from a source so high and so respectable as the decision of the supreme court of the United States. The inquiry is whether the presence at the overt act be necessary to make a man a traitor. The gentlemen say that it is necessary—that he cannot be a principal in the treason without actual presence. What says the supreme court in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout? "It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of this crime who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors." He insisted that this decision of the supreme court had settled the principle that actual presence was not necessary, and that the passage upon which he relied was not a mere obiter dictum, and not extra judicial; that in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout the question whether actual presence at the place where the overt act was committed was necessary to constitute the crime of treason was a material question to be considered by the court.

That a law should be so construed as to advance the remedy and repress the mischief is not more a rule of common law than a principle of reason; it applies to penal as well as to remedial laws. So also the maxim of the common law, that a law as well as a covenant should be so construed that its object may rather prevail than perish, is one of the plainest dictates of common sense. Apply these principles to the constitution. Gentlemen have said that its object was to prevent the people from being harassed by arbitrary and constructive treason. But its object, I presume, was not to declare that there was no such crime. It certainly did not mean to encourage treason. It meant to recognize the existence of the crime and provide for its punishment. The liberties of the people, which require that the offence should be defined, circumscribed, and limited, required also that it should be certainly and adequately punished. The framers of the constitution, informed by the examples of Greece and Rome, and foreseeing that the liberties of this republic might one day or other be seized by the daring ambition of some domestic usurper, have given peculiar importance and solemnity to the crime, by ingrafting it upon the constitution. But they have done this in vain if the construction contended for on the other side is to prevail. If it require actual presence at the scene of the assemblage to involve a man in the guilt of treason, how easy will it be for the principal traitor to avoid this guilt and escape punishment forever? He may go into distant states, from one state to another. He may secretly wander like a demon of darkness from one end of the continent to the other. He may enter into the confidence of the simple and unsuspecting. He may pour his poison into the minds of those who were before innocent. He may seduce them into a love of his person, offer them advantages, pretend that his measures are honorable and beneficial, connect them in his plot and attach them to his glory. He may prepare the whole mechanism of the stupendous and destructive engine and put it in motion. Let the rest be done by his agents. He may then go a hundred miles from the scene of action. Let him keep himself only from the scene of the assemblage and the immediate spot of battle, and he is innocent in law, while those whom he has deluded are to suffer the death of traitors! Who is the most guilty of this treason, the poor, weak, deluded instruments, or the artful and ambitious man who corrupted and misled them? There is no comparison between his guilt and theirs, and yet you secure impunity to him, while they are to suffer death! Is this according to the rules of reason? Is this moral right? Is this a means of preventing treason? Or rather, is it not in truth a direct invitation to it? Sir, it is obvious that neither reason nor moral right requires actual presence at the overt act to constitute the crime of treason. Put this case to any common man, whether the absence of a corruptor should exempt him from punishment for the crime which he has excited his deluded agents to commit, and he will instantly tell you that he deserves infinitely more severe punishment than his misguided instruments. There is a moral sense much more unerring in questions of this sort than the frigid deductions of jurists or philosophers; and no man of a sound mind and heart can doubt for a moment between the comparative guilt of Aaron Burr (the prime mover of the whole mischief) and of the poor men on Blennerhassett's Island who called themselves Burr's men. In the case of murder, who is the most guilty, the ignorant, deluded perpetrator or the abominable instigator? The decision of the supreme court, sir, is so far from being impracticable on the ground of reason and moral right, that it is supported by their most obvious and palpable dictates. Give to the constitution the construction contended for on the other side, and you might as well expunge the crime from the criminal code; nay, you had better do it, for by this construction you hold out the lure of impunity to the most dangerous men in the community, men of ambition and talents, while you loose the vengeance of the law on the comparatively innocent. If treason ought to be repressed, I ask you who is the most dangerous and the most likely to commit it? The mere instrument who applies the force, or the daring, aspiring, elevated genius who devises the whole plot, but acts behind the scenes?

Mr. Wirt then argued that the decision of the supreme court was supported by the law of England. He cited Lord Coke, 3 Inst. p. 9, where, commenting on the words in the statute of Edward III. which make our constitutional definition of treason, he says: "If many conspire to levy war, and some do levy the same according to the conspiracy, this is treason in all, for in treason all are principals, and war is levied." He also referred to similar passages in pages 16 and 21, Id. He also cited Hale, P. C. 214, where the same doctrine is laid down in terms equally distinct and emphatic: "But if many conspire to counterfeit, or counsel or abet it, and one of them doth the fact upon that counselling or conspiracy, it is treason in all, and they may be all indicted for counterfeiting generally, for in such case in treason all are principals." The same doctrine is in effect laid down in pages 323, 328, 339. Hawkins and Foster support the same doctrine. "Also, there can be no doubt but that he who by command or persuasion induces another to commit treason, is himself a traitor, (for without question, by such means he would be accessory to a felony,) and it is an uncontroverted rule that whatever will make a man an accessory in felony will make him a principal in treason." 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17, § 39. Foster (page 341) says: "It is well known that, in the language of the law, there are no accessories in treason. All are principals." "Every instance of incitement, aid, or protection, which in the case of felony will render a man an accessory before or after the fact, in the case of high treason, whether it be treason at common law or by statute, will make him a principal in the treason, unless the case be otherwise provided for by the statute creating the same," &c. Mr. Wirt referred to Judge Tucker's argument to prove that the doctrine that in treason all are principals is not the established law of England, and after passing a high encomium upon the learning, ability, and virtue of the author, said: "However sincerely I revere him, yet, certainly, when the question is, 'What is the law of England?' it cannot be considered as disrespectful to our learned and virtuous countryman to prefer the authority of such men as Coke, Hale, Hawkins, and Foster, to his." Mr. Wirt then adverted to the assertion of Mr. Wickham, that but two cases can be found in the books of accessories before the fact having been adjudged guilty as principals. But he admits (said Mr. Wirt) that there are several cases of accessories after the fact being so adjudged. The gentleman had inverted the order of the guilt. He apprehended no case could be found which will show that accessories after the fact are as criminal as those before the fact. It was for a long time doubted in England whether accessories after the fact were principals; but it was never doubted that accessories before the fact were principals. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 29, § 3. The gentleman had read the case of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton's sufferings, as they are presented as a Gorgon's head by Judge Tucker—not as an illustration of the law, but by way of exciting our horror against a corrupt judge. The prosecution did not rely upon the authority of that case. What could be the gentleman's motives in reading this case with a countenance and cadence of such peculiar pathos? Was it to excite our sympathies, under the hope that our apprehensions and feelings, when once set afloat, might, for the want of some other living object, be graciously transferred to his client? It was with the same view, he presumed, that the gentleman gave us the pathetic and affecting story of Lady Lisle, as it is touched by the elegant, chaste, and delicate pencil of Hume. It was with the same views, also, that he recited from the same author the deep, perfidious, and bloody horrors of a Kirk and a Jeffries. Sensible that there was nothing in the virtues of his client or in this case to interest us, he borrowed the sufferings and the virtues of a Throgmorton and a Lady Lisle to enlist our affections and set our hearts a bleeding, hoping that our pity, thus excited, might be transferred and attached to his client. He hoped that the counsel for the prosecution felt as much horror at the infernal depravity of Judge Bromley, and the sanguinary and execrable tyranny of Judge Jeffries, as they or any other gentleman can feel. But these cases do not apply to merciful and immaculate judges. He did not think it very respectful to this court to adduce such cases. They seem to be held up in terrorem, from an apprehension that their authority would be admitted here, but we apprehend no such consequence.

In answer to Mr. Wickham's argument that since the revolution of 1688 the British decisions have leaned the other way, and go to show that accessorial acts do not make a principal in treason, Mr. Wirt said that the conclusion was based on no adjudged case, nor even upon any obiter dictum of any judge. It has no other foundation than the impunity of those who aided the Pretender—who fought his battles or aided him in his fight. This was the mere policy of the house of Hanover. The pretensions of the Stuarts had divided the British nation. Their adherents were many and zealous. Their pretensions were crushed in battle. Two courses were open to the reigning monarch—either by clemency and forbearance to assuage the animosity of his enemies and brace his throne with the affections of his people, or to pursue his enemies with vengeance and wanton cruelty, and unsettle and float his throne in the blood of his subjects. He chose the former course; and because, either from magnanimity or policy, or both, he spared them, the gentleman supposes the law of treason was changed, and that they could not be punished.

Mr. Wirt adverted to the doctrine advanced by Mr. Wickham, that "a statute made in aid or affirmance of the common law carries with it all common law consequences," but "if a new felony be created by statute no common law consequences follow;" and contended that the authorities cited by Mr. Wickham in support of this position do not sustain it. He claimed that from the authorities cited these two positions were fairly deducible: First: That when a statute creates a new felony, unknown to the common law, although the statute says nothing about accessories to that felony, yet they exist and are punishable under the act; unless the peculiar wording of the statute precludes it, as in the statute of 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15. Secondly: That accessories are not the mere creatures of the common law; they may derive their existence from a statute solely, and that by mere implication under that statute. Since, then, accessories are not the creatures merely and solely of the common law, it makes no difference whether the common law exist here or not; accessories may nevertheless exist. Since a statute creating an offence impliedly embraces accessories, not by the operation of common law, but by the reason and nature of things, an American statute may impliedly embrace accessories, since whatever we may think of the existence of the common law in this country, no American, I hope, will doubt that reason and its deductions exist here. The only fair inference from Mr. Wickham's positions and authorities is, that if a statute of the United States were to adopt a common law phrase, in the creation of an offence, no common law consequences would follow, because we have no common law. But this is a moot point, because while the constitution and act of congress adopt the word "treason," they define in what it shall consist. I see no benefit that the gentleman could derive from these positions if they were admitted. If he meant to say that accessories are the mere creatures of the common law, and therefore cannot exist in this country, where there is no common law, I answer, First: That if the position were true, it would not affect this case, because within the reason of the doctrine touching principal and accessories, the part which the prisoner bore in this transaction would constitute him a principal. Secondly: If his conduct were of such a nature as to make him an accessory, I hold that we have a right to look to the common law to ascertain whether he be not a principal in this case.

First, I contend that the part which the prisoner bore in this transaction would constitute him a principal. Gentlemen say that all are accessories who are not present at the commission of the offence. We, on the contrary, contend that even in inferior felonies, a man may be a principal without actual presence. Let us examine this question. The law recognizes a legal as well as an actual presence. Before I refer to the books to explain this distinction, I beg leave to make one remark, that in order to determine the degree of proximity which should be between the principal and accessory, it is necessary to look into their acts and consider the nature of the crime and the extent of the theatre which it requires for its perpetration. A man may be legally present, although actually absent; even in felony legal presence makes a man as much a principal as actual presence. I beg leave to introduce a series of cases which go to unfold and establish this distinction, most of which my friend Mr. MacRae has already mentioned. You will find in the progress of these cases, the sphere of legal presence perpetually extending itself in proportion to the nature of the crime and the extent of theatre necessary for its commission. You will observe that as the theatre widens the scale of proximity is extended. The first case is in Hale, P. C. 439, "If divers persons come to make an affray, and are of the same party, and come into the same house, and one be killed in one of the rooms, those that are of that party, and that came for that purpose, though in other rooms of the same house, shall be said to be present." Here the house is the theatre, and it is required that those who are to be implicated as principals shall be in the other rooms of the same house. The next is the case of the Lord Dacre. Here, as the park was the theatre of the meditated crime, the scale of proximity is enlarged, and it was enough that the Lord Dacre and his associates were in the same park to implicate them in the guilt. The next is Pudsey's Case, which is thus stated in 1 Hale, P. C. 534: "Pudsey and two others, viz., A. and B, assault C, to rob him, in the highway, but C escapes by flight, and as they were assaulting him, A rides from Pudsey and B and assaults D, out of the view of Pudsey and B, and takes from him a dagger by robbery, and came back to Pudsey and B, and for this Pudsey was indicted and convicted of robbery—though he assented not to the robbery of D, neither was it done in his view—because they were all three assembled to commit a robbery, and this taking of the dagger was in the mean time." Here, as the highway and the whole forest was the scene of action, a still less degree of proximity was required than in either of the preceding cases; and, indeed, no limit of proximity is stated at all. But this case of Pudsey is irresistibly strong in another point of view, and contains a principle which covers the case at bar completely. He and his colleagues were leagued for the general purpose of robbing; they went out upon this purpose, and although Pudsey was not only absent at the particular act of robbing D, but gave no assent to that particular act, yet he was involved in the guilt of it, and suffered accordingly. The same author (page 537) contains a case which is, if possible, still stronger to the same purpose. It is the case of two men who go out for the purpose of robbing on the highway or committing a burglary. Although one only commits the offence, and the other, so far from being present, is actually engaged in the perpetration of a different offence, at a different place, yet this other is equally involved in the offence committed by the first. Hence, it is not actual presence which makes a principal in felony. It is merely their going forth leagued in the same general design, and their readiness to co-operate for effecting the common purpose. Suppose two men in the county of Bedford or Campbell should concert the murder of a man who had removed from thence to this place, and should set off together to effect this purpose, but that not knowing whether he had fixed his residence in Richmond or Manchester, they should on their arrival separate—one should enter Richmond and the other Manchester. They both agree and determine that he who had the first chance should kill him, and they also agree to return together and to assist and protect each other. He who enters Richmond commits the murder. Would not the other who went into Manchester be a principal in the murder? They were both engaged in the same unlawful design of murdering the same individual. They set off together and intend to return together. There was a concert between them, and each was ready to co-operate with the other in carrying this murderous design into effect. Here, then, is a case of a legal presence, though the person is actually absent, involving him in the guilt of actual presence. Foster, 349, 350, thus treats the subject: "When the law requires the presence of the accomplice at the perpetration of the fact, in order to render him a principal, it doth not require a strict, actual, immediate presence," &c. The reason of the law is the soul of the law. What is the reason, then, which, according to Foster, constitutes this legal presence? It is that the cause is a common cause; that each man operates in his station towards the same common end; that the part each man takes tends to give countenance, encouragement, and protection to the whole gang, and to insure the success of their whole enterprise. Whoever, in any crime, performs a part within this description, is legally present, and a principal in that crime. Foster (in pages 353, 354), after stating that general resolutions against all opposers, whether explicitly entered into or to be collected from their numbers, arms, or behavior at the scene of action, had always been considered as strong ingredients in cases of constructive presence, concludes thus: "In cases of homicide, committed in consequence of them, every person present in the sense of the law when the homicide hath been committed, hath been involved in the guilt of him that gave the mortal blow. The offences that Lord Dacre and Pudsey stood charged with, as principals, were committed far out of their sight and hearing; and yet both were holden to be present. It was sufficient that at the instant the facts were committed they were of the same party, and upon the same pursuit, and under the same engagement and expectation of mutual defence and support, with those who did the facts."

Let us apply the reasoning and principles of those cases to the case of Aaron Burr. In order to do this with propriety, we must consider the nature of the crime charged upon the prisoner, the theatre required for its perpetration, and the various parts to be performed in promotion of the general purpose. We must consider the difference between treason and felony; that treason occupies a much wider space; that if there have been an act of treason in this case it may be said to have covered the United States; and, therefore, you will not require the same degree of proximity between the accessory and principal as you would in a common felony. I proceed, then, to make this application. The charge in the indictment is treason, in levying war against the United States. The objects imputed to the prisoner are the seizure of Orleans and the separation of the states. Was not Aaron Burr of the same party, with the same design, and upon the same pursuit? Did he not first create the party? Did he not enlist the men and engage them in his project? And did they not all call themselves his men? Were they not all under the same agreement and expectation of mutual defence and support? Was it not a common cause with them? Did he not place each man to operate at his station, at one and the same instant, towards the same common end? Did not the part which each man took tend to give countenance, encouragement and protection to the whole gang, and to insure the success of their common enterprise? Was not the prisoner within every reason and principle assigned for the constitution of legal presence, and therefore a principal in the treason? If it be urged that the prisoner gave no express assent to the particular meeting on the island, it may be answered that neither did Pudsey, in the case cited, assent to the particular robbery of D by A; but Pudsey and A had the same common purpose, which involved them in the same common guilt. So the purpose of the prisoner and the men upon the island was a common purpose; and therefore their guilt is the same. But an error seems to have arisen in considering the overt act as the treason; the overt act is only the evidence of it. The moral guilt is in their intention. The overt act or assemblage on the island was not the object, the end, the consummation of the treason; it was a mere transient effect of it, an incidental evolution of the design. We must not, therefore, apply the doctrines just investigated to the act on Blennerhassett's Island. We must consider the prisoner's local position, not in reference to the assemblage, but to the general and grand object of the treason; not in reference to the island, but to the great theatre which the treason required, and on which it was acting, from New York to Orleans. For the object was not Blennerhassett's Island, but the empire of the West, formed in the North; the splendid purpose of seizing Orleans and rending the whole Union forcibly asunder. The whole country from Beaver to New Orleans was the scope of action. Burr, therefore, was not only legally but actually present on this theatre of action. In those cases of felony, the proximity between the accessories and principal actors was measured according to what was intended to be done. Here, the object was not an island but a kingdom; the theatre of action was much more extensive, and the proximity between the parties engaged in it must be proportionably enlarged. The part which the prisoner took in this transaction is such as in the case of felony would make him a principal and not an accessory, as the gentlemen contend; and consequently, according not only to the reasoning of all those cases, but to their own arguments, the prisoner must be considered as a principal in the treason.

Secondly: Let me inquire whether we have not a right to look at the common law, to show that the prisoner is a principal. Let us admit, for the sake of argument, (what is certainly disproved,) that accessories are the mere creatures of the common law; let us also admit that our constitution and act of congress do not embrace accessories; is it clear that we have no right to resort to the common law to implicate accessorial traitors? I do not know myself that this inquiry is necessary; nor do I pretend to say what may be the result of your reflections on the subject; it may appear to you necessary, and I would leave no subject untouched which the court may consider as involved in the debate. It would not be very bold in me, sir, to argue for the existence of the common law en masse, in this country. But let it not for a moment be understood that I mean to contend for this. I only say that it would not be very bold in me to do this, and I say so, because a majority of the federal judges, so far as their opinions have been made known, have held that opinion. In Worrel's Case, cited from Dallas, the court was divided; Judge Chase thought the common law not in force; Judge Peters thought otherwise. In a subsequent case, and that a criminal one, I mean the Case of Williams, Judge Ellsworth held the whole of the common law to be in force; and Judge Tucker informs us that Judge

Washington was also of opinion that the common law of England is in force here. These are all the opinions of which I have heard.[8] Having thus the majority of the federal judges, as far as their opinions are known, in favor of the opinion that the common law of England is in force here, I repeat that it would not be very bold in me, standing before a federal court, to insist on the full operation of the common law, with all its consequences and imputed offspring, accessories among the rest; but I will not avail myself of this "vantage ground." My own opinion is a different one. I take the principle with much greater restriction, and on this head submit these reflections to the consideration of the court. When a technical term is borrowed from any art or science, we look to that art or science to ascertain its import and signification. If a statute adopt phrases of the common law, we must look to the common law to ascertain their true signification. This is a rule of reason. It is the foundation of the principle cited by Sergeant Pengelly from Hobart, that when a statute adopts a common law term, you take that term in its common law meaning. It is the foundation, also, of a paragraph in one of the most luminous, elegant, and masterly state-papers that ever the world saw—I mean the celebrated report of the Virginia committee in 1799, 1800, from which I beg leave to read a short extract relative to our present inquiry: "Deeply impressed with these opinions, the general assembly of Virginia instruct the senators and request the representatives from this state in congress to use their best efforts to oppose the passing of any law founded on or recognizing the principle lately advanced, that the common law of England is in force under the government of the United States, excepting from such opposition, such particular parts of the common law as may have a sanction from the constitution, so far as they are necessarily comprehended in the technical phrases which express the powers delegated to the government; and excepting, also, such other parts thereof as may be adopted by congress as necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers expressly delegated." Here we find the recognition of the principle which takes common law phrases in the common law sense. Upon the same ground, Judge Iredell, in the Case of Fries [supra], states, in effect, that the constitutional terms of our definition of treason, being borrowed from the British statute, the framers of our constitution intended to adopt the meaning of those terms, as expounded in the parent country. Suppose an act of congress was passed, which said that a particular act should be felony, and said no more on the subject: where would you look for its true meaning? Would you not, by the adoption of that word, find it necessary to look at the source from which it was derived—that is, the common law—in order to ascertain its import? There is no other to which you can look for that purpose. Let us examine how these considerations bear on the point that we have a right to look at the common law to ascertain whether accessorial traitors be implicated. In applying these principles, we must inquire particularly into the nature of treason in levying war. Whence do we derive this particular treason? Sir Edward Coke, in his 3 Inst. 9, referring to the statute of Edward III., gives us a commentary on it, divides it into members, and expounds each of them as he goes along. He says that it has done nothing new, that it created no new offence which was not an offence at common law, but excluded some treasons and abolished and mitigated some of the punishments and penalties which existed at common law. When he comes to the words of the statute, "Si un home leve guerre encounter notre seigneur le roy,"—"if a man levy war against our lord the king,"—he says that "this was high treason by the common law." Although, then, the words of our definition are derived immediately from the statute of Edward, and though it received the sanction of parliament, this species of treason, levying war, was an offence at common law, and has been transplanted from the common law into our constitution. Have we not, then, a right to go to the fountain head, and ascertain there how much ground it covered, what was the nature of the treason, what its extent and limits? I do not speak of common law treasons at large, but this particular treason of levying war. Gentlemen will understand me. I do not mean to sanction any of the absurdities of the common law. I speak only of this single branch of treason, selected by the constitution. If, then, we have a right to go to the common law for this purpose, we shall discover that it comprehended all who were leagued in the general conspiracy, whether they themselves actually levied the war or caused it to be levied by others. I submit this idea to the court, not as one which I have had time to weigh and digest, but one which it may perhaps find not unworthy of consideration. But without resorting to the aid of the common law, we show by the constitution, interpreted by the rules of reason and moral right, as expounded by judicial decision, as well as by the English law, to which we were invited, that presence at the scene of the overt act is not necessary to make a man a traitor.

[8] It has since been decided by the supreme court, that the federal courts have no common law jurisdiction in criminal cases. U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32. But in U. S. v. Coolidge [Case No. 14,857], Mr. Justice Story says that recourse must be had to the principles of the common law to fix the definitions of crimes, as well as of other common law terms used in the constitution or statutes. "For instance," (he says) "congress has provided for the punishment of murder, manslaughter, and perjury, under certain circumstances, but has nowhere defined those crimes. Yet the common law must be resorted to for their definition," &c. This case has been relied upon to support the position that the common law rule, that whatever will make a man an accessory in felony will make him a principal in treason, is in full force in this country. 14 Boston Law Rep. 1851. It should be observed, however, that the constitution has defined the crime of treason; and this definition, as far as it goes, must be exclusive of all others. But in this definition itself certain common law terms are used, the meaning of which can only be ascertained by resorting to common law authorities. For instance, our courts have held that we must look to common law adjudications to ascertain the precise legal meaning of the term, "levying war." And the question seems to be reduced to this: Is it a common law principle, that those who successfully advise or incite others to levy war do actually levy war themselves, so as to come within the true definition of that term, or does the rule which makes them principals in the crime rest upon a mere arbitrary basis? Upon this question much more might be said than the limits of this note will allow.

Mr. Wirt remarked that whenever the acts of congress mention accessories to any crime, it is for the purpose of distinguishing between the guilt, and consequently the punishment, of accessories before and after the fact. Accessories before the fact in piracy are punished with death; those after, by fine and imprisonment. The same principles are observed with respect to accessories before and after in other cases. An inference very different from that drawn by Mr. Wickham ought to be deduced from the statute. According to his argument, even if the common law were in force here, accessories would not be liable. Congress knew that in treason all are principals, and that therefore it was unnecessary to implicate them in detail by a special act; but knowing that those who were the most innocent, who were the least concerned in that crime, were before then equally punishable with the most atrocious offenders, they intended to mitigate the fate of the least culpable as receivers and comforters after the fact, and rescuers of those who were not convicted. They felt that they were treading on ground that was previously occupied. They did not legislate on the subject as if they were creating an offence. They speak of it as an offence already existing. They distinguish between the degrees of guilt, and proportion the punishments accordingly. But according to Mr. Wickham's argument, accessories before the fact in treason, who are in general the greatest offenders, because the procurers and contrivers of the crimes, would escape altogether, whilst the least guilty are severely punished. Before you think that Mr. Wickham's idea is correct, you must believe that congress meant to punish the lesser, and leave entirely unpunished the greater offence. Was it possible that they should have intended that the dark, designing, flagitious offender, who intrigues and contrives, who plots and procures a deep conspiracy to subvert the government and destroy the liberties of his country, shall escape wholly unpunished, while the poor ignorant man, who is deluded by his artifices or those of his associates, shall be severely punished for rescuing from imprisonment another of the deluded victims of his ambition? Yet this result, as monstrous as it is absurd, may take place if Mr. Wickham's construction shall be adopted.

Mr. Wirt took up the second proposition of Mr. Wickham, that the indictment should charge the facts specially. He said the indictment was drawn from an authentic copy of the indictment in the Case of Fries, and was an exact transcript of that indictment, mutatis mutandis. He referred to a number of English precedents to show that to charge the prisoner generally with levying war had always been held sufficient.

Mr. Wickham here begged leave to interrupt Mr. Wirt in order to explain, as he said Mr. Wirt had misunderstood him. His argument, he said, was not that a special indictment was necessary in every case, but that whenever an absentee was charged and was to be made liable by relation for the acts of another, the manner of his being connected with that other should be stated in the indictment. For instance, I put the case of Blennerhassett. I never said that such an indictment as is now before the court would not be good against him, who was present at the time and place where the overt act is charged to have been committed.

Mr. Wirt, resuming, said he did not misunderstand the gentleman. His answer was, that if the accused have borne a part which constitutes treason, he is sufficiently and properly charged in the indictment. I have shown that in every case where a prisoner has acted a part which amounted to treason, whether he be absent or present, he may be indicted generally, because he is a principal in the treason; and whenever a person accused is a principal in a treason of levying war, it is sufficient to charge that he did levy war.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Do you mean to say that it is not necessary to state in the indictment in what manner the accused, who it is admitted was absent, became connected with the acts on Blennerhassett's Island?

Mr. Wirt.—I mean to say that the count is general in modern cases; that we are endeavoring to make the accused a traitor by connection, by stating the act which was done, and which act, from his conduct in the transaction, he made his own; that it is sufficient to make this charge generally, not only because it is authorized by the constitutional definition, but because it is conformable to modern cases, in which the indictments are pruned of all needless luxuriance.

Mr. Wirt referred to several cases, from which he drew inferences in favor of his position. He then took up the third proposition of Mr. Wickham. By this, he said, I understand the gentleman to advance, in other terms, the common law doctrine, that when a man is rendered a principal in treason by acts which would make him an accessory in felony, he cannot be tried before the principal in the first degree. I understand this to be the doctrine of the common law, as established by all the authorities; but when I concede this point, I insist that it can have no effect in favor of the accused for two reasons: 1st. Because it is the mere creature of the common law. 2d. Because if the common law of England be our law, this position assumes what is denied, that the conduct of the prisoner in this case is of an accessorial nature, or such as would make him an accessory in felony. If this position be the mere creature of the common law, no consequences can be deduced from it. It is sufficient to take Mr. Wickham's own declaration, that the common law does not exist in this country. If we examine the constitution and act of congress, we shall find that this idea of a distinction between principals in the first and second degree depends entirely on the common law. All who levy war against the United States, whether present or absent—all who are leagued in the conspiracy, whether on the spot of the assemblage or performing some minute and inconsiderable part in it a thousand miles from the scene of action—incur equally the sentence of the law. They are all equally traitors.

But to try this position to its utmost extent, let us not only put aside the constitution and act of congress and decision of the supreme court, but let us admit that the common law does not exist here. Still, before the principle could apply, it would remain to be proven that the conduct of the prisoner in this case has been accessorial; or in other words, that his acts in relation to this treason are of such a nature as would make him an accessory in felony. But is this the case? It is a mere petitio principii. It is denied that his acts are such as would make him an accessory in felony. I have already in another branch of this subject endeavored to show, on the grounds of authority and reason, that a man might be involved in the guilt of treason as a principal by being legally though not actually present; that treason occupied a much wider space than felony; that the scale of proximity between the accessory and principal must be extended in proportion to the extent of the theatre of the treason; and that as the prisoner must be considered as legally present, he could not be an accessory, but a principal. If I have succeeded in this, I have in fact proved that his conduct cannot be deemed accessorial. But an error has taken place from considering the scene of the overt act as the theatre of the treason, from mistaking the overt act for the treason itself, and consequently from referring the conduct of the prisoner to the acts on the island. The conduct of Aaron Burr has been considered in relation to the overt act on Blennerhassett's Island only; whereas it ought to be considered in connection with the grand design, the deep plot of seizing Orleans, separating the Union, and establishing an independent empire in the West, of which the prisoner was to be the chief. It ought to be recollected that these were his objects, and that the whole western country from Beaver to Orleans was the theatre of his treasonable operations. It is by this first reasoning that you are to consider whether he be a principal or an accessory, and not by limiting your inquiries to the circumscribed and narrow spot in the island where the acts charged happened to be performed. Having shown, I think, on the ground of law, that the prisoner cannot be considered as an accessory, let me press the inquiry whether on the ground of reason he be a principal or an accessory; and remember that his project was to seize New Orleans, separate the Union, and erect an independent empire in the West, of which he was to be the chief. This was the destination of the plot and the conclusion of the drama. Will any man say that Blennerhassett was the principal, and Burr but an accessory? Who will believe that Burr, the author and projector of the plot, who raised the forces, who enlisted the men, and who procured the funds for carrying it into execution, was made a cat's paw of? Will any man believe that Burr, who is a soldier, bold, ardent, restless and aspiring, the great actor whose brain conceived and whose hand brought the plot into operation, that he should sink down into an accessory, and that Blennerhassett should be elevated into a principal? He would startle at once at the thought. Aaron Burr, the contriver of the whole conspiracy, to everybody concerned in it was as the sun to the planets which surround him. Did he not bind them in their respective orbits, and give them their light, their heat and their motion? Yet he is to be considered an accessory, and Blennerhassett is to be the principal!

Let us put the case between Burr and Blennerhassett. Let us compare the two men, and settle this question of precedence between them. It may save a good deal of troublesome ceremony hereafter. Who Aaron Burr is we have seen in part already. I will add, that beginning his operations in New York, he associates with him men whose wealth is to supply the necessary funds. Possessed of the main-spring, his personal labor contrives all the machinery. Pervading the continent from New York to New Orleans, he draws into his plan, by every allurement which he can contrive, men of all ranks and descriptions. To youthful ardor he presents danger and glory; to ambition, rank and titles and honors; to avarice, the mines of Mexico. To each person whom he addresses he presents the object adapted to his taste. His recruiting officers are appointed. Men are engaged throughout the continent. Civil life is indeed quiet upon its surface, but in its bosom this man has contrived to deposit the materials which, with the slightest touch of his match, produce an explosion to shake the continent. All this his restless ambition has contrived; and in the autumn of 1806, he goes forth for the last time to apply this match. On this occasion he meets with Blennerhassett. Who is Blennerhassett? A native of Ireland, a man of letters, who fled from the storms of his own country to find quiet in ours. His history shows that war is not the natural element of his mind. If it had been, he never would have exchanged Ireland for America. So far is an army from furnishing the society natural and proper to Mr. Blennerhassett's character, that on his arrival in America, he retired even from the population of the Atlantic states, and sought quiet and solitude in the bosom of our western forests. But he carried with him taste and science and wealth; and lo! the desert smiled. Possessing himself of a beautiful island in the Ohio, he rears upon it a palace, and decorates it with every romantic embellishment of fancy. A shrubbery, that Shenstone might have envied, blooms around him. Music that might have charmed Calypso and her nymphs, is his. An extensive library spreads its treasures before him. A philosophical apparatus offers to him all the secrets and mysteries of nature. Peace, tranquility, and innocence shed their mingled delights around him. And to crown the enchantment of the scene, a wife who is said to be lovely even beyond her sex and graced with every accomplishment that can render it irresistible, had blessed him with her love, and made him the father of several children. The evidence would convince you that this is but a faint picture of the real life. In the midst of all this peace, this innocent simplicity and this tranquility, this feast of the mind, this pure banquet of the heart, the destroyer comes; he comes to change this paradise into a hell. Yet the flowers do not wither at his approach. No monitory shuddering through the bosom of their unfortunate possessor warns him of the ruin that is coming upon him. A stranger presents himself. Introduced to their civilities by the high rank which he had lately held in his country, he soon finds his way to their hearts, by the dignity and elegance of his demeanor, the light and beauty of his conversation, and the seductive and fascinating power of his address. The conquest was not difficult. Innocence is ever simple and credulous. Conscious of no design itself, it suspects none in others. It wears no guard before its breast. Every door and portal and avenue of the heart is thrown open, and all who choose it enter. Such was the state of Eden when the serpent entered its bowers. The prisoner, in a more engaging form, winding himself into the open and unpracticed heart of the unfortunate Blennerhassett, found but little difficulty in changing the native character of that heart and the objects of its affection. By degrees he infuses into it the poison of his own ambition. He breathes into it the fire of his own courage; a daring and desperate thirst for glory; an ardor panting for great enterprises, for all the storm and bustle and hurricane of life. In a short time the whole man is changed; and every object of his former delight is relinquished. No more he enjoys the tranquil scene; it has become flat and insipid to his taste. His books are abandoned. His retort and crucible are thrown aside. His shrubbery blooms and breathes its fragrance upon the air in vain; he likes it not. His ear no longer drinks the rich melody of music; it longs for the trumpet's clangor and the cannon's roar. Even the prattle of his babes, once so sweet, no longer affects him; and the angel smile of his wife, which hitherto touched his bosom with ecstasy so unspeakable, is now unseen and unfelt. Greater objects have taken possession of his soul. His imagination has been dazzled by visions of diadems, of stars and garters and titles of nobility. He has been taught to burn with restless emulation at the names of great heroes and conquerors. His enchanted island is destined soon to relapse into a wilderness; and in a few months we find the beautiful and tender partner of his bosom, whom he lately "permitted not the winds of" summer "to visit too roughly," we find her shivering at midnight, on the winter banks of the Ohio, and mingling her tears with the torrents, that froze as they fell. Yet this unfortunate man, thus deluded from his interest and his happiness, thus seduced from the paths of innocence and peace, thus confounded in the toils that were deliberately spread for him and overwhelmed by the mastering spirit and genius of another—this man, thus ruined and undone and made to play a subordinate part in this grand drama of guilt and treason, this man is to be called the principal offender, while he by whom he was thus plunged in misery is comparatively innocent, a mere accessory! Is this reason? Is it law? Is it humanity? Sir, neither the human heart nor the human understanding will bear a perversion so monstrous and absurd! so shocking to the soul! so revolting to reason! Let Aaron Burr, then, not shrink from the high destination which he has courted, and having already ruined Blennerhassett in fortune, character and happiness forever, let him not attempt to finish the tragedy by thrusting that ill-fated man between himself and punishment.

Upon the whole, sir, reason declares Aaron Burr the principal in this crime, and confirms herein the sentence of the law; and the gentleman, in saying that his offence is of a derivative and accessorial nature, begs the question, and draws his conclusions from what, instead of being conceded, is denied. It is clear from what has been said that Burr did not derive his guilt from the men on the island, but imparted his own guilt to them; that he is not an accessory but a principal; and, therefore, that there is nothing in the objection which demands a record of their conviction before we shall go on with our proof against him.

Upon the fourth and last proposition laid down by Mr. Wickham, viz: That no evidence could be received to connect Col. Burr with the transactions on Blennerhassett's Island, because the evidence failed to prove that any overt act of levying war had been committed there, Mr. Wirt said:

The question which the court is here called on to decide is, whether the assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island were an overt act of levying war. As the overt act is compounded of fact and intention, they must yield to us the intention, because we are ready to prove their intention to be traitorous. Were they not to admit it we could not be debarred from proving it. They must admit that the individuals who composed the assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island, were enlisted by Aaron Burr or his subaltern officers; that they had marched by individuals to the mouth of Beaver, a place of partial rendezvous; that when collected there, they proceeded to Blennerhassett's Island, another place of rendezvous, where they were to receive an accession of boats, men, provisions, arms and ammunition under the command of Blennerhassett himself; that from the island they proceeded by the mouth of Cumberland to Baton Rouge, a place of general rendezvous for the expected forces from the West and from the states of Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee; and that at this place he headed them with a considerable addition of men and arms. They must admit that he attempted the seduction of the officers and men at the several forts and garrisons of the United States as they passed; which forts and garrisons were too weak to have resisted with effect. They must admit that their destination was New Orleans, where they expected the co-operation of the United States troops and the commander-in-chief. They must admit that New Orleans was to be taken, together with its bank, shipping and military stores, &c., that the standard of treason was to be planted in that city, which was to be made the seat of his empire. All the country west of the Allegany was to be annexed to his empire. All this they must admit; for this and more we are prepared to prove; and they must insist that the assemblage on the island, connected with all these facts, does not amount to treason.

The question, then, is whether, all these things admitted, the assemblage on the island were an overt act of levying war. Here, sir, are we forced most reluctantly to argue to the court, on only a part of the evidence, in presence of the jury, before they have heard the rest of the evidence, which might go a great way to explain or alter its effect. But unpleasant as the question is in this way, we must meet it. What is an open act of levying war? To which we are obliged to answer that it must be decided by the constitution and act of congress. Gentlemen on the other side, speaking on this subject, have asked us for battles, bloody battles, hard knocks, the noise of cannon. "Show us your open acts of war," they exclaim. Hard knocks, says one, are things we can all feel and understand. Where was the open deed of war, this bloody battle, this bloody war? cries another. Nowhere gentlemen. There was no bloody battle. There was no bloody war. The energy of a despised and traduced government prevented that tragical consequence. In reply to all this blustering and clamor for blood and havoc, let me ask calmly and temperately, does our constitution and act of congress require them? Can treason be committed by nothing short of actual battle? Mr. Wickham, shrinking from a position so bold and indefensible, has said that if there be not actual force, there must be, at least, potential force, such as terror and intimidation struck by the treasonable assemblage. We will examine this idea presently. Let us at this moment recur to the constitutional definition of treason, or to so much thereof as relates to this case. "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them," not in making war, but in levying it. The whole question then turns on the meaning of that word, "levying." This word, however, the gentlemen on the other side have artfully dropped; as if conscious of its operation against them, they have entirely omitted to use it. We know that ours is a motley language, variegated and enriched by the plunder of many foreign stores. When we derive a word from the Greek, the Latin, or any other foreign language, living or dead, philologists have always thought it most safe and correct to go to the original language for the purpose of ascertaining the precise meaning of such word. "Levy," we are told by all our lexicographers, is a word of French origin. It is proper, therefore, that we should turn to the dictionary of that language to ascertain its true and real meaning; and I believe we shall not find that, when applied to war, it ever means to fight, as the gentlemen on the other side would have us to believe. Boyer's Dictionary is before me, sir, and I am the more encouraged to appeal to him, because in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout, your honor, in estimating the import of this very word, thought it not improper to refer to the authority of Doctor Johnson. "Lever," the verb active, signifies, according to Boyer, "to lift, heave, hold, or raise up." Under the verb he has no phrase applicable to our purpose; but under the substantive "levee," he has several. I will give you them all. "Levee d' un siege," the raising of a siege. "Levee des fruits," gathering of fruits, crop, harvest. "La levee du parlement Britannique," the rising or recess of the British parliament. "Levee, (collecte dê deniers,)" a levy-raising or gathering. "Levee de gens de guerre," levying, levy, or raising of soldiers. "Faire de levees de soldats," to levy or raise soldiers. So that when applied to fruits or taxes, it means gathering as well as raising. When applied to soldiers it means raising only, not gathering, assembling, or even bringing them together, but merely raising. Johnson takes both these meanings, as you mentioned in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout; but in the original language, we see that levying, when applied to soldiers, means simply the raising them, without anything further. In military matters, "levying" and "raising," if Boyer may be trusted, are synonymous. But to ascertain still more satisfactorily the meaning of this word "levy," let us look to the source from which we have borrowed the whole definition of treason, the statute of 25 Edw. III. The statute is in Norman French, and in describing the treason of levying war, uses these words: "Si home leve de guerre, contre nostre seigneur le roy en son royalme." In a subsequent reign, I mean the factious and turbulent reign of Richard II., when the statute of Edward, although unrepealed, was forgotten, lost and buried under the billows of party rage and vengeance, it became at length necessary for parliament to interfere and break in pieces the engine of destructive treason; and in the 21st year of Richard II., a statute was passed which may be considered as a parliamentary construction of that of Edward III. In that statute, the treason of levying war is thus explained, "Celuy gue levy le people, and chevache en counter le roy à fair guerre deins son realme." Here the French verb, "leve," is the same as that used in the statute of Edward, with an unimportant orthographic variation; and here it is clearly contradistinguished from the actual war. The levy is of men and horses, for the purpose of making war; and the levy would have been complete, although the purpose had never been executed. I consider, therefore, the statute of Richard, as not only adding another authority to Boyer, to prove that the extent of the French verb "leve" when applied to soldiers goes no farther than the raising them; but I consider that statute, also, as a parliamentary exposition or glossary of the phrase "levy de guerre," in the statute of Edward. In this latter opinion I am supported by 1 Hale, P. C. 85, who, speaking of the statute of Richard, says: "These four points of treason" (settled by the parliament of Richard) "seem to be included within the St. 25 Edw. III. as to the matter of them, with these differences, viz: The forfeiture is extended further than it was formerly, namely to the forfeiture of estates tail and uses. 2. Whereas the ancient way of proceeding against commoners was by indictment and trial thereupon by the country, the trial and judgment is here appointed to be in parliament. 3. But that wherein the principal inconvenience of this act lay was this: that whereas the statute of Edward the Third required an overt act to be laid in the indictment and proved in evidence, this act hath no such provision." These are all the differences that he makes between them. Hence it is clearly the opinion of Hale that the treason of levying war is materially the same in both statutes. For if the statute of Edward required actual war, hard knocks, bloody battle, to constitute treason, while that of Richard made the mere preparation for those purposes treason, would it have escaped such a mind as Hale's, more particularly when he was especially employed in discriminating between the two statutes, and marking the points of difference to the disadvantage of the statute of Richard? If nothing short of actual war will satisfy the statute of Edward, while that of Richard covers so much more ground as to comprehend the first act of recruiting, and to make it the treason, how can the former be said to include the latter? It might, with as much propriety, be said that a field of battle includes the country or kingdom within which it lies, or that the less includes the greater. Yet of this absurdity Hale hath been guilty, unless it be conceded that the statutes of Richard and of Edward are materially the same. If, in conformity of the opinion of Hale, this point be conceded, then it is indisputably clear and certain that the statute of Richard makes levying of war to consist in the preparations for that war, in the raising of men, horses, &c., for the purpose of making war; so, also, under the statute of Edward, levying war means the preparations for that war. And if this construction of the statute of Edward be admitted, we have but to remember that our definition of treason is borrowed from this statute, and to ask whether the same words, "levying war," in the English and American statutes mean the same thing.

Confiding in the candor of this investigation and the truth of the conclusion to which it has led me, I should myself have thought the mere enlistment of soldiers of itself an overt act of levying war. I should think such enlistment, too, sufficient to satisfy the reason of the statute of Edward, and consequently of our constitution and act of congress, in requiring an overt act to be proven.

Gentlemen may say that the statute of Richard II., by this construction, proves too much for my purpose; that it must be evident that the parliament were dissatisfied with the generality of the statute of Edward, and intended by that of Richard to restrain that generality and narrow the ground of constructive treason, but that this construction would extend it, and instead of producing the intended salutary effects, would augment the dangers which it was intended to avert. But the language of the act, which is plain and most explicit, affords a satisfactory answer to this argument. It is exclusive of all possible doubts, by making the act of war consist in visible external preparation. The term "levy" in some lexicons means simply "to raise;" and if this plain sense and most natural meaning were to be adopted, there could, then, be no doubt, the prevention of which is certainly one of the benefits intended by the act. But it appears to me that it is, also, a reasonable construction; that it is all that reason can require. What is the reason avowed by all the books for requiring proof of an overt act to constitute treason? Every man knows that the moral turpitude consists in the mind and intention. Why, then, do we require proof of an act? It is because we cannot otherwise discover the intention. It is because the secret intentions of the mind lie beyond the ken of mortal sight. They can be known only to the man himself and to that Being whose eye can pierce the gloom of midnight and the still deeper gloom that shrouds the traitor's heart. To his fellow men, those intentions can be manifested only by some external or overt act. I consider the phrase "overt act" as intended to be in contrast with "secret intention;" but whenever this secret intention ripens and breaks out into an act of which the human senses can take cognizance, I consider the reason of the law as being satisfied. We are, then, relieved from the necessity of prying into and guessing at the secrets of the heart. It is not pretended that any case ever occurred to contradict this idea, until the case which is reported by Ventris, which hath been said by some modern English writer, and pronounced by your honor, to settle the principle that the mere enlistment of soldiers is not sufficient to constitute the levying of war. Permit me, with the utmost deference and respect for your honor, to examine that case, and see whether it justify a conclusion so broad. That case, it is to be observed, is adjudged under the statute of 25 Edw. III. Now it requires but to adopt for a moment the idea which I have shown to be sanctioned by Lord Hale, that the statute of Richard explains by a periphrasis the more condensed definition of that of Edward, to perceive the reasoning and whole scope of the case in Ventris. "If a man," says the statute of Edward, "shall levy war against our lord the king in his realm;" "or he," says the statute of Richard, "who levies men and horses against the king, to make war in his realm." The levy, then, is a totally different thing from the war. The levy is the preparation; the war is the purpose; but it is "to make war in his realm." Wheresoever, then, the levy is made, the purpose must be to make war in the realm. Hence it is very clear that though the levying should be within the realm, the statute would not be satisfied, unless the purpose, also, were to make war within the realm. It is upon this latter point alone, upon the destination, that the case in Ventris turns, and not upon the scene of enlistment, nor upon the insufficiency of the fact of enlistment. The case in Ventris is that of Patrick Harding (volume 2, pp. 315, 316). The charge in the indictment is conspiring the death of the king and queen, William and Mary; and the overt act laid is "levying war by raising divers soldiers and men, armed and to be armed, (armatos et armaturos,) et milites sic ut præfertur levatos extra hoc regnum Angliæ misit, et iter secum suscipere procuravit ad sese jungendos aliis hostibus," &c. The special verdict finds that the prisoner did list, hire, raise and procure sixteen men, subjects of this kingdom, at the time, &c., and those sixteen men so listed, hired, raised and procured, did send out of this kingdom into the kingdom of France to assist and aid the French king, &c. Upon this special verdict found, the lord chief justice, Justice Gregory, and Justice Ventris, who were then present at the sessions, conceived some doubt; for they were of opinion that it did not come within the clause of Edw. III. of levying war; for that clause is, if a man levy war against our sovereign lord the king in his realm, and by the matter found in the special verdict it appears that these men were listed and sent beyond sea to aid the French king. In the original report, the words "in his realm" are printed in italics, as marking the particular part of the statute on which the opinion rested. But suppose the purposed war had been within the realm; is not the implication from the reasoning of the court irresistible, that the enlistment would have been a sufficient overt act of levying? Is it not clear that the court in this case considered the statute of Edward as explained by that of Richard II.? that it distinguished between the levy and the war, and required, according to the express letter of the second statute, that not only the preparation but the proposed war should be within the realm? But it has been said that if the enlistment had been a sufficient overt act of levying war, then war had been levied within the realm. But this is confounding the levy with the war, the means with the end, the preparation with the purpose. It is losing sight of the requisition of the statute, that not the levying merely, but the intended war shall be within the realm. Besides, when the court avows the reason of its opinion; when it declares it to consist, not in the insufficiency of the fact of preparation, but in the fact that the proposed war was to be out of the realm with what propriety can it be argued that its opinion rested not on the reason which it does itself avow, but on one which it does not avow, and which it disapproves as far as it can do it by implication? If it were immaterial where the war was to be, if the enlistment of men were in itself insufficient as an overt act of levying war, why did not the court take this ground at once, and say that the mere enlistment of men was not an overt act of levying war? The answer is obvious; it was because it considered the statute as requiring that the proposed war should be within the realm; whereas the war, as found by the jury, was intended to be out of the realm; and to my judgment the inference is equally obvious, that if the war had been found to be intended within the realm, the court would have had no doubt that the war had been levied by the enlistment. The case in Ventris, therefore, is so far from warranting the conclusion that the mere enlistment is not a sufficient overt act of levying war, that in my conception it warrants the conclusion that it is a sufficient act. And if the case in Ventris do not justify the doctrine that enlistment is insufficient as an overt act, I defy the gentlemen to produce a case not dependent on that which does warrant it.

Mr. Wirt then went into a critical examination of the authorities cited on the other side to prove that force and military array are necessary to constitute the act of levying war, and insisted that they did not sustain the position assumed by counsel for the defence. He dwelt upon the decision of the supreme court in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout, and maintained that the evidence proved such a treasonable assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island, as, according to that opinion, clearly amounted to levying war. He also insisted on the position, that whether an overt act had been proved was a question of fact which must be submitted to the jury, and decided by them under the instructions of the court.

Mr. Hay. A large portion of Mr. Hay's argument was devoted to the question, whether the motion to arrest the evidence was one which, on principle and precedent, could be entertained by the court. He contended that no precedent could be found to justify such practice, either English or American. He insisted that the motion called upon the court to usurp powers belonging exclusively to the jury, by deciding upon the facts of the case. To wrest from the jury the decision of facts in a criminal prosecution, he said, was a most dangerous proposition, replete with incalculable mischief. He felt infinitely more solicitude about the preservation of this principle in all its purity, than for the correct construction of constitutional treason, as contradistinguished from constructive or oppressive treason.

In answer to arguments on the other side, Mr. Hay said the counsel all call aloud for an open deed of war. But neither the constitution nor the law speak of an overt act of war. They speak of levying war. There was a real, essential difference between an open deed of war and an overt act of levying war. An open deed of levying war is an assemblage of troops. If you go beyond that line, if these troops employ force or fight a battle, it is folly to call it an overt act of levying war; it is an open act of war previously levied. Is not this distinction, he asked, plain to the mind of every man of common sense? and is it not according to the obvious meaning of the constitution? Why, then, should counsel call so loudly and vehemently for open deeds of war, when they must have known that the overt act of treason consisted in levying war against the United States, and not in making it?

In reference to the position that before the accused could be held answerable for acts of an accessorial nature, the guilt of the principals must be proved by a record of their conviction, Mr. Hay said there was no law to warrant the application of the rule to this case. The real doctrine was, that if a man be indicted as an accessory, he is at liberty to state before his trial, when the indictment is called, that he does not choose to be tried till the principal be convicted. The judge knows that his objection is valid, and he suspends the prosecution till the principal be convicted; either confining him in prison or bailing him till his trial, according to the circumstances of the case. The accused may choose to be tried, and waive the right of suspending the trial. It never was in the power of the accessory, after he had been arraigned and plead not guilty to the indictment without objection, when he found that the testimony bore heavily upon him, then to call for the record of his principal's conviction as a preliminary point. He cited 1 Hale, P. C. 623. He contended that this right to call for the record of the conviction of the principal only existed in case of an accessory indicted as an accessory; and could not exist in this case, because the accused was not charged as an accessory, but as a principal.

In reply to the position that inasmuch as Col. Burr was not present when and where the pretended overt act was charged to have been committed, he could be guilty, if at all, only in an accessorial capacity, Mr. Hay said: Mr. Wickham says that his proposition, that Burr is an accessory and not a principal, is deduced from the constitution of the United States, their laws, and the laws of England. His first position was, that there is no treason in the United States but that which is defined by the constitution. Agreed. This is sound doctrine.

His next position was, that no man can be punished but he who does the act thus defined. This is conceded also. But when he says that this act of levying war against the United States cannot be performed but by a person present on the spot where the offence is alleged to be committed, I deny the correctness of the position, and aver that it is not founded in sound sense, or in the law of this country or of Great Britain. A man may levy war without being present with the troops where the offence is alleged to be committed, or even without making actual war at all. It is unnecessary to press the distinction between levying war and war itself. The common sense of mankind has decided this question. The man who levies war is he who projects the plan, provides the means, causes soldiers to be enlisted, and arms and other necessaries to be prepared, and directs and superintends the whole operation. He may sometimes be also master of means sufficient for the subversion of the liberty and happiness of a whole people. What would be the course of conduct which a man, at the head of a conspiracy to subvert the government of his country, and to raise himself on its ruins, would pursue, you may easily judge. Supposing him to be a man whose understanding was equal to his ambition, he would proportion the means to the end. He would use activity and enterprise. He would be confined to no particular scene of operations. He would be here and there and at every place, where and when it would be necessary to prepare for the accomplishment of his great object. He might give directions to different bodies of troops to meet him at given times and places, while in the intermediate time he might make arrangements at different places to prevent disappointment, and to secure final and ample success. Is it necessary, according to common sense, that a leader should be present at the very moment when an assemblage of part of his soldiers is to meet at a particular place in consequence of his previous orders? There may be twenty different assemblages. If he be a man of talents, intelligence, and activity, he may have formed his designs so wisely and concerted his measures so skilfully, as to have fifty, or five hundred, or even a thousand different assemblages and subordinate plans conducing to one common end, all going on at the same time without his actual presence. He is not present at any one place, but he directs and commands everywhere, and vigilantly waits for a favorable moment till he can strike a final and decisive blow. On principles of common sense it is not essential, therefore, that the commander should be present at any preconcerted assemblage of his troops. I repeat, that the common understanding of mankind has decided this question. We find (and every expression used here may be soon verified) that George III. levies war against the United States three thousand miles from us. It is he who declares the war, by whose directions the troops are raised and employed. It is he who levies the war, and not his subjects, who fight the battles; his generals and soldiers, who come hither for slaughter and murder, they make the war upon us, but they do not levy it. If the subjects of the king of Great Britain were to levy war upon this country, they would not be entitled to be considered as public enemies, but robbers, pirates, and murderers, according to the acts which they would commit; and, therefore, instead of being treated as public enemies, they would be regarded as individual offenders who had perpetrated those crimes, and proceeded against as such. But as he levies the war, they become public enemies in consequence thereof. A man may, on principles of common sense, not only levy war, but make war without being present at the place where a battle is fought. Bonaparte was not actually on the field at the battle of Austerlitz. I do not know that he was in view of the line of battle. He was in the rear with the body of reserve; yet the victory gained on that memorable day was gained by him, because he stationed the troops, directed their movements, and stood ready to give assistance; and the glory of that victory, so decisive of the destiny of Europe, was his. He not only levied but made war, without being personally present.

Such is the case here: admit it to be true that Burr was not on the island, yet the men who went, met there by his procurement and direction; they leave it by his direction; and he afterwards joins them, and takes the command. So that in coming to, remaining on, and quitting the island, they act in exact obedience to his command. If the assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island were an overt act of levying war, the person who procured that assemblage, by whom its movements to and from the island were directed, is emphatically guilty of levying war against the United States. Let us pursue this argument a little further; suppose that Burr had never been at the spot at all, but he knows that his troops are there. He apprehends that an attack is to be made on them; and to repel it, he dispatches more men, arms, ammunition, provisions, and everything necessary for their defence, with orders to resist, and instructions how to conduct the battle which is actually fought. The attack is made and repelled. Thousands fall in the battle. Would he not, then, levy war? Would it be contended by gentlemen that by the constitution of the United States, Aaron Burr, not having been personally present when this overt act of his procurement was committed, was not a principal but an accessory? that his soldiers are principals in the treason, but that he is not guilty? that the constitution requires the actual presence of the commander-in-chief whenever a battle is fought by any part of his army, or wherever an attack is made or repelled? If he would be guilty of levying war, what becomes of the doctrine which requires his presence? The constitution requires his presence nowhere.

To prove, however, the fallacy of this doctrine, let us examine the result. He is innocent and safe. They are guilty and punished. Is it possible that the human mind can be so perplexed by learning and so misled by ingenuity, so totally bereaved of all its powers, as to adopt a conclusion like this? to pronounce that the great projector, the prime mover of the whole conspiracy and plot, is constitutionally safe, while his deluded followers are to be hanged? Yet this is the language and this the doctrine of Mr. Wickham. He would make as little ceremony with Blennerhassett as Burr said he would use to Miranda. As to Miranda, said he, "We will hang Miranda." It appears to me, sir, that that construction of the constitution which leads to such a conclusion, which shall exculpate Burr and hang Blennerhassett, which leaves the principal to destroy the agent, is not only repugnant to common sense but to every dictate of feeling and humanity. There is sufficient reason to deplore the misconduct and crime of Blennerhassett. He has certainly done wrong and offended against the laws of his country grievously; but I hope to be excused for declaring that there is no more comparison between Blennerhassett and Burr, as to criminality, than there is between the breeze which gently shakes the leaves and the storm which desolates the earth. If this construction be not founded in reason, let us call for the law which sanctions the doctrine for which he contends. If we look at home we shall find that this question has been decided already by our own judges. The supreme court of the United States has solemnly decided it, in direct opposition to what gentlemen have insisted to be the law. But they say that it ought not to be regarded, because it was an extra-judicial decision. Mr. Wickham, finding it inconvenient to prove it, pretends to anticipate our admission of it, and with his usual dexterity takes it for granted that he has nothing to do but to follow up that supposed concession. Let us examine the subject and see whether it be extra-judicial or not. Bollman and Swartwout, who were never at Blennerhassett's Island or with the troops, were before the court on suspicion of high treason. A motion was made to commit them on this charge. Having been brought before the court on a writ of habeas corpus, a motion was made by their counsel to discharge them. Those cases came first before the circuit court for the county of Washington, and the records of that court, containing the orders by which they were committed on the charge of treason in levying war against the United States, and the testimony on which the commitment was made, were brought before the supreme court. I do not know by whom they were defended in that court or in the circuit court. But I take it for granted when I turn my eyes to that part of the world that they were defended with ability and zeal. They were not present on Blennerhassett's Island, nor with any part of the forces of Colonel Burr; and though not present they were charged with treason. I certainly am at liberty to suppose, whoever may have been their counsel, that they were defended with great zeal and ability, and that they were defended on this ground. From the extreme zeal displayed in the course of this defence, we may infer what defence was made for those persons; and if so, the decision of the supreme court was on the very point, and must be conclusive authority in this case. But let us suppose that this was not the point immediately in discussion nor before the court, and that consequently the decision may, strictly speaking, be considered as extra-judicial. Still I am at liberty to say that this opinion of the supreme court is entitled to the highest degree of consideration and respect, and ought not to be departed from but for reasons very different in principle and effect from those used on the part of the counsel for the prisoner.

The law as expounded by the judges of this country not suiting Mr. Wickham, he goes to Great Britain for his law, and brings with him the common law of that country, to show that the accused is only an accessory, and therefore not guilty. Let us see what benefit he derives from this voyage and importation of the common law. The very instant he opens the law-book he finds that the common law declares, "in treason all are principals." The very system to which he resorts presents this doctrine at once to him: that in treason all persons in any manner concerned, whether present or absent, are principals. How is this dilemma removed? The gentleman will not rely on this doctrine, and he turns to us with an exulting countenance and exclaims, "the common law is not in force in this country under the government of the United States; you must be governed by the constitution only. The gentleman will not contradict me." He well knew that I would not controvert the position as to the non-existence of the common law. He knew that this was a point agreed. The common law is not in force in the United States. There is no treason in the United States but that defined by the constitution; and he who was not leagued in the conspiracy and performed a part in it, whatever else he may have done, cannot be punished. In what manner does he avail himself of this concession that we do not claim the aid of the common law? That very instant he takes it up for his own use. Because we have disclaimed and thrown it by, he takes it up for his own exclusive benefit. "After what you have said, you cannot resort to the common law which says that all are principals; but I will resort to some other parts of the common law, and avail myself of them." How does he avail himself of them? After having stated that it was not in force, he resorts to it and relies on the common law distinction of principals and accessories; a principal being the actor or person present aiding and abetting the offence; an accessory an absent person who procures and counsels or receives and comforts an offender. Is there not in this reasoning, which disclaims and uses the same authority at once, a temerity which defies reflection and amounts to desperation? Is it not a desperate construction of the case? Would a man of Mr. Wickham's talents contend in one breath that the common law is not in force in this country, and yet in the next make it the principal basis of his argument, unless it were a desperate case? Desperate cases require desperate efforts. He avails himself of the common law to borrow from it distinctions which he endeavors to fix without reason or propriety on the constitution, which he says we wish to render merely a dead letter. It is a distinction borrowed from the common law, which says that a principal is he who is the actor or is present at the perpetration of the act, aiding and abetting, and declares an accessory to be a person who is absent, but procures or commands or counsels the act to be done. This is the distinction in Great Britain between principals and accessories founded on the common law. He insists that the prisoner, not having been present at the commission of the act, is merely an accessory; that an accessory is not punishable under the constitution of the United States; and therefore that the prisoner is not punishable at all.

If the common law be not in force, the gentleman has no more right to resort to it, or borrow any distinctions from it, than he has to borrow a distinction from the civil law, the Gentoo law, the Chinese law, or any other law in the world. I conceive that Mr. Wickham has himself furnished us with a conclusive reason why we should not resort to the common law for these definitions. Before I mention that reason, permit me to remark that there is something extraordinary and humiliating in this argument respecting the correct construction of the constitution. Those who framed it have used plain words, such as a man of the most ordinary capacity, as well as a man of the most enlightened mind can understand; and yet we are not to depend on plain construction, such as is obvious to every man of common understanding, but to go to England to resort to a system declared not to be in force, to find out the true meaning! It appears to me, sir, to be as degrading as it is absurd, to resort to a foreign system not in force in order to introduce a distinction which does not belong to it.

I have said that Mr. Wickham had himself furnished the reason why we should not resort to the common law. The constitution, he says, must be our guide; and its construction must be governed by rules of moral right, and not by artificial rules. The only reason he gives for this is, that the constitution is a compact and not a law. It does not fully justify his inference. It is both a compact and a law. It may be considered as a rule prescribed by a superior, or as founded in compact between parties. The fair construction is, that so far as it operates on states, it is a compact between those states, equally obligatory on them all; but as far as it applies to individuals it is a law prescribed by the supreme power in the state (the people in convention) which every citizen is bound to obey; and it is declared by the instrument itself to be the supreme law of the land. It is not very material in what light it is to be considered; whether as a compact or law, or both; but this shows the construction most consonant to common sense, and that when the question is put in that way there is no difficulty. But let us avail ourselves of Mr. Wickham's golden key for unlocking the door of the constitution. By rules of moral right, I suppose he means that exposition which will give us the intention, if the words used by its framers will bear it. Knowing the character, mental acuteness, talents, and intellectual powers of those who framed that constitution, it must be presumed not only that they intended to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy in every instance, but that they expressed their meaning in such a manner that if the constitution be fairly expounded that object will certainly be attained. I will ask whether it is to be supposed that their intention was that a traitor must be on the spot while his troops slaughtered their fellow-citizens, or else that he could not be punished. That the accessory should pass with impunity while the humble instruments of his ambition should be punished. Suppose the question put to the enlightened men who framed that constitution. Suppose they were asked at that time "whether it be your intention to exclude from punishment the prime mover and projector of a treasonable plot, who shall by himself or his agents enlist and assemble troops and procure everything conducive to the overt act, if he be not present when the overt act is performed. Do you intend that such a contriver and leader shall not be a principal traitor, or punished at all, but that the humble and deluded instruments of his ambition shall be punished?" They would all have unanimously answered. "This construction never will be adopted by any intelligent court. It will be the duty of the court to adopt the principle which will prevent the mischief; and if it be urged that such a projector and leader being absent does not levy war, is only an accessory, and not being expressly mentioned, as such is not punishable, the court will not be at all embarrassed by su h an argument, only calculated to mislead." They could not have answered otherwise. Whence could they derive a contrary idea? as they must have intended the suppression of the mischief. I very cordially agree with Mr. Wickham, that in the exposition of the constitution artificial rules ought not to be admitted. If we are to be governed by the rules of moral right and to exclude artificial rules, then we must be governed by the general principles of reason and justice, and not by rules borrowed from the most complicated of all artificial systems on the face of the earth, the common law, where the parts are artfully constructed to suit each other, and which have no sort of reference to this country. The force of this remark is illustrated very completely in this very case. In Great Britain the principal is the perpetrator or aider who is present. The accessory is he who, not being present, procures, counsels, &c. It is manifest that in Great Britain it is immaterial where you draw the line between the principal and the accessory before the fact, because no mischief can ensue, for all the ground not covered by the principal is occupied by the accessory; and what is not covered by the accessory is occupied by the principal. All persons concerned in the perpetration of the offence and in the acts which led to that perpetration are amenable to the laws and justice of their country. The definition, therefore, of a principal is manifestly connected with that of an accessory: both together taking in the guilt of the transaction and the guilt that led to it.

But how does the introduction of the distinction operate in this country? The gentleman tells us that those only are principals who are present at the perpetration of an offence; that all others concerned are accessories; and that accessories are not punishable by the constitution; so that he circumscribes the guilt of a principal, and which only is punishable within very narrow limits. The result of his exposition is that the constitution does not operate on the very persons whom it was intended to affect, and the most atrocious and dangerous offenders escape unpunished. Can this be correct? In England the definition of principal depends on that of accessory, and that of an accessory on that of a principal. But Mr. Wickham wishes us to borrow the definition from Great Britain, in order to cut off one-half of the offenders. He who counsels, commands, or procures treason to be committed is to escape with impunity. It is very clear that if Mr. Wickham's doctrine be adopted here, to have its full operation, no man can be indicted as an accessory in this country. He cannot be charged as an accessory to levying war. He must levy it. If you take every person who is an accessory, that is, who is guilty of what is termed an accessorial treason in Great Britain, to be an accessory here, you trample on the constitution and exempt from punishment all except those who are present at the scene of action. These, though infinitely less guilty, the humble and deluded followers, are to be punished, while their absent leaders escape; and the gentleman is the very man by whose doctrines it is to be prostrated to the earth.

The doctrine for which I contend appears to me to be infinitely more reasonable. It will not produce the punishment of all who are guilty either as principals or accessories, using those words in the English acceptation. It will extend to those only who are leagued in the general conspiracy and take a part in it. It does not extend to him who only conspires, but takes no part; who avails himself of the locus pœnitentiæ and turns from the iniquity of those men with whom he was leagued, and is a mere traitor in design, because he has performed no act. Nor will it extend to him who does what is termed in Great Britain an accessorial act after the fact. So that doing an act only without being leagued in or a party to the design, or designing without an act, or giving food or lodgings to the conspirators, knowing their design, but being no party to it, would not be embraced by it. He who seeing this party going down to New Orleans, but had known nothing of them before, gave them half a dozen barrels of whisky, would not be a traitor; because though he did perform a minute act, he was not leagued in the general conspiracy, nor was the act done with a traitorous design. I place it precisely on the ground taken by the supreme court. Is not this reasonable? Is there any distinction between the guilt of the persons embraced by this construction of the constitution? Was not Aaron Burr as guilty as his associates on the island assembled by his direction? Is there any difference in England between the guilt of the principal and the accessory before the fact? They are equally punishable with death. The accessory in Great Britain is regarded as equally guilty with the principal.

By making the question presented by the constitution and the act of congress the only question to be submitted to the jury, (that is, did the accused levy war?) we get clear of all the subtilties and refinements of the common law, which require an understanding infinitely more acute than mine to state or even to comprehend them. I do not wish to be bewildered in this labyrinth of law. I have seen gentlemen, in merely attempting to argue, perfectly bewildered in a chaos which they themselves had created. I think it will be fortunate for this country if we expound the constitution by the rules of common sense, without the distinctions of the common law There is too much subtilty, too much refinement, too much complexity in it for a practical system. A man may devote twenty or thirty years to its study, and not be able to comprehend it completely. I will venture to say that he will misinterpret some parts of it, however learned he may be. Even the gentleman's argument was so abstruse from the subtilties and niceties derived from that system, that not more than half a dozen among us were able to understand the direct scope of it. Let us, then, have a system of our own, adapted to the situation, habits and feelings of the country, without the absurdities, the trash and rubbish of the common law.

I said that the common law was not in force. This may require some explanation. I should not deem it necessary to make it, if the gentlemen on the other side had rightly understood the extent of my admission on the subject. But I think it necessary to remove any doubts and prevent misconceptions. The court will observe that in civil cases congress has made a provision for this defect by the act of 1789. But this does not extend to criminal cases by its very terms. How far certain parts may have been adopted by the use of certain technical expressions is an important question requiring no decision now. Certain parts of it have been taken into use, by the use of certain technical phrases in the constitution and some acts of congress. It is the opinion of some very able men, who have combated the doctrine that the common law is in force, that some particular parts of it have a sanction from the constitution as far as they are necessarily comprehended in the technical phrases which express the powers delegated to the government, and that certain other parts thereof are and may be adopted by congress as necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers expressly delegated. This idea is founded on the report of the committee of the Virginia assembly, in the session of 1799–1800, written by Mr. Madison, aided by some other able men. Beyond this limitation the common law has not been adopted under the government of the United States. I have said that certain parts of it have been adopted by the use of certain technical phrases in the constitution. For instance, it provides "that the trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment) shall be by jury." Every person indicted must be tried by a jury. The trial by jury is a technical phrase of the common law. By its insertion in the constitution, that part of the common law which prescribes the number, the unanimity of the jury and the right of challenge is adopted. The constitution does not say of what number a jury shall consist; whether of twelve, thirteen, or twenty-three, or any other number. But according to the practical construction of the constitution, we take it to mean twelve men; and that the jury must be unanimous in the opinion which they pronounce. And whence do we get this order but from the word "trial"? Whence does the accused get the right to a peremptory challenge or a challenge for cause? They spring from the word "jury" in the constitution. The act of congress does not give him the right of peremptorily challenging thirty-five. It says that if any person indicted of treason shall challenge peremptorily above the number of thirty-five of the jury, the court shall proceed to the trial of the person so challenging as if he had pleaded not guilty, and render judgment accordingly, from which the right of challenging thirty-five or a certain number is implied; and this act is itself founded on the words of the constitution, "trial by jury." There is in that law not one word on the subject of a challenge for cause; and yet it is deduced from the practical construction of the common law that he has a right to challenge for cause. The whole of this doctrine and all these rights are deduced from those words in the constitution.

I said that the question whether a man were principal or not was a question of law and fact which the jury must decide; and the question whether the accused be guilty in the first or second degree is a question of law and fact which the jury must also decide. The question, "who is a principal in the second degree?" is a question of law on which the court may instruct the jury. The court may decide that question with reference to any particular case coming before it; but the question, whether the person charged as a principal be so, is a question compounded of law and fact. The question here is, not who is a principal, but whether the accused, who stands charged as such, be so in his conduct. It is compounded of fact and law, and to be decided by the jury, subject to be informed by the court as to the law.

In the illustration of this doctrine the court may say that he is a principal in the first degree, or actor or principal in the second degree, present, aiding and abetting; but this presence need not be within sight or hearing; for if a party be engaged in the same enterprise with the actors, and stationed where he can give them aid or protection, he is a principal. Of all these circumstances the jury must judge according to the evidence, and apply the law as they find the facts proved. The whole evidence must, therefore, go before them; and they may decide on the law as well as the fact. Therefore, whether he contend that he is merely an accessory, and not punishable, or only a principal in the second degree, and therefore not punishable until after the conviction of the principal in the first degree, yet as we charge him with levying war, we have a right to introduce all our evidence, and to call on the jury to decide all the questions resulting from that evidence.

In reply to the argument that the indictment should charge the facts specially, as they were intended to be proved, Mr. Hay said: Let us ask in what situation we should be, if we had done what Mr. Wickham says we ought to have done? If we had stated in the indictment that he had levied war, but that he was absent at the time when he levied it? It would, indeed, be a strange and unprecedented indictment which should state that he levied war on Blennerhassett's Island, (which implies presence,) but that he was not present when he did the act on it. It would have been as much as to say that he was present, and yet not present, which would be an absurdity in terms. How could the fact have been stated? I believe it would puzzle the gentleman to draw such an indictment. I believe there never was an indictment, from the beginning of the world to this day, which stated that the accused was not present at the time of committing the act. We say that he was legally, or in the estimation of the law, present and concerned in the act of treason. If we had stated that he was absent, it would have excluded his legal as well as actual presence. How could we have got over this difficulty? If we had stated the fact as it appears, that though not actually, he was constructively present, we must have given a detail of the evidence, the most minute and difficult that could be conceived; which is utterly proscribed by practice and propriety, as several authorities which I have already referred to prove; and if we had so stated it, gentlemen would most probably have loudly complained of it as irregular and extraordinary. An indictment cannot be framed by the mind of mortal man charging the actor to be absent without involving the absurdities or inconveniences which I have stated. Such a detail of the evidence is extremely difficult to obtain and inconvenient to state, and has never been required. No more is requisite than what we have stated: that the accused and a number of men met together for the purpose of levying war against the United States, and did levy it on Blennerhassett's Island. These are the principles on which I contend that his third objection could not be sustained even in England. The idea that the indictment should state him to have been absent was not law. An accessory before the fact, who was never on the spot, may be convicted under an indictment charging him as the actual perpetrator of the offence. He cited 1 Hale, P. C. 214, where it is said that "if many conspire to counterfeit, or counsel, or abet it, and one of them doth the fact, upon that counselling or conspiracy, it is treason in all; and they may be indicted for counterfeiting generally within this statute, for, in such case, in treason all are principals." Also, page 238: "Though the receiver of a traitor, knowing it, be a principal traitor, and shall not be said an accessory, yet this much he partakes of an accessory, that his indictment must be special of the receipt, and not generally that he did the thing, which may be otherwise in case of one that is a procurer, counsellor, or consenter." He also cited 1 East, P. C. 126, 127, where the same doctrine is laid down in nearly the same words.

Mr. Hay closed with the following remarks: It was said by Mr. Wickham that if the doctrine for which we contend could be sanctioned by the court, a precedent would be established which would be fatal to the liberty and happiness of the people of this country; that it would be more dangerous than any ever introduced in any country. He seems to be alarmed at our temerity, and endeavors to persuade us to desist from pursuing the object we have in view. He admonishes us that the principles and doctrine which we advocate to maintain the prosecution are totally subversive of public liberty. The pathetic and animated description which the gentleman gave us of anticipated calamities, and the fervor of his zeal in their deprecation, had a considerable effect on my mind, and induced me to examine minutely whether they would lead to those fatal consequences which he so eloquently depicted. He trembles for his country, for himself and his posterity, lest we should succeed. I have looked into the subject according to my best ability and judgment, and endeavored to discover whether any great evil or mischief would ensue from the principles which we have advocated, or the measures we have recommended. I, too, am a citizen of this country and the father of children, for whose happiness and welfare I feel a solicitude as lively and affectionate as any parent can feel. To the true happiness of my country, I hope, I know, that I am sincerely and ardently attached. But I see no danger. I apprehend none for myself or my posterity. I am perfectly willing to risk my own life, liberty, and happiness, and those of my posterity, on the propriety of the principles which we recommend. Let them avoid entering into traitorous conspiracies and designs fatal to the liberty and happiness of their fellow-citizens; let them avoid traitorous assemblies, overt acts of levying war, and they will be safe. They cannot be hurt. No individual need apprehend any danger from accusations of treason, either to himself or his posterity, if he and they be innocent. Before any man's life can be in jeopardy, he must not only be concerned in the unnatural and ungrateful scheme of subverting the government of his country, but he must take one active step to carry it into effect. It is unnecessary to mention the fate which any man deserves who attempts to destroy such a government as ours, or to destroy the tranquility and happiness of the people. Let every man pursue the path of integrity and patriotism; let him avoid schemes of unprincipled ambition; and he will not even be suspected. I hope and believe there is no danger on this score. The gentleman made another remark, to which I beg leave to call the attention of the court. I appeal to them whether the principles on which we have gone warranted his injurious anticipations. Without waiting to hear one word in support of the doctrines which we professed to maintain, he said that we must contend, before we could succeed in the prosecution, that the constitution was a dead letter. Have we done so? Have we not advocated the constitution in all its extent? Have we not maintained it in the most perfect purity? Have we not uniformly contended for its inviolability in every respect? Sir, we have contended for that construction which can alone save it from violation, and give it stability and permanence. Yet the gentleman said that we could not oppose his argument without contending that the constitution was a dead letter! The gentleman knows that he was incorrect. I would agree to die ten thousand times over before I would dare to advance so horrible a proposition. It was the language of zeal, mistaken zeal, uttered in the warmth of debate. It was a spark of momentary irritation which is common to that gentleman with most other men, but inconsistent with his usual sentiments of politeness and friendship, which, I hope, now have resumed their place in his breast. I do not wish to hurt his feelings; but I must add that he went still further. He stated that if we opposed him, we must adopt the doctrine established by the cruel Jeffries, and apply it against the accused, not the doctrine of the execrable Coke, but of the bloodthirsty Jeffries. Have we quoted his opinions, resorted to his authority, or advocated his principles? Sir, I never did, I never will, I never can advocate opinions and principles which I abhor; and I firmly and cordially unite in handing down the name of Jeffries with my execration to all posterity. Let that name be consigned to merited and eternal infamy. No man holds it in greater detestation and abhorrence than I do. Jeffries, the disgrace of the English bench, whose name is not mentioned even in that country but to be despised, will never be spoken of in this country but in terms of the deepest reproach.

Sir, we have never gone one step out of the right path, as far as we could trace it. We have confined ourselves within the fair exposition of the constitution of our country, according to our several capacities. I may be mistaken; but I have heard nothing yet to induce me to think that my exposition of the constitution and laws is incorrect. I have not stated a single fact which I did not believe to be true, nor urged a single argument which has not operated conviction on my own mind. Nor have the great and persevering exertions of the counsel of the accused, with all the splendor of their talents and the depth of their researches, enabled them to advance a single principle of defence which, in my estimation, hath not been amply refuted.

With this view of the subject, and believing the liberty, prosperity, and happiness of the people to be strongly connected with the decision of this case, I cannot conclude without expressing my hope that the motion will be rejected; that according to the opinion of this court on a late occasion, they will not stop the prosecution, but permit us to introduce the rest of our witnesses, in order to enable the jury to decide upon the fact coupled with the intention.

The following is a brief extract from Mr. Lee's compact and vigorous address:

Charles Lee. The second position is, that the presence of the party accused at the scene of action is, by the constitution of the United States, indispensably necessary to make him guilty of the fact of levying war. In this case we lay down the broad doctrine: that in this country there is no treason but under the constitution; that consequently there is no common law treason. When there is no other than the constitutional treason, I should suppose that this could hardly be a question, because we read in the constitution the word "only," which excludes everything from being treason but what the constitution says is treason: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." To advise levying war is in its essence and nature different from levying war. The constitution says it shall consist only in levying it; the other branch, of adhering to their enemies, &c., not being at all in question. To advise or procure levying of war is clearly distinct from levying it. Every person who can read has only to open the book containing the constitution, and he reads that levying war shall be treason only. Of course, by the adoption of this strong negative word, "only," it says, that advising to levy war shall not be treason. But gentlemen tell us that at common law advising to levy war is treason, and that there are no accessories in treason. We answer, that our constitution is in derogation and abridgement of the common law, not in affirmance of it; that it excludes entirely all common law treasons; all treasons whatsoever except the two instances specified. The common law of England is not in force on any subject under the constitution of the United States. If advising to levy war be a common law treason, (that is, a treason created by the common law,) and the common law have no force in this country, how can the common law be said to have created this treason in any court of the United States? Gentlemen admit that the common law as a general system has no force here. According to the opinion of Judge Chase, there can be no crime of which any courts of the United States can take cognizance unless it be created by an act of congress, and expressly authorized by the constitution, and the constitution has never adopted that common law doctrine which says that accessories in treason shall be considered as traitors. If it can be shown, let it be shown that the constitution has adopted this doctrine of accessories. It is said that it is impliedly adopted. This doctrine of implication I trust will not be countenanced by this court. I hope to be excused for repeating, that the constitution, touching the crime of treason, is in abridgement, not in affirmance of the common law. It takes its ground independently of the common law. The statute of 25 Edw. III., from which the words of the constitution are taken, is different from it. There are many other treasons at common law which remain in force there, and which that statute recognizes; whereas there are adopted into our constitution only these two specific treasons, with negative words excluding the possibility of any other. An accessorial treason is a common law treason in its own nature. It exists in England because the common law exists there; but it does not exist here, because treason consists only in levying war. If by the common law doctrine accessories be traitors, the same consequence does not follow in this country that does in England. This crime, which is to consist only of levying war and adhering to the enemies of the country, is punishable by law according to the discretion of congress, who may punish it in whatever way they may think proper; but the powers of congress have not yet been exercised over it. Whether it be through inadvertence or otherwise, they have hitherto omitted to punish accessories, except in an inconsiderable degree, as to those after the fact, who are rescuers of persons convicted of or committed for treason. This court has nothing to do with it. It would seem very strange to the ear of an American to hear that a man might be guilty at an after day; that after the cessation of a rebellion a man may be guilty of an act of war in that rebellion; that after the war has ceased there may be an act of levying war. Yet this part of the English law the constitution has completely excluded. By the common law this crime may be committed after the war has completely ceased, by receiving or giving comfort to a party who had been engaged in it. Treason might be committed on this day, in this place, in relation to some persons who had committed treason in person in the insurrection of 1793 or 1798. This common law doctrine I consider as being cut up by the constitution. If one common law treason be cut up, all are cut up; there is no common law treason. It is only by construction and deduction that any common law treason can be admitted. If one constructive treason be admitted, all may enter. If it be admitted that an accessory before the fact, an adviser or abettor, be constructively a traitor under the constitution, by the same common law rule of construction, an accessory after the fact, a mere receiver or comforter of a person deemed to have been a traitor, may be punished as a traitor long after the termination of a war, or the suppression of an insurrection. I know no difference between a procurer or aider before, and a receiver and comforter after the fact in treason. The same rules of decision apply to both. Either both exist or are cut up by the roots. Then, sir, if according to the English law accessorial treason be the creature of the common law, it has its existence only with the common law. The person who procures treason to be committed, who plots some project to subvert the government, who advises, who hires, who counsels, who commands, or who abets a project to subvert the government, is a traitor according to that common law. If all these be created by the common law of England, they exist only there. But if the common law have no existence here, the doctrine of accessorial treason has no force here.

Gentlemen say that the common law has no force here as a general system; but they say that certain parts of it have been adopted. They will look into authorities to see the meaning of particular expressions. They refer to the common law for the meaning of words. They say that crimes have been created by using such and such words in the constitution. What is levying war? It is said it consists of such and such facts, because it is so according to the English authorities, which are founded upon the common law. They still forget the distinction: that our constitution is in abridgment of the common law, and that it was intended to stand on its own feet independently of common law reasons. Let them only recollect this principle and it will prevent them from a repetition of errors. There are no words in the constitution which warrant their arguments. Was it intended by it that constructive treason should exist in this country in any case? Was it intended that a person absent at a great distance (perhaps out of the country, in another and very remote part of the world) should be construed to be present here? that such a person should, under the constitution, be considered as guilty of treason here by acts done by others? Can there be a more unnatural and tortured construction than to suppose a person present, committing acts of treason and violence in one state, when he was peaceably and innocently occupied in another? Sir, constructive treason is abrogated by the constitution. It exists in no case in this country. We are not to consider men present when they are absent. Such a construction is as unjust and oppressive as it is unnatural and unessential to the purposes of justice.

Mr. Luther Martin commenced his speech by the following introductory remarks:

May it please your honors: I shall now endeavor to close the important debate before the court, and to show that our motion ought to be granted. It involves certain great principles, on the correct settlement of which greatly depend the welfare and happiness of the people of this country. I shall therefore make no apology for any length of time I may occupy in the discussion of the question. When we are defending the life of a human being, and discussing principles of such vast importance to the interests of the community and posterity, time ought not to be regarded. A sufficient period ought to be devoted to the complete investigation of the subject, and entire development of truth. We contend that there is nothing to support the indictment before the jury, even admitting all those things to be true (and considering them as proved) which gentlemen say their testimony could establish. We call on the court to decide on the relevancy of the evidence which they offer. It is the duty of the court to prevent the introduction of any evidence in any case before it which is irrelevant to the issue. For this objection to illegal testimony, which it was our indispensable duty to make, we have been denounced throughout the United States as attempting to suppress the truth, and encroaching upon the exclusive rights of the jury. This subject shall be particularly discussed in the course of the argument. The exercise of this indisputable right has been held up to the public and to this jury as a conclusive proof of our guilt. It is alleged that we interrupt the due course of the testimony; that if we knew ourselves to be innocent, we would not have done so; and that it is sufficient to convince the jury of our criminality. We have been told that we are profoundly skilled in the science of defence, and are making the utmost efforts to save our client from merited punishment. Let us see what an immensity of time has been spent, and what means have been used in the course of this prosecution against our client, what patience and forbearance he hath manifested, and then let it be determined whether we ought to forego any legal advantages or surrender any of our rights.

The grand jury were sworn on the 22d of May; and we waited patiently from that day to the 13th day of June, before the primum mobile General Wilkinson thought proper to appear in obedience to the process of the court, by which means our client has suffered much inconvenience; and a great number of witnesses have suffered still more inconvenience. From the time that the indictment was found to be a true bill, our client has been closely confined. The first panel did not contain a sufficient number of unexceptionable jurors. Only four of them could be admitted; and these were not sworn till the 10th of August. Another panel was to be summoned, out of which the rest of the jury were not selected and sworn till the 17th of August; although Colonel Burr did everything that he possibly could to expedite the trial, waiving considerable privileges, as the history of the proceedings thereon will show. It may be said that he objected to a jury being sworn from the first panel, and therefore retarded the proceedings; but surely, sir, no person will consider it as a crime that he did not consent to be sacrificed; or, what is the same thing, that gentlemen who had signed his doom in their own minds before hand should decide on his reputation and his life. When this motion was made, though so much time had elapsed, only twelve witnesses had been sworn out of about one hundred and forty on their side; and there are thirty or more to be examined on our side; it is not, therefore, unreasonable to suppose that to examine all the witnesses, and hear the whole testimony, irrelevant as well as relevant, would require a month, perhaps two months. And further, when the circumstance of this season of the year is considered, the admission of illegal testimony, and waste of time in its examination, became more improper. Jurymen cannot be certain of retaining their health. Is it not probable that before the trial would be brought to a close, some of the jury, from the confinement which they must endure, might be taken sick? What would be the result? Our situation, already unpleasant and distressing, would become much more so. The jury must be discharged, and the whole must be done anew; or if by consent a juror were to be substituted in the place of a juror taken sick, the whole testimony must be re-examined, and the same length of time consumed; and if so, the same cause might again produce the same effect; so that from the infirmity of witnesses produced on the present occasion, there is scarcely a probability of the cause being determined in any reasonable period. During all this time Col. Burr must remain in confinement; and yet this time would be totally useless to him. While it oppressed him, it would afford him no benefit.

These considerations must satisfy every person who is in court, that our conduct is justifiable in resisting all attempts to introduce illegal testimony, and preventing the time of the court from being wasted in improper and irrelevant discussion; and that we do not wish to evade justice. I was myself disposed to waive these obvious and undeniable rights, and to submit to the inconveniences of hearing all the evidence, however irrelevant, because I was convinced that it would remove all the prejudices which have been excited against Colonel Burr without having the least foundation, and demonstrate his innocence to be as pure as that of the unsullied snow. But on consultation with the able gentlemen associated with me, this course has been deemed more eligible on principles of law as well as convenience. That the artifices and persecution of his enemies should have so far succeeded as to place Colonel Burr in his present situation, is a matter of deep regret; but I shall ever feel the sincerest gratitude to Heaven that my life has been preserved to this time, and that I am enabled to appear before this court in his defence; and if the efforts of those highly respectable and eminent gentlemen with whom I have the honor to be associated, may, united with my feeble aid, be successful in rescuing a gentleman for whom I, with pleasure, avow my friendship and esteem, from the fangs of his persecutors—if our joint efforts shall be successful in wiping away the tears of filial piety, in healing the deep wounds inflicted on the breast of the child by the envenomed shafts of hatred and malice hurled at the heart of the father—if our efforts shall succeed in preserving youth, innocence, elegance and merit from a life of unutterable misery, from despair, from distraction—it will be to me the greatest pleasure. What dear delight will my heart enjoy! How ineffable, how supreme will be my bliss!

Nor is private friendship for the accused and his connections my only inducement to use my utmost efforts in his vidication. I am urged by a different but very powerful motive. I am thankful to Heaven that when a great question, so awfully important as that which respects the principles of treason, is to be decided—a question on the correct construction of which the happiness or misery of the present and future ages depends—it gives me infinite pleasure to have an opportunity of exerting to the utmost my feeble talents, in opposing principles which I consider so destructive as those which are advanced on the present occasion; and if we shall demonstrate contrary principles to be correct and proper, if we shall be able to satisfy the court that principles the reverse of those contended for on the part of the prosecution ought to be established, I shall think that I have not lived in vain.

In proceeding to the argument, Mr. Martin laid down, in substance, the same four general propositions discussed by Mr. Wickham, and said there were no other points in the case, unless the counsel for the prosecution had some further testimony to prove that Colonel Burr was on Blennerhassett's Island when the pretended overt act was committed. He said he would observe by way of preliminary remark that there was no sort of question but what the principal and accessory may be brought to trial together, (or at the same time,) if both be before the court and the accessory waive all objections to a trial; but if he do not waive it, the antecedent conviction of the principal must be produced; and if he waive it, the court will direct the jury to acquit him if the guilt of the principal be not proved. Here, sir, I would beg to be understood that neither Colonel Burr nor his counsel admit or suggest that Blennerhassett or any other person was guilty of treason on Blennerhassett's Island. It is only a suspicion. We have not the most distant idea that he was guilty. Where, then, was the propriety of saying that we are willing to sacrifice Blennerhassett? and that he might be hanged without pity or remorse on our part? We deny it. We disavow and execrate such sentiments. We hold up to the public our sacred belief that Blennerhassett is as innocent as I am, or as the gentlemen on the other side; that no man on the island was guilty of treason; and that the party who were there were engaged in honest and honorable pursuits, without any other motive whatever. If even the intention to make war had been proved, yet throughout the whole Union the violence of actual war has never been known to take place. If such a war have taken place, it was a mighty strange kind of war, which neither man nor woman nor child has ever seen or heard. Though there was a great war in the United States from New Hampshire to New Orleans, and a great number of persons engaged in it, yet in this great war not a single act of violence can be proved by any human being to have happened.

Mr. Martin then proceeded to examine the question, who are accessories in murder and felony before and after the fact, and to apply the result to the doctrine of treason, in which the law of England declares persons to be principals who in those cases are accessorial agents. In order to understand the doctrine correctly, it was necessary to have a clear and distinct idea in what instances persons concerned in murder and felony can be considered as principals, and in what cases accessories. It seemed to be agreed that those who by hire, counsel, or conspiracy—and generally holden that those who by showing an express liking, approbation, or assent to another's felonious design of committing a felony, abet and encourage him to commit it, (but are so far absent when he commits it that he could not be encouraged by the hopes of any immediate help or assistance from them,) are accessories before the fact, both as to the felony intended and all other felonies which shall happen, in and by the execution of it, if they do not expressly retract and countermand their encouragement before it is actually committed. 2 Hawk. P. C. p. 445, c. 29, § 16. Whenever a person can be considered by law as constructively present, though not heard or seen, accessorial agency does not apply to him, but he must be considered as an immediate actor, and so indicted. He then went into an elaborate examination of the authorities to show how far the doctrine of constructive presence had been carried by the courts. He read and commented upon the authorities cited by Mr. Wirt on this point, Lord Dacre's Case, Pudsey's Case, and others, and claimed that they clearly settled the doctrine that no person can be considered constructively present, so as to make him a principal, who is not engaged in the general conspiracy, and so near that the person who does the fact is emboldened in it, from the hopes of present and immediate assistance of the abettor, whether he be in view of the fact or not. He then said:

On the present occasion the counsel have endeavored to distinguish between cases of constructive presence in treason and other crimes. They insist that to determine the degree of proximity between the immediate actor and his aiders or abettors, who are legally construed to be present, you must consider the theatre of action, and extend the degree of proximity according to the extent of that theatre; that the legal presence, which would not exist in murder or felony, may well exist in treason; that in treason all the whole United States are the theatre of action; the scale of proximity essential to legal presence should be in proportion, so that persons in Tennessee or Kentucky are to be considered as legally present on Blennerhassett's Island when the acts in question were committed. It is evident that the principles of legal constructive presence cannot be extended to this case, for the actors could have no hopes of immediate assistance from the others, who were hundreds of miles distant. But they insist that treason consists in the treasonable intention. It has been echoed and re-echoed that treason consists in the treasonable intention. We admit that there is in Great Britain one species of treason which consists in the intention, without any act consummating the guilt of treason. I mean the compassing the death of the king, where the crime is merely imagined; and nothing more is necessary than to write a letter to a man advising him to kill the king, and that fact being proved, he is guilty and liable to be punished for treason, though the king was not killed, and though the party advised took no steps to pursue it. Though this be correct when confined to the death of the king, queen, or eldest son of the king, and the treasonable intention constitutes the treason, yet the overt act is evidence of the intention only and not of the actual commission of the crime, because writing a letter is not treason, but proof of the intention to commit it. But why is the intention to commit it treason in Great Britain? Because a special law is made for the safeguard of the life of the king, making it treason to conspire, compass, or imagine his death, when evidenced by some overt act such as I have just stated; a conspiracy against the life of the king, whether carried into execution or not, is made treason by special act of parliament. But in America we have no species of treason except two: levying war against the United States, and adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. What is the treason charged on us? Levying war. This overt act of levying war, which is said to have been committed, must be proved by two witnesses. According to the constitution, no person can be convicted unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act. If there be twenty overt acts and each of them proved by one witness, nay, if there be fifty overt acts committed at different places, and each proved only by one witness, it will not suffice; two witnesses must concur in proving the same act at some particular place or the accused cannot be convicted. The overt act of levying war is not the crime of levying war, which consists of intention and act together. But gentlemen must admit that the intention alone is not punishable. There must be an actual levying of war, and the overt act is proof of it. On an indictment for levying war they can give no evidence but of what is charged. They can adduce proof only of the overt act which they have laid. Proof of the intention alone would be inadmissible; just as in the case of murder, the prosecutor cannot prove the murder without proving that the party has been killed; and so in a prosecution for stealing a horse, the taking of the horse must be proved; the malicious intention to kill in the one case, and the felonious intended appropriation in the other, must be established; but the intention in either case will not do without the act.

Mr. Martin said it had been repeatedly declared in our courts that the decisions in Great Britain, however entitled to respect, are not binding authority in this country; and he thanked God that such was the case. The principles laid down in Great Britain respecting treason, as appears from the history of their jurisprudence, have been such that their judges have in the most arbitrary manner carried into execution the most wicked wishes of the persons who held the crown. Even after the revolution of 1688 this has been the case, though not so much as formerly; they have extended the rules of evidence with respect to treason so as to shock humane judges. The influence of the crown was such, that whatever endangered the life of their sovereign lord and master, from whom the judges derived their authority, was construed to be treason in imagining or compassing his death. As they were under this bias, their decisions ought not to be considered as binding precedents, but received with great caution. It is necessary for the clear investigation of this matter that mere general expressions relating to the crime of treason in Great Britain ought not to be construed as extending to treason in levying war, but to the other branch, the doctrines of which were adopted to guard the life of the sovereign. The reason why there are not so many cases in Great Britain of indictments against accessories before the fact as against those after, was, that most of the prosecutions for treason there are for compassing the death of the king; and in indictments for compassing his death, he who advises it by writing or otherwise is as much a principal traitor as he who aids or assists in actually killing him. A party who converses on the subject is deemed a traitor; and the overt act is laid against him for compassing and consulting about the death of the king. Every act which evinces an intent formed in the mind of the accused against the safety of the king, as meeting to consult, writing a letter, enlisting men, preparing other means, &c., is admissible evidence to support an indictment for compassing or imagining the death of the king. An overt act must be set forth in every indictment for treason, and proved in every instance. In the case of compassing the death of the king, the object of requiring it is to prove the intention. If the intention could be otherwise proved, whether any act were done or not, though the person of the king were never injured, yet the party would suffer death for it; because in that case the crime consists in the design formed in the mind. Levying war, itself, may be laid as an overt act of compassing the king's death; and when it is so laid, the accused need not be charged with anything more. When the indictment is for levying war as a specific treason, it must specify the overt act which is to support it. So says the act of parliament; so say all the authorities. This doctrine is fully confirmed in Vaughan's Case [2 Salk. 634], 5 State Tr. 17. Captain Vaughan went on board a vessel called the Loyal Clencartie, in the service of the French king, to cruise against the subjects of England. In that case there were two counts in the indictment: one for levying war and the other for adhering to the king's enemies. It was decided on argument that his cruising in this vessel, though he fought no battle, and committed no actual hostility, was an act of aiding, and supported the count for adhering to the king's enemies; but it was decided and admitted that it was not sufficient proof to support the other count for levying war; and "that there must be an actual war proved upon a person indicted for levying war." In Harding's Case, 2 Vent. 316, who was indicted of treason in the time of William and Mary for enlisting sixteen men and sending them to France to aid the king of that country against the English, it was decided that he was guilty of treason, but not of treason in levying war. The specific treason whereof he was guilty was not that of levying war, but adhering to the king's enemies. The indictment charged that he compassed the death of the king and queen, and levied war against them, in enlisting those men and sending them out of the country to aid their enemies. It was determined that he was guilty of high treason within the clause of the statute for compassing the death of the king, it being found by special verdict that the prisoner did enlist those men with an intent to depose the king and queen, &c. It appears to have been an almost universal practice in former times, in prosecutions carried on by the attorney general, to state in every indictment a charge for compassing the death of the king—and for the plainest reason in the world: that this kind of indictment comprehended every kind of treason, and facilitated the conviction of those marked out for destruction. It was a comprehensive mode of prosecution which was more easy to be conducted and more successful in accomplishing the end proposed. If a person were to be indicted for aiding and assisting the king's enemies, or levying war against him, they would state in the indictment a charge for compassing the death of the king, because, according to the system adopted, this charge could be more easily supported by proof. Those who wished to destroy innocence preferred this mode of prosecution, because it would put the person accused more at their mercy. For in cases of compassing the king's death, the most wicked and arbitrary prosecutions were countenanced by the courts of justice. When the safety of the person of their king was in question, principles the most incompatible with justice were sanctioned. For this purpose, in every prosecution, when specific facts were proved, they would go into a history of the conspiracy against the king, because every conspiracy against the prince or his government was construed to be a plot intended against his life. And in the examination of these conspiracies, in order to establish their existence, they went into every kind of evidence—letters and verbal declarations, and words uttered by others, though not in the presence or hearing of the person accused; letters, written not to him but to any other person, and papers found in his possession. All these were jumbled together to establish the conspiracy, and the connection of the persons accused with it. To establish those conspiracies, and the connection of those who were accused of being concerned in them, every species of illegal and improper evidence was admitted by the most corrupt judges that ever sat in a court of justice. Not acts alone, but mere loose words, a hasty declaration, an assent inferred from an unguarded expression, nay, the declarations of other people and papers found in the possession of the party, by whomsoever written, were all admitted against the accused as proofs of a conspiracy and of compassing the death of the king. Transactions in themselves innocent were deemed sufficient to condemn to the scaffold. A mere declaration was sufficient to prove any act required to be established, because the death of the king was the cause of prosecution. An open, notorious act was not deemed necessary to establish guilt, but a story, a mere verbal assertion, without any positive proof of any real fact. This kind of evidence was admitted because it was the best calculated to destroy the victim of the government or of private revenge. They have on the present occasion proceeded on the principle that they could prove a conspiracy; but is there a particle of criminality proved? If some sort of connection between the person accused and those joined in the supposed conspiracy be proved, this is by no means sufficient on this indictment for levying war; but they must prove war actually levied—an act done. No person can be guilty of treason, though a thousand conspiracies to levy war were proved, without the existence of actual war. There must be an actual war proved. That is the proof which is introduced in all other cases except compassing the death of the king. In prosecutions for levying war, there must be acts of violence alleged and proved; an actual war must be proved to exist; or, at least, sufficient must be stated to show that the party were in a posture of war. When specific acts or particular circumstances, not amounting to the actual levying of war, or an adherence to the king's enemies, constitute treason, they can only support an indictment for compassing the death of the king. This may be safely laid down as a general rule, from which there is no exception whatever.

Let us see whether the principle that requires a specification of the offence of receiving a traitor after the fact do not equally apply to the case of advising and procuring treason before the fact. The cases already mentioned sufficiently prove that there is no difference between them in this respect. Why is a receiver after the fact considered as a traitor? Because the law says that he is a principal in the treason. But it is as necessary to distinguish or specify the crime of advising treason, or that a person said a thing before the fact, as it is to distinguish the doing a thing, as receiving a person guilty of treason after the fact. Is there any distinction between them? Is not notice as necessary in one case as the other? Each is considered as a principal in the treason. It is surely as necessary to lay the receiver in the indictment as having done the principal act himself, as he has done that which the law says makes him a principal, as it is to charge the adviser with having performed the act of war himself, because he has committed what makes him in law a principal. If he have done an act which the law says makes him a principal in treason, and it is sufficient in any case, however special the facts, to charge the accused generally according to the legal effect, then he may be charged generally in every case, and there will be no necessity of a specification in any case. I ask, if a man who counsels the levying of war can be charged with levying war, because he is a principal in treason, cannot the receiver be generally charged, also, with levying war, since he has done what makes him guilty of treason? The reason is in both cases the same. If, notwithstanding his having done what makes him a principal in treason, a receiver of a traitor must be specially charged, there is no reason in the world why a person who advises the commission of treason should not be charged specially. But there is a direct reason, stated in Foster, Hale, and Hawkins, why the adviser of treason should be specially charged: that in all other cases, except compassing the king's death, those who are to be considered as accessories (as far as relates to the mode of prosecution) cannot be put on their trial, except the principal have been convicted; but they may be brought to trial together. Do not these authorities prove that the indictment must specially show who is charged as an accessorial agent, and who did the act? that if they be not tried together the indictment must show that the principal has been convicted, since till then he cannot be tried against his will? How is he to know, when indicted in this general mode, that they do not mean to charge him by their proof directly with levying war in person? How can he suppose from this indictment that they mean to make it appear that other persons levied the war, and that he was more than one hundred miles off? If the indictment charged, what is true, that he was not with the actors, that he was at a great distance, but he advised or persuaded them to act, then he would not be obliged to be tried till the principal should have been convicted. Does not this furnish a decisive argument to prove that the indictment must specially show that the accused is charged as an accessory, when the evidence is intended to prove it? Before the conviction of the principal, the accessory cannot be put on his trial, except together with the principal; in which case the jury are expressly to be directed that if they do not find the principal (the person charged with levying the war) guilty, they are not to inquire into the conduct of the person who advised the levying of the war, but to acquit him, of course, since his guilt, being only derivative in its nature, cannot exist, if the principal on whose guilt it would be founded be innocent. How else could he object to a trial? It would be impossible for the accessorial agent to make any objection, unless it were specially stated in the indictment that he was charged as an accessory. This is full and explicit to show why, in treason, an overt act is laid in the indictment; that the party charged may know what he is charged with.

I ask, how could Colonel Burr, charged with treason on Blennerhassett's Island, know the specific act meant to be proved against him? that he was meant to be charged with some act done there when he was two hundred miles off? that he was considered as having advised that act? and that this was the offence he was to answer for? But gentlemen say that a specification is unnecessary, because we know what the charge is against Colonel Burr. The law presumes that every person is innocent till the contrary appear; that the party charged has no knowledge at all of what is not specified; and, consequently, that any man who means to disprove that innocence should make a clear and distinct charge against him. Gentlemen say that he must know the charge, because he has summoned thirty or forty men to give testimony in his favor. We saw that we were charged with treason on Blennerhassett's Island; and we have summoned these witnesses to prove that we were not there, and to contradict the evidence of certain witnesses summoned against us—I might say to prove the character of that all-important witness who endeavored to excite an insurrection of the negroes. Of this, however, the proof is rendered unnecessary by his precipitate flight. As they have charged that we were on the island, and laid there what they deem an overt act of levying war, we could not but conclude that they meant to prove it. We could not conjecture that they meant to prove, not that we were on the island, but that others were there, and to connect us with them. Hawkins, Hale, and Foster all declare the reason why an overt act must be stated: that the accused may know how to defend himself against it. The constitution and laws have provided that persons accused of crimes shall be tried in the state and district where they were committed; and that a copy of the indictment should be given to the accused a certain number of days before his trial, in order that he might be prepared to make his defence. If, when the party accused comes to be tried, evidence proving a different charge from that which is stated in the indictment of which he had a copy were to be admitted against him, would it not be a mockery of the constitution and a denial of justice? It would, because though the form were complied with by delivering him a copy, it would give him no notice of what was to be proved against him. But gentlemen say that the indictment does not charge Colonel Burr with being on the island, and therefore it need not be proved. If the indictment say that he levied war on the island, does it not necessarily allege that he was there? When it charges that he committed an overt act there, is it not the legal and fair inference that he was at the place when he committed it? When a party is said to have done any act at any place, is it not naturally understood that he was at the place where he is thus said to have committed the act?

But the gentleman says that he has authority to show that he may be charged as present, though not there; and he cites in support of the assertion 1 Hale, P. C. pp. 214, 238, and 1 East, P. C. p. 127. Let us see whether anything in Hale justify it. In page 214, his words are: "But if many conspire to counterfeit, or counsel, or abet it, and one of them doth the fact upon that counselling or conspiracy, it is treason in all, and they may be all indicted for counterfeiting generally within this statute, for, in such case, in treason all are principals." We must consider only as much of the precedents as from the reason of the case applies to the subject now in discussion. Now Hale has not said that those persons who, having conspired to counterfeit, become traitors by one of them having done the fact, upon that conspiracy, were not present. He says nothing of their being present or absent, but that if several conspire and only some of them act in pursuance of that conspiracy they are all equally guilty; that if two conspire to counterfeit the coin, and one do it according to the intention of that conspiracy, they are both equally guilty of treason. It is the nature of a conspiracy that what two conspire to do may be done by one, whether the other be absent or present. Hale says nothing as to their being together, or whether an absentee, or a person who only advises, can be charged as present and an actor. He leaves these questions just where they were, unexamined and undecided. If two persons conspire together for any unlawful purpose, as to write a letter to cheat a third person, and one of them write the letter, the other, being present, is considered as a conspirator, and as criminal as the writer of the letter, and they are indicted as joint conspirators. So in coining money: if two have joined in a conspiracy to counterfeit, and a part of the conspiracy be that one shall act upon that conspiracy, and he doth counterfeit or coin false money accordingly, they are equally guilty, and the act of one is thus the act of the other, under the law against coining false money in England. But he does not say that the party were absent. He refers to no authority. It is a mere inference, and can have no influence on this case. It can have no influence on accessorial agency. Here, though it does not strictly apply to this branch of my argument, I may draw a conclusion from the authority adduced by themselves, which operates against them. In this very page he had just said before that "there must be an actual counterfeiting; for a compassing, conspiracy, or attempt to counterfeit is not treason within this statute, without an actual counterfeiting." On the same principle, if the doctrine be applied to levying war, there must be an actual levying of war; and a conspiracy or attempt to levy war is not treason within the words and meaning of the constitution. So much for page 214.

Let us now turn to page 238, and see whether it can furnish any justification of the gentleman's argument: "Though the receiver of a traitor, knowing it, be a principal traitor, and shall not be said an accessory, yet thus much he partakes of an accessory, that his indictment must be special of the receipt, and not generally that he did the thing, (which authority we have repeatedly urged against them,) which may be otherwise in case of one that is a procurer, counsellor, or consenter. Thus it was done in Conier's Case, Dyer, 296a." This authority he relies on to show that a procurer or an accessory before the fact need not be specially charged; that he may be indicted generally that he levied the war. The words, "which may be otherwise in the case of one that is a procurer," &c., are depended on. So it may be otherwise in that species of treason compassing the king's death. I have no doubt that in that species of treason any degree of accessorial agency before the fact, as counselling another person, writing a letter, &c., would be construed an overt act of compassing the death; and, therefore, the accessory before the fact might be indicted generally for having compassed the death of the king. But it would not be so in the case of levying war, or any other treason. If he mean anything else, there is not a shadow of authority for it. He cites a case in Dyer which does not justify the construction for which the gentleman contends. That case only shows that a receiver of a false coiner was indicted specially for the receipt, and it was deemed a misdemeanor. That was an indictment for receiving a coiner, knowing him to have counterfeited or coined false money; and it specified the receiving him particularly; but judgment was not rendered against him, because it was judged to be only a misdemeanor. It states nothing as to the manner in which an accessory before the fact ought to be indicted; but it may fairly be inferred from it that he ought to be charged specially, as the indictment in that case was special. 1 East, P. C. p. 127, merely refers to those passages of Hale which have been just commented on, but does not explain them; but he fully explains himself in pages 100, 101, of the same volume, which, though already referred to, I beg leave again to read: "In regard to all acts of approbation, incitement, advice, or procuring, to that species of treason, compassing the king's death, &c., there is no doubt that the party may be tried before the person who acted upon such indictment, because the bare advising or encouraging to such actions is in itself a complete overt act of compassing, and it is totally immaterial whether the attempt were ever made or not. The Case of Sommerville proves no more than this, (though the rule is there laid down in general terms,) that a person aiding or procuring a treason may be tried before the actor. But with regard to all other treasons within the 25 Edw. III., if one advise or encourage another to commit them, or furnish him means for that purpose, in consequence whereof the fact is committed, the adviser will indeed be a principal, for such advice or assistance would have made him an accessory before the fact in felony; but if the other forebore to commit the act thus advised, the adviser could not be a traitor, merely on account of his ineffectual advice and encouragement, though his conduct would be highly criminal; for it cannot be said that a person procured an offence which in truth never was committed. In these cases, therefore, the treason is of a derivative nature, and depends entirely upon the question whether the agent have or have not been guilty of such treason, the proof of which can only be legally established by his conviction, if he continue amenable to justice, or his attainder by outlawry if he abscond, unless the accessory choose to waive the benefit of the law and submit to a trial." Here East explains himself where he means that a man may be indicted generally, and shows that where a party is to be considered in an accessorial point of view, he cannot be brought to trial, except by his own choice, until the principal be convicted or outlawed. Here those persons who advised or procured a treason before, are placed on the same footing with those who receive a traitor after the fact. But any act of an accessorial nature may be a complete overt act of that species of treason which comes within that clause of the statute which is against compassing the death of the king, queen, &c. This is the most comprehensive treason, the most easily prosecuted, and the most liable to be abused for the purpose of tyranny and oppression. As Aaron's rod swallowed all other rods, so this treason for compassing the king's death swallows all other treasons. 2 Hale, P. C. p. 223 (which see before), shows that though in high treason all are to be considered as principals, yet accessories before and after the fact (who are both put on the same footing) are to be proceeded against only as accessorial agents; that the accessory shall not be put to answer of the receipt or procurement, till the principal be outlawed, (or attained, &c.)

But the gentleman has said that agreeably to our constitution they could not charge the accused otherwise than as they have done; that they must have charged him with levying war. I cannot see any difficulty in charging him according to the truth of the case. But however criminal or injurious his conduct may be, and however much he may deserve punishment, he ought not to be deprived of the benefit of law, or to be considered as guilty of treason, without legal proof of his having committed an overt act of levying war, or to be condemned unheard to subserve unworthy party purposes. If advising a man to levy war be treason and punishable under the constitution in the same manner as actually levying war, I ask why should not the indictment be so drawn as to correspond with the evidence, and give full notice to the accused of the charge intended to be proved against him? I ask why was not the indictment in this case so drawn as to embrace the real facts? Why did it not state that A, B, and C, (meaning those on the island,) did levy war against the United States, and that Colonel Burr did advise, incite, encourage and counsel them to levy it?

Gentlemen say that we have insisted that the accessory ought not to be brought to trial till the principal were convicted; but that there is a case where it is not necessary to produce this record. We did not mean to deny one exception from this general rule: that they may be tried together. We admit that the position was laid down in terms rather too broad; because if the principal and accessory were indicted in the same indictment together, the accessorial agent could not be found guilty till the guilt of the principal were found. In that case the record of the conviction would not be necessary, because it could not exist. The indictment in such case would specify distinct charges against both according to the real facts; which would enable each of them to be prepared for trial. But the court would direct the jury: "Gentlemen, you are first to decide whether the principal charged with having done the acts be guilty or not. If you do not find him guilty, you are to make no inquiry as to the accessorial agent, (whose guilt is connected with and founded alone on that of the principal,) but to find him not guilty and discharge him of course; but if you find the principal guilty, you are then to inquire into the conduct of the accessory." But gentlemen, unable to controvert this correct doctrine, endeavor to avoid it, and say that Colonel Burr might have declined a trial till some of the actors who were on the island had been convicted. They ask us, why did not Colonel Burr refuse to come to trial? and urge that by submitting to a trial, he has waived the benefit of every objection which he might have been entitled to make. That they should have mentioned Blennerhassett in terms of compassion and regret may be accounted for; they may have policy for doing so. For some think that the public indignation ought only to be excited against Colonel Burr, in order to press him down as much as possible. This indirect seems to be a favorite mode of attacking the accused. But Colonel Burr could not resist a trial. The prosecutor has thought proper to charge him as having levied war in person, as a principal actor; and being thus indicted, he could not avoid it. He could make no specific objection. He could only meet the accusation by the general defence of not guilty.

Having proved that under this indictment no evidence yet adduced is competent to convict the accused, I shall now make a few observations on one of the questions before your honors. There is one proposition laid down by us which is of the greatest importance, and requires the utmost deliberation. It is this: Admit that the acts on the island were done with an intention to subvert the government of the United States, (which I hold must be the motive to render them treasonable; for no person will controvert this position, that the acts of levying war, in order to be treasonable, must have been done with this design,) yet there was no act of war, no violence done; there was no overt act of levying war, no treason committed. It involves a most important question: whether the most peaceable acts, acts innocent in their nature, though done with a design of subverting the government of the United States, can be considered as acts of levying war against the United States. The question is, whether violence be not necessary; whether some act of force must not be used to constitute a levying of war? We insist that no evidence can support an indictment for levying war without some act of violence. What is a levying of war? Why, gentlemen say that levying war is levying war—"lever la guerre"—leyying soldiers—that it consists in preparing the means of war. I should rather suppose that the framers of our constitution, who proceeded with so much caution, and endeavored in every part of that instrument to secure the rights and liberties of their felllow-citizens, and especially a speedy trial by an impartial jury of the district, did not intend, by the terms "levying war," an unnatural and dangerous construction, unknown in common parlance, and unusual in history or judicial proceedings. They could not have contemplated an extension of the doctrine of constructive treason, which has been always held so peculiarly hostile to civil liberty. They never could have intended that acts peaceable or innocent in themselves should constitute treason. If by "levying war" they meant enlisting of troops or raising an army, they would have said so in plain terms. They would have said that "treason against the United States shall consist in enlisting or levying troops, or raising an army, with intention to make war against them." If levying troops, embodying men, or enlisting soldiers, with intention to subvert the government of the United States, were intended as sufficient to constitute treason, why did not the framers of the constitution say so? Why did they not say that levying of troops or raising an army had the same idea or meant the same thing as levying of war?

In a constitution devised by men distinguished as much for their devotion to the public good as eminent by their talents, nothing unfavorable to liberty would have been intended. Precision of language must also have been attended to. Nothing, therefore, can justify the construction which gentlemen advocate but unavoidable necessity. But it is as unnecessary as it is dangerous. If they had intended that merely to enlist men, to raise and embody troops, to raise an army, without anything more, should constitute treason, they would have expressed it in such plain terms as to defy misconstruction. Levying of war implies force of some kind. The idea of violence of some kind is inseparable from that of war. But, sir, raising an army or levying troops is only a preparatory step towards levying war. You levy troops in preparation, in intention to levy war. But no act preparatory to levying war can be an actual levying of war. What is the technical meaning of "levying?" Whether derived from the French word "lever," or the Latin word "levare," to raise, (or, as applied to war, to make,) to levy war is to make it, according to its popular acceptation, as well as its meaning as used by some of the best writers. The meaning or true construction of both expressions, "to levy war," and "to make war," is precisely the same. Whatever is making war is levying it.

But, says the gentleman, "levying war and making war are different things; an overt act of levying war and an overt act of war are not the same; the king of England can levy war, but his troops make the war; that he levies, but his officers and soldiers fight the battles and make it." I did not know before, that in the United States, levying or raising troops was the same thing as levying war. Troops are often raised. One hundred thousand men have been authorized to be called out; but I did not know that we were levying war, however desirous some individuals may be that it were so. But gentlemen say that it is a common expression that the king levies war, and his officers and soldiers actually make it. Why is it said that the king levies war? It is a very uncouth expression; but he is said to levy war because he represents the nation. It is the nation in its national character that really makes war; and he is the person who is at the head of the nation, of which nation the officers and soldiers are only the constituent parts. He is said to levy war, because he is the representative of the nation in its national capacity. The United States also make war in their national capacity. They are composed of individuals, of whom the officers and soldiers, like the people of other countries, actually fight battles. It may as well be said that if I, Luther Martin, knock a man down with my hand, I do not knock him down, but my hand does; because my hand is a constituent part of my body. But there is no such distinction as gentlemen contend for between the king and his officers and soldiers. There is no such distinction as that the king levies, and his officers and soldiers make war. One king, as the representative of one nation, makes war on another as the representative of another nation; and thus the one nation makes war on the other. But there is no possible correctness in the distinction contended for. There is none in reason, in the decisions of courts, or in the practice of nations, which confines the making of war to those who actually fight battles; and until there shall be some decision establishing such a distinction, and thereby placing our country in a worse situation than the laws of Great Britain have placed that country, I cannot believe it to exist. I shall hold the true definition of levying war to be making war, and for the purpose of subverting the government of the United States. Sir, "making war," ex vi termini, implies the use of force, violence, soldiers. I appeal to the authorities both in Great Britain and America, as far as prosecutions for levying war have taken place in this country, whether an act of violence has not always been deemed essential to levying war; and whether the indictments do not specify some act of force or violence.

Even in the constructive treasons of destroying meetinghouses, and pulling down bawdy houses, force or violence must be employed to constitute treason. In all cases of that kind, houses have been violently torn down and destroyed, and many persons greatly injured. In the cases of Messenger, Green, and others, those of Damaree and Purchase, and all other cases of the like kind in England, and that of Fries and other cases in this country, force and violence have been used, and invariably stated; and what is still more decisive as to the necessity of employing actual force or using violence on such occasions, it was determined by all the judges of England on the former cases, that as to Green and Bedel, the special verdicts were not full enough to judge it treason, because the verdicts only found that these two persons were present, but neither found any particular act of force committed by them, nor that they were aiding and assisting to the rest who did use violence. Force or violence has always been deemed essential to the existence of treasonable war in England; and I call on the gentlemen to show one instance to the contrary.

Mr. Martin argued that men assembling and marching in military array, without actual violence being committed, could not constitute an overt act of leving war. He went into a critical examination of Lord Balmarino's Case, (relied on by the other side,) and contended that although he was seen marching at the head of a large body of armed troops, yet the plain inference from the report of the case was, that the court never considered such marching in military array as a sufficient overt act; that it was his taking possession of and holding the city of Carlisle that constituted the overt act which, in the opinion of the court, justified his conviction; and without this, or some other act of violence, the mere marching in military array, as aforesaid, would not, in the opinion of the court, have been sufficient. He also commented upon Vaughan's Case, in which it had been contended by the prosecution that the mere cruising on the high seas, without any acts of violence, had been held to constitute an overt act of levying war. He said as that was an indictment for aiding the king's enemies, which was proved by his cruising against the English, it could not be considered an authority for the purpose of proving that force is unnecessary to constitute treason in levying war. On this point he cited and commented upon many other authorities. He then said:

I beg leave to make a few observations on that part of our inquiries which relates to the great constitutional question: whether a person who, in Great Britain, would only be guilty of accessorial agency, can be guilty of treason in the United States. Is an act of accessorial agency before or after the fact in treason, in the United States, treason or not? Here I beg leave to observe that we ought not to be misled by the argument of the gentlemen; that the most guilty might pass unpunished by the negative of this question. The question is not whether a person can, by procuring treason to be committed, or by receiving and comforting a traitor, be guilty of a crime. No person will doubt but the person who is guilty of advising treason is guilty of a great crime, and liable to punishment; but the question which I propose to examine into, is, whether that crime be treason or not. He who advises, procures, or persuades another to commit treason is highly criminal, and merits very severe punishment. The receiver of a traitor, knowing him to be such, is highly censurable and punishable. But we aver that neither of them is guilty of treason within the true interpretation of the constitution of the United States. Every preparation made for the purpose of making or levying of war is not an act of treason; because nothing but making war for the purpose of changing or subverting the government of the United States is treason. Every act of those who make those preparations to levy war is criminal; and the government has an undoubted right to use the force of the country and all the means which the laws allow for their suppression. The government has an unquestionable right to punish those persons, and prevent their acts from being ripened into acts of treason.[9] It is not the question whether the government be to look on passively, and see those preparations matured without opposition, which are intended for its destruction. No person doubts the right of the government to punish those persons, and prevent the maturity and success of their plans. So clearly was the congress of [9] Here the question very naturally occurs, of what practical force is the constitutional limitation of the crime of treason, if congress has been left free to impose such penalties as it may see fit upon those treasons at common law which are excluded by the constitutional definition, by merely giving them another name? If congress has the power to prescribe any punishment at all for those offences in the nature of treason which do not come within the constitutional definition of that crime, we shall look in vain for any express limitation of that power in the constitution. There is, however, a very clearly implied limitation; and it is not to be presumed that congress would enact a law prescribing capital punishment for any offence in the nature of treason which cannot be punished as treason under the constitution. Such an act would certainly be a palpable violation of the spirit of the constitution, though not of its express letter. The late act of July 17, 1862, c. 195, § 2 [12 Stat. 589], provides for the punishment of many acts in the nature of treason, which would not, perhaps, amount to treason under the constitution; but the punishment it prescribes is fine and imprisonment only, with forfeiture of property in slaves, if the offender own any.

the United States of opinion that preparation to levy war was not treason, that, if I mistake not, there was an act passed last session expressly punishing such preparatory acts. It passed one branch of the legislature, and was sent forward to the other for its concurrence. I am not certain, but I believe it passed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—I believe it did not pass.[10]

Mr. Martin. It is immaterial whether it passed or not. It was in contemplation, and deemed necessary, whether the law passed or not. The only question is, whether a person who advised or procured treason to be committed be guilty of high treason or not. No person doubts that he is guilty of a great crime or a high misdemeanor; but is the offence of which he is guilty treason? But gentlemen ask what a deplorable situation the country is in if such an offence be not treason. As if the people and government were bound hand and foot, and could take no step to prevent the levying of war; as if, because he who only prepares to levy war cannot be punished as if he had actually levied it, he must escape entirely with impunity! as if, because preparation is not the same as consummation, there was no possibility of punishing it! This is begging the question entirely. There is no doubt that for so doing he would be guilty of treason in Great Britain; because it would be evidence to support an indictment for compassing the death of the king. But can a person who only advises war to be levied be said to have actually levied it? Gentlemen say that he had all the moral and intentional and therefore ought to be considered as having the actual guilt of it. Let it be so, that he has all the guilt of giving the advice, but not of the act of levying the war, because he never committed it. The court is to decide according to the constitution and laws. What prevented the framers of our constitution from providing that persons who should counsel, commend, or procure levying of war against the United States should be guilty of treason? As they made no such provision they did not intend it. There is another reason which prevents a mere counsellor or adviser of treason from being guilty of the treason of levying war. It is this: that levying war is of itself an open, public act. It is of such notoriety that everybody may see it going on. It is carried on publicly in the face of the world when the parties are levying it. It cannot, from its nature, be concealed from the public view. The word "public," we say, is material, though omitted in this indictment. It ought to be laid, because it ought to be proved. The authorities show that it ought to be so charged; and that levying of war must be an act of such notoriety that every one sees it. When troops are levied, and when they march through the country, &c., the people behold them, and the knowledge of the fact is universal.

We have had two insurrections in Pennsylvania: the one named the "Whisky Insurrection," and the other the "Hot Water Insurrection." If I were to name this I would call it the "Will-o'-the-Wisp Treason." For though it is said to be here and there and everywhere, yet it is nowhere. It exists only in the newspapers and in the mouths of the enemies of the gentleman for whom I appear, who get it put into the newspapers. But as acts of war must be open and public, if war exist at all it may be easily proved. If false, it may be easily proved to be so. If a man were to come forward and say that war was made, that armies marched and took towns and places, laid waste the country and took contributions from the inhabitants, if it were true it could be proved by everybody; if false, it could be disproved by everybody. Open and notorious facts are susceptible of easy proof or contradiction. But an advice previously given to commit treason is not in its nature susceptible of clear, explicit proof. It may be given in private and may be pretended to have been given when it was not. Innocent persons may be implicated. Communications or declarations may be feigned to have been secretly made which never were made. Persons having enmity against others and intent on their destruction may be brought forward in a court of justice as witnesses against them, and gratify their resentment by the disclosure of conspiracies which never existed but in their own malice, because they are secret crimes incapable in their nature of being directly refuted or disproved. If open deeds, notorious facts are not to be the only evidence, confessions must be received. The framers of the constitution wisely determined that no man should be guilty of treason in such a case. They would not expose the life of any man to the hazard of being destroyed by perjury, incapable from its nature of being disproved. They have secured a probability (if not a certainty) that the accused cannot be convicted unless he be guilty. They have not secured him from the resentment or hatred of private individuals, (for that is impossible,) but they have taken care that he is not to be charged with private acts incapable of disproof; with confessions and acknowledgments unsupported by probability; so that while there is a probability of the guilty being punished, the innocent is secured from being sacrificed to the malignant resentment of his enemies. These principles are such as ought to have directed and influenced (and no doubt did) the conduct of those who framed the constitution—men selected for their wisdom and patriotism to devise a system of government to secure and perpetuate the liberty and happiness of their country. No gentleman who had read and considered ancient history and knew the various systems of oppression which had existed in different countries, and the necessity of protecting innocence as well as punishing guilt, would have subjected his country to such misery as that any man could be convicted on evidence impossible to be disproved; and of this nature are all acts of accessorial agency before the fact in treason, as advising, counselling, commanding, &c., as well as many acts of accessorial agency after the fact. I have made these observations to show the principles on which the convention might correctly have determined to exclude this doctrine of accessorial treason. Let me now make some observations on the constitution itself, abstractedly from the consideration of those principles which must have most probably actuated the convention.

The gentleman who so ably opened the debate (Mr. Wickham) correctly said that the constitution, which was made to perpetuate the liberties of the people of this country, is to be construed differently from a statute law; that it is a sacred compact made between the United States in their corporate capacity, and every individual belonging to the United States. The United States in their corporate aggregate capacity have pledged themselves to the people of America that this constitution shall be the safeguard of their liberties and a barrier against encroachments on their rights, and that it shall continue unaltered unless amended by a constitutional majority. As to all statutes to be enacted by any succeeding legislatures, it is a compact that they shall not impair the great principles of, or transcend the limits prescribed by the constitution. In this view it is a compact between the United States and individuals; but when any question arising under any part of it comes before a court of justice, when any part of it is to be considered judicially, it is to be considered as the supreme law of the land. It is to be construed by the very terms of the compact itself: "This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof,"—"shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." The judges are thereby rendered incapable of making any decision in support of any law contravening its provisions or principles; and if any law passed by the legislature be contrary to any of the provisions of this constitution, the judges who are to pronounce judgment on the rights of individuals affected by such unconstitutional law, shall consider it as void and null as far as it contravenes or violates the constitution.

The gentlemen also said that the framers of the constitution intended to guard against constructive treason. This principle is so self-evident that it cannot be controverted. It neither has been nor can be denied. They certainly intended to make the question, what shall be said to be treason, as clear as possible, so that there should be no doubt. I ask what constructive treason is but that treason which the constitution does not mention in plain and express terms, but is inferred from circumstances by implication and construction. The terms employed by its framers are admirably calculated to exclude all construction and implication. He who reads with an intention to understand cannot possibly mistake their meaning. They tell him in plain terms that treason against the United States shall consist but in two acts: "that it shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." He who levies war against the United States, and he who adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort, are traitors, and none other, by the very positive and plain language of this compact. Does the constitution say that he who advises these acts, that he who receives or comforts any person who has done either of these acts, is guilty of treason? No person will say that he who counselled an act of war to be done is the person who actually did it. No person will say that he who advises another to adhere to the enemies of his country is the person who actually did adhere to them. He who advises, procures, or persuades, he who receives, comforts, or protects, or even he who has been active in aiding and assisting, but absent at a remote distance from the scene of action, is not the actor. The parts which these persons perform are all essentially different. Have the judges who judicially expound this constitution any authority to make the act of advising or comforting treasonable by construction? Is it not by construction that a man is made guilty of having levied war who only advised it? Is it not by construction that he is rendered guilty of levying war who only gave a night's lodging to a person who did assist in levying it? Is it not by construction that giving a dinner to a man in distress is tortured into levying of war? It is not by construction extravagantly extended that they make a party absent at a great distance constructively present and constructively guilty of the acts of others? Is the constitution of the United States to be taken by construction contrary to its own plain and explicit words? It is the same as if the constitution had expressly said that there should be no constructive treason, no constructive presence, no constructive agent.

The gentlemen went on to show that the common law could not be brought to aid them to make that treason which was not so before; to make an act of accessorial agency amount to treason, though not so without it. They have admitted fully that the common law cannot be received for the purpose of making that a crime which is not so by the constitution of the United States and laws made in pursuance thereof. But they admit that the common law, by the adoption of certain technical phrases in the constitution, is so far in force as to direct the sense or meaning of certain crimes, and the mode of proceeding on trials for those crimes. For instance, if a statute say that "if a man commit murder he shall be punished so and so, and the constitution say that the trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment) shall be by jury," the common law must be resorted to for the meaning of the word "murder"; and as the party accused is to be tried by a jury, the common law must be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of the word "trial" and the word "jury." The common law informs how many men shall constitute a jury; that it shall consist of twelve. It says that no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act or on confession in open court. The common law must be resorted to for the meaning of the word "convicted." It explains it to mean that the jury must be unanimous to find him guilty. But that beyond the effect of those technical phrases, which express the powers delegated to the government, the common law has not been adopted under the government of the United States. Does it not follow, as a necessary consequence, that no man can be guilty of an offence against the United States merely at common law? Is it not clear that the principles of the common law, as existing in Great Britain, cannot be applied here so as to make that an offence which is not so by the constitution and laws of the United States? Can the common law be resorted to in order to explain the constitution so as to make that a crime which would not be so without it? On that point I can readily declare to the gentlemen that I have always been of the same opinion which they declare themselves to hold. I never did consider that anything could be prosecuted as a crime against the United States, unless it were made so by the constitution, or some law enacted pursuant to it. I perfectly agree with the opinion of Judge Chase, declared in the case of U. S v. Worrall for an attempt to bribe Tench Coxe, the commissioner of the revenue, reported in 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 384. He said that though this offence was highly injurious to morals and deserving the severest punishment, yet it was not punishable by the constitution or laws of the United States; and therefore, as it was an indictment at common law, it could not be maintained in the federal courts. He would not say whether the offence at that time were punishable in a state court. It has, however, been held that these sorts of offences may be punished in the state courts, and it is so held by the party in power.

One of the counsel for the prosecution (Mr. Wirt) had made some very illiberal animadversions upon a position stated by Mr. Wickham, that the rule "that when a felony is created by statute, accessories to it, though not named, are punishable, and that all legal consequences of felony are attached to it by the common law, except where the special nature of the act leads to a different conclusion," is illustrated by a decision on the 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15, which makes piracy, an offence not punishable at common law, felony; that it has been solemnly adjudged that as this was not a common law offence, and not made in imitation or supply of it, it should not be construed according to the rules of the common law; and therefore that accessories to it are not punishable. Hawkins (in volume 1, P. C. c. 37, §§ 6, 7, page 153), says that "in the exposition of this statute it has been holden, first, that it does not alter the nature of the offence so as to make that which was before a felony only by the civil law now become a felony by the common law; for it must be still alleged as done upon the sea, and is no way cognizable by the common law, but only by virtue of this statute." "From the same ground, also, it follows that no persons shall, in respect of the statute, be construed to be or punished as accessories to piracies before or after, as they might have been if it had been made a felony by the statute—that accessories to piracy being neither expressly named in the statute, nor by construction included in it, remain as before." This statute declares that "all felonies and robberies, &c., upon the sea, &c., where the admiralty have power, authority, or jurisdiction, shall be inquired, tried, heard, determined, and judged in such shires and places in the realm, in like form and condition as if such offence or offences had been committed or done in or upon the land." It proceeds further to state that the commissions to the admirals and others to be appointed should "authorize them to hear and determine such offences after the common course of the law of the land, used for felonies or robberies done and committed upon the same." It further provides that they shall be proceeded against as felons for felonies committed on the land; and that those that should be convicted of any such offence by verdict, confession, &c., "shall have and suffer such pains of death, losses of lands, goods, and chattels, as if they had been attainted and convicted of such offence done upon the land." Here is an act declaring that persons guilty of piracy shall suffer the same pains and forfeitures as if they had committed these acts of violence and robbery on the land; but it makes no mention of accessories before or after the fact; and therefore the courts of that country construed it not to extend to them. The constitution declares certain specific acts to be punishable: the making of actual war, and an actual adherence to the enemies of the country, giving them aid and comfort. But the constitution does not say that advising, procuring, &c., those acts to be committed shall be treason. The inference, therefore, is natural and inevitable, that such advisers and procurers are not traitors within the true meaning of the constitution, according to the maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." But even if, as they have argued, common law principles were to be applied to expound the constitution, if I understand them rightly, they are a strong authority to show that accessories are not punishable, and that those persons only who do the acts of levying war and adherence to enemies are so. No principle of the common law is more clearly understood than that the expression of one thing is an exclusion of another, especially in penal laws.

Again, sir, a most powerful argument, to prove the legislative exposition of the constitution, is deducible from the act of congress referred to by the gentleman who introduced this subject. He observed that it was clear and evident, from a law passed soon after the adoption of the constitution, that the legislature did not consider that an accessory would be guilty as a traitor under the constitution as he would be in Great Britain; because they made a special provision that if any person should break gaol and rescue therefrom any person convicted of treason, he should be punished with death. Sir, in Great Britain the rescuing of a person convicted of treason is treason; and if the construction for which the counsel for the prosecution now contend had been deemed correct by the legislature, this provision would have been superfluous, and therefore would not have been made. But this act of congress goes still further, and provides that if any person shall by force set at liberty or rescue any person committed but not convicted for any of the offences aforesaid (treason being included,) every person so offending shall, on conviction, be punished in a small fine—only the sum of five hundred dollars, and imprisonment a year. Sir, in Great Britain the man who breaks open a gaol and lets out a person committed therein for treason is a traitor, provided the person let out or rescued be afterwards convicted of treason. If our legislature had considered a rescuer as guilty of treason and punishable with death, would they have passed a law inflicting on him only the trivial punishment of a year's imprisonment and a fine of five hundred dollars? and yet he cannot be punished twice for it. If in truth and reality the receiver and protector of a traitor were guilty of treason under the constitution, how came the legislature to provide so small a punishment for the person who breaks open gaol and rescues a traitor? How inconsistent and improper is the infliction of so moderate a punishment on the gaolbreaker and rescuer, if the mere receiver or comforter of a traitor before he is put in prison at all is punishable with death. He who forcibly opposes the laws and rescues a traitor from gaol is only punished with imprisonment not exceeding a year and a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars; while he who merely receives or comforts the traitor before he is committed for the crime or after he has made his escape is punishable with death! because in Great Britain he who receives or comforts persons guilty of treason is a traitor and punished with death, as the unfortunate Lady Lisle was. And if our constitution embraces no other acts as amounting to treason than what are expressly mentioned in it, it results of necessity that only the two offences of actually levying war against, and of adhering to the enemies of the United States, constitute treason. This is in my mind conclusive to show that our construction is correct, and that accessories before or after the fact were not contemplated by the constitution as traitors.

Mr. Martin replied at length to the arguments of counsel on the other side, that the pending motion was unprecedented, and called upon the court to usurp unwarranted powers, in derogation of the rights of the jury.[11] He concluded his argument on this point by the following remarks in reply to what Mr. Hay had said touching the fearful consequences that were to be apprehended from encroachments by the court on the rights and duties of the jury:

But the gentleman feels no solicitude for the fate of traitors. No more did the bloodthirsty Jeffreys. That sanguinary and cruel judge treated every man who came to be tried before him as a traitor. He thought none innocent, and condemned all he could. But the man must be lost to all humanity who would not drop the tear of pity whilst he wielded the sword of justice. But this inexorable tyrant had no feeling, and regarded no principle. Sir, does not the gentleman know that any man, however innocent, may be hunted down as a traitor? Does he not know that any man may be oppressed by a charge brought against him before a court and jury, without any knowledge of the facts of which he is accused? Is not the case of such a person sufficient to excite solicitude in the bosom of every person? Does he suppose that no man can be charged who is innocent? Does not the law presume him to be innocent till he be convicted by the court and jury? He ought not to be proceeded against if he be not a traitor but an innocent man. Ought not the court, therefore, to feel the utmost solicitude to prevent the oppression of innocence? He wishes to introduce all the evidence before the jury; and we wish to prevent it. I have no doubt but he wishes it; but if his wish be wrong, it is the sacred duty of your honors to prevent it from being gratified, and to reject impertinent and irrelevant testimony on a trial for life and death. The gentleman has himself recognized this principle. He did observe that when evidence is brought forward, the court will restrain it if impertinent to the issue tried before it. This is the very position for which we contend. It is too clear to admit of controversy, and decisive of the question before the court. The evidence of transactions out of this state does not establish what was done on Blennerhassett's Island; and therefore the testimony which they offer does not apply to the issue taken on the charge in the indictment.

I shall submit one observation on another point which I had like to have forgotten, and make a candid representation of what Mr. Wickham said about Blennerhassett. None of us said that we considered Blennerhassett to be guilty, as has been unjustly insinuated. He only stated what the law was. He denied that any person was guilty; alleged that no overt act was committed by any person; but still insisted on the legal consequences of the absence of Colonel Burr. I believe Blennerhassett to be as innocent as the books or instruments of music to which he is said to be so passionately addicted. But the gentleman expressed, with great zeal and pathos, that he pledged his own life and the lives of his children and posterity on the propriety of the doctrine which he advocated: that if they avoid conspiracies, that if they be innocent, they will be safe. Most delusive doctrine! It does not follow that because a man is innocent he will be safe. The experience of all ages forbids so extravagant an expectation. Without a rigid adherence to those rules which have been wisely established for the protection of innocence, there never can be safety. I pray God that neither his own life nor the lives of his children or posterity may depend on the propriety or permanency of his doctrines. He should reflect on the instability of human affairs, the vicissitudes of fortune, and the mutability of popular applause. Permanent security can only result from a wise system, calculated for all times, and to promote the happiness of all parties. If he be now "in the full tide of successful experiment," in the enjoyment of the approbation of his country and government, so was, not long ago, the gentleman whom I advocate. He was as highly distinguished by the kind favor of the people as he could be by their suffrages.[12] It was then incredible that their favor should so soon be changed by the calumny and rancor of party into the most malignant hatred. The gentleman may now think himself perfectly safe, by the prevalence of his party and principles; but the day very possibly may come, when he may find himself as obnoxious as the gentleman whom I defend. He may, possibly, by the same means, the malice, injustice, and violence of party spirit, like my client, not only find himself reviled and calumniated, but his dearest friends abused and persecuted. I should be sorry that such prediction should be realized with respect to any gentleman; but such are the natural consequences of his own pernicious doctrines; and these we oppose. It is for the security of innocence that we contend. If innocence had never been persecuted, if innocence were never in danger, why were so many checks provided in the constitution for its security? We know the summary and sanguinary proceedings of former times, as recorded in faithful history. In those times of oppression and cruelty, they never troubled courts or juries with their accusations, proofs and legal forms, but declared the intended victim guilty of treason, and proceeded to execution at once. We wish to prevent a repetition of those scenes of injustice and horror.

Mr. Martin closed his long and exhaustive argument by the following remarks:

Before concluding, let me observe that it has been my intention to argue the cause correctly, without hurting the feelings of any person in the world. We are unfortunately situated. We labor against great prejudices against my client, which tend to prevent him from having a fair trial. I have with pain heard it said that such are the public prejudices against Colonel Burr, that a jury, even should they be satisfied of his innocence, must have considerable firmness of mind to pronounce him not guilty. I have heard it not without horror. God of heaven! have we already under our form of government (which we have so often been told is best calculated of all governments to secure all our rights) arrived at a period when a trial in a court of justice, where life is at stake, shall be but a solemn mockery, a mere idle form and ceremony to transfer innocence from the gaol to the gibbet, to gratify popular indignation, excited by bloodthirsty enemies! But if it require in such a situation firmness in a jury, so does it equally require fortitude in judges to perform their duty. And here permit me again, most solemnly, and at the same time most respectfully, to observe that, in the case of life and death, where there remains one single doubt in the minds of the jury as to facts, or of the court as to law, it is their duty to decide in favor of life. If they do not, and the prisoner fall a victim, they are guilty of murder in foro cœli whatever their guilt may be in foro legis. When the sun mildly shines upon us, when the gentle zephyrs play around us, we can easily proceed forward in the straight path of our duty; but when bleak clouds enshroud the sky with darkness, when the tempest rages, the winds howl, and the waves break over us—when the thunders awfully roar over our heads and the lightnings of heaven blaze around us—it is then that all the energies of the human soul are called into action. It is then that the truly brave man stands firm at his post. It is then that, by an unshaken performance of his duty, man approaches the nearest possible to the Divinity. Nor is there any object in the creation on which the Supreme Being can look down with more delight and approbation than on a human being in such a situation and thus acting. May that God who now looks upon us, who has in his infinite wisdom called you into existence and placed you in that seat to dispense justice to your fellow citizens, to preserve and protect innocence against persecution—may that God so illuminate your understandings that you may know what is right; and may he nerve your souls with firmness and fortitude to act according to that knowledge.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The question now to be decided has been argued in a manner worthy of its importance, and with an earnestness evincing the strong conviction felt by the counsel on each side that the law is with them. A degree of eloquence seldom displayed on any occasion has embellished a solidity of argument and a depth of research by which the court has been greatly aided in forming the opinion it is about to deliver. The testimony adduced on the part of the United States to prove the overt act laid in the indictment having shown, and the attorney for the United States having admitted, that the prisoner was not present when that act, whatever may be its character, was committed, and there being no reason to doubt but that he was at a great distance, and in a different state, it is objected to the testimony offered on the part of the United States to connect him with those who committed the overt act, that such testimony is totally irrelevant, and must, therefore, be rejected. The arguments in support of this motion respect in part the merits of the case as it may be supposed to stand independent of the pleadings, and in part as exhibited by the pleadings.

On the first division of the subject two points are made: 1st. That, conformably to the constitution of the United States, no man can be convicted of treason who was not present when the war was levied. 2d. That if this construction be erroneous, no testimony can be received to charge one man with the overt acts of others until those overt acts as laid in the indictment be proved to the satisfaction of the court. The question which arises on the construction of the constitution, in every point of view in which it can be contemplated, is of infinite moment to the people of this country and to their government, and requires the most temperate and the most deliberate consideration. "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them." What is the natural import of the words "levying war?" and who may be said to levy it? Had their first application to treason been made by our constitution they would certainly have admitted of some latitude of construction. Taken most literally, they are, perhaps, of the same import with the words "raising or creating war"; but as those who join after the commencement are equally the objects of punishment, there would probably be a general admission that the term also comprehended making war or carrying on war. In the construction which courts would be required to give these words, it is not improbable that those who should raise, create, make, or carry on war, might be comprehended. The various acts which would be considered as coming within the term would be settled by a course of decisions; and it would be affirming boldly to say that those only who actually constituted a portion of the military force appearing in arms could be considered as levying war. There is no difficulty in affirming that there must be a war or the crime of levying it cannot exist; but there would often be considerable difficulty in affirming that a particular act did or did not involve the person committing it in the guilt and in the fact of levying war. If, for example, an army should be actually raised for the avowed purpose of carrying on open war against the United States and subverting their government, the point must be weighed very deliberately, before a judge would venture to decide that an overt act of levying war had not been committed by a commissary of purchases, who never saw the army, but who, knowing its object, and leaguing himself with the rebels, supplied that army with provisions, or, by a recruiting officer holding a commission in the rebel service, who, though never in camp, executed the particular duty assigned to him.[13]

But the term is not for the first time applied to treason by the constitution of the United States. It is a technical term. It is used in a very old statute of that country whose language is our language, and whose laws form the substratum of our laws. It is scarcely conceivable that the term was not employed by the framers of our constitution in the sense which had been affixed to it by those from whom we borrowed it. So far as the meaning of any terms, particularly terms of art, is completely ascertained, those by whom they are employed must be considered as employing them in that ascertained meaning, unless the contrary be proved by the context. It is, therefore, reasonable to suppose, unless it be incompatible with other expressions of the constitution, that the term "levying war" is used in that instrument in the same sense in which it was understood in England, and in this country, to have been used in the statute of the 25th of Edw. III. from which it was borrowed. It is said that this meaning is to be collected only from adjudged cases. But this position cannot be conceded to the extent in which it is laid down. The superior authority of adjudged cases will never be controverted. But those celebrated elementary writers who have stated the principles of the law, whose statements have received the common approbation of legal men, are not to be disregarded. Principles laid down by such writers as Coke, Hale, Foster, and Blackstone, are not lightly to be rejected. These books are in the hands of every student. Legal opinions are formed upon them; and those opinions are afterwards carried to the bar, the bench and the legislature. In the exposition of terms, therefore, used in instruments of the present day, the definitions and the dicta of those authors, if not contradicted by adjudications, and if compatible with the words of the statute, are entitled to respect. It is to be regretted that they do not shed as much light on this part of the subject as is to be wished. Coke does not give a complete definition of the term, but puts cases which amount to levying war. "An actual rebellion or insurrection, he says, is a levying of war." In whom? Coke does not say whether in those only who appear in arms, or in all those who take part in the rebellion or insurrection by real open deed. Hale, in treating on the same subject, puts many cases which shall constitute a levying of war, without which no act can amount to treason; but he does not particularize the parts to be performed by the different persons concerned in that war, which shall be sufficient to fix on each the guilt of levying it. Foster says: "The joining with rebels in an act of rebellion, or with enemies in acts of hostility, will make a man a traitor." "Furnishing rebels or enemies with money, arms, ammunition or other necessaries will prima facie make a man a traitor." Foster does not say that he would be a traitor under the words of the statute, independent of the legal rule which attaches the guilt of the principal to an accessory, nor that his treason is occasioned by that rule. In England this discrimination need not be made except for the purpose of framing the indictment; and, therefore, in the English books we do not perceive any effort to make it. Thus, surrendering a castle to rebels, being in confederacy with them, is said by Hale and Foster to be treason under the clause of levying war; but whether it be levying war in fact, or aiding those who levy it, is not said. Upon this point Blackstone is not more satisfactory. Although we find among the commentators upon treason enough to satisfy the inquiry, what is a state of internal war? yet no precise information can be acquired from them which would enable us to decide with clearness whether persons not in arms, but taking part in a rebellion, could be said to levy war, independently of that doctrine which attaches to the accessory the guilt of his principal. If in adjudged cases this question have been taken up and directly decided, the court has not seen those cases. The argument which may be drawn from the form of the indictment, though strong, is not conclusive. In the precedent found in Tremaine, Mary Speake, who was indicted for furnishing provisions to the party of the Duke of Monmouth, is indicted for furnishing provisions to those who were levying war, not for levying war herself. It may correctly be argued that, had this act amounted to levying war, she would have been indicted for levying war; and the furnishing of provisions would have been laid as the overt act. The court felt this when the precedent was produced But the argument, though strong, is not conclusive, because, in England, the inquiry, whether she had become a traitor by levying war, or by giving aid and comfort to those who were levying war,[14] was unimportant; and because, too, it does not appear from the indictment that she was actually concerned in the rebellion—that she belonged to the rebel party, or was guilty of anything further than a criminal speculation in selling them provisions.

It is not deemed necessary to trace the doctrine, that in treason all are principals, to its source. Its origin is most probably stated correctly by Judge Tucker in a work, the merit of which is with pleasure acknowledged. But if a spurious doctrine have been introduced into the common law, and have for centuries been admitted as genuine, it would require great hardihood in a judge to reject it. Accordingly, we find those of the English jurists who seem to disapprove the principle declaring that it is now too firmly settled to be shaken. It is unnecessary to trace this doctrine to its source for another reason: the terms of the constitution comprise no question respecting principal and accessory, so far as either may be truly and in fact said to levy war. Whether in England a person would be indicted in express terms for levying war or for assisting others in levying war, yet if in correct and legal language he can be said to have levied war, and if it have never been decided that the act would not amount to levying war, his case may, without violent construction, be brought within the letter and the plain meaning of the constitution. In examining these words, the argument which may be drawn from felonies, as, for example, from murder, is not more conclusive. Murder is the single act of killing with malice aforethought. But war is a complex operation, composed of many parts, co-operating with each other. No one man or body of men can perform them all if the war be of any continuance. Although, then, in correct and [14] If she was indicted under that clause of the statute of Edw. III. which relates to adhering to the enemies of the king, giving them aid and comfort, the indictment was certainly bad, according to the settled construction of that clause by the English courts. The authorities are uniform, that no person can be guilty of treason under that clause for adhering and giving aid and comfort to British subjects in rebellion. In other words, the term "enemies" means foreign enemies, and not rebels.

in law language, he alone is said to have murdered another who has perpetrated the fact of killing, or has been present aiding that fact, it does not follow that he alone can have levied war who has borne arms. All those who perform the various and essential military parts of prosecuting the war, which must be assigned to different persons, may with correctness and accuracy be said to levy war. Taking this view of the subject, it appears to the court that those who perform a part in the prosecution of the war may correctly be said to levy war and to commit treason under the constitution. It will be observed that this opinion does not extend to the case of a person who performs no act in the prosecution of the war—who counsels and advises it—or who, being engaged in the conspiracy, fails to perform his part. Whether such persons may be implicated by the doctrine that whatever would make a man an accessory in felony makes him a principal in treason, or are excluded because that doctrine is inapplicable to the United States,' the constitution having declared that treason shall consist only in levying war, and having made the proof of overt acts necessary to conviction, is a question of vast importance, which it would be proper for the supreme court to take a fit occasion to decide, but which an inferior tribunal would not willingly determine unless the case before them should require it.[15]

It may now be proper to notice the opinion of the supreme court in the case of the United States against Bollman and Swartwout. It is said that this opinion, in declaring that those who do not bear arms may yet be guilty of treason, is contrary to law, and is not obligatory because it is extra-judicial and was delivered on a point not argued. This court is therefore required to depart from the principle there laid down. It is true that, in that case, after forming the opinion that no treason could be committed because no treasonable assemblage had taken place, the court might have dispensed with proceeding further in the doctrines of treason. But it is to be remembered that the judges might act separately, and perhaps at the same time on the various prosecutions which might be instituted, and that no appeal lay from their decisions. Opposite judgments on the point would have presented a state of things infinitely to be deplored by all. It was not surprising, then, that they should have made some attempt to settle principles which would probably occur, and which were in some degree connected with the point before them. The court had employed some reasoning to show that without the actual embodying of men war could not be levied. It might have been inferred from this that those only who were so embodied could be guilty of treason. Not only to exclude this inference, but also to affirm the contrary, the court proceeded to observe: "It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of this crime who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable object, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors." This court is told that if this opinion be incorrect it ought not to be obeyed, because it was extra-judicial. For myself, I can say that I could not lightly be prevailed on to disobey it, were I even convinced that it was erroneous; but I would certainly use any means which the law placed in my power to carry the question again before the supreme court for reconsideration, in a case in which it would directly occur and be fully argued. The court which gave this opinion was composed of four judges. At the time I thought them unanimous, but I have since had reason to suspect that one of them, whose opinion is entitled to great respect, and whose indisposition prevented his entering into the discussions, on some of those points which were not essential to the decision of the very case under consideration, did not concur in this particular point with his brethren. Had the opinion been unanimous, it would have been given by a majority of the judges. But should the three who were absent concur with that judge who was present, and who perhaps dissents from what was then the opinion of the court, a majority of the judges may overrule this decision. I should, therefore, feel no objection, although I then thought and still think the opinion perfectly correct, to carry the point, if possible, again before the supreme court, if the case should depend upon it. In saying that I still think the opinion perfectly correct, I do not consider myself as going further than the preceding reasoning goes. Some gentlemen have argued as if the supreme court had adopted the whole doctrine of the English books on the subject of accessories to treason.[16] But certainly such is not the fact. Those only who perform a part, and who are leagued in the conspiracy, are declared to be traitors. To complete the definition both circumstances must concur. They must "perform a part," which will furnish the overt act; and they must be "leagued in conspiracy." The person who comes within this description in the opinion of the court levies war. The present motion, however, does not rest upon this point; for if under this indictment the United States might be let in to prove the part performed by the prisoner, if he did perform any part, the court could not stop the testimony, in its present stage.[17]

2d. The second point involves the character of the overt act which has been given in evidence, and calls upon the court to declare whether that act can amount to levying war. Although the court ought now to avoid any analysis of the testimony which has been offered in this case, provided the decision of the motion should not rest upon it, yet many reasons concur in giving peculiar propriety to a delivery, in the course of these trials, of a detailed opinion on the question, what is levying war? As this question has been argued at great length, it may probably save much trouble to the counsel now to give that opinion.

In opening the case, it was contended by the attorney for the United States, and has since been maintained on the part of the prosecution, that neither arms nor the application of force or violence are indispensably necessary to constitute the fact of levying war. To illustrate these positions, several cases have been stated, many of which would clearly amount to treason. In all of them, except that which was probably intended to be this case, and on which no observation will be made, the object of the assemblage was clearly treasonable. Its character was unequivocal, and was demonstrated by evidence furnished by the assemblage itself. There was no necessity to rely upon information drawn from extrinsic sources, or, in order to understand the fact, to pursue a course of intricate reasoning, and to conjecture motives. A force is supposed to be collected for an avowed treasonable object, in a condition to attempt that object, and to have commenced the attempt by moving towards it. I state these particulars, because although the cases put may establish the doctrine they are intended to support—may prove that the absence of arms, or the failure to apply force to sensible objects by the actual commission of violence on those objects, may be supplied by other circumstances—yet they also serve to show that the mind requires those circumstances to be satisfied that war is levied. Their construction of the opinion of the supreme court is, I think, thus far correct. It is certainly the opinion which was at the time entertained by myself; and which is still entertained. If a rebel army, avowing its hostility to the sovereign power, should front that of the government, should march and countermarch before it, should manœuvre in its face, and should then disperse from any cause whatever without firing a gun—I confess I could not, without some surprise, hear gentlemen seriously contend that this could not amount to an act of levying war. A case equally strong may be put with respect to the absence of military weapons. If the party be in a condition to execute the purposed treason without the usual implements of war, I can perceive no reason for requiring those implements in order to constitute the crime.

It is argued that no adjudged case can be produced from the English books where actual violence has not been committed. Suppose this were true. No adjudged case has, or, it is believed, can be produced from those books in which it has been laid down that war cannot be levied without the actual application of violence to external objects.[18] The silence of the reporters on this point may be readily accounted for. In cases of actual rebellion against the government, the most active and influential leaders are generally most actively engaged in the war; and as the object can never be to extend punishment to extermination, a sufficient number are found among those who have committed actual hostilities to satisfy the avenging arm of justice. In cases of constructive treason, such as pulling down meeting-houses, where the direct and avowed object is not the destruction of the sovereign power, some act of violence might be generally required to give to the crime a sufficient degree of malignity to convert it into treason, to render the guilt of any individual unequivocal. But Vaughan's Case is a case where there was no real application of violence, and where the act was adjudged to be treason. Gentlemen argue that Vaughan was only guilty of adhering to the king's enemies, but they have not the authority of the court for so saying. The judges unquestionably treat the cruising of Vaughan as an overt act of levying war. The opinions of the best elementary writers concur in declaring that where a body of men are assembled for the purpose of making war against the government, and are in a condition to make that war, the assemblage is an act of levying war. These opinions are contradicted by no adjudged case, and are supported by Vaughan's Case. This court is not inclined to controvert them. But although, in this respect, the opinion of the supreme court has not been misunderstood on the part of the prosecution, that opinion seems not to have been fully adverted to in a very essential point in which it is said to have been misconceived by others. The opinion, I am informed, has been construed to mean that any assemblage whatever for a treasonable purpose, whether in force or not in force, whether in a condition to use violence or not in that condition, is a levying of war. It is this construction, which has not, indeed, been expressly advanced at the bar, but which is said to have been adopted elsewhere, that the court deems it necessary to examine.

Independent of authority, trusting only to the dictates of reason, and expounding terms according to their ordinary signification, we should probably all concur in the declaration that war could not be levied without the employment and exhibition of force. War is an appeal from reason to the sword; and he who makes the appeal evidences the fact by the use of the means. His intention to go to war may be proved by words; but the actual going to war is a fact which is to be proved by open deed. The end is to be effected by force; and it would seem that in cases where no declaration is to be made, the state of actual war could only be created by the employment of force, or being in a condition to employ it. But the term, having been adopted by our constitution, must be understood in that sense in which it was universally received in this country when the constitution was framed. The sense in which it was received is to be collected from the most approved authorities of that nation from which we have borrowed the term. Lord Coke says that levying war against the king was treason at the common law. "A compassing or conspiracy to levy war, he adds, is no treason, for there must be a levying of war in fact." He proceeds to state cases of constructive levying war, where the direct design is not to overturn the government, but to effect some general object by force. The terms he employs, in stating these cases, are such as indicate an impression on his mind that actual violence is a necessary ingredient in constituting the fact of levying war. He then proceeds to say: "An actual rebellion or insurrection is a levying of war within this fact." "If any with strength and weapons invasive and defensive doth hold and defend a castle or fort against the king and his power, this is levying of war against the king." These cases are put to illustrate what he denominates "a war in fact." It is not easy to conceive "an actual invasion or insurrection" unconnected with force; nor can "a castle or fort be defended with strength and weapons invasive and defensive" without the employment of actual force. It would seem, then, to have been the opinion of Lord Coke that to levy war there must be an assemblage of men in a condition and with an intention to employ force. He certainly puts no case of a different description. Lord Hale says (1 Hale, P. C. p. 149, pl. 6:) "What shall be said a levying of war is partly a question of fact, for it is not every unlawful or riotous assembly of many persons to do an unlawful act, though de facto they commit the act they intend, that makes a levying of war; for then every riot would be treason, &c.," "but it must be such an assembly as carries with it speciem belli, the appearance of war; as if they ride or march vexillis explicatis, with colors flying, or if they be formed into companies or furnished with military officers, or if they are armed with military weapons, as swords, guns, bills, halberds, pikes, and are so circumstanced that it may be reasonably concluded they are in a posture of war; which circumstances are so various that it is hard to describe them all particularly." "Only the general expressions in all the indictments of this nature that I have seen are more guerrino arraiati," arrayed in warlike manner. He afterwards adds: "If there be a war levied as is above declared, viz, an assembly arrayed in warlike manner, and so in the posture of war for any treasonable attempt, it is bellum levatum but not percussum." It is obvious that Lord Hale supposed an assemblage of men in force, in a military posture, to be necessary to constitute the fact of levying war. The idea, he appears to suggest, that the apparatus of war is necessary, has been very justly combated by an able judge who has written a valuable treatise on the subject of treason; but, it is not recollected that his position, that the assembly should be in a posture of war for any treasonable attempt, has ever been denied. Hawkins (chapter 17, § 23), says "that not only those who rebel against the king, and take up arms to dethrone him, but, also, in many other cases, those who, in a violent and forcible manner, withstand his lawful authority, are said to levy war against him, and therefore those that hold a fort or castle against the king's forces, or keep together armed numbers of men, against the king's express command, have been adjudged to levy war against him." The cases put by Hawkins are all cases of actual force and violence. "Those who rebel against the king, and take up arms to dethrone him." In many other cases those "who, in a violent and forcible manner, withstand his lawful authority." "Those that hold a fort or castle against his forces, or keep together armed numbers of men against his express command." These cases are obviously cases of force and violence. Hawkins next proceeds to describe cases in which war is understood to be levied under the statute, although it was not directly made against the government. This Lord Hale terms an interpretative or constructive levying of war; and it will be perceived that he puts no case in which actual force is dispensed with. "Those also, he says, who make an insurrection in order to redress a public grievance, whether it be a real or pretended one, and of their own authority attempt with force to redress it, are said to levy war against the king, although they have no direct design against his person, inasmuch as they insolently invade his prerogative by attempting to do that by private authority which he, by public justice, ought to do; which manifestly tends to a downright rebellion. As where great numbers by force attempt to remove certain persons from the king," &c. The cases here put by Hawkins, of a constructive levying of war, do in terms require force as a constituent part of the description of the offence.

Judge Foster, in his valuable treatise on Treason, states the opinion which has been quoted from Lord Hale, and differs from that writer so far as the latter might seem to require swords, drums, colors, &c., what he terms the pomp and pageantry of war, as essential circumstances to constitute the fact of levying war. In the Cases of Damaree and Purchase, he says: "The want of those circumstances weighed nothing with the court, although the prisoner's counsel insisted much on that matter." But he adds: "The number of the insurgents supplied the want of military weapons; and they were provided with axes, crows, and other tools of the like nature, proper for the mischief they intended to effect. Furor arma ministrat." It is apparent that Judge Foster here alludes to an assemblage in force, or, as Lord Hale terms it, "in a warlike posture;" that is, in a condition to attempt or proceed upon the treason which had been contemplated. The same author afterwards states at large the Cases of Damaree and Purchase from 8 State Trials; and they are cases where the insurgents not only assembled in force, in the posture of war, or in a condition to execute the treasonable design, but they did actually carry it into execution, and did resist the guards who were sent to disperse them. Judge Foster states (section 4) all insurrections to effect certain innovations of a public and general concern, by an armed force, to be, in construction of law, high treason within the clause of levying war. The cases put by Foster of constructive levying of war all contain, as a material ingredient, the actual employment of force. After going through this branch of his subject, he proceeds to state the law in a case of actual levying war: that is, where the war is intended directly against the government. He says (section 9): "An assembly armed and arrayed in a warlike manner for a treasonable purpose is bellum levatum, though not bellum percussum. Listing and marching are sufficient overt acts, without coming to a battle or action. So cruising on the king's subjects under a French commission, France being then at war with us, was held to be adhering to the king's enemies, though no other act of hostility be proved." "An assembly armed and arrayed in a warlike manner for any treasonable purpose" is certainly in a state of force: in a condition to execute the treason for which they assembled. The words, "enlisting and marching," which are overt acts of levying war, do, in the arrangement of the sentence, also imply a state of force; though that state is not expressed in terms; for the succeeding words, which state a particular event as not having happened, prove that event to have been the next circumstance to those which had happened; they are "without coming to a battle or action." "If men be enlisted and march," (that is, if they march prepared for battle or in a condition for action: for marching is a technical term applied to the movement of a military corps,) it is an overt act of levying war, though they do not come to a battle or action. This exposition is rendered the stronger by what seems to be put in the same sentence as a parallel case with respect to adhering to an enemy. It is cruising under a commission from an enemy without committing any other act of hostility. Cruising is the act of sailing in warlike form and in a condition to assail those of whom the cruiser is in quest. This exposition, which seems to be that intended by Judge Foster, is rendered the more certain by a reference to the case in the State Trials from which the extracts are taken. The words used by the chief justice are: "When men form themselves into a body and march rank and file with weapons offensive and defensive, this is levying of war with open force, if the design be public." Mr. Phipps, the counsel for the prisoner, afterwards observed: "Intending to levy war is not treason unless a war be actually levied." To this the chief justice answered: "Is it not actually levying of war if they actually provide arms and levy men, and in a warlike manner set out and cruise and come with a design to destroy our ships?" Mr. Phipps still insisted "it would not be an actual levying of war unless they committed some act of hostility." "Yes, indeed," said the chief justice, "the going on board and being in a posture to attack the king's ships." Mr. Baron Powis added: "But for you to say that because they did not actually fight it is not a levying of war! Is it not plain what they did intend? that they came with that intention? that they came in that posture? that they came armed, and had guns and blunderbusses, and surrounded the ship twice? They came with an armed force; that is strong evidence of the design."

The point insisted on by counsel in the Case of Vaughan, as in this case, was, that war could not be levied without actual fighting. In this the counsel was very properly overruled; but it is apparent that the judges proceeded entirely on the idea that a warlike posture was indispensable to the fact of levying war. Judge Foster proceeds to give other instances of levying war: "Attacking the king's forces in opposition to his authority upon a march or in quarters is levying war." "Holding a castle or fort against the king or his forces, if actual force be used in order to keep possession, is levying war. But a bare detainer, as, suppose, by shutting the gates against the king or his forces, without any other force from within, Lord Hale conceiveth will not amount to treason." The whole doctrine of Judge Foster on this subject seems to demonstrate a clear opinion that a state of force or violence, a posture of war, must exist to constitute technically as well as really the fact of levying war.

Judge Blackstone seems to concur with his predecessors. Speaking of levying war, he says: "This may be done by taking arms, not only to dethrone the king, but under pretense to reform religion or the laws, or to remove evil counsellors or other grievances, whether real or pretended. For the law does not, neither can it, permit any private man or set of men to interfere forcibly in matters of such high importance." He proceeds to give examples of levying war, which show that he contemplated actual force as a necessary ingredient in the composition of this crime. It would seem, then, from the English authorities, that the words "levying war" have not received a technical different from their natural meaning, so far as respects the character of the assemblage of men which may constitute the fact. It must be a warlike assemblage, carrying the appearance of force, and in a situation to practice hostility.

Several judges of the United States have given opinions at their circuits on the subject, all of which deserve, and will receive the particular attention of this court.

In his charge to the grand jury, when John Fries was indicted in consequence of a forcible opposition to the direct tax, Judge Iredell is understood to have said: "I think I am warranted in saying that if, in the case of the insurgents who may come under your consideration, the intention was to prevent by force of arms the execution of an act of the congress of the United States altogether, any forcible opposition, calculated to carry that intention into effect, was a levying of war against the United States, and, of course, an act of treason." To levy war, then, according to this opinion of Judge Iredell, required the actual exertion of force. Judge Patterson, in his opinions delivered in two different cases, seems not to differ from Judge Iredell. He does not, indeed, precisely state the employment of force as necessary to constitute a levying war, but in giving his opinion, in cases in which force was actually employed, he considers the crime in one case as dependent on the intention; and in the other case he says: "Combining these facts and this design," (that is, combining actual force with a treasonable design,) "the crime is high treason." Judge Peters has also indicated the opinion that force was necessary to constitute the crime of levying war. Judge Chase has been particularly clear and explicit. In an opinion which he appears to have prepared on great consideration, he says: "The court are of opinion that if a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection to resist or oppose the execution of a statute of the United States by force, they are only guilty of a high misdemeanor; but if they proceed to carry such intention into execution by force, that they are guilty of the treason of levying war; and the quantum of the force employed neither increases nor diminishes the crime; whether by one hundred or one thousand persons is wholly immaterial. The court are of opinion that a combination or conspiracy to levy war against the United States is not treason unless combined with an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into execution; some actual force or violence must be used in pursuance of such design to levy war; but that it is altogether immaterial whether the force used be sufficient to effectuate the object. Any force connected with the intention will constitute the crime of levying of war." In various parts of the opinion delivered by Judge Chase, in the case of Fries, the same sentiments are to be found. It is to be observed that these judges are not content that troops should be assembled in a condition to employ force. According to them some degree of force must have been actually employed. The judges of the United States, then, so far as their opinions have been quoted, seem to have required still more to constitute the fact of levying war than has been required by the English books. Our judges seem to have required the actual exercise of force, the actual employment of some degree of violence. This, however, may be, and probably is, because, in the cases in which their opinions were given, the design not having been to overturn the government, but to resist the execution of a law, such an assemblage as would be sufficient for the purpose would require the actual employment of force to render the object unequivocal.

But it is said all these authorities have been overruled by the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Swartwout [4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 75]. If the supreme court have indeed extended the doctrine of treason further than it has heretofore been carried by the judges of England or of this country, their decision would be submitted to. At least this court could go no further than to endeavor again to bring the point directly before them. It would, however, be expected that an opinion which is to overrule all former precedents, and to establish a principle never before recognized, should be expressed in plain and explicit terms. A mere implication ought not to prostrate a principle which seems to have been so well established. Had the intention been entertained to make so material a change in this respect, the court ought to have expressly declared that any assemblage of men whatever, who had formed a treasonable design, whether in force or not, whether in a condition to attempt the design or not, whether attended with warlike appearances or not, constitutes the fact of levying war. Yet no declaration to this amount is made. Not an expression of the kind is to be found in the opinion of the supreme court. The foundation on which this argument rests is the omission of the court to state that the assemblage which constitutes the fact of levying war ought to be in force, and some passages which show that the question respecting the nature of the assemblage was not in the mind of the court when the opinion was drawn; which passages are mingled with others which at least show that there was no intention to depart from the course of the precedents in cases of treason by levying war. Every opinion, to be correctly understood, ought to be considered with a view to the case in which it was delivered. In the case of the United States against Bollman and Swartwout, there was no evidence that even two men had ever met for the purpose of executing the plan in which those persons were charged with having participated. It was, therefore, sufficient for the court to say that unless men were assembled, war could not be levied. That case was decided by this declaration. The court might indeed have defined the species of assemblage which would amount to levying of war; but, as this opinion was not a treatise on treason, but a decision of a particular case, expressions of doubtful import should be construed in reference to the case itself, and the mere omission to state that a particular circumstance was necessary to the consummation of the crime ought not to be construed into a declaration that the circumstance was unimportant. General expressions ought not to be considered as overruling settled principles, without a direct declaration to that effect. After these preliminary observations, the court will proceed to examine the opinion which has occasioned them.

The first expression in it bearing on the present question is, "To constitute that specific crime for which the prisoner now before the court has been committed, war must be actually levied against the United States. However flagitious may be the crime of conspiracy to subvert by force the government of our country, such conspiracy is not treason. To conspire to levy war and actually to levy war are distinct offences. The first must be brought into operation by the assemblage of men for a purpose treasonable in itself, or the fact of levying war cannot have been committed." Although it is not expressly stated that the assemblage of men for the purpose of carrying into operation the treasonable intent which will amount to levying war must be an assemblage in force, yet it is fairly to be inferred from the context; and nothing like dispensing with force appears in this paragraph. The expressions are, "to constitute the crime, war must be actually levied." A conspiracy to levy war is spoken of as "a conspiracy to subvert by force the government of our country." Speaking in general terms of an assemblage of men for this or for any other purpose, a person would naturally be understood as speaking of an assemblage in some degree adapted to the purpose. An assemblage to subvert by force the government of our country, and amounting to a levying of war, should be an assemblage in force. In a subsequent paragraph the court says: "It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of this crime who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled in order to effect by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, &c., and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are traitors. But there must be an actual assembling of men for the treasonable purpose to constitute a levying of war." The observations made on the preceding paragraph apply to this. "A body of men actually assembled, in order to effect by force a treasonable purpose," must be a body assembled with such appearance of force as would warrant the opinion that they were assembled for the particular purpose. An assemblage to constitute an actual levying of war should be an assemblage with such appearance of force as would justify the opinion that they met for the purpose. This explanation, which is believed to be the natural, certainly not a strained explanation of the words, derives some additional aid from the terms in which the paragraph last quoted commences: "It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of treason who has not appeared in arms against his country." These words seem intended to obviate an inference which might otherwise have been drawn from the preceding paragraph. They indicate that in the mind of the court the assemblage stated in that paragraph was an assemblage in arms; that the individuals who composed it had appeared in arms against their country; that is, in other words, that the assemblage was a military, a warlike assemblage. The succeeding paragraph in the opinion relates to a conspiracy, and serves to show that force and violence were in the mind of the court, and that there was no idea of extending the crime of treason by construction beyond the constitutional definition which had been given of it.

Returning to the case actually before the court, it is said: "A design to overturn the government of the United States in New Orleans by force would have been unquestionably a design which if carried into execution would have been treason; and the assemblage of a body of men for the purpose of carrying it into execution would amount to levying of war against the United States." Now what could reasonably be said to be an assemblage of a body of men for the purpose of overturning the government of the United States in New Orleans by force? Certainly an assemblage in force; an assemblage prepared, and intending to act with force; a military assemblage. The decisions theretofore made by the judges of the United States are, then, declared to be in conformity with the principles laid down by the supreme court. Is this declaration compatible with the idea of departing from those opinions on a point within the contemplation of the court? The opinions of Judge Patterson and Judge Iredell are said "to imply an actual assembling of men, though they rather designed to remark on the purpose to which the force was to be applied than on the nature of the force itself." This observation certainly indicates that the necessity of an assemblage of men was the particular point the court meant to establish, and that the idea of force was never separated from this assemblage.

The opinion of Judge Chase is next quoted with approbation. This opinion in terms requires the employment of force. After stating the verbal communication said to have been made by Mr. Swartwout to General Wilkinson, the court says, "If these words import that the government of New Orleans was to be revolutionized by force, although merely as a step to, or a means of, executing some greater projects, the design was unquestionably treasonable; and any assemblage of men for that purpose would amount to a levying of war." The words "any assemblage of men," if construed to affirm that any two or three of the conspirators who might be found together after this plan had been formed would be the act of levying war, would certainly be misconstrued. The sense of the expression, "any assemblage of men," is restricted by the words "for this purpose." Now, could it be in the contemplation of the court that a body of men would assemble for the purpose of revolutionizing New Orleans by force, who should not themselves be in force? After noticing some difference of opinion among the judges respecting the import of the words said to have been used by Mr. Swartwout, the court proceeds to observe: "But whether this treasonable intention be really imputable to the plan or not, it is admitted that it must have been carried into execution by an open assemblage for that purpose, previous to the arrest of the prisoner, in order to consummate the crime as to him." Could the court have conceived "an open assemblage" "for the purpose of overturning the government of New Orleans by force," to be only equivalent to a secret, furtive assemblage without the appearance of force? After quoting the words of Mr. Swartwout, from the affidavit, in which it was stated that Mr. Burr was levying an army of 7,000 men, and observing that the treason to be inferred from these words would depend on the intention with which it was levied, and on the progress which had been made in levying it, the court says: "The question, then, is whether this evidence prove Colonel Burr to have advanced so far in levying an army as actually to have assembled them." Actually to assemble an army of 7,000 men is unquestionably to place those who are so assembled in a state of open force. But as the mode of expression used in this passage might be misconstrued so far as to countenance the opinion that it would be necessary to assemble the whole army in order to constitute the fact of levying war, the court proceeds to say: "It is argued that since it cannot be necessary that the whole 7,000 men should be assembled, their commencing their march by detachments to the place of rendezvous must be sufficient to constitute the crime. This position is correct with some qualification. It cannot be necessary that the whole army should assemble, and that the various parts which are to compose it should have combined. But it is necessary there should be an actual assemblage; and therefore this evidence should make the fact unequivocal. The travelling of individuals to the place of rendezvous would, perhaps, not be sufficient. This would be an equivocal act, and has no warlike appearance. The meeting of particular bodies of men, and their march from places of partial to a place of general rendezvous, would be such an assemblage." The position here stated by the counsel for the prosecution is that the army "commencing its march by detachments to the place of rendezvous (that is, of the army) must be sufficient to constitute the crime." This position is not admitted by the court to be universally correct. It is said to be "correct with some qualification." What is that qualification? "The travelling of individuals to the place of rendezvous (and by this term is not to be understood one individual by himself, but several individuals, either separately or together, but not in military form) would perhaps not be sufficient." Why not sufficient? Because, says the court, "this would be an equivocal act and has no warlike appearance." The act, then, should be unequivocal and should have a warlike appearance. It must exhibit, in the words of Sir Matthew Hale, speciem belli, the appearance of war. This construction is rendered in some measure necessary when we observe that the court is qualifying the position, "that the army commencing their march by detachments to the place of rendezvous must be sufficient to constitute the crime." In qualifying this position they say, "the travelling of individuals would perhaps not be sufficient." Now, a solitary individual travelling to any point, with any intent, could not, without a total disregard of language, be termed a marching detachment. The court, therefore, must have contemplated several individuals travelling together, and the words being used in reference to the position they intended to qualify, would seem to indicate the distinction between the appearances attending the usual movement of a company of men for civil purposes, and that military movement which might, in correct language, be denominated "marching by detachments." The court then proceeded to say: "The meeting of particular bodies of men, and their marching from places of partial to a place of general rendezvous, would be such an assemblage."

It is obvious from the context that the court must have intended to state a case which would in itself be unequivocal, because it would have a warlike appearance. The case stated is that of distinct bodies of men assembling at different places, and marching from these places of partial to a place of general rendezvous. When this has been done an assemblage is produced which would in itself be unequivocal. But when is it done? What is the assemblage here described? The assemblage formed of the different bodies of partial at a place of general rendezvous. In describing the mode of coming to this assemblage the civil term "travelling" is dropped, and the military term "marching" is employed. If this were intended as a definition of an assemblage which would amount to levying war, the definition requires an assemblage at a place of general rendezvous, composed of bodies of men who had previously assembled at places of partial rendezvous. But this is not intended as a definition; for clearly if there should be no places of partial rendezvous, if troops should embody in the first instance in great force for the purpose of subverting the government by violence, the act would be unequivocal; it would have a warlike appearance; and it would, according to the opinion of the supreme court, properly construed, and according to English authorities, amount to levying war. But this, though not a definition, is put as an example, and surely it may be safely taken as an example. If different bodies of men, in pursuance of a treasonable design, plainly proved, should assemble in warlike appearance at places of partial rendezvous, and should march from those places to a place of general rendezvous, it is difficult to conceive how such a transaction could take place without exhibiting the appearance of war, without an obvious display of force. At any rate, a court in stating generally such a military assemblage as would amount to levying war, and having a case before it in which there was no assemblage whatever, cannot reasonably be understood, in putting such an example, to dispense with those appearances of war which seem to be required by the general current of authorities. Certainly it ought not to be so understood when it says in express terms that "it is more safe as well as more consonant to the principles of our constitution that the crime of treason should not be extended by construction to doubtful cases; and that crimes not clearly within the constitutional definition should receive such punishment as the legislature in its wisdom may provide."

After this analysis of the opinion of the supreme court, it will be observed that the direct question, whether an assemblage of men which might be construed to amount to a levying of war must appear in force or in military form, was not in argument or in fact before the court, and does not appear to have been in terms decided. The opinion seems to have been drawn without particularly adverting to this question; and, therefore, upon a transient view of particular expressions, might inspire the idea that a display of force, that appearances of war, were not necessary ingredients to constitute the fact of levying war. But upon a more intent and more accurate investigation of this opinion, although the terms force and violence are not employed as descriptive of the assemblage, such requisites are declared to be indispensable as can scarcely exist without the appearance of war and the existence of real force. It is said that war must be levied in fact; that the object must be one which is to be effected by force; that the assemblage must be such as to prove that this is its object; that it must not be an equivocal act, without a warlike appearance; that it must be an open assemblage for the purpose of force. In the course of this opinion, decisions are quoted and approved which require the employment of force to constitute the crime. It seems extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile these various declarations with the idea that the supreme court considered a secret, unarmed meeting, although that meeting be of conspirators, and although it met with a treasonable intent, as an actual levying of war. Without saying that the assemblage must be in force or in warlike form, it expresses itself so as to show that this idea was never discarded; and it uses terms which cannot be otherwise satisfied. The opinion of a single judge certainly weighs as nothing if opposed to that of the supreme court; but if he were one of the judges who assisted in framing that opinion, if while the impression under which it was framed was yet fresh upon his mind he delivered an opinion on the same testimony, not contradictory to that which had been given by all the judges together, but showing the sense in which he understood terms that might be differently expounded, it may fairly be said to be in some measure explanatory of the opinion itself. To the judge before whom the charge against the prisoner at the bar was first brought the same testimony was offered with that which had been exhibited before the supreme court; and he was required to give an opinion in almost the same case. Upon this occasion he said "war can only be levied by the employment of actual force. Troops must be embodied, men must be assembled, in order to levy war." Again he observed: "The fact to be proved in this case is an act of public notoriety. It must exist in the view of the world, or it cannot exist at all. The assembling of forces to levy war is a visible transaction; and numbers must witness it." It is not easy to doubt what kind of assemblage was in the mind of the judge who used these expressions; and it is to be recollected that he had just returned from the supreme court, and was speaking on the very facts on which the opinion of that court was delivered. The same judge, in his charge to the grand jury who found this bill, observed: "To constitute the fact of levying war it is not necessary that hostilities shall have actually commenced by engaging the military force of the United States, or that measures of violence against the government shall have been carried into execution. But levying war is a fact, in the constitution of which force is an indispensable ingredient. Any combination to subvert by force the government of the United States, violently to dismember the Union, to compel a change in the administration, to coerce the repeal or adoption of a general law, is a conspiracy to levy war; and if the conspiracy be carried into effect by the actual employment of force, by the embodying and assembling of men for the purpose of executing the treasonable design which was previously conceived, it amounts to levying of war. It has been held that arms are not essential to levying war, provided the force assembled be sufficient to attain, or, perhaps, to justify attempting the object without them." This paragraph is immediately followed by a reference to the opinion of the supreme court.

It requires no commentary upon these words to show that, in the opinion of the judge who uttered them, an assemblage of men which should constitute the fact of levying war must be an assemblage in force, and that he so understood the opinion of the supreme court. If in that opinion there may be found in some passages a want of precision, and an indefiniteness of expression, which has occasioned it to be differently understood by different persons, that may well be accounted for when it is recollected that in the particular case there was no assemblage whatever. In expounding that opinion the whole should be taken together, and in reference to the particular case in which it was delivered. It is, however, not improbable that the misunderstanding has arisen from this circumstance: The court unquestionably did not consider arms as an indispensable requisite to levying war. An assemblage adapted to the object might be in a condition to effect or to attempt it without them. Nor did the court consider the actual application of the force to the object as at all times an indispensable requisite; for an assemblage might be in a condition to apply force, might be in a state adapted to real war, without having made the actual application of that force. From these positions, which are to be found in the opinion, it may have been inferred, it is thought too hastily, that the nature of the assemblage was unimportant, and that war might be considered as actually levied by any meeting of men, if a criminal intention can be imputed to them by testimony of any kind whatever.

It has been thought proper to discuss this question at large, and to review the opinion of the supreme court, although this court would be more disposed to leave the question of fact, whether an overt act of levying war were committed on Blennerhassett's Island to the jury, under this explanation of the law, and to instruct them that unless the assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island was an assemblage in force, was a military assemblage in a condition to make war, it was not a levying of war, and that they could not construe it into an act of war, than to arrest the further testimony which might be offered to connect the prisoner with that assemblage, or to prove the intention of those who assembled together at that place. This point, however, is not to be understood as decided. It will, perhaps, constitute an essential inquiry in another case.

Before leaving the opinion of the supreme court entirely, on the question of the nature of the assemblage which will constitute an act of levying war, this court cannot forbear to ask, why is an assemblage absolutely required? Is it not to judge in some measure of the end by the proportion which the means bear to the end? Why is it that a single armed individual entering a boat, and sailing down the Ohio for the avowed purpose of attacking New Orleans, could not be said to levy war? Is it not that he is apparently not in a condition to levy war? If this be so, ought not the assemblage to furnish some evidence of its intention and capacity to levy war before it can amount to levying war? And ought not the supreme court, when speaking of an assemblage for the purpose of effecting a treasonable object by force, be understood to indicate an assemblage exhibiting the appearance of force? The definition of the attorney for the United States deserves notice in this respect. It is, "When there is an assemblage of men, convened for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable object, which force is meant to be employed before the assemblage disperses, this is treason." To read this definition without adverting to the argument, we should infer that the assemblage was itself to effect by force the treasonable object, not to join itself to some other bodies of men and then to effect the object by their combined force. Under this construction, it would be expected the appearance of the assemblage would bear some proportion to the object, and would indicate the intention; at any rate, that it would be an assemblage in force. This construction is most certainly not that which was intended; but it serves to show that general phrases must always be understood in reference to the subject-matter and to the general principles of law.

On that division of the subject which respects the merits of the case connected with the pleadings, two points are also made: 1st. That this indictment, having charged the prisoner with levying war on Blennerhassett's Island, and containing no other overt act, cannot be supported by proof that war was levied at that place by other persons in the absence of the prisoner, even admitting those persons to be connected with him in one common treasonable conspiracy. 2dly. That admitting such an indictment could be supported by such evidence, the previous conviction of some person, who committed the act which is said to amount to levying war, is indispensable to the conviction of a person who advised or procured that act.

As to the first point, the indictment contains two counts, one of which charges that the prisoner, with a number of persons unknown, levied war on Blennerhassett's Island, in the county of Wood, in the district of Virginia; and the other adds the circumstance of their proceeding from that island down the river for the purpose of seizing New Orleans by force. In point of fact, the prisoner was not on Blennerhassett's Island, nor in the county of Wood, nor in the district of Virginia. In considering this point, the court is led first to inquire whether an indictment for levying war must specify an overt act, or would be sufficient if it merely charged the prisoner in general terms with having levied war, omitting the expression of place or circumstance. The place in which a crime was committed is essential to an indictment, were it only to show the jurisdiction of the court. It is, also, essential for the purpose of enabling the prisoner to make his defence. That at common law an indictment would have been defective which did not mention the place in which the crime was committed can scarcely be doubted. For this, it is sufficient to refer to Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 84, and Id. chapter 23, § 91. This necessity is rendered the stronger by the constitutional provision that the offender "shall be tried in the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed," and by the act of congress which requires that twelve petit jurors at least shall be summoned from the county where the offence was committed. A description of the particular manner in which the war was levied seems, also, essential to enable the accused to make his defence. The law does not expect a man to be prepared to defend every act of his life which may be suddenly and without notice alleged against him. In common justice, the particular fact with which he is charged ought to be stated, and stated in such a manner as to afford a reasonable certainty of the nature of the accusation and the circumstances which will be adduced against him. The general doctrine on the subject of indictments is full to this point. Foster (Crown Law, p. 194), speaking of the treason of compassing the king's death, says: "From what has been said, it followeth that in every indictment for this species of treason, and, indeed, for levying war and adhering to the king's enemies, an overt act must be alleged and proved. For the overt act is the charge to which the prisoner must apply his defence." In page 220 Foster repeats this declaration. It is, also, laid down in Hawk. P. C. bk. 8, c. 17, § 29; 1 Hale, P. C. 121; 1 East, P. C. 116, and by the other authorities cited, especially Vaughan's Case. In corroboration of this opinion, it may be observed that treason can only be established by the proof of overt acts, and that by the common law as well as by the statute of 7 Wm. III. those overt acts only which are charged in the indictment can be given in evidence, unless, perhaps, as corroborative testimony after the overt acts are proved. That clause in the constitution, too, which says that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right "to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation," is considered as having a direct bearing on this point. It secures to him such information as will enable him to prepare for his defence. It seems, then, to be perfectly clear that it would not be sufficient for an indictment to allege generally that the accused had levied war against the United States. The charge must be more particularly specified by laying what is termed an overt act of levying war. The law relative to an appeal as cited from Stamford, is strongly corroborative of this opinion.

If it be necessary to specify the charge in the indictment, it would seem to follow, irresistibly, that the charge must be proved as laid. All the authorities which require an overt act, require also that this overt act should be proved. The decision in Vaughan's Case is particularly in point. Might it be otherwise, the charge of an overt act would be a mischief instead of an advantage to the accused. It would lead him from the true cause and nature of the accusation, instead of informing him respecting it. But it is contended on the part of the prosecution that, although the accused had never been with the party which assembled at Blennerhassett's Island, and was, at that time, at a great distance, and in a different state, he was yet legally present, and, therefore, may properly be charged in the indictment as being present in fact. It is, therefore, necessary to inquire whether in this case the doctrine of constructive presence can apply. It is conceived by the court to be possible that a person may be concerned in a treasonable conspiracy, and yet be legally as well as actually absent while some one act of the treason is perpetrated. If a rebellion should be so extensive as to spread through every state in the Union, it will scarcely be contended that every individual concerned in it is legally present at every overt act committed in the course of that rebellion. It would be a very violent presumption indeed, too violent to be made without clear authority, to presume that even the chief of the rebel army was legally present at every such overt act. If the main rebel army, with the chief at its head, should be prosecuting war at one extremity of our territory, say in New Hampshire; if this chief should be there captured and sent to the other extremity for the purpose of trial; if his indictment, instead of alleging an overt act which was true in point of fact, should allege that he had assembled some small party which in truth he had not seen, and had levied war by engaging in a skirmish in Georgia at a time when, in reality, he was fighting a battle in New Hampshire; if such evidence would support such an indictment by the fiction that he was legally present, though really absent, all would ask to what purpose are those provisions in the constitution, which direct the place of trial and ordain that the accused shall be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation?[19] But that a man may be legally absent who has counselled or procured a treasonable act is proved by all those books which treat upon the subject, and which concur in declaring that such a person is a principal traitor, not because he was legally present, but because in treason all are principals. Yet the indictment, speaking upon general principles, would charge him according to the truth of the case. Lord Coke says: "If many conspire to levy war, and some of them do levy the same according to the conspiracy, this is high treason in all." Why? because all were legally present when the war was levied? No. "For in treason," continues Lord Coke, "all be principals, and war is levied." In this case the indictment, reasoning from analogy, would not charge that the absent conspirators were present, but would state the truth of the case. If the conspirator had done nothing which amounted to levying of war, and if by our constitution the doctrine that an accessory becomes a principal be not adopted, in consequence of which the conspirator could not be condemned under an indictment stating the truth of the case, it would be going very far to say that this defect, if it be termed one, may be cured by an indictment stating the case untruly.

This doctrine of Lord Coke has been adopted by all subsequent writers, and it is generally laid down in the English books that whatever will make a man an accessory in felony, will make him a principal in treason; but it is nowhere suggested that he is by construction to be considered as present when in point of fact he was absent. Foster has been particularly quoted, and certainly he is precisely in point. "It is well known," says Foster, "that in the language of the law there are no accessories in high treason; all are principals. Every instance of incitement, aid, or protection, which in the case of felony will render a man an accessory before or after the fact, in the case of high treason, whether it be treason at common law or by statute, will make him a principal in treason." The cases of incitement and aid are cases put as examples of a man's becoming a principal in treason, not because he was legally present, but by force of that maxim in the common law, that whatever will render a man an accessory at common law will render him a principal in treason. In other passages the words "command" or "procure" are used to indicate the same state of things; that is, a treasonable assemblage produced by a man who is not himself in that assemblage. In point of law, then, the man who incites, aids, or procures a treasonable act, is not, merely in consequence of that incitement, aid, or procurement, legally present when that act is committed. If it do not result, from the nature of the crime, that all who are concerned in it are legally present at every overt act, then each case depends upon its own circumstances; and to judge how far the circumstances of any case can make him legally present, who is in fact absent, the doctrine of constructive presence must be examined.

Hale in volume 1, p. 615, says: "Regularly no man can be a principal in felony unless he be present." In the same page he says: "An accessory before is he that, being absent at the time of the felony committed, doth yet procure, counsel, or command another to commit a felony." The books are full of passages which state this to be the law. Foster, in showing what acts of concurrence will make a man a principal, says: "He must be present at the perpetration, otherwise he can be no more than an accessory before the fact." These strong distinctions would be idle, at any rate they would be inapplicable to treason, if they were to be entirely lost in the doctrine of constructive presence. Foster adds (page 349): "When the law requireth the presence of the accomplice at the perpetration of the fact in order to render him a principal, it doth not require a strict actual immediate presence, such a presence as would make him an eye or ear witness of what passeth." The terms used by Foster are such as would be employed by a man intending to show the necessity that the absent person should be near at hand, although from the nature of the thing no precise distance could be marked out. An inspection of the cases from which Foster drew this general principle will serve to illustrate it. Hale, P. C. p. 439. In all these cases, put by Hale, the whole party set out together to commit the very fact charged in the indictment; or to commit some other unlawful act, in which they are all to be personally concerned at the same time and place, and are, at the very time when the criminal fact is committed, near enough to give actual personal aid and assistance to the man who perpetrated it. Hale, in page 449, giving the reason for the decision in the case of the Lord Dacre, says: "They all came with an intent to steal the deer; and consequently the law supposes that they came all with the intent to oppose all that should hinder them in that design." The original case says this was their resolution. This opposition would be a personal opposition. This case, even as stated by Hale, would clearly not comprehend any man who entered into the combination, but who, instead of going to the park where the murder was committed, should not set out with the others, should go to a different park, or should even lose his way. In both these cases stated in Hale, P. C. p. 534, the persons actually set out together, and were near enough to assist in the commission of the fact. That in the Case of Pudsey the felony was, as stated by Hale, a different felony from that originally intended, is unimportant in regard to the particular principle now under consideration; so far as respected distance, as respected capacity to assist in case of resistance, it is the same as if the robbery had been that which was originally designed. The case in the original report shows that the felony committed was in fact in pursuance of that originally designed. Foster (page 350) plainly supposes the same particular design, not a general design composed of many particular distinct facts. He supposes them to be co-operating with respect to that particular design. This may be illustrated by a case which is, perhaps, common. Suppose a band of robbers confederated for the general purpose of robbing. They set out together, or in parties, to rob a particular individual; and each performs the part assigned to him. Some ride up to the individual, and demand his purse. Others watch out of sight to intercept those who might be coming to assist the man on whom the robbery is to be committed. If murder or robbery actually take place, all are principals; and all in construction of law are present. But suppose they set out at the same time or at different times, by different roads, to attack and rob different individuals or different companies; to commit distinct acts of robbery. It has never been contended that those who committed one act of robbery, or who failed altogether, were constructively present at the act of those who were associated with them in the common object of robbery, who were to share the plunder, but who did not assist at the particular fact. They do, indeed, belong to the general party; but they are not of the particular party which committed this fact. Foster concludes this subject by observing that "in order to render a person an accomplice and a principal in felony, he must be aiding and abetting at the fact, or ready to afford assistance if necessary:" that is, at the particular fact which is charged. He must be ready to render assistance to those who are committing that fact. He must, as is stated by Hawkins, be ready to give immediate and direct assistance. All the cases to be found in the books go to the same point. Let them be applied to that under consideration.

The whole treason laid in this indictment is the levying of war in Blennerhassett's Island; and the whole question to which the inquiry of the court is now directed is whether the prisoner was legally present at that fact. I say this is the whole question; because the prisoner can only be convicted on the overt act laid in the indictment. With respect to this prosecution, it is as if no other overt act existed. If other overt acts can be inquired into, it is for the sole purpose of proving the particular fact charged. It is an evidence of the crime consisting of this particular fact, not as establishing the general crime by a distinct fact. The counsel for the prosecution have charged those engaged in the defence with considering the overt act as treason, whereas it ought to be considered solely as the evidence of the treason; but the counsel for the prosecution seem themselves not to have sufficiently adverted to this clear principle; that though the overt act may not be itself the treason, it is the sole act of that treason which can produce conviction. It is the sole point in issue between the parties. And the only division of that point, if the expression be allowed, which the court is now examining, is the constructive presence of the prisoner at the fact charged.

To return, then, to the application of the cases. Had the prisoner set out with the party from Beaver for Blennerhassett's Island, or perhaps had he set out for that place, though not from Beaver, and had arrived in the island, he would have been present at the fact. Had he not arrived in the island, but had taken a position near enough to co-operate with those on the island, to assist them in any act of hostility, or to aid them if attacked, the question whether he was constructively present would be a question compounded of law and fact, which would be decided by the jury, with the aid of the court, so far as respected the law. In this case the accused would have been of the particular party assembled on the island, and would have been associated with them in the particular act of levying war said to have been committed on the island. But if he was not with the party at any time before they reached the island; if he did not join them there, or intend to join them there; if his personal co-operation in the general plan was to be afforded elsewhere, at a great distance, in a different state; if the overt acts of treason to be performed by him were to be distinct overt acts—then he was not of the particular party assembled at Blennerhassett's Island, and was not constructively present, aiding and assisting in the particular act which was there committed.[20] The testimony on this point, so far as it has been delivered, is not equivocal. There is not only no evidence that the accused was of the particular party which assembled on Blennerhassett's Island, but the whole evidence shows he was not of that party. In felony, then, admitting the crime to have been completed on the island, and to have been advised, procured, or commanded by the accused, he would have been incontestably an accessory and not a principal. But in treason, it is said, the law is otherwise, because the theatre of action is more extensive. The reasoning applies in England as strongly as in the United States. While in '15 and '45 the family of Stuart sought to regain the crown they had forfeited, the struggle was for the whole kingdom, yet no man was ever considered as legally present at one place, when actually at another; or as aiding in one transaction while actually employed in another. With the perfect knowledge that the whole nation may be the theatre of action, the English books unite in declaring that he who counsels, procures, or aids treason, is guilty accessorially, and solely in virtue of the common law principle that what will make a man an accessory in felony makes him a principal in treason. So far from considering a man as constructively present at every overt act of the general treason in which he may have been concerned, the whole doctrine of the books limits the proof against him to those particular overt acts of levying war with which he is charged. What would be the effect of a different doctrine? Clearly that which has been stated.

If a person levying war in Kentucky may be said to be constructively present and assembled with a party carrying on war in Virginia at a great distance from him, then he is present at every overt act performed anywhere. He may be tried in any state on the continent, where any overt act has been committed. He may be proved to be guilty of an overt act laid in the indictment in which he had no personal participation, by proving that he advised it, or that he committed other acts. This is, perhaps, too extravagant to be in terms maintained. Certainly it cannot be supported by the doctrines of the English law.

The opinion of Judge Patterson in Mitchell's Case has been cited on this point, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 348. The indictment is not specially stated, but from the case as reported, it must have been either general for levying war in the county of Allegany, and the overt act must have been the assemblage of men and levying of war in that county, or it must have given a particular detail of the treasonable transactions in that county. The first supposition is the most probable, but let the indictment be in the one form or the other, and the result is the same. The facts of the case are that a large body of men, of whom Mitchell was one, assembled at Braddock's field, in the county of Allegany, for the purpose of committing acts of violence at Pittsburg; that there was also an assemblage at a different time at Couch's fort, at which the prisoner also attended. The general and avowed object of that meeting was to concert measures for resisting the execution of a public law. At Couch's fort the resolution was taken to attack the house of the inspector, and the body there assembled marched to that house and attacked it. It was proved by the competent number of witnesses that he was at Couch's fort armed; that he offered to reconnoitre the house to be attacked; that he marched with the insurgents towards the house; that he was with them after the action attending the body of one of his comrades who was killed in it. One witness swore positively that he was present at the burning of the house; and a second witness said that "it run in his head that he had seen him there." That a doubt should exist in such a case as this is strong evidence of the necessity that the overt act should be unequivocally proved by two witnesses.

But what was the opinion of the judge in this case? Couch's fort and Neville's house being in the same county, the assemblage having been at Couch's fort, and the resolution to attack the house having been there taken, the body having for the avowed purpose moved in execution of that resolution towards the house to be attacked, he inclined to think that the act of marching was in itself levying war. If it was, then the overt act laid in the indictment was consummated by the assemblage at Couch's and the marching from thence; and Mitchell was proved to be guilty by more than two positive witnesses. But without deciding this to be the law, he proceeded to consider the meeting at Couch's, the immediate marching to Neville's house, and the attack and burning of the house, as one transaction. Mitchell was proved by more than two positive witnesses to have been in that transaction, to have taken an active part in it; and the judge declared it to be unnecessary that all should have seen him at the same time and place. But suppose not a single witness had proved Mitchell to have been at Couch's, or on the march, or at Neville's. Suppose he had been at the time notoriously absent in a different state. Can it be believed by any person who observes the caution with which Judge Patterson required the constitutional proof of two witnesses to the same overt act, that he would have said Mitchell was constructively present, and might, on that straining of a legal fiction, be found guilty of treason? Had he delivered such an opinion, what would have been the language of this country respecting it? Had he given this opinion, it would have required all the correctness of his life to strike his name from that bloody list in which the name of Jeffreys is enrolled.

But to estimate the opinion in Mitchell's Case, let its circumstances be transferred to Burr's Case. Suppose the body of men assembled in Blennerhassett's Island had previously met at some other place in the same county; that Burr had been proved to be with them by four witnesses; that the resolution to march to Blennerhassett's Island for a treasonable purpose had been there taken; that he had been seen on the march with them; that one witness had seen him on the island; that another thought he had seen him there; that he had been seen with the party directly after leaving the island; that this indictment had charged the levying of war in Wood county generally—the cases would, then, have been precisely parallel; and the decision would have been the same. In conformity with principle and with authority, then, the prisoner at the bar was neither legally nor actually present at Blennerhassett's Island; and the court is strongly inclined to the opinion that without proving an actual or legal presence by two witnesses, the overt act laid in this indictment cannot be proved.

But this opinion is controverted on two grounds: The first is, that the indictment does not charge the prisoner to have been present. The second, that although he was absent, yet if he caused the assemblage, he may be indicted as being present, and convicted on evidence that he caused the treasonable act. The first position is to be decided by the indictment itself. The court understands the allegation differently from the attorney for the United States. The court understands it to be directly charged that the prisoner did assemble with the multitude, and did march with them. Nothing will more clearly test this construction than putting the case into a shape which it may possibly take. Suppose the law be that the indictment would be defective unless it alleged the presence of the person indicted at the act of treason. If, upon a special verdict, facts should be found which amounted to a levying of war by the accused, and his counsel should insist that he could not be condemned because the indictment was defective in not charging that he was himself one of the assemblage which constituted the treason, or because it alleged the procurement defectively, would the attorney admit this construction of his indictment to be correct? I am persuaded he would not, and that he ought not to make such a concession. If, after a verdict, the indictment ought to be construed to allege that the prisoner was one of the assemblage at Blennerhassett's Island, it ought to be so construed now. But this is unimportant; for if the indictment alleges that the prisoner procured the assemblage, that procurement becomes part of the overt act, and must be proved, as will be shown hereafter. The second position is founded on 1 Hale, P. C. 214, 288, and 1 East, P. C. 127.

While I declare that this doctrine contradicts every idea I had ever entertained on the subject of indictments, (since it admits that one case may be stated, and a very different case may be proved,) I will acknowledge that it is countenanced by the authorities adduced in its support. To counsel or advise a treasonable assemblage, and to be one of that assemblage, are certainly distinct acts, and, therefore, ought not to be charged as the same act. The great objection to this mode of proceeding is, that the proof essentially varies from the charge in the character and essence of the offence, and in the testimony by which the accused is to defend himself. These dicta of Lord Hale, therefore, taken in the extent in which they are understood by the counsel for the United States, seem to be repugnant to the declarations we find everywhere that an overt act must be laid, and must be proved. No case is cited by Hale in support of them, and I am strongly inclined to the opinion that had the public received his corrected instead of his original manuscript, they would, if not expunged, have been restrained in their application to cases of a particular description. Laid down generally, and applied universally to all cases of treason, they are repugnant to the principles for which Hale contends, for which all the elementary writers contend, and from which courts have in no case, either directly reported or referred to in the books, ever departed. These principles are, that the indictment must give notice of the offence; that the accused is only bound to answer the particular charge which the indictment contains, and that the overt act laid is that particular charge. Under such circumstances, it is only doing justice to Hale to examine his dicta, and if they admit of being understood in a limited sense, not repugnant to his own doctrines nor to the general principles of law, to understand them in that sense. "If many conspire to counterfeit, or counsel or abet it, and one of them doth the fact upon that counselling or conspiracy, it is treason in all, and they may be all indicted for counterfeiting generally within this statute, for in such case in treason all are principals." This is laid down as applicable singly to the treason of counterfeiting the coin, and is not applied by Hale to other treasons. Had he designed to apply the principle universally he would have stated it as a general proposition; he would have laid it down in treating on other branches of the statute as well as in the chapter respecting the coin; he would have laid it down when treating on indictments generally. But he has done neither. Every sentiment bearing in any manner on this point, which is to be found in Lord Hale while on the doctrine of levying war or on the general doctrine of indictments, militates against the opinion that he considered the proposition as more extensive than he has declared it to be. No court could be justified in extending the dictum of a judge beyond its terms to cases which he had expressly treated, in which he has not himself applied it, and on which he, as well as others, has delivered opinions which that dictum would overrule. This would be the less justifiable if there should be a clear legal distinction indicated by the very terms in which the judge has expressed himself between the particular case to which alone he has applied the dictum and other cases to which the court is required to extend it. There is this clear legal distinction: "They may," says Judge Hale, "be indicted for counterfeiting generally." But if many conspire to levy war, and some actually levy it, they may not be indicted for levying war generally. The books concur in declaring that they cannot be so indicted. A special overt act of levying war must be laid. This distinction between counterfeiting the coins and that class of treasons among which levying war is placed is taken in the statute of Edward III. That statute requires an overt act of levying war to be laid in the indictment, and does not require an overt act of counterfeiting the coin to be laid. If in a particular case, in which a general indictment is sufficient, it be stated that the crime may be charged generally according to the legal effect of the act, it does not follow that in other cases, where a general indictment would not be sufficient, where an overt act must be laid, that this overt act need not be laid according to the real fact. Hale, then, is to be reconciled to himself and with the general principles of the law only by permitting the limits which he has himself given to his own dictum to remain where he has placed them. In page 238, Hale is speaking generally to the receiver of a traitor, and is stating in what such a receiver partakes of an accessory: 1st. "His indictment must be special of the receipt, and not generally that he did the thing, which may be otherwise in case of one that is procurer, counsellor, or consenter." The words "may be otherwise" do not clearly convey the idea that it is universally otherwise. In all cases of a receiver, the indictment must be special on the receipt, and not general. The words "may be otherwise in case of a procurer," &c., signify that it may be otherwise in all treasons, or that it may be otherwise in some treasons. If it may be otherwise in some treasons without contradicting the doctrines of Hale himself as well as of other writers, but cannot be otherwise in all treasons without such contradiction, the fair construction is, that Hale used these words in their restricted sense; that he used them in reference to treasons in which a general indictment would lie, not to treasons where a general indictment would not lie, but an overt act of the treason must be charged. The two passages of Hale thus construed may, perhaps, be law, and may leave him consistent with himself. It appears to the court to be the fair way of construing them.

These observations relative to the passages quoted from Hale apply to that quoted from East, who obviously copies from Hale and relies upon his authority. Upon this point, J. Kelyng, 26, and 1 Hale, P. C. p. 626, have also been relied upon. It is stated in both that if a man be indicted as a principal and acquitted, he cannot afterwards be indicted as an accessory before the fact—whence it is inferred, not without reason, that evidence of accessorial guilt may be received on such an indictment. Yet no case is found in which the question has been made and decided. The objection has never been taken at a trial and overruled, nor do the books say it would be overruled. Were such a case produced its application would be questionable. Kelyng says an accessory before the fact is quodam modo in some manner guilty of the fact. The law may not require that the manner should be stated, for in felony it does not require that an overt act should be laid. The indictment, therefore, may be general; but an overt act of levying war must be laid. These cases, then, prove in their utmost extent no more than the cases previously cited from Hale and East. This distinction between indictments which may state the fact generally, and those which must lay it specially, bear some analogy to a general and a special action on the case. In a general action the declaration may lay the assumpsit according to the legal effect of the transaction, but in a special action on the case the declaration must state the material circumstances truly, and they must be proved as stated. This distinction also derives some aid from a passage in Hale (page 625) immediately preceding that which has been cited at the bar. He says: "If A be indicted as principal and B as accessory before or after, and both be acquitted, yet B may be indicted as principal, and the former acquittal as accessory is no bar." The crimes, then, are not the same, and may not indifferently be tried under the same indictment. But why is it that an acquittal as principal may be pleaded in bar to an indictment as accessory, while an acquittal as accessory may not be pleaded in bar to an indictment as principal? If it be answered that the accessorial crime may be given in evidence on an indictment as principal, but that the principal crime may not be given in evidence on an indictment as accessory, the question recurs, on what legal ground does this distinction stand? I can imagine only this: an accessory being quodam modo a principal in indictments where the law does not require the manner to be stated, which need not be special, evidence of accessorial guilt, if the punishment be the same, may possibly be received; but every indictment as accessory must be special. The very allegation that he is an accessory must be a special allegation, and must show how he became an accessory. The charges of this special indictment, therefore, must be proved as laid, and no evidence which proves the crime in a form substantially different can be received. If this be the legal reason for the distinction, it supports the exposition of these dicta which has been given. If it be not the legal reason, I can conceive no other.

But suppose the law to be as is contended by the counsel for the United States. Suppose an indictment charging an individual with personally assembling among others, and thus levying war, may be satisfied with the proof that he caused the assemblage. What effect will this law have upon this case? The guilt of the accused, if there be any guilt, does not consist in the assemblage, for he was not a member of it. The simple fact of assemblage no more affects one absent man than another. His guilt, then, consists in procuring the assemblage, and upon this fact depends his criminality. The proof relative to the character of an assemblage must be the same whether a man be present or absent. In the general, to charge any individual with the guilt of an assemblage, the fact of his presence must be proved; it constitutes an essential part of the overt act. If, then, the procurement be substituted in the place of presence, does it not also constitute an essential part of the overt act? Must it not also be proved? Must it not be proved in the same manner that presence must be proved? If in one case the presence of the individual make the guilt of the assemblage his guilt, and in the other case the procurement by the individual make the guilt of the assemblage his guilt, then presence and procurement are equally component parts of the overt act, and equally require two witnesses. Collateral points may, say the books, be proved according to the course of the common law; but is this a collateral point? Is the fact, without which the accused does not participate in the guilt of the assemblage if it was guilty, a collateral point? This cannot be. The presence of the party, where presence is necessary, being a part of the overt act, must be positively proved by two witnesses. No presumptive evidence, no facts from which presence may be conjectured or inferred, will satisfy the constitution and the law. If procurement take the place of presence and become part of the overt act, then no presumptive evidence, no facts from which the procurement may be conjectured or inferred, can satisfy the constitution and the law. The mind is not to be led to the conclusion that the individual was present by a train of conjectures, of inferences, or of reasoning; the fact must be proved by two witnesses. Neither, where procurement supplies the want of presence, is the mind to be conducted to the conclusion that the accused procured the assembly by a train of conjectures or inferences, or of reasoning; the fact itself must be proved by two witnesses, and must have been committed within the district. If it be said that the advising or procurement of treason is a secret transaction, which can scarcely ever be proved in the manner required by this opinion, the answer which will readily suggest itself is, that the difficulty of proving a fact will not justify conviction without proof. Certainly it will not justify conviction without a direct and positive witness in a case where the constitution requires two. The more correct inference from this circumstance would seem to be, that the advising of the fact is not within the constitutional definition of the crime. To advise or procure a treason is in the nature of conspiring or plotting treason, which is not treason in itself. If, then, the doctrines of Kelyng, Hale, and East, be understood in the sense in which they are pressed by the counsel for the prosecution, and are applicable in the United States, the fact that the accused procured the assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island must be proved, not circumstantially, but positively, by two witnesses, to charge him with that assemblage. But there are still other most important considerations which must be well weighed before this doctrine can be applied to the United States.

The 8th amendment to the constitution has been pressed with great force, and it is impossible not to feel its application to this point. The accused cannot be said to be "informed of the nature and cause of the accusation" unless the indictment give him that notice which may reasonably suggest to him the point on which the accusation turns, so that he may know the course to be pursued in his defence. It is also well worthy of consideration, that this doctrine, so far as it respects treason, is entirely supported by the operation of the common law, which is said to convert the accessory before the fact into the principal, and to make the act of the principal his act. The accessory before the fact is not said to have levied war. He is not said to be guilty under the statute, but the common law attaches to him the guilt of that fact which he has advised or procured; and, as contended, makes it his act. This is the operation of the common law, not the operation of the statute. It is an operation, then, which can only be performed where the common law exists to perform it. It is the creature of the common law, and the creature presupposes its creator. To decide, then, that this doctrine is applicable to the United States would seem to imply the decision that the United States, as a nation, have a common law which creates and defines the punishment of crimes accessorial in their nature. It would imply the further decision that these accessorial crimes are not, in the case of treason, excluded by the definition of treason given in the constitution. I will not pretend that I have not individually an opinion on these points; but it is one which I should give only in a case which absolutely required it, unless I could confer respecting it with the judges of the supreme court.[21]

I have said that this doctrine cannot apply to the United States without implying those decisions respecting the common law which I have stated; because, should it be true, as is contended, that the constitutional definition of treason comprehends him who advises or procures an assemblage that levies war, it would not follow that such adviser or procurer might be charged as having been present at the assemblage. If the adviser or procurer be within the definition of levying war, and, independent of the agency of the common law, do actually levy war, then the advisement or procurement is an overt act of levying war. If it be the overt act on which he is to be convicted, then it must be charged in the indictment; for he can only be convicted on proof of the overt acts which are charged. To render this distinction more intelligible, let it be recollected that, although it should be conceded that since the statute of William and Mary he who advises or procures a treason may, in England, be charged as having committed that treason, by virtue of the common law operation, which is said, so far as respects the indictment, to unite the accessorial to the principal offence and permit them to be charged as one, yet it can never be conceded that he who commits one overt act under the statute of Edward can be charged and convicted on proof of another overt act. If, then, procurement be an overt act of treason under the constitution, no man can be convicted for the procurement under an indictment charging him with actually assembling, whatever may be the doctrine of the common law in the case of an accessorial offender.

It may not be improper in this place again

to advert to the opinion of the supreme court, and to show that it contains nothing contrary to the doctrine now laid down. That opinion is, that an individual may be guilty of treason "who has not appeared in arms against his country; that if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable object, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors." This opinion does not touch the case of a person who advises or procures an assemblage, and does nothing further. The advising, certainly, and perhaps the procuring, is more in the nature of a conspiracy to levy war than of the actual levying of war. According to the opinion, it is not enough to be leagued in the conspiracy, and that war be levied, but it is also necessary to perform a part: that part is the act of levying war. That part, it is true, may be minute, it may not be the actual appearance in arms, and it may be remote from the scene of action, that is, from the place where the army is assembled; but it must be a part, and that part must be performed by a person who is leagued in the conspiracy. This part, however minute or remote, constitutes the overt act of which alone the person who performs it can be convicted.[22] The opinion does not declare that the person who has performed this remote and minute part may be indicted for a part which was, in truth, performed by others, and convicted on their overt acts. It amounts to this and nothing more, that when war is actually levied, not only those who bear arms, but those also who are leagued in the conspiracy, and who perform the various distinct parts which are necessary for the prosecution of war, do, in the sense of the constitution, levy war. It may possibly be the opinion of the supreme court that those who procure a treason and do nothing further are guilty under the constitution. I only say that opinion has not yet been given, still less has it been indicated that he who advises shall be indicted as having performed the fact.

It is, then, the opinion of the court that this indictment can be supported only by testimony which proves the accused to have been actually or constructively present when the assemblage took place on Blennerhassett's Island; or by the admission of the doctrine that he who procures an act may be indicted as having performed that act.

It is further the opinion of the court that there is no testimony whatever which tends to prove that the accused was actually or constructively present when that assemblage did take place; indeed, the contrary is most apparent. With respect to admitting proof of procurement to establish a charge of actual presence, the court is of opinion that if this be admissible in England on an indictment for levying war, which is far from being conceded, it is admissible only by virtue of the operation of the common law upon the statute, and therefore is not admissible in this country unless by virtue of a similar operation—a point far from being established, but on which, for the present, no opinion is given. If, however, this point be established, still the procurement must be proved in the same manner and by the same kind of testimony which would be required to prove actual presence.

The second point in this division of the subject is the necessity of adducing the record of the previous conviction of some one person who committed the fact alleged to be treasonable. This point presupposes the treason of the accused, if any have been committed, to be accessorial in its nature. Its being of this description, according to the British authorities, depends on the presence or absence of the accused at the time the fact was committed. The doctrine on this subject is well understood, has been most copiously explained, and need not be repeated. That there is no evidence of his actual or legal presence is a point already discussed and decided. It is, then, apparent that but for the exception to the general principle which is made in cases of treason, those who assembled at Blennerhassett's Island, if that assemblage were such as to constitute the crime, would be principals, and those who might really have caused that assemblage, although in truth the chief traitors, would in law be accessories. It is a settled principle in the law that the accessory cannot be guilty of a greater offence than his principal. The maxim is "Accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis"—"The accessory follows the nature of his principal." Hence results the necessity of establishing the guilt of the principal before the accessory can be tried; for the degree of guilt which is incurred by counselling or commanding the commission of a crime depends upon the actual commission of that crime. No man is an accessory to murder unless the fact has been committed. The fact can only be established in a prosecution against the person by whom a crime has been perpetrated. The law supposes a man more capable of defending his own conduct than any other person, and will not tolerate that the guilt of A shall be established in a prosecution against B. Consequently, if the guilt of B depends on the guilt of A, A must be convicted before B can be tried. It would exhibit a monstrous deformity indeed in our system, if B might be executed for being accessory to a murder committed by A, and A should afterwards, upon a full trial, be acquitted of the fact. For this obvious reason, although the punishment of a principal and accessory was originally the same, and although in many instances it is still the same, the accessory could in no case be tried before the conviction of his principal, nor can he yet be tried previous to such conviction, unless he require it, or unless a special provision to that effect be made by statute. If, then, this were a felony, the prisoner at the bar could not be tried until the crime were established by the conviction of the person by whom it was actually perpetrated.

Is the law otherwise in this case, because in treason all are principals? Let this question be answered by reason and by authority. Why is it that in felonies, however atrocious, the trial of the accessory can never precede the conviction of the principal? Not because the one is denominated the principal and the other the accessory; for that would be ground on which a great law principle could never stand. Not because there was, in fact, a difference in the degree of moral guilt; for in the case of murder committed by a hardy villain for a bribe, the person plotting the murder and giving the bribe is, perhaps, of the two, the blacker criminal; and were it otherwise, this would furnish no argument for precedence in trial. What, then, is the reason? It has been already given. The legal guilt of the accessory depends on the guilt of the principal; and the guilt of the principal can only be established in a prosecution against himself. Does not this reason apply in full force to a case of treason? The legal guilt of the person who planned the assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island depends not simply on the criminality of the previous conspiracy, but on the criminality of that assemblage. If those who perpetrated the fact be not traitors, he who advised the fact cannot be a traitor. His guilt, then, in contemplation of law, depends on theirs; and their guilt can only be established in a prosecution against themselves. Whether the adviser of this assemblage be punishable with death as a principal or as an accessory, his liability to punishment depends on the degree of guilt attached to an act which has been perpetrated by others; and which, if it be a criminal act, renders them guilty also. His guilt, therefore, depends on theirs; and their guilt cannot be legally established in a prosecution against him.

The whole reason of the law, then, relative to the principal and accessory, so far as respects the order of trial, seems to apply in full force to a case of treason committed by one body of men in conspiracy with others who are absent. If from reason we pass to authority, we find it laid down by Hale, Foster, and East, in the most explicit terms, that the conviction of some one who has committed the treason must precede the trial of him who has advised or procured it. This position is also maintained by Leach in his notes on Hawkins, and is not, so far as the court has discovered, anywhere contradicted. These authorities have been read and commented on at such length that it cannot be necessary for the court to bring them again into view. It is the less necessary because it is not understood that the law is controverted by the counsel for the United States. It is, however, contended that the prisoner has waived his right to demand the conviction of some one person who was present at the fact, by pleading to his indictment. Had this indictment even charged the prisoner according to the truth of the case, the court would feel some difficulty in deciding that he had, by implication, waived his right to demand a species of testimony essential to his conviction. The court is not prepared to say that the act which is to operate against his rights did not require that it should be performed with a full knowledge of its operation. It would seem consonant to the usual course of proceeding in other respects in criminal cases, that the prisoner should be informed that he had a right to refuse to be tried until some person who committed the act should be convicted; and that he ought not to be considered as waiving the right to demand the record of conviction, unless with the full knowledge of that right he consented to be tried. The court, however, does not decide what the law would be in such a case. It is unnecessary to decide it; because pleading to an indictment, in which a man is charged as having committed an act, cannot be construed to waive a right which he would have possessed had he been charged with having advised the act. No person indicted as a principal can be expected to say, "I am not a principal. I am an accessory. I did not commit, I only advised the act."

The authority of the English cases on this subject depends, in a great measure, on the adoption of the common law doctrine of accessorial treasons. If that doctrine be excluded, this branch of it may not be directly applicable to treasons committed within the United States. If the crime of advising or procuring a levying of war be within the constitutional definition of treason, then he who advises or procures it must be indicted on the very fact; and the question whether the treasonableness of the act may be decided in the first instance in the trial of him who procured it, or must be decided in the trial of one who committed it, will depend upon the reason, as it respects the law of evidence, which produced the British decisions with regard to the trial of principal and accessory, rather than on the positive authority of those decisions. This question is not essential in the present case; because if the crime be within the constitutional definition, it is an overt act of levying war, and, to produce a conviction, ought to have been charged in the indictment.

The law of the case being thus far settled, what ought to be the decision of the court on the present motion? Ought the court to sit and hear testimony which cannot affect the prisoner, or ought the court to arrest that testimony? On this question much has been said —much that may perhaps be ascribed to a misconception of the point really under consideration. The motion has been treated as a motion confessedly made to stop irrelevant testimony; and, in the course of the argument, it has been repeatedly stated, by those who oppose the motion, that irrelevant testimony may and ought to be stopped. That this statement is perfectly correct is one of those fundamental principles in judicial proceedings which is acknowledged by all, and is founded in the absolute necessity of the thing. No person will contend that, in a civil or criminal case, either party is at liberty to introduce what testimony he pleases, legal or illegal, and to consume the whole term in details of facts unconnected with the particular case. Some tribunal, then, must decide on the admissibility of testimony. The parties cannot constitute this tribunal; for they do not agree. The jury cannot constitute it; for the question is whether they shall hear the testimony or not. Who, then, but the court can constitute it? It is of necessity the peculiar province of the court to judge of the admissibility of testimony. If the court admit improper or reject proper testimony, it is an error of judgment; but it is an error committed in the direct exercise of their judicial functions. The present indictment charges the prisoner with levying war against the United States, and alleges an overt act of levying war. That overt act must be proved, according to the mandates of the constitution and of the act of congress, by two witnesses. It is not proved by a single witness. The presence of the accused has been stated to be an essential component part of the overt act in this indictment, unless the common law principle respecting accessories should render it unnecessary; and there is not only no witness who has proved his actual or legal presence, but the fact of his absence is not controverted. The counsel for the prosecution offer to give in evidence subsequent transactions at a different place and in a different state, in order to prove—what? The overt act laid in the indictment? That the prisoner was one of those who assembled at Blennerhassett's Island? No: that is not alleged. It is well known that such testimony is not competent to establish such a fact. The constitution and law require that the fact should be established by two witnesses; not by the establishment of other facts from which the jury might reason to this fact. The testimony, then, is not relevant. If it can be introduced, it is only in the character of corroborative or confirmatory testimony, after the overt act has been proved by two witnesses in such manner that the question of fact ought to be left with the jury. The conclusion that in this state of things no testimony can be admissible is so inevitable that the counsel for the United States could not resist it. I do not understand them to deny that, if the overt act be not proved by two witnesses so as to be submitted to the jury, all other testimony must be irrelevant; because no other testimony can prove the act. Now, an assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island is proved by the requisite number of witnesses; and the court might submit it to the jury whether that assemblage amounted to a levying of war; but the presence of the accused at that assemblage being nowhere alleged except in the indictment, the overt act is not proved by a single witness; and, of consequence, all other testimony must be irrelevant. The only difference between this motion as made, and the motion in the form which the counsel for the United States would admit to be regular, is this: It is now general for the rejection of all testimony. It might be particular with respect to each witness as adduced. But can this be wished, or can it be deemed necessary? If enough be proved to show that the indictment cannot be supported, and that no testimony, unless it be of that description which the attorney for the United States declares himself not to possess, can be relevant, why should a question be taken on each witness? The opinion of this court on the order of testimony has frequently been adverted to as deciding this question against the motion. If a contradiction between the two opinions exist, the court cannot perceive it. It was said that levying war is an act compounded of law and fact, of which the jury, aided by the court, must judge. To that declaration the court still adheres. It was said that if the overt act were not proved by two witnesses, no testimony in its nature corroborative or confirmatory was admissible, or could be relevant. From that declaration there is certainly no departure. It has been asked, in allusion to the present case, if a general commanding an army should detach troops for a distant service, would the men composing that detachment be traitors, and would the commander-in-chief escape punishment? Let the opinion which has been given answer this question. Appearing at the head of an army would, according to this opinion, be an overt act of levying war. Detaching a military corps from it for military purposes might, also, be an overt act of levying war. It is not pretended that he would not be punishable for these acts. It is only said that he may be tried and convicted on his own acts in the state where those acts were committed, not on the acts of others in the state where those others acted.[23]

Much has been said in the course of the argument on points on which the court feels no inclination to comment particularly; but which may, perhaps not improperly, receive some notice. That this court dares not usurp power is most true. That this court dares not shrink from its duty is not less true. No man is desirous of placing himself in a disagreeable situation. No man is desirous of becoming the peculiar subject of calumny. No man might he let the bitter cup pass from him without self-reproach, would drain it to the bottom. But if he have no choice in the case, if there be no alternative presented to him but a dereliction of duty or the opprobrium of those who are denominated the world, he merits the contempt as well as the indignation of his country who can hesitate which to embrace. That gentlemen, in a case the most interesting, in the zeal with which they advocate particular opinions, and under the conviction in some measure produced by that zeal, should, on each side, press their arguments too far, should be impatient at any deliberation in the court, and should suspect or fear the operation of motives to which alone they can ascribe that deliberation, is, perhaps, a frailty incident to human nature; but if any conduct on the part of the court could warrant a sentiment that it would deviate to the one side or the other from the line prescribed by duty and by law, that conduct would be viewed by the judges themselves with an eye of extreme severity, and would long be recollected with deep and serious regret.

The arguments on both sides have been intently and deliberately considered. Those which could not be noticed, since to notice every argument and authority would swell this opinion to a volume, have not been disregarded. The result of the whole is a conviction, as complete as the mind of the court is capable of receiving on a complex subject, that the motion must prevail. No testimony relative to the conduct or declarations of the prisoner elsewhere, and subsequent to the transaction on Blennerhassett's Island, can be admitted; because such testimony, being in its nature merely corroborative and incompetent to prove the overt act in itself, is irrelevant until there be proof of the overt act by two witnesses. This opinion does not comprehend the proof by two witnesses that the meeting on Blennerhassett's Island was procured by the prisoner. On that point the court for the present withholds its opinion for reasons which have been already assigned; and as it is understood from the statements made on the part of the prosecution that no such testimony exists, if there be such let it be offered, and the court will decide upon it.

The jury have now heard the opinion of the court on the law of the case. They will apply that law to the facts, and will find a verdict of guilty or not guilty as their own consciences may direct.

As soon as the CHIEF JUSTICE had concluded, Mr. Hay observed that the opinion just delivered by the court furnished matter for the serious consideration of the counsel for the prosecution; and he hoped the court would grant them time to consider it. After some desultory conversation, the CHIEF JUSTICE, at Mr. Hay's request, delivered him the opinion, that he might read and consider it.

The court adjourned till six o'clock in the afternoon.

At six o'clock the court met, and adjourned till Tuesday.

Tuesday, September 1, 1807.

Mr. Hay informed the court that he had nothing to offer to the jury of evidence or argument; that he had examined the opinion of the court, and must leave the case with the jury. The jury accordingly retired, and in a short time returned with the following verdict, which was read by Colonel Carrington, their foreman: "We of the jury say that Aaron Burr is not proved to be guilty under this indictment by any evidence submitted to us. We therefore find him not guilty." This verdict was objected to by Colonel Burr and his counsel as unusual, informal, and irregular. Colonel Burr observed that wherever a verdict is informal the court will either send back the jury to alter it, or correct it itself; that they had no right to depart from the usual form; that the rule universally is to ask them on their return, "How say you? is he guilty or not guilty?" to which they give a direct answer of "guilty," or "not guilty." That this is correct and responsive to the charge always read to them by the clerk, "If you find him guilty, you are to say so, &c; if you find him not guilty, you are to say so and no more."

Mr. Hay thought the verdict ought to be recorded as found by the jury, which was substantially a verdict of acquittal; and that no principle of humanity, policy, or law, forbade its being received in the very terms used by the jury; that they were not bound to find a verdict in the shortest possible way; that the form did not affect the substance.

Mr. Martin said that it was like the whole play, "Much Ado about Nothing;" that this was a verdict of acquittal; that there was nothing to do but to answer the question of guilty or not guilty; that it was the case with every jury in every instance; they had or had not evidence before them. Did they wish to have the verdict entered in this form on the record, as a censure on the court for suppressing irrelevant testimony? That he was conscious they had no such meaning; and as they had not, the jury ought to answer the question judicially addressed to them simply by a verdict of not guilty, as that was their intention.

Colonel Carrington, one of the jury, observed that it was said among themselves that if the verdict was informal they would alter it; that it was, in fact, a verdict of acquittal.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said that the verdict was, in effect, the same as a verdict of acquittal; that it might stand on the bill as it was if the jury wished it; and an entry should be made on the record of "not guilty."

Mr. Parker, another of the jury, said that if he were to be sent back he would find the same verdict; that they all knew that it was not in the usual form, but it was more satisfactory to the jury as they had found it; and that he would not agree to alter it.

After some further desultory remarks by several of the counsel, Mr. Hay, in answer to the observation that the only correct form was guilty or not guilty, reminded the court of the case of Rex v. Woodfall [5 Burrows, 2661], for a libel, where the jury departed from the usual form, added other words, and found a verdict in these words: "We find the defendant guilty of publishing only." This form, though preferred by the jury, was probably disapproved of by the counsel; but it was taken by the court as they presented it; and, in the case of Rex v. Williams [unreported], cited in Woodfall's Case by the court, the jury added other words to the usual form of finding the defendant guilty; and as it did not affect the substance, it was entered up by the clerk "Guilty;" and no objection was ever made.

The court then decided that the verdict should remain as found by the jury; and that an entry should be made on the record of "Not Guilty."

The CHIEF JUSTICE politely thanked the jury for their patient attention during the whole course of this long trial, and then discharged them.

NOTE A. 1. The important question whether, under our constitution, a person can commit the crime of treason by merely advising and inciting others to levy war against the United States, without being personally present where war is actually levied by an assemblage of men in a "posture of war," and without doing any overt act constituting a "part" in the fact of levying war, still remains undetermined by any express adjudication. The argument that the constitutional definition of treason can not be extended beyond the plain, natural import of the words, by the interpolation of the common law rule, that whatever will make a man an accessory in felony will render him a principal in treason, is certainly a forcible one; but not conclusive to the minds of all who have investigated the subject. While Chief Justice Marshall, in this case, carefully abstained from pronouncing, judicially, any opinion upon this question, he intimated that, individually, he entertained one; and he stated the argument in favor of the more limited construction so forcibly as to leave little doubt as to what that individual opinion was. Some loose dicta may be found, both prior and subsequent to this trial, recognizing the doctrine that the common law rule above referred to is in full force in this country; but nothing having the semblance of judicial authority. Judge Chase, in his charge to the jury on the second trial of Fries, said: "In treason, all the participes criminis are principals; there are no accessories in this crime. Every act which in the case of felony would render a man an accessory, will, in the case of treason, make him a principal." Professor Greenleaf, in his valuable and generally accurate work on the Law of Evidence (volume 3, § 245), has attached undue importance to this extra-judicial remark. In his text he lays down, as a rule of law, the precise proposition above quoted, and in a note referring to the case of Fries, says: "No exception was taken to this doctrine, in that case, though the prisoner was defended by the ablest counsel of that day, and the case was one of deep political interest." This is certainly a remarkable error, in view of the notorious historical fact that on said second trial Fries was wholly without counsel. His counsel in the former trial, Messrs. Lewis and Dallas, withdrew from the case before the jury were sworn, on the second trial; and it was the announcement of Judge Chase that he should deliver to the jury, at the commencement of the trial, the very opinion from which the above quotation is made, and not permit counsel to controvert any of its positions, that caused them to abandon the defence. And this arbitrary conduct on the part of Judge Chase is the basis of the first charge in the first article of impeachment on which he was subsequently tried before the United States senate. But even if Fries had been defended by counsel, they would not have had the slightest occasion to except to this doctrine, as it could not possibly have any bearing on his case, he having been, according to his own admission, not only present when the war was alleged to have been levied, but the leader and commander of the band of insurgents who committed the hostile acts charged in the indictment. It is here worthy of remark, that while this very question commanded a large share of the attention of the counsel and the court throughout the trial of Colonel Burr, and Fries's Case was frequently cited on other points, the remark of Judge Chase above quoted was never once referred to in support of the position that the common law rule in regard to accessories in treason was in force in this country. Mr. Wickham referred to it once, but only to show its inconsistency with the position assumed by the same judge in the same trial; that English authorities were not to be regarded as precedents in our courts, in prosecutions for treason. But the opinion of Judge Chase in Warrall's Case, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 384, was frequently referred to, and urged with much force, in support of the contrary doctrine, viz.: that the federal courts have no common law jurisdiction in criminal cases: and hence that the constitutional definition of treason could not be extended by the application of common law rules. In fact, no judge ever more stoutly contended against the doctrine that common law crimes were cognizable in the federal courts (unless made so by express statute) than he did. He notified the counsel of Fries, before the trial commenced, "that he would not suffer the decisions at common law, and those under the statute of Edward III., to be read." Testimony of Wm. Lewis, 1 Chase, Tr. p. 129. And this was the basis of another charge in his impeachment. An essay on the law of treason, in the Boston Law Reporter of 1851 (volume 14, p. 416), and which has been cited in some of our standard elementary works on criminal law, lays down the proposition in still more positive terms. The writer says: "It is now too well settled to admit of question, that the law knows no accessories in treason; but that every one who, if it were a felony, would be an accessory, is, in the law of treason, a principal traitor. This rule, being now a constituent part of the law of treason, as administered in this country ever since its settlement, and in England for several centuries, its origin and history are of no importance. It is sufficient for us that it is a part of the law of the land." And yet in support of this broad assertion not a single adjudication of any American court is or can be cited. The writer refers only to the dictum of Judge Chase above quoted. Judge Grier, in Hanway's Case, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 144, said, in his charge to the jury: "An abettor in murder, in order to be held liable as a principal in the felony, must be present at the transaction; if absent he may be an accessory. But in treason all are principals, and a man may be guilty of aiding and abetting, though not present." This language, strangely enough, has been understood by some as expressing an opinion upon the very question which Chief Justice Marshall so cautiously reserved. But when carefully examined it will be found not to go a single step further than Judge Marshall went. He expressly held, in Burr's Case, that all who are guilty of treason at all, under the constitution and statute, are guilty as principals. He expressly held, too, that a man may be guilty of aiding and abetting in treason, though not present; "however remote from the scene of action." The question upon which he reserved his opinion was, whether a man can be guilty of treason by merely advising, inciting, and instigating others to commit it; and upon this question Judge Grier expressed no opinion in Hanway's Case [supra]. He did not say, as Judge Chase had said, that "every act which in case of felony would render a man an accessory, will, in the case of treason, make him a principal." It is to be presumed that he deliberately stopped short of this; for mere advising and inciting will render a man an accessory in felony, without the performance of any overt act. There was nothing in the facts of Hanway's Case to call for an opinion on the question which Chief Justice Marshall deemed of such "vast importance" that no tribunal inferior to the supreme court of the United States ought to express an opinion upon it, unless a pending case should absolutely require it; inasmuch as Hanway was notoriously present, taking a leading part in the transactions which were charged as a levying of war. It may be safely asserted, that no decision in this country, having the weight of judicial authority, has gone a single step beyond the proposition laid down in the opinion of the supreme court, per Marshall, C. J., in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout. And that proposition, as interpreted by the same eminent jurist in Burr's Case, is in substance this: That when war is actually levied by an "assemblage of men," in a "posture of war," for a treasonable object, any one who, being leagued in the general conspiracy, performs any overt act constituting a "part" in such fact of levying war, however remote from the scene of action, or however minute that part, is guilty as a principal traitor. The learned chief justice was very careful to explain, in Burr's Case, that the person "remote" from the scene of war, but performing a "part" therein, was not implicated in the crime of treason by virtue of the common law rule that "in treason all are principals," but on the ground that the fact of levying war may consist of a multiplicity of acts, performed in different places, by different persons. After laying down the proposition "that those who perform a part in the prosecution of the war may correctly be said to levy war and to commit treason under the constitution," he adds: "It will be observed that this opinion does not extend to the case of a person who performs no act in the prosecution of the war—who counsels and advises it—or who, being engaged in the conspiracy, fails to perform his part. Whether such persons may be implicated by the doctrine, that whatever would make a man an accessory in felony makes him a principal in treason, or are excluded because that doctrine is inapplicable to the United States, the constitution having declared that treason shall consist only in levying war, and having made the proof of overt acts necessary to a conviction, is a question of vast importance, which it would be proper for the supreme court to take a fit occasion to decide, but which an inferior tribunal would not willingly determine unless the case before them should require it." In another place, referring to the opinion of the supreme court in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout, he says: "This opinion does not touch the case of a person who advises or procures an assemblage, and does nothing more." And subsequently, in an opinion delivered during the pendency of the motion to commit Burr, Blennerhassett and Smith, he took occasion very emphatically to deny that the proposition laid down by the supreme court, that "a man leagued in the conspiracy may become a traitor by performing a part distinct from that of appearing in arms," involved the adoption of the common law doctrine in relation to accessorial acts in treason. Carp. Rep. 3 Burr. Tr. p. 152. The distinction is this: At common law an accessory may become a principal in treason without performing any overt act, mere advising or inciting being sufficient to implicate him as a principal in the crime of those who do commit the overt act. But the proposition laid down by the supreme court requires the actual commission of an overt act, constituting, a "part" in the fact of levying war, to implicate an absent person in the crime. This distinction, however, appears to have been wholly lost sight of by Judge Kane, in a charge delivered to the grand jury in Philadelphia, in 1851, at the term in which Hanway was indicted. He says: "Though he [the accused] was absent at the time of its actual perpetration, yet if he directed the act, devised, or knowingly furnished the means for carrying it into effect, instigating others to perform it, he shares their guilt. In treason there are no accessories." In another place he says: "Successfully to instigate treason is to commit treason." These mere obiter dicta of a district judge, thrown out in a charge to the grand jury, derive their only consequence from the fact that Judge Grier, subsequently, in his charge to the petit jury in Hanway's Case, expressed his general concurrence in the doctrines and sentiments of said charge to the grand jury delivered by Judge Kane. But, as has been before stated, there was nothing in Hanway's Case to call for any opinion on the question now under consideration; and it is not to be presumed that Judge Grier intended to affirm the doctrines laid down by Judge Kane in his charge to the grand jury, except in so far as they had some bearing on the case before him.

2. Whether a particular act, performed by an absentee, will constitute a "part" in the fact of levying war in another place, within the meaning of the supreme court, may of course sometimes be the subject of grave doubt. The same difficulty will arise that is always liable to arise in applying general rules to special cases. It must, however, be an "overt act," and must be directly and immediately ancillary to the principal act of war specified in the indictment; otherwise it cannot constitute a "part" thereof. Chief Justice Marshall says: "This part, however remote or minute, constitutes the overt act of which alone the person who performs it can be convicted." It is manifest, however, that he did not mean to say that it must be such an act as of itself would constitute the crime of treason; for in another place he says: "If, for example, an army should be actually raised for the avowed purpose of carrying on an open war against the United States and subverting their government, the point must be weighed very deliberately, before a judge would venture to decide that an overt act of levying war had not been committed by a commissary of purchases, who never saw the army, but who, knowing its object, and leaguing himself with the rebels, supplied that army with provisions; or by a recruiting officer holding a commission in the rebel service, who, though never in camp, executed the particular duty assigned to him." Yet it is clear that neither the purchasing of military supplies, nor the enlisting of soldiers, though for a treasonable object, will constitute the crime of treason, unless done in connection with and ancillary to some more positive act of war. There must at least be an actual "assembling of men" in "a posture of war," to which such acts have relation, and are ancillary, before they can constitute the crime of treason. In England, as remarked by Chief Justice Marshall, the courts have had no occasion to distinguish between such acts, performed by a person remote from the scene of actual war, as constitute a "part" in the fact of levying war, and so would make him a principal independently of the common law rule which converts all accessories in treason into principals, and such as are purely accessorial in their character; because the operation of that rule renders any such distinction wholly unnecessary. But if said common law rule is not in force in this country, the distinction must be drawn; and in some cases it will be found an extremely subtile one. It is clear that independently of the common law rule above referred to, mere advising and inciting others to levy war would not constitute the crime of treason, though war should actually be levied pursuant to such advice or incitement. It is not so clear, however, that commanding others to levy war, by a person in a situation to enforce obedience to his commands, would not constitute an overt act in the war actually levied in pursuance of such command. Yet in England the distinction between an imperative command and mere advice or incitement is an immaterial one, and hence no attempt has been made to define it. In the foregoing remarks it has not been the object of the writer to show what the decisions of our courts ought to be, on the question under consideration, but simply to show that the English doctrine, that whatever will render a man an accessory in felony will make him a principal in treason, has never yet been established by judicial authority as the law of treason in this country, and that the question is still an open one, notwithstanding the dicta of some judges and elementary writers to the contrary.

3. It is manifest that while the treasonable assemblage which alone can constitute a levying of war may be limited to a particular place in a particular state or district, an auxiliary act, constituting a part in the war there levied, may be performed in a different state or district. For instance, while the rebel army is besieging a fort or a city in one state, a confederate may be forwarding to that army reinforcements, arms, ammunition and supplies from another state, hundreds of miles distant. In such a case there can scarcely be a doubt that the acts of the distant confederate would constitute such a part in the war levied by the besieging army as would, within the meaning of the supreme court in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout, and of Chief Justice Marshall in Burr's Case, implicate him in the crime of treason there consummated. But in neither of said cases is it expressly stated in what district such "remote" abettor would be liable to prosecution; whether in that where he performed the auxiliary part, or that in which the principal act of levying war was actually committed. It would seem to be fairly inferable from some portions of the opinion delivered in Burr's Case, that unless the person performing such auxiliary part was near enough to the scene of hostile demonstration to be "of the particular party" there assembled, and in such a situation of ability to render them immediate aid as would make him a principal in the second degree in case of felony, he would only be subject to prosecution in the district where he performed the auxiliary acts implicating him in the crime. Other passages in the same opinion quite as clearly indicate that on an indictment specially charging the facts, he might be prosecuted in the district where the principal act of levying war was committed, though not present at the treasonable assemblage, and though he performed in a distant state or district the part implicating him in the crime. For instance, in one part of the opinion the chief justice says: "If, under this indictment, the United States might be let in to prove the part performed by the prisoner, if he did perform any part, the court could not stop the testimony in its present stage." The implication is clear, that the prisoner might have performed, in Kentucky, a part in a war prosecuted on Blennerhassett's Island. It is equally clear that evidence of the performance of such part was only inadmissible on account of the generality of the indictment, charging him as if actually present with the party on the island; and, as a necessary corollary, that he might have been prosecuted in Virginia for an auxiliary part performed in Kentucky, on a proper indictment, specially charging the facts. This may become a very important question in connection with the current rebellion, and therefore deserves consideration. If a person, performing in one district an act constituting an auxiliary part in the fact of levying war in another district, is liable to prosecution in the place where the principal act is committed, then in case the chief of the rebel conspiracy, or his secretary of war, or any of his principal coadjutors, should ever fall into our hands, all that would be necessary to convict either of them of treason in Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, or Indiana, would be to prove that he had performed in Virginia some act immediately ancillary to the invasions of the two former states by the rebel army under Lee or Early, or of the two latter by the marauders under John Morgan. If (as has been decided by the supreme court) a person performing in one place an act auxiliary to the fact of levying war in another place, "however remote," thereby becomes a principal in the crime of treason, it is believed that, on well established general principles, he will be subject to prosecution in the place where the principal act of levying war, to which his auxiliary act relates, is committed; whatever may have been the opinion entertained by Chief Justice Marshall on the subject. The general principle is believed to be well established, that where a crime is commenced in one place and consummated in another, or where it consists of several acts performed by different persons and in different places, any person implicated as a principal in the crime is liable to prosecution in the place where the crime is consummated, or where the principal act, which gives character to the crime, is committed. Numerous authorities in support of this principle will be found cited in the standard elementary books on criminal law; and the most important are referred to in the case particularly noticed in the succeeding paragraph. The case of People v. Adams, 3 Denio, 190; Id., 1 Comst. [1 N. Y.] 173, is an authority precisely in point on the question under consideration. Adams was indicted in the city of New York for obtaining a large sum of money from a firm in that city by means of fictitious receipts signed by a forwarder in Ohio, falsely acknowledging the delivery to him of a quantity of pork and lard for the use and subject to the order of said firm. He pleaded specially to the indictment, that he was a natural born citizen of Ohio, and had always resided there, and had never been in the state of New York; that the receipts were drawn and signed in Ohio, and that the offence was committed by their being presented in New York by innocent agents employed by the defendant in Ohio. This plea was demurred to, and after elaborate argument by the ablest counsel that money could command, the demurrer was sustained, first in the supreme court, and subsequently in the court of appeals. The decision turned upon the point that Adams, having employed innocent agents to consummate the crime in New York, was guilty as a principal, (there being no other guilty person to whose crime his acts could be accessorial;) and being guilty as a principal, he was liable to prosecution in the place where the crime was consummated, though not present, nor even within the general jurisdiction of the state. Now let us apply the principles of this case to the question under consideration. The supreme court has decided that when the crime of treason is consummated by an open act of war committed in one place, whoever performs a part in that war, "however minute or remote from the scene of action," thereby becomes a principal in the crime of treason. And in the New York case just cited, it was decided that whoever is guilty as a principal in any crime is liable to prosecution in the place where the crime is consummated, though not present at that place. Does it not follow, that any one who, in Richmond or elsewhere, performed any act immediately ancillary to the war which was prosecuted in Pennsylvania by the rebel army, in 1863, and thereby became a principal in the crime of treason there consummated, is liable to prosecution in Pennsylvania?

4. Professor Greenleaf, in his work on the Law of Evidence (volume 3, § 243), says it is on the ground of constructive presence "that if war is levied with an organized military force, vexillis explicatis, all those who perform the various military parts of prosecuting the war, which must be assigned to different persons, may justly be said to levy war;" and adds: "All that is necessary to implicate them is, to prove that they were leagued in the conspiracy, and performed a part in that which constituted the overt act, or was immediately ancillary thereto:" (citing Burr's Case.) The author of the essay on the law of treason in the Boston Law Reporter of 1851, (hereinbefore referred to,) takes the same ground; also citing Burr's Case. But however logical it might be to hold that, when war is actually levied by an organized military force in one place, any one who, being leagued in the general conspiracy, performs any part therein, at another and "remote" place, should be considered as constructively present where the principal act of levying war is committed, it is far from being clear that Chief Justice Marshall intended to assert or admit this principle. Indeed, many expressions in his opinion would seem to imply that he held directly the contrary doctrine. It is true that his argument was mainly addressed to the broader proposition, that any one who advises or procures a treasonable assemblage, constituting an overt act of levying war, is to be considered as constructively present at that assemblage, though in fact hundreds of miles distant. But it is difficult to reconcile his ruling, as well as many of his expressions, with any other opinion than that, where an auxiliary act constituting a part in the fact of levying war is performed at a great distance from the scene of the treasonable assemblage, the absent abettor cannot be considered as constructively present at the assemblage. If he could be held constructively present, evidence of his auxiliary acts would be admissible under an indictment charging him generally, as if actually present; for there is no principle in criminal pleading better settled, than that a principal in the second degree, who is constructively, but not actually present at the fact, may be charged generally with committing the fact. But in Burr's Case it was decided that the evidence of acts done at a great distance from Blennerhassett's Island was inadmissible, because the indictment charged the defendant as being present at the island where the treasonable assemblage was alleged to have taken place. The passage from Chief Justice Marshall's opinion above quoted, where he says, "If, under this indictment, the United States might be let in to prove the part performed by the prisoner, if he did perform any part, the court could not stop the testimony in its present stage," seems to be susceptible of no other interpretation than this. The reader will find in that opinion other passages equally difficult to reconcile with the doctrine that all who are implicated in the crime of levying war are to be considered as constructively present at the principal scene of the hostile demonstration. While, as has been shown, the theory that in treason the doctrine of constructive presence is to be so extended as to embrace all who perform any part in the fact of levying war by an organized military force, "however remote from the scene of action," does not seem to be sustained either by the reasoning or the ruling of the court in Burr's Case, yet so far as the question now under consideration is concerned, it is deemed to be wholly immaterial upon what theory the absent abettor becomes a principal in the crime, provided he becomes so independently of the common law rule which converts all accessories in treason into principals. It is sufficient that he is a principal, and being such the general rule applies, that he is liable to prosecution where the crime is actually consummated. Whether he becomes a principal on the theory of constructive presence, or on some other theory, independent of the common law rule above referred to, is only important as a question of pleading. If constructively present, he may be charged in the indictment as if actually present. Otherwise the indictment must be special, showing his absence; as was held to be necessary in Burr's Case.

5. It has been supposed by some writers that there is a very great hardship involved in holding a man liable to prosecution for treason in a state or district where he never may have been in his life. But this hardship, if it be one, is not peculiar to prosecutions for treason. Nor is it perceived what reasonable cause any man can have to complain that he is subjected to a prosecution in the place where his criminal acts take effect, and where he intended that they should take effect, though, from the nature of the crime, it was susceptible of being initiated at another place, and was consummated without his personal presence. Professor Tucker puts the case of a person in Maryland, hearing of Fries's insurrection in Pennsylvania, and lending a horse or money to a person avowedly going to join the insurgents, in order to assist him on his journey: and asks if this would amount to levying war in Pennsylvania, where the lender never was? 4 Tuck. Bl. Comm. Append. B. It may be answered, that if the lender was leagued in the general conspiracy, and furnished the horse or the money for the purpose of reinforcing the insurgents by sending them a recruit, he would clearly be guilty of treason, according to the doctrine announced by the supreme court in the Case of Bollman and Swartwout, and by Chief Justice Marshall in Burr's Case. And yet the act would be treason in Maryland only in virtue of its relation to and connection with the insurrection in Pennsylvania, where it was intended to take effect and do its mischief. Suppose, instead of lending a horse or money to a recruit, he should send a wagon load of arms and ammunition to the insurgents, to be used by them in the war they were then prosecuting for the subversion of the government; would it be a peculiarly hard case that he should be subjected to prosecution in the state where lives were actually destroyed by his act, and in pursuance of his intentions? If a person in Baltimore should send by express to a person in Philadelphia, with intent to destroy his life, an "infernal machine" concealed in a box, and the receiver, on opening the box, should be killed by the explosion, it is beyond question that the author of the crime would be liable to prosecution for murder in Philadelphia, although he may never have been in that city, or in the state of Pennsylvania in his life. But suppose instead of sending an "infernal machine," intended to destroy the life of one man, he should send a box of arms and ammunition to a rebel army in open war, intended not only to destroy the lives of many men, but to aid in subverting the government; would not the reasons for holding him subject to prosecution in Pennsylvania (independent of all arbitrary rules of law) be quite as strong as in the other case? If, therefore, it is a general rule of law applicable to other crimes, that whoever is implicated as a principal is liable to prosecution in the state or district where the crime is consummated, there can be no good reason for making an exception to the general rule in the case of treason, on the ground that it will work a peculiar hardship to the accused.

6. Chief Justice Marshall, in his opinion in Burr's Case, says: "If a rebellion should be so extensive as to spread through every state in the Union, it will scarcely be contended that every individual concerned in it is legally present at every overt act committed in the course of that rebellion. It would be a very violent presumption indeed—too violent to be made without clear authority—to presume that even the chief of the rebel army was legally present at every such overt act. If the main rebel army, with the chief at its head, should be prosecuting war at one extremity of our territory, say in New Hampshire; if this chief should be there captured and sent to the other extremity for the purpose of trial; if his indictment, instead of alleging an overt act, which was true in point of fact, should allege that he had assembled some small party, which in truth he had not seen, and had levied war by engaging in a skirmish in Georgia at a time when in reality he was fighting a battle in New Hampshire; if such evidence would support such an indictment by the fiction that he was legally present though really absent, all would ask to what purpose are those provisions in the constitution which direct the place of trial and ordain that the accused shall be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation?" Although the question to which these remarks had immediate application was as to the form of the indictment, it is perhaps fairly to be inferred that, in the opinion of the chief justice, in the case supposed, the chief of the rebel army would not be subject to prosecution in Georgia, under any form of indictment. And if (as is rather implied than expressed) it is to be supposed that he had no direct agency in prosecuting the skirmish in Georgia, and performed no part therein, this would undoubtedly be true. But let us suppose another case: Let us suppose that the chief of the rebel army in Georgia, during the present rebellion, should detach a portion of the troops under his command and send them by sea to attack and capture one of the seaboard towns of New Hampshire, furnishing them with all the arms and munitions of war necessary to that end; and that the expedition should succeed in accomplishing its object. Would not the rebel commander perform such a part in the capture of the town as would render him a principal in the crime of treason there consummated? And would he not, on general principles, be liable to prosecution in New Hampshire? If not, then an American citizen who should go into a foreign country—one of the West India Islands for instance—and there fit out, arm, equip, and man a fleet of war vessels, and send them to bombard and capture any one of our Atlantic cities, but remain behind himself, would be guilty of treason nowhere, and might return to the United States with impunity. Suppose that while the battles of South Mountain and Antietam were going on, the chief of ordnance of the rebel army had been stationed at Martinsburg, Virginia, from which point he was sending arms and ammunition to his confederates, engaged in battle in Maryland; would he not have been guilty of levying war in Maryland? If so, could it make any difference that he was similarly engaged at Richmond instead of Martinsburg? In either case the hostile acts would take effect and do their mischief in Maryland; and it is believed that the author of them would be answerable in Maryland, just as much as if, standing on the Virginia side of the Potomac, he had fired a gun into the ranks of our army stationed on the Maryland side of the river.

7. If the principle here contended for be tenable, it does not follow that an abettor, performing an auxiliary part in a war actually levied in another state, would be liable to prosecution only in the state where the principal act of levying war was committed. It is a general, though not a universal rule of law, that when a crime consists of several acts performed in different places, or is commenced in one place and consummated in another, any person implicated as a principal in the crime may be prosecuted either in the place where the crime is consummated, or that in which he personally performs the act which implicates him in it. Rex v. Brisac, 4 East, 164; Rex v. Burdett, 4 Barn. & Ald. 95; Girdwood's Case, 2 East, P. C. 1120; Fost. P. C. 349; People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 229. Upon the authority of these cases, and many others that might be cited, there can be no doubt that a person who, being leagued in the rebel conspiracy, should in Maryland purchase supplies or enlist men and forward them to the rebel army in Virginia, would be liable to prosecution for treason in Maryland. To the rule last laid down there is, however, at least one exception. The crime may have been commenced, or the auxiliary act which implicates the accused in it may have been performed in a foreign country, out of the general jurisdiction of the United States; in which case he could only be prosecuted in the state or district where the crime was consummated. In the case of People v. Adams, above cited, the acts performed by the defendant, in person, were all performed in a foreign state, and therefore he was not liable to prosecution at all in the place where he committed those acts; at least not liable under the laws of New York.

NOTE B. The reasonableness of the doctrine that treason by levying war may be committed without "the actual application of violence to external objects," is forcibly illustrated by the history of the current Rebellion in this country. It is believed that in some of the revolting states the authority of the federal government was completely subverted, and a revolutionary government, de facto, carried into full effect, without the commission of any acts of violence within their limits. Ordinances of secession were passed, renouncing all connection with or subordination to the federal government, and instituting new forms of government entirely independent thereof, which were carried into practical effect without the slightest physical opposition. Such was the unanimity of public sentiment, or the terror inspired by the energy, activity, and preparation of the leading conspirators, that no opposition was attempted by any portion of the people of those states, and there being no federal troops there to enforce the authority of the general government, these revolutionary measures were effectuated without "the application of violence to external objects," simply because there were no external objects present which it became necessary to employ force or violence against. Undoubtedly, in all these cases, the acts above referred to were accompanied by some concurrent acts of preparation for war, such as the organization and embodiment of troops; so that there was, perhaps, an actual "military array," and "posture of war." But according to the doctrine contended for by Mr. Burr's counsel, (especially Mr. Martin,) there could have been no treason committed in such states until there was actual violence committed. We may, indeed, imagine a case where the authority of the general government would be completely subverted in a state, without even a display of any such potential force as is said to consist in the "assembling and marching of troops," and in assuming "a posture of war." The legislature or a state convention might pass an ordinance of secession, and institute a revolutionary government, without making the slightest preparation for maintaining their position by military force. The state might be so surrounded by other revolted states, and public sentiment among its own citizens might be so unanimous, that any immediate preparation for maintaining their position by military force might be deemed unnecessary. All local federal officers might join in the conspiracy, or cease to perform their functions through fear; and so the authority of the federal government might be completely subverted: not only without any actual war, but without any preparation for war. It is not probable that any state assuming to secede from the Union so utterly neglected all preparations for war as this; but in every other respect the supposed case is only a statement of what actually did occur in more than one state. In the case supposed, could the legitimate government be entirely subverted throughout the state, without the guilt of treason being incurred by any one of its citizens? The proposition that it could be is a startling one; and yet there would be no such overt act of levying war as, according to the decisions of the courts, would seem to be an indispensable element in the crime of treason. It might be supposed, by unprofessional readers at least, that the persons by whose acts the authority of the federal government in a state was thus subverted, would be guilty of treason under that clause of the constitution which relates to "adhering to the enemies of the United States, giving them aid and comfort." But conceding that in this Rebellion every state which passed an ordinance of secession, did, by that act alone, give aid and comfort to the rebels in arms, and that the passing of an ordinance of secession is an act of adhesion to the rebel cause, it is doubtful, to say the least, whether the crime of treason can be committed in this country by adhering and giving aid and comfort to rebels. In England, under that clause of the statute of 25 Edw. III., from which this clause of our constitution is copied, it has always been held that treason could not be committed by adhering and giving aid and comfort to British subjects in rebellion. In other words, that the "enemies" referred to in that clause of the statute are foreign enemies, and not rebels. It is true that in England a person giving aid and comfort to rebels in arms against the government might be guilty of treason; but according to the decisions of the courts it would be treason in compassing the death of the king, or by reason of being accessorial to the levying of war, and not under the clause of the statute which relates to adhering to the king's enemies, giving them aid and comfort. As our constitution has adopted the words of this statute, our courts will give to those words the same construction which the courts of Great Britain had given to them previous to their adoption. No one has ever contended that our courts should give them a broader construction. No question as to the construction of this clause of the constitutional definition of treason arose in the trial of Col. Burr, as he was not indicted under it. But in reference to the other clause, Chief Justice Marshall said it was "scarcely conceivable that the term 'levying war' was not employed by the framers of our constitution in the same sense which had been affixed to it by those from whom we borrowed it." It is believed that in no decision of any of our courts has any construction of this second clause of the constitutional definition of treason ever been given. It has been reported that Mr. Justice Swayne, of the supreme court, early in this Rebellion, in a case which came before him in the Southern district of Ohio, held that treason under this clause of the constitution could not be committed by giving aid and comfort to the rebels; but in fact, as the writer has been informed by Judge Swayne himself, his decision did not turn on that question. It is believed, however, that the courts will be constrained so to decide whenever the question shall come directly before them. It was in view of this doctrine, probably, that congress passed the second section of the act of July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion," &c. (chapter 95 [12 Stat. 589]), which provides: "That if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States, or the laws thereof, or shall engage in, or give aid or comfort to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by the liberation of all his slaves, or by both of said punishments, at the discretion of the court." In view of the constructions which the courts of this country have given, and will probably be constrained to give, to the constitutional definition of treason, this is a most important statute, in reference to the existing Rebellion. Adherents to the rebel cause are numerous in some of the loyal states, and are daily doing acts which give aid and comfort to the Rebellion. Military arrests for acts of this description are very common; but as yet there have been comparatively few prosecutions in our civil courts of criminal jurisdiction. Perhaps if grand juries and district attorneys were more vigilant, there would be less necessity for military arrests and military trials in such cases; although, as long as the war lasts, it cannot be expected that military trials will be superseded by prosecutions in the civil courts. Without the aid of the law above cited, it is at least doubtful whether many of the acts of aid and encouragement to the Rebellion which it unquestionably covers, could be punished at all by prosecutions in our civil tribunals; especially if it should be finally decided that the common law rule which makes all accessories in treason principals, is not in force in this country. But this statute clearly reaches all cases, as well of mere advice or incitement of treason in levying war, as of aid and comfort to rebels in arms. It will therefore be the safest course, in all prosecutions against persons who have not clearly been guilty of levying war against the United States, according to the strictest construction of the constitution, to proceed under this statute, rather than for treason. It is true that the penalty prescribed by this statute is less severe than may be inflicted on conviction of treason. But the first section of the same act gives the court a discretion to inflict even a less penalty for treason than may be inflicted on a conviction under said second section. And since this discretion has been vested in the courts, it is not probable that the death penalty would ever be inflicted upon any but the most notorious and culpable traitors, even if convicted of treason. Another reason for proceeding under the statute of 1862, instead of prosecuting for treason, in all doubtful cases, is, that the defendant will not have the right to challenge, peremptorily, thirty-five jurors.

NOTE C. Although the question did not arise in Burr's Case, it may not be amiss here to remark, that some difference of opinion formerly prevailed in this country, whether the crime of treason can be committed without a levying of war with intent entirely to subvert the government of the United States. Mr. Martin, in a part of his final speech in Burr's Case which is not here given, expressed a very decided opinion that the decisions of the courts in Pennsylvania, in the prosecutions growing out of "what were called the whisky and hot water insurrections," were erroneous: that the insurgents in those cases were not guilty of treason, because "there was no design to subvert the government." "Such a thought," he said, "was not entertained. It was the expression of their disapprobation of a particular law, and opposition to the execution of that unpopular law; and the intentions of those people went no further than to induce its repeal." Rob. Rep. 2 Burr. Tr. p. 274. But the doctrines laid down by the courts in the cases referred to, instead of being shaken by time, have been affirmed by several judges of the supreme court of the present day; and it may now be regarded as entirely settled, that any combination and assemblage of men, in force, to oppose generally the execution of any law, will be treasonable. But a combination and assemblage to resist the execution of a law in a particular case, as to prevent the arrest of a particular individual, if the intention be not to oppose the execution of the law in all cases, will only amount to a great riot, or to murder if lives are destroyed. The law was thus laid down by Mr. Justice Grier, in Hanway's Case, in perfect consistence with all the earlier decisions. Mr. Justice Curtis said, in a charge to the grand jury in 1851: "If a person against whom process has issued from a court of the United States, should assemble and arm his friends, forcibly to prevent an arrest, and, in pursuance of such design, resistance should be made by those there assembled, they would be guilty of a very high crime; but it would not be treason, if their combination had reference solely to that case. But if process of arrest issues under a law of the United States, and individuals assemble forcibly to prevent an arrest under such process, pursuant to a design to prevent any person from being arrested under that law, and pursuant to such intent force is used by them for that purpose, they are guilty of treason. The law does not distinguish between a purpose to prevent the execution of one, or several, or all laws. Indeed, such a distinction would be found impracticable, if it were attempted. If this crime could not be committed by forcibly resisting one law, how many laws should be thus resisted, to constitute it? Should it be two, or three, or what particular number? And if all, how easy would it be for the most of treasons to escape punishment, simply by excepting out of the reasonable design, some one law. So that a combination, formed to oppose the execution of a law by force, with the design of acting in any case which may occur and be within the reach of such combination, is a treasonable conspiracy, and constitutes one of the elements of this crime."

[4. A capias is the proper process to bring an accused in to answer to an indictment for an offense against the laws of the United States.]

[5. Where the accused is already in court, an order of the court will supply the place of a capias.]

[6. It is sufficient, in an affidavit, for the production of a paper in the possession of the prosecution, to aver that it "may be material" in the defense.]

[7. On a motion to compel the production of a letter written to the president of the United States, and in the hands of the prosecuting attorney, averred to be material to the defense, parts of it cannot be withheld, in the discretion of the prosecuting attorney, on the ground of public interest. The president alone may decide as to the propriety of withholding them, and he cannot delegate his discretion.]

[8. On the trial of an indictment for a misdemeanor, in beginning or setting on foot a military expedition against a nation at peace with the United States, containing no allusion to a conspiracy, the declarations of third persons, not forming a part of the transaction, and not made in the presence of the accused, are not admissible in evidence.]

[9. In such case the acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character or object of the expedition in question, are not admissible in evidence.]

[10. The acts of the accused in a different district, which constitute, in themselves, substantive causes for a prosecution, cannot be given in evidence, unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment.]

[11. Any legal testimony which shows the expedition in question to be military, or to have been designed against the dominions of the nation, as charged, is admissible.]

[At law. Trial of Aaron Burr for a misdemeanor, in beginning, setting on foot, and providing the means of, a military expedition against the dominions or territory of the king of Spain.]

At the meeting of the court on Wednesday, the 2d of September, 1807, Mr. Hay stated that according to his understanding of the opinion of the court delivered in the trial for treason [Case No. 14,693], the evidence of the transactions on Blennerhassett's Island did not come up to the constitutional crime of levying war; and so it would be improper to press the prosecution against Blennerhassett and Israel Smith. Under these circumstances he should enter a nolle prosequi as to the indictments for treason, and move to commit them, and also Mr. Burr, in order that they should be tried in the place where it should appear that the crime had been committed. He moved that Blennerhassett and Smith might be brought into court; and an order was made accordingly.

Mr. Burr then said that the motions were distinct against the several individuals, and they could not be combined. He insisted on a separate examination as to himself, and required a specification of the time and place when and where the offence was said to have been committed, that he might have an opportunity of meeting the testimony.

A debate of considerable length ensued on this motion.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice, finally remarked that as Col. Burr was now in custody of the marshal, and bound to answer an indictment for a misdemeanor, the court had no authority to send him to another district.

Mr. Hay said that all three were in the same situation, and the same difficulty applied to all. He regretted that the difficulty had not been adverted to at an earlier period, which would have saved much trouble; that he did not wish to disturb the opinion of the court, but would proceed with the trial of Col. Burr for a misdemeanor. He requested the clerk to read the indictment in the usual way, that they might proceed without issuing process to take the accused into custody, as he was in court.

The clerk was about to proceed, when Mr. Burr interrupted him, and said that he ought not to be arraigned, but to be permitted to plead by attorney. He said he was in court, not on that indictment, but because he had not moved to be discharged since his acquittal on the first indictment for treason. In this case he wished certain land-marks to be set up, in order to direct in future cases.

A protracted debate ensued, occupying the remainder of the day, in which Mr. Botts made a very long speech, and several of the counsel, on both sides, made shorter ones; all about the question whether a capias or a summons was the proper process to bring Col. Burr before the court, he being all the time in court, and participating in the debate.

[2] [MARSHALL, Chief Justice, said, that if a capias should be determined to be the proper process, he should consider the situation of the party, and direct that he should not be discharged till the cause was finally decided. If a capias should be considered not to be the proper process, a venire facias must be awarded. There was another consideration: If a venire facias issued, it would involve the right to a continuance of the cause till another term. He would consider that with the principal question.

[THE COURT took time to consider; and adjourned till to-morrow.

[Thursday, September 3, 1807.

[MARSHALL, Chief Justice. The question now before the court is whether bail be demandable from a person actually in custody, against whom an indictment for a misdemeanor has been found by a grand jury. As conducting directly to a decision of this point, the question has been discussed whether a summons or a capias would be the proper process to bring the accused in to answer the indictment, if, in point of fact, he were not before the court. It seems to be the established practice of Virginia in such cases to issue a summons in the first instance; and if by any act of congress the laws of the several states be adopted as the rules by which the courts of the United States are to be governed in criminal prosecutions, the question is at an end; for I should admit the settled practice of the state courts as the sound construction of the state law under which that practice has prevailed. The 34th section of the judicial act, it is contended, has made this adoption. The words of that section are "that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

[It might certainly be well doubted whether this section (if it should be construed to extend to all the proceedings in a case where a reference can be made to the state laws for a rule of decision at the trial) can comprehend a case where, at the trial in chief, no such reference can be made. Now in criminal cases the laws of the United States constitute the sole rule of decision; and no man can be condemned or prosecuted in the federal courts on a state law. The laws of the several states therefore cannot be regarded as rules of decision in trials for offences against the United States. It would seem to me too that the technical term, "trials at common law," used in the section, is not correctly applicable to prosecutions for crimes. I have always conceived them to be, in this section, applied to civil suits, as contradistinguished from criminal prosecutions, as well as to suits at common law as contradistinguished from those which come before the court sitting as a court of equity or admiralty. The provision of this section would seem to be inapplicable to original process, for another reason. The case is otherwise provided for by an act of congress. The 14th section of the judicial act empowers the courts of the United States "to issue all writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." This section seems to me to give this court power to devise the process for bringing any person before it who has committed an offence of which it has cognisance, and not to refer it to the state law for that process. The limitation on this power is, that the process shall be agreeable to the principles and usages of law. By which I understand those general principles and those general usages which are to be found not in the legislative acts of any particular state, but in that generally recognised and long established law, which forms the substratum of the laws of every state.

[Upon general principles of law it would seem to me that in all cases where the judgment is to affect the person, the person ought to be held subject to that judgment. Thus in civil actions, where the body may be taken in execution to satisfy the judgment, bail may be demanded. If the right of the plaintiff be supported by very strong probability, as in debt upon a specialty, bail is demandable without the intervention of a judge. If there be no such clear evidence of the debt, bail is often required upon the affidavit of the party. Now, reasoning by analogy from civil suits to criminal prosecutions, it would seem not unreasonable, where there is such evidence as an indictment found by a grand jury, to use such process as will hold the person of the accused within the power of the court, or furnish security that the person will be brought forward to satisfy the judgment of the court. Yet the course of the common law appears originally to have been otherwise. It appears from Hawkins that the practice of the English courts was to issue a venire facias in the first instance, on an indictment for a misdemeanor. This practice however is stated by Blackstone to have been changed. He says (volume 4, p. 319), "And so in the case of misdemeanors, it is now the usual practice for any judge of the court of king's bench, upon certificate of an indictment found, to award a writ of capias immediately, in order to bring in the defendant."

[It is then the English construction of the common law, that although in the inferior courts the venire facias might be the usual course, and although it had prevailed, yet that a judge of the king's bench might issue a capias in the first instance. This subject has always appeared to me to be in a great measure governed by the 33d section of the judicial act. That section provides, that for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in that state where he is found, be arrested and imprisoned or bailed as the case may be. This act contemplates an arrest, not a summons; and this arrest is to be, not solely for offences for which the state laws authorize an arrest, but "for any crime or offence against the United States." I do not understand the reference to the state law respecting the mode of process as overruling the preceding general words, and limiting the power of arrest to cases in which according to the state laws a person might be arrested, but simply as prescribing the mode to be pursued. Wherever, by the laws of the United States, an offender is to be arrested, the process of arrest employed in the state shall be pursued; but an arrest is positively enjoined for any offence against the United States. This construction is confirmed by the succeeding words: the offender shall be imprisoned or bailed as the case may be. There exists no power to direct the offender, or to bind him without bail, to appear before the court; which would certainly have been allowed had the act contemplated a proceeding in such a case which should leave the person at large without security. But he is absolutely to be imprisoned or bailed as the case may be.

[In a subsequent part of the same section it is enacted "that upon all arrests in criminal cases bail shall be admitted, except where the punishment may be death." There is no provision for leaving the person at large without bail; and I have ever construed this section to impose it as a duty on the magistrate who proceeds against any offender against the United States to commit or bail him. I perceive in the law no other course to be pursued. This section, it is true, does not respect the process upon an indictment. But the law would be inconsistent with itself if it required a magistrate to arrest for any offence against the United States, if it commanded him on every arrest to commit or to bail, and yet refused a capias and permitted the same offender to go at large, as soon as an indictment was found against him. This section therefore appears to me to be entitled to great influence in determining the court on the mode of exercising the power given by the 14th section in relation to process. On the impeachment which has been mentioned, this point was particularly committed to Mr. Lee, and the law upon it was fully demonstrated by him. The only difficulty I ever felt on this question was produced by the former decision of Judge Iredell. If the state practice on this subject had been adopted, I should have held myself bound by that adoption. But I do not consider the state practice as adopted. Mundell's Case [Case No. 15,834] was a civil suit; and the decision was that the state rule respecting bail in civil actions must prevail. Sinclair's Case [unreported] was indeed a case similar to this; and in Sinclair's Case a venire facias was issued. But I am informed by the clerk that this was his act, at the instance of the attorney, not the act of the court. The point was not brought before the court.

[In U. S. v. Callender [Case No. 14,709] a capias, or what is the same thing, a bench warrant was issued. This was the act of the court; but, not having been an act on argument, or with a view of the whole law of the case and of former decisions, I should not have considered it as overruling those decisions if such existed. But there has been no decision expressly adopting the state practice; and the decision in Callender's Case [supra] appears to me to be correct. I think the capias the more proper process. It is conformable to the practice of England at the time of our Revolution, and is, I think, in conformity with the spirit of the 33d section of the judicial act. I shall therefore adopt it. To issue the capias to take into custody a person actually in custody would be an idle ceremony. In such a case the order of the court very properly supplies the place of a capias. The only difference between proceeding by capias and by order, which I can perceive, would be produced by making the writ returnable to the next term.] [3]

Mr. Hay then said he would proceed to the trial of the indictment for a misdemeanor.

Mr. Burr then referred to the letter which had been demanded of the president, which had often been promised but not yet produced. He wished to know whether that letter was in court.

Mr. Hay said he did not know whether the original letter was among his papers or not. He had searched for it, but had not been able to find it. He had a copy, which was ready to be produced.

Mr. Burr said the president had promised that the letter should be produced, and it was strange that it was not here. He was not disposed to admit a copy.

After some further remarks by counsel, the CHIEF JUSTICE said, unless the loss of the original be proved, a copy cannot be admitted.

Mr. Burr then called the attention of the court to the subject of bail, (made necessary by the decision that a capias was the proper process to bring him before the court.)

After some discussion, the CHIEF JUSTICE fixed the amount of the bail at five thousand dollars.

The counsel for the prosecution here took the alarm, that taking bail might entangle the motion intended subsequently to be made to commit for treason in another state. A debate on this subject of considerable length ensued, in the course of which the CHIEF JUSTICE remarked that those who prosecuted had the choice of making the motion to commit for a greater crime by discontinuing the prosecution for a misdemeanor, or of persevering in the latter.

At the close of this discussion, resulting in nothing, Mr. Burr observed that he had discovered that a letter written by General Wilkinson on the 12th of November, 1806, to the president of the United States, was material to his defence.

Mr. Hay said he had that letter, and would produce it. But there were some matters in the letters of General Wilkinson which ought not to be made public. It would be extremely improper to submit the whole of his letters to public inspection. He was willing to put them in the hands of the clerk confidentially, and he could copy all those parts which had relation to the cause.

The counsel for Colonel Burr were not satisfied with this proposal. They demanded the whole letters.

Mr. Hay said he was willing that Mr. Botts, Mr. Wickham, and Mr. Randolph should examine them. He would depend on their candor and integrity to make no improper disclosures; and if there should be any difference of opinion as to what were confidential passages, the court should decide.

Mr. Martin objected to this as a secret tribunal. The counsel had a right to hear the letters publicly, without their consent.

Mr. Burr's counsel united in refusing to inspect anything that was not also submitted to the inspection of their client.

The CHIEF JUSTICE saw no real difficulty in the case. If there were any parts of the letters confidential, then a public examination would be very wrong; otherwise they ought to be read.

Mr. Hay said the president wrote to him when he understood the process had been awarded, that he had reserved to himself the province of deciding what parts of the letters ought to be published and what parts required to be kept secret; that they wished everything to be as public as possible except those parts which were really confidential. The discussion continued till the court adjourned.

Friday, September 4, 1807.

Colonel Burr renewed his application for the production of the two letters from General Wilkinson to the president of the United States, for one of which a subpœna duces tecum had been awarded. He said that the president was in contempt, and he had a right to demand process of contempt against him; but as it would be unpleasant to resort to such process, and it would produce delay, he hoped the letters would be produced. It might, perhaps, suffice to produce a copy, if duly authenticated, of that of October 21st, which was said to be lost or mislaid. As to the letter of the 12th of November, he had reason to believe that the whole letter had been shown to others to injure him, and as the whole letter had been used against him, the whole ought to be produced.

Mr. Hay said he did not know what was meant by the expression of such a belief or suspicion.

Mr. Burr said he would be more explicit; and asked whether this letter had not been used against him before the grand jury.

Mr. Hay said he could not be certain whether it was produced before the grand jury or not. He was not as well acquainted with what passed before the grand jury as some other gentlemen were.

A long and excited debate ensued, in which Mr. Burr's counsel insisted on the production of the whole letter, and Mr. Hay insisted on withholding certain passages. He said there were two passages in the letter which he could not submit to public inspection; and he did know that they could be extorted from him under any circumstances. Finally, the counsel of Colonel Burr applied for a subpœna duces tecum to Mr. Hay, which was awarded. To this Mr. Hay made a return, tendering a copy of the letter of 12th November, 1806, "excepting such parts thereof as are, in my opinion, not material for the purposes of justice, for the defence of the accused, or pertinent to the issue now about to be joined; the parts excepted being communicated to the president, and he having devolved on me the exercise of that discretion which constitutionally belongs to himself. The accuracy of this opinion I am willing to refer to the judgment of the court, by submitting the original letter to its inspection. I further certify, in order to show more clearly the irrelevancy of the parts excepted to any defence which can be set up in the present case, that these parts contain a communication of the opinion of the writer concerning certain persons, about which opinion, or the fact of his having communicated it, the writer, if a witness before the court, could not legally, as I conceive, be interrogated; and about which no evidence could legally be received from other persons."

The CHIEF JUSTICE asked if there were any objections to this return.

Mr. Burr said he could not be satisfied with a copy of part of the letter.

Mr. Botts said it would be a matter of the deepest regret if an attachment should go against Mr. Hay, and nothing would give him greater pain than to be under the necessity of making such a motion. To avoid this, there was another alternative, but which was, also, extremely disagreeable, as it would produce delay, viz: To move that the cause should be continued until the letter should be produced. He made that motion, and supported it by a speech of considerable length.

Other counsel followed, in a protracted debate on the motion. When the discussion ended the CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the following opinion:

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. [4] [It is not without regret that I find myself constrained to deliver an opinion on the present application. To overrule the motion may, at least, have the appearance of imposing a hardship on the prisoner, and to grant it may occasion delay in a case which all must desire to terminate. It is with regret that I decide a question under such circumstances, because it is probable that those parts of the letter which are withheld, are of much less importance than gentlemen suppose; and that the effect of their production would be to dissipate suspicions which are now entertained, and to show that the subject of the controversy is by no means proportioned to the zeal with which it has been maintained. Upon an affidavit made by the accused, a subpœna duces tecum has been awarded to the president of the United States, requiring the production of this letter. In consequence of this process the letter was transmitted to the attorney for the United States, accompanied with a communication from the president, authorizing the attorney to exercise his discretion in the case. In the exercise of this discretion, he has selected certain parts of the letter which he has determined to withhold, because he believes them to be confidential, and therefore such as ought not to be exhibited in public. If this might be likened to a civil case, the law is express on the subject. It is that either party may require the other to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue. In this respect the courts of law are invested with the power of a court of chancery, and if the order be disobeyed by the plaintiff, judgment as in the case of a nonsuit may be entered against him.

[Now, if a paper be in possession of the opposite party, what statement of its contents or applicability can be expected from the person who claims its production, he not precisely knowing its contents? If the opposite party be required to produce his books on a particular subject, it is not necessary that the entries on those books should be stated in order to entitle the applicant to his motion. He cannot be expected to make such a statement. It has always been deemed sufficient to describe the paper required, to express its general purport, and to state its materiality to the case in some degree, even when its contents are known. When a paper is in possession of one party, it is completely in his power, and is required by the other, very strong reasons must be given to justify its being withheld, if it have any relation to the case. Before a court would make a decisive order in such a case it certainly ought to receive reasonable satisfaction of the probable materiality of the evidence asked for and refused, and of its relation to the pending controversy; but the information to be required must depend on the nature of the case.

[Criminal cases, it is true, are not provided for; but courts will always apply the rules of evidence to criminal prosecutions so as to treat the defence with as much liberality and tenderness as the case will admit. The prosecutor is the representative of the government, and the government acts as a party through the agency of the attorney, who directs and manages the prosecution on behalf of government. If there be a paper in the possession of the executive, which is not of an official nature, he must stand, as respects that paper, in nearly the same situation with any other individual who possesses a paper which might be required for the defence. If the executive possess a paper which is really believed by the accused to be material to his defence, ought it to be withheld? The question will recur, is it really material to his defence? The only evidence that can be received on this point is from the party himself, and he has made his affidavit to its materiality. But that is said to be insufficient; and why? Because the averment is, that the letter "may be material" in the defence. Until the course of the prosecution shall be fully developed, it may not be in the power of the accused to make a more positive averment. The importance of the letter to the defence, may depend on the testimony adduced by the prosecutor. But there were two indictments: the one for treason and the other for a misdemeanor, and the allegation of materiality made in the affidavit may, it is said, refer to either indictment. But the prosecution for treason is terminated, and was terminated before the affidavit was made. Consequently it can relate only to the indictment for a misdemeanor. It is objected that the particular passages of the letter which are required are not pointed out. But how can this be done while the letter itself is withheld? Or how can their applicability be shown without requiring the accused prematurely to disclose his defence?

[Let it be supposed that the letter may not contain anything respecting the person now before the court. Still it may respect a witness material in the case, and become important by bearing on his testimony. Different representations may have been made by that witness, or his conduct may have been such as to affect his testimony. In various modes a paper may bear upon the case, although before the case be opened its particular application cannot be perceived by the judge. That the president of the United States may be subpœnaed, and examined as a witness, and required to produce any paper in his possession, is not controverted. I cannot, however, on this point, go the whole length for which counsel have contended. The president, although subject to the general rules which apply to others, may have sufficient motives for declining to produce a particular paper, and those motives may be such as to restrain the court from enforcing its production. I do not think precisely with the gentlemen on either side. I can readily conceive that the president might receive a letter which it would be improper to exhibit in public, because of the manifest inconvenience of its exposure. The occasion for demanding it ought, in such a case, to be very strong, and to be fully shown to the court before its production could be insisted on. I admit, that in such a case, much reliance must be placed on the declaration of the president; and I do think that a privilege does exist to withhold private letters of a certain description. The reason is this: Letters to the president in his private character, are often written to him in consequence of his public character, and may relate to public concerns. Such a letter, though it be a private one, seems to partake of the character of an official paper, and to be such as ought not on light ground to be forced into public view.

[Yet it is a very serious thing, if such letter should contain any information material to the defence, to withhold from the accused the power of making use of it. It is a very serious thing to proceed to trial under such circumstances. I cannot precisely lay down any general rule for such a case. Perhaps the court ought to consider the reasons which would induce the president to refuse to exhibit such a letter as conclusive on it, unless such letter could be shown to be absolutely necessary in the defence. The president may himself state the particular reasons which may have induced him to withhold a paper, and the court would unquestionably allow their full force to those reasons. At the same time, the court could not refuse to pay proper attention to the affidavit of the accused. But on objections being made by the president to the production of a paper, the court would not proceed further in the case without such an affidavit as would clearly shew the paper to be essential to the justice of the case. On the present occasion the court would willingly hear further testimony on the materiality of the paper required, but that is not offered.

[In no case of this kind would a court be required to proceed against the president as against an ordinary individual. The objections to such a course are so strong and so obvious, that all must acknowledge them. But to induce the court to take any definite and decisive step with respect to the prosecution, founded on the refusal of the president to exhibit a paper, for reasons stated by himself, the materiality of that paper ought to be shown. In this case, however, the president has assigned no reason whatever for withholding the paper called for. The propriety of withholding it must be decided by himself, not by another for him. Of the weight of the reasons for and against producing it, he is himself the judge. It is their operation on his mind, not on the mind of others, which must be respected by the court. They must therefore be approved by himself, and not be the mere suggestions of another for him. It does not even appear to the court that the president does object to the production of any part of this letter. The objection, and the reasons in support of the objection, proceed from the attorney himself, and are not understood to emanate from the president. He submits it to the discretion of the attorney. Of course, it is to be understood that he has no objections to the production of the whole, if the attorney has not. Had the president, when he transmitted it, subjected it to certain restrictions, and stated that in his judgment the public interest required certain parts of it to be kept secret, and had accordingly made a reservation of them, all proper respect would have been paid to it; but he has made no such reservation. As to the use to be made of the letter, it is impossible that either the court or the attorney can know in what manner it is intended to be used. The declarations therefore made upon that subject can have no weight. Neither can any argument on its materiality or immateriality drawn from the supposed contents of the parts in question. The only ground laid for the court to act upon is the affidavit of the accused; and from that the court is induced to order that the paper be produced, or the cause be continued. In regard to the secrecy of these parts which it is stated are improper to give out to the world, the court will take any order that may be necessary. I do not think that the accused ought to be prohibited from seeing the letter; but, if it should be thought proper, I will order that no copy of it be taken for public exhibition, and that no use shall be made of it but what is necessarily attached to the case. After the accused has seen it, it will yet be a question whether it shall go to the jury or not. That question cannot be decided now, because the court cannot say whether those particular passages are of the nature which are specified. All that the court can do is to order that no copy shall be taken; and if it is necessary to debate it in public, those who take notes may be directed not to insert any part of the arguments on that subject. I believe, myself, that a great deal of the suspicion which has been excited will be diminished by the exhibition of this paper.] [5]

Mr. Hay said he would consult Gen. Wilkinson, and if he consented, he would produce the letter under the restrictions suggested by the court—preferring that to a continuance of the cause.

On Saturday, the 5th of September, Mr. Hay stated to the court that he would immediately send an express to Monticello (where the president then was) for instructions in relation to producing the letter, and that he would probably get a return by Tuesday evening.

On Wednesday, the 9th of September, a jury was empanneled and sworn, just one week having been consumed in the preliminary proceedings hereinbefore briefly noticed.

On the same day, Mr. Hay presented a certificate from the president, annexed to a copy of Gen. Wilkinson's letter, excepting such parts as he deemed he ought not to permit to be made public.

The clerk read the indictment, consisting of seven counts, all charging the defendant in slightly variant forms, with beginning, setting on foot, or providing the means of a military expedition against the dominions or territory of the king of Spain.

In all the counts the offence was charged to have been committed at Blennerhassett's Island, in the county of Wood, and district of Virginia.

The trial then proceeded, and in the course of it the counsel for the prosecution offered in evidence declarations of Blennerhassett tending to implicate Colonel Burr, and endeavored to support it by alleging: 1st, a conspiracy between these two and others; and that the declarations of one conspirator were evidence against the others; or, 2d, that they were accomplices. They also offered in evidence acts of the nature laid in the indictment, committed by the defendant in Ohio and Kentucky, all of which was objected to.

[The argument on the admissibility of the testimony lasted several days, at the close of which]

[The present motion is particularly directed against the admission of the testimony of Neale, who is offered for the purpose of proving certain conversations between himself and Herman Blannerhasset. It is objected that the declarations of Herman Blannerhasset are at this time inadmissible on this indictment. The rule of evidence which rejects mere hearsay testimony, which excludes from trials of a criminal or civil nature the declarations of any other individual than of him against whom the proceedings are instituted, has been generally deemed all essential to the correct administration of justice. I know not why a declaration in court should be unavailing, unless made upon oath, if a declaration out of court was to criminate others than him who made it; nor why a man should have a constitutional claim to be confronted with the witnesses against him, if mere verbal declarations, made in his absence, may be evidence against him. I know of no principle in the preservation of which all are more concerned. I know none, by undermining which, life, liberty and property, might be more endangered. It is therefore incumbent on courts to be watchful of every inroad on a principle so truly important. This rule as a general rule is permitted to stand, but some exceptions to it have been introduced, concerning the extent of which a difference of opinion prevails, and that difference produces the present question.

[The first exception is, that in cases of conspiracy, the acts, and it is said by some, the declarations of all the conspirators, may be given in evidence on the trial of any one of them, for the purpose of proving the conspiracy, and this case it is alleged, comes within the exception. With regard to this exception, a distinction is taken in the books between the admissibility and operation of testimony, which is clear in point of law, but not at all times easy to practice in fact. It is, that although this testimony be admitted, it is not to operate against the accused, unless brought home to him by testimony drawn from his own declarations or his own conduct. But the question to be considered is, does the exception comprehend this case? Is this a case of conspiracy according to the well-established law meaning of the term? Cases of conspiracy may be of two descriptions. 1st. Where the conspiracy is the crime, in which case the crime is complete although the act should never be performed, and in such cases if several be indicted, and all except one be acquitted, that one cannot, say the books, be convicted, because he cannot conspire alone. 2d. Where the crime consists in the intention, and is proved by a conspiracy, so that the conviction of the accused may take place upon evidence, that he has conspired to do an act which manifests the wicked intention. In both these cases an act is not essential to the completion of the crime, and a conspiracy is charged in the indictment as the ground of accusation. If the conspiracy be the sole charge, as it may be, the question to be decided, is, not whether the accused has committed any particular fact, but whether he has conspired to commit it. Evidence of conspiracy in such a case goes directly to support the issue. It has therefore been determined that the nature of the conspiracy may be proved by the transactions of any of the conspirators in furtherance of the common design; the degree of guilt, however, of the particular conspirator upon trial, must still depend on his own particular conduct.

[In the case at bar, the crime consists not in intention but in acts. The act of congress does not extend to the secret design, if not carried into open deed, nor to any conspiracy, however extensive, if it do not amount to a beginning or setting on foot a military expedition. The indictment contains no allusion to a conspiracy, and of consequence the issue to be tried by the jury is not whether the conspiracy has taken place, but whether the particular facts charged in the indictment have been committed. I do not mean to admit, that by any course which might have been given to the prosecution, this could have been converted into a case of conspiracy; but most assuredly if it was intended to prove a conspiracy, and to let in that kind of testimony which is admissible only in such a case, the indictment ought to have charged it. I have not been able to find in the books a single decision, or a solitary dictum which would countenance the attempt that is now made to introduce as testimony the declarations of third persons, made in the absence of the person on trial, under the idea of a conspiracy, where no conspiracy is alleged in the indictment. The researches of the counsel for the prosecution have not been more successful. But they suppose this case, though not within the letter, to come clearly within the reasoning of those cases where this testimony has been allowed. It has been said, that wherever the crime may be committed by a single individual, although in point of fact more than one should be concerned in it, as in all cases of felony, the prosecution must be conducted in the usual mode, and the declarations of third persons cannot be introduced at a trial; but whenever the crime requires more than one person, where from its nature it cannot be committed by a single individual, although it shall consist, not in conspiracy, but in open deed, yet it is in the nature of a conspiracy, and evidence of the declarations and acts of third persons connected with the accused may be received whether the indictment covers such testimony or not. I must confess that I do not feel the force of this distinction. I cannot conceive why, when numbers do in truth conspire to commit an act, as murder or robbery, the rule should be, that the declaration of one of them is no evidence against another, and yet, if the act should require more than one for its commission, that the declarations of one person engaged in the plot would immediately become evidence against another. I cannot perceive the reason of this distinction; but, admitting its solidity, I know not on what ground to dispense with charging in the indictment the combination intended to be proved. If this combination may be proved by the acts or declarations of third persons made in the absence of the accused, because he is connected with those persons; if in consequence of this connection the ordinary rules of evidence are to be prostrated, it would seem to me that the indictment ought to give some notice of this connection. When the terms used in the indictment necessarily imply a combination, it will be admitted that a combination is charged and may be proved. And where A., B., and C. are indicted for murdering D., yet in such a case the declarations of one of the parties made in the absence of the others have never been admitted as evidence against the others. If then this indictment should even imply that the fact charged was committed by more than one person, I cannot conceive that the declarations of a particeps criminis would become admissible on the trial of a person not present when they were made, unless those declarations form a part of the very transaction charged in the indictment.

[If in all this I should be mistaken, yet it remains to be proved that the offence charged may not be committed by a single individual. This may, in some measure depend on the exposition of the terms of the act; and it is to be observed that this exposition must be fixed. It cannot vary with the varying aspect of the prosecution at its different stages. If, as has been said, a military expedition is begun or set on foot when a single soldier is enlisted for the purpose, then unless it be begun as well by the soldier who enlists, as by the officer who enlists him, a military expedition may be begun by a single individual. So if those who engage in the enterprize follow their leader from their confidence in him, without any knowledge of the real object, there is no conspiracy, and the criminal act is the act of an individual. So, too, if the means are any means, the crime may unquestionably be committed by any individual. Should the term be even so construed as to imply that all the means must be provided before the offence can be committed, still all the means may, in many cases, be provided by a single individual. The rule then laid down by the counsel for the prosecution, if correct in itself, would not comprehend this case.

[Secondly, there are also cases in the books where acts are in their nature joint, and where the law attaches the guilt to all concerned in their commission, so that the act of one is in truth the act of others, where the conduct of one person in the commission of the fact constitutes the crime of another person; but this is distinct from conspiracy. If many persons combine to commit a murder, and all assist in it, and are actually or constructively present, the act of one is the act of all, and is sufficient for the conviction of all. So in acts of levying war, as in the Cases of Damane and Purchase, the acts of the mob were the acts of all in the mob whose conduct showed a concurrence in those acts, and in the general design, which the mob were carrying into execution. But these decisions turn on a distinct principle from conspiracy. The crime is a joint crime, and all those who are present aiding in the commission of it participate in each other's actions, and in the guilt attached to those actions. The conduct of each contributes to shew the nature of this joint crime; and declarations made during the transaction are explanatory of that transaction; but I cannot conceive that in either case declarations unconnected with the transaction would have been evidence against any other than the person who made them, or persons in whose presence they were made. If, for example, one of several men who had united in committing a murder should have said, that he with others contemplated the fact which was afterwards committed, I know of no case which would warrant the admission of this testimony upon the trial of a person who was not present when the words were spoken. So if Damane had previously declared that he had entered into a confederacy for the purpose of pulling down all meeting houses, I cannot believe that this testimony would have been admissible against a person having no knowledge of the declaration and giving no assent to it. In felony the guilt of the principal attaches to the accessory, and therefore the guilt of the principal is proved on the trial of the accessory. In treason, all are principals, and the guilt of him who has actually committed the treason does, in England, attach to him who has advised, aided or assisted that treason. Consequently the conduct of the person who has perpetrated the fact must be examined on the trial of him who has advised or procured it. But in misdemeanors by statute, where the commission of a particular fact constitutes the only crime punished by the law, I believe there is no case where the declaration of a particeps criminis can affect any but himself.

[Thirdly. The admission of the declarations of Mr. Blannerhasset may be insisted upon under the idea he was the agent of Col. B. How far the acts of one man may affect another criminally, is a subject for distinct consideration, but I believe there is no case where the words of an agent can be evidence against his principal on a criminal prosecution. Could such testimony be admissible, the agency must be first clearly established, not by the words of the agent, but by the acts of the principal, and the word must be within the power previously shown to have been given.

[The opinions of the circuit court of New York in trials of Smith and Ogden have been frequently mentioned. [Case No. 16,342.] Although I have not the honor to know the judge who gave those decisions, I consider them as the determination of a court of the United States, and I shall not be lightly induced to disregard them, or unnecessarily to treat them with disrespect. I do not, however, in the opinions of Judge Talmadge, perceive any expression indicating that the declarations of third persons could be received as testimony against any individual who was prosecuted under this act. If he has given that opinion, it has certainly escaped my notice, and has not been suggested to me by counsel. He unquestionably says in page 113 of the trial "that the reference which was made to the doctrine of conspiracy did not apply in that case." The reference alluded to was the observation of Mr. Emmet, who had said "that, if the object was to charge Col. Smith with the acts of Capt. Lewis, they ought to have laid the indictment for a conspiracy." The opinion of the judge that the doctrine of conspiracy had no application to the case, appears to me to be perfectly correct.

[I feel, therefore, no difficulty in deciding, that the testimony of Mr. Neale, unless he can go further than merely stating the declarations made to him by Blannerhasset, is at present inadmissible. But the argument has taken a much wider range. The points made, comprehend the exclusion of other testimony suggested by the attorney for the United States, and the opinion of the court upon the operation of testimony. As these subjects are entirely distinct, and as the object of the motion is the exclusion of testimony supposed to be illegal, I shall confine my observations to that part of the argument which respects the admissibility of evidence of the description of that proposed by the attorney for the United States. The indictment charges the accused in separate counts with beginning, with setting on foot, with preparing, and with providing the means for a military expedition to be carried on against a nation at peace with the United States. Any legal testimony which applies to any one of these counts is relevant. That which applies to none of them must be irrelevant. The expedition, the character and object of that expedition, that the defendant began it, that he set it on foot, that he provided and prepared the means for carrying it on, are all charged in the indictment, and consequently these charges may be all supported by any legal testimony. But that a military expedition was begun and set on foot by others, or that the means were prepared or provided by others, is not charged in this indictment, is not a crime which is or can be alleged against the defendant, and testimony to that effect is therefore not relevant. All testimony which serves to show the expedition to have been military in its character, as, for instance, testimony respecting their arms and provisions, no matter by whom purchased, their conduct, no matter by whom directed, or who was present, all legal testimony which serves to show the object of the expedition, as would be either actually marching against Mexico, any public declarations made among themselves stating Mexico as their object, any manifesto to this effect, any agreement entered into by them for such an expedition, these or similar acts would be received to show the object of the expedition.

[In trials of Smith and Ogden they were received. Whether the particular acts of the accused on which his guilt or innocence depends, must precede this species of testimony or may be preceded by it, is a question which merely respects the order of evidence. There can be no doubt but that at some stage of the prosecution, either before or after the particular part performed by the accused has been shown, the character and object of the expedition may be shown, and that by any legal testimony calculated to develope that character and object. Whether this testimony is admissible before the proof which particularly applies to the part performed by the accused, or ought to be introduced by first proving that part, is a question which is not made in this case, and which was not made in the case of Smith and Ogden. In that case it was certainly entirely unimportant, and it is probably not less so in this. It has been also contended that the acts no more than the declarations of third persons can be given in evidence on this indictment. It has been already said that those acts of equipment which go to show the character of the expedition may be given in evidence. If, for example, Blannerhasset, Tyler, Smith, or any other persons, provided arms, ammunition or provisions which were applied to the armament, this would be evidence, because it would show the character of the expedition. This was done in the case of Smith and Ogden, without enquiring who provided the arms, for they belonged to the expedition. Captain Lewis, for instance, purchased several military equipments. It was not deemed necessary to show that Smith was connected with Lewis, for these purchases were made for the expedition, and Smith was not charged with providing them. He was charged with providing other means; and the means provided by Lewis served to show the character of the expedition. But although the acts of all persons providing means applied to the expedition may be given in evidence upon the same principle that the state of the expedition may be shown, it does not follow that other acts of third persons may be given in evidence. It has also been contended that no transactions out of the district are testimony. This position is correct to a considerable extent, but not to the extent in which it is laid down. A declaration of Mr. Burr, for example, made in Kentucky or elsewhere, that he did not set on foot a military expedition on Blannerhasset's Island to be carried on against the dominions of the king of Spain while the United States were at peace with that power, would I think be evidence. So would the actual marching of the troops proved to be raised by him against the province of Mexico. Testimony which goes directly to prove the indictment may, I think, be drawn from any place. But I do not understand this to be the point really in contest. I understand the counsel of the United States to insist that providing means in Kentucky, that enlisting men in Kentucky, that joining the expedition in Kentucky, may be given in evidence to show that the accused did begin and set on foot the expedition in Blannerhasset's Island, or did provide the means at that place as charged in the indictment. This I understand to be the great question which divides the prosecution and defence.

[It is I believe a general rule in criminal prosecutions that a distinct crime for which a prosecution may be instituted cannot be given in evidence in order to render it more probable that the particular crime charged in the indictment was committed. If gentlemen think me wrong in this, I will certainly hear them upon the point, but I believe the position to be correct. Now providing the means for a military expedition in Kentucky to be carried on against the dominions of a prince with whom the United States are at peace, is certainly in itself a distinct offence, upon which an indictment may be as well supported as it can be for providing means for the same or a similar expedition in Virginia. According to the rule laid down then, this testimony cannot be received unless it goes to prove directly the charges contained in the indictment. But how can it go directly to prove those charges? Does it follow that the man who has provided the means in Kentucky has also provided the means in Virginia? Certainly it does not follow; and consequently the acts alleged in Kentucky do not prove the charges contained in the indictment. They would prove the defendant to have been connected in the enterprize, and gentlemen argue as if they thought this sufficient for their purpose. I shall be excused if I employ a few moments in stating my reasons for thinking it not sufficient. I have already said, and surely no man will deny, that two distinct persons may at different places furnish different means for the same enterprize. It will, I presume, not be contended that one of them may be indicted for the means provided by the other. So, too, if the same man shall provide means for the enterprize at different places, as in Virginia and Kentucky. I do not imagine that an indictment for providing arms in Virginia could be supported by proving that he provided ammunition in Kentucky. They are distinct offences, for either of which he may be punished, and the commission of one may render more probable, but does not prove, the commission of the other. How do gentlemen mean to make this testimony more relevant? It is by making the acts of Blannerhasset, Tyler and Smith, the acts of Burr, by insisting that their acts show an unlawful expedition to have been begun by him in Virginia, or that the means for that expedition were provided by him in Virginia. This being accomplished, his acts in Kentucky may be adduced to corroborate or confirm the testimony which discloses his conduct in Virginia. As preliminary then to this testimony, such proof of the specific charges contained in the indictment must be given, as may be left to the consideration of the jury. This proof relates to place as well as to fact. "Of whatsoever nature an offence indicted may be," says Hawkins (2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 35), "whether local or transitory, as seditious words or battery, &c., it seems to be agreed that if, upon not guilty pleaded, it shall appear that it was committed in a country different from that in which the indictment was found, the defendant shall be acquitted." This rule is the stronger in the United States, where it is affirmed by the constitution itself, and where the jurisdiction of the court is limited to offences within the district. Its obligation therefore is complete. If there be any direct testimony that an expedition was begun, or set on foot, or that the means were provided or prepared in Virginia, that testimony has not yet been heard, so far as I recollect. If there be such testimony it must also be shown that the expedition was begun, or that the means were prepared by the accused. No single act of his in Virginia has been offered in evidence. He made a contract in the state of Ohio for boats and provisions, which may have been intended as a part of the expedition, but no contract appears to have been made in Virginia, nor were the boats constructed or provisions procured in Virginia. How then is it to appear that he begun or set on foot a military expedition in Virginia, or that he provided or prepared the means for such an expedition? It is said, that if he gave orders from Kentucky or elsewhere, and in consequence of those orders the means were provided in Virginia, the accused is within the letter of the act, as well as its spirit, and has himself provided the means in Virginia. If these orders were in proof, the court as well as the counsel would be enabled to view the subject with more accuracy, and to treat it with more precision. Since those orders are not adduced, nor accurately stated, and the question has been argued without them, the court must decline giving any opinion, or consider the orders as offered, and say what orders would be admissible and what inadmissible. The latter course may save the bar the trouble of another argument. To whom are orders supposed to have been given, and who are supposed to have executed them? They must have been given to accomplices or to those who had no share in the expedition.

[The accomplices, under the direction of Col. Burr, have provided the means. Can their liability to the penalties of the law be doubted? I presume not. If persons engaged in the expedition have provided the means for carrying it on, it will, I presume, be admitted that they are within the letter and the spirit of the act. Each man has himself provided and prepared those particular means which he has furnished. If Col. Burr, as was the case with Col. Smith, has supplied money for the expedition, then money may be charged as the means provided by him; but, if that money was advanced to an accomplice, its investment in means for the expedition is the act of the accomplice, for which, being a free agent, he is himself responsible. The accomplice has committed the very act which the law punishes. Has the accused, by suggesting or procuring that act, also committed it? I will not say how far the rule, that penal laws must be construed strictly, may be carried without incurring the censure of disregarding the sense of the legislature. It may, however, be safely affirmed that the offence must come clearly within the description of the law according to the common understanding of the terms employed, or it is not punishable under the law. Now, to do an act, or to advise or procure an act, or to be connected or leagued with one who does that act, are not the same in either law, language, or in common parlance; and, if they are not the same, a penalty affixed to the one is not necessarily affixed to the other. The penalty affixed to the act of providing the means for a military expedition is not affixed to the act of advising or procuring those means to be provided, or of being associated with the man who has provided them. The distinction made by the law between these persons is well settled, and has been too frequently urged to require further explanation. The one is a principal, the other an accessory. In all misdemeanors punishable only by a statute which describes as the sole offender the person who commits the prohibited act, the one is within and the other not within the statute. In passing the act under consideration, congress obviously contemplated this distinction. I presume that in a prosecution under the 3d section, for fitting out a privateer, it would not be alleged that a person who was concerned with the man who actually fitted out the privateer, but who performed no act himself, could be convicted on an indictment, not for being concerned in fitting out the privateer, but for actually fitting her out. These are stated in that section as separate offences. This distinction taken in the law is well understood, and cannot be considered as overlooked by those who frame penal acts. They cannot be considered as intending to describe one offender when they describe another, and, if experience suggests defects in the Penal Code, the legislature exclusively judges how far those defects are to be remedied. While expounding the terms of the act, it may not be improper to notice an argument advanced by the attorney for the United States which was stopped by my observing that he had not correctly understood the opinion delivered in the case of treason. He understood that opinion as approving the doctrine laid down by Keeling and Hale, that an accessory before the fact might plead, in bar of an indictment as accessory, that he had been acquitted as principal, whence it was inferred that, on an indictment for doing an act, evidence of advising or producing that act might be received. I was certainly very far from approving this doctrine. On the contrary, I declared it to contradict every idea I had ever formed on the subject. But, if it were correct, I endeavored to show that it could not affect that case. My disapprobation of the doctrine induced me to look further into it, and my persuasion that it is not law is confirmed. 2 Hale, P. C. p. 292, says: "If A. and B. be indicted of the murder of C., upon their evidence it appears that A. committed the fact and B. was not present but was accessory before the fact by commanding it, B. shall be discharged." In 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 85, § 11, Hawkins discusses the subject, shows in a note the contradiction in those authorities which maintain the doctrine, cites the opposing authorities, and obviously approves the opinion which is here given. It is apparent, then, that the law never considers the commission and the procurement of an act, even where both are criminal, as the same act.

[I cannot, therefore, consider means provided by those who are his accomplices in the expedition, as means provided by Col. Burr. If the means were provided by order of the accused, by persons not accomplices and not guilty under the act, the law may be otherwise. I shall not exclude such testimony. There is, however, some doubt whether the place of trial should be where the orders were given, or where they were executed. At common law, if an act was procured or advised at one place, and executed at another, it was doubted whether the procurer could be tried at either place, because the offence was not complete at either. This difficulty was removed by a statute made in the reign of Edward VI. If there be testimony showing, by orders from the accused, means were provided in Virginia by a person not an accomplice, it may be received, and the question respecting the scene of trial put in way for a final decision. The question whether all the means must be provided before the offence described in the statute has been committed, relates to the effect rather than to the exclusion of the testimony. I shall certainly not reject any evidence which shows that any means were provided by the accused in the place charged in the indictment. Upon the subject of beginning and setting on foot a military expedition or enterprize, it would be unnecessary at this time to say anything, were it not on the account of the question respecting the introduction of testimony of the district. What is an expedition? What is an enterprize? An expedition, if we consult Johnson, is "a march or voyage with martial intentions." In this sense, it does not mean the body which marches, but the march itself. The term is, however, sometimes employed to designate the armament itself, as well as the movement of that armament. An enterprize is "an undertaking of hazard, an arduous attempt." The proper meaning of this word also describes the general undertaking, and not the armament with which that undertaking is to be accomplished.

[The first count in the indictment charges that Burr began the expedition in "Blannerhassett's Island; the second and third, that he set on foot the enterprize on Blannerhassett's Island. If the term expedition is to be taken in its common and direct sense,—that is, to mean a march or voyage with martial intentions,—it began where that march or voyage begun; and it must have been begun by the accused to bring him within the act. If the term be taken in its figurative sense to designate the armament instead of the movement of the armament, then I cannot readily conceive an act which begins an expedition, unless the same act may also be said to provide the means of an expedition. The formation of the plan in the mind is not the commencement of the expedition, within the act. Our laws punish no mental crimes not brought into open deed. The disclosure of that plan does not begin it. If it did, the first disclosure would be the beginning. I find a difficulty in conceiving any act which amounts to providing the means for an expedition. However, if there can be such an act, and it has been committed in Virginia, it may certainly be given in evidence. The same observations apply to setting on foot an enterprize. These remarks are made to show what it will be necessary to prove in order to let in corroborative proof.

[It is then the opinion of the court, that the declarations of third persons not forming a part of the transaction, and not made in the presence of the accused, cannot be received in evidence in this case. That the acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character or object of the expedition, cannot be given in evidence. That the acts of the accused, in a different district, which constitute in themselves substantive causes for a prosecution, cannot be given in evidence unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment. That any legal testimony which shows the expedition to be military, or to have been designed against the dominions of Spain, may be received. Gentlemen well know how to apply these principles. Should any difficulty occur in applying them, the particular case will be brought before the court and decided.

[After the opinion was delivered, Mr. Hay requested a copy of it, and made some observations as to its effect upon the future progress of the trial. He considered that the man who had the supreme command and direction of this military enterprize (which they could prove it to be) did provide the means and set it on foot. This was a question he thought proper for the consideration of the jury, and this idea would be strengthened by evidence which could be produced, if permitted.

[Mr. Wirt. The fact is, that Mr. Belknap can prove (as well as others) that he sent orders and did other acts showing that he was at the head and command of the whole.

[The CHIEF JUSTICE. But suppose the connection was proved (which I have no doubt could be), and suppose the enterprize originated with Col. Burr (which is very probably the case), others might have provided the means, from what could be made to appear. He is not indicted for being connected with the enterprize, but for providing certain specific means. If the party under Tyler is to be considered as of a military nature, and that an expedition began at Beaver, or where not, if the movement is to be considered as an enlistment of men, then, wherever the first movement was made, there the expedition began. I do not think that his taking the command at Cumberland can be considered as a count in the indictment; it might go to render it more probable (if there was any doubt as to the transaction) that what was done was under his control; but the act itself must be proved on Blannerhasset's Island; and there the intention with which that act was done would come in by proving that he took the command afterwards. But how can he be charged with beginning there, if it should appear that he began in Pennsylvania? The question of "beginning" I do not mean to take from the jury; of the place of beginning and of the acts themselves, they must decide. An abstract, independent question will arise, however, which is, whether the witnesses proved the indictment or not? Now I do not think that they did prove the indictment. What might be done is a future question.

[Mr. Wirt. Am I to understand, sir, that the acts of accomplices, out of the district, tending to prove the acts laid in the indictment, may be given in evidence?

[The CHIEF JUSTICE. Any act which shows the character of the transaction itself, in my opinion, may be given.

[Mr. Wickham. I understand the opinion of the court to be that we cannot be liable for the acts of others, though done within the district; no auxiliary acts can be given against us, and they are not entitled to go out of the district to show acts done elsewhere, against us?

[Mr. M'Rae. If we shall offer evidence that will be proper to submit to a jury, to prove where he did commence this enterprize, at any period whatever, it is not necessary that we should show that he remained on Blannerhasset's Island all the time. But seeing the enterprize was actually commenced, we shall be able to satisfy a jury that, when Burr was on the island, he did there actually project it, and did agree with Blannerhasset as to its progress, which was afterwards carried on, we ought certainly then to be at liberty to go out of the district to show that he was the principal person concerned in it. I do not suppose it necessary for us to show that all the means were provided by him.

[The CHIEF JUSTICE. There is no doubt which I had at the commencement of this case (which I do not now suggest to make a question of) it relates to the indictment, and consequently to a particular part of the evidence, particularly to the words of the statute "beginning and setting on foot an expedition." I do doubt whether it is not necessary to show in the indictment how the expedition was begun. I do not know that it is necessary to set forth the principal means in the indictment. It is in itself, an extremely vague term, but if it is a necessary one, surely the particular manner of beginning must be showed. I think, however, it ought to be laid in the indictment, and if so, that is a strong reason why it ought to be shown by evidence.

[The counsel on both sides were ordered to be furnished with copies of the opinion, and the court adjourned to Tuesday, ten o'clock.

[Tuesday, September 15.

[Mr. Hay said, that the counsel for the prosecution had agreed to go on as well as they could, for that they had drawn such a construction from the opinion as to excite them to suppose that they had sufficient evidence yet remaining to produce a conviction of the person accused, without interfering with the opinion of the court. He was stating some of the points laid down by the court, as far as we were able to hear him (which was extremely difficult), when Mr. Botts interfered to explain what were the limits set by the court, upon which he dwelt at some length, and repeated most of the arguments before used, as to the absence of Mr. Burr, and the evidence offered respecting conversations held between him and others. Indeed, he took a brief review of the whole opinion, and concluded, upon the whole, that the absence of Mr. Burr rendered all evidence which it appeared could be produced irrelevant; none had been offered, and he defied the prosecution to offer a particle,—for, from the whole review of the opinion, it was not within the compass of the heart of man to produce a conviction.

[Mr. Martin offered a few observations favorable to the production of any evidence which the prosecution could produce: if they exceeded the bounds which the court had justly prescribed, it would then be due time to make objections, on which the court would determine.

[Much desultory conversation ensued, when Richard Neale was again called, and asked whether he was on the island on the night of Blannerhasset's departure. "A. I was not. I left the country in October, and know nothing of it."

[James McDowell was then called and sworn.

[Mr. Burr stated that this witness was introduced for the purpose of proving an interview between him and the accused at the mouth of Cumberland river, where the accused stated to him the object of the expedition. The witness commenced his evidence by saying that he should begin up at Wheeling and proceed downwards to Cumberland where he first saw Col. Burr, when Col. Burr interrupted him by observing that he understood that this was offered as corroborative or auxiliary testimony, but auxiliary to what? They ought first to demonstrate acts done at the island, before they attempt to prove what was done, or (what is worse) said, out of the district.

[Mr. Wirt went into a review of the opinion to support the propriety of offering this species of evidence, and contended that, before they could come to the substantive charge, they ought to be permitted to show the parts so nearly attached as this was. On this ground was General Eaton's testimony admitted, because it bore direct on the charge laid in the indictment, and equally intimate were the acts at Cumberland. Under the act of congress, the charge is, providing means, &c. Now, was not the assumption of the command of those engaged in this expedition a material article in the means provided or providing? Here was the right to command acknowledged. It is not our meaning to say that there he began the expedition; he provided most of his means elsewhere, but there he met with his men, and there he headed them (he referred to Vaughan's case.) The mouth of Cumberland transaction was one link in the great chain; it commenced perhaps with what occurred between him and General Eaton, and proceeded by degrees till men, arms, &c., were procured, but the superintendence of Burr was discoverable everywhere; he projected and hastened on the scheme, as will appear. The transactions at Cumberland cannot be abstracted more than others of equal importance. Such corroborative testimony as that now offered, he contended, was even let in in capital cases, and could not be excluded without manifest injustice to the prosecution, because of its very intimate connection with the whole. There was a wide difference between a mere connection, and a man having the sovereign command of a criminal transaction (as was now attempted to be proved). The beginning was with General Eaton,—the consummation was to be somewhere else. It would be proved that Burr not only began, but brought the thing about so far as it went; he was the life and prime mover of the whole. Mr. Wirt went into some reasoning and elucidation of the propriety of this evidence; though it was no positive proof of his guilt under the indictment, yet he insisted it was strong circumstantial evidence that these means were his means, and that the evidence was within the meaning of the court, as far as he understood the opinion.

[Mr. Botts expressed his extreme surprise at the light in which the gentlemen had represented the opinion of the court: he made some strong strictures on Mr. Wirt's representations of it, and admired the judge's patience to sit there and hear it. He then quoted some parts of the opinion, and made some strong eulogistic remarks upon it, after which he compared it with the point in dispute; as to Burr's presence, &c. (which has so often been the topic). It was stated to be one continued act. Be it so; let it be supposed to be an act of unanimity and continuity, and how would it then stand? A distinct offence was charged to have been committed by Col. Burr on the island, but, instead of its being done by him, on the island, it appeared to have been done by others, and evidence of words used elsewhere were brought as corroborative, to prove what was done where he was not! By what kind of ingenuity could anything done in Cumberland be transported to Blannerhasset's Island, when the act, though laid there, was already disproved.

[MARSHALL, Chief Justice. I certainly should not have sat so patiently to hear the elaborate arguments which were offered, if I had not had a hope that the opinion which was afterwards delivered would have settled the point; an opinion which I thought was given so clear as to render it unnecessary to give another opinion upon the same point. It appears to me now that it would be unnecessary were it not for the vaguity of the law, and different understandings of gentlemen as to the terms "beginning and setting on foot" an expedition. They vary in opinions amazingly on those terms. Now, what is "beginning"? There must be some definite meaning affixed to the word, or I do not know how a court is to act upon the law. It means something, or else it is too vague for a court to punish those who have committed the act, or are the subjects of prosecution. As I before stated, an "expedition" must mean one of two things; it must indicate the march of a military force or army from one place to another, or it must be considered as a military armament substantively. Now, its natural and direct meaning must be the movement of a military armament, and not the armament itself. Now, when this movement takes place the expedition is said to begin; the march is said to have commenced. But the word also means an armament that moves, rather than the movement of that armament. However, I did not undertake to decide this question of the meaning, because I wished not to fix a positive meaning to terms when they relate to a law that may possibly undergo a revision, particularly when I had no precedent nor assistance in it. But if it be the movement of an armament itself, when that armament existed as such, then as I said before I could not distinguish between providing the means of that armament and the beginning of it. I cannot conceive what it is, nor can I conceive any fact that will amount to a "beginning" this armament, unless it is in the provision of the means, or of some means. Furnishing money or enlisting men may be considered as providing means. This, then, must be beginning the expedition. It must either mean this, or it must mean the march. If it means the march, then the expedition was brought down by Mr. Tyler from Beaver, where they first assembled, and afterwards rested at Blannerhasset's Island, whence they proceeded lower down. If it be expedition, and the meaning of the word is the march of the armament, then the proof is positive that it did not begin at Blannerhasset's Island. If the meaning is the provision of the armament, then the beginning of the expedition is the place where the first means were provided. Taking then, the word in one or the other meaning, it certainly appears to me that the testimony produced by the attorney of the United States disproves his own charge, for that it was not begun on Blannerhasset's Island, where the charge is laid in the indictment. The beginning, then, is out of the question.

[The question then is whether the means were provided or not on Blannerhasset's Island. If there be any testimony that goes to prove this, I certainly am not at liberty to refuse it. But gentlemen will consider whether they are not wasting the time and money of the United States, and of all those persons who are forced to attend here, whilst they are producing such a mass of testimony which does not bear upon the cause. Any arguments on the principle which was stated, that the testimony respecting means provided elsewhere, supporting this charge, I am willing to hear. If the opinion of the court before given can be proved to be erroneous, I shall be very happy to hear it pointed out, because I wish to be as correct as possible; but, if these principles are not erroneous, why do gentlemen bring witnesses forward in direct opposition to them? I can ascribe no other reason to it, than because the law does not give definite ideas on the subject of its own provisions. The truth is, the words of the law must be taken to retrospect to the origination of the plan. For instance, General Eaton states that in Washington the accused laid before him a certain plan, when he said that he had sufficient means, &c. Now, if those means could be discovered, it certainly shows that the beginning of this expedition was in Washington, but the indictment states it to be on Blannerhasset's Island. Now, unless the fact itself shall be proved, how can there be evidence given of motives, yet undiscovered?] [7]

It is, then, the opinion of the court that the declarations of third persons not forming a part of the transaction, and not made in the presence of the accused, cannot be received in evidence in this case. That the acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character or object of the expedition, cannot be given in evidence. That the acts of the accused, in a different district, which constitute in themselves substantive causes for a prosecution, cannot be given in evidence, unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment. That any legal testimony which shows the expedition to be military, or to have been designed against the dominions of Spain, may be received.

The attorney of the district finding in the progress of the cause that this decision excluded almost the whole of his testimony, on the 15th of September moved the court to discharge the jury. This was objected to by the defendant, who insisted upon a verdict. THE COURT being of opinion that the jury could not, in this stage of the case, be discharged without mutual consent, and that they must give a verdict, they accordingly retired, and not long after returned with a verdict of "Not guilty."

Case No. 14,694a.

UNITED STATES v. BURR et al.[1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Oct. 20, 1807.

TREASON—INTENT IN ASSEMBLAGE—PROOF OF OBJECT—INCIDENTAL TREASON — UNCOMMUNICATED INTENT OF LEADER — MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE — HOSTILE ACT AS EXCUSE — PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF ACCUSED—PROVINCE OF COURT—PLEA AUTREFOIS ACQUIT.

[1. The question raised by a defense made in the nature of a plea autrefois acquit will not be determined on a preliminary examination to commit a person for high treason.]

[2. While war may be levied without a battle, or the actual application of force to the object on which it was designed to act, and a body of men assembled for the purpose of war, and being in a posture of war, do in fact levy war, the intent is an indispensable ingredient in the composition of the fact; and, if it is charged that war was levied without striking the blow, the intention to strike must be plainly proved.]

[3. Quære, whether, after proving a connection for some general object between persons accused of treason in levying war, the conversations of one with third persons may be given in evidence against the other to prove what that object was.]

[4. The fact that treason might incidentally arise in the attempt to embark troops against a foreign nation with which the United States are at peace, will not infect a previous assemblage of troops, where the treason was neither committed nor intended.]

[5. Either acts of hostility and resistance to the government, or a hostile intention in the body assembled, are necessary to convert a meeting of men with ordinary appearances into an act of levying war. A treasonable intent on the part of the leader or person who convened the assemblage, uncommunicated to the assemblage, is not sufficient.]

[6. A citizen cannot make the election, or anticipate his government's making the election, to consider as an act of war the taking possession by another nation of contested territory, arising out of a dispute as to boundaries.]

[7. The setting on foot or providing the means of a military expedition against a nation with which the United States are at peace is an offense notwithstanding it appear that war is inevitable, unless the prosecution of the expedition depended upor its taking place.]

[8. The question whether a military expedition against a nation with which the United States were at peace was really to depend upon war being declared will not be determined upon a preliminary examination.]

[At law. On motion for commitment of Aaron Burr and Harman Blennerhassett to another district for trial for treason.]

Immediately after the return of the verdict, on the indictment for a misdemeanor [Case No. 14,694], Mr. Hay announced that it was his intention "to move for the commitment of Aaron Burr to that place for trial where the military expedition is said to have been completed;" and that he should combine in the same motion Israel Smith and Harman Blennerhassett, entering a nolle prosequi as to their trials for misdemeanor.

[1] [For references to the various cases in this series, which, together, embrace a full report of the entire proceedings against Aaron Burr, see footnote to Case No. 14,692a.]

Mr. Burr requested him to allege the place where the act was said to have been committed.

Mr. Hay replied that the evidence which he should introduce would cover a vast extent of territory; that he would name, if he could, the very spot.

Mr. Burr demanded the district, then.

Mr. Hay was not prepared to specify the district.

Wednesday, September 16, 1807.

Mr. Burr insisted on his right to a separate examination, and to demand a specification of the charges intended to be laid.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice, overruled the motion for a separate examination, but decided that a specification in writing was necessary.

Mr. Hay then produced a paper, charging Aaron Burr, Harman Blennerhassett and Israel Smith with treason, in levying war against the United States; and "that an overt act of levying war was committed on an island, whose name is not known, at the mouth of the Cumberland river, in the state of Kentucky; and that other overt acts of levying war were committed at Bayou Pierre, in the Mississippi territory, and on the Mississippi river between the places above named."

Mr. Hay then called a witness to the stand, but had not proceeded far in his examination before the counsel for the defence interposed two objections, viz: 1st. That no evidence was admissible of acts done in the Mississippi territory, because the court had no power to commit for trial in a territory. 2d. That no evidence was admissible as against Colonel Burr alone, because he had been tried by a jury and acquitted, in a former prosecution, on the same charge. On these propositions a protracted discussion ensued.

The CHIEF JUSTICE decided that under the law he had no power to commit for trial in a territory, and, therefore, could not receive evidence of acts done in a territory. On the plea of autrefois acquit he reserved his opinion, but decided to hear the evidence. He subsequently decided to admit the evidence of acts done in the Mississippi territory, "in the expectation that it might serve to explain the meeting at the mouth of the Cumberland, and because it was believed to be proper for an examining magistrate to receive it."

The counsel for the prosecution then proceeded with their testimony. The door was thrown wide open, and nearly everything offered was received, subject to future objection if it should appear not to be relevant to the charges under investigation. The examination of the evidence, with the discussions that arose from time to time as it progressed, occupied the court until the 20th of October. Considering the great length of time consumed in the examination, an astonishingly small amount of additional light was thrown upon the transactions under investigation. General Wilkinson was examined and cross-examined at very great length, and the object of a large portion of the testimony introduced by the defence was to impeach his credibility. To this end much evidence was presented tending to prove his knowledge of and connection with Burr's projected expedition against Mexico, and thereby to contradict his testimony on that subject. In fact, the investigation assumed the appearance of being as much a trial of Wilkinson as of the defendants against whom the charges were pending.

On the 20th of October Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered an opinion of which the following is a copy, except some preliminary remarks on the powers and duties of a judge sitting as an examining magistrate, which are omitted:

The charges against the accused are: 1st, that they have levied war against the United States at the mouth of Cumberland river, in Kentucky; and, 2dly, that they have begun and provided the means for a military expedition against a nation with which the United States were at peace.

With respect to one of the accused, a preliminary defence is made in the nature of a plea of autrefois acquit. If the question raised by this defence was one on which my judgment was completely formed in favor of the person by whom it is made, it would certainly be improper for me to commit him; but if my judgment is not absolutely and decidedly formed upon it, there would be a manifest impropriety in undertaking now to determine it. This does not arise from any fear to meet a great question whenever my situation shall require me to meet it, but from a belief that I ought as well to avoid the intrusion of my opinions on my brethren in cases where duty does not enjoin it on me to give them, as the withholding of those opinions where my situation may demand them. The question whether autrefois acquit will be a good plea in this case is of great magnitude, and ought to be settled by the united wisdom of all the judges. Were it brought before me on a trial in chief, I would, if in my power, carry it before the supreme court. When brought before me merely as an examining magistrate, I should deem myself inexcusable were I to decide, while a single doubt remained respecting the correctness of that decision.

To settle new and important questions in our Criminal Code, especially where those questions are constitutional, is a task upon which a single judge will at any time enter with reluctance; certainly, he would not willingly engage in it while acting as an examining magistrate. There is a decent fitness which all must feel in bringing such questions, if practicable, before all the judges. In England, trials which are expected to involve questions of great magnitude are seldom assigned to one or two judges. At that interesting crisis when Hardy, Tooke, Thelwall, and others were indicted for treason, Chief Justice Eyre was aided and supported by four associate judges of high talents and character. It would, I have no doubt, in that country be a matter of surprise if any person, whatever might be his station in the judiciary, should undertake to settle a great and novel point on a question of commitment. Although, in the United States, our system does not admit of a commission authorizing a majority of the judges to constitute a court for the trial of special criminal cases, yet it does admit of carrying a doubtful and important point before the supreme court, and I should not feel myself justified were I now to give an opinion anticipating such a measure. I shall therefore consider this motion as if no verdict had been rendered for either of the parties.

Both charges are supported by the same transaction and the same testimony. The assemblage at the mouth of Cumberland is considered as an act of levying war against the United States, and as a military armament collected for the invasion of a neighboring power with whom the United States were at peace. From the evidence which details that transaction, it appears that from sixty to one hundred men, who were collected from the upper parts of the Ohio under the direction of Tyler and Floyd, had descended the river and reached the mouth of Cumberland about the 25th of December, 1806. The next day they went on shore, and formed a line, represented by some as somewhat circular, to receive Colonel Burr, who was introduced to them, and who said that he had intended to impart something to them, or that he had intended to communicate his views, but that reasons of his own had induced him to postpone this communication; or, as others say, that there were then too many bystanders to admit of a communication of his objects. The men assembled at the mouth of Cumberland appear to have considered Colonel Burr as their chief. Whatever might be the point towards which they were moving, they seem to have looked upon him as their conductor. They demeaned themselves in a peaceable and orderly manner. No act of violence was committed, nor was any outrage on the laws practiced. There was no act of disobedience to the civil authority, nor were there any military appearances. There were some arms, and some boxes which might or might not contain arms. There were also some implements of husbandry, but they were purchased at the place. These men assembled under contracts to settle a tract of country on the Red river. No hostile objects were avowed; and, after continuing a day or two on an island in the mouth of the river, the party proceeded down the Ohio. There are some circumstances in this transaction which are calculated to excite attention and to awaken suspicion. If the exclusive object of those who composed this meeting was to settle lands, it would naturally form the subject of public conversation, and there would most probably have been no impediment to a free communication respecting it. The course of the human mind would naturally lead to such communications. The silence observed by the leaders on this subject, connected with hints of ulterior views, seemed calculated to impress on the minds of the people themselves that some other project was contemplated, and was probably designed to make that impression. That the men should have been armed with rifles was to be expected, had their single object been to plant themselves in the Washita; but the musket and bayonet are, perhaps, not the species of arms which are most usually found in our frontier settlements; nor were the individuals who were assembled of that description of persons who would most naturally be employed for such a purpose. The engagement for six months, too, is a stipulation for which it is difficult to account upon the principle that a settlement of lands was the sole or principal object in contemplation. These are circumstances which excite suspicion. How far they may be accounted for by saying that ulterior eventual objects were entertained, and that the event on which those objects depended was believed to be certain or nearly certain, I need not determine; but I can scarcely suppose it possible that it would be contended by any person that the transactions at the mouth of Cumberland do, in themselves, amount to an act of levying war. There was neither an act of hostility committed, nor any intention to commit such act avowed.

Very early in the proceedings which preceded this motion, I declared the opinion that war might be levied without a battle, or the actual application of force to the object on which it was designed to act; that a body of men assembled for the purpose of war, and being in a posture of war, do levy war; and from that opinion I have certainly felt no disposition to recede. But the intention is an indispensable ingredient in the composition of the fact; and if war may be levied without striking the blow, the intention to strike must be plainly proved. To prove this intention, the prosecutor for the United States offers evidence of conversations held by the accused, or some of them, with various individuals, at different times, relative to the views which were entertained, and the plans which had been formed, and of certain facts which took place after leaving the mouth of Cumberland. For although it was decided not to be within the power of this court to commit for trial in a territory of the United States, yet every transaction within a territory has been given in evidence in the expectation that such testimony might serve to explain the meeting at the mouth of Cumberland, and because it was believed to be proper for an examining magistrate to receive it.

That conversations or actions at a different time and place might be given in evidence as corroborative of the overt act of levying war, after that had been proved in such a manner as to be left to a jury, I never doubted for an instant. But that in a case where the intent could not be inferred from the fact, and was not proved by declarations connected with the fact, among which I should include the terms under which those who composed the assemblage were convened together, this defect could be entirely supplied by extrinsic testimony, not applying the intent conclusively to the particular fact, is a point on which I have entertained doubts which are not yet entirely removed. The opinion of Judge Iredell in the Case of Fries [Case No. 5,126], according to my understanding of it when read at the bar, appears to bear strongly on this point, and that opinion would be conclusive with me, at least while acting as an examining magistrate. I have not reviewed it particularly, because my decision will not depend on the propriety of admitting this mode of proving the intent. It has, also, been made a question, whether after proving a connection between the accused for some general object, the conversations of one of them may be given in evidence against any other than himself for the purpose of proving what that object was. On the part of the United States it is insisted that such conversations may be given in evidence on an indictment for treason in levying war. By the defence it is contended that such evidence is only admissible on indictments for a conspiracy, or on indictments where a conspiracy may be laid as an overt act.

The principle that one man shall not be criminated by the declarations of another, not assented to by him, nor made in due course of law, constitutes a rule of evidence which ought not unreflectingly to be invaded. It is one of those principles on which I do not think myself required to decide, because I am not sure that its decision, however interesting it might be on a trial in chief, would essentially affect the question of commitment, nor am I confident that its decision as argued on the part of the United States would introduce the testimony it was designed to introduce. In the English books generally, the position that the declarations of a person not on trial may be given in evidence against a man proved to have been connected with him, is laid down only in cases of conspiracy, where the crime is completed without any other open deed. The position is certainly not laid down with respect to such cases, in terms which exclude its application to others, but it is not laid down in general terms, and is affirmed to apply to those particular cases, without being affirmed to apply to others. From this general observation relative to the English books, East is to be excepted. He states the proposition generally. Yet it may well be doubted whether this general statement was not with a view to the law in that treason which, in England, almost swallows up every other.

But admitting the law to be the same in treason by levying war as in cases of conspiracy, how far does it extend? The doctrine on this subject was reviewed in the Case of Hardy and Tooke [unreported]. On the part of the crown, a letter of Thelwall containing seditious songs composed by himself, and sung in the society, was offered as evidence against Hardy, who was connected with Thelwall. This testimony was rejected, because it was not a part of the transaction itself, but an account of that transaction given by Thelwall to a person not engaged in the conspiracy. The court was divided, three for rejecting and two for admitting the evidence. A letter addressed by one conspirator to another, but not proved to have been received, was then offered and admitted against the opinion of the chief justice, who thought that such a letter did not amount to an act done which might be evidence, but only to a relation of that act, which could not be evidence. He was overruled, because a letter from one conspirator to another on the conspiracy was a complete act in that conspirator. The next paper offered was a letter from a society in the conspiracy, which was found in the possession of one of the conspirators, and this was unanimously admitted.

The principle which appears to be established by these decisions is, that a letter from one conspirator to another on the subject of the conspiracy is evidence against all, but that a letter from a conspirator to a person not connected with him, stating facts relative to the conspiracy, is only evidence against himself. How far a conversation held with a stranger for the purpose of bringing him into the plot may be considered as a transaction, and, therefore, testimony to show the general conspiracy, does not appear from these decisions. This species of evidence is received to show the general object of the conspiracy, but can affect no individual further than his assent to that object can be proved by such testimony as is admissible in ordinary cases. I notice this point for the purpose of observing that I do not decide it on the present motion.

The first question which arises on the evidence is: With what objects did those men convene who assembled at the mouth of Cumberland? Was it to separate the Western from the Eastern states by seizing and holding New Orleans? Was it to carry on an expedition against Mexico, making the embarkation at New Orleans? Was this expedition to depend on a war with Spain? The conversation held by Colonel Burr with Commodore Decatur stated his object to be an expedition against Mexico, which would be undertaken, as the commodore understood, with the approbation of government in the event of war. To General Eaton, he unfolded, in his various conversations, plans for invading Mexico, and also for severing the Western from the Atlantic states. To Commodore Truxton, he spoke of the invasion and conquest of Mexico in the event of a war, as a plan which he had digested in concert with General Wilkinson, and into which he was extremely desirous to draw the commodore. A circumstance is narrated by this witness which has been noticed by the counsel for the United States, and deserves consideration. It is the declaration of Colonel Burr that he was about to despatch two couriers with letters to General Wilkinson relative to the expedition. It was at this time that Messrs. Bollman and Swartwout are said to have left Philadelphia, carrying each a copy of the ciphered letter which has constituted so important a document in the various motions that have been made on this occasion. This letter, though expressed in terms of some ambiguity, has been understood by the supreme court, and is understood by me, to relate to a military expedition against the territories of a foreign prince. In this sense the testimony offered on the part of the United States shows it to have been also understood by Bollman, by Swartwout, and by General Wilkinson. The inference is very strong that this letter is the same to which Colonel Burr alluded in his conversation with Commodore Truxton, and strengthens the idea that the accused gave to that gentleman a true statement of the real object, so far at least as relates to the point against which his preparations were to be directed. All the conversation relative to an expedition by sea would be equally inapplicable to any attempt on the territories of the United States and to the settlement of lands. His conversations with the Messrs. Morgan certainly indicate that his mind was strongly directed to military objects, that he was not friendly to the present administration, and that he contemplated a separation of the Union as an event which would take place at no very distant day. His conversation with Lieutenant Jackson points in express terms to hostility against Spain. The conversations of Mr. Blennerhassett evince dispositions unfriendly to the Union, and his writings are obviously intended to disaffect the Western people, and to excite in their bosoms strong prejudices against their Atlantic brethren. That the object of these writings was to prepare the Western states for a dismemberment is apparent on the face of them, and was frequently avowed by himself. In a conversation with the Messrs. Henderson, which derives additional importance from the solemnity with which his communications were made, he laid open a plan for dismembering the Union, under the auspices of Mr. Burr. To others, at subsequent times, he spoke of the invasion of Mexico as the particular object to which the preparations then making were directed. In all those whom he sought to engage in the expedition, the idea was excited that, though the Wachita was its avowed object, it covered something more splendid, and the allusions to Mexico, when not direct, were scarcely to be misunstood. The language of Comfort Tyler also tends to prove that the enterprise was destined against Mexico. The communications made to Gen. Wilkinson deserve much consideration in marking the real intention of the parties, because it is obvious that Colonel Burr, whether with or without reason, calculated on his co-operation, with the army which he commanded, and that on this co-operation the execution of his plan greatly, if not absolutely, depended. To General Wilkinson both the ciphered letter and the explanations made by Bollman and Swartwout declared the expedition to be military and to be intended against Mexico.

I do not think the authenticity of this letter can now be questioned. When to the circumstances enumerated by the counsel on the part of the United States are added the testimony of Mr. Swartwout, and its being written in a cipher previously established between General Wilkinson and Colonel Burr, I think it sufficiently proved, at least for the present, although not in the hand-writing of the person to whom it is ascribed. The conversation stated by Gen. Wilkinson as passing between Mr. Swartwout and himself, so far as it is contradicted by that gentleman, cannot affect Mr. Burr, for this plain reason: the person alleged to have made those declarations avers not only that he never made them, but that he was never authorized to make them; that he never heard from Mr. Burr any sentiment indicating designs against any part of the United States, and never even suspected him of such designs. If, then, Gen. Wilkinson be correct, I must consider the observations he narrates as the conjectures of Mr. Swartwout, not authorized by Mr. Burr.

It is also a circumstance of some weight, that Mr. Burr's declarations at the mouth of Cumberland furnish strong reasons for the opinion that he did not wish those to whom he addressed himself to consider the Wachita as his real ultimate object, and the reference to further information from their particular leaders would naturally induce the expectation that without any open avowal their minds would be gradually conducted to the point to which their assent was to be obtained. We find there were rumors among them of attacking Baton Rouge, of attacking other parts of the Spanish dominions, but not a suggestion was heard of hostility against the United States.

On comparing the testimony adduced by the United States with itself, this is observable. That which relates to treason indicates the general design, while that which relates to misdemeanor points to the particular expedition which was actually commenced. Weighing the whole of this testimony, it appears to me to preponderate in favor of the opinion that the enterprise was really designed against Mexico.

But there is strong reason to suppose that the embarkation was to be made at New Orleans, and this, it is said, could not take place without subverting for a time the government of the territory, which, it is alleged, would be treason. The supreme court has said that to revolutionize a territory by force, although merely as a step to or a means of executing some greater projects is treason. But an embarkation of troops against a foreign country may be made without revolutionizing the government of the place, and without subverting the legitimate authority. It is true that violence might probably result from such an attempt, and treason might be the consequence of its execution; but this treason would arise incidentally, and would not be the direct object for which the men originally assembled. This treason would attach to those who committed it, but would not, I am inclined to think, infect a previous assemblage convened for a distinct purpose. If the object of the assemblage at the mouth of Cumberland was to embark at New Orleans for the purpose of invading Mexico, the law relative to that assemblage would be essentially different from what it might be if their direct object was to subvert the government of New Orleans by force. If, in prosecuting their purpose at New Orleans, war should be levied, this would be treason at New Orleans when the fact was committed, but it could not, I think, be said to be treason by levying war at the mouth of Cumberland, where the fact was neither committed nor intended. It might be otherwise, if at the mouth of Cumberland the determination to subvert the government of a territory by force had been formed.

This opinion may be in some degree illustrated by the doctrine of the English books. Levying of war is an overt act of compassing the king's death. So is a conspiracy to levy war, provided the conspiracy be direct against the king or his government. But if it be a conspiracy to do an act of constructive treason, which act, if done, would support an indictment for compassing the king's death, the conspiracy without the act will not support the indictment. So, in this case, if the object be embarkation of a body of men against a foreign country, in the execution of which war may or may not be levied, the fact becomes necessary to constitute the treason.

It is also a circumstance of considerable weight with me that the proof exhibited by the United States to establish a general design to dismember the Union applies only to Colonel Burr and Mr. Blennerhassett. It is not proved to have been ever communicated even to Tyler or Floyd. There is not only a failure to prove that such a design was communicated to, or even entertained by the men who were assembled at the mouth of Cumberland; but the contrary is in full evidence. The United States have adduced several witnesses belonging to that assemblage, who concur in declaring that they heard nothing, that they suspected nothing, and that they would have executed nothing hostile to the United States. This testimony cannot be disregarded, for it is uncontradicted, and is offered by the prosecution. How, then, can this assemblage be said to have levied war against the United States?

Had Burr and Blennerhassett constituted this meeting, no man could have construed it into an act of levying war, whatever might have been their purpose. Their being joined by others having no hostile intentions against the United States, who were attached to them with other views, and who would not permit themselves to be employed in the execution of such intentions, does not seem to me to alter the case. The reason why men in a posture of war may be said to levy war before a blow is struck, is that they are ready to strike, and war consists in the various movements of a military force, as well as in actual fighting. But these men were not ready nor willing to strike, nor could their chief be ready to strike without them. He had yet to prevail upon them to come into his measures. This is not a meeting for the purpose of executing a formal design, but a meeting for the purpose of forming a design. It is, therefore, more in the nature of conspiracy than actual war.

Suppose Mr. Burr had, at the mouth of Cumberland, declared his object to be to seize upon New Orleans and dismember the Union, and that upon this declaration his men had universally abandoned him, could this have been denominated an act of levying war? If we forget the constitution and laws of our country, if we suppose treason, like moral guilt, to consist in the intention, and that it may be legally evidenced by the words declaring that intention, the answer to this question may be in the affirmative; but it can only consist in an open deed of levying war. I confess myself unable to perceive how such a proposition can be construed into such a deed.

The case does not appear to me to be essentially varied by the circumstance that this design was not avowed, and that the men followed Colonel Burr with other views. Upon general principles, it appears to me that unless some act be committed from which a treasonable intent may be inferred, that the treasonable intent must be proved in the assemblage, where that assemblage is composed of free agents, as well as in the person who convenes them, before the law considers war as being actually levied.

This opinion is supposed to be contrary to the decision in the Cases of the Earls of Essex and Southampton [1 How. St. Tr. 1333]. I have examined that case as reported in the State Trials, and do not think it in any respect contradictory to the ideas I have delivered. The design of the Earl of Essex was to force his way into the palace, and to remove certain counsellors from the queen, who were his enemies; but he intended no hurt to the person of the queen. For the purpose of executing this design, he assembled a large body of armed men at his own house, who continued embodied after being ordered by the proper authority to disperse, and he also entered the city of London for the purpose of raising the citizens, in order further to aid him in the execution of his plan. Several consultations had been previously held at which the Earl of Southampton assisted, and it is not alleged in the case that he was not fully informed of these projects. He believed that no design was entertained against the person of the queen, and therefore that his acts were not treasonable; but in the law he was mistaken. In fact, no particular design against her person was entertained, and Essex as little suspected as Southampton that they were committing treason. They were ignorant that the law pronounced those facts to be treason, but they were neither ignorant of the facts themselves nor of the real intention with which those facts were committed.

In this case the judges delivered their opinion of the law on two points. The one, "that in case where a subject attempteth to put himself into such strength as the king should not be able to resist him, and to force and compel the king to govern otherwise than according to his own royal authority and direction, it is manifest rebellion." The other, "that in every rebellion the law intendeth as a consequent the compassing the death and deprivation of the king, as foreseeing that the rebel will never suffer that king to live or reign who might punish or take revenge of his treason or rebellion."

Under this law opinion of the judges, Essex and Southampton, were condemned and executed. The only difference between them was, that the quarrel was the quarrel of Essex, and Southampton only adhered to him, but he adhered to him knowing what he did, and the intention with which he acted.

Believing, then, the weight of testimony to be in favor of the opinion that the real and direct object of the expedition was Mexico, and inclining, also, to the opinion that, in law, either acts of hostility and resistance to the government, or a hostile intention in the body assembled, is necessary to convert a meeting of men with ordinary appearances into an act of levying war, it would, in my judgment, be improper in me to commit the accused on the charge of treason.

It is contended that they are not guilty of a misdemeanor, on one of these grounds: Either the United States were actually at war with Spain, or the expedition was dependent on war, and, in the event of peace, was to be converted into a settlement on the Wachita. It is alleged that we were at war with Spain, because a Spanish army had crossed the Sabine, and entered the territory of the United States. That a nation may be put in a state of war by the unequivocal aggressions of others, without any act of its own, is a proposition which I am not disposed to controvert, but I cannot concede this to be such an act. The boundaries claimed by the United States to their recent purchase of Louisiana are contested by Spain. Now, if either nation takes possession of the contested territory as its own, it is an act which the opposite government may elect to consider either as an act of war or otherwise, and only the government can make that election. No citizen is at liberty to make it, or to anticipate his government. But it is alleged that war, if not absolutely made, appeared to be inevitable, and that the prosecution of the expedition depended on its taking place. That the probability of war was great may be admitted, and this may extenuate the offence; but it still remains an offence which is punishable by law. If the expedition was really eventual, and was not to take place in the time of peace, then, certainly, preparations might be made for it without infracting any law; but this is a fact proper for the exclusive consideration of the jury, and I shall make no comment upon it which might, the one way or the other, influence their judgment.

I shall commit Aaron Burr and Harman Blennerhassett for preparing and providing the means for a military expedition against the territories of a foreign prince, with whom the United States were at peace. If those whose province and duty it is to prosecute offenders against the laws of the United States shall be of opinion that a crime of a deeper dye has been committed, it is at their choice to act in conformity with that opinion.

Israel Smith is not proved to have provided or prepared any means whatever, and therefore I shall not commit him. If he has really offended against the laws, he may be prosecuted for the treason in Kentucky, or for the misdemeanor in his own state, where (if anywhere) his offence has been committed.

After the delivery of the opinion of the court, the CHIEF JUSTICE observed that he had not specified (in that opinion) the particular district to which the defendants were to be committed. He thought it best that there should be only one trial for them; but if Burr was sent to Kentucky, Blennerhassett could not be, because he had provided no means for the expedition but in the district of Ohio.

Mr. Hay then moved for their commitment to Ohio, which was ordered.

Messrs. Burr and Blennerhassett were admitted to bail, in the sum of three thousand dollars each. Luther Martin and Dr. Cummings, securities for A. Burr; Dr. Cummings and Israel Smith, for H. Blennerhassett.

The court then adjourned.

Case No. 14,695.

UNITED STATES v. BURROUGHS.

[3 McLean, 405;[1] 2 West. Law J. 63, 119.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1844.

EMBEZZLEMENT FROM MAIL—INDICTMENT—OWNERSHIP OF STOLEN PROPERTY—VARIANCE—SURPLUSAGE—VERDICT.

1. A and B deposited certain bank notes with C and D, to be forwarded to the bank, with certain other notes on the same bank, owned by C and D; and the notes having been all stolen from the mail, may be laid in the indictment as the property of C and D.

[Cited in U. S. v. Jones, 31 Fed. 726.]

[Cited in brief in State v. Beatty, 90 Mo. 144, 2 S. W. 215.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

2. A slight and unsubstantial variance between the indictment and the proof, in regard to the direction of a letter which is not produced, and which the witness states, after the lapse of two years, with doubt, ought not to exclude the evidence.

3. And this is especially the case if, under some counts in the indictment, the objection of variance does not apply.

4. A carrier of the mail, for an offence under the law punishable generally, may be convicted, though not as carrier.

5. And being charged as carrier in the indictment, there being no such offence described, the word "carrier" will be considered as descriptive of his person and as surplusage.

6. One or more good counts in an indictment will sustain a general verdict of guilty, though there be one or more bad counts in it.

[Cited in U. S. v. Burns, Case No. 14,691; U. S. v. Patterson, Id. 16,011; U. S. v. Plumer, Id. 16,056.]

[W. M. Corry moved for a new trial upon the following grounds, which were also urged to the court and jury at the trial:

[The verdict, except on the second count, is unsustained by the evidence. The punishment for the offence mentioned in that count cannot exceed 6 months imprisonment, and a fine. The verdict on the first count cannot be sustained, for the 22d section of the post-office act only provides for the case of stealing the mail from, and not by, the person having the custody of it; the words being "with or without the consent of the person having the custody thereof." It is unnecessary to consider whether the offence charged in this count could be the subject of an indictment in the state court, for the jurisdiction of this court is given only by the law of congress, which does not provide for the case of "stealing the mail" by the person having custody thereof, although the other clauses do provide for the case of the stealing &c. of a letter by such a person; and the indictment must rest therefore upon these latter clauses. See Pooley's Case (Old Bailey, 1801) 1 East. P. C., addenda, 17; Brown's Case, Russ. & R. 32, and the note of decisions on similar enactments; 3 Burn, J. P. 743; Rosc. 703. None of the other counts (except the 2d ut supra) is sustained by the proof, for they all charge that the property in the notes was in Semple & Barker, whereas after the notes were mixed together so that they could not be distinguished one from the other, Semple, Barker, Cooper and Kay, became tenants in common of the whole mass according to their respective proportions. Such is the effect in all cases where the property of different persons is rightf '-ly mixed together. Where it is wrongfully mixed, the wrong doer forfeits his share of the whole to the other owners. 1 Hale, P. C. 413; 2 Bl. Comm. 405; 2 Kent, Comm. 364; Inst. 2, 1, 26, 28; Com. Dig. Pl. (3 M.) 20; Story, Bailm. § 40; 21 Pick. 298, 304; 2 Johns. Ch. 108; 2 Blackf. 377; 2 Camp. 576; 1 Vern. 217; 2 Vern. 516; 2 Dane, Abr. 119; 19 Ves. 432; 7 Mass. 127; Bac. Abr. "Trespass," E, 2. After Semple and Barker had mixed the notes together, and while they retained the possession of the whole, they had a special property in the whole, and could have maintained trover against any person taking them away. But when they had posted the letter containing all the notes, and had thus parted with the possession of the individual portion that had been committed to their charge, in pursuance of the bailment, they retained no right, either of property or possession in the individual share of Cooper and Hay. The only remaining interest of Semple and Barker, was the right of property in their own undivided share, whereas the indictment treats the sole property in a part of the notes to be in them. As their interest was one in common, and not sole, the indictment is not sustained by the evidence in this vital respect. Neither is the allegation, that the letter was directed to "M. Garraty, Esq., Cashier," made out by the evidence. The witness thought that the address did not contain the word "Cashier."

[Charles Anthony, U. S. Dist. Atty., argued that the carrier of a mail might be guilty of stealing it; that the 3d and subsequent counts were sustained by the evidence, as Semple and Barker had possession of the whole of the notes, and that the doctrine as to mixing property belonging to different owners, did not apply to a description of the ownership in an indictment. And that the omission to prove the superscription of the letter to be as stated in the indictment was immaterial, especially as the other counts were sustained.][2]

Jordan A. Pugh and W. M. Corry, for prisoner.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The jury having returned a verdict of guilty, on the seven counts contained in the indictment, a motion is now made for a new trial, and also in arrest of judgment:

On two grounds, the defendant's counsel insist that a new trial should be granted. 1. "Because the bank notes alleged to have been stolen, are stated, in all the counts of the indictment, to be the property of Semple and Barker, whereas the proof showed that they were the property of those persons and two other individuals." 2. "Because the proof was that the letter, which contained the notes, is averred in the indictment to have been directed to 'M. Garraty, Esquire, Cashier,' and the proof was, that it was directed to 'M. Garraty, Esquire.'"

It was proved that there were enclosed in the letter, bank notes on the Lancaster (Ohio) Bank, amounting to two hundred and six dollars; one hundred and ten dollars of which belonged to Semple and Barker, and the residue to James L. Cooper and C. H. Kay. That these latter individuals deposited their notes with Semple and Barker, to be forwarded to the bank to procure exchanges. All the notes were enclosed in the same letter, by Semple and Barker, which was signed by them. This is not a question between bailor and bailee; but the only inquiry is, whether there was such a property of all the notes in Semple and Barker, as sustains the allegation in the indictment. On this point there can be no doubt. They had possession of the notes for a special purpose, and were responsible for an improper use of them. The argument that they had parted with the possession of the notes, by enclosing them in a letter, by mail, requires no answer. A mere carrier may be described as the owner of the goods. 1 Hale, P. C. 512. Goods stolen from a washerwoman, may be described as hers, because she is answerable for them. 1 Leach. 357. If a coach be standing in the yard of a coach maker to be repaired, and a plate of glass and hammer cloth be stolen from it, the property may be well laid in the owner of the premises. Id. 356. "Where a parcel is stolen from the boot of a stage, the property may be laid in the driver, though he may be no proprietor of the goods or the coach; and though as against his employers he has a bare charge, but as against the rest of the world, he has a legal possession." Id.

The second ground, as regards the direction of the letter, affords no sufficient reason for setting aside the verdict. Barker, who directed the letter, says that his impression is, that it was directed to "M. Garraty, Esquire, Lancaster, Ohio," but he does not speak positively on the subject. He made no entry of the superscription, and as two years have elapsed, it is hardly to be expected that he should be able to state the fact positively. In Rosc. Ev. 199, "in an indictment upon 7 Geo. III., c. 50, the letter was described as one to be delivered to persons using, in trade, the name and firm of Messrs. B. N. & H.," the word, Messrs., being frequently added to their address, in the direction of letters and other papers received on business, though they themselves, in drawing bills, never used the word. "This was held to be no variance." If the letter had been presented, and the direction of it varied from the allegation in the indictment, it could not have been received in evidence. For, although the direction of the letter need not to have been stated in the indictment, yet having been stated, the proof must correspond with the allegation. But in this case the letter was not produced; the statement of the witness not being positive as to the variance, and the jury having found the defendant guilty generally, the verdict, it seems to us, should not be set aside. There is another view which is conclusive on this point. All the counts of the indictment, except three, are free from the objection of variance. The second count alleges that the letter was addressed to "M. Garraty, Esquire, Lancaster, Ohio." The fifth count charges the defendant with embezzling a bag of letters, as carrier, which contained a bank note. And the sixth count contains the same charge, except a mail of letters is used instead of a bag of letters. The punishment on the two last counts, or either of them, is the same as on the three counts where the variance, if any, exists. So that, the finding of the defendant guilty on those counts does not, in the least, change the nature or amount of the punishment.

A motion for a new trial is addressed to the discretion of the court, and that discretion should never be exercised in favor of a defendant in a civil or criminal case, where substantial justice has been done, and where there is no principle of law which can operate favorably to the defendant. The letter, beyond dispute, was evidence under all the counts, except the third, fourth and seventh. The motion for a new trial is overruled. The motion in arrest of judgment is mainly founded upon the first count in the indictment, which charges the defendant with stealing the mail of the United States. In England, by the statute of 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, a material change has been made in the law, so that many exceptions to an indictment, which were before fatal on a motion in arrest, now must be taken advantage of by demurrer or writ of error. This, however, is not the law in this country. It is insisted that the carrier of the mail, if he take it fraudulently, is only guilty of a breach of trust; that such is the rule at common law, and that the act of congress does not make it an offence. In 1 Leach, 1, it is expressly laid down, that at common law, persons employed in the post-office, have no special property in the letters committed to their charge, which may prevent their stealing from amounting to larceny. If a bag of wheat be delivered to a warehouse man for safe custody, and he take the wheat out of the bag and dispose of it, it is larceny. Russ. & R., 337. Where a clerk embezzled a bill of exchange, which he had received in the usual course of business to be transmitted by post, it was held to be larceny. Case of Paradice, 2 East, P. C. 565; Case of Taylor [3 Bos. & P. 596]. The courts of the United States have no common law jurisdiction of offences, and the above citations are only made to show that the ground assumed as to the acts of the carrier, at common law, is not sustainable. It is admitted, that unless the charge in the first count is sustained under the twenty-second section of the post-office act of 1825 [4 Stat. 108], the count is bad. The words of the section are, "And if any person shall steal the mail, or shall steal or take from or out of any mail, or from or out of any post-office, any letter or packet; or if any person shall take the mail, or any letter or packet therefrom, or from any post-office, whether with or without the consent of the person having custody thereof, and shall open, embezzle or destroy any such mail, letter or packet, the same containing any article of value, or any other article, paper or thing mentioned in the twenty-first section of this act; or if any person shall, by fraud or deception, obtain from any person having custody thereof, any mail, letter or packet containing any article of value, &c., such offender on conviction shall be imprisoned not less than two, nor exceeding ten years." As the carrier of the mail, for any act of violence upon it, is punished with much greater severity than is provided in the above section, a presumption arises that the legislature did not consider the section as applying to a mail carrier. And this view is strengthened, by the provision that the offender shall be equally liable, "whether the mail, letter or packet, was obtained with or without the consent of the person having it in custody." Still, if the language of the section clearly embrace the offence charged, and it is punished nowhere else, the language of the section must govern, whatever may be supposed to have been within the mind of the legislature. It is very clear the defendant cannot be punished as carrier of the mail; but the question is, whether the word "carrier" may not be considered as descriptive of the person, and not as aggravating the offence. Because an individual is a carrier of the mail, it does not follow that he is exempt from punishment for offences disconnected with his employment. Suppose the carrier of the mail should steal a horse, and in the indictment for it he should be described as the carrier of the mail, would that vitiate the indictment? Surely not. As carrier he is not punishable for stealing a horse, but as an individual he is punishable. The description, as carrier, would be regarded as surplusage. And this rule applies to the case under consideration.

The defendant is charged, as carrier, with stealing the mail. Now, there is no such offence known to the law. But stealing the mail is an offence, and, it is supposed, that the defendant, to such a charge, could not plead in justification or excuse that he was a carrier of the mail. Suppose a carrier of the mail should steal a letter from a post-office, and should be indicted for the taking of the letter as carrier, could he not be convicted? His description as carrier would be considered as used to identify him, and not as constituting an ingredient by which the penalty is to be measured. It is supposed that the count is defective, because the property of the mail is not laid to be in the United States, or in any one; nor is its value stated. This being a statutory offence, the value of the mail need not be stated, any more than the value of the letter. If a letter be stolen from a post-office, which contains an article of value, a higher punishment is inflicted on the offender, and consequently the article must be described and the value of it stated. But for the taking of a letter, which contains nothing of value, no value need be averred; and so it is in regard to the mail. I confess that I am inclined to think, if a carrier of the mail, having possession of it, shall steal it, he cannot escape, for the reason that there is no provision in the statute to punish him as carrier. The act is punishable, and I see no reason why a carrier of the mail should escape. But it is unnecessary to overrule the motion in arrest, on this ground. The court do not decide the question. If the first count be bad, there being other counts in the indictment which are good, on a general verdict of guilty, the judgment cannot be arrested. In this, an indictment differs from a declaration. For one defective count in the latter, the judgment must be arrested; while in the former, one good count sustains the verdict. The motion in arrest of judgment was overruled; and the defendant was sentenced to ten years imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor.

UNITED STATES (BURROUGHS v.). See Case No. 2,202.

Case No. 14,696.

UNITED STATES v. BUTLER et al.

[2 Blatchf. 201.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 17, 1851.

JUDGMENT—PAYMENT BY CREDITOR OF PRIOR INCUMBRANCE—RENTS AND PROFITS—LIEN.

1. Where, on the filing of a bill to remove an incumbrance on land, so that it may be sold under the plaintiff's judgment, a receiver is appointed of the rents and profits of the land, they are, in equity, subject to the lien and claim of the judgment, the same as the land itself.

2. Where the parties to such a suit settle it, the plaintiff getting rid of the incumbrance by paying to its holder a certain sum, and the land being thus left subject only to his judgment, the result is, in legal effect, the same, as it respects the lien of the judgment, as if a decree were to be made in the suit that, on payment of the sum, the prior incumbrance should be discharged.

3. On the payment of such sum by the plaintiff, under a decree, the land and the rents and profits would be applicable to the plaintiff's judgment; and, the incumbrance being disposed of by settlement, the land and the rents and profits that have accrued become subject to the judgment.

4. Nor does the fact that the land is then sold under the judgment, and satisfaction entered of the judgment, that being done in pursuance of an agreement with the defendant in the judgment, affect the right of the plaintiff to those rents and profits. They are, in equity, immediately applicable to the judgment when the right under the incumbrance is disposed of; and the agreement to enter the satisfaction after selling the land and applying the proceeds, will be construed, upon a fair interpretation, to intend that the rents and profits which have accrued and are in the hands of the receiver shall also be applied on the judgment.

This was a demurrer to a supplemental bill. The facts were these: In December, 1816, the plaintiffs recovered a judgment against the defendant Thomas C. Butler, in the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New-York, for a large amount. The judgment was recovered on duty bonds, on which Butler and also one Minturn and one J. Sturgis were sureties for others. On the 12th of August, 1816, Butler and wife executed to J. Sturgis a mortgage, covering certain houses and lots in the city of New-York, to secure the payment of $27,000, without interest, in one year thereafter. The mortgage was given to indemnify J. Sturgis against liability on the said bonds. On the 31st of March, 1823, there was upwards of $30,000 due on the judgment against Butler, and on that day the original bill in this cause was filed, to remove the said mortgage as an incumbrance upon the lots, so that they could be sold under the said judgment. J. Sturgis had paid nothing, as surety to the government. Butler put in an answer to the original bill, admitting that the mortgage was given to J. Sturgis for the purpose of raising money to pay the bonds or the judgments recovered upon them; that he had so advised the attorney of the United States; and that he had received no consideration from J. Sturgis for the same. J. Sturgis also answered the original bill, alleging, among other things, that Butler was indebted to him at the time of giving the mortgage; that it was not given solely to indemnify him as surety to the plaintiffs on the bonds; that he had assigned the mortgage to secure the sum of $15,000 due and owing to the firm of Sturgis & Burrows, in Savannah, Georgia; and that Butler had admitted to him that funds had been put into his hands by Minturn & Champlin, the principal debtors in the bonds, to satisfy them, and had stated that he would be kept harmless. On the 11th of February, 1825, a supplemental bill was filed, making Burrows, the surviving partner of Sturgis & Burrows, a defendant, and praying a discovery as to the assignment of the mortgage, and that it might be delivered up and cancelled. Burrows answered, setting up a large indebtedness of J. Sturgis to him and his partner, and alleging that the assignment of the mortgage to them was made in part satisfaction of the same. Replications were filed to the original and supplemental bills, and proofs were taken in the case, and it was brought to a hearing, and, on the 20th of June, 1826, an order was made referring the case to a master, to take and state an account between the defendants Butler and J. Sturgis. [Case No. 16,414.] On the 7th of June, 1827, a further order was entered, appointing Thomas C. Bolton, the master, a receiver of the rents and issues of the premises covered by the mortgage. Before the master completed the reference, and on the 25th of July, 1830, an order was entered discharging him as master and receiver, and appointing in his place Murray Hoffman, who was authorized to receive the balance of money in the hands of Bolton, and deposit it in the New York Life Insurance and Trust Company. Hoffman continued as such receiver down to the sale, hereafter mentioned, of the mortgaged premises.

By an act of congress, passed March 24, 1834, (6 Stat. 555,) the secretary of the treasury was authorized to compromise the bonds and judgments, with the parties liable on them, and particularly with Minturn, surviving partner of Minturn & Champlin, the principal debtors. An arrangement was accordingly made, by which Burrows, the surviving partner of Sturgis & Burrows, in consideration of $6,000, assigned the mortgage to the plaintiffs; and it was further agreed, on the 12th of June, 1834, between the secretary and Minturn, by way of compromising and settling all the claims of the United States upon the late firm of Minturn & Champlin and their sureties, that Minturn should procure to be assigned to the United States the mortgage given by Butler to J. Sturgis, in order to clear the premises from embarrassment, so that they could be made available towards the payment of the judgment against Butler, and, in consideration of the assignment having been made, the plaintiffs stipulated to release all the judgments, (there having been separate judgments against the principal debtors and each of the sureties,) and to discharge them of record, as soon as the mortgaged premises should be sold under the mortgage, or otherwise disposed of. The premises were sold under the judgment against Butler, on the 10th of March, 1838, and purchased by John Rathbone for $25,500, which was much less than the amount then due on the judgment, and the mortgage was assigned to him as a muniment of title. Satisfaction of the several judgments was entered of record on the 4th of August, 1840.

The supplemental bill which was now filed set forth the above facts, and alleged that Hoffman, the receiver, had in his hands $9,000; that a large sum of money, far exceeding the sum in the hands of the receiver, remained due on the judgment against Butler, over and beyond the amount brought by the sale of the mortgaged premises; and that the defendants Laird M. H. Butler and Jonas Butler claimed the funds in the receiver's hands, under an assignment of some interest in the lots from T. C. Butler, but the bill charged that it was made, if at all, during the pendency of the suits against T. C. Butler and the others, and of which these defendants were chargeable with notice. The bill also set forth various judgments recovered by the plaintiffs against T. C. Butler for debts due from him individually, and which remained unpaid, and were a lien on the lots covered by the mortgage, or on T. C. Butler's equity of redemption in them. The bill prayed that the sum in the receiver's hands might be directed to be paid over to the plaintiffs on the balance remaining upon the first-mentioned judgment against T. C. Butler, or upon those last-named. To this supplemental bill T. C. Butler and L. M. H. Butler demurred.

Benjamin F. Butler, for plaintiffs.
Edward Sandford, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The answer of Thomas C. Butler to the original bill admits that the mortgage was given to Sturgis for the benefit of the plaintiffs, that is, for the purpose of raising money to pay the judgments recovered on the custom-house bonds, and was, therefore, properly no real incumbrance on the premises, as respected the judgment against Butler. So far as his interest was concerned, therefore, they might have been sold at once under the judgment, and the proceeds applied in payment. The sale, however, was embarrassed by the interest in the mortgage set up by Sturgis, the mortgagee, and by Sturgis & Burrows, the assignees under him. But as, on the filing of the bill to remove this incumbrance, a receiver had been appointed, for the purpose of securing the rents and profits pending the litigation, that they might be applied towards the satisfaction of the judgment, if necessary, they are, in equity, to be deemed subject to the lien and claim by virtue of the judgment, the same as the premises themselves.

The rents and profits thus accruing would have been applied to the judgment, together with the proceeds of the sale, if the proceedings in equity had gone to a final decree in favor of the plaintiffs. Certainly, there would have been no ground for any other disposition, as it respected Butler or those coming in under him, as he had admitted that the premises were subject to the lien of the judgment, from the time it was docketed, free from the mortgage. The litigation with him, as it respected the mortgage, and the right of applying the premises to the satisfaction of the judgment, ended on the coming in of his answer. It continued only in respect to the claim of Sturgis and his assignees. If they had succeeded in establishing the mortgage, and if the premises had, on being sold, turned out to be insufficient to satisfy that security, perhaps they would, it being the first lien, have been entitled, in equity, to have the rents and profits accruing and in the hands of the receiver applied to its payment. That was a question, however, between the plaintiffs and those parties.

Has, then, the settlement made with Minturn and the assignees of the mortgage in any way affected the right of the plaintiffs to this fund? I do not see how this can be. The parties, instead of carrying on the litigation to a final determination, preferred to settle it; and the plaintiffs, by paying the sum of $6,000, got rid of the mortgage incumbrance, and the premises were thus left subject only to the lien of their judgment. In legal effect, the result is the same, as it respects the lien of the judgment, as if a decree had been made, on the coming in of the master's report, that, on payment of such sum, the prior incumbrance should be discharged. On the payment of that sum, the premises and the rents and profits that had accrued and were in the hands of the receiver, would have been applicable to the judgment of the plaintiffs against Butler. The mortgage having been got rid of by the settlement, every thing was accomplished that would have been by a decree to the effect above stated. The land and the rents and profits that had accrued became subject to the judgment; and this is what, as is apparent, was intended by the parties, in their arrangement.

Neither does the entry of satisfaction of the judgment after the sale in any way affect the right of the plaintiffs to the rents and profits. They were in court, awaiting the result of the litigation, to be applied to the judgment; and, in equity, were immediately applicable, when the right under the mortgage was disposed of. Besides, the whole scope of the settlement clearly shows, that it was intended by all parties concerned, that the premises covered by the mortgage, and the rents and profits that had accrued and of right belonged to the judgment creditors, should be applied to the plaintiffs' demand. Butler had nothing to say in the matter, as he had admitted this right in his answer.

I am satisfied, therefore, that there is sufficient equity in the bill to entitle the plaintiffs to this fund, and that the demurrer should be overruled.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1806.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—SLAVE.

Assault and battery of a slave is an indictable offence.

Indictment [against Isaac Butler] for beating a woman of color (a slave) to her damage, and against the peace and dignity of the government of the United States.

Mr. Hamilton, for the traverser, contended that beating a slave was not an indictable offence.

CURIA, contra. The property which a man has in a slave is not of the same nature as his property in a horse. It is only a right to his perpetual service.

UNITED STATES v. BUTLER.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 422.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1807.

If a witness appear in court at the term mentioned in his recognizance, and no default be entered against him at that term, and the recognizance be not respited, he is not bound by the recognizance to attend at the following term, although the cause should be continued.

Scire facias against a surety of a witness, bound by recognizance to appear at June term, 1804, and not to depart without leave of court. The breach assigned was that the witness failed to appear according to the recognizance. Upon the trial of the issue the evidence offered, to show the breach, was a record of November term, 1804, stating that the witness was called and failed to appear. There was no record of the respite of the recognizance, nor of a continuance of it, nor of any order for the witness to attend again. It appeared, upon the record of June term, that the witness was allowed for four days' attendance on the prosecution at that term.

THE COURT (nem. con.) said that the record of the default of the witness at November term was not evidence of a breach of the recognizance by not appearing, unless there was a record of a respite, &c., and even then it was doubtful whether the breach assigned should not be that the witness had departed without leave of the court.

Verdict for the defendant.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1812.

WITNESS—SLAVE—FREE NEGROES.

1. A slave is not a competent witness against a free black person, in a capital case.

2. But free blacks, unless they are in a state of servitude by law, are competent witnesses against free blacks.

Indictment for arson in burning the stable of Hieronimus.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, offered a slave as a witness.

Mr. Key, for defendant [Minta Butler, a free black woman], objected that he was not a competent witness against a free negro in a capital case.

Mr. Jones admitted the objection to be good.

Mr. Key then objected to free negroes as witnesses against the prisoner, and cited the Maryland act of 1717, c. 13, § 3.

But THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent,) said that only free negroes, during their term of servitude by law, or mulattoes, during their term of servitude by law, were excluded by that act.

UNITED STATES v. BUTLER et al.[1]

[1 Hughes, 457.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. April 1877.

INDICTMENT—FINDING AND ENTRY—GRAND JURY—CHALLENGE TO ARRAY—PETIT JURORS—CHALLENGES—CONSPIRACY—CIRCUIT COURT JURISDICTION.

1. It is not necessary that the finding of a grand jury upon a bill of indictment presented by them should be read in open court.

2. The handing of the bill to the clerk in open court, and the entry of it by him on the records, is a sufficient publication of the finding of the grand jury.

3. A challenge to the array of the grand jury cannot be made after the jury is organized and has entered upon its duties.

4. The jurisdiction of the United States circuit court for the district of South Carolina extends throughout the entire state.

5. The district attorney is not bound to furnish the defendants with the names of the prosecutor and witnesses in a criminal case not capital.

6. In challenging the petit jurors, the right of peremptory challenge need not be exercised until the opportunity of rejecting for cause is afforded.

7. In presenting jurors for challenge, the government must first exercise its right, and then the defence.

8. As the government is allowed the right of peremptory challenge, it cannot ask a juror to stand aside until the panel is exhausted before challenging for cause or peremptorily.

9. It is a good cause of challenge to a juror, that he has voluntarily joined the Rebellion. See Rev. St. § 820.

10. To convict under this indictment, for conspiracy contrary to the provisions of sections 5508 and 5520, Rev. St., it is not necessary to find that the conspiracy charged was formed against the voter named in the indictment alone. It is sufficient if it is made to appear that he was included among persons actually conspired against.

11. Every member of a conspiracy is responsible, personally, for the acts of every member thereof, done in furtherance of its illegal purposes, whether he be himself present or not.

12. A "reasonable doubt" is something more than a captious doubt. It must be a doubt for which a reason can be given.

[Cited in U. S. v. Stevens, Case No. 16,392.]

13. All citizens of the United States, whether white or black, are included within the protection of the statute alleged to have been violated by the defendants.

This was an indictment for conspiracy against one David Bush to prevent him from giving his support in favor of the election of one Robert Smalls as a member of congress, etc. The indictment was drawn under the provisions of sections 5508 and 5520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It consisted of five counts as originally drawn, but the first count was held bad upon demurrer.

[An information filed by the district attorney against the same parties was quashed. Case No. 14,701.]

The indictment was as follows, the formal parts being omitted:

First Count. That Andrew Pickens Butler, George W. Croft, August P. Brown, Abner W. Atkinson, George W. Bush, George B. Bush, Paul F. Bowers, Augustus McDaniels, William S Bush, John Bowers, Whitmore W. Stallings, and John M. Bush, together with divers other evil-disposed persons, to the jurors aforesaid as yet unknown, late of Aiken county, South Carolina, on the 18th day of September, A. D. 1876, at Aiken county, in the state of South Carolina, in said district, and within the jurisdiction of this court, unlawfully did conspire together to prevent, by force, intimidation, and threat, one David Bush, a male citizen of the state of South Carolina, and of the United States, who was then and there lawfully entitled to vote at any election by the people in said county, state, and district, from giving his support and advocacy in a legal manner toward and in favor of Christopher C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cooke, and William F. Meyers, lawfully qualified persons, as electors for president and vice-president of the United States, contrary to section 5520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, etc.

Second Count. That Andrew Pickens Butler, etc., together with divers other evil-disposed persons, to the said jurors now unknown, late of Aiken county, in the state of South Carolina, on the 18th day of September, 1876, at Aiken county, in the state of South Carolina, in said district, and within the jurisdiction of this court, unlawfully did conspire together to prevent, by force, intimidation, and threat, one David Bush, a male citizen of the United States and of the state of South Carolina, who was then and there lawfully entitled, as an elector, to vote at any election by the people in said county, state, and district, from giving his support and advocacy in a legal manner toward and in favor of the election of one Robert Smalls, a lawfully qualified person, as a member of the forty-fifth congress of the United States, contrary to section 5520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, etc.

Third Count. That Andrew Pickens Butler, etc., together with divers other evil-disposed persons, to the jurors aforesaid now unknown, late of Aiken county, in the state of South Carolina, on the 18th day of September, in the year 1876, at Aiken county, in the state of South Carolina, in said district and within the jurisdiction of this court, unlawfully did conspire together to injure in his person and property one David Bush, a male citizen of the United States and the state of South Carolina, of African descent, who, then and there, was lawfully entitled to vote at any election by the people in said county, state, and district, on account of his giving his support and advocacy in a legal manner in favor of the election of one Robert Smalls, a lawfully qualified person, as a member of the forty-fifth congress of the United States, contrary to section 5520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, etc.

Fourth Count. That Andrew Pickens Butler, etc., together with divers other evil-disposed persons, to the jurors aforesaid as yet unknown, late of Aiken county, in the state of South Carolina, at Aiken county, in the state of South Carolina, in said district, and within the jurisdiction of this court, on the sixteenth day of September, in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-six, unlawfully did conspire together to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate one David Bush, a male citizen of the United States, and of the state of South Carolina, of African descent, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, and duly qualified to vote at any election by the people in said county, state, and district, in the free exercise of the right and privilege secured to him by the laws of the United States, to wit, in the free exercise of the right and privilege secured to him by section two thousand and four of the Revised Statutes of the United States to vote at a general election by the people, held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, on account of the race and color of him, the said David Bush, contrary to the provisions of section five thousand five hundred and eight of the Revised Statutes of the United States, etc.

Fifth Count. That said Andrew Pickens Butler, etc., together with divers other evil-disposed persons, to the jurors aforesaid as yet unknown, late of Aiken county, South Carolina, on the sixteenth day of September, A. D. eighteen hundred and seventy-six, at Aiken county, in the state of South Carolina, in said district, and within the jurisdiction of this court, unlawfully did conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate one David Bush, a male citizen of the United States, and of the state of South Carolina, of African descent, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, and duly qualified as an elector, to vote at any election by the people in said county, state, and district, for representatives in the congress of the United States, in the free exercise of the right and privilege secured to him by the laws of the United States, to wit, in the free exercise of the right and privilege secured to him by section two thousand and four of the Revised Statutes of the United States to vote, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, for a representative in the congress of the United States from the Fifth congressional district of the state of South Carolina, at an election held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, on account of the race and color of him, the said David Bush, contrary to the provisions of section five thousand five hundred and eight of the Revised Statutes of the United States, etc.

On the case being called, on motion of the defendants' counsel, the case against A. P. Butler was continued, on the ground that he was a member of the state senate of South Carolina, which was then in session. The counsel for the defence moved that their clients be not compelled to answer to the indictment, on the ground that it was not a legal indictment, as there had been no formal publication of the finding of the grand jury in court.

BOND, Circuit Judge, stated that he remembered the circumstances of the finding of this indictment. It had been brought in by the grand jury, the foreman had handed it to the clerk, by whom it was handed to the court for inspection, and afterwards it was handed back to the clerk for entry. The names of the grand jurors had been called out, and they had been asked if this was their finding, and they had answered that it was. That the handing of the indictment to the clerk, and the entry of it on the record was all the publication ever intended. It was not meant that the whole world should know who were indicted, and for what offences, because the accused could then escape.

WAITE, Circuit Justice, stated that he had never known any other practice.

The counsel for the defendants continued to urge their objection to the indictment upon this ground, but the court adhered to its ruling. The defendants' counsel then challenged the array of the grand jury on several grounds, the principal of which were the following: The grand jurors who were summoned and appeared at the present term of the court were not designated, according to the mode of forming such juries, then practiced in the state courts of the state of South Carolina so far as such mode was practicable in this, that the commissioners who selected the citizens whose names were placed on the jury list, were designated by officers in the judiciary department of the United States government, and were not officers elected by the people, nor appointed by the executive department, as are the like jury commissioners elected and appointed by the state laws which regulate the practice of forming juries in the state courts, and that for the purpose of forming said juries, neither the rule LI of the circuit courts of the United States for the district of South Carolina, nor the order of the circuit court of December 8th, 1876, under which the said juries were formed, conformed the designation and impanelling of juries to the laws and usages relating to jurors in the state courts, in force in said state, at the date of such order as required by section 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That the commissioners so designated by the order of the court for the selection of said juries were themselves officers of the government, and were not calculated to be most favorable to an impartial trial in cases of prosecutions by the government. That the writs of venire were served and returned by the United States marshal for the Eastern district of South Carolina, R. M. Wallace, Esq., who is not "an indifferent person," as required by section 803 of the United States Revised Statutes. That the array of grand jurors returned and accepted is composed of five persons who are not in the venire, and are not returned as additional grand jurors as required by section 808 of the United States Revised Statutes, having been returned as additional jurors by the United States marshal under an order of a judge of the United States court, not issued in the case contemplated by said section, viz., "If, of the persons summoned, less than sixteen attend, they shall be placed on the grand jury, and the court shall order the marshal to summon, either immediately, or on a day fixed, from the body of the district, and not from the bystanders, a sufficient number of persons to complete the grand jury;" whereas these challengers say that eighteen of the grand jurors summoned appeared, and the additional grand jurors summoned by said order were not necessary to complete said grand jury. The additional grand jurors so summoned were not from the body of the district, as required by section 808 of the Revised Statutes.

The commissioners designated by the said order of 8th December, 1876, were not persons residing in the Eastern district of South Carolina. The citizens selected by the said commissioners were not selected from the several counties composing the district of the state in which the trial is proposed to be had, in which the accused reside, and in which the alleged offences were said to have been committed, viz., the Eastern district of South Carolina; but a portion of the citizens so selected were selected from counties within the Western district of said state. The court disallowed the challenge to the array on the ground that such a challenge must be made before the jury is impanelled, and that it cannot be made after it has been organized and has entered upon the discharge of its duties. As to the objection that the grand jurors were not all drawn from the Eastern district of South Carolina, the court held: "As to the question of the jurisdiction of this court throughout the entire state of South Carolina, we decide, for the purposes of this trial, in favor of the jurisdiction. This is in accordance with the uniform practice of the court, without objection from any quarter, for nearly half a century. If, after the trial, it is thought desirable to bring the point again to our attention we will consider it, and, in case of disagreement between us as to its proper determination, certify it to the supreme court for decision."

It was then moved to quash the indictment upon the same grounds as those urged in the challenge to the array, but the court overruled the motion. A demurrer was thereupon filed to the indictment.

The grounds of demurrer were substantially as follows: As to the first count—(1) That the force, intimidation, and threat therein charged are not particularized. (2) That the support and advocacy therein set forth are not particularized. (3) That the legal manner of giving such support and advocacy is not particularized. (4) That the support and advocacy are not stated to be in favor of the persons named as electors. (5) That the persons named as electors are not stated to have been qualified at any time or place. (6) That no place in Aiken county has been specified as the place where the alleged conspiracy was formed. (7) That no election, nor time, nor place thereof is alleged. As to the second count—Same as to first count except (4) That Robert Smalls is not stated to have been a lawfully qualified person as member of congress at any time or place. (5) That it is not stated that the said Robert Smalls was a candidate. (6) That it is not stated from what state or congressional district said Robert Smalls was to be elected, nor from what congressional district he was a lawfully qualified person as a member of congress. As to the third count—Same as first count, except 2d and 5th grounds. (2) That no mode or means of injuring the said David Bush in his person or property is alleged. (5) That it is not stated from what congressional district the election of said Robert Smalls was sought to be supported and advocated, nor from what election district he was a lawfully qualified person as a member of congress. That as to all of said first, second, and third counts in said indictment, race, color, or previous condition is not alleged to be the motive or object of said conspiracy. As to the fourth count—(1) That the injuring, oppressing, threatening, and intimidating therein charged are not particularized. (2) That the description of general election and of the people who were to vote thereat is too vague and indefinite. (3) That the election mentioned therein is described as an election held, and not as one to be holden. (4) That David Bush is alleged as qualified to vote without specification of time or place. (5) That the race and color of said David Bush, on account of which the offence is alleged to have been committed, are not specified. (6) That the right and privilege therein alleged to be secured to the said David Bush by section 2004 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as matters of law, are not secured by said section. (7) That section 5508 does not prohibit or punish the violation of the specific rights declared and set forth in section 2004, and the alleged violation of rights and privilege specifically declared in section 2004 is not in law contrary to the provisions of section 5508, as alleged. As to the fifth count—Same as to the fourth count except third. (3) That no such election as that at which David Bush is alleged as duly qualified as an elector to vote, can be holden. As to all of said counts—(1) That no one of said counts alleges with sufficient particularity the election at which David Bush was lawfully entitled to vote. (2) That the conspiracy charged in each and every count is alleged in terms too vague, general, insufficient, and uncertain to afford the accused proper notice to plead and prepare their defence, and they set forth no specific offence under the law. (3) That no one of said counts contains a charge of criminal matter, indictable under the constitution and laws of the United States. (4) Because each of the sections under which this prosecution is prosecuted, in so far as it creates offences and imposes penalties, is without warrant from the constitution, and is an infringement of the sovereignty of the states and the people. (5) That this court has no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the offences set forth in any of said counts. (6) That no criminal intent is alleged in any one of said counts.

William Stone, U. S. Atty., E. Earle, Asst. U. S. Atty., and D. T. Corbin, for the United States.

James Aldrich, Le Roy F. Youmans, Simonton & Barker, D. S. Henderson, C. Richard Miles, and Edward McCrady, Jr., for defendants.

After argument by the defendants' counsel and the counsel for the United States, the court, by WAITE, Circuit Justice, pronounced the following opinion as to the demurrer:

The first count is bad. Section 5520 makes it an offence to conspire to prevent by force, etc., any citizen, etc., from giving his support or advocacy, in a legal manner, toward or in favor of the election of any legally qualified person as an elector for president or vice-president. In this count the allegation is not that the support or advocacy to be prevented was of the election of the persons named as electors, but of the persons themselves. The offence consists only in the conspiracy to prevent the support and advocacy of the election. The demurrer to this count is, therefore, sustained. As to the other counts the demurrer is overruled, without prejudice, however, to the rights of the defendants to renew their objections upon a motion to arrest, if they shall so desire.

The defendants thereupon severally pleaded "not guilty."

The counsel for defence asked that they be furnished by the district attorney with the names of the prosecutor and the witnesses, but the CHIEF JUSTICE stated that there was no practice justifying such a demand.

It was then moved that the government be required to elect one of the four counts of the indictment upon which to proceed. The counts charge offences under different statutes, the penalties being different. They also charge offences growing out of different transactions, and they charge offences growing out of transactions on different days, the offences charged in the first two counts being alleged to have been committed on the 18th September, and those in the last two on the 16th September.

BOND, Circuit Judge, announced the decision of the court that there was no reason to compel the government to elect at that stage of the proceedings.

Counsel for the defence then asked the privilege of entering a challenge to the array of the petit jury (pro forma), on the same grounds as the challenge to the grand jury. Granted.

Mr. Youmans, for the defence, said that before the clerk proceeded to impanel the jury he would like to ask for information whether the peremptory challenges must be exhausted before any challenge for cause was made, or vice versa, or whether it was a matter of indifference.

BOND, Circuit Judge, replied that counsel might do either one or the other, but as there were only three peremptory challenges, it would be very foolish to exhaust them before challenging for cause.

After some further discussion it was decided that each juror should be subject first to the challenge of the government, and afterwards of the defence.

The impanelling of the jury was proceeded with, until one Haines was called. He was examined on his voir dire, and was then told by the counsel for the government to stand aside. The defence objected, and insisted that the prosecution must either exercise its right of challenge or waive it entirely and at once. For the prosecution it was contended that the right of qualified challenge in the courts of the United States was sustained by the supreme court of the United States in the case of U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480. The rule laid down in that case was subsequently followed in the circuit court for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania in the case of U. S. v. Wilson [Case No. 16,730]. The court held that this rule was in force when the government had no right of peremptory challenge, but as the right of challenging jurors peremptorily has been given the prosecution, it should stand on the same footing with the defence, and either exercise the right of challenge at once or not at all.

When Hutson Lee was called, and while under examination on his voir dire, he was asked whether he had not voluntarily served in the Confederate army. He replied that he had. He was thereupon challenged for cause, in accordance with the provisions of section 820 of the Revised Statutes. The counsel for the defence objected to the challenge on the ground that the disqualification had been removed, together with other disabilities. And on the further ground that congress had no right to append a penalty to a statute regulating the qualifications of jurors. The court decided that it was not a penalty, but a right of challenge given to the government by positive act of congress, which the court had no choice but to observe until it was repealed.

The jury being impanelled, each juror was required to take and subscribe the special oath as provided by section 822 of the Revised Statutes.

The examination of witnesses continued for ten days. Only a brief narrative of the events testified to can be given. To an understanding of them, a description of the place where they occurred is necessary. The Port Royal Railroad extends from Augusta to Port Royal and Beaufort. It crosses the Savannah river a few miles below Augusta, at a point known as the Sand Bar Ferry. A few miles below the point of crossing is a station called Jackson's. Seven or eight miles further down is another station called Ellenton. Here is a settlement of some five or six families, containing about ten white male adults. The county line separating Barnwell county from Aiken county is between two and three miles east of Ellenton. A mile to the north of Ellenton is a stream which empties into the Savannah river, called the Upper Three Runs. It is crossed at a point known as the Union Bridges, one and a half miles from Ellenton, and at Rouse's Bridge, four or five miles further up the stream. Aiken and Augusta are each about twenty miles distant from these bridges, the former being nearly due north from them, the latter northwest from them. Barnwell Court House is about eighteen miles due east from Rouse's Bridge. No villages are between Ellenton or Rouse's Bridge and any of these points.

The government did not attempt to prove the existence of the conspiracy alleged in the indictment, except by circumstantial evidence. The evidence for the prosecution was therefore directed to proof of acts done and declarations made by the alleged conspirators before and at the doing of the overt acts.

As to the acts proved: On Friday, September 14th, 1876, one Peter Williams, a young colored man, was taken from the house of another colored man where he had been staying, by several white men, and told that he had to go to a trial justice's for an alleged assault on one Mrs. Harley and her son, a boy of nine or ten years of age. He was taken to the road, where Mr. Harley, the husband of Mrs. Harley, and others were, was struck three times by him in the face, then, after turning away, and endeavoring to run from his captors, he was pursued and shot at, and severely wounded. From the effects of these wounds he died several days afterwards. After he was shot he was put on a wagon by Harley and his friends, and taken to his (Harley's) house. Here Mrs. Harley was called out to see him. She said he was not the man who struck her. While lying in the wagon, one of the white men put a pistol to his heel and shot him, the ball coming out at the calf of the leg. He was taken a short distance up the road, thrown into a fence corner, and a white man stood guard over him, declaring that he should not be moved until he died. Later that afternoon a writ was issued by Trial Justice Griffin (colored) for the arrest of this Peter Williams and one Pope for the assault on Mrs. Harley. Angus P. Brown, one of the defendants, was deputed as a special constable to serve it. On Saturday the whites, to the number of nearly two hundred, gathered near Mrs. Harley's with arms and mounted. Harley lived seven or eight miles northwest from Rouse's Bridge. The whites, under command of Angus Brown, left Harley's Saturday afternoon to go in the direction of Rouse's Bridge. They passed the store of one Chavis, where a few colored men had been in the habit of meeting on Saturday afternoon to talk over matters of interest to them. The members were Republicans. As the whites passed the store they made threats against a prominent colored Republican named Holland, who had been a trial justice in Aiken county. Afterwards a large body of armed white men gathered in the neighborhood of Hamburg, and went down towards Rouse's Bridge to join Brown's forces. Saturday night many of the whites staid at Matlock Church, a few miles northwest from Rouse's Bridge. Sunday afternoon they went towards the bridge. The main body numbered between two and three hundred. The Hamburg company had joined them at this time. Colonel A. P. Butler had met Captain Angus Brown on Saturday, and on Sunday he had command of the whites. They halted in an old field, a short distance from the bridge, and remained there some time. While they were there, three colored men were shot. One of them, Henry Campbell, was trying to escape from some whites who had taken him prisoner, and who had taken away from him his gun. He afterwards died from his wounds. The two others were without arms when shot, and were trying to get out of the way of the whites. The movements of the whites had alarmed the colored men, and a small party of them were near Rouse's Bridge on Sunday. Some of them had arms. After three of their number had been shot, the whites sent to them to have a "compromise." Six from each side went near Weatherby's store, a short distance west of the bridge. The whites said they had a warrant for Frederick Pope, and exhibited it. The colored men said he was not with them, and that if they found him they would take him to Aiken and deliver him up. Both parties then agreed to go home. That afternoon, on the south side of the Union Bridges, some of the colored men had assembled at a place where they held their religious meetings. They were greatly alarmed at the action of the whites, and most of them concluded to sleep in the woods that night, and remain together as much as possible. Just at dusk, some of the whites who had been at Rouse's Bridge came across Union Bridges on their way home. They passed the colored people without molestation. A gun was fired after a man named Ashley had passed. It was probably discharged by one of the negroes. No one was injured by it. Soon afterwards a body of whites came up to the bridge and fired into the negroes, killing one of their number, Basil Bryant, instantly. Some of the negroes then returned the fire, and a fusilade was kept up a few minutes from both sides. No serious injuries followed. The whites turned back and the negroes remained in the swamp near the bridge. Monday, the negroes from the neighborhood of Rouse's Bridge came to Union Bridges. They consulted together as to their course. They then went to Ellenton to the number of seventy-five or one hundred. Many had arms. They remained there an hour or so. Here they were met by one Simon Coker, a colored man, who was a member of the legislature from Barnwell county. He lived at Robbins's, a station on the Port Royal Railroad, seven miles southeast from Ellenton. Coker advised them to go home, as he didn't think the white people would trouble them. They took his advice and left in the direction of their homes. Sunday night most of the whites remained at Myers's, eight or ten miles from Rouse's Bridge, on the Augusta road. Sunday afternoon a messenger was sent to Aiken, and Captain G. W. Croft took command of a party of white men, who left there late Sunday night for Ellenton. But the colored people had sent messengers to Aiken, who had reported on Sunday afternoon to the sheriff of that county that the whites were shooting some of their men, and asking him to go down and protect them from further violence. He did not conclude to go until Monday morning. When he did leave he took along his son and three other white men as a posse. He reached Myers's that afternoon and remained there. Croft's company joined the whites about Cowden plantation, near Jackson's Station. The entire body, under Colonel Butler, went towards the railroad. A freight train had run off the track that morning one and a half miles below Jackson's, and the engine and some cars had fallen over on the side of the track. As the whites advanced their skirmishers were thrown out, and by some of the number a negro named Finissee, seen near the track, was shot to death. He was unarmed at the time; after he was shot his right ear was cut off. The whites then proceeded towards Ellenton, crossing the runs at Union Bridges. On their way, a portion of the column went to the house of a colored woman named Joanna Bailey. Two of the defendants, Paul and John Bowers, went into the house and found there one Wilkins Hamilton, a nephew of Joanna. He had been shot in the leg the-night before at Union Bridges. He was unarmed when these two entered the house, and offered them no resistance. Five pistol-balls were shot into him by these two men, in the presence of his aunt, killing him instantly. They rejoined the column, and proceeded with it to Ellenton. Near the station they killed another colored man, John Kelsey, who was trying to escape from them. Afterwards the column turned and went by the house of some colored people named Kelsey. Six young colored men had eaten dinner there. As they heard the advancing column of mounted men they ran from the house. David Bush and Sam Brown, a deaf and dumb boy, were killed by the whites in the field near the house. Warren Kelsey was killed in his yard, in the presence of his wife and family, while begging for his life and promising to vote the Democratic ticket. The whites, after going about a mile beyond this place, returned to Ellenton. The main body of them encamped there that night.

The following morning the whites moved towards Rouse's Bridge, by the road on the east side of the runs. The negroes who were in the swamp above the bridge heard a great shouting from the women about nine o'clock in the morning, that "the Yankees had come." They therefore came out of the swamp, and found that a detachment of United States troops, under the command of Captain Lloyd and Lieutenant Hinton, had marched from Aiken pursuant to orders from General Ruger, to see what was going on. They halted not far from Rouse's Bridge, on the west side of the runs. The negroes were delighted at the arrival of the United States soldiers. Some of them were on their knees praying, and saying, "Thank God, the Yankees have come." As some of the negroes came up there was firing heard towards the swamp, and the officers were told that the whites had shot one of the colored men. Presently there was a cry, "Here they come." Captain Lloyd and Liutenant Hinton looked down the road and saw an armed body of white men approaching. They walked down the road to meet it. They stopped and spoke to one man at the head of the column. While they were talking with him Colonel Butler came up and asked what they proposed? They replied they had nothing to propose. Afterwards Captain Croft and another man were sent to them by Colonel Butler, and they were asked what their orders were. They said simply to preserve the peace. Croft asked if they would disperse the negroes should the whites leave for home. They replied they would advise them to go home, and had no doubt they would do so. In about half an hour the whites rode off in the direction of Myers's and Augusta. The officers estimated the number of white men at between 300 and 400, all well armed and mounted. The negroes in the swamp were estimated at from 75 to 100, and their arms were very poor; many had no arms at all.

About the time of the conference between the army officers and Colonel Butler at Rouse's Bridge, a party of white men who had remained at Ellenton, and who were apparently under the orders of O. N. Butler, of Augusta, went to Robbins's Station on the Port Royal road. A construction train and a passenger train went down there, and the party under Butler found Simon Coker, who has been before alluded to as the man who had been at Ellenton the day before, and who had advised the negroes to disperse. He was going to the railroad station for the purpose of going down the road to Tennessee. He had his satchel in his hand, and was unarmed when taken prisoner by Butler's men. Both trains backed up to Ellenton, and Coker was taken out of the car. He was surrounded by many of the white men, and did not seem to realize that his life was in danger. About twelve o'clock, he was taken to an old field some 200 or 250 yards distant. The whites surrounded him, and a volley of bullets was shot into him, killing him instantly. He was left to lie where he had fallen, but after his death his pockets were examined by those who had participated in killing him. O. N. Butler, with several of the men who were at Ellenton when Coker was killed, had come down from Augusta on Monday morning in the train, and had got off at Jackson's Station with his men. They were all well armed. They met the whites under command of A. P. Butler near the wrecked train on Monday forenoon, and went with them to Ellenton and co-operated with them on Monday forenoon. On Tuesday afternoon, after Coker had been killed, a body of seventy or eighty white men, among whom were some of the men who had been with Colonel Butler at Rouse's Bridge on that morning when he said the whites would disperse and go peaceably to their homes, came to a field by the roadside about three miles below Ellenton, in which were William Goodwin and his son Charles, and Robert Turner and his son George, all colored, picking cotton.

Robert Turner thus described what followed: "They flung open the big gate, and they all poured in like a storm, and went down to William Goodwin and took him and carried him outside of the fence, and enlisted him with the horse company; and my son had gone outside in the wood whilst they were tangling about, and he came back in the house and got in the house and sat down. . . . . They hunted all about in the cribs and the fodder-loft and everywhere else. They spied him, I suppose, when he went off out of the field. They couldn't find him. After awhile two of them went into the house. . . . . They took him out of the house. His wife beckoned to me. . . . . I went to them and begged them not to kill my son; he was sick, and I knew he never would go out in any riot. I asked them, 'Please not to kill him; he is a poor sickly creature, and he never got in any disturbance.' . . . . Then they carried him off in the woods, him and William, to a thicket by the side of the branch, and killed him. . . . . I took my little wagon, and went and found him dead, and hauled him and fixed him and buried him." William Goodwin's body was found the next day, with nine bullet-holes through it, in the swamp about one hundred yards from where George Turner had been killed.

On the following Thursday a body of armed white men, some of whom were proved to have been at Rouse's Bridge on Tuesday when the whites promised to go home peaceably, went to the house of Dick Thompson (colored), a few miles from Rouse's Bridge, in Barnwell county. Here they found Thompson and one Edward W. Bush. Both were in the house unarmed, sitting on a bed. They were taken out of the house and carried down a lane. Thompson was allowed to go back. Bush was taken down to the foot of the lane, and in about half an hour three of the white men fired each two shots into him, killing him instantly. His wife was at the house with three young children when he was taken out, and the children called to the men, "Don't kill papa."

To prove the motive for the killing of these thirteen men whose deaths have been referred to, the prosecution introduced declarations of the alleged conspirators. The defendant, Atkinson, told Moore, one of the witnesses, before the occurrences, that the leading rascals of the Republican party were going to be killed before the election. That the Democrats would wade to their saddle-skirts in blood to carry the election. He advised Moore to join a Democratic club or he would not live until the election. The defendant, George W. Bush, told David Bush, in the presence of his wife, about two weeks before the riot, that he could not remain on his place unless he voted the Democratic ticket or refused to vote at all. On the morning of the day on which David Bush was killed, George W. Bush came to David's house. He was absent, but his wife was at home. About thirty armed and mounted white men were with him. He took out a list which he called a "dead list," and read from it the names of several prominent colored Republicans in that vicinity who were to be killed. On this list was the name of her husband. That evening, after her husband was killed, George W. Bush, with some of the men who were at her house in the morning, rode up. Bush with three or four others came to the house and told her her husband was killed, and his body was under a persimmon tree in the Kelsey field. On Monday, one Darius Weathersby (colored) was taken a prisoner by the whites. He was asked if he ever voted and if he would vote the Democratic ticket if turned loose. Some of the men said they were going to kill the leading men. John Scott was taken a prisoner the same day, and remained under guard that night. The white men told him that night they were going to kill every d——d negro in the country. It was the leading men they wanted. They said they were going to breakfast on Simon Coker. One of the white men got Scott off at daylight, and told him the men would kill him. He hid him in a store at Ellenton and saved his life. One Anselen Kelly heard a conversation between two of the whites engaged in the riots some time before they took place. One of them in discussing the political campaign said that the plan was to kill eight or ten leading Republican negroes, and they could manage the balance. Berry Riley was told that if he voted the Republican ticket he would die, that the Democrats intended to carry the election if they had to wade to their saddle-skirts in blood. Willis Leddick heard the men of the company that went from Hamburg to join Captain Brown, on Saturday, September 16th, say they were going down to get Mink Holland, and stick his head up in Edgefield; that they were after the leading men; that this was a white man's government and they were going to have it. Columbus Roundtree was told that the whites intended to adopt the Mississippi plan—kill a few of the niggers and scare the balance. The defendant, George W. Bush, said that the riot was not started altogether in behalf of Mrs. Harley, but to win the election. Two colored men who had been sent to Aiken on Sunday for the sheriff, were captured by the white men going from Aiken to Ellenton, when about one and a half miles from Aiken. They were compelled to go back home as prisoners. About four miles from Aiken they were compelled by some of these men to get down on their knees, and made to swear that they would vote the Democratic ticket. Colonel A. P. Butler asked Bryant Council, who was taken prisoner by the whites on Monday, what his politics were. He replied that he had not determined. Butler told him to fall in line. Some of Butler's men struck him over the head with a gun. Albert Carroll was told that the whites were going to carry the election on the Mississippi plan, the shotgun policy. H. J. Miller (white) told Carroll a week after the Hamburg riot that the Democrats intended to carry the election if they had to kill every negro in the whole country. (Miller was on the stand as a witness for the defence, and did not deny this fact.) O. N. Butler was consulted by the whites as to what should be done with Coker. He said, "Kill him. All we want to do is to kill the leaders and then we can rule the others." In reply to the testimony adduced for the prosecution the defence introduced evidence tending to show that the gathering of whites on Saturday and Sunday was for the purpose of assisting Captain Brown in executing the warrant for the arrest of Frederick Pope. That the conduct of the whites subsequently was justified by the action of the negroes, and that they were simply engaged in quelling a riot. That most of the negroes who were shot or killed on Sunday and Monday were the aggressors, and were shot in self-defence. It was shown that Mrs. Harley and her son had been assaulted on Friday by two unknown negroes. Suspicion rested on Peter Williams and Frederick Pope. Williams was captured, was struck in the face by Mr. Harley, then attempted to run and escape, but was pursued, shot, and afterwards carried into Harley's house. Mrs. Harley at first said he was the wrong man, but after seeing his face she said he was one of the men who was at the house, but not the one who struck her. That afternoon Trial Justice Griffin issued a warrant for the arrest of Williams and Pope, and appointed A. P. Brown special constable to serve it. No return was ever made upon the warrant.

Saturday afternoon the whites gathered at Harley's, and started towards Rouse's Bridge to arrest Pope. Many of them slept at Matlock Church that night. Sunday morning they went on towards the bridge. That morning, Dunbar Lamar came for Trial Justice Griffin saying that Colonel A. P. Butler had sent for him. He went to within a short distance of the bridge, and found Butler there with about eight hundred white men. Butler requested him to go down and talk to the colored people; that he wanted to make one more effort to quell the riot. In regard to the shooting of Henry Campbell on Sunday morning, one Tavell swore that he saw a colored man in the field raise a gun and shoot, and that his mule was struck with shot. That he then fired, and shot the man apparently in the arm. Two witnesses, Ransom and Page, testified that before Campbell was shot, they were surrounded by several negroes, and that threats were made to kill them. Page said he told the negroes that they had a warrant for Pope, and that he saw him among them, but they said they intended to protect him. At the conference held between the whites and negroes one of the negroes asked if the agreement for peace had anything to do with their voting. The whites replied that it had not. Sunday afternoon the whites started to go towards their homes. Many of them remained all night at Myers's. That afternoon, one Solomon testified that about sixty negroes were drilling in front of his store, which was a short distance to the north of Union Bridges. Solomon made a list of their names in Hebrew, which his clerk, H. J. Miller, afterwards wrote out from his dictation. Towards dusk some of the white people passed Solomon's store to go across the bridges towards their homes in the direction of Ellenton. After four or five had passed, one Elmore Ashley passed on horseback. He testified that when about seventy-five yards from the bridge he was halted by some colored men there. One took his gun from him, but it was restored by another of the party. Some called out "Kill him!" He put spurs to his horse, and was fired at. Just as the gun was discharged his horse stumbled. He was not hurt. Several white men then rode down towards the bridge and fired at the negroes. The fire was returned. At the first fire from the whites Basil Bryant was instantly killed. A few of the white men were wounded with small shot. The whites retreated. Some went back to Myers's and reported that the negroes had ambushed and killed some of their number. Captain William D. Bush went to Augusta and reported all along the road that the negroes were rising and killing white men. Small bands of armed negroes were reported at various points about Ellenton on Sunday. Sunday night, about eight or nine o'clock, one John Williams (white) was killed near Cowden, a plantation between Jackson's Station and Ellenton. He was with a man named Stallings when he was killed. Stallings testified that he was shot by negroes who were in the woods.

Sunday night, the telegraph wire was cut at the bridge just above Ellenton. Monday the whites, in command of A. P. Butler, went to the wreck of the train on the Port Royal Railroad. As they neared the road, there was a line of skirmishers deployed. A gun of some sort was fired by unknown parties, some of the shot from which struck one car of the freight train, while others struck the rails. Soon afterwards a colored man was seen crossing the track, and was shot and killed by the whites. (This man was Kit Finissee.) Colonel Butler sent orders to the skirmishers after this man was shot to be careful not to shoot their own men. O. N. Butler and some men from Augusta were met at this place. They joined the column and remained with it the rest of the day. From Cowden the whites went to Ellenton. On the way several prisoners were taken On arriving at Ellenton, a negro fired into the whites from behind a wood-pile. He was killed. (This was John Kelsey.) No body of negroes at Ellenton then. There was a great deal of shooting by the whites at Ellenton in all directions. From Ellenton the whites went towards the Kelsey House and the plantation of Major Crossland, half a mile or more beyond there. As the head of the column neared the Kelsey House six or seven men ran out and fired. The column was well closed up. No white man was shot. The whites then fired and killed three of the men. The others escaped. After going up as far as Major Crossland's, the column returned to Ellenton by another road. A company of white men from Edgefield joined Butler at this time. A. C. Jordan, a son of the sheriff of Aiken county, met Butler at Crossland's. He had left Aiken in company with the sheriff about ten o'clock that morning. When within a few miles of Rouse's Bridge, the sheriff turned to go in that direction, as it was there that the negroes were who had sent for him. His son told him it would not be safe to go that way. They therefore went to Myers's, which they reached about three o'clock. The sheriff remained there, and told his son to go to Rouse's Bridge and to tell Colonel Butler, or whoever was in command, that he thought the whites were in the right this time, and that if he wanted any assistance in quelling the riot to let him know, and he thought he could get it. Butler said he thought he had sufficient men to quell them. He said he had been asked to go to Ellenton, as the negroes were massed there. The whites remained at Ellenton that night, and put out pickets. A detachment under Captain Brown went across Union Bridges and staid there all night. Monday evening a party of white men from Barnwell were fired into about a mile from Robbins's Station on the road to Ellenton. They were going to Ellenton. It was dark, and it could not be told who did the shooting. One Robert Williams was killed. Two others were wounded. Whites returned the fire. The whites fell back to Steel Creek Bridge. On Tuesday the main body of whites left Ellenton about seven o'clock to go to Rouse's Bridge, where the negroes were reported to be massed. The son of the sheriff, when nearing the bridge, was in command of the skirmishers on the left of the road. The skirmishers were dismounted. In their front were mounted "scouts." Some of the scouts testified that two negroes fired into them as they neared the bridge. Several of them returned the fire. By this time there was a great shouting across the bridge. When they reached the bridge the planks were off. The stream was forded, and the skirmish line advanced on the other side. It was then that the whites met the army officers. After the whites had agreed to disperse and go home, a request was made for volunteers to go to Ellenton, but Colonel Butler did not wish the men to go.

Dr. William S. Cannon testified that he was at Ellenton on Tuesday. Saw Coker there, and spoke to him. Didn't know the white men who had him in charge. They were mostly strangers. He remained at the station until about one o'clock, reading papers. When he left the depot he heard he had been shot half an hour before. His killing didn't create much excitement. Nobody seemed to know or care anything about it. He went home and ate dinner. After dinner rode back and looked at his body. He estimated the number of white men who were at Ellenton on Monday afternoon at from three hundred to five hundred. Their column was about half a mile long.

Testimony was given tending to show that on Monday morning, at Union Bridges, some of the negroes were noisy and were calling for "white blood." They had a drum Monday morning, and it was beaten when they went to Ellenton. No one was injured by the negroes at Ellenton or elsewhere on Monday, and no property was destroyed by them, so far as appeared by the evidence. A gin-house was burned on Sunday night some miles below Ellenton. It was not shown by what means it was set on fire. It was also proved by the witnesses for the defence that several white families were at Myers's on Monday and Tuesday for protection. On Wednesday night, September 20th, James Patterson, the sheriff of Barnwell county, was wounded in the face and breast by shots fired at him when near Ashley's, five or six miles from Rouse's Bridge, in Barnwell county. He was riding in a buggy at the time with a friend. He could not tell who shot him. He remained that night at Ashley's, and went home the next day.

Trial Justice Griffin, a witness for the defence, testified that on Tuesday or Wednesday—he thought it was Tuesday—he held an inquest as to John Williams, the white man who was killed Sunday night. The jury did not view the body. Testimony was taken and the jury returned a verdict that deceased came to his death from gunshot wounds inflicted by parties unknown. On cross-examination, he said that Mr. Paul Hammond advised him not to go home that evening after the inquest. He said he had promised his wife that he would do so if he were alive. A pass was therefore given him, which was produced. It was as follows: "Silver Bluff, S. C., September 18th, 1876. Pass the bearer, Charles Griffin, on special business. A. P. Butler. Paul Hammond." The date is wrong. It should have been September 19th. Griffin left about half-past three o'clock for home. He lived towards Augusta, in Beech Island, some ten or fifteen miles from Silver Bluff. On his way home he was taken prisoner by a party of about thirty men, who were going towards Augusta. They cursed him, called him a d——d radical, and said they were going to kill him because he was a Republican. He pleaded for his life, and showed the pass which he had. They halted and consulted together, and finally released him. Before doing so, however, he promised not to vote the Republican ticket. Afterwards, he came up to the main party. He promised them that if they would spare his life, he would not give any of the names that were there. The witness was asked the names of any of the party. He replied that he could not give it, unless it were forced out of him. He was then asked if he felt that it would be unsafe to reveal the names now, and he said he believed the same party would, perhaps, hurt him if they could get him. Some of the same party he had seen on Sunday, at Rouse's Bridge.

In reply to the evidence for the defence, the prosecution introduced evidence to show that the colored men who were at Kelsey's did not fire guns at all. Also that the firing on Tuesday morning, at Rouse's Bridge, was commenced by the whites. Matt Scott (colored) was shot, and still carries the bullet under the skin. He was unarmed. He said the bullets whistled around him "like bees around a gum." His brother Isaac said he and Matt were going down the hill to cross the bridge, to get with the rest of the negroes. That he didn't know there were any white people near. They were shot at, and he was shot in the right thigh. He turned and ran up the hill. He ran twenty or thirty yards, then turned and fired his gun—an old shotgun. Then he ran across the hill, the white men after him. He fell into a deep gully, and thought that he thus saved his life.

The testimony having closed, and arguments having been made for the prosecution and defence, WAITE, Circuit Justice, charged the jury as follows:

The defendants, George W. Croft, Angus P. Brown, Abner W. Atkinson, George W. Bush, George B. Bush, Paul F. Bowers, Augustus McDaniels, William L. Bush, John Bowers, Whitmore W. Stallings, and John M. Bush, are on trial before you upon the second, third, fourth, and fifth counts of the indictment alone, as the first count has been adjudged to be insufficient in law. The second and third counts are predicated upon section 5520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which, so far as it is applicable to this case, provides that if two or more persons conspire to prevent by force, intimidation, or threat any citizen who is lawfully entitled to vote, from giving his support or advocacy, in a legal manner, toward or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as a member of the congress of the United States, or to injure any citizen in person or property, on account of such support or advocacy, each of such persons shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both.

The second count charges, in substance, that the defendants, together with divers other persons, did unlawfully conspire together to prevent by force, intimidation, and threat, David Bush, a citizen of the United States, and of the state of South Carolina, and lawfully entitled to vote at any election by the people of Aiken county, from giving his support and advocacy, in a legal manner, toward and in favor of the election of Robert Smalls, a lawfully qualified person, as a member of the forty-fifth congress of the United States. To convict under this count it is necessary for you to find from the evidence. 1st. That David Bush was a citizen of the United States, that is to say, that he was born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof. 2d. That he was lawfully entitled to vote at any election to be held in Aiken county for a member of the congress of the United States, that is to say, that he was of the age of twenty-one years, or upwards, and had resided in the state of South Carolina one year, and in the county of Aiken sixty days, and that he labored under none of the disabilities named in the constitution of the state. 3d. That Robert Smalls was a lawfully qualified person for the office of a member of the congress of the United States, or in other words, that he had attained the age of twenty-five years, and had been seven years a citizen of the United States, and was an inhabitant of this state; and 4th. That the defendants, or some of them, on or before the 18th of September last, unlawfully conspired among themselves or with others to prevent Bush, by force, intimidation, or threat, from giving support and advocacy to the election of Smalls as a member of the congress of the United States.

The third count differs only from the second in that it charges the conspiracy of the defendants to have been to injure Bush in his person and property, on account of his having given support and advocacy, in a legal manner, in favor of the election of Smalls as a member of the forty-fifth congress. To convict under this count, your findings must be the same as under the second, except in respect to the object of the conspiracy. As to that you must be satisfied from the evidence that the defendants, or some of them, unlawfully conspired among themselves or with others, with the intent to, and for the purpose of injuring Bush in his person or his property, because of his having given support or advocacy to the election of Smalls.

The fourth and fifth counts are predicated upon section 5508 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides among other things, that if two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the constitution or laws of the United States, or because of having exercised the same, they shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, and shall be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust, created by the constitution or laws of the United States. The fourth count charges that the defendants, together with divers other persons, to the jurors unknown, conspired to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate one David Bush, a male citizen of the United States, of African descent, and duly qualified to vote at any election by the people of Aiken county, in the free exercise of the right and privilege of voting at a general election by the people on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1876, on account of his race and color. To convict under this count you must be satisfied from the evidence: 1. That Bush was a citizen of the United States and a qualified voter of Aiken county, the same as under the former counts. 2. That the defendants, or some of them, conspired among themselves or with others to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate him in the free exercise of his right and privilege of voting at the election in November last; and 3. That this was done on account of his race or color. The fifth count differs only from the fourth in that it charges the conspiracy to have had special reference to the election of a member of congress for the Fifth congressional district of this state, to be voted for at that election. The controlling element in the offence charged in both these counts is the race or color of Bush. It is not enough that the defendants may have conspired against him on account of his political opinions, or on account of his support or advocacy of any political party, for that is not the crime of which they are in these counts accused. In the second and third counts such is, in effect, the charge, but in the fourth and fifth it is not. To convict under the latter counts it must appear that the object of the defendants in their unlawful combination was to interfere with his right and privilege of voting on account of his race or color, without regard to his political belief or association. As it appears from the evidence that Bush was killed on the 18th of September last, it follows that you must find that the conspiracy against him, whatever may have been its character, was formed on or before that day.

It has not been attempted on the part of the defence to contradict the evidence offered by the government to prove that Bush was a colored man, or that he was a citizen of the United States, or a lawfully qualified voter of Aiken county, or a member of the political party which, on or about the 15th of September last, put Smalls in nomination for election as a member of congress for the congressional district in which Aiken county is situated. It is not probable, therefore, that you will have any difficulty in arriving at a conclusion upon these preliminary questions. The real controversy before you is as to the existence of the alleged conspiracy. It is to this point that the evidence to which you have been listening with such attention for so many days has been principally directed. And here it is proper to say in the outset that the defendants are not on trial for the killing of Bush, or of any other of the numerous homicides that were committed during the disturbances which followed the alleged attack by two negroes upon Mrs. Harley and her little son, near Silverton, on the morning of Friday, the 15th of September. The shocking details of these transactions, which have been given in evidence, are only to be considered by you with reference to their bearing upon the existence of the alleged conspiracy to prevent by force, intimidation, or threats the support and advocacy by Bush of the election of Smalls, or to intimidate him on account of his race or color in the free exercise of his right to vote. However much you may deprecate the acts which have been described by the witnesses, the punishment of those guilty of them has been committed by the laws to other courts than this. Power for that purpose exists in the government of the state, and under our political system the courts of that government can alone be resorted to for the trial and conviction of such offenders. But the acts themselves are proper subjects for your consideration, so far as they legitimately tend to prove the crime charged in this indictment, and which has been made an offence against the laws of the United States. It is not for you to consider whether these laws are wise or unwise. That was the duty of congress when it passed them, and, having been passed, neither you nor the court have at this time anything else to do but to see that they are properly enforced. Their object is to protect the citizens of the United States in the lawful enjoyment of rights which have been secured to them by the constitution and laws of the United States, and while in this case they have been resorted to on account of the alleged violation by white men of the privileges of colored men, they are equally open to the whites against the blacks, should occasion ever require. So far from arraying race against race, their object is to prevent such a calamity. Neither are you to inquire at whose instance the indictment has been found or the trial had. Equally unimportant is it to you or to us whether the state or its officers have been unable or unwilling to punish offences against its own laws, or to bring to judgment in its own courts the violators of its own peace. It is enough for us that the government of the United States has seen fit, through its own appropriate department, to bring this case here for judicial investigation.

We do not propose to comment at all upon the evidence which has been adduced before you. You have listened to it patiently as it came from the witnesses, and we have no doubt will consider it in your room with all the care and judgment the importance of the case demands. The claims, both of the government and the defendants, have been argued before you by able counsel. There has been no attempt to establish the conspiracy which is charged by direct proof. No witness has been brought before you to swear that he was present when the unlawful combination alleged was in terms agreed upon by the parties or any of them. The testimony is wholly circumstantial, and consists of the acts and declarations of the parties named in the indictment, and of those who are alleged to have been their co-conspirators. In judging of the proper effect of these acts and declarations as evidence to sustain the indictment, you must consider them with reference to the circumstances under which the parties were placed at the time, and the rumors which, acting as prudent men, they would then have reasonable cause to believe were true.

On the part of the defendants it is claimed that at the commencement of the unfortunate occurrences which are in evidence, they were acting as officers of the law for the arrest and punishment of the two negroes who made the attack upon Mrs. Harley, and afterwards for the suppression of a riot which arose out of an attempt by the colored people in that vicinity to resist them in the performance of their duties. For this purpose it has been shown that a warrant was sued out before Trial Justice Griffin for the arrest of Peter Williams and Frederick Pope, charged with the alleged assault, and that Captain Brown, one of the defendants, was deputed as a special constable for its service. By the laws of the state every constable is a conservator of the peace, and may take into custody and carry to the nearest trial justice, any person or persons who may be, in his view, engaged in riotous conduct or open violation of the peace and refuse, upon his command, to desist therefrom; and also any person who may, in his view, commit any felony or misdemeanor; and for the purpose of preserving the peace, and also executing any criminal process. Every constable has the power of ordering out such posse comitatus to his assistance as may be necessary to enable him to discharge his duty. In suppressing riotous assemblages, the officers of the law and those who assist them, in case of resistance, may attack, wound, and, if necessary, kill those who resist, taking care to commit no unnecessary violence or to abuse this power legally vested in them. Every one is justified in doing what is necessary for the faithful discharge of the duties annexed to his office, although he is doubly culpable if he wantonly commits an illegal act under the color or pretext of the law. This is the language of Lord Mansfield, as it has been read to you by one of the counsel for the defendants in his argument, and correctly expresses the rule of law applicable to such a case. You may properly be governed by this rule in the consideration of the evidence in this case. If the acts done by the defendants and those engaged with them in giving effect to their common purpose were no more than were necessary for the execution of the warrant which Captain Brown had for service, or the suppression of what was in fact, or may have been supposed to be, a riotous assemblage; if no unnecessary violence was committed, and the power which was lawfully vested in the officer and his posse was not in any respect abused, then you may with propriety conclude that the sole object of the parties was to execute the warrant and suppress the riot. But if you, on the contrary, find that unnecessary violence was employed and that illegal acts were wantonly committed, then you may with equal propriety further inquire whether the parties in their combined action had any other object in view, and if so, what it was. It is claimed on the part of the government that the process of the law was used only as a pretext, and that the real purpose of the parties was to carry into effect a conspiracy which had already been formed by them or some of them against Bush. This is the precise question which you are called upon to determine, and you are compelled to determine it upon circumstantial evidence alone. That kind of evidence, if full and complete, is as convincing as that which is called direct. But to warrant a conviction upon such evidence alone, the circumstances proven must not only be consistent with the theory of the guilt of the defendants, but they must be entirely inconsistent with any other rational conclusion.

To convict under this indictment it is not necessary to find that the conspiracy charged was formed against Bush alone. It is sufficient if it is made to appear to your satisfaction that he was included among persons actually conspired against. Neither is it necessary that he should have been mentioned by name in the agreement or mutual understanding of the conspirators. It is sufficient if you find that the conspiracy was formed against a class which included him, and that in the execution of the common purpose it was actually carried into effect against him. Each member of a conspiracy is responsible personally for the acts of every member thereof, done in furtherance of its illegal purposes, whether he be himself present or not. It follows that the acts and declarations of one of the conspirators while actually engaged in giving effect to the common purpose, may be given in evidence against his co-conspirators. Having a common purpose, the acts and declarations of one while carrying that purpose into effect are the acts and declarations of all. But isolated acts of violence by individuals who may have been engaged in the conspiracy cannot be used against the others, unless it appears that they were done in furtherance of the common purpose. All are bound by them if they resulted from the original unlawful agreement between the parties to accomplish by their concerted action the proposed result. All who were present when the acts of violence, which are relied upon as evidence of the conspiracy in this case, were committed, may not have been conspirators. It is possible that some may have supposed that the whole object of the assemblage was to suppress a riot and preserve the peace. Others, who were in fact the conspirators, may have taken advantage of the occasion to carry their unlawful purposes into effect. Whether this was so or not is for you to determine, and in order that justice may be done and the guilty punished while the innocent escape, the law permits you to so frame your verdict as to accomplish that end. It may be—1. Guilty as to all upon all the counts. 2. Not guilty as to all upon all the counts. 3. Guilty as to some upon all the counts, and not guilty as to others. 4. Guilty as to some upon one or more of the counts, and not guilty as to the others. The burden of proof, gentlemen, is upon the government. It is a wise maxim of the law in favor of life and liberty, that every man is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty, and this presumption is to continue with your sitting as jurors, until it has been overcome by the testimony beyond a reasonable doubt. But a reasonable doubt is something more than a captious doubt, a mere vague notion that possibly the accused may be innocent. It must be a doubt for which a reason may be assigned. It need not be a reason sufficient to convince another, but it must be such as may properly influence the mind of one who is honestly endeavoring to perform his solemn duty as a juror.

And now in conclusion, gentlemen, we say to you that both the government and the defendants are entitled to the independent judgment of each one of you upon the issues presented for your consideration. It is sometimes the case that jurors agree that the vote of a majority, or some other number less than the whole, shall be adopted as the verdict to be returned. Such an arrangement is not in accordance with the requirements of the law. Each of you must find the verdict he agrees to upon his own oath, and no one has the right to shift the responsibility of his final action from his own conscience to that of one or more of his fellows. You may be convinced by his reasons, but you ought not to put yourself in a position to become bound by his simple vote. It is your duty to consult together, to compare your recollections of the testimony, to consider carefully among yourselves the bearings it has upon the facts to be established, and to harmonize your views if possible, but your verdict should be in accordance with your own deliberate judgment.

A single word more. It has been argued before you that this is a political trial and that the prosecution has been instituted and carried on for political purposes alone. Such arguments, gentlemen, should have no influence with you. The case to you and to the court also is political only in the sense that it grows out of an alleged offence against the political rights of a citizen of the United States, secured to him by the national constitution. That a number of citizens of the United States have been killed, there can be no question. But that is not enough to enable the government of the United States to interfere for their protection. Under the constitution that duty belongs to the state alone. But when an unlawful combination is made to interfere with any of the rights of national citizenship secured to citizens of the United States by the national constitution, then an offence is committed against the laws of the United States, and it is not only the right, but the absolute duty of the national government to interfere and afford to its citizens that protection which every good government is bound to give. The case, as alleged in this indictment, is such a case, and you, as citizens, are bound to lift yourselves above the political arena, and render your verdict regardless of popular clamor or partisan excitement. The statute which is to-day invoked for the punishment of an offence against a colored man, may to-morow be used for the protection of a white man. All citizens of the United States, whether they be white or black, are included within its provisions.

You have, gentlemen, a solemn and important duty to perform, and the case is committed to your most careful consideration.

The jury, after remaining out over thirty hours and being unable to agree, except as to Abner W. Atkinson, whom they found not guilty, were discharged, and a mistrial was entered as to the other defendants.

FELONIES, WHAT ARE—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—CONSPIRACY.

[The crime of conspiring to injure or intimidate citizens of the United States in the exercise of their civil rights is an infamous crime, which must be proceeded against by indictment, and not by information.]

[This was an information against A. P. Butler and others charging them with a violation of Rev. St. § 5508, which provides for the punishment of conspiracies to injure or intimidate citizens of the United States in the exercise of their civil rights. Heard on motion to quash the information.]

Before BOND, Circuit Judge, and BRYAN, District Judge.

BOND, Circuit Judge. In determining this motion we do not think it necessary to settle what conspiracy was an infamous crime at common law, for though in criminal matters the common law of England at the time of the making of the federal constitution must be looked to to determine the character of offenses which are described in the language of the common law, yet we think the statute under which this information is filed is sufficiently plain to determine this motion. In the first place, section 1022 of the Revised Statutes gives authority to file informations in all cases arising under chapter 7, tit. "Crimes Which are not Infamous," from which it is plainly to be inferred that chapter 7, in the judgment of the law-makers, describes some crimes which are infamous to which section 1022 did not apply. But in looking through that chapter there is no crime mentioned which can be thought infamous unless it be the one described in section 5508, under which this information is filed; for which the party convicted is not only to be fined and imprisoned but also to be disqualified ever thereafter from holding any place of trust and profit or honor under the laws of the United States, and is rendered ineligible to office. And in section 5509, it is provided that if in the course of violating section 5509 "any other felony" be committed which is another indication that in the mind of the legislature a felony had before been described or at least an infamous crime. But again by section 5509 if upon the trial we find that in the course of violating section 5508 a murder or arson has been committed we are to punish the violation of section 5509, with the punishment the state law affixes to those crimes, does not that constitute the offense against section 5508, a capital offense, that being the punishment for murder in South Carolina? All criminal statutes are to be construed strictly and in favor of liberty. And we think there is no question that offenses under this section 5508 must be presented by a grand jury and can not be tried upon information.

INTERNAL REVENUE—ASSESSOR'S LIST—TAX DUE—PRIMA FACIE CASE.

The assessor's original list, transmitted to the collector, is prima facie evidence of amount of tax due. The government need not, in the first instance, go into particulars of assessment, or show that it was properly made. That this was the case is inferred from assessment itself, until the contrary is shown by party objecting to it.

UNITED STATES v. BUTTERFIELD et al.

[7 Ben. 412.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1874.

LIABILITY OF ASSISTANT TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES FOR MONEY LOST—COMMISSION ON SALE OF STAMPS.

1. While B. was assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, certain moneys, in his hands as such officer, were lost by clerks. The United States brought suit on his official bond, to recover the amount. After the commencement of the suit, B. made a claim to the proper department of the government, for an allowance on the sales of stamps by him as such assistant treasurer, sufficient to make the amount of 5 per cent. on the amount of the sales, including the sum which he had allowed to the persons to whom he had sold the stamps, under the 170th section of the act of June 30th, 1864 (13 Stat. 297). The government disallowed the claim, holding that, under the 6th and 22d sections of the act of August 6th, 1846 (9 Stat. 65), he was not entitled to anything for such sales above the sum which he had allowed to others, as above stated. The allowance so claimed was more than the amount of money lost; and the bondsmen claimed that it should be made by the government. If it was made, nothing was due on the bond: Held, that B. and his bondsmen were liable on their bond for the money lost.

2. The provisions of the 22d section of the act of August 6, 1846, were inconsistent with those of the 170th section of the act of June 30, 1864, and the later one must prevail.

3. B., therefore, was entitled to the allowance which he claimed; it made no difference that the claim for the allowance was not made till after this suit was brought; and the defendants were entitled to judgment.

At law.

George Bliss, U. S. Dist. Atty.

William D. Shipman, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 23d of June, 1869, the defendant Daniel Butterfield was appointed assistant treasurer of the United States, and treasurer of the assay office, at New York. On the 26th of June, 1869, he, as principal, and the other four defendants, as sureties, executed a bond to the United States, reciting the appointment of Butterfield to said office on said day, and conditioned that the bond should be void, if Butterfield "has truly and faithfully executed and discharged, and shall truly and faithfully continue to execute and discharge, all the duties of said office, according to the laws of the United States, and, moreover, has well, truly and faithfully kept, and shall well, truly and faithfully keep, safely, without loaning, using, depositing in banks, or exchanging for other funds than as allowed by the act of congress hereinafter specifically referred to and described, all the public money collected by him, or otherwise at any time placed in his possession and custody, till the same has been, or shall be, ordered by the proper department or officer of government to be transferred or paid out, and, when such orders for transfer or payment have been, or shall be, received, has faithfully and promptly made, and shall faithfully and promptly make, the same as directed, and has done, and shall do and perform, all other duties, as fiscal agent of the government, which have been, or may be, imposed by any act of congress, or by any regulation of the treasury department, made in conformity to law, and also has done and performed, and shall do and perform, all acts and duties required by law, or by direction of any of the executive departments of the government, as agent for paying pensions, or for making any other disbursements which either of the heads of those departments may be required by law to make, and which are of a character to be made by a depositary constituted by an act of congress, entitled 'An act to provide for the better organization of the treasury, and for the collection, safekeeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue,' approved August 6, 1846, consistently with the other official duties imposed upon him," and that otherwise such bond should remain in force. The plaintiffs bring suit on the bond, and assign, in the declaration, as a breach of the condition of the bond, that the defendant Butterfield did not truly and faithfully continue to execute and discharge all the duties of the said office, according to the laws of the United States, and did not faithfully and promptly make transfers or payments of all the public money collected by him, or otherwise at any time placed in his possession and custody, when the same was ordered by the proper department or officer of government to be transferred or paid out, and when said orders were received, as directed, and did not perform all other duties, as fiscal agent of the government, which had been, and were thereafter, and during his occupancy of said office, imposed by any act of congress, or any regulation of the treasury department, made in conformity to law, but on the contrary, on the 16th of November, 1869, wrongfully converted to his own use the sum of $2,219 00, currency of the United States, and $100 00, gold coin of the United States, which money was the property of the United States, and collected by him, or placed in his possession and custody, as such assistant treasurer and treasurer of the assay office, and did not faithfully and promptly make transfers or payments thereof, although the same were ordered by the proper department and officer of the government to be transferred and paid out, and said orders were received by him, as he was directed. The declaration claims, as damages, $2,219 00 currency, and $100 00 gold.

The defendant Butterfield entered upon the duties of said office, and continued therein until the 16th of November, 1869, when he resigned. In the discharge of the duties of said office, which involved the receiving, handling, care and disbursement of very large sums of money daily, he was assisted by a large number of clerks and other subordinates. Among said clerks were one Field and one Tandy. All of said clerks and subordinates in said office were, and always have been, in practice, nominated by the assistant treasurer, and confirmed by the secretary of the treasury, and, before entering upon their duties, are required to take, and did, in fact, take, the oath required by the 1st section of the act of August 6, 1861, 12 Stat. 326. None of said clerks or subordinates receive any commission or formal evidence of their appointment, except notice of their nomination and approval. In fact, they could be, at any time, suspended by the assistant treasurer and removed by him, subject to the approval of the secretary of the treasury. The assistant treasurer always assigned to each of said clerks and subordinates their duties, and changed said duties at will. For the convenient transaction of the business of said office, the same is, under the direction of the assistant treasurer, divided into departments, one of which is designated as the "currency receiving department." During all the time the defendant Butterfield filled the office of assistant treasurer, the said currency receiving department was under the charge of said Field, as its chief. On the evening of the 21st of August, 1869, a deficit was discovered in the currency funds of said department, to the amount of $2,075 00, and the same has never been recovered, nor has the amount thereof ever been accounted for, or paid over, to the plaintiffs. During the time the defendant Butterfield so acted as assistant treasurer at New York, said Tandy was employed in the gold room, in the office of said assistant treasurer, and had charge, during the day, of the gold and silver coin which might be received therein. On the 6th of August, 1869, a deficit of $100 00 in gold coin was discovered in the cash room of said Tandy, when making up proof, and the said missing $100 00 has never been recovered, nor its loss accounted for, nor has the same ever been paid to the plaintiffs. When the defendant Butterfield entered upon the duties of his said office, he found said Field and said Tandy employed therein, they having been appointed during the term of the predecessor in office of the defendant Butterfield. The defendant Butterfield gave them no new appointment, but knew that they were so employed, as they had been since 1864, and did not suspend them or attempt to remove them. On entering upon the duties of his office, he announced to all employed therein, that they would be retained in their places until removed. Field and Tandy have ever since remained employed in said office. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendant Butterfield have ever been able to discover the cause of the disappearance of the money so lost, though the fact of such loss was immediately made known, and every effort was put forth to ascertain the manner in which such loss occurred; but there is no evidence or reason to believe, nor do any of the parties to this suit believe or suspect, that any portion of such money was taken by said Field or said Tandy, or with their connivance, knowledge or consent. The same never came into the hands of the defendant Butterfield, although it was part and parcel of the public moneys in the assistant treasurer's office, belonging to the plaintiffs, nor was the defendant Butterfield guilty, in any manner, of any actual wrong or neglect in reference thereto, nor is he, in any manner, chargeable with, or responsible for, said loss, except as he may be held responsible in judgment of law.

The defendant Butterfield, between the 23d of June, 1869, and the 16th of November, 1869, and while he was discharging the duties of said office of assistant treasurer, was, in conformity with the 170th section of the act of June 30, 1864, 13 Stat. 297, supplied by the commissioner of internal revenue, with revenue stamps of the character named in that section, for sale for the accommodation of the public, as therein provided, and such stamps, between such dates, were delivered by said commissioner to the defendant Butterfield, for that purpose, to an amount exceeding in value the sum of $1,669,637 50, and the defendant Butterfield actually sold the same to the amount of that sum, and fully accounted for the proceeds thereof to the plaintiffs. The said 170th section contains this provision: "In any collection district where, in the judgment of the commissioner of internal revenue, the facilities for the procurement and distribution of * * * * * adhesive stamps are or shall be insufficient, the commissioner as aforesaid is authorized to furnish, supply and deliver to the collector, and to the assessor of any such district, and to any assistant treasurer of the United States, or designated depositary thereof, or any postmaster, a suitable quantity or amount of * * * adhesive stamps, without prepayment therefor, and shall allow the highest rate of commissions allowed by law to any other parties purchasing the same." The 161st section of the same act contains this provision: "The commissioner of internal revenue * * * is hereby authorized to sell to and supply collectors, deputy collectors, postmasters, stationers, or any other persons, at his discretion, with adhesive stamps * * * as herein provided for, in amounts of not less than fifty dollars, upon the payment, at the time of delivery, of the amount of duties said stamps, * * * so sold or supplied, represent; and may allow upon the aggregate amount of such stamps, as aforesaid, the sum of not exceeding five per centum, as commission to the collectors, postmasters, stationers or other purchasers." Five per centum on the amount of stamps so received and sold by the defendant Butterfield was $83,481 87. In the settlement of the stamp account of the defendant Butterfield with the plaintiffs, they allowed him, as the amount of such commissions to which he was entitled, the sum of $73,645 64, and no more, such last named sum being the sum which he had allowed to the persons to whom he had sold said stamps. In October, 1873, and after the commencement of this suit, and not before, the defendant Butterfield made to the proper department of the government a claim to have allowed and paid to him the balance of said five per centum on the amount of said stamps so received and sold by him, namely, the sum of $9,836 23. On the 8th of November, 1873, such claim was rejected.

The foregoing facts are not in dispute. The defendants deny the liability of the defendant Butterfield for the money lost, and, if liable for it on the bond, claim to have allowed, in extinguishment of it, so much of the $9,836 23 as is sufficient for that purpose.

While there cannot be any doubt, upon principle and authority, that the defendants are liable, on their bond, for the money lost, I think it cannot be recovered in this suit, because the defendant Butterfield is entitled to the allowance claimed.

The ground on which the claim was disallowed by the treasury department was, that, by the 22d section of the act of August 6th, 1846 (9 Stat. 65), it is declared that the salary of the assistant treasurer shall be in full for his services, and that he shall not charge or receive any commission, pay or perquisite for any official service of any character or description whatsoever; and that, by the 6th section of the same act, he is required to do and perform all acts and duties required by law or by direction of any of the executive departments of the government. These provisions of law were regarded by the treasury department as still in force, and in view of them, and of the fact that the office of the assistant treasurer at New York was held to be part of the treasury itself, the department refused to allow to the defendant Butterfield any commissions on stamps beyond what he had allowed to purchasers of them from him.

By the 161st section of the act of 1864, congress adopted the policy of permitting the commissioner of internal revenue to sell stamps to officers such as collectors, deputy collectors, and postmasters, in certain amounts, on prepayment therefor of their face value, less a commission, to be allowed to such officers, of not exceeding five per centum on the aggregate amount of the stamps. By the 170th section of the same act, in order to increase the facilities for procuring stamps, it authorized the commissioner to furnish stamps to collectors, assessors, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and postmasters, without limit as to amount, and without prepayment, and prescribed that he "shall allow the highest rate of commissions allowed by law to any other parties purchasing the same." Under the 170th section, the officers named therein, when supplied with the stamps, became purchasers of them, as fully as the officers named in the 161st section became purchasers of stamps, when supplied with them under that section. The price was not to be paid in advance, but was to be the face value of the stamps, less the highest rate of commissions allowed by law to any other purchaser. This rate, by the 161st section, was five per centum. By the 170th section, if the commissioner chose to supply the stamps to an assistant treasurer, the allowance of the five per centum commission was made imperative. The words are "shall allow." This allowance, so far as assistant treasurers are concerned, is inconsistent with the provisions of the 22d section of the act of 1846. The two cannot stand together. The later one must prevail.

The fact that the claim for the allowance was not made till after this suit was brought is of no importance.

On the agreed statement of facts, there must be judgment for the defendants.

[Subsequently a motion, on affidavits made by the district attorney of the United States, for leave to put in further evidence tending to show error in the statement of accounts of the treasury department, on which the case had been submitted to the court, was denied. Case No. 14,704.]

Case No. 14,704.

UNITED STATES v. BUTTERFIELD et al.

[8 Ben. 23.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1875.

MOTION TO CORRECT AGREED STATEMENT OF FACTS —TRIAL—NEW TRIAL—LACHES—TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

1. A suit was brought against B., who had been assistant treasurer of the United States, and against his sureties on his official bond. It was tried on an agreed statement of facts, which included an account from the treasury department at Washington. One question in the case was as to the right of the defendant B. to an allowance of certain commissions on the sale of stamps, which commissions exceeded the claim against him. The court made a decision that he was entitled to the allowance and that there must be judgment for the defendant [Case No. 14,703]. Before any order or judgment was actually entered, the United States district attorney made a motion to the court for leave to correct the agreed statement of facts, on affidavits setting forth that the statement was erroneous, because it did not show that the allowance in question had been in fact made Held, that, as there was nothing in the minutes of the court showing any action by the court on the evidence submitted to it, it must be held that the trial was not concluded.

2. Therefore, the rules applicable to new trials were not to be invoked;

3. To justify the court in granting the motion, it must be shown not only that the plaintiff had not been guilty of laches, but that the statement of facts was actually erroneous in the particular in question.

4. Although the district attorney had been shown not to be guilty of laches, it had not been shown that the officers of the treasury department charged with the duty of stating the accounts between the United States and B. had not been guilty of laches, nor had it been shown how the alleged error arose.

5. Therefore, the motion must be denied, with leave to renew it on further papers.

After the decision made by the court in this case, which is reported in the 7th volume of these Reports [supra], the district attorney of the United States made a motion, on affidavits, for leave to put in further evidence, tending to show a mistake of fact in the treasury statement on which the case had been submitted to the court. The defendants [Daniel Butterfield and others] raised the objection that the application was substantially one for a new trial, and that a proper case for granting a new trial had not been made out.

George Bliss, U. S. Dist. Atty.

William D. Shipman, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I do not think it can be said that the trial of this cause has yet been concluded. There is nothing in the minutes of the court showing any action by the court on the evidence submitted to it, which evidence consisted wholly of the written statement agreed to by the parties. I think, therefore, that the rules applicable to new trials are not to be invoked. Therefore, if a proper case be shown, the plaintiffs may be allowed to withdraw their assent to the agreed statement of facts. To justify the court in allowing this, it must not only be shown that the plaintiffs have not been guilty of laches, but the court must see that the agreed statement of facts is in fact wrong in the particular in which it is alleged to be wrong. The agreed statement is a formal stipulation, signed by the district attorney and by the attorney for the defendants, stating that the parties agree on the facts therein set forth. The affidavit of the district attorney, on which the motion is now made by the plaintiffs to amend such statement of facts in the respects indicated in such affidavit, and that the decision rendered by the judge herein be changed accordingly, and that judgment be ordered as the facts require, sets forth that the agreed statement was erroneous, in that the amounts therein stated to have been allowed to the defendant Butterfield as commissions on sales of stamps should have been $85,084.46 instead of $73,645.64, and that consequently the claim of the defendant Butterfield to be allowed the further sum of $9,836.23 was and is unfounded, because that sum had been allowed to him by allowing to him the $85,084.46. It also sets forth that the error arose from mistakes made by certain clerks in the treasury department in making up the account on which said statement of facts was based, and that said account did not truly state the transactions between the plaintiffs and the defendant Butterfield, and that such errors were not known to the district attorney at the time of the trial, but that as soon as he learned them he brought them to the notice of the attorneys for the defendants.

The district attorney has been guilty of no laches, but it is not shown that the officers of the treasury department charged with the duty of stating the accounts between the United States and the defendant Butterfield have not been. The accounts, when stated, are made evidence against the party that he owes to the United States the balance of money shown by the account to be due from him to the United States. It is stated in the agreed statement of facts, that, in the settlement of the defendant Butterfield's stamp account with the United States, they allowed him, as the amount of commissions to which he was entitled, $73,645.64, and no more. This shows that a settlement or statement of account between the United States and the defendant Butterfield was made by the United States. A copy of such statement from the books of the treasury department is before me, showing an account between the defendant Butterfield and the United States in respect to stamps, in which he is charged with $2,036,250.94 as the value of stamps delivered to him, and is credited with the same sum, made up by $1,669,639.50 remitted by him, and $73,645.64 commissions allowed him, and $292,965.80 as the value of stamps turned over by him to his successor. If in fact the allowance for commissions was $85,084.46 it is not shown when the error in the statement of account was discovered at the treasury department, or by whom, or how it came to be made, or that it ought not to have been discovered sooner than it was, or what the mistakes are that were made by the clerks, or who the clerks were, or that the errors were not known to the proper officers of the department when the agreed statement of facts was signed, or that the true amount allowed for commissions was not known to them when the statement of account was made and when the agreed statement of facts was signed.

Moreover, the statement annexed to the affidavit of the district attorney, as showing the manner in which the alleged error arose, is one from which it cannot be seen how such alleged error arose, inasmuch as it does not show an allowance for commissions of $11,438.82 more than the $73,645.64.

On the papers now before me I must deny the motion, with leave to the plaintiffs to renew it on further papers.

UNITED STATES v. BYERS.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 171.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1831.

LARCENY—BANK NOTE—PROOF OF GENUINENESS.

Upon the trial of an indictment for stealing a note of the Bank of the United States, it is not necessary that the United States should prove that it was a genuine note of that bank, otherwise than by producing the note itself; nor that it was the note of a chartered bank.

Mr. Hellen, for prisoner [Jane Byers], required that the United States should strictly prove that it was a genuine note of the bank; and cited 2 Starkie, Ev. (Am. Ed.) 829, in the note, which refers to the case of State v. Tillery, 1 Nott & McC. 9, and Russ. Crimes (Am. Ed.) 1032.

But THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) stopped the attorney of the United States, and said that the note itself, being proved to be the note stolen, is prima facie evidence of what it purports on its face to be.

Mr. Hellen then contended that the United States must prove it to be a note of a chartered bank.

But THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) said that the ninth section of the penitentiary act only required that it should be a bank-note.

UNITED STATES v. CADWALADER et al.

[Gilp. 563.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. June 4, 1835.

OFFICER—COMPENSATION—CREDITS—DEPARTMENT REGULATIONS.

1. Where a public officer, not appointed or prohibited by law, is employed by the head of a department, his duties and compensation are to be regulated by the agreement made in the case.

2. No agreement made by the head of a department, with an agent appointed under the act of 3d March, 1809 [2 Stat. 535], will entitle him to more than the compensation allowed thereby.

3. A discretion is vested in the head of a department, to allow a special officer, employed under it, compensation for his services even beyond the amount agreed upon, should he consider them equitably entitled to it.

4. Where the accounts of a public officer, employed by the head of a department under a special contract, are settled, and a certain rate of compensation allowed, he continues to be entitled to the same rate of compensation for similar subsequent services, until a new agreement or notice of change.

5. A claim for a credit, not actually disallowed, is to be considered only as suspended, if disapproved and passed over by the head of a department

6. The regulations of a department of the government in settling its accounts, are intended for general rules in the transaction of its business, but are subject to the revision of a court and jury, when they work manifest injustice to individuals.

This was an action of debt, brought to recover the sum of eleven thousand six hundred and twenty-two dollars and sixty cents, which it was alleged Mr. M'Call in his lifetime had received from the United States for their use, and which was still due and unpaid by his representatives. To this action the defendants [Thomas Cadwalader, Robert M'Call and Thomas Cadwalader, Jr., executors of Richard M'Call, deceased] pleaded the general issue and a set-off, with leave to give the special matter in evidence.

On the 4th June, 1835, the case came on for trial before Judge HOPKINSON and a special jury, when the following facts were proved:

Early in the year 1815, Mr. Richard M'Call was appointed consul of the United States for the port of Barcelona. About the same time, a squadron was sent to the Mediterranean, and it was determined by the navy department to employ him as a special agent for this squadron, to be employed as long as his services should be considered necessary, and with authority to draw bills on certain houses in Europe. A letter of the secretary of the navy of the 7th March, 1815, fixes as his compensation for these services, "a commission of two per cent. on his disbursements, provided the whole sum so allowed should not exceed that authorized to be given to a navy agent," which was two thousand dollars per annum. Mr. M'Call did not consider this sufficient for the labours and responsibility of such an office, and, on the 12th April, the secretary of the navy, Mr. Crowninshield, agreed to extend the allowance by adding, "a commission of two and a half per cent. on absolute expenditures made when he should be absent from Barcelona, following the squadron;" requiring distinct accounts of disbursements made under those circumstances. Mr. M'Call proceeded to the Mediterranean and commenced his special agency on the 13th July, 1815. From that time until November, 1817, his place of residence on land was at Barcelona, but he was frequently, and for considerable periods, either following the squadron, or at Carthagena, Marseilles, Mahon, or other places which the duties of his agency required him to visit. At the latter period he removed to Gibraltar, considering that the most convenient place for supplying the squadron, and thenceforth it became his place of residence. His accounts were made up at the end of every half year, and transmitted with the vouchers to the treasury department. The compensation which he claimed in these accounts, was always two and a half per cent. on all disbursements made by him for the public service, elsewhere than at Barcelona, and two per cent. on those made there, up to the sum of two thousand dollars per annum: he also charged the United States for the clerk hire, storage and office expenses, which were actually incurred. On the 20th June, 1817, the first settlement of his accounts took place at the treasury, and embraced only those from 13th July to 24th October, 1815: during the whole of that period he was absent with the squadron, and two and a half per cent. on all his disbursements were allowed. On the 25th May, 1821, the auditor having before him for settlement all the accounts from 25th October, 1815, to 1st July, 1820, referred to the secretary of the navy, Mr. Thompson, the claim of Mr. M'Call for two and a half per cent. on his disbursements, after he went to reside at Gibraltar, and also his charges for clerk hire, &c. there. On the 1st June, 1821, the secretary of the navy decided, that Mr. M'Call's compensation was to be regulated by the letters between him and the secretary of the navy, Mr. Crowninshield, in 1815, from which he thought "it fairly to be intended, that his compensation was not to exceed two thousand dollars a year, for all business transacted at his permanent place of residence. At the time the arrangement was made he resided at Barcelona, and the just interpretation of the agreement was, that the same rate of compensation should apply as to all business at his permanent place of residence." He therefore declined allowing him more than at that rate for expenditures at Gibraltar after his removal to that place. On the 4th June, the auditor communicated this decision of the secretary to Mr. M'Call, and in the settlement made on the 22d May, 1822, the whole commissions from October, 1815, to July, 1820, amounting to thirty-one thousand three hundred and fifty-nine dollars and forty cents, were suspended. To this decision Mr. M'Call did not assent, and in 1824 came to the United States for the purpose of having the subject thoroughly investigated and disposed of, declaring at the same time that he should be obliged to relinquish the agency if his claims were refused. His disbursements for the navy department had then amounted to about two millions of dollars, and been attended with no loss to the United States. The subject of the suspended items was fully and carefully re-examined by the secretary of the navy, Mr. Southard, who differed in his view of it from his predecessor, and at the settlement made on the 31st December, 1824, the commissions before suspended, and an additional sum of twelve thousand and twenty-four dollars and twenty-five cents, for subsequent commissions, were carried to his credit: he was also allowed one thousand dollars for clerk hire, and eight hundred and ninety-five dollars for office rent and expenses annually. After this settlement Mr. M'Call resigned his consulate, but returned to Gibraltar and continued to execute his agency. His accounts up to the 1st January, 1828, were from time to time settled on the same basis. On the 3d March, 1830, the auditor having before him the accounts from 1st January, 1828, to 1st January, 1830, containing similar claims for commissions and office expenses, referred them to the secretary of the navy, Mr. Branch, stating that "for those allowances he found no authority in law, in the regulations of the navy department, or in any entry by the secretary upon the vouchers." On the 12th March, the secretary of the navy decided that Mr. M'Call was to receive the same compensation as a navy agent while permanent, and when absent from his place of residence, that agreed on by the secretary of the navy, Mr. Crowninshield, in his letter of 12th April, 1815. On the 15th March, 1830, a settlement was made in accordance with this decision. Mr. M'Call, who had returned home, resigned his agency, and on the 21st April, 1831, a final settlement on the same basis was made at the treasury, by which a balance was asserted to be due to the United States of eleven thousand six hundred and ninety-three dollars and fifty-eight cents. This balance was made up of the following items:

(1) Balance in Mr. M'Call's hands admitted to be due and tendered by him to the treasury..	$ 5,478	94
(2) Commissions on disbursements at Gibraltar over and above the compensation of a navy agent	2,309	26
(3) Commissions on bills of exchange	44	40
(4) Office rent and charges for two years	3,790	00
(5) Subsequent correction	70	98

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty.

This is a question of contract, of written contract. Mr. M'Call was not a navy agent, under the act of 3d March, 1809, whose character, duties and compensation are fixed by law; but a special agent of the navy department, chosen to perform a certain duty pointed out by that department, for which they agreed to allow him a certain compensation. The whole was reduced to writing, weighed by him for more than a month, modified at his suggestion, and again put in writing; he then entered on the stipulated duties. By this contract he must abide. It is found in the letters of himself and the secretary of the navy, Mr. Crowninshield, in March and April, 1815. He was to have the same allowance as a navy agent when at his place of permanent residence. After 1817, this was Gibraltar. In 1820, he claimed more while there; he claimed two and a half per cent. on all disbursements. In 1821, this was submitted to the secretary of the navy, Mr. Thompson, who refused it. In 1824, it was renewed and admitted; but still on the ground of this contract, not in opposition to it. That contract remained unchanged. It speaks for itself. If an erroneous construction was put upon it, the United States are not affected by it. In 1830, the same allowance is again claimed; it is refused as it had been in 1821, and this refusal obliges them to bring the present suit. The defendants make the same demand before this court, which Mr. M'Call made at the treasury; the same reply is given; the contract does not authorize it. U. S. v. Lyman [Case No. 15,647]; U. S. v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 735; U. S. v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 1.

M'Call & Cadwalader, for defendants.

If the accounting officers had received the evidence of Mr. Southard's construction of this contract, which has been submitted to the court and jury, they would never have refused these allowances. Their ground of rejection is, that there is no entry of his decision. The case is here to be passed upon with a full knowledge of it. That construction was unquestionably right; but if it were not, it is sufficient to sanction the items of set off which the defendants offer. By the original contract, the compensation was fixed in two contingencies; the first, when Mr. M'Call was at Barcelona, there he had his consulate and its profits, as well as his own business, and the additional compensation of a navy agent was liberal and sufficient; the second, when he had to accompany the squadron, fix his residence for a greater or less time at other places, and sacrifice his own concerns for those of the public, for this he asked and was promised only the customary commercial commission of a merchant, two and a half per cent. The words of the correspondence in 1815, bear this construction, and it is consistent with usage and justice. As to the allowance for office expenses, it is made to navy agents in the United States, and therefore falls within the express stipulation of the letter; but if it were not, it is sanctioned by the usage of the department, which was confirmed by this court in a late case. To say that it was wrong in the secretary of the navy to allow, in 1824, what was rejected in 1821, is to confound together suspension and rejection; these claims were large, and in settling the account they were passed by for further consideration; they were not rejected; they came up in 1824, as matters yet undecided. The decision of Mr. Southard, therefore, was right in all respects, at the time it was made. But that is not the question here. This claim commences four years after Mr. Southard's decision. It commences entirely, after Mr. M'Call had come to this country, conferred with the department, and returned to the Mediterranean with their plighted faith to allow it. The contract, made by the letters of 1815, was at an end; the settlement of 1824 became a contract, which had not been terminated by the government in 1830. No doubt the secretary of the navy might refuse these allowances after that time; but he cannot do so retrospectively; it has been laid down by this court, as well as by the supreme court, that no change in a usage is to be retrospective; that a person, who has for years received a compensation, cannot be deprived of it by the head of a department, who shall construe a contract differently from his predecessors. U. S. v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 1; U. S. v. Duval [Case No. 15,015]; Armstrong v. U. S. [Id. 548].

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty., in reply.

In 1815, a contract was deliberately made, between Mr. M'Call and the secretary of the navy, so explicit in its terms, that it cannot be misunderstood. The question is, whether or not that contract allows him two and a half per cent. commissions on all his disbursements at his place of permanent residence, and a regular annual sum of one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five dollars, for office expenses. On its face it certainly does not. At the time of the first settlement these allowances were not claimed; on the contrary, the commissions on disbursements at Barcelona, were charged separately from those on disbursements while absent, and no claim was made for any office expenses. At the time of the second settlement, a similar distinction was made; but it was observed, that after his permanent residence was fixed at Gibraltar, he claimed the extra commissions; this was refused from the outset, and in 1821, was deliberately examined and rejected; it was not merely suspended, for the letter of the secretary of the navy is positive as to the meaning of the contract, and settled the point definitely so far as the department could do so; the suspension was to give time to ascertain the periods of absence and residence at Gibraltar, so as to adjust the accounts; there was no hesitation or suspension as to the propriety of the allowance; up to this time there was no claim even of an annual sum for office charges. In 1824, Mr. M'Call comes to the United States, and a third settlement is made; he puts in a claim again for the extra commissions during his residence at Gibraltar, and an entirely new one for office expenses, the whole amounting to sixty thousand dollars. This was allowed by the secretary of the navy, but not by any change in the contract; it was his interpretation of that instrument; there was no new contract, nor indeed any written order, given at the time, at least none has been found. This act then made no variation in the rights of either party; a claim was made by Mr. M'Call under his contract, at that time, and he obtained it. If his decision was wrong, it cannot affect the rights of the United States; it cannot change their written agreement with their agent; it cannot govern the construction of the instrument on a subsequent occasion. Whenever Mr. M'Call presented his accounts, they were to be settled by the officer for the time being, according to the existing contract; and if at one time an error was made, it is no reason that it should also be made at another; the settlements were from time to time, the contract was continuous; it existed in 1829, as much as in 1815, and alone governed each intermediate settlement. Now the very words of the letters confine the extra commission to disbursements made when absent from the place of permanent residence, and seem to place that item beyond question. As to the office charges. no proof of the same annual allowance to any navy agent was given; much less to a special agent, whose extra commissions gave him so large a compensation. Neither item, then, can be properly allowed under the agreement; and if the view is correct, that this agreement continued in force up to 1830, that no legal change had been made in it, and no new one formed, then the accounting officers were correct in rejecting them, and this jury ought not now to allow them.

HOPKINSON, District Judge (charging jury). (After stating the several charges of the United States against the defendant, which constitute the claim sought to be recovered in this action, and also, generally, the grounds on which it is resisted, the judge instructed the jury on the matters of law arising in the case, substantially as follows:) The jury must bear in mind that the appointment of Mr. M'Call, to the duties of a navy agent, was not made under the act of congress of 3d March, 1809, and of course the question of his compensation for his services is not to be governed by the provisions of that law. Had his appointment been under that law, our course in the decision of this cause would be very plain and easy. We should follow the directions of the law, without regarding the acts or opinions of the secretary of the navy, as no agreements by him with Mr. M'Call, however explicit, if made in violation of the law, could be attended to here. The defendant, also, is presumed to have known the law by which his office was conferred on him, and to have known further that no contract made by the secretary with him, not warranted by the law, could be enforced in any court of the United States. Mr. M'Call was not appointed by virtue of that act of congress, but under a general authority, lawfully exercised by the secretary of the navy, to appoint agents of the department, who are not, properly speaking, navy agents, nor officers of the United States, but the agents of the secretary or his department. In such cases, where there is no statutory prohibition or limitation, a large discretion is allowed to the departments. In such appointments the duties of the agent, as well as his compensation and emoluments, must be regulated by the agreement made between him and the secretary. The duties and the compensation must wait upon the object of the appointment; they will vary according to the circumstances of each case; they may be permanent or temporary, more or less. We have, then, not to look to the law of 3d March, 1809, for the liquidation of this account, for our guide and rule in settling the claims of the respective parties, but we must look truly and conscientiously to the agreement between them, upon the faith of which the services of the defendant were rendered. The changes that have taken place in the office of secretary of the navy, have probably produced all the difficulties between the defendant and the department, but they can produce no change in any contract made within the authority of the officer who made it.

The original agreement is contained in a correspondence between Mr. Crowninshield, the then secretary of the navy, and Mr. M'Call. The several letters do not appear to me to be ambiguous, at least as regards the principal item of dispute, that is, the commissions or compensation to be allowed to the defendant; and my construction of them inclines to the opinion given upon them by Secretary Thompson, who had succeeded Mr. Crowninshield in the navy department. When Mr. M'Call rendered his first account to the department, or when it was there settled, Mr. Thompson was in office, and had the account settled according to his construction of the contract. If the duties and services of the appointment turned out to be more onerous, important and expensive than was contemplated when the contract was made, they nevertheless can have no operation in changing the meaning or construction of the contract, but they would afford a good and just reason for modifying it for the future, or for making a new and different one. or for the exercise of the secretary's discretion in making allowances to meet these unexpected contingencies. Thus, if the contract had been made on the basis, that the residence of Mr. M'Call was to be at Barcelona, where living was cheap and commissions low, and where he had also a consulate, and it turned out that the public service required the navy agent to remove to Gibraltar, this would be a fair ground for a new contract, or for additional, equitable allowances. The secretary was not restricted to make no allowances but such as came strictly within the letter of the contract, if he should think there had been services performed, or expenses in that service incurred, not provided for by the contract. It is unfortunate that the secretary who made the agreement was not first called upon to say what was intended by it. His construction would probably have been received as authentic by his successors. The accounts of Mr. M'Call were submitted to the auditor, and by him referred to the secretary, whose decision upon them I am inclined to adopt. It is said Mr. M'Call acquiesced in this decision. Did he do so? It is true he continued to hold the appointment, but to make strong remonstrances against that decision; and it is to be remarked that, in his appeal to the secretary, he takes the ground of his services, and not of the contract, to support his claims. This was correct.

Before Mr. M'Call again rendered his accounts to the department, another secretary, Mr. Southard, came into the office. Mr. M'Call renewed his charges, not only for the period between his first and second accounts, but introduced the very items that had been rejected or suspended by the former secretary. A question has arisen as to what items were rejected and what suspended. It is said that the charge of commissions only was suspended, but that, as to the other disputed items, the opinion of Secretary Thompson is clear, explicit and final. This may or may not have been his intention; but the suspension, as it appears on the account, goes to the whole of it; and we should presume that Mr. M'Call so understood it, as he would hardly have preferred those charges again, in the face of Mr. Thompson's decision, had he continued in office.

The accounts of the defendant were submitted to Secretary Southard, who seems to have given them a full and careful examination, and finally he passed and allowed the accounts, admitting all Mr. M'Call's charges, not only for the period subsequent to his own coming into office, but for the antecedent time, allowing the items which his predecessor had refused or suspended. Mr. Southard must, like the defendant, have considered that these items were suspended, and not finally decided upon by Secretary Thompson. Although Mr. Thompson had given his opinion on the principle on which the account should be settled, yet the items affected by the principle were suspended, and not finally acted upon; they were not closed against future consideration and adjustment, by Mr. Thompson himself, or by a successor to his authority. Whatever may have been his reason for not directly applying his principle to the items in question, Mr. Southard believed, and I cannot say he was mistaken, that the whole account, when it came to him, was open for his examination and judgment; and he acted upon it accordingly. With my understanding of the original contract with Mr. Crowninshield, as I have intimated, I must consider that, in passing this account and allowing the disputed charges of the defendant, he did not proceed on the ground of that contract, for I do not see how it could bear him out; but that he did proceed on a ground equally tenable and firm, that is, by virtue of his general authority, as the head of his department, to exercise his discretion in making compensation to the agents of the department for their services, in conformity with his judgment and views of the justice of the case, after a longer experience and a fuller knowledge of the nature of the defendant's services, had enabled him to appreciate their value, and to estimate more correctly the expenses to which they exposed the agent.

But it is worthy of particular attention, that the account thus settled by Mr. Southard, which contained the very charges formerly suspended or rejected, as it may have been, has been considered by the department to be finally closed; the defendant obtained his credits; they cannot now be disturbed, and no attempt is made by this suit to disturb them. If this suit had been brought for the allowances made by Mr. Southard, anterior to the settlement of 1824, we might have been called upon to look to and construe the original contract; but it is now unnecessary, as the accounts now in controversy, are subsequent to that settlement. Before these accounts of the defendant were presented to the department, another change had taken place in the office of secretary; Mr. Branch had succeeded Mr. Southard. The accounts are sent to the new secretary by the fourth auditor, with certain objections, or rather questions upon them. The result was, that Mr. Branch, going back to the original contract for the adjustment of the accounts, resumed the opinion of Secretary Thompson and adjusted them accordingly, as the district attorney has submitted them to you, that is, refusing the defendant credit for the charges which Mr. Southard had allowed in the previous settlement of his accounts.

We have now arrived at the real question in this case, which is, are we at this time at liberty to go back to the contract between Secretary Crowninshield and Mr. M'Call, and to receive or reject the disputed items of his account, as we shall believe they are or are not warranted by the construction we shall put upon that contract; or, on the other hand, are we not bound by the allowances made by Secretary Southard, to the defendant in the settlement of his account in 1824, either, as a construction of the contract binding on the United States, or as constituting a new contract for the subsequent services of the defendant? With the opinion I have, and which I have already intimated, of the meaning of that contract, I cannot think that Mr. Southard admitted the charges in question by virtue of that contract; but that he considered them not to have been finally acted upon by his predecessor, that they were, therefore, open to his judgment upon them, and that after receiving the personal explanations of the charges from Mr. M'Call, who had returned to the United States for the purpose of settling this account; after learning from him the real nature and extent of his services, and his extraordinary expenses in performing them, together with the change that had taken place in his situation and residence, and the importance and extent of his duties, the secretary took upon himself, as he clearly had a right to do, if the former secretary had but suspended these charges for further explanation, to make these allowances and fix the compensation of the agent, according to his view of the circumstances shown to him, in support of their justice and equity. In Macdaniel's Case, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 1, it is said by the judge, delivering the opinion of the court that "it will not be contended that one secretary has not the same power as another, to give a construction to an act which relates to the business of the department." The court in that case fully recognise the discretion which any one of the great departments of the government must be allowed to exercise, in the distribution of its duties and responsibilities, and that while he regulates the exercise of his powers by the law, it does not follow that he must show a statutory provision for every thing he does.

In the case submitted now to this court and jury, we are not called upon to decide upon the right of Mr. Southard to admit the credits in question, whether they had been suspended or rejected by the former secretary. Whether Mr. Southard was right or wrong in his action upon the account which he settled with the defendant in 1824, and in his allowance of credits to the defendant in that account which had formerly been withheld, is, at this time and in this suit, of no importance. This suit is not brought by the United States to recover back the money, credited and allowed to the defendant by that settlement, upon the allegation, that the secretary transcended his power in allowing those credits, or on any other allegation. No attempt is made to disturb that settlement. This action is now brought to recover from the defendant the money which he retains for his compensation and charges, for services and expenses subsequent to that settlement, and in strict conformity with the allowances that were made to him by the secretary, in that settlement. Then the question is, if it can be called a question, had the secretary a right to make a contract or arrangement with his agent, acting under and by his authority, performing the services of the department under his direction and controul, for the compensation for these services and for the expenses for which he was to be allowed in performing them? If the secretary had this power, if he has made this contract with the defendant, and the defendant, upon the faith of the contract, has gone on to render his services and to disburse his money in the public service, it is for us to inquire, whether Mr. Southard has exercised his discretion discreetly or not; whether he has been too liberal or not in the terms he gave to his agent. That such an arrangement, such a contract, was made, seems to me to be proved beyond a question by the testimony of Mr. Southard, and of Mr. Watkins at that time the fourth auditor of the treasury department, in addition to the evidence afforded by the settlement itself. On the faith of this agreement, Mr. M'Call resigned his consulship at Barcelona, returned to Gibraltar, resumed the duties of his agency, and devoted himself to them. No question has been made of the fidelity and ability with which he performed these duties.

You will observe that this case comes before you, on a more free and extensive ground than it stood at the department, when these credits were refused. The officers of that department looked at the case only as it appeared on their books and records; they decided it by their regulations for the settlement of accounts, which are intended only for general rules in the transaction of the business of the office, and for the government of extraordinary cases. The courts have often revised the decisions made by the strictness of these regulations, where they worked manifest injustice to the individuals concerned. The accounting officers of the department, in this instance, took up the original contract as it appears in the correspondence between Secretary Crowninshield and the defendant; they put their construction upon it, with which I do not find fault, and they stopped there. As they found nothing on their books and records of the subsequent proceedings of Mr. Southard, they paid no attention to them. It is our duty, however, to go further into the truth and justice of the case, and to decide upon the rights of the parties by the laws of the land, and not by the office rules of a department. Upon these principles of law, applied to your own views of the evidence, you will make up your verdict. The defendant admits a balance to be due from him to the United States of five thousand four hundred and seventy-eight dollars and ninety-four cents, which he has always been ready to pay. The United States claim from him the sum of eleven thousand six hundred and twenty dollars and sixty cents, with interest amounting to thirteen hundred and twenty-eight dollars and thirty-one cents. The difference is made by the disputed items in the defendant's account, upon which you are to decide.

The jury found a verdict for the United States for five thousand four hundred and seventy-eight dollars and ninety-four cents.

Case No. 14,707.

UNITED STATES v. CALDWELL.

[8 Blatchf. 131.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 3, 1871.

EXTRADITION — BROUGHT WITHIN JURISDICTION — TRIAL FOR ANOTHER OFFENCE.

The defendant was indicted for bribing an officer of the United States. He pleaded that he was brought into the jurisdiction of the court on a charge of forgery, under an extradition treaty, and that such offence of bribery was not within the treaty. On demurrer to the plea: Held, that the plea was bad.

Noah Davis, U. S. Dist. Atty.
William H. Anthon, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court upon a demurrer to the plea. The prisoner has been indicted for the offence of bribing an officer of the United States. To this indictment the defendant pleads, that this court ought not to take cognizance of the offence in the indictment specified, because, at the time when he was arrested and brought within the jurisdiction of this court, he was a resident of Prescott, in the province of Ontario, dominion of Canada, and was brought into the jurisdiction of this court on a charge of forgery, under the provisions of the treaty between her Britannic majesty and the United States of America, commonly called the "Ashburton Treaty," ratified August 9th, 1842 [8 Stat. 576], providing for the extradition of persons charged with certain offences, and the offence specified in said indictment is not one of the offences mentioned in the said treaty, and this court has no jurisdiction in the premises. To this plea the government demurs, and thus the question is raised, whether the facts set forth in the plea are sufficient to oust this court of jurisdiction to try the defendant for an offence otherwise conceded to be within its cognizance.

On the part of the defence, reliance is placed upon sundry cases in the tribunals of this state, which furnish, it is claimed, a support to the proposition of the defence, that this court has jurisdiction of the person of the prisoner for a single purpose only, namely, his trial for the crime for which he was extradited. The cases referred to are civil cases, wherein the service of the warrant of arrest was set aside by the court on motion, because it appeared that the plaintiff in the action had resorted to fraud to procure the presence of the defendant within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, in order that he might cause his arrest. Such cases do not furnish a rule applicable in criminal prosecutions, nor do I find any case where a warrant of arrest of a person charged with crime at the instance of the people, has been set aside, because of deceit practiced to bring the accused within the reach of the warrant.

But, if the same rule were applicable in criminal prosecutions and in civil actions, and if the question here arose on a motion to set aside the arrest, instead of on a plea to the jurisdiction, I am of the opinion that the relief could not be granted, for the reason that the person of the prisoner is not within the jurisdiction of the United States by virtue of any warrant issued out of this or any court. The prisoner was brought within the jurisdiction of the United States by virtue of a warrant of the executive authority of a foreign government, upon the requisition of the executive department of the government of the United States; and, while abuse of extradition proceedings, and want of good faith in resorting to them, doubtless constitute a good cause of complaint between the two governments, such complaints do not form a proper subject of investigation in the courts, however much those tribunals might regret that they should have been permitted to arise. To hold otherwise, would, in a case like the present, permit a person accused of crime to put the government on trial for its dealings with a foreign power. In the present case, there is hardly room for the charge that the extradition proceedings against the accused were in bad faith, inasmuch as the records of this court show an indictment duly found against the accused for the crime by reason of which his extradition was granted. But, whether extradited in good faith or not, the prisoner, in point of fact, is within the jurisdiction of the court, charged with a crime therein committed; and I am at a loss for even a plausible reason for holding, upon such a plea as the present, that the court is without jurisdiction to try him. The question appears to me to be not one of jurisdiction of the court, but rather of privilege from arrest; and I cannot say that the fact, that the defendant was brought within the jurisdiction by virtue of a warrant of extradition for the crime of forgery, affords him a legal exemption from prosecution for other crimes by him committed.

I may add, that the Case of Heilbronn [Case No. 6,323], which, so far as I know, is not reported, probably affords a precedent for the action of the government in the present case. Heilbronn was delivered by the government of the United States to the government of Great Britain, upon a charge of forgery. When the facts out of which the charge arose were proved before the commissioner, the ground taken in his behalf was, that the crime committed was not forgery, but embezzlement. The commissioner held otherwise, and the prisoner was extradited; but, upon his arrival in Great Britain, he was there indicted and convicted of embezzlement. upon the same facts which had been claimed before the commissioner to show forgery. That case presented, therefore, the point now taken here; but, whether it was taken upon the trial in Great Britain, I do not know. I do not, therefore, refer to the case as an authority, but simply notice it, as, perhaps, a precedent.

The demurrer must be held to be well taken, but the defendant has leave to withdraw his plea, and enter a plea of not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. CALDWELL.

WITNESSES—FAILURE TO OBEY SUBPŒNA—ATTACHMENT.

[1. Judges of a county court are not excused from obeying a subpœna to appear as witnesses, on the ground that the judges of the state supreme court are holding a nisi prius court in the county, and that the occasion seems to require respectful attention to them on the part of the county judges; and in case of a failure to obey the subpœna an attachment will issue.]

[2. Prior service of a subpœna upon a witness who fails to appear is an indispensable requisite to awarding an attachment against him.]

[Cited in The Laurens, Case No. 8,122; Dreskill v. Parish, Id. 4,076.]

This was an indictment for a misdemeanor committed in Northumberland county, in which a subpœna had issued, on the part of the defendant, to summon Samuel M'Clay, Esq., and John M'Pherson, Esq., associate judges of the county courts of Northumberland, to appear in the circuit court as witnesses on the 4th of May. The subpœna was served on Mr. M'Clay on the 28th of April, and on Mr. M'Pherson the next day. E. Tilghman now produced an affidavit, "that they were material witnesses, without the benefit of whose testimony, the defendant apprehended and believed he could not safely proceed to trial;" and moved for a postponement, not only in this case, but, also, in cases of Montgomery, Lang and Stockman; in which, to save expence, no subpœna had issued, though the same persons were material witnesses for the respective defendants.

Mr. Rawle, the district attorney, objected, that from the 4th of May, when the subpœna was returnable, a sufficient time had elapsed to have brought the witnesses to Philadelphia upon an attachment; but he consented to consider the subpœna as having issued in all the causes. There was no legal necessity for the witnesses, merely because they were county judges, to attend the nisi prius of the supreme court, which is alleged in excuse for their absence; and as this is not a capital case, the application for delay is not entitled to be treated with any peculiar indulgence.

E. Tilghman replied, that the subpœna had been served in a reasonable time; and, although no attachment had been moved for, it is some excuse for the defendant, that he expected the trials for treason would first come on; and for the witnesses, that their official situation seemed to prescribe a respectful attention to the judges of the supreme court, who were then holding a court of nisi prius, in the county of Northumberland. But after the oath which the defendant has taken, the court will not presume, that his application for delay is without just cause; and if there is just cause, they will not compel him to proceed to a trial, under such disadvantages. Besides, it is not desired, to put off the trial till the next term, but only for a few days, that an express may be sent for the witnesses; as with the benefit of their testimony it is immaterial to the defendant when he shall be tried. Though, if the delay is limited to a few days, it will be necessary, in order to remove all future cavil, to move for an attachment against the witnesses.

BY THE COURT:—We have no hesitation in granting the indulgence of a delay for a few days. The cause may, therefore, be continued till this day week; and, in the meantime, let the attachment issue; but it can only be in the case, in which the subpœna has been actually served. The practice must always be strict in the previous stages of the business, before an attachment can be awarded; and all the documents upon which it is awarded, must be filed with the court.

PATERSON, Circuit Justice:—We pay no respect to persons. The law operates equally upon all; the high and low, the rich and poor. If we issue a subpœna to a justice or a judge, and it is not obeyed, we should be more strict in our proceedings against such characters, than against others, whose office did not so strongly point out their duty.

INDICTMENT FOR SEDITIOUS LIBEL—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY — PLEADING — EVIDENCE IN JUSTIFICATION — TRIAL — CHALLENGES OF JURORS.

[1. In a prosecution for libel under the sedition law (Act 1798) the jury have nothing to do with assessing the fine in case of a conviction. That is for the court alone.]

[2. Where an indictment for libel is founded upon passages contained in a book, it is not necessary to set out the title of the book; but it is sufficient to aver that upon a date mentioned defendant did publish, etc., a false, etc., libel "of the tenor and effect following," and then set out the passages complained of.]

[3. An allegation of "tenor and effect" requires proof of the substance only, and not the precise words.]

[4. Where the accused relies upon a justification, the proof of the justification must extend to the whole charge, otherwise it is insufficient and inadmissible; and it is not competent to prove one part of the specific charge by one witness and other parts by different witnesses.]

[5. In a prosecution for seditious libel the only question which can be put to a juror challenged for favor is whether he has ever formed and delivered an opinion upon the charge against the accused; and it is improper to ask whether he has ever formed and delivered an opinion on the book in which the alleged libellous passages occur.]

[6. Principal challenges to the array, or the whole jury at once, are always for partiality in the sheriff, and not in the jurors, and such challenges are to be determined by the court; whereas challenges for favor, in the particular jurors, are to be determined by triers sworn by the court. And the fact that a partial juror has been returned is no reason for inferring partiality in the sheriff, so as to furnish ground of challenge to the array.]

[7. The court may demand a statement in writing of questions intended to be put to a witness, in order that no illegal evidence may be heard by the jury and make an undue impression.]

[8. The right of the jury in criminal cases to determine the law as well as the facts does not extend to a determination of the question whether a statute of the United States produced to them is void as contravening the constitution. The constitutionality of the law under which the indictment is found is a matter solely for the court, and counsel will not be permitted to argue that question to the jury.]

[Indictment against James Thompson Callender for a seditious libel against the president of the United States.]

The matter set out in the indictment as libellous was as follows: "The reign of Mr. Adams has been one continued tempest of malignant passions. As president, he has never opened his lips, or lifted his pen without threatening and scolding; the grand object of his administration has been to exasperate the rage of contending parties, to calumniate and destroy every man who differs from his opinions. Mr. Adams has laboured, and with melancholy success, to break up the bonds of social affection, and under the ruins of confidence and friendship, to extinguish the only gleam of happiness that glimmers through the dark and despicable farce of life. The contriver of this peace has been suddenly converted, as he said, to the presidential system, that is to a French war, an American navy, a large standing army, an additional load of taxes, and all the other symptoms and consequences of debt and despotism. The same system of persecution has been extended all over the continent, every person holding an office must either quit it, or think and vote exactly with Mr. Adams. Adams and Washington have since been shaping a series of these paper jobbers into judges and ambassadors, as their whole courage lies in want of shame; these poltroons, without risking a manly and intelligible defence of their own measures, raise an affected yelp against the corruption of the French Directory, as if any corruption would be more venal, more notorious, more execrated than their own. The object with Mr. Adams was to recommend a French war, professedly for the sake of supporting American commerce, but in reality for the sake of yoking us into an alliance with the British tyrant.—While such numbers of the effective agents of the Revolution languish in obscurity, or shiver in want, ask Mr. Adams whether it was proper to heap so many myriads of dollars upon William Smith, upon a paper jobber, who, next to Hamilton and himself is, perhaps, the most detested character on the continent.—You will then make your choice between innocence and guilt, between freedom and slavery, between paradise and perdition; you will choose between the man who has deserted and reversed all his principles, and that man whose own example strengthens all his laws, that man whose predictions, like those of Henry, have been converted into history. You will choose between that man whose life is unspotted by a crime, and that man whose hands are reeking with the blood of the poor, friendless Connecticut sailor: I see the tear of indignation starting on your cheeks! You anticipate the name of John Adams.—Every feature in the conduct of Mr. Adams, forms a distinct and additional evidence, that he was determined at all events to embroil this country with France. Mr. Adams has only completed the scene of ignominy which Mr. Washington began.—This last presidential felony will be buried by congress in the same criminal silence as its predecessors. Foremost in whatever is detestable, Mr. Adams feels anxiety to curb the frontier population. He was a professed aristocrat; he had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest. Thus we see the genuine character of the president, when but in a secondary station, he censured the funding system, when at the head of affairs, he reverses all his former principles. He exerts himself to plunge his country into the most expensive and ruinous establishments. In the two first years of his presidency, he has contrived pretences to double the annual expense of government by useless fleets, armies, sinecures and jobs of every possible description. By sending these ambassadors to Paris, Mr. Adams and his British faction designed to do nothing but mischief. In that paper with all the cowardly insolence arising from his assurance of personal safety, with all the fury, but without the propriety or sublimity of Homer's Achilles, this hoary headed incendiary, this libeller of the governor of Virginia, bawls out to arms! then to arms! It was floating upon the same bladder of popularity that Mr. Adams threatened to make this city the centrical point of a bonfire. Reader, dost thou envy that unfortunate old man with his twenty-five thousand dollars a year, with the petty parade of his birth-day, with the importance of his name sticking in every other page of the statute book. Alas! he is not an object of envy, but of compassion and of horror. With Connecticut more than half undeceived, with Pennsylvania disgusted, with Virginia alarmed, with Kentucky holding him in defiance, having renounced all his original principles, and affronted all his honest friends, he cannot enjoy the sweet slumbers of innocence, he cannot hope to feel the most exquisitely delightful sensation that ever warmed a human breast, the consciousness of being universally and deservedly beloved.—It is happy for Mr. Adams himself, as well as for his country, that he asserted an untruth. In the midst of such a scene of profligacy and of usury the president has persisted as long as he durst, in making his utmost efforts for provoking a French war. For although Mr. Adams were to make a treaty with France, yet such is the grossness of his prejudice, and so great is the violence of his passions, that under his administration America would be in constant danger of a second quarrel. When a chief magistrate both in his speeches and newspapers, is constantly reviling France, he can neither expect nor desire to live long in peace with her. Take your choice, then, between Adams, war and beggary, and Jefferson, peace and competency."

On Wednesday, May 28, a continuance was asked for by the defendant's counsel, upon the following affidavit:

"City of Richmond, ss. This day James Thompson Callender made oath before me, a magistrate of the said city, that William Gardner, Tench Coxe, Judge Bee, Timothy Pickering, William B. Giles, Stephen Thompson Mason, and General Blackburn, he believes to be material witnesses in his defence, against an indictment found against him during the present term of the circuit court of the United States for the middle circuit, Virginia district: that William Gardner aforesaid resides, he believes, in Portsmouth, in the state of New Hampshire; that Tench Coxe aforesaid resides in Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania; that Judge Bee resides, the deponent hath understood, in South Carolina, but in what part of the state he knows not; that Timothy Pickering aforesaid resided of late in Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania, but where he resides at this time the deponent doth not know; that William B. Giles aforesaid, he hath understood since he hath been furnished with a copy of the indictment, and since the said Giles hath left town, resides in the county of Amelia; and that Gen. Blackburn resides in the county of Bath. The said James Thompson Callender further declares, that he expects to prove by the said William Gardner, and that he verily believes that he shall prove by the said William Gardner, that the said William Gardner was commissioner of loans for the state of New Hampshire, under the government of the United States, and that he was turned out of the said office of commissioner of loans because he, the said Gardner, refused to subscribe an address circulated in the town of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, and presented to the president of the United States in the year 1798, at the instance of several inhabitants of the said town, in which address unequivocal approbation of the conduct of the said president, in the administration of the United States, is expressed.

"(2d) That said James Thompson Callender also declares, on oath, that he verily believes that he shall prove, by the evidence of Tench Coxe aforesaid, that he, the said Tench Coxe, in the year 1798, held an important office under the government of the United States, to wit, commissioner of the revenue, from which office the said Coxe was ejected by the present president of the United States, because he did not approve the measures of his the said president's administration, or the principles on which it was conducted. That he verily believes that he shall be able to prove, by the evidence of Judge Bee, that he did receive from the president of the United States, in the year 1799, a letter, in which he the said president did advise and request the said Judge Bee, then acting in his judicial character, to deliver to the consul of the British nation in Charleston Jonathan Robbins, alias Thomas Nash, who had been apprehended and carried before the said judge on a charge of murder committed on the high seas, on board the British frigate Hermione.

"He farther deposes on oath, that he verily believes that he shall be able to prove, by the evidence of Timothy Pickering, that the president of the United States was in possession of despatches from Mr. Vans Murray, American minister in Holland, containing assurances on the part of the French Republic that ambassadors from the United States would be received in a way satisfactory to the people and government of the United States, many weeks while congress was in session, before he communicated the same to congress.

"The deponent further saith, that he verily believes that he shall be able to prove, by the evidence of Stephen Thompson Mason and William B. Giles, that John Adams, president of the United States, has unequivocally avowed, in conversation with them, principles utterly incompatible with the principles of the present constitution of the United States; principles which could not be carried into operation under any political institution without the establishment of a direct, powerful, and dangerous aristocracy; that he declared, in express terms, to the said Stephen Thompson Mason, that he had no more idea that the present federal constitution could, for any length of time, control the people of the United States, than that it could control the motion of the planets; that he also declared to the said Stephen Thompson Mason, that he had no more idea that a political society could exist without a distinction of ranks, than that an army could exist without officers; and also that he can prove, by the said William B. Giles, that the president of the United States has avowed, in conversation with him, a sentiment to this effect, that he thought the executive department of the United States ought to be vested with power to direct and control the public will. That this deponent verily believes that he shall be able to prove, by General Blackburn, that he did, on the —— day of ——, in the year 1798, receive an address from John Adams, president of the United States, in answer to the field officers of Bath county, in which the said president does avow that there was a party in Virginia which deserved to be humbled into dust and ashes before the indignant frowns of their injured, insulted, and offended country. And this deponent further saith, he is advised and believes that it is material to his defence against the indictment aforesaid, that he should procure authentic copies of sundry answers made by the president of the United States to addresses from the inhabitants of the United States, in various parts thereof, which authentic copies he cannot procure, so as to be in readiness for trial during the present term. He also saith that he is advised and doth believe, that a certain book, entitled 'An Essay on Canon and Feudal Law,' or entitled in words to that purport, ascribed to the president of the United States, and of which he believes the president is the author, is material to his defence, and that he cannot procure a copy of the same, and evidence that the said president is the author thereof, without being allowed several weeks, and perhaps months, for the purpose. He further saith that he is told by the counsel who mean to appear for him, that they cannot possibly be prepared to investigate the evidence relating to the several charges in the indictment, even if all the persons and documents wanted were upon the spot."

The motion, after having been argued by Mr. Hay and Mr. Nicholas for the traverser, and Mr. Nelson, District Attorney, for the United States, was refused by the court, but a postponement granted till the ensuing Monday.

On Monday, the 2d of June, Mr. Callender appeared in court, attended by his counsel, Mr. Nicholas, the Attorney-General of the State, Mr. Hay, and Mr. Wirt.

The traverser being called, a postponement for a few hours was asked, until it could be ascertained whether Mr. Giles would attend or not. The badness of the weather on the preceding day, it was suggested, had probably prevented his arrival in town as early as might otherwise have been expected. The judge desired to know whether the counsel for the traverser wished a postponement for a few hours only, or until the next day, as they might make their choice. The next day was preferred.

On Tuesday, the motion for a postponement until November was renewed.

Mr. Hay said that Mr. Giles had not arrived, and that he did not then expect him. Mr. Giles would, probably, presume that the indictment was either tried or continued to the day to which he was summoned, and as he had not come on that day he could not be expected at all. Mr. H. then remarked that the court had declared the evidence of Mr. Giles to be material, not only in express terms, but by a partial postponement, and inferred that the trial ought not to take place until his personal attendance could be procured.

Mr. H. then requested the attention of the court to other reasons, which satisfied his own mind, that the motion ought to be granted.

The laws and customs of the state of Virginia were in favour of the motion. In this state when an indictment for misdemeanour is found, the party is not arrested and brought into court, but a summons issues returnable to the succeeding court. In the interval the party has time to collect and prepare the materials for his defence. It was true, as to himself, that he had long ago formed a determination to appear in behalf of the first man who should be indicted in this state for a libel under the sedition law. He had formed this resolution because he was convinced, after the most mature deliberation, preceded by a calm and temperate investigation of the subject with gentlemen who differed from him in political sentiment, but were of the first characters for talents, that the second section of the sedition law was unconstitutional. But he had never supposed the trial would take place immediately after the prosecution was commenced, and therefore, though he was ready to discuss the question concerning the "rights of the jury to decide the law of the case," and the question concerning the constitutionality of the law, he was not ready to state and to comment on the evidence on which the traverser relied. This had been already asserted to the court. But there was another point worthy of notice. He was not ashamed to acknowledge, he said, that he was but little acquainted with the doctrine of libels. Happily for the repose of people, no instance had occurred in this state which had turned the attention of professional men to that subject. In the little time, therefore, that had elapsed since the traverser had been arrested, he had not had leisure to examine a point which appeared to him to merit some consideration.

The second section of the sedition law made falsehood as well as scandal and malice an essential part of every libel, and by the last sentence the party accused is allowed to show in his justification the truth of the matter charged to be libellous.

Mr. H. said, he would not pretend to say decidedly what ought to be the construction of that law, but the opinion which he had been able to form after a very short consideration of the subject, was, that the object of the law was to punish a man, not for abuse nor for erroneous deductions or opinions, but for "fact falsely and maliciously asserted." If this idea was correct, it became a matter of consequence to do what had never been done perhaps before, to draw a line of discrimination between fact and opinion; because if the indictment contained against the traverser charges of being guilty of error in opinion as well as falsehood in fact, it was so far defective, and ought not to be regarded in preparing for a defence, or notice by the jury in assessing the fine.

Here the judge interrupted Mr. H., and told him that he was mistaken in supposing that the jury had a right to assess the fine. It may be conformable, said he, to your local state laws, but it is a wild notion as applied to the federal court. It is not the law.

Mr. H. said that he was somewhat perplexed. He could sometimes answer arguments, but not authority; however, if he was permitted to proceed, he would state his ideas about fact and opinion, and then leave the subject to the court.

Mr. Hay said, that the observations which he was about to make, were hazarded without that deliberation to which he could wish to have recourse. He was not, however, urging an argument, but praying for time to prepare one. It seemed to him, he said, that the assertion of a fact was the assertion of that which, from its nature, was susceptible of direct and positive evidence; everything else was opinion. For instance, if one man should say of another that he stole a horse, the assertion, if true, could be demonstrated to be true by proving that he did steal a horse; or if one man said of another that he was a thief, the person making the charge might support it by proving that the party accused had taken property secretly, without the consent or knowledge of the owner. About evidence in a question of this sort, all men of common understanding would form the same opinion. But what sort of evidence would be necessary to prove the first words of the indictment, that the reign of Mr. Adams had been one continued tempest of malignant passions? The circumstances to which the writer might allude, and which satisfied his mind that Mr. Adams was intemperate and passionate, would only prove to a man of different political complexion, that he was under the influence of a patriotic, honest and virtuous sensibility. When Mr. Adams said in his reply to the people of Arlington and Sandgate, "that he had long seen the exertions of dangerous and restless men misleading the understanding of well-meaning citizens, and prompting them to such measures as would sink the glories of America, and prostrate her liberties at the feet of France,"—some might conceive that he was speaking the language of passion and malignity. Many were of that opinion,—Mr. H. himself was. He did not think that Mr. Adams could point his finger to a single man who deserved a reproach so vile. It was language calculated to exasperate the rage of contending parties. On the other hand, he was willing to admit that there were men of good sense and upright principles who really believe that the president spoke the plain truth, and that they themselves had seen such men as he had described. This was a question of opinion only, and therefore was open to endless discussion.

One instance more would completely illustrate his meaning. The indictment charged the traverser with having maliciously asserted, that the president had reversed all his principles. If this assertion could be proved, it would be necessary, 1st. To show what his principles were.—2d. What they are now. The first branch of discussion presented difficulties absolutely insurmountable. Men of different political opinions, furnished with the same materials of information, would form conclusions diametrically opposite. Let them take for their guide the vindication of the constitution of the United States. Many were perfectly satisfied that the president of the United States, instead of approving the federal constitution, was of opinion, that a government composed of an hereditary chief magistrate, and senate, and a house of commons or representatives, chosen by the people, was better calculated than any other to secure the liberties and promote the happiness of the people. Mr. Hay avowed that he had no doubt that such was the opinion of the president. But others might think, and many had said, that the fair inference was, that he was cordially attached to the principles on which the constitution of the United States was constructed. What the president's principles had been, therefore, was a question, about which there would forever be a difference of opinion; and if the assertion made by the traverser was not capable of being proved or disproved, the privilege of giving the truth in evidence was a nullity. A jury of one party would not believe it when given; a jury of the other party would not require it to be given.

Mr. Hay concluded by saying that delay was of no consequence to the traverser. Not only his little property, but his liberty was at stake. He wished to have time to defend himself by counsel who felt competent to the task which they were to perform. As to the United States at large, an immediate trial could be of no sort of consequence, nor can it be of any moment, said Mr. H., to the party who, it is said, has been libelled. The reputation of the president of the United States must for ever rest on the opinion of a virtuous and intelligent people: and standing on its mighty basis, it could never be affected by the abuse or declamation of an individual, and that individual an obscure and friendless foreigner.

Mr. Nicholas then made a few observations.[1]

We conceive that the testimony of Mr. Giles is extremely important; he will prove, as Mr. Callender has stated in his affidavit, that Mr. Adams, the president, wished that the executive had power to control the public will.

This testimony, when compared with the books of the president, will substantiate the charges in the book written by Mr. Callender. It will go strongly to a confirmation of the charges in dispute; it goes directly to that part of the indictment, where he is charged with having said, that the president is a professed aristocrat. It has been stated, that as there are nineteen charges in the indictment against the traverser, though we prove eighteen of them to be true, yet he must be found guilty, because we do not prove the truth of the nineteenth;—but how is it possible for us to defend ourselves, or how can we be prepared for trial, if the witness, by whom we can prove that particular charge, be absent? If the court think that, in order to justify ourselves, we must prove the whole libel to be true, and it shall appear that testimony to prove a particular charge is wanting, the court will afford us an opportunity of adducing it. I conceive, with submission, that the former judgment of the court, in particularly postponing the trial, admitted the evidence of Mr. Giles to be material, and that his personal attendance would be essential to justice.

Here, CHASE, Circuit Justice, informed Mr. Nicholas that he had not apprehended the opinion of the court rightly, and that although on the application of the counsel for the traverser, the court had given them the choice of postponement of the trial till to-day instead of a few hours; yet it was not meant by that indulgence, either to declare the testimony of Mr. Giles material, or to postpone the trial till another term, on account of his absence. Mr. Nicholas then urged once more the necessity of postponing the trial till Mr. Giles could attend. The question, he said, on a motion for a continuance, is, can the testimony of the absent witness substantiate the defence or the point in issue? How can it be done, if the witness be not present? When a witness, to prove the truth of a particular charge, is absent, I trust the court will give us time to avail ourselves of his evidence, and will not precipitate a trial, when a trial will not demonstrate that the decision is right; for if the defendant be found guilty when his witnesses are absent, and counsel unprepared, the verdict will not satisfy the public mind of his guilt.

Here CHASE, Circuit Justice, stopped Mr. Nicholas, and addressed the counsel for Mr. Callender, thus:—

It is wholly improper to go back to the former motion. Gentlemen, you misapprehend the intention of the court, in postponing the cause till to-day—you ought to confine yourselves to the present motion. Two reasons are assigned for postponing the trial: the first, that Mr. Giles is absent, and it is inferred, that the court, by not ruling a trial before, admitted his evidence to be material. The court did not enter into the question whether it be material or not. It appeared, that he was within a little distance of this place, and the cause was suspended till Monday, that Mr. Giles might be summoned, before that day, to attend. On Monday, you asked for a postponement of the trial for a few hours, and it was stated that, perhaps he might come in the course of the day. Instead of a few hours, you had choice of continuing it till to-day. Mr. Giles has been summoned, and does not attend. Regularly you ought to take out an attachment against him, for not attending, after having been served with the subpœna, and apprised, that his evidence was required by the traverser. There is no reason to believe he will be here during the term of the court: you do not expect him; if such excuses as these authorize a postponement of the trial, it must be evident that this cause will never be tried. It is not necessary to say whether Mr. Giles, if present, could be sworn or not; because the traverser is not entitled, on general principles, to a continuance. Another reason assigned is, that as the jury are to assess the fine, it is essential that the traverser should have the privilege of adducing testimony to mitigate it. This may be the practice in your own state courts. Your own court will be governed by your own laws; but it does not apply to the federal courts. The jury are not to regulate the fine. It is a mistaken idea; they have nothing to do with it. But it is stated that the counsel are unprepared to defend the traverser. You show yourselves to be men of ability, and there is no difficulty in the cause; but you say that you are not ready to discuss the difference between fact and opinion: that the charges in the indictment are merely opinion, and not facts falsely asserted. Must there be a departure from common sense, to find out a construction favourable to the traverser? This construction admits the publication, but denies its criminality. If the traverser certainly published that defamatory paper, read it and consider it. Can any man of you say, that the president is a detestable and criminal man? The traverser charges him with being a murderer and a thief, a despot and a tyrant! Will you call a man a murderer and a thief, and excuse yourself by saying it is but mere opinion—or, that you heard so? Any falsehood, however palpable and wicked, may be justified by this species of argument. The question here is, with what intent the traverser published these charges? Are they false, scandalous, and malicious, and published with intent to defame? It is for the jury to say, what was the intent of such imputations, and this is sufficiently obvious. The cause must be tried. I am sworn to do justice between the United States and the prisoner at the bar. I do not dictate to you how you are to defend him, but you must defend every man according to the law; and without intending any disrespect to either of you, I must confine you to what I think the law.

[1] Here Mr. Robertson's report begins. The report in the Virginia Examiner makes Judge Chase refuse the motion directly at the close of Mr. Hay's speech. I have preferred Mr. Robertson's narrative, however, not only because he was a responsible reporter, but because his report was afterwards verified by him under oath.

The marshal was then ordered to call the jury.

Mr. Nicholas.—We mean to challenge the array and take every advantage which the laws of the country give us. In support of this doctrine, I will read a passage from "Trials per Pais." (Here he read the passage.) I believe there is testimony in court to prove that one of the jurors returned by the marshal, has expressed his sentiments hostile to the traverser. It is like a case stated in the books, where a verdict was set aside, because a juryman had previously said, that the man accused ought to be hanged; and in that case, on the second trial, every juryman was called to say, whether he had formed any opinion on the subject or not?

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—My construction of the law is quite the contrary. I have always seen triers sworn to decide these questions. How is this done in your country? Challenges for favour must be decided by triers. I suppose there must be triers sworn.

Mr. Nicholas.—I believe the books lay down this distinction. Challenges to the array are either principal challenges, or challenges for favour;—causes for principal challenges are always tried by the court; challenges for favour are always tried by triers.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—Well, sir, your challenge is for favour, because you state the juror to be unfavourable to the traverser.

Mr. Nicholas.—This book states it as a cause of principal challenge.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—Show me that book: it is not the best authority. Have you Coke upon Littleton in the house? If I had it we would see the whole doctrine at once. I am persuaded that Coke upon Littleton states, that challenges for favour must be decided by triers. The oath of the triers is laid down there. Challenges to the array are for partiality in the sheriff.

Coke upon Littleton being produced, and the judge having examined it, observed, the case is clear. Principal challenges to the array, or the whole jury at once, are always for partiality in the sheriff, and not in the jurors.

Mr. Nicholas said, that the law might perhaps consider the return of a partial juror, as sufficient to ground a challenge to the array, on the principle of partiality in the sheriff, and wished to know if he was correct in this idea of the law.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—No sir, the law is not so. You must proceed regularly. You may bring in proof if you can, that any juror has delivered his opinion upon that case heretofore; or you may examine the juror himself, upon oath, to this effect. You may do either, but not both; and this alternative offered, you must consider not as a strict right.

The counsel chose to rely on the jurors themselves.

The first juror was sworn, and the judge put the following question to him: "Have you ever formed and delivered an opinion upon the charges contained in the indictment?" The juror answered, that he had never seen the indictment, nor heard it read. The judge then said, he must be sworn in chief.

Mr. Hay asked permission to put a question to the juror before he was sworn in chief. The judge desired to know what sort of a question he meant to put, and told him he must first hear the question, and if he thought it a proper one, it might be put.

Mr. Hay.—The question which, with the permission of the court, I meant to have asked, is this: "Have you ever formed and delivered an opinion on the book entitled, 'The Prospect Before Us,' from which the charges in the indictment are extracted?"

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—That question is improper, and you shall not ask it. The only proper question is, "Have you ever formed and delivered an opinion upon this charge." He must have delivered as well as formed the opinion. Such a question as you propose, would prevent the man from ever being tried—the whole country have heard the case, and very probably, formed an opinion. You might mislead men by your ingenuity, and if you were indulged in putting the question, the traverser might never be tried. He has answered, that he never saw the indictment, nor heard it read, and if he has neither read nor heard the charges, I am sure he cannot have formed or delivered an opinion on the subject.

Mr. Hay then asked, that the indictment might be read to the juror, because, perhaps, when he heard and understood the charges, he would answer, that he had both formed and delivered an opinion upon them.

The judge replied, that the court had already indulged him as far as they could. That the answer of the juryman was explicit—that they could not go further than they had gone, and that he ought to be satisfied.

The juryman was then sworn in chief, and the issue was explained, that it must be proved that the traverser wrote or published the book—that the charges were false, scandalous and malicious, and that he wrote them with intent to defame, and that if he could prove the charges he must be acquitted. The same question, "whether they had formed and delivered an opinion on the charges against the traverser," was put by the judge, to eight of the other jurymen successively, before they were sworn in chief, and they all answered in the negative.

The counsel for the traverser said, that it was unnecessary to put this question to the other three jurymen, and they were accordingly sworn in chief immediately. The eighth juror answered, when the previous question was put to him, that though he had never read or heard the charges in the indictment, and knew not what the traverser had published, yet he had formed an unequivocal opinion, that such a book as "The Prospect Before Us," came within the sedition law. But no objection was made to him, and he was sworn like the rest.

The indictment was then read by the clerk.

Mr. Nelson, the district attorney, then said: I shall not attempt, gentlemen of the jury, to excite your passions or inflame your feelings. I shall endeavour to be cautious, and avoid uttering what ought not to be said, which may in any manner influence your judgment, upon your oath; for in that office which I hold, which is that of the people of United America, it is more than a common duty, to take care not to step beyond that line which leads to justice. To that state in which your passions shall be; to such feelings as you shall possess, after hearing the charge contained in the indictment, the evidence in support of it, and a fair statement and representation of the case, I shall leave and entrust the case. In the present state of the business, it will be proper for me to call your attention to the statute or act of congress, which relates to this case.

Here Mr. Nelson read the second and third sections of the sedition law. [Lyon's Case, Case No. 8,646, and note.]

Upon this statute James Thompson Callender is now indicted, and the indictment charges that, maliciously designing and intending to defame the president, he, James Thompson Callender, did publish the libel set forth therein, with intent to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and to excite the hatred of the good people of the United States towards him. It will be for you, gentlemen of the jury, in this case to determine whether the traverser has, or has not, been the publisher of this paper. This point being ascertained, it will be for you to consider with what view, and for what purpose, a paper like this has been composed and published. If you believe it to be a candid and fair discussion of constitutional subjects, of real grievances, or of political opinions and principles generally, you will not consider it to be a libel within the statute. If you believe the facts and allegations averred in the paper are true, you will consider that the traverser hath defended himself according to the statute; but if, from internal evidence in the paper itself, you do not think so, you do not believe it to be a candid evidence and fair discussion of constitutional subjects, real grievances, or political opinions and principles, and that it does not contain the truth in all parts, you must find the traverser guilty. You will take the paper into your room with you, and consider it coolly and dispassionately, free, and discharged from all that you may have heard abroad respecting it, and determine in your minds whether it be possible to give it any other construction than that which the indictment has ascribed to it. To me it seems impossible that the extremest ingenuity can show that it was written for any other purpose. However, gentlemen of the jury, to you I submit the calm examination of the paper, upon the paper itself, and this business as to the libel which, or such parts of which, as are charged in the indictment, I shall lay before you, after it shall be proven by witnesses, who will be produced to show that James Thompson Callender, the traverser, did publish this paper; and, in laying it before you, I will make such observations as may seem to me proper and necessary to be made.

Mr. Hay understood that some of the witnesses who are to be examined to prove the guilt of the accused, were themselves, in the estimation of the law, equally guilty; that they have printed, though they had not written the libel in question. He would, therefore, beg leave to make it known to those who were in any degree implicated, that they are not bound to accuse themselves, and may withhold, if they think proper, such part of their evidence as has a tendency to criminate themselves.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—This is correct. Every person concerned in the publication is protected by law from compulsion to criminate himself; but, I suppose, if any of them give his evidence, the government of the United States is pledged not to institute a prosecution against him. Of this he may be assured.

Mr. Nelson then called Wm. Duval, who said that he saw Mr. Henry Banks have the book called "The Prospect Before Us"; that Mr. Banks gave him the book to read; that the next day he saw Mr. Callender, who told him that he must pay him a dollar for the book given him by Mr. Banks; that he did then pay the dollar for it to Mr. Callender; and that the book, he believes, contained some of the charges in the indictment.

Mr. Banks was then called.—He declared that, some time ago, he had become a subscriber to the book entitled "The Prospect Before Us," and paid the money at the time of subscription; that he lent the book to Major Duval, and sent to inform Mr. Callender, that he might get the money for it of Major Duval, and that he could get another copy himself another time; that he got from Mr. Callender the copy he delivered to Major Duval; that he never heard the traverser acknowledge that he was the author, but that his opinion upon the subject was clear.—The judge told him that his opinion was no evidence against the traverser.

Wm. Burton was next called.—He said that he purchased such a book from Mr. Pleasants (who is a bookseller as well as a printer); that he paid the money to Mr. Pleasants, and Mr. Callender was present.

Wm. A. Rind was next called.—His testimony substantially was, that a copy of the book in question, then in court, belonged to him; that, a considerable time ago, Mr. Lyon applied to them to print the National Magazine; that they entered into contract for the purpose of printing twenty-two sheets of that, or an equivalent in other work; that, after a great part of the magazine had been printed, it stopped, either for the want of paper or some other cause; that Mr. Lyon then brought "The Prospect Before Us"; that they printed four or five half-sheets of it; that the proof-sheets were sent to Mr. Callender for correction, and returned corrected in his handwriting; that Mr. Callender once corrected a proof-sheet in a large room at the office; that Mr. Callender came once to hurry the work, and said he would pay, but that he considered Mr. Lyon as paymaster; that, at Mr. Dixon's office, Mr. Callender said he would give him twenty copies if he would read one through, as he was sure it would convert him; that a small part of the manuscript remained in his possession, which he produced, then in court, and which he believed to be the handwriting of Mr. Callender. Being asked if he had ever seen Mr. Callender write, he said he had; that Mr. Callender once took the debates in the house of assembly for them.

The book and manuscript sheets were then compared, and found to correspond; this occupied some time, and the judge took some pains in examining and comparing them.

Meriwether Jones said, that he had never read the book till after the presentment was made, except a few passages, and perhaps about thirty-three pages; that not a word of it was printed at his office, though he sold some of the copies for the benefit of Mr. Callender; that he only possessed one copy (which he then showed), and which he declared he found where Mr. Callender generally kept his papers; that whenever he sold any of the books, Mr. Callender received the money; that he kept a memorandum of the money he received that he might know how much he owed him; that he could not positively say whether Mr. Callender was the author of the book or not; that he had never told him he was, though he had his opinion and belief on the subject; that he had published proposals to print the book, and, afterwards, that he had them for sale, but he did not recollect whether he published that he had them for sale for the benefit of Mr. Callender, though the fact was so; that the strongest proof he had of Mr. Callender being the author, was a conversation that he had with him respecting that part of the book where, speaking of Washington and Adams, it used the term poltroons; Mr. Callender said he alluded to some who had received appointments from them, and not to themselves.

Thos. Nicholson said, that Mr. Callender had called at his house to engage him to publish a part of the book; that he could not do it then; that he called on him the next day, accompanied by Mr. Meriwether Jones, for whom he was then engaged to print; that Mr. Jones told him that he might suspend his work, which he was then engaged in, to do Mr. Callender's; that he printed seven pages of the book, that Mr. Callender paid him for it, and he understood it was for his emolument.

John Dixon said, that he printed the greatest part of the book (about 120 pages) at the request of Mr. Lyon, and that Mr. Callender corrected the proof-sheet.

Jas. Lyon's evidence was, that he did not know that Mr. Callender was the author of the book, but that he knew him to be the publisher of it, jointly with himself; and that he probably (but he did not recollect certainly) had furnished Mr. Rind with the copy of the book; that Mr. Callender corrected the sheets from the press; that he never saw Mr. Callender writing, but supposed, from having seen the manuscript, and some writing which was (said to be) written by him, that he wrote it.

Samuel Pleasants deposed, that he had sold copies of this book; he understood that the books were sent to him from the book-binder, for Mr. Callender; that he received both the money and the subscription papers for him, and paid him the money he received; that he sold, perhaps, a hundred copies.

The oral testimony of the United States being finished, the attorney for the United States was about to point to the jury the passages in "The Prospect Before Us" corresponding with the charges in the indictment, when Mr. Hay objected to the introduction of that book.

I conceive, he said, that this book cannot be adduced in evidence, in support of the charges stated in the indictment. Perhaps my stating to the court the reasons which have led me to this conclusion, may subject me to the imputation which has more than once fallen from the bench. It has been the pleasure of the court to observe, that the defence had been conceived and continued in error. What I am about to say will not, perhaps, induce the court to change that opinion. It is with great diffidence I address the court on a subject which I have not had sufficient leisure to investigate. If, unfortunately, my conception of this law be mistaken, I hope I shall be excused, and that the reprimand will not be severe, when it is recollected that I have had not sufficient time for a full examination of the case. The position for which I contend is, that the book entitled "The Prospect Before Us" cannot be given in evidence in support of the indictment. The title of the book is not mentioned in the indictment. It states, that "on the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred, the traverser did write, print, utter, and publish, a false, scandalous, and malicious writing against the president of the United States, of the tenor and effect following: 'The reign of Mr. Adams,' &c." In prosecutions for libels in the English courts, great strictness is observed; the difference of a single letter between the words of the indictment and those in the written or printed paper adduced in evidence, is fatal; and when "tenor and effect" are inserted, all the authorities concur in declaring, that they impose on the prosecutor the necessity of proving the very words in the indictment. The first charge in the indictment is for a libellous writing of the following tenor: "The reign of Mr. Adams has been one continued reign of malignant passions." The book which is introduced in support of this charge begins differently, and contains a hundred other pages, and many pages besides, and is not named in the indictment. The position for which I therefore mean to contend is, that when libellous passages are extracted from a book which has a name by which it can be described, it is the duty of the prosecutor to describe the book by that name; for instance, he ought, in this case, to have stated, that the party accused had published a false, scandalous, and malicious writing, entitled "The Prospect Before Us," containing, among other things, the passages complained of. There are two strong reasons to support this doctrine. The first ground on which I rest the validity of this observation is, that the practice has been invariably so. I have taken the trouble of examining fifteen or twenty cases, in all of which the books from which libellous passages were taken, had a name or title, and the prosecutor described every one of them by the name which the author had chosen to give it. From these I will select three cases, to show that the description of the libellous writing by the title given it by the author, has been deemed essentially necessary, the first of which was remarkable for the length of the title; the second, where the paper contained the libel, had a number as well as a title, and both the number and the title were recited. (Here Mr. Hay showed from a book concerning libels, that the title in those two cases, and the number in the latter of them were recited.) And the third, where the libel was published in the French language, in which case the title, though lengthy, was recited in that language, and then in English. In page 87 of the same book there is a history given of a prosecution by information against the Chevalier de On, for publishing a libel against the Count de Guerchy, ambassador from France. The prosecution was commenced in the court of king's bench. The information states the title, the name of the libel fully and literally, as it was published in French, and then states the translation in English at full length. I bring forward these cases to prove what the practice is; and it is an observation of one of the best judges that ever sat in the king's bench, Lord Holt, that "the form of pleading is evidence of what the law is." If, then, it be the practice to recite in the indictment the name, to describe the title of the book, or libel published; if this has been the invariable practice ever since the unhappy prosecutions for libels took place in that country—I believe there is no doubt but the title of this book ought to have been stated in the indictment. I have learned to think with diffidence, but I am firmly persuaded that the attorney for the United States cannot give a single case from the English books of a contrary practice: and with respect to prosecutions in the United States, I know not what the practice may be in the few instances that may have occurred. It appears, too, that substantial reasons, founded on principles of sound law, and sound justice, can be adduced in support of this practice. A principle on which I rely to explain this practice to be correct, is, that it is a universal rule of law, that if a man's words, spoken or written, be made the foundation of a charge against him, the whole should be taken together. If the whole writing charged to be libellous, be stated in the indictment, it will be in the power of the defendant to resort to other passages of the same book to explain it.—If the defendant were indicted for publishing "The Prospect Before Us," he could resort to other parts of the book for an explanation. It was the duty of the attorney for the United States to have done so; as he has omitted it, he ought to be precluded from producing it in evidence.—I will now state the other reason, in support of my objection to the admissibility of this book as evidence: It is founded on this principle which hath always prevailed, or was supposed to prevail in criminal law, that in all criminal cases, the offence should be described with all possible accuracy and precision. In felony, it is necessary to insert in the indictment the goods and chattels alleged to be stolen, as well as the name of the person to whom they belong. The reasons are furnished by the books, why this precision is deemed necessary; the first, that the defendant may know the charge against him, and be able to defend himself; the other, that he may plead the conviction or acquittal in bar of a subsequent prosecution for the same offence. Here he referred to Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown (page 322) as authority. The defendant is charged with writing and publishing a libel of "the following tenor and effect": and but very few passages are selected from the book, which bear but a very little proportion to the extent of the whole of it. I ask, how is the defendant to know whether these few passages were taken from "The Prospect Before Us," or from some newspaper, in which they have been republished by some person, for whose conduct he was not responsible? Unless the charge be accurately specified, it is impossible for him to defend himself. In support of this indictment, evidence as to either case might be brought forward.—If in the indictment he had been charged with publishing a book, entitled "The Prospect Before Us," he would have known with an absolute certainty and demonstration, (by the copy with which he had been furnished,) what was meant to be proved against him, and what was necessary for him to prove in his own vindication; as this is not the case, and as he was not bound to know whether the passages were taken from the book or a newspaper, containing extracts from it, in the publication of which he had no concern, and for which he is under no responsibility, he ought to be sheltered by law from this evidence, which is attempted to be introduced against him. The second reason has made a great impression on my mind, and yet retains its influence. I conceive, that one writing against the president, containing fifty libellous passages, if published at the same time, can be but one act, and if there be but one act, there can be but one prosecution; if the present indictment had mentioned the title of the book, and the very passages relied on as parts of this book, the decision of this jury and this court which is about to be pronounced in this case, might be pleaded in bar to any subsequent indictment, for the same or any other passages in the same book. It is no argument to say, that there will be no subsequent prosecution; in times like these, it is impossible to predict what may be attempted, and if such a prosecution were to take place, I should not be more surprised than I am at present. If the title of the book had been inserted in this indictment, and a subsequent indictment were to be brought forward, I know that the defendant would plead in bar, that he had been formerly convicted or formerly acquitted; and the production of the record alone would protect him; but if the title of the book is not to be recited, the record will not be conclusive, and a second prosecution may take place: for the second indictment, compared with the present record, will contain no internal evidence, that the traverser had been formerly tried for the same offence, but he must resort to oral testimony, to prove that this book had been given in evidence against him at a former trial; and he might not be able to procure witnesses, whose testimony would be sufficient to establish this point. These are the reasons which induce me to think that this book ought not to be admitted to go in evidence to support the charges in the indictment. This principle has a considerable operation in questions of private property. In an action of debt, if a bond or writing be the ground of the action; if there be the most minute variance between the bond or writing stated in the declaration, and that which is adduced in evidence in support of it, the party must suffer a nonsuit. If this precision and minute attention to accuracy be required in actions of property between man and man, is it not infinitely more important that the same principles should govern in criminal cases? If the argument be good in one case, it appears to be irresistible and omnipotent in the other.

Here CHASE, Circuit Justice, requested Mr. Hay to point out these parts of the authorities referred to, on which he relied to establish his doctrine.

Mr. Hay.—If the court will have a little patience I will find the places.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—I will have a great deal.

Mr. Hay.—The authorities I rely on are, Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown (page 322), and Salkeld's Reports (page 660). In this last book it is adjudged that when an indictment uses the words "secundum tenorem et effectum," it binds the prosecutor to a literal recital; and any the least variance between the charge in the indictment and evidence offered to support it is fatal. The case I here refer to was an information for a libel: "In which libel were contained divers libellous matters secundum tenorem et effectum, and in setting forth a sentence of the libel, it was recited with the word 'nor' instead of the word 'not,' but the sense was not altered thereby. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and this appearing upon evidence, a special verdict was found, and the court held that the word 'tenor,' imports, a 'true copy,' and that the variance was fatal; for 'not' and 'nor' are different; different grammar, and different in sense; and Powys' Justice held as to the point where literal omissions, &c. would be fatal; that where a letter omitted or changed makes another word, it is a fatal variance; otherwise where the word continues the same; and in the principal case no man would swear this to be a literal copy." It appears from well established authorities that the words "in manner and form following," do not bind the prosecutor to recite exactly, but the word "tenor" hath so strict a technical meaning, that it binds him to a literal copy. These principles certainly apply to the case before the court. The words

"tenor and effect following" are stated, and the evidence is variant.

Here CHASE, Circuit Justice, interrupted Mr. Hay, and spoke to this effect: You are certainly mistaken in your statement of the law, as applied to the case now before the court. In the cases you mention there is really a variance between the indictment and the evidence. Your objection is, that there is a variance between the thing charged in the indictment and the writing offered in evidence. But this case is very different; there is no variance. To ascertain this point I will state the indictment, and compare it with the law on which the prosecution is founded. The indictment charges, that the traverser, "maliciously intending to defame the president of the United States, and to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and to excite the hatred of the good people of the United States against him, did wickedly and maliciously write, print, utter and publish, a false, scandalous and malicious writing, against the president of the United States, of the tenor and effect following, that is to say: 'The reign of Mr. Adams has hitherto been one continued tempest, &c.' Now what is the law? The act of congress provides among other things that, 'if any person shall write, print, utter or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered or published, any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings, against the government, or either house of the congress, or the president of the United States, with intent to defame the said government, or either house of congress, or the said president, or to bring them, or either or any of them, into contempt or disrepute, or to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States, &c.'" The indictment charges the defendant with publishing a false, scandalous and malicious writing against the president, and the law provides against the publication of false, scandalous and malicious writings against the president.—The offences stated in the indictment correspond with those expressed in the law; the question then is, whether the name of the book in which such false, scandalous and malicious writings are published, must be recited in an indictment against an offender? It brings it to this point—Is it necessary that the title of the publication should be examined before it can be ascertained that it comes within the law? Any false, scandalous and malicious writing published with intent to defame, is provided against by law, whatever may be its title or name, or whether it have any name or not. I know that cases can be produced where the title of the libel is recited in the indictment. I remember one case where a man was indicted for publishing a libel called "The Nun in her Smock;" but it was not necessary to mention the title of the libel in that case, nor is it essential in any. Why is it necessary that every charge against a defendant should be explicit? It is that he may clearly comprehend it, and be prepared to make his defence: it is not necessary for this purpose to recite the name of the libel. The charge against the traverser is very explicit, and he well understands and is prepared to defend it; but it is no censure on his counsel that they urge this argument in his favour. You argue further, on a supposition, that if a subsequent prosecution were to be instituted for the same offence, the verdict and judgment now to be rendered could not be pleaded in bar. It requires very little legal ability to demonstrate that the title need not be recited; and it is equally easy to prove that the decision in this case may be pleaded in bar of any other prosecution for the same offence. The attorney for the United States must prove that the traverser did publish a false, scandalous and malicious writing, with intent to defame the president. This can be done without reciting the title; and if he supports by the evidence any entire charge—if he proves that the traverser did publish any false, scandalous and malicious writing, it will be sufficient to support the indictment as to that charge, but he must be acquitted of the other charges: and the charges of which he may be found guilty, can be easily compared to charges in any subsequent indictment. This is quite different from the cases where there is an actual variance between the paper charged, and the paper offered in evidence. I understand that difference to be, that where the prosecutor undertakes to say that certain precise words have been published, he must establish them; but when he states words of the tenor and effect following, he will only be obliged to prove the substance;[2] but you insist that the whole original, including the title, must be copied in the indictment verbatim et literatim. I wonder you did not add et punctuatim also. There is no real variance, and there is an end of the objection. You are mistaken.—I pronounce this to be the law, and I shall instruct the jury, that they may find the traverser guilty of part of the charges, and acquit him of such as are not proved.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, then informed the attorney for the United States, who was about to rise to prove the admissibility of the book as evidence, that it was unnecessary for him to make any reply, and there was no good reason to exclude it; that all that was necessary to be done on the part of the United States was to prove the charges to be true, and the book called "The Prospect Before Us" was good evidence to support it.

2 This position, notwithstanding the boisterous way in which it is laid down, is incorrect. There must be always at common law an exact recital of the alleged libellous matter, unless in the indictment itself the pleader excuses himself from so doing on the ground of the destruction of the instrument, or its possession by the defendant. See the authorities collected in Whart. Prec. of Ind. 545. "Tenor and effect" exacts a literal recital. Ford v. Bennett, cited 1 Ld. Raym. 415; Rex v. Bear, 2 Salk. 417. At the same time, Mr. Hay's position, that the title must be set out, is not sustained by the authorities, though it is clear that in knocking it down, Judge Chase knocked down nearly the whole law of libels besides.

Mr. Nelson.—Although the paper is long and complicated, the testimony is not so. The testimony, as I stated to you before, is concise, plain, and correct. If there be a man who, now that he has heard that testimony, entertains a doubt whether this libel was published by the traverser, it will be useless for me to address him; if there be a man who doubts on that point, his mind must be imperviable to the traits of truth; his mind must be panoplied o'er with doubt, skepticism and prejudice. If no doubt remain on this point, the question first in order to be examined is decided: whether there be room for doubt, a summary review of the testimony will ascertain. Can there be a doubt —when all the witnesses have concurred in establishing this one point — that James Thompson Callender corrected the proof-sheets? Can there be a doubt, when those who sold the copies of the book have all said that they sold them for his benefit, and that he received the money? When it has been proved that he received the money from one purchaser himself, and that he paid for printing part of it—that part of the manuscript is in his own hand-writing—can there be any doubt?—And when, in addition to this, one witness declares that he knew him to be a joint publisher with himself, and another witness declared, that he explained the meaning of a certain term, supposed to be ambiguous in its application, is it possible to entertain any doubt? Thus stands the evidence as to the publication. It will be proper for me, gentlemen of the jury, to state to you what is a publication in point of law, as to writing or printing: that the direct or indirect circulation or emission of a libel, is a publication thereof, in law and in fact, has never been questioned in a court of law. If it appears to you that James Thompson Callender did not directly or indirectly emit or circulate this paper, then is he not the publisher thereof; if he be not the publisher directly nor indirectly thereof, then ought he to be acquitted: and if he be the publisher, and the intention thereof be not criminal, that is, if the matter therein contained be not false, scandalous and malicious, still ought he to be acquitted; but if he be the publisher, and the matter be libellous, that is, false, scandalous and malicious, the intention must be wicked and criminal, and you must find him guilty. For the questions you are to try, gentlemen of the jury, are: Was this paper published by the traverser? Was the intention criminal? that is, is the matter false, scandalous and malicious? The evidence which you have heard ascertains the first question, and an examination of the paper, or such parts of it as are laid in the indictment, will decide the second question. Whether your hearts are at ease—whether your passions are untouched—whether your feelings are unaffected, now that you have fully heard the charge, you best know. It remains only now for me, gentlemen of the jury, to call upon you, in the name of your country, whose interest you are to defend whilst you protect the rights of the individual. I call upon you in the name of your God, a portion of whose justice you are about to administer, and on your oaths, uninfluenced by favour, partiality, prejudice or affection, to discharge your duty to your God, to your country, and to yourselves.

Here Mr. Nelson read the first charge in the indictment, and proceeded to comment at great length upon the libellous passages, sentence by sentence. I have told you, he closed by saying, and again repeat, that it is the peculiar privilege of every citizen of this happy country to place confidence in whom he pleases, and at the constitutional periods of making new elections, to withdraw his confidence from a former representative, and place his trust in another; and even expatiate on the virtues of the new candidate; but this does not warrant him to vilify, revile, and defame another individual, who is a candidate. Cannot a good thing be said of one individual, without saying black and damnable things of another? Is it necessary, in order to recommend one man to the presidential office, that you should charge another with bringing on his country war and beggary? The whole forms a perfect chain of malice, falsehood, and slander. Thus have I made, gentlemen of the jury, a calm, uncoloured statement of facts. I have not highly varnished, nor have said anything but what is consistent with truth. What impression the evidence or charge may have made on your minds, whether your feelings be affected, you and each of you know best. It remains only now for me, gentlemen of the jury, to remind you, that you are not only to protect the interests of your country, but to defend the rights of that individual; and in the name of God and of your country, I call upon you to discharge your duty to both and to yourselves.

The attorney for the United States having concluded, the counsel for the traverser introduced Colonel John Taylor (of Carolina county) as a witness, and he was sworn; but at the moment the oath was administered, the judge called on them, and desired to know what they intended to prove by the witness. They answered that they intended to examine Colonel Taylor to prove that he had avowed principles in his presence which justified Mr. Callender in saying that the president was an aristocrat; that he had voted against the sequestration law, and the resolutions concerning the suspension of commercial intercourse with Great Britain, by which he defeated every effort of those who were in favour of those beneficial measures which were well calculated to promote the happiness of their country.

The judge demanded a statement in writing of the questions intended to be put to the witness.

Mr. Nicholas remarked, that the traverser was at least entitled to every indulgence which had been shown to the attorney for the United States; that this requisition had not been made of the attorney, when he introduced witnesses on behalf of the United States, nor was it according to the practice of the state courts; that he wished the witness to state all he knew that would apply to the defence of his client; that he did not know what the witness would precisely prove, but that if the court insisted upon it, he would furnish a statement of the questions which he should first propound, but requested that he might not be considered as confined, in the examination of the witness, to the questions so stated.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—It is right to state the questions intended to be propounded to witnesses, in all cases, and the reason is extremely plain. Juries are only to hear legal evidence, and the court are the only judges of what is or is not legal evidence, to support the issue joined between the parties. To say that you will correct improper evidence, after it shall have been given, is improper, because illegal evidence, once heard, may make an undue impression, and, therefore, ought not to be heard at all by the jury; and the attorney for the United States had, in opening the cause, stated the purpose for which he introduced the witnesses.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, having received a statement of the questions meant to be put,[3] and which were propounded by Mr. Nicholas, declared Colonel Taylor's evidence to be inadmissible. No evidence, said the judge, is admissible that does not go to justify the whole charge. The charge you mean to justify by this witness, as I understand you, is, that the president is a professed aristocrat, and that he has proved serviceable to the British interest. You must prove both these points, or you prove nothing. Now as you do not attempt to prove the whole of one specific charge, but only a part of it, your evidence cannot be received; this is the law, both in civil and criminal cases; he who justifies, must justify an entire charge, or else his defence does not amount to a justification in law. You have not proved the truth of any particular charge, though in order to excuse it, you must prove the whole; to prove the truth of a part only, is not proving what is material. The attorney proposed to prove his indictment. He has exhibited his oral and written testimony to prove it. The traverser excuses himself from the imputed guilt, by averring that part of some of the charges is true. Is this evidence proper when the whole charge is in issue? If it be, the proof of a very trivial part of an important indictment would excuse from the whole; but I pronounce the law to be otherwise, and take the responsibility on myself, and risk my character on it. It may be said that this will preclude the party from the privilege of his testimony; but this will only be a misrepresentation, it precludes them from no legal benefit. My country has made me a judge, and you must be governed now by my opinion, though I may be mistaken; but if I am not right, it is an error in judgment, and you can state the proceedings on the record so as to show any error, and I shall be the first man to grant you the benefit of a new trial by granting you a writ of error in the supreme court. It is on these grounds that I reject the evidence of the gentleman. The very argument assigned by the young gentleman who spoke last, has convinced my mind that I am right. The offered testimony has no direct and proper application to the issue; it would deceive and mislead the jury; an argumentative justification of a trivial, unimportant part of a libel, would be urged before a jury as a substantial vindication of the whole. You would, by misleading the jury under such illegal testimony, destroy public treaties and public faith; and nothing would be more uncertain than law, were such an illegal excuse admitted in courts of law.

Mr. Nicholas suggested that it might be proper to prove one part of a specific charge by one witness, and another part by another, and thereby prove the charge.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, in answer, repeated some of his former arguments, and added, that the very argument suggested by the young gentleman who spoke last, convinced his mind that it would be improper to admit the testimony now offered to the court; that to admit evidence, which went to an argumentative establishment of the truth of a minute part of the charge by one witness, and another minute part by another witness, would be irregular, and subversive of every principle of law; that it had no relation to the issue; that it was a popular argument, calculated to deceive the people, but very incorrect.

Here GRIFFIN, District Judge, being called upon by CHASE, Circuit Justice, to deliver his opinion on the question before the court, declared that he concurred with his brother judge.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, then observed: This is a new doctrine, inculcated in Virginia. You have all along mistaken the law, and press your mistakes on the court. The United States must prove the publication, and the fallacy of it. When these things are done, [3] Ques. 1st. Did you ever hear Mr. Adams express any opinion favourable to monarchy and aristocracy: and what were they? Ques. 2d. Did you ever hear Mr. Adams, whilst vice president, express his disapprobation of the funding system? Ques. 3d. Do you know whether Mr. Adams did not, in the year 1794, vote against the sequestration law, and the bill for suspending commercial intercourse with Great Britain?

you must prove a justification, and this justification must be entire and complete, as to any one specific charge; a partial justification is inadmissible. I am happy to find that my brother Judge GRIFFIN concurs with me in opinion.

The counsel for the traverser again desired to be heard on the subject.

Mr. Hay spoke thus: The question before the court is, whether this evidence goes to prove the truth of the whole charge? The opinion given by the court I understand to be, that evidence cannot be produced by the traverser to prove the truth of a part of a charge; but if evidence could be adduced to prove the whole, then such evidence would be admissible. One specific charge is twofold; that the president is an aristocrat; and that he proved serviceable to the British interest. The evidence, we suppose, will support this charge; we wish to prove the truth of the whole charge if we can, though I do not know that it is in our power. The evidence, we have reason to believe, goes first to prove that he is an aristocrat, and secondly, that he did prove serviceable to the British interest; if the testimony will in fact prove these two points, whatever may be the opinion of the court, I do not hesitate to say that, in my estimation, it will fully excuse and justify the traverser; if we can prove that the president has avowed aristocratical sentiments in conversation, and that he did in reality prove faithful and serviceable to the British interest, the traverser must be acquitted of this charge. As to the first part, I can prove by the words of Mr. Adams, published by himself, in his book called "A Defence of the American Constitution," that he thinks a government of three parts, a king, lords, and commons, the best in the world. Suppose, in addition to this, it could be proved that a law passed the house of representatives of the United States, to sequester British property; and suppose that one-half the senate of the United States were in favour of it; and that the policy of passing the law was advocated by the best and wisest men in this country, who have the same pretensions to patriotism and virtue that Mr. Adams has, but that its passage was prevented by the casting vote of Mr. Adams as speaker of the senate, would not the traverser be justified as to this charge? Would it not demonstrate that he proved serviceable to the British interests? By the answers to the first and third questions we expect to prove both these points.

Here Mr. Nelson objected to the introduction of such testimony, as being altogether inadmissible; that gentlemen ought to reflect that, if such evidence as this was to be received, any other testimony, however irregular or improper, might also be admitted; and, particularly, that it would be a departure from the universal principle of law, which required the production of the best testimony which the nature of every case admitted, and that the journals and records of congress were the best evidence of what votes had been given on any subject discussed before that body.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, then addressed himself to Mr. Nelson thus: Being very much pressed, by the young gentlemen who defend the traverser, to admit this testimony, I was going to recommend to you to permit those questions to be put to the witness, though they are certainly irregular. I wish you could consent that they should be propounded.

Mr. Nelson declared that he did not feel himself at liberty to consent to such a departure from legal principles.

Mr. Wirt then rose and addressed the jury. —He premised that the situation of the defendant and his counsel was extremely embarrassing; that as Mr. Callender had been presented, indicted, arrested and tried, during this term, he had not been able to procure the testimony essential to his defence, nor was his counsel prepared to defend him; and he insinuated that the conduct of the court was apparently precipitate, in not postponing the trial until the next term.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, told him he must not reflect on the court.

Mr. Wirt said, that his object was not to reflect on the court, but to apologize to the jury for the weakness of a defence which he was about to make.

After observing that his apology included the very reflection he denied, the court told him to proceed in his cause.

Mr. Wirt.—Gentlemen of the jury, I am prevented from explaining to you the causes which have conspired to weaken our defence, and it is no doubt right that I should be prevented, as the court have so decided. Permit me, then, gentlemen, to pass on abruptly to the law, under which we are indicted. You will find that a material part of your inquiry will relate to the powers of a jury over the subject committed to them, whether they have the right to determine the law, as well as the fact. In Virginia, an act of the assembly has adopted the common law of England; that common law, therefore, possesses in this state all the energy of a legislative act. By an act of congress, the rules of proceedings in the federal courts, in the several states, are directed to conform to the rules of the states in which such court may be in session; by that act of congress, it is therefore provided, that the practice of the courts of Virginia shall be observed in this court: to ascertain your power, therefore, as a jury, we have only to refer to the common law of England, which has been adopted in the laws of this state, and which defines the powers of juries in the state courts. By the common law of England, juries possess the power of considering and deciding the law as well as the fact, in every case which may come before them. I have no doubt but I shall receive the correction of the court, if I am wrong in these positions. If, then, a jury in a court of the state would have a right to decide the law and the fact, so have you. The federal constitution is the supreme law of the land; and a right to consider the law, is a right to consider the constitution: if the law of congress under which we are indicted, be an infraction of the constitution, it has not the force of a law, and if you were to find the traverser guilty, under such an act, you would violate your oaths.

Here CHASE, Circuit Justice—Take your seat, sir, if you please. If I understand you rightly, you offer an argument to the petit jury, to convince them that the statute of congress, entitled, "An act, &c.," commonly called the "Sedition Law," is contrary to the constitution of the United States and, therefore, void. Now I tell you that this is irregular and inadmissible; it is not competent to the jury to decide on this point; but if you address yourselves, gentlemen, to the court, they will with pleasure hear any reasons you may offer, to show that the jury have the right contended for. Since I came into the commonwealth, I understood that this question would be stirred, and that the power of a jury to determine the validity or nullity of a law would be urged. I have, therefore, deliberately considered the subject, and I am ready to explain my reasons for concluding that the petit jury have not a right to decide on the constitutionality of a law, and that such a power would be extremely dangerous. —Hear my words: I wish the world to know them,—my opinion is the result of mature reflection.

(Here the judge then read part of a long opinion, to show that the jury had not the right contended for; after which, he told the counsel for the traverser, that he would hear with pleasure any arguments which could be urged to show that he was mistaken.)

Mr. Wirt.—I shall state to the court, in a few words, the reasons which have induced me to ascribe this right to the jury. They are sworn to give their verdict according to the evidence, and the law is evidence; if the jury have no right to consider the law, how is it possible for them to render a general verdict? Suppose, for example, an indictment for murder—how can the jury pronounce a verdict of guilty, or not guilty, if they have not the right as well of ascertaining whether the facts have been committed, as whether they amount to a breach of law? This doctrine is too clearly established to require the aid of authorities.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—No man will deny your law—we all know that juries have the right to decide the law, as well as the fact—and the constitution is the supreme law of the land, which controls all laws which are repugnant to it.

Mr. Wirt.—Since, then, the jury have a right to consider the law, and since the constitution is law, the conclusion is certainly syllogistic, that the jury have a right to consider the constitution.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—A non sequitur, sir.

Here Mr. Wirt sat down.

Mr. Nicholas then addressed the court. I am so much under the influence of duty that, though I am in the same situation with the gentleman who preceded me, and though the court seem to be impressed with the opinion, that the jury have no right to determine on the constitutionality of an act of congress, yet, arduous as the task may be, I shall offer a few observations to show that they have this right. I intend to defend Mr. Callender by the establishment of two points. First, that a law contrary to the constitution is void; and, secondly, that the jury have a right to consider the law and the fact. First, it seems to be admitted on all hands, that, when the legislature exercise a power not given them by the constitution, the judiciary will disregard their acts. The second point, that the jury have a right to decide the law and the fact, appears to me equally clear. In the exercise of the power of determining law and fact, a jury cannot be controlled by the court. The court have a right to instruct the jury, but the jury have a right to act as they think right; and if they find contrary to the directions of the court, and to the law of the case, the court may set aside their verdict and grant a new trial.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.—Courts do not claim the right of setting aside the verdict in criminal cases.

Mr. Nicholas.—From this right of the jury to consider law and fact in a general verdict, it seems to follow, that counsel ought to be permitted to address a jury on the constitutionality of the law in question;—this leads me back to my first position, that if an act of congress contravene the constitution of the United States, a jury have a right to say that it is null, and that they will not give the efficacy of a law to an act which is void in itself; believing it to be contrary to the constitution, they will not convict any man of a violation of it: if this jury believed that the sedition act is not a law of the land, they cannot find the defendant guilty. The constitution secures to every man a fair and impartial trial by jury, in the district where the fact shall have been committed: and to preserve this sacred right unimpaired, it should never be interfered with. If ever a precedent is established, that the court can control the jury so as to prevent them from finding a general verdict, their important right, without which every other right is of no value, will be impaired, if not absolutely destroyed. Juries are to decide according to the dictates of conscience and the laws of the country, and to control them would endanger the right of this most invaluable mode of trial. I have understood that some reliance would be placed on two decisions of the courts of this state, in which they determined two acts of our legislature to be unconstitutional; but when we come to analyze these decisions, they will not authorize the belief that the jury have not the right I contend for—they only prove that the judiciary can declare legislative acts to be unconstitutional; they do not prove that a jury may not have a similar power. In the case of Kamper v. Hawkins [1 Va. Cas. 20] they refused to carry into effect a law which gave the district courts a right to grant injunctions in certain cases, because they thought it unconstitutional, and that the courts had no power to act under the law: that case did not turn on a relative view of the power and connection of a court and jury, it was a question whether the courts would exercise a particular jurisdiction, and carry into effect that act as practiced by the judges in chancery; but they never decided that a jury had not a right to determine on the constitutionality of a law, nor could a question about this right have arisen in those two cases; the court said that the judiciary were not bound to carry into effect an unconstitutional law. I do not deny the right of the court to determine the law, but I deny the right of the court to control the jury; though I have not bestowed a very particular attention on this subject, I am perfectly convinced that the jury have the right I contend for; and, consequently, that counsel have a right to address them on that subject. The act of congress to which I have alluded, appears to have given to the jury the power of deciding on the law and the fact; and I trust, that when this whole question comes into consideration, the court will suffer the counsel for the traverser to go on to speak to the jury, subject to the direction of the court.

Mr. Hay rose, after Mr. Nicholas concluded, and observed that he was prepared to address the court on the extent of the powers of the jury in the case at bar. The arguments, said he, which I shall urge, I shall address to the court, not wishing to be heard by the jury, or to be attended to by the numerous auditory now present. A question of great importance depends on this decision; much of the public happiness, of the public peace, of the public liberty, depend on the final decision which shall be pronounced on this subject. I entertained doubts at first; but a calm and dispassionate inquiry, and the most temperate investigation and reflection, have led me to believe and to say, that the jury have a right to determine every question which is necessary to determine, before sentence can be pronounced upon the traverser. I contend that the jury have a right to determine whether the writing charged in the indictment to be false, scandalous and malicious, be a libel or not. If this question should be decided in the affirmative by the court, I shall endeavour to convince the jury that it is not a libel, because there is no law in force under the government of the United States, which defines what a libel is, or prescribes its punishment. It is a universal principle of law, that questions of law belong to the court, and that the decision of facts belongs to the jury; but a jury have a right to determine both law and fact in all cases.

Here Judge CHASE asked Mr. Hay whether he meant to extend his proposition to civil as well as criminal cases, and told him that if he did, the law was clearly otherwise.

Mr. Hay answered, that he thought the proposition universally true, but it was only necessary for him to prove it to be true in cases of a criminal nature.

Judge CHASE again interrupted Mr. Hay, and briefly expressed his opinion of the law. And then Mr. Hay folded up and put away his papers, seeming to decline any further argument.

Judge CHASE requested him to continue his argument, and added—"Please to proceed, and be assured that you will not be interrupted by me, say what you will."

Mr. Hay refused to proceed.

Judge CHASE observed, that though he thought it his duty to stop the counsel when mistaking the law, yet he did not wish to interrupt them improperly; that there was no occasion to be captious; and concluded thus, "Act as you please, sir."

Judge CHASE then proceeded.[4] "I will assign my reasons why I will not permit the counsel for the traverser to offer arguments to the jury, to urge them to do what the constitution and law of this country will not permit; and which, if I should allow, I should, in my judgment, violate my duty, disregard the constitution and law, and surrender up the judicial power of the United States, that is, the power intrusted by the constitution to the federal courts, to a petit jury, in direct breach of my oath of office. The indictment charges that the traverser, on the 1st day of February, 1800, designing and intending to defame the president of the United States, and to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and to excite the hatred of the good people of the United States against him, did wickedly and maliciously write, print, utter, and publish (or did cause or procure to be printed and published), a false, scandalous, and malicious writing, against the said president of the United States, of the tenor and effect stated in the indictment. On examining the indictment, it appears, that twenty separate and distinct sets of words are set forth therein, as allegations or charges against the traverser. He has plead "not guilty" to all of them. To support this indictment on behalf of the government of the United States, it must be proved to the jury; first, that the traverser did write, print, utter or publish, or did cause or procure to be printed or published, a false and scandalous writing against the president of the United States; secondly, that the said writing is false, scandalous, and malicious; and thirdly, that it was published with intent to defame the president, &c., as stated in the statute and charged in the indictment. If these three facts shall be established to the satisfaction of the jury, they must find the traverser guilty, generally, unless he can prove to them the truth of the matter contained in the publication, in which case, the statute on which the traverser is indicted excuses him. If all the twenty sets of words, stated in the indictment as charges against the traverser, shall not be proved against him; or if he can prove that any of them are true, the jury will acquit him of such of them as shall not be established against him, and also of such of them as he can prove to be true; and they will find him guilty of the residue.

These inquiries, on behalf of the government of the United States, and on the part of the traverser, are proper for, and within the jurisdiction and the terms of the oath of the petit jury, who have been sworn "that they will well and truly try the issue joined between the United States and the traverser at the bar, and a true verdict give according to their evidence." The issue joined, therefore, is, whether the traverser is guilty of the several offences charged in the indictment; and to this issue no evidence is admissible (on the part of the government, or of the traverser) but what is pertinent or applicable to it. The petit jury, to discharge their duty, must first inquire, whether the traverser committed all or any of the facts alleged in the indictment to have been done by him, some time before the indictment. If they find that he did commit all or any of the said facts, their next inquiry is, whether the doing such facts have been made criminal and punishable by the statute of the United States, on which the traverser is indicted. For this purpose, they must peruse the statute, and carefully examine whether the facts charged and proved are within the provisions of it. If the words that create the offence are plain and intelligible, they must then determine whether the offence proved is of the species of criminality charged in the indictment; but if the words are ambiguous or doubtful, all construction should be rejected. The statute, on which the traverser is indicted, enacts "that the jury who shall try the cause shall have a right to determine the law and the fact, under the direction of the court, as in other cases." By this provision, I understand that a right is given to the jury to determine what the law is in the case before them; and not to decide whether a statute of the United States produced to them, is a law or not, or whether it is void, under an opinion that it is unconstitutional, that is, contrary to the constitution of the United States. I admit that the jury are to compare the statute with the facts proved, and then to decide whether the acts done are prohibited by the law; and whether they amount to the offence described in the indictment. This power the jury necessarily possesses, in order to enable them to decide on the guilt or innocence of the person accused. It is one thing to decide what the law is, on the facts proved, and another and a very different thing, to determine that the statute produced is no law. To decide what the law is on the facts, is an admission that the law exists. If there be no law in the case, there can be no comparison between it and the facts; and it is unnecessary to establish facts before it is ascertained that there is a law to punish the commission of them.

The existence of the law is a previous inquiry, and the inquiry into facts is altogether unnecessary, if there is no law to which the facts can apply. By this right to decide what the law is in any case arising under the statute, I cannot conceive that a right is given to the petit jury to determine whether the statute (under which they claim this right) is constitutional or not. To determine the validity of the statute, the constitution of the United States must necessarily be resorted to and considered, and its provisions inquired into. It must be determined whether the statute alleged to be void, because contrary to the constitution, is prohibited by it expressly, or by necessary implication. Was it ever intended, by the framers of the constitution, or by the people of America, that it should ever be submitted to the examination of a jury, to decide what restrictions are expressly or impliedly imposed by it on the national legislature? I cannot possibly believe that congress intended, by the statute, to grant a right to a petit jury to declare a statute void. The man who maintains this position must have a most contemptible opinion of the understanding of that body; but I believe the defect lies with himself. If any one can be so weak in intellect as to entertain this opinion of congress, he must give up the exercise of the power, when he is informed that congress had no authority to vest it in any body whatsoever; because, by the constitution, (as I will hereafter show,) this right is expressly granted to the judicial power of the United States, and is recognized by congress by a perpetual statute. If the statute should be held void by a jury, it would seem that they could not claim a right to such decision under an act that they themselves consider as mere waste paper. Their right must, therefore, be derived from some other source.

It appears to me that all the rights, powers, and duties of the petit jury, sworn in this cause, can only be derived from the constitution, or statutes of the United States made agreeably to it; or from some statute of this commonwealth not contrary to the federal constitution or statutes of congress; or from the common law, which was adopted by the federal constitution in the case of trials by jury in criminal cases. It never was pretended, as I ever heard, before this time, that a petit jury in England (from whence our common law is derived,) or in any part of the United States ever exercised such power. If a petit jury can rightfully exercise this power over one statute of congress, they must have an equal right and power over any other statute, and indeed over all the statutes; for no line can be drawn, no restriction imposed on the exercise of such power; it must rest in discretion only. If this power be once admitted, petit jurors will be superior to the national legislature, and its laws will be subject to their control. The power to abrogate or to make laws nugatory, is equal to the authority of making them. The evident consequences of this right in juries will be, that a law of congress will be in operation in one state and not in another. A law to impose taxes will be obeyed in one state, and not in another, unless force be employed to compel submission. The doing certain acts will be held criminal, and punished in one state, and similar acts may be held innocent, and even approved and applauded in another. The effects of the exercise of this power by petit jurors may be readily conceived. It appears to me that the right now claimed has a direct tendency to dissolve the union of the United States, on which, under Divine Providence, our political safety, happiness, and prosperity depend.

No citizen of knowledge and information, unless under the influence of passion or prejudice, will believe, without very strong and indubitable proof, that congress will, intentionally, make any law in violation of the federal constitution, and their sacred trust. I admit that the constitution contemplates that congress may, from inattention or error in judgment, pass a law prohibited by the constitution; and, therefore, it has provided a peaceable, safe, and adequate remedy. If such a case should happen, the mode of redress is pointed out in the constitution, and no other mode can be adopted without a manifest infraction of it. Every man must admit that the power of deciding the constitutionality of any law of the United States, or of any particular state, is one of the greatest and most important powers the people could grant. Such power is restrictive of the legislative power of the Union, and also of the several states; not absolute and unlimited, but confined to such cases only where the law in question shall clearly appear to have been prohibited by the federal constitution, and not in any doubtful case. On referring to the ninth section of the first article of the constitution, there may be seen many restrictions imposed on the powers of the national legislature, and also on the powers of the several state legislatures. Among the special exceptions to their authority, is the power to make ex post facto laws, to lay any capitation, or other direct tax, unless in proportion to the census; to lay any tax or duty on articles exported from any state, &c. &c. It should be remembered that the judicial power of the United States is co-existent, co-extensive, and co-ordinate with, and altogether independent of, the federal legislature, or the executive. By the sixth article of the constitution, among other things, it is declared that the constitution shall be the supreme law of the land. By the third article, it is established "that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such other inferior courts as congress may from time to time ordain and establish; and that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution and laws of the United States."

Among the cases which may arise under the constitution, are all the restrictions on the authority of congress, and of the state legislatures. It is very clear, that the present case arises under the constitution, and also under a law of the United States, and therefore it is the very case to which the constitution declares the judicial powers of the United States shall extend. It is incontrovertible that the constitution is the supreme law, and therefore, it must be the rule by which the federal and state judges are bound to regulate their decisions. By the sixth article of the constitution, it is provided (among other things) that all members of congress, and of the several state legislatures, and all judicial officers of the United States, and of the several states, shall be bound by an oath or affirmation to support the constitution. By this provision, I understand that every person, so sworn or affirmed, promises that he will preserve the constitution as established, and the distribution of powers thereby granted; and that he will not assent to any amendment or alteration thereof, but in the mode prescribed in the fifth article; and that he will not consent to any usurpation by any one branch of the legislature upon the other, or upon the executive, or by the executive upon either branch, or by any department or officer of government, of the power granted to another; or that the power granted to either shall be exercised by others. I also understand by this engagement, that the person taking it, promises also that he will oppose by his example, argument, advice, and persuasion, and by all other means in his power, force only excepted, any design, advice or attempt to impair or destroy the constitution. If this exposition of this solemn obligation is substantially correct, I cannot believe that any person having the same understanding of it, will maintain that a petit jury can rightfully exercise the power granted by the constitution to the federal judiciary.

From these considerations I draw this conclusion, that the judicial power of the United States is the only proper and competent authority to decide whether any statute made by congress (or any of the state legislatures) is contrary to, or in violation of, the federal constitution. That this was the opinion of the senate and house of representatives, and of General Washington, then president of the United States, fully appears by the statute, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," made at the first session of the first congress (on 24th September, 1789, chapter 20, § 8 [1 Stat. 76]), which enacts, "that the justices of the supreme courts, and the district judges, shall take an oath or affirmation in the following words, to wit: 'I, A. B., do solemnly swear or affirm, that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent on me as ——, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the constitution and laws of the United States.'" No position can be more clear than that all the federal judges are bound by the solemn obligation of religion, to regulate their decisions agreeably to the constitution of the United States, and that it is the standard of their determination in all cases that come before them. I believe that it has been the general and prevailing opinion in all the Union, that the power now wished to be exercised by a jury, properly belonged to the federal courts. It was alleged that the tax on carriages was considered by the people of this commonwealth to be unconstitutional, and a case was made to submit the question to the supreme court of the United States, and they decided that the statute was not unconstitutional, and their decision was acquiesced in. I have seen a report of a case (Kamper v. Hawkins [supra]), decided in 1793, in the general court of this commonwealth, respecting the constitutionality of a law which gave the district courts a power of granting injunctions in certain cases, in which case the judges of the general court (four to one) determined that the law was unconstitutional and void. On yesterday I saw the record of another case, in the court of appeals of this commonwealth (in 1788), on which it appears that the general assembly passed "An act to establish district courts," and the judges (ten being present), adjudged "that the constitution and the said act were in opposition, and could not exist together, and that the court ought not to do anything officially in the execution of an act, which appeared to be contrary to the spirit of the constitution." I also observed, that the then governor, Mr. Edmund Randolph, immediately on this decision, called the general assembly by proclamation; and I have been informed that they altered the law according to the opinion of the court. From these two decisions, in the two highest courts of justice in this state, I may fairly conclude, that, at that period, it was thought that the courts of justice were the proper judicature to determine the constitutionality of the laws of this commonwealth. It is now contended, that the constitutionality of the laws of congress should be submitted to the decision of a petit jury. May I ask, whence this change of opinion? I declare that the doctrine is entirely novel to me, and that I never heard of it before my arrival in this city. It appears to me to be not only new, but very absurd and dangerous, in direct opposition to, and a breach of the constitution. And I wish those who maintain this doctrine, and have sworn to support the constitution, conscientiously to reconsider their opinions with a calm and deliberate temper, and with minds disposed to find the truth, and to alter their opinion if convinced of their error. It must be evident, that decisions in the district or circuit courts of the United States will be uniform, or they will become so by the revision and correction of the supreme court; and thereby the same principles will pervade all the Union; but the opinions of petit juries will very probably be different in different states.

The decision of courts of justice will not be influenced by political and local principles, and prejudices. If inferior courts commit error, it may be rectified; but if juries make mistakes, there can be no revision or control over their verdicts, and therefore, there can be no mode to obtain uniformity in their decisions. Besides, petit juries are under no obligation by the terms of their oath, to decide the constitutionality of any law; their determination, therefore, will be extra judicial. I should also imagine, that no jury would wish to have a right to determine such great, important, and difficult questions; and I hope no jury can be found, who will exercise the power desired over the statutes of congress, against the opinion of the federal courts.

I have consulted with my brother, Judge GRIFFIN, and I now deliver the opinion of the court, "That the petit jury have no right to decide on the constitutionality of the statute on which the traverser is indicted; and that, if the jury should exercise that power, they would thereby usurp the authority entrusted by the constitution of the United States to this court." Governed by this opinion, the court will not allow the counsel for the traverser to argue before the petit jury, that they have a right to decide on the constitutionality of the statute, on which the traverser stands indicted. If the counsel for the traverser had offered sufficient arguments to the court, to show that the petit jury had this right, the court, on being convinced that the opinion delivered was erroneous, would have changed it; for they hold it a much greater reproach for a judge to continue in his error, than to retract. The gentlemen of the profession know, that questions have sometimes occurred in the state courts, whether acts of assembly had expired, or had been repealed; but no one will say that such questions were ever submitted to a jury. If the constitution of the United States had not given to the judiciary a right to decide on the constitutionality of federal laws—yet, if such power could be exercised, it could not be by a juror, from this consideration—it is a maxim of law in all the states, that the courts have the exclusive right to decide every question, as to the admissibility of evidence in every case, civil or criminal, whether the evidence be by act of assembly, or by deed, or other writing, or by witnesses.

Judge CHASE concluded with observing, that, if he knew himself, the opinion he had delivered and the reasons offered in its support, flowed not from political motives, or reasons of state, with which he had no concern, and which he conceived never ought to enter courts of justice; but from a deliberate conviction of what the constitution and the law of the land required. "I hold myself equally bound," said he, "to support the rights of the jury, as the rights of the court." I consider it of the greatest consequence to the administration of justice, that the powers of the court, and the powers of the petit jury, should be kept distinct and separate. I have uniformly delivered the opinion, "that the petit jury have a right to decide the law as well as the fact, in criminal cases;" but it never entered into my mind that they, therefore, had a right to determine the constitutionality of any statute of the United States. It is my duty to execute the laws of the United States with justice and impartiality, with firmness and decision, and I will endeavour to discharge this duty with the assistance of the Fountain of Wisdom, and the Giver of all human reason and understanding.

After two hours, the jury returned with a verdict of guilty, upon which the court sentenced the traverser to a fine of two hundred dollars, and an imprisonment of nine months.

NOTE I. The tempest which this trial excited can now hardly be understood. The papers, for the first time in our history, were crammed with detailed reports, in which evidence and speeches were given at large. Virginia was in a flame; for even before the trial, affidavits were circulated in which it was stated that upon starting for Richmond, Judge Chase had publicly announced that "he would teach the lawyers in Virginia the difference between the liberty and the licentiousness of the press" (see Chase's Trial, 43); and that he had told the marshal "not to put any of those creatures called Democrats on the jury" (Id. 44). In his usual coarse jocularity, he had likened himself to a schoolmaster, who, breaking into the chamber of a few unruly boys, was about to reduce their notions of their own importance by a little wholesome chastisement: and his auditors roared at the picture of the burly judge, stretching in turn the representatives of the Virginia chivalry over his knee, and then sending them off one by one, cured by the same vigorous application. Judge Chase's peculiar recklessness of manner during the trial, can only be explained on the principle that, possessed with this notion, he was determined to do all that he could do, to humiliate and degrade the spirited bar which was called around him. He had hardly entered into the court house, before he saw that the most distinguished lawyers even in that most distinguished body had been pitched upon to conduct the defence; and he could not but feel that the crowd with which the room was filled, was attracted much more by the struggle to take place between the court and the counsel, than that between the prosecution and the prisoner. He thought it was better to settle the matter at once; and it must be confessed that the slap he gave Mr. Nicholas and Mr. Hay at the outset—something so far beyond anything they had ever calculated on as possible in judicial warfare—completely deprived those two eminent lawyers of their self possession. He had them down, and soon after adding Mr. Wirt to their number—whom he called a "young man," telling him to sit down, though that most courteous and eloquent counsel was then nearly middle aged, a widower, with a family of children—he proceeded to tuck them under his elbow, and at his leisure to apply to them that correction which he had promised. How richly he did so, the trial in the text amply shows. But not only all Virginia, but the profession throughout the country, was stung to the quick. The Philadelphia bar, as has been already noticed, was aroused by a similar invasion of its prerogative; and for a long time counsel declined to appear before the judge who had thus violated, as they alleged, the decorum of his office. At the very moment a determination was avowed to obtain an impeachment, and at last, in January, 1804, Mr. Randolph rose in the house of representatives, and made the long-expected charges. At another period, it will probably be necessary to consider at large this memorable trial; and in the preliminary notes to this work, an outline of Judge Chase's life has been given in which the general character of the proceeding is noticed. At present it is enough to consider its relation to the present case. Five articles of the impeachment were based on Callender's trial, and of these the fate was as follows: Art. II. Misconduct in refusing to overrule the objection to John Bassett, as a juror. Guilty, 10; not guilty, 24. Art. III. Misconduct in refusing to permit Mr. Taylor to be examined. Guilty, 18; not guilty, 16. Art. IV. Rude, contemptuous, and indecent conduct during the trial. Guilty, 18; not guilty, 16. Art. V. Misconduct in issuing bench warrant, instead of summons. Guilty, none; not guilty, 34. Art. VI. Misconduct in refusing continuance. Guilty, 4; not guilty, 30. On the third and fourth articles nothing but Judge Chase's age, and the peculiar party sympathies of the senate, saved him, as was conceded at the time, from a conviction by the requisite majority of two-thirds. The fourth article, it is true, rested on the abuse of a discretionary power, not susceptible, perhaps, of exact legal measurement; but the rejection of Mr. Taylor's testimony, on which the second article hung, was a palpable and unprecedented violation of the law of evidence. Mr. Taylor was offered to prove the truth of one of the several allegations in the alleged libellous article; the sedition act provided that the defendant should be permitted to give the truth in evidence; Judge Chase refused to allow Mr. Taylor to be examined, because it was no defence to justify part of the libellous matter; it was necessary that there should be a justification of the whole. In other words, a witness was rejected, who proved a material part of the defendant's case, simply because the particular witness was not able to prove the whole of it. Callender himself, like all the other subjects of the sedition law, was a foreigner, and was as depraved in morals as he was malignant in temper. "He seemed to have been a man," says Mr. Harrison, the accomplished historian of Virginia (2 Hist. Va. 373), "in whose heart vindictive passion raged without control." The "Prospect Before Us," from which the libellous matter in the text was extracted, is now, as it was then by all honourable minds, surrendered to infamy, and the only regret is, that a creature so contemptible should have been temporarily honoured by the fires of a martyrdom like that which the present trial inflicted. Mr.

Tucker (2 Life of Jefferson, 120), after mentioning that, on Mr. Jefferson's accession, he refused Callender the office of postmaster at Richmond, thus states the sequel of his history: "It should be further mentioned that Mr. Jefferson, as soon as he became president, exercised his powers of pardon in favour of Callender, as well as all others who had been convicted under the sedition law, and were then undergoing sentence of imprisonment. He took great offence at the refusal, and in no long time was found writing in opposition to the new administration: and he openly justified his desertion, on the ground of the ill-treatment he had received from Mr. Jefferson. He was of course welcomed by the new allies, and having connected himself with the editor of an obscure journal, recently established in Richmond, (the Recorder,) he poured forth against the Republican party generally, and Mr. Jefferson in particular, a torrent of scurrility and slander, of which no example had been previously afforded in the United States, not even by himself. The private life of Mr. Jefferson, present and past, was the subject of the closest scrutiny; and, whenever he was believed to be vulnerable, no matter for what cause, or upon what evidence, he was unhesitatingly assailed in the grossest and most offensive way. Such, too, are the debasing effects of party malignity, that there were not wanting those of the Federal party who were panders to this writer's vindictive calumnies, and communicated every piece of scandal or gossip, no matter how unfit for the public eye, how unsupported by evidence, or improbable in itself, which was thought at all likely to lower the chief magistrate in the eyes of the nation. The paper which was the vehicle of these slanders, and which previously circulated scarcely out of Richmond, now found its way to the remotest parts of the Union. It remains to be added that, while this wretched libeller, who had now become an habitual sot, was disseminating his slanders and ribaldry with untiring virulence, he was one morning found drowned in James' River, where he had been bathing, it was supposed, in a state of intoxication."

The following letters of Mr. Jefferson are here of some interest:

Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Monroe.

(3 Jeff. Corres. 503.)

"Washington, July 15th, 1802. Dear Sir:—Your favour of the 7th has been duly received. I am really mortified at the base ingratitude of Callender. It presents human nature in a hideous form. It gives me concern, because I perceive that relief, which was afforded him on mere motives of charity, may be viewed under the aspect of employing him as a writer. When 'The Political Progress of Britain' first appeared in this country, it was in a periodical publication called the Bee, where I saw it. I was speaking of it in terms of strong approbation to a friend in Philadelphia, when he asked me if I knew that the author was there in the city, a fugitive from prosecution on account of that work, and in want of employ for his subsistence. This was the first of my learning that Callender was the author of the work. I considered him as a man of science fled from persecution, and assured my friend of my readiness to do whatever I could to serve him. It was long after this, before I saw him; probably not till 1798. He had in the mean time written a second part of the 'Political Progress,' much inferior to the first, and his 'History of the United States.' In 1798, I think, I was applied to by Mr. Leiper to contribute to his relief. I did so. In 1799, I think, S. T. Mason applied for him. I contributed again. He had by this time paid me two personal visits. When he fled in a panic from Philadelphia to General Mason's, he wrote to me that he was a fugitive in want of employ, wished to know if he could get into a counting house or school, in my neighborhood, or that of Richmond; that he had materials for a volume, and if he could get as much money as would buy the paper, the profit of the sale would be all his own. I availed myself of this pretext to cover a mere charity, by desiring him to consider me a subscriber for as many copies of his book as the money enclosed ($50) amounted to; but to send me two copies only, as the others might lay until called for. But I discouraged his coming into my neighborhood. His first writings here had fallen far short of his original 'Political Progress,' and the scurrilities of his subsequent ones began evidently to do mischief. As to myself, no man wished more to see his pen stopped; but I still considered him as a proper object of benevolence. The succeeding year he again wanted money to buy paper for another volume. I made his letter, as before, the occasion of giving him another fifty dollars. He considers these as proofs of my approbation of his writings, when they were mere charities, yielded under a strong conviction that he was injuring us by these writings. It is known to many that the sums given him were such, and even smaller than I was in the habit of giving to others in distress, of the Federal as well as the Republican party, without attention to political principles. Soon after I was elected to the government, Callender came on here, wishing to be made postmaster of Richmond. I knew him to be totally unfit for it, and however ready I was to aid him with my own charities (and I then gave him fifty dollars), I did not think the public offices were confided to me to give away as charities. He took it in mortal offence, and from that moment has been hauling off to his former enemies, the Federalists. Besides the letter I wrote him in answer to the one from General Mason's, I wrote him another containing answers to two questions he addressed me. 1st. Whether Mr. Jay received salary as chief justice and envoy at the same time? and, 2d. Something relative to the expenses of an embassy to Constantinople. I think these were the only letters I ever wrote him, in answer to volumes he was perpetually writing to me. This is the true state of what has passed between him and me. I do not know that it can be used without committing me in controversy, as it were, with one too little respected by the public to merit that notice. I leave to your judgment what use can be made of these facts."

Mr. Jefferson to Mrs. Adams.

"Washington, July 22d, 1804. Dear Madam:—Your favour of the 1st instant was duly received, and I would not again have intruded on you, but to rectify certain facts which seem not to have been presented to you under their true aspect. My charities to Callender are considered as rewards for his calumnies. As early, I think, as 1796, I was told in Philadelphia that Callender, the author of the 'Political Progress of Britain,' was in that city, a fugitive from persecution, having written that book, and in distress. I had read and approved the book; I considered him as a man of genius, unjustly persecuted. I knew nothing of his private character, and immediately expressed my readiness to contribute to his relief, and to serve him. It was a considerable time after that, on application from a person who thought of him as I did, I contributed to his relief, and afterwards repeated the contribution. Himself I did not see till long after, nor ever more than two or three times. When he first began to write, he told some useful truths in his coarse way; but nobody sooner disapproved of his writing than I did, or wished more that he should be silent. My charities to him were no more meant as encouragements to his scurrilities, than those I gave to the beggar at my door, are meant as rewards for the vices of his life, and to make them chargeable to myself. In truth, they would have been greater to him, had he never written a word, after the work for which he fled from Britain. With respect to the calumnies of writers and printers at large, published against Mr. Adams, I was as far from stooping to any concern or approbation of them as Mr. Adams was respecting those of Porcupine, Fenno, or Russell, who published volumes against me for every sentence rendered by their opponents against Mr. Adams. But I never supposed Mr. Adams had any participation in the atrocities of these editors, or their writers. I knew myself incapable of that base warfare, and believed him to be so. On the contrary, whatever I may have thought of the acts of the administration of that day, I have ever borne testimony to Mr. Adams' personal worth; nor was it ever impeached in my presence without a just vindication on my part. I never supposed that any person who knew either of us, could believe that either of us meddled in that dirty work. But another fact is, that I liberated a wretch who was suffering for a libel against Mr. Adams! I do not know who was the particular wretch alluded to; but I discharged every person under punishment or prosecution under the sedition law, because I considered, and now consider, that law to be a nullity as absolute and as palpable as if congress had ordered us to fall down and worship a golden image. It was accordingly done in every instance, without asking what the offenders had done, or against whom they had offended, but whether the pains they were suffering were inflicted under the pretended sedition law. It was certainly possible that my motives for contributing to the relief of Callender, and liberating under the sedition law, might have been to protect, encourage, and reward slander; but they may also have been those which inspire ordinary charities to objects of distress, meritorious or not, or the obligation of an oath to protect the constitution, violated by an unauthorized act of congress. Which of these were my motives, must be decided by a regard to the general tenor of my life. On this I am not afraid to appeal to any nation at large, to posterity, and still less to that Being who sees himself our motives, who will judge us from his own knowledge of them, and not on the testimony of Porcupine or Fenno. You observe, there has been one other act of my administration personally unkind, and suppose it will readily suggest itself to me. I declare, on my honour, madam, I have not the least conception what act is alluded to. I never did a single one with an unkind intention. My sole object, in this letter, being to place before your attention, that the acts imputed to me are either such as are falsely imputed, or as might flow from good as well as bad motives, I shall make no other addition than the assurance of my continued wishes for the health and happiness of yourself and Mr. Adams."

[NOTE 2. Subsequently, upon the trial of the impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase, before the senate of the United States, the second article charged Judge Chase with overruling the objection of John Basset, who wished to be excused from serving on the jury in the trial of Callender, and causing him to be sworn, and to serve on the said jury, by whose verdict Callender was convicted.

[Basset had expressed no wish to be excused, provided there would be no impropriety in his being sworn, but from a delicate scruple he informed the court, that he had seen in the newspapers, extracts said to be taken from "The Prospect Before Us;" that he had no knowledge whether they were truly extracted, but if they were and the context did not explain away the apparent meaning of the extracts, he had made up his opinion unequivocally that their author came within the provisions of the sedition law.] [5]

Case No. 14,710.

UNITED STATES v. CALLICOTT et al.

[7 Int. Rev. Rec. 177.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. May, 1868.

INTERNAL REVENUE COLLECTOR — ACCEPTANCE OF FRAUDULENT BOND.

[On the prosecution of an internal revenue collector for accepting a fraudulent bond for the transportation of distilled spirits, evidence that the collector accepted 18 or 19 bonds, forged both as to principal and surety, in the same month, and that, when fraud was suggested, he delayed to institute an investigation, may be considered, as tending to show his participation in the fraud.]

The defendants [Thomas C. Callicott and John S. Allen] were the former collector of internal revenue for the Third district of New York, and his deputy. The indictment against them was founded upon the thirtieth section of the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 484], and the forty-second section of the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 162]. They were indicted jointly with others against whom the government discontinued.

E. W. Stoughton, Mr. Tracey, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Mr. Keasby, U. S. Dist. Atty. for New Jersey, for the United States.

Mr. Jenks and I. T. Williams, for defendants. Mr. Williams fell sick during the trial, and C. De Witt was added to defendants' counsel.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BENEDICT, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The indictment in this case found against the accused is, in substance, that Callicott and Allen, collector and deputy collector of internal revenue of the Third collection district of New York and others named and unknown, contriving and intending to defraud the United States of divers sums of money payable for taxes upon 200 barrels of distilled spirits, on the 7th of May, 1867, conspired together to procure to be fraudulently executed, a certain bond required by the laws of the United States and regulations of the commissioner of internal revenue; that is to say, a bond for the transportation of distilled spirits dated the 7th of May, 1867, purporting to be a sufficient bond for the transportation, executed by R. H. Hand as principal, and William Malin and John Jaggard as sureties, for the sum of $30,000 each, conditioned for the transportation of the 200 barrels from the bonded warehouse of John Wilson, in Brooklyn, to the bonded warehouse of M. S. Cole, of the Third district of Massachusetts, Boston,—whereas, in fact, the name of Hand was forged and the sureties were insufficient and wholly worthless, as the said Callicott, Allen and the others well knew, by which fraudulent bond payment of the tax was evaded, and lost to the United States. The indictment also charges that Callicott and Allen fraudulently accepted this Hand bond for the transportation of spirits as above stated—as above described—and did thereupon permit and allow the 200 barrels to be removed from the warehouse of Wilson, well knowing the insufficiency of the bond and of the sureties.

This is the substance, gentlemen, of the charge in the indictment against the accused, —in what may be called the first count in the indictment. There is also a count in it charging a conspiracy of the defendants to connive at the fraudulent execution of this Hand bond, and to accept it as security within the act of congress for the transportation of the spirits from Wilson's warehouse; and upon the acceptance of which a permit was granted to remove the spirits to the warehouse in Boston already referred to. The offence as stated in the indictment is founded upon the thirtieth section of the act of March 2, 1867, and which provides that "if two or more persons conspire together to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of them shall do any act to effect the object, the parties to the conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 and to imprisonment not exceeding two years."

The acts of the parties, you will observe here described as constituting the offense, fall short of the actual commission of the fraud against the government. The conspiracy to defraud with any one act by either of the parties constitutes the offense. The mere combining or confederating to commit the fraud is sufficient without any actual perpetration of it, or loss or damage to the government if any one of them has taken a step toward its execution, toward carrying into effect, as in the present case, the procurement of the fraudulent bond. That is one step—or the granting of a permit would be another step, for the withdrawal of the whiskey from the warehouse. The law strikes at the incipient steps, the germ of the offence, with a view the more effectually to deter persons from entering upon the fraud, and lays hold of them before its consummation.

The other offense charged, and which we refer to, is founded on the forty-second section of the act of July, 1866. It provides that if any person shall sign any fraudulent bond or permit, or other documents required by law, or who shall fraudulently procure the same to be executed, or who shall connive at the execution thereof by which the payment of any internal revenue tax shall be evaded, or attempted to be evaded, or which shall be executed for the purpose of withdrawing spirits from a bonded warehouse, on conviction shall forfeit all his interest in the spirits (if he has any,) and be imprisoned for a term of not less than one year nor more than five years. This act makes it an offence for any person to execute or to connive at the execution of a fraudulent bond, or to execute or connive at the execution of a fraudulent permit or other documents required by law, with a view to evade the payment of the tax, or for the purpose of withdrawing the spirits from a bonded warehouse.

It will thus be seen, gentlemen, how specific and particular the offence or offences charged in the indictment in this case are described in the acts of congress—so specific that any person who can read cannot misunderstand them, more especially public officers who are appointed to carry into execution the laws and provisions of the acts; whose attention must, therefore, necessarily have been drawn to the particular provisions as the guide of their conduct and the foundation of their duties.

By the fortieth section of this act of 1866, distilled spirits which have been inspected, gauged and marked by an inspector may be removed without the payment of the tax from the bonded warehouse of the distillery, as exemplified in the case of Wilson upon the execution of a transportation bond, as the commissioner of internal revenue may prescribe,—which he has done, as you see from the form of the execution,—and may be transported to any general bonded warehouse used for the storage of spirits, and immediately (according to the law) on its arrival at the bonded warehouse to which the spirits have been transferred, they are to be again gauged, again inspected, and placed in the warehouse.

The Hand bond, which figures largely in this case, was got up under this provision of the law and the regulations of the commissioner That this bond was grossly fraudulent, and was got up for the purpose of defrauding the government by the removal of whiskey from Wilson's warehouse without paying the tax, is undeniable, and that it effected the purpose designed by procuring the removal of the 411 barrels—in two lots, I refer to the whole—without the payment of tax—whereby the government lost some $46,000 tax, is equally true. The proof on this subject is overwhelming. We need not, therefore, give ourselves any trouble to look critically into the evidence as to the fact that the government was defrauded in this removal. Witnesses concerned and engaged in the execution of it, have given us a detailed account of the manner in which the fraud was perpetrated. The material and only question, therefore, left open for your examination and judgment, is whether the defendants, Callicott and Allen, were parties to this fraud, connived at it, or co-operated in its perpetration. It is the evidence in the case bearing upon this question—the whole of it so far as it has any bearing upon this question—that it becomes necessary that you should look critically into it, examine it, and upon which evidence you will find your verdict. Were they parties to this fraud? The question has been very fully, fairly and ably examined and discussed by each of the learned counsel who has addressed you on the subject, and I do not doubt but that you are already very fully possessed of the question, and of all the evidence which has any pertinent bearing upon it. I do not intend, therefore, to be tedious in going over, for I am quite satisfied with the discussion by the learned counsel. All I intend is to draw your attention more especially and exclusively to the real question in the case—the question of fact in the case.

The ground taken in the defence is that Callicott, the collector, had no knowledge of the fraud in the execution of this bond—this Hand bond; that it was not executed before him, but before Allen, the deputy, and hence he had no means of knowledge, or even of suspicion, that there was anything wrong in getting it up, or in the execution of it. Now, this is certainly true as it respects the execution of the bond; it was not executed in his room in the building, but in the adjoining room—the front room, occupied by the deputy—and so far the ground taken on the part of the learned counsel is well founded on the evidence; but it should be remembered—he had it afterward in his possession for several days for the purpose of examination, and with a view to ascertain if it was good security for the tax on the whisky to be removed. When Hardy applied to him with the bond for the permit the first time, he declined to give the permit—and took the bond to look into it—took it from Hardy to look into it, and several days elapsed before Hardy called again for the permit. And when he did, the bond was still with Callicott, for he took it to look at it according to this witness and said he believed it was all right. Now, if he had really made an examination into the sufficiency of the security he would naturally look to the character and condition of the sureties as these were the most important names on the bond—sureties for the principal. Any examination instituted by any person of common understanding with the view to ascertain the sufficiency of the bond—the responsibility of it—for any purpose—would naturally lead the person to look to the conditions of the sureties upon it; and it is quite natural that the collector should have followed that view. Their places of residence were accurately upon the bond, and in this city where they resided. One of them, according to a witness, a responsible witness, whose tenant he was, states that Martin lives within ten minutes walk from the collector's office; the other, Jaggard, within about a mile from the office. If he had gone there, or if he had sent there to inquire of these names, as we see from the testimony in the case, the fraudulent character of the bond would have at once been revealed.

There is also another circumstance in respect to this bond which we think should not be overlooked. The experiment was tried upon Callicott to get a permit to remove this whisky without any bond, indicating thereby unmistakably a design to perpetrate a fraud by using him and his office in the removal of the whiskey. You recollect the application by Cunningham and the delivery of two blank permits to Callicott with a mark, I think made by McMullen, which was pointed out to him by Cunningham, and which permits he was requested to sign by his friend who had made these marks; and this without a transportation bond, without any sort of a bond. The meaning of this application could not be misunderstood, it was openly and undisguisedly made, and could have no other result if complied with—if the application was complied with—than to defraud the government. And I am sorry to say—sorry to be obliged to say—that Callicott entertained the application, received the blanks (the blank permits,) for further consideration; that is, according to the evidence of the witness. He took them and said he would see about them, instead of rejecting them instantly with indignation. Now, to say the least of this, Callicott, we see, was advised, and had a knowledge that these parties, Cunningham and McMullen, two of the conspirators, intended to perpetrate a fraud upon the government. He was thus put upon his guard by this fraudulent conduct, and if an honest officer, he would naturally have seen to it that no contrivance of theirs—no subsequent contrivance of theirs—such as getting up a fraudulent bond or otherwise, that the fraud should succeed. He was admonished that these persons had made an experiment upon him with a view to get the 200 bbls. from the Wilson warehouse without payment of the tax, and without any security—without any bond. The first lot, 200 barrels, was removed by means of this bond, and a permit was given upon the face of it by the collector. Instead of being taken to Boston according to the conditions or terms of the permit, a large portion of it was taken to rectifying establishments in this neighborhood, including Brown and others, a firm which embraced McMullen as one of the partners. Thus the fraud was perfected.

I shall not go into the details, but you remember the disposition that was made of it. A large portion of it was sold for $1.30 a gallon, and the money went into the hands of McMullen.

Afterward another application was made to the collector for the removal of 211 barrels from the same warehouse and by the same parties. This lot of whiskey was removed on the 24th and 25th of May. Now it is admitted—it is not to be denied upon the evidence—that this lot—this second lot—was removed without any bond. The old permit was used, the date being altered from the 14th to the 24th of May, and a transportation order of the same date—24th of May, signed by Callicott, was procured. These papers were procured by McMullen who afterward delivered them to Cunningham, and upon which the whisky was removed—211 barrels—not to Boston according to the directions in the order, but to these rectifying establishments in the neighborhood, especially to that of Brown and others. Unexplained, this is a manifest fraud upon the government by the collector—no bond, no payment of the tax.

But an explanation has been offered by the learned counsel for the defendants, and it is for you to examine it, and for you to determine the weight of it. It is this: that McMullen altered the old permit himself from the 14th to the 24th, and that the transportation order which was genuine and bore the same date, the 24th, was given under the supposition that it was intended to apply to the first permit—the permit of the 14th of May. It is not denied that the alteration in the old permit from the 14th of May to the 24th, was made by McMullen. It is proved to be in his handwriting and doubtless he altered it; but the transportation order dated on the same day of the alteration and signed by Callicott, he must have procured. He was the man who went to obtain the permit for the second lot, and who brought the papers and delivered them to Callicott, who delivered them to Dayton, the storekeeper. McMullen, therefore, must have got the transportation order which was issued on that day. Now, the first permit that was given on the 14th of May, conferred full authority upon these parties to remove 200 barrels of whisky from this warehouse to Wilson's. It required no transportation order—that is, none was given at the time; but the permit was given as full authority to the parties for the benefit of McMullen; he was the master spirit—for his benefit—full authority to remove the 200 barrels. The argument is, and you must give it such weight as you think it is entitled to, that the collector may have supposed that these first 200 barrels of whisky were not immediately removed upon that permit of the 14th of May, and that they may have remained there in the warehouse for the ten days, and that this order was given for the purpose of accompanying that first permit with a view to the removal of the first lot of 200 barrels. That is the argument, and that is the explanation which the learned counsel has given. It is for you to look at it, to examine all the circumstances connected with the removal of the second lot, and the papers on which it was made. Now, De Veau who was the bond clerk in the office, wrote this transportation order. He was the witness that testifies that he wrote it, and that it is in his handwriting; and he is the one you recollect, when it was removed by Dayton to the office, that was concerned in the alteration of the date of that order from the 24th to the 16th. He has given us no explanation of the order—of this transportation order—thus written by him. He has not given any explanation that it was issued for the purpose of accompanying the first permit of May 14. He has given no explanation of it, but left it unexplained. There was at least such indiscretion in giving this second order—or rather this transportation order—as very properly called for observations as respects official duty.

The collector knew that he had given this authority for the removal of 200 barrels on the 14th from Wilson's warehouse, and he thus gives a second authority to remove the same number of barrels ten days afterward, leaving it open to these parties engaged in both applications to him—these who had made the application for the removal of the first 200 barrels, and had also subsequently renewed the application for 211 more, and who had, in the first application indicated, a disposition to perpetrate a fraud upon the government in the removal of this whiskey. Under these circumstances, and in connection with these parties who are thus suspected, it would have been wise on the part of the public officer, before he put into their hands these two authorities, that could be used for the purpose of taking out a double quantity if he had instituted an inquiry, either by himself or by his clerks, or deputies, at the warehouse of Wilson, to see whether the first 200 barrels had not already been removed. I understand that it was not over a mile or two—two or three miles from the collector's office, this warehouse. It would have been no great trouble, consumed not much time to have instituted this inquiry when the application was made for two hundred barrels more, to see whether the first permit had been used in the transfer from the warehouse of the whisky.

There is one more topic I am going to call your attention to for a moment, and then I shall leave the case to you; and that is the circumstance connected with the application of the district attorney on the 28th of May, for the privilege of examining these bonded warehouses, B. You have that account from the assistant district attorney. What led to this application is a fact that seems to be in some dispute between the learned counsel, although I recollect distinctly the testimony of Mr. Allen, and it is on my notes. Twenty-one barrels of the last lot of the 211 were seized in the carts on the ninth, and were in the street in front of the office of the district attorney. The seizure of course, produced some sensation among the parties who were interested in the removal, and on the part of the district attorney, who was looking to the interests of the government. It seems that Mr. Allen in the interest of the government, went with Cunningham, who was interested in getting the 21 barrels released, to the office of the collector. Mr. Allen, the assistant district attorney, states that he there put the question to the collector whether this whiskey that was thus seized and detained had been removed in pursuance of an order from him, and the answer, as stated by Mr. Allen, was that he had given the order to remove from class A, Wilson's warehouse, to class B, general bonded warehouses. That is the testimony of Mr. Allen. It is questioned on the part of the counsel for the accused, that is upon the contradiction which would exist between the two orders, for Allen's testimony is not mistaken, that the first transportation order was to carry this whiskey to Boston. The second transportation order, according to the account which we have from Mr. Allen, was not under that order, but under an order to transfer the whiskey from class A to class B, bonded warehouses. I don't put weight upon that, what I wish to call your attention to is this: This suggestion of the removal of the whiskey from the warehouse of Wilson to class B,—the general bonded warehouse,—excited the suspicion of the district attorney that there was something wrong about the removal. Hence, he instructed his assistant, on the 28th, to go to the collector and get the privilege of having these bonded warehouses, class B, examined, to see if he could find where this whiskey had been transferred. He went there, and on putting the question to him, the collector was unable to state to him in what particular warehouse, class B, this whiskey had been transferred. If he had been able to do so, why of course the assistant district attorney could have made the examination at once, but he was unable to tell him, and stated to him that Mr. Dayton, the removal officer, had the order or permit; that he was then gone and probably he would not be able to find it that afternoon, but he would see the officer and get the papers from him. Well, Allen called the next day, the 29th, and that day the collector was not in, but he saw Tappan, and all the papers that Tappan could find was this Hand bond and they examined that. He called the third day and saw the collector. He had not been able to see the storekeeper, the one who held the permit for this transfer to class B. He called on the 31st day, and although there was an arrangement that he would permit these warehouses to be examined if one of his deputies could accompany the district attorney or his agent, yet there was a postponement—there was a delay from the 28th to the 31st inclusive.

You must remember that the most of this whisky—the whole of it, indeed—had been removed on the 25th; it was in the city. Now, if there really was any ground for suspicion as suspected of this second lot of whisky, and the removal of it, and the perseverance on the part of the district attorney, with a view to get an opportunity to explore these warehouses with a view to find the whisky, if there was any real ground of suspicion, even the suggestion of suspicion, that fraud had been committed in the removal of this whisky from the warehouse of Wilson, why, certainly the collector should have been the first man that would have put in requisition all his official force for the purpose of ferreting out the fraud upon the government, that had been suggested in the removal of the whisky by the district attorney.

I shall not take up your time upon the fraudulent bonds in general. It would not have been remarkable nor singular, if, in the multitude of business of an office of this kind, occasionally an imposition should have been pressed upon him. But the idea that some eighteen or nineteen fraudulent bonds, forged both as to principal and as to surety or otherwise tainted with fraud; that there should have been that number accepted in succession, within a limit of about a month, was sufficient to excite surprise, if not suspicion, and call for an explanation.

Now, gentlemen, return to the question that I put to you in the opening, and that is: look at these facts; this testimony which I called your attention to, and if I have omitted anything in the facts that your attention has been called to by the learned counsel, examine all and determine whether or not these defendants have been parties to the fraud or connived at the fraud against the government which is admitted, and about which there is no controversy. If you are satisfied upon the examination of the evidence that they are, you are bound to convict; if not, to acquit them.

The jury then retired. After an absence of four hours they re-appeared, and stated through the foreman that they had not agreed upon a verdict.

THE COURT ordered them to retire.

The next day at 10 o'clock the jury appeared in the United States circuit court room and announced through their foreman that they were unable to agree. They were again ordered to retire. The foreman intimated that he desired to submit a few questions in a written form to the court for instruction on several points.

BENEDICT, District Judge, in view of the absence of the counsel for the prisoners, and the presiding justice, deferred answer until 1 o'clock, when the jury was summoned.

NELSON, Circuit Justice, then said: We have examined the request for instructions which was submitted to Judge BENEDICT this morning, and will instruct the jury upon the points submitted. First point: "Can the jury bring in a verdict on one of the statutes charged to have been violated, and alone?" Second point: "What is the legal weight of the testimony of the witness Cunningham?"

You may bring in a verdict formed on one of the provisions of law alleged to have been violated alone. The fact of the witness being a co-conspirator affects the credibility of his testimony, and the jury have a right to regard the question of credit; but if the testimony is corroborated by other witnesses, then credit is to be given to it. You may regard the weight of the evidence of a co-conspirator if it stands alone, but if it is corroborated, then you are bound to credit it. This case has occupied much time, and has been examined with attention by you, and it is highly important that a determination should be arrived at. It has involved great expense to the government, and a new trial would necessitate renewed expense and delay; and it is therefore desirable that you should reach a conclusion without great delay. The jury will return.

The jury then retired, and at 7 o'clock they re-appeared and announced that they had agreed upon a verdict, convicting Callicott, and acquitting the other defendant, John S. Allen.

Mr. Callicott was remanded to the penitentiary.

[NOTE. The defendant Callicott was, on June 5, 1868, sentenced to pay a fine of $10,000 and to be confined in the Albany penitentiary for the period of two years. In December following he petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus in the circuit court to inquire into the legality of his imprisonment. The petition was denied. Case No. 2,311. Subsequently, and a short time before the expiration of the two-year sentence, he again petitioned Circuit Judge Woodruff for a writ of habeas corpus. Between the time of the swearing to this last petition and the hearing on the application the petitioner was unconditionally pardoned by the president. The petition was, notwithstanding, prosecuted, and was again denied. Id. 2,323.]

UNITED STATES v. CALVIN et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 640.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1826.

SLAVERY—INDICTMENT FOR RIOT AND ASSAULT AND BATTERY—HOW TRIABLE.

This court has not jurisdiction of riot, and assault and battery, by slaves, in Alexandria county.

Indictment for a riot, and assault and battery, by slaves, on a constable.

Mr. Taylor, for defendants' masters, moved to quash the indictment, because by the law of Virginia of December 17, (Laws 1792, p. 187, § 11), it is enacted that "riots, routs, unlawful assemblies, trespasses, and seditious speeches by a slave or slaves, shall be punished with stripes at the discretion of a justice of the peace; and he who will, may apprehend and carry him, her, or them before such justice." This law was continued in force in the county of Alexandria by the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801 (2 Stat. 103). The common-law punishment of misdemeanors by fine and imprisonment is not applicable to slaves, who can have no property, and whose time and labor belong to their masters, so that imprisonment would be no punishment to them.

Mr. Swann, for the United States. By the act of the 27th of February, 1801 (2 Stat. 103), this court has cognizance of all crimes and offences. The jurisdiction of the justice may be concurrent.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that this court has not jurisdiction; and that the indictment must be quashed, and the prisoners committed to take their trial before a justice of the peace.

UNITED STATES v. CAMBUSTON.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 86.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—VALIDITY OF GRANT.

No opposition to the confirmation of this claim.

Claim [by Henry Cambuston] for eleven leagues of land in Butte county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.

Volney E. Howard, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The original grant in this case is not produced, but it is shown to have been in the possession of the grantee in the year 1850, when it was deposited by him in the government archives, where it still remains. A traced copy is, however, filed; and the genuineness of the original fully established by proof. It appears in evidence that efforts to occupy the land were made by the grantee within the year, and that in 1847 he had built a house, stocked his rancho, and cultivated a portion of it under the superintendence of his major domo. The exterior boundaries of the tract are sufficiently indicated in the grant, and the quantity of land to be taken within those boundaries is mentioned as eleven leagues, if so much can be found outside of the lands of the neighbors, whose lines are to be respected.

The commissioners have confirmed this claim, and although the absence of the expediente containing the petition and other proceedings prior to the grant prevents the proof in this case from being of so conclusive character as in many others, yet the board does not seem to have entertained any doubt as to its genuineness, nor has the claim been opposed in this court in any argument on the part of the United States. It has been submitted to us for decision without comment, and though we would have desired fuller proofs on the subject, we do not feel at liberty to disregard the uncontradicted evidence which establishes the genuineness of the grant. The claim must therefore be confirmed.

[NOTE. Upon an appeal to the supreme court, the decree above was reversed, with directions to remand the cause to this court for a further hearing. 20 How. (61 U. S.) 59. In accordance with this mandate, the cause came before this court for a further hearing, which resulted in a decree rejecting the claim. Case No. 14,713. Cambuston having died, his widow appeared in court, and asked to be permitted to become the party claimant of the land, as executrix of the will of her deceased husband, which had been admitted to probate May 3, 1869. An order to this effect was made April 3, 1875, and on the same day the claimant asked that a new trial be granted, and that the decree rejecting the claim might be reversed. The parties thereupon appeared, and, after hearing, the court denied the motion. On the same day, April 3, 1875, another appeal was allowed, both from the final decree and the order refusing a new trial. The United States moved to dismiss the appeal, because taken too late. The motion to dismiss was granted. 95 U. S. 285.]

Case No. 14,713.

UNITED STATES v. CAMBUSTON.

[7 Sawy. 575.] [1]

District Court. D. California. June, 1859.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—CAPACITY OF FOREIGNERS TO RECEIVE—REPEAL OF LAWS—AUTHORITY OF GOVERNORS — PRESUMPTIONS FROM OFFICIAL ACTS.

[1. The law of Mexico of 1824, which permitted and invited foreigners to settle on the vacant lands of the republic, was repealed by the law of December 29, 1836, which provided "that foreigners cannot acquire real estate in the republic, unless they have been naturalized and married to a Mexican woman, and have otherwise complied with the laws relating to such acquisition. The acquisitions of colonists will be subject to special laws of colonization." But if it be assumed that the act of 1836 did not repeal the law of 1824, such repeal was effected by the 12th article of the law of 1842, which provides that "foreigners cannot acquire royal or public lands, in all departments of the republic, without contracting for them with the government, which passes this right as representing the domain of the Mexican nation." Therefore, after the latter act, no unnaturalized foreigner had capacity to receive a grant of land without the express license of the supreme government.]

[2. The rule that public acts of public officers shall, in absence of proof to the contrary, be presumed to have been done in the exercise of a legitimate authority, applies with but little force to grants of land made by the Mexican governor of California, within a few weeks before the territory passed from his hands, and during the heat and conflict of the struggle in which his power was overthrown, especially where the evidence that the formalities required by law were observed is imperfect and unsatisfactory, and rests wholly in parol, where it does not appear that any preliminary inquiries were made as to the point on which he is supposed to have exceeded his authority, and where his situation and the mode in which he exercised his authority in other cases about the same time suggests a suspicion of carelessness and recklessness in the exercise of his powers.]

[3. Where a grant was made by the governor of California, just before the territory was wrested from his hands, to one who was commonly supposed to be a French citizen, and in whose behalf the French minister to Mexico had made strong representations to that government a short time before, and it was not stated in the grant either that he had been naturalized or that he had obtained a license from the supreme government to take the lands, held, that the mere fact of the making of the grant did not, under the circumstances, raise any presumption that he had been naturalized or that he had received such license, and the burden was on him to show affirmatively the existence of one of these facts in order to establish his right to receive the grant. U. S. v. Reading, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 9, distinguished.]

[Cited in Bouldin v. Phelps, 30 Fed. 569.]

[4. The Mexican governors of California had no authority to remove the disabilities of foreigners in respect to holding lands under the laws of 1836 and 1842; and an attempt to make a grant to a foreigner by executing the necessary papers could not, therefore, operate as an enfranchisement, which would render the grant effectual.]

[Claim by Henry Cambuston for 11 leagues of land in Butte county, on the Sacramento river.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case having been confirmed by this court [Case No. 14,712], the case was appealed to the supreme court, by whom the decree was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proofs. [20 How. (61 U. S.) 59.]

The principal grounds assigned by the supreme court for their decision, are: The want of all record testimony, or any explanation of its absence. The unsatisfactory character of the evidence as to the genuineness of the signatures. The absence of any evidence that the preliminary steps required by the law to a grant of public domain by the governors had been observed, especially those which were matters of record. That the grant was not recorded in the proper book, or in any book whatever, so far as appeared by the proofs. That it was a pure donation, without pecuniary consideration or meritorious services. That it was unaccompanied by the forms and usages always observed in making grants. That it was unknown to any one except the grantee and one other interested person, until 1850. That it was made by a governor who had recently expelled his predecessor, and who was not proved to have been recognized by the supreme government. That it was made but one month and a half before the conquest of the country by the United States forces, and during the very heat and conflict of the struggle in which the power of the governor was overthrown; and, therefore, that his authority to make it, and the bona fides of its exercise, should be scrutinized with great care.

As these objections had not been urged before the commissioners or this court, the cause was remanded that the claimant might, if in his power, remove them by the introduction of further evidence. Further evidence has accordingly been taken, and the cause is again submitted for decision.

As to many of the points alluded to by the supreme court, the testimony leaves no room for doubt. The original grant is produced from the archives where it has remained since 1850, when it was deposited with Major Canby.

The signatures of Pico and Moreno are undoubtedly genuine. The grant is also shown to be in the handwriting of Augustin Olvera, who was secretary to the departmental assembly; and Mr. Hopkins, the keeper of the archives, states that, in the water-marks and general appearances of the paper on which it was written, it corresponded with paper used at its date. That officer seems to entertain no doubt of the genuineness of the signatures, and his opinion is of great value.

The real point in the case is not whether Pico and Moreno signed the grant, but when they did do so. It is also shown, and the fact is known to the court as part of the history of the country, that Pio Pico had been recognized by the supreme government as constitutional governor of the department before the date of this grant.

Before proceeding to consider the proofs as to the facts that the preliminary steps requisite to a grant were taken, and which explain the absence of record evidence that it issued, it may be observed that, according to the usage of the Mexican government, the record evidence, as well of the preliminary proceedings as of the issue of the grant, should be found in the espediente, and in the book known as the "Toma de Razon."

The espediente, as is well known, consisted of the petition, with the marginal order of the governor; the informes, when they were furnished; the decree of concession, and, usually, a borrador, or draft, of the title delivered to the party. These papers, stitched together, formed the espediente, which was preserved among the archives and formed the only record of the proceedings, except that contained in the Toma de Razon. This last was a book in which short entries were made of the date of the grant, the name of the grantee, and that of the land granted.

If, therefore, the espediente in any case be lost, and the Toma de Razon, for the year in which the grant was made, be also lost, no record evidence of the grant would exist, unless it should happen to be referred to in other grants or espedientes, a reference not likely to occur with respect to a grant of late date.

It is shown in this case, and the fact is notorious, that the book of Toma de Razon, for the year 1846, is not among the archives. It is also in proof that the archives were, for some months after the seizure of the country by the Americans, left in a condition where spoliations or loss of documents may have taken place. But the extent of such spoliations has been greatly exaggerated, for the archives exist in a degree of completeness and perfection greater, perhaps, than could have reasonably been anticipated, as is proved by the fact that all the espedientes, to the number of four hundred and twenty-two, of which a list was made by Jimeno, are found on the files. Nevertheless, it is possible that some espedientes have been lost. Colonel Fremont appears to have removed several, which were lost in the mountains; and the testimony of Captain Halleck shows that such an accident may very possibly have happened.

The absence, therefore, of all record evidence of this grant does not conclusively show that no espediente in the case ever existed. It may possibly have been lost; but such an accident is extremely improbable.

It has already been stated that all the espedientes mentioned in Jimeno's list, to the number of four hundred and twenty-two, are found in the archives. The latest concession entered in that list is dated December 24, 1844. I am not aware that the espediente for any concession mentioned in the Toma de Razon for the succeeding year, and which contains entries down to December 23, 1845, is lost, though such may be the case.

It was certainly, therefore, by a most unfortunate, and what would, a priori, be thought a most improbable accident, that the espediente in this case was lost, when so large a number of similar documents, subjected to the same chances, were preserved in an unbroken series. To prove the existence of the espediente the claimant has examined Pio Pico and Jose Matias Moreno.

Governor Pico swears that he does not remember the petition, but that it must have been presented, or the grant would not have issued; that he believes the signatures to be those of himself and Moreno, and that he also believes the grant was signed on the day it bears date. He does not pretend, however, to remember the fact of having made the grant, nor that any informes were asked for or obtained, but, with his usual caution or evasiveness, confines himself to the expression of his belief that it bears his signature and was executed at its date.

Moreno's testimony is more positive. He swears that a petition signed by Cambuston was addressed to the governor, praying for certain lands in the North; that the petition was dated previously to the grant; that he saw this petition when he became secretary, May 1, 1846; and that attached to it were the informes of certain authorities (who they were he does not recollect), and an order of the governor directing the grant to issue.

He also testifies that he made a note of the grant in the Toma de Razon, and that the espediente remained among the archives until Governor Pico and himself were driven from the country. No other witness is produced by whom the petition of Cambuston or the espediente was ever seen, or who has any knowledge of their existence.

The officers who gave the informes are not produced, though it would seem not difficult to discover who they were, and to procure from them evidence of the fact that they reported on the application.

As Governor Pico makes no mention of any informe, and merely infers that a petition was presented from the fact that a grant issued, the only evidence tending to show that the espediente was formed, and that the usual preliminary steps were taken by the governor, is that of Moreno,—a witness not unknown to this court, and whose credibility it has, on several occcasions, been called upon to consider.

The existence of a document of this character, unknown to any other person,—which is not found in its proper place of custody, where it would be found unless an extraordinary accident be supposed to have occurred,—a part of which (viz., the petition) would probably have been known to other persons than the applicant, and certainly to the authorities by whom the informe was furnished, can hardly be said to be satisfactorily proved by the uncorroborated testimony of Moreno.

The fact, however, that a grant was asserted to be in existence in 1846 or 1847, is testified to by some witnesses on whom the court can rely with entire confidence.

P. B. Reading testifies that he heard of this claim as early as 1846; that he heard several persons speak of the Cambuston claim as adjoining Sutter's northern line near the "Buttes," on the Sacramento. On his cross-examination he states that, according to his best recollection, he heard this in 1846,—certainly not previously; but that, in looking back for thirteen years, it is not possible to recollect such a fact with certainty unless connected with some event.

Colonel J. D. Stevenson, who arrived in California March 6, 1847, in command of the first regiment, New York volunteers, testifies that he became acquainted with Cambuston in April, 1847, and was intimate with him and his family until he left Monterey, in May of the same year; that he renewed his acquaintance with him in October, 1848, and has been closely intimate with him ever since; that in 1847 he was in the habit of visiting daily the Soberanes family, with whom Cambuston was then residing, and into which Cambuston subsequently married; that Doctor Townsend and his wife were also residing with that family, and that he first heard the grant spoken of by these latter in presence of Cambuston; that it was alluded to as being the Sacramento valley between Sutter's line and that of a man named Flugge; that subsequently, in May, 1847, he became acquainted with Flugge, and continued intimate with him until he (witness) left Los Angeles, in the fall of 1848; that he had frequent consultations with him respecting his rancho; that in various conversations Flugge spoke of a grant to Cambuston between his own rancho and Sutter's line; that in October, 1848, or the spring of 1849, Cambuston showed him (witness) a paper purporting to be a grant for the ranch in question; that he (witness) advised him to retain it carefully until a government should be organized; and that he subsequently filed it with Major Canby, by his (witness') advice.

Jacob A. Morenhout testifies that he first heard of the claim of Cambuston, in 1846, soon after his arrival in California; that when obtaining a description of the French residents from his predecessor in the office of consul of France, he was told by the latter that Cambuston had a claim for a large tract of land on the Sacramento river, but that it was then thought of no value; that in 1847, as he believes, or perhaps in the beginning of 1848, Cambuston deposited in the consulate a bundle of papers, among which was this title; and that he is positive he saw the title long before there was any doubt raised about it, and before the lands were of any value.

The evidence of this witness, which had been taken before the commissioners, was disregarded by the supreme court because of his interest in the suit. The testimony above cited is contained in a deposition taken since the cause was remanded. In that deposition he states in the most positive manner that he has sold out all his interest in the claim, and that he has now no interest whatever in the event of the suit. His character is wholly unimpeached, his testimony entirely uncontradicted. He came to California as consul of France, and he continues to hold the office of vice consul at Monterey to the present time. I know of no reason why his statements should not be received by the court with entire confidence. Captain H. W. Halleck testifies that he heard of this grant in the spring of 1847, and also heard that Cambuston was endeavoring to get Americans to go and settle upon it.

It must, I think, be taken as proved, that a grant of some kind was in existence shortly after the date of the grant produced in this case, and before the return of Pio Pico to California in the spring of 1848. All the witnesses agree that the grant heard of by them was for lands in Sacramento valley. Colonel Stevenson identifies the grant he heard of with that now exhibited by the designation of Flugge's rancho as one of its boundaries, and his conversation with Flugge respecting it; and Morenhout mentions that he was "attracted by the quantity, eleven leagues, but it was not worth anything."

The objection, therefore, of the supreme court, "that the grant was unknown to any person besides the grantee and another interested party, until filed among the archives in 1850," is conclusively answered.

There is also some evidence to show that in October, 1846, the land was occupied and cultivated. But the only testimony on this point is that of Victor Prudon; and the fact is not material, for the occupation testified to was after the conquest, and the existence of the grant shortly after its date is proved, as we have seen, by more reliable testimony.

With respect to the consideration for the grant, Governor Alvarado testifies that Cambuston rendered services as public printer to the government from 1841 to 1846; that he was not paid for those services; and that he (Alvarado) offered him land in payment, which he did not then accept; but that he (witness) heard that one of his successors had granted land in compensation. With respect to this testimony it is to be observed: (1) That it is only hearsay. (2) That no mention is made in the grant of any such consideration. (3) That it appears from the documents produced from the archives, and which will hereafter be referred to, that on the eighth of August, 1844, Bocanegra, minister of relations of Mexico, transmitted a dispatch to the governor of California, in which he enclosed a communication from the French minister at Mexico, complaining that Henry Cambuston, a French citizen, had been driven from California, and that Cambuston protested his innocence, etc. The French minister, therefore, demands that he be permitted to return, etc.

The statement of Alvarado, that from 1841 to 1846 Cambuston was employed at Monterey as teacher and public printer, must consequently be untrue. It cannot be said, therefore, that the objection raised by the supreme court that this grant was a pure donation has been satisfactorily answered.

An objection, however, is taken to this claim, which was not urged heretofore, either in this or the supreme court. It is claimed that Cambuston was a citizen of France, and therefore incapable of taking a grant.

This objection is urged: (1) To show that, even if all the preliminary steps had been taken, and the grant in all other respects regularly made, the governor exceeded his powers. (2) That the fact that the grantee was a foreigner, and notoriously known to be such, would certainly have been made known to the governor had the usual informes with regard to the qualifications of the applicant, etc., been asked for and obtained, and that the fact that he was so known to be a foreigner, is a strong circumstance to show that the grant was executed without the usual informes having been asked for. (3) That the issuing of so large a grant to a foreigner at that time, and under the circumstances of its alleged execution, shows the want of that bona fides on the part of the governor in the exercise of his authority, which, as also the existence of his authority to make the grant, the supreme court has declared, "should in this and similar cases be inquired into, and scrutinized with great care."

The evidence which is relied on to prove that Cambuston was an unnaturalized foreigner, is the following:

(1) The deposition of Morenhout, taken by the claimant. This witness testifies that when he arrived here as French consul, he obtained from his predecessor a description of the French residents of the country, and was told that Cambuston had a grant, etc., and that subsequently Cambuston deposited his papers in the consulate.

This witness does not expressly state that Cambuston was a Frenchman, but it is clearly to be inferred from his account that he first obtained information about his affairs, as such, and the subsequent reception of the papers in the consulate, can hardly be accounted for on any other hypothesis.

(2) Colonel Stevenson, also a witness for the claimant, states that Cambuston spoke French and Spanish, but no English.

(3) It appears from the archives that, on the eighth of August, 1844, a dispatch was sent by Bocanegra, minister of relations of Mexico, to the governor of California, inclosing a communication from the French minister at Mexico, in which the latter complains that Henry Cambuston, a Frenchman, established in Monterey, had been driven from California; that Cambuston protested his innocence. The minister, therefore, remonstrates against such arbitrary conduct, and asks that he be permitted to return, etc. It also appears that, on the twenty-ninth of January, 1846, Manuel Castro, then prefect of Monterey, transmitted a communication to the secretary of the department, containing an account of a quarrel which had occurred between himself and Henry Cambuston, a teacher in the public school, and inclosing copies of communications relative thereto, between Louis Gasquet, acting French consul, and Jose Castro, commandant general, and also a copy of the proceedings had against Cambuston by Manuel Castro. In all these proceedings, Cambuston is spoken of, both by the French consul and General Castro, as a French citizen. It does not, however, appear, that the interference and protection of the French minister in 1844, or that of the French consul in 1846, were claimed by Cambuston.

As this objection was for the first time taken in the brief filed by the United States, the case was opened, that the United States might adduce the testimony above referred to from the archives, and that the claimant might show, if possible, either that he was not a foreigner, or had been naturalized. No proof on these last points has been submitted by him. In the briefs filed on the part of the claimant, it is not urged that as a matter of fact Cambuston is not a Frenchman. He resides in this country, and is not unfrequently in this city. He is known to a large number of people, as is shown by the witnesses whom he has himself produced. If he were not a Frenchman, Morenhout, Colonel Stevenson, and many others could readily have so stated. The absence, therefore, of any attempt to repel the presumptions arising from the proofs above cited, and even of any denial of their truth, justifies me in treating those proofs as establishing that Cambuston was a French citizen. Assuming, then, that he was a foreigner, and not naturalized, we proceed to inquire whether he could take lands by grant in colonization, and whether in attempting to grant lands to him, Governor Pico exceeded his authority.

By the law of 1824, foreigners were not only permitted but invited to settle, as colonists, on the vacant lands of the Mexican republic.

But the circumstances connected with the settlement of Texas, or other considerations, induced the government, in 1836, to adopt a more jealous and exclusive policy.

By the constitutional laws of December 29th of that year, it is provided, "that foreigners cannot acquire real estate in the republic, unless they have been naturalized and married to a Mexican woman, and have otherwise complied with the laws relating to such acquisitions. The acquisitions of colonists will be subject to special laws of colonization."

Under this provision it might perhaps have been doubtful whether it was intended merely to prohibit the acquisition of lands by foreigners in the ordinary modes, leaving their rights to acquire lands as colonists to be governed by the then existing special laws, or whether it was intended to make the prohibition general, leaving their rights as colonists to be fixed by future special laws.

But we have abundant evidence of the construction given to this provision by the authorities of California. In 1843, Isaac J. Sparks, a native of the United States, but a naturalized Mexican, applied for a grant of land, and the usual informes were ordered. The alcalde of Santa Barbara reported that Sparks "was married in the United States, which is a good reason why he cannot marry with any one in this country." And Dominguez, the prefect, reported that "as the law in speaking of strangers, prohibits them from acquiring real estate in the republic unless naturalized therein, married with a Mexican, etc., your excellency will order in the matter what may be proper."

On these reports Micheltorena orders the proceedings to be suspended "until the arrival of the new constitution," viz., that of 1842, which will presently be noticed.

In December of the same year Sparks renewed his application, wherein Jimeno, the secretary, reported:

"The party interested has not acquired the land he petitions for, on account of his not being married to a Mexican, as required by the constitution of 1836, and although by a subsequent decree foreigners were allowed to acquire real estate in the republic, exceptions are made in the frontier departments, which have been subjected to regulations which have not yet been received. I believe it would be an act of justice to grant the land to the petitioner, as he is honorable and industrious, and a naturalized citizen."

The land was accordingly granted, but without the power to sell.

In the case of Sansevain, a French citizen, who applied for a grant, Jimeno reported as follows: "Don Pedro Sansevain is not naturalized, an indispensable requisite in order to acquire property in the territory, but he may be permitted to cut wood upon the land until he is naturalized and can receive the title he desires."

Sansevain was accordingly naturalized, and on the twenty-first of April, 1846, renewed his application as a Mexican, by naturalization, to Governor Pico, by whom the land was granted on the twenty-first of April, 1846, about one month before the date of the grant to Cambuston. In the decree of concession and the final title, the fact is carefully set forth that the grantee is a Mexican citizen by naturalization.

I am not aware of any case in which the espediente shows that this "indispensable requisite," as it is called by Jimeno, was dispensed with. It is surprising that the first and only instance of the kind should be that of Cambuston, who two years before had been driven from the country, and a few months before had been involved in a long and acrimonious dispute with the authorities, in which the representative of his nation felt himself called on to interfere.

The subsequent decree to which Micheltorena and Jimeno allude is undoubtedly that of March, 1842.

By this law, foreigners, not citizens, were authorized to acquire real property in the republic; but by article 9, it was enacted, that "those arrangements should not include the departments on the frontier and bordering on other nations, in regard to which special laws of colonization will be enacted, without the power to foreigners to ever acquire property in them without the express license of the supreme government." Rock. p. 612.

It is suggested that this was a restriction intended to be made in future laws of colonization, and not a limitation in the then existing laws.

But even if this be so, the latest existing law was that of 1836, which we have seen denied all right to foreigners to acquire lands, unless naturalized and married to a Mexican, and it is impossible to suppose that Santa Ana, when by his edict of 1842 he removed these disabilities as to the central departments, and declared that the frontier departments were not included in the new arrangements, but with respect to them special colonization laws should be enacted, under which foreigners should not acquire lands without the express license of the supreme government, intended that the ancient and liberal law of 1824 which offered lands to all foreigners, without the license of the supreme government, should remain unrepealed.

The fact that future special laws of colonization containing this restriction were promised, shows that he, like Micheltorena, Jimeno, and the other authorities of California, regarded the law of 1824 as modified or repealed, in this respect, by the law of 1836.

But even if, contrary to the construction given to it by Jimeno, we construe the law of 1836 as not repealing the colonization laws of 1824, that repeal must, nevertheless, be deemed to have been effected by the twelfth article of the law of 1842.

That article provides that "foreigners cannot acquire royal or public lands, in all the departments of the republic, without contracting for them with the government, which possesses this right as representing the domain of the Mexican nation." Rockw. p. 613.

It must, therefore, be concluded, that at the time the grant to Cambuston purports to have been issued, he had, if an unnaturalized foreigner, no capacity to take lands without the express license of the supreme government.

It is urged, however, that the court is bound to presume that the governor did not exceed his authority; and, therefore, it must presume either that Cambuston was naturalized and that the governor was duly apprised of the fact by the preliminary proceedings, or else that the express license of the supreme government was obtained.

It is undoubtedly true, as a general principle, that the public acts of public officers purporting to be exercised in an official capacity and by public authority shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be presumed to have been done in the exercise of a legitimate, and not a usurped, authority. U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 727.

The acts, therefore, of a public officer, to whom a public duty is assigned, within the sphere of that duty, are, prima facie, taken to be within his power. "He who would controvert a grant executed by the lawful authority, with all the solemnities required by the law, takes upon himself the burden of showing that the officer transcended the powers conferred upon him, or that the transaction is tainted with fraud." U. S. v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 453.

These principles are declared by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall "to be too deeply founded in reason and law ever to be successfully assailed."

The justice of this remark is obvious. As by hypothesis the only evidence of the existence or non-existence of the power in the officer is the fact that he exercised it, the court is compelled to adopt one of two presumptions: either that he acted legally, or illegally. In the absence of all proof to the contrary, it could not rationally be presumed that he acted illegally. The other alternative must, therefore, be accepted.

But the force of this presumption must, from the nature of things, vary with the circumstances. Where the officer, as a governor or viceroy, appointed by the king, dependent on his favor and liable to be punished for disobedience; where the act in question is one of a series by which he repeatedly and notoriously assumed the power in question; where no assignable motive appears which could have induced him, in the particular case, to exercise a usurped authority, nor any circumstances either in his own situation or that of the grantee, or in the mode of exercising his power,—which suggests doubt as to the bona fides of the transaction, the presumption we are considering may be regarded as almost conclusive.

But where, as in this case, the grant purports to have been made by a governor within a few weeks of the time when the government of the territory passed from his hands, and during the very heat and conflict of the struggle in which his power was overthrown, where the evidence that the formalities required by law were observed is imperfect and unsatisfactory, and rests wholly in parol, where it does not appear that any preliminary inquiries were made as to the point on which he is supposed to have exceeded his authority, and where the situation of the granting officer, and the mode in which he exercised his authority in other cases at or about the period when the grant purports to have been issued, suggest the suspicion of carelessness, if not recklessness, in the exercise of his powers,—under all these circumstances it must be admitted that the presumption we are considering loses much of its force, if it be not entirely repelled.

It is declared by the supreme court in this case, that this grant, purporting to have been made under the circumstances above referred to, and "all others similarly situated, should be scrutinized with great care, both as to the authority of the governor to make them and the bona fides of its exercise."

But how can such scrutiny be exercised if we apply to them a blind and technical presumption of legality, raised by the mere fact that the governor signed the grant, and treat that fact as satisfactory evidence of the governor's authority, unless the United States produce proofs to the contrary, in their own nature impossible to be furnished?

The United States have shown that the governors of the frontier departments had no power to grant lands to foreigners; certainly not without the express license of the supreme government, if we adopt the construction of the law of 1842, most favorable to the claimant.

They have also shown, I think satisfactorily, that the grantee was a Frenchman, and that within a few months of the date of the grant his rights as such were vigorously asserted by the representative of his nation; that he was by that officer and by the California authorities treated and recognized as such throughout a protracted proceeding; and, as this proceeding was taken for his benefit, it may be reasonably inferred to have been at his instance; and he should be regarded as having asserted his status as a French citizen, and as having demanded protection of the representative of his country as such.

No informes or preliminary inquiries were proven which show that it was ascertained by the governor that the grantee had been naturalized, nor is he, as was usual and almost invariable in similar cases, declared to be such in the grant. If, then, this proof be not sufficient to overcome the presumption arising from the fact that the governor signed the grant, in what way can it be met?

The United States cannot prove the negative fact that the grantee was not naturalized. They may raise, as they have done, a strong presumption to that effect, by showing that he was of French birth, and that rights were claimed for him as a French citizen a few months previous to the grant. But as the forms of the proceeding to obtain naturalization were exceedingly simple, and they could be taken before any magistrate, it is impossible to prove that a particular person was not naturalized.

It seems to me clear, therefore, that in such a case the foreigner should prove the affirmative fact that he was naturalized—a fact peculiarly within his knowledge, and the means of proving which are easy. No such proof has been offered in this case.

The same observations apply to the other presumption in which the court is asked to indulge, viz.: That the grant was expressly authorized by the supreme government. The very state of facts for which the United States contend—viz., that no license was obtained—supposes affirmative proof that it was not given to be unattainable; for all that could be shown would be that no such license appears of record, in the archives or elsewhere, and such is the proof in this case.

Governor Pico, who was a witness for the claimant, makes no mention of any such license; and as it would have been the solitary instance of the kind which, so far as I am informed, ever occurred in the history of California, the fact could hardly have escaped his memory, nor would the claimant have omitted to establish it by the testimony of the governor.

Besides, it is impossible to suppose that so protracted and troublesome a proceeding as demanding and obtaining the license of the supreme government would have been resorted to, when the applicant could, without delay or difficulty, have been naturalized by an ordinary magistrate.

The idea, therefore, that such a license may have been obtained, appears to me rather an ingenious suggestion of counsel, than a legal presumption which the court should indulge.

But the case of U. S. v. Reading, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 9, is relied on as an authority decisive of this case. In that case the grant contained the usual recital "that the proper proceedings and investigations had been previously complied with according to the provisions of the laws," etc., in the form invariably adopted in all grants.

"Now this," say the supreme court, "is not merely the language of clerical formality, though it might be the same from usage in like cases, but it is a declaration of the governor's official and judicial conscience; that his power to make the grant has been used in a fit case," etc.

"We consider it conclusive of the fact of the petitioner's naturalization, precluding all other inquiries about it, in our consideration of this case, by the record."

With reference to that case, it is to be observed:

(1) That the grant to Major Reading states "that he is a Mexican by naturalization," which is not stated in the grant to Cambuston; and it further appeared, from the espediente, that the usual informes were obtained, and the petitioner reported by Jimeno to be a proper person for the governor's favor.

(2) So far as the principles laid down by the supreme court, in the extract above cited, can be supposed to apply to this case, they must be taken as overruled by its more recent decision in the case we are now considering.

"It is true," say the supreme court, "the document recites that a petition was presented, and that the customary investigation had been made in respect to the application. But this cannot be regarded as conclusive, or even satisfactory evidence of these facts when the question is raised, whether or not the alleged grant is made in conformity with the requirements of law—in other words, whether the preliminary conditions had been complied with, which enabled the governor in the particular case to make the grant." U. S. v. Cambuston, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 68.

The court then proceeds to distinguish between the Florida and Louisiana cases and those in California. In the first, the existence of the power to grant and the regularity of its exercise were presumed from the facts of the habitual granting of lands by certain officers, and the customary mode adopted in making them. In the California cases the power is expressly conferred and the manner of its exercise prescribed by law; and therefore no presumptions are admissible. But the court must look to the law for the power to make the grant, and the manner of its exercise.

If, then, the court refused to treat the recital that the customary investigation had been had, etc., as conclusive or even satisfactory evidence of the fact, but remanded the case that such proofs might be given, it is difficult to perceive how this court can treat the same recital as proving not only that the investigations were made, but that they resulted favorably to the petitioner, and that he was ascertained to have been naturalized, especially as he is not stated in the grant to have been a citizen, either by birth or naturalization.

In the Case of Reading, the informe of Jimeno, and the statement in the grant that he was a naturalized citizen, may well be regarded as a judicial ascertainment of the fact precluding all subsequent inquiries upon the subject.

But in this case no informes are produced. We have only the statement of Moreno that they existed in an espediente, which is lost, and which no other witness ever saw. As to its contents we are wholly uninformed—and the grant does not contain the result of the investigation, for contrary to the almost invariable practice, the political status of the grantee is not mentioned.

One other argument urged by the counsel for the claimant remains to be noticed. It is insisted that the "prohibition against foreigners holding lands is not restrictive upon the power of the governor to remove the disability, and a grant by him operates as an enfranchisement." In support of this proposition various cases are cited. 20 Johns. 706; 7 Johns. 290; 9 Johns. 362; 5 Cow. 397; 2 Wend. 133. But the distinction between those cases and the case at bar is obvious. In the decisions referred to, it is held that where the legislature directed a grant to issue to a particular person by name, or to a class of persons of which he was one, and a patent was executed to him in pursuance of the statute, it could not be objected that other and general laws disabled him from taking. The same sovereign authority which created the disability was competent to remove it, and the law authorizing the patent was held to operate as a repeal pro tanto of the previous general laws. In such cases the question is clearly one of intention, not of power. But the governor of California had no similar power. He was a subordinate agent, with powers conferred and limited by law. To say that he had authority to remove a disability created by law is to say that he was above and not subject to the law, and to affirm in effect that a violation of law by an officer of government operates as a repeal of it.

I have thus, in obedience to the injunction of the supreme court, inquired into and scrutinized this case with great care as to the authority of the governor to make the grant, and the bona fides of its exercise.

The result of that inquiry is, that the grantee was a foreigner, and does not appear to have been naturalized; nor is it shown that the express license of the supreme government was obtained. The governor, therefore, had no authority to make the grant.

The claim must be rejected.

NOTE. It will be observed that in the foregoing opinion the question is not presented by counsel, nor discussed by the court, whether a grant by the governor, unapproved by the departmental assembly, vested such a title in the grantee (assuming him to have been capable of taking) as the United States are bound to respect, notwithstanding that the land was not occupied or cultivated before the subversion of the Mexican authority. This point is supposed to have been determined by the supreme court in the case of Fremont v. U. S. [17 How. (58 U. S.) 542], the omission to take possession and fulfil the conditions during the short interval that elapsed between the date of the grant and the acquisition of the country by the United States being considered by the counsel for the United States entirely insufficient to give rise to the presumption of abandonment.

The following note was prepared for insertion in a volume of decisions of this court in land cases which it was proposed to publish. That project having been abandoned, it has been thought convenient to append it to the foregoing opinion. The Case of Cambuston was among the first decided by this court under the authority of Fremont v. U. S., and is believed to present a striking illustration of many of the observations in the annexed note.

The case of Fremont v. U. S., was among the earliest of the cases decided by the United States district court on appeal from the board of commissioners. It was the first in which the supreme court announced the principles by which this class of cases was to be decided. It has, therefore, remained the most important and the leading case on this branch of the law, and has exercised a controlling influence on all subsequent decisions of this court.

As the judgment of the district court was reversed by the supreme court, a fuller exposition of the grounds of that judgment than circumstances then permitted will, it is hoped, not be deemed disrespectful to the supreme court, nor, perhaps, prove uninteresting to the reader.

The authority of the governor of California to grant lands in colonization was derived from the law of 1824, and the regulations of 1828 made by the executive in virtue of the authority conferred by the law.

The first eight articles of those regulations are as follows:

"(1) The governors of the territories are authorized (in compliance with the law of the general congress of the eighteenth of August, 1824, and under the conditions hereafter specified), to grant vacant lands in their respective territories, to contractors (empresarios), families, or private persons, whether Mexicans or foreigners, who may ask for them for the purpose of cultivating or inhabiting them.

"(2) Every person soliciting lands, whether he be an empresario, head of a family, or private person, shall address to the governor of the respective territory, a petition setting forth his name, country, profession, the number, description, religion, and other circumstances of the families, or persons with whom he wishes to colonize, describing, as distinctly as possible, by means of a map, the land asked for.

"(3) The governor shall proceed immediately to obtain the necessary information whether the petition embraces the conditions required by the said law of the eighteenth of August, both as regards the land and the candidate, in order that the petitioner may at once be attended to, or if it be preferred, the respective municipal authority may be consulted, whether there be any objection to making the grant.

"(4) This being done, the governor will accede or not to said petition, in exact conformity to the laws on the subject, and especially the beforementioned one of the eighteenth of August, 1824.

"(5) The grants made to families or private persons, shall not be held to be definitively valid without the previous consent of the territorial deputation, to which end the respective documents (espedientes) shall be forwarded to it.

"(6) When the governor shall not obtain the approbation of the territorial deputation, he shall report to the supreme government, forwarding the necessary documents for its decision.

"(7) The grants made to empresarios for them to colonize with many families, shall not be held to be definitively valid until the approval of the supreme government be obtained, to which the necessary documents must be forwarded, along with the report of the territorial deputation.

"(8) The definitive grant asked for being made, a document signed by the governor shall be given, to serve as a title to the party interested, wherein it must be stated that said grant is made in exact conformity with the provisions of the laws in virtue whereof possession shall be given."

Under the earlier governors, and especially under Figueroa, who appears to have been among the most enlightened of them all, the practice observed in granting lands appears to have been in precise conformity with the requirements of the regulations.

The petition, accompanied by the diseno, was presented, and was referred by a marginal order to the municipal authorities, or other fit persons, for informes as to the qualifications of the petitioner, his means of occupying the land, etc., and also as to the condition of the land, whether vacant or not, and as to its extent.

When the informes were received, the governor decided upon the application. "If he acceded to the petition," he did so by making a short decree, usually called the decree of concession, which was at ached to the petition and informes, and constituted the espediente. The decree of concession usually directed that the espediente should be sent to the most excellent departmental assembly for their approval, but no title paper or documento was as yet delivered to the party interested. It was not until after the assembly had approved the concession, and it had thus become "definitively valid," that the documento or title paper mentioned in the eighth article was delivered "to the party interested to serve as a title." This documento always expressed that it was in conformity with the provisions of the laws; and it contained various conditions, the breach of which subjected the land to "denouncement" by any one who might desire to obtain it for himself.

It would seem from the language of the eighth article that it was only when the concession had thus become definitive, and when the documento had been furnished to the party, that he had the right to apply to the "respective judge" to obtain a judicial measurement and delivery of possession of the land. In one instance, at least, which has fallen under my notice, it appeared that the judicial officer refused to give the possession on the ground that the concession had not been approved, and, on appeal to the governor, the local officer was sustained.

The loose and informal mode of conducting business, the small value of the lands, the infrequency of the meetings of the assembly, and other causes, soon led the governors to depart from the strict course of procedure with respect to concessions of land which Figueroa had observed; and the practice grew up of issuing the final documento, or title paper, immediately upon the making of the decree of concession. A clause was, however, inserted in the title, to the effect that the grant was subject to the approval of the most excellent departmental assembly. The grant was then, in advance of the approval, delivered to the party, and he usually proceeded at once to occupy the land.

It would seem, however, from the instance cited above, that when the point was formally presented to the governor, he did not feel at liberty to direct the judicial possession to be given by the "corresponding judge," until, by the approval of the assembly, the grant had assumed definitive validity

Of the grants so made by the various governors, many were subsequently approved by the assembly. This was done after a reference to a committee of that body, and upon a report by that committee. A resolution of approval was then passed, and a testimonio, or certified copy of the resolution of approval, was furnished to the party interested.

That the assembly did not consider their duties merely formal, is proved by the fact that, in some instances, the extent of the land granted was materially reduced, or rather the concession was approved only to a limited extent. In many cases, however, the espedientes seem never to have been transmitted to the assembly, and many of the ancient inhabitants of the country were found at the conquest in possession of and claiming to own lands by virtue of grants by the governor, unapproved by the departmental assembly.

There were also found in the possession of many persons, grants by the governor for extensive tracts which they had never occupied, nor, as in the case of the grant to Alvarado, perhaps even seen. As the Mexican rule approached the period of its final subversion, when war with the United States was on all sides recognized as impending, and after the rising of the American settlers in the country, known as the "Bear Flag War," had occurred, the governor (Pio Pico) appears to have distributed grants with a lavishness that would justify the suspicion that he hoped to secure to his countrymen, by the pen, the lands he foresaw they were about to be deprived of by the sword.

Under these circumstances, it became a point of vital importance to determine the effect and legal operation of the unapproved grants of the governors of California.

On this point two opposing views were suggested.

(1) It was held by some that the regulations merely provided that the concessions of the governor should not possess definitive validity until approved by the assembly or the supreme government, and that they did not provide that until such approval they should possess no validity whatever; that even when disapproved by the assembly the grant did not fail, but it was then the governor's duty to transmit the espediente to the supreme government for its approval, and the grant remained valid and effective, though not definitively so, until the supreme government had refused to approve it; that the concessions of the governor must, therefore, be deemed to have passed to the grantee a base or determinable fee, liable it is true to be divested by the refusal of both the assembly and the supreme government to approve, but remaining a vested and valid right of property until that contingency occurred. It was therefore contended, that the practice of issuing the grants immediately on making the decree of concession, and subject to the approval of the assembly, was more strictly in accordance with the law than that which obtained under Figueroa; and that the estates so granted, not having been divested by any refusal to approve on the part of the Mexican authorities, must be held valid and indefeasible by the American authorities.

It was also urged that, inasmuch as by the regulations it was the duty of the governor, not of the grantee, to transmit the espediente for approval to the assembly, any omission or neglect of duty in that respect ought not to work an injury to the grantee.

(2) On the other hand, it was maintained that the regulations, by a just and inevitable construction showed that, to make a valid or complete grant, the concurrence of either the assembly or the supreme government was necessary; that the practice under Figueroa was the only practice which could have been adopted in strict conformity with the law; and that grants issued in advance of and subject to the approval of the assembly, were essentially inchoate or imperfect titles; that the application, therefore, of the grantee for a confirmation, was in effect an application to the United States to complete and give definitive validity to a grant which, by Mexican law, was incomplete, and not "definitively valid," and which the United States were at liberty to refuse, unless the grantee could urge equitable considerations in his favor, such as would have bound the conscience of the former government if it had been asked to approve the concession; that these equities were to be found in the fact of the occupation and cultivation of the land, which would justify the grantee in asserting that he had rendered, and the former government received, the consideration upon which, by the policy of the colonization laws, the lands were granted. But where no such fact appeared, and where no settlement had been effected, and whether by the fault or the misfortune of the grantee was immaterial, the United States were at liberty to refuse to confirm and complete the title, defective and incomplete in itself, and in aid of which the claimant could invoke no equities. The last view was that adopted by this court, for reasons, the fallacy of which I am obliged to confess myself to this day unable to perceive. It will be sufficient in this note rather to indicate than to develop or enlarge upon them.

(1) Whatever may be said of the validity which the unapproved grants of the governor may have possessed, it is evident, from the regulations, that the power to grant lands was intended to be vested in the governor concurrently with the assembly, or by and with the consent of that body; that the power of granting the public domain in the territories was not to be exercised at the absolute will of a governor appointed at Mexico, but was to be subject to the approval of the local legislative assembly, and in case of disagreement to the final decision of the supreme government.

To carry out this policy, the only strict and regular mode which could have been adopted was that pursued by Figueroa, whose practice was, as already stated, to decide himself in the first instance on the application, that is, to accede or not to the petition, then to transmit the espediente to the assembly, and to issue the documento or title paper when their approval had been obtained.

But if the governor had authority to grant an estate to an applicant, which could only be divested by the refusal of both the assembly and the supreme government to approve the grant, he could readily have defeated the whole policy of the law, for he had only to omit to send in the espediente for approval. The contingency on which the estate was to be divested could in such case never occur; for until the grant was submitted for their approbation they could have no opportunity to disapprove it.

But that the final title was not to issue until the concession had become definitive, that is, until it had been approved, is clear, from the very terms of the eighth article.

"The definitive grant asked for being made, a document signed by the governor shall be given to serve as a title to the party interested," etc.

It will be observed that this is the only document which, by the regulations, was at any time to be delivered to the party. Up to the time of its reception he might have remained in entire ignorance of the result of his application, and it was only by virtue of this document that judicial possession of the land could be given.

If, then, this document was his only title paper, and if, by law, it ought not to have been issued until the grant had, by approval, become definitive, it follows that no rights legally passed to him by virtue of any action of the governor previous to such approval; and that the delivery of the final documento, in advance of and subject to an approval, could not, in strictness, have vested any estate defeasible or other in the grantee.

It is, of course, not supposed that the action of the governor in acceding to the petition, or making his first decree of concession, was of no effect. It was the performance of a part, and a most important part, of the acts necessary to the execution of a grant of public lands. But it was not all that the law required. And until the concession had been approved it conferred no legal rights, any more than the nomination by the president of an officer to the senate confers, without confirmation by that body, a right to the office.

That it was the governor's duty to transmit the espediente to the assembly, and in case of their disapproval to the supreme government, is admitted.

But that fact serves more clearly to show that until such approval the proceeding remained exclusively in the hands and under the control of the government or granting power. That the applicant was not recognized as having yet acquired any rights, and might even, as before observed, have been ignorant of the action of the government; for otherwise the duty of perfecting his title by the confirmation of the assembly would have been imposed upon the petitioner.

The fact, then, that a grant was not submitted to the assembly is not charged upon the applicant as a fault. It was his misfortune that the proceedings necessary to pass the title were not had. But the circumstance that the governor neglected his duty in this respect can have no effect to impart a validity to the governor's preliminary action, which it would not otherwise possess.

But as the practice of issuing the final title in the first instance had so long and so extensively prevailed in the country, as many ranchos had long been held and occupied under no other title, it seemed just to treat the reception of such a title as constituting an equity, which when followed and consolidated by an occupation and settlement, i. e., the rendering of the consideration contemplated by the colonization laws of Mexico, authorized the claimant to demand a confirmation by the United States.

But where the land had not been occupied, where the claim was founded solely on the fact that a title, unapproved by the assembly, had been delivered to the party, I was of opinion that he had no right to demand that this government should complete and make definitive that which the former government had left incomplete and inchoate.

The same conclusion was reached by another course of reasoning.

(2) It cannot be denied that the assembly and the supreme government possessed the right to avoid, by refusing to approve, the act of the governor in making the concession. This was a sovereign and a proprietary right expressly reserved to them by the law, and by the terms of the document delivered to the party.

This right passed to the United States by the conquest, and could justly have been exercised in all cases where the Mexican authorities, had their government not been subverted, would have been at liberty to do so, i. e., where no equitable circumstances existed sufficient to bind the conscience of that government.

If, then, the Mexican government had found itself in the same condition as that in which the United States were placed; if lands which had been distributed by the league as almost without value had suddenly commanded enormously increased prices; if an immense immigration had set in of other Mexican citizens, who asked for and were willing to buy tracts of only one hundred and sixty acres instead of eleven square leagues; if the possession of such immense estates by single individuals had become contrary to the policy of her laws, the genius and habits of her citizens, and inconsistent with the rapid development of the resources of the country; if all these circumstances had existed, it may be declared with some confidence, that Mexico would have felt it to be not merely her right but her duty to exercise the power expressly reserved to her of avoiding the concessions of the governor, by refusing to approve them, in all cases where the grantee could allege no solid equities in his favor.

If, then, she had avowed her willingness to confirm and approve all such grants whenever on the faith of them the grantee had actually occupied and settled upon the land,—that is, whenever he could show that the government had received the consideration which the policy of the former laws had required,—it seemed to me that she would have done all that could have been claimed or expected from either her justice or her generosity.

The United States, succeeding to the rights and duties of Mexico, was at liberty to assume the same position, and had a right to demand, when called upon to recognize or confirm an unapproved grant, that the claimant should show occupation and cultivation of the land; not to avoid a forfeiture, as for breach of conditions subsequent in the grant, but as an indispensable part of the equities on which he could rely for a confirmation.

It was for these reasons that I considered that in all cases evidence of the fulfilment of the conditions of occupation and cultivation was indispensable, and that as occupation and cultivation constituted an essential element of the equities on which alone the claimant could base his application, no excuses for its omission, or explanation of the obstacles which prevented it, could be received; for the inquiry was not whether by neglect he had forfeited a vested right, but whether by performing certain acts he had acquired one, or, in other words, whether any equitable circumstances existed which bound the conscience of this government to confirm and complete the title.

Under this view, the questions presented under the Mexican colonization laws bore a close analogy to those debated and decided in the Louisiana and Florida cases, in which it was held by the supreme court that the performance of the conditions constituted the chief ground of the claimant's equity. The decisions of that court in those cases I therefore considered as affording a guide and imposing a rule for the determination of land cases in California, and as the later decisions in the cases of U. S. v. Boisdore [11 How. (52 U. S.) 63], De Vilemont v. U. S. [13 How. (54 U. S.) 261], Glenn v. U. S. [Id. 250], etc., had rigorously required the exact fulfilment of the conditions, I feel obliged, reluctantly, to follow them; and in the Case of Cervantes [Case No. 14,768], to demand an occupation and settlement within the time limited in the grant—a decision apparently harsh and illiberal, but which, under the pressure of the later decisions of the supreme court, I thought myself compelled to make. But in the case of Fremont, I entertained no doubt. Alvarado, the original grantee, had not only never occupied, but, so far as appeared, had never even seen, the land for which he obtained a concession; and the obstacles which prevented a settlement existed at the time he applied for and procured the concession, and when he assumed the implied obligation to occupy and cultivate the land.

This land, unavailable and almost worthless under the Mexican government, had, chiefly in consequence of the American occupation, assumed an enormous value. It seemed to me, therefore, clear that the United States were in that case justified in refusing to recognize and perfect a claim in support of which the claimant could urge no other fact than the possession of a title-paper signed by the governor, but unapproved by the assembly or the supreme government.

But the supreme court overruled this decision. In its opinion, that tribunal seems to have adopted a view not precisely in accordance with either of those stated in this note.

It regarded the grant to Alvarado "as having given him a vested interest in the quantity of land therein specified;" but it proceeded to inquire "whether there was any breach of the conditions annexed to it, during the continuance of the Mexican authority, which forfeited his right and revested the title in the government." Fremont v. U. S., 17 How. [58 U. S.] 560.

To determine this point, the supreme court further proceeded to inquire, whether there had been such unreasonable delay or want of effort on the part of Alvarado to fulfil as would justify the presumption that he had abandoned his claim before the Mexican power ceased to exist. The court then considered the various obstacles which had prevented a settlement, and the efforts made to effect one; and finding no unreasonable delay or neglect on the part of the grantee, confirmed the claim.

The language of the supreme court is not explicit as to the important point whether it regarded the unapproved grant of the governor as vesting a legal estate, liable to be divested by breach of conditions subsequent, or as passing merely an equitable interest which the United States were bound to respect, unless forfeited by unreasonable neglect to fulfil the conditions.

On the true construction of the opinion of the supreme court, in this respect, much diversity of opinion has prevailed. If the grant to Alvarado had been approved by the assembly, and had thus become complete and definitive by the concurrence of all the granting powers necessary to its execution, the conditions would have remained conditions subsequent, the breach of which would not forfeit the estate, but would have merely rendered it liable to denouncement—a formal proceeding or mode of enforcing a forfeiture well known to the Mexican law. But if no such proceeding had been taken, and the fee remained in the grantee, undivested by any act of the Mexican authorities, it would seem that the courts of the United States could have no power to inquire into and declare forfeitures which had accrued under the former government.

But inasmuch as the supreme court did enter into the inquiry whether the grantee had forfeited his rights by delay or neglect, in its judgment, unreasonable, it may be inferred that the court must have regarded the estate or interest vested in the grantee as an equitable interest, liable to be divested by unreasonable delays or neglects, which might constitute an equitable forfeiture.

But whatever may have been the views of the supreme court on this question, the practical result of the decision was most important. For under it, every claim for which a title-paper signed by the governor was exhibited was to be confirmed, unless the United States could show that there had been such unreasonable delay or neglect to fulfil the conditions as would create the presumption of an abandonment.

The views previously taken by this court had been commended to it, not more by their supposed technical accuracy than by considerations of their policy and practical advantage.

In deciding upon the genuineness of any claim to land under Mexican grants, the most, if not the only, satisfactory evidence which can be offered, is that furnished by the archives and afforded by the notorious possession and claim of ownership under the former government.

But, under the decision of the supreme court, I found myself unable practically to apply this latter test; for it was always easy, in cases of fraudulent or antedated grants, to locate the land in districts where it could readily be shown that Indian hostilities presented an insuperable obstacle to a settlement, and by parol proof of this fact and of some efforts or attempts at a settlement by the pretended grantee, to make the case precisely analogous to that of Fremont.

But this was not the most important practical consequence of the decision. A greater part of the grants by Pio Pico, which have obtained the sobriquet of "eleventh-hour grants," were executed but a few months before the final subversion of the Mexican authority. The grantees, in many instances, had not seen the land, and had never taken any steps to effect its settlement. Unapproved by the assembly, issued with evident signs of haste if not carelessness, never occupied or cultivated, they seemed to possess less equities than almost any other. But these grants were precisely those with regard to which the court could not declare that they had been forfeited by abandonment.

The distracted condition of the country, and the impracticability of occupying the land, could always be alleged in excuse for the omission to do so. And independently of such excuses, it seemed impossible to presume an intention to abandon, from a neglect of a few months, when the customary period allowed for the purpose was one year.

The difficulty, therefore, of declaring the grant forfeited by abandonment increased in proportion to the shortness of the interval between its execution and the conquest of the country. And thus those grants, issued under the circumstances which have been mentioned, and which seemed more than all others destitute of real equities, were the most secure from the operation of the principle announced in the Case of Fremont.

The book of Toma de Razon, for 1846, having been lost, and it being possible that the espediente in a particular case had met the same fate, the absence of archive testimony could not be regarded as conclusive evidence of the spuriousness of the title; and parol testimony, which it was not easy to contradict, however much it might be distrusted, was generally at hand to afford the requisite secondary proof of the contents of the lost espediente.

As proof of occupation could not be exacted, the court felt obliged to confirm these titles on proofs which amounted to little more than the verification of the signatures of the officers who executed them.

This result might, it is true, have been avoided by inquiring into the bona fides of the exercise of his authority by the governor. But an attempt to ascertain the motives of an officer, when performing an official act admitted to be legally within the limits of his authority, would in most cases prove abortive and unsatisfactory, and the conclusion reached would often be of too speculative and conjectural a character to form the basis of a judicial determination. For these reasons, it seemed to this court, when these cases were first brought before it, clear, that as a matter of law, as well as on the grounds of policy, and as a means of preventing frauds, evidence of occupation and cultivation should in all cases be exacted, where a claim was made under a grant by the governor, unapproved by the departmental assembly.

Case No. 14,714.

UNITED STATES v. CAMPBELL et al.

[4 Cranch. C. C. 658.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

WITNESS—ONE JOINTLY INDICTED—ACQUITTAL.

If two be jointly indicted for robbery, and if one be acquitted, and the other convicted, the latter may have a new trial without the other, who may be examined as a witness upon the new trial.

John Campbell and Thomas Turner were jointly indicted for the robbery of Mrs. Queen. Turner was acquitted, but Campbell was convicted, and moved for a new trial on the ground that Turner was now a good witness for Campbell, and that other evidence also had been discovered. A doubt was suggested whether a new trial could be granted to one without setting aside the verdict as to the other also, but upon the authority of Mawbey's Case, 6 Term R. 619–640, and 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 659, 660.

THE COURT (nem. con.) granted Campbell a new trial, without disturbing the verdict as to Turner, and permitted Turner to be examined as a witness for Campbell, who was thereupon acquitted also.

UNITED STATES (CAMPBELL v.). See Case No. 2,373.

Case No. 14,715.

UNITED STATES v. CANAL BANK.

[3 Story, 79; [1] 7 Law Rep. 88.]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1844.

UNITED STATES—PRIORITY—DEEDS—RECORD—ATTACHMENT.

1. The United States have no such priority over other creditors of their debtors, as to entitle them to a prior satisfaction, by attachment and levy, over prior attaching creditors.

[Cited in U. S. v. Griswold, 8 Fed. 501; Bush v. U. S., 14 Fed. 323.]

2. In Massachusetts and Maine, a creditor, attaching real estate, can hold the same against a person purchasing prior to the attachment, but whose deed is not recorded until after the attachment; provided the attaching creditor has no notice of the deed, at the time of the attachment.

3. The United States, by attachment and levy of execution upon real estate, do not acquire any better title to the same, than the debtor himself had.

4. B. attached certain land, as the property of C., on October 4, 1839, and levied an execution thereon, on November 11, 1840. C. conveyed the same land to H. by deed, prior to the attachment, but the deed was not recorded until October 26, 1839, and B. had no notice thereof, prior to that time. The United States recovered judgment against C. and H. on duty bonds, subsequent to October, 1839, and levied their execution on the same premises, prior to November 11, 1840, "as the estate of any or all the debtors." It was held, that the United States were not entitled to a priority against B.

This was a writ of entry, on the plaintiffs' own seisin, wherein they demanded of the defendants seisin and possession of certain premises, situated in Portland, Maine, described in the writ. It appeared, from the agreed statement of facts, that on the 24th of October, 1839, the present defendants attached certain real estate, of which the demanded premises composed a part, on a writ against James C. Churchill and Caleb S. Carter. Having obtained judgment, the present defendants caused their execution to be duly levied thereon, November 11, 1840, agreeably to the laws of Maine. It also appeared, that on the —— day of October, 1839, Churchill, and Churchill and Carter, conveyed the demanded premises, by certain deeds, to Noah Hinkley; but the deeds were not recorded, nor their existence known to the present defendants, until October 26, 1839, and no change of possession of the premises had taken place. It further appeared, that the plaintiffs, after the attachments before mentioned, commenced suits against the said Churchill, Carter and Hinkley, on duty bonds, falling due subsequent to the attachments before mentioned; that they recovered judgment, and caused their executions, issued thereon, to be levied on a part of the demanded premises, "as the estate of any or all the debtors," prior to the levy of the defendants' executions before mentioned.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

It was agreed, that the conveyances from Churchill, and Churchill and Carter, to Hinkley, were not an assignment and transfer of all their property, and that they never made a general assignment of all their property, until long after that transaction, when they did so under the provisions of the bankrupt law, in 1842. If, upon these facts, the plaintiffs could maintain this action, judgment was to be entered in their favor, for that part of the demanded premises included in their levy; otherwise, judgment was to be rendered for the defendants.

Parks, Dist. Atty., for the United States.
Mr. Goodenow, for the tenants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Upon this statement of the facts, several questions have been suggested. In the first place, whether the United States have any priority, or privilege, in respect to the debts due to them by their debtors, over the debts due to private persons, so as to entitle them to a prior satisfaction, upon any judgments obtained against their debtors, out of the property attached, before other attaching creditors, whose attachments are of an earlier date. In my judgment they have not. It has long since been settled, by the solemn adjudications of the supreme court, that the United States do not possess any general right of priority or privilege over private creditors, for the satisfaction of the debts due to them, founded upon any general prerogative, belonging to the government in its sovereign capacity; but that all the priority or privilege, which the government is at liberty to assert, is or must be founded upon some statute, passed by congress, in virtue of its constitutional authority. This was expressly so held in U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 358, 396, and the doctrine has ever since been strictly adhered to. U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 73; Prince v. Bartlett, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 431; Thelleson v. Smith, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 396; U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108; Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 387. It is not here, as it is in England, where the sovereign is entitled, in virtue of his prerogative, to a priority over private creditors, for satisfaction of the debts due to the crown. Com. Dig. "Prerogative," D, 86; Id. "Debt," G, 8, G, 9. Four classes of cases only are provided for by Act March 3, 1797, c. 74, § 5 [1 Story's Laws, 465; 1 Stat. 515]; and the same are in substance re-enacted in the revenue collection act of 1799 (chapter 128, § 65 [1 Story's Laws, 630; 1 Stat. 676]. First, cases where the estate and effects of any deceased debtor in the hands of his executors or administrators, are insufficient to pay his debts. Secondly, cases where the debtor, not having property sufficient to pay all his just debts, has made a voluntary assignment thereof for the benefit of his creditors. Thirdly, cases where the estate and effects of an absconding, concealed, or absent debtor, have been attached by process of law. And, fourthly, cases where the debtor has committed a legal act of bankruptcy. The debtors, in the present case, do not fall within either of these predicaments. But the case of Prince v. Bartlett, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 431, is directly in point, to the very case of conflicting attachments; and decides, that in such a case the private creditor, having the prior attachment on the property, is entitled to a preference over the subsequent attachment of the United States.

In the next place, the question arises, whether an attaching creditor is entitled to satisfaction, out of the real estate of his debtor, against a bona fide purchaser of the same estate, for a valuable consideration, without notice, whose deed is not recorded in the registry of deeds, until after the attachment is made. As an original question, I should have entertained very great doubts, whether the attaching creditor had any such right; at least, unless the purchaser fraudulently, or by gross negligence, withholds his deed from being recorded until after the attachment, and thereby designedly misleads, or actually injures the other creditors of the debtor. My opinion upon this subject, independent of authority, would be, that an attaching creditor, in all cases, except cases of such fraud, or gross negligence, can entitle himself only to the same interests and rights in the estates attached, as the debtor himself has, or would have, at the time of the attachment, against the purchaser. But I understand that, under the local laws of Massachusetts and Maine, (which upon this subject are the same,) it has been held, that the attaching creditor is entitled to a prior satisfaction, out of the real estate attached, if he has not, at the time of the attachment, any notice of the prior unrecorded deed; or if the purchaser has not, with all reasonable diligence procured his deed to be recorded. See Farnsworth v. Childs, 4 Mass. 637; Davis v. Blunt, 6 Mass. 487; Prescott v. Heard, 10 Mass. 60; Priest v. Rice, 1 Pick. 164; Cushing v. Hurd, 4 Pick. 253. See, also, Briggs v. French [Case No. 1,871]; Stanley v. Perley, 5 Greenl. 369. In the present case, it is not suggested, that Hinkley's deed might not, with reasonable diligence, have been recorded, before the attachment of the tenants was made. Following, therefore, the local decisions upon this subject, which, as a rule of real property, governing many titles in the state, and also as a construction of the nature and operation of local statutes, ought, in my judgment, to be followed, I have no difficulty in saying, that the attachment of the tenants has a priority over the conveyances to Hinkley.

Then, in the next and last place, does it make any difference, that the United States are attaching creditors of Hinkley, and have levied their execution upon the demanded premises? In my opinion it does not. Generally speaking, an attaching creditor is deemed to be in the same situation as a second purchaser, according to the decisions in Massachusetts and Maine; and we all know, that a second purchaser is not affected with the title of any third persons in the property, of which he has no notice. In the present case, Hinkley's title was subordinate to that of the tenants, under their prior attachment, and the United States can properly claim, against the tenants, the same rights only that Hinkley himself might claim; for the title of the United States is but a derivative title under Hinkley. The case is not like that of Coffin v. Ray, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 212, where the grantee, under whom the attaching creditor claimed, had notice of the unregistered deed of a prior grantee, and the court held, that as the attaching creditor had no notice of such prior deed at the time of his attachment, although he had before the levy of the execution, he was entitled to hold against the grantee of such prior deed. Here, the United States, at the time of their attachment, either knew, or might have known, of the prior attachment of the defendants, and that Hinkley's deed was not, at that time, recorded. But whether the United States did know, or might have known, of the prior attachment of the tenants, or not, is immaterial, since such knowledge in Hinkley could not have given validity to his title, against the prior attachment of the tenants. And if the United States are to be treated as purchasers at all, they must be treated as purchasers of all Hinkley's rights in the premises, subject to the prior incumbrances thereon. The case of Coffin v. Ray, supra, certainly goes very far, and places the attaching creditor in a better situation, than that of the grantee, under whom he claims title. But it is distinguishable from the present case in the material circumstances, that in that case, the notice created a mere personal equity, affecting the grantee alone, and thus would deprive him of the right to set up his title, as a bona fide purchaser, without notice, against the prior grantee; whereas, in the present case, the attaching creditor, by his prior attachment, acquired a right in rem, and no personal equity whatsoever applies to him, founded upon notice of Hinkley's deed, of which the United States could avail themselves.

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Nov. 22, 1867.

APPEAL—FINAL DECREE—WAR—PROHIBITION OF COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE—SEIZURE OF GOLD COIN.

[1. Certain merchandise, together with some gold coin, was seized during a period of insurrection and libeled for condemnation, as about to be transported into the enemy's country. A decree was entered by which the merchandise was condemned and ordered to be sold. The court, in delivering its opinion, stated that the gold could not be condemned, and the decree directed that it should be deposited in the registry, to await further orders. Over two years later, on the petition of a claimant, the gold was ordered to be paid over to him. Held, that the original decree was not final in respect to the gold, and that, consequently, an appeal from the subsequent order might be taken, notwithstanding the fact that more than two years had elapsed since the date of the former decree.]

[2. The act of July 13, 1861, providing for the forfeiture of all "goods and chattels, wares and merchandise" coming from, or proceeding to, the insurrectionary districts, includes gold coin.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.]

CHASE, Circuit Justice. This cause comes before us on appeal from the district court. The libel charges that a canoe called the "Lapwing," with a lot of goods and chattels, consisting of two canvas sails, seven barrels of borax, and seven hundred and seventy dollars in gold, was, on or about the 20th of July, 1862, proceeding from parts of the United States not in insurrection to a part of Virginia which was in insurrection, and that the canoe and cargo including the gold, were seized by the proper officers for the violation of the act of July 13, 1861 [supra], and the act of May 20, 1862 [12 Stat. 404], prohibiting commercial intercourse between the loyal and rebel states, and thereupon the libel brought for condemnation. No claim was put in on the hearing below for any part of the property seized.

The first decree of the district court recites the facts proved. From this recital it appears that the canoe, with the borax on board, was found lying in a creek in St. Mary's county, in Maryland, and seized on behalf of the United States by a party of cavalry. No person was on board the canoe, but in the woods at a little distance, a man was captured who admitted that he was the owner of the canoe and cargo; that he was a physician residing in Virginia, and that he intended to take the borax to Virginia for sale. The gold was found upon his person. Upon these facts the district court expressed the opinion that all the property except the gold was liable to condemnation, but that the gold was not so liable, and thereupon at the March term, 1864, a decree was made condemning the canoe, the borax and the canvas sails, and directing that the gold be deposited in the registry to await further orders. The decree further directed the sale of the property condemned and the deposit of the proceeds, after payment of costs, in the registry to await further orders. Subsequently in June, 1866, Daniel W. Vowles presented a petition claiming to be the person from whom the gold was taken, and praying an order that it should be paid over to him. The identity of the claimant was admitted, and an order was made for the payment of the money agreeably to his prayer. From this order the United States appealed.

The record does not exhibit the evidence upon which the district court acted, but counsel on both sides admit the correctness of the statement of facts made by the district judge. It is also admitted by the appellee, and this admission is the only evidence before us in addition to what was before the district court, that the gold seized upon his person, along with himself was proceeding to an insurrectionary state without a legal permit.

This is the case, and the first question arises upon a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the decree at the March term, 1864, was final, and was not appealed from within the time allowed by law. If this be so, the present appeal must, without doubt, be dismissed. But was the decree of March term, 1864, a final decree as to the gold? It is true that the learned district judge in his opinion stated quite distinctly that in his judgment the gold could not be condemned. But the decree makes no final order concerning it. On the contrary its direction is that the gold be deposited in the registry to await final order. We cannot doubt that after this order it was quite competent for the district court, had the judge changed his opinion, to make an order condemning the gold and directing its payment into the national treasury either directly or after conversion into national currency by sale. There can be no final decree concerning a fund which remains in the custody of a court subject to further orders except one which terminates that custody. The only final decree in this case therefore relating to the gold was that made upon the petition of Vowles, and directing its payment to him. It is not questioned that the appeal from this final order was in time. The motion to dismiss must therefore be overruled.

This brings us to the merits of the controversy. The fifth section of the act for the collection of duties and for other purposes, approved July 13, 1861, prohibits all commercial intercourse between the citizens of states and parts of states in insurrection, and citizens of other parts of the United States, and provides that "all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise" "coming from" an insurgent state or "proceeding to" such state "by land or water" shall be "forfeited to the United States," unless protected by the license or permission provided for in the act. It is clear upon the evidence that the gold was "proceeding to" an insurgent state; indeed the fact is expressly admitted. The only question before us therefore is, do the words "goods and chattels, wares and merchandise" include gold coin? Now, nothing can be more certain than that in general these words do include money, whether of gold or of any other kind. Bouv. Law Dict. 224. The word "goods" has the same signification as the word "bona" in the civil law, under which name (Wheaton's Law Lexicon, 441) is comprehended almost every species of personal property. Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 13. It is true that according to some authorities money cannot be taken in execution upon a fieri facias against the goods and chattels of a judgment debtor; but the reason is, not that money is not included under the ordinary sense of the words "goods and chattels," but that it is not vendible. Lord Mansfield called this "a quaint reason" (Doug. 231), and it deserves a harder name. The contrary doctrine is expressly declared by the supreme court of the United States in Turner v. Kendall, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 133. There is, to be sure, a citation by Mr. Justice Story in Citizen's Bank v. Nantucket Steamboat Co. [Case No. 2,730], of a case from 1 Carr. & P. 310, to the effect that an indictment for embezzlement of money alleged to be the money of certain directors vested by statute "with all the goods, chattels, furniture, clothing, and debts" of the corporation was not sustained by proof that the money belonged to the corporation, for the reason that the words "goods and chattels" did not include money. But on referring to the book I do not find that the point was passed upon by the court. It was only made by counsel and reserved with other points by Baron Parke for decision by the twelve judges, and the case was finally adjudged (1 Moody, Crown Cas. 15) on one of the other points without the expression of any opinion on the question supposed by Judge Story to have been decided. It is possible that the learned judge did not examine the case. He cited it by a wrong name, Rex v. Burrell. That Mr. Justice Story did not himself adopt the doctrine that "goods" do not include money is apparent from the case of U. S. v. Moulton [Case No. 15,827]. In that case he held expressly that "personal goods" include not only coin but bank notes. The same doctrine was affirmed in U. S. v. Murray [Id. 15,842].

On the whole it seems clear upon authority and upon sound reason that the prohibition in the act of congress extended to coin. It were strange indeed, if an act, intended to prevent all unlicensed commercial intercourse between the loyal and the insurgent parts of the country permitted the unrestricted carrying of coin, the chief instrument of such commerce, to the latter from the former. No such construction of the act can be allowed unless required by clear words. And the mode of conveyance cannot affect the legal consequences of the fact. The most valuable goods are very often carried upon the person, especially when the object is to elude the vigilance of guards and officers, or to escape the consequences of being engaged in prohibited traffic. Daily experience during the late Civil War then illustrated and daily experience in the revenue service now illustrates the truth of this observation.

It has already been observed that it is part of the case here, not so clearly if at all established in the district court, that the gold coin in question was proceeding to a part of Virginia then in insurrection. A decree must therefore be made condemning it as forfeited to the United States.

Case No. 14,719.

UNITED STATES v. CANTER et al.

[2 Bond, 389.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1870.

ELECTIVE FRANCHISE — CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT—NEGROES—INTERFERENCE WITH VOTERS.

1. The amendment to the constitution of the United States, securing to all persons born here all the rights of citizenship, is now in full force and valid as a part of the constitution, and includes the African race.

2. The right of suffrage is included in the guaranty of the constitutional amendment.

3. Section 4 of the act of congress of May 31, 1870 [16 Stat. 141], prohibits and punishes all interference in the exercise of the right of voting, by threats, intimidation, or violence, which hinders or prevents the free exercise of the right.

4. The acts and conduct of the defendant, Lewis Canter, as proved, are within the scope and operation of said section 4.

5. Individual views, adverse to the policy of the extension of the right of suffrage as provided for in the constitutional amendments, should have no influence with the jury, as the act of congress, under which the indictment is framed, is a valid act, passed in pursuance of the constitution, and obligatory upon every citizen.

At law.

Lewis H. Bond, for the United States.
Cassius K. Brenneman, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). The defendants, Lewis Canter and Henry Canter, father and son, are jointly indicted for a violation of the act of congress of May 31, 1870 [supra], securing to all persons, entitled by law to the right of voting at elections, the peaceful and unobstructed exercise of that right There are three counts in the indictment. The first charges that at the annual election held in Washington township, Lawrence county, Ohio, on October 11, 1870, the defendants, by threats, violence, and intimidation, hindered and prevented one Jacob Stuart from voting. The second count is similar to the first, with the exception that it is alleged said Stuart and one Jupiter Wilson were prevented from voting at said election by the same means averred in the first count. The third count charges an attempt to hinder and prevent the persons named from voting.

The indictment is framed under section 4 of the act of congress before referred to, which, in substance, provides that any person who, by bribery, threats, intimidation, or violence, shall hinder or prevent any qualified voter from the exercise of that right, shall be subject to punishment by fine or imprisonment. Several witnesses have been sworn, whose testimony in detail I shall not detain the jury by reciting. It is claimed that the evidence shows that Jacob Stuart and Jupiter Wilson both colored men of the African race, went to the place of voting at the election in Washington township, Lawrence county, Ohio, on October 11, 1870, for the purpose of voting for state and county officers, and also for a representative in congress for the district in which Washington township was situated; that there was a crowd about the place of voting, and as the two colored men approached the place, there were loud and violent words used to the effect that they would not be allowed to vote, and that the defendant, Lewis Canter, said to them they need not go to the polls, for no colored man should vote; that he would die first, and would cut the heart out of any one who would protect them. And that intimidated by the violence and threats used, the colored men were prevented from voting, and retired peaceably from the place. There can be no doubt that, if such is the evidence before you, it brings the defendant, Lewis Canter, within the scope and terms of the act of congress referred to. If his conduct, and the words used by him, did intimidate the colored men, and hindered and prevented them from voting, it was the precise result which it was the intent of the law to prevent. As to the defendant, Henry Canter, the son, though in company with his father, there is no evidence implicating him in the use of any words, or as guilty of any act subjecting him to the penalty of the law; and as to him it will be the duty of the jury to return a verdict of not guilty.

In commiting this case to the jury, I have only to remark that the act of congress of May, 1870, under which this indictment is framed, was enacted to carry into effect a recent amendment of the constitution of the United States, guarantying to all native-born male persons the full rights of citizenship, irrespective of race, color, or previous condition. This implies obviously the right of suffrage and includes clearly the African race, though not specially named in the constitutional amendment referred to. To secure to all persons their rights under the amendment, the legislation of congress was expedient and necessary; and that body had an undoubted right to pass the act of May 31, 1870. The clause on which this indictment is based, in the most explicit terms, prohibits and punishes all interference with the exercise of the right of voting by all persons entitled to that right, which in its effect hinders or prevents its free and unobstructed enjoyment. The persons named in the indictment as having been prevented from voting through the violence and threats of one of the defendants, though colored persons, had an undoubted right to vote at the election referred to; and if the jury find from the evidence that they were hindered or prevented from voting by the defendant and by the means averred in the indictment, they will have no hesitancy in returning a verdict against him.

I will here take occasion to remark that whatever may be our individual views as to the policy and expediency of the extension of the right of suffrage resulting from the constitutional amendment adverted to, it is now a part of the constitution, and all laws passed in pursuance of it are obligatory upon every citizen. It must be admitted that the guaranty of the right of citizenship to all not disfranchised by crime, is in strict accordance with the great principles which underlie our free republican government. And there is good reason to hope that the experiment will work auspiciously to the promotion of the stability and success of our free institutions. If there is a race among us, who, from the adverse circumstances with which, without their fault, they have been heretofore surrounded, may not be now fitted for the enlightened exercise of all the rights of citizenship, there are good reasons for the hope that the bestowment of these rights will stimulate them to such efforts in the acquirement of knowledge and intelligence, as will result in their moral and intellectual elevation, and qualify them fully for the right discharge of all their duties and obligations as free and independent members and citizens of our country.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty as to Henry Canter, and guilty as to Lewis Canter; and the latter was sentenced to six months' imprisonment in the jail of Lawrence county.

Case No. 14,720.

UNITED STATES v. CARBERY et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 358.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1822.

ELECTIONS—COMMISSIONERS OF ELECTION—VOTES—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. The election of a mayor of the city of Washington must be held in each ward by three commissioners of election. If the three are present the acts of the majority are, in law, the acts of the three. The return of two is sufficient, if the three were present The return of the commissioners is not conclusive, but is prima facie evidence that the votes were good, and throws the burden of proof on the relator to show that bad votes were given for the incumbent. If the election be held by two commissioners only, in any of the wards, the whole election is void.

2. A certificate of the result of the election must be returned by the commissioners to the boards of aldermen and common council. Parol evidence is competent to show that all the commissioners were present.

A writ of mandamus nisi, was obtained by Mr. Roger C. Weightman, one of the candidates for the office of mayor of Washington at the late election, held on the first Monday in June, 1822, against Mr. Thomas Carbery, who had been returned as duly elected; and against the commissioners of election; commanding the said Thomas Carbery immediately to cease and forbear to hold, claim, or execute, the place, or office of mayor, and to admit the said Roger C. Weightman into the said place and office; and commanding the said commissioners to return him as mayor of the said city duly elected at the said election, or show cause to the contrary. To this writ there was a special return, concluding with an averment that the said Thomas Carbery was duly elected mayor, &c., and that the said R. C. Weightman was not. Upon this traverse, an issue was joined; which came on to be tried on the 2d of January, 1823.

Mr. Jones, for relator, contended, 1st, that the return of the election of mayor must, under the 3d section of the charter of 1820 (3 Stat. 583), be made by all the commissioners of election. A return by part of them is insufficient. It is different in the case of the election of members of the boards of aldermen and common council; for by the 6th section the return by a majority, as to their election, is expressly authorized. 2d. That the election must be holden by three commissioners in each ward; although a return by two should be deemed sufficient. All must be present acting, or ready to act; and this must appear by their return. Parol evidence is not competent to prove that fact. The return of the first ward is by two of the commissioners only; and they do not certify, that they are a majority. If one of the commissioners is present and refuses to act, there are in law only two present. The reason for having three present, is, that all questions may be promptly decided. The general principle that in corporations aggregate, the act of a majority is the act of all, does not apply to the commissioners of election. They have only a joint power.

Mr. Swann and Mr. Ashton, for respondents. The return by a majority is sufficient; and it is competent to show by parol evidence that all the commissioners were present, and that those who made the return were a majority. In all cases of a public nature, and where the power is given for the public good, the act of the majority is the act of all. Green v. Miller, 6 Johns. 39, 41; Grindley v. Barker, 1 Bos. & P. 229; Rex v. Beeston, 3 Term R. 592; Withnell v. Gartham, 6 Term R. 388; Vin. Abr. tit. "Authority," p. 418, § 6; Co. Litt. 181b. Suppose one of the commissioners should be taken suddenly ill, or should die, or seeing that the election was going against his wishes, should retire, or refuse to act—would the whole election be void?

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

This surely could not be the intention of the legislature. In the case of corporations aggregate, it is not necessary that all should be present, if all had notice.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) decided, 1st. That it was competent to give parol evidence to show that the whole number of commissioners were present at the election in the First ward. 2d. That the election in each ward must be holden by three commissioners. 3d. That if the three commissioners were present, the acts of the majority were in law the acts of the three. 4th. That the return of two is sufficient if the three were present.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Key, for relator, then offered evidence to show that votes had been given, for Mr. Carbery, by unqualified voters.

Mr. Swann and Mr. Ashton objected, and contended that the several returns of the ward commissioners is conclusive on that point, they being the sole judges of the qualifications of the electors; and as the choice is required to be by ballot, no voter can be compelled to disclose for whom he voted. No power is given, by the charter, to any person or tribunal to decide upon the election of mayor. The boards of aldermen and common council have the sole and exclusive right, by the 6th section of the charter, to "judge of the legality of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their own members," but not of the mayor. By the 3d section the commissioners are to certify to the boards of aldermen and common council "the result of the election of mayor;" in order to do which, they must decide upon the qualification of the voters at the time of voting. It is not necessary that the certificate of the election of the mayor should be the joint act of all the eighteen commissioners of election. If each set of commissioners of the several wards, respectively certify the number of votes taken in their respective wards, it is equivalent to a certificate of the result of the election by the eighteen commissioners; for if the number of votes in each ward is ascertained, the result of the election is that he is chosen who has the greatest number of votes. It is not necessary that the result should be certified by the commissioners where they have certified the facts from which that result must necessarily follow. The return of the commissioners as to the election of mayor is to be made in the same manner as that for the election of the members of the boards of aldermen and common council; that is, "the commissioners for each ward, or a majority of them, shall count the ballots, and make out, under their hands and seals, a correct return of the persons having the greatest number of legal votes," "together with the number of votes given to each person voted for." In order to do this they must necessarily decide upon the legality of the votes. This court has no jurisdiction to decide upon the validity of the election.

Mr. Jones. The jurisdiction of this court is general, and is unlimited by the subject-matter. It has an inherent jurisdiction to compel all the corporations in the district to do their duty. In this respect there is no difference between the corporation of Washington and the banks and insurance companies. This court has compelled the Bank of Alexandria to open its subscription; has set aside the election of the officers of the Union Bank of Alexandria, and of the Columbian Insurance Company. The commissioners have no authority to judge of the qualification of the electors. By the 5th section of the charter, the register of the city is to furnish the commissioners with "a list of the persons having a right to vote." The register, therefore, and not the commissioners, is to judge of the qualifications of the voters. The boards of aldermen and common council have the exclusive right of judging of the election of members of their own bodies, and consequently of the qualifications of the electors; and the mayor is to be chosen by the same electors. No power is anywhere given to the commissioners upon that subject. They are to receive the votes of such voters as are on the register's list.

Mr. Key, on the same side, cited Johnston v. Corporation of Charleston, 1 Bay, 441; Brosius v. Reuter, 1 Har. & J. 557, 558.

Mr. Swann, contra, cited Symmers v. Regem, Cowp. 498.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) said that the return of the commissioners was not conclusive, but was prima facie evidence that the votes were good, and threw the burden of proof on the relator to show that bad votes were given for the incumbent.

THE COURT also decided that the return from the 5th ward was void because the election was holden by two only of the three commissioners; and that the whole election was void for that reason; as well as because no certificate of "the result of the election of mayor" was ever returned by the commissioners to the board of aldermen and board of common council, agreeably to the 3d section of the charter.

Notwithstanding this opinion of the court the jury found a general verdict "for the defendants," thereby, in effect, affirming the election to be valid.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) ordered a new trial to be had at the present term, without costs. The issues were informal, there being a double traverse, namely, the election of Mr. Weightman traversed by Mr. Carbery; and that of Mr. Carbery by Mr. Weightman.

The new trial came on, January 8, 1823, when Mr. Swann, to show that upon a mandamus the defendant cannot be amoved unless for the purpose of admitting the relator, cited Rex v. Mayor of Colchester, 2 Term R. 259; Rex v. Bishop of Chester, 1 Term R. 396; Geter v. Commissioners for Tobacco Inspection, 1 Bay, 356.

THE COURT gave the same instructions to the jury as upon the former trial; and added, further, that upon the evidence, the jury ought to find a verdict for the relator.

Mr. Swann, prayed the court to instruct the jury that it was competent for them, upon that evidence, to find a verdict for the defendant; but the court refused.

Verdict for the relator; who thereupon filed an information in the nature of a quo warranto, in the name of the attorney of the United States, but it was never prosecuted, as the term for which the mayor was elected expired on the first Monday of June, 1824, and it could hardly be expected that the proceedings upon the quo warranto would be terminated before that day.

Case No. 14,720a.

UNITED STATES v. CARD.

[2 Hask. 469.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Jan., 1881.

INFORMER—PROSECUTOR—MAINE STATUTE—APPORTIONMENT OF REWARD.

1. An informer, under section 11, c. 121, of the Revised Statutes of Maine, is one who first gives important information to the proper authorities that in fact leads to the conviction of a criminal.

2. A prosecutor, under that statute, is one who procures the arrest of the guilty party.

3. The reward given by that statute should be apportioned by the court between the informer and prosecutor according to their respective merit.

Indictment against William R. Card for passing counterfeit notes of the United States. He had been convicted and sentenced to prison.

Morrill Goddard and Charles W. Horton each petitioned the court to certify to the governor and council of Maine that he was entitled to the reward allowed prosecutors and informers under section 11, c. 121, of the Revised Statutes of that state.

Thomas H. Haskell and Nathan Webb, for Goddard.

Wilber F. Lunt, for Horton.

FOX, District Judge. It appears that Morrill Goddard, a lad of about fourteen, in September last was a student at the Cumberland Greely Institute. On the 30th of that month, he was present at a fair in West Cumberland, and, from the conduct of one Record, was led to watch him with some care and shrewdness; finding that Record was making many small purchases and always paying by a bill that was apparently new, receiving back the change, on an examination of some of the bills, Goddard decided they were counterfeit and so informed Bridges, city marshal of Portland, who was present at the fair. After hearing Goddard's account, Bridges concluded to arrest Record who was pointed out to him by Goddard. After his arrest, similar bills were found upon Record, and he also redeemed some of the bills he had passed. He was taken by Bridges to the lock-up in Portland, and the same evening disclosed to Black, a deputy marshal, that he had obtained these bills from Wm. R. Card.

Bridges that night informed Smith, the United States deputy marshal, of Record's arrest, and that he would probably disclose from whom he received those bills, and requested Smith to take charge of the case in behalf of the United States. Smith, therefore, requested Charles W. Horton, who had been a government detective under the internal revenue department, but who was not then in the service of the government, to go with him to the lock-up and have an interview with Record in order to ascertain from whom he obtained these notes. They went there and were informed by Black that Record was willing to disclose all he knew about the notes. They went into the corridor upon which was the cell in which Record was imprisoned. Horton stood at the door of the cell and conversed with Record, Smith being a few feet distant, but within hearing of all that was said. Record then informed them that he had received a large number of these bills from Card, and also where a parcel was concealed.

That same night, Horton made formal complaint before Commissioner Rand against Card for this offense, and caused him to be arrested the next morning, and he was bound over and subsequently convicted. Horton found in the place described by Record the package of bills which were produced by him at the hearing before Commissioner Rand.

It is very certain that it was entirely owing to the sagacity and perseverance of Goddard that Record was arrested for the offense for which he has since been indicted, but on account of his insanity has not yet been put on trial. While thus under arrest, at the instigation and procurement of Goddard, Record first disclosed to Black that Card had furnished him with the counterfeit notes, and this was before Horton knew anything of the matter. The city officers, thinking that it was the duty of the United States officials to carry on the prosecutions for these offences, so informed Deputy Marshal Smith, at whose request Horton accompanied him to the city lock-up, to be present at the interview with Record. At this interview, Horton ascertained from Record nothing which he had not already disclosed to Black, and which Black was ready to communicate to them if Record did not repeat the confession as he had informed Black he was ready to do.

Under these circumstances, it is certainly very questionable whether Horton should be deemed the informer as against Goddard, who had been the occasion of Record's disclosure. Goddard subsequently by letter notified the United States district attorney that he claimed to be the informer and prosecutor of Record, and that he was ready to furnish the testimony for his conviction.

In U. S. v. One Hundred Barrels of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 15,946], Judge Lowell defines an informer as "he who first gives to a person authorized to receive it, important information which, in fact, leads to the desired result; and the offer is not necessarily confined to persons who should expose the details of the fraud. * * * It is enough, if the result is in fact reached, primarily through his means."

In my opinion, Goddard should be deemed primarily the informer in Card's case, as well as in that of Record; but, as he took no steps to institute a prosecution against Card, and this was all done by Horton, and the arrest of Card was by his procurement, I hold he, rather than Goddard, may properly be deemed the prosecutor of Card.

The claim of Goddard is much the most meritorious; and as the statute authorizes the court to apportion the reward between the parties, I allow to Morrill Goddard three-fourths part of the reward to be paid by the state, and to C. M. Horton one-fourth part thereof.

UNITED STATES v. CARGO OF SUGAR.

[3 Sawy. 27.] [1]

District Court, D. California. April, 1874.

FORFEITURE — SEIZURE — BOND FOR VALUE — APPRAISEMENT.

Where property under bonds for duties is seized in a warehouse, the bond for value under the 89th section of the act of 1799 [1 Stat. 695] should represent its full market value, duties included.

At law.

Delos Lake, U. S. Atty.

Milton Andros, of counsel for the United States.

Doyle & Barber, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. An application is made by the owner and claimant of the goods proceeded against in this suit, that the appraisers be instructed to appraise the goods at their cash market value, less the duties legally chargeable upon them, and that upon giving bond for the value so ascertained, and producing a certificate of the collector that the duties have been paid, the goods be delivered to the claimant.

This application is opposed by the district attorney, who contends that the goods should be appraised at their full market value, without deducting the amount of the duties.

It appears that two separate entries at the custom-house were made of the goods—a part was entered for consumption, the usual deposit made to cover the duties, and a delivery order obtained by the importer. Before this order was executed the goods were seized. For the remainder of the goods a warehouse entry was made, and the bond required by the acts of August 30, 1842 [5 Stat. 548], and August 6, 1846 [9 Stat. 53], duly executed. They were still in the warehouse when seized.

The question presented to the court is important. It has been very fully discussed by the learned judge of the Southern district of New York, who has delivered a long and elaborate opinion, in which the whole subject is reviewed.

The conclusions at which he arrives are, that the bond for value under the 89th section of the act of 1799 [supra] should represent the full value of the property to the importer at the time of seizure.

That when the property is seized in his hands, after the duties are paid, its value to him is its market value, which necessarily includes the duties.

But where property under bonds for duties is seized in a warehouse, its full value to the importer at the time of seizure is its market value, less the duties; and for this amount the bond on delivery must be given.

I have been unable to assent to the correctness of these conclusions.

It is observed by the learned judge that "the interpretation uniformly given to the 89th section of the act of 1799 is, that the sum at which the property seized is to be appraised, is its value, as of the time and place of seizure."

No authorities are cited in support of this position. With great deference it appears to me to involve a fundamental error.

The government on a seizure of forfeited goods acquires a right of property, which it enforces by a condemnation and sale. As until condemnation the fact of forfeiture is unascertained, the claimant is allowed to obtain his goods on substituting in their stead a bond for their value. The sum for which this bond is to be given should obviously be a sum equal to the value of the goods to the government at the time they are delivered to the claimant, or the equivalent of the amount which might then be realized from them by a sale in the market. Nothing less will put the government in the same position as if it had retained the goods, or prevent its being a loser by the pretended substitution of an equivalent in value.

To estimate this value as of any other time than that of the appraisement and delivery might, according to circumstances, be a hardship and injustice either to the government or to the claimant. The seizure may have been made months previously. If in the meantime the price of the goods has declined, or their value otherwise been impaired, it would be unjust to demand of the claimant a bond for a larger sum than he can obtain for them in the market. If, on the other hand, their price has appreciated, he has no right to ask the government to surrender goods which have become its property by the forfeiture without receiving a bond of an amount equal to their full value when it surrenders them. This value is evidently the price which the goods then command in the market.

When the claimant applies to the court for a delivery of the goods seized, on payment of the duties and giving a bond for their value, he, in effect, asks that the property be delivered to him, on which, as soon as it reaches his hands, the whole market value can be realized. This is its true value, both to him and to the government. If he be permitted to give a bond for a less amount he will obtain his goods at less than their true value, and the government will part with them on a security representing a smaller sum than the goods would be worth if retained in its possession.

It is plain that in cases of seizure, as in all other cases where property in the possession of the law is surrendered on substituting a bond for its value, the bond should be for a sum equivalent to the value of the goods, at the time of the delivery, to the party who surrenders, and to the party who receives. This is evidently a sum no greater and no less than the market value of the goods at the time of the delivery.

But even if it were true that the basis of appraisement is the value of the goods to the importer at the time and place of seizure, I do not perceive why that value is to be taken as the market value less the duties.

The importer has given bond for the duties, and this bond he is liable for, unless the goods be re-exported. If the goods perish in the warehouse he still remains liable for the duties, and his loss is the amount of their market value. If he forfeits the goods in consequence of his crime he must still pay the duties, and the loss he sustains is the market value of his goods. This loss the government alleges he has incurred, and if while the question is undetermined he seeks to obtain his goods he must give bond in the sum they were worth to him when his ownership of them was divested by the forfeiture and seizure.

Even then, on the hypothesis that the appraisement is to be as of the time and place of seizure, it is clear that the basis of appraisement must be the full market value or the goods at that time without deducting the duties.

But, for the reasons assigned above, I think it evident that the value must be fixed as of the time the appraisement is made and the goods delivered to the claimant.

But it is said, in the opinion referred to, that "in case such a bond as the government claims to receive in this present case be given, the importer will lose if the property is condemned, in the suit, not only what was the value to him of the property in warehouse at the time of its seizure, but in addition a sum equal to the amount of the duties chargeable thereon; and if after thus bonding the property, he withdraws it for consumption, he must pay the duties on it in cash to the collector, notwithstanding the amount has been included in such delivery bond. He will thus, in case of condemnation, lose more than he would if the property was not delivered to him on bond, but was to remain in the hands of the government and be sold by it. In each case the same offense is charged and has been committed, for which the property is forfeited. In each case the property is in warehouse under bond for duties. The merchant is equally guilty in each case; but if the claimant seeks to avail himself of the privilege of bonding his property when it is seized while in warehouse, he cannot do so according to the views urged by the government without imposing upon himself a liability in case the property is condemned, which he will not incur if he leaves the property in the hands of the government. Such a result is opposed to the spirit and intent of the eighty-ninth section of the act of March 2, 1799. * * * To require from him such a bond as the government claims, would be to deprive him practically of the benefit of bonding warehoused property seized and prosecuted while in warehouse. But if the property is delivered to the claimant on a bond for its value when seized, not including the duties, then if the property is condemned in the suit the importer will lose the same amount as if he had not bonded the property and no more, and will thus have the full benefit of the privileges of the warehouse system, and the full benefit of the system of bonding provided for by the eighty-ninth section of the act of 1799."

I have cited this passage at length, for it contains a full statement of the grounds on which the learned judge based his opinion. The fallacy of the fundamental idea on which it rests appears to me evident.

The penalty attached by law to the offense charged is the forfeiture of the goods seized, or their value.

The payment of duties is not exacted as any part of the penalty. The obligation to pay them attaches absolutely as the consequence of the importation, and this payment is exacted, whether the goods be forfeited or not, as a condition precedent to the delivery of them to the importer. If the goods be entered for warehouse the importer has the right within a limited time to re-export them and procure the cancellation of his bond; but in all cases where the goods are delivered to the importer, as the claimant now asks the court to order, the duties must first be paid.

If the goods are condemned the loss to him is precisely the same, whether he bonds them, as the government now claims he must do, or whether he suffers them to remain in the custody of the court and be sold under its decree.

In either case he must pay the duties, for his bond for duties can only be canceled by the exportation of the goods, and this by his own crime he has put it out of his power to do. Besides the duties, he loses in either case the value of his goods, and no more.

If he suffers them to be sold this is evidently the amount of his loss. But if he obtains their delivery to himself on giving bond for their full market value the bond will represent only what they are worth to him, and the sum he can obtain for them in the market If the goods are subsequently condemned he pays over their proceeds in satisfaction of his bond, and his liability is thus precisely what the statute creates—liability to pay the duties. and as a penalty for his offense the loss of his goods or their proceeds.

The fallacy of the argument so often urged, that by exacting a bond for the full market value, including duties, and also requiring the duties to be paid, the court obliges the importer to pay duties twice, is also apparent.

He pays duties but once, and he gives bond for the amount which the property is worth to him when delivered, and which, if the appraisement be just, he realizes from its sale. If he be permitted to take his goods on giving bond for their market value, less the duties, the inevitable consequence will be that he will save, and the government will lose, a sum equal to the amount of the duties.

For though he pays duties in the first instance, he can sell the goods at their market price, and thus be reimbursed the duties he has paid, while the balance of the proceeds will be sufficient to satisfy the bond he has given. The goods will thus have gone into consumption in effect without payment of duties, or, to speak more accurately, the government will, though it has received the duties, recover less by precisely their amount than the value of the property, the ownership or which it had acquired by the forfeiture.

The circumstance that the goods have been seized in a warehouse can in no way affect the matter, for the claimant asks, not that the goods be suffered to remain in warehouse, and the seizure be superseded, but that they be delivered to him and go into consumption. This the court can order only on payment of duties.

He thus puts himself precisely in the position of one who withdraws goods for consumption, and the value he should give bond for is the value of the goods he receives, which is their market price, or the sum he can obtain for them.

Even if the importer whose goods have been seized in a warehouse, can on applying to bond them be considered as retaining any right to avoid payment of duties by re-exporting them, a single illustration of the possible results of the mode of appraisement suggested will expose its erroneousness. Let us suppose the market value of the goods to be equal to or less than the amount of the duties

Such is said to have been until recently the case with regard to whisky.

Their market value, less the duties, will, in such case, be nothing—and the claimant can procure their delivery to him on giving bond in a nominal sum.

If, then, he can omit to pay the duty, and re-export the goods. or recover the duty back by way of drawback (as he may possibly do in this case under the fourteenth section of the act of August 30, 1842), he may, by a sale in a foreign market, realize from them a sum which though less than the duties, may be considerable—while the government, which has established its title by forfeiture to the goods, will have neither duties, goods, nor a bond.

In view of the late ruling market prices of whisky the case suggested does not seem an extreme one, but the principle is illustrated in all cases where the amount of the duties bears any considerable proportion to the market value of the goods.

It is observed by the learned judge of the Southern district of New York, that "uniformity of principle and equal justice to importers, in all cases, can be carried out only by varying the basis of appraisement in the manner indicated in cases of delivery bonds, on seizures of property in warehouses."

With all deference I must be allowed to observe that the proposed variation seems to me to introduce a discrimination between importers of different classes not justified by reason or law.

It is admitted that if the duties have been paid, and the goods are seized in the hands of the importer, he can only obtain them by giving bond for their full market value—or, in other words, by securing the repayment in case of condemnation of the value he receives when the goods are delivered to him. On what ground should the importer, who has made a warehouse entry, be put in a better position?

He also asks for and receives property which he can at once convert into money, and for which he can obtain by sales the sum he is required to pay in case of condemnation. The goods are worth that sum to the government, and what right has he to ask the government to surrender them without receiving a bond for their full value?

I confess, that after the fullest consideration, I have been able to discover nothing, either in the warehouse laws or the provisions of the eighty-ninth section of the act of 1799, which can give any color to such a pretension.

I regret exceedingly to be obliged to dissent from any opinion entertained by the distinguished judge of the Southern district of New York, especially when it is sustained by that of his eminent predecessor.

But I cannot avoid announcing the conclusions which, after the best consideration

I can give the subject, I have reached. My belief in their correctness is strengthened by the fact that they seem to be in accordance with the views entertained by the learned judge of the Pennsylvania district, whose decision which I have not had the advantage of seeing, is referred to in the opinion of the district judge of the Southern district of New York.

An order must be entered directing the goods seized to be delivered to the claimant, on his executing a bond for their appraised value, without deducting the duties, and on the production of the collector's certificate that the duties have been paid.

Case No. 14,722.

UNITED STATES v. CARGO OF SUGAR.

[3 Sawy. 46.] [1]

District Court, D. California. 1874.

FORFEITURE—ENTRY OF GOODS—FRAUDULENT APPLIANCE—COLORED SUGARS—GOOD FAITH.

1. The term "entry," as used in section 1 of the act of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 738], must be understood to include the series of acts done by the importer at the custom-house necessary to the introduction of his merchandise into the United States, in compliance with the forms of law.

2. If in the performance of these acts, and as a means of making the entry, the importer is guilty of any false or fraudulent practice or appliance, or uses any false or fraudulent document, he comes within the law.

3. Whether the agent who makes the entry had knowledge of the fraud is immaterial. The guilty knowledge of the owner is sufficient.

4. Where charcoal had been mixed with sugar above No. 12 Dutch standard in color, for the purpose of reducing its grade, and making it appear to be below No. 12 Dutch standard in color, and the importer failed to disclose that fact to the customhouse authorities, held, that the color of the sugar was not thereby altered. It was merely disguised, and the concealment and suppression of that fact by the importer at the time of taking his oath and making his entry, and the oath taken by him, constituted "a false and fraudulent practice and appliance" within the meaning of the law; and this notwithstanding that the law does not require that the color of the sugar be stated in the invoice or entry.

5. Whether the collector was deceived by the attempted fraud, is immaterial.

6. The belief on the part of the importer that he might lawfully put charcoal into his sugar, and thus alter its grade, and enable himself to lawfully enter it as of a lower grade, and that he might lawfully withhold from the custom-house authorities knowledge of the facts, will be no protection to him.

[Suit by the United States against a cargo of sugar. For prior proceedings, relating to the appraisal of the goods for release to the claimant upon bond for value, see Case No. 14,721.]

Delos Lake, U. S. Atty. (Milton Andros, of counsel), for the United States.

Doyle & Barber, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge (charging jury). The counsel for the claimants has presented to me instructions, thirty-six in number, with the request that I would give them to you as the law of this case. I have not, according to the state practice, marked upon the margin of each, "Granted" or "Refused," but they may be all treated as refused, except so far as they are contained in what I am about to say.

I approach, gentlemen, the discharge of my duty in this case with a sense of responsibility, not only because of the importance of the proceeding, but because, in the view I take of it, its determination must depend upon the instructions given to you on the matter of law. I have been unable to discern any matters of fact that are seriously controverted, and upon which you are called upon to pass.

In the first place, I desire to say that whether the law on which this proceeding is based be harsh or just, is no concern of yours, nor is the disposition that is to be made of the proceeds in case of confiscation, or whether the collector or the consul has acted well or ill, or whether the officers have been animated by a rapacious spirit or simply by zeal to detect fraud and to discharge their duties. All these considerations are wholly foreign to the purpose. You are called upon simply to decide whether certain matters of fact to which by law the consequence of forfeiture of the goods is attached, have been established by proof. What, then, is the law? The section under which this prosecution is brought provides: "If any owner, consignee or agent of any goods, wares and merchandise shall knowingly make or attempt to make an entry thereof by means of any false invoice, or false certificate of any consul, vice-consul or commercial agent, or of any invoice which shall not contain a true statement of all the particulars hereinbefore required, or by means of any other false or fraudulent document or paper, or of any other false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, such goods, wares or merchandise, or their value shall be forfeited."

You will perceive that the offense to which the penalty of forfeiture is annexed is the making or the attempt to make an entry of goods, wares and merchandise "by means" of any false document, or false practice or appliance.

What, then, is an entry? The term entry in the acts of congress is used in two senses. In many of the acts it refers to the bill of entry: the paper or declaration which the merchant or importer in the first instance hands to the entry clerk. In other statutes it is used to denote, not a document, but a transaction: a series of acts which are necessary to the end to be accomplished, viz., the entering of the goods. In the latter sense it is used in this statute. The language is: "If any owner or consignee shall make or attempt to make an entry by means of false documents, false invoice or any other false or fraudulent appliances." It is the fraudulent use of means in the attaining of an object and accomplishing of a result, to wit, the entry of the goods, which the statute here denounces. The acts which accomplish this result, and which, taken together, constitute an entry, must have a beginning and an end. There is a moment when the entry is attempted to be made or begun; there is a moment when it is accomplished. The entry may be said to be commenced, or attempted, when the merchant presents his declaration or bill of entry. When this bill of entry has gone to the requisite clerks' desks, when accompanied by the certificate of the consul, the invoice and the oath, it is delivered to the collector and accepted by him, then the goods may, in a just sense, be said to be admitted to entry and the entry to be accomplished. If in the performance of any of those acts, and as a means of making the entry, any false document, appliance or practice is resorted to, then this statute applies and the goods so entered are forfeited to the United States.

Whether, in the course of the proceedings one document is used, or two or three are used, can make no difference. It is also immaterial whether there are one or two bills of entry indicating the dispositions which the importer desires to make of the goods; as of some to the warehouse and some to be withdrawn for consumption, or whether he takes one oath or two oaths. The entry consists of the series of acts required by law to be done to effect that object, and if in the course of them the importer is guilty of any false or fraudulent practice, or uses any false document whatsoever, he comes within the law.

It is urged in this case, on the part of the government, that in making the entry the merchant, in judgment of law, may be said to present himself to the collector with his documents in one hand, and his goods in the other, and if the character of the goods themselves is fraudulently disguised, if any false appliance with respect to them is used, it may justly be said he has effected his entry "by means" of that appliance. I think, gentlemen, it would perhaps be straining the statute to say that any false practice with reference to the goods themselves would be a "means" of making the entry. He does not make his entry "by means" of that false practice or disguise. But he does make his entry "by means" of any false document he may use or any false oath he may take, if such document or oath be requisite and necessary as a means and condition precedent to the goods being admitted to entry. Therefore, if this invoice, the certificate of the consul, or the oath the importer has taken, be false or fraudulent, then he has made use of a fraudulent means necessary to effect the very object he had in view, to wit, the procuring his goods to be admitted to entry.

It is alleged that the oath of Mr. De Ro was false. It is not pretended that Mr. De Ro knew the facts of the case, or was himself, personally, either morally or legally culpable in any point of view. But the knowledge of his principal is his knowledge for such purposes, and that it must be so is evident. For otherwise, any fraud could be perpetrated with impunity by procuring an innocent broker or agent, through whom parties not innocent could effect the entry of their goods. It is, therefore, not the innocence or guilty knowledge of the agent, but it is the knowledge of the owner himself who has devised the fraud which carries with it the consequence of condemnation.

Treating, therefore, Mr. De Ro's oath as if it were made by the owner, it is claimed by the prosecution that it is false. He swears, gentlemen, that he has not concealed or suppressed any fact whereby the revenue of the United States might be defrauded.

It is argued, with the ingenuity which has characterized counsel throughout the whole case, that the suppression or concealment of any fact which the law does not call upon him to disclose is not wrongful, and that inasmuch as, in this case, it was not requisite that in the entry, or the invoice, the color of the goods should be stated, the suppression or concealment of the true color could not be an offense. It is true, gentlemen, that the color of the sugars is not required to be stated in the invoice, but from the nature of the oath that is required to be taken it appears to me plain that congress intended by imposing so searching an oath that there should be disclosed at the time, and not suppressed or concealed, any fact, whether required to be stated in the entry or invoice or not, which it was important to the interests of the revenue to be known, or whereby the revenue of the United States might be defrauded. Had it been intended that the importer should merely swear that the invoice, bill of lading and entry were true, the oath would have been to that effect and nothing more. But it goes further. The importer swears "that the invoice and bill of lading now presented by me to the collector of —— are the true and only invoice and bill of lading by me received of the goods, etc.; that the entry now delivered by me contains a just and true account of said goods, etc., according to said invoice and bill of lading, and that nothing has been, on my part, nor, to my knowledge, on the part of any other person, concealed or suppressed, whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duty lawfully due on said goods,' etc.

It appears to me, that when that oath was required by congress it was intended to cover just such a transaction as this, and that though the statements of the invoice might be true, though it might contain all that the law required to be stated therein, yet, if from the nature of the transaction by any fraudulent device or contrivance there was something which, if concealed or suppressed, might tend to defraud the revenue of the United States, it was then to be disclosed, and the suppression of and failure to disclose that fact made the oath to that extent a false oath, thus constituting it a false document and appliance "by means" of which the entry was made.

It has been argued, gentlemen, that it is essential that the collector of the revenue should be deceived. But the effect upon the mind of the collector, of the false or fraudulent appliances, is wholly immaterial; whether or not he believed in the statement, whether he was colluding with the party entering the goods, or knew, in advance, that a fraud was intended or was to be attempted, is wholly immaterial. As well might it be said of one indicted for perjury that the magistrate before whom he had appeared, and before whom he was required to take his oath, did not believe the story or knew he was swearing falsely. Such a defense could not for a moment be admitted, and the case is nearly identical with this. The charge here is, the production or use and employment of a false document or the use of false and fraudulent means to accomplish a certain object. If the party has used those means he is clearly guilty of the offense, whether the collector knew of the commission of the offense at the time it was committed, or only discovered it afterwards. In either event the statute operates, and confiscation follows as a consequence of the employment of the fraudulent means to effect an entry of the goods. Nor does the character of the device, whether flimsy or transparent, or readily or with difficulty to be detected, provided it be fraudulent, affect the question. The degree of skill, ingenuity or cunning with which the fraud is contrived, can make no difference. Nor, gentlemen, is it true, as contended, that the forfeiture in such case is limited to the mere goods in relation to which such fraudulent practice is used. The language of the statute is too explicit to admit of any doubt as to its meaning: "If any owner or consignee of any goods, wares and merchandise shall knowingly make, or attempt to make entry thereof by means of any false invoice or fraudulent practice, such goods, wares and merchandise shall be forfeited."

What are the goods, wares and merchandise thus to be forfeited? Plainly, the goods entered or attempted to be entered at the custom-house. There was but one entry, but one invoice in this case. The acts done, taken together, constitute an entry of the goods; an entry of this whole invoice or importation of sugar. If, in the attempt to effect that object, fraudulent means have been used, the goods so entered are forfeited. It is therefore the whole invoice that is forfeited, or nothing.

Having disposed of these matters, we approach, gentlemen, to the more serious part of the case and the real merits of this transaction. It will strike you as curious that the government should affirm that a practice has been resorted to here, which is morally and legally fraudulent, and that this practice or contrivance should be admitted to have been used, and should be defended and justified on legal, and I believe, moral grounds. It is not often that counsel of distinguished ability and high character are so totally at variance upon moral as well as legal questions. It becomes our duty, therefore, to consider what is the true view to be taken of this transaction.

You are aware that congress has established color as a standard of duty, or the standard, rather, whereby to determine the duty upon sugar. It has been stated to you, and the fact is not disputed, that the adoption of this mode of assessing the duties was the result of very many experiments and attempts to establish other rules by which to determine the amount of duties to be placed on this species of merchandise.

Mr. Bridge informs us that he thinks this standard is, upon the whole, the best and most satisfactory ever adopted, and such seems to be the fact. What, then, was the motive of congress in adopting the standard of color? It is plain, gentlemen, that except so far as protection is concerned, color could only be rationally adopted as indicative of value—not as invariably indicating it, but as generally doing so, and as affording, upon the whole, the best, most convenient and most appreciable test of the value and the quality of the article. That it is so in this case, has been established by the witnesses; for, though they state that color is not the sole criterion of value, and that there are other considerations of great importance to be borne in mind, yet they all admit that color is a very important circumstance to be regarded in determining the value or quality of sugar. It has been shown that sugar in its pure state is colorless, and it would seem to follow that the degree or depth of the color which a particular article of raw sugar possesses must vary with the amount of impurities it contains; and the amount of impurities contained must have a very important effect on the value of the mass. It is said there can be no such thing as disguise in color; that color addresses itself to the senses, that that which appears to be of a certain hue is of that hue; that there is no difference between a real and an apparent color.

The language of the acts of congress in relation to the tariff is used in a commercial and popular sense. It is addressed to practical men of business, and intended to govern them in the daily affairs of life. There is some plausibility undoubtedly in the assertion, that there is no distinction between real and apparent color; that when an object is presented to the eye and produces a certain effect upon the optic nerve, the effect so produced constitutes, to all intents and purposes, its color. But let us consider. It is admitted that if the government were to impose a duty according to the color of a horse, you could not whitewash him and so change his color within the meaning of the law; or if congress should impose a high duty upon rosewood logs of a certain color, you could not, by staining their surface, give to the logs a darker or lighter hue in order to evade the duty. To this it has been answered that a horse, or log of rosewood, has a natural color, which may be disguised but cannot be altered. But this admits that there may be an apparent color disguising the true color.

But it is said that sugar has no natural color, but only an artificial color; that its hue is the result of its manufacture; that it depends upon the mode in which the manufacture has been conducted, and upon the ingredients that are put into or removed from the sugar, and therefore it cannot be said to have a natural color like a horse or a log of wood. Let us see. Suppose wines were valued according to their clearness and lightness of color, and suppose there were a drug that would give to the light-colored wine a murky, clouded appearance, without, however, injuring the wine; and that after passing through the custom-house, the wine could be restored to its former clearness by the addition of another ingredient which would precipitate the coloring-matter; could it be said that such a practice would be lawful? Do we not feel that the introduction of the first drug, by which there was imparted to the vine a color different from its real color, would be a fraudulent attempt to disguise and conceal the color of the article? True it is, that it would have to the eye a dark color, but it would not be the color legitimately resulting from the ordinary course of manufacture, to which it has been subjected. I have used this illustration, for the color of wine, like that of sugar, may, in a great degree, depend upon its treatment or mode of manufacture.

What, then, is "color" in regard to sugar, as the term is used in the statute? It appears to me, gentlemen, that it is the hue or degree of lightness which the sugar has attained in the ordinary course of its manufacture, and which indicates the degree of perfection to which the process of clarification has been carried. Undoubtedly while the sugar, or while the cane-juice rather, remains in the manufacturer's hands, he may omit to take out the impurities, or may put in impurities if he so desires, for as yet it has not become sugar. The hue of the sugar—that is, the result of his operations—will be determined by the degree to which he has abstracted the impurities or foreign substances from it, or the amount of such foreign substances as he may have introduced into it. But when it has passed out of his hands and gone into the hands of the importer, or the proposed importer, or the merchant, then the hue it has acquired is the "color" that congress had reference to when it established color as the standard of classification. If, then, by the admixture of some foreign and totally different substance, such as caramel, or, as in this case, charcoal, this color be changed, the color so acquired cannot be considered the color to which congress referred as a standard for assessing the duties. It is contended here that the color has been really altered, not disguised; that the mass is of a color below No. 12 Dutch standard of color; that is, that the sugar really possesses the color which you see in that bottle. Is this strictly true? I observe that the lumps of any considerable size, upon being crushed, reveal the color of the sugar as it was before the admixture, and that, in fact, there was only a slight coating of charcoal upon the surface of the lumps, the sugar itself being entirely unaltered; that is, the sugar in the interior of the lumps. Can it make any difference whether the lumps are small or large? The eye perceives in the larger lumps that the charcoal only covers the surface, and that the mass of the sugar in the interior of the lump is unchanged and is of the original color. If our vision were more perfect we would perceive the same phenomenon in the small microscopic particles. It appears to me, under such circumstances, that the color of the sugar cannot, in any sense, be said to have been changed, but rather that it has been disguised.

One other observation will, I think, expose the true nature of this transaction. I am not aware that the obligations of citizens to the government are less solemn or less imperative than those of one citizen to another. Suppose, gentlemen, that a contract had been made and the money paid down, by which one of you agreed to deliver sugar above No. 12 Dutch standard in color, and suppose that, as has been proved here, it were possible to impart to sugar of a dark hue a lighter appearance by putting into it gypsum or chalk, or some other coloring-matter: your contract in the case supposed would (like the obligation of the importer to pay so much to the government, in case his goods are above No. 12 Dutch standard) be to give to the purchaser sugar above No. 12 Dutch standard in color. In both cases the same mode of classification is referred to. In both cases the same phrase is used to indicate the kind of sugar that is the subject-matter of the obligation. The obligation is, in the one case, to pay the duty specified in the act, if the sugar be of a certain color; in the other, to deliver, for a price already paid, sugar of a certain specified color. Would you conceive yourselves at liberty to take sugars of No. 6 in color, and put into them gypsum or chalk, and tender them to the party with whom you had contracted, as sugars above No. 12? Would you expect him to listen to you, if you should say, "I contracted to give you sugar above No. 12 Dutch standard in color; but what is the Dutch standard of color? You can only know by looking at it through a glass bottle. You can go to the appraiser's office and compare the sugar I offer with sugar above No. 12 Dutch standard, and if the colors are the same I claim the right to tender it, notwithstanding it is in fact No. 6 sugar, and I have used chalk or gypsum to make it appear of a lighter color." Can any man mistake as to the propriety of such a course? It appears to me that there is no difference between the two cases, and the device by which a seller would give a false appearance of lightness is of the same character, and must have the same legal effect, as the device by which the importer would give to these sugars a false appearance of darkness.

If that view be correct, then, gentlemen, in this case the importer, consignee or agent, has mixed charcoal with these sugars in order to disguise the true color, and make them appear to be below No. 12 Dutch standard of color, when in point of fact they were above No. 12 in color, with intent to pass them at the custom-house as sugars of the lower grade; and if he has suppressed and concealed from the officers of the customs the fact that he has tampered with and sought to disguise the color of his goods, then, in my judgment, he has been guilty of a false appliance and fraudulent practice within the meaning of the statute, and must abide the consequences which the law imposes.

It may appear to some of you, gentlemen, that there has been but an innocent mistake as to the law,—a false construction given to the statute. That for this mistake the confiscation of the goods is too severe a penalty, especially as the consequences of that confiscation fall, in great part, upon innocent parties, and to a considerable extent upon the representatives of a gentleman, now deceased, well known for his public spirit, his great mental activity and varied attainments. But you are not at liberty to be influenced by these considerations. Mr. Gordon's ignorance of, or mistake as to the law, cannot excuse him. He did this act at his peril; and if the act be an offense under the statute, the penalty of the law attaches. I will read to you in this connection, from the same authority which one of the counsel has cited, and then shall conclude my remarks.

In the case which I am about to read, congress had enacted that where refined sugars were exported, a drawback or return of duty might be claimed. The law further provided that if any goods should be entered by means of any false denomination, they should be forfeited, unless it were shown that such false denomination happened by accident or mistake, and not from any intention to defraud the revenue. The party in this case entered the goods as "refined sugars;" and claimed the drawback. They were, on the part of the government, alleged to be not refined sugars, but what are called "bastard sugars," and were seized as having been entered under a false denomination. The first point to be decided was whether the sugars were or were not refined sugars. The court held they were not. The claimant then urged that he thought they were, and that he had merely made a mistake in the construction of the law. The question thus arose whether this was such a mistake as brought him within the proviso of the statute exempting the goods from confiscation when the false denomination was shown to be the result of mistake or accident.

Now, upon this state of facts, which I hope you will bear in mind, as it closely resembles the state of the facts with which we have to deal, Judge Thompson, one of the most eminent judges that ever sat upon the bench of the supreme court of the United States, says:

"The first inquiry which seems naturally to arise is, What is the nature and character of the mistake which will save the forfeiture? Is it restricted to some matter of fact, or does it include mistake as to the application of the law to the subject thus falsely denominated, the qualities of such sugars being fully known to the person making the entry? I cannot think that, upon any sound construction, the proviso can cover mistakes of the latter description. Such are purely mistakes of law, and it is a principle too well settled to admit of being drawn in question, that ignorance or mistake of law furnishes no excuse in any case, civil or criminal. * * * And if the term 'mistake' does not include error of judgment as to matter of law (as I think it does not), I am unable to discover any ground upon which the false denomination can be said to have happened by mistake or accident; and the only remaining question is, whether this was done with an intention to defraud the revenue, within the sense and meaning of the proviso; and it appears to me that it follows as a matter of course that if the entry was by design, and not by mistake or accident, the legal consequence is that it was done to defraud the revenue. * * * Admitting that he himself honestly believed that his sugars were refined sugars, within the meaning of the law, and that he was entitled to the drawback, still it amounts to no more than a mistake or error of judgment upon the law, and does not protect the sugars from forfeiture."

If that be the law, gentlemen, and I see no reason to doubt it, for the same principle is affirmed in a case decided by the late judge of the Southern district of New York, then the circumstance that the owner of these goods believed that he might lawfully put charcoal into them and lawfully withhold the knowledge of that fact from the custom-house authorities, and that he thereby and within the meaning of the law degraded the sugars and lowered their color, and converted them from sugars above No. 12 to sugars below No. 12 in color, and that he might lawfully enter them as of the lower grade—though he honestly believe all this; such erroneous belief and mistaken construction of the law afford him no excuse, and the goods are subject to forfeiture.

If, therefore, in conclusion, gentlemen, you believe from the evidence that this sugar, after it reached the purchaser's hands, was mixed with charcoal for the purpose of reducing its grade and making it appear to be below No. 12 Dutch standard in color, when in point of fact before the introduction of such charcoal it was above No. 12 Dutch standard in color, and if you believe that Mr. De Ro, when he took his oath and made the entry, suppressed and concealed that fact, or did not disclose it to the custom-house officer, then that suppression and concealment, and the oath so taken by Mr. De Ro, were, in my judgment, a false appliance and practice within the meaning of the law, of which the consequence is a forfeiture of the goods contained in the invoice.

UNITED STATES v. CARICO.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 446.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1824.

FALSE PRETENCES—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

It is not an indictable offence at common law, to obtain and take "by means of false and fraudulent pretences" from the compting-house of a merchant, sundry of his books of account.

This indictment charged that the defendant [James Carico], with force and arms, falsely and fraudulently, by means of false and fraudulent pretences, did obtain and take from the compting-house of one N. B. Vanzandt, two books of account of the value of five dollars, of the goods and chattels of the said N. B. V. against the peace and government of the United States. The defendant was found guilty.

Mr. Wallach, for defendant, moved in arrest of judgment, and contended that it was only a private injury, and not indictable at common law, or under any statute; and, if it were, the pretences should have been particularly set forth, and averred to be false. Rex v. Wheatly, 2 Burrows, 1125.

Mr. Swann, for the United States.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that it was not an indictable offence, and arrested the judgment.

Case No. 14,724.

UNITED STATES v. CARLISLE.

[4 Am. Law T. Rep. (U. S. Cts.) 231.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. Nov., 1871.

CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION — ACCEPTANCE — INJUNCTION—PLEADING.

[1. The prosecutor of a qui tam action (as to which there had been an agreement between him and the government relative to payment, out of any judgment obtained, of the expenses of the action, including "25 per cent. of a moiety of the judgment" to an informer, and division of the balance between him and the government) wrote the postmaster general, after judgment was obtained, asking for his views and instructions as to how the 25 per cent. was to be paid,—whether it was to come out of the moiety going to the government, or from the entire amount received, the balance to be divided between the government and him according to the terms of the law. In answer the postmaster general wrote, "The 25 per cent. must first be deducted," and then, after referring to certain expenses to be deducted, said: "The remainder can then be distributed according to the terms of the law." Held, that the prosecutor's reply (taking no exception to the terms stated in the postmaster general's letter, but reciting the fact that a decree for distribution had been entered without deducting the 25 per cent., and suggesting that the clerk be authorized to pay 25 per cent. of the sum recovered and going to the government to satisfy the informer's claim, and then, after reciting that his expenses would be 16 per cent. of his moiety, stating that he proposed, when he received it, to pay into the treasury 12 per cent. of his moiety, after deducting 16 per cent. for expenses, and adding that this would be more favorable for the government than "the terms indicated by your letter") contained a recognition of "the terms indicated" as the true terms, and a proposition in lieu thereof.]

[2. The acceptance of the prosecutor's proposition by the postmaster general did not give the government a mere personal claim against the prosecutor for the 12 per cent., but vested in it an interest to that extent in his moiety of the judgment fund; so that, the decree for distribution having provided for payment to him of a moiety, without any deduction on account of the 25 per cent., he will be treated as a trustee of the fund for the government, to the extent of the 12 per cent.]

[3. The sending by the postmaster general, to the clerk of the court in which the qui tam action was pending, of a letter directing him to pay the 25 per cent. to the informer, from the moiety going to the government, "as suggested in C.'s (prosecutor's) letter," which was inclosed, was an acceptance of the prosecutor's proposition.]

[4. Where the answer to a bill for injunction admits that defendant wrote certain letters, a denial therein that the construction given thereto by complainant is correct will not entitle defendant to a denial of the injunction, the construction thereof being for the court.]

This was a bill in equity filed by complainants to recover from defendant Carlisle a portion of a certain judgment fund to which the United States set up equitable rights by virtue of certain agreements between the postmaster general and Carlisle. The facts are as follows: In November, 1868, a judgment was recovered in a qui tam action, wherein Carlisle was qui tam prosecutor against Calvin F. S. Thomas and others for frauds committed in furnishing supplies to the post office department. Indictments had also been found against the parties who committed the frauds, and the qui tam actions were subsequently brought to recover the penalties and damages under the fraud act of March 2, 1863 (12 Stat. 696). It was averred in the bill that Carlisle, who was then special agent of the treasury, agreed to reimburse the United States for all expenses incurred, advances made, and assistance rendered in the prosecution of these qui tam actions, out of such judgment as should be recovered in those cases; that certain sums paid for assistant counsel to aid the district attorney, and for the salary of an assistant in the investigation of the cases and other outlays, together with 25 per cent. of a moiety of the judgment to be recovered, which was to be paid to an informant for important information, should be first deducted from the gross amount of the judgment, and the remainder be divided in equal portions between the government and the prosecutor. The existence of this understanding between the government and the defendant Carlisle was evidenced by the correspondence between the late Postmaster General Randall and Carlisle. Tacitly admitting the facts above stated, Carlisle writes, under date of November 25, 1868, to "learn the views and receive the instructions" of the department relative to the disposition of the judgment fund. The reply of the postmaster general directed such a disposition of the fund as was contemplated in the agreement averred in the bill and given above. Carlisle again, on February 10, 1869, writes the postmaster general, and without excepting to the terms of distribution proposed, requested that authority may be given to the clerk to pay the 25 per cent. of one moiety of the judgment from the moiety of the government, and proposes on his part, in case this advance is made by the government "to pay into the treasury, when he receives it, twelve (12) per cent. of the moiety going to him (the prosecutor), after deducting sixteen per cent. for expenses." To this offer no answer was given directly to Carlisle, but he admitted, and it was further in proof, that the letter containing Carlisle's proposition was sent to the clerk of the district court for the E. D. of Michigan, by the postmaster general, with instructions to pay the money to the informer in accordance with the letter of Mr. Carlisle, "herewith sent," and such money was accordingly paid. The bill averred and the answer admitted the receipt by Carlisle of forty-three thousand five hundred and seven and $^{27}/_{100}$ dollars, parcel of his moiety of said judgment, and also the payment by the United States of the 25 per cent. to the informer —some $12,615. Carlisle refused payment of the 12 per cent. agreed to be paid and the bill was filed, praying to have him declared a trustee for complainants of 12 per cent. of his moiety of said judgment after deducting 16 per cent. for costs and expenses, and asking that he be compelled to pay to complainants 12 per cent. of 84 per cent. of the portion of his moiety which he had received, and to enjoin him from receiving, and the clerk from paying, any further portion of said moiety until satisfaction of complainant's rights in the premises. The motion for a temporary injunction was argued and granted. On final hearing on pleading and proofs, the injunction was made perpetual, as appears in the opinion of the court. The decision upon the motion is given first in order.

A. B. Hayward, U. S. Dist. Atty., and H. H. Swan, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Alfred Russell, for defendants.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The decision of this motion depends almost entirely upon the construction to be given to Carlisle's letter of February 10, 1869, Schedule C of the bill, and the question of acceptance by complainant of the proposal therein contained. In order to arrive at a true construction of that letter it is necessary to go back and examine the preliminary steps leading to it and constituting the consideration for the proposition contained in it. If it be true, as alleged in the bill, that the 25 per cent. reward paid to Brown by complainant out of its moiety, was, by the original agreement, to be deducted from the whole amount recovered, before distribution, then it (the amount so paid) was to come out of the judgment found, and as between these parties constituted a claim upon it of which the moiety of each was to bear its part, and the letter of February 10, 1869, proposing to complainant that it pay the whole amount going to Brown out of its moiety, and that Carlisle would pay to complainant 12 per cent. of his moiety after deducting 16 per cent. for expenses, was simply a proposition to charge his moiety with said 12 per cent. in favor of complainant, in lieu of the charge which was before upon it in favor of Brown; the consideration for the proposition being, that the complainant would assume and pay and thus relieve defendant's moiety from the entire charge in favor of Brown. Was there any such original agreement then, as stated in the bill in relation to the manner in which the 25 per cent. going to Brown was to be paid? The answer positively denies any such agreement, and if that was all, the motion should no doubt be denied. But when the question appears first to have suggested itself to defendant, as to what fund the 25 per cent. to Brown was to be paid from, he seems himself to have been in doubt, and in his letter of November 25, 1868 (Schedule B to bill) he says, "I desire to learn the views and to receive your instructions as to how and the manner in which the 25 per cent. is to be paid; whether it is to come from the moiety going to the government or whether it is to be paid from the entire amount received and the balance divided between the Government and prosecutor, according to the terms of the law." In reply to this letter he is informed, under date of January 7, 1868 (Schedule A of the bill), as follows: "In reply you are informed that the 25 per cent. must first be deducted," and thereafter mentioning certain other matters which will be noticed hereafter, adds: "The remainder can then be distributed according to the terms of the law." It seems that before the letter was received by defendant a decree of distribution had been entered without deducting the 25 per cent. On receipt of it, however, defendant in reply wrote his letter of February 10, 1869.

In this letter he takes no exception to the terms proposed, but on the contrary, after reciting the fact of the entry of decree of distribution as above stated, and making some observations in regard to it, he says, "In this view of the case I would respectfully suggest, in order to cancel the claim which is made by the person giving the information" (meaning Brown) "that the clerk be authorized to pay 25 per cent. of the sum recovered and going to the government," and then after stating that his expenses over and above his taxable costs will be 16 per cent. of his moiety, adds (speaking of himself in the third person as the prosecutor) as follows: "He proposes, however, to pay into the treasury, when he receives it, 12 per cent. of the moiety going to him, after deducting 16 per cent. for expenses;" and the letter closes as follows: "By this ruling of the court and the proposal of the prosecution it will be seen that the government gains more than it would under the terms indicated by your letter of the 7th ult;" thus clearly indicating that, 1st, "the terms indicated" by the letter to defendant of January 7, 1869, directing that the amount going to Brown should be deducted from the whole sum recovered before distribution, were recognized as the true terms, and, 2nd, that the proposition of February 10th, 1869, was in lieu of such terms.

I hold, therefore, with the light I now have, that the proposition contained in the letter of defendant Carlisle of February 10th, 1869, if accepted by complainant, would vest in complainant an interest in defendant's moiety of the judgment fund in controversy equal to 12 per cent. thereof after deducting 16 per cent. therefrom for his expenses; and that such interest, standing upon the record as it does, in defendant's name, he must be treated for the purposes of this motion as a trustee of the fund to that extent for complainant. It is true it is denied in the answer that the construction above given to the letters referred to is correct. But he admits that he wrote the letters, and the letters being so admitted their construction is for the court. Denials in an answer, in order to entitle a defendant to a denial or dissolution of an injunction, must be of facts, and not of conclusions where the facts are admitted.

Some stress was laid upon the use of the words "when he receives it" in the proposition of defendant of February 10, 1869, and it was argued that the use of the words create if anything a mere personal obligation to pay the 12 per cent. when he should receive it, and does not create any interest in complainant in the fund itself, and therefore there is a complete remedy at law, and this court as a court of equity has no jurisdiction in the premises. I think that, in view of all the antecedent and surrounding circumstances, these words "when he receives it," must be deemed to mean, as I have no doubt the writer did mean, "when the same shall be paid in." In support of this construction it is to be observed that the 12 per cent. proposed to be paid into the treasury was "of the moiety" going to defendant, that is, part and parcel of such moiety, eo nomine.

The only question that remains to be considered is, whether the defendant's proposal of February 10th, 1869, was accepted by complainant. No notification of acceptance seems to have been given direct to the defendant. On receipt, however, of defendant's letter of February 10th, or soon thereafter, under date of February 27, 1869, the postmaster general, who had charge of the matter for complainants, and with whom all the transactions and correspondence in the matter was had, enclosed defendant's letter of February 10, to the clerk of the court, and instructed him in substance to pay the 25 per cent. going to Brown from the moiety going to complainant "as suggested in Mr. Carlisle's letter," and the same has been paid accordingly, so far as received by the clerk. This was an acceptance in fact, and from the fact that defendant's letter containing the instructions was sent with the instructions, and in express terms made the basis of them, it would seem that it was anticipated that the clerk would retain the 12 per cent. after deducting 16 per cent. and pay the same into the treasury, holding defendant's letter of February 10 as his voucher therefor as against defendant, which, as the case now stands, I think he was fully authorized to do. The clerk's office is a public office. The matters concerned were matters appearing by the public records in his office. The instructions of the postmaster general to the clerk, inclosing defendant's letter, became a part of those records. Those records are notice to all the world of what they contain, especially to parties to them. I think, therefore, there was a sufficient acceptance to make the proposal binding upon the parties. I have therefore said nothing about the amounts alleged in the bill to have been advanced by complainants to defendant Carlisle, to aid him in the prosecution of the suit, because if there was anything of that, it was all merged in the compromise based upon Carlisle's letter of February 10, 1869, and as that compromise has sufficient foundation to stand upon without those items, they are of no consequence in the present consideration. Being of opinion, therefore, that at least a prima facie case is made out against the defendant Carlisle, and that therefore, so much of the moiety of the fund in question going to Carlisle as is necessary to meet the claim of complainant upon that moiety should be retained in the clerk's hands until the case can be presented and fully heard upon its merits, an injunction will be allowed to issue as against him. The defendant Davison is clerk of the court in whose hands as such a portion of the fund in dispute now is, and the residue will eventually come. The object of making him a party defendant was solely to restrain him from paying over the fund to Carlisle until the merits of the case can be litigated between him and the complainant. The whole object sought would probably be accomplished by the injunction against Carlisle alone; but inasmuch as Davison admits that he threatens to pay over the fund to Carlisle, regardless of the claims set up by complainant, I think complainant is entitled to an injunction against him also. The motion for injunction is granted as against both defendants, but it must be so modified as to restrain Carlisle from receiving and the clerk from paying over to him only 12 per cent of the whole amount of the moiety decreed to Carlisle, less 16 per cent. thereof.

The case was subsequently heard on pleadings and proofs and taken under advisement by the court. The opinion of the court on the final hearing, was as follows:

LONGYEAR, District Judge. When the case was before the court on the motion for a preliminary injunction, the questions involved, as presented by the pleadings, were fully considered. In the light in which the case was thus presented it was held "that the proposition contained in the letter of defendant Carlisle of February 10th, 1869, if accepted by complainant, would vest in complainant an interest in defendant's moiety of the judgment fund in controversy, equal to 12 per cent. thereof after deducting 16 per cent. therefrom for his expenses; and that such interest standing upon the record, as it does, in defendant's name, he must be treated * * * as a trustee of the fund to that extent, for complainant." It was also then further held, that a sufficient acceptance by complainant of Carlisle's proposition in his said letter of February 10th, 1869, to make the terms of that proposition binding upon the parties appeared by the pleadings. I can see nothing in the proofs which have since been taken that tends to change or modify the conclusions thus arrived at upon the pleadings; on the contrary, I find much in those proofs tending to confirm those conclusions. The proofs show that the transactions between the postmaster general and Carlisle, out of which this suit has arisen, were contracted in a very loose and bungling manner; and if they were left to stand entirely upon the proof of what took place between them, without the light thrown upon those transactions by their letters, it would be very difficult to say just what those transactions were, and what rights and liabilities, if any, were created. By the letters, however, it appears that the postmaster general and Carlisle never had any doubts whatever upon those points, but on the contrary, that they understood each other perfectly well. The only doubt Carlisle seems to have entertained at any time was that expressed in his first letter to the postmaster general (Nov. 25th, 1868), relating to the reward of 25 per cent. to be paid to Brown, and that was (quoting his language) "whether it should come from the moiety going to the government, or whether it should be paid from the entire amount recovered, and the balance be divided between the government and the prosecutor, according to the terms of the law." In this letter Carlisle says to the postmaster general: "I desire to learn the views, and to receive your instructions, as to how and the manner in which the 25 per cent. is to be paid." In reply to this the postmaster general, in his letter of January 7th, 1869, says: "The 25 per cent. referred to must first be deducted, as also must the sum paid assistant counsel ($500), and the amount paid Louis Brush ($853.12), your assistant, for services and expenses." So well satisfied was Carlisle with this reply that we find him filing a copy of it in the case in which the judgment to which it relates was recovered, with an indorsement in his own handwriting, as instructions to the clerk, as follows: "The proportions, I think, in which distribution will be made, as indicated by the within, would be: Costs, 83 per cent.; informer's share, 25 per cent.; balance equally between government and prosecutor." It is this reply of the postmaster general to which Carlisle also alludes in his letter of February 10, 1869, in which the new arrangement which constitutes the basis of this suit was proposed. It is difficult to conceive of a more complete or conclusive recognition or admission of an existing arrangement or agreement than what is shown by the above facts. Here then was a full and valid consideration for the proposition contained in Carlisle's letter of February 10, 1869. In fact the new arrangement, or agreement, which resulted from the proposition, was but a substitution for the former arrangement.

When this case was before the court on the former occasion alluded to, it was held that the filing of Carlisle's letter of February 10, 1869, with the clerk of the court, by the postmaster general, with instructions to him to comply with so much of the terms as related to conditions to be performed on the part of the government, was such an acceptance of the propositions contained in said letter as made it binding in all its parts, on both parties. In addition to this we now have Carlisle's express admission in his testimony, that he knew the above facts and that the postmaster general was acting upon the said letter. Thus the substituted arrangement was made as complete and binding as it could be. It will not do to say that because the postmaster general in his instructions to the clerk of the court, accompanying Carlisle's letter, said nothing about the 12 per cent., but merely instructed the clerk to pay to Brown the 25 per cent., from the moiety going to the government, it was no acceptance of the proposition in all its parts. The instructions accompanied the letter and had express reference to it. All that was needed as between the government and the clerk of the court, one of its own officers, was to confer upon the latter authority to do on the part of the government what was to be done by it under Carlisle's proposition. What was to be done by Carlisle in consideration of such performance on the part of the government would follow as a matter of course. A decree must be entered in this case making the injunction heretofore issued perpetual, and for the payment to complainant by the clerk of the district court out of the moiety of the judgment against Thomas and others described in the bill of complaint, adjudged to the defendant Carlisle, a sum equal to 12 per cent. of said moiety, after deducting from said moiety 16 per cent. for expenses, etc., and for costs to complainant as against the defendant Carlisle, but without costs as against the defendant Davison.

Case No. 14,725.

UNITED STATES v. CARLTON.

[1 Gall. 400.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1813.

PRACTICE AT LAW—QUESTION OF LAW—APPEAL—IMMATERIAL ERROR.

1. It is error for the court to declare a question of law to be a question of fact.

2. Although an error appear on the record, yet, if in distinct pleadings, a complete bar is shown to the action, the judgment must be affirmed.

[Cited in McNulty v. Batty, 2 Pin. 58.]

[In error to the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.

[This was an action by the United States against William Carlton.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. What constitutes an importation is, when all the facts are given, a question of law. Under the circumstances of the present case, the judge in the court below ought to have instructed the jury, at what time the importation in point of law took place, so as to attach the right to duties thereon, if they believed the evidence; and not have left the whole as a matter of fact for their consideration. There was error, therefore, in deciding that it was a mere question of fact proper for the consideration of the jury, as the judge below seems to have held. I say "seems to have held," for the language is singularly obscure, and can have no other rational interpretation. This error would, in general, be a sufficient ground for a reversal of the judgment. But it appears from the pleadings (on the technical accuracy of which we give no opinion), that the defendant, on the day the bond became due, tendered the full sum contained in the alternative of the condition of the bond, in discharge thereof. This we have held in U. S. v. Thompson [Case No. 16,486], to be a legal discharge thereof; and as therefore in no event could the United States have had judgment on the facts admitted by the pleadings, we are bound to affirm the judgment, notwithstanding the error in the opinion of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

Case No. 14,726.

UNITED STATES v. CARNOT.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 469.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1824.

LARCENY — BANK-NOTES — WITNESS — INTEREST — JURY DE MEDIETATE LINGUAE.

1. The owner of the goods stolen, after having released to the United States and to the prisoner, all his interest in the fine, is a competent witness for the United States, and may be examined generally.

2. A foreigner in Virginia is entitled to a jury de medietate linguæ.

3. Bank-notes are not goods and chattels, and cannot be the subject of larceny at common law.

The prisoner [Alexander Carnot] was indicted at common law, for stealing certain bank-notes, the property of W. B. Stewart, to wit, two bank-notes of the Bank of Virginia, and one ten-dollar bank-note of the Bank of the United States. W. B. Stewart, the owner of the notes, was called to testify for the United States, and stated that he had collected $95, which he had laid by in his desk to pay a particular debt; that he had not seen it for two or three days, when going to his desk, he missed $60. That he asked his wife, who denied she had taken it, and said it must have been taken by the Frenchman, (meaning the prisoner.)

THE COURT here interposed and stopped the witness, and, asked if it was agreed that he should be examined generally.

Mr. Taylor, for the prisoner, objected to the witness because he was entitled to one half of the fine which the court might impose.

Mr. Swann, the district attorney, obtained a release from the witness to the United States, and to the prisoner of all right to the fine; and the court permitted the witness to be examined generally.

Mr. Ramsay, for the prisoner, in argument to the jury said that the prisoner might have required a jury de medietate linguæ.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) intimated a doubt upon that point, as it was not allowed in Maryland.

Mr. Herbert afterwards produced "The Richmond Inquirer" of November 4, 1823 (volume XX., No. 52), in which it is stated that in the case of U. S. v. Cartacho [Case No. 14,738], in the circuit court of the United States, before Mr. Chief Justice Marshall and Judge St. George Tucker, "the court, according to the motion of the prisoner's counsel, directed the discharge of the jury that had been previously summoned, and that a new array should be impanelled, one half of which to be foreigners, who were not citizens of the United States." INTERNAL REVENUE—OWNERSHIP OF ILLICIT DISTILLERY—BOND—RECORDS—HOW PROVEN.

1. Where the statute does not require a copy of a bond to be made and preserved, or the bond to be recorded or otherwise chronicled in a book or other place, the testimony of the proper officer that no bond has been given, as required by law, is to be taken as evidence of the fact without the production of the records of his office, which would not be admissible as evidence.

2. Whoever aids in the act of illegal distilling is to be held responsible under the law without regard to ownership of the still or its product.

[This was an information against W. W. Carpenter. Heard on motion for a new trial.]

H. P. Farrow, U. S. Atty., and Geo. S. Thomas, Asst. U. S. Atty., for the Government.

Mr. Payne and W. F. Wright, for defendant.

ERSKINE, District Judge. The United States attorney filed a criminal information against the defendant for carrying on the business of distiller without having given bond. The grounds relied upon for a new trial are, (1) That the court erred in permitting the witness, Holtzclaw (the collector of internal revenue), to prove by parol, over the objections of defendant, that he had examined the books and papers in his office, and he had been unable to find the bond of the defendant on file there. Defendant's counsel insisting that the legal mode of proving the facts would be, by the production, in open court, of the books and papers, or by showing, after diligent search, their loss or destruction, or that they were otherwise inaccessible to the court or defendant; and that parol evidence was not admissible, "because the witness testified that the papers were in his office in Atlanta, and could" (therefore) "have been reached by subpœna duces tecum." (2) "Because the court erred in ruling out that part of the evidence of Randolph Jones which proved that James Carpenter, who was present with defendant and exercising acts of ownership, and while in possession and exercising acts of ownership, and in presence of said defendant, declared that the still was his, the said James Carpenter's, and not defendant's, the declarations being made while he was engaged in the acts constituting him, the said James, a distiller.

The testimony was as follows, to wit: Holtzclaw testified: "Have examined the books and papers in my office back to the first of January, 1874, and found no bond executed by defendant as a distiller; have made a pretty thorough examination. No such paper in my office, no bond filed, none given. Books and papers in my office." Randolph Jones sworn: "Saw defendant and his son, James Carpenter, at a still-house in this district; saw defendant assist James in pouring some warm water upon some meal." Cross-examination: "James Carpenter, while at the still-house, told witness that he (James) owned the still-house, and that he made this declaration while in the still-house and exercising acts of ownership."

When the statutory prerequisites are complied with (see the arts. passim), the applicant must make a bond with sureties, conditioned that he will faithfully comply with the law, etc. It is the duty of the collector to approve the bond, after which the party may begin distilling. It was not questioned that the collector is the proper custodian of the bond, after it has been approved by him, or that his office is the place to lodge and preserve it. But it was urged that the legal mode of proving that no bond had been given, was by the production, in court, of the books and papers, or by showing their loss or destruction, or their inaccessibility; and that parol evidence was inadmissible because Holtzclaw testified that the papers were in his office and could be reached by subpœna duces tecum. Holtzclaw swore that he had examined the books and papers in his office back to the 1st of January, 1874, and found no bond of defendant's—no such paper there; no bond filed, none given.

It seems to me that the testimony disposes of the first objection taken; for as the statute does not require a copy of the bond to be made and preserved, or the bond to be recorded or otherwise chronicled in a book or other place, the production of books or papers would not be admissible as evidence. Indeed, if the objection and its legal effect be fairly tested, it, in its consequences, goes to this extent; if no bond could be discovered in the collector's office, and the books and papers of his office were produced under a subpœna duces tecum, in court, and no evidence could be found in them, showing that defendant had given the bond as required by law, or if given and approved, that the bond had since been lost or destroyed, the burden of proof would be shifted from the prosecutor to the defendant. But as already remarked neither the books nor papers would be legal testimony. So then, the burden of proof was changed when the witness, Holtzclaw, testified that no bond could be found in his office; that none had been filed; further, that none had been given. See Elkins v. State, 13 Ga. 435.

As to the second point, that the court erred in ruling out the admissions of James Carpenter made in the presence of the defendant, that he, James Carpenter, and not the defendant, owned the still, (still-house says the evidence); and that this declaration was made while said James was exercising acts of ownership, and engaged in acts which constituted him a distiller; the court was of the opinion that this testimony was irrelevant. It will be remembered that, in misdemeanors, all contrivers, aiders and procurers are principals. And the statute does not make it an ingredient, that the party carrying on a distillery shall be the owner or part owner of the still. The admission was made while James Carpenter was doing acts which constituted him a distiller and the defendant was assisting by pouring warm water upon meal. Therefore, if the defendant did, in the least degree assist in procuring or contriving the committing of the illegal act, he would not in anywise be excused because the still belonged to another. And it may be remarked that the evidence is, that James Carpenter, in the defendant's presence, said that the still-house was owned by him, (James) and not by defendant; which language, if taken in a general sense, would not, strictly speaking, mean the vessel and apparatus, but simply the house. But as the expression "still-house" may have been intended, before used by James Carpenter, to include the still, the defendant should have the doubt resolved in his favor. And this might have been favorable to a new trial, if the act of congress had made ownership an element in constituting a person a distiller.

Motion for a new trial overruled.

District Court, N. D. California. 1864.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—DECREE OF CONFIRMATION—OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY.

[Act May 6, 1864 (13 Stat. 69), giving persons claiming lands within the San Ramon rancho the right to test the correctness of the location of the lands confirmed to the claimants of that rancho, notwithstanding any official or approved survey under said decree of confirmation, and notwithstanding any stipulation or consent given by the district attorney authorizing such location, does not give the district court power to revise a decree of confirmation rendered by it, under an agreement between the claimant and the district attorney, in conformity with which the location was made, no mistake having occurred, and the consent of the United States authorities being deliberately given.]

[This was a claim by H. W. Carpentier for the rancho San Ramon in Contra Costa county.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This case comes up on objections to the survey, filed on the part of the United States and of certain persons intervening in the suit. The circumstances of this case are, in some respects, peculiar. A statement of the various proceedings had in it is therefore necessary. The grant under which the land is claimed was made by Governor Figueroa on the 10th June, 1833, to Bartolo Pacheco and Mariano Castro. Under this grant two claims, each for an undivided half of the land, were presented to the board. One of these claims was in the name of Rafaela Soto de Pacheco, and in the other that of Domingo Peralta. The claim of Pacheco was rejected by the board, for some defect in the mesne conveyances; but that of Peralta was confirmed. Both cases were appealed.

The board had confirmed the claim of Peralta to "one-half of the tract called 'San Ramon' containing two square leagues of land, more or less." In the decree the boundaries of this tract were set forth, and reference was made to the diseño which accompanied the expediente On the hearing of the cause in this court it appeared that the calls of the grant and the delineation on the diseño described the tract with much certainty, and as the quantity included within these limits was understood to be but slightly in excess of two leagues, the claim was confirmed to one-half of the tract within the boundaries, but without limitation as to quantity. This decree was entered on the 2d day of March, 1857. From this decree the United States appealed, April 1, 1857. On the 5th January, 1858, the district attorney having been advised by the attorney general that the United States did not desire to prosecute the appeal, filed the usual consent that the order granting the appeal be vacated, and that an order be entered allowing the claimant to proceed on the decree of this court as on final decree. This order was accordingly made on the same day. On the 13th of the succeeding month, the claim of Pacheco, for the other moiety of the rancho, was confirmed without opposition, and on the 15th a decree was entered in which the tract was described by metes and bounds in the same terms as in the decree entered in favor of Peralta. As the attorney general had already abandoned the appeal in the latter case, no appeal was taken from the decree in favor of Pacheco. On the 10th March, 1858, a notice was given by the district attorney of a motion to open the decree in the Peralta case. In support of this motion affidavits were filed, showing that the land included within the boundaries was of the extent of about four leagues, instead of two leagues, as had been previously supposed. On the 3d December, 1859, an amended decree was entered. The opinion of the court, delivered at the time, sets forth the reasons for its determination, but its attention does not appear to have been called to the fact that more than two terms had elapsed since the entry of the decree which was thus set aside and amended. No similar amended decree was entered in the Pacheco case, although a motion was made to the effect, which was overruled, probably because the proper notices had not been served. The motion however, was not renewed.

To this amended decree the claimant in the Peralta case strenuously objected, contending that, by a just interpretation, the grant was for a tract with fixed boundaries, and not for a certain quantity of land, and, moreover, that the decree of this court, and the dismissal of the appeal taken by the United States, with the consent of the district attorney, that the decree should be deemed final, deprived this court of all authority to alter or amend it. The claimant accordingly appealed from the decree as amended, and the proceedings were pending until June 4, 1862. On that day Mr. Della Torre, former district attorney, and who, by appointment of the attorney general, represented the interests of the United States, by an agreement with Mr. Carpentier, who represented the claim of Peralta, submitted a decree to the court to which both parties consented. By the terms of this decree the claimant was to be restricted to the quantity of two leagues of land, but he was to be allowed to select that quantity anywhere within the exterior boundaries provided it was in one tract. In consideration of this Mr. Carpentier consented to abandon the appeal he had taken from the second decree of this court, and to forego any rights he had acquired under the first decree, the dismissal of the appeal from it, and the consent to its finality by the United States. On the same day, June 4th, a similar amended decree was entered in the Pacheco case. Under the decree in favor of Mr. Carpentier, who had been substituted as claimant in place of Peralta, a survey was made, which on application of certain parties holding under Romero, the claimant of an adjoining tract, was ordered into court.

Numerous depositions were taken on either side, and the case was still pending when, on the 6th May, 1864, a special act of congress [13 Stat. 69] was passed, the effect of which has now to be considered. By this act it is in substance provided, that any persons claiming, whether as pre-emptors, settlers or otherwise, any of the lands included within the exterior boundaries of the San Ramon rancho, shall have the right "in all courts" to test the correctness of the location of the lands confirmed to the claimants of that rancho, notwithstanding any official or approved survey thereof, now or hereafter to be made, under said decree of confirmation, and notwithstanding any stipulation or consent given by the district attorney authorizing such locations. It is unnecessary to consider whether by this act there is given to the persons described in it the right to contest in the state courts, at any time, the correctness of any location which may hereafter be made, and approved by this or the appellate court. It is enough to say that, at least, the right to contest in this court the correctness of the survey which has been made is clearly conferred, and this notwithstanding any stipulation or consent given by the district attorney, authorizing such locations.

Bound as I am to give effect to the will of the legislature, I have, nevertheless, felt great difficulty in determining how, and to what extent, the right proposed to be conferred shall be exercised. On two points involved in this cause there can be no reasonable doubt: (1) If the claimants are entitled to only two leagues, the survey and location that have been made are clearly not such as this court could approve, or as the surveyor, acting under the general instructions of the land office, would have made. (2) The survey that has been made is admitted on all hands to be in strict conformity with the decree. It is in conformity not merely with the terms of the decree, but with its intent and meaning, and in accordance with the understanding embodied in the decree, by which the claimants agreed to relinquish their claim to have the whole tract within the exterior boundaries included within the survey, and to be limited to the precise quantity of two leagues, in consideration of being permitted to select the two leagues anywhere within the boundaries, provided they were in one tract. This arrangement was deliberately made by the representatives of the United States more than two years ago, and embodied in a consent decree. The survey that has been made is admitted to be such as the decree was intended to authorize. Under these circumstances, the contestants dispute the "correctness of the location." It is evident that congress was under the impression that the only obstacle which prevented settlers and others from bringing this survey before the courts for correction and reform was a stipulation and consent by the district attorney, authorizing the survey to be made in this form. They do not seem to have been aware that that consent was embodied in a final decree of this court, and that, so long as that decree stands, the survey must be held to be correct, for it conforms to the decree. That this court, in passing upon the correctness of a survey, is limited to the inquiry whether it conforms to the decree, has been explicitly decided by the supreme court. In the case of Fossat v. U. S. [2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 649], recently before the supreme court, the decision of this court was reversed in part, on the ground that the survey approved by this court did not conform to the decree of confirmation.

In speaking of the action of this court, the supreme court says: "This direction of the court not only reformed the survey of the tract, as made by the surveyor general, but reformed the decree itself of the court, entered on the 18th October, 1858, in pursuance of which the survey had been made. The court assumed that the survey and location of the tract was not to be governed by the decree, but, on the contrary, that it was open to the court to revise, alter, and change it at discretion, and to require the surveyor general to conform his survey to any new or amended decree. * * * The duty of the surveyor general under all these acts is to survey and locate the confirmed tract in conformity with the decree. It is the only guide furnished him, and one of the first instructions from the land office is as follows: 'In the survey of finally confirmed land claims, you must be strictly governed by the decree of confirmation,' etc." It is to be remembered that in the case of U. S. v. Fossat, the original suit had been between the United States and the claimant alone. The location of the common line of division between the Fossat rancho and the adjoining rancho of Berreyesa was disputed. But Berreyesa was not a party to the suit, nor had he, as the supreme court had expressly decided, any right to intervene in the proceeding. The decree of confirmation, therefore, of the Fossat claim, was made in a suit to which Berreyesa was a stranger, and by the terms of the act of 1851 [9 Stat. 631], it was not to affect the rights of third persons. Under the provisions of the act of 1860 [12 Stat. 22], Berreyesa appeared for the first time as a contestant of the correct location of the dividing line between himself and his neighbor.

It would be hard to imagine a case where the rights of a party intervening, to have the common boundary of his own and a neighbor's rancho fixed as might appear to be just, and irrespective to the terms of any decree obtained by the latter in a suit between himself and the United States, would be stronger. The supreme court, however, determined that this court had no authority to alter or amend its first decree, and that the inquiry into the correctness of the survey and location by the surveyor general, was merely an inquiry whether the survey was in conformity with the decree, from which, even on the intervention of a colindante, under the act of 1860, neither the surveyor general nor the court was at liberty to depart. The language of the supreme court on this point is clear and unmistakable. It has almost the air of a rebuke to this court for departing from what was supposed to be its former decree. To the same effect is the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Folsom (not reported), and in a recent act of congress by which the power of reforming and correcting surveys, conferred on this court by the act of 1860, is withdrawn, the surveyor general is required in all cases to strictly conform to the decree of confirmation.

From the foregoing it is plain that, even if the parties objecting to this survey were, like Berreyesa, persons for the first time heard in the cause, the court could only inquire whether the survey conformed to the decree, and it would not be at liberty, on hearing new allegations and proofs, to locate the land in any other manner than that prescribed in the decree, notwithstanding that, on an examination of the original papers, and hearing proofs adduced by the intervener, it might believe the decree to be in some respects erroneous. A fortiori, it follows that, where the parties contesting claim under the United States, they are bound by the terms of a final decree entered by consent of the United States. This case is said to involve great hardships to a large number of most respectable persons. But I am unable to perceive how, under the law as expounded by the supreme court, this court can pronounce a survey to be incorrect which is admitted to be in strict conformity with the final decree of confirmation. It may be said, however, that the decree itself should be vacated and set aside. But the recent act of congress gives no such power to this court. It admits certain parties to contest the correctness of the survey, notwithstanding any stipulation by the district attorney, authorizing such survey; but it gives no power to the court to vacate or alter a final decree entered more than two years ago. That the court had no such power independently of the statute, the decision of the supreme court, already cited, conclusively shows; and it will be noted that the reasons for its exercise were far stronger in that case than in this. For in this case the United States, and people claiming under them, may not unreasonably be held bound by a decree in a suit to which the United States was a party; while in the Fossat Case, the person intervening was not a party to the suit when the decree was entered. If it be suggested that the court has the same power to set aside the last consent decree, as it had to alter and amend its first decree, the answer is plain.

In assuming authority to amend its first decree, the court proceeded on two grounds: (1) The decree sought to be amended was founded on a mistake of facts. It was supposed that the land embraced within the exterior boundaries was but slightly, if at all, in excess of two leagues. It was subsequently ascertained to be more than four leagues in extent. The court therefore, by amending its decree, merely entered such a judgment as, had it been apprised of the facts, it would have entered in the first instance. But, with the consent decree, no mistake has occurred. All the facts were well known to the representatives of the United States. The consent was deliberately given, and the decree, which was thought to secure a great advantage to the United States, was formally entered, with full knowledge of its effect and operation. I know not on what ground the United States, or persons claiming under them, can now ask that it be set aside. (2) At the time the decree was amended, the supreme court, by its then latest decision, was supposed to have declared that all decrees of confirmation were simply interlocutory, and that the jurisdiction of the court over the case remained until a patent was issued. Under this view, it was natural to suppose that this court had, soon after the expiration of the term, power to amend its decree, especially where it had been mistaken as to matters of fact. But, in the last decision rendered by the supreme court, the decree of confirmation is, as we have seen, declared to be a final and conclusive determination of the boundaries and location described in it. And this, not only as between the United States and the claimant and parties their privies, but as between the claimant and a neighbor who was not a party to the cause when the decree was entered, and when the boundary established by the decree is the common boundary line between his rancho and that of the claimant. But, even if this court had authority to set aside or disregard the decree under which this survey has been made, it by no means follows that it could now direct the quantity of two leagues of land to be located as might appear to be just.

It has already been stated that, by the first decree of this court, there was confirmed to the claimant the entire tract. This decree was afterwards amended, so as to restrict the claimant to two leagues, and no more. But this amendment was made, not only after the expiration of the term, but after an appeal which had been taken by the United States had been dismissed by the order of the attorney general, and a consent given that the decree rendered should be final. Whether, under these circumstances, this court had any authority to enter a new decree presented a difficult and doubtful question.

The claimants, having appealed from this amended decree, had a right to the judgment of the supreme court whether (1) he had not, as he contended, by the terms of the original grant, a right to all the land within his boundaries, whatever might be its extent; and (2) whether, by force of the first decree of this court, the dismissal of the appeal by the United States, and the consent that the decree should be final, his right to the whole tract was not res adjudicata beyond the power of this court to disturb. When, therefore, the claimant consented to abandon his appeal, and to accept a decree restricting him to two leagues, and the United States on their part agreed that the two leagues might be located at his election, it is clear that if, by force of subsequent special legislation, or in any other way, the claimant is deprived of the consideration for his agreement, the whole agreement should be annulled, and he should be restored to his former position, with his right of appeal to the supreme court unimpaired. But the special act referred to gives no authority to this court to effect so extensive and important a change in the whole posture of the case. It authorizes the parties named to "contest the correctness" of the survey, but it gives no authority to the court to vacate its decree, or to determine the correctness of the survey by any other rules, or on any other considerations than those by which it is governed in ordinary cases.

Under the law as laid down by the supreme court, I am compelled to pronounce any survey made in conformity with the decree of confirmation to be correct. As this survey is admitted to be in conformity with the decree of confirmation, it must therefore be confirmed. It is a satisfaction to me to know that, if this decision be erroneous, the recent law by which appeals from this court, in survey cases, are to be taken to the circuit, and not to the supreme, court, affords to the parties interested an easy and expeditious remedy.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 439.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1823.

CRIMINAL PRACTICE—INDICTMENT—INDORSEMENT OF PROSECUTOR'S NAME—RECOGNIZANCE.

In cases of misdemeanor, the court in Alexandria will not compel the traverser to plead to the indictment, until a prosecutor's name be indorsed; and the recognizance will be respited; unless the attorney of the United States shall satisfy the court that it is a case which ought to be excepted out of the general rule.

[Cited in U. S. v. Helriggle, Case No. 15,344.]

Indictment for selling spirituous liquors without license. No name of a prosecutor was written at the foot of the indictment, as required by the Virginia statute of November 13, 1792, c. 74, §§ 24, 25. Nor had the offence been presented by the grand jury, upon the knowledge of two of their body, nor upon the testimony of a witness called upon by the court, or the grand jury, according to the provisions of the Virginia statute of December 2, 1795, c. 188, § 2.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant [David Carr], objected to pleading until a prosecutor's name should be indorsed.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) said that they would not compel the defendant to plead to the indictment until a prosecutor's name should be indorsed, and that the recognizance should be respited.

Mr. Swann, for the United States, stated that the recognizance had been returned by a justice of the peace, with the names of the witnesses, and he sent them to the grand jury; and that he could satisfy the court that it is a case which should be excepted out of the general rule, and a day was assigned to hear the witnesses. UNITED STATES v. CARR.

[3 Sawy. 302.][1]

District Court, D. Oregon. March 23, 1875.

EXTORTION UNDER COLOR OF OFFICE—COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS — CRIMES COMMITTED IN ALASKA—JURISDICTION.

1. Section 12 of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 118), defining the crime of extortion under color of office, so far as officers of the customs are concerned, is an act relating to customs, and was therefore extended over Alaska by section 1 of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 240).

2. Alaska being a place without the limits of any state or judicial district of the United States, within the meaning of section 14 of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 118; Rev. St. § 730) this court has jurisdiction to try a person charged with the commission of a crime therein; provided such person is found in the district of Oregon or first brought here.

[Cited in U. S. v. Williams, 2 Fed. 62.]

3. Section 5481 of the Revised Statutes, being passed June 22, 1874, after the cession of Alaska, is in force there from the time of its passage.

[These were indictments against John A. Carr.]

Rufus Mallory, for the United States.

Joseph N. Dolph, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. Two indictments (Nos. 420 and 444) have been found against the defendant, the collector of customs at Fort Wrangel, Alaska, charging him with the commission of the crime of extortion under color of office. The defendant demurs to the indictments.

In support of the demurrer, it is maintained: (1) That section 12 of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 118), defining the crime of extortion under color of office was not extended over Alaska by section 1 of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 240), which only included "the laws of the United States, relating to customs, commerce and navigation;" (2) that upon the cession of territory to the United States, as in the cession of Alaska, the laws of the United States are not extended over it proprio vigore; and (3) that if the act of 1825, defining the crime of extortion, was extended over Alaska upon its acquisition by the United States, still this court has no jurisdiction to try the defendant for a violation thereof, because the jurisdiction of this court over offenses committed in Alaska is conferred by the act of 1868 aforesaid, which only gives such jurisdiction for violation of that act and the laws relating to customs, commerce and navigation.

To this it is replied by the prosecution: (1) That the act of 1825 defining extortion, so far as the defendant, a deputy collector of customs, is concerned, is an act relating to customs—a revenue law—and therefore in force in Alaska by means of the act of 1868 aforesaid. (2) That said law being a general one for the punishment of extortion by any officer of the United States, was in force in Alaska proprio vigore from the time of its cession to the United States. (3) That by section 5481 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, passed June 22, 1874, the crime of extortion by an officer of the United States is defined, and that said act being passed since the cession of Alaska is in force there from the time of its passage, which was prior to the commission of the crime charged in the indictment No. 444. (4) That although this court would not have jurisdiction of these offenses for the sole reason that they were committed in Alaska, unless the act defining the crime of extortion was pro tanto an act relating to customs, and therefore extended over Alaska by the said act of 1868; yet under section 14 of said act of 1825 (Rev. St. § 730), if the law punishing extortion was otherwise in force in Alaska, this court would have jurisdiction to try the defendant upon the charges, if it appears that this is the district in which he was found or first brought, because Alaska, the place where the alleged crimes were committed, is without the limits of any state or district of the United States.

The demurrers must be overruled. The act defining the crime of extortion, and providing for its punishment, includes officers of the customs, and so far it is an act "relating to customs," and is, therefore, in force in Alaska by virtue of section 1 of the act of July 27, 1868, extending "the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation" over that country, if not proprio vigore.

Besides section 12 of the act of 1825, defining extortion, having been re-enacted on June 22, 1874, as section 5481 of the Revised Statutes,—after the cession of Alaska to the United States,—was, therefore, in force in that country proprio vigore at the time the crime charged in No. 444 is alleged to have been committed. This being so, the facts stated constitute a crime, of which this court has jurisdiction, it also appearing that it was committed without the jurisdiction of any particular state or district (section 14 of act of 1825; Rev. St. § 730); and that the defendant was first brought into this district, independent of the jurisdiction specially conferred upon it by section 7 of the Alaska act of 1868 (Rev. St. § 1957).

The demurrers are overruled, but the defendant may be heard upon the same questions in arrest of judgment if a verdict should be given against him on the trial.

The defendant afterwards pleaded guilty and was fined.

UNITED STATES v. CARR et al.

[3 Sawy. 477.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. Sept. 27, 1875.[2]

PUBLIC LANDS—CALIFORNIA—TITLE—APPROPRIATION FOR PUBLIC USES—DEDICATION—GRANT.

1. The title of the city of San Francisco, under the Mexican law, was so far subject to the control of the former government, previous to the conquest and cession of the country, and of the United States subsequently, that portions of the lands within the limits claimed by the city could have been reserved by those governments, respectively, for public purposes at any time before the title had become, by action of the authorities of the city, vested in private parties.

2. As against parties having no title in themselves, holding by intrusion, mere trespassers, the possession of the government for a hospital for infirm and disabled seamen, of a part of the four lots in the city of San Francisco, upon which the hospital is situated, under a deed from the city authorities, with claim to the remainder of the lots for the same purposes, and the assertion of that claim by the removal of the intruders, is an occupation for public uses of the whole premises, within the meaning of the act of congress of 1864 [13 Stat. 333], which excepts from the grant to the city "all sites or other parcels of land" which had been or were then occupied for such uses by the United States.

[Cited in People v. Monk, 28 Pac. 1116.]

3. The setting apart of the premises for a hospital by direction of the government, with the appropriation by congress of moneys to the support of the institution, the construction of buildings thereon, and inclosure of the land, show a dedication of the premises for a public use within the meaning of the decree and confirmatory act of March 3, 1866 [14 Stat. 4], both of which excepted from confirmation to the city parcels of land which had been previously reserved or dedicated to public uses.

This suit was brought to quiet the title to four fifty-vara lots, situated within the city of San Francisco, upon two of which stands the United States Marine Hospital.

In June, 1851, commissioners for the construction of public buildings in San Francisco, appointed by the secretary of the treasury, selected a place on what is known as "Rincon Point" in the city, as a suitable site for a marine hospital. Previous to the selection, and on the thirtieth of September, 1850, congress had appropriated the sum of fifty thousand dollars for the construction of a marine hospital, to be located by the secretary of the treasury at or near San Francisco. In August, 1852, and in August, 1854, further appropriations were made for the completion of the building, and the arrangement and inclosure of the grounds upon which it is situated. But previous to the commencement of the building the commissioners applied to the city authorities of San Francisco for a conveyance of the city's interest in the land which had been selected. In accordance with this application an ordinance was passed by the common council of the city, directing the mayor to execute a conveyance of the right, title and interest of the city to a block of land consisting of six fifty-vara lots, four of which constitute the premises in controversy. Subsequently the hospital was erected on two of the lots, numbered one and two of the blocks; and outstanding buildings connected with the hospital were constructed on two others of the lots, numbered three and four of the block; and these two were inclosed by a high fence connecting with the building. It is upon this deed and the subsequent use of the lots for a marine hospital that the United States rely. At the time the United States took possession of lots three and four there were several persons upon them, some of whom voluntarily left, and others were removed by the marshal of the United States. The defendants claim under parties thus dispossessed, and assert title to the premises under an ordinance of the city of San Francisco, known as the "Van Ness Ordinance," from its author, passed on the twentieth of June, 1855. By that ordinance the city relinquished and granted all her right and claim to the lands within her corporate limits, as defined by the charter of 1851, to the parties in the actual possession thereof, by themselves or tenants, on or before the first day of January, 1855, provided such possession was continued up to the time of the introduction of the ordinance into the common council, or if interrupted by an intruder or trespasser, had been or might be recovered by legal process. This ordinance was ratified and confirmed by the legislature of California on the eleventh of March, 1858. On the first of July, 1864, congress passed an act entitled "An act to expedite the settlement of titles to land in the state of California," by the fifth section of which, all the right and title of the United States to the lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, as defined by her charter of April 15, 1851, were relinquished and granted to the said city and its successors, for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinance of said city, there being excepted from this relinquishment and grant "all sites or other parcels of land" which had been or then were "occupied by the United States for military, naval, or other public uses." 13 Stat. 333. At the time the Van Ness ordinance was passed, the city of San Francisco asserted title, as successors of a Mexican pueblo, to four square leagues of land covering the site of the present city, and had exhibited her claim to the board of land commissioners created under the act of March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631]; and the board had confirmed the claim to a portion of the land, and rejected it for the residue. The city not being satisfied with the portion adjudged to her, prosecuted an appeal from the decision of the board to the United States district court, from which court the case was transferred to the circuit court of the United States for the district of California. That court adjudged the claim of the city to be valid to four square leagues of land subject to certain exceptions and reservations; and on the eighteenth of May, 1865, its final decree in the case was entered, which is as follows:

"Final Decree Confirming the Claim of the City of San Francisco to its Pueblo Lands, 1865. The City of San Francisco v. The United States. The appeal in this case taken by the petitioner, the city of San Francisco, from the decree of the board of land commissioners to ascertain and settle private land claims in the state of California, entered on the twenty-first day of December, 1854, by which the claim of the petitioner was adjudged to be valid, and confirmed to lands within certain described limits, coming on to be heard upon the transcript of proceedings and decision of said board, and the papers and evidence upon which said decision was founded, and further evidence taken in the district court of the United States for the Northern district of California pending said appeal—the said case having been transferred to this court by order of the said district court, under the provisions of section four of the act entitled 'An act to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California,' approved July 1, 1864—and counsel of the United States and for the petitioner having been heard, and due deliberation had, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the claim of the petitioner, the city of San Francisco, to the land hereinafter described, is valid, and that the same be confirmed. The land of which confirmation is made is a tract situated within the county of San Francisco, and embracing so much of the extreme upper portion of the peninsula above ordinary high-water mark (as the same existed at the date of the conquest of the country, namely, the seventh of July, A. D. 1846) on which the city of San Francisco is situated, as will contain an area of four square leagues—said tract being bounded on the north and east by the Bay of San Francisco; on the west by the Pacific Ocean; and on the south by a due east and west line drawn so as to include the area aforesaid, subject to the following deductions, namely: such parcels of land as have been heretofore reserved or dedicated to public uses by the United States; and also such parcels of land as have been by grants from lawful authority vested in private proprietorship, and have been finally confirmed to parties claiming under said grants by the tribunals of the United States, or shall hereafter be finally confirmed to parties claiming thereunder by said tribunals, in proceedings now pending therein for that purpose; all of which said excepted parcels of land are included within the area of four square leagues above mentioned, but are excluded from the confirmation to the city. This confirmation is in trust, for the benefit of the lot holders under grants from the pueblo, town, or city of San Francisco, or other competent authority, and as to any residue, in trust for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of the city. Field, Circuit Judge. San Francisco, May 18, 1865."

From this decree the United States and the city of San Francisco appealed—the United States from the whole decree, and the city from so much thereof as included certain lands reserved for public purposes in the estimate of the quantity confirmed. Whilst the appeal was pending in the supreme court of the United States, congress passed the following act: "An act to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco: Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled: That all the right and title of the United States to the land situated within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, in the state of California, confirmed to the city of San Francisco by the decree of the circuit court of the United States for the Northern district of California, entered on the eighteenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, be, and the same are, hereby relinquished and granted to the said city of San Francisco and its successors, and the claim of the said city to said land is hereby confirmed, subject, however, to the reservations and exceptions designated in said decree, and upon the following trusts, namely, that all the said land, not heretofore granted to said city, shall be disposed of and conveyed by said city to parties in the bona fide actual possession thereof by themselves or tenants, on the passage of this act, in such quantities and upon such terms and conditions as the legislature of the state of California may prescribe, except such parcels thereof as may be reserved and set apart by ordinance of said city for public uses: provided, however, that the relinquishment and grant by this act shall not interfere with or prejudice any valid adverse right or claim, if such exist, to said land or any part thereof, whether derived from Spain, Mexico, or the United States, or preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof. Approved March 8, 1866." At the December term of the supreme court of the United States for 1866—the term following the passage of the above act—the appeal of the United States and the appeal of the city of San Francisco, in the Pueblo Case, were both dismissed, by stipulation of counsel of the respective parties. FIELD, Circuit Justice. This is a suit on the equity side of the court to quiet the title of the United States to four fifty-vara lots constituting the southeasterly half of the block bounded by Harrison, Spear, Folsom and Main streets, in the city of San Francisco. And the principal question for determination is, whether these lots were excepted from the confirmation to the city by the decree of the circuit court of the United States in the Pueblo Case, and the legislation of congress. It is unnecessary to go into any examination of the character of the city's title under the Mexican law; that subject has been elaborately considered in several adjudications of this court. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to state that the title was so far subject to the control of the former government, previous to the conquest and cession of the country, and of the United States subsequently, that portions of the lands within the limits claimed by the city could have been reserved by those governments, respectively, for public purposes at any time before the title had become, by action of the authorities of the city, vested in private parties. It was, therefore, competent for the United States to set apart the premises in question, if not thus vested in private parties, for the erection of a hospital for disabled and infirm seamen, or for any other public purpose, at any time previous to the decree of the circuit court in the Pueblo Case, and the confirmatory act of congress of March 8, 1866, unless their right was relinquished by the fifth section of the act of July 1, 1864. That act relinquished and granted to the city the interest and right of the United States to lands within the charter limits of 1851, for the uses and purposes of the Van Ness ordinance; but it expressly excepted from its operation "all sites or other parcels of land" which had been or were then occupied by the United States for public uses.

The decree of the circuit court in the Pueblo Case also excepted from confirmation to the city, parcels of land which had been previously reserved or dedicated to public uses; and the confirmatory act of congress of 1866 provided for the same reservations.

It is clear from the evidence presented in the case, and from the whole history of the action of the government with respect to the Marine Hospital, that the United States have claimed the right to the four lots in controversy since the deed of the city, executed in December, 1862; and that at the date of the decree in the Pueblo Case, and the confirmatory act of congress, they were in possession of the premises under their deed, or at least of a part of them, using such part for the hospital, with claim to the balance for the same purpose. As against parties having no title in themselves, holding by intrusion, mere trespassers, this possession of the government of a part of the lots with claim to the balance under the deed, and the assertion of that claim by the removal of the intruders, is an occupation of the whole premises for a public use, within the meaning of the act of congress of 1864. And the setting apart of the premises for a hospital by direction of the government, with the appropriation by congress of moneys to the support of the institution, the construction of buildings thereon, and inclosure of the land, show a dedication of the premises for a public use within the meaning of the decree and confirmatory act.

The defendants rest all their claim upon rights acquired by possession under the Van Ness ordinance. But that ordinance could not apply to lots covered by the previous deed of the city, executed in December, 1862. That deed, it is true, was inoperative against a previous conveyance of the city to the commissioners of the funded debt, or grantees from them, but it was operative against any further disposition of the premises by the city, if any interest remained in the corporation. The Van Ness ordinance could not embrace lands in which the city's interest had been thus disposed of, for that ordinance only purported to give such interest as the city held. Of necessity, it could give no more. Hubbard v. Sullivan, 18 Cal. 508. The defendants had, therefore, no standing even under the Van Ness ordinance, but were simple intruders whose possession, if it existed as claimed, was, whilst it lasted, illegal and tortious.

The United States must have a decree to quiet the title, and declaring that the claim and assertion of an adverse interest by the defendants in the premises in controversy is without any just right and wholly invalid. And it is so ordered.

[Affirmed by the supreme court. 98 U. S. 433.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Clark, 31 Fed. 716.]

5. No mere words, applied by one man to another, will justify the use of a deadly weapon; nor can they be the lawful occasion of that "heat" which would reduce the act of killing from murder to manslaughter.

Robert E. Carr was indicted and tried, at the November term, 1872, of the circuit court for the Southern district of Georgia, for the willful murder of Harmon A. Jordan. The case was this: Both the prisoner and the deceased were soldiers in the 3d artillery, United States army, and were stationed at Fort Pulaski, on Cockspur Island, near the mouth of the Savannah river, in Georgia. On the 13th of July, 1872, the prisoner was the sergeant of the guard at the fort. About seven o'clock in the evening, a drunken quarrel occurred between some of the soldiers in the fort. Sergeant Bell, attempting to suppress the disorder, was taking Corporal McKinley to the guard house, when he was set upon by other soldiers and knocked down and left insensible upon the ground. A call was then made for the sergeant of the guard. The prisoner and three men of the guard at once crossed the parade to the scene of the disorder. The prisoner gave Sergeant Shirer, who was one of the disorderly soldiers, in charge of two men of the guard to convey him to the guard house. Shirer had lost his cap, and, when he asked leave to get it, the prisoner struck him with the butt of his musket and knocked him down. At this point, the deceased approached the prisoner and said to him, "You are a mean man," or "You are a damned mean man to knock a man down in that way." The prisoner then made an attempt to run his bayonet into deceased, who avoided the thrust, and turned and commenced running toward his quarters. Prisoner raised his piece to fire. It was at half-cock. He brought it down, cocked it, raised it again, and fired at deceased, who was at the time running from prisoner toward his quarters. The ball entered the back of deceased near the spine, passed through his body, coming out near the left nipple; passed through his left elbow and then struck the wall of the fort beyond. At the time he was shot, the deceased was eight or ten yards from prisoner. He died in about ten minutes. It was a disputed question of fact, upon the trial, whether the deceased was engaged in, or was trying to suppress, the disorder among the soldiers at the time the prisoner came up. There was also some evidence tending to show that the musket of the prisoner was discharged accidentally and not purposely, and that prisoner acted under the orders of the ranking sergeant in the fort. There was no commissioned officer within the fort at the time of the homicide.

Julian Hartridge and M. J. O'Donohue, for defense.

WOODS, Circuit Judge (charging jury). The prisoner stands at the bar of this court charged with the crime of willful murder. The indictment is based upon the third section of the act of congress, approved April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 113), which reads as follows: "That if any person or persons shall, within any fort, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or in any other place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, commit the crime of willful murder, such person or persons on conviction thereof shall suffer death." It charges that the prisoner, on the 13th of July, 1872, at and within Fort Pulaski, on Cockspur Island, within the Southern district of Georgia, the said fort being at that time under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, did, upon the person of one Harmon E. Jordan, commit the crime of willful murder by shooting him with a musket. To this indictment the prisoner has pleaded not guilty, and has put himself upon the country. He comes to the bar under the protection of that humane maxim of the law, that every man is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is shown. In other words, the burden of proof is on the United States to establish the prisoner's guilt. Until this is done, in the eye of the law he is innocent. The prosecution must prove to your satisfaction every material ingredient of the offense of willful murder, before you would be justified in returning a verdict of guilty.

Counsel for prisoner do not deny that on the 13th of July last at Fort Pulaski, within the Southern district of Georgia, Harmon E. Jordan was killed by a shot fired from a musket held in the hands of the prisoner. Nor do they deny that the United States has sole and exclusive jurisdiction over Cockspur Island, on which Fort Pulaski is situate. There is therefore no question raised as to the jurisdiction of this court to try the accused.

It is not every killing of a human being that is criminal. Many homicides are of such a nature as to be no crimes at all. This makes it necessary for the court to instruct you what constitutes the crime of willful murder as known to the law. Murder is defined to be "when a person of sound memory and discretion unlawfully killeth any reasonable creature in being and under the king's peace, with malice aforethought, express or implied." 3 Co. Inst. 47. In the case on trial it is not denied that the deceased, Harmon E. Jordan, was killed by a musket ball fired from a musket held in the hands of the prisoner, nor is it denied that the prisoner was of sound memory and discretion at that time, nor that Jordan was under the peace and protection of the law, so that the willful killing of him would be a crime. Therefore, according to the definition just quoted, the only points for you to pass upon in deciding whether the prisoner at the bar is guilty of murder are: First, was the killing unlawful? and second, was it done with malice aforethought, express or implied?

Upon the point whether or not the killing was unlawful, you will first inquire whether the act of the prisoner which resulted in the death of Jordan was intentional or unintentional. If it was unintentional, if the prisoner had no purpose to fire his piece, but it was discharged by him accidentally, and at the time of its discharge the prisoner was engaged in no unlawful act, then the act of killing is a homicide by misadventure, and is no crime. Therefore, if you shall be of opinion that the musket of the prisoner was accidentally discharged, and he was at the time engaged in no unlawful act, it would be your duty without further inquiry to return a verdict of not guilty. If, however, on the other hand, you believe the prisoner discharged his piece purposely, you will then inquire further whether the killing was lawful or unlawful. The simple fact, if such you find to be the fact, that the prisoner, on the 13th of July last, was sergeant of the guard at Fort Pulaski, and the deceased was at the same time and place a private soldier, does not of itself make the killing a lawful homicide. The willful killing of a soldier by a guard may be as clearly murder as the willful killing of one citizen by another. Nor will any order of a superior officer to an inferior in rank justify the willful killing of a person under the peace and protection of the law. A soldier is bound to obey only the lawful orders of his superiors. If he receives an order to do an unlawful act, he is bound neither by his duty nor his oath to do it. So far from such an order being a justification, it makes the party giving the order an accomplice in the crime. For instance, an order from an officer to a soldier to shoot another for disrespectful words merely would, if obeyed, be murder, both in the officer and soldier. It was the duty of the prisoner as officer of the guard to preserve the peace within the fort, and to suppress disorderly and mutinous conduct. He was authorized to use all proper and reasonable means to accomplish this end. But the means used and the force applied should be measured by the necessity of the case. For instance, the law would not justify the killing of a single unarmed soldier, even though drunken, riotous or even mutinous, when he could be arrested without resort to such extreme means. The means used must be proportioned to the end to be accomplished. In order to determine whether the homicide, now under investigation, was lawful or unlawful, you should consider what, under the circumstances of the case, would appear to a reasonable man to be the demands of duty. Place yourselves in the position of the prisoner at the time of the homicide. Inquire whether at the moment he fired his piece at the deceased, with his surroundings at that time, he had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, that the killing or serious wounding of the deceased was necessary to the suppression of a mutiny then and there existing, or of a disorder which threatened speedily to ripen into mutiny. If he had reasonable ground so to believe, and did so believe, then the killing was not unlawful. But if on the other hand, the mutinous conduct of the soldiers, if there was any such, had ceased, and it so appeared to the prisoner, or if he could reasonably have suppressed the disorder without the resort to such violent means as the taking of the life of the deceased, and it would so have appeared to a reasonable man under like circumstances, then the killing was unlawful. But it must be understood that the law will not require an officer charged with the order and discipline of a camp or fort to weigh with scrupulous nicety the amount of force necessary to suppress disorder. The exercise of a reasonable discretion is all that is required.

If you shall reach the conclusion under these instructions that the homicide under consideration was lawful, it will be your duty without further inquiry to return a verdict of not guilty. If however you shall be of opinion that the killing was unlawful, you will then proceed to inquire whether it was attended with malice aforethought, express or implied. "Malice aforethought is the grand criterion which distinguishes murder from other homicide, and it is not so properly spite or malevolence to the deceased in particular, as any evil design in general; the dictate of a wicked, depraved and malignant heart; a purpose to do a wicked act, and it may be either express or implied in law. Express malice is when one with a sedate, deliberate mind and formed design doth kill another, which formed design is evidenced by external circumstances discovering that inward intention, as lying in wait, antecedent menaces or former grudges, and concerted schemes to do him some bodily harm. So in many cases, when no malice is expressed, the law will imply it, as when a man willfully poisons another; in such a deliberate act the law presumes malice, though no particular enmity can be proved. And if a man kills another suddenly, without any, or without a considerable provocation, the law implies malice; for no person, except of abandoned heart, would be guilty of such an act upon a slight or upon no apparent cause." 4 Bl. Comm. 198. "Although the malice in murder is what is called 'malice aforethought,' yet there is no particular period of time during which it is necessary it should have existed, or the prisoner should have contemplated the homicide. If, for example, the intent to kill or do other great bodily harm is executed the instant it springs into the mind, the offense is as truly murder as if it had dwelt there for a long period." 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 677.

If you are satisfied that the prisoner at the bar when he fired upon the deceased intended not to kill him, but only to do him some great bodily harm, if his act was unlawful and was done with malice aforethought, as it has been explained to you, still he is guilty of murder. A recent act of congress declares that in all criminal causes the defendant may be found guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged in the indictment. Section 9, Act June 1, 1871 (17 Stat. 198). We instruct you that the crime of manslaughter is included in the crime of willful murder, with which the prisoner is charged in the indictment. So that if after a careful investigation, you should conclude that the prisoner is not guilty of willful murder, you may still find him guilty of manslaughter. "Manslaughter is defined to be the unlawful killing of another without malice, express or implied, which may be either voluntarily upon a sudden heat, or involuntarily, but in the commission of some unlawful act." 4 Bl. Comm. 191. If you shall be of opinion that the killing of the deceased was unlawful, you must decide whether the offense of the prisoner is murder or manslaughter.

It is not claimed in this case that the firing of the prisoner's musket was done involuntarily while the prisoner was in the commission of an unlawful act. So that if the prisoner is guilty of manslaughter at all, it must be because he is guilty of a killing voluntarily upon a sudden heat. No words applied by one man to another will justify the use of a deadly weapon, nor can they be the lawful occasion of that "heat" which would reduce the act of killing from murder to manslaughter. If a man returns provoking language by a blow from an instrument calculated to produce death, and death follows, the act will be murder. State v. Merrill, 2 Dev. 269; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 872, 873. If you find the killing of the deceased was unlawful, but without malice, as we have defined malice, if it was done upon a sudden heat, not caused by the words merely of the deceased, but by an assault, then the prisoner is guilty of manslaughter and not of murder, and such should be your verdict. Before you can find the prisoner guilty of either murder or manslaughter, you must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt, that every ingredient necessary to the offense has been established by the proof. A reasonable doubt is not a remote and far fetched or fanciful doubt. It must be suggested by the evidence in the case, and of such strength as would influence a reasonable man in the conduct of his own affairs.

If you are satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner of either murder or manslaughter, you will return a verdict of guilty accordingly. If on the other hand you are convinced of the prisoner's innocence, or have reasonable doubt of his guilt, it will be your pleasant duty to say, "Not guilty." In your retirement, remember the great magnitude of this case to the public and the prisoner; bring your best ability to bear upon the investigation, and acquit yourselves of your solemn duty like good and lawful men.

EVIDENCE—CONTENTS OF PAPERS—NOTICE TO PRODUCE.

Upon an indictment for selling a free person as a slave, under the Maryland law of 1796, c. 67, parol evidence may be given of the contents of papers delivered by the witness to the defendant, without a previous notice to produce them.

The witness stated that he delivered to the defendant [James Carrico] the papers which he had received with the woman who was sold, which papers showed that she was bound to serve only three years and nine months.

Mr. Key and Mr. Van Horne, for defendant, objected to parol evidence of the contents of the papers without previous notice to the defendant to produce them; and cited Peake, Ev. 110, 111, Am. note, which refers to Com. v. Messinger, 1 Bin. 273; State v. Orsborn, 1 Root, 152; and State v. Blodget, Id. 534.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, not sitting, having been of counsel for the defendant) overruled the objection. Quære?

A special verdict was found, upon which judgment was arrested.

WITNESS—COMPETENCY—WAGER UPON RESULT OF TRIAL.

1. A witness cannot be rejected in consequence of having been provoked to bet upon the event of the trial.

2. A wager upon the event of the trial is void in law.

Indictment [against Lucretia Carrico] for assaulting and beating a Mrs. Collard. Mary Hutchinson, a witness for the United States, upon cross-examination, admitted that one James C Deneale, who had irritated the witness, and by whose advice the defendant had cowhided Mrs. Collard, told the witness, before the trial, that he would bet her five dollars that Mrs. Collard would be cast; and the witness agreed to the wager.

W. L. Brent, for defendant, objected, and contended that the testimony which the witness had given should be rejected.

THE COURT said, that the wager was void in law, and that the witness, not being, in JURY — PEREMPTORY CHALLENGE — EVIDENCE — GENERAL BAD CHARACTER.

1. Peremptory challenge allowed only in capital cases, in Alexandria.

2. The United States cannot give evidence of the general bad character of the prisoner, unless the prisoner should first bring evidence to support his character.

[Cited in U. S. v. McPherson, Case No. 15,703.]

Indictment, under the act of congress of 1790 (1 Stat. 112), for stealing.

Edward J. Lee, for prisoner [Michael Carrigo], contended that he had a right to a peremptory challenge. He contended that the prisoner was charged with felony; and by the law of Virginia (Rev. Code, 110) "no person charged with murder or felony shall be admitted to a peremptory challenge of more than twenty," which implies the right peremptorily to challenge that number. A felony is such an offence as by the common law worked a forfeiture of goods or chattels, or both. If a statute changes the punishment and takes away the forfeiture, the offence does not thereby cease to be a felony.

Mr. Mason, for the United States, cited 2 Hawk. P. C. pp. 580, 581.

THE COURT decided that in cases not capital the prisoner has not a right to the peremptory challenge.

THE COURT refused to permit the attorney for the United States to bring evidence of the general bad character of the prisoner, unless the prisoner should first bring evidence in support of his general character.

Case No. 14,736.

UNITED STATES v. CARILLO.

[Hoff. Dec. 40.]

District Court, N. D. California. Sept. 7, 1859.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—SURVEY—OBJECTIONS BY SETTLERS.

[1. Under Act June 14, 1860, settlers can object to the location of the grant only through the United States district attorney.]

[2. On a petition for a sobrante lying between various ranchos, a grant was made by the governor of "three square leagues, a little more or less, as the respective diseño explains." On the diseño a considerable tract was delineated, but a smaller space was enclosed in yellow lines, and marked "What is solicited." Held, that this reference in the grant to the diseño did not necessarily indicate that it included only the space so marked, but the presumption rather was that three leagues was granted to be taken anywhere within the tract bounded by the ranchos named.]

[Claim by Joaquin Carillo to a certain tract of land.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The survey in this case having been made and duly published, it was, on the motion of the district attorney, ordered into court. A monition was issued in this court, and at the return day various parties intervened in the proceeding, under the provisions of the act of June 14, 1860 [12 Stat. 33]. Among these interveners were several parties who had purchased lands from the claimant which were not included in the survey. The claimant also appeared, while settlers, whose lands were, as alleged, erroneously embraced within it, appeared, by the district attorney, in the name of the United States.

On the hearing, the claimant admitted that the tracts sold by him should be included in the survey, and further consented that the location might be so modified as to exclude all lands in possession of settlers, provided three leagues, (the quantity granted,) were embraced in the survey and within the limits of the original grant. A decree to this effect was entered, with the consent of all parties, and a new survey, made in pursuance thereof, has been approved and adopted by the final decree of the court. A motion is now made on behalf of certain other settlers whose lands are included in the last survey to open the decree, and relocate the grant. The effect of this relocation, if made as desired, will be to include a large number of settlers, who are now excluded, and to exclude perhaps an equal number who are now included in the survey.

The district attorney, after examining into the merits of the case, came to the conclusion that the location ought not to be disturbed. He accordingly refused to move to open the decree, on behalf of the United States, and the motion is now made by private counsel, employed by that portion of the numerous settlers on the rancho who are dissatisfied. There would seem, at first sight, no reason for admitting these persons to become parties to the proceeding after so long a delay, and a neglect to bring their rights to the notice of the district attorney, or the court. The monition, advertisements, and proclamations gave them ample notice that the survey might be modified so as to include their lands; nor could they have been ignorant that the chief ground of objection to it was the fact that several tracts, long since sold by the claimant to bona fide purchasers, were not embraced within it. If the survey were modified, so as to include their tracts, it was evident that their own settlements must also be embraced within it, or if not necessarily so embraced, that a contest would arise as between various settlers, some of whom would necessarily be included, and others left out. As against those settlers, therefore, who had made known their rights to the district attorney, and in whose behalf he intervened, the others, who slept on their rights, would seem to have no equities. But the statute presents an insuperable obstacle to allowing these parties now to intervene.

By the 3d section of the act of 1860, it is provided that "all parties claiming interest by preemption, settlement or other right or title derived from the United States, shall not be permitted to intervene separately, but the rights and interests of such parties shall be represented by the district attorney of the United States, aided by counsel acting for such parties jointly, if they think proper to employ such counsel." Under this provision the parties claiming under the United States, who brought their claims to the notice of the district attorney, have been heard, and as that officer now declines to appear in the name of the United States for other parties, I cannot perceive how, under the act of congress, I can permit them "to intervene separately," and in their own names.

But it is urged that the Appwood survey is clearly without the exterior limits of the tract originally granted, and that the court, on being so informed, should, on its own motion, open and set aside its decree. But this statement is denied, as a matter of fact. To ascertain whether or not it be true the decree must be opened, and, if necessary, further testimony taken. But the decree has already determined that the survey is of the proper quantity and within the limits of the grant. It is difficult, therefore, to see how the court, at the suggestion of counsel, who, in this view, is a mere amicus curiæ, and represents no party who has a standing in court, or is entitled to be heard, can proceed to re-examine and set aside its own final adjudication. But it is said that as this decree was by consent, it ought not to be treated like a deliberate determination, by the court of contested questions. It is true that the decree was by consent—that is, that the claimant admitted the justice of all the objections urged, and consented to any modification of the survey which might be desired, provided that the quantity granted were given to him, and the lands sold to him were included. And in this proposition all parties acquiesced. Under such circumstances it is at least doubtful whether the court can make itself the representative of persons not parties to the cause, and who, the statute declares, shall be represented by the district attorney intervening in the name of the United States. If the decree be opened, the survey which has been approved will still be objected to by any party to the proceeding, and all objections to it must be urged by the court, or by an amicus curiæ who represents its views. Certainly, to justify so anomalous a proceeding, a very clear case ought to be shown, where the court has been induced by the parties to make a palpably erroneous decree,—a case extremely improbable where the interests of the United States, and all parties claiming adversely to them are represented by numerous and intelligent counsel. I have, however, examined the objections presented, to see whether, as alleged, so clear an error has been committed by the court as would induce the existence of a doubtful jurisdiction to rectify it.

The original petition of Carillo was for a sobrante lying between various ranchos, and extending in width from the hills of Mayacanes as far as the law permitted, which he supposed to be five or six leagues, but subject to the boundaries of the adjoining ranchos, when they should be measured. Those measurements not having been made, the proceeding was suspended, and the applicant in the meantime allowed to occupy, but not build upon, the land. In the succeeding year the claimant renewed his petition, and apprised the governor that, owing to the neglect of the colindantes, no measurements had yet been made. He therefore prayed for an immediate grant of the land. Jimeno, to whom the petition was referred, reported that there seemed no objection to making the grant, subjecting the petitioner to the measurements of the colindantes, and not allowing him to occupy more than three square leagues, which was all that remained vacant. The grant was, accordingly, issued. The land granted is described as bounded "by the rancho de Cotate, by that of D'a Mar. Ignacio Lopez, by the Lagunas, by the rancho of Don Juan Cooper, by that of Don Marcos West, and by that of Don Juan Wilson, subject to the measurement of the colindantes when possession shall be given them of the lands they actually possess." The fourth condition is in the usual form: "The land donated is three square leagues, a little more or less, as the respective diseño explains." On the diseño a considerable tract of country is delineated, but a smaller space is enclosed by yellow lines, and marked "What is solicited." The lines of the survey do not, in all respects, conform to the yellow lines thus delineated; and the question arises, did the governor, by referring to this diseño, mean to concede that particular tract, or did he, as the grant declares, intend to concede three leagues of land, to be taken out of a tract of which the boundaries were to be the boundaries of the adjoining ranchos, when the same should be established, and to which the grant to the claimant should be subordinate. It appears to me that the latter was more probably his intention. The expediente discloses that the governor was indisposed to make any grant to Carillo until the neighboring lands had been measured; and though he finally consented to do so, it is not to be presumed that, without any knowledge of the true location of those boundaries, he determined to grant a specific tract, which might very possibly encroach upon them.

Nor would such a proceeding have been just to the claimant; for, if the land granted was precisely that contained within the yellow lines, and if it in part included—as was, in fact, the case—lands belonging to an adjoining rancho, the claimant would have no means of making up the deficiency, for the yellow lines would circumscribe him on all sides. It seems to me far more reasonable to suppose that the governor intended to grant three leagues to be taken within the tract bounded by the ranchos named; and the diseño was drawn by the petitioner, and referred to by the governor, as indicating the supposed lines of the colindantes, but not as designating, by the natural objects delineated, the precise location of lines which were as yet unascertained. If this view be correct, it follows that within the boundaries of the adjoining ranchos, as subsequently established, the claimant had a right to elect where his three leagues should be taken; and, having sold portions of the tract to bona fide purchasers for value, he would not be at liberty even if disposed to make a location which would not include their lands.

It is not pretended that the survey is without the limits of the tract bounded as has been stated. The only objection urged is that it is in part without the limits of the tract delineated by yellow lines. That objection being disposed of, and found to be of very doubtful validity, I see no reason for the court to interpose, as has been suggested, of its own motion, to correct a manifest error. The motion is therefore denied.

UNITED STATES v. CARRILLO.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 96.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—VALIDITY OF CLAIM.

No reason for doubting the entire validity of this claim.

Claim [by Joaquin Carrillo] for three leagues of land [the rancho Llano de Santa Rosa] in Sonoma county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.

Halleck, Peachy & Billings, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It appears from the expediente in this case that the claimant, on the twenty-second of June, 1843, petitioned Governor Micheltorena for a grant of land on the plain adjoining the rancho of his mother. The governor, however, suspended action on the subject, as no judicial measurement had been made of the adjoining ranchos, and the extent of the sobrante or surplus reserved was not ascertained. On the twelfth of March, 1844, the claimant applied to the alcalde of the district for permission to sow, and build a house upon the land, during the pendency of his application to the governor for a grant. The alcalde granted him leave to sow the land, holding himself responsible to the owners of the lands if there should be any damage, but he refused him permission to build the house. On the twenty-sixth of March, 1844, the claimant renewed his application to the governor, stating that his petition still remained unacted upon on account of the neglect of the colindantes or adjoining proprietors to have their lands measured according to law.

The secretary, to whom this second petition was referred, reported favorably to it, and advised a grant of not more than three square leagues, subject to the measurements of the adjoining proprietors. In accordance with this report, the grant now produced was made; and it appears in evidence that he built first a small house and afterwards a very large one on the land, on which he has continued ever since to reside. He has also cultivated from one to three hundred acres of it with corn, barley, wheat, &c. The handwriting of the grant in the possession of the party is fully proved, and there seems no reason to doubt the entire validity of this claim. The map and the designation in the grant of the colindantes or conterminous owners abundantly show the locality of the tract granted; and the claimant's title to the land solicited must be confirmed to the extent of three leagues, subject to the measurement of the land previously granted to the colindantes. The decision of the board must, therefore, be affirmed.

TRIAL FOR MURDER.

[On the prosecution of a foreigner for murder the court may direct that half of the array shall be foreigners.]

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Carnot, Case No. 14,726.]

A special session of the circuit court of the United States for the district commenced at Norfolk, October 27, 1823, pursuant to public notice, for the trial of Manuel Cartacho upon a charge of piracy; Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL presiding, Hon. ST. GEORGE TUCKER, associate judge.

The Chief Justice having delivered his charge to the grand jury, the jury retired, and about two hours after came into court with a true bill.

The clerk being about to call the petit jury summoned to try the issue, Albert Allmand, Esq., of counsel for the accused, moved the court to set aside half of the array, and allow to the prisoner the substitution of the like number of foreigners,—a privilege, sometimes accorded to alien criminals by our courts, with whom it is discretionary, but in regard to which there is no act of congress, although the state laws have a provision to that effect. The court held the motion under advisement, and adjourned till the next day, when it acceded to the motion of the prisoner's counsel, and directed the discharge of the jury that had been previously summoned, and that a new array should be empanelled, one-half of which should be foreigners who were not citizens of the United States. The jury being sworn, the examination of witnesses on the part of the United States and for the prisoner commenced, and did not close until 5 o'clock p. m., when the court adjourned to October 31st, having previously directed that the jury should be kept together in custody of the marshal until the meeting of the court. By consent of counsel the case was committed to the jury without argument, and in a short time they returned into court with a verdict of guilty, but recommending the prisoner to the clemency of the president of the United States, and on November 3d the Chief Justice pronounced upon the prisoner the sentence of death, and appointed Friday, the 5th of December, for his execution.

UNITED STATES v. CARTER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 243.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1821.

FORGERY—UTTERING—DELIVERY OF SEALED LETTER—KNOWLEDGE OF CONTENTS—ORDER FOR MONEY.

1. If a person, knowing the contents of a forged letter, and with intent to obtain money thereupon, deliver it, although sealed, to the clerk of the person to whom it is addressed, and whom he supposes to be authorized to open it, this is evidence of uttering it.

[Cited in brief in Smith v. State, 20 Neb. 284, 29 N. W. 924.]

2. The act of knowingly uttering as true a false and forged letter requesting the person to whom it is addressed to pay to the bearer a sum of money, with intent to defraud any person, is an offence at common law.

The grand jury found two indictments against the prisoner [Jesse Carter] at common law. 1st, for knowingly uttering as true a false and forged letter purporting to be from T. Bayley, and addressed to Mr. Jonah Thompson, requesting him to pay to the prisoner $400, with intent to defraud Mr. Thompson. There was another count charging the same as being done with intent to defraud Mr. Bayley. The 2d indictment was for uttering a similar letter purporting to be from Israel Janney, and addressed to John Janney, requesting him to pay money to one John Preston.

THE COURT (nem. con.) at the request of Mr. Swann, for the United States, instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the prisoner knew the contents of the letter, and presented it to a person who he supposed was authorized to open it, and with intent to obtain money thereupon, it was evidence of uttering it.

The jury found the prisoner guilty upon each indictment.

Mason & Taylor, for prisoner, moved in arrest of judgment, and contended that the indictments did not show any offence at common law. That it was only an attempt to defraud by false pretences, which is only a statute offence. That no person has been actually defrauded, and that an unsuccessful attempt to defraud a person is not an offence at common law. If the attempt had been punishable at common law, there would have been no necessity for the statute of false pretences. They cited 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 421; Rex v. Wheatly, 2 Burrows, 1127; Young v. Rex, 3 Term R. 104; 2 East, 817; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 428; St. 33 Hen. VIII. of False Tokens, and the Virginia Statute of False Tokens (November 18, 1789, p. 45); 1 Hawk. P. CONTEMPT—THREATENING WITNESS IN PRESENCE OF COURT.

1. It is a contempt of court in an acquitted female prisoner to threaten vengeance, in the presence of the court, against the witnesses; and the court will fine her, and order her to give security for good behavior.

2. A contempt in the piazza of the court house, into which the windows of the court room open, is a contempt in the presence of the court.

[Cited in U. S. v. Anon., 21 Fed. 770.]

Indictment for larceny. Verdict, "Not guilty."

Clara Selden and Mary Stuart, who were witnesses in the cause, made affidavit, that while in the piazza of the court room, immediately after the verdict, the prisoner [Louisa Carter], retiring from the court, spoke certain opprobrious words, (which were stated in the affidavit,) and threatened one of them that she would give her her dose, and that she would be revenged of them both; that the prisoner is a violent tempered woman, and that they are really afraid that she will do them some personal and bodily injury.

Mr. Swann, the district attorney, thereupon moved for an attachment of contempt.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Hewitt, for the prisoner, objected.

THE COURT, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) considering it as a contempt in the presence of the court, it being within the possibility of the hearing of the court, and in the piazza immediately adjoining the court room, (the windows of which opened into the piazza,) ordered the attachment without a previous rule to show cause. And upon being brought in upon the attachment, and having, upon interrogatories, confessed the said threats, and repeated them in the face of the court, and avowed her determination to carry them into effect,

THE COURT fined her one dollar, and ordered her to give security for her good behavior in 100 dollars, and in default thereof committed her to prison until, &c.

UNITED STATES v. CARTER.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 732.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1836.

COURTS—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — JURISDICTION OVER OFFENCES BY NEGROES—VIRGINIA STATUTE.

An indictment at common law, in the county of Alexandria, will lie against a free negro or mulatto for assault and battery upon a white man; notwithstanding the Virginia statute of December 17, 1792, § 17.

To an indictment at common law for assault and battery upon William Ball, a white man, the defendant, [George Carter,] by his counsel, Mr. Neale, filed the following plea:—"And the said George Carter in his own proper person comes and says that the said United States ought not, neither ought the judges of the United States for the county of Alexandria in the District of Columbia, to have or take further cognizance of the indictment aforesaid; because he says that the cause or causes of action by indictment, and each and every of them are out of the jurisdiction of the honorable the judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia held for the county of Alexandria. Because, he further says, 1. That he is a freeman of color. 2. That even if he was guilty of the offence as charged in the indictment, still it is not such an offence as this court can entertain by indictment, at common law, or under any other law; "because, by the act of assembly of Virginia, now in force in this county, (Alexandria,) entitled 'An act to reduce into one the several acts concerning slaves, free negroes, and mulattoes,' passed the 17th of December, 1792, such offence, if committed by 'any negro or mulatto, bond or free,' shall be tried before a justice of the peace of the county or corporation where such offence shall be committed; and, if convicted, shall receive such punishment as the justice shall think proper, not exceeding thirty lashes on his or her bare back. That there is no law in the District of Columbia or in the county of Alexandria which gives this honorable court jurisdiction in this case, and this he is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said United States, or the honorable the judges of the United States for the District of Columbia and county of Alexandria, will or ought to take further cognizance of the indictment aforesaid." To this plea was appended the usual affidavit.

THE COURT (nem. con., but THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting,) overruled the plea.

UNITED STATES v. CASE.

[8 Blatchf. 250.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Feb. 17, 1871.

RECOGNIZANCE—POWER OF COMMISSIONER TO TAKE.

A commissioner appointed by a circuit court of the United States for a district within the state of New York, has no power to take a recognizance for the appearance before himself, at a future day, of a person charged with a criminal offence against the laws of the United States, and a recognizance so taken is void.

[Cited in note to U. S. v. Horton, Case No. 15,393; U. S. v. Martin, 17 Fed. 155; Ex parte Perkins, 29 Fed. 909; Strong v. U. S., 34 Fed. 21; Re Manning, 44 Fed. 276; Marvin v. U. S., Id. 410; U. S. v. Keiver, 56 Fed. 425; Hallett v. U. S., 63 Fed. 822.]

[In error to the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.]

This was an action, brought in the district court, by the United States, on a recognizance taken by a commissioner appointed by the circuit court, on the arrest and examination of a person charged with perjury, conditioned for the appearance of the accused before the commissioner on a future day, to which the proceeding was adjourned, for his further examination. The instructions given to the jury, on the trial of the action in the district court, were, in substance, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, and a verdict was rendered for the defendant [Alfred Case]. The judgment thereupon, with the bill of exceptions to the rulings of the district judge, was brought, by writ of error, to this court.

William Dorsheimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.

J. Thomas Spriggs, for defendant in error.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. I concur in the conclusion of the court below, that a commissioner has no authority to take bail for the appearance of a party accused, for examination before himself at a future day. It is unnecessary to repeat the reasoning contained in the opinion of the district judge upon that point. It may be conceded, that a commissioner, under the statutes of the United States in virtue of which he is appointed, has, in the matter of taking bail, the same power as a judge of the supreme, circuit, or district court, or a justice of the peace, and, therefore, the question is—has either of the officers last named such power?

It is quite clear, I think, that the 33d section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 91) was rightly construed by Judge Curtis, in U. S. v. Rundlett [Case No. 16,208], and that, in a state where a justice of the peace has power to take a recognizance to appear from day to day pending the examination of an accused, there a United States commissioner has such power. There seems no good reason why the officers of the United States should not have the same power in this respect in whatever state they exercise their jurisdiction; but, congress having seen fit to direct, that a party accused may, "agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders" in the state "where he may be found," "be arrested, and imprisoned, or bailed," the court cannot say that a recognizance not warranted by the laws of the state, nor by any other act of congress, is of any validity. Indeed, in the case above referred to, the doubt considered in the opinion of Judge Curtis was, whether the terms, "agreeably to the usual mode of process" in the state, could be so construed as to confer power to take such bail even in a state where such bail was authorized. The statutes of New Hampshire authorizing the taking of such a recognizance, it was held that a commissioner, by virtue of his powers as commissioner, and of the act of congress of 1789, might do so.

The case of Potter v. Kingsbury, 4 Day, 98, shows, also, that, in Connecticut, a bond or recognizance for such appearance might be taken pending an examination; but the court refer the power solely to the statute.

No such statute exists in New York, and I am referred to no decision of her courts affirming the power of her magistrates to take such a recognizance. Unless the power can be inferred from the general authority given to take bail, it cannot be affirmed at all; and, in considering that question, it is not material whether the statutes of the state of New York are referred to, or the broad language of the acts of congress. Section 33, of the act of 1789, declares, quite as broadly as any statute of the state of New York, that, "upon all arrests in criminal cases, bail shall be admitted." Whether such language is to be construed to require the judge, justice, or commissioner to take bail for appearance from day to day, may be ascertained by inquiring what was the meaning of the term "bail," as understood and used, either at common law, or in the statutes of England, by which the subject was chiefly regulated in that country. I have searched in vain to find any authority for giving it the construction contended for. It meant, at that early day, when the sheriff of the county, as a peace officer, exercised the power of holding to bail, the taking of security for the appearance of the party accused at the court, at the time and place for trial. It has that meaning, and, indeed, is so described, in terms, in the statutes which were passed restricting, regulating, and finally withdrawing that power from sheriffs, and conferring it exclusively upon courts, justices, or other magistrates. See English Statutes at Large, 3 Edw. I. c. 15; 6 Edw. I. c. 9; 1 Rich. III. c. 3; 3 Hen. VII. c. 3; 19 Hen. VII. c. 10; 1 & 2 Phil. & M. c. 13; 1 Edw. IV. c. 2. I have noticed no English statute which warrants the taking of any other bail than above described, until the enactment of 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 218, which specially authorizes constables in the Metropolitan police district, attending the watch-houses between 8 o'clock in the afternoon and 6 in the forenoon, to take bail, from parties arrested without warrant for petty misdemeanors, for their appearance before the justice in Bow street, at 10 in the morning.

It cannot be said, I think, that the power to take such security for attendance for examination from day to day exists at common law, or that it is a necessary incident to the power and duty to enquire whether there is ground for holding the accused for trial. The duty of the justices to examine, and to complete such examination within a reasonable time, is often affirmed in the early English cases, and the power, also, to commit pending the examination; and it has been held, that, for unreasonable detention, for the purposes of examination, justices are liable to an action. The duty to examine speedily, and to discharge, if no sufficient proof of guilt appears, to justify holding for trial, is stringently maintained, and, no doubt, because, the accused being lawfully held in actual custody until such examination is had, due regard to the liberty of the subject demands that no unreasonable delay be permitted. It may, also, be suggested, that, until the official enquiry into the probable guilt of the accused, and the degree of enormity of the offence committed, the magistrate has no guide by which to determine what amount of security for appearance would be justly required. True, where the power has been expressly conferred, the magistrate may be governed by the charge made, and, for the purpose of fixing the security to be given to appear from day to day, may assume the guilt of the accused, and that the offence is as charged in the complaint; and a party arrested may prefer to give such security, if able to do so, rather than remain in custody. Nevertheless, the theory, and the just theory, was, that, until examination by the magistrate, he could not, in justice to the accused, or to the state, by any safe guide, determine whether bail ought to be required, or fix its amount; and, hence, justice required, that he should proceed without unreasonable delay to the investigation of the matter charged, that the accused might be speedily relieved, if no sufficient cause for holding to trial appeared.

I conclude, therefore, that the duty and power to admit to bail, declared by the acts of congress, as well as by the constitution of the United States, no less than by the constitution and statutes of New York, relate to the acceptance of bail for appearance at the proper court, to answer there for the offence charged.

In the sense in which bail for appearance at the next court is spoken of, the commissioner holds no court. He acts as an arresting, examining, and committing magistrate. It may seem to be a hardship—no doubt, it may often be, in fact, a great hardship—where, from circumstances wholly beyond the control either of the prosecutor or the accused, the examination consumes many days, that the accused is not entitled to demand a relief from actual custody, on tendering good security for due attendance from day to day; but a remedy for this must, I think, be sought in such legislation as has already been had in some of the states, whose example congress may deem it wise to follow. At present, I think a commissioner has no power to take such security, and that the recognizance sued upon in this action is void. The judgment must be affirmed.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT—RELEASE OF SURETY.

A surety is released from his obligations under a contract guaranteed by him where any modification is made in that contract without his consent, even though it be by mutual agreement between the principals, and in a particular not deemed essential by either of them.

Richard Crowley, for the United States.

Lansing & Lyman (Wm. C. Ruger, of counsel), for defendants.

WALLACE, District Judge. The defendants are sued upon a guaranty whereby they undertook that one Van Wagenen, who was a bidder for a contract to furnish stone about to be let by the plaintiff, would, in case the contract was awarded to him, enter into the contract with sufficient sureties within ten days after the acceptance of his bid to furnish the materials in conformity to the terms of the advertisement under which the bid was made, and in case of his default the defendants agreed to make good the difference between the offer of Van Wagenen and the next lowest bidder, or the person to whom the contract might be awarded. The contract was awarded to Van Wagenen. He failed to execute it, and it was then awarded to another bidder; the difference in the bids being $7,290, which sum this action is brought to recover.

The facts material to the case are these: Under the authority of the acts of congress in that behalf the government of the United States were improving the St. Mary's Falls Canal, the work being under the immediate supervision of Major Weitzel as engineer in charge, and a contract was about to be let for furnishing the stone to be used in the improvement, pursuant to the terms of an advertisement. A copy of the advertisement, together with the specifications, a form of proposal and form of guaranty, all in print, and all annexed together, were forwarded to parties proposing to bid. The specifications, among other things, provide that the stone to be furnished shall be "of some good quality, approved by the engineer in charge," and require the bidder "to send to the office of the engineer, free of charge, a sample of the kind of stone proposed to be delivered," of a designated size, "one face left in the rough and the other faces picked, sawed or hammered to show how the stone will work." The proposal reads, that the bidder will furnish stone agreeably to the terms of the specification, which shall be "of a quality shown by an accompanying sample." Among the bids received by the engineer was one from Van Wagenen. The blanks left in the bids for dates, names, and prices, and those in the guaranty for the names and places of residences of the guarantors, were filled out, the proposal being signed by Van Wagenen and the guaranty by the defendants, while endorsed upon the paper following the guaranty was a notice addressed to the engineer, and signed by Van Wagenen, as follows: "I refer you for samples of stone to be furnished under this bid to samples sent by me to your office at the time of former bid by me on same work, and will agree to furnish like stone or such stone as the engineer in charge shall require." This notice was not upon the papers when defendants signed the guaranty, nor was it in any way known or assented to by them. By the terms of the advertisement, bids were to be received up to three o'clock p. m. of March 31st. March 31st the engineer telegraphed to Van Wagenen, "What kind of stone and from which quarries do you propose to furnish under your bid of this day?" To which on the same day Van Wagenen answered by telegram: "Limestone from the following quarries: Marblehead and Kelly's Island, Ohio; Chaumont, New York; Queenstown, Ontario." The next day the engineer telegraphed to Van Wagenen: "If contract is awarded, you must furnish Marblehead or Kelly's Island stone. Chaumont will not be accepted; Queenstown is prohibited by law." It would seem that Van Wagenen assented to these conditions, and on April 26th the engineer notified Van Wagenen that his bid was accepted and the contract awarded. May 3d Van Wagenen notified the engineer that he could not get the stone required. No contract was tendered to Van Wagenen for execution, and the contract was let to another bidder.

Upon these facts it is insisted by the defendants that they are not liable because the contract proposed by the engineer and which Van Wagenen failed to enter into was not the contract, the execution of which the defendants had guaranteed, but one by which a different kind of stone from that originally provided for was to be substituted. If the contract proposed for execution to Van Wagenen differed in any material particular from that called for by the advertisement, specifications and proposal, it must be held that defendants are not liable upon their obligation; and this result will follow although the contract was modified by the mutual consent of Van Wagenen and the engineer in charge, and in a particular which was not deemed substantial by either of them. The defendants are sureties, who are bound to the extent and in the manner and under the circumstances pointed out in their obligation, and no further. It is not sufficient that a surety may sustain no injury by a change in the contract he has guaranteed. Even if the change will inure to his benefit, he is still absolved. He has a right to stand upon the strict terms of his contract, and any material variation made without his assent is fatal. These propositions are so well settled that no citation of authorities is required to support them. Cases peculiarly in point, however, are Barns v. Barrow, 61 N. Y. 39; Whitcher v. Hall. 5 Barn. & C. 269; Grant v. Smith, 46 N. Y. 93; U. S. v. Corwine [Case No. 14,871]; U. S. v. Tillotson [Id. 16,524].

Applying these rules, it will first be necessary to ascertain what contract the defendants undertook Van Wagenen should enter into, and, second, whether the contract proposed for his execution and which he failed to enter into varied in any material particular from that originally provided for. Reading the advertisement, specification and proposal together, the fair interpretation of their language is that a contract shall be executed to furnish stone of a description designated by a sample which is to accompany the proposal. It is not contemplated that the sample shall be annexed to the proposal; the sample need not be in existence when the proposal is signed; it suffices if the sample accompany the proposal in any manner which will enable it to be identified when the bids are opened, so that the engineer may pass judgment upon it and compare it with the samples of other bidders. The guarantors cannot insist that they undertook that Van Wagenen would enter into a contract to furnish stone like a sample existing when their guaranty was signed. They saw fit to sanction a proposal which permitted the bidder to build them by any sample he might choose to forward. Inasmuch as at any time before the period for receiving proposals might expire the proposal could be withdrawn and delivered again with a new sample, any sample finally delivered with the proposal would be the sample accompanying the proposal. On the other hand, the specifications and proposal cannot be construed to authorize a contract for stone of any description required by the engineer. While one clause in the specifications states that the stone "shall be of good quality, and subject to the approval of the engineer," this clause is controlled by that one relative to the sample, and, read together, the meaning is manifest that the bidder is to furnish stone according to the sample, but unless it is of good quality it may be rejected by the engineer.

The original contract having been ascertained, it remains to inquire whether the one proposed for execution was the same or a different contract. As appears by the notice endorsed upon the proposal of Van Wagenen he designated as the sample of stone to be contracted for a sample which he had theretofore delivered to the engineer. He stated also in this notice that he would contract to furnish any other stone the engineer might desire. If this notice had been brought to the attention of the defendants prior to their signing the guaranty, it would seem clear that they intended to authorize Van Wagenen to contract to furnish such stone as he might select at the time of signing the contract. But, as the proof stands, the notice cannot be regarded as part of the contract sanctioned by these defendants. The effect of the notice, therefore, was only to make the sample of stone which Van Wagenen had theretofore delivered the sample accompanying the proposal.

It does not distinctly appear whether the telegram from the engineer to Van Wagenen inquiring what kind of stone the latter intended to furnish under his bid, or the answer of Van Wagenen specifying the kind of stone and the quarries from which it would be obtained, were sent before or after the bids were opened. It seems they were sent on the day for opening the bids, and nothing more is shown But, however the fact may have been, is not important in my view of the case, because it was not until the next day that Van Wagenen was notified that if the contract was awarded to him, stone from three of the quarries he had specified would not be accepted, and that stone from two specified quarries must be furnished by him. This was a distinct notification that the contract would only be awarded him on the condition that he should furnish stone from one or both of two quarries. Assuming that the sample which he had delivered to the engineer could have been furnished from any one or from all of the five quarries mentioned in the telegram of the day before, and assuming that this telegram was sent by him and received by the engineer prior to the opening of the bids, nevertheless a condition was required which was not contemplated by the bid. It was a condition the tendency of which necessarily was to restrict his sources of supply and which because of this might render it more difficult or less profitable for him to undertake the performance of the contract. It is true he did not so regard it, and was satisfied to accede. It does not follow, however, that the defendants would have assented to the change, and in the absence of any evidence that they did assent it must be held that the contract proposed for execution was not the one which defendants guaranteed Van Wagenen should execute.

Stated briefly, the result of the communications between Van Wagenen and the engineer was that the latter should enter into a contract to furnish stone from the Marblehead or Kelly's Island quarry, while the contract which defendants were responsible for was one to furnish stone like a sample designated at or before the opening of the bids. Either Van Wagenen had designated the article by a sample at the time the bids were opened, or he had not. If he had, the contract tendered for his execution should have called for stone like the sample and without any restrictive conditions relative to the place from which it should be obtained. If he had not designated the articles, the undertaking of the defendants was inoperative because one of the conditions which entered into it had not been fulfilled, and what was subsequently agreed upon between Van Wagenen and the engineer was a new contract and not that which defendants had guaranteed.

Implications against the good faith of Van Wagenen, and which tend to show that he never intended to enter into the contract pursuant to his bid, arise from the evidence in the case. Whether these are well founded or not is not material They do not derogate from the right of the defendants to insist upon the strict letter of their obligations. The recovery cannot be sustained and a new trial is granted.

Case No. 14,744.

UNITED STATES v. CASHIEL.

[1 Hughes, 552.] [1]

District Court, D. Maryland. 1863.

CRIMINAL LAW—TWICE IN JEOPARDY—ACQUITTAL BEFORE COURT-MARTIAL.

An acquittal before a court-martial cannot be pleaded in defence of an indictment in a court of law; even though the offence charged in either case be substantially the same.

In the month of June, 1863, the accused [Hazel B. Cashiel] had at pasture on his farm, in Montgomery county, Md., some five hundred head of cattle, which, with some five hundred others, belonging to the United States, were driven away, on the morning of the 28th of that month, for their protection from the Confederate cavalry, then approaching. Soon thereafter, the invading forces riding up to where several persons, including the accused, were standing, demanded in what direction the cattle had gone. One person pointed them in a direction opposite to the true one. In a few minutes one of the cavalrymen returned from the pursuit, and repeating the demand, the accused is alleged to have indicated to him the road which the cattle had taken, their number, and the fact that they were driven without any guard except their ordinary herdsmen. This information did not result in any benefit to the enemy, as the cattle were driven safely within the Federal lines. Shortly after this occurrence Mr. Cashiel was arrested, taken to Washington, and there tried by a court-martial, on the charge of conveying intelligence to the enemy, contrary to the 57th article of war. The court which tried him, after maturely considering the evidence adduced, found the accused of the specifications and charge guilty, but say "that, although the accused answered certain questions put by rebels, which, in a strict literal sense conveyed intelligence to the enemy, it has not appeared in evidence that the information was volunteered, nor does the court perceive that such intelligence was given with that criminal design which the law contemplates as the animus of a breach of the 57th article of war; and the court, therefore, affixes no penalty to the offence beyond an admonition, that in future he will be more on his guard in answering inquiries addressed to him by an enemy." The secretary of war approved of the findings of the court, upon the specifications and charge, and disapproved of the sentence; and, after a review of the testimony and proceedings of the court, in an order from the war department, dated July 29th, 1863, says: "Although the accused has been relieved of all responsibility under the 57th article of war, he is still liable to be prosecuted under the 2d section of the act to suppress insurrection, etc., approved July 17th, 1862 [12 Stat. 589], for giving aid and comfort to the rebellion, and that the prosecution for this offence may be proceeded with he will be handed over to the civil authorities." After the passage of this order Mr. Cashiel was again arrested, and an indictment afterwards found against him in the United States district court of Maryland, September term, under the act of July, 1862. When the case was called for trial at the present term of the court, the counsel for Mr. Cashiel put in the plea of autrefois convict, averring that as he had been before tried by the proper tribunal, he could not be again impeached and put in jeopardy for the same offence. To this plea the United States demurred, and the questions involved in the case were argued by William Schley, Esq., of Baltimore, and Charles Abert, Esq., of Montgomery county, for the traverser, and William Price and Nathaniel L. Thayer, Esqs., for the government.

GILES, District Judge. The 2d section of the act of 17th of July, 1862, under which the traverser stands indicted, is as follows: "That if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or shall give aid or comfort thereto, or shall engage in or give aid and comfort to any existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, he shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have; or by both of said punishments, at the discretion of the court." The trial and conviction which forms the subject-matter of the plea filed in this case, was had before a general court-martial, held in the city of Washington, in pursuance of orders from the war department. The charge against the traverser before that court was for a violation of the 57th section of the article of war, which article is as follows: "Whoever shall be convicted of holding correspondence with, or giving intelligence to the enemy, either directly or indirectly, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall be ordered by the sentence of the court-martial." See act of 1806 (2 Stat. 366). Two questions have been presented in the argument of this case: 1st. Had the court-martial, whose record is referred to in the plea filed in this case, jurisdiction of the offence there charged and over the person of the traverser? And if so, 2d. Is the said charge the same offence (within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States) for which the traverser now stands indicted?

I shall discuss the second question, for if that be answered in the negative, it overrules the plea filed in this case; and it becomes unnecessary to consider and decide the first. They have both been argued with great ability, and the first question, touching the jurisdiction of courts-martial, presents at the present time a painful interest. It is a question with which our previous reading had not made us familiar, for, until the present widespread insurrection, the administration of our general government had been known to us only by the exercise of its peaceful civil powers, and by its laws executed and enforced by the national judiciary. But our constitution was made for all time—a time of war as well as a time of peace; and what is the extent and limit of the war power it imparted to the government, presents a problem of no easy solution, but one which is now engaging the attention and careful consideration of the statesmen and jurists of the land. As the view I take of this case relieves me from the consideration at present of so grave a question, I will only add, before I pass from it, that the more I study the constitution of our country the more am I impressed with the wisdom, the forethought, and the experience of the great men who framed it. And my firm conviction is, that our only pathway of safety and hope for the future lies in a strict observance of all its provisions. Now, what is meant by the word "offence," as used in the fifth amendment to the constitution? This is settled by the supreme court in the case of Moore v. Illinois, reported in 14 How. [55 U. S.] 17, where Justice Grier says, in delivering the opinion of the court, "An offence in its legal signification means the transgression of a law."

In this case we have two laws—the articles of war, as contained in the act of 1806, and the law of 1862, which I have before cited—and their provisions are different. The 57th article of war punishes the holding of any correspondence or the giving of any intelligence to the enemy. For in a time of war (when alone this article operates) it might be prejudicial to the discipline and good order of the army that any correspondence should be held by any of its members with the enemy, although the intelligence given might be in no manner in furtherance of that enemy's views and designs. Whereas, no conviction could be had under the act of 1862, unless the intelligence given was of such a character as to give aid and comfort to those engaged in the insurrection. It might very well be, then, that facts which would warrant a conviction under the 57th article of war could produce no such result in an indictment under the 2d section of the act of 1862. And many facts would warrant a conviction under the law of 1862 which are not punishable under the 57th article of war. These are laws to be administered by different tribunals, and they create distinct offences. And there was no law of the United States punishing by indictment corresponding with the enemy or giving them intelligence (unless it amounted to treason under the act of 1790 [1 Stat. 112], or as giving aid and comfort to the rebellion under the act of 1862) until the act of the 25th of February, 1863 [12 Stat. 696], and that only punishes correspondence, either written or verbal, where it is carried on with "intent to defeat the measures of the government, or to weaken, in any way, their efficacy." When congress, in 1806, was framing the articles of war, they provided, by the 33d article, that whenever an officer or soldier should be accused of a capital crime, or of having committed any offence against the person or property of any citizen, such as is punishable by the known laws of the land, he should be delivered over to the civil magistrate for punishment. And although by article 9 they provided a punishment for an officer or soldier striking or drawing a weapon upon, or offering any violence to his superior officer, it could not be contended that this provision debarred the civil courts from punishing the offence as an assault and battery. And although the act of 1806 does not contain the provision to be found in the mutiny acts of Great Britain, "That nothing in it shall be construed to exempt any officer or soldier whatsoever from being proceeded against by due course of law," yet it appears to me that that is its true construction; that the military law, as it exists in the United States, is an exceptional code, applicable to a class of persons in given relations, but not abrogating or derogating from the general law of the land, but that the latter is left in full force and virtue. Tytler, in his treatise on Military Law, says: "The martial or military law, as contained in the military law and articles of war, does, in no respect, either supersede or interfere with the civil and municipal law of the realm." He is an Englishman, and treating of the laws of that country. But what say the two most approved writers on military law in this country? Benet, on page 100 of his treatise, says: "A former acquittal or correction of an act by a civil court, is not a good plea in bar before a court-martial on charges and specifications, covering the same act." And De Hart, on page 140, says: "A former acquittal or conviction pleaded, must have reference to a trial by a court-martial. The same acts, as they may offend against the rights of private persons, may also violate the proprieties of military discipline, and as such may be investigated by both civil and military courts. This is a principle perfectly well established in the military service, and has been acted upon and approved by the highest authority." And both these accomplished writers cite the case of Captain Howe. In May, 1842, Captain Howe, of the 2d dragoons, was tried upon a charge for "conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline," in having beaten or caused to be beaten, in a cruel and inhuman manner, a private of his company. Upon arraignment, Captain Howe pleaded, in bar of trial, that he had been tried and acquitted for the said act upon an indictment for manslaughter in the civil court. But the court would not admit the validity of such plea, and proceeded to trial. Captain Howe was convicted upon the charge and sentenced to be suspended from rank, pay and emoluments for twelve months. The proceedings and decision of the court were approved and confirmed by the war department, by general order No. 34, in 1842. John C. Spencer, of New York, was then secretary of war, himself a lawyer of considerable reputation in his day. Now the civil court before whom Captain Howe had been tried and acquitted was not, as the learned counsellor for the traverser supposed, a court of a different sovereignty, a court of a state; but Florida was then a territory, and the trial took place before the superior court for the territory of East Florida, a court established by congress by the act of May 26th, 1824 [4 Stat. 45]. The judge, district attorney and marshal of said court were appointed by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and their salaries were paid out of the treasury of the United States. It was a court whose only power was derived from the authority of the United States, and which possessed the usual jurisdiction belonging to the district and circuit courts of the United States, in addition to a jurisdiction to administer the local laws of the territory of Florida. And the opinion of Mr. Legare, the then attorney-general (one of the most accomplished lawyers of the day), sustained the course of the court-martial in this case. It is therefore an authority entitled to great respect. It was not until 1845 that Florida was admitted into the Union. If this be a sound law, then it must follow that an acquittal before the court-martial could not be pleaded to an indictment before the civil court. And, as the supreme court say in the case [Moore v. Illinois] 14 How. [55 U. S.] 17, "it cannot be truly averred that the offender has been twice punished for the same offence, but only that by one act he has committed two offences, for each of which he is justly punishable." The great principle that in the administration of criminal justice no person should be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offence is much older than our constitution. It existed as a fundamental rule of the common law from a very early period, and is recognized by all English writers on common law. But it is limited to forbid a second trial for one and the same offence. Blackstone (Comm. vol. 4, p. 336), says, "that the pleas of autrefois acquit and autrefois convict must be upon a prosecution for the same identical act and crime."[2] And although an acquittal on an appeal was a good bar to an indictment, yet he informs us on page 313 that an appeal was a prosecution for some heinous crime, demanding punishment on account of the particular injury suffered, rather than to vindicate the public justice. The view I take of the provision in the fifth amendment to the constitution does not, therefore, conflict with this humane principle of the common law. Under each, a former trial, to be a bar, must be a trial for the same identical offence, or, in other words, for the transgression of the same law. As opposed to this view, I have found but two authorities, a dictum of Justice Woodbury, in the case of Wilkes v. Duncan, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 123, and a note on page 341, 1st volume of the 9th edition of Kent's Commentaries. The case in 7 How. [48 U. S.] was an action of trespass, brought by a marine against Commodore Wilkes, for some punishment inflicted on plaintiff while on board one of the vessels of the exploring expedition. A court-martial which was convened after the return of the expedition had acquitted the defendant of this charge. On the trial of this case in the court below the record of the proceedings of the court-martial had been offered as evidence, but rejected by the court. The propriety of this rejection having been considered by the supreme court, Justice Woodbury, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "We think that such proceedings were not conclusive on the plaintiff here, though a bar to subsequent indictments in courts of common law for the same offence." Now no such point was presented in the case, and no contingency could ever arise as to crimes committed on a ship-of-war, for the reason I shall state in reviewing the other authority. I have very great respect for the memory of Judge Woodbury, whose judicial life was illustrated by great legal learning and patient, untiring industry, but the language I have quoted was an obiter dictum, and is overruled, I think, by the subsequent decision of the supreme court to which I have referred. The commentator in Kent's Commentaries discusses the proposition that the district and circuit courts of the United States have no criminal jurisdiction but what is expressly conferred upon them by statute, and have not, therefore, any jurisdiction over offences committed on board of one of our national ships-of-war, as no such jurisdiction is given by any statute. Judge Betts so held in the Case of Captain Mackenzie [Cases Nos. 15,630 and 15,691], and that the jurisdiction of the naval court-martial in his case was exclusive, he being then on his trial before a naval court-martial for murder on board the United States sloop-of-war Somers. The commentator goes on to say, "If they (the civil courts) had jurisdiction, an acquittal by a court-martial would be a bar to any criminal proceeding in any other court." But he cites no authority to sustain this position; and as no notice is made of the decision in 14 How. [55 U. S. 17], I think the note must have been written before that decision was made by the supreme court. As instances in which a man may be punished twice for the same act where it constitutes two offences, I cite the case of General Houston, who, having assaulted a member of the house of representatives, was punished by the house for the contempt, and was subsequently indicted and convicted for the same assault in the criminal court in the District of Columbia [Case No. 15,398]. The opinion of Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, the then attorney-general, was taken upon the subject, and he held the subsequent trial and conviction legal. In his opinion he says: "The act committed by General Houston was one and the same, and it constituted but one indictable offence, and he was liable therefore to only one conviction on indictment." But it was not the same offence for which he was punished by the house of representatives.

I also cite the case of State v. Yancy, reported in 1 N. C. Law Repos. 519. In this case it was decided that for an assault committed in the presence of the court, and for which contempt the court punished by a fine, the party could be afterwards tried for the assault and battery. It appears to me, therefore, that before I can decide a charge to be "the same offence" within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the constitution, it must appear that the offence was the same in law and in fact. In the case at bar, the traverser is charged with a violation of the act of 1862 by giving aid and comfort to those in rebellion. The charge on which he was tried before the court-martial was for giving intelligence to the enemy, in violation of the articles of war. I consider that identity wanting which would make his trial on this indictment a violation of the constitution of the United States. The demurrer is sustained, and the traverser's plea of autrefois convict is overruled, with leave to him to plead over.

UNITED STATES v. CASSEDY et al.

[2 Sumn. 582.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1837

SEAMEN—INDICTMENT FOR REVOLT—COMBINATION TO RESIST AUTHORITY—SUBSTITUTED MASTER—CONTRACT OF SERVICE.

1. To sustain an indictment for an endeavor to commit a revolt under the act of congress of 1835 (chapter 40, § 2 [4 Stat. 776]), a confederacy or combination must be shewn between two or more of the seamen, to refuse to do further duty on board the ship, and to resist the lawful commands of the officers.

[Cited in U. S. v. Peterson, Case No. 16,037; U. S. v. Huff, 13 Fed. 637.]

2. The contract of seamen for the voyage is not suspended or extinguished by the death, removal, or resignation of the original master; but they are bound to perform the voyage under any person, who is lawfully substituted in his stead.

[Cited in U. S. v. Nye, Case No. 15,906.]

3. If a person, substituted as master, be grossly incompetent to the duties of his station, from want of skill or bad habits, or profligate and cruel behavior, the seamen may be justified in refusing to do duty, or to remain by the ship.

[Cited in U. S. v. Nye, Case No. 15,906.]

Indictment for an endeavor to commit a revolt on board of the ship Amethyst, on the high seas, against Act 1835, c. 40, § 2. Plea, the general issue.

At the trial it appeared in evidence, that the Amethyst was an American ship, registered in New Bedford. She sailed from thence on a whaling voyage in the Pacific in August, 1836, under the command of Capt. Warren Howland. In consequence of ill-health, Capt. Howland was obliged to leave the ship at St. Helena, in January, 1837, and with the advice of the American consul at that port, he appointed the chief mate to the command for the residue of the voyage. The crew, upon receiving information of the substitution of the mate to the command, refused to do any further duty on board, although the mate was experienced, and they were urged to do so by the consul. On the next day, Capt. Howland and the consul went on board and examined the crew separately The defendants [Alfred] Cassedy, Bowditch and Jenkins still persisted in their refusal; and said they did not like to proceed on the voyage, with the mate as master. They were then taken on shore, and put into prison. Two days afterwards the consul, together with two American masters, went on board to persuade the crew to go to sea. The mate, by direction of the consul, ordered the ship to be got under weigh for sea. Half of the crew refused at first; but finally all of them then on board, except the defendants Allen, King and Hopp consented. These three last were then also sent on shore, and put in prison with the others, who had been put in prison two days before. The ship afterwards proceeded to sea without them; and they were sent home in another American ship, the Octavia, for trial, and arrived at New Bedford.

Mr. Mills, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in summing up to the jury said: Upon the facts stated in the evidence, which indeed, is not in its general bearing disputed, the question arises, whether the defendants, or any of them, are guilty of the offence charged in the indictment. And that depends upon another question, whether there was among the defendants, or any two or more of them, a common confederacy or combination to refuse to do further duty on board the ship, and to resist the lawful commands of the officers in regard to the sailing or preparations for the voyage. If there was any such confederacy or combination, or any encouragement by the defendants of each other in such acts of refusal and disobedience, then the offence, in contemplation of law, has been committed, unless some justification of the refusal and disobedience is made out. The defendants seem to have proceeded upon the ground, that they were not bound to service on board after the original master ceased to be such; and that they were not bound to serve under the mate, acting as master, under a regular substituted appointment. This is a sheer mistake of the law. The contract of seamen for the voyage is not suspended or extinguished by the original master's ceasing to be such, by death, by removal, by resignation, or otherwise. They are bound to perform the voyage under any person, who is lawfully substituted master for the voyage; for their engagement is, in substance, an engagement with the owners for the voyage, and not with a particular master, so long as he remains such. It is true, that if a person, substituted as master, is grossly incompetent to the duties of his station from want of due skill or from grossly bad habits, or from profligate and cruel behavior, that may furnish a suitable excuse for a refusal to do duty, or to remain by the ship. But such a case must be clearly made out, beyond all reasonable doubt, and it is not to be presumed, or inferred. There is no such proof in the present case; and, therefore, it cannot be insisted on. The evidence, so far as it goes, is decidedly favorable to the competency, skill, and good character of the mate. The question then resolves itself into a mere question of fact, upon which the jury will pass their opinion.

Verdict against all the defendants, guilty.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—SURVEY.

[Where a survey based on a Mexican grant appears to be incorrect, it will be rejected, and a new one ordered.]

It appears, by the expediente in this case, that on the twelfth of June, 1834, there was granted to the successors of Francisco Ma. Castro, then deceased, the lawful ownership of a tract of land known by the name of "San Pablo," and bounded by the ranchos of San Antonio and El Pinole, and by a portion of the Bay of San Francisco. For this tract Francisco Castro had previously, on the twenty-third of April, 1823, obtained a concession from the territorial deputation. The fourth condition of the grant of 1834 declares the land granted to be three square leagues, a little more or less, according to the diseno which accompanies the expediente. On the twenty-third of June of the same year, Joaquin Castro, the son and representative of Francisco Ma. Castro, addressed a petition to the governor, in which he states that, through inadvertence, he neglected in his first petition to ask for the extent included in the diseno annexed, and "only claimed the three square leagues which we formerly occupied. That, as this piece of land is rather too small for the number of cattle grazing on it, he solicits, in the names of the other heirs, and as their agent, that the said petition be understood to include the augmentation of land described in the aforesaid plan." This petition was referred by the governor to the secretary for an informe. By the report of that officer, it appears that he proceeded to measure a tract of land of which he gives the boundaries, and which he delineates on a plan annexed to his report, and marked by him "No. 2," to distinguish it from the original diseno presented by Castro, marked "No. 1." The report further states that it results from the measurement that from the hill of San Antonio to the northeast there is a distance of one league and 500 varas, from that point to the north-northwest, one league and 1,500 varas, and from that point to the north-northwest, one league and 100 varas. "Reducing these land and sea boundary lines to the right lines of a quadrilateral figure, and performing the measurement of the same, I find a tract of land measuring four square leagues and nearly one twenty-fourth of a league, setting aside and not counting the inequalities or unevenness of the ground, which do not appear on the plan marked 'No. 2,' but are shown on the plan No. 1, though inaccurately, because the height of the hills does not appear, as they ought to do, to arrive at a correct conclusion as to the dimensions of the tract."

On the 14th August, 1835, the governor made a decree of concession, as follows: "Having seen the petition with which this expediente begins, the concession which was obtained from the most ex. territorial deputation on the 15th April, 1823, and the petition dated June 23d of this year, soliciting the amplification of a little more than one square league, as is exhibited on the diseno No. 2, with whatever else was necessary and convenient, I declare Don Francisco Maria Castro, and by his decease his heirs and successors, lawful owner and owners of the tract known as San Pablo, bounded by the ranchos of San Antonio and Pinole, and by a part of the Bay of San Francisco," etc. On the 20th August of the same year, the formal title issued. In this are recited the grant to Francisco Castro by the deputation, the subsequent application by his heirs for the lawful ownership, and their recent petition for the surplus of a little more than one square league. The fourth condition states that the land of which mention is made is "of the extent of a little more than four square leagues ('cuatro sitios de ganado mayor, poco mas'), including the amplification which was conceded by the decree of the 14th August of this year, and as is explained by the diseno which accompanies the expediente. The judge who shall give the possession will cause it to be measured, designate the boundaries, and reserve the surplus to the nation for its convenient uses."

It is apparent from these documents that the governor intended to grant to the successors of Francisco Castro an addition of a little more than one league to the tract of three leagues already conceded, and that the boundaries of the whole tract, as augmented, were those designated on the diseno of Negrete, No. 2, which is expressly referred to in the decree of concession, as indicating the amplification solicited. The quantity of land ascertained by Negrete to be included within the sea boundaries and the land lines run by him is designated in the 4th condition as to the quantity granted, and the surplus or sobrante is reserved. It cannot be pretended that the governor meant to grant all the land included within the first diseno, or within the exterior boundaries mentioned, viz. the ranchos of El Pinole, San Antonio, and the bay, for those boundaries contain nearly double the quantity granted. The extent of the first grant to his father is mentioned by Joaquin Castro, in his last petition, as three leagues. The extent of the tract, as augmented, is reported by Negrete to be four leagues and one twenty-fourth of a league, and he annexes a map showing its boundaries, and marked No. 2. The governor, in his decree of concession, states the amplification solicited to be of the extent of a little more than one square league, "as explained by the diseno No. 2"; and of this and the tract of three leagues already conceded he declares the heirs of Castro the owners. And finally, in the formal title, the land is declared to be of the extent of a little more than four square leagues, "as shown by the map" (clearly meaning the map No. 2), and the sobrante is reserved.

On reference to the diseno of Negrete, there would seem to be no difficulty in locating the land with reasonable certainty. On two sides the land fronts on the bay. On the south, the dividing line between the ranchos of San Pablo and San Antonio has already been determined by this court, after full argument by the representatives of both ranchos. If, then, that line be adopted, from the crest of the hills to the bay, thence along the shores of the latter, and including the Potrero, up to the point marked on Negrete's map as the termination of his northern line, there will be no difficulty in running the remaining lines so as to include the quantity of four leagues and about one twenty-fourth of a league; conforming the courses and lengths of said lines as nearly as may be to the northern and northeastern dotted lines as laid down on the diseno of Negrete. The survey must therefore be rejected, and a new survey made, conformably to this opinion.

[For the opinion confirming the grant in this case, see Case No. 14,751.]

Case No. 14,750.

UNITED STATES v. CASTRO.

[Cal. Law J. & Lit. Rev. 137.]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. 10, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY.

[1. Where the owners of adjacent ranchos have acquiesced in, adopted, and recognized for nearly 20 years, as the boundary between the ranchos, a certain line established by a government official in the discharge of his duties, and in conformity to which buildings have been erected, and the land cultivated for a long series of years, one of such owners cannot assert that such line is erroneous.]

[2. The mere execution by a grantee from the Mexican government of deeds of parts of the tract within the exterior boundaries does not show a location of the grant as including the land so conveyed, to be adopted by the court in preference to an election of location shown by the previous erection of a house and corrals on another part of the tract, and by the cultivation of the adjacent land, and residence thereon for a number of years.]

The principal controversy in this case is as to the location of the dividing line between the ranchos of Mariano Castro and Jose Pena. It appears from the expediente that in February, 1841, Jose Pena presented a petition to the governor, alleging that from the year 1837 he had solicited the Rincon de San Francisquito, but that, by various proceedings, which he details, a part of it, and also an augmento he had solicited, had been conceded to other parties. He therefore prays for a new augmentation of his land "from the arroyo de las Yeguas, which is its limit, as far as the first sausal toward the east," and he submits a diseño indicating the boundaries of the tract with the augmento. The augmento thus solicited was included within the general limits of the rancho of "Pastoria de las Borregas," which had been applied for by Francisco Estrada, but had not yet been granted. The inchoate right thus acquired by Estrada was so far respected as to make it necessary that his assent to the grant to Pena should be obtained. The administrator of the mission, to whom the petition was referred, accordingly reports that, "As respects the piece of land, 'Pedazo de Tierra,' which the applicant desires as an augmento, it may be conceded, without prejudice to any one, since, although it is included in the diseño of Don Francisco Estrada, he has agreed, in my presence, to cede it to Don Jose Pena." This agreement Estrada embodied in a written declaration, signed by himself, and attached to the expediente, wherein he obliges himself to cede to Pena "the piece in addition (el pedazo mas de augmento,) as described in his map, and shown on his diseño."

On the 29th March, 1841, the grant issued,—no express reference is made to the augmento,—but the land is described as bounded by that of Don Francisco Estrada. Estrada did not obtain his formal title until the succeeding January. It describes his land as bounded by that of Pena "on the side of the sausal de las Borregas." On the 19th of June, 1843, Ynigo, an Indian of Santa Clara, addressed a petition to the governor, alleging his right to a portion of the land included within the grant to Estrada, for which, as he averred, he had already received documents which had been lost. The governor, with the view of ascertaining how much land was included within the boundaries of the Estrada grant, ordered Sunol, the sub-prefect of the district, to measure the land, after previously notifying Estrada and the Indian Ynigo. This order was complied with by Sunol. His report to the government is found in the archives, and the actual location of the lines run by him is proved by his own testimony, and that of his assisting witnesses He appears to have fixed some of the boundaries, especially towards the south, arbitrarily, and as convenience dictated,—adopting a road and the crossing of the arroyo Cupertino as part of the boundary, without attempting to run to the line of the rancho of Prado Mesa, with which Estrada's tract is declared in the grant to be "colindante." The western boundary, or the line between Pena and Estrada, he seems to have run with care. It was pointed out to him by Estrada as the line of the augmento which he had agreed to cede; and, though Pena was not present, his son was aware of the proceeding, and witnessed the running of the line.

The testimony is conclusive and uncontradicted that from that day until recently the line thus established has been recognized by both parties, and been notorious among all the neighbors, as the dividing line between the ranchos. At the time this measurement was made Pena had already erected a house to the east of the Yeguas creek, which had been the original western boundary of the Estrada tract. A house had also been erected by Castro, the father-in-law of Estrada, and to whom the latter subsequently ceded all his rights in the immediate vicinity. This house, or rather another, erected in 1849, has continued to be occupied by the family of Castro ever since, and his widow resides in it to this day. The common boundary line of the ranchos was therefore run between the two houses, leaving Pena's house to the west, and within his limits, and that of Castro to the east. The boundary thus established in 1843 remained undisturbed and undisputed until very recently, when certain parties claiming an interest in the Pena grant, derived through the Robles, the assignees of Pena, for the first time urged the pretension that the line is not in accordance with the "linea del augmento" indicated on the diseño.

It is contended that if that line be drawn as there laid down, it will pass far to the eastward of the Sunol line. The quantity thus added to the Pena grant, in addition to that bounded by the Sunol line, will be about 3,000 acres. The line claimed by counsel will be drawn about 2¾ miles to the eastward of the Yeguas creek, and the total augmento, which, on this location we must suppose Pena to have solicited out of the Estrada tract, and Estrada to have consented to cede, would be not less than 4,000 acres, or nearly one square league. In support of this claim, the only evidence appealed to is the "linea del augmento," as drawn on the diseño of Pena. This diseño represents a tract of land bounded on the north by the bay, and on the west by the arroyo de Francisquito; on the east the arroyo de las Yeguas is laid down.

running from the hills toward the bay on the north. The "linea del augmento" appears to commence at a point in the hills to the west of the Yeguas, but, deflecting towards the east, it crosses that creek, intersects a road some distance to the eastward of where the same road is crossed by the Yeguas, and continues in the same direction to the bay. The road referred to is represented as running parallel with the bay, and east and west, from the San Francisquito creek to the eastern limits of the diseño.

BY THE COURT. In the foregoing description the directions referred to are approximately those indicated by actual survey, the compass marks on the diseño being, as usual, incorrect. Along the "linea del augmento" toward its southern end, near the hills, are written the words "Arastradero y Limites." The part of it beyond the point where it crosses the Yeguas is inscribed "Linea del Augmento." It is claimed that the line thus indicated is the line of the arastradero road, which, it is alleged, still exists, and can readily be traced. That that road, or a line nearly coincident with it, was intended to be adopted as far as the Yeguas creek, appears to me plain from the grant and diseño. The point of beginning, viz. "la punta del arastradero," is called for in the grant, and the direction of the line toward the Yeguas does not materially vary from that of the existing road, which Mr. Matthewson, the surveyor, declares to have the appearance of being an old road of the country, and the location of which could not, from the nature of the ground, have been materially altered. But the point where the dividing line crosses the main San Jose road, and its direction thence to the bay, are the real subjects of controversy. It is suggested that this point may be ascertained by comparing the distance along the main road, as indicated on the diseño, from the crossing of the Yeguas to the crossing of the dividing line, with the distance from the crossing of the Yeguas to that of the San Francisquito creek. The diseño seems to show that the dividing line crossed the road at a distance east of the crossing of the Yeguas a little more than one-third as great as the distance along the road between the two creeks.

It is apparent that to determine the location by a measurement of this kind is to attribute to the diseño an accuracy and justness of proportion rarely to be found in the rude map submitted to the governor, and certainly not characteristic of this diseño as is shown by comparing the relative length and width of the tract represented on it with its actual length and width as determined by the natural objects called for.

With a view, however, of ascertaining what, on the theory proposed, would be the location of the dividing line, I have procured, at the surveyor general's office, the measurement to be made. The distance between the Yeguas and San Francisquito creeks is determined by actual survey. If, then, the dividing line be run at the proportionate distance east of the Yeguas, it will be found not very considerably to differ with the Sunol line. It will certainly fall far short of the line contended for by counsel. Another mode suggested of determining the point in question is by comparing the length of the dividing line as indicated on the diseño from the hills or the "punta del arastradero" to where it crosses the Yeguas with the distance from the latter point to where it is represented as crossing the road. I have not attempted accurately to make this comparison. I have no doubt, however, that the result would be to carry the eastern line considerably to the eastward of the line run by Sunol. The method is obnoxious to the objection referred to,—that it attributes to the diseño a correctness which it evidently does not possess; and, though indications such as these are sometimes necessarily resorted to in the absence of all other modes of determining boundaries, in this case they are evidently not to be followed. But while thus appealing to obscure and doubtful indications of the diseño, the counsel has strangely overlooked the explicit language of Pena's petition and of the grant to Estrada. In the petition the augmento solicited is "from the Yeguas," which is the present boundary, as far as "the first sausalito toward the east." In the grant to Estrada, the ranch of the latter is described as bounded by the lands of Don Jose Pena on the side of the "sausal de las Borregas." On the diseño this sausalito is laid down, and the dividing line is represented as running at a very short distance to the east of it. This sausalito now exists upon the ground, and is readily identified as the first sausal to the east of the Yeguas. It is immediately adjacent to the sheep corral from whence the ranch derived the name of "Pastoria de las Borregas." It is evidently the sausal de las Borregas mentioned in the Estrada grant.

The language of Pena's petition might be construed as intended to exclude the sausalito from the augmento, for he asks only for the land "from the Yeguas as far as the "first sausalito." The diseño, however, would seem to indicate that it was intended to be included. The line run by Sunol passes through the sausal, leaving the larger portion on the side of Pena. As the houses of Pena and Castro were already built, and contiguous to each other, the line was run between them by Sunol, and the intention of the parties, no doubt, substantially carried into effect. The family of Castro have continued to reside in their house to the present day, and the acquiescence of both parties in the dividing line thus established is proved by uncontroverted testimony. If, then, the question were new, and the line were now for the first time to be located by the calls in the grant and diseño, it would not, to any considerable degree, depart from the line established by Sunol in 1843. But, even if this latter location were clearly erroneous, yet, on the plain principles of justice and law, it ought not now to be disturbed. It has been established, recognized, and adopted as a boundary line for nearly twenty years. Neither at the time it was run by Sunol, nor at any time afterwards, did Pena make any objection or complaint with regard to it. It was notorious among all the neighbors as the established and admitted line of division between the ranchos. It does not appear that the Robles, who have acquired Pena's interest, even now dispute this line. It is stated in the brief of the counsel for Castro that they acknowledge the line run by Sunol to be the ancient and true boundary between the ranchos. The objection is urged solely by a party who claims to have derived some interests in the rancho through the Robles. That the line, whether or not in precise accordance with the indications of the diseño, was substantially that intended by the parties, is evident from the fact that the house and principal cultivations of the Estrada rancho are immediately adjacent to it. It cannot be supposed that Estrada would have consented voluntarily and without consideration to cede to Pena part of his rancho including his house, his corrals, and comprising, if the line be run as contended for, more than four thousand acres of land, and this under the designation of 'un pedazo de tierra," or piece of land,—a term evidently implying a tract of no great extent. That the parties have acquiesced in, adopted, and recognized this line is evident, not only from the direct testimony to the fact, but from the circumstance that in 1849 Castro built a new house near his old one, in which his family have ever since resided. It will not be pretended that he built this house on land which he supposed he had ceded to Pena. The manifest injustice of disturbing a boundary, fixed by long acquiescence and adoption, has been recognized in numerous cases.

In Jackson v. Dieffendorf, 3 Johns. 269, Van Ness, J., says: "Shall a possession of thirty-eight years be disturbed because from a recent survey it appears not to correspond with partition deeds executed sixty years before?" In Jackson v. Van Corlaer, 11 Johns. 123, the parties who owned the land nineteen years before the trial agreed upon the line of division which had repeatedly been acquiesced in, and within ten years they had mutually supported the division fence thus agreed upon. The court refused to disturb the line so established. In Jackson v. Freer, 17 Johns. 31, Spencer, C. J., says: "The patents were issued on the mutual agreement of those interested in the whole tract to secure their common rights, and thus the agreement was carried into complete effect. The survey of the lots and the actual location of them by the joint act of all the parties must control. The map was intended to represent the relative situations and localities of the lots as regarded each other; the actual survey was the practical location." In McCormick v. Barnum, 10 Wend. 104, Chief Justice Savage says: "The line was acquiesced in for more than twenty years. The defendant had early built a house on the premises in question, and the plaintiff's agent must have seen it. This is clearly such a recognition and acquiescence as should bar the plaintiff's claim." In Jackson v. Murray, 7 Johns. 5, the court says: "In all cases of any uncertainty in the location of patents and deeds, courts hold the party to his actual location;" and Chief Justice Thompson, in Jackson v. Wood, 13 Johns. 346, says: "In grants of great antiquity, where the description of the land is vague and the construction somewhat doubtful, the acts of the parties, the acts of the government and those claiming under adjoining patents are entitled to great weight in the location of a grant."

The close analogy which the above cases (and many more might be cited) bear to the case at bar is apparent. With the exception that Pena was not himself present when the line was established by Sunol, the case at bar is at least as strong as any of those cited. That Pena and those claiming under him have for nearly twenty years acquiesced in and recognized the line cannot be doubted. It was established by a government official in the discharge of a duty imposed upon him by the governor. It was treated as fixed by the governor when determining how much land out of the Estrada grant should be given to Ynigo, and Pena or his grantees have suffered a house to be built, and the land to be cultivated for a long series of years, without complaint or objection. This house, and land to the extent of more than three thousand acres beyond the Sunol line, it is now sought to include in the Pena grant. It appears to me that the pretension is wholly inadmissible, and that the boundary between the ranchos as fixed by Sunol is not only in reasonable conformity with the calls of the grant and diseño, but even if it departed from them it ought not now, under the circumstances, to be disturbed. On the part of the claimants it is contended that the measurement by Sunol was a judicial delivery of the possession of the tract, and that the survey should now be made so as to include all the land within those boundaries. The circumstances under which the measurement was made by Sunol have already been adverted to. It is apparent that this measurement had few of the characteristics of, nor was it intended to operate as, a judicial delivery of possession. It was not made by a judge, but by an executive officer. The witnesses were not sworn, the colindantes were not summoned, no judicial record of the proceeding was made, and, what is conclusive, no delivery of the possession with the usual or with any formalities was given. Its object was merely to inform the governor of the extent of the tract in order to enable him to determine what portion might be conceded to Ynigo, and leave to Estrada sufficient to satisfy his grant for two leagues, a little more or less. The measurement was effected and a grant to Ynigo of much less than he solicited, and supposed to be about one-half of a league in extent, was made. I can see nothing in this proceeding to authorize the extension of the Estrada grant to the exterior boundaries run by Sunol, in great part arbitrarily, and, as he admits, without reference to quantity; i. e. without any intention of measuring off to Estrada the two leagues granted to him, but merely, as the order directs, to ascertain how much land was within the exterior limits. But whether or not this conclusion be right, the point is res adjudicata. The same claim was made to this court when the Estrada grant was before it on appeal from the board of commissioners. It was expressly decided, after argument, that the claim was valid to the extent of two leagues and no more. The validity and effect of Sunol's proceedings as a judicial delivery of possession were discussed at length in the opinion of the court, and the decree restricting the claim to two leagues has since been affirmed by the supreme court. [24 How. (65 U. S.) 346.] It is, therefore, the law of the case.

The recent discovery among the archives of the order to and report of Sunol in no respect alters the legal aspect of the question. But, even if it were otherwise, those records are at most newly discovered evidence, to be submitted to the court in a bill of review, which, under the act of 1851, this court has no jurisdiction to entertain. The decree, therefore, which confirms the claim to two square leagues of land and no more, is final and conclusive.

The location of the two square leagues within the exterior boundaries remains to be determined. It appears that in 1850, Castro conveyed to Jones, who had been acting as his attorney and counsel, a piece of land on the extreme eastern border of the rancho. An attempt has been made to show that this conveyance was merely a grant of the sobrante over and above two leagues, and that it was intended merely as a relinquishment by Castro of his rights in the surplus, in case he should be adjudged to possess any. But the evidence on this point is by parol, and, even if admissible, it is unsatisfactory. At the time of the conveyance there is no reason to suppose that either party doubted the rights of Castro to the whole tract included within what has been called the judicial possession given by Sunol. The deed was, therefore, accepted by Jones as an absolute conveyance in fee simple, and he has conveyed to subpurchasers portions of the land. If, then, Castro were now seeking to make an election so as to exclude the lands sold, it is quite possible that he would be estopped by his deed to declare that the land conveyed should not be included, notwithstanding that the deed seems to have been made and received under a mistaken notion of his rights. But in fact his election had been made long previously to the date of the deed to Jones. As early as 1843 he had built a house and corrals, and had cultivated lands on the extreme western portions of the tract. In 1849 a new house was erected, and we have seen that as early as 1843 he was present with Sunol, when the latter ran upon the ground his extreme western boundary. In the opinion delivered by this court in the case of U. S. v. Sutter [Case No. 16,424] it is said: "As against a grantee, or purchasers under him, seeking to exercise the right of election subsequent to and differing from a location already constructively elected by deeds of conveyance, the above reasoning would seem conclusive. But it commonly happens that soon after obtaining his grant, and prior to any conveyance of any portion of the land, the grantee has erected a dwelling house, corrals, etc., and has cultivated portions, more or less extensive, of his land. Ignorant of the dimensions of the tract within his exterior boundaries, or supposing, as was formerly not uncommon, that the whole tract within his exterior boundaries would be confirmed to him, he may have conveyed away portions remote from his houses and cultivations—the purchaser, perhaps, taking the risk of having the land purchased included in the survey—and, it may be, paying a price less than its value by reason of the uncertainty as to the location. But the grantee, or a subsequent purchaser under him, might, notwithstanding such a conveyance, insist that no location should be made so as to exclude his ancient dwelling house, his corrals, and his cultivated fields. He might urge, with great force, that it would be absurd to confirm his claim, because he had settled upon and improved it, and afterward to declare that his house and improvements were not upon his own, but upon public land. He might also urge that the erection of a house and corrals, the cultivation of the adjacent lands, especially when effected at great expense, and followed by a residence of many years, are acts which indicate an election far more unmistakeably and emphatically than any conveyances could do—and that subsequent purchasers of remote parts of the tract are affected with notice of the fact that, so far as his homestead and adjacent lands are concerned, the election is already made, and the location fixed. So, too, the purchaser of his house and improvements might reasonably claim that wherever the grant might finally be located, it ought, at all events, to include what the grantee had, by acts so notorious and unmistakeable, averred it to embrace; and that the location thus originally made by the grantee should not be affected by the execution of deeds, perhaps quit-claim, and without consideration, of which he, the purchaser of the house and improved land, neither had nor could have had notice. If, in addition, we consider how readily frauds upon the purchaser of the homestead, or even upon settlers, (who naturally look to the house and settlement as determining the location of the grant,) might be committed by means of antedated conveyances, it will, I think, be apparent that the mere execution of deeds to purchasers cannot, in all cases, be accepted as an election by the grantee of the location of the land which is to be adopted by this court, by causing the survey to be made of the tracts so conveyed, including them successively, in the order of their dates until the whole quantity be obtained."

I have found no reason to doubt the correctness of these views, expressed more than eighteen months ago. It may be observed, in addition, that the duty of the United States is to locate this land, as nearly as may be, in the same manner as the magistrate called upon to give a judicial possession would or ought to have done, with such modifications only as are necessary to adapt it to the lines of public surveys, and to prevent the location from being unreasonably injurious to the public interests. It cannot be doubted that if a judicial possession of this rancho had been given, Castro would not only have the right, but would have been required to include within it his house and cultivations; and any sobrante that might have resulted would probably have been cut off on the side of the Mission of Santa Clara, so as to leave the remaining lands of that establishment, to which the Estrada tract originally appertained, in a compact form.

A portion of the two leagues granted to Estrada has been conveyed to Murphy by metes and bounds, who has presented his claim and obtained a separate confirmation for the tract conveyed to him. The confirmation to Castro was, therefore, for two leagues, excepting therefrom the land conveyed and confirmed to Murphy. There must, therefore, be surveyed to Castro, within his exterior boundaries, a tract sufficient to make up, with the lands of Murphy, the quantity of two leagues; such tract to be located so as to include his house and cultivations, and to be in a compact form.

Case No. 14,751.

UNITED STATES v. CASTRO.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 105.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—VALIDITY OF CLAIM.

No opposition to the confirmation of this claim.

Claim [by Joaquin Y. Castro, administrator of Francisco Maria Castro, deceased] for about four leagues of land in Contra Costa county [the Rancho San Pablo], confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.

Saunders & Hepburn, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This case has been submitted to this court on appeal without argument or the statement of any objection to its validity. We have, however, as in other cases, examined the transcript, which is unusually voluminous, and have perceived no obstacle to its confirmation. The first application for the land appears to have been made by Don Francisco Castro in 1823, and to have been addressed to the deputation. On the same day a degree was made granting the place solicited, and directing the military commander of the presidio of San Francisco to put the petitioner in possession. This seems, from various causes, not to have been done, nor does the title to the land appear to have issued to Francisco Castro during his lifetime, although, as appears from the expediente, he had gone upon the land, placed cattle upon it, and from time to time solicited of the governor the formal title. On his death, his son and the administrator of his estate, Joaquin Ysidro Castro, petitioned the governor on the twenty-sixth of May, 1834, for the land occupied by the family, stating it to be three leagues in extent, and annexing to his petition a map of the land solicited. The governor, after having caused the documents on file in the case of the previous application of Francisco Castro to be produced, acceded to the petition, and on the twelfth of June, 1834, the formal title issued to the successors of Francisco Castro. In this title the boundaries of the land are mentioned, and reference is made to the map which accompanies the expediente. The extent of the land granted is stated to be three square leagues, more or less. On the twenty-third of June, 1835, Joaquin Ysidro Castro presented another petition to the governor, in which he states that he had through inadvertence neglected to ask for all the land included in the boundaries indicated on the diseño, and he solicits an augmentation of the previous grant so as to include the whole tract designated on the map. By the report of Negrete, the secretary to whom the governor referred this petition, it appears that the land comprised within the boundaries referred to had been ascertained to be of the extent of four and one twenty-fourth square leagues. On the fourteenth of August, 1835, the governor granted to the successors of Francisco Castro the augmentation solicited, and on the twentieth of August, 1835, the formal title was issued for the land as originally bounded, and in the fourth so called condition of the title, the extent of the tract is declared to be "four square leagues and a little over, including the surplus which by the decree of the fourteenth of August of the present year was granted to them, and as shown by the map which accompanies the expediente and already conceded to them." It is this tract of four square leagues and a little over that is now claimed by the appellees.

All the above recited facts appear from the expedientes on file. The authenticity of the original documents produced by the interested parties is fully proved, and their long continued occupation and extensive improvements of the land for more than thirty years clearly established. It also appears that the grant was approved by the departmental assembly. We are of opinion therefore that this claim is valid, and that the decision of the board should be affirmed.

UNITED STATES v. CASTRO et al.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 125.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—NONPRODUCTION OF GRANT—LONG AND NOTORIOUS OCCUPATION.

The nonproduction of the grant in this case does not affect the validity of the claim, the loss of the grant being proved, and long and notorious occupation of the land established.

Claim [by Rufina Castro and others] for two leagues of land in Santa Clara county [the Rancho Solis], confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.
Stanly & King, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The only doubt that can be raised with regard to the validity of this claim arises from the fact that the original grant is not produced. The board, however, after considering the evidence taken to show that the grant had been delivered to the deceased grantee, as well as its subsequent loss, arrive at the conclusion that it duly issued as represented in the petition. The fact that the list of grants in the archives contains this amongst others, the parol testimony of several witnesses who have seen it and known that it was produced and referred to, to settle disputed boundary lines, and the still more conclusive fact that the grantee and his family have resided upon the land for more than twenty years, are sufficient to remove any suspicions which the nonproduction of the grant might otherwise suggest. An occupation so long continued and so notorious, with a claim of ownership so universally recognized, might of itself be deemed sufficient evidence of ownership. The claim was unanimously confirmed by the board, and we see no reason for reversing their judgment; nor has any been suggested on the part of the United States. A decree of confirmation must therefore be entered.

Case No. 14,753.

UNITED STATES v. CASTRO.

[Hoff. Op 57; Hoff. Dec. 97.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1859.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—BOUNDARIES—QUANTITY IN GRANT.

[Under a grant of land "of the extent of two square leagues, a little more or less," the judicial officer has no power to confirm a tract of three and one-half leagues.]

[Claim by Mariano Castro for a certain tract of land called "La Pastoria."]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was confirmed by the board. The genuineness of the grant is not disputed. The only question raised is, whether the grantee shall take the whole tract which Sunol deposes he measured off to him, or shall be confined to the quantity mentioned in the grant. By the expediente it appears that the land was originally applied for by Jose Estrada, in 1840. In this petition no boundaries are mentioned, but the place in Santa Clara, known as "La Pastoria," is asked for with the understanding that the said tract should "consist of two leagues, a little more or less." On this petition various informes were obtained, and on the 27th February, 1841, Gov. Alvarado directed the expediente "to be passed to the actual trustee of the establishment of Santa Clara, the party interested to annex thereto a design of the tract asked for." This diseño appears to have been presented, for it is found in the expediente. In the decree of concession Estrada is declared "the owner in property of the land called Pastoria de las Borregas, bounded by the land of Don Jose Peno, by that of Don Prado Nesa and La Punta del Roblar, to the extent of two leagues, as shown by the annexed diseño." In the grant the land is described in the same terms, but in the second condition it is stated "that the land of which mention is made is of the extent of two square leagues, a little more or less," and the judge who shall give the possession is directed to "cause it to be measured according to the ordinances, the surplus thereof to be left to the nation for its convenient uses." The third condition directs, in the usual form, that the judge giving the judicial possession shall mark out the boundaries, on the limits of which the grantee shall put besides the landmarks some fruit or other useful trees.

It appears by the testimony of Antonio Sunol, that in 1842, acting as subprefect, and in pursuance of an order of the governor, he measured the land of which the grantee was in possession—that he made a written report of his proceedings in the matter, which he transmitted to the government and recorded them in the book of proceedings kept by him as subprefect. Neither the report nor the book can now be found, and we are compelled to resort to parol testimony to ascertain what were the measurements made by Sunol. He swears that subsequently—but when he does not state—he accompanied a surveyor to the land, and pointed out to him the limits which he had just established—although he did not see the actual survey of the land. On being shown a map, or sketch of the tract, he states that so far as he saw the land the sketch appears to be correct, and he proceeds to describe the lines run by him when he gave the possession. He appears to have run five lines, the first two of which are not marked on the map, and would seem not to have been intended as boundaries. The first was run at the eastern end of the ranch, parallel to the creek of Las Yeguas, but at some distance from it; and the second nearly at right angles to it, and passing from the house of Robles through the centre of the rancho to the laguna on the western extremity. From this laguna he ran a line to the bay on the north, and another to the edge of the chemisal on the southwest—and from the end of this latter a fifth line was run to Arroyo de San Jose, as shown on the map.

On comparing the tract of land which appears to have been intended to be included within these boundaries with indications of the diseño it is found impossible to identify the two tracts. The diseño is drawn with extreme wideness. No boundaries seem to be delineated, and the only objects which I have been able to recognize are four lines—two of which are marked as caminos, or roads; the third as the Arroyo de las Yeguas; and the fourth as the estero, or bay. The laguna is not laid down, nor is the creek of San Jose, which Sunol seems to have taken for a boundary, but the word "Roblar" is inscribed on the diseño apparently at a place near where, by the survey since made, the lands of Prada Meso are situated. I have not been able to find on either of the diseños, on the map, or in the testimony of any witness any information as to the situation of the lands of Pena, by which, as the grant mentions, the lands of the claimant are bounded. From an endorsement on the original grant, signed by Gov. Micheltorrena, and dated Feb. 14, 1844, it appears that by a resolution of the departmental assembly of that date the concession to the Indian of Santa, called Yingo, of the land then occupied by him, was ordered to be issued. This land is comprised within the limits of the claimant's rancho as measured by Sunol in 1842. The board therefore directed that the lands of Yingo, as well as those sold by the claimant to Martin Murphy, and which have been separately confirmed to him, should be excepted from the lands confirmed in the case.

The question then arises, to what extent of land is the claimant entitled? It appears in evidence that the lands embraced within the measurement of Sunol are from three to four leagues in extent. It cannot be contended that the grant is for a tract of land by metes and bounds. As already stated, the grant merely mentions the names of two persons on whose lands the tract borders, and the third boundary, if it can be called such, is a point and not a line. The diseño fails to afford any intelligible indication whatever as to the limits of the tract intended to be granted. It is clear, therefore, that under the grant the claimant would be entitled to two leagues. In the case of U. S. v. Fossatt [21 How. (62 U. S.) 445], the supreme court refused to attach any significance to the words "more or less," or to extend the grant beyond the quantity clearly expressed. Yet in that case three boundaries were distinctly mentioned in the grant, and the fourth was supposed by this court to be clearly indicated by the diseño, the petition and the name of the place granted. The excess within the boundaries was only a fraction of a league—the usual unit of measurement.

Under this ruling of the supreme court, it is of course impossible to construe the grant in the present case as conveying more than two leagues. To confirm, then, to the claimant a tract of 3½ leagues in extent, on the ground that it was measured off to him by the judicial officer, would be to attribute to that officer the granting power. The measurement made by him seems to have been to some degree loose and informal. No record of the act of giving judicial possession, such as is often found attached to the expediente, appears to have been made. He recorded his proceedings he says, in his book; but the nature and formality of that record does not appear. It is not shown that the lines run by Sunol were measured by him. Their length is not given, nor does he appear to have estimated the quantity of the land of which he gave the possession. The lines, moreover, do not disclose any tract, for the second appears to have been run nearly through its centre; though it seems probable that he intended the estero to be the northern boundary. So far as appears either from the grant, the diseño or the evidence in the case, the land was laid off at the mere discretion of the judicial officer; nor is it apparent why he might not have fixed the boundaries in any other manner, or included within them a far greater quantity of land. I cannot discover that in his location of the land he has attempted to ascertain it by reference to the boundaries of Don Jose Pena, or to the point called "Punta del Roblar," both of which are called for as boundaries in the grant; and it is even suggested that the only remaining boundary called for, viz. the lands of Don Prado Mesa, has not been observed. To affirm that under a grant of this kind, which from its own indefiniteness, as well as by the law as laid down by the supreme court, must be construed to convey only two leagues, the claimant is, nevertheless, by virtue of a possession given by a judicial officer—such as that given in this case—to be allowed a tract from three to four leagues in extent, is, as before observed, virtually to recognize in that officer a power to grant land, rather than measure and locate them, and to ascertain the sobrante.

I therefore think that there should be confirmed under this grant only two leagues of land, to be laid and measured within the boundaries mentioned in the grant. Reference for the more precise ascertainment of said boundaries to be made to the diseño, accompanying the expediente, and to the deposition of Sunol, and the map annexed thereto on file in this case—said two leagues to be surveyed and located after the first ascertaining and measuring off the lands granted to the Indian Migo. For a description of which last mentioned lands, reference to be had to the opinion of the board of commissioners on file in this case, and to the note made by Gov. Micheltorrena on the back of the original grant herein. It being understood that the said lands so granted to the said Indian shall first be measured off, and then that the quantity of two leagues shall be measured within the boundaries above mentioned, and the said quantity of two leagues is hereby confirmed to the claimant, excepting, nevertheless, from said confirmation the lands conveyed by him to one Martin Murphy, which lands have been separately confirmed to the said Murphy; and for a description of said lands of Martin Murphy, reference is to be had to two deeds executed by the claimant to said Murphy, and filed in case No. 90, on the docket of the board of commissioners.

Case No. 14,754.

UNITED STATES v. CASTRO.

[5 Sawy. 625.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July 26, 1868.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—TERM—MISTAKE—MEXICAN LAND GRANT—INVESTITURE OF TITLE—BOUNDARIES DESIGNATED IN GRANT—SURVEY.

1. The doctrine that the jurisdiction of the court over a cause, after final decree, ceases with the term in which the decree is rendered, does not apply to decrees entered by mistake. Accordingly, where a decree was rendered by the district court of the United States, affirming on appeal a decree of the board of land commissioners, confirming a claim to land under a Mexican grant, and afterwards overlooking the fact that such decree had been rendered, upon a stipulation entered into between the attorney of the United States and the attorney of the claimants, an order was entered by the district court dismissing the appeal, and subsequently at another term this last order was vacated: Held, that the order was properly vacated, although a term of the court had elapsed since the order was made.

2. After a grant had been issued by the governor of California, under the Mexican law, and such grant had received the approval of the departmental assembly, it was essential to a complete investiture of the title that there should be an official delivery of possession to the grantee by the magistrate of the vicinage, which proceeding required a measurement and segregation from the public domain of the specific quantity granted.

3. The magistrate of the vicinage in officially delivering possession was required to measure off the quantity within the boundaries designated in the grant. Any passing beyond such boundaries vitiated his whole proceeding.

4. When the district court, under the act of June 14, 1860 (12 Stat. 33), had ordered a survey of a confirmed claim to land under a Mexican grant into court for examination, its jurisdiction over it continued, and over any new survey directed by it, until the survey of the claim was finally disposed of, notwithstanding the passage of the act of July 1, 1864 (13 Stat. 332).

This was an appeal [by the United States] from a decree of the district court of California, approving the survey of a confirmed claim under a Mexican grant [to Guadalupe Castro.]

Isaac Hartman, W. W. Crane, and McCullough & Boyd, for appellant.

Delos Lake and Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for the United States.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. We do not deem it important to consider at length the several objections urged by the appellants to the decree of the district court, approving the survey of the rancho confirmed to the claimants. A brief notice of them will be sufficient.

It is evident, from an examinaton of the original title papers, that the Mexican government intended to cede to Castro only a tract of two square leagues. The conditions annexed to his grant state that the land ceded is of this extent, and require its measurement, and reserve any surplus for the national use. The designation of the tract ceded by a particular name, and the specification of the outboundaries, must yield to the limitation of quantity as thus expressed. Such has been the uniform ruling of the federal courts in cases of this kind. It is only where this limitation is omitted that the concession is held to embrace the entire quantity within specified boundaries. Where this is wanting, the extent of the grant is only restricted by the boundaries named, and the provisions of the colonization law of 1824. U. S. v. Pico, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 539.

The decree of the district court entered in February, 1857, affirming the decision of the board of land commissioners, contains a similar limitation. It adjudges the claim of the parties to be valid, and confirms it to "the extent of two square leagues and no more." Previous to the rendition of this decree, the attorney-general had transmitted a notice from Washington that the appeal would not be prosecuted by the United States; but the notice was not received at San Francisco until some time in March following. Yet, notwithstanding the decree of the district court, a stipulation was entered into between the district attorney and the attorney of the claimants, more than a year afterwards—in June, 1858—that the notice of intention to prosecute the appeal on the part of the United States would be withdrawn and the appeal be dismissed, and that the claimants have leave to proceed upon the decree of the board as upon a final decree; and upon that stipulation the district court ordered the appeal to be dismissed, and gave the claimants the leave stipulated.

It is very evident that this latter decree was inadvertently entered without the attention of the district court being called to its previous decree. The notice of the attorney-general had ceased to be of any effect, by the decree rendered during its transmission from Washington to San Francisco. It was no longer applicable to any pending appeal. We think, therefore, the proceeding subsequently taken to vacate the decree, was eminently proper, and within the jurisdiction of the court, notwithstanding the lapse of time since its entry.

The doctrine that the jurisdiction of the court over a cause after final decree ceases with the term in which the decree is rendered, is intended to protect parties from disturbance and litigation after the merits of their cases have been fully heard and determined. It was not intended to protect them in decrees entered by mistake, any more than in decrees obtained by imposition or fraud upon the court. We must regard, therefore, the original decree of the district court entered in January, 1857, which in terms has never been set aside, as the decree which must determine the extent of the land confirmed to the claimants. That decree, as we have already stated, limits the quantity to two square leagues.

The position of the appellants, that their title had been perfected under the Mexican government, and required no further action on the part of the United States, rests upon the supposed validity of the proceeding taken for the measurement of the land ceded, and the delivery of its possession. The grant had received the approval of the assembly of the department, and had thus become definitively valid. The only subsequent proceeding essential to a complete investiture of the title was an official delivery of possession by the magistrate of the vicinage, a proceeding which required a measurement and segregation from the public domain of the specific quantity granted. Malarin v. U. S., 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 289. The attempted proceeding for this segregation and delivery taken by a justice of the peace in January, 1846, assuming that he was a magistrate of the rank required in such cases, was clearly invalid. The Cañada del Cerbo was the boundary between the grant to Castro and the subsequent grant to Amesti. This was expressly so declared by Micheltorrena in this latter grant. The record of the proceedings of the justice shows that he passed beyond this boundary, and not only included in his measurement a much larger quantity than that granted to Castro, but also a portion of the land granted to Amesti. This he had no authority to do. His authority was limited to the measurement of the specific quantity granted, and the delivery of its possession. His departure from this course vitiated the whole proceedings.

The objection to the jurisdiction of the district court over the survey, is untenable. In December, 1860, the court had ordered the survey previously made into court. In January, 1862, it had allowed the exceptions taken to it, and had ordered a re-survey of the premises by the surveyor-general. The act of July 1, 1864, to expedite the settlement of titles in California, whilst restoring to the surveyor-general and the general land-office, the jurisdiction over surveys of lands confirmed under Mexican grants, which they had previous to the act of June, 1860, provides, that where proceedings for the correction or confirmation of surveys are pending at the time of its passage in the district court, it shall be lawful for that court to proceed and complete its examination and determination of the matter. The order calling in the original survey was the initiative of a proceeding for its correction, and the proceeding could not be considered ended because the surveyor-general was subsequently directed to make a re-survey in accordance with certain directions. The order for a re-survey did not bring the case within the provisions of the last paragraph of the third section of the act of 1864. That paragraph applies only to new surveys which may be ordered by the circuit court, upon the decision of appeals from the district court; but the order directing a re-survey was itself subsequently set aside, which left the survey before the court upon the original order.

After careful consideration of the several objections urged by counsel of the appellants in their very elaborate brief, we find nothing which would justify interference with the decree of the district court. The case appears to have received great consideration from the learned judge of that court, and we are satisfied with his conclusions.

Decree affirmed.

UNITED STATES (CASTRO v.). See Cases Nos. 2,508 and 2,509.

Case No. 14,755.

UNITED STATES v. The CATHARINE.

[2 Paine, 721;[1] 3 Law Rep. 255.]

Circuit Court,[2] New York. 1840.

SLAVE TRADE—EMPLOYMENT—CONFISCATION—DELIVERY OF VESSEL—PREPARATIONS OF VESSEL AND CARGO.

1. An American vessel, on her outward voyage to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of taking on board a cargo of slaves, is, before any slaves are received on board, "employed or made use of," within the act of congress of May 10th, 1800 [2 Stat 70], "in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another."

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

[2] [District not given.]

2. To be employed in anything, means not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it, to be under contract or orders to do it.

3. And if the outward voyage under the American character and ownership be planned and undertaken with a view and under an arrangement that the ownership and national character are to be changed on the arrival of the vessel on the coast of Africa, and that she is then to be employed in the transportation of slaves, she comes clearly within the mischief and within the true intent and meaning of the act of congress.

4. And, in such a case, the confiscation is not limited to the American interest held in the vessel at the time she is engaged in the actual transportation of slaves. It is not the true construction of the act that the whole adventure must be performed whilst the vessel retains her American character and ownership. The penalty is incurred and the forfeiture attaches from the very inception of the voyage. The vessel becomes tainted with the offence wherever she may go, or into whatever hands she may fall, and the forfeiture attaches upon all interests concerned.

[Cited in U. S. v. Greathouse, Case No. 15,254.]

5. But a bona fide sale of a vessel, to be delivered at any given place on the coast of Africa, unconnected with the ulterior employment of the vessel, and not in aid of an employment in the transportation of slaves, would not subject her to forfeiture within the act of congress.

6. Where a voyage to the coast of Africa is commenced and prosecuted under strongly suspicious circumstances, accompanied with preparations and a cargo taken, such as are usually employed in voyages in the slave trade, it is incumbent on the claimant to explain and remove such suspicious circumstances by clear, explicit and unequivocal proofs.

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court of [the United States for] the Northern district of New York, awarding restitution of a vessel captured as a slaver, and libelled by the United States. The libel contained several articles, but the following was the only one on which condemnation was sought at the trial: "Fifthly, that a certain schooner or vessel called the Catharine, being the property, wholly or in part, of a citizen or citizens of the United States, or of persons residing within the United States, to the said libellant unknown, was heretofore, to wit, on or about the first day of July, in the year of our Lord, 1839, employed and made use of by some person or persons being a citizen or citizens of the United States, or being a person or persons residing within the United States, to the said libellant unknown, in the transportation and carrying of slaves from some foreign country to the said libellant unknown, to some other foreign country or place to the said libellant unknown, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, being the act of congress, entitled 'An act in addition to the act entitled An act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country,' approved May 10th, 1800." The libel prayed the forfeiture and condemnation of the vessel.

A claim was put in by Charles Tyng, setting up the following facts, viz.: That he was a native citizen of the United States, but that he had resided at Havana as a ship broker and commission agent since October, 1837. In May, 1839, the Catharine, a registered vessel of the United States, built and owned in Baltimore, arrived at Havana, under the command of William J. Wedge, a citizen of the United States. He represented himself as the agent of R. W. Allen and John Henderson, citizens of Baltimore, the owners of the vessel, to effect a sale of her; and had a power of attorney from them for that purpose. He employed Tyng to sell her; and the latter, in June following, sold her, as he supposed, to Martinez & Co., of Havana, for $7,750, and delivered possession of her to them. Wedge being anxious to return in a vessel sailing for the United States, Tyng advanced him the price of the vessel before he had received it himself, and took from Wedge a power of substitution, to enable him to transfer the vessel. About ten days afterwards, however, the purchasers having discovered some objections to the vessel, refused to complete the purchase and pay the price. But in the interval, the sale being supposed complete, one of the house who had purchased her, desired Tyng to effect a charter of the vessel to John S. Thrasher, a citizen of the United States, which he accordingly did. The charter party was between Tyng, as agent of the owners, and Thrasher, and was for a voyage to Principe or other ports on the coast of Africa, of eight months, at three hundred dollars per month; and if the vessel should be at sea at the expiration of the eight months, the charter to continue until she arrived in port. By the terms of the charter party, Thrasher was to victual and man her. Finding that he could not compel Martinez & Co. to pay for the vessel without a lawsuit, which he wished to avoid, Tyng sold the vessel, about the 25th of June, to one Teran, of Havana. By the contract of sale, which was reduced to writing, Teran agreed to purchase the vessel for $10,000, provided she should be delivered to him at the port of Bona, on the coast of Africa, on or before the first of October, and to pay in advance $7,500, and the balance at Havana on receiving satisfactory evidence of the delivery of the vessel at Bona; and Tyng was to be at liberty to load or charter the vessel until the day of her delivery at Bona, and was to refund the sum advanced in the event of failing to deliver her. Previous to effecting the contract of sale to Teran, Tyng applied to Thrasher to modify the charter party, representing to him the hardship of the case; and the latter, induced by such representations, thereupon agreed, in writing, to modify his charter party so as to enable Tyng to deliver the vessel at Bona by the first of October, relinquishing his right to her after his cargo should be landed at Principe. Thrasher loaded the vessel with a cargo which appeared, by the bill of lading and invoice, to be worth about $6,000. The principal articles were one hundred half-pipes of brandy, valued at $1,500, and two thousand two hundred and seventy-five bales of leaf tobacco, valued at $2,275. There were also fourteen large hogshead shooks, ten long do. do., one boiler for clarifying, one thousand five hundred feet of white pine boards, and eleven pieces of joist. The rest of the invoice was ordinary merchandise. The cargo was consigned to one Pereyra, and the vessel sailed for Principe under the command of one Peterson. About the 30th day of August the vessel was forcibly seized and taken possession of by the Dolphin, a foreign armed vessel; and Robert H. Dundas having been placed in command of her, she was brought by him into the port of New York. The pretence for the seizure was that she was a slaver; and though sailing under American colors, was, in reality, owned by Spaniards. The claim of Tyng concluded with averring, that he had been sued by Martinez & Co., at Havana, to recover back their advance; that Allen & Henderson had refused to repay the money advanced by him, on the ground that he had made the vessel his own; and that she was, in fact, his property, and at the time of the capture under his control, and had not been engaged in the slave trade; and that he had never intended to employ her in such trade.

Petitions were also filed by Michael, the mate, and Foxcroft, one of the mariners, alleging that the vessel was engaged on a lawful voyage, or that they supposed it to be so; and that if it was broken off, it was not their fault, but the fault of the master and owners, and praying their wages.

The following facts were proved by the deposition of Robert H. Dundas, a mate or passed midshipman in the British navy, examined on the part of the United States: On the 13th of August, 1839, he was serving on board the brigantine Dolphin, a British national vessel, commanded by Lieutenant Holland, and cruising off Cape St. Pauls, on the coast of Africa. On that day, while sailing in a north-east direction towards the land, they fell in with and gave chase to the Catharine, which was then about three or four miles off the cape, steering south-west, off the land. She showed no colors, but hoisted American colors after about two hours' chase, and after the Dolphin had fired several shots. When they first saw her she was distant, at north-west, about three or four miles, and the wind was at W. N. W. They finally compelled her to heave to, and Dundas boarded her as examining officer, and found Peterson in command. He demanded the register, crew-list, invoice of cargo, American log-book, and some other papers, which Peterson delivered to him. In about one hour Lieut. Holland came on board and searched Capt. Peterson, and found the following paper concealed on his person: "The main thing for you to do on this voyage is to be ready, in case you are boarded by a man-of-war, to show your log-book, which must be regularly kept from the time you leave here, your ship's papers, your charter party for the voyage, your ship's roll and instructions; and you are, in that event, to take all command with your American sailors, according to your roll; all the others are to be passengers. You are to be very careful that, in any cross questions, you do not commit yourself, but always stick to the same story. When the vessel is discharged, you must at once cut your register in two pieces; one piece you must enclose direct and send to Messrs. Thomas Wilson & Co., Baltimore; the other piece you will bring with you and give to me when you return here. You must be very particular about that, and do not let any time pass after the cargo is out before you cut the register in two pieces, and be careful to keep them separate. Throw one piece overboard if you are obliged to by being boarded by a man-of-war." Peterson, who was very drunk, resisted the search, and it took several persons to hold him; within half an hour afterwards they found a Spanish log-book of the voyage, kept cotemporaneously with the American log-book, from the 29th of June to the 12th of August, and several other papers in Spanish and English. The Spanish log-book was found in the trunk of one of the Spaniards, some of the other papers in trunks of the other Spaniards, and some were found loose forward. They picked up every paper they could find. Among the papers was a letter of instructions from Thrasher to Peterson, dated June 28th, the only material part of which was as follows: "As soon as your vessel is ready for sea, you will proceed to the Isle of Principe, and on your arrival there you will consign your vessel and cargo to Joseph Pereyra, Esq., and deliver him the certified invoice herewith enclosed. Should he wish you to proceed to any other port or ports on the coast of Africa, with or without a cargo, you will implicitly obey his instructions, as he has my full power to act as he may see fit for my interest. You will be particularly careful, however, not to receive on board said schooner any cargo that is contraband, or that is not allowed by the laws of the United States to be laden on board American vessels. A number of persons having applied to me for passage out in the schooner, I have consented; but you will take care that their passports are in order, and that there are no circumstances attending them which will be likely to bring you into the least difficulty." Among the papers were also the shipping articles, headed, "No ardent spirits allowed on board," and signed by four seamen purporting to be native Americans, and two foreigners; the crew list corresponding with the shipping articles; the charter party, bill of lading and invoice the same as set forth in the claim of Tyng; American protections for the four seamen shipped as Americans; a register of the vessel taken out at Baltimore; a list of twenty-four persons, Spanish or Portuguese, with designations showing them to compose the officers and mariners of a ship's company, at the head of which was Pereyra as master; the plan of a slave deck drawn on paper; and several papers in Spanish and Portuguese not deemed material. There was also the following agreement signed by Pereyra: "It is mutually agreed between F. A. Peterson and Joseph Pereyra, the former master and the latter supercargo of schooner Catharine, of Baltimore, now bound on a voyage to the coast of Africa, that said F. A. Peterson shall go out master of said schooner on her present voyage, for the sum of one hundred dollars per month and three hundred dollars gratification, the wages to continue until his return here, should he return in the vessel, or any other vessel belonging to the house for which J. Pereyra is agent. But should said Peterson wish to leave the vessel on the coast, said Pereyra binds himself hereby to pay unto said Peterson three hundred dollars gratification, and his wages up to the day he leaves the vessel, less one hundred dollars received here as one month's advance. Jose Pereyra. Havana, June 28th, 1839."

The deposition of Dundas further proved that the crew consisted of eight persons with American protections, including the captain. There were also on board twenty or twenty-five foreigners, mostly Spanish or Portuguese; six or eight men would be quite sufficient to navigate the vessel in a lawful trade; witness came over to New York in her with six men. They found on board a large boiler or cooking apparatus sufficient to cook for three hundred people; a quantity of lumber which was marked and numbered for laying a slave deck, and could easily have been put up in a few hours as a slave deck after the cargo was discharged; a number of wooden vessels, some made up and some in shooks; about nine were made up and there were materials for about six more; each would have contained from four to six hundred gallons. They also found five hundred and seventy wooden spoons, similar to those used in slave vessels, and thirty-six large tin dishes and a number of small ones. These equipments are generally found in slave vessels, and witness had never seen them anywhere else. They found no irons, but they are generally concealed in the lower part of the vessel. All the persons found on board, with the exception of Capt. Peterson, the American mate, one American seaman, and Pereyra, were landed at Quitta, a port a few miles east of Cape St. Pauls, and much resorted to by vessels for water and provisions. Witness then took the vessel to Sierra Leone, and laid the papers before the mixed commission, but they refused to take jurisdiction of the case on the ground that the Catharine was sailing under an American register. He then, pursuant to orders, brought her to the United States, and arrived here the 6th of October, 1839. The day after their arrival Pereyra committed suicide. The cargo found on board corresponded with the invoice, and was such an one as an honest trader would have on board trading with the coast of Africa; it was also such an one as a slaver would have on board; the lumber and large boiler would excite witness' suspicion; the vessel was not in a condition to receive slaves until her cargo was discharged, and a slave deck could not have been put up until then; had the vessel been condemned at a port where a mixed commission was sitting, witness would have had a share as prize-money of the vessel and cargo; if she should now be condemned he would not say whether he would be entitled to anything or not; he had done nothing to assert or relinquish any claim he might have.

Michael the mate, who had filed a petition for wages, was also examined on the part of the libellants. The only material parts in his deposition not otherwise stated, are the following: He entered on board the Catharine, on the 26th June, at Havana. He entered and signed the articles or shipping-list by the name of Ebenezer Tucker, of Salem, Massachusetts, and as an American citizen; he was, however, a native of Scotland. He so entered because he could not enter without an American protection. This was suggested to him by the shipping-master, who furnished him with a protection in the name of Ebenezer Tucker. The vessel sailed from Havana on the 28th of June; she had on board about twenty-eight or thirty persons; the majority were Spanish or Portuguese; Capt. Peterson and not witness kept the log-book; the Spaniards or Portuguese used to lend a hand in working the vessel; as far as he knew they were passengers; some of the crew were employed in making sennett; it is yarns plaited together, and is used in putting around ropes and rigging to prevent chafing; a good deal of it was made on board, but it was all used in putting round the rigging, to the best of his knowledge; he did not know what cargo they had on board, nor that there was any intention of going to any other place than the Island of Principe; he did not ship for the purpose or with the intention of engaging in the slave trade; when the Dolphin boarded the Catharine she was about five miles from Quitta; being short of water and provisions they had been there to get a supply, and were bound to Principe when they were captured; they were at Quitta only a few hours.

Foxcroft, who had filed a petition for wages, was examined as a witness, both for the claimants and libellants. His deposition contained no material facts, except the following:—He shipped on board the Catharine, at Havana, as a seaman, and signed the shipping articles by the name of Joseph Mackie; he had an American protection when he shipped; Capt. Peterson knew nothing of his shipping under a wrong name; he did not ship for the purpose or with the intention of being engaged in the slave trade, and there was not, to his knowledge, any such purpose or intention on the part of any on board; the reason of his shipping under a wrong name, was because he could not ship on board an American vessel without an American protection, and there was no other vessel in which he could ship; the protection was given him by the shipping-master, at Havana; he was not an American citizen, but a British subject; witness, while on board the Catharine, was engaged in making sennett, under the directions of the boatswain's yeoman, who told him it was to be used in tying slaves; they made a very great quantity; many were engaged in making it, and more was made than was necessary for the use of the vessel; there was a good deal on board unused at the time of the capture, as much as one hundred fathoms.

The counsel for the libellants admitted all the facts set forth and averred in the claim of Tyng.

The district court dismissed the libel, and ordered the vessel to be delivered up to the claimant. It also dismissed the seamen's petitions for wages, on the ground that the vessel was not under arrest thereupon, and there being no proceeds or avails in court upon which said petitions could attach. On pronouncing it, the district court delivered the following reasons for its decree:

This is a prosecution in rem, seeking the forfeiture of the vessel for being engaged in the slave trade. The bill articulates upon various acts of congress, charging against the vessel the circumstances which incur a forfeiture by the provisions of these acts. On the hearing, however, the contestation between the parties was limited to the fifth article alone. That allegation is, that the schooner being the property, wholly, or in part, of a citizen or citizens of the United States, or of persons residing within the United States to the libellant unknown, was, on or about the first day of July, 1839, employed and made use of by some person or persons residing within the United States to the libellant unknown, in the transportation and carrying of slaves from some foreign country or place to the said libellant unknown, to some other foreign country or place to the libellant unknown, contrary to the act of congress of May 10th, 1800. It is admitted that the ownership of the vessel is in citizens of the United States, and it is unnecessary, under the view the court takes of the case, to enter upon the question whether the claimant has shown a lien or privilege in respect to his advances to the owner, which would be protected in case of the condemnation of the vessel. On the 15th of June, 1839, the claimant, as agent of the owners, chartered the vessel to John S. Thrasher, for a voyage from Havana to the Isle of Principe, or other part or parts of Africa, as the agent of the charterer may direct. The vessel was laden and despatched by the charterer, and was captured on the 13th of August, in the prosecution of her voyage, by a British cruiser near the coast of Africa. The supreme court having decided, in the construction of this statute, that "the vessel in question was employed in the transportation of slaves within the meaning of the act, if she was sailing on her outward voyage to the African coast, in order to take slaves on board to be transported to another foreign country," I should have no difficulty, upon a careful review of the facts and circumstances, in deciding that the charge of the libel had been fully sustained against the vessel, if the charter party, and her outfit and the proceedings under it, were the controlling facts of the case.

Looking at the case in this point of view, I am not able to discover that it can be distinguished favorably to the claimant, from the case of The Butterfly [unreported], recently decided in this court. The pertinency and weight of a similar class of facts and circumstances were fully considered by the court in that case, and it may be added that some particulars exist here which would probably be regarded as rendering the inferences and presumptions then recognized and adopted, still more direct and conclusive. It seems to me, however, that the enterprise assumes a new character subsequent to the execution of the charter party, and so far as the charge in the libel now under consideration may be made to affect it. On the 25th of June the claimant contracted to sell the vessel to one Teran, for $20,000, and to deliver her at Bona, on the coast of Africa, on or before the first day of October thereafter, and received $7,000 of the consideration-money in advance. On the same day the charterer made in writing a modification of his charter party, and engaged to relinquish the vessel "after the cargo I have now on board is landed at the Isle of Principe in accordance with the bill of lading," to enable the claimant to deliver the vessel to Teran, at Bona, according to his contract. It is not to be concealed that this whole arrangement bears the semblance of being a common concern between Thrasher and Teran, in respect both to the charter and purchase. A scrutiny of the evidence cannot fail to make the impression that the two acts were preconcerted parts of the enterprise; that the vessel should wear her American character to the coast of Africa, with a view probably to avoid the application of the treaty between England and Spain, and the hazard of interception by British cruisers; and that when there, she should become Spanish, before venturing on her return voyage, lest the officers and crew might be declared pirates under the act of congress of May 15, 1820. If this be so, it would tend to confirm the verity of the representation that this was an actual contract of sale, and that the vessel at Bona was to become wholly Spanish property. This particular is of great importance in determining the application of the act of congress to the case. There is certainly nothing in that act inhibiting an American vessel from carrying any description of cargo to the coast of Africa. She may be legitimately let on freight or chartered for such a voyage. If everything she undertakes to do as a vessel of the United States, be to carry out and deliver a cargo, she would not, in fulfilling such an engagement, come within the prohibitory enactments of the statute. The statute reaches her only when the evidence shows that her outward voyage is only in part fulfilment of her employment as an American vessel, which is to be continued and consummated by transporting slaves into some other foreign country. The broadest latitude the supreme court gives to the term "employment," as evidence of such illegal voyage, falls short of being satisfied by the mere transportation of an outward cargo. The decision requires that it shall further appear that the vessel was on such outward voyage for the purpose of taking on board a cargo of slaves, as part and parcel of the adventure. In a prosecution of persons serving on board such vessel, it may be of no importance whether the vessel was to retain or change her national character after reaching the outward port, provided the whole enterprise was to be regarded as one voyage.

But it is apprehended a prosecution under the first section against the vessel, cannot be sustained without showing that the whole adventure contemplated by her, is to be performed by her in her American character. The terms of the section are these: "That it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other persons residing within the United States, directly or indirectly to hold or have any right or property in any vessel employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying slaves from one foreign country or place to another, and any right or property belonging as aforesaid shall be forfeited," &c. The penalty of this act is plainly levelled against American property employed as inhibited, and the confiscation is limited to the American interest held in a vessel at the time she is employed in the slave trade. There is nothing in this statute to reach the case of an American vessel built and fitted out for the slave trade, but actually sold to a foreigner and employed by him. What, then, is the application of the act to the facts of this case? Upon the proofs, I am satisfied the vessel was chartered, fitted out and laden at Havana, with intent to be employed in the slave trade, prohibited by this act, and it is settled by the decision of the supreme court upon the import of the term "employed," as used in this act by congress, that "to be employed in anything, means not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it," and, accordingly, the chartering and fitting out the vessel at Havana, with design to have her perform the voyage then arranged, brought the transaction within the prohibition of the act; and had the seizure been made under that state of facts, the condemnation of the vessel must have been pronounced by the court. The proof, however, is equally strong that in this incipient state of the enterprise, the voyage was changed, and the vessel was then put under "contract and orders," to carry out a cargo and freight, and deliver it at Principe, to the charterer, in fulfilment of the contract of sale. There is nothing beyond vague suspicions to warrant this ulterior change of the destination of the vessel with the voyage first contemplated. St. Thomas and Principe are near the equator; if the Bona to which the vessel was directed, be the port in Algiers, the great distance of the two points apart would strongly denote an entire disconnection of the undertaking. No evidence was offered that there was any place of that name in the vicinity of Principe, nor other fact evincing the object of the voyage to be continuous and identical, and I am, accordingly, bound to hold, upon the testimony, that the vessel sailed from Havana to deliver a cargo at Principe, and was then wholly discharged and separated from that employment, and was after that to be taken to Bona, and delivered to the purchaser. This adventure, prosecuted with such intent, cannot be brought within the interdiction of the statute, and I shall, therefore, decree that the libel be dismissed, and the vessel delivered up to the claimants.

I am aware that this is a point of importance and difficulty. My duty, however, is to express the result of my own reflections upon the subject, and this I do with the greater promptitude, because, from the magnitude of the question and interests involved in the decision, the judgment now pronounced will be submitted to the review of the appellate courts.

There being no condemnation of the vessel, the petition of the seamen for wages out of the proceeds must be also determined.

Ordered, that the libel be discharged, and the schooner Catharine, her tackle, &c., be delivered up by the marshal to the claimant.

From this decree the libellants appealed. On the trial in this court, in addition to the proofs taken in the court below, only one witness was examined. He stated, on behalf of the libellants, that in the month of September, 1840, on taking out the cargo of the Catharine which had not before been removed, there were found near the bottom of the hold two bags containing iron manacles or handcuffs. The witness stated that the manacles in one of the bags were counted, and were found to be one hundred and seventy-five in number; and that the other bag was about the same size, and appeared to contain about the same number, but its contents were not counted.[3]

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This case comes up on an appeal from the district court for the Southern district of New York. The proceeding in the court below was for an alleged forfeiture of the vessel, for a violation of the act of congress of the 10th May, 1800 (3 Story's Laws, 382 [2 Stat. 70]), which declares that it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person residing within the United States, directly or indirectly to hold or have any right or property in any vessel employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another; and any right or property belonging as aforesaid, shall be forfeited. The supreme court, in the case of U. S. v. Morris,[4] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 473, have given a construction to the term "employed" as here used in this act. The question, say the court, in this case is, whether a vessel on her outward voyage to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of taking on board a cargo of slaves, is "employed or made use of" in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another, before any slaves are received on board? To be "employed," say the court, in anything means not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it, to be under contract or orders to do it. And this is not only the ordinary meaning of the word, but has frequently been used in that sense in other acts of congress. That the vessel in question was employed in the transportation of slaves within the meaning of the act of congress, if she was sailing on her outward voyage to the African coast, in order to take them on board, to be transported to another foreign country. That the Catharine was an American vessel, sailing under the American flag, and documented as an American vessel, is not denied; and the claimant, Charles Tyng, who interposes his claim as owner, was an American citizen. This would seem to bring the case directly within the prohibition in the act, and subject the vessel to forfeiture; and, indeed, the district judge in the court below, declares that he should have no difficulty, upon a careful review of the facts and circumstances, in deciding that the charge of the libel had been fully sustained against the vessel, if the charter party and her outfit, and the proceedings under it, were the controlling facts in the case. That the pertinency and weight of a similar class of facts and circumstances were fully considered by the court in the case of The Butterfly [unreported], recently decided in this court, where the vessel was condemned; and the learned judge adds, that some particulars exist here which would probably be regarded as rendering the inferences and presumptions then adopted and recognized, still more direct and conclusive; but that it seemed to him that the enterprise assumed a new character subsequent to the execution of the charter party. That there is nothing in the act inhibiting an American vessel from carrying any description of cargo to the coast of Africa; she may be legitimately let on freight or chartered for such a voyage. If everything she undertakes to do as a vessel of the United States, be to carry out and deliver a cargo, she would not, in fulfilling such an engagement, come within the prohibitory enactments of the statute. The statute reaches her only when the evidence shows her outward voyage is only in part fulfilment of her employment as an American vessel, which is to be continued and consummated by transporting slaves into some other foreign country.

I am not disposed to give a construction to this act which will interdict an American vessel from carrying out a cargo, and delivering it upon the coast of Africa, if unconnected with the subsequent employment of the vessel in the transportation of slaves; but I am not prepared to admit that such subsequent employment must be in the character of an American vessel, in order to bring her within the prohibition in the act. If the circumstances are such as to warrant the conclusion that the outward voyage, under the American character and ownership, was planned and undertaken with a view, and under an arrangement, that the ownership and character were to be changed on the arrival of the vessel on the coast of Africa, and there to be employed in the transportation of slaves, such vessel would clearly come within the mischief, and, I think, within the true intent and meaning of the act of congress.

There can be no doubt but that a bona fide sale of a vessel, to be delivered at any given place upon the coast of Africa, unconnected with the ulterior employment of the vessel, and not in aid of an employment in the transportation of slaves, would not subject her to forfeiture within this act of congress; but where the voyage is commenced and prosecuted under strong and suspicious circumstances, accompanied with preparations, and the vessel laden with a cargo such as are usually employed in voyages of this description, it imposes no unreasonable hardship upon a party to call upon him to explain and remove such suspicious circumstances. If the adventure is innocent, it may easily be shown to be so. The language of the supreme court, in the case of The Josefa Segunda, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 356, is very strong on this point.[5] In the execution of these laws (the suppression of the slave trade), no vig-

[4] See note 3 at end of case.

[5] When any act is done, which of itself, and unexplained, is a violation of law, and a party to extricate himself, or his property, from the consequences of it, resorts to the plea of necessity or distress, the burden of proof is not only thrown upon him: but when the temptation to in-ilance can be excessive, and restitution ought never to be made but in cases which are purged of every intentional violation by proofs the most clear, the most explicit and unequivocal. But let us look a little at the circumstances of this case, and see whether they are not such as call upon the party to give a more satisfactory explanation. The claimant, Charles Tyng, alleges that he is a citizen of the United States, residing in Havana since the year 1837, and engaged in the business of a ship-broker and commission agent; that some time in the latter part of May, 1839, the schooner Catharine, an American vessel, arrived at the Havana, under the command of William J. Wedge, a citizen of the United States, who applied to him, and represented that he was authorized by R. W. Allen and John Henderson, citizens of Baltimore, and owners of the Catharine, to effect a sale thereof, and employed him for that purpose. That he succeeded in effecting a sale to the house of Don Pedro Martinez & Co.; which sale, however, owing to some misunderstanding, fell through. He, however, feeling confident that the bargain would be consummated, had advanced the purchase-money to Wedge, and he had returned to Philadelphia, after having made him his substitute under the letter of attorney from Allen & Henderson. He afterwards effected a sale of the vessel to Don Teran, of Havana, but had previously chartered her to one Thrasher, who agreed so to modify his charter party as to meet the terms of sale to Don Teran. Under these circumstances, the Catharine sailed from the Havana, on her voyage to the coast of Africa, and was captured by the Dolphin, a British armed vessel, and brought into the port of New York.

These are the general outlines of the case; but a more particular examination of the various circumstances are necessary to a proper understanding of the transaction.

It is proper, in the first place, to notice, that although the claimant, Charles Tyng, was originally an authorized agent to sell the vessel for Allen & Henderson; yet they, having received the purchase-money from him, through Capt. Wedge, refused to refund it, and threw the vessel upon his hands. He, therefore, interposes his claim as owner, and alleges himself to be such. His sale to Teran bears date the 25th of June, 1839, and was for the consideration of $10,000, provided the vessel was delivered to him at the port of Bona, on the coast of Africa, on or before the 1st day of October. Part of the purchase-money was to be paid in advance, and the balance on receiving satisfactory evidence of the delivery of the vessel at Bona; the said Charles Tyng being left at liberty to load or charter the vessel until her delivery at Bona; the money advanced to be refunded to Teran, in case of failure to deliver the vessel at Bona on or before the 1st of October. The vessel having been captured before her arrival on the coast of Africa, the sale and transfer of the property in the vessel was never consummated, but remained in the original owner; and whether that ownership was in the house in Baltimore or in Tyng, is immaterial; though Tyng asserts himself to be the owner, and must be dealt with as such. He was the owner on the outward voyage, and at the time of the capture. If he was such owner, and the vessel was employed in the transportation of slaves, according to the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Morris [14 Pet. (39 U. S.) 464], how does the act of congress affect his interest in the vessel? It declares that it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, directly or indirectly to hold or have any right or property in any vessel employed or made use of in the carrying or transportation of slaves from one foreign country or place to another; and any right or property belonging as aforesaid, shall be forfeited. The forfeiture attached upon the violation of the prohibition—and that violation occurred the instant the vessel was employed in the transportation of slaves, or, in other words, at the commencement of the voyage, if such voyage was prosecuted with the view, and for the purpose of transporting slaves from one foreign country or place to another foreign country or place. That such was the purpose for which this vessel was purchased by Teran, and was proceeding to the coast of Africa, admits of but little doubt. It was intimated on the argument, that there was no such place as Bona on the west coast of Africa, where the slave trade is carried on; and if the vessel was to be delivered at Bona, on the coast of Algiers, it afforded no ground of suspicion. But this suggestion was so utterly improbable, that it was not pressed there, and is entitled to no consideration. That there is such a place as Bona, (as known and understood by the parties,) on the west coast of Africa, cannot admit of a doubt.

The charter party entered into between the claimant and Thrasher, bears date on the 15th day of June, 1839, for a voyage from Havana to Isle of Principe or other port or ports on the coast of Africa, as the agent of the charterer may direct; the charterer to provide a crew, and furnish them with all necessary provisions, &c., for their maintenance during the voyage, and to pay all port charges; the charterer to pay $300 per month for eight months, and if the vessel should be at sea at the expiration of said term, the charter party to continue until her arrival, and the cargo shall be discharged. The charterer gave to Capt. Peterson, the master of the vessel, instructions to proceed to the Isle of Principe, and on his arrival there, to consign the vessel and cargo to Joseph Perey-ra, and deliver to him the certified invoice enclosed in the letter of instructions, and giving him directions implicitly to obey the instructions of Pereyra. And in his letter of instructions he says: "A number of persons having applied to me for passage out in the schooner, I have consented; but you will take care that their passports are in order, and that there are no circumstances attending them which will be likely to bring you into the least difficulty." Pereyra, the consignee of the charter, was at Havana, and went out as supercargo. It appears, from the deposition of Robert H. Dundas, mate of the Dolphin, that when the Catharine was captured, the witness demanded of the captain his papers, and a number were delivered up, which are unimportant to be noticed here. Soon after, Lieut. Holland came on board the Catharine, and Capt. Peterson was searched, and there was found concealed on his person a certain paper, which among the exhibits is marked No. 33, and which will be hereafter noticed. From this deposition of the mate, it appears that the crew of the Catharine consisted of eight persons, with American protections, including the captain, and about twenty or twenty-five foreigners, mostly Spanish and Portuguese; that six or eight men would be quite sufficient to navigate the Catharine in a lawful trade; that there was found on board a large boiler or cooking apparatus, sufficiently large to have cooked for three hundred people; a quantity of lumber, which was prepared and numbered for laying a slave-deck, and could easily have been put up as a slave-deck in a few hours after the cargo was discharged; a number of leagers were found on board, some made up and some in shooks—about nine were made up, and materials for about six more; each would contain five or six hundred gallons. There were found on board about five hundred and seventy wooden spoons, similar to those used in slave vessels; there were thirty-eight large tin dishes, and a number of small ones; that the equipments above mentioned are such as are usually found on board of slave vessels, and he has never seen them elsewhere. They found no irons, but they are generally concealed in the lower part of the vessel; and from the evidence taken in this court upon the appeal, it appears that two bags of iron manacles were found concealed under the cargo; one was counted and contained one hundred and seventy-five, and the other appeared to be about the same size. The mate further testified, that the Catharine was captured three or four miles from Cape St. Pauls; that the cargo found on board was such an one as an honest trader would have on board, trading with the coast of Africa, and it was also such an one as a slaver would have on board; that the lumber and large boiler would excite suspicion. The document before referred to, which was found on the person of the master, although without date or signature, is deserving of notice; it is as follows. "The main thing for you to do on this voyage is to be ready, in case you are boarded by a man-of-war, to show your log-book, which must be regularly kept from the time you leave here, your ship's papers, your charter party for the voyage, your ship's roll and instructions; and you are, in that event, to take all command with your American sailors, according to your roll, all the others are to be passengers. You are to be very careful that in case of any cross-questions you do not commit yourself, but always stick to the same story. When the vessel is discharged, you must at once cut your register in two pieces. One piece you must enclose direct, and send to Messrs. Thomas Wilson & Co., Baltimore; the other piece you will bring with you, and give to me when you return here. You must be very particular about that, and do not let any time pass after the cargo is out before you cut the register in two pieces, and be careful to keep them separate. Throw one piece overboard if you are obliged to by being boarded by a man-of-war."

It is not very certain from whom this document emanated. It must have been from some person having an interest in the vessel or in the voyage, and most probably either Thrasher, the charterer, or Teran, the conditional purchaser. The language as to the disposition of the register would seem more appropriately to come from Teran, who was to become the owner. But from whomsoever it came, being found on board the vessel, and forcibly taken from the master, it was a document connected with the voyage, and bears evident marks of suspicion that the adventure was not in reality what it purported ostensibly to be, a fair and legal voyage to the coast of Africa. If it had been, no disguise would have been necessary. The direction, in case of being boarded by a man-of-war, to take all command with the American sailors, and all the others to be passengers, shows that they were not in reality passengers, but connected with the vessel, and were to assume the character of passengers as a disguise. It is, in the first place, highly improbable that any persons should be going out to that part of the coast of Africa as mere passengers. But considering them connected with the ulterior employment of the vessel in the transportation of slaves, their being on board is easily accounted for. When a cargo of slaves was taken on board, it would require the vessel to be manned by a greater number than would be required for the mere navigation of the vessel. From a careful examination of the proofs in this case, I am satisfied that this vessel was chartered, fitted out and laden at Havana, with intent to be employed in the slave trade, prohibited by the act of congress of the 10th of May, 1800. And the circumstances connected with and attending the outward voyage, in my judgment, lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the arrangement made with respect to the conditional sale of the vessel, and the delivery of the possession at Bona, was a part of the contrivance to avoid the interruption of the adventure by capture. If this was a real and bona fide sale of the Catharine, it is a little remarkable that no person is designated to whom possession was to be given at Bona. Teran, the purchaser, was in Havana, and would not himself take the possession. It appears by the letter of instructions to Capt. Peterson, from Thrasher, the charterer, that the vessel and cargo were to be consigned to Pereyra, who went out as supercargo. But there is nothing showing any connection between him and Teran. If the outward voyage of this vessel to the coast of Africa was unconnected with the subsequent employment of the vessel in the transportation of slaves, it certainly requires explanation why she was so peculiarly fitted, in every respect, for the transportation of slaves; and, unexplained, they lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the whole was one connected scheme to send out this vessel to be employed in the transportation of slaves. If this was a concerted plan between Thrasher and Teran in the purchase and charter of the vessel, the more easily to elude capture and condemnation, it is difficult to conceive how Tyng, the claimant, could have been ignorant of the object and purpose for which this arrangement was made, and he must, therefore, be considered a party to it, and the whole must be taken to be one continuous enterprise; and if so, the mere change of property in the vessel after her arrival on the coast of Africa, could not legalize the transaction. The penalty was incurred, and the forfeiture attached from the very inception of the voyage, if it was commenced for the purpose of taking on board and transporting slaves. It is true that the penalty of this act of congress is levelled against American property employed in the manner prohibited. But I cannot think that the confiscation is limited to the American interest at the time she is engaged in the actual transportation of slaves. If such is the construction to be given to this act, it may be evaded with the utmost facility in every case. I cannot yield to the construction that the whole adventure must be performed whilst the vessel retains her American character and ownership. Where the change of ownership is a part of the scheme, the forfeiture attaches upon all interests concerned. The vessel becomes tainted with the offence wherever she may go, or into whatever hands she may fall. The ownership of this vessel, on her outward voyage, was certainly American The transfer of the title never did take place, the vessel never having arrived at Bona. The American interest was, therefore, forfeited, within the express terms of the law; and if the arrangement made with Teran, the purchaser, was for the purpose of evading the penalty of our law, he cannot claim any protection of his interest in the vessel in the courts of this country.

I am, accordingly, of opinion that the vessel became forfeited under the act of congress, and that the decree of the district court must be reversed, and a decree of condemnation entered.
