The attorney for the United States, having offered evidence to prove that the defendant was asked if he was aware of the nature of the pamphlets put into his hands in New York, and said he supposed they were of the same nature as those he had been a subscriber for, and that he approved the sentiments they contained, offered in evidence to the jury the publications found on the defendant relating to the same subject with the libels charged in the indictment; and contended that they were competent to be given to the jury with evidence that some of them were indorsed in the defendant's handwriting with the words, "read and circulate," to prove, not only the evil intent of the defendant in publishing the libellous paper charged in the first count, but as evidence of the publication, by the defendant, of the paper charged as a libel in the second count. He contended also that the pamphlets themselves purporting, upon their title page, to be printed and published in New York, are evidence of their own publication, and that it is only necessary to prove a copy to have been found in the defendant's possession, with the words, "read and circulate" indorsed thereon by the defendant to charge him with the publication of them here.

THE COURT was of opinion that the printing and publishing of these pamphlets, in New York, is not evidence of their publication here, so as to fix upon the defendant here such a knowledge of their publication as to make his possession alone, even with the words "read and circulate" written upon them, evidence of the publication of them, by him, here. That, in order to show the evil intent with which the defendant published the paper charged in the first count, it is not competent for the United States to give, in evidence to the jury, other unpublished papers or pamphlets, found in the defendant's possession, unless accompanied by evidence of some acknowledgment or admission by the defendant that he knew and approved their contents. That the evidence did not appear to the court to justify the inference that the defendant knew and approved the contents of those pamphlets, unless it can be connected with evidence that they were of the same nature with those which he had been a subscriber for.

The attorney for the United States then gave evidence tending to show that the defendant had been a subscriber for the "Emancipator;" and the court permitted the attorney of the United States to give in evidence several numbers of that paper, as containing the sentiments alluded to by the defendant, as those which he approved, to show the evil intent with which he published the libel charged in the first count; but confined him to the reading of the sentiments contained in the "Emancipator" itself; and refused to permit him to read to the jury the publications advertised for sale by the secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society, in the Emancipator, although evidence had been given tending to prove that the defendant was a member of that society.

The attorney of the United States then being about to offer evidence in support of the third count; the counsel of the defendant objected that the count was so vague, uncertain, and imperfect, that the court ought not to permit evidence to be given in support of it; and the counsel on both sides agreed that the court should now consider the question as if upon a motion to quash that count.

Mr. Key, for the United States, and in support of the indictment, cited the precedents in 2 Chit. 45, 47, and 48.

The defendant's counsel cited 3 Chit. 901, 903, 904; 1 Russ. 210.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) permitted evidence to be given upon the third count, without prejudice to a motion in arrest of judgment upon that count, if the verdict should be against the defendant.

On the part of the defendant, it was then urged that the papers, found upon the defendant, had been illegally seized under pretence of an unlawful warrant commanding the officer, to whom it was directed, to arrest the defendant, and to search for and seize any incendiary pamphlets or papers which should be found in the defendant's possession, and bring them, with the defendant, before the justices who issued the warrant, and that therefore the pamphlets and papers so found are not admissible in evidence to the jury. Upon that point the defendant's counsel cited Entick v. Carrington, 2 Wils. 275, 282, 291; State Trials, 1052, 1063; Lord Chief Justice Lee's Opinion; and St. 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, § 63.

Mr. Key, for the United States, contended, that if the warrant was illegal, (which he did not admit,) yet the fact that the libels were found upon him, may be given in evidence, in the same manner as you may, upon an indictment for counterfeiting coin, prove that the defendant was found in possession of the instruments and implements of coining; or upon an indictment for burglary, give evidence of false keys, &c.

THE COURT was of opinion that the seizure of the papers, even if illegal, cannot prevent the United States from giving, in evidence, the fact that the defendant had in his possession some of the libels charged in the indictment, and of the publication of which, in this district, evidence shall have been given.

The attorney for the United States having offered evidence tending to show that the libel charged in the second count, and one of those charged in the third count, had been published in this county, offered to prove that printed copies of the same were found in the possession of the defendant, at the time of his arrest, with the words "read and circulate," written by the defendant, upon some of them.

The counsel for the defendant, contended, that, if, in any case, the possession of a copy of a libel is evidence of a publication by the possessor, it must be a written copy of a known published libel. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73, § 13; 1 Vent. 31; Rex v. Fitton, 2 Keb. 502; Rex v. Beare, 2 Salk. 418, Carth. 409, and 1 Ld. Raym. 414; Want's Case, Moore, 627; 1 Russ. 235; Barrow v. Lewellin, Hob. 62; 2 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 209; Burdett's Case, 4 Barn. & Ald. 135; Starkie, 419; 12 Vin. Abr. 239.

The attorney of the United States, in reply, cited Starkie, Ev. pt. 4, pp. 849, 871, 875; 3 Chit. 875c; 1 Russ. 235; 12 Vin. Abr. tit. "Evidence," T, b, 61.

THE COURT permitted the United States to give evidence to the jury, that the defendant was found in possession of printed copies of the libel charged in the second count, and of one of those charged in the third count; of the publication of which, in this district, some evidence had been given.

The attorney for the United States then offered, in evidence, the pamphlets containing the pictures, which were charged as libellous, in the third count.

THE COURT permitted the pictures to be given in evidence, and shown to the jury, but refused to suffer the pamphlets, attached to the pictures, to be read to the jury by the attorney of the United States, as no part but the pictures was charged as libels in that count.

The attorney of the United States then offered to read to the jury the pamphlets attached to the pictures, to show the evil intent with which the pictures were published.

THE COURT said, that if the matter now proposed to be read, is not charged in the indictment, and would be, of itself, a substantive libel, and therefore indictable, it cannot be given in evidence.

The attorney for the United States offered to examine, as a witness, one John Colclazer, a colored man, born of a white woman.

The counsel for the defendant objected.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contrà) overruled the objection, and the witness was sworn and examined.

The evidence being closed, Mr. Carlisle, who opened the argument to the jury, on behalf of the prosecution, was about to read some parts of the pamphlets containing the libellous matter charged in the indictment, which parts had not been read in the opening of the evidence.

The defendant's counsel objected to anything being read in argument, to the jury, which had not been read when the pamphlets were offered in evidence.

But THE COURT overruled the objection, and said that the United States had not only the right, but were bound, to give in evidence the whole of the publication which contains the libellous matter charged; and either party has a right to read any part of it, pertinent to the issue.

Verdict, not guilty.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—INDICTMENT FOR FRAUDULENT CONCEALMENT OF PROPERTY.

1. Under section 44 of the bankrupt act of March, 1867 [14 Stat. 539], it was objected to an indictment that it did not sufficiently allege that the accused had attempted to account for certain of his property by fictitious losses, and that he had secreted and concealed certain portions of his property, after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. The indictment alleged that the defendant was lawfully adjudged a bankrupt; that after commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy he was required by the district court to submit to examination on oath as to the disposal and condition of his property; that such examination was held; that the bankrupt was sworn to make true answers; and that he attempted to account for a certain item of property, with intent to defraud his creditors, by a fictitious loss. Held, that the objection as to the sufficiency of the allegation could not be sustained.

2. Section 38 of the act provides that the filing of a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy, either by the debtor or by a creditor, upon which an order may be issued by the court or by the register, shall be deemed the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy.

3. An averment in the indictment that the defendant was lawfully adjudged a bankrupt was sufficient to admit the record.

4. Such an averment is only a preliminary allegation to let in the record of the examination, which is itself a proceeding in bankruptcy.

5. The objection that the averment of a conclusion is insufficient is not applicable to the one in this case, which was only essential to lay the foundation for the admission of the record to which it refers.

6. If this were not so, then it would be necessary to set out the whole record in the indictment.

7. Where in an indictment it was alleged in substance that the property falsely accounted for belonged to the bankrupt and was assignable under the bankrupt act, held, that such averment was equivalent to charging that the property was that of the defendant.

Motion in arrest of judgment. Indictment under section 44 of the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, charging the defendant [John Crane] with attempting to account for a certain part of his property by fictitious losses, and for secreting certain of his property after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy.

The following causes were assigned: First. It is not alleged, nor does it appear in either count of said indictment, that he has committed an offence of which this court has jurisdiction. Second. It is not alleged, and it does not appear, that the omissions charged in the first count of the indictment, or that the attempt to account for fifteen thousand six hundred and eighty-three dollars by a fictitious loss thereof charged in the second count, or that the concealment charged in the third and last count, was after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. Third. It is not alleged, and it does not appear, that the omission or either of the acts with which he is charged in said indictment was after the commencement of legal proceedings in bankruptcy. Fourth. If the second counts be, in other respects, sufficient, it is not alleged that the sum of fifteen thousand six hundred and eighty-three dollars was the property of him, the said Crane. Fifth. The said indictment and each and all the counts thereof are otherwise defective and insufficient to support or warrant a judgment against him.

G. S. Hillard, U. S. Atty.

H. W. Paine and H. W. Muzzey, for defendant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The indictment is founded upon the forty-fourth section of the act of congress of the second of March, 1867, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States" (14 Stat. 539).

By that section it is provided, among other things, "that if any debtor or bankrupt shall, after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, secrete or conceal any property belonging to his estate * * * with intent to prevent it from coming into the possession of the assignee in bankruptcy, * * * or shall, with intent to defraud, wilfully and fraudulently conceal from his assignee or omit from his schedule any property or effects whatsoever, * * * or shall attempt to account for any of his property by fictitious losses or expenses, * * * he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," etc. 14 Stat. 539.

The charge in the first count of the indictment is that the defendant at Boston on the 19th of February, 1868, wilfully and fraudulently, and with intent to defraud his creditors, did omit from the schedule annexed to his petition in bankruptcy, purporting to contain an inventory of all his estate, real and personal, a large part of his personal property, assignable under said act, to wit, thirty thousand dollars in money, together with a large amount of goods and chattels.

The second count is drawn upon that clause of the same section which makes it an offence to attempt to account for any of his property by fictitious losses or expenses, as is more fully set forth in the indictment.

The third count is drawn on that clause of the section which provides for the punishment of any such debtor or bankrupt, who, after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, secretes or conceals any property belonging to his estate, with intent to prevent it from coming into the possession of the assignee in bankruptcy.

Motions in arrest of judgment in criminal cases are addressed to the entire indictment, so that in cases where the indictment contains more than one count, if any one of the counts is good, the motion must be denied.

Strong doubts are entertained whether the first count can be supported; but it is unnecessary to decide the point, as the court is of the opinion that the allegations of the second and third counts are sufficient.

Special consideration need not be bestowed upon the first cause assigned in the motion, as the supposed objections therein specified are more definitely set forth in the second and third causes, and those two causes may be considered together.

The precise import of the objection is that the counts, or either of them, do not show definite and sufficient allegations; that the several supposed criminal acts therein imputed to the defendant were done and committed by him after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

The argument is, that the allegation that the proceedings in bankruptcy were previously commenced is essential in the indictment, because the acts imputed to the defendant were not criminal unless they were done and committed after those proceedings were commenced; and it is doubtless true that the proposition is well founded. Suppose that to be so, still the inquiry remains whether the allegations as made are sufficient.

The substance of the allegations of the second count upon that subject is, that the defendant, on his own petition, filed in said district court on the 19th of February, 1868, was lawfully adjudged a bankrupt, and after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy in the said case, he was required by the said district court to attend and submit to an examination on oath upon all matters relating to the disposal and condition of his property, and that he did submit to such examination in pursuance of such requirements, and was then and there duly sworn to make true answers to such questions as should be propounded to him in reference to the disposal of his property and estate. Such is the substance of the allegation in respect to the commencement of the proceedings; but the grand jury go on to allege that he was then and there inquired of as to the disposal of fifteen thousand six hundred and eighty-three dollars previously received by him on a certain day, therein specified; and the averment is, that he then and there, with intent to defraud his creditors, falsely and fraudulently attempted to account for that sum by a fictitious loss of the same, as therein more fully set forth and alleged. The direct provision of the thirty-eighth section is, that the filing of a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy, either by a debtor in his own behalf or by any creditor against a debtor, upon which an order may be issued by the court or by a register in the manner provided in section four, shall be deemed and taken to be the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy under that act. 14 Stat. 35. Doubt cannot be entertained that the averment that the defendant was lawfully adjudged a bankrupt, as therein alleged, was sufficient to admit the record, or an exemplified copy thereof, in evidence; and inasmuch as the act alleged could not be proved in any other way, the court is of the opinion that the allegation in the form pleaded is sufficient. Taken in any point of view, it is only a preliminary allegation, to let in the record of the examination of the bankrupt, which is itself a proceeding in bankruptcy.

An averment of a conclusion is said to be insufficient; but the rule has many exceptions, and cannot properly be applied to an allegation like the one under consideration, which is only essential as laying the foundation for the admission of the record to which it refers. Unless that be the rule in this case, then it was necessary to set out the whole record, which cannot be admitted, as it would require unnecessary complexity in indictments under this act of congress without any possible advantage to the accused. Objection was not made to the admissibility of the record, under this allegation, and certainly, where it was received in evidence, every right of the accused was as effectually protected as if the record had been copied into the indictment.

Suffice it to say, without entering more into detail, that the court is of the opinion that neither the second nor the third cause assigned in support of the motion is well founded, whether applied to the second or third count.

The ground assumed in the fourth cause assigned is, that it is not alleged in the second count that the money therein described was the property of the defendant. But it is therein alleged, in substance and effect, that the money belonged to him, and was assignable under the bankrupt act.

Motion overruled. Judgment on the verdict.

UNITED STATES v. CRANE.

[4 McLean, 317.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Nov. Term, 1847.

CRIMINAL LAW—ACCESSORY—EFFECT OF ACQUITTAL OF PRINCIPAL.

1. When an individual is charged as accessory, he may, under the statute, be tried and convicted, if the principal can not be found.

2. But when the principal has been tried and acquitted, on the charges, on which another is indicted as accessory, the person charged as accessory will be discharged on motion.

[This was an indictment against Joel W. Crane, charging him with knowingly and willfully receiving and secreting stolen mail.]

Bartley, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Ewing & Swayne, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant is indicted, as accessory under the 45th section of the post office act [of 1825 (4 Stat. 114)], which declares, "that if any person shall buy, receive or conceal, or aid in buying, receiving or concealing any article mentioned in the 21st section of the act, knowing the same to have been stolen from the mail of the United States, shall be punished on conviction, etc. And such person so offending, may be tried and convicted without the principal offender being first tried, provided he has fled from justice and can not be put upon his trial." The principal offender was convicted on the first, second and fifth counts of the indictments found against him. "The first count charged him with stealing the mail; the second count contained the same charge, somewhat varied, and the fifth count charged the defendant with stealing the mail containing sundry letters and packets." The indictment against Pettis, the principal, contained six counts, and the jury found him guilty on three counts and not guilty on the other three. In the third count he was charged with stealing the mail, containing fifty letters. The fourth charged him with stealing the mail containing sundry articles of great value, to wit, of the value of five hundred dollars, the particular description of which, being to the jurors unknown. Also containing sundry bank notes of great value, being to the jurors unknown. Also containing sundry bank notes of great value, to wit, of the value of five hundred dollars, the particular description of which being to the jurors unknown. Also containing bank notes specified of the value of thirty-five dollars. The sixth count charged him with ripping, cutting, etc., the mail bag. There are three counts against the defendant as accessory. The first count is abandoned. The second count charges that Pettis stole the mail of the United States of great value, to wit, of the value of five thousand dollars; and that the defendant Crane then and there well knowing, that the said Pettis had stolen the said mail as aforesaid, did knowingly and feloniously afford and furnish comfort and assistance to the said Pettis, by keeping and secreting the said last mentioned money for the said Pettis, etc. The third count charges Pettis with stealing the mail, of the value of five hundred dollars and containing letters inclosing a large quantity of bank notes, to wit, five thousand dollars which were received and secreted by the defendant Crane.

A motion is made to discharge the defendant on the ground that Pettis, his principal, was found not guilty on the counts against him for stealing the mail containing bank notes, etc.

1. There seems to be no objection against hearing this motion, as it presents only a question of law arising from facts of record.

2. The offense charged against Crane is under the statute; but it is governed by the same principles as the offense at common law, except that if the principal can not be found, the accessory may be convicted.

3. If the principal be acquitted, the accessory must be discharged.

4. The principal must be convicted, if found, of the thing which the accessory is charged with concealing.

5. If the accessory be charged with stealing bank notes, the principal must be convicted of stealing, from the mail, bank notes.

6. It is not sufficient to show, that he did in fact steal them, but, if found, he must be convicted of stealing them, before the accessory can be punished. 1 Chit. Cr. Law 218; Hale, P. C. 623.

The defendant is discharged.

UNITED STATES v. CRANSTON et al.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 289.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1828.

CONSTABLE—SURETIES ON BOND—MONEY COLLECTED.

The sureties in a constable's bond are not liable for money collected by the constable without legal process.

Debt upon a constable's bond. The breach assigned was that the creditor, A. B., for whose use this suit was brought, had put a note into the hands of Cranston, the constable, to collect; that he collected the money, and refused to pay it over to the creditor. It appeared that he collected it without legal process.

Mr. Mason, for defendants, denied that they were liable upon their bond for the money thus collected.

Mr. Wise, for plaintiff, and Mr. Mason, for defendants, submitted the question to the court without argument.

And THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), said that the defendant (the constable) was not liable upon his official bond for this money, although he gave a receipt, as constable, for the note. His official duty only commences when he has legal process; and he is only liable officially, for money officially collected, that is, upon legal process.

UNITED STATES v. CRAWFORD et al.

[1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 388.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1843.

CRIMINAL PRACTICE—ARREST OF JUDGMENT—SEAMEN—INDICTMENT FOR MUTINY AND REVOLT.

1. Where the crew of an American vessel sailing on a whaling voyage were convicted for endeavoring to make a mutiny and revolt, and no objection on the trial of the prisoners was made, that no proof had been adduced in support of the averment in the indictment that the Southern district of New York was the district court in which the prisoners were first brought and apprehended, held, that although such objection might have availed on the trial, it was too late on a motion in arrest of judgment.

2. The constitution of the United States gave congress the power to punish for misdemeanors.

3. The character of the vessel must be proved to be an American vessel, and the title of the ship may be proved by parol.

4. The names of the grand jurors did not appear in the indictment itself.

5. Persons who were not citizens of the United States, and had enlisted on board of an American vessel, could not be punished for disobedience of orders in the absence of a treaty with the government to which they belonged, unless such act of disobedience amount to a violation of the law of nations.

This was an indictment against [Lewis Crawford and others] certain seamen composing a part of the crew of the American ship called "The Clifford Wayne," which sailed on a whaling voyage to the South Atlantic Ocean from the port of New Bedford in Massachusetts. The offence charged, was for endeavoring to make a mutiny and revolt on board of said ship on the high seas on said voyage. The vessel, after being at sea for nine months, returned to the port of New Bedford with a part of the disobedient crew, and the remainder, being the prisoners, had been taken out at Buenos Ayres, and sent home in a ship of war to the United States. The prisoners, on being arraigned, severally pleaded not guilty. Upon the trial before the learned district judge, on the evidence of the master and officers of the vessel, they were convicted.

Mr. Nash, for prisoners, now moved to arrest the judgment on the following grounds:

1. That no proof on the trial had been adduced in support of the averment in the indictment, that the Southern district of New York in the Second circuit was the district and circuit in which the defendants were first brought and apprehended; that such fact was necessary to give the court jurisdiction. The learned counsel referred to the act of congress of March 3, 1825, § 14,—Gard. Dig. p. 754 [4 Stat. 118]; and he contended that the averment of that fact ought to have been proved on the trial; U. S. v. Tillotson [Case No. 16,524]; 1 Kent, Comm. 344; Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 382; Starkie, Cr. Pl. 278, 279; 3 Starkie, Ev. 1552, note; Doug. 665; 5 E. C. 2. That the constitution of the United States (article 9, § 8) gave congress the power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations, and the old confederation gave congress the power of appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas; but there was nothing in either of those instruments to punish misdemeanors, and the prisoners in this case having been indicted under the act of March 3d, 1835, § 2 [4 Stat. 776], were accused only of committing a misdemeanor. The indictment therefore ought to be quashed. The Exchange, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 116; 1 Kent, Comm. 355, 333; [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 97, 105.

3. That no proof on the trial had been adduced in support of the averment contained in the indictment, that the offence was committed on board of an American vessel. That as the United States had not jurisdiction of offences committed on board foreign ships, such averment in the indictment became necessary, and being necessary it should have been proved. U. S. v. 4. That the names of the grand jurors who found the indictment did not appear in the indictment. That such omission was fatal, inasmuch as the courts of the United States in the absence of their own rules were bound by the practice of the king's bench in England. 1 Kent, Comm. 341, 342; Precedents of Indictments in the Crown Circuit Companion, 4 Dallas' Rep., title "Indictment;" [Robinson v. 5. That the indictment ought to have averred, and proof ought to have been adduced on the trial in support of that averment, that the prisoners were citizens of the United States. For the want of such averment and proof, the indictment is bad; 2 Story's Laws U. S. 1302 [4 Stat. 809]; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 23, 221, 228; [Tayloe v. Riggs] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 596; 1 Starkie, Ev. 437; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 566, 567; 17 Mass. 258.

6. That the shipping articles between the master and the prisoners ought to have been introduced on the trial to show that the voyage or term of time for which the crew shipped had not expired at the time of the alleged mutiny. Gord. Dig. arts. 14, 70; [U. S. v. Gooding] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 471; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 2, 3, 228; 15 East, 244; 7 Barn. & C. 625; 3 Barn. & C. 665; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 31.

7. For multifariousness in the several counts of the indictment. Cowp. 675.

The district attorney, for the United States, relied on the following points:

1. That the prisoners having been indicted and tried in the Southern district of New York, the court would presume after verdict that this district and circuit was the one in which the prisoners were first apprehended and brought.

2. That congress had passed laws repeatedly to punish misdemeanors, and he denied the right of the judges at the assizes to disregard the acts of congress.

3. That the presumption of law was that the offence was committed on board of an American vessel, and as the prisoners had not called for the proof of the character of the vessel, the court might presume that the offence was committed as charged in the indictment.

4. That the state court practice was to omit the names of the grand jurors in the indictment, that this ought to be the rule in the present case. (BY THE COURT. We do not admit that the state courts' practice is to govern where it conflicts with the practice of the court of king's bench in England.)

See Rule 7, Sup. Ct. U. S.

5th. That it was not necessary that the prisoners should have been citizens of the United States, inasmuch as had they enlisted on board of an American vessel they would be bound by the laws of the United States.

6th. That inasmuch as the prisoners had not set up in their defence, that the voyage was not ended, the court would presume that the prisoners were not entitled to their discharge.

7th. That the several counts were not multifarious.

Before THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This is a case involving many serious and important questions. It appears that the prisoners, after having cruised for whales in the Southern Atlantic Ocean for several months and taken little or nothing, a large part of them became dissatisfied, and alleged that they had shipped for only one season, and refused to go into the high southern latitudes and Indian Ocean for whales, inasmuch as they did not know where the voyage might end; that the master found them disobedient, unwilling to proceed further; and that after the crew had refused to continue the voyage, he put back to Buenos Ayres, where the prisoners were taken out of the vessel. The master then, after sending home the prisoners to New York in an American ship of war, proceeded to return to New Bedford, where the crew were re-shipped and others substituted in the stead of those who refused to do duty.

As to the first point we admitted the rule to be as laid down by the defendants' counsel, but inasmuch as the objection was not made at the trial, the prisoners must be deemed to have assented to the truth of the averment in the indictment, and this was all that was necessary to convict the prisoners, and the jury were therefore warranted in finding the defendants guilty.

With respect to the second point, the constitution of the United States and the articles of the confederation, both contain provisions to punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and the new constitution has gone further, and added offences against the law of nations. Now we are of opinion that it was an offence against the law of nations for a crew of a vessel to disobey orders of the master, and to endeavor to commit a mutiny and revolt on board of a vessel. Although there is no express adjudication on this subject, we think that in this case the offences charged in the indictment were within the terms of the constitution. The congress of the United States on various occasions have passed laws in regard to misdemeanors, and it would be calling upon the court to say at the assizes that the acts of congress for a long series of years have been unconstitutional. It is too much to ask this court at the circuit to say that such acts have been unconstitutional, inasmuch as the supreme court has never yet directly passed upon this question.

As to the third point, there can be no doubt that the character of the vessel must be proved to be American, and this court would not take jurisdiction of offences committed on board of foreign ships. The jury must have been satisfied on this point, or they would not have been warranted in finding a verdict against the prisoners. The vessel was proved to have cleared and sailed from an American port, to wit, New Bedford, in Massachusetts, on a whaling voyage, and to have returned there after the voyage was broken up, and the jury might reasonably infer that she was an American vessel. We have previously held that the title to a ship might be proved by parol, without production of written documents of its ownership. Whether the court was right or wrong on this point, we adhere to the decision already given until over-ruled by the supreme court of the United States.

As to the fourth point, many precedents showed that the names of the grand jurors who found the indictment appeared in the caption of it, and the case in 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 382 [Bingham v. Cabot], appears to be an authority in favor of the defendants, but we are not satisfied that this was the settled practice in all cases in the king's bench or at the assizes in England. The state court practice in the state of New York has for a long time been different. The indictment and the caption appear to be regarded as two distinct instruments in practice. There is no doubt that on a certiorari from an inferior court to a superior one, the names of the grand jurors, as well as of all the officers of the court, and the court itself, must be sent up in the record, but we are disposed to hold that the names of the grand jurors need not appear in the indictment itself; at least, this being an unsettled question, we rule that this indictment is sufficient.

With regard to the fifth point, it is not clear that persons who were not citizens of the United States, and enlisted on board of American vessels, could not be punished for disobedience of orders or other acts of felony and piracy: If they were pirates, they could clearly be punished as such by the laws of nations, let them be citizens of what country they might. Besides, there was no proof in this case but that the whole of the defendants were not citizens of the United States. If they were, they could clearly be punished. If they were citizens of Great Britain, then the act of congress did not apply, inasmuch as we had no treaty with Great Britain, which prohibited their seamen or our seamen from being employed on board of vessels in each other's service. See Act March 3d, 1813, § 10.

With reference to the sixth point, the shipping articles were the usual instruments of contracts between the master and his crew to the voyage, and were required by the acts of congress for foreign voyages, and for voyages other than to an adjacent state. The defendants had not called for the shipping articles on the trial. The master clearly would not be authorized to force the defendants to go on a new voyage when the old one had ended, but it did not appear that the old one was finished when the revolt took place. We think the proof should have been offered by the defendants distinctly on this point, if this was the ground of their refusal to do duty. But the court had previously held that the voyage might be proved without the production of the shipping articles.

As to the last point, we do not hold the doctrine in regard to the arrest of judgment so strict as Lord Mansfield has in Horne's Case [Cowp. 672]. We look to the substantial ends of justice, and if the defendants have not been fairly prejudiced by the form of the indictment, we should hold it is not enough to arrest the judgment, if the averments against the prisoners were sufficient, although there were several serious and grave questions raised by the defendants' counsel in his argument, yet we have come to the conclusion to pass sentence upon the verdict. The prisoners were subsequently brought into court, and sentenced each to six months' imprisonment in the county gaol.

UNITED STATES v. CRITTENDEN.

[Hempst. 61.] [1]

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Oct., 1828.

INDICTMENT—ALLEGATION OF TIME—CONCLUSION.

1. Indictment is quashable in which the time is alleged "on or about" such a day.

2. It is also quashable for failing to conclude "against the peace and dignity of the United States."

Indictment [against Robert Crittenden] for sending a challenge to fight a duel.

Before JOHNSON ESKRIDGE, BATES, and TRIMBLE, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant moved the court to quash the indictment, because the time therein stated was in the alternative "on or about," and because the indictment does not conclude "against the peace and dignity of the United States;" and the parties being heard, and full consideration thereof had, it is the opinion of the court that for either of the objections the indictment should be quashed.

Indictment quashed, and defendant discharged.

Case No. 14,891.

UNITED STATES ex rel. STANDING BEAR v. CROOK.

[5 Dill. 453.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1879.

HABEAS CORPUS—RIGHT OF INDIAN TO WRIT—REMOVAL INTO INDIAN TERRITORY—CONSENT OF INDIANS.

1. An Indian is a "person" within the meaning of the habeas corpus act, and as such is entitled to sue out a writ of habeas corpus in the federal courts when it is shown that the petitioner is deprived of liberty under color of authority of the United States, or is in custody of an officer in violation of the constitution or a law of the United States, or in violation of a treaty made in pursuance thereof.

2. The right of expatriation is a natural, inherent, and inalienable right, and extends to the Indian as well as to the white race.

3. The commissioner of Indian affairs has ample authority for removing from an Indian reservation all persons found thereon without authority of law, or whose presence may be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians.

4. The military power of the government may be employed to effect such removal; but where the removal is effected, it is the duty of the troops to convey the persons so removed, by the most convenient and safe route, to the civil authorities of the judicial district in which the offence may be committed, to be proceeded against in due course of law. In time of peace, no authority, civil or military, exists for transporting Indians from one section of the country to another, without the consent of the Indians, nor to confine them to any particular reservation against their will; and where officers of the government attempt to do this, and arrest and hold Indians who are at peace with the government, for the purpose of removing them to and confining them on a reservation in the Indian Territory, they will be released on habeas corpus.

[This was a hearing upon return to writ of habeas corpus issued against George Crook, a brigadier general of the army of the United States, at the relation of Standing Bear and other Indians, formerly belonging to the Ponca tribe of Indians.]

A. J. Poppleton and John L. Webster, for relators.

G. M. Lambertson, U. S. Atty.

DUNDY, District Judge. During the fifteen years in which I have been engaged in administering the laws of my country, I have never been called upon to hear or decide a case that appealed so strongly to my sympathy as the one now under consideration. On the one side, we have a few of the remnants of a once numerous and powerful, but now weak, insignificant, unlettered, and generally despised race; on the other, we have the representative of one of the most powerful, most enlightened, and most Christianized nations of modern times. On the one side, we have the representatives of this wasted race coming into this national tribunal of ours, asking for justice and liberty to enable them to adopt our boasted civilization, and to pursue the arts of peace, which have made us great and happy as a nation; on the other side, we have this magnificent, if not magnanimous, government, resisting this application with the determination of sending these people back to the country which is to them less desirable than perpetual imprisonment in their own native land. But I think it is creditable to the heart and mind of the brave and distinguished officer who is made respondent herein to say that he has no sort of sympathy in the business in which he is forced by his position to bear a part so conspicuous; and, so far as I am individually concerned, I think it not improper to say that, if the strongest possible sympathy could give the relators title to freedom, they would have been restored to liberty the moment the arguments in their behalf were closed. No examination or further thought would then have been necessary or expedient. But in a country where liberty is regulated by law, something more satisfactory and enduring than mere sympathy must furnish and constitute the rule and basis of judicial action. It follows that this case must be examined and decided on principles of law, and that unless the relators are entitled to their discharge under the constitution or laws of the United States, or some treaty made pursuant thereto, they must be remanded to the custody of the officer who caused their arrest, to be returned to the Indian Territory, which they left without the consent of the government.

On the 8th of April, 1879, the relators, Standing Bear and twenty-five others, during the session of the court held at that time at Lincoln, presented their petition, duly verified, praying for the allowance of a writ of habeas corpus and their final discharge from custody thereunder.

The petition alleges, in substance, that the relators are Indians who have formerly belonged to the Ponca tribe of Indians, now located in the Indian Territory; that they had some time previously withdrawn from the tribe, and completely severed their tribal relations therewith, and had adopted the general habits of the whites, and were then endeavoring to maintain themselves by their own exertions, and without aid or assistance from the general government; that whilst they were thus engaged, and without being guilty of violating any of the laws of the United States, they were arrested and restrained of their liberty by order of the respondent, George Crook.

The writ was issued and served on the respondent on the 8th day of April, and, the distance between the place where the writ was made returnable and the place where the relators were confined being more than twenty miles, ten days were allotted in which to make return.

On the 18th of April the writ was returned, and the authority for the arrest and detention is therein shown. The substance of the return to the writ, and the additional statement since filed, is that the relators are individual members of, and connected with, the Ponca tribe of Indians; that they had fled or escaped from a reservation situated some place within the limits of the Indian Territory—had departed therefrom without permission from the government; and, at the request of the secretary of the interior, the general of the army had issued an order which required the respondent to arrest and return the relators to their tribe in the Indian Territory, and that, pursuant to the said order, he had caused the relators to be arrested on the Omaha Indian reservation, and that they were in his custody for the purpose of being returned to the Indian Territory.

It is claimed upon the one side, and denied upon the other, that the relators had withdrawn and severed, for all time, their connection with the tribe to which they belonged; and upon this point alone was there any testimony produced by either party hereto. The other matters stated in the petition and the return to the writ are conceded to be true; so that the questions to be determined are purely questions of law.

On the 8th of March, 1859, a treaty was made by the United States with the Ponca tribe of Indians, by which a certain tract of country, north of the Niobrara river and west of the Missouri, was set apart for the permanent home of the said Indians, in which the government agreed to protect them during their good behavior. But just when, or how, or why, or under what circumstances, the Indians left their reservation in Dakota and went to the Indian Territory, does not appear.

The district attorney very earnestly questions the jurisdiction of the court to issue the writ, and to hear and determine the case made herein, and has supported his theory with an argument of great ingenuity and much ability. But, nevertheless, I am of the opinion that his premises are erroneous, and his conclusions, therefore, wrong and unjust. The great respect I entertain for that officer, and the very able manner in which his views were presented, make it necessary for me to give somewhat at length the reasons which lead me to this conclusion.

The district attorney discussed at length the reasons which led to the origin of the writ of habeas corpus, and the character of the proceedings and practice in connection therewith in the parent country. It was claimed that the laws of the realm limited the right to sue out this writ to the free subjects of the kingdom, and that none others came within the benefits of such beneficent laws; and, reasoning from analogy, it is claimed that none but American citizens are entitled to sue out this high prerogative writ in any of the federal courts. I have not examined the English laws regulating the suing out of the writ, nor have I thought it necessary so to do. Of this I will only observe that if the laws of England are as they are claimed to be, they will appear at a disadvantage when compared with our own. This only proves that the laws of a limited monarchy are sometimes less wise and humane than the laws of our own republic—that whilst the parliament of Great Britain was legislating in behalf of the favored few, the congress of the United States was legislating in behalf of all mankind who come within our jurisdiction.

Section 751 of the Revised Statutes declares that "the supreme court and the circuit and district courts shall have power to issue writs of habeas corpus." Section 752 confers the power to issue writs on the judges of said courts, within their jurisdiction, and declares this to be "for the purpose of inquiry into the cause of restraint of liberty." Section 753 restricts the power, limits the jurisdiction, and defines the cases where the writ may properly issue. That may be done under this section where the prisoner "is in custody under or by color of authority of the United States, * * * or is in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of a law of the United States, * * * or in custody in violation of the constitution or of a law or treaty of the United States." Thus, it will be seen that when a person is in custody or deprived of his liberty under color of authority of the United States, or in violation of the constitution or laws or treaties of the United States, the federal judges have jurisdiction, and the writ can properly issue. I take it that the true construction to be placed upon this act is this, that in all cases where federal officers, civil or military, have the custody and control of a person claimed to be unlawfully restrained of liberty, they are then restrained of liberty under color of authority of the United States, and the federal courts can properly proceed to determine the question of unlawful restraint, because no other courts can properly do so. In the other instance, the federal courts and judges can properly issue the writ in all cases where the person is alleged to be in custody in violation of the constitution or a law or treaty of the United States. In such a case, it is wholly immaterial what officer, state or federal, has custody of the person seeking the relief. These relators may be entitled to the writ in either case. Under the first paragraph they certainly are—that is, if an Indian can be entitled to it at all—because they are in custody of a federal officer, under color of authority of the United States. And they may be entitled to the writ under the other paragraph, before recited, for the reason, as they allege, that they are restrained of liberty in violation of a provision of their treaty, before referred to. Now, it must be borne in mind that the habeas corpus act describes applicants for the writ as "persons," or "parties," who may be entitled thereto. It nowhere describes them as "citizens," nor is citizenship in any way or place made a qualification for suing out the writ, and, in the absence of express provision or necessary implication which would require the interpretation contended for by the district attorney, I should not feel justified in giving the words "person" and "party" such a narrow construction. The most natural, and therefore most reasonable, way is to attach the same meaning to words and phrases when found in a statute that is attached to them when and where found in general use. If we do so in this instance, then the question cannot be open to serious doubt. Webster describes a person as "a living soul; a self-conscious being; a moral agent; especially a living human being; a man, woman, or child; an individual of the human race." This is comprehensive enough, it would seem, to include even an Indian. In defining certain generic terms, the first section of the Revised Statutes, declares that the word "person" includes copartnerships and corporations. On the whole, it seems to me quite evident that the comprehensive language used in this section is intended to apply to all mankind—as well the relators as the more favored white race. This will be doing no violence to language, or to the spirit or letter of the law, nor to the intention, as it is believed, of the law-making power of the government. I must hold, then, that Indians, and consequently the relators, are "persons," such as are described by and included within the laws before quoted. It is said, however, that this is the first instance on record in which an Indian has been permitted to sue out and maintain a writ of habeas corpus in a federal court, and therefore the court must be without jurisdiction in the premises. This is a non sequitur. I confess I do not know of another instance where this has been done, but I can also say that the occasion for it perhaps has never before been so great. It may be that the Indians think it wiser and better, in the end, to resort to this peaceful process than it would be to undertake the hopeless task of redressing their own alleged wrongs by force of arms. Returning reason, and the sad experience of others similarly situated, have taught them the folly and madness of the arbitrament of the sword. They can readily see that any serious resistance on their part would be the signal for their utter extermination. Have they not, then, chosen the wiser part by resorting to the very tribunal erected by those they claim have wronged and oppressed them? This, however, is not the tribunal of their own choice, but it is the only one into which they can lawfully go for deliverance. It cannot, therefore, be fairly said that because no Indian ever before invoked the aid of this writ in a federal court, the rightful authority to issue it does not exist. Power and authority rightfully conferred do not necessarily cease to exist in consequence of long non-user. Though much time has elapsed, and many generations have passed away, since the passage of the original habeas corpus act, from which I have quoted, it will not do to say that these Indians cannot avail themselves of its beneficent provisions simply because none of their ancestors ever sought relief thereunder.

Every "person" who comes within our jurisdiction, whether he be European, Asiatic, African, or "native to the manor born," must obey the laws of the United States. Every one who violates them incurs the penalty provided thereby. When a "person" is charged, in a proper way, with the commission of crime, we do not inquire upon the trial in what country the accused was born, nor to what sovereign or government allegiance is due, nor to what race he belongs. The questions of guilt and innocence only form the subjects of inquiry. An Indian, then, especially off from his reservation, is amenable to the criminal laws of the United States, the same as all other persons. They being subject to arrest for the violation of our criminal laws, and being "persons" such as the law contemplates and includes in the description of parties who may sue out the writ, it would indeed be a sad commentary on the justice and impartiality of our laws to hold that Indians, though natives of our own country, cannot test the validity of an alleged illegal imprisonment in this manner, as well as a subject of a foreign government who may happen to be sojourning in this country, but owing it no sort of allegiance. I cannot doubt that congress intended to give to every person who might be unlawfully restrained of liberty under color of authority of the United States, the right to the writ and a discharge thereon. I conclude, then, that, so far as the issuing of the writ is concerned, it was properly issued, and that the relators are within the jurisdiction conferred by the habeas corpus act.

A question of much greater importance remains for consideration, which, when determined, will be decisive of this whole controversy. This relates to the right of the government to arrest and hold the relators for a time, for the purpose of being returned to a point in the Indian Territory from which it is alleged the Indians escaped. I am not vain enough to think that I can do full justice to a question like the one under consideration. But, as the matter furnishes so much valuable material for discussion, and so much food for reflection, I shall try to present it as viewed from my own standpoint, without reference to consequences or criticisms, which, though not specially invited, will be sure to follow.

A review of the policy of the government adopted in its dealings with the friendly tribe of Poncas, to which the relators at one time belonged, seems not only appropriate, but almost indispensable to a correct understanding of this controversy. The Ponca Indians have been at peace with the government, and have remained the steadfast friends of the whites, for many years. They lived peaceably upon the land and in the country they claimed and called their own.

On the 12th of March, 1858, they made a treaty with the United States, by which they ceded all claims to lands, except the following tract: "Beginning at a point on the Niobrara river, and running due north so as to intersect the Ponca river twenty-five miles from its mouth; thence from said point of intersection up and along the Ponca river twenty miles; thence due south to the Niobrara river; and thence down and along said river to the place of beginning; which tract is hereby reserved for the future homes of said Indians." In consideration of this cession, the government agreed "to protect the Poncas in the possession of the tract of land reserved for their future homes, and their persons and property thereon, during good behavior on their part." Annuities were to be paid them for thirty years, houses were to be built, schools were to be established, and other things were to be done by the government, in consideration of said cession. See 12 Stat. 997.

On the 10th of March, 1865, another treaty was made, and a part of the other reservation was ceded to the government. Other lands, however, were, to some extent, substituted therefor, "by way of rewarding them for their constant fidelity to the government, and citizens thereof, and with a view of returning to the said tribe of Ponca Indians their old burying-grounds and cornfields." This treaty also provides for paying $15,080 for spoliations committed on the Indians. See 14 Stat. 675.

On the 29th day of April, 1868, the government made a treaty with the several bands of Sioux Indians, which treaty was ratified by the senate on the 16th of the following February, in and by which the reservations set apart for the Poncas under former treaties were completely absolved. 15 Stat. 635. This was done without consultation with, or knowledge or consent on the part of, the Ponca tribe of Indians.

On the 15th of August, 1876, congress passed the general Indian appropriation bill, and in it we find a provision authorizing the secretary of the interior to use $25,000 for the removal of the Poncas to the Indian Territory, and providing them a home therein, with consent of the tribe. 19 Stat. 192.

In the Indian appropriation bill passed by congress on the 27th day of May, 1878, we find a provision authorizing the secretary of the interior to expend the sum of $30,000 for the purpose of removing and locating the Ponca Indians on a new reservation, near the Kaw river.

No reference has been made to any other treaties or laws, under which the right to arrest and remove the Indians is claimed to exist.

The Poncas lived upon their reservation in southern Dakota, and cultivated a portion of the same, until two or three years ago, when they removed therefrom, but whether by force or otherwise does not appear. At all events, we find a portion of them, including the relators, located at some point in the Indian Territory. There, the testimony seems to show, is where the trouble commenced. Standing Bear, the principal witness, states that out of five hundred and eighty-one Indians who went from the reservation in Dakota to the Indian Territory, one hundred and fifty-eight died within a year or so, and a great proportion of the others were sick and disabled, caused, in a great measure, no doubt, from change of climate; and to save himself and the survivors of his wasted family, and the feeble remnant of his little band of followers, he determined to leave the Indian Territory and return to his old home, where, to use his own language, "he might live and die in peace, and be buried with his fathers." He also states that he informed the agent of their final purpose to leave, never to return, and that he and his followers had finally, fully, and forever severed his and their connection with the Ponca tribe of Indians, and had resolved to disband as a tribe, or band, of Indians, and to cut loose from the government, go to work, become self-sustaining, and adopt the habits and customs of a higher civilization. To accomplish what would seem to be a desirable and laudable purpose, all who were able so to do went to work to earn a living. The Omaha Indians, who speak the same language, and with whom many of the Poncas have long continued to intermarry, gave them employment and ground to cultivate, so as to make them self-sustaining. And it was when at the Omaha reservation, and when thus employed, that they were arrested by order of the government, for the purpose of being taken back to the Indian Territory. They claim to be unable to see the justice, or reason, or wisdom, or necessity, of removing them by force from their own native plains and blood relations to a far-off country, in which they can see little but new-made graves opening for their reception. The land from which they fled in fear has no attractions for them. The love of home and native land was strong enough in the minds of these people to induce them to brave every peril to return and live and die where they had been reared. The bones of the dead son of Standing Bear were not to repose in the land they hoped to be leaving forever, but were carefully preserved and protected, and formed a part of what was to them a melancholy procession homeward. Such instances of parental affection, and such love of home and native land, may be heathen in origin, but it seems to me that they are not unlike Christian in principle.

What is here stated in this connection is mainly for the purpose of showing that the relators did all they could to separate themselves from their tribe and to sever their tribal relations, for the purpose of becoming self-sustaining and living without support from the government. This being so, it presents the question as to whether or not an Indian can withdraw from his tribe, sever his tribal relation therewith, and terminate his allegiance thereto, for the purpose of making an independent living and adopting our own civilization.

If Indian tribes are to be regarded and treated as separate but dependent nations, there can be no serious difficulty about the question. If they are not to be regarded and treated as separate, dependent nations, then no allegiance is owing from an individual Indian to his tribe, and he could, therefore, withdraw therefrom at any time. The question of expatriation has engaged the attention of our government from the time of its very foundation. Many heated discussions have been carried on between our own and foreign governments on this great question, until diplomacy has triumphantly secured the right to every person found within our jurisdiction. This right has always been claimed and admitted by our government, and it is now no longer an open question. It can make but little difference, then, whether we accord to the Indian tribes a national character or not, as in either case I think the individual Indian possesses the clear and God-given right to withdraw from his tribe and forever live away from it, as though it had no further existence. If the right of expatriation was open to doubt in this country down to the year 1868, certainly since that time no sort of question as to the right can now exist. On the 27th of July of that year congress passed an act, now appearing as section 1999 of the Revised Statutes, which declares that: "Whereas, the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and, whereas, in the recognition of this principle the government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenship. * * * Therefore, any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officer of the United States which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the republic."

This declaration must forever settle the question until it is reopened by other legislation upon the same subject. This is, however, only reaffirming in the most solemn and authoritative manner a principle well settled and understood in this country for many years past.

In most, if not all, instances in which treaties have been made with the several Indian tribes, where reservations have been set apart for their occupancy, the government has either reserved the right or bound itself to protect the Indians thereon. Many of the treaties expressly prohibit white persons being on the reservations unless specially authorized by the treaties or acts of congress for the purpose of carrying out treaty stipulations.

Laws passed for the government of the Indian country, and for the purpose of regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, confer upon certain officers of the government almost unlimited power over the persons who go upon the reservations without lawful authority. Section 2149 of the Revised Statutes authorizes and requires the commissioner of Indian affairs, with the approval of the secretary of the interior, to remove from any "tribal reservation" any person being thereon without authority of law, or whose presence within the limits of the reservation may, in the judgment of the commissioner, be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians. The authority here conferred upon the commissioner fully justifies him in causing to be removed from Indian reservations all persons thereon in violation of law, or whose presence thereon may be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians upon the reservations. This applies as well to an Indian as to a white person, and manifestly for the same reason, the object of the law being to prevent unwarranted interference between the Indians and the agent representing the government. Whether such an extensive discretionary power is wisely vested in the commissioner of Indian affairs or not, need not be questioned. It is enough to know that the power rightfully exists, and, where existing, the exercise of the power must be upheld. If, then, the commissioner has the right to cause the expulsion from the Omaha Indian reservation of all persons thereon who are there in violation of law, or whose presence may be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians, then he must of necessity be authorized to use the necessary force to accomplish his purpose. Where, then, is he to look for this necessary force? The military arm of the government is the most natural and most potent force to be used on such occasions, and section 2150 of the Revised Statutes, specially authorizes the use of the army for this service. The army, then, it seems, is the proper force to employ when intruders and trespassers who go upon the reservations are to be ejected therefrom.

The first subdivision of the Revised Statutes last referred to provides that "the military forces of the United States may be employed, in such manner and under such regulations as the president may direct, in the apprehension of every person who may be in the Indian country in violation of law, and in conveying him immediately from the Indian country, by the nearest convenient and safe route, to the civil authority of the territory or judicial district in which such person shall be found, to be proceeded against in due course of law." This is the authority under which the military can be lawfully employed to remove intruders from an Indian reservation. What may be done by the troops in such cases is here fully and clearly stated; and it is this authority, it is believed, under which the respondent acted.

All Indian reservations held under treaty stipulations with the government must be deemed and taken to be a part of the "Indian country," within the meaning of our laws on that subject. The relators were found upon the Omaha Indian reservation. That being a part of the Indian country, and they not being a part of the Omaha tribe of Indians, they were there without lawful authority, and if the commissioner of Indian affairs deemed their presence detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Omaha Indians, he had lawful warrant to remove them from the reservation, and to employ the necessary military force to effect this object in safety.

General Crook had the rightful authority to remove the relators from the reservation, and must stand justified in removing them therefrom. But when the troops are thus employed they must exercise the authority in the manner provided by the section of the law just read. This law makes it the duty of the troops to convey the parties arrested, by the nearest convenient and safe route, to the civil authority of the territory or judicial district in which such persons shall be found, to be proceeded against in due course of law. The duty of the military authorities is here very clearly and sharply defined, and no one can be justified in departing therefrom, especially in time of peace. As General Crook had the right to arrest and remove the relators from the Omaha Indian reservation, it follows, from what has been stated, that the law required him to convey them to this city and turn them over to the marshal and United States attorney, to be proceeded against in due course of law. Then proceedings could be instituted against them in either the circuit or district court, and if the relators had incurred a penalty under the law, punishment would follow; otherwise, they would be discharged from custody. But this course was not pursued in this case; neither was it intended to observe the laws in that regard, for General Crook's orders, emanating from higher authority, expressly required him to apprehend the relators and remove them by force to the Indian Territory, from which it is alleged they escaped. But in what General Crook has done in the premises no fault can be imputed to him. He was simply obeying the orders of his superior officers, but the orders, as we think, lack the necessary authority of law, and are, therefore, not binding on the relators.

I have searched in vain for the semblance of any authority justifying the commissioner in attempting to remove by force any Indians, whether belonging to a tribe or not, to any place, or for any other purpose than what has been stated. Certainly, without some specific authority found in an act of congress, or in a treaty with the Ponca tribe of Indians, he could not lawfully force the relators back to the Indian Territory, to remain and die in that country, against their will. In the absence of all treaty stipulations or laws of the United States authorizing such removal, I must conclude that no such arbitrary authority exists. It is true, if the relators are to be regarded as a part of the great nation of Ponca Indians, the government might, in time of war, remove them to any place of safety so long as the war should last, but perhaps no longer, unless they were charged with the commission of some crime. This is a war power merely, and exists in time of war only. Every nation exercises the right to arrest and detain an alien enemy during the existence of a war, and all subjects or citizens of the hostile nations are subject to be dealt with under this rule.

But it is not claimed that the Ponca tribe of Indians are at war with the United States, so that this war power might be used against them; in fact, they are amongst the most peaceable and friendly of all the Indian tribes, and have at times received from the government unmistakable and substantial recognition of their long-continued friendship for the whites. In time of peace the war power remains in abeyance, and must be subservient to the civil authority of the government until something occurs to justify its exercise. No fact exists, and nothing has occurred, so far as the relators are concerned, to make it necessary or lawful to exercise such an authority over them. If they could be removed to the Indian Territory by force, and kept there in the same way, I can see no good reason why they might not be taken and kept by force in the penitentiary at Lincoln, or Leavenworth, or Jefferson City, or any other place which the commander of the forces might, in his judgment, see proper to designate. I cannot think that any such arbitrary authority exists in this country.

The reasoning advanced in support of my views, leads me to conclude:

1. That an Indian is a "person" within the meaning of the laws of the United States, and has, therefore, the right to sue out a writ of habeas corpus in a federal court, or before a federal judge, in all cases where he may be confined or in custody under color of authority of the United States, or where he is restrained of liberty in violation of the constitution or laws of the United States.

2. That General George Crook, the respondent, being commander of the military department of the Platte, has the custody of the relators, under color of authority of the United States, and in violation of the laws thereof.

3. That no rightful authority exists for removing by force any of the relators to the Indian Territory, as the respondent has been directed to do.

4. That the Indians possess the inherent right of expatriation, as well as the more fortunate white race, and have the inalienable right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," so long as they obey the laws and do not trepass on forbidden ground. And,

5. Being restrained of liberty under color of authority of the United States, and in violation of the laws thereof, the relators must be discharged from custody, and it is so ordered.

Ordered accordingly.

NOTE. At the May term, 1879, Mr. Justice Miller refused to hear an appeal prosecuted by the United States, because the Indians who had petitioned for the writ of habeas corpus were not present, having been released by the order of Dundy, District Judge, and no security for their appearance having been taken.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL — CONVICTION OF SIMPLE ASSAULT.

Upon an indictment at common law for assault with intent to kill and murder, the defendant may be found guilty of the simple assault only.

Upon the trial, W. L. Brent, for defendant, moved the court to instruct the jury that if they should not find the assault to be with intent to murder, they must find the defendant not guilty. 1 East, Cr. Law, 411, which was a case decided by Lord Kenyon at nisi prius on an indictment in which there were two counts, namely: 1. For an assault with intent to murder. 2. A common count for assault and battery. The evidence was that if death had ensued it would have been manslaughter only; and Lord Kenyon directed the jury to find the defendant not guilty on the first count.

Mr. Key, contrà, cited 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 232, 248, 250, 251; Hunt's Case, 2 Camp. 583; and Williams' Case, Id. 646.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent, but concurring) refused to give the instruction; and directed the jury, that they might, if justified by the evidence, find the defendant guilty of the assault only, without the intent charged.

UNITED STATES v. CROSBY et al.[1]

[1 Hughes, 448.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. Nov. Term, 1871.

ELECTIONS — INTIMIDATING VOTERS — FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION — INDICTMENT — STATUTES — PROTECTION OF VOTERS.

1. The first section of the act of May 31st, 1870 (16 Stat. 140), declared a right, and section 7 of the same act defines the punishment for its violation.

2. It is not necessary that each section of the act should contain or disclose the penalty for its infraction That is often, as in this statute, referred to a later and generally to the closing section of the act defining the crime or offence, and is made applicable to all the antecedent sections.

3. In charging a statutory offence it is generally sufficient to set it out in the words of the statute. If the statute uses a common law name for a crime which it proposes to punish, the indictment must set forth the various ingredients of the crime which go to make up the offence at common law.

4. Congress has never assumed the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the several states. To do so is left entirely to the states themselves. The right of a citizen to vote depends upon the laws of the state in which he resides, and is not granted to him by the constitution of the United States; nor is such right guaranteed to him by that instrument. All that is guaranteed is that he shall not be deprived of suffrage by reason of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

5. The right to be secure in one's house is not a right derived from the constitution. It existed long before the adoption of the constitution, at common law, and cannot be said to come within the meaning of the words of the act, "right, privilege, or immunity granted or secured by the constitution of the United States."

6. Congress has power to interfere for the protection of voters at federal elections, and that power existed before the adoption of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendments to the constitution.

This was an indictment [against Allen Crosby, Sherod Childers, and others] for conspiracy contrary to the provisions of sections 5, 6, and 7 of the act of congress of May 31st, 1870, to enforce the rights of citizens to vote, etc., and section 2 of the act of April 20th, 1871, to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. The indictment contained eleven counts, which charged as follows: First Count. That Allen Crosby, etc., on the first day of February, 1871, unlawfully did conspire together with intent to violate the first section of the act entitled "An act to enforce the rights of the citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of this Union, and for other purposes," approved May 31st, 1870, to wit: "That all citizens of the United States who are or shall be otherwise qualified by law to vote at any election by the people in any state, territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall be entitled and allowed to vote at all such elections, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; any constitution, law, custom, usage, or regulation of any state or territory, or by or under its authority, to the contrary notwithstanding," contrary to the act of congress in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States. Second Count. That on the same day, the defendants "unlawfully did conspire together with intent to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate Amzi Rainey, a citizen of the United States, with intent to prevent and hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of a right and privilege granted and secured to him by the constitution and laws of the United States, to wit, the right of suffrage contrary," etc. Third Count. Same as the second, with the addition of a charge of burglary, in the following words: "That said Allen Crosby . . . . about the hour of eleven of the clock in the night, on the day and year aforesaid, at the county, etc., in the act of committing the offence aforesaid as aforesaid set forth and alleged, with force and arms the dwelling-house of the said Amzi Rainey, there situate, feloniously and burglariously did break and enter with intent to commit a felony; and that the defendants in the said dwelling-house there being, in and upon the said Amzi Rainey, in the said dwelling-house then being, then and there, unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously did make an assault; and the said defendants, the said Amzi Rainey, in and upon the head, shoulders, and back of the said Amzi Rainey, then and there unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously did strike, cut, and wound, with intent to do unto said Amzi Rainey some grievous bodily harm, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of South Carolina." Fourth Count. That the same day the defendants unlawfully did attempt to control Amzi Rainey in exercising the right of suffrage, to whom the right of suffrage is secured and guaranteed by the fifteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, by threats of violence to himself, contrary, etc. Fifth Count. Same as the fourth count, with the addition of a charge of burglary, as set out in the third count. Sixth Count. That on the same day, defendants unlawfully did conspire together with intent to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate Amzi Rainey, a citizen of the United States, because of his free exercise of a right and privilege granted and secured to him by the constitution and laws of the United States, to wit, the right of suffrage, contrary, etc. Seventh Count. Same as the sixth count, with the addition of a charge of burglary, as set out in the third count. Eighth Count. That on the same day, defendants unlawfully did conspire together with intent to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate Amzi Rainey, a citizen of the United States, with intent to prevent and hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of a right and privilege granted and secured to him by the constitution of the United States, to wit, the right to be secure in his person, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable search and seizure, contrary, etc. Ninth Count. That on the 21st day of April, 1871, the defendants unlawfully did conspire together for the purpose of depriving Amzi Rainey of the equal protection of the laws, contrary, etc. Tenth Count. That on the 21st day of April, 1871, defendants unlawfully did conspire together for the purpose of depriving Amzi Rainey of equal privileges and immunities under the laws, contrary, etc. Eleventh Count. That on the 21st day of April, 1871, defendants unlawfully did conspire together to injure Amzi Rainey, a citizen of the United States, lawfully entitled to vote, in his person, on account of giving his support, in a lawful manner, in favor of the election of A. S. Wallace, a lawfully qualified person, as a member of the congress of the United States, contrary, etc.

On December 4th, 1871, it was moved in behalf of the defendants, to quash the indictment on the following grounds: As to the first count: 1. The conspiracy charged is, to violate the first section of the act of May 31st, 1870, which section defines no crime or offence, and forbids nothing. 2. The names of the persons hindered or prevented, or not allowed to vote, are not set forth, nor is it alleged that their names were unknown to the grand jury. 3. The means by which the unlawful prevention was effected are not set forth. 4. The specific election at which they were not allowed to vote, whether for state, county, municipal, United States officers or representatives in congress, is not set forth. 5. Nor the date of the election, as stated, third Wednesday of October, 1872. 6. The qualifications of said male citizens to vote are not set forth. As to the second count: 1. It is not alleged that said Rainey was qualified to vote. 2. Nor that there was any election. 3. The unlawful means are not set forth. As to the third count: The defendants rely here upon this further objection, to wit: The burglary and battery charged in this count is not alleged as an overt act of the conspiracy, but as a distinct offence against the state of South Carolina, as is cognizable by, or within, the jurisdiction of this court, but is exclusively cognizable by the state court, having jurisdiction of such offences in the said county of York. As to the fourth count: 1. It does not allege that said Rainey was, at the time when, etc., a citizen of the United States; or, that the right of suffrage was then secured to him by the said fifteenth amendment. 2. It is not alleged that he was otherwise qualified to vote than by force of the said amendment. 3. No election is set forth. As to the fifth count: The defendants rely upon the same objections to this count as set forth to the said second and third counts. As to the sixth count: The defendants rely upon the same objections to this count as are set forth to the said second count; and in addition, that it is not alleged that he had exercised the privilege therein mentioned. As to the seventh count: The defendants rely upon the same objections to this count as are set forth to the second, third, and fourth counts. As to the eighth count: 1. The means by which he was to be hindered are not set forth. 2. It is not alleged which of the rights—those of person or property—were intended to be invaded, searched, or seized. 3. It is not alleged that he was a householder. As to the ninth count: 1. It is not averred in what way, or by what means, the said Rainey was so deprived of the equal protection of the laws. 2. It is not averred what were the laws, federal or state, of the protection of which he was so deprived. 3. It is not alleged that he was a citizen of the United States, or of any state, or any territory of the United States. As to the tenth count: The defendants rely upon the same objections as set forth to the ninth count; and, further, that it is not set forth what privileges or immunities he was so deprived of. As to the eleventh count: 1. It is uncertain, because it does not appear that the conspiracy and injury were before or after the election. 2. The particular election, or when, or where, it occurred, is not set forth, and no day is given, except the date of the conspiracy; that is to say, the 21st of April, 1871, the next day after the act was passed. 3. It is not alleged that said Rainey was qualified to vote at that election, or that he was a citizen of the state or resident of the congressional district where the election was held. 4. It was not alleged that said Wallace was a citizen of the United States, or a citizen of the state or district in which said election was held, nor that he was a candidate for election, or that said Rainey voted or intended to vote for him.

D. T. Corbin, U. S. Atty., and D. H. Chamberlain, for the United States.

Clawson, Thompson & Clawson, Reverdy Johnson, and Henry Stanberry, for defendants.

BOND, Circuit Judge. After the prolonged and very able argument of counsel upon this motion to quash, we feel embarrassed, gentlemen, that, upon so little deliberation, we are to pass judgment upon the grave questions raised here. But the fact that so many persons are now in confinement upon these charges and that so many witnesses are in attendance upon the court, at great personal expense, makes it necessary that we should not delay longer. And the first objection to the first count in the indictment is, that the section of the act of May 31st, 1870, which this count charges the parties with conspiring to violate, declares no penalty for the offence. The first section of the act declares a right. It is referred to in this count by its number, and with sufficient certainty it seems to us to enable the parties charged, after trial, to plead the verdict rendered in this case in bar to another indictment. After declaring the right, the statute proceeds, in section 7, to define the punishment for its violation. It is not necessary, it seems to us, that each section of the act should contain or disclose the penalty for its infraction. That is often, as in this statute, referred to a later and generally to the closing section of the act defining the crime or offence, and is made applicable to all the antecedent sections. It is objected, moreover, that this count does not contain the names of the parties who, being entitled to vote, were to be hindered and prevented from the exercise of the elective franchise by the traversers. It must be remembered that this is not an indictment to punish a wrong done to individuals, against the peace and dignity of the United States, but for a conspiracy to do that wrong. The offence is completed the moment the compact is formed, whether any person, within the contemplation of the first section, has actually been hindered or not. If the traversers never committed any overt act, but separated and went home after the completion of the conspiracy, they have incurred the penalty which the seventh section prescribes. So it makes no difference what particular person the conspiracy when put in motion first reached. The act complained of is the conspiracy; and if it be true that any person was hindered or prevented from the exercise of the right granted by the first section, such hindrance and prevention is only proof of the conspiracy, and does not in anywise tend to make the crime more complete. It is generally sufficient, in charging a statutory offence, to set it out in the words of the statute. If the statute uses a common law name for a crime which it proposes to punish, the indictment must set forth the various ingredients of the crime which go to make up the offence at common law. But when the statute itself creates the offence and defines it, it is sufficient if the indictment uses the words of the statute, unless the words be indefinite and vague, ambiguous or general, in which case the indictment must so particularize the act complained of that the party charged shall be in no doubt of the offence alleged against him. The certainty required is that which will enable him to plead the verdict in bar of any future action. It is alleged, in this count, that this conspiracy was to go into operation at an election not yet held, to wit, the third Wednesday of October, 1872, and it is objected that this is not sufficient, that the right to vote is not a continuing right, but exists only at the time of its immediate exercise. It would be strange, indeed, if parties could not be punished, if it be necessary to punish them at all, for any offence but those committed against this act on election day, and in the direct exercise of the elective franchise. The usefulness of the act of congress would be entirely frustrated by such requirement. A man may be so effectually intimidated weeks before the election that he would not dare to go within a mile of the polls, and all the mischief the act is intended to remedy would flourish, and no punishment could be awarded them, under this construction, because the right to vote is not a subsisting right, but one which recurs to the citizen on election day. We do not so hold. The uncertainty which the count leaves as to whether this was a state election or a federal is urged as fatal. The indictment charges that this was a conspiracy to violate the first section of this act. This section declares that all citizens shall be allowed to vote at all elections, who are qualified by law to vote, without distinction of race, or color, or previous condition of servitude. Congress has never assumed the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the several states. To do so is left entirely with the states themselves. But the constitution has declared that the states shall make no distinction on the grounds stated in this first section. And, by this legislation, congress has endeavored, in a way which congress thought appropriate, to enforce it. It is this act of appropriate legislation, and the first section of it, which the defendants are charged with violating, and we think it makes no difference at what election, whether it be state or federal, he is intimidated or hindered from voting because of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Congress may have found it difficult to devise a method by which to punish a state which, by law, made such distinction, and may have thought that legislation most likely to secure the end in view which punished the individual citizen who acted by virtue of a state law or upon his individual responsibility. If the act be within the scope of the amendment, and in the line of its purpose, congress is the sole judge of its appropriateness. The next objection, which is that the count does not set forth the qualification of the voter, is sufficiently answered, we think, in the remarks we have made respecting the requirements of indictments setting forth statutory offences.

We are of opinion that the second count of the indictment is bad, because it does not allege that Amzi Rainey was qualified to vote; and for another reason, more fatal, that it alleges the right of Rainey to vote to be a right and privilege granted to him by the constitution of the United States. This, as we have shown, is not so. The right of a citizen to vote depends upon the laws of the state in which he resides, and is not granted to him by the constitution of the United States, nor is such right guaranteed to him by that instrument. All that is guaranteed is, that he shall not be deprived of the suffrage by reason of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The third count is a repetition of the second, with a clause setting out a charge of burglary. Concerning the court's jurisdiction over such charge, the court is divided in opinion, and will, therefore, make no comment on it at this time.

The fourth count is obnoxious to the objection that neither the citizenship of Rainey nor the fact of his qualifications to vote is set out.

The fifth count repeats the charge contained in the fourth, with the additional clause contained in the third count, and the court refrains from noticing it for the reasons given as to the first count.

The sixth count is intended to charge a conspiracy to oppress Rainey for having prior to 1st February, 1871, exercised the right of suffrage; and would be good if it were drawn with the particularity of the first count, which charges a conspiracy to oppress, to prevent the future exercise of this right. It does not, however, contain any allegation of the fact of qualification, nor that the party was entitled to vote in York county, or anywhere else, or that he ever exercised his right to vote.

The seventh count is a repetition of the sixth, with the charge of burglary added, as in the third count.

The eighth count alleges a conspiracy to prevent and hinder Rainey from the exercise of a right secured to him by the constitution of the United States, which is defined to be the right to be secured in his person and papers against unreasonable search. The article in the constitution of the United States, to enforce which this count is supposed to be drawn, has long been decided to be a mere restriction upon the United States itself. The right to be secure in one's house is not a right derived from the constitution, but it existed long before the adoption of the constitution, at common law, and cannot be said to come within the meaning of the words of the act "right, privilege, or immunity granted or secured by the constitution of the United States."

The ninth count is entirely too indefinite, and the defendants could not possibly know, from its language, with what offence they were charged; and the same objection is valid as to the tenth count.

The eleventh and last count of the indictment charges a conspiracy to injure Rainey because he had previously voted for a member of congress. We have no doubt of the power of congress to interfere in the protection of voters at federal elections, and that that power existed before the adoption of either of the recent amendments. It is a power necessary to the existence of congress, and this count seems to set forth the charge with sufficient perspicuity, and is not liable to the objections urged against it.

The motion to quash is overruled as to the first and eleventh counts of the indictment, and sustained as to the others, excepting such as the court is divided respecting.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term. 1835.

INDICTMENT FOR BEATING SLAVE.

It is an indictable offence to cruelly beat the slave of another, in the public highway and leave her there, exposed to public view.

The first count of the indictment was for a common assault and battery on "one negro Milly." The second count charged the defendant [George Cross] with an assault upon one negro Milly, "in a public road and highway in the county aforesaid," and cruelly beating her, "to the great damage of the said Milly and to the terror and disturbance and annoyance of the good citizens of the United States then and there passing and repassing on and near the said public road and highway, and there and thereabouts living and abiding, and against the peace and government of the United States." It appeared in evidence that Milly was the slave of Mr. Z. Walker; and at the prayer of the attorney of the United States—

THE COURT instructed the jury that if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the defendant cruelly beat the slave in the public highway, and left her there, exposed to public view, it was an indictable offence.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, however, was of opinion that it was not an indictable offence unless the beating was in the public view.

UNITED STATES v. CROW.

[1 Bond, 51.] [2]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1856.

LARCENY FROM MAIL — EVIDENCE — INCULPATING CIRCUMSTANCES—PROOF OF CHARACTER.

1. On the trial of an indictment for abstracting a letter or package from the mail, the most satisfactory evidence that it had been in the mail is that of the person who deposited it in the post-office; and of its loss, that of the person to whom it was addressed, to the effect that it was never received by him.

2. In the absence of any direct testimony connecting the defendant with the violation of the mail, collateral circumstances tending to his inculpation are admissible in evidence to the jury.

3. Evidence having been introduced showing that a letter had been mailed at Carlisle, in the state of Pennsylvania, addressed to parties in Ohio, inclosing a draft or bill, the prosecution, for the purpose of proving that the draft or bill had been in the defendant's possession, and to raise the presumption that he had stolen it from the mail, offered in evidence a letter purporting to have been written and signed by Martin Smith, transmitting the draft or bill to a banker in Marietta, Ohio, to be cashed, and proposed to prove by a witness that said letter was in the handwriting of the defendant; and the witness stated that it was his impression and belief that the handwriting of the letter, including the signature of Martin Smith, was the proper handwriting of the defendant; but having sworn that he had seen the defendant write but once, and had no other means of knowing his handwriting, the court instructed the jury that the proof of the handwriting was not sufficient, and would not justify a verdict of guilty.

4. Proof of the previous good character of the defendant, and that without compulsion he sought an investigation of the charge is not only admissible, but should have weight with the jury if the evidence implicating him creates a reasonable doubt of his guilt.

[This was an indictment against Robert J. Crow, charging him with abstracting a letter from the United States mail.]

H. J. Jewett, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Johnson & Carroll, for defendant.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). The indictment against the defendant contains several distinct charges, one or more of which must be substantiated by the evidence to justify a verdict of guilty. The first, second, and third counts are for stealing letters and packages from the mail of the United States without any particular description or designation of them. The fourth count charges the stealing of a letter from the mail, which had been deposited in the post-office at Carlisle, in the state of Pennsylvania, written by R. M. Henderson, addressed to J. D. & J. Brown, Amesville, Ohio, which, it is averred, inclosed a draft in favor of said Browns, drawn by the cashier of a bank at Carlisle on one of the banks of Philadelphia. The fifth count charges the defendant with having fraudulently taken from the post-office, at Beverly, Ohio, a letter addressed to one Martin Smith. These several charges are based on different provisions of the laws of the United States, designed for the protection of the mails and the punishment of persons guilty of violating them. The case for the prosecution rests wholly on circumstantial evidence, which, it is insisted by the counsel for the government, must lead the jury to the conclusion that the defendant is guilty. It is proper here to remark, that to justify the conviction of the defendant the jury must be satisfied, not only that the mail has been violated, but that the letters or packages, with the stealing of which the defendant is charged, had been in, and were taken from, the mail of the United States. The usual, and certainly the most satisfactory, evidence that a letter or package was put into the mail for transmission, is that of the person who deposited it in the post-office; and the best evidence of its loss is that of the person to whom the letter or package was addressed. In this case neither the person mailing the letter or package, nor the person to whom it was directed, has been called as a witness; and the jury are therefore to consider whether other circumstances in proof connect the defendant with the criminal acts charged.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

It will not be necessary to recite at length the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution, which it is claimed proves the guilt of the defendant. I will refer only to the more material facts relied upon for this purpose. The witness, Harvey Smith, says that about the 4th of May last he was informed that some letters and fragments of letters and envelopes had been found under a school-house, in the village of Plymouth, Washington county, Ohio. Upon examination he found some mutilated letters, with envelopes and postmarks upon them. And he identifies some of these now presented to the jury as being the same that were found under the school-house. This evidence proves that there was a violation of the mail of the United States at the place mentioned, but there seems to be no proof directly implicating the defendant with such violation. It is insisted, however, that the evidence establishes the fact that the defendant was in possession of the draft or bill described in the fourth count of the indictment, and that until he shows that he came honestly into the possession he must be presumed to have stolen it from the mail. It will be for the jury to inquire and determine, first, whether the evidence sufficiently proves the fact of the possession of the draft by the defendant; and, secondly, whether, if in possession, he abstracted it from the mail. On the last point, I may as well remark here that, though the jury may have sufficient grounds for finding the fact of possession in the defendant, they must also be satisfied that it was feloniously stolen from the mail to constitute his guilt under this indictment. If he came, even feloniously, into the possession of the draft by other means than stealing it from the mail, the offense would be one cognizable in a state court, but of which this court has no jurisdiction.

It is an important inquiry for the jury, whether there is sufficient proof that the draft was in the possession of the defendant. For, it will be obvious, if the draft be proved to have been in his possession, in connection with the fact that it was inclosed in the letter from Carlisle, addressed to the Browns at Amesville and sent by mail, a prima facie case of guilt against the defendant would seem to be made out. And it would be necessary for him to repel the presumption of guilt by proof that he obtained possession of the draft by other means than those charged in the indictment.

The evidence mainly relied on by the prosecution to show that the draft had been in defendant's possession, is that of George Benedict, who swears that on April 17, 1855, he took from the post-office at Marietta a letter addressed to him, purporting to be written by Martin Smith, dated the 14th of April, which contained the draft in question, with a request that Benedict would cash the draft and remit the proceeds to the writer. The envelope of this letter is produced to this witness, and he identifies it as being the same that covered the letter received from Smith. The postmark shows that it was mailed at Amesville. The witness, Benedict, swears that he remitted the proceeds of the draft in bank-notes, inclosed in a letter addressed to Martin Smith. He thinks there were two $50 notes on Wheeling banks, and that the rest was in Ohio notes.

It is insisted by the prosecution that the letter purporting to be written and signed by Martin Smith was written by the defendant, and is, therefore, conclusive evidence that the draft had been in his hands, and that he resorted to the trick of transmitting it to Benedict for the purpose of getting it cashed, under the feigned name of Martin Smith, that he might reap the proceeds of his crime without danger of detection. It is, therefore, a most important inquiry for the jury whether the defendant wrote the letter to Benedict under the name of Martin Smith. The only witness for the prosecution to show that this letter was in the handwriting of the defendant is Harvey Smith, who swears that it is his impression and belief that the letter is in the handwriting of the defendant. He does not swear positively on this subject; and on cross-examination the witness says he saw the defendant write but once, and that was at an election, where he wrote some tickets. The letter in question has been permitted to go to the jury, and they are to decide whether it was written by the defendant. It is the duty and the province of the court, however, to state the law on this subject to the jury. Now, it is undoubtedly true that proof of handwriting if often a most reliable species of evidence, and is admissible as such both in civil and criminal cases. But to entitle it to any consideration, the witness who testifies to the handwriting of another must have had adequate means of becoming acquainted with it, and must be able to swear to it with some degree of positiveness. He must have seen the person write frequently, or must otherwise have obtained a satisfactory knowledge of the character of his writing. It is not enough that he has seen the person, as is the proof in this case, write but once, and then under circumstances showing that the attention of the witness was not specially directed to the peculiarities of the penmanship. It would be dangerous, in a criminal case, to rely on such vague and unsatisfactory evidence as the basis of a verdict which will subject the accused to severe punishment and operate as a perpetual brand of infamy on his character.

If the jury are of the opinion that the letter inclosing the draft addressed to Benedict was not written by the defendant, or that the evidence as to that fact leaves it in doubt whether he was the writer, they will inquire whether there are other facts in proof which satisfactorily establish his guilt. Apart from the alleged possession of the draft, there is no evidence that the defendant has been in possession of anything which was taken from the mail. It is stated by one witness, Mr. Faris, that some short time after the receipt of the proceeds of the draft the defendant requested him to change a $50 bank-note on the Merchants and Manufacturers' Bank of Wheeling. And this fact is relied on as sustaining the inference that this was one of the notes remitted by Benedict in the purchase of the draft sent to him by the person calling himself Martin Smith. There is no proof, however, identifying this as one of the notes sent by Benedict. It will, however, be for the jury to give such weight to this evidence as it may be fairly entitled to. If the note exchanged by Faris, at the request of the defendant, was one of the notes sent in Benedict's letter addressed to Smith, it would undoubtedly be a fact strongly implicating the defendant, and which, unexplained, would be sufficient to warrant the inference of his guilt.

As to the fifth count of the indictment, charging defendant with having unlawfully and fraudulently taken Benedict's letter addressed to Martin Smith from the post-office at Beverly, to which it was directed, there seems to be no satisfactory evidence. Indeed, the only fact relied on to establish this charge is that before noticed, namely, that the defendant had the possession of a $50 Wheeling bank-note. For the reason already adverted to, the jury will no doubt hesitate in giving much weight to this fact.

The case is submitted to the jury, with the remark that it will be their duty to give the defendant the benefit of the evidence adduced by him to prove his previous good standing and character in the community in which he lived. Several respectable and intelligent witnesses have testified directly and positively to his good character, and their evidence on the point is not impeached or contradicted. It is also a fact brought to light by the evidence, that some months after this transaction, and when it was made known to the defendant that he was suspected of having stolen from the mail, though then in the distant state of Missouri, he immediately returned to his former residence in Ohio, and courted a full investigation of the charge. This, with the proof of his good character, is entitled to the consideration of the jury, unless the evidence of guilt is so clear as to leave no reasonable doubt in their minds.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. CRUIKSHANK et al.

[1 Woods, 308; [1] 13 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 630.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1874.[2]

CIVIL RIGHTS BILL — INDICTMENT FOR VIOLATION —FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION — RIGHT TO VOTE — INJURIES TO NEGROES—HOW COGNIZABLE.

1. An indictment, under the enforcement act or civil rights bill, for violating civil rights, should state that the offense charged was committed against the person injured by reason of his race, color or previous condition of servitude.

2. A charge that the defendants conspired to injure certain persons of African descent, being citizens of the United States, thereby to prevent them from exercising their rights as citizens, such as the right to peaceably assemble, to bear arms, etc., unless accompanied with an averment that the injury was committed by reason of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of the person conspired against, is not sustainable in the courts of the United States.

3. Congress has power to legislate for the enforcement of any right granted by the constitution; but the power must be exercised according to the nature of the grant or guaranty. If it only be that congress or the legislature of a state shall not pass laws for abridging the right, it is a guaranty against acts of the government only, state or federal, and not against the acts of individuals; and in such case congress has not power to legislate over the subject generally; but only to provide remedies or redress in case the legislature or congress itself (as the case may be) should violate the prohibition. The fourteenth amendment of the constitution does not change the power of congress in this respect.

4. The thirteenth amendment confers upon congress full power to legislate on the subject of slavery, and to pass all laws it may deem proper for its entire eradication in every form. The civil rights act of 1866 was within this power.

[Cited in Le Grand v. U. S., 12 Fed. 581.]

5. That act was intended to give to the colored race the rights of citizenship, and to protect them, as a race, or class, from unfriendly state legislation and from lawless combinations. An injury to a colored person, therefore, is not cognizable by the United States courts under that act, unless inflicted by reason of his race, color or previous condition of servitude. An ordinary crime against a colored person, without having that characteristic, is cognizable only in the state courts.

6. The fifteenth amendment does not confer upon congress the power to regulate the right to vote generally; but only to provide against discrimination on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. Congress, therefore, cannot legislate in reference to any interference with the right to vote, which does not proceed from that cause, unless in elections of senators or representatives. A conspiracy to prevent a colored person from voting is no more a United States offense than a conspiracy to prevent a white person from voting, unless entered into by reason of the voter's race, color or previous condition of servitude.

[Cited in Le Grand v. U. S., 12 Fed. 579; U. S. v. Harris, 106 U. S. 637, 1 Sup. Ct. 607.]

This was an indictment under the enforcement act of May 31, 1870, against [William J. Cruikshank and] nearly one hundred other persons, charging, in the first count, that on the 13th day of April, 1873, at Grant parish, in the state of Louisiana, the defendants unlawfully and feloniously did band together with the unlawful and felonious intent and purpose to injure, oppress, threaten and intimidate one Levi Nelson and one Alexander Tillman, being citizens of the United States of African descent, and persons of color, and in the peace of the state and the United States, with the unlawful and felonious intent thereby to hinder and prevent them in their free exercise and enjoyment of their lawful right and privilege to peaceably assemble together with each other and with other citizens of the United States for a peaceable and lawful purpose, the same being a right and privilege granted or secured to them in common with all other good citizens of the United States, by the constitution and laws of the United States, contrary to the form of the statute, etc. The ninth count repeated the same charge, changing only the words "band together," for the words "conspire together." The seven counts following the first (with the corresponding seven counts following the ninth) charge a conspiracy to injure, oppress, threaten and intimidate the same persons with the intent to prevent and hinder them in the exercise and enjoyment of certain other rights and privileges, namely: in the second count, the right "to keep and bear arms for a lawful purpose;" in the third, with the intent "to deprive them of their lives and liberty of person without due process of law;" in the fourth, the right "to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings enacted by the state or the United States for the security of persons and property, and enjoyed by white citizens;" in the fifth, "the rights, privileges, immunities and protection granted and secured to them as citizens of the United States and of Louisiana, by reason of their race and color, and because they were of African descent, and persons of color;" in the sixth, "the right to vote at any future election, knowing them to be qualified;" in the seventh, "with intent to put them in fear of bodily harm, injure and oppress them, because they had voted at a previous election held in November, 1872;" in the eighth, "every, each, all and singular the several rights and privileges granted or secured to them in common with all good citizens of the United States." The last sixteen counts charged the murder of the same persons in executing the conspiracy. Three of the defendants being convicted on the first sixteen counts of conspiracy only, motion was made in arrest of judgment, and argued by R. H. Marr, E. John Ellis, W. R. Whitaker, and Mr. Bryan, for defendants.

J. R. Beckwith, U. S. Atty., for the United States.

The judges not being agreed, BRADLEY, Circuit Justice, delivered the following opinion in favor of the motion, which was granted accordingly, and the case was certified to the supreme court:

The indictment in this case is founded on the 6th and 7th sections of the act of congress approved May 31, 1870, entitled "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of this Union, and for other purposes." 16 Stat. 140. It contains two distinct series of counts, in one of which the defendants are charged with having unlawfully and feloniously banded or conspired together to intimidate certain persons of African descent (specified by name), and thereby to hinder and prevent them in, and deprive them of, the free exercise and enjoyment of certain supposed constitutional rights and privileges, respectively specified in the several counts of the indictment, such as, in one count, the right peaceably to assemble themselves together; in another, the right to keep and bear arms; in a third, the right to be protected against deprivation of life, liberty and property without due process of law; in a fourth, the right to the full and equal benefit of the laws; in another, the right to vote, etc. The second series or counts charges murder in addition to, and whilst carrying out, the conspiracies charged. Three of the defendants, Cruikshank, Hadnot and Irwin, have been convicted of conspiracy under the first series of counts, which are founded on the sixth section of the act, and now move in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the act is unconstitutional, and that the indictment does not charge any crime under it.

The main ground of objection is that the act is municipal in its character, operating directly on the conduct of individuals, and taking the place of ordinary state legislation; and that there is no constitutional authority for such an act, inasmuch as the state laws furnish adequate remedy for the alleged wrongs committed.

It cannot, of course, be denied that express power is given to congress to enforce by appropriate legislation the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments of the constitution, but it is insisted that this act does not pursue the appropriate mode of doing this. A brief examination of its provisions is necessary more fully to understand the form in which the questions arise. The first section provides that all citizens of the United States, otherwise qualified, shall be allowed to vote at all elections in any state, county, city, township, etc., without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude, any constitution, law, custom or usage of any state or territory to the contrary notwithstanding. This is not quite the converse of the 15th amendment. That amendment does not establish the right of any citizens to vote; it merely declares that race, color or previous condition of servitude shall not exclude them. This is an important distinction, and has a decided bearing on the questions at issue. The second section requires that equal opportunity shall be given to all citizens, without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude, to perform any act required as a prerequisite or qualification for voting, and makes it a penal offense for officers and others to refuse or omit to give such equal opportunity. The third section makes the offer to perform such preparatory act, if not performed by reason of such wrongful act or omission of the officers or others, equivalent to performance; and makes it the duty of inspectors or judges of election, on affidavit of such offer being made, to receive the party's vote; and makes it a penal offense to refuse to do so. These three sections relate to the right secured by the 15th amendment. The fourth section makes it a penal offense for any person, by force, bribery, threats, etc., to hinder or prevent, or to conspire with others to hinder or prevent, any citizen from performing any preparatory act requisite to qualify him to vote, or from voting, at any election. This section does not seem to be based on the 15th amendment, nor to relate to the specific right secured thereby. It extends far beyond the scope of the amendment, as will more fully appear hereafter. The fifth section makes it a penal offense for any person to prevent or attempt to prevent, hinder or intimidate any person from exercising the right of suffrage, to whom it is secured by the 15th amendment, by means of bribery, threats, or threats of depriving of occupation, or of ejecting from lands or tenements, or of refusing to renew a lease, or of violence to such person or his family. The sixth section, under which the first sixteen counts of the indictment are framed, contains two distinct clauses. The first declares that "if two or more persons shall band or conspire together, or go in disguise upon the public highway, or upon the premises of another with intent (to violate any provision of this act), such persons shall be held guilty of felony." Of course this would include conspiracy to prevent any person from voting, or from performing any preparatory act requisite thereto. The next clause has a larger scope. Repeating the introductory and concluding words, it is as follows: "If two or more persons shall band or conspire together, or go in disguise upon the public highway, or upon the premises of another with intent to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised the same, such persons shall be held guilty of felony." Here it is made penal to enter into a conspiracy to injure or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent or hinder his exercise and enjoyment, not merely of the right to vote, but of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the constitution or laws of the United States.

The question is at once suggested, under what clause of the constitution does the power to enact such a law arise? It is undoubtedly a sound proposition, that whenever a right is guarantied by the constitution of the United States, congress has the power to provide for its enforcement, either by implication arising from the correlative duty of government to protect, wherever a right to the citizen is conferred, or under the general power (contained in article 1, § 8, par. 18) "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof." It was on the principle first stated that the fugitive slave law was sustained by the supreme court of the United States. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539. The constitution guarantied the rendition of fugitives held to labor or service in any state, and it was held that congress had, by implication, the power to enforce the guaranty by legislation. "They require," says Justice Story, delivering the opinion of the majority of the court, "the aid of legislation to protect the right, to enforce the delivery, and to secure the subsequent possession of the slave. If, indeed, the constitution guaranties the right, and if it requires the delivery upon the claim of the owner (as cannot well be doubted), the natural inference certainly is, that the national government is clothed with the appropriate authority and functions to enforce it. The fundamental principle applicable to all cases of this sort would seem to be, that where the end is required, the means are given; and, where the duty is enjoined, the ability to perform it is contemplated to exist on the part of the functionaries to whom it is entrusted. The clause is found in the national constitution and not in that of any state. It does not point out any state functionaries, or any state action to carry its provisions into effect. The state, therefore, cannot be compelled to enforce them, etc. The natural if not the necessary conclusion is, that the national government, in the absence of all positive provisions to the contrary, is bound, through its own departments, legislative, judicial, or executive, as the case may require, to carry into effect all the rights and duties imposed upon it by the constitution." To the objection that the power did not fall within the scope of the enumerated powers of legislation confided to congress, Justice Story answers: "Stripped of its artificial and technical structure, the argument comes to this, that, although rights are exclusively secured by, or duties are exclusively imposed upon, the national government, yet, unless the power to enforce these rights or to execute these duties can be found among the express powers of legislation enumerated in the constitution, they remain without any means of giving them effect by any act of congress, and they must operate solely proprio vigore, however defective may be their operation; nay, even although in a practical sense, they may become a nullity from the want of a proper remedy to enforce them, or to provide against their violation. If this be the true interpretation of the constitution, it must, in a great measure, fail to attain many of its avowed and positive objects as a security of rights and a recognition of duties. Such a limited construction of the constitution has never yet been adopted as correct, either in theory or practice." [Prigg v. Pennsylvania] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 618.

It seems to be firmly established by the unanimous opinion of the judges in the above quoted case that congress has power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, every right and privilege given or guarantied by the constitution. The method of enforcement, or the legislation appropriate to that end, will depend upon the character of the right conferred. It may be by the establishment of regulations for attaining the object of the right, the imposition of penalties for its violation or the institution of judicial procedure for its vindication when assailed, or when ignored by the state courts; or it may be by all of these together. One method of enforcement may be applicable to one fundamental right, and not applicable to another. With regard to those acknowledged rights and privileges of the citizen, which form a part of his political inheritance derived from the mother country, and which were challenged and vindicated by centuries of stubborn resistance to arbitrary power, they belong to him as his birthright, and it is the duty of the particular state of which he is a citizen to protect and enforce them, and to do naught to deprive him of their full enjoyment. When any of these rights and privileges are secured in the constitution of the United States only by a declaration that the state or the United States shall not violate or abridge them, it is at once understood that they are not created or conferred by the constitution, but that the constitution only guaranties that they shall not be impaired by the state, or the United States, as the case may be. The fulfillment of this guaranty by the United States is the only duty with which that government is charged. The affirmative enforcement of the rights and privileges themselves, unless something more is expressed, does not devolve upon it, but belongs to the state government as a part of its residuary sovereignty. For example, when it is declared that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, this declaration is not intended as a guaranty against the commission of murder, false imprisonment, robbery, or any other crime committed by individual malefactors, so as to give congress the power to pass laws for the punishment of such crimes in the several states generally. It is a constitutional security against arbitrary and unjust legislation by which a man may be proceeded against in a summary manner and arbitrarily arrested and condemned, without the benefit of those time-honored forms of proceeding in open court and trial by jury, which is the clear right of every freeman, both in the parent country and in this. It is a guaranty of protection against the acts of the state government itself. It is a guaranty against the exertion of arbitrary and tyrannical power on the part of the government and legislature of the state, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses; and the power of congress, whether implied or expressed, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty, does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of ordinary crime within the states. This would be to clothe congress with power to pass laws for the general preservation of social order in every state. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require or authorize congress to perform the duty which the guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the state to perform, and which it requires the state to perform. The duty and power of enforcement take their inception from the moment that the state fails to comply with the duty enjoined, or violates the prohibition imposed. No state may pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts. Does this authorize congress to pass laws for the general enforcement of contracts in the states? Certainly not. But when the state has passed a law which violates the prohibition, congress may provide a remedy. It did so in the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 85] by authorizing an appeal to the supreme court of the United States of all cases where a constitutional or federal right should be denied or overruled in a state court.

Again, "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." But this does not authorize congress to pass a general system of municipal law for the security of person and property, to have effect in the several states for the protection of citizens of other states to whom the fundamental right is guarantied. It only authorizes appropriate and efficient remedies to be provided in case the guaranty is violated. Where affirmative legislation is required to give the citizen the right guarantied, congress may undoubtedly adopt it, as was done in the case of the fugitive slave law and as has been done in later times, to carry into full effect the 13th amendment of the constitution by the passage of the civil rights bill, as will be more fully noted hereafter. But with regard to mere constitutional prohibitions of state interference with established or acknowledged privileges and immunities, the appropriate legislation to enforce such prohibitions is that which may be necessary or proper for furnishing suitable redress when such prohibitions are disregarded or violated. Where no violation is attempted, the interference of congress would be officious, unnecessary, and inappropriate.

The bearing of these observations on the effect of the several recent amendments of the constitution, in conferring legislative powers upon congress, is next to be noticed. The 13th amendment declares that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction, and that congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation. This is not merely a prohibition against the passage or enforcement of any law inflicting or establishing slavery or involuntary servitude, but it is a positive declaration that slavery shall not exist. It prohibits the thing. In the enforcement of this article, therefore, congress has to deal with the subject matter. If an amendment had been adopted that polygamy should not exist within the United States, and a similar power to enforce it had been given as in the case of slavery, congress would certainly have had the power to legislate for the suppression and punishment of polygamy. So, undoubtedly, by the 13th amendment congress has power to legislate for the entire eradication of slavery in the United States. This amendment had an affirmative operation the moment it was adopted. It enfranchised four millions of slaves, if, indeed, they had not previously been enfranchised by the operation of the Civil War. Congress, therefore, acquired the power not only to legislate for the eradication of slavery, but the power to give full effect to this bestowment of liberty on these millions of people. All this it essayed to do by the civil rights bill, passed April 9, 1866 (14 Stat. 27), by which it was declared that all persons born in the United States, and not subject to a foreign power (except Indians, not taxed), should be citizens of the United States; and that such citizens, of every race and color, without any regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, should have the same right in every state and territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and should be subject to like punishment, pains and penalties, and to none other, any law, etc., to the contrary notwithstanding.

It was supposed that the eradication of slavery and involuntary servitude of every form and description required that the slave should be made a citizen and placed on an entire equality before the law with the white citizen, and, therefore, that congress had the power, under the amendment, to declare and effectuate these objects. The form of doing this, by extending the right of citizenship and equality before the law to persons of every race and color (except Indians not taxed and, of course, excepting the white race, whose privileges were adopted as the standard), although it embraced many persons, free colored people and others, who were already citizens in several of the states, was necessary for the purpose of settling a point which had been raised by eminent authority, that none but the white race were entitled to the rights of citizenship in this country. As disability to be a citizen and enjoy equal rights was deemed one form or badge of servitude, it was supposed that congress had the power, under the amendment, to settle this point of doubt, and place the other races on the same plane of privilege as that occupied by the white race.

Conceding this to be true (which I think it is), congress then had the right to go further and to enforce its declaration by passing laws for the prosecution and punishment of those who should deprive, or attempt to deprive, any person of the rights thus conferred upon him. Without having this power, congress could not enforce the amendment. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that congress had the power to make it a penal offense to conspire to deprive a person of, or to hinder him in, the exercise and enjoyment of the rights and privileges conferred by the 13th amendment and the laws thus passed in pursuance thereof. But this power does not authorize congress to pass laws for the punishment of ordinary crimes and offenses against persons of the colored race or any other race. That belongs to the state government alone. All ordinary murders, robberies, assaults, thefts, and offenses whatsoever are cognizable only in the state courts, unless, indeed, the state should deny to the class of persons referred to the equal protection of the laws. Then, of course, congress could provide remedies for their security and protection. But, in ordinary cases, where the laws of the state are not obnoxious to the provisions of the amendment, the duty of congress in the creation and punishment of offenses is limited to those offenses which aim at the deprivation of the colored citizen's enjoyment and exercise of his rights of citizenship and of equal protection of the laws because of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude. To illustrate: If in a community or neighborhood composed principally of whites, a citizen of African descent, or of the Indian race, not within the exception of the amendment, should propose to lease and cultivate a farm, and a combination should be formed to expel him and prevent him from the accomplishment of his purpose on account of his race or color, it cannot be doubted that this would be a case within the power of congress to remedy and redress. It would be a case of interference with that person's exercise of his equal rights as a citizen because of his race. But if that person should be injured in his person or property by any wrongdoer for the mere felonious or wrongful purpose of malice, revenge, hatred, or gain, without any design to interfere with his rights of citizenship or equality before the laws, as being a person of a different race and color from the white race, it would be an ordinary crime, punishable by the state laws only. To constitute an offense, therefore, of which congress and the courts of the United States have a right to take cognizance under this amendment, there must be a design to injure a person, or deprive him of his equal right of enjoying the protection of the laws, by reason of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Otherwise it is a case exclusively within the jurisdiction of the state and its courts.

I will next consider the effect of the 15th amendment, to enforce which the law under consideration was primarily framed. The amendment declares that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and power is given to congress to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation. Although negative in form, and therefore, at first view, apparently to be governed by the rule that congress has no duty to perform until the state has violated its provisions, nevertheless in substance, it confers a positive right which did not exist before. The language is peculiar. It is composed of two negatives. The right shall not be denied. That is, the right shall be enjoyed; the right, namely, to be exempt from the disability of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, as respects the right to vote. In terms it has a general application to all, but the history of the events out of which the amendment grew shows that it was principally intended to confer upon colored citizens the right of suffrage. The majority of the court in the recent Slaughter-house Cases, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 81, say: "In the light of the history of these amendments, and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause." (Speaking of that clause in the 14th amendment which prohibits the states from denying to any person within its jurisdiction, the equal protection of the laws.) "The existence of laws in the states where the newly emancipated negroes existed, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden. * * * We doubt very much whether any action of a state not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision." Whether this suggestion of the court, that the recent amendments were intended for the benefit of the African race alone, be accepted or not, it is manifest that the 15th amendment was primarily and principally intended for their benefit, and that it does have the affirmative effect before stated of conferring upon them an equal right to vote with that enjoyed by white citizens. It was, in fact, a constitutional extension of the civil rights bill passed in 1866, conferring upon the emancipated slave (as well as all persons of his race) another specific right in addition to those enumerated in that bill; and it is to be interpreted on the same general principles. But whilst the amendment has the effect adverted to, it must be remembered that the right conferred and guarantied is not an absolute, but a relative one. It does not confer the right to vote. That is the prerogative of the state laws. It only confers a right not to be excluded from voting by reason of race, color or previous condition of servitude, and this is all the right that congress can enforce. It confers upon citizens of the African race the same right to vote as white citizens possess. It makes them equal. This is the whole scope of the amendment. The powers of congress, therefore, are confined within this scope. The amendment does not confer upon congress any power to regulate elections or the right of voting where it did not have that power before, except in the particular matter specified. It does, however, confer upon congress the right of enforcing the prohibition imposed against excluding citizens of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before the amendment congress had the power to regulate elections and the right of voting in the District of Columbia and in the territories, and to regulate (by altering any regulations made by the state) the time, place and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives in the several states. It has that power still, subject to the prohibition of the amendment. Also, before the amendment, the states had the power to regulate all state elections and the right of voting therein. They have that power still, subject to the prohibition of the amendment and the right of congress to enforce it. Congress has not acquired any additional right to regulate the latter elections, or the right of voting therein, which it did not possess before, except the power to enforce the prohibition imposed on the states, and the equal right acquired by all races and colors to vote.

The manner in which the prohibition (or the equal right to vote) may be enforced is, of course, the question of principal interest in this inquiry. When the right of citizens of the United States to vote is denied or abridged by a state on account of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude, either by withholding the right itself or the remedies which are given to other citizens to enforce it, then, undoubtedly, congress has the power to pass laws to directly enforce the right and punish individuals for its violation, because that would be the only appropriate and efficient mode of enforcing the amendment. Congress cannot, with any propriety, or to any good purpose, pass laws forbidding the state legislature to deny or abridge the right, nor declaring void any state legislation adopted for that end. The prohibition is already in the constitutional amendment, and laws in violation of it are absolutely void by virtue of that prohibition. So far as relates to rendering null and void the obnoxious law, it is done already; but that does not help the person entitled to vote. By the supposition the state law gives him no remedy and no redress. It is clear, therefore, that the only practical way in which congress can enforce the amendment is by itself giving a remedy and giving redress. If the party should be sued in the state court for attempting to exercise his right, of course the appeal to the supreme court of the United States, given by the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act, would be all the remedy he would need; but it would be entirely inefficient in securing to him the actual exercise of his right to vote.

But suppose that the laws of the state are in harmony with the amendment, at least contain nothing repugnant thereto; has congress the power to pass laws concurrently with the state to enforce the right of every race and color, without regard to the previous condition of servitude, to an equality in the right to vote? There is no essential incongruity in the coexistence of concurrent laws, state and federal, for the punishment of the same unlawful acts as offenses both against the laws of the state and the laws of the United States. Robbery of the mails, counterfeiting the coin, assaults upon a United States marshal or other officer while in the performance of his duty, and many other cases of like nature, will readily suggest themselves. Moore v. Illinois, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 20. Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court in the case cited, says: "Every citizen of the United States is also a citizen of a state or territory. He may be said to owe allegiance to two sovereigns, and may be liable to punishment for an infraction of the laws of either. The same act may be an offense or transgression of the laws of both. Thus, an assault upon the marshal of the United States, and hindering him in the execution of legal process, is a high offense against the United States, for which the perpetrator is liable to punishment; and the same act may be also a gross breach of the peace of the state, a riot, assault, or a murder, and subject the same person to a punishment, under the state laws, for a misdemeanor or felony. That either or both may (if they see fit) punish such an offender cannot be doubted."

The real difficulty in the present case is to determine whether the amendment has given to congress any power to legislate except to furnish redress in cases where the states violate the amendment. Considering, as before intimated, that the amendment, notwithstanding its negative form, substantially guaranties the equal right to vote to citizens of every race and color, I am inclined to the opinion that congress has the power to secure that right not only as against the unfriendly operation of state laws, but against outrage, violence, and combinations on the part of individuals, irrespective of the state laws. Such was the opinion of congress itself in passing the law at a time when many of its members were the same who had consulted upon the original form of the amendment in proposing it to the states. And as such a construction of the amendment is admissible, and the question is one at least of grave doubt, it would be assuming a great deal for this court to decide the law, to the extent indicated, unconstitutional. But the limitations which are prescribed by the amendment must not be lost sight of. It is not the right to vote which is guarantied to all citizens. Congress cannot interfere with the regulation of that right by the states except to prevent by appropriate legislation any distinction as to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The state may establish any other conditions and discriminations it pleases, whether as to age, sex, property, education, or anything else. Congress, so far as the 15th amendment is concerned, is limited to the one subject of discrimination—on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. It can regulate as to nothing else. No interference with a person's right to vote, unless made on account of his race, color or previous condition of servitude, is subject to congressional animadversion. There may be a conspiracy to prevent persons from voting having no reference to this discrimination. It may include whites as well as blacks, or may be confined altogether to the latter. It may have reference to the particular politics of the parties. All such conspiracies are amenable to the state laws alone. To bring them within the scope of the amendment and of the powers of congress they must have for motive the race, color or previous condition of servitude of the party whose right is assailed.

According to my view the law on the subject may be generalized in the following proposition: The war of race, whether it assumes the dimensions of civil strife or domestic violence, whether carried on in a guerrilla or predatory form, or by private combinations, or even by private outrage or intimidation, is subject to the jurisdiction of the government of the United States; and when any atrocity is committed which may be assigned to this cause it may be punished by the laws and in the courts of the United States; but any outrages, atrocities, or conspiracies, whether against the colored race or the white race, which do not flow from this cause, but spring from the ordinary felonious or criminal intent which prompts to such unlawful acts, are not within the jurisdiction of the United States, but within the sole jurisdiction of the states, unless, indeed, the state, by its laws, denies to any particular race equality of rights, in which case the government of the United States may furnish remedy and redress to the fullest extent and in the most direct manner. Unless this distinction be made we are driven to one of two extremes—either that congress can never interfere where the state laws are unobjectionable, however remiss the state authorties may be in executing them, and however much a proscribed race may be oppressed; or that congress may pass an entire body of municipal law for the protection of person and property within the states, to operate concurrently with the state laws, for the protection and benefit of a particular class of the community. This fundamental principle, I think, applies to both the 13th and 15th amendments.

After what has been said, a few observations will suffice as to the effect of the 14th amendment, upon the questions under consideration. It is claimed that, by this amendment, congress is empowered to pass laws for directly enforcing all privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States by original proceedings in the courts of the United States, because it provides, amongst other things, that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and because it gives congress power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. If the power to enforce the amendment were equivalent to the power to legislate generally on the subject matter of the privileges and immunities referred to, this would be a legitimate conclusion. But, as before intimated, that subject matter may consist of rights and privileges not derived from the grants of the constitution, but from those inherited privileges which belong to every citizen, as his birthright, or from that body of natural rights which are recognized and regarded as sacred in all free governments; and the only manner in which the constitution recognizes them may be in a prohibition against the government of the United States, or the state governments, interfering with them. It is obvious, therefore, that the manner of enforcing the provisions of this amendment will depend upon the character of the privilege or immunity in question. If simply prohibitory of governmental action there will be nothing to enforce until such action is undertaken. How can a prohibition, in the nature of things, be enforced until it is violated? Laws may be passed in advance to meet the contingency of a violation, but they can have no application until it occurs. On the other hand, when the provision is violated by the passage of an obnoxious law, such law is clearly void, and all acts done under it will be trespasses. The legislation required from congress, therefore, is such as will provide a preventive or compensatory remedy or due punishment for such trespasses; and appeals from the state courts to the United States courts in cases that come up for adjudication. If these views are correct, there can be no constitutional legislation of congress for directly enforcing the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States by original proceedings in the courts of the United States, where the only constitutional guaranty of such privileges and immunities is, that no state shall pass any law to abridge them, and where the state has passed no laws adverse to them, but, on the contrary, has passed laws to sustain and enforce them.

I will now proceed to examine the several counts in the indictment, and endeavor to test their validity by the principles which have been laid down. These have been so fully enunciated and explained, that a very brief examination of the counts will suffice.

The first count is for a conspiracy to interfere with the right "to peaceably assemble together with each other, and with other citizens, for a peaceable and lawful purpose." This right is guarantied in the first amendment to the constitution, which declares that "congress shall make no law abridging the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." Does this disaffirmance of the power of congress to prevent the assembling of the people amount to an affirmative power to punish individuals for disturbing assemblies? This would be a strange inference. That is the prerogative of the states. It belongs to the preservation of the public peace and the fundamental rights of the people. The people of the states do not ask congress to protect the right, but demand that it shall not interfere with it. Has anything since occurred to give congress legislative power over the subject matter? The 14th amendment declares that no state shall by law abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Grant that this prohibition now prevents the states from interfering with the right to assemble, as being one of such privileges and immunities, still, does it give congress power to legislate over the subject? Power to enforce the amendment is all that is given to congress. If the amendment is not violated, it has no power over the subject.

The second count, which is for a conspiracy to interfere with certain citizens in their right to bear arms, is open to the same criticism as the first.

The third count charges a conspiracy to deprive certain citizens of African descent of their lives and liberties without due process of law. Every murderer and robber does this. Congress surely is not vested with power to legislate for the suppression and punishment of all murders, robberies, and assaults committed within the states. In none of these counts is there any averment that the state had, by its laws, interfered with any of the rights referred to, or that it had attempted to deprive the citizens of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or that it did not afford to all the equal protection of the laws. The third count cannot be sustained.

The fourth count charges a conspiracy to deprive certain colored citizens of African descent, of the free exercise and enjoyment of the right and privilege to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property which is enjoyed by the white citizens. The right and privilege to interfere with the exercise of which is here alleged to have been the object of the conspiracy is not contained in the constitution in express terms. The 14th amendment, amongst other things, declares that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. But the indictment does not allege that this has been done. The count manifestly refers to the rights secured by the civil rights bill of April 9, 1866, which has already been referred to. That act, as we have seen, expressly declares that all citizens of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, shall have the same right in every state and territory to make and enforce contracts, etc., and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens. The conspiracy charged in the fourth count is a conspiracy to interfere with the free exercise and enjoyment of this right. But the count does not contain any allegation that the defendants committed the acts complained of with a design to deprive the injured persons of their rights on account of their race, color or previous condition of servitude. This, as we have seen, is an essential ingredient in the crime to bring it within the cognizance of the United States authorities. Perhaps such a design may be inferred from the allegation that the persons injured were of the African race, and that the intent was to deprive them of the exercise and enjoyment of the rights enjoyed by white citizens. But it ought not to have been left to inference; it should have been alleged. On this ground, therefore, I think this count is defective and cannot be sustained.

It is also defective on account of the vagueness and generality of the charge—"to prevent and hinder (them) in the free exercise and enjoyment of their several and respective right and privilege to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings then and there enacted," etc. It seems to me that such a general and sweeping charge, without any specification of any laws or proceedings, does not amount to the averment of a criminal act. It is not merely informal, it is insufficient.

The fifth and eighth counts are open to the same objection of vagueness and generality as the fourth, and for that reason neither of them can, in my judgment, be sustained.

The sixth count charges a conspiracy to prevent and hinder certain citizens of the United States, who were of African descent and persons of color, in the exercise and enjoyment of their right to vote at any election to be thereafter held in the state of Louisiana, or in the parish of Grant, knowing they had such right to vote. A conspiracy to hinder a person from exercising his right to vote at any election is made indictable by the fourth section of the enforcement act; also by the sixth section, read in connection with the first. Over the general subject of the right to vote in the states, and the regulation of said right, congress, as we have seen, has no power to legislate. The fifteenth amendment relates only to discriminations on account of race, color and previous condition of servitude, and, as we have before shown, is a prohibition against the making of such discriminations. The law on which this count is founded is not confined to cases of discrimination above referred to. It is general and universal in its application. Such a law is not supported by the constitution. The charge contained in the count does not describe a criminal offense known to any valid and constitutional law of the United States. It should, at least, have been shown that the conspiracy was entered into to deprive the injured persons of their right to vote by reason of their race, color or previous condition of servitude. This count I also regard as invalid.

The seventh count charges a conspiracy to injure and oppress certain colored citizens of African descent because, being duly qualified to vote, they had exercised their right to do so, and had voted at the election held in Louisiana, in November, 1872, and at other times. This count is subject to the same objection as the last, and is invalid for the same reason.

The next eight counts on which the verdict was found are literal copies, respectively, of the first eight, so far as relates to the language on which their validity depends. The same observations apply to them which apply to the first eight.

In my opinion the motion in arrest of judgment must be granted.

[NOTE. The order arresting the judgment in conformity with the above opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley was affirmed by the supreme court, where it was carried on writ of error and certificate of division. 92 U. S. 542.]

Case No. 14,898.

UNITED STATES v. The CUBA.

[2 Hughes, 489; [1] 2 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 121; 10 Int. Rev. Rec. 115; 2 Balt. Law Trans. 743.]

District Court, D. Maryland. 1869.

CUSTOMS—FORFEITURE—LANDING WITHOUT PERMIT.

A vessel is liable under section 50 of act of 1799 [1 Stat. 665], relating to customs revenues, to forfeiture for the landing without permit of merchandise over the value of four hundred dollars, whether the owner is innocent or not.

[This is a libel on information for the forfeiture of the vessel and tackle under the act of 1799, on the charge of some 45,000 cigars having been landed without permit. There seemed to be no dispute as to the fact that one of the steamer's engineers, (named A. B. Hanna, who afterwards testified against the vessel,) had made an arrangement with a New York man, named Clarke, to run in cigars duty free, and that the cigars in question, valued at over $400, were being smuggled under this contract, no evidence of any complicity of the owners of the vessel appearing. The act of 1799 renders the parties knowingly offending liable to a fine, &c., and the vessel and tackle liable to forfeiture should merchandise amounting to over $400 be landed without permit from the custom house by any person on board such vessel. The act of 1866 [14 Stat. 178], provides another and different penalty for knowingly importing merchandise contrary to law against the parties actually offending, and says nothing of a forfeiture of the vessel. Thereupon the defense contend that the act of 1866 embraces the offence in question and is a substitute for that portion of the act of 1799, and repealing the same by implication, relieves the vessel in this case from the penalty therein contained.

[Considerable stress was laid upon the hardship which would be worked upon innocent ship owners by making them liable under the act of 1799, for the frauds of parties over whom they have no control and against which they cannot protect themselves.] [2]

GILES, District Judge. This is a libel upon information on the instance side of the court to forfeit the steamship Cuba, her tackle, furniture, etc. The libel was originally laid under the provisions of the 50th section of the act of 1799, and was subsequently amended by counts under the 24th and 27th sections of the same act. The district attorney, however, abandoned the amendment, and in the argument only relied on the original count. There is no evidence to sustain the allegations under the 27th section, and the 24th section is apparently superseded by the 4th section of the act of 1866, and not having been relied upon by the district attorney, will not be considered further.

The question then for the court to determine is whether a forfeiture of the vessel can be had under the allegations of the first count, based upon the 50th section of the act of 1799. This section provides that no goods or merchandise brought from foreign ports shall be landed at night, or without the authority of the proper officers of the court, and should goods be so landed in contravention of the act, the captain of the vessel, whether he has knowledge of the offence or not, is made liable to a penalty of a fine of $400, and all others knowingly assisting therein are punishable by a fine of the same sum; and should the goods so landed amount at their highest market rate to over the value of $400, the section renders the vessel, etc., liable to forfeiture. It is proved that during the year 1868 the steamship Cuba was a regular trader between the ports of Baltimore, New Orleans, and Havana. She had been built or purchased by some of the most respectable and enterprising citizens of this port, and placed upon the route for the public-spirited purpose of building up this trade. Being so engaged, between the 1st January, 1868, and the 1st of January, 1869, on some four or five trips some 45,000 cigars from Havana were secretly landed by the first engineer of the steamer, a portion of them being delivered in New Orleans and the balance here in contravention of the 50th section of the act of 1799; the captain and first officer of the steamer, her owners and directors having no knowledge of the transaction, and being perfectly innocent of any complicity therein. If this vessel is liable it is a very hard case upon them, for it is perfectly clear that no human prudence or skill can guard against the landing of merchandise as small in bulk as the value of $400 in Havana cigars. This is manifest from the circumstances of this very case. When the lynx-eyed officer of the customs boarded the vessel off Annapolis, suspecting and for the purpose of detecting this very fraud, with all his search and exertion he failed to find some four thousand cigars which the engineer then had on board, and subsequently brought out from their hiding place, landed and shipped to his confederate in New York. In the present state of the navigation, in the brief time of the rapid trips of steamers, it is impossible to prevent such frauds. With the hardship of the law, however, the court has nothing to do; its duty is only to declare and enforce the law as made; the making of laws and the remission of penalties therein imposed belong to other departments of the government.

In the very able arguments of counsel for the claimants, the court understood them to contend that the 50th section of the act of 1799 was repealed by implication by the 4th section of the act of 1866. There are one or two plain rules recognized by courts for the construction of statutes which are applicable to this case. Repeals by implication are never favored, particularly as applied to statutes designed for the enforcement of the revenue laws of the government [U. S. v. 67 Packages of Dry Goods] 17 How. [58 U. S.] 85; [Sinnot v. Davenport] 22 How. [63 U. S.] 229; U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils [Case No. 15,924]. A statute is never repealed by implication if the prior and subsequent statutes can be so construed as to stand together [Wood v. U. S.] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342. The implication must be one of necessity, and it is not sufficient that the two acts should relate to the same subject-matter, there must be a positive repugnancy between them, and even then the appeal is only pro tanto of the prior statute as cannot stand together with the subsequent act. All laws for the collection of revenue are to be construed as auxiliary and cumulative, except when otherwise expressly provided therein. [McCool v. Smith] 1 Black [66 U. S.] 459; Aspden's Estate [Case No. 589]; [Lessee of Croghan v. Nelson] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 187; Morlot v. Lawrence [Case No. 9,815]; U. S. v. Smith [Id. 16,319]. The case last cited is very similar to the one before me. The object of the law in both was to prevent smuggling, and it was there contended that the act of 1842 [5 Stat. 548] repealed by implication the act of 1832 [4 Stat. 583], but the court decided there was no repeal, the last act covering some but not all the ground of the first act.

To look at the acts, the 50th section of the act of 1799 inflicts a penalty upon the master whether he had knowledge or not, a penalty imposed by the government to secure extreme caution and vigilance upon his part, and where the goods landed should amount to $400 in value, provides for the forfeiture of the vessel. The act of 1866, section 4, upon which Mr. Brune so ably commented, like section 19 in the act of 1842, imposes a penalty upon those who knowingly import goods contrary to law, the forfeiture of the goods imported, a fine of from $50 to $5000, and imprisonment for not more than two years. A party cannot be convicted under this section unless he has knowingly and wilfully engaged in the forbidden transaction, and so this act does not cover the same ground as the act of 1799, which provides against the handling of goods by night or without the permit of the collector and naval officer of the port. The acts do not cover the same ground nor the same offence, and consequently there is no repeal by implication.

It might have been urged, though the point was not raised, that under the 8th section of the act of 1866, providing that in any case where a vessel, or the owner, master, or manager of a vessel, shall be subject to a penalty for violation of the revenue laws of the United States, such vessel shall be holden for such penalty, etc., that the steamer in this case can only be held for the penalty against the landing of the cigars (some $2000), and though the court at first thought such to be the case, upon careful examination of the section by the lights of the rules before laid down, I am of opinion that this statute can stand, and that there is double remedy given, and this section can apply where the value of the goods landed is under $400, and that when over that amount the government can elect whether to pursue one or the other remedy, and the court is bound to so construe it, though if it could have seen its way it would take pleasure in clearing the vessel under the circumstances of this case. There is, however, a provision in the act of 1866 (section 18) which has escaped the attention of the counsel on both sides, and which disposes of the whole question of repeal by implication. The 18th section enacts that "nothing in this act contained shall be taken to abridge or limit any forfeiture, penalty, fine, liability, or remedy provided for or arising under any law now in force, except as herein otherwise especially provided." This cuts out by the roots the doctrine of repeal by implication, and clears the case from all difficulty. I have, therefore, nothing left to do but to enforce the law; and as it is perfectly clear that the cigars were not on the manifest, and were landed without permit, I shall sign a decree for the condemnation of the vessel, etc. As the vessel has been taken out on stipulations, I shall order them paid within twenty days.

Case No. 14,899.

UNITED STATES v. CULLERTON et al.

[8 Biss. 166;[1] 24 Int. Rev. Rec. 68.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Feb. 1878.

INTERNAL REVENUE — ACTION UPON BOND — SENTENCE AS A BAR — PARDON.

1. Where a distiller is indicted for violation of the internal revenue laws, his conviction and sentence for such violations is not a bar to such action, unless the sentence is actually fulfilled—if a fine by payment, and if imprisonment, by serving out the term.

2. A pardon is an effectual satisfaction of such sentence, and also operates as a complete release of the sureties on the bond from all liability for the same acts or breaches of duty charged in the indictment.

This is an action of debt upon a bond given by the defendants [Edward F. Cullerton and others] conditioned for the faithful performance by defendant Cullerton of his duties in the office of internal revenue gauger for the First collection district of this state, to which he had been duly appointed. The bond bears date the 23d day of December, 1874. Ten breaches of this bond are assigned in the declaration:

[1. That on the 1st day of February, 1875, while Cullerton, as such gauger, was assigned to duty at the distillery of Dickinson, Leach and Co., he permitted a large quantity of spirits, produced at said distillery, to wit: ten thousand proof gallons to be removed to some place other than the distillery warehouse, without payment of the tax thereon imposed, whereby the United States was defrauded of said tax.

[2. That on the 10th day of February, 1875, while acting as such gauger and while assigned for duty at said distillery, said Cullerton did conspire with said Dickinson, Leach and others to defraud the United States of the tax on a large quantity of spirits produced at said distillery, by means of which conspiracy a large quantity of said spirits were removed from said distillery without payment of the tax, whereby the United States was defrauded of the tax imposed by law on said spirits.

[3. That on the 1st day of March, 1875, while said Cullerton was assigned to duty at said distillery as such gauger, said Dickinson and others did unlawfully remove therefrom a large quantity, to wit: ten thousand gallons of spirits, produced at said distillery, without payment of the tax thereon; and that Cullerton had knowledge of such removal, and failed and neglected to report such removal to the collector of internal revenue for said district, whereby the tax on said spirits was wholly lost to the United States.

[4. That on the 10th day of March, 1875, while Cullerton was assigned to duty as such gauger at said distillery, said Dickinson and others unlawfully removed a large quantity of spirits from said distillery without payment of tax, to wit: ten thousand gallons; and that, although Cullerton had knowledge of the intended removal and eloigning of said spirits from said distillery, he omitted to give notice thereof to the collector of said district, whereby, etc.

[5. That on the 20th day of February, 1875, while Cullerton was assigned to duty as such gauger at said distillery, a large quantity, to wit: ten thousand gallons of spirits were removed from said distillery without payment of the tax, by and with the connivance and collusion of said Cullerton, whereby the United States were defrauded, etc.

[6. That on the 1st day of April, 1875, while assigned to do duty as such gauger at the distillery of the Illinois Distilling Company, he did permit divers persons to remove from said distillery a large quantity, to wit: ten thousand gallons of spirits there produced without payment of the tax imposed thereon, whereby, etc.

[The seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth breaches are like the second, third, fourth, and fifth, with the exception that they charge the spirits to have been removed from the distillery of the Illinois Distilling Company.] [2]

To this the defendants plead two special pleas:

First—That on the 11th of February, 1876, Cullerton was indicted by the grand jury of the district court of this district for the same identical acts of misconduct assigned in said declaration as breaches of said bond. That he was afterwards duly arraigned in said court and pleaded "Not guilty" to said indictment, and afterwards, to-wit: on the 12th day of June, 1876, he was duly tried on said indictment before said court and a jury, and by the verdict of said jury found "Guilty" on the fourth count of said indictment and "Not guilty" as to all the other counts and charges therein. On which verdict said court, afterwards, to-wit: on the 21st day of July, 1876, gave judgment and sentenced said Cullerton to pay a fine of one thousand dollars, and to be imprisoned in the jail of Cook county, Illinois, for the term of six months, and to pay the costs of said prosecution—which said judgment has not been reversed, etc.

Second—That after the trial, conviction, and sentence of said Cullerton as set forth in the first special plea, to-wit: on the 3d day of August, 1876, the president of the United States wholly pardoned and released said Cullerton from the offenses, causes of action and penalties alleged in the said several breaches in said declaration on condition that said Cullerton would pay the said fine of one thousand dollars and the costs of said prosecution. And avers that said Cullerton duly accepted said pardon, and paid said fine and costs long before the commencement of this suit.

To these two pleas the district attorney filed a general demurrer.

Mark Bangs, U. S. Dist. Atty.
C. H. Reed, for defendants.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The only question is, whether these two pleas present an answer to the action.

The first plea of indictment, trial, conviction and sentence for the same offenses under the criminal clauses of the statute prescribing the duties and punishments of officers of the internal revenue department, raises the question whether the government can have a remedy upon the officer's bond after prosecuting and convicting him criminally.

I take it that there can be no doubt but that an acquittal under a criminal proceeding would be a bar to an action on the bond for damages for the same breaches of duty charged in the indictment. So that it is only necessary to ask whether the conviction for neglect of duty under the fourth count of the indictment is a bar to this suit for damages on the bond for the same negligence —the plea containing apt averments that the breaches for negligence assigned in this suit are the same as charged in the fourth count of the indictment.

A reference to the indictment pleaded in this case shows that it was based upon section 3169 of the Revised Statutes, and the acts of misconduct alleged in the declaration are substantially the same for which penalties are provided in this section.

The section reads as follows:

"Every officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States—

"First—Who is guilty of any extortion or willful oppression under color of law; or, second—Who knowingly demands other or greater sums than are authorized by law, or receives any fee, compensation, or reward, except as by law prescribed, for the performance of any duty; or, third—Who willfully neglects to perform any of the duties enjoined on him by law; or, fourth—Who conspires or colludes with any other person to defraud the United States; or, fifth—Who makes opportunity for any person to defraud the United States; or, sixth—Who does or omits to do any act with intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States; or, seventh—Who negligently or designedly permits any violation of the law by any other person; or, eighth—Who makes or signs any false entry in any book, or makes or signs any false certificate or return, in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make any entry, certificate or return; or, ninth—Who, having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States, under any revenue law, fails to report, in writing, such knowledge or information to his next superior officer and to the commissioner of internal revenue; or, tenth—Who demands or accepts, or attempts to collect, directly or indirectly, as payment or gift, or otherwise, any sum of money or other thing of value for the compromise, adjustment, or settlement of any charge or complaint for any violation or alleged violation of law, except as expressly authorized by law so to do, shall be dismissed from office, and shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than one thousand dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. The court shall also render judgment against the said officer or agent for the amount of damages sustained in favor of the party injured, to be collected by execution. One-half of the fine so imposed shall be for the use of the United States, and the other half for the use of the informer, who shall be ascertained by the judgment of the court."

It will be seen that under this law the court is required to render judgment against the officer or agent for the amount of damages sustained in favor of the party injured, to be collected by execution.

Every gauger is required by law (section 3156) to give bond in a penal sum not less than five thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties under the law and regulations. And I am of opinion that it is not a good plea to a suit on this bond to allege an indictment, conviction and sentence under section 3169, or any other section prescribing penalties for violation of duty as such officer, unless there is an averment of satisfaction of the judgment. If a fine, by payment—if imprisonment, by serving out the term of sentence.

If the government elects in case of breach of duty to prosecute its dishonest officer by indictment instead of proceeding on the bond for damages, and obtains a conviction and satisfaction of the judgment, I think it would be barred from proceeding on the bond for the same delinquencies; but until the judgment in the criminal proceeding is satisfied, I think the intent of the law would be to reserve to the government the right of action on the bond for the damages.

It may be true, as contended in the argument, that where a statute provides a remedy by indictment and also by a civil action in behalf of the government against an officer for violation or neglect of duty, and the government proceeds by indictment, that this is a bar to the civil suit. But this statute is peculiar and I think it was the evident intention of congress that an officer violating its provisions should be liable criminally and civilly, or at least, that his civil liability should not be discharged until he had satisfied whatever judgment might be rendered against him in a criminal proceeding.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the demurrer to the first special plea is well taken.

The second plea alleges an executive pardon after conviction on the fourth count of the indictment, and the plea avers the conviction and judgment to have been for the same identical acts of misconduct charged as breaches of the bond.

"A pardon in a legal sense is a remission of guilt." 1 Bish. Cr. Law, 898.

Lord Coke says: "A pardon is a work of mercy, whereby the king either before attainder, sentence or conviction, or after, forgiveth any crime, offense, punishment, execution, right, title, debt, or duty, temporal or ecclesiastical." 3 Inst. 233.

"A pardon is an act of grace proceeding from the power intrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual on whom it is bestowed from the punishment the law inflicts for the crime he has committed." Per Marshall, C. J., U. S. v. Wilson, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 160.

"The effect of a full pardon is to absolve the party from all the legal consequences of his crime, and of his conviction, direct and collateral, including the punishment, whether of imprisonment, pecuniary penalty, or whatever else the law has provided." 1 Bish. Cr. Law, 916.

In Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 380, the supreme court of the United States says: "A pardon extends to every offense known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment."

"A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender; and when the pardon is full, it releases the punishment, and blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense. If granted before conviction, it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching. If granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to his civil rights; it makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new credit and capacity."

So, Blackstone says: "The effect of a pardon is to make the offender a new man; to acquit him of all corporal penalties and forfeitures annexed to the offense for which he obtains his pardon, and not so much to restore his former as to give him a new credit and capacity." 4 Black. 402.

One of the "legal consequences" of the violations of duty charged in this declaration is the liability to an action on this officer's bond, which he had given for the faithful performance of his duty; and I apprehend there is hardly room for a doubt that a full pardon —and the pardon here pleaded, when accepted and its conditions complied with, is a full pardon—releases its recipient from all the penalties attached to his offense. He is legally excused, and the offense wiped out against him.

It can hardly require argument to prove that if the executive has by the pardon pleaded remitted the legal consequence of Cullerton's official derelictions, no suit can be maintained against him or his sureties for those derelictions. All the remedies of the government against him, both on his bond and by indictment, are released, and he stands purged of these offenses as fully as if the offenses had not been committed.

The law goes so far as to hold that the right of a private person to a share of a penalty by reason of his being an informer, or having instituted a prosecution under a penal law, is released by a pardon unless actually vested by judgment. Holliday v. People, 5 Gilman, 214; Cope v. Com., 4 Casey [28 Pa. St.] 297; Com. v. Denniston, 9 Watts, 142.

The case of U. S. v. McKee [Case No. 15,688], lately tried in St. Louis before the United States circuit court for the Eastern district of Missouri, Mr. Justice Miller presiding, was almost precisely parallel to this in its main facts, and there the pleas of former conviction and punishment and of pardon were held to be a complete answer to a suit for the same offenses.

In the case at bar the plea avers that the misconduct alleged in the declaration is the same as that for which the defendant Cullerton had been convicted, and for which he had been pardoned. The government may, of course, take issue on this averment, and if the offenses for which this officer was pardoned are not the same as those alleged in the declaration, perhaps this suit may be maintained. It may be that when the government has proceeded against an officer by indictment for misfeasance, malfeasance or nonfeasance in his official duty, the presumption would be that all his official derelictions up to the time of the finding of the indictment had been charged, and that it could not afterwards indict or sue for acts committed prior to the indictment when a judgment had been given adverse to the government, or when it had obtained a conviction and satisfaction; but the question does not arise and need not be decided at this time.

The demurrer is sustained as to the first plea, and overruled as to the second.

Case No. 14,900.

UNITED STATES v. CUMMINGS.

[3 Pittsb. Leg. J. 29.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. May 8, 1855.

MAIL ROBBERY — INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—TRIAL.

[This was an indictment against Henry Cummings, charging him with robbing the mail.] The indictment being read to the prisoner, he plead "not guilty." This case was set down for the previous term, but a continuance was granted, the defendant alleging that he was not prepared to go to trial, owing to the absence of important witnesses.

The jury is composed of the gentlemen named below: (1) George Conner, (2) Alex. Mestergedd, (3) Wm. M. Barrow, (4) John Scott, (5) Levi Colvin, (6) J. A. Patterson, (7) Thos. Brownfield, (8) Hugh McKee, (9) John Long, (10) Wm. H. Blair, (11) A. S. Davis, (12) John Rogers.

Charles Shaler, for the Government.

Samuel W. Black, J. Bowman Sweitzer, and John H. Hampton, for the prisoner.

Cummings is a robust, healthy-looking man, and has a fine appearance. He is apparently about thirty-five years of age.

The charge on which he is arraigned is as follows, as stated by Judge Shaler in opening the case: About the middle of June, 1854, a gentleman named Oliver Judd, residing in the town of Monterey, Massachusetts, put a letter containing two $50 notes on the Mahaiwe Bank, same state, into the post office at that place, addressed to Nathaniel Hubbard, a relative, at Harrison, Potter county, Pennsylvania. Expecting the letter, Hubbard called at the post office at Harrison, and inquired of Cummings, who was postmaster, whether the package had arrived. The answer was that it had not. He repeated the call several times, as well as did other members of the family, and each time the answer was the same. Hubbard then wrote to Judd, that the letter had not reached its destination, and desired to know something concerning it. The clerk in the post office at Monterey, before enclosing the notes in an envelope, had taken a memorandum of them, and this was forwarded to Hubbard. He again called upon Cummings, but without gaining any information. He asked to look at the record, and Cummings answered that he had sent it to Washington City. It was afterwards found, however, in the post office at Harrison, but no entries for June were on it. Hubbard's suspicions as to the honesty of Cummings became aroused, from certain circumstances that came to his knowledge. During the month of October, Cummings had made arrangements to visit the West, in company with several of his acquaintances. Before the party started on their journey, Hubbard acquainted one of them with the facts that he was in possession of, and desired him to watch Cummings closely, to see whether he passed or had money of the description. When the travelers reached Detroit, Michigan, Cummings said that, as he had large bills, and wished to get them changed, he would pay the fare of the whole party, and then they could refund to him. The proposition was agreed to, and in the meantime the man who had the memorandum made his companions acquainted with the matter. They remained in Detroit several hours, and during the day Cummings remarked that he had a note for which he wished to get smaller ones, and that he would repair to a broker's, and get it exchanged. He walked up one street till he reached another, where he turned. His associates stepped into a clothing store, purchased some articles, and then followed after him. Just as they turned the corner, they saw him coming out of an exchange office, and when he came up to them, they told him to go to the hotel and wait for them, as they also wished to get bills exchanged. On entering the broker's they inquired whether Cummings had procured small notes for a large one, and receiving an affirmative reply, they requested to look at the large bill, and found that it answered the description precisely. They immediately had him arrested, and on going to the railroad office they discovered that the note with which he paid their fare, was exactly similar to the other one missed from the letter. Cummings was brought to this city and lodged in jail, where he has been ever since.

William Bostwick testified—Reside in Great Barrington, Massachusetts; am cashier of the Mahaiwe Bank, at that place; (one of the notes was shown to witness, and he pronounced it a genuine issue of his bank; it was No. 306, letter A, and dated August, 1853,) no duplicate numbers of that letter are issued; all $50 notes are lettered A; have no regular time of calling in and cancelling such notes; the number is the only way in which the note can be distinguished from other notes of the same denomination.

B. C. Langdon testified—Reside in Monterey, Massachusetts; am clerk in the post office at that place; Mr. Oliver Judd, on the 16th of last June, came into the office with two $50 notes, and requested me to inclose and direct them to Nathaniel Hubbard, at Harrison Valley, Potter county, Pa.; did as he wished; took a memorandum of the description and denomination of the bills; they were numbered 302 and 306; put the letter in the usual place for letters in the post office; some time after, received a letter from Mr. Hubbard, in which he stated that the letter had not reached its destination; replied to him, saying I had mailed it; also wrote to Cummings, to ask him whether he had received any letters from our office of the date of the 16th June. Cross-examined—Have a distinct recollection of directing the letter to Nathaniel Hubbard, at the request of Mr. Judd; did not take a memorandum of the denomination of the notes, as I did not consider it necessary.

The prosecution offered in evidence a leaf from the register of the post office at Monterey, on which the letter was entered. Mr. Hampton objected, contending that it was necessary to produce the register itself. Col. Black thought the objection was sound, and read an extract from the English law in support of the position. THE COURT sustained the objection.

Nathaniel Hubbard testified—Reside in Harrison, Potter county, Pa.; Henry Cummings was postmaster there in June; received a letter at his office, informing me that a letter had been sent to me; inquired of Cummings whether a letter from Monterey had been received by him; he said not; it is often the case that neighbors take letters out for me, and I asked Cummings to look at the record; he said he had sent the records away; I afterwards saw the record, examined it—during the month of July—and found no entries for June; think I informed several persons of the description of the notes, and requested them to look out for the money; informed one or two persons who were accompanying Cummings to the West; gave one of them a memorandum; John A. Tryal was the man; wanted him to see whether Cummings passed money of the description of Nos. 302 and 306 on the Mahaiwe Bank, of $50; Cummings left Harrison in October, in company with four or five gentlemen. Cross-examined—The second letter was got out of the office by a neighbor, who handed it to me; it was in July, I think, that I expected the letter containing the money; Cummings left for the West in October; Mr. Tryal was the person to whom I made known my suspicions.

Luther W. Hubbard testified—Reside in Harrison, Potter county; Henry Cummings was postmaster there in the summer of 1854; inquired for a letter which I understood had been sent to my father; made inquiries frequently, but without gaining any information.

The examination of the witness having been concluded, the court adjourned until three o'clock in the afternoon.

Afternoon Session.

John S. Tryon, sworn—My place of residence last summer was Harrison Valley; knew Cummings there; he and myself and others went West last September; he said he had two $100 bills which he got a year before, and had kept for the purpose of traveling with. After we started he said he had fifty-dollar bills. At Hornellsville we paid the fare on the cars for the party to Chicago. When we were in Detroit, Cummings spoke about getting his money changed, and we all went with him; he passed one or two offices that were not opened; I then stopped in a clothing store, with the others; Cummings went on and got his money changed; afterwards I met him, and he told me where he got his money changed; Fletcher and myself went there; inquired of the broker what bill prisoner had (objected to); prisoner was not present; the broker showed us a fifty-dollar Mehaiwe Bank bill; I referred to my mem.; I can't tell what the number of the bill is now; went to the state's attorney's office, and had Cummings arrested.

By Defence—Were there any inducements held out to the prisoner to make any statement?

Answer—No. He said he supposed Hubbard had got the note passed at Hornellsville, telegraphed and had him arrested. The United States attorney took my memorandum. Fletcher went back for it, but could not get it; he got a copy of it; prisoner told me it I had told him of the arrest, he would have given me satisfaction about it.

Nothing of importance was elicited on the cross examination.

Fletcher, sworn.—Was one of the emigrating party. In Detroit went into the broker's office, where Cummings got his money changed, with Tryon; asked him whether he had a certain bill; he hesitated, said he had a $50 bill on Mehaiwe Bank, marked No. 306. This is the same office, where Cummings had just been; none of us got any large notes changed. Tryon had a memorandum of the bill; have here a copy of it.

This was offered in evidence, but objected to, and objection sustained.

Nicholas Payne, sworn.—Am teller in Dye's Bank, Detroit, [the note was shown him,] that note I changed last October, early in the morning; changed it for the prisoner; put my initials on the note; in the afternoon, Tryon came to me and searched for the note.

In the cross-examination, the defence endeavored to show that the witness could not identify the prisoner with certainty, and that the bill received from him was mixed up with the other bills in such a manner that its identity also became uncertain.

A. W. Sprague, sworn—Am a police officer of Detroit; the deputy marshall handed the prisoner into my charge, and I brought him here.

By the Defense—Both conversations I had with the prisoner when he was in my custody. I cautioned him against making any admission; didn't hold out any inducements to him to make any.

The defence objected to the testimony on the ground of a recent decision of the English courts, which excludes all testimony by policemen as to admissions made while the prisoners were in their custody. The point was reserved.

Examination continued—While on the way from the jail to the court house in Detroit, he said he never before believed in destiny, but he did now, and that he was destined to take that money; thought the man insane, and so did others. He showed me the portrait of his child, and said that child was the occasion of his taking the money.

The prosecution closed here.

J. C. Dunn was sworn, and testified to the manner in which the mails are made up. At the conclusion of his testimony, the court adjourned.

IRWIN, District Judge, charged the jury, after which they retired, with instructions to bring in a sealed verdict.

The jury came to a verdict on Wednesday evening, about ten o'clock. The verdict was sealed. On Thursday morning, at the opening of court, the jury were called to their boxes, and the verdict being opened read "Guilty" with a recommendation to the mercy of the court.

Col. Black, for the defence, made a motion in arrest of judgment, which was argued on Friday morning. The motion was made upon an alleged deficiency in the indictment.

[NOTE. At a subsequent hearing of the case, upon a motion for an arrest of judgment, May 26, 1855, the defendant was remanded to prison, no amount of bail being made. Case No. 14,901a. A bill was filed against the prisoner in the month of October following, upon a charge of larceny of a $50 note. The jury rendered a verdict of "Guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted," and the prisoner was remanded. Id. 14,901b. At a final hearing of the case, in April, 1856, the prisoner was released, having entered into a bond for $2,000. Id. 14,901.]

INDICTMENT—EMBEZZLEMENT BY POSTMASTER.

[An indictment charging a postmaster with taking a note on a bank from a package in the mail, and converting it to his own use, is fatally defective, without an averment that the note was the property of some person.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Laws, Case No. 15,579; U. S. v. Haynes, 29 Fed. 698.]

Before IRWIN, District Judge.

In the case of the United States against Henry Cummings, indicted for mail robbery, which had been certified to the United States circuit court to get the opinion of his honor, Judge Grier, in reference to the motion in arrest of judgment, Judge Shaler remarked that the judge of the circuit court had decided that after a conviction the case could not be properly certified from the one court to the other. It being, therefore, improperly before that tribunal, no opinion as to the matter could be given. He then moved that the case be certified back from the circuit to the district court for further consideration and final action.

So ordered by THE COURT, and entered upon the record. [Case No. 14,900.]

Judge Shaler then stated that, inasmuch as the argument on the motion in arrest of judgment had been heard, his honor would be pleased to decide upon it.

IRWIN, District Judge, remarked that he had examined the authorities bearing on the case, and was convinced that the motion should be granted, for the reason that it was not alleged in the indictment that the note taken from the letter was the property of any person. The judgment was therefore arrested. [Cases Nos. 14,901a, 14,901b.]

The prosecuting attorney alluded to the fact that a similar point had been decided in the same way by Judge Curtis.

Col. Black, attorney for Henry Cummings, remarked, in justice to Mr. Shaler, that this question had never before been raised in either the Eastern or Western district of Pennsylvania, and that the uniform custom was to frame the indictments as drawn up by the United States district attorney.

Judge Shaler stated that he had consulted with government officers on the subject, and deemed it consistent with duty to permit the defendant to enter into recognizance in $2,000, conditioned for his appearance at the October term of that court.

Henry Cummings and his brother Calvin then entered into the required bond, and the prisoner was released.

Mr. Cummings it will be remembered, was postmaster at Harrison, Potter county, in 1854, and in June of that year it was alleged that Oliver Judd, of Monterey, Mass., addressed a letter, containing two fifty-dollar notes, on the Mahawa Bank, to a relative named Nathaniel Judd, at Harrison, which was never received. In October of the same year, Cummings went west to buy land, and was arrested at Detriot after having exchanged at a broker's office a note similar to those alleged to have been stolen. He has been in our jail ever since,—a period of about seventeen months.

INDICTMENT—EMBEZZLEMENT BY POSTMASTER.

[An indictment based on the second clause of the 21st section of the post-office law (of 1825; 4 Stat. 107), and charging the postmaster with taking from a letter in the mails a note on a bank, and converting the same to his own use, is fatally defective if it fails to aver that the note was a thing of value.]

Tuesday having been appointed by Judge IRWIN for delivering his opinion on the motion for an arrest of judgment in the case of Henry Cummings, convicted in the United States district court for robbing the mail at Harrison Valley post-office, Potter county, the prisoner was brought into court at 10 o'clock, to hear the result. He exhibited much anxiety. The main point argued by the defence was that the indictment did not set forth that the article stolen was a thing of intrinsic value. The question never having been raised before, the decision of Judge IRWIN will possess additional importance. The report which we give below was made up from notes taken at the delivery of the opinion [Case No. 14,900]:

The case of U. S. v. Cummings was continued until the present to enable the court to examine the authorities referred to by the counsel for the government and for the defence in their arguments on the motion in arrest of judgment. The court had looked into the many others not cited, with much care. The case of U. S. v. Mills [7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 138], cited by United States attorney, did not seem to involve the point at issue. The question there was whether the indictment contained sufficient averment of guilt to convict. It was not based upon the 21st section of the post-office law, but upon the 24th section, which provides that he who shall embezzle, destroy, or secrete, or aid or assist therein, shall be subject to the same penalty. In the case referred to, the value of the bank notes contained in the letter were to the jury unknown. No value was given. The question in the case before the court was whether the value of the bank note should have been inserted in the indictment. In the case of Mills the only question was whether it was necessary to make an averment of guilt to convict the accessory. The court replied, as an abstract question, in the affirmative; but that also in the indictment it was sufficiently averred. The principal had been previously convicted, and in the case of the accessory it was only necessary to establish that fact. The case referred to had no bearing whatever on the point at issue.

The only cases brought before the United States court, reported, were [U. S. v. Nott, Case No. 15,900, and United States v. Lancaster, Id. 15,556]. In the case of U. S. v. Nott the court says, if the money taken was counterfeit, or upon a bank that never existed, or upon an insolvent institution, it would not be an offence under the statute. In that trial the case did not turn upon the value, &c., but the point was raised in argument. The decision of the court, however, sustains the position of the defence. In the case U. S. v. Lancaster the question now under consideration, though referred to in that case in argument, was not decided by the court. Referring to the value, had it been contained in the motion to quash, it would have been the strongest point in the case, but as it did not, the motion was refused on other grounds.

There is a very essential difference between the first and second clauses of the 21st section of the post-office law. In the first clause the offence was secretly embezzling and destroying a letter not containing anything of value, and the penalty was a fine of $300 and imprisonment for six months. The offence in the latter consists not only in embezzling, destroying, and secreting, but doing that, and taking from it any of the instruments contained in the letter, and for that the punishment was ten years' imprisonment. Simply prying into a letter, without intent to steal, is very often done, and is a mild offence. The crime is greatly increased if an article of value is taken out of it. The essence of the offence is the value of the instrument contained in the letter,—the question was, whether it possessed intrinsic value. Hence it was necessary to state whether the article was of value. In indictments for larceny at common law the essential part of the indictment was the statement that the article alleged to have been stolen was of value. The value must appear. In this case, in which the offence was committed for the purpose of gaining by the loss of another, the value should also be stated. At common law the indictment could not be sustained.

A large portion of the 21st section is taken from a statute of Geo. III. The very words are the same. Upon examining the forms of indictment used under the English statute, the court found the value of the article contained in the letter was always inserted, and in one case particularly, where a draft was stolen, which was invalid for want of a stamp, on which account the indictment was not sustained. In other cases, where the postmaster or clerk was charged with the offence of which Cummings was convicted, the forms of the indictment also showed the value of the article contained in the letter; and, where coin was taken, the denomination and value were mentioned. There was no reason why the value of the note should have been omitted in the indictment in the case of Cummings. Embezzling, under the act of congress, is a much more serious offence than larceny, in all cases of which the value must be set forth. It involved a breach of trust,—a violation of oath,—besides the stealing. But surely, in this country, it could not be the case that the taking of a note of no value, as is so often the case in the frequent bankruptcy of banks, should subject a defendant to the punishment contemplated in the statute. And this is decided by Judge McLean in the case of U. S. v. Nott.

There are many other articles contained in letters valuable only to the persons sending or receiving, but possessing no intrinsic value. It must have intrinsic value to be the foundation of a prosecution of this kind, and that value must be set forth in the indictment.

In this view of the subject the court were of opinion that the judgment should be arrested.

Judge Shaler remarked that there was an indictment pending against Cummings for the larceny of the note contained in the letter, for the embezzlement of which he had been tried, and he requested the court to make an order fixing the amount of bail proper to be given. His honor was not prepared at present to name the amount, and therefore remanded Cummings to prison.

Another indictment will probably be presented at the next term of court, the form of which will be laid down by Judge IRWIN in the above decision.

[NOTE. Subsequently a bill was entered against the defendant upon a charge of larceny for a $50 note. The jury rendered a verdict against the prisoner, who was then remanded. Case No. 14,901b.

[At a final hearing the next year the prisoner was released, having entered into a bond for $2,000. Case No. 14,901.]

VIOLATION OF POSTAL LAWS—EMBEZZLEMENT BY POSTMASTER—TRIAL—VERDICT.

Before IRWIN, District Judge.

The court was occupied principally in the transaction of civil business. The grand jury found a true bill against Henry Cummings, for mail robbery. Our readers will recollect that this man was tried on the above charge, convicted, and subsequently granted a new trial at the last term of the court in this city. He now stands indicted a second time. The trial will commence on Wednesday.

The case of Henry Cummings, indicted for robbing the United States mail, was taken up. After a jury had been empanelled, Hon. Charles Shaler, United States district attorney, opened the case. The following is a statement of the circumstances upon which the charge was brought: [See Case No. 14,900.]

Cummings was tried and convicted in May last, but the verdict was set aside in consequence of some informality in the indictment. [Id. 14,901a.] The present bill charges the larceny of one particular $50 note.

The testimony was mainly the same as that published by us in May last. [Case No. 14,900.] B. C. Langdon testified to having received two $50 notes on the Mahawa Bank, Massachusetts, from Mr. Judd, at the post office in Monterey, to be forwarded to Alexander Hubbard, at Harrison Valley, Potter county, Pa. The notes were numbered 202 and 206. He took a memorandum of them. (The memorandum, one of the notes, and the post office register of Monterey, were offered in evidence.) Mr. Hubbard testified to having made repeated enquiry of Cummings for the letter, and was invariably told that no such letter had been received at Harrison Valley.

Col. Black and J. H. Hampton, for the defence.

Shaler & Flenniken, for the prosecution.

Court met at ten o'clock, to receive the verdict of the jury in the case of Henry Cummings, indicted for mail robbery. The court was informed that the jury was unable to agree, and asked to be discharged. They were were then ordered to come into court, when his honor refused to discharge them, while there was a possibility of their being able to find a verdict. They were notified that the court would meet at three o'clock in the afternoon, for their convenience.

At three o'clock the court convened, and the jurors came down. The prisoner was also brought in. The jury then returned a verdict of "Guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted." Col. Black made a motion for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment. The prisoner was remanded, and court adjourned until ten o'clock on Monday.

[Upon a final hearing, the prisoner was released after giving a bond for $2,000. Case No. 14,901.]

PLEADING AT LAW—REJOINDER—DOUBLE ISSUE—NIL DEBIT.

1. A rejoinder must answer the replication.
2. It must tender an issue on a single point.
3. If double, it is demurrable.

[Cited in Elminger v. Drew, Case No. 4,416.]

[Cited in brief in Wiard v. Semken, 8 Mackey, 476.]

4. The plea of nil debit is improper, where the action is founded on a deed.
5. If the deed be only inducement to the action, that plea is proper.

[This was an action by the United States against Cumpton, and Coleman, his surety, upon the official bond of Cumpton as post master.]

The District Attorney, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Bright, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. Cumpton, the defendant, having been post master, and failing to account, &c. the above action was brought on his official bond. He pleaded that he had in all things performed his duties faithfully, and accounted for monies received, &c. The plaintiffs replied that he did not at all times after the making of the said writing obligatory and the said condition thereof, well and truly observe, perform, fulfill or keep, all and singular the conditions, &c., in the said writing, as in said plea is alleged, but that he broke the same. 1. That he did not make returns every three months. 2. Rendered no account since the 2d April, 1840; and that between the 1st April and 30th of the same month divers sums came to his hands as post master. 3. That on the 13th April, 1840, there was in his hands the sum of sixty-eight dollars. To this the defendants rejoined: 1st. That the said Cumpton did heretofore, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, the 5th July, 1841, at said district, render accounts of his receipts and expenditures as post master, to the general post office, which were then and there received. 2d. That said Cumpton, as post master, did not, at divers times between the 1st April, 1840, and the 10th of the same month, receive divers sums amounting to sixty-eight dollars, and that he does not owe. 3. That he owes nothing, &c. To this rejoinder the plaintiffs demurred.

The demurrer must be sustained. The rejoinder does not answer the breach, to which it was intended to apply. The breach assigned is, that the said Cumpton did not once in three months faithfully render accounts of his receipts, &c. as post master. The rejoinder is, that Cumpton, on the 5th July, 1841, rendered accounts, &c. which were received, &c. The law requires quarterly accounts to be rendered. Cumpton was post master from 6th November, 1838, to 13th April, 1841. The rejoinder is, therefore, defective in this, that it does not show or aver that accounts were rendered once in three months. The post office law imposes a penalty on post masters, who neglect to make their quarterly returns. They are liable to pay double the amount of postages, ordinarily received, in each quarter, if the quarterly return be not made. The second part of the rejoinder is double, and is, therefore, demurrable. It denies certain allegations of the replication, and also avers that Cumpton owes nothing. The issue must be tendered on a single point, though it may include several facts. Here, however, two distinct issues are tendered. The third part of the rejoinder, which is nil debit, is also demurrable. This plea can never be pleaded when a specialty is the foundation of the action. It is proper in a case where the deed is mere inducement to the action. 1 Chit. Pl. 423; 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 406. The demurrer is sustained, and judgment.

CRIMINAL LAW — "TRIAL" — PRACTICE — COPY OF INDICTMENT.

Under the statute of 1790, c. 9, § 28 [1 Stat. 118], which requires, that in capital cases a copy of the indictment, &c. should be delivered to the prisoner two entire days before the trial, the word "trial" means the trying the cause by the jury, and not the arraignment and pleading preparatory to such trial by the jury.

Indictments [against Winslow Curtis, alias Sylvester Colston] for the murder of Edward Selfridge, on the high seas, on the 28th of August, 1826. Plea, not guilty.

After a verdict of guilty, Jarvis & Dunlap, for the prisoner, moved in arrest of judgment, and also for a new trial, because no copy of the indictment was furnished two days before the prisoner's arraignment and pleading, according to the statutes of 1790, c. 9, § 29. The motions were argued at length by them, and replied to by Mr. Blake, U. S. Dist. Atty.

The arguments are so fully considered by the court, that it is unnecessary to repeat them.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. If the court entertained the slightest doubt upon the present question, as it is a capital case, we should take further time for deliberation. But having carefully examined all the authorities which have been cited, and deliberately considered them, I shall now proceed to state the opinion which we have formed. The point submitted is, that the prisoner was entitled of right to a copy of the indictment, two days, at least, before his arraignment thereon; that no copy was in fact furnished him, until after his arraignment; and that this omission now entitles him to have a new trial, or to have the judgment arrested. In point of fact the prisoner was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty, before the district judge, on the 29th day of November last; and at the same time, at his request, counsel were assigned to him by the court, and he selected, on that occasion, the gentlemen who so ably defended him at the trial. From various causes the trial was postponed until the 15th day of December instant; and when the prisoner was, at that time, about to be put on trial, he objected, that he had not received a copy of the indictment until the day preceding; and, at his suggestion, the trial was then postponed until the 19th day of the month, to enable him to make more thorough preparations for the trial. No suggestion was made at that time of a desire to retract his plea; nor any hint of the objection since raised, that he ought to have received a copy of the indictment before his arraignment; nor that he desired to have a new arraignment. At the trial no such objection was raised before the jury was sworn; nor indeed was the objection stated, until all the evidence was fully gone though, and the counsel, closing for the prisoner, was about to finish his argument. He then contended, that the objection was fatal to the trial, and the prisoner was entitled to a verdict of acquittal. The court immediately suggested, both to the prsoner and to his counsel, that if the prisoner, even at that time, was desirous to retrace his steps, and withdraw the cause from the jury, and to be arraigned anew, after receiving a copy for two or more days, there would be no objection on the part of the court, whatever might be their opinion of the law of the point, to allow him that indulgence. Both the prisoner and his counsel declined the ofter, and put the prisoner upon his legal rights, without intending to waive any of them in the present posture of the cause. Under these circumstances the court have a right to conclude, that no actual prejudice has been intended, or has in fact occurred to the prisoner; that the slip, if any, was wholly without motive; and that the point is one to be decided as of mere strict right. It has in fact been so argued at the bar; and certainly if well founded, and the prisoner is now entitled to the benefit of it, however formal or inconsequential the error may seem to the merits of the case, he may now demand from the court its full legal effect.

The argument proceeds upon the foundation of being fully sustained by the twenty-ninth section of the crimes act of 1790, c. 9. That section declares, "that any person who shall be accused and indicted of treason, shall have a copy of the indictment and a list of the jury and witnesses to be produced on the trial for proving the said indictment, mentioning the names and places of abode of such witnesses and jurors, delivered unto him at least three entire days before he shall be tried for the same; and in other capital offences shall have such copy of the indictment and list of the jury, two entire days at least before the trial. And that every person, so accused and indicted for any of the crimes aforesaid, shall be allowed and admitted to make his defence by counsel learned in the law; and the court, before whom such person shall be tried, or some judge thereof, shall, and they are hereby authorized and required, immediately upon his request, to assign to such person such counsel, not exceeding two, as such person shall desire," &c. This being a statute of our own government, it is doubtless the right and duty of the court to give it a sound and reasonable construction, according to the true import of its terms. But in giving such construction it is highly proper to consider what has been the construction, if any, put upon like words by other courts, and especially by the judges of England, from which country we derive our notions of the common law, and much of our jurisprudence. The question is, what is meant in this statute by the words "before he shall be tried," and "before the trial," for they are doubtless equivalent. Do they mean, that the copy shall be delivered two days before the jury is sworn to try the cause upon the issue of fact; or do they mean, before the party is arraigned on the indictment and put to plead, and before it is ascertained, whether by his plea there will be a trial by jury or not?

I will state, in the first place, what, in the opinion of the court, would be the true construction of the statute, supposing the point were, for the first time, suggested for argument; and in the next place, how far that construction is affected by any English authorities. And we are clear in opinion, that, upon the statute itself, the true meaning is, that the copy should be delivered two days before the cause is tried by the jury, and not before the party is arraigned on the indictment. The reasons, that lead us to this conclusion, are, first, that this is the natural exposition of the intent and object of the enactment; and, secondly, that it is the legal and technical meaning of the word "trial," in the sense of the common law. It is admitted, that the legislature may use technical words in an untechnical sense; and, when from the context this is ascertained, it is the duty of the court to construe the words according to the legislative intent. It is equally its duty to follow such intent, when the legislature uses untechnical words in a technical sense. In each case, indeed, the duty of the court is the same, to carry into effect the object of the legislature, so far as it is expressed, and to give a suitable exposition of the terms, according to the fair import of the language. But where the legislature uses words, which have an appropriate sense in the common law, that sense is supposed to be the one intended by the legislature, unless the context shows, that a different sense was in fact intended. Now, in the sense of the common law, the arraignment of the prisoner constitutes no part of the trial. It is a preliminary proceeding; and until the party has pleaded, it cannot be ascertained, whether there will be any trial or not. The elementary books are full to this purpose. Mr. Justice Blackstone, in the passage cited at the bar (which is a mere transcript from Lord Hale), says, "to arraign is nothing else, but to call the prisoner to the bar of the court to answer the matter charged upon him by the indictment." 4 Bl. Comm. 322; 2 Hale, P. C. 216, c. 28. If upon the arraignment the prisoner pleads guilty, there can be no trial at all; for there remains no fact to be tried; the whole charge of the indictment is admitted, and nothing remains but to pass the proper judgment of the law upon the premises. The same may be said as to other pleas, as a pardon, auter fois convict or acquit, which if admitted, supersede any trial. Indeed, the very forms of the proceeding upon the arraignment are so complete evidence of the legal meaning of a trial, that of themselves they are decisive. When the prisoner, upon his arraignment, pleads not guilty, he is then asked, how he will be tried, and the response, in case of a trial by jury, is, that he will be tried by God and his country. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 416, 417. "When, therefore," says Mr. Justice Blackstone, "a prisoner, on his arraignment, has pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon the country, which country the jury are, the sheriff of the county must return a panel of jurors," &c. 4 Bl. Comm. 350. So Lord Hale says, "After the prisoner hath pleaded and put himself upon the country, the next thing, in order of proceeding, is the trial of the offender." 2 Hale, P. C. 259, c. 34. And Sir Michael Foster, in treating on the subject, in the very paragraph preceding that cited at the bar, says, he will range the proceedings under the following heads:

"What privileges the prisoner is entitled to, and what is incumbent on him previous to the trial, and what during the trial." Fost. Crown Law, 227. See, also, Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, cc. 28, 39, 40. And under the former he places all the privileges of a copy of the indictment and list of jurors, &c. allowed by the law of England in cases of high treason. And the like distinction between the arraignment and trial was taken in Layer's Case, in 1722 (4 Bl. Comm. 322; Waite's Case, 1 Leach, Crown Cas. 33, 43; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 415, 417), and is universally recognised. The very form, too, of calling the prisoner, when he is to be put on his trial by the jury, shows the legal sense of the terms. He is then told by the clerk, in the language of the law, that he is now set at the bar to be tried, and he is to make his challenges before the jurors are sworn. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 532.

In short, so far as authorities, or reasoning, or forms go, there can be no legal doubt, that by the term "trial," is generally intended, in the law, the actual trial of the prisoner by the jury. The constitution of the United States, too, in the sixth amendment, which provides, that the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by jury, manifestly uses the term in the same sense; and indeed it pervades the general structure of our laws. There is not the slightest reason, in our judgment, for presuming that congress, in this section of the act of 1790, used the term in any different or wider sense. On the contrary, every portion of its language is entirely consistent with, and supports this construction. The object of the legislature was to enable the party to make his defence in the best and most perfect manner. Not only is a copy of the indictment, but a list of the witnesses in treason, and a list of the jurors in all capital cases, to be delivered to the prisoner. But unless he has already been arraigned, and has pleaded, how can it be supposed, that witnesses or jurors can be necessary? The witnesses can only be heard upon an issue of fact; and the jury can only try an issue of fact. Until, therefore, there has been an arraignment and plea, on which a trial may be had, it would hardly seem worthy of legislative interposition to prescribe the delivery of a list of witnesses or of jurors. If, then, the natural interpretation of the clause, so far as witnesses and jurors are concerned, is, that the list should be delivered three or two days before the time of the actual trial by the jury, the same interpretation must be applied to the copy of the indictment, for the same language, in the same connexion, is applied to both.

It has been said, that a copy of the indictment may be important, in some cases, to enable the prisoner to plead. Without question it may be so; but in such cases he would, upon the ordinary principles, be entitled to a copy for that purpose. Even in England, where no copy is provided for in any capital trials, except for treason, it is not uncommon to grant the prisoner a copy at his request, where it is shown to be important to his pleading or defence. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 404. But it is one thing for the legislature to prescribe a thing, as a matter of right, in all cases before arraignment and pleading; and quite another thing, to grant it as a matter of fair discretion, in the course of judicial proceedings, where it may further public justice. It has been further said, that a copy of the indictment can be of no use, unless for the purpose of pleading. But this is certainly a mistake. It is of great importance to ascertain, in many cases, the precise form of the charge in order to shape the evidence, so as to meet it, or to disprove the material allegations. In indictments for treason, the overt acts must be laid in the indictment, and it is, or may be, of the very highest importance to the prisoner to know the precise form of every charge of this nature, so vital to the indictment. The same thing may be said, in many cases, of homicides, as to the manner of the death, the instrument which inflicted it, and the place where done, &c. If, in a case of murder, the means of the death are not proved by the evidence, substantially, as laid in the indictment, the party is entitled to an acquittal. If, for instance, the death in the present case had been laid, in the indictment, to have been by drowning only, and not by a hatchet, and the proof had established the latter mode of death, the prisoner must have been acquitted. So where the indictment alleges the offence to be committed on the high seas, this is vital to the jurisdiction of the court in many cases; so that, if not substantially proved, the indictment fails, even though the place may be within the general admiralty jurisdiction. Some crimes by statute are only punishable when committed on the high seas, and some are punishable when committed in any other place within the admiralty jurisdiction. The distinction may often be most material to the defence at the trial. It cannot, then, be admitted for a moment, that in a capital case a copy of the indictment may not essentially aid the prisoner in his defence, both in point of merits and legal exceptions. It can rarely happen, that the want of a copy at the time of arraignment can prejudice the prisoner, because it must be presumed, that every court, solicitous for justice, will grant a copy, and delay the pleading for a reasonable time, to enable the party to avail himself of all his rights In point of fact, in criminal cases, few defences do arise, of which the prisoner has not the full benefit under the plea of not guilty; and other pleas are of rare occurrence.

Such is a summary of the reasoning, which induces the court to declare, that if the point were entirely new, it would feel bound to decide, that the true construction of the statute, whether considered upon its obvious terms, or intent, requires that the copy of the indictment should be delivered, two days at least, not before the arraignment of the prisoner, but before his trial by the jury. But in cases of this sort, the court will listen to the opinions expressed on like occasions, by other judicial tribunals, with the most anxious attention; and if, upon similar words in any statutes having similar objects, a different construction has been maintained, and acted upon, it ought to have very great weight here. Let us see, then, how the case stands upon the statutes and authorities cited at the bar. The statutes cited are the statutes of 7 Wm. III. c. 3, § 1, and 7 Anne, c. 21, § 11, respecting trials for treason. Before I proceed to comment on them, I would state, that the latter section (eleventh of 7 Anne, c. 3), on which so much reliance has been placed, is a mere supplement to, and not a total repeal of, the former. It authorizes a list of the witnesses to be delivered, which was not provided for by the statute of 7 William III.; and requires that the list of jurors should be delivered ten days before the trial, the statute of William requiring it only two days; and also a copy of the indictment ten days before the trial, the statute of William requiring it only five days. In all other respects it left the statute of William in full force and operation; and therefore the statute of Anne, being a mere supplement, has been governed by the construction previously put upon the statute of William, substituting only the enlarged period of ten days for the prior periods. This accounts at once for the reason, why the statute of Anne has never received any judicial construction. In point of fact, it did not take effect, as indeed it was upon its own terms not to take effect, until after the death of the Pretender, which did not occur until the reign of George III. Indeed, the first trial for treason upon which the statute of Anne operated, was that of Lord George Gordon, in 1781. The case is reported in Doug. 590, and upon that occasion the attorney general moved, that a list of the jurors, intended to be returned by the sheriff for the trial of the prisoner, should be delivered to the prosecutor, that a copy might be delivered to the prisoner ten days before his arraignment, that having been the construction put upon the terms, "before the trial," in the statute of William. A rule upon the sheriff was granted accordingly; and the attorney general remarked upon the peculiarity of the statutes; and said, "as there is no issue till arraignment, there can be no jury, strictly speaking, because no jury process can be awarded, until issue joined." And the reporter in a note observes, that the statute of Anne is but an extension of that of William; and thence deduces the inference (at least by implication), that the construction of both statutes on this point must be the same. The practice, then, must be considered as regulated exclusively by the statute of William; and I will now proceed to examine the terms of that statute. Upon that examination, I think it will conclusively appear, that the construction put upon it by the English judges is perfectly correct; and that the presence of language not existing in the statute of the United States, compelled them to desert the ordinary sense of the word, "trial," in order to carry into effect an apparent and expressed object of the legislature, that the copy of the indictment should be delivered before the arraignment. It provides, that "all and every person and persons whatsoever, that shall be accused and indicted for high treason, &c., or for misprision of such treason (for other capital offences are not comprehended in the English statutes), shall have a true copy of the whole indictment, but not the names of the witnesses, delivered unto them or any of them, five days, at the least, before he or they shall be tried for the same, whereby to enable them and any of them respectively to advise with counsel thereupon, to plead and make their defence, his or their attorney &c. requiring the same, and paying the officer his reasonable fees for writing thereof, not exceeding five shillings for the copy of every such indictment." Now it is to be observed, that in this clause a copy of the indictment only (and not of the list of jurors) is provided for, and the avowed object is to enable the prisoner to advise with counsel, and to plead and make defence. According to the course of practice in England, the prisoner is obliged to plead, instanter, upon his arraignment; and therefore the very object of parliament, expressed on the face of the enactment, would be defeated, unless the copy were furnished five days before the arraignment. The courts, therefore, in construing the statute, upon its plain intendment, were driven to say, that the terms, "before he or they shall be tried," must, in this connexion, be construed to mean, before the arraignment, because in no other way could the object be effected. And this exposition is so reasonable and just, that the only surprise is, that it should ever have been made a question. Sir Michael Foster, in the passages cited at the bar (Fost. Crown Law, 228, 230), gives the reason for it, which has been already stated. See 1 East, P. C. 111, 112, 114, 115; 4 Bl. Comm. 351; Hawk. P. C. bk. 2 c. 39; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 405. The statute proceeds, in the next sentence, to recognise the true legal difference between the arraignment and trial, for it declares, "that every such person so accused and indicted, arraigned, or tried for any such treason as aforesaid, &c. shall be received and admitted to make his and their full defence by counsel learned in the law &c." Here the arraignment and trial are distinguished, as progressive acts, and that counsel are to be permitted in each; and thus, in the former clause, the inartificial use of the words, "shall be tried," is completely established. The provision, that the prisoner

"shall have copies of the panel of the jurors, who are to try them, duly returned by the sheriff, and delivered unto them &c. two days at the least before he or they shall be tried for the same," stands in another (the seventh) section of the act. I have been curious to ascertain, whether under the act of William, it was the practice to deliver the list of jurors also before the arraignment. In Sir Michael Foster's report of the trial of the rebels in 1746, he speaks expressly, as to the delivery of the copy of the indictment before the arraignment; but says nothing as to the list of jurors. And in his subsequent discourse he alludes to the provision, as to the list of jurors, in very general terms, leaving it somewhat doubtful, whether the list of the panel was ever delivered until after the arraignment and plea, and trial assigned. Fost. Crown Law, 1, 230. But upon examination of the case of Rex v. Rookwood, 4 St. Tr. 661, 667, the very point arose, and Lord Chief Justice Holt and the other judges on that occasion held, that the list of jurors was to be given not before the arraignment, but two days before the trial by the jury. In fact, in that case the jury were not summoned until after the prisoner had been arraigned, and pleaded. The practice under the statute of Anne, from necessity, led to the delivery of all the copies before the arraignment; because it expressly requires, that the lists of the witnesses and jurors "shall be also given at the same time that the copy of the indictment is delivered to the party indicated." Doug. 591.

From this examination of the statutes of William and Anne, it is apparent, that the terms are not the same with our act of congress; and that the courts have been driven to give an exposition of the provisions different from their natural import, in consequence of explanatory phrases, which could in no other way be rationally interpreted. There is no reason to suppose, that the learned judges would have given a different exposition from that which we think the true one of the act of congress, if the language had been in all respects the same as ours. In point of authority, then, there is nothing binding on the conscience of the court, or that justifies it in abandoning the natural sense of the words used in the act of congress. But suppose the acts were the same, and required the same interpretation, and that the prisoner was entitled to a copy of the indictment and list of jurors before arraignment, the question would still remain, whether he could now avail himself of this omission. A party may have a legal right to an exception, which he cannot take in every stage of the cause. The law points out an order in its proceedings, and requires that the party should take his exceptions, and demand his privileges, at such time as general justice and convenience require; otherwise he is deemed to waive them. A party is certainly at liberty to waive any privileges introduced solely for his own benefit; and if he is satisfied with going on without them, and sustains no prejudice thereby, there seems no ground to arrest the judgment, or grant a new trial upon this account.

The law is perfectly settled upon this subject in England under the strictest construction of the statutes of William and Anne. We have seen, that the prisoner is entitled to "a true copy of the whole indictment;" and yet, if he has received an imperfect copy, or if, being entitled to a copy of the caption of the indictment, he has received a copy without the caption, and he proceeds to plead, it is too late to take the exception. Sir Michael Foster (Fost. Crown Law, 230) says, "but if the prisoner pleadeth without a copy of the caption, as some of the assassins did, he is too late to take the objection, or indeed any other objection that turneth upon a defect in the copy; for by pleading, he admitteth that he hath had a copy sufficient for the purposes intended by the act." Now a false or imperfect copy is, in intendment of law, no true copy, and therefore, as none. But the sole object of the act being to enable the party to plead, if he is willing and ready to plead without a true copy, the law supposes his defence does not turn upon any such fact; and that he is sufficiently apprised of the whole charge, and of his own defence to it. Mr. East, in his very accurate work on Crown Law (1 East, P. C. 113), lays down the rule even more broadly. He says, "but, after pleading, it is too late to object, either to the want of a copy, or to any insufficiency in it; for that admits it to be sufficient." And he is well warranted in the statement, for in the case of Rex v. Cook, reported in 4 Hargrave, St. Tr. 738, 746, 13 Howell, St. Tr. 311, and very accurately, on this point; also, in 2 Salk. 634, it was so expressly decided by the court. In that case the prisoner, after plea, but before the jury was sworn, took an exception by his counsel, that he had not had a copy of the indictment, and therefore he could not be tried. But the court said, "By the words of the act (statute of Wm. III.) he is to demand it, and he has it to enable him to plead, and till then he is not to plead. In this case he has pleaded; therefore this benefit is waived, and the prisoner has admitted he has a copy, or did not think it for his service to require it, but was able to plead without the help of it." The same doctrine is recognized by all the other elementary writers, to which we have had access. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 405. The same point was decided in Rookwood's Case, 4 State Tr. 661, 667. It was, in fact, decided and acted upon by the circuit court, sitting in Rhode Island, on a trial for murder, in the case of U. S. v. Cornell [Case No. 14,868].

In the case now at bar, the prisoner has been held to no strictness whatsoever. After he had pleaded, after his cause was fully before the jury, the court, in tenderness to human life, was willing to allow him to withdraw the cause from the jury; not, indeed, as a matter of right, but of discretion. He declined it; and if ever the waiver of a benefit was intentional, and without prejudice to the party, I am justified in saying, that the present is such a case.

It remains only to remark upon some cases cited from the Massachusetts Reports. This court is entirely satisfied, that those cases were rightly decided. The case of Com. v. Andrews, 3 Mass. 126, turned upon the well known principle, that an accessary could not be tried without his own consent, unless his principal were also on trial, or had been convicted. And if he were tried by his own express consent, no judgment could pass upon him, until the principal was subsequently convicted. The court said, that they would not presume the assent of the prisoner to the trial, much less his desire to be tried, before the principal was tried and convicted, from the mere fact, that he was put on trial. It did not appear, that he knew his rights, or that he had given any consent; and that in criminal cases an express relinquishment of a right should appear, before the party should be deprived of it. The right here attempted to be presumed to be waived, was vital to the whole prosecution; and the language of the court must be interpreted to refer to such cases. In Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 303, the question was a question of jurisdiction. The statute of 1805 declared, that "all indictments, which may be found for any capital offence, shall be heard, tried, and determined &c. by three or more of the said justices" of the court. The arraignment of the prisoner for a capital offence was before one judge only. The court held the arraignment was coram non judice; and that the intent of the statute was, that a prisoner capitally indicted should not be put upon his defence, unless three justices at least were present. The case is so plainly right on the very words of the statute, "heard, tried, and determined," that it is scarcely susceptible of legal doubt. This is the substance of what I have to say, as to the opinion formed by the court. Our judgment is, that the motions be overruled.

DAVIS, District Judge, expressed his concurrence in the opinion, and added some illustrative remarks.

[See Case No. 16,682.]

NOTE, added by Judge Story. Since this opinwas delivered, I have had an opportunity to examine the case of Rex v. Rookwood, 4 State Tr. 661, at large. The very distinction insisted upon by this court was admitted and insisted upon by the counsel and court in that case. Lord Chief Justice Holt, in particular, stated, that the interpretation of the first section of the statute of William, as to the time of delivering a copy of the indictment, was altogether governed by the explanatory words, "to plead and make their defence;" and that otherwise the interpretation would be the same as that of the seventh section, as to the list of jurors, viz. that the time of trial by the jury was intended, and not the time of arraignment. When it is considered, that this case was decided the very year that the statute of 7 Wm. III. first took effect, and by such eminent judges as Lord Chief Justice Holt and Lord Chief Justice Treby, its authority is absolutely irresistible, as to the true exposition of the statute of William. It confirms, in an unexpected manner, the view already suggested by the present judgment.

Case No. 14,906.

UNITED STATES v. CUSHMAN.

[1 Lowell, 414.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE — DISTILLER — SPECIAL TAX — REPEAL OF STATUTES.

Section 23 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 153), punishing a distiller who shall carry on business without payment of a special tax, is not repealed by section 5 of the act of March 31, 1868 (15 Stat. 59), which punishes more severely every distiller who shall defraud or attempt to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, although the minimum punishment under the former law is regulated by the amount of spirits unlawfully distilled.

[This was an indictment against A. W. Cushman and others for carrying on the business of distillers of spirits without license.] In this case, and two others against other defendants, that were argued with it, the defendants had pleaded guilty to indictments framed under the act of July 13, 1866, § 23 (14 Stat. 153), and now moved in arrest of judgment.

G. A. Somerby, C. L. Woodbury, and L. S. Dabney, for the several defendants.

The statute relied on by the government has been repealed by section 5 of the act of 1868 (15 Stat. 59), for the punishment is increased by the later statute, and the offence is the same, namely, defrauding the government of the taxes on distilled spirits; for though the charge is, in form, the non-payment of the special tax or license fee, yet, in fact, the fine is regulated by the number of gallons illicitly distilled. To the point of implied repeal, see Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 429; Com. v. McDonough, 13 Allen, 581.

H. D. Hyde, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

The offence defined in the two statutes is not the same. In the one case it is the carrying on a business without license, and in the other defrauding the government of another and different tax, which may be done by a licensed as well as an unlicensed distiller.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

LOWELL, District Judge. The mode of ascertaining the punishment established by the law of 1866, is unusual, but the offence is clearly the carrying on a business without due authority. The extent of the business carried on is made the measure of the lowest fine, but the offence is complete when the business is actually begun. Congress may have taken for granted that a person who did not pay the special tax or license fee would be very likely to be a defaulter in respect to the much more onerous tax on the product, but they have not said that it is the latter fraud which they intended to punish. Under this section it is not necessary for the government to allege, and they never do allege, that the taxes on the spirits themselves have not been paid; nor would it be a good defense to an indictment to aver and prove that in fact they had been paid.

In this district it has been our practice to require that the indictment should aver, and the jury should find, the number of gallons distilled by the defendant; but our reason for adopting this practice was not that the fact formed any part of the substance of the offence, but because it is proper, and according to the best precedents, for the jury to pass upon a fact upon which the minimum of fine is made by law to depend. Without such a finding, the record would never show whether the court had obeyed the law or not. Upon careful consideration, we are not able to see that the section under review means any thing more than this, that the amount of business done without authority shall regulate the punishment. It follows that the law of 1868, in affixing a higher penalty for a failure to pay the tax on the spirits, was dealing with a different subject-matter, and that a conviction or acquittal under either law would be no defence to an indictment under the other, and that the latter does not repeal the former. The real difficulty and possible hardship arise out of the statute of 1866 taken by itself quite as much as from any conflict between the two statutes. Motions denied.

Case No. 14,907.

UNITED STATES v. CUSHMAN.

[2 Sumn. 310.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1836.

ADMINISTRATOR—ACTION ON BOND FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES — JOINT JUDGMENT — PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — ASSENT OF SURETIES TO RELEASE — ASSENT BY HEIR.

1. Where a judgment was obtained upon a joint and several bond, for duties at the custom house, in a joint suit against all the obligors; and afterwards, one of the obligors died; it was held, that no action at law lay against the administrator of the deceased obligor, but only against the surviving judgment debtors.

[Cited in dissenting opinion in U. S. v. Price, 9 How. (50 U. S.) 96.]

2. The Acts N. H. 1808 and 1830, on the subject of the liability of administrators, upon joint contracts and joint demands against the estate of a deceased debtor (when the other debtor survived), do not apply to a suit on a joint judgment, whatever might be the case, as to a suit on the original contract or demand.

3. Where the secretary of the treasury releases an insolvent debtor, under the acts of congress, upon the condition of the assent of his sureties to the release, without prejudice to their liability, that assent must be by the parties, if living, and if dead, by their personal representatives. An assent by the heir of a surety is not sufficient.

Debt on judgment. The parties agreed to a statement of facts, as follows: This is an action of debt, founded upon a judgment rendered by the circuit court, for the district of New Hampshire, on 8th of October, A. D. 1829, in favor of the plaintiffs, against Willis Barnabee, John N. Sherburne, and John Abbot—for the sum of $918.53 debt, and $27.06 cost. The said judgment was rendered upon a bond, given for the security of duties upon goods imported. The defendant, Samuel Cushman, is administrator upon the estate of John Abbot. The writ in this case, together with the copies of the judgment above named, are made a part of this case. In May, A. D. 1834, the aforesaid Willis Barnabee, applied for a discharge from the above named judgment, in pursuance of the provisions of certain insolvent laws of the United States. A hearing was had before the commissioners, and the result of this investigation, was forwarded to the secretary of the treasury department. After which hearing and report, the secretary of the treasury, forwarded to said Barnabee a letter, which is made a part of this case. On the same 18th of June, the secretary of the treasury forwarded to the district attorney of New Hampshire, a discharge, which made a part of this case. The said discharge now is, and ever has been, retained by the district attorney. On 19th November, 1834, John N. Sherburne, above named, together with John E. Abbot, son and sole heir of John Abbot, who deceased after the rendition of the afore described judgment, signed a document, showing their assent to the discharge of the said Barnabee—which document was filed in the treasury department on 10th April, A. D. 1835. On 26th August, A. D. 1829, Willis Barnabee surrendered to the custom house, two debenture certificates—one for the sum of $341.40, the other for the sum of $50.66—for the benefit of the government; and endorsed on each of them, a receipt for the amount thereof, which several sums, amounting to $392.06 at the time of rendering the aforesaid judgment, were not, and have not since been allowed to said Barnabee. The above named defendant, Cushman, has filed a general demurrer. The said Sherburne has pleaded nul tiel record, and also satisfaction for the sum of $392.06—the said Barnabee has pleaded a discharge under the insolvent laws of the United States.

Upon the above case, it is agreed, that such judgment shall be rendered as pertains to law. It is further agreed, that if the court are of opinion the action cannot be maintained against the three defendants, but can be against Cushman as administrator, the plaintiffs are at liberty to become nonsuit, as to the other two defendants, and may amend so as to take judgment against Cushman alone, for such sum as the court may direct. The estate of John Abbot has been represented insolvent, and is probably so in fact.

Mr. Hale, U. S. Dist. Atty.
C. B. Goodrich, for defendants.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and HARVEY, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Upon this statement of facts, I have no doubt, that the suit is not maintainable against all the defendants. It is the case of a joint judgment against three; and the suit is brought against two of the judgment debtors, who survive, and the administrator of the third judgment debtor, who is dead. The general doctrine of the common law unquestionably is, that the judgment survives against the surviving debtors only, and is gone as to the deceased debtor. The administrator is sued in autre droit; but it is clear, that he is not suable in that capacity jointly with the other debtors. But the parties have agreed, that, if necessary, the writ and declaration may be amended, so as to become the case of a several suit against the administrator of the deceased debtor upon the judgment. And the question is thus presented, whether such a suit could be maintainable against him separately upon the joint judgment. I am of opinion, that it could not be so maintainable. As the judgment is joint, all the parties, who are living, and within the process of the court, must be joined in a suit upon that judgment. So the supreme court decided, in the case of Gilman v. Rives, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 298. But, in truth, this is not the most pressing part of the objection. The judgment survives against the living judgment debtors; and can in no mode whatsoever, known to the common law, be enforced against the administrator of the deceased debtor. As to him, in its character as a judgment, it is functus officio.

The statutes of New Hampshire have not in any manner, helped this matter. The act of 1808 (Rev. Laws 1830, p. 65), applies only to suits on joint contracts, while they remain such, and not to judgments. It does no more than the original bond has provided in the present case; that is, it makes the contract several, as well as joint; so that it is suable as a several contract against the personal representatives of each deceased joint contractor. But the present is not a suit upon the original bond, as a several contract; but upon the joint judgment. Whether, after a joint judgment upon a joint and several contract, a several suit can be maintained upon the same contract severally against one of the debtors, or his personal representative; or whether it is merged in the judgment, is a question, which we need not meddle with in this case; for it does not arise. See on this point, Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 253; Lechmere v. Fletcher, 1 Cromp. & M. 634, 635. The act of 1822, § 12 (Rev. Laws 1830, p. 336), does not seem intended by its terms to go farther than the prior act of 1808. It provides, "that the estate of any person deceased, and the executor or administrator thereof, shall be liable for joint demands against the deceased, and any other person, in the same way and manner, as they would be liable, if such demands were several, as well as joint; unless it appear to have been the intention of the parties, that the demand should survive only against the longest liver." It is difficult to perceive, how this language could apply to any other cases, except cases of contract voluntarily entered into by the parties, where they had an option to make their responsibility joint and several, or otherwise; and where the right of suit is still resting upon the original contract. It cannot, without violence to the terms, be applied to judgments; for no such thing is known, at the common law, as a joint and several judgment.

This view of the nature and operation of the statutes of New Hampshire renders it wholly unnecessary to consider another point, which has been suggested by the argument; and that is, whether a contract made with the United States for the payment of duties, under the revenue laws of the United States, is, or can properly be deemed a local contract, to be governed by the state laws. Whenever that point arises directly in judgment, it may become necessary to consider the grounds and extent of the decisions of the supreme court, in Cox v. U. S., 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 172, 203, and in Duncan v. U. S., 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 435, 449. It is quite a different question, whether, upon a bill in equity properly framed, the United States might or might not have redress against the administrator. That would depend upon principles and facts wholly incapable of being properly considered in a court of law. In such a suit, the question would be presented, whether the debenture certificates ought not to be first deducted from the debt.

As to the other point, which, it is suggested, the case was intended to raise, whether the consent of John E. Abbot, the son and heir of the deceased, to the discharge of Barnabee, was a compliance with the condition of the discharge of Barnabee, provided for by the secretary of the treasury in his official instrument in the case; I am of opinion, that it was not. The consent must have been given by the party himself, if living; if not living, by his personal representative; for the latter only was capable of acting in the premises, so as to bind the estate of the deceased generally. The son, though heir, was in the sense of law a mere stranger, having no privity in contract or responsibility, by which he could bind the general assets of the deceased. But at most he could bind himself, only so far as real estate should descend to him from the deceased. My opinion, therefore, is, that, at law, upon the statement of facts, judgment ought to be entered for the defendants, that the plaintiffs take nothing by their writ.

The district judge concurs in this opinion, and therefore let judgment pass for the defendant.

[NOTE. For a bill in equity, brought to recover the amount of the same judgment out of the assets of Abbot in the hands of the defendant, see Case No. 14,908.]

Case No. 14,908.

UNITED STATES v. CUSHMAN.

[2 Sumn. 426.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. Oct. Term, 1836.

EQUITY — SUIT AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR — INSOLVENCY—BOND FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES—SURETIES —JOINT JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

1. Where a joint and several bond was given for duties at the custom house, and afterwards a joint judgment was obtained against all the obligors (the principal and sureties), and then, one of the obligors (a surety) died; and the survivors became insolvent; it was held, that the United States were entitled to maintain a suit in equity for the recovery of the debt out of the assets of the deceased judgment debtor, whose estate was also insolvent, in virtue of their general priority in cases of insolvency.

2. In such a case, as between the United States and the obligors on the duty bond, all of them are deemed principal debtors.

3. Where sureties bind themselves jointly and severally as principals in a bond, there is no difference, as to their liability in equity for the debt, between them and the principal debtor, for whom they are sureties.

[Cited in dissenting opinion in U. S. v. Price, 9 How. (50 U. S.) 105. Cited in Re Babcock, Case No. 696.]

4. Semble, that a joint judgment is no bar at law to a separate suit against one of the obligors on a joint and several bond, or against his personal representatives. The joint judgment only bars the joint remedy in such case, and not the several remedy.

Bill in equity, by the United States, against Samuel Cushman, administrator of John Abbott. The parties agreed to the following statement of facts: On 25th February, 1828, Willis Barnabee, with J. N. Sherburne and John Abbott as sureties, made their joint and several bond to the United States, in the sum of $2,400, conditioned to pay certain duties on or before the 25th August, 1829, due on goods imported by the said Barnabee. On 28th August, 1829, a joint suit against the said obligors was commenced, and judgment rendered thereon on the 8th October, 1829, in favor of the United States, for $918.53 debt, and $27.06 cost. In May, 1834, the aforesaid Willis Barnabee applied for a discharge from the above-named judgment, in pursuance of certain insolvent laws of the United States—a hearing was had before the commissioners appointed under the said laws for the district of New Hampshire, and the result of this investigation was forwarded to the secretary of the treasury department. After which hearing and report, the secretary of the treasury forwarded to the said Barnabee a letter in the following words: "Treasury Department, June 18th, 1834. Sir, your case has been decided, and the warrant for your release from your debt to the government will be issued, and the duplicates of the same prepared and transmitted to the attorney of the United States for your district without delay. Signed, R. B. Taney, Secretary of the Treasury." On the same 18th of June, the secretary of the treasury forwarded to the district attorney of New Hampshire, a discharge in the following words: "To all to whom these presents shall come, I, Roger B. Taney, secretary of the United States, send greeting: Whereas Willis Barnabee, of Portsmouth, in the district of New Hampshire, has presented his petition to the secretary of the treasury of the United States, to be released from certain debts due by him to the United States on the 1st day of January, 1831; and a report in writing of the circumstances of the case having been transmitted to the said secretary by the commissioners of insolvency for said district, pursuant to the provision of the statute of the United States, passed the second day of March, 1831 [4 Stat. 467], entitled, 'An act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States.' And whereas I, the said secretary of the treasury, having maturely considered the said petition and report, and it being proved to my satisfaction, that the said Willis Barnabee was, on the first day of January, 1831, a debtor to the United States, in a sum of money which he is unable to pay; that he hath done no act fraudulently to deprive the United States of their legal priority, that he has not been guilty of any fraud, nor made any conveyance of his estate, real or personal, in trust for himself, or with an interest to defraud the United States, or whereby to expect any benefit or advantage to himself or family. Now, therefore, know ye, that I, the said secretary of the treasury, in consideration of the premises, and by virtue of the power and authority vested in me by the aforesaid statute, and by an act of congress, entitled 'An act in addition to an act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States,' approved the 14th day of July, 1832 [Id. 595], and by virtue of an act of congress, to revive and amend the aforesaid acts, approved June 7th, 1834 [Id. 676], do hereby decide to release the said Willis Barnabee from his said debt, upon condition that John N. Sherburne and John Abbott, the sureties of the said Willis Barnabee, shall file with the secretary of the treasury, their consent, in writing, that the privileges of the said acts may be extended to him, the said Willis, without any prejudice to their liability; and provided that the right of the United States to have applied to the said debt all and every debenture certificate or certificates, applicable to the same, be not hereby relinquished, but on the contrary fully saved and reserved. Given under my hand and seal of office, at the city of Washington, this 18th of June, 1834, and of the independence of the United States the fifty-eighth. (L. S.) R. B. Taney, Secretary of the Treasury." The said discharge now is, and ever has been retained by the said district attorney. On 19th November, 1834, J. N. Sherburne, above-named, together with John E. Abbott, son, and sole heir of John Abbott, who deceased after the rendition of the aforedescribed judgment, signed a document showing their assent to the discharge of said Barnabee; which document was filed in the treasury department on 10th April, 1835, and is in these words: "Whereas Willis Barnabee, as principal, John N. Sherburne and John Abbott, as sureties, all of Portsmouth, district of New Hampshire, made their certain bond to the United States of America, for the security of certain duties; upon which bond the said United States have since obtained judgment. Whereas, also, the said Willis Barnabee has proposed to avail himself of the provision of certain laws of the United States for the benefit and discharge of persons insolvent. Now, therefore, we, the said John E. Abbott, son and sole heir of the above-named John Abbott, who is now deceased, do hereby assert and approve any discharge which said United States may give to said Barnabee; also consent that the right of the United States to have applied to the said debt all and every debenture certificate or certificates applicable to the same, be not by said discharge relinquished, but on the contrary fully reserved and saved to the United States, reserving our respective rights against said Barnabee and each other as sureties." On 26th August, 1829, Willis Barnabee surrendered to the custom house at Portsmouth, to the collector, two debenture certificates; one for $341.40, the other for $50.66, for the benefit of the government, and endorsed on each of them a receipt for the amount thereof, which sums, amounting to $392.06, at the time of rendering the aforesaid judgment, were not and have not since been allowed to the said Barnabee. The estate of John Abbott is insolvent. Samuel Cushman is administrator of the said estate, and has assets more than the amount claimed in the bill.

Mr. Hale, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Goodrich, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This case has been already before the court in an action of debt, founded upon the joint judgment (referred to in the proceedings), and brought against the present defendant; and the court were then of opinion, that, as an action founded upon the joint judgment, it was not maintainable against the defendant, as administrator of Abbott; but, that at law the judgment survived exclusively against Barnabee and Sherburne. [Case No. 14,907.] The present bill in equity is brought to recover the amount of the same judgment out of the assets of Abbott in the hands of the defendant. The defendant admits assets sufficient to pay the amount due to the United States on the judgment; but he denies, that the United States, by reason of their legal priority, or otherwise, have any right or title whatsoever to satisfaction thereof out of the assets, under the circumstances of the present case. There is no dispute between the parties as to the material facts. It is admitted, that the original bond for the payment of duties was in its form joint and several, and was given by Barnabee as principal, and by Sherburne and Abbott as his sureties; that the judgment was obtained against all the obligors on a joint suit in the lifetime of Abbott; that Barnabee and Sherburne are insolvent; and that the United States have received the sum of $392.06 in debenture certificates from Barnabee, which have not been deducted from the amount of the judgment.

The first consideration which arises, is, whether the amount of these debenture certificates ought to be deducted from the judgment debt. I have not the slightest doubt, that it ought to be deducted; for to this extent the judgment has either been satisfied, or the judgment was pro tanto originally taken for a larger amount than what was actually due. The argument for the United States seems to be, that it was properly matter of set-off in the original joint action; and not having been then insisted on, it cannot now be made of any avail. Now, whatever force there might be in the argument upon the ground of laches, if the present were a suit brought by any of the parties to the original judgment to be relieved against the same to the amount of the debenture certificate, upon which it is unnecessary to give any opinion, though I must say, that it would be difficult to convince a court of equity, that it ought not, under the circumstances, to give the relief, as the case of an omission of credit by mistake or accident; or, if treated as a set-off, in the nature of a counter demand, which might be, but was not necessary to be, set off in that suit; the argument can have no just application in the present case. The present suit is brought by the United States to enforce a claim against the defendant in equity; and it would be most extraordinary, if a court of equity should lend its aid to any party to recover any debt beyond what in conscience and truth is due to him. One of the fundamental rules in equity jurisprudence is, that he, who seeks equity, must do equity. The debenture certificates, in truth, are to be deemed a part payment of the debt; which the United States were bound to give credit for; and it would be a fraud upon the sureties to set up a claim against them for the whole judgment debt, when it had been in part extinguished, and the United States must be presumed to have agreed to give a credit for the same pro tanto.

We come, in the next place, to the consideration of the point raised by the defendant, as to the release of Barnabee by the secretary of the treasury. I have already had occasion to express my opinion, that the release was inoperative in consequence of the conditions annexed thereto not having been complied with; for Abbott, the surety, in his lifetime never assented to it, and the assent of John E. Abbott, his son, is in no just sense the assent of his legal "representatives," if such an assent would have been a compliance with the condition. The main argument on behalf of the defendant is, that the release became, in the event, an operative discharge of Barnabee, notwithstanding it has not been delivered, and notwithstanding the condition has not been complied with; because (it is said) the secretary has required by the condition more than by law he was authorized to require; and also, because a literal compliance with it became impossible. The condition required is, that Sherburne and Abbott should consent to the discharge of Barnabee, without any prejudice to their liability. At the time of the making of the instrument, Abbott was dead; and, therefore, a literal compliance with its terms was impossible; and the secretary had no right, by law, to impose the condition. Besides; by the death of Abbott, he was discharged at law from the judgment; and it survived against the other obligors only. The assent of his legal representatives could not be required to the discharge, for by his death his legal liability was gone; and they were by law incompetent to give such an assent. Sherburne, the only surety, who is liable upon the judgment, has assented; and the condition by his assent had been complied with, as far as could be required by law. Such is the argument. The infirmity of the argument is, that it assumes, that if the condition annexed by the secretary is either impossible, or beyond what the law requires, or authorizes, the condition is void, and it leaves the release absolute. Now, that is the very matter in controversy. And my opinion is, that the release of the secretary, if it is to operate at all, must operate throughout. If he has exceeded his authority, the whole act is void, and not merely the condition. The condition is a condition precedent, and if impossible to be performed, the release does not take effect. If illegal to be required, still the release being to take effect only, when it was complied with, the whole instrument, in its original concoction, was invalid. But it does not appear to me, that the secretary has exceeded his authority in imposing the present condition. On the contrary, it was within the scope and objects of the laws, under which he acted. The act of March 2d, 1831, c. 61, § 4 [4 Stat. 467], authorized the secretary, when he was satisfied, that the debtor was insolvent, and had committed no fraud, to "compromise with the debtor upon such terms and conditions as he may think reasonable and proper, under all the circumstances of the case." A broader discretionary authority could scarcely have been given; and it has not, in any manner, been restricted by the subsequent acts, so as to touch the present condition. The amendatory act of July 14th, 1832, c. 227 [4 Stat. 595], extends the provisions to reach the present case; and further provides (section 3) that the debtor shall not be discharged "until it shall appear to the satisfaction of the secretary of the treasury, that the sureties of the debtor are unable to pay the said debt, and that they are entitled to the provisions of this act in like manner, as the said principal debtor shall be entitled to the same, or unless said sureties shall file their consent, in writing, with the secretary of the treasury, that the privileges of this act, and the act, to which this is an amendment, may be extended to their principal without any prejudice to their liability; or unless such discharge can and shall be given in such manner, as not to affect the legal liability of such sureties." It is apparent, that the secretary imposed the present condition with this directory clause immediately under his view. The act of June 7th, 1834, c. 45 [4 Stat. 676], further provides, that if any surety, or co-surety, of the debtor, shall be dead, "the consent of the legal representative or representatives of such deceased surety or co-surety shall be received, and entitle the applicant for relief in like manner as the consent of a living surety or co-surety would do, by the provisions of the 3d section" of the act of 1832. So, that the very case now in judgment has been expressly provided for, viz. that of a deceased surety. And there is no pretence to say, that if the legal representative of such surety might, or could, at law or in equity, be made liable for the debt, his assent to the discharge might not be required by the secretary, as a proper and reasonable condition of granting it.

The next question is, whether the United States are entitled to maintain the present bill, under the circumstances of the case, against the defendant, as a matter of equitable jurisdiction. I am of opinion, that they are. The estate of Abbott is insolvent; and, in a case of insolvency, the United States are, by virtue of the act of March 3d, 1797, c. 74 [1 Story's Laws, 464; 1 Stat. 512], entitled to a priority of payment out of the assets of the deceased debtor. In my judgment, there is no difference, as to the right of priority, whether the debt due to the United States is a legal debt, or an equitable debt. Each is equally within the purview of the statute; and a bill in equity is the appropriate remedy to enforce this priority against the administrator. U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108, 115; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 531–535.

The only real remaining question is, whether the death of Abbott operated to discharge him altogether from the original debt, both at law and in equity; for if his estate is liable in equity for the debt, it is wholly immaterial, how the matter would stand at law. The argument of the defendant is, that the present is the case of a surety, and against a surety a court of equity will take no step to enlarge his liability, or to make him liable, where he is already discharged at law. Generally speaking, this doctrine is true, and fully supported by the authorities. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 164; Id. § 82. But the question is, whether it applies to the present case. This is not a case, where the plaintiff seeks to have a bond, or other contract, joint in its form, reformed, so as to make it joint and several against a surety, living, or dead. In such a case, a court of equity will not interfere, unless there is the most plenary evidence to establish the fact, that it was the intention of all the parties, that it should be several, as well as joint. But if such an intention is clearly established, courts of equity will enforce that intention, when there has been an omission to express it by accident, or mistake, or fraud, as well against sureties as against the principal debtor. Under such circumstances there is no distinction between the case of sureties and that of principals; for it is a mere specific performance of the original contract, as understood by all the parties. The true difference between principals and sureties is, that in the case of principals, courts of equity will ordinarily presume, that a contract, in form joint, was intended to be joint and several, as all are equally debtors. But in the case of sureties, courts of equity will presume nothing beyond what the positive facts substantiate; and if the contract is in form joint, they will not presume it to have been intended to be joint and several, unless upon distinct and satisfactory proofs to that effect. The cases of Devaynes v. Noble (Sleech's Case) 1 Mer. 564–568; Sumner v. Powell, 2 Mer. 36; Thomas v. Frazer, 3 Ves. 399, 402; Rawstone v. Parr, 3 Russ. 424, 539; Wiser v. Blachly, 1 Johns. Ch. 607; Berg v Radcliffe, 6 Johns. Ch. 302; Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 680; Hunt v. Rosmaniere's Adm'rs, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 211, 212; Id. 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 16; Weaver v. Shryock, 6 Serg. & R. 262, 264, 265,—fully recognize the general doctrine and the distinction, each of which indeed is so reasonable in itself, that as soon as it is enunciated, it carries with it its own intrinsic justification. But no reform whatever is required of the instrument in the present case. It is a bond joint and several in its form, as is required by the duty collection act of 1799, c. 128, § 62 [1 Story's Laws, 627; 1 Stat. 673, c. 22]; and therefore it is the several, as well as the joint contract of each of the obligors. As between the obligors themselves, Sherburne and Abbott were the sureties, and Barnabee the principal debtor. But as between them and the United States, they were all principal debtors, jointly and severally liable as such by the general principles of law, as well as in equity. The reasoning of Mr. Chancellor Kent, in Berg v. Radcliffe, 6 Johns. Ch. 302, is entirely satisfactory and conclusive upon this point, if it admitted, as I conceive it does not, of any reasonable doubt.

The argument of the defendant proceeds upon the supposition, that if a bond, joint and several in form, is sued against all the obligors, and a joint judgment is obtained thereon, that joint judgment, though unsatisfied, ipso facto, extinguishes the several, as well as the joint obligation ex contractu. No authority has been cited, which supports such a doctrine even at law; and it is somewhat difficult to ascertain the principles, by which it can be maintained. A joint judgment upon a joint contract without doubt operates at law as a merger of the joint contract; and having passed in rem judicatam no joint suit can afterwards be maintained upon the contract, but only upon the judgment. That has been the well-established law at least ever since Higgens's Case, 6 Coke, 44–46; on the ground, that a judgment, being matter of record, is of a higher nature than a mere specialty; and the law will not in point of policy allow a plaintiff to multiply suits for the same cause of action against the defendant, to his oppression and injury. See Com. Dig. "Action," K, 3, K, 4; Lechmere v. Fletcher, 1 Cromp. & M. 632, 633. If one of the judgment debtors dies, the judgment survives against the others; and no remedy at law lies upon it against the executor or administrator of the deceased debtor. If, however, the original debt was in reality the joint debt of all the parties, as partners, or as otherwise having a joint interest, and the survivors are insolvent; in such a case a court of equity will enforce the judgment, as it would have enforced the original contract, against the assets of the deceased debtor, upon the ground, that it ought, under such circumstances, to be treated as a several, as well as a joint contract. In the present case the contract is several, as well as joint; and it becomes necessary to consider, whether the joint judgment could even at law operate as a bar to a several suit brought against Abbott in his lifetime or against his legal representatives after his decease upon the several obligation created by the bond. Treated as a matter of principle it would be difficult to affirm, that a joint judgment ought to be held any bar except to the joint contract, on which it was founded. In a several suit bought rightfully on the bond as a several contract, the bar of a former joint judgment would not seem to apply; for in a legal sense the former judgment was not between the same parties, nor upon the same contract. It would be strictly res inter alios acta. In Higgens's Case, 6 Coke, 44–46, it was held by the court, that where two are bound jointly and severally and the obligee has judgment against one of them, he may yet sue the other; for against him the nature of the bond is not changed; for notwithstanding the judgment he may plead, that it is not his deed. See Broome v. Wooton, Yel. 67, and Mr. Metcalf's note; s. c., Cro. Jac. 73, 74; s. p. stated in 1 Cromp. & M. 634, 635. That case is not directly in point to the present; for, here, the original judgment was joint; and therefore, quoad the bond, as a joint contract, it had as to both passed in rem judicatam. In Dyke v. Mercer, 2 Show. 393, two men were bound in a bond to J. S. (it is not said jointly and severally); one was sued, who pleaded, that his co-obligor had been sued to judgment and thereupon a fieri facias issued, and the sheriff levied the money. Upon demurrer it was held, that the plea was bad, it not averring any satisfaction. Here, again, the party sued was not a party to the former judgment. In Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 253, 265, it was held by the supreme court of the United States that a recovery in a several suit against one partner upon a partnership contract (a note) was no bar to a joint suit against both partners on the same contract, at least as to the partner, not before sued, and who set it up as a separate defence; for as to him the former judgment was no merger of the contract, he not being a party to that judgment. On that occasion the court said: "The doctrine of merger, even admitting, that a judgment against one of several joint obligors would terminate the whole obligation, so that a distinct action could not be maintained against the others, which is not admitted, can be applied only to a case, in which the original declaration was on a joint covenant, not to a case, in which the declaration on the first suit was on a sole contract." This case also is distinguishable from the case at bar, because the defendant was not a party to the original judgment. But the remark of the court, that a judgment on a sole contract cannot be a bar to a suit on a joint contract seems to apply in principle here; for it must be equally true as to the converse case of a judgment on a joint contract, as a bar to a subsequent suit on a sole contract. They are not, and cannot be treated as the same identical cause of action between the same parties. The case of Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. 148, is also distinguishable. The original suit was brought against one partner upon a partnership contract; and afterwards a joint suit against both partners, in which each partner pleaded the former judgment in bar. The court held, that the former judgment was a good bar as to the partner, who was formerly sued; and that, therefore, the joint suit was not maintainable against either partner, since there was no principle of law, which could authorize separate judgments in an action on a joint contract. The court criticised the case of Sheehy v. Mandeville; but did not deem it applicable to the case before them. But the learned judge, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "It is true, that in case of a joint and several contract an unsatisfied judgment against one of the promisors is no bar to a subsequent action against the other." The subject has been very recently discussed in England in Lechmere v. Fletcher, 1 Cromp. & M. 623; but there, again, the facts did not call for any decision of the precise point now before this court. In that case there was an original partnership debt, upon which a joint suit was brought; and in that suit (irregularly enough, as was admitted) one of the defendants had a verdict in his favor and the other a verdict and judgment against him. Afterwards the plaintiff brought a sole suit against the defendant, who had the verdict in his favor, upon a distinct promise made to him before the former suit was brought to pay his (the defendant's) proportion of the debt. One question was, whether the former judgment in his favor was a bar to the new suit; and the court of exchequer held, that it was not; for it was not for the same cause of action, or to be disposed of by the same evidence. On that occasion, however, Mr. Baron Bayley, in delivering the opinion of the court, went largely into the authorities, and especially commented on the case of Higgens, 6 Coke, 45, and Broome v. Wooton, Cro. Jac. 73, Yel. 68. After quoting the language of Lord Chief Justice Popham in the latter case, that in debt on an obligation against two, "every of them is chargeable and liable to the entire debt; and therefore a recovery against one is no bar as to the other until satisfaction," he added: "If, indeed, that were the case of a joint bond, not a joint and several bond, we have been referred to no authority, which goes that length. It may be, where you sue and recover a judgment against one debtor only, on a contract which is joint, and not several, that your right to sue on the joint contract is destroyed. That, if so, would be so merely on the ground of the difficulty, to which the form of action would give rise. If on a joint contract you have sued one, and entered judgment against him, there might be an invincible obstacle; because upon a new action against another of the parties to the contract, the defendant would have a right to plead, that he made no promise, except with the other defendant, and he could not be joined. Therefore, though we have met with no case, which establishes the position, we are inclined to think, that, in the case of a joint bond, a judgment against one joint contractor would be a bar to an action against another. But if a defendant is liable separately, as well as jointly, the technical difficulty, to which I have referred, is removed." He afterwards added: "Where there is a joint obligation, and a separate one also, you do not, by recovering judgment against one, preclude yourself from suing the other." Now, this reasoning though not ad idem, yet certainly in its general scope goes far to establish the conclusion, that a separate suit would be maintainable at law against Abbott's administrator, on the separate obligation of Abbott; and that the judgment on the joint action would be no bar, because in such separate suit it would not be necessary to make the other obligors parties. And upon principle, if there were no authority, it appears to me, that the same conclusion must be drawn. When a party enters into a joint and several obligation, he in effect agrees, that he will be liable to a joint action, and to a several action for the debt; and if so, then a joint judgment can be no bar to a several suit, if that judgment remains unsatisfied. The defect of the opposing argument is, that, it supposes, that the obligee has an election only of the one remedy, or of the other; and that by electing a joint suit, he waives his right to maintain a several suit. That I take not to be a sound legal interpretation of the contract. The remedies are concurrent. And I know of no principle of law, which would have prevented the plaintiffs from bringing a joint suit and a several suit on the bond at the same time, and proceeding therein pari passu. It is true, that they could have but one satisfaction. But we all know, that on the same contract the plaintiff may often maintain different suits at the same time, though he can have but one satisfaction. A joint judgment is not per se a satisfaction of a joint and several contract.

I have thought it proper to say thus much upon the general question at law. But in my judgment, it is wholly immaterial in this case, whether a suit could be maintained at law, or not. The joint contracts of debtors, having a common interest, are in equity treated as joint and several, wherever the joint remedy at law fails to enable the plaintiff to obtain satisfaction. Thus, if a joint debt of partners exists, and one of them dies, and the other is insolvent, a court of equity will compel payment out of the assets of the deceased partner. In such a case, a court of equity raises, by implication the several liability. A fortiori, the same principle will be applied by a court of equity in the case of a contract, in form joint and several, where the survivors are insolvent. If the joint judgment could be treated at law (as I think it cannot be,) as a merger of the several obligation; so far from that constituting a ground in equity to refuse relief against the assets of the deceased party, it furnishes a clear ground for its interference; for it is against conscience, that a party, who has severally agreed to pay the whole debt, should, by the mere accident of his own death, deprive the creditor of all remedy against his assets. So courts of equity have always treated this matter; and the present case is but a new application of a very old and well-established doctrine. I do not go over the authorities. The principle to be deduced from them, and the authorities, by which it is supported, are sufficiently stated in the work cited at the argument. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 676, and note 1; Id. § 164, and note. Sir Wm. Grant, in Devaynes v. Noble (Sleech's Case) 1 Mer. 564, 565, and in Sumner v. Powell, 2 Mer. 30, 36, has given a very clear exposition of the doctrine, and of the grounds of equitable interference. It is applied to all cases, where the contract is in fact, or ought in contemplation of law to be held, joint and several; and then it is immaterial, whether all are principals, or a part are sureties. Rawstone v. Parr, 3 Russ. 424, 539, fully recognizes this doctrine, though the case was finally disposed of upon another ground, viz. that there was no sufficient proof, that a joint and general contract was intended by the parties.

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the United States are entitled to a decree for the amount of the debt now due to the bond, after deducting therefrom, the amount of the debenture certificates, with interest upon the balance, to be paid out of the assets of Abbott now in the hands of the defendant, in virtue of their general right of priority of payment in a case of insolvency.

OFFICER—APPOINTMENT—NOTICE.

An overseer of a road in Virginia, who has not been notified of his appointment, is not liable for the penalty of the act of Virginia of 5th January, 1786, p. 27.

Presentment against the defendant [G. W. P. Custis], as overseer of the road, to recover the penalty of fifteen shillings, for neglect of duty, under the sixth section of act Va., Jan. 5, 1786, p. 27.

E. J. Lee, for defendant, objected that there was no evidence of notice to defendant of his appointment. The act of December 10, 1796, (page 372,) required notice in a certain way, and the sheriff's return is to be conclusive evidence, and is the only evidence which the court can regard.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1853.

SEAMEN — ABOLITION OF FLOGGING — INDICTMENT FOR FLOGGING SEAMAN—JUSTIFIABLE CAUSE —"VESSELS OF COMMERCE"—MALICE.

1. The act abolishing the punishment of flogging in the navy, and in vessels of commerce is not a penal law, and no indictment can be framed upon it. It applies to whaling ships, which are "vessels of commerce," within the meaning of this act.

2. It prohibits corporal punishment by stripes, inflicted with a cat, and any punishment which in substance and effect amounts thereto.

3. The degree of such punishment is not material; it is the kind of punishment which is alone to be considered.

4. It is a question of fact for the jury, whether the punishment inflicted was, in substance and effect, the punishment of flogging.

5. Under an indictment founded on the third section of the act of March 3, 1835 (4 Stat. 776), if the punishment inflicted was flogging, it was without justifiable cause.

6. But it is incumbent on the government to prove, not only that the act was without justifiable cause, but that it was malicious, that it was a wilful departure from a known duty. If the master knew that his act was illegal, it was malicious, in the sense of this act of 1835.

[Cited in The Yankee v. Gallagher, Case No. 18,124.]

This was an indictment under the third section of the act of March 3, 1835, (4 Stat. 776,) against [Charles B. Cutler] the master of the whaling bark Dolphin, for beating one of his crew. It appeared that the man had been disobedient, and in a quarrel with the boat-steerer, under whose command he was at the time, the man had wounded him severely in the head. And that the defendant had caused the man to be seized up, and inflicted on him six blows with a piece of ratlin stuff. There was evidence tending to show, that when the master was about to inflict punishment, he called all hands, and declared that he was unwilling to flog the man, but felt it was his duty to do so; and some of the witnesses testified that he also said that he knew it was against the law, but felt obliged to go through it.

Mr. Brown, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Bosworth, for defendant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The defendant is indicted under the act of 1835, for beating one of his crew with malice, and without justifiable cause. The government must prove (1) the beating; (2) the want of justifiable cause; (3) malice. The beating is not denied. The first question is; was there justifiable cause? If the punishment inflicted was the punishment of flogging, within the meaning of the act of 1850 [9 Stat. 440], there could be no justifiable cause, the authority of the master to punish by flogging being taken away. And it is for the jury to find whether what was done, amounted to the punishment of flogging abolished by that act. In order to decide this question, it is necessary for the jury to attend to what is the punishment of flogging referred to in that law; and my instruction is, that it is corporal punishment by stripes, inflicted with a cat, or any punishment which, in substance and effect, amounts thereto. The particular form of the instrument is not material; what you must look to is the effect produced. If the man was punished by stripes, inflicted with a rope, and this, in substance and effect, is the same kind of punishment as the punishment of flogging with a cat, then it is prohibited by this law. The degree of severity of the punishment is not material. It is the kind, and not the degree of punishment which is important. It may be, that one blow with a cat would inflict stripes more painful to be borne, than one blow with a piece of ratlin stuff. But this is not material, if both are corporal punishment by stripes, and both are in substance the same kind of punishment. Another question is, whether whaling ships are vessels of commerce within the meaning of this law. I am of opinion they are. I do not state the reasons which have brought me to this conclusion, for they were fully detailed in the charge given to the grand jury at the present time.

It also incumbent on the government to prove malice. This word is not to be interpreted in its popular sense. It means, a wilful departure from a known duty. If the master knew that his act was unlawful, and did it, intending to take the consequences, that was a malicious act, within the meaning of this law of 1835.

The act of 1850 is not a penal law, and no indictment can be framed on it. But it has the effect to make an important change in the powers of the master, and consequently has an important effect on the question of justifiable cause and malice, arising under indictments framed on the law of 1835.

The defendant was found guilty.

direction of the president, to authorize the advance of public moneys to disbursing officers, is merely directory to the officers of government, and is not a qualification of the contract of the surety for such officer; and the surety is liable for the misappropriation of public money by his principal, though it was advanced to him contrary to this act.

2. As the president speaks and acts through the heads of departments in reference to the business committed to them, if money is advanced by the direction of the head of the proper department, the direction of the president will be presumed.

[5. Cited in Chadwick v. U. S., 3 Fed. 755, to the point that treasury transcripts are admissible as evidence when suit is brought in any case of delinquency of a revenue officer or other person accountable for public money.]

This was an action of debt on the official bond of Charles W. Cutter as navy agent. Cutter having absconded was not served; but service was made on several of his sureties, who appeared and pleaded the general issue, with leave to give any special matter in evidence. It appeared on the trial that Cutter was duly appointed navy agent for the United States naval station at Portsmouth, on the seventeenth day of April, 1850. His appointment was to continue in force for the term of four years from the sixteenth day of the same April. The terms of his commission required him "carefully and diligently to discharge the duties of navy agent, by doing and performing all manner of things thereunto appertaining; and to observe and follow the orders and directions which he may from time to time receive from the president of the United States and the secretary of the navy." The bond declared on, bears date on the twenty-third day of April, 1850; and its condition is, that Cutter "shall faithfully discharge all his duties as navy agent in the navy of the United States." At the trial, the attorney for the United States offered to read, in evidence, copies of letters from Cutter to the secretary of the navy, and from the latter to Cutter, certified under the seal of the department. The defendant's counsel objected to their being read in evidence:—1. Because not annexed to any transcript of an account. 2. Because some of them are copies of letters to Cutter, who must be presumed to have the originals, and no notice has been given to him to produce them. 3. Because on this trial, Cutter not being a party, his admissions are not evidence, as against his sureties. The court overruled the objections and admitted the evidence,—it being admitted by the defendants that Cutter had absconded, and that his place of abode was unknown to the district-attorney. The plaintiffs called John B. Sullivan, who, being examined, stated that he was a clerk in the fourth auditor's office, which was charged by law with the settlement of the accounts of Cutter. He produced an account rendered by Cutter to the department, of the date of June 30, 1851, showing a balance against Cutter of $31,813.37. The witness stated that there was no change made in this account by the auditor,—it was allowed and settled as presented. He produced also another account rendered by Cutter, covering the period of time between the date of the last-mentioned account and the 24th day of July when Cutter was removed from office. This account consisted entirely of credits claimed by Cutter, which amounted to the sum of $22,000.80. The witness stated that the whole of this was allowed to Cutter, except two sums of $2,750, for which no voucher was produced, and $20, an error in overcharging commissions. And he produced an account stated on the books of the auditor, showing, that charging Cutter with the balance of his former account, $31,812.37, and crediting him with the amount found due to him as navy agent, he was a defaulter to the amount of $12,581.57 in that capacity. The witness further stated, that by the direction of the secretary of the navy, the navy agents paid the navy pensions, and that consequently Cutter had another account as navy pension agent; and he produced an account rendered by Cutter to the department, in that capacity, and bearing date on the first day of July, 1851, showing a balance against Cutter of $1,437.52. This account had been allowed as correct by the auditor. As to the balance of Cutter's account as navy agent, the defence was, that one of the items of debit in that account amounting to the sum of $18,400 had gone into Cutter's hands contrary to one of the regulations of the navy department, and without any order from the president of the United States. And the defendants offered evidence tending to show that by a standing regulation of the navy department made on the first day of June, 1849, "The requisitions of disbursing officers through the bureaus of the navy department, must be accompanied by the triplicate of the bill to be paid, duly receipted by the storekeeper, or other proper officer authorized to receipt for supplies, and approved by the senior officer present." That during the period of time in question, a dry dock was building at the navy yard in Portsmouth by contractors; and that in reference to the payments on account of that contract, the secretary of the navy directed this regulation to be so far modified, that moneys might be advanced to the navy agent upon certificates of the officer inspecting the work, approved by the senior officer present. That on the third day of April, 1850, Cutter forwarded to the bureau of docks and yards, a requisition for money on account of this contract, of $18,400, accompanied by the required certificate of the inspecting officer approved by the senior officer. It appeared that the course of business of the bureau of the department in case of regular requisitions, was for the bureau to draw on the secretary, who ordered the money to be remitted or not as he should see proper. On this occasion such a draft was drawn by the head of the bureau on the secretary of the navy, and by his order the required sum of $18,400 was remitted to Cutter. On the twenty-third day of the same April, Cutter made another requisition on the bureau for the same sum of $18,400, accompanied by the triplicate of the bill, approved by the senior officer, from which it appeared that this last requisition was for the same payment for which the first was made. The head of the bureau drew on the secretary for this sum, and it was by the order of the secretary sent to Cutter. It did not appear whether the first sum had been actually remitted to Cutter when the second was ordered to be paid to him, nor was it made certain, by any direct evidence, whether it was intended that Cutter should have in his hands $18,400, in anticipation of a payment, or whether it was by an oversight and mistake of the department, that he received one of these sums. The evidence was such that the jury might have come to either of these results. The court ruled, that this evidence and any inferences of fact which the jury could legitimately draw from it, would not in point of law, relieve the sureties from responsibility for this item of $18,400.

In respect to the balance due from Cutter, as navy pension agent, it was insisted by the defendants that it was not within the condition of the bond, because this was only for the faithful performance of the duties of navy agent, and a witness was called by the defendants, who testified that he held the office of navy agent at Portsmouth, after Cutter's removal, and that he received a separate appointment and gave a separate bond as navy pension agent. But the court ruled that the business of paying navy pensions did not constitute a separate office; that there was no such distinct office known to the law of the United States as "navy pension agent"; that it was competent for the secretary of the navy to assign this business to navy agents, and if he did so, it became part of the duties of their offices, for the faithful performance whereof their sureties would be liable.

It was then agreed between the counsel, with the sanction of the court, that the case should be taken from the jury and the questions of law considered by the court, and a verdict directed as the court might think the law required; it being understood that before the case should be finally committed to a jury, either party might take a bill of exceptions.

Mr. George, U. S. Dist. Atty.
G. Marston and T. W. Emery, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. I have now maturely considered the questions of law involved in this case, and will proceed to state my opinion thereon, and to give such directions to the jury as will finally dispose of the case in this court.

The first question which I have considered, arises out of the evidence respecting the circumstances under which the two sums of $18,400 came into the hands of Cutter. It is not denied, that this was public money of the United States, nor that it came into the hands of Cutter to be applied by him as navy agent, to pay for the building of the dry dock at the navy yard at Portsmouth. But the ground is, that no order of the president of the United States appears to have justified this advance of money to the disbursing officer, and that in respect to one of those sums, it was paid to him without his having produced the voucher required by the regulation of the navy department.

One argument for the defendants is, that the act of congress of January 31, 1823, § 1, prohibits an advance of public money to any disbursing officer, without the especial direction of the president, and that the government has shown no such especial direction in this case. In Williams v. U. S., 1 How. [42 U. S.] 290, the supreme court had occasion to put a construction on this section, and held, that general instructions by the president to the secretary of the treasury, to make such advances to the marshals of the United States as the secretary should deem proper, and the act of the secretary in making the advance brought the case under this law; that such duties can be performed by the president only through the agency of the appropriate department and the act of the head of that department is, in legal effect, the act of the president. That case differs from this, in so far as there was oral evidence in that case, of some former general directions of the president. No oral or written evidence has been given in this case, of any directions by the president to the secretary of the navy on this subject.

The question is, is any such evidence necessary? The act of congress which authorizes the construction of this dock (9 Stat. 170), contains this language: "That the secretary of the navy is hereby directed to cause to be constructed at each of the navy yards, at Kittery, &c., and the sum of fifty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated towards said dock at Kittery." By a subsequent act (9 Stat. 270, 271), the secretary is required to make a contract with one of two sets of contractors, therein named, for building and completing this dock. By two subsequent acts (9 Stat. 377–516), further appropriations were made for prosecuting and completing the work. There can be no doubt therefore, that the whole subject of the construction of this dock was placed by congress under the care of the secretary of the navy. In Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 498, the question arose whether the president had reserved from sale a particular tract of land. The court say: "At the request of the secretary of war, the commissioner of the general land-office, in 1824, colored and marked upon the map this very section, as reserved for military purposes, and directed it to be reserved from sale for those purposes. We consider this, too, as having been done by authority of law; for amongst other provisions in the act of 1830 (4 Stat. 420), all lands are exempted from preëmption, which are reserved from sale by order of the president. The president speaks and acts through the heads of the several departments, in relation to the subjects which appertain to their respective duties. Both military posts and Indian affairs, including agencies, belong to the war department. Hence we consider the act of the war department in requiring this reservation to be made, as being in legal contemplation the act of the president; and, consequently, that the reservation thus made was, in legal effect, a reservation made by order of the president, within the terms of the act of congress."

I am unable to distinguish the question in this case, from that arising in Wilcox v. Jackson [supra]. Here the secretary of the navy not only had committed to him generally, the subject of naval affairs, but the construction of this dock, was expressly placed under his care by the acts of congress, authorizing its erection. In reference to this subject it may be said, with even more propriety than in Wilcox v. Jackson, that whatever the president is to do, he is to do through and by the secretary. This money was advanced to Cutter in each instance, by the order of the secretary. So far as the authority of the president was necessary, I must consider him as speaking and acting through the secretary to whom the subject was committed by congress. I must presume, in the absence of all evidence, that the advances made, were with his approbation and under his direction, within the meaning of the act of congress. But if this were otherwise,—if the especial personal direction of the president were necessary to bring the advance within the act of 1823, I should have great difficulty in holding, that the absence of that direction would prevent the sureties from being responsible for public money actually received by the navy agent. It came into his hands to be applied to the uses of the government. He was bound so to apply it. His failure to do so was unfaithful conduct in his office. And for all unfaithful conduct by him, the sureties are responsible, unless it appears that a particular transaction is not within their contract. Reduced to its real substance the argument in their favor is, that though they were responsible, according to the terms of their bond, that Cutter should faithfully perform the duties of navy agent, it is not a duty of a navy agent faithfully to apply public moneys which come to his hands contrary to the command of this act of congress. Now, the second section of this act, and another act containing provisions similar to that of its third section, have been under the consideration of the supreme court; and it has been held that these provisions of law are merely directory to the officers of the government, and make no part of the contract with the surety; that they are created by the government for its own security, and to regulate the conduct of its own affairs, and that though the surety may place confidence in the agents of the government, and expect them to observe the prescribed regulations, he has the same means of judgment as to their fidelity in office, as the government itself has, and the latter does not undertake to guaranty that fidelity. U. S. v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 720; U. S. v. Vanzandt, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 184; Smith T. v. U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 292; Dox v. Post-Master General, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 318. I perceive no sound distinction in this respect between the first section of the act now under consideration, and the second and third sections which have been thus interpreted. The former relates to placing money in the hands of the officer; the latter to allowing it to remain there, and his continuance in office. Each of these regulations, would, if observed, tend to diminish the responsibility of the surety, and to save him from loss. If it be not a part of his contract that one should be observed, neither is it that the other should be. Indeed, in the case of Minor v. Mechanics Bank of Alexandria, Id. 46, the supreme court held that even if the president and directors of a bank were to conspire with the cashier to enable him to misappropriate the money of the bank, this would not save his sureties, which clearly shows that the obligee does not guaranty to the sureties, the faithful observance by others, of those precautions which, if observed, would tend materially to their security. And these views apply also to the argument grounded on the failure to observe the regulation of the department requiring the production of the triplicate bill, before remitting the money. This was a regulation made by the government for its own security, in the conduct of its business, which formed no part of the contract of the surety; it was clearly in the power of the secretary to dispense with it, if he thought it needful to do so; and the failure to observe it constitutes no defence. Nor does the fact that two sums of $18,400, instead of one, were advanced to Cutter, in any view which may be taken of the evidence, amount to a defence. If this was done inadvertently and through laches, it is settled by the cases above cited, that the laches of its officers cannot prejudice the government. Whether by laches or design, these two sums came to the hands of Cutter, it was public money received by him in his capacity of navy agent, and which he was bound, in that capacity, to apply to the uses of the United States. His misappropriation of it, was unfaithful conduct as a navy agent, and for this, by the terms of their contract, the sureties are responsible.

The next inquiry is whether these sureties were responsible for the faithful application by Cutter of the funds intrusted to him for the payment of navy pensions. In the case of Browne v. U. S. [Case No. 2,036], I had occasion to examine the question, whether the employment to pay navy pensions constituted a distinct office, under the constitution and laws of the United States. I came to the conclusion that it did not; that this duty was assigned by the secretary of the navy to the navy agents as part of their duties as navy agents. To this conclusion I now adhere. The terms of Cutter's commission as navy agent authorize and require him "carefully and diligently to discharge the duties of navy agent, by doing and performing all manner of things thereunto appertaining; and he is to observe and follow the orders and directions which he may from time to time receive from the president of the United States and the secretary of the navy." The terms of the commission are, therefore, broad enough to include all duties which might from time to time be assigned to the officer by the orders of the secretary of the navy, provided they are among the things which by law may appertain to the office. As was observed in Browne v. U. S. [supra], no other description of the duties and powers of this office is known to me, except that contained in the act of March 3, 1809, § 3 (2 Stat. 536), to make contracts or for the purchase of supplies, or for the disbursement, in any other manner, of moneys for the use of the navy of the United States. There can be no doubt that moneys paid to officers and seamen as pensions, are disbursed for the use of the navy of the United States, and that it is within the terms of the commission issued to Cutter, for the secretary of the navy to order him to pay them. When such an order had been made, the faithful disbursement of the public moneys intrusted to him for this purpose, became part of his duties as navy agent, and as such within the terms of the contract of his sureties that he would faithfully perform all the duties of navy agent. The cases bear a very close resemblance to Minor v. Mechanics Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 72. In that case a by-law of the bank provided that "the cashier shall do and perform all other duties that may from time to time be required of him by the president or board of directors relative to the affairs of the institution." When Minor was appointed cashier, the duties of teller were also assigned to him. Though the office of teller and the distinct accounts which belonged to it were still kept up, the court held that the duties of teller thenceforth became part of the duties of cashier, and the sureties, who had undertaken for the faithful performance of the duties of cashier were responsible also for the performance of those duties which had previously belonged to the office of teller. That his bond as cashier must be construed to cover all defaults in duty annexed to the office from time to time by those authorized to make such annexation.

The remaining inquiry is, whether the copies of the correspondence were rightly admitted. Very little practical importance can be attached to this inquiry in this case, because the letters bore only on the question of Cutter's being a defaulter, and as the state of his accounts, as settled at the treasury, was fully shown, by unexceptionable evidence, the admission or rejection of the letters became immaterial. But I think they were rightly admitted. The act of congress of September 15, 1789 (1 Stat. 69, § 5), provides that the secretary of state shall cause a seal of office to be made, &c., "and all copies of records and papers in the said office, authenticated under the said seal, shall be evidence equally as the original record or paper." By the act of February 22, 1849 (9 Stat. 347, § 3), it was enacted, that "copies of books, papers, documents, and records in the war, navy, treasury, and post-office departments, and in the attorney-general's office, may be certified in the same manner, and with the same effect as those in the department of state." This correspondence, which consisted of letters to and from Cutter, was so certified. But it is objected that the copies of the letters to Cutter are not admissible, because they are only copies of copies; that if the copies which are in the navy department had been produced, they would not be admissible without accounting for the failure to produce the originals in the possession of Cutter. But when it was admitted that Cutter was an absconding defaulter, and that his place of abode was unknown to the district attorney, the failure to produce the originals is accounted for. It was further objected that Cutter's admissions are not evidence against his sureties. I am inclined to think the mere naked admissions of the principal, not made in the course of any business, or as parts of any acts with which the surety is connected by his contract, cannot be received in evidence against the surety. The laws on this subject are collected in 1 Phil. Ev. 297, 390, and in 3 Cow. & H. & Edw. Notes, pp. 241-245. There are cases which go so far as to admit the declarations of the principal as evidence against the surety, without restriction as to the time or circumstances under which they were made. There is also another class of cases, in which it is held that, a judgment against the principal is evidence against the surety, of the demand which it establishes.

Drummond v. Prestman, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 515; Heard v. Lodge, 20 Pick. 53. But in this case it is only needful to say, that the letters, both of the secretary and Cutter are not mere naked declarations. They are demands on the one part for payment, and on the other part replies to that demand. They are strictly part of the res gestæ in the administration of that office, for the faithful conduct of which the sureties were bound. And such are admissible in evidence against the sureties, upon the same principle that his accounts, rendered to the department are admissible.

I have now considered all the questions raised in this case. I am of opinion that there should be a verdict rendered for the plaintiff. Upon this verdict judgment must be rendered for the amount of the penalty of the bond, to be discharged on payment of the amount actually due; that is to say, the two sums of $12,581.57, and $1,437.52, amounting to the sum of $14,019.09, with interest from the date of the writ. See Farrar v. U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 373; Ives v. Merchants Bank, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 159.

Case No. 14,912.

UNITED STATES v. CUTTS.

[1 Sumn. 133.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1832.

BANK STOCK—ASSIGNMENT—TRANSFER—EQUITABLE TITLE—UNITED STATES—PRIORITY OF PAYMENT—ADMINISTRATOR—ASSETS.

1. A, owning certain five per cent. stock of the United States, borrowed $1960 of B on a note payable in four months, and made an assignment of the stock, with a power of attorney to transfer it on the books of the bank, and delivered the certificate of the stock to B, who was to sell the stock, if the debt was not paid when due. A died before the note became due, insolvent and indebted to United States, who claimed a priority of payment. The stock was never transferred on the public books during A's lifetime. After his death his administrator sold the stock, and applied the proceeds to the payment of B's debt. It was held, that B took an equitable interest by the assignment in the stock, notwithstanding the act of 1790, c. 61 [1 Story's Laws, 109; 1 Stat. 138, c. 34], had declared, that transfers should be made only on the books of the government by the party in person, or by his attorney, and that the payment by the administrator was not a misapplication of the assets.

2. The act of 1790, c. 61 [1 Story's Laws, 109; 1 Stat. 138, c. 34], did not intend to interfere with, or prohibit, equitable titles or claims on stock; but only to fix the legal title between the government and the holder.

3. Stock held by a trustee (and the holder after an assignment is a mere trustee) is not assets in the hands of his administrator or assignees.

This was an action of debt on an official bond, given by N. Lyde (the intestate) for the faithful performance of his duties as purser in the navy. The parties agreed to a special statement of facts, as follows: "It is agreed that the defendant's intestate was a purser in the navy of the United States, and that the bond mentioned in the plaintiff's writ was given by the said Lyde for the faithful performance of his official duties as such purser. The said Lyde died on the 7th of July, 1828, and in June, 1829, a balance was stated by the accounting officers of the treasury to be due from the said Lyde's estate to the United States, of $5522.08. The defendant immediately afterwards paid to the United States the sum of $3857.75, being the amount of assets in his hands, unless the court shall be of opinion on the facts following, that he had a further amount. On the 1st day of July, 1828, the said Lyde borrowed of Thomas Sheafe the sum of $1960, and gave his note for that sum to said Sheafe, payable in four months, and also delivered to said Sheafe a certificate of five per cent. stock of the United States, standing on the books of the Bank of the United States, at Boston, for $1960, and executed and delivered to him an instrument, of which the following is a copy: 'Know all men, by these presents, that whereas I, Nathaniel Lyde, of the United States' navy, have obtained a loan of Thomas Sheafe, of Portsmouth, N. H., Esq., on my promissory note, bearing date this first day of July, 1828, for $1960, payable in four months and grace from the date hereof, and I have agreed to pledge $1960 of United States five per cent. stock, redeemable after the year 1832, belonging to myself, the certificate whereof has been delivered to said Sheafe, previous to the execution hereof, for drawing the payment of said note. Now know ye, that, in consideration of the premises, and for value received, I do hereby assign all my interest in said stock to said Thomas Sheafe, in trust and for the purposes aforesaid; and I do authorize and empower the said Thomas Sheafe, in person or by substitute in his name, to sell, assign, and transfer, unto any person or persons, as much of said stock as may be necessary to pay whatever may be due on said note, together with the necessary expenses attending the same. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, the first day of July, A. D. 1828. Nathaniel Lyde. (Seal.) Sealed, &c., in the presence of Richard R. Waldron, W. B. Parker.' And the said Sheafe, at that time, made to said Lyde a receipt in the following words: 'Portsmouth, N. H., July 1st, 1828. I acknowledge to have received of Nathaniel Lyde, Esq., a certificate of United States five per cent. stock for nineteen hundred and sixty dollars, as collateral security for a note of said Lyde to me for that sum, which certificate is to be returned to said Lyde, also the assignment of said stock, whenever said note is paid. Thomas Sheafe.' The said Lyde died on the 7th of July, 1828. After the said note became payable, the said Sheafe applied at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States at Boston, to make a transfer of the same, which was refused at said office on account of the death of the said Lyde; and on the 15th of January, 1829, the said [Edward] Cutts, as administrator as aforesaid, on said Sheafe's giving a bond to indemnify him, transferred the said stock on the books of said office, to said Sheafe, in payment of said note and interest, and nine dollars and eighty cents, which sum constituted part of the money paid by the said Cutts to the United States. The said Sheafe allowed the current price at Boston, for stock of that denomination. The circumstances and amount of said Lyde's estate were not known at the time of the transfer. His estate has since been represented insolvent. If the court are of opinion, that the said stock, under the foregoing circumstances, constituted assets in the hands of the said Cutts, as administrator, the defendant is to be defaulted, and judgment rendered for the sum of $1664.33, debt, and costs, in common form, and execution to issue. If otherwise, judgment is to be rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the same sum, to be levied on the goods and chattels, which were of the said Lyde, and which shall hereafter come to the hands of the said Cutts, as administrator as aforesaid, to be administered. It is understood, that the defendant is not to be prejudiced by the foregoing statement from claiming further allowances, which he claims to be equitably due from the United States to the estate of said Lyde."

The cause was argued at the last October term at Exeter, N. H., in the absence of the district judge, by Messrs. Mason and Durell for the plaintiffs, and by E. Cutts and Mr. Bartlett for the defendant.

For the plaintiffs it was contended, that there was no legal transfer to Sheafe by the instrument stated in the case, in the lifetime of Lyde. The transfer by the act of 4th of August, 1790; Story's Laws, p. 112, c. 61 [1 Stat. 140],—could be made only on the books of the treasury, by the party or his attorney; and this provision extended to all subsequent acts respecting the transfer of the public debt. The certificates of the public debt on their face purport "to be transferable only at the bank," by the party or his attorney. If this be so, then, by the death of Lyde, the transfer was extinguished; and, Lyde's estate being insolvent, the United States were entitled to the statute priority given to the government by law, and the administrator had no right, as against creditors, to make the transfer for the benefit of Sheafe. The instrument of agreement did not make any transfer of the stock, or show an intention to make any immediate transfer. The words are, that Lyde has agreed to transfer, not that he has transferred. No transfer was to be made, until after the note became due, and was unpaid. And so the receipt of Sheafe purports. If these positions are correct, then Sheafe had no lien on the stock. The delivery of the certificate would not make any difference, or give any lien on the stock; and the power given in the instrument was a mere verbal power, not coupled with any interest. There was no mistake, no fraud, and no error. The parties did exactly what they intended. The case, then, falls directly within the authority of Hunt v. Rousmanière's Administrator [Cases Nos. 6,897 and 6,898]; s. c., 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 174, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 1. Against other creditors, in a case of insolvency, a court of equity would not give any relief. So it was held in Hunt v. Rousmanière. It would not overrule the express provisions of the statute, as to the mode of transfer.

For the defendant it was argued, that the instrument was not a mere power of attorney. In the beginning, it is true, it is stated, that Lyde had agreed to pledge, &c.; but afterwards it is expressly stated, that he does thereby assign the stock. It is a power, then, coupled with an interest in the stock. It is true, that it was not a transfer at law, but it was in equity, and transferred Lyde's interest in the stock; and so the power was irrevocable, and survived the death of Lyde. A trust coupled with a power or interest survives. 4 Dane, Abr. c. 135, art. 6, §§ 4, 8. The intention was to give Sheafe a complete lien on the stock. The certificate was delivered to Sheafe, and no transfer could be made on the books of the bank without delivering it up. Hunt v. Rousmanière [supra] was a case of a mere naked power. The intestate remained in possession of the vessel. The loan officer, after Lyde's death, might properly have allowed Sheafe to transfer the stock. The administrator has done no more than his duty. The statute—August 4, 1790 [1 Story's Laws, 109, c. 61, 1 Stat. 138]—as to transfers is a mere regulation between the government and the stockholders, with regard to the legal interest, and who shall be deemed owners, as between them. It did not intend to touch any assignments or transfers between the holders and third persons. Sheafe was an assignee of a chose in action, and as such he had a power conferred with an interest. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. 34. The administrator might have been compelled in equity to make this transfer; and if so, there is no devastavit, or misappropriation of the funds.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This cause was argued fully at the last term; and entertaining, as I did, considerable doubts upon it, at and after the argument, it was continued for advisement until this term. In the mean time, I have bestowed no inconsiderable reflection upon the subject, and have availed myself of all the information within my reach, as I deem the decision of great practical importance.

The question, upon the statement of facts, comes to this, whether there has been any misapplication of the assets of Lyde, the intestate, by his administrator, in the sale and appropriation of the five per cent. stock to the payment of the debt due to Sheafe, Lyde's estate being insolvent, and the United States, in such a case, having, under the statute of March 3d, 1797, c. 74, § 5 [1 Story's Laws, 464; 1 Stat. 512, c. 20], a right of priority of payment of all debts due to the government out of his assets. And that depends upon this farther question, whether the instrument under which Sheafe claims a right to the stock in controversy, and the deposit of the certificate with him, were a sufficient equitable assignment of the stock, or gave a sufficient lien thereon to defeat the priority of the United States.

In order to arrive at a just conclusion upon this point, it will be necessary, in the first place, to ascertain, what is the true interpretation of the terms of the instrument; and in the next place, what is the legal operation of those terms, when their meaning is thus ascertained. The instrument begins by reciting, that Lyde had obtained a loan of Sheafe on a note dated the 1st of July, 1828, for $1960, and payable in four months and grace; and that Lyde had "agreed to pledge" $1960 of United States five per cent stock, redeemable after the year 1832, belonging to himself, the certificate whereof had been then delivered to Sheafe, for securing the payment of the note; and it then proceeds to declare, that in consideration of the premises, he, Lyde, did thereby "assign all (his) interest in said stock" to Sheafe, in trust and for the purposes aforesaid; and he then constituted Sheafe his attorney in person, or by his substitute in his (Sheafe's) name, to sell, assign, and transfer unto any persons, so much of the stock as may be necessary to pay whatever may be due on the note, with the necessary expenses. The intention to pledge the stock, as security for the note, is unquestionable; and in execution of this intention, there is an actual delivery of the certificate, and an assignment, in appropriate words, of all his (Lyde's) interest in the stock, and an authority to sell and transfer the same. It is not, then, the case of a mere unexecuted agreement to pledge the stock; nor a mere naked delivery of the certificate, as the sole pledge; but, so far as the parties could execute the agreement of pledge, without an actual transfer of the stock on the books of the bank, they have perfected the pledge by an assignment of the interest, and a delivery of the certificate. The power of attorney is not a mere naked power, uncoupled with any interest, according to the intention of the parties; but, if such is its effect, it results from principles of law, wholly beside that intention and in opposition to it.

What, then, is the legal operation of the terms of the instrument, according to this, which is the natural, and, as I think, the only just interpretation of them? Is it utterly void, except as a mere power to sell and transfer? If so, then, upon the doctrine of the case of Hunt v. Rousmanière [Cases Nos. 6,897 and 6,898]; s. c., 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 174, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 1, though irrevocable by Lyde during his lifetime, it became extinguished by his death. Now, I am clearly of opinion, that it cannot be so considered. If it does not, in point of law or equity, assign any interest in the stock, still it does contain an agreement to pledge it, which agreement, being legal, is a subsisting contract, capable of being enforced in an action at law, or by a bill in equity for a specific performance, against Lyde's administrator, supposing the rights of other creditors not to interfere. No one can doubt, that, if Lyde's estate were solvent, the administrator might be compelled in equity to transfer the stock to Sheafe, or to a purchaser under him, on the books of the bank, or at least to have it sold, in order to discharge the debt. And, if the administrator should refuse so to do, he might, at the election of Sheafe, be sued also at law for damages for the breach of the contract. But the difficulty is not in applying the remedy; but in the nature and effect of the relief, arising from the interfering rights and equities of other creditors, in a case of insolvency. If a recovery should be had at law, Sheafe, in a case of insolvency, could only come in, pari passu, with other creditors of the same degree, and not with others possessing a priority. And in equity, if he could obtain a specific performance at all, it must be because he has a superior equity upon such a contract of pledge over other creditors. That could not be pretended, unless his contract created a lien on the very stock (see Hunt v. Rousmanière [Case No. 6,897]; s. c., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 1); or an assignment, which should in equity be deemed an appropriation of the fund (Lepard v. Vernon, 2 Ves. & B. 51). In regard to the lien, that seems to have been relied on at the argument, as arising from the delivery of the certificate, according to the intention of the parties, and from some supposed analogy to the lien recognised in equity, in cases of a deposit of title deeds, which is held to amount to an equitable mortgage. See 3 Cov. Pow. Mortg. c. 23, pp. 1049–1061; Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 277, 284. And it has been said, that no transfer of the stock would be allowed, but upon a surrender of the old certificate. That is probably true in point of practice. I am not aware, however, that it is strictly required by law. There may doubtless be a pledge of a certificate of stock, which shall operate merely as a pledge of the instrument, and not of the stock; but ordinarily the deposit of the certificate as an exposition of the intention of the parties, covers also a pledge of the stock. Formerly, indeed, upon a mere deposit of title deeds, the party took an interest in the deeds only, and not in the estate. Ex parte Whitbread, 19 Ves. 209-211. The first case the other way, seems to have been Russel v. Russel, 1 Brown, Ch. 269. In the present case, however, there is no doubt, that the parties intended a lien, or equitable mortgage, not merely upon the certificate, but upon the stock. If the analogy of a deposit of title deeds should, therefore, hold good, it would apply with great cogency to the present case; for it has been decided, that the equitable lien by a deposit of title deeds, is good against the priority of the crown for a debt, found due by an inquisition, after the date of the deposit. Casberd v. Ward, 6 Price, 411. See, also, Ex parte Byas, 1 Atk. 124; Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 277, 284.

P . waiving any inquiry of this sort, let us see, how the case stands upon the ground of assignment. The statute of August 4th, 1790 [1 Story's Laws, 109, c. 61; 1 Stat. 138, c. 34], authorizing the creation and transfer of stock of the public debt, provides (section 7) "that the stock, which shall be created pursuant to this act, shall be transferable only on the books of the treasury or of the said commissioners respectively, upon which the credit for the same shall exist at the time of transfer, by the proprietor or proprietors of such stock, his, her, or their attorney." This clause has been made applicable to all other loans and stock subsequently created. And by the act of March 3d, 1817, c. 211 [3 Story's Laws, 1625; 3 Stat. 360, c. 38], the duties of commissioners of loans were transferred to the Bank of the United States; and have ever since been performed by that national institution. The argument is, that this statute contains a virtual prohibition of any transfer of stock, except on the books of the treasury or commissioners, according to the act of 1790; and that, consequently, the asserted assignment to Sheafe without such a transfer was utterly void, and inoperative, to convey any title whatsoever in the stock to him; and that a court of equity cannot create a transfer against the prohibitions of the act. If such be the true construction of the statute, there is an end of the defence; and judgment must pass in favor of the United States. That, however, is the very hinge of the controversy. That the statute is susceptible of that construction may be admitted; that it is the true or sole construction remains to be considered. Before entering upon this point, it may be proper to premise, that the United States have no lien, for any debts due to them, upon the public stock held by their debtors. To give or support any such lien, would defeat the obvious policy of the acts making the stock transferable. The claim, therefore, of the United States is merely a right of priority of payment, in cases of insolvency, out of the assets of the deceased debtor, in the hands of his administrators or executors, and not out of the stock specifically. The administrator has the sole right to sell and transfer the stock; and his present act, so far as the sale and transfer are concerned, was entirely justifiable, and within the scope of his authority. The only point is, whether he has rightly applied the proceeds in the order of payment of the debts. Now it seems to me, that the true interpretation of the statute is, that, so far as the United States and the proprietors are concerned, no transfer is to be considered as complete and perfect, so as to pass the legal ownership of the stock, and make the purchaser the legal owner, until the transfer has been entered upon the public books. No person can transfer the same as such owner, or entitle himself to receive the dividends, unless he stands as a recorded proprietor upon these books. And there is a manifest propriety and policy, in this view, in making the provision, as it would avoid, on the part of the government, all inquiries into, and examination of, any equitable or other titles, or liens set up, as acquired under a proprietor, by any third persons dealing with him. This object may well be effected, without, in the slightest degree, interfering with the validity of any equitable titles or liens acquired under any agreement between the proprietor and third persons, so far as it regards them respectively. And it would sound harsh, to hold all such agreements between the proprietor and his creditor, or between him and a purchaser, utterly void, inter sese, unless there were a very plain and direct expression in the statute to that effect, which, in this case, there certainly is not. I understand the statute to provide only for legal transfers, and to look to them, and them only; leaving the parties at liberty to create whatever equitable titles and liens they may choose, and to enforce them by the general remedies between them and their representatives, which the jurisprudence of the country recognises for such purposes. And it appears to me, that the analogies of the law, and the general current of the authorities, justify this conclusion.

First, the analogies of the law. Nothing is more common, than for the legal estate or title to be in one person, and the beneficial interest in another. A trustee of stock is the legal proprietor; but the beneficial interest belongs to his cestui que trust. Suppose, in this case, Lyde had held the stock avowedly as the trustee for Sheafe, could there be a doubt, that, upon the death of Lyde, the stock would not have been assets; but would have been transferable to the cestui que trust? Now, in what substantial respect does the case, here put, differ from that at bar? After the agreement and assignment, was not Lyde to all intents and purposes a trustee, holding the legal title for the benefit of Sheafe? The argument would admit this conclusion, if the assignment were not utterly void, as an equitable assignment. But upon what ground can it be held utterly void? The statute has not declared, that a proprietor shall not contract to hold the stock, as trustee for another. Neither has it declared him incapable of making an equitable assignment. All that it has declared is, that there shall not be any transfer of the stock except upon the books of the bank. The certificate upon its face contains the same declaration. Its language is, "which debt is recorded in, and transferable only at, this bank, by appearance in person, or by attorney." But, subject to this regulation, the proprietor may burthen or charge it with any trusts he pleases. The statute has not prohibited trusts; and it is almost incredible, that it should intend so to do. If it does not prohibit trusts, upon what ground can it be inferred, that it means to prohibit equitable assignments, which are only a mode of creating such trusts?

There is a clear line of distinction, running through all this class of cases, between a legal and an equitable transfer and right to stock. In this respect, stock, whether of a negotiable nature or not, bears a close analogy to choses in action; closer, perhaps, than to goods and chattels. See Wildman v. Wildman, 9 Ves. 174, 177. Now, though an assignment is not permitted by the common law, of any choses in action, except negotiable instruments, and therefore a transfer of them is, at law, utterly inoperative; yet it is common learning, that such an assignment is upheld in equity, and amounts to an appropriation of the property to the assignee. Thus, a debt due by bond, or in any other manner, than upon a negotiable instrument, may be assigned; and, from the moment of the assignment, the interest of the obligee, or other assignor, is, in the view of a court of equity, completely transferred to the assignee. And if, afterwards, the assignor dies, the rights of the assignee will be respected in the course of administration; and if the money is recovered by the administrator, as the only proper party to sue, it will not be deemed assets, but be treated as the money of the assignee. See Dawes v. Boylston, 9 Mass. 337; Cutts v. Perkins, 12 Mass. 206, 210; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. 34; Ex parte Byas, 1 Atk. 124. So a draft, drawn by a creditor upon his debtor, for an amount due to him, if made for a valuable consideration, amounts to an equitable appropriation and assignment of the fund, and will be enforced accordingly against the debtor. See Row v. Dawson, 1 Ves. Sr. 331; Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 277, 285, 286; Clarke v. Adair, cited by Buller, J., in Master v. Miller, 4 Term R. 343; Cutts v. Perkins, 12 Mass. 206, 211; Ex parte Alderson, 1 Madd. 53. In the case of Lepard v. Vernon, 2 Ves. & B. 51, the whole scope of the reasoning of Sir William Grant shows, that if the debt had been assigned, the power, given to collect it, would have been deemed a power coupled with an interest, and the assignment a sufficient appropriation of the debt, so as to prevent it from becoming a part of the assets of the deceased in the hands of his administrator. There is nothing, then, in the analogies of the law, which prevents a court of equity from holding the assignment in the present case from operating as an equitable appropriation of the stock, notwithstanding the statute does not contemplate any but a legal transfer of the stock, and directs such transfer to be made, and to be made only in a particular prescribed manner. These analogies show, that a transfer, void at law, may yet be upheld as an equitable appropriation, unless there be some prohibition by positive law.

Then, as to the authorities. They are not, perhaps, all reconcilable with each other; but there is a sufficiently strong body, in support of the views already suggested, to justify the court in its present decision. In the case of U. S. v. Vaughan, 3 Bin. 394, certain shares in the Bank of the United States had been transferred by the holders in London to a purchaser there, the certificate of the stock delivered to the purchaser, and a blank power of attorney to transfer them on the books of the corporation in America. The stock was attached by a process of foreign attachment before any actual transfer had been entered upon the books of the corporation. By the charter of the bank,—Act 1791, c. 84 [1 Story's Laws, 169; 1 Stat. 191, c. 10],—it was provided, that, "the stock of the said corporation shall be assignable and transferrible according to such rules as shall be instituted in that behalf by the laws and ordinances of the same;" and by a by-law of the corporation the stock was made transferrible only at the bank on its books by the proprietor personally, or his attorney. The argument was, that under these circumstances the transfer was void, and the attachment good. But the court held, that the sale and other proceedings operated as an equitable assignment to the purchaser; and that the attachment was void. There is an elaborate opinion of Mr. Justice Yeates, from which I will quote a single passage directly in point. "In what relation, then," says he, "previous to a formal transfer, did the original contracting parties stand towards each other? As between them, it is conceded, there subsisted a certain degree of equity; and why not a trust? B. S. and B. (the holders) ceased to have a beneficial interest in the shares of the bank stock, which they had sold at a full price. It is true on the face of the books they were the nominal stockholders; and a payment of the semi-annual dividends to them would have justified the directors of the bank. But had the power to transfer been revoked by the death of the attorney before its execution, or had it been consumed by fire, a court of equity would certainly have decreed a specific execution of the contract, &c. I, therefore, view B. S. and B. for the purposes of the present argument, as mere trustees for the claimants, against whom a chancellor would enforce a specific execution of their contract, &c.; and thinking, as I do, that the United States can have no claim on bank stock, which their debtors had sold bona fide, &c., I am of opinion," &c. Mr. Justice Brackenridge concurred, holding, that the by-law did not exclude the passing of an equitable interest. The case of Quiner v. Marblehead Ins. Co., 10 Mass. 476 (see, also, Sargent v. Franklin Ins. Co., 8 Pick. 90), is quite as strong. In that case the charter contained a clause, that no transfer of any share in said company shall be permitted, or be valid, until the whole capital stock shall be paid in. One half only had been paid in, and one of the stockholders assigned his shares to a purchaser. These shares were subsequently attached by a creditor of the stockholder; and the main question at the trial was, whether the creditor, or the purchaser, was entitled to the stock. The court held, that the prohibitory clause was not intended, as a general prohibition of transfers, but merely to prevent speculation in the scrip, and to continue the responsibility of the original subscribers, in case of loss, beyond the funds actually vested. The court said, that by this provision the transfer could not be complete, and essential to all purposes, until the full amount was paid in; but that the creditor may be substituted for the debtor, and may acquire the right, upon payment of the residue of the subscription, to have the transfer entered upon the books; and that in the case then before the court the purchaser had the equitable interest in the shares, and the company would be justified in issuing certificates to him. In the case of Union Bank of Georgetown v. Laird, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 390, the charter contained a clause, that "the shares of the capital stock, at any time owned by any individual stockholder, shall be transferable only on the books of the bank, according to such rules as may, conformably to law, be established in that behalf by the president and directors;" but all debts due to the bank must be first satisfied. The question was, whether a creditor, to whom the shares were assigned, as security, was, under the circumstances, entitled to a transfer of the stock without satisfying the debts due to the bank. That is not the point here; but the material consideration is, that the court in that case treated it as a valid equitable assignment. "No person," said the court, "can acquire a legal title to any shares, except under a regular transfer according to the rules of the bank; and if any person takes an equitable assignment, it must be subject to the rights of the bank under the act of incorporation." The same point was directly decided in President, etc., of Bank of Utica v. Smalley, 2 Cow. 770. There, the charter declared, that, "no transfer of stock shall be valid or effectual until such transfer shall be registered in a book or books kept for that purpose by the directors," and unless the person making the same shall previously discharge all debts due by him or her to the corporation. The holder made an assignment of shares in Paris, which was not registered; the question was, whether it passed, as between vendor and vendee, the interest in the stock. The court held, that the transfer was valid between the parties without registration, though the purchaser must take, subject to the rights of the bank. The doctrine in Sargent v. Franklin Ins. Co., 8 Pick. 90, leads to the same result.

I am aware, that there are cases, in which a doctrine, apparently different, has been maintained. See Marlborough Manuf'g Co. v. Smith, 2 Conn. 579; Northrop v. Newtown & Bridgport Turnpike Co., 3 Conn. 544; Northrop v. Curtis, 5 Conn. 246; Oxford Turnpike Co. v. Bunnel, 6 Conn. 552. Those cases are susceptible of this explanation, that the terms of the acts of incorporation were construed to mean, that the registration of the transfers was the origination of the new title, and not merely a legal completion of a previous inchoate title. Several of those cases turned upon the right of attachment of creditors according to the local laws, which operated upon the legal title; and the only other case (Marlborough Manuf'g Co. v. Smith, 2 Conn. 579) involved the sole question, whether an equitable assignee was liable for instalments as a legal stockholder; and it was held that he was not. It might be sufficient to say, that the case at bar involves no point as to the priority of any attaching creditor, nor any question as to the legal ownership of the stock. The whole argument turns upon an equitable interest, and a lien consequent thereon. If these cases are not to be explained in this manner, but turn upon the more general principle already stated, with all possible deference to the learned judges, who decided them, they do not appear to me founded on as solid grounds as those which maintain a different doctrine. In a conflict of authority, my judgment goes with the latter. The case of administrators is not distinguishable from that of assignees in bankruptcy. In each case the assets are bound by the same equities, which would affect the vendors; and the administrators and assignees cannot place themselves in a better situation than the principal; but are bound by the same equities, which bind him. See Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 86, 100; Jewson v. Moulson, 2 Atk. 417, 420; Row v. Dawson, 1 Ves. Sr. 331; Tyrrell v. Hope, 2 Atk. 558; Ex parte Byas, 1 Atk. 124. It is true, that where the equities of all the creditors are equal, a purchaser cannot entitle himself to a priority of satisfaction; but that cannot be, where one has already acquired a lien or equitable title.

Upon the whole, my judgment is, that there has been no misappropriation of the assets by the administrator; but that the equitable interest in the stock was vested in Sheafe; and he had a right to have it sold to discharge the debt due to him. Judgment is, therefore, to be rendered against the defendant, pursuant to the agreement of the parties, only for future assets, quando acciderint.

UNITED STATES v. DAIR et al.

[4 Biss. 280.] [1]

District Court, D. Indiana. Jan., 1869.

PLEADING AT LAW—TRAVERSE—PLEA—NON EST FACTUM—ESCROW.

1. A breach of the condition of a penal bond is not sufficiently traversed by a plea averring that the obligors have not violated the condition to the extent charged in the declaration. It should deny any breach of the condition as charged in the declaration.

2. A special plea of non est factum, averring that the supposed bond sued on is a mere escrow, is bad, unless it avers that the instrument in question was delivered to some third person on a condition that has not been performed. But with such an averment, the plea may be a good special non est factum.

At law.

A. Kilgore, U. S. Dist. Atty., and J. W. Gordon, for the United States.

Milligan, McDonald, Roach & McDonald, for defendants.

McDONALD, District Judge. Debt on a penal bond, against the principal and his sureties. The condition of the bond is that Jonathan M. Dair, the principal, a distiller, should in all respects comply with the requirements of the law in relation to distilled spirits. The breach laid is that Dair unlawfully removed from his distillery eight thousand two hundred and fifty gallons of distilled spirits, otherwise than into a bonded warehouse.

Dair and his sureties, William F. Davison and Abraham Briggs, all plead separately. And the government demurs to all the pleas except two pleas of general non est factum filed by the sureties.

Dair files but one plea. It seems to be intended as a traverse of the breach of the condition of the bond charged in the declaration. It is substantially as follows: that it is untrue that he removed eight thousand two hundred and fifty gallons of distilled spirits from his distillery, otherwise than into a bonded warehouse; that it is untrue, as is alleged in the declaration, that there is due to the plaintiff sixteen thousand five hundred dollars for taxes unpaid upon spirits distilled by Dair; but that, on the contrary, the number of gallons of distilled spirits unlawfully removed by him is less than is stated in the declaration, and the amount of taxes unpaid on spirits unlawfully removed by him is less than that stated in the declaration.

This plea is so obviously and outrageously bad, that it deserves no consideration by the court. It looks very much like a sham plea. The demurrer to it is sustained; and an interlocutory judgment on it against Dair will be rendered.

Davison, one of the sureties, has filed three pleas—a general plea of non est factum, and two special pleas of non est factum. To the two last there are demurrers.

The first of these special pleas of non est factum, avers that Davison signed the bond when it was in blank as to the names of the other obligors; that he signed it at the request of one William F. Sanks, on his assurance that it should be executed by one James Dair before it should be delivered to the obligee; that said James Dair never executed it; and that Davison never would have signed it, but on condition that said James Dair should also sign it.

This plea is an attempt to show that, as to Davison, the instrument is a mere escrow. But this it fails to do. To make the instrument such, the plea ought to have averred that the supposed bond was delivered to some third person to be delivered to the obligee only on the performance of the condition pleaded. For want of such averment, the plea is bad, and the demurrer to it is sustained.

The second special plea of non est factum filed by Davison is like the first, except that it adds that "said supposed writing," after he signed it, "was left with said William F. Sanks as an escrow, to be delivered by him to the plaintiff's agent in case the same was so afterwards executed by James Dair, and not otherwise."

This is a good plea to show that, as to Davison, the supposed bond is a mere escrow, and not his deed. It shows a signing and delivery to a stranger to be delivered to the obligee only on the performance of a condition precedent, which it avers was never performed. If the facts thus pleaded are true, it is certain that the instrument sued on is not the deed of the defendant Davison. Demurrer overruled.

The defendant Briggs has filed four pleas, to the second, third, and fourth of which there are demurrers.

The second of these pleas is substantially the same as the plea of the principal obligor, Jonathan M. Dair, which we have already considered. And for the same reason on which that plea is held bad, the demurrer to this is sustained.

The third and fourth pleas of Briggs are copies of the second and third pleas of Davison, already discussed; and the ruling on them must be the same. The demurrer to the third plea of Briggs is therefore sustained; and the demurrer to his fourth plea is overruled.

[NOTE. Judgment having been given against the principals on the bond, and in favor of sureties, the plaintiffs carried the case by writ of error to the circuit court, where judgment was obtained against all of the defendants. Case unreported. The cause was then carried to the supreme court, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 1.]

UNITED STATES v. DAMIANI et al.

District Court, N. D. Florida. 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—TOBACCO—DEALER—DEBT FOR PENALTY—BURDEN OF PROOF—ACT JULY 20, 1868.

Held, that any person who keeps leaf tobacco for sale is a dealer, and a single sale is sufficient to fix his character as such: that if such dealer does not keep a book and make returns of his purchases and sales, as required by the 76th section of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 158], he becomes liable to the penalty of five hundred dollars prescribed by that section; that in an action of debt for the penalty under that section the jury cannot find a greater sum than five hundred dollars, although the act fixes the penalty at not less than that sum. The plaintiff having proved sales of leaf tobacco by the defendants, and that said defendants had not paid the special tax as dealers in leaf tobacco, and had not procured or kept a book, as required by the act, so far as was known to the assessor of internal revenue, the burden of proof was, by such prima facie case, shifted upon the defendants to show that they had kept such book, and had made the proper returns therein; and, having failed so to do, the jury might infer that no such book was kept by them.

INTERNAL REVENUE—WHOLESALE LIQUOR DEALERS—TAX—DEATH OF PARTNER.

On motion for a new trial.

The firm of Daniels and Son on the 1st day of May, 1873, paid a special tax for the business of wholesale dealers in liquor at Sandusky. The firm consisted of Eve Daniels, the mother, and George Daniels, the son. In August, 1873, Eve died, leaving George her only heir and representative, and also surviving partner, who continued the business at the same place for the remainder of the year in the name of Daniels and Son. Held, that having paid the tax for the whole year, George Daniels was not required to do so again under the law, on the death of his mother and partner, and having been convicted a new trial is granted herein.

UNITED STATES v. DANTZLER.

[3 Woods, 719.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Mississippi. Nov. Term, 1877.

REPLEVIN—SEIZURE—FORTHCOMING BOND—SUBSEQUENT SEIZURE.

When property has been seized by a sheriff, by virtue of a writ of replevin issued out of a state court, and released to the defendant upon a forthcoming bond, it is still in the custody of the state court, to abide the result of the replevin suit, and not subject to seizure by the marshal, under a writ of replevin subsequently issued out of a United States court, at the suit of the United States.

In this case a rule was taken upon the United States marshal, requiring him to show cause why he should not discharge from seizure certain logs and lumber taken by him under a writ of replevin sued out of the United States court, in a suit brought by the United States against the defendant [L. N. Dantzler].

J. Z. George and T. W. Price, for the rule.

Luke Lea, U. S. Atty., contra.

HILL, District Judge. The grounds upon which the rule is based are, that before the seizure was made by the marshal, the state of Mississippi had sued out of the circuit court of the county of Jackson, in this state, a writ of replevin against the said defendant, by virtue of which the same logs and lumber were seized by the sheriff, and that under the provisions of the replevin law of the state, the defendant had executed a forthcoming bond, with sureties conditioned for the forthcoming of said property, to abide the judgment of the court in said suit, and that the property was so in his possession, under said bond, at the time of the seizure by the marshal, under the process from this court. There is no controversy as to the facts stated, the only question being whether or not the property so held by the defendant was subject to seizure by the marshal, under the writ of replevin in his hands, the validity of both replevin writs being admitted. It has been a well settled rule, since the foundation of the federal government, that when property is legally in possession of the officers of the state courts it will not be disturbed by the officers of the federal courts, and that when legally in possession of the officers of the federal courts, it will not be interfered with by officers of the state courts. Any other rule would lead to conflicts, and mar the much desired harmonious action of our complex system of government.

The important question to be considered is, whether or not the property, after it was released to the defendant upon his forthcoming bond, was still in the custody of the circuit court of Jackson county. The bond is conditioned that the property shall be forthcoming to abide the judgment of the court, if adjudged to belong to the plaintiff, and if default is made therein, to pay its value and the damages sustained by the plaintiff, and costs of suit. Section 1535 of the Code of Mississippi provides that if the property is in possession of the losing party, the execution shall command the sheriff to take the property in controversy, if the same may be had, and deliver the same to the successful party; and, if not to be had, that he make the value thereof, together with the damages and costs, of the goods, chattels, lands and tenements of the party, and his sureties against whom the judgment is rendered, or the successful party may have his distringas to compel the delivery of the property, together with a fieri facias for the damages and costs.

There are several adjudicated cases by the supreme court of this state recognizing the right of a claimant to personal property to institute his action of replevin, and have the property seized and taken out of the possession of a levying officer under writs of attachment or fieri facias, though issuing out of different state courts. But no case is found where it has been taken out of the possession of an officer holding under a writ of replevin. The reason given for permitting the seizure of the property in the possession of an officer holding under a writ of attachment or fieri facias, is that the officer levying the process is directed to levy only on the defendant's property, and the writ constitutes the officer the judge of what property belongs to the defendant; and if he seizes property belonging to any one else, his process is no protection to him, and he becomes liable, as a wrong-doer, like anyone else. The same doctrine is held by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 334. In that case, Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, draws very clearly the distinction between the two classes of process, and holds that the officer levying the writ of attachment or fieri facias, being constituted the judge of what property belongs to the defendant, must act at his own peril, and, if he makes a mistake, must answer for it without the protection of the court from which the process issues; but when he seizes the property specified in his process he is not so liable, and will be protected by the court; he, however, must know that it is specified in the process, for if he makes a mistake and seizes that not specified, he is liable as other persons. In this opinion the case of Hagan v. Lucas, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 400, is referred to and approved. In the latter case the facts were substantially these: Hagan obtained judgment against Bynum & McDade, in the federal court for Alabama, upon which execution was issued and levied upon certain slaves in the possession of Lucas, as the property of the defendants. Lucas claimed the property, and gave bond for the trial of his right to the property, as provided by the laws of Alabama. Upon the trial of this issue, it was proved that the same slaves had been levied upon by execution issued upon judgments in the circuit court of Montgomery county, Alabama, in favor of different persons, and Lucas claiming them, gave bond as provided by statute, for their delivery to the sheriff to answer the judgment of the court, should the right be decided adversely as to him, upon the trial of the right of property in that court. This case being removed by writ of error to the supreme court, the judgment of the court below was affirmed, the court holding that the slaves, when in the possession of Lucas, under his forthcoming bonds, were not liable to seizure by the marshal, and that his levy was void; holding, further, that when seized by the marshal they were still in the custody of the state court; that the possession of Lucas was the possession of the sheriff, and that property in possession of one court cannot be disturbed by an officer, under process, from another court, and especially by one holding his authority from a different source. The same rule is held in Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583, and in Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450; the rule laid down in Hagan v. Lucas [supra], being referred to and approved in both cases as the settled doctrine of the supreme court on this question. The rule thus laid down by the supreme court is binding upon this court, and under it the levy made by the marshal in this case must be held as without authority and void, unless the position taken by the district attorney, and ably and ingeniously pressed, be correct, which is, that admitting the rule as stated, it does not apply to a case where the United States are plaintiffs, in a suit in one of their own courts; that in such case the federal court is not one of concurrent jurisdiction with the state court, but of paramount jurisdiction, and that the United States have a right to resort to their own courts to enforce their rights. That they do possess this right is uncontroverted, but I am of opinion that when the United States bring suit against a citizen for the enforcement of any real or supposed right they can claim nothing which is not equally the right of the citizen against whom the suit is prosecuted, and that where a state is a party the same rule will be applied.

There is scarcely a conceivable case in which the United States have not ample redress in their own courts for the enforcement of any right, legal or equitable, without interfering with the jurisdiction of the state courts. The writ of replevin, provided by the law of this state, was not in force in this court until recently adopted by rule of this court. Before then, the United States were only entitled to an action of trover or trespass, and could not have seized this property until after judgment. These actions are still afforded to the United States, and may be prosecuted without any interference with the state court, or its possession of the property in controversy. If the person holding the property under such bond, or a purchaser under him, is about to remove the same from the jurisdiction of this court, upon bill filed alleging the right of the United States to the property, the pendency of the suit and the insolvency of the defendant, an injunction will be granted to prevent the removal of the property beyond the jurisdiction of the court. So soon as the litigation is ended in the state court, the property may be seized if the defendant is successful, or if the plaintiff succeed, it may still be pursued by the writ of replevin, or other remedy. Any risk which the United States may run by reason of not getting immediate possession, would not equal the injury that would result from the conflict of jurisdiction to which the doctrine contended for by the district attorney would lead. For it must be remembered that it would authorize the seizure of the property in the possession of the sheriff, as well as any one else.

It must be admitted that there are cases in which the ends of justice would be promoted by allowing property seized under one writ of replevin to be taken out of the possession of the seizing officer by virtue of another writ of replevin, as in case of attachment and fieri facias, especially as our act of replevin does not allow third parties, claiming the property, to interfere. To enable this to be done, in one or more states it is allowed by statute; but that it requires an enabling statute to permit it to be done, is a strong argument that without it it cannot be done, and none such exists in this state.

A very careful consideration of all the arguments and authorities adduced satisfies me that this seizure was unauthorized and void; therefore, the marshal will release the property and deliver it to the defendant, and it is so ordered.

Case No. 14,918.

UNITED STATES v. DARNAUD.

[3 Wall. Jr. 143.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1855.

SLAVE TRADE — ELECTION OF FELONIES — OWNERSHIP OF VESSEL — CITIZENSHIP — DISCHARGE OF SWORN JUROR — PRIVILEGE OF WITNESS — CUSTOM HOUSE REGISTRY — COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING.

1. In a prosecution under the act of May 15, 1820 [3 Stat. 600], for suppressing the slave trade, the act of receiving negroes on the coast of Africa, and of confining and detaining them on ship-board, and the aiding and abetting in confining, form one transaction, and may therefore be joined together in the indictment and prosecution, under different counts; but the selling and delivery of the negroes at the termination of the voyage, as on the coast of Cuba, seems to be a distinct transaction; and if this felony is charged in the same indictment with the other, the prosecution will be made to elect on what counts it will proceed.

2. Ownership of the vessel by a citizen of the United States, if the accused be not, himself, a citizen; or citizenship of the accused, if the ownership be not by such citizen, is an essential ingredient in maintaining a prosecution under the fourth and fifth sections of the act above named.

3. Citizenship, within the meaning of this act, is not what may be called citizenship of domicile, nor is it such citizenship as has been claimed by diplomatic assertion under our naturalization laws, for one who has formally declared his intention to become a citizen, without having proceeded further. But it is that citizenship which has a plain, simple, every-day meaning; that unequivocal relation between every American and his country which binds him to allegiance and pledges to him protection.

4. The custom house registry of a vessel, under the acts of congress, as a vessel of the United States, prior to which registry an oath must be taken by the person in whose favor it is made, that he is true and only owner, and a citizen of the United States, is evidence of her national character within the meaning of the acts of congress; and of the character under which she publicly appeared and acted; but in a criminal prosecution against a third person, it is very slight evidence indeed—if it be evidence at all—of the real fact of ownership, and whether or not the ownership be in a citizen of the United States. The case of U. S. v. Brune [Case No. 14,677], very slightly qualified, perhaps, but substantially confirmed and its correctness enforced. In such a prosecution the ownership must be proved distinctly, and as other facts are proved, by common law testimony. Purchasing the vessel, paying for her, repairing her and fitting her for sea, bargaining and paying for her ship stores, procuring her pilot, and shipping her crew, all these are proper evidence of ownership, as they also are, if ownership is disproved, that the vessel was navigated for or on behalf of the person doing these acts. But if in direct connection with these acts and alongside of them, it is proved as a fact that the funds which this person was using belonged to a third party, not a citizen; that he had no funds of his own, that he spoke of himself as an agent and was recognized as such by the banker who put him in funds, and by the third person whose funds they were—all this, which is proper evidence—is evidence to show that the ownership was not in a citizen but in a foreigner; and so far to defeat the prosecution.

[1] [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq.]

5. It is irregular for the court to instruct the witnesses generally, or even a single witness generally, that they were not bound, in answer to questions which might be put to them, to make any answers which would criminate themselves. The proper way is to wait until a question is asked, which, if answered in one way may criminate the witness, and for the court then to interfere.

6. Whether two or more signatures, which purport to be the signatures of different persons, are or are not written by the same person, is a proper subject of proof by an expert; though the testimony of an expert on such a subject is a dangerous kind of evidence.

A law of congress (Act of May 15, 1820, c. 113, §§ 4, 5 [3 Stat. 600]), designed for the suppression of the slave trade, enacts by one section, "that if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign vessel, engaged in the slave trade, or any other person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any vessel, owned in whole or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land from any such vessel, and on any foreign shore, seize any negro or mulatto, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall receive such negro or mulatto on board any such vessel with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and suffer death." And by another, enacts that if any such person shall forcibly confine or detain, or aid and abet in forcibly confining or detaining on board such vessel, any negro or mulatto, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall land, or deliver on shore, from on board any such vessel, any such negro or mulatto, with intent to make sale of, or having previously sold, such negro or mulatto as a slave, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and sufier death. Under this law, Darnaud, the prisoner, who had been engaged in a slaving voyage on the Grey Eagle, was indicted. The indictment contained thirty-nine counts. The defendant's citizenship and the national character of the vessel were properly alleged. And five distinct charges were made in the bill: (1) Receiving negroes on board the vessel on the coast of Africa; (2) confining and detaining on board the vessel; (3) aiding and abetting in confining and detaining on board the vessel; (4) delivering on shore at Cuba from on board the vessel, having previously sold; (5) delivering on shore there from on board the vessel, with the intention of selling.[2]

One Marsden, of New York, a principal character in the case, and about whose American citizenship there was no doubt, was alleged in the indictment to be the person who owned the vessel when she was thus engaged, or if not the owner, then the person on whose account and for whose benefit she was navigated.

The prisoner having pleaded not guilty, and Mr. Vandyke, the district attorney, having opened his case, C. Guillou and R. P. Kane, counsel of the prisoner, referring to several authorities,[3] moved that the prosecution should be made to elect on which of the counts

[2] Slave vessels sail with two or three, or four captains. One captain clears her in a United States port, and swears he is an American citizen. Another, belonging to a different country, in connection with the first, when she arrives at the coast of Africa receives the slaves on board. Another, after the slaves are received, takes charge of them and commands the vessel, and makes one of the former captains the doctor, mate, steward, or something else. Another delivers the slaves on shore. This is done in order to enable the vessels to seek the protection of a flag which the cruiser hailing them will, under the treaties between different governments, respect and regard. If a vessel of this nature happens to be chased by a British cruiser, the practice is to run up the American flag; the American captain shows himself with his American papers, and the cruiser goes off without boarding. When an American cruiser comes in sight, the Portuguese or Spanish flag is run up, and the false Portuguese or Spanish papers are produced. In the present instance, when a British cruiser hove in sight, the American flag was run aloft and the American papers were ready to be shown, and when that flag was seen the cruiser went off. It was on these accounts that the indictment charged the prisoner in this separated way, (1) with receiving; (2) with confining and detaining on board, &c. The counts were essentially as follows:

Eleven counts, from first to eleventh, inclusive, charged the defendant with receiving on the coast of Africa on board a vessel called the Grey Eagle, negroes not held to service or labor, with intent to make slaves of them. The counts were drawn in various forms. Twelve counts, from twelfth to twenty-third, inclusive, with confining and detaining negroes on board the vessel Grey Eagle, etc., in various forms. Three, from twenty-fourth to twenty-sixth, inclusive, with "aiding and abetting" in confining and detaining in various forms. Six, from twenty-seventh to thirty-second, inclusive, with delivering on shore from on board vessel, with the following variations: Twenty-seventh charged vessel as owned, wholly and in part, by a citizen and citizens unknown, and also charges the intent of defendant to sell said negroes as slaves. Twenty-eighth charged vessel as owned by a citizen, with intent to sell. Twenty-ninth charged defendant as master of vessel owned by a citizen unknown, intent being to sell. Thirtieth charged defendant, as one of ship's company, with delivering at the Island of Cuba, negroes from vessel owned wholly and in part by a citizen and citizens, having previously sold such negroes as slaves. Thirty-first charged vessel as navigated for a citizen and citizens, and that negroes had previously been sold. Thirty-second charged vessel owned wholly and in part by a citizen and citizens unknown, did on high seas deliver, &c., having previously sold. Thirty-third charged that defendant was a citizen, one of ship's company, of a foreign vessel and did receive on board five hundred negroes, said negroes having been seized on a foreign shore, with intent to make slaves of said negroes. Thirty-fourth, that defendant on high seas, being master of vessel owned, in whole and in part, by citizen and citizens, did receive on board, a number of negroes, who had been seized on a foreign shore. Thirty-fifth, that defendant was a citizen, and one of ship's company, of foreign vessel and did confine and detain a number of negroes, with intent to make them slaves.

it would proceed; arguing that now was the proper time for this application, which if not allowed here could not be allowed hereafter in the shape of error, or in arrest of judgment. They contended that the indictment contained at least four distinct felonies: (1) Receiving the negroes on board the vessel; (2) confining and detaining them on board; (3) aiding and abetting in confining and detaining; (4) delivering on shore from on board the vessel. They were not part of the same transaction, nor were they distinct misdemeanors, merely part of one felony. Each was a distinct felony, alike punishable with death, nor was one an ingredient of the others.

Mr. Vandyke. The application is out of time. If the indictment charged distinct felonies, a motion should have been made to quash before plea pleaded. Having pleaded, the defendant should wait till the prosecution has closed its case. A joinder is allowed even by the common law in regard to all parts of the same transaction. But if it were otherwise, the act of congress of February 26, 1863, provides that "whenever there are or shall be several charges against any person or persons for the same act or transaction, or for two or more acts or transactions connected together, or for two or more transactions of the same class of crimes or offences, which may be properly joined, instead of having several indictments, the whole may be joined in one indictment in several counts; and if two or more indictments shall be found in such cases, the court may order them consolidated." The words "which may be properly joined" do not refer to all the clauses that precede them, but only to the clause "two or more transactions of the same class." This is a statutory felony; and all the acts charged, even if each one is a felony, are parts of the same transaction, or acts or transactions connected together, and are properly joined.

Before GRIER, Circuit Justice, and KANE, District Judge.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The transaction on the coast of Africa is one matter which may be charged in all the forms it will bear. The receiving of the negroes there, the confining and detaining of them, and the aiding and abetting in confining and detaining, form one transaction, though they are different offences. They may therefore be joined together. It might also in the same connection be charged that the act was done by a foreign citizen in an American vessel, or an American in a foreign vessel. Besides, the vessel might be charged as belonging to A. or B., or persons unknown. These are all parts of the transaction. The indictment, however, goes further, and charges the selling and delivering of negroes on the coast of Cuba, which forms a separate and distinct transaction. I am unwilling to say that the receiving, detaining, aiding and abetting in these acts, the man being an American, or being not an American; the vessel being an American vessel, or being not an American vessel, belonging to A., B., or C., or to people unknown, may not be allegations of the same transaction. But I think, as at present advised, that the selling and delivering of slaves on the Cuban coast is a distinct transaction. If the defence asks me to say more than this, I am not at present disposed to do so. But whatever may be the election of the prosecuting officer, he has a right to bring out the whole history of the matter as part of the res gestæ.

Mr. Vandyke, under this expression of opinion, then elected to try on those counts which charged with receiving on board and confining and detaining, and aiding and abetting in confining and detaining, striking out all which charged with crime on the coast of Cuba.

The Grey Eagle was an American built vessel; and had been owned by seven or eight American merchants engaged as partners in the pearl fishery. One Hollingsworth, of Philadelphia, a reputable merchant, was managing owner, and to him alone, as such, the vessel had been transferred by bill of sale, he taking an oath at the custom house that he was "true and only owner;" an oath required by law to be taken by a person when he is true and only owner; but not the proper oath where others are in any way interested with him. The pearl fishery proving unsuccessful, Hollingsworth gave orders to a house in New York to sell the vessel. Marsden called on them and inquired as to the terms of sale. The price fixed was $10,000. Marsden did not wish to give that amount for her, and he was told that he might go to Philadelphia and deal with the owners. He came to Philadelphia, saw Mr. Hollingsworth, and concluded a purchase of the vessel for $9,100, and took her to New York. The bill of sale from Hollingsworth to Marsden was dated March 4th, 1854. Marsden of course with that bill of sale took the register, which had been issued at the port of Philadelphia to Mr. Hollingsworth. A pilot took her to New York and delivered her to Marsden.

Previous to the arrival of the vessel at New York, Marsden employed a rigger to rig out the vessel She arrived there, of course, some time after the 4th; the register and bill of sale were not deposited in the New York custom house until the 20th of March, but in the meantime the vessel arrived there, and Marsden, with two or three others, commenced the active preparation of the vessel for a voyage. Marsden employed the rigger, the carpenter, and sailmaker; bought the coppers which were put on board the vessel for cooking purposes; purchased 28,000 pounds, upwards of 10 tons, of rice; 12 or 14 barrels of beef, and half the number of pork; 24,000 gallons of water; in short he, and he alone, had the vessel prepared for the voyage. He engaged the shipping master to ship the crew, in part by himself and in part in connection with the defendant. And thus on the 20th of March had the vessel partially prepared. He then deposited in the custom house the bill of sale from Mr. Hollingsworth to him, and surrendered the register.

Things remained in this way until the vessel was ready for clearing, which was not until the 25th of March. A majority of the bills which were incurred had not up to the time of clearing been paid by anybody. After she cleared, two or three of the parties having bills, went to the office of one Oaksmith, where Marsden had a desk for the purpose of conducting his business, and there received their pay. Some of them were paid by one Machado, hereafter mentioned.

The vessel, by the agency of Marsden, and by the assistance of Darnaud, who took part in receiving the stores on board, was ready on the 25th of March to be put afloat. At this juncture Marsden employed a broker to make a bill of sale to a person called Samuel S. Gray, and it was done. The register bond in the custom house is regularly signed by some person representing himself as Samuel S. Gray, in which signature the prisoner joined as master of the vessel. The law requires the master to make oath that he also is a citizen of the United States; and all the custom house proceedings and papers assume that he has done so, and that he is one. But for some reasons not properly explained, it appeared that at about this time the officers of the New York custom house violated their duty in this respect; not exacting this oath from masters. In the bond, which was signed by Darnaud, as master, Gray alleged himself to be a citizen of the United States. The broker procured a respectable man as surety, who did not know who Samuel S. Gray was, but went security simply because Marsden requested it, through his agent.

The vessel cleared with those papers, which the prisoner, as captain, was by law bound to take with him; but previous to the clearing, it went through another usual transaction—the shipping of the crew. A crew is shipped in this way: A shipping master is generally the agent of the owner, as well as the agent of certain boarding house keepers who have crews to ship. He opens a shipping office, and sailors go to him and sign the shipping articles, a large printed document prepared in accordance with an act of congress. Some of the sailors make their marks, and some write their names in such a way as to be illegible. This paper is not taken with the ship. It is sent to the custom house and is there deposited. This crew list has appended to it the oath of a notary public that he has received sufficient proof of the American character of the vessel and of the crew named on the shipping list. The law also requires that the owner or master shall deposit a copy, under oath, of these shipping articles, which shall be sworn to by the master before a notary public, as a true and exact copy of the original paper. Of this paper, which is deposited in the custom house, the master takes a copy certified under the seal of the collector. That copy goes with the vessel and forms the paper which is contemplated in the crew bond, and in relation to which the bond is given. All this was complied with. One Pentz, was employed by Marsden to ship the crew for this vessel. After the vessel had sailed, Marsden called and paid Pentz for the shipping of the crew.

Who the Samuel S. Gray was did not at all appear. Marsden was not forthcoming. Nobody identified Gray; nobody knew him. The position of the prosecution was that the transfer from Marsden was a mere fraud; a device to get Marsden's name as owner from off the custom house registry. And the position therefore taken was that Marsden was still owner in whole; or in part with Machado.

On the other hand there was verbal evidence of people's belief that Marsden was a man of no property when he made the purchase and outfit, and evidence of the fact that all the funds came to him from one Machado, of New York, a Spaniard, naturalized here, as the prosecution proved by the production of his papers, and who in this matter, was, as appeared by his own oath, merely the agent of another Spaniard not naturalized, one Rivero, who he said had placed the funds in his hands. Who this Rivero was did not appear at all; nor was he shown to be a man of property. He had been on board the vessel during her voyage to Africa, as one of her two or three captains; but beyond this (see supra, note 2), nothing whatever appeared, Rivero had no written evidence of ownership, so far as appeared; nor was his ownership shown in any way but by the mere fact that Marsden and Rivero had told this Machado (so he swore), that he, Rivero, was owner of the vessel, and the fact that Machado received and paid the funds as Rivero's; doing it sometimes in a pretty loose way. How Marsden was paid for any of his services was not shown by anybody. That most if not all the funds which Marsden used in the matter passed through Machado's hands, was plain enough; but Machado's books were relied on by the prosecution to show that all this was but a form; and that, in part at least, the funds belonged to Marsden, or to Machado, or to both.

So far as concerned the citizenship of the prisoner—a matter important only in case the vessel was really not owned by an American—it appeared that this person was a native of France, and came to this country twelve or fourteen years before this voyage; that he then represented himself as a Frenchman, as he also did when arrested under the warrant in this case; that he could speak little or no English, when he came here; that he lodged at French boarding houses, associated with French people; and when applying for a place on an American vessel was asked how he expected to get the place when he could speak nothing but French. On the other hand, he appeared to have in fact renounced his own country; had hailed for twelve or fourteen years as from the United States; had never used an American protection when shipping for foreign ports; had represented himself in fact, if not positively sworn, at the custom-house, that he was a citizen of the United States; and had acted as captain of a vessel which he knew was registered as American; a privilege allowed by law to American citizens only.

Mr. Vandyke, for United States, to the jury:

The owners of vessels about to engage in the slave trade being certain of prosecution as pirates if discovered, and of the penalty of execution if convicted, make, invariably, and from the origin of their enterprise, arrangements as complete as possible, to defeat all prosecution. The highest efforts of their ingenuity, sharpened by experience of criminal courts, as to what is needed, are brought into action for this purpose. The arrangements consist in a substratum of agents and of foreigners and of men ready to swear to anything; all at first invisible; but in case of a prosecution to be projected upon the scene. The real actors are Americans; and so long as they are not overtaken by the justice of the Nation, we hear of no other actors in the enterprise. No foreigners, no false custom house oaths are necessary. But when a criminal is seen, then the stalking horse comes into view to hide him. The false fabric is raised to shut out from view the true one. All that was pre-arranged for the rear ground—agencies, foreigners, perjury—comes forth complete in every part.

In an indictment for slave stealing, the jury ought to look at facts rather than any testimony not clearly pure. That perjury will be committed by witnesses of the defence is certain. Pre-arrangements are made for perjury in all slave voyages. Unless this slave voyage is unlike every other, and an exceptional case merely, a matter not to be presumed, there will be, as of course, witnesses at hand from the start to show that the ownership is a different one from that which appears, had been sworn to and universally believed.

When, therefore, the jury sees an American citizen acting from beginning to end as owner; with all the muniments and indicia in his own name—treating, buying, rigging, equipping, shipping crew and sending out of the harbor a vessel which he swears is his alone; when in a most dangerous enterprise he declares himself from the beginning to the end of the enterprise to be owner; when the man who is now set forth as owner—a foreigner—a man confessedly engaged in cheating our government and in carrying on under false pretences an illegal and infamous traffic—cannot show that he ever had one written evidence of ownership, even of the most secret kind against an American, a stranger to him, a man of worse character even than himself; when the whole evidence of the Spanish ownership rests not upon even a secret written agreement, but rests on one Spaniard's or his clerk's testimony of what these two infamous characters once told him; and upon the simple fact that the money with which the ship was bought passed through his hands as the money of a foreigner—in such a case, on an indictment where that exact kind of evidence is almost certain to come forth, no matter what the truth may be, then, in such a case, the jury should look at facts, as much more likely evidence of truth than oral testimony. I mean of course than such oral testimony. Had Marsden died, to whom would this ship have belonged? Living or dead, what evidence had Rivero of ownership against Marsden, or against anybody? This is not the way in which merchants—Spanish slave merchants—deal, and is irresistible to show a lie, ex post facto. Marsden is said to have had no property. One witness believes so; knowing little about him. What evidence is there that Rivero had property either? Who is Rivero? He was no merchant. He was one of the captains of this voyage. Where did his property come from? Concede that he put money in point of fact into Machado's hands, and had the semblance of property. Marsden, as apparent owner of the vessel, had much better semblance of property. Who put the money into Rivero's hands? Let them show that. Was it American or was it Spanish capital? Let them show that. Rivero was a mere figure in the case; and used because he was a Spanish figure. How was Marsden paid? Let that be shown. Did he receive commissions? Or had he an interest as part-owner in the voyage? If he was a mere agent he received some compensation in money. Has an attempt been made to show that he received anything in that way? The inference is irresistible that if not owner by original purchase, he was paid by an interest of some kind in the voyage; and that the vessel in part was navigated in his behalf. That is enough. It is a matter of no importance how small may have been the interest which Marsden, or Machado, or any other American citizen may have had in the vessel; if one farthing, it is sufficient, because it is a part of an interest in the vessel. If from all the circumstances of the case as brought before us, as to the parol and paper title and the circumstances under which the vessel sailed, we should believe that any person belonging to this Nation had an interest in the vessel, we are relieved from all difficulty, so far as the point of jurisdiction is concerned. Nor does it matter whether that interest be a legal or equitable one, whether it appear upon the face of the paper title, or has been covered up in fraud, to be inferred from the circumstances of the transaction, with the view of avoiding the responsibilities imposed by congress on those engaged in this unnatural and wicked traffic. If any person was so prominent in the management of the business connected with this vessel as to lead one to suppose that he owned it wholly or in part, it is enough for the purposes of this cause, even though his interest may have been attempted to be covered up and secreted, so that he might screen himself behind the responsibility which rested on the shoulders of all those engaged, and which now rests upon the shoulders of this unfortunate defendant, a fact which may be proved directly or indirectly, or which may be inferred from all the circumstances surrounding the transaction, just as we would infer any other conclusion to which our minds may be led upon a subject of fact involved in any cause. And all that is said in regard to the question of ownership, is applicable to the other question raised by the act of congress, whether—the ownership being foreign—the vessel was navigated for or in behalf of a citizen of the United States.

Then finally, supposing the Spaniard, Rivero, was owner, and that the vessel was not navigated in any way in behalf of any citizen of the United States, was the prisoner a citizen? The term citizen is capable of more meanings than one. Darnaud has renounced his country: he hails from here as a citizen. He is captain of a vessel registered as American; which under our laws presupposes citizenship in him. He has, no doubt, sworn that he was a citizen. The notary public certifies him as such: His domicile is here: Letters of naturalization are not necessary to convert a foreigner into a citizen in all meanings of the term. In the well known case of Martin Koszta, our government interposed and protected as its subject and citizen, against European monarchs, a man who had merely declared an intention of becoming a citizen. The word citizen has therefore other meanings than the one which it has under our naturalization laws. A man may be a citizen who is neither born here nor naturalized. The court will instruct you on this subject. But when a man enjoys peculiar privileges of citizenship, and renouncing in fact—much better than renouncing in form—his own country, adopts another as his home, it seems but natural that he should be deemed a citizen of that other, so far at least as to make him amenable to its laws, when they punish its "citizens" who engage in a traffic denounced by the voice of nearly every Christian nation of the earth.

C. Guillou and R. P. Kane having replied, the charge of the court—Judge GRIER, who had been present during most of the trial, being now absent—was thus delivered by—

KANE, District Judge. The thirty-nine counts of this indictment are included in two general propositions. The first, that the accused, being one of the ship's company, of a vessel which was at the time owned or employed by a citizen or citizens of the United States, did receive or did detain on board one or more negroes, with intent to make slaves of them; or that he did aid and abet others in doing so. The second, that the accused did some one or more of the acts, which are charged and as I have recited them, on board of a vessel; no matter by whom owned or employed; he being a citizen of the United States.

The first class, regarding his own national character as of no consequence; but making the character of the vessel, the national ownership of the vessel, the national character of the owners of the vessel, an indispensable criterion; the second, disregarding the nationality of the owners and employers, but fixing itself upon the national character of the captain, or member of the ship's company, represented by the defendant.

I have to say to you, in the first place, that every one of the elements of the charge, as I have recited them before you, must be proved by the United States before they can claim a verdict of guilty. That is to say: the United States must prove, that this accused prisoner was one of the ship's company of a vessel, which was at the time owned or employed by a citizen or citizens of the United States, and that he then and there received and detained on board one or more negroes with intent to make slaves of them; or did aid and abet others in doing so. Or else, the United States must satisfy you, that the defendant, being himself a citizen of the United States, did one or the other of these acts on board a vessel, without regard to her ownership, upon the high seas.

Among the elements which alternatively constitute the crime, is the citizenship of the accused, or that of the ship's owner. It is not merely a question of jurisdiction in the view of the court, according to the ordinary use of the term. It is a question of the essential elements of the crime. The offence is a statutory one. It not only describes the place where the offence may be committed, and the circumstances which shall go to make the offence, but it defines the persons who alone are capable of committing it. And the statute is as inapplicable to other persons as it is to other places or to other acts.

There is good reason for this, a reason sufficiently obvious. Every nation has absolute jurisdiction of crimes committed within its own territory; and may make whatever laws it chooses, declaring what acts shall be crimes if committed there. But no nation can legislate for others. And as the high seas are the common territory of nations, those laws only which all nations recognize are the laws of that common territory by which all men are bound. No state can any more legislate for the high seas, than a corporator can legislate for the corporation of which he is a member, or an individual citizen for the county or state in which he lives. No nation can make or enforce special laws for the high seas, without infringing upon the rights of other nations. It was an effort on the part of England, like this, to declare what should be the law affecting neutrals, third persons, individuals of other nations, which led to our war of 1812. It was an effort on the part of France, to prescribe what should be the muniments of title borne by American vessels on the high seas, which embroiled us in hostilities with that country in the early part of the present century. It was an attempt of the same sort, or in the same spirit, by Spain, by Denmark, and by other foreign powers, which at different periods led to reclamations, stern and in the end successful, on the part of the American government, for the damage sustained by American citizens by reason of acts of unauthorized jurisdiction.

In a word, no state can make a general law applicable to all upon the high seas. Where an act has been denounced as crime by the universal law of nations, where the evil to be guarded against is one which all mankind recognize as an evil, where the offence is one that all mankind concur in punishing, we have an offence against the law of nations, which any nation may vindicate through the instrumentality of its courts. Thus the robber on the high seas, the murderer on the high seas, the ravisher on the high seas, pirates all of them, recognizing no allegiance to any country, because the very act violates their allegiance to all their fellow men, if caught, may be punished by the first taker. And so too, if the nations of the so-called civilized world, who are fond of calling themselves the whole world, and of arrogating to themselves somewhat too readily all the rights that belong to the whole world, could for once unite in defining that some one act should be regarded as a crime by all, it may be that after such an agreement by all the world, the courts of any one nation might without reference to the nationality of the individual undertake to punish the offence he had committed.

But so soon as we leave these crimes of universal recognition, the jurisdiction of a state over the acts of men upon the high seas becomes circumscribed. It is no longer an exponent of the law of individual or international morals. The owner of a farm cannot legislate for the highway, however conscientious or wise he may be. All the jurisdiction which any nation exerts, or can properly affect to exert upon the high seas, except as the representative of the general sense of mankind, declared in the general law of nations, is founded on the control which every nation has over its own citizens, and their conduct wherever they may be found, or over the acts of others who for the time have subjected themselves to our jurisdiction by accepting the protection of our flag. If you or myself, entitled to the protection of our country, and with our country pledged to defend us wherever we go, not having yet passed within the territory of a foreign sovereign, but being on the common highway of nations, violate the laws of our government, we may be punished for violating them. And if we, being citizens owning vessels under the American flag, entitled, therefore, to protection as American vessels, engage others, whether foreigners or citizens, to be our voluntary associates in violating the laws of our country, and they are caught violating them upon the common highway of nations, they may be brought here and punished.

But it is only in the two cases, where the individual accused is himself a citizen, whose allegiance to his government continued while he was upon the common highway of nations, or where the property upon which the individual was found perpetrating a wrong was property recognized as American, owned by Americans, it is only in these two cases that the United States can make a law which would be binding upon all citizens or which could be enforced by courts of justice; and I do not hesitate to say, after something of mature consideration, that if the congress of the United States, in its honorable zeal for the repression of a grievous crime against mankind, were to call upon courts of justice to extend the jurisdiction of the United States beyond the limits I have indicated, it would be the duty of courts of justice to decline the jurisdiction so conferred. It is for this reason, then, that our government, in denouncing guilt, and punishment against acts like those charged upon this prisoner, denounces acts done by American citizens and by persons sailing under the sanction and auspices of American citizens on vessels owned by American citizens or in their employ.

That the offence is called in our particular statute piracy, does not vary the legal position and consequences of the case. Piracy is essentially an offence against the universal law of the sea. It assumes that the individual has thrown off his allegiance to mankind. He is the enemy of all who meet him. The slave trade, however horrible it may be, is not within that category. It has been recognized as lawful for many centuries by all the nations of the world. It is only within a few years, within the memory perhaps of every one whom I am addressing on the jury, that the first declaration was made by national authority that it was a crime. And up to the present moment there are nations professing to be civilized, Christian nations, that have refused peremptorily to unite in so recognizing it. It is not, therefore, piracy—such a piracy, no matter whether so called in our acts of congress or not—not such a piracy as constitutes a man the enemy of his race, and confers upon every court of justice in every land the right to try and punish him for his acts. It is no further unlawful in the estimation of courts, it is no further unlawful in the estimation of jurors, considered as jurors, whatever it may be in the estimation of all of us as men and as Christians, than as it is distinctly declared by the laws of our own country to be prohibited to you and myself.

The element, therefore, of citizenship in the description of the crime, on the part of the ship's owner and of the master or member of the ship's company, is an essential condition and element of the crime with which this prisoner is charged; and it must be proved as such, or the accused cannot be convicted here.

Having said this, I have nearly got through with the legal propositions that have a bearing upon the case. I come to the consideration of questions of fact—questions peculiarly for you to decide; and in regard to which I desire to go no further than to gather together from my memory those portions of the evidence which bear upon particular points.

First, then, was this vessel owned by an American citizen, or navigated for or in behalf of an American citizen or citizens, at the time of the acts charged in this indictment? In the first place she was American built, and her American character remained unchanged, of course, until in some way or other, she was divorced from it. It remained unchanged, when Mr. Hollingsworth, acting on behalf of a company of gentlemen, but acting in his own name, purchased her, and took out her register in his own name—all those gentlemen being American citizens. She was at that time a vessel owned by American citizens. Those citizens, through the instrumentality of Mr. Hollingsworth, sold her to Marsden, for the time being of New York, and a citizen of the United States, who paid for her and took title in his own name; whether as sole owner, or whether like Mr. Hollingsworth, owner with others, or whether as agent or representative of others, without personal interest on his part, does not appear.

It is to be lamented, and it may be a subject of lamentation not only among moralists, that the preliminaries of title which are prescribed by our laws, and which exact the solemn oath of the party as to the nature of his title, the extent of it, and the number and names of his associates in the purchase, and that the consequent records of title to American ships, are so often irregular and erroneous. You have had a single instance of it, in the case of a gentleman of unimpeached honor in our commercial circles, who makes or rather signs at the custom house a formal oath, that he is the sole and exclusive owner of the vessel, when, in point of fact, it was altogether otherwise; when he was neither the sole nor exclusive owner, but only one of six or seven or eight owners.

The title, the paper title, as between the persons who have themselves taken part in its fabrication, may be regarded as conclusive against them; that is to say, that if you, sir, have executed a bill of sale in my favor, and permitted me to take the register in my name, you shall not be permitted to deny afterwards that you had sold the vessel; and if I accept from you a bill of sale, and go and take out the register, and hold it in possession, I shall not hereafter deny that you sold me the vessel. So far the register may with safety be received as evidence of the transaction. But to say that the execution of a bill of sale by you to me, the surrender of the register by you, and the issuing of a new register in my name, is to be given as evidence against our learned friends who have argued this case before us, who neither could have known nor prevented what we were doing, who had no opportunity of interfering with us, who, if they knew that the whole transaction was a spurious one, an imaginary sale, intended merely as a disguise, and had gone into the custom house to protest against it, would not have been even listened to; to say that they should be bound by what we had done, would be to say that their rights would be at the mercy of our discretion, integrity and honor.

Still, the title, the apparent title, passed from Hollingsworth to Marsden, and it had something more of strength than would properly attach to its paper character, inasmuch as Marsden paid his money before he took it. And thus, at first glance, and till something was shown to the contrary, we should have reason to believe that he was the owner; and he being an American citizen, the vessel continued the property of an American citizen, after passing into his hands. Had, then, the case rested here, it would have been proper for us to require some directness of proof from the parties who should undertake to deny the American ownership of the vessel.

But the United States do not stop here. After showing the title of Marsden, they go on to show that the title, the paper title, the bill of sale title, the register title, passed afterwards to Gray. He, also, is alleged to be a citizen of the United States on the face of the papers. And thus the paper title, upon which, so far as it was worth anything, Marsden's ownership rested, passed altogether by the transfer of that same paper title to another man, described in like terms as a citizen of the United States.

But it is asserted on the part of the United States, that although some one in the name of Gray went through all the formalities at the custom house in the authentication and record of the bill of sale and in procuring the register, yet that this Gray was never the owner at all; and in thus asserting that Gray was never the owner, the United States denounce the truth and efficiency of that title to ownership which is disclosed by the papers of the custom house.

Passing, then, outside of the paper title, the title according to the custom house, whose records have only conducted us into a difficulty from which they fail to relieve us, how stands the fact of ownership? Who was it that did own this vessel? The defendant says Marsden never owned it, just as the United States say Gray never owned it; and both of the paper titles being thus impeached, we must seek for the real ownership in the other evidence that is before us. How stands that evidence?

We had the cotemporary declarations of Marsden, that he bought the vessel and was fitting it out not for himself, but for a Spaniard named Rivero. We had also the declarations of Rivero, that Marsden had bought for him. We had the evidence of a witness called by the United States, Mr. Oaksmith, that Marsden had no means of his own, wherewith to buy the vessel; and we have the evidence of Mr. Machado, and of his clerks, one of them, if not both, that the funds disbursed by Marsden in the purchase of this vessel belonged to Rivero. I am not aware that there is any other direct evidence going to show whose funds purchased that vessel.

If you are satisfied from what the witnesses have said here, that in truth and in fact Marsden was not a man of adequate means to purchase this vessel; that he bought the vessel for a Spaniard, with funds obtained from that Spaniard; that Spaniard declared that the vessel had been bought for him; that he accompanied and controlled Marsden while the vessel was getting fitted out, and directed his correspondent and banker to make advances to Marsden from time to time for the payment of bills, the court says to you, that in the absence of some proof to the contrary, you are called to believe that Marsden was not really the owner of the vessel, but only the agent for the purchase. It is unnecessary for the court to say to you, conversant as some of you are with the everyday transactions of a business community, that the largest mercantile dealings are conducted and concluded in the names of brokers and agents, without declaring the names of their principals; and that large funds are every day in the year put in the hands of agents to negotiate the purchase of ships and cargoes, without an indication that there are third parties interested in the purchase.

On the other hand, to contradict these assertions you have the examination of books of account of Mr. Machado and of Marsden, the collation of entry with entry, and the argument ingeniously and very powerfully pressed by the district attorney, that the books show these stories to be false; that Marsden was really a man of adequate wealth; that Rivero never did buy the vessel; that the purchase was never made for him; that the funds which Marsden got from Machado were not Rivero's funds, but were Marsden's own, or Machado's own, or that at least they were not Rivero's.

You are to judge then, gentlemen, upon all the evidence; I make no further comment upon it, so far as regards this point of the case; whether the funds and ownership in point of fact—not according to the paper title, for that paper title fixes it on Gray—but whether the ownership in point of fact was in Marsden, or Rivero, or Machado, or any body else. You are to say whether Marsden's disbursements were of his own funds; whether he was in whole or in part the real beneficial owner of this ship; or whether it was Rivero or some one else who bought and owned her. If it was Rivero for whom Marsden acted, whose funds he disbursed, for whom he bought and held, then this vessel was not a vessel belonging to an American citizen, or navigated for or on behalf of an American citizen.

I feel the more confidence in putting this point to you strongly and clearly, because I see that were a different doctrine to be held by our courts, there would be scarcely any protection whatever against the arts of slave traders. If the paper title, the formalities of the custom house, the record of the bill of sale, and the issuing of the register, indicated what was the ownership of the vessel, no one American, base enough to engage in the slave trade, would ever be found on board a vessel with an American register, or an American bill of sale. However American her ownership in fact, she would be sold to some Rivero, or some anonymous Portuguese; the Portuguese flag would be hoisted, and the American owner stepping on board would exult under the protecting fraud of an alien flag, and a fabricated bill of sale.

I instruct you, gentlemen, that the law does not regard the semblance, but the fact. Was this vessel in truth, owned by American citizens? If there was a mask, tear it off, and look at the reality. Did this vessel belong to the man who was on board, the Spanish captain as he was called, or did she belong to an American citizen?

Passing then from this point, I come to the other category under which the different counts of the indictment arrange themselves; merely reminding you that unless you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, that this vessel at the time belonged to an American citizen in whole or in part, or was navigated for or on behalf of an American citizen, then all those counts of the indictment in which the charge is made, that the vessel was so owned, are not proved, and your verdict as to them must be not guilty.

Of all the charges in this second class, it is an essential element, that the accused was a citizen of the United States at the time of the acts. You have heard some discussion as to the meaning of this term, citizenship of the United States. It has a plain, simple, everyday meaning; and that meaning you may safely take without a definition. It is that unequivocal relation between every American and his country which binds him to allegiance and pledges to him protection,—that goes with him wherever he goes, stamping him a traitor if he be found in the ranks of an enemy, as a criminal if violating her laws; but watching over him, and covering him with the shield of her power, though he traverses the sea under a stranger flag, or sojourns on a foreign shore. It is not the citizenship of domicile; the citizenship, if you may call it so, of the man who comes to be a guest upon your shores, and who is entitled to protection, just as the stranger becomes a member of your household when you invite him to stay for the night. That is not the citizenship the act refers to; for that subjects to no liability whatever, beyond the territorial limits of the country in which the domicile is. Nor is it what some law books have called judicial citizenship; for that has no relation to a subject like this, but applies only to the question whether the party can sue or be sued in the courts of the United States, or whether their litigation must go over to the state courts. Nor, gentlemen of the jury, is it what some might call diplomatic citizenship, for want of a better term; that grade of inchoate citizenship which may be claimed by one who has declared his intention to become a citizen hereafter; prospective in its allegiance, actual in its asserted rights; about which diplomatists have disputed somewhat, but which I believe our courts have not yet recognized; such is not the citizenship meant by the act of congress. It is citizenship, such as yours and mine—that citizenship which makes us constituent members of this country, and that binds us everywhere to obey its laws, because it protects us everywhere. The right and the duty are inseparable. They begin and end together.

How then stands the question as to this prisoner? In the first place, it appears that he was a Frenchman by birth and language. Such were his own declarations if you believe the witnesses who have been examined before you. The declarations of a man after he is arrested for a crime, or when he is about to commit a crime, may be of very little value; and the man who, to prepare himself for going on a slaving voyage, had taken care to announce to the world that he was not an American, would gain very little advantage from his cautionary declarations. But if, at a time when he was not interested in disguising or denying his true national character, he had declared himself either a Frenchman or an American, having no object in falsifying the truth—not meditating the violation of a law which might subject him to punishment in case he were a citizen of one nation rather than of the other—if by common reputation, in the ordinary converse of his fellowmen, his nationality was recognized as in accordance with his declarations—presenting thus the same sort of evidence of his national character that I have of yours, that you have of mine, that we both have of the gentlemen who surround us in this court—then surely his uncontradicted declarations are entitled to some credit. Just as in a question of pedigree; we speak of parentage and birthplace, on the authority of generally accepted opinion, which resolves itself at last into very little if anything else than the assertions of the party, or his household, or his neighbors. Seafaring men rarely travel with the family bible in their pockets.

If then, it be true, that this man did some fourteen or fifteen years ago arrive here, a Frenchman, apparently unable to speak English, that he did represent himself as born in France, that he did go to a French boarding house, that his associates were French, as this witness testified, that when he applied to one of them to get him a place on board a vessel, he was told it was useless for him to expect to get a place when he could not speak a word of English—having all this before us, and uncontradicted, we are to take him to have been a Frenchman or a foreigner fourteen years ago. If so, when or how did he become an American citizen? When was it? Where was it? We have had in the case of Mr. Machado, the proper proof by which the individual, foreigner by birth, is shown to be an American citizen now. The production of his letters of naturalization, and proof of his identity with the party named in them. We have had no such proof in regard to this man.

What then have we as a substitute? His assertion or admission that he had become one? Doubtful evidence, gentlemen, I may say to you. I should fear very much in a grave cause like this to determine upon the guilt of the prisoner, simply because he had said at a former time, that he was such a citizen as was amenable to our laws of the sea. I have seen too many of the oaths even, that pass through the custom house; I have seen too many good names signed to the papers that were received in that office as proofs of citizenship, and ownership, and identity of invoiced, with actual values, to be very anxious to begin the game of punishing capitally for a misrepresentation of fact at the custom house. Yet if a man has gravely asserted that he was an American citizen, still more if he swore that he was an American citizen, he cannot complain if we so far vindicate the principles of morality as to accept his oath for truth, until he gives us some better reason for believing that he lied. But in this case, did this defendant ever assert or admit that he was an American citizen? That he never carried a protection as an American citizen, as the district attorney has very truly observed, matters little; for very few American citizens carry protections now, and I trust the time may be very distant when they shall again be thought necessary.

But it is argued, that the custom house papers declare or rather assume the citizenship of this prisoner. If so, they would be of value just so far as he had been party to them, or had recognized their correctness; and no further. Look then through all these documents, and say whether you find in them any assertion or recognition by the prisoner, of his being an American citizen. So far as I remember them, those papers from the custom house contained no proof at all as to the citizenship of the accused. In fact, the oath which the act of congress had required to be made, and which would have decided the question of his citizenship, so far as a custom house oath can attest anything, that oath prescribed by the act of congress, was for some years before this transaction, pretermitted as obsolete by the custom house at New York; and thus it happens there is no such oath taken by this accused, by which you can test the question whether he claimed to be a citizen or not. Then you have the crew list. So far as I remember that instrument, it is certified by a notary public that he received sufficient proof of the American character of the vessel, and of the crew named in the list itself. I may say to you gentlemen, that this certificate of that notary public, that he received sufficient proof, and his oath superadded to the instrument that he received such proof, are of little avail to the prosecution. It is this court, which has to judge of the legal relevancy of the proof; you are to judge of its sufficiency. But that crew list upon examining it, unless my recollection deceives me, does not contain any name by which it is alleged this prisoner has passed himself. There is, therefore, no admission, even supposing that he himself had made oath to the accuracy of the crew list, the oath being as to the American character of the vessel, and of the crew named in it. All these, however, like the other facts and circumstances which have been presented to you by the United States, are for you to consider of.

I have gone over two of the points; there is a third. If you are satisfied that the vessel belonged in whole or in part to American citizens, or that the prisoner was an American citizen; if you are satisfied that this prisoner was engaged on board as one of the ship's company, no matter whether as master or as mate, or as interpreter, or as doctor, if he was engaged on board in the prosecution of these acts, there remains still a point you are to be satisfied upon, of the intent on his part to reduce these people to slavery. I do not mean that it is a question whether this was really a slaving voyage or not; it seems to have been settled all around that it was a slaving voyage; but the character of the prisoner's intent as to the individuals who were on board is an essential topic of consideration by the jury. The seamen who shipped for the island of San Thomas, as probably supposing they were going to St. Thomas, in the West Indies, and who found out they were going to a little island on the coast of Africa, after they were on the high seas, bound to obedience by the maritime code, and exposed to peril and outrage if they refused; such seamen cannot be said to have sailed with the intent to make or sell slaves.

We had a case of piracy before this court some years ago, which was presided over by my Brother GRIER, during the whole trial, and in which he made the charge. The evidence in some respects, not in a great many, but in some respects resembled that which has been before you. And I feel, that I shall do well to close the remarks I have to make upon this case by quoting some of the language of my eminent colleague. I adopt it entirely as my own; but I know that I shall secure for my own opinion greater weight by a reference to his. He said as follows:

"The United States can assume jurisdiction and a right to punish this offence committed on the high seas, only in consequence of the allegiance or citizenship of the offender, or because the act was done on board or by the crew or ship's company of a ship or vessel owned in whole or in part or navigated for or in behalf of a citizen or citizens of the United States. Hence it lies at the very foundation of this case, that the prosecution establish to your satisfaction the fact, either that the defendant is a citizen and owing allegiance to the United States and bound by her laws; or that not being such, the ship or vessel was owned in part or in whole by citizens. That the vessel assumed an American character abroad, is in evidence, that she was sent by the consul to an American port, that at Rio she applied to the American consul and held herself forth to the world as American; this affords a strong presumption of her American character, her national character. But it is not a necessary consequence therefrom that her owners were American citizens. Denizens or resident foreigners might have owned her. But then again, she sailed from New London as an American vessel. The testimony affords a strong probability that she was owned by Americans;—and as the testimony is wholly for your consideration, the court will not say that it is insufficient, if it be satisfactory to your minds.

"But the court think it their duty to observe, in a case of such awful and solemn consequences to the defendant, that the jury should be cautious how they deal with mere probabilities. What hindered the government from sending to New London, and bringing here the register, and the very owners themselves, to establish this fact beyond a doubt? Have they a right to call on you to convict on doubtful or probable testimony, when they had it in their power to have removed the doubt and furnished certainty instead of probability? Without wishing to interfere with your prerogative as to the facts, I venture to say that you would not be unreasonable if you required it at their hands."

In a word, gentlemen, I ask you to take the spirit of these remarks, and apply them to this case. When the United States call upon a jury to give a verdict of guilty, they are bound to prove the defendant's guilt of the charge set forth in the indictment. Not. of course, by direct, irrefragable evidence—such evidence, where intent is an element of the crime, is rarely if ever possible—but by evidence which may satisfy the judgment and conscience beyond a reasonable doubt. You will not convict because you suspect; on the other hand, you will not refuse to convict, because you have doubts of legal policy, or sympathies that are to be shocked by a capital execution. You will answer upon the evidence before you, just as you would in a case that called for your cautious because responsible action, in the concerns of daily life, fearlessly, honestly, as men who have sworn to do justly between him and the state.

Mr. Vandyke asked the court to charge, that if the jury believe Marsden exercised the ordinary, usual acts of ownership in the fitting out of this vessel, these acts of his, being part of the res gestæ should be taken into consideration in determining the question whether the vessel was navigated for or on his account.

KANE, District Judge. They are so no doubt. Yet these acts on his part may be colored and explained by attendant circumstances. If Mr. Marsden acted as owner of this vessel in purchasing her, paying for her, repairing her, fitting her for sea, bargaining and paying for her ship's stores, procuring her pilot, all these are acts of ownership, and would certainly show that if he was not the owner, she was at least navigated on his behalf. But then if in direct connection with these acts of his, and running alongside of them, it be proved as fact, that the funds which he was using were the funds of a third person not a citizen, that he had no funds of his own, that he spoke of himself as a mere broker or agent, and was recognized as such by the banker who put him in funds, and by the third person whose funds they were; then, if all these be deemed true and not merely devices to disguise the truth, they would establish the fact of ownership in another, just as in a different aspect, they would be proof he was the owner of the vessel.

Verdict, not guilty.

Incidental Points.

In the course of this trial, the following points, aside from the main case, occurred and were decided:

First Point.

After the prisoner had pleaded not guilty, and a jury had been called, one of the jurors who was in delicate health, stated to the court, that certainly he would be unable to go through the cause without an attack of illness. The prisoner having exhausted his twenty challenges, the court, stating that it had no power to discharge a juror after he was once sworn, unless by consent of parties, suggested to the counsel that in view of the great inconvenience likely to arise, the record by consent might be so far falsified as to strike out the juror's name, and so as not to show that he had ever been called or sworn at all; and that the defendant should have the privilege of another challenge. That in this way both parties would be estopped from alleging the irregularity as matter of error. Being so recommended by the court, this course was agreed to by the counsel on both sides.

Second Point.

When the prosecution had opened its case, and being about to go on with its evidence, had sworn a witness, the prisoner's counsel asked the court to instruct the witness and the other witnesses generally, before any of them were examined, and with a view to their own protection, that they were not bound to make any statements criminating themselves.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. We cannot do this. It would put it in the power of a witness by a mental reservation to tell only what he pleased, and to be the judge of what would criminate him, and the crimination might be moral, political or criminal. The court will interfere when necessary.

Third Point.

To prove the reputed American character of the vessel on which the piracy alleged in the principal case was charged to have been committed, and the public declaration of her ownership by a citizen of the United States—such character and ownership being essential facts to sustain the indictment—the prosecution offered in evidence the vessel's original registry at the custom house in New York; promising to follow this proof up with other evidence of ownership. This registry, as is generally known, is made under an act of congress (Act of December 31, 1792 [1 Stat. 287]), declaring what vessels shall be "denominated and deemed vessels of the United States, entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels." It prescribes that before the registry can be made, the owners or one of them must swear or affirm that according to the best of his or their knowledge and belief, the vessel is owned wholly or in part by a citizen of the United States.

Objection being made by Mr. Guillou and Mr. Kane, who relied on U. S. v. Brune [Case No. 14,677], that case was distinguished by Mr. Vandyke, district attorney, for the United States, from this, because there the evidence was neither preceded nor to be followed up by any other evidence. It was the only evidence the prosecution relied on; and though offered as prima facie, was in truth relied on as conclusive. Here we shall follow the matter up by direct evidence of actual ownership. We wish to prove the history of this vessel from her build to the present day, and these papers are offered as part of the history of the vessel, and as part of the record and title of the vessel. What they are worth will be hereafter a question. As part of the paper title of the vessel, and as showing through whose hands she has passed, and in whose hands she now is, they are at least competent.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. You can prove that these are the original custom house papers; and they may go to the jury as part of the case generally, and to show under what public character the vessel appeared and acted. What they are worth in law as evidence of actual ownership by a citizen of the United States, is matter to be considered hereafter.

Fourth Point.

The custom house registry of ownership of the vessel, which was now in evidence, being found to be in the name of one Gray, who on those books thus appeared to be owner, and the prosecution alleging that the name of Gray was a simulated one, which had been fraudulently assumed by some person in order to get the apparent ownership out of Marsden, a former registered, and still the real owner—the prosecution in order to prove the fraud, and that the name was thus simulated, now offered to prove by an expert that two different signatures on the registry, to wit, the signature to a bond, a crew bond, and a manifest which purported to be made, one by one person, and one by another, were in fact made by the same person under different names. But the prosecution had not proved, nor was it admitted by the defence, who had made either signature. The question put to the expert was, "Look at the signatures to the bond, to the crew bond, and to the manifest, and say whether they are, to the best of your knowledge and belief, by the same person?"

Mr. Guillou objected to the question. Unless you have an acknowledged signature, or one proved by one who saw it signed, for comparison, you cannot bring in the evidence of a mere expert.

Mr. Vandyke. That is true in the case of a forgery. I know that there must then be a test paper by which the other signatures are to be proved. But I wish to show that the same man, whoever he be, signed the manifest, the oath, the crew bond and the register bond; that they are all signed by one and the same person. If I offered this testimony for the purpose of showing that a certain A. B. signed those papers, then it would be necessary for me to have an admitted signature of A. B., in order to prove that he did sign them; my object now is only to prove the fact that the signatures on all the papers are by the same person.

Mr. Guillou, in reply. In a capital case any doubtful or dangerous evidence ought to be wholly excluded. It does not do to let evidence in to the jury, expecting that an antidote will come from the charge of the court. An effect in a criminal case is produced by the mere admission of evidence, and the charge cannot destroy this effect. How uncertain is the evidence of an expert on a question of this kind! If you would bring every expert from Maine to Louisiana, you would find one half of them would decide directly contrary to this witness on the stand. Nor has the counsel on the other side any right to open so wide a field for controversy; he is able to produce any number of witnesses he may want on the subject, but the defendant who is a stranger here and a foreigner, has not the same means to do so.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. If the evidence were offered to prove that the prisoner had made both these signatures, it would be incompetent unless you had first an acknowledged or proven signature of the prisoner as a datum for a standard of comparison. Perhaps, indeed, it is only in cases of forgery where there is a similitude of handwriting, that such evidence is admitted at all. But here Mr. Vandyke is trying to prove external facts unconnected with the defendant. He has to show that the defendant did certain acts, that he went to Africa. He has not only to do that, but he must show more—he must show the national character of this vessel, her history, and a hundred other matters; and then her name painted on her stern. So, also, he gives the public register connected with her, showing the public character the vessel acted under. He then shows that a man by the name of Marsden is connected with her, and is the owner; that he paid her bills and fitted her out to go upon this voyage; that he had a bill of sale to her, and that he is a citizen; that under suspicious circumstances, there was a transfer made to a separate party, who, he alleges, is a man of straw—nobody at all—and in order to prove it so, wants to show that the signature of the captain and that of this party appear to be the same, done by the same hand. Now if that be a fact, would there not be some evidence in the case to show that it is so? He has put himself upon showing that this man is not the true owner; that there is a bill of sale made to him which is a mere sham; that it is made to nobody, and this is legitimate evidence in the case; not that it fixes this man as Darnaud, but that the transfer upon the record shows upon its face these two signatures were done by the same hand. Whether the signatures appear to be done by the same hand, that, I think, is a question you can put to an expert. Though the testimony is of rather a dangerous character, and not much to be relied on.

Case No. 14,919.

UNITED STATES v. DARTON.

[6 McLean, 46.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1853.

ILLEGAL CUTTING OF TIMBER—PROOF—INTENT—REASONABLE DOUBT—MISTAKE.

1. Under the act of 1831 [4 Stat. 472], for the punishment of offenses in cutting and removing timber from the United States lands, the rule of proof is fixed by the statute. The government must prove the cutting on the lands specified: the defendant may rebut the same, by showing circumstances of ignorance as to the section lines or mistake.

[Cited in U. S. v. Murphy, 32 Fed. 383.]

2. The proof must correspond with the charge—cutting oak is not cutting pine timber.

3. The proof of the act places the burden of explanation on the defendant. From an unlawful act an unlawful intent will be inferred.

4. A reasonable doubt is that which relates either to the character or the force of the testimony, and not a mere conjecture.

[This was an indictment against Peter Darton for cutting timber on public lands.]

The District Attorney and Frazer & Hand, for the United States.

Gray & Van Arman, for defendant.

Before WILKINS, District Judge.

The defendant was tried on an indictment charging him with removing and cutting timber on government lands. The testimony showed that his father owned a mill seat and various tracts of land, in the vicinage of the lands described in the indictment; that he resided at the mill, as the agent of his father, who lived in Chicago, and was under instructions to avoid cutting on the government lands; that a number of trees were cut by mistake across the lines, which were subsequently ascertained by actual survey, the defendant accompanying the surveyor, and showing the corner posts; and when he ascertained that he had cut over his lines, he wrote to his father, and caused the quarter section on which the timber was cut to be entered at the land-office, the certificate of which was given in evidence. It was contended on the part of the government: 1st. That circumstances showing ignorance and mistake, if believed by the jury, constituted no defense. 2d. That a subsequent entry of the lands was no defense.

CHARGE OF THE COURT. The prisoner at the bar, Peter Darton, whose true deliverance between him and the United States, you are obligated by your solemn oaths to make, according to the evidence given you in court, is charged with timber cutting and timber removing on and from the lands of the United States. The particular offense is created by, and defined and described in, the statutes of the United States. The act of March 2, 1831, by its second section, constitutes three general classes of offenses, with their respective accessorial subdivisions. The court will enumerate them in their order, that you may be better enabled to understand the particular offense now under consideration. The first is—The cutting and removing naval timber, specifically named red cedar and live oak, on lands specially selected and reserved by the government, or aiding in such acts, or wantonly destroying on such lands, such naval timber.

By a previous enactment of congress, of the first of March, 1817 [3 Stat. 347], entitled "An act," making reservation of certain public lands "to supply timber for naval purposes," it was made the duty of the secretary of the navy, under the direction of the president of the United States, to cause such vacant and unappropriated public lands, as produced the live oak and red cedar timbers, to be explored, and to select such tracts as, according to his judgment, were necessary to furnish the navy of the United States, a sufficient supply of naval timber. It was then declared an offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any person to cut any timber on such reserved tracts, without authority to do so by order of a competent officer. At the same time it was declared criminal to cut, or remove or be employed in removing, the naval timber specified, with intent to dispose of the same for transportation, from the same description of the public lands. Such, with other measures of a penal character, and with the avowed design of preserving a supply of timber for the United States navy, were the salutary provisions of the statute of 1817. But the government was the proprietor of other lands, on which grew other timber, valuable in a great degree for other purposes than ship building. Much of these lands were surveyed by and under national authority, and by various statutory enactments were opened to settlements, and offered at a fixed price, which could neither be augmented nor lessened by demand.

The policy of these statutes was two-fold:—1st. The speedy settlement of the public domain; and thereby converting the wilderness into a garden, and by the acquisition of a revenue from the public sales. In furtherance of both objects, it was desirable, that the lands should be so far protected from spoliation, as to encourage immigration, and induce settlement and sale. Moreover, it was discovered that the protection afforded by the act of 1817, was not sufficiently extensive as to naval timber growing elsewhere, than on the reservations; and the public lands in the north and south-west, being repeatedly stripped of valuable house timber, by lawless trespassers, the national legislature was moved to amend and enlarge the provisions of the act of 1817, by those of 1831, embracing other lands, than the reserved lands, naval timber on other lands, and other timber than naval timber on the unreserved public lands of the United States. Thus originated the other two classes as designated in the 1st section of the last act, —namely: 2d. The offense of cutting naval timber on other lands, &c. 3d. The offense of cutting or removing, &c., other timber than naval timber on other lands than naval lands, with the intent to export, dispose of, use, or employ the same in any manner whatsoever, other than for the use of the navy of the United States. This last, comprehends the charges set forth in this indictment, which contains four counts. The 1st is for cutting 3,000 pine trees, at township 12, north of range 17 west, and township 12, north of range 16 west, on section 13 of township 12, north of range 17 west, and on section 13 of township 12, north of range 16 west, in the county of Oceana and state of Michigan. The second count, is for aiding and assisting in the trespass specified in the first. The 3d, is for removing 5,000 timber logs from the premises described, and with the intent stated. And the 4th count, is for aiding in the last act described, or being employed in the same. To these charges, the defendant has plead not guilty—denying the cutting and the removing in every form and shape, in which the same is charged. Before any application of the law to the facts of this case—the court will briefly detain your attention on two prominent propositions involved: 1st. What must be proved by the government, in order to sustain the prosecution. 2d. What must be proved by the defendant, in case the government has made a case to warrant a conviction, as matter of complete exculpation. What must be proved by the government? The rule of proof is fixed by the statute. The offense is cutting or removing timber from government lands, with the evil intent described. The fact then, must be fully established by conclusive proof, that timber of the kind described was cut by the defendant, or by his procurement: and that the same was cut on the township, and section, and range, specially set forth. Cutting other timber, than that charged, will not suffice. If pine trees, or pine logs are charged, proof of oak or hickory will not do. And so also, if the cutting is on other lands, the proof will not do. The defendant must be acquitted.

But, gentlemen, if the specific act of cutting or removing is proved, the guilty—the unlawful—intent will be presumed. From an unlawful act an unlawful intent will be inferred. The statute declares the act criminal. Proof of the commission of the act, raises the presumption of a guilty knowledge and a guilty intention. If poison be given, the malicious intent will be inferred, and need not be proved. But this presumption may be rebutted, by the evidence of circumstances, showing a lawful intention. This applies to all crimes. To felony and to misdemeanor. An evil intent is an essential ingredient of every crime. And the statute does not contemplate the punishment of the innocent. An unlawful act with a lawful intention, is not criminal.

With this view, the law declares one intent which exculpates in express terms, viz.; the intent to appropriate the timber cut to the use of the navy of the United States. Nevertheless this does not exclude a defense based upon circumstances, clearly showing that no trespass was designed by the defendant. Understand this—the government must prove two prominent facts. The cutting, and the premises where cut. If such proof corresponds with the allegations of the indictment, and there is no explanatory proof rebutting an unlawful intention, your verdict must be guilty. But otherwise, after such proof on the part of the government, if the defendant clearly shows that a mistake was committed by the defendant himself, or, by the hands under his direction, in regard to the lines of survey, if proof be furnished, satisfactory to the jury, that the defendant owned timber lands in the vicinage, or, was the agent of the owner, and that the section corners and quarter posts, as designative of the public survey, were such, that a mistake might be committed, as to the lines separating the private entry, from the unsold lands, and that the trespass charged was thus committed, without the design of cutting on the government lands. If such be the conclusive character of the defendant's evidence, the inference of a guilty intention is removed, and an acquittal is his right under the benign provisions of the criminal law. For it is a blessed and an unquestionable truth—a maxim not to be controverted —that the government of the United States seeks not the conviction or punishment of an innocent man. Conviction, not recovery, is the important word; punishment, not recompense, the great object sought by the prosecution. Damages are recoverable by civil action. Reparation for injury, relief, and not a penalty.

Now, the United States, as a great land proprietor, is not inhibited the usual civil remedy allowed to and provided for all, for any loss or injury sustained. The courts of justice are opened to the civil actions of the government as to those of an individual. But there is a vast difference in the rule of judgment between the civil action and the criminal verdict. In the former, the proof of the injury and its extent, calls justly for the rendition of appropriate damages; and the plea of ignorance or mistake, or an innocent intention, availeth not. The injury is done, the ignorant trespasser must repair the loss. So with the government. Its landed dominion is under the protection of the general law, independent of the statute of 1831. The action of trespass is an action to which the government may resort, and under which it may recover damages to the full extent of the injury sustained. And, a conviction and punishment of a defendant, for a trespass, under the act of 1831, would not protect under a civil action for the injury sustained. Neither would a judgment, on the latter remedy, be a sufficient plea of defense under the indictment. Wherefore, then, exclude from consideration in this species of criminal prosecution, the proof which negates an unlawful intention, or shows a clear mistake, or such ignorance as establishes beyond all doubt an intention other than that of cutting or removing the government timber?

The court, then, has no hesitation in giving you this instruction: That if you believe, from the evidence given you in court, that the defendant cut timber on the lands in question, through a misapprehension at the time as to the lines which separated the government lands from those of his father, whose agent he was, and that he then acted under a mistake, believing that the premises where the timber was cut, were those of his father, and not the public lands, your duty is to acquit. What, then, has been proved upon this issue? This is for your exclusive deliberation. It is your province, your sole province, to settle what facts have been proved. The court cannot, with judicial propriety, interfere with you in the discharge of this duty. Your opinion as to the facts, is that which must compose your verdict. The opinion of the judge is not your opinion, and should not be made the foundation of your opinion. And, furthermore, your verdict is the opinion of each and every one of you. Such is the peculiar and emphatic injunction of a juror's oath. Your conscience cannot repose with ease either upon what your fellow-juror or the judge may think, as to the facts, no more than the judge can safely rely, at all times, upon the doctrines urged by able, learned and upright counsel. The inquiry, then, comes back to yourselves —what has been proved? Much difficulty, honestly felt by jurors in endeavoring to bring their minds into accord, arises from their omission to ascertain, in the first place, the facts upon which they are all agreed. On retiring, it is usually propounded, Is the party guilty, or is he not guilty?—a question of a general character, including a response to many particulars which together make up guilt; but upon which a vote is taken, without any antecedent settlement of material facts. Whereas, if these are in the first place made the subject of careful deliberation, comparison and determination, no inconvenient protraction or disagreement would, in many cases, occur. It is your duty to examine, and weigh, and sift the testimony. It is your duty so to inquire, as to be ready to give a reason to your own consciences of the faith that is in you. You cannot jump satisfactorily at conclusions in so important a matter as a verdict in a criminal case. Enquire, then, in your own minds, now, even now, what facts are conceded, or what are proved, and what are the subject of conflict? Did the defendant cut pine trees on the government land specified? Is this so, there is no contest about the title to the premises. They are the government lands acquired from the Indians, by the treaty of Washington.

There is no contest about the ownership and occupancy of the lands in the immediate vicinage. The father of the defendant was their owner, and of a mill seat for the manufacture of lumber, on an adjoining section. There is no contest about the residence of the defendant, and the relation he bore to the management of the mill and the lands. He was his father's servant, clothed with a special power, and under direction to cut no timber from the government lands. There is no question as to the roads leading to and from the mill, and the purpose for which those roads were used—bringing timber to the mills. There is no question but what timber, to a great extent, was cut by some persons on sections 13 and 18. There is no question but what the 40 acre lots on S. W. quarter of section 18, and N. E. quarter of section 13, were used for the purpose of supplying the mill; and that the timber cut by the defendant's direction, was not only cut upon these 40 acres, but also across the lines, and on the lands of the government adjacent.

Reaching this point, then, you have got to the remaining inquiry, mainly affecting the guilt or innocence of the defendant: Was this cutting done by him, and the hands under him, under a mistake, and a well-grounded ignorance of the lines which separated his father's land from that of the government? The principal witness for the government is Mr. Bean, who visited, observed and surveyed the premises, by direction of the government agent, entrusted with the care of the government timber in this district. The defendant showed him the quarter post on the township line, or section line, and accompanied him the whole day in running the section lines. No controversy in relation to these facts, and none, of course, in relation to what the witness observed, that much timber appeared to be cut on parts of sections 13 and 18. During this survey, the defendant admitted that he had cut some of the timber, but claimed the proprietory intercession of the witness, because he had shown him the post, and aided him in ascertaining the lines. Such is the alleged admission of the defendant, and its force and extent rests upon the credit you give to the witness, by whom it is established, and all that defendant said at the time must be taken together as one and an entire admission. There is, in addition to the charge of cutting, a count for the removal. If the defendant admitted he cut the timber, and you are satisfied that he had the management of the mill, and that the timber was removed to the mill, his admission will cover both charges.

In every criminal accusation reasonable doubt should materially sway the mind, in favor of the accused. This principle is of higher origin than human laws. It should govern in social life. It must control in judicial tribunals. Wherefore condemn—if the mind hesitates as to guilt? But the suggestion of merciful conjecture, is not the reasonable doubt, contemplated by the law. The doubt of the juror, consistent with his reason, is that which relates either to the character or the force of the testimony. The test is, is or is not such a fact fully proved? If yea, are the witnesses by which it is established, worthy of belief? If yea, all doubt vanishes, and there remains no basis on which the reason can rest. Sometimes a witness may be unimpeached as to general character, and may be uncontradicted either by others, or be perfectly consistent in his statement; and yet, from his deportment on the witness' stand, render himself unworthy of credit. A hesitating or confused manner, or a studied narrative of which a jury may judge from all that accompanies the delivery of the testimony, will justly cast a shade of doubt upon it all. Of this, however, the jury alone, unaided either by the court or the counsel, must decide for themselves. And certainly where two witnesses contradict each other as to a particular fact, and one exhibits a frank and unbiased manner; and the other is confused, hesitating, and evidently biassed,—the reliance of the jury can with more safety be given to the first, while they reject entirely the last. It is another matter altogether, where discrepancies are fairly established in the narrative of the witness. Where he states in his examination in chief, a fact, which he contradicts in his cross-examination; or where he conceals the whole of a matter, which is afterwards extracted by cross-interrogation, such discrepancy, or such conduct, if clearly apparent to the jury, should lead to the rejection of the testimony.

The jury found a verdict of guilty; and the court sentenced the defendant to one day's imprisonment, and fifty dollars fine.

UNITED STATES v. DAVENPORT.

[Deady, 264.] [1]

District Court, D. Oregon. May 17, 1867.

INDICTMENT — VERDICT — COUNTS — DISCHARGE OF JURY.

1. An indictment, in which there is a joinder of offences or offenders, so far as the jury are concerned, is to be considered as a several one as to each of such offences or offenders.

2. When an indictment contains two or more counts upon distinct offences or upon different statements of the same offence, the jury may find a verdict of guilty or not guilty upon any or all of such counts, and if there is any count upon which they are not agreed, they may be discharged without giving a verdict thereon; and such count will stand for re-trial.

[Cited in Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. 427.]

[This was an indictment against Isaac A. Davenport, for perjury.]

Joseph N. Dolph, for plaintiff.

DEADY, District Judge. The defendant in this action was indicted for the crime of perjury, committed in swearing to his income returns for the years 1864 and 1865 respectively. The indictment contained two counts—the first upon the affidavit to the return for 1864, and the second upon the affidavit to that of 1865. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict of "not guilty" as to the first count, and then and there stated to the court that they were unable to agree as to the second one. The court received the verdict and discharged the jury.

The defendant now moves for judgment of acquittal generally upon this verdict, and that he be discharged. No direct authority is cited in support of the motion, but counsel for defendant claim that a verdict of not guilty upon one count in an indictment, is in legal effect, equivalent to a verdict of not guilty upon all the counts therein. In support of this position the case at bar is likened to one where the jury convict on some counts and are silent as to others. In such cases it is said that the weight of modern authority is, that the verdict is equivalent to not guilty as to the counts concerning which the jury are silent. But the authorities are not uniform on this point, and the rule appears to have been "that if distinct offences are charged in separate counts of the same indictment, the verdict must expressly find the defendant either guilty or not guilty upon each count, or no judgment can be rendered." 2 Lead. Cr. Cas. 503. But in the case under consideration the jury are not silent as to the other counts, but state expressly, that as to such count they cannot agree to a verdict either way. The case of Campbell v. State, 9 Yerg. 333, is cited and relied upon by counsel for defendant. But there is no analogy between that case and this. There the indictment contained three counts. The crime charged was the larceny of a bank note. The jury found the defendant guilty as to the second count, and not guilty as to the first and second ones. On motion of the defendant, the verdict was set aside and a new trial granted. Whether the order of the court setting the whole verdict aside, went beyond the motion of the defendant, does not appear. On the second trial, the defendant was found not guilty as to the first and second counts, and guilty as to the third one. Judgment was given accordingly. On review, the court held, that the defendant having been found not guilty as to the third count on the first trial, could not be tried on that count again, and reversed the judgment. All that this case decides is, that a verdict in favor of a defendant cannot be set aside, even upon his own motion, and that if it is, and he is subsequently convicted on the same count upon which the verdict set aside was found, it is erroneous. In Morris v. State, 1 Blackf. 37, the defendant being found guilty on one count of an indictment, and not guilty as to the other, moved for a new trial. The motion being allowed, the whole verdict was set aside and the defendant put upon trial on both counts.

The defendant, Davenport, is charged with two distinct offences. Being "of the same class" they are properly joined in the same indictment. 10 Stat. 162. The jury have found a verdict upon one count—as to one offence—and disagreed as to the other. It is believed that no authority can be found for holding such a verdict to be equivalent to an acquittal on both counts. There can be no pretence that justice to the defendant requires that it should. The general rule seems to be, that for all the purposes of a verdict, an indictment, in which there is a joinder of offences or offenders, is to be considered as a several and separate one, as to each of such offences or offenders. The jury may therefore find a verdict of guilty or not guilty as to some, and no verdict as to others, because they cannot agree thereon. In Com. v. Wood, 12 Mass. 313, two persons were jointly indicted and tried for larceny. The jury came into court and suggested that they had agreed upon a verdict as to one of the defendants, but were unable to agree as to the other. Objection was made by the attorney general, to receiving a verdict unless upon the whole matter. But the court polled the jury, and they answered that they found Wood not guilty, but could not agree as to the other. The verdict was received and Wood discharged, but as to the other defendant the indictment was continued for re-trial. In that case there was a joinder of offenders, while here there is a joinder of offences. But in my judgment this difference in the facts makes no difference in the principle. The analogy between the two cases is complete. In the note to Campbell's Case, 2 Lead. Cr. Cas. 502, the subject of separate counts in an indictment is discussed. It is there maintained, that the separate counts in an indictment are to be treated as separate indictments, whether they are upon distinct offences in fact, or upon different statements in the same offence. Speaking of an indictment containing two counts, the note says: "The jury may be discharged from the consideration of a count upon which they are not agreed, returning a verdict only upon the other." This rule appears both just and practical, and it meets this case exactly. The defendant has been tried for two similar offences. The jury have found him not guilty as to one, but as to the other they were unable to agree. To have refused to receive this verdict would have been unjust to the defendant who was thereby acquitted of one of the charges, but to receive it and then treat it as a verdict of not guilty as to both counts, would be equally unjust to the prosecution.

As to the second count there is no verdict. The jury were unable to agree concerning the guilt or innocence of the defendant as to the crime therein charged. The indictment as to this count stands for trial as if a jury had never been impaneled in the action.

Judgment for defendant upon the first count of the indictment, and motion denied as to second one.

Case No. 14,921.

UNITED STATES ex rel. DE LOYNE v. DAVIDSON.

[1 Biss. 433; [1] 2 Chi. Leg. News, 385.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan., 1864.

MARSHAL'S BOND—CITIZENHSIP—FEDERAL JURISDICTION—PARTIES.

1. The United States courts have jurisdiction in all cases of marshal's bonds, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties, and this jurisdiction rests on the ground that within the meaning of the constitution they are cases under the laws of the United States.

[Cited in Pierson v. Philips, 36 Fed. 837.]

2. Although the courts had no authority to maintain actions in this class of cases, until congress exercised the power to give jurisdiction, the act of April 10th, 1806 [2 Stat. 372], having provided for suits on marshal's bonds, this jurisdiction is established.

[See Adler v. Newcomb, Case No. 83.]

3. Under this act it is optional with the injured party to bring the suit on the bond in his own name, or in the name of the United States, and the United States is not substantially a party to the record.

[Cited in Hagood v. Blythe, 37 Fed. 251.]

Motion to dismiss a suit upon a marshal's bond, on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction, the allegations in the declaration concerning the citizenship of the parties not bringing the case within the 12th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 79].

C. A. Gregory, for plaintiff.

William C. Goudy, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. This is a suit on the bond of J. W. Davidson, formerly marshal of this district, and his sureties, in the name of the United States, for the benefit of George De Loyne, whose interest alone is affected. It is averred in the declaration that De Loyne is a citizen of the state of Illinois, and also that Davidson and his co-defendants are citizens of the same state.

This is a question of great nicety, and I have come to the conclusion that the action can be maintained. I will state, very briefly, the grounds of my opinion. I assume that the party really in interest here is the person for whose use the suit is brought; that he is to all intents and purposes the plaintiff in the suit. By the terms of the judiciary act of 1789 the marshal, before he enters upon the duties of his office, must give bonds in the sum of twenty thousand dollars for the faithful performance of his duties, with securities satisfactory to the judge. The original act makes no provision as to suit upon the bond. The act of 1806 makes such provision.

It is necessary to advert to the language of the constitution as to the power existing in courts of the United States to maintain actions. The second section of the third article of the constitution declares: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority." The language of the constitution is that judicial power extends, among other cases, to cases arising in law and equity under the laws of the United States.

It has been maintained with a good deal of force that this was a self executing provision; that when the courts of the United States were established by act of congress, this provision of the constitution operated directly to vest jurisdiction in courts of the United States. That has not been the construction which has been given to this section of the constitution, but the construction has been that it was necessary that there should be an act of congress to vest in the courts authority to maintain actions in a particular case, and that, unless congress did give jurisdiction, no jurisdiction actually existed; accordingly, congress has, from time to time, vested in the courts of the United States jurisdiction in this class of cases, as it is a dormant power that springs into life only by virtue of an act of congress.

The law of April 10th, 1806 (2 Stat. 372), provides that "the bond heretofore given, or which may hereafter be given, by the marshal of any district, for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, shall be filed and recorded in the office of the clerk of the district court, or circuit court, sitting within the district for which such marshal shall have been appointed." The second section provides that "it shall be lawful, in case of the breach of the condition of any such bond, for any person, persons, or body politic, thereby injured, to constitute a suit upon such bond, in the name and for the sole use of such party, and, thereupon to recover such damages as shall be legally assessed, with costs of suit, for which execution may issue for such party in due form; and, in case such party shall fail to recover in the suit, judgment shall be rendered and execution may issue for costs in favor of the defendant or defendants, against the party who shall have instituted the suit, and the United States shall in no case be liable for the same."

This court has held in cases which have been formerly considered, that this was, to all intents and purposes, a suit for the sole use and in the name of the party whose interest is affected—in this particular case for the sole use and in the name of George De Loyne; and that it was competent to use, nominally, the name of the United States in instituting the action. It is not compulsory to institute the suit in the name of the person who has been damnified, without the name of the United States—but that the common law right still exists to use the name of the United States for the use of the party.

It is impossible to avoid the conclusion, enforced in the several decisions, that the United States are not substantially the parties upon this record. In the case of McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 9, the supreme court of the United States held that McNutt was not, within the meaning of the law of congress, the party upon the record. But that was a suit upon a sheriff's bond given to the governor of Mississippi, and the party really on the record was the party who was damnified, and for whose benefit the suit was brought. The court maintained the jurisdiction. This being so, it would follow that, in this case, the United States are only nominally a party.

It resolves itself into this: Whether it was the intention of congress, by the second section of the act of 1806, to vest in the courts of the United States jurisdiction where suits were brought on marshals' bonds, on the ground that within the meaning of the language of the constitution, it is a case under the laws of the United States. It is clear that the laws of the United States determine absolutely as to the responsibility of the marshal and his securities. I have come to the conclusion that it was the intention of this act of congress to vest jurisdiction in the United States courts in all cases of marshals' bonds, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties. It will be observed congress does not use the language it sometimes uses—that suit may be instituted on such bond in any court having jurisdiction of the same, state or national, but the language is "to institute the suit upon such bond in the name and for the sole use of the party." Is it presumable that congress, in using this language, intended to apply it to the courts of the states? Is it not, on the contrary, a natural presumption that it was to apply to the courts of the United States over which they had supreme control? Was congress speaking of state courts, where it declared that judgment shall be rendered and execution may issue for such party in due form? Was it not intended to apply to courts of the United States? I think it was, and that congress was giving directions to the courts of the United States, and that it was the intention of this act of congress to vest in United States courts jurisdiction in this class of cases.

The third section strengthens this view of the case. It provides that "the said bonds shall after any judgment or judgments rendered thereon, remain as a security for the benefit of any person, persons, or body politic injured by breach of the condition of the same until the whole penalty shall have been recovered, and the proceedings shall be always in the same manner and as hereinbefore directed." Then comes in the declaration in relation to the limitation of actions.

This is the conclusion I have arrived at on this subject. The argument from inconvenience is very strong in favor of this construction of the act of 1806. If it was the intention of the act of congress that suit could be brought in the state courts only, on these bonds, it is easy to see it would give rise to conflicts of jurisdiction and questions as to the right of priority of claims. It is true that the language might have been more precise and distinct. It might have specified the courts in which suits were to be instituted; but it has not done so, and the only question is whether it was contemplated by the framers of this law that suits should be instituted in the courts of the United States. I think that is a fair inference from the various provisions of the act.

The motion will be overruled.

UNITED STATES v. DAVIDSON et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 576.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1835.

CRIMINAL LAW—JOINT INDICTMENT—TRIAL—WITNESS.

Upon a joint indictment against two, for assault and battery, it is not a matter of right that they should be tried separately, at their request; and neither can be examined as a witness for the other unless there be no evidence against one; in which case the jury may acquit him, and then he may be examined for the other defendant.

Indictment [against Lewis G. Davidson and I. W. Stratton] for assault and battery on a negro, a servant at Fuller's Hotel.

Mr. Brent, for defendants, asked that they might be tried separately, as he wished to examine each as a witness for the other.

THE COURT said that it was perhaps in the discretion of the court to allow it, but that the defendants could not claim it as a matter of right; and that neither can be examined as a witness for the other unless it should appear that there was no evidence against one; in which case the jury may acquit him, and then he may be examined for the other; but if there be any evidence against him he cannot be examined. 1 Chit. UNITED STATES v. DAVIS.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 18, 1869.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY—DIRECTIONS FROM ATTORNEY GENERAL—TRIAL—REMOVAL OF PRISONER DURING TRIAL—NEW TRIAL.

1. Whether the attorney general has power to give a direction to a district attorney, in respect to his official action in regard to an indictment found by a grand jury, and presented by such grand jury to the court, for its action thereon, quere.

2. Such a direction, if given, is for the district attorney alone, and does not control the court.

3. Where the court refused to allow a prisoner, indicted for perjury, to read, in opposition to the motion of the district attorney to proceed with the trial of the indictment against him, a letter from the attorney general to the district attorney, directing the latter to allow the prisoner an opportunity to place himself beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and also refused to allow the prisoner to show that he had not been afforded such opportunity, and the trial was proceeded with, and the prisoner was convicted: Held, on a motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, that no error was committed.

4. Where a prisoner, indicted for perjury, was put upon his trial, and was present, with his counsel, during the empanelling of the jury, and during a portion of the opening of the case to the jury by the district attorney, and was then removed from the court-room, by order of the court, to an adjoining room, with liberty of access for his counsel, because he persisted in interrupting the district attorney, in a loud voice, although admonished by the court to refrain, and the opening by the district attorney proceeded and was concluded during the prisoner's absence, and the prisoner was present during the rest of the trial, and was convicted: Held, on a motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, that no error was committed.

[Cited in Gore v. State (Ark.) 12 S. W. 565. Cited in brief in Sahlinger v. People, 102 Ill. 243. Cited in Shular v. State, 105 Ind. 300, 4 N. E. 870; State v. Hope (Mo.) 13 S. W. 494.]

This was a motion [by George B. Davis] in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The defendant, who was indicted for having committed perjury in an affidavit made to procure the arrest of Joshua F. Bailey, collector of internal revenue, having been found guilty by the jury, now moves in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial.

The first position taken on his behalf is, that the court erred in granting the motion of the district attorney to put the defendant upon his trial, and in refusing to allow the defendant to read, in opposition to that motion, the directions of Attorney General Evarts, contained in a letter dated February 11th, 1869.

addressed to Mr. Courtney, then district attorney, and to show that the defendant had not been afforded such an opportunity to leave the country as the attorney general had, in such letter, directed he should have. This ruling, it is insisted, was erroneous, and it is claimed that the court was bound judicially to recognize the instructions of the attorney general, and, consequently, not to put the defendant on trial. I see no reason to doubt the correctness of the ruling complained of. If the attorney general has power to give any directions whatever to a district attorney, in respect to his official action, in regard to indictments found by a grand jury, and presented by such grand jury to the court, for its action thereon, and if, assuming that the attorney general has that power, such a direction as that claimed to have been given by the attorney general in regard to this defendant, can be said to be fairly within its scope, it is certain that such a direction is for the district attorney alone, and that it does not control the court. The court is not bound to construe or consider the official communications made to the district attorney. That responsibility belongs to the district attorney himself, who must act upon his own views of their validity and effect, and who, alone, is known to the court as representing the United States in a criminal case. Accordingly, when the district attorney moves the trial of a criminal case, he is, in the absence of any suggestion of collusion, entitled to have his motion granted, unless legal reasons to the contrary be shown. Neither the wishes nor the instructions of the attorney general furnish, of themselves, such reasons, nor do his communications to the district attorney afford evidence of the facts stated therein, upon which a court can render a decision; while the fact that the defendant was sought to be put upon his trial without having been afforded an opportunity to place himself beyond the jurisdiction of the court, although accompanied with the further fact that instructions to give him such opportunity were issued by the attorney general, would not justify the court in denying the motion of the district attorney to proceed with the trial.

The next point urged in behalf of the defendant is, that he was not personally present during a portion of his trial. This point arises out of the following facts: The defendant was brought into court in custody, and was present, with his counsel, during the empanelling of the jury, and during a portion of the opening of the case by the district attorney. During the opening, he commenced interrupting the district attorney, and persisted in denying his statements, in a loud voice, although admonished by the court to refrain from interrupting. The action of the prisoner continuing to be such as to make it impossible to proceed in the trial with due decorum, he was ordered to be removed from the court-room by the marshal, and to be detained in an adjoining room, with liberty of access for his counsel. The trial then proceeded, under the objection of the prisoner's counsel, so far as to conclude the opening. The trial was then postponed to the next day, when, the defendant having become composed, it was continued and concluded without further disturbance. This statement seems sufficient to dispose of the point in question. The right of a prisoner to be present at his trial does not include the right to prevent a trial by unseemly disturbance. The defendant had the opportunity to be present at the whole of his trial. He was, in fact, present while the jury were being empanelled and the evidence was being introduced. He was absent during a part of the opening, only because of his own disorderly conduct. It does not lie in his mouth to complain of the order which was made necessary by his own misconduct, and which he could at any time have terminated by signifying his willingness to avoid creating disturbance.

In addition to the two positions I have thus noticed, several objections to the rulings of the court upon questions of evidence, and to a portion of the charge, have been taken, but none of them are tenable, and they do not appear to be of sufficient importance or novelty to require a discussion here.

The motion is, accordingly, denied.

INDICTMENT — ASSAULT AND BATTERY — "PERSON UNKNOWN."

Quære, whether an indictment will lie for assault and battery upon "a person unknown," not "unknown to the jurors."

Indictment [against William Davis] for assault and battery, "upon a person unknown," (not "to the jurors unknown,")

Mr. Neale, for defendant, moved in arrest of judgment, that the indictment was too uncertain.

THE COURT, however, overruled the motion; CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting, because the only reason which can be admitted for not inserting the name of the person assaulted, is, that the person was unknown to the jurors; which is not averred; for the person might be unknown to the attorney of the United States, who sent up the indictment, and might have been known to the jurors. The indictment might be true if the person assaulted was unknown by any person.

UNITED STATES v. DAVIS.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 622.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1839.

CONTEMPT—RETURN TO WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS—SLAVES—PETITION FOR FREEDOM—SECURITY FOR FORTHCOMING OF PETITIONERS.

1. If the return to a writ of habeas corpus be evasive and insufficient, the party refusing to produce the bodies of the prisoners, if present in court, will be committed until he produce them, or be otherwise discharged.

[Disapproved in Re Jackson, 15 Mich. 430–441. Cited in Rivers v. Mitchell, 57 Iowa, 196, 10 N. W. 628.]

2. If, when produced, the prisoners appear to be held as slaves, and claim to be free, and file their petitions for freedom, the person claiming them as slaves will be required by the court to give security for their forthcoming to prosecute their claim for freedom; and if he fail to give such security, the court will order them to be taken into custody of the marshal for safe-keeping until their trial, or the further order of the court.

Habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, (issued on the 14th of January, 1840,) directed to Thomas N. Davis, commanding him to have before the court the bodies of Israel Brinkley, Emanuel Price, and Maria Course, persons of color, with the cause of their detention. The return of the writ by Davis stated upon oath, that he purchased the three negroes publicly, in the bar-room of Thomas Lloyd's tavern, in the city of Washington, as slaves for life, from one Joseph Woodall, on the 31st December, 1839, and took from him a bill of sale, warranting the title to the negroes, and that they were slaves for life, which bill of sale he produces as part of his return; that he paid for them the sum of $1,200, which he avers to be a reasonable price for them; that he had never any reason to doubt that they were slaves for life, as they were warranted to be. The undersigned avers that the said individuals were removed, as he believes, beyond the District of Columbia, before the service of the said writs of habeas corpus, and before the undersigned heard of the existence of such process; and that the said individuals are now beyond the control and out of the custody of the undersigned, and, as he believes, beyond the District of Columbia. A number of witnesses were sworn and examined, whose testimony tended to show that Davis had removed the negroes, because he suspected that they would apply for a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. Key, for the prisoners, contended that the answer was insufficient and evasive. It does not deny that the prisoners are in his power; or that he is unable to produce them.

Mr. Key, therefore, moved the court for an attachment against him, and cited Rex v. Winton, 5 Term R. 89. The sending the prisoners away with intent to avoid the expected process of this court, is of itself an obstruction of justice, and a contempt of court.

Mr. Hoban, contra, contended, that the return was a sufficient excuse for not bringing in the bodies of the prisoners, and cited Ex parte Stacy, 10 Johns. 328.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), after stating the writs of habeas corpus and return, made the following order: "The court, having examined and considered the return of the said Thomas N. Davis, to the writs of habeas corpus aforesaid, and having heard counsel thereupon do adjudge the said answer to be evasive and insufficient, and that the said Davis is bound to produce the bodies of the said negroes, mentioned in the said writs, before the court; and the said Davis being now present in court, and refusing to produce the said negroes, it is therefore, this 16th day of January, 1840, ordered that the said Davis be committed to the custody of the marshal, until he shall produce the said negroes, or be otherwise discharged in due course of law."

On the 18th of January, 1840, it was further ordered by THE COURT, that, "in case the said Emanuel Price and Maria Course shall be surrendered by the said Thomas N. Davis, or by any other person for him, to the marshal, he shall take the said negroes into his custody, subject to the further order of the court, and that he then discharge the said Davis from jail."

The negro Israel Brinkley had run away, and had been taken up and lodged in jail in Baltimore. On the 20th of January, 1840, being the last day of the term, the said Davis having brought into court the negroes Emanuel Price, and Maria Course, THE COURT made the following order: "Emanuel Price and Maria Course being in court, and having filed their petition for freedom against a certain Thomas N. Davis, to March term next, and the said Davis being present in court, and the court having required the said Davis to enter into recognizance, in the sum of $1,000, that he would not remove the said negroes out of the jurisdiction of this court, until their right to freedom shall be tried, and a decision thereon had, and the said Davis having refused to give such recognizance; it is therefore ordered that the said negroes be committed to the marshal of this district for safe-keeping, until the further order of the court in the premises." See Laws Md. 1796, c. 67, and Id. c. 43, § 5.

These negroes afterwards established their right to freedom, and were discharged; their jail fees being charged to the United States, and settled in the marshal's accounts.

UNITED STATES v. DAVIS et al.

[1 Deady, 294.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Oct. 1, 1867.

POSTMASTER—ACTION UPON BOND—COUNTERCLAIM—EXTRA ALLOWANCE—PLEA.

1. In an action by the United States on a postmaster's bond, the defendant may plead a counter claim, if it appear from such plea that the items thereof have been duly presented to the proper department for allowance, and rejected.

2. The act of June 22, 1854 (10 Stat. 293, 299), authorizes the postmaster general in his discretion to make an extra allowance to postmasters for extra labor and expense in certain cases: Held, that no postmaster has a right to such allowance until it is made him by the postmaster general—and that the action of the latter in the premises is final, and not subject to judicial review.

3. A plea of counter claim for certain extra services and expenses incurred by a postmaster under the act aforesaid, or the one of July 1, 1864 (13 Stat. 335), should show that the office kept by the defendant was within the act authorizing an allowance on such accounts.

4. The provision of the act of July 1, 1864 (13 Stat. 335, § 5), which enacts, that "the postmaster general, shall allow to the postmaster, a just and reasonable sum for the necessary cost in whole or in part of rent, fuel," etc., is in effect, permissive and not mandatory, and no postmaster has any legal right to such allowance until it is awarded him by the postmaster general.

This action was brought by the United States against the defendant Herman W. Davis, and his sureties—Robert Pentland and James B. Stephens—in his official bond as deputy post-master at the city of Portland, to recover certain moneys alleged to have been received and wrongfully detained by said Davis, while acting as such postmaster.

A. C. Gibbs, for plaintiff.

W. T. Trimble, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. The complaint alleges the making of the bond, and that between November 1, 1861, and November 4, 1865, Davis received as postmaster, the sum of $9,032.40, and accounted for $6,006.56 of the same, leaving a balance due the United States of $3,025.84, for which it prays judgment against the defendants.

The answer of the defendants substantially admits the statement of the account as set forth in the complaint, and sets up a counter claim amounting in the aggregate to $4,582.50. The first item in this counter claim is $307, for postoffice stamps delivered to the successor of Davis. The rest of the items are for office rent, clerk hire, gas, fuel and stationery. The plaintiff demurs to the counter claim except the first item. This raises the question as to whether the defendant, Davis, was by law entitled to these allowances for these purposes. The answer avers that the items of the counter claim have been duly presented to the proper department for allowance and rejected. This being the case, if Davis was entitled as a matter of right to incur these expenses and pay them out of the proceeds of the office, he is entitled to have them allowed in this action, notwithstanding the decision of the department.

On the argument of the demurrer, the following acts of congress have been cited by counsel for plaintiff, regulating the compensation and allowances of deputy postmasters, during the period Davis was in office. No other has been cited by counsel for the defendants, and I take it for granted, without further examination, that these are all that exist, touching this subject. Act June 22, 1854 (10 Stat. 293, 299); Act March 3, 1863, §§ 5, 6 (10 Stat. 702); Act July 1, 1864 (13 Stat. 335); and Act March 3, 1865, § 3 (13 Stat. 505).

The act of 1854, regulated the compensation and allowances of Davis, until the act of July 1, 1864, went into effect. This act gave deputy postmasters a certain commission "on the postage collected at their respective offices in each quarter of the year." This act also authorizes the postmaster general to make certain allowances to postmasters at distributing and separating offices, for extra labor and necessary expenses incurred by them in the discharge of these special duties of distributing and separating the mails. But the statute is not imperative and gives the postmaster general authority to make this allowance when in his judgment it is proper to do so. The statute commits the matter to the discretion of the postmaster general, and the subordinate cannot claim the allowance as a matter of right. In this case it appears from the answer, that the postmaster general has exercised his authority—his discretion—and refused to make the allowance. When the defendant, Davis, entered upon the office at Portland, he virtually agreed to perform the duties of the position for the commission allowed by law, and such further allowances for extra labor and expenses as the postmaster general in his discretion might deem proper to allow him. It seems the postmaster general has not seen proper to make him any allowance. So far as this statute is concerned, this is the end of the case. The extra allowance was to depend upon the award of the postmaster general, and not of a court or jury. The defendant never could have any legal right to an allowance, until it was given him by the judgment of his superior officer, and that officer having directly refused to make the allowance, I cannot see on what ground this counter claim can be sustained.

But this is not all. It does not appear from the answer that the office at Portland is or was, either a distributing or separating office. Even if the statute was absolute and gave these allowances as a matter of right, still the answer must show that the defendant was within its provisions — in other words that the office at Portland was a distributing or separating office. As a matter of fact, it is not pretended that the defendant's office was a distributing office, while I suppose it was a separating office. Now the allowance which the postmaster general may make to a separating office, is a sum sufficient to compensate for "the extra labor necessary to a prompt and efficient performance of the duties of separating and dispatching the mails passing through his office." The allowance is for the extra labor in separating and handling the mail bags and dispatching them to the various offices to which they are directed from the distributing office. Nothing is to be allowed by this act to a separating office for gas, fuel, stationery or office rent.

I find nothing in the act of March 3, 1863, which sustains the counter claim of the defendants. Section 5 requires the postmaster general to make an allowance for clerical service, when "by reason of the presence of a military or naval force near any postoffice, unusual business accrues thereat." The answer does not bring the case of the defendants within this provision. Section 6 provides that "no postmaster shall hereafter, under any pretence whatever, have, or receive, or retain for himself, in the aggregate, more than the amount of his salary." Whether this provision applies to such postmasters, commonly called deputy postmasters, as received a commission upon postage, rather than a fixed salary, I am not prepared to say. But it matters not so far as this case is concerned.

By the act of July 1, 1864, the compensation of postmasters was changed. They were divided into five classes, and to receive salaries in proportion to the compensation received during the two prior years.

Sections 5 and 6 of this act relate to allowances for expenses. The first of these two sections provides, "That at the postoffice of New York, and at offices of the first and second classes, the postmaster-general shall allow to the postmaster a just and reasonable sum for the necessary cost, in whole or in part, of rent, fuel, lights and clerks, to be adjusted upon a satisfactory exhibit of the facts. And at offices of the third, fourth, and fifth classes, such expenses shall be paid by the postmaster, except as in the sixth section provided." Section 6 authorizes the postmaster-general to designate distributing and separating offices at the intersection of mail routes, "and where any such office is of the third, fourth or fifth class of postoffices, he may make a reasonable allowance to such postmaster for the necessary cost, in whole or in part, of clerical services arising from such duties."

To bring this case within either of these sections, I think the answer should contain averments, either that the office kept by Davis was of the first or second class, or had been designated as a distributing or separating office. The court cannot presume that the office at Portland came within either of these categories—it must be averred.

But as this is a question of pleading rather than right, and may be avoided by amendment, if the facts will warrant, I will assume that the office at Portland, since July 1, 1864, was of the first or second class, or that it had been designated as a separating office. It is admitted, I believe, by counsel, that it was never a distributing office. The first assumption would bring the case within the provision of section 5. The language of this section is peculiar—"the postmaster-general shall allow," etc. It might be said, that even where the language of the statute was imperative, and absolutely required the postmaster-general in a given case or contingency, to allow a postmaster certain expenses; yet, still, until the allowance was made, the postmaster would have no legal right to the sum expended, which he could assert in a court in an action against him by the United States. Many reasons of public policy and convenience might be adduced in support of this construction of the statute. But notwithstanding these considerations, I think the contrary conclusion would be more consonant with justice and correct legal principles. When the statute peremptorily requires that the allowance be made, the officer makes the expenditure on the faith of the government, pledged as it were by the words of the statute, and in such case, it seems to me the safer course to hold that such an expenditure constitutes a legal claim against the United States.

But this imperative language "shall allow," is, I think, qualified by what follows—"in whole or in part":—to "require" the postmaster-general to allow an expenditure "in whole or in part," is, in effect, equivalent to authorizing him to allow it or not in his discretion. The amendment to this section contained in section 3 of the act of March 3, 1863, uses the phrase, "authorized to allow, at his discretion." Taken in connection with what appears to have been the uniform policy of congress in regard to the extra allowances to postmasters, namely, to enable the postmaster-general to allow but not to enable the postmaster to demand as a legal right, I am satisfied the language of section 5 ought to be construed as permissive and not mandatory to the postmaster-general. As to section 6, the language is only permissive; "he may make a reasonable allowance."

Section 3 of the act of March 3, 1865, is amendatory of section 5 of the act of July 1, 1864. It enlarges the items of expenditure for which allowances may be made to postmasters, and includes offices of the third and fourth class as well as the first and third, but leaves it in the discretion of the postmaster-general whether any allowance shall be made or not.

This disposes of the counter-claim of the defendant, so far as demurred to. The demurrer is sustained.

UNITED STATES v. DAVIS.

[15 Int. Rev. Rec. 10.]

District Court, N. D. Mississippi. Dec. Term, 1871.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—ILLICIT DISTILLERY—INDICTMENT—ENTRY ON MINUTES.

[1. If one is engaged in running a distillery upon which the special tax has not been paid, it is immaterial whether he is the owner or has any interest in it, or whether he knows that the special tax has not been paid. If he is acting merely as the agent of another, it is his duty to ascertain whether the law had been complied with.]

[2. It is no ground for arresting a verdict in Mississippi that the minutes of the court do not show that the grand jury returned into court the indictment indorsed and signed by the foreman as a true bill, stating the name of the defendant and the offence with which he is charged. Under the Code of that state, the clerk is required to indorse on the indictment the word "Filed," with the date and his signature as clerk; but no entry is made showing the finding of the indictment unless the party be under arrest or on recognizance.]

[This was an indictment against M. A. Davis upon the charge of keeping an illicit distillery.]

G. Wiley Wells, U. S. Atty.

H. A. Barr and Samuel Ghoulson, for the defence.

HILL, District Judge. The indictment against the defendant contains three counts, based upon the 44th, 7th, and 4th sections or the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 125]: (1) That the defendant, with one George Davis, carried on the business of a distiller without having paid the special tax therefor as required by law, and with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him. (2) That the defendant and said George Davis carried on the business of distilling spiritous liquors without having given the bond therefor, as required by law. (3) That the defendant and said George Davis did make mash, wort, and wash in a building other than a distillery duly authorized according to law.

The testimony of the seizing officer was, that when he seized said distillery it was in operation and was under the management of the defendant, who then said that he was not the owner, but was employed to carry on the distillery by his brother George Davis, who was then in North Carolina. He found there was nothing about the distillery meeting the requirements of the law to constitute it a lawful distillery; that no special tax had been paid, or any bond given, nor was it insisted by defendant that any attempt had been made to comply with the law, or that it was in any way a legally authorized distillery. The defendant then proved by a witness that George Davis said to defendant that he would pay him (the defendant) twenty dollars per month, and hire a colored man to work on his farm, if he would carry on his distillery for him; that he afterwards saw him at work in the distillery; said witness also proved that the distillery was situated on the land of the defendant, in a building that had been built for that purpose some years since.

THE COURT (charging jury). The indictment charges the defendant, with one George Davis, who is not on trial, in three separate counts, for violations of the revenue laws of the United States. The first count charges that said parties carried on the business of distillers without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, and with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by them. The second count charges them with having carried on said business without having given the bond therefor, as required by law. The third count charges them with having made wort and wash in a building other than a legally authorized distillery.

All men are presumed to be innocent until the contrary is shown by sufficient proof. That proof should satisfy your minds so that you can rest easy upon the conclusion of guilt, and if it does not so satisfy the mind, you should acquit the defendant. It is incumbent upon the United States to produce such proof, either by their own evidence, or it should arise out of the evidence of the defendant.

To authorize a verdict of guilty under the first count, it is necessary that the proof should satisfy you, as already stated, that the defendant did carry on the business of a distiller, either for himself, or for himself and another, or for another, without having paid the special tax as required by law, and with intent to defraud the United States of the revenue arising from the same. If you shall be satisfied that the business was so carried on, then it is incumbent upon the defendant to show that the special tax was paid; this being required of him, or of the owner; also, that he was not the owner; it devolves upon the person charged, to show a compliance with the requirement of the law, and that not having been shown by the evidence, the presumption of law is that it has not been done. To carry on the business without having paid the special tax, has the effect to defraud the government of the tax, and the legal presumption is that such was the intention of those who carried it on. If the defendant was not interested in the distillery or its proceeds, yet if he was engaged in running it, or carried it on as the agent of the owner, it was incumbent upon him to know that the special tax was paid, and if he did not do so, then all the presumptions of the law arise against him that do against the owner. The proof shows that the defendant was the owner of the land upon which the still was situate, and that he was the party actually engaged in running it; these facts raise the presumption that he was the owner, and it is incumbent upon him to show by sufficient evidence that he was not such owner.

To justify you in finding a verdict of guilty against the defendant upon the second count you must be satisfied from the proof that he did engage in carrying on the business of a distiller without having given the bond therefor as required by law. It is immaterial whether he was the owner, partner, or agent of the owners; if he was engaged in carrying on the business it was incumbent upon him to ascertain and know that the bond was given as required by law, and if he neglected to do so, and the bond was not given, you will find the defendant guilty as charged under this count; an intention to defraud need not be alleged, or proved; the act makes it an offence to carry on the business without first giving the bond.

To justify you in finding a verdict of guilty against the defendant in the third count, the evidence should satisfy you that the defendant did make mash, wort, or wash in a building other than in a legally authorized distillery; if the proof satisfies you that he did make mash, wort, or wash fit for distillation in the building stated in the proof, you will find the defendant guilty under this count, as he has not shown or offered to show that it was a legally authorized distillery.

If the proof satisfies you of the guilt of the defendant in all the counts in the indictment, you will find a verdict of guilty; if it fails to satisfy you of his guilt in any of said counts, you will find a verdict of not guilty; but if you find him guilty in any one or two of the counts, you will find a verdict of guilty in such count or counts, specifying them, and not guilty in the other or others.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty as to the two first counts, and not guilty as to the third.

The defendant moved the court for a new trial upon the allegation that the court misdirected the jury both as to the first and second counts, and by his counsel insisted that the court should have directed the jury that they should return a verdict of not guilty upon the first count unless the proof satisfied them that the defendant was the owner of the distillery, or had an interest in it, or that he knew that the special tax had not been paid. And that the court should have instructed the jury that unless the proof satisfied them that the defendant was interested in the distillery as owner, or part owner, or that he carried it on with intent to defraud the government of the special tax, or that he knew it had not been paid and that he carried it on with the intent to defraud the government of its revenue. Also that the presumption was that the bond had been given and it was incumbent on the prosecution to show that defendant knew or had good cause to believe that it had not been so given.

After full argument had by the defendant's counsel and the district attorney, it was ordered by THE COURT that said motion be overruled. The defendant then moved the court in arrest of the judgment on said verdict on the grounds that the record did not show the finding and return of the indictment by the grand jury.

The record shows that on the 4th day of July, 1871, the grand jury returned into court in a body and returned a bill of indictment, No. 489, against the persons therein named, and for the offences therein named, indorsed by the foreman a true bill, signed by him as such foreman, and returned to consider further of presentments. The indictment has upon it the following number and indorsement: "No. 489. Filed July 4, 1871. 2 copies issued. G. R. Hill, Clerk."

It was contended by defendant's counsel that by the common law as well as by the statutes of every state, the minutes of the court must show that the grand jury returned into court the indictment indorsed and signed by the foreman a true bill, stating the name of the defendant and the offence with which he is charged. Otherwise no conviction and judgment can be legally had upon such indictment.

After argument by counsel, THE COURT held that, while the rule contended for might have prevailed at common law, and might prevail in some other states, such was not the case in this state, the provisions of the Code being that the clerk shall indorse on the indictment "Filed" with the date, and sign his name, as clerk; but that no entry shall be made showing the finding of the indictment on the minutes of the court, unless the party shall be under arrest or on recognizance, and that the fact of the return of the indictment shall not be made known to any but the court and its officers until after the arrest of the parties charged. This is the law, not only in this state, but in many other states, and is for the purpose of preventing escapes. This court, conforming as nearly as possible to the state laws, has since its organization adopted the same rule, with this addition, that the minutes do show the return of the bill by its number, which number, under the inspection of the court and the entry on the minutes of the return with the number, is also done under the inspection of the judge, so that almost if not quite as much certainty is obtained for the protection of the defendant as under the practice insisted upon, and that the reasons offered in support of the motion are insufficient, and the motion is thereupon overruled.

The facts showed that the defendant is a man in very moderate circumstances, with a large family and feeble wife dependent upon him for support; that the distillery was a very small concern, situate in a remote neighborhood; and that the probabilities are that he was ignorant as to the revenue laws, and, in consideration of which, the court imposed a fine of one thousand dollars, and six months' imprisonment, and expressed the hope that the executive clemency may grant him and his dependent family relief.

At law.

Mr. Bates, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Emmons, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought against the defendant as surety on the bond of a postmaster. The defendant pleaded a discharge under the bankrupt law. To this plea the plaintiffs demurred, joinder, &c. The question for decision is, whether the defendant as a surety to the government, is discharged under the bankrupt law.

It is a general principle in England, that the king is not bound by a general statutory provision. It must be made to apply to the sovereignty specially to bind it. The same principle has been recognised, to some extent at least, in this country. On this ground it has been uniformly held, that the statute of limitations does not bar a claim of the government, unless the provision be express that it shall be a bar. In the post office act, unless suit be brought against the surety of a postmaster, within two years after the defalcation occurs, the government is barred. In many other cases, the prosecution for certain penalties incurred is limited. But under the general statute, no court has held that the government was barred.

I have always considered this rule of doubtful policy, as against sureties, as it encourages negligence in public officers, and often proves ruinous to individuals. Reposing in the vigilance of the government, a surety of a postmaster, or other public agent, is not apprised of a defalcation, until it is too late to save himself. In these cases, it is especially necessary to apprise the surety of the defalcation at the earliest practicable moment, that he may take the proper steps for his indemnity. Suits have often been commenced from ten to twenty years after the failure of the principal.

The fourth section of the bankrupt law provides, "and such discharge and certificate when duly granted, shall, in all courts of justice, be deemed a full and complete discharge of all debts, contracts, and other engagements of such bankrupt which are proveable under this act, and shall and may be pleaded as a full and complete bar," &c.

In the first section of the act, it is declared not to extend to debts which shall have been created in consequence of a defalcation as a public officer, &c. And it is insisted that the debt now claimed did accrue by reason of the defalcation of the postmaster, and, consequently, is not within the act.

This argument is admitted as regards the postmaster, but does the act embrace his surety? The exception against a public defaulter is personal, and is intended to withhold from him a benefit given to others, because he is a defaulter. He has not discharged his duty faithfully to the public, and he is, therefore, excluded from a discharge for a debt thus incurred. But from this special provision, an inference may be drawn that, without such a provision, the law would have embraced the case of a defaulter.

As regards the surety, who is under no

default, and is in no respect censurable for the responsibility incurred, we see no reason why he should not be discharged under the law, from such an indictment. He is literally within the act, and we see nothing in its policy which should exclude him from its benefits. The demurrer is overruled.

UNITED STATES v. DAVIS.

[5 Mason, 356.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1829.

FEDERAL CRIMINAL JURISDICTION—GRANT TO UNITED STATES—LARCENY—CHOSES IN ACTION—"PERSONAL GOODS."

1. The offence of larceny is not punishable under the act of 1790, c. 9 [1 Stat. 112; 1 Story's Laws, p. 80, c. 36], unless committed in a place under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; and to bring the case within the statute there must be an averment of such sole and exclusive jurisdiction in the indictment.

[Cited in U. S. v. Andrews, Case No. 14,455; U. S. v. Tierney, Id. 16,517.]

2. "Personal goods," in that statute, do not include choses in action, the latter not being the subject of larceny at the common law.

[Cited in U. S. v. Moulton, Case No. 15,827; U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 251.]

3. Where a larceny is committed in a place not under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, it may yet be punishable under the third section of the act of 1825, c. 276 [3 Story's Laws, 2000; 4 Stat. 115, c. 65.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Barney, Case No. 14,524.]

4. Offences are punishable under that section according to the state laws, where they are committed, under circumstances, or in places, in which, before that act, no court of the United States had authority to punish them.

[Cited in Re O'Connor, 37 Wis. 384.]

5. It seems that a reservation on a cession of "concurrent jurisdiction," to serve state process, civil and criminal, in the ceded place, does not exclude the exclusive legislation or exclusive jurisdiction of the United States over the ceded place. It merely operates as a condition of the grant.

[Cited in Lasher v. State, 30 Tex. App. 387, 17 S. W. 1065; Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 318.]

Indictment against the defendant [Edmund Davis] for larceny. The indictment charged, that the defendant, on the 15th of May, 1829, in the Marine Hospital at Chelsea, in the district of Massachusetts, a needful building belonging to the United States, the site whereof has been and is ceded by the state of Massachusetts to the United States, with force and arms, one trunk of the value, &c., one bank bill of the North Bank, of the value, &c., one bank bill of the Bank of the United States, of the value, &c. (describing also sundry other articles, and gold and silver coins,) and one promissory note, being then unsatisfied &c. of the goods, chattels, monies, and property of Charles Turner, steward and overseer of the said Marine Hospital, then and there in the said Marine Hospital, being found, did then and there feloniously steal, take, and carry away, against the peace and dignity of the said United States, and contrary to the form of the statute of the United States in such case made and provided. Plea, not guilty.

Upon the trial the jury disagreed as to the facts, and were, by consent of the parties discharged from giving any verdict. And thereupon F. Dexter, for the defendant, moved the court to quash the indictment upon an objection, which he had taken at the trial. It was as follows: The present indictment is founded on the act of 1825 (chapter 276, § 3). That section applies only to offences, which have not been previously provided for by the crimes act of 1790, c. 9 [1 Story's Laws, p. 83, c. 36] § 16. The offence described in that section is larceny; and so is that in the present indictment. The offence too is committed in a place within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. And if not so, still as the specific offence is provided for, although not when committed in such a place as the Marine Hospital under the cession, it is out of the purview of the act of 1825. The words of that act (section 3) are "that if any offence shall be committed in any of the places aforesaid, the punishment of which offence is not specially provided for by any law of the United States, such offence shall receive the punishment provided by the laws of the state in which the ceded territory is situate. The terms of the statute do not apply to the place, but to the description of the offence. If not punishable when committed in the particular place, still, if the offence is provided for, and punishable when committed in any other place, the statute does not authorize the court to entertain jurisdiction.

Mr. Dunlap, U. S. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

The motion to quash the indictment rests upon two grounds; first, that the indictment is not supported by the statute of 1825 (chapter 276, § 4); secondly, that it is not supported by the statute of 1790 (chapter 36, § 16). It is said, that it is not within the statute of 1825, because the offence is "specially provided for" by the statute of 1790; and not within the statute of 1790, because the indictment does not aver, that the place where the larceny was committed was within the "sole and exclusive" jurisdiction of the United States. The answers offered to these objections to the indictment are these. The offence, charged in the indictment,—stealing a trunk, containing money, bank bills, and a promissory note,—was not provided for by the statute of 1790, for the Marine Hospital at Chelsea was not a place within the "sole and exclusive jurisdiction" of the United States, within the words and meaning of that statute. It was a place where congress must necessarily, by the constitution of the United States (article 1, § 8), exercise "exclusive legislation;" but the act of cession, by the state of Massachusetts, expressly provides, that the state of Massachusetts shall retain "concurrent jurisdiction," so far as that all criminal and civil processes of the state may be executed within the ceded tract of land, and persons residing there are to be considered inhabitants of the town of Chelsea.

If the cession of the tract to the United States necessarily vested the "sole and exclusive jurisdiction" in the United States, upon the ground, that "jurisdiction" must be "sole and exclusive," then alleging the place, as is alleged in the indictment, to be "under the jurisdiction of the United States," is alleging it to be under the "sole and exclusive jurisdiction;" and, consequently, the indictment, if not supported by the statute of 1825, is, clearly, by that of 1790. It was the opinion of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, delivered by Chief Justice Parsons, in relation to offences in the Springfield Armory, in Clary's Case, 8 Mass. 72, that the cession by the state of Massachusetts vested in the United States the sole and exclusive jurisdiction in relation to offences there committed. The word "jurisdiction," in the first section of the statute of 1825, being in relation to the forts, dock-yards, arsenals, and magazines, in the statute of 1790, is evidently there used in the sense of "sole and exclusive jurisdiction."

On the other hand, if the mere possession of "jurisdiction" is not the possession of "sole and exclusive jurisdiction," then the Marine Hospital at Chelsea is not under the "sole and exclusive jurisdiction" of the United States, because of the "concurrent jurisdiction" of Massachusetts, reserved in the cession; and, therefore, it is not a place described in the statute of 1790, and the case falls within the statute of 1825.

The sixteenth section of the statute of 1790 contains the word, "places," but it evidently refers to the third section of that law, in which is contained the following enumeration; "fort, arsenal, dock-yard, magazine, or in any other place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States." It is contended, that the word "place," is here used as synonymous with "district of country," and was never intended to apply to a "needful building," like the hospital, as such buildings were not then possessed. This, probably was one of the reasons which induced congress to make the very provision in the statute of 1825.

The statute of 1790 did not provide for this case, for it prohibited, if it prohibited a technical larceny, (which, from the language used, is doubtful,) the stealing of "personal goods" merely. Mr. Dane, in his Abridgment of American Law (volume 7, p. 176), observes, upon this law, that the act does not say, "feloniously stole." In the present case, the only "personal goods" stolen were the trunk. Its contents were monies, bank bills, and a promissory note. Perhaps the monies may be included under the term, "personal goods," but the bank bills and the promissory note, being choses in action, cannot; and, as the larceny was committed at one time and place, it could not be split into two offences. Consequently, the case was not provided for in the statute of 1790, and fell within that of 1825. Goods and chattels are synonymous words. The law dictionaries refer, for a definition of goods, to the word "chattels." Jac. Law Dict. "Goods."

In Com. Dig. tit. "Biens," is an enumeration of what are included in the term, "goods"; neither money nor choses in action are enumerated. Lord Coke, also, makes a similar enumeration; but although he mentions such things as "bows," does not enumerate money nor choses in action. Co. Litt. 118. Jacob's Law Dictionary, word "chattels," contains a similar definition. Money and choses in action, so far from being mentioned as chattels, are expressly stated not to be so. Had choses in action been "personal goods," there would have been no necessity for the various statutes passed to render property of this nature the subject of larceny; for there never was a time in the history of the common law when a felonious taking and carrying away the "personal goods" of another, with intent to steal, was not larceny. These statutes were passed expressly upon the ground, that choses in action were not "personal goods." The words, "personal goods," in the 16th section of the statute of 1790, are evidently used in a common law sense, instead of the word, "chattels," and being in a penal statute, are to receive a strict construction. Because money and choses in action are "assets," it does not follow that they, particularly choses in action, are "personal goods;" for mortgages, leases for years, stocks, &c. are assets in the hands of executors and administrators, though certainly not goods and chattels.

STORY, Circuit Justice. We have considered the motion, and are of opinion, that the objection taken at the bar cannot be maintained in point of law, and the motion ought therefore to be overruled. The crimes act of 1790, c. 9 [1 Story's Laws, p. 83, c. 36] § 16, provides, "that if any person within any of the places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or upon the high seas, shall take and carry away, with intent to steal or purloin, the personal goods of another," &c. he shall, on conviction, be liable to a certain punishment prescribed by the act. It is clear, that no person is punishable under this act, unless his case falls within the descriptive terms used in the act. If he should take and carry away, with intent to steal or purloin, any thing, not the "personal goods" of another, or should commit the offence in a place not "under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States," he would not be liable to punishment under the act. And an indictment, which did not contain all the material statements to bring the case within the statute, would be bad, and judgment might, even after verdict, be arrested for the defect. And an indictment, to be properly framed, must follow, if not the very words, at least the substance of the statute. Now, it is clear, that the present indictment could not be supported for a moment on the act of 1790, for it does not state, that the place is "under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States," nor does it use the words of the statute, "take and carry away with intent to steal or purloin;" both which defects would be fatal. For in criminal cases, courts of law are not at liberty to make intendments and inferences to support indictments, in the same manner as they may do to support civil actions. How, then, can the court say, upon this motion, that the offence described in this indictment is the same offence provided for in the act of 1790? If the words of the act of 1790 describe the offence of larceny or theft at the common law, still the indictment must use the words of the statute, for it is punishable as a statute offence; and it would not be sufficient to allege, that the party was guilty of larceny or theft. And for the same reason it would not be sufficient to use any other words, not being those of the statute, although in the sense of the common law they may be descriptive of the same offence. Whether the words, "take and carry away with intent to steal," are exactly in all cases of the same legal import with "feloniously steal, take, and carry away," it is unnecessary to consider.

Farther; an indictment on the act of 1790 lies only, where the offence is committed in respect to the "personal goods" of another. To ascertain what is the meaning of these words we must resort to the common law, for that furnishes the proper rule of interpretation. Now, in the strict sense of the common law, personal goods are goods, which are moveable, belonging to, or the property of, some person, and which have an intrinsic value. Bonds, bills, and notes, which are choses in action, are not esteemed, by the common law, goods, whereof larceny may be committed, being of no intrinsic value, and not importing any property in possession of the person, from whom they are stolen, but only evidence of property. See 2 Bl. Comm. 383, 387, 394, 396, 397; 4 Bl. Comm. 232, 233, 234; 2 East, P. C. 587; 2 Russ. Crimes, 1095; 1 Hawk. P. C. bk. 1, c. 33, §§ 34, 35. It is true, that the words "goods" or "chattels," may, in the construction of wills, include bonds, notes, bank-bills, &c.; but this is upon the presumed intention of the testator, where a liberal exposition of his words is allowable, and upon principles derived from the civil and canon law. 2 Rop. Leg. c. 16. But in penal statutes a more strict construction is adopted; and the analogy of the common law in respect to larceny may well furnish the proper rule for decision. We think, then, that "personal goods," in the sense of the act of 1790, do not embrace choses in action. And the present indictment is, in part, founded on a larceny of choses in action.

But the decisive objection against the motion is, that to bring the case within the act of 1790 the offence must be committed in a place within "the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States." The allegation, in the present indictment, is, that the site of the Marine Hospital "has been and is ceded by the state of Massachusetts to the United States;" which allegation is quite consistent with its not being a sole or exclusive jurisdiction. At least the court cannot intend otherwise upon a motion of this nature. It cannot judicially say, that a cession of jurisdiction is, ipso facto, equivalent to, and necessarily a sole and exclusive jurisdiction. If we are at liberty to look into the statute of Massachusetts (March 4, 1826, St. 1825–28, c. 181), ceding jurisdiction of a place for a Marine Hospital in Chelsea, which, as a public statute, we may take notice of, (though we cannot judicially know, that the place described in the indictment was purchased under the authority of that statute,) we shall find, from the terms of that statute, that there was not an unconditional consent to the cession. The words are, "that the consent of this commonwealth be and hereby is granted to the United States to purchase a tract of land, not exceeding ten acres, which shall be found necessary for the Marine Hospital to be built at Chelsea in the county of Suffolk, and may hold the same during the continuance of the use and appropriation aforesaid. Provided, that this commonwealth shall retain, and does hereby retain concurrent jurisdiction with the United States in and over said land so far, that all civil and criminal process, issued under the authority of this commonwealth or any officer thereof, may be executed on any part of said land, or in any building, which may be erected thereon, in the same way and manner, as though this consent had not been granted as aforesaid." And then follows another proviso, "that persons removing upon the tract of land shall be deemed to be inhabitants of Chelsea, and enjoy rights and privileges, and perform duties as such, except serving on juries, or doing military duty." The constitution of the United States has authorized congress "to exercise exclusive legislation over all places purchased by consent of the legislature of the state, in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." And there is nothing in this act of cession which excludes the exercise of exclusive legislation in this tract of land by congress, for no power to punish offences committed there is retained by the state. If, therefore, by the terms "sole and exclusive jurisdiction," in the act of 1790, no more is meant, than "exclusive legislation," an indictment founded on that act, so far as this objection goes might be maintained. In the case of Com. v. Clary, 8 Mass. 72, the supreme court of Massachusetts considered the mere reservation, in a cession, of a right to execute such civil and criminal process, as not inconsistent with an exclusive jurisdiction in the United States. And that decision was adopted and followed by the circuit court in U. S. v. Cornell [Case No. 14,867]. In the cession referred to in U. S. v. Cornell, the words, "concurrent jurisdiction" are not to be found in the proviso. But in the cession by the statute of Massachusetts (statute 25th of June, 1798,) referred to in Com. v. Clary, 8 Mass. 72, the words, "concurrent jurisdiction" are found in the same connexion. And indeed the clause of the present cession appears to be borrowed, in substance, from that of the statute of 1798. So that the authority is directly in point. The act of congress of March 2, 1795, c. 105 [1 Story's Laws, 391; 1 Stat. 426, c. 40], seems incidentally to justify the same construction; for it declares cessions for light-houses, &c. made with such reservations, shall be deemed sufficient; and further provides, that where such reservations have not been made, the state process may nevertheless be executed there. But it is not necessary absolutely to decide this point in the present case, since the present indictment does not allege, that the offence was committed in a place under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; so that it does not judicially appear to be an offence punishable under that act. If there was a concurrent jurisdiction, the offence is clearly not punishable by the act of 1790; if there was an exclusive jurisdiction, that is not shown on the face of the indictment. Either way, therefore, we cannot say, that the offence is provided for in the place, where it was committed, so as to be punishable by this court, if the party had pleaded guilty under the act of 1790.

But it is said, that it is not necessary, that the offence should be so punishable, to except it out of the operation of the third section of the crimes act of 1825; all that is required is, that the offence should have been provided for by some prior act, as a substantive offence in some place, as in a fort or on the high seas, &c. although not in a hospital. We cannot yield to this argument. The object of the act of 1825 was to provide for the punishment of offences committed in places under the jurisdiction of the United States, where the offence was not before punishable by the courts of the United States under the actual circumstances of its commission. The language of the act is, "that if any offence shall be committed in any of the places aforesaid, (that is, forts, dock-yards, &c. or the site of any other needful buildings,) the punishment of which offence is not specially provided for by any law of the United States, such offence shall, upon a conviction in any court of the United States, &c., be liable to, and receive, the same punishment, as the laws of the state, in which such fort, &c. is situate, provide for the like offence, &c." Now, it is plain, that no law of the United States punished this offence, if the place was not within its sole and exclusive jurisdiction. It was, therefore, within the very words of the section, an offence, "the punishment of which was not specially provided for by any law of the United States." The purposes of the section would be wholly defeated by any other construction of the words; and we can really perceive no solid objection to that, which we have given to it. It appears to us to be a rational and obvious construction of it.

The motion to quash the indictment is therefore overruled.

Case No. 14,931.

UNITED STATES v. DAVIS et al.

[2 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 35.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 5, 1841.

LARCENY ON HIGH SEAS — CIRCUIT COURT JURISDICTION—INDICTMENT—WITNESS—TRIAL —PRESUMPTION.

1. Where prisoners were jointly indicted under the act of congress of 1790 (section 16), for grand larceny upon the high seas, it was held that the taking originally must be upon the high seas to convict the prisoners. [1 Stat. 116.]

2. If the jury believed that the taking was on board of the vessel while lying in the port of Savannah, in the state of Georgia, being one of the United States, the circuit courts of the United States of oyer and terminer, sitting in admiralty, had not jurisdiction of the offence.

3. Bringing the property stolen away from the port of Savannah to the port of New York, did not give the court jurisdiction, although brought on board of an American vessel and on the high seas.

4. The court, on motion of the prisoner's counsel, permitted the case of one of the prisoners to be submitted to the jury separate, so that he could be used as a witness in case he was found not guilty.

5. The prisoner was called after his acquittal, as to the point where the goods were originally taken,—whether on the high seas, or while the vessel lay at Savannah, in Georgia.

6. The court held that at the trial they would not stop the proceedings on the ground that the proof did not show a case clearly within the indictment, but that in case the prisoners were convicted, they might move in arrest of judgment for the variance.

7. The court also held, that an indictment charging the prisoners with stealing goods, the property of persons unknown, was sufficient, and that where proof was offered that goods had been stolen on board of a vessel on the high seas, consigned to a mercantile firm at the port where the vessel was bound, the proof would be sufficient to convict the prisoners.

8. If there was a reasonable presumption that the taking of the property was felonious and against the will of the true owner, though such owner were unknown, there were sufficient grounds to convict the prisoners.

This was an indictment [against Joshua Davis and John Hanlon] for grand larceny on the high seas, on board of the American brig Excel, belonging to the port of New York, under the act of congress of the United States, passed April 30, 1790 (section 16).

The indictment charged, that the prisoners, on the high seas, on board of said brig, took and carried away 3 pieces of kerseymere cloth, 14 pairs of boots, 22 silver spoons, 10 pieces of table linen, and other articles, of the value of $300, the personal goods of the master of said vessel, or the owners thereof, or belonging to some person or persons to the jurors unknown. Plea, "not guilty."

The prisoners were jointly indicted and tried together.

The district attorney called William Wendell, who testified that the brig Excel sailed from the port of New York for Savannah, in Georgia, and thence back to the port of New York. That the prisoners and another man by the name of Hobby, were seamen on board of said vessel. The goods stolen were consigned to Prince & Wylder, merchants in Savannah, Georgia. The witness further testified, that he did not know to whom the goods belonged, but they were a part of the cargo of the vessel. He saw Hobby, who was a seaman on board the brig, with a quantity of kerseymere, and also a number of silver table spoons, on shore at Savannah, trying to sell them. On the return voyage of the vessel, Davis told witness that he had been sadly cheated by Hanlon and Hobby, that they had broken open together the forehatch of the vessel, took a parcel containing three pieces of kerseymere, broke open a package and took out 14 pairs of boots, and from another box 22 silver spoons, a quantity of table linen, sheets and diapers, four knives, &c., and that they had only given him $10 for his share, when it was worth 2 or 300. Witness advised Davis to tell the captain, but he answered that he was afraid that Hanlon and Hobby would kill him if he did. Davis further told Wendell that part of the goods were now on board the vessel, in a box, and stated where they were placed. Previous to the arrival of the vessel at quarantine, New York, Wendell told the captain. The secreted goods were then drawn from their hiding place, and the two men arrested on their arrival here.

The master of the vessel for the voyage was next called as a witness, and testified that he had not been aware that any other goods than the kerseymere had been stolen, previous to Wendell's giving him the information. A bill for this had been presented at Savannah, amounting to $98. The packages from which the rest had been taken probably belonged to the country, and sufficient time had not elapsed to hear from them. He also stated, that the men were more likely to have stolen the goods while lying at Savannah than at sea. He further testified that the fact of the robbery having been committed was corroborated by the finding of a box in a house over the forehatch of the vessel, which box contained part of the stolen property, which had been brought back from Savannah to the port of New York, and was not discovered until the vessel arrived at quarantine, in New York, on her return voyage. The captain of the vessel testified that he knew nothing of the robbery by the prisoners until the witness Wendell, to whom the alleged confession was made, informed him of it on the return voyage, about three days before the vessel arrived at quarantine, and that he had not until then known there was such a box on board the vessel.

At this stage of the case the prisoner's counsel contended that the confession of Davis should not be considered as evidence against him. It was given under circumstances of promise which were not good in law, and cited the case of People v. Thorn, reported in 4 City H. Rec. 81. Thorn, Livingston and Tracy, were indicted for a conspiracy to defraud the Merchants' Bank in the city of New York out of $100,000, when the government witness testified that he believed the confession of Thorn was made under the influence of the promise of making him a state's evidence.

The counsel for the prisoners also took another objection,—that it did not appear to whom the goods belonged by the evidence. The district attorney stated that he had no further evidence in the cause. The counsel for the prisoners insisted that they could not be convicted, as it was necessary to prove that the goods taken belonged to some person who had a real existence, and whose name should be correctly set forth in the indictment, and cited 2 Russ. Crimes, p. 162; Archb. Cr. Pl. 176. The counsel stated the indictment did not agree with the statute. The latter states that the goods taken must be personal property of another, whereas the indictment says that they belonged to some person or persons unknown, and "what evidence have we," said the counsel, "that the goods did not belong to the prisoners themselves?" The objections to the confessions of Davis were overruled by the court. The judge stated that in case the prisoners were convicted they could move in arrest of judgment on a case made for want of sufficient proof, should they be advised so to do; but was inclined to hold in the present stage of the case that the proof and the indictment charging the prisoners with stealing goods, the property of persons unknown, was sufficient, and declined to stop the trial.

The prisoners' counsel then stated that they wished to call Hanlon, one of the prisoners, as a witness in the cause, and moved that the case, so far as Hanlon, one of the prisoners, was concerned, might go to the jury separate. His honor, the judge, then permitted the counsel of the prisoner to submit his case on the evidence to the jury, who returned a verdict of not guilty. Hanlon was then put upon the stand, and was asked where it was that Davis took the goods, whether it was on the high seas or in the port of Savannah. The witness stated that he could not tell, for he knew nothing about it.

The prisoner's counsel then summed up to the jury, and argued that the weight of proof went to show that the robbery had been committed at the town of Savannah, in Georgia, and that therefore this court had no jurisdiction in the premises, as the act of congress required that it should be proved the defendants had "taken and carried away the personal property of another person on the high seas," and that therefore the prisoner must be acquitted, even had he been morally guilty of the robbery, and asked the court to charge the jury that if they believed that the goods were originally taken while the vessel was in the port of Savannah, in Georgia, that this court had not jurisdiction to try the offence, and the prisoner must be acquitted on this ground. They urged that the act of congress of 1790 (section 16), under which the prisoner was indicted, did not confer jurisdiction upon this court for larcenies on board of vessels while they lay within the municipal jurisdiction of any state in the United States, or within the municipal jurisdiction of a foreign state.

THE COURT thereupon, after the summing up of the respective counsel, charged the jury: (1) That it must be proved to their satisfaction that a larceny had been committed, and if they believed the testimony in this cause, there could be no doubt on this point. (2) That it must have been committed on the high seas and on board of an American vessel; and it was a question of fact for them to determine from the evidence whether the property stolen had been taken while the vessel lay at the port of Savannah or upon the high seas. If they found that the goods were stolen while the vessel was on the high seas, they would be bound to convict the prisoners; but if the goods were taken while the vessel lay at the port of Savannah, in the state of Georgia, although the prisoner morally was guilty of the larceny, he could not be punished by this court, under the act of congress, as the statute had not conferred jurisdiction upon this court, and the jury would be bound under the latter hypothesis to acquit the prisoner.

The cause was then submitted to the jury, who retired and returned a verdict of "Not guilty," whereupon the prisoner was discharged.

1. A gun was fired from an American ship, lying in the harbor of Raiatea, one of the Society Isles and a foreign government, by which a person on board a schooner, belonging to the natives and lying in the same harbor, was killed. Held, that the act was, in contemplation of law, done on board the foreign schooner, where the shot took effect, and that jurisdiction of it belonged to the foreign government, and not to the courts of the United States under the crimes act of 1790, c. 36, § 12 [1 Story's Laws, 85; 1 Stat. 115, c. 9].

Indictment [against James Davis] for manslaughter of a person, whose name was unknown, against the act of 1790, c. 36, § 12 (1 Story's Laws, 84 [1 Stat. 115, c. 9]). There were two counts, one stating the offence to be committed on the high seas; the other containing a special statement of all the circumstances as to locality, &c. Plea, not guilty.

At the trial, it appeared in evidence from the testimony of the mate, that the defendant (Davis), was master of the ship Rose, an American whale ship. The ship sailed on the voyage in August, 1833. In the course of the voyage, the ship arrived at the island of Raiatea, one of the Society Islands, where she lay for ten or twelve days to recruit, and to cooper her oil. While lying there, a schooner came alongside, which belonged to some persons, who were residents of one of the islands, and was tied to the ship. The deceased was one of the crew of that schooner. Some difficulty having occurred with an Irishman who did not belong to the ship, but was employed on board; and the defendant (Davis) ordered him to be tied up and flogged, which was accordingly done by the mate. The deceased at that time came on board of the ship, and said to the defendant, Captain Davis, do not strike the man across the loins. The defendant told him to go out of the ship, and he immediately left the ship and went on board of the schooner. The Irishman was then put in irons. Sometime after, the boat's crew of the ship Rose came on board and refused to do duty, while the Irishman remained in irons. The defendant told them to go to work. They still refused, and one of them (a blackman) took up a handspike. The defendant had previously sent for his gun below, and then had it in his hands; and the blackman having the handspike, said to him; "Shoot straight, if you do not shoot me I will kill you." The defendant then ordered the mate to put the blackman in irons; and while the mate was doing it, the gun, then in the captain's hands, went off, and the mate, upon looking up, saw the deceased was shot, and fall instantly dead on the deck of the schooner. How the gun went off, whether purposely or not, did not appear. The defendant then went below. The deceased had not taken any part in this affray, and was all the time on board of the schooner until he was shot. An examination was afterwards had before the American consul at the island, and the defendant was sent home for trial. From the testimony it further appeared, that the deceased was not an American but was a foreigner, and was believed to be an Englishman. From the testimony and other evidence, it farther appeared, that the island of Raiatea is surrounded or in a great part surrounded by a coral reef, which forms a fine harbor, a half mile wide from the reef to the island. At high water the coral reef is not out of water or visible; but at low water it is, as the natives may then be seen walking on the reef. At high water, the sea of course washes entirely over the reef. There are small islets about the reef, and two places only where vessels can enter. The entrances are narrow, not above twenty rods wide. Pilots are there required at both entrances, and pilotage and port duties are paid. There is no better harbor in the South Seas; and it is not an open roadstead. The ship and schooner, at the time of the occurrence, lay within the reef about one hundred and fifty yards from the shore of the island, about two miles from one of the entrances. The place was commonly called a harbor or port.

Upon this evidence obtained from the witness for the government; Choate for the defendant, without going into any evidence on his side, cited 3 Murray, Enc. Geography, art. Raiatea, p. 159, and 2 Malte Brun, Geography, p. 294, and contended, that upon the government's own evidence, the court had no jurisdiction of the case. He said, that he was prepared to show, that no offence had been committed; but that the defendant had good reason to suppose, that his gun was not loaded, and only pointed it for intimidation; and that he had been tried before the king of the Society Islands, and had been acquitted. But, as he thought, the offence, if any, was not within the jurisdiction of the court. He cited U. S. v. McGill, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 426.

Mr. Mills, Dist. Atty., said he was willing to submit the case upon the evidence, to the court and jury.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. We are of opinion, that under the circumstances established in evidence, there is no jurisdiction in this cause. The crimes act of 1790 (chapter 36, § 12), on which this indictment is founded, gives to this court jurisdiction of the crime of manslaughter only when committed "on the high seas." We do not absolutely decide, whether the place where this offence, if any, was committed, was the high seas or not; because that might be affected by considerations of a very delicate and difficult nature, as whether it was high or low tide; for a place may at high water be the high seas, and yet at low water be strictly a part of the land, as is the case on our seashore, according to the well known doctrine in Constable's Case, 5 Coke, 106a. In the present case at high water, the tide of the ocean had full sweep over the place in question; and it may be matter of grave consideration, whether, if the whole reef was at the time covered with water, the whole, including the place where the schooner lay, ought not to be deemed the high seas. But on this we give no opinion.

What we found ourselves upon in this case, is, that the offence, if any, was committed, not on board of the American ship Rose; but on board of a foreign schooner belonging to inhabitants of the Society Islands, and of course, under the territorial government of the king of the Society Islands, with which kingdom we have trade, and friendly intercourse, and which our government may be presumed (since we have a consul there) to recognize as entitled to the rights and sovereignty of an independent nation, and of course entitled to try offences committed within its territorial jurisdiction. I say the offence was committed on board of the schooner; for although the gun was fired from the ship Rose, the shot took effect and the death happened on board of the schooner; and the act was, in contemplation of law, done where the shot took effect. So the law was settled in the case of Rex v. Coombes, 1 Leach, 388, where a person on the high seas was killed by a shot fired by a person on shore, and the offence was held to be committed on the high seas, and to be within the admiralty jurisdiction. Of offences committed on the high seas on board of foreign vessels (not being a piratical vessel,) but belonging to persons under the acknowledged government of a foreign country, this court has no jurisdiction under the act of 1790 (chapter 36, § 12). That was the doctrine of the supreme court in U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 610, and U. S. v. Klintock, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 144, and U. S. v. Holmes, Id. 412; applied, it is true, to another class of cases, but in its scope embracing the present. We lay no stress on the fact that the deceased was a foreigner. Our judgment would be the same, if he had been an American citizen. We decide the case wholly on the ground, that the schooner was a foreign vessel, belonging to foreigners, and at the time under the acknowledged jurisdiction of a foreign government. We think, that under such circumstances, the jurisdiction over the offence belonged to the foreign government, and not to the courts of the United States under the act of congress.

The jury immediately returned a verdict of not guilty.

NOTE. The district judge, immediately on this acquittal, suggested for consideration, whether, under such circumstances, it was not the duty of the court to remand the prisoner to the foreign government for trial. Mr. Justice Story said, that he had never known any such authority exercised by our courts, except where the case was provided for by the stipulations of some treaty. He had great doubts, whether, upon principles of international law, and independent of any statutable provisions, or treaty stipulations, any court of justice was either bound in duty, or authorized in its discretion, to send back any offender to a foreign government whose laws he was supposed to have violated. The district judge acquiesced in this view of the matter; and the prisoner was discharged.

UNITED STATES v. DAWSON et al.

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. April 28, 1853.

COURTS—DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS—INDIAN COUNTRY—STATUTE—CRIMINAL JURISDICTION—INDICTMENT PENDING.

1. Persons indicted in 1845 in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, for a felony committed in the Indian country west of Arkansas, and which territory was transferred to the Western district of Arkansas by the act of 3d March, 1851 (9 Stat. 594), are subject to be tried in the court where the indictment was found, and the court in the Western district has no jurisdiction.

2. That act did not deprive the court where an indictment was pending, of the right to try and determine the same.

Indictment for murder.

The indictment was as follows, namely:—

"The United States of America, District of Arkansas, ss.: In the circuit court of the United States, begun and holden within and for the district of Arkansas aforesaid, at the April term thereof, A. D. 1845. Dawson, who is a white man, and not an Indian, late of said district, on the 8th day of July, in the year of Christ, eighteen hundred and forty-four, with force and arms, in that part and portion of the Indian country west of the Mississippi river that is bounded north by the north line of lands assigned to the Osage tribe of Indians, produced east to the state of Missouri, west by the Mexican possessions, south by Red river, and east by the west line of the now states of Arkansas and Missouri (the same being territory annexed to the district of Arkansas, for the purposes in the act in that behalf made and provided,) namely, in the district of Arkansas aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this honorable court, in and upon one Seaborn Hill, who was a white man and not an Indian, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, did make an assault; and that the said James L. Dawson, a certain pistol of the value of five dollars, then and there loaded and charged with gunpowder and one leaden bullet, which pistol the said James L. Dawson, in his right hand, then and there had and held at, to, against, and upon the said Seaborn Hill, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, did shoot and discharge; and that the said James L. Dawson, with the leaden bullet aforesaid, out of the pistol aforesaid, then and there, by force of the gunpowder and shot sent forth as aforesaid, the said Seaborn Hill in and upon the left breast of him the said Seaborn Hill, a little below the left pap of him the said Seaborn Hill, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, did strike, penetrate, and wound, giving to the said Seaborn Hill then and there with the leaden bullet aforesaid, so as aforesaid shot, discharged, and sent forth out of the pistol aforesaid by the said James L. Dawson, in and upon the left breast of him the said Seaborn Hill, a little below the left pap of him the said Seaborn Hill, one mortal wound of the depth of six inches, and of the breadth of half an inch, of which mortal wound the said Seaborn Hill then and there instantly died. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present, that John R. Baylor, yeoman, who is a white man, and not an Indian, late of said district, on the day and year aforesaid, with force and arms, in the Indian country west of Arkansas, that is to say, in the Indian country bounded and described as aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, namely, in the district aforesaid, feloniously and wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, was present, aiding, abetting, and assisting the said James L. Dawson, the felony and murder aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, to do and commit, and so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said James L. Dawson and John R. Baylor, the said Seaborn Hill, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did kill and murder, contrary to the form of the statute in that behalf made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States of America aforesaid, and this indictment is founded on the testimony of witnesses sworn to testify before the grand-jury. S. H. Hempstead, Attorney of the U. States, for the Dist. of Arkansas.

"A true bill. P. T. Crutchfield, foreman of the grand-jury.

"Filed April 16th, 1845. Wm. Field, Clerk, by A. H. Rutherford, D. C."

Dawson was arrested on the 8th day of November, 1852, in Texas, by the marshal thereof, on process issued on the indictment, and was delivered to Luther Chase, the marshal of the Eastern district of Arkansas, on the 24th of November, 1852, and was from thenceforward confined in the jail of Pulaski county. John R. Baylor was never arrested.

On the 23d day of December, 1852, Dawson presented to the Hon. DANIEL RINGO, district judge at chambers, a petition for a habeas corpus, setting out the indictment, and his commitment under it, and insisting that all jurisdiction over the case totally ceased after the passage of the act of the 3d of March, 1851, creating a Western district of Arkansas and attaching the Indian country, where this offence was alleged to have been committed to the court of that district; and praying to be discharged from imprisonment.

Joseph Stilwell, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Albert Pike, E. Cummins, and E. H. English, for Dawson.

Before DANIEL, Circuit Justice, and RINGO, District Judge.

RINGO, District Judge. On hearing the petition of James L. Dawson, praying a writ of habeas corpus and discharge from imprisonment, and upon hearing the argument of counsel thereupon, as well on behalf of the prisoner as of the United States, it appears by the showing of petitioner that he stands charged by indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas with the crime of murder, committed in the Indian country, on a white person, on the 8th day of July, A. D. 1844, within the limits of that part of the Indian country then attached to that district;—that this indictment was in due form found by the grand-jury impanelled and sworn in the circuit court, at the April term thereof, A. D. 1845, and by the jury returned and delivered into court as a true bill, on the 16th day of April, A. D. 1845, and then filed; that writs of capias founded thereupon, for his arrest to answer the United States on said charge have been from time to time by order of court issued thereout, and that the prosecution is still pending: that on and by virtue of one of the writs of capias, issued in due form, bearing date the 20th day of May, A. D. 1852, addressed to the marshal of the district of Texas, and returnable to said court at the April term thereof, 1853, petitioner was on the 8th day of November, 1852, arrested in the state and district of Texas, by a deputy of the marshal of the district of Texas, by whom he was thence conveyed to the district of Arkansas, and on the 24th day of November, turned over and delivered into the custody of Luther Chase, "marshal of the United States for the Eastern district of Arkansas, and by him committed to the jail of Pulaski county in the last-named district, where he has ever since remained and still is imprisoned, to answer to said indictment, and that no cause, other than said charge, indictment, capias, and proceedings exists, or ever did exist for his imprisonment and detention in custody. He therefore claims the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, and that upon the hearing he may be discharged from imprisonment and custody, on the ground that this court is not possessed of jurisdiction of the crime, because the same if committed, was committed at a place not now within its jurisdiction, the place where said crime is charged to have been committed, being in that part of the Indian country, which by act of congress of March 3, 1851, dividing the district of Arkansas, is attached to the Western district of Arkansas for which a separate district court was by said act created and vested with all the jurisdiction and powers of a circuit court, without any reservation to said circuit court of jurisdiction of any crimes previously committed within the limits of said Western district, or the Indian country attached thereto, or any transfer of any prosecution, or case, then pending in the circuit court, to any other court, and without any provision for the trial of such crimes in the district court for the Western district. Wherefore he insists he is legally discharged from any prosecution for said crime, no court possessing the power to punish offences committed in the Indian country now attached to said Western district committed prior to the creation thereof by the division of said Arkansas district, and is now illegally imprisoned and held in custody to answer the said indictment.

I am not satisfied that by the division of the district, and the attaching of the place and Indian country where the crime is charged to have been committed, to the Western district of Arkansas, the jurisdiction of the circuit court over the crime, and the prosecution thereof were divested, or that this court notwithstanding does not possess ample jurisdiction thereof, and may lawfully proceed to try and punish in such case although the place where the crime was committed, if committed at all, is not now within, or attached to, the Eastern district of Arkansas and within which the place, where by law the circuit court is required to hold its sessions, is situated, and inasmuch as the crime charged against the petitioner is a felony, and no sufficient ground for his discharge from imprisonment is shown, admitting all of the facts to be true, as stated in his petition, (with which is exhibited a duly certi-ed copy of the indictment and writ of capias, with the return thereto of the marshal above mentioned,) the prayer of the petition is denied.

At the April term, 1853, a motion was made by Dawson, to quash the indictment on the same ground set out in the petition, namely, that the act of 3d March, 1851, creating a court in the Western district of Arkansas, had the effect of destroying the jurisdiction of this court over the case.

This motion was argued, before DANIEL, Circuit Justice, and RINGO, District Judge. Joseph Stilwell, U. S. Dist. Atty. A. Pike, E. Cummins, and E. H. English, for Dawson. Upon this motion the judges differed in opinion and certified two questions to the supreme court, which are stated in the decision of that court, hereafter introduced.

Dawson applied for bail, but the court on hearing the testimony refused his application.

NOTE. The case in the supreme court was argued at the December term, 1853, Mr. Cushing, Atty. Gen., for the United States; and Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Pike, for Dawson; and will be found reported in 15 How. [56 U. S.] 467–494.

Mr. Justice NELSON delivered the opinion of the supreme court:

The defendant was indicted in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, for the alleged murder of one Seaborn Hill, in the Indian country west of the state of Arkansas. The defendant is a white man and so was Hill, the deceased.

At a circuit court held at the city of Little Rock, on the 28th of April, 1853, the indictment came on for trial before the judges of that court; whereupon a motion was made on behalf of the defendant, to quash the indictment for want of jurisdiction of the court to try the same. And upon the argument, the judges being divided in opinion, the following question was certified to this court for its decision:—

1. Did the act of congress, entitled "An act to divide the district of Arkansas into two judicial districts," approved the 3d of March, 1851, by which the Western district of Arkansas was created, take away the power and jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Arkansas, to try the indictment pending against the prisoner, James L. Dawson, a white man, found in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, by a grand-jury impanelled on the 16th of April, 1845, for feloniously killing Seaborn Hill, a white man, on the 8th of July, 1844, in the country belonging to the Creek Nation of Indians west of Arkansas, and which formed a part of the Indian country annexed to the judicial district of Arkansas by the act of congress, approved on the 17th of June, 1844 [5 Stat. 680], entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and to preserve peace on the frontiers,'" passed 30th June, 1834 [4 Stat. 729].

To state the question presented for our decision in a more simple form, it is this: At the time the state of Arkansas composed but one judicial district in which the federal courts were held, the Indian country lying west of the state was annexed to it for the trial of crimes committed therein by persons other than Indians. In this condition of the jurisdiction of these courts, the crime in question was committed in the Indian country, and the indictment found in the circuit court at the April term, 1845, while sitting at the city of Little Rock, the place of holding the court.

Subsequent to this the state was divided into two judicial districts, the one called the Eastern and the other the Western district of Arkansas. The Indian country was attached to, and has since belonged to the Western district. The question presented for our decision is, whether or not the circuit court for the Eastern district is competent to try this indictment, since the change in the arrangements of the districts.

By the 24th section of the act of congress, June 30, 1834 (4 Stat. 733), it was provided that all that part of the Indian country west of the Mississippi river, bounded north by the northern boundary of lands assigned to the Osage tribe of Indians, west by the Mexican possessions, south by Red river, and east by the west line of the territory of Arkansas and state of Missouri, should be annexed to the territorial government of Arkansas for the sole purpose of carrying the several provisions of the act into effect. And the 25th section enacted, that so much of the laws of the United States as provides for the punishment of crimes committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall be in force in the Indian country, provided the same shall not extend to crimes committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian. The act of congress of June 7th, 1844 (5 Stat. 680), which was enacted after the territory of Arkansas became a state, provided that the courts of the United States for the district of Arkansas should be vested with the same power and jurisdiction to punish crimes committed within the Indian country, designated in the 24th section of the act of 1834, and therein annexed to the territory of Arkansas, as were vested in the courts of the United States for said territory before the same became a state; and that for the sole purpose of carrying the act into effect, all that Indian country theretofore annexed by said 24th section to the said territory, should be annexed to the state of Arkansas.

As we have already stated, the crime in question was committed in this Indian country, after it was annexed for the purposes stated, to the state of Arkansas; and the indictment was found in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, which we have seen was coextensive with the state. And if no change had taken place in the arrangement of the district before the trial, there could of course have been no question as to the jurisdiction of the court. But by the act of congress 3d March, 1851, it was provided that the counties of Benton and eight others enumerated, and all that part of the Indian country annexed to the state of Arkansas for the purposes stated, should constitute a new judicial district, to be styled "The Western district of Arkansas," and the residue of said state shall remain a judicial district, to be styled "The Eastern district of Arkansas." The 2d section provides, that the judge of the district court shall hold two terms of his court in this Western district in each year at Van Buren, the county seat in Crawford county. And the third confers upon him, in addition to the ordinary powers of a district court, jurisdiction within the district of all causes, civil or criminal, except appeals and writs of error which are cognizable before a circuit court of the United States. The fourth provides for the appointment of a district attorney and marshal for the district, and also for a clerk of the court.

It will be seen, on a careful perusal of this act, that it simply erects a new judicial district out of nine of the western counties in the state, together with the Indian country, and confers on the district judge, besides the jurisdiction already possessed, circuit court powers within the district, subject to the limitation as to appeals and writs of error; leaving the powers and jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts, as they existed in the remaining portion of the state, untouched. These remain and continue within the district after the change, the same as before; the only effect being to restrict the territory over which the jurisdiction extends. Hence no provision is made as to the time or place of holding the circuit or district courts in the district, or in respect to the officers of the courts, such as district attorney, marshal, or clerk, or for organizing the courts for the despatch of their business. These are all provided for under the old organization. 5 Stat. 50, 51, 176, 177, 178.

We do not, therefore, perceive any objection to the jurisdiction of these courts over cases pending at the time the change took place, civil and criminal, inasmuch as the erection of the new district was not intended to affect it in respect to such cases, nor has it in our judgment necessarily operated to deprive them of it.

It has been supposed that a provision in the sixth amendment of the constitution of the United States has a bearing upon this question, which provides that, "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law." The argument is. that since the erection of the new district out of the nine western counties in the state, together with the Indian country, it is not competent for the circuit court, in view of this amendment, to try the prisoners within the remaining portion of the old district, inasmuch as that amendment requires that the district within which the offence is committed, and the trial to be had, shall be ascertained and fixed previous to the commission of the offence. But it will be seen from the words of this amendment, that it applies only to the case of offences committed within the limits of a state; and whatever might be our conclusion, if this offence had been committed within the state of Arkansas, it is sufficient here to say, so far as it respects the objection, that the offence was committed out of its limits, and within the Indian country. The language of the amendment is too particular and specific to leave any doubt about it. "The accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall be committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

The only regulation in the constitution, as it respects crimes committed out of the limits of a state, is to be found in article 3, § 2 of the constitution, as follows:—"The trial of crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any state, the trial shall be at such place or places as the congress may by law have directed." Accordingly, in the first crimes act, passed April 30, 1790, § 8 (1 Stat. 114), it was provided, that "the trial of crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought." A crime, therefore, committed against the laws of the United States, out of the limits of a state, is not local, but may be tried at such place as congress shall designate by law. This furnishes an answer to the argument against the jurisdiction of the court, as it respects venue, trial in the county, and jury from the vicinage, as well as in respect to the necessity of particular or fixed districts before the offence. These considerations have no application or bearing upon the question.

In this case, by the annexation of the Indian country to the state of Arkansas, in pursuance of the act of 1844 for the punishment of crimes committed in that country, the place of indictment and trial was in the circuit court of the United States for that state in which the indictment has been found and was pending in 1851, when the Western district was set off; and as that change did not affect the jurisdiction of the court as it respected pending cases, but remained the same after the alteration of the district as before, it follows that the trial of the indictment in this court will be at the place and in the court as prescribed by law, which is all that is required in the case of an offence committed out of the limits of a state.

We shall direct, therefore, an answer in the negative to be certified to the court below to the first question sent up for our decision, as we are of opinion the court possesses jurisdiction to hear and give judgment on the indictment.

The second question sent up in the division of opinion is as follows:—Can the district court of the United States for the Western district of Arkansas take jurisdiction of the case aforesaid, so found in the year 1845, in said circuit court for the district of Arkansas?

As our conclusion upon the first question supersedes the necessity of passing upon the second, it will be unnecessary to examine it, and we shall therefore confine our answer and certificate to the court below to the first.

Mr. Justice McLEAN, dissenting.

The facts and law of this case, as I understand them, have led me to a different conclusion from that of a majority of the court. The 24th section of the act of the 30th June, 1834, after making various provisions defining the limits of the Indian country, and imposing penalties for several offences by white persons, provides, "that for the sole purpose of carrying this act into effect, the Indian country bounded east by Arkansas and Missouri, west by Mexico, north by the Osage country, and south by Red river, shall be, and hereby is, annexed to the territory of Arkansas." On the 8th of July, 1844, a murder was committed at the Creek agency, in the Creek country west of Arkansas, for which the grand-jury found a bill of indictment in the circuit court of Arkansas at April term, 1845. By an act of March 3, 1851, it is provided, "that from and after the passage of this act the counties of Benton, Washington, Crawford, Scott, Polk, Franklin, Johnson, Madison, and Carroll, and all that part of the Indian country lying within the present judicial district of Arkansas, shall constitute a new judicial district, to be styled the Western district of Arkansas; and the residue of said state shall be and remain a judicial district, to be styled the Eastern district of Arkansas."

After the division of the district, Dawson the defendant was arrested for the alleged murder; and the question whether the circuit court of the United States sitting within the Eastern district has jurisdiction to try the case, has been referred to this court. When the offence was committed and the indictment was found, the district of Arkansas included the state and the Indian country described; but when the defendant was arrested and the case was called for trial, the district had been divided; and the question is raised in the Eastern district, the murder having been committed in the Western. In the act dividing the district, congress had power to provide that all offences committed in the district before the division should be tried in the Eastern district. But no such provision being made, the question is, whether the jurisdiction may be exercised in that district without it. Since the division of the district, capital punishments have been inflicted in the Western district for offences committed before the division. This deprived the accused of no rights which they could claim under the constitution of the United States or the laws of the Union. The sixth article of the amendment to the constitution declares, that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law." As the state and district are connected by the copulative conjunction in this provision, the case before us is not technically within it. The crime is alleged to have been committed within the Indian country which the district includes; but it is not within the state. But the case appears to me to be within the policy of the provision. Nine counties of the state of Arkansas are within the district, and from which the jury to try the defendant might be summoned. This brings the case substantially within the above provision. Had the place of the murder been within one of the above counties, the constitutional provisions must have governed the case. All the rights guaranteed by the constitution would have been secured to the criminal by a trial in the Western district; but those rights are not realized by him on a trial in the Eastern district. And that is made the place of trial because the alleged murder was not committed within the state.

In the 2d section of the 3d article of the constitution it is declared that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any state, the trial shall be at such place or places as congress may by law have directed." The latter clause of this provision covers the case now before us. The crime charged was not committed within any state; but it was committed within a district, within which such offences are to be tried as "directed by congress." And there seems to me to be no authority to try such an offender in any other district or at any other place. The act of 1834 provides that an offender under the act, when arrested, shall be sent for trial to the district where jurisdiction may be exercised. The punishments inflicted in the Western district of Arkansas for crimes committed before the division of the district, were in accordance with the above provision of the constitution and the principles of the common law, both of which are opposed to a trial of the same offences in the Eastern district. The tribunal is the same in both districts, except the circuit judge may not be bound to attend the Western district; but the Western district includes the place of the crime, which by the laws of England and of this country is the criterion of jurisdiction in criminal cases. This is never departed from where the limits of the jurisdiction are prescribed.

On what ground can jurisdiction be exercised in the Eastern district? Not, I presume, on the ground that the crime was committed before the district was divided. If this be assumed and sustained, the capital punishments which have been inflicted in the Western district for similar offences have been without authority. The offenders have been tried and they have had substantially the benefits secured by the constitution. They have had a jury from the district and as near the vicinage as practicable. These privileges they would not have realized had they been tried in the Eastern district. If tried in the Eastern district the jury must have been summoned from that district, and not from the district in which the offence was committed. The considerations in favor of the Western district as the legal place of trial, greatly outweigh, it seems to me, any that can arise in favor of the Eastern district.

There is, however, a fact which may be supposed of great weight in deciding the question; and that is, the indictment was found before the division of the district. I will examine this. It is admitted the jurisdiction was in the circuit court for the entire district when the indictment was found. This gave jurisdiction; but every step taker in the cause subsequent to the finding of the bill, is as much the exercise of jurisdiction as the finding of the bill. The establishment of the Western district in effect repealed the jurisdiction of the Eastern district as to causes of action arising in the Western district as fully as if the law had declared "no jurisdiction shall hereafter be taken in any case, civil or criminal, which is of a local character and arises in the Western district." Offences committed in that district are made local by the acts of congress. This is not a case where, if jurisdiction once attaches, the court may finally determine the matter. There seems to me to be no reason for such a rule in a criminal case, especially when it is opposed to the policy of the constitution and to the principles of the common law.

A case lately decided in this court may have some bearing on this question. Under the fugitive slave law of 1793 [1 Stat. 302], certain penalties were inflicted for aiding a fugitive from labor to escape. A number of actions were brought in several of the states—in Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan—for the recovery of this penalty; but it was set up in defence that this penalty was repealed by repugnant provisions in the law of 1850 [9 Stat. 462], on the same subject, and this court so held. The actions which had been pending for years were stricken from the docket. But it may be said the repeal in the case stated operated on the right of action. This is admitted. And so it may be said the Western district was repugnant to the Eastern, so far as causes of local actions arise in the Western district; and is not this repugnancy as fatal to the trial, as the repeal of the penalty in the act of 1793? All this difficulty arises from an omission of congress to make in the law dividing the district, the necessary provision; and it appears to me we have no power by construction or otherwise to supply the omission. This could not be done in an action of ejectment. A writ of possession in such a case could not be issued to the Western district on a judgment entered in the Eastern. And if such jurisdiction could not be sustained in a civil action, much less can it be sustained in a criminal case.

If a person guilty of a crime in the Indian country before the division, could not be indicted and tried in the Eastern district, it follows that the fact of the crime having been committed in the Indian country can afford no ground of jurisdiction in the present case. It must rest alone then, it would seem, for jurisdiction on the ground that the indictment having been found in the Eastern district, the same jurisdiction may try the defendants, and if found guilty sentence them to be executed. This view must overcome the locality of the crime, and the right which the defendants may claim to have, a jury as near the vicinage as practicable, at least a jury from the district where the crime was committed. These appear to me to be objections entitled to great consideration. A jurisdiction in so important a case should not be maintained under reasonable doubts of its legality.

The cases referred to in the argument to retain the jurisdiction, do not, as it appears to me, overcome the objections. Numerous instances are cited where the territory of a judicial district has been changed, provision being made in the act that the jurisdiction should be continued where suits had been commenced. This shows the necessity of such a provision, and is an argument against the exercise of the jurisdiction where no provision has been made. And in those cases like the present, where a district has been changed without any provision as to jurisdiction, there is no exercise of it shown in a criminal case, especially where the punishment is death. Where jurisdiction attaches from citizenship of the parties, a change of residence does not affect the jurisdiction. The case of Tyrell v. Roundtree, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 464, seems to have no bearing upon this question. That action was commenced by an attachment, which was laid upon the land before the division of the county; and this court said the land remained in the custody of the officer subject to the judgment of the court. An interest was vested in him for the purposes of that judgment. The judgment was not a general lien on it, but was a specific appropriation of the property itself. And they say a division of the county could not divert this vested interest, or deprive the officer of power to finish a process which was rightly begun. There may be cases where counties have been divided after jurisdiction was taken in a local action, and the suit has been carried into judgment; but such cases afford no authority in the present case.

In the case relied upon as in point, Rhoades v. Selin [Case No. 11,740], the court said: "At the first or second session of this court, which succeeded the passage of the act of 1824, which added this and other counties to the Western judicial district, we were called upon to decide whether the present action, together with some others then on our docket for trial, together with the papers belonging to them, should be sent to the Western district or retained here. After hearing counsel on the question the opinion of the court was that those cases were not embraced either by word or the obvious intention and policy of the act." This does not appear to be a well considered case. The counties were annexed to another jurisdiction, and yet the court speak of "the obvious intention and policy of the act;" and on that ground entertain jurisdiction over cases pending in the former district. This was right in regard to transitory actions; but not where the actions were of a local character.

Ordered to be certified that the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Arkansas had jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine the indictment. [15 How. (56 U. S.) 467.]

At the April term, 1855, the case was tried before the Hon. DANIEL RINGO, district judge, holding the circuit court; absent the Hon. PETER V. DANIEL, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States.

J. W. McConaughey, Dist. Atty., and M. Quail, for the United States.

Albert Pike and S. W. Williams, for the prisoner.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty of manslaughter, and recommended Dawson to the mercy of the court. And the court subsequently pronounced sentence, which was, that the said Dawson should be imprisoned for the space of two years in the common jail of Pulaski county in the state of Arkansas. The case as to John R. Baylor was continued. Upon a petition very numerously signed, Dawson was pardoned by President Pierce, in the summer of 1855.

Case No. 14,934.

UNITED STATES v. DAY.

[6 Am. Law Reg. 632.]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. 1858.

CONTEMPT — VIOLATION OF INJUNCTION — SUBSEQUENT DECREE.

1. A contempt of court in the United States courts must arise from disobedience of or resistance to some decree or order in existence. Hence where A., on the 17th day of September, 1852, sold a certain patent while a suit was pending in relation to it, and on the 28th of September, 1852, an injunction was issued, held, that the sale was no contempt.

2. The history of the law of contempt in the United States courts traced and discussed.

Report, per GREEN, Master:

This honorable court, by its order dated 23d day of March, 1853, directed the subscriber, one of the masters of the court, to continue the examination of the defendant in this proceeding on interrogatories to be propounded and answered in such form as he should direct, and he hereby reports, that the said defendant attended before him, from time to time, and answered in writing, under oath, the several interrogatories to him propounded, which said interrogatories and answers are returned to this court with this report.

The subscriber would also report, that in pursuance of the order of the court, he examined William H. Rogers, Amos D. Wyckoff and John Helm, witnesses produced before him at the instance of the relator, in reference to the contempt charged in this proceeding, and he hereby returns to this court, with his report, the examination of the said witnesses.

And it is further ordered, that the said master report to the court in writing, whether or not the said defendant is in contempt for having violated an injunction tested on the 28th of September, 1852, and which, directed to Horace H. Day, and his agents, etc., commands them from thenceforth to desist and refrain from making, using, or vending to others to be used, any manufactures, goods, articles or materials, composed of India-rubber, prepared in the manner specified in the patent granted to Nathaniel Hayward, as assigned to Charles Goodyear, or in the manner specified in the patent reissued to the said Charles Goodyear, and from infringing upon and violating the said patent in any way whatsoever. [Case No. 5,569.] The injunction is not to prevent the defendant from manufacturing shirred or corrugated goods, and such other articles as the said defendant is authorized to make under certain articles of agreement made and entered into between him and the complainant.

It appears from the evidence that the writ of injunction was served on Day and Rogers and Wyckoff on the same day it was issued or the day after, and that orders were sent to the factory at New Brunswick, on that day, directed to Mr. Rollo, who was in charge of the establishment, to desist from further manufacturing any articles which would or could be considered a violation of the injunction, and Day, Rogers, Wyckoff and Helm, the witnesses examined before the master, all unite in saying that they believe that the instructions were observed and carried out. But it is insisted on the part of the relator, that Day's conduct before and after the 28th of September, amounts to a violation of the injunction, and that he ought to be adjudged to be in contempt, and most of the evidence taken has had reference to this point.

It appears from the examinations taken before me, that on the 17th of September, 1852, Horace H. Day executed to Rogers & Wyckoff an absolute bill of sale, in consideration of $225,000, for all the stock of goods, fixtures and materials, at 23 Courtland street, New York, and the machinery, and every thing else, except water wheels, in the factories at New Brunswick, at Piscataway, and at Great Barrington; all India-rubber goods on consignment, and a full license to use in their own business, all the patents or patent rights belonging to Day, and took in payment the promissory notes of Rogers and Wyckoff jointly, twenty-eight in number, from sixty days to thirty-four months, secured by mortgages on the property included in the bill of sale, except the property at Courtland street store; that the sum of fifty dollars was paid by Rogers & Wyckoff to bind the bargain; that Day also executed leases for the factories, &c., at New Brunswick, Piscataway, and Great Barrington, and 23 Courtland street, with conditions that he, Day, should have an office, in which to conduct any other than an India-rubber business, and the privilege of keeping a sign at the door, and over the entrance to his office. A rent is reserved in each of the leases, and the term fixed is seven months and thirteen days.

Rogers & Wyckoff were the clerks of Day, and had property to no very large amount; no inventory was made or appraisement had. Rogers & Wyckoff took possession and opened a new set of books, and bought and sold, and made the usual entries in the books of the firm of Rogers & Wyckoff, and matters continued in this way till the 19th of October, little more than a month, when the parties under their hands and seals, rescinded the bill of sale, leases, mortgages and licenses, and agreed to cancel the notes and mortgages, and Rogers & Wyckoff were to account to Day for the amount sold by them of the purchased goods, and Day agreed to allow Rogers & Wyckoff for all cash paid by them on the purchase of goods then mixed up with the others in the store, and to assume and pay their credit obligations for the same.

It is insisted by the counsel for the relator, that this sale, including some vulcanized rubber, made while the suit was pending, and with a full knowledge of the matter in dispute, is a violation of the injunction. Several cases are cited from the English chancery books in support of their position, and it may be well briefly to examine these cases to ascertain how the law of contempt has been settled in England. The first case cited is from 14 Ves. 136, Osborne v. Tenant. In this case, Lord Eldon, the chancellor, ruled, that as the party, by his attendance in court, was apprised of what the decision of the court would be, and that an injunction would be ordered, and left the court at the moment the decision was pronounced, and did an act to defeat such decision, the court would hold the party to the same consequences, as if the order had been actually made. So, also, in the case of Skip v. Harwood, from 3 Atk. 564, Lord Hardwicke committed the defendant to the Fleet, for contempt, on the ground that he attended in court the whole time that the argument was going on; was present when the opinion was delivered, and left the court just as the decree for an injunction was given, and removed in a fraudulent and collusive manner a part of the partnership effects, which, by the decree, he was restrained from doing. But these cases are distinguishable from this case in several particulars. This case was argued in March, 1852, and no decision was made till the 28th of September, some six months afterwards. The merits had been discussed by able counsel on both sides, upon a very large amount of evidence, not without some doubt as to its weight. No intimation had fallen from the court as to their opinion, and the case was held under advisement till the 28th of September, 1852. Lord Eldon, in a subsequent case of James v. Downes, 18 Ves. 521, revives this subject, and holds this language: "a party cannot be committed for the breach of an injunction, that express species of contempt, unless there is an injunction. There is no instance, previous to the case of Osborne v. Tenant, that the court ventured to consider the act of contempt, unless the party being present in court, heard the order for an injunction made." That if the party was in court while the motion for an injunction was proceeding, he should not escape the process by turning his back before the court pronounced the order "Let the injunction go," for this would be considered a mere contrivance. The judges appear to have laid down no general principle in these cases; each case seems to regulate itself, and depends much upon the temper and peculiar mind of the judge.

To place the suitor within the entire control of the court, is not in harmony with the free institutions of our country, and when the matter was first debated before the master, he felt confident that some legislative enactment would be found, which would define the power of the court, defend its dignity, preserve its order, enforce its decrees, and at the same time protect the liberty of the citizen. What is the legislation on this subject?

In the act of congress to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789 [1 Stat. 73], it is provided in the seventeenth section, that all the courts in the United States should have the power to punish by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before them, and then by the ninetieth rule regulating the practice of the courts of equity of the United States, the practice of the circuit court, unless provided for by rule, should be regulated by the practice of the high court of chancery in England, so far as the same could be reasonably applied. The courts have therefore taken the English cases as their guide, and continued to do so until the year 1831, when congress passed an act entitled an act declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court. See 4 Stat. 487. By this law it is enacted, that the power of the courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempt of court, shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in the presence of the court, or so near as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any officer in his official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by officer, party, juror, witness, or any other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the court.

As this is an important act, and seems to settle the case before the court, some pains have been taken to ascertain its origin. We find that Hon. James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, was impeached by the house of representatives, under the following circumstances: He had delivered an opinion, and given judgment in accordance therewith, in an action pending in his court, in favor of the United States affecting the title to a large tract of land. The losing party appealed from the decision, and before the determination of the case, Judge Peck published in one of the public newspapers, his opinion. The counsel for the applicant published an article, in another newspaper, purporting to expose the errors of doctrine and fact alleged to exist in the opinion of the judge. There is nothing offensive in the language or manner of the article. A few days after the appearance of the article, the judge directed proceedings to be instituted, as for a contempt; in a summary manner, an attachment was issued against the attorney, and he was brought before the judge, but declined submitting to interrogatories, as he wished to recall nothing that he had written. He was, by the order of the judge, committed to prison for twenty-four hours, and suspended from practicing as an attorney in that court for eighteen months. This order was in the spirit and letter of the English cases, and considered as a legitimate exercise of the power vested in the court. But the attorney protested, and the case ultimately reached Washington, and Judge Peck was impeached by the house, and tried before the senate, and escaped conviction by a single vote. The subject of contempt was discussed before the court of impeachment, by the first legal minds of the country—by Wirt and Meredith, by Buchanan and Story, and Spencer and Wickliffe. A few days after this decision, a member of the house of representatives offered a resolution that the committee on the judiciary should be directed to inquire into the expediency of defining by statute all offences which may be punishable as contempt of the courts of the United States, and also to limit the punishment of the same; and Mr. Buchanan, the chairman of that committee, reported the act of the 2d of March, 1831. The action of Judge Peck was considered, by those who voted for his conviction, as a great disparagement of public justice, as an abuse of judicial authority, and as a subversion of the liberties of the people of the United States.

The law passed was beyond doubt intended as a guide for the courts, and to forbid in future all constructive contempts; and that the courts should make use of the writ of attachment for the protection of themselves, and not for the benefit of the party complaining. By this act, to constitute a contempt, there must be a decree or order in existence, and a disobedience or resistance to such decree or order. Applying this reasoning to the sale of the 17th of September, 1852. How can this sale be said to be a disobedience of a decree not entered up till the 28th of September, some ten days afterwards. Besides, Day, and Rogers, and Wyckoff all unite in swearing that they had no intention to defeat the decree of the court, for they one and all say they thought Day would be the successful party. We find in the case of U. S. v. Dodge [Case No. 14,975], the law on this point thus expressed: "If the party against whom an attachment has issued for a contempt, by his affidavit and answers to interrogatories discharge himself of the contempt, no further proceedings can be had against him in the attachment; but if perjury appear, he will be recognized to answer," &c.

But is there anything in this extraordinary sale, and in what took place between its execution and rescission, which can be considered a disobedience to the injunction? There can be no doubt, that a part of the goods sold by Day to Rogers and Wyckoff, consisted of vulcanized rubber, manufactured prior to the 17th of September, and an infringement of Goodyear's patent; and, also, that a part of these goods were sold by Rogers and Wyckoff, before the decision. Did the testimony fix with certainty, that the vending of the vulcanized rubber goods after the service of the injunction was made, under the direction of Mr. Day, I should be inclined to report him in contempt, for I hold the law to be, that as soon as the decree was entered, confirming the right of Mr. Goodyear, all goods manufactured in infringement of that right, were contraband, and any sale or intermeddling with them, would be a using in disobedience of the injunction. But the testimony does not show that after the 28th of September, 1852, Mr. Day manufactured or sold any prohibited article, and his liability, if any, must rest upon his consent and knowledge of what Rogers & Wyckoff did. The law upon this point appears to be, that one may be guilty of a breach of an injunction, by aiding and abetting those who are committing an act inconsistent with it, although he should not actually take part in such act.

Did Rogers & Wyckoff, after the 28th of September, 1852, do any act inconsistent with the injunction? If they did, it must have been by vending the prohibited articles. Now, in the language of one of the cases cited, Magennis v. Parkhurst, 3 Green, Ch. [4 N. J. Eq.] 434, "the party alleging a contempt of court by breach of an injunction, must make it out clearly to the satisfaction of the court." The defendant has denied the contempt under oath. Does the testimony of Rogers & Wyckoff, and Helm prove it? Helm in his answer, says, that after the 28th of September he mixed rubber compound for heating, for the purpose of making shirred cloth, and nothing else, and there were shoes made up out of the compound, which was prepared, or partially prepared before the decision; nothing but shoes. William H. Rogers estimated the sales at 23 Courtland street, between the 17th of September and the 19th of October, at from $15,000 to $20,000, and to the question, of that sum, about how much was vulcanized India-rubber goods? he answers that if the webbing or shirred cloth be considered vulcanized, then two-thirds of the sales were vulcanized, and he does not recollect that during that period, Day made himself responsible for any debt contracted by Rogers & Wyckoff. He further says that Rogers & Wyckoff continued after the decision, to sell vulcanized rubber goods, including over-shoes, but that Day did not induce him or Wyckoff to sell vulcanized rubber goods to any person; the persons having goods on consignment made returns of their sales to Rogers & Wyckoff, but Mr. Day did not receive any moneys from them; that there was not ever at any time any understanding that Day should have any interest in the business or property after the sale of the 17th of September, or that Rogers & Wyckoff should act as agents for Day, or that the business should be conducted for Day's benefit. Amos D. Wyckoff, who was the principal bookeeper, and was constantly at the store, 23 Courtland street, says that Rogers & Wyckoff did sell vulcanized rubber goods, which had been manufactured by Day before the 17th of September, and included in the sale, but the quantity he cannot tell, and that what remained were retransferred to Day, and remain in the store, No. 23 Courtland street. The testimony of this witness does not show any participation of Day in the sales, or that he aided therein.

It was insisted by the counsel of relator, that the sale of the 17th of September was fraudulent and void, but however unusual the terms of payment may be, and however insufficient the security, still it is not perceived that these are unmistakable marks of fraud. The sale was good between the parties, and passed the title from Day to Rogers and Wyckoff, and however void as against Goodyear, if it had not been rescinded, it is valid between the parties. It cannot be concealed that the sale of the 17th of September, and its rescission, are marked with some extraordinary features, but they do not, in my opinion, make the acts of Rogers & Wyckoff those of Day, and bring him within the severe consequences of having disobeyed the injunction, and thus subject him to fine and imprisonment. Besides any damage which Goodyear may have sustained, can be ascertained and liquidated by the master, who is yet to take an account of all the rubber goods manufactured and sold by the defendant, in violation of the patent of the complainant. Much time has been spent in the investigation of this subject, but the master does not think that it has been misspent, for it was right that this whole transaction should be disclosed. Though the examination in the case was continued for several days, it was not a case of oppression on the part of the complainant.

All these suggestions are respectfully submitted to the court, and the master reports on this branch of the case that, in his opinion, under the true construction of the act of congress, of March, 1831, and the testimony taken, the defendant, Horace H. Day, is not in contempt.

THE COURT subsequently confirmed the master's report. [Unreported.]

INDICTMENT—VARIANCE—RECEIVING STOLEN PROPERTY—CHARACTER OF PROPERTY.

1. Where an indictment for receiving stolen goods charges that the accused received the goods from the principal felon, and the proofs show that they were received from a person to whom the thief had delivered them, the variance is fatal.

2. In a prosecution for receiving stolen postage stamps, the proof was that the thief deposited them in an express office directed to the defendant, and after arrest gave a written order for the property to a postmaster, who took them, and subsequently, by order of the postoffice department, re-deposited them in the express office and they were forwarded to the defendant, who received them. Held, that the character of the stamps as stolen property ceased in the hands of the postmaster, and that there could be no conviction.

The indictment charged that on the 19th of November, 1874, the defendant [Reuben E. De Bare] with intent to defraud the United States, wilfully and feloniously received from one Crawford a quantity of postage stamps, the said stamps having been stolen from a post-office of the United States, and the defendant, at the time he received the same, knowing them to have been stolen.

At the trial the testimony disclosed the following facts: In the night of November 12th, 1874, the post-office at Unionville, Missouri, was robbed by Crawford, and postage stamps to the amount of about $156 were stolen. The robber was detected and arrested at

Quincy, Ill. Previous to his arrest, he had deposited the stamps in the form of an enclosed package in the express office at Quincy, directed to the defendant at Milwaukee, Wis. After his arrest, he surrendered other property stolen from the Unionville post-office, and on request of the Quincy postmaster, gave the latter a written order on the agent of the express company, for the package of stamps. Upon presentation of this order at the express office the stamps were delivered to the Quincy postmaster, who testified that he took the package to his office, opened it, counted the stamps and placed them in the postoffice vault. He thus retained possession of the stamps until subsequently ordered by the post-office department to let them go forward to the consignee. Using the external wrapper and fastenings, he found upon the package when it came to his possession he re-inclosed the stamps and re-deposited them in the express office to be forwarded, the package bearing the identical directions placed upon it by the original consignor.

Testimony was given on the trial to show that the stamps after being thus forwarded, came to the hands of the defendant. The jury were instructed, that in order to convict, it must be proven as charged in the indictment, that the defendant received the stamps from Crawford, and that if the jury should find from the evidence that the Quincy postmaster, as his individual act, or for and in behalf of the post-office department, forwarded the stamps to the defendant, and that the defendant received them from the postmaster and not from Crawford, there must be a verdict of acquittal, even though the stamps were originally stolen by Crawford. The verdict was against the accused. His counsel moved for a new trial on two grounds: (1) That the verdict was against the evidence and the instructions of the court, and moreover, upon the facts proved, that the jury should have been directed to render a verdict of acquittal. (2) That when the stamps came into the hands of the Quincy postmaster, their character was that of stolen property recovered by the owner; that they thereafter ceased to have that character, and that when received by the defendant, they were not, as to the person from whom they came, stolen stamps, and therefore there could be no conviction in this case.

Levi Hubbell, U. S. Dist. Atty.
N. S. Murphey, for defendant.

DYER, District Judge. Careful consideration of the question has confirmed me in the opinion that the instruction given to the jury was right. Undoubtedly it is not, in all cases, essential that an indictment against a receiver should allege by whom the property was stolen. A party may be indicted for receiving goods stolen by persons unknown. In a case where an indictment was objected to because it did not ascertain the principal thief, and did not, therefore, state to whom in particular the prisoner was accessory, it was neld good [Thomas' Case, O. B. 1766];[2] but "where the principal, however, is known, it seems proper to state it according to the truth." 2 East, P. C. 781. It is laid down in the books as a settled principle, that if an indictment allege that the goods were received from the thief, it must be proved that they were received from the thief, and if it appear that the thief gave them to a person from whom the accused received them, it is a fatal variance. In support of this principle, Arundel's Case, 1 Lewis, 115, cited by defendant's counsel, on this motion, is the leading authority. The prisoner was indicted for receiving stolen goods, and the indictment alleged that he received them from the person who stole them, and that this person was a certain ill-disposed person to the jurors unknown. It was proved that the person who stole the property handed it to J S., and that J. S. delivered it to the prisoner; and Parke, J., held, that on this indictment it was necessary to prove that the prisoner received the property from the person who actually stole it, and he would not allow it to go to the jury to say whether or not the person from whom he was proved to have received it was an innocent agent of the thier.

Now, in the case at bar, the indictment charges that the defendant received the postage stamps from Crawford. To convict, the proof should conform to the charge. If the proof is that the defendant received the stamps from the Quincy postmaster and not from Crawford, the variance is fatal. Crawford was the principal felon. After arrest, as we have seen, the stamps passed into the possession of the Quincy postmaster, who took them from the express office, and subsequently, by direction of the department, forwarded them to the consignee. There was no relation of principal and agent between Crawford and the postmaster. The former had originally authorized the express company to carry and deliver the stamps to the defendant. By his order in writing, given to the postmaster, he withdrew that authority, ceased to be a party to the contract of transportation, and surrendered the stamps to the postmaster. The subsequent re-deposit of the stamps in the express office, was the act of the postmaster under direction of the department, and I think the case is directly within the principle of Arundel's Case before cited.

I am convinced, therefore, that it would not have been error to have instructed the jury that the variance between the allegation in the indictment and the proof, is fatal to a conviction.

If there be any doubt upon the point thus far discussed, there can be none, I think, concerning the second ground urged in support of this motion. The ownership of these stamps was in the United States. The Quincy postmaster was the agent of the owner. When Crawford surrendered them to this agent they were reclaimed property that had been stolen, but their character as stolen property ceased in the hands of the postmaster, so far as the subsequent receiver was concerned. The moral turpitude of a receiver under such circumstances may be as great as in case the property comes directly from the hands of the thief, because the criminal intent on his part exists equally in both cases. But to create the offense which the law punishes, the property, when received, must, in fact, and in a legal sense, be stolen property. If these stamps were received by the defendant, they did not, when received, upon the proof made, bear this character. They had been captured from the thief by the owner, and the act of forwarding them to the alleged receiver was the act of the owner.

[2] [From 7 Chi. Leg. News, 321.]

I regard this point conclusively settled upon authority In State v. Ives, 13 Ired. 338, it was held that an indictment for receiving stolen goods must aver from whom the goods were received, so as to show that the person charged received them from the principal felon. If received from any other person the statute does not apply. In Reg. v. Schmidt, L. R. 1 Crown Cas. 15, the case was this: Four thieves stole goods from the custody of a railway company, and afterwards sent them in a parcel by the same company's line addressed to the prisoner. During the transit the theft was discovered, and, on the arrival of the parcel at the station for its delivery, a policeman, in the employ of the company, opened it and then returned it to the porter, whose duty it was to deliver it with instructions to keep it until further orders. On the following day the policeman directed the porter to take the parcel to its address, where it was received by the prisoner, who was afterwards convicted of receiving the goods knowing them to be stolen, upon an indictment which laid the property in the goods in the railway company. Held, that the goods had got back into the possession of the owner so as to be no longer stolen goods, and that the conviction was wrong. The case of Reg. v. Lyons, 41 E. C. L. 122, was cited by counsel for the prosecution in support of a conviction in this case. The report of the case is meager, but it appears that a brass weight had been stolen by a lad in the employ of the prosecutors; and it having been taken from him by another servant in the presence of one of the prosecutors, it was restored to the lad again, in order that he might take it for sale to the house of the prisoner, where he had been in the habit of selling similar articles before. The lad took it and sold it for 6½d. The point was made that as the property had been restored to the possession of the owner it could not afterwards be considered as stolen property. Coleridge, J., said that for the purposes of the day, he should consider the evidence sufficient to sustain the indictment, but would take a note of the objection. The prisoner was convicted and sentenced to transportation, and no change was subsequently made in the judgment of the court. But this case of Reg. v. Lyons is expressly overruled in the case of Reg. v. Dolan, 29 Eng. Law & Eq. 533, Lord Campbell, C. J., delivering a judgment in which Justices Coleridge, Cresswell, Platt and Williams concur. Lord Campbell says: "With regard to the Reg. v. Lyons, I think that the facts cannot be accurately stated. But if they be, I must say that I cannot concur with that decision, and I think that it ought not to be acted upon." Of his previous decision in that case, Coleridge, J., says: "Having no recollection of the case of Reg. v. Lyons, I cannot take upon myself to say it is wrongly reported. But if it is not, I am bound to say that I think I made a great mistake."

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE—RECOGNIZANCE—RECITING OFFENCE.

Where defendants are arrested and held to bail before a commissioner to appear in a federal court, it is not necessary that the recognizance shall show upon its face that the offence is one embraced within a statute of the United States.

Defendants [Anthony De Grieff and others] were indicted for unlawfully conspiring together to commit an offence against the United States, which is specified in section 5443 of the Revised Statutes. [A motion made to quash the indictment was denied. Case No. 14,936.] They did not appear, and their bail was forfeited.

C. P. L. Butler, Jr., Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Robert S. Green and Benjamin B. Foster, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is an action at law upon a recognizance. The defendants having been arrested, the recognizance was taken before a United States commissioner for their appearance in court. The defendants insist that the recognizance is invalid; their position is that the commissioner has no power to commit or hold to bail except for offences against the United States; that the recognizance must show upon its face that the officer had jurisdiction; that the act which is stated in the recognizance is not an offence by any act of congress, and therefore the recognizance is void. The defendants contend that the recognizance must necessarily describe the particular offence which is charged in the indictment. I do not decide this part of the proposition, but I do not by any means concede its truth. U. S. v. George, [Case No. 15,199]; People v. Kane, 4 Denio, 530. The proposition also asserts that the particular offence must be so described that it shall appear upon the face of the recognizance to be an offence which is embraced within a statute of the United States, and that a partial or imperfect description cannot be supplemented by reference in the recognizance to the indictment where the offence is correctly described. In this part of the proposition I do not concur. The general principle in respect to the manner in which offences should be described in recognizances is laid down by Chief Justice Nelson, in People v. Blankman, 17 Wend. 252, as follows: "It is not necessary to set forth the offence in the warrant, mittimus, or recognizance with all the particularity or detail required in an indictment." 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 33. The decision in U. S. v. Hand [Case No. 15,296], which is relied upon by the defendants, is not in point. Judgment for the plaintiff.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — INDICTMENT FOR CONCEALING AND DESTROYING PAPERS—COMMISSION OF FRAUD.

1. An indictment for a violation of section 5440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, charged that the defendants conspired to commit an offence against the United States, that is, to wilfully conceal and destroy certain papers relating to certain merchandise called dress trimmings, liable to duty, which had been theretofore imported and brought into the United States, and the port of New York, from a foreign port, by A., for the purpose of suppressing certain evidence of fraud therein contained, describing the papers and averring that they contained statements from the consignors of A., addressed to and received by him in the due course of his business, showing that said merchandise had been knowingly and fraudulently entered and passed through the custom house at New York, on a false classification thereof as to value, and by the payment of less than the duty legally due to the United States, and which papers were material and important evidence for the United States in any proceedings because of said fraudulent entry, and alleging various acts charged to have been done to effect the object of the conspiracy. On a motion to quash the indictment, it was objected, that it was bad for uncertainty, because it omitted to state facts showing the commission of a fraud upon the United States in connection with the importation of the merchandise, and because the contents of the papers were not so stated as to enable the court to see that they contained evidence of that fraud: Held, that the indictment was sufficient.

2. By section 5443 of the Revised Statutes, it is made an offence to conceal or destroy papers of the description given in said indictment. What it would be necessary to aver and prove on an indictment under section 5443, quere.

3. The case of U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, commented on and distinguished.

4. The defendants, though indictable under section 5443, not having been indicted thereunder, may be indicted under section 5440.

[This was an indictment against Anthony De Grieff and others for concealing and destroying papers relating to certain merchandise, liable to duty, for the purpose of concealing evidences of fraud against the United States.]

William P. Fiero, U. S. Asst. Dist. Atty.

Robert S. Green and Aaron J. Vanderpoel, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court on a motion to quash the indictment. The provision of law under which the indictment is framed is to be found in section 5440 of the Revised Statutes, where it is provided, that, "if two or more persons conspire either to commit any offence against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars and not more than ten thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not more than two years." Under this section, it is sought, by the present indictment, to charge the defendants with having conspired to commit one of the offences against the United States which are created by section 5443 of the Revised Statutes. The language of that section is as follows: "Every person who wilfully conceals or destroys any invoice, book or paper relating to any merchandise liable to duty, which has been or may be imported into the United States from any foreign port or country, after an inspection thereof has been demanded by the collector of any collection district, or at any time conceals or destroys any such invoice, book or paper, for the purpose of suppressing any evidence of fraud therein contained, shall be punished by a fine of not more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not more than two years, or both."

The first count charges, that, at a certain time and place, the defendants conspired to commit an offence against the United States, that is to say, to wilfully conceal and destroy certain papers relating to certain merchandise called dress trimmings, liable to duty, which had been theretofore imported and brought into the United States and the port and collection district of New York, from a foreign port, by the firm of A. De Grieff & Co., for the purpose of suppressing certain evidence of fraud against the United States, therein contained. Then follows a description of the papers referred to, coupled with the averment, that said papers contained statements from the correspondents, consignors, and purchasing agents of the said firm of A. De Grieff & Co., addressed to and received by said firm in the due course of their business, showing and tending to show that said merchandise had been knowingly and fraudulently entered and passed through the custom-house, the office of the collector of the port and collection district of New York, upon a false classification thereof as to value, and by the payment of less than the amount of duty legally due to the United States, and which said papers were material and important evidence for the United States in any proceedings because of said fraudulent entry. Then follows a statement of various acts charged to have been done to effect the object of the conspiracy.

The second count begins with reciting the pendency of a suit in rem for the forfeiture and condemnation, to the use of the United States, of certain trimmings which had been imported as stated in the first count, for a violation of the laws of the United States, in the importation of said merchandise, and, also, of a suit against the defendants De Grieff and Triacca, for the recovery of damages for a violation of the laws of the United States, in the said importation. It then charges a conspiracy, as in the first count, describing the papers as in the first count, and avers that said papers contained statements from the correspondents, consignors, and purchasing agents of De Grieff & Co., addressed to and received by said firm in the due course of their business, showing and tending to show fraud and violation of the laws of the United States, in the said importation, which papers were evidence for the United States in the prosecution of the suits aforesaid, and in any proceeding by the United States because of the violation of the laws of the United States, in the importation of said merchandise. Then follows a statement of acts done to effect the object of the said conspiracy, as in the first count.

The third count charges a conspiracy to commit an offence against the United States, that is to say, to wilfully conceal and destroy certain papers relating to certain merchandise, a full description of which is unknown, liable to duty, which had been theretofore imported, for the purpose of suppressing certain evidence of fraud against the United States, therein contained, following with a description of the papers, and a statement of acts done, as in the first count.

The fourth count, after reciting, in the language of the second count, the pendency of suits, charges a conspiracy to commit an offence against the United States, that is to say, to wilfully conceal and destroy certain invoices and papers relating to said dress trimmings, liable to duty, which had been theretofore imported, as stated in the first count, for the purpose of suppressing certain evidence of fraud upon the United States in said importation, following with a list of the said papers described, and averring that said invoices and papers contained statements from the correspondents, consignors, and purchasing agents of De Grieff & Co., addressed to and received by them in the due course of their business, showing and tending to show fraud against the United States, in the importation of said merchandise, and which said papers were important and material evidence for the United States in the prosecution of the said suits, and in any proceedings by the United States because of the violation of the laws of the United States, in the importation of said merchandise. A statement of acts done to effect the object of the conspiracy is then given, as in the first count.

The indictment concludes with the averment, that, by the means aforesaid and in the manner aforesaid, according to the conspiracy, combination and agreement aforesaid, the defendants committed an offence against the United States.

To this indictment it is objected, that it is bad for uncertainty, because it omits to state facts showing the commission of a fraud upon the United States in connection with the importation of the merchandise described, and because the contents of the papers are not so stated as to enable the court to see that they contained evidence of that fraud.

In support of the objection that the indictment contains no facts showing the commission of a fraud, the argument made is this: Unless there was a fraud upon the United States in connection with the importation of the merchandise described, the papers described could not have contained evidence of such a fraud, and there could be no conspiracy to destroy what did not exist. The foundation of the charge, therefore, is a fraud upon the United States in connection with the importation in question, and facts must be stated to show the commission of such a fraud. The difficulty with this argument, when applied to a case like the present—for a similar argument has been made without avail in regard to indictments for receiving stolen goods and the like (Rosc. Cr. Ev. 867; Archb. Cr. Prac. 939; Rex v. Jervis, 6 Car. & P. 156. See, also, forms, Archb. Cr. Prac. 441, 869)—is, that it proceeds upon the assumption, that the substance of the offence charged is the fraud upon the United States in the importation of the merchandise described. But, the indictment is for a conspiracy to commit an offence against the United States, not for a fraud upon the United States. The rule applicable to indictments of this character has been thus stated: "When looking at a charge of conspiracy to commit an offence, we do not require it (the offence) to be set forth with all the precision requisite in describing the offence itself." Latham v. Reg., 5 Best & S. 635. The result of the cases upon the subject in this country is thus stated in State v. Keach, 40 Vt. 113, 117: "The adjudged cases uniformly recognize the rule, that a general allegation that two or more persons conspired to effect an object criminal in itself, as to commit a misdemeanor or felony, is sufficient, even though the indictment omits all charges of the particular means to be used." In State v. Parker, 43 N. H. 83, 84, it is said: "If it (the object of the conspiracy) is not an offence at common law, but only by statute, the purpose of the conspiracy must be set forth in such manner as to show that it is within the terms of the statute." Judged by these rules, the present indictment is sufficient. It shows that the defendants conspired to commit an offence against the United States, by averring that the object of the conspiracy was to conceal and destroy certain described papers relating to certain described merchandise liable to duty, and theretofore imported into the United States at the port of New York, from Paris, by the firm of De Grieff & Co., for the purpose of suppressing evidence of fraud against the United States, therein contained. The facts which are here stated consist of an act and an intent, i. e., that the defendants agreed together to do a certain act, namely, to conceal and destroy certain papers, for a purpose designated; and, by section 5443, the concealment or destruction of papers of the description given, for the purpose stated, is made an offence against the United States. The indictment, therefore, sets forth the purpose of the conspiracy in such manner as to show that it is within the terms of the statute, and, accordingly, is within the requirement of the law, as stated in the cases above cited.

What it would be necessary to aver and prove if this were an indictment for the offence created by section 5443, it is unnecessary to determine on this occasion, but, it may be remarked, that a construction of the section that would require proof of a fraud as to which the papers destroyed contained evidence, would nullify the statute in many cases, such, for instance, as where the papers destroyed contain the only evidence of a necessary link in the proof of the fraud. It could hardly have been intended that the successful result of the prohibited act should render its punishment impossible. But, however this may be in the case of a prosecution for the offence created by section 5443, in a case like this, where the substance of the charge is an unlawful agreement made for the purpose of effecting a certain result, to require the circumstances attending the fraud to be set forth, would be to require a statement of the evidence intended to be adduced to prove the facts averred. An objection which, in some cases of conspiracy, may be made, that, owing to the circumstances of the case, the indictment, although sufficient in law, fails to inform the particular defendant of the act intended to be proved against him, is, in such cases, met by the tender of particulars. That objection cannot be here made, for the reason, that this indictment, in addition to stating the conspiracy with due particularity of time and place, gives a description of the papers sufficient to identify them, and as full as the circumstances will permit, and, with as much particularity as can be asked where, from the nature of the case, the papers are not under the control of the prosecution, points out the matter in the papers which it was the object of the conspirators to suppress, and thus fully informs the defendant of the charge upon which he is to be tried.

It is further objected, that the indictment fails to show to the court that the matter in the papers would be evidence of a fraud upon the United States. There is no occasion to question the necessity, which this indictment assumes, of proving, in a case like this, that the result sought to be attained by the agreement to destroy these papers was the suppression of evidence of fraud contained in the papers. But, that is a fact to be shown by evidence as to the terms of the agreement and the surrounding circumstances. Whether those facts and circumstances will warrant the jury in saying that the result which the defendants sought to attain by this conspiracy was that charged in the indictment, is to be determined when the evidence has been given at the trial. It cannot now be determined by the court. Plainly, it would be impossible for the indictment to show to the court that the matter contained in the letters destroyed tended to show that a fraud had been committed, unless it contained the evidence going to explain the statements in the letters, and their significance as bearing upon the question of fraud; and there is no ground to contend that such should be the contents of an indictment of this character. What has, in cases similar, been deemed sufficient for an indictment, may be seen by referring to the form of an indictment for conspiring to suppress evidence, given in 5 Cox, Cr. Cas. Append. No. 3, p. 9.

The decision of the supreme court of the United States in U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, has been pressed upon my attention, as a controlling authority adverse to the conclusion above indicated. But, the indictment in Cruikshank Case was not for a conspiracy to commit an offence, and the determination in respect thereto cannot, therefore, be authority in a case like this. That indictment was under the 6th section of the enforcement act of May 30, 1870 (16 Stat. 141), now found, in a modified form, in section 5508 of the Revised Statutes, which makes it an offence against the United States to conspire to do certain described acts with a certain described intent. The ingredients of the offence are found in the provision creating it, and the court held that all those ingredients must be stated in the indictment, with such specification of detail as to enable the court to see that the offence created by the enforcement act had been committed. The present indictment is for a conspiracy of a different character, made an offence by a different statute, and having different ingredients. By the section under which this indictment is drawn, a crime is committed when the agreement is to commit any offence against the United States, without regard to the result sought to be attained by making the agreement. It is true, that the opinion of the supreme court in the Case of Cruikshank deals, to a certain extent, with the general requisites of an indictment; but I fail to find there any indication of an intention to lay down a rule in regard to the requirements of an indictment like the present, or to state any rule at variance with the law declared in the cases from which I have above quoted. On the contrary, two of those cases are cited with apparent approval, in the opinion of the court. The opinion, indeed, supports the present indictment, for, by way of illustration, it refers to a statute of Maine similar in character to the statute upon which this indictment is drawn, where it is made an offence to conspire to commit any crime punishable by imprisonment in the state prison; but it points out, that an indictment under the statute of Maine, to be good, must specify the crime charged as the object of the conspiracy, so as to enable the court to see whether it be one punishable by imprisonment in the state prison. The present indictment, so judged, is sufficient, for, the charge made is not general, that the defendants conspired to commit an offence against the United States, but it descends to particulars and particularizes the act as being an agreement between the defendants to conceal and destroy certain described papers relating to the importation of certain merchandise, entered into by the defendants for the purpose of suppressing evidence of fraud in connection with that importation, contained therein. The act thus particularized is made by statute an offence against the United States, and it thus appears, that, if proved, it will support a conviction under section 5440. While, therefore, the determination in Cruikshank's Case, cannot control the determination in any case like this, the opinion there delivered is in harmony with the conclusion that the present indictment is sufficient in law to put the defendants upon their trial.

The remaining objection to be considered is, that, upon the showing of the indictment, the defendants should have been charged under section 5443 and cannot be charged under section 5440. This objection is not pressed upon the ground of merger. Clearly, it could not be pressed on that ground, for, there is no merger in crimes of equal rank, such as misdemeanors. U. S. v. McKee [Case No. 15,688]. But, it is supposed that a different ground is taken, by claiming that the facts stated in the indictment show that the conspiracy complained of forms part of an accomplished crime, made punishable by section 5443, and cannot, therefore, be made the subject of a prosecution under section 5440. But, if there be no merger, there is no force in this suggestion. It may well be, that one who has been once tried upon a charge of an offence under section 5443 cannot be again tried under section 5440, for a conspiracy that formed an element of the offence already tried. No such question is here raised. Here, the question is, whether it is competent for the government to put the defendants upon trial for having done what by section 5440, is made an offence against the United States, they never having been before called in question for that act. That offence not having been merged in any other offence, there is no possible ground on which to decide that it cannot be prosecuted. The Case of McKee, above cited, is an authority adverse to such a contention.

The motion to quash is, for these reasons, denied.

UNITED STATES v. DE HARO.

[1 Cal. Law J. 195.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—LOCATION OF BOUNDARIES—DECREE FOUNDED ON PAROL EVIDENCE—INTERPRETATION.

[The location of a lot of 100 varas, the claim for which was confirmed by the court, was made solely upon the testimony of a witness who described one of its boundaries as adjoining the "Casa Principal," of an old mission. This language was carried verbatim into the decree. On objections to a survey made under the decree, it appeared that certain outhouses belonging to the mission had been situated on that side of it, and that the words "Casa Principal" might have been used to indicate either that the lot extended to the ruins of these buildings, or beyond them (and including them) to the mission church. In fact, the lot actually occupied by the grantee and built upon by him extended only to the ruins of the outbuildings. Held, that the decree would be construed so as to require the boundary to be located at the latter place.]

Survey of grant at Mission Dolores. Rejected [by the board] December 12, 1862. [Upon appeal to the district court, the decree was reversed, and the grant confirmed. Case unreported. This last decision was affirmed by the supreme court. 22 How. (63 U. S.) 293. It is now heard upon the question of the location of the grant.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case, which is for a 100-vara lot at the Mission Dolores, was rejected by the board for want of any description of the premises, either in the petition or grant, whereby they could be identified. The cause having been appealed to this court, a witness was produced who testified to the location of the lot granted to De Haro. He describes it as situate on Dolores street and adjoining the "Casa Principal" of the old mission, on the north side of said house, and on the west side of Dolores street. There is nothing intervening between said lot and the "Casa Principal." De Haro built a house on it, and fenced it in. On this testimony the claim was confirmed. In the decree the description given by the witness is verbatim adopted, and this decree has been affirmed by the supreme court. [22 How. (63 U. S.) 293.]

As to the general location of the lot there is no dispute. In his petition De Haro asks for a lot 100 varas square "in that occupied by the ruins of the houses which formerly belonged to the escolta of the mission." The site of these houses is admitted, and that built by De Haro still exists. It is objected, however, that the southern boundary line of the lot has been run some 75 feet too far to the south, while the claimants contend that this location is necessarily required by the call in the decree for the "Casa Principal." It is to be observed that this call is derived neither from the petition nor the grant, but solely from the description of the lot given by a single witness.

Much testimony has been taken to show what was, at the time of the grant, known as the "Casa Principal" of the mission. It appears that, immediately adjoining the church, a long building extended along the plaza or Dolores street, which contained the kitchen, the rooms occupied by the priests, and those reserved for guests. Beyond this was a small alley way, and immediately adjoining a building called "Trojé," used as a lumber or store room. North of this was an adobe wall, which formed the front of an inclosure containing several houses, in one of which wool was kept. Another was a mill, and a third a house where soap was made. I cannot exactly determine whether the front wall of the mill came to the street, or whether it was situated in the rear of the inclosure, bounded on the street by the adobe wall. To these buildings succeeded the houses occupied by the escolta or guard. The lot has been surveyed so that its southern boundary is the northern end of the building occupied by the priests, and used for the entertainment of guests. It is contended that it should not extend further than the wall of the mill which has been referred to.

The various buildings above described evidently formed part of the establishment. The labors performed were conducted by Indians, under the supervision of the fathers, and the houses themselves were erected by them, and intended and used for supplying the mission with flour, soap, blankets, etc., necessary to its maintenance. Several witnesses swear that all these houses were included under the general name of "Casa Principal," though that term, probably, in strictness, applied only to the building occupied by the priests. But the testimony is clear and uncontradicted that the lot claimed and occupied by De Haro did not extend further south than the wall of the mill. The officer who, as he swears, gave him judicial possession of the land, fixes its southern boundary at that line, and numerous other witnesses testify that he never claimed the land which lay between the mill and the "Casa Principal," proper. Had this testimony been before the court at the time the decree was made, there could have been no question as to the boundary of the lot.

It is claimed, however, that that boundary has been finally determined by the call in the decree for the "Casa Principal." But it has already been observed that this call was taken from, and merely repeats, the language of the only witness who testified to the location of the lot. As the evidence leaves no doubt as to the true southern line of the premises, we are bound to presume that the witness, by the term "Casa Principal," intended to refer to the whole group of buildings, including the "Trojé," the "Savoneria," and the mill, which some of the witnesses declare were included under that name. We have no reason to suppose that he used the term more accurately than they, especially when we know that, if he intended to state that the lot adjoined the "Casa Principal," proper, he stated what was untrue. The "Casa Principal" of the decree must clearly be taken to be the "Casa Principal" referred to by the witness, and what that must have been, if he intended to testify truly, the evidence of the actual occupation, inclosure, and claim of De Haro discloses.

I think, therefore, that the 100-vara lot, confirmed, should be located as it was granted and occupied by De Haro; that is, bounded on the south by the wall of the old mill, and running 100 varas north along the line of Dolores street.

[NOTE. Subsequently the decree in this case, in so far as it seemed to confirm a 100-vara lot, was annulled, and the grant held as covering only a 50-vara lot. Case No. 14,938. For other of the De Haro grants, see Cases Nos. 14,939–14,941.]

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — AMBIGUOUS DECREE OF CONFIRMATION—REJECTION OF SURVEY.

[In a clear case of mistake in a decree of confirmation, whereby the claimants might be given more land than they are entitled to, or have claimed, it is the duty of the court, on objections to a survey, to lay hold of any ambiguity or discrepancies in the language of the decree, which will enable it to restrict the claimant to the land actually granted, occupied, and claimed.]

Survey of lot at Mission Dolores. Rejected [by the board] December 17, 1862. [Confirmed by the district court. Case unreported. Affirmed upon appeal by the supreme court. 22 How. (63 U. S.) 293. The question of the survey was considered and an opinion rendered, which held the grant as covering a 100-vara lot along Dolores street. Case No. 14,937. The case is now heard to correct what is claimed to be an error as to the size of the lot.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. It appears, from De Haro's petition to the board, that, previously to the year 1843, he had been put in possession by the prefect, José Ramon Estrada, of certain houses in the mission of Dolores, known as those of the major domos. He therefore asked the governor to legitimate his right of property in them, and to add 50 varas square to the eastward of them. In conformity with this petition, the governor, on the 16th August, 1843, ratified and confirmed the concession of the prefect, "together with—'juntamente con'—fifty varas to the eastward of the said houses, as solicited." In the petition of the claimants to the board, and in the opinion delivered by the latter, the land is described as a single lot of the extent of 50 varas square. It is also stated in the petition that the concession by Estrada was for the same lot, and this concession was ratified by the governor. But this is evidently an erroneous construction of the petition and grant, for those papers show, very unequivocally, that De Haro merely obtained from the prefect the houses, and that he asked the governor to ratify that concession, and for an augmento, or addition, of 50 varas square to the east of them.

The decree of this court, which has been affirmed by the supreme court [22 How. (63 U. S.) 293], describes the land as a "fifty-vara lot, situate in the Mission Dolores, on which lot there is a house which formerly formed part of the establishment of the Mission Dolores, occupied by the major domos thereof, fronting on the plaza, etc., together with and adding thereto, fifty varas to the eastward of, and immediately adjoining, said houses." Under this decree, a survey has been made of two 50-vara lots,—one including the houses, and another, to the eastward and immediately adjoining, not the houses, but the first 50-vara lot. It would seem clear, from the terms of the petition and grant, that the land solicited was a 50-vara lot, including the houses in which De Haro then resided. It can hardly be supposed that he intended to ask for the houses and the land covered by them, and a lot lying wholly to the east of them; for, in that case, he would have no land in the rear of his house, and his lot would have been situated to the east of and wholly detached from it. That such was the understanding of the claimants appears from their own petition to the board, which only asks for a single 50-vara lot.

The decree entered in this court is obscure, and, to a certain degree, repugnant. In the first part it confirms to the claimant a lot on the northeast corner of Center and Dolores streets, fronting on the plaza, etc. The last clause is as follows: "Together with and adding 50 varas to the eastward and immediately adjoining said houses." As the houses stood upon the corner, it is evident that the 50-vara lot situated on the corner must embrace the site of the houses and a considerable piece of land to the eastward of them, for it is not pretended that the houses covered the whole of a 50-vara lot. The second clause of the decree, if it means by the words "50 varas," a lot 50 varas square adjoining the houses on the east, describes land already in a great part included in the first description. The 50 varas last spoken of could not, therefore, have been in addition to the first 50-vara lot; for it was for the same land, except that the first lot began at Dolores street,—that is, was on the corner,—while the second began at the easterly end of the houses, the only difference being a strip of land equal in breadth to the front of the houses.

But to construe the decree as intended to give two 50-vara lots, the second, in great part located on the ground included in the first, is not only to attribute to it an absurdity, but the effect would be to give to the claimants what they have not and could not have claimed under any construction of their grant. It is plain that either they are entitled to the exact site of the houses and a lot 50 varas square to the eastward of them, or else, as they themselves represented to the board, to a single 50-vara lot, including the houses. They cannot, in any event, be entitled to a lot 50 varas deep, on the corner, and another lot 50 varas deep adjoining the houses on the east; for this would be to give them, not the houses and a 50-vara lot in addition, but a lot on the corner with a front equal to the front of the houses, and a depth of 50 varas, and a 50-vara lot in addition.

The attempt, under this grant and decree, to survey two separate 50-vara lots is wholly inadmissible. It is not warranted by the terms of the decree, and is repugnant to the language and obvious meaning of the grant, as well as the claimants' own petition to the board. The claim for a single 50-vara lot, presented to the board, was rejected. It was not suggested to this court, on appeal, that any larger tract was claimed. The notice of appeal, signed by the attorneys for the claimant, is indorsed, "Claim for 50 varas square at the mission." In the petition for a review of the decision of the board, filed in this court, the land is again described as a lot 50 varas square at the Mission Dolores. And the witness produced by the claimants, on the faith of whose testimony the claim was confirmed, only speaks of a single lot, on which the house inhabited by De Haro was situated, and which was of the extent of 50 varas square. It is nowhere pretended that the claimants were entitled to the land covered by the houses and a 50-vara lot in addition; still less, to two 50-vara lots,—one on the corner, including the houses, and a second to the eastward of it.

The decree of the court was evidently intended to follow the language of the grant by confirming the claim to the houses and to a 50-vara lot to the eastward of them. Had this description been adopted, the question as to the true meaning of the grant would have been presented by the decree precisely as by the original papers; and what that meaning is, as understood by the claimant himself, is abundantly clear. But the decree, unfortunately, does not conform to the language of the grant, for it confirms to the claimants, not the houses, and a 50-vara lot to the eastward of it, but a 50-vara lot on the corner, including the houses, and "50 varas to the eastward of said houses." This discrepancy in the decree appears for the first time to have suggested the idea of obtaining two 50-vara lots, instead of the one lot granted; and the record shows that a notice was filed of a motion to reform the decree by adding to the description of the property contained in said decree the words, "together with a parcel of land, 50 varas square, to the eastward thereof." This motion does not appear to have been made, for no order granting or refusing it is found. The decree was subsequently set aside on the discovery, by the district attorney, that the grant bore date when Alvarado was not in office; but, on the production of the original papers, it appeared that the date of the papers had been altered, that they were originally dated during Alvarado's official term, and that the alteration had been made against the interests of the claimants, and was not to be imputed to them. The original decree was therefore reinstated, without amendment. If the language of the decree were explicit and unequivocal, it might be too late now to disturb it, notwithstanding that it might give to the claimants more than they asked for, or any of their witnesses pretended they were entitled to. But in so clear a case of mistake I consider it my duty to lay hold of any ambiguity or discrepancy in its language to enable me to restrict the confirmation to the land actually granted and occupied and claimed. The decree does not say that a parcel of land, 50 varas square, adjoining the houses, shall be added, but "50 varas," which is a line, and not a piece of ground. It says, too, that it shall be in addition to the 50-vara lot on the corner; but this it cannot be, for we have seen that the lot on the corner will include the greater part of a second lot, adjoining the houses on the east.

I think that, in a case like the present, where the decree, prepared by counsel, has evidently been signed by the circuit judge improvidently, and under the idea that it described the land mentioned in the grant, where the claimants have never pretended to have obtained but one lot 50 varas square, where their petition to the board and to this court was for a lot of those dimensions only, and all their testimony referred to a single 50-vara lot, it would be absurd and unjust to allow them, under a decree such as this, to obtain any more land than they were justly entitled to. The survey must therefore be set aside, and a new survey made of a 50-vara lot, beginning at the southwest corner of the old house of the major domos of the mission; running thence easterly, with the line of said house, 50 varas; thence, at right angles, 50 varas; thence, at right angles, parallel with the first line, 50 varas; and thence to the point of beginning.

Case No. 14,939.

UNITED STATES v. DE HARO.

[Hoff. Dec. 53.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1862.[1]

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — LICENSE TO OCCUPY — EFFECT.

[On a petition for the grant of land for pasturage, the secretary reported that the land was vacant, but suggested that, as the ejidos of the neighboring pueblo had not been designated, the petitioner might "in the meantime" occupy the land under "a provisional license"; and the governor accordingly executed a document permitting the petitioners to occupy the land subject to the measurement which might be made of the ejidos of the pueblo, and providing that they should lose their rights "to this provisional concession" if they violated the conditions thereof. Held, that such document gave the petitioners no rights to the absolute fee which should be respected by the United States.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. On the 12th of April, 1844, Ramon and Francisco de Haro presented a petition to the governor in which they alleged that, being compelled to remove the cattle of their deceased mother from the rancho of José Antonio Sanchez, they desired the grant of a small piece of land called the Potrero de San Francisco, in extent from north to south 2,288 varas, and from east to west 2,508 varas. They further stated that the land could be enclosed, and that they intended to place in it tame cattle, as their father's land was insufficient, and as they had obtained, being minors, his permission to make their petition. This petition was, on the 29th April, referred to the secretary, who, on the same day, reported that the land was vacant, as the mission of San Francisco, within the lands of which it was included, had no property whatever. But he suggests that inasmuch as the ejidos of the pueblo had not been designated, the petitioners might in the meantime occupy the land under a provisional license. In pursuance of this report, a document was signed and issued by the governor, in which he declares that, in conformity with the laws and regulations governing the matter, he has resolved to permit the petitioners to occupy the land, subjecting them to the measurement which may be made of the ejidos of the establishment of San Francisco, and subject to the following conditions, etc., etc. The 3d condition is as follows: "The land of which mention is made is one-half a square league, and if they violate these conditions they will lose their rights to this provisional concession, which is delivered to the parties for their security and for these ends."

The expediente containing these various documents is found in the archives. The concession is noted on Jimeno's Index and the Toma de Razon for 1844. No doubt of their genuineness can, therefore, be entertained. But on the sheet containing the copy of the provisional license delivered to the party interested, and now produced by the claimants, is found a grant dated May 24, 1844, purporting to be signed by the governor, and reciting that, having ascertained, on proper inquiry, that the grant will neither interfere with the limits of the new town of Yerba Buena nor be injurious to the mission, he (the governor,) "has determined, in accordance with the opinion of the departmental assembly expressed in their decree of this date, to grant the land in full property to Ramon and Francisco de Haro, that they may do what they please with it." The claimants also produced before the board a second grant, dated Sept. 18th, 1844, purporting to have been made by Governor Micheltorena, in which the land is described as of the breadth of 3,000 varas and of the same number of varas in length, and the De Haros are declared the owners of it in full property, in consideration of the services rendered by, and the indebtedness of the public treasury to, their father, Don Francisco de Haro. The first of these two grants, viz. that written on the same sheet of paper as the provisional license and purporting to ratify and make absolute the latter, was clearly proven before the board to be a forgery. It was virtually abandoned by the claimants, by filing, on the 2d March, 1854, the second grant dated Sept. 18th, 1844. On the faith of this title paper the claim was confirmed by the board, though not without grave doubts as to its genuineness. The cause having been appealed to this court, further proof was taken, and on the hearing the second grant, also, with the series of perjuries by which it had been attempted to be supported, was formally abandoned by the counsel for the claimant, and the claim to a confirmation based solely on the provisional license above mentioned and the proofs showing an occupation under it. It is apparent from the terms of this document, that the governor refused to accede to the petition of the De Haros for a grant of the land. But inasmuch as they required a piece of land whereon to place the cattle of their mother, which could no longer remain on the rancho of Sanchez, the governor determined to allow them to occupy temporarily the tract solicited, as it was not then used by the mission. The language of Jimeno indicates with entire precision the nature of the rights intended to be conceded. He speaks of it not as a provisional grant, but a "provisional license" to occupy land. In the document issued by the governor, he declares that "he has determined to permit them to occupy the land"; and in the third condition, the usual phrase which declares that the party shall lose his right to the land (al terreno), in case he violates the conditions, is altered to "he shall lose his right to this provisional concession." That this change of phraseology was not accidental, is apparent on examination of the copy of the permit retained in the archives. This document is in the handwriting of Jimeno. In writing the last condition, he had evidently pursued the usual form, and written "perdera su derecho al terreno y sera," etc.; but recollecting that the instrument was not a grant, and conferred no rights "to the land," he has erased those words, and substituted the phrase above quoted, "perdera su derecho a esta concession provisional," etc. A similar alteration in phraseology appears in the note by Jimeno, of the recording of the grant. Instead of the usual form, "Queda tomada razon de este titulo en el libro correspondiente," the phrase, "Queda tomada razon de esta licencia provisional en el libro correspondiente," is substituted, indicating the clear discrimination in Jimeno's mind between a grant, whether absolute or provisional, and the mere license to occupy, which he was signing. As observed by the counsel for the United States, "These acts of Jimeno give character to the document signed by Micheltorena, and fix its meaning with a certainty."

It is urged on the part of the claimant, that this provisional license carried with it the promise of the absolute fee, or that it was in fact a grant defeasible only in the event that the land was included within the ejidos to be measured, and, as that event has become impossible, that the grant is now single and absolute. But we have already seen by the terms of the document itself, as well as by the language of Jimeno with regard to it, that the right conferred was a mere license to occupy, and that not permanently, but "in the meanwhile," until the ejidos should be measured. The instrument contains no words of grant, either provisional or otherwise, of the land; and it must have been known to the governor and Jimeno that the lands must eventually be included within the four leagues which was ordinarily assigned to pueblos as ejidos. The petition of the De Haros showed, not only that they wished for a grant of the land, but that they were then in want of some place on which to put their mother's cattle. The governor, though he refused to grant the land, very naturally consented to its temporary use for the purpose designated. And the document issued to the parties is precisely such as would effectuate such an intention. I think it very clear that this instrument cannot be regarded as a conditional grant, defeasible only on the measurement of the ejidos, but that it is a concession, not of any land, but merely of the right to occupy land.

But it is urged that under the Mexican system a concession, even of this nature, implied a promise that the full title should be given, and, when followed by possession and occupation, that an equity arises which the United States are bound to respect. In support of this view the cases of U. S. v. Alviso [23 How. (64 U. S.) 318], decided by the supreme court, and U. S. v. Chaboya [Case No. 14,770], and U. S. v. Bidwell [Id. 14,592], decided by the board and this court, are relied on. In the Case of Alviso the claimant had petitioned the governor for a grant of the land and permission to occupy while the proceedings for the perfection of the title were pending. This petition was granted, and the administrator of the ex-mission of San Francisco directed to report. In 1839 this order was exhibited to the prefect, who agreed to reserve the land for the claimant, and that he might occupy it, referring him to the governor for a complete title. In 1840 the administrator reported that the land was vacant, and did not belong to the mission or any private person. The testimony showed that the occupation of the claimant commenced in 1840, and had continued for fourteen years, that he had improved and cultivated the land, and that his family resided on it. No objection was suggested why the claimant should not have have been a colonist of the portion of the public domain solicited by him, and of which he had been recognized as proprietor since 1840. The court, under these circumstances, refused to disturb his ancient possession. It will be perceived that this case differs from that under consideration in several important particulars. The land solicited was situated on the shores of the ocean, at a distance of from twenty to thirty miles from the mission of San Francisco de Asis. It was vacant, and was not recognized as the property of the mission or any private individual. The propriety of granting it was recognized by the prefect, who permitted the claimants to occupy it, and shown by the report to the administrator to whom the governor referred the petition. There could, therefore, as observed by the supreme court, have existed no objection to making the grant. The right of occupation conceded to the claimant was thus clearly in expectation of the full title, and was in terms solicited by him, and granted by the governor, "while the proceedings for the perfection of the title were pending." When, therefore, after having taken possession of the land, improved, cultivated and built a house on it, in which he had resided as the recognized owner for fourteen years, Alviso presented his claim to the board, it was manifestly unjust to disturb him, because his title had not been perfected. But in the case at bar the land solicited would evidently fall within the ejidos of the pueblo whereon they should be measured. It had even before the date of the petition been enclosed by a wall built by the fathers of the mission. The grant solicited was refused, but a permission to occupy temporarily was given, not, as in Alviso's Case, "while further proceedings for the perfection of the title were pending," but merely until the ejidos should be measured. We look in vain in the expediente for any evidence not only of a promise but even of an intention or expectation, on the part of the governor, to grant the land in full property. But admitting that such an intention or expectation could be inferred from the mere fact that the right to occupy the tract in question temporarily with their mother's cattle was conceded to the petitioners, the case in other respects is far weaker than of Alviso.

It is, I think, conclusively established by the proofs, notwithstanding some evidence to the contrary, that the petitioner neither resided on nor cultivated the land. After the grant, as before, they continued to live with their father at the mission, or at his rancho of San Bruno. They no doubt repaired the old wall which had been erected by the priests, and which, as the land was enclosed on three sides by water, served to enclose it. On this tract they placed their cattle and horses, which were readily attended to by themselves or their vaqueros residing at the mission. It may well be doubted whether this use, under these circumstances, of a valuable and convenient piece of land immediately adjoining the mission, and not more than a league distant from the present city of San Francisco, and which had even been enclosed by the fathers, could be considered such an occupation and cultivation of vacant land as under the colonization laws would raise an equity which the Mexican or this government is bound to respect. It would seem that the petitioners rather received a benefit from than conferred one on the government. It is to be observed that the supreme court did not, in the Case of Alviso, nor have they in any other, decided that a mere permission to occupy, followed by actual occupation, is sufficient to entitle the claimant to confirmation. The contrary doctrine is clearly announced in the case of U. S. v. Garcia, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 282. It is evident that each case must depend on its own circumstances. Where, as in Alviso's Case, the permission was evidently given in contemplation of the future title to be issued; where the reports are favorable and recommend a grant; where no objection is suggested why the claimant should not have been a colonist of that portion of the public domain; where the land is vacant, and has been occupied, and dwelt upon by the claimant for fourteen years,—the claim will be confirmed. But even in such a case it is evident that the confirmation is based upon the equity arising from the ancient possession, under a notorious and recognized claim of title, rather than upon any promise to make a grant implied from the mere fact of a permission to occupy.

With respect to the case of U. S. v. Chaboya [supra], decided by this court, it is sufficient to say that the permission was given to occupy "while the suitable procedure was going on," that the report of the prefect was not only favorable to the issuance of the grant, but informed the governor, that "the opposition made to it by the residents of the pueblo had no other design than to remove Chaboya from the land he had occupied for many years, and was absolutely destitute of justice." And what is more important, that it appeared by the proofs that in 1837 Chaboya built a house upon the land, fenced in a considerable portion of it, and had, at the date of the confirmation, been residing on it with his wife and numerous family for twenty-two years. The case of U. S. v. Bidwell [supra], was confirmed by the board; but the confirmation was based on the general title of Micheltorena, at that time supposed, when followed by occupation and cultivation, to have confirmed incontestable rights. The claimant, it is true, presented two provisional grants. These, it appeared were issued by the governor in that form, not from any objection to making the full title, but on the advice of Jimeno, who after reporting favorably to the petition, suggested "that on account of the governor's contemplated visit to that part of the country, the land should be granted provisionally, subject to the ulterior disposition which his excellency might see fit to make of the matter." Under this grant the land was occupied and cultivated, and a house and corral erected upon it.

It will be observed that, in this case, the concession was not of a mere license to occupy, but a grant (the provisional) of the land. In their opinion, the board say: "From the language of the provisional title paper in this case, in connection with the circumstances under which it issued, it may be fairly understood to have been the intention of the governor to make a grant of the land in fee to Dickey and his heirs, subject only to be defeated by some subsequent act of the governor, and no such act having taken place, it may perhaps be considered as absolute." It is precisely in these particulars that the grant to Dickey differs from the permission to occupy given to the De Haros. The intention of the governor referred to by the board was not an intention to make a grant at some future period, but an intention to make a present grant, or rather that the title issued by him should operate as a grant unless defeated by some subsequent act of his own. But no such effect can be attributed to the license given in the case at bar. The most that the ingenuity of counsel has been able to discover in it is an implied contract that if the petitioner complied with the conditions he should have a title, unless the land should be embraced within the ejidos of the pueblo. It is evident, therefore, that even if the decision in U. S. v. Bidwell [supra], had turned upon the point we have been considering, and that decision were binding on this court, it would have no application to the case at bar.

The only ground on which a confirmation of this claim can plausibly be urged is that just referred to, viz., that the document issued by the governor amounted to a declaration that the party might go into possession, with the implied promise that if he fulfilled the law, and the land was not required for ejidos, he should have a title. But neither the terms of the concession, nor the circumstances under which it issued, can, in my judgment, admit of such a construction. If the permission to occupy had been given "while the proceedings to subject the title were pending"; if the governor had indicated a willingness to grant; if the reports had been favorable, and no obstacle were suggested why the grant should not have been made; if the claimant had gone into possession as owner, and had lived with his family on the land for fourteen years, as in Alviso's Case, or twenty-two years, as in the Case of Chaboya,—the claim should, in analogy to those cases, be confirmed. But in this case the permission is given to occupy only until an assignment of the land to the pueblo is effected. The governor not only indicates no willingness or intention to grant, but, in obedience to Jimeno's suggestion, he refuses to grant, and, ex industria, limits the concession to the permission to occupy land not then used by the mission. The objections to making the grant appear from the report of the officer to whom it was referred; and, finally, the land, at the conquest of the country, though it had been used by the claimants for a little more than two years, had never been inhabited or built upon, nor had any act been done with reference to it which, like the long residence, occupation, and cultivation of Chaboya and Alviso, might have raised an equity in favor of the claimants. It is, perhaps, not unfair to add that the forgeries and perjuries which have been so freely resorted to, to impart additional validity to this title, may justly be considered as admission on the part of the claimants of the infirmity of the only title paper they in fact received.

My opinion is that the claim should be rejected.

[NOTE. The decree entered in this case was, upon appeal by the claimants, affirmed by the supreme court. 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 599. For other of the De Haro grants, see Cases Nos. 14,937 and 14,940.]

Case No. 14,940.

UNITED STATES v. DE HARO.

[Hoff. Dec. 75.]

District Court, N. D. California. June 13, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — SURVEY — CONFLICTING CLAIMS—SHAPE OF TRACT.

[This was a claim by the heirs of Francisco de Haro to the Rancho Laguna de las Mercedes.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. I do not deem it necessary to consider at any length the argument presented on behalf of the claimants, by which it is sought to prove that the whole tract delineated on the diseño should have been confirmed, and not merely half a league, to which their claim was restricted. The point was considered and decided by the board, and that decree has become final; nor have any objections to the survey been filed by the claimants on the ground that it embraces only half a league, as required by the decree, and not the much larger quantity delineated on the desiño. That the decree of the board was correct cannot be for a moment doubted. The original petition of Galindo describes the land as one league in length by half a league in breadth. The witnesses whose testimony was taken by order of the governor variously estimate it as of the extent of "one league in length by half a league in breadth;" "three-quarters of a league in length by one-quarter of a league in breadth;" and "one league in length by half a league in breadth in some places, and a quarter of a league in others." And in the fourth condition describes it as of a length equivalent to half a league, directs it to be measured, and reserves the surplus. In the deed from Galindo to De Haro, the ancestor of the claimants, the land is described as "one league in longitude, and one-half a league in latitude;" and the wife of De Haro, in a subsequent petition to the governor for an augmento, or extension, expressly states to him that the land purchased by her husband from Galindo was only half a league in extent, and was therefore too small, etc. As this petition was never acted upon, and the only title of the claimants is derived from the grant to Galindo, it is plain that their pretension to any larger extent than half a league is wholly inadmissible.

The only question in the case is as to the location within the exterior limits of the half league confirmed to the claimants. It appeared that when the case was pending before the board, a preliminary survey was made at the suggestion of the claimants, by John C. Hays, Esq., surveyor general. On this survey the whole tract delineated on the diseño was run out; and the plat was then furnished by the surveyor to the administrator of the estate of the deceased, De Haro, who seems to have been conducting the litigation, with a request that the parties would designate the particular half league which they claimed under the grant. The administrator referred the matter to Brown and Denniston, who had married heirs of De Haro, who marked out the half league on the plat, returned it to the surveyor, and then went with him on the ground, and the lines were run out and laid down on the plat. The plat survey and field notes were filed in the cause by the surveyor general, at the request, as he states in his communication to the board, of the attorneys for the claimants. Immediately after these proceedings, Brown and Denniston openly proclaimed that the lands outside of the half league so selected were public lands. They took up and recorded a claim to a portion of those lands, and advised others who are now settled on the lands to do the like. Brown, as guardian for one of the heirs, leased some hundreds of acres of land embraced within the half league, and, having subsequently mortgaged the same land, a foreclosure was had, and it is now held under that title. It appears also that Denniston and wife conveyed the same land to one Andrews, whose interest is now said to be vested in Mahoney, the present claimant of the whole tract within the exterior boundaries. It also appears that in 1853, the surveyor general, considering the designation of the half league referred to as an election by the claimants, caused outside lands to be surveyed and sectionized as public land; and numerous settlers relying upon these circumstances, have entered upon the land in good faith; taken up preemption claims, paid their money, received certificates, and have erected improvements said to be worth more than $75,000. It further appears that at the time the half league was selected it was considered the most valuable portion of the land; any subsequent change in value being chiefly due to the improvements made by the settlers. It is now enough to change the location of the one-half league, and, abandoning the land previously selected and in part sold and mortgaged by Brown and Denniston, to locate anew, so as to include the lands occupied and improved as above stated. The survey made in accordance with the recent wishes of the present claimant of the whole title has been objected to on the part of the United States.

It is objected on the part of the claimants that the settlers as such, have no right to intervene in this proceeding, and an elaborate argument has been made to show that they had no right, until after the quantity granted was segregated by competent authority, to enter upon any lands embraced within the exterior limits of the grant. But it is sufficient to observe in reply that the exceptions to this survey are filed by the United States, and not by the settlers. The United States have certainly the right to be heard in opposition to any survey or location which the district attorney may deem unjust; and this, whether it be desired to protect the interests of present or future claimants under the preemption laws, or merely the rights and interests of the government itself. The very terms of the act of 1860 [12 Stat. 34], require that "all persons claiming interests under preemption settlement, or other right or title derived from the United States, shall be represented by the district attorney, intervening in the name of the United States." It cannot be denied that the persons in whose behalf the district attorney has intervened in this instance claim "a right derived or title from the United States." But, as before intimated, even if there were no settlers on the land, or any private interests concerned to correct the location, the United States, through the district attorney, have clearly the right to protect the public interests, and to prevent injustice, by procuring a proper location of the grant.

The more important question remains: Can the claimants now be permitted to abandon the location selected as above stated, and float the grant to such portion of the land as may suit their present convenience or interests? Had the grant belonged to a single individual by whom an election was made, as above described, the point would have been too clear for argument. It is said, however, that some of the heirs of De Haro were minors, and, therefore, could not have assented to the election. It appears that for some time after the death of De Haro his title papers were in the hands of Julius R. Rose, Esq., who, probably, had the general management of the estate. On the 30th July an informal paper was executed by the heirs of De Haro, by which the administration of the estate was confided to Ramon De Saldo. This paper was signed by Josefa De Haro, the widow, Rosalia Brown, (by her husband, C. Brown,) Prudencia De Haro, and Candelavia and Carlota De Haro. De Saldo was also appointed the guardian of Candelavia and Carlota De Haro, while Charles Brown was guardian of the boy Alonzo. In the exercise of the trust thus confided to him, De Saldo employed counsel to present the case to the board, and at their suggestion the survey was made, and the land designated by Brown and Denniston, who had married the daughters of De Haro.

De Saldo testifies that he had no reason to suppose that the heirs of De Haro were dissatisfied with the survey, and assigns three reasons for supposing that they were, in fact, satisfied with it: (1) Their having pointed out the lines. (2) Their preempting lands outside of the boundaries. (3) That he had in his possession a document sworn to by their father, describing the identical land as his own. There is necessarily some difficulty in cases where a rancho is owned by a large number of persons, in obtaining the consent of all to the election of any particular tract. As the land must ordinarily be surveyed in a compact form and in one entire tract, the choice of majority in interest, it would seem, ought to govern. And where, as in this case, the designation has been made and acted upon by the representatives of two of the principal heirs, one of whom was also guardian for another heir, and with the full knowledge and acquiescence of the administrator of the estate, who was also guardian for two of the heirs, and by whom the attorneys to prosecute the claim were employed, and when the land outside the portion selected has been sectionized by the United States, and taken up by settlers in good faith, without objection or remonstrance on the part of any of the claimants, and when the election appears to have been fairly made and in the interests of all concerned, it appears to me that the United States have a right to insist that it shall be final and conclusive; and that settlers who have in good faith acquired inceptive titles to other portions of the tract, should not be deprived of their titles and their improvements by a change in the location of the grant.

I think, therefore, that the official survey should be set aside, and a new one made, in conformity with the survey by Leander Ransom, filed before the board of land commissioners.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY.

[1. Under the ordinances of the former government it seems that all grants of public land were required to be measured in a square or rectangular form, and the only deviation allowed was in cases where some natural obstacle prevented such a measurement, and then the parallelogram was transformed into a trapezium; that is, two of the sides were measured parallel to each other, but, if a natural obstacle prevented the production of one of them far enough to include the entire quantity within a rectangular figure, the other was produced, and their ends united by an oblique line.]

[2. The court has no authority to deflect and modify lines so as to exclude particular parcels, even where they have been settled upon by others in good faith. The only proper method is to make the location as described in the decree of confirmation, and, when the decree fails to give specific directions, to measure the land as required by the ordinances.]

[Objections to the official survey of the rancho of the Laguna de las Mercedes, claimed by Josefa de Haro.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In the opinion heretofore delivered in this case [Case No. 14,938] it was considered that, by the final decree of confirmation, the quantity of land confirmed to the claimant was the half of one square league, and no more; and that it was to be located in a tract running from north to south one league, and from east to west one-half a league, to be measured according to the ordinances, and so as to include the site of the houses of De Haro, and of Galindo, the original grantee. An order having been entered in conformity with this opinion, a new survey has been made and returned into court for its approval.

With the exception of a very slight curve, introduced so as to conform to the surveyed line of an adjoining rancho, the east and west lines run due north and south, as required by the ordinances. The northerly line also runs east and west; but the southerly line has been surveyed from southwest to northeast, thus giving to the tract the figure of a trapezium. By the ordinance, it would seem that all grants of public land were required to be measured in a square or rectangular form. If, however, any natural obstacle prevented such a measurement, the parallelograms were transformed into trapeziums; that is, two of the sides were measured parallel to each other and running north and south or east and west; but if a natural obstacle prevented the production of one of them far enough to include the required quantity within a rectangular figure, the other was produced, and their ends united by an oblique line, thus giving to the tract the form of a trapezium. On page 77 of the "Ordenanzas de Tierras y Aguas" will be found the diagram of a survey almost identical in figure with the official survey returned into court. Conceding that the land is to be measured in a tract one league long from north to south, and half a league wide from east to west, or as nearly in that form as is possible, without passing the exterior limits of the grant, I confess myself unable to see how the survey can be attained so as to conform more nearly to these requirements, or to the provisions of the ordenanzas.

I am aware that there are some circumstances in this case which make it one of peculiar hardship. It is quite possible that many persons have, in good faith, believed that the half league solicited and desired by the claimants was the tract surveyed by Ransom at the instigation of De Saldo, as explained in the former opinions of this court. Under this idea they have settled upon and erected valuable improvements on the lands not included in that survey, of which they will be dispossessed if the survey now before the court shall be finally approved. But, for the reasons heretofore given, I have not felt at liberty to disregard the explicit language of the final decree of the board and of this court, in which both the United States and the claimants have acquiesced, and which not only omits to adopt the Ransom survey, but directs a different location of the tract to be made. Under that decree, taken in connection with the ordenanzas, I am unable to perceive how any alteration, except one purely arbitrary, in the survey can be made. But even if such alteration were attempted, with a view of excluding settlers now included, others not now embraced within the survey would be included, who would urge their objections, and ask for a further modification of the lines. I do not consider that I have the power or the right thus arbitrarily to cause ranchos to be surveyed so as to subserve private interests. An attempt to deflect and modify lines so as to exclude particular parcels of lands would not only give rise to suspicions of favoritism and partiality, but might do injustice to other parties whose small holdings, perhaps of inferior comparative value, but of great importance to their possessors, might thus be included. The only practicable method in any case is to adopt a general rule, and I know of none that I can follow, in a case like the present, but to make the location as described in the decree of confirmation, and, when the decree fails to give specific directions, to measure the land as required in the ordenanzas. I am aware that in this case large interests are involved, and that this, or any other decision I might make, must necessarily create disappointment and discontent.

It affords me much satisfaction to feel that my decision is subject to a review by a higher tribunal, where any errors into which I have fallen will be corrected. The official survey is approved.

[The case was taken on an appeal to the supreme court, where the order of this court was set aside. 154 U. S. 544, 14 Sup. Ct. 1161.]

Case No. 14,942.

UNITED STATES v. DELAWARE INS. CO.

[4 Wash. C. C. 418.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1823.

UNITED STATES—INSOLVENCY—PRIORITY OF PAYMENT—TRANSFER OF PERSONAL PROPERTY—POSSESSION—CONSIGNEE FOR VALUE.

1. If before the right of preference of the United States to be first paid out of the estate of the insolvent has accrued, by the act of insolvency being committed, the debtor has made a bona fide conveyance of property to a third person, or has mortgaged it, or it has been taken in execution, such property is not liable for the debt due to the United States. A respondentia bond, in form, does not pass the right of property in the goods; nor does a mere consignment or indorsement of the bill of lading. They are mere personal contracts. But it is otherwise, if these instruments are given or made for value, or are given to a creditor, as a security.

[Distinguished in Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Conard, Case No. 627. Cited in Greely v. Smith, Id. 5,750.]

2. Actual possession is not necessary to a transfer of personal property; nor is the want of it even an indicium of fraud, where from circumstances it cannot be obtained. Possession of goods at sea, by the master, is the possession of whosoever is or may become the owner of them.

[Cited in Keene v. Wheatley, Case No. 7,644.]

3. It is no objection to the vesting of the right of property in the consignee for value, or whose debt it is to secure, that the goods are by agreement to be at the risk and for account of the consignor.

This is a action for money had and received, to recover the sum of $6,141, on the following case: On the 7th of May, 1822, H. D. Watkins and Michael Doran borrowed from the defendants, the sum of $10,000, at respondentia, upon the specie, goods, &c. laden or to be laden on board the ship Adriana, whereof Thomas Dixey was master, bound on a voyage from Philadelphia to Canton, and at and from Canton back to Philadelphia, at a premium of fourteen per cent. The bond is in the common form; but upon it is indorsed a memorandum, signed by H. D. Watkins and Michael Doran, reciting an agreement that the bills of lading for the specie, goods, &c. mentioned in the within obligation, shall be indorsed to the Delaware Insurance Company, as a collateral security for the loan mentioned in it; and further, that the property to be shipped on the homeward passage, (as a collateral security) being the proceeds of the said loan, shall be for the account and risk of the said H. D. Watkins and Michael Doran, but consigned by invoices and bills of lading, under cover, addressed to the president and directors of the Delaware Insurance Company. It is then expressly declared, that such indorsement, or consignment, shall not be held to exonerate the persons of the borrowers, nor compel the Delaware Insurance Company to accept the specie or merchandise which may arrive under such bills of lading, or consignment, in discharge of the debt; but it shall be lawful for the Delaware Insurance Company to secure and hold the said specie and merchandise for sixty days after their arrival at Philadelphia, and if the principal and premium shall not be paid within said sixty days, to dispose of the merchandise at public auction, and to charge the borrowers with the balance that may remain due after crediting the specie so received, and the proceeds of the sales of the merchandise; the freight, duties, and other proper charges, being first deducted.

On the same day that the respondentia bond was given, the borrowers, Watkins and Doran, executed a separate paper, signed by them, stating that the Delaware Insurance Company, having lent them $10,000 on respondentia, at a premium of fourteen per cent. for the voyage of the Adriana, from Philadelphia to Canton and back, "it is further agreed, that the bill of lading of the outward shipment to be made in specie, with the returns thereof, are to be assigned to the Delaware Insurance Company, and that the consignee, or supercargo, shall be directed to consign the said returns to the Delaware Insurance Company, as a collateral security for the bond (being paid) now given by us." The bill of lading for the outward cargo shipped by Watkins, viz. two kegs, containing 10,000 Spanish dollars, to be delivered at Canton, to B. Etting or his assigns, is indorsed and signed by Watkins in the following words: "For value received, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I do hereby assign and transfer the within bill of lading, and sum of money therein mentioned, and also the goods, &c. to be invested therewith at Canton, or elsewhere, and shipped in return for the same, unto the Delaware Insurance Company, as a collateral security, according to the memorandum duly executed and indorsed on a respondentia bond given to the said Delaware Insurance Company." This indorsement is dated the 23d of May, 1822, which is also the date of the bill of lading. The bill of lading at Canton, is dated the 23d of December, 1822, and the goods mentioned in it are stated to be shipped by B. Etting, for account and risk of H. D. Watkins, and consigned to the Delaware Insurance Company, and to be delivered to them. The invoice corresponds with the bill of lading, and is addressed to the president of the Delaware Insurance Company.

The Adriana returned to this port on the 24th of April, 1823, and on the 26th of June following, the defendants stated an account with H. D. Watkins, making a small balance against him, after debiting the sum loaned, premium, interest and charges, and crediting the goods, &c. On the 9th of June, 1823, Watkins executed a deed of assignment to the district attorney of all his property, in trust to pay certain duty bonds (the amount now sued for) due to the United States, and the residue for the use of his other creditors. The schedule which accompanied this deed mentions Canton goods by the Adriana, in the hands of the Delaware Insurance Company, by virtue of a consignment to them. These goods, being, on their arrival, taken into the stores of the custom house, the district attorney addressed a letter to the collector, stating the above assignment by Watkins to him, and desiring him not to deliver the goods to the defendants. By a subsequent arrangement between the parties, the goods were delivered to the defendants without prejudice, under an agreement that this action should be brought to try the question of property in them. On the side of the United States it was contended, that on the 9th of June, 1823, when the legal insolvency of Watkins happened, by his assignment of all his effects to the use of the United States, the property in the Canton goods was in him, and not in the defendants. Neither the respondentia bond, the assignment of the outward bill of lading, nor the consignment by bill of lading and invoice of the homeward cargo to the defendants, amounted, per se, to a transfer of the property in these goods to them. They were shipped for the account, and at the risk of Watkins, which, together with the possession of them by his agent, constituted him the unquestionable owner of them. The defendants never had either actual or constructive possession of them, which is essential to the transfer of personal property. If the defendants were not the owners, neither had they a lease, because they had not possession. In short, the sole object of the agreement between Watkins and the defendants, was to give a preference to the latter, which must yield to that claimed by the United States. [U. S. v. Hove] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 73, 90; [Prince v. Bartlett] 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 431; U. S. v. King [Case No. 15,536]; 3 Johns. 369; [U. S. v. Fisher] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 231.

On the other side, it was insisted, that the preference claimed by the United States, is not in the nature of a lien to overreach an absolute transfer of property by the insolvent, or a security given on it; and this whether the property be real or personal. Although a respondentia bond, assignment of a bill of lading, or a consignment of goods, does not per se transfer the property; yet if it appear that it was the intention of the parties, by these means, to grant a security to the indorsee or consignee for a debt due, or if the indorsement or consignment be for a valuable consideration, the right of property passes. Actual possession is not essential to the transfer where it cannot be taken, which is always the case where the goods are at sea, or beyond sea. To avoid a charge of fraud, it should be taken as soon as it can be obtained. Neither is the transfer prevented by the circumstance that the goods are shipped for account and at the risk of the shipper, if it be part of the original agreement that they should be so shipped, as it was in this case, and if the intention of the parties manifestly appears to have been that the consignment should be made for the purpose of securing a debt. C. J. Ingersoll, Dist. Atty., and J. R. Ingersoll, for the United States.

Mr. Binney and John Sergeant, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The question is, whether the preference to which the United States are entitled over the other creditors of Watkins, will overreach the right claimed by the defendants to the goods imported from Canton and consigned to them?

The leading principle stated in the case of Thelusson v. Smith, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 426, is that which must in a great measure decide this cause. It is, that although in a case of insolvency, the debts due to the United States are first to be satisfied, without regarding the superior dignity of those due by the insolvent to others, still they must be satisfied out of the debtor's estate. And therefore, if before the right of preference has accrued to the United States, the debtor has made a bona fide conveyance of property to a third person, or has mortgaged it to secure a debt, or if his property has been seized under an execution; in all these cases, the property is divested out of the debtor, and cannot be made liable to the debts due to the United States. It has also been decided by the supreme court, that the right of preference given to the United States does not arise until the act of insolvency has been committed, and that this right is not in the nature of a lien. [U. S. v. Fisher] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 358.

Attending to these principles, we have now to inquire whether, upon general principles of law, the property in the Canton goods consigned to the defendants, was divested out of Watkins, and vested in the defendants, prior to the 9th of June, 1823, when the act of insolvency was committed? It must be conceded that in England, as well as in this country, a respondentia bond in common form, is considered as amounting to no more than a personal security. It is equally clear, that a mere consignment or indorsement of a bill of lading, or filling up a bill of lading to the consignee, does not per se pass the right of property in the goods to the consignee or indorsee. They only give to the consignee a right to demand the goods of the captain.

The true rule is stated by Holt (page 74) in his second volume on Shipping, that the indorsement of a bill of lading is an immediate transfer of the legal interest in the cargo to the assignee, provided it be for value. But if shipped without order, the ownership remains in the shipper; or if the indorsement be made without consideration. But it is otherwise, if the bill of lading be filled up to a creditor as a security for his debt. It is laid down in the case of Hibbert v. Carter, 1 Term R. 745, that an indorsement of a bill of lading to a creditor, without any proof or explanation, dehors, is, prima facie, a transfer of the property to him; but if the intention be proved to be only to bind the net profits, it is otherwise. Now this is a very strong case in its application to the present. For, if the mere circumstance of the indorsee being a creditor, amounts to a presumptive transfer of the property, how much stronger must be the case where the object and intention of the indorsement are to secure a debt due to the indorsee, and in fulfilment of an express agreement between the shipper and the indorsee, entered into at the time the debt was contracted, that the indorsement should be made, or the bills of lading be filled up to the creditor, for the purpose of securing the debt then contracted? This is precisely the present case. The $10,000, for which the respondentia bond was given, were loaned upon an express stipulation in writing, entered into at the time of the loan, that the bills of lading for the outward cargo should be indorsed to the defendants, as a collateral security for the debt, and also that the goods to be shipped on the homeward voyage, being the investment of the money lent, should be assigned to the defendants, and should be consigned to them as collateral security. This agreement was partly executed on the 23d of May, 1822, by the assignment of the outward bill of lading, and of the $10,000 mentioned in it, and of the goods in which they were to be invested, and was afterwards completed by the consignment to the defendants.

Two objections have been made by the plaintiffs' counsel to the application of the principles before mentioned to the present case. (1) That the transfer was incomplete and inoperative, on account of actual possession of the goods brought from Canton having, at no period, been taken by the defendants. (2) That these goods were shipped and were agreed to be so shipped, at the risk and for account of Watkins.

As to the first objection, it is not well founded in point of law. Actual possession is not essential to the transfer of personal property, and the want of it is not even an indicium of fraud, where, from circumstances, it cannot be obtained. The indorsement of a bill of lading for a cargo whilst at sea, for a valuable consideration, transfers the property, although actual possession is not and can not be taken by the assignee. The possession of the master is constructively the possession of the owner of the goods, and the right of possession follows the right of property, according as that may change from one person to another. A contrary doctrine would be attended by the most calamitous consequences to commerce.

The other objection is completely and satisfactorily refuted by the case of Haille v. Smith, 1 Bos. & P. 563, in which it is laid down, that the nature of the trust being, that the proceeds of the cargo should remain with the consignee, applicable to the debt for the security of which the consignment was made, under an agreement to that effect, for a valuable consideration, the risk must necessarily remain with the consignor, notwithstanding the change of property, and that he must suffer, or be benefited by the loss or profit on the sale. The court came to the conclusion, that the cargo vested in the consignees, notwithstanding the risk remained in those who transferred the cargo, and nothwithstanding the cargo was to be sold with a view to the profit or loss of the consignor. In that case, actual possession never came to the hands of the consignee; and it is, upon the whole, a strong authority as to most, if not all, the points discussed in this case.

We are clearly of opinion, that the property in these goods vested in the defendants prior to the act of insolvency committed by Watkins on the 9th of June, 1823, and that they were not liable to the preference claimed by the United States. The only interest which remained in Watkins, was a right of redemption upon payment of the debt due to the defendants, or to any surplus which there might have been upon a sale of the goods, after satisfying the defendants. This being the law of the case, and the facts being all in writing, and agreed between the parties, I must direct a verdict to be found for the defendants.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 18, 1862.

FEDERAL CRIMINAL JURISDICTION — MURDER ON THE HIGH SEAS—INDICTMENT—NATIONAL CHARACTER OF VESSEL—OWNERSHIP.

1. Where an offence is within a general jurisdiction of a court of the United States, it is not necessary that an indictment for the offence should exclude, by descriptive terms, every possible exemption of the defendant from the jurisdiction.

2. Thus, where a murder committed on a vessel is of such a character that a court of the United States can entertain jurisdiction of it, although the vessel has no national character, no national character need be alleged in the indictment, and it need not negative the possible foreign nationality of the vessel.

3. Under the eighth section of the act of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 113), it is sufficient, in an indictment for a murder committed on board of a vessel on the high seas, by an alien, to allege that the vessel was owned by a citizen of the United States, without alleging otherwise the national character of the vessel.

This was an indictment against [Ferdinando Demarchi] an alien, for a murder on the high seas, committed on board of the ship Blondel. The defendant, having been convicted, now moved for an arrest of judgment, on the ground that the indictment did not allege that the Blondel was an American vessel.

E. Delafield Smith, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Edwin James, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This indictment is founded on the eighth section of the act of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 113). It alleges that the murder was committed on board of the Blondel, "owned by a certain person or persons to the said jurors unknown, being a citizen or citizens of the United States of America." It is insisted that this allegation is, on its face, insufficient to give the court jurisdiction, and that, therefore, the judgment ought to be arrested. The argument is, that, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States not being unlimited over crimes committed upon all vessels on the high seas, it must be confined to American vessels, that is, vessels whose nationality is fixed and determined by registration in conformity with the navigation laws of the country, and that this national character of the vessel must be alleged in the indictment, unless the defendant is described as a citizen of the United States. This objection is purely technical, as the Blondel was proved, on the trial, to be, in fact, an American vessel, although her register was not produced. She was proved to have been built in the United States, and to have been exclusively owned by citizens of the United States, at the time of the commission of the offence.

The power of the government of the United States to punish offences on the high seas, is co-extensive with that of any other nation. Like all other maritime nations, it punishes robbery and murder on the high seas, whenever and wherever committed by its own subjects on the ocean, and whenever and by whomsoever committed on board of vessels belonging to its own subjects. Indeed, like other nations, it goes further than this, and punishes piracy and piratical murder on board of all vessels found on the high seas, which have no national character, and whose ownership cannot be determined. It was expressly decided, in U. S. v. Klintock, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 144, that the act on which this indictment is founded extends to all persons, on board of all vessels which throw off their national character, by cruising piratically and committing piracy on other vessels. This indictment charges a piratical murder, and, if the court has jurisdiction to try such a case, where the offence was committed on board of a vessel having no national character, it is clear that no national character need be alleged in the indictment. It is quite true, that the proof in any given case may disclose the fact that the offence was committed on board of a foreign ship, sailing under a foreign flag, by a foreigner, and upon a foreigner, and that the crime was, therefore, one merely against another government. On such a disclosure, it would be the duty of the court to dismiss the case. But it is not necessary for an indictment, when the offence comes within a general jurisdiction of the court, to exclude, by descriptive terms, every possible exemption of the defendant from that jurisdiction. If the offence is of such a character that the court can entertain the case, although the vessel has no national character, no national character, as has already been remarked, need be alleged; and it would seem equally clear, that the possible foreign nationality of the vessel need not be negatived in the indictment. This seems to have been the understanding of the courts and the profession in England, and to this understanding the practice in that country, in similar trials, has conformed, for a long series of years. That practice has been adopted here, and been steadily adhered to since the foundation of this government.

In indictments for piracy, both at common law and under the statutes, in England, there is usually no allegation either of the nationality of the vessel or of the citizenship of the defendant. The ownership of the vessel is sometimes, although not always, alleged to be in the subjects of the queen. Archb. Cr. Pl. & Ev. (14th London Ed.) pp. 363–365; 3 Chit. Cr. Law (4th Am. Ed.) p. 1093. Indeed, in cases where the offence charged is not piratical, and is not alleged to have been committed piratically, the nationality of the vessel and of the defendant, and even the ownership, are often omitted. This was so in the case of Rex v. Thompson [2 East, P. C. 514, 517] in which the indictment is said to have been drawn by an eminent crown lawyer, and where the offence is not charged as having been piratically committed, but as an assault upon the captain of the vessel, by some of his own crew, with intent to murder him. The same is true of indictments for burning ships or sinking them at sea. 3 Chit. Cr. Law, pp. 1097, 1098.

But, independently of the foregoing considerations, I am satisfied that the allegation in this indictment, that this ship was owned by citizens of the United States, is sufficient to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the court. Even admitting, for this purpose, that the course of proceedings, both in our own and the English courts, has often departed from the sound rules of criminal pleading, still, I am not aware that citizens of the United States are permitted to sail, under any foreign flag, ships exclusively owned by them. Under the doctrine laid down by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 610, and U. S. v. Klintock, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 144, the circuit court has jurisdiction of a case of murder and robbery, under the eighth section of this act of 1790, unless the defendant be a foreigner, and the offence be committed on board of a vessel which, at the time, "in point of fact, as well as right, is the property of subjects of a foreign state, who have at the time, in virtue of this property, the control of the vessel." The allegation of ownership, in this indictment, excludes the case from that class of vessels over which the jurisdiction of the court does not extend.

Motion overruled.

UNITED STATES v. DEMING.

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1845.

PERJURY—FALSE BANKRUPT SCHEDULES—INDICTMENT—MISNOMER OF COURT—OATH—AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER.

1. Where such words of description are used in an indictment, as to have an application only to the proper person, it is sufficient, although the words of the statute be not used.

2. On a charge of perjury by a petitioner in bankruptcy, the indictment need not set out, particularly or substantially, the petition.

3. A general reference to it, which shall show its character and object, is sufficient.

4. To sustain an indictment for perjury, the oath must be administered by some one authorized.

[Cited in U. S. v. Howard, 37 Fed. 667.]

5. An authority to a county clerk, to swear petitioners resident in his county, does not give him power to administer an oath to one who resides in another county.

[This was an indictment against Benajah H. Deming for perjury.]

The District Attorney, for the United States.

Abbott & Lathrop, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment for perjury, in swearing falsely in a proceeding in bankruptcy, the jury having found a verdict of guilty. A motion is now made to arrest the judgment on the following grounds:

1. Because there is a misnomer in the indictment, as to the court before whom the proceeding was had. The 7th section of the bankrupt act provides that all petitions in bankruptcy shall be had "in the district court," etc., and the allegation in the indictment is of a petition made "to a judge sitting as a bankrupt court." And it is contended, that this, being descriptive of the personal of the judge, must be substantially, if not strictly, set out in the indictment. That the description given might refer to the circuit court, etc. As no judge can sit in bankruptcy except the district judge, we think the indictment in this respect is sufficient. The circuit court has jurisdiction to hear appeals in bankruptcy, from the bankrupt court, but the circuit judge, in hearing these appeals, can not be said to sit in bankruptcy. Such a sitting can only apply to the district judge.

2. The indictment is alleged to be defective in not setting out the petition with sufficient particularity and certainty. It is argued, if the prosecutor undertakes to set out proceedings material to the offense, even unnecessarily, he must do it with the same certainty as if they were required. That formerly, all the proceedings in the course of which the perjury is charged to have been committed, were required to be set forth, and though now excused by statutes both in England and this country; yet, if the prosecutor does not avail himself of the statute, he is held to the ancient strictness. 2 Chit. Cr. Law, 307; 2 Russ. Crimes, 536. It is unnecessary to set out the petition, substantially or otherwise; a mere reference to its character and object is sufficient. And we do not think that the indictment contains any allegations or statements which bring it within the rule laid down by the counsel. We recognize the principles relied on, but we do not think they apply to the indictment as framed.

3. The third ground is, that the alleged false oath was not administered by any person legally authorized. The bankrupt act requires that petitions shall be sworn to; but does not declare before whom the oath shall be taken. The district court, under the act, adopted a rule which authorizes the clerk of the district court to administer oaths generally to petitioners; and another, as follows: "Ordered, that the petitioners residing out of the county of Wayne, may verify their petitions before the county clerk of the county in which they reside; and the clerks of the different counties of this district are hereby appointed commissioners to administer oaths or affirmations to petitioners applying for the benefit of the bankrupt law." The indictment shows that the defendant was a resident of the county of Jackson, but it alleges that he took the oath before the clerk of Washtenaw county. And the question is made, whether he had the power to administer the oath. As clerk merely, we suppose he had not the power. But had he not authority, under the rule of the court? The first part of the rule limits the authority of the clerk to administer the oath, to residents in his county. The words are, that the petitioners may take the oath "before the county clerk of the county in which they reside." But the prosecutor insists, that the latter part of the order enlarges the power of the clerk, as it appoints him a "commissioner to administer oaths or affirmations to petitioners applying for the benefit of the bankrupt law."

In giving a construction to this order, the whole of it must be taken together. The clerks were not appointed commissioners generally, under the act of congress, but merely for the special purpose of administering oaths to petitioners, and to persons, as it would seem, who reside in their respective counties. We think that this is a fair construction of the rule, and, consequently, that the clerk of Washtenaw county had no power to administer an oath to the defendant, who was a citizen of Jackson county.

The judgment is arrested.

SUBORNATION OF PERJURY — INDICTMENT — AVERMENTS.

1. Subornation of perjury is in its essence but a particular form of perjury itself.

2. An indictment for subornation of perjury must aver that the defendant knew that the testimony which he instigated the suborned witness to give was false, and that in giving such testimony the witness would willfully and corruptly commit the crime of perjury.

Indictment for subornation of perjury. Heard on demurrer.

The indictment contained two counts. The first alleged the pendency in the United States court of claims, of a suit brought by one Harriet Mills, who claimed to be a loyal citizen of the United States, against the United States to recover from the treasury the proceeds of one hundred bales of cotton which she alleged were her property, and which were taken in August, 1874, by the United States military forces, turned over to the officers of the treasury department, and afterwards sold and the proceeds amounting to $40,000, paid into the treasury of the United States, and that said court had jurisdiction to pass upon said claim; that on May 10, 1875, at the city of New Orleans, the defendants, R. Stewart Dennee, lawyer, and Samuel Gamage, yeoman, "unlawfully, corruptly, wickedly and maliciously did solicit, suborn and instigate and endeavor to persuade, and did then and there suborn, instigate, and procure one Martha L. Knight to appear before one Robert H. Shannon" United States circuit court commissioner, authorized by law to administer oaths, etc., "and did then and there wickedly and corruptly instigate and procure the said Martha L. Knight to give evidence and her deposition in said issue, * * * and upon her corporal oath, duly administered according to law, to falsely swear and give evidence to certain matters material and relevant to the said issue, and to matters therein and thereby put in issue to the effect following, that is to say." The first count of the indictment then set out certain questions and the answers thereto, given by the said Knight, which was followed by a traverse of the truth of each and every answer given by her as set out in the indictment. The count then concluded as follows: "Whereas in truth and in fact she, the said Martha L. Knight, on or about, or concerning the matters touching which, she in her said deposition, did declare and testify had no knowledge or belief of the truth thereof in so far as any and all matters by her sworn to, stated and deposed as aforesaid in her said deposition aforesaid, were or are material to the issue so joined in the said court of claims as aforesaid, there and then at no time when she did so swear, depose and her evidence give as aforesaid contrary to the form of the statute, etc." The second count set out in substantially the same manner as the first the pendency and nature of the suit of Mills against the United States in the court of claims, the jurisdiction of the court over the cause, and then proceeded to aver that the defendants, at New Orleans, on the 10th day of March, 1875, "did unlawfully, corruptly, wickedly solicit, suborn and instigate, and endeavor to persuade, and did then and there suborn and instigate and procure one Martha L. Knight to appear as a witness in said cause, * * * and did so wickedly and unlawfully, as aforesaid, cause and procure the said Martha L. Knight then and there * * * to appear before one Robert H. Shannon" who was a commissioner of the United States circuit court, authorized to administer oaths, "and did then and there wickedly and corruptly instigate and procure the said Martha L. Knight to give evidence and her deposition in said issue, * * * and to falsely swear and give evidence to certain matters material and relevant to the said issue" to the effect following, that is to say. Then followed a statement of certain questions propounded to the said Martha L. Knight, and her answers thereto under oath and a traverse seriatim of each and every answer so set out. The second count then concluded with the same averments as the first.

The demurrer was based on the alleged ground that the indictment did not set out any offense against the laws of the United States.

John H. New, Asst. U. S. Atty.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The crime of subornation of perjury has several indispensable ingredients which must be charged in the indictment or it will be fatally defective: (1) The testimony of the witness suborned must be false. (2) It must be given willfully and corruptly by the witness, knowing it to be false. (3) The suborner must know or believe that the testimony of the witness given, or about to be given will be false. (4) He must know or believe that the witness will willfully and corruptly testify to facts which he knows to be false. A careful scrutiny of the counts of this indictment fails to reveal any averment that the defendants knew or believed that the testimony of the witness whom they are charged with suborning would be false, or that they knew it was false, or that they knew that the witness knew it was false, or that they knew that she would willfully and corruptly testify, or had willfully and corruptly testified to facts as true, knowing them to be false.

To make a good indictment for subornation of perjury the false swearing must be set out with the same detail as an indictment for perjury, and the indictment must charge that the defendants procured the witness to testify knowing that the testimony would be false, and knowing that the witness knew that the testimony he had given, or was about to give, was false, and knowing that he would corruptly and willfully give false testimony. In the case of Com. v. Douglass, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 244, the defendant was indicted for subornation of perjury. On the trial the court below instructed the jury that "if it was proved to them beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant on the former trial for forgery (referred to in the indictment) put Fanny Crossman on the stand or caused her to be put on the stand as a witness, knowing that she would testify as set forth in the indictment, and intending that she should so testify, and he put her on the stand, or caused her to be put on the stand for the purpose of her so testifying, and she did so testify and such testimony was false, and he knew when he put her on the stand, that if she did so testify her testimony would be false; it would be sufficient to prove that part of the indictment which alleged that defendant suborned Fanny Crossman to commit perjury as set forth in the indictment."

This charge was assigned for error, and the supreme judicial court in passing upon it said: "The remaining exception to the charge of the presiding judge is of more importance, and is, we think, well founded. The jury were instructed that if certain facts stated in the exceptions were proved beyond reasonable doubt, it would be sufficient proof of that part of the indictment which charged that the defendant suborned Fanny Crossman to commit perjury. Now, we are of opinion that all these facts might exist and yet the defendant might not be guilty of the crime charged in the indictment. The defendant might know or believe—for he could not know with certainty—that the witness whom he called would testify as she did, and he might know that her testimony would be false, but if he did not know that she would willfully testify to a fact knowing it to be false, he could not be convicted of the crime charged. If he did not know or believe that the witness intended to commit the crime of perjury, he could not be guilty of the crime of suborning her. To constitute perjury the witness must willfully testify falsely, knowing the testimony given to be false. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 69, § 2; Bac. Abr. 'Perjury,' A; 2 Russ. Crimes, 1753. A witness, by mistake or defect of memory, may testify untruly without being guilty of perjury or any other crime." Subornation of perjury is in its essence but a particular form of perjury itself. 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 1197. See, also, Whart. Prec. Ind. pp. 598, 599, forms c, d. See, also, form of indictment in Archb. Cr. Pl. & Ev. pp. 575, 577. See same form, 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 878; State v. Carland, 3 Dev. 114.

Tested by these authorities, both counts of the indictment are bad, first, because they do not aver that the defendants knew that the testimony which they instigated the witness to give was false, and second, because there is no averment that the defendants knew that the witness knew that the testimony she was instigated to give was false.

Demurrer sustained.

[NOTE. The defendants were, at the same term of the court, indicted for conspiracy with intent to defraud the United States. A demurrer to the indictment was overruled. See Case No. 14,948.]

CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD UNITED STATES—INDICTMENT—AVERMENT OF MEANS AGREED ON—OFFENCES.

on whereby the conspiracy was to be carried into effect.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Patterson, 55 Fed. 616.]

2. An indictment for conspiracy under section 5440, Rev. St., which avers the conspiracy and the overt acts done to carry it into effect, is sufficient without stating the means agreed on to accomplish the purpose of the conspiracy.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Patterson, 55 Fed. 616.]

3. Section 30 of the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 484], entitled "An act to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," which is embodied in the Revised Statutes as section 5440, prohibits a conspiracy to defraud the United States, not only by committing some one or more of the offenses described in other sections of the act, but in any manner whatever.

Heard on demurrer to the indictment. The indictment was found on the 6th day of June, 1876, and was predicated on section 30 of the act approved March 2, 1876, entitled "An act to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes." 14 Stat. 484. The section declares, "that if two or more persons conspire, either to commit any offense against the laws of the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of said parties to said conspiracy shall do any act to effect the object thereof, the parties to said conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars, and not more than ten thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not exceeding two years." This section is substantially embodied in the United States Revised Statutes as section 5440. The indictment charged that Harriet A. Mills, spinster, Samuel Gamage, yeoman, R. Stewart Dennee, lawyer, and others, naming them all, late of the said district of Louisiana, being persons of evil minds and dispositions, on the first day of March, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and seventy-four, at and within the state of Louisiana, and the district of Louisiana aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of said court, with force and arms, unlawfully and wickedly did conspire, combine, confederate and agree together and among themselves, and with Martha L. Knight, Joseph P. Murphy, * * * and divers other evil-disposed persons, whose names are as yet to the grand jurors unknown, unlawfully and fraudulently to defraud the United States of America of a large sum of money, to wit, forty thousand dollars lawful money of the United States, of the property and moneys of the United States. Then followed averments setting forth, with great particularity and precision, numerous overt acts of the defendants, or some of them, done to effect the object of the conspiracy. The overt acts charged were the prosecution, by suit against the United States in the court of claims, of a false, feigned and fraudulent claim by false and perjured testimony. The demurrer alleged that the indictment was not sufficient in law, and that defendants were not bound to answer the same.

John H. New, Asst. U. S. Atty.

Wm. H. Hunt, John Ray, and F. W. Baker, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. It is objected to the indictment, that it does not set out and aver the manner in which and the means whereby the object of the conspiracy charged was to be carried into effect, and that the averments setting out the overt acts, done in furtherance of the conspiracy, do not supply this defect. There is much conflict in the adjudged cases, on the point whether, in an indictment for conspiracy to cheat and defraud, it is necessary to aver the means agreed on to carry the conspiracy into effect. The affirmative of the proposition has been held in Massachusetts. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 111; Com. v. Eastman, 1 Cush. 189; Com. v. Shedd, 7 Cush. 514; Com. v. Wallace, 16 Gray, 221. It has also been so held in the following cases: State v. Parker, 43 N. H. 83; State v. Roberts, 34 Me. 320. In the case of Lambert v. People, 6 Cow. 578, the indictment being for a conspiracy to cheat and defraud, etc., without averring specifically the means to be used, the court for the trial of impeachments and errors was equally divided on the question whether the indictment was a good one or not. It was decided by the casting vote of the president, that it was defective, and the judgment of the supreme court sustaining it reversed. On the other hand, it is the settled English rule that the words "unlawfully, fraudulently and deceitfully did conspire, combine, confederate and agree together to cheat and defraud" one "of his goods and chattels," contain a sufficient allegation of conspiracy, without mention of any means intended. 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 200, and cases there cited. See, also, Rex v. Gill, 2 Barn. & Ald. 204; Rex v. Seward, 1 Adol. & E. 706. The same doctrine is held in the following American cases: People v. Richards, 1 Mich. 216; State v. Younger, 1 Dev. 357. A somewhat careful consideration of the authorities convinces me that the better reason is with those who deny the necessity of setting out the means by which the conspiracy was to be carried into effect. But it seems clear that the statute upon which this indictment is based was intended to relieve the pleader from any supposed necessity of setting out the means agreed upon to carry out the conspiracy, by requiring him to aver some act done in furtherance of the conspiracy, and making such act a necessary ingredient of the offense. In the case of Com. v. Shedd, 7 Cush. 514, the court said, that "the great difficulty in giving effect to the allegation of overt acts in an indictment for conspiracy on a motion in arrest of judgment for insufficiency of the indictment, is this, that overt acts are merely alleged by way of aggravation of the offense, and though alleged, they need not be proved, and the alleged conspiracy might be found by the jury without proof of the precise overt acts charged to have been done in pursuance of the conspiracy." That difficulty does not exist here, for the overt act is a part of the offense, and must be proved, as laid in the indictment. The reason given in the case just quoted from, why the averment of overt acts cannot have effect in the indictment for conspiracy, does not apply. In my opinion, therefore, this indictment which avers the conspiracy, and then sets out the overt acts done to carry it into effect, is sufficient, and it is not necessary to aver the means agreed on to effect the conspiracy. The averment of acts done to effect the object of the conspiracy, and which must be proven to sustain the indictment, is more than the equivalent of an averment of means agreed on to carry it into effect. This objection to the indictment is not well taken.

It is further objected to the sufficiency of the indictment, that the law upon which it is based is exclusively a revenue law, and intended only for the punishment of conspiracies to do certain things prohibited by the act itself. And it is urged that this is not a revenue case, as the overt acts charged are not prohibited by the body of the act, on the thirtieth section of which the indictment is based. In other words, it is claimed that because the act of March 2, 1867, supra, does not in terms forbid the prosecution of fraudulent suits against the United States in the court of claims, and the recovery of judgments and the receipt of money thereon by means of false and fraudulent claims, and perjured testimony, a conspiracy to commence and carry on to a final judgment such a suit, cannot be punished under section 30 of said act above quoted. This, it seems to me, is too narrow a reading of section 30. It denounces a conspiracy to defraud the United States, not simply by committing one or more of the offenses specified in the act, but to defraud the United States "in any manner whatever," or to commit any offense against the laws of the United States. The language of the section is too broad to be confined within the narrow range sought to be imposed upon it.

It is next said that it is not an indictable offense—to prosecute a suit in the court of claims—that the court to which the claim is submitted must pass upon its genuineness, and if held good, no other court can inquire into or re-examine the question thus passed upon, that the United States is a party defendant to the suit before the court of claims, has the right and opportunity to defend, and cannot, pending the decision of the question therein involved, or subsequent thereto, proceed criminally against the other parties to the cause in another court to punish them for prosecuting a false and fraudulent claim. Non constat, but the court of claims may decide the claim just.

The real question is, whether a conspiracy to prosecute a false and fraudulent claim against the United States, and to procure the evidence of false witnesses to support and maintain it, is a conspiracy to defraud the United States. If it is, it falls within the purview of the statute. If a witness gives a false deposition in a civil cause, he may be prosecuted therefor criminally, notwithstanding the fact that the court in the civil cause must pass upon the credibility of his testimony. And the fact that, on the strength of his false testimony the civil case has been decided, is no reason why the false witness should not be prosecuted for his crime. The successful issue of the perjury rather furnishes an additional reason for the criminal prosecution.

The position taken in support of the demurrer, amounts to this: that no fraud, no perjury, no subornation of perjury, employed to gain a civil cause can ever be punished, because to prosecute and punish the crime would be equivalent to a collateral re-examination of the cause tried and determined by another court. To state the proposition is to refute it.

It is further insisted that the offense charged is barred by the statute of limitations. The indictment was found June 6, 1876, and the offense is laid as of March 1, 1874. The section of the law on which the indictment is based has been held to constitute a part of the revenue laws of the United States (U. S. v. Rindskopf [Case No. 16,165]; U. S. v. Fehrenback [Id. 15,083]), and by section 1046, Revised Statutes, prosecutions for any crime arising under the revenue laws of the United States must be instituted within five years after the offense is committed. The original section on which the indictment is based, is embodied in a law devoted to the subject of the internal revenue, and it seems clear that a conspiracy to defraud the United States by withdrawing money from its treasury by a false and fraudulent claim, supported by false testimony, is an offense against the revenue laws of the United States. I do not understand that the term "revenue laws" is confined exclusively to laws providing for the collection of the revenues, but may extend to any provision of the laws on the subject of revenue, intended to protect the funds collected under those laws, or which in any other manner have lawfully been paid into the treasury. As the indictment was filed within five years after the date fixed as the time when the offense was committed, the prosecution is not, in my judgment, barred.

It is urged as a further objection to the indictment, that there is a fatal variance and repugnancy in the dates set out in the indictment. After a careful reading of the indictment, I am unable to find any impossible or repugnant dates. Demurrer overruled.

Case No. 14,949.

UNITED STATES v. DENNIS.

[1 Bond, 103.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1850.

RECOGNIZANCE—CERTAINTY—ACTION UPON—UNITED STATES MAIL.

1. A recognizance is sufficiently certain if it sets out an act punishable by the statute without any of the particulars.

2. Where an action of debt was brought on a recognizance, the condition of which was, that the defendant should appear "to answer to the charge of stealing from the mail of the United States, contrary to the statute of the United States, in such case made and provided:" Held, that the felonious or criminal character of the act was charged with sufficient certainty.

3. The mail of the United States embraces everything which may by law be transported or conveyed by post.

[This was an action by the United States against John J. Dennis.]

John O'Neill, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Lee & Fisher, for defendant.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is an action of debt on the recognizance of the defendant as bail for the appearance of Henry Fulkerth, who has been charged, before a commissioner of this court, with a violation of the mail of the United States, the said Fulkerth being a postmaster. The commissioner required the accused to give bail, and, in default thereof, he was committed to jail. He subsequently appeared before the district judge, and, on his application, was admitted to bail and discharged from custody. The defendant entered into a recognizance for the appearance of the accused person at the October term of this court. It is averred in the declaration that he failed to appear, and that the defendant was called and duly defaulted. A general demurrer has been filed to the declaration, and the exception relied on is, that the recognizance does not define or state any crime made punishable by an act of congress and of which this court has jurisdiction. The condition of the recognizance is, that the accused person shall appear at the then next term of the circuit court of the United States "to answer to the charge of stealing from the mail of the United States, contrary to the statute of the United States, in such case made and provided, and also such other charge or charges as may be exhibited against him." It is insisted that the allegations of "stealing from the mail of the United States, contrary to the statute," etc., are vague and indefinite, and do not import any specific crime for which the accused is to answer. The same certainty is not required in a recognizance that is required in an indictment; it is sufficient if it sets out an act punishable by the statute, without any of the particulars. It is very clear that a charge of stealing from the mail of the United States imports a crime without any statement of what was stolen. The mail of the United States embraces everything which may by law be transported or conveyed by post, and every unlawful taking from the mail of anything which constitutes a part of it is a crime. There is, therefore, no ground for a presumption that stealing anything, whether a mere letter or a letter containing money, or any paper or any other thing designated in the statute, can be an innocent act; it necessarily imports a crime. But when, as in this recognizance, it is added that such stealing was "contrary to the statute of the United States in such case made and provided," the felonious or criminal character of the act is charged with sufficient certainty. A case decided in Kentucky, reported in 3 J. J. Marsh. 641, has been cited by the defendant's counsel, where a recognizance for "gaming" was held bad by the court for uncertainty. That decision was right for the reason that gaming, as a general term, did not necessarily import a crime. It was only a crime when committed under the circumstances stated in the statute; under other circumstances it was perfectly innocent. It was necessary, therefore, to set out the game and the circumstances. If the charge had been "gaming contrary to the statutes of the state of Kentucky," it would have been good. But as before stated, no state of facts can be conceived of, in which stealing from the mail of the United States can be an innocent act—it implies a crime.

The demurrer will therefore be overruled.

UNITED STATES v. DE RODRIGUEZ et al.

[7 Sawy. 617.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Nov. 26, 1864.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—EXCEPTIONS TO SURVEY—BOUNDARIES.

[When the dividing line between two ranchos has been fixed in proceedings for the confirmation of one of them, to which the claimant of the other was a party, such line should not be disturbed on exceptions to the official survey of the latter rancho, when this would involve the issue of overlapping patents creating certain litigation, and a possible loss by the claimant of the former rancho of part of the land confirmed to him in such proceedings.]

[Claim by Maria Concepcion Valencia de Rodriguez and others to the Rancho San Francisquito, in Santa Clara county, granted May 1, 1839, by Juan B. Alvarado to Antonio

Buelna. The claim was confirmed by the commission November 28, 1854, by the district court February 4, 1856, and appeal dismissed April 2, 1857.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This case comes upon exceptions to the official survey filed on the part of the United States and on the part of the neighboring rancheros. To understand correctly the question raised, a brief review of the proceedings to obtain the grant, and those which resulted in the confirmation, is necessary.

The original petition of Buelna asked for the place called San Francisquito, "to the extent of eight suertes of two hundred varas square each, making sixteen hundred, according to the reglamento of colonization." The language of the decree of concession, and of the grant, is somewhat involved; but the land is clearly enough described as eight suertes of two hundred varas each, including the land lying between the Chemisal and the San Francisquito creek, and extending from the upper crossing of the road leading to the sierra to the road leading from Santa Clara to San Francisco, known as the "Middle Road."

The third condition describes the land granted as of the extent of two-thirds of a league, a little more or less. On the diseño attached to the expediente, the boundaries mentioned in the grant are clearly exhibited. On the north is the brook; running parallel with it, and at a short distance to the south, is the Chemisal. On the west is the road to the sierra, which crosses the brook, and on the east is the middle road. It would seem, however, that the grant was not intended to extend as far as this road, for a little to the west of it a line is drawn from the Chemisal to the brook marked "raya," indicating that it is the eastern boundary of the tract. On the corner of the diseño is a note, stating that the land is of the extent of eight suertes.

I have been unable to understand the meaning of the clause in the third condition, stating the land to be of the extent of two-thirds of a league. If the eight suertes asked for were to be each two hundred varas square, the total area of the tract would be three hundred and twenty thousand square varas. A square league is five thousand varas square, and its area is twenty-five million of varas.

Parol testimony was taken before the board of land commissioners to show that a juridical possession was given of the land by metes and bounds. No record of the act of possession was produced, but the board confirmed the claim according to the juridical possession, as sworn to by the witnesses. Its decree sets forth particularly the boundaries of the tract, and states the extent of land confirmed to be "two-thirds of a league, a little more or less." This decree was affirmed on appeal to this court, the United States offering no opposition. The tract thus described extends to a considerable distance to the south of the Chemisal, between which and the San Francisquito creek both the decree of concession and the grant describe the land as situated. It also extends to the eastward beyond the line marked "raya," which the diseño designates as a boundary in that direction. In the official survey, the calls of the decree seem to have been wholly disregarded, as also the indication of the map, which the claimants themselves presented to the board as a correct survey of the tract of which judicial possession was given. The most that the claimants can ask for is that the boundaries called for in the decree be followed. I cannot perceive, therefore, how the official survey can be sustained.

It is objected, however, on the part of the owners of the adjoining rancho, confirmed to the heirs of Mesa, that the dividing line between the ranchos has already been fixed in a proceeding to which the present claimant was a party, and that that line must be adopted in fixing the boundaries of the claimant's land, notwithstanding that it is a different line from that described in his decree of confirmation. It appears that when the Mesa Rancho was surveyed, objections to the survey were filed, and the proceedings required by the act of 1860 [12 Stat. 33] were taken. The owners of the Rodriguez Rancho intervened, and were heard, and the court, after due deliberation, located the Mesa Rancho as appeared to be just under the decree of confirmation and the evidence in the case.

On the part of the owners of the Mesa Rancho, it is contended that the location of the common boundary between the ranchos has thus become res adjudicata, not only as against the United States, but as against the owners of the Rodriguez Rancho, who were parties to the proceeding, and who might have appealed if dissatisfied with the decree; that the object and effect of the proceedings under the law of 1860 were to settle disputes of this nature between contiguous proprietors; and that, inasmuch as the Mesa Rancho has been finally located, the Rodriguez Rancho cannot be made to include a part of the same land, unless overlapping patents be issued, which is never done by the United States.

On the part of the present claimants, it is urged that the final decree obtained by them gives a definite location to their land; that it describes the boundaries clearly and specifically; that it in terms adopts the judicial measurement testified to in the cause; that their rights are thus fixed and determined by the decree; and that the power of the court, under the act of 1860, is limited to an inquiry, whether the survey is in accordance with the terms of the decree.

It is also urged that the intervention in the case of Mesa had for its object to prevent the boundaries of that rancho from being so fixed as to include any portion of the land already confirmed to the claimants, and thus to avoid future dispute and litigation; that although this object was not attained, yet that their own rights under their decree were not waived by them; that the adjudication in that suit only fixed the boundaries of the Mesa Rancho—it did not, and could not, affect the boundaries of the Rodriguez Rancho, already established by the decree of confirmation, and which was not then before the court; and that they are now entitled to have their land surveyed as described in their final decree of confirmation, notwithstanding that they include lands already embraced in the Mesa survey.

It will be perceived that the question thus presented is difficult and important.

Since the argument of this cause, the opinion of the supreme court in the Case of Fossat [2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 649] has been received. Before proceeding to inquire how far the decision in that case disposes of the questions raised in the case at bar, I deem it due to myself to correct some misapprehensions, as to matters of fact, into which both the counsel who argued the cause and the supreme court appear to have fallen.

The opinion, after detailing the previous history of the cause up to the time when the survey was ordered into this court, under the provisions of the act of 1860, states that the district court entered an order reforming the survey as to the eastern line. "This direction," the court observes, "not only reformed the survey of the tract, as made by the surveyor general, but reformed the decree itself of the court, entered on the eighteenth of October, 1858, in pursuance of which the survey had been made. The court assumed that the survey and location of the tract were not to be governed by the decree, but on the contrary, that it was open to the court to revise, alter, and change it at discretion, and to require the surveyor general to conform his survey and location to any new or amended decree—for certainly if it was competent to change the eastern line from that settled in the decree, it was equally competent for it to change every other line or boundary as there described and fixed."

"Now it must be remembered that this decree of the district court, designating with great exactness this eastern line—with such exactness that the surveyor general had no difficulty in its location—was entered in pursuance of and in accordance with the mandate of this court, and by which that court was instructed, at the time of the dismissal of the appeal, that the three external lines declared in it were in conformity with the opinion of this court, and that the other line—the north line—only remained to be completed by a survey to be made, and that this line was to be governed by quantity, which quantity had been previously determined."

"This radical change, therefore, of the eastern line of the tract, involves something more than a change by the court of its own decree; it is the change of a decree, entered in conformity with the mandate of this court."

If it be true, as here stated, that a subordinate judge has not only radically changed his own decree, without color of authority, but that the decree so changed was one "in conformity with the opinion" of the superior tribunal, his action would deserve stronger language of censure than the supreme court has used.

I shall show, however: (1) That no decision as to the eastern line of the Fossat claim was ever made by this court until its last decree in the proceedings had under the act of 1860; that the questions in regard to the location of that line were never until then argued or submitted to the decision of the court; and, further, that under the rulings of the supreme court, this court had, prior to the act of 1860, no jurisdiction to locate and establish that line. (2) That this court had no reason to suspect that any supposed decision with regard to that line had been affirmed, or in any way passed upon by the supreme court; that when the location of the eastern line was, in a proceeding taken under the act of 1860, for the first time submitted to this court, it was not suggested by any of the counsel that the supreme court had affirmed or expressed any opinion whatever upon the correctness of the location of even the southern line, which had been argued and decided by this court, still less upon the location of the eastern line, which had not been argued, and which, it was universally conceded, could not be determined in a proceeding to which the adjoining owner was not a party. (3) That even if the location of the eastern line had been determined by this court, and if that determination had been affirmed by the supreme court, there were good reasons for believing that, under the act of 1860, it was the duty of the court, on the intervention of Berreyesa, then for the first time heard in the cause, to determine the line according to justice and right, and irrespective of any decree obtained by either party in a proceeding between himself and the United States.

I. By the act of March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631], the board of commissioners and the courts on appeal were empowered to decide only upon "the validity" of land claims. This act differed from the laws of 1824 [4 Stat. 52] and 1828 [Id. 292] in withholding the power, conferred by those acts on the courts, of deciding "all matters relative to the extent, locality and boundaries" of the claims. The controversy was strictly limited to the United States and the claimants, and third persons were not permitted to intervene. But the law provided that their rights should not be affected by the decree or patents under them. The duty of locating finally confirmed land claims, was confided to the surveyor-general; and with respect to interfering or conflicting claims, he was authorized to decide in the first instance, leaving to the parties interested the right of recourse to the ordinary tribunals.

That such was the true construction and effect of the law was explicitly decided by the supreme court. In U. S. v. Fossat, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 413, certain adversary claimants had been permitted to appear, and adduce evidence in the name of the United States. The supreme court says:

"It is the opinion of the court that the intervention of adversary claimants, in the suit of a petitioner under the act of 1851, for the confirmation of his claim to land in California, is a practice not to be encouraged. The board of commissioners was instituted by congress to obtain a prompt decision on the validity of private land claims, to enable the government to distinguish the public lands from that which had been severed from the public domain by Mexico; and that it might fulfil the obligation assumed at the time of the cession of California, to secure and protect the property of its inhabitants.

"The jurisdiction of the board of commissioners in the first instance, and the appellate jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, is limited to the making of decisions on the validity of the claim, preliminary to its location and survey by the surveyor general of California, acting under the laws of the United States. This officer is required to survey and furnish plats of the claim that may be confirmed.

"In reference to interfering or conflicting claims, he is authorized to decide by adopting the lines agreed to by the claimants, and in the absence of an agreement to follow the rules of justice.

"The acts of congress provide that neither the decisions of the commissioners, nor of the district or supreme courts, nor of the surveyor general, shall preclude a legal investigation and decision by the proper judicial tribunal between parties having such interfering claims, * * * and a patent under the act is only conclusive between the United States and the claimant, and does not affect third parties. The language and policy of these enactments limit a controversy like the present to the United States and the claimants." 20 How. [61 U. S.] 424.

This decision, though made subsequently to the first decree of this court, in the Fossat Case, merely affirmed the correctness of the construction previously given by the board, the court, and the bar, to the provisions of the statute.

When, therefore, the Case of Fossat was presented, it was contended by the district attorney that the court had no authority whatever to fix any of the boundaries of the tract, not even those between it and the public land, but that all questions of boundary and location must be determined by the surveyor general. It was considered, however, by the court, that an inquiry into the validity of a claim necessarily involved, to a certain extent, inquiries into its location and extent, and that when a question arose between the United States and the claimant, as to the identity of a natural object called for in the grant, and which formed the boundary between the land granted and the public land, it was the duty of the court to hear and determine the dispute. The correctness of this view was explicitly affirmed at a subsequent stage of the cause by the supreme court. U. S. v. Fossat, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 449.

But, with regard to the dividing lines between the claimant and a neighbor, when the controversy related to lands admitted to belong to one or the other, and therefore private, it was universally conceded that the court had no jurisdiction to determine it, especially as the adjoining owner had no right to intervene in the suit, and no decision of the disputed boundary could affect his rights. The evidence and arguments in the cause were, therefore, exclusively directed to the question raised with regard to the southern boundary.

The location of the eastern line was not disputed or discussed, nor was any question respecting it submitted to the court. So, as far as the record disclosed, there was nothing to show that the location of that line was in controversy.

The court was aware, however, that with regard to that line a dispute in fact existed. This dispute was understood to arise from a supposed repugnancy between the description of the line contained in the grants and the delineation of it on the diseño of Berreyesa.

The decree of the court, therefore, after determining the southern boundary, describes the eastern line in the language of the grants, but it especially refers to and adopts the dotted line marked on the diseño of Berreyesa, as indicating the boundary between the ranchos. And it was supposed that by these means all questions between the claimants, under Larios and Berreyesa, would be left open and undecided. Such, even yet, appears to me to be the fair construction of the decree.

The case having been appealed, the decree of this court was reversed on points hereafter to be referred to, and the cause was remanded to this court with instructions "to declare the three external boundaries designated in the grant, from the evidence on file and additional evidence to be taken." It is in the opinion then delivered by the supreme court, that the declarations above cited, with regard to the jurisdiction of the court and the determination by the surveyor-general of lines between conflicting and interfering claims, are found. Any doubt which this court might have entertained as to its authority to determine, in the absence of Berreyesa, the disputed line between the ranchos, was dissipated by the very explicit language of the supreme court.

On the return of the cause, further evidence was taken, and counsel were heard. The location of the eastern was, as before, not debated, and the arguments related solely to the location of the southern line. The court, in its decree, reaffirmed its previous decision with regard to that line. The eastern line was described as before, in the language of the grants, and the dotted line on the diseño was again carefully referred to and adopted, as indicating the boundary between the ranchos. An appeal having been taken from this decree, it was held by the supreme court that the decree was interlocutory, and not final; that the northern line, which was merely described as a line to be run for quantity, should have been fixed upon the ground by a survey. The appeal was therefore dismissed.

The cause having been remanded to this court, no further proceedings in it were had until after the passage of the act of 1860, when the counsel for the claimant moved for and obtained an order directing the surveyor to survey the tract, and to give notice according to the provisions of that act, of the approval of the plat and survey. This was done, and the survey was ordered into court on the application of the Berreyesas, who thus for the first time became parties to the cause. Their own rancho had also been surveyed, and the same dividing line adopted by the surveyor as in the Fossat survey. This survey was also on their application ordered into court, and the Quicksilver Mining Company, claiming under Larios, and the New Almaden Company, intervened and became parties to the proceeding. All parties being thus before the court, evidence was taken and argument heard relative to the location of the eastern line. The location of that line was then for the first time decided by the court.

It was not suggested by any of the counsel that this question had ever before been submitted to or passed upon by the court. They knew the fact to be otherwise. Nor was it contended that the language of any previous decree in the suit of Fossat v. U. S. imported a decision of the question. It was not, to my recollection, hinted by any one, nor did the idea occur to the court, that any decision of this court supposed to determine that line had in any way been affirmed, or even considered, by the supreme court. The question was on all sides treated as still open and undecided, and this court proceeded to determine it, without the remotest suspicion that its action was irregular or unauthorized. Its determination, though then for the first time judicially declared, was in accordance with the opinion it had entertained from the time when, in an ejectment suit brought long before in the circuit court, the counsel for the New Almaden Company had contended for the location of the eastern line, as claimed by the representatives of Larios.

That opinion has been adjudged by the supreme court to be erroneous; but as this court has been supposed to have not only departed from its decrees, but to have changed its opinions, I shall be pardoned, I trust, for stating, with all deference to the superior judgment of the appellate tribunal, that notwithstanding all that has been said, I am still unable to discover the error of the final decision of this court by which the line between the ranchos was determined. I believe that the history and nature of the dispute between the grantees, their evident and necessary object in fixing upon the line, and, above all, the plain and palpable delineation of it upon the diseño, unmistakably show the intention and understanding of the parties; that to this evidence, the words of the grants, which are very obscure, and which were intended to describe a line already agreed upon by the parties, and delineated on the diseño as a substitute for an actual marking on the ground, ought to yield; that to carry out the principal and controlling intention of the parties, either the call in the grants for the "falda," or that for "a straight line," must be sacrificed—which of them, was practically immaterial, for they were both or equal dignity; but both were, in my judgment, subordinate to the mute but visible call of the diseño, which showed how the line was to be drawn, where it was to strike the sierra, and how the valley was to be divided between the disputants.

On these grounds I believe that Castillero, who denounced the mine, Pico, the alcalde, Berreyesa himself, and, so far as we know, the neighbors and contemporaneous inhabitants of the country, were not all mistaken, when without doubt or dispute they asserted the recently discovered quicksilver mine to be "on the lands of the retired sergeant Jose Reyes Berreyesa."

But whatever may be thought of the correctness of these views, it is certain that the location of the eastern line was never adjudicated by this court until its last decree was made, and that in that adjudication, whether erroneous or not, it did not revise, or change, or alter, as has been supposed by the supreme court, any previous decision of its own, with respect to the location of that line.

II. I shall not show that this court had no reason to suspect that any decree supposed to determine that line had ever been affirmed by, or declared to be in conformity with, "the opinion of the supreme court."

The first decree of this court confirmed the title of the claimant to the easterly portion of the valley described in his petition as the Canada de los Capitancillos. This valley is on the north and south bounded by parallel ranges of hills, and the tract confirmed was limited on the west by the Arroyo Seco, and on the east by the line agreed on between Larios and Berreyesa, the latter of whom had obtained a grant for the easterly portion of the valley.

The third condition of the grant declared the land to be of the "extent of one square league, a little more or less (poco mas o menos), as explained by the map accompanying the expediente."

In the grant, only three boundaries were mentioned, viz. the southern, the western, and the eastern. But the diseño to which the grant referred plainly represented the range of hills which formed the northern limit of the valley, while the designation in the petition of the land solicited as the valley of the Capitancillos and the situation of the petitioner's house, seemed to indicate unmistakably that the tract asked for and granted was the canada or valley extending from the Arroyo Seco on the west to the land of Berreyesa on the east.

On the argument, the only disputed boundary was the southern. It was claimed by the United States and the counsel for the New Almaden Company, that the "sierra" called for in the grant was the base of a range of foot-hills, or "lomas bajas;" while the claimant contended, that by that term the chain of high mountains behind and parallel to the "lomas" was evidently referred to. The court adopted the latter view.

There was, therefore, confirmed to the claimant the valley lying between the sierra on the south and the pueblo hills on the north—and extending from the Arroyo Seco to the agreed line of division between the ranchos. Its extent was, as the grant declared, a little more than one square league; but how much more could not be ascertained until the dispute with Berreyesa, in regard to the dividing line, should be finally settled.

This decree was reversed by the supreme court on appeal. It was held by that court, that, as only three boundaries were mentioned in the grant, there "was no other criterion for determining the fourth, or northern boundary, than the limitation of the quantity as expressed in the third condition." The words "poco mas o menos" were rejected, as "having no meaning in a system of survey and location like that of the United States," and the court observed: "If the limitation of the quantity had not been so explicitly declared, it might have been proper to refer to the petition and diseño, or to have inquired if the name 'Capitancillos' had any significance as connected with the limits of the tract." The grant to Larios was therefore declared to be "for one league of land, to be taken within the southern, western, and eastern boundaries designated therein, and to be located at the election of the grantee, or his assigns, under the restrictions established for the location and survey of private land claims in California by the executive department of this government."

The district court was directed "to declare the external boundaries designated in the grant, from the evidence on file, and such other evidence as may be produced before it." [U. S. v. Fossat] 20 How. [61 U. S.] 427.

It will not, I presume, be contended that this opinion, or the mandate in pursuance of it, in any respect constituted an affirmance of the decision of this court with regard to boundaries.

The location of the southern boundary, which was the principal question discussed in the court below, is not alluded to; no intimation is given whether, in the opinion of the supreme court, the "sierra" mentioned in the grant was the range of low hills or the mountain chain behind it, and the cause is remanded, with direction to this court to declare the three boundaries mentioned in the grant from the evidence on file, and such other evidence as may be produced, clearly showing that the supreme court intended to keep the question as to the location of those boundaries open and undecided, and that they supposed it might be elucidated by further testimony.

On the return of the cause, further testimony was taken, and the location of the southern boundary reargued. This court reaffirmed its previous judgment with respect to that line, and after describing, as has been stated, the eastern line in the language of the grants, with a reference to and adoption of the dotted line on the Berreyesa diseño, directed, in the very language of the supreme court, the northern line to be run for quantity "at the election of the grantee or his assigns, under the restrictions established for the location and survey of private land claims in California by the executive department of this government."

It is evident that no more precise decree could have been made without an actual survey, which it had not, up to that time, been supposed this court had power to order, nor could a final survey have been made at that stage of the cause, for the northern line being required to be run for quantity, it obviously could not be run until all the other lines were established, and no establishment of the eastern line or disputed boundary between Larios and Berreyesa could be made in a proceeding wherein, by the express decision of the supreme court, the latter was not permitted to intervene, and the decree in which could have no effect upon his rights.

It will also be observed that the refusal of the supreme court to recognize the natural boundary of the valley on the north, as the northern limit of the tract, and the direction to this court to locate the league "within" the three other boundaries, and to run the northern line for quantity, at the election of the grantee, necessarily compelled this court to locate the grant, in great part, among the hills toward the south.

If, then, there be in the final survey the anomaly of locating a grant for a valley among the mountains, excluding the valley solicited, it has been the direct and inevitable result of the instructions given to this court by its superior.

From the second decree of this court, an appeal was again taken, and a decision as to the disputed southern line was on all hands confidently expected.

That expectation was not fulfilled. When the cause came up, a doubt was suggested by the chief justice, "whether there had been a final decision by the district court under the mandate, and whether the appeal ought not to be dismissed on that ground."

On this suggestion a motion to dismiss was made and argued.

The merits of the case do not appear to have been alluded to in the argument of the counsel. They certainly are not referred to in the opinion of the court.

It was decided that the decree appealed from was not a final decree, and the appeal was dismissed.

In the opinion, the court, after reciting its previous direction to this court to declare the external boundaries designated in the grant, from the evidence on file, and such further evidence as might be produced, says: "The district court, in conformity with the directions of the decree, declared the external lines on the sides of the tract, leaving the other line to be completed by a survey to be made. From the decree in this form the United States have appealed. A motion has been submitted to the court for the dismissal of the appeal, because the decree was interlocutory, and not final." [U. S. v. Fossat] 21 How. [62 U. S.] 447.

This statement of the action of this court is in all respects accurate. I am to this day unable to perceive what else, or what more this court could have done under the mandate and under the law as it had been up to that time expounded by the supreme court.

But I must be permitted to express my profound astonishment at discovering that this simple sentence, which states the action of this court under the previous mandate, has been considered as amounting to an affirmance by the supreme court of the correctness of the location, not only of the southern line, which had been discussed and decided, but also of that of the eastern line, which had never been argued, which was an interfering claim, declared by the supreme court, to be left by law to the decision of the surveyor general, and which it seemed repugnant to reason and justice to decide finally, in any controversy to which Berreyesa was not and could not be a party.

But, even with respect to the southern line, it was not for a moment suspected by this court, nor was it even suggested by counsel, that the supreme court, on a preliminary motion to dismiss an appeal, without hearing argument on the merits, without alluding to the grave and difficult question involved, meant, at the moment it was deciding the decree appealed from to be interlocutory and not final, and thus, in effect, declaring itself without jurisdiction, to finally pass upon and determine every question involved in the case.

That such was its intention I am bound to conclude from its recent opinion. On that supposition alone can the observation above cited, that "the change of the eastern line by this court involves something more than a change by that court of its own decree—it is the change of a decree in conformity with the mandate of this court,"—be accounted for.

I have thus, I believe, established beyond all doubt or controversy, that if this court has changed a decree, the correctness of which had been affirmed by the superior tribunal, it has done so unintentionally and unconsciously—and under circumstances which did not suggest nor could they reasonably have suggested to either court or counsel the construction which has since been given to the opinion and mandate of the supreme court.

III. I shall now show that if the eastern line had been fixed by this court, and even if that decision had been affirmed by the supreme court in a suit between Fossat and the United States, there were good grounds for believing that when, under the provisions of the act of 1860, Berreyesa, for the first time, became a party to the cause, and when under the same act his own rancho was before the court for location, in which proceeding the claimants under Justo Larios intervened, it was the right and duty of the court to determine in both suits the true location of the dividing line between the ranchos, irrespective of any decree obtained by either claimant in a suit to which his neighbor was not a party.

To fully understand the question here presented, a precise notion must be obtained of the circumstances which led to the passage of the law of 1860.

It has already been stated that the supreme court dismissed the appeal from the second decree of this court on the ground that it was interlocutory, and not final. It was held that all the boundaries of the tract should have been ascertained and established by a survey, and a decree of confirmation entered for the tract surveyed.

In answer to the objection that the district court had no means of ascertaining the boundaries by a survey, or compelling the surveyor to execute its decree, that court declared that the district court had power to enforce the fulfilment by the surveyor of its decree, and added that "the power of the district court over the cause does not terminate until the issue of a patent conformably to its decree." [U. S. v. Fossat] 21 How. [62 U. S.] 451.

The decision was received here with surprise, but with great satisfaction. The authority thus attributed to this court was immediately invoked, and application was made in many cases for orders to the surveyor general to return into this court, for reform and correction, surveys alleged to be erroneous.

Before exercising this jurisdiction the court heard an argument, in which most of the members of the bar concerned in land cases participated, as to the true construction and effect of the decision of the supreme court and the practice to be adopted under it. The views of the bar were various and conflicting. It was held, however, by the court, that the decision in question in effect overruled the previous decisions of the supreme court, which had declared the jurisdiction of the court to be "limited to making decisions upon the validity of land claims preliminary to their location and survey by the surveyor general," and that henceforth the court must assume the duty of correcting and reforming all surveys made under its decrees, when alleged to be erroneous.

This construction of its decision was recognized by the supreme court as correct in subsequent cases.

"In the case of U. S. v. Fossat, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 445, this court had occasion to refer to the limits of the authority of the courts of the United States under the act of March 3, 1851, above cited. We stated in that case that if questions of a judicial nature arose in the settlement of the location and boundary of grants confirmed to individuals, the district court was empowered to settle those questions upon a proper case being submitted to it before the issue of a patent, and in such case the judgment may properly be extended to the confirmation of the survey, and an order for the patent to issue." Castro v. Hendricks, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 442.

In the case of U. S. v. Berreyesa's Heirs, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 500, the supreme court says: "The appellees have requested the court to give instructions relative to the location and survey of this grant, similar to those found in the case of U. S. v. Fossat, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 425. But no question was decided in the court below upon the location of the lines of the tract, and it would be irregular for this court to assume that the action of that court will not conform to the established rules on the subject. The decree of the district court has not been called in question by the appellees; and should any difficulty arise in the location of the grant, it will be competent for the appellees to invoke the aid of that court."

This court having announced that it would exercise the new jurisdiction attributed to it, numerous surveys were ordered before it for revision and correction. The means thus offered of obtaining a judicial determination of the many difficult and important questions relative to the location of grants which had arisen were eagerly seized on by both the representatives of the United States and of the claimants, for it substituted an inquiry in court, where witnesses could be summoned, examined and cross-examined, where counsel could be heard and a decision rendered, the grounds of which were exposed in an opinion, and from which an appeal could be taken to the supreme court, for the quasi trial before the surveyor general, and for the still more unsatisfactory examination by an officer in Washington on ex parte affidavits, the contents of which, and even the fact that they had been forwarded, might be unknown to the party against whom they were taken.

But in the discharge of the duty thus imposed upon the court, great embarrassment was experienced. The supreme court had declared that the contest was limited to the United States and the claimants, and that third parties had no right to intervene. But it was obvious that the parties immediately affected by an erroneous location would often be colindantes or adjoining owners, between whom and the claimant a common boundary line was to be run, or purchasers from the original grantee of lands within the exterior boundaries, which might have been erroneously excluded from the survey, or grantees of the sobrante or excess within the exterior boundaries, who had a clear right to be heard as to the location of the first grant.

The United States, also, had an evident interest in requiring the dividing lines between the ranchos to be determined before the establishment of the lines to be run for quantity. For how could the latter be fixed while the former remained uncertain?

Although the court had power to hear and determine objections to surveys, no time was limited within which objections were to be made, except that it must be before the issue of a patent; nor were any means prescribed for giving notice to parties interested that a survey had been completed and approved by the surveyor-general. A survey, therefore, might be made, approved, transmitted to Washington, and a patent issued before, as was alleged to have happened in some cases; persons affected by it, and who would have objected to it, were apprised of the fact. Further legislation thus seemed to be indispensable. The law of 1860 was, therefore, recommended and passed, not to confer a new jurisdiction on the district courts, but, as its title imports, to define and regulate the jurisdiction the supreme court had already decided them to possess.

It provided in substance for a notice, by publication, of the approval of surveys by the surveyor general. It limited the time within which objections were to be taken. It permitted all parties interested to intervene and be heard, and it assigned a limited period (six months) for taking an appeal from the decisions of the district courts. These are similar provisions, I believe, to have been indispensably necessary for the proper discharge by the district courts of the duties imposed upon them by the decision in U. S. v. Fossat

I believe, also, that the law has been found, in practice, salutary and beneficial, and has been so regarded, almost universally, by the parties affected by it or acquainted with its operation; and that the difficult and most important questions raised, with respect to the location of land claims, have been settled under it more justly and satisfactorily to all parties than, making due allowance for the errors of a court not claiming to be infallible, was practicable under any other system.

It has recently been said, on very high authority, that the questions submitted by this law to the courts "involve the consideration of various matters not properly the subject of judicial inquiry," and that "it creates a new and anomalous jurisdiction in the court, which cannot be assumed independent of the act, and under it should be exercised only the cases coming clearly within its language."

I have already shown that the jurisdiction was declared by the supreme court substantially to exist, independently of and prior to the passage of the law of 1860, and that the act was passed to enable the district courts to carry out and give effect to the decision of the supreme court. That the jurisdiction conferred was not new or anomalous I shall now proceed to show

By the provisions of the act of May 26, 1824, relative to land claims in territory acquired under the Louisiana purchase, which provisions were, by the act of May 23, 1828, made applicable to land claims in Florida, the courts were charged with a double duty: (1) That of determining all questions arising in the cause, relative to the title of the claimant; and (2) all questions relative to the "extent, locality, and boundaries of the claim."

In defining the duties of the court under these acts, Mr. Justice Catron says: "First, the paper title to such private property it is our duty to investigate and ascertain, and by our decision to establish; and, secondly, it is our duty to ascertain and cause to be surveyed and marked by definite boundaries the lands granted." U. S. v. Forbes, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 182.

In the case of U. S. v. Lawton, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 28, the same justice holds substantially the same language.

Under the act of May 26, 1824, the proceedings were conducted according to the rules of a court of equity. All parties interested, or claimed to be interested, were brought before the court; process was served as in other cases, and the court had power to decide finally all questions and matters arising in the cause. U. S. v. Moore, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 223.

Under the act of March 3, 1851, the jurisdiction of the courts is limited to the making of decisions on the validity of the title; process is not issued, nor are all parties in interest brought in, or permitted to intervene.

The survey and location of claims, which have been confirmed, are committed to the surveyor, who is even invested with a quasi judicial authority to decide upon conflicting or interfering claims.

But the decrees of the courts and surveys of the surveyor general, under the act of 1851, unlike the decrees and locations under the act of 1824, are conclusive only upon the United States and the claimants, and do not bind third parties. U. S. v. Fossat, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 425.

When, therefore, the supreme court, overruling its previous decision, attributed to this court jurisdiction, and made it its duty to fix the boundaries of the claim confirmed by an actual survey made under its direction, and declared that without such a survey the decree was not final, and that the jurisdiction of this court over the cause continued until the issue of a patent ([U. S. v. Fossat] 21 How. [62 U. S.] 450); and, when congress, by the law of 1860, regulated and provided for the exercise of this jurisdiction by authorizing the courts to review and correct the surveys of the surveyor general, after admitting all persons interested to become parties to the proceedings, the law, instead of being anomalous and exceptional, merely supplied a defect in the act of 1851, and brought the legislation, with regard to California land claims, into harmony with the previous legislation of congress in similar cases.

The defect of the law of 1851 consisted in giving to the courts jurisdiction to decide only upon the validity of claims, while questions of boundary and location were left to the decision of the surveyor-general. It thus attempted to separate, and subject to different modes of determination, inquiries in their nature almost inseparable.

The inquiry the courts were authorized to make, was only whether the claim was valid, as against the United States, and all inconvenience or injustice which might arise from the exclusion of third parties was supposed to be obviated by providing the decrees and patents should not affect their rights.

The supreme court, in its first decision in the Fossat Case, distinctly traced, as we have seen, the line of discrimination between the duties of the courts and those of the surveyor general. But even then it was apparent, and when the case came up again it was expressly recognized, that the inquiry into "validity" necessarily involved "questions of extent, quantity, location, and boundary, essential to be determined before even the 'validity' of the claim could be decided." The distribution of powers, contemplated by the statute, was thus found to be impracticable, and the line of discrimination between the duties of the surveyor general and those of the courts became obscure and undefined. Had the grants in California been for tracts bounded by natural limits, it might have been sufficient to determine the validity of the claim and establish its boundaries where it adjoined public land, leaving the boundary lines between the claimant and his neighbors to be settled by a litigation inter partes.

But when the grants are for quantity, and the lines between the claimant's and the public land have to be drawn so as to include a certain area, it is obvious that no final, or at least no just, settlement of any of the boundaries can be made until the lines between the claimant and his neighbors are fixed. When, therefore, in its second opinion in the Fossat Case, the supreme court directed this court to cause the northern line, which was to be run for quantity, to be surveyed upon the ground, it is apparent that this direction could not have been complied with until the eastern line was located either finally or provisionally.

But that line was in dispute, and certainly no final determination of it could be made in a suit between the United States and Fossat, to which Berreyesa was a stranger.

But if it were merely fixed provisionally, and its final location still remained subject to future determination, to what end run other lines upon the ground, which depended upon and should be varied according to the future location of the eastern line?

I have referred more especially to the Case of Fossat, because its circumstances are well known; but similar difficulties were presented in every case where the court was asked to inquire into surveys which pretended to fix external lines required to be run for quantity, while the dividing lines between the claimant and his neighbors remain unsettled. The law of 1860 removed these difficulties, by enabling the neighbors to be heard and become parties. It supplied the omissions of the law of 1851, and gave to the court the jurisdiction, which they should have possessed from the beginning, to inquire and decide, as under the laws of 1824 and 1828, all questions of location and boundary, after first admitting as parties all persons interested. Why the questions thus submitted to the courts are less fit subjects for judicial inquiry than similar questions of disputed boundary, daily litigated in ejectment suits, I have been unable to perceive.

If all questions of location and boundary are to be left to the decision of executive officers, as well might we declare that the duty of the ordinary tribunals, in appropriate cases, is merely to pass upon the issues raised by pleas of non est factum, or devisavit vel non, but that all questions as to the construction and operation of the deed, or will, are to be decided by the marshal or the sheriff. The Case of Fossat, alone, would seem sufficient to apprise us, that a question of boundary involving such immense interests, to elucidate which volumes of depositions have been taken, and in which the briefs of counsel occupy hundreds of printed pages, is not in its own nature proper to be passed upon by merely executive officers, without hearing the testimony of witnesses, the arguments of counsel, or using the other means of arriving at truth available in courts of justice.

The law of 1860 has been repealed. This court is thus relieved of what has hitherto been the most difficult, and the least grateful part of its duties. But as I was personally instrumental in procuring its passage, and as its wisdom and policy have been in high quarters doubted or assailed, I have thought it not improper to avail myself of this occasion to explain the grounds upon which it was recommended and believed to be necessary and beneficial.

The dismissal of the appeal from the second decree of this court, in the Case of Fossat, occasioned some embarrassment to the court and the counsel for the claimant. The supreme court had, in effect, decided that the decree was not final, because no survey of the land had been made. See last opinion of the supreme court in U. S. v. Fossat. The law of 1851, authorized the surveyor general to survey those lands only the claims to which had been finally confirmed. It thus seemed that there could be no final decree without a survey, and no survey without a final decree. The law of 1860 relieved the counsel for the claimant from this dilemma. He accordingly moved for and obtained an order, directing the surveyor general to survey the tract confirmed to Fossat, and on the approval by him of the plat and survey thereof, to give notice of such approval, as required by the act of congress approved June 14, 1860.

No opposition was made to the granting of this motion. The order appears to have been entered on the day the motion was made. The original is on file, signed by the judge, but drawn by and in the handwriting of the counsel for the claimant. Under this order a survey was made, and having been returned into this court at the instance of the New Almaden Company, the heirs of Berreyesa intervened, objected to the survey, and for the first time became parties to the controversy. The New Almaden Company also intervened and objected to the survey, and the parties proceeded to take testimony for and against it.

The Berreyesas having obtained a final confirmation, their rancho had been surveyed; and this survey, which adopted the same boundary line between the ranchos as that assumed in the Fossat survey, was also ordered into court on the application of the Berreyesas, in whose behalf exceptions are filed.

In this proceeding, the New Almaden Company, claiming under Castillero, and the Quicksilver Mining Company, claiming under Fossat, intervened and became parties. All parties being thus before the court, in each of the two suits, it proceeded to hear evidence and argument, and to decide upon the disputed line between the ranchos. It was not pretended by the counsel who before this court represented Fossat, that the controversy had ever been decided by this court on its merits. It was not by any one suggested, or suspected by the court, that the supreme court had, on a motion to dismiss an appeal on the ground it was taken from a decree not final, but interlocutory, meant to affirm, or any way to pass upon the correctness of the decree appealed from.

This court, thereupon, after full argument and deliberation, determined, by a decision applicable to both cases, the common line of division between the ranchos. But even if the original decree, entered when Fossat and the United States alone were parties, had assumed to determine the boundary line between the ranchos, and if that decree had been affirmed, I should not have hesitated, when the surveys of both ranchos came up for approval, to determine their common line of division as might under the evidence then adduced have appeared to be just, and irrespective of any decree obtained by either disputant in the absence of his adversary. And this for the following reasons:

1. The first decree of this court had been reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to declare the boundaries mentioned in the grant within which the league of Larios was to be taken. This the court had done, and expressed its decision in a decree. That decree the supreme court had declared to be interlocutory, and not final. For that reason alone the appeal had been dismissed, and this court had been directed to cause a survey to be made, which when approved and embodied in its decree, would impart to it finality. The survey in the Fossat Case had thus been made under a decree, which, by the positive declaration of the supreme court, was not a final, but merely an interlocutory decree. As such it was open to revision, until the court, by approving and adopting a survey, had made what the supreme court had declared would alone constitute a final decree in the cause.

2. It could not be pretended that the location of the dividing line was in any respect determined by the decree in the Berreyesa Case; for that decree merely described his land as "adjoining that of Justo Larios, with the boundaries mentioned in the grant and delineated on the diseño." Berreyesa, therefore, had in his own case a clear right to have his land surveyed as might appear to be just. He could not be bound by decrees entered in another suit between Fossat and the United States, in which he had not been heard, and to which he was not and could not have been a party. If, then, the survey of the Fossat Rancho was to be controlled by decrees previously entered in that suit, from which the court was not at liberty to depart, while the survey in the Berreyesa Case remained open to further inquiry, and subject to the decision of the court on the merits, the result must have been that two inconsistent surveys would have been approved, and overlapping patents issued.

To make inconsistent decrees, and approve conflicting surveys, I considered wholly inadmissible. It would only have produced future litigation unnecessary and vexatious; when all the parties were before the court, and were anxious for a determination by this court, and the supreme court on appeal, of the controversy which had so long been pending.

3. The decision of the supreme court, and the provisions of the act of 1860, had imposed upon this court the duty of establishing by a survey all the boundaries of the Fossat Rancho. As the northern line was to be run for quantity, it could only be fixed after all the other lines were determined. The dividing line between the ranchos had, therefore, first to be ascertained before the court or a surveyor could know where the northern line should be drawn, so as to make up the precise quantity of one league and no more.

If, then, Berreyesa, intervening for the first time in the cause, had practically no right to be heard, and if the location of the dividing line was to be considered as fixed by a decree made before he became a party to the suit, such a course could be consistent with the commonest rule of justice only on the hypothesis that the location did not and could not affect his rights, but that the final location of the line would remain open to contestation in the ordinary tribunals.

But if this were so, the attempt to determine the northern boundary was idle and vain; for if Fossat was to obtain exactly one league, and no more, the line run for quantity ought to be varied with every subsequent location of the disputed boundary. Justice and the interests of the United States, demanded, therefore, that in this and similar cases the lines between the claimant and his neighbors should be established before those run for quantity should be fixed; and it is obvious that this could be done only in a proceeding where the adjoining proprietors could appear, take evidence, and be heard, and in which they could not be bound by a decree entered in the suit before they were admitted as parties.

I have already observed that if, in a proceeding under the act of 1860 to correct a survey, the colindantes intervening in the suit are to be bound by the previous decree, it can only be on the theory that they are not affected by the survey, decree, or patent under it, but retain their rights unimpaired and capable of assertion in the ordinary tribunals.

But this theory would in practice be found deceptive, and the right of recourse to the ordinary tribunals illusory.

The California land claims are for the most part founded on mere equities—the legal title remaining in the United States, to divest which a patent is necessary.

If, then, a grantee to whom a patent for a specified tract of land had been issued, were to attempt before the ordinary tribunals to assert a right under his original grant to land not covered by his patent; and if, in addition, the land thus claimed were included within the patent of a neighbor, to whom it had been surveyed and patented under another, and perhaps older, grant; it may well be doubted whether the bare statement of the case would not insure its dismissal by the ordinary tribunal. The "legal investigation and decision, by the proper judicial tribunal, of disputes between parties having interfering claims," which the act of 1851 contemplates, would, therefore, be found, after patents have been issued to both, a wholly unavailable remedy for the party injured by the erroneous determination of the dispute by the surveyor general, or an ex parte decision of it by the United States courts.

But if, to avoid this result, and to give to both parties an equal standing in the ordinary courts, conflicting decrees should be made and overlapping patents issued, it is evident not only that interminable litigation would ensue, but that one of the claimants would be wronged by the United States; for the unsuccessful party would lose a part of the land covered by his patent, and would fall short to the extent of the land in dispute of the quantity to which he was entitled by his grant.

On these grounds I was of opinion that where two or more surveys of coterminous ranchos are before the court, on proceedings under the act of 1860, where the controversy relates to their common boundary lines and all the claimants have intervened in and become parties to the suit with respect to each survey, it was the duty of the court to determine the dividing lines irrespective of any decree obtained by either as against the United States; and that to make conflicting decrees and issue overlapping patents, or to fix the lines according to decrees entered before the colindantes were heard in the cause, would, in the one case, involve the parties in vexatious litigation, and, in the other, practically deprive the colindante of his rights without a hearing.

The language of the act of 1860 appeared to this court not merely to justify, but to demand, this construction of its provisions. By the third section, all persons having an interest in, or whose rights are affected by any survey or location, are permitted to intervene. By the fourth section, the parties so intervening are allowed to take testimony "as to any matters necessary to show the true and proper location of the claim;" and the court, on hearing the allegations and proofs, is empowered to render judgment thereon; and if, in its opinion, the location and survey are erroneous, it is authorized to set aside and annul the same, or to correct and modify. 12 Stat. 34.

It will be perceived that the intervening parties are permitted to take testimony, not merely as to whether the survey conforms to a previous decree of the court, by which their rights may have been prejudged in their absence, but "as to any matters necessary to show the true and proper location of the claim;" and the court, after hearing the new allegations and proofs, is required to render judgment thereon, and to set aside the survey, not when it fails to conform to the previous decree, but whenever, after hearing the proofs, the location and survey are "in its opinion erroneous." If congress had intended to give to the courts the same powers as were conferred upon them by the acts of 1824 and 1828,—viz., to decide finally, after bringing before them all parties in interest, all questions relating to the extent, boundaries, and locality of the claims,—I know not what other language could have been used to express the intention.

But to construe the act as limiting the powers of the court on the intervention of parties previously strangers to the cause, to the inquiry whether the survey conformed to the decree already made, would defeat in great part the purpose of the law; for the determination of the court would settle nothing. It could not settle the dividing lines, for they would be fixed according to a decree made before the colindantes were heard; and even the exterior lines where the claim is bounded by public land could not rationally be considered as established, so long as the dividing lines by which in a grant for quantity they must necessarily be governed remained uncertain.

I have thought it right thus to explain fully the grounds on which the opinion of this court was based, in order that its action which has been so much criticised, may be thoroughly understood, and the nature of its errors (if errors it has committed) may be exactly appreciated. I have felt at liberty to do so, from the fact that in the recent opinion of the supreme court the question last considered is not discussed, but the construction given by the counsel for the claimant to the act of 1860 seems to have been adopted as necessarily and of course correct. I have explained the reasons for my opinions, not in any spirit of rebellion or protest against the authority which it is my duty and my desire to obey, but because I thought it just to present to the supreme court, it may be for the first time, the reasons which led me to arrive at a conclusion which it has pronounced to be incorrect, and to show that the action of this court, though perhaps erroneous, was not, as has been supposed, inconsistent, hasty, or inconsiderate.

With respect to the supposed change of the decrees of this court, I believe I have shown beyond controversy:

(1) That no decision was ever made, or intended to be made, of the dispute regarding the eastern line until the last decree under the provisions of the act of 1860, and that this court had good grounds for believing that it had no authority to make any such decision.

(2) That it was not aware, and had no reason to suspect, that any decree supposed to determine that line had been affirmed by the supreme court.

(3) That even if the fact had been otherwise, there were strong reasons for believing that a decree so entered in a suit between the United States and the claimants did not and ought not to bind other parties subsequently intervening for their interests under the provisions of the act of 1860.

I trust, therefore, that the injustice of the implied censure contained in the recent opinion of the supreme court will be recognized by that high tribunal.

It remains to determine how far the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Fossat is decisive of the question raised in the case at bar. It will be observed, that though in the opinion of the supreme court it is distinctly declared that, in a proceeding under the act of 1860, the duties of this court are limited to an inquiry whether the survey conforms to the decree previously entered in the cause, yet that the location of the dividing line is discussed on its merits, and the location adopted by this court adjudged to be erroneous; that at least a majority of the court assented to its judgment is certain. But it may very possibly be that the assent was given by some of its members on the ground that they agreed on the question raised as to the true location of the eastern line, without concurring in the general principle announced, viz., that colindantes and other intervenors in a proceeding under the act of 1860, who then for the first time are heard in it, are bound by the terms of a decree entered when the only parties to the suit were the United States and the claimant. The volume containing the last decisions of the supreme court has not been received in this state. Whether or not a majority of the court adopted all the views expressed in the published opinion, I am uninformed. I only know that they assented to the judgment.

But on the hypothesis that they did, the case at bar is distinguishable from that of Fossat. Here the claimant has intervened and become a party to a proceeding which necessarily involved the determination of the common boundary line between the ranchos. From the decision in that proceeding he might have appealed, and in case the location of the Mesa Rancho as established by this court had been altered, there would still have been assigned to the claimant of that rancho the full quantity of land to which he was entitled. As the case now stands, the owners of the Mesa Rancho can only obtain the land as surveyed and located under the decision of this court; and if the claim of the owners of the Rodriguez Ranch be allowed, their land will in part be located on the tract surveyed to Mesa, and overlapping patents must be issued creating certain litigation, and a possible loss by Mesa of a part of his land. The position of Rodriguez is thus closely analogous to what would be the position of Berreyesa if he should seek to have the line between him and Fossat adjudicated anew, according to the calls of his own decree.

It may well be doubted whether the supreme court would re-open the whole controversy, and on finding that the Berreyesa decree called for a line different from that called for in the Fossat decree, would make a new location of it, and direct overlapping patents to issue.

In the case at bar, the injustice of now depriving Mesa of a considerable portion of the land which, contrary to his own wishes, has been surveyed to him, is so manifest that I do not feel called upon, on the authority of a single case, where the effect and practical operation of the doctrines announced may not have been fully presented to the supreme court, to take from Mesa lands surveyed and perhaps patented, and for which there are now no means of giving him an equivalent by extending his lines in other directions.

I think, therefore, that the survey of the land confirmed to Rodriguez should be corrected by conforming the lines strictly to those called for in the decree, except that on the east it must follow the lines established by the final survey of the Mesa Rancho, as the lines of division between the ranchos.

Case No. 14,950a.

UNITED STATES v. DERRINGER.

[2 Hayw. & H. 72.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April 9, 1851.

CONTRACTS — ACTION FOR BREACH — MUTUALITY.

1. When the clerk of the house of representatives made a contract with the defendant to deliver wood at a given price and the time for delivery was extended by the clerk, held, that the clerk could not rescind the contract for non-delivery of the wood until the expiration of the time agreed upon for its delivery.

2. Where the defendant had contracted with the clerk of the house of representatives to furnish the government with wood, without an appropriation from congress to pay for the same, it was held, in a suit brought by the United States against the defendant for a breach of contract, that as, in the absence of an appropriation by congress, the United States would not be bound to answer in damages if they had refused to accept the wood, for the same reason the defendant would not be liable for not furnishing the wood.

Declaration:

"That whereas the said Bronaugh M. Derringer, on the 8th day of May, in the year 1845, by his certain writing obligatory, sealed with his seal, and to the court here shown, whose date is the day and year above written, acknowledged himself jointly and severally with one Henry Derringer, Esq., to be held and firmly bound unto the said United States in the sum of $1,000, which said writing obligatory was with a condition therein written, that if the said B. M. Derringer did well and truly execute a contract entered into between B. B. French, clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, acting for and in behalf of the United States, which contract bears date the 8th day of May, 1845, in and by which said contract, amongst other things the said Derringer had contracted and engaged with the said B. B. French, acting as aforesaid, that for the consideration therein mentioned, the said Derringer would furnish and deliver at the office of the clerk of the house of representatives aforesaid, in the city of Washington, free of any charge or carriage, on or before the 1st day of September, 1845, 100 cords of the best hickory wood, to be sawed into lengths of two feet and piled away in the vaults appropriated for the reception thereof, at and for the rate of $5.49 per cord; and the said B. B. French, clerk as aforesaid, and acting as aforesaid, stipulated and agreed for, and on account of the United States, of the said United States with the said B. M. Derringer, otherwise called Bronaugh M. Derringer, to pay the said Derringer for the wood aforesaid, so as aforesaid to be delivered, sawed and piled away, according to the price and terms aforesaid, as soon as the account of the said Derringer thereof should be audited by the committee of accounts of the house of representatives, and an appropriation be made therefor by the congress of the said United States. And the United States in fact say that the said Derringer did not fulfill in whole, or in part, the said contract, but wholly failed therein, to wit: at the county aforesaid, and that the said Derringer did not furnish and deliver at the office of the clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, the quantity of wood aforesaid, viz. 100 cords of wood, and did not saw, or cause to be sawed, the same, or any part thereof, into lengths of two feet, and did not pile away, or cause to be piled away, the same, or any part thereof, in the vaults appropriated for the reception thereof, at or before the time stipulated in said contract, or at any time thereafter whereby an action hath accrued to the said United States to demand and have of him, the said Derringer, the sum of money above demanded, nevertheless the said Derringer, although often requested, has not paid to the said United States the said sum of money above demanded, or any part thereof, but so to do has hitherto wholly refused, and still doth refuse, to the great damage of the United States, to the value of $1,000, and therefore they bring suit," etc.

Pleas of the defendant to the declaration:

"And the defendant comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and craves oyer of the writing obligatory set forth in the declaration as the foundation of the action and of the condition thereof, and also of the agreement therein referred to, purporting to have been made between B. B. French, clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, and said defendant, B. M. Derringer, which said two writings are read to him in the words and figures to wit: the first, the bond entered into by the defendant and Henry Derringer; second, the contract, which writings being heard and understood, the defendant saith the United States their action against this defendant to have and maintain ought not, because the defendant doth aver that after the said 8th day of May, 1845, and before the said 1st day of September, 1845, to wit: On the ——— day of ———, in the year 1845, at Washington, D. C., at the office of the house of representatives, it was mutually agreed between the said B. B. French, clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, and the said B. M. Derringer, that the time for the delivery of the said wood was and should be extended to the 1st day of October, 1845, and that a delivery of said wood on or before the said day of September, 1845, was dispensed with; and the said stipulation of this defendant to deliver the said 100 cords of wood on or before the 1st of September, 1845, was waived, released, set aside and cancelled by the said B. B. French as aforesaid, by and with the consent of this defendant, and by concurrent wills and consent of said B. B. French, clerk of the house of representatives aforesaid, and the said B. M. Derringer, the defendant.

"(2) And the defendant, for a further plea, saith that after the said execution of the contract of May 8, 1845, and before the said 1st day of September, 1845, to wit: On the ——— day of ———, at the district and county aforesaid, by mutual agreement of said B. B. French, clerk of the house of representatives, and of said defendant B. M. Derringer, the time for the delivery of said 100 cords of wood was extended, and it was by said parties mutually then and there agreed that the time for delivery of said wood, instead of on or before said 1st day of September, should be on or before said 1st day of October, 1845; and the defendant doth further aver that after the said time for the delivery of the wood had been so as aforesaid extended, and before the expiration of the said 1st day of October, 1845, he, the said B. B. French, clerk as aforesaid, did give notice to this defendant not to deliver the wood, and did declare the contract as not obligatory upon him, the said B. B. French, the one party, and did declare to this defendant that he, said French, no longer looked to this defendant, B. M. Derringer, for a supply of wood for the house; and he, the said B. B. French, clerk as aforesaid, said by his certain writing, signed with his name, and dated 'Office of House of Representatives, United States, Washington, October 1, 1845,' and addressed to this defendant, and to him delivered in the morning of said day, did therein and thereby admit and acknowledge the extension of the time for delivery of the wood as hereinbefore set forth and pleaded; and he, the said French, clerk as aforesaid, did, in and by said writing, so addressed and delivered to this defendant, to wit: on the said 1st day of October, 1845, in the District of Columbia, and county of Washington, aforesaid, put an end to the said contract for the delivery of the wood, and prevent this defendant from delivering of the wood; and the defendant brings here and shows to the court the said letter bearing date, 'Office, Hall of Representatives, United States, October 1, 1845,' signed with the name of him, the said B. B. French, clerk of the house of representatives as aforesaid, by J. E. Millard, therein authorized by said French; and this defendant doth say that he, the said B. B. French, clerk as aforesaid, by his own acting and doing, did prevent the delivery of the wood on the said 1st day of September, 1845, and on the said 1st day of October, 1845; and this defendant avers that he, the said B. B. French, clerk as aforesaid, is the cause why the said wood was not delivered, and did obstruct, prevent and prohibit, this defendant from the delivery of the wood.

"(3) And for a further plea this defendant saith that after the said contract of the 8th May, 1845, for the delivery of the said wood on or before the 1st day of September, 1845, and before the said 1st day of September, 1845, it was mutually agreed, to wit: On the ——— day of ———, in the year 1845, by and between the said B. B. French, clerk as aforesaid, and this defendant, that the time for the delivery of said 100 cords of wood should be extended, and that the time for delivery of said 100 cords of wood shall be on or before the 1st day of October, 1845; and the said defendant doth further say and aver that before the said extended time for the delivery of the wood had expired, and whilst this defendant was, as he doth aver, with all due diligence and care, preparing to deliver the wood in performance of the said contract, he, the said French, clerk as aforesaid, did contract with one Joseph Rafliffe, for the purpose of supplying said wood, and therefore and thereupon did give notice to this defendant not to deliver the wood, and that the said French did not look to this defendant for a supply of wood; which said notification to this defendant was made in writing, signed with the name of the said B. B. French, as clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, bearing date on the 1st day of October, 1845, at the office of the house of representatives, wherein is stated and set forth as well the said extension of time for delivery, as also the notification to this defendant not to deliver the wood, and likewise the notification to this defendant that said B. B. French did not look to this defendant for a supply of wood for the said house of representatives, which said written notification, bearing date on the day and year aforesaid, is to the court here now shown; and the defendant avers that said writing so aforesaid, made in the said office of the house of representatives, and signed with the name of B. B. French, was made and delivered to this defendant on the said 1st day of October, 1845, at Washington, in the district of Columbia aforesaid, and was delivered to this defendant before noon of that day, and all of which this defendant is ready to verify.

"(4) And for a further plea this defendant saith that the said B. B. French, by his certain writing, signed with his proper name, and officially made as clerk aforesaid, made and delivered to this defendant in the forenoon of the 1st day of October, 1845, in the county of Washington and District of Columbia, and to the court here now shown, bearing date at the office of the house of representatives; and on the said 1st day of October, 1845, did therein and thereby waive, release, discharge, acquit and absolve this defendant from the said contract for the delivery of said wood, and did therein and thereby give notice and information to this defendant not to deliver the said wood; and did therein and thereby give notice and information to this defendant that he, the said French, clerk as aforesaid, did not look to this defendant for the supply of said wood for the use of the house of representatives, and this the defendant is ready to verify.

"(5) And for a further plea this defendant saith that the congress of the United States had not made, on or before the said 8th day of May, or 1st of September, or 1st day of October in said year 1845, any appropriation of money for the purchase of said 100 cords of wood for the use of the house of representatives, and that neither the United States nor congress of the United States had given to said B. B. French, individually, or in his official capacity as clerk, authority or rightful power to bargain for the purchase on credit and bind the United States or the congress to pay for said wood; and that the said contract made by said B. B. French, in his official capacity, and purporting to have been by him done as acting for and on behalf of the United States, was without any warrant of law, done by usurpation and assumption, was void in the beginning, of no validity in the course of time; that in and by said writings no valuable, lawful or good consideration flowed or accrued therefrom or thereby to this defendant, and that the said contract in the declaration supposed was null, and is of no force and effect in law, and this the defendant is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment if the plaintiff ought to have and maintain the action in the declaration in manner and form as therein set forth, complained and alleged," etc.

Plaintiff's additional count:

"And whereas, also, the said B. M. Derringer, otherwise called Bronaugh M. Derringer, on the said 8th day of May, in the year 1845, at the county aforesaid, by his certain other writing obligatory of that date, sealed with his seal, and here in court to be produced, bound and acknowledged himself to be indebted, with one Henry Derringer, to the said United States of America, in the full and just sum of $1,000, of current money of said United States, which said last mentioned writing obligatory was, with a certain condition thereunto written, setting forth that a public advertisement, dated on the 16th day of April, in the year 1845, was issued by the clerk of the house of representatives of the said United States; that the defendant had contracted to deliver at the office of the clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, for the use of the said house of representatives, on or before the 1st day of September, in the year 1845, free of charge for carriage, 100 cords of hickory wood, according to the specification in said advertisement, at $5.49 per cord, and that the said clerk of the house of representatives as aforesaid, had notified his acceptance of the said proposals, and had required security for the due and faithful delivery of said wood; and that the said defendant would well and truly cause to be delivered at the said office of the clerk of the house of representatives, the said wood, agreeably to a certain contract for furnishing the same, and in conformity with the terms specified in the said advertisement, and that the said defendant would well and faithfully fulfill all the terms of his said contract, which said contract was entered into by and between the defendant and the said French, clerk as aforesaid, and acting as aforesaid, bears date on the said 8th day of May, in the year 1845, sealed with the respective seals of the said defendant and the said French, and is here in court to be produced; and by which contract said defendant on his part agreed with said French, clerk as aforesaid, and acting as aforesaid, to deliver at the office of the said clerk in the city of Washington, free of charge for carriage, on or before the 1st day of September, 1845, 100 cords of the best hickory wood, to be sawed into lengths of two feet and piled away in the vaults appropriated for the reception thereof, at and after the rate of $5.49 per cord; and the said French, clerk as aforesaid, stipulated for and on account of the said United States to pay for the wood aforesaid, according to the price and terms aforesaid, as soon as the account of the defendant therefor should be audited by the committee of accounts of the said house of representatives, and an appropriation be made therefor. And the plaintiffs aver that on or about the said 1st day of September, 1845, the time stipulated in the contract in the said last mentioned writing obligatory mentioned, for the delivery, sawing and piling away of the wood aforesaid, according to the price and terms in the said last mentioned contract mentioned, having then expired or being about to expire, and the defendant not having fulfilled his said last mentioned contract, the defendant informed the said Benjamin B. French, clerk as aforesaid, and acting as aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, that said defendant could not fulfill his said last mentioned contract, and could not deliver, saw and pile away said wood as aforesaid at or by the time limited and stipulated in said last mentioned contract for such delivery, sawing and piling away; and on or about the said 1st day of September, in the year aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, requested the said Benjamin B. French, clerk as aforesaid, and acting as aforesaid, to enlarge the time specified in said last mentioned contract for the delivery, sawing and piling away as aforesaid of said wood, so as to give the defendant all the said month of September for delivering, sawing and piling away the same, strongly assuring said French that should such indulgence be given, said French should not be again disappointed. Whereupon said French, clerk as aforesaid, and acting as aforesaid, at the special instance and request of the defendant, consented to enlarge the time aforesaid so as to give the defendant all the month of September within which to deliver, saw and pile away said wood as aforesaid. And so the plaintiffs say that on or about the said 1st day of September, 1845, at the county aforesaid, the said French, clerk as aforesaid, and acting as aforesaid, and the defendant, did, on the aforesaid special instance and request of the defendant, agree together to enlarge and extend, and did enlarge and extend through all the said month of September, the time fixed and limited in the said last mentioned contract, and in the said last mentioned writing obligatory for the delivery, sawing and piling away of the said wood as aforesaid; but that neither the said last mentioned contract nor the said condition of the last mentioned writing obligatory was, on the day and year last named, or at any other time, in any other particular than as to the time of delivery, sawing and piling away, altered or varied in any respect or degree whatever, but remained in full force, virtue and effect, except as to the time of delivery, sawing and piling away, as if said time of delivery, sawing and piling away had not been so enlarged and extended as aforesaid. Yet the defendant did not, on or before the 1st day of September, 1845, nor at any day or time during the said month of September, nor at any other day and time whatever, well and faithfully fulfill said last mentioned contract either in whole or in part, and has not, at any other day or time whatever, well and faithfully fulfilled the said last mentioned contract, either in whole or in part; in this, that the defendant did not, on or before the said 1st day of September, 1845, nor at any day or time during the said month of September, nor at any other day or time whatever, deliver or cause to be delivered at the office of the clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, in the city of Washington, saw or cause to be sawed into lengths of two feet, pile away or cause to be piled away in the vaults appropriated for the reception thereof, 100 cords of the best hickory wood or any part thereof, and has not, at any other day or time whatever, delivered or caused to be delivered at said office, sawed or caused to be sawed, and piled away or caused to be piled away in the vaults appropriated for the reception thereof, said 100 cords of the best hickory wood or any part thereof, whereby an action has accrued to the plaintiff to demand and to have of the defendant the sum of money last above demanded; nevertheless the defendant, though often requested to do so, has not paid to the plaintiffs the said last above demanded sum of money, or any part thereof, but so to do has hitherto wholly refused and still refuses. By means of which said premises the plaintiffs have sustained damages to a large amount, to wit: to the amount of $1,000, and therefore they bring their suit," etc.

"And the defendant, for further plea to the said declaration, and to the additional count filed by the attorney of the United States, doth allege and say that B. B. French, clerk of the house of representatives, by his certain writing, signed with his name, bearing date on the ——— day of ———, 1845, did extend and enlarge the time for the delivery of the wood in the declaration mentioned to the 1st day of October, 1845, and that the defendant had by said extension the whole of said 1st day of October, 1845, for the delivery of the wood; and that the said B. B. French, by his letter to this defendant, delivered on the said 1st day of October, 1845, and before sunset of that day, to wit: at 11 o'clock in the forenoon of the said day, at the city of Washington, and county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, forbid the said defendant to deliver the wood, and this he is ready to verify, without that the contract and time for delivery was extended only to the last day of September, as the plaintiff in pleading hath alleged."

"And the plaintiffs saith the contract and time for the delivery was extended and enlarged to include the last day of September only, and not to include the 1st day of October, 1845, as the defendant, in pleading of, hath alleged, and this the plaintiffs pray may be enquired of by the country."

And the defendant likewise.

P. R. Fendall, for the United States.
Ould & Bibb, for defendant.

The plaintiffs to support the issue on their part joined offered evidence, tending to prove that on the 16th day of April, 1845, one Benjamin B. French was clerk, duly elected and qualified as clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, and so continued to be until the 1st day of November following; and long after that, on the day and year first aforesaid, the said French, as such clerk, caused to be published in the National Intelligencer and other newspapers printed and published in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, a notice in the words following: (Prout the same.) The plaintiffs then offered evidence tending to prove that proposals for furnishing said wood were accordingly made by sundry bidders; that the lowest bid was made by the defendant, and at the rate of $5.49 per cord; that on ——— day of May, 1845, the said French, as such clerk, accepted the defendant's said bid; that on the 8th of May next following, the defendant and the said French, as such clerk, entered into a contract for the delivery of said wood, and on the same day the defendant executed his bond for the delivery of said wood, which said contract and bond were read in evidence to the jury and are in words and figures following: (Prout the same.) The plaintiffs then offered the evidence of B. B. French, tending to prove that on or before the 1st day of September, 1845, the day fixed by the condition of said bond for the delivery of said wood, the defendant called on said French, represented that he was not prepared to deliver the said wood on that day, and solicited an extension of the time for delivery throughout said month of September; that said extension was granted by said French as such clerk, but that in all other respects the original contract remained unaltered; that said wood, or any part thereof, was not delivered nor offered to be delivered during said month of September, nor at any other time; that on the 1st day of October next following, one I. C. Millard, a clerk in the office of said French, by authority of said French, addressed a letter to the defendant in the words and figures following: (Prout said letter.) This letter of October 1, 1845, was given in evidence by plaintiffs before the parol evidence as to extension of time, and the defendant objected to that part of the parol evidence of French which tended to prove that the extension of time for delivery was confined to the month of September, to the exclusion of the first day of October. The court admitted the evidence subject to the further consideration of the court.

The plaintiffs then offered evidence to prove that on or before said 1st day of October, 1845, and thereafter, the defendant resided in Georgetown, District of Columbia; that the office hours of said French, clerk as aforesaid, ended at 3 o'clock p. m., and it was the usage of his office for letters written there to be sent to the post office after 3 o'clock in the afternoon; that the defendant on or before the 1st day of October, 1845, kept a wood and coal yard in the city of Washington, but had no wood; that shortly before the 2d day of October, 1845, the said French addressed letters to the two bidders successively, who were next lowest to the defendant, apprising them on information which said French had received of the probability that the defendant would fail to comply with his contract, and enquiring whether they would be willing to furnish the wood; that receiving no answer from either of the two next lowest of them, or an answer declining, he agreed with the third for the delivery, sawing and piling away of the wood, as provided by the contract, at the price of $6.50 per cord; that this was a fair market price on the 2d of October, 1845, of hickory wood of the quality called for by the contract, delivered, sawed, and piled away as therein required; that the new contractor was industriously occupied between three and four weeks delivering, sawing and piling away said 100 cords of hickory wood, which was conveyed in numerous carts, some of them being hired by the contractor, and that for them he paid at the rate of $1 a cord; that with the aid of all the carts in the city of Washington and Georgetown, it would have been impossible for 100 cords of hickory wood to be conveyed, sawed and piled away in the vaults of the house of representatives in a single day. The plaintiffs further offered in evidence the rules of the house of representatives, existing and in force when said contract was made, being the rules printed by order of said house, in the year 1837, by Thomas Allen, printer thereto, and the plaintiffs then offered evidence tending to prove that in the year 1833, the said French was first employed in the clerk's office of the house of representatives, and that there was then existing and in force a usage (established long before the passage of the act of congress of February 23, 1815 [3 Stat. 212], requiring the clerk of the house of representatives, to give bond and security for the faithful application and disbursement of the contingent fund), under which usage it was the duty of the clerk to have charge of the contingent fund annually appropriated by congress for the use of said house; to provide and pay for out of it fuel and other necessaries for the use of said house, and to make contracts for their purchase and delivery; that claims for articles furnished under such contracts, after being passed by the committee of accounts, were paid by the clerk, and subsequently allowed at the treasury of the United States; that when the contingent fund was exhausted congress made appropriation for the deficiency, and such claims as the first appropriation had proved insufficient to meet were, as aforesaid, paid out of the appropriations for deficiency, and allowed at the treasury; that before the passage of the act of congress of 26th of August, 1842 [5 Stat. 534], requiring printing and stationery to be advertised for, it was the usage for the clerk to make purchases and contracts without advertising for proposals, but that since the passage of that law, the usage has been for the clerk to advertise for proposals to furnish fuel, in the manner prescribed by that law, in regard to stationery and printing; and that in view of the possibility of the contingent fund proving insufficient for its objects, a clause was generally inserted in the contracts, to the effect that the articles (after being audited by the committee of accounts) should be paid for "as soon as an appropriation should be made therefor," which clause was inserted in the contract with the defendant, although by the act of congress of March 3, 1845 [5 Stat. 752], making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government, for the year ending June 30, 1846, and for other purposes, $100,000 were appropriated for stationery, fuel, printing and all other contingent expenses of the house of representatives; and although no deficiency in said fund so appropriated was apprehended. And the plaintiffs offered evidence tending to prove that in point of fact no such deficiency did occur, and that the wood furnished under the defendant's contract by the substituted contractor was paid for out of said appropriation.

The defendant then offered evidence tending to prove that in the months of September and October, 1845, the best hickory wood in Georgetown was sold and delivered in Georgetown at $5.50 per cord, but that this price was exclusive of the cost of sawing and piling away

Instructions:

Whereupon the defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury as follows: That if they believe from the evidence the said B. B. French had no authority in law to contract for and on behalf of the United States, and to bind the United States by the said contract in the declaration mentioned, and that the said contract not binding on the said United States did not bind said defendant, he is entitled to a verdict in this suit, which was given.

THE COURT gave also the following instructions:

1. That if the jury find from the evidence that by mutual agreement between B. B. French, clerk of the house of representatives, and the defendant, the time for the delivery of the wood in the declaration mentioned was extended and enlarged for the 1st day of October, 1845, then the defendant has verified and maintained his second, third, fourth, and sixth pleas, and the jury should find for the defendant.

2. That if the jury shall find from the evidence the letter bearing date October 1, 1845, to be genuine letter issued from the office of the clerk of the house of representatives, by the authority of B. B. French, the clerk, and delivered to the defendant on the same day, then the law of the case is for the defendant, and the jury should find for him.

To which giving of said instructions the plaintiffs, by their counsel, except.

The above instructions were concurred in by MORSELL and DUNLOP, Circuit Judges.
Verdict for defendant.

UNITED STATES v. DESMOND.

[39 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 332.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April, 1858.

CUSTOMS—OBSTRUCTING OFFICER.

This was an indictment [against Timothy Desmond] for obstructing a custom-house officer in the discharge of his duty. It appeared from the evidence that the defendant was a gatekeeper on Pier No. 44, North river, at which the steamer Kangaroo was lying; that the custom-house officer, Mr. Munroe, was on board the ship, and, hearing a confusion at the gate, went there, and found the defendant refusing to allow parties in, whereupon he ordered him to open it, and, on his refusal, undertook to open it himself, and, in doing so, got hit on the head by the defendant with a stick.

Mr. Yoachimssen, for the United States.
Mr. Donohue, for defendant.

HALL, District Judge, thought this was hardly a part of Munroe's duty, as a custom-house officer, and the jury found a verdict of not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. DEVAUGHAN.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 84.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1827.

JUROR—VOIR DIRE—DISQUALIFICATION—CONTEMPT.

1. The question which may be asked of a juror when called up to be sworn, is, "Have you formed and delivered any opinion as to the guilt of the prisoner?"

2. If a juror, after being summoned, voluntarily forms and delivers an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, with a view of disqualifying himself for serving on the jury at the trial, it is a contempt of court, inasmuch as it tends to the obstruction of justice.

[Cited in Re May, 1 Fed. 742; U. S. v. Anonymous, 21 Fed. 770.]

Indictment [against Jonathan Devaughan] for the murder of Tobias Martin, in the county of Washington; the cause having been removed to this county at the request of the prisoner.

A. C. Casanove, one of the venire, was asked by Mr. Hewitt, the prisoner's counsel, whether he had formed an opinion respecting the guilt of the prisoner.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, said he understood the proper question to be, whether he had formed and delivered an opinion as to the guilt of the prisoner upon this indictment; and the question was so put.

Mr. Casanove answered that he had. One of the judges asked whether he had so formed and delivered it since he was summoned on the venire. He answered in the affirmative. One of the judges then asked him whether he did so with a view to disqualify himself for serving on the jury. His answer was, yes, partly with that view, and certainly with a hope that it would have that effect.

THE COURT (nem. con.) thought that this conduct of Mr. Casanove, in thus disqualifying himself to serve on the jury, after he had been summoned, was a contempt of court, and ordered him to be fined $50 for the contempt.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, said, that A. C. Casanove, one of the jurors summoned upon this venire, having stated to the court, that since he was summoned as a juror in this cause, he has formed and delivered an opinion as to the guilt of the prisoner in this cause, partly with a view to disqualify himself for serving as a juror in the cause, and with the hope that it would have that effect, the court is of opinion that Mr. Casanove's conduct, in that respect, was a contempt of court, and that he be fined $50. That the court did not suppose Mr. Casanove intended any contempt to the judges personally, nor to the court simply as a court, but that as it tended to the obstruction of justice, the court deemed it necessary to take this notice of it, reserving to itself the right to mitigate the fine, or to rescind the order upon any proper representation which may hereafter be made by Mr. Casanove, upon the subject.

Mr. Casanove was then rejected as a juror. Several of the other jurors, having formed and delivered opinions against the prisoner before they were summoned, were discharged.

The case of U. S. v. Burr [Case No. 14,694], was cited, in which case it appears that the question put to the jurors was, whether they had formed and delivered an opinion, &c.

The evidence was very clear against the prisoner. He was convicted; sentenced, on the 5th of May, 1827, to be hung on the last Wednesday in June, and executed in the county of Alexandria.

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. March 14, 1868.

JURY — PEREMPTORY CHALLENGE — INDICTMENT —JOINDER OF OFFENCES—INTERNAL REVENUE.

1. No right to make a peremptory challenge to a juror exists, in the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of New York, on the part of a person on trial on an indictment for a misdemeanor.

[Cited in U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. 199.]

2. The act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), does not confer such right.

3. The neglect or failure of an officer of the internal revenue to perform a duty required of him by law, does not relieve another person, who has violated the law, from the consequences of such violation.

4. In an indictment for a misdemeanor, several offences may be joined in different counts; and, when that is done, the prosecution cannot be compelled to elect between the several counts.

5. On the trial of an indictment under the internal revenue law, for having carried on business without a license, and without having paid a special tax, and for having failed to keep books required by law to be kept, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that he had a license, and paid the special tax, and kept the books.

This was a motion for a new trial. The prisoner [John Devlin] had been convicted on an indictment, charging him with offences against the internal revenue laws. [Case No. 14,955.]

Benjamin F. Tracy, U. S. Dist. Atty.

William C. De Witt, for prisoner.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The application for a new trial is based on several grounds, the most important of which relates to the right of peremptory challenges in this court, and will be first considered. The ruling of the court on the trial was, that the offences charged against the prisoner were misdemeanors, and that, in such prosecutions, no right of peremptory challenge existed in this court. The ruling was not made without consideration, and, having now again examined the question, in the light of the argument on this motion, I see no reason to change the opinion then formed. Although apparently doubted on the trial, the ruling that the offences charged were misdemeanors, has not been seriously questioned on the present motion. These offences are three in number, set forth in as many counts. The defendant is charged, first, with having carried on the business of a wholesale dealer without having taken out a license; second, with having carried on the same business after September, 1866, (when the law requiring a new registration and the payment of a special tax took effect,) without having paid the special tax; third, with having failed to keep the books which the law requires to be kept by wholesale dealers in liquors. No general statute of the United States exists according to which these offences can be declared felonies, nor are they declared to be such by the statute creating them, although there are offences in the same act expressly designated such. They are not made punishable by hard labor, and a felonious intent is not made a part of the offence. In character, they are such that an intention to raise them to the rank of felony is not to be presumed, in the absence of any expressed indication of such an intention. A statute will not be construed to create a new felony, unless its express words or their necessary implication so require. 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 557. The offences, then, are misdemeanors. If so, the right of peremptory challenge must be found conferred by some statute of the United States; for, at common law, no such right exists in such cases. 4 Bl. Comm. 353. It has, accordingly, been argued, that, by the act of congress of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), the state statute of 1847, which gives to a prisoner the right of peremptory challenge in the tribunals of the state, is made, in effect, a statute of the United States and available as conferring such right in this court. But, although it is true, that, under the state act of 1847, the right in question exists in the tribunals of the state, I am unable to see how the language of the United States statute of 1840 can, by any fair construction, be considered as giving effect to that act in this court. The words of the act are as follows: "Jurors to serve in the courts of the United States in each state respectively, shall have the like qualifications, and be entitled to the like exemptions, as jurors of the highest court of law of such state now have, and are entitled to, and shall hereafter, from time to time, have and be entitled to, and shall be designated by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming such juries now practised, and hereafter to be practised therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States, or the officers thereof." These words seem to me clearly to confine the act to the subject of the qualifications of persons to serve as jurymen, and their exemptions from that duty, and in no wise to relate to the right to a peremptory challenge, which is the setting aside a juryman without regard to his qualification or exemption. Such was the construction placed upon this act, in 1851, by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of U. S. v. Douglass [Case No. 14,989], and, the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Shackleford, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 588, is to the same effect. This last case brought up, on a certificate of division, the question of the right to peremptory challenges, in a prosecution for a misdemeanor in Kentucky, and the determination of the court, as I understand it, was, that, by virtue of the latter portion of the act of 1840, the courts of the United States are empowered to adopt, by rule, an existing state statute upon the subject of peremptory challenges, but that, in the absence of any such adoption by rule, the right to a peremptory challenge, in a prosecution for a misdemeanor, could not be held to exist, either under the common law, or under a law of the state not so adopted by the court. The point in question is thus settled adversely to the prisoner by authority; for, in this court, the state act of 1847 has never been adopted by rule or in practice, nor has that act, to my knowledge, been adopted in any of the courts of this circuit.

The next question to be considered relates to the rulings of the court in excluding certain offers of evidence made by the defence. These offers are based upon the proposition, that the citizen and the officer of the revenue bear such a relation to each other, in regard to the law, that the neglect or failure of the officer to perform the duties which the law requires of him, relieves the citizen from the obligations which the law imposes upon him. The proposition is manifestly unsound. To maintain it would be to hold, that a revenue officer, by failing to obey or enforce a law, could destroy the law. It would be, in effect, to transfer to officers of the revenue the law-making power, and would enable them to make the law binding upon those only whom they might desire to have bound. This cannot be. The officers may, or may not, comply with the law, but the law exists, nevertheless, in full force, and visits with its punishment both the citizen and the officer, when they are shown to have disregarded its requirements. These views are not new, but have been repeatedly expressed by courts, in disposing of defences based upon the same theory now advanced on behalf of this prisoner. Com. v. Blackington (Shaw, C. J.) 24 Pick. 352; Lord v. Jones (Shepley, J.) 24 Me. 439, 442; Mayor v. Mason, 4 E. D. Smith, 142, 145 (Woodruff, J.). If, then, it were true that the failure of an assistant assessor to register the application of the prisoner, prevented him from obtaining a license from the collector, that would not make it lawful for him to proceed without a license. The refusal to grant a license is not equivalent to a license. So, too, if it be true, as appears from the papers offered in evidence, that, after the commission of the offence here charged, and after the prisoner had been arrested, and these very offences had, to some extent, been judicially examined into, the officers of the internal revenue accepted from him an application for a license, and received from him the amount of the special tax, this proceeding on the part of the prisoner does not tend to show that he had a license at the time in question, or had paid his special tax before he proceeded to do business; nor did the action of the officers work out a pardon for the offences thus previously committed. Neither the law-making power, nor the pardoning power, has been entrusted to the collectors and assessors of the internal revenue.

The next question raised is based upon the refusal of the court to compel the prosecution to elect between the several counts in the indictment. On this point it is only necessary to say, that an examination of the text-books will show it to be well settled that, in cases of misdemeanor, several offences may be joined in different counts, and that there is no right, in such cases, to compel the prosecution to rely on one transaction. 1 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 209, 212.

One other point has been taken on this motion, and that relates to the charge to the jury, that the burden rested on the prisoner to show that he had taken out a license, and had paid the special tax, and had kept the books required by the law. On this point it must first be noticed, that no exception was taken to this portion of the charge, nor was it objected to at the trial. Therefore, the point cannot be properly raised on this motion. But, without intending, in any degree, to countenance the practice of omitting to object at the time to portions of a charge supposed to be erroneous, I may add, that the charge could only have been understood to be declaratory of the law of the case as it stood on the evidence, and not to be the announcement of an abstract proposition. That it correctly declared the law of the case is not to be disputed; for, there was, in the case, positive evidence, from the prisoner's own clerk, that the books were not kept, and, also, evidence going to show that no license had been issued to the prisoner, and that no special tax had been paid by him. But, I apprehend that, considered as an abstract proposition, it will be found to be correct in principle and sustained by authority. Thus, in State v. Geuing, 1 McCord, 573; which was an indictment for selling liquor without a license, the court, upon appeal, say: "It is the opinion of the court, that the burthen of the proof lay on the defendant, and that it was incumbent on him to show that he had been licensed to retail, a fact which, if it existed, could easily have been made to appear, by the adduction of his license." So, also, in Wheat v. State, 6 Mo. 455, which was an indictment for keeping a ferry without a license, it was held, that the burden was on the defendant to show that he had a license, without the state offering any evidence to show the contrary.

I have now considered all the points raised on the part of the defence on this motion, and the result is, that no good ground for a new trial has been shown. The motion for a new trial must, therefore, be denied.

Case No. 14,954.

UNITED STATES v. DEVLIN et al.

[5 Int. Rev. Rec. 182.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. June, 1867.

VIOLATIONS OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—FRAUDULENT INSPECTOR'S BRAND.

[The thirty-eighth section of the act of July 13, 1866, making it a felony for "any person" to use any inspector's brand upon casks purporting to contain distilled spirits, with intent to defraud, etc., is not confined to frauds in which the inspector himself is concerned, but includes such use of the inspector's brand by any other parties.]

In this case, which was one of several indictments found against the defendants [John Devlin, T. T. Levan, F. H. Tappan, and A. J. Phillips] arising out of the great frauds in distilled spirits, the defendants demurred to the indictment on the ground that the statute had not constituted the acts charged an offence.

The demurrers were argued by:

Dist. Atty. Tracy, for United States.

Mr. Evarts, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice (orally). In this case we have looked into the question raised by the demurrer, argued by counsel on both sides, and have satisfied ourselves that the demurrer is not well taken, and it will be overruled. The first two counts in the indictment charge substantially these defendants with having put an inspector's brand upon barrels of whiskey or distilled spirits, the brand being, "Manufactured prior to Sept. 1, 1866. A. J. Phillips, Inspector, New York;" with having put this inspector's brand upon large numbers of barrels or casks of distilled spirits, which brand imports in the judgment of law that the tax upon the whiskey has been paid; has been paid by the manufacturer. That is the import of the brand, whereas the defendants knew that the liquor was manufactured subsequent to the 1st of September, 1866. They knew at the time that the taxes had not been paid, and that this brand was put on with the intent to defraud the government. That is the charge substantially of the first two counts in the indictment. The third count charges these defendants with having put upon their casks of distilled liquor a counterfeit brand—a false and counterfeit brand of the inspector—with the intent to defraud the government. Now, the act of July 13, 1866, § 38 [14 Stat. 159], contains this provision: "Any person who shall with fraudulent intent use any inspector's brands, or plates upon any cask or package containing, or purporting to contain distilled spirits, or who shall knowingly make or use any counterfeit brand or spurious brand, or plate, upon any cask or package of distilled spirits, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined $1,000, and imprisoned not less than two nor more than five years." Any person who shall with fraudulent intent use any inspector's brand, or who shall use a counterfeit brand, knowing that it was a counterfeit brand, with the intent to defraud the government, will be subject to this penalty. Our opinion is, that the first and second counts come within this portion of the thirty-eighth section.

An attempt has been made to confine this section to cases where the inspector himself is concerned in the perpetration of the fraud. In the previous part of the section there is an offence described of that kind. But this clause covers all offenses committed by any person, and therefore embraces these defendants as well as, probably, an inspector himself. A clause in the same section, in relation to the using of counterfeit brands or marks, embraces the third count of the indictment.

We are also inclined to think that the indictment is brought, at least the first and second counts would be brought, within the forty-third section. The forty-third section, among other things, provides, that any person owning any distilled spirits intended for sale, manufactured prior to the time when this act takes place, exceeding fifty gallons altogether, shall notify, in writing, the collector of the district where such spirits may be stored, held or owned, within sixty days thereafter, to gauge and prove the same; and upon receipt of said notice the collector shall cause said spirits to be gauged and proved, and the casks or packages containing the same to be marked by the inspector in the following manner: "Manufactured prior to ——, 186–, District —— Inspector," this mark or brand to be put upon these casks or barrels. Another clause of that section has this provision: "And any person who shall so brand any package containing spirits, knowing the taxes thereon have not been paid, shall forfeit such spirits, and be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." Now the charge in these counts is that certain brands described are placed upon certain casks by these defendants, knowing at the time that the taxes had not been paid; knowing also that the brand imported that they had been paid; that it was put on fraudulently and with the intent to defraud the government. There is undoubtedly a question on the statute itself —a matter of construction, which involves the only doubt in connection with the case, arising from the fact that in the subsequent part of the section another brand is referred to and made the subject of an offence. The argument is that the last clause does not embrace the previous matter described in the section. We are inclined to think that it was meant to embrace the false brand referred to in the previous part of the section. Our opinion is, that the indictment may well be sustained on all counts first, second and third, under the thirty-eighth section. We are inclined to think that the first and second counts may be sustained under the forty-third section. We must, therefore, overrule the demurrer and give judgment for the government.

On the rendering of this decision the district attorney moved the court that judgment be entered in favor of the United States against the defendants on the demurrer, and that the court proceed to sentence them on the first and second counts of the indictment, which were based on the forty-third section of the act of 1866, the offence under which was only a misdemeanor, for where a defendant demurs to an indictment for a misdemeanor, if it is decided against him, he is not allowed to plead over, but judgment absolute is rendered against him.

Mr. Evarts said that if that was the law, it was the defendant's counsel who ought to go to prison rather than the defendants.

The district attorney said that such was certainly the law settled by the court of errors of this state in the case of People v. Taylor, in 3 Denio [91], and by the courts of Connecticut, in a case which he cited from the Connecticut Reports.

NELSON, Circuit Justice, said that he would not hold the defendants to any technical rule in the matter. The questions might just as well have been raised by a motion to quash as by a demurrer, and he thought on the whole the defendants better be allowed to plead. They were accordingly notified to plead to the indictment.

[NOTE. Subsequently John Devlin was convicted upon an indictment charging him with distilling without license, and without having paid the special tax. Case No. 14,955. Motion for new trial was denied. Id. 14,953.]

Case No. 14,955.

UNITED STATES v. DEVLIN.

[7 Int. Rev. Rec. 44.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 5, 1868.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—FRAUDULENT DISTILLING—SPECIAL TAX—INDICTMENT—BURDEN OF PROOF—BAIL AFTER CONVICTION.

[1. In prosecutions for carrying on the business of a wholesale liquor dealer without a license, or without having paid the special tax, or without having kept the books required by the internal revenue laws, the burden is upon the defendants to show that they have a license or have paid the special tax and kept books as required.]

[2. Where, after conviction, time is granted for the prisoner's counsel to prepare a case and move in arrest of judgment, it seems that the court has no authority to take bail in the meantime.]

[This was an indictment against John Devlin for defrauding the government out of the tax on distilled spirits. There were indictments against Devlin and others for falsely branding spirits. See Case No. 14,954. The most material part of the defendant's evidence is given in the report below.]

Thursday, Jan. 30.

Immediately after the opening of the court, the question as to whether the count, charging the prisoner with not having kept books, should be retained in the indictment, was brought before the court by counsel for the prisoner. The judge ruled that he would retain it.

Moses Richards was the first witness called for the defence. He said that in 1866 he held the office of assistant assessor of the Fifth division of the Third district; the other assistants were Alex. M. Gurly, Nelson Northrup, and various others; a Mr. Robinson was assessor, and Mr. Bowen was collector; the business of witness was to canvass in the district and take in applications of license when brought in; on the 15th of each month a list was made of the applicants to pay special tax, and then sent into the assessor's office; knew Mr. Devlin well; also knew that he had sent in an application under the indictment; Devlin applied to him for registration; had some forms of application at that time, but wanted them; refused to give him one; furnished him, a week afterward, with a form; after having sent the form it was left at witness' office thirty days after it was sent him; put the paper in Mr. Northrup's office; had nothing to do with regard to the payment of the tax; previous to May or June, 1865, knew him only by reputation; never had any business transactions with him; was in charge of the Fifth division from November, 1865, to May, 1867; his office was No. 166 Johnson street; the plumber's shop was within his district; had been in the plumber's shop three or four times altogether; during the summer of 1866 saw Devlin every week; did not know what his business was except by hearsay; after he made his application found what he was; never saw him do business; never had his check for any purpose (prosecution here presented a check for $700 found in Devlin's check-book on the Atlantic Bank, made by Devlin to Mr. Richards. The check read "Aug. 21, M. Richards, salvage $700. Pay to bearer $700, John Devlin;) witness denied all knowledge of the check; check (produced) dated Aug. 20, for $550 was not in his handwriting; from May to August could not recollect any person who returned for a month over two barrels of whiskey; knew Peter Austin, distiller, for the four months from May to August he returned as shown by copies of returns (produced) only two barrels; made the returns of Burns.

Thos. A. Murray was examined. He said he knew Devlin; acted as clerk to him; remembered going with him to Mr. Richards in May last in regard to registry of an application for license; heard what passed between Devlin and Richards; Richards said he had not a form, but would get some that day and would send one down to Frank Devlin's plumber shop; afterward received a form of application; Jas. Devlin then got it, and it was handed, the last Sunday in June, to John Devlin; the blanks were filled up, and the Tuesday following the application paper was carried to Mr. Richards' house and laid on the desk; Mrs. Richards only was there inside.

Richards was then recalled. He said Patrick Burns was a distiller; but did not know anything about the capacity of his distillery; saw the paper (produced) which showed the capacity of his still was 125 gallons; could not say whether that was so; was book-keeper in a distillery; the return of Patrick Burns for the month of May showed that taxes had been paid on 202 gallons of whiskey.

Friday, Jan. 31.

Immediately on the opening of the court the cross-examination by the district attorney of Moses Richards was resumed. The witness identified thirty-three applications for distilleries (produced) as having been made during his term of office, and transmitted by him to the assessor; identified monthly returns of distillers (produced) taken before him, and by him transmitted to the assessor's office; it was not his duty to visit these distilleries from day to day or week to week; was obliged to visit only once a month; did not remember that a distiller should make a statement every ten days as to the quantity on mash; that book (produced) was a tri-monthly book; but sworn statements were only made monthly; never was in the habit of signing blank affidavits; a blank, or rather partly filled form of affidavit (produced) was signed by him, but he did not see what it was signed for; when the registers for license came in he filed them on the back; the applications (produced) were signed by him according to usual custom; did not file or indorse Mr. Devlin's application; could not say whether any indorsement was filled on it or not.

The direct examination being resumed, the witness said that Devlin not being in his district he did not indorse the application, but had it put in Mr. Northrup's box; did not know who filled up the blank affidavit not sworn to; could not tell whether the blank affidavits in Mr. Rice's books were sworn to; never heard any complaint against himself of irregularity of conduct in the office of assessor; never before had seen the check-books of Mr. Devlin; knew nothing about them other than what was shown him in court; resigned at the suggestion of the assessor.

John W. Salvage testified that since the 1st of June, 1867, he had acted as clerk in the assessor's office, Third district of New York; found among the papers in the assessor's office an application from John Devlin; the paper (produced) was not that found, but this paper (produced) was the one found in the assessor's office; it was an application paper from Devlin, and found in the January monthly papers in the assessor's office.

Richard C. Egan, clerk in the assessor's office, deposed that an application paper was handed him in the office; he was searching for it at the time, but failed to get it, and another clerk of a former collector handed it to him; could not tell where the clerk got the paper; a Mr. Tappen handed it to him; found a paper in the assessor's office, of which he took a certified copy.

Charles Tappen, clerk in the collector's office, deposed that he knew an application paper had been handed in, and having searched for it, found it; if an applicant wished to pay in advance of the monthly list, the collector required the assessor to send up a duplicate of the application.

Thomas A. Murray swore that the partly-filled affidavit alluded to previously was not filled in by Richards, though he believed the signature was that gentleman's; could not say whether the paper found was the same as that handed in in May.

John D. Carrol deposed that official papers that went to Mr. Northrup were all turned over to the succeeding assessor.

Counsel on both sides then agreed that Mr. McCormack did not receive the application paper, or take it away from the assessor's office.

Mr. Evarts proposed next to read the receipt dated Feb. 6 and 7, for tax paid for the year ending May, 1867, also a receipt dated March 13, 1867, for the reassessment of Aug. 1, 1866, which was made necessary by the act of 1864 [13 Stat. 223]. Both papers were objected to.

Mr. Murray was recalled, and said he acted in Mr. Devlin's employment in the capacity of clerk; he kept no book, but did errands for Mr. Devlin, and sometimes filled up his check-books; took deposits on the bank for Francis Devlin but was paid by John; from February to May did not receive money from John Devlin to deposit in the bank; did nothing particular or general for him; was paid $20 a week; did everything he was asked to do; check-books were on the table, and anybody could write in them; often scribbled in them; could not tell his own hand-writing in blocks of check-books produced; John Devlin, wife and child, boarded in witness' house in Carlton avenue.

Mr. Evarts applied for permission to give oral evidence of the contents of the application-paper handed in in May which was refused. Documents relative to the granting of a license to Devlin in February last were handed in, after which the proceedings were adjourned to Monday.

Monday, Feb. 3.

THE COURT announced that he would exclude papers—a duplicate application and another paper found after Devlin's arrest—offered by the defence on Friday as evidence, but would give them the benefit of an exception.

Frederick J. Warburton swore to the accuracy of the stenographic report of proceedings taken before Commissioner Newton. As to the correctness of Mr. Cocheu's testimony, impugned by that gentleman, witness said the evidence was correct, with the exception of a few trifling verbal errors.

Charles Tappen, recalled and examined, deposed that in the book of special tax assessment the letters "D. N." meant "Demand Notice."

The district-attorney then offered in evidence the testimony of Cocheu, taken before the commissioner.

The evidence was objected to, and his honor ruled it out.

The district-attorney next offered to read a letter written by Mr. Devlin to Mr. Cocheu, which would be corroborative evidence of the conversation between both gentlemen.

THE COURT admitted the evidence.

The handwriting of the letter having been proved, the document itself was read. It ran thus: "Oct. 2, 1866. Dear Sir: My liberal offer of this morning, the same as I extend to others, which you refused, is withdrawn. This is after reflection and consultation. Your manner seemed menacing and defiant. I never submit to it from any one, especially from one so vulnerable as Mr. Cocheu. If you wish me to consider it as a challenge to test our strength in certain quarters, I accept it. Yours, &c., John Devlin."

John W. Salvage swore that he made an abstract of returns (produced) which was correct.

Mr. Brady then spoke for the defence. He argued that his client was merely a broker, and it was therefore unnecessary for him to keep a book. He entered very fully into the case, arguing it at great length, and finally asked for a verdict for his client.

Mr. Stoughton replied on the part of the government. He recapitulated the evidence, and said from the state of facts presented, there was no other course open for the jury but to find a verdict for the government.

THE COURT then charged the jury: This case that now closes carries with it great responsibility. Responsibility on the jurymen in any case is no very light thing. It is dependent in this case, from the nature of the cause, for this is a revenue cause, an effort on the part of the treasury department of the United States to enforce the revenue laws of the country—laws upon which rest the credit of the country, laws which touch every portion of society, and upon which almost the life of the nation rests—most unpleasant laws, laws which must be enforced, which in any country that expects to live must be obeyed, both by the poor and the rich, by the powerful as well as by the weak, and those laws can be enforced in a free government but in two ways, and both lead through the courts of law. They provide as a means of enforcing them forfeiture, where the government seizes the property of persons claimed to have violated those laws, and confiscates, forfeits, sells it, hoping thereby to compel obedience to the laws by the milder form of punishment by losing property. The other feature—method of enforcing—is by criminal prosecution, in which a party is charged with offending those laws. Although having many severe features, although stringent in their terms, they are not necessarily harsh statutes. Whether they were so or were not, would be of small consequence here, for your duty and mine would be to impose them; but that you may not be under the impression that you are asked in this or in any other case to enforce a law that is hard and harsh, it is only necessary to consider that in the first place for violation of that law, it rests with the government prosecutor whether he will prosecute. If he determines that the prosecution must be pursued, the matter then goes before the grand jury, and the grand jury must say whether they think it must be prosecuted. If they so declare by their indictment, it comes into a court of justice, before a court and jury, and there, in most instances, great discretion is conveyed, giving to the court in the matter of punishment, as in this case, the option to inflict a fine ranging from $10 to $500, and the term of imprisonment from a few days to two years; and if the grand jury found the man guilty, the case comes, as I said, before a petty jury, so that the law is law, and may be enforced without any unnecessary harshness. Now, government having tried, as is well known, in the enforcing of this revenue law, the milder form of punishment by forfeiture, has at last been driven to resort to criminal prosecution. It is the last resort. If criminal offenders against the United States can pass through courts and go free, there is no other way in a free government by which the revenue can be collected. Upon the juries of the country rests the responsibility of saying in all revenue cases whether or no this law shall be obeyed, and that is the responsibility that is upon you in this case. Now I don't say this to have you suppose that this man's cause is to be disposed of upon no general considerations, nor upon facts or law of other cases. He is entitled here in this case, as every criminal, every prisoner, every defendant is, to have his own case judged upon its own law and its own facts, without reference to its effect upon the community, and that must be the judgment in this case. But every criminal prosecution has two objects in view, one to punish the offender for the crime he has committed, and the other by the example to prevent others from committing the like offence, and so that the general consideration of the object of these prosecutions is the proper thing—the necessary thing for you to consider in order that you may come to a proper conclusion. Realize the responsibility which rests upon you when you are called upon to decide a case of this kind. I am making these remarks with reference to the responsibility more freely in this case, because, I say frankly and under a sense of my own responsibility, that under the law, as I understand it, and under the evidence as it appears to me, there is no doubt as to the judgment which should follow the prosecution. In such a case, where there is so little doubt, the responsibility comes upon the jury clean and clear. It should be realized. Now, this is no action to recover $50 or $100. It is no case of a contract between the government of the United States or any of the United States officers and John Devlin. It has another signification. As a matter of money, it makes but little difference whether a man of the Ninth or Fifth ward runs a distillery, produces a few gallons of whiskey, or whether this prisoner brought fifty or one hundred gallons, and did not pay the tax on them into the treasury on such a day. It is, as a matter of money, little; but whether or no this man or the other man shall or shall not obey the law is a matter of great moment, and that is the question here. This man is prosecuted because he has, if the facts be true as the witnesses have sworn, because he has declined and refused to obey the law, and that gives the case a great significance. Now realize your responsibility. I call your attention to your rights and duties as jurymen, to rights and duties which you, in common with all juries called in courts of justice, have in this case. In our country a jury in most classes of cases, is a part of every court of justice. In many lands there is no jury; cases are passed on—all the facts—by one judge or three judges. In our country, in some classes of cases, the judge passes upon the law and facts. In the admiralty cases tried here I am never assisted by a jury, for I myself alone have to assume the responsibility and pass upon the law and facts. But in ordinary court cases there is always in our country a jury, and the jury passes upon the facts, and the court passes upon the law. Under that class of cases, there are also other considerations that the judge there has the right, as in civil cases, to indicate to the jury to direct their verdict by his own opinion of the evidence. When there is no dispute about the facts, then the judge directs the jury, and the jury find upon the opinion of the court on the evidence what the verdict should be. But when you come to a criminal case, under our form of government the case must always go to the jury, and the responsibility shifts from the court to the jury, who pass upon facts, and whose verdict is final. They pass upon the facts alone; they take the law. You must take the law in your case as you receive it from the court; you have no right to differ; you have no right to doubt, for the purposes of this case.

The law as declared from the bench is the only law you can look to. That law you have a right to apply to the facts as you find them. and on that you render your verdict—which is conclusive. That is your duty here, to consider the facts, and I will declare the law. Let us look to see what the case is—for you must still remember this case is the case we are to try and no other. This man, the prisoner at the bar, is charged with three offences, all made criminal by the law. In the first place, he is charged with having carried on the business of a wholesale dealer in liquor, from the months of May to September, 1866, without having a license. In such a case the onus of proof, as to whether a man has or has not a license, rests on the defendant. The government is not bound to prove that a man has a license, for the very simple reason that that man has merely to produce his license if he has one. In this case, from the evidence as it stands, there is no evidence to show that a license has been taken out by John Devlin for carrying on the business of a wholesale dealer in liquor from May to September, 1866; so that the question is, "Did he carry on the business of a wholesale dealer in liquor in this district during that period?" That is the question of fact for you to pass upon. The definition of a wholesale dealer is fixed by the statute, which declares that a wholesale dealer is a person who shall sell liquor in quantities exceeding three gallons to one person at the same time, and a person who carries on that business of dealing in those wholesale quantities is an offender where he has no license. So then you see clearly the question you have to ask yourselves. Look at this, which I think is the second count, but which in point of time is the first charge. Did he carry on the business of dealing for gain in disposing of those wholesale quantities of liquor in this district? If you find that he did, why then you are bound to render your verdict of guilty. You heard the evidence here. You have heard what the witnesses said, and you are bound to believe the witnesses unless in the circumstances attending the transaction as proved, or in the other matter there was something to lead you to discredit their statements; but if there are no circumstances which lead you to doubt the evidence of Mr. Paffer, Cunningham and another witness which you recollect having before you—if you believe the statements of these witnesses, then you are bound to say the man carried on the business of a wholesale dealer in liquor at this time without having had a license. There is no evidence in the case that will warrant you in finding he was a pedler. The question is, was he a pedler, after the definition of a pedler as given in the statute? And I charge you that he was not, and the person, if he feels aggrieved by this statement of the law, may have the benefit of an exception. We dispose of the first charge. The simple question of fact I don't direct on. I direct the law, and upon you is the responsibility of saying if this man carried on the business as a business of dealing for gain—this dealing in the article of liquor—during the period I have mentioned.

Now, the next charge, which is the first charge in this indictment, is that, after September, he carried on the business of a wholesale dealer in liquor without having paid a special tax. The 1st of September the law was changed, no more licenses were required, but a man was bound to register himself, as he was under the first statute, with the assessor of his district, and after registering to apply to the collector, and there pay the sum which was called special tax, for which he got a receipt; and it is declared by the law that any man who carries on the business without having paid the special tax is a vender; and the charge is here that after this law came into operation, which was after September, the person charged—the accused—carried on the business of a wholesale dealer in liquors without having paid this tax. Here also, as in the other case, the burden did rest upon him to prove that he had paid the tax, and he has failed to prove he paid it. So here it is the same question as in the first charge. Did he, during this different period, carry on the business of a wholesale dealer in liquor? It is sworn to by others of these witnesses. You remember what the evidence is. You will consider and say, on your oaths, whether or no he dealt in this article of liquor, in quantities exceeding three gallons, for the latter period mentioned in the indictment. The third charge is distinct, arising out of the same person's occupation, and it is that he failed to keep books as provided by law. The law in that behalf declares that every wholesale dealer in liquor shall keep a book stating in it the persons from whom he buys, the quantity of his dealings, and it makes it a penalty—an offence—not to keep this book, and that is the law of the land. It was a law which was obligatory upon this man if he was a wholesale dealer, and the question here is, as in the other, had he kept a book in which his sales were entered and his purchases? But it is not shown that he did keep a book. The burden was upon him, and you will recollect the evidence of the witnesses on that point. If he was a wholesale dealer and failed to keep a book, then he must be found guilty under this charge. Those are the three charges to be borne in your mind. They are distinct from each other, and must be passed on by you, and they are, as I said in the first place, by no means trivial. Then the difficulty about this law is that many suppose that the simple feature of it is one particular thing; that each particular thing is trivial and unimportant. It is not for you or me to say whether it is important that he should keep a book, but the law says that he shall. So then, gentlemen, there you have the case. Three charges against the man are to be passed upon by you, and your verdict is to be rendered by your oaths as you find the facts to be. Only one conclusion can be arrived at, but it will be your conclusion and not mine. This person—this prisoner—is entitled in this case, as every prisoner is, to the benefit of every reasonable doubt upon the facts. It must be a reasonable doubt, and that he should have, if a reasonable doubt can be found to exist. Your duty is, under the law, to consider the evidence, and if you believe the testimony that has been offered, and you think there is no reasonable doubt but that he carried on the business, in these quantities, you will find him guilty —otherwise you will acquit him.

After an absence of about ten minutes the jury returned with a verdict of guilty on all three counts.

Mr. Evarts asked for time to make a case and to move in arrest of judgment, and on consultation between counsel and the court the 24th of February was fixed for the hearing of the motion.

THE COURT then ordered the accused to be remanded to custody. His counsel stated that they supposed he was already on sufficient bail in this case and under the other indictments. [See Case No. 14,954.]

The district-attorney said it was not sufficient in the present state of the case, and there might be a doubt as to taking bail after conviction.

Application to Put in Bail.

Wednesday, Feb. 5.

BENEDICT, District Judge, gave his opinion on the application to admit the prisoner to bail. He said: "I have considered the matter of bailing John Devlin, and made inquiries as to the practice in the Southern district court. A doubt is supposed to exist as to the power of taking bail after conviction under the words of the statute which permits bail to be taken. The practice seems to have been not to take bail. There being a doubt with the court as to taking bail that is sufficient to defeat the application in the present case, the prisoner must be remanded until the argument takes place."

UNITED STATES v. DEWEY.

[6 Biss. 501.] [1]

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. Jan., 1876.

JUDGMENT—RECOVERY IN ANOTHER STATE—BAR.

It is a good plea that since the commencement of a suit, judgment was recovered between the same parties in another federal court upon the same cause of action. It is immaterial which suit was first commenced.

[Cited in Radford v. Folsom, 14 Fed. 100.]

This was an action brought to recover the sum of $6,215 of the defendant [Nelson Dewey] as one of the sureties of George W. Gaffitt and James J. Dewey, upon a bond given by them to the United States, on the 7th day of January, 1868, as manufacturers of friction matches, etc., conditioned to pay for all revenue stamps that might be needed by them from the commissioner of internal revenue, from time to time, according to law. There were two other sureties upon the bond, who reside in New York, where the principals also reside. It is now shown that prior to the commencement of this suit, a suit was prosecuted by the United States, in the district court for the Southern district of New York, against all the parties to the bond, but that service was not made on Dewey, as he was a resident of this state, but that after this suit was at issue, he voluntarily appeared in that suit, and thus gave that court jurisdiction over him. It further apears by the affidavit of defendant, filed on this motion, that on the 7th day of December, 1875, judgment was obtained against all of the defendants therein, including himself, for the amount claimed as due upon the bond. Upon this state of facts, the defendant, when the case was called for trial, moved for leave to file a plea setting up these facts, by a plea puis darrein continuance, as a bar to the further prosecution of this action.

H. M. Lewis, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Gregory & Pinney, for defendant.

HOPKINS, District Judge. I was not cited, nor have I been able to find a decision of the federal courts upon this question, or whether the pendency of a suit in one district may be plead in abatement to a suit in another district of the federal courts. I find that the decisions of the United States circuit courts are not in accord upon the right to plead the pendency of a suit for the same cause of action in the state courts in abatement to suits prosecuted afterwards in the United States courts, although I think the weight of authority in those courts is in favor of the right, particularly when the suit is pending in the same state with such courts.

Judge Love, in Brooks v. Mills County [Case No. 1,955], has examined and collected the authorities sustaining this view with great industry. Justice Clifford, in Lowring v. Marsh [Id. 8,514], says, however, that the rule has always been that such a plea was not good in the First circuit, but in this circuit it has been the other way. Earl v. Raymond [Id. 4,243].

The question has never been decided by the supreme court of the United States. I must say I do not see any satisfactory reason for denying the plea in abatement of suits pending in the courts of other states. Multiplicity of litigation is vexatious, and should be discouraged, and only when necessary should any suit be sustained, and when a party sues in one jurisdiction, I do not see why he should be allowed to sue at the same time in another, for the same cause of action. On that point I concur with the intimation of the court in 30 Vt. 538, hereafter cited.

But it may not be necessary to decide that question in this case, for here it is alleged that there has been a recovery for the same cause of action. If so, it is a merger, and no recovery can be had in any other court, state or federal, upon the same cause of action. This is too well settled to be questioned. Mason v. Eldred, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 231; Eldred v. Bank, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 545; Freem. Judgm. § 186.

In this case it appears that as to this defendant this court first got jurisdiction, so that the suit in New York could not for that reason have been plead in abatement to this suit, hence the question whether a plea of a suit pending in another district for the same cause is immaterial to consider on this motion.

The matter proposed to be set up does not go to the form of the remedy, but to the right to maintain the action at all. It shows that the cause of action is gone—is merged in a judgment,—and therefore, no longer in a legal sense exists. Nicholl v. Mason, 21 Wend. 339. This is the rule prevailing in regard to suits prosecuted in different states at the same time. The pendency of the one first commenced cannot be plead in abatement to another subsequently prosecuted in another state, but a judgment in either without reference to the question as to which was commenced first, may be plead in bar to the other. Bank of U. S. v. Merchants' Bank of Baltimore, 7 Gill, 415; Bank of North America v. Wheeler, 28 Conn. 433; McGilvray v. Avery, 30 Vt. 538; Rogers v. Odell, 39 N. H. 452; 1 Chit. Pl. 454.

This doctrine is held to necessarily result from the provision in the constitution of the United States, that the judicial proceedings of each state shall have like effect in every state as in the state where they were taken. But I think the effect given to judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction, by the common law, would lead to the same conclusion.

As the defendant appeared in that case, the judgment therein extinguished the cause of action. But there does not seem to be any advantage accruing to the United States by prosecuting this suit to judgment, for an execution issued upon the judgment obtained in the Southern district of New York, may run into and be executed in this state as well as if issued from this court (Rev. St. U. S. § 986), so that the reason for admitting that judgment as a bar to this suit is much stronger than in a case between private parties, where executions are confined to the states where judgment is recovered. The motion of the defendant is therefore granted.

BASTARDY—COMPLAINT—JURISDICTION.

In cases of bastardy this court has no jurisdiction, unless upon complaint of the overseers of the poor of the county.

A case of bastardy.

Mr. Taylor, for the defendant [David Dick, Jr.], contended that no proceeding can be instituted against the reputed father of a bastard child but on application by the overseers of the poor of the county, or of one of them. Laws Va. Dec. 26, 1792, § 23. But the application, in this case, was made by Jonathan Swift, who was a trustee of the poor of the town, under a by-law of the corporation of Alexandria.

Mr. Swann, contra. That relates only to the manner of bringing the party before the court, but being now before the court, it has authority to make an order for the support of the child, and to indemnify the county.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said that they had no jurisdiction. That in order to give this court jurisdiction, the application must be made by an overseer of the poor of the county.

UNITED STATES v. DICKINSON.

[Hempst. 1.] [2]

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Jan., 1820.

RAPE—INDICTMENT—JURY.

1. It is not a fatal defect in an indictment for rape that it also alleges that the woman was gotten with child.

2. Before a jury is made up, incompetent jurors who have been summoned, may be discharged, and others summoned in their places.

Indictment [against Thomas Dickinson] for rape.

Before SCOTT, J.

This was an indictment for rape committed on the person of Sally Hall, to which the defendant pleaded not guilty, and there was a trial by jury composed of Richmond Peeler, Charles Roberts, Manuel Roderigue, John Jordolas, Jacques Gocio, Stephen Vasseau, Nathal Vasseau, Michael Petterson, John Pertua, Manuel Pertua, Pierre Mitchell, and Attica Nodall, who, after hearing evidence and arguments of counsel, retired to consult of their verdict, and, after deliberation, returned into court the following, namely, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of rape, in manner and form as in the indictment alleged."

The counsel for the prisoner moved in arrest of judgment for the following reasons: "(1) It does not appear by the indictment that the same was found by the grand jurors of the United States. (2) No place is mentioned in the indictment where the offence was committed, nor is it mentioned in what year it was committed. (3) The assault and rape are not positively and directly charged in the indictment. (4) It is not stated to have been feloniously committed. (6) It is not alleged in the indictment that Sally Hall was in the peace of God and the United States when the offence is alleged to have been committed. (7) Two offences, which are inconsistent with each other, are alleged to have been committed at the same time, in the indictment, namely, rape on Sally Hall, and the getting her with child.[2] (8) The place of residence and occupation of the accused is not mentioned in the indictment. (9) It appears by the record that H. Armstrong was foreman of the grand jury who found the bill of indictment, and that H. Armstrong is not a competent juror, not having resided 12 months in this territory. (10) Three jurors were dismissed by the court after they were sworn, and before they found a verdict, as appears from the record."[3]

Joshua Norvell, for the United States.

Jasin Chamberlain, Henry Cassady, Alexander S. Walker, and Perly Wallis, for prisoner.

THE COURT overruled the motion, and said that some of the reasons urged in arrest of judgment were not sustained by the record; that others were not proper grounds in arrest of judgment, and that some had not been presented at the proper time nor in a proper manner, if good at all.

The prisoner being asked if he had any objection why sentence should not be pronounced against him on the verdict of the jury, said that he objected to any sentence, because he was advised that the indictment did not properly charge the commission of a felony.

[2] The old notion that if the woman conceived, it could not be a rape, because she must in such case have consented, is quite exploded. 1 Hale, P. C. 631; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 41, § 8; 1 East, P. C. p. 445, c. 10, § 7; 1 Russ. Crimes, p. 677. Impregnation, it is well known, does not depend on the consciousness or volition of the female. If the uterine organs be in a condition favorable to impregnation, this may take place as readily as if the intercourse was voluntary. Tayl. Med. Jur.

[3] Before the jury was made up, three persons who had been sworn as jurors, namely, William A. Luckie, John O'Regan, and Thomas Stephens, were discharged on the motion of the prosecuting attorney, on the ground that they had not resided 12 months in the territory (Geyer, Dig. p. 34), and others were ordered to be sworn in their places, and to this proceeding, the counsel of the accused objected.

THE COURT disregarded his objection, and sentenced him to be castrated according to the law in that behalf provided, by a skillful physician, under the direction of the sheriff of Arkansas county, on the 15th February, 1820, between 10 o'clock a. m., and 3 o'clock p. m., of that day.[4]

A motion was made by the prisoner for a writ of error coram nobis, but the motion was overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1840.

INDICTMENT — COUNTS — ELECTION — WITNESS — CHARACTER—IMPEACHMENT—LEADING QUESTIONS.

1. The court will not compel the prosecuting attorney to elect on which count in the indictment he will try the defendant, where there are different counts, charging offences of different grades, of the same class, and connected with the same transaction.

[This was an indictment against Daniel J. Dickinson for larceny from the United States mail.]

The Prosecuting Attorney, for the Government.

Anthony & Swayne, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an indictment for stealing letters and packets from the mail of the United States. The indictment contained nine counts, as follows: 1. For stealing the mail; 2. Stealing letters and packets out of the mail; 3. Stealing the mail, and opening it, and taking therefrom certain bank notes; 4. Stealing from the mail three certain letters containing bank notes; 5. For cutting the mailbag, with intent to steal, and take a letter therefrom; 6. For being present, aiding and assisting Charles Bostwick in stealing the mail; 7. For receiving certain bank notes, knowing them to have been stolen; 8. For concealing certain bank notes, knowing them to have been stolen from the mail; 9. For aiding Bostwick in concealing certain bank notes, knowing them to have been stolen from the mail.

After the defendant had pleaded not guilty, and before the jury were called, the counsel for the defendant moved that the district attorney be required to make an election, on which count in the indictment he will rely for a conviction of the defendant; and English Crown Cases, 234, was cited in support of the motion. It was opposed by the district attorney.

The principal ground on which an election by the prosecuting attorney is urged, is, that by including distinct offences in the same indictment, the defendant is restricted in his right of challenge. He may be willing to be tried by some of the jurors on some of the counts, but unwilling that they should pass upon others. It is clear that offences of a different class, and which require different punishments, as murder and larceny, can not be joined in the same indictment. In the case of Young v. Rex, in error, 3 Term R. 106, the court held that it was no objection in arrest of judgment, that the indictment contains several charges of the same nature in the different counts. The same principle was held in 2 Maule & S. 379. Lord Kenyon remarked, the judgment on all the counts is precisely the same; a misdemeanor is charged in each. Most probably the charges were meant to meet the same facts; but, if it were not so, I think they might be joined in the same indictment. In the case of Reg. v. Strange, 8 Car. & P. 172, it was held that the offences of stabbing and cutting, with intent to murder, and with intent to maim and disable, although the judgment differs, being capital on the first count, and not on the others, they would not require the prosecutor to elect on which charge he will proceed.

It is no objection, in point of law, that an indictment charges prisoners, in one count, as principals in stealing, and, in another, as receivers; but, upon a case reserved, the judges were divided in opinion, whether the prosecutor should have been put to his election, and directed that both charges should not, for the future, be put in the same indictment. Rex v. Galloway, 1 Moody, Crown Cas. 234. And a rule was subsequently adopted by the judges, that, in a case like the above, the prosecutor should be put to his election. Rex v. Flower, 3 Car. & P. 413. But this being a rule of practice, merely, is not received as an authority. A count charging a person with being accessory before the fact, may be joined with a count charging him with being accessory after the fact, to the same felony; and the prosecutor can not be required to elect upon which he will proceed, as the party may be found guilty on both. Rex v. Blackson, 8 Car. & P. 43. A receiver may be indicted as an accessory in one count, and for a substantive felony in another count; and although, in his discretion, the judge may put the prosecutor to his election, he will not do so whenever it is clear that there is only one offence, and the joinder of counts can not prejudice the defendant. Rex v. Austin, 7 Car. & P. 796; Rex v. Hartall, Id. 475; Rex v. Wheeler, Id. 170. Although a prosecutor can not charge a defendant with different felonies, in different counts; yet he may charge the same felony in different ways, in several counts, in order to meet the facts of the case. Archb. Cr. Pl. (Ed. 1840) 56.

[4] This sentence was not executed, the prisoner having been pardoned by James Miller, the governor of Arkansas territory.

The first five counts in the indictment charge, substantially, the same offence, though taking a letter or packet which contains bank notes, as charged in the third and fourth counts, is punished by a higher penalty. In fact, the court can not but know that all the counts in the indictment relate to the same transaction, and that the variation of the form in which the offence is charged, in the different counts, is done with a view to meet the evidence, and that they present only different grades of the same offence. Should the jury convict the defendant under the third or fourth counts, it would virtually cover all the other counts. There could be but one punishment. This subject must depend, in a great degree, on the exercise of a sound discretion by the court. They will see that offences shall not be so joined, in the same indictment, as to deprive the defendant of any right which the law gives him. Experience shows the propriety, and, indeed, necessity of charging the offence in different ways, so as to meet the proof; and within the knowledge of the court, no injustice has been done, under this practice, to defendants. And we think, that in a case like the present, great injustice would be done to the public, by compelling the prosecuting attorney to make an election. The motion is, therefore, overruled.

The jury being sworn, in the course of the examination of the witnesses, Bostwick, who was the driver of the mail stage at the time the mail is charged to have been robbed, and who, having been indicted for the same at the present term, pleaded guilty, was offered as a witness by the prosecuting attorney; and the court held that sentence not having been passed on him he was a competent witness. That the circumstances under which he was offered, could be used to impeach his credit. He was informed, however, by the court, that he was not bound to state any fact which would criminate himself. Eliza French was, also, called as a witness, and, while under examination, was asked a question which, if answered one way, would show her character to be infamous; and the court informed her that she need not answer the question. Witnesses were afterwards called to impeach her character, and on a question being asked whether she was not a lewd woman, the court interposed, and said that the question must be restricted to her general character for veracity. See U. S. v. Vansickle [Case No. 16,609], and the authorities there cited. A question was then asked a witness whether Eliza French had not stated, in his hearing, certain facts, with the view of discrediting her evidence, by showing that such statement was materially different from the facts sworn to by her. This was objected to, and the court sustained the objection, on the ground that as the witness, when under examination, had not been questioned as to such statement, it could not be proved to discredit her. That to lay the foundation for such evidence, Eliza French must have been asked, when under examination, whether she made such statement. M'Kinney v. Neil [Id. 8,865]; 1 Phil. Ev. (Ed. 1839) 293; 2 Brod. & B. 286, 315. Eliza French was again called, without objection, and the question was asked her whether she had made a certain statement, repeating the substance of it, to an individual, naming him, which she answered in the negative. After this the impeaching evidence was heard. And certain questions were asked of her, by the defendants' counsel, in regard to certain matters which, though they had a remote relation to the subject matter of inquiry, had no direct relevancy, with the view of contradicting her answers, to discredit her. This was objected to, and the court sustained the objection.

Such questions must be relevant to the matter in issue. Spenceley v. De Willott, 7 East, 110. If the answer were given on a collateral matter, no contradictory evidence could be heard. Harris v. Tippett, 2 Camp. 638; 1 Blackf. 86; Ellmaker v. Buckley, 16 Serg. & R. 77. This question came distinctly before the supreme court, at the last term, in the case of Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 461, in which the court said, "that a party has no right to cross-examine any witness except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination." A witness may be examined as to expressions or acts conducing to show a bias for or against either of the parties. Under this rule it might be proper to ask the witness, whether he did not prevent, or endeavor to prevent, the attendance of a witness, and whether he did not threaten to be revenged of one of the parties. This has no direct relevancy to the matters in issue, but it affects the credit of the witness, and, therefore, is admissible.

In the course of the examination an inquiry was submitted to the court, as to the form of a question to be propounded to a witness in chief. The court said it was extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to adopt any form which would be proper in all cases. The rule is, that a question shall not be so propounded to a witness as to indicate the answer desired. The form laid down in some of the books, "do you or do you not known," &c., is a leading question, and may be so emphasized as to indicate, in the strongest terms, the desired answer. It is a matter of no great difficulty, in every examination of a witness, by a general remark, to inform him on what points he is to be examined, and then to elicit his knowledge respecting them, by such questions as do not lead to the answer desired. In the crossexamination leading questions are admissible on the ground that the witness, having been called by one party, may not be equally willing to disclose all he knows that shall be favorable to the other. And there may be circumstances, arising from the conduct of a witness, which shall require leading questions to be put to him, when examined as a witness in chief. This matter must depend upon the judgment of the court.

Except the above, no questions of law were raised in the course of the trial; and it is not deemed necessary to state the facts which were submitted to the jury. The verdict was, "Not guilty."

INTERNAL REVENUE LAW—PROCESS FOR VINEGAR MAKING—PRODUCTION OF ALCOHOL.

[The owner of a vinegar manufactory is liable under 15 St. 125, if by the process used by him he obtains alcohol from his mash so that he is saved the expense of purchasing the alcohol necessary for the making of vinegar.]

[This was a proceeding to forfeit distillery at 390 Eleventh avenue, New York City.]

Roger M. Sherman, Asst. U. S. Atty.

Charles S. Spencer, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge (charging jury). There is a single question, and but a single question, according to my understanding of the law as applicable to this case, for your consideration. This defendant was, according to the testimony, a maker of vinegar. His ultimate product was vinegar. There is no testimony to show that any distilled spirits, as such, came out of his establishment, and the evidence to the contrary is about as strong as negative evidence can be. His establishment according to the testimony was watched to see whether it was not used for making distilled spirits, but the officers never found anything of the kind. So that it is quite clear that there was not any illicit action on the part of Mr. Jessen in producing spirits there, and taking it away out of the establishment, as spirits. He was a vinegar maker. Several statutes have been passed on the subject, which have been read and commented upon, and in 1868, in consequence of various decisions of the court, the law was passed, which is embodied now in the Revised Statutes [15 St. 125]. The substance of the law, as I understand it, is that a person may make a mash out of molasses, and water, and yeast, and just such a mash as a distiller would make, if he were going to make distilled spirits or rum, and such person may lawfully make this mash to be used exclusively to make vinegar, but he must not apply to that mash a process of distillation which, by the use of a still, or of a vessel equivalent to a still, will give him substantially in his vinegar the product of this mash, in the shape of alcohol, just as if, at the point where the product of such still enters into the mixture, he had put in alcohol from the outside, instead of having that alcohol as the result of the process he uses. That is the law. It is for you to say, on the evidence, whether you believe that the defendant, by his process substantially introduced spirits into his mixture, and had the spirits there for subsequent oxydation to make vinegar. We know that vinegar is the result of the oxydation of spirituous substances, which are oxydized by exposure to air. In the process of making vinegar in large quantities, shavings and charcoal, and other substances are used, which will make an extensive surface for exposure of the alcohol to the air, and promote rapid oxydation. If Mr. Jessen, by this process of his, got some alcohol out of his mash, by the use of his boiler, and was thus saved some expense of purchasing alcohol outside, he is liable in this case, otherwise he is not. The government must make out its case by a fair proponderance of evidence. This substantially covers all the questions in this case In so far as what I have said does not concur with the requests on the part of the government, I must be considered as declining to charge in accordance with those requests. You will understand, gentlemen, that the testimony of Mr. Jessen is, that after his product entered the receiver in his basement, it was pumped upstairs, and alcohol was added and it was put through generators. But the point is whether he got into his mixture any alcohol, which was a substitute for other alcohol, which he would otherwise have been obliged to buy to put into it.

A Juror. Can we use our technical knowledge?

THE COURT. You must go according to the evidence.

The jury could not agree upon a verdict, and were consequently discharged, ten being for forfeiture, and two against.

With the intimation of the court, on a motion for a retrial, that the process adopted was clearly illegal, the motion was granted. The agreement was tendered by the claimant, that the apparatus used by him should be at once torn down by him in the presence of a deputy collector, and a certificate being furnished by the deputy collector of its destruction, the government agreed not to press the motion.

UNITED STATES v. DISTILLERY AT PETERSBURG.

[1 Hughes, 533;[1] 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 195; 8 Chi. Leg. News, 314.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. 1876.

INTERNAL REVENUE — DISTILLER'S BOOKS — FOR WHAT PURPOSE KEPT—SEIZURE OF BOOKS—EVIDENCE.

1. The books of a distiller, kept in accordance with sections 3303 and 3304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are quasi records, false entries in which, or an omission to make such entries as the law requires in which, or a refusal to produce which, on proper demand, will subject the distillery to forfeiture.

2. The seizure of such books by a collector of internal revenue upon an order of one of the executive departments of the government, given in the legitimate exercise of its duties, is not a "judicial proceeding" in the contemplation of section 860 of the Revised Statutes, such as deprives the government of the right to use them as evidence in the trial of a libel for forfeiture filed against such a distillery.

The facts of the case of the United States against a distillery [owned by M. & E. Myers] at Petersburg were as follows: Section 3303 of the Revised Statutes provides that every distillery shall, from day to day, make, or cause to be made, in a book or books to be kept by him in such form as the commissioner of internal revenue may prescribe, certain specified entries recording in detail his transactions at the distillery. Section 3304 then provides that these books "shall always be kept at the distillery, and be always open to the inspection of every revenue officer, * * * and whenever required shall be produced for the inspection of any revenue officer."

On the 1st day of November, 1875, the collector of internal revenue for the Second collection district of Virginia, acting under special authority for that purpose from the commissioner of internal revenue, seized the distillery, which is the subject-matter of this action, for a violation of section 3257 of the Revised Statutes, and with it took possession of the books kept upon the premises pursuant to the requirements of section 3303. At the trial of this suit in the district court, the United States, to maintain the issue on their part, offered these books in evidence, but the claimants objected to their admissibility, upon the ground that they had been obtained from the distillers by means of a judicial proceeding. This objection was based upon section 860 of the Revised Statutes which is as follows: "No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence obtained from any party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him, or his property or estate, in any court of the United States in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture; provided, that this section shall not exempt any party or witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in discovering or testifying as aforesaid." The district court sustained the objection and excluded the evidence. To this ruling the United States excepted in due form upon the record, and the question presented for consideration stands upon that exception.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. The books of a distiller, kept in obedience to the requirements of the statute, are, so to speak, quasi records. They are intended for use as much by the government as the distiller. They constitute part of the machinery which the law has provided for the enforcement of the revenue laws. Their object is to furnish the government with evidence of the daily business of the distillery, and with the means of detecting frauds. They are to be preserved two years for that purpose, and are to be produced for the inspection of the proper government officials whenever demanded. They are, in a sense, part of the distillery itself, and as much subject to inspection and use for the purpose of securing the payment of the revenue as the building or any part of the fixtures or apparatus. False entries therein, or an omission to make such entries as the law requires, or a refusal to produce them upon proper demand, will subject the distillery to forfeiture The possession of the books in this case was not obtained by means of any judicial proceeding. The seizure was not by virtue of any warrant issued by a court or judicial officer, but upon an order of the executive departments of the government, made in the legitimate exercise of its powers for the enforcement of the laws. The books were taken because found on the premises in the place where the law required they should be kept for the purposes of evidence, to be consulted and considered by the government. They were no more excluded by this statute from use as evidence, on account of the manner in which they were obtained, than were the tubs or other apparatus seized at the same time.

This case is entirely different from that of U. S. v. Hughes [Case No. 15,419], decided by Judge Blatchford, in the Southern district of New York. There the warrant of seizure was issued by a judge and made returnable to the court (14 St. 547, § 2). The evidence obtained consisted exclusively of private books and papers, which were in no sense whatever public. They were excluded because they had been obtained under a warrant issued in a judicial proceeding by a judge to a marshal, returnable with the papers, etc., to the judge for his judicial action. Here, as has been seen, the books were public books, kept for the purposes of evidence, and intended for use as well by the government as the distiller. The United States have the right to demand their production without judicial protest for all purposes connected with the revenue liabilities of the distillers or the distilleries.

We think the district court erred in excluding the testimony, and the judgment must for this reason be reversed. It is unnecessary now to consider any other questions presented by the record, as upon another trial, with additional evidence, the court may be able to find the facts more specifically and definitely than they appear in the present record.

The case is remanded for a new trial.

UNITED STATES v. DISTILLERY AT SPRING VALLEY.

[8 Ben. 473;[1] 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 218.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1876.

INTERNAL REVENUE — FORFEITURE — CONNIVANCE OF STOREKEEPER.

The connivance of a government storekeeper in charge of a distillery, with the person who runs the distillery, will not have the effect to destroy the forfeiture of the property resulting from the acts of such person under the internal revenue acts of 1864, 1866, 1868, and 1872 (13 Stat. 240; 14 Stat. 111; 15 Stat. 59, 132, 134; 17 Stat. 240).

A suit was brought by the United States to forfeit this property for alleged violation of the internal revenue acts, and, under the charge of the district court, the jury found a verdict against the government. The judgment was, however, reversed by the circuit court, on writ of error (see [Case No. 14,963]), and the case came before this court for a second trial, at which the claimant maintained, that, as it now appeared that the frauds upon the revenue, charged to have been committed by the person who was running the distillery, were commited with the connivance of the government storekeeper in charge of the distillery, the forfeiture of the property could not be enforced.

R. M. Sherman, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Geo. Ticknor Curtis, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. If the decision of the circuit court in this case [Case No. 14,963] is a correct exposition of the law, I do not see how the connivance and complicity of the government storekeeper in the fraud committed by the person who ran the distillery, can operate to destroy the forfeiture resulting from the acts of such person. The person who carried on the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, did not any the less carry on such business with such intent, because he did not commit his fraud secretly, but had for a participant in it the government storekeeper. I think, therefore, there must be a decree for the United States, because I think the decision of the circuit court in this case, above cited, covers, substantially, every question now presented.

Thomas Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

George T. Curtis, for claimant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The distillery at Spring Valley, in Rockland county, New York, with the land on which it stands, and certain land used for ingress to and egress from the same, and, also, the stills and other apparatus, tools, implements, and instruments used, fit and intended for use, in the distillation of spirits, were, together with certain distilled spirits and raw materials for distillation, seized, on the 22d of January, 1873, for alleged violations of the internal revenue laws relating to distillers, distillation, and the taxes, &c., imposed thereon. Upon such seizure, the information, in behalf of the United States, in this cause, was filed in the district court, and condemnation of the property prayed for, as forfeited by reason of such violations. Elijah Brown only appeared herein as claimant, setting up his ownership of the distillery, and its fixtures, and the real estate seized, in fee, and the ownership of the tools, implements, apparatus and instruments, (other than fixtures,) provided for, used. and intended for use, in distilling upon the premises, but making no claim to the distilled spirits, or to the raw materials seized. It is unnecessary to state the pleadings more fully, since no question is made, on the argument herein, that the pleadings are not sufficient for all the purposes of proof, or of the argument of the questions raised on the trial. The revenue laws alleged to have been violated, and to which the several counts in the information relate, are, section 48 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 240), as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), section 22 of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 134), as amended by the 12th section of the act of June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. 240), section 44 of the last named act (15 Stat. 142), as amended by the 12th section of the said act of June 6, 1872, section 5 of the act of March 31, 1868 (Id. 59), and section 19 of the said act of July 20, 1868 (Id. 132), the provisions of which, so far as material to the questions discussed, will be hereinafter stated.

Evidence was given showing that, on, and for more than three years prior to, the day of the said seizure, the claimant, Elijah Brown, was the owner in fee of the distillery and fixtures and real estate seized, and claimed by him herein, and the owner of the movable tools, implements and instruments used and fit, and intended to be used, for distillation, seized on the premises, and also claimed by him as aforesaid. Evidence was also given, tending to show, that, on the 3d of November, 1870, an indenture of lease of the said lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situate, with the distillery buildings thereon, and the machinery and fixtures in said buildings, was executed and delivered by the said claimant to the copartnership firm of M. Newman & Company, (which consisted of Marcus Newman, Simon Kahnweiler and the said claimant, Elijah Brown,) to carry on the business of a distiller therewith, for five years from the 12th of October, 1870, at a rent therefor in money, manure and distillery slops, as particularly mentioned; that, on the same 3d of November, 1870, the said Brown, the claimant, executed his consent, in form as required by the 8th section of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 128), reciting the execution of the said lease, and, among other things, containing as follows: "I do hereby consent that the leasehold premises aforesaid may be used for the purpose of distilling spirits, subject to the provisions of law, and I stipulate and agree that the lien of the United States for taxes and penalties shall have priority to my reversionary interest, and that, in case of the forfeiture of the distillery premises, or any part thereof, the title of the same shall vest in the United States, discharged from my claim as such reversioner and owner;" that the said firm of M. Newman & Company never did any business under their said copartnership, but, on or about the 27th of September, 1871, the interest of the said M. Newman & Company was transferred by the said claimant, Brown, to Marcus Newman; that, on the said 27th of September, 1871, the said claimant, Brown, entered into and executed an agreement with the said Marcus Newman, with covenants relating to the conditions upon which the said Newman should carry on the business of a distiller at the said distillery and premises of the said Brown, during the residue of the said leasehold term and an extension of such term, if desired, and that said Newman should have the privilege of procuring a railroad to be built, and have a right of way across the said Brown's land to his said distillery; and that thereafter, and to the date of the said seizure, the said Newman carried on the business of a distiller at said distillery and premises under the said agreement, and carried it on there with the knowledge of the said Brown that it was carried on there, and with the permission and sufferance of the said Brown to the carrying it on there, and that such railroad was constructed and used as a way over or across the land of the said Brown, for the purpose of ingress and egress to and from the said distillery, such land so used as a way being the same seized as such way and claimed herein by the said Brown, and was so used by the said Newman with the like knowledge and permission of the said Brown. It was also proved, that all of the property claimed by the said Brown, other than the lot of land and distillery buildings thereon, and the land used for ingress and egress as aforesaid, was property found in the distillery buildings, some part thereof attached thereto by screws, bolts, cleets and other fastenings, and the residue thereof not attached thereto by screws, bolts or other fastenings, but the whole thereof belonged to the claimant, Brown, and was part of the manufacturing apparatus used in the business of distilling, supplied by the claimant, Brown, at his own expense; and that the said Marcus Newman filed the distiller's notice and the usual distiller's bond, duly approved, and other papers required by law, and carried on said business, as respects the officers of the revenue, solely in his own name. Evidence was also given tending to prove violations of the said several sections of the internal revenue laws, and frauds mentioned therein, during the period of about thirteen months prior to the seizure, at the said distillery, and other evidence was offered having a like tendency, which, in harmony with the ruling of the judge presiding at the trial in the district court, on the principal question of law, was rejected; but no evidence was given tending to show that the claimant, Brown, had any knowledge of such frauds or violations of law, or of the intention of the said Newman, or the persons conducting or superintending such business, to commit such violations of such frauds, or that he consented to or connived at any fraud or violation of the law in the conduct of the business, or otherwise in relation thereto, or to the spirits distilled at the distillery or found therein.

It seems to me unnecessary to give, in any further detail, the state of the evidence received, the exceptions to the exclusion of the evidence which was rejected, the numerous requests for specific instructions to the jury which were refused, or the details of the charge which were given and excepted to. A few extracts from the charge will show the principles which governed the conduct of the trial, and which entered into the various other rulings, and the detailed or specific instructions to the jury, and these will exhibit the main and controlling question argued in this court.

The judge charged, that, under the 48th section of the act of June 30th, 1864, no property, other than personal property, could be forfeited; and, second, that all of the machinery and apparatus and other things found in the distillery buildings, and on the distillery premises, used for and in connection with the business of distilling there carried on, and permanently connected with the soil, or with anything attached to the soil, were part of the land, and so not forfeitable under said section; and, third, that all movable articles or implements, found in the distillery or on the premises, if constituting part of the manufacturing apparatus used in the business of distilling, and if supplied by the claimant, at his own expense, as part of the distillery premises, were part of the land, and so not forfeitable, by reason of the charges of the information under said section. The judge further charged, that none of the property claimed and owned by Elijah Brown could be forfeited under section 22 of the act of July 20th, 1868, by reason of any violation, by said Newman, of the provisions of said section, proven as charged in the information, because no property is declared by said section to be forfeitable, except property of the distiller; that the distillery and distilling apparatus claimed and owned by the said Elijah Brown could not be forfeited under the 5th section of the act of March 31st, 1868, although used by said Newman, in carrying on the business of a distiller, in defrauding the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, because no property is declared by said section to be forfeitable, except the property of the distiller; and that, under the 44th and 19th sections of the said act of July 20th, 1868, the articles or implements above described, whether permanently connected with the soil, or movable articles or implements constituting part of the manufacturing apparatus used in the business of distilling, and supplied by the claimant at his own expense, as part of the distillery premises, were part of the land, and not personal property, within the meaning of those sections. The judge further charged, that, in order to forfeit any real estate described in the information, and claimed by said Elijah Brown, under any provision of the internal revenue laws, involved in the present action, by which real estate is, under any circumstances, made forfeitable, the jury must be satisfied that the claimant had guilty knowledge of, and was in complicity with or connived at, the fraudulent or unlawful acts or omissions and intents of the said Newman.

By these or other specific directions the jury were instructed, that, under the 5th section of the act of March 31st, 1868, and the 22d section of the act of July 20th, 1868, no property of the claimant could be forfeited; that the tools, implements, and instruments, used in the work of distilling, owned by the claimant, and furnished at his own expense therefor, as a part of the distillery premises, were to be regarded as real estate, under the 48th, 44th, and 19th sections aforesaid, and could not be forfeited under the 48th section; that the real estate, thus including such tools, implements, and instruments, and including the way owned by the claimant, used for the purposes of ingress and egress to and from the distillery, could not be forfeited, unless the jury should find that Newman was guilty of the fraudulent acts, omissions, and intents mentioned in the aforesaid 48th, 44th, and 19th sections, charged in the information, and should also find that the claimant, with guilty knowledge of, and complicity in, the fraudulent acts and intents of Newman, suffered or permitted the business to be carried on by said Newman with such fraudulent intent, or connived at the carrying on of the same by Newman, with such intent; and, as to false entries in books, or entries omitted, that the claimant knowingly suffered or permitted said Newman, or some other person, to make those false and fraudulent entries or omissions, or connived at the same.

This abbreviation of the charge seems to me to exhibit all that is material to an understanding of the questions hereinafter considered. These instructions were, of course, under a proviso, that the jury should also find, as does not appear to have been denied or doubted, that Marcus Newman held the said distillery premises under a lease from the claimant, as lessor and owner in fee thereof, and that the claimant did not participate in any way in the profits of the distillery, and selling of the liquors manufactured by Newman, but reserved and received money, distillery slops, and manure, as rent for the occupation and use of the distillery premises.

Although several questions apparently arise out of these instructions, and some others out of the rejection of evidence, all would seem to be substantially answered by an answer to the principal inquiry, whether the owner and lessor of a distillery can be deprived of his property without proof of some guilty participation in, or connivance at, the fraudulent or unlawful acts claimed to be causes of forfeiture. This question was, on the trial in the district court, answered by the judge in the negative, by what was tersely stated by the counsel for the claimant, on the argument herein, to be the substance of the charge to the jury, namely, that, where property is leased, the fee cannot be forfeited unless the owner knowingly permits it to be used fraudulently, or connives at such fraudulent use. The correctness of this is insisted upon, first, as being in accordance with the proper construction of the several sections of the internal revenue acts upon which the information proceeds; and, second, because the contrary would make the law declaring such forfeiture unconstitutional.

To determine the true construction of the several sections counted upon, their language, the intent apparent therein, and the general scope and design of the legislature, manifest when other provisions of the acts are also brought into view, may all be useful; and it will be convenient to state the substance of the sections to be construed, in the order in which they are counted upon.

The 48th section of the act of June 30th, 1864, as amended in 1866, declares, that "all goods, wares, merchandise, articles or objects, on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law, which shall be found in the possession or custody, or within the control, of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold or removed by such person or persons in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with design to avoid payment of said taxes, may be seized * * * and the same shall be forfeited to the United States; and, also, all raw materials found in the possession of any person or persons intending to manufacture the same into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, or with design to evade the payment of said tax; and, also, all tools, implements, instruments and personal property whatsoever, in the place or building, or within any yard or enclosure, where such articles or such raw materials shall be found, may also be seized by any collector or deputy collector as aforesaid, and the same shall be forfeited as aforesaid." In view of the rulings had upon the trial, two observations upon this section are immediately pertinent—First, there is no word nor phrase therein that describes the tools, implements, instruments and personal property whatsoever, as owned by the person or persons having the fraudulent purpose. "All tools, implements, instruments and personal property whatsoever, in the place," &c., literally excludes any inquiry into the ownership or title; and, second, no distinction is made between tools, implements and instruments constituting part of the manufacturing apparatus used in the business, and other tools, implements and instruments there for some other purpose. Possibly, under this section, fixtures may not be deemed included in the words "tools, implements and instruments," which are more apt to describe articles movable and not attached to the freehold. But, if neither fixtures nor movable articles used in the conduct or carrying on of a manufacturing business are meant, it is obvious, that, in general, the terms, "all tools, implements and instruments," would have no operation, for such tools, &c., are not usually found in a manufactory, intended for use elsewhere; and, on the contrary, where, in speaking of an intent to manufacture raw materials into articles subject to tax, congress provided for the forfeiture of "all tools, implements and instruments * * * in the place," there would seem to be a presumption that the tools, implements and instruments provided for, and to be used in, such manufacture, were prominently in view.

The 22d section of the act of July 20th, 1868, as amended by the act of 1872, after providing that any distiller desiring to suspend work in his distillery may give notice in writing, stating when he will suspend, and that no distiller, after having given such notice, shall, after the time stated therein, carry on the business of a distiller on said premises, until he shall have given another notice in writing, stating the time when he will resume work, declares, that "any distiller, after the time fixed in said notice declaring his intention to suspend work, who shall carry on the business of a distiller on said premises, or shall have mash, wort or beer in his distillery, or on any premises connected therewith, or who shall have in his possession, or under his control, any mash, wort or beer, with intent to distil the same on said premises, shall incur the forfeitures and be subject to the same punishment as provided for persons who carry on the business of a distiller without having given the bond required by law." The forfeitures here referred to are declared in the 44th section of the same act, to be hereafter stated. The doubt, however, of the meaning of this 22d section, if any, arises mainly from the use of the word "incur." The 44th section employs other language. It declares that certain specified things "shall be forfeited." Now, under the 22d section, does the language, "shall incur the forfeitures," mean, shall bring into operative effect the forfeitures denounced in the 44th section, or does it mean that he shall forfeit his interest in the things so mentioned in the 44th section? When a distiller incurs a forfeiture, it would seem, that, literally, he subjects himself to it, and not that he brings it on another; but, in connection with the 44th section, it may well mean, that the acts described in the 22d section shall have the same operation and effect, in respect of forfeiture, as those which produce forfeitures under the 44th section; in other words, the forfeitures shall be the same in each case—he shall thereby cause, or bring on, the forfeitures. &c. The consideration of the general scheme and purpose of the law will bear significantly upon this.

This 44th section of the same act declares, that "any person * * * who shall carry on the business of a distiller, without having given bond as required by law, or who shall engage in or carry on the business of a distiller, with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall, for every such offence, be fined * * * and imprisoned * * *. And all distilled spirits or wines, and all stills or other apparatus, fit or intended to be used for the distillation * * * of spirits, * * * owned by such person, wherever found, and all distilled spirits or wines and personal property found in the distillery, * * * or in any building, room, yard, or enclosure connected therewith, and used with or constituting a part of the premises, and all the right, title, and interest of such person in the lot or tract of land on which such distillery is situated, and all right, title, and interest therein of every person who knowingly has suffered or permitted the business of a distiller to be there carried on, or who has connived at the same, and all personal property owned by, or in the possession of, any person who has permitted or suffered any building, yard, or enclosure, or any part thereof, to be used for the purposes of ingress or egress to or from such distillery, which shall be found in any such building, yard, or enclosure, and all the right, title, and interest of every person in any premises used for ingress or egress to or from such distillery, who has knowingly suffered or permitted such premises to be used for such ingress or egress, shall be forfeited to the United States." In this section congress seem to have anticipated a possible discussion, whether it was intended to forfeit property found upon the premises or used for the purposes of distillation, not belonging to the distiller, and to have purposely been so explicit as to preclude inquiry into mere questions of title, and, at the same time, in respect to the real estate, to protect one whose land under lease or out of possession, may, without his knowledge or consent, or, perhaps, even against his will, when he has no power to prevent, be used in or for the purposes of a distillery. Thus, the forfeiture is, first, of spirits, wines, stills and other apparatus owned by the distiller, wherever found; secondly, of all distilled spirits, wines, and personal property found in the distillery, or in any building, &c., connected therewith, and used with or constituting a part of the premises. This second forfeiture is declared irrespective of ownership. It plainly includes property not owned by the distiller. All spirits, wines, stills and other apparatus owned by the distiller had already been declared forfeited, whether found on the distillery premises or not. It would have been meaningless to declare again, second, that the same should be forfeited when found there. Spirits, &c., owned by the distiller, are brought into distinct contrast with the other spirits, &c., named. The latter are only forfeited when found on the distillery premises; the former are forfeited wherever found. Owners of personal property may, in general, be presumed to know where it is, to know for what purposes the place is used, and to be competent to protect it. Indeed, when the practical conduct of the business of distilling is brought into view, the probability is, by no means, slight, that spirits and other personal property found on the distillery premises have some connection with or relation to the very business carried on, as, e. g., the product thereof, the implements therefor, or instruments used in some manner in aid thereof, cattle, hogs, &c., fed therefrom, and the like, all of which tend to its encouragement. The forfeiture is, third, of all the right, title, and interest of the distiller in the lot or tract of land on which such distillery is situated; and, fourth, all right, title, and interest of every person who knowingly has suffered or permitted the business of a distiller to be there carried on, or has connived at the same. Here, again, the distinction between the distiller's property and the property of others is declared. Interests in real estate are various, present, future, vested, and contingent. The title may be in one, the present lawful possession and control may be in another. The interest or title of no one ought to be, and by this section is not, exposed to forfeiture, unless there is voluntary permission or sufferance that the premises be used for the business which was here regulated, or there was connivance at its use for that business. But, an owner using the premises as a distillery himself, and an owner voluntarily permitting his premises to be used as a distillery, or conniving at such use, might, without great impropriety, be placed on the same footing. Their relation to a government legislating to suppress frauds in that very business is not very widely different. At least, the government might cast upon such owners responsibility for the use of their own property; and that it was the intention of this law to do so will appear in the progress of the discussion.

One word, however, seems to be called for, in this place, relative to the terms, "has connived at the same." It is argued, that this means, connived at the fraud or intent to defraud. Neither the terms used nor their connection warrant any such interpretation. The interest of one who permits the business of a distiller to be there carried on is forfeited. That language is entirely explicit; and, connived at "the same" means, connived at the carrying on of the business of a distiller there. There was reason for using the word. Sometimes, express permission and knowledge could be proved; but, often, it might be difficult to go further in proof than to show connivance at the carrying on of the business. When, next, the section declares the forfeiture of all personal property owned by, or in possession of, any person who has "permitted" or "suffered" any building, yard, or enclosure, or any part thereof, to be used for purposes of ingress or egress to or from such distillery, which shall be found in any such building, yard, or enclosure, and of all the right, title, and interest of every person in any premises used for ingress or egress to or from such distillery, who has knowingly suffered or permitted such premises to be used for such ingress or egress, nothing is said about connivance. It is enough that it provides for the knowing permission or suffrance of the use for, or in aid of, the business of distilling. The great facility of concealing the business of distilling in rear buildings and in cellars, and in places only accessible through other buildings or passages through the property of others, and, particularly, in cities, no doubt makes this provision an important one.

I pass to the next section counted upon, the 5th section of the act of March 31st, 1868, which declares, that "every person engaged in carrying on the business of a distiller, who shall defraud, or attempt to defraud, the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him, and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits, found in the distillery and on the distillery premises." It is pertinent to observe here, that not a word is said touching the ownership of the subjects of forfeiture; that, whereas, elsewhere, stills and property owned by the distiller are mentioned as forfeited, and the right, title, and interest of the distiller in the premises is spoken of, here it is the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him that are mentioned—not necessarily owned by him, but used by him—and all spirits and raw materials found on the premises. The criticism is, doubtless, possible, that, by the terms, "shall forfeit," congress mean, that he, and he only, shall be subjected to loss; and that a person can only forfeit that which he has, or has a right to keep—his own. If this section declared the only forfeiture found in this system of laws, there would be some plausibility in this verbal criticism; but, read as a part of a system, and, especially, in connection with the other sections already adverted to, and with still others not involved in this case, a broader meaning must be given thereto. It means, that he, by his fraud, subjects to forfeiture the property mentioned.

The remaining section referred to in the information is the 19th section of the before-named act of July 20th, 1868. It requires, that "every person making or distilling spirits, or owning any still, boiler, or other vessel used for the purpose of distilling spirits, or having such still, boiler, or other vessel so used under his superintendence, either as agent or owner, or using any such still, boiler, or other vessel, shall, from day to day, make, or cause to be made, true and exact entry, in a book or books to be kept by him," of various particulars touching the kinds and quantities of materials used, and the procurement thereof, the fuel, water and ice purchased, &c., the grain used, and various other particulars tending to show, or enable the officers of the revenue to ascertain, the amount of tax, &c. It then requires the distiller to render an account, and that the distiller, or principal manager of the distillery, shall make oath to such return in a form prescribed, the book to be always kept at the distillery, and to be always open to the inspection of any revenue officer, &c., and provides that, "if any false entry shall be made, or any entry shall be omitted therefrom, with intent to defraud, or to conceal from the revenue officers any fact or particular required to be stated or entered in either of said books, or to mislead in reference thereto, or if any distiller, as aforesaid, shall omit or refuse to provide either of said books, or shall cancel, obliterate, or destroy any part of either of such books, or any entry therein, with intent to defraud, or shall permit the same to be done, or such books, or either of them, be not produced when required by any revenue officer, the distillery, distilling apparatus, and the lot or tract of land on which it stands, and all personal property of every kind and description on said premises, used in the business there carried on, shall be forfeited to the United States." I place no especial stress upon the circumstance, that this section begins with the declaration that every person, whether making or distilling spirits, or owning a still, boiler, or other vessel used for the purpose of distilling, shall make, or cause to be made, the entries specified; and yet this is in harmony with the general design, elsewhere shown, to make the owner of machinery and apparatus easily used for defrauding the government, conveniently employed in the perpetration of frauds, which the government was struggling, by the most careful, minute, and stringent precautions, to prevent, responsible, in a large degree, for the manner in which his own machinery and apparatus was used, whether by himself, or by others to whom he should entrust it for use. The observations already made upon some of the other sections, and the terms in which specific things are declared forfeited, are pertinent to this section, both as to real and personal estate; and, in this place, I desire only to add, that, if congress designed to declare such forfeiture, irrespective of the question of ownership, and so as to exclude any inquiry into the title to the property, words more explicit and unqualified could hardly have been employed.

The court cannot be controlled by the supposed or real harshness of these enactments. Considerations founded in the suggestion of hardship are for the legislature. If the law be valid, the courts cannot refuse to carry it into effect. If the law is explicit and clear, construction cannot be permitted to destroy its meaning. Nor is it the duty of courts to apologize for the law; and yet it seems obvious, that, in these laws, in relation to distillers, distilleries, and distilled spirits, there appears, in successive enactments, amendments, change and increase of penalties, punishments, and forfeitures, with greater minuteness and greater comprehensiveness, from time to time, a violent struggle to restrain or regulate and control a business heavily taxed, in which there are extraordinary temptations to fraud, and more than usual facilities for its perpetration. If we now look to the purpose and intent of congress, manifested in the general scheme of the legislation on the subject, we shall find light and aid in the interpretation of the sections which have already been commented upon, and confirming what has been suggested as to each, with especial reference to the question, whether congress intended that property should be forfeited, in any case, without proof of the actual complicity of the owner in the alleged fraud. Not only so, the views already expressed are not only confirmed, but the other provisions of the law go very far to relieve the statutes from any apparent hardship or unreasonableness, in forfeiting the property of one for frauds committed by another.

By the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 125), the subject of the taxation of distilled spirits was very largely revised, and, by the first section, the intent to hold the owners of distilleries to some responsibility for the use which should be made of them, whether by themselves or others, is declared, by making every proprietor of a distillery, &c., and every person interested in the use thereof, jointly and severally liable for the taxes imposed by law on the distilled spirits produced therefrom, and the tax is declared a first lien on the spirits distilled, the distillery used for distilling the same, the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and on the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, together with any building thereon. Section 5 requires every person having in his possession, custody, or control, any still or distilling apparatus set up, to register the same, and declares that any still or distillery apparatus not so registered, with all personal property in the possession or control of such person, and found in the building, yard, or enclosure, shall be forfeited. Here it will be seen that the law takes hold of the property, whoever owns it, and makes it imperative that the owner shall see that the law is observed.

In view of the lien contemplated, and of the forfeitures and penalties pronounced in the act, congress did not fail to see that there might be cases, in which prior valid liens might exist upon the property, in favor of persons who could not control its use, and whose interests ought not to be affected by the sole act of another, nor, also, to see that there might be many cases in which the legal possession might be in holders for a term of years, or having other temporary control, where the owners of the reversion, remainder or other future or contingent estate or interest had no lawful right to interfere with the present use of the property, nor that there might be cases in which the title, or some interest, was held by femes covert, minors or other persons under disability. It was, therefore, determined not to permit the business of distilling to be carried on, unless, nor until, all impediments to the creation and enforcement of a contemplated lien, as well for penalties as taxes, and all impediments to the enforcement of forfeitures, were removed; and this was important to prevent any suggestion that the law violated the constitution, or its fundamental principles, and, also, to hinder any allegation that property had been forfeited belonging to one who had not consented voluntarily to place it within the operation of, and make it expressly subject to, the law. Accordingly, by the 8th section, it is provided, that no bond of a distiller shall be approved, unless he is the owner in fee, unincumbered by any mortgage, judgment or other lien, of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, or unless he files with the assessor, in connection with his notice of intention to commence the business, the written consent of the owner of the fee, and of any mortgagee, judgment creditor, or other person having a lien thereon, duly acknowledged, that the premises may be used for the purpose of distilling spirits, subject to the provisions of law, and expressly stipulating that the lien of the United States for taxes and penalties shall have priority of such mortgage, judgment or other incumbrance, and that, in case of the forfeiture of the distillery premises, or any part thereof, the title of the same shall vest in the United States, discharged from any such mortgage, judgment or other incumbrance. What could possibly more distinctly exhibit the intent to look to the property for security, to hold the property to the fulfillment of all the requirements of the law, to forfeit the property and all the title and interest of owner, lessee, and incumbrancers, whenever forfeiture was denounced? Without such intention, what useful purpose does this consent of an owner to the use of the premises as a distillery serve? Is it an idle form? It is suggested that it means consent of the owner to a forfeiture for any cause for which the property of an owner can lawfully be forfeited. Then it is a useless paper. For such a cause the title and interest of an owner may be forfeited as well without as with his consent. It was intended not merely to obviate cavil about the invasion of the rights of the innocent, in violation of the alleged principle, that no man shall suffer for the offense of another, (which, we may be permitted to say, is, by no means, of universal application,) but it was intended to close the mouth of the owner in advance, and meet his claim by the exhibition of his voluntary consent that the use of his property for a distillery shall be subject to the provisions of law, by his express stipulation, (given in advance, and as a consideration for the license granted,) that, in case of forfeiture, that is, of any forfeiture declared by law, the title shall vest in the United States. The act of the owner is voluntary. His stipulation is, in its nature, and, so far as any constitutional question is involved, his stipulation is, in effect, that the forfeitures shall have operation notwithstanding his ownership. The case is not so hard as many forfeitures under revenue laws enforced in cases of smuggling and the like, against the means, instrument, vessel or vehicle by aid of which the law is violated. As in those cases, this law holds the rem, and treats it as guilty, and the owner here has, moreover, voluntarily stipulated, in advance, that it may be so held.

The act then provides for the case of a distillery erected prior to the passage of the act, and held for a term of years only. In such case, the tenant might not be able to procure the consent of the owner of the remainder or reversion. That he may not for that reason be deprived of the lawful use of his distillery, and may have due license to distil, the tenant is permitted to give bond for the full value of the property, to be enforced in case the distillery, &c., should be forfeited, and so, where the fee, or a mortgage or other incumbrance, belongs to a feme covert, infant, a lunatic, or one who is disabled to give such consent, such bond may be given. Why all this, if it is only the interest of the tenant which is, in any event, to be forfeited, for his violation of the law? The construction contended for makes this procurement of consent, and the giving of a bond in lieu thereof, an absurdity.

Then follow various provisions prescribing penalties, declaring liens and the various forfeitures which have above been commented upon, and others. Section 37 is an illustration of one forfeiture declared, in close analogy to many which result from the breach of laws against smuggling. It forbids the removal of spirits after sunset and before sunrise, and declares, that, in case of violation, the spirits, together with any vessel containing the same, and any horse, cart, boat, or other conveyance used in the removal thereof, shall be forfeited to the United States; and section 55, as amended by the 12th section of the said act of 1872, provides, that, where spirits which have been withdrawn and shipped for exportation shall be intentionally relanded within the United States, the spirits, the vessel from which the same were relanded, and all boats, vehicles, horses or other animals used in relanding and removing such spirits, shall be forfeited. No question of ownership is made. It is expected that the owner of property will see to the use made of it, at his peril. Other parts of the act might be referred to, and words might be largely multiplied upon the need of stringent provisions to protect the government from frauds and evasions of the law, and the slight restraint that would exist when only a forfeiture of a holding at will, or at sufferance, or from month to month, or even from year to year, was all that is to be apprehended.

But, enough and more than enough has been said to express the opinion that the trial below proceeded upon an erroneous interpretation of the law governing the rights of the parties. Under the views here expressed, it may not be of any materiality to discriminate between fixtures and movable articles, tools, implements, and instruments used in the distillery. It is probable that the instruction to the jury to treat the latter as real estate, for the purposes of the trial, grew out of the other instruction, that the property of the owner could not be forfeited unless the owner was a party to the fraud, or in complicity with the distiller therein. Under the views expressed in this opinion, the question raised thereupon is, probably, not material. It is, however, proper to say, that, if a case be made in which tools, implements, instruments and personal property found on the premises are forfeited, I see no ground on which, by calling them real estate, or part of the distillery apparatus, they can be withdrawn and saved.

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

[NOTE. Upon the second trial the above decision was substantially followed, and a decree entered for the United States. Case No. 14,962.]

Case No. 14,964.

UNITED STATES v. DISTILLERY, ETC., OF J. C. McCOY et al.

[21 Int. Rev. Rec. 165.]

District Court, D. Nebraska. May Term, 1869.

FORFEITURE — BOND TO ANSWER — TITLE TO FORFEITED PROPERTY — MECHANIC'S LIEN.

1. The title to property forfeited for wrongful and fraudulent acts passes by the operation of law to the United States at the moment of the commission of the acts causing the forfeiture, and the acceptance of a bond to answer a judgment against the claimants to the property forfeited does not reinvest the title in them.

[Cited in Dobbins' Distillery v. U. S., 96 U. S. 402.]

2. A modification of this rigid rule of law is allowed in this case in favor of the mechanics' liens of those who furnished the material and machines by which the property has been built up and made more valuable, but without passing judgment as to their legal title, and solely on the plea "that no great injustice could result therefrom to the government, whilst a refusal to apply a part of the fund to the payment thereof might result in the greatest injustice."

[This was a suit to forfeit the distillery and rectifying establishment of J. C. McCoy & Co. Judgment of forfeiture entered.]

Strickland, Mason, Kennedy, and U. S. Atty. Neville, for the government.

Redick, Woolworth, Doane & Kennedy, for creditors.

G. W. Ambrose, for the assignee in bankruptcy.

General Estabrook, for Lamaster, claiming as informer.

Mr. Kennedy, for Copeland, claiming as informer.

Judge Wakely, for Haynes and Brewer, sureties in the release bond.

DUNDY, District Judge. Heard on application for distribution of finances in registry of court. This case is perhaps the most remarkable one ever brought in this court. It is peculiar in some, and of the first importance in many, respects. The complicated questions arising during the several stages through which the cause has passed; the magnitude of the interests involved; the lapse of time since the institution of the suit; and the great number of eminent counsel engaged both for and against the government, all combine to give additional interest to the proceedings. For general convenience, a history of the origin and progress of the litigation growing out of the original seizure of the distillery and rectifying establishment seems necessary, as well as proper. The distillery and rectifying establishment was seized and closed up by a government officer, on the 22d day of December, 1868. On the 28th of the same month, the United States attorney filed an information on which the property was afterwards condemned, as forfeited to the United States. This information charged the said McCoy and Co., with the commission of several criminal acts which led to the seizure of the property in question. These criminal acts are alleged to have been committed on the 13th day of October, 1868, and on other days subsequent thereto. The verdict of the jury sustains the truth of the allegations in the information.

On the 14th day of January, 1869, the distillery and rectifying establishment, together with a large amount of personal property, were released on bond given by McCoy and Co., claimants. On the 2nd day of September, 1869, trial was had, and the verdict of the jury was for the government. A judgment of condemnation followed this verdict on the 2nd day of September, 1869. On the 14th day of February, 1870, an order was made directing the marshal to sell the distillery and rectifying establishment and to bring the proceeds arising from the sale into court to abide its further order. The sale was duly made by the marshal and the proceeds, amounting to the sum of $14,900.00, brought into court to be applied as the court might further direct. This sale was confirmed by the court and a deed made to the purchaser by the marshal. On the 30th of April, 1869, and during the progress of the cause, proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted against McCoy and Co., which eventually resulted in their being adjudicated bankrupts. Shortly before, and soon after this several suits were commenced in the state court against McCoy and Co., in most of which judgments were rendered by default for the whole amount claimed to be due. The several judgment creditors claimed to have liens on the property sold, and now apply for the money realized on the sale of the same. The judgment of Winehagen and Hanbostle was rendered on the 29th day of April, 1868, for the sum of $8,375. Judgment of I. B. Fleming was obtained on the 14th day of October, 1868, for $1,527. Judgment of Hastings, Ledyard and Co., on the 16th day of October, 1868, for $2,668.38. Judgment of Hoagland, based on a mechanic's lien, was obtained on the 29th day of June, 1869, for $2,229. The lien was for materials furnished, between the 17th of September, 1868, and the 15th of December, of the same year. Judgment of W. P. Anderson, on the 20th day of October, 1869, for $978.19. Harris and Fortus, judgment, on the 2nd day of July, 1870, for $1,360, is also based on a mechanic's lien for materials furnished between 13th day of September, 1868, and the 6th day of February, 1869. In addition to these alleged liens, the Council Bluffs Iron Works Co. claims a mechanic's lien for the sum of $2,800, for materials furnished between the 17th of February, 1868, and the 23d of February, 1869. Fitzpatrick also claims a balance due on a mechanic's lien, of $119.35. This was for materials furnished between the 14th of October, 1868, and the 12th of March, 1869. At the time the distillery was seized, there was due from McCoy to the government about $3,110 taxes, which constituted a valid lien on the premises seized. Before the time of making the order in which the marshal was directed to sell the property seized, the United States had commenced suit in the circuit court against McCoy and Co., with whom were impleaded all of the above named creditors of McCoy and Co., the object of which was at least in part to settle the question of lien, between the government and the said parties. This suit was commenced on the 15th day of January, 1870; hence the order directing the proceeds arising from sale, to be brought into court to abide its further order. The second amended bill was not filed in that case until December, 1871. After the issues were made up, a large mass of testimony was taken, the cause tried in the circuit court and the bill was there dismissed. And by common consent of all parties in interest, the record in the case in that court was transmitted to this court, where the questions there raised were to be decided. That cause was decided at the November (1872) term of the circuit court. At the October (1873) term of this court a question was submitted to a jury relative to the disputed facts between two parties who claimed a moiety as informers. At the same term of court, counsel on behalf of Omaha City and Douglas county, asked leave to file a claim for taxes said to have been assessed and on the distillery.

These facts constitute the basis upon which the original proceedings were instituted, upon which this cause has been conducted, and upon which (at least so far as this court is concerned) it is to be finally disposed of.

At the time of seizing the property by the revenue officers, the distillery and rectifying establishment was closed up, and thereafter held by them until the same was released on bond. After the release, the distillery was run for a short time, when it was abandoned by the owners, who soon after fled from the state. The property, mainly for the want of better care than could be bestowed on it by the government officers, began to rapidly depreciate in value. This fact was made to appear from the statement of parties in interest and from a personal inspection of the premises. And it was thought to be for the best interests of all concerned to have the property sold at as early a day as practicable, and to have the proceeds brought into court, when such as might desire so to do could apply for and receive the proceeds, should they be found entitled thereto. It is claimed, however, that a portion only of the parties in interest consented to the making of the order in question. The testimony seems to be conflicting upon that point. But suppose no consent was given by any one of the parties—suppose that instead of consenting, each and every one of them had protested against making the order as some of them do here now, could that possibly affect the validity of the order? Manifestly not. The court either had, or had not the authority to make the order of sale. If the authority to make it existed then no consent of a creditor, whether judgment creditor or not—who was not a party to the suit—who had in no way intervened, was necessary to give validity to the order; if the court had not the lawful authority to make the order, then certainly the lien holders consenting thereto would not confer the right to make any such an order. There can be no reasonable doubt of the jurisdiction of the court in this behalf. As the property was lawfully seized it was eventually condemned and forfeited to the government for violations of the revenue law committed with and about it by McCoy and Co., the owners. There is no question about the validity of the seizure nor the binding force of the judgment of condemnation. But the sole objection seems to be to the validity of the order directing the marshal to sell the identical property seized. At the time this order was made, McCoy and Co. had the legal title to the property seized, unless that title was vested in the United States by operation of law, at the time McCoy and Co. committed the wrongful acts that led to the seizure. Now, if those wrongful acts divested McCoy and Co. of the title, and vested it in the United States, then there can be no question about the validity of the order. If the title still remained in McCoy and Co., then most clearly it was subject to buy and sell to satisfy the judgment rendered against them, and after the judgment was entered on the bond, and execution issued thereon the marshal was clearly justified in proceeding to take and sell the property as that of McCoy and Co., to satisfy the said judgment. This he could have done as well without as with the order of sale to which objection is here made. Any property which McCoy and Co. had in this state was subject to seizure and sale to satisfy the judgment. And it was the duty of the marshal to first exhaust the property of the principals before proceeding to take the property of the surety in the release bond. It seems then that no valid or lawful objection existed against making the order of sale. The propriety of making the order at the time it was done cannot well be questioned, as the property sold for very much more than it was originally appraised at. Besides, since the sale was made by the marshal, and down to the time of hearing of the case in the circuit court, the government had realized something over two hundred and thirty thousand dollars out of the distillery in the shape of taxes. If any other or further indication of the action of the court in making the order of sale be necessary, it will be found in the opinion of the circuit judge, delivered by him in the case before referred to. It follows from these views that the money is properly in this court, awaiting its further order.

The property was seized and condemned under the act of congress of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 162). The amended information contains several counts or distinct charges and specifications in most of which it is distinctly stated that McCoy and Co. committed the wrongful acts which led to the seizure and caused the forfeiture on the 13th day of October, 1868, and on other days between that date and the 22d day of December, the time of the seizure. One of the principal charges is that on the 13th day of October, 1868, McCoy and Co., after the survey and registration of the distillery, enlarged the producing capacity of the distillery without giving notice to the assessor, with intent to defraud the United States. The other charges of fraud are both numerous and important, but need no further notice here. The verdict of the jury was for the government "on all the issues joined," of which the specification above stated was one.

It will be seen, then, that the wrongful and fraudulent acts that caused the forfeiture of the distillery were committed on the 13th of October, 1868. At the date last stated the wrong was done, the fraud committed and the property forfeited. The moment the fraudulent act is committed which causes the forfeiture, the owner is divested of the property, and the title, by operation of law, changes and vests in the United States. So in this case, the title of McCoy and Co. was lost, notwithstanding they retained possession of the property for a time after the commission of the fraud. In all such cases, and in that one, the property was seized and held for a time for the purpose of protecting the rights of the government, and the object to be gained in instituting proceedings to condemn property so seized is to have a judicial determination of the question of right involved between the claimants of the property and the authority that seizes the same. So far as this distillery is concerned, it has been judicially determined that the title of McCoy and Co. to the same was divested on the 13th day of October, 1868, and parties who dealt with them after that date before as well as after the seizure, did so at their own risk and peril, and as the property was at all times within the jurisdiction of the court, it cannot be said that the United States relinquished or in any way abandoned the right and claim thereto, notwithstanding bond was given to answer whatever judgment might be recovered against the claimants. If a fraud had been committed upon the court in procuring the approval of a bond with worthless sureties, would that fact have exempted the property from being further proceeded against as was done in this case, especially when the property had never changed hands after the seizure? We think not. Was anything of this kind attempted by the sureties on the bond in this case? It is unnecessary perhaps to pursue this inquiry, as it is enough to say that the sureties justified on oath, each swearing that it was worth $1,600.00 in unencumbered real estate in this state, and that it is a matter of general notoriety that the sureties have long since left the state, and are believed to be out of reach of ordinary executions. It cannot therefore be seen that the act of releasing the distillery on bond would reinvest the title to the same in McCoy and Co. And if it did not so reinvest it, then no person could acquire an interest in the property after the act of forfeiture was committed, or at least after the time of the seizure. The circuit court, in the case before referred to, must have taken this view of the case, otherwise it would be difficult to see on what principle the court there decided that "in any event all the interest of McCoy and Co. in the property was forfeited to the government, and this forfeiture has been judicially ascertained and decided, and therefore it is not perceived what interest the bankrupts' estate has in the fund." The judge in delivering his opinion in that case further says, that "at the time of the sale the United States was the owner of the property, under a forfeiture judicially ascertained, and had been such owner from the time of the violation of the law for which it was seized." Keeping these principles in view and with such light for a guide, the questions of lien presented for consideration will be decided according to the views here expressed. So far as the record shows McCoy and Co. never held the legal title to the lot of ground on which the rectifying establishment was situated; and for aught that is known, no title to the fee in that case really passed to the purchaser under the marshal's hand. Whatever title McCoy and Co. and the United States had in the lot, may have passed to the purchaser, but nothing more than that appears from the record. And McCoy and Co. may or may not have had such an interest in that lot as would have been bound by a judgment in the state court. The proceeds arising from the sale of the rectifying establishment, excepting the marshal's percentage on the sale of the same, is awarded to the United States, and is to be credited on the decree accordingly. McCoy and Co.

acquired title to lot 4, on which the distillery was located, on the 13th day of August, 1868. At the time of the rendition of a judgment in the state court, all of the real estate of the party against whom the judgment is obtained, if situated in the county where judgment is rendered, became bound for the payment thereof. But lands acquired by a judgment debtor after judgment rendered, are not bound thereby, until execution issues and is levied thereon. Under the Code practice as understood and practiced in this state, argument is unnecessary to demonstrate the truth or correctness of this proposition. This view of the case necessarily disposes of the alleged lien of the judgment of Winehagen and Hanbostle, which was rendered in the district court of Douglas county on the 29th day of April, 1868. And as no execution seems to have been issued, or levy made on the property, at any time before the 13th October, 1868, at which time the property became forfeited, this claim must be rejected. The judgment of J. B. Fleming, obtained in the same court on the 14th day of October, 1868, was after the commission of the act of forfeiture, and the title vested in the United States. There was no lien created in this case, by the entry of this judgment, and the claim must therefore be rejected. The judgment of Hastings, Ledyard and Co., was rendered on the 16th of October, 1868, and stands on the same footing as the last above described. The same is true of the judgment of W. P. Anderson, obtained the 20th of October, 1869. The claims in the two cases last stated must be rejected.

A question of greater difficulty is presented with respect to the claims of those who filed mechanics' liens against the distillery. In the case before referred to the circuit court expressly refused to pass upon the validity of these liens as against the government, and no adjudicated case have I been able to find, where such questions have been determined. And if these views heretofore expressed are correct, then a rigid application of the rule stated (i. e. that a person dealing with another after the commission of the act of forfeiture, would do so at his own risk) would exclude any interest of the parties supposed to have been acquired after the 13th October, and the time of releasing the property on hand. Under the mechanic's lien law of this state, as it existed in the years 1868 and 1869, persons who furnished material or machinery for the erection of buildings or construction of mills or manufactories, were entitled to a mechanic's lien to secure payment therefor; to secure the lien, it was necessary to file the same within four months from the time of furnishing the last material or machinery. The law in this respect seems to have strictly been complied with by all the parties, who are here claiming under and by virtue of their mechanics' liens, and ordinarily no difference would be experienced in enforcing these liens in the state court. It seems that these parties commenced to furnish the materials on the 18th of February, 1868, and concluded on the 12th of March, 1869. A portion of the same was furnished after the commission of the acts of forfeiture by McCoy and Co., and before the seizure, and also after the property was released on bond. The great and most difficult question raised in this connection, and which must of necessity be here determined, is as to what effect the forfeiture had on these several mechanics' liens. If a rigid rule of law should be here applied and enforced, it might be that the claimants would be without a remedy to enforce their alleged rights. But if a more enlarged and liberal view is to be taken, and an equitable disposition of the fund is to be made, then the claims of these several lien holders may be respected, and their rights secured. I confess I have serious doubts about this, and have no opinion thereon that I may not feel bound to abandon and disown tomorrow. Of one thing, however, I feel quite well assured, and that is if these material men and machinists who furnished material and machinery for the distillery are paid their just claims out of the proceeds of the sale of the property, which their material and machinery had built up and made valuable, that no great injustice could result therefrom to the government, whilst a refusal to apply a part of the fund to the payment thereof might result in an act of the greatest injustice. And when the duty of the court to make other disposition of the money is not clear, I prefer to apply the money where the least injustice will be done. There can then be no doubt about where the money is to be applied. I conclude then, that the amount due on the lien of the Council Bluffs Iron Works Co., amounting to $2,888.60; the lien of Hoagland amounting to $2,229.05; the lien of Fitzpatrick amounting to $119.35, and the lien of Harris and Foster for $1,369.00 must be paid out of this fund. No costs, however, will be allowed on any of these claims, as the suits in the cases of Hoagland and Harris and Foster, were commenced and prosecuted in the state court after the property was seized, and after proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against McCoy and Co.

On the 24th day of November, 1873, the city of Omaha and Douglas county filed written applications for a portion of the money to be applied to the payment of taxes said to have been assessed against McCoy and Co., a part of which was assessed on the property sold. It nowhere appears that the district attorney or any of the several claimants had any notice of the filing of these claims. Such notice ought to have been given to the district attorney, at least, so as to have given him an opportunity to attack the validity of the tax, had he seen proper to do so; especially as the cause had been fully submitted to the court before the filing of the claims. These claims may be, and perhaps are meritorious ones, but as the applications now stand, both must be rejected. Order of dissolution will be made conforming to the views here expressed.

I find on the files an application made by private counsel for an allowance out of this fund for services rendered during the progress of the trial. The assistant counsel was employed under an order made by the secretary of the treasury, and as the court made no order directing the services to be performed, and as the counsel were not subject to the control of the court, it is not apparent that the court has the right to make the order desired.

Just before the close of the last term of court, for my own convenience, and owing to the great amount, and conflicting character of the testimony on the subject, I submitted to a jury the questions in dispute between the two persons who claimed to be informers. The jury found that the two acted in concert, and both gave information at the same time which led to the seizure of the property. Of course, this verdict has no binding force, but it is so manifestly just, as appears from the testimony, that the finding of the jury will be adopted as the finding of the court.

The fund now in the registry of the court ought to be distributed and applied as follows: Out of the fund realized from the sale of the rectifying establishments ($2,800) pay: First. The marshal's fee for selling. Second. The balance to be credited on the decree. Out of the fund realized from the sale of the distillery, on which liens were filed: First. All costs and expenses incurred for the seizure, trial, condemnation and sale of the whole of the property seized, including any allowance to officers of the court, in lieu of fees or otherwise. Second. The mechanic's lien heretofore described of the Council Bluffs Iron Works Company for $2,883.60.

Hoagland for	$2,229 05
Fitzpatrick for	119 35
Harris and Foster for	1,369 00

—And the balance of the said fund to be applied to and credited on the decree. And it is so ordered. Owing to the voluminous record, and the amount of labor required in conjunction with the clerk and marshal to tax the cost bills, the case will be referred to General Manderson, a member of the bar, to tax the costs, make distribution of the fund, and to report the same to this court on the first day of the next (May) term thereof.

Case No. 14,965.

UNITED STATES v. DISTILLERY IN WEST FRONT STREET.

[2 Abb. (U. S.) 192;[1] 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 174; 18 Pittsb. Leg. J. 61; 4 Brewst. 246.]

District Court, D. Delaware. 1870.

REVENUE LAWS—VALIDITY OF PROVISIONS IMPOSING FORFEITURE.

An act of congress,—such as section 44 of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 142), which declares that real property employed in a violation of a revenue law shall be forfeited therefor,—is not unconstitutional. Such an act may be sustained as a regulation of civil policy appropriate to accomplish a purpose vital to government.

This was a libel of information to enforce a forfeiture.

HALL, District Judge. This is a case of libel of information on behalf of the United States in rem; that is to say, a distillery, being a brick building, 106 West Front street, Wilmington, and the lot of land on which the said distillery stands, and certain apparatus, &c., which John S. Prettyman, U. S. collector of internal revenue for this district, had seized as forfeited to the United States, according to section 44 of the act of congress "imposing taxes on distilled spirits," &c., of July 20, 1868.

The libel of information alleges that Archibald McKinley, being a person distilling spirits, on the —— day of ——, 1869, at the distillery aforesaid, did carry on the business of a distiller, with intent to defraud the United States of a part of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, contrary to section 44 aforesaid, and that Philip Plunket had right, title, and interest in the said lot of land on which the said distillery is situated, and did knowingly suffer and permit the business of a distiller to be carired on by the said Archibald McKinley, at the said distillery.

Archibald McKinley and Philip Plunket have appeared and claimed the property, and answered the information severally; Philip Plunket claiming the real estate (the distillery and lot of land on which it is situated, in which he says he has an estate in fee simple). The answer put in issue all the allegations in the libel of information. On trial before a jury, a general verdict has been found for the plaintiff.

It is thus established that Archibald McKinley, a distiller, did carry on the business of a distiller at the distillery before mentioned, situated on the afore-mentioned lot of land; that Philip Plunket had a right, title, and interest in the said lot of land, and did knowingly suffer and permit the said Archibald McKinley to carry on the said business of a distiller there, or, in the phraseology of the said section 44, "the said business of a distiller to be there carried on by him." Therefore, all the right, title, and interest of Philip Plunket in this distillery and lot of land, according to this section 44, was forfeited to the United States, and a decree of condemnation should be pronounced, according to the prayer of the libel of information.

It is objected to this, that this section 44, cannot have this effect upon the real estate of Philip Plunket, under the clauses of the constitution of the United States prohibiting the passing of a bill of attainder or forfeiting real estate, even for punishment of treason, except for life; arguing that the forfeiting real estate by the mere enactment of the legislature, without offense or delinquency of the owner, is, in practical effect, a bill of attainder, certainly open to the same objection, and when the fundamental principle of our government will not allow forfeiture, except during life, for the highest crime, it certainly cannot be suffered for a misdemeanor.

In answer, it is obvious to remark, that these clauses of the constitution of the United States have respect to high crimes, and punishment of them, restraining rigor, and guarding against arbitrarily enacting guilt. The case before the court is a civil suit in rem, against the thing, to ratify the seizure of it, and the provision of the act of congress under which it is alleged to be forfeited, and therefore was seized, is a regulation of civil policy, framed to secure to the United States fair payment of taxes imposed for the support of the government, a regulation of civil policy to accomplish a purpose vital to government; for without revenue the government cannot exist; and what measures may be requisite to enforce the collection of a tax, it is for congress, in the exercise of its legislative power, to determine. That power is not unlimited; but what are the objections to the provision upon which this case depends?

Certainly, congress can impose a tax on distilled spirits, and provide the processes and measures for collecting it; for preventing the government being defrauded of it; and what measure more obvious, germane, or suitable, than to make the defrauding of the tax cause of forfeiting the distillery (viz: the building and the lot of land on which it is situated), the provision under consideration.

The objection that would first occur would be, that the forfeiture is unreasonably large; but of this, congress is the rightful judge, and experience in this matter has guided to this provision. There is no objection; it is in natural course; it is common to make the use of a thing for an unlawful purpose, its employment in an injurious way, cause of its forfeiture. Carrying on the distilling business, with intention to defraud the government of the taxes on the spirits distilled, and actually defrauding it, the case before the court upon this verdict, so far from exhibiting the provision complained of as intolerable for hardship, commends it to a sense of justice and propriety. I can see no force in the protest against its action on real estate—fee simple in land.

Under the feudal system, all title to land was derived from the king, and held for doing service to him; and those holding from him granted to those under them, upon like tenure, doing service to them; the holders or tenants must all be choice men, in whom there was personal trust to perform the stipulated service—all controlling considerations of the grants, in those times of violence and war. But the tenants must hold the land in order to perform the service. The service was indispensable; hence the land was inalienable, the service being essentially personal; and the feudal system thus established principles of land tenure, which the nation, as it became commercial, had a constant struggle with—an interesting part of English history.

We have never adopted nor allowed like principles in our land tenure. Our earliest statutes, 1694 and 1700, make land liable to pay debts, when sufficient personal estate cannot be found; and it was not till about seventy years afterward, about 1770, that the regulation was made that, if the profits would pay the debt and interest in seven years, the land should not be sold, but delivered to the creditors on elegit, to be held till payment from the profits. This regulation does not affect the character of land in its liability for debt. It can be sold from the owner by adverse proceeding, in fee simple, for debt, for taxes, for a fine for an assault and battery upon a judgment of a justice of the peace; it is property, and subject, as property is subject, to answer demands which law makes upon it for the ends of justice.

As a further reason against construing and administering the provision of the act of congress upon which this case rests, according to its literal meaning, it is contended that it is in practical effect a bill of attainder, taking from Philip Plunket this real estate, by mere force of enactment, without offense or delinquency on his part.

I have already met this argument. I may add, further, this is not a proceeding against Philip Plunket; he has intervened in this case, making himself, of his own accord, a party. The proceeding is against this distillery, as a thing forfeited for being used as a means for carrying on the business of distilling spirits, with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled; and the allegation informing Philip Plunket, who has made himself a party to the proceeding, why his property is forfeited, is, that he knowingly permitted the distiller who carried on this business to use this distillery. As the use was by his permission, he must abide the consequences.

The distillery is thus made, by this provision of the act, a pledge, to the amount of its value, that the business of distilling in it shall be carried on fairly, without intention to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled, or any part of it; and Philip Plunket, by knowingly permitting its use under this provision—and no man is allowed to plead ignorance of the law, and also the written instrument under his hand, according to the eighth section, attests his privity—consents to this; so that this view of the case comes to this point—that Philip Plunket, knowingly permitting this property to be used as a distillery, subjects it to be security for the fair carrying on of the business. This is the scope of the provision, and there can be no objection to it.

Let there be a decree of condemnation in the usual form.

Case No. 14,966.

UNITED STATES v. DISTILLERY NO. TWENTY-EIGHT et al.

[6 Biss. 483; [1] 21 Int. Rev. Rec. 366; 8 Chi. Leg. News, 57; 2 Cent. Law J. 749.]

District Court, D. Indiana. Nov. 4, 1875.

INTERNAL REVENUE—DISTILLERS—BOOKS—JURY TRIAL—PENALTY—EX POST FACTO LAW.

1. The act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 486], does not apply exclusively to cases arising under the custom revenue laws, but applies as well to cases arising under the internal revenue laws.

2. The fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, is constitutional, and does not violate articles 4, 5 and 7, of the amendments to the constitution.

3. This is a proceeding against the distillery and not against the claimants; any statements made by them as witnesses in the proceeding against the distillery could not be used against them in any subsequent criminal prosecution.

4. The court had the power to make the order requiring the production of the books and papers, and to enforce it.

5. When the issues are made up, the claimants will have the constitutional right to demand a jury trial.

6. The penalty for not complying with the order to produce books is that the allegations in the motion shall be taken as confessed.

7. The objection that the act of 1874 is an ex post facto law considered.

Informations were filed in two cases under the internal revenue laws against distillery No. twenty-eight, and certain rectifying houses and other property. Gordon B. and John W. Bingham intervened as claimants and the causes were consolidated. Subsequently, upon the written motion of the district attorney, under the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, an order was entered against the claimants to produce in court certain business books and papers relating to their business as distillers, rectifiers and wholesale liquor dealers, on a day and hour certain, subject to the examination of the district attorney, under the direction of the court. On the day named claimants appeared by counsel, and moved that this order be vacated for the following reasons: (1) That the act of June 22, 1874, applies exclusively to cases arising under the custom revenue laws, and not at all to proceedings under the internal revenue laws. (2) That the books and papers ordered to be produced are not described with sufficient particularity. (3) That the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, is unconstitutional in this, that it violates articles 4, 5 and 7 of the amendments to the constitution.

Nelson Trusler, Dist. Atty., Charles L. Holstein and Thomas M. Browne, for the United States.

James M. Shackelford and Charles Denby, for claimants.

GRESHAM, District Judge. The section under which the order was entered against the claimants reads as follows: "That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal, arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the government, whenever, in his belief, any business book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which the suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant by the United States marshal by delivering to him a certified copy thereof, or otherwise serving the same as original notices of suit in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail or refuse to produce such book, invoice, or paper, in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in said motion shall be taken as confessed, unless his failure or refusal to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And if produced, the said attorney shall be permitted, under the direction of the court, to make examination, (at which examination the defendant or claimant, or his agent, may be present,) of such entries in said book, invoice, or papers, as relate to or tend to prove the allegation aforesaid, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of the said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have subject to the order of the court, the custody of them, except pending their examination in court as aforesaid."

Language more general could hardly have been employed. It provides for the production of books, papers, etc., "in all suits and proceedings other than criminal, arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States."

It is true the act is entitled "An act to amend the custom revenue laws and to repeal moieties," and that, with the exception of the fifth section, its provisions relate solely to the customs-revenue. But it also appears that the provisions of the former acts, repealed by the act of 1874, also related exclusively to the customs-revenue. Why, then, did not congress expressly limit the operation of this act, providing for the production of business books and papers to cases arising under the customs-revenue laws, as it did the provisions of the several acts referred to in this act and repealed by it? Clearly for the reason that in all suits other than criminal, arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, congress designed that the court might require the production of any business book and paper belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant.

Besides, it is seldom that the title of an act of congress is resorted to as an aid in its construction. The title neither extends nor restrains any positive provisions contained in the body of the act. It is well known that congress often embodies in a single act incongruous provisions, having no reference to the matters specified in the title. Hadden v. Collector, etc., 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 107.

The second objection made to producing the business books, papers, etc., is that the same were not described with sufficient particularity.

The act must receive a reasonable construction. Such a decree of particularity as was insisted upon by counsel for claimants would render the fifth section practically nugatory. The district attorney cannot be required in his motion to describe the business books as journal A or B, or ledger A or B, for he may not know what particular books the claimants have.

The description of the books and papers in the written motion, and the order of the court is, substantially· Certain day books, journals, cash books, ledgers, blotter-books, blotters, invoices, dray-tickets, etc., kept, received, and taken by the claimants in their business as distillers rectifiers and wholesale liquor dealers, between certain dates named, and since the 22d day of June, 1874, showing the amount of spirits produced, received, removed, and sold by them during the time named. The claimants were sufficiently advised by this description what books and papers were meant No greater certainty of description was required to satisfy the statute. U S v. Three Tons of Coal [Case No. 16,515]; Myer v. Becker [Id. 1,208].

In considering the constitutionality of the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, it is necessary to determine the real character of the case at bar.

The charges made in the libel are against the property and not against the claimants. It is the distillery and other property proceeded against that are treated as the offenders. The claimants, strictly speaking, are not parties to the proceeding. They are here of their own motion, and not on the process of the court. The judgment must be for or against the property libeled, not for or against the claimants. A forfeiture of the property does not convict the claimants. This proceeding is entirely independent of any criminal prosecutions which have been commenced, or which may hereafter be commenced against them The books and papers, which may or may not, when produced, inculpate the property, can only be used in evidence in this action. After being thus used they go back into the possession of the claimants.

The question, therefore, of compelling a person to accuse himself or to testify against himself in a criminal case is not before the court. Even if the act of 1874 were not in existence, the claimants might be compelled by a subpœna duces tecum, to bring in the books and papers called for in the order of the court; and I can see no reason why they might not also be compelled to testify concerning all the allegations of the libel. Any statements thus made by them as witnesses in the proceeding against the distillery and other property could not be used against them in any subsequent criminal prosecution.

The act of February 25, 1868 [15 Stat. 37], section 860, Rev. St., provides that "no discovery or evidence obtained from the party or witness, by reason of a judicial proceeding * * * shall be given in evidence or in any manner used against him, or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture."

It was said in argument that under this statute the books and papers, even if produced, could not be used in evidence on the trial of this cause

The act of 1874, expressly provides that the books and papers may be thus used in evidence. This is the last expression of the legislative will. So far as the two acts are inconsistent or repugnant, the act of 1868 is repealed. The claimants are not justified by article five of the amendments to the constitution in refusing to produce their books and papers to be used in evidence. U. S. v. Mason [Case No. 15,735]; U. S. v. Three Tons of Coal [supra].

The claimants next attempted to shelter themselves under the provision in article four, of the amendments to the constitution which secures the people in their persons, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Congress is empowered by the constitution "to levy and collect taxes, imports and excises," provided the laws are uniform in their operation. The mode and manner of exercising this power is left to the discretion of congress. Under the exercise of that power congress has provided the internal revenue system. By that system the government raises the principal portion of its revenue. The tax on the production and sale of spirits is a material source of revenue. The government has, therefore, practically assumed control of the manufacture and sale of spirits. It has adopted regulations for the government of distillers, rectifiers, and wholesale dealers, with fines, penalties, and forfeitures for their violation. They are required to keep books in which they are to enter daily all their business transactions with the utmost particularity. These books are at all times open to the inspection of the proper revenue officers, and are popularly known as government books. If properly kept they will show the exact amount of spirits produced, received, and removed on any given day. If so kept, they will correspond with their business books, and this correspondence ought to exist. No one can engage in the manufacture and sale of spirits without the consent of the government. That consent is obtained on certain terms and conditions. No one can be allowed to say that, as a distiller, rectifier, or wholesale liquor dealer, he has kept a private record of his transactions. His books and entries are quasi public books and entries. The government has a right to see any record kept by him of his business. This right has been exercised by the government since its organization. The first and subsequent congresses have enacted such laws. It is too late to question the validity of such statutes. Experience has shown that without severe and even inquisitorial regulations the government cannot successfully collect the tax levied upon the production and sale of spirits, and the necessities of the government justify the existence and rigid enforcement of such regulations.

The order of the court complained of by the claimants authorizes neither search nor seizure. It calls on the claimants to produce certain books and papers relating to their business as distillers, rectifiers, and wholesale liquor dealers. If their business books and papers are not produced the allegations of the libel are taken as confessed.

The claimants were equally unsuccessful in invoking the protection of article seven of the amendments to the constitution. That article provides that "in suits at common law, when the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." And it has been settled that a proceeding in rem under the internal revenue laws is a suit at common law within the meaning of that article. The Sarah, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 391.

It is clear then that when the issues in this proceeding are made, and the case is ready for trial, the claimants will have a constitutional right to demand a jury.

But they must first submit to and comply with all reasonable and proper rules and orders of the court entered against them in making up the issues and preparing the case for final trial.

As already stated, the books and records kept by the claimants are quasi public records. If their government books were kept as the law required them to be kept, their business books will make the same showing as the government books. And if this correspondence exists, the production of their business books and papers will not harm the claimants. If their government books were not so kept, and their business books and papers contain evidence which will tend to prove the allegations in the libel, there is justice in the demand of the government for their production.

The act of 1874, authorized the court to make the order in controversy. That act, and others of the same nature, have not only been held constitutional, but reasonable and proper, in view of the object sought to be accomplished. The statute authorizing the order for the production of books and papers also fixes the penalty for disobedience of that order—the allegations in the motion shall be taken as confessed.

If congress had not seen proper to prescribe the penalty or punishment for disobedience of the order, it can hardly be doubted that the courts, in the exercise of a sound discretion, would have been authorized to enforce compliance either by fine or imprisonment, or both. In this case the statute has fixed the penalty, and the court can inflict no other. If the claimants refuse to comply with the order of the court they are in contempt of its authority. That question is not triable by a jury. The contempt can be purged only by a compliance with the court's order. The constitutional right of the claimants to a trial by jury will not shield them from punishment for disobedience of the order of the court.

Whenever in the progress of a proceeding a party acts contumaciously by disobeying a lawful order entered against him, that proceeding, so far as he can claim any advantage under it, is at once arrested, and goes no further until the contempt is purged. Where the United States courts are not limited by statute, their power to enforce obedience to their orders by punishing for contempt is discretionary. The object to be accomplished by the exercise of this power may be punitive in its character, or it may be at once punitive and remedial, according to the given case.

In the case of Texas v. White [reported, sub nom. In re Chiles, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 157], in the supreme court of the United States, Justice Miller used this language: "The exercise of this power has a twofold aspect, namely: First, the proper punishment of the guilty party for his disrespect of the authority of the court or its order; and second, to compel his performance of some act or duty required of him by the court, which he refuses to perform. Stimpson v. Putnam, 41 Vt. 238. In the former case the court must judge for itself the nature and extent of the punishment with reference to the gravity of the offense. In the latter case the party refusing to obey should be fined and imprisoned until he performs the act required of him, or shows that it is not in his power to do it." Also see Bish. Cr. Law (3d Ed.) §§ 232–259, inclusive.

The first ten articles of the amendments to the constitution were proposed by the first congress of the United States at its first session on the 25th day of September, 1789. At the same session, and about the same time, the act commonly called the judiciary act was passed. Section fifteen of that act (section 724, p. 137, Rev. St.) is as follows: "In the trial of actions at law, the courts of the United States may, on motion and due notice thereof being given, to require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue, in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery; and if a plaintiff shall fail to comply with such order, to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectively, on motion, to give the like judgment for the defendant as in cases of non-suit; and if a defendant shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectively, on motion as aforesaid, to give judgment against him or her by default."

In the case of U. S. v. Twenty-Eight Packages Pins [Case No. 16,561], it was held that this statute did not apply to proceedings in rem. The contrary, however, was held by Judge Treat, of the Eastern district of Missouri, in the case of U. S. v. Four Hundred and Sixty-Nine Barrels of Spirits [Id. 15,148], in which ruling he says he is supported by the circuit judge in a well-considered opinion. This section of the judiciary act is important as a legislative construction of the seventh article of the amendments to the constitution. The very act organizing the federal courts is contemporaneous with the articles of the amendments to the constitution, whose protection was relied on by the counsel for the claimants with such seeming confidence. The act is still in force. It authorizes the courts to order the production of the books and writings of a party, and to enforce such order by summary judgment against the party failing or refusing it. The motion in the case at bar was made under the act of 1874, and not under that of 1789 [1 Stat. 73]; but the argument by which the former statute is sustained necessarily establishes the validity of the latter. The further point was made by counsel for the claimants that the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, was ex post facto, and, therefore null and void. In support of that position the case of U. S. v. Hughes [Case No. 15,416], was cited.

That was a case pending before the passage of the act of 1874. It was a suit to recover penalties for an alleged violation of the revenue laws, committed prior to the enactment of the law of 1874. The motion in the case involved the production of books and papers of the defendant used and kept by him prior to the act of 1874. Judge Blatchford held, that as applied to that case, the act of 1874 was ex post facto, in that it altered the legal rules of evidence which applied prior thereto and at the time of the alleged violation. This case is expressly limited to the books, papers, etc., of the claimants, relating to their business since the act of June 22, 1874. Whether or not a statute is ex post facto, depends upon the facts of the particular case.

The court has been aided in the consideration of these questions by the labors of the counsel upon both sides, and especially by those of Mr. Holstein, the assistant district attorney.

The motion of counsel for claimants is overruled, and the order of the court requiring the production of the business books, papers, etc., will stand.

UNITED STATES v. DIXEY et al.

[3 Wash. C. C. 15.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1811.

EMBARGO BOND — EXCUSE FOR NONPERFORMING VOYAGE—PUTTING INTO FOREIGN PORT —SEAWORTHINESS.

Want of seaworthiness, in a vessel sailing under a bond given according to the provisions of the embargo law, may or may not, according to circumstances, deprive the obligee of the excuse of prevention from performing the voyage, by the perils of the sea. If the vessel be lost before she arrive at her port of destination, or at another port in the United States, the obligors would be excused, whether she was seaworthy or not. If the vessel proceeded to a foreign port, from want of seaworthiness, it may afford strong presumption that it was not the real cause of her so doing, but that a breach of the condition was originally intended.

Action on an embargo bond. The question of law, was, whether the want of seaworthiness of the vessel, does not deprive the obligor of the benefit of the excuse of prevention, by danger of the sea, or other unavoidable accident. The voyage was from Philadelphia to New-Orleans; and in consequence of the disabled state of the vessel, she was obliged to put into Havana, whence the defendant [Dixey, Coxe & Price] was not permitted by the governor to take away the cargo.

In the charge, it was stated that want of seaworthiness might or might not have this effect. The case is to be considered in reference to the object and intention of the law, which was, to prevent a vessel going to a foreign port. If, for instance, the vessel should be lost before she reaches the port of her destination, or any other port in the United States, it would not deprive the obligor of the benefit of the exception of loss by a peril of the sea, to prove that she was not seaworthy. If she should go to a foreign port, though in consequence of a peril of the sea operating as the immediate cause, the want of seaworthiness might or might not be important, according to circumstances. It may afford strong ground of suspicion, that the avowed destination was not bona fide, and that the excuse was a mere cover to a breach of the law; as if the vessel is not sufficiently provisioned for the avowed voyage, and on that account, called at a forbidden port. But this intention may be repelled. In this case, the voyage was one which the defendant was accustomed to carry on, and which had been performed to New-Orleans only the year before, in the same vessel. It is very improbable, that he would risk so large a cargo in a vessel which he did not deem sufficient to carry it safely, and he could not calculate her condition so nicely, as to think her sufficient to go to Havana, and not to New-Orleans. Besides, the immediate cause of her incapacity to proceed, arose from her striking on the Bahama Bank. The question is, was the breach of the condition of the bond produced by a peril of the sea, or unavoidable accident—or merely from the fault of the defendant? If the former, the verdict should be for the defendant, if the latter, against him.

Verdict for defendant.

UNITED STATES v. DIXON.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 25, 1807.

CRIMINAL LAW — INDICTMENT FOR BURGLARY — CONVICTION OF LARCENY—RETRACTING PLEA OF GUILTY.

1. Upon an indictment for burglary, the jury may find the prisoner guilty of larceny only.

2. Upon an indictment for larceny at common law, the court may render judgment according to the statute.

3. The court will suffer the prisoner to retract his plea of guilty in a capital case, and to plead not guilty.

Indictment [against Godfrey Dixon] at common law for burglary, in the house of John Curran. The jury having retired, sent to the court to know whether they could, upon that indictment, find the prisoner guilty of stealing only, and acquit him of the burglary. THE COURT having ordered the jury to be brought into court, told them, it was in their power to find a general verdict of guilty, or not guilty, or to find specially that the prisoner was guilty of a part only of the facts which go to constitute the crime of burglary; and that if they were not satisfied as to the breaking and entering the house in the night-time, they might so find their verdict, and that he was guilty of larceny only. Whereupon the jury retired, and in a short time returned a verdict, not guilty as to the breaking and entering the house in the night, but guilty of feloniously stealing the goods, &c. Sentence, 39 stripes, and one dollar fine. The sentence was under the act of congress, of 30th April, 1790, § 16 (1 Stat. 116).

NOTE. When Dixon was first arraigned he pleaded not guilty, and Mr. Hiort and Mr. Key were assigned as his counsel.

When called for trial his counsel informed the court that he wished to withdraw his plea of not guilty, being satisfied that the proof of his confessions were too strong to admit of any hope, and that he thought it might be the means of his obtaining a pardon, especially as he was not the principal perpetrator of the act. Whereupon THE COURT explained to the prisoner the nature of his indictment, and stated the punishment to be death, and asked him whether he fully understood the nature of the charge against him and the punishment of the crime, to which he answered in the affirmative, upon which THE COURT suffered him to plead guilty, and remanded him.

On the 25th of June he was ordered into court; and THE COURT again explained to him his offence and its punishment, and told him he had an opportunity, if he pleased, of retracting his plea, and of putting himself upon his trial; and asked him if he still persisted in pleading guilty, when he said he wished for a trial, and to plead not guilty. And THE COURT suffered him to withdraw the plea of guilty and put himself on his trial. The result of which is stated above.

SALE OF LIQUORS — POWER TO GRANT LICENSE — CITY OF WASHINGTON.

An indictment will not lie against an inhabitant of the city of Washington for retailing spirituous liquors within the city.

Indictment [against Jacob Dixon] for retailing spirituous liquors within the city of Washington, without license under the act of Maryland, 1784, c. 37, § 24.

The case having been submitted without argument, THE COURT decided that the exclusive power of granting licenses for retailing, and the exclusive power of regulating the same, was, by the charter of Washington, vested in the corporation, and that the indictment would not lie.

COMMON GAMING-HOUSE — INDICTMENT — COMMON LAW OFFENCE.

It is an indictable offence at common law to keep a common gaming-house, and for lucre and gain to cause idle and evil disposed persons to come and play together there, and to game for divers large and excessive sums of money, to the common nuisance of the citizens of the United States.

[Cited in Marcus v. U. S., Case No. 9,062a.]

[Cited in People v. Sponsler, 1 Dak. 289, 46 N. W. 460.]

Indictment for a common nuisance in keeping a common gambling-house for playing at the unlawful game called faro. The indictment was founded upon the model of that in the case of Rex v. Rogier, 1 Barn. & C. 272, 8 Serg. & L. 75, and charged, "that the said Jacob Dixon did, on," &c., "at," &c., "and on divers days and times," &c., "with force and arms at," &c., "unlawfully keep and maintain a certain common gambling-house, and in the said gambling-house, for lucre and gain, on the said first day of January and on the other times aforesaid, then and there, did unlawfully and wilfully cause and procure divers idle and evil disposed persons to frequent and come to play together at a certain unlawful game called faro, and in the said common gaming-house on the said first day of January," &c., "unlawfully did permit and suffer the said idle and evil disposed persons to be and remain playing at the said unlawful game called faro, for divers large and excessive sums of money; to the great damage and common nuisance of the good citizens of the United States, to the evil example of all persons in like cases offending, and against the peace and government of the United States."

The jury having found the defendant guilty upon this indictment, Coxe & Dandridge, for defendant, moved in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial; and after full argument on the part of the defendant, Mr. Swann, for the United States, cited the precedent in Archb. Cr. Law, 363, and submitted the case to the court.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), as follows:

Coxe & Dandridge have moved the court in arrest of judgment, and contend that the matters charged in the indictment do not constitute an offence at common law. That at common law no game or gaming was unlawful; nor was it unlawful to keep a common gaming-house; and to this point they cited 3 Reeves, Eng. Law, pp. 170, 293; 1 Curwood's Hawk. P. C. 721; Jac. Law Dict. "Gaming"; 9 Anne, c. 14; 4 Tuck. Bl. 171; Com. v. Richards, 1 Va. Cas. 133; 3 Chitty, for the forms of indictment containing a count for a disorderly house. Rex v. Rogier, 1 Barn. & C. 272; Hawk. P. C. bk. 1, c. 32, § 2; Rex v. Dixon, 10 Mod. 335; 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9, § 12; 1 Doug. 60, 61, in Chandler v. Roberts, referring to 10 Mod. 256. The British statutes of 16 Car. II. c. 7, against deceit in gaming; 9 Anne, c. 14, § 1, avoiding securities for money lost at gaming; Id. § 2, providing that if more than £10 be lost at play, at one sitting, it may be recovered; and section 3, requiring the winner to answer on oath, are in force in this country. But the English and British statutes, prohibiting certain games to certain classes of persons, never were in force in Maryland, and, consequently, are not in force here. The act of 1797 (chapter 110, § 2) is the only act in force in this county, for restraining any kind of games, except the by-laws of the corporations of Washington and Georgetown; and that act only prohibits the setting up, keeping, and maintaining certain gaming-tables, or devices, in any tavern, or house occupied by a retailer of wine, spirituous liquors, &c. The game of faro is not an unlawful game. No person can be punished under that statute for playing at that game, whether it be played in a tavern or a private dwelling-house. The offence under the statute, is the setting up and maintaining the table or device.

The indictment, therefore, in the present case, derives no assistance from any statute; nor does the playing at faro constitute any part of the offence. If it can be supported at all, it must be as an indictment for a common nuisance in keeping a common gaming-house, for lucre and gain, at which divers idle and dissolute persons were permitted to assemble and game for divers large and excessive sums of money. Hawkins (book 1, c. 75, § 6) says: "Also it hath been said that all common stages for rope-dancers, and, also, all common gaming-houses, are nuisances in the eye of the law;" "not only because they are great temptations to idleness, but, also, because they are apt to draw together great numbers of disorderly persons, which cannot but be very inconvenient to the neighborhood." And in section 7, he says: "And it seems to be a proper distinction between playhouses and the nuisances mentioned in the foregoing section; that playhouses having been originally instituted with a laudable design of recommending virtue to the imitation of the people, and exposing vice and folly, are not nuisances in their own nature, but may only become such by accident; whereas the others cannot but be nuisances." Hawkins cites Higginson's Case, 2 Burrows, 1232, for keeping and maintaining "a certain common, ill-governed, and disorderly house, and in the said house, for his own lucre and profit, certain evil and ill-disposed persons, of ill name and fame, and of dishonest conversation, to frequent and come together, then and there unlawfully did cause and procure; and the said persons, in the said house, then," &c., "and there to be and remain, fighting of cocks, boxing, playing at cudgels, and misbehaving themselves, unlawfully and wilfully did permit, and yet doth permit; to the great damage and common nuisance of all the subjects of our said lord the king, inhabiting near the said house, and against the peace," &c. Upon a motion in arrest of judgment this indictment was adjudged good, by the court of king's bench. He cites, also Rex v. Howel, 3 Keb. 465, 510, which was an indictment at common law for keeping a cockpit six days, for which he was fined forty shillings a day, the court making the statute of 33 Hen. VIII., c. 9, § 11, the rule of the fine, although the indictment was not under that statute. He also cites Rex v. Dixon, 10 Mod. 336. The court there said, that the keeping of a gaming-house was an offence indictable at common law. In that case, indeed, the indictment was upon the statute of 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9, § 11; and the objection was, that the statute, having chalked out a particular method of proceeding for the recovery of the penalty of forty shillings a day, indictment would not lie. But the court said, that "where the statute gives a new penalty, or a new remedy for a common-law offence, the remedy at common law shall not be taken away without negative words."

It was also objected, that if it were to be considered as an indictment at common law, it would not be good, for want of concluding "ad commune nocumentum"; but the court said it was "not necessary to conclude so here; the offence, in its own nature, importing that it is so. Besides, the word 'common' supplies this defect, if it were one." The statute of 9 Anne, c. 14, which makes playing at any game unlawful, if more than £10 shall be lost at one sitting, is in force in this country.

The indictment, in this case, is taken from the precedent in Archbold's Criminal Pleading (page 363), which is the exact form used in the case of Rex v. Rogier, 1 Barn. & C. 272; in which case Abbott, C. J., upon a motion in arrest of judgment, said, "I have no doubt that the facts stated in this indictment constitute an offence at common law. Hawkins, in the passage which has been cited, observes, 'It has been said that common gaming-houses are nuisances in the eye of the law;' and then he assigns the reason, namely, that they tend to produce certain evil consequences; which is not very different from saying that they are nuisances, if those consequences are produced. Since his time, many parties have been convicted upon indictments in which the keeping of such a house has been charged to be an offence at common law." After stating that the recitals in the statute of 25 Geo. II. c. 36, are "a legislative declaration that the keeping of a gaming-house is an indictable offence," Mr. Chief Justice Abbott proceeds: "Besides, the 9 Anne, c. 14, § 2, makes playing at any game unlawful if more than £10 shall be lost. Now, in this case, the indictment states, not only that the defendants kept a common gaming-house, but that they permitted persons to play there for divers large and excessive sums of money. The playing for large and excessive sums of money would, of itself, make any game unlawful; and, if so, there can be no doubt that this is an offence at common law." Bayley, Holroyd, and Best, Justices, concurred, and Holroyd, J., further added, "that in his opinion, it would have been sufficient merely to have alleged that the defendants kept a common gaming-house." The motion in arrest of judgment was overruled. It may be observed, that in that case the judges laid no stress upon the fact charged in the indictment, that the defendant caused persons to come to play together at a certain unlawful game called rouge et noir; nor have I been able to find, that at the time when that case was decided the game of rouge et noir had been made unlawful by any statute. The statute of 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9, repealed all the former "statutes made for the restraint of unlawful games, or for the maintenance of artillery, as touching the penalties and forfeitures of the same." By the eleventh section, it is enacted, That no person shall, for his gain, lucre, or living, keep "any common house, alley, or place, or place of bowling, coyting, cloysh, cales, half-bowl, tennis, dicing-table, or carding, or any other manner of game prohibited by any estatute heretofore made; or any unlawful new game now invented or made; or any other new unlawful game hereafter to be invented, found, had, or made; upon pain to forfeit and pay for every day keeping, having or maintaining, or suffering any such game to be had, kept, executed, played, or maintained, within any such house, garden, alley, or other place, contrary to the form and effect of this estatute, forty shillings."

The first statute, prohibiting any kind of game, was that of 12 Rich. II. c. 6 (Anno 1388), and applied only to servants of husbandry, laborers, and servants of artificers and victuallers; not to servants of gentlemen; and it commands them to refrain from such games as "hand and foot ball, coits, dice, throwing of stone keyles, and such other importune games." The statute of 11 Hen. IV. c. 4 (Anno 1409), enforces the 12 Rich. II. c. 6, against laborers and servants playing at such unlawful games, by six days' imprisonment. The statute of 17 Edw. IV. c. 3 (Anno 1477), "For unlawful games," says: "That as, according to the laws of this land, no person shall use any unlawful games, that is to say, coits, foot-ball, or such like games;" "contrary to which laws, the said games, and divers newly-devised games called cloish, kayles, half-bowle, hand-in-and-hand-out, and quekeborde, from day to day, are used in divers parts of this land;" "which gamesters are daily supported and favored by the masters and occupiers of divers houses, tenements, gardens, and other places in which they use, and play at their said ungracious and not commendable games;" wherefore, it was enacted, that no occupier or master of any house, tenement, &c., should voluntarily suffer any person to play at any of the said games, in any their said houses, tenements, &c., or any other place, under pain of imprisonment for three years, and to lose for every default £20. And that no person should use or play at any of the said games, under pain of two years' imprisonment, and £10 for every default. The statute of 11 Hen. VII. c. 2 (Anno 1494), provided, that no artificer, laborer, or servant, should play at any unlawful game, but in Christmas. But by the statute of 19 Hen. VII. c. 12 (Anno 1503), certain persons were forbidden to play at unlawful games. The statute 3 Hen. VIII. c. 3 (Anno 1511), provided that unlawful games should not be used. By the statute 27 Hen. VIII. c. 25 (Anno 1535), "there shall be no playing at unlawful games." These are all the statutes upon the subject prior to 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9. The titles only of the last four are given in Ruffhead's edition of the statutes, it being stated in the margin, that they were repealed by 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9. No principles are stated in any of them by which it can be ascertained what newly-invented games, (that is, games invented after these statutes,) should be deemed unlawful. The 12th section of the statute of 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9, makes it penal in any person to haunt the gaming-houses mentioned in the 11th section, and to play there. By the 13th section certain placards or licenses might be obtained, expressing what games should be used, and what persons should play thereat; security being given by recognizance to the lord chancellor, not to use the placard contrary to the form thereof. The 16th section provides, "that no manner of artificer, or craftsman of any handicraft or occupation, husbandman, apprentice, laborer, servant at husbandry, journeyman, or servant of artificer, mariners, fishermen, waterman, or serving-man," "shall play at the tables, tennis, dice, cards, bowls, clash, coyting, logating, or any other unlawful game, out of Christmas, under pain of 20s. to be forfeit for every time; and at Christmas to play at any of the said games in their masters' houses, or in their masters' presence; and also that no manner of persons shall, at any time play at any bowls in open places out of his garden or orchard, upon pain," &c. By the 21st section, leases of gaming-houses were to be void. By the 22d and 23d sections, masters might license their servants to play with themselves or other gentlemen. This statute did not prohibit gaming of any kind, at all times by all persons, and at all places; so that there was not, in truth, any game which was in itself unlawful. It only became unlawful by being used by certain persons, or in certain places, or at certain times.

The keeping of a common house for any unlawful game, for lucre and gain was prohibited; but no game was made unlawful unless played at such common house. The statutes thus formed a circle. Every game played in a common gaming-house, was unlawful; and every common house for playing at an unlawful game was unlawful. Some other games are prohibited by name, in subsequent statutes, and all games with dice, except back-gammon; but the game of rouge et noir is not, as far as I have been able to search, mentioned in any of them. It was not, therefore, an unlawful game, unless made so by being played in an unlawful place, or by persons not authorized to play it, or at an improper time. If all games were unlawful when played in a common gaming-house, then it was unlawful because it was played in such a house. But, as I have before said, the court, in the case of Rex v. Rogier, did not lay any stress upon its being, in itself, an unlawful game. They seem to have decided the cause entirely upon the ground that a common gaming-house, kept for lucre and gain, at which persons are permitted to play for large and excessive sums of money, is, per se, a common nuisance. The reason why it is to be considered as a common nuisance, is, that it tends to draw together idle and evil disposed persons; to corrupt their morals, and to ruin their fortunes; which is the same reason which is given in the case of houses of common prostitution. It is not because the game played in such a gaming-house is, in itself, an unlawful game, but because it is a common gaming-house kept for lucre and gain, where persons are permitted to play for money and other valuable property.

It has been said, in argument, that if the law be so, every man who has a whist-party at his house is liable to be prosecuted and punished for a nuisance. But the distinction is broad and palpable. To become a common nuisance, it must be a common gaming-house, kept for lucre and gain; holding out allurements to all who are disposed to game, and kept for that purpose. We entirely concur with the English judges, in saying that we have no doubt that the facts stated in this indictment, constitute an offence at common law.

The motion in arrest of judgment must therefore be overruled.

But there is also a motion for a new trial; and it is understood that the grounds are: (1) That there was no evidence that the playing was for large and excessive sums of money, which is a necessary constituent in the offence. (2) That there was no evidence that it was in fact a common nuisance; nor that idle and evil-disposed persons were there; nor that it was a common gaming-house, open to everybody. (3) That only one instance of playing was proved.

1. As to the first ground, the evidence was that the defendant kept a faro-bank, and the jury may be presumed to know the nature of the game and may have inferred from it, as they had a right to do, that whenever the game is played, it is for large sums; and that large sums are generally won and lost at that game.

2. It is not necessary to prove that it was a common nuisance. It was sufficient to prove that it was a common gaming-house, kept for lucre and gain.

3. It is not necessary to prove more than one act of gaming. It may be proved to be kept as and for a common gaming-house by other evidence than that of its having been often used as such.

Motion overruled.

UNITED STATES v. DOBBINS.

[1 Pa. Law J. Rep. 5.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. March, 1842.

BANKRUPTCY — PRIVILEGE FROM CIVIL ARREST.

A petitioner in bankruptcy is privileged from arrest on civil process pending the proceedings on this petition to be declared a bankrupt.

This was a habeas corpus commanding the defendant, a constable, to bring before the court the body of Johnathan Ramaley. By the return on the writ, it appeared that the relator, Johnathan Ramaley, was arrested on an execution issued by an alderman of the city of Pittsburgh; that, previously to his arrest, the relator had filed his petition in due form to this court to be declared a bankrupt; that the schedule annexed to said petition contained the name and amount of the debt, &c., of the arresting creditor; that the said court had made an order appointing the 12th day of March for the hearing of the relator and his creditors; and that notice of this order was published according to law.

T. Mellon, for relator.

IRWIN, District Judge, decided that the relator was within the jurisdiction of the court by the proceedings in bankruptcy, and, being bound at all times to abide its orders and decrees in the matter of his petition, he was entitled to its protection, by being privileged from arrest in the present case, pending the proceedings in his application for relief under the bankrupt law. It was therefore ordered that the relator be discharged from arrest, and that the arresting creditor pay the cost of the proceedings on the writ of habeas corpus.

UNITED STATES v. DOBBS et al.

[15 Int. Rev. Rec. 9.]

District Court, N. D. Mississippi. Dec. Term, 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAW—ILLICIT DISTILLERY.

[1. On a prosecution for conducting a distillery without giving the necessary bond or paying the tax, ignorance on the part of defendants that the bond had not been given or tax paid is no defense.]

[2. The presence of defendants while the distillery was in operation is merely a circumstance to show their connection with it, and will not alone justify a conviction.]

[This was an indictment against Newman H. Dobbs and E. S. Elliott on a charge of illicit distilling.]

G. Wiley Wells, U. S. Dist. Atty.

R. O. Reynolds and Samuel J. Ghoulson, for defendants.

Upon the trial of this cause the following proceedings were had:

After the jury was placed in the box, but before they were accepted by the defendants, defendants' attorneys proposed to challenge peremptorily John Anderson, one of the jurors in the box, which was objected to by the district attorney, who contended that, in the courts of the United States in cases other than those in which the punishment is death, neither party is entitled to challenge a juror except for cause.

HILL, District Judge. By the common law peremptory challenges of jurors in misdemeanors were not allowed, nor is there any act of congress making such provision. But by the act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), it is provided among other things that for the purpose of conforming as nearly as might be the qualifications, etc., of jurors to those in the state courts, the courts of the United States shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and empanelling of juries in substance to the laws and usages then in force in such state; and further, shall have power, by rule or order, from time to time, to conform the same to any change in these respects which might be thereafter adopted by the legislatures of the respective states for the state courts. The power and authority to make orders and rules under the provisions of this act in respect to challenges of jurors, whether peremptory or for cause, and in causes both civil and criminal, other than for treason, and those in which the punishment is death, was held and declared by Justice Nelson in case of U. S. v. Shackleford, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 588. By the provisions of article 297, § 61, c. 64, p. 621, it is provided that in cases not capital the accused shall be allowed four peremptory challenges, and the state two. That if the rules heretofore adopted by this court do not adopt this provision as a rule of this court, and allow the United States two peremptory challenges, and the accused four, the same is now adopted, and that number of peremptory challenges allowed each party in causes in this court other than the causes provided for by the act of congress.

Whereupon the district attorney challenged peremptorily one, and the defendants two jurors. The district attorney then introduced Perry Campbell, who testified that he was the assistant assessor of internal revenue for the Third district of Mississippi in the year 1870; that as such assessor he visited distillery No. 2, situated on Horne Lake in said district, and in De Soto county in this judicial district, at various times during the months of February, March, and April of that year; that said distillery was registered in the name of O. H. Pollard, but the business was transacted with him as such assessor by defendant Elliott; that notice was given for a discontinuance of said distillery; when he went to close it up, he was not furnished with the kind of lock required by the commissioner of internal revenue, but other locks were procured and the establishment locked up; that he visited the establishment on the 23d of May, 1871, when he found the locks broken and the distillery establishment in operation, that defendant Dobbs was in the distillery and gave him some beer to drink, which was taken out of a stand in the house; that he met defendant Elliott, who remarked, "You have caught us, but Pollard has gone to Okolona to execute the bond, and we will make it all right;" that he reported the facts to the assessor, and upon his report the establishment was seized by the collector.

The district attorney then introduced A. P. Shattuck, who testified that he is now and was during the year 1870 assessor of internal revenue for the Third district of Mississippi: That distillery No. 2 is situated on Horne Lake in De Soto county in said district, and had been conducted in the name of O. H. Pollard in the months of February, March, and April, 1870; that he had given the bond and paid the special tax for that time, but had not given notice of his intention to continue or resume said distillery operation after the 1st of May of that year; that O. H. Pollard and defendant Elliott about the 1st of May came to his office and proposed giving bond to resume operations in said distillery; that the bond was filled up, said O. H. Pollard as principal and said Elliott as surety; that he declined to accept and approve the same, when he was asked if Austin Pollard would be sufficient as an additional surety, when he replied that he would. O. H. Pollard said Austin Pollard was in Jackson and he would get him to sign the bond when he returned, that he was expecting his return in a few days, but that the bond was never completed nor was any assessment made or further steps taken in his office.

The district attorney then introduced B. B. Emory, who testified that he was the collector of internal revenue in 1870 for said district; that distillery No. 2 mentioned was conducted in the months of February, March and April in the name of O. H. Pollard; that defendant Elliott transacted all the business connected with his office in relation to said distillery during said time; that no special tax was paid by any one on account of said distillery for the revenue year commencing May 1, 1870; that he seized said distillery June 1, 1870; that he found the still warm, and mash, or beer, in the tubs, and some liquor, which he took to be whiskey, in the still, did not taste it, but it smelled like whiskey; that Dobbs pointed out a number of cattle and hogs, which he said belonged to him individually, and some to Major Wicks, and not to the firm; that he pointed out other property which he said belonged to the distillery; that he understood from both the defendants that they and O. H. Pollard composed the firm doing business in said distillery; that when he seized said distillery he found the ground wet around the still, and saw fresh wagon tracks going immediately from the still.

The district attorney then introduced J. B. Hood, who testified that about June 4, 1870, he took possession of said still as custodian under said Emory as collector and seizing officer; that there was then no whiskey in the cistern, but some mash in the tubs, which he threw out to the stock. It was also in proof that one Franks, one Hunt, and another were engaged as operatives in running said distillery at the time both Campbell and Emory were there after the 1st of May, 1870.

The defendants then offered to read to the jury, as evidence, a deed to the land on which the distillery was situated, to Austin Pollard, and a lease from him to O. H. Pollard, also a distiller's bond given by O. H. Pollard to the United States for the license year ending May 1, 1870, with all other papers on file in the collector's office relating to said distillery, filed by said Pollard during the said license year ending May 1, 1870, to show that prior to May 1, 1871, the ownership of the distillery was in O. H. Pollard. This being objected to by the district attorney, the objection was sustained, and the evidence offered excluded, on the ground that any such ownership could not relieve for acts done after the 1st of May, 1870.

BY THE COURT (charging jury). The defendants are charged in the indictment in three separate counts: 1st. That they, on the 23d day of May, 1870, carried on the business of distillers without having given the bond required by law therefor. 2d. That they on said day carried on the business of distillers without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law. 3d. That they on said day made mash, wort, and wash, fit for distillation and the production of spirits, in a building other than a distillery authorized by law. To these charges the defendants have plead not guilty, and it is for you to determine from the testimony whether they are or are not guilty of either one or all the charges against them.

All these men are presumed to be innocent until their guilt is established by sufficient testimony. To justify you in finding a verdict of guilty against the defendants, or either of them, the proof must satisfy your minds of the truth of the charges in the indictment; if it does, so that your minds can rest easy upon the conclusion of the truth of charge, you will so find in your verdict. But should it fail to produce such conviction, you will return your verdict of not guilty. If you shall find that one of them is guilty, and the proof not satisfy you of the guilt of the other, you will return a verdict of guilty as to the former, and not guilty as to the latter; or, if you shall find the defendants guilty of the charge in one count of the indictment, and not guilty as to the others, or either of them, you will so find. All distillers are required to execute the bond as required by law, on the 1st day of May of each year, or thereafter before commencing operation, and to have an assessment made, and pay the special tax, and must also file the proper notice of the time of commencing, and perform all requirements of the law, to authorize commencing distillation in such distillery; and if they commence before such compliance, it creates the offence of carrying on an illicit distillery, and this is substantially the offence charged in the first and second counts; and if mash, wort, and wash were made by the defendants, or either of them, in said building, although it was constructed with all the appertainments prescribed, yet, if the bond had not been given, and the special tax not paid, it was not a legally authorized distillery, and the offence charged in the third count was committed. If the proof satisfies you that the defendants, or either of them, were in any way connected with said distillery, as owners, partners, or employees, in operating said distillery after the 1st of May, 1870, it is incumbent on them to show by proof that the requirements of the law had been fulfilled to authorize such distillation; it was incumbent on them to ascertain whether or not the requirements of the law had been fulfilled to authorize the operation of the distillery; and their ignorance as to whether the bond had been given and tax paid will be no excuse. The presence of the defendants, if you are satisfied from the proof that they were present when the distillery was in operation, is a circumstance to show their connection with it, but, if nothing more is shown, will not be sufficient evidence to justify a conviction; but this circumstance must be taken and weighed with all the other evidence in the cause. If the evidence shows that one of the defendants is guilty of the charge, but does not show which, then you must acquit both. Confessions of a party accused of crime are said in law-books to be the most uncertain kind of evidence; but to constitute confessions a crime must have been charged when the confession is made, which, it is presumed, would alarm and affect the party charged. When admissions are freely and voluntarily made, and in advance of any charge of crime, such admissions are to be considered as any other evidence.

With the punishment annexed to a violation of the law you have nothing to do, nor with any real or apparent hardship, your duty being to determine from all the proof, and nothing else, whether the charges made in the indictment are true or not.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the United States.

UNITED STATES v. DODGE.

[1 Deady, 124.] [1]

District Court, D. Oregon. July 15, 1865.[2]

CUSTOMS DUTIES—LIABILITY OF CONSIGNEE—WHEN DUTIES ACCRUE—BONDED WAREHOUSES.

1. The importer or consignee of imported goods, is personally liable for the duties charged thereon.

2. An importation is complete when the goods arrive at the proper port of entry, and the duties accrue at that time, and not at the time of the subsequent entry at the custom house.

3. In 1864 there were no public stores or bonded warehouses in the district of Oregon, and therefore goods imported into such district, before June 30 of that year, could not come within the description or operation of section 19 of the act of that date (13 Stat. 216).

This action was commenced June 23, 1865, to recover a balance of $738.68, alleged to be due from the defendant [Alexander Dodge] to the plaintiff, for duties on a cargo of salt imported from the Sandwich Islands to Portland, in the district of Oregon, in the month of June, 1864. The case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. From the findings it appears: That on June 12, 1864, the bark Cambridge arrived at the port of Astoria, in this district, from the Sandwich Islands, with a cargo of 401,364 pounds of salt in bulk, consigned to order; that prior to June 30, the defendant purchased said salt, and became the owner and consignee thereof, and as such made a verbal entry of the same for consumption, which entry was to be made in writing, as soon as the salt was discharged from the vessel, and the exact quantity ascertained; that in pursuance of said purchase and verbal entry, and prior to June 30, said salt was, by permission of the proper officer, discharged from said vessel, and received by the defendant in his premises; and that, afterwards, on July 23, the entry of the salt was made and verified in writing by the defendant, and the duties thereon computed at the rate of twenty-seven cents a hundred pounds, amounting in the aggregate, to $1,083.68, of which sum the defendant shortly afterwards paid to the collector, $300, but thereafter refused to pay the remainder of $783.68.

Joseph N. Dolph, for plaintiff.

Lansing Stout and Charles Larabee, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. There is no doubt but that the defendant is personally liable for whatever duties are legally due upon the salt. When he purchased a cargo consigned to order, he became the consignee thereof. In Meredeth v. U. S., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 493, the supreme court held that both the importer and consignee were personally liable for duties on imported goods. Upon the argument no serious question was made as to the facts of this case, but admitting them to be as found by the court, the defendant makes two objections to the plaintiff's right to recover more than the sum of $422.45, which he admits to be due.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Matthew P. Deady, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by the circuit court. Case unreported.]

First: That under the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 213), salt was only liable to pay a duty of eighteen cents a hundred pounds, and that this cargo came within that act by virtue of section 19 thereof (13 Stat. 216), which provides: "That all goods, wares and merchandise which may be in the public stores or bonded warehouses on the day and year this act shall take effect shall be subjected to no other duty upon the entry thereof for consumption, than if the same were imported respectively after that day." In support of this conclusion counsel attempt to maintain that the salt after its discharge from the Cambridge and prior to July 23, was in a "public store," and not yet entered for consumption. The material fact assumed in this proposition is not true. There are not now nor never were any public stores or bonded warehouses for the storing of imported goods established in Portland. The salt was delivered from the vessel on to the private premises of the defendant. At the time it is apparent that he had no thought of such a thing as the salt being entered in bond or deposited in a public store or warehouse. The duties being more than the defendant was prepared to pay at once, the collector, as a favor, trusted the defendant until he could dispose of some portion of the salt. Upon this arrangement he paid the $300, but hearing soon after of this provision in the act of June 30, 1864, he appears to have conceived the idea of claiming that this importation came within section 19 of said act, because the salt was in fact stored in a warehouse (his own) when the act took effect, and because the formal entry for consumption was not made until after that date. If there had been a bonded warehouse in Portland, as there should have been, it is more than likely that this salt would have been entered in bond, and thus brought within the operation of said section 19, and thereby been admitted to consumption at one third less duties than it was. For this reason, it may be said that the defendant was within the equity of the statute, and if he had promptly paid the duties according to the collector's assessment and his agreement, and then appealed to the secretary of the treasury in the mode prescribed by law, the difference might have been remitted to him. But as it was, the defendant not only refused to perform his agreement with the collector, but seemed disposed to avoid the payment of even the $422.45 which he now admits was due from him in any event.

Second: That the importation was not complete until the formal written entry of the goods for consumption on July 23, and that therefore the duties thereon are to be computed under the act then in force. But the reason of the thing and the whole current of authorities are otherwise. Duties accrue when the vessel containing the goods arrives at the proper port of entry. This is the moment when the importation is complete, and not the subsequent entry at the custom house. This is the long and well established rule even in cases like this, where a new act has been passed increasing or diminishing duties upon goods imported after a specified period. Meredeth v. U. S., cited above; U. S. v. Bowell, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 372; Arnold v. U. S., 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 120; U. S. v. Lindsey [Case No. 15,603]; Prince v. U. S. [Id. 11,425]. Judgment that the plaintiff recover of the defendant, $783.68, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per centum per annum, from July 23, 1864, amounting to $76.19, together with its costs and disbursements of this action, taxed at $70.72.

[Affirmed on error in the circuit court September 13, 1866 (Field, Circuit Justice). Case unreported.]

Case No. 14,974.

UNITED STATES v. DODGE.

[1 Deady, 186.] [1]

District Court, D. Oregon. Nov. 7, 1866.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALE WITHOUT LICENSE—PROCEEDS OF SALE—PROOFS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

1. A sale of spirituous liquors, without a license therefor first obtained, is a violation of section 73 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 249), although the party making such sale intended at the time to give the proceeds thereof to the sanitary commission or other charitable use.

[Cited in State v. Dunbar, 13 Or. 591, 11 Pac. 300.]

2. Reputation is competent proof of the name of a person, place or house; and, therefore, upon the trial of an indictment against one Dodge for selling liquor without license, the government was allowed to prove that the house where the witness bought the liquor was called Dodge's, and that the name of the man who kept it was called Dodge.

3. Power and duty of a jury in judging of the credibility of witnesses, and the value or effect of evidence.

This was an indictment [against Solomon Dodge] found under section 73 of the Act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 249), commonly called the "Internal Revenue Act." It charged the defendant with selling liquor at retail without a license therefor, between July 12 and September 15, 1845, at Yaquinna Bay, in the district of Oregon. The plea was "Not guilty." On the trial, it was admitted that between the dates aforesaid, or since, the defendant was not licensed to retail liquor. From the evidence it appeared that he was the proprietor and occupant of a house in the village of Oysterville, on the waters of Yaquinna Bay, where he was in the habit of entertaining travelers with board and lodging; that he kept spirituous liquors in his house and furnished them to his guests and others, by the drink or bottle, without any direct charge therefor, but that such guests and others at the suggestion of the defendant, deposited the value of such liquor in money in a box kept on the mantelpiece with a hole cut in the lid of it, and called by the defendant "the sanitary box." There was no evidence tending to show that the moneys so deposited were ever in fact applied by the defendant to any use other than his own.

Joseph N. Dolph, for plaintiff.
William M. Strong, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge (charging jury). The internal revenue act of June 30, 1864, provides: Section 71: "That no person, firm, company or corporation, shall be engaged in, prosecute or carry on any trade, business or profession hereinafter mentioned or described, until he or they shall have obtained a license therefor in the manner hereinafter provided." Section 72 prescribes the mode of obtaining such license, and devolves upon the person requiring it the duty of applying therefor, and furnishing the proper officer the necessary information to enable him to issue the same, and also to pay the tax thereon. Section 73: "That if any person or persons shall exercise or carry on any trade, business, or profession, or do any act hereinafter mentioned, for the exercising, carrying on, or doing of which trade, business or profession, a license is required by this act, without taking out such license, as in that behalf required, he, she, or they shall, for every such offence, besides being liable for the payment of the tax, be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or both." Section 73 defines the crime with which the defendant is accused, and prescribes the punishment therefor. It consists in the exercising or carrying on the business of a retail liquor dealer. Section 79 of the act (subdivision 5) defines the business of a retail liquor dealer, as follows: "Every person who shall sell, or offer for sale foreign or domestic spirits * * * in quantities of three gallons or less, * * * shall be regarded as a retail dealer in liquors under this act."

If the evidence satisfies you that the defendant, between the dates charged in the indictment, was engaged in the business of retailing liquor, within the terms of this definition, you should find him guilty, otherwise not. Proof of a single act of selling or offering for sale, is sufficient to constitute the crime, and warrant a conviction. The object of section 73, is to punish persons who do or attempt to defraud the revenue of the United States in this particular, and unless it is honestly and impartially enforced by courts and juries, the government is cheated, and gross injustice is done to all honest people, who pay their taxes fairly and promptly. Proof that the defendant was engaged in the business of a retail liquor dealer, may arise from circumstances, other than a particular instance, of selling or offering to sell. A person is engaged in a business within the meaning of the act, when he has the means to do so at his command, and holds himself out to the world, or the public in that capacity, or is ready or offers to do a particular act, constituting such business. If he should not succeed in securing custom or making sales, this fact is not an excuse for having engaged in the business without a license. The license must be first obtained, and then, and not before, the party is at liberty to sell or offer for sale, liquor in less quantities than three gallons. The liquor may be offered for sale without a special or personal solicitation of any particular person to become a purchaser. It may be done by general advertisements in the press, or by the exhibition of signs or symbols in the vicinity of the place of the alleged business, or by having the article on sale, with intent to dispose of it to any one offering to purchase.

Counsel for the defendant ask the court to instruct you, as a matter of law, that if the money recovered by the defendant for liquor, was honestly intended by him for the use of the sanitary commission, he cannot be convicted. I hardly suppose counsel is in earnest in making this proposition. But be that as it may, I decline to give the instruction. The delivery or furnishing of liquor by the defendant to any one with the intent on his part to obtain and receive a compensation therefor, directly or indirectly, constitutes a violation of section 73 of the act; and any ulterior purpose, whether real or pretended, to bestow the money or compensation so obtained upon any person or object of charity, or otherwise, does not affect the character of the transaction or purge the defendant of the guilt incurred by such unlicensed traffic. As well argue that it is justifiable to cheat or steal generally for the benefit of the sanitary commission. The old maxim applies—"Be just before you are generous." However, upon the facts known to the court, this "sanitary-box" appears to be a mere dishonest device to avoid the payment of the tax, and not a very ingenious one. It is a matter of history that the Confederate army under Lee surrendered to Grant on April 9, 1865. Practically, the Civil War then terminated, and with it the collections for the sanitary commission. Such being the case, judge you if it is not absurd now to claim that the defendant was retailing liquor at the remote and insignificant village of Oysterville, on the coast of Oregon, without a license, in the month of September, 1865, for the benefit of the sick and wounded of the army of the Republic. Besides, before the defendant is excused upon this ground, in common honesty, he ought to show that he has paid over the money made or received to the commission. Nothing of the kind has been attempted, and you are therefore warranted in concluding that this defence is untrue in fact as well as insufficient in law.

A witness has been allowed to testify before you that the house in Oysterville, where he obtained liquor, was on one occasion "called Dodge's." Counsel for the defendant objected to the introduction of this evidence on the ground that it was hearsay. Not satisfied with the ruling of the court, counsel appeals to you in somewhat extravagant terms, to disregard it as incompetent. I suppose you are aware, if counsel is not, that it is the province of the court to decide what evidence is competent and relevant, and not that of the jury. In the heat of argument and from a desire of victory, counsel sometimes make extravagant assertions before juries, for which they are hardly accountable, and to which you should give no heed.

The testimony of the witness has been allowed by the court to be offered to you as competent, and it is your duty so to receive and consider it as such. The house "was called Dodge's," and the man who dealt out the liquor "was called Dodge"—in other words, the house, and the man who kept it, had the reputation in that vicinity of being named Dodge. Reputation or hearsay is competent proof of the name of a person, place or house. But the effect or value of this evidence upon the point in controversy —whether the witness got his liquor from the defendant or at a place under his control—is for you to determine. And so it is with all the evidence in the case. The degree of credit to be given to the testimony of the witnesses, and the inferences, if any, to be made from the facts proven, are matters within your province to determine. Yet your power in this respect is not arbitrary, but must be exercised with legal discretion and in subordination to the rules of evidence. Your oath to decide according to the law and evidence given you in court, obliges you to do this. And it is the duty of the court to make such suggestions to you in this respect as it conceives proper under the circumstances of the case.

It is not contended that any of the witnesses have deliberately stated what is untrue. The presumption of law is that a witness testifies truly, and you are to act upon this presumption until it is overcome by the evidence or circumstances of the case. The witnesses, so far as appears, are persons without any grudge against the defendant, and having no special or personal interest in his conviction. From the fact that it appears they obtained liquor at his house for their own convenience, they may be reluctant to testify against the defendant, and thus be the means of his being punished for that act. Such feelings are natural, and have their foundation in a generous sentiment, but you should bear in mind that they may lead a witness to, unconsciously or otherwise, state the facts concerning which he is interrogated as favorably for the defendant as he can, without telling a deliberate falsehood. As in this case, a witness upon his examination in chief, may state a fact against the defendant positively, and upon cross-examination, at the suggestion of counsel for defence be very ready to cast doubt upon such statement, by admitting the possibility of his being mistaken in regard to some important circumstances connected therewith. Considering the relation which the witnesses called by the government appear to sustain to the defendant, it is fair to infer that their testimony is as favorable to him as their consciences would permit. Subject to these suggestions and your oaths, you are to judge of the credibility of the witnesses and the value of their evidence, and find accordingly.

The law presumes that the defendant is innocent of the crime charged against him. The burden of proof is upon the government to overcome that presumption, and prove the charge as laid in the indictment beyond a reasonable doubt. A reasonable doubt is not a mere caprice, whim or possibility, but a doubt arising from the circumstances of the case, and founded upon a substantial reason. It is not required that the proof should amount to absolute certainty. Moral certainty is sufficient to authorize a verdict of guilty, and you are not to acquit the defendant because by some possibility or other he may not be guilty. If, upon a careful consideration of all the circumstances of the case, you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty as charged in the indictment, you should say so by your verdict, otherwise not.

The jury found the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment. Judgment that the defendant pay a fine of $50, and the costs of the action, taxed at $76.26, and that in default thereof he be committed to the county jail at Multnomah county until the same was discharged, at the rate of one day for every $2 of such fine and costs.

District Court, W. D. Texas. Oct. 3, 1877.

CIVIL RIGHTS — RAILWAY PASSENGERS — MASTER AND SERVANT.

[1. A railway employé who denies to a female passenger having a first-class ticket a right to ride in the only car in the train appropriated for the accommodation of ladies alone, solely because she is a person of African descent, is guilty, under the civil rights law of March 1, 1875 (18 Stat. 335), whether he acts under the instructions of his employer or not. If he acts under the instructions of superior officers of the railway company, they also are guilty under the law.]

[2. If there are two cars, equally fit and appropriate, in all respects, for the use of white female passengers as well as colored female passengers, then there is no offence, under the law in denying a colored female passenger entrance to one, and requiring her to ride in the other.]

DUVAL, District Judge (charging jury). The information filed in this case charges that W. E. Dodge, as president, W. R. Baker, as vice president, and J. Durand, as superintendent, of the Houston & Texas Central Railway Company, together with John Burdisch, an employé of said company, being in control and managing the cars of said road, did on the 26th of April, 1876, with an unlawful common intent and purpose, deny to one Milly Anderson admission into a car intended and provided for the transportation of female passengers, for the sole reason that she was a person of African descent, contrary to the act of congress of March 1, 1875, entitled, "An act to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights." The act in question, so far as it bears upon the present case, provides "that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities and privileges of public conveyances on land or water," etc., "subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude." The act then goes on to denounce a penalty upon any person who shall violate this provision. Although the passage of this act, including the provision just read, was no doubt suggested by the condition of the late slave race of the Southern states, who had afterwards been made citizens of the United States, yet it is not confined in its operations to them alone. It extends to the white race, also, and embraces every person who is a citizen of the United States. One of the most valuable rights which every citizen of the United States enjoys is the right of passing from one place in the Union to the other, either for purposes of business or pleasure. To enable him to enjoy this liberty of locomotion, the incidental right exists, both by common and statute law, that he or she shall be conveyed on and over the great public lines of transportation which traverse the country by land or water. These lines of transportation, whether they consist of railroads, steamboats, or stages, are known to the law as common carriers. They owe to the public at large a general duty, independent of any contract in the particular case. The law imposes upon them the duty of transporting every citizen who pays the fare demanded to some designated point, and of giving him or her full and equal accommodation, convenience, and comfort, as is accorded to other passengers, male and female, who pay a like fare. This right of the citizen, and this duty of the common carrier, is recognized and exists by the common law of the land, and it is only to protect this right, and enforce this duty, that congress passed the provision of law which I read to you. Persons who refuse to conform to reasonable regulations on the part of the carrier, or who, for good reason, are not fit associates for other passengers, as, for instance, those who are drunk, disorderly, indecent, or offensive in their conduct, or who have contagious diseases, and the like, may properly be refused passage. But, with these and perhaps other like exceptions, every citizen of the United States, male or female, native born or naturalized, white or black, who pays to the carrier the fare demanded for the best accommodations, is entitled to the best provided for the different sexes; and no discrimination, as against the one, in favor of the other, can be legally made, provided they are decent in person and inoffensive in conduct. Mere race or color will not justify any such discrimination. The officers or employés of an incorporated railroad company are presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to do their duty,—to act according to the instructions given them by their principal. But where an officer or employé of such company denies to a citizen of the United States admission into and passage upon a railroad car, to which such citizen is legally entitled (there being room for him or her to sit therein), then such officer or employé would be liable to a prosecution like the present, whether he acted under the instructions of his principal or not.

If the jury believe, from all the evidence in this case, that Milly Anderson, on the occasion referred to in the information, had purchased a first-class ticket, entitling her to a seat in a car of the Houston & Texas Central Railway Company, destined and appropriated for the accommodation of ladies alone, and there was but one such car, and, on presenting such ticket to the defendant Burdisch, she was by him denied admittance therein, solely because she was a person of African descent, then he would be guilty under the law, whether he acted under the instructions of his principal or not; and, furthermore, if the jury believe from the evidence that Burdisch, under such circumstances, acted under the authority and instructions of the other defendants, Dodge, Baker, and Durand, then the said defendants would be guilty; otherwise, they would not. But if the jury believe from the evidence that there were two cars on this occasion, and that they were equally used and appropriated for the carriage of ladies and gentlemen who had first-class tickets, without distinction of race or color, and that they afforded the same advantages, comforts, conveniences, and enjoyments; and if they further believe that under such circumstances the defendant Burdisch, while denying Milly Anderson entrance into one, gave her passage in the other, then he would not be liable to this prosecution, and the jury should return a verdict of not guilty, generally, as to the defendants. But in such case the jury should be fully satisfied from the evidence that the car in which passage was offered was in fact, in all respects, equal to the other, and was as fit and appropriate at that time for white female citizens as for colored female citizens. If there exists on the part of the jury, or any of them, any prejudice for or against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, or for or against colored citizens, I beg that it will be discarded on this occasion, and that under the law as I have given it, and the evidence before them, this jury will determine the guilt or innocence of the defendants just as they would if the denial of rights charged in the information had been in reference to a white female citizen, instead of a colored one.

Case No. 14,977.

UNITED STATES v. DOEBLER.

[Baldw. 519.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1832.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—CONTENTS OF LETTER—NOTICE TO PRODUCE—COUNTERFEITING—SCIENTER—PASSING OTHER COUNTERFEITS.

1. On an indictment for forging and delivering bank notes, after proof of the fact of forging a large quantity, and the delivery of one note; parol evidence of the contents of a letter to an accomplice from the defendant on the subject of counterfeit notes, for which the accomplice could not account and had not searched, but believed he has lost, is admissible. If the letter to which it is an answer is in the hands of the defendant, it need not be produced or notice given to the defendant to produce it, before evidence is given of the contents of the answer.

[Cited in Morehead v. U. S., Case No. 9,792.]

[Cited in American Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Rosenagle, 77 Pa. St. 514; De Baril v. Pardo (Pa. Sup.) 8 Atl. 878.]

2. The law presumes that an accomplice would destroy a letter which would implicate him, and no search is necessary in order to admit secondary evidence.

3. In forgery no notice is necessary to produce a paper in the hands of the defendant, an accomplice, or a third person who secretes it to protect the defendant, or that evidence of its contents will be offered at the trial, though such paper is not the subject of the indictment.

4. If the original would be evidence of the scienter, as to the note laid in the indictment, the law presumes notice that all competent evidence relating to it will be offered.

5. After evidence that a note of the description laid in the indictment had been forged and passed, evidence may be given of delivering or passing other counterfeited notes on the same bank before or after the passing the one in question.

6. The time which elapses between the two acts is not material as a matter of law, but of fact for the jury to draw the inference of the scienter, the presumption being weaker from the length of time.

The indictment in this case contained three counts: (1) For forging, procuring to be forged and assisting to be forged, a note in imitation of a note of the Bank of the United States, for 20 dollars, signed by N. Biddle, president, and W. M'Illvaine, cashier; the payee, the date, and place of date is unknown, which was in the possession of the defendant, and is now in the possession of some person unknown to the jury. (2) For the same offence, omitting the names of the president and cashier, which note remains in the possession of the defendant. (3) For delivering a forged note as described in the first count, knowing it to be forged, which note is in the possession of some person unknown.

The following questions of evidence arose at the trial: On the trial it was testified by one Rallston, an accomplice, that the defendant had in his possession at the Lancaster races, two bundles of counterfeit United States 20 dollar notes, which he said he had filled up, one of which he delivered to witness to pass, saying it was counterfeit; afterwards he told witness to write to him when he wanted any more. He accordingly wrote several letters requesting the defendant to send him some of the same notes, to which he received answers; he sent one of the letters by one Shive, who brought him back a letter, which he opened and read; being asked for the letter, he said he had it not, had no place where he kept letters or papers, did not know where to look for it, or what had become of it, but believed it had been lost. Shive proved the receipt of a letter from Rallston directed to the defendant, that he delivered it to him and received an answer, which he delivered to Rallston, who read it in his presence. Mr. Gilpin then offered to prove the contents of the letter, which was opposed by Mr. Brashears and D. P. Brown, for the defendant, on the ground that the letter was not produced, no search made for it, no notice given that secondary evidence of its contents would be offered, or to produce the letter to which it was an answer. After argument on both sides, the court took time to consider the question. One Empich was then examined, who proved that at the Lancaster races, at the time testified by Rallston, the defendant delivered him a 20 dollar note, stating that it was not good, and requested the witness to play it off at a faro table, which he did not do, but after some time returned it to the defendant. Mr. Gilpin, after stating that this note was not the subject of any indictment, but that the evidence in relation to it was offered to prove the scienter as to the notes charged in the indictment, asked the witness to describe the 20 dollar note, as to the bank, &c. it was on, which was objected to, on the ground that this was matter collateral to the indictment, of which notice ought to have been given to the defendant, and that it was not evidence of the scienter, because the delivery of the note to Empich was subsequent to the delivery of the note which was the subject matter of the indictment, and the question was elaborately argued.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. In deciding on the admission of the secondary evidence of the contents of the letter, we must, in this stage of the cause, consider the defendant and Rallston as acting in concert in relation to the passing of counterfeit notes forged by defendant, together with Shive, who was the carrier of the letters which passed between them, and who was also concerned in passing the notes, and that the object of the letters was to procure from the defendant forged notes for the others to pass. The possession of such letters would be strong evidence against them or either of them; Rallston had no inducements to preserve them, but strong ones to destroy them as soon as received; the presumption is, that they were so destroyed to suppress evidence of his guilt, and he testifies that he has no knowledge of where the letter is, but believes it is lost, &c. The general rule is, that the best evidence shall be offered which the nature of the case admits, and is in the power of the party to produce, secondary evidence of the contents of papers, is not admissible when by reasonable diligence the original can be produced, but the degree of diligence depends on the nature of the transaction to which the paper relates, the importance of the paper, and the circumstances of the case. 1 Durn. & E. [1 Term R.] 201; [Riggs v. Tayloe] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 484; [Sebree v. Dorr] Id. 563; [Renner v. Bank of Columbia] Id. 596; [Sicard v. Davis] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 124; [U. S. v. Reyburn] Id. 366, 368; 4 Bing. 294; 13 E. C. L. 443. If the court are satisfied that the paper is not kept back by design, that there can be no inducement to withhold it and the paper is of such a nature that no doubt can arise as to its contents in its substantial parts, secondary evidence is admissible even without a search by the party who had once had it in possession (Sicard v. Davis, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 124), if the non production is accounted for, so that it appears not to be attainable by the party offering to prove its contents, or that a search would be useless (U. S. v. Reyburn, Id. 366, 368). There must be a well grounded suspicion that better evidence is in the power of the party than what he produces, or negligence in making the proper search, to exclude a copy or other evidence of the contents of papers; but it is difficult to lay down a precise rule applicable to all cases. Reasonable diligence necessarily depends on the features of each case as they are developed. In the present we can have no difficulty. It is not pretended that the letter was ever in the hands of any others than the accomplices of the defendant. If self-preservation would not induce them to destroy it, they certainly had no inducement to preserve it. From the object of the correspondence, there can be no difficulty in ascertaining the subject matter of the letter and its contents, sufficiently for all the purposes of justice. It is in proof that the letter to which it was an answer was put into the hands of defendant, related to counterfeit notes, and that the one in question related to the same subject, and was delivered to the witness by the defendant himself; under such circumstances, we are of opinion that no search was necessary, as every presumption is that the letter was destroyed, and the account given by Rallston consistent with his situation and the subject of the letter.

It is next contended that the letter to which it was an answer, ought to have been produced, and notice given to the defendant that evidence of the contents of the letter received from defendant would be offered, before the secondary evidence can be given. It is admitted that if the letter was the immediate subject of the indictment, no notice would be necessary, but it is contended that it is necessary in all other cases, according to the rule laid down by the supreme court of this state, in Com. v. Messinger, 1 Bin. 275. Neither the cases referred to by the court in that case, or those cited in the argument, support the distinction contended for, or establish the rule laid down by the chief justice; they establish the principle that other evidence may be given as to papers which a defendant will not produce on notice to himself (Attorney General v. Le Merchant, 2 Durn. & E. [2 Term R.] 201, note; Rex v. Watson [2 Term R. 199], M'Nall. Ev. 354), or to his attorney. Gates v. Winter, 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 306. Where it is in the hands of a third person, who will not produce it on a subpœna duces tecum (Rex v. Aickles, Leach, 294, 390), or has been secreted by a brother of the defendant and another person to screen him (Com. v. Snell, 3 Mass. 82), no notice is necessary. These were cases of forgery. In cases of treason by writing traitorous letters, copies from a book, which defendant said contained copies of his letters to his respondents, were received without notice, or the production of the original. Francias' Case, 6 State Tr. 98. In Layer's Case, 9 State Tr. 319, a witness was permitted to state the contents of a traitorous paper, which defendant gave to witness to read, and which he read, without notice to produce the original. 6 State Tr. 263, 267, 318, 319. The secondary evidence was in all these cases admitted on the ground of the paper being in the possession of the defendant or third persons, which accounted for their non production, and showed that there has been no default in the prosecutor, where the paper had been secreted to protect the prisoner or is in his own possession. In such cases, the admission of the secondary evidence depends on tracing the original paper to the hands of the defendant, or third person, from whom it cannot be procured, and not on the question of notice. This is the rule laid down in Rex v. Layer, 9 State Tr. 319, and adopted in Le Merchant's Case, 2 Durn. & E. [2 Term R.] 203, note; in Snell's Case, 3 Mass. 82, and in U. S. v. Reyburn, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 366, 368. The evidence goes to the jury who will decide whether the paper has been so traced; it is a legal foundation for a verdict against the defendant, as if the original had been produced, and it is not restricted to papers which are the immediate subject of the indictment. Rex v. Gordon [1 Leach, 300, note] was an indictment for killing Mr. Thomas in a duel. Gordon had sent a challenge by his servant to Thomas, who sent his answer by his servant, who delivered it to the servant of Gordon, but it did not appear that Gordon had received it. An attested copy was admitted as legal evidence, and it was left to the jury to decide, whether the original ever reached the prisoner's hands. The acceptance of the challenge was not the offence charged in the indictment, it was only a link in the chain of evidence; the court deemed the delivery to the servant such prima facie evidence of a delivery to the master, as to leave it to the jury, without notice being given to the prisoner to produce it, or that a copy would be offered in evidence. So in U. S. v. Mitchell [Cases Nos. 15,788 and 15,789], which was an indictment for treason in levying war against the United States, the overt act was that the prisoner was in arms with a party at Couch's Fort, assisted in burning the inspector's house, and was active at the meeting at Braddock's Fields; but the indictment made no reference to the writing or circulation of any treasonable paper. The district attorney offered in evidence the copy of a circular letter, written by some of the leaders of the insurrection, calling for an assemblage of the people at Braddock's Fields, and to prove that the letter had been seen by the defendant, with whom it had been left to pass on to another person, and that the copy produced was in substance conformable to the original. This court held that if the copy offered, was a copy of one of those letters circulated at the time of the insurrection, it was admissible evidence, otherwise not. The same principle had been settled in Rex v. Hardy, on an indictment for treason. 1 East, P. C. 99.

The rule laid down in 1 Bin. 275, as to cases of larceny, and in 2 Serg. & R. 31, 496, in civil actions, is undoubtedly correct. The reason is obvious; in larceny the prosecutor is not allowed to give evidence of the stealing of any other articles than those laid in the indictment; the felonious intention in taking the articles in question, cannot be made out by proof of the prisoner taking similar articles at another time, or from another person, and no scienter is necessary to make out, or constitute the criminal offence. In trover and the other actions, the plaintiff must prove property in the specific thing claimed; the thing stolen, or the thing taken or detained, are therefore the only matters in relation to which any evidence can be received. But indictments for treason and forgery are not governed by the same rules, an overt act of treason must be laid and proved as laid, but as a traitorous intention is a necessary ingredient in the crime, that intent, as applicable to the particular overt act, may be made out by evidence of other treasonable acts than the one charged in the indictment, not to convict on such proof of other treasons, but to bring home the guilty intention to the overt act (6

State Tr. 318, 319; Fost. Crown Law, 11, 9, 10, 22, 245, 246; 2 Burr's Trial, 428); the overt act charged being the only act of treason which can produce conviction, and the only point in issue between the parties (4 Cranch [8 U. S.] Append. 493). The constitution and law of the United States require that the overt act should be established by two witnesses, not by the establishment of other facts, from which the jury might reason to this fact; after this fact is established, other facts may be admitted in the character of corroborative or confirmatory testimony. Id. 506, Append. s. p.; 1 East, P. C. 116. The same principle applies to forgery, and for the same reason; as the intention and knowledge with which the act is done, constitute the crime, it may be made out by evidence of other acts of a similar kind with that charged in the indictment. This being the well settled and well known rule in such cases, the prisoner cannot be taken by surprise; when such evidence is offered, he must come prepared to meet not only the evidence which applies directly to the specific act charged, but all other acts which, according to the known rules of evidence, a prosecutor may adduce to prove the act charged. If the note he is charged with forging, passing or delivering, is of the same kind or character with others which he has disposed of, or retains in his possession, he has notice in effect that if practicable to procure it evidence will be given of their counterfeit character, and of his having passed them as true. 1 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 94. It is notice in law, by which a party is as much bound both in civil and in criminal cases as by notice in fact. Notice in fact is notice in form, notice in law is notice in effect, and either are sufficient. Yeates, J., 2 Serg. & R. 34. With the notes in his pocket, he cannot complain that he is ignorant of their character; if he has put them off he knows to whom, and can trace them as easily as the prosecutor; if he has retained a part, he can the better compare them, and thus avoid the imposition to his charge of notes for which he is not accountable. Knowing that proof of all these facts, is as competent to the prosecutor as the one specifically charged, no injustice is done him; all the acts which can be brought against him are his own, or the acts of others acting by his consent, knowledge, or procurement, and no acts of mere third persons can be testified against him. He ought to answer for, and be prepared to meet them, on the same rules of evidence which apply to the principal act for which he is on trial. The indictment is notice of that, and we think it also notice of the other acts, which are as admissible in evidence as the one charged. The reason given by the chief justice in the Case of Massinger applies with great force to a case of larceny.

The defendant has no reason to believe, that the felonious taking of any other paper than the one laid in the indictment, would be brought into question; but the reason ceases in a trial for forgery, and the rule not only ceases with its reason, but a different rule arises from the most obvious reasons. The law, the knowledge of the defendant, and his counsel, all inform him, that the passing of other similar notes will be brought into question, and this is legal notice not only to this extent, but as to any letters or other papers in the hands of himself, his confederates or others, which would be legal evidence if the originals were produced. That this letter would be evidence on this indictment cannot be doubted, the only question about the admission of the secondary evidence of its contents is, whether the prosecutor has made out such a case as makes the evidence offered a substitute for the original.

The Cases of Aickles, Gordon, Snell, Mitchell and Reyburn [supra] are all of papers not in the possession of the prisoner; but it was held in all, that the paper being in the hands of third persons, by delivery by himself, his servant, or secreted by his friends to protect him; circulated among the parties to a treasonable insurrection, or delivered to an accomplice in a kindred crime, might be proved by secondary evidence, on the same principle as where it was in the possession of the party himself. We cannot distinguish the principle of this case from those; the letters written and notes passed or delivered to others by the defendant, are in the custody of some one by his consent, or destroyed, and their possession is so for his possession and custody, that the secondary evidence of their existence, character or contents, may be given under the same rules, which apply to papers in his actual custody or possession. This rule has been applied to cases, where the forged paper is set out specifically in the indictment, it would apply a fortiori, where it is set out generally, as in this case. If the paper is so described as to make it appear that it is the kind and description of paper embraced in the law, evidence may be given relative to any papers coming within that description, if the indictment lays them as destroyed by the prisoner, to be in his possession, or that they cannot be produced, and there has been no laches in the prosecutor. 8 Mass. 59, 110. Whether it is properly laid in this case is a question not now before us, but if it is, then this note, if identified, may be as much the subject of the indictment as the one delivered to Rallston, though it may not be a case in which the court will compel an election to be made, as to which note the prosecutor shall proceed against. Vide E. C. L. 934. Should it be considered as a note laid in the indictment, the objection to the evidence now offered would not apply; because if the witness answers that it was a note of the Bank of the United States, it would be evidence without any notice, as it was retraced back from Empick to the defendant, and corresponded with the one charged in the indictment, or it would be evidence to show the scienter; so that in any view the question is proper without any notice. In Rex v. Millard evidence was given of the passing of other forged notes than those laid in the indictment, though not produced at the trial, but having been traced to the prisoner, no evidence was given of any notice, nor any objection made for the want of it. Russ. & R. 245, 247.

The indictment, in all cases of forgery, is in itself notice that all competent evidence will be produced; the defendant cannot, therefore, be taken by surprise, when the passing of any other forged notes of a manufacture similar to the one laid in the indictment is offered; whether the mode of proof is by the production of letters, copies, or proof of their contents, or by the notes, is immaterial, so that the evidence conduces to prove the scienter as to the one charged.

It is objected that the evidence of passing other notes in this case is inadmissible, because it was after the delivery or passing the one laid in the indictment. It seems both were passed at the time of the Lancaster races, but it is not proved whether the one delivered to Rallston was previous to the one delivered to Empich, nor is it material if there was an interval, or how long, so that there is any fair ground for presuming the two acts of uttering, to have been so connected as to show a scienter in the one charged in the indictment (Russ. & R. 135, 147); nor whether the other notes are of the same manufacture (Car. Cr. Law, 195). The whole conduct of the prisoner is evidence of his knowledge of the forgery; the jury may judge from his conduct on one occasion, of his knowledge on another; where crimes intermix, the court must go through the whole detail; the more detached they are in point of time, the less relation they will bear to that stated in the indictment. But in such case the only question would be, whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant the inference of knowledge from such particular transaction; it would not make the inference inadmissible, "as if a man should come to Manchester with a bundle of forged notes, his whole demeanour would afford pregnant evidences of the mind and purpose with which he came." Rex v. Wylie, 1 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 94; s. p., 1 Camp. 400; 6 State Tr. 58.

For these reasons we are of opinion that evidence of the contents of the letter received by Rallston from the defendant, and of the description of the note delivered by him to Empich is admissible; it will be for the jury to judge of the knowledge of the note laid in the indictment to be a forgery, from the whole conduct and demeanour of the defendant, whether by acts or writing. Whether the other transactions justify them in drawing the inference, is for them to decide; the distance in point of time between the delivery of the note at the Lancaster races, and the writing the letter to Rallston from Lebanon, may weaken the presumption; but connected as they are by evidence, the jury may look to the whole conduct of the defendant in relation to the delivery or passing of counterfeit notes of a character and manufacture similar to those laid in the indictment.

The jury found the defendant not guilty.

Case No. 14,978.

UNITED STATES v. DOLAN.

[5 Blatchf. 284.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Dec., 1865.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—WHETHER INDICTABLE UNDER UNITED STATES STATUTE.

The circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of New York has, by virtue of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 115), jurisdiction of an indictment for an assault with intent to kill, committed in the navy yard at Brooklyn.

This was an indictment [against Philip Dolan] for an assault with intent to kill, committed in the navy yard at Brooklyn. The defendant now moved to quash the indictment, on the ground that the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 115), on which it was founded, did not create the offence charged, and that there was no statute of the United States creating the offence

THE COURT (BENEDICT, District Judge) held, that the act of March 3d, 1825, covered the case; that the question had been substantially decided by the supreme court, in the case of U. S. v. Paul, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 141, and that Mr. Justice Thompson, Mr. Justice Nelson, and Judge Betts, had held, in the United States courts for the Southern district of New York, that the act of 1825 applied to cases of the kind. Motion denied.

INTERNAL REVENUE—BANKS—SURPLUS EARNINGS.

1. The undistributed surplus earnings of savings banks, added during the year to their contingent funds, are subject to taxation under the 9th section of the act of congress of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 138].

2. That such a fund is held as an authorized security for depositors does not affect its liability to taxation under the act; that question depends upon the fact that it is the accumulation of surplus earnings, and not upon the purpose for which these earnings are withheld from periodical distribution.

[2] [Affirmed in 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 227.]

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The special verdict returned by the jury in this case finds that the defendant "is a banking institution, chartered by the laws of Pennsylvania, without stockholders or capital stock, and doing the business of receiving deposits to be loaned or invested for the sole benefit of its depositors;" and it presents the question, whether the undistributed earnings of such an institution, which were placed semi-annually to the credit of a fund to be retained under its charter for the security of its depositors, is subject to taxation.

The solution of this question is furnished by the 9th section of the act of congress of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 138), by which the 120th section of the act of June 30, 1864, is repealed, and it is enacted "that there shall be levied and collected a tax of five per centum on all dividends in scrip or money thereafter declared due, wherever and whenever the same shall be payable to stockholders, policy holders, or depositors or parties whatsoever, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, income or gains of any bank, trust company, savings institution, and of any fire, marine, life, inland insurance company, either stock or mutual, under whatever name or style known or called, in the United States or territories, whether specially incorporated or existing under general laws, and on all undistributed sums, or sums made or added during the year to their surplus or contingent funds."

It needs no argument to prove that the corporation defendant falls within the description of the institutions upon which a tax is imposed by this section. Although it is found to be a banking institution, yet it is perhaps more accurately described in the verdict by its functions as a savings institution, as its corporate name indicates. To whichever of these classes it may be assigned, it is clearly embraced in the category of taxable subjects. Upon such institutions a two-fold tax is imposed—First, upon dividends declared and payable to stockholders or depositors out of their earnings, and, second, upon their earnings in excess of the divided profits, whether held as an undistributed sum or added to their surplus or contingent funds. By a proviso to this sub-section, however, it is declared that "the annual or semiannual interest allowed or paid to the depositors in savings banks or savings institutions" shall not be considered as dividends. This leaves the undistributed sums made or added during the year to the contingent funds of these institutions liable to the tax, and, even if the meaning of the preceding part of the subsection was at all doubtful, clearly indicates the intention of congress to subject to taxation all the annual earnings of such institutions, except that portion of them which is allowed to depositors as interest on their deposits.

Having a contingent fund, made up of surplus undistributed earnings, the defendant, by the express terms of the act, is liable to the tax of five per cent. imposed by it upon the semi-annual increment of this fund. Nor does it affect the question, that this fund is held as an authorized security for depositors; the act makes its liability to taxation to depend upon the fact that it is the accumulation of surplus earnings, and not upon the purpose for which these earnings are withheld from periodical distribution. It is not denied that this is the effect of the part of the section above quoted, taken by itself; but it is contended that it must be considered in connection with another part of the section (14 Stat. 136), amending the 110th section of the act of 1866, and that by the proviso thereto the fund in question is exempted from the tax claimed. That proviso is as follows: "Provided, that this section shall not apply to associations which are taxed under and by virtue of the act 'to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof'; and the deposits in associations or companies known as provident institutions, savings banks, savings funds, or savings institutions, having no capital stock and doing no other business than receiving deposits to be loaned or invested for the sole benefit of the parties making such deposits, without profit or compensation to the association or company shall be exempt from tax on so much of their deposits as they have invested in securities of the United States, and on all deposits less than five hundred dollars made in the name of any one person; and the returns required to be made by such provident institutions and savings banks, after July, 1866, shall be made on the first Monday of January and July of each year, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue." In the body of this sub-section a monthly tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent., equal to one-half per cent. per annum is imposed upon the average amounts of deposits subject to draft, "with any person, bank, association, company or corporation engaged in the business of banking;" and it is plain that to this tax alone do the terms of the proviso apply; while by the general terms of the enactment all persons engaged in banking are subjected to this tax upon deposits, the proviso exempts from it so much of the deposits, with a special class of institutions, as may be invested in government securities, or as do not exceed five hundred dollars, in the name of any one person; no doubt on account of the beneficial character of such investment, and as a concession to depositors of limited means.

Now the tax in controversy is imposed upon earnings, and, in the case of savings institutions, only upon so much of them as may remain after deducting allowances to depositors as interest upon their deposits. Recognizing again the meritorious objects and operation of such institutions, the act establishes a provident adjustment of the tax, by which the stipulated gains of the depositors are not abridged. But because the same considerate liberality induced a partial exemption of deposits from taxation, it does not follow that the proviso which secures it, is to be extended beyond the subject to which it is appropriated, or the context which it expressly qualifies. By no latitude of implication can this be done, where both the subject and the rate of taxation to which it is sought to apply the proviso are different from those to which it expressly relates. In the one case the tax is imposed upon surplus earnings, and at the rate of five per cent.; in the other upon deposits, and at the rate of one-half of one per cent. Now the proviso exempts from the latter tax deposits with institutions named, which are invested in certain securities, and are of limited amount in the names of single individuals. It refers exclusively to this tax, and restricts its imposition as stated, and it has no necessary relation to any other tax imposed by the act. It cannot, therefore, by implication, be made more comprehensive than its terms import, or be extended beyond the scope, within which both its reason and its subject confine it.

But it is urged that, as "provident institutions,"—to which it is alleged the corporation defendant belongs—are named in the proviso and not in the sub-section imposing the tax upon earnings, they are excluded from the imposition of this tax. Whether a distinct class of institutions is thus described, or whether they are generally the same, as the others named in the proviso, is altogether immaterial. If they are not banks or savings institutions, their earnings are not taxable. But, as before mentioned, the defendant here is properly found to be a savings institution, and, as such expressly designated by the act, its surplus earnings are subject to taxation. The United States is, therefore, entitled to judgment for the amount of tax in arrear.

Upon this sum interest is claimed, but I do not think it is allowable. Although it does not appear in the verdict, it has been orally agreed by the counsel, that the defendant was not reprehensibly in default, but that its refusal to pay the tax claimed was induced by the inconsistent action and the conflicting opinions of the internal revenue department as to its liability, and its reasonable desire, therefore, to have this judicially determined. Under such circumstances interest ought not to be exacted. But besides this, a specific penalty is imposed for default in the payment of the tax, which is, therefore, the exclusive measure of accountability, beyond the amount of the tax itself. For this a separate action is pending, and the liability of the defendant must be limited to the amount of tax in arrear. It is, therefore, ordered that judgment be entered on the verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $5,356.

[On error this judgment was affirmed by the supreme court. 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 227.]

FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER—WHERE INQUEST TAKEN—GRAND JURORS.

In forcible entry and detainer, it is not necessary that it should appear upon certiorari, that the inquest was taken on the spot where the force was used; nor that the jurors should appear to be qualified according to the requisites of the common law.

[Cited in Holmead v. Smith, Case No. 6,630.]

Inquisition for forcible entry and detainer brought up by certiorari.

Mr. Morsell moved to quash the inquisition, because the inquest was not taken on the spot where the force is alleged to have been used, and because it did not appear that the jurors had the common-law qualifications of grand jurors; this being a proceeding at the common law.

F. S. Key, contra. The issue is joined below on the traverse of the force, and the proceedings were there arrested by the certiorari. The defendant cannot take advantage of any thing but what would avail him in arrest of judgment. The warrant to the marshal is, to summon sufficient and indifferent persons to inquire upon their oath, &c., and it does not appear on the proceedings that they were not sufficient.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to quash the inquisition on either of the grounds suggested.

CONSPIRACY — INDICTMENT — UNLAWFUL COMBINATION—ACT TO EFFECT OBJECT.

An indictment for a violation of the 30th section of the act of March 2d, 1867 (14 Stat. 484), which provides, "that, if two or more persons conspire either to commit any offence against the laws of the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of said parties to said conspiracy shall do any act to effect the object thereof, the parties to said conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," is sufficient, if it correctly charges an unlawful combination as actually made, and, in addition, describes any act by any one of the parties to the unlawful agreement, as an act intended to be relied upon to show the agreement in operation, although it does not appear, by the face of the indictment, in what manner the act described would tend to effect the object of the conspiracy.

[Cited in U. S. v. Graff, Case No. 15,244; U. S. v. Sanche, 7 Fed. 719.]

This was a motion to quash an indictment [against Simon Donau and Christopher Flood] found for a violation of the 30th section of the act of March 2d, 1867 (14 Stat. 484), which provides, "that, if two or more persons conspire either to commit any offence against the laws of the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of said parties to said conspiracy shall do any act to effect the object thereof. the parties to said conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars, and not more than ten thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not exceeding two years."

Ambrose H. Purdy, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Thomas Harland, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge, in denying the motion, said, in substance:

The 30th section of the act of March 2d, 1867, creates an offence which may be committed without any other action on the part of the accused, than that of conspiring with another to commit an offence against the laws of the United States, or to defraud the United States. The unlawful agreement is, therefore, the gist of the offence which this section intended to create. The requirement that some act to effect the object of the conspiracy be done by some one of the conspirators, is intended to afford a locus pœnitentiæ. Until some act be done by some one of the conspirators to effect the object of the unlawful agreement, all parties to the agreement may withdraw, and thus escape the effect of the statute. After such an act all are liable to the penalty. The act to effect the object of the conspiracy, which the statute calls for, is not designated as an overt act, and was not intended to be made an element proper of the offence. The offence is the conspiracy. Some act by some one of the conspirators is required, to show not the unlawful agreement, but that the unlawful agreement, while subsisting, became operative. The offence of conspiracy is committed when, to the intention to conspire, is added the actual agreement; and this intent to conspire, coupled with the act of conspiring, completes the offence intended to be created by the statute, notwithstanding the requirement that the prosecution show, by some act of some one of the conspirators, that the agreement went into actual operation.

If, then, an indictment correctly charges an unlawful combination and agreement as actually made, and, in addition, describes any act by any one of the parties to the unlawful agreement, as an act intended to be relied on to show the agreement in operation, it is sufficient, although, upon the face of the indictment, it does not appear in what manner the act described would tend to effect the object of the conspiracy. It is sufficient, if the act be so described as to apprise the defendant what act is intended to be given in evidence as tending to show that the unlawful agreement was put in operation, without its being made to appear to the court, upon the face of the indictment, that the act mentioned is necessarily calculated to effect the object of the unlawful combination charged. It is not the case of an attempt to commit crime. The crime is committed when the combination is made, and the act of one of the conspirators is not required by the statute to show the intent. That is inferred from the unlawful act of combining to defraud, or to commit an offence, but the object of requiring proof of some act in furtherance of the unlawful agreement is, to show that the unlawful combination became a living, active combination.

INTERNAL REVENUE—BREWERS—ENTRY IN BOOKS —"FERMENTED" AND "MALT" LIQUORS.

In the act of June 6, 1872 [17 Stat. 245], the terms "malt liquor" and "fermented liquor" are used synonymously, and the brewer is expressly required to enter all malt liquors in his book, whether sold to other brewers or to the public.

[Motion in arrest of judgment.]

LOWELL, District Judge. The defendant was indicted and convicted as a brewer for neglecting to make true entry and report of the malt liquors made by him, as required by section 19 of the act of June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. 245), the indictment being framed under section 19 of the same statute, or rather under the corresponding section in the Revised Statutes, section 3340, which is copied exactly from section 19, as is also the section corresponding with section 17 (section 3337). The objection taken is that the indictment speaks only of "malt liquors," while it is said that the statute imposed a tax only on beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors; that there may be malt liquors that are not included in this enumeration is said to be evident from section 27 (17 Stat. 249; Rev. St. § 3351), which provides that malt liquor or tun liquor in the first stages of fermentation, known as unfermented worts, may be sold by one brewer to another, and not be taxed until it has reached its last form. To this the attorney for the United States makes two answers: (1) That the statute in its various sections uses the phrases malt liquor and fermented liquor as synonymous. (2) That the brewer is expressly required to enter all malt liquor in his book, whether he sells it to other brewers or to the public.

I am inclined to agree with the prosecution on both these points. The first is understood to have been assented to by Judge Fox, who tried the cause and over-ruled a motion to quash the indictment.

Taking all the provisions of the statutes together, I think it sufficiently appears that there are no malt liquors known to the law which are not required to be entered on the brewer's books. A brewer is defined in section 3244 as a person who makes fermented liquors of any name or description, for sale, from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor, which clearly comprehends the maker of every possible kind of malt liquors. Then, in section 3336, it mentions beer, lager beer, ale, porter and other fermented liquors, without saying similar fermented liquors. In the next section, which requires the keeping of books, it says "such" fermented liquors," and afterwards, beer, lager beer, etc., "or other similar fermented liquors." The "such fermented liquors" can only refer to section 3336, which has mentioned all fermented liquors. But I do not give much importance to this. I think it may be fairly collected, as was argued; that the statute intends to include all malt liquors, though it probably does not include all fermented liquors, such as cider, for instance, and that this is the reason for the qualification which is usually annexed to the words fermented liquors.

I consider, too, that section 3351 does not say that tun liquor is known as malt liquor, but, on the contrary, that it is known as unfermented worts. If it is malt liquor, I think it should be entered on the books; but whether it is or not I do not know.

I conclude that if there be any malt liquor not required to be entered on the books, the statute does not acknowledge it, and that it would be a matter of defence, and not an objection to the indictment on its face. Motion in arrest denied.

OBSTRUCTING PROCESS OF UNITED STATES — RELEASING PRISONER ON HABEAS CORPUS.

[A judge of a state court who, in pursuance of a conspiracy and in bad faith, releases on habeas corpus, without any ground therefor, a prisoner committed on an examination by a United States commissioner, to answer an indictment if found against him, is, with those who conspire with him for such purpose, guilty of obstructing process of the United States.]

[This was an indictment against S. P. Doss and others for obstructing a United States officer in the discharge of his duty.]

James S. Botsford, Dist. Atty., and H. B. Johnson, for the United States.

Ewing & Smith and Mr. Philips, for defendants.

KREKEL, District Judge (charging jury). The first count of the indictment charges that Doss, McAfee, Snow and Wray, did knowingly and wilfully obstruct, resist, and oppose McConoughey, United States deputy marshal, in serving, and while attempting to serve and execute a warrant of commitment on Samuel Snow. The second count charges the same defendants with rescuing said Samuel Snow by force from said marshal, who held him under warrant of commitment. These charges are based upon an act of congress, which provides: "If any person shall knowingly or wilfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any officer of the United States in serving or attempting to serve or execute any measure, process or warrant, or any rule or order of any of the courts of the United States, or any other legal or judicial process whatever. * * * Every person so knowingly or wilfully offending in the premises, shall, on conviction, be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months, and fined not exceeding three hundred dollars." "Or if any person or persons shall by force set at liberty or rescue any person committed for, or convicted of, any offence against the United States, every person so offending shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, and imprisoned not exceeding one year."

It appears that one Samuel Snow was arrested on a warrant issued by United States Commissioner Birdseye, upon affidavit filed by one Morris, charging said Snow with having in his possession for the purpose of passing as genuine certain counterfeit obligations of the United States. Snow was brought before the commissioner on the 20th day of September, 1871, who continued the hearing of the case to the 30th of the same month. Upon an examination then had, said Snow was bound over for his appearance before the district court for the Western district of Missouri, to answer an indictment if found. Snow gave bail in the sum of one thousand dollars, with two of the present defendants, Wray and David Snow, the latter the father of Samuel Snow, as sureties. Afterwards, under an act of congress, which provides: "That any party charged with a criminal offence and admitted to bail, may in vacation be arrested by his bail and delivered to the marshal or his deputy before any judge or other officer having power to commit for such an offence, and, at the request of such bail, the judge or other officer shall recommit the party arrested to the custody of the United States marshal; and he shall hold him until discharged in due course of law." Samuel Snow was surrendered by his sureties to the commissioner, Birdseye, who delivered him to the deputy marshal, and failing to give bond was committed by the deputy marshal to the jail of Vernon county for safe keeping, until he could be removed to the county jail of St. Louis county. On the day of the surrendering of said Samuel Snow by his sureties, a writ of habeas corpus was sued out before the probate judge of Vernon county, the defendant McAfee, on petition of the said Samuel Snow, under the statute of Missouri, which provides that the applicant for the benefit of the writ shall state under oath in substance, by whom the party for whom relief is prayed is imprisoned or restrained of his liberty, and the place where, naming the parties, all the facts concerning the imprisonment or restraint, and the true cause thereof, and if the imprisonment is alleged to be illegal, in what the illegality consists. Samuel Snow, in his petition for the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, says that he was arrested by one McConoughey upon some process, or pretended process (charging him with an attempt to pass counterfeit money), issued by one Birdseye, and that he is now restrained of his liberty at the county of Vernon for no crime or criminal matter. The law required him to set out all the facts concerning the imprisonment and the true cause thereof. You will observe how carefully this petition, in spite of the provision of the statute quoted, seeks to withhold the facts, well known to the petitioner, that a United States commissioner, Birdseye, had acted in his case, and that he was in the custody of the United States deputy marshal, McConoughey. The evidence as to the time at which the affidavit annexed to the petition was sworn to, and also how he accounts for his failing to comply with another requirement of the statutes, that if he was restrained or confined by virtue of any warrant, order, or process, a copy thereof must accompany the petition, is before you. Had this part of the statute law been complied with, the judge who issued the writ of habeas corpus could at once have seen what kind of case he was dealing with, and he might well have refused the writ, under that clause of the Missouri statutes providing that if it appears that the party cannot be discharged or otherwise relieved, the writ shall be denied. All these plain provisions of the statutes were staring those engaged in obtaining the benefits of the writ for Samuel Snow in the face at the time of the application. When the return to the writ was made—so full and pointed—it should have arrested attention, especially as the jurisdictional question fully appeared. The return fully sets out all the facts and circumstances of the arrest, the examination, the holding to bail, the surrender of bail, and the recommitment, the cause of the restraint by a United States commissioner (a duly authorized judicial officer of the United States). It was presented by the law officer of the government.

I shall not stop to examine as to what has been said in the discussion of the adjudicated cases as to whether a United States marshal, holding a prisoner under due process of the United States—as Snow was held—is bound to produce the body of the person so detained or imprisoned, together with the time and cause of his imprisonment and detention, as required by the Missouri statutes and the writ, for whatever the law may be the good understanding that should ever exist between the state and national government and its judiciaries should govern rather than the law. The officers of the national government acted properly and in the true spirit of the law in producing the body of Samuel Snow, and the cause of his restraint and detention, thus putting the probate judge fully in possession of the case. When that was done, and the return not denied, for the paper filed the next day can scarcely be called a denial, the probate judge should have abstained from longer interfering with the case. His acts thereafter were illegal. The Missouri statute, in its 35th section of the habeas corpus act, provides, that if it appear that the prisoner is in custody by virtue of process from any court legally constituted, or issued by any officer in the course of judicial proceeding before him, such prisoner can only be discharged on one of the following cases: —First. Where the jurisdiction of such court or officer has been exceeded either as to matter, place, sum, or person. Second. Where, though the original imprisonment was lawful, yet by some act, omission, or event which has taken place afterwards, the party has become entitled to be discharged. Third. Where the process is defective in some matter of substance required by law, rendering such process void. Fourth. Where the process, though in proper form, has been issued in a case, or under circumstances not allowed by law. Fifth. Where the process, though in proper form, has been issued or executed by a person who is not authorized by law to issue or execute the same, or where the person having the custody of such prisoner under such process is not the person empowered by law to detain him. Sixth. Where the process is not authorized by any judgment, order or decree, nor by any provision of law.

It most manifestly appeared that the process of the United States commissioner was issued by an officer in the course of judicial proceedings before him. This has not in any manner been questioned. By the most liberal construction that can be given to the six classes of cases under which a prisoner may be discharged, not one can be found within which the case before Judge McAfee could be brought. These provisions plainly repudiate the discharge of the prisoner. Such a law as the one quoted, and the enforcement thereof, is an absolute necessity, for where would the interference stop if judicial officers, who had the right to issue the writ of habeas corpus, had nothing to guide them but their own discretion? Every jail in the land would be emptied if it was not for such or similar provisions of law, limiting and restraining the exercise of judicial discretion.

It is asked, is it supposable that a United States commissioner can take a citizen of a state, and he have no redress through its own legal tribunals? Under our system we are citizens of the general government first, and as such we owe paramount allegiance to it. It is a mistake to suppose that the national government operates on citizens of a state. It operates on its own citizens, and enforces its laws upon them as such. But this danger of oppression from the national government is more imaginary than real. Thus, for instance, there are not less than three judges who could have fully examined into and corrected any error which the United States commissioner might have committed. The judges of the Eastern and Western districts, in their capacity as circuit court judges, could have acted besides the circuit court judge proper. Missouri is most favorably situated in respect to the national judiciary. If the people of one district should from any cause distrust the judge of their own district, they need only apply to the other, who as circuit judge has jurisdiction over the whole state. Reference has been made to the concurrent jurisdiction in many cases exercised by the federal and state judiciary, and the case in which the present proceeding had its origin is one of that class. The debasing of the currency of the country is an evil which affects all alike, citizens of the state as well as of the United States. Is it strange that congress and state legislatures should be alike willing to provide a remedy? In applying such remedy no conflict can ever arise, for the well-known rule is, to leave jurisdiction to the tribunal first obtaining it. Had Samuel Snow in this case been arrested by state authority, no one would ever have thought of disturbing or interfering with the rightfully-acquired jurisdiction. To deduce from these concessions the right of the state judiciary to interfere with first and rightfully-obtained jurisdiction of the United States, would be the reversing of both the intent and legal rule.

Let us now return to the real question in issue: How far can a judicial officer of a state justify his interference in the judicial proceedings of the United States? As a matter of course, if Judge McAfee, in combination with others, misused his position and office by making use of the law and his power for the purpose of accomplishing an improper release of Samuel Snow, and you are fully satisfied of that fact, defendant McAfee, and those who acted with him, are guilty of having obstructed the process under the first count of the indictment. If, on the other hand, you should come to the conclusion that there was no combination between all of these defendants, but that there was such a combination between two or more of them, then you should find as many as entered into the combination (not less than two) guilty, under the first count of the indictment. If you shall find that no conspiracy or combination for the purpose stated existed among any of the defendants, you will next inquire, whether any, and if so, how many are guilty of having obstructed the process of the United States under the first count of the indictment, or by force rescued under the second count. In considering the acts of the probate judge you are instructed that the law is that if he acted bona fide, that is, in good faith, he is not answerable, and you should find him not guilty. He was bound to act on the application made to him for the writ of habeas corpus, and if he erred in granting the writ, or in the proceedings had before him under it, for that error he is not responsible in these proceedings. In a late decision as to the custody of a prisoner pending the hearing of a writ of habeas corpus, the supreme court of the United States, in Barth v. Clise [12 Wall. (79 U. S.) 400], held, that by the common law upon the return of a writ of habeas corpus, and the production of the body of the party suing it out, the authority under which the original commitment took place is superseded. After that time, and until the case is finally disposed of, the safe-keeping of the prisoner is entirely under the control and direction of the court to which the return is made; that the prisoner is detained not under the original commitment, but under the authority of the writ of habeas corpus; that pending hearing he may be bailed de die in diem, or be remanded to the jail whence he came, or be committed to any other suitable place of confinement under the control of the court.

It would seem that, under the entire control thus given to the court over the prisoner, the judge may direct any person to take charge of, and hold the prisoner until the case is finally disposed of. The person thus holding the prisoner must of necessity be able to justify for the simple act of holding under the order of the court, and if you shall find that Wray did nothing else than hold the prisoner under order of the court, for that act alone he should not be found guilty of obstructing the process of the United States. But this ruling of the supreme court of the United States also affects the acts of the other defendants. However much the allusion to wire-pulling by Doss, or that to force by Wight or the reference to the power behind the throne of the district attorney, may lead you to understand what was transpiring in that court at a time when men of cool, dispassionate judgment were sadly needed, yet the decision referred to relieves the judge, Doss and Wight of having obstructed process, for if the prisoner was in the custody of the court they could not be guilty of obstructing process of the United States. The case then comes back to the first proposition, was there a conspiracy or combination of two or more of these defendants to improperly release Samuel Snow from his imprisonment, thus obstructing the process of the United States. If you are satisfied there was, you will find so many as entered into such a conspiracy and combination guilty under the first count of the indictment.

This case will point out the caution with which those in authority should proceed. The steps taken could not possibly redound to the benefit of Samuel Snow, for the discharge obtained could not protect him against an examination into his offence before the grand jury. Instead of having him to deal with, if no interference had occurred, we are now engaged in examining into the case growing out of the interference. It seems incomprehensible why a jealousy should exist between the state and the national government, and especially between the judiciaries of the two. Identity of interests, affecting the individual in both capacities as a citizen of a state and the general government alike, when rightly understood, can leave no room for differences. The judiciary, solely interested in the faithful execution of the laws, should hesitate to interfere with each other, because of the conflict which must necessarily follow derogatory to both.

You, gentlemen of the jury, to whom this case is about to be submitted for final action, will enter upon the consideration thereof, I am sure, in that true spirit which recognises its obligations to both governments, and above all, to that spirit of justice and of right on which all government and laws securely rest.

The jury returned a verdict, finding McAfee (the judge who issued the writ) and Doss (the attorney of the prisoner suing out the writ) guilty, and Snow and Wray not guilty.

UNITED STATES ex rel. WEST et al. v. DOUGHTY.

[7 Blatchf. 424.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 28, 1870.

PARTIES — UNITED STATES — HOW APPEARANCE MADE—DISTRICT ATTORNEY—PATENTS.

1. Where a bill in equity stated that it was brought by the United States at the relation of certain persons, and did not state that the United States brought it by their district attorney, and was subscribed by certain other persons as solicitors for the plaintiffs, and the prayer of it was that certain letters patent of the United States issued to the defendant might be surrendered to be cancelled: Held, on demurrer to the bill, that it was bad, as not stating a case which entitled the United States to the relief sought.

[Cited in U. S. v. Draper, 19 D. C. 94.]

2. This court can, under the 35th section of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 92), recognize the United States as a plaintiff on the record, only when the record shows that the United States appear as plaintiffs by the district attorney.

[Cited in Attorney General v. Rumford Chemical Works, 32 Fed. 623.]

[This was a bill in equity by Joseph I. West and others against Samuel H. Doughty, praying the surrender of certain letters patent, No. 25,701, issued October 4, 1859, reissued December 27, 1859 (No. 870), and again August 1, 1870. A trial under the first issue of this patent will be found in Case No. 4,029, and under the second reissue in Case No. 4,028.]

Edwards Pierrepont and Frederick H. Betts, for plaintiffs.

Edwin W. Stoughton and Stephen D. Law, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a demurrer to the pleading filed by the plaintiffs in this suit before the commencement thereof. The pleading styles itself a "bill or information," but is substantially, in form, a bill in equity. It states, that it is brought at the relation of Joseph I. West and three other persons who are named. The prayer of the bill is, that the defendant may be decreed to deliver up and surrender certain reissued letters patent, issued to him by the United States, August 1st, 1865, for an "improvement in skeleton skirts," to be cancelled, and may be enjoined from suing for the infringement thereof, or interfering, by means thereof, with the people of the United States, in the business of making, using, or selling hoop skirts, in accordance with the specification of claim of said reissued letters patent. The ground of the bill is, that the letters patent were issued by the United States inadvertently, and by accident and mistake, and are, therefore, void. The demurrer, which styles the pleading to which it demurs an information, demurs to it for several reasons, one of which is, that it does not state a case entitling the plaintiffs to the relief sought.

The bill appears, on its face, not to be brought by the district attorney of the United States for this district. It is subscribed by certain other persons as solicitors for the plaintiffs. The bill does not state, in the body of it, that the United States bring it by the district attorney, but merely states that they bring it against the defendant, at the relation of the relators. The names of the plaintiffs' solicitors are not found in the body of the bill, but are appended at the end of it. This court can recognize the United States as a plaintiff on the record, only when the record shows that the United States appear as plaintiffs by the district attorney of this district. Upon this bill, if there are any plaintiffs, the United States are such plaintiffs. The relators are not plaintiffs. The bill must be maintained, and is sought to be maintained, if at all, solely on the right of the United States themselves, as plaintiffs, to bring it. Now, by the 35th section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 92), it is provided, that there shall be appointed, in each district, a person to act as attorney for the United States in such district, whose duty it shall be to prosecute, in such district, all civil actions in which the United States shall be concerned, except before the supreme court in the district in which that court shall be holden. Under this statute, it has always been held by the federal courts in this district, that there is no power conferred on them, by statute or usage, to recognize a suit, civil or criminal, as legally before them, in the name of the United States, unless it is instituted and prosecuted by a district attorney legally appointed and commissioned conformably to the statute. U. S. v. McAvoy [Case No. 15,654]. The fact that the suit is instituted on behalf of the United States by the person who is district attorney, and that he acts as such, in instituting the suit on behalf of the United States, must appear by the face of the bill or declaration, or the pleading will be held bad on demurrer, as not stating a case which entitles the United States to the relief sought. The only intendment that can be drawn from the face of the bill, in this case, is, that it is filed without the authority of the United States, inasmuch, as it does not, by its face, appear to be filed on behalf of the United States, by the officer by whom, alone, the United States can, under the statute, prosecute this suit.

For this reason, the bill must be dismissed, without reference to any of the other points taken by the defendant, on the argument of the demurrer.

Case No. 14,987.

UNITED STATES v. DOUGHTY et al.

[1 Quart. Law J. 69.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Nov. 30, 1855.

EVIDENCE — SEAMEN — INDICTMENT FOR REVOLT — SHIPPING ARTICLES — COPY — HANDWRITING.

1. On a charge of revolt against seamen, a copy of the shipping articles purporting to be signed by the prisoners cannot be given in evidence to show that the prisoners were part of the crew, without proof of loss or destruction of the original articles.

2. The original articles cannot be given in evidence unless the handwriting of the prisoner is proved.

This was an indictment under the act of congress, March, 1835, § 2 [4 Stat. 776], for an endeavor to commit a revolt on board of the American ship Arcole (R. A. Pitman, master), while lying in Hampton Roads. Plea not guilty.

John M. Gregory, for the United States.

Henry G. Cannon and James R. Crenshaw, for prisoners.

On the trial, the attorney for the United States offered in evidence a certified copy of the shipping articles, for the purpose of proving that the prisoners were the crew or part of the crew of the said ship.

But, on motion of the defendants, THE COURT held that a copy could not be read in evidence without first proving that the original was lost or destroyed.

The attorney then obtained from the custom house the original articles purporting to be signed by the prisoners. But the defendants moved the court to exclude the original articles unless the attorney for the United States could prove the signatures of the prisoners to have been made by themselves or by some persons authorized to sign for them, which motion THE COURT sustained.

The attorney then offered to prove that the prisoners were on board of the Arcole as her crew; but THE COURT held after argument that any contract different from that provided for and rendered necessary by the act of congress of July 20, 1840, c. 48, § 10 [5 Stat. 395], was void; and that act requiring a written or printed contract, and declaring any contract of a different character to be void, no parol contract or verbal agreement could be proven; and that unless the prisoners were part of the crew of the vessel, they could not be prosecuted for an endeavor to commit a revolt, and therefore the jury must find the prisoners not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. DOUGLASS et al.

[2 Blatchf. 207.] [2]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 2, 1851.

CRIMINAL LAW — JOINT INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—MURDER — CHALLENGE TO JURORS — HOW ALLOWED—QUALIFIED PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where, on a joint indictment against three for murder, one of them is tried separately, it is not competent for him to give in evidence a conversation between the other two, when they were alone, inculpating themselves and exculpating him from all participation in the crime.

2. The cases of Powell v. Harper, 5 Car. & P. 590, and of Doe v. Haddon, 3 Doug. 310, commented on and explained.

3. What is direct evidence, and what circumstantial evidence.

4. In a case of circumstantial evidence, the jury, in order to convict, must find the circumstances to be satisfactorily proved as facts, and must also find that those facts clearly and unequivocally imply the guilt of the accused, and cannot be reasonably reconciled with any hypothesis of his innocence.

5. Where a person is present, actually or constructively, at a murder, aiding and abetting it, that is sufficient, both at common law and under the statutes of the United States, to warrant his conviction under an indictment charging him with the murder, though containing no count charging him with only being present at the murder, aiding and abetting it.

6. The acts of congress of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 114, § 10), and of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 115, § 4), do not make the aiding and abetting an act of murder by personal presence and assistance, a separate and distinct offence.

7. A qualified peremptory challenge in a criminal case, that is, a right to set aside a juror without challenging him for principal cause or to the favor, and to have him finally excluded from the jury unless the panel is exhausted by the challenges of the prisoner, exists in favor of the government in the courts of the United States. Per Nelson, J.

8. This is the settled doctrine of the common law, and was recognized by the supreme court of the United States in U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480. Per Nelson, J.

9. The act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), applies only to the mode of selecting the jury, that is, by ballot, lot or otherwise, as prescribed by the state laws, and does not affect the questions involved in the right of challenging the jurors called, whether peremptorily or for cause. Those questions stand upon the common law, except where regulated by act of congress. Per Nelson, J.

[Cited in U. S. v. Devlin, Case No. 14,953; U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. 199.]

10. The act of July 20th, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), manifests a purpose to conform the regulations in regard to the designation and empanelling of jurors in the courts of the United States, so far as may be practicable, to the existing laws of the particular states. Per Betts, J.

[Cited in U. S. v. Devlin, Case No. 14,953.]

11. It is a well-settled principle, in the jurisprudence of the United States, that rules of state practice acted upon by the courts of the United States in a state, as obligatory upon them, have the efficacy of rules adopted by express order of those courts. Per Betts, J.

12. The right to a qualified peremptory challenge in a criminal case did not belong to the crown, at common law. It rested wholly upon a construction of the statute of 33 Edw. I. Per Betts, J.

13. The case of U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480, did not involve any question as to the right of the government with regard to challenges of jurors. Per Betts, J.

14. The laws of the state of New-York do not allow to the prosecution, in a criminal case, such qualified peremptory challenge, and the practice of the courts of the United States has always been, to conform in all respects, in trials by jury, as nearly as practicable, to the laws of the state in which they sit. Per Betts, J.

15. The attorney for the United States is bound to assign and substantiate his challenge when it is made, and before other jurors can be drawn. Per Betts, J.

This was a joint indictment against three persons for murder upon the high seas. The prisoners were tried at New-York, before Mr. Justice NELSON and Judge BETTS, in May, 1851, and found guilty. [Edward F.] Douglass was tried separately. James Clements and Thomas Benson were tried together. Before sentence, a motion for a new trial was made before both judges, upon their minutes of the trial and the charge of the presiding judge to the jury. The indictment, in every count, charged the murder of the deceased by each of the prisoners There was no count charging either of the prisoners with only being present at the murder, aiding and abetting it. The points urged as grounds for a new trial were these: 1st. That the court erred in allowing the district attorney to exercise a qualified peremptory challenge, by excluding individual jurors from the jury until the panel should be exhausted, without making any challenge to such jurors for principal cause or to the favor; 2d, that Douglass ought to have been allowed to prove a conversation between Benson and Clements when they were alone, inculpating themselves and exculpating Douglass from all participation in the crime; 3d, that the court erred in not charging the jury that the evidence was purely circumstantial; 4th, that the court erred in not charging the jury that the evidence must exclude, to a moral certainty, every hypothesis but that of guilt, before a conviction could be had, and that the court misdirected the jury, in instructing them that they could convict the prisoners if the circumstantial evidence was found to be more consistent with their guilt than with their innocence; 5th, that the court erred in charging the jury that mere presence, actual or constructive, at the murder, aiding and abetting it, was sufficient to warrant a conviction under the indictment.

Ogden Hoffman and William M. Evarts, for the United States.

Lorenzo B. Shepard and George F. Betts, for prisoners.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The motion for a new trial made in this case is denied. But it is proper to say, that the judges do not altogether agree in respect to the point made as to the right of the government to a qualified peremptory challenge—that is, the right to set aside a juror without cause, and to have him finally excluded from the jury unless the panel is exhausted by the challenges of the prisoner. If the jury-list is exhausted before the panel is completed, it is admitted that the juror thus set aside must be called and must serve, unless he is challenged by the government for cause. This qualified right of challenge without cause is the settled doctrine of the common law, and has been recognized by the supreme court of the United States in the case of U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480, and has been practised upon in some of the circuits. The doubt that is suggested in regard to it arises under the act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), which provides for the designation of jurors to serve in the federal courts, by ballot, lot or otherwise, according to the mode of selecting them in the states where such courts are held; and for this purpose, those courts are empowered to make rules and regulations for conforming the designation and empaneling of jurors to the laws and usages of the states as they may exist at the time. A rule to this effect has been adopted in this district. My Brother Betts thinks that the act of 1840 adopts, together with the mode of selecting and empaneling the jury, the law of the state regulating the right of challenge, which would exclude the qualified right of peremptory challenge that belongs to the government at common law. Such is the law of the state. But my own opinion is, that the act of 1840 applies only to the mode and manner of drawing or selecting the jury, that is, by ballot, lot or otherwise, as prescribed by the state laws, and does not affect the questions involved in the right of challenging the jurors called, whether peremptorily or for cause; and that those questions stand upon the common law, except where regulated by act of congress.

In the present case, the panel was completed before the jury-list was exhausted, and before the privilege of peremptory challenge belonging to the prisoners was exhausted. The question, therefore, in this particular case, is one of no substantial importance in the fair and proper administration of justice. Great liberality was extended by the court to both sides in forming the panel, with a view to the selection of an impartial and intelligent jury, and such was eminently the character of the one obtained.

BETTS, District Judge. The judges differ in opinion upon the first point urged as a ground for a new trial, and concur in regard to all the others.

Upon the second point, we think there was no foundation in law for admitting the evidence offered. The general principle laid down by text-writers is explicitly against it (Best, Ev. 96; 50 Law Lib., N. S., 79); and so is the reason of the thing. Mere assertions by one person, affecting the guilt or innocence of another, show no such privity with the latter as to become evidence for or against him. The case of Powell v. Harper, 5 Car. & P. 590, is too loose a statement to be entitled to reliance, if it intends to declare any such doctrine; and, in so far as it admits the naked declaration of a person not on trial, that he stole certain property, to be evidence against another that he received it knowing it to be stolen, it is against the well-established rules of law. Some feature in the case is undoubtedly dropped in the report of it. The case of Doe v. Haddon, 3 Doug. 310, cited for the prisoners, turned on a different point. The declarations offered in evidence were offered to vitiate an act done by the party making them and show it corrupt and void, that act being introduced as the ground of right by the lessor of the plaintiff.

The third point made rests upon a misconception of the character of the evidence. It was not wholly circumstantial. A very large and most important part of it was direct and positive. The murder of the deceased, the report of a musket, the cry of murder by the deceased, the presence of the prisoners on deck at the time, armed with muskets and other deadly weapons, and the violent interference of two of them to prevent the officers of the vessel from going to the rescue of the dying man, are facts directly proved. Such, also, was the fact of the muskets, coming clandestinely to the possession of the prisoners. The only fact important to their conviction of the murder, which depended upon presumptive proof, was, whether the three concurred in the felonious acts out of which the death of the deceased arose.

The fourth point is not supported by the terms of the charge. It was delivered in writing, and is, accordingly, easily compared with the doctrine contended for by the prisoners' counsel. We think that the clear and unmistakable import of it is, that the jury, in order to convict, must find the circumstances to be satisfactorily proved as facts, and must also find that those facts clearly and unequivocally imply the guilt of the prisoners and cannot be reasonably reconciled with any hypothesis of their innocence. This is the plain bearing of the instructions, and if, in particular sentences, expressions of a wider and looser bearing occur, yet, in others, the language is explicit and pointed to that effect, and the whole charge is reconcilable only upon the idea that the jury must find that the circumstances remove all reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoners.

We think that the fifth point cannot be maintained. At common law, every person present at a murder, willingly aiding or abetting its perpetration, is guilty of murder, and may be indicted and convicted as principal in the first degree. The acts of congress of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 114, § 10), and of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 115, § 4), in which aiders and abetters are named, do not make the aiding and abetting an act of murder by personal presence and assistance, a separate and distinct offence. The more probable interpretation of those terms is, that they apply to accessories before the fact. There is certainly no fair ground to infer that they were employed in the statutes to distinguish such aiders and abetters from the principal murderer. Whart. Cr. Law, 224. We therefore think the indictment is good in charging the prisoners with the murder by doing acts aiding and abetting its perpetration in their presence. U. S. v. McGill [Case No. 15,676]; U. S. v. Ross [Id. 16,196].

As the first point involves an inquiry into the practice of the court, of much weight and some difficulty, it is proper to set forth more at large the considerations which influence the minds of the judges in the opinions they adopt in respect to it. The presiding judge holds that, as the matter is not expressly regulated by act of congress, the courts of the United States must resort to the common law to ascertain what the rule is in regard to the right of the government to challenge jurors in capital cases. He construes the act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), as extending no further than the judiciary act of 1789, and regards its provisions as limited to the mode and manner of obtaining the general panel of jurors to serve in court, and as not governing the method of empanelling them in a specific case on trial. He also holds, that the common law practice of permitting the crown to have jurors set aside without challenging them, till the whole panel is exhausted by the challenges of the prisoner or the acceptance of jurors called, must be regarded as the rule in the courts of the United States. I maintain a different view. We concur in the opinion that, under the terms of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 88, § 29), the state law was made the rule of the courts of the United States only in respect to the mode of designating the jurors, and that, in other respects, the common law was followed. U. S. v. The Insurgents [Case No. 15,443]. But I think that the act of May 13, 1800 (2 Stat. 82), and the act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), are more extensive enactments, and manifest a plain purpose to conform the regulations in regard to jurors in the courts of the United States, so far as may be practicable to the existing laws of the particular states.

The 29th section of the judiciary act of 1789 required the jurors to be designated by lot or otherwise, according to the mode of forming juries in the states respectively, to which language the act of May 13, 1800, added the words, "therein now practised;" thus making the state practice of that day the rule governing the courts of the United States in designating jurors. The act of July 20, 1840, annexes to the addition made by the act of 1800, the words, "and hereafter to be practised therein," and more distinctly indicates the intention of congress to bring the whole system substantially within the regulations of the state laws, by declaring first, that the jurors shall have the like qualifications and be entitled to the like exemptions as state jurors "now have and are entitled to, and shall hereafter, from time to time, have and be entitled to;" and secondly, by adding, "and, for this purpose, the" "courts" of the United States "shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and empaneling of juries, in substance, to the laws and usages now in force" in the states. Though it is not claimed for this language that it, in express terms, conforms the entire regulations, both in obtaining jurors and in empaneling juries, to the laws and usages of the states, yet it is most significant to show, that the state laws and usages were looked to as the leading and main authority in both respects. And, moreover, it denotes the competency of the courts of the United States to regulate the subject by adopting express rules to that end. It is a well-settled principle, in the jurisprudence of the United States, that rules of state practice acted upon by the courts of the United States in a state as obligatory upon them, have the efficacy of rules adopted by express order of those courts. Fullerton v. Bank of U. S., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 604. Accordingly, the uninterrupted usages of the courts of the United States in this district, for over fifty years, to conduct criminal trials, especially in the organization of juries, conformably to the state laws, is high evidence of an explicit adoption of that practice.

Independently, however, of these considerations, I think that the right claimed by the attorney for the United States in this case was not maintainable upon any doctrine of the common law. There is no evidence that the crown ever possessed or claimed that right, except under the provisions of the act of 33 Edw. I. The prerogative right on the part of the king, prior to this act, was to challenge jurors peremptorily, without restriction of numbers, which in effect gave the crown the power of selecting juries in capital cases. Co. Litt. 156b; Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 43, § 2; Bac. Abr. "Juries," E, 10; Com. Dig. "Challenge," G, 1; Joy, Conf. 143, 24 Law Lib. (N. S.) 84; Chit. Cr. Law, 434; 2 Hale, P. C. 271. This was the evil which parliament intended to remedy by the act of 33 Edw. I. Co. Litt. 156b. Bacon gives the act at large (Abr. "Juries," E, 10); and these motives for its passage are assigned by Baron Gilbert. He also adds, that it is the established practice of the courts, in the construction of the act, that the king need not show any cause of his challenge till the whole panel be gone through. That this is a practice of the English courts, resting not on the common law, but wholly upon the construction of the statute, is still more definitely settled by the decisions of the king's bench in Rex v. Parry, 7 Car. & P. 836, and in Reg. v. Frost, 9 Car. & P. 129, 136, made upon the provisions of the act of 6 Geo. IV., re-enacting in substance the act of 33 Edw. I.

Mr. Justice Story, in U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480, would also seem, on a fair construction of his language, to place the right of the crown to this mode of challenge, upon the uniform practice which has prevailed in the English courts since the statute of 33 Edw. I.; but the reasoning of the learned judge, collateral to the point under consideration by the court, even if it amounts to a recognition of the English practice as a doctrine of the common law, cannot avail as a judgment of the court on the subject. The point raised upon the certificate of division of opinion, and determined by the supreme court, related solely to the right of two or more persons, jointly charged, in the same indictment, with a capital offence, to be tried severally, separate and apart—an inquiry apparently in no way involving the prerogative or authority of the government in respect to its challenges of jurors on such trial. And, even if the very accomplished jurist who drew up the opinion of the court had explicitly pronounced the privilege now claimed on the part of the United States to be a common law right, the declaration could not, in a different case, carry the authority of a judicial decision, though it would command all the consideration which the suggestions of a judge so acute, laborious and exact, upon questions of common law, always merit and receive.

The point in question was directly raised in the Pennsylvania circuit, before Judges Baldwin and Hopkinson, in 1830, in the case of U. S. v. Wilson [Case No. 16,730]. The district attorney challenged a juror peremptorily. His right to do so was denied by the counsel for the prisoner. The court observed, that they had known no case where the right now claimed had been allowed to the prosecution; that they would not be the first to do it in a capital case, unless it was clearly established; but that, on examining the opinion of the supreme court, in the case of U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480, they did not feel themselves at liberty to refuse the qualified right of challenge claimed by the United States.

It was upon reading these cases on the trial of the indictment against the prisoners, that this court permitted the exercise of a like challenge, and the presiding judge considers the law on the subject settled by these cases. I dissent from that opinion, and think that the court committed an error on the trial in allowing the challenges of the district attorney.

The cases in Pennsylvania, which were referred to on the argument, throw no additional light on the subject. Those cases do not appear to harmonize in principle with each other, on the question of the right of challenge, while, in one particular, they strongly corroborate the view I have taken against the existence in the states of any common law right to such challenge. In Com. v. Lesher, 17 Serg. & R. 155, the court deny that such a right of challenge exists in Pennsylvania. In the subsequent case of Com. v. Jolliffe, 7 Watts, 585, that decision is treated as having been incautiously made, and it is held that the statute in force in Pennsylvania is substantially the same as that of 33 Edw. I., and that there is no reason why it should not receive the same construction. Whichever decision is adopted as the correct exposition of the law, the doctrine that this mode of challenge is not a common law right, is not affected by it, any further than as the general reasoning of the court in the last case conflicts with the principle involved in the doctrine. And I most confidently insist, that no act of a state legislature and no decision of a state court can be shown, manifesting an intention to set up, in the United States, a privilege to the prosecution in capital cases, in respect to the organization of the jury, greater than is enjoyed by the accused; and further, that it was the palpable purpose of the acts of Edw. I. and Geo. IV., to bring the right of the crown within a narrower restriction, and only to give the king and the prisoner coequal rights of challenge for cause.

Under the English practice, and that proposed to be sanctioned in the United States, a way is open for most unreasonable advantages in favor of the government against the prisoner. Suppose the panel to consist of eighty jurors, (the number returned in the present cases,) and that it should so chance that one-half of the whole number are men free of impeachment by challenge for principal cause or favor, yet so circumstanced as to have naturally strong prepossessions in support of the prosecution—for instance, that they are shipowners, shipmasters and others, so connected with maritime business as to feel honestly but deeply convinced that every act of a sailor at sea, tending to put in peril the lives of the officers, or the vessel or cargo, should be regarded with the greatest distrust of his motives, and as justly requiring, at the hands of the seaman, most satisfactory evidence of his innocence, and that circumstances which, in other relations, would be regarded as slight or insignificant, should carry a weighty import when brought to bear against a sailor. The other half of the panel may be drawn from the ordinary employments of life, and be in no way, by their business, associations or prepossessions, unfavorably impressed respecting the character and integrity of seamen as a class. On empanelling the jury, the district attorney may set aside every one of the forty who would deal dispassionately with the case, and drive the prisoner to exercise his peremptory challenges and those for cause upon the forty who stand naturally in a relation of distrust, if not of hostility, towards him. This, to the extent supposed, is put as an extreme case. But it marks distinctly the principle, and shows that the government may be enabled to force upon the panel men who, unless constrained by overpowering evidence for the defence, would be ready to refuse the prisoner the benefit of an acquittal under almost any circumstances, and might even be inclined, upon testimony faintly criminating him, to render against him a verdict of conviction.

The whole theory of criminal jurisprudence looks to placing the advantage, if one accompanies the case, on the side of the accused; and I think that, after the efforts almost universally put forth in the United States to strengthen and extend such privilege, particularly to a person on trial for his life, we are taking a long step backwards, in setting up the practices of the English assizes, originating in an age of colder sympathy for human life than pervades our era and the jurisprudence of the United States. Accordingly, I regard it as far more consonant with the spirit of our institutions and the rules of criminal law sanctioned by them, for this court to adhere to the humane and guarded practice adopted in this state, than to recur to one drawn from an English statute, (by means of a construction wearing more the appearance of maintaining a royal prerogative against the will of the legislature, than of securing to a prisoner the pittance of favor accorded by it,) which dates back to about the year 1300, to the reign of a monarch who, in advance of the sentiment of his age, made most meritorious efforts to reform the condition of the law in his realm, both civil and criminal.

The legislation of the state of New-York shows conclusively how the rule is accepted here, and may, with great force, be claimed as declaratory of the true import of the English statutory law on the subject. At all events, it fixes definitively the law governing the state courts in this respect. As early as 1786 it was enacted that, in all cases where the attorney-general of this state, in behalf of this state, or he who shall in any case prosecute for the people of this state, shall challenge any juror as not indifferent, or for any other cause, he who shall make any such challenge shall immediately assign and show the cause of such challenge, and the truth thereof shall be inquired of and tried in the same manner as the challenges of other parties are or ought by law to be inquired of and tried. 1 Jones & V. Laws, p. 311, § 22; 1 Greenl. Laws, p. 269, § 22. This statute was included in the revision of 1801 (1 Kent & R. Laws, p. 385, § 25), and in that of 1813 (1 Rev. Laws, p. 334, § 25), and was preserved in the Revised Statutes (1 Rev. St. p. 734, § 11). If the English statute of 33 Edw. I. was ever in force in this colony or state, it was specifically repealed by the acts of 1786 and 1788 (1 Jones & V. Laws, p. 312, § 27; 2 Jones & V. Laws, p. 282, § 37). And then the common law, as modified by the laws and usages of the state, and not as altered by acts of parliament, would govern the method of conducting criminal trials and selecting jurors. 1 Kent, Comm. 472, 473, and notes.

The practice of the courts of the United States has always been to conform in all respects, in trials by jury, as nearly as practicable, to the laws of the state in which they sit. Conk. Prac. (1st Ed.) 298. On the trial of Col. Burr, Chief Justice Marshall said: "The United States have precisely the same rights as the prisoner has, and make the same challenges for a good cause." 1 Burr, Tr. 425. The counsel for the government argued for the right of the government to challenge jurors for cause. Mr. Martin, for Col. Burr, insisted that the United States had no right to disqualify jurors for the prisoner. Chief Justice Marshall replied: "Certainly, the counsel for the United States may challenge for cause." Id. 424. And, under those rulings of the court, the counsel proceeded immediately to try the cause of challenge. These proceedings manifest most clearly that the challenges were received and disposed of by the circuit court pursuant to the laws of the state or the practice of the state courts, and that no reference was had to the English practice under the statute of 33 Edw. I.

To the like effect were the proceedings in Jones v. Van Zandt [Case No. 7,502]. The action was in the name of an individual, but was treated, under a statute of Ohio, as a criminal prosecution, and the question was made as to the right of the government to challenge jurors, and the right was upheld and exercised in conformity with the state law.

Upon the foregoing considerations, I am of opinion that the attorney for the United States had no right to a peremptory challenge, and was bound to assign and substantiate his challenge when it was made, and before other jurors could be drawn. New trial denied.

Case No. 14,990.

UNITED STATES v. DOW.

[Taney, 34.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April Term, 1840.

CRIMINAL LAW — COPY OF INDICTMENT — LIST OF JURY — PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES — MANNER OF SELECTING JURY — WITNESSES — INDICTMENT — REPUGNANT ALLEGATIONS.

1. In capital cases, the prisoner is entitled to a copy of the indictment, and a list of the jury, mentioning the names and places of abode of such jurors, to be delivered to him two entire days before his arraignment.

[Cited in Logan v. U. S., 12 Sup. Ct. 630.]

2. Under the act of congress of April 30, 1790, c. 36, § 28 [1 Story's Laws, 89; 1 Stat. 118, c. 9], the arraignment is to be regarded as the commencement of the trial; and the two entire days must be exclusive of the day of delivery of the copy of the indictment and list of jurors, and the day of the arraignment.

3. In offences made capital by the act of congress of April 30, 1790, the prisoner may challenge twenty jurors peremptorily; in treason, thirty-five. In indictments for capital offences, under that act, the prisoner may challenge twenty jurors peremptorily, and no more; in offences made capital since that act, he is entitled to thirty-five peremptory challenges, according to the rules of the common law.

4. The act of congress, passed September 24, 1789, c. 20, § 29 [1 Story's Laws, 63; 1 Stat. 88], in referring to the laws of the states in relation to juries, applies only to the mode of selecting them, and not to the number to be summoned. The circuit courts are bound to follow the laws of the respective states in which they are held, in the mode of forming the juries, and in determining upon their qualifications; but the laws of the several states do not regulate the courts of the United States in the number to be summoned; upon this subject, they are governed by the rules of the common law.

5. The prisoner was indicted for the murder of the captain of the brig Francis, on the high seas; the brig was an American vessel, and the prisoner one of the mariners on board; he belonged to the Malay race, and was baptized and educated in the Christian religion; the witnesses on the part of the United States were two free negroes and one free mulatto. On objection being made to the admissibility of the evidence of one of these negroes, held, that the question was to be determined by the laws of Maryland.

6. Upon general principles, there was nothing in the case of the witness, or in his color, that would make him incompetent to give testimony in any case

7. The result of the legislation of Maryland on this subject, is, that negroes and mulattoes, free or slave, are not competent witnesses in any case wherein a Christian white person is concerned; but they are competent witnesses against all other persons.

8. The prisoner could not be regarded as a Christian white person, and therefore the testimony was admissible against him.

9. An indictment which states that the prisoner, "late of the district of Maryland, mariner, on the 31st day of October, 1839, then and there, being on board a certain brig, called, &c., on the high seas, on the Atlantic Ocean, in latitude 33°, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, and within the jurisdiction of the United States, * * * did, then and there, commit," &c., is bad for repugnancy; and no judgment will be rendered thereon.

10. The words then and there, mean "at the time and place aforesaid," and in this case refer as to time, to the 31st day of October, 1839, and as to the place, to the district of Maryland; and this allegation (which is a substantive one) is repugnant to the subsequent allegation, that the offence was committed on the high seas, "out of the jurisdiction of any particular state."

11. The court cannot reject any material allegation in an indictment or information, which is sensible and consistent in the place where it occurs, and is not repugnant to any antecedent matter, merely on account of there occurring afterwards, in the same indictment or information, another allegation inconsistent with the former, and which latter allegation cannot itself be rejected.

N. Williams, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Z. Collins Lee and S. Teackle Wallis, for prisoner.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. Lorenzo Dow was indicted for the murder of the captain of the brig Francis, on the high seas; the brig being an American vessel, and Lorenzo Dow one of the mariners on board. He was indicted under the act of congress of April 30, 1790, c. 36, § 28 [1 Story's Laws, 89; 1 Stat. 118, c. 9].

At the trial of the case, the following points were ruled by the court, before the jury were sworn:

1. That the prisoner was entitled to a copy of the indictment, and a list of the jury, mentioning the names and places of abode of such jurors, to be delivered to him two entire days before his arraignment. That, under the act of April 30, 1790, c. 36, § 28 [2 Story's Laws, 89; 1 Stat. 118, c. 9], the arraignment was to be regarded as the commencement of the trial; and the two entire days must be exclusive of the day of delivery of the copy of the indictment and list of jurors, and the day of the arraignment. Fost. Crown Law, 230; 4 Bl. Comm. 351.

2. In offences made capital by the act of April 30, 1790, the party may challenge twenty jurors peremptorily; in treason thirty-five (see section 29); and the prisoner being indicted under this law, he was entitled to challenge twenty peremptorily, and no more. In offences made capital since the act of 1790, the party is entitled to thirty-five peremptory challenges, according to the rules of the common law. U. S. v. Johns [Case No. 15,481.]

3. The act of congress of September 24, 1789, c. 20, § 29 [1 Story's Laws, 63; 1 Stat. 88], in referring to the laws of the states in relation to juries, applies only to the mode of selecting them, and not to the number to be summoned. The circuit courts are bound to follow the laws of the respective states in which they are held, in the mode of forming the juries, and in determining upon their qualifications; but the laws of the states do not regulate the courts of the United States in the number to be summoned; upon this subject, the courts of the United States are governed by the rules of the common law. U. S. v. Insurgents [Case No. 15,443]; Case of Fries [Id. 5,126].

In this case, the court directed the marshal to summon as many, in addition to those attending on the regular panel for the term, as would make up the number of thirty-six; and that the list of these thirty-six jurors should be delivered to the prisoner, two entire days before his arraignment.

The jury were sworn, and the trial proceeded. It appeared from the admissions on both sides, that the prisoner was a native of the town of Manilla, in one of the Philippine Islands; that his parents were both Malays, living in that town, and subjects of the queen of Spain; that they were Christians, and that the prisoner was baptized and educated in the Christian religion, and had always professed to be a Christian.

At the time of the murder, the captain was the only white person on board; the crew consisted of the Malay, three negroes, and one mulatto; two of the negroes were natives of Philadelphia, and one a native of the state of Delaware; the mulatto was a native of the British province of Nova Scotia; they were all free.

The first witness produced on behalf of the United States was one of these negroes. He was objected to by the counsel for the prisoner, upon the ground, that by the laws of Maryland, a free negro was not a competent witness in any case against the prisoner; or, at all events, not in a capital case.

In deciding upon the admissibility of this evidence, the court must be governed by the laws of Maryland, under the act of congress of 1789, c. 20, § 34 [1 Story's Laws, 67; 1 Stat. 92], which provides, "that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law." It will be necessary, therefore, to review the different acts of assembly, which have been passed by the state upon this subject; for, if the testimony offered is not admissible, it must be on the ground that it is excluded by some statute of the state. Upon general principles, there is certainly nothing in the case of the witness, or in his color, that would make him incompetent to give testimony in any case.

The first act of assembly upon this subject is that of May session 1717, c. 13. The second section of that law provides, that "no negro or mulatto slave, free negro, or mulatto born of a white woman, during the time of his servitude by law, or any Indian slave, or free Indian, native of this or the neighboring provinces, be admitted or received as good and valid evidence in law, in any matter or thing whatsoever, depending before any court of record, or before any magistrate, within this province, wherein any Christian white person is concerned." And the third section of this law makes the several persons excluded by the second section, witnesses against each other, where other sufficient evidence is wanting, "provided such evidence or testimony do not extend to the depriving of them, or any of them, of life or member."

It will be observed, that this act of assembly disqualifies the persons mentioned in it from giving testimony, in any case wherein a Christian white person is concerned; but permits them to be examined, in the discretion of the judge, against one another, in cases not extending to life or member. This qualified admission of their testimony against each other, was always held to be an implied exclusion of it in favor of one another; and this produced the act of assembly of 1801, c. 109, which permitted them to give testimony for, as well as against, each other, in prosecutions for stealing goods, or for receiving them knowing them to be stolen.

The act of 1808, c. 81, was the next in order, and made them witnesses in all criminal prosecutions, for and against one another. In this act, as well as in the act of 1801, before mentioned, "Indian slaves," and "free Indian natives," are not mentioned, because before the passage of these laws, that unfortunate race had disappeared from the state. And it is also proper to remark, that in the act of 1808, the expression used in the act of 1717, of "mulatto born of a white woman, during the time of his servitude by law," is altogether dropped, and the persons authorized to give testimony are, "any negro or mulatto slave, or any mulatto descended of a white woman, or any negro or mulatto free or freed;" and the persons for or against whom it may be given, in any criminal prosecution, are described in precisely the same words. The acts of assembly that subjected a mulatto, born of a white woman, to a certain period of servitude, were not in force when the law of 1808 was passed; they were repealed by the act of 1790, and again in 1796, c. 67, § 14.

The result of these various acts of legislation is this: negroes and mulattoes, free or slave, are not competent witnesses, in any case wherein a Christian white person is concerned; but they are competent witnesses against all other persons. It is true, that the act of 1808 does not, in so many words, say that negroes and mulattoes shall be competent witnesses in all cases except those wherein a Christian white person is concerned; the language of the statute merely enables them to give testimony in the cases there specified. These were cases in which, among others, negroes and mulattoes had been made incompetent witnesses by the act of 1717; and the effect of the act of 1808 was to repeal so much of this law. And as negroes and mulattoes, as well as persons of any other description, were competent witnesses upon the general principles of the common law, and as they had been disabled merely by the prohibitory provisions of the act of 1717; they are now competent witnesses in all cases, where the provisions of that statute are no longer in force; and the only disabling clause of that statute still in force, is the one which makes them incompetent where any Christian white person is concerned; the other disabling clauses have all been repealed.

We do not speak of the clauses in relation to Indian slaves, or native Indians; the silence of the laws of 1801 and 1808, in relation to this class of persons, has already been accounted for. The prisoner, however, is not an "Indian slave, or a free Indian native of this or any of the neighboring provinces;" and if the provisions of the act of 1717, in relation to persons of that description, be regarded as still in force; and if negroes or mulattoes would be incompetent witnesses against them, in cases affecting life or member, yet the prohibition does not reach the case of the prisoner.

The only question is, whether he is to be regarded as a Christian white person? We think he is not; the Malays have never been ranked by any writer among the white races. But the act of 1717, which excludes the testimony of negroes and mulattoes, in cases where Christian white persons are concerned, did not look to the differences, moral or physical, which have been supposed to exist between the different races of mankind; the law was made for practical purposes, and grew out of the political and social condition of the colony. The colonists were all of the white race, and all professed the Christian religion; from the situation of the world at that time, no persons but white men professing the Christian religion could be expected to emigrate to Maryland; and if any person of a different color, or professing a different religion, had come into the colony, he would not, at that time, have been recognized as an equal by the colonists, or deemed worthy of participating with them in the privileges of this community. The only nations of the world which were then regarded, or perhaps entitled to be regarded, as civilized, were the white Christian nations of Europe; and certainly emigrants were not expected or desired from any other quarter.

The political community of the colony was composed entirely of white men professing the Christian religion; they possessed all the powers of government granted by the charter. Christian white men could not be reduced to slavery, or held as slaves in the colony; but they might, according to the laws of the colony, lawfully hold in slavery negroes or mulattoes, or Indians. The white race did not admit individuals of either of the other races to political or social equality; they were regarded and treated as inferiors, of whom it was lawful, under certain circumstances, to make slaves. These three races existing in the same territory, one possessing all the power, and holding the other two in a state of subjection and degredation, it was natural, that feelings should be created by such a state of things, that would make it dangerous for the white population to receive as witnesses against themselves the members of the two races which it had thus degraded; hence free negroes and mulattoes, and free Indians of this or the neighboring provinces, as well as those who were held in slavery, were disqualified from being witnesses against Christian white men. No one who belonged to either of the races of which slaves could be made, was allowed to be a witness where any one was concerned who belonged to the race of which the masters were composed.

In order, therefore, to make the negroes and the mulatto incompetent witnesses in this case, it must be shown that the prisoner belonging to the white race, that is to say, to that race of men who settled the colony of Maryland, and formed its political community, at the time the act of 1717 was passed. But it is admitted, that he is a Malay; and the Malays are not white men, and have never been classed with the white race. In Maryland, they were certainly regarded as belonging to one of those races of whom it was lawful to make slaves, and who, according to the laws of England and of the colony, were legitimate objects of the slave trade. This appears by the following case. By the act of assembly of Maryland of 1715, c. 44, § 22, it is declared, "that all negroes and other slaves already imported, or hereafter to be imported into this province and all the children now born, or hereafter to be born of such negroes and slaves, shall be slaves during their natural lives." It became a question, under this act, whether the descendant of a woman who was imported as a slave from Madagascar, could be held in slavery in Maryland. 3 Har. & McH. 501. This case is not fully stated in the report; I have examined the original papers. It was proved that the mother of the petitioner was a yellow woman with straight black hair, and that she was not of the negro race, and the testimony shows that it was upon this fact that the petitioner chiefly relied; she was undoubtedly a Malay, according to the description in the evidence. The court said that as Madagascar was a country where the slave trade is practised, the petitioner must show that her ancestor was free in her own country, in order to entitle her to freedom here. Now, it is well known that the Malay race form a part of the population of Madagascar (1 Maltebrun's Geography, 192, 586; 2 Murray's Geography, 525; McCul. Dict. 786; Wyatt, Nat. Hist. 22, 23; Ives' Voyage, 5; 2 Raynal's East & West Indies, 227); and consequently, under this decision, may be held in slavery in this state, if they were slaves in their own country, and when imported here as slaves, they are presumed to have been slaves in their own country, till the contrary appears.

It follows, from this decision, that Malays might lawfully be held in slavery in the colony of Maryland, and consequently, are not embraced by the description of white men as mentioned in the act of 1717, and the testimony offered is not excluded by that law. The case before the court, therefore, stands upon the general principles of the common law, and the witnesses offered by the United States are competent witnesses.

It may be proper to say a few words in relation to the cases embraced by the third section of the act of 1717. By that section negroes, mulattoes and Indians were not witnesses against one another, in cases which might affect life or member. The policy of this section obviously stood upon very different principles from that which dictated the total exclusion of their testimony against white persons. It arose from the barbarous and brutal ignorance of the two excluded classes, and their crude and monstrous superstitions, which rendered them incapable of feeling or appreciating the obligation of an oath, as felt and appreciated in a Christian community; and it was not, therefore, deemed safe to receive them as witnesses, even against one another, in the more serious or grave offences, lest they should avail themselves of the privilege in order to obtain revenge for real or supposed injuries. Even the limited extent to which they might be heard was discretionary with the judge, and he might, if he deemed it proper to do so, refuse to hear them; and if he heard them at all, it must be against one another; they could in no case whatever be received as witnesses in behalf of each other.

In process of time, however, when the Indians had disappeared from the state, and the negro and mulatto population had become instructed in the doctrines of the Christian religion, and made aware of the sanctity and obligation of an oath, the reason which had excluded them as witnesses, even in cases where individuals of their own class were concerned, no longer existed; and the act of 1808, therefore, made them competent in all cases for and against one another. In other words, it made them competent in all cases in which they had been disabled by the act of 1717, except in the case where white persons or Indians were concerned; in the case of white persons, the reasons of policy which dictated the exclusion remained unchanged; and in the case of the Indians, the law had no longer any practical operation, as there were no Indians, free or slave, remaining within the borders of the state.

If the third section of the act of 1717 was still in force, we must have regarded it as an implied declaration that negroes or mulattoes, free or slave, were incompetent witnesses, in any case where life or member was at stake, and upon that principle have rejected the testimony now offered on behalf of the United States. But the act of 1808 having restored their competency in all cases except those above mentioned, and the case of the prisoner not being within either of those exceptions, the question must be determined upon common law principles, and the testimony of these witnesses must, therefore, be admitted.

The testimony was accordingly given to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty of murder.

A motion in arrest of judgment was made by the prisoner's counsel, and, after full argument, the court gave the following opinion, arresting the judgment.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. The objection taken to the indictment, upon the motion in arrest of judgment, is, that it contains averments repugnant to one another, in relation to the place where the offence was committed. The first count in the indictment states that "Lorenzo Dow, late of the district of Maryland, mariner, on the 31st day of October 1839, then and there, being on board a certain brig called the Francis, belonging to a citizen of the United States, on the high seas, on the Atlantic ocean, in latitude thirty-three," out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, and within the jurisdiction of the United States, did, then and there, commit the crime charged in the indictment. The objection is, that the word "there," first above mentioned, refers to the district of Maryland; that it is an allegation that the crime was committed within that district, and consequently, that this allegation is repugnant to the subsequent averment, in the same sentence, that it was committed "out of the jurisdiction of any particular state."

We have carefully examined the precedents, and we are satisfied that the words "then and there," as first above introduced, are not to be found in indictments in analogous cases, in any book of approved authority. The words "then and there," which so frequently occur in indictments, mean nothing more than the words "at the time and place aforesaid;" they necessarily imply that a certain time and a certain place have been before mentioned, to which they relate; and if no time and place have been before mentioned, the words "then and there" must be insensible and without meaning.

In the case under consideration, the district of Maryland is the only place, and the 31st of October, 1839, the only time mentioned in the indictment, before the words "then and there," which are now in question. If, instead of using these words, the indictment had said, that "at the time and place aforesaid," Lorenzo Dow, on board the brig Francis, committed the murder, there would be no doubt that the place referred to was the district of Maryland; because it is the only place before mentioned in the indictment. We have already said that the words "then and there" mean the same thing with the words "at the time and place aforesaid;" this clause in the indictment is, therefore, a plain averment that at the date before mentioned, and at the district of Maryland, Lorenzo Dow, on board the brig Francis, committed the crime of which he has been found guilty. But this averment is repugnant to the allegation in the same clause of the indictment, which states that, at the time therein mentioned, he committed the crime on board the brig Francis, "out of the jurisdiction of any particular state;" for if the place at which he committed the murder was out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, it could not be at the district of Maryland.

It has been argued, in support of the indictment, that these words "then and there," which are manifestly out of place, may be regarded as surplusage. But the rule upon this subject is very clearly stated in the case of Rex v. Stevens, 5 East, 244, where Lord Ellenborough says: "I do not find any authority in the law which warrants us in rejecting any material allegation in an indictment or information, which is sensible and consistent in the place where it occurs, and is not repugnant to any antecedent matter, merely on account of there occurring afterwards, in the same indictment or information, another allegation inconsistent with the former, and which latter allegation cannot itself be rejected."

The rule of law here stated, undoubtedly is the true one, and it must decide the case before us. For here, the averment in question, relating to the place at which the crime was committed, is a material one, because we have no jurisdiction if this averment is true; it is sensible and consistent where it occurs, because such a crime might have been committed on board the brig Francis, within the district of Maryland; it is clearly not repugnant to any antecedent matter; but it is repugnant to the subsequent allegation, that the crime was committed out of the jurisdiction of any particular state; and this latter averment cannot be rejected, because the jurisdiction of this court to try and punish the offender depends upon it. We have no jurisdiction unless the offence was committed out of the jurisdiction of any particular state. The allegations as to place are therefore both material; they are repugnant to one another; and as neither can be rejected, the indictment is fatally defective.

If we were at liberty to look into the evidence given upon the trial, the objection to the indictment might easily be disposed of; for the brig Francis does not appear to have been at any time within the district of Maryland, and all the evidence states that the act for which the prisoner is indicted was done on the high seas, as charged in the latter averment. But the court are not at liberty to look beyond the indictment itself. He has been found guilty of the crime charged in that indictment—according to one allegation, that crime was committed in the district of Maryland; according to another, it was committed out of the jurisdiction of any particular state. In the first case, we have no jurisdiction; in the latter, we have; but we have no right to go out of the indictment, and inquire which of these conflicting allegations contains the truth.

The rules of law applicable to indictments, are undoubtedly in many instances technical and nice; but they have been long and well established, and no court has a right to disregard them, even in the case of the humblest individual, or the most guilty offender.

The case before us, however, is rather matter of substance than one of technical form. Certainly, a court ought not to be permitted to inflict punishment, unless the offence is first found by the jury. The verdict of guilty finds the precise offence charged in the indictment, and none other; and, unless the indictment clearly shows that it was committed within the jurisdiction of the court, the principles of justice, as well as the principles of law, forbid the court to proceed to judgment.

We have spoken, so far, of the first count in the indictment; the same defect is found in the remaining three counts. The judgment must therefore be arrested.

The prisoner was re-indicted and tried, and found guilty. Sentence of death was passed upon him, but he was subsequently pardoned by the president of the United States.

Case No. 14,990a.

UNITED STATES v. DOWDEN.

[1 Hayw. & H. 145.] [1]

Criminal Court, District of Columbia. Aug. 12, 1843.

CRIMINAL LAW—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—HANDWRITING—WITNESS.

1. The prisoner has a right to show the spirit and temper with which the prosecution has been conducted, and if it has been brought to bear against the accused he has a right to bring it to the attention of the jury.

2. In the examination of a witness as to the handwriting of the prisoner he must answer from his knowledge of handwriting; he must have seen the writing which the writing in question resembles, and must come to the conclusion in his own mind that he believes it to be the prisoner's handwriting.

3. A witness whose name is on the back of the indictment should be called by the district attorney if he is a material witness, not otherwise.

The prisoner [Raymond P. Dowden] was indicted for stealing treasury notes that were issued by the government under the act of congress of January 31st, 1842 [5 Stat. 469].

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

Philip R. Fendall, U. S. Dist. Atty.
W. L. Brent and Jas. Hoban, for prisoner.

There were several indictments against the prisoner. The counsel for the prisoner asked on which the district attorney intended to try the prisoner, contending that they should be proceeded with in their order. The district attorney stated that he would be tried on the indictment for larceny.

After argument THE COURT directed the trial to proceed on the indictment for larceny.

Mr. Fendall, in opening the case, said there were strong circumstances fixing suspicion on the defendant, which required explanation. He hoped the defendant would be able to explain them, and if he could do so satisfactorily no one would feel a greater degree of gratification than himself. If he could make that explanation to the jury it would be their pleasure to give him a verdict of acquittal.

Mr. Hoban opened the case for the defence. In his remarks he stated the language of the district attorney's distinguished predecessor: "If there was nothing else than a handwriting upon which to convict a man, I would not hang a dog on such testimony, because I could not swear to my own handwriting. I would not believe any man who attempted to swear positively—so much do handwritings approximate to each other, and so difficult is it to distinguish between them." The whole case stands upon the undistinguished handwriting of the accused. I ask for the accused a full trial and an honorable acquittal.

In the course of the trial the following question was put to one of the government witnesses, who was called by the defence on cross examination: "Q. State whether any person or persons engaged in prosecuting the defendant tampered with you before your examination at the enquiring court in this place, the influence used, the threats made, or the rewards held out to you, if you would swear that B. C. Campbell and the defendant were the same person; and by whom such influences were used, such threats made, or such rewards held out, and at what place, and under what circumstances? A. Yes; I was treated in that matter."

The district attorney appealed to the court whether the question was pertinent or not.

"The defence," said Mr. Brent, "we set up is not only that our client is not guilty, but that the investigation of all the facts connected with this case will be to bring to light one of the most infamous conspiracies to destroy the character and standing of an innocent man that ever was attempted in any community. In pursuit of this object I would not stop to inquire who might or might not be implicated. I care not what the standing of a man may be, how distinguished his character, or lofty his station, yet if my duty to my client requires me to bring his conduct before that jury, I will not hesitate to do so."

THE COURT decided that the question could be put, and answered only so as to reach officers of the government of the United States who have been sworn, or whose evidence has been used by consent in this case, but not as to other officers. Exceptions were taken as to this ruling.

THE COURT, on the following day, reversed its decision, and stated that the defendant had a right to show the spirit and temper with which the prosecution had been conducted, and if it had been brought to bear against the accused, he had a right to bring it to the attention of the jury, and, therefore, decided that the testimony might be offered.

THE COURT expressed the opinion that no publication ought to be made of trials in courts of justice while they were pending, as they might produce improper influence.

A witness was examined as to the prisoner's handwriting. He stated that he is familiar with his handwriting; that there is nothing in the writing shown that he could positively identify as his handwriting.

THE COURT remarked that the witness must answer from his knowledge of handwriting. He must have seen the writing which the part on the note resembles, and come to a conviction in his own mind that he believes it to be the traverser's writing. He must be convinced and speak from his conviction. This is the rule of law.

Mr. Brent claimed it as a right that the district attorney should have every witness whose name is on the back of the indictment examined, as he wished to cross-examine them, citing Archb. Cr. Law, p. 141.

THE COURT decided that the witness should be called if he was a material witness, not otherwise.

The case was submitted to the jury without argument.

The jury brought in a verdict of "Not guilty."

UNITED STATES v. DOWNING.

[3 Cent. Law J. 383.][1]

District Court, D. Kansas. 1876.

INDIANS—SELLING LIQUOR TO—INDIAN COUNTRY.

1. The act of congress (Rev. St. § 2139) which provides that "every person, except an Indian in the Indian country, who sells, exchanges, gives, barters, or disposes of any spirituous liquor or wine to any Indian under the charge of an Indian superintendent or agent, or introduces or attempts to introduce any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country, shall be punished," etc., was only intended to prohibit the selling, giving, or bartering of spirituous liquors or wine to an Indian in the Indian country and not elsewhere.

2. The words "in the Indian country," refer to the locality of the offence, and not to the habitation of the Indian excepted from the penalty of the act.

[Indictment for selling liquor to Indians. Heard on motion to quash.]

George R. Peck, U. S. Dist. Atty.
G. C. Clemens, for defendant.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

FOSTER, District Judge. The indictment alleges that the defendant did, within the district of Kansas, sell, exchange, give and barter one pint of spirituous liquor to Richard Rice and Peter Burdeaux, both Indians of the Tribe and Nation of Pottawatomies, and being under the charge of M. H. Newlon, an Indian agent duly appointed, etc. The defendant moves to quash the indictment for that it does not charge an offence against him.

The law (Rev. St. § 2139) provides as follows: "Every person, except an Indian in the Indian country, who sells, exchanges, gives, barters, or disposes of any spirituous liquors or wine to any Indian under the charge of an Indian superintendent or agent, or introduces or attempts to introduce any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country, shall be punished," etc. The question at issue involves the construction of the sentence, "except an Indian in the Indian country." Do the words, "in the Indian country," refer to the residence of the Indian excepted from the operation of the law, or do they define the locus in quo of the act prohibited? In other words, does the law only prohibit the traffic of liquor in the Indian country, by any person except an Indian, or does it prohibit (with the same exception) the traffic with any Indian under the charge of a superintendent or agent, whether in the Indian country or not?

Under the law of June 30th, 1834 (4 Stat. 732), the prohibition extended only to the Indian country. By the amendatory act of February 13th, 1862 (12 Stat. 339), the words "in the Indian country" were stricken out, thus making the prohibition apply to any Indian under the charge of a superintendent or agent, whether in the Indian country or not. Now these two acts of 1834, and 1862 have been repealed by the Revised Statutes, and section 2139, which we are called upon to construe, appears to be the only law in existence prohibiting the selling, bartering, or giving of liquor to Indians. There is but little to aid us in ascertaining the intention of the law-making power in this act, except the context and the phraseology of the law itself. The chapter under which this section is found is headed: "Government of Indian Country." The head and marginal notes to this section read, "Penalty for Selling Spirituous Liquors in Indian Country." The first paragraph of this section says: "No ardent spirits shall be introduced under any pretense into the Indian country." By an examination of the various provisions of this chapter, it will be seen, that the whole tenor of the law is to regulate and govern traffic with the Indians in the Indian country. The punctuation of this section also conveys the same idea, there being a comma before and after the words, "except an Indian," and I construe those words as if they were in parenthesis.

It appears to me, that the section under consideration was intended to prohibit the selling, giving, or bartering of spirituous liquors or wine to an Indian in the Indian country, and not elsewhere. That the words "in the Indian country," refer to the locality of the offence, and not to the habitation of the Indian excepted from the penalty of the act. We observe in section 2135, prohibiting other kinds of traffic, a similar exception of an Indian. It was evidently the intention of the legislature to prevent not only the introduction of liquor into the Indian country, but also the selling or giving it to the Indian after it had been introduced, by every person except an Indian. The exception prevents the application of the law to an Indian, except so far as his liquor would be subject to seizure under the provisions of the next section. So it would seem the "untutored child of the forest" might traffic in liquor without limit, subject only to the inconvenience of seizure and confiscation. If the other view is taken of this law, and the words "in the Indian country," be applied to the domicile of the Indian excepted, it would result that a special privilege is granted to an Indian in the Indian country, over an Indian in any other locality. The former could carry on this traffic with all the tribes and nations of Indians, while the latter would be prohibited. And this further question would then arise: Would the Indian residing in the Indian country be limited to traffic in that country, or would he carry this privilege about with him, and have a roving commission to deal in whiskey anywhere he pleased, provided the Indian country was his domicile? In brief, would it except an Indian living in the Indian country, or an Indian selling in the Indian country from the operation of the law? Or must the excepted Indian both reside and carry on the traffic in the Indian country? This law is wonderfully and fearfully made, and like the grace of God "it passeth all understanding." We find ourselves groping in darkness when we accept any other theory than the first one suggested, and upon which we rest our decision. But we are met with the argument that under this construction dealers in liquor may set up in the traffic on the borders of the Indian country with impunity, and thus defeat the object and purpose of the law. Now if we are to look beyond the interpretation of the act of congress to the effect likely to result, there are two answers to this objection. First. If his business introduced or attempted to introduce liquor into the Indian country the penalty of the law would reach him. Whether selling a drink of liquor to an Indian who crossed the border for that purpose would be introducing liquor into the Indian country is a question in metaphysics too abstruse for me to solve, until driven to it by dire necessity. Second. There is a statute law of this state (Gen. St. 524) which in stringent terms prohibits this traffic with the Indians, and which is ample to reach malefactors in the case referred to, and it is eminently proper that the laws of the state should denounce and punish those acts committed within its limits, which tend to do harm to its citizens, and to subvert the peace and good order of the community. The people of the state lying contiguous to the Indian country, are more immediately affected by this traffic within its borders than are the people of the country at large. It is apparent why congress should legislate against the traffic in the Indian country, which is under the immediate jurisdiction of congress, and yet not interfere when the state jurisdiction intervenes. It is the spirit and theory of the general government to leave to state legislation such matters as are properly cognizable by the local government.

It has been decided by Mr. Justice Miller—U. S. v. Ward [Case No. 16,639]—that the jurisdiction of the court of this state extends over all Indian reservations within the limits of the state, unless by treaty stipulation such reservations were not to be included within the state limits. To use the words of the learned judge: "All territory which was not covered by such treaties, was included within the state within its jurisdiction, and within its territory, and this irrevocably, unqualifiedly and exclusively." Again he says: "It can not be said of the new state of Kansas that she stands upon an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatever, * * * if congress can without her consent exclude her from the right and the power to enforce the laws which she has made for the protection of the lives, persons and property of her citizens, on any portion of her soil." The Indian country, as defined by the act of 1834, was all that vast and boundless territory lying west of the Mississippi, and not within the states of Missouri and Louisiana, or the territory of Arkansas. As the several new states which have been carved out of this vast territory have been admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original states, under the principle established by Justice Miller in the Ward Case, this expansive territory has been greatly diminished, and from what was originally the Indian country must now be excluded the new states taken therefrom, and all Indian reservations included within the limits and jurisdiction of such states. Under this rule it is not unlikely, that such Indian reservations within the borders of this state, as were by a treaty stipulation to be excluded from states limits and state jurisdiction, are still in the Indian country, and within its jurisdiction. In this case, however, it is not charged that the liquor was sold on such a reservation or on any reservation whatever, and therefore it is not necessary to decide this point. The great body of the Indian tribes have been removed to the Indian country, and there is but little reason to apprehend that the state of Knasas can not amply protect herself from the liquor traffic with the few remnants of tribes still remaining within her borders. The motion to quash the indictment must be allowed.

Case No. 14,992.

UNITED STATES v. DRENNEN et al.

[Hempst. 320.] [1]

District Court, D. Arkansas. March, 1845.

EXECUTION—FEDERAL JURISDICTION—ADMINISTRATORS — ASSETS — PROPERTY OF DECEASED PERSONS.

1. Suits may be brought in the courts of the United States against executors and administrators, and judgments rendered against them in their representative capacity, and executions issued against the property of the estate unadministered, and a sale thereof, whether it be lands, slaves, or goods and chattels, will pass a valid title to the purchaser.

2. Every court must necessarily possess the power of executing its judgments and decrees.

3. The judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73] expressly provides for rendering judgments against the estates of deceased persons, and also for issuing executions on all judgments rendered in the courts of the United States.

4. The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is derived alone from the constitution and laws of the United States, and cannot be enlarged, diminished, or affected by state laws or regulations. [Robinson v. Campbell] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 221; [The Orleans v. Phoebus] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175.

[Cited in National Bank of Western Ark. v. Sebastian Co., Case No. 10,040.]

5. By the laws of Arkansas, goods and chattels, credits and effects, lands, tenements, and slaves are assets in the hands of an administrator for the payment of debts.

6. Judgments may be rendered de bonis testatoris under these laws, and executions issued against the estate of the intestate, and the same sold to satisfy the execution.

7. Where property will be sacrificed, the officer should not sell, but wait for a venditioni exponas.

8. See notes, as to sale of property of deceased persons on judgments and execution.

Petition to quash execution:

"District of Arkansas—set. To the Hon. Benjamin Johnson, Judge of the District Court of the United States in and for the District of Arkansas: Your petitioners, John Drennen and Elias Rector, as administrators of all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits of Wharton Rector, deceased, respectfully represent, that heretofore, namely, on the 12th day of October, A. D. 1844, the United States, by the consideration and judgment of the district court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, recovered against your petitioners, as and in their capacities of administrators as aforesaid, the sum of seven thousand five hundred and twenty-five dollars and ninety-one cents, which were adjudged to them for their damages, with interest on said damages at the rate of six per cent. per annum from said 22d day of October, 1844, till paid, together with the sum of fifty-five dollars and fifty-one cents for costs sustained in said suit, which by the record thereof remaining in said court more fully appears. Your petitioners further represent, that afterwards, namely, on the fourth day of March, A. D. 1845, said United States, for having execution of said judgment, sued out of the office of the clerk of said court a certain writ of fieri facias, directed to the marshal of said district, by which said writ said marshal was commanded that of the goods and chattels and slaves, lands and tenements of the said intestate Wharton Rector, at the time of his death, he should cause to be made the damages and interest aforesaid, together with the costs aforesaid, so that he should have the same before the clerk of said court at his office in the city of Little Rock on the first Monday of April next, to be paid over to said plaintiffs; which said writ afterwards came to and is now in the hands of said marshal, who has, by virtue thereof, levied upon and advertised that the following described lands and tenements, situated in Rector town, Pulaski county, in the district aforesaid, namely, lots 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, in block or square No. 6; fractional block No. 5, consisting of lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6; fractional blocks 12 and 13; blocks No. 8 and 9; fractional blocks 3 and 4, and block No. 16, will be sold on the 29th day of March, 1845, to satisfy said writ of fieri facias; all which by a copy of said writ, with the marshal's certificate thereon, herewith exhibited, marked A, and to be taken as part hereof, will more fully appear. And your petitioners submit and insist, that by the law of the land, no writ of execution could issue against them, as such administrators, upon said judgment. Your petitioners therefore pray your honors to supersede, quash, and set aside said writ of fieri facias, together with all the proceedings had under and by virtue thereof. And your petitioners will ever pray, &c. John Drennen and Elias Rector, as Administrators of Wharton Rector, Deceased."

Exhibit A. "United States of America, District of Arkansas — sct. The United States, to the Marshal of the Arkansas District, Greeting: Whereas, the United States, on the 12th day of October, A. D. 1844, in our district court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, hath recovered against John Drennen and Elias Rector, administrators of the estate of Wharton Rector, deceased, the sum of seven thousand five hundred and twenty-five dollars and ninety-one cents (say $7,525.91), which were adjudged to them for their damages, with interest on said damages at six per centum per annum from the said 22d day of October, A. D. 1844, till paid, together with the sum of fifty-five dollars and forty-one cents for costs sustained in the suit. You are therefore commanded, that of the goods and chattels and slaves, lands and tenements of the said intestate Wharton Rector, at the time of his death, you cause to be made the damages and interest aforesaid, together with the costs aforesaid, so that you have the same before the clerk of our said court at his office in the city of Little Rock on the first Monday of April next, to be paid over to said plaintiff, and then and there certify how you have executed this writ. In testimony whereof, Benjamin Johnson, Esq., judge of our said court, hath caused the seal of said court to be hereto affixed this fourth day of March, A. "I, Henry M. Rector, United States marshal in and for the district of Arkansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the execution now in my hands in the cause therein mentioned, and that I have levied said execution upon lots 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. 11, and 12, in block or square No. 6; fractional block No. 5, consisting of lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6; fractional blocks 12 and 13; blocks No. 8 and 9, fractional blocks 3 and 4, and block No. 16,—all in Rector town, Pulaski county, Arkansas. And I do further certify, that I have advertised that said parcels of land would be sold, to satisfy said execution, on the 29th day of March, 1845. Given under my hand this 13th day of March, 1845. Henry M. Rector, U. S. Marshal, District of Arkansas."

Written notice was served on S. H. Hempstead, attorney for the United States for the district of Arkansas, on the 13th of March, 1845, that the above petition would be heard before the Hon. Benjamin Johnson, district judge, at chambers, on the 14th of March, 1845; at which time the matter of the petition was argued by George C. Watkins for the petitioners, and S. H. Hempstead, district attorney, for the United States, who admitted the facts stated in the petition to be true. The application was denied on the merits, but no written opinion was delivered at the time. Subsequently the following was written.

OPINION OF THE COURT (JOHNSON, District Judge). This was an application to quash an execution issued on a judgment obtained by the United States against John Drennen and Elias Rector, administrators of Wharton Rector, deceased, in the district court of Arkansas, on the 22d of October, 1844, and also to quash and set aside all the proceedings under the execution. The judgment substantially pursues the English form, and is against the petitioners in their representative capacity, and its language is that the moneys therein adjudged be "levied of the goods, chattels, slaves, lands, and tenements which were of Wharton Rector at the time of his death, and remaining in their hands to be administered." The execution pursues the judgment, and both are correct as to form and substance. The marshal levied, among other real property, on blocks eight and nine in Rector town, on which there are costly and valuable improvements, as the property of Wharton Rector, deceased, and, it is alleged, has advertised and will proceed to sell the same, unless prevented from doing so. The application was overruled, on the principal ground that this court had a right to execute its judgments; but no reasons were given at length. As it was a question of interest and considerable difficulty, and time was not then afforded to examine it as fully as it deserved, I have since done so, and am confirmed in the correctness of my decision, and will now proceed to give briefly my reasons for it.

The ground upon which the execution was sought to be quashed was, that in view of the law of the state, none could be issued against administrators; and it was insisted by the counsel for the petitioners, that a judgment against an administrator must be filed in the probate court, according to the laws of Arkansas, classed and satisfied out of the assets of the estate in the regular course of administration, in full if the estate was solvent, and pro rata if insolvent, and that to allow an execution to be issued and levied on the assets of the deceased, and have them sold, would disturb the course of administration, and enable one creditor to obtain an advantage over another, when they should all be on an equal footing. This is a question of delicacy and difficulty, and may in many instances in its practical results produce conflicts of authority between the federal and state tribunals, always to be avoided if practicable. But the jurisdiction of this court is clear, and cannot be surrendered. By the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Story's Laws, 56, § 9], the district courts have cognizance of all suits at common law, where the United States sue, and the matter in dispute exclusive of costs, amounts to the sum or value of two hundred dollars. And by the act of 3d March, 1815 [3 Stat. 244], the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts is extended to all suits at common law in which the United States, or any officer thereof, under the authority of an act of congress, shall sue, irrespective of the amount in controversy. [1 Stat. 76.] There is no defect in jurisdiction, unless it springs from inability to sue executors and administrators at all. Now that power is clearly vested in the courts of the United States, because the act of 1789 adverted to, expressly provides for rendering judgments against the estates of deceased persons. Gord. Dig. 687. And the same act provides for the issuing of executions on all judgments rendered in those courts. [Ross v. Duval] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 60. Besides, the reports of the courts of the United States furnish ample evidence of the constant practice of bringing suits against executors and administrators, and to cite these cases would be a work of supererogation, because it would be to demonstrate what cannot be denied. Nor does it seem to have been thought, in any instance, that judgments thus rendered could not be executed; and certainly an execution is necessary to the beneficial exercise of the jurisdiction. An execution is said to be the end of the law, and it gives to the successful party the fruits of his judgment. [U. S. v. Nourse] 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 8. If a court is competent to pronounce judgment, it must be equally competent to issue execution to obtain its satisfaction. 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 106. A court without the means of executing its judgments and decrees, would be an anomaly in jurisprudence, not deserving the name of a judicial tribunal. It would be idle to adjudicate what could not be executed; and the power to pronounce necessarily implies the power of executing. Congress has the constitutional power to carry into effect all judgments which the judicial department has power to pronounce. Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1; Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, Id. 51. And as we have already seen, that power has been exercised in the act of 1789, by expressly authorizing writs of execution to issue on all judgments which the courts of the United States may render.

The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is derived alone from the constitution and laws of the United States, and cannot be enlarged, diminished, or affected by state laws or regulations. Ex parte Cabrera [Case No. 2,278]; Livingston v. Jefferson [Id. 8,411]; [Wayman v. Southard] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1, 51, 61. Nor can the local laws of a state confer jurisdiction on the courts of the United States. They can only furnish rules to ascertain the rights of parties and thus assist in the administration of the proper remedies, where the jurisdiction is vested by the laws of the United States. [The Orleans v. Phoebus] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175. To allow state laws to affect or impair the jurisdiction of the federal courts, or to arrest the remedies in those courts, would be to virtually abolish them at pleasure. Even then, if it were true, that by the laws of Arkansas a judgment against an administrator cannot be executed or enforced otherwise than by an application to the probate court, it could have no effect in this forum, because, as we have seen, the right of rendering judgments and issuing executions thereon, against the representatives of deceased persons, is clearly conferred on the courts of the United States by acts of congress, and must necessarily supersede any state regulations in conflict with them. The laws of the several states only become rules of decision in trials at common law in the federal courts, in cases where they apply, and where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States do not provide a different rule. 1 Stat. 92; [Livingston v. Story] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 361; [Green v. Lessee of Neal] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 291; U. S. v. Duncan [Case No. 15,003]. But the position is not sound; because there is nothing, as I can perceive, in the laws of Arkansas forbidding the execution of a judgment against an administrator in his representative capacity. On the contrary, it would appear to be allowable, because the right of the circuit courts to pronounce judgments de bonis testatoris is clearly inferable from the provisions of the statute authorizing actions pending against the deceased to be revived against his representative; and also actions generally to be instituted against executors and administrators, in the circuit courts, after the death of the intestate or testator. Rev. St. 81. And then steps in the eighth section of the execution law, which provides, in substance, that when an execution shall be issued against any person as heir, devisee, executor, or administrator, the officer to whom the same shall be directed shall be commended, that of the goods and chattels which were of the ancestor, testator, or intestate at the time of his death, he cause to be made the debt, damages, and costs; for want of goods and chattels, then, real estate which was of the deceased at the time of his death, must be seized to satisfy the execution. Rev. St. 375. It is very clear from this section, that an execution may be issued de bonis testatoris, and of course the property of the deceased levied on and sold. And lands and slaves of the deceased may be sold as well as personal property.

There does not appear to me to be any conflict in the provisions of the administration law and the last quoted provision. Such a construction should be given as that the whole may stand and be effectual. The administration law should doubtless be construed as giving two remedies; one cheap, simple, and expeditious' that is to say, by applying to the administrator or probate court, for the allowance and classification of the claim, and having an order for its payment, either partly or entirely, according to the condition of the estate; the other, more expensive and less expeditious, namely, by bringing an ordinary suit at law in the common law courts, obtaining judgment and execution de bonis testatoris,[2] and which are not affected by the insolvency of the estate, provided there are goods and chattels, lands and tenements, or slaves sufficient to satisfy such debt, remaining unadministered. Whichever remedy a party adopts, he must of course take it subject to all the conditions and limitations peculiar to the particular forum he seeks.

But it is insisted that death has the effect of withdrawing the assets and property of the deceased, of every description, from the influence of an execution, and placing all within the exclusive control of the probate courts. I do not so read the statutes of Arkansas. If that were true, the provisions above quoted authorizing suits against executors and administrators, and executions to issue against the property of the deceased would be nugatory, and would stand a dead letter on the statute-book. Besides, it is well settled that if land be levied on in the lifetime of the judgment debtor, the sale may proceed after his death. The levy upon the property places it from that time forward in the custody of the law, for the payment of the judgment, and although the judgment creditor does not thereby become the owner, yet the levy may be said to vest in him an interest, or give him a lien not affected by the death of the judgment debtor. Certainly death does not withdraw it from the custody of the law. Massie v. Long, 2 Ohio, 290; Buckner v. Terrill, Litt. Sel. Cas. 29; Sumner v. Moore [Case No. 13,610].[3] Putting the statutes aside, then, here is a case where the property would not be withdrawn from the influence of an execution; and, indeed, the fallacy of the argument is too obvious to need further criticism. and is not sustained by authority.

The law, in allowing judgments and execu-

[2] In Ryan v. Lemon, 2 Eng. [7 Ark.] 79, decided by the supreme court of Arkansas in 1846, the same distinction is substantially enunciated. It was there held that in the collection of claims against the estates of deceased persons, claimants may proceed by action according to the forms of the common law, or before the probate court, in the summary manner prescribed by the administration law; and that if the former is adopted, it must be subject to the qualifications imposed by legislative enactment. And the different provisions with regard to bringing suits against executors and administrators and presenting claims, were discussed and construed.

[3] A fieri facias being issued upon a judgment, was levied on land, and the judgment debtor died. Without reviving the judgment by scire facias a venditioni exponas was issued after his death, and the officer under it sold the land thus levied on; and it was held that the sale was valid, and conferred a good title on the purchaser. Taylor v. Doe, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 287. The court said, "We regard the venditioni exponas merely as a continuation and completion of the previous execution, by which the property had been appropriated, and was still in the custody of the law." A sale under execution without revival of the judgment is not absolutely void, but voidable only, and cannot be avoided collaterally. [Pollard v. Files] 2 How. [43 U. S.] 602; [Taylor v. Benham] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 253; 9 Smedes & M. 216. A sale made under execution, tested and issued after the death of the defendant therein, and without a revival of the judgment, is voidable, but not void. The sale is good until set aside by a direct proceeding, and cannot be attacked collaterally. Shelton v Hamilton, 1 Cushm. (Miss.) 496. A sale of lands under a judgment against an executor de bonis testatoris conveys a good title to the purchaser, and the title of the heirs is thereby divested. Worthy v. Hames, 8 Ga. 234. The acts of congress (3d March, 1797, § 5, and 2d March, 1799, § 65) giving priority to debts due the United States, control all state laws for the distribution of estates of deceased persons. 1 Stat. 515, 676. The law makes no exception in favor of a particular class of creditors, and the priority of the United States does not yield to the claims of any creditors, however high may be the dignity of their debts. U. S. v. Duncan [Case No. 15,003]. Almost every state or sovereignty makes itself, by its own legislation, a preferred creditor, as to debts that may be due to it. Such was the Roman law, and such is the law of England. Statutes giving the government a priority are presumed to be for the public good, and are for that reason to be liberally construed in favor of the sovereign. [U. S. v. State Bank of North Carolina] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 29; [Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Delaware] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 134.

tions against the estates of deceased persons, established no new and unheard of doctrine; but rather carried out an ancient rule; because the common law of England enforced claims against estates, by means of judgments and executions de bonis testatoris. Real estate was not subject to sale under execution in any case, against the living or the dead, because it was held to be against the policy of their peculiar system of government. Nor were lands there, as here, assets in the hands of the administrator for the payment of debts Slaves were neither subject to execution, nor assets in the hands of an administrator, because slavery did not and does not exist in England. But goods and chattels which were assets, were subject to execution, seizure, and sale for the debts of the intestate as long as they remained in the hands of the administrator in specie unadministered; and they were so considered until actually sold and applied to the payment of debts. And this, notwithstanding the general subject of administration, was under the authority and jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts; and notwithstanding, too, a scale of priority was established and fixed by law among creditors. Toll. Ex'rs, 258. The case of Mara v. Quin, 6 Term R. 5, shows that a debt may be levied of the assets of the deceased in the hands of the executor to be administered. 2 Saund. 219a, note 2. And several cases in state courts are to the same effect. Mitchel v. Lunt, 4 Mass. 654; McCormick v. Meason, 1 Serg. & R. 92; Prescott v. Tarbell, 1 Mass. 204; Weeks v. Gibbs, 9 Mass. 74; Clark v. May, 11 Mass. 233. It is only necessary to ascertain what are assets, because if by the common law goods and chattels might be taken on execution on account of their being assets and unadministered, so here lands and slaves may be taken and sold, if assets by our laws, which they certainly are. Now the law of Arkansas destines the property of the deceased, real, personal, and mixed, to the payment of debts. Real estate, slaves, personal chattels, rights and credits, and property of every nature and description, are declared to be assets for that purpose.[4] Everything is surrendered, nothing withheld. The administrator represents the intestate; and although it is true that by means of an action and judgment de bonis testatoris, the issuing of execution thereon, and levying on and selling specific property of the deceased, unadministered, subject to execution, one creditor may obtain an advantage over another, yet this results from the favor which the law extends to the vigilant creditor. One creditor may obtain priority over another and have his debt satisfied, to the exclusion of others, who, owing to the exhaustion of property, may get nothing, or only partial satisfaction. But this is no greater hardship than may and in fact constantly does occur between the living, because one creditor, by his activity and vigilance, may clothe himself with the right of judicially appropriating sufficient property of the defendant to satisfy the debt, and which may be his entire property, thus shutting out all other claims and debts, and leaving them unpaid. It is difficult to perceive, on principle, why vigilance should not reap its appropriate and accustomed reward, as well after as before the death of the debtor.

It is insisted, that to allow the property of a deceased person to be sold on execution, would be likely to produce a sacrifice of it. But I am not able to perceive why there would be any greater sacrifice than in any ordinary judicial sale. The sale must be public, and every one would have equal opportunities of purchasing; and if the marshal was satisfied that combinations existed to produce a sacrifice, or, owing to other causes, that it would fall so far below its real value as to warrant him, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to return the property unsold for want of bidders, he might, although possibly not absolutely bound so to do, take that course, as in ordinary cases, and wait for a venditioni exponas, and under which he must sell. 3 Camp. 521, 2 Cow 185; 1 Freem. Ch. 470. Allowing, however, the objection in its fullest force, it could not affect the question of power, and would only be a circumstance connected with its expediency, and therefore to have no controlling weight. In this case it appears that the marshal has levied on the lands of the intestate, and as every officer is presumed to do his duty, it must be taken as at least prima facie evidence that sufficient goods and chattels could not be found whereon to levy the execution, and therefore that it was necessary to seize and sell the lands. But even if there was in fact sufficient personal property, still the sale would not be invalid, nor would the title of the purchaser be affected, as the command to take personalty first is merely directory to the officer. 7 Eng. [12 Ark.] 272, 273. And for any omission of duty in that respect, he would be responsible for whatever damage might accrue to the estate; but the sale would be good. 3 Bibb. 219; 3 A. K. Marsh. 281; 4 T. B. Mon. 474; 5 Blackf. 590; 6 Wend. 523.

On the whole, I am clearly of opinion that this application ought to be refused, and that the plaintiffs have a right to proceed to a sale of the property Petition refused.

NOTE. In Adamson v. Cummins, 5 Eng. [10 Ark.] 541, decided by the supreme court of Arkansas in 1850, it was said that our statutes certainly recognize the right of the circuit court to render judgments de bonis testatoris, else why permit any action pending against the deceased at the time of his death to survive and be revived against his executor, or why the recognition of the right to commence actions generally against executors and administrators after the death of the testator or intestate, or why make provisions touching the conduct of such suits, and the character and effect of judgments in such cases? And it was also said that the 8th section of the statute of executions was an express recognition of the right of the circuit court to issue executions de bonis testatoris; and moreover, that the right of the circuit courts to execute their own judgments was, upon general principles, clearly maintainable, and that all the analogies of the law were in favor of it. But the court held that an execution which was levied on the slaves of the intestate was irregular merely, not void, and was quashable by the administrator after sale; but that the purchaser, without notice of the irregularity, would hold the property purchased, and that the sale would not be set aside. The lands of a deceased debtor may be seized on execution and sold, under a judgment rendered against the executors of such deceased debtor for a debt due from him. Landes v. Perkins, 12 Mo. 260; Landes v. Brant, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 376.

[4] Menifee v. Menifee, 3 Eng. [8 Ark.] 47, 48 (decided in 1847), holds that lands and slaves are assets in the hands of the administrator for the payment of debts, and he entitled to the rents and profits and the possession thereof.

INSANITY—DEFENCE TO MURDER—DELIRIUM PRODUCED BY DRINK.

Where a person is insane at the time he commits a murder, he is not punishable as a murderer, although such insanity be remotely occasioned by undue indulgence in spirituous liquors. But it is otherwise, if he be at the time intoxicated, and his insanity be directly caused by the immediate influence of such liquors.

Indictment [against Alexander Drew] for the murder of Charles L. Clark on the high seas on board of the American ship John Jay, of which Drew was master, and Clark was second mate. Plea, general issue.

At the trial the principal facts were not contested. But the defence set up was the insanity of the prisoner at the time of committing the homicide. It appeared, that for a considerable time before the fatal act, Drew had been in the habit of indulging himself in very gross and almost continual drunkenness; that about five days before it took place, he ordered all the liquor on board to be thrown overboard, which was accordingly done. He soon afterwards began to betray great restlessness, uneasiness, fretfulness and irritability; expressed his fear that the crew intended to murder him; and complained of persons, who were unseen, talking to him, and urging him to kill Clark; and his dread of so doing. He could not sleep, but was in almost constant motion during the day and night. The night before the act, he was more restless than usual, seemed to be in great fear, and said, that whenever he laid down there were persons threatening to kill him, if he did not kill the mate, &c. &c. In short, he exhibited all the marked symptoms of the disease brought on by intemperance, called delirium tremens.

Upon the closing of the evidence, the court asked Blake, the district attorney, if he expected to change the posture of the case. He admitted, that unless upon the facts, the court were of opinion, that this insanity, brought on by the antecedent drunkenness, constituted no defence for the act, he could not expect success in the prosecution. D. Davis and Mr. Bassett, for prisoner.

STORY, Circuit Justice. We are of opinion, that the indictment upon these admitted facts cannot be maintained. The prisoner was unquestionably insane at the time of committing the offence. And the question made at the bar is, whether insanity, whose remote cause is habitual drunkenness, is, or is not, an excuse in a court of law for a homicide committed by the party, while so insane, but not at the time intoxicated or under the influence of liquor. We are clearly of opinion, that insanity is a competent excuse in such a case. In general, insanity is an excuse for the commission of every crime, because the party has not the possession of that reason, which includes responsibility. An exception is, when the crime is committed by a party while in a fit of intoxication, the law not permitting a man to avail himself of the excuse of his own gross vice and misconduct, to shelter himself from the legal consequences of such crime. But the crime must take place and be the immediate result of the fit of intoxication, and while it lasts; and not, as in this case, a remote consequence, superinduced by the antecedent exhaustion of the party, arising from gross and habitual drunkenness. However criminal in a moral point of view such an indulgence is, and however justly a party may be responsible for his acts arising from it to Almighty God, human tribunals are generally restricted from punishing them, since they are not the acts of a reasonable being. Had the crime been committed while Drew was in a fit of intoxication, he would have been liable to be convicted of murder. As he was not then intoxicated, but merely insane from an abstinence from liquor, he cannot be pronounced guilty of the offence. The law looks to the immediate, and not to the remote cause; to the actual state of the party, and not to the causes, which remotely produced it. Many species of insanity arise remotely from what in a moral view is a criminal neglect or fault of the party, as from religious melancholy, undue exposure, extravagant pride, ambition, &c. Yet such insanity has always been deemed a sufficient excuse for any crime done under its influence.

Verdict, "Not guilty."

UNITED STATES v. DRISCOLL.

[1 Lowell, 303.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1869.

EMBEZZLEMENT FROM MAIL — AUTHORITY TO RECEIVE—ERRAND-BOY—MASTER AND SERVANT.

1. An errand-boy who is authorized to call for and receive his employer's letters arriving by mail, and who, after receiving such a letter, containing an article of value, embezzles it, cannot be convicted under section 22 of the Act March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 108], of taking from the mail and embezzling the letter, because his taking was lawful.

[Cited in U. S. v. Thoma, Case No. 16,471; U. S. v. McCready, 11 Fed. 230. Quoted in U. S. v. Safford, 66 Fed. 944.]

[Cited in State v. Concord R. R., 59 N. H. 86.]

2. Nor can he be convicted, under another clause of the same section, of opening a letter, not containing an article of value, before it shall have been delivered to the person to whom it was directed, if he took it in pursuance of his duty as errand-boy, because the delivery to him was a delivery to his employer within the meaning of that clause.

[Quoted in U. S. v. Safford, 66 Fed. 944.]

3. It is not the purpose of the post-office acts to regulate the conduct of masters and servants, but only to protect the mails.

[This was an indictment against John T. Driscoll for embezzling and destroying letters.]

M. F. Dickinson, Jr., Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

J. E. Bates, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. The defendant is an errand-boy employed by the firm of Hallet & Davis, of Boston, whose duty required him to take from the post-office all letters arriving by mail to the address of his employers. He has been convicted of having embezzled or destroyed two such letters so received by him, one containing, and one not containing, an article of value. The two indictments are framed under two clauses of section 22 of the act of 3d of March, 1825 (4 Stat. 108). By the first clause, it is made penal for any person to take the mail, or any letter or packet therefrom, or from any post-office, whether with or without the consent of the person having custody thereof, and to open, embezzle, or destroy any such mail, letter, or packet, the same containing any article of value; and by the second clause, the offence is committed if any person shall take any letter not containing an article of value out of any post-office, or shall open any letter which shall have been in any post-office, before it shall have been delivered to the person to whom it is directed, with design to obstruct the correspondence or pry into another's business or secrets. The question in this case is, whether the agent or servant of a person to whom a letter is addressed is within the meaning of the above clauses of the twenty-second section.

The scope and purpose of these clauses, and of the whole section, appear to be to protect the mails from every kind of danger while in the custody of the United States. Some of the language is broad enough to include within its literal meaning every letter that has ever been in a post-office, and every person that can deal with any such letter before it reaches the manual possession of its owner. Taken literally, the first clause is broad enough to cover even the person to whom the letter is addressed. But the law must have a reasonable construction, and one in accordance with the subject-matter, which is the due and proper custody and delivery of the mail. It must be taken to refer to letters with which the United States have concern under their power and duty to transport and deliver the correspondence of the country. It cannot be that the owner of a letter would be liable for such an act, and it is clear that the same rule applies to the agent. The first clause refers to an unlawful taking, whether with or without the connivance of an officer of the department, and without such a taking the offence is not complete. Here the taking was lawful.

The second clause of the section is not so clear. Under this clause the taking is not an essential element of the offence. The law reads "take or open," &c.; the language is disjunctive. But I think the delivery means in this, as in the other clause, delivery to the person or to his authorized agent. When such a delivery has been made, the government is discharged of further responsibility, and its functions cease to operate upon the letter. If the clerk or servant of the owner betrays his trust, that is a matter to be looked into by the authority of the state, whose laws regulate such agencies. If those laws make the act an embezzlement, there will be a remedy; if they do not, it would not be becoming in congress to do so if it could, which may be doubted. These letters had been delivered to the persons to whom they were directed, because they had been delivered to a servant duly authorized by them to receive their letters.

Two cases have been cited by the defendant's counsel,—U. S. v. Parsons [Case No. 16,000], and U. S. v. Sander [Id. 16,219],—in the latter of which it was held, that if a letter had been delivered to an authorized person, and the opening took place afterwards, this statute did not apply, because delivery to the agent or servant is delivery to the person to whom the letter is addressed; and in the former, the judgment was that the United States was discharged from further responsibility in the premises, after a bona fide delivery, though to the wrong person, himself innocent, when the offence was begun and consummated by a stranger, after the delivery had been perfected. The views of the judges in these cases were fortified by considerations derived from the natural functions, so to speak, of the federal government, it not being probable that the United States would attempt to regulate the relation of master and servant. I am informed upon good authority that Judge Sprague has made a similar decision. I have considered this question once before. A letter had been left at a shop where the letters of the person to whom the particular letter was addressed were, with his knowledge and consent, usually left. A stranger, the defendant, intermeddled with such a letter after such delivery, and was indicted under the latter clause above cited, and the case being, by consent, submitted to me in a somewhat informal way, I ruled upon it, and the result was a nol. pros.

The government has cited only one case,—U. S. v. Pond [Case No. 16,067],—but it is one of high authority, though, I suppose, not actually binding on this court, which has concurrent jurisdiction of all criminal cases, not capital. The point there came up on a motion to quash. Such a motion is always addressed to the discretion of the court, and I understand the decision to go only to this extent, that it is not necessary to allege in the indictment that the letter was in the custody of the United States at the time it was opened. This is undoubtedly so. The remarks of Mr. Justice Curtis go further, no doubt; still, I do not consider them to go to the length necessary to support this prosecution, because they do not refer to a delivery of the letter to one authorized to receive it. Judge Sprague's opinion was given after the decision of U. S. v. Pond [supra], had been made, and that case was called to his attention, and he must have considered, as I do, that it was not an authority to the point now in controversy.

One of the indictments here attempts to meet the difficulty by alleging that the defendant took the letter and unlawfully opened it, but the defect is not in the indictment, but in the law; which does not meet the case. The word "unlawfully" is not often of much value in an indictment; it only asserts a conclusion of law, which, if it arises out of the facts set forth, is unnecessary, and if it does not, is insufficient. The opening may have been unlawful, but it is not made so by any act of congress. New trial ordered.

Case No. 14,995.

UNITED STATES v. DRY OX AND COW HIDES.

[2 Int. Rev. Rec. 34.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. July 15, 1865.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — INVOICE — UNDERVALUATION — FOREIGN DEPRECIATED CURRENCY.

This was an information to enforce the forfeiture of certain hides seized for an alleged violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

The claimants [Pickman & Silsbee], in 1862, imported from Buenos Ayres, by the barque Emma Cushing, a cargo of four thousand two hundred and sixty-one hides, and entered them at the custom house upon an invoice from E. H. Folmar & Co., their Buenos Ayres correspondents. This invoice was made out in the paper currency of Buenos Ayres, and contained the consular certificate for reducing the amount to American currency. They had also received from their correspondents another invoice made out in gold doubloons. The government maintained that the goods should have been entered upon this last invoice, and that, because they were not so entered, the government was defrauded of duties.

The information alleged: 1st. That the hides were invoiced at less than their actual cost, with intent to avoid a part of their proper duty. 2d. That the invoice was made up with intent, by a false valuation, to evade the revenue. 3d. That the invoice was falsely made up with intent to evade the revenue in this: that it represented the hides as bought in paper money, whereas they were in fact bought in gold; that it was well known that by this mode of stating the purchase, as in paper and not in gold, the hides would pay less than their proper duties on entry here, and that this invoice was made up in paper with the intent that this result should follow. The claimants pleaded the general issue.

Upon the trial of the cause, the government showed that Mr. B. H. Silsbee, one of the claimants, upon the arrival of the vessel which brought these hides, entered them at the custom house in Boston, and produced on their entry an invoice from the shipper, E. H. Folmar, of Buenos Ayres, stating the price in the paper money of Buenos Ayres, and representing the hides as costing in this currency $345,278 78; that attached to the invoice was a certificate of the United States consul at Buenos Ayres, that twenty-seven paper dollars were equal to one Spanish dollar; and that, upon his entry, the importer had stated the cost of the hides in federal money, in accordance with the rate given in this certificate, at $12,788 07. It was also proved that, shortly after this entry, difficulties arose with reference to importations from Buenos Ayres, which led to an examination of Mr. Silsbee by the appraisers, and that upon this examination he produced another invoice of these hides, made out in specie, and representing their cost as $14,376 75, accompanied by a letter from Folmar, in which he spoke of this as "the real invoice," and stated that there was "an advantage in having the invoice for the custom house made out in paper, the consular certificate placing the currency at $27 per Spanish dollar, whereas estimating as worth $16 (fuertes) we would calculate it at about $25 to the hard dollar;" but also saying that our custom house regulation required the invoice to be made out in the paper money; and that this letter and the specie invoice were in the possession of the importer before the arrival and entry of the hides in Boston.

It was also shown in evidence that Buenos Ayres is a province of the Argentine confederacy; that there is in that province paper money issued by the government of the province known as moneda corriente, which is a legal tender for all government dues; is employed in the payment of all the ordinary expenses of daily life, and in the purchase of Mestiza wool for exportation; that it is not received in any other province of the confederation; and that dry and salted hides for export, tallow, and Cordova wool, are always bought and paid for in doubloons.

The claimants on this state of facts contended, as matter of law, that they were obliged by the statute of the United States, requiring all invoices of goods subject to ad valorem duty imported into the United States from any foreign country to be made out in the currency or currencies of the place or country whence they were imported, to have the cost of their hides expressed on their invoice in paper money, even though the purchase was actually made in doubloons. They also contended that the statement of the cost of the hides in the invoice in another currency than that actually employed in their purchase, if the reduction from the one currency into the other be truly made, even though such a reduction would probably effect their entry at less than their actual value, and was made with this intent and for this purpose, was not a violation of the laws of the United States. But on these points the court ruled otherwise, as appears in the instructions to the jury given below; and the claimants then offered evidence tending to show that the United States consul at Buenos Ayres had insisted on having the invoices of all goods exported from Buenos Ayres to the United States made out in paper money, and refused to certify to invoices in which the price was expressed in specie; that the merchants in Buenos Ayres believed the law to require that the invoices should be made out in paper money, and understood the consul to insist upon this being done; and that this was the reason why Folmar made up his invoice in this way; and, in support of this view, they relied much on Folmar's own statement in his deposition, taken in the case, and on a passage in his letter to the claimants, inclosing the specie invoice of these hides, in which he said: "Hides in this market are generally bought in gold, but the custom house regulations of the United States requiring all invoices from Buenos Ayres to be made out in paper currency, we always accompany each shipment with a certified invoice reduced to paper, corresponding in value to the cost of the merchandise in hard money." It was admitted that the amount of paper money stated in the invoice as the cost of the hides was the exact equivalent of the doubloons actually paid for these hides at the market rate of doubloons to paper on that day.

The government introduced evidence tending to show that the consul had never refused to certify to specie invoices of exports from Buenos Ayres; that no such certificates had ever been required at the custom house; and that, prior to the entry of these goods, no entry had ever been made of an invoice of dry ox and cow hides from Buenos Ayres, in which the cost was stated and the transaction represented in paper alone, and the actual coin used in payment wholly suppressed.

R. H. Dana, Jr., U. S. Atty., and T. K. Lothrop, for the United States.

Wm. M. Evarts, C. L. Woodbury, and M. E. Ingalls, for claimants.

LOWELL, District Judge (charging jury). The law intends that the invoice, by which goods, purchased abroad and imported into the United States and subject to an ad valorem duty, are entered at the custom house, should state accurately the true transaction between the buyer and the seller; and, as part of this statement, that it should be made out in the currency in which the purchase was made, if that is a currency of the country from which the goods are imported; and the statement of the currency in an invoice of such goods is, by intendment of law, a statement that the goods were purchased in that currency, it being a currency of the country.

If the invoice is made out in a currency different from that of the purchase, and that mode of statement would, by the usages of the treasury officers, be likely to result in a payment of less duties than would have been lawfully exacted by the statement of the currency actually used; and the merchant makes out the invoice with the knowledge of this result, and with the design and for the purpose by that mode of statement to obtain this result, then the invoice is falsely made up under the fourth section of the act of May 28, 1830 [4 Stat. 410], although the currency actually used is another currency of the same place or country, and although the statement is an equivalent statement to a person acquainted with the relative values of the currencies. If in this case the invoice was so made up, with such purpose and intent by the agent of the claimants, and entry of the goods was made upon that invoice by the claimants, their innocence of the purpose and result will not prevent a forfeiture, but will be proper evidence to be weighed by the jury in considering the intent and design of the entire transaction.

The fourth section of the act of May 28, 1830, so far as the points involved in this case are concerned, applies to invoices of goods imported in bulk, as well as to goods imported in packages, and to an entry for warehouse as well as to an entry for consumption. If any appraisement is necessary in case of an invoice falsely made out with intent to evade the duties under the fourth section of this act, the appraisement in this case is sufficient.

If the jury find that doubloons were in common use at Buenos Ayres, at the time of this purchase, as a medium of purchase and sale, between merchants of Buenos Ayres, and between such merchants and traders from the interior provinces of the Argentine republic (of which Buenos Ayres is one), and in which accounts were often kept by merchants and bankers, then the jury may properly find that doubloons were a currency of the country within the meaning of the act of March 3, 1801 [2 Stat. 121], although the paper money of the province of Buenos Ayres was also in common use in that province, in purchases and sales, and was a legal tender in that province; and although the doubloon was not of the coinage of Buenos Ayres or of the Argentine republic.

If the jury find that invoices in doubloons were in fact sent forward by the consul without any certificate of the value of the doubloon, and were accepted at our custom houses at a rate satisfactory to our officers and nearer the true value of our money than were the paper invoices as reduced by the consul's certificate, that practice is to be considered, for the purposes of this case, to have been a lawful practice, and would be binding on Folmar, if he was aware of it; and if, knowing of this difference, he made out the invoice as he did, for the purpose of taking advantage of it, and thereby evading duties, his action would be within the statute.

If the jury find that Mr. Folmar did not make out the invoice for the purpose of evading the duties, as above explained, but for another and different purpose, then the goods are not liable to forfeiture. For instance, if he honestly believed, after due inquiry, whether of our consul or of other persons likely to be informed upon the subject, including his partner in New York, that our custom house regulations required the invoice to be made out in paper; and he in good faith made it out in order to meet that supposed requirement, then the goods would not be liable to forfeiture, although he knew that by that mode a less duty would be paid than by some other mode, which he thought inadmissible, and though no such regulation in fact existed.

On this issue, the burden of proof is on the claimants,—that is, they are to show what the transaction really was. Whichever party has made out his case by the preponderance of the evidence will be entitled to the verdict. If the evidence appears entirely equal on each side, the government must prevail. Very few cases are decided by the burden of proof, because the jury usually finds that one side or the other has made out the best case. There is no evidence in the case upon which the jury can find a false valuation of the goods under either of the statutes upon which this information is framed.

The jury returned a verdict for the claimants.

Case No. 14,996.

UNITED STATES v. DUANE.

[Wall., Sr., 5.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. May 12, 1801.

CONTINUANCE — CRIMINAL LAW — COMMISSION TO EXAMINE WITNESSES.

Where the execution of a commission to examine witnesses, has been prevented by the acts or omission of the prosecutor or his agents, the defendant is entitled to a continuance, even if he be guilty of laches in taking out the commission.

[Cited in brief in Fisher v. Greene, 95 Ill. 95.]

This was a motion to put off the trial on the affidavit of William Duane. Upon the whole it appeared, that the indictment was found against him for a libel on the senate of the United States in October term, 1800, and continued on his affidavit that he was not prepared and had material witnesses who were absent, &c. In the same term, he applied to the attorney of the United States for the district, (Ingersoll,) to consent to a commission for taking the depositions of his witnesses, which was immediately assented to. The witnesses proposed to be examined were Wm. Bingham, Jacob Read, Uriah Tracey, Humphrey Marshall, James Gunn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Hillhouse, Nathaniel Chipman, Charles Pinckney and James Ross, all members of the senate of the United States. The defendant, however, took out no commission until about the middle of February, 1801, when a new application was made to Ingersoll, to assent to the issuing of the commission. This consent was given in writing, and commissioners named on each side, to wit: Charles Lee and Harrison G. Otis, for the United States, and John Mason and John Thomson Mason, for the defendant. The attorney for the district declined filing interrogatories on behalf of the United States. The commission was accordingly made out, and arrived at Washington about the 20th of February, and notice thereof given to the commissioners. Those for the defendant accepted, and Otis for the United States; (Lee declining to act.) The commissioners met and agreed upon a form of summons to the several witnesses, which, together with a copy of the interrogatories, and a request that they would deliver their answers in writing, and attend at a time and place fixed in the summons, was served on each of the aforesaid gentlemen of the senate. At the time appointed, none of the witnesses attended except Humphrey Marshall; and at the request of Mr. Otis, another time was agreed on for receiving the witnesses; but it did not appear that any notice of this second meeting was given to any witness, except Gunn and H. Marshall. The commissioners for the defendant attended according to the adjournment, but Otis did not; and on inquiring, it was found he had left Washington that day. The defendant then proposed to his commissioners, that they should request the witnesses to send their answers in writing to them; one of whom, (John Mason,) observed that this might be done, but he thought it would be ineffectual, as he conceived the commission could not be executed without one commissioner on each side. The defendant, however, waited on Marshall and Gunn, and requested them to send their answers to the commissioners or to seal them up, and intrust them to him to be delivered in court. They declined either, and Gunn declared he would not attend as a witness, unless compelled; and observed that as neither of the commissioners for the prosecution attended, the commission was no longer obligatory. The defendant waited in Washington until all the witnesses had gone. He further swore, that all those witnesses were material; in particular Gunn, Bingham and Pinckney; that he had intended to serve process on Bingham as a witness, but before process served, he unexpectedly embarked on board ship, and sailed to parts beyond sea. It appeared further, that many of the witnesses who had refused to attend the commission at Washington, came afterwards to Philadelphia; and that in particular, it was known to the defendant that U. Tracey was in Philadelphia, and yet no subpœna served.

Dickerson & Cooper, for defendant, insisted that Duane had used due diligence; and being deprived of the evidence necessary for his defence, by the refusal of the witnesses to attend, and the commission failing by the act of the commissioners for the prosecution, he ought not to be forced to trial this term.

Mr. Ingersoll, for United States, contended that the commission was a mere courtesy, assented to by him freely; and however defeated as to its object, the prosecution ought not to stop. That Duane had not proceeded on it for three months after October session. Had he taken it out in time, and the commissioners for the United States declined, a new one might have been sent to willing commissioners; but he delayed to the very rising of congress.

Before TILGHMAN, Chief Judge, and GRIFFITH and BASSETT, Circuit Judges.

GRIFFITH, Circuit Judge. This indictment found in October last against William Duane for a libel on the senate of the United States, was then ready to be tried on the part of the public prosecutor. The defendant professed to be unprepared, and on his affidavit proving the allegation, the trial was postponed in his favor until this term. The public prosecutor is now ready to proceed, and the defendant again asks that the prosecution may be suspended until October next. His counsel have insisted with much earnestness upon some topics which are immaterial in law or unfounded in fact. His situation was represented as a hard one, owing to the obstacles in the way of procuring his evidence, such as the limited jurisdiction of the court not affording him compulsory process—the remoteness and dispersion of the witnesses, who, he alleges, will justify the truth of the libel—the improbability of his being able to bring the members of the senate, implicated in the libel, into court to criminate themselves. As to all these representations, whether true or false, they furnish no grounds upon which this court, sitting to try crimes committed, and found by a grand-jury within their jurisdiction, can act. The editor of a paper who deliberately publishes to the world a charge which immediately affects the character of an individual, or brings the government into hatred or contempt, should be prepared to prove an accusation voluntarily made, and, whilst subsisting, followed with private distresses or public calamity. He acts at his peril—he knows his authority. He knows, or should know, what aid he can have by law, to procure his evidence; he can foresee the hardship, (if there be one,) of his not being able to get witnesses from other states, or authorised to compel men to furnish evidence against themselves. An offender would seldom be brought to trial, if his swearing to the materiality of witnesses out of the reach of the court, and showing some pains to procure their attendance, were grounds for its postponement. Where witnesses are out of the jurisdiction of the court, and there is no well-grounded expectation of procuring their testimony at another time, a trial is not to be deferred; for it is a standing requisite in such cases, and must appear on oath, that the party has a reasonable expectation of procuring their testimony at the next court. Now the defendant's affidavit is, in this particular, defective; and his counsel have said, that they do not expect the attendance of these witnesses. The defendant then, had he used the utmost diligence to procure the evidence of these witnesses, all residing beyond the process of the court, and not bound to answer interrogatories on a commission, must have failed in his application; but in fact there appears the greatest negligence even on this point. Mr. Ingersoll, the attorney for the United States, on the suggestion of the defendant that he was desirous of examining a number of senators, (the witnesses now sworn to be material,) immediately, and at the last October term, consented he should take out a commission for that purpose. This was mere matter of favour, and certainly very liberal in the prosecutor. The congress met at Washington on the 17th of November, 1800. The defendant, instead of sending down the commission to take the answers of the witnesses, delayed even the issuing of it until the 16th of February, 1801, four months after it was agreed to, and three months after the meeting of the senate, and when they were about rising. At this time, his counsel made a new application to Mr. Ingersoll, to assent to the commission's then issuing, which he immediately complied with, and each party nominated two commissioners. The commission issued directed to the four commissioners, or any two of them, "one however being of each nomination." From this history, it is evident that the defendant did nothing to insure the success of his commission until the last moment. If the question then turned, in my idea of it, upon the general facts of the witnesses being beyond the process of the court and the diligence of the party, I should think there was not a shadow of right in favor of the motion. But I am of opinion that this application must prevail, because the commission which did issue on the 15th of February, was rendered abortive by the acts of the commissioners named on the part of the prosecutor. Those for the defendant accepted; Mr. Lee, one of the commissioners for the United States, declined; Mr. Otis, the other, took on him the commission, and met once; all the witnesses were summoned before them; none attended except Mr. H. Marshall, and an adjournment was agreed upon. Mr. Otis left town on the very day to which the business was adjourned; of consequence, the commission being joint, and requiring one of each nomination, could not be executed by the two commissioners for the defendant. It has been said the defendant lost no evidence by this; for the senators had refused to attend on the first summons, and it was well known, they did not mean to subject themselves to answer the defendant's interrogatories, and so well convinced was he of it, that he did not summon them to appear on the adjournment. The truth of this inference is not clear. Had Mr. Otis met the other commissioners, they might have executed the commission, at least in part; the senators might have been prevailed on to give in their answers. The act of the commissioner in departing, defeated any further prosecution of the commission. But the defendant's affidavit goes to establish a strong probability that he lost the testimony of General Gunn, by the departure of Mr. Otis. He swears General Gunn was a very material witness, and had promised to give in his answer, but that on waiting upon him to attend the commissioners on the adjourned day, he declined, and assigned as one of his reasons, "That the commissioners had no authority to proceed now that Mr. Otis was gone." If this representation be true, it does appear that the non-execution of the commission arose from the non-attendance of the commissioner on the part of the United States, and that too after he had accepted the office. On this ground, and on this only, I am of opinion the cause ought to be continued. In this view of it, it is evident that the requisites usually called for in the affidavit to postpone a cause, are not in question, as here the case turns not on the conduct and circumstances of the party calling for a postponement, but upon the omission and acts of the prosecutor or agents of the prosecutor, who insists on a trial. If I doubted in a case of this sort, that would determine me to allow the continuance, because attended with no inconsiderable inconvenience, and avoiding even the appearance of hardship; but the delay must be on the terms of the offer made by the defendant's counsel, to take a trial in October at all events.

BASSETT, Circuit Judge. I feel myself bound on this occasion, though with regret, to disagree with my brother. He has stated the facts relative to the conduct of the defendant, and admits that he has not only used very little diligence to get the commission executed, but on the contrary is chargeable with the greatest neglect. It is said, indeed, that from and after the 15th of February, he took some pains and was disappointed in the effect of his commission, by the departure of Mr. Otis from the seat of government. But why did he postpone it so long? He knew congress must rise on the 3d of March. Had he gone earlier in the winter, the commissioner for the United States would have been under no necessity of leaving the city; or if he did, another might have been substituted. A party who has once postponed a cause should not come again with such a story as this. He should show that he has done every thing in his power to perform. There will never be a trial of an offender, if such excuses are received. Besides, the affidavit is radically defective. It wants the asseveration that the party expects to be able to procure the attendance of the witnesses at the next court. This is an indispensable requisite; it is reasonable, and sanctioned by long usage, for if he does not expect to have their testimony, why delay the trial for their absence at this time; and his counsel have said they do not expect it. I think there is not sufficient ground for further delay, and therefore am against the motion.

TILGHMAN, Chief Judge. The defendant certainly has used very little foresight or diligence in getting the commission executed, which was with so much candour agreed to by Mr. Ingersoll in October term last. He delayed for several months; the only reason assigned for it is, that his counsel, Mr. Dallas, was to be at Washington in February, and he wished to avail himself of his attention on the execution of it. This may be so. It appears, however, that he took out the commission and had the commissioners nominated on the 15th of February, and from that time no laches are imputable to him; and in fact, he found all the witnesses whom he proposed to examine, at Washington. The commission is not executed or returned, and it appears that this has happened from the non-attendance of Mr. Otis, one of the commissioners for the United States. For this reason, I am of opinion a continuance should be ordered. Had the defendant not relied on the execution of the commission, he might possibly have used other means of procuring testimony, if he had any; and therefore ought now to have that opportunity. The ground on which I go, is the conduct of the commissioner for the United States, in defeating the commission, unintentionally no doubt, but with all the possible consequences of designed dereliction. It will be seen that I do not go upon the ground of the conduct of the defendant. His affidavit would be insufficient had he not shown irregularity in the proceeding of the other party. Much has been said relative to the hardship of drawing his justification from the lips of his prosecutors, the members of the senate. I deliver no opinion, whether they can be compelled to give evidence on this indictment. But the defendant has no right to complain of this. If he will libel men without any other means of proving the matter than from themselves, he takes the risk on himself. The defendant's counsel must take their motion, upon the condition, however, of a peremptory trial next term. Without this offer, I should be against the motion, as the commission was not of right.

Case No. 14,997.

UNITED STATES v. DUANE.

[Wall., Sr., 102.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. May 22, 1801.

CONTEMPT — PUBLICATION REFLECTING ON COURT AND PARTIES—JUDGMENT.

[Cited in U. S. v. Jacobi, Case No. 15,460, to the point that contempts are crimes and may be prosecuted as such.]

[This was an action on the case for a libel on the plaintiff in the case of Hollingsworth v. Duane, in the Aurora, a newspaper published by William Duane, the defendant. A motion to postpone the trial was denied. Case No. 6,614. The trial then proceeded, the main question being as to whether the defendant was a citizen of the United States or an alien. The verdict of the jury was to the effect that the defendant was not a citizen of the United States, but an alien, and subject of the king of Great Britain. Id. 6,615. Subsequently the counsel for the defendant moved to set aside the verdict because the foreman of the jury was an alien. The motion was overruled. Case No. 6,618. See Cases Nos. 6,616, 6,617, 14,996, and 16,654, all on questions as to contempt of court during the proceedings in this case.]

The attachment ordered in the preceding case [Case No. 6,616] being immediately served, and the defendant taken into custody, he was admitted to bail on his own recognizance in 500 dollars, to appear tomorrow morning to answer to the contempt.

He appeared accordingly, and was asked whether he desired interrogatories; his counsel said he did not. Being therefore in contempt on the proofs before the court, Mr. Dallas, his counsel, was heard in extenuation of the offence. He made a long and ingenious commentary on the paper, not by way of vindicating it, for he confessed it was indecent and contemptuous, and unauthorized by the proceedings on the trial; but with a view to extenuate. He undertook to show that the defendant had been provoked and irritated into this imprudent step, by a publication in Wayne's Gazette of the United States, the day after the trial.

TILGHMAN, Chief Judge. A motion was made by the counsel for Levi Hollingsworth, for a rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue against you, grounded on an affidavit of your having made a publication in the newspaper called the Aurora, which was supposed to be a contempt of this court. You appeared in court, on the day appointed for showing cause, and when the prosecutor was about to offer evidence in support of the rule, you voluntarily declared that you confessed yourself the author of the publication in the Aurora. The counsel for the prosecutor were then heard in support of the rule, and your counsel made an elaborate and ingenious argument against it. The court delivered their opinion yesterday, that you had been guilty of a contempt, and made the rule absolute. You were then informed, that if you wished to answer interrogatories, it was your right and your privilege to have them exhibited by the prosecutor; and that if, by your answer on oath, you cleared yourself of the contempt, it would be received as the truth, notwithstanding the evidence that had been produced against you, and you would be discharged from all further proceedings. You requested time to consider of it, which was granted you; and you have this day declared that you do not wish the interrogatories to be exhibited.

Before I pronounce the judgment of the court, I will briefly mention the circumstances of your case. Levi Hollingsworth brought an action against you for a libel. You pleaded, that both he and you were citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, and therefore the circuit court of the United States had no jurisdiction. The plaintiff replied, that you were not a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania, but a subject of the king of Great Britain; and on that point issue was joined. The cause came to trial this term. The jury were sworn, and evidence offered on both sides, after which it was agreed between the counsel, that the cause should be submitted to the jury, under the charge of the court, without argument. In consequence of this agreement, after premising that the court were always desirous of receiving information from the arguments of learned counsel, and that if your counsel on reflection were dissatisfied with the court's decision, they might either take a bill of exceptions, or move for a new trial, I delivered their clear and unanimous opinion, that upon the evidence produced, taking it in the most favourable point of view for you, you were to be considered a British subject. The jury, having received this charge, retired for a few minutes, and returned with a verdict in conformity to it. The court have already declared, and I now repeat it, that though your plea was put in on oath, the verdict of the jury against you is no imputation on your moral character. The truth of your plea depended on matter of law, and supposing that the law was in your favour, you might very innocently have sworn to it as you did. In pursuance of an agreement between the counsel, the jury did not assess the plaintiff's damages. The counsel then made another agreement, that the damages should be assessed by a special or struck jury next term, and that you should have liberty to offer any evidence in mitigation of damages, which might legally be given in evidence on the general issue joined Your counsel have candidly declared, that in the whole course of these proceedings, you received from the court that liberal and impartial treatment, which we do not consider as matter of favour, but the strict right of every one who appears before us. Under these circumstances, the action being still depending, the damages (the great object of the suit) remaining to be assessed, you made a publication in your own paper, the Aurora, in which, after mentioning the decision which had recently taken place, you endeavored to draw public odium on the plaintiff, by representing him as a man who had been guilty of treason, and saved from the gallows by the lenity of the late chief justice of Pennsylvania. You asserted that the respectable jury who tried your cause had given a most infamous verdict; and you made insinuations, too plain to be misunderstood, that no justice was to be expected by citizens of republican principles, in a trial by struck jury, and under the system for the administration of justice, established by the existing law of the United States, which you indecently styled "Mr. Adams's judiciary law." The evident tendency of your whole publication was to vilify and degrade the character of the plaintiff, and thereby to lessen his damages; to deter the counsel of the plaintiff, the clerk of the court, and the future jury, from doing their duty; and to intimidate the court themselves, if they were susceptible of intimidation, which most surely they are not, from whatever quarter or by whatever means it may be attempted. All the world must be sensible that proceedings of this kind tend to subvert the foundations of justice. If judges and jurors, parties and their counsel, be subjected, during the pendency of suits, to the aspersions and unrestrained publications of the press, what, but the destruction of the trial by jury, must ensue? I mean the impartiality, the purity, the independence of that trial. Some men may be found so fortified by nature or habit, as to be above all influence of that kind. But how many honest and honourable minds will either wholly withdraw themselves from taking any part in the administration of justice, or shrink from the free and unbiased discharge of their office, if it be permitted that they should be held up to the world as degraded, corrupt, and infamous? Jurors are not volunteers; they are called here by compulsion of law, and generally give their attendance to the great detriment of their private affairs. They are therefore more strongly entitled to protection. If they remain unprotected, they will soon learn to despise the process of a court which will be itself contemptible, and relinquish an inconvenient duty, subjecting them to calumny and disgrace. These consequences will follow, in a greater or less degree, with reference to the judges, the jury, the counsel, the officers concerned in returning jurors, and all who may be necessarily employed in the administration of justice. If therefore the trial by jury is to be preserved; if the rights of suitors are to be protected touching their dearest interests, of property, life, or character; courts of justice must prevent all discussions, all interference, or reflections in newspapers, while causes are depending. This is equally the privilege and security of both parties; and the support of it is the common cause of every virtuous man in the community. In order to afford complete security, it is absolutely necessary to restrain and punish offences of this kind in a summary manner, and in a summary manner they have been punished, from the earliest times to the present day. There is nothing contrary to this mode of proceeding in the constitution of the United States, though it declares that the trial of all crimes shall be by jury. By fair construction this is only to be intended of those crimes which by our former laws and customs had been tried by jury. This construction has been universally received by the courts of the United States, and by the courts of the several states, whose particular constitutions contain a similar provision. It was determined very solemnly in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Com. v. Oswald [1 Dall. (1 U. S.) 317]. The present governor of Pennsylvania was then chief justice. He is well versed in the general principles of the law, as well as the usages and customs of the United States, and cannot be supposed to have favored constructions unfriendly to true liberty, or unwarranted by the genuine sense of the constitution. The principles established in Oswald's Case, are too strongly founded to be shaken; and I can say with certainty, that for the last seven years, they have been considered and acted upon as the undoubted law of Pennsylvania. The statutes of the United States expressly give to their courts the power of punishing contempts by fine or imprisonment at their discretion, and whoever attends to the expressions in those statutes, will easily perceive that they recognize a summary mode of proceeding. We confine ourselves within the ancient limits of the law, recently retraced by legislative provisions and judicial decisions. You have alleged, by way of extenuation of your offence, that you were provoked to it, by an abusive publication in Wayne's paper. But, if you were ill-treated by Mr. Wayne, you should have applied to the law for redress, and not have revenged yourself, by attacking Mr. Hollingsworth, the jury, the counsel, the officers, and the court. To give your apology its utmost force, it amounts but to this; that you acted under the impulse of passion. The court have taken that circumstance into consideration; at the same time, I think myself bound to declare, that passion is no justification of an offence, and cannot go far, even in extenuation. If a plea of that kind were allowed, men of violent tempers would have no inducement to restrain them I am satisfied that on reflection, you yourself must be sensible that you have acted with extreme impropriety. Your case is attended with circumstances of far greater aggravation than Oswald's. But though the court have power to punish at discretion, it is far from their inclination to crush you, by an oppressive fine, or lasting imprisonment. They hope and believe offences of this kind will be prevented in future by a general conviction of their destructive tendency, and by an assurance that the court possess both the power and the resolution to punish them. Upon the whole, the judgment of the court is, that you be imprisoned for thirty days including this day, that you pay the costs of the prosecution, and that you stand committed till this judgment be complied with.

UNITED STATES v. DUFFY et al.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 164.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1804.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSIONS—LARCENY—PROPERTY IN GOODS STOLEN.

1. A confession upon oath, before a magistrate, cannot be given in evidence against the prisoner.

2. Possession is prima facie evidence of property.

Indictment [against Thomas Duffy, alias Rustick, and Christopher Duffy] for stealing a cable.

Mr. Taylor, for United States, produced Mr. Hoffman, the magistrate, to prove what the prisoners had testified before him on an examination of John Duffy, on a charge of stealing the cable; to show that they, being examined separately, had given opposite and inconsistent accounts of the cable, and to show their confession upon oath before the magistrate.

THE COURT refused to admit the testimony, upon the authority of 1 McNally, Ev. 47, rule 12; Buller, N. P. 242; Leach, Crown Cas. (1st Ed.; Irish) 248.

The indictment charged the cable to be of the goods and chattels of one Andry.

Mr. Swann, for defendants, contended that the jury must be satisfied that Andry had a general or special property, and that its being in Andry's boat, is not sufficient evidence of property.

THE COURT directed the jury, that a qualified property was sufficient, and that the testimony of its being taken from Andry's vessel is competent to go to the jury, and that they must decide whether Andry had a qualified property in the cable.

UNITED STATES v. DULANY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 510.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1808.

CRIMINAL LAW — INDICTMENT — INDORSEMENT OF PROSECUTOR'S NAME.

When a presentment for a misdemeanor is found by the grand jury without the name of a prosecutor, the court will order an indictment to be sent up without the indorsement of a prosecutor, upon the suggestion of the attorney of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Jones, the attorney for the District, to send up an indictment [against Benjamin Dulany] to the grand jury upon a presentment made by them, no person being indorsed as prosecutor, THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) said that in such cases, upon the motion of the attorney for the United States, they would order indictments to be sent up without a prosecutor's name being indorsed, upon the attorney's suggesting that in his opinion the cases require such interposition.

Mr. Jones replied that he could not undertake to give any opinion, but he should never make a motion in any case which should appear to him to be malicious or trifling.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 571.] [1]

CRIMINAL LAW—SECURITY FOR COSTS.

The prosecutor must give security for costs.

Mr. Youngs, for defendant [John Peyton Dulany], moved to stay the trial until the prosecutor give security for costs according to rule No. 29, in the rule-book: the prosecutor (Dr. Spohn) having removed from the District and having no property. Granted.

UNITED STATES v. DULUTH et al.

[1 Dill. 469 [2] 10 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 449.]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. 1871.

NAVIGABLE WATERS — POWERS OF NATIONAL AND STATE GOVERNMENTS OVER—INJUNCTION.

1. The United States may bring an injunction bill, in the proper circuit court, to protect improvements, which she is making under the authority of congress, in navigable waters, from injury which will be caused by works of internal improvement within state limits, and by state authority. The power of the federal government, when called into exercise, is, in such cases, not only paramount but exclusive, and cannot lawfully be interfered with to any extent.

[Distinguished in U. S. v. Beef Slough Manuf'g, etc., Co., Case No. 14,559. Cited in Louisiana State Lottery Co. v. Fitzpatrick, Id. 8,541; U. S. v. Mississippi, etc., Boom Co., 3 Fed. 552.]

2. Whether the work prosecuted under state authority will have the effect to interfere with that prosecuted under the federal authority, is a question of fact upon which the opinions of the government engineers, while entitled to great consideration, are not conclusive.

3. Where the injury threatened is of a character not easily remedied, if the injunction be refused, and there is no denial that the act charged is contemplated, a temporary injunction should be granted, unless the case made by the bill is satisfactorily refuted.

[Cited in Wilkinson v. Tilden, 9 Fed. 684; Lee v. Simpson, 37 Fed. 15.]

[Cited in Pioneer Wood-Pulp Co. v. Bensley, 70 Wis. 482, 36 N. W. 321.]

The United States, by her attorney for the district of Minnesota, who acts under the direction of the attorney general, brings this bill in chancery in the circuit court for that district, for an injunction against the defendants. The facts stated in the bill are briefly these: That the government of the United States, by means of appropriations made by congress, is making certain improvements at the mouth of the St. Louis river, intended to keep open and to deepen the channel at that point, between the western end of Lake Superior and the body of water called Superior Bay. This bay is separated from the main body of the lake by a narrow tongue of land, a few hundred yards in width, starting from the Minnesota shore on the north, and projecting itself south toward the Wisconsin shore about six miles. Between the southern extremity of this narrow strip of land, called Minnesota Point, and the Wisconsin shore of the lake, the St. Louis river and the waters of Superior Bay make an outlet into Lake Superior, and through the outlet or channel (for the St. Louis river here makes a current), vessels navigating the lakes, make their way to the harbor of Superior city, Wisconsin, and to the inner harbor of the city of Duluth. This latter city is situated in the state of Minnesota, at the upper end of Minnesota Point, and has not only its harbor in Superior Bay, but has its wharf on the lake, where vessels receive and discharge their cargoes. The improvements on which the United States have been at work for two or three years, are at the mouth of the St. Louis river, between the south end of Minnesota Point and the Wisconsin shore, and, as the bill alleges, are intended to narrow the channel at that point, by piers on each side of it, that the body of water carried by the St. Louis river and the Bay of Superior, through the channel, may be increased in velocity so as to deepen the channel and keep it free from the deposits which have a tendency to fill it up, and thus obstruct the entrance and exit of vessels into and from Superior Bay. The bill then alleges that the defendants are engaged in cutting a canal across the upper end of Minnesota Point, near Duluth, through which the waters of Superior Bay will flow into Lake Superior, and by which the current of the St. Louis river, now flowing through the outlet already described, will be diverted into the canal, and that the result will be to render ineffectual the efforts of the United States to protect and deepen the natural channel at the mouth of the St. Louis river, and to cause it to be filled up, so as to become incapable of navigation. To prevent this result, the court is asked to enjoin the defendants from the further prosecution of work on the canal.

Mr. Davis, U. S. Dist. Atty., for Minnesota, with whom was Mr. Barlow, Atty. Gen., of Wisconsin, and Mr. Spooner, for the United States.

Mr. Cornell, Atty. Gen., for Minnesota, and Mr. Masterson, for the city of Duluth.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

MILLER, Circuit Justice. While the defendants do not deny the right of the United States to come as a party plaintiff into her own courts, to seek protection for her own interests, they claim that the real plaintiffs in this suit are the state of Wisconsin and the city of Superior, while the United States are mere nominal parties, and that the proceeding is instigated by rivalry and jealousy, and has for its purpose the injury of Duluth by impeding the growth of her commerce, by checking the improvement of her harbor, to which the canal is essential.

Of all this the court can know nothing, judicially. The present suit was authorized by the proper officer of the government, namely: the attorney general, and, in doing so, he appears to have acted on the request of the engineering bureau having in charge the work threatened with injury. This injury, if the allegations of the bill be true, is a direct interference by the defendants, with the operations of the federal government in the improvement of the navigation of the lake at that point.

We cannot assume that the government of the United States, or its officers who bring this suit, are governed by a spirit of hostility to Duluth, nor can we make that the subject of inquiry on this occasion.

If the allegations of the bill be true, we have no doubt of the right of the officers of the federal government to bring this suit in the name of the United States, to protect her rights, and deem it a much more appropriate mode of doing so than by the physical force of the war department.

That the protection, improvement, and general control of the navigable waters of the United States are within the constitutional competency of congress, there can be no doubt. This power has been so often asserted, both in congress and in the supreme court, that reference to adjudged cases would be an affectation of learning. No one has denied this for many years past, and it is not denied by counsel on the present occasion.

It is, however, asserted that the states have a concurrent right to authorize improvements on the navigable waters of the United States in which their citizens are interested, so far as these waters lie within their territorial limits; and it is shown by affidavits, and by the statutes of Minnesota, that the canal here complained of is authorized by said state, and is important to her commerce, and is within her territory. That such a power can be exercised by the states may be admitted, when it does not injure the general interest of commerce, and when it does not conflict with any control assumed by the federal government over the same locality.

But all the reported cases which concede this power in the states agree that it exists only while the congress of the United States refrains from the assertion of its authority, and that, when the latter is called into exercise, it is not only paramount, but exclusive. Such is the principle asserted by the supreme court in Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 35, and in Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 713, and in Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 299, in all of which the question is thoroughly examined.

Nor can any doubts be entertained, from the facts before us, that the congress of the United States has called into exercise the federal power in the improvement of the navigation between Lake Superior and Superior Bay. They have made appropriations for this purpose more than once, one of which is so recent as the month of March last, which is yet unexpended, and the mode of expending this money, being confided by congress to certain officers of the government, it must be held that whatever is done by them in furtherance of that purpose, is done under the authority of congress. It is, however, claimed that inasmuch as congress, in the same bill which contains the last appropriation referred to, also appropriated a like sum for the improvement of the harbor of Duluth, it is to be inferred that congress thereby recognized the canal now complained of as a legitimate work.

In support of this view, reference is made to a joint resolution of the Minnesota legislature, in response to which it is claimed this latter appropriation was made. But we can draw no such inference from the action of congress; for, while that joint resolution does mention this canal, with other matters, as one mode of improving the Duluth harbor, and declares that the system under which congress was seeking to improve the entrance to Superior Bay (which was supposed to be as useful to Duluth as to Superior city) is a failure, it does not appear that congress adopted these views, for it left both appropriations under the control of the engineer corps of the war department, which, both then and now, continue to assert that the work at the mouth of St. Louis river is the true mode of improving the entrance to Superior Bay, in which are the harbors of Superior city and of Duluth. We must hold, then, that this work is authorized by the congress of the United States, and is prosecuted under their authority, and that the canal is not.

The remaining question to be considered is, whether the allegation of the bill, that this canal will seriously interfere with that work, is sustained by the evidence before us.

In this aspect of the case it is to be understood that although no answer to the bill is filed, we have admitted counter affidavits.

The complainant supports the bill by the reports of the engineer bureau, and by the affidavits of the officers of that corps engaged on the work, and by those of other civil engineers.

The defendants have a large number of affidavits showing that no such effect on that work will follow the opening of the canal, as is alleged in the bill.

It is urged by counsel for complainant that the reports of the engineers and their statements, made as is claimed on accurate surveys, should be held conclusive. But while we concede that their action in determining the best mode of improving the entrance to the bay cannot be questioned here, we cannot give such effect to their opinions on the question of the influence of the canal on that improvement, though we concede to their opinion the value which their station and character merit.

The affidavits on both sides are numerous. They demonstrate what all courts and juries have so often felt, that where the question is one of opinion and not of fact, though that opinion should be founded on scientific principles or professional skill, the inquiry is painfully unsatisfactory, and the answers strangely contradictory.

In this emergency I am relieved by a principle which has generally governed me, and which, I believe, governs nearly all judges, in applications for preliminary injunctions. It is that, when the danger or injury threatened is of a character which cannot be easily remedied if the injunction is refused, and there is no denial that the act charged is contemplated, the temporary injunction should be granted, unless the case made by the bill is satisfactorily refuted by the defendant. In this case I am not satisfied that it is so refuted. I am inclined, personally, to believe that the effect of opening the canal without the breakwater, or some other protection to the natural action of the flow of water through it, will tend to fill up the channel at the mouth of the river.

It is said in answer to this, that no irreparable damage can ensue from making the canal, and that more injury will result to defendants from stopping the work, than can arise from its completion. But I do not agree that the damage, if there shall be any from the canal, can be repaired without immense difficulty, and probably, not at all. While the canal might be closed with great expense, the deposits which may have accumulated at the mouth of the river, before the question is settled, may never be removed, or the removal may be too costly to justify the attempt. And, in a case of interference with the authority of the federal government, the court cannot consider the relative amount of injury to accrue to the party thus interfering, and to the government. Such a principle would tend to encourage interference with federal authority, when it ought to be repressed.

On the other hand, if, on the final hearing, it shall be made to appear that complainants are mistaken, the injunction can be dissolved, and the work completed. And the truth in the matter can, in the meantime, be ascertained by accurate surveys, and calculations impartially made, either by officers of the government, or by competent engineers appointed by the court, or by depositions subject to cross-examination, so that when the court comes to decide, it will have the subject within its control, and will have something more than ex parte affidavits, some of which are, by no means, clear or precise in their statements. Or if, before the final hearing, it shall be made to appear in the manner indicated, or in any other manner satisfactory to the court, that the canal can be protected by a breakwater, so as to prevent the too rapid diversion of water from the bay, or can, in any other manner, be completed without injury to the government works, and the complainants put their work in that condition, the injunction may be modified or dissolved.

In conclusion, I take the liberty of saying that, since congress has taken this matter in hand by appropriating money for the improvement of these harbors, it should cause the adoption of some comprehensive plan for the improvement of both harbors, and not leave it to the conflicting interest of the two cities, or to the adverse action of the state and federal authorities.

Nor can I doubt, if the defendants here should ask of the department in charge of these improvements, a careful inquiry into the plan which they believe essential to their interests, that some mode of prosecuting such improvement would be found which would meet the approval of that department, and obviate the necessity of a final decision by this court.

I am happy in the assistance of Judge DILLON, of this circuit, on the hearing of this application, and in his concurrence in these views.

An injunction according to the prayer, will be allowed. Ordered accordingly.

NOTE. At the June term, 1871, by consent of the war department, and of the attorney general, the injunction was dissolved on the filing of a bond by the city of Duluth, in the sum of $100,000, conditioned that the city should complete and maintain a dyke across the Bay of Superior, from Minnesota Point to Rice's Point, by the first day of December, 1871, and complete the canal according to plans to be approved by the chief of engineers or the war department. The bond was filed, the injunction dissolved, and further proceedings in the suit stayed.

UNITED STATES v. DUNCAN et al.

[4 McLean, 99.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1846.

DOWER—PROVISION IN WILL IN LIEU OF DOWER—ELECTION—RENUNCIATION—WHEN TO BE MADE.

1. Dower is a clear legal right, and can not be divested except upon full knowledge of the widow's rights.

2. If she accept what by the will is given in lieu of dower, not knowing the extent of the estate, she may renounce under the will, and claim, after the lapse of years. And in some cases, where it shall be necessary, she may bring a suit to ascertain the true condition of the estate, to enable her to make a proper election.

[Cited in Cribben v. Cribben, 136 Ill. 609, 27 N. E. 71; Valentine v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 79 Wis. 585, 48 N. W. 856.]

3. The statute of Illinois, declaring "that any provision in the will bars dower," must have a reasonable construction.

4. To bar dower, the amount must be such as to afford a reasonable presumption that it was given in lieu of dower.

5. Unless the will shall be express on the subject, a small amount of personal property, the estate being large, not sufficient.

[Distinguished in Warren v. Warren, 148 Ill. 647, 36 N. E. 611.]

In equity.

Mr. Butterfield, for United States.

Mr. Harden, for defendant.

BY THE COURT. This bill was filed by the United States to subject the lands of Gen. Duncan, deceased, to the payment of liabilities incurred by him as a security for Linn, who was a receiver of public moneys at Vandalia, and who was a defaulter to a large amount, for which a judgment was obtained against Duncan. And this bill was brought to investigate the title to the lands of Duncan's estate, ascertain the extent of his interests, and remove all embarrassments. The question now raised and discussed, and which we are to decide, is, whether the widow of Gen. Duncan is entitled to dower. That the statute gives her dower in all the real estate of her deceased husband, as well that which he held by contract as that which he held by deed in fee simple, is not disputed; but it is alleged that she is barred under the will. By the will, Mrs. Duncan received a considerable amount of personal property, and, it seems, she has not renounced this right to claim her dower under the statute. On the part of the government, it is contended that where at common law a devise is made in lieu of dower, in a reasonable time, the widow must make her election to claim dower, or she will be barred. 8 Paige, 328; 4 Kent, Comm. 57. He says, "It is likewise settled, that a collateral satisfaction, consisting of money or other chattel interests, given by will and accepted by the wife after her husband's death, will constitute an equitable bar of dower." She may make her election to claim dower, some years after her husband's death, and where she has received that which was intended to be in lieu of dower, if she acted in any degree in ignorance of her rights. But where she has acted with a full knowledge of her rights, in the acceptance of the testamentary provision instead of her dower, she will be bound by her acceptance.

But the question is, whether the bequest referred to, was given, or intended to be given, in lieu of dower. Certain real estate had been conveyed to Mrs. Duncan, to secure her against contingencies, which was greatly below the estate she brought to her husband. This can in no sense be considered operating against her claim of dower. It was only returning to his wife a part of the estate which she had in her own right, and which he came into the possession of by marriage.

It is argued that it was the intent of the testator to give personal property in lieu of dower. But there is no expression in the will which authorizes such an inference, unless it be the simple fact, of bequeathing the personal property. In deciding this question, regard must be had to the condition of the parties. Gen. Duncan was a man of large property, and at the time of his death, in all probability, expected to be relieved, in some form, from a part of his suretyship. He seems only to have been embarrassed on this account. It is true, the Revised Statutes of Illinois of 1833, p. 624, "declare that any provision by will bars dower, unless it be otherwise expressed in the will, and unless the widow in six months renounces the provision." Now this provision must have a reasonable construction. Will it be contended that any bequest in the will to the wife, however small, will bar dower? Such could not have been the intention of the legislature. And if this construction be not sustainable, is there any other rule than that the bequest should be such as would be a reasonable compensation for dower in the real estate? Can the wife be divested of her dower, which is a legal right, on any other principle? Is she barred of her dower, if she accept a gift of five or twenty dollars, or some piece of furniture under the will from her dying husband, as an evidence of his affection? Certainly she is not. Where any property was bequeathed to the wife, which from the amount, might be presumed under the statute to be in lieu of dower, and there was nothing in the will to contradict this presumption, she would be bound by it, ordinarily, unless her election of dower were made in six months. This appears to be a reasonable construction of the statute, which will effectuate the intention of the legislature. In treating upon this subject, Mr. Justice Story, in his treatise on Equity (section 1088), says: "If a testator should bequeath property to his wife, manifestly with the intention of its being in satisfaction of her dower, it would create a case of election. But such an intention must be clear and free from ambiguity. And it would not be inferred from the mere fact of the testator's making a general disposition of all his property, although he should give his wife a legacy; for he might intend to give only what was strictly his own, subject to dower. There is no repugnancy in such a bequest." "Besides," he says, "the right to dower being in itself a clear, legal right, an intent to exclude that right by a voluntary gift, ought to be demonstrated, either by express words, or by clear and manifest implication." This is the substance of the authorities on this subject. In Birmingham v. Kirwan, 2 Schoales & L. 452, in the clear language of Lord Reddesdale, the above doctrine is forcibly illustrated. 10 Pick. 510. In Clark v. Sewell, 3 Atk. 97, it is said, "What is given by a will, ought, from the character of the instrument, ordinarily be deemed as given as a mere bounty, unless a contrary intention is apparent on the face of the instrument," "or, as it has been well expressed, whatever has been given by a will is prima facie, to be intended as a bounty or benevolence." But there seems to have been a renunciation under the will after the lapse of eighteen months, which, it is contended, is too late, as the statute requires it to be done in six months. Here, too, the statute must receive a reasonable construction. Suppose the widow remains in utter ignorance of the estate of her husband, and has no means within the time limited, to ascertain the facts which would enable her to make an election. It has often been held, that years, under certain circumstances, may be allowed for this election. That the widow may file her bill to obtain a knowledge of the estate. That where she has been in possession of the bequest for years, under an ignorance of the estate, she may renounce under the will and claim dower.

From the nature of the case, it must be perceived that there are cases in which the election could not be made in six months, and it would not be extending the principles of equity beyond their legitimate limits, in such cases of hardship, to relieve the widow. The estate of Gen. Duncan was large, and by the suretyship named, much embarrassed. It was impossible to understand the extent of the property and the nature of his liabilities, it would seem, in six months, so as to determine this matter. Upon the whole, when we consider the small amount of the personal property bequeathed, one-third of which belonged to the widow, the presumption can not arise, that the bequest was given in lieu of dower. And no fair construction of the statute would bring such a case within it. We think Mrs. Duncan is indowable of the lands of her husband, and commissioners will be appointed to set it off, unless an arrangement on the subject shall be made.

[The value of the widow's dower was agreed upon and amicably settled. See Case No. 15,003 for a settlement of the priorities of the various creditors, including the United States.]

Case No. 15,003.

UNITED STATES v. DUNCAN.

[4 McLean, 607.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. Dec. Term, 1850.

JUDGMENT—LIEN ON REAL ESTATE—PARTNERSHIP—APPROPRIATION OF ASSETS TO PAY INDIVIDUAL DEBTS—UNITED STATES—PRIORITY OF CLAIM—JUDICIAL SALE.

1. The judgments at law and charges in chancery of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Illinois, institute a lien throughout the state, on the real estate of the party against whom they are rendered. This doctrine treated as the law of this court until the supreme court shall establish a different rule.

2. A person who, at a judicial sale, purchases a tract of land as the property of the party against whom the judgment is obtained, and pays the purchase money to the plaintiff, can not as a general thing, call on him for re-payment.

3. A sale of real estate of D had taken place under a decree of this court. O became the purchaser of a piece of land and paid the purchase money to the plaintiffs, but discovering that D had no title to the land, made application to the court to have the purchase money reimbursed out of moneys of the plaintiffs in court. Held, that in the absence of fraud and unfair dealing, this could not be done, but that being a judicial rule, O must take the consequences of a defect or failure of title; and that the remedy was in equity against D or his legal representatives.

[Cited in Brunner v. Brenan, 49 Ind. 100.]

4. If one partner withdraws funds from the partnership and pays the taxes on his private estate, the creditors of the partnership do not, in general, thereby acquire a lien on the land. The estate of the partner is still his own private property, and in case of his death, passes to his heirs or devisees, subject to that debt as to others; and if his executors make a similar appropriation of the partnership funds, the rule is the same.

5. Where it was alleged that A & B were partners, and after A's death his executors appropriate partnership property to the payment of taxes on his estate, and in expenses of administration, he being at the time of his death insolvent and indebted to the United States, in judgments and otherwise, which judgments were a lien on the real estate of A, the lien of the United States and their priority of payment were not thereby affected, but they could enforce their judgments notwithstanding the acts of the executors.

6. Where the partnership property is not sufficient to pay the debts of the firm, the priority of the United States does not reach the undivided interest of one of the partners in the partnership effects, if he is indebted to the United States, but when it has become his separate, individual property, the rule would be different. The true test is, whether the property belong to the partnership or the individual.

7. The creditors of a partnership applied to the state court by bill, to declare the partnership and decree the payment of the partnership debts out of assets in the hands of the administrator of one of the partners who had died insolvent, indebted to the United States. The administrator denied the partnership and took an objection based on the debts of the United States and their priority. The state court decreed in accordance with the prayer of the bill. The United States were not parties and did not appear in the state court. Held, that the proceedings in the state court did not impair the rights of the United States, and that they were not bound by them, but that notwithstanding the decree in the state court, the priority of the government attached and that whenever the proceeds of any real estate, or any personal estate came into the hands of the administrator, he became a trustee for the United States, and they must first be paid.

8. The acts of congress giving the United States a priority of payment supersede all state laws upon the subject of the distribution of those estates that come within their provisions. The law makes no exception in favor of a particular class of creditors, and the priority of the United States does not yield to the claims of any creditors, however high may be the dignity of their debts.

[Cited in U. S. v. Drennan, Case No. 14,992.]

9. In June, 1841, the United States reversed judgments in this court against D, subsequently in 1841 and 1842 other creditors obtained judgments in a state court against him. These last judgments were liens only on the real estate of D, situate in the county where the judgments were rendered. In 1846 the United States obtained a decree in this court directing all of D's real property in the state, to be sold to pay an indebtedness to the United States independent of the judgments of 1841. D died in 1844, his whole property not being sufficient to pay the debts due the government. Under the decree of 1846, various sales took place of real estate out of the county in which the other creditors had their judgments, and there was a fund in court arising from these sales sufficient to pay the judgments of the other creditors. The United States having made out executions on the judgments of 1841 and levied them on lands situate in the county where the other creditors held their judgments, these creditors made application to this court to compel the United States to go on lands out of that county to satisfy their judgments, or for the proceeds of the lands sold, out of that county. Held, that however it might be in the case of private individuals, the United States having an older lien, made perfect by a levy, were entitled to return it and sell the property to satisfy the judgments of 1841, and that the other creditors had no claim upon the proceeds in court.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Lewis, Case No. 15,595.]

10. It is a rule well recognized and understood, that where a party has a lien for a debt on two funds, and another party has a lien on one of the funds only, a court of equity will oblige the party who has the double fund to resort in the first instance, for payment, to that fund upon which the other party has no lien. But this is never done when it trenches on the rights or operates to the prejudice of the party entitled to the double fund.

11. But this rule does not affect, under the circumstances of this case the priority of the United States, neither is that priority affected by the suit settled in New York, that lands consisting of different parcels, subject to a general incumbrance, are, in equity, to be charged in the inverse order of the alienation of the several funds.

12. The case of Schryver v. Teller, 9 Paige, 173, examined and distinguished from this.

13. It has been uniformly held in all the cases that the priority of the United States does not disturb any specific lien, nor the forfeited lien of a judgment, that is, it does not supersede a mortgage on land, nor a judgment made perfect by the issue of an execution and a levy on real estate. But in the case of a general lien it is not so clear.

14. The laws of the United States giving a priority to the government, are of general application in the cases therein stated, and if a debtor is to be excepted out of the general rule, it devolves upon the party alleging the exception to show it.

In equity.

Mr. Williams, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Smith & Brown, for petitioners.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. In the year 1835, Joseph Duncan, whose representatives are the defendants in this case, became one of the sureties of William Linn, receiver of public monies at Vandalia, in this state. The principal having failed to comply with the duties imposed on him by law, the sureties became liable in the bond given to the United States. At the June term, 1841, of this court, the United States recovered three several judgments at law against the sureties. Duncan, among others, for the aggregate sum of $29,191 05. At the time these judgments were obtained, none of the sureties, except Duncan, had any available property, and Linn, the principal, was insolvent. On the 22d of December, 1843, the United States realized on these judgments the sum of $23,532 65. In January, 1844, Joseph Duncan died, disposing by will, of his real and personal estate, but making no provision other than the usual one for the payment of his debts, for the amount due the United States. At the time of his death, he was seized of a great many tracts of land lying in different counties of this state, and in Morgan county, his place of residence. The judgments of 1841, in this court, not covering the defalcation of Linn, the plaintiffs instituted suit at law, to the December term of this court, 1844, against William Thomas, as administrator, etc., of Joseph Duncan, the executors having resigned or ceased to act; and at that term recovered judgment against the administrator, de bonis testatoris, for the sum of $48,151 61. In February, 1846, the United States filed a bill in this court, setting forth most of the facts detailed above, and asking for a discovery of the title papers and estate of Duncan; insisting upon the priority of the plaintiffs; and praying for an account of the money due the United States; of the personal estate of Duncan; and of the value, rents and profits of the real estate; and that if the personal estate was not sufficient, the real estate might be sold to pay the debt due the plaintiffs. To this bill, the widow, heirs, executors, devisees, etc., of Duncan were made parties. During the progress of the cause, the value of the widow's dower was agreed upon and amicably settled, and she relinquished. [See Case No. 15,002.] Answers were put in by the defendants, and at the June term, 1846, a decree was rendered in favor of the United States for the sum of $49,156 15 (that being all that was due except what had not been collected under the judgments of 1841), and ordering the real estate of Duncan to be sold, and the proceeds to be paid to the United States, "first paying prior liens, if any." Under this decree, various sales of real estate out of Morgan county have taken place, under the direction of a commissioner, for which very considerable sums have been realized, part of which have been paid over to the United States, but there remains the sum of $4,052 subject to the order of the court. [See Case No. 15,005.] Personal property to the amount of $300 was sold under the judgment of 1844.

There were two judgments recovered against Duncan in his life time, in the circuit court of Morgan county, of this state, one by McConnell and others for $333 76, in November, 1841, and the other by Matthews for $497 35 in March, 1842. On the 10th of November, 1845, Doremas, Suydam & Nixon filed a bill in the same court against William Thomas, administrator, etc. of Duncan's estate, alleging that certain personal property which the executors of Duncan had sold, and the proceeds of which, amounting to $960 60, it seems they had applied to the payment of taxes on real estate and expenses of administration, belonged to a firm of which one James M. Duncan and Joseph Duncan, in his life time, were partners, and that the plaintiffs were creditors of that firm, and claiming that they (Doremas, Suydam & Nixon) should be re-paid the money so used by the executors, and that they should be substituted in their place; insisting it was a former claim. James M. Duncan, also one of the sureties of Linn, was a party to this bill, but he was insolvent. The administrator in his answer denied the partnership, and referred to the claim of the United States and their priority, and to the proceedings in this court, which he set forth at length; but the circuit court of Morgan county, by a decree rendered on the 17th November, 1847, found that the partnership did exist, as stated in the bill; that at the death of Duncan, the goods and chattels referred to, and the proceeds of which had gone into the hands of the executors, were liable for the partnership debts, wherever traced, and ordered that the plaintiffs should be paid out of the estate of Duncan. To Doremas & Nixon, $766 48; to Wm. A. Ranson & Co., $194 12. The latter had been made parties and Suydam had died pending the suit. The court further adjudged that inasmuch as it did not appear the administrator had any assets in his hands, he should pay the above sums out of assets thereafter to come into his hands, or which might remain in his hands after the settlement of his accounts as administrator. It is proper to add, that an objection was made in the answer of Thomas, because the United States were not made parties, but the court decided that it was not necessary to make them parties.

It was conceded that the judgments of 1841, rendered in this court, were a lien on all the real estate of Duncan within the state; that the decree of June term, 1846, operated to the same extent, upon the real estate in the hands of the heirs, devisees, executors, etc., of Duncan;[2] and that the judgments of the Morgan circuit court operated only upon real estate within the county of Morgan. The judgments and decrees rendered in the circuit court of Morgan county, are yet in force, not being paid or satisfied, except some partial payments hereafter mentioned. The judgments at law of this court recovered in 1841, being only paid in part, the United States in 1847 issued alias executions on those judgments, and the marshal levied them on lands lying in Morgan county of which Duncan had been seized, and they were sold by the plaintiffs.

Joseph Duncan, at the time of his death, did not possess sufficient property, including real and personal, to discharge the debt he owed the United States, the lands out of Morgan county not being of value enough to satisfy the decree of June term, 1846. And it does not appear that there was more than sufficient property in Morgan county, to meet the balance due on the judgments of 1841 of this court. In this condition stood the case, when, on the 15th of June, 1847, McConnell et al. and Matthews filed their petition in this court. The petition of McConnell et al. alleges that under the decree of 1846, sales of lands without the county of Morgan had taken place, upon which had been made $3,555 20, which, it insists ought to be, as to the lien of their judgment, a credit on the judgments at law of the United States of June, 1841—that there are lands out of the county of Morgan more than sufficient to satisfy those judgments, and that the United States are proceeding to sell real estate in Morgan county. The petition calls for the interposition of the court to arrest the sale; to marshal the securities so as to give them the benefit of their lien, by throwing the judgments of the United States of 1841, upon lands out of Morgan county and that the sum made $3,555 20 be applied upon those judgments. The petition of Matthews is, in all respects, similar to that of McConnell et al. A fi. fa. had issued on the judgment of McConnell, and $60 00 had been obtained on it. A fi. fa. had also issued on the judgment of Matthews, and real estate had been levied on, and $393 00 made by the sale of it. The executions in each case were issued within a year after the judgments were obtained respectively. On the 23d of December, 1847, Doremas & Nixon, and A. Ranson & Co., likewise filed a petition setting forth most of the facts heretofore mentioned, and alleging that this court had taken full administration of the estate of Duncan—that their decree of the Morgan court of November, 1847, had been rendered useless—that there was no priority of payment to the United States, till the estate was ready to be disbursed—that taxes and costs of administration were to be first paid—that under the circumstances they stand as the state and individuals, and were clothed with their rights—that there was more real estate to be sold, and their partnership fund had increased the amount to be disbursed in this cause—and asking that their decree be paid out of money received from the sale of real and personal estate, or, if that be not proper, that the commissioner of this court be ordered to sell land enough to satisfy the sum named in their decree, and pay it over to them.

Various supplemental petitions were filed by all the parties, from time to time, bringing before the court the proceedings that have since taken place in this cause, and particularly stating that other lands, out of Morgan county had been sold, under the decree of June, 1846, and the money received, and that the sum of $3,789 56 was made by sale of land in Morgan county under the judgment of 1841. The petition of O'Donoghue, which was filed on the 10th of January, 1849, states that he had purchased a lot of land at a sale made by the commissioner in this cause, which lot was sold as a part of the estate of Duncan; that he paid the commissioner for it, and that Duncan had no title to it, having before his death by deed duly recorded, conveyed it to the Illinois College, and he seeks to have the sale by the commissioner annulled, and to have the money paid by him reimbursed out of the fund in court. When these petitions were presented, this court, without determining the questions sought to be raised by them, ordered that a sufficient fund should be reserved to satisfy their claims, which was to be paid to the petitioners, provided the court should be of opinion upon the final disposition of the cause, that the parties were entitled to receive the amounts they sought. And there is now a fund of more than four thousand dollars awaiting the decision of the questions presented by these petitioners.

These are the material facts: The applications were once heard before the former judge of this court, but no decision was given or order entered. They have therefore been fully argued before me, and it now becomes my duty to announce my opinions upon the different questions presented. The counsel of the United States, not denying the allegations contained in the petitions, insists that the petitioners are not entitled to the relief they seek, nor to any relief. As the petition of O'Donoghue stands upon a footing entirely different from the others, it may be convenient to consider that first. The sale under which he purchased the lot was made by the order of this court, and it is well settled that in all judicial sales there is no warranty; but that the rule of caveat emptor applies. Owings v. Thompson, 3 Scam. 502. If there be fraud or concealment or any unfair dealing, that may be a ground for an application to a court of equity; otherwise the purchaser must look to the soundness of his title. This is the established rule in England and throughout the United States, and it should be peculiarly applicable here, where it is so easy to trace the title to real estate, the sources, in nearly all cases, being the public records of the country. It is true where a plaintiff in an execution purchases a tract of land, belonging apparently, or which he supposes to belong to the defendant, and there is, in fact, no title, a court will interpose and place the parties in their former condition. But that is because it is a matter between themselves; the purchase having neither benefited nor injured any third person: and it has been decided, that where there was no fraud and a stranger to the execution purchased a piece of land as the property of the defendant, where he had no title, a court of equity would compel the judgment debtor to refund the amount to the purchaser, on the ground that his purchase had paid the debt. But no case has been shown in which, under such circumstances, the purchaser could call upon the plaintiff in the execution to refund the amount. Indeed the case just mentioned is conclusive that he could not, for it is because the sale must so far stand as to enable the plaintiff to retain the money paid, that the defendant is liable. It could make no difference, that the money, instead of being in the hands of the party, was held by the officer or paid into court. In either case, it would seem, the right of the party to the fruits of his judgment could not be contested.

But conceding that this last position may be questionable, still after the money has actually been paid to the party, it is beyond the reach of the purchaser. Here the money paid by the petitioner has been received by the plaintiff, and he seeks to make another fund, now in court, arising from the sale of other property belonging to the estate of Duncan, liable to the claim.

On the part of the petitioner the court was referred to Lansing v. Quackenbush, 5 Cow. 38, a case where the defendant had represented he was the owner of lots, which the party purchased, and it turned out he was not. On application to the court, they said there was a remedy but that it was in equity. Here was a false statement, and if the plaintiff were not a party to it, the remedy would be against the defendant. Adams v. Smith, Id. 280, was also referred to. In this case the sheriff had sold personal property which did not belong to the defendant, and the real owner sued the sheriff and plaintiff jointly and recovered. The court allowed the amount made on the sale and indorsed on the execution, to be stricken out and an execution to issue for the amount of the original judgment. In this case it was personal property, and the owner resorted to the remedy which the law gave him, the property remaining with the purchaser. Both cases are very shortly reported and clearly distinguishable from the present. But the supreme court of Illinois have held, under somewhat similar circumstances, there was no remedy against the plaintiff in the execution. A party purchased some property under an execution. A stranger sued for and recovered the property from the purchaser. The latter then brought suit against the plaintiff in the execution to recover back the purchase money. The court decided that the plaintiff was not liable. England v. Clark, 4 Scam. 486. These were all cases of personal property, but in a sale of real estate under execution, no action is brought, because if the property of A is sold on an execution against B the title to the property is unchanged, and A ordinarily suffers no wrong. In a very recent case, however,—Dunn v. Frazier, 8 Blackf. 432,—this question was directly decided. That was a much stronger case than this. A judgment had been obtained and an execution was issued and returned nulla bona, and afterward the judgment creditor filed a petition alleging that the judgment debtor was the owner of certain real estate in fee simple. On the application of the petitioner the court ordered the real estate to be sold on execution. It was sold accordingly, and Frazier became the purchaser. One of the administrators of the judgment debtor was present at the sale, and solicited Frazier to buy, assuring him that the title was good. Various proceedings took place, during which Dunn, the judgment creditor, transferred the judgment to one Adams, and Frazier refused to pay the purchase money. Another execution was issued which was enjoined. Finally Frazier paid part of the money to Adams and the remainder into court, (to the clerk). The judgment debtor had no title to the property. These facts being made to appear to the court below, by bill in chancery, it ordered the money to be paid back to Frazier, but the supreme court of Indiana reversed the decree, on the distinct ground that a purchaser who buys land and pays the money, the judgment creditor receiving it, can not recover it back from the creditor, either at law or in equity, merely because the judgment debtor had no title to the land. The proper course in such a case was to proceed against the judgment debtor or his estate by bill in equity. And even in relation to the money in court, it depended altogether upon the fact whether there was anything due on the judgment, or it was an overplus, in which last count it might be paid over to the purchaser. And see Warner v. Helm, 1 Gilman, 220. It will be seen, therefore, from these principles and authorities, the petitioner, while he has no claim upon the fund now in court, has a remedy against the estate of Duncan. That it may be unavailing is his misfortune. If the petitioner obtain the money he has paid, it must be by the voluntary act of the plaintiff, and not by the order of this court.

Let us now proceed to consider the petition of Doremas & Nixon, and A. Ranson & Co. They insist that, inasmuch as there was a partnership between James M. and Joseph Duncan, and the executors of Joseph Duncan had used the partnership goods to pay the taxes on his real estate, and the expenses of administration, they, as creditors of the partnership, have a right to be repaid out of the fund in court. There can be no doubt that the partnership effects are primarily liable for the partnership debts, and that those effects ought not to be appropriated to the payment of the separate liabilities of one of the partners. And if the executors knowingly diverted them in the manner charged in the bill filed in the circuit court of the state, they acted illegally. But conceding this, it does not follow that the partnership creditors thereby obtained a lien upon the separate property of Duncan. No authority has been referred to which shows that if one partner withdraws funds from the partnership, and pays the taxes on his private estate, the creditors of the firm thereby acquire a lien on the land, unless, indeed, the decree on which the application now under consideration is founded may be so regarded. All that can be said is, that the estate of the partner becomes liable to the creditor of the firm. The estate of the partner is still his own private property, and, in case of his death, passes to his heirs or devisees, subject, if he has used the partnership funds for the purpose mentioned, to that debt as to others. Story, Partn. §§ 97, 326, 358–361. Neither would the use of the partnership funds by the executors, in the expenses of administration, create any lien upon the estate. It would still be a debt due from the estate. And, if the creditor of the firm were placed in the condition of those individuals to whom those expenses had been paid, it is doubtful whether that circumstance, for reasons presently to be given, would affect the question.

It has been decided that the priority of the United States does not reach the property of a partner in partnership effects, so as to pay the separate debt of one of the partners (he being the debtor of the United States) when the partnership property is not sufficient to pay the debts of the firm. U. S. v. Hack, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 271. But that proceeds upon the presumption that they are partnership effects. It is plain, if they had ceased to be such, and had become the separate property of the one indebted to the United States, the doctrine would be different. The true test would seem to be whether the property belonged to the firm or the individual. Now it is to be remarked that these petitioners did not ask the court of Morgan county to do more than to declare the partnership, and to decree the payment of the partnership debt out of assets which were at that time, or thereafter to be, in the hands of the administrator. They claimed, at most, not a lien on the estate, but a priority of payment out of the estate. And the court, though it expresses the opinion that the funds of the partnership effects were liable to the debts of the petitioners where ever they could be traced, decides they were to be paid out of the estate of the testator. Accordingly, in whatever light we may regard this decree of the circuit court of Morgan county, it is clear it intended that payment of the debts was to be made out of Duncan's estate, when there should be sufficient assets for that purpose in the hands of the administrator. The court does not even decree that the petitioners shall be first paid, but there is an alternative that they may be paid, when the administrator, upon the settlement of his accounts as such, shall have money then remaining in his hands. The decree did not create any lien, specific or general, upon any fund, nor upon the real estate of the testator, as it probably could not; and it does not vary essentially from the usual judgment against an administrator for the debt of a deceased party. Though an objection was taken to the proceedings in Morgan county, because the United States were not made parties, it is said that the decree is binding on them in this court in this application, on the part of the petitioners. Let us now examine this position, and endeavor to ascertain whether this is so.

At the time of Joseph Duncan's death, his indebtedness to the United States, except the balance due on the judgments at law of this court, of 1841, did not constitute a lien upon his real or personal estate. The plaintiffs had only a right to a priority of payment. And it may be admitted, for the purpose of this argument, that their priority did not extend, in point of law, so as to operate upon the real estate of which Duncan died seized, in the hands of heirs or devisees. But at the time the petitioners filed their bill in the circuit court of Morgan county, there was a judgment of this court against William Thomas, as the administrator with the will annexed, etc., of Duncan, and at the time the final decree was rendered in the circuit court of Morgan county, there was and had been for more than a year, a decree standing in this court, which took effect upon all the real estate of Duncan within the state, and directed it all to be sold for the payment of the debts of the United States, first paying prior liens. When this decree was rendered in June, 1846, the claims of the petitioners were certainly not a prior lien binding the estate. If, then, we give effect to the decree in the state court, we are not the less bound to give full effect to the judgments and decree in this court; and we will now proceed to show that it must be considered subject to those of this court; that under the law and by virtue of the proceedings here, the decree of the circuit court of Morgan county could not become operative until the claims in this court were satisfied. The petitioners have not sought to enforce their decree in the state court; indeed, so long as there is nothing in the hands of the administrator, it would not, by its terms, be enforced. They come into this court and request its action on their claims.

By the 5th section of the act of 3d March, 1797, it is provided, that where any revenue officer, or other person, hereafter becoming indebted to the United States, by bond or otherwise, shall become insolvent, or where the estate of any deceased debtor, in the hands of executors or administrators, shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased, the debt due to the United States shall be first satisfied. 1 Stat. 515. This applies to two classes of debtors. Those who are insolvent, and those, whose estates, in the hands of executors or administrators, are not sufficient to discharge all the debts due from the estate. It was intended to reach the property of the debtor, whether living or dead. It has been decided that this section is applicable to all debtors of the United States. Joseph Duncan's estate was the estate of a deceased debtor of the United States, and when it comes within the other requisition of the act, that is, whenever it came into the hands of executors or administrators, then the operation of the law was complete. The doctrine of the supreme court of the United States, as founded on this law and a similar one (Act March 2, 1799, § 65 [1 Stat. 676]), as it respects this point is, that the party, whether assignee, executor or administrator, into whose hands the estate of the two classes of debtors mentioned, passes, becomes a trustee for the United States, and from the fund in his hands, they must first be paid. Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Delaware, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 102; Brent v. Bank of Washington, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 596. If it be admitted that the priority of the United States did not extend to the real estate of Duncan, in the hands of heirs or devisees, as already stated, because it does not attach as against them, still when the real estate or the proceeds thereof passed to, or vested by law in, the hands of the executors or administrators, the priority did attach. U. S. v. Crookshank, 1 Edw. Ch. 233. Consequently, whenever the proceeds of any real estate, or any personal estate came into the hands of Thomas, as the administrator, he, having notice of the debt due the government, became a trustee for the United States, and was obliged to pay them first, independent of the judgment of December term, 1844, and the decree of June term, 1846, of this court. These merely determined the amount of the debt, but in no degree changed his duty in the premises.

It is to be observed that this law of congress supersedes all state laws upon the subject of the distribution of those estates that come within its provisions. The language of the supreme court of the United States, in Thilluson v. Smith, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 396, is, that there is no exception made by the law in favor of a particular class of creditors. And the same court, in Connel v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 444, say, that the priority of the United States does not yield to any class of creditors, however high may be the dignity of their debts. It follows, then, if these principles are correct, that the claims of the petitioners cannot bind any funds in the hands of the administrator, nor any lands sold under the judgments or the decree in chancery of this court, nor the proceeds of the same, notwithstanding the decree of the circuit court of Morgan county; for whatever may be the effect of this last decree, it can not operate, under the circumstances, so as to impair the rights of the United States. Field v. U. S., 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 182.

The remaining question is as to the effect of the judgments at law of the circuit court of Morgan county. As the rights of the petitioners, whose claims we are now to consider, depend upon the same principle, we will examine them together. This, then, was the position of the parties. The United States had judgments binding all the lands of Duncan throughout the state, prior, in point of time, to the judgment of McConnell and others, and that of Matthews, which last two judgments were binding only on lands in Morgan county; and the United States had a decree subsequent and subordinate to both, but which, in extent, had the advantage of operating, like the judgments of June, 1841, throughout the state. The petitioners insist they have a right to throw the judgments of 1841 upon lands without the county of Morgan. They assert that at the time their judgments became liens upon the real estate in Morgan county, the United States, having also judgments which were liens upon that land, and which were, besides, liens upon lands out of Morgan county, are compelled to go upon these last mentioned lands upon the principle, well recognized and understood, that where a party has a lien for a debt on two funds, and another party has a lien on one of the funds only, a court of equity will oblige the party who has the double fund, to resort, in the first instance, for payment to that fund, upon which the other party has no lien. And it is contended that the circumstance of the United States procuring a decree binding the lands out of Morgan county, before the application is made here, can make no difference. Another principle is also involved, which may be considered settled law in New York at least, that where there is a general incumbrance upon distinct parcels of land, and the owner aliens them at different times to different persons, the parcel last sold is to be first charged to its full value to pay the general incumbrance, and so on backwards. The argument is this: If Duncan had mortgaged all his lands in the state to the United States, for the payment of thirty thousand dollars, and then had mortgaged his lands in Morgan county to these petitioners for the amount of their judgments, and afterward all his lands out of Morgan county to the United States for forty-nine thousand dollars, these lands out of Morgan county, being the last aliened, are, according to the doctrine above mentioned, to be first charged with the payment of the sum first named. And it can make no difference, it is said, if, instead of mortgaging the lands out of Morgan county, he had mortgaged all of his lands in the state over again; because, it will be seen, in order to adapt it to this case, we must include all the land, the decree of 1846 of this court binding the lands in Morgan county as well as elsewhere. It is urged that these being judgments, the principle is the same. This is stating the proposition fully, and carrying the analogy to as great an extent in favor of the petitioners as was contended for by their counsel in the argument.

The doctrine that where a man owns different parcels of land, and transfers some of them, himself also retaining some, all the parcels being subject, before the transfer, to a general incumbrance made by him, the part which he still retains shall be applied to the payment or discharge of that general incumbrance, rather than that which he has transferred, is founded on the plainest principles of equity. It would be manifestly unjust that those persons to whom he had made transfers should be compelled to pay off the incumbrance, when he held land which would satisfy it. Accordingly, it has been held, under such circumstances, that the property transferred is only liable, in the event of the part remaining in the owner not being sufficient to discharge the incumbrance. On the other hand, the doctrine already mentioned as settled in New York, that land consisting of different parcels, subject to a general incumbrance, is in equity to be charged in the inverse order of the alienation of the several parcels, has been sometimes questioned, and Judge Story thinks it is not maintainable upon principle, and inclines to the opinion that there should be contribution, in such cases, according to the relative value of the estates. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 634a, 1233a. The New York doctrine was pressed very far in the case of Schryver v. Teller, 9 Paige, 173, and as that was cited in the argument by the counsel of the petitioners, and considered conclusively settling the principles which should govern this case, it may not be improper to give it a particular examination. In that case, the owner of two parcels of land—one at Coxsackie, the other at Redhook—having encumbered both by judgments, and each by mortgages, on the 28th of May, 1840, mortgaged the Coxsackie property, and on the 7th of July following mortgaged it again to another person. On the 9th of June, of the same year, he mortgaged the Redhook property, and again on the 12th of the same month, this last being given to the same persons that held the mortgage of the 7th of July on the Coxsackie property. On the 3d of June, 1840, a judgment was docketed, which was a lien on both. The parties who held the mortgage of the 7th of July on the Coxsackie property, and those who held the mortgage of the 9th of June on the Redhook property, at different times and in different courts, filed bills for foreclosure, and at different dates obtained the usual decrees for sale of the property, the master having reported as to the priority of the several liens. On the 2d of March, 1841, the Redhook property was sold for an amount sufficient to satisfy all the liens on it prior in point of time to the mortgage of the 28th of May, 1840, on the Coxsackie property. On the 23d of March, 1841, this last property was sold for an amount not sufficient to pay the costs of foreclosure and the mortgage of 28th of May, if the previous judgments, as well as the prior specific liens on that property were paid out of such sale. Under these circumstances the holder of the mortgage of the 28th of May, made application to the court for a modification of the original decree, so as to throw the judgments on the surplus proceeds of the Redhook property, after satisfying all liens thereon prior to his mortgage. The court allowed the application on the ground that as the Redhook property was more than sufficient to pay all liens on it prior to the date of the applicant's mortgage, in case the judgment creditors, who held liens at that time, sought to enforce them on the Redhook property, if the applicant paid them, he would have a right in equity to insist on an assignment of them, so that he might have a repayment out of the surplus funds, in preference to those who had liens on that property accruing after the date of his mortgage. For instance, the judgment creditors had liens on both properties, when his mortgage was taken on one. (Coxsackie.) If, in enforcing these liens it would prejudice his mortgage, he would have a right in equity to compel them to go upon the Redhook property, because certainly, he could be in no better position by taking an assignment of the judgments than those who held them. Let us suppose the case put had actually happened—that the applicant had purchased the judgments; then he would be the holder of judgments binding on both properties and of a mortgage on one. The doctrine of the court is that in this condition, he could go upon the Redhook property to satisfy his judgments in preference to one who had a lien on that property accruing after his mortgage. The court illustrated it by saying; if there had been a mortgage on both properties, and it had been foreclosed, the decree would require the property to be sold separately, and the proceeds so to be marshalled as to pay general liens on the whole, out of that part of the fund arising from the sale of the Redhook property, thus far giving the applicant the benefit of his priority on the Coxsackie property over a subsequent incumbrancer of the Redhook property.

In the case just cited there was a general incumbrance binding both parcels, also specific incumbrances binding each, and a transfer made of one and then the other; and it seems to proceed upon the principle, that inasmuch, as at the time when the transfer was made of one of the parcels, the party would have the right to compel the general incumbrancer to go upon the parcel not affected by the transfer, no subsequent act of the owner in relation to that other parcel could change his rights. Whether it would make any difference if the general incumbrance and the transfer of the second parcel were held by the same person, does not appear; but it is certain, he would, in one sense, come within the qualification of limitation of the rule laid down by Judge Story. He says that though the rule—that is if a creditor has two funds he shall take his satisfaction out of that fund upon which another creditor has no lien—is so general, it is never applied, except where it can be done without justice to the person who has the double fund as well as the debtor. It is never done when it trenches upon the rights or operates to the prejudice of the party entitled to the double fund. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 558–560, 633. The object is to satisfy both creditors. It is apparent, however, whenever the double fund is insufficient to pay all the claims against it, and the same person has the right to proceed against both, and against one alone, it does affect the right of the party entitled to the double fund. For example, in this case, the United States have a general lien upon different parcels of land; creditors—the petitioners—have also a general lien upon some of the parcels; and the United States have a lien which may well be considered specific upon all the parcels. Now it is plain if the creditors turn the general lien of the United States over to the lands not bound by the lien of the creditors, under the facts of this case, it diminishes by so much the fund which is to satisfy the decree of 1846. In other words, whatever is paid to the petitioners is an absolute loss to the plaintiff. Notwithstanding such would be the effect, in this case, upon the party entitled to the double fund, it may be questionable whether the circumstance of taking a subsequent lien, could or ought to place them in a better position; certainly not if the true reason be given for the rule in the case in Paige. To apply the argument of that case to this;—if these petitioners had paid off the balance due on the judgments of the plaintiffs of 1841, they would have the right in equity to insist upon an assignment thereof. The case of Schryver v. Teller, 9 Paige, 173, if he admit it was rightly ruled, must be regarded as deciding that a general lien will be thrown upon a particular parcel of land so as to give a party having a mortgage the benefit of his priority over subsequent incumbrances either of the whole or a part; that is where the question is dependant upon priority of time alone. But it does not follow that this would be the rule where there is a priority of right—that is in a case where the parties as such, do not stand upon an equality of right.

Let us, therefore, examine how far the character of the parties in this case, affects the question. The plaintiffs constitute the sovereign power of the country, and, according to the jurisprudence of most states, under certain circumstances are entitled as a creditor to peculiar privileges. It was so under the Roman law; is so under the law of England, and under our own. We must bear in mind that the statutes giving the government a priority are presumed to have for their object the public good, and are, therefore, to be liberally construed. U. S. v. State Bank of North Carolina, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 29; Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Delaware, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 134. The application was presented in this case, after a levy had been issued by the United States, upon lands in Morgan county, under executions issued on the judgments of 1841. The lands were sold and the money appropriated upon those judgments, subsequent to the filing of the original petitions, as appears by the supplemental petitions. This court did not interfere with the proceedings under the executions, but suffered them to continue, and directed that there should be reserved a sufficient fund to meet the claim of the petitioners, from what might be made by the sale of lands in this case. The rights of the petitioners ought, perhaps, for that reason, to be considered the same as if the money arising from the sale of the Morgan lands, had been paid into court, subject to its order herein. And, apparently, it should be governed by the same principles, as if the petitioners, instead of pursuing the course they have, had applied to a court of equity to restrain the proceedings on the executions—waiving for the purpose of the supposed case all objections on account of sovereignty—and the United States had come and given, in answer, the decree of 1846, the indebtedness of Duncan's estate; in fine stating all the facts and claiming a priority of payments under the law.

It would seem upon principles as well as by the authority of adjudged cases—if we throw out of view the decree of 1846 and the question of sovereignty—there could be no doubt of the right of the judgment creditors to compel the plaintiffs to look to lands out of Morgan county, not bound by their lien, for the satisfaction of the balance due the United States upon the judgments of 1841, for in that case there would be property sufficient to pay both. It is true, technically speaking, the petitioners, if they paid the judgments of 1841, could not compel the plaintiffs to assign those judgments to them, because they could not directly reach the United States. Hill v. U. S., 9 How. [50 U. S.] 386. But if this difficulty were avoided, the question is whether the decree of 1846, which operated specifically upon lands not affected by the judgments of the petitioners, changes the principle. It must be conceded the question is not free from embarrassment in consequence of the difficulty of extracting from the various cases which have been decided, the true rule of interpretation of the acts of congress, laid down by the supreme court. The petitioners had taken out executions on their judgments within a year after they were rendered; on one some real estate—not in question here—had been sold, on the other a small payment had been made, as to the balances due on them respectively, the judgments became general liens. It has been uniformly held in all the cases that the priority of the United States does not disturb any specific lien, nor the perfected lien of a judgment, that is it does not supercede a mortgage on land, nor a judgment made perfect by the issue of an execution and a levy on land. Thelluson v. Smith, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 396; Cunard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 386. But in the case of a general lien it is not so clear.

The case of Thelluson v. Smith, if it is not considered, as in some respects, overruled by the case of Cunard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., certainly establishes the doctrine that the priority of the United States does not yield to a judgment which is a general lien upon real estate. The facts were, that Thelluson and others received a judgment against Crammel, which it was admitted by the court, was a lien upon his lands on the 30th of May, 1805. Afterwards he made an assignment of all his estate, being insolvent, and in debt to the United States so as to bring him within the operation of the acts of congress. The United States subsequently brought suit against him, had judgment, sued out execution, levied on and sold an estate called Sedgely, admitted to be bound by the judgment of May 20th, 1805. The marshal having received the proceeds, Thelluson and others brought suit against him. They had not issued execution nor levied on the estate by virtue of their judgment. One of the questions made in the case was, whether the United States were entitled to be paid in preference to the judgment creditor? This the supreme court decided in the affirmative, concluding by saying, "a judgment gives the judgment creditor a lien on the debtor's lands, and a preference over all subsequent judgment creditors. But the act of congress defeats this preference." This was under the act of 1799, but we have already seen that in this respect it is like the act of 1797. This case was particularly examined and reviewed in Cunard v. Atlantic Ins. Co. It is there said that Thelluson v. Smith was a case where a judgment creditor sought to recover the proceeds of a sale of land made under an adverse execution, on the ground that he had a general lien by judgment on the land; and in such circumstances the action was not maintained. The real ground of the decision, the court says, was that the judgment creditors had never made his lien specific; that he had no title to the proceeds in his property; and if they were to be deemed general funds of the debtor, the priority of the United States attached; that a mere lien on land did not convey the legal title to the proceeds of a sale made under an adverse execution; the case did not establish the principle that a specific lien could be displaced by the priority of the United States, because that priority was not of itself equivalent to a lien. Judge Johnson, in his reported opinion, says, that he never acknowledged the authority of the case of Thelluson v. Smith on the point supposed to be decided by it, the precedence of the right of the United States as to a previous judgment in the case of a general assignment, and that he concurred in it only because of the want of privity between the parties. He thought the sale of the Sedgely estate under the execution was a nullity, because the assignment of Crummond divested all his interest, so as to place it beyond the reach of the execution issued on the judgment of the United States. Suppose, however, the assignees in whom the estate had vested, admitting it had vested, had sold it, notwithstanding the lien, then, according to my understanding of the case of Thelluson v. Smith, also as corrected and explained in Cunard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., the proceeds of the sale, in the hands of the assignees, would have been subject to the priority of the United States. As in this case, if the lands in Morgan county had been sold by the executors or administrator, under the authority of the will or the law, the proceeds would have been liable, not to the judgment creditors (the petitioners), but to the United States; it being understood in all such cases that the executor or administrator in whose hands were the proceeds, had notice of the debt due the government. In Cunard v. Atlantic Ins. Co. the court are careful to say the priority of the United States does not affect any specific lien; but in the case of Brant v. Bank of Washington, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 596, the court state that it has never been decided that the priority of the United States affects any lien, general or specific, existing when the event happened which gave them the priority.

Suppose, then, the case of Thelluson v. Smith may be considered as shaken, and, indeed, overruled, about which some doubt may be entertained, so far as it gives a preference to the United States over the general lien of a judgment creditor, it would follow that the judgments of these petitioners would not be affected by the mere force of the statute of 1797; and, possibly, we might go further, and say they would not be affected by any mere judgment or decree in favor of the United States, or the indebtedness of Duncan's estate, rendered after the date of the judgments of the petitioners. But this court is asked to go some further; to say that the United States shall forego their lien of 1841, superior to that of the petitioners, as to the lands in Morgan county, and sell a part of the lands bound by their decree of 1846, out of that county, so that the petitioners may be paid in preference to the plaintiffs. This, it seems to me, can not be done. The United States are entitled to all their legal rights; and, in the case supposed, of an application to a court of equity, to say to the judgment creditors: We will enforce our lien of older date than yours, made specific by a levy before you applied to the court; we will retain our lien under the decree of 1846 upon the lands out of Morgan county; we are not to be regarded as ordinary individual creditors of the estate; your rights must yield to ours. The same answer to the application of the petitioners must be given in this court. If they have a lien, so have the United States; and to decide that, under the circumstances of this case, the latter could not enforce their judgments of 1841, would be to say, in effect, they had no priority of payment at all, but they must stand upon an equal footing with the other creditors; to prevent which was the very object of that portion of the statutes of 1797 and 1799, already referred to.

We have been told their lien can not be displaced by that which is not a lien, the priority of the plaintiffs. It is not. There is not only a priority, but that priority has been perfected into specific liens. If it be said that, discarding the decree of 1846, the United States might be regarded as individuals and thrown on the lands out of Morgan county for the satisfaction of their judgments of 1841, and they ought, consequently, to be treated in the same manner, notwithstanding that decree; if the first could be done, the other would not necessarily follow, and the reason is, in the former case, the United States would be paid, in the latter not; and the law is imperative they shall be first paid when the estate of any deceased debtor, in the hands of executors or administrators, is insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased. And certainly the lands of the deceased debtor, when these petitioners made their application to this court, were as strongly bound by the claim of the United States, as the proceeds of them could have been in the hands of executors or administrators. The laws of the United States giving a priority to the government are of general application, in the cases therein stated, and if a debtor is to be excepted out of the general rule, it devolves upon the party alleging the exception, to show it. I think these petitioners have not satisfactorily established their right to be withdrawn from the ordinary predicament of creditors, when they come in competition with the claims of the government. In all such cases, it is manifest congress intended to give priority of payment to the United States over all other creditors. Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Delaware, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 134.

Admitting that the question is not free from difficulty, yet I have not been able to come at any other conclusion than that which is here announced. It is sometimes a hard rule, undoubtedly, upon individual creditors and upon families, that a man's whole estate should be swept away to pay a debt due to the government, but courts of justice can only expound and apply the law, and if upon a fair and impartial examination of the subject they can ascertain its intent and meaning, their duty is simply to administer it, as it becomes applicable, in the various relations of life, to the rights and interests of the parties before them.

Case No. 15,004.

UNITED STATES v. DUNCAN.

[2 Pittsb. Rep. 328; 4 West. Law Month. 425; 10 Pittsb. Leg. J. 41.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1863.

BAIL — FORFEITURE OF RECOGNIZANCE — RELIEF FROM—SURETY.

1. Act of congress of 28th February, 1838 [5 Stat. 321], authorizing the courts of the United States to relieve bail in certain cases, construed.

2. The courts in England had such power, independent of acts of parliament conferring it, which were held by the judges to be simply in affirmance of the common law.

3. The reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall, in U. S. v. Feely [Case No. 15,082], although delivered many years before the passage of the act of congress, sustains the power of the court to grant relief, as well after as before judgment.

4. A recognizance is a matter of record, and when forfeited, it is in the nature of a judgment of record, and when judgment is given the whole is to be taken as one record.

5. In the courts of the United States, the recognizance is estreated and sued in the same forum, and the court having power over the proceedings from the beginning may grant relief, even after judgment and execution in the hands of the marshal.

Scire facias sur recognisance. Rule to set aside judgment and spare the recognisance as to Duncan.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. A true bill was found at the May sessions, 1861, against Joseph Shoemaker, for making and passing counterfeit coin, in the resemblance and similitude of the coin coined by the mint of the United States. On the 5th day of August, 1861, the defendant, Robert Duncan, and Alexander McGregor, entered into recognisance for the appearance of Shoemaker at the following October sessions. He failed to appear, and the recognisance was forfeited. On the 26th of October, a sci. fa. was sued out, and served on Duncan the same day. No appearance or plea being entered, judgment nil dicit was entered, and the sum liquidated by the clerk at $3,000.

Duncan took out a bail piece, and dispatched a deputy marshal to the camp at Indianapolis, where it was alleged Shoemaker was engaged in the public service. As the military there was more potent than the civil power, the deputy failed to arrest him; but at a subsequent period, and after the date of the judgment, he was captured in this city and committed to prison by his bail, where he now remains in the custody of the United States marshal. An application is now made to relieve Duncan, one of the bail, under the authority delegated to the court, by the act of congress of 28th February, 1839, § 6 [5 Stat. 321]. Brightly, 283. This act provides, that "whenever it shall appear to the court, that there has been no wilful default of the parties, and that a trial can notwithstanding be had in the cause, and that public justice does not otherwise require the same penalty to be exacted or enforced," the court shall have authority in their discretion to remit the whole or a part of the penalty. If the wilful default here mentioned, was applicable to the act of the prisoner alone, the law would fail to extend relief to meritorious sureties, who, trusting in the integrity of the principal, were found in default, without any act or connivance on their part. The true construction of the act would seem to be, that where there is no collusion with the principal, no aid extended him to escape, or no effort made to defeat the ends of public justice, the court shall have power, in their discretion, to relieve the surety from the penalty of the recognisance. Here it appears that Duncan, instead of conniving at the absence of the principal, made every effort to arrest him, and finally succeeding in placing him in the custody of the United States officers. "A trial can be had" in his case; and, although it is alleged on the part of the government, that owing to the absence of material witnesses, it may not be a successful one for the prosecution, yet the bail does comply with the spirit of his undertaking, in placing the prisoner at the bar for trial. The absence of the witnesses on the part of the government is no default of his, but is one of the casualties to which all suits in courts of justice are subject. It is one of the chances which enure to the benefit of criminals, and one of the misfortunes incident to all public trials.

In the examination of this case, the court has entertained some doubt as to its power to extend this relief after judgment, after it has become a debt of record against the defendant, and in favor of the United States. This power was exercised by the common law courts in England, and statutes were passed extending it, but they were all held to have been simply in affirmance of the common law. In 18 Vin. Abr. tit. "Recognisance," letter D, 167, 168, it is said, "If a recognisance is estreated into the exchequer, because not punctually complied with, yet if the party appears, and takes trial at the next session, he may compound for a very small matter in the court of exchequer, because the effect, though not the exact form of the recognisance is complied with; judges of the oyer and terminer are the proper judges, whether recognisances should be estreated or spared; and it is for the advantage of public justice that they should have such power, if upon the circumstances of the case they see fit." This shows the power exercised before judgment, in the sound discretion of the court. In England, the recognisance was estreated and sued in a different tribunal from that in which it was taken, and an interference after judgment might bring about a conflict of jurisdiction. But in the courts of the United States, the suit is brought in the same forum and subject to the same judicial cognisance. The court has not lost control over its record, and it may extend relief when a proper case is presented for its action. The opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in U. S. v. Feely [Case No. 15,082], was delivered in 1813, before the passage of the act of congress heretofore recited, and was an application for relief before the recognisance was estreated, and before judgment, but the whole reasoning of that great chief justice sanctions the exercise of the power as well after as before judgment. In the case of Com. v. Denniston, 9 Watts, 142, the principal is recognised, that a recognisance is a matter of record, and when forfeited, it is in the nature of a judgment of record, and when judgment is given, the whole is taken as one record. The right of the governor, therefore, to remit, cannot be affected by proceeding to judgment on the recognisance, as the nature of the recognisance remains the same, after as before judgment. This being the case the act of congress affords us ample power in the exercise of a sound discretion to afford the relief prayed for. And as we are of opinion that the absence of the principal was no fault of the bail, and that he has done all in his power to repair the public injury by the surrender of the prisoner, he is entitled to the interposition of the court upon payment of costs.

The judgment is set aside as to Duncan, and the recognisance as to him, respited and spared upon payment of all the costs which have accrued upon the scire facias.

UNITED STATES v. DUNCAN et al.

[4 McLean, 207.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1847.

LIENS—APPLICATION OF PROCEEDS.

Where there are two liens on the same land, one being paramount to the other, which also covers other lands in the state, the court will order the lands to be sold, reserving the application of the proceeds for the order of the court.

Mr. Butterfield, for the United States.
Mr. McClure, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. Judgments were obtained in this court in 1841, which are a lien on the lands of the ancestor of the defendants, throughout the state. In 1846, there was a decree against the same, in favor of the plaintiffs, for forty-nine thousand dollars. Certain judgments have been subsequently entered against the same person, in Morgan county state court, for about six hundred dollars, which create a lien upon the lands in that county. Executions have been issued on the judgments of the United States, and a motion is now made to direct the other lands of Duncan's heirs in the state, to be sold, in satisfaction of the judgments and decrees above stated. 1 Paige, 185; 19 Johns. 493; 1 Stat. 515.

The court order, that should the land in Morgan county sell for more than the amount of the judgments of the United States, entered in 1841, the solicitor or agent of the United States, shall retain in his own hands such surplus, subject to the order of this court. Or, should such lands sell for less than the balance of said judgments, and the other lands subject to the decree shall sell for more money than the amount of such decree, the surplus shall be held by the solicitor and agent of the United States, subject to the disposition of the court.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

[This was an action by the United States against Josiah Dunham and others.]

Mr. Goodrich, for the United States.
Choate & Hallet, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a writ of error to the district court in an action of debt on a judgment, brought by the United States. The verdict was for the defendants, and a bill of exceptions was taken.

The first exception is, that the court allowed the defendants' counsel to open and close. This is not a subject for an exception. It was so held by the supreme court in Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 363.

The next exception is, that some of the defendants were admitted as witnesses on their own behalf. Under the statute of Massachusetts (St. 1856, c. 188), I think these persons were admissible as witnesses. It applies to all civil cases, except those wherein an original party is dead, or an executor or administrator is a party; and this case does not come within either exception.

It is argued that no one defendant was competent without calling all the defendants. But I do not find anything in the statute upon which to rest this position.

It is also insisted that statute is not law in this court; and reliance is placed on that part of the thirteenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 88), which provides "that the mode of proof by oral testimony and examination of witnesses in open court shall be the same in all courts of the United States, as well in the trial of equity and admiralty and maritime jurisdiction as of actions at common law." But the purpose of this provision was not to introduce a law of evidence respecting the competency of witnesses, but a mode of proceeding by examination, in open court, of such witnesses as should be competent under the appropriate rules of law; and to apply that mode to all the classes of cases over which the courts of the United States have jurisdiction. And I consider it to be settled, that the state laws of evidence are rules of decision in civil trials at the common law, under the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act. McNeil v. Holbrook, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 84; Sims v. Hundley, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 1.

It was also suggested that the United States are not bound by this act. Undoubtedly it would be competent for congress so to provide. But independent of such provision, I know of no prerogative possessed by the United States to be exempt from the rules of evidence, which govern other suitors, in civil actions at the common law. And it must be remembered that this state law confers upon each party the privilege of examining the adverse party; which he did not possess at common law.

The next exception is founded on the rejection of certain letters offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, upon the ground of their immateriality. As the letters are not inserted in the bill of exceptions I cannot determine whether they were material or not, and the presumption is the ruling was correct. Carrol v. Peak, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 19; Camden v. Doremus, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 515.

It has been insisted in argument that the solicitor of the treasury had not authority to empower the district attorney to receive satisfaction of the judgment declared on in land or mortgages. But it does not appear by the bill of exceptions that any such point was made or ruled on in the court below; and this court on a writ of error cannot inquire into or determine that question.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

NOTE. State laws of evidence are rules of decision in actions at common law in federal courts. See The William Jarvis [Case No. 17,697], citing case in text. Bills of exceptions—what should be stated in. See Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Baring, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 162, citing case in text.

SAME v. RAND.

[Hoff. Op. 535.]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. Sept. 10, 1856.

CRIMINAL LAW — CONSOLIDATION OF INDICTMENTS AGAINST DIFFERENT PERSONS.

[The provision in the fee bill (Act Feb. 26, 1853; 10 Stat. 161) that, whenever there are "several charges against any person or persons for the same act or transaction," the whole may be joined in one indictment in separate counts, and, "if two or more indictments shall be found in such cases, the court may order them consolidated," does not authorize the consolidation of separate indictments against different persons, although the offence was joint, and they might have been jointly indicted.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[These were separate indictments against John L. Durkee and C. E. Rand for the crime of piracy. Defendants moved the court to consolidate the two cases, under Act Feb. 26, 1853.]

Wm. Blanding, U. S. Atty.

Crockett & Page, Bailie Peyton, and Wm. Duer, for defendant.

Before McALLISTER, Circuit Judge, and HOFFMAN, District Judge.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In these cases separate indictments have been found against the above defendants for the same offence. It is not denied that the offence charged was committed by the defendants jointly, and that they might have been jointly indicted. Separate indictments having been preferred, the accused pleaded separately. A motion is now made to consolidate the indictments under the power given to the court by the act of February 26th, 1853. The only clause in the act which is supposed to confer this power is as follows: "Whenever there are or shall be several charges against any person or persons for the same act or transaction, instead of having several indictments, the whole may be joined in one indictment in separate counts, and if two or more indictments shall be found in such cases, the court may order them consolidated." The case contemplated by the statute is evidently that of several offences growing out of one transaction, no matter by how many committed. And the provision was partly intended, perhaps, to remove any doubts that might previously have existed as to the right of joining distinct offences in the same indictment. It is observed by Wharton: "How far a defendant may be charged with distinct offences on different counts of the same indictment has received varied adjudication." Whart. Cr. Law, p. 203. The statute therefore provides for the joinder of several charges for the same transaction, or for two or more transactions connected together, or for two or more transactions of the same class of crimes and offences which might properly be joined; and this whether the charges be against one or more persons.

The provision in question occurs in the fee bill of 1853, and was intended to enable the court to expedite proceedings and diminish costs; and the succeeding clause provides that, whenever two or more indictments, suits or proceedings are or shall be prosecuted, which should be joined, the district attorney prosecuting them shall be paid but one bill of costs. There is no reason to suppose that any alteration of the law was intended affecting the right of either the government or the accused. It was merely proposed to remove any doubts as to the joinder of offences, and to oblige the prosecutor to make the proceedings as little expensive as possible. The language of the act is, "whenever there shall be several charges against any person or persons." I think that the term "several" is here used in its popular sense—i. e., meaning more than one. It cannot mean "separate" charges, that is, the same charge separately made against several defendants, for the language is, "whenever there shall be several charges against any person or persons." The fact that the statute contemplates that several charges may be made against one person, shows that the term "several" related to the charges and not to the persons. Had congress meant to provide for the joinder of several defendants in one indictment, they would not have allowed it in cases where charges are preferred for the "same act or transaction"; but when they are preferred for a joint act or transaction, parties can be jointly indicted only when the offence is "joint." But if any doubt remain as to the true construction of this clause, it is removed by the concluding words. It is provided that if there be several charges against any person or persons, the whole shall be joined in one indictment; if two or more indictments shall be found, they may be consolidated. The whole of what? Clearly, the whole of the charges. This language cannot be contrued to mean that all the defendants may be joined where the same charge is made against different persons. But further. How is "the whole to be joined in one indictment"? The statute declares "in separate counts"; still more clearly referring to the case of several charges or offences, and not to that of the same charge or offence alleged against different persons. I think it, therefore, beyond all doubt, that the statute merely meant to direct the joinder of different offences in one indictment in the cases enumerated in the clause above quoted, but had no reference whatever to the joinder of defendants in indictments for a joint offence. On that point the law is undisputed, that where more than one join in the commission of an offence, all or any number of them may be jointly indicted for it, or each of them may be indicted separately. When they are indicted jointly, the court may, in its discretion, give them the benefit of separate trials; but where they are indicted separately, we think the statute gives us no power to order them to be tried jointly, either on the application of the district attorney or of the accused.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge, said that he thought that it was a question that was left altogether to the discretion of the court; but as there was some doubt about it, and his colleague was of opinion that the cases could not be consolidated, he concurred in the opinion delivered by him.

[The trial of John L. Durkee for the crime of piracy was then commenced, and is reported in Case No. 15,009.]

UNITED STATES v. DURKEE.

[1 McAll. 196.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. July Term, 1856.

LARCENY—REQUISITES—INTENT TO APPROPRIATE—PIRACY.

1. The essential requisite of larceny is the lucri causa. Held, if the prisoner took and carried away the muskets with intent to appropriate any of them to his own use, or permanently to deprive the owner of them, such taking is larceny.

[Cited in dissenting opinion in People v. Raschke, 73 Cal. 385, 15 Pac. 16; State v. Slingerland, 19 Nev. 135, 7 Pac. 283.]

2. If the taking was with the sole intent to prevent the use of them upon himself or his associates, it is not larceny.

[Cited in Gooch v. State, 60 Ark. 5, 28 S. W. 511.]

This was a case of an indictment [against John L. Durkee] under the 3d section of the act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 600). It arose out of the movements of a body of men known as the "Vigilance Committee," in the city of San Francisco, during the excitement which existed in that city during the summer of 1856. The prisoner was charged with being concerned in making an assault upon a vessel on her way from Sacramento to San Francisco, with arms on board, the property of the state, and carrying them off from those to whom the transportation of them had been confided by the authorities.

William Blanding, U. S. Dist. Atty.

I. B. Crockett and Wm. Duer, for defendant.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge (charging jury). We approach, we trust, the termination of this case with the single desire to dispense evenhanded justice between the parties. Each of you, placed upon that panel, has called upon his God to witness that he has neither bias nor prejudice in this case. As for myself, though it is my sworn duty to convict him whom the law condemns; yet to convict improperly under the forms of law would fill me with horror as great as if I were to take into my own hands the issues of life and death, and send down to the grave my fellow-creature without the forms, the guards, and the sanctions which the constitution, the laws, and humanity have thrown around him. Animated by this sentiment, I proceed to state to you the law which, in the opinion of this court, must control your action. In order to fix your attention on the only issue you are sworn to try, it is necessary to separate it from all collateral considerations. The defense is rested upon the ground that, in seizing the arms for the taking of which the prisoner has been indicted, he was acting in obedience to the orders of a body which we charge you was unauthorized by and banded together in violation and defiance of the laws. It is our duty to say to you that no orders emanating from such a source can vary the character of the act charged against the prisoner, if it be established that he is guilty of it under the law and testimony in this case.

Again, gentlemen, the prisoner may have been guilty of a crime or crimes other than that for which he is indicted; he may, in what he has done, have acted with those who deserve execration as unfeeling violators of the laws of their country, or merit approbation as patriotic citizens. In a word, he may have transgressed every precept of the moral or municipal law. Those, and all other like considerations, must be dismissed from your minds. He is on trial for a single offense,—piracy. Any other crime he may have committed; but if you shall find he is innocent of the one now charged against him, he must go free. This is demanded by an immutable principle of justice. No man can be held responsible for an act unless, after having been confronted with his accuser and an impartial trial had, he has been found guilty; and then his responsibility must be confined to the specific crime that has been proved against him. This is a right guaranteed even to a malefactor. It has been truly said by a distinguished author that, "the law withdraws its protection from a malefactor while actually engaged in illegal acts; but at any other moment, it protects his person and property as impartially as it does yours or mine. For instance, if a burglar breaks into my house, I may then and there cut him down like a dog. If a pickpocket puts his hand into my pocket, I may knock him down. But if I break into a notorious felon's house, and rob him, I am just as great a felon in the law's eye as if I so robbed an honest citizen; and so, if I attack a burglar's or a pickpocket's person and life at any moment when he is not feloniously engaged, I am none the less a villain in the law's clear eye because my villainy is aimed at an habitual villain. And here the law is not only just but expedient; for were such fatal partialities admitted, we should soon advance from doing acts of villainy upon villains to calling any one a villain whom we wished to wrong, and then wronging him." Thus vigilant and just is law; it views every man before judgment innocent, so far as affording him an opportunity to defend himself surrounded by those guards which the law has prescribed. To deal differently with an accused party, would violate alike the precepts of municipal law and the dictates of natural justice. We repeat, then, your duty is to limit your attention to the single inquiry whether the prisoner is guilty or not of the specific crime for which he is indicted.

The indictment is founded upon the 3d section of the act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 600). So much of it as is necessary to be considered is in the following words: "That if any person shall upon the high seas, or in any open roadstead, or in any haven, basin, or bay, or in any river where the sea ebbs and flows, commit the crime of robbery in and upon any ship or vessel, or upon any of the ship's company of any ship or vessel, or the lading thereof, such person shall be adjudged to be a pirate, and being thereof convicted before the circuit court of the United States for the district into which he shall be brought or in which he shall be found, shall suffer death." The power of congress thus to legislate, is derived from that clause in the constitution which declares, that the judicial power shall extend to "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." Originally, the states had exclusive jurisdiction of all crimes committed within the limits of their respective counties. Then came the clause in the constitution referred to. In relation to this, the supreme court of the United States have said, "It is not questioned, that whatever may be necessary to the full and unlimited exercise of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is in the government of the Union. Congress may pass all laws which are necessary and proper for giving the most complete effect to this power." U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 388. The legislation of congress prior to the passing of the act under consideration, has been limited in its enactments to offenses committed on the high seas, and to places the exclusive jurisdiction over which had been ceded to the general government. Finding it necessary and proper, in order to carry out fully the power vested in them in all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, congress passed the act under which this indictment is framed; which, while it accomplishes the contemplated object, impinges no further upon the jurisdiction of the states than was absolutely necessary to achieve the object which, under the grant by the constitution, it was in their power to effect. The proviso to the act declares, "that nothing in this section contained shall be so construed as to deprive any particular state of its jurisdiction over such offenses when committed within the body of a county; or authorize the courts of the United States to try any such offenses after conviction or acquittance for the same offense in a state court." The jurisdiction of the federal and state judiciary is therefore concurrent in this case, and the familiar principle intervenes, that where there are concurrent jurisdictions the one who first obtains possession of the case must exert it. In the exercise of this jurisdiction, the court has no unwritten criminal code to which it can resort as a source of jurisdiction; nor can it look to the common law, further than as a guide in its exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon it expressly by statute. The legislative authority must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the court that shall have jurisdiction of the offense, before cognizance can be taken of it. U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32. The act on which this indictment is founded declares, robbery committed on the high seas and in certain places shall be deemed to be piracy. To become a pirate under this law, a man must have committed robbery. Of the meaning of the term "robbery," we think there can be no doubt. It must be understood as it was recognized and defined to be at common law. Although the common law is not a source of jurisdiction in the courts of the United States, it is necessarily referred to for the definition and application of terms.

The only inquiry, then, is, what was robbery at common law at the time of the separation of the American colonies from the parent country? U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 610. In robbery, which is larceny accompanied by intimidation or force, the felonious intent in taking constitutes the offense. Blackstone tells us, the taking and carrying away must be done animo furandi, or, as the civil law expresses it, lucri causa. Lord Coke, in his Institutes, and Hawkins, in his Pleas of the Crown, give the same definition. 1 Hawk. P. C. 93. Archbold states that "larceny, as far as respects the intent with which it is committed, is where a man knowingly takes and carries away the goods of another without any claim or pretense of right, with intent wholly to deprive the owner of them and to appropriate or convert them to his own use." In Pear's Case, East, P. C. tit. "Larceny," § 2, Baron Eyre defines larceny to be "the wrongful taking of goods with intent to spoil the owner of them causa lucri." The foregoing authorities all include in larceny, as an essential element, what is termed the lucri causa. A similar view is taken by the supreme court of Missouri in the case of State v. Conway, 18 Mo. 321. "The taking (say the court) must be done animo furandi, or, as the civil law terms it, the lucri causa. The felonious intent is the material ingredient in the offense." To constitute this offense, therefore, in any form, there must be a taking from the possession, a carrying away against the will of the owner, and a felonious intent to convert it to the offender's use. Again, in the state of Delaware it was ruled, that if the party indicted for larceny, where he took a horse for the stealing of which he was indicted, intended to appropriate him to his own use, by selling or retaining him to his own use, it was felony; but if he only took him to aid him in his escape as a runaway slave, it was no more than a trespass. 2 Har. 529. In Alabama, the supreme court considered the doctrine at common law to be "that the criminal intention constitutes the offense, and is the only criterion to distinguish a larceny from a trespass. That, according to the common-law writers, to constitute the offense of larceny it was not sufficient that the goods be taken for the purpose of destroying them to injure his neighbor, and actually destroying them. Such offense would be malicious mischief; but it would want one of the essential ingredients of larceny—the lucri causa—the intention to profit by the act by the conversion of the property." State v. Hawkins, 8 Port. (Ala.) 461. In that case, although it was evident the prisoner had secreted the slave from her owner with a view to do the owner an injury by aiding the slave to obtain her freedom, still, as there was no intention to convert the slave to his own use, the party was held to be not guilty of larceny. The courts, then, of Missouri, of Delaware, and of Alabama, in the three cases cited, consider the doctrine of the common law to be, that to constitute larceny there must be, as an essential ingredient and a necessary element, the animus furandi or lucri causa. There are decided cases in England which sustain a similar doctrine. Thus, in Rex v. Holloway, 5 Car. & P. 524, decided in 1833, the prisoner was indicted for stealing a gun from the prosecutor, who was a game-keeper. The latter, knowing him to be a poacher, seized him. A companion of the prisoner rescued him; and the latter, getting free, wrenched the gun from the prosecutor and ran off with it. It was proved that the prisoner said he would sell the gun, and it was not afterwards found. The jury returned that they did not think that the prisoner, at the time he took the gun, had any intention of appropriating it to his own use. "Then (said the court) you must acquit him. It is a question peculiarly for your consideration. If he did not, when he took it, intend its appropriation, it is not felony; and his resolving afterwards to dispose of it, will not make it such." In Rex v. Crump, 1 Car. & P. 658, the prisoner was indicted for stealing a horse, three bridles, two saddles, and a bag; and the court left it to the jury to say whether the prisoner intended to steal the horse; for if he intended to steal the articles, and only to use the horse to convey the articles away, he would not be guilty of stealing the horse. The case of Rex v. Wright, 1 Burrows, 543, was that of a servant indicted for stealing his master's plate; and it appeared that, after the plate was missed but before complaint was made, the prisoner replaced it. It was in proof that the plate had been pawned, and the pawnbroker testified that the prisoner had, on previous occasions, pawned plate and redeemed it. The court left it to the jury to say, whether the prisoner took the plate with intent to steal it, or to raise money on it and then return it; for in the latter case it was no larceny. The prisoner was acquitted. In Rex v. Van Muyen, 1 Russ. & R. 118, the prisoner, who was master of a Prussian vessel captured by the British and carried into a home port, was indicted for stealing certain articles from the ship. There was no evidence to prove whether the prisoner had taken the articles for his own use or that of his owners. Chambers, J., reserved the point for the opinion of the judges; and a majority of them were of the opinion that if the prisoner had taken the articles for his own use, it was larceny, otherwise it was not. In Reg. v. Godfrey, 8 Car. & P. 563, it was decided, that where a person from curiosity, either personal or political, opens a letter addressed to another person, and keeps the letter (this in the absence of a statute), it is a trespass, not a larceny, even though a part of his object may be to prevent the letter from reaching its destination.

The foregoing decisions embody, in a practical form, the principle enunciated in the definitions given by the text-writers. We will now advert to three or four recent English decisions, which seem to qualify the doctrine. In the year 1815, two decisions were made in England, which were subsequently followed by two others, without comment or discussion. The first is that of Rex v. Cabbage, 1 Russ & R. 292. The principle enunciated was, "that if the intent be to destroy the article taken, it will be sufficient to constitute the offence of larceny, if done to serve the prisoner or any other person, though not in a pecuniary way." The case was this: The prisoner, to screen his accomplice, who was indicted for stealing a horse, broke into the prosecutor's stable and took away the horse, which he backed into a coal pit and killed. A majority of the judges decided this was larceny. At such a decision we are not surprised to find Lord Abingdon exclaiming, in 1838, when that case was cited in his presence, "I cannot accede to that!" The second English case on this point, is Rex v. Morfit, 1 Russ. & R. 307, decided on the authority of the former. There, A and B, servants, opened the granary of their master by means of a false key, and took two bushels of beans to give to their master's horses, in addition to the quantity allowed; and it was held to be larceny. Some of the judges alleged that the additional quantity of beans would diminish the work of the men who had to look after the horses, and this diminution in their labor was considered a lucri causa. The astuteness with which the lucri causa was sought for and discovered in that case, is strong proof of the stringency of the rule which requires it as an essential ingredient in the crime of larceny. This case is referred to by a recent writer as a "singular case on this point." Archb. Cr. Law (Ed. 1853.) Such it undoubtedly is; as in effect it destroyed the distinction which had existed from an ancient period between larceny and trespass, unless we can, with some of the judges, detect the existence of the lucri causa in that case. Looking into the cases last cited, and the grounds on which they were decided, we deem the observations made in relation to them by the supreme court of Alabama, not inappropriate. "It appears to us (they say) that these cases cannot be considered authority in this country. The shadowy and almost imaginary distinctions upon which they rest, are at war with that precision and certainty which are the boast of the criminal law of England." 8 Port. 465. These cases stand in direct opposition to the numerous authorities, English and American, above cited. They introduced a change into the common law as it existed at the time of the emigration of our ancestors to this country; and we cannot recognize modifications recently made in the common law of England, as controlling this court. If an authority could have been found emanating from an American court, adopting these hair-breadth distinctions, it certainly could not have eluded the search of the profession.

After a careful examination of the law, we give you, gentlemen, the instructions which follow: 1. That if you believe, from the evidence, that the prisoner took and carried away the arms, with the intent to appropriate them, or any portion of them, to his own use, or permanently deprive the owner of the same, then he is guilty. 2. But if you shall believe that he did not take the arms for the purpose of appropriating them, or any part thereof to his own use, and only for the purpose of preventing their being used on himself or his associates, then the prisoner is not guilty.

Verdict, "Not guilty."

UNITED STATES v. DURLING.

[4 Biss. 509.] [1]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan., 1869.

WITNESS—RECOGNIZANCE FOR APPEARANCE—TRAVELING EXPENSES.

1. It is the duty of the district attorney, in criminal prosecutions by the government, where he has any doubt whether witnesses will attend, to have them properly recognized.

2. If a witness subpœnaed by the government, has means to travel, it is not necessary for the officer to tender his traveling expenses; and the court will attach a witness who, on that ground, neglects to attend.

[Cited in Norris v. Hassler, 23 Fed. 582.]

3. The officer summoning witnesses should see that those who have no means to travel, are provided with necessary funds.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. I wish to lay down a few rules upon this subject as a guide to the district attorney, upon which I will insist hereafter when this question comes up again. It is always within his power, under the law, where a person is within the jurisdiction of the court, and he doubts whether he will be present on the trial of the cause, to compel him to give security that he will be present at the trial; so that it was competent for the district attorney, when these parties were here and he doubted whether they would be present when the case was called for trial, to have them brought before a competent officer and recognized, and give security that they would be present. The law goes so far even as to declare that, in a criminal case, if they cannot give security they may be imprisoned until the trial, in order that their testimony may be given.

Again, where there is a witness residing in another district, the process of this court goes to that district. It is issued to the marshal of that district, and it is the duty of the person to whom it is addressed, if he has the means, to travel here to give his testimony. If he has not, the proper officer of the government will furnish him with means. It is not necessary, if he has the means, that the fees should be tendered to him before he is required to obey the process. An attachment would issue and the court would punish a man who could pay his expenses and would not come because the money was not tendered. It is only where a man has not the means of paying his expenses, that it is necessary for the money to be tendered to the witness in order to make it incumbent on him to obey the process of the court.

Hereafter, I wish it understood that those witnesses who have not the means of attending court must be furnished with the means when the subpœna is served, and if there is doubt entertained of their being present at the trial they must be compelled to give security; if they fail to do so, they must be held in custody until the trial.

UNITED STATES v. DUSTIN et al.

[2 Bond, 332.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1869.

CRIMINAL LAW—INDICTMENT—MOTION TO QUASH—CONSPIRACY—ALLEGATIONS OF OVERT ACTS—COUNTS.

1. A motion to quash will not be sustained unless the indictment is bad beyond a reasonable doubt.

2. It is the practice, in the courts of the United States, where an indictment has been quashed, to hold the defendant in custody to answer to a new indictment.

3. In an indictment, based upon section 30 of the act March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 484], charging a conspiracy to defraud the United States of the taxes due upon distilled spirits, it is not necessary to allege the specific mode agreed upon by which the object of the conspiracy was to be carried out.

4. It is sufficient, in an indictment under this law, to aver that there was a conspiracy to defraud the United States of taxes legally due, and that in pursuance of such conspiracy the defendants committed a stated overt act.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Patterson, 55 Fed. 616.]

[1] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

5. Allegations of the overt act are not required to be as full and minute in an indictment for conspiracy as in an indictment for fraud without any conspiracy.

6. If an overt act, in violation of law, is charged as in pursuance of a previous conspiracy, it is sufficient.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Patterson, 55 Fed. 616.]

7. One good count in an indictment will sustain a general verdict of guilty, and though there may be different counts, it will afford no reason for quashing the whole indictment.

W. M. Bateman, U. S. Dist. Atty.

James Sloane and H. L. Burnett, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. In this case the counsel for the defendants have submitted a motion to quash the indictment. A motion to quash will not be sustained unless the indictment is bad beyond a reasonable doubt. This rule has been adopted in view of the fact that nearly all questions involving the sufficiency of the indictment may be available to the defendant, if a conviction follows, on a motion in arrest of judgment. It is true, if the indictment is so palpably defective that no judgment could be rendered on it after conviction, it is the duty of the court to sustain the motion to quash. In this case the decision is not of any great importance to the defendants, as it is now the practice in the courts of the United States, in the exercise of their criminal jurisdiction, where an indictment has been quashed, to hold defendant in custody to answer to a new indictment. If the present motion should be sustained, no reason is perceived why such an order should not be made.

The indictment is based on section 30 of the act of March 2, 1867, providing for the punishment of conspiracies to commit crimes against, or in any manner to defraud, the United States. The first count charges that the eleven persons named, intending to defraud the United States, conspired together to evade the payment of a large amount of revenue due on distilled spirits; and, in pursuance of such unlawful agreement, did aid and abet certain persons named, in the removal to, and concealment of 10,000 gallons of distilled spirits in, a place other than a bonded warehouse. It is averred that such removal was from the distillery where the spirits had been distilled, without payment of the legal tax, and without giving bond as required by law.

The objection to the count is, that it does not set out the specific means by which the defendants proposed to effect the fraud charged, or name or describe the distillery from which, or the place to which, the spirits were to be removed.

The court is aware of no authorities requiring, in an indictment for a conspiracy under section 30 of this statute, that in averring the fact that the defendants agreed together to commit a criminal act or perpetrate a fraud, the specific mode agreed upon, by which the object of the conspiracy was to be carried out, should be averred. The statute referred to is far reaching, and includes every conspiracy to "defraud the United States in any manner whatever." It is sufficient, in an indictment under this law, to aver that there was a conspiracy to defraud the United States of taxes legally due; and that in pursuance of such conspiracy, the defendants committed a stated overt act. It is otherwise where a conspiracy is relied on as the criminal act, without any averment of an overt act, to effect the object of the conspiracy. In that case, all the facts must be averred which constitute the conspiracy. This, too, is the law where the conspiracy alleged is for the purpose of doing an act not in itself criminal or in violation of a statute. 2 Bish. Cr. Pl. §§ 176, 179; 2 Archb. Cr. Law, 1049; 7 Cush. 514, 515. Under these authorities the averments in this indictment, as to the objects of the conspiracy, are sufficient.

The law, as to the description of the overt acts in the indictment, seems to be the same as applicable to the averments of the conspiracy. The indictment alleges that in pursuance of the conspiracy, the defendants proceeded to perpetrate certain acts of fraud in violation of law. These acts of fraud charged are the removal of a large quantity of spirits from the distillery where they were made, to a place other than a bonded warehouse, in violation of law and with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the same. It is claimed by counsel for the defendants that these allegations of the commission of the overt act are defective for vagueness and want of particularity, for the same reasons urged and before noticed, as applicable to description of the conspiracy.

On this point there seems to be some conflict in the authorities. But the general doctrine is, that the allegations of the overt act are not required to be as full and minute in an indictment for conspiracy as in an indictment for fraud without any charge of a conspiracy. If an overt act, in violation of law, is charged as in pursuance of a previous conspiracy, it is sufficient. U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460, 7 Curt. Dec. 281, 293.

In addition to points noticed, it has been strenously argued that this indictment is bad for repugnancy and duplicity. These points are certainly not so clear of doubt as to require that the motion to quash should be sustained. If it shall be necessary, they may be more fully considered and decided hereafter.

The court has not deemed it necessary separately to consider the grounds of the motion, as applicable to the second count. They are substantially the same as those urged in reference to the first count. One good count in an indictment will sustain a general verdict of guilty; and though there may be defective counts, it will afford no reason for quashing the whole indictment.

Motion overruled.

Case No. 15,012.

UNITED STATES v. DUSTIN et al.

[15 Int. Rev. Rec. 30.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1872.

CRIMINAL LAW — LIMITATION OF PROSECUTIONS — CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD — REVENUE LAWS.

1. An indictment has been pending in the United States circuit court for more than a year, alleging that the defendants conspired to defraud the United States of the taxes upon certain distilled spirits manufactured in the Sixth district of Ohio. A demurrer was filed to the indictment, upon the ground that the prosecution was barred by the two years statute of limitations of the act of congress of 1790 [1 Stat. 112].

2. The demurrer is overruled, and it is held that the thirtieth section of the act of congress of March, 1867 [14 Stat. 484], punishing conspiracies, is a "revenue law," and the period of limitation for offences against said thirtieth section is held to be five years instead of two.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge. This is an indictment under the thirtieth section of the act of March 2, 1867, which provides that "if two or more persons conspire to commit any offence against any law of the United States, or defraud the United States in any manner whatsoever, they shall be punished," etc. The title of the act is "to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes." The act is a long one, and all of its many sections, save this and one other, relate solely to internal revenue. This section has reference to violations of revenue and other laws also, and the question is, whether the act of 1804 [2 Stat. 290], limiting the prosecution of offences "arising under the revenue laws" to five years, applies to conspiracies under said section when such conspiracies are solely to violate revenue laws. It is conceded that the act of congress of 1790, requiring prosecutions to be begun in two years, does apply if that of 1804 does not. There is, therefore, no necessity for a forced construction of the latter act in order to prevent the anomaly of a class of prosecutions without any limitation whatever. The court is to decide which of two limitation laws it believes congress intended should govern in prosecutions for violations of said thirtieth section, by conspiring to defraud the revenue.

We have been favored with arguments of great length and elaborateness, and if they are not in detail answered, it is not because they have not received a patient examination. The learned counsel for the defendants relied mainly upon two propositions. First, that the limitation act of 1804 had no application to laws for the protection of internal revenue, and second, if it did, it was to be confined to such offences as were created before its enactment. We find no difficulty in rejecting both assumptions. His third position, which affirms that, within the meaning of the statute, this offence does not arise under a revenue law, is, in our estimation, the only question worthy very serious consideration. No plausible reason is perceived for saying the word "revenue" in this and other laws where it is used broadly and generally, does not include internal revenue, as well as customs laws. The only matter of surprise is that it should ever have been necessary for the court to decide it. But the question has been discussed, and, as often as raised, decided adversely to those who sought to confine the meaning of the word "revenue" to external duties only. In U. S. v. Wright [Case No. 16,770], Judge McKennan, after what he terms a most elaborate argument, decided the precise point and applied the act of 1804 to the limitation of a prosecution under an internal revenue act. In Stevens v. Mack [Id. 13,404], Judge Blatchford, in deciding that the act of 1833 [4 Stat. 632], by its express provisions, referred only to causes arising under the customs laws, took pains to say that such would not be the effect of an act like this thirtieth section under consideration, where the general term "revenue" without qualifying clauses is used. There are several other similar statutes which have received the same reading. It might be shown from a consideration of all the legislation on this subject that to divide arbitrarily the laws into two classes, and decide that all provisions in reference to revenue laws meant customs laws only, would result in most absurd consequences. The absence of all reason for the interpretation asked renders such a labor unnecessary. We have not overlooked the remark of Judge Blatchford in U. S. v. Blaisdell [Case No. 14,608]. It is also said that the limitation act of 1804 is not prospective, but that it is to be confined to the offences created and defined by then existing laws. In Adams v. Woods, 2 Cranch [6 U. S. 336], it was decided that the limitation law of 1790 applied to subsequently created offences. That decision has been followed in Johnson v. U. S. [Case No. 7,418]; U. S. v. Ballard [Id. 14,507]; U. S. v. Mayo [Id. 15,755],—and is obligatory upon this court. Defendant's counsel says these decisions are erroneous and should be followed only in reference to the particular statutes they construed. We do not think so, but on the contrary believe they decide a principle applicable to all general laws of limitation, including that of 1804. If we did not think so, the decision of the supreme court would still be followed in all its legitimate consequences until it was by the tribunal which pronounced it overruled or questioned.

This is all, under ordinary circumstances, which should be said in reference to this position, but the great length, pains-taking and earnest arguments of defendant's counsel upon this position demand a brief notice. No general statute of limitations in the whole history of our law, in England or here, was ever construed as we are asked by defendant's counsel to read this one. They are, of all others, from their nature and intention, eminently prospective, and the contest has been whether they shall affect at all existing causes of action, and how far they may do so under our American constitution. Every book upon criminal law treats them as applicable to future created offences. Limitation acts in England and in this country have stood for half a century limiting prosecutions under succeeding statutes creating offences of the same class and nature, and nowhere is there a judgment or dictum that they are to be confined to crimes under existing laws, any more than to existing offences under those already enacted.

The following are the judgments cited in support of this extraordinary position, and all of them expressly or by their argument, concede that they are exceptional, and rest upon the peculiarities of the statutes which they construe. In Hall v. State, 20 Ohio, 716, a law made it an offence to sell ardent spirits within three miles of furnaces in certain manufacturing counties, and it was construed to be applicable only to furnaces in existence at its passage. The judgment was delivered by a most able jurist, and were it in the least degree pertinent here we should deem it well to suggest the reasons for our dissent from its conclusions. But it is quite foreign to this discussion. It was a special law, did not create a general rule for the state, and rested expressly on these peculiarities. The learned court which pronounced it, apply no such rule as counsel seek to deduce from it, to the general statute of limitations of Ohio. They would deem it a most extraordinary use of Hall v. State, to apply its exceptional and professedly peculiar canon of construction to a reading of a general statute of limitation. The case of U. S. v. Paul, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 141, depended upon its own special circumstances. There are several similar judgments of the supreme court. It adopted the existing punishments of state laws at the time of the passage of an act of congress. These state laws were before congress and approbated. Of course congress did not approbate future punishments of which they knew nothing. Territorial laws of the United States in numerous instances when they adopt the laws of the states have been thus construed because from their nature such must have been the intention of the law-makers. On the other hand, such is not the intention in the passage of statutes of limitation, especially when the same legislative body creates subsequent offences and affixes no different period of limitation. Every presumption of reason and law suggests the application of those which exist, if no new one is created. 5 Mod. 425, was before the supreme court in Adams v. Woods, and regarded, as evidently it should be, as having no reference to a general statute of limitations. If so disposed, as we are not, we have no right to repudiate this criticism of the supreme court. 6 Durn. & E. [6 Term R.] 286, decides only that merely athletic exhibitions or tumbling was not a stage play within a law which required a copy of all plays to be presented to the lord chamberlain for approval. The remark that the act contemplated such kinds of plays as were common at its passage, is undoubtedly true in that case, as in many others, but it has no tendency to show that the limitation act of 1804 applied only to those frauds which the dishonest men of that period had practiced, and which were punished by existing laws. Sedg. St. Const. Law, 276, is cited for a passage from Vattel, affirming the every day principle that fraudulent changes in the condition of property, in violation of the intentions of contracting parties, do not affect their rights. Our American books are full of better illustrations of this familiar doctrine. It is argued that because parties to contracts and treaties are, in the law, supposed to contemplate the condition of things when they are made, therefore a general statute of limitation will be confined to offences created before its passage. No analogy is perceived even if the passage referred to asserted a general rule, but it does not. It is only in that class of agreements or treaties which, from their nature show us such was the intention of the parties, that the interpretation is given. The law is the same in both instances. Treaties, agreements, and laws, and every other form of communication between men, must receive the same rational treatment. Language general in form will be held to contemplate the present or the future, or both, as the circumstances of its use indicate the one or the other to have been in the contemplation of the parties. When such, in justice, ought to be the interpretation, statutes of limitation have been applied solely to new causes of action. A short period of three years on a foreign judgment, although general in its terms, was construed to apply to future judgments only in Murray v. Gibson, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 421, and Boyd v. Barrenger, 23 Miss. 270. We have referred to all the judgments and authorities cited in the extended argument for the defence to sustain the position which we have no difficulty in overruling.

The more difficult question remains, does the offence with which defendants are charged arise under a revenue law? It arises under that law to which we are compelled to refer in order to ascertain its character, and without which no charge can be sustained. In this instance no crime would be described but for those clauses in the revenue law, to violate which the conspiracy was formed. Repeal them and the indictment fails. They, and section 30 of the act of 1867, are both equally necessary for its support. The offence arises equally under both, and if we concede that the section is not itself a revenue law, and that the offence does not arise solely under such law, no violence is done to language by applying the limitation act of 1804, for that act does not require that the offence should. The history of interpretation is full of instances where courts, impressed with the impolicy and public injury of contrary rulings, have gone very far beyond the license of saying that this action arises under a revenue law, if it does so in part, and cannot be prosecuted at all if such law did not exist. But the literal technical reading is even stronger than this, because it is manifest this same section may be deemed a revenue law, an army law, or a naval law, just as the object of the conspiracy is to violate provisions of the statutes for the protection of one or the other of these departments. In such a reading there is nothing novel or anomalous. Let us suppose that instead of a general statute of limitation there was a separate one for the offences against each of those classes of law, and that in these circumstances such a conspiracy act as this under consideration was passed. It is evident the courts would be compelled to rule that the respective statutes of limitation would apply to different offences created by the same section, as the conspiracy might be to violate one or the other of those codes. If not, there would be no limitation to the crime of conspiracy. In such a case as supposed all would concede that different statutes of limitation must be applied to different conspiracies under the same section. Such a construction is now supported by a less pressing necessity than in the case supposed, because there is a general statute which may without violence be made applicable. But the principle is the same, and if there are sufficient urgent reasons to coerce it there is nothing either absurd or untechnical in its adoption. It is fully conceded that if the conspiracy were to fraudulently admit a foreigner to citizenship a different limitation would apply. In no sense, then, would the offence arise under a revenue law. If a revenue law, strictly so called, is the object of violation, the five years would govern, and there is no uncertainty in the rule in either case.

In our former colonial and territorial laws there are many statutes which, by adopting those of other states, and by reference to the common law, in the same section, and by the same words, created offences of far different grades subject to different punishments and limitations. Several recent acts of congress for the trial of state offenders who are denied civil rights by local laws embody the same principle. An act declaring that all offences should be defined and punished as at common law would be what the counsel for defendant says this law is, if we construe it as the counsel for the government asks. Every possible criticism of this technical character which is now made upon the proposed construction would be equally applicable if the law read as follows: "Any persons who shall conspire to commit any offence against the revenue laws, the laws for the protection of commerce, for the postal service, the army, or any law of the United States, shall," etc. Here we should be forced to say it was a revenue law, because expressly so saying, and apply the five years limitation to conspiracy to violate it. At the same time it would also be a piracy law, and an army law, conspiracies to violate which would not be limited to five years. But the statute as it now reads means precisely what it would in the supposed form. The compendious language used cannot alter its character. A law which provided for punishing conspiracies to commit offences against the revenue laws only would, of course, be a revenue law within the statute of 1804. This is conceded. If a law which provided solely for punishing such conspiracies would be so, it could by no reason lose that character because it added also the same penalties for the same offence in reference to other departments of the government. No such imputed absurdity, therefore, no such unheard of anomaly as counsel supposes, is to result from treating this one section now, with its compendious general form, including all laws, as we should be compelled to treat it if it specifically provided for conspiracies against the revenue laws, and added subsequently the general clause in reference to other laws. There may be some difficulty in its interpretation, but there are in the way of carrying out the actual intention of congress and the pressing necessities of the public safety no such literal and technical difficulties as are imagined.

That section 30 of the act of 1867 is found in an act the chief purpose of which is to impose taxes does not certainly make it solely a revenue law; but its location there may be looked to in its interpretation. It suggests connection between it and the condition of things which required its enactment. The conspiracies which called for it were, in the great majority of cases, those to violate revenue statutes. The instances also of its application thus far in nearly every case called to our attention are of the same character. We know as fully as any historical legal fact can be known that the leading object of the statute was to punish these offences. Experience before 1804 demonstrated that the short period of limitation of two years cut off nine-tenths of the prosecutions which public safety demanded.

These crimes it was ascertained then, and known still better now, are oftener than otherwise unknown until after that time has elapsed. Hence it was for them extended to five years, while for others it was still left at two years. Conspiracies to perpetrate crimes against the revenue are, if possible, still more covert and less subject to early discovery. It is an instructive fact, too, that in nearly every case of this character in this entire circuit, and we think all, this limitation statute of 1790, has been invoked to shield the offender. Legislation that permits such a result, more unwise, more at war with the well understood policy demanded by the public safety in this class of cases, can not be imagined. If thus compelled to read it, it will add a practical proviso that under section 30 of the act of 1867, no prosecutions shall take place for conspiracies to violate the revenue laws. Its leading object will be defeated and an intention imputed to congress, we are certain it did not entertain. Looking to the previous condition of the law, the history of the wrongs which demanded this section, the object of its passage, the location of the section in a revenue statute, and the injurious and discreditable effect upon the administration of our criminal law, to send out of court flocks of wrong doers with impunity, we think our duty is quite clear to say that an indictment under it for conspiracy to commit an offence against the revenue laws may lawfully be found after twenty-four months.

Had this same section 30 been inserted in the original crimes act, contemporaneously with the general limitations act of 1790, it would not have been so construed. There would have been no other limitation than the one in that act. The facts and history would not, as now, warrant the interpretation we give it. But long before the act of 1867, that of 1804 had declared a different policy in reference to all offences against the revenue. The court of last resort had said such penal and criminal laws should not be construed in the narrow sense in which many common law judgments had read that class of acts. The onus probandi had, by statute, been changed in a large number of these cases, and this policy further illustrated by a liberal judicial action which had extended the principle much beyond the specific instances named in the letter of the statutes. We feel we have no right to take a step backward in this none too efficient course of legislation and judgment. The frequency and boldness of this class of offences has been partially checked by a vigorous administration of the law. It has been greatly aided by those wise and protective precepts which the court of last resort has established in the ascertainment of guilt. The unnecessary, impolitic and obstructive reading which this defence demands is at war with this course of decisions. An amendment of the existing statutes would not authorize the trial of those now guilty, and there is no necessity in our judgment, for asking it.

The learned counsel for the defendant cited several judgments to sustain the interpretation he asked. We have considered his references, and added a few others, not because they furnish guides for the particular interpretation here, but to suggest only that our courts, state and national, as well as those in England, have, in pursuit of what they thought the intention of the legislature, gone infinitely beyond the limits demanded by our judgment here. They are trammelled by no narrow rules, but so administer the statute as to obey most deferentially and implicitly what they think the law-makers meant. They do not require the most accurate or happy expression for this end, but read the words in a usual or unusual, in a general or limited, a popular or technical and scientific sense, just as, after a full consideration of all the facts which called for the enactments and the consequences of proposed constructions, they believe will best effectuate the objects of the provisions of law. It is most eminently true, in this department of law, that school definitions, and a formal logical nomenclature, are not only useless, but misleading. Judges and commentators have so often repeated this that it is no longer worthy of illustration. Mr. Sedgwick (page 227) says that the attempt to set up formal canons is ingenious and metaphysically "curious, but of no practical utility." Precedents may guide in reference to the right sources and limits of our inquiries in search of the intended meaning, and illustrate the almost unlimited liberty which it is our duty to take with the literalisms of a law, but afford slight aid in determining the meaning of an act in particular instances. 1 Bl. Comm. 59, says: "The signs by which we may seek the intention are the words of the contract, the subject matter, the effects and consequences, or the spirit and reason of the law." In Brewer v. Blough, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 178, it is said to be "the duty of the court to restrain the words of the law with narrow limits if satisfied that the literal meaning would extend it to cases not intended by the legislature." By no popular signification does the word "may" mean "must," but they have become to be nearly synonymous in the law of constitutions. See Miner v. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 16; Supervisors v. U. S., 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 435; Galma v. Amy, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 705. "The law should be construed so as to effectuate it even if contrary to its letter," says Tonnele v. Hall, 4 Comst. [4 N. Y.] 140. A notable instance of interpretation is that of the supreme court of the United States, and many state tribunals, holding that "beyond seas" in a statute of limitations, means only "without the state." Murray v. Baker, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 341; Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 361. The words here can hardly be said to have been interpreted, but others have been supplied. Defendant's counsel cited 7 Mass. 306; 4 Cush. 214; 12 Mass. 383; 11 Ohio, 252. The points they adjudge are sustained by numerous other decisions. Garnishee laws referring to all debts are held not to reach those due by promissory notes, because the consequences would be so impolitic that the courts knew that such was not the intent of their makers. One of them held "all ships" did not include government ships, and the others are but illustrations of a familiar rule that general words, where the intention as adduced from the subject matter requires it, will be restrained to par ticular instances. The duty performed in these cases requires a similar one here to seek the intention, even, although a slightly less literal meaning may result. In 15 Johns. 358, 380, and which has been approved by the supreme court, it is said: "A thing within the intention is as much within the law as if within its letter, and that which is within the letter is not within the statute unless within the intention. Such interpretation should be put upon it as not to suffer it to be eluded." A two years' limitation upon section 30 of the act of 1867, will practically repeal it. The English stock-jobbing acts refer to all stocks. It was held, looking to their object, not to apply to foreign stock. Salkeld v. Johnston, 1 Hare, 196.

General clauses in usury laws declaring all contracts void are construed to make them voidable only at the election of the party injured. Under the head of waiver the most important constitutional and statutory provisions are construed to be applicable only at the election of the party, and that he must elect the very first opportunity. The statute of frauds positively declares certain agreements void. By what rule have courts held under so many such laws that part performance, the admission of the contract, etc., took it out of the statute, but that leading one applicable in all instances, that the presumed intention must be followed even at the expense of the letter? Pennsylvania and other states have said that clauses even in their constitutions in reference to the passing of laws are directory. The judgments disregarding the letter of statutes by holding them directory when no mere interpretation could effectuate legislative intent, are still more numerous. Among the most learned discussions of this subject, resulting in as extensive assumption of judicial liberty as any to be found in modern books, are those by the courts of New York in relation to the word "corporation," and in reference to which it was held that, although certain organizations were such, they were not so within the meaning and spirit of the constitution. 3 Const. [3 N. Y.] 485; 4 Hill, 384; 23 Wend. 103; 7 Hill, 510; 3 Seld. [7 N. Y.] 328. They come within the letter but not the intention. Far within the limits of these and numerous other precedents, we are authorized to interpret the language of the thirtieth section of the act of 1867, as we propose, if such interpretation embodies the legislative intention. The letter and form will not stand in the way. It is said finally, these are criminal and penal laws, and must be construed in favor of the defendant if possible. If applicable this rule is in our way, for with much plausibility, to say the least, these laws might be differently rendered. We should be prepared to say, if necessary, however, that so far as statutes of limitation are concerned, and all the processes to bring an offender to trial, to ascertain his guilt, the old and irrational and frequently misapplied rules for the interpretation of penal and criminal acts have no application. It is only when the degree of punishment and the character of the offences are concerned, that they have been recognized. For the supreme court has said that all these laws intended to prevent fraud and protect the public revenue, should be liberally construed to effectuate the remedy and secure trial. That they must not be construed with other criminal and penal laws within the rule relied on. Cliquot v. U. S., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 115; Taylor v. U. S., 3 How. [44 U. S.] 197; 2 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 614; 7 Int. Rev. Rec. 6, and the earlier United States cases cited in these judgments. We should do violence to the reasons of these decisions were we to go back for maxims to the period when counsel and witnesses were denied to prisoners, in order to adopt a limitation which, in nine cases in ten, would enable this law to be evaded and the guilty to escape trial.

We should be quite satisfied with a judgment in conformity with this opinion, but when the cause was argued my Brother LEAVITT was on the bench. It is, therefore, pronounced by one member of the court as then constituted. He has now retired and cannot participate in it or dissent. My Brother SWING has not heard the arguments, and I am unwilling that these accidents shall deprive the defendant of the only opportunity he has under the laws to test the rectitude of this ruling. Had I no doubt, I would not take the step proposed, for it is by no means conceded that defendants have in all cases a right to what is called a full bench. Yet in no case, when after all available diligence, there remains such a condition of opinion as we find in this, have I failed when hearing the cause alone, at the request of defendant's counsel, and his undertaking in case of disagreement to follow the case to the supreme court to confer with my brethren, the district judges, and if the result create the occasion, unite in a certificate of division. If counsel ask it, such course will be taken in this cause. If so, they will submit additional copies of the briefs to the district judge, unless he is already supplied. I will add that two of the judges in other districts before whom similar questions are pending, concur in this judgment, and should Brother SWING also concur, it is likely to constitute the law of this circuit until congress affords—what we all deem highly impolitic to withhold—a review of our judgments by writ of error.

Case No. 15,013.

UNITED STATES v. DUTCHER.

[7 Int. Rev. Rec. 122; 1 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 60.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. April, 1868.

INTERNAL REVENUE—RECTIFIER'S BOOKS—NEGLECT TO KEEP.

It is not the intent of the internal revenue law [of 1866; 14 Stat. 98] that rectifiers or distillers shall be furnished with copies of the regulations and requirements thereof.

This was a libel for forfeiture of a rectifying establishment at Amboy, Ill., for neglecting to keep a book as required by the 26th section of the act of July 13, 1866. The claimant's counsel admitted that it was clearly proven to the jury that the book kept did not show all the spirits received and purchased, and sold or delivered; and Hon. Geo. C. Bates, on behalf of the defense, asked the court to charge the jury as follows: That if the jury believed from the evidence adduced that no rules and regulations for the keeping of a rectifier's book were ever prescribed, and furnished to the claimant by the commissioner of internal revenue as are provided for in section 26 of the act of July 13, 1866, they must find for the claimant, even though the books were not kept in accordance with the statute. That if the jury believed from the evidence adduced that the claimant has actually paid the excise tax of $2 per gallon "on every proof gallon so purchased or received by him, or sold or delivered" into the office of collector of that district, so that the United States has not been injured or defrauded in its revenue by the irregular entries in his book, that then they must find for the claimant, as they must be satisfied that his intent and purpose was, by irregular books, to defraud the revenue.

Before DRUMMOND, District Judge. The charge of the judge was against the positions above taken. His honor said to the jury: "The simple question is, has there been a failure on the part of the claimant to comply with the law in section 26 of said act, in regard to keeping his books as rectifier? It is clear that it is not the intent of the law that each rectifier or distiller shall be furnished with copies of the regulations and requirements. He must take proper pains to ascertain what the rules and regulations are. He must keep the book showing the facts required in the section referred to, even though the commissioner has prescribed nothing on the subject; and that a failure to keep a correct book under circumstances which indicate that it was through intent or gross negligence, would subject the party to the penalties of both fine and forfeiture prescribed in said section."

Case No. 15,014.

UNITED STATES v. DUTCHER.

[2 Biss. 51;[1] 8 Int. Rev. Rec. 161; 1 Chi. Leg. News, 57.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct. Term, 1868.

INTERNAL REVENUE—DISTILLERS' BONDS—PENALTY—MISTAKE OF OFFICER—TAX RATE.

1. The claim of the government under distillers' bonds for the payment of a tax, is not a penalty, nor in the nature of a penalty.

2. A bond given under the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 163], is not a penalty, but a contract and security, and is not affected by the repealing act of January 11, 1868 [14 Stat. 483], nor are suits or prosecutions instituted upon such a bond abated.

[Distinguished in U. S. v. Singer, Case No. 16,292.]

3. A distiller cannot avail himself of any mistake of the officer in overgauging the spirits. The law is imperative.

4. The tax must be paid at the rate prescribed by the law in force at the time the bonds were given.

Suit upon a distiller's bond given to the United States under the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 163).

Three cases were submitted to the court under the following state of facts: In November, 1866, the defendant Dutcher, who was a distiller, had certain highwines in a bonded warehouse at Amboy, Ill., and desired to remove them to New York, and thereupon made application to the proper authorities for leave to remove them, and in accordance with the law and practice, he gave bonds under which he was authorized to remove them from Amboy to a bonded warehouse in New York. Prior to their removal, in conformity with law, the highwines were inspected, and on their arrival in New York were again inspected, and it was ascertained that there was a deficiency in the quantity, as compared with what the inspection showed at Amboy, and there being three different bonds given, and a deficiency under each, on the 20th day of May, 1868, suit was brought upon the three separate bonds against Dutcher and the sureties, to recover for the deficiency.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. Various objections have been made on the part of the defendants, which I will proceed to consider in their order.

In the first place, it is claimed that the law under which these bonds were given, has been repealed by the law of January 11th, 1868 (14 Stat. 483). The law under which the bonds were given, was passed on the 13th of July, 1866. It is claimed that the repeal of the law of 1868 deprived the government of the right to institute suits upon these bonds, and also prevented the government from prosecuting them after suits had been instituted; in other words, that the repeal of the law puts an end to all proceedings connected with these bonds, and all right or claim to sue upon them—and on the ground that this is a penalty—the rule being that unless there is a saving clause all penalties under the law fall with the repeal of the law. This rule is not disputed and is well established. The only question connected with this part of the case is whether this is a penalty. We think it is not. The highwines were in the bonded warehouse at Amboy, for the purpose of securing the government in the payment of the tax. They were permitted to be removed to a bonded warehouse elsewhere (in this instance to New York), upon giving sufficient security. When they arrived at the bonded warehouse in New York, they were held there for the payment of the tax; they were taken out of the custody of the government and given to the owner, in order that they might be transferred, and, of course, the government losing all control of them, the bonds stand as security to the government for the payment of the tax and for nothing else. When the parties executed the bonds, they made a contract with the government, not in the nature of a penalty, but for the purpose simply of paying the tax which was due to the government. The only question is whether the repeal of the law, by the act of January 11th, 1868, which declares that thereafter the tax should be paid before distilled spirits should be removed from a bonded warehouse, destroyed the contract which the parties had previously made with the government for the payment of the tax. This contract was lawful when it was entered into. It was for the payment of a sum that was due to the government, and it is difficult to see how the mere repeal of the law can destroy the contract, and put an end to a right on the part of the government, which was absolute—namely, the payment of the tax. It is not a penalty. It is a sum claimed to be due the government for its support, like any other tax, and is not in the nature of a penalty. But independent of this, the repealing law, it is clear, was not intended to prevent the operation of such contracts as this. By virtue of prior laws the owner of highwines had a right to remove them from a bonded warehouse, upon giving a bond under such regulations as the commissioner of internal revenue might prescribe without the payment of the tax, and this law merely says that hereafter it cannot be done, but before the removal of the highwines from a bonded warehouse, all taxes must be paid, and then comes in the clause that, "All acts, and parts of acts, inconsistent with the provisions of this act be and are hereby repealed."

The contract that was thus made was not inconsistent with the provision. It was voluntarily entered into by the parties with a view of paying the taxes which were due the government. Therefore, it is clear—and both of us concur in this—as we do in all the conclusions given in deciding these cases—that the repealing law did not destroy the contract entered into between these parties and the government for the payment of the tax.

The next question is whether the parties are bound by the bonds which they have given, in which is stated the quantity of highwines, as by the inspection of the proper authority at Amboy. The evidence of the officer in New York and the officer at Amboy who inspected the highwines has been taken, and it appears from the evidence that the inspector at Amboy certified that the wines were of greater quantity than was the fact; in other words, that he gauged the casks of highwines too high.

The question is, whether the defendants can avail themselves of this difference, on the ground that there was a mistake made in gauging the liquors. We think they cannot. The 40th section of the act of 1866 provides that all distilled spirits which had been inspected, gauged, proved and marked by the inspector, according to the provisions of law, might be removed, without the payment of the taxes, from a bonded warehouse, under such rules and regulations and on such bond or security as the commissioner of internal revenue, subject to the approval of the secretary of the treasury, might prescribe, and that they might be transported to any general bonded warehouse; that after their arrival there they were to be inspected, and that "the tax shall be paid on the difference between the number of proof gallons stated in the bond given at the place of shipment and the number received at the warehouse, less the allowance for leakage as established by the regulations of the commissioner of internal revenue." Observe, the tax shall be paid on the difference between the number of gallons as stated in the bond and the number received at the warehouse less the allowance for leakage, etc., "and, except for actual destruction by unavoidable accident, by the elements or by the public enemy, no other allowance for loss shall be made." Now we think the language of this section imperative, and too explicit to allow us to admit any evidence tending to show that there was a mistake made in the gauging of the liquors, the language of the section being that the tax must be paid on the difference between what the bond states as inspected and the amount as received at the place of transfer, and that no other allowance shall be made except of a particular character, and the claim here not coming within the exception. That exception, of course, was intended to provide for any destruction without any fault or neglect on the part of the owner in the transit of the property from one bonded warehouse to another, as by fire, by breakage of cars, and everything of that sort. It is a hard rule, undoubtedly, for I am satisfied that there was a mistake made, but it is a mistake that we cannot remedy. They must, therefore, pay over the tax for the difference in the quantity after making all such allowances as the regulations prescribe, and as, after such allowance, there is a deficiency, which is admitted, for that deficiency the defendants are liable upon their bonds.

Another objection has been made, that, conceding the defendants are liable, they are liable only to the extent of sixty cents per gallon, and not for two dollars, as the law then was; and it is claimed that the bond stands in the place of the highwines, and if the wines were in the bonded warehouse in New York, the government could only have now what is the present tax, and could not recover or have what was the tax by the law of 1866. What has become of these highwines we do not know, whether they are there or have been sold, but the theory of the case proceeds upon the ground that the defendant, who owned these highwines, and in whose custody and control they were, has abstracted from the casks, without the payment of the tax, a certain quantity of liquor. Whether he has done so in fact or not, is not material, that is the theory upon which the cases proceed, and, of course, we must take it just as it exists, and decide upon the principle which there is in the cases, and that being so, the defendants must pay the tax which was due under the law in force at the time, namely, two dollars per gallon. However, as I am satisfied that there was a mistake, as I have already said, in the quantity of highwines as certified, it would afford me pleasure, and I have no doubt it will also my brother judge, to certify to the proper authority that the evidence does establish this conclusion, in order that the parties may apply there for a reduction of any sum which may be recovered against them. In this way the defendants may obtain the relief they ask from the court, and which we think the court is not competent to give. I have been told that the commissioner of internal revenue has in some instances taken sixty cents a gallon under similar circumstances. If that has been done, it shows (I understand it is now repudiated) an inconsistency which ought not to exist. But the courts of the country, while treating the decisions of a bureau at Washington with due respect, must decide all legal questions arising before them according to their own views of the law.

USAGE—INDIAN AGENT—EXTRA COMPENSATION—DISCRETION—DISALLOWANCE OF CLAIM—NEW TRIAL.

1. A usage, which is to govern a question of right between parties, must be so certain, uniform, and notorious, as to be understood and known by them.

2. The usage of a department of the government, in settling its accounts, can have no effect on those of an individual unless it is certain, uniform and notorious.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Ingersoll, Case No. 15,440.]

3. Although the salary of an Indian agent is fixed under the provisions of the act of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 461], at a certain sum, yet he has a right to an allowance in addition, for such services or expenditures as are authorised by a general usage of the department of war.

4. Where a charge, not prohibited by law, is supported by a clear equity arising from a bonâ fide performance of service by a public officer, or a bonâ fide expenditure of money for the public service, a discretion is properly vested in the head of a department of the government to allow it, although there is no express authority for it, and it is not a subject of strict legal right.

5. In all cases where a discretion is confided to the head of a department of the government, to allow or disallow a charge of a public officer, a court and jury have the same discretion over the charge, when it comes before them for revision and examination.

6. Where a public officer, at the request of the head of a department, performs other public duties than those properly belonging to his office, he is entitled to extra compensation.

[Cited in U. S. v. Ingersoll, Case No. 15,440.]

7. Expenditures made by an Indian agent, for the benefit of the Indians, and on a tract of land reserved and held by themselves, are not to be charged to the United States.

8. Under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1797 [1 Stat. 512], no claim of a public officer for a credit, can be admitted on a trial, unless it has been presented to and disallowed by the accounting officers of the treasury.

9. A suspension of a claim for a credit, by the accounting officers of the treasury, is not a disallowance, although no particular form of allowance or disallowance is required.

10. Where a controversy consists chiefly of questions of fact, the objections to a verdict must be very cogent to induce the court to grant a new trial.

[Cited in Briscoe v. Bronaugh, 1 Tex. 326.]

11. Where a jury render a verdict against the plain principles of law, as laid down by the court, and against clear and unquestioned evidence, the court will grant a new trial notwithstanding the particular circumstances or general justice of the case.

[1] [Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

On the 25th of January, 1833, suit was brought in this court by the United States against the representatives of Edward W. Duval [Ellen Duval, and William Duval], to recover eleven thousand five hundred and thirty-eight dollars and fifty-four cents, for that sum of money alleged to have been received by him in his life time, and to be still due and unpaid. To this suit the defendants pleaded the general issue. The case came to be tried before HOPKINSON, District Judge, and a special jury, on the 3d of June, 1833, when the material facts established were as follows:

On the 7th of October, 1824, Mr. Duval was appointed Indian agent to the Cherokees on the Arkansas, and gave bond to the United States with two sureties, in the sum of ten thousand dollars, for the faithful discharge of the duties of the office. There being no agency house, he was authorized to build one at an expense not exceeding two thousand dollars. Finding, however, on his arrival there, that the other duties of his station prevented his attention to this object, and having a house of his own, such part of it as was necessary was occupied for the public use, and a rent of one hundred and twenty dollars per annum, allowed by the government. In 1826, however, it being considered absolutely necessary, he was directed to purchase a house at the cost first specified. This he did on the 31st of March, 1827, but the building requiring much alteration and repair, was not completed till the end of December, 1829, though partially occupied in June preceding; the entire cost of purchase, alterations, and repairs having amounted to two thousand six hundred and seventy-nine dollars and sixty cents. Mr. Duval was also directed to build, for the use of the Indians, a cotton gin, but limited to seven hundred dollars; the Indians themselves wishing a better one, offered him five hundred dollars more from their own funds, and ultimately agreed, should it cost above twelve hundred dollars, to supply the excess; it was finished in 1829, for eighteen hundred and seventy dollars and ninety-four cents. Immediately after his appointment, and with these instructions as well as others in regard to the general discharge of his duties as agent, Mr. Duval went to Arkansas. He remained there until January, 1828, acting to the entire satisfaction of the government, and obtaining much influence among the Indian tribes. He devoted himself especially to carry through the plan of removing the Indians over the Mississippi, and was entrusted with large disbursements for that object. His accounts appear to have been regularly rendered up to this time. In the winter of 1827, the Cherokees, urged on as they represented by the pressure of heavy grievances, determined to send a delegation to Washington, without the usual previous permission to do so, and with some difficulty prevailed on Mr. Duval to accompany it, on the 3d of January, 1828. This visit led to negotiations of importance, in which he acted as the principal negotiator for the government. They ended in a treaty with the Cherokees, on the 6th of May, 1828, for the cession of their territory lying within the boundaries of Arkansas, and removal beyond its western limits. By the fourth article, however, a small tract, on which various improvements had been made, was reserved from the general cession, and agreed to be sold by the United States, who were specially to apply the proceeds to erect a mill and other works, for the benefit of the Cherokees, in their new country. On the 6th of June the delegation left Washington to return home. Mr. Duval remained until the month of November following, up to which time he settled his accounts. He then returned to Arkansas, entrusted with carrying into effect the treaty made in the spring; and was also appointed agent for the Choctaws west of the Mississippi, though without any allowance for additional compensation. He was besides directed to receive the emigrant Indians from Georgia and the adjoining states, at the mouth of White river, and to provision and transport them west of Arkansas. On the 22d of April, 1829, the reservation, above referred to, was sold by the United States with all the improvements made upon it; the proceeds were two thousand and fifty dollars, and were applied to the benefit of the Indians on the new territory to which they removed. The reservation in question was purchased by Mr. Duval himself, and remained in his possession and that of his representatives, until the 26th of April, 1832, when the sale was cancelled by the secretary of war, on the ground that such a purchase ought not to be made by an Indian agent. To this decision his representatives assented, and the sum given by Mr. Duval was repaid. After his return to the agency, for a period of fourteen months, Mr. Duval received and disbursed very large sums of money in the performance of his various duties. He failed, however, to render any account during the whole of that time, by reason, as was afterwards alleged, of his constant engagement in the public service. After waiting till the 15th of January, 1830, the secretary of war informed him that the provisions of the law of January 31, 1823, relative to punctual settlements, being positive, and the accounting officers of the treasury having reported his failure to comply with them for so long a period, no other course was left than his removal. On the 15th of September, 1830, Mr. Duval died in Arkansas, no adjustment of his accounts having been made. In the spring of 1832, his representatives presented an account of the disbursements made by him, and his various claims for expenditures, allowances, and compensation, which resulted in a balance alleged to be due to him from the United States, of three thousand nine hundred and sixty-five dollars and fifty-one cents. On an examination of this account by the accounting officers of the treasury, numerous items of charge were rejected, as inadmissible, or not sufficiently proved, and on the 26th of April, 1832, according to their report, he was at the time of his death actually indebted to the United States in the sum of eleven thousand five hundred and thirty-eight dollars and fifty-four cents, the debt to recover which this suit was brought.

The difference between the two accounts, amounting altogether to fifteen thousand five hundred and four dollars and five cents, was made up of numerous charges which were classed under the following general items; viz.

1. The rent of his house for the agency, from October 1, 1826, to December 31, 1829.....	$ 390 00

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty.

The amount in dispute in this case is large, but it is also important from the circumstances connected with it. Nearly three years have elapsed since the death of Mr. Duval, so that the fullest opportunity has been afforded to elucidate and explain every part of the transactions. The whole accounts have been thoroughly investigated by the accounting officers of the treasury, with the aid of his representatives, and under the immediate inspection of those officers of the government, who have long been versed in all the minutiæ of such accounts, and are well acquainted with the expenditures necessary for an Indian agent. We are to consider in the outset the duties of the agent, his compensation, and the disbursements he can lawfully claim allowance for. His duties, as defined by law, are to receive and dispose of goods to the Indians on public account, to carry into effect the various provisions of the treaties with them, and to account regularly every quarter. His compensation was at first a salary and certain rations, but in 1818 it was fixed at fifteen hundred dollars, to embrace all allowances for himself, his clerks, and every service connected with his office. His disbursements are either those necessary to his place, or such as are extra and contingent; before he can claim allowance for them, all, even the most necessary, must be accurately vouched; when, however, they are extra or contingent expenditures, a mere voucher of their having been made is not sufficient, they are not left to his own discretion, they must be sanctioned by the secretary of war, or proper officer of the department. These rules are to govern us in admitting or rejecting the claims that are now made by Mr. Duval's representatives; such as are strictly within the duties of his office must be satisfactorily proved; such as are not must have the sanction of the department.

The first two items are evidently contingent, and are expressly refused by the treasury for want of the proper sanction. Nor are they just. In the first, rent is charged for his own house long after one had been purchased by the United States, or at least long after Mr. Duval had received the money to purchase one; and in the second, he was performing the duties of his office at a distance from his agency, but certainly not with more labour, and for this he was receiving his salary. The next three items depend entirely on vouchers of the sufficiency of which the jury must judge. The sixth, however, is clearly within the provision for compensation fixed by law, and to authorise its allowance in addition, the sanction of the department even would scarcely suffice; yet this is entirely wanting. The claim for compensation for the Choctaw agency, is directly at variance with the terms entered into on his appointment, which were, that there should be no additional allowance. The payment to Graves is provided for by the treaty, and was to be made by the United States; it was actually paid at the treasury; and this payment by Mr. Duval was without authority, which he ought first to have obtained. The next item is a matter of proof, the object of the expenditures being within the duties of the agent. The three which follow are altogether contingent, altogether such as an agent ought not to make without previous authority; to send a messenger to Washington at a heavy expense, when the documents could have been transmitted by mail; to employ an additional interpreter when there was one attached to this tribe, and regularly in the service and pay of the United States; and to charge the United States with the keeping of his own horses, when his compensation is fixed by law, and limited to a sum which is expressly to include all the charges for his official acts and services; these are expenditures which, if allowed on the mere discretion of the agent, and without the sanction of those officers whom the law authorises to control him, would lead to the most lavish system. The thirteenth item is an expenditure by an agent directly contrary to his instructions, which limited him to two thousand dollars. The fourteenth and fifteenth are charges that never should have been made to the United States; in their cession the Indians made a "reservation" of a small tract of land for their own use; on this a cotton gin was erected for them, towards which the United States agreed to contribute seven hundred dollars and no more; certain improvements which the Indians wanted were also made for them; the disbursements were made by the agent, but were entirely for the benefit of the Indians; any additional ones, therefore, on the house, on the gin, or on the reservation itself, were chargeable to them; they knew the limitation fixed on the buildings; they expressly retained the reservation as their exclusive property; the agent was equally acquainted with both circumstances; the former never expected these payments to be made by the United States, and the latter had no right to charge them with them. Most of the charges embraced in the eight following items are matters of proof for the jury, but among them are found some, contingent in their character, and being without the sanction of the war department, inadmissible. To the last or twenty-fourth item, there is an evident and unanswerable objection; it has never been disallowed by the treasury; it is not included among the rejected items making up the balance claimed from Mr. Duval. The fourth section of the act of March 3, 1797, expressly declares, that in suits between the United States and individuals, no claim for a credit shall be admitted upon the trial, but such as have been presented and disallowed by the accounting officers, which is not the case with this item. In fact, the treasury have given the defendants time to produce their proof; they are not disposed to reject it; it is not the subject of controversy now as to its principle; there is nothing that makes it yet a proper matter for the investigation of this tribunal. 1 Story, Laws, 464 [1 Stat. 512]; 2 Story, Laws, 1189, 1191 [2 Stat. 653, 654].

J. R. Ingersoll and Mr. Sergeant, for defendants.

The existence of a suit does not in any degree authorise the inference that there is any, the smallest, amount unaccounted for by the public officer. It does not necessarily imply that the accounting officers of the government ever thought that such was the case. It is perhaps deemed a convenient mode of settling an account which must be settled somewhere, and justice is not anticipated in her results by any of the preliminary proceedings. The argument on behalf of the United States seems to presume, that the decision here is to be controlled by what the public officers at Washington have done, or have refused to do. This is not so. The whole matter is before the court and jury, and on the broadest equitable principles. It is no doubt true, that in settling accounts at the treasury, the accounting officers require the sanction of the head of the department for an expenditure evidently contingent; but this court and jury do not require his sanction; they have the same power to make the allowance that he has, and so the supreme court has expressly decided. More than this, if the accounting officers or the secretary should reject a claim because not authorized by law, this court could allow it, should they deem it equitable. It has been alleged, that, as the claim for many of these expenditures rests on the usage of the department in allowing them, and the sanction of the secretary has been always given to such allowances, consequently his sanction forms part of the usage; but to this it is answered, that the sanction of the secretary is not a constituent part of the usage, which is limited to the thing done and the circumstances necessarily attendant on it; if it has been usual for the secretary to allow a charge, and he shall refuse to do so in a particular instance, the court and jury are to do what he ought to have done. These principles have all been clearly established by the supreme court. U. S. v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 1; U. S. v. Ripley, Id. 18; U. S. v. Fillebrown, Id. 28.

The first item of charge hardly admits of a question; the United States agreed to furnish an agency house, and one fit to live in was not finished till December 31, 1829; of course they must pay the rent till that time; nor did Mr. Duval receive any money until he bought the new house; he was merely authorised to draw it before; it was a credit, not a payment. To his compensation in effecting the treaty he is justly entitled; his great services are proved; it was not part of his duty as an Indian agent; he was expressly requested to act by the government; and similar allowances have been made in cases exactly similar. The third, fourth and fifth items were rejected for want of vouchers, which have been furnished at this trial, and of course remove the objection. The expenses of Mr. Duval, at the council, have been admitted by the accounting officers, but the item has been rejected because it includes a charge for the loss of his horse: we have proved this loss to have been in the service of the United States, and occasioned by duties he was performing for them; a circumstance giving him an unquestionably equitable claim. His charge as Choctaw agent is for his expenses; the agreement that he was not to receive additional compensation, never was intended to deprive him of the repayment of expenses, expressly occasioned by his assuming gratuitously a new duty. The double payment to Graves is an error which ought not to fall on Mr. Duval; he was authorised to make it under the general agency connected with the treaty; he did so; after he had actually paid it in Arkansas, the treasury pays it, without inquiring, at Washington; the blame is there, and Mr. Duval must not be made to suffer. We have fully proved the expenditures in the ninth item. Those in the tenth and eleventh are of the most equitable character; important accounts and vouchers were to be transmitted through the wilderness; they related to the fulfilment of an interesting treaty; the expenditure of thousands of dollars depended on them. So in the employment of an interpreter, surely in adjusting an important treaty, it was no extravagant exercise of discretion for Mr. Duval to have his own interpreter, in addition to the one belonging to the Indian delegation; the United States were the sole gainers by it, and to throw the expense on their authorised agent would be manifestly unjust. Mr. Duval was allowed to purchase two horses at the expense of the United States; he did not do so, but employed his own in their service; to pay him for their forage is surely most equitable; and it never was intended that, under such circumstances, it should be deducted from his compensation. The limitation of two thousand dollars for the agency house was applicable to the cost of the building; this excess has arisen from the land, and that land has since become the property of the United States: will they make the agent pay from his own pocket for property they hold themselves, especially when he has proved the bona fide expenditure of the sum in a purchase directed by them? The expenditures on the reservation were made by Mr. Duval; no doubt at first for the Indians, but by the treaty the United States agreed to sell this reservation and give the proceeds to the Indians; they have done so, and paid them the whole sum it brought with the improvements; but at the time of sale these improvements had not been paid for, and the United States were bound either to deduct their cost from the sum received and pay it to Mr. Duval, who made them, if the treaty meant the net proceeds; or if it meant that the Indians were to receive the whole for a gift as it stood, then they were to pay off the cost of the improvements besides; in either case, as the sale of the property was entrusted to them, Mr. Duval has a right to look to them for this payment. The remaining items, except the last, depend entirely on the sufficiency of the proof, and that offered on this trial seems in most respects amply sufficient. In fact, the only cases not almost indisputable, are those of the allowance to the blacksmith, McDavid, for his assistance in the nineteenth item, and to Flower, for his services as a commissary in furnishing provisions: it is alleged that these are included in the general payments of their respective contracts, but the evidence appears sufficient to show that they were extra expenditures, and entitled to a separate allowance. The twenty-fourth item ought to be submitted to the jury; it is part of the same transaction which should be definitively closed by their verdict; the charge itself is very just: Mr. Duval purchased the land without any idea that the government would disapprove of it; he expended this money on it when it was his own; the United States took it from him and now retain it; they have the benefit of all he did, and of course ought to pay for it. It has, however, been submitted to the treasury and there suspended, which is tantamount to a disallowance; it therefore forms a set-off, such a one as would be indisputable between man and man; such a one as the act referred to by the district attorney never meant to exclude; the intention of that law was, to give the United States an opportunity of examining, through its officers, the claims presented, before they were submitted to a judicial investigation; this has been done, and the accounting officers have not been satisfied of their correctness; in no respect, therefore, will the United States suffer any injustice by its admission, while the defendants will be subjected to great hardship by a refusal.

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty., in reply.

It has not been contended that the jury are to be bound by the decisions of the accounting officers; but merely that their reasons in rejecting many of the claims are entitled to great weight, as persons well acquainted with the usages in regard to such agencies, and the nature of the vouchers, and having no interest whatever. This ought especially to weigh in the present case, because these accounts have been all made up since the death of Mr. Duval, and every rejected item is presented for the first time since that event, though the actual disbursements took place before. It is to be remembered too, that though the amount in dispute is large in itself, yet it is not so in comparison with the aggregate of Mr. Duval's disbursements, which was probably more than a million of dollars. The principles which govern the allowances here are simple. First, to allow Mr. Duval the specific sum for his own compensation and expenses which the law authorises. Secondly, to require adequate proof of all his disbursements. Thirdly, where the disbursements have not been specifically authorised by law or settled usage, to require the sanction of the secretary of war. To the last, which embraces most of these disputed charges, the defendant's counsel object. They deny the necessity of the allowance of the secretary in contingent expenditures, and assert that if the jury think them proper, that is sufficient. To this it is answered that the law means to require the secretary specially to superintend all contingent expenditures, he is held responsible for the disbursement of the contingent fund for Indian affairs, he is obliged to report annually every payment made from it, he knows what an agent in remote districts, in Arkansas for instance, ought to apply it to, which surely a jury in Philadelphia cannot. The allowance therefore of the secretary converts what is contingent into a specific expenditure. The appropriation by law is general when first made; this sanction makes it specific; it does what congress have done in many points, and would have done in all, could they have known every want of the agency. When the defendants rest their claim on a usage of the department, they seem to admit this principle; for that usage is itself an implied sanction. It is in their application of the usage to their particular claims that they fail; a uniform or general admission of the very same allowance must be proved, which they have failed to do; in the Case of Macdaniel, the express approval of the same services for which he claimed compensation was proved on previous and repeated occasions, and the question was as to the amount of compensation; in the Case of Fillebrown there was an implied contract to do the act previously ascertained, the amount of compensation alone was left unsettled.

It is contended therefore that in regard to all disbursements, falling within the class which is to be paid from the appropriation for "contingencies," the following rules are to govern the allowance: (1) That the appropriation is made by law, to be applied only to such cases as the secretary of war sanctions, and consequently, that all claims for "contingencies" not sanctioned by him, must be allowed by the legislature, not by the courts. (2) That if such claims could be the subject of judicial allowance, still, in the absence of any express contract between the government and Mr. Duval, as to the services performed or the amount to be paid for them, the evidence of the implied contract must rest upon the usage proved in the cause; that according to such usage the allowance for contingencies, both as to the necessity of the services and the amount to be paid for them, has been invariably governed by the decision of the secretary of war in each particular case; that therefore no claim for contingencies ought to be allowed to the defendants, which has not been specifically sanctioned by the secretary of war. (3) That there was an implied contract between Mr. Duval and the government, to take such sum for every contingent service performed by him, as might be allowed by the existing head of the department at the time of settling his account; that therefore his representatives can claim nothing for contingent services without such allowance. These principles are not in opposition to the decisions of the supreme court, which have been cited; they place the judgment on an officer who is well fitted by his situation to form a correct one, and whom congress have obliged to report annually and made responsible; to do otherwise would be to submit to the uncontrolled discretion of a subordinate agent, in a remote place, who is amenable to no one whatever.

If these rules be correct, then the claims of Mr. Duval for allowances for the rent of his own house from April 1, 1827, to December 31, 1829; for his services at Washington, in procuring the acceptance of the treaty of May 6, 1828, by the Cherokees; for the loss of his horse in going to an Indian council; for forage of his own horses from January 1, 1826, to August 1, 1830; and for special services rendered by himself at the agency; not having been sanctioned by the secretary of war ought not to be allowed. They were all services of his own, rendered in the performance of those duties for which he received by law a specific compensation. and if the secretary, who knew all the facts and circumstances, did not consider them as extraordinary, they ought not to be paid for from the contingent fund. The same remark may be made as to his employment of expresses and an additional interpreter; they are expenditures in relation to the ordinary duties of his agency, of the propriety of which the head of the war department could best judge, as well as of the fund from which they ought to be paid. As to the claims of Mr. Duval, for allowances for disbursements made by him on the property and improvements called the "Cherokee Reservation," mentioned in the fourth article of the treaty of May 6, 1828; viz. for building and repairing the agency house, over and above the sum of two thousand dollars, either before or after the sale of the reservation; for erecting a cotton gin, over and above the sum of seven hundred dollars; and for expenditures charged by him to the "Cherokee Reservation," and made previous to the sale, they ought not any of them to be allowed, because they are not legally chargeable against the United States. In the first two expenditures Mr. Duval was allowed certain sums by the United States, which he received and expended; he has no right to ask more from them; the land belonged to the Cherokees; all that Mr. Duval expended on it, whether on the buildings in addition, or in improvements, was for them and they must pay him; he had no lien on the land; it was sold by the United States under the treaty and the proceeds paid over to the Cherokees; if the sale was incorrect or imperfect it is to be sold again, and if it brings more the surplus must be paid to them also; but until actually sold it was or is the property of the Indians, and to them Mr. Duval must look for repayment. The same principles are to be applied by the jury in considering all the other items, except the last, which falls under the class of contingencies; the rest, which are matters of proof, must depend entirely on the evidence. As to the twenty-fourth item, the law is too clear to admit of doubt; it requires expressly that every credit claimed shall have been disallowed; this has not been done; a suspension is not a disallowance; a suspension followed by a suit for a balance which includes the sum suspended, might be an implied disallowance; but a sum presented, suspended, and not embraced in the amount claimed on suit by the United States, is not a disallowance either express or implied; on the contrary, it leaves the inference that the claim is believed to be just, and will be admitted on proper proof being produced, for which time is now given.

HOPKINSON, District Judge (charging jury). It is more than two weeks, that your attention has been closely and patiently given to this interesting and complicated cause, in which an endless variety of facts, intermixed with questions of law and usage, is involved. The long account which has been spread before you, contains twenty-four principal items which are disputed, and which again are subdivided so as to amount to nearly one hundred subjects of controversy. It is now my duty to present to your consideration such views of the case, as I may believe will assist you in making up your verdict. I might, perhaps, perform this duty with more order and in a better shape, by postponing the charge until to-morrow; but I have determined to proceed with it at once, while the evidence and arguments are more fresh in our recollection than they may be twenty-four hours hence. The items for which the defendants now claim a credit have been rejected by the officers of the treasury at Washington, and, as to some of them, the refusal is justified by insisting upon the usage of the department in settling such accounts. You will understand that an usage, which is to govern a question of right, between parties in this court, must be so certain, uniform, and notorious that you may say that it was understood and known to the parties. In such a case we cannot say that it is allowed to change or control the contract between them, but rather that it is a part of the contract, and was so understood, and, of course, is as binding upon them as any other stipulation in it. The usages of a department of the government in settling an account with an individual, unless it be such a one as I have described, can have no influence here.

There is another question of somewhat the same character, upon which it is proper I should be very explicit with you, and if I am mistaken in my view of it, the dissatisfied party has the means of correcting my error. It has been repeatedly and ardently urged upon us, by the district attorney, that as to certain charges in this account, that is, those which are embraced in or applicable to what is called, "the contingent fund," the decision upon them by the secretary of war is final and conclusive, that his decision may not be reversed and disturbed here, and that in case of hardship or injustice in the refusal to make allowances to a public agent for such charges, congress only can grant relief. I entirely and distinctly dissent from this doctrine, although we are assured that such is the understanding and practice of the war department, and the treasury officers at Washington. If this cause comes to this court and jury trammelled, nay decided, by the judgment of the secretary of war, to what purpose has the party a right to bring it here; the trial is an unreal mockery, and you and I are the mere automata of a stronger hand, the agents to execute the decree of a higher power. I say to you, that in every case where the law of congress allows or refuses a charge in the account of a public agent, the secretary, as well as you and I, are bound by that law and must conform ourselves to it; but that in the cases where the law is not imperative, but confides to the secretary an authority, a discretion to allow or disallow a charge, as he may deem it to be just and equitable, or otherwise, then when the cause comes to this court for revision and examination, the court and jury have the same discretion and authority over such charges as the secretary had in the first instance, and we may exercise our judgments upon them in allowing or disallowing them, as we may think justice and equity demand. The opinion of the secretary will have the influence to which his character and station entitle him and no more. As an authority it is nothing.

I should be diffident of using this language to you if I were not supported in it by the highest judicial tribunal of our country. I understand the doctrine of the supreme court to be such as I have given it to you. Let me repeat it. When a certain charge is prohibited to a public agent by the law under and by which he is appointed, the allowance of such a charge would be a violation of the law, which is not permitted either to the court or the head of a department. But when there is no such prohibition, but the objection or defect is the want of an express authority for it, and it is therefore not a subject of strict legal right, yet nevertheless if it is supported by a clear equity arising from a bona fide performance of a service, or the bona fide expenditure of money for the public service, there a discretion is properly and indeed necessarily vested in the head of the proper department to allow the charge. If it were not so the consequence would be, either that the service and interests of the government would often suffer, or that a meritorious officer would be ruined by his fidelity and zeal. Whenever and wherever the head of a department may exercise his discretion upon such a charge, and in the use of that discretion, has refused the allowance, and the court and jury before whom the case shall come for trial, think that the secretary ought to have made the allowance, they may do it. This doctrine is sustained by the supreme court in the cases of U. S. v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 12, in that of U. S. v. Ripley, Id. 25, 26, and in that of U. S. v. Fillebrown, Id. 48. I hold then that you are not bound by any thing the secretary, the comptroller, or the auditor has done with the charges in this account, be they contingent or not contingent.

We must now make a review as brief as possible, of the particular subjects of controversy in this cause. The treasury transcript, which is primâ facie evidence of the indebtedness of the defendant, shows a balance due from him to the United States of eleven thousand five hundred and thirty-eight dollars and seventy-five cents. This stands good against him, unless he can extinguish or reduce it by showing that he has just claims or is entitled to credits which have been refused in the settlement of his account at the treasury. He has presented to you certain claims and credits which were not allowed at the treasury, and you are now to decide whether they ought to have been allowed; whether they are such as the justice of his case entitled him to. (The judge took up the several items in their order, recapitulated the evidence, and made his remarks on each of them. It is only as to some of them that it is thought now necessary to repeat his observations.)

Item 2. This is for charges of an Indian treaty at Washington. It consists of two parts: (1) His expenses. This was allowed at Washington. (2) For his services in negotiating the treaty. He had no appointment as a commissioner for that purpose; but did he render the service of one? It is proved that he did, and that his services were indispensable to the success of the negotiation. Did he volunteer his services? If he did. he is not entitled to this charge; but it is proved that he acted by the request of the secretary of war, and that he did the duties of a commissioner. It was an extra service, not within the line of his duty as an Indian agent. His compensation should be what is allowed in similar cases, for the same services. If he did the duties of a commissioner, he is entitled to the compensation of one.

Item 8. This is a charge of eleven hundred and twenty-five dollars, paid by the defendant to one Thomas Graves, for damages for spoliations. The treaty appropriated eight thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars, for spoliations committed on the Cherokees; also a further sum of twelve hundred dollars for Graves; also five hundred dollars for one Guest, and five hundred dollars for one Rogers. All these sums were put into the hands of the agent to be distributed according to the terms of the treaty. The agent, it is not doubted, paid to Graves the money due to him; but it appears that the government also paid it to Rogers, on an order drawn by Graves. It has thus been twice paid. Who is to bear the loss? The party on whom the fault rests; the party who incautiously made the payment. The money was given by the government to Duval as their agent, to be paid by him to Graves; he therefore not only had the authority to pay it, but it was his duty. He did pay it honestly and in good faith, on the order of Graves, in several sums at different times ending in 1830, and part of it was paid by Mr. Murray after the death of Mr. Duval. After Graves had thus given orders on Mr. Duval for the whole amount due to him, which orders were paid without a suspicion of fraud, he most dishonestly gave an order on the government to Rogers for twelve hundred dollars, which was presented by Rogers and paid to him by the government. Now is there any doubt where the fault, the want of due caution, was? When this order was presented, the government well knew that the whole amount to be paid for spoliations, of course including that due to Graves, had been put into the hands of their agent, Mr. Duval, to be by him distributed to the persons entitled to it. Yet without making any inquiry why this order was drawn on them, why Mr. Duval had not been applied to, or if he had, why he had not paid it, or whether it was or was not paid, they accept and pay the order thus fraudulently drawn, and as to which the fraud would have been detected by the exercise of the most ordinary prudence. This is not all; Graves had another claim for one hundred and seventy-five dollars, under the general appropriation for damages, by the same treaty, but the specific appropriation only was put into the hands of Mr. Duval. The claim for one hundred and seventy-five dollars, which if due was properly drawn for on them, was refused, while the other was paid. The only ground taken now for refusing to Mr. Duval the allowance, is that the payments made by him, on the orders of Graves, were not presented in the settlement of Mr. Duval's account of 1830 and 1831. This is doubtful. Mr. Murray swears that they were then presented; the auditor says they were not; of the fact you will judge; but whether they were or were not, the defendant has a clear right to the allowance.

Item 13. This is a charge of six hundred and seventy-nine dollars and sixty cents for erecting the agency house. Some important questions are involved in it. In 1827 a house was purchased by Mr. Duval for seven hundred and fifty dollars, with the site. It was but a log cabin with a frame store house. The new building, erected about two miles and a half from the old one, cost with the seven hundred and fifty dollars paid for the old one, the sum of two thousand six hundred and seventy-nine dollars and sixty cents. The agent had distinct orders not to exceed the sum of two thousand dollars for this object; he was expressly limited to that amount. He now presents a charge against the United States for six hundred and seventy-nine dollars and sixty cents, the excess of his expenditure beyond his orders. The disbursements are said, by the witness, to have been made with economy. But will this justify the agent for disregarding his orders and exceeding his authority? Nothing can be more dangerous than the admission of such a principle. It is like any other case of principal and agent. The agent of the United States stands bound by the same law, as the agent of any individual. In both cases the question is: has he exceeded his instructions clearly and distinctly given, in which there is no equivocation, and nothing left him but to obey? If he has, he must answer for it; all he has done beyond his authority is of himself and for himself, and he must take it upon himself. It is not like the case where an agent, having no specific instructions, and being called upon to act, exercises a sound and honest discretion. In the face of clear and positive orders, there is nothing for discretion to decide. It is pretended that the limitation of two thousand dollars had reference only to the building of the house, and not to the purchase of the land. The purchase of the house necessarily included the land on which it stood. The whole expenditure for an agency house was not to exceed two thousand dollars. In purchasing the reservation, on which this house stood, the log cabin and frame store were valued at four hundred dollars, and the ground at three hundred and fifty. To this seven hundred and fifty he had a right to add thirteen hundred and fifty for bettering the accommodation, and no more. He has exceeded this amount by the sum of six hundred and seventy-nine dollars and sixty cents, which he now claims from the United States. I think he is not entitled to it.

Item 14. This was a charge for expenditures in erecting a cotton gin and gin house. These improvements were erected partly in 1827, partly in 1828, and not completed until 1829. The government had allowed the agent to expend the sum of seven hundred dollars; but he had expended beyond that amount eleven hundred and seventy dollars and ninety-four cents, which he now charges to the government. He was allowed the seven hundred. The witness, Mr. Murray, testified that the sum allowed was not sufficient to erect a suitable house. The cotton gin was in the reservation, and was included in the sale of that land. This excess of his authority and orders can hardly be justified. If he found the sum allowed too small, he should have so represented it to the government and waited for new instructions. The excess was not trifling; it was nearly three times the amount allowed. The defendant did not claim this allowance, but gave it up as not chargeable to the government. But there is another view of this charge, which seems to me to exclude the defendant from any claim upon it. By a treaty with the Indians on the 6th of May, 1828, they made a cession of certain territory to the United States, with a special reservation of a part of it. By this reservation, the part reserved with all the improvements on it, was agreed to be sold by the United States, and the proceeds of the sale were to be applied to the benefit of the Indians on the new territory to which they removed. The cotton gin and improvements in question were erected upon this reserved part, and of course were to be sold with it. The sale was accordingly made. The proceeds were the sum of two thousand and fifty dollars, which were fully and faithfully applied to the use of the Cherokees, in conformity with the agreement. This sum was the proceeds of the land and of all the improvements on it, and of course, when the United States paid over this sum to the use of the Indians, they paid the value of those improvements as well as of the land. It is now contended that the government must pay the defendant for these same improvements; thus paying for them twice; once to the Indians, for whom they were erected on their own territory, and again to the defendant, who had erected them at his own hazard, so far as he exceeded his authority in their cost. Nor has the defendant any reason to complain: he is only sent back to the persons for whom and on whose credit, to wit, the Cherokees, he made these improvements. He had no idea that the United States were answerable to him for them: so he says in his memorandum of the 20th of May, 1828. If he were living we cannot suppose he would make this charge. Mr. Duval was himself the purchaser of the land, with the improvements, at the public sale. It is true that this sale was afterwards cancelled by an agreement between his representatives and the United States, by which he transferred his right to them, on the ground that he, being the Indian agent, could not be the purchaser at such sale; but I do not see that this circumstance gives any equity to this charge which can address itself to this court and jury. If his purchase was illegal and void, by reason of his agency, he gave up nothing by cancelling it, or by the transfer of his right to the United States. If his purchase was legal, the surrender was voluntary and without condition. If his representatives intended to charge the United States, on account of this transfer, with this debt, in addition to the amount which the land sold for, they should have said so, and made it a condition of the transfer. The only consideration which appears to have been given by the United States, or asked by Mr. Duval's representatives, is the repayment to them of the sum of two thousand and fifty dollars, which he had given for it at the sale. Now they would add nearly twelve hundred dollars to this consideration, without any notice of any such intention or expectation. Suppose this sale or transfer by them had been made to one of you; would you expect to be called upon to pay, not only the stipulated price or consideration, but also to discharge an old debt, not charged upon the land, which the Cherokees owe to Mr. Duval for the very improvements included in your purchase and paid for by you? I am very clear that this charge ought not to be allowed, but that the Cherokees, the original debtors, at whose request, on whose credit, and for whose use the improvements were made, must be looked to for payment. They have indeed received compensation for them in the price paid to them on the sale of the land with them.

Item 15. This charge must also be disallowed. These expenditures were made on the land, when it belonged to the Indians, or at least they had the beneficial interest in it. They were on the tract reserved for the benefit of the Indians. Mr. Murray, the witness of the defendants, who was connected with the agency as the clerk of the agent, and a member of his family, expressly says, that he believes Mr. Duval considered the Cherokee Nation as responsible to him for this expenditure; that he considered the whole matter to be between the Cherokees and himself, and not with the government. Indeed the charge is not to the United States, but to the "Cherokee Reservation." Mr. Duval never presented the charge to the government in his life time.

Item 24. This is a charge of fourteen hundred and twenty-seven dollars and seventy-five cents, for expenditures on the Cherokee reservation. The counsel for the defendants states that these expenses were made on the land, after the purchase of it by Mr. Duval, and while he thought it his own; afterwards the sale to him was cancelled, and the land, with these improvements, transferred to the United States, the secretary of war saying that Mr. Duval, being the agent of the government, was prohibited from purchasing. The United States having thus taken these improvements ought to reimburse Mr. Duval for them; he made them believe that he had a right to the land. But we are precluded from taking this charge into our consideration. We need not therefore take into our consideration the objections that are made to it, to wit, that it has no date, no signature, no bills or receipts, nor any thing to prove the expenditures for which a reimbursement is claimed. The preliminary difficulty is that this charge has never been presented to the department for their allowance or disallowance. It has of consequence never been rejected by the accounting officers of the treasury. By the fourth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1797, it is enacted that in suits between the United States and individuals, no claim for a credit shall be admitted upon the trial, but such as shall appear to have been presented to the accounting officers of the treasury, for their examination, and by them disallowed, in whole or in part. This has not been done, at least it does not appear that it has. No disallowance of this item appears any where here. It has been assimilated to some items which have been suspended though not absolutely disallowed, and yet have been the subject of examination on this trial. I answer: (1) That no objection was made to them by the officer of the United States, who has appeared for them on this trial, and has their rights in his charge; and at most the argument could only prove that the suspended item ought not to have been inquired into, but does not prove that this may. (2) But I think that it does now appear that these items, although at first only suspended, are now disallowed, because the suit brought by the United States, claims a balance which necessarily excludes these items. No particular form of allowance or disallowance is required by the act. It is enough if it appears that they are disallowed.

The jury found a verdict in favour of the United States for the sum of three hundred and forty-eight dollars and twenty-nine cents. At the time of giving their verdict they presented a paper to the court, in which were stated those items of account in dispute that were allowed, and those that were rejected by them. From this it appeared that they had refused Mr. Duval a credit for items 7, 13, 14, and 24, altogether; and also for that part of item 2, which consisted of a claim for compensation; that part of item 19 which consisted of the materials used by McDavid, the blacksmith; and that part of item 20 which consisted of an allowance to Flower for his services as a commissary. All the remaining items claimed by the defendants were allowed.

On the 24th of June, 1833, the district attorney moved for a new trial, and filed the following reasons: (1) Because the jury allowed the claim of the defendants for one hundred and forty-seven dollars and fifty cents, including one hundred and ten dollars for the loss of a horse of the said Edward W. Duval, although the defendants were not entitled by law to such allowance; although there was no evidence that the loss of the horse was occasioned by his being employed in the service of the United States; and although the court charged that they were not entitled to such allowance unless such loss was so occasioned. (2) Because the jury allowed the claim of the defendants for three hundred dollars, for disbursements made by the said Edward W. Duval to an interpreter at Washington, although the defendants were not entitled by law, to such allowance; although there was evidence, that the said interpreter was not entitled to the same for any services rendered by him, that the allowance was not claimed by the said Edward W. Duval in his life time, and that it was not paid till after his death; and although the court charged the jury unfavourably to such allowance. (3) Because the jury allowed the claim of the defendants for four hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-four cents, for forage of horses of the said Edward W. Duval, for four years and upwards, although the defendants were not entitled by law to such allowance; although there was evidence that the said Edward W. Duval never claimed the same in his life time; and although the court charged the jury unfavourably to such allowance. (4) Because the jury allowed the claim of the defendants for two hundred and seventy dollars and thirty-five cents, for disbursements made by the said Edward W. Duval on the property called the "Cherokee Reservation" before its sale, although the defendants were not entitled by law to such allowance; although there was evidence that the disbursements were made at the request of the Cherokees for their own benefit, and on the understanding by the said Edward W. Duval that they were to be paid for by them; and although the court charged the jury against such allowance. (5) Because the jury allowed the claim of the defendants for eight hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, including disbursements made by the said Edward W. Duval to James McDavid for the board and wages of a striker, although the defendants were not entitled by law to such allowance; although there was evidence that the same had been included in previous payments; and although the court charged the jury unfavourably to such allowance. (6) Because the jury allowed the claims of the defendants for thirty dollars and twenty dollars, for travelling expenses of the said Edward W. Duval, although the defendants were not entitled by law to such allowance; although there was evidence that the said Edward W. Duval never claimed the same in his life time; and although the court charged the jury unfavourably to such allowance. (7) Because the verdict of the jury was against law. (8) Because the verdict of the jury was against the evidence. (9) Because the verdict of the jury was against the charge of the court.

On the 10th of September, 1833, the motion for a new trial was argued by Mr. Gilpin, District Attorney, for the United States, and Mr. Sergeant, for defendants.

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty.

It is unnecessary, and would be improper in this stage of the cause, to renew the argument on the points of law submitted to and decided by the court, after so full an opinion as that expressed in the charge to the jury. This application is, therefore, limited to those items on which the verdict was in opposition to the opinion or direction of the court; in which it was against the law as laid down in the charge, or against the weight of evidence. The statement presented by the jury, at the time of rendering their verdict, enables us to discover these without difficulty, and to ascertain exactly in what points their final decision was erroneous, on either ground. The first objection arises from their allowance to Mr. Duval for the loss of his horse in going to an Indian council, which forms part of the sixth item. This was against law, because it was not established by the evidence that the horse was lost on account of its employment in the service of the United States, and no allowance is lawful except for such a loss. The law fixes the entire compensation of the agent at fifteen hundred dollars per annum, in which his necessary expenses are included, and all the evidence of any customary allowance goes at most to cases where the horses are specially employed for the public service. The charge of the court was in accordance with this view, declaring expressly that the loss must be occasioned, not merely in such service, but by it. The second objection is to the allowance of the eleventh item, for the services of an interpreter to the Indian delegation. This is altogether illegal; it is for services rendered to the Cherokees, and as long since as 1828, there was a regular interpreter to the delegation who was paid by the United States; and this charge never seems in any manner to have been contracted for or allowed by Mr. Duval himself in his life time. Though undoubtedly questions of fact are to be left to the jury, yet this is a decision so much against the weight of evidence, that it affords quite sufficient ground for the exercise of the right to grant a new trial. Kohne v. Insurance Co. of North America [Case No. 7,921]; Smith v. McCormick, 2 Yeates, 164; Swearingen v. Birch, 4 Yeates, 322. The third objection is to the allowance of the twelfth item for the forage of Mr. Duval's horses, which was never claimed by him at all during his life, and is now brought forward by his representatives in one general charge, extending back several years before his death. The evidence of Messrs. Stewart and McKenney, adduced by the defendants to prove the usage of the war department, at most, sustains allowances for a special or temporary employment of horses by an agent, never an annual allowance. This is a regular charge per annum for nearly five years. It is in direct opposition to the charge of the court, and is unsupported by any evidence. The fourth objection is to the allowance of the fifteenth item, the expenditures on the Cherokee reservation before its sale. These expenditures were incurred on the property while it belonged to the Indians; the improvements were made at their request, charged to them in the accounts of Mr. Duval, and, as he himself stated to the department, were to be paid by them. The fifth objection is to the allowance of that part of the nineteenth item, which embraces the board and services of the assistant or striker of the blacksmith, employed at the agency. This was clearly against the evidence. It was proved that the assistant was his own slave, and that the claim was carried back for several years, though intermediate bills had been paid, but this charge was included in none of them. The last objection is to the allowance of the twenty-third item, which consists of a charge for Mr. Duval's own travelling expenses. This, like the preceding claims of a similar kind, is properly embraced in the salary of an agent; it was for ordinary expenses on official and necessary business; it was not charged by Mr. Duval during his own life; and no evidence has been produced that he ever considered it as a ground for a special credit.

(THE COURT intimated to the counsel for the defendants that it was unnecessary to argue the first, second, fifth and sixth objections; and, understanding that they were willing to give up the verdict so far as it allowed the amount of the fifteenth item, for expenditures on the Cherokee reservation, he was directed to confine his reply to the third reason on behalf of the United States for a new trial.)

Mr. Sergeant, for defendants.

The argument in support of this objection involves the point of law asserted by the district attorney on the trial of the cause, that the sanction of the secretary of war is necessary to authorise the allowance by the court and jury of the claim presented. The court have already overruled that ground, and the only question which the jury had to consider, in regard to this allowance, was, whether these horses were necessary to the service of the United States. It never could be the rule of the department that, where an emergency arose, the agent was not to meet it; that he was first to send to Washington; on the contrary, it is necessary and proper that he should be at liberty to exercise a reasonable discretion. It appears from the evidence of Col. McKenney, that there was no positive rule on the subject, but that where an agent was called on to perform unexpected but necessary services, an allowance was made suitable to the circumstances; he adds that horses are necessary for the agent; that when kept for the use of the United States, the expense was allowed, and that two, the number for which this forage is claimed, are reasonable. The defendants have proved, by the evidence of Mr. Murray, that these horses were used only for the public service; if, therefore, the expense of keeping them is refused, the indispensable business of the United States will have been performed, at the expense of Mr. Duval and his representatives. But this, at any rate, is not a ground for a new trial; the whole matter, as to law, usage and fact, was fully submitted to the jury; it was contested at large by the district attorney; and it was specially discussed by the court in the charge. It was allowed because it was an expense bonâ fide incurred, of which the United States derived the benefit; and believing this, the jury were right in allowing it. It is immaterial whether it was claimed or not during the lifetime of Mr. Duval; if the jury were satisfied that he was justly entitled to it, they acted as properly in giving it to his representatives, as they would have done in giving it to himself, had he lived.

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty., in reply.

The verdict of the jury on this item is sustained, because, as is alleged, the usage of the war department admits such an allowance, because these horses were for the express service of the United States, and because it is altogether immaterial whether the claim was made before or after the death of Mr. Duval. The evidence of Messrs. Stewart and McKenney, officers long in the Indian department, does not establish an allowance under circumstances exactly similar; the instances they cite differ from it in a material point; they refer to horses used on special occasions, on emergencies, and for particular objects, while this is an annual and permanent charge. It is true they were employed in the service of the United States, but all the agent's expenses, as such, were equally incurred in their service: this is not enough, it must be shown that they were in some unusual, extraordinary service, which has not been done. This fact makes the time and manner of presenting the charge material: had it been a subject of special expense or charge, it would have been presented by Mr. Duval; and his omission to do so, during his life, affords strong ground to conclude that he did not consider the case as one falling within the line of special allowance, to which the witnesses above named have referred, and which undoubtedly was well known to Mr. Duval.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. When a controversy, consisting almost entirely of questions of fact, has been fully and fairly tried by an impartial and intelligent jury, each party having produced all the evidence in his power, and no expectation being entertained by either of furnishing any additional facts, a court would yield, with extreme reluctance, to an application to set aside the verdict. The cause now before us occupied the attention of this court, and such a jury as I have described, for more than ten days, and every part of it was laboriously examined and discussed. There is no hope that anything can be added to it, either in the way of argument or evidence, on another trial. In such a case the objections to the verdict should be cogent indeed, before the court would allow them to prevail against it. In addition to this general principle, there are circumstances in this case which make me very unwilling to disturb the decision of the jury. The controversy arose on a long and old account, in relation to transactions in a distant wilderness, in part with savages, and in part with men not much above them in education and a knowledge of the forms of business. The transactions themselves were sometimes the result of sudden emergencies, when the public service required a prompt action, and an observance of exact regularity was impossible without danger to the service. It is obvious that in such an agency, it would scarcely be just or reasonable to call for, at this distance of time as well as place, a full and satisfactory explanation of all the doubts and difficulties which may present themselves here, in the investigation of these complicated affairs, and of the various items, some of them very small, which are brought into the account. Unfortunately one of the parties, from whom such explanations might have been received, is dead, and his representatives have been obliged to make up his case from his papers as they found them. Such a case seems to be peculiarly fitted for the broad and equitable jurisdiction of a jury over the evidence of a cause, and the belief they will give to it. It should not be altogether overlooked, too, on a question of granting a new trial, addressed to the discretion of the court, which discretion takes for its guide the justice or injustice to the parties that will follow the allowance or refusal of a second trial, that, in this case, the defendants have relied, and must always rely, on the knowledge and testimony of a single witness; that he lives at an immense distance from this place of holding the court, and was, probably, brought here at a great expense; that his presence can hardly be expected again; and that his evidence was of a nature to require a personal examination at the bar, and could not be taken with satisfaction to either party in any other way. Such circumstances would strongly dispose me to let this verdict stand, although in some instances the jury have not drawn the same conclusions from the evidence that I should have done, and have made some allowances to the defendants, which I should have refused, were I not, on a careful review of the disputed items of this account and the decision of the jury upon them, constrained to say that I find some in which the jury have, in my opinion, rendered their verdict against the plain principles of law, or against the clear and unquestioned evidence of the case. Such errors I am bound to correct, and must be governed by higher considerations even than those which I have stated in support of the verdict. The court must never suffer its controlling power over a verdict to be prostrated, nor the particular circumstances or even the justice of any case, to overthrow the general principles established for the adminstration of the law, and the security of the rights of all.

The motion for a new trial in this case is made on the part of the United States. The reasons filed, exclusive of the general or formal ones, are six in number. The first, second, fifth, and sixth, relate to the allowance by the jury of certain disputed credits claimed by the defendants in their account, as to which there was evidence given both for and against them, and they were left by the court to the jury on their evidence and equity. Upon these I shall say no more than that I cannot interfere with the opinion of the jury in such cases. As to the fifth, the most important of them in amount, I will remark that the disbursements here charged to the United States were actually made and paid by Mr. Duval to the blacksmith James McDavid. The objections made on the part of the United States to the right of McDavid to this money, or, at least to that part of it which he charged for his striker, are very strong and have not been well answered or explained; but, on the other hand, as no pretence is made of any fraud or collusion between Mr. Duval and McDavid, and the propriety of the charge itself is not so absolutely disproved as to fix upon Mr. Duval an imputation of gross and culpable negligence, and he actually paid the money, I cannot say that the jury were wrong in allowing it. Why should Mr. Duval have paid this money to McDavid if he did not think it honestly due to him? He knew he took the hazard on himself of its being allowed to him or not in the settlement of his account. To the general remark I have made on the first reason, which relates to the loss of a horse, I will add that the witness said he knew the horse died in the service which brought the charge within Mr. Stewart's rule of allowance: but I told the jury that if they thought the horse died in consequence or by reason of the service, the charge should be allowed, but not if the loss was owing to the fault or negligence of the owner, even if the horse was in the service at the time. As to the three hundred dollars paid to Pierre Perra as an interpreter at Washington, which is the subject of the second reason for a new trial, I am free to say that I should not have allowed it, and I gave my reasons for this opinion to the jury; but they have thought otherwise, and I cannot say that they had not a right to do so. It was, in my mind, a strong circumstance against this charge, that the money was not paid by Mr. Duval to Perra, nor, as far as I recollect the evidence, ever demanded of him by Perra. It was paid since the death of Mr. Duval, one may almost say gratuitously by his administrator, and three years after the service was performed for which it was demanded. The service was in 1828, the payment in June, 1831. Such things certainly cast a shade over the charge, but the jury have been satisfied that it is correct, and their decision upon it must stand.

The two items, on which I have not been able to find a satisfactory support for the verdict, are the third and fourth. The fourth has not been argued on this motion, because it is understood that the defendants will consent to correct the verdict by adding to it the amount of this item, to wit, two hundred and seventy dollars and thirty-five cents. It arose on a claim made by Mr. Duval for disbursements for improvements on the property called the "Cherokee Reservation," before its sale. Such a charge upon the United States for disbursements on property not belonging to them, but of which both the title and possession were in the Cherokees, was directly contrary to every principle of law, charging one party for improvements on the property of another. Nor did Mr. Duval himself ever consider this an expenditure chargeable to the United States, or introduce it into any account against them. The charge was to the "Cherokee Reservation." Mr. Murray, the defendants' witness, who was the confidential clerk of Mr. Duval, and from whom we have derived all our knowledge of the transactions of his agency, says expressly, that he believes Mr. Duval considered the Cherokee Nation as responsible to him for these improvements; that he considered the whole matter to be between the Cherokees and himself, and not with the government. This allowance of this charge against the government, is as much against the evidence as the law of the case. As the counsel for the defendants have given up this part of the verdict on my suggestion, at the argument, I owe it to them to explain more fully the reasons of my opinion. By the treaty of the 6th of May, 1828, the Cherokee Indians made a cession of territory to the United States, with a special reservation of a certain part of it. In relation to this it was stipulated that the part reserved, with all the improvements on it, should be sold by the United States, and the proceeds of the sale be applied to the benefit of the Indians on the new territory to which they removed. The sale was made. Mr. Duval was the purchaser at the price of two thousand and fifty dollars; this he paid to the United States, and they appropriated it, according to their agreement, for the benefit of the Indians on their new territory. This sum, so received and so applied by the United States, was the whole proceeds of the sale as well of the lands included in the reservation as of all the improvements made thereon, for which improvements the sum of two hundred and seventy dollars and thirty-five cents, now claimed by the defendants, was expended by Mr. Duval, while the land belonged to the Indians, at their request and on their credit and responsibility. It is now contended, or was so at the trial of this cause, that the United States must not only pay to the Indians the proceeds of their land and improvements, but must further pay a debt they owe to Mr. Duval on account of those improvements, that is, in fact they are to pay twice for them, once by handing to the Indians the whole amount they brought at a public sale, and now again by paying for them to the person at whose cost they were made. When Mr. Duval made these improvements he did so on the credit of the Cherokees, and had no idea of having any claim on the United States for them.

When Mr. Duval made the purchase of this reservation he was the agent of the United States to these Indians. It was, since his death, on a suggestion of the illegality or impropriety of his being a purchaser at this sale, surrendered by his representatives to the United States, and they received back the money he had paid for it. Does the agreement with the United States to cancel this purchase, and the transfer of his right to the United States, raise an equity to support this claim, because the land and the improvements thereby became the property of the United States? I can see nothing in this arrangement which raises an equity against the United States for the charge in question. If the purchase made by Mr. Duval was illegal by reason of his agency, his representatives gave up nothing when they cancelled it, and made the transfer to the United States. If, on the other hand, the purchase was legal and their right to the land complete, the surrender of it was a voluntary act, made freely and without condition, or any intimation of receiving any thing more from the United States than a return of the money Mr. Duval had paid for it, which, it may be, was better for them than the land. If it was the intention of the representatives to claim any more, either directly or as a credit in their account with the government, they should have said so, and the United States, the other party to the bargain, could have said whether they would assent to it or not. The only consideration that appears in the agreement, the only one that was recognised by both of the parties, or even thought of, as far as we know, by either of them, was the repayment of the sum of two thousand and fifty dollars, which Mr. Duval had given for the land. If an individual, instead of the government, had made this agreement with Mr. Duval, and had paid him the stipulated consideration, could he have been afterwards charged with an old debt which the Cherokees owed to Mr. Duval, for the same improvements on the land which were paid for in the sum of two thousand and fifty dollars, given for the whole? I told the jury that I was very clear that this item ought not to be allowed, on any principle of law or equity, and it is as clearly against the evidence.

The matter alleged for a new trial, in the third reason, requires a fuller explanation of the evidence which relates to it. It is thus stated: "Because the jury allowed the claim of the defendants for four hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-four cents for forage of horses of the said Edward W. Duval for four years and upwards, although the defendants were not entitled by law to such allowance; although there was evidence that the said Edward W. Duval never claimed the same in his lifetime; and although the court charged the jury unfavorably to such allowance." The charge or credit, claimed by the defendant in this item, is for foraging two horses from the 1st of January, 1826, to 31st of August, 1830. In the examination of Mr. Murray, the witness of the defendants, to support this charge, he says, that these horses were employed in the service of the United States, and were necessary for it. He thinks the charges are moderate. They were Mr. Duval's horses; he had his farm horses besides; these were kept for public service, such as travelling through the Nation, and to send expresses. He says, he knows of no such allowance to other agents. Mr. Duval had not the same horses all the time. He knows of no authority from the secretary of war to Mr. Duval to keep these horses.

On this evidence, given by the defendants to support this claim, these observations present themselves: (1) That the charge is for a period of four years and eight months; during which period, nor, indeed, at any time in the lifetime of Mr. Duval, was any charge for keeping these horses introduced by him into his accounts sent to or settled with the department, nor any claim made for it in any way by Mr. Duval. This circumstance affords some ground, I might say strong ground, to presume that he never considered it a charge which he had a right to make, or intended to make, against the government, and it stands, in this respect, on a similar footing with the charge for the improvements on the Cherokee reservation. (2) If these horses were really kept for the public service, and were necessary for it, and were so thought and intended by Mr. Duval, the cost or purchase of them would have been, at least, as fair a charge upon the government as their forage; but they were Mr. Duval's horses, bought with his private funds, and no reimbursement of their price was ever asked by Mr. Duval, or is even now asked from the United States. This is another circumstance to show how this transaction has been understood by Mr. Duval himself. (3) The same horses were not kept through the whole period, but no account is raised with the United States for the sale or the loss of the horses he parted with, nor for the purchase of their substitutes. (4) This is a regular, continued charge for a long period, and not for horses required or employed, from time to time, in the public service, on emergencies which allowed no opportunity to consult the department at Washington, and obtain the permission of the secretary for the expenditure; nor do they appear to have been procured or wanted for any such emergencies, but to have been used for travelling through the Nation or in sending expresses, in the performance of the ordinary duties of the agent.

Before we take up the evidence of Mr. Stewart and Col. McKenney on this subject, let us turn to the act of congress which has a direct bearing upon it, and whose provisions, we must presume, were found to be necessary to prevent or restrain abuses upon the treasury, in the undefinable shape of extra allowances, which might grow out of these agencies without the means of detecting or checking them in detail. By the first section of the act of April 20, 1818, the salaries of the several Indian agents are appointed; and by the third section it is enacted: "That the sums hereby allowed to Indian agents and factors shall be in full compensation for all their services; and that all rations, or other allowances made to them, shall be deducted from the sums hereby allowed." The legal rights or claims of an agent upon the United States are thus circumscribed by the law, but there exists in the war department a power to make allowances to an agent, unprovided for by law, when the secretary shall think them to be just and equitable, and not forbidden by any law. Under this power, certain usages have grown up in the department, which have become the law of the department, and on which an agent has a right to rely, in the exercise of his functions. That which has been uniformly allowed to others, he may presume will be allowed to him, and if he performs a service, or makes an expenditure of this description, he has a right to expect an allowance for it. The defendants have endeavoured to bring the charge we are now considering, within the protection of the usage of the war department. To effect this they have produced the testimony of William Stewart and Col. McKenney. Mr. Stewart has been a clerk in the war department from 1818 to 1832; he says it has been invariably the custom to allow salary officers extra for services not within the scope of their offices. He mentioned the case of Governor McMinn, who received eight dollars a day and other allowances, as a commissioner to value the improvements of the Cherokees, and received at the same time his salary as governor. In this case it is evident that the appointment as a commissioner was entirely distinct from that of governor; the duties of the stations were wholly independent of each other. The service as a commissioner was clearly not within the scope of his office of governor. It is no example or precedent in this case. So of the case of Col. McKenney. In 1827, this gentleman, then at the head of the Indian bureau of the war department, whose office and duties were at Washington, was sent by the government among the Indians to make treaties, and to reconcile some differences among the Creeks. He acted as a commissioner in forming a treaty, and received pay as a commissioner for the time he was treating, and his travelling expenses, and, at the same time, his salary as superintendent of the Indian bureau. This case is analogous to that of Governor McMinn, but not to the charge made on behalf of Mr. Duval. I am aware that this part of Mr. Stewart's testimony was applied more particularly to other charges in the defendant's account than to this; but as it may have some bearing on this also, I have made this reference to it. In relation to this item, to wit, the foraging the horses, this witness says, that no allowance was made for keeping horses, unless specially agreed upon by the secretary. If a horse is wanted for an emergency requiring prompt execution, as expresses, there is a discretionary power with the agent to employ one, but, in general, no allowance was made for horses, unless specially authorized. When this witness gives the example of expresses, he must be understood to mean an express on an emergency requiring prompt execution, and not an ordinary message sent on ordinary business.

In the case of Col. Crowell, given by this witness, the question was deliberately considered. He was the agent of the Creek Indians, and brought a charge of two hundred and fifty dollars a year for horses, for the use of the agency, for four or five years. It was allowed by the then acting secretary of war. This was in 1828. He was also allowed for the cost or purchase of the horses. Thus he carried the whole thing through as the concern of the government, charging them for keeping what he alleged to be their horses, bought and kept for the use of the agency; and not, as in this case, for keeping horses admitted to be his own. The comptroller, in settling Col. Crowell's account, refused to pass this charge; and so it remained suspended, until it was finally, within the last eighteen months, rejected by the secretary of war. This seems to have settled the practice or usage of the department, or to have been in conformity with it, for, the witness says, several agents brought in similar claims, but they were all rejected. What this witness says about allowances being sometimes made on honour, on the character of the officer, clearly relates to a deficiency in the vouchers, and not to the admissibility of the charge. The whole bearing of this testimony is opposed to the credit claimed for Mr. Duval. He had no special authority from the secretary for the purchase or keeping of these horses; no evidence has been given to show that they were procured or kept or employed for any emergency in the public service so sudden and pressing that no application could be made for them to the secretary, consistent with the service. On the contrary, they were kept for nearly five years, not only without any request to, or permission from the secretary to warrant it, but without any intimation to him that such horses were in the employment of the government, or in the possession of their agent.

The testimony of Col. McKenney does not change this aspect of the case. He says, that an agent in the Indian country was not obliged to conform in all respects to the voucher system, and he gives a good reason for it. In speaking of the discretionary power, which, Col. McKenney believes, was vested in an agent, he explains himself by putting a case of emergency in which it would be impossible to get the instructions of the government; and he says, "under such circumstances it was expected of him to exercise a sound discretion, and to move in the case." He would then be allowed in his account "a reasonable expenditure in such an enterprise." This, the witness says, applies to any extraordinary occurrence within or without the agency, as if horses or canoes are wanted, they are allowed for. He says, the agent has to pay Indian annuities in specie; that horses are wanted to transport it; and adds, that a horse, sometimes two, is allowed for the use of the agent in his own personal intercourse with the different divisions of his agency; that two horses were generally considered to be a reasonable allowance for an agent; the horses to be bought by the government, and to be their property. This general allegation of such an allowance was qualified by the witness, in his answer to a question of the court, in which he said, an agent would not be allowed for keeping horses, unless it was specially allowed by the secretary of war, by which I understand that, when he said before that "two horses were generally considered to be a reasonable allowance for an agent," he meant that the allowance must be first obtained from the secretary, except in cases of emergency, and not that the agent might procure and keep the horses at his discretion, and afterwards make them a charge, as a matter of right, against the government.

I have looked through the evidence, in vain, for something by which I could, judicially, support the verdict of the jury in this particular. The charge of the court was very explicit against it, and, on a careful review of the case, I see no reason to change the opinion I had at the trial. By admitting this charge, we should introduce a new rule and principle in the settlement of the accounts of Indian agents, which may be very extensive and mischievous in its consequences. If the defendants had a right to this credit, I should not regard its disallowance by the accounting officers of the government, who necessarily transact their business by established rules, which cannot always conform to the right and justice of every case; but these defendants have tried to justify this charge, not by any positive law or legal right, but in the equity of an alleged usage of the department of war, when it is clear no usage exists there to countenance the claim.

After the delivery of the above opinion, the defendants' counsel appeared in open court, and agreed that judgment be entered for the United States of America, for one thousand and eighty-five dollars and twenty-eight cents, in conformity with the opinion of the court. Judgment accordingly for the United States of America, for one thousand and eighty-five dollars and twenty-eight cents.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 42.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1812.

CRIMINAL LAW—BILLIARD ROOM WITHOUT LICENSE.

A person who hires out his billiard room for two days, is liable to the penalty of Act Md. 1798, c. 113.

Indictment for keeping a billiard table for use without license.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) decided that the defendant, who had hired a room in the county of Washington, out of the jurisdiction of the corporations of Washington and Georgetown, and set up his billiard table in it, and rented it to Scott, for two days, for $30, was liable to the penalty of $150, under the act of assembly of Maryland of 1798 (chapter 113), and that it was immaterial whether he received the rent all at once, or by sixpence a game. Verdict, guilty. Fined $150.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 19, 1875.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—WAREHOUSE BOND—REDUCTION IN RATE—SALE—ACTION FOR DEFICIENCY.

1. On the 1st of December, 1866, a warehouse bond was given to the United States, for the payment of the duties then existing, or to be thereafter enacted, on certain brandy. The condition of the bond was, that the obligors should, after the expiration of one year, and before the expiration of three years, from the date of the bond, withdraw the brandy and pay to the collector the amount of the penalty of the bond, or the true amount, when ascertained, of duties imposed by law on the brandy, and an additional sum equal to ten per centum of the said duties. From a date prior to December 1, 1869, until January 1, 1871, the duty on brandy was $3 per proof gallon. By the twenty-first section of the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 262, 263), which went into effect January 1, 1871, the duty was reduced to $2 per proof gallon. The twenty-sixth section of the same act provided, that all imported goods which might be in bonded warehouses on January 1, 1871, should be subject to no other duty, upon the entry thereof for consumption, than if the same were imported after that day. After January 1, 1871, the brandy was sold at auction by the United States for non-payment of duties, and a suit was brought on the bond to recover the amount of duties due beyond the proceeds of the sale. Held, that the proper rate of duty on the brandy was the rate imposed by law at the expiration of three years from the date of the bond, namely, on the 1st of December, 1869, which was $3 per proof gallon, and an additional duty equal to ten per centum thereof.

2. Whether the twenty-sixth section of the act of July 14, 1870, applied to goods which are, by statute, regarded as abandoned to the government, for having remained in warehouse three years without the payment of the duties and charges thereon, quære.

[This was an action by the United States against Charles A. Duvivier.]

George Bliss, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Edmund H. Smith, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Stephen G. Clarke and Addison Brown, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This action was upon a warehouse bond, dated December 1, 1866, which was given for the payment of the duties then existing or to be thereafter enacted, upon a large quantity of brandy. The condition of the bond was, that, "if the above bounden principles shall, after the expiration of one year, and before the expiration of three years, from the date aforesaid, so withdraw the same and pay to the said collector the sum aforesaid, or the true amount, when ascertained, of duties imposed by such law thereon, and shall pay an additional sum or duty equal to ten per centum of the said duties, then the bond is to be void." The goods remained in the warehouse until they were sold for non-payment of duties. It was agreed, upon the trial of the case, that, if the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, they should find the number of gallons of brandy upon which duty was payable, and that the court should determine, as matter of law, the amount of duty which was properly assessable. The jury found for the plaintiffs, and that there was due upon the bond the amount of duty upon 223 gallons, less the amount which had been realized from the auction sale of said liquors for non-payment of duties. The sale was after January 1, 1871. Prior to that date, the duty was $3 per proof gallon. By the twenty-first section of the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 262, 263), which went into effect January 1, 1871, the duty upon brandy was reduced to $2 per proof gallon. The twenty-sixth section of the same act (16 Stat. 269), provided, that all imported goods which might be in bonded warehouses on January 1, 1871, should be subject to no other duty, upon the entry thereof for consumption, than if the same were imported after that day.

The question is, whether, the goods having been in warehouse since December 1, 1866, when the act of July 14, 1870, went into effect, and having been sold thereafter for non-payment of duties, the proper amount which was due upon the bond was $2 per gallon, or the pre-existing duty. The defendant, at the time of the importation of the brandy, desired credit, and gave security which was satisfactory to the government, for the payment of the duties within three years. The condition of the bond was, that if, before the expiration of three years from its date, he should pay the true amount of duties imposed by law, and an additional sum equal to ten per cent. of the said duties, the bond was to be void. The duty of the obligor was to pay before the expiration of three years from the date of this bond. If the duties were not then paid, the condition of the bond was thereupon broken, and the principal was in default, and, with his sureties, was thereupon liable upon the bond to pay to the government the amount of unpaid duties which were then due. The amount to be paid was the amount due at the time of default, with interest.

Goods which remain in warehouse beyond three years, without payment of duties and charges thereon, are, by statute, regarded as "abandoned to the government." I am not certain that the twenty-sixth section of the act of July 14, 1870, was applicable to goods which, having remained in warehouse more than three years, had been, in contemplation of law, abandoned to the government. But, a decision of that question is not required in the present case. It is not material to ascertain what was the amount of duty which was due upon the goods on January 1, 1871. In an action to recover the amount due upon this bond, it is material to ascertain what was the amount of money which, by the bond, the obligor promised to pay. That amount was the amount of duties existing at the date of the bond, or to be thereafter enacted, prior to the expiration of three years, with the addition of ten per cent. in case the goods were not withdrawn until after the expiration of one year.

Judgment should be entered upon the verdict according to these principles

UNITED STATES v. EARHART et al.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. May 7, 1877.

PUBLIC OFFICER — MISAPPROPRIATION OF FUNDS — PRESUMPTIONS — ACTION UPON BOND — SURETY.

H. was appointed superintendent of Indian affairs to succeed himself, and at the date of the execution of his second bond there was a balance due the United States of the moneys received by him under his first bond. Held, that there could be no presumption that this sum had been illegally appropriated by the officer, but the fact must be proved by the party claiming or alleging it; and that in the absence of such proof, the presumption is that this balance was then in the hands of the officer, to be applied and accounted for under his second bond.

[Cited in Board of Sup'rs v. Pabst, 70 Wis. 367, 35 N. W. 337.]

Action [by United States against R. P. Earhart, administrator, and others] on bond of superintendent of Indian affairs.

Rufus Mallory, for the United States.

Walter W. Thayer and William H. Effinger, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought against the administrator and sureties of the late J. W. Perit Huntington, superintendent of Indian affairs for Oregon, to recover the sum of $22,966.65, as and for moneys received by him as said superintendent, between March 28, 1863, and January 8, 1868, and not accounted for, with interest thereon.

By the stipulation of the parties it was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. From the pleadings and the evidence the facts appear to be as follows:

(1) On March 28, 1863, Huntington, having been appointed superintendent of Indian affairs, gave bond to the United States, in the sum of $100,000, with the defendants Long, Heatherly, Coffin, Griswold and Miller as sureties, conditioned for "the careful discharge" of his official duties, and that he would "faithfully expend all public moneys and honestly account for the same," which might come into his hands, without fraud or delay; and on January 8, 1868, said Huntington, having been re-appointed as such superintendent, gave a second official bond to the United States with other persons as sureties.

(2) On September 11, 1867, the acting commissioner of Indian affairs, C. E. Mix, wrote Huntington an official letter, advising him of his re-appointment, which, among other directions, contained the following: "You are required to make out and forward here your accounts up to the date of your new bond, and in doing so transfer in due form to yourself all public moneys and property on hand belonging to the superintendency, the same to be accounted for under your new bond."

(3) On January 8, 1868, Huntington, in obedience to the foregoing direction, stated and returned an account current between himself and the United States for the "fractional part of month ending January 8, 1868," which he certified "embraced all public moneys received by him and not heretofore accounted for," and from which it appeared that of the various appropriations for the Indian service in his superintendency he had "on hand from last month" the aggregate sum of $34,607.90, and that there was due Huntington, for moneys expended by him in excess of the appropriations for "general and incidental expenses," and "for treaty stipulations with the Klamaths and Modocs," the sum of $11,600, making the balance due the United States $23,007.90.

(4) Upon the statement of differences made in the final settlement of Huntington's accounts under his bond of March 28, 1863, in the office of the second auditor on November 20, 1875, it was ascertained and determined that on account of errors in calculation and otherwise the amount thus reported to be due the United States should be reduced by the sum of $41.25, leaving the net balance due the United States on January 8, 1868, $22,966.65.

(5) On June 3, 1869, Huntington died, and on June 16 the defendant Earhart was duly appointed administrator of his estate, and is still such administrator; and on January 19, 1876, said account was duly presented to said Earhart for allowance, and by him rejected.

The only evidence received or offered upon the trial was the transcript of the treasury books and proceedings concerning the accounts under the first bond, together with certified copies of said bond, Huntington's return of January 8, 1868, and the letters from the acting commissioner of Indian affairs, and therefore it does not appear whether the above mentioned balance was carried forward into the superintendent's accounts under the second bond, and there charged to himself, or not.

Upon these facts it is claimed by counsel for the United States that it appears Huntington was a defaulter for the sum admitted by him and found by the accounting officers of the treasury to be in his hands on January 8, 1868, and as such default occurred during the period covered by the first bond, the sureties therein are liable as well as the principal. The argument is, that there being no direct evidence upon the question whether or not Huntington carried this balance forward into his accounts under the second bond, the presumption is that he did not, and therefore he failed to account for it. But it is admitted that if it appeared that such balance had been so carried forward, it could not be said that there was a default unless the plaintiff showed further that, as a matter of fact, the money was not on hand as reported by Huntington.

But in my judgment it is immaterial, so far as this case is concerned, whether Huntington carried this balance into his accounts under the second bond or not. If on January 8, 1868, the date of the execution of said bond, he had the money on hand, the sureties therein became bound for his future conduct concerning it. It was then money received by him under his second appointment and bond, and to be accounted for accordingly, just as if it had then first come to his hands from the treasury. The liability of the sureties in the first bond then ceased, and they cannot be charged with the consequences of any subsequent misconduct or neglect of Huntington's concerning moneys then in his hands.

The evidence introduced by the government consists of the transcript of the treasury books and proceedings and the statement of Huntington. According to the latter, this balance was then "on hand." Upon this point it is explicit. The government having introduced this statement, is bound by it until it is shown to be false or incorrect. Nor do the accounts and proceedings in the treasury show anything to the contrary. According to them, the money constituting the balance had been received by Huntington from the United States during the period covered by the first bond, and on January 8, 1868, was due the United States—that is, so far as appeared, remained in his hands unexpended, and to be disposed of as provided by law and directed by the department of the interior. In this case the superintendent was directed by his superior to turn over the amount to himself as his own successor. Whether he did so or not does not appear. Probably, according to the familiar rule, that official duty is presumed to have been done, it ought to be assumed that he did, until the contrary appears. But this is altogether immaterial. For aught that would appear the turning over to himself, if done at all, might have consisted of a mere naked entry upon the books of the superintendency without the money being actually on hand. As a business transaction he should have been required to deposit the money with a United States depositary and return the certificate as a voucher to the department, and afterwards have received back the amount under his second bond.

However, the simple question here is, was the money "on hand" when the second bond was given and the liability of the sureties in the first terminated.

The government, in effect, alleges that it was not, and that there was a default to this amount. The defendants deny the allegation. The burden of proof is upon the party making the allegation. Now, so far from the evidence introduced by the government tending to prove that the balance sued for was not on hand when the second bond was given, it rather proves that it was. Before it can be said upon this evidence that Huntington was a defaulter on January 8, 1868, it must be presumed that the unexpended balance, which appears to have been, and should have been, in his hands at that time, had in fact been misapplied or appropriated to his own use. This fact, if it be a fact, the government might prove. But there is no presumption in any case that an officer has violated his duty or misappropriated funds intrusted to his care, but the contrary. In the case of two bonds given by a public officer for his conduct during two successive terms of the same office, the government is not entitled to recover of the sureties in the first bond any balance which appears from the accounts to have remained undisbursed in his hands at the expiration of the first term, unless it is satisfactorily proven that in fact such balance was not on hand, but had in some way been misappropriated. This has not been done or attempted in this case.

The case of Bruce v. U. S., 17 How. [58 U. S.] 437, appears to be in point, and decisive of the question. Bruce had held the office of Indian agent for two terms, from 1840 to 1848. The action was brought against him and his sureties in the second bond. and the breach assigned was that at the close of the second term there was a balance in his hands which he refused to turn over to the United States when required. One of the defenses was that the balance had accrued, or the default occurred, under the first bond, and, therefore, the parties to the second bond were not liable. The court below instructed the jury: "That if, when Bruce was re-appointed agent, in 1844, he had moneys in his hands of the United States which he received as agent under his previous commission, then he was bound to apply and account for such moneys under the second commission, and his sureties are bound under the bond which is sued on. But if Bruce had appropriated the moneys received under the previous commission to his own use, when this bond was given, then the first set of sureties are responsible for the moneys thus illegally appropriated, and the defendants are not liable, and the burden of proof is on the defendants to show that Bruce had illegally appropriated the money before the bond sued on was given."

On error to the supreme court, this ruling was affirmed, Taney, C. J., saying: "When Bruce received his second commission, if any money or property which he received in his former term of office still remained in his hands, he was bound to apply and account for it under the appointment he then received;" and again: "Undoubtedly, the sureties in the second term of office are not responsible for a default committed in his first. But if any part of the balance now claimed from him was misapplied during that period, it was incumbent on the plaintiffs in error to prove it. No officer, without proof, will be presumed to have violated his duty; and if Bruce had done so, Steele had a right, under the opinion of the circuit court, to show it, and exonerate himself to that amount; but it could not be presumed merely because there appears, by the accounts, to have been a balance in his hands at the expiration of his first term."

Here, the government asks the court to presume that the moneys which appear by the accounts to have been in Huntington's hands at the close of his first term of office, had in fact been illegally appropriated by him before that time. This, the supreme court say, cannot be done, and the reason is apparent. Such a presumption, instead of being founded on fact, would be against evidence, besides being contrary to the well established rule that official duty is presumed to have been duly performed.

There must be a finding of fact and law for the defendants.

KREKEL, District Judge. This is an information filed by the district attorney, alleging that defendant was a manufacturer of cigars, and as such had failed to execute bond as required by law. To this defendant files his motion to quash, alleging, in substance, that cases of the kind cannot be prosecuted by information, but must be by indictment. This brings up the question, first, is the case here presented within the act of July 13, 1866, which provides that "all fines, penalties, and forfeitures which may be imposed or incurred shall and may be sued for and recovered, when not otherwise provided, in the name of the United States, in any proper form of action or by any appropriate form of proceeding before any circuit or district court"? The provision cited is found in the revenue act, and there can be no doubt that the intention of congress was to sanction or provide for a class of cases most frequently occurring under the revenue laws. Looking at the language employed, "a proper form of action," it is obvious that congress here had reference to existing forms of action; and, when using the terms immediately following, "or by any appropriate form of proceeding," it intended to enlarge the former by giving authority to provide new and suitable forms and proceedings to meet cases as they might arise. It is well known that, at the time of framing and adopting the constitution, fines and penalties could be and were largely recovered by information; and there can scarcely be any doubt but that congress had reference, when speaking of "a proper form of action," to that practice which, at the time of the enactment of the law cited, prevailed in a number of the states. It must, then, be taken that the case under consideration, and the class of cases to which it belongs, comes within the provisions of the statute cited.

The second question is, had congress the power to pass the act of 1866, and especially the provision cited, thereby doing away with the necessity of a grand jury passing upon cases arising under internal revenue laws? The fifth article of the amendments of the constitution of the United States provides that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury." It will be observed that this provision covers infamous crimes only. It is not necessary to define what is here meant by "infamous," for it is an undisputed point that misdemeanors, such as the one for which the information under consideration is filed, cannot, by any construction or interpretation given by courts, be brought within the term "infamous." At the time of the adoption of the amendment cited, attention was, no doubt, called to existing constitutional provisions; and, had the requirement that all classes of crimes should be passed on by grand juries before trial been intended, suitable language for that purpose would have been employed. Indeed, by the use of the words "capital or otherwise infamous crimes," it may be readily inferred that a grand jury was to pass upon such, and such only; and, while the legislature was not bound to limit the holding to answer to that class of cases, but might extend the requirement to any offences, yet the decision of a grand jury was secured only to the person or persons charged with the higher classes of crime specified. The act of March 30, 1790, passed by congress soon after the adoption of the constitution, strongly supports the view here taken. In the thirty-second section of said act, providing the time within which prosecutions shall be commenced, it enacts: "Nor shall any person be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offence not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall have been found or instituted,"—thus affirming that there existed the distinction between crimes and other offences contended for. As sustaining these views, see U. S. v. Shephard [Case No. 16,273], and U. S. v. Waller [Id. 16,634].

Upon these views of the court, the case under consideration may be prosecuted by information, and the motion to quash is overruled.

UNITED STATES v. EBNER.

[4 Biss. 117.] [1]

District Court, D. Indiana. Dec. Term, 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE—INDICTMENT—ACTION OF DEBT.

1. Under the internal revenue laws, when the punishment prescribed is a pecuniary penalty or fine only, and the act fixes the exact amount of it, the action of debt will lie to recover it.

2. Where the punishment provided is a fine only, and the amount of it is not fixed, but left to the discretion of the court, the prosecution for it must be by indictment.

3. In all cases in which the law provides that imprisonment either may or must be any part of the punishment, the prosecution must be by indictment.

[This was an action against John Ebner.]

McDONALD, District Judge. This is an action of debt on the thirty-first section of the internal revenue act [of 1864 (13 Stat. 235)].

The defendant demurs to the declaration on the ground that debt does not lie for a violation of the provisions of that section.

The section in question, among other things, provides that every person making or distilling spirits shall from day to day make true and exact entry, in a book to be kept in such form as the commissioner of internal revenue may prescribe, of the number of pounds or gallons of materials used for the purpose of producing spirits, the number of gallons of spirits distilled, the number of gallons placed in warehouse and the proof thereof, and the number of gallons sold with the proof thereof, etc. And the section provides that "Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall, for every such offense, be liable to a fine of five hundred dollars."

The declaration charges a violation of the provisions above cited, and demands judgment for $500.

Confining our inquiry to this section alone, I would suppose that a proceeding by indictment is the only remedy for a violation of its provisions.

But pursuing the rule that, in construing a provision in a statute, all its parts must be considered, I am led to a different conclusion.

This act has many requirements on the subject of internal revenue, the violations of some of which are, in terms, punishable by pecuniary penalties, some by fine only, and some by fine and imprisonment. It would be tedious to examine here the numerous sections of the act which relate to these matters. It seems certain, however, that the word "penalty" and the term "fine" are in some parts of the act, used convertibly. Thus, the fourteenth section declares that every person who shall violate its provisions "shall be liable to a fine or penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars." Here the two terms are evidently employed as meaning the same thing.

The forty-first section of the act provides that "it shall be the duty of the collectors," etc., "to prosecute for the recovery of any sum or sums which may be forfeited by law; and all fines, penalties, and forfeitures which may be incurred or imposed by law shall be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States, in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate form of proceeding, qui tam or otherwise." A like provision is found in the 179th section of the act. Here is express authority to sue for "fines" arising under this law. The term "sue" is employed in both these sections; and it is inapplicable to a prosecution by indictment. We do not say that a man is sued for a crime. The term always supposes a civil action. Then, for some "fines" imposed by the internal revenue act, it is clear that a man may be sued in a civil action—in any "appropriate action." Now, in my opinion, where the act fixes the amount of a pecuniary punishment, whether it calls it a penalty or a fine, an action of debt is an "appropriate action." And for our future guidance in relation to violations of the internal revenue act, I venture to lay down the following rules:

1. Where the punishment prescribed is a pecuniary penalty or fine only, and where the act fixes the exact amount of it, the action of debt will lie to recover it.

2. Where the punishment provided is a fine only, and the exact amount of it is not fixed by the act, but is left to the discretion of the court trying the case,—as where the language is that the party shall be fined in any sum not exceeding a certain amount,—there the action of debt will not lie, nor can any other civil action be the "appropriate" remedy, but the prosecution must be by indictment.

3. In all cases in which the act provides that imprisonment either may or must be a part of the punishment, there no civil action will lie, and the only remedy is by indictment.

The demurrer is overruled.

NOTE. Debt is the appropriate action whenever a demand is for a sum certain, and is capable of being reduced readily to a certainty. 1 Chit. Pl. 108. If a statute prohibit the doing an act under a penalty or forfeiture to be paid to a party aggrieved, and do not prescribe any mode of recovery, it may be recovered in an action of debt. Id. Whenever a statute gives a right to recover damages which are ascertained by the act itself, an action of debt lies and is proper, if no specific remedy is provided. Blackburn v. Baker, 7 Port. (Ala.) 284. It has been held in Ohio that debt is the proper remedy for a penalty imposed by a statute, though the amount is uncertain, and is to be fixed by the court between five and fifty dollars. SHIPPING—PUBLIC REGULATIONS—CARRYING PASSENGERS WITHOUT LICENSE—EXEMPTIONS—TUG BOAT.

1. Where a steam vessel usually employed as a tow boat, transported passengers from Buffalo to Canada, and back, a distance of 12 or 15 miles each way, for pay, held, that she was liable to the penalty imposed for a violation of section 2 of the act of July 7, 1838 (5 Stat. 304), in transporting passengers without a license, and that she was not entitled to the benefit of the exemption created by section 42 of the act of August 30, 1852 (10 Stat. 75), in favor of a steamer used as a tug boat or a towing boat.

2. Such exemption applies only to a steamer while engaged in towing, or in the business of towing, and not to a steamer usually engaged in towing.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and nere reprinted by permission.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.]

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court, adjudging against the propeller Echo a penalty of $500 for a violation of the acts of congress of July 7, 1838 (5 Stat. 304), and August 30, 1852 (10 Stat. 75).

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It appears, from the proofs, that the propeller was usually employed as a tow boat in and about the harbor of Buffalo, but that, on the 10th of June, 1857, she transported some one hundred passengers from Buffalo to Point Albino, Canada, on Lake Erie, and back, a distance of twelve or fifteen miles each way, and took pay for the same.

By the second section of the act of 1838, it is provided that it shall not be lawful for the owner, master, or captain of any steamboat or vessel, etc., to transport any goods or passengers upon the bays, lakes, etc., of the United States, without having first obtained from the proper officer a license under the existing laws, and without having complied with the conditions imposed by that act. The forty-second section of the act of 1852 exempts from the operation of that act steamers used as ferry boats, tug boats or towing boats.

It is insisted, on the part of the defence, that the propeller, in the present case, comes within the exception in the above section, inasmuch as she is usually employed in the business of towing. But, the plain answer to the objection is, that the exception does not apply to steamers usually engaged in ferrying or towing, but to steamers while thus engaged, or while engaged in that business. If they leave that business and engage in transporting passengers, even for a single trip, they are, while thus engaged, out of the exception, not only in words, but in the spirit, intent, and mischief of the act, and are within the conditions and penalties therein prescribed. The question is not, whether the steamer has been usually employed in the towing business, but, what was her employment and service at the time complained of. If it was the transportation of passengers, then she is responsible for a full compliance with all the conditions required of vessels in that service, whatever may have been, or whatever may subsequently be, her employment. Any construction of the acts short of this, would but open the way to an evasion of their requirements.

Decree affirmed.

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan. Term, 1858.

POST OFFICE—INDICTMENT FOR OPENING LETTER—LETTERS OF CRIMINALS—CONFLICT OF LAWS.

1. A letter once placed in the postoffice is in the custody of the law, and no one except the writer and the person to whom it is directed, or some one authorized by him, has the right while it is there to open it for the mere purpose of ascertaining its contents.

[Cited in U. S. v. McCready, 11 Fed. 231.]

2. Neither postmasters nor other officers have any authority to open it under the pretext that there might be something improper or even criminal therein.

3. The letter of a criminal is under the full protection of the law. The violation by a criminal of an agreement that the sheriff was to inspect all letters written by him before they left the jail, would not authorize the sheriff to open a letter after it was in the postoffice. Nothing but his consent in regard to that particular letter would so authorize him.

4. When a letter is placed in a postoffice it is within the legal custody of the officers or agents of the government, and while it so continues, the laws of the United States operate upon it to the exclusion of state laws.

Indictment [against John Eddy] under the twenty-second section of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 109). That section declares: "And if any person shall take any letter or packet not containing any article of value or evidence thereof, out of a postoffice, or shall open any letter or packet which shall have been in a postoffice, or in custody of a mail-carrier, before it shall have been delivered to the person to whom it is directed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, to pry into another's business or secrets; or shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any such mail, letter or packet, such offender upon conviction shall pay for every such offence a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months." During the summer of 1857, a man by the name of White was arrested on a criminal charge and placed in the custody of the defendant, who at the time was sheriff of McHenry county. While in jail, White expressed a desire to write to some of his friends, asking for assistance, which the defendant said he might do, but that he, the defendant, must have the inspection of all the letters. To this White assented. Some time afterwards, White wrote a letter addressed to a person in Iowa, and gave it to a man who had called on him at the jail. The latter deposited it in the postoffice at Woodstock, and paid the postage, and the letter was duly stamped. The sheriff, being informed of this, went to the postoffice and called for the letter, and it was handed to him by the postmaster, for the reason, as he states, that he supposed that Mr. Eddy only wished to look at the direction. While the letter was thus in the defendant's possession, he opened it, read it, took a memorandum of its contents, resealed it, and returned it to the postmaster, who duly mailed it. From all the facts in the case, it appeared that the defendant's motive in the act was to prevent the prisoner from having any improper communication with any one by means of the letter; and he seemed to suppose he had the right to do what he did.

DRUMMOND, District Judge (charging jury). 1. If the letter was in the postoffice in the usual way, and for the ordinary purpose for which letters are deposited, and it was opened by the defendant before its delivery to the person to whom it was addressed, with the design to pry into the business of White or ascertain his secrets, then the offence was complete.

2. When a letter is once placed in the post-office, it is in the custody of the law, and no one except the writer or the persons to whom it is directed, or some person authorized by him, has the right while it is there to open it for the mere purpose of ascertaining its contents.

3. Neither postmasters nor postoffice agents, nor officers of any kind or grade, have any authority to open letters while in the postoffice, under the pretext that there might be something improper, or even criminal, written therein.

4. The letter of a criminal, when once placed in the postoffice, is just as much under the protection of the law, as the letter of the most honest man in the community.

5. Even if it was the agreement between White and the sheriff that the latter was to inspect all the letters written by the former before they left the jail, and White violated the agreement, still that would not authorize the sheriff to open the letter after it was in the post-office, in order to ascertain its contents. Nothing could authorize him, except the consent, expressed or implied, of White, to open the letter which was deposited in the office.

6. In this case the party who was under arrest was afterwards tried and acquitted of the charge for which he was in custody, and we are therefore to presume him innocent. But that makes no difference in the principle applicable to such a case as this. If he had been found guilty the rule would be the same.

7. There is no conflict between the laws of the United States and the laws of the state. A state officer having a prisoner in his custody may exercise a certain discretionary power over his written correspondence with others, so long as that correspondence is out of the jurisdiction or control of the post-office department, but when it is placed within the legal custody of the officers or agents of the department, and while it continues there, the laws of the United States operate on it, and not the laws of the state. In what has been said, the court refers of course to letters while in such custody and on deposit, or in transit to the places or persons addressed, which was true of this letter.

Verdict, guilty.

The court being of opinion that the defendant had been only technically guilty, without criminal or wrongful intent, imposed a nominal penalty.

NOTE. It is an offence against this section to open a letter which has been in the postoffice before delivery to the person to whom it is directed, though the letter is not sealed, and was not at the time in the lawful custody of any person, and even though it was written by the defendant himself. UNITED STATES v. EDWARDS.

[17 Int. Rev. Rec. 126.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1873.

INTERNAL REVENUE—SELLING UNSTAMPED CIGARS.

[1. The punishment imposed by the act of 1868 for selling unstamped cigars is not confined to importers and manufacturers, though they alone are required to pack the cigars and affix the stamps.]

[2. An indictment for selling cigars "not properly boxed and stamped as required by law" will not be held defective merely because it fails to state that the sale was not for importation or exportation, so as to dispense with the necessity of paying the tax, provided it points out the sale as having been at a given time and place, the words "as required by law" being an argumentative allegation that the sale was not within the excepted classes.]

Indictment [against L. C. Edwards] under section 89 of the act of July 20, 1868 (16 Stat. 162), which enacts "that all cigars which shall be removed from any manufactory or place where cigars are made, without the same being packed in boxes as required by this act, or without the proper stamp thereon denoting the tax, or without burning into each box with a branding iron the number of the cigars contained therein, and the name of the manufacturer, and the number of the district and the state, or without the stamp denoting the tax thereon being properly affixed and cancelled, or which shall be sold or offered for sale not properly boxed and stamped, shall be forfeited to the United States. And any person who shall commit any of the above described offences shall, on conviction, be fined for each such offence not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months, nor more than two years." The charge in the first count was that the defendant, at Boston, on a certain day, "did sell and offer for sale to Frank C. Humphreys, a certain number of cigars, to wit, one hundred thereof not properly boxed and stamped as required by law, to wit, did then and there, as aforesaid, sell and offer for sale said cigars in a certain box without any stamp thereon denoting the tax on said cigars." The second and third counts were like the first, except in the number of cigars said to have been sold or offered for sale. The fourth count averred that the cigars had been imported from a foreign country, but this was abandoned. After a verdict of guilty on the first three counts, the defendant moved for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment.

E. P. Nettleton, for the United States.

J. W. Richardson and G. W. Searle, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. It was argued that the manufacturer of domestic cigars, and the importer of those that were brought from abroad, are the only persons liable to the penalties of section 89 of the act of 1868. By section 81 the manufacturer is to pay the tax; by section 82 he is to give bond conditioned, among other things, to pay it by stamps; by section 93 importers of foreign cigars, besides paying the import duties upon them, are to affix to the boxes the like stamps as are required to be affixed to domestic cigars by the manufacturers, and importers are made subject to the penalties applied to manufacturers; by section 87 stamps are to be furnished only to manufacturers and importers, and it is they who are to pack them in certain kinds of boxes. The argument is, that the punishment for selling or offering to sell cigars not properly boxed and stamped is intended for those persons only whose duty it is to pack them and affix the stamps, and who alone can be certain that they are in all respects duly packed, and to whom only the officers are to make sale of stamps.

There is much force in this argument. But on the other hand the words of the law include all persons who sell or offer for sale cigars not properly boxed or stamped; and by section 85 retail dealers are expressly excepted under certain circumstances, showing that congress considered that they were within the general language of that section, which is no broader than section 89. There is an obvious and very strong motive for including dealers in the prohibition, so as to make it for their interest to see that the manufacturers comply with the law. If the statute had punished them for buying unstamped cigars, there might be some danger of injustice, because purchases are often made by letter, and the cigars are not seen until delivery is made of them; but by making it criminal to sell, there is no danger of surprise or accident, and the same result is reached, because the dealer will take care to return to the manufacturer all boxes that do not appear to conform to the rules. Indeed it is not easy to see that the statute could be effectually worked in any other way. If the manufacturer should fail to brand his boxes with his name and district, as a fraudulent manufacturer would be very careful to do, there would be no hold upon any one, and no way of tracing the wrong to its source. Such an argument as this would not, perhaps, have much weight if the statute were ambiguous on its face, because a criminal statute ought to be clear and explicit; but the law being clear on its face in favor of the government, and the doubt being raised only from a careful examination of other parts of the act, and only by an inference of intent derived from those other sections, the argument that such an intent is improbable and that the obvious meaning of the section may have many reasons of general policy to support it, is legitimate, and not without much value. I hold, therefore, that the words of the charge are not to be restrained by implication.

Another objection is, that the crime is not set out with sufficient fulness. There is no statement of circumstances to show that a stamp should have been affixed to the box containing the cigars that are said to have been sold or offered for sale. Under the strict rules of criminal pleading there seems to be a defect here. Selling or offering for sale cigars contained in a box not stamped, is not necessarily a breach of the law, because an importer of cigars may enter them in bond and may re-export them without paying any tax, and he may sell them for the same purpose, and they may be sold any number of times within the period allowed by the warehousing laws, and no stamp need be affixed unless some one should change his mind and make a sale of the goods for domestic use or consumption. So by the amendments to sections 73 and 74 of the statute now under consideration, passed June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. 254), manufacturers of cigars may export them or sell them for export under certain circumstances, and by complying with certain forms, without paying any tax or duty upon them. If, therefore, the defendant were an importer selling cigars in bond for re-exportation, or a manufacturer selling for exportation, or a dealer whose title was derived, however remotely, from either of them, and who honestly sold for the same purpose, no crime was committed by the sale. The indictment does not negative such a sale. But the supreme court and other courts of the United States have gone so far in permitting statute misdemeanors to be laid in the very words of the statute, that after much consideration I do not feel at liberty to set aside this indictment. The statute crime here is selling cigars not properly boxed or stamped. This is fully set out in the indictment. What remains is to point out the overt acts, so to say, with sufficient distinctness to put the defendant on his guard as to the acts really intended to be passed. This is done by alleging that it was a sale to Frank C. Humphreys, at a given time and place. Then there is an argumentative allegation that it was such a sale as could not properly be made without a stamp being affixed to the box. This argumentative allegation is found in the words "as required by law," which, though bad as pleading, may be held sufficient as notice, and would require the government to prove affirmatively that the sale was made under such circumstances as to bring it within the prohibition. Upon the whole, therefore, I think the indictment may be upheld.

I have carefully considered the affidavits filed in aid of the motion for a new trial. They tend to show that all the cigars made by Mr. Climie are stamped; and the evidence at the trial tended to show that those cigars were made by Climie Such evidence is defective in this, that it fails to show how the cigars came to be sold without a stamp, if they had once been stamped. The history of the cigars was before the jury. They were traced from Climie to Humphreys, and no one admitted or now admits that he removed the stamps. The only theories consistent with the defence are that Randall, who bought of Climie, and for whose account the defendant sold the cigars, removed the stamps, and he denied it on the stand; or that Humphreys removed them, and he denied it. No motive is shown for Humphreys to do it, unless to ruin the defendant, against whom he was not shown to have any cause of quarrel or complaint. I can think of no motive that Randall should have, unless to sell the cigars as smuggled, and it does not appear that he did sell them as smuggled, but the contrary appeared. Section 90 enacts that the absence of the proper revenue stamp on any box of cigars sold or offered for sale shall be notice to all persons that the tax has not been paid thereon, and shall be prima facie evidence of the non-payment thereof. In this case we have that evidence, and positive evidence besides, and I am of opinion that even if the cumulative evidence now offered had been before the jury they would have been well warranted in finding a verdict of guilty, and I do not consider that I have any right to order a new trial in order that a second jury may decide on the probabilities of the case.

The other objections are overruled. Motions denied.

At law.

Mr. Forman, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Baker, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought on a bond given by the defendant as receiver of public moneys, to recover a balance of fifteen hundred and seventy dollars, which by the books of the treasury appeared to be due to the plaintiffs. A certified transcript from the books of the treasury department showing this balance was offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, which was objected to by the defendant's counsel, because several items in the account, amounting to more than the balance claimed, were charged as balances found due by the officers of the treasury department, and the court sustained the objection and refused to admit the transcript as evidence. The treasury officers seem to pay more regard to their own peculiar forms than to the requisites of the law or the decisions of the courts of the United States. It has long since been decided by the supreme court—[U. S. v. Jones] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 383—that the "act of congress in making a transcript from the books and proceedings of the treasury evidence, does not mean the statement of an account in gross, but a statement of the items, both of the debits and credits, as they were acted upon by the accounting officers of the department." In this account several balances were charged, not as reported by the receiver, but as found to be due, at different periods, on the adjustment of his accounts at the treasury. These items then are not the evidence on which the accounting officers acted, but the result of their judgment on the accounts.

Controversies frequently arise on treasury adjustments, because certain items claimed as credits are disallowed or certain debits are charged; and how can the court decide on these items if they be not stated in the transcript. The transcript must present the accounts to the court, as they stood before the accounting officers, and the judgment of the court must be given on this evidence. This transcript therefore so far as regards the sums charged as balances, is not evidence. It being suggested that there were other questions in the case, which both parties were desirous of bringing before the court, the defendants consented that the above transcript should go in evidence to the jury. From the transcript it appears that the defendant ceased to be receiver at the end of the first six months of the year in which his term of office expired; and that he received during that period between four and five hundred thousand dollars. And the question is whether the defendant shall receive the commission of one per cent. allowed by law, on the moneys received, under the limitation provided, or whether the commission shall be graduated so as to extend over the whole year. This construction, it appears, has been given to the law by the secretary of the treasury, and consequently, the defendant having served but half of the year, he has been allowed but the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars for his commissions.

The first section of the act of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 466], provides, that "the receivers of public moneys for the lands of the United States, shall receive an annual salary of five hundred dollars each, and a commission of one per centum on the moneys received, as a compensation for clerk hire, receiving, safe keeping and transmitting, such moneys to the treasury of the United States; provided, always, that the whole amount which any receiver of public moneys shall receive, under the provisions of this act, shall not exceed, for any one year, the sum of three thousand dollars." This act adopts two modes of compensation; the one an annual salary, and the other a per cent. on moneys received, provided the commission shall not exceed twenty-five hundred dollars per annum. The salary is paid quarterly, and is limited to the time the service is performed. But the commissions depend not on the time of service, but on the amount of moneys received. And how this allowance in the present case can be graduated so as to pay the defendant only the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars, when the law allows him twenty-five hundred dollars, it is not easy to see. The law limits the commission to twenty-five hundred dollars within the year, but the limitation applies to the receiver who receives the commission. He shall not receive within any one year, including his salary, for his services, a sum exceeding three thousand dollars. But the law makes no provision imposing a further limitation for a fraction of a year.

There is no evidence before the court that the successor of the defendant received a dollar for the last six months of the year, covered by the defendant's appointment. He had received a sum which entitled him to the commission of twenty-five hundred dollars, and this he has a right to claim. On the resignation of the defendant he pays over the four hundred thousand dollars received within the last six months, and he is refused a credit for the commissions which the law allows him. And this is done under the supposition that his successor may receive money enough for the remaining six months of the year, to entitle him to claim the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars as commissions. But suppose he should receive the sum of ten, twenty, or fifty thousand dollars, what is then to be done. Shall he receive one per cent. upon the sum thus received, and shall the balance of the commission be paid to his predecessor? This would be unjust as regards the services compensated, and in violation of the law. Why shall one individual receive one per cent., and another about one quarter per cent., on moneys received within the year. If the law admits of any graduation of the commissions, it should be made on the sums respectively received, and not in reference to the time of service. The salary has reference to the time, the commission to the amount of moneys received.

The year of the new receiver commences from the date of his appointment. And suppose that he should not receive a dollar for the first six months of the year, but for the last six months should receive a sum which would give him the full limit of the commissions allowed in any one year, could he not claim them? He is not appointed to fill a vacancy, but for the term of four years, under the law. And he is as much entitled to twenty-five hundred dollars as commissions, should one per cent. on moneys received amount to that sum, for the first year of his service, as for either of the three remaining years. And it is matter of surprise that a different construction should have been given to the law.

If the construction contended for be correct, the compensation of the successor of the defendant, as to his commissions for the first six months, must be fixed by the amount of moneys received by him within that period, and not by the sum received within the year. By graduating the allowance of commissions to quarterly payments, and giving it the character of a salary, injustice is done and the law is misconstrued.

The other items of credit claimed by the defendant, which were refused by the treasury department, were proper items of expenditure, and the jury will allow them, if the proof of disbursement be satisfactory.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

UNITED STATES v. EGGLESTON et al.

[4 Sawy. 199; 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 113; 9 Chi. Leg. News, 218; 15 Alb. Law J. 493.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. March 5, 1877.

EVIDENCE—TREASURY TRANSCRIPTS—PRIORITY OF UNITED STATES—ADMINISTRATORS—ASSETS—CHARGES UPON ESTATE—EXPENSES.

1. The transcript of the books and proceedings of the treasury department, provided for in section 886 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the accounts of persons accountable for public money, is prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein, so far as the same are authorized by law.

2. Nothing is assets in the hands of an administrator, applicable to the payment of a demand against the estate, within the meaning of section 1103 of the Oregon Civil Code, but money—something which is a legal tender.

3. Semble, that under section 1140 of the Oregon Civil Code, even money in the hands of an administrator is not assets applicable to the payment of a claim, until its payment has been directed by the county court.

4. A debt due an estate from the administrator thereof, and returned on the inventory as solvent, is presumed to have been collected, and is, therefore, assets in his hands, applicable to the payment of a debt due from the deceased to the United States.

5. The priority given to the United States by section 3466 of the Revised Statutes in the case of insolvent debtors, is not a lien upon the property of the insolvents in the hands of the assignee or administrator, but only a right to a priority of payment out of the proceeds of such property after notice of the claim.

6. Taxes and funeral charges are not "debts due from the deceased," within the meaning of section 3466, supra, but charges imposed thereon by the law of the state, which the administrator is bound to discharge before satisfying any claim of the United States as creditor of the deceased.

7. Expenses of last illness are a "debt due from the deceased," and under section 3466, supra, a debt due the United States is to be preferred to them, but if duly paid by the administrator without notice of the claim of the United States, the priority of the latter is lost.

8. The priority of the United States only extends to the net proceeds of the property of the deceased, and therefore the necessary expenses of the administration are first to be paid; but this does not include the costs and expenses of defending an action like this, where the claim was prima facie just, and ought to have been allowed.

Action on paymaster's bond [by the United States against Virgil S. Eggleston and others].

Rufus Mallory, U. S. Atty.

Walter W. Thayer and Richard Williams, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. On July 10, 1873, the defendant Eggleston, being a paymaster in the army of the United States, gave a bond to the plaintiff, with the defendant Robie and the deceased Alexander Miller as his sureties therein, in the sum of $40,000, conditioned, among other things, that said Eggleston would account for all moneys received by him as such paymaster, and, when thereunto required, would refund any such moneys remaining in his hands unaccounted for.

On December 15, 1875, upon a statement and adjustment of Eggleston's accounts at the treasury department, it was ascertained and certified that there remained in his hands unaccounted for, of the moneys received by him under the bond aforesaid, the sum of $12,413.45.

On October 6, 1875, Miller, one of the sureties aforesaid, died, and on December 7, 1875, the defendant Nurse was appointed administrator of his estate by the county court of Lake county, Oregon; and on February 20, 1876, the demand was duly presented to said Nurse for payment, and by him disallowed.

Subsequently this action was brought by the United States upon Eggleston's bond, to recover the sum aforesaid. Neither Eggleston nor Robie have appeared or been served with the summons. The complaint alleges that Nurse "has in his possession, as such administrator, property belonging to said estate applicable to the payment of the money above mentioned."

Nurse, answering the complaint, admits the execution of the bond, but denies the remaining allegations of the complaint, and particularly that he has in his hands property of said estate applicable to the payment of the plaintiff's demand. The case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury.

The transcript from the books and proceedings of the treasury department shows that the defendant Eggleston, by his own account current, is in arrear to the amount of $12,319.40, and that in addition to this sum, $94.05 of the credits claimed by him in such account are unlawful or inaccurate, making the whole indebtedness under the bond of $12,413.45.

By section 886 of the Revised Statutes, this transcript is made prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein, so far as the same are authorized by law. Walton v. U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 655; U. S. v. Buford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 29; U. S. v. Jones, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 384; Gratiot v. U. S., 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 369; U. S. v. Eckford's Ex'rs, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 263; Hoyt v. U. S., 10 How. [51 U. S.] 132; Bruce v. U. S., 17 How. [58 U. S.] 438.

Nothing appearing to the contrary of this, the plaintiff is entitled of course to judgment against the defendant Nurse, as administrator of the estate of Miller, for the said sum of $12,413.45, to be satisfied out of the goods of his intestate. But the plaintiff also claims that it appears from the evidence that at the commencement of this action, there was $4,950.33 in Nurse's hands as such administrator, applicable to the satisfaction of this demand, and therefore there should be judgment against him personally for that amount, with interest from the date of the inventory. This conclusion is based upon section 1103 of the Oregon Civil Code, which provides that the effect of a judgment against an administrator is only to establish the claim, so as to require it to be satisfied in due course of administration, "unless it appear that the complaint alleged assets in his hands applicable to the satisfaction of such claim, and that such allegation was admitted or found to be true, in which case the judgment * * * may be enforced against such * * * administrator personally."

As to the facts, it appears from the inventory and the testimony of Nurse at the time of his appointment as administrator, he was indebted to the estate of Miller in the sum of $6,665, less sundry set-offs amounting to $1,759.67, and a claim to recover $800 damages for the failure of title to twenty pack-mules which he had purchased from Miller in his life-time, leaving a balance due said estate of $4,105.33. This debt was returned as solvent by the administrator, and so appraised by the appraisers. The whole amount of property on the inventory was appraised at $4,605.33. The other $500 consists of personal property, debts due the estate from third persons, and interests in mining claims.

Counsel for the plaintiff maintains that all property upon the inventory is "assets" applicable to the payment of this demand within the meaning of that term as used in section 1103, supra, and therefore insists upon a judgment to that extent against Nurse, to be satisfied de bonus propriis.

No authority has been cited by counsel upon this point, and I have not found any directly bearing on it. My own conclusion is, that the personal property or choses in action in the hands of an administrator is not assets applicable to the satisfaction—payment—of a demand against the estate within the meaning of this section; and that nothing is such an asset but money—that which is a legal tender, and with which a debt can be discharged.

This cannot be done with property or choses in action. If the administrator neglects to convert the property in his hands into money, so as to be able to satisfy the claims against the estate, he is guilty of negligence, and may be removed, and is also liable upon his bond. But I think it would be impracticable and unsafe in this action to inquire into the probable money value of the property mentioned in the inventory, and then charge the administrator personally with that sum, as money in his hands applicable to the payment of this claim. Upon an actual sale of the property, the amount realized might fall far short of this supposed value, to the irremediable loss of the administrator. Such money assets must also be at the time subject to be applied to the payment of the demand in question.

This action was commenced March 24, 1876—less than six months after the appointment of the defendant Nurse as administrator. Now, section 1140 of the Oregon Civil Code provides in effect that the county court, after the filing of the first semi-annual account of the administrator, shall "ascertain and determine if the estate be sufficient to satisfy the claims presented and allowed" by the administrator within the first six months after notice of his appointment, "after paying the funeral charges and expenses of administration," and shall then order and direct payment to be made in full, or pro rata, as the case may be.

From this it seems that even money in the hands of an administrator is not technically assets applicable to the payment of a claim, unless the county court in which the letters were granted has ascertained the fact and made an order to that effect.

This point was not made by counsel, and will therefore be considered waived. Yet it is stated to show that if the administrator is not authorized to pay any claim against the estate until directed by the county court, as provided in section 1140, supra, then section 1103, supra, ought not to be construed so as to charge him under any circumstances with assets in his hands applicable to the payment of a particular claim until its payment has been authorized and directed by the county.

But waiving the effect of this section (section 1140) had Nurse any money in his hands as administrator at the commencement of this action, applicable to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's demand? At the date of the letters he was solvent, and owed the estate $4,105.33. This sum it was his duty to collect from himself as debtor of the estate by transferring it to himself as administrator thereof. It is but reasonable to presume that this duty was duly performed, and that such sum was then, and still is, in his hands as administrator.

Was it then applicable to the payment of this claim? By section 3466 of the Revised Statutes, it is provided that whenever the estate of a deceased person in the hands of his administrator "is insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased, the debts due the United States shall be first satisfied." The language of this section is absolute. The debts due the United States are to be satisfied, to the exclusion of any other debt due from the deceased.

The constitutionality of this act, and that it gives no lien upon the property of the debtor, but only a priority of payment out of the proceeds of such property upon the debtor's dying insolvent, and therefore does not overreach or affect a bona fide transfer of the same, was settled by the supreme court in U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 390, 396.

It does not appear that the administrator had any notice of this claim prior to February 20, 1876, when it was presented to him and disallowed. At that time, according to the evidence he had paid out for expenses of Miller's last illness, $370; for funeral charges, $45, and for taxes on the estate, $40; in all, $455.

In U. S. v. Fisher, supra (note, p. 390), it was said by Chief Justice Marshall that the administrator is only liable to the extent of the assets in his hands, after notice of the claim of the United States; and in U. S. v. Clark [Case No. 14,807], it was held that the administrator is to be considered a trustee, and only liable after notice or the knowledge of such circumstances as would put a prudent man upon inquiry.

This being so, it follows that the administrator is not personally liable to the plaintiff under section 3466, supra, for the assets which he had disbursed in good faith before notice of its claim.

The two items of taxes and funeral charges are "not debts due from the deceased," but charges imposed by the law of the state which the administrator is bound to discharge in the performance of his trust before satisfying any claim of the United States as a creditor of the deceased. The title to the property of this estate not being affected by section 4366, supra, and being therefore in the administrator, it is private property and subject to taxation by the state, and this charge is paramount and prior to any claim which the United States may have against the proceeds as creditor of the deceased.

In U. S. v. Hunter [Case No. 15,427], Mr. Justice Story held that the right of priority of the United States only attaches to what remains of a debt due to an insolvent debtor, or of his estate, after the proper charges and expenses of collecting, or administering it, as the case may be, are satisfied. Upon appeal to the supreme court, the decree in this case was affirmed without this question being mooted. [Hunter v. U. S.] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 173. The expenses of Miller's last illness are a "debt due from the deceased," and therefore the claim of the United States is entitled to a priority of payment. Waiving the question, because not made by counsel, whether this payment is to be considered as made in good faith because made without the order of the county court, as provided in section 1140, supra, it was otherwise duly made and without notice of the prior claim of the United States. Deduct then the sum of these payments from the $4,105.33 of assets presumed to be in the defendant's hands, and there is left $3,650.33.

In addition to this, there must be deducted the expenses of administration. These are, so far as appears, the compensation of the administrator and the fees of printers and officers. The administrator's ordinary compensation is "a commission upon the whole estate accounted for by him." Civ. Code Or. § 1146. For the purposes of this action, assuming that to be the sum due from the administrator to the deceased, and treating the rest of the estate as merely things in action, this commission amounts to $202.10. Add to this $100 for fees of printers and officers, and the remainder, $3,348.26, is the sum for which the plaintiff is entitled to a personal judgment against the defendant Nurse.

The defendant claimed in his evidence that the expenses of administration would amount to a much larger sum than this. The only item he mentioned was the expense of defending this action. But as this claim ought to have been allowed by him when presented, and this litigation thereby avoided, it is difficult to see on what ground he can be allowed anything on this account. If the estate is to pay the expenses of this litigation, the effect will be that the United States maintains the administrator in his apparently improper resistance to the collection of its lawful claim.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment against Nurse, as administrator, for $12,413.45, with interest on the same at the rate of ten per centum per annum from the adjustment of the accounts, December 15, 1875, until this date, and also against said Nurse, personally, for $3,348.23 of said sum, and the costs and expenses of this action.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHT BARRELS OF WHISKEY.

[6 Int. Rev. Rec 124; 15 Pittsb. Leg. J. 4.]

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct., 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE — FORFEITURE — DISTILLED SPIRITS — REMOVAL FROM INSPECTED PACKAGES—RECTIFICATION.

[The provisions of Acts 1866, c. 184, § 43, providing for the forfeiture of spirits, removed from the original packages in which they were inspected and gauged, into other packages, for purposes of rectification, redistillation, or change of proof, unless they are again inspected, gauged and properly branded, does not apply to spirits merely poured from the original packages into an open vat for rectification.]

MILLER, District Judge. The information is brought against two thousand one hundred and twenty-eight gallons of spirits, of different names and descriptions, seized in the rectifying establishment of John R. Hodson, in the city of Janesville, in this district. Article 1 propounds that on the 25th of April, 1867, the liquors enumerated were found in the possession and custody of said John R. Hodson, for the purpose of being sold and removed by him with design to avoid payment of taxes. Article 2 propounds that on the 1st day of April, 1867, at Turtleville, in this district, the said liquors being distilled spirits, were removed from the original packages in which they were inspected and gauged as required by law, into other packages for purposes of rectification and change of proof, and were not again inspected, and gauged and properly branded, contrary to the act, etc. Article 3 propounds that on the 1st day of April, 1867, at Turtleville, the said liquors were drawn off in casks or packages and inspected, gauged and proved, and were afterwards removed to the rectifying establishment of William Hodson, at Turtleville, and removed from the casks or packages in which they were inspected and gauged into other packages for purposes of rectification and change of proof, and were not again inspected and gauged and properly branded, nor was the United States inspector's brand put on the packages into which the liquors were removed. And they came into the hands of John R. Hodson at his rectifying establishment at Janesville before they were seized, having been so removed, rectified and changed, contrary to the act, etc.

The hearing was had upon a written stipulation—as to eight barrels of whiskey containing 288 proof gallons—which, it is agreed, were rectified by William Hodson, at his rectifying establishment at Turtleville, and branded by him, "William Hodson, Rectifier, Turtleville, Wisconsin, Rectified," and were not inspected and branded otherwise. The highwines and distilled spirits from which the whiskey was obtained by the process of rectification were poured, as is usual in rectifying, into an open vat, stationary and fixed, and were not inspected after rectification. The whiskey contained in the eight barrels was sold by William Hodson to claimant, and by him poured into the vat in his store and rectifying establishment at Janesville, and were seized in the vat.

This information is brought on this provision of section 43, c. 189, of the act of 1866 [14 Stat. 162]: "And all spirits, after being removed from the original package, in which they were inspected and gauged, into other packages for purposes of rectification, redistillation or change of proof, shall again be inspected, and gauged, and properly branded; and the absence of the inspector's brand shall be taken and held as a sufficient cause or evidence upon which any spirits so found may be forfeited." It is conceded that the wines had been inspected and gauged before rectification at Turtleville; and the first article of the information is abandoned. The law provides for the forfeiture of inspected and gauged spirits removed from the packages in which they were inspected and gauged, into other packages for the purpose of rectification, redistillation, or change of proof, without again being inspected and gauged, and properly branded by the inspector. This provision is for the purpose of identification in the second packages of the same spirits that had been inspected, gauged and branded in the former packages and thereby to prevent fraud. But the stipulation does not support the information. It is agreed that the eight barrels of whiskey containing 288 proof gallons, had been rectified by William Hodson in his establishment at Turtleville, and branded by him with his private brand. The highwines being inspected, gauged, and branded by the inspector, were poured as is usual in rectifying, into an open vat, stationary and fixed, and were rectified. They were not poured into other vessels or packages as highwines, from one set of packages into other packages. Their identity as highwines ceased, upon being poured into the open vat and rectified. The vat is not a package within the meaning of the law. Pouring the wines into the vat was the first act towards rectification, which was followed by the rectifying process, thereby changing the wines into whiskey.

The next sentence of the section (which is repealed by the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 471]) illustrates clearly the position here taken. It provides for a forfeiture for changing the character of spirits that have been duly inspected and marked, either by rectification, mixing or otherwise, and placing the same in packages for consumption or sale, without first stamping or branding upon such packages in such a manner as the commissioner of internal revenue may prescribe, the word "Rectified." William Hodson at Turtleville, not knowing of the repeal of this provision, marked the barrels or packages of rectified whiskey in the manner directed by the commissioner. The provision under which the information is brought, relates to the transfer of inspected spirits from one package to another before rectification. The repealed sentence relates to the marking of whiskey after rectification.

The whiskey contained in the eight barrels was sold by William Hodson to the claimant, John R. Hodson, who removed them to his rectifying establishment in Janesville where they had been poured into his rectifying vat for further rectification and where they were seized. This transfer does not change the nature of the case, nor does it make an additional cause of forfeiture. The government had been paid the taxes, and William Hodson at Turtleville had a right to pour the contents of the inspected packages of spirits into his rectifying vat, and John R. Hodson had a right to purchase the rectified article and rectify it in his establishment at Janesville.

Case No. 15,029.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHT CASES OF LAMPS.

[1 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 252.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1839.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FRAUDULENT INVOICES—BURDEN OF PROOF—PROVINCE OF JURY.

[1. If the government shows that the invoice price is far below the market price, this is sufficient to place the burden on the importer to show what price he actually paid, and, if he does not do so, the jury are warranted in inferring that the invoice was falsely made up.]

[2. If the evidence shows that the market price is not much above the invoice price, the jury may consider whether the difference is greater than the ordinary fluctuations of the market, or what might arise from the necessities of the seller, the state of the times, etc.]

[This was an action for the forfeiture of eight cases of lamps imported from France in June, 1838, per the ship Louis Phillip, and consigned to Augustine Draconi.]

Forfeiture of goods for undervaluation.

The articles were what are called mechanical lamps, having in the interior of the lamp a machinery and movements similar to those of a clock, by which the oil is at all times so forced up to the wick, that the lamp gives a much brighter and more beautiful light than ordinary lamps. The bodies of the lamps were entered in the invoice at 30 francs each, and the suspension frames, globes, and other appendages, were all entered in the invoice at various specific prices, all of which, it was alleged, were 100 per cent. below the appraised value and the current price of such articles, and that therefore the invoice had been fraudulently made up to defraud the revenue of the United States.

In support of these allegations, several appraisers and other attaches of the customhouse testified that they had examined the articles, and that the value put upon them in the invoice was from 70 to 100 per cent. below their current price. But it appeared that not one of the customhouse officers who had examined the articles had any practical knowledge of the value of or price of such articles, and had formed their opinion only from inference, founded on information they obtained from others. There were also some witnesses called who dealt in lamps, but not in the peculiar sort of lamps now in question, which have been rarely imported into this country. The witnesses could therefore decide upon their value inferentially, and in this way they set a much higher value on some of the articles than they had been set down in the invoice. On the part of the claimant, witnesses were produced who are practically acquainted with the value of such lamps and they valued some of them below the invoice price and others a little above it.

THE COURT charged the jury it would be necessary for them to take the invoice and the appraisement, and compare them together, and then compare these papers with the testimony, and see how far the evidence supported and upheld the invoice or the appraisement. After the jury had done this, they would apply the facts, and draw the proper inferences. It was necessary for the court to lay down the principles of law by which the jury were to be guided in giving their verdict, in order that they should know what they had to decide. It was said that the property in question had been imported in violation of the revenue laws, inasmuch as that the importer, in making out his invoice, had entered the articles at a false valuation. The question, then, for their inquiry was, simply, was the invoice made up with intent to defraud the revenue, by charging the property under its value?

The government had given no direct evidence on the subject. It was competent for them to have shown what the articles cost the importer abroad; and, if the price in the invoice was shown to be less than the purchase price, this would have been direct testimony to show that the invoice was false; and if the party was to have derived advantage from it, the jury would be necessarily called in to say that he had committed a fraud to cheat the revenue. There had been, however, no direct evidence given by the government, and they had endeavored to show that the market value was more than the invoice; and, if that had been shown, it was ground for a fair inference that the party had bought them at the current market value, and it would be then incumbent on him to show at what price he had actually purchased them, and, if he did not so do, it would be fair for the jury to infer that the invoice was falsely made up. The case rested mainly on whether the invoice was charged below the fair market value, and the government had endeavored to prove this in various ways. First, they showed the value set upon it by the appraisers; and, although this was, in the first instance, prima facie evidence, to a certain extent, it was not, invariably, evidence of the highest character, as it was not to be supposed that the appraisers were acquainted with the value of all articles which came into this port. And in the present instance it appeared that the appraisers had never been engaged in the sale or manufacture of such articles, or had any practical knowledge of their value, and made it up only from general inquiries. And supposing that the judgment formed from such sources showed a different value to that in the invoice, still that would not be sufficient to prove a fraud. For, if the market or adjudged value of the articles was not much greater than what was in the invoice, then the jury had a right to consider whether the deviations were greater than the ordinary fluctuations of the market, or what might arise from the necessities of the seller, the state of the times, or any other occurrence incidental to mercantile affairs. And, if the testimony showed that the invoice was as nearly right as wrong, then it was the duty of the jury to consider that the importer intended to act rightly towards the government, and they should not impute a fraud to him which the testimony had not clearly established.

Verdict for the claimant.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHT CASKS OF WHISKEY.

[7 Int. Rev. Rec. 4; 14 Pittsb. Leg. J. 11.]

District Court, E. D. New York. 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE—SPIRITS FOUND OUT OF WAREHOUSE—BURDEN OF PROOF—BRANDS—PAYMENT OF TAX.

[1. In the case of the seizure, for violation of the internal revenue laws, of distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, the burden of proof under section 45, Act 1866 (14 Stat. 163), is upon the claimant to show that the requirements of the law have been complied with.]

[2. Proof by the claimant that proper brands were upon the barrels is insufficient. He must show, in all cases where the payment of tax is a prerequisite to the removal from a bonded warehouse, that such tax has been paid.]

This was a case where a quantity of rectified spirits was seized while being transported from the rectifying establishment of W. O. Tyler, West street, New York, to Brooklyn. The evidence on the part of the government showed that the spirits were rectified; that they were made of a barrel of new spirits and the remainder rectified spirits which were properly branded. It was claimed by the district attorney that the burden of proof to show that the tax on these spirits and the spirits from which they had been made was paid, devolved upon the claimant [J. Hexseimer].

BENEDICT, District Judge, said that the question had been reduced to a construction of the forty-fifth section of the act of 1866 [14 Stat. 163], providing that spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law not being paid, the burden of proof shall be upon the claimant to show that the requirements of the law have been complied with.

Mr. Hollis, counsel for claimant, asked the court to direct the jury to find a verdict for the claimant, upon the ground that no probable cause of seizure was shown by the government other than that the spriits were found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, and that the claimant was not called upon to prove anything concerning them; that, assuming the burden of proof to be upon the claimant, he was entitled to judgment, having shown that the spirits were marked as the law requires.

District Attorney Tracey requested the court to direct a verdict for the government, under the construction given section 45 by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of U. S. v. 508 Barrels of Spirits [Case No. 15,113], inasmuch as no evidence was offered by claimant showing that the tax had been paid.

Judge BENEDICT, in deciding, said that he considered the propositions of the law to have been disposed of in the Case of 508 Barrels; that these spirits had been removed for transportation from Illinois to the Third district, New York, and were found in the Third district out of a bonded warehouse, and that the higher court held that the burden was upon the claimant to show that the law was complied with, and that the fact that proper brands were upon the barrels was insufficient. This case differed from that only where these spirits purported to be rectified spirits removed from a bonded warehouse upon payment of tax instead of spirits removed for transportation upon bond. Proof of the payment of tax upon removal of the spirits from the bonded warehouse must also be given. The words "requirements of the law in regard to the same" referred to the removal from the bonded warehouse according to law, and payment of tax when that was necessary to a removal.

In concluding, Judge BENEDICT said that he had consulted with Judge NELSON, who concurred with him in his opinion with regard to the case. A verdict for the government must accordingly be entered condemning the property.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHTEEN BALES OF BLANKETS.

[7 Int. Rev. Rec. 69.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1868.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURE—UNDERVALUATION.

This was a case brought to forfeit the goods for alleged undervaluation. The goods were manufactured at Piermont, near Paris, by T. A. Sollier, and by him shipped to this country, one invoice in December, 1861, and one in January, 1862. He stated the value in the invoices at 11 francs a pair. On appraisal at the customhouse their value was raised to 15 francs a pair. A reappraisement was demanded, and the reappraisers valued them at 16 francs. Thereupon the goods were seized as forfeited for the undervaluation. The claimant gave testimony by witnesses examined on commission, that the goods though shipped in December and January, were actually manufactured by him in September previous, and that the invoice stated their value correctly at that time, while the appraisers had taken their value at the time of shipment.

Mr. Allen, for the United States.
Mr. Choate, for claimant.

THE COURT held that under Act 1823, § 8 [3 Stat. 729], the market value at the time of manufacture was the proper value to be stated by the manufacturer in his invoice, instead of the value at the time of shipment. The government witnesses were recalled and testified that the value was higher than 11 francs even at the time of manufacture, the price of blankets having risen very much after the battle of Bull Run, and the indications of a long war in this country. The question of fact as to the value at that time was left to the jury, and they found a verdict for the claimant.

Case No. 15,033.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHTEEN BARRELS HIGH WINES.

[8 Blatchf. 475.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 20, 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE — DISTILLER — NEGLECT TO MAKE ENTRY AND RETURN—PENALTY—FORFEITURE—WITNESS—EVIDENCE.

1. The penalty for a violation of the thirty-first section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 157), in the neglect, on the part of a distiller, to make entry and return, as required by that section, is not merely the penalty imposed by that section, but also the forfeiture of spirits, &c., provided for by the twenty-fifth section of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483).

2. Where, on the cross-examination of a witness, collateral facts are called out from him tending to create distrust of his integrity, fidelity, or truth, it is competent for the adverse party to ask of the witness an explanation which may show the consistency of such facts with his integrity, fidelity, and truth, although circumstances may thus be proved which are foreign to the principal issue, and which, but for such previous cross-examination, would not be permitted to be proved.

[Cited in U. S. v. Quantity of Tobacco, Case No. 16,106.]

3. Where some, though slight, evidence is given on the part of the United States tending to show a failure to make the true and exact entries and returns required by the said thirty-first section, the burthen is cast upon the claimant to show a compliance with the statute.

[Cited in U. S. v. Quantity of Tobacco, Case No. 16,106.]

4. Where property is seized as forfeited for a violation of the internal revenue law, and is bonded, and returned to the claimant, it becomes subject to forfeiture for causes subsequently arising; but the fact of a condemnation for such subsequent forfeiture cannot affect the question of its liability to condemnation in the suit in which it was so bonded.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.]

William Dorsheimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.
C. Carskadden, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. It is quite manifest that, under the decision of this court in U. S. v. 36 Barrels of High Wines [Case No. 16,468], all the spirits and other property in the place or building, or within the yard or enclosure, where the same were found, were liable to condemnation, under the forty-eighth section of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the ninth section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111); and, inasmuch as the jury found, as to certain of the spirits, that they were in the possession, custody, and control of the claimants, for the purpose of being sold by them in fraud of the internal revenue laws, it follows that they were rightly condemned. In this respect, the charge of the court was too favorable to the claimants; and it would seem useless to try the cause a second time, when, upon the facts found, the condemnation must be certain, according to the construction, heretofore given in this court, of the effect of placing the spirits in the distillery warehouse, namely, that, although in such warehouse, the spirits are, nevertheless, in the possession, custody, and control of the owner, within the meaning of the said forty-eighth section.

But the case was tried upon the contrary view of the meaning of that section, and of the effect of placing the spirits in the warehouse. As to the spirits there stored, the actual condemnation was adjudged under the thirty-first section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 157), and the twenty-fifth section of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483); and, in my judgment, these are entirely sufficient to sustain such condemnation. The thirty-first section of the act of 1866 required the claimants, from day to day, to make, or cause to be made, true and exact entry, in a book kept in such form as the commissioner of internal revenue might prescribe, of the number of pounds or gallons of materials used, the number of gallons of spirits distilled, the number of gallons placed in warehouse, with various other particulars specified, and, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each month, to render an account containing these particulars to the assessor. The twenty-fifth section of the act of 1867 makes the neglect to do this a cause of forfeiture of all the spirits made by or for the distiller, and of all vessels used in making the same, and of all materials fit for use in distillation, found on the premises. The fourth count in the information charges, that the spirits seized were made, manufactured, and distilled by the claimants in certain stills, &c.; and that the owner, agent, and superintendent of such stills did neglect and refuse to make true and exact entry and report of the same, and did neglect and refuse, from day to day, to make, or cause to be made, true and exact entry, in a book kept in such form as the commissioner of internal revenue had theretofore prescribed, of the number of pounds or gallons, etc., following, in detail, the particulars specified in section 31. This count the jury found proved, and condemnation, of course, followed. The counsel for the claimants erroneously insists, that the consequence of a violation of this thirty-first section is only fine and imprisonment. The penalty of forfeiture of the spirits, vessels, stills, boilers, and materials is added by the twenty-fifth section of the act of 1867.

If, therefore, there was no error in the reception or rejection of testimony, nor in the instructions to the jury in other particulars than are above referred to, the judgment should be affirmed. Evidence of other acts occurring a month before and a month after the seizure in question, indicating an intent to sell and dispose of spirits distilled by the claimants in fraud of the United States, and without the payment of the tax thereon, was objected to as too remote. I do not think it necessary, on this point, to add anything to what was said in U. S. v. 36 Barrels of High Wines [Case No. 16,469]. There, the same point was urged, and the evidence held admissible.

There is nothing, I think, in the objection to the testimony given by way of explanation of the conduct of the witness Avery. It was not given as evidence in chief, to affect the claimants on the questions in issue, but only to avoid the effect of facts elicited by the claimants on their cross-examination. When cross-examining counsel see fit to call out from the witness collateral facts which tend to create distrust of his integrity, fidelity or truth, it is entirely competent and proper for the adverse party to ask of the witness an explanation which may show that the facts thus elicited were, in truth, wholly consistent with his integrity, fidelity and truth, although they thereby prove circumstances foreign to the principal issue, and which, but for such previous cross-examination, they would not be permitted to prove.

On the question whether the hogs and pigs seized were within the place or building, or within the yard or enclosure, where the articles, spirits or materials were found, the jury, upon the distinct question being submitted to them, have found in the affirmative. They might properly so find. The shed or pen in which they were kept, itself formed a part of the enclosing fence surrounding the premises; and it was not for the court to say that the exterior line or side of that shed or pen was not the exterior line of the enclosed distillery yard or premises. I think the finding of the jury must be held conclusive upon that question.

The observations of the court on the state of the proofs were not erroneous. Evidence had been given in behalf of the government, tending to show that the claimants had not made true and exact entries and returns, and the opinion of the court was expressed, that this cast the burthen upon the claimants, to show that they had complied with the statute. From the nature of the case, the proof on this subject was in the possession of the claimants. They knew just how many pounds or gallons of materials they had used, how many gallons they had distilled, and all the other particulars required to be entered and returned. The government had, presumptively, no such knowledge, and were struggling to prove a negative. In such cases, the rule is familiar. Slight proof given by the party who is under such disadvantage, is sufficient to call upon the adverse party, who has the proof in his own hands, to show what is the truth concerning the matter in question.

The subsequent forfeiture and condemnation of certain of the same property, for a subsequent violation of the law could have no effect to defeat the claim of the government in this proceeding. When the property was bonded and returned to the claimants, the lien of the government thereon, for the cause of forfeiture assigned in this proceeding, was gone. The property then remained in the claimants' hands, for all purposes, their own, as much as any property theretofore or thereafter acquired, and it was entirely free from liability to further seizure for the causes herein alleged. But, like any other property, it might be forfeited, if subsequent cause therefor arose, and such forfeiture would be solely by reason of such subsequent cause.

The judgment must be affirmed, with costs.

Case No. 15,033a.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHTEEN PIPES DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[20 Niles Reg. 346.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. 1821.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—COLLECTION LAWS—SEIZURE OF DISTILLED SPIRITS—EVIDENCE.

[1. Certain casks of distilled spirits were seized under the collection act of March 2, 1799, §§ 41, 43 (1 Stat. 659, 660), on the ground that they were unaccompanied by the certificates required by law. At the time of seizure the claimant stated to the officer that he had the certificates at his house, and would at once bring them to the customhouse, where the goods were taken. He never produced them at the customhouse, but some time afterwards presented them to the district judge, when making an application for delivery of the goods on giving bond. Held, that these facts were sufficient to sustain an averment that the casks were "found unaccompanied with the proper certificates," so as to justify the seizure, and raise a legal presumption of the liability of the goods to forfeiture, which could only be repelled by the production of satisfactory proof that the spirits contained in the casks at the time of seizure had been actually imported and the duties paid.]

[2. If a person having in his possession for sale a cask of distilled spirits which has once passed from the customhouse, accompanied by the marks and certificate required by law, change essentially the contents of the cask, without first obliterating such marks, and surrendering the certificate, this act must be regarded as fraudulent, and debars him from ever after resorting to the certificate as evidence of his rights.]

[This was an information of forfeiture against 18 pipes of distilled spirits, claimed by T. R. Rix, charging the violation of sections 41 and 43 of the act of congress of March 2, 1799, "regulating the collection of duties on imports and tonnage."]

George Blake, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Jas. T. Austin and Daniel Webster, for claimant.

BY THE COURT. It appeared in evidence, first, that the casks of distilled spirits in question were of such description as were required by the act to be marked and accompanied with the usual certificates; and, secondly, that on the 29th day of April last, they were found by the seizing officer in the possession of a person unaccompanied by such certificates. It was shown, by the testimony of sundry witnesses that the casks in question were filled at the time of the seizure with a species of distilled spirits, and that each of them had been regularly marked at the customhouse in Boston in conformity with the requirements of law, as containing foreign gin of the first proof, imported in ship Packet, Turner, master; all the original marks and numbers remaining as at first, without any change or obliteration. It was furthermore proved that the claimant, being present at the seizure, was requested by the seizing officer to produce the certificates which were required to accompany the casks; that, in answer to this demand, the claimant declared that he had the proper certificates, and that he would go to his house for them, and bring them down to the customhouse for the inspection of the collector. The seizing officer requested him to do so, assuring him, at the same time, that he would go immediately to the customhouse, in order to meet him there. The casks were accordingly removed by the seizing officer to the store commonly used by the collector as a place of deposit for merchandise under such circumstances, and thereupon the seizing officer went to the customhouse, according to the arrangement which had been previously made with the claimant, as above stated, in order to wait there his arrival with the certificates. It appeared, however, that the claimant did not, on that day, nor at any time afterwards, produce the said documents at the customhouse, as he had proposed to do, and in fact that nothing further was heard of any such documents, either by the collector or any other representing the United States in behalf of the prosecution, until they were produced before the district judge on the second day of June following, when an application was made to the said judge by the claimant for the delivery of the merchandise, upon giving bond for the appraised value thereof, in conformity with the provisions of the law in such cases.

It was further shewn on the part of the United States, very clearly and satisfactorily, that, notwithstanding the apparent conformity between the casks and certificates, yet that the contents of the former at the time of the seizure were essentially different from what they were at the time of their being marked, and at the issuing of the certificates; that the spirits now contained in the casks, instead of being genuine Holland gin of first proof, according to the purport of the marks and certificates, were in fact a species of mixed, adulterated spirit, composed (in the opinion of the witnesses) partly of foreign and partly of domestic manufacture; and, although not much reduced merely as to proof, yet so affected by the mixture as to have lost about fifty per cent. of the market value of the article as at the time of its original importation.

The opinion of the judge, upon the several points which had arisen at the trial, was expressed to the effect following, viz.:

1. That, even if the certificates now produced were genuine, and found, in every respect, to comport with the marks and contents of the casks, still that the circumstance of their nonproduction, upon the demand of the seizing officer, and their being kept back, for such a length of time by the claimant, must be deemed sufficient, in point of law, to maintain the "averment that the casks were found unaccompanied with the proper certificates," so as to justify the seizure, and to raise a legal presumption of their liability to forfeiture, which could only be removed by the production of satisfactory proof on the other side "that the distilled spirits contained in them at the time of seizure, had actually been imported into the United States, and the duties thereupon paid or secured."

2. That a person having in his possession for sale a cask of distilled spirits, which has once passed from the customhouse, and is accompanied by the marks and certificates required by the law in that case, has no more right, without first obliterating such marks, and surrendering the certificate, to change, essentially, the contents of such a cask, than he has to alter the marks, or to erase and falsify the certificate itself; that to do this, in either case, is to tamper with an important public regulation; that it must be regarded as a fraudulent act of the party, and, like the forging or falsification of a deed, or any other instrument, must forever debar him from the privilege of resorting afterwards to the original voucher as affording the evidence of his rights.

3. As a conclusion from the foregoing positions, it was laid down distinctly by the judge that if, from the strong proofs which had been produced on the part of the prosecution, it should be the opinion of the jury that any part of the spirits contained in these casks were of foreign manufacture, or, in other words, were such as were required by law to be marked and certificated, and that the contents of the casks, at the time of the seizure, were essentially different from what they were when the certificates were issued, then that the certificates ought to be rejected as wholly inapplicable, as affording no evidence whatsoever that the spirits had been legally imported and the duties secured. In fine, that, whatever might be the inconvenience or injury resulting to the claimant from this construction, it was such, and such only, as had been brought upon him by his own indiscretion or fraud, in attempting to pervert the purposes of an important public document; and that he had therefore no reasonable grounds for complaining of any hardship.

Case No. 15,035.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHT HUNDRED BARRELS OF SPIRITS.

[10 Int. Rev. Rec. 126.]

District Court, D. Missouri. 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE — WHISKEY — FORFEITURE — FAILURE TO PAY TAX—RECTIFIER—BOOKS.

About a year ago there arrived at this port, first the steamer W. R. Arthur, then the Great Republic, then the Frank Pargoud, each of which steamers were loaded to the guards with New Orleans spirits, all of which was seized as contraband. The first seizure was instituted at the request of the district attorney. The other seizures followed in rapid succession for several days, until some eight hundred barrels had been gobbled. The claimants of the first lots were C. S. Mattison & Co., a firm composed of a son of Ex-Gov. Mattison of Illinois, and R. E. Goodell, son-in-law of the same distinguished capitalist. Another lot was claimed by J. S. Clark, of New Orleans, with whom Thos. E. Maurice was interested. Another lot was claimed by Thomas H. Walker, son of a prominent distiller and whiskey dealer of New Orleans.

Gen. Noble, the district attorney, went to New Orleans in January and February to take evidence in these cases, and was prepared at the present term of the court to try all of them, but most of the claimants had their cases continued. Walker had the audacity to bring the issue before a jury, and the case has been tried.

The evidence on the part of the United States was that of an official of New Orleans, Ben Jacobs, who showed that the rectifier of the whiskey had his establishment in the same building with the distillery known as "Walker's Distillery," and run in the name of L. C. Clark, and that he had observed various matters of suspicion, which indicated a connection between the two establishments.

The evidence for the defence, which was highly favorable for the government, showed that Mr. Hart, rectifier, was a party connected with the Walkers, and had had money advanced to him by the elder Walker; that he had kept his books in a very unsatisfactory manner; lost sheets of paper which, in his testimony, he endeavored to show had been torn up by his servants. It further appeared that Clark, the distiller, had shipped the same high wines by Hart to St. Louis for the benefit of the younger Walker; that Walker had accompanied them in the Great Republic; that at the same time the Great Republic brought up some 300 other barrels of spirits, and it was these spirits, or some of them, which had some connection with the murder committed on the Great Republic on the morning of her arrival here, and of which the captain, W. B. Donaldson, was accused, and is to be tried shortly in the criminal court. Thomas H. Walker testified that he was a law student, having studied law for three years, and had left his father's plantation in the South with this spiritual endowment from the old man, and with the object "to travel and speculate as a traveler." He further testified that after the seizure his hopes had been blighted. There was no proof that the tax had been paid, and as this burden was upon the claimant, the court instructed the jury that it was his duty to satisfy them fully upon this point.

It was further clearly shown that Mr. Hart, the rectifier, had not kept the book required by section 6 of the revenue law, and therefore the spirits were also forfeited. It was also shown that the rectifying-house of Hunt was in the distillery of Walker, though in the name of Clark; that Walker had advanced money to Hart; that Clark had shipped the spirits for Hart to Walker the younger, and that the younger Walker had come up on the boat with the spirits, and that an old and close intimacy existed between the parties, and that they were bringing spirits from a market where they were at least as high as at St. Louis, paying extra expenses, etc., and at the same time there were whole steamboat loads coming from the same place, etc.

The jury retired, and after a short absense, returned with a verdict for the United States on the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, tenth and eleventh articles in the information, either one of which was sufficient to forfeit the spirits. They found the seventh, eighth and ninth articles untrue.

Case No. 15,036.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHT HUNDRED CADDIES OF TOBACCO.

[2 Bond, 305.] [1]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—TOBACCO—FALSE RETURN—FALSE BRANDS—INNOCENT PURCHASER.

1. In an information, claiming a forfeiture of tobacco, in two distinct charges, based on two provisions of the internal revenue laws, the district attorney may claim a judgment on either or both, as the evidence may justify, and the court will not require him to elect on which he will rely.

2. Tobacco, as an article subject to taxation, is included in section 9 of the act of July, 1866 [14 Stat. 101], and may be forfeited for fraud perpetrated by the manufacturer, even in the possession of a purchaser, without knowledge of the fraud.

3. This is a stringent but necessary provision in the internal revenue system.

4. The title of the government to the property infected with fraud, vests from the time of its commission, and the taint of fraud inheres in it, even in the possession of an innocent purchaser.

5. If false brands were placed upon the caddies by a revenue officer, indicating that the legal taxes had been paid, when in fact they had not been paid, without any complicity in the fraud by the claimant, it would not be a ground of forfeiture, and if the jury find a forfeiture, it must be for the original fraud of the manufacturer in failing to return, or making false returns of the quantity manufactured.

Durbin Ward, Dist. Atty., and Henry Hooper, for the United States.

H. C. Whitman, Jacob D. Cox, C. W. Moulton, and H. L. Burnett, for claimant.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). The United States, in this proceeding, claim the forfeiture of eight hundred caddies of plug tobacco, as manufactured and sold in violation of the internal revenue statute. George Atkins has made himself a party to the suit, by his appearance and answer, in which he claims to be the owner of the tobacco, and denies the allegations of fraud, set forth in the information. This tobacco, it appears from the evidence, came into the possession of Atkins, the claimant, by purchase from Diehl & Anderson, a business firm in Cincinnati. Immediately after the purchase it was transferred to the warehouse of a Mr. Wall, in the city, where it has since remained and where the seizure was made. On the 12th of October last, on the complaint of Hoagland, a detective employed by the revenue department, and a witness for the government in this case, the tobacco was seized by order of Harris, collector of the first collection district of Ohio. It was brought within the jurisdiction of this court by the proper proceedings, and the question on which the jury are now to pass, is whether it is forfeited to the United States on the ground of fraud, as alleged in the information.

There are two distinct charges in the information, based on two different provisions of an internal revenue statute. Both provisions are embraced within section 9 of the act of July, 1866. The first, so far as it is necessary now to advert to it, provides, in substance, that all articles subject by law to tax, found in the possession or custody of any person, for the purpose of being removed, or sold, in fraud of the law, and with intent to evade the payment of the tax, shall be absolutely forfeited to the United States. It is also claimed by the district attorney, that the tobacco is forfeited also under the second charge in the information, based on the other provision of the act of 1866, which, in substance, is that all articles subject to tax, which shall be removed, deposited, or concealed, with intent to defraud the government of the tax, shall be forfeited. The information is so framed as to meet both provisions of the section of the law referred to.

And here it will be proper to notice a point of law presented and argued by the learned counsel for the claimant, namely, that the district attorney can not claim a forfeiture of the tobacco under both provisions of the statute on which the charges in the information are based. In other words, the claim is that the district attorney must be required to designate the particular provision on which he relies for a judgment of forfeiture, and can not rely on both. The information does not refer in terms to the section of the law on which a forfeiture is claimed. In the first count or charge, it recites, with nearly literal accuracy, that part of section 9 on which the claim of the government is based, and the counsel contends that the district attorney can not rely on the second provision of section 9 as a basis of forfeiture, but must be restricted to the first. While it may have been proper for the counsel for the claimant, at the inception of the trial, to have moved the court for an order requiring the district attorney to elect on which of the two provisions of the law he would insist as the ground of forfeiture, the court will not, at this stage of the proceeding, make such an order. I am quite clear, however, that it is the right of the government, under this information, to claim a forfeiture under either provision of section 9, if the fraud charged is within either or both.

It is also strenuously urged by the counsel for the claimant, that tobacco is not included in the designation of articles subject to forfeiture under the first provision of that section, and that therefore the eight hundred caddies in question can not be forfeited under the information in this case. The argument in support of this position has been able, but the court cannot concur with counsel in the views which have been urged. I can not entertain a doubt that the article of tobacco, by a fair construction of section 9, is included in its terms, as forfeitable for any fraud contemplated and punished by it. The language of that section is, and was intended to be as comprehensive and far reaching as language could make it. It clearly includes all goods, wares, and merchandise, and every article subject to taxation. And although there may be other sections of the law apparently in conflict with this construction, they can not set aside the explicit provisions of section 9 yet unrepealed and in full force. The jury will have observed that the ground on which the claim of the government for the forfeiture of this tobacco is based, is that it was infected by fraud on the part of the manufacturer, subjecting it to forfeiture wherever it might be found, and into whose possession it may have passed. It is claimed by the United States, that Gaines, the manufacturer of this tobacco, failed to make returns of the quantity manufactured by him, as required by law. The statute, in plain words, requires the manufacturer to return under oath, from time to time, the quantity made, and to pay the tax imposed on it. And a failure to comply with this requirement is a gross fraud, subjecting the tobacco to forfeiture.

It will be obvious to the jury that their first inquiry will be, whether Gaines, the manufacturer, was guilty of the frauds charged? I do not propose to detain the jury by any detail of the evidence on this question, but shall leave it exclusively for their consideration. It is proper to remind the jury, that the foundation of the government's claim to a forfeiture rests on the proof of Gaines' fraud. If the fraud by him is not sustained by the evidence, there is no ground for a verdict of forfeiture of the tobacco. The title of Atkins, the claimant, in the absence of such evidence, would be clear and indisputable.

It is an important question in this case, whether, if the fraud by Gaines is established, the property is subject to forfeiture in the possession of Atkins, an innocent purchaser, without knowledge of the fraud of the manufacturer. This is an important inquiry, the answer to which may be decisive of this case. I shall present the views of the court very briefly, and without detaining the jury by a labored exposition of the character or policy of revenue laws. It is clear, however, that under the existing statutes, the property rights and interests of individuals may suffer, while the person in possession may not be chargeable with any fraud, or have any knowledge of, or complicity in it. As an illustration of this principle, I may refer to section 9 of the statute, on which the charges in this information are based. The first charge alleges substantially that the tobacco in question was held by the person in whose possession it was found "in fraud of the law," or, in other words, it was sold illicitly, without the payment of the tax, with the intent to defraud the United States. Now, upon the hypothesis that Atkins, the claimant, who was the purchaser of the tobacco, was ignorant of the fraud perpetrated by Gaines, that does not relieve the tobacco from the taint of fraud, or protect it from forfeiture, if the fraud is proved. By the words of the statute, the tobacco was forfeited to the United States from the time of the commission of the fraud, and the lien or claim of the government attaches from that time, so perfectly and so effectually, that the person guilty of the frauds has no title which he can transfer to a purchaser, though he may have no knowledge of the fraud. The fraud, by operation of law, attaches to and inheres in the property, subject to taxation, wherever it may be found. This doctrine may seem to partake of harshness and severity; and, doubtless, in its operation it may work injury to persons innocent of any intentional wrong. Yet, in all efficient systems of internal revenue, there is a necessity for its adoption and enforcement. The power of taxation is a necessary appendage of every enlightened government; and it becomes a paramount duty resting upon those administering it, when necessary, to impose taxes for the purpose of sustaining the public credit, and enabling the government to perform its constituted obligations. And laws for raising revenue for these purposes must necessarily be stringent, or if not so, they will not be efficient. Tax impositions are not ordinarily looked upon with favor by those who are required to bear the burden. And the experience of our government, in reference to revenue laws, proves a sad laxity in the morals of the country on this subject. Men often ignore their legal and moral obligation to the government, and tax their ingenuity by resorting to all kinds of crafty devices to evade the payment of taxes imposed by law. Even those who, in other transactions, observe the obligation of honesty and fair dealing with their fellow-men, do not scruple to defraud the government. If the jury find this tobacco to be infected with fraud, I am constrained to instruct them that it is subject to forfeiture, even if Atkins, the claimant, was ignorant of, and had no participation in the fraud. Such must be the fair construction of the statute. The government has been defrauded of the legal tax on the tobacco, and it was held by the claimant "in fraud of the law."

It is, however, insisted by the district attorney, that Atkins can not be regarded in the light of an innocent purchaser of this tobacco, and that the circumstances brought to the notice of the jury, will justify them in the conclusion that he had at least an intimation of the frauds committed by Gaines. If the jury assent to this view—if they find that Atkins had just ground to presume the existence of the fraud—he would not have any, even an equitable claim to this tobacco, as an innocent purchaser; and the jury, without scruple or hesitation, would return a verdict for the United States.

It is not necessary to advert specially to the fraud charged by the government, in the use of false brands upon the caddies containing this tobacco. There is, perhaps, evidence sufficient to justify the jury in finding that false brands were used, and there can be no question that the use of such brands knowingly is a criminal act, and would constitute a ground of forfeiture. But it would seem probable that these brands were put on by McDonald, a revenue official, acting in collusion with Gaines. There is no claim, however, that Atkins had any agency in, or knowledge of, this criminal act, and he ought not to be held responsible for it. The criminality attaches to the corrupt and unfaithful officer, in putting on brands falsely indicating the payment of the just taxes, knowing they had not been paid. If the claim of the government to a forfeiture rested solely on this ground, it would not be sufficient to justify a verdict against the claimant. If the jury find for the United States, their verdict must be based on the charge of the original fraud by Gaines.

The jury will have noticed there is a good deal of conflict in the evidence in this case. The credibility due to the testimony of witnesses being exclusively for the jury, I have only to remark it will be their duty, if practicable, to reconcile the testimony consistently with the truthfulness of the witnesses, and if this can not be done, they are to decide to whom credit is due.

Case No. 15,037.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHTY-FIVE HOGSHEADS OF SUGAR.

[2 Paine, 54.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New York. Dec., 1830.[2]

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FALSE ENTRY—DRAWBACK ON EXPORTATION—REFINED SUGAR.

1. The 84th section of the act of congress of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 694], declaring a forfeiture for the entry in the office of the collector, by a false demonstration, of goods, wares or merchandise, for the benefit of the drawback or bounty on exportation, has not been repealed.

2. Sugars entitled to drawback on exportation must have been refined in the United States.

3. What are refined sugars within the meaning of the act of congress, and such as entitle the claimant to the drawback allowed by law upon sugars refined within the United States, and exported therefrom, must be gathered from the commercial sense in which the distinguishing qualities and properties of this commodity are known and understood.

4. The proviso to the act which declares that the forfeiture shall not be incurred if the false denomination happened by mistake or accident, is restricted to mistake of some matter-of-fact, and does not include mistakes as to the construction or application of the law.

5. If the entry was by design, the legal consequence is that it was done to defraud the revenue.

[Cited in U. S. v. 146,650 Clapboards, Case No. 15,935.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

Between the 24th December, 1829, and 2d January, 1830, entries were made at the custom-house, in New York, by the claimant, of a shipment of about 300 hogsheads and casks of sugar, for the benefit of drawback thereon, as allowed by law upon the exportation of sugar refined in the United States, and made out of foreign sugar. A part of these sugars had been laden on board of the brig Spartan, for Leghorn, and were, by order of the collector, seized and relanded, but all restored except the eighty-five hogsheads in question, which were libelled and tried before the district judge of the Southern district of New York, who denied the claimant's right to enter them for drawback, but decreed their restoration [case unreported], to which cross appeals were taken to the circuit court.

W. Q. Morton, for claimant.

J. A. Hamilton and W. M. Price, for the United States.

For the claimant it was argued as follows: That the phraseology of the various acts of congress, allowing "a drawback upon sugar refined in the United States and exported therefrom," referred to a condition of the commodity answering to the description of "refined sugar," anterior to its being made to assume the appearance of loaf, lump, or bastard sugars. That any of these three descriptions of sugar are produced from "refined sugar," which refined sugar, in the aggregate, constitutes what the law has in view for the allowance of drawback upon exportation; and no matter what subsequent appearance the refiner may cause any portion of that aggregate to assume, whether loaf, lump or bastard, so long as he can show it to retain those properties entitling it to come within the description of "a refined sugar," any and all of those products are without discrimination entitled to the drawback as "refined sugar." As fully sustaining these positions, the case of U. S. v. Pennington [Case No. 16,026], was cited. That bastard sugar is "refined sugar," in point of fact, was contended to have been established by the testimony of a majority of sugar refiners, examined in the present case, and corroborated by the commercial legislation of England, from the year 1765 to 1829. Together with the statutes, the following authorities were cited: Nodin's British Customs, p. 373; Pope, Cust. tits. 221, 225; Commercial Dig. 139. If, however, it should be determined that the sugars in question had been entered by a "false denomination," then, for the claimant, it was contended that he was "mistaken as to the denomination" by which they were entered. But that the evidence produced was sufficient to show that he honestly believed such "denomination" to be "true," and from this conviction, and not from any intention to defraud the revenue, the "mistaken entry" was made. That under the proviso to the 84th section of the act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 695], whenever evidence is offered, the question of "forfeiture" can only be a question of "fact" (turning as it does upon "fraudulent intentions") for the jury to answer to; if before a court in the place of a jury, must be decided by the court as a "question of fact." That the "court" might reserve the question, whether the commodity entered for drawback be of the description within the purview of the legislative acts of congress, as one of "law," wholly separated from "intention," and not involving "forfeiture." That the term "mistake," as contained in the law, of necessity covered as well mistake of law as of fact. That an act may properly be said "to happen by mistake," though done advisedly and with deliberation. U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 312; Riggs v. Taylor, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 483; Rex v. Smith, 2 Show. 153. That the proceedings on the part of libellants were void "ab initio;" because the subject of exporting sugar refined in the United States with benefit of drawback, was not within the purview of the 84th section of the act of March, 1799, the same having been impliedly repealed "quoad," sugars refined in the United States, by the acts of July 24, 1813 (chapter 549, §§ 8, 9) 4 Bior. & D. Laws, 565 [3 Stat. 35]; of April, 1816, §§ 6–8, c. 172 [3 Stat. 340]; by section 11, Act April 20, 1818, c. 365, 4 Bior. & D. Laws, 314 [3 Stat. 444]; and by the act of January 21, 1829, c. 11 [4 Stat. 331].

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in 7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 404.]

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The two questions presented to the court below, were (1) Whether the sugar in question was refined sugar within the meaning of the law? (2) If not, is the owner excused from the forfeiture under the proviso in the 84th section of the act of March 2, 1799? This sugar was entered at the custom-house for exportation as refined sugar, with the view of obtaining the drawback allowed by law in such case. Shortly after it was laden on shipboard, the collector caused the eighty-five hogsheads to be seized and libelled, as forfeited for having been entered under a false denomination. The 84th section of the act of March 2, 1799. 3 Bior. & D. Laws, 219 [1 Stat. 694], declares, that if any goods, wares, or merchandise, of which entry shall have been made in the office of a collector, for the benefit of drawback or bounty upon exportation, shall be entered by a false denomination, and all such goods, wares, or merchandise, or the value thereof, to be recovered of the owner or persons making such entry, shall be forfeited. The allegation in the libel, upon which the forfeiture is claimed, is: That the entry was made by a false denomination of the sugars, with intent thereby to defraud the revenue of the United States. The answer of the claimant denies that the sugars were entered by a false denomination, or with intent to defraud the revenue of the United States, but insists that they were refined sugars within the meaning of the act of congress. The libel does not purport to be founded upon any particular act of congress; but unless it can be sustained under the 84th section of the act of 1799, no law has been referred to, or pretended to exist, upon which it can be sustained. It has been contended on the argument here, that this section of the act, so far as relates to refined sugars, has been repealed. This question was not made in the district court, and I do not think it has been sustained in this court, by any references to the laws of congress. I do not deem it necessary to go into a very minute notice of the various changes of the legislation upon the subject of drawback upon refined sugar.

The first act, allowing a drawback upon sugar refined within the United States, was passed in the year 1794. 2 Bior. & D. Laws, 431, § 19 [1 Stat. 389]. This act was to continue for two years. But by the act of the 3d March, 1795 (2 Bior. & D. Laws, 496, § 20 [1 Stat. 438]), it was continued until the 1st of March, 1801. It was permitted to expire at that time; but the allowance of the drawback was again renewed in 1813 (4 Bior. &

D. Laws, 565, § 8 [3 Stat. 35]), under some different modifications, and continued from time to time by act 1816 (6 Bior. & D. Laws, 160 [3 Stat. 340]), by act of 1817 (6 Bior. & D. Laws, 249 [3 Stat. 401]), and made perpetual by act of 20th of April, 1818 (4 Bior. & D. Laws, § 11 [3 Stat. 444]); and by the act of 21st of January, 1829, the drawback is increased from four to five cents per pound. But in all these various changes and modifications, there is certainly no express repeal of the 84th section of the act of 1799, nor do I discern anything that can be considered an implied repeal, and the objection that there is no act of congress upon which the libel can be sustained, falls to the ground, and the case must rest upon the two questions made and decided in the district court.

1. Were the sugars entered under a false denomination, or, in other words, were they refined sugars within the meaning of the act of congress, and such as entitled the claimant to the drawback allowed by law upon sugars refined within the United States, and exported therefrom? The act of congress has not attempted in any manner to define the distinguishing qualities or properties of this commodity. It is spoken of as an article of merchandise, embraced within the trade and commerce of the country, and presumed to be known and understood by dealers in the article. All laws of this description are made for practical purposes, and are to be construed according to the commercial sense in which they were known and understood. It is not probable that the process of refining sugars entered at all into the consideration of congress; but they legislated upon the subject under a denomination known as an "article of commerce." This necessarily leads to the examination of witnesses, to ascertain whether the sugars in question are refined sugars in this commercial sense; and upon this point a great number of witnesses were examined in the district court, and their testimony has again been brought under the consideration of this court, on the argument here. I deem it unnecessary, however, to go into a critical examination of this evidence. There is, undoubtedly, some contrariety in the opinion of the witnesses; but I think the weight of evidence is decidedly in favor of the conclusion, that the sugars in question were not refined sugars in a commercial sense; and as this is the conclusion to which the district judge came, I am satisfied with adopting the view taken by him, of the evidence upon this branch of the case, by barely remarking, that in all the acts, from the year 1794 down to the present day, the same phraseology is used. The commodity entitled to drawback on exportation, is sugar refined in the United States. We must, therefore, construe the law as applying to an article as understood at that early day, which may in some measure account for the difference of opinion among the witnesses. It is fairly to be collected from the testimony that, as far back as the year '94, the sugars known in the market as loaf and lump, were those denominated "refined sugars," whether they remained in the loaf or were crushed. But, more recently, an opinion among many seems to have grown up, that every product of raw sugar that has gone through the process of refining, and which can be again converted into sugar, is to be considered as refined sugar; and hence they include, under this denomination, what are usually called "bastars," or "bastard sugars." These, in a certain sense, may be considered refined sugars. But in my judgment, it is very clear, that in a commercial sense, and within the meaning of the law, they cannot be considered refined sugar. The sugars in question were, therefore, entered under a false denomination, and thereby became forfeited, unless the case is brought within the proviso to this same 84th section, which declares that the forfeiture shall not be incurred, if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court, in which a prosecution for the forfeiture shall be had, that such false denomination happened by mistake or accident, and not from any intention to defraud the revenue.

2. The next inquiry, therefore, is, whether the respondent has made out a case, which under this proviso will save the forfeiture. The district court was of opinion that such a case had been made out, and the sugars were acquitted on this ground; as I have not been able to arrive at the same conclusion, it will be necessary that I should give this part of the case a more particular consideration. It is proper here to notice, that further, and as I think, material testimony, has been taken in this court; and the cause is now to be decided under a different aspect, in some respect, from that presented to the district court. The material facts on this part of the case are few and undisputed. The claimant does not pretend to deny but that the sugars in question are what are called "bastars" or "bastards"; and that he knew them to be such when he entered them for exportation; and his answer and claim asserts that they are refined sugars, entitled to the drawback, and were shipped as such, and without any intention to defraud the revenue. He does not set up in his answer that there was any mistake as to matter of fact, with respect to the quality of this sugar; but with full knowledge of what the sugars were, he assumes the broad ground that they were refined sugars within the meaning of the law. In this he was mistaken in the judgment of the district court, as well as of this court; and the effect of such mistake upon his rights is presented for consideration. A brief notice of the evidence, however, may be necessary in order rightly to judge of the character of the alleged mistake, and to determine how far the claimant is chargeable with an intention to defraud the revenue.

It appears from the evidence that the claimant was repeatedly informed by the surveyor of the port, and the deputy collector, before this shipment, and, also, by a direct correspondence with the comptroller of the treasury, that he would not be entitled to receive a drawback upon his brown bastars, or bastard sugars, specimens of which he had furnished the collector, and had also sent to the treasury department at Washington; and other specimens had been shown to him at the custom-house, greatly superior in quality to the sugars seized; and he was informed by the custom-house officers that he must conform to those specimens as standards in the exportation of sugars, as refined. The claimant had been exporting large quantities of this article, and disputes and difficulties had arisen between him and the custom-house officers in relation thereto. He was perfectly aware that the sugars he was shipping were of an inferior quality to the specimens which had been shown him at the custom-house, and that he was acting in opposition to the instructions there given, and he well knew that he would not be allowed the drawback if the quality of the sugar should be discovered. It is true that Mr. Phillips, one of the inspectors of the customs, superintended the packing and shipping of the sugars, and gave his permit for the shipment; but this was very properly considered by the district court as having very little influence upon the cause, either as matter of law or as matter of fact; as matter of law, it is only a precautionary measure, but it is no way conclusive. If such permit settled the question as to the quality of the goods, there would be no such thing as a seizure for an entry by a false denomination, when such entry agrees with the permit of the inspector; and as matter of evidence, it afforded no excuse or justification to the claimant; for the inspector, who superintended the packing and shipping of the sugar, was confessedly inexperienced in the article, and allowed it to pass as refined sugar only because he thought it corresponded with the specimens he had seen at the custom-house. But the claimant knew it did not, and he was not in the least influenced or governed by the opinion of the inspector as to the quality of the sugar; he acted with a full understanding that the drawback would not be paid if the quality of the sugar was discovered at the custom-house. The permit of the inspector was, therefore, not only no justification or excuse, but, under the circumstances, might warrant the suspicion that the claimant intended thereby to elude any further examination from the custom-house officers; and the course pursued by the claimant, when the sugars were sent on shipboard, clearly manifested an intention and determination to avoid a more close inspection of those sugars, knowing, from what had taken place, it must result in a denial of the drawback. When he found the inspectors on board the vessel, taking samples of the sugars, under the orders of the collector, he ordered them off. It is true, that after they left the vessel, he told them they might go back and take as many samples as they pleased, which they declined. This circumstance might not be entitled to so much weight, if nothing afterwards of a suspicious character had occurred, particularly as the inspectors returned the next day and proceeded in the examination. But at the close of the day, (being the 31st of December,) it was agreed between the claimant and inspectors, with the consent of the captain, that the vessel should be locked, and no more cargo taken on board until after 9 o'clock on the 2d of January. Before that hour, however, one of the inspectors went on board and found the vessel broken open, and they were taking on board more sugars claimed by Mr. Barlow, who was then present; and on the inspectors' complaining that he was acting in violation of their agreement, he said that they had gone illegally to work, and that he intended to make the collector and all of them sweat for it, (or words to that effect,) and that he should continue loading the vessel until he was stopped by proper authority. On this being reported to the collector, he ordered the seizure to be made.

It is also in proof that the inspectors had laid aside a hogshead of sugar, which they had rejected, as not equal to the specimens furnished them at the custom-house, and by which they were to be governed. Mr. Barlow was not present, but soon after came down, and the inspectors showed him the rejected hogshead. He said: "Very well; let it be." Some time after, on the same day, he said to the inspectors: "I sent that cask down on purpose to try you, to see whether you would pass it." It is fairly to be collected from the evidence, that the rejected cask was one that had been passed by Mr. Phillips.

These are the material and leading facts upon which the protection claimed by the respondent rests. In deciding upon this part of the case, it must be considered as settled that the sugars were entered by a false denomination, and that the forfeiture follows as matter of course, unless the claimant has made out, on his part, that such false denomination happened by mistake or accident, and not from any intention to defraud the revenue. The first inquiry that seems naturally to arise is, what is the nature and character of the mistake which will save the forfeiture? Is it restricted to some matter of fact, or does it include mistakes as to the application of the law to the subject, thus falsely denominated, the qualities of such sugars being fully known to the person making the entry? I cannot think that upon any sound construction the proviso can cover mistakes of the latter description. Such are purely mistakes of law, and it is a principle too well settled to admit of being drawn in question, that ignorance or mistake of law furnishes no excuse in any case, civil or criminal. No good reason is perceived why this maxim should not be applied to the present case as well as to any other. A doubt as to the construction of a law has never been understood as taking a case out of the application of this rule; and it appears to me that such a doctrine would lead to consequences extremely injurious. There are but few statutes that may not admit of some doubt as to their construction, and it surely cannot be maintained that all who act under a mistaken construction of such doubtful statutes, are irresponsible for their acts. The claimant was fully apprized of the construction given to this act at the custom-house, and knew that the drawback would not be allowed upon the sugars he was shipping if the quality was discovered. But he professed to believe, and probably did believe, that the construction at the custom-house was wrong. And he meant to maintain that bastards were refined sugars, and entitled to the drawback. And he now insists that he is not bound by the custom-house construction, but has a right to have that construction judicially settled. There can be no doubt but that his right, in this respect, stands upon the same footing with other rights protected by law. No man is bound to take the law from the opinion of his adversary. He may appeal to the judicial tribunals of the country to construe the law, and settle his right under it. But he must abide by the consequences if he happens to be mistaken in his view of the law. He cannot claim the right of setting the law at defiance until such judicial construction can be obtained. Such a doctrine is entirely inadmissible. He has a right to have the judgment of the court in the last resort, before he is concluded; but it would be a most extravagant pretension that the operation of the law must be suspended in the meantime. If he chooses to act upon his own construction, and in opposition to that of the custom-house officers and the treasury department, he has a right to litigate this question before the judicial tribunals; but, as in all these cases, he litigates at his peril. And, whether the stake is great or small, can make no difference in principle. It may, perhaps, in some measure, serve to show either his confidence in his own opinion, or his boldness in resisting that of the executive officers of government. A mistake is an error in judgment or opinion, a misconstruction, and may be applied to some matter of law as well as fact; and the intention of the legislature is to be discovered from the subject-matter to which it is applied, and its connection with other words. It is here coupled with the word "accident," "mistake or accident." And as the two words may not import exactly the same thing, there is no more reason to conclude that the former was intended to be applied to matters of law than the latter, which certainly can have no application except to some matter of fact; and both terms, as here used, are properly applied in the same sense. It is very clear that this false denomination did not happen by accident: there was no casualty or any unforeseen or unexpected occurrence which caused the entry by this denomination. It was done deliberately, and by design, and with full knowledge of all the parts and circumstances that attended the transaction. And if the term "mistake" does not include error of judgment as to matter of law, (as I think it does not,) I am unable to discover any ground upon which the false denomination can be said to have happened, by mistake or accident. And the only remaining question is, whether this was done with an intention to defraud the revenue, within the sense and meaning of the proviso; and it appears to me that it follows as matter of course, that if the entry was by design, and not by mistake or accident, the legal consequence is, that it was done to defraud the revenue.

The excuse is to be made out by showing that the false denomination happened by mistake or accident, and not from any intention to defraud the revenue. The evidence shows very clearly that he intended to obtain from the government the drawback, and if he was not entitled to it, he intended to obtain what he had no right to, to the injury of the revenue. The obtaining or withholding wrongfully from another that which is his right, either by deception or artifice, or without his knowledge and consent, is defrauding him of his right. It is possible that he had so firmly persuaded himself that his sugars were entitled to the drawback, that he may acquit himself of any moral turpitude. But the manner in which he attempted to get the sugars on board the vessel, and his declaration to the inspectors, that he sent down the rejected hogshead to try them, manifested a disposition to practice upon what he believed to be the ignorance of the inspectors, and a resort to artifice and deception to elude a full and fair examination of his sugars. A false denomination in the entry happening under such circumstances, surely could not have been considered by the legislature as entitled to favor. Mr. Barlow was not dealing in an article of which he was ignorant. He states in his answer, that he is a sugar refiner, and had been for many years past, and that he himself refined about one half of these sugars. He was not, therefore, in this matter, acting under the advice or representations of others; he was not himself deceived in any respect as to the article. But with full knowledge of the qualities of the sugar, and with full knowledge that he was acting in opposition to the opinion of the collector and comptroller, through whom he must obtain the drawback, and that some artifice must be resorted to in order to effect this, he enters these as refined sugars which, in the judgment of the district court and of this court, was a false denomination. Admitting that he himself honestly believed that his sugars were refined sugars within the meaning of the law, and that he was entitled to the drawback, still it amounts to no more than a mistake or error of judgment upon the law, and does not protect the sugars from forfeiture. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the case is not brought within the proviso of the 84th section of the act of March 2, 1799, and that the decree of the district court must be reversed, and a decree of condemnation entered.

UNITED STATES v. EIGHTY-TWO PACKAGES OF GLASS.

[37 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 322.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July, 1857.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURE OF GOODS—UNDERVALUATION.

[1. A forfeiture is incurred if the goods are invoiced at a sum different from their actual cost at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties; and it is immaterial whether the discovery of the fraud be made while the goods are passing inspection or afterwards.]

[2. The collector has authority to cause a re-examination and valuation of goods after an appraiser has passed the same, and such examination satisfies the legal prerequisites to a seizure of the goods for undervaluation.]

[3. It seems that, if a seizure is irregular, the government may nevertheless adopt the same, and proceed to condemnation, if the same was founded upon a good cause of forfeiture.]

[4. "Actual cost," as used in the statute, means the cost of the goods at the place of exportation, with the addition of all dutiable charges; and claimants cannot defend an undervaluation in the invoice by showing that the goods could be manufactured for the invoice price.]

This was a motion for a new trial. A libel of information was filed to forfeit the goods for undervaluation, under the 66th section of the act of March 2, 1799. The case was tried before a jury, who rendered a verdict condemning the goods. On the trial it appeared that the glass arrived at this port February, 1855, consigned to Schank & Downing, the claimants, by an association doing business near Nannur, in Belgium, called the "Floreffee Company." When it arrived, it was examined and appraised, and passed by the appraisers at the invoice valuation. But afterwards the appraisers sent to the claimants for a case of the glass, which was furnished and reappraised, informally, as the claimants alleged, and this action was commenced to forfeit it.

HELD BY THE COURT: That the forfeiture is incurred if the goods are not invoiced according to their actual cost at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties; and it is immaterial whether the discovery of the fraud be made while the goods are passing inspection, or afterwards. That it is not made to appear that the importation was made, or entry offered, by manufacturers on their own account, and the collector must accordingly regard it as made by purchasers, and deal with it as such. That the collector had authority to cause a re-examination and valuation of the goods for dutiable purposes, and, when so made, the examination satisfies the legal prerequisites to an arrest of the goods; and it seems that the government have a right to adopt a seizure, if founded upon a good cause of forfeiture, and proceed for the condemnation of the goods, whether the seizure was regular or not. That the irregularity of appraisement, if any occurred, would not, under that doctrine, annul the action for the forfeiture. That the evidence of reappraisal was admissible to show authority for instituting the action. That "actual cost" is the cost of the goods at the place whence exported, with all dutiable charges added, and the claimants could not defend an undervaluation on the invoice by proving that the goods could be manufactured for the price. That the ruling of the court on the trial was correct.

DISORDERLY HOUSE—NUISANCE—EVIDENCE.

Facts from which the jury may find the defendant guilty of keeping a disorderly house.

[Cited in brief in Com. v. Kidder, 107 Mass. 191. Cited in Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 245.]

Indictment [against John Elder] for keeping a disorderly house. Verdict, guilty. Motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. There was evidence tending to prove the following facts: That the defendant kept a public drinking house in this city, where he sold spirituous liquors to all persons who would buy them, and suffered and encouraged persons to buy and drink them in his house; that his house was frequented by idle, disorderly, suspicious, and drunken persons, sometimes quarreling and fighting, and making a great noise late at night, and even till after midnight; that he kept a public ninepin alley, at which game people were often playing very late at night; that he suffered persons resident in this city to sit and continue drinking spirituous liquors in his house, until they were intoxicated, and this was suffered as much on Sundays as on other days; that his house was small, and not calculated for the entertainment of travelers, or even of lodgers, there being only two rooms on a floor, and the family occupying the upper stories. There was no evidence of his having had a tavern license at the time stated in the indictment, and respecting which the witnesses testified; nor has any such license been produced, although called for by the court upon this motion for a new trial. A transferred license has been produced, which expired on the first Monday of November, and the time stated in the indictment is the 1st of December, 1834. The indictment is in the common form, charging that he kept a disorderly house, and for lucre and gain caused and procured evil-disposed persons to frequent and come together in his house, and permitted them at unlawful times to be and remain there drinking, tippling, cursing, swearing, and quarreling to the common nuisance, and in manifest destruction and corruption of youth and other people in their manners, conversation, morals, and estate, etc.

The question, then, is whether a house kept in the manner, and for the purpose which, from the evidence, the jury had a right to infer that this house was kept, is not substantially a nuisance, within the meaning of the indictment and of the law. We think it is. Neither the act of assembly of Maryland respecting ordinary licenses, nor the charter of the city of Washington, nor the by-laws of that corporation, as far as we are informed, authorizes the keeping of such a house, in such a manner as it seems to the court by the evidence given upon the trial, the defendant's house was kept. If the defendant had had the most favorable license which the law allows, it could not have justified him in suffering idle, disorderly, suspicious, and drunken persons to meet together in and frequent his house, nor to suffer inhabitants of this city, not being lodgers or boarders in his house, to remain there drinking and tippling, for his lucre and gain, at any time; and especially on Sundays. But if this was done without any license at all, as seems to have been the case, there can be no doubt that it is a common nuisance.

ARMY OFFICER — EXTRA SERVICES — DISBURSEMENTS.

An army officer, ordered to take charge of and superintend the works on certain fortifications, claimed credits for extra services under the army regulations for 1821, 2½ per centum of the amount disbursed by him. Held, on a suit by the government upon his account for alleged balances due, that the proviso of the 3d section of the act of congress of 1835, c. 30 (4 Stat. 771), did not apply to the case, and that he was entitled to such credits.

This was a suit brought by the plaintiffs for a balance due on an army officer's (the late Wm. A. Eliason) account.

The declaration contains the usual counts. The cause was tried on an agreed statement of facts.

The declaration is as follows: "District of Columbia, Washington County. To wit: William A. Eliason, late of Washington county, gentleman, was attached to answer unto the United States in a plea of trespass on the case, &c. And whereupon the said plaintiffs, by F. S. Key, their attorney, complain that whereas the said defendant, on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, at the county aforesaid, was indebted unto the said plaintiffs in the sum of nine thousand eight hundred and thirty dollars and thirty-two cents, current money, for sundry matters and articles properly chargeable in account, as by a particular account thereof herewith into court exhibited appears; and so being indebted, the said defendant, in consideration thereof, afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, undertook and faithfully promised to the said plaintiffs to pay the said plaintiffs the aforesaid sum of money when he should be thereto afterwards required." Then followed a count for the like sum laid out and expended at the request of the said defendant, and a count for a like sum found in arrears, and due to the said plaintiffs. "Yet, the said defendant, not regarding his said several promises and undertakings, so by him made in this behalf as aforesaid, but contriving, and fraudulently intending, craftily and subtilely to deceive and defraud the said plaintiffs in this respect, hath not yet paid the said several sums of money, or any part thereof, to the said plaintiffs (although so to do the defendant was requested by the said plaintiffs, to wit, on the same day and year aforesaid, and often afterwards, at the county aforesaid), but he to do this has hitherto refused, and still refuses. Whereupon the said plaintiffs say they are injured and have sustained damage to the value of twenty thousand dollars current money, and therefore the said United States bring suit, &c. John Doe, Richard Roe, Pledges. F. S. Key, Att'y for the United States for the District of Columbia."

The cause came on for trial at the March term, 1840, and the death of the defendant, William A. Eliason, was suggested, when Mary L. Eliason, administratrix, appeared.

The following agreed case was submitted for the opinion of the court: On the trial of the above cause the plaintiffs, to maintain the issue on their part joined, offered in evidence the transcript from the treasury department which states a balance of $2,600.75 due from the defendant to the United States. And the defendant then offered evidence to show that said intestate was a captain in the United States corps of engineers, and, as such, was ordered to take charge of and superintend the works on Fortress Calhoun, and took charge of, on, and continued the said work from, the 7th of November, 1834, to the 10th of September, 1838. And further offered in evidence the general regulations of the war department, as follows: Article 67, § 14: "When there is no agent for fortifications the superintending officer shall perform the duties of agent, and while performing such duties, the rules and regulations for the government of the agents shall be applicable to him; and as compensation for the performance of that extra duty, he will be allowed, for moneys expended by him in the construction of fortifications, at the rate of two dollars per diem, during the continuance of such disbursements, provided the whole amount of emoluments shall not exceed two-and-a-half per cent. on the amount expended." Army Regulations 1821, p. 167. And further, that the said intestate while thus employed disbursed $214,392.61. That he was also directed to take charge of and superintend the removal of a light-house into Fortress Calhoun, in which service he disbursed $1,143.13. And further, that he was charged with the disbursement of, and did disburse, the sum of $1,891.43 for incidental expenses of fortifications, beginning in the year 1830. And that he purchased for the use of the engineer department a set of instruments and case, and the department allowed him for the instruments, but refused to allow him for the case, amounting to $10. And further, that the pay and emoluments of the said intestate have been stopped by the government of the United States from the 31st day of December, 1838, to the 15th day of June 1839, amounting to $1,014.95. And the defendant claimed credits to the amount of $3,764.05. And further offered evidence that all the claims above stated, except that for pay and emoluments, had been submitted to and rejected by the auditing officers of the treasury department. And further produced and offered in evidence the statement of the state of the appropriations under which the disbursements were made, in which it states the total amount to be accounted for by Capt. Eliason since April 1, 1835, $214,392.61.

The plaintiffs offered in evidence the regulations of the war department of March 14, 1835, construing the proviso in the act of congress of March 3, 1835. And upon the foregoing statement it is submitted to the court to say whether the defendant's intestate was entitled by law to the allowance claimed by him for disbursements as above stated. If the court is of opinion that he is so entitled, then the judgment to be for defendant, if otherwise, for the plaintiff for the amount appearing due by the transcript.[2]

F. S. Key, for the United States.

Joseph H. Bradley, for defendant.

The following is the opinion of THE COURT:

Upon the full consideration of the case stated as aforesaid, THE COURT is of opinion that the proviso in the act of March 3, 1835 (chapter 30, § 3),[3] is only applicable to the disbursing of public money appropriated by law during the session of congress in which that act was passed, and it appearing to the satisfaction of the court that no part of the money as aforesaid disbursed by the defendant was appropriated at the said session of congress; the court is also of opinion that the said intestate was entitled to the allowances claimed by him for the disbursements as above stated, and do therefore order the judgment to be entered for the said defendant.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEBT — TAXATION — MANDAMUS—DEMAND—REFUSAL—LEVY —AUTHORIZED TAX.

1. The authority in a municipal corporation to incur an obligation carries with it, by necessary implication, the duty of providing by taxation for its payment.

2. Where a judgment has been obtained against a municipal corporation for overdue interest on its bonds, it is not necessary to prove an express demand for payment, and an express refusal thereof, as a condition precedent to the issuance of a writ of mandamus to compel payment.

3. This court cannot, by mandamus or otherwise, direct a municipal corporation to levy a tax larger than is authorized by law.

[2] The amount stated in the declaration was reduced to the amount stated in the transcript of the treasury department.

[3] Section 3, c. 30, of the act of March 3, 1835, repealed section 2, c. 92, of the act of 1834 [4 Stat. 698], making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year 1834, and contained a proviso that no officer should receive under this act a greater annual salary or compensation than was paid to such officer for the year 1832, and that in no case shall the compensation of any other officers than collectors, appraisers and surveyors, whether by salaries, fees or otherwise, exceed the sum of $1,500 each, per annum. Nor shall the union of any two or more of these offices in one person entitle him to receive more than that sum, &c.

The relators, who are the legal representatives of Peter and Robert Goelet, recovered in September, 1879, a judgment in this court against the city of Elizabeth for overdue interest on its municipal bonds, and execution thereon was returned nulla bona. [Case unreported.] A rule then issued from this court to defendant to show cause why writs of mandamus should not be granted, one directed to the city council, commanding a tax to be levied and collected for the amount due on the judgment, and the other to the board of assessment of taxes, commanding the assessment and collection of a tax for the same purpose. On the return of the rule.

E. T. Gerry and B. C. Chetwood, for relators.

B. Williamson, for respondent.

NIXON, District Judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

There is a class of cases in which it has been held that courts have power to grant the writ, without absolute proof of a demand and express refusal. In other words, the refusal may be inferred from the acts or omissions of the parties. Thus, in Maddox v. Graham, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 56, it was adjudged that, where a city council is required by law to collect a tax sufficient in amount, annually, to pay the interest upon bonds issued by the city in payment of the subscription of stock to a railroad company, and there is no specific legal remedy provided for nonperformance, mandamus may be obtained to compel them to discharge that duty at the instance of the holders of the bonds; and where it appeared that the proper authorities of the city did not intend to do the act required, a refusal in terms was not necessary to put them in fault. Tapp. Mand. 285, in discussing the right to issue a mandamus under such circumstances, says: "The refusal may not be express, but there should be enough, from the whole facts, to show to the court that, for some proper reason, compliance is withheld." The parties are estopped by the existence of the judgment from denying that the bonds were legally issued (Mayor, etc., v. Lord, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 409), and the doctrine is now well established that the authority in a municipal corporation to incur an obligation carries with it, by necessary implication, the duty of providing, by taxation for its payment. Ex parte Parsons [Case No. 10,774]; U. S. v. New Orleans, [98 U. S.] 381; Citizens' Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Topeka, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 655. Every one who purchases a municipal bond is supposed to be familiar with the legislation existing in regard to the mode of its payment. He cannot complain if the authority to tax is confined to a rate per cent. which, on a fair valuation of the taxable property, will not realize a sufficient sum to meet the maturing obligations of the city, because he is chargeable with notice of the limitation when he made his investment. In such a case, he must wait for his just dues until a growth of the municipality, or a change in the law, will render the tax assessment more productive. There is certainly no power in this court, by mandamus or otherwise, to direct a corporation to levy a tax larger than the law authorizes. But, in the present case, the officers of the city do not have the excuse that no authority is conferred upon them by the charter to provide the means for the payment of the interest upon the bonds. The fourteenth section not only grants the power to the city council, but imposes upon them the duty to raise by tax, in each year, money for the payment of the interest upon the city debt. We are satisfied that an alternative mandamus should issue to the city council, commanding them to raise the requisite amount of money for the payment of the judgment in favor of the relators, in the manner prescribed by the city charter, or to show cause before the court, on the fourth Tuesday of March next, why they do not order the same to be levied and collected. Ordered accordingly.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1823.

SLAVES — ASSAULT AND BATTERY — JURISDICTION OVER OFFENCE.

This court has no jurisdiction in assault and battery by a slave on a white man; and will order him to be taken before a justice of the peace to be dealt with according to law.

This was an indictment of [negro Ellick] a slave, for an assault and battery upon Henry Shortle, a white man. The jury found him guilty, and assessed the fine at $23.

THE COURT arrested the judgment, being of opinion that neither the court nor jury could assess a fine or inflict corporal punishment upon a slave, and that an adequate corporal punishment could only be inflicted by a justice of the peace. They therefore ordered the marshal to take the prisoner before N. S. Wise, a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law, and that the verdict and this order be certified to the said justice.

STATUTORY PENALTIES—HOW RECOVERABLE—CIVIL AND CRIMINAL ACTIONS.

[1. The penalty imposed by Rev. St. § 4570, upon the owner or master of a vessel, for failure to provide the medical stores and other articles therein mentioned, may be recovered by the United States by a civil action, when the same is brought in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts. This action may be in the form of an information in the nature of an action of debt, which is to be regarded as an action in tort.[1]

[2. A declaration to recover a statutory penalty must demand a precise sum, although the statute declares that the penalty shall be "not more than" a sum stated.]

An information in the nature of debt was filed by the attorney of the United States against the defendant [George F. Elliot] as owner and master of the American barquentine Annie E. Elliot, of Boston, to recover penalties for a breach of Rev. St. §§ 4569 and 4570, alleging, in the first count, that on the 3d day of May, 1874, said vessel was bound on a voyage from Boston "around the Cape of Good Hope," to wit, to Batavia, to Java, and that the defendant, as owner, neglected to provide the lime or lemon juice, as in said statute required, whereby an action had accrued to the United States to recover, by way of penalty, a sum of not more than five hundred dollars; and in the second count, that the defendant, as master, failed to serve out to the men lime or lemon juice on said voyage whereby the plaintiffs were entitled to recover a further sum of not more than one hundred dollars. The defendant demurred.

Frederick Dabney, for defendant.

The most appropriate remedy in this case is a criminal information or indictment. U. S. v. Abbot [Case No. 14,416]. An action or information of debt will not lie, because the penalty is not fixed, and cannot be ascertained by computation. College of Physicians v. Salmon, Ld. Raym. 680; U. S. v. Morin [Case No. 15,810]. This is the general rule in relation to that form of action. 1 Chit. Pl. 108–113; Peake, Ev. 272; Emery v. Fell, 2 Term R. 29; Bullard v. Bell [Case No. 2,121]; Gedney v. Inhabitants of Tewksbury, 3 Mass. 307; Bigelow v. Cambridge, etc., Corp. 7 Mass. 202; Stockwell v. U. S., 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 452; Chaffee v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 538.

Prentiss Cummings, Asst. U. S. Atty., for plaintiffs.

Rev. St. § 4610, appears to countenance either a civil or a criminal proceeding, some of the language being appropriate to the one mode, and some to the other. A civil action in the nature of debt is admissible. Theoretically, the sum must be fixed; but in practice any money demand may be recovered in debt. U. S. v. Colt [Case No. 14,839]; Hughes v. Insurance Co., 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 294; Dillingham v. Skein [Case No. 3,912a]; Ex parte Reed [Id. 11,634]. This was the law of Massachusetts until 1852, when the practice act substituted an action of tort for one of debt. Rev. St. c. 118, § 42; St. 1852, § 312; Stilson v. Tobey, 2 Mass. 521; Com. v. Stevens, 15 Mass. 195; Com. v. Connecticut River R. Co., 15 Gray, 447; Gen. St. c. 176, § 2; c. 155, §§ 20, 21. Perhaps the information should be called "tort," but the name is not important.

LOWELL, Circuit Judge. It is well settled that when pecuniary penalties are affixed by statute to an act or a neglect, and there is no imprisonment provided for, or other reason to suppose that a mere punishment is intended, and no special remedy is pointed out in the statute, a civil action (formerly always "debt") will lie for their recovery, although the penalties are for the sole use of the sovereign. Rolle, Abr. 598, pl. 18, 19; Jacob v. U. S. [Case No. 7,157]. When the practice of the courts of the United States first adopted that of the several states, penalties could be so recovered in Massachusetts. When the sovereign was interested in the penalty, it might be recovered, in England, by information in the nature of debt, which, in revenue cases, was brought in the exchequer, but in others in any of the king's courts. If an informer was interested, his rights were established by the decree. See Attorney General v. Hines, Parker, Exch. 182; U. S. v. Lyman [Case No. 15,647], per Story, J.; Rook's Case, Hardr. 20; Roe v. Roe, Id. 185; Rex v. Clark, 2 Cowp. 610; Butler v. Butler, 1 East, 338. In the vice admiralty court at Boston, in January, 1728, the advocate general exhibited an information in behalf of the king, the governor of the province, and John Jekyl, Esq., collector of the port of Boston, against Abishai Ffolgier, of Nantucket, master of the sloop Raven, for breach of the acts of trade, for that the said Ffolgier, on the 21st of December last, made report of his arrival from Nantucket with oil and whalebone, etc., but refused to give to said John Jekyl a manifest, and for certain other acts in connection with another vessel; and the decree was that the defendant pay one hundred pounds,—one third to his majesty, one-third to his excellency, the governor, and one-third to John Jekyl, the informer. Rex v. Ffolgier, 1 Vice-Adm. Records, Mass. 56. In 1831 a similar information was filed in the district court for this district against a master for not delivering his manifest, demanding a penalty of not exceeding $500. After hearing, Judge Davis awarded $5 and costs. Records, vol. 18, p. 27. There are other informations on file for pecuniary penalties. I assume, therefore, that where debt will lie, the United States may have an information, unless the recent practice act has changed the rule,—a point to be considered hereafter.

In looking over the recent admirable collection of the province laws of Massachusetts, edited by Messrs. Ames and Goodell, I have found a great many acts imposing pecuniary penalties and forfeitures. In many of them no remedy is specifically given. In many others it is enacted that they may be recovered by "bill, plaint, or information." These words were probably used to meet the English law that a qui tam action could not be by "bill," but must be by "original" or by information. In others there is added after these words, "or by the presentment of a grand jury." In February, 1794, a statute provided that all pecuniary fines and forfeitures made, or that may be made, recoverable by bill, plaint, or information, or by any of these modes of prosecution, or where no mode of recovery is prescribed, shall and may be sued for and recovered by action of debt; saving, however, all remedies specifically given by any statute. This means, I suppose, that when the statute gave a right to file an information, or to obtain a presentment, these additional remedies should be preserved. St. 1793, c. 43, § 4. In 1801 a statute gave an alternative remedy by indictment whenever the penalty was wholly or in part for the use of the commonwealth. St. 1800, c. 57, § 4. It has remained the law of this state since 1801 that the commonwealth may have a civil action or an indictment at its election, though the form of the action is now tort. Rev. St. c. 133, § 14, and c. 118, § 42; Gen. St. c. 176, § 2.

It is in my opinion, the law of this country that debt will lie, though the amount of the penalty is uncertain. See the able judgment of Washington, J., in U. S. v. Colt [Case No. 14,839], the reasoning of which was adopted and enforced by the supreme court, though not in a case upon a statute. Hughes v. Union Ins. Co., 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 294; Rockwell v. State, 11 Ohio, 130; U. S. v. Allen [Case No. 14,431]. In Dane's Abr. c. 148, art. 9, § 5, it is said that for the many penalties and forfeitures enacted by congress, of not less than so much, or more than so much, debt is generally the proper remedy. In 1795 an action of debt was sustained in Massachusetts for an uncertain penalty, and the court assessed the amount. Eddy v. Oliver, 5 Dane, Abr. c. 148, art. 11, § 3. In the case of Com. v. Stevens, 15 Mass. 195, a similar action was sustained. The statute is not cited, but it must have been St. 1809, c. 108, § 34, art. 21, which imposes a penalty of not less than five nor more than twenty dollars for each offence.

Most of the foregoing cases were cited in argument, and it was urged by the defendant that they came under statutes which expressly mentioned an action of debt. This is true, and is the ground of decision in U. S. v. Allen [supra]; but the other cases do not rest upon that basis alone, but seem to me to establish, as Mr. Justice Washington asserts, a general rule that debt will lie for a penalty imposed by statute, as well as for one reserved in a bond, and that the declaration may be for the largest, or for any definite, sum, under which the penalty is to be chancered or assessed as the case may be. Our practice is now assimilated, as nearly as may be, to that of the several states at the time of suit brought (Rev. St. § 914); and an action of tort will lie in the district of Massachusetts to recover a penalty, where no other remedy is expressly or impliedly given by congress.

There is nothing in the section on which this information is brought which indicates that the exclusive remedy is a criminal proceeding. The language is, "liable to a penalty." The word "conviction" is used in the section, but this is often applied to civil prosecutions, and the context shows that the master who has been so convicted is to recover the amount of the penalty and the costs incurred by him from the owner; which seems to point to a civil action. In the many statutes and cases which I have examined I find words of a quasi criminal character constantly applied to civil actions for penalties. It is probable that informations for penalties were originally criminal. And it was always held in England that "not guilty" was a good plea to an action of debt for a penalty. See St. 21 Jac. I. c. 4, § 4; Wortley v. Herpingham, Cro. Eliz. 766; Attorney General v. Hines, Parker, Exch. 182; Atcheson v. Everitt, 1 Cowp. 382; Rex v. Clark, Id. 610. This plea was said by Parsons, C. J., to be of doubtful propriety in Stilson v. Tobey, 2 Mass. 521, 522; but the statute of James expressly authorizes it, and it was used in the cases above cited from Parker, Croke, and Cowper, Dane's Abridgement, and Com. v. Stevens, 15 Mass. 195. A striking example of the application of language imparting a criminal proceeding to a civil action for penalties is found in Adams v. Woods, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336. It may be added that many parts of our Revised Statutes clearly show that a civil action is understood to be the usual form for recovering these penalties. Rev. St. §§ 732, 919, 942, 1041, 2124, 3087, 3213. Both parties agree that Rev. St. 4610, which purports to instruct us how the penalties and forfeitures of the title may be recovered, is so drawn that it is impossible to reconcile its language with either mode of proceeding exclusively. The rule that a civil action will lie is so general, and has been so long established, that I should hesitate to deny the remedy, unless upon a clear command against it; especially as it is in favor of the citizen. Mr. Justice Story has said that an indictment cannot be brought in such a case. Ex parte Marquand [Case No. 9,100]. Mr. Justice Clifford has pointed out that there are many cases in which the government may proceed in that mode. U. S. v. Abbot [Id. 14,416]. The case last above cited, in which I sat with the presiding justice of this circuit, does not decide that a civil action will not lie for the penalty therein mentioned. The reasoning leads to the opposite conclusion. The act (now Rev. St. § 3213) provided that all fines, penalties, and forfeitures might be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate form of proceeding, qui tam, or otherwise. The decision was that the last clause gave remedies in addition to an action, and, among others, an indictment; and, by a still stronger argument, the action which is mentioned must be sustainable. If those additional words had not been in the act, the civil remedy would have been exclusive. U. S. v. Tilden [Case No. 16,523].

We have seen that in Massachusetts the state has the election to proceed by action or by indictment. This election has been expressly given in several statutes of the United States, and may be fairly inferred from others. Judge Leavitt, expressing a clear opinion that an indictment might have been sustained for a pecuniary penalty under a certain statute in which no specific remedy was given, held that an action of debt would lie. U. S. v. Bougher [Case No. 14,627]. And at common law an indictment may be maintained for a misdemeanor, in addition to a specific penalty given by another part of the statute, and recoverable civilly. Rex v. Robinson, 2 Burrows, 799; Rex v. Harris, 4 Term R. 202; Shipman v. Henbest, Id. 109.

I therefore decide that, whether the penalties of Rev. St. § 4570, can be recovered by indictment or not, they may be sued for by the United States in a civil action. I do not think that the practice act (Rev. St. § 914) intends to deprive the United States of the right to file an information, instead of bringing an action, although informations for this precise cause of action are not now brought in Massachusetts. The provision of section 3213, that any proper form may be adopted, though by its context it is probably to be confined to penalties accruing under the internal revenue laws, expresses what I think is the intent of the legislature. The government must conform substantially to the practice of Massachusetts. That practice still admits civil information, though not for penalties, and if an informer sues qui tam, be should sue in tort; and I agree with the district attorney that the information, which is the king's action, should be treated as in the nature of an action of tort.

The declaration avers that an action has accrued for not more than certain sums. Mr. Justice Washington remarked in U. S. v. Colt [supra], that the declaration should demand a precise sum, and leave the court or jury to assess a lesser amount if they saw fit. This remark was more particularly applicable to an action of debt; but, even in tort, you demand a certain sum. Though you may fail to recover, in either action, all that you demand, still a demand of not more than $600 may be a demand of nothing, which is certainly not more than that sum. But this fault of pleading may be easily supplied by amendment. Demurrer overruled.

UNITED STATES v. ELLIOT.

[3 Mason, 156.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1823.

INDICTMENT—CONCLUSION—FALSE SWEARING.

1. If a statute offence is alleged in the indictment according to the words of the act, it is not vitiated by a conclusion, which calls the offence by a wrong name.

2. As if the offence be false swearing under the pension act of 1820, c. 51 [3 Story's Laws, 1778; 3 Stat. 569, c. 53], the indictment is not vitiated by the jurors' conclusion, "And so the jurors say, &c. &c. that the party did commit wilful and corrupt perjury."

Indictment [against Jedediah Elliot] for taking a false oath under the pension act of 1st of May, 1820, c. 51 [3 Story's Laws, 1778; 3 Stat. 569; c. 53]. Plea, not guilty. At the trial a verdict was found against the defendant.

Mr. Fessenden, for defendant, made two points of law on a motion in arrest of judgment: (1) That the act did not make the offence perjury in its technical sense, though it affixed to it the same punishment. (2) That the indictment having concluded in the usual form of indictments for perjury, "And so the jurors &c. do say, that the defendant did falsely, &c. commit wilful and corrupt perjury," the indictment was bad in substance if the offence was not perjury, and it was not helped by the previous particular description of facts in the indictment. He cited Plowd. 125; 3 Bac. Abr. "Indictment," H, 3; 2 Hale, P. C. 168, 169, 192; 1 Esp. 280.

Mr. Shepley, U. S. Dist. Atty. contended e contra on both points, and cited 2 Chit. Cr. Law, 291, (312); 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 156 (232).

STORY, Circuit Justice. The pension act of 1820, c. 51, § 2 [3 Story's Laws, 1778; 3 Stat. 569, c. 53], declares, that "any person, who shall swear or affirm falsely in the premises, and be thereof convicted, shall suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury." We incline to think, that the act does not make the offence a technical perjury, but only refers to it, for the purpose of affixing the same punishment. The other objection is more important. But we think that the conclusion does not vitiate the indictment, if the offence is in other respects fully and exactly described; for it is but an inference of law from the premises; and if the jury mistook the nature of the offence, but have truly stated all the facts constituting it, it is sufficient, and the conclusion, "and so the jurors say &c." may be rejected as surplusage. In the previous part of this indictment, the offence is fully and exactly stated in the very words of the statute; and the party has been found guilty. If guilty of the offence, it is wholly immaterial whether it be perjury in the sense of the common law or not.

The motion in arrest of judgment must be overruled.

Case No. 15,045.

UNITED STATES v. ELLIOTT.

[1 Hayw. & H. 232;[1] 3 West Law J. 183.]

Criminal Court, District of Columbia. December 13, 1845.

CRIMINAL LAW — PRESENTMENT — INDICTMENT — DISCHARGE.

1. That the presentment of crime or the reverse is equivalent to the action and judgment of a grand jury upon a bill of indictment.

2. The court will order the discharge of a prisoner where the presentment of the grand jury is equivalent to the finding of "Not found" or "Not a true bill" on an indictment for murder or manslaughter.

[This was a presentment against William R. Elliott, charged with shooting W. Z. Kendall. Heard on motion to discharge.]

Before CRAWFORD, Judge.[2]

On motion of Mr. P. R. Fendall the prisoner was brought into court, and was assisted by Mr. Jones in asking for his discharge on the presentment made by the grand jury. The district attorney resisted the motion.

THE COURT delivered the following opinion:

The grand jury of this county, charged at the present term to inquire into all offences against the peace and government of the United States, on the 10th instant, returned the following presentment: "The jurors of the United States for the county aforesaid do upon their oaths present Wm. R. Elliott for causing the death of W. Z. Kendall, by shooting him with a pistol in self-defence, when he was attacked by and was retreating from the said Kendall, on or about the 23d day of August, 1845." The defendant has been confined in jail of the county since the commission of the homicide, viz., from the 23d day of August last, and now, this 13th day of December, 1845, a motion is made by his counsel, P. R. Fendall and Walter Jones, for his discharge, on the ground that this presentment is equivalent to the finding of "Not found," "Not a true bill," on an indictment for murder or manslaughter.

A presentment is, strictly speaking, the notice take by a grand jury of any offence, from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them at the instance of the king, upon which the officer of the court must afterwards frame an indictment. 4 Bl. Comm. 301; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 163. The act of Maryland, passed November 3, 1722, c. 4, provides that from and after the publication hereof no attorney general, or clerk of the peace, or of indictments, shall exhibit any bill or bills of indictment to any grand jury against any person whatsoever, without an express order from the governor and council, or from the court where the prosecution is to be, or some one of the justices of the court, or unless the offender be bound over to such court, or that the grand jury find or make a presentment of the offence of their own knowledge, upon penalty of paying the party grieved all the damages and charges that shall be occasioned by such prosecution, any law, statute, usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding. Under this law, a practice has grown up to precede indictments by presentment. This I understand to be the uniform practice at this day, and it has been followed in this instance, the witnesses having been all summoned by the district attorney at the request of the defendant's counsel, so that the investigation might be made without delay by the grand jury, he having no further or otherwise interfered. The inquiry is, first, whether a presentment acquitting the accused is equivalent to a finding to the same effect on an indictment; and, second, if so, does this presentment amount to an acquittal at law, or have the grand jury on their responsibility, as a most important and the exclusive originators of judicial proceedings, presented such facts as show that in their judgment no offence, or an excusable one, has been committed by the accused.

1. The inquiry has been as full as it would have been on an indictment. This the court is bound to presume, or to suppose, which cannot be done by me, that the grand jury in assuming the high responsibility they have taken, have neglected their duty or misconducted themselves in its discharge. The practice here imposes this full investigation on them before they present; if they think a crime has been committed, they so present, and the indictment follows, and is found, I presume, without any examination of witnesses. I am therefore of the opinion that a presentment of crime, or the reverse, under the peculiar practice here, is and ought to be equivalent to the action and judgment of a grand jury upon a bill of indictment.

[2] On the 3d of November, 1845, Thomas Hartley Crawford, of Pennsylvania, late commissioner of Indian affairs, took his seat upon the criminal court bench in place of Judge Dunlop, appointed associate judge of the circuit court.

2. Do they present facts which in law amount to an acquittal? Homicide in law, excusable se defendendo, is: "If two men fight, and one of them dies, or if one attack another, and without fighting he flies, and retreating as far as he can until at length no means of escaping his assailant remain, and he then turn around and kill his assailant in order to avoid destruction, the homicide is excusable in self-defence." Fost. Crown Law, 277; Archb. Pl. & Ev. 391; 4 Bl. Comm. 183, 184; 1 Russ. Crimes, 543, 544. "No possible (or at least probable) means of escaping his assailant." The presentment is, "Wm. R. Elliott for causing the death of W. Z. Kendall by shooting him with a pistol in self defence when he was attacked by, and was retreating from the said Kendall," &c. That Wm. R. Elliott caused the death of W. Z. Kendall, by shooting him—the fact of the homicide is thus found; but they further say he shot him in self defence. This embodies the substance of the definition of a killing excusable. Self defence means to protect from an assault on his life, or to save himself from some great bodily harm, but the grand jury go on to say, "When he was attacked by, and was retreating from the said Kendall;" thereby, it seems to me, using almost the very terms of the law on the subject. If (and the grand jury so present) it was a case of self defence, after the accused was attacked, and while he was retreating from, or to avoid the deceased, it would be excusable homicide in the eye of the law. Suppose the grand jury had so found on a bill of indictment, no doubt is or can be entertained that the court would be bound on such judgment of the grand jury to discharge the defendant. The presentment is, under the practice, here equivalent. I know of no responsibility but that which I owe to God and my conscience for an upright discharge of duty. Here, however, there is none but what rests on the grand jury, who discharged their duty with conscientiousness and integrity I have neither doubt nor right to doubt. I am of opinion the accused is entitled, under the presentment made, to his discharge, and so accordingly order.

UNITED STATES v. ELLIS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 125.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1803.

PENALTY—STATUTE—INDICTMENT.

If a statute prescribes a particular mode of enforcing payment of a penalty, it must be pursued, and indictment will not lie.

Indictment for gaming. Verdict, guilty. Motion in arrest of judgment, that the act of assembly of Virginia, which gives the penalty, provides that it shall be recovered before a single magistrate in the same manner as small debts. It contains no prohibitory words, but says only, if any one shall play, he shall pay the penalty of twenty dollars—and does not say that the penalty may be recovered by indictment.

Mr. Mason, for the United States, cited the following authorities: Rev. Code, p. 112, §§ 24–26, which speaks of indictments for misdemeanors. Section 28. The court may order the clerk to issue summons, or other process. Section 37. Where the penalty does not exceed twenty dollars, it may be sued for by petition, as in the case of other small debts. Page 106, § 1. Grand jury in district court to present all misdemeanors. Section 2. The like in county courts. Page 107, § 5, the same as section 2. Section 6. Where the penalty in the district court does not exceed twenty dollars, the court may hear without indictment; so, in county courts where it does not exceed five dollars. By Rev. Code, pp. 183–185, § 13, the act is to be given in charge to the grand jury. Act 1797, c. 2, §§ 7, 8.

Mr. Swann, for defendant, cited the gaming act (Rev. Code, p. 185), which prescribes a specific mode of recovering the penalty, and contains no prohibitory clause. 2 Hale, P. C. 171; Stubbs, Crown Cir. Comp. 95; U. S. v. Simms (Sup. Ct. U. S., Feb. 1803) 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 252; 2 Burrows, 803.

[4 Sawy. 590.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. June 11, 1866.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS—BOND—SURETIES—NEW APPOINTMENT—PRIOR ACTS.

1. A bond given by a collector of customs for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, under the act of congress of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 705), if given after he assumes office, binds the sureties for the acts of the collector prior to its date.

2. The act of congress of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. 60), relating to the official bond of a collector of customs as a depository of the public moneys and fiscal agent of the United States, contemplates security against future responsibility and not for past transactions.

3. Where a statutory bond goes beyond the requirements of the statute, it is for the excess without obligatory force.

4. Where a collector of customs, appointed by the president during a recess of the senate, gave a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties as collector and also as a depositary of public moneys and fiscal agent of the United States, and afterward he was newly appointed to the same office by and with the advice and consent of the senate, held, that the sureties on the bond were not liable for acts of their principal, done after he accepted his new appointment.

These three actions were brought by the United States against the sureties on the official bond of Beverly C. Sanders, executed by him as collector of customs in the port of San Francisco. Sanders was appointed such collector by the president, on the 13th of November, 1852. The appointment was made to fill a vacancy occurring during a recess of the senate. On the 16th of January, 1853, during the ensuing session of the senate, Sanders was appointed by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, collector for four years from that date, and he accepted the appointment. On the 6th of December following his first appointment, he executed with Argenti and the defendants [Alfred J.] Ellis, [John] Parrott and [Samuel J.] Hensley, as sureties, the bond upon which these actions are brought—each of the sureties limiting his individual responsibility to the sum of $50,000. The pleadings were identical in each case. The questions for determination arose upon demurrer to the answers to the first and second counts of the amended complaint.

The first count averred that Sanders was collector from November 13, 1852, to January 16, 1853, inclusive, and assigned as breach of the bond the unlawful detention by him, and the conversion to his own use of public moneys received by him in his official capacity during this period. The second count differed from the first in averring that Sanders was collector of the customs from the 13th of November, 1852, to the 3d of March, 1853, inclusive; and in assigning as breaches of the bond the detention and conversion of public moneys received during that period. There were several special answers to both of these counts, upon which two questions were presented for determination: First, whether the bond in suit bound the sureties for the acts of the collector prior to its date; and second, whether it bound them for his acts after his acceptance of his new appointment, January 16, 1853.

J. P. Hoge, for the United States.

J. B. Crockett and Hall McAllister, for defendant.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. The bond upon which these actions are brought, appears to have been given by Sanders as his official bond for the faithful discharge of his duties as collector, pursuant to the act of March 2, 1799, and also as his bond for the performance of his duties as depositary of the public moneys and fiscal agent under the act of August 6, 1846, and it must be considered in this double aspect.

The act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 705), provides that every collector shall give a bond to the United States within three months after he enters upon the execution of his office and furnishes the form of the bond. The condition in the form applies as well to the past as the future acts of the collector; its language is: "If he has truly and faithfully executed and discharged, and shall continue truly and faithfully to execute and discharge all the duties of the said office according to law, then the above obligation to be void and of no effect; otherwise it shall abide in full force and virtue."

The act of June 4, 1844 (5 Stat. 661), requires the bond to be given before the collector shall be qualified to enter upon the performance of his duties. Of course, if given before the office is assumed, the condition embracing past acts would be unmeaning and useless. But if for any cause such bond should not be executed or approved until after the assumption of the office, or the sureties accepted should be found, upon further information, to be insufficient, the form prescribed by the act of 1799 might very well be adopted. We do not perceive any such repugnancy between that act and the act of 1844, that the former is necessarily superseded by the latter. We are of opinion that in some cases the provisions of the former act may properly be followed. So far, therefore, as the bond is for the faithful discharge of the duties of the collector, under the act of 1799, our judgment is that it binds the sureties for his acts from the 13th of November, 1852.

But as a bond of a depositary of the public moneys and fiscal agent of the United States under the act of August, 1846, so far as that act imposes new and additional duties on the collector, not covered by his ordinary official bond, the case is different. That act contemplates security against future responsibility, not for past transactions. In the absence from it of provisions otherwise directing, the bond exacted must be held to apply only to subsequent acts. So far as it is made retrospective it is void. Where a statutory bond goes beyond the requirements of the statute, it is for the excess without obligatory force.

But in either view, whether as the bond of the collector or as the bond of a depositary and fiscal agent, it does not bind the sureties for the acts of their principal, done after the period when he accepted his new appointment. The first appointment, during the recess of the senate, by the president, and the subsequent appointment by the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate, are distinct from each other, as much so as if given to different persons. The former could under no circumstances extend beyond the close of the ensuing session of the senate; the latter was for the period of four years from its date. The first appointment would have extended until and including the 3d of March, 1853, had not in the meantime the new appointment been made and accepted. The acceptance of the new appointment was a surrender and superseding of the first. U. S. v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 720.

The bond was given with reference to the first appointment, and its obligation was limited to acts done during the continuance of that appointment. The office of depositary and fiscal agent was attached to the office of collector; it depended upon that office, and ceased when that ceased.

We may here observe that it is difficult to perceive how the new appointment could have been accepted on the day of the appointee's confirmation by the senate, unless he was present at the time in Washington. January, 1853, embraces a period when telegraphic lines across the continent did not exist, and instantaneous communication with the capital was impossible. We make allusion to this matter because it may appear on the trial that there was no legal acceptance of the new appointment until weeks after the action of the senate.

By the acceptance averred in the answers, a legal acceptance must be understood. Whether to constitute such acceptance the execution of new bonds or other equally expressive act on the part of the appointee was essential, is a matter which, hereafter, may demand consideration.

As the special answers do not deny the alleged breach of the conditions of the bond, between the 13th of November and the 6th of December, 1852, the demurrers must be sustained, and the defendants required to amend their answers, or file new answers to the complaint.

Case No. 15,048.

UNITED STATES v. ELM.

[2 Cin. Law Bul. 307; 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 419.]

District Court, N. D. New York. Dec. 24, 1877.

CITIZENSHIP OF INDIANS—DISINTEGRATED TRIBES—RIGHT TO VOTE.

[Indians born in the United States, of a tribe which has ceased to maintain its tribal int@grity, and who are subject to taxation under the laws of the state in which they reside, are "subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States, within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution, and are therefore, under its terms, citizens of the United States, and of the state of their residence, and possess the right to vote in national elections.]

[This was an indictment against Abraham Elm, an Oneida Indian, for illegal voting. Heard on motion for a new trial.]

WALLACE, District Judge. The defendant, an Oneida Indian, who was born and had always resided within the town of Lenox, Madison county, voted for representative in congress at the election of 1876, claiming to be a citizen of the United States. He was indicted for illegal voting, tried, and convicted in this court. Sentence was suspended by the court in order that the questions presented on the trial, and which were then formally ruled against the defendant, might be deliberately considered and decided upon a motion for a new trial. That motion has been made, and the question is now presented whether or not the Oneida Indians are citizens of the United States, and, as such, entitled to vote.

If the defendant was a citizen of the United States, he was entitled to exercise the right of suffrage. The right to vote is conferred by the state, not by the United States, and it has been conferred in New York upon "every male citizen of the age of twenty-one years who shall have been a citizen for ten days and an inhabitant of this state one year next preceding an election, and for the last four months a resident of the county, and for the last twenty days a resident of the election district in which he may offer his vote." By the fourteenth amendment to the constitution it is declared that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside," and by force of this language every citizen of the United States is a citizen of the state wherein he resides. It is not enough to confer citizenship on the defendant that he was born in the United States. It must also appear that he was "subject to the jurisdiction thereof," within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment.

In a general sense every person born in the United States is within the jurisdiction thereof while he remains in the country. Aliens, while residing here, owe a local allegiance, and are equally bound with citizens to obey all general laws for the maintenance of peace and order which do not relate specially to our own citizens, and they are amenable to the ordinary tribunals of the country. But there are classes of residents who, though they may be born here, are not subject to the exercise of those prerogatives of sovereignty which a government has the right to enforce over its own citizens, and over them alone, and it is to these that the language of the amendment applies. Within this sense. those persons who, though born here, are born within the allegiance of a foreign sovereign, or of another government, are not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. The children of ambassadors, though in fact born here, are, in the theory of the law, born within the allegiance of the foreign power the parent represents.

Indians who maintain their tribal relations are the subjects of independent governments, and, as such, not in the jurisdiction of the United States, within the meaning of the amendment, because the Indian nations have always been regarded as distinct political communities, between which and our government certain international relations were to be maintained. These relations are established by treaties to the same extent as with foreign powers. They are treated as sovereign communities, possessing and exercising the right of free deliberation and action, but, in consideration of protection, owing a qualified subjection to the United States.

If defendant's tribe continued to maintain its tribal integrity, and he continued to recognize his tribal relations, his status as a citizen would not be affected by the fourteenth amendment; but such is not his case. His tribe has ceased to maintain its tribal integrity, and he has abandoned his tribal relations, as will hereafter appear; and because of these facts, and because Indians in this state are subject to taxation, he is a citizen, within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. This conclusion is sanctioned not only by the language of the fourteenth amendment, but is fortified by other legislation by congress concerning citizenship.

By Act Cong. 1866, c. 31 [14 Stat. 27], commonly known as the "Civil Rights Bill," all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are declared to be citizens of the United States. Native Indians in this state are taxed. By an act of the legislature passed in 1843, native Indians are authorized to purchase, take, hold, and convey real estate, and, when they become freeholders to the value of $100, "are subject to taxation and to the civil jurisdiction of courts of law and equity in the same manner and to the same extent as citizens." When by the civil rights bill Indians not taxed were excluded from the classes upon which citizenship was conferred, upon well-settled rules of construction those who were taxed were by implication included in the grant. In other words, those Indians who were taxed were not excepted from the class who were declared to be citizens.

Previous to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, it had been held by high authority that congress might naturalize Indians by special act (7 Op. Attys. Gen. 746); and, of course, if this could be done by special act, it could by a general law, and the act in question would confer citizenship on the defendant. No doubt can be entertained of the power of congress to declare what persons shall be recognized as citizens of the United States, and when, by the fourteenth amendment, such citizens were declared to be citizens of the several states in which they should reside, the whole subject of citizenship was transferred to the jurisdiction of congress, and the rights of the defendant could safely rest upon the act in question. It is not necessary, however, to decide that the Indians in this state became citizens by force of the civil rights bill. I prefer to regard that act as a contemporaneous construction of the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. The civil rights bill was passed by the same congress which adopted the resolution to submit the fourteenth amendment to the legislatures of the several states. Both the amendment and the civil rights bill dealt with the question of citizenship, and in the declaration defining the class of persons to whom it was extended language almost identical was used in each. While, primarily, these measures, originated for the protection of natives of African descent, who, by the decision in the case of Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 393, were held not to be citizens of the United States, within the meaning of the constitution, it is not to be doubted that they were intended to confer the rights of citizenship upon such others as, owing to the peculiar condition of our national development, were not citizens in legal contemplation, though by birth and by allegiance they were or might become entitled to recognition as such.

The phraseology employed is sufficiently broad to include Indians who have abandoned their tribes and become so far integrated with the general body of citizens that the states in which they reside have subjected them to the duties of citizens and enforced over them the prerogatives of sovereignty. Prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, many of the Indian tribes had become disintegrated, and the members had abandoned their tribal relations, and were distributed among and assimilated with the general body of citizens of the state in which they lived, conforming to the same usages, and their rights of person and property regulated by the same laws, which controlled the rest of the inhabitants of the state. They were natives by birth, and were not aliens in allegiance. Their status had been defined, sometimes, as that of alien residents; sometimes, as that of domestic subjects. In the case of Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 404, Chief Justice Taney said: "If an individual Indian should leave his tribe, and take up his abode among the white population, he would be entitled to all the rights and privileges which would belong to an emigrant from any other foreign people." Accepting this as a correct statement of the law, it would follow that such an Indian was not, and in the absence of special legislation could not become, a citizen. He could not be naturalized, because the naturalization laws only apply to persons born out of the United States. The remarks of Chief Justice Taney were applicable to that class of Indians who had left their tribes, and thus abandoned their tribal relations; but instances were extant, in the history of the Indians tribes, where the tribal organization had become defunct, and where the individual Indians had so far been recognized as citizens of the state that they had been authorized to acquire and hold real estate, and subjected to taxation and to the civil jurisdiction of the courts. It had never been authoritatively decided whether or not such Indians were citizens.

In 1822 the supreme court of this state decided, in Jackson v. Goodell, 20 Johns. 187, that the Indians resident in this state were citizens, but that decision was reversed by the court of errors. Since that decision, however, great changes have taken place in the social and political relations between the Indians and the body of citizens at large, as is well illustrated by the history of the Oneidas. By treaties between the United States and the Six Nations, the Menomonies, and Winnebagoes in 1831 and 1838 the Six Nations acquired extensive cessions of lands in Wisconsin near Green Bay; and about that time the main body of the Oneidas removed to these lands. Since then, the tribal government has ceased as to those who remained in this state. It is true those remaining here have continued to designate one of their number as chief, but his sole authority consists in representing them in the receipt of an annuity which he distributes among the survivors. The 20 families which constitute the remnant of the Oneidas reside in the vicinity of their original reservation. They do not constitute a community by themselves, but their dwellings are interspersed with the habitations of the whites. In religion, in customs, in language, in everything but the color of their skins, they are identified with the rest of the population. In 1843, by an act of the legislature of this state, they were authorized to hold their lands in severalty, according to a partition which had theretofore been made. Reference has already been made to the general law of this state, passed in 1843, subjecting them to taxation and to the jurisdiction of the courts in the same manner and to the same extent as other citizens. In view of the changes which have intervened in the social and political relations of the Indians of this state since the decision of Jackson v. Goodell, there is certainly fair reasons to assume that, irrespective of the fourteenth amendment, they would now be held to be citizens of the state. However that might be, those who, like the defendant, have no tribe, and are taxed, are, within the language of the fourteenth amendment, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, as that language should be interpreted in the light of the civil rights bill. They are natives, they owe no allegiance other than to the government of the United States, and they have been placed by the state upon an equality with its citizens respecting important rights denied to aliens. As the state and the United States can impose upon them all the duties and obligations of subjects, they are entitled to the corresponding rights which spring from relation. These are the rights which a government owes to its citizens.

For these reasons, my conclusion is the defendant was entitled to vote, and was improperly convicted. The motion for a new trial is granted.

Case No. 15,049.

UNITED STATES v. EL TELEGRAFO.

[Newb. 383.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. Dec., 1846.

PRIZE—RESIDENCE IN ENEMY COUNTRY—ENEMY FLAG—NEUTRAL OWNERSHIP—FURTHER PROOF—EXAMINATION IN PREPARATORIO.

1. A person residing in the enemy country long enough to acquire a domicil there, is subjected to all the disabilities of an enemy, so far as it relates to his property.

2. A vessel sailing under the flag of the enemy, is considered as enemy property, and is liable to confiscation jure belli.

3. Upon the breaking out of war between the United States and the republic of Mexico, the province or department of Yucatan, belonging to Mexico, having assumed a flag of her own, and having manifested a determination to remain neutral, a special order was issued by the president of the United States, exempting her citizens from the operation of the laws of war. Under such circumstances no citizen or resident of Yucatan, could with impunity violate her neutrality by assuming, for the purposes of trade, the flag of the enemy.

4. It is a principle of the law of prize, as recognized by the supreme court of the United States (The Nereide, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 388), that the two maxims of "free ships, free goods," and "enemy ships, enemy goods," are not necessarily connected. The primitive law, independently of international compact, rests on the simple principle, that war gives a right to capture the goods of an enemy, but gives no right to capture the goods of a friend. The neutral flag constitutes no protection to an enemy's property, and the belligerent flag communicates no hostile character to neutral property.

5. From the foregoing principle, it follows, that a distinction may be drawn between the vessel sailing under the flag of the enemy and her cargo belonging to a neutral; but if it appear that the neutral has by his residence in the enemy country, acquired a domicil there, his property will be considered as enemy property.

6. The court will refuse an application for further proof, where the claim and test affidavit of the claimant are utterly at variance with his answers to the standing interrogatories.

7. The greatest solemnity is attached to examinations in preparatorio. The standing interrogatories are of a searching character, and well calculated to elicit truth and detect fraud; and the reasons must be cogent indeed, that would induce the court to deviate from the established practice, and permit a claimant by further proof, to contradict his own declarations, made under the solemnity of an oath, touching a fact so important as domicil or national character.

In admiralty.

Mr. Durant, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Clarke & Stewart, for captors.

Mr. Soule, for claimant.

McCALEB, District Judge. The vessel containing the property which is now the subject of contest, was captured by the United States steamship Mississippi, under the command of Commodore Perry, on the 21st of October last, about thirty-five miles from the bar of the Tobasco river. She was taken as enemy property and as such condemned by a judgment of this court, as prize of war to the captors. A claim has been entered for the cargo by one Antonio Gual, who declares himself the owner of everything found on board, except a few articles of little value which were the property of the master. I will briefly advert to the evidence upon which the condemnation of the vessel was pronounced, and then proceed to inquire how far I am permitted to draw a distinction in favor of the cargo.

The deposition of the master in answer to the standing interrogatories, shows that the schooner "sailed under Mexican colors and had none other on board. He was appointed to the command of the vessel by John Graham, at Campeachy, on the 2d of October last; Graham was owner of the vessel when she was seized; the deponent knows this because Graham told him so; the said owner is an Englishman, and is a brother-in-law of Mr. McGregor, the American consul at Campeachy; he resides with his family in Campeachy, but deponent does not know how long he has resided there; nor does he know how long said owner has been in possession of the vessel, nor from whom he purchased her. He thinks the said owner came from England to Campeachy, and that he is an English subject." In answer to the thirty-second interrogatory, the deponent declares that "as to the property of the Telegrafo," she stands in the name of Alexandro Perez, who is a Mexican citizen, but really belongs to John Graham, who being an Englishman, cannot hold her in his own name. The deposition of Antonio Gual, the claimant of the cargo, shows that a commercial house in Campeachy, composed of John Graham and Jose Calome, is the owner of the Telegrafo, though she stands in the name of some other person whose name deponent cannot recollect. He knows that the persons here named were the owners, by documents which he has seen. The said owners were born, the former in England, and the latter in Campeachy. They now reside in Campeachy. Deponent never knew of them in any other place; they have been in possession of the vessel a long time; they purchased her from one Ramirez; the only sale he knows of, is that from Ramirez to Graham & Calome. He does not know what was the consideration of the sale, nor whether the same was paid, nor any security given. He thinks that said bill of sale transferred the vessel to an individual whose name is unknown to the deponent, but that Graham & Calome are, and were the true owners. He believes that the vessel, if restored, will belong to Graham & Calome, and none others. The certificate of John F. McGregor, styling himself United States consul at Campeachy, shows that "the Mexican schooner Telegrafo is owned by Don Alexandro Perez, a citizen of Campeachy." The papers of the schooner show her to be a vessel of the department of Yucatan, in the republic of Mexico.

I have not considered it necessary to determine whether the ownership of the vessel be in Graham & Calome, or in Perez, the Mexican citizen; for whether it be in the one or the other, the evidence shows enough to authorize a condemnation. If this question were important, I should undoubtedly feel myself bound by the register or bill of sale which fixes the ownership in Perez. But the residence of Graham & Calome, the latter being a citizen of Campeachy, places them in the situation of enemies. Whatever exemption from the laws of war might be pleaded in favor of Yucatan vessels, it is clear that the conduct of the owners has not been such as to authorize the court to draw any distinction between them and other citizens of Mexico residing in any other part of the republic. It has been proved before this court, that Yucatan had a flag of her own. Had this vessel been found sailing under it at the time of her capture, there would be some ground for supposing that the owners were adhering to that state of neutrality, which the executive department of the government was led to believe would be observed by Yucatan, and which was, on the breaking out of the war, declared in a circular of the secretary of the treasury, to be the ground of extending to the ports of that country, privileges which, by the laws of war, were necessarily forbidden to the other ports of the republic of Mexico. But the concurrent testimony of the master and crew shows that she sailed under Mexican colors, and had no other colors on board; thus openly claiming the protection of the flag of the enemy, and boldly setting at defiance the American squadron now blockading the ports of Mexico. The conduct of this vessel can be regarded in no other light, than as an open and flagrant violation of the very condition upon which our government extended the privileges to which I have alluded, to the ports of Yucatan; and may be regarded as among the many instances of bad faith on the part of citizens of that particular department, which prompted the executive department of our government to revoke the order contained in the circular of the secretary of the treasury, and to place her in the same attitude occupied by other portions of Mexico. The facts of the case thus presented, are not such as to authorize me to regard the vessel in any other light than as enemy property, and therefore liable to condemnation.

I will now consider the claim which has been asserted to the cargo. It is a well settled principle of the law of prize, as recognized by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of The Nereide, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 388, that the two maxims of free ships, free goods, and enemy ships, enemy goods, are not necessarily connected. "The primitive law," says Mr. Wheaton (International Law, 480), "independently of international compact, rests on the simple principle that war gives a right to capture the goods of an enemy, but gives no right to capture the goods of a friend. The neutral flag constitutes no protection to an enemy's property, and the belligerent flag communicates no hostile character to neutral property." Let us then inquire how far the national character of the claimant in this case, as established by the evidence, will authorize the court to consider the cargo as neutral property. In answer to the standing interrogatories, the claimant himself declares, that "he was born in Spain. For the last seven years he has lived in Campeachy. He now lives in Campeachy, and has lived there twenty years. He belongs to the Yucatan government, originally belonged to Spain. He is not married. His brother and nephews live in Campeachy." It is unnecessary to look beyond his own declaration, for evidence to establish his national character, or such a domicil in the enemy's country, as will authorize the court to invest him with a national character, different from that which attached to the place of his birth. The claimant, by his own showing, though born a Spaniard, has, by his long residence in the enemy's country, acquired a domicil, which, by the laws of war, and for all the purposes of this libel, subject him to all the disabilities of an enemy. By his own showing, he was, at the time of the shipment of the cargo, fully cognizant of the fraudulent design on the part of those whom he considered the real owners of the vessel, to conceal their ownership by a simulated sale to an individual whose name he did not recollect, but which is proven by the master to be Perez, a Mexican citizen. And whether the property of the vessel was really in Perez, or in Graham and Calome, he knew or was bound to know, that the birth place of one of the partners, and the acquired domicil of the other, invested both of them with the character of enemies, and consequently was fully aware when he sailed with his cargo on the Telegrafo, he was sailing in an enemy's vessel. We have, then, here presented a case of an enemy shipper, embarking with his property on board of an enemy vessel. "In general, and unless under special circumstances," says Mr. Wheaton (International Law, 390), "the character of ships depends on the material character of the owner as ascertained by his domicil; but if a vessel is navigating under the flag and pass of a foreign country, she is to be considered as bearing the national character of the country under whose flag she sails; she makes a part of its navigation, and is in every respect liable to be considered as a vessel of the country; for ships have a peculiar character impressed upon them by the special nature of their documents, and are always held to the character with which they are so invested, to the exclusion of any claims of interest which persons resident in neutral countries, may actually have in them. But where the cargo is laden on board in time of peace, and documented as foreign property in the same manner with the ship, with the view of avoiding alien duties, the sailing under the foreign flag and pass, is not held conclusive as to the cargo. A distinction is made between the ship, which is held bound by the character imposed upon it by the authority of the government, from which all the documents issue, and the goods, whose character has no such dependence upon the authority of the state. In time of war, a more strict principle may be necessary; but where the transaction takes place in peace, and without any expectation of war, the cargo is not to be involved in the condemnation of the vessel, which, under these circumstances, is considered as incorporated into the navigation of that country whose flag and pass she bears."

It is unnecessary to apply the principle sustained by this high authority, with the same strictness therein required, to justify a condemnation of this cargo. It is clearly shown to be the property of the enemy shipped in time of war on board of an enemy vessel, sailing under the enemy flag. I shall not stop to inquire whether there may not hereafter be a reason for the equitable interposition of the executive to be drawn from the fact, that at the date of the capture, the order contained in the circular from the treasury department, exempting the ports of Yucatan from the laws of war, remained unrevoked. For under the circumstances of this case, I consider it immaterial whether the order of the executive thus issued through the secretary of the treasury, was revoked or not, at the date of the capture; since, by the very terms of that order it is clear, that the strict neutrality on the part of Yucatan, which was the condition upon which it was granted, was disregarded alike by the owners of the vessel and the owner of the cargo. They have placed their property under the protection of the flag of the enemy, and sailed for an enemy port. The vessel and cargo are, in my judgment, so included in this transaction, that it is difficult to perceive upon what ground any distinction can be drawn. The order of the president cannot be construed into a sanction of the double dealing of which the parties in this case have been guilty. That order is recognized as the rule by which this court will be governed; but as its effect was to relax the stringent principles of the laws of war, it should be strictly construed and confined to the object it was intended to accomplish. In adopting so liberal and humane a policy towards Yucatan, it certainly was never the design of the president, that citizens and residents of that country, should be allowed to abandon the neutral and appropriate flag of their particular department, and assume that of the enemy; nor could it have been his design to restrain the prize courts of this country, from inquiring how far the acts of those citizens and residents conformed to that state of neutrality and friendship towards the United States, in which the circular of the secretary of the treasury, expresses the hope they will remain. The questions which naturally and necessarily arise, are neutrality or no neutrality, hostility or no hostility: and the court cannot determine such questions without a free and unrestricted inquiry into the facts developed by the evidence. In the peculiar position occupied by Yucatan, it was the duty of her citizens, and those residing within her jurisdiction, to observe extraordinary caution in their commercial intercourse with other nations; and yet we see them, as in the case before us, openly assuming the garb of enemies, for the purpose of gaining access to the ports of the enemy. The conduct of the owners of this vessel and her cargo, presents to the view of the court a discordia rerum totally irreconcilable with a friendly or neutral attitude. They cannot be permitted at one and the same time, to plead before the prize tribunals of this country, an exemption from the general operation of the laws of war, under an order from the executive of our government, and before the tribunals of Mexico, an exemption from the operation of the same laws, by showing that they sailed under the Mexican flag. The very motive which prompted them to assume that flag, was doubtless to avoid the difficulty and inconvenience which might result from the maintenance of a separate and independent national character.

But the proctors for this claimant have strenuously contended that he is not a resident of the enemy's country, and has never acquired a domicil there; but that, on the contrary, he is a subject of the queen of Spain, and a resident of Havana. In support of this position they adduce his own test affidavit, and his affidavit subsequently made, alleging that he was misunderstood by the prize commissioner when he gave his answers to the standing interrogatories. It is difficult to believe that such a total misapprehension could have existed on the part of both the prize commissioner and the sworn interpreter of the court, when it appears by the certificate of the former, "that the witness having declared that he could not speak the English language, and that the Spanish was his vernacular, the oath was administered, questions propounded, and answers received, and afterwards read over to him in the latter language, through Edward Lanne, a sworn interpreter." To the plain and simple questions, "Where were you born? where have you resided for the last seven years? where do you now live and how long have you lived there?" he has answered, "that he was born in Spain, for the last seven years has lived in Campeachy, and has lived there twenty years; he belongs to the Yucatan government—originally belonged to Spain." In his test affidavit and claim he alleges that he is a subject of the queen of Spain, a native of Catalonia, in Spain, and a resident of the city of Havana, in the island of Cuba, one of the colonies of Spain. In his claim he further alleges, that for the last seven years he has been a resident of Havana, and that only occasionally, and in the fair and honest prosecution of his commercial dealings and transactions, has he visited the ports of Yucatan, of Mexico and of the United States; in neither of which ports he ever fixed his residence, but preserved his residence in Havana, as aforesaid, from which he started on his commercial undertakings. Upon being informed by his proctors of the conflict between his answers to the standing interrogatories and the facts relating to his residence, as stated in his test affidavit and claim, he presented another affidavit, declaring, not that he misunderstood the questions propounded to him in the Spanish language by the interpreter, but that the interpreter must have misunderstood his answers. With every disposition to extend indulgence to a party whenever there is a fair ground for supposing that any misunderstanding or mistake may have arisen, I cannot reconcile such an indulgence with a faithful discharge of my duty in the present instance. It is extremely improbable that any such misunderstanding on the part of the claimant existed. There is no similarity in the sound of the names of Campeachy and Havana which will justify the belief that the interpreter could have mistaken the latter for the former. This fact, alone, would be sufficient to induce the court to reject the subsequent affidavits, without looking to other parts of his answers to the standing interrogatories, which state facts so totally at variance with those which it is now alleged were intended to be stated. And yet the learned proctors have, notwithstanding these glaring inconsistencies in the oaths of their client, urged upon the court the propriety of granting an order for further proof, to enable him to establish a residence in Havana. Whatever may be the strength of the conviction of the honesty of this claimant, which has animated the efforts of his proctors (whose sincerity I cannot for a moment question), I do not feel myself at liberty to take the same benevolent and charitable views of the motives by which he is actuated In the language of Mr. Justice Johnson, in the case of The Rapid, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 164: "It is the unenvied province of the court to be directed by the head and not the heart. In deciding upon principles that must define the rights and duties of the citizen, and direct the future decisions of justice, no latitude is left for the exercise of feeling." Temptations to fraud in cases of this nature are many and strong, but it is the duty of a court of prize to exact the utmost fairness on the part of both captors and claimants, and to frown upon every attempt at deception.

The fact that the claim is in opposition to the examination in preparatorio, would alone be a sufficient ground for the rejection of the claim. "The claim, too, of Mr. Tappan," says Mr. Justice Story, in the case of The Diana [Case No. 3,876], "was in total opposition to all the papers and preparatory examination. Now, I take the general rule to be, that no claim shall be admitted in opposition to the depositions and the ship's papers. It is not an inflexible rule, for it admits of exceptions; but, on examination, it will be found that those exceptions stand upon very particular grounds, in cases occurring in time of peace, or at the very commencement of war, and granted as a special indulgence. But in times of known war, to admit claims in opposition to all the preparatory evidence and papers, to enable parties to assume the enemy's garb for one purpose and throw it off for another, would be holding out an invitation to frauds, and subject the court to endless impositions. The rule can never be relaxed to such an extent without prostrating the whole law of prize." "On the whole, I am entirely satisfied that the claim of Mr. Tappan, standing, as it does, in direct opposition to all the papers and preparatory examinations, ought, even if he had been a neutral, to have been rejected in limine."

The greatest solemnity is generally attached to the examination in preparatorio. The standing interrogatories are searching in their character, and well calculated to elicit truth and detect fraud, and the reasons must be far more cogent than those here advanced, to induce me, in the present instance, to deviate from the beaten track and allow the claimant, by further proof, to contradict his own declarations made under the solemnity of an oath, touching a fact so important as domicil or national character. I shall, therefore, refuse the application for further proof, reject the claim of Antonio Gual, and condemn the cargo of the Telegrafo as prize of war to the captors. The register is hereby ordered to enter a formal decree of condemnation.

Case No. 15,050.

UNITED STATES v. EMERSON.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 188.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1831.

CONTEMPT—OBJECTIONABLE LANGUAGE—ASSAULT—IN PRESENCE OF COURT.

It is a contempt of court, punishable under the act of congress of the 2d of March, 1831 [4 Stat. 487], "declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court," to call another a liar openly in the presence of the court while in session, and in the hearing of the officers of the court; and an assault and battery committed in the hall of entrance into the court room, separated from it only by a door without panels, and covered with cloth, was either "in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice."

[Cited in U. S. v. Anon., 21 Fed. 770.]

[Cited in Holman v. State, 5 N. E. 558.]

The defendant [Hiram S. Emerson] was brought before the court by the marshal for contempt. He had been standing near the stove, in the court room, in conversation with a man named Childs, concerning a suit which some negroes had brought for their freedom against Emerson, when the latter said to him, in the hearing of the crier and bailiffs, "You are a liar," to which Childs replied, "You are a damned liar." The crier commanded silence. Emerson shook his finger in Childs' face, and said, "This place is your protection"; to which Childs said, "This is not a place for altercation. I am willing to see you anywhere." They then went into the central hall of entrance, separated from the court room only by a door without panels, but covered with cloth, so as to afford but a slight obstruction to the sound. In the hall the conversation was repeated, and Emerson struck Childs several times with a whip. Some of the officers of the court being present brought the parties immediately before the court, who, upon hearing the testimony, ordered both parties to give security to appear in court the next day to answer interrogatories touching the supposed contempt. On this day the parties appeared, and answered the interrogatories which had been filed by the attorney of the United States; and, the facts appearing thereby to be substantially as before stated,

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the language used by each to the other, in the presence of the court, was a contempt, and that the attack made by Emerson upon Childs, in the hall of entrance, while the court was sitting, was either "in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," within the meaning of the act of congress of the 2d of March, 1831 [4 Stat. 487], "declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court."

THE COURT therefore imposed a fine of five dollars upon each of the parties.

The grand jury having afterward found an indictment against Emerson for the assault and battery, and he having submitted to the court, was fined five dollars upon that indictment.

UNITED STATES v. EMERSON.

[6 McLean, 406.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1855.

EMBEZZLEMENT FROM MAIL—EVIDENCE—WITNESSES—CHARACTER.

1. On a charge for stealing letters out of the mail by a post master or other person, it is important to have as witnesses the post masters through whose offices the letters passed or were distributed.

2. When such witnesses are not called, although there may be proof of the mailing of the letters, and that they were never received, it is not sufficient for the conviction of any post master on the route.

3. If a witness swear positively as to the commission of the offence under improbable circumstances, whose character is bad, it will have little weight with the jury.

4. And this is especially so where the accused shows a good character. Under doubtful circumstances of guilt, good character will lead to an acquittal of the defendant.

[This was an indictment against John M. Emerson.]

The District Attorney, for the United States.

Morrison & Walpole, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment which charges the defendant with embezzling various letters, which contained articles of value, while acting as post master at Hamilton, in Steuben county, Indiana. E. B. Mott, a witness, states, that on or about the 1st of January, 1853, he mailed a letter at the office of defendant, directed to James Akright, New London, Huron County, O., which contained two certificates of deposit, dated the 3d of December, 1852, given by the Tompkins County Bank, New York, in favor of James A. Gibbons, assigned to Akright. The package was directed to the distributing office at Toledo. S. W. Spratt stated that three letters or packets were mailed about the same time, one of which contained two certificates of deposit, each for fifty dollars; the other two packets contained a deed and other papers, all of which by their direction were to pass through the Toledo post office. The first letter was mailed the same evening, &c. Mr. Brown, the post office agent, in a short time after the loss of the letters was suspected, examined the distributing post office at Toledo, and found that no such letters as described had passed through that office, at or near the time that they should have been distributed at that office. Dugan, a witness, was called by the prosecution, who swore that on the 1st of January, 1853, he called at the post office in Hamilton, about ten o'clock at night, knocked at the door, and no one answering, he went across the street on some business. In a short time he returned, and seeing a light in the window of the post office, he crossed over the fence and approached the window, where he saw the post master sitting near the window engaged in opening letters; and he saw him take money and other articles out of the letters thus opened, which he put in his pockets, and one or two of the letters, after the contents had been taken out, he laid upon the window, so that the witness could see the directions on the letters, and he says the directions were to the same persons as sworn to have been mailed on the 1st of January. One he specially observed was directed to James Akright. He observed that one of the letters opened contained a deed, or what appeared to be a deed, or a patent for land. After the defendant had completed his work, he stepped into an adjoining room, opened the door of a stove and threw the letters into it. Dugan, by a large number of respectable witnesses, was proved to have a bad character, and every one stated that he was not worthy of credit under oath. The defendant's character, was proved to be good. He was a physician of respectable standing in society, and he was evidently a man of intelligence. It was also proved that Dugan was once arrested for perjury, at the instance of the defendant, on which account he was hostile to the defendant, although that difficulty had been settled between them.

The court charged the jury that the evidence, without the statements of Dugan, did not authorize a conviction. That the letters were mailed at the office of the defendant at the time stated, there could be no reasonable doubt. The witnesses were highly respectable, and nothing has been stated to their discredit. But from the office of the defendant to the distributing office at Toledo, a distance of more than fifty miles, there are several post offices where the mail was opened, but none of the post masters have been called as witnesses. The examination of the Toledo office where the mail is distributed, is satisfactory to show that no such mail as should have been forwarded from the Hamilton office was distributed at Toledo. But if the letters were abstracted at Toledo, where they passed through the hands of the post master or his clerks, and if they were carried in the mail to that point, the latter have not been called as witnesses. Nor is there any evidence to show that the letters deposited in the Hamilton office have not been received. These defects in the evidence are fatal to the success of the prosecution, unless the jury shall believe the evidence of Dugan. The credibility of witnesses must be considered and judged of by the jury.

In the first place, this witness is discredited by his neighbors. Many of them have been examined, and they agree in saying Dugan's character is bad, and that they would not believe him under oath. There is no better test of the character of a witness than the opinion of his neighbors. Every man has a character where he is best known, —where his daily walk and conversation are observed and spoken of. Local prejudices or excitements may sometimes do injustice to an individual. But this is generally temporary. So that upon the whole, there is no criterion so safe, in determining as to the truth of a witness, as the opinion of his neighbors. The relation of the witness in regard to the acts of the defendant, which he observed through a window at a late hour of the night, cannot be said to have been impossible; but they were very extraordinary. They were of a character to create strong doubts of their truth, unless they proceeded from a credible person. It appears that the witness and the defendant had been at enmity. This not unfrequently affords a motive for revenge, where injuries supposed or real had been inflicted on the witness. Of these matters, gentlemen, you are to judge and determine. The defendant has proved a good character. He is a professional man, and stood well with his neighbors. He has left the neighborhood, but he seems to have left few enemies behind him. Indeed, from the evidence, no witness speaks to his prejudice, except the witness, Dugan. Character, gentlemen, under all circumstances, is the best earthly inheritance. It is a shield to the innocent when unjustly accused. And in this case you will give weight to it, in connection with the other facts of the case.

Verdict "Not guilty."

UNITED STATES v. EMERY.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 270.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1832.

HIGHWAYS—RECORDING LOCATION.

The road from Georgetown, D. C., to the Little Falls bridge, is not a public highway, because the location thereof was not recorded among the records of the territory of Columbia.

This was an indictment for obstructing the highway between Georgetown, District of Columbia, and the Little Falls bridge, by blasting rocks, etc.

C. Cox, for defendant, contended that, as the location of the road had never been "recorded among the records of the territory of Columbia," as required by the Maryland act of 1795, c. 44, § 2, it was not a public highway, and therefore the indictment could not be sustained.

And so THE COURT instructed the jury (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent).

Case No. 15,053.

UNITED STATES v. ENRIGHT.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 239.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1857.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—INCHOATE TITLE—JUDICIAL POSSESSION.

An inchoate title, followed by juridical possession, presents an equity which the United States are bound to respect.

This claim was confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

P. Della Torre, U. S. Atty.

J. B. Crockett, for appellee.

BY THE COURT. The documentary evidence of title exhibited by the claimant in this case is as follows: A petition to the governor dated December 20, 1844; a marginal decree or order for information by the governor, and a favorable report by the secretary, Manuel Jimeno. On receiving this report, the governor makes the following decree: "January 6, 1845. Granted as asked for and reported by the Most Reverend Father Minister. Micheltorena." The claimant has also produced a record of judicial possession, which seems to have been formally given him by the constitutional judge of first instance of the pueblo of San José Guadalupe on the 18th of February, 1846.

It is objected that these documents are insufficient to vest any title, either legal or equitable, in the claimant. It must be admitted that the concession in this case is not the final documento or title which, by the eighth article of the regulations, the governor was authorized to issue when the definitive concession was made.

In Arguello v. U. S., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 543, the supreme court, after alluding to the "informes" usually required, says: "By the fourth section, the governor being thus informed may 'accede or not' to the petition. This was done in two ways: sometimes he expressed his consent by merely writing the word 'concedo' at the bottom of the expediente; at other times it was expressed with more formality, as in the present case. * * * It is intended merely to show that the governor has 'acceded' to the request of the applicant, and as an order for a patent or definitive title in due form to be drawn out for execution. It is not itself such a document as is required by the eighth section, which directs that the definitive grant asked for being made, a document signed by the governor shall be given to serve as a title to the parties interested." But this concession, although not the final title which issued under the eighth article, is nevertheless a grant. The words of the grant are positive and plain; and though shorter and more informal than the usual decree of concession, commencing with the words "vista la peticion," it is in all respects as effectual to constitute an inchoate or imperfect title.

It has always been held by this court, that according to the provisions of the regulations the formal or definitive title contemplated by the eighth article could not issue until after the concession of the governor had been approved by the departmental assembly; and that though the practice of issuing that document in advance of such approval, and in terms "subject to it," obtained to a considerable extent, yet such a document, where no approval had been obtained, constituted merely an inceptive or equitable title. Whether this latter view be correct or not, no doubt can be entertained that the first decree of concession, whether made in the more formal manner usually observed or, as in the present case, by the short declaration that the land was "granted as asked for," afforded the basis for the departmental assembly, whose approbation was necessary to perfect or give "definitive validity" to the title. When therefore it appears that this inceptive title has been delivered to the party shortly after its date, and has been regarded by the judicial officer as furnishing the requisite authority to enable him to put the grantee in possession, it should be treated as vesting in the grantee the inchoate or equitable title, which when followed by occupation and cultivation ought to be respected. There is no reason to suppose that when the governor, after having obtained the requisite information, had acceded to the petition, made a decree of concession, and ordered the patent to issue, he would have declined to sign the title in form. So far as his action was concerned he was functus officio, except the merely formal act of signing the final "documento;" and it may well be doubted whether, if this concession had been approved by the assembly, he would have been at liberty to withhold from the party the formal evidence of title which the eighth article directs him to issue in such cases. It is not explained why the governor did not in this case pursue the more usual practice of issuing the final title "subject to the approval of the assembly." He may, perhaps, in strict conformity with the regulations, have withheld it until the approval was obtained, or he may, according to the loose and informal practice of the country, have considered that for so small a piece of land the grant indorsed upon the petition was sufficient to secure the rights of the applicant. The concession was at all events delivered to the grantee; for we find it in his hands very soon after its date, and by virtue of it the possession was formally delivered to him.

The next inquiry is, did the grantee fulfill the conditions usually annexed to the formal title, and in consideration of which it issued? On this point there is some conflict of evidence. After referring to the testimony, the board in their opinion say: "From a careful examination of all the proofs in the case, we think the preponderance of proof is in favor of the claimant, and must be regarded as establishing the fact of the cultivation of the place by Garcia from a period anterior to the grant to the time of sale to Enright" (the present claimant). We see no reason to dissent from this conclusion.

The remaining question relates to the location and extent of the land. The petition describes it as "2,000" varas of farming land; a note in the margin of the petition by Pacheco states that the petition for the farming land is for 8,000 varas. Under this description juridical possession was given of a piece of land 2,000 varas square. There might, perhaps, be some room to doubt whether the land described in the petition was 2,000 varas square or 2,000 square varas; but the note of Pacheco, the construction given to the concession by the alcalde, as well as the natural interpretation of the words when properly used, satisfy us that the intention was to grant a piece of land 2,000 varas square, or bounded by a line 8,000 varas long, taking the four sides together, as stated by Pacheco.

On the whole, we are of opinion that the grantee acquired by the concession an inceptive or inchoate title, which when followed by cultivation and juridical possession constitute an equity the United States are bound to respect. The decree of the board must be affirmed.

District Court, N. D. California. Sept. 13, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — IDENTIFICATION OF BOUNDARIES—ERROR IN DECREE OF CONFIRMATION.

[1. In view of the well-known looseness and inaccuracy with which business was transacted in California under the Mexican government, the fact that a decree of concession made by a Mexican governor referred to a certain tree as a live oak, when in fact the only tree reasonably answering the other calls of the description was a white oak, is not sufficient ground for overthrowing a survey based upon such white oak; especially when there is other evidence identifying it as the one referred to in the act of possession.]

[2. In a decree of confirmation an apparent error, arising out of the obscurity of the act of possession, and which consists in assuming that the line taken as the base of the survey runs towards the property of a person mentioned, and may interfere therewith, should not be allowed to control a clear and definite call for that line, as of a given course and direction.]

[Objections by the United States to the official survey of a certain grant situated in Santa Clara county, and now claimed by

James Enwright. The decree of the board affirming the grant was affirmed in Case No. 15,053.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. The official survey in this case has been returned into court under the provisions of the act of 1860. The objections are filed on the part of the United States. By the final decree of confirmation, the land is described as follows: "The land, of which confirmation is made, is situated in the county of Santa Clara, and now occupied by said James Enwright; the said land being in a square of two thousand varas, on each side, and lying adjoining lands known as the 'Mission Lands of the Mission of Santa Clara,' and having, for the side of said premises next to said mission, a line drawn from the first live oak before the place known as 'San Pedro y San Pablo,' and running thence to the south-southeast 2,000 varas, unless the same shall sooner strike the limits of the land known, in 1846, as 'Mariano Castro's land,' and terminating the same at said Castro's limits, if the said line should strike said limits with less than 2,000 varas. The land hereby confirmed being the square having the line above mentioned for the side of the same on the part towards said mission." This description is founded on the record of judicial possession produced in the cause, and to which the decree of the board refers for greater certainty. That record, after stating that a cordel fifty Castillian varas in length was measured, proceeds as follows: "The measurement was commenced by drawing a line of twenty cordels from the first encino (live oak) in front of the place known as 'San Pedro y San Pablo' towards the south-southeast; which tree remained as a dividing boundary to form the square of the extension of the land; and afterwards there were measured 8,000 varas, drawing the first measured line as far as the limits of Mariano Castro's land." The official survey has been made by drawing a line in a direction nearly south-southeast from a tree, adopted as that referred to in the record of possession, to the distance of 2,000 varas, and, on this line, as a base, erecting the square confirmed to the claimant.

It is objected, on the part of the United States: (1) That on applying the description of the grant and the decree to the land and natural objects found upon it, it is so uncertain and incapable of definite application as to make it impracticable to survey any lands whatever. (2) That the tree adopted in the official survey as the point of beginning is not the one intended by the decree. (3) That the survey does not locate the land as described in the decree.

It is unnecessary to consider the first point separately. The examination of the other objections will necessarily involve the question whether or not the description in the act of possession, and in the decree of the lands granted and confirmed to Garcia, is so uncertain, and incapable of application to any ascertainable tract, as to compel us to deprive the claimant of any land whatever.

2. It appears that the tree adopted as the initial point of the survey is a "roble," and not an "encino," as mentioned in the act of possession. The difference between the "roble," or white oak, and the "encino," or live oak, is, undoubtedly, marked and unmistakable. But any one acquainted with the looseness and inaccuracy with which the former inhabitants of this country conducted almost all their business, even official, will have little difficulty in supposing that the act of possession might have mentioned one tree, when the other was, in fact, meant. The record was not drawn up on the ground, and possibly not until some days after the possession was given. The clerk or secretary might easily have forgotten whether the tree from which the measurement was made was a white oak or a live oak. Nor would, in those days, great accuracy on such a point be required, for the measurement was made in the presence of witnesses, and the tree marked as a visible monument. There are in the neighborhood several "encinos," which would satisfy the call of the record. But most of these appear to be in, and to form a part of, the grove known as "San Pedro and San Pablo," whereas the tree mentioned in the record is described as the first tree in front of ("antes") the place called "San Pedro y San Pablo." The encino of the survey is a lone tree of large size and considerable antiquity, standing out in the plain at the distance of about a mile from the grove referred to. But the question is entirely set at rest by the testimony of Salvio Pacheco, if his evidence can be relied on. He positively identifies the "roble" at which the survey begins as the tree mentioned in the record. It is testified by Mr. Beale, United States surveyor general, that Pacheco accompanied him, when viewing the land, to point out the boundaries. That, when at some distance, Pacheco pointed to the oak in question, stating his belief that it was the tree at which the measurement was begun, and that, if so, there was a small arroyo or sanjou at its foot, and that its trunk had marks upon it. On arriving at the tree, it was found to be on the banks of a small "sanjou," and marks, evidently made by an axe, and of considerable antiquity, were found upon it, as described by Pacheco. Mr. Beale adds that he has long known Pacheco, by reputation, as a very honest and worthy man, and that he believes no native Californian has a higher reputation for integrity. Pacheco himself testifies that the tree pointed out by him on this occasion was the identical tree adopted and marked by his brother, Dolores Pacheco, when giving possession. The latter and the other assisting witnesses are dead. Salvio Pacheco himself is seventy years of age. No witness identifies any other tree as that claimed by Garcia, or recognized as his boundary; nor is any other found bearing ancient marks, which might have been made at the time of the judicial possession. The objection rests entirely on the fact that the tree in question is a white, and not a live, oak. I think it clear that this slight discrepancy is not sufficient to counterbalance the other proofs which identify this tree of the survey with that referred to in the act of possession.

It may be added that the claimant submitted to the board several diagrams of the lands, including more or less of the adjacent country. In all of these the tract was laid down precisely as it has since been surveyed, and in all the oak tree of the survey is represented as the point of beginning. When, therefore, the board, in its description of the land confirmed, mentioned an oak tree as the starting point of the first line, none other than the tree represented on all the maps filed in the case could have been intended, for no other had, up to that time, been by any one referred to. So far, then, as the location adopted by the board can be considered as final and res adjudicata, it is evident that the tree in question must be taken to have been, by the final decree in the case, adopted as the initial point of the eastern boundary of the lands confirmed.

3. The next objection is that the lands are not located in accordance with the decree of confirmation. The record of judicial measurement states, as we have seen, that a line twenty cordels or 1,000 varas in length was run from the oak tree in a south-southeast direction, in order to form the square to be assigned to Garcia. It then states, in substance, that 8,000 varas of land were measured, drawing the first-measured line to the limits of Castro's land. But the land of Castro lies to the west of the point of beginning. A line drawn southeast from that point would never reach it. The board seems not to have been informed as to the situation of Castro's land, for the decree directs the first line to be run in a south-southeast direction 2,000 varas, unless the boundary of Castro be sooner reached. This discrepancy or obscurity in the language of the act of possession has not been explained. It would seem most probable that the line between the tract to be measured and the mission lands of Santa Clara was first established. In that case the record correctly describes it as running south-southeast. It is possible that, having established this line, which was measured, as the record states, to the distance of only 1,000 varas, the officer proceeded to measure a line at right angles to it, and running towards Castro's land; and, in his record of proceedings, he has called this latter his first measured line, regarding the 1,000 vara line as run merely for the purpose of establishing a base. But, whatever be the explanation, there is evidently a discrepancy in the description. Either the first line did not run south-southeast, or it did not run in the direction of Castro's land. As before observed, no question as to the location of the tract seems to have been raised before the board. All the maps—and there are three produced in evidence—represent a tract 2,000 long and 2,000 wide, located as it has since been surveyed. To this tract all the evidence of occupation and cultivation referred, and the board, being of opinion that the proofs established a sufficient cultivation and improvement, confirmed it to the claimant. There can be no doubt as to what land the board intended to confirm. The proof before them, the language of their opinion, and the terms of the decree are conclusive. The decree declares that the line drawn from the oak tree south-southeast is to be "the side of said premises next to the mission;" "the land hereby confirmed being the square having the line above mentioned for the side of the same on the part towards said mission." In their opinion, after stating that the act of possession established the starting point, and the direction of the line first run, with great distinctness, the board say: "This testimony establishes the location of the land as it was evidently intended to be on the southwest side of the line thus run, embracing the land occupied at the time of the judicial survey by the grantee, and located so as to adjoin the mission lands, and also the lands of Mariano Castro." We have thus unmistakably indicated the direction and length of a line which is to form the base of a square to be erected upon it, and this line is to be on the side of the tract next the mission, and the square is to be formed to the southwest of it.

The survey is in precise accordance with this description. The only call in the decree which it fails to satisfy is that which contemplates that the line drawn to the south-southeast shall run in the direction of the lands of Castro. But this, as we have seen, is impossible. The board were evidently under the impression that the line described in the decree would run towards Castro's land; and such would be the natural inference from the obscure language of the act of possession. But this error cannot control the clear and definite call for a line of a given course and distance, and the distinct location of the square on the southwest of this line as a base.

It is to be observed, in addition, that the decree does not direct the line to be run to the land of Castro. Its terms are, "running thence" (i. e. from the oak) "to the south-southeast 2,000 varas, unless the same shall sooner strike the limits of the land known, in 1846, as 'Mariano Castro's land,' and terminating the same at said Castro's limits, if the said line should strike said limits with less than 2,000 varas." The line of the survey is in literal accordance with this description. It runs from the point named, in the prescribed direction, to the distance mentioned, and it does not strike the limits of the land known, in 1846, as that of Mariano Castro. The fact that it could not do so, no matter how far produced, proves that the board was under an erroneous impression in that particular; but it cannot, on that account, be said that the calls of the decree have not been observed. There is, therefore, no foundation for the objection that "the survey does not locate the land as it is described in the decree of confirmation."

But, inasmuch as the decree was evidently founded on the act of possession, and refers to that document for further description, it might still be open to inquire whether the land described in the decree of confirmation is, in fact, that whereof possession was given. On recurring to the act of possession, we find, as before observed, that its language is obscure. A possible explanation of the seeming discrepancy has been suggested. It would seem that, however inaccurate may have been the notions of the alcalde and his assistants as to the courses by compass of the lines run by him, they could not have failed to know that the mission lands lay to the east, and Castro's land to the west, of the tract they were to measure. When, therefore, the record describes the first line as drawn to south-southeast, it is almost impossible that they should have intended it to run to Castro's land, which lay to the west and northwest. So gross a blunder can hardly be supposed. The testimony of Pacheco, the only surviving assisting witness, confirms. He identifies positively the line first run.

Some stress is laid in the brief filed on the part of the United States on the fact that Pacheco, in his deposition, says the first line was run "more or less south or southwest,—we called it southerly." The next line, he says, was run "northeast or northwest. We knew nothing about the points of the compass, except north, south, east, and west." The witness here exhibits the confusion of ideas as to courses by compass, so commonly found among his countrymen. But, though unable to describe them, no doubt can be entertained as to what lines he referred to. He has pointed them out to the surveyor on the ground as those actually run by the judicial officer; and in his deposition, though confused and erroneous as to points of compass, he states one fact about which he could not have been mistaken, and which shows that the line from the oak tree must have been run as described in the act of possession. He states that it was run "from the roble towards Santa Clara," i. e. about southeast. He also says that the lands of Mariano Castro lay to the northwest of the roble. They are, in fact, situated to the north and west of that tree. It is plain, therefore, that it could not have been intended by the alcalde that the first line should run towards the lands of Castro. The lines pointed out by Pacheco to the surveyor general are those of the official survey. They, in all respects, conform to those delineated on the maps presented by the claimant to the board, and they correspond with the description of the land confirmed contained in the decree.

The evidence of occupation and cultivation, on which the board confirmed the inchoate title, presented by the claimant, referred to the lands embraced within these lines. They are situated in the bajio, or low grounds, as mentioned in the act of possession; whereas, if located as suggested on the part of the United States, they would include but a small portion of the bajio, and would, to a considerable extent, be located in the grove called "San Pedro y San Pablo." The only circumstance which tends, in any degree, to throw doubts on the question of location is the description in the second deed from Garcia to the claimant. In this deed the lines are described as commencing at "San Pedro and San Pablo," and not at a tree in front of that place, and running "thence southwest 2,000 varas, thence northwest 2,000 varas, thence northeast 2,000 varas, thence to the point of beginning." Assuming that, by the words "San Pedro y San Pablo," the tree in front of that place was intended, it is evident that the tract described is to the northwest of the tract surveyed. I am unable to account for this description, except by supposing a clerical error in stating the course of one of the lines. The tract called for in the deed in no respect conforms to that described in the act of possession, except that the first line is run towards Mariano Castro's limits, and the square is formed by running lines perpendicular to it, towards the northwest. At least a third of the land included within these lines is embraced within the official survey of Mariano Castro's land, contrary to the express provision of the act of possession and of the decree, and contrary to the evident understanding of every witness who has spoken of the location and limits of the tract claimed by Garcia. Not only the terms of the act of possession, but the positive testimony of the only surviving witness to that proceeding, show that the tract was not located as described in the deed; and we are without the slightest evidence to justify us in assigning to the claimant, even if he desired it, the tract embraced within the arbitrary lines mentioned in his conveyance. All the right and title of Garcia to the land had previously been acquired by Enwright under a deed which described it, in general terms, as the piece of farming land, 2,000 varas square, granted on the 6th January, 1845, whereof judicial possession was given on the 18th February, 1846, etc. A subsequent conveyance, made one year after the first, contains the erroneous description which has been noticed.

It is plain that no claim for the land described in the second deed was presented to the board. The petition describes the land as it has since been surveyed, and the plat annexed to it, and the other maps produced in evidence delineate the same tract. It would seem, therefore, that the misdescription must be the result of a clerical error. But, whether it be so or not, the fact that Garcia has, either intentionally or by mistake, conveyed a tract different from that granted him, and whereof he received judicial possession, affords no reason why the court should change its location as established by the act of possession; more especially when that location has been fixed by the decree of the board, which has become final by the consent of the United States.

For these reasons, I think that the official survey should be approved.

William D. Shipman and Henry L. Burnett, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a suit brought by the United States against the Erie Railway Company, to recover taxes alleged to be due to the plaintiffs on certain interest coupons paid by the defendant on bonds issued by the defendant, which payments were made in the years 1866, 1867, 1868 and 1869, and also to recover certain penalties alleged to be due to the plaintiffs for the failure of the defendant to make returns of the amount of said taxes. The suit is founded on section 122 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 284), as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 138). Such section, as so amended, reads as follows, the parts of the section as amended which are not found in the original section being put in parentheses, and the parts of the original section which are not found in the amended section being put in italics: "Any railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slack-water company, indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of indebtedness have been issued, payable in one or more years after date, upon which interest is stipulated to be paid, or coupons representing the interest, or any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip or money, due or payable to its stockholders (including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens), as part of the earnings, profits, income or gains of such company, and all profits of such company carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction, shall be subject to and pay a duty (tax) of five per centum on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever (and wherever) the same shall be payable (and to whatsoever party or person the same may be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens); and said companies are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments on account of any interest, or coupons, and dividends, due and payable as aforesaid, the duty (tax) of five per centum; and the payment of the amount of said duty (tax) so deducted from the interest, or coupons, or dividends, and certified by the president or treasurer of said company, shall discharge said company from that amount of the dividend, or interest, or coupon on the bonds or other evidences of their indebtedness so held by any person or party whatever, except where said companies may have contracted otherwise. And a list or return shall be made and rendered to the assessor or assistant assessor, in duplicate, and one of said lists or returns shall be transmitted and the duty paid to the commissioner of internal revenue within thirty days after the time when (on or before the tenth day of the month following that in which) said interest, coupons or dividends become due and payable, and as often as every six months; and said list or return shall contain a true and faithful account of the amount of the duty (tax), and there shall be annexed thereto a declaration of the president or treasurer of the company, under oath or affirmation, in form and manner as may be prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful account of said duty (tax). And for any default in making or rendering such list or return, with the declaration annexed, or of the payment of the duty (tax) as aforesaid, the company making such default shall forfeit, as a penalty, the sum of one thousand dollars; and, in case of any default in making or rendering said list or return, or of the payment of the duty (tax) or any part thereof, as aforesaid, the assessment and collection of the duty (tax) and penalty shall be made according to the provisions of law in other cases of neglect or refusal: (Provided, that whenever any of the companies mentioned in this section shall be unable to pay the interest on their indebtedness, and shall in fact fail to pay such interest, in such cases the tax levied by this section shall not be paid to the United States until said company resume the payment of interest on their indebtedness)."

Prior to September 1, 1866, the defendant had issued and sold, as hereinafter stated, sterling coupon bonds, dated September 1, 1865, the principal of which was payable ten years after date, and the principal and interest of which were, by the terms of said bonds and coupons, payable in London, England, at the office of J. S. Morgan & Co., bankers, of said London, to the amount of £800,000 sterling. After the 1st of March, 1868, and before the 1st of September, 1868, the defendant issued and sold of the same class of bonds, £200,000 sterling, the principal and interest of which were payable at the same place as the principal and interest of the £800,000 above stated. The rate of interest on all of said bonds was six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, on the first days of March and September of each year. Said bonds, with the coupons thereto attached, were all sold directly to foreign bankers, who had their banking houses and principal places of business in said London, and were resold by them to their customers in Europe. During all of the years 1866, 1867, 1868 and 1869, all of said bonds and coupons were held and owned by non-resident aliens and not by citizens of the United States, except bonds to the amount of £20,000, and the coupons thereto belonging, which latter bonds, and no more, were held and owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States residing in Europe. The amount of the interest, as the same fell due, on all of the said bonds, was provided for and sent forward by the defendant, in one sum, to said J. S. Morgan & Co., before the dates at which the same fell due, and it was paid at the respective dates at which it fell due, by said J. S. Morgan & Co., at their banking house in London, to the holders of the said bonds and coupons. The total amount of interest so paid, from and including September 1, 1866, to and including September 1, 1869, was £186,000 sterling, the amount of the tax on which, at the rate of five per cent., would be £9,300 sterling. Included therein is the amount of interest paid on the £20,000 sterling of bonds held and owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, and the amount of tax thereon, such interest being £4,200 sterling, and such tax being £210 sterling. The defendant made no returns to the assessor, or to any other officer of the internal revenue of the United States, of the payment of the said interest, or of any part thereof, nor did the defendant pay any tax to the United States on said interest or any part thereof, nor did the defendant withhold said tax or any part thereof from the amount of said interest, but the defendant paid the full amount of said interest to the holders of said bonds. No assessment was ever made on the defendant for any portion of said tax, nor was any demand ever made on the defendant for the payment of the same to the United States, until December 31, 1872. The defendant has not paid to the plaintiffs any penalty for failure to make return of the payment of said interest.

The foregoing facts are agreed upon by the parties, in writing, and the case has been tried by the court, without a jury. The main question in the case is, whether the defendant is liable to pay to the United States the five per cent. tax, being £9,090 sterling, on the £181,800 sterling of interest which it paid to non-resident aliens.

Under the decisions of the supreme court in U. S. v. Railroad Co., 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 322, and Stockdale v. Insurance Cos., 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 323, it must be regarded as settled, in the construction of the statute in question, that, when interest is payable by a corporation to any bondholder who, for any special reason, is exempt from the tax on such interest, then the corporation is not liable to pay such tax. The tax is held to be a tax on the bondholder, in effect and in substance, the corporation being the agent of the government for collecting and paying over the tax. It is really a tax on the income of the bondholder, and is a part of the income tax provided for by sections 116 to 123 of the act of 1864 and the amendments thereto. In U. S. v. Railroad Co., above cited, it was held that the tax imposed by the statute in question could not be collected by the United States from a railroad corporation, in respect of interest payable by it on bonds issued by it and owned by the city of Baltimore, on the ground that that city, being a municipal corporation, and a portion of the sovereign power of the state of Maryland, was not subject to taxation by congress upon its municipal revenues. The tax was not regarded as a tax on the corporation, as such, or on its revenues, but was held to be a tax on the creditors of the corporation, and the corporation was held not to be liable to the tax unless the creditor was liable. The same case also determines, that, although the language of the statute in question may be broad enough to include, in terms, a tax on interest payable to a party or person not subject to taxation by congress, yet it will not be construed as applicable to such a party or person. This view is affirmed in Stockdale v. Insurance Cos., above cited.

Are the non-resident alien holders of the bonds in question in this case, subject to taxation in respect of the interest payable and paid on their bonds? In Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 262, it was held, under the act of 1864, before the amendment of 1866, that congress did not intend to impose the five per cent. tax, as an income tax, on non-resident aliens; and that the scheme of the statute, in authorizing the company to deduct from the interest payable the amount of the tax thereon, was merely a mode of collecting that part of the income tax. But it is apparent that congress, in the amendment of 1866, intended to have the tax extend to interest payable to non-resident aliens. In doing so, it has undertaken to lay a tax, and an income tax, on non-resident aliens, in respect of such interest. Can it lawfully do so?

In the case of State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 300, the state of Pennsylvania had passed an act requiring every company incorporated by Pennsylvania, doing business therein, which pays interest to its bondholders, to retain from said bondholders, before paying such interest, a tax of five per centum on every dollar of interest so paid, and to pay the same to the state treasurer for the use of the state. The state court sustained the validity of the tax. The supreme court held, that bonds of corporations, owned by non-residents of the state, were not property anywhere but in the hands of their owners; that they were thus beyond the jurisdiction of the taxing power of the state; and that the law which required the corporation to retain five per cent. of the interest due to the non-resident bondholders was not a legitimate exercise of the taxing power, because it was a tax on property beyond the jurisdiction of the state. The tax laid in that case was quite as much a tax on the corporation, or on moneys in the hands of the corporation, as is the tax now under consideration. But the supreme court looked through the form to the substance, and held that the tax was not a tax on the corporation, or on the property of the corporation, or on property within the jurisdiction of the state, or on the money in the hands of the corporation, but was a tax on the debt, which was not property of the debtor, but was property in the hands of the bondholders. The congress of the United States can have no greater power to tax persons or property not within the jurisdiction of the United States, than a state has to tax persons and property not within its jurisdiction. By the tax in question, it has taxed either the non-resident alien or his property out of the jurisdiction of the United States. Probably, the view which led to the amendment of 1866 was, that the tax was a tax on the corporation, or on the earnings, profits, income or gains of the corporation, or on money in the hands of the corporation, belonging to it. The form of the enactment is, that the company shall be subject to and pay the tax on the amount of the interest it has contracted to pay, when such interest shall be payable, and, of course, before such interest shall be paid. But, as the tax in this case is really a tax on the property and income of non-resident aliens, when such property is not within the jurisdiction of the United States, and is thus a tax on the non-resident aliens themselves, it is a tax which cannot be upheld.

In arriving at this conclusion, I dissent from the reasoning and decision of the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts, held by Judge Clark, in the case of Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Slack [Case No. 9,527a]. In that case, the court, while holding that taxation cannot extend beyond the jurisdiction of the taxing power, and that the objects of taxation must be within the territorial limits of the taxing power, arrived at the conclusion, that, under the statute in question, the interest, when it became due and payable, was either the property of the corporation, and thus rightfully taxable, or the property of the bondholder, and thus taxable because in the shape of funds within the jurisdiction of the taxing power and under its control, the tax attaching to the interest, as funds of the bondholder in the hands of the corporation. These views seem to me to run counter to the decisions of the supreme court in U. S. v. Railroad Co., and Stockdale v. Insurance Cos., above cited. The latter case is not referred to by Judge Clark in his opinion.

The plaintiffs are, therefore, not entitled to recover the tax on the £181,800 sterling of interest which it paid to non-residents and aliens, or any penalty thereon. Their right to recover the £210 sterling tax on the £4,200 sterling of interest is admitted. The defendant contends that this amount is to be recovered at its value in legal tender currency at the date of the trial or judgment. But I am of opinion that, under sections 3 and 4 of the act of March 10, 1866 (14 Stat. 5), as amended by section 9 bis of the act of July 13, 1866 (Id. 147, now section 3178 of the Revised Statutes), the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the tax at its value in legal tender currency at the several dates when the interest was payable.

In accordance with the decision of this court in the case of U. S. v. New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co. [Case No. 15,872], Dec. 16, 1875, only one penalty is recoverable for all defaults prior to the commencement of the suit.

NOTE. The United States carried this case, by writ of error, to the circuit court, where it was heard before Chief Justice Waite. His decision was as follows: "I fully concur with the learned district judge in the view he has taken of this case. The tax for the recovery of which the suit was brought was a tax upon the owner of the bonds and not upon the defendant. It was not a tax, in the nature of a tax in rem, upon the bond itself, but upon the income of the owner of the bond, derived from that particular piece of property. The foreign owner of these bonds was not, in any respect, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, neither was this portion of his income. His debtor was, and so was the money of his debtor, but the money of his debtor did not become a part of his income until it was paid to him, and, in this case, the payment was made outside of the United States, in accordance with the obligations of the contract which he held. The power of the United States is limited to persons, property and business within their jurisdiction, as much as that of a state is limited to the same subjects within its jurisdiction. State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 300. The default of the defendant in making its returns was a continuing one. Only one penalty, therefore, is recoverable. The judgment of the district court is affirmed."

But see Railroad Co. v. Collector, 100 U. S. 595.

[The judgment of the circuit court was reversed in error by the supreme court. 106 U. S. 327, 1 Sup. Ct. 223. At a later day a petition for rehearing was denied. 107 U. S. 1, 2 Sup. Ct. 83.]

UNITED STATES v. ERSKINE.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 299.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1833.

EVIDENCE—RECORDS—INDICTMENT FOR PERJURY—MOTION IN ARREST OF JUDGMENT—PRACTICE.

1. Upon an indictment for perjury in this court, it is not necessary to produce a copy of the record of this court in the cause in which the perjury was committed. The court is presumed to know its own record. The record exists, although not reduced to writing in full; and the record is what it ought to be when correctly extended from the minutes.

2. It is only necessary to prove so much of the testimony of the witness as relates to the particular fact on which the perjury is assigned. After conviction of perjury, if the defendant move in arrest of judgment, and then forfeit his recognizance, the court will not give its opinion until the defendant appears in person.

[Cited in Hutcherson v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 24 S. W. 909.]

Indictment [against William Erskine] for perjury committed on the trial of John Ryan, at the last term of this court, by testifying that Evelina Ridgway, a witness in that cause, was a common drunkard.

Mr. Key, U. S. Dist. Atty., offered the record of this court to show that there was such a prosecution against Ryan; and, as evidence of the record, produced the docket entries and minutes of the court.

Mr. Marbury, for defendant, objected that the docket entries and minutes are not the record, and cited Archb. Cr. Law, 318; Reg. v. Carter, 6 Mod 168. The minutes of another court are not the record. Archb. Cr. Law, 81. The whole record must be given in evidence. 1 Har. Dig. 408; Rex v. Bellamy, 1 Ryan & M. 171; Harrison v. Rowan [Case No. 6,143]; 1 Murph. 156. The style of the court must be truly set forth in the indictment.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the objection, and said that, it being a record of this court, no copy of the record is necessary to be produced. The court itself needs not to be judicially informed of its record; it is presumed to know its own record, and the minutes and docket entries are mere memoranda to refresh the recollection of the court and the clerk, and by which he is to make up the roll. The record exists, although not reduced to writing in full; and the record is what it ought to be, when correctly extended from the minutes. See Burk's Ex'rs v. Tregg's Ex'rs, 2 Wash. (Va.) 215.

Mr. Marbury contended that it was incumbent on the United States to prove all that the witness testified on that trial, and cited Rex v. Jones, Peake, 38, and Rex v. Dowlin, Id. 171.

THE COURT, however, said (nem. con.) that the law was correctly laid down by Starkie on Evidence (part 4, p. 1142), who says: "It seems, therefore, that, at most, the rule amounts to this, that all the evidence given by the defendant in reference to the particular fact on which perjury is assigned, ought to be proved. And the rule, even to this effect, appears to be a doubtful one; for, when it has once been proved that particular facts, positively and deliberately sworn to by the defendant in any part of his evidence, were falsely sworn to, it seems, in principle, to be incumbent on him to prove, if he can, that, in other parts of the testimony, he explained or qualified that to which he had so sworn."

Verdict, guilty.

Mr. Marbury, for defendant, moved in arrest of judgment, and the motion was argued by him and Mr. Key; but the defendant forfeited his recognizance, and the court refused to give any opinion upon the motion, unless the defendant should be present.

UNITED STATES v. ESTUDILLO.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 204.] [1]

District Court, D. California. Dec. Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—BOUNDARIES—"MORE OR LESS"—QUANTITY NAMED IN GRANT.

Where the description contained in a grant, and the circumstances of the case, justify the belief that the intention was to grant all the land included within the boundaries named, then the words "poco mas ó menos" (a little more or less) must be construed as operative to pass to the grantee such fractional part of a league as may be found in excess of the quantity named in the grant.

Claim [by the heirs of Jose Joaquin Estudillo] for one league of land in Alameda county [known as the "Rancho San Leandro"], confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

Thornton & Williams, for appellees.

BY THE COURT. This claim was confirmed by the board. It has recently undergone so full an examination in the ejectment suit brought in the circuit court, that I conceive it unnecessary to consider at length the testimony by which its genuineness is established. On the whole, after an attentive consideration of the additional testimony taken in this court, I incline to the belief that the grant issued as alleged by the claimant, although the nonproduction of the original grant and the fact that the order of concession is unsigned, leaves some room for doubt on this point. It appears to me evident that the grantor intended to fix as the limits of the tract, the San Leandro, the sea and the diramaderos or overflowings of the springs. On the fourth side the boundary is designated as "a straight line from the diramaderos to the San Lorenzo, but so drawn as not to include the Indian cultivations." This line was, from the terms of the grant, to be a straight line, and should be drawn to the nearest point of the San Lorenzo to which it can be drawn without including the Indian cultivations; whether that line will thus take a southerly or a south-westerly direction will depend upon the extent of the Indian cultivations. Such has seemed to me, after much consideration, the true construction of the grant and diseño in this case, and such was the view taken of it by the circuit court and by the board of commissioners.

But the difficult question in the case is that presented by the words "poco mas ó menos." It is certainly not easy to say what precise effect they were intended to have. Some operation should clearly be given them, unless they are so hopelessly vague and uncertain as to admit of no definite construction. The grant conveys to the grantee "a part of the land known as 'San Leandro,'" and proceeds to define the boundaries with more than ordinary precision. The third condition states the land of which donation is made to be one square league, a little more or less (poco mas ó menos), directs it to be measured, and reserves the surplus. The quantity of land contained within the boundaries will probably exceed one league by a considerable fraction. Ought then the words "poco mas ó menos" to be rejected for uncertainty, and the grantee in this and all similar cases to be limited to the precise quantity of one league, no matter how small the gore or strip of land in excess may on measurement be found to be; or are we at liberty to construe the words referred to as embracing such fractional part of a league as may be found within the boundaries? The question is one of intention on the part of the grantor. In most instances the description in these grants was obviously intended to designate the tract out of which the granted quantity was to be taken, rather than to indicate the limits of the land granted. In some cases, on the other hand, the boundaries are indicated with much precision, and the mention of quantity is obviously rather a conjectural estimate of its extent than intended as a limitation of the grant to the quantity mentioned; and yet in these cases the sobrante clause is added, apparently from habit, or because no pains were taken to vary the form of the grant according to the circumstances of particular cases. The English equivalent for the words "un sitio, poco mas ó menos," would perhaps be given by the phrase "about one square league." Where under our system a grant specifies the boundaries of the land which it conveys in absolute terms, the subsequent mention of its extent as of "about one square league," with a reservation of the surplus, would probably be inoperative. It may plausibly be argued, that if any part of the grant is rejected for uncertainty, the whole phrase (un sitio, poco mas ó menos) should be rejected, and not merely the indefinite words which terminate it. Certainly, if the expression were in English "about one league," the court would hardly strike out the word "about" and construe the words "one league" as indicating that precise quantity—not to be exceeded by a single foot. It has on the whole seemed to me that where the grant describes in its granting clause a particular piece of land, with definite or ascertainable boundaries, and the condition mentions the extent of the land so granted as of so many leagues, "more or less," the latter expression should be so construed as to embrace such additional fractional part of a league as may on measurement be found within the boundaries. There is certainly some difficulty in determining what quantity shall by this clause be deemed to pass. To allow under a grant of one league, more or less, three or four or five leagues to pass, would evidently be unreasonable, unless the condition be rejected in toto. It would seem equally unreasonable to restrict the grantee to the precise quantity of one league as determined by an accurate survey, and to take from him a gore of land, perhaps a few yards in width, along one side of his rancho, and which is clearly embraced within the boundaries as mentioned in his grant. I think the words should be allowed a reasonable operation, and that where the description contained in the grant, the previous proceedings, and the circumstances of the case justify the belief that the grantor's general intention was to grant all the land within the boundaries, the words "poco mas ó menos" should be construed to embrace such fractional part of a league as might be found to be in excess of the specified quantity.

The circuit court and the board were of opinion that in the grant under consideration, the excess, such as it was shown to be, passed to the grantee, and in that opinion I concur.

A decree must be entered affirming the decision of the board.

[NOTE. The surveyor general of the United States for California caused a survey of the land confirmed to be made, which survey included 7,000 acres, and more, being over 2,500 acres in excess of one square league granted; that such excess included land occupied and claimed by one Mulford and others, under the laws of the United States; that in October, 1859, the district court entered an order directing the surveyor general to return to the court his said survey, which was done, and exceptions filed thereto. The matter of said survey was pending in said court on the 14th day of June, 1860, and was made subject to the provision of the act of June 14, 1860. Mulford and others, claiming an interest in the survey, filed exceptions in the district court. Mulford, in order to ascertain his right to intervene in his own name, filed a petition to that end, and moved for leave to intervene, which motion was denied. In 1862 a decree was entered in the district court, approving the decree of the surveyor general, which decree was adverse to the interests of Mulford. An appeal taken to the supreme court was dismissed, on stipulation of the parties, and a motion afterwards made, on behalf of Mulford and others, that the stipulation be vacated. The motion was denied. 1 Wall. (68 U. S.) 710.]

Case No. 15,059.

UNITED STATES v. The ETHAN ALLEN.

[3 Am. Law Rev. 372.]

District Court, D. California. 1868.

SHIPPING—VIOLATION OF REGULATIONS RELATING TO PASSENGERS—FINES AND PENALTIES—LIENS.

[1. Under the act of March 3, 1855, known as the "Passenger Act," the fines imposed upon the master by sections 1 and 6, for acts which are therein declared to be misdemeanors, are not made a lien upon the vessel. The provision in the fifteenth section, that the "amount of the several penalties" imposed by the foregoing provisions shall constitute a lien, refers only to the penalties imposed by sections 2–5, 7, and 14, upon both the master and owners, and which are expressly made recoverable by suit.]

[Cited in The Strathairly, 124 U. S. 569, 8 Sup. Ct. 612.]

[2. Even if it be assumed that such fines are made a lien upon the vessel, an action against her to recover them cannot be maintained before the amount thereof, and the master's liability, has been fixed by his trial, conviction, and sentence.]

In this case a libel of information was filed by the district attorney of the United States against the barque Ethan Allen, charging that the master of the vessel took on board at Sydney, Australia, thirty-five more passengers than is "the proportion to the space occupied by them, and appropriated for their use on board said vessel, and unoccupied by stores or other goods, not being the personal baggage of such passengers," as provided in section 1 of the act of congress, approved March 3, 1855 [10 Stat. 715], entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels." Thereupon the vessel was taken into custody by the marshal. Exceptions were filed to the libel.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The exceptions filed by the claimants to the libel of information present two questions: (1) Is the fine, which, under the first section of the act of March 3, 1855, the master of a vessel, on indictment and conviction, may be sentenced to pay, a lien on the vessel, and recoverable in a proceeding in rem? (2) Can such action against the vessel be maintained before the amount of the fine and the liability of the master have been fixed by his trial, conviction, and sentence?

The section referred to provides that, for certain violations of its provisions, the master "shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," and on conviction thereof shall be fined fifty dollars for each passenger, &c., and may also be imprisoned not exceeding six months. The fifteenth section of the same act provides that the same "amount of the several penalties" imposed by the foregoing provisions shall be liens on the vessel, &c. If the fine imposed by the first section was the only fine or penalty mentioned in the act, it might be supposed to have been the intention of congress to secure its payment by making it a lien on the vessel. The act known as the passenger act contains various provisions for the safety, health, and comfort of passengers. For violation of these provisions two kinds of punishment are denounced. For certain offences mentioned in sections 1 and 6 the master is declared guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, is to be fined, and may also be imprisoned. For the violation of the provisions contained in the second, third, fourth, fifth, seventh, and fourteenth sections, the master and owners are to forfeit and pay specified amounts, to be recovered by suit in any United States court within the jurisdiction of which the vessel may arrive, &c. It is plain that the provision of the fifteenth section, by which the penalties imposed by the act are made liens on the vessel, applies only to these penalties, for which both the master and owners are liable; and the collection of which it was intended to secure by authorizing a proceeding directly against the vessel. In sections 1 and 6, the punishment of the master is spoken of as a "fine," while section 15 declares to be liens only the "penalties" imposed by the act. It would seem, therefore, that congress intended to distinguish between the "fines" which, on conviction of a misdemeanor, the master might be sentenced to pay, and the "penalties" which, in a civil action, are made recoverable from the owners, as well as the master. The offences for which the master is made criminally liable are wilful violations of the law, in which the owners may have no complicity. The infractions of the act, for which the owners are made responsible in a civil suit, relate to houses over passage ways, to ventilators, camboozes or cooking ranges, water closets, &c., and other arrangements for the comfort and health of the passengers, which it is the owner's duty to provide. For the omission to do so, the owners and the vessel are justly made responsible. I think it clear, therefore, that these, and these alone, are the penalties which, by the fifteenth section, are made liens on the vessel.

If this view be correct, it is unnecessary to consider the second point raised by the exceptions. It may be observed, however, that the only mode by which the liability of the master to a fine, and the amount of the fine, can be ascertained, is that prescribed in the act, namely, his indictment, conviction, and sentence. Until this liability has thus been judicially established, it cannot be said legally to exist; and certainly the court cannot, in a civil action against the vessel, determine how many passengers in excess of the legal number a jury might have found the captain to have taken on board, or what would be the amount of the fine the court by the verdict of the jury would have been called on to impose. Even if the master were first convicted and sentenced, it would be anomalous to hold the owners responsible, through their vessel, for the amount of a fine imposed in a proceeding to which they were not parties, and of which they may have had no notice. On the other hand, if the vessel is sued, and the fine collected from her proceeds before the master is tried, how can the latter, in a subsequent criminal proceeding against himself, set up the fact that the fine imposed on him has already been paid? Is the court to violate the positive requirements of the statute, and impose no fine on the master when found guilty, or is it, by sentencing him to pay the statutory fine, to exact a double payment of the single fine which the law imposes? I think it clear, to construe the fifteenth section as applying to fines which the master may be sentenced to pay, would involve such incongruities and absurdities as render the construction wholly inadmissible.

The exceptions are sustained.

UNITED STATES v. The ETTA.

[4 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 38.]

District Court. D. New Jersey. Sept. Term, 1864.

PRIZE—FORFEITURE—PURCHASE FROM BELLIGERENT.

The sale of a vessel of war by a belligerent to a neutral during hostilities is not valid as against the other belligerent.

[Cited in The Georgia, Case No. 5,349; The Georgia v. U. S., 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 42.]

In admiralty.

A. Q. Keasbey, U. S. Dist. Atty.

1. The proof shows beyond doubt that this vessel was the rebel privateer Retribution, and was liable to seizure and forfeiture for some, or all of the causes set forth in the libel; and having been so liable, these claimants must show that they have acquired such a title as purges the forfeiture, and gives them the absolute ownership, and the burden of proof is upon them. The Emulous [Case No. 4,479]; Ten Hogsheads of Rum [Id. 13,830]; The Short Staple [Id. 12,813]; The Eliza [Id. 4,346]. Unless they show a valid title their claim must be dismissed, and they have no concern with the disposition of the vessel, or the form of proceeding.

2. They simply allege that they bought in good faith, of a British subject at Nassau, who bought at an auction, under a condemnation by surveyors for unseaworthiness, made at the request of the rebel captain. If we admit this to be true, the question remains, does such a title shield her from forfeiture, and require a return of the vessel?

3. This title is invalid: First. Because she was originally captured by the rebels from the United States; and if they are to be treated as pirates, she was stolen, and no title could pass from them. Second. If they are to be treated as belligerents, and gained title by capture, they used her to aid the rebellion, and she became liable to forfeiture, and any transfer was void under the 6th section of act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 590); and the forfeiture took effect on the commission of the offence, and avoids subsequent sale to an innocent purchaser. Unless the statute is in the alternative, and forfeits the article or its value, the forfeiture relates back to the commission of the offence. U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 337; U. S. v. 1960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; U. S. v. Mars, Id. 417; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246; Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366; which cases overrule the decision of Judge Story in The Mars [Case No. 9,106]. Third. If the transfer to a neutral purchaser in good faith, was not void by the statute, yet she was prize of war, and no sentence of condemnation is shown; and until such sentence, no valid title can be made by the captors. The Flad Oyen, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 135; Jecker v. Montgomery, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 516, and 18 How. [59 U. S.] 110; The Falcon, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 198; The Kierlighett, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 97; The Dawn [Case No. 3,665]; The Estrella, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 298; The Jos. Segunda, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 338; The Astrea, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 125.

4. The sale of this vessel by an enemy to a neutral was illegal. Such sales of merchant ships, though sometimes held valid in England and this country, are always regarded with extreme suspicion. The Bernon, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 102; The Argo, Id. 158; The Sechs Geschwistern, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 101; Append. to 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 30. But the sale of an enemy's vessel of war to a neutral, has been held by Lord Stowell to be absolutely illegal. The Minerva, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 396. And this doctrine is approved by Judge Story in Append. to 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 31, and should now be judicially adopted in this, the first case that has arisen in this country.

5. Treating her as the absolute property of the rebels the title of the claimants is invalid (1) because even if they were innocent purchasers without notice, and the rebel captain was the duly authorized master, he had no power to sell the ship. A sale under condemnation for unseaworthiness can be valid only in cases of extreme necessity, where the vessel cannot be repaired, and it must be optima fide. The Tilton [Case No. 14,054]. And there must be a judicial condemnation, and even then, courts will look behind it into all the facts. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 66; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 643, and cases cited; The Flad Oyen; The Dawn, ubi supra. Here was no extreme necessity, no condemnation, but a sham survey, a mere cloak for the desired sale. But the captain was not authorized to sell her under any circumstances. Such a condemnation and sale of a national war vessel would be illegal anywhere. And their title is invalid (2) because the testimony clearly shows that they were not bona fide or innocent purchasers, without notice. They had full notice of her character and history, and were bound to know that they could not acquire a valid title. They could acquire no title if there was even enough to put them on inquiry. The Ploughboy [Case No. 11,230]; The Tilton [supra].

6. To establish this claim would be to form a precedent dangerous to us, and invaluable to the rebels. They would find pliant surveyors in every neutral port, and a ready market for all their prizes, and for all their war vessels when disabled or hard pressed by our cruisers.

In reply to a suggestion by Mr. Edwards that the Sumter and the Georgia had been dismantled and sold, with the sanction of the British authorities, Mr. Keasbey replied, that no judicial confirmation of such sales had taken place, and that if those vessels should be overhauled by our cruisers, they would certainly be seized, and then the very questions in this case would remain to be decided in our courts.

Charles Edwards, for claimants, after objecting to the testimony of the informer, and to certain hearsay evidence, made the following points:

1. The Etta had become British property unconditionally, and the only question should be whether a bonâ fide buyer of a vessel in a neutral port, getting a title through British law, has to look further than liens. She had become British property before they purchased her, and they bought her of a British subject in a neutral port, and complied with all the requirements of British law, to make her a British vessel.

2. She had been condemned as unseaworthy by a competent board of surveyors, and ordered to be sold. The unseaworthiness of the vessel, coupled with the survey, sale, and register to Stead, the purchaser, granted by the custom house at Nassau, vested the property in him (Gordon v. Massachusetts Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2 Pick 264); and the British title of the claimants is also perfectly clear. She was purchased bonâ fide and purely with a view to use her in peaceful neutral commerce. She does not appear to have had a warlike character at any time while she was at Nassau. Her seizure was that of a vessel of a country at peace with the United States. It was a tortious seizure, and restitution ought to be made. Talbot v. Jansen, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 133.

3. But even if she had borne the character of an enemy, honest change of ownership rubbed off enemy property. Enemy's ship may be bought by a neutral. The Sechs Geschwistern, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 100; The Johanna Emilie, Spinks, Prize Cas. 16, and same case in 29 Eng. Law & Eq. 562; 6 Op. Attys. Gen. p. 652; 7 Op. Attys. Gen. p. 538; The Ocean Bride, Spinks, Prize Cas. 79.

4. The charges against the vessel are of a criminal character, and must be proved by strict legal evidence, and the wrongful actors must be shown to be the owners; this must be done before the United States can have any standing, and yet even when it is done, we insist that she cannot be held.

5. Even if prior wrong committed is proved, yet she is not to be condemned unless she had a criminal character at the time of her seizure. U. S. v. 1960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; U. S. v. Mars, Id. 417; The Saunders [Case No. 12,372]; U. S. v. The Manginate, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 356; U. S. v. Grundy, Id. 337; Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 283. She had no such hostile character, or warlike vitality about her when first put up for sale at Nassau, but was even for peaceful purposes, unseaworthy.

6. There can be no confiscation under the act of August 6, 1861, [12 Stat. 319], unless upon legal proof of ownership, and illegal acts done by the owners. There is no such proof; and if condemnation is sought under the act of July 17, 1862, the test of property must be of the time of the seizure. There is nothing in the act which forfeits unconditionally from the date of the statute.

7. If the vessel was seized by the rebels and used in piratical aggressions, she is clearly not condemnable; her old ownership would continue. The principle applied to The Chesapeake Case would apply here. Pirates have no ownership. 1 Kent, 184; 2 Dods. 369; 1 W. Rob. Adm. 433; Hagg. Adm. 143.

8. It is not proved that she attempted to run the blockade, but, if she had, she cannot be tried for it on the instance side of this court, nor even in a prize court, for she had ended any such voyage. Man. Law Nat. 328; Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 4, c. 3, § 13; The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 348.

FIELD, District Judge. This is an information filed by the district attorney, in behalf of the United States, and of Daniel Howell, against the schooner, now called the Etta, but lately known as the Retribution, seized at Jersey City, on the 1st day of September, 1863, for an alleged forfeiture under the laws of the United States. The libel, after reciting the existence of an insurrection against the government of the United States, and the proclamation of the president of the 15th of April, 1861, proceeds to allege five distinct grounds of forfeiture. (1) That Vernon C. Locke and Thomas Jones, and other persons unknown, have acquired, purchased, sold, and given the said vessel, with intent that the same should be used and employed in aiding and abetting such insurrection, in violation of the 1st section of the act of August 6, 1861 [12 Stat. 319], entitled "An act to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes." (2) That in violation of the same section, the said Vernon C. Locke and Thomas Jones and others, being the owners of said vessel, have used and employed her in aid of such insurrection. (3) That the said vessel was the property of Vernon C. Locke and other persons unknown, acting as officers of the navy of the rebels, in arms against the government of the United States, and therefore liable to seizure under the 5th section of the act of July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes." (4) That the said vessel was the property of Vernon C. Locke and others, holding certain offices and agencies under the government of the so-called "Confederate States of America," and therefore liable to seizure, under another clause of the same section of the act of July 17, 1862. (5) That the said vessel was purchased, fitted out in whole or in part, and held, for the purpose of being employed in the commission of piratical aggressions and depredations, and in the commission of other acts of piracy, as defined by the law of nations, in violation of the 1st section of the act of August 15, 1861, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy.'"

A claim is interposed by Gustave Renouard and Byron Bode, who allege that they are merchants, residents of Nassau, New Providence, British subjects, and bonâ fide owners of the said schooner Etta. That in the month of February, 1863, while the said schooner Etta, then called the Retribution, was in the port of Nassau, she was deemed unseaworthy, and a survey was duly had in Nassau upon her by competent shipbuilders and shipping merchants. That in consequence of such survey, and by order of the board of survey, she was in the said month of February, 1863, sold by public auction in Nassau to Thomas Stead of the same place, a British subject, who continued to hold and own her until about the 20th day of July thereafter, when he caused her to be sold by public auction at Nassau, at which sale these claimants bought her, in good faith and for a valuable consideration. That on the 2d day of July, 1863, and on the completion of such purchase, they received a bill of sale of her from the said Thomas Stead, took possession of her, and have been her sole owners ever since, no other persons having any share, interest, or ownership in her. They also allege, that since they have owned the said vessel she has not been engaged in any illegal or piratical voyage, and that they have not been privy to or interested in any prior illegal or piratical voyage, and that they have never used her at any time in contravention of any statute of the United States, or been privy to or interested in any such contravention. It is to the question of the validity of this claim that the arguments of counsel have been chiefly directed.

Now the first, and by far the most important question in this case, according to the view which I take of it, is this, What was the character of this vessel? Was she a merchant vessel, or was she an armed vessel of war in the service of the Confederate States? As the judgment I am to pronounce will depend in a great measure upon the solution of this question, I propose to examine somewhat in detail the evidence bearing upon it. We have in the first place the testimony of Daniel Howell. The first time he ever saw the vessel was at Nassau, in March, 1863. She was at Cochran's Anchorage. He saw her through a glass, while lying there. She appeared like an ordinary schooner with a gun amidships. When she came into the harbor, he went on board of her. She was not then armed, but there were indications that she had been. There was a track on the deck for a swivel gun. It looked as if it had been used for that purpose. She was a fore and aft schooner, and had the appearance of having been altered from a propeller. The filling in at the stern, where the propeller had been, indicated it. He saw the captain on board. He went under the name of Captain Parker, but his real name was Vernon C. Locke. The captain told the witness that the vessel was the privateer Retribution; that she was originally the propeller "Uncle Ben," and had been taken from the Yankees. He said, he had knocked some half dozen vessels of the Yankees to pieces. He showed witness some chronometers which he said he had taken from the Yankees. He had six himself, and his first lieutenant, whose name was Gray, had four or five. But these declarations of Parker, it is said, are nothing but hearsay evidence, and therefore inadmissible. This may be so, and even if they were not, we should feel disposed to receive with many grains of allowance, the boastful account given of his exploits by this rebel captain. But what the witness saw himself is certainly evidence. There were the indications that the vessel had been originally a propeller; that she had been altered to a schooner; that she had been armed. There were the chronometers. They told their own tale, of American merchantmen plundered and destroyed. They were the customary trophies of rebel privateers. The witness saw the vessel every day until the latter part of April, when she went out, as he says, to run the blockade. She had then another captain on board named Jones. She went out to go to Wilmington, as the captain said. She cleared at the custom house for St. Johns, "as all the runners of the blockade do." I quote the language of the witness. She was loaded with salt; the witness might have added, as all the blockade runners are. The witness was on board, and saw the salt. About ten days after she came into port again. She was in the same condition in which she had gone out, minus her salt. The witness went on board of her. She had lost her cargo. The captain told him, that just as he got out, a steamer sighted him, and in running away from her he shipped so much sea, that he lost all his cargo. Now here again, what the captain told him may be hearsay, but what he himself saw is competent evidence. She cleared for St. Johns. She had a cargo of salt on board. She came back in ten days without it. Such an explanation of these facts, as the captain is represented as giving, is certainly not improbable, and might, perhaps, be fairly inferred even without any direct evidence. This witness also states that when the vessel first came to Nassau, the captain told him he was going to get her condemned and have her sold; that it was a very easy matter to get a vessel condemned. Now it turns out in point of fact, that the vessel was condemned; and the process by which it was effected shows that the operation was not a difficult one.

But, it is contended by the counsel for the claimants, that Howell is an informer, and has, therefore, a direct interest in procuring a sentence of condemnation; and on that account is an incompetent witness. But I do not understand this to be the rule of law. On the contrary, it is laid down by Greenleaf, in his Treatise upon Evidence, that the fact of a witness for the prosecution being entitled to a reward from the government upon conviction of the offender, or to a portion of the fine or penalty inflicted, is not admitted as a valid objection to his competency. "The public," he observes, "has an interest in the suppression of crime and the conviction of criminals. It is with a view to stir up greater vigilance in apprehending, that rewards are given, and it would defeat the object of the legislature, to narrow the means of conviction by means of those rewards, and to exclude testimony which otherwise would have been admissible:" 1 Greenl. Ev. § 412. The interest which this witness has in the event of the suit, may detract somewhat from the credit to which his testimony is entitled, and may cause it to be received with a certain degree of jealousy. But I see no reason to doubt the substantial truth of his statements. In all important particulars, they are abundantly confirmed by the testimony of other witnesses.

Eppes Sargeant lives at Nassau, and is clerk of the Dry Dock in that city. Thinks the vessel came in the last of February or first of March, 1863. She same in at Cochran's Landing and lay there some time. He saw her when she came into the harbor. He saw a circle on her, where it appeared a gun had traversed. It was where they carry pivot guns. He knew of no other purpose for which such a mark could exist. She was advertised for sale by Adderly & Co., as the "Confederate Schooner Retribution." Witness saw the advertisement. Adderly & Co. were agents for most of the rebel steamers. The Retribution was universally known and spoken of as a rebel privateer. From a conversation he had with Mr. Bode, one of the claimants, witness supposed he knew all about her. Witness remarked to him, on learning she was coming to New York, that he bought her on purpose to make trouble between the two governments, knowing that she had been a privateer, and that she probably would be seized as soon as she arrived. His answer was, "If they seized her, he would make them pay well for her." He did not deny that he knew she had been a privateer.

Thomas Samson is a detective in the treasury department at New York. He was in the Bahama Islands in the spring of 1863; was sent by board of underwriters and marshal to look after blockade runners. He first saw the schooner Retribution on the south side of Long Key. She was a rebel privateer, and armed. Remembers distinctly seeing one, and he thinks two, guns on board of her. Saw two of the officers of the vessel, the first and second lieutenants. Had a conversation about the difficulty between the North and the South. The captain of the Retribution said, "they had done nothing more than the North had." This was about the 15th of February, 1863. The witness next saw the Retribution, about a month afterwards, at Cochran's Anchorage, about five miles from the city of Nassau. She had no guns then. The Retribution was publicly and generally known at Nassau as a rebel privateer. It was as notorious as anything could be. Nobody doubted it. Such is an outline of the evidence adduced on the part of the libellants touching the character of this vessel. Is it contradicted by the witnesses who have been examined on the part of the claimants? So far from this, it is confirmed in almost every particular.

Byron Bode, one of the claimants, on his cross-examination says: "The Etta was known as the 'Retribution,' when she arrived at Nassau. I heard that she had been a propeller, and altered to her present state and shape as a schooner."

Charles I. Marshall says: "I heard that the Etta had been a privateer. I believe it was publicly known at Nassau."

George D. Harris says: "I believe the vessel to have been once employed in the service of the Confederate States as a privateer, under the name of the 'Retribution.' I think it probable it was known at Nassau, although I really don't know that it was. I knew Captain Parker in command of her when she was the Retribution. She was called the 'Retribution' when she arrived." In the copy of the register granted to Thomas Stead, she is described as foreign built—her name "Etta"—and her foreign name "Retribution."

William Sawyer, who was the harbor master at Nassau, and one of the surveyors upon whose report she was condemned, says: "The vessel was called the 'Retribution' when I saw her first. It was said then that she was a Confederate vessel of war."

The testimony of Edward B. A. Taylor too upon this point is very significant, and must, I think, remove all doubt as to the true character of this vessel. He was the acting receiver general, and registrar of shipping at Nassau, and was examined as a witness upon the part of the claimants. "The Retribution," he says, "did not enter as a trader in this port of Nassau. She was treated as a Confederate vessel of war. Such vessels do not pass the receiver general's office at all."

From all the evidence then in this case, it is impossible to resist the conviction, that this vessel was an armed vessel of war in the service of the Confederate States. She was probably as well known at Nassau, as the Sumter at Gibraltar, or the Georgia at Liverpool. Could then the claimants, who are British subjects residing at Nassau, acquire a valid title to her, by a bill of sale, or in any other way? It is really the case of a purchase by a neutral, of a vessel of war belonging to a belligerent, while lying imprisoned in a neutral port, from which there was no escape without peril of capture. I use the terms "neutral," and "belligerent," as descriptive of the relation which subsists between the claimants and the Confederate States, because, by her proclamation of neutrality, of the 13th of May, 1861, the queen of England recognised "hostilities as existing between the government of the United States of America, and certain states styling themselves 'The Confederate States of America' "; and the supreme court of the United States have decided, that after such an official recognition by the sovereign, a citizen of a foreign state is estopped from denying the existence of a war with all its consequences as regards neutrals. Prize Cases, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 669.

This question, as to the right of a neutral to purchase an enemy's vessel of war, would at any time, and under any circumstances, be a question of importance; but it derives an especial interest from the nature and character of the war in which we are now engaged, and which would render the exercise of such a right, supposing it to exist, peculiarly liable to abuse. It is a matter of some surprise, that a question confessedly so important, and one too so likely to arise, should not have received a larger share of attention from writers on international law, and that it should not have been the subject of more frequent judicial determination. And yet, with the exception of the case of The Minerva [6 C. Rob. Adm. 396], decided by Lord Stowell in 1807, and which has been silently adopted as an authority by subsequent text writers, it has never, so far as I have been able to ascertain, been the subject either of legal discussion or of legal adjudication.

With regard to the purchase of merchant vessels belonging to a belligerent the case is otherwise. The question has frequently arisen, and there are repeated decisions in reference to it in the English courts of admiralty. The law, however, upon this subject varies in different countries. The 7th article of the French regulations of the 26th of July, 1778, which is still in force, provides, that enemy-built vessels cannot be reputed to belong to neutrals, unless there is documentary proof found on board, that the sale to a subject of an ally or neutral was made before the commencement of hostilities. This regulation is thus defended in a recent French treatise, in answer to the question, of what importance it is, whether enemy's vessels have been sold to neutrals before or after hostilities. "Belligerents, in desiring in maritime wars to appropriate to themselves ships of their enemies, do not wish that the latter should, to avoid capture and confiscation, realize the capital which their vessels represent. All enemy's vessels pursued by cruisers, and in danger of being captured, would take refuge in neutral ports, and in order that they might not be captured, their owners would sell them to neutral citizens." See Lawr. Wheat. Int. Law, 581, note. The Russian rule would seem to be the same as the French. In England, however, the validity of such purchases has been sustained, not however without much discussion, and some hesitation of opinion. They are allowed to be legal, but obnoxious to much suspicion, and courts will always feel it to be their duty to look into them with great jealousy. The Bernon, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 102; The Sechs Geschwistern, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 101. Such too would appear to be the law in the United States. 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] Append. 450; 6 Op. Attys. Gen. p. 652; 7 Op. Attys. Gen. p. 538. Of course, in countries like France and Russia, where the transfer of an enemy's merchant ships is held to be illegal, the purchase of ships of war belonging to an enemy must be deemed illegal also. For every possible reason which could be assigned for the one, would apply with tenfold force to the other. But how is it in England and the United States, where the purchase by a neutral of an enemy's merchant vessel is not in general illegal? Is the right of purchase confined to merchant vessels, or does it extend also to vessels of war? There is, as I said before, but a single adjudged case, in which the question seems to have arisen. It is the case of The Minerva, decided by Lord Stowell, and reported in 6 C. Rob. Adm. 396. It was the case of a vessel under Kniphausen colors, and claimed by Count Bentinck, Lord of Kniphausen, as a ship purchased by him, in April, 1807, in the port of Bergen. She had been a Dutch ship of war, belonging to the Dutch East India Company, and had been chased into North Bergen after an action with a British frigate, and had been lying in that port for nearly three years. Count Bentinck was allowed to appear in person before the court, and explain the circumstances of the transaction. He stated that the vessel had been long ago disposed of, at the breaking up of the Dutch East India Company, to individuals, on whose account she had since continued in the port of Bergen; and that it was from these persons, and not from the government of Holland, or from any public company, that the purchase was made. It was also stated that the vessel was purchased for the purpose of being employed in the West India trade to St. Thomas; and that she was on her way from Bergen to Kniphausen when she was captured. Here then was the case of a vessel, not belonging to the government of Holland but to the Dutch East India Company; a vessel that had been lying for nearly three years in a neutral port; that had been sold, a long time before, upon the breaking up of the company, to individuals, from whom she was purchased by a sovereign prince for the purpose of being employed in a legitimate trade. If, under these circumstances, the purchase was illegal, it would be difficult to imagine any possible case, in which the transfer of an enemy's war vessel to a neutral could be deemed lawful. And yet Lord Stowell rejected the claim, and held the transaction not to be legal. "The first question," he says in delivering his judgment, "is whether such a purchase can be legally made? I am not aware of any case in this court, or in the court of appeal, in which the legality of such a purchase has been recognised. There have been cases of merchant vessels driven into ports out of which they could not escape, and there sold, in which after much discussion and some hesitation of opinion, the validity of the purchase has been sustained. Such cases, I believe, did occur during the first war, in which I attended this court or the court of appeal. But whether the purchase of a vessel of this description built for war, and employed as such, and now rendered incapable of acting as a ship of war, by the arms of the other belligerents, and driven into a neutral port for shelter, whether the purchase of such a ship, I say, can be allowed, which shall enable the enemy so far to rescue himself from the disadvantages into which he has fallen, as to have the value at least restored to him by a neutral purchaser, is a question on which I shall wait for the authority of the superior court before I admit the validity of such transfer. That a private merchant could lawfully do this, I shall not hold, till I am so instructed by the superior court. That a sovereign prince should embark in such a transaction, unless under such guards as would effectually remove all possibility of abuse, is what, but for the instance before us, could scarcely have been expected. Some communication, at least we might suppose, would be made to the belligerent government, accompanied with a disclosure of every circumstance of caution that should exclude the suspicion of what is always to be apprehended, the danger of such a vessel finding her way back again into the navy of her own country."

The judgment in this case was not appealed from; its correctness, so far as I know, has never been called in question; and the principle involved in it has since been adopted by English text-writers as a settled rule of international law 2 Wildm. Int. Law, 90; Hasack, Rights of Neutrals, 81; Hazlitt & R. Manual Int. Law, 209.

In this country the question seems never to have received a judicial determination; but in the appendix to the second volume of Wheaton's Reports, which is now known to have been written by Judge Story, after stating that the purchase by neutrals of enemies' ships during war is not in general illegal, the author adds: "But the right of purchase by neutrals, extends only to merchant ships of enemies; for the purchase of ships of war belonging to enemies is held to be invalid." And the case of The Minerva is referred to as an authority for this position. We have then the highest legal authority, both in England and this country, for the doctrine, that the purchase by a neutral of an enemy's ship of war is illegal. When Lord Stowell and Judge Story agree, upon a question touching belligerent rights and neutral responsibilities, he must be a bold man that would venture to differ. But the doctrine is sustained by reason as well as by authority. And perhaps no case could furnish a better illustration of the wisdom and propriety of the rule, than the one now under consideration. Here is an armed vessel, in the service of the Confederate States, which after preying upon our commerce with a boldness and success which almost commands admiration, takes refuge from the vigilance of our cruisers in the neutral port of Nassau. Deterred from venturing out for fear of capture, she is stripped of her armament, purchased by a citizen of Nassau, obtains a British register under a new name, clears for a neutral port, and then endeavors to run the blockade, and make her way back to a hostile port, where she may be repaired and refitted as a vessel of war, and again sally forth upon a new career of plunder and depredation. A vessel under such circumstances cannot be a legitimate subject of commercial speculation. A neutral who purchases her, whatever may be his motives, does it at his peril. He may design to devote her to peaceful commerce, but the warlike character once impressed still adheres to her. He may call her the "Etta," but she is still the "Retribution," and by that name will be known and remembered.

The counsel for the claimants, in the course of his very able argument, alluded to the cases of the "Sumter," and the "Georgia," both of which had been Confederate vessels of war, and both of which had been transferred to neutrals. The inference that he would draw from these instances is, that such transfers could not have been illegal. But this is assuming the very point in controversy. When the legality of those transfers shall have been affirmed by our judicial tribunals, then, and not till then, can an argument in favor of the claimants be derived from them. On the contrary, these transactions only show the frequency and the facility with which such transfers are made, and ought therefore to admonish us of the danger of sanctioning such a practice. Let it be understood that such transactions are lawful, and we may look to see every rebel privateer, chased by our cruisers into a neutral port, emerging in a few days clothed with a British register—decked in new colors—and called by a new name.

But it is insisted that this vessel, after her arrival at Nassau, was, upon a survey, found to be unseaworthy, and thereupon sold at public auction, and that Stead, the purchaser, thereby acquired a valid title, which he afterwards transferred to the claimants. That there are circumstances under which the master of a merchant vessel may, in the absence of the owner, and upon a report by surveyors of her unseaworthiness, sell her, so as to vest the property in the purchaser, is undoubtedly true. But this is only in a case of supreme necessity, which sweeps all ordinary rules before it. It must be a necessity which leaves no alternative, which prescribes the law for itself, and puts the party in a positive state of compulsion to act. The master in such a case acts for the owner, because he has no opportunity to act for himself. If the property could be kept safely until he could be consulted, and have an opportunity in a reasonable time to exercise his own judgment as to the propriety of a sale, the necessity to act for him would cease. It is not enough that the master acts in good faith and for the interest of all concerned, if the requisite necessity for the sale be not clearly made out. Not even the sanction of a vice-admiralty court, much less the report of surveyors, will aid the sale when the requisite necessity is wanting. The master is employed only to navigate the ship, and the sale of it is manifestly beyond his commission, and becomes the unauthorized act of a servant, disposing of property which he was intrusted only to carry and convey. This is the doctrine of all the cases upon the subject, both in England and in this country, and is sanctioned by the very highest authority: Idle v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co., 8 Taunt. 755; Read v. Bonham, 3 Brod. & B. 147; Robertson v. Clarke, 1 Bing. 445; Hall v. Franklin Ins. Co., 9 Pick. 466; The Tilton [Case No. 14,054]; 3 Kent, Comm. (2d Ed.) 173.

Now it would not be difficult to show, from an examination of the evidence in this case, that no such necessity existed as would have justified the sale of this vessel, supposing it to have been an ordinary merchant ship. But no such examination is necessary, for the vessel in question was, as we have already seen, not a merchant vessel at all, but an armed vessel of war in the service of the Confederate States. That the officer in command of a war vessel of a belligerent can, under the pretence of her being unseaworthy, have her condemned and sold in a neutral port, and that a valid title can thus be acquired to her, is a proposition too monstrous to merit a moment's discussion. The relation in which such an officer stands towards those by whom he is commissioned and employed, is so entirely different from that which subsists between the master of a merchant vessel and the owner, that no rule drawn from the one can, under any possible circumstances, be applicable to the other. And even admitting that, as between the captain of this vessel and her owners, the sale of her under the circumstances was justifiable, still it was a transfer to a neutral of a war vessel of a belligerent, and, therefore, as I have endeavored to show, illegal. Surely, if the owners of this vessel could convey to Stead no valid title to her, it will hardly be pretended that the captain, acting as he always does in such cases as agent for the owners, could do so. If then the sale of this vessel to Stead conveyed no title to him, he of course could transmit no title to the claimants.

Whether the claimants, Renouard and Bode, acted in good faith in the purchase of this vessel, it is unnecessary to inquire. That they are respectable merchants of Nassau, that they paid a valuable consideration for her, and that they had no intention of employing her for any illegal purposes, are cheerfully admitted. This is more, however, than can be said with regard to Stead. There is too much reason to believe that his object in purchasing the vessel was to employ her in running the blockade. But whether this be so or not, it is a matter of no importance, in the view which I have taken of this case. He had no right to purchase her for any purpose. And as to Renouard and Bode, they must have known that this had been a war vessel in the service of the Confederate States, and they ought to have known that for this reason, she was not a legitimate object of commercial speculation. The claim is rejected.

Case No. 15,061.

UNITED STATES v. EVANS.

[19 Int. Rev. Rec. 118.]

District Court, E. D. Tennessee. April, 1874.

COUNTERFEITING—WITNESSES—DETECTIVES.

George Andrews, U. S. Dist. Atty.

E. C. Camp, for defendant.

EMMONS, District Judge, alluding to the claim of forbearance made for the defence because of their refusal to impeach the witness Dyer and show that he too had been engaged in passing counterfeit money, said in substance that the guilt of the defendant was proved quite irrespective of Dyer's credibility. No logical connection was seen between the assumed fact of his complicity and the punishment due to the prisoner. His honor saw in it only an additional reason for increased severity upon this whole class of offenders, so many of whom have been convicted and plead guilty during the present term. It is the temptations which they present to the young and inexperienced which bring to the bar so many novices in crime for whom a larger sympathy is felt and upon whom, consistent with justice, lighter punishment may be inflicted. The witness Dyer is a young man of prepossessing appearance. If we may assume the worst which is said of him it proves only that one more victim of these old dealers in counterfeit money has fallen a prey to their arts. His parents and kindred, or citizens who are interested in the safety of society, will fail to perceive in the fact that he had fallen any mitigation of the offence of the old and hardened criminal who had been one of the instruments of his fall.

The instrumentalities by which so large a number of offenders have now been brought to justice, the detective force of the government, have been but slightly referred to in the appeal made to the court; and certainly not in any manner demanding the dissent of the court on this occasion. As this case, however, owes its presence and result here to the skill and diligence of governmental employees, and as such agencies have been so frequently a subject of severe comment, he deemed it a duty briefly to call attention to the demonstration which the history of the present term afforded of the efficiency and beneficence of the system.

It had abundantly appeared that for many years in this district the passing of counterfeit money had become a methodized business. It had its manufacturers, its wholesale and retail dealers, many of whom were as well known and recognized in the community as the miller and the merchant. Magistrates, county clerks, members of the bar, and otherwise apparently respectable business men kept each other in countenance in the commission of this unpunished crime. Although arrests sometimes took place the most authoritative information warranted the declaration that convictions had not followed. The astounding and mortifying fact was presented that while public sentiment produced activity in the punishment of other high crimes this class of offenders perpetrated their wrongs with such impunity and frequency that the ordinary business of the country was seriously impeded. The numbers who were joining their ranks were rapidly increasing. Leading citizens appealed to the government for protection. Numerous suspected persons were pointed out, but proof of overt acts was found to be impossible. A detective force was sent to discover the necessary evidence for conviction. By a series of simple, yet skillful plans, large numbers of guilty parties were induced to offer their criminal wares for sale and display their possession in circumstances which removed all difficulty of proof. The gratifying result is that numerous old offenders, with still greater numbers of lesser criminals, whom they had deluded into their service, have been convicted and punished. That the agency has been efficient and successful is beyond all doubt. The only criticism which the court or a watchful public, jealous of the citizens' rights and careful to guard their reputation, can make of it is the danger that innocent parties may be seduced into crime by the agents of the government. His honor said he had examined the plans and methods of this action intended to prevent the possibility of such a consequence. Detail would be out of place here. All that would be appropriate would be to refer to actual results before us—to that which is proved by the records of the court. The extraordinary fact was true, that of the great number of indictments which stood for trial at the present term, pleas of guilty had been entered in nearly all, and in the few which have been brought formally before a jury, so clear and convincing was the proof that in not one of them had an address of any kind been made by counsel for the defence. The citizen might look upon this protective and necessary work without any fear that in the extent of its success and the rapidity of its execution a single citizen has been sacrificed by inadvertence or unscrupulousness.

If the detective force would continue this conscientious carefulness, adhere rigidly to those rules for their guidance so well calculated to insure the safety of their action, the time would soon come, if it had not already arrived, when counsel for the prisoner could no longer by a contemptuous emphasis of the word detective, and a sneering manner cast odium upon the calling. It will be as seldom attempted as the like unjust purpose now is in reference to the word judge. He believed there were few more useful arms of the public service than that which had so speedily brought to punishment so large a number of dangerous offenders.

Case No. 15,062.

UNITED STATES v. EVANS et al.

[Crabbe, 60.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Dec. 5, 1836.

UNITED STATES—PRIORITY OF CLAIM—PARTNERSHIP ASSETS.

It seems that where one of a partnership is indebted to the United States, and an assignment is executed of the joint and several property of the partners, the United States are not entitled to a preference over the joint creditors for the payment of such individual debt out of the assets of the partnership.

Jonah Thompson being indebted to the United States as surety on sundry bonds of Samuel Thompson, given in the years 1825 and 1826, became an insolvent on the 7th May, 1827, and was released by the secretary of the treasury on the 13th December, 1832. See United States v. Thompson [Case No. 16,487]. On the 25th May, 1827, Jonah and George Thompson, then, and for some time before, trading together, executed an assignment of their joint and several property. Certain joint assets came into the hands of the defendants [Joseph R. Evans, William Yardley, and James Nevins], as assignees, and this suit was commenced to test the right of the United States to a preference over the joint creditors for the payment of the individual debt of Jonah Thompson, on the bonds above stated, out of the joint assets of the partnership.

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty.

This case presents less a question of fact than of law. The affairs of the estate have been properly managed by the defendants; and the question is whether the United States have a right to the assets now in the assignees' hands, in preference to other creditors, under the various laws on that subject. Act Aug. 4, 1790, § 45 (1 Story's Laws, 147 [1 Stat. 169]); Act March 3, 1797, § 5 (1 Story's Laws, 465 [1 Stat. 512]); Act March 2, 1799, § 65 (1 Story's Laws, 630 [1 Stat. 676]).

Samuel and Jonah Thompson became indebted to the United States, the one as principal and the other as surety, on various custom-house bonds, amounting in all to $10,585.43, on which the interest up to the present date amounts to $5,346.11. On the 7th May, 1827, Jonah Thompson became insolvent. On the 25th May, Jonah and George Thompson made a voluntary assignment, for the benefit of their creditors, to William Sansom and others. A partnership then existed between these assignors, and Jonah Thompson also carried on business in his own name. The assignment was of the joint and separate property, to pay the partnership and the personal debts. The assignees, however, refused to accept this assignment, and on the 16th November, 1827, they assigned over the property to the present defendants, on the same trusts. Under this assignment, a large sum of money passed into the defendants' hands. The gross amount received has been $81,678.25, and the claims thereupon which we admit are to be preferred to that of the United States are $70,920.08. This leaves the sum now in controversy at $10,758.17. To this last amount, under the laws which have been cited, we contend that the United States are entitled.

J. M. Read, for defendants.

If the United States are entitled to the money the defendants have received, we make no question as to where it came from, whether from the separate estate of Jonah Thompson, or the joint estate of both assignors. All the proceeds of the real estate of Jonah Thompson have been paid over to the United States, and there is no claim on that account. The personal estate of both assignors, received by the defendants, amounts to $140. And the whole of the sum now in question, with the trifling exception just mentioned, arose from the joint property. The question, then, is whether the United States, on bonds in which Jonah and George Thompson never appeared together, nor George Thompson at all, are to be paid out of the partnership funds of those parties, in preference to partnership creditors. Partnership property is never liable to pay a separate debt until all the joint debts are paid. United States v. Astley [Case No. 14,472]; Tom v. Goodrich, 2 Johns. 213; Rex v. Sanderson, 1 Wightw. 50, 6 Cond. Exch. 443; U. S. v. Hack, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 271.

Under an agreement of counsel that leave should be reserved to move to set the judgment aside, on the question of law, HOPKINSON, District Judge, charged the jury as follows:

The balance which is the subject of controversy, to wit, $10,758.17, arose from the sale of partnership property belonging to the firm of George and Jonah Thompson. This partnership is insolvent, and its assets insufficient to pay the joint debts. The question, then, is whether the fund arising from partnership property is to be applied to the debt of Jonah Thompson, one of the partners, in preference to the creditors of the partnership. I am of opinion that the United States are not entitled to this preference, and that your verdict should be for the defendants.

Upon this charge a verdict was given for the defendants, and judgment nisi entered thereon. The United States subsequently paid the costs, and made no motion to set aside the judgment.

The information was amended by filling up the blank of the date of the commission of the offence. The same amendment was also permitted in the cases of U. S. v. Howard, U. S. v. Smith, and U. S. v. Indictment [against Evan Evans] for acting as constable without giving bond agreeably to the fourth section of the act of May 3, 1802 [2 Stat. 194].

Verdict, guilty of serving warrants, but not of serving any execution.

Mr. Peacock, for defendant, contended that the object of the law was only for the security of creditors as to receipt of money on execution.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the omission to give the bond was a violation of duty; and fined the defendant one dollar.

INDICTMENT—KEEPING FARO TABLE—STATUTORY PENALTY—HOW RECOVERED.

The penalty for keeping a faro table in a place occupied as a tavern, contrary to the Maryland act of 1797, c. 110, may be recovered by indictment.

The defendant was convicted upon an indictment for keeping a faro table at a place occupied as a tavern, contrary to the Maryland act of 1797, c. 110.

Mr. Dandridge, for defendant, moved in arrest of judgment, and contended that the verdict does not authorize the court to give judgment for the penalty; but only creates a cause of action in favor of any one who will sue upon that verdict for the penalty. The second section of that act says: "On pain of forfeiting, for every offence, the sum of fifty pounds, upon conviction thereof by indictment or confession in the county court." The fifth section says, that "one moiety of the forfeiture accruing or becoming due under this act shall be applied to the use of the county, and the other moiety to the person or persons who shall sue for the same." By the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1801 (2 Stat. 115,) Burch's Dig. 233, it is enacted "that all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, accruing under the laws of the states of Maryland and Virginia, which by adoption have become the laws of this district, shall be recovered, with costs, by indictment, or information in the name of the United States, or by action of debt in the name of the United States and of the informer; one-half of which fines shall accrue to the United States, and the other half to the informer," etc.

Mr. Dandridge cited Com. v. Richards, 1 Va. Cas. 133, in which case it was decided, by the general court, that the forfeiture of $150, declared by Act 1797, c. 2, § 3, cannot be recovered for the use of the commonwealth by information; the forfeiture being given "to the person who will sue for the same." Rex v. Luckup, 2 Strange, 1048, that upon a conviction under St. 9 Anne, c. 14, for cheating at play, the court could not give judgment for five times the value of the thing won; the act having provided that the penalty should be recovered by action "by such person as will sue for the same." St. 30, Geo. I. c. 24.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the motion in arrest of judgment, because the forfeiture accrues upon the conviction, and the conviction is to be by indictment, according to the express words of the act of Maryland of 1797, c. 110, as well as by the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1801 (2 Stat. 115). No other mode of recovering the penalty is given by either of those statutes; and the practice has been, uniformly, both in Maryland and in this District, to render judgment for the penalty, upon conviction upon indictment under that statute.

The counsel for the defendant contended, that, as half of the penalty was, by the statute of Maryland, to be applied to the use of the county, and the other half to the person who should prosecute and sue for the same, the penalty could only be recovered by an action of debt by the informer and the United States. But the statutes upon which the cases which were cited by the defendant's counsel were decided prescribed the mode of recovery to be by any person who will sue for the same. Such is also the provision of the test act, 25 Car. II. c. 2, § 5, upon which the information was founded in the

CUSTOMS DUTIES — DISCHARGE OF GOODS — MANIFEST—POST ENTRY.

Discharge of cargo into lighters not an unloading under the statute. After such discharge, by general order, consignee should be allowed to make a post entry of goods not on the manifest.

Proceedings to forfeit vessels and cigars on the ground that the cigars, exceeding $400 in value, were unloaded from the vessel without any permit from the collector, contrary to the fiftieth section of the collection act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 665]. The facts were, that when the vessel arrived she was detained at quarantine, and her cargo was ordered to be discharged into lighters—some cigars under special permit, and the rest of the cargo under a general order. All the cargo of the vessel was thus discharged from the Express into lighters, under the inspection of custom house officers, and brought to this city; but before it was landed, the consignees, discovering that the cigars in question were not upon the manifest, applied to the collector to make a post entry of them.

Held, that upon the facts in evidence the act of removing the cargo into lighters was not an unloading and delivery of them from the barque, coming reasonably within the purview of the prohibition of the statute (1 Stat. 665, § 50), the separation from the vessel not taking them from her charge and control (U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,343]). That what was done in respect to these cigars, fairly falls within the scope of the authorization of the general order issued to the consignee. The informations dismissed, and vessel and cigars ordered to be discharged.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF BOUNTY AND PENSION LAWS—CLAIM AGENT'S COMMISSION.

1. Under the constitutional authority "to raise and support armies" (Const. art. 1, § 8), congress has power to bestow bounties and pensions upon those who may engage in the military service of the United States.

2. This power embraces and authorizes an enactment making it an offense punishable in the national courts, to detain from a military pensioner any portion of a sum collected in his behalf, as his pension.

[Cited in U. S. v. Hall, 98 U. S. 356.]

3. Sections 12 and 13 of the pension act of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. 389), limiting the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed the papers necessary under the act, and providing that the receiving of any greater compensation than that prescribed shall be punishable as a misdemeanor, are, therefore, constitutional.

[Cited in U. S. v. Marks, Case No. 15,721.]

Demurrer to an indictment.

The defendant, James H. Fairchilds, was indicted for having wrongfully withheld from one Penrose, a pensioner of the United States, a portion of a sum which the defendant, acting as agent for Penrose, had collected from the pension office, as being a pension to which Penrose was entitled. The indictment was founded upon sections 12 and 13 of the pension act of July 4, 1864 [13 Stat. 389], the substance of which is as follows: That any agent or attorney who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater compensation for services under the act than that prescribed, or who shall contract or agree to prosecute any claim for a pension, bounty, or other allowance under the act for a percentage on the amount of the claim, or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or other claimant the whole or any part of the pension or claim allowed and due, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment. The sum withheld was claimed and retained by defendant as his commission for services rendered by him to the pensioner.

[The indictment charges that Fairchilds wrongfully withheld $64.52 from Penrose, a pensioner, part of $174.52 collected and received by Fairchilds as pension money allowed and due Penrose from the United States. Penrose is a discharged soldier, and as such was entitled to a pension. He employed Fairchilds to obtain such pension, which Fairchilds did, and received from the pension office $174.52. Of this he paid Penrose $110, retaining and withholding the balance as compensation for services.] [2]

The defendant demurred to the indictment upon the ground that the facts alleged did not amount to any offense.

A. D. Griswold, Dist. Atty., and E. S. Eggleston, for the United States.

Lucius Patterson, for defendant.

WITHEY, District Judge. It is argued that congress has no power, under the constitution, to define as an offense that which is charged against Fairchilds. The question is, therefore, one of the constitutional power of congress. Sections 12 and 13 of the act of July 4, 1864, are claimed to be unconstitutional.

[1] [Reported by Benjamin Vaughn Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [From 7 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 306.]

It is argued by the learned counsel for Fairchilds that Fairchilds was the agent of Penrose and not of the government, and the district attorney does not deny the proposition. From this it is claimed that the transaction was purely between private citizens of a state, affected them only, and in nowise the United States government, nor any officer or agent of the United States; that these citizens were at liberty to make such bargain as they pleased in reference to the amount of compensation for services rendered by one for the other, whether that service related to pension money or otherwise; and that no law passed by congress can, in any regard, control or affect the parties or their rights or dealings under such contract. That when once the pension office paid the money over to Fairchilds, as the agent of Penrose, it was the property of Penrose, and he alone can call his agent to account for the same; and if any restriction can be placed upon the question of compensation of the agent, or any penalty be imposed on the agent for retaining or wrongfully withholding the whole or any portion of such moneys, only state laws can impose such restrictions and penalty. That there can be no offense by a citizen which both sovereignties can punish; if the one has the power, the other has not. That the state may exercise the power, and, therefore, the national government cannot.

It must be conceded that the line between the state and the national jurisdiction is not always clearly defined, and great care is demanded of the courts in passing upon a question like that involved in this case. The congress of the United States has, by the passage of the act in question, declared that the power exists under the constitution of the United States to protect the fund for the claimant, and limit the compensation which an agent or attorney shall receive for services rendered to one entitled to a pension in procuring the same. To warrant the courts in setting aside this law as unconstitutional, the case must be so clear that no reasonable doubt can be said to exist. Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 128. And especially is this so when the question is to be decided by a court of limited or inferior jurisdiction.

The constitutionality of the act of congress is, however, made a question, and there is no reason why this court should not consider and pass upon it. In construing the extent of the powers conferred by the constitution upon congress, we are to look at the language of the instrument which confers those powers in connection with the purposes for which they were conferred. What, then, are the constitutional provisions under which it is claimed congress could pass the act defining the offense charged in this case? The words of the constitution are: "Congress shall have power to raise and support armies," and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States." Article 1, § 8.

The supreme court of the United States, in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 316, hold that "although among the enumerated powers of government we do not find the word 'bank' or 'incorporation,' we find the great powers to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct war; and to raise and support armies and navies;" and that "a government, intrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nation so vitally depend, must also be intrusted with ample means for their execution;" that the constitution of the United States "does not profess to enumerate the means by which the powers it confers may be executed;" that "the government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed upon it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means."

By the aid of the profound views thus expressed by Chief Justice Marshall, let us examine the question before us. Congress is expressly empowered to "raise and support armies," and we shall do well to remember that congress is to be allowed, according to the ruling I have read, to select the means by which armies are to be raised and supported. In selecting the means to accomplish these things, we find pay, bounties, and pensions are stipulated and promised to the soldier. Through these means, thousands who could not otherwise afford to leave all and enter the military service, come forward, enlist, and do battle to protect and defend the rights, interests, and honor of the nation. By the use of these means the government is enabled readily to raise an army and fill its ranks from time to time.

Pensions and bounties are not given for the support of the army, but promised by way of inducement and reward for the citizen becoming a soldier and faithfully serving his country. There is no express power given in the constitution to congress to give pensions or bounties to the soldier. The right is claimed, however, and has never been doubted as being within those incidental or implied powers flowing from the expressly granted or enumerated power, to "raise and support armies." They are among the means which it selects in the exercise of a granted power, and I apprehend congress is the sole judge as to what means are appropriate and to be selected in the exercise of any of its enumerated powers. Most of the penal laws of the government of the United States rest upon the incidental or implied powers of congress to punish violation of its laws. It was well argued by the district-attorney, that under the power to regulate commerce, congress has passed laws regulating vessels engaged in carrying passengers, in prescribing the size of state-rooms and otherwise, as well as in requiring vessels to convey disabled American seamen found in a foreign port to this country. And, again, laws forbidding the sale of bounty certificates, as well as many other statutes of a like character, none of which have been held unconstitutional, or judicially questioned, so far as I know; and yet these statutes find no sanction in the constitution of the United States other than in the implied powers, and the general provision "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers vested in the government.

If, then, congress may promise bounties and pensions to the nation's soldiers, may it not, by appropriate penalties, guard those rewards against him who would divert them in any manner away from the beneficiary? If the soldier may lawfully be promised bounties and pensions, and if, from his occupation of arms and want of the requisite knowledge, he must employ another to prepare the requisite evidence to the pension office to bring him within the law and secure the promised bounty and pension, may not the government say to such employee: This money we pay to you for one of our soldiers, and you must pay it over to him intact; failing in which you make yourself liable to fine and imprisonment? True, the employee is the agent of the soldier in all that he does for him, but he must deal with the government in the exercise of that agency; and in taking such employment to secure for the discharged soldier his bounty or pension, he knows the restrictions placed by congress upon the compensation he can receive, and the prohibition against his retaining any portion of the funds from the soldier. These provisions may be regarded as the terms and conditions upon which the government consents to recognize the agency of the person employed by the soldier, and pays the money over to such agent. Congress must alone be the sole judge of what is both necessary and expedient on any subject within the range of its powers to act.

"To employ the means necessary to an end, is generally understood as employing any means calculated to produce the end." Congress has employed a means in raising and supporting armies, in addition to pay, clothing, &c.,—bounties and pensions; and has sought by appropriate penalties to guard these moneys through all channels from the nation's treasury into the hands of the pensioner.

Said the supreme court, in the case already referred to: "Let the end be legitimate; let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional."
