pended on them. The prohibition is not put upon export. The qualification or disqualification, is only fixed upon the character and quality of the carrier. The prohibition does not extend beyond the class of vessels, that were privileged by Great Britain.

The inference, which the attorney for the government is understood to draw from the evidence in this case, is that the boat was going to St. Andrews, which was one of the enumerated ports; and to which it would have been lawful, under the act, to export in a British vessel, coming directly from that port. And the employment of the boat is contended, by the attorney, to have been between Eastport and St. Andrews. This is supposition,—but if the defence rested on that point, there is no positive proof of that fact (viz. arriving from St. Andrews), in favour of the boat. But the operation of the act is annulled by the contingency provided for in the 6th section; the trade and intercourse between the United States and the British colonial ports having been subsequently prohibited by a British order in council, and the provisions of that act thereupon ceasing to operate in favour of British vessels, so far as it extended to them, as announced by the president's proclamation of 17th March, 1827; and the acts of 1818 and 1820 are thereby revived in full force. That the act of 1823 was thereby in effect repealed, was decided by the district judge in the case of The Atlantic (Dec. Term, 1827) [Case No. 621]. Erasing from the act the regulation in regard to British vessels, it is emphatically asked, what is left? The idea of an implied prohibition, a penalty by implication, raised constructively from the mention of "vessels of the United States," in the terms of the act, will not stand the test of legal principles. Although within the permissive words of the act, there was nothing within the terms of the prohibition but British vessels of the privileged class; nor is there anything else upon which they can act. It may be very true, that the present boat was not a proper "vessel of the United States;" but there can be no pretence for considering it a British vessel within the contemplation and meaning of the act; and although it be not the one, it is no matter, as long as it be not the other. The allegation, that this was not "a vessel of the United States," may be, technically, true enough, but it draws no consequence after it; but it will be difficult to sustain the allegation of its being a British vessel, to bring it within the act of 1820. It may be granted, that the persons represented as owners do not come within the requirements of our registry act. Neither is it a British built, owned, and navigated vessel, within the intendment of the act of 1820. The boat does not come within the scope, policy, and provisions of the act in reference to entry, bonding, tonnage. It is not a vessel "coming and arriving by sea within the sense of the statute." The allegation in the first article of the information is defective. It does not state any entry, or attempt to enter. The coming and arriving by sea do not constitute the offence. It is only a sort of inducement to its taking place, or more properly, perhaps, an indication of its character. The vessel so coming and arriving, being British, is excluded. It is the vessel entering or attempting to enter, that is forfeited; and the language of the act has reference only to the class of vessels capable of coming to entry. It is submitted, therefore, with great deference, that a decree of forfeiture cannot be sustained on either allegation. It is not questioned that such a boat, in proceeding to discharge its lading on the opposite shore, might come in contact with some law there established, to prevent importation in other than their own privileged shipping; but the exportation supposed to be intended in the present case, was an American enterprize entirely.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a libel of seizure founded on the acts, prohibiting commercial intercourse with the British colonial possessions, of the fifteenth of May, 1820, [3 Story's Laws, p. 1800 (3 Stat. 602, c. 122)], and the first of March, 1823, c. 150 [3 Story's Laws, 1893 (3 Stat. 740, c. 22)], as put into operation by the president's proclamation of the 17th of March, 1827. The questions raised in the case depend upon the true construction of these acts, and upon the conformity of the libel thereto, so as to present the point of forfeiture. The act of 1820 provides, that "after the 30th of September, then next, the ports of the United States shall be and remain closed against every vessel, owned wholly, or in part, by a subject or subjects of his Britannic majesty, coming or arriving by sea from any port or place in the province of Lower Canada, or coming or arriving from any port or place in the province of New Brunswick," &c. And it then proceeds to declare, that "every such vessel so excluded from the ports of the United States, that shall enter or attempt to enter the same, in violation of this act, shall, with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited to the United States."

The first remark, which I would make on this clause is, that it inflicts no forfeiture upon an excluded vessel, unless she enters, or attempts to enter some port of the United States; and it is, therefore, necessary that the libel should, in substance, contain an allegation of such entry, or attempt, before the court can pronounce a decree of condemnation, however clearly the facts may be made out. Now, the first count in the libel, which alone touches this statute, contains no such allegation. It merely affirms, that "the vessel or boat aforesaid was a vessel, owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of his Britannic majesty, and came and arrived by sea from some port or place in the province of New Brunswick, to the attorney unknown, within the port of Eastport aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statutes," &c. This is not an allegation in strict conformity with the words of the statute. The words "arrive" and "enter" are not always synonymous, and there certainly may be an arrival, without an actual entry, or an attempt to enter. Perhaps an arrival within a port, cannot be without an entry into the port. But still, it seems to me, that courts of law are not to inflict forfeitures, without the substantial phrases of the statute being used. And I am by no means sure, that the court would be warranted in giving judgment, where the words departed so widely from those of the statute. It would seem inconsistent with the rules usually adopted in the administration of penal laws. This point, however, is less important, because the libel is open to amendment; though the strong inclination of my opinion is, that without an amendment no condemnation could be pronounced, if the case were ever so clearly in favour of the government. The coming or arriving by sea is confined, by the immediately succeeding words, to Lower Canada, and any coming or arriving is prohibited from New Brunswick, whether by sea or otherwise. In this respect, I adopt the criticism of the district attorney as well founded. This informality in the allegation is no otherwise important, than that it ties up the case to narrower evidence, than the act itself requires.

The important question however is, whether the facts present a case within the real scope and operation of the statute. The facts are these. The owners of the boat are, and have been for several years inhabitants of Eastport, and have with their families a bonâ fide domicil there. The boat itself is less than five tons in burthen, is open and without any deck, and her home also is admitted to be Eastport. The owners are British born subjects, and have not, so far as any evidence exists in the record, changed their national allegiance. At the time of the seizure, the boat had on board 28 barrels of tar and pitch, and was bound with them from Eastport to St. Andrews, in New Brunswick. She had no custom-house papers on board, and none appear to have been taken out at any time for her. There is no proof that she ever came from New Brunswick and entered, or attempted to enter, any port of the United States. Strictly speaking, then, the facts do not, upon this general view, come up to a case of forfeiture. The intention of the parties, however, is not, as I understand it, to place the cause on this ground. Their wish is to settle a general question of great concern to the navigation with small craft, in that part of the country. And as the point has been fully argued, and a decision may save much future litigation, I am not indisposed to meet it upon the merits.

The question is, whether the navigation from the province of New Brunswick to a port of the United States by an open boat, owned as the present is, is interdicted by the act of 1820. The libel does not charge, that she was employed in trade; and therefore, if the interdiction applies at all, it applies (as has been very correctly remarked by the district judge) as well to cases, where the boat is employed as a ferry boat, or to make a visit, as to cases, where the object is the transportation of merchandise. The argument of the district attorney is, that the boat falls within the general description of the statutes, and is a "vessel" within its terms and meaning; and that she is owned "by a subject or subjects of his Britannic majesty." And if so, she is excluded from entry into our ports. There can be no doubt, that in a general sense a boat is a vessel, for it is a "vehicle in which men or goods are carried on the water," which is one of the definitions of a "vessel" given in our lexicographies; and one of the definitions of a "boat," given in like manner, is, that it is "a vessel to pass the water in," or "a ship of a small size." In a nautical sense, it more usually designates an open vessel, without decks. Whether the word is used in the one sense or the other in a particular statute, must depend upon the context and objects of the statute itself, which may and often do narrow down the general import to specific classes of cases. The object of the act of 1818, c. 65 [3 Story's Laws, 1677 (3 Stat. 432, c. 70)], to which the act of 1820 is an explanatory supplement, is to exclude British navigation from our ports, which should come from any of the British colonies, which were closed against the navigation of the United States. Both acts were in their nature retaliatory; and the subsequent acts of 1822, c. 56 [3 Stat. 681], and of 1823, c. 150 [3 Story's Laws, 1893 (3 Stat. 740, c. 22)], confirm this view in the most ample manner. The doctrine of reciprocity lies at the bottom of all of them, and this principally in regard to the islands and colonies in the West Indies. That the intention of the act of 1820 was to cut off trade and commerce in British ships from New Brunswick to the United States cannot be doubted; that it went farther, and meant to prohibit all intercourse by water with that province in any British craft, is not so clear. If the words of the act would cover such cases, it is by no means as certain, that the policy of the legislature reached to the same extent. It is well known, that the ordinary mode of communication between that province and northeastern frontier ports is by boat navigation; and there does not seem to be any ground to suppose that congress intended to prevent the common travel of visitors, or passengers, to and from that province. The second section of the act is manifestly confined to British vessels, which are allowed and required to enter at the custom-house in the course of trade. But boats of the present description do not fall within this class. The third section applies to cases of the importation of goods from the colonies, and is necessarily confined to commercial intercourse. The same intention is still more completely demonstrated in the act of 1823, which suspends the acts of 1818 and 1820 as to certain colonial ports, and opens trade with them in British vessels. Every provision in this act looks to cases of trade and importation; and to vessels, which by our general laws are allowed to enter and clear at our custom-houses. By the general revenue collection act of 1799, c. 128, § 92 [1 Story's Laws, 656 (1 Stat. 697, c. 22)], no foreign dutiable goods are allowed to be imported from any foreign ports by sea in any vessel, foreign or domestic, of less than thirty tons burthen. And the navigation act of 1817, c. 204 [3 Story's Laws, 1622 (3 Stat. 351, c. 31)], is still more restrictive. I am not aware, that in any of our laws respecting shipping the word "vessel" is applied to any description of boats, like the present. The registry act (Acts 1792, c. 45 [1 Story's Laws, 268; 1 Stat. 287, c. 1]), invariably uses the words "ship or vessel," as descriptive of the class of shipping, which it includes. It contains no limitation by tonnage of the size of the ship or vessel; but the form of the certificate of registry (section 9) supposes, that such ship or vessel has a deck, mast, &c. And the regulations, prescribed by our laws, for ascertaining the tonnage of ships or vessels for the payment of tonnage duty, and for other purposes of admeasurement, refer to such only as have one or more decks. Acts 1799, c. 128, § 64 [1 Story's Laws, 630]. The fair inference deducible from these provisions is, that the registry act was not meant to apply to ships or vessels without any deck. In respect to the coasting trade and fisheries, the same phrase, "ship or vessel," is used in the act of 1793, c. 52 [1 Story's Laws, 285 (1 Stat. 305, c. 8)], for enrolling or licensing them for such business; but no ship or vessel less than five tons in burthen seems within the purview of the act. Sections 1, 4, 26. The form of enrolment, too, presupposes, that the ship or vessel has a deck, mast, &c; and her tonnage is to be ascertained in the same manner, as in case of registered ships. There is a provision also (section 3) that registered ships may be enrolled, and enrolled or licensed ships may be registered, which seems, by implication, to limit their sizes reciprocally to tonnage above five tons, and to such as have a deck or mast. This construction is fortified by the language of the 37th section, which declares, "that nothing in this act shall be construed to extend to any boat, or lighter, not being masted, or if masted, and not decked, employed in the harbour of any town or city." It is plain, from this clause, that boats without masts or decks were not allowed to be enrolled or licensed for the coasting trade or fisheries. And the fishing bounty is confined to "boats or vessels" of more than five tons burthen. See Acts 1813, c. 34, §§ 5, 6 [3 Stat. 49].

There are, also, provisions in our laws, which contemplate importations from foreign countries in vessels of a smaller description. But in such cases, the general term "vessel," is not alone employed, but a more specific description is added. Thus, by the 105th section of the act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 661 (1 Stat. 702, c. 22)], importations are allowed on the northern and northwestern boundaries of the United States, "in vessels or boats of any burthen;" and the next section (section 106) goes on to provide, "that all vessels, boats, rafts, and carriages of what kind or nature soever, arriving in the district aforesaid, containing goods, &c. shall be reported to the collector," &c. A distinction between "boats" and "vessels" is here taken; and a distinction does, in fact, exist in common parlance and maritime usage. The term "vessel" is never, or at least very rarely, used to designate any watercraft without a deck; but the term "boat" is constantly used to designate such small vehicles of this nature, as are without a deck. In Mortimer's Commercial Dictionary, a "boat" is defined to be "a small open vessel, commonly wrought by oars." He says, that the term "ship" is "a general name for all large vessels." And it appears to me, that the general sense, in which the word "vessel" is used in our laws, is in contradistinction to an "open boat," and excluding the latter. Such is its meaning in the act of 1815, c. 246 [2 Story's Laws, 1515 (3 Stat. 231, c. 94)], where it is declared lawful "for any collector &c. to enter on board, search, and examine, any ship, vessel, boat, or raft," &c. See, also, Acts 1802, c. 45, § 8 [2 Stat. 182]. And when the word is found in our laws without any thing in the context to explain or enlarge its meaning, it appears to me a sound rule of interpretation to construe it as used in that sense, which is its most common sense in maritime usage. Especially ought it to receive such an interpretation, when it interferes with no known policy of the legislature, and a different course would involve general inconvenience. The strong inclination of my opinion, therefore, is, that open boats, like the present, even if British owned, if not employed in trade from the British colonies, are not within the scope of the act of 1820. But this case does not turn upon that point alone; and therefore I leave it for an absolute decision, until it forms the single point for judgment.

There is another question of more importance, at least to residents within the United States; and that is, whether this boat was, within the sense of the act of 1820, a vessel "owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of his Britannic majesty." It is certain, that our laws allows aliens to build ships in the United States, and confer upon them privileges, which are denied to ships built and owned in foreign countries. The former are allowed to be recorded in the custom-house, and to receive a certificate thereof, and thereby are subjected to a less tonnage duty than the latter. See Acts 1792, c. 45, §§ 20–22, 24 [1 Story's Laws, 268 (1 Stat. 287, c. 1)]; Acts 1790, c. 57, § 1 [1 Story's Laws, 106 (1 Stat. 135, c. 30)]. It is as clear, that British subjects, domiciled in the United States, are entitled to hold boats of the same description as the present. And I know of no law, which prohibits them from plying between port and port of the United States, so that they are not employed in the coasting trade or fisheries. It does not appear to me reasonable to presume, that congress had any intention to interdict intercourse, except with vessels belonging to British subjects, who retained their national domicil and privileges. If, by the laws of France, British subjects, domiciled in France, might bonâ fide own ships, which would be entitled to the privileges of French shipping, a ship so owned, and bonâ fide bearing the French flag, would not seem to me excluded from commerce with this country by the act of 1820. Without entering into the consideration, how far it is necessary to constitute an excluded ship, that she should be owned and registered according to the British registry acts, I think the true interpretation of the act of 1820 is, that the words therein, "British subject or subjects," mean such subject or subjects as still retain their British domicil, and hold their vessels in the character of British subjects; and not such as have a domicil in the United States, and own vessels, which are protected by the laws of this country, and have their home bonâ fide here. The policy of the United States has not been to interfere with merchants domiciled here; but to exclude shipping sailing under the flag of protection of England; such shipping as, in the sense of the law of nations, would be deemed British shipping. By the law of nations, for all purposes of capture and prize, and national character, this boat would be deemed an American boat, because her domicil is American. My judgment, therefore, is, that upon the first count the case of forfeiture is not made out in point of fact, because this boat is not, in the sense of the act of 1820, owned, in whole or in part, by subjects of his Britannic majesty.

The second count in the libel is founded on the 5th section of the act of 1823, c. 150 [3 Story's Laws, 1893 (3 Stat. 740, c. 22)]. That act opens commercial intercourse and navigation with certain enumerated British colonial ports, and among others, with St. Johns and St. Andrews, in New Brunswick; and declares it lawful to import in any British vessel, coming directly from any of the British colonial ports enumerated in the act, which vessels are navigated by a master and three fourths of the mariners British subjects, any articles of the growth &c. of any of the said British colonies, the importation of which is not from elsewhere prohibited, and which may be exported from the same ports to the United States on equal terms in vessels belonging to the states. It prohibits importations in any other manner, or of any other kinds, from the same colonial ports. The 5th section then proceeds to provide, that it shall be lawful to export from the United States directly to the same colonial ports in any vessel of the United States, or in any British vessel, as above described, any article of the growth &c. of the United States, or any article legally imported therein, the exportation of which elsewhere shall not be prohibited by law &c. And in the close of the section it declares, "and in case any such articles shall be shipped or waterborne for the purpose of being exported contrary to this act, the same shall be forfeited," &c. This is the clause on which the second count of the libel is framed. It propounds, that at Eastport, "sundry goods &c. of the growth &c. of the United States, composing the lading of the open boat aforesaid, were shipped and waterborne in said boat, on the waters of the Bay of Passamaquoddy, in said district, for the purpose of being exported from said States to the province of New Brunswick, in the boat or vessel aforesaid, the said boat or vessel then and there not being a vessel of the United States," &c. The 6th section of the act provides, "that this act &c. shall remain in force as long as the enumerated British colonial ports shall be open to the admission of vessels of the United States, conformably to the provisions of the British act of parliament, of the 24th of June, 1822. St. 3 Geo. IV. c. 44. But if at any time the trade and intercourse between the United States and all or any of the enumerated ports, authorized by the said act of parliament, shall be prohibited by a British order in council, or by act of parliament, then, from the day of the date of such order in council, or act of parliament, or from the time the same shall commence to be in force, proclamation to that effect having been made by the president of the United States, each and every provision of this act, so far as the same shall apply to the intercourse between the United States and the enumerated colonial ports, in British vessels, shall cease to operate in their favour; and each and every provision of the act," of 1818 and 1820, "shall revive and be in full force." The president made his proclamation according to this provision, on the 17th of March, 1827, and thus the acts of 1818 and 1820 were effectively revived. The true interpretation of this 6th section of the act has been matter of considerable argument at the bar. Is it, in the given case of the occlusion of the enumerated British colonial ports, virtually repealed in all its provisions, as to intercourse and trade with them, as the introductory clause seems to intend? Or is it repealed only as to intercourse and trade in British vessels, leaving the intercourse and trade in vessels of the United States under the regulation of the 5th section, as a substantive and existing enactment; as the latter clause of the 6th section seems to intimate? The latter is the construction contended for by the district attorney, and on which the second count rests; the former is maintained by the counsel for the claimant.

The act of 1818 contains no provisions excluding trade, either by way of importation into the United States, or exportation from the United States, except in British vessels. Not a word is said respecting the vessels of the United States, or of any other foreign country, except Great Britain. The 1st and 2d sections of the act of 1820 are limited in the same manner. The 3d section prohibits the importation of any goods, &c. from the province of Nova Scotia, the province of New Brunswick, the islands of Cape Breton, St. Johns, Newfoundland, or their respective dependencies, from the Bermuda islands, the Bahama islands, the islands called Caicos, or the British possessions in the West Indies, or on the continent of America, south of the southern boundary of the United States, except such goods &c. as are the growth &c. of such provinces, islands, and possessions, where the same shall be laden, and from whence they shall be directly imported into the United States. Nothing is said as to exportations from the United States of any goods whatsoever in vessels, not British. The main object of the act of 1823 was to open the intercourse and trade with certain enumerated ports in those prohibited colonial possessions, upon the principles of reciprocity held out by the act of 3 Geo. IV. c. 44. The first four sections respect importations solely in British vessels. In the 5th section, for the first time, occurs any provision relating to exports, and there the phrase is (as has been already stated), it shall be lawful to export from the United States &c. in any vessel of the United States, or in any British vessel, &c. The first remark, that is called for by this posture of our legislation is, that as to British vessels, the whole intercourse and trade, provided for by the act of 1823, is completely suspended, and the exclusion of them, by the acts of 1818 and 1820, entirely revived. Thus the retaliatory system is put into complete operation; and that, which alone seemed within the legislative intention, the exclusion of British ships coming from, or going to, ports, where American ships were excluded, universally prohibited. The next remark is, that no legislative intention is any where avowed to interdict trade or intercourse in American vessels to or from any colonial ports. The next remark is, that though the 5th section of the act of 1823, contains an affirmative clause, that it shall be lawful to export from the United States to the enumerated ports, in any vessel of the United States, any goods &c.; yet there is no prohibitory clause, declaring any such exportation in any vessels, not of the United States, and not British, unlawful. Now, upon general principles of interpretation, no prohibition can be implied from merely affirmative words. The affirmative words may repeal or suspend a prohibition theretofore created, but per se they cannot create one. The forfeiture in the last clause of the 5th section applies only to cases, where articles shall be shipped or waterborne, for the purpose of being exported, "contrary to the provisions of the act." To inflict it, therefore, it must be established, that some prohibition exists in the act, which has been violated. Where is the prohibition of such exportation in vessels not British, and not strictly vessels of the United States in the sense of the registry act? None such has been pointed out; and if it had existed, it would not have escaped the scrutinizing sagacity of the district attorney. Assuming, then, that the 5th section, as to vessels of the United States, remains in full force, it is merely affirmative; there was no antecedent prohibition of exportation other than in British vessels; the present boat is not, in the sense of the act, such a British vessel; and consequently the second count falls for want of sufficient facts to maintain its vital averments.

The decree of the district court must be affirmed and restitution accordingly.

Case No. 15,968.

UNITED STATES v. OPEN BOAT.

[5 Mason, 232.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1829.

NONINTERCOURSE LAWS—BRITISH COLONIES—OPEN BOATS—FORFEITURE OF CARGO—BURDEN OF PROOF—PRACTICE.

1. Under the act of May 15, 1820, c. 122 [3 Stat. 602], prohibiting commercial intercourse from the British colonies in British ships, British owned vessels are included in the prohibition, although not registered or navigated according to the British navigation and registry acts.

2. But open boats, without decks, are not included in the prohibition.

3. The forfeiture, under the act, attaches to the cargo on board at the time the vessel enters, or attempts to enter our ports; and not to any cargo subsequently taken on board, though on board at the time of the seizure.

4. Where goods are seized, and claimed as forfeited as part of the cargo, the onus probandi is on the government to prove, that such goods were part of the cargo on board at the time of the offence.

5. The claimant may file a special defence on that point, if he chooses; but it is also in issue on the general denial of the allegations of the libel.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

Libel of seizure against an open boat and her lading, seized in fact at Eastport on navigable waters for a violation of the laws of the United States, on the 4th of January, 1828, by the collector of the district of Passamaquoddy. At the trial in the district court, a decree of condemnation was pronounced against the boat and all her lading, except 7 barrels of flour, 2 barrels of pork, and 13 bags of meal, for default of any claim. [Case unreported.] The excepted goods were claimed by Bucknam and Gunnison of Eastport; and upon a subsequent hearing a decree of acquittal passed by consent in favour of the claimants; from which decree an appeal was taken in behalf of the United States to the circuit court.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Mr. Shepley, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Mr. Daveis, for claimants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The present libel contains two counts. The first is founded upon the revenue collection act of 1799, c. 128, § 92 [1 Story's Laws, 656; 1 Stat. 697, c. 22], which declares, that "no goods &c. of foreign growth or manufacture, subject to the payment of duties, shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place, in any other manner than by sea, nor in any ship or vessel of less than thirty tons burthen," &c. with certain exceptions, which do not apply to the present case. The count alleges, that sundry foreign goods &c. were imported from a foreign port in this boat, the same being less than thirty tons burthen, against the form of the statute, &c. This count has been abandoned for want of evidence to support it, and may therefore be put entirely out of the case. The second count is founded on the act of May 15, 1820, c. 122 [3 Stat. 602], prohibiting commercial intercourse with the British colonies. That act declares, that "the ports of the United States shall be and remain closed against every vessel owned wholly or in part by subjects or a subject of his Britannic majesty coming or arriving by sea from any port or place in the province of Lower Canada, or coming or arriving from any port or place in the province of New Brunswick, the province of Nova Scotia, &c. And every such vessel so excluded from the ports of the United States, that shall enter or attempt to enter the same in violation of this act, shall, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited to the United States." The second count alleges, that the boat is British owned, came and arrived by sea from some port or place in the province of New Brunswick, within the port of Lubec; and entered the same port, and was employed in trade between said foreign port or place and the United States, contrary to the form of the statute. The facts admitted to be true are, that the boat is an open boat, with a fore-cuddy, of six or seven tons burthen. She is owned by British subjects, and belongs to a place called La Tete, in the province of New Brunswick, and came from thence in ballast to Eastport, where she took on board a cargo of American growth and origin, for the purpose of carrying the same to the river Maguagadavie in the same province. After her cargo was on board and before sailing, she was seized by the collector for an asserted violation of the laws of the United States.

Before I proceed to the main question, it may be well to dispose of those, which have been discussed at the bar, as in some sort of a preliminary nature.

The first question is, whether the goods now claimed are liable to forfeiture at all, it not being established by any direct proof in the cause, that they constituted any part of the cargo of the boat. This point was not made in the court below, and now comes by surprize upon the government. Under such circumstances, if the cause turned upon it, I should have no difficulty in postponing a final decision until an opportunity was given to bring this matter of fact before the court. The district attorney supposes, that enough appears upon the record to raise a presumption, that these goods were part of the cargo of the boat, especially as the claim does not set up any such special defence. The claim is, indeed, in a very general form, and quite too general and imperfect to found an exact denial of the allegations of the libel, if legal nicety had been insisted upon in the earlier proceedings. It was, without doubt, competent for the claimants to have taken the present objection by a special answer, or exception, if they had chosen so to do. But if their claim and answer contain a general denial of all the matters in the libel, every fact alleged in the libel and necessary to maintain the asserted forfeiture, must be affirmatively established by the government; for the case does not fall within the 71st section of the revenue collection act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 633, 1 Stat. 678, c. 22]. Now it is very clear, that upon the language of the act of 1820, no goods are forfeited, unless they are part of the cargo on board the vessel; and consequently that fact must be affirmatively established by the United States. I see no sufficient proof to this effect on the record; and there is some presumption against it; for the boat, on board of which these goods were laden, is said to have been given up by the collector; and the boat, to which the present libel attaches, has been condemned and sold under the process of the court. So that (to say the least of it) there is sufficient doubt to call for some farther proof and explanation.

A more material question is, what is the true construction of the act of 1820, as to the cargo liable to condemnation? Is it the cargo on board at the time of committing the offense, that is to say, at the time of the illegal entry, or attempt to enter; or the cargo on board at the time of the seizure, however long afterwards that may be made? The latter construction is insisted on by the district attorney; and the former is contended for on the other side. My opinion is, that the cargo intended by the act is the cargo on board at the time, when the vessel enters, or attempts to enter the port. The words are, "every such vessel, &c. that shall enter or attempt to enter, &c. shall, with her tackle, &c. together with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited." The offence is committed, and the forfeiture is complete at the moment of the entry, or the attempt to enter. If she has no cargo then on board, none is subjected to forfeiture; for the words of the act do not look to any future events to impose a new forfeiture. The cargo affected with forfeiture is deemed in some sort a participator in the offence, and involved in the guilt of the vehicle. If the legislature had intended to subject every future cargo taken on board by the vessel to forfeiture, as tainted by association with the offending vessel, the natural language would have been, that every such vessel, together with the cargo found on board at the time of seizure, although not on board at the time of the offence, shall be forfeited. But the language used is different, and just such as must have been used, if the cargo to be forfeited was to be on board contemporary with the offence. It is difficult to read it, and not to perceive, that the vessel, her tackle, &c. and her cargo on board, are to be affected with the forfeiture at the same instant of time. The effect of a different construction would be to create a sort of floating, and fluctuating forfeiture, attaching to different things at different times. Thus, if various cargoes were put on board at subsequent periods between the time of the offence and the seizure, one of two things must happen; either, that the forfeiture would attach to each successive cargo taken on board, and thus be cumulative on all; or that the cargo found on board, though innocent, would be subjected to the offence, and discharge every antecedent cargo from it. The original cargo on board at the time of the offence might in this way escape, although embraced in the corpus delicti; and an entirely innocent cargo, belonging to persons in utter ignorance of it, become the victim. The forfeiture would thus be in suspense until the moment of seizure, and depend, not upon association in crime, but upon the choice, or caprice, or diligence of the seizing officer, as to the time of seizure. I do not say, that such a course of legislation might not exist; and if it did, the court would be bound to act upon it. But it would be so extraordinary and unprecedented, so dissonant from the principles of general justice and convenience, and so subversive of private security and private rights, that it would require very strong and direct expressions on the part of the legislature to justify such an interpretation of its acts.

The case of The Two Friends [Case No. 14,289], has been cited by the district attorney in favour of his construction of the statute. If I could view that case in the same light, it would very much abate my confidence in that decision on the particular point, for which it is now cited; although it would still be maintainable upon the other grounds stated in the opinion of the court. But I am of opinion, that nothing in that case touches the present in point of principle. That was the case of a coasting vessel, which was seized, while she was engaged in the coasting trade under a coasting license, regularly granted. The material objections against her were, that during the time the license was in force she was transferred to a British subject, and that she was engaged in a trade, for which she was not licensed. The 32d section of the coasting act of 1793, c. 52 [1 Story's Laws, 298; 1 Stat. 316], (c. 8), declares, that if any licensed ship or vessel shall be transferred in whole or in part, to any person, who is not at the time of such transfer a citizen of or resident within the United States, or if such ship or vessel shall be employed in any other trade than that, for which she is licensed, or shall be found with a forged or altered license, or one granted for any other ship or vessel, every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, &c. and the cargo found on board her, shall be forfeited. The court held, that the cargo found on board at the time of the seizure was forfeited. But that decision proceeded upon the ground of the peculiar language of the act, and the consideration, that the forfeiture was a continuing forfeiture by the vessel's still sailing and acting illegally under the license up to the very time of the seizure. If the vessel had ceased to be engaged in the coasting trade, and had afterwards taken an innocent cargo on board, there is nothing in that opinion, which decides, that such a cargo, under such circumstances would have been forfeited. And here I might stop. But I am given to understand, that the important question, which the parties wish to have settled, and which was the main object of the present appeal, is, whether a boat of the description of that under seizure, owned by British subjects, resident in a British province, is within the prohibitions of the act of 1820. The point has been fully argued in the present case, as well as in a former case before this court; and as all parties press for a decision upon it, and it is of great interest to the inhabitants of Maine bordering on the British provinces, the court will not decline to express its opinion. The true answer depends upon the point, whether an open boat, owned by a British subject, is a vessel within the meaning of the act of 1820. In the case of U. S. v. An Open Boat [Case No. 15,967], Noyes, claimant, decided at the last October term, at Wiscasset, the point was much discussed; and the reasoning of the court led to the conclusion (though there was no absolute decision) that an open boat, without decks or masts, was not a "vessel" within the purview of the statute, because in a nautical sense, as well as in the sense of our revenue and navigation laws, the term "vessel" is used in contradistinction to such boats, to indicate a class of larger sized shipping. I do not go over the illustrations used on that occasion, because the case is already before the public; but I advert to it simply to state, that further reflection has induced me to adhere to that opinion. The boat now before the court could not be lawfully employed in any trade from the province of New Brunswick to the United States, with goods of foreign growth or manufacture; because such trade is prohibited by the act of 1799, c. 128, § 92 [1 Story's Laws, 656; 1 Stat. 697, c. 22], to vessels of less than thirty tons. She was not in fact so employed. Unless she was prohibited from an entry into our ports, the subsequent act of receiving a cargo on board of American growth for a return voyage to New Brunswick constituted no offence. The words of the act of 1820 do not, in my judgment, prohibit such an entry, or such an exportation. This court is not at liberty to look beyond the words of the act for the policy, which governed its provisions. The words must be construed according to their natural import, taken in connexion with other statutes for the regulation of commerce. It is a well known rule, that penal statutes are construed strictly; and that forfeitures are not to be inflicted by straining the words so as to reach some conjectural policy, not avowed on the face of the statute. Even where cases lie within the same mischief, if they are not provided for in the text of the act, courts of justice do not adventure on the usurpation of legislative authority to meet them. I must confess too, that if I were at liberty to travel out of the words of the act, and consult any supposed public policy of the government, there is no clear ground, upon which I could affirm, that boats of this description were intended by the government to be excluded from our ports, or were prohibited from carrying goods from our ports to the British colonies.

One argument, much pressed by the counsel for the claimants in the former, as well as in the present case, requires to be noticed. It is, that no British owned vessels are within the act of 1820, except such as are British owned and navigated in the sense of the British navigation and registry acts. It is said, and said truly, that this court, sitting in admiralty, may take notice of these acts; and that the very terms of our prohibitory and retaliatory acts invite the court to such an examination, by the references, which are tacitly made to the British system. But, giving whatever force we may to this line of argument, it must still be conceded, that our own acts must be construed by their own words; and that though the causes of our prohibitory system may be found in the corresponding British legislation, yet it by no means follows, that congress was bound to stop, where that stopped; or intended to confine its own enactments to the existing state of the British shipping laws. The court then is not called upon to impose any limitation upon the words of the act of 1820, which they do not of themselves import. The words are "every vessel owned, wholly or in part, by a subject or subjects of his Britannic majesty." Now, a vessel may fall within this category, although she is not registered or navigated according to the British acts, so as to entitle her to the statute benefits of a British character. British ownership is one thing; a title to the benefits of the British navigation acts is quite another thing. A different construction would make our own legislation dependant on the state of the British laws at every moment; and a slight relaxation of them in favour of her own colonial navigation would at once defeat our whole system, and reduce it to a dead letter. What authority has this court to presume, that so obvious a result was not within the scope of the legislation of congress, and intentionally provided for? The words of the act of 1820 cover such a case; and how can this court say, that they are to be narrowed down, so as to be inoperative, where they would be most needed, in cases within the same mischief, and justifying the same retaliation? My opinion is, that every vessel owned by British subjects, domiciled in the British dominions, is within the intent of the act; and that though our retaliatory system looked to the state of the British laws, it meant to meet them, not in their form, but in their principle, however that might be varied.

Upon the whole my opinion is, that the decree of the district court must be affirmed; but I shall certify that there was reasonable cause of seizure. Decree accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. The ORION. See Case No. 10,575.

Case No. 15,969.

UNITED STATES v. ORMSBY.

[3 Wash. C. C. 195.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1813.

ARMY CONTRACTOR'S ACCOUNTS — SETTLEMENT — INTEREST.

The defendant settled his account at the treasury department, in 1808, on which a balance was stated against him. In 1812, he claimed further credits, which were allowed to him, and which reduced the balance claimed from him in 1808. The court instructed the jury to allow interest on the actual balance, from 1808.

[1] [Originally published from the MS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

Action on the case, for the balance of an account, settled at the treasury department. The defendant, under a special contract with the government, to furnish certain supplies to the army, received advances of money; and upon a settlement of his account at the treasury, in May, 1808, a balance of about 2200 dollars was found to be due from him. He afterwards, viz. in March, 1812, claimed other credits, which had not been allowed in May, 1808, but to which the treasury department, in March, 1812, was satisfied he was entitled; and being then admitted, reduced the balance to 1616 dollars. The only question was, whether the United States were entitled to interest on the 1616 dollars, from May, 1808, or from March, 1812.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. Interest ought to be given from the first named period; and cannot be affected by the subsequent allowance of a credit not known, nor perhaps proved, when the first settlement was made.

Case No. 15,970.

UNITED STATES v. ORTEGA et al.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 135.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT.

This claim is valid for the portion petitioned for by Maria Clara Ortega and Julius Martin.

Claim [by Quintin Ortega and others] for [the Rancho San Ysidro] one league of land in Santa Clara county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.
Stanly & King, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It appears from the expediente on file in the archives that Quintin Ortega, in the year 1833, petitioned Governor Figueroa for a title to a tract of land granted to his father, Ignacio Ortega, by Don Joaquin Arrillaga, in 1809. The governor made the usual reference for information, and by the reports made to him it appeared that for more than twenty years, and in fact from 1809 until his decease in 1829 or 1830, the land had belonged to and been in possession of Ignacio Ortega, and that since that time his son and two daughters had continued to occupy it. On the third of June, 1833, the governor made his concession, granting to Quintin Ortega and his sisters, Maria Clara Ortega and Maria Isabel Ortega, the rancho called San Ysidro, bounded by the Mission of San Juan Bautista, by the ranchos of Animas and Las Llagas, and by the mountains—"the land being conceded in equal parts and subject to the stipulated conditions." These conditions, it is evident from the subsequent proceedings, related to the division of the land among the grantees, for the governor appears to have issued three documentos or titles, each granting a third part of the land included within the boundaries embraced in his decree of concession. By the documento issued to Maria Clara Ortega, wife of John Gilroy, there was granted to her a part of the rancho of San Ysidro, bounded by the Rancho de Las Animas and the mountain, and the parts which appertain to her brother Quintin and her sister Maria Isabel. The quantity of land granted is limited to one square league, and the sobrante is reserved in the usual terms. This grant, as well as those to Quintin and Maria Isabel for their portions of the rancho, was approved by the departmental assembly on the seventeenth of May, 1834. There seems to be no doubt of the genuineness of the grants in these cases, or of the occupation and cultivation of the land by the grantees and their father since 1809. It appears from the opinion of the board of commissioners that the claim of Quintin Ortega to the portion of San Ysidro granted to him, was confirmed in a separate suit instituted on his behalf, and as the petition filed does not embrace the claim of Maria Isabel, there only remains to be passed upon in this case the claim of Maria Clara and that of Julius Martin, who derives his title by deed from her and her husband, dated January 8, 1852. With respect to the boundary line of "Las Animas," which is also the boundary of that portion of San Ysidro granted to Maria Clara, some disputes have arisen. But for the reasons assigned in the opinion in that case, such disputes cannot in this proceeding be settled. It is clear that both claims are valid as against the United States. The precise location of the boundary line between the coterminous ranchos must be settled either by the surveyor general or by the proper tribunals of the country. The claimant, Maria Clara Ortega, is, therefore, entitled to a decree of confirmation for the portion of San Ysidro granted to her to the extent of one league, and bounded as described in the grant, excepting therefrom the part conveyed by her and her husband to Julius Martin, for which a decree must be entered in favor of said Martin.

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 15,971.

UNITED STATES v. ORTEGA.

[4 Wash. C. C. 531.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1825.

PROOF OF FOREIGN LAWS—PAROL EVIDENCE—ASSAULT ON FOREIGN MINISTER.

1. The unwritten law of a foreign government may be proved by parol evidence, but the written law can only be proved by itself.

[Cited in Lattourett v. Cook, 1 Iowa, 1; State v. Behrman, 114 N. C. 797, 19 S. E. 223.]

2. What constitutes an assault?

[Cited in Kirland v. State, 43 Ind. 150.]

3. Upon an indictment for an assault committed on the charge d'affaires of a foreign government, proof that the person assaulted is received and recognized by the executive of the United States, is conclusive as to his public character; and that he is entitled to all the immunities of a foreign minister.

[Cited in U. S. v. Benner, Case No. 14,568; Ex parte Baiz, 135 U. S. 424, 10 Sup. Ct. 859.]

[Cited in People v. Jones, 24 Mich. 226.]

4. If a foreign minister commits the first assault, he forfeits his immunity so far as to excuse the defendant for returning it.

5. It is no defence upon such indictment that defendant was ignorant of the public character of the minister.

[Cited in U. S. v. Benner, Case No. 14,568.]

The defendant was indicted for an assault upon the person of Mr. Salmon, the Spanish charge d'affaires, and for infracting the law of nations by committing violence upon his person. These charges were contained in two separate indictments, both of which were tried at the same time. The facts of the case, as proved by Mr. Salmon (who presented himself to the court as a voluntary witness), were as follows. On the night of the 17th of September last, whilst the witness was returning from the circus, he heard the steps of some person walking gently behind him. The defendant came up to him, and seizing the breast of his coat, said, angrily: "Mr. Salmon, I am Ortega, you have insulted me, and I seek satisfaction." The answer was, "I have not insulted you, but you now insult me—let me go." "No," replied the defendant, "I have got you now, and I will not let you go, unless you will promise to give me satisfaction, for you have published many falsehoods against me." Mr. Salmon replied, that he had published nothing against him, but in answer to a very insulting manifesto of his against all kings, and especially against his government. He further added: "Is it so long after your arrival that you seek satisfaction for an old offence; and is this the way you demand it? Have you no friend to send on such an errand? You know who I am, and where I live." The defendant, still retaining his hold, Salmon again desired him to let him go, threatening to strike him if he did not. The defendant answered: "You need not strike me, for I shall fight you in another place"; and then inquired if he had any arms about him? Mr. Salmon replied that he had not, for he professed to be a peaceable man. The defendant observed, that he had none either, but that he could easily procure them, if Mr. Salmon would fight. Mr. Salmon answered that he should fight him immediately, if he did not release him. All remonstrances proving fruitless, Mr. Salmon thrust the defendant with the point of his umbrella, which was returned by a blow with another umbrella. The fight continued for some time, when Mr. Salmon, having greatly the advantage, having hold of his cravat with his back fixed against the wall, a Mr. Smith came up, and desired them to separate. Mr. Salmon agreed to release the defendant if he would promise to keep the peace. This, after some hesitation, was promised, and the defendant was released. But almost immediately afterwards the defendant again approached Mr. Salmon in a menacing attitude, with one of his arms raised. Mr. Smith immediately interposed, and after reminding the defendant of his promise, told him, that if he was determined to have a fight, he must first fight him. This put an end to the affray; and the parties separated. Another witness, Mr. Wallace, stated, that he passed the parties, who were talking in Spanish, with apparent ill blood, and that he did not observe the defendant to have hold of Mr. Salmon. He stopped at a short distance from them, and remained till the fight was over. To prove the public character of Mr. Salmon, the following evidence was given. An official letter from Mr. Anduaga, the Spanish minister, just previous to his departure from the United States, addressed to the secretary of state of the United States, dated 15th of March, 1823, informing him that he had appointed Mr. Salmon charge d'affaires of his Catholic majesty in the United States; and another letter to the same effect, from the same person, addressed to Mr. Salmon. A letter from the secretary of state, dated the 20th of the same month, addressed to Mr. Anduaga, in answer to the above, recognizing the character of Mr. Salmon, and stating he should with pleasure correspond with him. Two letters from the secretary of state, dated the 4th of April, 1823, and the 24th of September last, addressed to Mr. Salmon as charge d'affaires; the latter being in answer to one addressed to the department complaining of the outrage committed by the defendant, in which the secretary regrets the circumstance, and states, in substance, that the public prosecutor would do what was proper on the occasion.

Mr. Brent, the chief clerk in the department of state, was then examined; who deposed, that Mr. Salmon was recognized by the president as charge d'affaires, on the retiring of Mr. Anduaga, and was accredited by the secretary of state, who has continued to correspond with him as such, from the departure of Mr. Anduaga, until within a short time past. Mr. Salmon stated upon his examination, that Mr. Anduaga was appointed minister to the United States, under what was termed the constitutional government, which was established on the 9th of March, 1820, and might be said to have terminated about the 1st of October, 1823. To prove that the public character of Mr. Salmon was known to the defendant, two letters from the latter to the former, dated in May, 1824, addressed to him as charge d'affaires, were read. The counsel for the defendant offered to prove, by a witness, the contents of two decrees of the king of Spain, bearing date the 1st and 20th of October, 1823, as well as another called the "Decree of Purification," issued in December, 1824, for the purpose of showing that Mr. Salmon, not having complied with the last decree, ceased to be a minister of the Spanish king. The court refused to permit such evidence to be given, stating that, although the unwritten law of foreign countries may be proved by witnesses, the written law could be proved only by itself. To prove that a charge d'affaires is a public minister, entitled to the same privileges, immunities, and protection, and that it is sufficient, though he has no letters of credence, if he be received by the government to which he is sent, and personally presented, the district attorney referred to 8 Merl. Repert. p. 238. He contended that the public character of Mr. Salmon was abundantly proved.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The counsel for the defendant insisted, (1) That the alleged assault by the defendant was not sufficiently proved, the evidence of Mr. Wallace upon that point being opposed to that of Mr. Salmon. That even if it were not, it is no assault for one person gently to lay his hand upon another, or to take him by the coat, as Mr. Salmon states was done in this case. That the first assault was committed by Mr. Salmon, which will justify a battery committed even on a foreign minister; for which was cited U. S. v. Liddle [Case No. 15,598], decided in this court in 1807. (2) That no evidence had been given sufficient to prove that the defendant knew the public character of Mr. Salmon, without which the offence is not made out. For although Mr. Salmon may have been charge d'affaires in 1824, yet the defendant had reason to believe that he was displaced by virtue of the Spanish decrees, particularly that of purification. (3) The minister, Mr. Anduaga, had no authority to appoint Mr. Salmon charge d'affaires; the appointment could be made only by the government of Spain. But if he had the power, still, the official character of that gentleman ceased with the constitutional government, and could only revive by a new appointment of the king upon his restoration, of which no evidence has been given. They denied that the recognition of his public character by the executive of the United States, was sufficient evidence of his being a minister, and entitled to the immunities of one. Cases cited: Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 4, c. 7, §§ 80–83; Id. c. 8, § 111; 2 Burl. 366; Wicquefort, Ambassadors, 18, 112, 113; Cas. Temp. Talb. 282; 4 Inst. 153; Mart. Law Nat. 198.

The District Attorney, for the United States.

J. R. Ingersoll and S. Chew, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). This is a prosecution instituted by the United States, for the purpose of vindicating the law of nations and of the United States, offended, as is charged, in the person of a foreign minister, by an assault committed on him by the defendant. It is a case which cannot fail to be highly interesting both to the defendant and to our government. To the former, on account of the punishment which might be the consequence of conviction; and to the latter, because the government of the United States, like that of all civilized nations, is bound to afford redress for the violation of those privileges and immunities which the law of nations confers upon foreign ministers, and which are consecrated by the practice of the civilized world. A neglect, or refusal to perform this duty might lead to retaliation upon our own ministers abroad, and even to war. The case, therefore, from its importance, recommends itself to the gravest attention both of the court and of the jury.

There are two questions for your consideration: (1) Is the charge, that an assault was committed by the defendant upon the person of Mr. Salmon, sufficiently proved? If it be, then (2) Was Mr. Salmon a public minister at the time the assault was made?

1. (After summing up the evidence as before stated, the judge proceeds:) It was argued by the counsel for the defendant, that, to constitute an assault, it must be accompanied by some act of violence. The mere taking hold of the coat, or laying the hand gently upon the person of another, it is said, does not amount to this offence; and that nothing more is proved in this case, even by Mr. Salmon. It is very true that these acts may be done, very innocently, without offending the law. If done in friendship, for a benevolent purpose, and the like, the act would certainly not amount to an assault. But these acts, if done in anger, or a rude and insolent manner, or with a view to hostility, amount, not only to an assault, but to a battery. Even striking at a person, though no blow be inflicted, or raising the arm to strike, or holding up one's fist at him, if done in anger or in a menacing manner, are considered by the law as assaults. It is then for you to say whether, from the evidence which has been given in the cause, Mr. Salmon was seized, or laid hold of, by the defendant, in kindness and for a justifiable cause, or in anger and with hostile intentions? If the latter, it is an unquestionable case of assault and battery.

It was further argued by the defendant's counsel, that the only witness to prove the assault, is the party who considers himself to have been aggrieved, and therefore, that his evidence ought to be received with great caution, particularly, as another witness, Mr. Wallace, who was present, did not observe the defendant to have hold of Mr. Salmon's coat. It is for the jury to say, whether the evidence of this fact, as stated by Mr. Salmon, is contradicted by Mr. Wallace; and if it be, whose statement is most to be believed; and whether this latter witness, who deposed that he passed the parties in the night and stopped at some paces from them, had it as much in his power to give them correct information in relation to this fact, as Mr. Salmon, who was immediately engaged in the transaction had? If there be no absolute contradiction, the mere circumstance that the testimony given in support of the prosecution is by the party alleged to be aggrieved, ought to have very little influence in the decision of the case. The law makes him a competent witness. He has no interest whatever in the decision of the case; and, if his character be unimpeached, his testimony given in such a manner as not to justify a suspicion of his want of strict veracity, and he stands uncontradicted by other testimony, he is a credible witness, and entitled to be believed. Again, it has been insisted, that, by waving his privilege in becoming a voluntary witness, he has himself violated the law of nations, and his duty to his sovereign. If this be so, that is a matter to be settled by them. We have nothing to do with it. It deprives him neither of his competency, nor of his credibility.

But should the jury feel doubts as to the first assault, on the ground of any discrepance in the evidence, the witnesses all agree that, after Mr. Salmon released the defendant upon his promise to keep the peace, the defendant again approached him in a hostile, or menacing manner, with his arm raised, when a further conflict was prevented by the commendable interposition of Mr. Smith. That this act amounted to an assault admits of not the slightest doubt, and brings the case within the provisions of the twenty-seventh [28th] section of the crime act of 1790 [1 Stat. 118], provided Mr. Salmon was a foreign minister; which is the second point to be considered.

2. Was Mr. Salmon a foreign minister, at the time the alleged offence was committed? The following evidence has been given to prove the public character of this gentleman. (Here the evidence before mentioned was stated to the jury.) The counsel for the defendant have gone into a rigid examination of the credentials of Mr. Salmon. They deny that any thing short of credentials emanating from the sovereign, from some department of his government charged to perform duties of this nature, could constitute him a minister; and, that, even if the appointment of a minister under the constitutional government of Spain was sufficient, it became void by the revolution, which restored the king to his former power, and rendered a reappointment necessary.

If these were questions fit for judicial inquiry and decision, we should say that the appointment of a charge d'affaires by a foreign minister, upon his retiring from the station to which he had been appointed, is usual in practice; and if he be recognized as such by that branch of the government which is authorised to receive ministers, and with which he is to transact the business of his own sovereign, his character of minister is unquestionable. And further, that if, after the constitutional government of Spain terminated, a reappointment, or a recognition, by the king, of the public character of this gentleman were necessary, still, as he is found, after a lapse of about two years, the recognized minister of Spain by our government, we ought to presume that his sovereign has done all that he thought necessary to clothe him with that character.

But the conclusive answer to these arguments is, that these are matters of state, with which courts of justice have nothing to do. The constitution of the United States having vested in the president the power to receive ambassadors and other public ministers, has necessarily bestowed upon that branch of the government, not only the right, but the exclusive right, to judge of the credentials of the ministers so received; and so long as they continue to be recognized and treated by the president as ministers, the other branches of the government are bound to consider them as such. If courts of justice could sit in judgment upon the decision of the executive in reference to the public character of a foreign minister, and by pronouncing him to be unduly appointed, or improperly recognized, deprive him of the privileges of a minister, what an extraordinary anomaly would such an interference present to the world! The individual who should be placed in this predicament, would, for all the purposes of his own, and of this government, be a minister, the representative of his sovereign, authorised to transact the business with which he is charged, and to bind his sovereign, whilst acting in obedience to his orders; and yet, he would be no minister in the view of the judiciary, and, of course, not entitled to the protection due from that character. In other words, a public minister without the privileges and immunities of one. For, notwithstanding this judicial interference, he would still continue to be a minister as long as the president should continue to recognize him as such; and no judgment of a court of justice could deprive him of that character, although it should withhold from him the sanctity appertaining to it. Besides, if it belong to courts of justice to meddle with these matters, and looking beyond the acts and conduct of the president, to decide a person recognized by him as a foreign minister, to be no minister, surely that branch of the government ought to possess all the lights to guide their judgment which are possessed by the president, and should consequently be empowered to call for and to expose to public view, the archives of state, and the correspondence of the executive of this nation with foreign nations, in relation to the subject on which the decision is to be made. Yet, who would be wild enough to maintain a proposition so extravagant and absurd?

The principles which have been stated are those which governed this court in U. S. v. Liddle [Case No. 15,598], decided in 1807; in which it was stated, that the certificate of the secretary of state, that the person claiming to be a charge d'affaires, was received and recognized as such by the executive of this government, was the best evidence which could be given of that fact. The only proper inquiry, in short, in cases of this nature is, has the person, claiming to be a foreign minister, been received and recognized as such by the executive of this government? If he has, the evidence of those facts is not only sufficient, but in our opinion, conclusive upon the subject of his privileges as a minister. Such has been the nature of the evidence given in this case.

It now remains only to notice two or three arguments of the counsel, upon which some reliance was placed. It seemed to be supposed by the district attorney, that even if the first assault had been made by Mr. Salmon on the defendant, the blow which was returned would have been an offence under the act of congress. But this is not the opinion of the court. A foreign minister, by committing the first assault, so far loses his privilege, that he cannot complain of an infraction of the law of nations; if in his turn, he should be assaulted by the party aggrieved. This was decided by this court in Liddle's Case.

It was insisted by the defendant's counsel, that it is incumbent on the prosecutor to prove that the public character of Mr. Salmon was known to the defendant at the time this transaction took place. If this position could be maintained, still, as it is shown by the defendant's letters to Mr. Salmon in May, 1824, that he then knew that gentleman to be the Spanish charge d'affaires; if he had afterwards ceased to be so, it lay on the defendant to prove it. Knowing him once to have been entitled to this character, he acted at his peril if it should turn out that that character still continued; or if indeed the reverse should not be proved. But in point of law, it is immaterial whether the defendant knew that the person assaulted was charge d'affaires or not, and this point also was decided in the case before referred to of U. S. v. Liddle.

As to the Spanish decrees, alluded to by the counsel for the defendant; there is no evidence given of them, and consequently they are not to be noticed by the jury. It is impossible for the court or jury to say whether they do, or do not affect Mr. Salmon.

The jury returned with a verdict finding the defendant guilty.

NOTE. A motion in arrest of judgment was made on the ground that this was a case affecting a foreign minister, and that therefore the circuit court had not jurisdiction. This point was taken to the supreme court upon a pro forma certificate of a division of opinion in this court, and there decided in favour of the jurisdiction. 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 467.

UNITED STATES (OSBORNE v.). See Case No. 10,599.

Case No. 15,971a.

UNITED STATES v. OSGOOD.

[Betts, Scr. Bk. 27.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1839.

FORGERY OF PENSION PAPERS.

[1. Forgery is the false making of a paper, but it need not be the entire fabrication thereof. Any addition to a genuine paper, or any alteration of it in an essential particular, so as to give it a different meaning, is a forgery.]

[2. Aiding or assisting in forging papers with intent to defraud the government consists in the commission of any act having a tendency to forward or facilitate a forgery committed by another. The degree of aid or assistance is unimportant. To trace a name with a pencil, afterwards filled up with another in ink, or to take measures to prevent surprise or detection while the forgery is being committed would be such an act.]

[3. To forge the name of the magistrate to the jurat of an affidavit is a forgery of the affidavit, within the meaning of the law.]

[This was an indictment for forgery against Walter F. Osgood.]

BETTS, District Judge, stated to the jury, that the act of congress prohibited, under highly penal sanctions, the commission of forgeries for the purpose of defrauding the government of the United States. The indictment charges the prisoner at the bar with having been concerned in the forgery of certain affidavits or paper writings, with intent to defraud the government, or an agent of the government for the payment of pensions. The statute anticipates three various ways in which this offence may be committed, and the indictment charges the prisoner to have violated the act in each of those particulars. The prisoner can only be tried upon the accusations stated in the indictment, and the jury must first ascertain with clearness, what the offences are upon which he stands arraigned, and by what acts he is accused of having committed them. The offences prohibited by the statute, and designated in the indictment, may be arranged in three classes; each class having its appropriate signification, and modes of proof. The first class is (1) forgery, aiding or assisting in forgery; and causing or procuring to be forged the paper writings set out in the indictment. Forgery is the false making of a paper. This false making need not be the entire fabrication of the paper; any addition to a genuine paper, or any alteration of it in an essential particular, so as to give it a different importance and meaning, is a forgery; and if this change is made for the purpose of defrauding the government, it is a felony, the crime interdicted by the statute. Aiding or assisting in forging consists in the commission of any act having a tendency to forward or facilitate a forgery committing by another. The degree of aid or assistance is unimportant; if what is done is, in any manner, calculated to promote the forgery, the act comes within the statute. To trace a name with a pencil, afterwards filled up with another in ink, would be such an act; so taking measures to prevent surprise or detection, whilst the forgery is actually committing, would be aiding and assisting in its commission. Causing or procuring a forgery to be committed would be the use of any persuasion or influence inducing another to commit it. In several of the first counts of this indictment, these acts are all charged to have been committed by the prisoner, in relation to several papers,—the affidavit of Benjamin C. Dubois; that of Hugh Stephenson, and of Samuel Loyd. These papers would not be perfect or complete, so as to answer the purpose they were prepared for, without being authenticated by the attestation of a magistrate. A simple statement of facts by a party claiming a pension, would be of no avail to him; to render the paper of service, it must be regularly sworn to. The jurat, accordingly, became an essential and vital part of the paper, giving to it that character without which it would not be acted on by the war department. To forge the name of the magistrate, would, therefore, be deemed, in judgment of law, the forgery of the affidavit, so as to support an indictment alleging the forgery, not of the name of the magistrate only, but of the paper itself.

The testimony shows beyond all grounds for doubt, that the name of the recorder appended to the affidavits is forged; the only question upon the evidence requiring deliberation, is, whether it is proved that the act was done by the prisoner; or by his aid or procurement. The proofs offered to establish this fact are circumstantial and direct. The circumstantial evidence consists of the facts that the body of the papers is in the handwriting of Luyster, a clerk in the prisoner's office and employment; that the affidavits were presented by the prisoner to the pension office, and the monies received by him upon them; that at least one of the supposed deponents, Stephenson, had been dead about eight months, and proof is offered to show that this last fact was well known to the prisoner; and that other papers to obtain pensions (proved to be forged, and to have been prepared by the prisoner) were also in part in the handwriting of Luyster. More remote facts, but being also relative to the subject, are also in proof,—that an affidavit in support of the application of one Clarke, proved to be in the handwriting of the prisoner, is forged; that Clarke died in 1826; and that papers in the prisoner's handwriting with the forged attestation of the recorder that he was living, &c., were executed and used in 1833, and that in 1833 the prisoner drew Clarke's pension, $960, in this city on a forged affidavit, at the same time asserting under his own signature, that Clarke did not apply personally for it on account of his age and infirmities. Evidence of a similar character in many features is also offered with respect to the application of Loyd, and the papers prepared and used in his name.

These facts are laid before the jury on the part of the prosecution as a foundation for the inference that the prisoner committed the forgeries laid to his charge, or procured them to be done, or aided and assisted in their perpetration. Circumstances may be so directly and necessarily connected with the conclusion of guilt as to amount to what is called a violent presumption of guilt, and so as to be equally satisfactory with positive proof. That force of evidence might probably be found in circumstances showing beyond doubt that the body of these papers had been prepared by the prisoner, that he had used them as genuine to his own individual benefit, and that he knew the persons whose names were used were fictitious. It would be difficult to suppose a combination of facts of that character without holding them connected with the further one; that the name added to the papers had been forged by him, or at his instance and with his assistance. It belongs to the jury to determine how far the testimony has established facts of that character, and also to decide what intendment must necessarily accompany them.

Although the circumstances in proof may not afford a violent presumption of the guilt of the prisoner, yet they may raise a probable presumption of such guilt. The distinction in law between these two degrees of presumptive evidence is that the latter is such an inference or conclusion as common observation and experience teach us ought ordinarily to be drawn from the facts. If a man attempts to pass a counterfeit bank bill, the filling up of which is in his own handwriting, the probable presumption is that he forged the whole bill, and a jury would be well justified in finding him guilty of the counterfeiting, in the absence of proof on his part showing that he did not commit the offence. If he had passed such bills, and was found with a large quantity of them in his possession, the presumption that he was the counterfeiter would become violent,—would demand his conviction as upon full proofs, unless he could clear himself by countervailing testimony.

After maturely considering the circumstantial evidence before them, and estimating its weight and bearing, if the jury are in doubt whether the offence is proved by it, it will be necessary to bring into consideration the direct proof to this part of the charge. That consists of the testimony of the accomplice, Luyster. The law admits an accomplice to be a competent witness, but it declares it unsafe to convict upon his uncorroborated evidence alone. To corroborate his testimony there must be other proof supporting him in essential parts of his story. The jury will undoubtedly find much evidence of that character in this case, and, considering Luyster's credit affected only by the fact that he was a particeps criminis, there might be enough found probably to justify a good deal of confidence in his statements. The jury, are, however, to bear in mind that the witness has once before given an entirely opposite account, on oath, of the transactions to which he now testifies, and that in the one instance or the other he has committed manifest perjury. It may happen that the most depraved of human beings may so bear himself on his examination as to command the confidence of a court and jury; when he unbosoms himself without reserve, and carries to every judgment a deep conviction that he is honestly attempting the only atonement and expiation for his past offences allowed man in this life,—a confession of his sins, and making all the reparation in his power for the wrongs done by him. Even then the steadier experience of the law admonishes us against yielding to emotion and sympathy, and cautions us that it is safer to abide by well-tried rules of judging, than to proceed upon vague impulses, even though the mind may at the moment be entirely satisfied of the truth of the witness, and clear wrong be done in the individual case by not crediting him. The cardinal rule, which has served in all ages, and been applied to all conditions of men, is that a witness wilfully falsifying the truth in one particular, when upon oath, ought never to be believed upon the strength of his own testimony, whatever he may assert. And further, in respect to this witness, Luyster, the jury will carefully note his manner of testifying, and if they find he prevaricates, denies facts which it is plain he must know, endeavors to make concealments, half discloses at one moment what he fully discloses at another, it would be unsafe and improvident to rely in the slightest upon his testimony, except in so far as each particular statement is corroborated by other proofs.

The jury will be required to pass also upon the other classes of offences set forth in the indictment: (2) Uttering and publishing as true the three affidavits or papers described. (3) Transmitting or presenting them to the government or an agent thereof. The evidence of uttering or publishing the papers, and of presenting them to an agent of the government as true, is very explicit and uncontradicted. The counsel for the prisoner in no way question these two facts. To convict him, however, of the offence for which he is indicted, the proofs must satisfy the jury that the prisoner knew when he so used the papers that they were forged. All the evidence applicable to the first class of counts also applies to latter classes; and, though the evidence may be insufficient to prove the actual forgery, it may be adequate to establish the scienter, or knowledge of the prisoner that the papers were forged. It is to be examined only, in this point of view, in reference to these counts in the indictment, and the single inquiry referred to the jury on this branch of the subject is whether upon the whole evidence it is proved that the prisoner knew the papers described in the indictment were forgeries, at the time he offered them as genuine.

THE COURT further remarked that it was the right of the jury to separate the charges in their finding, and give a verdict of guilty upon any one of the counts in the indictment, and of not guilty upon all or any of the others. So, also, they may discriminate between the several particulars embraced in any one count or class of counts. Three affidavits are specified in the indictment as the subject of the offence; but the crime is complete, if either affidavit was forged by the prisoner, or uttered and published as true, with a knowledge that it was forged. Should the proofs establish the prisoner's guilt as to any one, and not as to the other particular specifications, the jury may acquit him, in respect to the latter, or return a general verdict of guilty, inasmuch as the crime is the same whether one or all the papers were forged.

It belongs to the prosecution to produce legal evidence proving the guilt of the prisoner. He is to have the advantage of every defect of testimony, and of every reasonable doubt existing upon the proofs; and whatever suspicions the evidence may raise, if it does not make out satisfactorily the criminality of the prisoner in the matter and manner charged in the indictment, he is entitled to a verdict of acquittal.

The jury found the prisoner guilty upon the whole indictment.

Case No. 15,972.

UNITED STATES v. OSIO.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 100.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

The grant in this case was made under the express authority of the Mexican government.

Claim [by Antonio Maria Osio] for Angel Island, situated in the Bay of San Francisco.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.
Bates & Lawrence, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case is founded on a grant made by Governor Alvarado on the eleventh day of June, 1839. The expediente is produced from the archives, and the genuineness of the original grant fully established. The island which is the subject of the grant appears to have been used almost immediately after the grant by the claimant for the raising of cattle, horses,, etc., a considerable number of which he placed upon it. He also built upon it a small house, which was occupied by his major domo. The claimant although he did not personally reside on the island, frequently visited it; and on one occasion remained upon it three months, superintending, among other things, the erection of a dam to form a reservoir for the use of his cattle. His title to the land seems to have been generally known and recognized, and the cattle upon it were marked with his brand. He afterwards built three other houses and put a portion of the land under cultivation, and at the time of the war his cattle were used to the number of five hundred. The only doubt which can be suggested with regard to the validity of the claimant's title is, whether the governor had a right to grant islands upon or near the coast. But it appears that the grants of this and other islands were made by the express direction of the superior government of Mexico; and the governor was enjoined to grant the islands to Mexicans in order to prevent their occupation by foreigners, who might injure the commerce and fisheries of the republic, and who, especially the Russians, might otherwise acquire a permanent foothold upon them. We agree with the board in the opinion that this express authority to make these grants removes all doubt on the subject. The board have unanimously confirmed this claim, and we see no reason for reversing their decision. Their decree must therefore be affirmed.

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed in 23 How. (64 U. S.) 273.]

[On appeal to the supreme court the decree was reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition. 23 How. (64 U. S.) 273.]

Case No. 15,973.

UNITED STATES v. O'SULLIVAN et al.

[9 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 193.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July, 1851.

REMISSION OF CAUSES FROM DISTRICT TO CIRCUIT COURT.

1. A case will not be remitted to the circuit court from the district court, except when it shall appear that the questions of law are, in the judgment of the district court, of so grave a character that it must judicially declare them both difficult and important.

2. Nor would a judge be justified in remitting a case to the circuit court from the district court, because he had given a particular exposition to a crime's act in his charge to the grand jury, when it is not made to appear that his exposition is in conflict with that of any other court.

The question raised in this motion was, whether, on the indictment found by the grand jury against the defendants, the district court were bound to remit it to the circuit court. The facts and circumstances sufficiently appear in the opinion delivered by the learned district judge.

J. Prescott Hall, U. S. Dist. Atty.
John L. O'Sullivan, in pro. per.

BETTS, District Judge. The defendant moved the court, on the indictment found by the grand jury against him, that it be remitted to the circuit court. The act of congress of August 8, 1846 (Sess. Laws, 109, c. 98, § 2 [9 Stat. 72]), authorizes the United States attorney, at his discretion, to move the circuit court or district court to remit to the other indictments found in either. And in the 3d section further enacts that the district court may remit to the circuit court any indictment pending in the district court, when, in the opinion of the court, difficult and important questions of law are involved in the case. The district attorney opposed the motion for a remittitur, because of the great delay which such course must create, and because numerous witnesses were attending for the trial of the case on the part of the United States, many of whom were detained in jail, not being able to give recognizances for their appearance. The court asked to be furnished by the defendant with the points of law deemed by him to be of a character to call for the remittitur of the cause, under the provisions of the statute. A note of such points was accordingly given the court. They have been attentively considered, not with a view to determine which way the various suggestions propounded in them should be answered, but to ascertain whether they involve questions of such difficulty and importance as to render it the duty of this court to refer the subject to the circuit court. The points of law supposed to arise under this indictment do not seem to me to assume so grave a character. That the act of congress may present debatable questions, and demand the decision and construction of the court upon those questions, is highly probable; and it is not to be expected any statutory regulation will ever be expressed in a perspicuity and definiteness of language which admits of no exception or doubt. When one doubt is removed by construction, others spring out of the interpretation itself, and it is a constant occupation of jurists and judicial tribunals to encounter and solve such doubts. It cannot be supposed, therefore, that congress intended the district courts should exercise jurisdiction only in cases free of difficulty, and not important in themselves, and remit all others of a different character to the circuit courts. By the act of August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. 517, § 3), it is enacted that the district courts of the United States shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit courts of all crimes and offences against the United States, the punishment of which is not capital; and in such of the districts where the business of the courts may require it to be done for the purposes of justice, and to prevent undue expenses and delays in the trial of criminal causes, the district courts shall hold monthly adjournments of the regular terms thereof for the trial and hearing of such causes. The direction to hold monthly adjournments does not apply to this court, it being required by the act of May 29, 1830 (4 Stat. 422, § 1), that the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York shall hold a stated term, at the city hall of the city of New York, on the first Tuesday of each month. But the provision of the act of 1842 imports a direction to district courts to exercise the jurisdiction conferred by it, so that delays and expenses may be avoided in criminal cases. The manifest object of the statute would be frustrated, if these courts, on the occurrence of any debatable question of law in a criminal cause, should suspend their action, and remit the case to a circuit court. No one can, with reason, suppose such a step proper, unless the questions of law are, in the judgment of the court, of a character that it must judicially declare them both difficult and important. Those suggested in the memorandum handed me by the defendant may some of them be new, and not yet adjudicated upon in the United States courts, and perhaps were never before presented for consideration. Those circumstances do not, however, necessarily clothe them with the qualities of difficult and important questions. Questions of construction and interpretation are incessantly arising in the administration of criminal law. Scarcely an indictment, under a new or old statute, is brought to trial without there being started, and seriously discussed, question after question, vitally important to the defence, or perhaps to the prosecution; yet the district courts cannot consider they are authorized to disembarrass themselves from the consideration and decision of those questions, by adjourning them to the circuit court; nor, very often when clearly of the utmost importance in the cause, to declare them difficult.

The grand jury, at the present term, have already brought in thirteen indictments, and yesterday presented six for offences against recent statutes of the United States; all of which last are for offences never prosecuted in this court since I have presided in it. Still it is no less my duty to proceed and hear the new cases than the old, however apparent it may be that points very important to the defence of the parties accused may arise under many or all of them.

In the present case it would be most grateful to my own feelings to be relieved of the burthen of the trial; not only because there must necessarily devolve on the court great fatigue and anxiety, in a prolonged and actively contested case, surrounded with many other considerations than the intrinsic merits presented by the issues, but especially because it is plainly signified in this proceeding that the defendant desires by it no less to change the judge than the tribunal. In the points submitted by him, as the foundation of the motion, a paragraph was inserted taking the ground distinctly that the district judge had, in advance of argument, in his charge to the grand jury, given strong and decided views of the law, which would necessarily affect his judgment on the hearing of the cause. It is true the pen was struck through the lines of the paragraph, but evidently not intended so to obliterate them that the sentiment should fail being communicated to the judge. I take no exceptions to the suggestion. The party had a right to make it, and there would have been nothing offensive or indecorous in the objection if expressed openly. Most plainly it affords no legal cause for the judge to decline jurisdiction in the case, or for the party to challenge the propriety of his acting in it. A judge, from his office and station, is presupposed acquainted with the law of the land, and, from study and reflection, to have formed opinions upon the bearing of all positive laws of a general character, on any supposed state of facts. The more extensively and thoroughly he is informed upon those subjects, the better is he qualified for his place. His opinions should not be inflexible nor stubborn, but open to re-examination upon new light or reasons brought to his attention; still, his position is the reverse of that of a juror. Instead of having a mind free of all knowledge or impression on the subject to be submitted to his judgment, it ought to be strongly imbued with the law he is to administer, so as to be prepared to apprehend the justness of any criticisms or explanations applied to it; and it matters not if his opinion be in some measure already made up both on the law and facts of the case, by having acted as committing magistrate on the accusation. Under this theory a party acquires no benefit by appealing or transmitting his cause from one judicatory to another, to avoid its being heard by a judge who had formed an opinion upon the meaning of the law, because in every step upwards, from the lowest court to that of last resort, he must be presumed to meet judges of more matured and fixed opinions upon the subject. The policy and advantage of this ascending scale of review is to bring the matter ultimately before those who are prepared, by previous study and experience, to pronounce definitely upon the subject.

I cannot think, therefore, that the act of congress contemplates, or that a judge would be justified in remitting a case to the circuit court from the district court, because he had given a particular exposition to a crimes act, when it is not made to appear his exposition is in conflict with that of any other court. When it is discovered that judges in different sections of the United States put varying interpretations upon the criminal statutes, it is, then, clearly important that the judgment of the supreme court should be invoked to give an exposition which shall become a rule to all the tribunals of the country.

Independent of these general considerations, I consider it improper to remit causes to the circuit court in this district, except in cases of most manifest and grave importance. The circuit judge sits in that court only twice a year, and is unable to devote the time necessary to dispose of the business exclusively within its jurisdiction. He might be compelled, in order to clear the jails, to lay aside his civil calendar, and give his attention to cases, which, by law, the district court is required to hear; or he may feel constrained to remand to the district court the cases originating there, and within its jurisdiction, and he would be thus imposing great delay and enhanced expense upon individuals and the government, by reason of improvident concessions of the district court to parties under indictment. I consider it my duty to dispose of the business cast upon me by the law, and however willing I may be personally to be freed of these particular classes of cases, I discover nothing in them which authorizes me to send them from this court to the circuit court for trial. I shall accordingly decline giving the order asked in the present case, and also in those of Lewis and Schlessinger.

[See Cases Nos. 15,974 and 15,975.]

Case No. 15,974.

UNITED STATES v. O'SULLIVAN et al.

[9 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 257.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July Term, 1851.

INDICTMENT—MOTION TO QUASH—STATUTORY OFFENCES—NEUTRALITY LAWS—CONSTRUCTION AND EFFECT—INTERNATIONAL LAW.

1. A motion to quash an indictment is a proper mode of taking objections to it for want of form or substance.

2. It is, however, discretionary with the court whether it will quash an indictment for defect of form.

3. It is generally sufficient to describe a statutory offence in the words of the statute creating it, particularly so in cases of misdemeanors.

[Cited in U. S. v. Quinn, Case No. 16,110.]

4. U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,342], and U. S. v. Burr [Id. 14,693], are precedents establishing the sufficiency of such indictment under the 5th section of the act of June 5, 1794 [1 Stat. 384].

5. The 6th section of the act of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 449], is substantially a transcript of that. In U. S. v. Henderson, an indictment under this section, corresponding to that of U. S. v. Burr, decided to be good.

6. The particulars constituting the offence are matters of evidence and not of pleading.

7. The indictment in the present case held to be good in point of form.

8. The law of nations no less interdicts warlike aggressions made directly upon a nation at peace than the aid of one belligerent against another.

9. They are just cause for reprisal and war. What a nation may not lawfully do in its public capacity in respect to others, the citizens or subjects of it ought not to do in their private capacity.

10. Q. Whether they can be restrained or punished by the judicial tribunals therefor, under the law of nations, as part of the common law of the land?

11. The United States government is the first amongst civilized nations which compelled, by positive law, its citizens, individually, to observe the law of nations towards friendly powers.

12. The act of 1794 was not intended as merely a neutrality act.

13. The president invoked the legislation of congress for further objects than the means of maintaining the neutrality of the United States between belligerents solely.

14. The act has been accepted by the United States government and judicial officers ever since its enactment, as extending to warlike expeditions from this country, not intended to aid one belligerent against another.

15. The cases of U. S. v. Smith and U. S. v. Burr clearly evince that understanding of it.

16. Q. Whether a direct attack by the United States, or by individuals from the United States, on a Spanish province in America, is properly a breach of neutrality, though Spain be at the time at war in Europe with a power with whom the United States is at peace?

17. The act of 1818 has been uniformly treated by the executive department, and by judges of the United States courts, as embracing warlike enterprises set on foot in this country against a friendly power at peace with all the world.

18. Such, also, according to established rules of construction, is the interpretation to be put upon the language of the act.

19. The matters charged in the indictment constitute a violation of the statute, and the motion to quash the indictment denied on both grounds.

[This was an indictment against John L. O'Sullivan and others for preparing and setting on foot, etc., a military expedition against the Island of Cuba. Heard on motion to quash.]

J. Prescott Hall and Ogden Hoffman, for the United States.

F. B. Cutting and J. Van Buren, for defendants.

BETTS, District Judge. The indictment in this case is founded upon the 6th section of the act "in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," passed April 20, 1818. The provisions of the section are "that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district or people, with whom the United States are at peace, every person so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor." The indictment, in ninety-seven counts, charges the defendants, by themselves and in conjunction with others, with having, within the United States and at the city of New York, begun a military expedition and enterprise, and with having provided and prepared the means for a military expedition and enterprise, to be carried on from thence against Cuba, the territory and dominion of the queen of Spain, and also against the people of the territory and colony of Cuba. Each count purports to charge the offence in the words of the statute, and the variations between them are mostly formal only and relate to the different appellations given in the indictment to the Island of Cuba, or place against which the expedition was destined. The defendants move to quash the indictment, for want of averments proper and necessary to be pleaded to by them, or on which any judgment of the court, in case of their conviction by a jury, can be rendered. These objections relate only to the form and structure of the indictment, and if well taken do not dispose of the accusations preferred against the defendants, as they may be obviated by a new bill correcting the deficiencies of the present one.

The essential point raised by the motion, and discussed with great earnestness and force on the part of the defendants, covers their liability to prosecution under any form of indictment, for the act alleged to have been committed by them. The position taken on the merits is, that the act of congress relates solely to the maintenance of a state of neutrality by citizens of the United States, in respect to foreign states in amity with us, but at war with each other. It will be proper to consider in the first place the sufficiency of the indictment as framed, for if that be vitally defective the defendants must be discharged from the present prosecution, and it will be labor lost to investigate and decide the main question as to the force and operation of the statute.

A doubt was suggested preliminarily on the part of the prosecution, whether it is competent for the defendants, after having plead the general issue to the indictment, to withdraw that plea and move to have the bill quashed; or even if the motion to quash is an appropriate one, to bring up merely technical points of pleading. It is true, the defendants, when arraigned, entered their pleas of not guilty to the indictment, but it was without the presence or advice of their counsel, and under the assurance of the court that the plea should no way prejudice their rights, and that they should have the privilege of every defence to the indictment, when their counsel came into court, that they were entitled to by law before the plea of not guilty was interposed. The authority of the court, to control the order of pleading at its discretion, cannot be doubted.

The doctrine of the English books is, that by the common law the court may, in discretion, quash an indictment for such insufficiency, as will make any judgment whatsoever, given upon any part of it against the defendants, erroneous. Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 146; 1 Chit. Cr. Law; Archb. Cr. Pl. p. 64, § 8; Bac. Abr. Indict. K; Com. Dig. (Day's Ed.) Indict. H, and notes. The American authorities recognize the principle fully. Whart. Cr. Law, pp. 130, 61, 7, § 1; Barb. Cr. Law, 306, c. 7. But Hawkins says, the judges are in no case bound ex debito justitiæ, to quash an indictment, but may oblige the party to plead or to demur to it. Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 146.

The first count of the indictment charges, that the defendants, on the 23d day of April, 1851, within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States of America, to wit, at the city of New York, in the Southern district of New York, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with force and arms did, in conjunction with some other persons to the jurors unknown, begin a certain military expedition, to be carried on from thence against the territory of a foreign prince, to wit, the territory of the queen of Spain, the United States then and there being at peace with the said queen of Spain. The twelve counts succeeding, also count on the words "begin a military expedition"; and state the offence substantially in the same language as the first count, varying from it in some instances in averring the military expedition was to be carried on from the United States, and also in naming Cuba as the place against which it was to be carried on; and giving that sometimes the appellation of territory, dominion, colony or district, of the queen of Spain, or of the people of Cuba. Similar allegations are made in the counts charging the setting on foot a military enterprise, to the 34th count inclusive. From the 35th to the 75th counts inclusive, the defendants are charged with having provided the means for carrying on a military expedition or enterprise, and from the 76th to the 97th counts inclusive, with having prepared the means for the same.

The most material exceptions taken on the part of the defendants to the frame of the indictment, are: 1. That in the 34 first counts it is not stated what acts were done by the defendants, to begin or set on foot a military expedition or enterprise, nor what constituted or composed the expedition, and rendered it military. 2. That the defendants are not charged with having begun or set on foot the expedition or enterprise, with criminal intent, or knowing it to be a military one. 3. That it is not averred from what place in particular in the United States, nor at what time, the expedition or enterprise was to be carried on. 4. That the counts from 75 to 97, do not charge any criminal intent, or that the defendants had any knowledge that the means prepared and provided were to be employed in carrying on a military expedition. 5. That all the counts want the fulness and precision required by law, in describing a criminal offence, and connecting any person with its commission.

These objections and various minor ones, raised in the course of the argument, fall under two general considerations: 1. Whether it is legally sufficient in an indictment on this section of the statute, to describe the offence in the words of the act, and if so: 2. Whether the pleading in the present case fulfills the spirit of the rule, by designating times and places and acts, with the distinctness and precision necessary to bring the defendants within the charge of having violated the law.

In England, it is required that indictments for offences made so by statute, when of the degree of felony, shall contain the same formality and precision as on common law offences, and it is not enough to pursue the description of the offence given by the statute, but the special acts done, or ingredients of the offence, must be stated in the indictment. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, § 22; Archb. Cr. Law, 50; Starkie, Cr. Pl. 235. It is unnecessary to inquire whether the United States courts have adopted, even in cases of felony, the rigor of the common law rule of pleading in this respect. I apprehend the general practice is to charge statutory offences, carrying with them an infamous punishment, in the words of the statute constituting the offence; for instance, an assault with intent to kill, or commit a rape, or with a dangerous weapon, or making a revolt. Be this as it may as to felonies, the rule is clear and explicit in respect to misdemeanors, that it is generally enough in an indictment to describe the offence in the words of the statute creating it. U. S. v. Kelly, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 418, where the indictment charged the defendant with an endeavor to make a revolt, and it was held by the supreme court to be a sufficient description of the offence. In U. S. v. Gooding [12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 460], the defendant was indicted for fitting out a vessel to be employed in the slave trade —the act of congress of April 20, 1818, having made it an offence so to do. Exception was taken that the particular acts done by the defendant were not specified. There would be, apparently, in those cases, strong reasons for requiring such statement, that it might appear upon the record an offence had been committed, and also to enable the defendant to be prepared for his defence. But the supreme court held the indictment sufficient. [U. S. v. Gooding] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460. So, on an indictment under the 3d section of the act upon which the present indictment is founded, the defendant was charged with being knowingly concerned in fitting out a vessel with intent that she should be employed in acts of hostility, &c., &c., describing the offence in the language of the statute. The court decided that it was sufficient for the indictment to charge the offence in the words of the statute. U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 465. The decision in the last case has more pertinency and weight on the present question, because it had reference to a section of this very act, and because it declares a mode of describing the offence, no less general and indistinct than the present, to be all that is required in law. In U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 142, the court again assert the general rule to be, that in indictments for misdemeanors created by statute, it is sufficient to charge the offence in the words of the statute. The court further say there is not that technical nicety, as to form, necessary, which seems to have been adopted and sanctioned by long practice in cases of felony, and, with respect to some crimes, where particular words must be used, and no other words, however synonymous they may seem, can be substituted.

These doctrines are applied in the U. S. circuit courts, in indictments for misdemeanor, in a spirit as broad and liberal as that indicated by the supreme court. U. S. v. Hayward [Case No. 15,336]; U. S. v. La Coste [Id. 15,548]; U. S. v. Martin [Id. 15,731]; U. S. v. Lancaster [Id. 15,556]; Whart. Prec. Ind. 608, note. And it is worthy of notice that, even in civil actions upon penal statutes, the United States supreme court hold it sufficient to charge the offence, or plead matter of defence in the words of the statute. [Locke v. U. S.] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 339; [Gelston v. Hoyt] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 330. The counsel for the defendants suppose a decision of the supreme court of this state has marked a qualification not inconsistent with the rule declared by the supreme court of the United States, but which restores to indictments upon statutes a more just and desirable conformity to those founded upon common law offences. People v. Taylor, 3 Denio, 96. I do not understand the decision in that case conflicts, in any essential particular, with those above cited; on the contrary, it seems to me to confirm, in the strongest terms, the principles upon which they rest. It was an indictment for setting on foot and for carrying on a certain lottery. The state statute made it an offence for any person to open, set on foot, carry on, promote, or draw any lottery, &c. 1 Rev. St. 665. The court say, all the counts based upon a lottery state the purpose for which the lottery was made, in the words of the statute, and that is enough to show that it was an illegal lottery. The counts also follow the statute in severally stating what was done by the defendant, to wit, that he did "set on foot," "carry on" and "open" a certain lottery, and in this are sufficient; neither of the counts contains any description of the lottery beyond a general statement of the purpose for which it was made. For the latter reason, the first, third and fourth counts were pronounced bad, but the second count was held good, because it had the averment that "a more particular description of the lottery was unknown to the jurors." This decision may perhaps be regarded as in a degree shaken, if not overruled, by that of the court of appeals in Charles v. People, 1 Comst. [1 N. Y.] 180, in which it was held that an indictment, under the same statute, for publishing an account of a certain illegal lottery was good without other description of the lottery or the acts done. The statute is "that no person shall by printing, &c., &c., publish an account of such illegal lottery." The case of Com. v. Dana, 2 Metc. [Mass.] 329, seems to stand opposed to the reasoning and conclusion of the court in People v. Taylor, as to the necessity of filling out the meaning of the legislature by averments in the indictment beyond the language of the statute. See, also, 5 Pick. 41, 42; 6 N. H. 53. Be that as it may, whether an indictment under the New York statute for setting on foot, or publishing an account of a lottery, must give the name of the lottery or an excuse for not setting it forth, the case of People v. Taylor is pointed and distinct that no other description of setting on foot, or carrying on, or opening a lottery, is necessary than to aver in the words of the statute that the defendant did set on foot, etc., etc. The counsel also call the attention of the court to the state act of 1849, c. 278 (Sess. Laws, 403), making it a misdemeanor "to manufacture, cause to be manufactured, sell or expose, or keep for sale or gift or part with 'slung shot,'" stating that it has been adjudged by the criminal court for this city, that an indictment under this act following its words is bad, and that the intent of the party charged, to use such slung shot, must be averred and proved. The decision undoubtedly rests upon the doctrine that when the statutory description does not give every necessary ingredient of the offence, then the indictment must aver the facts necessary to constitute the crime, and such as show a scienter and criminal intent on the part of the accused. Archb. Cr. Pl. 64; Barb. Cr. Law, 291. But such is not the case under the statute in question. The act charged to have been done by the defendants imports a knowledge of its criminality, and the intent necessary to constitute the offence described by the statute. To begin, or set on foot a military expedition from the United States against another nation, necessarily imports by force of the expressions themselves that the act was done understandingly, both as to the object and purpose for which the military expedition is prepared or set on foot, and the end it is to answer or accomplish.

After this brief consideration of the general rule in relation to indictments upon statutes for misdemeanors, and the exposition of the supreme court of the United States, of an indictment drawn in the language of the 3d section of the statute in question, it may be proper to advert to the evidence supplied in the action of the judiciary on the section specially under discussion, to ascertain whether any interpretation has been put upon it, which will throw light upon this inquiry and indicate the sense in which this act has been understood and executed. This is a re-enactment of the 5th section of the act of June 5, 1794, with the addition of "or of any colony, district or people," after foreign prince or state, with whom the United States are at peace. The description of the offence and the punishment are otherwise identical. In April, 1806, indictments were presented in the United States circuit court for this district, against Samuel G. Ogden and William S. Smith, founded upon the 5th section of the act of June 5, 1794. The indictments were very concise, the parties were indicted separately. Trial of Smith and Ogden, vi, ix.[1] The first count charges that Ogden on the 10th day of January, 1806, at the city of New York, within the district of New York, and within the jurisdiction of the United States, did begin a certain military expedition to be carried on from thence against the dominions of a foreign prince, to wit, the dominions of the king of Spain, the United States then and there being at peace with the said king of Spain. The second count, with the same preamble, avers that Ogden "did set on foot a certain military enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territories," as before. Third count same as second, except alleging it to be against the province of Caraccas in South America, then and there being the territory of the king of Spain. Fourth count, same preamble, did provide the means, to wit, one ship or vessel called the Leander, for a certain other military expedition to be carried on from thence against the dominions of the king of Spain. Fifth count, same as last, and after Leander, adding, "one hundred and fifty men, thirty cannon, five hundred muskets, four thousand pikes, thirty tons of cannon balls, one hundred swords, one hundred and fifty quarter casks of gunpowder" for a military expedition to be carried on from thence against the province of Caraccas, etc. Sixth, and same as last, except place, to be carried on against "the dominions of some foreign state to the jurors unknown." Seventh, same preamble, "did set on foot a certain other military enterprise to be carried on from thence against the dominions of some foreign state, to the jurors unknown." The indictment against Smith, has the three first and last counts the same as that against Ogden; the fourth, fifth and sixth counts also the same with those against Ogden, except in charging the means prepared and provided to be thirty men and $300 in money. The prosecution in those cases touched closely upon some of the exciting topics of party politics, and they were pursued and defended with an acrimony better befitting the arena of party strifes than a tribunal of justice. The first talents of the New-York bar appeared for the defence, and every point was combated with all the astuteness and ardor causes so circumstanced would be apt to engender in the then state of public feeling. Messrs. Emmet, Harrison, Colden and O. Hoffman, conducted the defence, and it is fair to infer that no tenable point of objection to the prosecution derivable from the law or the facts would escape the sagacity and experience of such counsel. Pleas in abatement were interposed, and motions made to quash the indictment, because improper testimony had been laid before the grand jury. Trial of Smith and Ogden, xxiv., xiii.[1] A most earnest and protracted argument was addressed to the court to compel the attendance as witnesses of the secretary of state, and other heads of the departments of the general government, and the most earnest efforts renewedly made to postpone the trials; but on the various motions and discussions, it was never suggested that the form of the indictment was objectionable, either in not describing properly the offences charged to have been committed, or averring the times and places they were to be perpetrated. It is to be remarked that Mr. Hoffman had been attorney general of the state of New York, Mr. Harrison United States attorney of this district, and the eminence of Messrs. Emmet and Colden in all branches of juridical learning, gives to the omission of such counsel, to raise an objection to the indictment in form or substance when so pressed by the case, the force of the strongest argument in its support and vindication of its legal sufficiency. On the 9th of September, 1807, after Col. Burr had been acquitted on an indictment for high treason, he was arraigned at Richmond, Virginia, before Chief Justice Marshall, on an indictment under the same section, the 5th section of the act of June 5, 1794, for beginning and setting on foot a military expedition against Mexico. From the synopsis of the indictment given (2 Burr, Tr. 538) it appears to have been framed nearly identically with those against Smith and Ogden. The offence is charged in the words of the act and in no other way; "did begin a military expedition," "did set on foot a military expedition and enterprise," against the territory and dominions of the king of Spain, against the province of Mexico, and against the territory and dominions of a foreign state unknown. The history of the trials of Col. Burr affords an exhibition of acumen, learning and perseverance in pressing every topic of defence supplied by legal skill and experience which is not surpassed by any case on record. Himself a jurist of pre-eminent distinction, and assisted by Edmund Randolph, Wickham, Charles Lee, Robert Goodlee Harper, Luther Martin, Botts, &c., some of them leading lawyers of the age, the prosecutions were opposed at every point of advance, when there seemed the faintest ground for objection, and thus, for a series of weeks, was maintained a struggle against the cases set up by the government against him. Both indictments were defeated, but it is certainly remarkable, if the one, now in question, was open to the objection that the offence was not sufficiently described, and that it was otherwise defective in form or substance, that ground should not have been then taken against it. And the more so, because it was most strenuously insisted that Col. Burr could not be properly prosecuted in that district for the offence; and if he could, that he ought not to be subjected to trial at that time, or at all, after his acquittal on the capital charge. In the unremitted efforts to get rid of the indictment or of the trial, it was never suggested by Col. Burr or either of his counsel, nor by the court, that the indictment in its then shape could not be maintained. It was treated in all the motions and arguments as sufficient and valid, in point of form, and the court, in a carefully prepared opinion on the motion to reject evidence offered under it on the part of the United States, declares "that any legal testimony which shows the expedition to have been military or to have been designed against the dominions of Spain, may be received." 2 Burr, Tr. 539, and Append. This case, surrounded with its attendant circumstances, augments the force of the implication derived from the trial of Smith and Ogden, that there was no valid and sound objection in law to the sufficiency of the indictments, in the form in which they were presented.

[1] [Cases Nos. 16,341a–16,342b.]

The argument, from the usage of the courts and the undoubting acquiescence of the profession in support of the sufficiency and propriety of setting forth the offence in question in the words of the statute, is further strengthened by the recent proceedings in the United States circuit court for the District of Louisiana. An indictment was presented in that court, on the 6th section of the act of 1818, against Henderson, for beginning and setting on foot a military expedition against Cuba. I have been furnished with the form of the indictment, and find it corresponds almost exactly with those in the cases of Smith and Ogden and of Col. Burr. No demurrer or motion to quash the indictment was made on the part of the defendant; he went to trial upon it as sufficient in point of form and substance. On the trial, evidence offered by the United States of circumstances tending to show the beginning and setting on foot a military expedition by the defendant was objected to, because those circumstances were not set forth and averred in the indictment. The presiding judge, in a very carefully prepared and able opinion, overruled the objection and held that it was sufficient to charge the offence in the words of the statute, the particulars constituting the offence were matters of proof and not of averment. This case then also shows that in the understanding of the bar, the indictment was not open to exception upon its face, because of insufficiency in stating the offence, and it further shows the deliberate judgment of the court upon the precise point, that the objection cannot avail against the admissibility of evidence under the averment, so that it accordingly is sufficient as a description of the offence and also as notice to the accused of the matters he must be prepared to meet and defend himself against.

[1] [Cases Nos. 16,341a–16,342b.]

It was unnecessary in the present indictment to aver that what the defendants did, was done by them with a criminal intent or with knowledge that it was a criminal offence. The statute does not make these particulars a part of the description of the offence, but the definition given imports a criminal knowledge and intent in those committing it. To begin or set on foot, or supply means for a military expedition from the United States to be carried on against a nation at peace with the United States, as already intimated, implies in those concerned in such an adventure, a purpose and intention to do that act understandingly and intentionally, which is pronounced by the law to be a crime. No further charge of a criminal design can be required when not exacted by the terms of the statute, than to state a course of conduct necessarily importing a purpose to do those acts which are forbidden by law. The indictment against the defendants comports in all important particulars and nearly verbatim with those heretofore presented in the three different circuit courts of the United States as above referred to. I do not find, except in one count, the omission of any part of the description of the offence given by the statute, nor the insertion of averments variant from those employed in the preceding cases. In the 19th count, it is not asserted that the military expedition was to be carried on from any place. This is doubtless a clerical error, but it is fatal to the count. In some instances the allegation is, that the expedition or enterprise was to be carried on "from thence" (in the words of the statute), in some, "from the United States." The argument is that the grammatical relation of the words "from thence" in several counts, is to "the city and district of New York" and not to the United States. The meaning of the statute undoubtedly is, that the expedition shall be intended to be carried on from the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, but I apprehend an averment merely that it was to be carried on from the district of New York, would be precise and certain enough, as the court must judicially know that place to be within the jurisdiction of the United States. But all the counts add the allegation that the act was done within the jurisdiction of the United States, to wit, setting on foot, beginning, &c., to be carried on from thence. No further certainty is necessary in my judgment, to render these counts unexceptionable. The words "from thence," as used in this statute, mean from the United States and are precisely equivalent to the territory or jurisdiction of the United States.

It is questionable, in my mind, whether it is allowable to state in an indictment, that the military expedition was to be carried on against the territory or dominions of a prince or state, to the jurors unknown. That fact, it appears to me, should be ascertained and explicitly averred by the grand jury, and without a knowledge enabling them to present that fact, they could not properly charge the crime to have been committed. It is nearly as incongruous, in view of the object of the statute and the description there given of the offence, for the jurors to say, it is unknown to them against what place the expedition was designed, as for them to have asserted that the defendants did some kind of act, but whether it was beginning or setting on foot a military expedition, was unknown to the jurors. If the jurors do not know against what nation the expedition was to be directed, how can they know it was a nation at peace with the United States? I should certainly, if not controlled by authority or precedents, hold it to be an indispensable part of the description of this offence, to name the prince or state whose territories or dominions were to be invaded. These same averments, were, however, employed in the three indictments referred to, and without objection, and were held allowable in civil proceedings by the U. S. supreme court. Locke v. U. S., 7 Cranch. [11 U. S.] 339; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 329. And I shall, therefore, not decide on this motion, that the omission to name the friendly power against whom the enterprise is designed, is fatal to the indictment, but leave the question to be presented more solemnly by demurrer or in arrest of judgment. In my opinion, it is not necessary to designate the particular part of the United States from which the expedition is to be carried on, nor the time when. These are matters collateral to the gist of the offence. That consists in concocting a military expedition within the United States, with a hostile purpose towards a friendly nation. It is no part of the description of the offence, that the expedition or enterprise shall have left the United States, and, accordingly, it can be of no essential importance to allege the particular point contemplated for its departure. The guilty purpose must be proved, and the guilty acts to be all done within the district of New York, and it no way qualifies or affects the character of these particulars, whether the defendants intended to put off the expedition at Castine, or Galveston, or any intermediate point.

In my opinion the motion to quash the indictment for want of proper form, must be overruled. I have given this point of the case a much more extended consideration than its importance or difficulty would seem to demand. I have been induced to bestow more attention upon the structure of the indictment because of the extremely able argument of the counsel for the defendants on the subject, and because this particular branch of criminal pleading has not before been brought distinctly in judgment in the courts of the United States. Independent of the controlling authorities cited in support of the mode of describing the offence pursued in this case, I think on general principles the succinctness and conciseness of description adopted here should be upheld in preference to having the pleadings crowded with multifarious details of facts, a great portion of which must necessarily be conjectural and thrown into the averments, to meet any possible state of proof that might chance to arise on the trial, and would not accordingly afford a specific notice to the accused of the facts relied on by the prosecution for their conviction. In libels of information on a statute to enforce forfeitures, and in defence for seizure of property as forfeited, pleading according to the terms of the statutes is held sufficient notice to the claimant and description of the offence. [Locke v. U. S.] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 339; [Gelston v. Hoyt] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 339. To aver that the defendants set on foot or begun a military expedition at New York, will apprise them as distinctly of the matter of accusation as to set forth a schedule of facts, which may enter into the preparation of such expedition.

The multifariousness of details might more embarrass than aid the defence, as it would be obvious to the defendants, that although a hundred particulars might be enumerated in the indictment, the public prosecutor on the trial might limit his evidence to a single one, and might prove that by the admissions or declarations of the defendants themselves. There is no advantage afforded a party defendant by a multiplicity of notices ranging over an indefinite series of incidents and circumstances. The law wisely leaves these to the proof, and discards them from the pleadings. In the present case in my opinion, it is matter for proof and not of pleading, to show what was done by the defendants in beginning and setting on foot the military expedition charged against them.

The consideration of the main question on the merits, although the one of greatest magnitude in point of principle, will be made as brief as may be consistent with a distinct expression of the views of the court upon it. The motion to quash the indictment most legitimately attaches to the objection, that the acts charged upon the defendants constitute no violation of the act of congress, and do not fall within the criminal jurisdiction of the court. The authorities concur in the doctrine that if the matters alleged in the indictment are not punishable by law, the indictment will be quashed. Whart. Cr. Law, 131; Archb. Cr. Law, 64; Bac. Abr. Indict. K.

The position of the defendants' counsel is, that the acts of June 5, 1794, and of April 20, 1818, are neutrality acts, intended to have operation only in case of war between nations in amity with the United States, and to prevent the citizens of the United States committing acts favoring one, and hostile to another belligerent. The argument is, that the passage of the act of 1794 was induced by the relations then existing between the United States, France and Great Britain, and more especially to check the mischief with which this country was threatened through the pretensions and conduct of Mr. Genet, the French minister. That the legislation of congress being invoked only to the end to declare and enforce our neutral obligations, all the provisions of the statute must be construed in subordination to that purpose, and the 5th section be regarded no more than a restriction upon our citizens in respect to belligerent powers, and not a substantive and independent enactment, declaring a class of offences not known to our own laws, nor recognized by the laws of nations. It is further insisted that the construction claimed for the act of 1794 must be extended to the act of 1818, the latter being a transcript, substantially, of the former; and, also, that the incorporation in it of the act of 1817, which was, by title, avowedly a neutrality act, and nothing more, would tend to characterize the one adopting it, as a neutrality act also.

To determine the justness and pertinency of this train of reasoning, it may be important to look more closely to the foundation of the act of 1794, and endeavor to ascertain whether, in one feature more than another, it rests upon any admitted doctrine of the law of nations. It is an infraction of that law for a friendly power to interfere in case of war, between other nations with whom she is at peace, and render aid to one belligerent against another, and such act may become a justifiable cause for reprisals and war on the part of the nation so injured. Mart. Law Nat. bk. 8, c. 6; Wheat. Hist. Law Nat. 453; 4 Gro. De Jure B. lib. 3, c. 17, § 3. But there is no conceded doctrine of that law, nor any uniform usage of nations which prohibits the citizens and subjects of a neutral power enlisting in the service or taking part with either belligerent. This, so far as it falls within the notice of publicists, appears to be a matter of municipal regulation, left to the authority of each particular government over its own subjects, and not to come within the cognizance of public law. Id. c. 18. Indeed, it has been made a question, and one which the United States felt themselves compelled to discuss, whether belligerent powers had not a right to enlist and enrol men in a neutral country to carry on war against nations at peace with such neutral, without impairing by those means the neutrality of such country. Wheat. Hist. Law Nat. 471, 472. The United States government properly repudiated the pretension and held itself bound by its relations to friendly powers to restrain within our territories the exercise of any such privilege. Letter of Jefferson to Gov. Morris, August 16, 1793 (3 Jefferson's Writings, 269). Still it is doubtful, whether the argument proves more than that the restraint devolves upon the municipal authority by force of the local or common law, and should be enforced by it.

The law of nations, which interdicts a neutral power, becoming a party in a war between others with which it is at peace, springs out of and rests upon that code of natural law which recognizes and declares the right of every nation to remain at peace, and not to be unjustly or wrongfully driven into war by the aggressions of another. Under its doctrine non-interference is as high a duty as neutrality. The right of every people to the undisturbed possession of its territory and independency, and to repel by force every encroachment upon either, is justly placed by writers on the ethics of national law, first amongst those natural rights which it is the end of public law to recognize and preserve. Mart. Law Nat. 69; 1 Wildm. Int. Law, 50; Wheat. Hist. Law Nat. p. 4, c. 1; Vatt. Law Nat. § 64; Id. 216, 217, 369. It is denounced as an act of wrongful aggression for any other power to interfere with the independency of a state or people, however objectionable may be its existing form of government or mode of administering it. 1 Kent, Comm. 21; Vatt. Law Nat. 49, 50, 198, 203. Chancellor Kent seems inclined to sanction the privilege of one nation to interfere in the domestic disturbances and insurrections of another, in behalf of the oppressed and wronged portion of the nation, when requested by it so to do. 1 Kent, Comm. 21–23. But the doctrine is controverted with great strength of argument and authority by a later writer, who repudiates as wholly untenable the notion that one nation is clothed with authority to adjudge upon the internal affairs of another or to intermeddle with them for any cause other than the necessity of its own defence. 1 Wildm. Int. Law, 50, 57; 1 Sparks' Washington, 382 (opinion of Gen. Washington).

The first administration of the government of the United States found itself called upon at an early day, in taking its place in the family of nations, to enforce an observance of the rules of public law in its transactions with two belligerents, each of which was united to this country by numerous ties of interest and sympathy. 2 Marshall's Life of Washington, 283, 287, 288; 1 Gibb's Administration of Washington and Adams, 140. The course it would pursue in relation to those engaged in war was explicitly announced by the proclamation of President Washington, dated April 22, 1793. 1 Wait, St. Pap. 44. The instructions of the treasury department of August 4, 1793, adopted by order of the president, framed a system of regulations to govern the conduct of its public officers, in enforcing the spirit of the proclamation in the ports and harbors of the United States. Id. 45. And similar directions were given the governors of states, and the troops of the United States, in respect to the interior of the country. 2 Marshall's Life of Washington, 334, 355. The president, in his speech at the meeting of congress, Dec. 3, 1793, calls for statutory enactments to sanction and enforce the principles thus promulgated by the government. Wait, St. Pap. 40. But to maintain our neutrality merely between belligerents was not all the exigencies the case called for, nor the whole that was contemplated by the government. It is manifest it did not mean to limit its action to a fulfillment towards other nations of its obligations in respect to them as belligerents alone. Its policy was of a broader character, and befitting the principle upon which it came into existence as a government, and exercised governmental powers. As the representative of the people,—their agent, delegated by the people of the United States,—the government adopted an administrative and legislative policy embracing both its direct relationship to foreign states, and the co-ordinate obligations of the citizens individually to uphold and effectuate that relationship. What the government might not do in its public capacity, without an infraction of the law of nations and subjecting itself to reprisals and war, it claimed the people should be prohibited doing individually, giving to its statute book the impress of that law, higher than the codes and rescripts of jurists, which inhibits doing to others, what others ought not to do to us. Charges of Chief Justice Jay and Mr. Justice Wilson to Grand Juries, in 1793 (Whart St. Tr. 55, 62). It is most manifest, that, at the earliest day the subject was acted on, the United States government intended to make the personal duties of citizens co-equal with those of the nation, in respect to acts of hostility against other states, and that the obligation was equally imperative whether those states were in peace or at war.

Mr. Jefferson in his letter to Mr. Genet, June 17, 1793, denies the right of the French government to enlist citizens of the United States within our territories into her service, upon the authority of writers on the Law of Nations; and in the end puts the objection to such acts of a foreign government, upon the broad ground, that we are at peace with all nations by the law of nature. "By that law man is at peace with man, till some aggression is committed, which by the same law, authorizes one to destroy another, as his enemy. For our citizens, then, to commit murders and depredations on the members of nations at peace with us, or to combine to do it, appeared, says the secretary of state, to the executive and to those whom they consulted, as much against the laws of the land, as to murder or rob, or to combine to murder or rob its own citizens, and as much to require punishment if done within their limits where they have territorial jurisdiction, or on the high seas, where they have a personal jurisdiction, reaching their own citizens only. So say our laws, as we understand them. To them the appeal is made, and whether we have construed them well or ill, the constitutional judges will decide." 1 Am. St. P. (Foreign Relations) 124, 155. It is manifest from this despatch that the cabinet then supposed that either the common law of the United States or the laws of the particular states made the acts reprobated crimes, when committed within their territories, and that individuals would thus be amenable to punishment for the robbery and murder of the subjects of a friendly nation out of our territory the same as if the offences had been committed within any particular state.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1784, had declared the law of nations formed part of the municipal law of the state. Respublica v. Longchamps, 1 Dall. 111. And the chief justice of the United States, and two at least of his able associates, in 1793, expressed their opinions that the law of nations could be enforced by the federal courts, as the common law of the country, against persons indicted for its violation. Whart. St. Tr. 52, 55, 56, 62, 83. This doctrine is upheld by eminent lawyers of that day, writing since the events have passed. Rawle, Const. 10; Dup. Const. 3, note. But it is manifest the popular opinion was against the doctrine. 4 Tuck. Bl. Append. 10. Appeals were accordingly made to the tribunals pursuant to the suggestion of Mr. Jefferson, both in respect to persons serving in armed vessels and with land forces against a friendly people, but it was found that the states either possessed no laws reaching the difficulty, or felt no disposition to enforce them (2 Marshall's Life of Washington, 233, 334), and that juries would not be governed by the law as laid down by the national judges in the federal courts (Whart. St. Tr. 83, 88).

In this state of the subject, the president in his speech at the opening of the next congress, called the attention of congress to his proclamation and the regulations he had caused to be adopted, to enforce neutrality, and it is most plain, he contemplated and solicited the interposition of the legislature to compel the citizens to conform in all respects to the principles of the law of nations, recognized and observed on the part of the government, in regard to friendly powers. He says, "It rests with the wisdom of congress to correct, improve or enforce the plan of procedure (adopted by the administration), and it will probably be found expedient, to extend the legal code and the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States to many cases, which, though dependent on principles already recognized, demanded some further provisions. Where individuals shall, within the United States, array themselves in hostility against any of the powers at war, or enter upon military expeditions or enterprises within the jurisdiction of the United States, or usurp and exercise judicial authority within the United States; or where the penalties or violations of the law of nations may have been indistinctly marked, or are inadequate, these offences cannot receive too early and close an attention, and require prompt and decisive remedies." 1 Wait, St. Pap. 40; 1 Am. St. P. (Foreign Relations) 22. It is to be remarked, that out of three of the above four special calls for extending the criminal code, one only directly relates to a state of neutrality, the others looking to provisions for maintaining the sovereignty and peace of the United States in their relations with foreign powers, as well in peace as at war with each other.

The act of June 5, 1794, was passed the same session of congress, to which the above recommendation was addressed, and it deserves notice, as evidence of the scope and design of the enactment as understood by those active in producing its passage, that Mr. Jefferson, in 1806, as president, with the concurrence of Mr. Madison, secretary of state, caused prosecutions against Smith and Ogden and Col. Burr to be instituted, for setting on foot in the United States, warlike expeditions against provinces of Spain, and without any allusion to the offences imputed against them being violations of our neutral obligations. 4 Jefferson's Writings, 86; Id. 103. At these periods Spain was nominally in alliance with France, but was secretly negotiating with England and Russia to come into the confederacy against Napoleon, and was therefore considered by them as quasi neutral. Ann. Reg. 1806, 1807; 4 Allison's Europe. And when the case of Smith and Ogden came before the United States court, Judge Patterson, without making any distinction in respect to belligerents, charged the grand jury that the principles of non-intervention embodied in the 5th section were founded upon the law of nations. Smith and Ogden's Trial, p. 219; also, p. 83. So it seems the policy and intent of this law has always been understood by the executive under every administration. An eminent statesman and jurist, speaking in the name of the government, declares its purpose was to prevent individuals being at war whilst their government is at peace. This exposition comports with the specific recommendations of President Washington. The United States, Mr. Webster remarks, have thought the salutary law of non-intervention by our nation with the affairs of others, is liable to be essentially impaired, if while the government refrains from interference, interference is still allowed to its subjects, individually or in masses.

The government of the United States has not considered it as sufficient to confine the duties of neutrality and non-interference to the case of governments whose territories lie adjacent to each other. The principle they regard the same, if those territories be divided by half the globe. The rule is founded on the impropriety and danger of allowing individuals to make war on their own authority, or, by mingling themselves in the belligerent operations of other nations, to run the hazard of counteracting the policy or embroiling the relations of their own government, and the United States have been the first among civilized nations to enforce that observance of this just rule of neutrality and peace by special and adequate legal enactments. By these laws it is prescribed to the citizens of the United States, what is understood to be their duty as neutrals by the law of nations, and their duty also which they owed to the interest and honor of their own country. Mr. Webster's letter to Mr. Fox, April 24, 1842; 1 Ex. Docs. (27th Cong., 3d Sept.) p. 127. The executive government since that period has adhered to the doctrine avowed in the above despatch, and denounced as a violation of the law of the land all acts contravening the terms of the 6th section of the act of 1818. That the law applies to and prohibits the setting on foot warlike expeditions in the United States to be carried on against any friendly power, was strongly maintained and declared during the administration of Mr. Van Buren.

The president in his proclamation of Nov. 21, 1838, declares that the combination or association of citizens of the United States to disturb the peace of the dominions of a friendly nation, is a violation of the laws providing for the performance of our obligations to the other powers of the world, and of that sacred code of laws by which national intercourse is regulated. 1 Ex. Docs. (3d Sept., 25th Cong.) p. 34. In his message to congress the president is distinct and explicit in asserting "that military invasions by our citizens into friendly countries and the commission of acts of violence on the members thereof, in order to effect a change in their government, or under any pretext whatever, have from the commencement of our government, been held equally criminal on the part of those engaged in them, and as much deserving of punishment as would be the disturbance of the public peace by the perpetration of similar acts within our own territory." These principles the president says were cherished and established by the great and good men who declared and established our independence, and were maintained at a highly critical period in our history, and subsequently embodied in highly penal enactments, the faithful enforcement of which he regards inseparably associated with the maintenance of our national honor. Id. pp. 5, 6. This language of the president was applied to the non-interference provisions of the statute, and not to those which may be strictly termed the neutrality clauses, and what he solicited from congress was a precautionary law to enable the executive to anticipate parties attempting the commission of the offences named in the 6th section and arrest them or their means before the acts should be actually consummated. So Attorney General Butler, in his opinion, upon the power of the president to seize, under the act of 1818, the arms of citizens setting on foot a military expedition against Canada, assumes that the 6th section applies to enterprises such as those then carried on against Canada. 2 Op. Attys. Gen. U. S. 1176. Neither the president or attorney general regard it an ingredient of the offence, that the state to be invaded, should be at war with another.

Looking at the provisions of the first section of the act of 1838, prepared as is understood with the sanction of the president, the secretary of state and attorney general, it seems to import a most explicit recognition that the acts done and means provided in the United States for carrying on warlike enterprises or expeditions into Canada, were in the then state of that province and the country, infractions of the 6th section of the act of 1818, and what was needful was something more than punishment by fine and imprisonment for the offences, when perpetrated, "provided," as the president says, "the parties can be found." It was a summary authority to intercept and break up the design by seizing the means provided for carrying it on, and by arresting and holding to adequate bail persons suspected of being concerned in the enterprises. Act 1838, §§ 1, 6, 7.

This is all I deem necessary to be said in this connection in relation to the views of the executive department of the government, antecedent and subsequent to the passage of the law (and in this respect the acts of 1794 and 1818 may be regarded identical), showing that it was called for and always accepted and enforced as a law, no less of non-interference by our citizens by military expeditions against nations at peace with all the world, than one prohibiting acts of hostility in favor of any belligerent power against another in peace with the United States. This topic, however, being the one on which the defendants chiefly rely, they insisting the act of congress does not apply to the facts alleged against them, and the question being of great public moment to our own citizens and in our relations with foreign governments, it is meet the subject should be considered under other aspects. And I think the import of the law collected from its face, according to the established rules of interpretation plainly denotes the intention of congress to stamp as crimes acts done within our territories, designed to violate the peace and rights of a friendly people, whatever may be the relation of such people in respect to other nations. The cardinal consideration is, are they in amity with the United States, and if so, no persons shall be permitted within our jurisdiction, to take any warlike measures designed to disturb that peace.

We have already seen that the attention of congress was called to the subject of this law, because of unwarrantable usurpation of powers within the United States by the French minister. He openly claimed the right, and attempted to exercise it, to commission, arm, equip and man cruisers in our ports to commit hostilities on nations with whom the French were at war, and also to recruit land forces, issue commissions to officers, and organize within and march from our territories such forces against Florida and Louisiana, the dominions of Spain, or any other enemy of France. 2 Marshall's Life of Washington, 283, 287, 288, 334, 335. He publicly denied the power of this government to prevent his doing such acts, and a governor of a Western state, in which a warlike expedition was setting on foot against New Orleans, when required by the president to suppress it, coincided with the French minister, and denied there was any law of the United States prohibiting the enterprise. Id. 334, 335. This was in 1793. The measures taken by congress were designed to extend the criminal laws, and bring within them the very acts the government complained of and was endeavoring to suppress. It is nowhere said or intimated in the statute that this was done to maintain our neutrality in a technical sense. The act takes the title of an act "for the punishment of crimes against the United States," and only the 3d and 4th sections have express reference to acts in relation to other nations at war. The act under the same title was continued in force March 2, 1797, and made perpetual April 24, 1800. Nothing is more common than for the legislature to make provision in a public statute for matters beyond and distinct from the special causes which promoted its passage, and no principle of construction limits the operation of a statute to a particular mischief it remedies, when others of a kindred character are brought within its language.

It is the constant course of legislation, in removing a special evil or mischief, to make the enactments affecting it broad enough to suppress others, whether similar in character or wholly distinct from it in their nature. In such cases the statute is never interpreted to have relation only to the subject which more particularly called it into existence, but is made to operate in conformity to its language. Its true meaning is to be sought for in the body of the act itself. 1 Kent, Comm. 460, 463. Reading the act of 1794, with a view to these sensible and satisfactory rules of interpretation, it is difficult to see ground for doubt, that it does embrace and is carefully framed to include a class of offences distinct from those commonly understood to be infractions of the laws of neutrality. It devotes two sections specifically to those particular offences, and then furthermore declares to be high misdemeanors, for our citizens to enlist in foreign service or take commissions in it, or for any person within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, to set on foot a military expedition, &c., &c., against any state, people, &c., with whom the United States are at peace. I see no mode of satisfying this language, but in holding it comprehends all the acts denounced, when committed within the United States, against a friendly power, without respect to his relationship to other powers. This, it appears to me, has been the acceptation in which the act has been received by our judges and most eminent jurists since its enactments.

The first instance in which the 5th section of the act of 1794 appears to have been acted upon judicially, was in the case of Bollman and Swartwout. The main point in the case related to other questions, but after the court had decided that the prisoners could not be held in the District of Columbia under imprisonment there for treason committed elsewhere, and that the facts in evidence did not prove the crime of treason, a question seems to have been made whether the prisoners were not liable to prosecution and to be detained under the 5th section of the act of 1794 for trial. The court say, "Admitting the affidavit of Genl. Wilkinson, both prisoners were guilty of a most culpable enterprise against the dominions of a power at peace with the United States." They then rehearse the provisions of the 5th section, and remark that "there is a want of precision in the description of the offence which might produce some difficulty in deciding what cases came within it." U. S. v. Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 136, 137. The court thereupon discharged the prisoners, because the crime of treason for which they were arrested, was not proved against them and as they were not committed for setting on foot a military enterprise against the dominions of Spain, nor was it suggested that the offence had been committed within the District of Columbia, they ought not to be detained for that cause. The recognition of the act by the court as applicable to a warlike expedition from the United States against a friendly nation, without any reference to the proceeding having connection with a belligerent power, affords strong negative evidence, that the court did not regard the circumstance of such concurrence, to be an ingredient in the offence. But this implication is made to amount to almost conclusive evidence, by the proceedings the succeeding summer in the United States circuit court in Virginia against Col. Burr, already alluded to. He was not indicted, for any act of aid to one belligerent against another or otherwise violating the neutrality of the United States, but for setting on foot a military expedition in this country against the dominions of a nation at peace with the United States. On that occasion the point would directly arise and be cardinal for the defence of Col. Burr, if he was only indictable under the statute, for acts in aid of one belligerent against another. For supposing the fact that Spain, at the time, was at war with some other power with which the United States were at peace, a military expedition from the United States against the dominions of Spain in America, without concert or connection with any other belligerent, would not be regarded a violation of neutrality, on the part of the United States, but a direct act of invasion and war upon Spain. Vatt. Law Nat. 360. Each belligerent may indirectly in that manner aid the other against a common enemy; but, by making a common enemy and a common cause, the relationship of neutrality is abandoned and the attacking party becomes himself a belligerent. The defence was direct and patent, therefore, for Col. Burr, that the matters charged against him in the indictment were no violation of the statute, inasmuch as they were not, the assistance of one belligerent against its antagonist, so that if committed by the United States the acts would amount to a breach of their neutrality, if that fact any way affected the offence. It is not to be supposed a point so apparent and vital to the cause in one aspect, could have escaped the notice of the court and defence. Col. Burr was himself a member of the United States senate, and his counsel, Mr. Harper, a member of the house when the act passed; his counsel, Mr. Randolph, was secretary of state, and Mr. Lee, attorney general, the same year, and the presiding judge, shortly after, a member of congress and secretary of state. The presiding judge, the defendant and several of his counsel being thus lawyers and statesmen cotemporaries with the enactment of the law in question, and prominently active in the political agitations of the day, out of which the statute originated, had its purpose been solely to prevent a breach of our neutral relations with other countries, nothing could have been more familiar to the minds of those men than the fact that it was designed to have an operation so limited; and no evidence of a negative character can be more impressive and stringent, than the common assent on that trial, that the charges set forth made out a case of violation of the statute in its letter and intent. So, also, in the prosecution of Smith and Ogden, the indictment was for setting on foot a military expedition from the United States against Caraccas, Venezuela or Columbia, and other acts within the description on the 5th section of the statute only. That was also instituted under the presidency of Mr. Jefferson and the charges on which the accusation was grounded, were held by Attorney General Breckenridge to be an infraction of the act of 1794 for which the accused were subject to punishment. 1 Op. Attys. Gen. U. S. 98. Its design was to revolutionize that province, then being in a state of peace abroad, and with no domestic insurrection or disturbance. Enc. American Arts; Columbia, Miranda. Yet no exception was taken by the learned and zealous counsel who conducted the defence, and who brought to its support every topic which could tend to ward the prosecution from the defendants and fasten on the administration wrongful conduct and motives in instigating and directing it, nor was it suggested such a warlike expedition was no violation of the law, because it was no breach of neutral obligations. If not an innocent commercial expedition, as the defence maintained it to be, they took the other alternative, that it was direct and positive war, urged with the assent and concurrence of the government. In such posture of the defence, the prosecution stood defeated palpably upon the indictment, if the 5th section of the act of 1794 only interdicted those acts which were in violation of the neutrality of the country. The counsel and the court took no such limited view of the case. They understood the statute according to its plain reading, and the intimation was nowhere made in the whole range of the animated and not always entirely decorous discussions on the trial, that the statute did not embrace private acts of hostility begun to be carried on from the United States against a friendly power, in the largest sense of that language. Judge Patterson, in commenting on the provision of the act in question and its policy, says it is declaratory of the law of nations, and besides, every species of private and unauthorized hostilities is inconsistent with the principles of the social compact and the very nature, scope and end of civil government. Trial of Smith and Ogden, 83; Whart. St. Tr. 55, 62 (Chief Justice Jay and Mr. Justice Wilson). The act of March 3, 1817 [3 Stat. 370], in its title and all the provisions, is strictly a neutrality act, and was occasioned by the insurrections and revolutions going on at the time in the South American and Mexican provinces. But so anomalous and extraordinary had been the character of hostilities and proceedings with some of those states and of citizens of the United States acting under assumed authority from them, that the attention of congress was called to the subject by a special message of President Monroe. 1 Am. St. P. (15th Cong., 1st Sess.) pp. 4, 5, Dec., 1817. The same session, the committee of foreign relations of the house of representatives reported a bill which, after long debates and repeated amendments, ultimately became the act of April 20, 1818. Journals, House Reps., 15th Cong., 1st Sess. That law purports in its title, to be a crimes act, and not one to preserve the neutral relations of the United States. It embodies the acts of 1794 and 1817, with alterations and additions. It is not now material to collate the three statutes, but it is observable that the last marks with more precision and exactness than the preceding ones the cases of violations of neutral obligations provided against. It also creates offences not named in the acts of 1794 and 1817, and which in no sense can be arranged under neutral obligations. For instance the 4th section, in relation to citizens of the United States being concerned, out of the United States, in privateers cruizing against the property of citizens of the United States. And it is doubtful, upon the terms of the statute, whether enlisting, within the United States, in the service of any foreign power, or going out of the United States with intent to enlist, is not made an offence, without regard to the employment of such soldier or sailor in the foreign service. The sections of the act which in terms indicate a reference to neutral duties, are the first, fourth and fifth; the 2d, 6th and 8th have no such connection in language, and must take effect independently of that consideration, unless upon the principles of reasonable construction, they are found limited to that application. The act has been otherwise always understood by our public functionaries executive and judicial.

President Van Buren, in his message to congress of Dec. 3, 1838, before cited, in reference to the hostile movements on foot in this country against Canada, says, "It is by the laws already made criminal in our citizens by unauthorized military operations on their part, to embarrass or anticipate the decision of congress, whether the country shall interfere with or be made a party to the struggle in those provinces." In his message of January 5, 1838 (which led to the act of 1838), the president further says, "The existing laws are insufficient to guard against hostile invasions, from the United States, of the territory of friendly and neighboring nations. The laws now in force provide sufficient penalties for the punishment of such offences after they have been committed, and provided the parties can be found; but the executive is powerless in many cases to prevent the commission of them, even when in possession of ample evidence of an intention, on the part of evil disposed persons, to violate our laws." 2 Executive Documents (25th Cong., 2d Sess.) Document 64. And the act of March 10, 1838 [5 Stat. 212], passed in compliance with the instance of the president, to aid the execution of the 6th section of the act of 1818, most manifestly indicates the understanding of congress that the offences denounced came within the meaning of that statute, and the latter one was required in the peculiar situation of the two countries to enable the president to enforce the former according to its spirit and intent.

Mr. Webster in his correspondence with the British minister, Mr. Fox, on this subject, before cited, also represents the act of 1818 as covering the very case of an invasion of Canada, from the United States, in a time of peace, within and without the provinces. 1 Ex. Docs. (27th Cong., 3d Sess.) p. 127. So, also, President Taylor in his proclamation, August 11, 1849, expressly pronounces the alleged enterprises on foot in the United States against Cuba, to be a violation of the criminal laws of the United States. 3 Ex. Docs. (1st Sess., 31st Cong.) pt. 1. The same declaration is repeated, by authority of President Fillmore, by Mr. Webster, in public instructions to the U. S. attorneys. Circular, Sept. 3, 1850. So far as the act has come within the cognizance of the United States judges, they have invariably recognized the 6th section as applicable to and designed to punish such state of facts. In 1835, the grand jury of this district submitted to the circuit judges the enquiry whether it was a violation of that section, for persons to hold meetings in this city and appoint committees to provide means and make collections for the purpose of enabling the inhabitants of Texas to engage in a civil war with Mexico, now at peace with the United States. The judges, Thompson and Betts, answered in writing, that the section applied to military expeditions to be carried on from the United States, and that the case supposed did not fall within it. But the answer necessarily imports the opinion of the judges that such military expedition would be a violation of the law. 3 Ex. Docs. (25th Cong., 2d Sess.). Judge Rawle, of the local court, New Orleans, in effect ruled the same point. Id. p. 22. Judge Conkling, in a letter to Mr. Fillmore in congress, on this subject, puts the same construction upon the 6th section of the act. He notes a defect in the statute in not providing sufficient precautionary means to enable the government to arrest persons entering upon such enterprises before the crime is consummated. 3 Ex. Docs. (3d Sess., 25th Cong.) Doc. 35.

Judge McLean, in a matured charge delivered the grand jury, in relation to the hostile movements from our territories upon Canada, in 1838, declares the 6th section of the act has application to military expeditions of that character, against a people at peace with us and within itself. [See Charge to the Grand Jury] 2 McLean, 1. It may be added that this court, in 1850, gave similar instructions to the grand jury in this district, in respect to military expeditions against Cuba, and repeated the same sentiment to the grand jury who found the indictment now under consideration. In the circuit court at New Orleans, Judge McCaleb recently instructed the grand jury that the act applies to the case of setting on foot or providing means for a military expedition against Cuba, from the United States; and in his charge to the petit jury on the trial of the indictment and after prolonged discussions upon the subject, he adheres to that interpretation of the law. Pamph. Rep. pp. 4, 7, 29.

After this review of the subject in its various bearings, I am prepared to say, that upon the plain language of the statute, —from the circumstances which induced its passage, the double obligation of the government to keep individual citizens aloof from the conflicts of foreign powers, and to prevent their making private war upon nations at amity with us,—from the concurrent views of executive and judicial officers as to the meaning and design of the statute, that the case made by this indictment comes within the purpose and meaning of the sixth section of the act of 1818 and is a manifest violation of its provisions. The motion to quash the indictment cannot, therefore, on these views of the subject, prevail. But I would remark that, notwithstanding my own conviction, resulting from a careful survey of the questions debated on this motion, that the acts of the defendants charged in the indictment, constitute an infraction of the sixth section of the act of 1818, and are sufficiently laid in the indictment; yet, in deference to the opinion of the distinguished counsel of the defendants, so earnestly expressed and so ably supported, I shall submit this decision to the consideration of the judge of the circuit court; and if he suggests a doubt of the justness of the conclusions adopted in it, or shall intimate that he does not concur in them, I will then remit the case to the circuit court, that the defendants may, by means of a difference of opinion of the two judges, have the points certified to the supreme court for final decision.

[See Cases Nos. 15,973 and 15,975.]

Case No. 15,975.

UNITED STATES v. O'SULLIVAN.

[2 Whart. Cr. Law, § 2802, note.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1851.

MILITARY EXPEDITIONS AGAINST FRIENDLY PEOPLES — STATUTE OF 1818 — WHAT CONSTITUTES THE OFFENCE — CRIMINAL LAW — PROVINCE OF JURY.

[1. Before the jury can convict any persons of preparing or setting on foot, etc., an expedition against any prince, people, etc., with whom the United States are at peace, under the act of 1818, it must be proved to their satisfaction that the purpose of the expedition or enterprise was some military service, some attack or invasion of another people or country as a military force. To constitute the offence there must be a hostile intention connected with the act of beginning or setting on foot the expedition.]

[Quoted in U. S. v. Lumsden, Case No. 15,641.]

[2. When connected with this hostile intent, there are four acts which the statute declares unlawful, either one of which completes the crime; namely: (1) to "begin" an expedition; (2) to "set on foot" an expedition; (3) to "provide the means" for an expedition; and (4) to "procure" those means.]

[3. To constitute the offence it is not essential that the expedition should start for its destination. On the contrary, the law is designed to reach any act done within the jurisdiction of the United States in preparation for, or furtherance of, a warlike expedition against a people with whom the United States are at peace, without regard to whether the expedition was ever actually started on its way or not.]

[4. The law of 1818 is not a neutrality law merely, which applies only during a state of war, in order to prevent our citizens from interfering as against one of the belligerents. On the contrary, it applies to all hostile expeditions or purposes designed to violate the peace and rights of a people at peace with the United States, whether they be at war with any other nation or not.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Lumsden, Case No. 15,641.]

[5. The statute of 1838 does not affect the application of the law of 1818 to all ordinary cases. The former act was only a temporary provision, adapted to the peculiar conditions of the Northern frontier, and intended to stop incursions into the Canadas.]

[6. The guilty purpose must be proved, and the guilty acts done within the judicial district, where the indictment is found.]

[7. In criminal cases in the federal courts the jury are not the judges of the law, as well as of the facts. They are to understand and accept the law as it is stated to them by the court.]

[See Cases Nos. 15,973 and 15,974.]

JUDSON, District Judge (charging jury). "The cause now to be committed to you is that of the United States against John L. O'Sullivan, Lewis Schlessinger, and A. Irvin Lewis, all of whom have been arrested. Schlessinger, having given bail, does not appear, and the case goes on against O'Sullivan and Lewis. The indictment is found on the 6th section of an act of congress, passed April 20, 1818 [3 Stat 449]. The section is in the following words: 'That if any person, shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or procure the means for any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district or people, with whom the United States are at peace, every such person so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor.' The indictment contains ninety-seven counts, setting out in different forms the offence supposed to have been committed against this act. These various forms of declaring are adopted for the purpose of meeting the phraseology peculiar to this act. At the same time it is not claimed that more than one offence has been committed. You will, therefore, be unembarrassed with these matters of form. The 10th count must be laid out of the case. In the disposition of this case much depends upon the proper construction of this act of congress; and on this subject we are to be governed by established rules; and, so far as I have been able to investigate the matter, we shall have no occasion to seek out any new or untried rules for our guide. And, first of all, it is an undeniable proposition, that all penal statutes are to receive a strict construction. This is a penal statute, and it falls within this rule. The terms used are not to be extended beyond their natural import to fix an offence on the defendant; but this rule, on the other hand, does not require any such construction as to fritter it away, and defeat its object, and annul the law itself. I will then state to you, in the outset, some of these essential rules, and point out their application. We are to look at the spirit, intent, and object of a law—what mischief it was intended to prevent, and in what manner the remedy is to be applied? What, then, is this law? Its great object—the all-pervading object of this law—is peace with all nations—national amity—which will alone enable us to enjoy friendly intercourse and uninterrupted commerce, the great source of wealth and prosperity—in short, to prevent war, with all its sad and desolating consequences. These being the objects of this law, they are sufficiently important to arrest the intention of both court and jury, and secure, to the United States and to the accused, a fair and impartial trial. Before the jury can convict on this indictment, it must be proved to their satisfaction that the expedition or enterprise was in its character military; or, in other words, it must have been shown by competent proof that the design, the end, the aim, and the purpose of the expedition, or enterprise, was some military service, some attack, or invasion of another people or country, state, or colony, as a military force. The engagement of men to invade or attack any other people or country, by force and strong hand—the designation of officers—the classification and arrangement of men into regiments, squadrons, battalions, or companies; the divisions of the men into infantry, cavalry, artillery, or riflemen; the purchase of vessels or steamboats—military stores—such as powder or ball—for an expedition, give character to the expedition itself, provided that there is sufficient proof to satisfy the jury that they are to be used. But any expedition or enterprise in matters of commerce or of business, of a civil nature, unattended by a design of an attack, invasion, or conquest, is wholly legal, and is not an expedition or an enterprise within this act. A colonization, expedition, or enterprise is not unlawful. It contemplates only a peaceful settlement, without intention or design to make war upon people, or to overturn their government. To constitute a misdemeanor under the law of 1818, there must have been a hostile intention connected with the act of beginning or setting on foot the expedition. This intended hostility, or this intended peaceful movement, characterizes the act of beginning or setting on foot an expedition. The one makes it military, and the other makes it colonization. How this distinctive character shall be shown depends on the proof. A vessel, armed and equipped, with all the implements and munitions of war, with men organized into companies, might be a striking spectacle; but even then, we should inquire of the proof, what they were to do, and what their destiny was. Without such qualifying proof it might still be lawful, but with it the military character might be established. In this sense, declarations of intentions would do much to develop the real object, and the object is the great thing to be sought for. A specious covering, an artifice, secret movements, or deceptive proceedings, may aid in fixing the true character of any act.

"These remarks lead me to the consideration of such acts as are penal under the law of 1818. The term 'expedition' is used to signify a march or voyage with martial or hostile intentions. The term 'enterprise' means an undertaking of hazard, an arduous attempt. 'Begin' is to do the first act; to enter upon. We may say, with all propriety, that to begin an enterprise is to take the first step; the initiatory movement of an enterprise, the very formation and commencement of an expedition. 'To set on foot,' is to arrange, to place in order, to set forward, to put in way of being ready. Then 'to provide,' is to furnish and supply, and 'to procure the means,' is to obtain, bring together, put on board, to collect. After all these proofs are made out, the prosecution must further show that the beginning, the setting on foot, or the providing or procuring materials for such an expedition or enterprise, were within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, and to be carried on from thence, against the territory or dominions of some foreign prince or state, colony or district, or people, with whom the United States were at peace. You will see, by a careful attention to this law, that there are four acts which are declared to be unlawful, and which are prohibited by the statute. To 'begin' an expedition—to 'set on foot' an expedition—to 'provide' the means for an enterprise; and lastly to 'procure' those means. It is not necessary that all these distinct provisions shall be violated to constitute the offence—the proof of either one of them will be deemed sufficient. These are put in the alternative. As an illustration of what has been said thus far, I will remark—that to purchase, charter, repair, or fit up any vessel or steamboat; to procure and put on board such vessel or steamboat, powder, ball, fire-arms, military stores, ship stores, or any of them, to be used at any place in contravention of, and with an intent to violate, this act, is proper evidence; to enlist, engage verbally, or contract with men as officers, soldiers, or musicians, to go out on such an expedition, as I have defined, may be considered by the jury, as providing and procuring the means of a military expedition and enterprise; and if the proof shows the additional fact, that these means were provided and procured for a military expedition, or enterprise, then it is your business to consider such acts as falling directly within this law.

"It is not essential to the case that the expedition should start, much less, that it should have been accomplished. To 'begin' is not to 'finish.' To 'set on foot' is not to accomplish. To provide and procure powder is not to put to it the match, or the percussion. It is not necessary that the vessel should actually sail, nor is it necessary that war should exist between the nation on which the descent is to be made, with another nation.

"The counsel for the defence, in the course of the argument, have laid down several important propositions of law, of which I have been called upon to speak to you. They put forward this as the leading proposition, to wit:

"(1) 'The jury are judges of the law of the case.' This question has been argued at great length and with great zeal, enforcing upon you the propriety of adopting this as a rule of our proceeding. Now, why is this? The law is not so—the law never was so in the United States courts—and I think I may safely add, that it never can be so. I refer to the opinion of the late Judge Story, and especially to a very late opinion of Judge Curtis, one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States, which has been read to us. These opinions settle the matter, that the court is to judge of the law, and that the jury are to understand the law as it is pronounced by the court. Judge Thompson always so held in this circuit—so, I believe, in all the other circuits. No principle can be better settled, or more universally acquiesced in. It is no advantage to the jury to possess this power, and any attempt to exercise it, is a direct violation of the oath of the jury. What has surprised me is, that counsel, with all the knowledge of these decisions, should argue for hours that this is not law. Yet we have heard of such arguments here, and it becomes my duty to tell you that no countenance can be given to the proposition. But I think it requires and deserves the unqualified disapprobation from the place which I occupy.

"(2) 'This expedition, whatever it might have been, had never gone forth.' Now, gentlemen, this proposition is not the law of the United States, which you have sworn to support. The statute does not require that the expedition should go out, and the decisions which I will soon read to you will settle this in like manner.

"(3) 'That the law of 1818 is a neutrality law merely, and designed only to apply to a state of war.' Well, this proposition must stand also corrected by numerous determinations, which I will incorporate into my remarks. Again, it is said that

"(4) 'The law of 1838 shows that the law of 1818 could not operate.' The law of 1838 was a temporary law, adapted to the peculiar condition of the Northern frontier; and a new rule of evidence was introduced, founded on probable cause alone, as sufficient authority to seize and stop the incursions into the Canadas—then, by this law of 1838, a new set of officers were vested with the power to take possession and stop the invasion. It is, therefore, inapplicable, and may be laid out of view.

"(5) 'If convicted, these defendants are to be sent to the state prison.' This is not so. These varied propositions of the law cannot be sustained by this court. I will have you distinctly understand that the defence cannot be aided by these propositions—they will afford no security to the defendants, and I think it peculiarly unfortunate that the defence should be placed on grounds so untenable. And I shall here entreat you by no means to hazard the cause of the defendants upon such grounds.

"Gentlemen of the Jury, you will see now, by what follows, that all these questions of law have been settled, leaving nothing for me to do except to acquiesce in the law as it has been declared and pronounced by all the learned judges in the United States, who have passed upon the questions. The decisions have been uniform, and surely it would be worse than presumption in me, even to question what has been thus established by such high and ample authority. My business is to pronounce the law as it is, and it is yours so to receive it, and be satisfied. I hold in my hand the able opinion of the Hon. Judge Betts, delivered after full argument on this very indictment, delivered from this bench last July. Every question of law raised in this argument was then decided. How can I reverse that judgment? You know who pronounced it, and the great weight to which it is entitled, from the long experience and great learning of that judge. I find, also, by the report itself, that these questions have been submitted to the learned judge of the supreme court, who presides over this circuit—that he concurs in the law as there ruled; and, of course, it has become the law in my district, as well as in this, and while it stands unreversed, it is the law of the Union. I cannot stop here to read the whole report, but I will read in your presence a few extracts:

" 'This is all I deem necessary to be said in this connexion in relation to the views of the executive department of the government, antecedent and subsequent to the passage of the law (and in this respect the acts of 1794 and 1818 may be regarded as identical), showing that it was called for and always accepted and enforced as a law, no less of non-interference by our citizens—by military expeditions, against nations at peace with all the world, than one prohibiting acts of hostility in favor of any belligerent power against another at peace with the United States. This topic, however, being the one on which the defendants chiefly rely, they insisting the act of congress does not apply to the facts alleged against them, and the question being of great public moment to our own citizens, and in our relations with foreign governments, it is meet the subject should be considered under other aspects. And I think the import of the law collected from its face, according to the established rules of interpretation, plainly denotes the intention of congress to stamp as crimes acts done within our territories, designed to violate the peace and rights of a friendly people, whatever may be the relation of such people in respect to other nations. The cardinal consideration is, are they in amity with the United States, and, if so, no person shall be permitted within our jurisdiction, to take any warlike measure designed to disturb that peace? I see no mode of satisfying this language, but in holding that it comprehends all the acts denounced, when committed within the United States, against a friendly power, without respect to his relationship to other powers. This, it appears to me, has been the acceptation in which this act has been received by our judges and most eminent jurists since its enactment. It is no part of the description of the offence that the expedition or enterprise shall have left the United States, and, accordingly, it can be of no essential importance to allege the particular point contemplated for its departure.'

"The guilty purpose must be proved, and the guilty acts to be all done within the district of New York, and it in no way qualifies or affects the character of these particulars, whether the defendants intended to put off the expedition at Castine, Galveston, or any intermediate point.

"I have occasion to refer again to the opinion of Judge Betts, contained in his charge to a grand jury of this district, and the legal argument which it embraces is so much in accordance with my own views, that I deem it proper to make it a part of my charge. The clerk will oblige me by reading it: 'The act of congress of April 10, 1814, prescribes the laws of neutrality which our citizens are bound to observe in regard to foreign nations. The provisions are stringent, but no more so than comports with the high character for justice and good faith towards others, which it is the policy and aim of this government to maintain. In leaving to every citizen, as an individual, the undisputed right to expatriate himself, at his own option, and connect himself with any other nation or people, this government still possesses the unquestionable power to prohibit that citizen, individually, or in association with others, entering into engagements or measures within the American territory, or upon American vessels, in hostility to other nations, and which may compromit our peace with them. It would be most deplorable if no such controlling power existed in this government, and if men might be allowed, under the influence of evil, or even good, motives, to set on foot warlike enterprises from our shores, against nations at peace with us, and thus, for private objects, sordid or criminal in themselves—or under the impulse of fanaticism or wild delusions—bring upon this country, at their own discretion, the calamities of war. The will of the nation is expressed, in this respect, by the statute of April, 1818. It attempts to guard against the infraction of the peace and rights of friendly powers by our own people, or by acts done within our territory, by inhibiting therein all proceedings of a warlike purpose or tendency, against any foreign government or people, with whom the United States are at peace. The only provisions of the statute which come within the scope of your inquiry to the court, and to which your attention should be addressed, are contained in the sixth section. The sixth section makes it a high misdemeanor for any person within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States to begin or set on foot, or provide, or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign power or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace. This language is very comprehensive and peremptory. It brands as a national offence the first effort or proposal by individuals to get up a military enterprise within this country against a friendly one. It does not wait for the project to be consummated by any formal array, or organization of forces, or declaration of war; but strikes at the inception of the purpose, in the first incipient step taken, with a view to the enterprise, by either engaging men, munitions of war, or means of transportation, or funds for its maintenance; and even further, it is not necessary that the means shall be actually provided and procured. The statute makes it a crime to procure those means. This would clearly comprehend the making ready, and the tender or offer of such means to encourage or induce the expedition; and may probably include also any plan or arrangements, having in view the aid and furtherance of the enterprise. Under this provision of the law, you will, therefore, inquire carefully whether any person or persons have been concerned within this district in getting up a hostile expedition against the Island of Cuba; whether by them, or through their agency or influence, men have been secured, enlisted, or employed, to carry it on; whether munitions of war, money, or transport vessels have been provided here for that object; and if the facts in proof fasten on any individual a participation in such acts, it is your duty to indict him for the violation of this statute, and present him for trial before this court. It must be manifest to you, gentlemen, that these criminal designs, if undertaken, will be managed with much disguise and caution; it is not probable that soldiers will be openly enlisted, or officers commissioned, or vessels freighted to transport munitions of war, or men to the field of action. Pretences and coloring will be employed to mask the real object the parties to such criminal proceedings contemplate. But if you discover the purpose really to be to supply the means of hostile aggression against Cuba, then all persons connected with it, and promoting it will be answerable for the violation of the laws of the United States in the undertaking, the same as if their proceedings had been openly and avowedly intended for a hostile invasion, and waging war on that community.'

"Superadded to this authority," continued Judge JUDSON, "which alone would be conclusive on me, we have the opinions of Judge M'Lean, Judge Catron, Judge Story, Judge M'Kinley, and Judge M'Caleb, all to the same point, fully and powerfully sustaining the decision of Judge Betts. I think I may say to you, with entire confidence, that the law is well settled, that the acts charged in this indictment fall within this law, and that the proper defence to be urged before you was, that the government have failed to prove the allegations in the indictment, and there the defence must rest. These are wholly questions of fact, belonging to the jury; and I am the last person to invade your rights, or to interfere with your exclusive privileges in weighing the testimony in all criminal cases. I would not, if I could, do that, because there is a sufficient responsibility on me without assuming yours. No, gentlemen, you are left free to be influenced by your own convictions of duty, in weighing this evidence. If, upon your oaths, you can say that the facts in this case are not true, then it will afford me unspeakable pleasure to hear the verdict so pronounced, because I confide this part of the case to you, and you must be responsible to your own consciences for the result.

"But, before this case is committed to your deliberation, it may be proper to allude to an appeal that has been made to you, which certainly requires a trifling notice. It is said here, that there has not been a conviction upon this act, by any jury. This is the appeal; and the recent trials at the South are relied upon as guides for you also. But, gentlemen, it was no fault of the law that an acquittal took place there. The fault was elsewhere; and I should tell you that the fault rested with the jury, precisely as it did many years ago in Georgia, when the much-lamented Whitney sought, in that state, to recover for a wanton interference with his rights. The law was in his favor; it was so pronounced by the court, over and over again; yet he could not have a verdict for the redress of his great wrongs, because the jurors were influenced by their interests, and by their prejudices, to have the law thus violated. The state herself was dishonored, and the jurors must have lived to feel the sting of remorse.

"But, again, it has been said that Colonel Burr was not convicted of treason, and could not be convicted under the act of 1794, for a high misdemeanor. He was indicted in the District of Columbia,[1] instead of the state of Ohio, where the crime was committed. He ought to have been indicted in the right district, and there he might have been convicted. I may be excused in a passing remark regarding what has been said by the counsel for the defence, as to the district attorney, his preparation and management of this cause. The terms used, as you will bear me witness, were unusually severe, harsh, and reproachful, such as are not often heard in a court of justice. I am induced to this for the sole reason that I fear you may suppose, from my silence, that the attack was to be justified by the circumstances of the case. Personal assaults like these should not be made, unless there shall be found a clear warrant for them, in both the conduct and motive of the person assailed. It has been my fortune to have known the district attorney from his youth. He is a native of my own county, born and reared up in a town adjoining that of my birth-place. He was prepared for college life in the village where I live. When he presented himself for admission at our bar, it was my lot to examine his qualifications; and, as we there had an old-fashioned requirement of good character, he was reported to the court by me as being, in this particular, above all suspicion or reproach. I well remember how joyfully we received him into our fellowship, and with what entire confidence he was received and cheered onward by the public confidence. At the May session of our legislature, in 1823, though much my junior, he was my successor to an honorable post in that body. But he left it for a more ample field, and found it in your city, where he is well known to you all, as a high-minded member of the profession, incapable in his nature of intentional wrong to any human being. Since then, I have only seen him once or twice, until the fall of 1850, but I have not been ignorant of his high position here, earned, as it has been, by a life of honorable toil. Others there may be, who have entitled themselves to as good a name, and to an equal share of public confidence, but there are none who can, for themselves, claim a better fame, or a more honorable post in the profession; and nothing in the course of this trial has shaken, in the least degree, my confidence in his honor and integrity. Judge ye, whether the remarks to which I have here alluded, were just in their application, or worthy the source from whence they came.

[1] [Evidently a mistake. Burr was indicted and tried in the district of Virginia. See Case No. 14,692a.]

"There is another incident of this trial, which still lingers on my mind; but as it was a matter of personal, rather than a public, concern, I have some delicacy in taking the least notice of it. But, gentlemen, our relations thus far have been so friendly, that I confess I have a strong desire to carry home with me your good wishes, and for that purpose alone I may be indulged in saying that you all must remember that while the senior counsel was opening the defence, by an attack on an officer of this court, and after he was denounced in unmeasured terms, according to the views of the speaker, you were told 'that the court sanctioned the unlawful expedition on the treasury of the United States.' You will remember, also, that every eye, except that of the speaker, was fixed on the point of personal assault. You may remember, too, that the object of that attack, bitter and unkind as it was, sat in silence. A week has elapsed, and still the shaft is left. When this case is over, I expect to leave you, perhaps forever, and as I desire to carry back to my home your friendship and confidence, there is but one favor to be sought at your hands. For this reason I ask the jury to place these unmerited remarks by the side of the testimony of Burtinett, and let them both be stricken from the case. Perhaps you may say that it was my duty to have stopped all that portion of the argument which related to the law of the case, as was done recently by one of the most learned judges of the supreme court, Judge Curtis. Perhaps I should have done so; but on a moment's reflection you will see why I let the argument proceed. This is not my own judicial district; and as I am here in obedience to the law which has called me, and am a stranger to the jury, I did not wish even to appear to assume power which others might suppose belonged to you. I have heard it all. And again, I was equally disposed to give to these defendants every benefit of what their counsel might, by any possibility, conceive for their benefit. Hence the indulgence has been cheerfully granted; and I repeat, what cannot be too often repeated, that the defendants are entitled to every reasonable doubt arising out of the testimony.

"Now, gentlemen, I have endeavored to dispose of many of the difficulties and embarrassments which have hung around this case, and in some measure obscured the real merits, which are indeed so important to those defendants and to the country. In this humble effort, I hope that I may have aided you, and rendered your task somewhat less responsible. My wish and my object have been to render the case less complicated and more simple—to present to you only the real question to be tried. It is a question of fact merely. Give yourselves no trouble and no anxiety about anything else but the facts in the case. Have the allegations in this indictment been proved? That is all. This cause is put to you to be decided on its own merits—on the truth of the allegations contained in the indictment, as they are laid, in one or any of the counts except the nineteenth. You will, of course, remember that you are a New York jury, empanelled here, and not in New Orleans, nor in Mississippi—knowing, as you do, that your verdict must be according to the evidence given in court.

"A single word as to the facts: (1) From the evidence, you must be satisfied, beyond any reasonable doubt, that persons were combined to begin, or set on foot, a military expedition in the city of New York, to be carried on from thence against a territory with which the United States were at peace. (2) If from the evidence, you find such a combination or agreement to have been made, or understood by them, then what any one of those persons may have said or done, in relation to the expedition, becomes evidence against all. (3) The proof must establish in your mind, that the expedition or enterprise was a military enterprise, and evidence showing that the ends and objects were hostile or forcible against a nation at peace with the United States—then it is, to all intents and purposes, a military expedition. (4) The prosecution is bound to prove that act of beginning, or setting on foot, or that the means were provided or procured within the Southern district of New York. (5) You must be satisfied, from the evidence, that these defendants have done these acts, or participated in their being done, before you can return your verdict against them.

"The testimony is now before you, and that portion of it which has been presented through Mr. Johannisson, the interpreter, in a manner acceptable to both parties, requires your careful attention. To show you the important principle involved in the invaluable right of a jury trial, and as that right is to be preserved inviolate, I. shall leave the evidence in your hands, without naming a witness, or commenting upon any of the testimony, either written or parol. It is your province to weigh that evidence. and apply the law as now construed to that testimony, and return your verdict accordingly. Prejudices you should have none; they are unworthy of such men and such a cause. Partialities you cannot entertain, because your oath forbids their indulgence. You are not to convict or acquit because those accused are great men or small men, but only because the evidence of the case makes your duty plain. The law is no respecter of persons, and the glory of our land is, that, in the hands of an upright jury, the administration of justice reaches the high and the low, the rich and the poor, with unerring equality. The law never punishes to inflict a wound. The real objects are, to reform the individual, and to prevent others from like offences, so that life, property, and character may be made secure.

"To conclude, I will only say, do your duty to the government—do your duty to the accused, without fear or favor of any man—protect the innocent, but punish those who may have violated your laws. Let the evidence in court and your conscience be your guide. This will give you rest and peace."

For forms of indictment, see Whart. Prec. Ind. 1121, &c.

Case No. 15,976.

UNITED STATES v. The OTTAWA.

[Newb. 536.] [1]

District Court, D. Michigan. Jan., 1857.

STEAM PASSENGER VESSELS—INSPECTION AND REGULATION—FERRY BOATS.

1. [The exception in] the 42d section of the act of congress passed August 30, 1852 [10 Stat. 61], entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam,' passed July 7, 1838 [5 Stat. 304], and for other purposes," cannot be so construed as to exclude boats or vessels ordinarily used as ferry or tug boats.

[Cited in American Transp. Co. v. Moore, 5 Mich. 390.]

2. Where a steamboat, built for a ferry boat, used in her daily employment as such, and occasionally as a tug boat, was employed one day in making several trips from Detroit to Hamtramck, three miles distant, carrying passengers to the grounds of the state fair; held, that such use did not change the ordinary character of the boat, or take her from the exception of the statute, or make her liable to the penalties of the act.

[1] [Reported by John S. Newberry, Esq.]

In admiralty.

Levi Bishop, for libelants.
Walker & Russel, for the United States.

WILKINS, District Judge. This is a libel and information filed by the district attorney of the United States, on the complaint and information of one Thomas Chilvers, a resident of said district, in order to recover from the steamer Ottawa the penalty, by the second section of the act of congress of 1838 [5 Stat. 304], imposed on steamboats propelled in whole or in part by steam, transporting merchandise or passengers upon the navigable waters of the United States, without first having obtained a license under the provisions of the law, requiring the inspection of boilers and machinery. The first section of the act of 1852 [10 Stat. 61], amendatory of the act of 1838, provided that no such license should be granted by any collector, unless upon satisfactory evidence that all the provisions of the law were complied with, excepting, however, from its penal application, all steamers used as ferry boats, tug boats, towing boats and steamers under 150 tons burden, and used in whole or in part in the navigation of canals. By the libel, the court is informed, that on the 1st of October, 1856, the steamer Ottawa, owned by George B. Russel, was employed in the transportation of passengers on the Detroit river, between this city and the adjacent township of Hamtramck, without having been inspected or licensed pursuant to law. To this allegation the respondent avers, that the steamer Ottawa was built and used as a ferry boat and tug boat, and was enrolled and licensed as such, and as such was engaged on the day specified, and was always so used before and since: and that on the said day she made her regular trips as a ferry boat between Detroit and the town of Windsor, Canada West. The language of the exception contained in the forty-second section of the act of 1852, is very explicit; and taken in connection with the obvious design of the law, which was "the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels running on voyages between distant ports," cannot be so construed as to exclude boats or vessels ordinarily used as ferry or tug boats. In this case there was evidence that the municipal authority leased to the respondent the landing and wharf at the foot of Woodward avenue, to be used as a ferry landing: that he was the proprietor of a number of boats, used by him for the purposes of a ferry boat between this place and Windsor: and that this boat was built as a ferry boat, used as such, was daily employed in this ferry line, and occasionally as a tug boat. There is no proof that she was ever used as a passenger steamer, running between distant ports with either freight or passengers. On the day alleged in the libel, there being a state fair in the township of Hamtramck, she was employed in several trips in conveying visitors from the city to the fair grounds, and it is contended by the libelant, that these occasional trips changed her ordinary character as a ferry boat and took her out of the exception of the statute. I think otherwise. The exception is not confined to vessels licensed as ferry boats. Ferry license and ferry usage are two different terms. The one applies to the privilege, the other to the vessel; and the legislature evidently had in view the inspection of vessels constructed for voyages or trips of more than an hour's duration, and with the usual accommodations of state rooms and dormitories as passenger boats. The one class of steamers is more exposed to peril than the other, and to afford security to life was the object of the penalty imposed, while the exception cannot be considered as embracing only licensed ferries. Whether this boat was engaged at the time as a ferry boat, in running between this place and Hamtramck, is not deemed material; or, whether there was a regular license or not. There being evidence that she was built as a ferry boat, and that such was her daily occupation, is considered as bringing her within the spirit and letter of the statutory exception. Libel dismissed.

Case No. 15,977.

UNITED STATES v. OTTMAN et al.

[1 Hughes, 313.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. July, 1877.

JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—NONRESIDENTS OF THE DISTRICT—REMOVED CAUSES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—PLEA OF IMPRISONMENT.

1. Congress has constitutional power to confer jurisdiction on the United States courts, of suits brought against defendants non-resident in the districts where the suits are brought.

2. Congress has conferred this jurisdiction as to suits against non-residents, commenced in the state courts by attachment and removed into United States courts, by sections 2 and 4 of the act of March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 470], "to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States," etc., etc.

[Cited in Kelly v. Virginia Protection Ins. Co., Case No. 7,677; Fidelity Trust Co. v. Gill Car Co., 25 Fed. 741; Romaine v. Union Ins. Co., 28 Fed. 636; New York, I. & P. Co. v. Milburn Gin & Machine Co., 35 Fed. 229; Elliott v. Shuler, 50 Fed. 456.]

3. A special plea of imprisonment is not valid in a civil action.

This is a suit in equity, commenced by process of attachment, which was brought in the hustings court of the city of Alexandria, Virginia, and afterwards, on motion of the United States, removed into this court. The demand of the United States against Ottman is for $15,000, of which $10,000 is claimed from the banking company as held for [W. H.] Ottman. At the time of commencing the suit, this sum of $10,000, alleged to have been deposited by Ottman, and held on deposit in the German Banking Company of Alexandria, was attached; and publication was made, as required in such cases by the laws of Virginia. There were also attached in this suit certain shares of stock in the said banking company, and in the Alexandria Marine Railway Company, amounting in approximate value to two thousand dollars. The defendant, Ottman, is a citizen of the District of Columbia, and was at the time of the issuing of process in this suit, and is now, confined in the common jail there under indictment for complicity in the larceny of $47,000 from the treasury of the United States, of which it is charged this $10,000 deposited by him in the German Banking Company of Alexandria was a part. The suit was first brought in August, 1875, and some proceedings were had in it in the fall of that year, but until recently it has been allowed to await the result of the indictment pending against Ottman in the District of Columbia, which has been mentioned. In November, 1875, special appearance for the purpose, and motion, was made by the defendant, by counsel, to quash the attachments taken out in the cause, but the motion was overruled. Thereupon the defendant entered by leave a special appearance for the purpose, and filed, January 5th, 1876, a plea setting forth that he was held in jail by the plaintiffs in the District of Columbia, and thereby prevented from defending the suit. Afterwards, in May last, the defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, and also entered a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction. The plaintiffs demur to the first of the two pleas, and join in the other, and on this state of facts and pleadings the cause is now heard. Defendants' counsel also declare a purpose, if their plea to the jurisdiction is overruled, to demur to the bill, and have, in argument, set forth the grounds of their demurrer. The principal point relied on by counsel for the defendant in the argument is, the want of jurisdiction, by reason of Ottman being a non-resident of the district in which the suit was brought.

L. L. Lewis, U. S. Atty., and Jeremiah Wilson, for the United States.

Matthew H. Carpenter and Francis L. Smith, for defendant.

HUGHES, District Judge. This is an action in which the United States is complainant, and not one between citizen and citizen, in which either plaintiff or defendant must be a non-resident, in order that the court shall have jurisdiction. It is a suit which, to be effectual to secure the money claimed of the German Banking Company, must of necessity be brought in this district, and could not reach the money if brought in the District of Columbia. The object of the suit cannot be attained by suing elsewhere; and this suit, to accomplish the ends of justice by securing a trial on the merits, must proceed either in the state court or in this court. It is a case, therefore, for a liberal and not a narrow or technical construction of the law regulating the jurisdiction of the court. The provisions of law on which that jurisdiction depends are as follows: Section 1 of the act of congress of March 3, 1875, which appears as chapter 137 of the Acts of 1874–75 (18 Stat. 470), provides in substance, that the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, in which the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners. But no civil suit shall be "brought" before a circuit court of the United States against any person "by any original process" or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving such process or commencing such proceeding, "except as hereinafter provided." Section 2 provides that in any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, hereafter brought in any state court where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of five hundred dollars in which the United States shall be plaintiff or petitioner, either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district. On being so removed, "the cause shall then proceed as if it had been originally commenced in the said circuit court." And section 4 of the act in question provides in substance, that when any suit shall be removed from a state court to a circuit court of the United States, any attachment or sequestration of the goods or estate of the defendant had in such suit in the state court shall hold the goods or estate so attached or sequestered, to answer the final judgment or decree, "in the same manner as by law they would have been held to answer final judgment or decree, had it been rendered by the court in which such suit was commenced," etc., etc. This act of congress is substantially the same as the corresponding sections of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73].

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The decisions of the United States courts under this legislation of congress have been as follows: In Pollard v. Dwight, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 421, the proceeding was commenced by process of foreign attachment in the state court, and was removed by the defendants into the United States circuit court for that judicial district. The supreme court held that by appearing and pleading to issue the defendant waived all objection to the service of process. In Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 330, where suit was commenced in the federal court by foreign attachment, the supreme court decided that the process of foreign attachment cannot properly issue from a circuit court of the United States against the property of a person not resident in the judicial district for which the court is held, but that if a non-resident defendant appears to such process, and pleads to issue, he waives his exemption from liability to the service of process against him, and the court thereby acquires jurisdiction. In Levy v. Fitzpatrick, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 171, the court says: "No judgment can be rendered by a circuit court against any defendant who has not been served with process issued against his person in the manner pointed out in section 11, Judiciary Act of 1789 (section 1, Act 1875), unless the defendant waive the necessity of such process by entering his appearance to the suit." In Day v. Hayward and Chaffee v. Same, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 214, the court held in the general terms which it had used in Levy v. Fitzpatrick [supra]. That case was one where the suit was brought in the United States circuit court against a non-resident, and, on failure of the marshal to find the defendant, process of attachment had been taken out against the defendant's estate in accordance with the practice observed in the courts of that state. At the hearing the defendant had not appeared nor pleaded to issue, and it was held that there was no jurisdiction. In Herndon v. Ridgway, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 424, which was a suit in equity against several defendants who were non-residents, and who had not been served with process, the court said: "The jurisdiction of the circuit court over parties is acquired only by a service of process or their voluntary appearance. It has no authority to issue process to another state. In the present case the defendants decline to appear, and process cannot be served, so that the court is without jurisdiction over the essential parties to the bill." In Sayles v. Northwestern Ins. Co. [Case No. 12,421], it was decided that where a suit was commenced by foreign attachment in a state court, if the defendant appear there, and by motion remove the cause to the circuit court of the United States, it is then too late to object to the jurisdiction of that court, or to raise the objection in the United States court of non-residency in the judicial district. Five years after the decision of the supreme court in Day v. Hayward [supra], which was the latest of the cases cited above, the case of Barney v. Globe Bank of Boston [Case No. 1,031], was decided. It was there held that a suit commenced in a state court by attachment upon property of a non-resident defendant, without personal service upon the defendant, was within the meaning of the law of the United States relating to the removal of suits, and that the federal court has jurisdiction of the cause, if properly removed, whether the defendant appears or not, although it would not have jurisdiction to compel the attendance of defendant if the suit had been originally brought in that court. In the cases Pollard v. Dwight, Sayles v. Northwestern Ins. Co., and Barney v. Globe Bank of Boston [supra], the suits were commenced by attachment against the property of the non-resident defendant in the state court, and in each case the suit was removed into the federal court on the motion of the defendant. In each case the jurisdiction of the federal court was sustained. In the cases in 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 330, and 20 How. [61 U. S.] 214, suit was commenced by attachment in the federal court. In one of them the defendant appeared and pleaded to issue, and was held to have waived thereby his right of objection to the jurisdiction. In the other the defendant did not appear or plead to issue, and it was held that there was no jurisdiction to compel him to do so. In the cases in 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 171, and 17 How. [58 U. S.] 424, it was decided, generally, that judgment or decree cannot be rendered against a defendant unless service of process has been made upon him in the manner required by the 11th section of the act of 1789 (section 1. Act 1875).

The case now before us being one properly commenced in a state court, and properly removed to the federal court, it would seem to fall within the control of the decisions in Pollard v. Dwight, Sayles v. Northwestern Ins. Co., and Barney v. Globe Bank, and, being dissimilar in essential particulars from those in Peters and in Howard, which were not removed suits, would seem not to be governed by those cases. There can be no doubt that the suit was rightfully brought in the state court. It is not pretended but that that court possessed full jurisdiction to entertain and proceed in it. There can be no doubt that it was a removable suit, and that it has been removed here regularly, legally, and by proper proceeding. Indeed, counsel for defendant argued affirmatively that all these things were so, except the second proposition, as to which they maintain that it ought to have been a suit at law, and not in equity. They only contend that, now that the suit has got here, this court cannot proceed with it, for want of jurisdiction to proceed. But I think jurisdiction to remove carries jurisdiction to proceed. Section 1 of the act of 1875 provides only that such a suit as this shall not be brought here by original process. As this suit was not originally brought here, nor brought here at all by original process, that prohibition of the statute is not violated. True, the statute requires that, after a suit is removed here, it shall be proceeded in as if it had been originally commenced here, and it is contended that this requirement means only as "if originally commenced" here, and that inasmuch as the suit could not have been commenced here at all, it cannot be proceeded in here at all. Such a construction of the clause relied on would lead to the mockery of allowing a cause, proper for removal under the law, to be removed only for the purpose of turning it out of court. Such a construction is, of course, not to be given, if it can be avoided. Happily, this construction is especially forbidden by section 4 of the act, which makes an exception to this requirement of such suits as are commenced in state courts by attachment, and provides that, where any removed cause has been so commenced in the state court, such attachment shall hold the goods in the same manner as by law they would have been held to answer final judgment or decree, had it been rendered by the court in which such suit was commenced. This provision would be a mockery if the view of the defendant's counsel were correct. How could the money attached in the hands of the German Banking Company be held in this cause for such decree as the state court could have given, if no further step could be taken here, especially if, as defendant's counsel contend, the suit cannot now be remanded to the state court? Surely congress could not have intended that such an absurdity of consequences should be reached by judicial proceedings taken under its legislation.

The view of Mr. Justice Curtis, fully sustained by Judge Shipman, ought therefore in my judgment to prevail, that if the suit be one rightfully brought in the state court, and which the act of congress authorizes to be removed thence into the federal court, the very fact of authority to remove empowers the federal court to take jurisdiction and proceed in the cause; the only real question in that court being, was the suit rightfully removed? If a cause has thus come into the federal court, then section 4 of the act empowers and requires that court to go on with it, and to give such decree against the property attached as the state court should have given if the suit had remained there. Congress has full constitutional power to give the United States courts jurisdiction over defendants non-resident in the districts in which suits against them are brought; and it has, in sections 2 and 4 of the statute under construction, given this power in the single instance of suits commenced by attachment in state courts, and removed into United States courts. This can easily be made apparent. It must not be overlooked that section 1 avoids the use of such language as would embrace removed attachment suits commenced in state courts, in the class of suits in which, in order that the federal courts may have jurisdiction, it requires that defendants must live, or be served with process, in the judicial districts where the suits are brought. As if to discriminate attachment suits removed out of state courts, from suits commenced in the federal courts, section 1 is particular to say that no civil suit shall be brought in a federal court by any original process, in a district where the defendant is not a resident, or is not found; leaving suits commenced by original process in state courts out of its purview, to be governed by the provisions of sections 2 and 4, which follow. Section 1, 2, and 4 must of course be construed together. When so construed, they induce the following reasoning and lead to the following conclusions: Under section 1, jurisdiction over non-residents is, in general, not given to the federal courts in any suit commenced by original process in the federal courts; but under sections 2 and 4 these courts may acquire such jurisdiction, by removal, over attachment suits commenced by original process in state courts. For sections 2 and 4 give jurisdiction of removed attachment suits commenced by original process in state courts, and this jurisdiction of such suits is good over non-residents, unless it is prohibited by section 1. But section 1 avoids such a prohibition, for its limitation of jurisdiction only applies to suits commenced by original process in the federal courts; these limiting words not only not applying to removed suits commenced by original process in the state courts, but necessarily implying that jurisdiction in such suits is left to be determined by sections 2 and 4. Moreover, even if the words "no civil suit shall be brought by any original process" in the federal courts against a non-resident could be construed as denying jurisdiction of suits brought by original process in the state courts,—even in that event the words at the end of the same clause, "except as hereinafter provided," would require that the provisions in regard to attachment suits removed from state courts under sections 2 and 4 should be construed as falling within the exception. I must, therefore, overrule the plea to the jurisdiction, and deny the defendant's motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction.

As to the plea of imprisonment, personal appearance is not essential in a civil action, and a defendant may be required to make defence by counsel to such an action, while in jail. This point has been already overruled in this cause on the motion to quash. See Slade v. Joseph, 5 Daly, 187, and Olery v. Brown, 51 How. Prac. 92. As to the objection intended to be raised on demurrer, that this being a case in which there is claimed to be complete and adequate remedy at law, equity has no jurisdiction, it is enough to say that this suit was brought in a Virginia state court, and that under the laws of Virginia. resort may be had by any creditor to a court of equity for an attachment to enforce a purely legal demand against a non-resident defendant. The statutory provisions allowing this remedy may be found in the state Code, and in sections 7, 37, and 181 of Daniel on Attachment. The defendant's intended demurrer to the bill on this ground is therefore overruled. So is his objection to the bill on the ground of multifariousness. The bill has but one object, to secure the payment of the debt directly by the defendant himself, and indirectly by his debtor, the German Banking Company. It is therefore not multifarious. A decree will be entered in accordance with this opinion.

Case No. 15,978.

UNITED STATES v. OUTERBRIDGE.

[5 Sawy. 620.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. June 25, 1868.

DEGREES OF MURDER—MANSLAUGHTER—MALICE—JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—THREATS.

1. In the laws of the United States, there is no such designation as murder in the first degree or murder in the second degree; they simply provide for the crime of willful murder, and attach to it the punishment of death.

2. In the absence of statutory provisions, the federal courts resort to the common law for guidance in the construction of legal terms and phrases.

[Cited in U. S. v. Clark, 46 Fed. 635.]

3. The difference between murder and manslaughter consists in the existence of malice, express or implied in the one case, and the absence of malice in the other.

[Cited in The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. 426.]

4. Malice is implied in every case of intentional homicide; that is to say, when once it is established that a person was intentionally killed, the law implies that malice existed in the party who caused the death, and the burden rests upon him to rebut the implication.

[Cited in Ex parte Brown, 40 Fed. 83.]

[Cited in People v. Dillon, 30 Pac. 152.]

5. A man may repel force by force in the defense of his person, his family or property, against any one who manifestly endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a felony. The right to oppose force to force in such case, is founded upon the law of nature, and is not superseded by the law of society.

6. Neither words nor gestures, however insulting and irritating, nor an assault, will justify the killing of the aggressor; his killing is justifiable only when there is an apparent intent by him to commit a felony, and the danger is imminent, and the species of resistance used necessary to avert it.

7. By imminent danger is meant immediate danger, such as must be instantly met, such as cannot be guarded against by calling on the assistance of others or the protection of the law.

8. Mere threats against the person or life of another, without any attempt at execution, will not justify homicide, nor even when such attempt at execution is made, unless the danger be so imminent as not to admit of any delay in meeting it on the part of the assailed.

The defendant [Heber Outerbridge] was indicted and tried at the June term of 1868, for murder on the high seas.

J. B. Manchester, for defendant.
Delos Lake, U. S. Atty.

FIELD, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The facts of this case lie in a very narrow compass, and the principles of law applicable to them are very simple and can be readily understood. You are the exclusive judges of the facts; that is to say, it is your province to pass upon the evidence, to give to it such weight as you may deem it entitled, and determine therefrom all disputed questions of fact. The duty of the court will end when it states to you the law by which the offense charged is to be considered, and the principles by which the evidence is to be weighed.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The prisoner at the bar is indicted for the crime of murder. The indictment charges that the defendant did, on the first of April of the present year, on the high seas, on board of the American vessel Jenny Prince, belonging to citizens of the United States, feloniously, willfully, and of malice aforethought, make an assault upon one William Anderson, then aboard of said vessel, and by a capstan bar, an instrument of wood, of four feet in length and six inches in circumference, inflict several mortal wounds upon his head and neck, of which he, on the same day, died. The charge here is of the murder of William Anderson, upon the high seas, on the first of April, last.

The act of congress under which the indictment is found provides what the punishment shall be for this crime; it declares that the punishment shall be death. But it does not define the crime itself, nor establish any degrees in the turpitude of the offense, as does the law of the state. There is no such designation made in the laws of the United States as murder in the first or murder in the second or any other degree. The statute simply enacts that if any person upon the high seas, or in any arm of the sea within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall commit the crime of willful murder, such person shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer death. We must therefore resort to the common law for a definition of the crime. In the absence of statutory provisions, the federal courts are obliged to resort to that law for guidance in the construction of legal terms and phrases. By that law murder is defined to be the willful killing of a human being in the peace of the country, with malice aforethought, either expressed or implied. The term malice is here used in a technical sense, and includes not merely hatred and revenge, but every bad and unjustifiable motive. Express malice exists when one, with deliberate premeditation and design formed in advance, kills another, such premeditation and design being manifested by external circumstances capable of proof, such as lying in wait, antecedent threats, and concerted schemes to do the party bodily harm. Malice is implied by the law from any deliberate and cruel act committed by one person against another. Thus it is implied when one man kills another without provocation, or where the provocation is not great, for no person except one of an abandoned heart could be guilty of such an act without cause, or upon any slight cause. The terms express and implied malice, in truth, indicate the same state of mind, but they are established in different ways; the one by circumstances showing premeditation of the homicide, and the other being inferred only from the act committed.

Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being without malice, express or implied. It may be voluntary or involuntary. It is voluntary when committed with a design to kill, under the influence of a sudden and violent passion caused by great provocation, which the law, in its tenderness to the infirmity of human nature, considers such a palliative of the offense as to rebut the presumption which would otherwise arise of malice. Manslaughter is involuntary when committed by accident, or without any intention to take life. As you will thus perceive, the difference between murder and manslaughter consists in the existence of malice, express or implied, in the one case, and the absence of malice in the other.

Now, malice is implied in every case of intentional homicide; that is to say, when once it is established that a person was intentionally killed, the law implies that malice existed in the party who caused the death. If there are any circumstances of excuse or palliation which will rebut the implication of malice, it is incumbent upon him to show them. The burden of proof rests upon him, for the law presumes that every person intends to produce the results which are the usual consequences of his acts. A man can not strike another violently with a bar of iron without inflicting bodily pain; if, therefore, he does thus strike another, the law presumes that he intended thus to inflict pain. The usual effect of a leaden ball fired from a loaded pistol of the common size, at a distance of a few feet only, striking the head or back of a person, is to kill such person; the law therefore presumes that every one who thus fires a loaded pistol within a few feet of the object intends to kill; it therefore implies malice in him.

In the present case there is no question as to the homicide charged, nor is there any question that the homicide was committed by the prisoner, nor is it denied that the blows which caused the homicide were intentionally given. The instrument used was of such magnitude and weight that it would, in all probability, have broken the skull, had it been applied with slight force, but the evidence shows that great force was used. There is no element in the case which can bring the homicide within the definition of manslaughter. There was here no sudden and violent passion produced by great provocation, which, for the moment, overpowered the reason of the prisoner. He does not rest his defense upon any such ground. His defense is that he was justified in taking the life of Anderson; that the homicide was required for the preservation of his own life.

Now upon this subject of justification the law is explicit. A man may repel force by force in the defense of his person, his family or property, against any one, who manifestly endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a felony, as murder, robbery, or the like. The right to oppose force to force in such case is founded upon the law of nature, and is not and can not be superseded by the law of society.

In the definition of justifiable homicide the following particulars, says Mr. Justice Washington, "are to be attended to. The intent must be to commit a felony. If it be only to commit a trespass, as to beat the party, it will not justify the killing of the aggressor. No words, no gestures, however insulting and irritating, not even an assault, will afford such justification; although it may be sufficient to reduce the offense from murder to manslaughter. In the next place, the intent to commit a felony must be apparent, which will be sufficient, although it should afterwards turn out that the real intention was less criminal, or was even innocent. This apparent intent is to be collected from the attending circumstances, such as the manner of the assault, the nature of the weapons used, and the like. And, lastly, to produce this justification, it must appear that the danger was imminent, and the species of resistance used necessary to avert it." U. S. v. Wiltberger [Case No. 16,738].

You will observe from this language that the intent to commit the felony must be apparent; that is, in the process of execution, so that the movement towards the execution becomes cognizable by the senses. For example, if a man declares that he will kill another, and moves towards him with a heavy weapon raised in the position to strike, or with a pistol cocked and directed towards him, the intent to commit a felony would be apparent, although in point of fact the party may never have intended to strike, or the pistol may have been unloaded. As observed by Mr. Justice Washington, this apparent intent is to be collected from the attending circumstances, such as the manner of the assault, the nature of the weapons used, and the like.

You will observe from the language cited that the intent to commit a felony must not only be apparent, it must also appear that the danger was imminent, and the species of resistance used necessary to avert it. By imminent danger is meant immediate danger—one that must be instantly met; one that can not be guarded against by calling on the assistance of others or the protection of the law. And the species of resistance used, that is, the means to prevent the threatened injury, must be such as were necessary to avert it.

Tested by these rules, the defense utterly fails. We will not even presume to suggest that the threats of the deceased were the mere coarse vaporings of a brutal sailor, never intended to be carried out. We will assume that, at the time they were uttered, they were the expression of a determined purpose on the part of the deceased. There is no evidence of any subsequent attempt to carry them into execution; nor is there any evidence that there was not adequate means with the captain and the rest of the crew, for the protection of the defendant. The danger, if any ever existed, that the threats would be carried into effect, was not imminent. The deceased was at the time asleep, covered by a sail on the deck. If it had been reasonable to believe that on awakening he would have proceeded at once to the execution of his threat, even then the means to secure him and prevent him should have been resorted to. There was sufficient force on board to control him.

Mere threats against the person or life of another, without any attempt at execution, will not justify homicide, nor even when such attempt is made, unless the danger be so imminent as not to admit of any delay in meeting it on the part of the assailed. No other rule could exist with proper security to human life in society.

The case is in your hands. As already said, you are the exclusive judges of the facts; that is to say, it is your exclusive province to pass on the evidence, and to give it such weight as you may judge it entitled to receive.

The jury found the defendant guilty of murder.

Case No. 15,979.

UNITED STATES v. OVERTON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 42.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1812.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—LICENSE.

The widow and administratrix of a deceased tavern-keeper cannot sell spirituous liquors under her husband's license; nor can she transfer it to another.

[Cited in State v. Lydick, 11 Neb. 373, 9 N. W. 560.]

Indictment for selling liquor as an ordinary-keeper, without license.

The defendant justified under a written authority from Mrs. Smallwood, the widow and administratrix of Walter B. Smallwood, indorsed on the original license which had been granted to him in his lifetime.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra,) said that Mrs. Smallwood had no authority to sell under her husband's license after his death. It is a personal trust. The recognizance given by the husband cannot be forfeited after his death by any misconduct of his widow.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The jury found the defendant guilty, and the court rendered judgment for the fine of 600 lbs. of tobacco, under the act of assembly of Maryland.

Case No. 15,979a.

UNITED STATES v. OWNERS OF THE UNICORN.

[3 Am. Law J. 188.]

District Court, D. Maryland. Feb. 12, 1796.

NEUTRALITY LAWS — FITTING OUT PRIVATEERS — EVIDENCE—LIABILITY OF OWNER FOR ACTS OF MASTER.

[1. Where it is claimed that defendant fitted out a privateer in his country, contrary to the act of June, 1794 (1 Stat. 381), it must appear affirmatively, in order to convict him, that the equipment was within the United States; that defendant caused such equipment to be made, or was knowingly concerned in it; and that the intent of the equipment was to commit hostilities on nations with whom the United States were at peace.]

[2. A French citizen, transiently within the United States, cannot be criminally prosecuted for piracies and robberies committed by the captain of a privateer, owned by him, upon neutral vessels.]

In admiralty.

WINCHESTER, District Judge. The owners of the privateer Unicorn, falsely called Sansculotte Laveaux, if liable to punishment in the United States, can only be prosecuted under the act of congress of the 5th of June, 1794 [1 Stat. 381], by the third section of which law it is provided, "that if any person shall within any of the ports, harbours, bays, rivers, or other waters of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out or arming of any ship or vessel with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any prince or state" to commit hostilities upon nations with whom the United States are at peace, such offence is declared to be a high misdemeanor, and subjects the party convicted to a fine not exceeding 5000 dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding three years. The offence designated by this law was, anterior to the passage thereof, a high offence against the sovereignty of the United States, and in contravention of the law and usages of independent neutral nations. But the difficulties which must ever exist in a government of limited and specified powers, in applying the punishment to the infraction of a law which created no specific penalty, as well as the doubts on the question, where does the sovereignty (as applied to the government) of the United States reside? induced the necessity of providing by an ordinary act of legislation for the punishment of such cases. The owner of the Unicorn must therefore be considered as having violated a civil law of the United States and will incur its penalties on a conviction according to the accustomed form of judicial proceeding. The evidence to establish his guilt must be of affirmative acts corresponding to the provisions of the law, to wit: that the equipment was within the United States; that he caused such equipment to be made, or was knowingly concerned in it; and lastly, that the intent of the equipment was to commit hostilities on nations with whom the United States are at peace. The evidence must be disclosed in court before a jury of the country who are to be his judges. The sentence of General Laveaux would not be admissible in our courts, inasmuch as he was not a party in the proceeding, and because according to our law it would be the highest iniquity to bind a man by a sentence which he had not the opportunity to controvert; besides it passed on a different question. On that trial there was no question as to the infraction of a civil law of this country. The same evidence which would be sufficient for the conviction of the owner would be enough to convict Americans concerned with him.

Question. Is the owner of the ship Unicorn responsible for the piracies and robberies exercised by his captain upon neutral vessels? Are there any laws of the United States which sanction that responsibility, and can he be prosecuted on those grounds?

Answer. Under the particular circumstances of this case, I am inclined to think that the owner of the Unicorn cannot be prosecuted criminally as for piracy and robbery. As a French citizen, transiently within the United States, he owed nothing but obedience to the laws of order and good government within the nation. He remained a French citizen, and although there may have been flagrant outrages committed on neutral vessels, they could only be considered as civil trespasses resulting from acts which were to them unlawful, as being an excess of the authority under which they acted.

There is no particular law of the United States on the subject. The only responsibility which exists is to answer in damages for the injury sustained. These can only be recovered by actions to be commenced by the individuals whose property was attacked and injured.

Case No. 15,980.

UNITED STATES v. PACHECO et al.

[Hoff. Dec. 62.]

District Court, N. D. California. March 22, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY — ESTOPPEL.

[1. The claimants of a grant are estopped to object that parts of the land, which they have sold and conveyed as part of their rancho, are not within its limits, for the purpose of completing their quantity by embracing in the survey lands not conveyed by them.]

[2. The mere fact that the diseño of a neighboring rancho includes part of the land embraced in the claimants' diseño is no ground for excluding such land from the claimants' survey, where the adjoining rancho has not yet been surveyed, and the owners thereof have not intervened to assert their alleged rights.]

[Claim of Rosa de Pacheco and others to a rancho of four leagues in San Ramon valley, Contra Costa county. See Case No. 15,981. On objections to the official survey.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The survey in this case is objected to on behalf of certain parties claiming an interest in the southwest corner of the rancho by deed from the original grantee. A portion of the land conveyed to them has not been included in the survey. In the grant the land is described as included between the Arroyo de las Nueces and the Sierra de las Golgones, bounded by the said places and by the ranchos of Las Juntas, San Ramon, and Monte del Diabolo. The fourth condition describes it as "two square leagues" (decided by the supreme court to have been erroneously substituted for four square leagues), "a little more or less, as shown by the map, which goes with the expediente." The diseño very distinctly represents a tract of land bounded on the west and east by the Arroyo de las Nueces and the Sierra da Golgones respectively on the north, by a line drawn from the creek to the sierra, and is described "Linea Divisoria;" and on the south by a chain of hills inscribed "Sierra Divisoria." There cannot be any doubt that this sierra was intended as the southern boundary of the tract. It is identified by the witnesses as a well-defined ridge or watershed, running from a couple of hills or arnitos, near the Nueces, to the Sierra de los Golgones. The southern line of the official survey has been located considerably north, and apparently at an arbitrary distance from this unmistakable natural boundary. I think it clear that against their own grantees the claimants have no right to elect a location of the land which shall not include all of the tract conveyed by them lying within the exterior limits of the diseño. The claimants of the residue of the rancho are the only parties who have formally appeared in support of the survey. But the counsel who appeared for them is also interested in, or represents, the adjoining rancho of the San Ramon. In the interest of the owners of that rancho (who have not intervened in this suit) he objected to any location of the southern line by which it shall be made to extend to the west until it met the Arroyo del Ingerto. Admitting this objection to be just, the survey would, nevertheless, be erroneous, for the line of the "Sierra Divisoria" is wholly neglected as a southern boundary. That boundary being fixed in the official survey at a considerable distance to the north of the sierra towards the western end, and at an equal distance to the south of it, towards the eastern end. Whereas the indications of the diseño are clear that the sierra should be followed throughout the whole course of the southern boundary as near as may be. It is claimed on the part of the owners of San Ramon, that the southern line should stop before reaching the Ingerto, and that the boundary from that point is a line drawn a little west of north until it strikes the Arroyo de las Nueces a short distance above its junction with the Ingerto. In support of this location, the diseño of San Ramon is exhibited. On this is delineated the strip of land in question, lying on the east of the Ingerto, and extending northward to a point above the junction of the creeks. But the same piece of land is undoubtedly included within the diseño in the case at bar. The Rancho of San Ramon has not been surveyed, nor have the owners made themselves parties to this proceeding. No testimony as to the boundaries of that rancho has been taken, nor any information on the subject afforded, except the mere production of the diseño. It is by no means certain that the piece of land in question, though delineated on the diseño of San Ramon, was intended to be included within the tract actually granted. The diseños which accompanied the petitions addressed to the governor, not unfrequently represent large districts of country—far larger than it was intended to include even within the exterior boundaries within which the quantity granted was to be taken. They sometimes indicated the region of country where the land was situated, rather than the limits of the tract solicited. It is suggested that the diseño of San Ramon includes a quantity of land several times greater than to which it is alleged the grant is limited. However this may be, it is obviously impossible to declare, in the absence of all information as to the true boundaries of San Ramon, or of any elections of location which its owners may have made, and which would prevent them from crossing the creek, that this strip of land, though clearly within the limits of the claimants' diseño, and heretofore conveyed by them to third parties, should not be included within the survey merely because the same strip is represented on the diseño of San Ramon. It certainly does not lie in the mouths of the claimants to object that the land they have sold and conveyed as part of their rancho is not within its limits, and this in order that, by excluding it, they may complete their quantity of four leagues, by embracing lands not conveyed by them. I think, therefore, that the survey should be reformed by running the line as the same was located by Mr. Williamson, of the topographical engineers, and as laid down on the map attached to his deposition. I do not understand that the location made by him of the eastern portion of the southern line, or of the eastern and northern lines, is disputed. On the coming in of that survey, the owners of San Ramon will have an opportunity to appear, and to show that the modified survey improperly embraces a portion of their land. It will then be possible, with both parties before the court, definitely to settle the disputed boundary between the ranchos.

Case No. 15,981.

UNITED STATES v. PACHECO.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 79.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT.

No objections to the confirmation of this claim.

Claim [by Saliro Pacheco] for [the Rancho Monte del Diablo] four leagues of land, in Contra Costa county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States. [The grant was made March 30, 1844, by José Figueroa to S. Pacheco, and a patent was eventually issued.]

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.
B. W. Leigh, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In this case, a grant from Governor Figueroa to the claimant is produced and proved, and evidence is offered to prove the occupation and cultivation of the land within the year; as prescribed in the grant. In the opinion of the board the grant is treated as undoubtedly genuine, and the fact of the performance of the conditions as indisputable. No additional testimony has been taken in this court, nor has any reason for refusing the decree of the board and rejecting the claim been suggested to us on the part of the appellants. The only objections that could have been raised, viz., the want of juridical possession, and the fact that the land is within the ten littoral leagues, has already repeatedly been overruled. A decree confirming the claim must therefore be entered.

Case No. 15,982.

UNITED STATES v. PACHECO et al.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 150.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1856.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—CONSTRUCTION.

[When the land was granted by specific boundaries, which were represented to the grantor to contain a certain quantity, and, on ascertaining that the quantity was the same as that represented, he proceeded to grant all the land within those boundaries, and referred to the map, which clearly indicated the quantity, it will be assumed that the intention was to grant all the land included in the boundaries, though in a subsequent condition in the grant the quantity was erroneously stated.]

Claim [by Rosa Pacheco and others, devisees of Juana Sanchez de Pacheco] for [the Rancho Arroyo de las Nueces y Bolbones] two leagues of land, more or less, in Contra Costa county, confirmed by the board for two leagues, and appealed by the United States and by claimants.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.
A. P. Crittenden, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In this case appeals have been taken both by the United States and by the claimants. The board confirmed the title to the land to the extent of two leagues; and the claimants assert that they are entitled to a confirmation of the tract granted by metes and bounds, and irrespective of quantity. With regard to the validity of the grant no question seems to be raised. In the brief filed on the part of the United States it is observed, that "on the general question of the validity of the whole grant, it is not designed to repeat objections and arguments which this court has so often decided to be untenable." The validity of the title being thus admitted, under the principles laid down in the former adjudications of this court, the only question is as to the extent to which it should be confirmed. The petition was presented to Governor Figueroa on the fifteenth of May, 1834, and the usual order of reference for information was made. After receiving the report of the ayuntamiento of San José Guadalupe, a further reference was made to the alcalde of Monterey, directing him to examine witnesses, to be produced by the petitioner, as to her qualifications, as to whether the land was vacant, as to its extent and nature, and as to whether she had the means of stocking it with cattle. The alcalde accordingly took the depositions of the witnesses, by which it appeared that, as stated by two of them, the land was two and one-half leagues, "a little more or less," long, and about two leagues broad; and as deposed by the third, that it was two leagues long, more or less, and about two leagues broad. Upon receiving these reports, the governor made the usual order of concession, declaring the petitioner "owner of the land between the Arroyo de las Nueces and the Sierra de los Golgones, bounded by the said places and by the ranchos of San Ramon, Las Juntas and Monte del Diablo; and directing the expediente to be sent to the most excellent deputation for their due approval. The grant or final title, in what would seem to be strict compliance with the colonization laws, was withheld until the approval of the assembly had made the grant definitively valid. On the eleventh of July, 1834, the assembly passed a resolution approving "the grant made to Doña Juana Sanches de

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed in 22 How. (63 U. S.) 225.]

Pacheco of the place included between the Arroyo de las Nueces and the Bolbones." On the thirty-first of July, the governor, after referring to the resolution of approval, ordered the title to issue. It accordingly issued on the same day. The grant, after reciting that Doña J. S. de Pacheco had petitioned for the land included between the Arroyo de las Nueces and the Sierra de los Golgones, bounded by the said places and the ranchos of Las Juntas, San Ramon and Monte del Diablo, and after referring to the resolution approving the grant of the land between the Arroyo de las Nueces and the Sierra de los Golgones, grants to her "the aforesaid land, declaring to her the ownership of it by these presents, and subject to the following conditions." The fourth condition is as follows: "The land of which mention is made is two square leagues, a little more or less, as shown by the map which goes with the expediente. The magistrate who may give the possession will cause it to be measured in conformity with the ordinance, for the purpose of marking out the boundaries, leaving the surplus which may result to the nation for its convenient uses."

It is contended on the part of the United States that by this condition the quantity of land is limited to two leagues, a little more or less. It is urged on the part of the claimants, that the original order of concession, the resolution of approval, and the description of the land in the grant itself, clearly show the intention to have been to grant the land as delineated on the diseño and described in the grant; and that if the fourth condition be construed to limit the quantity, it is repugnant to the rest of the grant, inconsistent with the previous concession and resolution of approval, and probably introduced by mistake.

If such was the intention of the governor when he made the concession, and of the assembly when they approved of it, the final title, issued with an express reference to, and avowed conformity with the resolution of approval, should, if possible, be so construed as to give effect to it. The inquiry therefore is, did the governor intend by the fourth condition to limit the quantity of land granted, or is the mention of quantity to be treated as merely a misdescription of the extent of the land, which should, as at common law, yield to boundaries, when the latter are distinctly mentioned, and when such construction is necessary to give effect to the intention of the parties? In the case of U. S. v. Wright [Case No. 16,769], it was held by this court, that where land had been granted by specific boundaries, which included in fact about eight leagues, and the condition specified the extent as four leagues, a little more or less, the grant could not to be construed to embrace the larger quantity. But in that case it appeared that the petitioner himself, as well as the witnesses produced by him, had represented the land as only "three or four leagues in extent." The governor, therefore, in limiting the grant to the quantity represented to be included within the boundaries, either merely carried into effect the understanding and intentions of all parties, or else the representations were fraudulent, and the parties to the deception could not in a court of equity be allowed the fruits of their fraud. It seemed to the court in that case that justice would be satisfied and every substantial right protected by limiting the extent of the land to the quantity which the governor intended to grant and the petition asked for. But the case at bar is different. The governor was fully apprised of the extent of the land, not only by the testimony of the witnesses produced before the alcalde, but the diseño which was submitted both to the governor and the assembly, and which is referred to in the condition, shows the land included within the boundaries to be of about the extent mentioned by the witnesses. The boundaries mentioned in the concession, the resolution of approval, and the grant, are the same as those indicated on the map, and the governor in all probability derived his description of the land from that source. It is clear from this fact, as well as the express language of the condition, that the governor intended to grant the land "as shown by the map;" and that map contains a scale which must, independently of other information, have apprised the governor that the quantity was greater than two leagues.

In this, as in all analogous cases, the only object of the court should be to carry out the intentions of the granting power. When, therefore, we find the land granted by specific boundaries, and those boundaries represented to the grantor to contain a certain quantity; when the grantor's attention has been directed to the point; and on ascertaining that the quantity is the same as that represented he nevertheless proceeds to grant all the land within those boundaries, and refers to the map which clearly indicates the quantity—under all these circumstances, we must consider that the intention was to grant all the land included within the boundaries, notwithstanding that in a subsequent condition the quantity may be erroneously stated. That conditions applicable only to one species of grants were often inserted by mistake in grants of a different species is notorious. In this case the mention of two leagues as the extent of the granted land is perhaps owing to the fact that the clerk who drafted the document forgot that a tract two leagues broad by two wide contained four and not two square leagues. However this may be, we think it clear that in this case all the land within the boundaries was intended to be granted; and as there is no proof or suggestion that the land so included exceeds in extent the quantity testified to by the witnesses before the alcalde, that the claim should be confined to the tract as described in the grant and delineated on the map.

[The case was taken by appeal to the supreme court, where the decree was reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court for further proceedings. 22 How. (63 U. S.) 225.]

UNITED STATES (PACHECO v.). See Case No. 10,641.

Case No. 15,983.

UNITED STATES v. PACIFIC RAILROAD.

[4 Dill. 66.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1877.

SUIT TO RECOVER TAXES—SET-OFF—ILLEGAL TAX—REMEDIES.

1. The obligation or duty to pay taxes assessed by the United States, is one which may be enforced by suit—by an action at law or a bill in equity, according to the nature of the relief sought.

2. In such a suit by the United States, the defendant cannot plead a set-off, legal or equitable, growing out of independent claims against the United States, although such claims are just, and have been presented to and rejected by the proper auditing officers.

[See Apperson v. Memphis, Case No. 497.]

3. The remedy against an illegal tax assessed by the United States, pointed out.

[Quoted in Kensett v. Stivers, 10 Fed. 526. Cited in Snyder v. Marks, 109 U. S. 193, 3 Sup. Ct. 160.]

This was a bill in equity by the United States to recover the amount of certain taxes claimed to be due, under the internal revenue law, from the defendant company, and to enforce the lien of the taxes upon the property of the company, which, since the taxes accrued, has passed into other hands. Among other defences in the answer, is one in which the railroad company claimed a set-off for a sum exceeding the amount of taxes sued for, growing out of the use of the railroad of the defendant by the government during the war; which claim, it is alleged, has been duly presented to the proper department of the government and rejected. This portion of the answer was excepted to by the United States; and it was in disposing of these exceptions that the following opinion was orally pronounced by Mr. Justice MILLER.

W. H. Bliss, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Cline, Jamison & Day, for defendant.

[Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.]

MILLER, Circuit Justice, orally. The United States brings suit against the Pacific Railroad Company for the collection of a tax alleged to be due by the railroad company, and to enforce the lien of this tax upon the property of the company, which has passed into other hands. The railroad company sets up as one of its defences that it has a claim against the United States in excess of the amount of these taxes, for the use of the railroad and its appurtenances during the war, which has never been paid; and it alleges, also, that these claims have been presented to the proper auditing officers and rejected; and it is insisted that they come within the statutes of the United States upon that subject, which allows an equitable set-off where just claims have been rejected. And the defendant also claims that the government, being a plaintiff, and bringing this action in chancery in the nature of an action for a debt, the suit is liable to the principle of mutual set-off, which governs all suits in equity. A good deal of argument on both sides has been presented to us upon the question whether an action to recover taxes is an action of debt, and whether an obligation to pay taxes to the government is a debt. There is considerable conflict of authority on that subject. Not only is there such conflict in the courts other than those of the United States, but the supreme court of the United States, in at least two cases, has given what might appear to be conflicting decisions upon the subject. In the case of Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 71, which was a suit to recover taxes, the state of Oregon claimed that her taxes should be paid in gold, and that the legal-tender laws then in existence, and in existence long before, had no application to taxes, whether state or national, except as they were made receivable for dues to the United States by the act itself. And the question turned on whether the taxes which the state of Oregon assessed against her citizens was a debt within the meaning of the legal-tender laws, which provided in terms that they should be receivable in payment of all debts. The supreme court unanimously held that in that sense, at all events, and for that purpose, a tax was not a debt. In other words, the meaning of it was that the congress of the United States did not, by the use of the word "debt" in that act, intend to include taxes of the states. Chief Justice Chase delivered the opinion, and he referred to several of the authorities cited yesterday on the subject whether a tax is a debt or not. On the other hand, in a later case [Dollar Sav. Bank v. U. S.] 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 227, coming up from Pennsylvania, where the United States brought an action at law for some internal revenue taxes, a recovery was stoutly resisted on the ground that a tax was not a debt, and as it was not a debt within the common law meaning of the phrase, that it could not be so collected. In that case the supreme court held that, for the purposes of that collection, and in some senses, it was a debt; that the tax—which, I presume, was the same kind of a tax as this is—could be so collected. Whenever the proper officers themselves ascertain their earnings for that particular year, the law applied and made the assessment; it could be neither more nor less than that amount, and no assessment by the officers of the government was necessary to ascertain the amount; therefore, it is a debt collectible by suit. I state these things merely to show the difference of opinion that has existed upon the subject, as also to show the fact that the supreme court has, under one set of circumstances, recognized that a tax is a debt, while under another that it was not a debt. In the view that all of us here take, I think, however, that this discussion is immaterial. It is immaterial what you call the obligation of a citizen to pay his taxes; it is very clearly an obligation which may be enforced by the courts. In the case from the state of Pennsylvania, it was simply a suit for taxes, and nothing else; but if it was not such a suit, an equitable lien, it is claimed, would give the right in chancery to recover what was merely a debt at common law. The question remains whether it is liable to a set-off. This depends upon a principle of policy, in which both the government of the United States and its courts have sounded no uncertain note at any time. We have even, without the aid of an act of congress, refused to grant an injunction to stay the collection of taxes under any circumstances—and this upon the broad ground applicable to this case, that the taxes of the government are essential to the support and existence of the government; and we have always refused to permit any interference with their collection by injunction. The principle involved is this: That by setting up other debts, and cross-actions and counter-claims against the government, it would, in effect, be placing the existence of the government at the mercy of any person who chose to set up his right in this way, and thus hinder the collection of the taxes. Since that decision was originally made, the statutes passed by congress go very strongly in that direction. Congress has passed a statute expressly forbidding the granting of an injunction for that purpose. It has passed a statute for the correction of errors of the assessing and collecting officers of the government, which the supreme court has said, in two or three cases, is a complete and perfect system. If the tax is unjustly assessed, or supposed to be unjustly assessed, the remedy allowed is an appeal to the commissioner of internal revenue. If he decides against the party, or fails to decide within six months, the party injured can pay his taxes and go into court and sue for the amount, and recover it back if he is wrongfully assessed, the court being unprejudiced by any action of the commissioner. The statute says he may bring his suit to recover it back, and he will get it back if the court so decides. The time for bringing such a suit is limited, so as to have no delay in settling the matter. It must be within twelve months—six months after the commissioner has decided, and twelve months after the appeal has been taken. And we have said over and over again in our courts that that was a complete and exclusive system of correctional justice in regard to the collection of taxes unjustly assessed; that it was the only system, and by that ruling we abide. There can be no such thing as obstructing and objecting to the payment, as in the case of adjusting the accounts of individuals. It may be said that since the government has refused, by its auditing officers, to allow this party their claim, they have no remedy, and that it is inequitable to allow the government to recover one hundred and twenty thousand dollars against them, when the government owes them half a million. And the argument would have some force, notwithstanding the want of any express provision on the subject, if there were no other remedy. But it is to be considered that the application to the auditing officers is in itself a remedy. They act in a judicial capacity, and are impartial, or supposed to be so, and perhaps are just as good judges as to what ought to be done as we are. But suppose they are not, there remains the right to sue in the court of claims. That court was instituted for this very purpose. But it may be said that the claim set up here is not of a character over which the court of claims has jurisdiction. I cannot see, if it is a claim which can be made a set-off, why it is not a case which can be enforced in the court of claims, because the court of claims has jurisdiction of all claims against the United States growing out of contracts, express or implied. And surely no one can suppose that a claim can be used as a set-off if it does not grow out of a contract, expressed or implied. No statute of any state or of any government, and no principle of law, ever allows any set-off which does not grow out of a contract; so that, in refusing to allow this set-off to come in here and delay the government in the collection of its taxes, we do not leave the party without judicial remedy. The judgment of the court is that the exceptions to the answer which sets up that defence must be sustained. Exceptions sustained.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[Subsequently the defendant demurred to the bill, and the demurrer was sustained. Case No. 15,984.]

Case No. 15,984.

UNITED STATES v. PACIFIC RAILROAD et al.

[4 Dill. 71;[1] 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 384.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1877.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—DEMAND OF TAXES—LIEN.

1. The internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 104; Rev. St. § 3186), provides, in reference to certain taxes, that if any person liable to pay the same, "neglects or refuses to pay them after demand, the amount shall be a lien in favor of the United States from the time it was due until paid, with interest, penalties, and costs, upon all property and rights of property belonging to such person:" Held, that a demand is necessary to create and bring into operation this lien.

[Cited in U. S. v. Allen, 14 Fed. 264.]

2. It is essential to such a demand that it should state the amount of the tax and demand payment thereof.

3. That each of the three several demands here alleged was insufficient to create the lien.

This was a suit in equity, brought in 1877, under the authority of the statute (Rev. St. § 3213), which provides for the recovery of taxes by suit and to enforce the lien of the taxes against the property owned by the delinquent (the Pacific Railroad) at the time the taxes accrued (Rev. St. § 3186). The taxes sought to be recovered, amounting to about twenty-five thousand dollars, accrued in 1871 against the Pacific Railroad. The property of that company has since been sold on a decree of foreclosure, and is owned by and in possession of the other defendants to the bill. The defendants, the present owners of the property, demurred to the bill, raising, principally, the question of the sufficiency of the demand averred in the bill and amended bill, to create or give a lien for the taxes. Three demands are relied on by the government: 1. The letter of Collector Maguire, of July 25, 1874. 2. A demand on August 29, 1874. 3. A suit brought in October, 1874, against the lessee of the Pacific Railroad, viz., the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, for the recovery of said taxes, which suit is still pending, and to which the Pacific Railroad is not a party. The particulars of these several demands appear in the opinion of the court, which was orally pronounced by Mr. Justice Miller.

W. H. Bliss, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Melville C. Day, for defendants.

[Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.]

MILLER, Circuit Justice. We have before us the case of the United States against the Pacific Railroad et al. It was first submitted on the exceptions to the answer. [Case No. 15,983.] The purpose of the bill is to enforce by a decree in equity a lien against the Pacific Railroad Company, and those into whose hands the property has since come, for taxes, which, it is alleged, were never paid and never reported by the Pacific Railroad Company for assessment.

The first proposition which we had to decide was that the defence pleaded as a set-off could not be set up; that no set-off or counter-claim could be set up in any suit against a party in favor of the government for the collection of taxes. The question here involved then came up on other exceptions to the answer.

We soon discovered that the main question to be decided in this case was whether such a demand had been made of these taxes as brought it within the operation of section 3186 of the Revised Statutes, originally enacted on the 13th day of July, 1866, which is that "if any person liable to pay any tax neglects or refuses to pay the same after demand, the amount shall be a lien in favor of the United States from the time it was due until paid, with the interest, penalties, and costs that may accrue in addition thereto, upon all property and the rights to property belonging to such person."

Now the main question is, whether such a demand had been made as makes effective the lien mentioned against the property of the Pacific Railroad.

In order that the question might be fully considered by this court on the facts just as they could be proved, the parties concluded to abandon the exceptions to the answer, and the attorney for the government took leave to amend his bill and perfect it so as to set out the exact facts which he claimed to constitute such a demand. He has done so by two amended bills, and the whole question turns upon whether these bills set out a sufficient demand to create a lien for the taxes. The first demand which he sets out is found in a letter of the date of July 25, 1874, from Mr. Maguire, the collector of this district, to the Pacific Railroad Company, which I will read:

"Gentlemen:—I beg leave to call your attention to the enclosed copy of the Internal Revenue Record, containing a letter from the honorable commissioner of internal revenue addressed to W. H. Sinclair, Esq., collector of Galveston. The letter referred to gives an abstract of the various acts of congress, to which you are referred, meaning taxes on the gross receipts, dividends, interest on bonds, etc., of railroad companies and others. Upon examination of the books of this office, it appears that during a large part of the time covered by these various acts no returns were made by you in accordance with their requirements, and from credible information in my possession it further appears that a large amount is due by your company for taxes, together with the penalty of fifty per cent for neglecting to make the return. I call your attention particularly to the matter of surplus earnings of interest on bonds.

"I am instructed by the commissioner of internal revenue to call upon you for a statement of all taxable amounts which have not heretofore been returned, and to say further that if a proper return is made immediately, with a waiver in writing of exemption from assessment contained in section 20 of the act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 229], indorsed across the face of said return, the assessment will be made without the penalty; otherwise, it will become my duty to report the case to the United States attorney of this district, for collection by suit, with penalty added.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

"Any further information that I can furnish you for facilitating this matter will be cheerfully given.

"Your early attention is earnestly requested.

"Very respectfully, C. Maguire,
"Collector First District."

That is the first allegation of the demand. And the amended petition then goes on to allege: "And afterwards, on the 29th day of August, 1874, a demand was made by the said collector in person upon said company for a return of the taxes due; to which demand said company replied that it would make no return, and were prepared to defend."

The third statement of a demand is an allegation that about that time, or shortly afterwards, a suit was instituted by the government of the United States for these taxes, in which the amount due was fairly stated, against the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company; and the claim that such a demand is sufficient (not having been made on the Pacific Railroad) was founded on the allegation in the amended bill that the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company had become the successor of the Pacific Railroad by virtue of the contract or lease under which it took possession of all its property and agreed to discharge all its debts, including taxes.

I do not think it is necessary to say anything further about that allegation except that it is an allegation of a demand against a corporation different from the one against which these taxes are now sought to be enforced, and different from the corporation which owed the taxes. The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company is not a party to this suit. Whether the demand would be good against them or not if they were parties to this suit, it is not necessary for us to say. They never owed the taxes to the government in any other way than by their contract with the Pacific Railroad. It is a very doubtful question whether the government could have made them pay on that contract—that was a contract between them and the Pacific Railroad, and not between them and the government. But, passing that, the case was an action of debt, which is still pending against them. Whether they are liable or not, it seems to me too clear for argument that a demand made upon that company and upon no one else for the payment of taxes due from the Pacific Railroad Company cannot be held to be a demand within the meaning of the statute. The demand is not made against the proper party, and is not made against any party to the present suit.

The next question is as to the demand contained in the letter of Mr. Maguire. The demand in that letter is not, in my opinion, of as much force as the verbal one, taking it just as it is averred. The objection to it is, that, looking at this letter from beginning to end, it is an effort, a request, to have these parties furnish the means by which the amount of the tax can be assessed or ascertained against them. There is nowhere a demand that they should come up and pay these taxes; it is only a demand for such information as will enable the assessor, as a preliminary matter, to ascertain the amount of these taxes, and then make a demand for them, or at least then take such steps as the law would allow for the collection of these taxes. The corporation is told, as an inducement to make this report, that if they will waive certain things the penalty of fifty per cent will also be waived. Now, this statement is made upon the authority and request of the commissioner of internal revenue, and, in point of philological accuracy, there is certainly no demand here for taxes.

I will consider some parts of that letter in connection with the next point, which I will proceed to comment upon.

"And afterwards, on the 29th day of August, 1874, a demand was made by said collector in person upon said company for a return of the taxes due; to which demand said company replied that it would make no return, and was prepared to defend."

Now, if it were not for the language "prepared to defend," and that they "would make no return," that is exactly the same as the statement in the letter. It is not a demand for the payment of taxes—there is no demand that you come and pay. It is a demand for a return—that you make a return of the taxes due, by which I suppose they mean a return of the dividends, and the interest and the surplus on which the taxes could be ascertained.

It has, therefore, the same defect, and would be of no more significance than the letter, except that it is argued with some degree of force by the district attorney that, since those returns, or that return, which was demanded, was an essential and necessary foundation on which the government could ascertain the amount of the taxes and make a demand for them, and since they have refused peremptorily to do that, accompanied with the statement that they were prepared to defend—that they would not make any return, but would defend any suit against them—it is said that any further demand is not required; that it was practically a demand and a refusal; and there is some force in the argument. I confess there appears to be more doubt upon it than any of the other matters in the case; and to determine whether that was such a demand as would create a lien upon "all the property and the rights to property" (for that is the language of the statute), we must look at the statute critically.

It is first to be observed that the statute bristles all over with the weapons which are supposed to be efficient to enable the government not only to ascertain what amount of taxes are due from any person or corporation, but to collect those taxes. All the processes which ingenuity can devise have been put into these statutes. Inquisitorial powers, production of books under oath, attachment and imprisonment, seizures and confiscations, are all at the command of the government from the beginning to the end; and all these have in appropriate cases been put into operation unhesitatingly. And this very section, as it stood at the time in regard to which this demand was made, is one of those which is most full of authority conferred upon the collecting officer in regard to that matter. One provision is that "the collector shall, within ten days after receiving any list of taxes, give notice to each person liable to pay any taxes stated therein, etc., stating the amount of such taxes and demanding payment thereof."

Now, if it is necessary to make a man liable to the processes of distraint and seizure, which will be carried out very soon after the notice reaches him—that the notice should state the amount as well as the time when the tax was due—why should it not be necessary that a notice which by an ex parte proceeding creates a lien on all the property and rights to property of the defendant, should state the amount, and demand its payment? But no amount is stated. No amount is hinted at. There is nothing in this letter or in any of the demands which would not be satisfied by ten dollars or by ten millions.

There is further to be considered the extraordinary nature of the lien. It is not only a lien upon the land, but it is a lien upon the personal property. It is not only a lien upon property in possession, but upon all rights to property depending upon contracts, and upon unexecuted contracts. It not only creates a present lien, but it relates back:

"Any person, banking association, or corporation liable to pay any taxes, neglecting or refusing to pay the same after demand, the amount will be a lien in favor of the United States from the time it is due until it shall have been paid."

This demand may be made three years or five years after the tax shall become due, and will create a lien which retroacts after five years, and establishes itself upon the real estate and personal property, books, written contracts, and everything that can be taken hold of and identified as the property or rights to property of the defendant.

Now, when the lien as created by the demand is of such a character, it is reasonable and it is proper that all the steps which the law requires of the party creating the lien in his own favor shall be pursued strictly. One of the evidences of that must be a demand for the payment of the taxes. Another one, it seems to me, ought to be a demand for the specific amount to be paid.

In all of these alleged demands there is no demand, literally or philologically speaking, for the payment of any tax whatever. There is no demand for any specific amount averred, and surely a lien attended by such consequences as this one ought to have the amount stated with particularity in order to permit its enforcement.

It is to be observed that all this is a very different thing from the collection of the taxes by the ordinary process of distraint, or by a suit against a party for the amount of them. In an action of debt no such demand is necessary for the collection, as the supreme court of the United States has decided, because when the dividends are declared or the interest paid the law annexes to it the obligation to pay five per cent on that amount. But the law does not annex to that any lien on a man's property. The law does not annex to those taxes as taxes ex proprio vigore any lien. It is different from the statutes concerning the distillation of spirits, in which the penalties are so heavy and where all the stills, houses, real estate, etc., are made liable from the beginning for the taxes, and a lien created on them from the moment they become due, without any act of the government. Those are different taxes, collected under different circumstances. Here the act that constitutes and creates the lien is the demand. Without the demand there can be no lien, but with a just and proper demand, made in a proper way, the officer creates the lien by the very act of making the demand.

It is not necessary to go any further. We are of the opinion that no such demand has been made as will authorize the United States to come into court by a bill in chancery to enforce a lien created by such demand.

The demurrer of the defendants to the bill of complaint is sustained. Demurrer sustained.

The district attorney took leave again to amend the bill of complaint.

Case No. 15,985.

UNITED STATES v. PACKAGE OF LACE.

[Gilp. 338.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Feb. Term, 1833.

CUSTOMS LAWS — FORFEITURES — FRAUDULENT INVOICES—OMISSIONS FROM INVOICE.

1. To justify the forfeiture of a package of goods, under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of 28th May, 1830 [4 Stat. 409], either the package must contain an article not described in the invoice, or the package or invoice must be made up with intent to evade or defraud the revenue.

[1] [Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

2. On an information for forfeiture of a package of goods, containing an article not described in the invoice, under the provisions of the act of 28th May, 1830, neither accident, mistake, nor innocence of fraudulent intention is a sufficient ground of defence.

3. The proviso in the sixty-seventh section of the act of 2d March, 1799 [1 Stat. 677], which declares "that a package differing in its contents from the entry shall not be forfeited, if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the collector or of the court of the district that such difference proceeded from accident or mistake," is repealed by the act of 20th April, 1818 [3 Stat. 433], and the forfeiture can only be remitted in the manner prescribed by the act of 3d March 1797 [1 Stat. 506].

On the 5th September, 1831, the attorney of the United States, for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, filed an information against a package of cotton lace, imported into the port of Philadelphia, on the 24th July, 1831, from Liverpool, in England, on board of the ship Monongahela. The information alleged that the said goods were subject to ad valorem duty, and that the package, being inspected, was found to contain certain goods, wares, and merchandise, not described in the invoice, whereby the same was forfeited; and due process of law for the condemnation of the goods in question was prayed for. On the 1st July, 1831, Eliza Bacon filed a claim to the said package, for and on behalf of Charles Mellor. In answer to the information, the claimant denied that the package was made up with any intent to evade and defraud the revenue, or that the same was liable to forfeiture.

On the 19th February, 1833, the case came on for trial before Judge Hopkinson, and a special jury. It appeared by the evidence, that, on the 10th August, 1831, the goods were entered at the custom house by the claimant, who produced the original invoice at the time of making the entry. On the same day, and immediately after the entry, the package in question was brought to the custom house, in order to be inspected, under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of 28th May, 1830. On opening the package, at the public warehouse, thirteen pieces of quillings were found lying on the top, which were not mentioned or described in the invoice. Testimony, taken under a commission to Nottingham, in England, where the lace was manufactured, went to show, that the thirteen pieces of quillings had been placed in the package by accident and mistake, and that the omission to describe them in the invoice arose from ignorance, on the part of the person by whom it was made, that they were contained in the package.

Mr. Gilpin, for the United States.

This information is founded on the fourth section of the act of 28th May, 1830, relative to goods subject to ad valorem duty, which declares, "that if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, the same shall be forfeited." The provisions of this law are too plain to be controverted. Its object is to secure, even more strictly than before, the correctness of the invoice. It requires that document to be correct, under the heaviest penalty. By the act of 2d March, 1799, a discretion was confided to the collector of the customs, to judge whether or not a difference between the contents of the package, and the account of them given at the time of entry, was the result of accident or design; but that discretion no longer exists. Repeated evasions of the revenue have given rise to this change. If the error is not fraudulent, the secretary of the treasury is authorised to remit the forfeiture, by the act of 3d March, 1797; 1 Story's Laws, 458, 632; 3 Story's Laws, 1684 [1 Stat. 506, 677; 3 Stat. 433].

Mr. Broom, for claimant.

It is a mistake to suppose that the law does not look to the fraudulent intention. Without that there can be no forfeiture. None has been proved in this case, none even is alleged in the information or on the argument. The whole series of the revenue laws shows that the forfeiture depends on the fraudulent design. The only change has been in the tribunal which is to judge of this design; formerly it was the collector of the customs, now it is the court and jury. The act of 2d March, 1799, expressly exempts a package from forfeiture, though containing an article not described in the invoice, if the collector is satisfied there was no intention to defraud the revenue. The act of 20th April, 1818, repeals certain parts of that law, but does not touch this proviso. It could not be intended to apply the remedy prescribed in the act of 3d March, 1797, to these cases, for it was passed previously to the law of 2d March, 1799, which legislates upon these matters, and to which alone, and not to that of 3d March, 1797, the provisions of the act of 20th April, 1818, are supplementary. This is the more evident, because this latter law directs that "forfeitures are to be recovered and distributed in the manner prescribed by the act of 2d March, 1799," and surely it does not mean that the forfeitures are to be recovered and distributed under one law, and remitted or mitigated under another.

Mr. Gilpin, for the United States, in reply.

Nothing can be more explicit than the fourth section of the act of 28th May, 1830; if it conflicts with any previous law, it repeals it. Where a subsequent statute is inconsistent with a former one, and the two cannot be reconciled; or where the latter is on the same subject matter and introduces some new qualifications or modifications, the two cannot stand together; the latest must prevail. Affirmations in statutes that introduce new provisions, imply a negative of all that is not within their purview; so that a law directing a thing to be done in a certain manner, implies that it shall not be done in any other manner. U. S. v. Hair Pencils [Case No. 15,924.]

But in fact there is no conflict between the act of 28th May, 1830, and that of 2d March, 1799. The designation of the offence is the same in both; the penalty is the same; the mode of recovery is the same. The difference is in the time and manner of redress, mitigation or pardon after the offence has been proceeded against and ascertained. To establish, therefore, the discordance now suggested, and to show that the subsequent and late law is to be controlled by that passed twenty-five years since, would not, even if it could be done, afford a valid ground of defence.

HOPKINSON, District Judge (charging jury). The information you are trying is founded on the fourth section of an act of congress passed on the 28th May, 1830. This section, after directing the manner in which the collectors of the customs shall cause the packages of imported goods to be opened and examined, goes on to enact that "if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or if such package or invoice be made up with intent, by a false valuation, or extension, or otherwise, to evade and defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited."

Two distinct acts are made the grounds or causes of forfeiture. 1. If a package contains any article not described in the invoice. 2. If the package or invoice has been made up with intent to evade or defraud the revenue. The information before you proceeds on the first, and charges that the package or box in question did contain certain articles not described in the invoice. This is the fact alleged in the information, and it is denied by the answer, and is thus put before you for your decision upon it. It is a question of fact merely, apart from every consideration of intention, innocent or fraudulent. Did this package contain any article not described in the invoice, or did it not? Your verdict is to answer this question. The inquiry on the second ground of forfeiture is more difficult and complicated, for in that case the jury have to decide, not only upon the truth of the fact charged, but also the intention with which the act was done, whether in innocence, by mistake, or by accident, or with a design to defraud the revenue. In this case there is no dispute about the fact; it is not, and it could not be denied, that the box of laces did contain articles not described in the invoice. The whole defence is put on the law of the case, which relieves you from the trouble and responsibility of deciding it. It is a question which belongs to the court, and I shall take it upon myself on my own responsibility.

The defence is, that, although the fourth section of the act of 28th May, 1830, declares that a forfeiture shall be incurred, if the package contain any article not described in the invoice, yet that no such forfeiture is incurred unless the articles so found in the package were put there with a fraudulent intent; that if it happened by accident or mistake, it may be inquired into on this trial; that this is to be decided by you; and that the claimant will be entitled to your verdict if you shall be of that opinion. Is this the true meaning and construction of the law? In such a question we must first look to the law itself. Is that clear and explicit? Has it no ambiguity, which requires that we should look further for an explanation? I can see no such ambiguity in the enactment in question. It is a direct, explicit declaration, that if any article shall be found in a package which was not inserted or described in the invoice of that package, the same, that is, the package, shall be forfeited; not a word or intimation about the intention with which the surplus articles were put into the package; not a suggestion that accident or mistake is to be a defence on the trial of a prosecution for this penalty, or is to be any part of the issue or inquiry on such trial.

The argument of the counsel for the claimant has taken another course to bring him to his conclusion. His main reliance has been on the sixty-seventh section of the act of 2d March, 1799, which he considers now to be in force, and to be incorporated with the provisions of the law of 1830. The section of the former act referred to, is in many respects different in its course of proceeding from the latter act; changes having been made from time to time as experience pointed them out. The sixty-seventh section of the act of 1799, made it lawful for the collector, after entry of any goods, on suspicion of fraud, to open and examine any package; and "if the package so examined shall be found to differ in its contents from the entry, then the goods contained in such package shall be forfeited." Here we see, that the examination is to be made after the entry; that it is to be made only on a suspicion of fraud; and the difference which works the forfeiture, is to be between the entry and the contents of the package. Nothing is said about the invoice. By the act of 1830, the collector is directed absolutely, and whether he has or has not a suspicion of fraud, to cause one package out of every twenty of each invoice, to be opened and examined; and if the package thus examined shall be found not to correspond with the invoice, then all the goods contained in the entry are to be inspected; and then it is declared, that if any package shall be found to contain an article not described in the invoice, it shall be forfeited. By the law of 1799, the collector is authorised to open and examine packages only on a suspicion of fraud: this is the groundwork of his proceeding; and the subsequent proviso of the law is consistent with the principle of the enactment; it is, that the forfeiture shall not be incurred if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the collector, or of the court in which a prosecution shall be had for the forfeiture, that such difference proceeded from accident or mistake, and not from an intention to defraud the revenue. The opening and examination of the package is to be made only when, in the judgment and discretion of the collector, there is good reason to suspect fraud; and it is consistent with this principle, that if he shall afterwards be satisfied that his suspicions were unfounded, and there was no intention to defraud the revenue, he should have the authority to declare this opinion, upon which the forfeiture should not be incurred.

Now the argument for the present claimant is, that the proviso of the sixty-seventh section of the act of 1799 is still in force, although it is clear that the enacting clause has been suspended by subsequent laws; and that, therefore, if on a seizure under the law of 1830, the collector should be satisfied there was no intention of fraud when goods, not described in the invoice, are found in a package, the forfeiture would not be incurred; that the court has the same power; and that the jury stands in the place of the court in the exercise of this power, since it has been decided that seizures on land are to be tried by a jury. This process of reasoning, which is not a little complicated, would bring the question of intention before you in the determination of this cause. It is alleged that this proviso has never been repealed, and this is the foundation of the argument. The act of 1799 continued to be the law of the land until 1818, when a supplement to it was passed, introducing material changes in the whole revenue system. By the twenty-second section of the supplement, a change is made in the law on the subject of our present inquiry. The collectors are directed, without any previous suspicion of fraud, to cause at least one package out of every invoice to be opened and examined. We stop here to ask, if this positive order does not take from the collector the discretion to examine a package or not, according as he should or should not entertain a suspicion of fraud; and could he justify himself for neglecting to do it by the allegation that he had no such suspicion? Yet there is no express repeal of that part of the sixty-seventh section of the act of 1799, any more than of the proviso of that section.

We proceed with the act of 1818. After directing that the package shall be examined, it enacts, that if it shall be found not to correspond with the invoice, then a full inspection shall be made of all the goods included in the entry; "and if any package is found to contain any article not described in the invoice, the whole package shall be forfeited." It is further directed, that "if the goods shall be subject to an ad valorem duty, the same proceedings shall be had, and the same penalties shall be incurred as are provided in the eleventh section of the act: provided, that nothing therein contained shall save from forfeiture any package having in it any article not described in the invoice." We are here referred to the eleventh section of the act, and by that it is enacted that when, in the opinion of the collector, there is just ground to suspect that goods, subject to an ad valorem duty, have been invoiced below their true value, he shall direct them to be appraised; and if the appraised value shall exceed the invoice price, an addition is to be made to it, on which the duties are to be estimated. To prevent any misunderstanding, to preserve the distinction between goods found in the package not mentioned in the invoice, and an undervaluation of them in the invoice, it is expressly provided that nothing in the act shall save from forfeiture any package having in it goods not described in the invoice.

The whole clause or provision in the act of 1799, which relieves the forfeiture, if the collector or the court shall be of opinion that no fraud was intended, is omitted. Do we find no substitute for it; no power to discriminate between fraudulent and innocent cases of excess? There is a substitute. The power to discriminate between such cases remains, although it is vested in another tribunal. The twenty-fifth section enacts, that all penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of this act may be mitigated or remitted, in the manner prescribed by the act entitled, "An act for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," passed on the third day of March, 1797. That act directs the party who has incurred the penalty or forfeiture, to present his petition to the judge of the district, who is to inquire into the circumstances of the case; to state the facts and transmit them to the secretary of the treasury, who shall have power to mitigate or remit the forfeiture, if, in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud. It is to be observed that there never was a power, in the collector or the court, to remit a forfeiture. The provision of the law of 1799, was that no forfeiture should be incurred in the case mentioned, if the collector should be of opinion that the difference, between the entry and the contents of the package, proceeded from accident or mistake, and not from an intention to defraud the revenue. The law of 1818, also enacts a forfeiture for such a difference, but does not re-enact the condition on which the forfeiture shall not be incurred. The forfeiture is declared to be absolute and complete, on finding any article in the package not described in the invoice, and the circumstance of accident or mistake which, in the former law, was referred to the judgment of the collector, and would relieve from the forfeiture, is, by the act of 1818, to be the ground of a petition for a remission, to be judged of by the secretary of the treasury. How can we suppose that it was the intention of congress, that there should be no forfeiture in cases of accident or mistake, and, at the same time, to refer such cases to the treasury for a remission of the forfeiture at the discretion of the secretary? Yet such must be the state of the law, if the proviso of the sixty-seventh section of the act of 1799 is considered to be in force. The whole of that section is supplied by the act of 1818, and repealed so far as it is inconsistent with it.

Some stress was laid on that part of the twenty-fifth section of the act of 1818, which declares, that all the penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of it, "shall be sued for, recovered, distributed, and accounted for, in the manner prescribed," by the act of 2d March, 1799. It has been argued that this has reference to and keeps alive the sixty-seventh section of that act. I see no reason for this construction. The section of the law of 1799 referred to, is evidently the eighty-ninth, which provides expressly for the recovery and distribution or the penalties incurred by any breach of it.

The next act on the subject is that of 1st March, 1823, another supplement to the law of 1799. The fifteenth section of this act, among other things, enacts, that "if any package be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, the whole package shall be forfeited;" there is then this proviso; "that the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorised to remit the forfeiture, if in his opinion, the said article was put in by mistake, or without any intention to defraud the revenue." Here then is the whole case provided for; what shall constitute the offence; what the penalty or punishment shall be; and in what manner and by what authority, a discrimination shall be made between cases of fraud and cases of mistake. It is hardly possible to believe that the same power was left in the collector under the law of 1799. The recovery and distribution of penalties and forfeitures are to be made according to the act of 2d March, 1799, and to be mitigated or remitted in the manner prescribed by the act of 3d March, 1797, already referred to.

We now come to the law of 1830, under which this prosecution has been instituted. It is entitled, "An act for the more effectual collection of the impost duties." I have already remarked upon the language of the section, which embraces the charge laid in this information. There is nothing doubtful or ambiguous in it, and I have found nothing in any antecedent law to affect the construction of this act, in the manner or to the purpose contended for by the claimant. The seventh section of this act also refers it to the secretary of the treasury to remit any forfeiture, whenever he is of opinion that no fraud on the revenue was intended.

On the whole case, then, the fact being admitted or proved to your satisfaction, that the box or package of laces in question, did contain articles not described in the invoice, I have no doubt on the law, that the whole package is forfeited, and that neither you nor I have any thing to do with the question, whether these articles got into the box by mistake or accident, nor with the intention, fraudulent or innocent, in putting them in. The law has given the decision of that question to another power in the government. It belongs not to you or to me.

The jury found a verdict for the United States.

Case No. 15,986.

UNITED STATES v. PACKAGE OF WOOL.

[Gilp. 349.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May Term, 1833.

CUSTOMS LAWS — FORFEITURES — OMISSIONS FROM INVOICE—EVIDENCE OF MISTAKE.

1. On an information for forfeiture of a package of goods, containing an article not described in the invoice, under the provisions of the act of May 28, 1830 [4 Stat. 409], evidence of accident or mistake may be given, to rebut the inference of fraudulent intention, but is not a sufficient ground of defence.

2. Where an article not described in the invoice is found in a package, the whole package, and not the article alone, is forfeited under the provisions of the act of May 28, 1830.

On the 16th October, 1830, the attorney of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, filed an information against a package containing two hundred and fifty pounds of coney wool and five dozen and ten caps, imported into the port of Philadelphia on the 8th September, 1830, from Liverpool, in the ship Ann. The information alleged that the goods were subject to ad valorem duty, and that the package being inspected was found to contain certain goods, wares, and merchandise not described in the invoice, whereby the same was forfeited; and due process of law, for the condemnation of the goods in question, was prayed for. On the 26th November, 1833, Daniel Vail and Peter Marseilles filed a claim to the package. In answer to the information the claimants averred, that if the package did contain articles not described in the invoice, the same occurred wholly by accident and mistake, and without any intention to defraud the United States, and they alleged that it was not liable to forfeiture. To this answer a general replication was filed on the part of the United States.

On the 27th May, 1833, the case came on

[1] [Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

for trial before Judge HOPKINSON and a special jury.

On the part of the United States the original invoice, presented at the custom house by the claimants at the time of entry, was produced. It described the package in question as containing only two hundred and fifty pounds of coney wool. It was proved that on opening it at the public stores five dozen and ten caps were found within. The counsel for the claimants then offered to read testimony, taken under a commission to London, in order to prove that the articles thus omitted in the invoice, were put into the box by accident or mistake.

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Mr. Chauncey, for claimants.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The question of law in this case has been fully argued and considered, in another case, by this court. It is my opinion, that the only fact we have to try here, is whether the package contained articles not described in the invoice. We have nothing to do with the intention, with which they were so put in the box, nor whether it was done by mistake and accident, or with a fraudulent design upon the revenue. This is an inquiry for the secretary of the treasury to make, should the case be brought under his consideration, in the manner directed by the act of congress, and not for this court and jury to pass upon. In strictness, therefore, the evidence now offered should be rejected as having no relevancy to the issue; but, as the claimants are said to be respectable merchants, it may be due to them, or at least, no unreasonable indulgence, to allow them to show their case to the jury and the public, as it really is. I shall, therefore, permit the testimony to be read for the reason given, and not for any influence it can legally have on the verdict.

This evidence being read, and no other offered on the part of the United States, HOPKINSON, District Judge, delivered the following charge to the jury: It is the opinion of the court that, by the revenue laws, if any package, imported into the United States, shall be found to contain any articles not described in the invoice, the whole package shall be forfeited; and that this forfeiture cannot be avoided, by showing that the articles omitted in the invoice were put into the package by accident or mistake, and without any intention to defraud the United States. The power to remit the forfeiture, in cases of accident or innocent mistake, without a fraudulent intention, is given to the secretary of the treasury, and not to the court and jury by whom the issue on the information is tried.

The jury found a verdict for the United States.

Case No. 15,986a.

UNITED STATES v. PAGE.

[9 Betts, D. C. MS. 57.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June 12, 1847.

SHIPPING — MASTER'S BOND FOR RETURN OF SEAMEN FROM FOREIGN VOYAGE — INTERPRETATION AND PERFORMANCE—EXCEPTIONS—SPECIAL VERDICT.

[1. The statutory bond given by the master to the United States when going upon a foreign voyage, to exhibit his crew list, and produce the persons named therein, to the first boarding officer on his return from the voyage, imposes upon him a duty not merely to receive them passively, and return them when willing, but requires him to exercise all his lawful authority for the purpose of bringing them back.]

[2. The exception in the statute and bond of the case of a seaman who "absconds," does not necessarily apply to the case of a deserter, or of one who leaves the ship openly; for in such case the seaman may be found and apprehended by the aid of the local authorities, and it is the master's duty to have this done.]

[3. In an action on such a bond there was a special verdict finding that one of the seamen was dissatisfied, applied to one of the foreign owners for discharge, and understood from the answer that his discharge was assented to, and that he "left the ship, going to sea, 13 miles out from Liverpool, and returned there in the steamboat which towed her out." Held, that the court could not construe this as a finding that the seaman "absconded," within the meaning of the bond, so as to relieve the master from liability.]

[4. Assuming that there is no difference between bonds at common law and statutory or official bonds, the master would not be exonerated from his covenant by merely showing physical inability, subsequently accruing on his part, to perform it; or that others, whose assent and concurrence were necessary, could not be prevailed upon or compelled to aid or permit its performance.]

[5. The exceptions enumerated in the statute and bond are persons who may be discharged abroad with the written consent of the consul, etc., or who may have died or absconded, or been forcibly impressed into other service. Held, that these express exceptions should be extended by construction to other cases of a like character, and that, as the master signed the bond in his official capacity, he should be considered as relieved from its performance, when by reason of sickness he becomes unable to perform his duties, and is relieved in a foreign port and superseded by another.]

PER CURIAM. The defendant [Pitkin Page] as master of the ship Hudson, on the 24th day of March, 1845, at Mobile, executed to the United States a penal bond in the sum of $400, conditioned, that he would exhibit his crew list and produce the persons named therein to the first boarding officer at the first port at which he should arrive, on his return from the foreign voyage then to be made, except persons who may be discharged abroad with the written consent of the consul, &c., or who may have died or absconded, or been forcibly impressed into other service. The declaration avers the forfeiture of the bond and negatives the existence of facts forming an exception or excuse to the defendant.

On the trial of the cause, a special verdict was rendered by the jury which finds these facts: The execution of the bond by the defendant. That William W. Benson was named on the crew list, and was one of the crew and chief mate of the ship, and performed the voyage with the defendant from Mobile to Liverpool, where the ship arrived the 7th day of May, 1845, when the defendant left her, being unable, in consequence of sickness, to attend to his duties on board. That a new master was appointed to the command of the vessel in place of the defendant, and the said Benson continued on board, discharged the outward cargo and took in the return one. That Benson was dissatisfied in not having the command of the ship given him, and applied to one of the owners, then in Liverpool, to be discharged; and understood from the answer that his discharge was assented to, and left the ship, going to sea, 13 miles out from Liverpool, and returned there in the steamboat which towed her out. That the defendant was not on board the ship or steamboat at the time. On his return to Liverpool, Benson called on the defendant for the balance of wages due him and was told it should be paid him soon, and in four or five days after, the defendant paid him $16, in full of the amount due him for his services on board the ship. That Benson never appeared before the United States consul for his consent to his discharge, and was so paid off and discharged without the consent and knowledge of the consul. That the defendant did not come to the United States in the ship. She arrived in this port July 22, 1845, under command of the master appointed in his place, this being the first port at which she arrived after the execution of the bond. That the defendant left Liverpool after said ship sailed, and arrived at this port July 23, 1845, this being the first port at which he arrived after the execution of the bond. But neither the master of the ship nor the defendant has ever produced to a boarding officer here the said Benson. That on the 7th of August, 1845, Benson applied to the United States consul at London for relief as an American seaman, and was sent by the consul to New York in the ship Quebec, where he arrived in the month of September, 1845. The question upon this special verdict is whether the penalty of the bond can be enforced by the United States against the defendant. The undertaking has not been fulfilled to the letter, by the production of the seaman. Nor does the special verdict find specifically any of the facts named in the statute and condition of the bond, excusing the defendant from performance.

It is argued in behalf of the defendant that the jury has found facts which the court should interpret to be an absconding of the sailor from the ship. I do not say that it would be out of the province of the court to give the facts found a name and interpretation not expressed by the jury. But in the case of a special verdict, I apprehend the court is not at liberty to select between various imports of facts stated and give that adopted by it the effect of an express finding by the jury. Trial per Pais, 280.

The court will draw the legal conclusion from facts found by a special verdict. Butler v. Hopper [Case No. 2,241]. But if the legal affirmation or negative conclusion on the issue does not follow as a necessary consequence from the facts stated, no judgment will be pronounced upon it. State v. Duncan, 2 McCord, 129; Peterson v. U. S. [Case No. 11,036]; Stearns v. Barrett [Case No. 13,337]; [Barnes v. Williams] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 415. The term "abscond," employed in the statute and bond, is not to be understood solely in its ordinary acceptation or strict etymological meaning; but in determining the sense in which congress intended to use it, regard is to be had to the connection and subject-matter to which it has relation. The provision has respect to the relation of the master of a vessel to his crew, and his control over them on a voyage from the United States to foreign ports and back to this country. That control is taken away and lost when a sailor "absconds," because in such a case the master loses the means of coercing the person of the seaman by force of his own authority, or aid of that of the country where his vessel is in port. Admitting that in this instance the seaman deserted the vessel, such desertion will not necessarily bring the master within the exception of the bond, for it is manifest that the absconding and desertion of seamen from vessels are not equivalent in all essential particulars. Desertion may be open and in defiance of the officers of the vessel, or may follow from continuing an absence forty-eight hours beyond the time of leave granted, and the sailor may all the while continue notoriously within reach of the authority of the master. The Bulmer, 1 Hagg. Adm. 163; The Jupiter, 2 Hagg. Adm. 229. Indeed, he may show himself daily alongside the vessel, but, continuing to refuse to enter on board and do duty, he will be subjected to the pains and consequences of desertion. This is because the penalty is personal to himself, and follows his misconduct and dereliction of duty. But such condition of the sailor could not exonerate the master from the obligation of his bond. He is not merely to receive seamen passively, and return them when willing and consenting to come home, but he assumes a positive obligation, and is bound to exercise all his lawful authority to fulfil it. The court cannot assume in this case that the sailor left the ship furtively, or, intending to elude the notice of the master, or that he any way concealed or secreted himself on board the steamboat, whilst that remained by the ship. It is equally consistent with the finding of the jury to infer that he went openly from the ship, declaring his purpose to leave her and return in the steamboat to Liverpool.

In the language of the supreme court, if there was evidence sufficient in the special verdict from which the jury might have found the fact (that the seaman left the ship clandestinely and without the knowledge of the master) yet they have not found it, and the court cannot, upon a special verdict intend it. Barnes v. Williams, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 416. In my opinion, therefore, the special verdict does not place the defendant within any of the exceptions named in the condition of the bond.

The remaining consideration is as to the legal effect and operation of the bond, and whether it is to be construed an absolute undertaking to restore the seaman, and must be pronounced forfeited unless one of the specifically excepted cases is proved to exist. Two considerations are involved in this inquiry: First, whether it became impossible, in a legal sense, for the defendant to perform the condition of the bond by reason of events subsequent to its execution; and, second, whether the exceptions stated in the condition are to be taken as positive and exclusive of all others, or only as general denominations or classes of excuses, comprehending likewise others of like character, not named.

In considering the first point, no question will be raised whether a distinction exists between bonds at common law and statutory or official bonds in the admission of the defence of inability of the obligor to perform. On this assumption it is clear that a party cannot be exonerated from his covenant by showing merely physical inability subsequently accruing on his part to perform it; or that others whose assent and concurrence are necessary to its execution cannot be prevailed upon nor compelled to aid or permit its performance. The common-law rule is stringent and precise on this subject. 5 Dane, Abr. 173, § 7; Mounsey v. Drake, 10 Johns. 27; Com. Dig. "Condition" (D 1), 2; (L 14). The obligor takes the hazard of all contingencies which may impede or prevent his doing the act stipulated, other than those overpowering occurrences called acts of God, or of the public enemy, which displace and supercede individual efforts and the ordinary connections and incidents of human affairs. The event of the defendant's indisposition and consequent absence from the ship would not prevent his having his undertaking fulfilled by his under-officers, and thus would not necessarily change his relations to the government and the subject-matter of the contract, and would not, accordingly, be deemed an obstacle interposed by the act of God, and in that sense rendering it impossible for him to perform his engagement.

The other point seems to me, however to present weightier and more prevailing considerations in support of the defence. There are forcible reasons for regarding the exceptions named in the bond as indicating the description of facts which should operate a defeasance, and not as intended to restrict the excuse to those specific particulars. If sailors are "forcibly impressed into other service" the master is exonerated, and assuredly the exemption would be extended, upon every principle of construction, to prisoners of war, or those captured by pirates, the condition of the bond looking to the interposition of an adversary force, irresistible by the master, as the ground of excuse, and not to the disposition made by the seaman of the invading force and a just and rational interpretation of the exceptions would therefore apply the principle to other facts of like character and effect with that specified. That this construction of the exception may be admissible is also probable, because the bond is exacted by statute and is given by the defendant in his official character of master of the ship. He stipulates in that capacity, and the manifest import of the engagement is that it shall have relation to his acts whilst actually or virtually in command of the vessel. It calls for the exercise of his powers as master and such only. Viewed merely as a personal obligation it would be senseless, if not nugatory; for the defendant, individually and independently of his official relation to the vessel, could have no rightful authority to keep or present the crew list to a boarding officer or control the movements of this seaman, and compel his continuing with the vessel or return to the United States. It was then necessarily the power of the master of the vessel which was designed to be bound by the bond, and to have it exercised to the end appointed; and that authority it was which the United States contracted with and relied upon. The exceptions to this condition all tend to indicate and corroborate that construction of the contract. They release the defendant from its obligation, in cases where he could not have or employ the authority of master, and parity of reason would carry the exemption to every case where that authority no longer existed on his part or could not be legally exercised by him. In case of desertion not attended with concealment the master personally, or those in his place for the time, his under-officers, have rightful power to bring back the deserter by force, or can apply to the local authorities to aid in recovering him. An omission to do one or both would be plainly a dereliction of duty, which the obligation of the bond properly covers. But in this case, the defendant had ceased to be master of the ship. He could not arrest the sailor by his own authority, and had no right to invoke the aid of the civil magistrate to cause the arrest had the desertion taken place in the port of Liverpool; and it is not easily perceived what defence to an action for false imprisonment the defendant could have made, had he seized the sailor, and attempted to bring him home forcibly, after his relation as master of the vessel had terminated. This train of reasoning might be extended, but I shall content myself with stating the general conclusions that the bond being given by the defendant as master of the ship, and received and exacted by the United States from him in that capacity, and having stipulated for acts and the exercise of powers by him as master alone, and pointing out exemptions from its obligation where that official authority could not be exercised or applied, I am of opinion that its penalty does not attach and cannot be enforced against him in respect to any of the crew leaving the ship after the defendant ceased to be her master, and she was placed under the command of another person.

Judgment must accordingly be rendered on the special verdict for the defendant.

Case No. 15,987.

UNITED STATES v. PAGE.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 80.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

This claim not resisted by the United States.

[Claim of Thomas S. Page for four leagues of land in Sonoma county, known as the "Rancho Cotate." Confirmed by the board of land commissioners, and appeal taken by the United States.]

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.
Thornton & Williams, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In this case the original grant was not produced, but its existence and loss are proved beyond all reasonable doubt by the depositions of the witnesses and the production of the expediente from the archives containing the usual documents, and also a certificate of approval by the departmental assembly. The grant is also mentioned in the index of grants by the former government. No doubt was entertained by the commissioners as to the sufficiency of the proofs on these points, nor is any objection raised in this court in regard to them. The evidence discloses a full compliance with the conditions, and the description in the grant and map determines its locality. No objection is raised on the part of the appellants to the confirmation of this claim, and on looking over the transcript we have not perceived any reason to doubt its entire validity. The decree of the board must therefore be affirmed.

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 15,988.

UNITED STATES v. PAGE.

[2 Sawy. 353; [1] 17 Int. Rev. Rec. 158; 5 Chi. Leg. News, 363; 20 Pittsb. Leg. J. 158.]

District Court, D. Oregon. March 17, 1873.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS — WHOLESALE LIQUOR DEALER—NONPAYMENT OF TAX—INDICTMENT.

1. An indictment which charges the defendant with carrying on the business of a wholesale liquor dealer without the payment of a special tax therefor, at a certain place, continuously, between certain dates, is sufficient without stating the means or circumstances by which he became such dealer.

2. The rule upon this subject laid down in United States v. Howard [Case No. 15,402], affirmed.

[This was an indictment against W. D. Page for violation of the internal revenue laws. Heard on demurrer.]

Addison C. Gibbs, for the United States.
Benton Killin, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. The indictment in this case is found under section 44 of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 142), as amended by the act of June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. 240), and charges that the defendant "did, on February 10, 1873, and continuously thereafter, until March 6 of the same year, exercise and carry on the business of a wholesale liquor dealer, without paying the special tax therefor." The defendant demurs to the indictment because the particular facts constituting the crime are not stated therein.

Among other things, said section forty-four provides, substantially, that any person who shall carry on the business of a wholesale liquor dealer, without having paid the special tax as required by law, shall be punished as therein provided; and subdivision five of section fifty-nine of said act, as amended by the act of April 10, 1869 (16 Stat. 42), and the act of June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. 240), declares that "every person who sells, or offers for sale, foreign or domestic distilled spirits, or wines, in quantities of not less than five gallons at the same time, shall be regarded as a wholesale liquor dealer."

Counsel for the demurrer insist that the indictment should not only state that the defendant carried on the business of a wholesale liquor dealer, but, also, the means or particular acts whereby he carried it on—as that, at a time and place named, he sold distilled spirits, wines or malt liquors, or offered them for sale, and in what quantities.

In U. S. v. Howard [Case No. 15,402], this court held that: "An indictment which charges a defendant with carrying on the business of a retail liquor dealer, without payment of a special tax, at a certain place, continuously, between certain dates, is sufficient, without stating the means or circumstances by which he became such retail dealer."

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The statute makes no difference in the definition of a retail and wholesale liquor dealer, except as to quantity; and if such an indictment is good in the one case it must be in the other.

The general rule, which requires that the indictment should not only contain the description of the crime charged, but also those particular facts and necessary circumstances, by which it is constituted and identified, is admitted. But this case falls within the exceptions to the rule, where the crime is habitual character or conduct, and consists of a frequent repetition of similar acts, such as the case of a barrator, scold, etc.

In re Lindaur [Case No. 8,358], the petitioner had been indicted for being engaged and concerned in the business of a lottery ticket dealer, without any statement showing how or by what means he was so engaged and concerned. Having plead guilty and been sentenced to imprisonment, he subsequently applied for a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that as no crime was charged in the indictment, therefore the judgment was erroneous and void. The writ was denied; but on the argument no objection seems to have been made to the sufficiency of the indictment in this respect.

In U. S. v. Fox [Case No. 15,156], the defendant was indicted for carrying on the business of a distiller, on September 1, 1866, and on divers other days up to and until December 10 of the same year. After a verdict of guilty the defendant's counsel moved in arrest of judgment. One of the grounds of the motion was, that the indictment did not charge a crime, because it did not state the particular acts which would show that the defendant was a distiller. In passing upon this point the court, Lowell, J., said: "As I have had occasion to observe in another case, the precedents prescribe a very simple form of charging such a crime as this. * * * And in general when the charge is, that a certain trade has been carried on, or that the defendant has sustained a particular character, as that of a barrator, scold, etc., it is not essential to set out the particular acts which go to make up the trading or course of life. It would be otherwise if each act were a crime; or if by the statute definition a fixed number of separate acts made up the crime." Notwithstanding the able and ingenious argument of counsel for the demurrer, I am satisfied with the ruling in U. S. v. Howard [supra]. In principle and circumstances the cases are exactly alike.

Because the statute has declared who shall be regarded as a wholesale or retail liquor dealer, the rule of pleading in this class of cases is not changed. In this respect the statute is simply a rule of evidence, prescribing what shall be sufficient evidence of the fact that a party did carry on either of these trades or businesses.

[The demurrer is overruled.] [2]

Case No. 15,989.

UNITED STATES v. PALMER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 11.] [3]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1810.

GRAND JURY—WITNESSES.

Witnesses cannot be sent to the grand jury on the part of the accused; nor can a grand juror be withdrawn after he is sworn, for a cause which existed before he was sworn.

[Cited in U. S. v. Terry, 39 Fed. 362.]

Mr. E. J. Lee stated that the witnesses were about to be sent to the grand jury on the part of the United States against one Palmer for perjury, and moved for leave to send up witnesses to the grand jury on the part of Palmer, and referred the court to Burr's trial at Richmond. He moved also to withdraw from the grand jury the magistrate who committed Palmer. As to the right to challenge grand jurors, he cited Hawk. P. C. (3d folio Ed.) 2, c. 25, § 16, pp. 215, 307, and Id. c. 43, § 1, p. 412. By the Virginia law, a magistrate of the examining court is excluded from the jury.

THE COURT said that, not being furnished with any precedent of sending up witnesses to the grand jury on the part of the accused, they refused the motion, and refused to withdraw a grand juror after he was sworn, for a cause which existed before he was sworn. See 4 Bl. Comm. 302.

UNITED STATES (PALMER v.). See Cases Nos. 10,695–10,697.

UNITED STATES v. The PALO ALTO. See Case No. 10,700.

Case No. 15,990.

UNITED STATES v. PALOMARES.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 97.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

The validity of this claim not contested.

[Claim by the heirs of Francisco Guerrero Palomares for a lot 400 varas square in the Mission Dolores, San Francisco county. Confirmed by the board of land commissioners, and an appeal taken by the United States.]

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.

Halleck, Peachy & Billings, for appellees.

---

[2] [From 17 Int. Rev. Rec. 158.]

[3] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It appears from the documentary evidence in this case that Governor Figueroa's order, dated March 5th, 1835, directed the commissioner of San Solano to furnish to such individuals of the colony as might desire to remove and establish themselves elsewhere, the necessary assistance to pass the bay, and to report to the government the persons who might do so, with their places of destination. On the fourth of November, 1836, Francisco Guerrero petitioned Gov. Gutierrez, who had succeeded Figueroa, for a piece of land near the mission, and referred to the previous order of Figueroa allowing a settlement on any land that might be selected. This petition was referred to the administrator of the mission of San Francisco, by whom a favorable report was made, and the governor, on the thirtieth of May, 1836, granted to Guerrero the four hundred varas solicited according to his petition. The signatures of the documents are proved to be those of the officers by whom they purport to have been signed, and it is further proved that the grantee almost immediately after went upon his land, built a house upon it, fenced it and converted it into a garden—it having been before marshy and unoccupied. The grantee and his family, the present claimants, continued to reside upon it until his death in 1851. No objections to this grant are made on the part of the United States. It was confirmed by the board, and we see no reason for reversing their decision. The title of the claimants must therefore be confirmed.

UNITED STATES (PANAUD v.). See Case No. 10,704.

Case No. 15,991.

UNITED STATES v. PARK et al.

[2 Chi. Leg. News, 385.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Aug. 27, 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE — CAPACITY OF DISTILLERY — PRO RATA TAX.

Under the act of July 4, 1868, if the government fails or refuses to assign to a distillery the necessary number of store-keepers, and directs that the distillery be run only a certain number of hours, it reduces pro tanto the productive capacity of the distillery, and can only collect a pro rata tax.

Before BLODGETT, District Judge.

[Nowhere more fully reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 15,992.

UNITED STATES v. PARKER et al.

[2 Dall. 373.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1797.

CAPIAS AD RESPONDENDUM — ALIAS WRIT — RETROSPECTIVE TESTE.

[1. There is no effectual mode of issuing an alias capias ad respondendum but by testing it of the term to which the original writ was returnable; and there is no principle or usage which will authorize giving a retrospective teste as of April term, 1792, to an alias capias issued in August, 1796.]

[2. Cited in Hunter v. U. S., 5 Pet. (30 U. S.) 185, to the point that while a defendant is charged in execution, the debt is considered as satisfied, and that a discharge of one co-debtor is a discharge of all.]

A capias had issued in this cause against Daniel Parker, Wm. Duer, and John Holker, returnable to April term, 1792; and the marshal then returned, cepi corpus as to Duer, (who gave special bail in due time) and non sunt inventi, as to Parker and Holker. After a declaration was filed (reciting that the marshal had not found two of the defendants within his district, and proceeding against the other alone, upon the principles of the practice of the courts of Pennsylvania) after issue had been joined, and a variety of continuances, and other entries made upon the record, an original, not an alias, capias was issued, on the 8th of August, 1796, returnable to October term following, against Holker alone, upon which writ he was arrested; but on a hearing before Wilson, Justice, he was discharged on common bail.[2]

Mr. Rawle, for plaintiff, observed, that upon principles of common justice, and, he thought, upon principles of law too, when there were several defendants, and one only was taken on the first writ, process might issue, from time to time, to bring the others into court, without compelling the plaintiff to discontinue his action. By the 11th section of the judicial act (vol. 1, Swift's Ed., p. 58, c. 9 [1 Stat. 78]), it is provided, that the courts of the United States "shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." It is only incumbent on the plaintiff, therefore, to shew, that the present writ is necessary to the efficient exercise of the court's jurisdiction, and that it is agreeable to the principles and usages of law. It is admitted, that the course of proceeding in England, is different. There, the defendant, who is not taken upon the writ, must be pursued to outlawry; and if he does not enter bail, in order to avoid the penal consequences, the plaintiff applies to the exchequer for a sequestration, and obtains payment from the outlaw's effects. 1 Strange, 473; 2 W. Bl. 759; 2 Bl. Comm. 283. But no mode of proceeding to outlawry in civil cases, is recognized, or prescribed, by any law of the federal, or state, government; and even in criminal cases, it is questionable, whether the state law could furnish a rule for the United States. Unless, therefore, the mode now pursued shall be sanctioned, endless inconveniences will arise in the administration of justice; for, the plaintiff cannot discontinue his action, without certainly losing bail as to one defendant, while he has only a chance of obtaining it from another. If then, there is a necessity of adopting some process to prevent a right being without a remedy, the present process will be found perfectly consistent with the principles and usages of law; and the informality of the continuances will not be of sufficient moment to attract the attention of the court. Sell. Prac. 400. Such process has been issued repeatedly, both in the supreme court and common pleas of Pennsylvania; though the regularity of it was never, indeed, contested. In England, however, the courts of law and chancery were bound by forms of writ, of almost immemorial antiquity, and always prescribed by the express authority of parliament; 'till the pressure of business, and the diversity of the cases that arose, produced the statute of Westm. 2, which authorized the clerks in chancery to frame writs in consimili casu; and in the exercise of that authority, from time to time, a considerable latitude has been taken. 4 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law, 426; 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law, 202; 2 Inst. 404, 407; Gilb. 2–4, 8; Coke, 48. An authority strictly analogous is given to the federal courts by the judicial act; and as there is no common officina brevium, it follows, of course, that each court must frame its own writs, according to the nature of the respective cases.

[1] [Reported by A. J. Dallas, Esq.]

[2] This action had been originally instituted in the supreme court of Pennsylvania; and Holker (who was then the only person arrested) pressed for a trial; but after an ineffectual opposition to an order for bringing on the cause, the attorney of the district entered a discontinuance. On this ground, I am informed, Judge Wilson directed common bail to be accepted from Holker in the second suit. In October term, the attorney of the district (Rawle) had obtained two rules: (1) That Holker shew cause, on the first day of the present term, why the writ issued should not be amended, conformably to the precept, which, it was alleged, directed an alias capias; and (2) that Holker shew cause why the plaintiff should not file common bail for him. It was agreed, however that the case should be argued, as if the last writ had been an alias capias, reciting the original capias and return; and the only question discussed was—whether an alias capias could issue, after the lapse of so many terms, and under the circumstances appearing upon the record, to arrest Holker, and make him a party to the existing suit?

Gibson, Ingersoll & Dallas, for defendant, Holker, waived all objection to the mere form of the second capias; but insisted, that even an alias capias could not issue, unless it was tested of the term, to which the original was returned, and made returnable to the next immediately ensuing term.[3] They exemplified the mode of proceeding by outlawry in England, on a return of non est inventus as to one of several defendants; the force of the issue joined; and the impracticability of making an amendment in the declaration filed, to meet the new case to be brought upon the record; from 1 Strange, 473; 1 Wils. 78; 2 Sell. Prac. 389; 5 Com. Dig. 652. One defendant has given bail for the whole amount of the demand; the declaration expressly states, that Holker is not a party to the suit; and an issue is actually joined by Duer alone. If, therefore, the plaintiff succeeds in the present object, how is the record to be new modelled, upon any principle of law, or practice, so as to be rendered consistent with itself, and with the truth of the case? What will be the title of the declaration;—of what term shall it be filed;—what shall be the form of the old, or any new, issue;—and what is to be done with the original writ, and its return? Thus, the perplexity arising from the plaintiff's doctrine, (which, if it is just in one case, must be just in every case) is endless and insurmountable. Suppose the suit originated in the common pleas, but had been removed into the supreme court before the second writ issues:—from which court shall the second writ issue, and may one half of the cause be depending in the court above, and the other half in the court below? Suppose a verdict given on the first writ, before the second writ is returned:—can there be two verdicts for the same cause, how shall the amount be ascertained, or execution issue; and what is to be done if the verdicts should be contradictory? Suppose there are ten defendants to one contract, can it be reasonable or just, that there should be ten writs issued, or that ten bail bonds should be successively taken, for ten times the amount of the demand, or how is the bail to be modified and apportioned? Many other hypotheses might be fairly suggested to evince the extravagance, to which an allowance of the present motion would lead; and even after allowing it, there would arise another difficulty, in ascertaining in what action common bail should be entered for Holker, as there are now clearly two actions for the same cause on the records. See 5 Com. Dig. 297. But it is not intended to leave the plaintiff without a remedy. If the bail is satisfactory (and satisfactory bail can always be exacted, to the full amount of the demand upon the arrest of any one of the parties) the plaintiff may proceed to recover judgment, conformably to the state practice. If the plaintiff is not satisfied with the bail, then there may be a discontinuance; or, perhaps, the process may be kept alive, from term to term, till all the parties to the contract are brought into court.

Rawle, in reply. The consequences ascribed to the doctrine, in support of the motion, owe all their extravagance to the imagination of the opposite counsel. There is an important distinction between usages of law, and the practice of courts;—the latter being only a part of the former, and not, of course, as extensive. The question, therefore, should not be referred to the practice of the state courts, but should be decided by the usages of law, under the act of congress; and if it is shewn, that the mode of proceeding, now pursued, is not inconsistent with the state practice, while it is agreeable to the usages and principles of law, it should be sanctioned by the court. The process of outlawry in England is neither a dilatory, nor a precarious, remedy; for, all the writs may issue at once; the effect, by pronouncing the civil death of the party, cannot be prevented; and the plaintiff is entitled to receive his money from the public treasury out of the sequestered effects of the delinquent. Sell. Prac. Here, however, it would be idle to suspend all proceedings against the defendant who is arrested; since there is no legal process by which the effects of a non-appearing defendant can be made responsible; and it is uncertain when (if ever) he will come within the jurisdiction of the court. The process of outlawry was devised, principally, to get clear of the return of non est inventus, and to show that the plaintiff has done everything in his power to bring all the parties before the court; but it was never intended as an instrument of indulgence and benefit to the arrested defendant. It is asked, however, in what way the record and pleadings may be made consistent, on the insertion of Holker's name as a defendant? In the first place, it is to be answered, that whenever bail is entered, it has relation, by a legal retrospect, to the first day of the term, to which the capias was returnable; so, the court may order Holker's bail to be filed as of April term, 1792; and, thereupon, grant leave to imparl. As to the declaration, it may be amended to correspond with the fact; and even the case in 3 Wils. 78, shews in what manner this difficulty may be overcome. 1 Sell. Prac. 88, 260. Nor is it important how many defendants enter bail, or for what sum, since the plaintiff can recover no more than the amount of the demand for which the action is brought; and joint defendants may, in any case, give several bail bonds. The objection to the division and multiplication of suits, will, likewise, vanish, when it is recollected, that the same effect is produced by the severance of pleas, which may take place (as many precedents in Lilly's Entries establish) in every action against several defendants:—A joint issue, and a joint judgment are not indispensably requisite; and this court has no superior court, which might involve the inconveniency of a removal of the suit upon the first writ, before the second writ had issued. If, upon the whole, the process is a necessary instrument for the accomplishment of justice, it will be recognized and confirmed by the court, although it is not to be found in the ancient authorities of English law.

[3] IREDELL, Circuit Justice. Is it intended to maintain the writ on the footing of an alias, unless issued to the next term, after the return of the original capias?

Rawle. I think it can be so maintained.

THE COURT, having taken from the 12th to the 16th of April, to advise upon the subject, delivered the following opinions, after a recapitulation of the entries on the record.

PETERS, District Judge. There is no controversy on the state of the action, as it respects Wm. Duer, who has given bail for the full amount demanded by the plaintiff; and, it is conceded, that the process used on the present occasion, could not have been used in England. In that country, the outlawry in a civil case is, perhaps, an adequate remedy for the plaintiff; but it is always optional with the defendant, whether he will submit to the rigor of the proceeding, or enter special bail. In Pennsylvania, likewise, a remedy has been introduced by long usage; the plaintiff being allowed, if he pleases, to proceed, at once, against the defendant who is arrested: And now, as the laws of the United States have prescribed no specific mode for a case of this description, it is proposed, under the authority of the 14th section of the judicial act, that the court shall frame, or rather sanction, a new form of writ, which the plaintiff deems adequate to the purpose, and consistent with the principles and usages of law. But I am not a friend to this species of judicial legislation; nor do I think it necessary, or proper, to exercise the power of the court, in the present instance; even admitting the existence of the power to the extent contended for. It appears sufficient to my mind, to defeat the present motion, that the alias is not tested at the return of the original capias, nor made returnable at the next ensuing term. 5 Com. Dig. 239. There is no principle, or usage of law, that will sanction the idea of giving a retrospective teste, as far back as April term, 1792, to an alias capias issued in August, 1796. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion, that, on this ground alone, both the rules must be discharged.

IREDELL, Circuit Justice. I agree, in substance, with the opinion of my Brother PETERS. Whatever idea may be entertained of the authority of the court, to adopt the practice of Pennsylvania, or to devise a new form of process upon the principles and usages of law, it does not appear to me, that the plaintiff would be regularly entitled, under the present circumstances, to the benefit of either proceeding; for, there is no effectual mode of issuing an alias capias, but by testing it of the term to which the original writ was returned. The practice of Pennsylvania may be reasonable; and its antiquity at least would certainly entitle it to respect; but that practice goes no farther, than to give to the plaintiff an option, either to suspend his proceedings 'till the non-appearing defendant can be arrested, or to waive, on filing a declaration, all chance against him, and enforce the suit only against the defendant, who is taken on the capias. In the present instance, it may have been expedient to adopt the latter course of the alternative, on account of Mr. Holker's permanent residence in another state; but being adopted, the plaintiff is bound by it, and cannot, even on the principles of the Pennsylvania practice, avail himself of Mr. Holker's casual visit to Philadelphia, without discontinuing the first action. What, indeed, would be the condition of the defendant, who is arrested, if a different construction were to prevail? He might be ready for trial; he might be able to prove that there was no cause of action; he might be desirous to avoid trouble and expense by a prompt confession of judgment; or he might be the principal, and the non-appearing defendant merely a surety, so that he could derive no advantage from the arrest of his colleague;—and yet he would be exposed to an indefinite term of imprisonment, or be held with his bail for an indefinite period in suspense, at the pleasure of a plaintiff, who should chuse to calculate upon any remote possibility of bringing all the defendants into court. The injustice and oppression to the defendant, furnishes a strong argument against the allowance of such a privilege to the plaintiff.

It is conceded, however, by the plaintiff's counsel, that the motion would be irregular, unless leave is given to file common bail for Mr. Holker, as of April term, 1792, when the original action was instituted. But why should such a retrospect be allowed? Mr. Holker was not then arrested; and shall the court countenance a mere fiction;—a fiction not indispensable to justice, unknown to the law, and directly adverse to the truth of the case, exhibited for a number of years upon the record? No:—I am an enemy to every species of fictions. The fictions which have been incorporated into the law by long usage, (and, I believe, the cases of ejectment and common recovery afford the only fictions recognized in America) must be sustained; but as far as I can prevent the introduction of novelties of this nature, I shall be assiduous to do so. All the entries upon the record were true and regular at the time of making them. There is, therefore, no error to amend; but the court is asked, for the convenience of the United States, arbitrarily to abolish the writ and its return, the declaration, the issue, and the continuances; and not only to undo all that has been previously done, but by an entry of common bail, to ingraft, in effect, this falsehood upon the record, that Mr. Holker was arrested in April, 1792. But after all, I will not anticipate an opinion, upon a case in which an alias shall be regularly taken out, and continued, from term to term; though my present impressions are unfavorable, even on that ground to the plaintiff's doctrine. The multiplication of suits, the perplexity of entries, and the oppressive vexation of successive bail bonds, each for the full amount of the demand, are effects that could not be easily tolerated in the administration of justice. I have not heard, during the discussion, of any principle, or usage, of law, that would reconcile them to my mind: but this is not the foundation of the present decision; for, the irregularity in the teste and return of the alias capias is a sufficient reason to reject the plaintiff's motion.

The rules discharged.[4]

CHASE, Circuit Justice. The whole proceeding is to my mind unintelligible and irregular. There is only one of the parties to the contract, and only one of the defendants named in the writ before the court; and no process of outlawry has been prosecuted against the others; how shall we proceed to give judgment? Again: to what is the plea of non assumpsit to be applied? Is it, that the appearing defendant did not assume himself, or that he did not jointly assume with the other defendants? And how comes the plea of the statute of limitations to be added, without the leave of the court? But the counsel will have time to reflect upon these difficulties. For, the jury are not sworn, even in this irregular state of the record, to try the issues between the parties; and therefore, the court, on its own authority, will direct the juror last qualified to be withdrawn.

A juror was, accordingly, withdrawn, and the action continued till the next term.

Case No. 15,993.

UNITED STATES v. PARKER.

[See Case No. 15,735.]

UNITED STATES (PARKER v.). See Cases Nos. 10,750 and 10,751.

Case No. 15,994.

UNITED STATES v. PARKHILL.

[2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 604, note.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. June 15, 1875.

INTERNAL REVENUE OFFICERS—VISITORIAL POWERS—EXAMINATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

[Visitorial powers are not conferred upon the internal revenue officers, under Rev. St. §§ 3177, 5241, whereby they would be authorized to examine the checks of a national bank.]

In this case the defendant [the cashier of the Monongahela National Bank of Brownsville, Pennsylvania] refused to allow a deputy collector of internal revenue to examine the bank's checks. On the trial the district judge directed the jury to find a verdict pro forma for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the question of law whether, under the acts of congress, visitorial powers over national banks are conferred upon internal revenue officers.

[4] The cause (which was indebitatus assumpsit) came on for trial before CHASE and PETERS, Justices, at April term, 1798, when, after the opening was commenced by Rawle, for the plaintiff, it was discovered that the plea of "non assumpsit" was entered in short, and that the statute of limitations had, also, been pleaded; though the jury were only sworn to try the issue, and not the issues, joined between the parties.

Upon the argument on the point reserved

Mr. Reed, for plaintiff, contended that such powers were vested in revenue officers by Rev. St. § 3177, and that Id. section 5241 did not exclude them therefrom.

Mr. Sweitzer, for defendant, argued these two propositions: (1) That section 37 of the act of June 30, 1864, (Rev. St. § 3177 [13 Stat. 238]), did not, in terms or by fair implication, extend to or include national banks; (2) that national banks are protected by positive statute against any other visitorial powers than such as are authorized by the national bank act, and such as are vested in courts of law and chancery.

Before McKENNAN, Circuit Judge (sitting as assessor), and McCANDLESS, District Judge.

THE COURT ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant upon the point reserved.

Case No. 15,995.

UNITED STATES v. PARKS.

[Cited in Re Crittenden, Case No. 3,393. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 15,996.

UNITED STATES v. PARKS.

[See Case No. 10,764.]

Case No. 15,997.

UNITED STATES v. PARMELE.

[1 Paine, 252.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. April Term, 1810.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — CONTRACT IN AGENT'S NAME.

No action will lie in the name of a principal, on a written contract made by his agent in his own name, although the defendant may have known the agent's character; and a demurrer, in such a case, to the declaration, where the United States were the plaintiffs, was sustained.

[Cited in Chandler v. Coe, 54 N. H. 567. Distinguished in Gilpin v. Howell, 5 Pa. St. 50; Huntington v. Knox, 7 Cush. 375. Cited in City of Providence v. Miller, 11 R. I. 278; Sisson v. Cleveland & T. R. Co., 14 Mich. 496.]

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Connecticut.]

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. This cause coming up on a demurrer to the declaration, if that be insufficient there must be judgment for the defendant below. This action is brought on a written contract of the defendant [John Parmele] by which he acknowledged to have received from one Stephen Rainy one hundred barrels of flour, and agreed to be holden therefor to Alexander Wolcott, Esquire, or order, when called for, he paying ten cents per barrel storage. The objections to the declaration are, that no demand is stated to have been made of the defendant, nor any tender of the storage; and that no action will lie on this agreement in the name of the United States. The last objection is the only one which will be examined, for if that be well taken, the plaintiffs cannot recover in this suit. To obviate the force of this objection, which seemed to be felt, it has been said, that the action is not founded on the written contract, but on the right which vested in the United States by the seizure and condemnation of this property; and that the agreement was only made use of as evidence. Whether such an action could have been brought, this court is not bound to say; but the present suit is not of that description. It proceeds entirely on the defendant's contract, and the court, if it cannot discover his liability there, has no right to look for it elsewhere. It is also contended, that an interest in the United States is sufficient for the purpose of maintaining this suit. Such an interest, it is true, is disclosed in the declaration, so far as a seizure and confiscation could give it; but a science of these matters not being imputed to the defendant, it is not easy to perceive how he could suppose the public had any interest in the flour committed to his keeping. But if he knew every thing, it will not, in the judgment of this court, make any difference.

The United States, in a case of this kind, have no privilege or rights beyond those of an individual. If they sue on a contract, they are as much held to prove it as a private citizen, and any variance will be as fatal in the one case as the other. If this flour had been private property, but not that of Rainy or Wolcott, and it had been known to be so to the defendant, yet on this contract no suit could have been maintained, but in the name of the parties to it. None of the cases cited show that the cestuy que trust can bring an action at law, on an agreement made with his trustee. There is a fitness in confining the remedy to the party to whom the promise is made; in which case the judgment can always be pleaded in bar to another action. If the United States recover in this action, who can say that Parmele may not be vexed by another suit in the name of Rainy or Wolcott? The court, although it has an opinion, is not called upon to say who would have been the proper plaintiff in this case; but as no promise was made to the United States, it is sufficient to say, that they have altogether failed in making out their cause of action. The court cannot say, that an engagement to deliver this property to Rainy or Wolcott was one to deliver it to the United States, or to their marshal of this district. Where there is no difficulty in suing in the name of the party to the contract, there can be no necessity of supporting the suit of a stranger to it; and without a precedent in point, the court would feel great reluctance in making one.

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

This case has also been likened to those of principal and factor; and it has been said, and correctly, that the former can sue on a sale made by the latter, although he be not at the time known to the purchaser. Courts of law, out of their great solicitude to protect the interest of a principal, have gone great lengths in identifying him with his agent or factor, and as a necessary consequence, have permitted a suit in his own name, although he be not, except by implication of law, a party to it. But the court does not know that such suit was ever sustained on the contract itself, where one in writing took place between the factor and vendor, in which the name of the principal did not appear. What use might be made of such a paper, as matter of evidence, is one thing; but that a suit can be brought upon it in the name of any but a party to it, has not been shown; nor is it believed that such is the law. Without then disturbing any of the cases of this class which have been referred to, this court cannot, when sitting as a court of law, say, that an express and written promise to do a thing to Rainy or Wolcott, is a contract to do the same thing to the United States. It looks in vain to the writing itself for such an engagement; and that is the only source from which it has any right to make its deductions. It is on that which the plaintiffs have relied, and if they do not succeed in showing an assumpsit there, they fail in their action altogether.

Upon the whole, as the United States have sued on a written contract, to which they are not parties, and in which they are not even named, but which appears to have been made with other persons, it is the opinion of this court, that the judgment of the district court was erroneous [case unreported], and must be reversed.

UNITED STATES v. PARMENTER. See Case No. 14,756.

Case No. 15,998.

UNITED STATES v. PARROTT et al.

[1 McAll. 271; [1] Hoff. Op. 234; 7 Morr. Min. Rep. 335.]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. July Term, 1858.

INJUNCTION AGAINST WASTE—PRACTICE—PARTIES—EQUITY JURISDICTION—DENIALS OF ANSWER—AFFIDAVITS—PUBLIC MINERAL LANDS.

1. On a motion for injunction to enjoin waste, the complainant cannot, on bill and answer, read affidavits in support of his title.

[Cited in Farmer v. Calvert Lithographing, etc., Co., Case No. 4,651.]

2. The general rule is, that all persons interested in the object of the bill, are proper parties. There are qualifications to this rule; and the court will not suffer it to be so applied as to defeat the purposes of justice.

3. On a motion to dissolve an injunction, matters set up by way of avoidance in the answer responsive to the bill, should be deemed, on such motion, equivalent to an affidavit by the defendant. Such matters, on the final hearing, must be proved by the defendant.

4. The jurisdiction of this court is limited to certain persons and matters, but within those limits it can confer a remedy when a plain, adequate, and complete one cannot be had at law. In the exercise of its equity jurisdiction within those limits, it can afford relief where it can be afforded by the principles of the high court of chancery in England.

5. Injunction may issue to stay irreparable mischief or waste, in cases of disputed title.

[Cited in Le Roy v. Wright, Case No. 8,273.]

6. Where the answer denies, directly and positively upon personal knowledge, the allegations of the bill, it "denies the equity of the bill," and, acting upon it as evidence, the injunction will be dissolved by the court, in the absence of extraordinary circumstances.

7. Query:—Whether, in a case of irreparable mischief, the court will permit affidavits to be read in contradiction to positive denials of the answer?

8. Where fraud, forgery, and ante-dating are distinctly alleged in the bill, and the only denial of them is on "information and belief," it is not a "denial of the equity of the bill," and cannot arrest the issue of an injunction, or authorize a dissolution of it if one has been granted.

[Cited in Cole Silver Min. Co. v. Virginia & G. H. Water Co., Case No. 2,990.]

9. The working of a gold mine is the taking away the substance of the estate.

10. Mere insolvency, if inconsiderable, would not give jurisdiction to the court: but where the amount is great, and the inability of the party to respond is greatly disproportioned to that amount, such insolvency would be an element to influence the action of the court, and where it exists is proper subject for an allegation in the bill.

[Cited in brief in Dormueil v. Ward, 108 Ill. 216.]

11. The United States have not conveyed or dedicated the minerals in the public lands to individuals or the public.

[Cited in Lee Doon v. Tesh, 68 Cal. 48, 6 Pac. 97, and 8 Pac. 621.]

12. The institution of an action at common law, prior to the exhibition of a bill in equity, for injunction, is the general rule; but such action is not an indispensable prerequisite in all cases.

13. A court of equity will, in some cases, enjoin against the removal of the fruits of past waste.

The bill in this case is filed for an injunction, and the appointment of a receiver. The object is to restrain the working of a quicksilver mine, known as the "New Almaden," of the alleged value of $25,000,000 and from which defendants are extracting minerals to the annual value of $1,000,000. It alleges that the title under which defendants claim to hold possession, is derived from the Mexican government, and that the same, independently of all other defects, is forged and ante-dated. That defendants have, through one Andres Castillero, in their own behalf, petitioned the board of land-commissioners organized under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, for a confirmation of their claim; which application is now pending on appeal before the district court of the United States for the Northern district of California. The bill prays for an injunction to enjoin the destruction of the mine until the title to it is determined by the tribunals to which its adjudication is finally confided.

[1] [Reported by Cutler McAllister, Esq.]

P. Della Torre, Dist. Atty., Edmund Randolph, and E. H. Stanton, for the United States.

A. C. Peachey and Gregory Yale, for defendants.

Before McALLISTER and HOFFMAN, District Judges.

McALLISTER, District Judge. The magnitude of the interests involved, the novelty of this case in some of its features, the fact that the documentary title on which the defendants to a certain extent rely, was obtained from Mexico pending the war between that country and this, a few weeks prior to the occupation of this country by the American forces, the allegation that such documentary title was procured by a conspiracy to defraud the United States and was forged and ante-dated,—are circumstances which have invested this case with no ordinary interest outside these walls. That interest has been reflected upon those who have appeared in court as the representatives of the respective parties, as evidenced by the strenuous and zealous efforts which have been made by the respective counsel. This court is reminded by this condition of things, of the remarks of Chief Justice Marshall, in Mitchel v. U. S., 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 723. "Though the hope of deciding causes to the mutual satisfaction of parties would be chimerical, that of convincing them that the case has been fully and fairly considered, that due attention has been given to the arguments of counsel, and that the best judgment of the court has been exercised on the case, may be sometimes indulged. Even this is not always attainable. In the excitement produced by ardent controversies, gentlemen view the same object through such different media that minds not unfrequently receive therefrom precisely opposite impressions. The court, however, must see with its own eyes, and exercise its own judgment, guided by its own reason." The present proceeding may be viewed as in the nature of an information on the part of the government through its law officer. It is a bill filed by the district attorney of the United States in their behalf. It sets out the title of the United States to certain premises; that defendants are in possession of said premises, which consists of a mine of vast value, and are extracting its minerals to an amount in value of $1,000,000 per annum, and have abstracted already minerals to the amount of $8,000,000. It charges their possession to be tortious, and that the title under which defendants hold such possession was forged, false, antedated, and fabricated in pursuance of a conspiracy formed to cheat and defraud the United States of their rights to the said property; that defendants have filed a petition in the name of one Andres Castillero to the board of land-commissioners under the act of congress passed March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631], which is pending on appeal before the district court of the United States, for the Northern district of California, the object of which petition is to obtain from the United States a confirmation of the title which they pretend to hold from the Mexican government. It further alleges that defendants are destroying the substance of the mine, that they are unable to respond for the damages which have already accrued and still may accrue, and prays that an injunction may issue to stay the waste they are committing and threaten to commit, until the determination of the title by the tribunals to which the adjudication of it is confided by law shall take place, and that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the property intermediately.

This bill has been met by a demurrer and an answer. Double pleading in a court of equity is not allowable; and the answer in this case being a general one, overrules the demurrer upon the settled doctrine of the court. Taylor v. Luther [Case No. 13,796]. So that the demurrer may be dismissed without further observation, and the case stand on the bill and answer. Id. When the motion for injunction was made, the solicitors for defendants objected to any affidavit offered by complainants as to title. It was agreed that such affidavit might be read, and its admissibility argued on the discussion by counsel of the merits, and decided by the court in its opinion. Affidavits for defendant responsive to those on the part of complainants as to title, were admitted to be read, subject to the decision which should be made by the court on the admissibility of the complainants' affidavits to title. This motion for an injunction could be disposed of in a comparatively brief time; but the objections urged against the jurisdiction of the court, and to the character and form of this proceeding, have been numerous, and urged with so much zeal and apparent conviction in their correctness, that it is proper that special notice should be taken of them, in the hope of convincing parties that the court has "fairly considered the case, that due attention has been given to the arguments of counsel, and that the best judgment of the court has been exercised in the case."

The first question, then, is the admissibility of affidavits as to title, presented by defendants. The right of the plaintiff to read affidavits on a motion for injunction is declared to be a well-settled rule. It is his unquestionable right, say the court in Ken-sler v. Clarke, 1 Rich. 620 [2 Hill (S. C.) 620], to read affidavits on an application for an injunction in the support of the allegations in his bill before the coming in of the answer; and as constituting a part of his case, they may be read on any subsequent motion to perpetuate or dissolve the injunction. But the court lays down the rule that no affidavits filed subsequently to the coming in of the answer can be read, for the reason it was calculated to surprise the defendant. The only exception to this rule of the right of plaintiff is to be found in the cases of waste and such as are analogous, for the purpose of preventing irreparable mischief; and that exception limits the affidavits to waste, insolvency, or other collateral fact, and does not permit them to extend to the question of title. This exception as to affidavits as to title was asserted by Lord Eldon in Morphett v. Jones, 19 Ves. 350, and in Norway v. Rowe, Id. 157; and seems to be recognized by the text-writers, by the case cited above from South Carolina, and by other decisions. Mr. Justice Story, in the case of Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272], has intimated his doubts as to the existence of a good reason for the rule which denies the right of a complainant to read affidavits as to title, in a case of irreparable mischief; and the remarks of the learned judge upon the point are entitled to much consideration, and may lead hereafter to a qualification of the rule. The proposition for which he contends is, that affidavits to title should upon general principles be looked to, not for the purpose of establishing title, but to enable the court to see if probable foundation existed to believe that the complainant may establish his title and be liable intermediately to irreparable injury. In the case of Tobin v. Walkinshaw [Id. 14,068], decided by this court, it went into a full consideration of the case of Poor v. Carleton [supra]; and inasmuch as the point was not directly before the court in that case, and the learned judge in that case admitted that affidavits to title were only to be looked to for a qualified purpose, considering too, as well settled, that on a motion for an injunction a court of equity is not to look into title, this court came to the conclusion it would be better to adhere to the ancient rule until qualified by some authoritative decision directly on the point. The court, therefore, decided that affidavits to title could not be read. The law announced in that case must be applied to the present, and so much of the affidavits of plaintiff in this case as goes to title must be discarded by the court in the adjudication of this motion. The affidavits of the defendants, which were admitted to be read as responsive to plaintiff's affidavits, must be also rejected. As the court excludes the plaintiff's, on a consideration of the question of their admissibility, which by consent of parties when they were read was reserved for its decision, the affidavits of the defendants must share the same fate. The only ground on which they could be received was, that they were responsive to the affidavits of complainant as to title. In the absence of any such, no rule is better settled than that defendants cannot read affidavits to support their answer. 1 Hoff. Ch. Prac. 360; Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202; 2 Hill (S. C.) 620. In the language of Lord Eldon, in Norway v. Rowe, 19 Ves. 157, "the title must be taken on the answer." The case, therefore, is to be discussed on the pleadings—the allegations in the bill as verified by the affidavits accompanying them, exclusive of any portion of them which go to title, and the denials in the answer.

A preliminary inquiry is, as to the jurisdiction of the court as to the parties. The decision of this court in the case of Tobin v. Walkinshaw [supra] has been cited as an authority which settles the question raised in favor of the objection taken by the defendants' counsel to the jurisdiction of this court, on the ground of want of parties. A reference to the structure of the bill in that case and in this, will show that, whatever may have been the language of the court arguendo in that case, it can not be cited as an authority in the present. In that case, it was alleged that defendants held under a conveyance from one Andres Castillero. There was no allegation that he was beyond the jurisdiction of this court, nor any prayer that he might be brought into court, should he at any time come within the reach of its process. It prayed for the cancellation of deeds in the hands of absent persons; it prayed for an account of all the profits of the mine for the preceding year, and for a perpetual injunction. By the subsequent pleadings it was ascertained, that two persons resident in this city, within the jurisdiction of this court, equally interested with defendants, were not made partes to the bill. It was in relation to such a bill the court said: "But the bill asks, that an account of profits belonging to other people be taken, and title-deeds to property in which those other and absent persons are as much interested and to a larger extent than the defendants themselves, shall be canceled." The court further said: "But there is one feature in this case which distinguishes it from all others. It is, that two absent persons (Parrott and Bolton), whose interests would be affected by a decree, are residents of this city, and within the reach of the process of this court. But if by bringing them before the court, this case would be beyond the jurisdiction of this court, can the court by indirection adjudicate upon their rights, and thus do indirectly what it could not do directly?"

Now, the present bill makes all persons in interest, within the reach of the process of the court, parties to the bill. It alleges, that certain persons who are absent from this state hold possession of the mine, by the defendants as their agents, and prays, if they come within the jurisdiction of this court, they may be made parties. It asks for the delivery and cancellation of no deeds, nor any account of profits. It asks from the defendants the value of the ore extracted and carried away by either of them, or by any other person with license and consent of them, or either of them, while in possession, as alleged wrongdoers, of the premises. It alleges, that under the act of March 3, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle private land-claims in the state of California," a petition in conformity with the provisions of that act has been submitted to the board of land-commissioners in the name of one Andres Castillero, for and in behalf of defendants, asking for a confirmation of the claim to the premises in dispute held under a Mexican title; which proceeding is pending on appeal before the district court of the United States for the Northern district of California, before which tribunal the alleged title of the premises is now awaiting adjudication. The bill prays for an injunction to enjoin the destruction of the premises before the termination of that adjudication.

The averment of the answer which raises the objection to the jurisdiction is, that certain persons resident in foreign countries are associated with defendants, and the names of some of them are unknown. The lands and mine are admitted to be in possession of the agents of the company of which the said non-residents are parties. The question presented is, whether where the parties are prosecuting a claim in the district court by their attorneys, and holding possession and enjoying the proceeds of the premises by their agents, the court has the power to protect the property, or is deprived of that power because some of the parties are without the jurisdiction of the court. The affirmative of this proposition, if sustained, would be attended with singular results. It would only be necessary for parties to associate themselves with foreign parties who were beyond the process of this court, and entire exclusion from any equitable relief required by others who may have rights to or claims on the property in their possession, would be the result. The general rule in a court of equity is, that all persons who are interested in the object of the bill are necessary and proper parties. There are exceptions to this rule, which are governed by one and the same principle, which is—as the object of the general rule is—to accomplish the purposes of justice between all the parties in interest; and it is a rule founded in some sort upon public convenience and policy, rather than upon positive municipal or general jurisprudence. Courts of equity will not suffer it to be so applied as to defeat the very purposes of justice, if they can dispose of the merits of the case before them without prejudice to the rights of other persons who are not parties, or if the circumstances of the case render the application of the rule impracticable. Story, Eq. Pl. § 77. The first exception to the rule stated by Judge Story is founded upon the utter impracticability of making the necessary or proper parties, by reason of their being beyond the process of the court. Id. § 79. This ground of exception is peculiarly applicable to suits in equity in the courts of the United States. If, therefore, this rule as to parties were of universal application, many suits in those courts would be incapable of being sustained therein; and Judge Story states that the general rule in the courts of the United States, is to dispense, if consistently with the merits of a case it can possibly be done, with all parties over whom the court would not possess jurisdiction. Id. § 79. Parties to bills are divided into three classes—nominal, necessary, and indispensable. The act of congress of February 28, 1839 (5 Stat. 321), and the 47th rule of equity of the circuit courts of the United States, were enacted to remove the disability alluded to by Judge Story, in the circuit courts, in the administration of justice, where some of the parties were beyond the jurisdiction of the court. The judicial construction placed upon those enactments is, that they have dispensed with the duty of making nominal or necessary parties where it is impracticable to do so by reason of their being beyond the reach of the process of the court; but the presence of an indispensable party is as necessary to the jurisdiction of the court as it was before the enactment of the rule and the law. The presence of an indispensable party is demanded by the consideration that no court of equity, however general its jurisdiction, can adjudicate directly upon the rights of a party unless he is actually or constructively present. [Mallow v. Hinde] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 194. The absent parties are undoubtedly necessary parties, and had they been within reach of the process of this court, must have been made parties to the record. But are they, under the circumstances, so indispensable as parties, as to prevent any decree by this court?

In this case it is alleged in the bill, that certain parties reside out of the jurisdiction of this court; and it prays that they may be made parties whenever they shall be found within its jurisdiction, in conformity with the 22d rule of equity. The answer admits that they reside beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and the names of some of them are unknown to defendants. It admits the possession of the property by the agents of those absent parties, which agents are made parties to this bill. The same parties are in the district court prosecuting a claim to the same property in the name of Andres Castillero against the plaintiffs. No act is required to be done by these parties. They are before the district court, where their rights in the property are to be adjudicated. Not actually, they are constructively present on this motion.

In the case of Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738, the bill was against, and the decree was rendered against, an individual who was the agent of another, who was not a party to the bill, being a sovereign state, and who could not be made a party. The objection in that case was, that as the real party cannot be brought before the court, a suit could not be sustained against the agents of that party. "Why," ask the court (page 843), "may not it (this court) restrain him from the commission of a wrong which it would punish him for committing?" The case of Osborn v. U. S. Bank was a demand for money of the principal in the hands of an agent, which belonged to a principal not a party to the record. Hence, this court in its opinion in the case of Tobin v. Walkinshaw [Case No. 14,068], in commenting on that, state as one of the grounds of difference that in the case of Tobin v. Walkinshaw "there is no question of principal and agent in this case."

There would seem to be no reason to restrain the court from acting, for want of parties. To do so in this case, would be a denial of justice. The parties, while using another judicial tribunal for the confirmation of their alleged title, would be enabled by reason of the absence of some of them without the jurisdiction, to bar the party against whom they are prosecuting their claim to the property, from the interposition of this court to preserve and protect that property pending such prosecution. The foreign parties would thus be making use of an American tribunal to enforce their claim, while they availed themselves of their absence to preclude the complainants from a right to which the humblest individual is entitled,—to invoke an injunction for the preservation of the property; for only to that extent can the action of this court go. Judge Story lays down the ordinary rule to be, that where the persons who are out of the jurisdiction are mere passive objects of the judgment of the court, or their rights are merely incidental to those of the parties before the court, then, inasmuch as a complete decree may be obtained without them, they may be dispensed with. If such absent persons are to be active in the performance and execution of the decree, or if they have rights wholly distinct from those of other parties, or if the decree ought to be pursued against them, they are indispensable. Story, Eq. Pl. § 81. Speaking of a defect for want of parties, this author says: "In many instances the objection will be fatal to the whole suit. In others, it will not prevent the court from proceeding to the decision of other questions between the parties actually before it, even though such a decision may incidentally touch upon or question the rights of the absent parties." Id. In Smith v. Hibernian Mine Co., 1 Schoales & L. 238, Lord Redesdale says: "The ordinary practice of courts of equity in England, when one party is out of the jurisdiction and other parties within it, is to charge the fact in the bill; and then the court proceeds against the other parties, notwithstanding he is not before it. It cannot proceed to compel him to do any act, but it can proceed against the other parties; and if the disposition of the property is in the power of the other parties, the court may act upon it." "I remember" (says the chancellor), "a case where a bill was filed to sell an estate for payment of debts, and the heir at law who was entitled to the surplus after payment of debts, was out of the jurisdiction. The court ordered the estate to be sold for the payment of debts; the heir (say the court) might file a bill to set aside the proceedings if they were erroneous."

In the case at bar, no act is required to be performed by the absent parties in the execution of the decree; their interests are incidental only to those of defendants, and they are passive parties; the possession of the property is in them by their agents. They may come into this court at any time; they are, in the name of Castillero, prosecuting for the confirmation of their claim to the property in the hands of their agents, the defendants. The case of Coiron v. Millaudon, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 113, has been cited by defendants' solicitors. In that case, the bill was filed to set aside a sale of property on the ground of irregularities in insolvent proceedings. If the sale were set aside, the defendants would have been enabled to recover from the creditors who had received their money. The court say: "The creditors, therefore, are the parties chiefly concerned in these proceedings, and as it respects those to whom the proceeds of the estate have been distributed, they are directly interested in upholding the sale; for if it is set aside, and the proceedings declared a nullity, they would be liable to refund the share of the purchase-money each one had received in the distribution." This latter case simply affirms the principle announced in Mallow v. Hinde, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 194, and in Tobin v. Walkinshaw, decided by this court, that indispensable parties, as they were considered in those cases to have been, could not be dispensed with.

We cannot consider the objection to the jurisdiction for the want of parties as tenable.

Whether the answer should be regarded on this motion more than an affidavit, is the next question which has been raised. The ancient doctrine may be as contended for by the solicitors of complainants; but we think that upon the ground of reason and more recent authority, all direct denials in the answer responsive to the allegations of the bill, and not matters of avoidance, ought to have the effect of an answer as evidence on this motion as on a final hearing. On a motion to dissolve an injunction, Mr. Justice

Story says: The ground of "dissolving an injunction upon a full denial by the answer of the material facts is, that in such a case the court gives entire credit to the answer, upon the common rule in equity, that it is to prevail, if responsive to the charges of the bill, until it is overcome by the testimony of two witnesses, or of one and other stringent corroborative circumstances." Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272]. It is evident, then, that Judge Story considered that even on a motion to dissolve an injunction, the same effect was to be given to the answer as is to be given to it on the hearing.

As to the effect to be given to matters set up in the answer by way of avoidance, there has been some conflict of authority. In New York, South Carolina and New Jersey, the doctrine is well settled that matter of avoidance set out in the answer responsive to the allegations in the bill, is to be considered as equivalent to an affidavit on a motion for injunction. In Maryland and Georgia, a contrary doctrine obtains. In the former state (3 Bland, 162), while enforcing their view of the rule, the court did so upon a single authority in Bardiston's Chancery Reports, one hundred and thirty years old; and the Maryland court say "that the rule was not mentioned in any English digest, compilation, or book, other than that book." The court in Georgia (1 Kelly, 7), relied solely for their construction on the case of Hart v. Ten Eyck, 2 Johns. Ch. 63. But the decision in this case has been repeatedly reversed in New York. [1 Paige, 239; 2 Sanf. 673] [2]

As to the effect of the answer, then, in this case, the court considers that, on this motion, the denials made in it on personal knowledge, direct and responsive to the bill, are to receive the consideration due to them as if it was on the hearing, but that matters set up by way of avoidance are to be received as affidavits. As this question was raised at the bar, it is deemed proper to dispose of it, were it only to settle the practice of this court in view of the conflict of authority which exists.

The next subject of inquiry is the objection made to the jurisdiction of the court, by reason of the subject-matter. It is urged that its jurisdiction is special and limited, and does not extend its aid in an auxiliary proceeding to a court not governed by the principles of the common law. That this proceeding is auxiliary, and not the exercise of original jurisdiction, and is dependent upon that now exercised by the district court under the act of 1851. That the suit must be depending in a common-law court, and between the same parties; and the case of Clarke v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 164, and that of Dunlap v. Stetson [Case No. 4,164], are cited to sustain these propositions. These cases were decided upon the question of jurisdiction as to the want of parties. Nothing was before the court as to jurisdiction as to the subject-matter. It had been decided by Judge Story (Clarke v. Mathewson [Id. 2,857]) that a bill of revivor, being a suit between the citizens of the same state, the court had no jurisdiction. On appeal to the supreme court, in Clarke v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 164, they reversed the decision of the court below; and all that was decided was that a bill of revivor was not an original bill, but a mere continuation of it, and if the plaintiff in the original suit was competent to sue in the circuit court, his administrator, though a citizen of the same state with defendant, might revive the suit, the two bills being considered one and the same case. The case cited, Dunlap v. Stetson [supra], related also to the jurisdiction as to parties, the point being whether the suit could be sustained, the defendant being a citizen of Massachusetts, and not resident in Maine, and the subpœna having been served upon him in Massachusetts; and the decision was, that injunction would be issued by the court to enjoin a judgment obtained in the same court, although the original plaintiff is a citizen of another state, and this upon the ground that the injunction bill was part of the original bill. The court cannot consider that these cases, which were decided on the question of jurisdiction under section 11 of the judiciary act, have any bearing on the jurisdiction as to subject-matter. They decide that an injunction bill is part of the original bill it seeks to enjoin, and that in the issue of it the court is not in the exercise of original jurisdiction; and they predicate the same decree of a bill of revivor. But what is the jurisdiction of this court as to the subject-matter, they do not establish. This must be done by reference to the constitution, acts of congress, and the judicial construction they have received. There is no doubt that the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States is limited to certain persons and subjects, but within those limits is the same in every state, and complete and full. The constitution provides (article 3, § 2) that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity specified therein, among which are enumerated "controversies to which the United States shall be a party." The judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 78) enacts, that the circuit courts shall have original cognizance with the courts of the several states, of all suits at common law and in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars, and the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners. By the act organizing this court (10 Stat. 631), it is declared, that the court organized thereby, "shall in all things have and exercise the same jurisdiction as is vested in the circuit courts of the United States, as organized under existing laws." The jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, is thus summed up by the supreme court in Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 563: "Chancery jurisdiction is conferred on the courts of the United States, with the limitation that suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, in any case where plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law." The supreme court has placed in several cases a judicial construction upon these words. In Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 210, they say, that the words "plain, adequate, and complete" were declaratory, making no alteration in the rules as to equitable remedies. In Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212, that to determine the signification of these words, resort must be had to the principles of the common law of England, and not to the laws of the state where the court sits; and that if the state law has given a legal remedy for an equitable right, the jurisdiction of the circuit court is not affected; and that to bar a suit in equity, the remedy at law must be as efficient to the ends of justice and its complete and prompt administration, as the remedy in equity. Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 210.

[2] [From Hoff. Op. p. 234.]

It is difficult to see how, under the constitution, the judiciary act, and the judicial constructions given, it can be successfully urged that the circuit courts within the limits prescribed as to persons and subjects, have not a complete and full equity jurisdiction. In this case the court has jurisdiction as to parties, because the United States are plaintiffs. They have jurisdiction of the subject-matter because it exceeds the amount in value prescribed by law, and because there is no "plain, adequate, and complete remedy" for the injury complained of. Whether in affording the relief, they exercise original or auxiliary jurisdiction, has nothing to do with the question, unless an inquiry should arise where a party whose citizenship does not entitle him to invoke the original jurisdiction of the federal courts attempts to do so. The jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States has been defined by the supreme court. In Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 563, the supreme court say: "The rules of the high court of chancery have been adopted by the courts of the United States, and there is no other limitation to the exercise of a chancery jurisdiction by these courts, except the value of the matter in controversy, the residence or character of the parties, or a claim which arises under a law of the United States. In exercising this jurisdiction, the courts of the Union are not limited by the chancery system adopted by any state, and they exercise their functions in a state where no court of chancery has been established. The usage of the high court of chancery in England, whenever the jurisdiction is exercised, governs the proceedings. This may be said to be the common law of the country, and since the organization of the government, has been observed. Under this system, where relief can be given, similar relief may be given by the courts of the Union." We cannot, therefore consider the objection to the jurisdiction of this court as to the subject-matter available. In granting the relief prayed for, it has all the powers of the English chancery.

We have seen that within the limits of their jurisdiction as to persons and subject-matter, the only restriction upon their equity powers is, that there be no plain or adequate remedy at law. Have the plaintiffs such complete remedy at law as should bar this suit? The rule is, that the party may come into equity, although he has a remedy at law: if such remedy be not plain, complete and adequate, a fortiori, if he has no remedy at law, he is entitled to the aid of a court of equity. The protection of the mine is the object contemplated by this bill; the preservation of its substance, until the title to it is ascertained by the tribunals to which the question is exclusively confided, is the prayer of the bill. That tribunal has no jurisdiction as to waste or destructive trespass. The title is the only question left to their decision. They have no power to save the property from destruction; and if this court possess none, complainants are without remedy. The administration of justice can neither be "complete nor prompt."

Stress has been placed upon the fact that previously to the institution of this bill, no action at common law has been instituted by complainants. It is urged that such step was necessarily preliminary to the filing of this bill, and the very form of the action is prescribed. Now in the ordinary course of things, where one claims title to real estate, his first step ordinarily is to enforce his claim in one of the ordinary courts of justice, in the form of an action of trespass to try title, or one of ejectment. The limited jurisdiction of a court of law may render it necessary that he should have the interposition of a court of equity to obtain a discovery in aid of his common-law suit; or he may have a defense equitable in character, of which he could not avail himself in a court of law; or the plaintiff may be attempting to avail himself of a legal title inequitably; and in many other instances it may be necessary to invoke the jurisdiction of equity. The fact that a party has not taken this usual step is matter of suspicion, and clearly shows, where no reasons exist for the omission, the want of that diligence the law requires from parties in the pursuit of their alleged rights. Hence, we find frequent allusions in the cases to the fact whether the party has instituted his action at law before he came into equity; and in a certain class of cases, the courts have refused to interfere when an action at law has not been brought. The rule is, however, by no means universal. That the institution of an action at common law is an indispensable pre-requisite in all cases to the institution of a bill for an injunction, cannot be admitted. No case has been cited, which has made the omission of a party to have previously instituted a suit at law, the sole ground for refusing an injunction, where fraud was alleged and irreparable mischief the injury sought to be remedied. But the reasons for the ordinary rule do not exist in this case; and the maxim "Cessante ratione cessat et ipsa lex," must apply.

There is a pending litigation between complainants and Andres Castillero, under whom defendants claim, and in whose name they are, in their own behalf and that of their associates in interest, now prosecuting the title to the premises in dispute. To protect the substance of that property pending that litigation, is the object of this bill. The objection is, that such litigation must be pending in a particular form, and in a court of common law. We do not consider this proposition correct, and the cases where the courts of chancery in England have interposed to protect property in litigation in the ecclesiastical courts, disaffirm that doctrine. To these we shall hereafter refer. For the present we will inquire whether, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the omission of the complainants to have instituted an action in a court of common law to try title, is sufficient to defeat the present application. It is true, the United States hold a legal title to the premises. Suppose that, counting upon that title, they had sued for the recovery of the possession, might not the defendants in that suit have pleaded to the action the act of congress passed 3d March, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land-claims in the state of California," and their proceedings under it pending in the district court? By that act the United States are bound to hold their title subservient to the adjudication of special tribunals, with rules of decision very different from those which obtain in the ordinary tribunals of the country. An attempt on the part of the United States, so long as that act is unrepealed, to avail of their legal title in a court of common law, would have been inequitable and unjust. They have made no such attempt. They do not propose to do so, by this bill, further than as they allege it is necessary, in order to preserve the property until the question of title is determined as provided for by law. The fact that they have made their title dependent upon the action of special tribunals, and thus have deprived themselves of the right to enforce it at common law, cannot bar them from enforcing their equitable right to prevent the destruction of the property, on the ground that they had not previously to their application brought an action at common law to enforce that title.

Another objection to the relief prayed for is, that an injunction cannot be granted to enjoin a trespass where the title is disputed. In a case of mere trespass, or a technical waste where the mischief is not imminent, where no equitable circumstances appear, and no fraud alleged, and where the title of plaintiff is disputed in the manner prescribed by law, the rule is correctly stated. Where the mischief sought to be protected against is irreparable and imminent; where the bill alleges fraud and antedating in the execution of the title-papers set up by the defendants, and their genuineness is affirmed only on information and belief,—the case does not exist, to the knowledge of this court, where the rule contended for is to be literally applied. No one of the cases cited by the solicitor for defendants reaches this case. The authorities are numerous. To comment upon them in detail would be an unconscionable consumption of time.

The strongest case cited from the English authorities is that of Pillsworth v. Hopton, 6 Ves. 51; and from the American, those of Storm v. Mann, 4 Johns. Ch. 21, and Perry v. Parker [Case No. 11,010]. In the former case, the lord chancellor said: "I do not recollect that the court ever granted an injunction under any such circumstances." The character of the waste is not mentioned; and his lordship concluded by saying: "I remember perfectly, being told from the bench very early in my life, that if the plaintiff filed a bill for an account, and an injunction to restrain waste, stating that the defendant claimed by a title adverse to his, he stated himself out of court." Now, this parol authority which his lordship applied to that case, decided in 1801, must have carried back his memory to about the middle of the eighteenth century. In 1837, nearly a century afterwards, Judge Story says: "Indeed, there are numerous cases which show the gradual meliorations or changes, often silent and almost unperceived, which have been introduced into the practice of the courts of equity, to obviate the inconveniences which experience has demonstrated, and to adapt the remedial justice of these courts to the new exigencies of society." The learned jurist adverts to an instance by way of illustration; and, in a subsequent part of his opinion, alludes to the qualification of the doctrine which existed, that affidavits could not be read in support of the title of the plaintiff, which is contradicted by the answer. "I cannot well see," said he, "why the court, to prevent irreparable mischief, may not look to affidavits in affirmance of the plaintiff's title, not so much with a view to establish that title, but to see whether it has such probable foundation in the present stage of the cause, as to entitle the plaintiff to be protected against irreparable mischief, if upon the hearing it should turn out to be well founded." Judge Story has alluded to the proposition laid down by the chancellor in the case of Pills-worth v. Hopton, and says: "The interference of courts of equity in restraint of waste may have been originally confined to cases founded in privity of title; and for the plaintiff to state a case in which the defendant pretended that the plaintiff was not entitled to the estate, or in which the defendant was asserted to claim under the adverse right, was said to be for the plaintiff to state himself out of court. But at present the courts have by insensible degrees enlarged the jurisdiction to reach cases of adverse claims and rights not founded on privity, as for instance, to cases of trespass with irreparable mischief." Story, Eq. Jur. § 918. In Pillsworth v. Hopton, it is also to be observed that the plaintiff had failed in an ejectment suit he had brought; and further, there was no equitable circumstance calling for the interposition of a court of equity. In the second case, that of Storm v. Mann, 4 Johns. Ch. 21, decided in 1819, cited to sustain the general proposition as to dispute of title, the defendant had been for a long time, and was at the time, in possession; the nature of the waste is not stated, and no special ground was taken for equitable relief, nor any explanation made for the delay. The principle asserted in this case is, that a court of equity will not interfere where rights are properly determinable in a court of law where an adequate remedy can be found. In this case, the court referred to the case of Pillsworth v. Hopton, above referred to, as an authority for saying, "If the plaintiff in his bill states an adverse claim in the defendant, he states himself out of court." We have seen the views of Judge Story on this point; and it is extraordinary that the principle ever should have been asserted in any case in such general terms, that a party setting forth an adverse claim in the bill states himself out of court.

There are few cases which can be imagined where one enters upon land and exercises acts of ownership, that he cannot be said in common parlance to dispute the title of the owner so soon as he is known to him. We shall see, by reference to authority, that no such principle now exists. The last American case cited, is that of Perry v. Parker [Case No. 11,010]. The bill in this case was to enjoin the cutting of the dam and gates of the complainant; and Mr. Justice Woodbury, after noticing the cases in which injunction has been refused on the ground of the right being disputed, says: "Some cases of necessity, where the danger is great and the injury irreparable, may in England be regarded as exceptions;" and he refers to several cases decided in the high court of chancery. It is to be observed that in this case there was no fraud alleged, no irreparable mischief suggested, nor other equitable circumstances. The judge, in the absence of them, refused the injunction. But he states, after alluding to the exceptions in England, his own convictions as to the law. "And I am inclined to hold," he said, "that a mere denial of title is never sufficient, as such denial may be made for delay and mischief, unless as before remarked it is accompanied by circumstances showing it to be in good faith." If a denial unaccompanied by other circumstances is never sufficient, it seems that a denial on mere "information and belief" as in this case, of the charges of fraud, forgery, and antedating made against the documentary title of defendants, would be insufficient. A careful examination of all the authorities cited by defendant only shows, in the opinion of the court, that in the case of common trespass, in the absence of equitable circumstances, an injunction will not issue if the title of plaintiff is disputed; that the pendency of a suit is not of itself a ground for the interference of a court of equity; that a party may by laches, or delay unaccounted for, or by an omission to bring an action at law, there being no reason for the omission, deprive himself of the right to the interposition of a court of equity. There is no one of those cases which assert that a party by simply disputing plaintiff's title can defeat his application, in a case resembling the present.

The true rule will be found by referring to the English and American authorities. That decisions directly in point, on either side, are to be found to every part of this case, is not to be expected. It is novel in some of its features. But a new case does not create necessarily a new principle. Chief Justice Marshall, in Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 841, stated: "The appellants admit that injunctions are often awarded for the protection of parties in the enjoyment of a franchise; but deny that one has ever been granted in such a case as this. But, although the precise case may never have occurred, if the same principle applies the same remedy ought to be afforded." Principles have been enunciated both in England and this country, the application of which will dissipate all difficulty arising from the novelty of this case. Lord Redesdale, than whom there is no higher authority, and of whom the court say, in Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige, 195, "His opinion upon a case of equity pleadings is always esteemed the highest authority," and in England where his treatise is received by the whole profession, "as an authoritative standard and guide," is clear and full upon this point. This author, in enumerating the general objects of the jurisdiction of a court of equity, includes the following: (1) Where the principles of law by which the ordinary courts are guided, give a right, but the powers of those courts are not sufficient to afford a complete remedy, or their modes of proceeding are inadequate to the purpose. (2) Where the principles of law by which the ordinary courts are guided, give no right, but, upon the principles of universal justice, the interference of the judicial power is necessary to prevent a wrong, and the positive law is silent. (3) To provide for the safety of property in dispute pending a litigation, and to preserve property in danger of being dissipated or destroyed by those to whose care it is by law entrusted, or by persons having immediate but partial interests. Mitf. Ch. Pl. 111. Again, he lays down the rule that, "pending a litigation, the property in dispute is often in danger of being lost or injured, and in such cases a court of equity will interfere to preserve it, if the powers of the court in which the litigation is depending are insufficient for the purpose." Thus, during a suit in an ecclesiastical court, for administration of the effects of a person dead, a court of equity will entertain a suit for the mere preservation of the property of the deceased till the litigation is determined, although the ecclesiastical court, by granting an administration pendente lite, will provide for the collection of the effects. Id. 158.

In Daniell's Chancery Practice, it is stated, that "an injunction will be granted in some cases where the parties have both legal titles and legal remedies, but irreparable mischief would be done unless they were entitled to more immediate relief than that which they could obtain at law; it has accordingly been granted, when the injunction amounted in fact to an injunction to stop a trespass; for if the court would not interfere against a trespasser, he might go on by repeated acts of damage which would be absolutely irremediable." The author refers to Flamang's Case [cited in 6 Ves. 147], in which Lord Thurlow refused to enjoin a mere trespass: but subsequently changed his opinion, on the ground that irreparable mischief would follow his refusal; holding, in effect, that if the defendant was using the substance of the thing, the liberty of bringing an action was not the only remedy to which in equity he was entitled; and the author concludes: "The same principle has been acted on and applied without scruple, in various other decisions; for unless there was a jurisdiction to prevent destruction or irreparable mischief, there would be a great want of justice in the country." 3 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1854.

The foregoing are the expositions of the general doctrine by two standard text-writers; and they presuppose that the property sought to be protected was in dispute. In Poor v. Carleton [supra], Mr. Story does not confine himself to the question of title as raised upon the pleadings, but is of opinion that affidavits as to title ought, on general principles, to be permitted to be read. Whence the necessity, in any case, of reading affidavits as to title of plaintiff, unless upon the ground that such title has been disputed? The authorities which exclude affidavits to title do not do so upon the ground that defendant has disputed the title of plaintiff, but because the court has no jurisdiction to establish title between the parties. In U. S. v. Gear, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 120, the defendant had been sued in two actions, at law and in equity, and they involved his right to a tract of land upon which there was a lead mine. The first was an action of trespass, and the second a bill in chancery to stay waste, on the equity side. The defendant by his pleas to the common-law suit, raised the question of title. The same question was raised in the equity cause. Both cases were carried up, on a division of opinion between the judges, to the supreme court. Among other questions raised in the equity cause, was the right of complainant to an injunction; which was granted. In Kinsler v. Clarke, 1 Rich. 617 [2 Hill, 617],[3] a bill was filed for an injunction to restrain from waste or cutting timber. The defendant insisted in his answer that he had a perfect title to the premises, and set it out. The chancellor, in his decree, discussed the question of right, and decided in plaintiff's favor, and ordered an injunction to issue. On an appeal (Chancellors Johnson, Harper, and De Saussure, justices), the court declined to decree on the question of title, but sustained that portion of the chancellor's opinion which went to the issue of an injunction. "The claim," said Chancellor De Saussure, "of both parties to the title was set forth in the pleadings; and the chancellor on the circuit, to put an end to litigation and the multiplicity of suits, made a decree on the question of right. But, as this court is unwilling to decide on the question of title, which is pending in a suit at law, it will make no decree on the appeal on that ground, but will leave the parties to the litigation of the title to the court of law, to which the court remits them." The court confined itself to the appeal from the decree of the chancellor granting an injunction. The appeal was made on the ground, that in a case of trespass no injunction ought to be granted. Neither the chancellor below nor the appellate tribunal considered, that the right of complainant to an injunction was defeated by defendant disputing the title, and setting up in his answer an adverse one. The court of appeals say (De Saussure delivering the opinion): "On a careful examination, I concur entirely with him, in directing an injunction to be issued in this case. He has placed the interposition of the court for the protection of the land in question from irreparable mischief, on the true grounds; and I entirely concur with him. Nor is this doctrine and practice new in England or in this country."

The court cannot believe, in view of the foregoing authorities, that no injunction can in any case be granted where the title is disputed, in a case of trespass of the character complained of in this case.

[3] [From Hoff. Op. 234.]

Thus far the attention of the court has been limited to the objections urged by defendant's solicitors to the jurisdiction of the court and the mode of procedure. The remaining question is one raised by one of the grounds of defense taken, viz. that the defendants are protected by the answer. This is a substantial defense. It is the ordinary question which arises on a motion for an injunction, or to dissolve an injunction (if previously granted), on bill and answer. A decision of it covers the whole merits of this motion. When an answer denies directly and positively from personal knowledge the material allegations of the bill, it "denies the equity of the bill," and the court is bound to consider it as evidence to which entire credit is to be given, until disproved by two witnesses, or one with stringent corroborative circumstances. Acting upon it as such, the court, in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, will dissolve the injunction if previously granted. If, on the contrary, such denials are not or cannot be made, they will consider that the allegations of the bill have not been disproved. The rule on this point, with its qualifications, will appear by reference to the authorities. The general rule is, that an injunction is to be dissolved when an answer comes in and denies all the equity of the bill. This is the rule in ordinary cases; but, to use the words of Lord Eldon in Clapham v. White, 8 Ves. 36, there are "excepted cases;" such are, mismanagement of partnership concerns, cases of waste or destructive trespasses, patent cases, and cases of irreparable mischief. But even in those cases to which the general rule applies, the answer, to have the effect of dissolving the injunction or preventing its issue, must be specific and positive.[4] [2 Story, Eq. Pl. § 832 et seq.]

In Poor v. Carleton [supra], Judge Story says: "But supposing the doctrine (which he by no means admits) were as comprehensive as to the dissolving an injunction on the coming in of the answer as the counsel has contended for, the question occurs whether it is applicable to all kinds of answers which deny the whole merits of the bill, or whether it is applicable to such answers only as contain statements and denials by defendants connusant of the facts, and denying the allegations upon their own personal knowledge. It seems to me very clear, upon principle, that it applies to the latter only. The ground of the practice of dissolving an injunction upon a full denial, by the answer, of the material facts is, that in such a case the court gives entire credit to the answer, upon the common rule in equity that it is to prevail, if responsive to the bill, until it is overcome by the testimony of two witnesses, or of one and other stringent corroborative circumstances. But it would certainly be an evasion of the principle of the rule, if we were to say that a mere naked denial, by a party who had no personal knowledge of any of the material facts, were to receive the same credit as if the denial were by a party possessing actual knowledge of them. In the latter case the conscience of the defendant is not at all sifted, and his denial must be founded upon his ignorance of the facts, and merely to put them in a train for contestation and due proof to be made by the other side." The learned judge proceeds: "What sort of evidence can that be, which consists in the mere negation of knowledge by the party appealed to? Such negation affords no presumption against the plaintiff's claims; but merely establishes that the defendant has no personal knowledge to aid it, or disprove it. It is upon this ground that it has been held, and in my judgment very properly held, that if the answer does not positively deny the material facts, or the denial is merely from information and belief, it furnishes no ground for an application to dissolve a special injunction." Poor v. Carleton [supra]. Judge Story has thus compendiously embodied the doctrine and the reason for its existence. His remarks were made on a motion for the dissolution of an injunction after answer. They apply to the present motion for an injunction after answer; for surely, if an answer does not so deny the material allegations of the bill as will authorize the dissolution of an injunction, such answer will not prevent the issue of one in a proper case.

In Clarke's Ex'rs v. Van Riemsdyk, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 160, the court say: "If a defendant asserts a fact (in his answer) which is not and cannot be within his own knowledge, the nature of his testimony cannot be changed by the positiveness of his assertion. The strength of his belief may have betrayed him into a mode of expression of which he was not fully apprised. When he intended to utter only a strong conviction of the existence of a particular fact, or what he deemed an infallible deduction from the facts which were known to him, he may assert that belief or that deduction in terms which convey the idea of his knowing the fact itself. Thus, when the executors say, that John Innes Clark never gave Benjamin Munro authority to take up money or to draw bills; when they assert that Riemsdyk, who was in Batavia, did not take this bill on the credit of the owners of the Patterson, but on the sole credit of Benjamin Munro, they assert facts which cannot be within their own knowledge. In the first instance, they speak from belief; in the last, they swear to a deduction which they make from the admitted fact that Munro could show no written authority. "These traits in the character of the testimony must be perceived by the court, and must be allowed their due weight, whether the evidence be given in the form of an answer or deposition. The respondents could found their assertions only on belief: they ought so to have expressed themselves; and their having, perhaps incautiously, used terms indicating a knowledge of what, in the nature of things, they could not know, cannot give to their answer more effect than it would have been entitled to had they been more circumspect in their language." A practical illustration of this doctrine, as applicable to an affidavit on a motion for injunction, is to be found in the case of Davis v. Leo, 6 Ves. 785, in which Lord Eldon says: "There is no positive affidavit in this case that the will was made, under which the plaintiff is next tenant for life, to the defendant Leo. This is a mere hypothetical title, upon the plaintiff's information and belief that a settlement was executed." It is to be borne in mind, that the grounds of defendant's information and belief were set forth and his belief sworn to. His lordship, however, proceeded and said: "There is no instance of an injunction in such a case. An affidavit to information and belief is nothing in this sort of case."

[4] [From Hoff. Op. 234.]

In Everly v. Rice, 3 Green, Ch. [4 N. J. Eq.] 553, the chancellor says, referring to the answer in that case: "In common charity it is to be presumed, that this general denial relates to a written agreement or deed which is not alleged in the bill, or else that it is predicated of the defendant's information and belief, which is not sufficient. The defendant must answer upon his own knowledge, and not upon information and belief, otherwise the injunction must be retained till the final hearing." Nor is this well-settled principle affected by the inability of a defendant to make a fuller denial; for the reasons given for the existence of it are unaffected by the inability of a defendant to make a fuller denial; and for the simple reason, that the existence of the fact alleged by complainant is unaffected by the ignorance of the defendant of its existence or the sincerity of his belief in its non-existence.

In Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202, the bill prayed for an injunction staying all proceedings on a judgment in ejectment which had been obtained against the complainant. Chancellor Kent stated: "The only point is, whether the two deeds from Griffith to Sarah Johnson, under whom the defendants set up title, were fraudulent and void. The question of fraud was not tried; and from the history of the ejectment suit, as stated in the pleadings, it would seem that it could not be tried, as the recovery was placed entirely on the ground that the defendant at law was tenant to the new defendants, and so concluded from setting up this defense. But the fraud as charged, is a proper and familiar head of equity jurisdiction, and unless the answer be full and satisfactory, the injunction, if right in the first instance, ought to be retained until the hearing. All the denial contained in the answer is, that the defendants were not privy to any fraud, and were bona-fide purchasers, under a judgment and execution against Sarah Johnson. If she had no title, they had none, and they aver that they believe her title was good, because they do not know or believe that the conveyances from Griffith to her were fraudulent. This is leaving the question of fraud as unsettled as before the answer came in. It is true, the defendants may have given all the denial in their power; but the fraud may exist notwithstanding, and consistently with their ignorance of the sincerity of their belief. In some particular cases, the court will continue an injunction though the defendant has fully answered the equity set up."

In the case of Everly v. Rice, the following is cited from the language of Chancellor Williamson, in the case of Kinnaman v. Henry: "I do not consider," said he, "the fraud in this case as sufficiently denied to entitle the defendants to a dissolution of the injunction upon the ground of the whole equity of the bill being denied. The defendants are not charged with being parties or privy to the fraud;" nor were they so. In relation to them the chancellor says: "All they could do, or which they have done, is to deny all knowledge or belief of the alleged fraud. The answer may be perfectly true, and yet Johnson, the mortgagor, guilty of the fraud imputed to him, and the complainant entitled to relief against these defendants. Such an answer is not sufficient denial of the complainant's equity to entitle the defendants to a dissolution of the injunction."

We will now submit to the principles enunciated in the foregoing authorities, the denials of the answer in this case. One allegation in the bill, and one of the most material, is direct and positive. It enumerates sundry documents constituting a part of the documentary title of defendants, and expressly charges, that all and singular said documents in relation to said Castillero's claim to said tract of land and cinnabar mine are false, fraudulent, ante-dated and forged, and they have all and singular been fraudulently contrived and fabricated since the right of property and possession to the said land and mine accrued to complainants, with intent to cheat and defraud the United States out of the property and possession of said land and mine. The denial of the defendants as to the forgery of the documents is to be found in section fourteenth of the answer. They say, that they have no personal knowledge of anything said or done by the said Castillero in or about his said representations to the Alcalde Pico, as shown in his letters, copies of which are exhibited in Exhibits A and B; neither have they any personal knowledge of what was said or done by the said alcalde, when he gave the said Castillero possession of the mine and lands around it, which was evidenced by the written instrument, a copy of which is exhibited, marked "Exhibit E;" nor have they any personal knowledge of what was said or done by Castillero, or the Mexican authorities, in and about the business which resulted in the proposals, contracts, grants, and official correspondence and reports which appear and are shown in the exhibits annexed to this answer, being Exhibits G, H, J, K, L, M, N; but they have been informed and believe that the said documents are perfectly genuine and fair, and express truly the matters and things to which they relate, and were made at the times of their respective dates.

Having stated their want of personal knowledge of the facts covered by said documents, in the fifteenth section of the answer, the defendants aver that, to the best of their knowledge, information, and belief, Castillero did present to said Alcalde Pico the two original letters, copies of which are hereto annexed, marked "Exhibits A and B," and that said letters were written on their respective dates; and said Pico did put the said Castillero in possession of the mine and of three thousand varas of land in all directions measured from the mouth of the said mine, in the month of December, 1845, and that all the matters of fact recited and described in the said instrument signed by Pico, alcalde, and by Antonio Suñol and José Noriega, attesting witnesses, a copy of which is shown in Exhibit E, are truly recited therein; and in the same section, the defendants Halleck and Barron say, and the defendants Parrott, Bolton, and Young, believe it to be true, that they (the said Halleck and Barron), have conversed with the said Pico, the alcalde, with the said Antonio Suñol, and with José Fernandez, who, in the month of December, 1845, was a clerk in the office of Pico, alcalde, who was present on the ground at the old mouth of the mine when the said possession was given, and also with other persons who lived in and about the pueblo of San José in 1845 and 1846, and who knew of the possession of said mine by Castillero as a matter of general notoriety; and from all the knowledge and information obtained from these and other various and authentic sources, which information was positive and precise, the defendants are convinced and believe that the possession of the mine, and of three thousand varas of land measured in all directions from the then mouth of the mine, was given by the said Alcalde Pico to the said Castillero, in the month of December, A. D. 1845, as set forth in Exhibit E. And this section concludes with the averment that to "the best of their knowledge, information, and belief," all the acts and things which are described and mentioned in the original documents, of which the Exhibits G, H, I, K, L, M, N, and O, are copies, did really take place, as they are therein set forth, and at the times therein specified, and that all the said documents are genuine, and were made at the times shown in their respective dates. In the sixteenth section of the answer, William E. Barron avers, and the defendants, Halleck, Young, Parrott, and Bolton, believe it to be true, that in the month of May, in the present year, he (the said William E. Barron), was informed by Segura, that he, Segura, was in 1846 president of the "Junta de Fomento," that his signature to the various "Exhibits," when shown to him, were genuine, and also declared that all the titles were signed by the persons who purport to sign them, and received by him; and a detailed statement by him is made of the facts connected with the acts of the said Segura in connection with the title of Castillero. In the seventeenth section of the answer a similar course is pursued, the difference being in the character of the facts communicated to Mr. Barron, and his informant on this occasion being Manuel Conto, secretary of "El Fondo de Mineria." In the eighteenth section of the answer a similar statement is made; the only difference being in the character of the facts narrated; being detailed by a different person, Jose Maria Duran, who stated he was chief clerk of the ministry of justice, under Becerra. In the nineteenth section of the answer, similar statements of facts are made upon the information of Castillo Lanzas, who was a Mexican official in 1846. In the twentieth section, the information was received by Mr. Barron from one Blas Balcarcel, who in 1846 was prefect of the National College of Mining in Mexico. In the twenty-first section of the answer, it is averred that Barron while he was in Mexico inquired in the various offices of the government, and found many persons who remembered when Castillero was in Mexico in 1846, and that it was reported and believed that he discovered a quicksilver mine in California, and that he was then engaged in making some contract with government in relation to the same; and from all the said Barron could learn, he is perfectly convinced that all the matters and things spoken of in the documents copies of which appear in the said Exhibits G, H, I, K, L, M, and N, are truly related in said documents, and that all the said documents are genuine and were made at the time they purport by their dates to have been made. In the twentieth section of the answer, all the defendants unite in the averment that they believe in the entire truth of all the information received as aforesaid by the said Barron, and from all said information, and from other sources of information, that all the matters and things spoken of in the documents copies of which appear in the said Exhibits G, H, I, K, L, M, and N, are truly related in said documents, and that all the said documents are genuine, and were made as they purport to have been made by their dates. The last section which alludes to that part of the bill which charges forgery and ante-dating, is the twenty-third; which denies generally the charges, and particularly denies that any of the documents copies of which are shown in the Exhibits A, B, E, G, H, I, K, L, M, N, and O, are false, or fraudulent, or ante-dated, or forged, &c.

Most of that portion of the answer which responds to the allegations of forgery and ante-dating of the muniments of defendant's title, is given literally, and all substantially set out. It is matter elaborate and argumentative; but does not constitute positive and distinct denials, which the law requires in an answer in response to the material allegations in a bill, in order to influence the action of the court on a motion for an injunction in a case of irreparable mischief, or destructive trespass. The insertion in an answer of such denials merely, in the language of Judge Story, puts them in a train for contestation and proof by the other side. Poor v. Carleton.

The averment of the genuineness of the documents alleged by the bill to be forged and ante-dated, is founded entirely on "information and belief," and on deductions from facts of which defendants were informed. In the fourteenth section of the answer they say, they have no personal knowledge of anything said or done by Castillero in his representations to the Alcalde Pico, as shown in his letters; that they have no personal knowledge of what was said or done by the alcalde when he gave the possession of said mine to Castillero, evidenced by Exhibit E; nor any personal knowledge of what was said or done by Castillero or the Mexican authorities about the business which resulted in the documents, grants, &c., which are shown in the Exhibits G, H, I, K, L, M, N; but, they say, they have been informed and believe that said documents are perfectly genuine and express truly the matters and things to which they relate. The allegation in the bill is positive, and charges that these very documents, or rather their supposed originals, were fraudulent, forged, and ante-dated. The denial is, that the defendants have no personal knowledge of the facts exhibited in the documents, but they have been informed and they believe the documents to be perfectly genuine, express truly the matters and things which they relate, and that they were made at the times of their respective dates. Can such denial be deemed clear, direct, and positive? They do not pretend to have seen the originals; they disavow all personal knowledge of the facts to which they relate. Their belief as to the genuineness of the documents, is founded on the information they received that they were genuine; and upon the authenticity of that information they found their belief of the genuineness of the facts of which they relate, of which themselves are in no other way connusant. Every word they have uttered may be strictly true. Their belief may be sincere, they undoubtedly may have received such information, and yet the documents may have been fabricated as alleged, without imputation of false swearing. Hence the well-settled rule that the denial in an answer must be direct and founded on personal knowledge before the court can act upon them in a case of irreparable mischief, and the issue of an injunction to enjoin the same.

It is due to the defendants in this case to say, they have frankly disclosed the sources of their belief and sworn only to it. They have not placed themselves in the position of parties described by Chief Justice Marshall in Clarke's Ex'rs v. Van Reimsdyk, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 160. The strength of their belief has not betrayed them into a mode of expression of which they were not apprised. That when they intended to utter only a strong conviction of the existence of a particular fact, or what they deemed an infallible deduction from the facts known to them, they may assert that fact or that deduction in terms which convey the idea of their knowing the fact itself. In this case, the defendants tell us, they have no personal knowledge of the transactions; that they were informed the documents were genuine, and acting on that information, they swear to their belief of the existence of the facts to which they relate.

It may be urged, they could not truly make a fuller answer in the nature of things. This is true; and if the question was, whether such denials be sufficient to raise the issues for trial on the final hearing, and impose upon the complainants the duty of meeting them by proof, there could be no doubt that the pleading would be sufficient for that purpose. That defendants are unable to answer more fully, is not their fault; but the rights of complainants cannot be prejudiced, for it certainly is not their fault. The defendants are in the precise position of all other parties who are called on in a case like the present, to answer an alleged simulation of the title by those under whom they claim. Chancellor Kent only affirms the well-settled doctrine, when he says: "It is true, the defendants may have given all the denial in their power; but the fraud may exist notwithstanding, and consistently with their ignorance, or the sincerity of their belief." Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202.

In ascertaining the sufficiency of the denials in the answer, it is necessary to refer to some other allegations in the bill. The twenty-eighth article of the bill charges that all the pretended proceedings before the said Alcalde Pico, in respect to the judicial possession of the mine, and all the pretended proceedings of the government of Mexico, were falsely and fraudulently made, contrived, procured, ante-dated and forged, in pursuance of the aforesaid fraudulent conspiracy against the United States, and with intent to defraud the United States out of said mine and minerals, or some part thereof, under false, forged, and ante-dated Mexican titles. The bill further charges that in pursuance of said conspiracy, letters were written and communications and memoran-dums made between the said Alexander Forbes and his confederates, and the said J. Alexander Forbes, as their agent (copies of which are herewith filed as exhibits, marked "B, C, D" and "E," and made part of the bill), in and about the fabrication and procuring the aforesaid false, ante-dated and forged Mexican titles, &c. To these charges, they reply in the thirty-second section of the answer, and the defendants admit the correspondence embraced in said exhibits, to have been written by the parties to them, at the times they bear dates respectively, and at the places from which they purport to be written, except the letter dated 25th March, 1848, which they aver to have been forged. They do not deny that J. Alexander Forbes was acting in behalf of, or as agent of the parties, but they deny "that said letters and communications were written by the said parties with an intent to commit a fraud in furtherance of a conspiracy to fabricate a title, as charged in said bill, except so far as appears from said letters on the part of the said James Alexander Forbes." They neither deny nor admit such intention on his part; but refer to the correspondence for the ascertainment of the fact, whether or not a person under whom some of the defendants claim title, was guilty of the charges of conspiracy and intention to cheat, as alleged in the bill. Such denials of material allegations of the bill in the answer, though sufficient for the purpose of pleading, to place the issues raised in a train for contestation, are not sufficient to enable the court to act upon the documents as proved, and to refuse the injunction on that ground.

We have discussed this motion on the allegations of the bill and the denials of the answer, as all affidavits as to title have, in my opinion, been excluded by the well-settled rules of courts of equity, a rule affirmed by this court in the case of Tobin v. Walkinshaw [supra]. Judge Story has, as we have seen, expressed strong doubts of the propriety of the rule, and as an extended discussion has been made by the respective counsel in relation to title, it is deemed proper to look to the facts elicited by the affidavits, and to inquire into the allegations of forgery and ante-dating made against the documentary title set up by defendants, with a view not to decide upon or establish title, a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of another tribunal, but to ascertain whether the facts and the testimony bearing upon the allegations of fraud, forgery, and ante-dating, be such as to satisfy the court that there is reasonable foundation for the plaintiff's title, which would entitle them to protection from irreparable mischief, in the event that such title should turn out to be well founded. My associate will give his views upon that point.

The remaining inquiry is, does the present case come within the range of cases in which courts of equity have exercised the powers now invoked? A response to this question will be found by reference to a few decided cases, in addition to authorities incidentally alluded to while commenting upon the objections urged by the solicitors for defendants. It is proper to observe, that the court on this motion is not to try title. The determination of that question belongs exclusively to another tribunal. All that we have to do in relation to title is to look to the allegations of the bill and the denials in the answer, and ascertain from them whether the plaintiff's title, in the language of Mr. Justice Story, "has such a probable foundation in the present stage of the cause, as to entitle the plaintiff to be protected against irreparable mischief, if upon the hearing it should turn out to be well founded." Poor v. Carleton. To this, the court will limit its remarks.

In Lloyd v. Passingham, 16 Ves. 59, a receiver and injunction were refused where defendant was in possession, but where the legal estate was charged to have been obtained through forged documents. The action of the court did not turn upon a want of power in the court, but upon the special circumstances of the case. The grounds on which the court decided will instruct us as to the principles on which a court of equity acts in cases analogous to the present. In that case, the defendants had recovered, by ejectment, certain estates. This occurred some fourteen years prior to the suit in equity. The latter was a bill filed to impeach the verdict in ejectment, principally as obtained upon forged entries of burial and death, contrived by Robert Passingham. The bill prayed for an injunction to enjoin the cutting of timber and other waste, and for a receiver. The case was argued on affidavits. Lord Eldon refused the application on three grounds: (1) Because the trial in ejectment had been had upon other testimony than the entries which were alleged to have been forged; (2) because doubts were thrown upon the affidavits charging the forgery, on account of contradictions as to time and circumstances, which made the act of forgery, if done, a remarkable one; and (3) because no danger as to the rents was suggested. His lordship looked to the additional circumstance, that the defendants would be made illegitimate, provided the testimony should bear out the affidavits.

It was under foregoing circumstances, where the defendants held the legal title and a judgment in ejectment obtained by them fourteen years previously, when the judgment had been obtained on other testimony beside the alleged forged documents, where the evidence as to the forgery was contradicted and where there was no irreparable mischief, for none such was suggested, that Lord Eldon refused the motion and concluded with these words: "Whatever may be the ultimate event of this suit to which my act this day, refusing this application, will be no prejudice, I do not consider that these circumstances form that extreme case in which the possession is to be taken from those who have the legal title." 16 Ves. 72. Nothing is said of want of power in the court; a perfect legal title was in defendants, held under a judgment for fourteen years, accompanied by possession. The judgment was obtained on other testimony beside the documents alleged to be forged, the testimony as to forgery contradictory; and, above all, irreparable injury not even suggested; and yet his lordship in deciding against the motion bases his decision to a considerable extent on the last ground,—"that refusing the application will be of no prejudice." In his opinion the chancellor expressly says: "I give no opinion upon the application from injunction to stay waste." This language was used by him in view of the fact, that he did not view the case as one of irreparable mischief. This case not only establishes the power of the court, but no notice was taken of the fact that there was no suit at law pending at the time.

In the case of Lining v. Geddes, 1 McCord, Eq. 304, no suit at law was pending, and the court in its opinion was discussing the power of a court of equity to interfere by injunction in a case of trespass. They overruled the decision of the court below ordering an injunction to issue to restrain the defendant from obstructing a right of private way; and they at the same time place the doctrine on its true ground, that of irreparable injury. They consider a temporary obstruction of a private road, and similar trespasses, as not cognizable in equity. The decision in this case enunciates the true rule. It is the irreparable mischief which is to govern. A party may complain of what may be deemed technically a nuisance or waste; but the true question remains, is the act complained of one of irreparable mischief? The court in the above case say, that the nuisance complained of must be productive of irreparable injury. 1 McCord, Eq. 309. In reference to trespasses which are not attended by such mischief and an adequate remedy can be obtained at law, they say, such cases do not require the aid of a court of equity, and certainly not until the right has been determined at law. Id. Upon the nature and character of the injury complained of, depends to a considerable extent the jurisdiction of this court. Is it irreparable? Irreparable injury is such as cannot be estimated with accuracy in money, or where it is so great that the party committing it, cannot make a compensation, or where from its nature the injured party cannot be made whole. Such for instance, as the destruction of the substance of the thing. The property sought to be protected is mineral land, and a mine of great value. The acts which defendants are committing and intend to commit, are such as the law adjudges to be waste. This point is settled by the case of U. S. v. Gear, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 120. and also by the supreme court of this state.

In the case of Merced Min. Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 321, it is said: "The ground upon which the injunction was granted in these cases of timber, coals, ores, and quarries was, that the trespasser, in the language of Lord Eldon, was 'taking away the very substance of the estate.'" "It must be conceded that the principles of these cases apply to gold mines as well as to others. In fact, there are circumstances connected with gold mines (and the remarks apply equally to quicksilver mines) that render the remedy by injunction more appropriate than to other mines. The only value of a gold-mining claim, in most cases, consists in the mineral. If a party removes the gold, he removes all that is of any value in the estate itself. It is emphatically taking away the entire substance of the estate." After affirming the rule, that facts to show that the injury is irreparable must be stated in the complaint, the court proceeds: "But in the cases of mines, timber, and quarries, the statement of the injury is sufficient. In the nature of the case, all the party could well state as matter of fact, is the destruction of the timber in the one case, and the taking away the minerals in the other. Taking away the minerals is itself the injury that is irreparable; because, it is the taking away the substance of the estate. The allegation of insolvency is not necessary to procure the injunction in these cases. The right to the remedy is based upon the nature of the injury, and not upon the incapacity of the party to respond in damages." In the opinion of this court, mere insolvency, if the amount is inconsiderable, would not give jurisdiction to a court; but where the amount is great, and the inability to respond is greatly disproportioned to that amount, such insolvency would be an element which would certainly influence the action of a court; and where it exists is a proper subject for an allegation in the bill.

Having disposed of the question relative to the power of the court, and the irreparable character of the injury complained of, we come to the consideration of another point: Have the complainants such a right in the premises as entitles them to an injunction to protect them until the litigation pending as to their title shall be determined? That the United States, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, acquired the legal and paramount title, seems not to be denied. That no legal title can vest in defendants until the confirmation of their claim, under the act of March 3, 1851, is clear [Stoddard v. Chambers] 2 How. [43 U. S.] 316. But it is contended that the congress of the United States have dedicated the minerals in the lands of California to the public. The grounds on which this proposition is placed by defendants' solicitors are: (1) The United States by their general policy, and the direct concurrence of the executive branch of the government, have encouraged the working of mines and the employment of mining capital in California. (2) The state has done the same by express legislation; and all the departments of the state government have concurred in establishing mining operations in the state on public land as the paramount interest of the state, to which all other industrial branches are subservient.

We shall not pause to inquire into the legislation of this state in relation to minerals on the public lands of the United States. One thing is certain, that neither her policy nor legislation, however much they may influence the action of the legislature of the Union, can deprive the United States of any legal right, or influence the action of this court in this case. That has been guarded against in the act of congress passed September 9, 1850 (9 Stat. 452), entitled "An act for the admission of the state of California into the Union." In that act it is expressly provided, "that the people of said state, through their legislature or otherwise, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within its limits; and shall pass no law, and do no act, whereby the title of the United States to and right to dispose of the same, shall be impaired or questioned."

As to the ground that the congress of the United States have dedicated the minerals to the public, and hence there is no equity in this bill, it is difficult to perceive, if such dedication had been made, how it could affect in any way the equity of the present claim. Suppose it to be the fact, how can it affect the rights of defendants' private claim? If such dedication does authorize the occupancy of the public lands, and permit persons who occupy them to dig the minerals in conformity with state laws, can the acquiescence of the general government in their so doing, aid legally or equitably the title of defendants, who do not claim under that permission, but claim to have an adverse and exclusive right to the property as against the United States and all the world?

The claim of these defendants of the exclusive ownership of the mine, is inconsistent with the title they attempt to set up, under the dedication by congress of the minerals to the public. They cannot in the same breath set up a superior adverse title, and also a right to work the mine by reason of a dedication of the minerals to the public. Congress has never parted with the right (reserved as we have seen by the act admitting this state into the Union) of disposing of the public mineral lands. They have merely exempted them from the general land laws, and have omitted to legislate in regard to them except to exempt them from pre-emption rights, by the act of March 3, 1853. They can at any moment dispose of them. The defendants did not enter upon the premises by virtue of any tacit or implied permission and license, but adversely as owners, and claim the lands as theirs, whatever disposition the United States may make with regard to the public mineral lands. If relying upon such permission to all persons to enter upon, and work mineral lands, defendants had entered, it might be a sufficient answer to a bill for an account of profits during the time such permission continued. But defendants did not enter, nor do they claim under such license, but adversely as owners. The United States having the title to the mine, the court cannot say that they have lost their rights, because, with regard to other minerals they have not asserted them.

Congress, to whom alone under the constitution of the United States, regulations for the disposal of public property is confided, have, so far as their action goes, manifested their determination to relinquish no right to any public land in California. Having protected in the act admitting the state into the Union, their title to the public lands so far as the state was concerned, they proceeded to guard that title from individual claimants. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo addressed itself to the political department; and up to the passing of the act of March 3, 1851, that department alone had power to perfect titles and administer equities to claimants. [Glenn v. U. S.] 13 How. [54 U. S.] 260. Congress in the fulfillment of its treaty obligations, passed that act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land-claims in the state of California." It is an established principle of jurisprudence in all civilized nations, that the sovereign cannot be sued in its own courts, or in any other without its consent and permission; but it may, if it thinks proper, waive this privilege, and permit itself to be made a defendant in a suit by individuals, or by another state. And as this permission is altogether voluntary, it follows that it may prescribe the terms and conditions on which it consents to be sued, and the manner in which the suit shall be conducted, and may withdraw its consent whenever it may suppose that justice to the public requires it. Beers v. Arkansas, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 527. Under this power, the political department transferred, by the act of March 3, 1851, the power of perfecting titles and administering equities to individual claimants. Aware that many claims would be made under Mexican titles, some legal, others equitable and inchoate, and others fraudulent, and with a view to segregate all lands of individual claimants from the public domain, congress passed the act in question. Desirous to fulfill in a liberal spirit the treaty obligations of the government, they imparted to the tribunals to which the jurisdiction was committed, rules of decision different from those which obtained in the ordinary judicial tribunals of the country. This extended range of principles was made their rule of action, to effect what congress purposed they should; that is, to enable them to confirm a large number of claims which were inchoate and, being no evidence of legal title, presented inchoate and equitable rights, commending themselves to courts regulated as those tribunals were by the "principles of equity which could not be enforced by the ordinary judicial tribunals."

We consider it evident that the United States have a title and interest in the premises in dispute, and have a clear right in a proper case to invoke the interposition of a court of equity to protect the property until the title to it is ascertained in the manner prescribed by law—whether it be public land or not. One of the terms on which the United States consented to be sued, is prescribed in the 13th section of the act; which enacts that all lands the claims to which have been finally rejected by the commissioners, or which shall be decided to be invalid by the district or supreme court, shall be deemed, held, and considered as part of the public domain of the United States. Dunl. Laws U. S. 1296.

The fact is admitted by the pleadings in this case, that a petition is pending in behalf of defendants, in the name of one Andres Castillero, in the district court, on appeal from the commissioners, having for its object a confirmation of the title to these premises. The result of a decision in one way will be to segregate the premises from the public domain; and they will not be segregated until such decision is made. A contrary decision will leave the property in the hands of complainants. Can it be successfully asserted that the United States have no such interest in the mine as will authorize a court of equity to protect the property while that issue is pending? We consider the legal title to this property to be in the United States, until it is decided to be private property. But suppose it be assumed that the interest held by the United States is to be confined to what they hold under the act of March 3, 1851. If such assumption be made, it may be contended that, so limited, it is a mere contingent interest, and not to be protected by the court,—that it is not a vested interest. The answer to such suggestion is, that the right or interest of defendants is equally contingent; and again, that the right of complainants, if it be admitted to be contingent, will not deprive it of protection from a court of equity in a proper case.

The court will grant an injunction when the aggrieved party has only equitable rights. Thus in cases of mortgages, if the mortgagee or mortgagor in possession commits waste, or threatens to commit it, an injunction will be granted. So where there is a contingent estate on an executory devise dependent over upon a legal estate, courts of equity will not permit waste to be done to the injury of the estate. In case of a mortgagee filing a bill to stay waste by the mortgagor in possession, the court will interpose, although the right of the mortgagee in the land or its proceeds is contingent upon his recovery of the debt, to secure payment of which the mortgage was given. In Camp v. Bates, 11 Conn. 51, a bill was filed to enjoin waste upon property on which complainant held a lien as an attaching creditor, under a law of the state. It was admitted that by the attachment the party acquired no legal title to the property, and that he might never obtain one. The court say: It has been urged that the "plaintiff had neither an equitable nor a legal title. That he had no interest in the estate, none which a court of equity would consider a vested interest;" and the court proceeds to inquire into the right of the party, and coming to the conclusion that the attachment, when completed, would bind the estate under the provisions of the law, say: "We are not, then, to speculate as to the result whether the creditor will recover at all, or recover the full sum he demands. The estate attached is to be held subject to meet that recovery, be it more or less. The question then arises, does the law give this privilege and then leave the debtor to take it away or destroy it? Does the law give a privilege and allow the party against whom it is given to render it useless? Is a court so utterly impotent, or is it so fettered by its own rules, that this may be done and the court have no power to prevent it? Did not the plaintiff, by his levy, acquire the sanction of the law that the property should stand pledged to await his judgment? Had he not, then, a right acquired by this lien, a right which a court of justice is bound to respect and defend? It is not indeed a legal interest, which would pass by a release deed; but it is a right not less sacred, and no less regarded by a court of law." The fact, then, that the interest of the complainants under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, is made contingent, does not defeat their right to the protection of the court. We have referred to this last case, to show that the submission by the United States of their title to a contingency does not affect injuriously the present application.

The bill in this case prays for an injunction to stay future waste, and also that the action of the court may extend to the preservation of the ore and materials now upon said mine and land, and all the quicksilver extracted from the ore of said mine in the possession of said defendants. It is urged that injunction is not granted in restraint of the removal of that which has been disconnected from the realty and assumed the shape of chattels. In the case of Watson v. Hunter, 5 Johns. Ch. 169, the principle affirmed is that in ordinary cases where no special circumstances intervene, injunction will not be issued to prevent the removal of timber already cut. Chancellor Kent concludes his opinion by saying: "I do not mean to be understood to say that the court will never interfere, but that it ought not to be done in ordinary cases like the present." In Winship v. Pitts, 3 Paige, 259, 261, it is said: "In ordinary cases, the account for waste already committed is merely incidental to the relief by injunction against future waste, and is directed to prevent a multiplicity of suits. The rule, however is general, that although the recovery of damages for waste is not a substantial ground for a bill in equity, yet if the court has jurisdiction of the subject upon any other ground, it will decree an account of the waste committed." 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 554. In Backler v. Farrow, 2 Hill (S. C.) 111, the court asserts the general rule to be, that damages for waste cannot be recovered, the remedy being at law; but they say: "But, having proper jurisdiction of the case, there is hardly any question in relation to property which this court may not determine incidentally, for the purpose of doing complete justice and preventing multiplicity of litigation." The rule as laid down in the case of Jesus College v. Bloom, 3 Atk. 262, Amb. 54, is that a bill will not lie for waste merely, but if the party be properly in court for another purpose, as to obtain an injunction, then an account of past waste will be granted. "There are many cases where this court have made decrees in the cases of mines which they could not have done in the cases of timber. There is no question that the court was in possession of this case, and incident to it were the accounts for rents and profits and the account for waste."

Where an injunction against waste is granted, if the complainant has a claim in law to satisfy for the value of the timber or other matters, the removal of which constitutes the waste, he is entitled to an account as of course, as incident to the injunction and to prevent multiplicity of suits. 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 554. Now, the removal of large amounts of minerals constitutes waste. The result of the doctrine furnished by the authorities is, that in an ordinary case an injunction will not be issued to operate upon past waste; but that in cases where the court has original jurisdiction of the case, and the party is properly in court for some other purpose, for instance, to obtain an injunction, or where there is the allegation of fraud, or where the removal constitutes a part of the waste, the court may extend its protection to past waste. That the cases which constitute exceptions to the rule which applies to ordinary cases are those where the profits of mines and the opening of mines is the waste complained of.

To this point is the case of Jesus College v. Bloom, Amb. 56, where the court, referring to an authority cited, say: "The more probable reason for decreeing an account in that case seems to be because it was the case of mines; and the court always distinguishes between digging of mines and cutting of timber, because the digging of mines is a sort of trade; and there are many cases where this court will relieve and decree an account of ore taken when in any other tort or wrong done it has refused relief." We consider this case not to be the ordinary one of cutting timber, but the working of a valuable mine, and that the injunction in this case should extend to ore extracted, and remaining on the premises as well as to future waste.

A careful examination of this case has brought the court to the following conclusions: That the complainants have exhibited a title to the premises in dispute, which entitles them to an injunction to stay waste upon it; that the character of the waste complained of is what the law deems irreparable mischief; that the allegations of the bill charging forgery, fraud, and ante-dating upon the documentary title under which defendants claim, have only been denied "on information and belief," which will not authorize the court to consider the allegations in the bill on this motion as disproved; and lastly, that the facts as shown by the exhibits annexed to the pleadings, and the affidavits filed, if they are to be considered, do not set forth circumstances showing good faith, which, according to Mr. Justice Woodbury, in Perry v. Parker [Case No. 11,010], must accompany "a general denial" of plaintiff's title, in order to make it sufficient. The court, therefore, are constrained by a "judicial necessity," to grant the injunction prayed for. The injunction will be temporary, subject to the further order of the court. It is not to be anticipated that either party will interpose any obstacle to the prompt determination of the issue as to the title to the premises now pending. But it is deemed proper to keep this injunction under the control of the court, so that it may be able to do what subsequent events may require.

The bill prays that a proper person or persons may be appointed receivers of the said tract of land, mine, and minerals, take possession of the same, with the appurtenances, receive the profits of same, and all the ore of said mine, and the quicksilver extracted therefrom, and to lease, work and manage the said mine, and receive the rents, issues and profits thereof, and the ore and quicksilver to said mine or elsewhere, in the defendant's possession, that has been extracted from said ore; to make sale and disposition thereof, to be accounted for under the order of this court. The court do not consider that the appointment of receivers with such extreme powers, is at this time necessary. The ground on which the court has felt it to be its duty to interpose by injunction in this case, is to preserve the premises from waste and destruction, while the title to it is undecided. It has also considered it its duty to enjoin against the removal of the ores which have been already extracted, and remain on the premises. Every object contemplated by the bill, and which the court desires to effect, would seem to be attained by enjoining the further working of the mine, and the reduction and carrying off the ores now on the premises. Unless those ores are liable to deterioration, from natural causes or by being plundered, there is no necessity to appoint a receiver. If, however, it be made to appear that the condition of those ores is from any cause insecure, or other circumstances which may call for further interposition, the court will take into consideration an application for the appointment of a receiver.

An injunction, in accordance with the prayer of the bill, and in conformity with the views herein expressed, will be submitted, by the solicitors for complainants, to the court.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In the opinion just read, this case has been considered on the allegations of the bill and answer alone, excluding all affidavits on either side relating to title. It has been seen, however, that in the opinion of Judge Story, the court to prevent irreparable mischief may look to "affidavits in affirmance of the plaintiff's title, not so much with a view to establish that title, but to see whether it has such a probable foundation in the present state, as to entitle the plaintiff to be protected against irreparable mischief, if upon the hearing of the cause it should turn out to be well founded." Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272]. Had no answer been filed, it is clear that the court, as in the case of Lloyd v. Passingham, 16 Ves. 59, and in that of Perry v. Parker [supra], relied on by the defendants, might have heard the motion on affidavits filed on both sides. Unwilling to rest the decision of the motion upon what may seem a technical and rigorous rule, and on allegations in the bill which are assumed to be true merely because not met by a positive denial in the answer, we have looked into the affidavits on either side with a view of ascertaining whether the complainants, assuming such an inquiry to be admissible, have made out such a prima facie or probable case, as will warrant the interference of the court in this preliminary stage of the cause. That the court will interfere to prevent the destruction of the estate or fund, even though the title is disputed, has already been abundantly shown. That it will so interfere against a party in possession, and even against such a party having the legal estate, is also clear. The inquiry arises, what must be the nature or force of the evidence which the court will exact before it exercises this authority? It is admitted in the case of Perry v. Parker that a mere denial of plaintiff's title, without any evidence to show the denial to be made probably in good faith, and to be sustained by something of fact and law, is not sufficient. In Daniell, Ch. Prac. p. 2027, it is said: "The court will appoint a receiver against a party having possession under a legal title, if it can be satisfied that such party is wrongfully entitled to such legal estate." Where the right to the possession is in dispute, the court will, if it sees clearly that the plaintiff has the right, and that the ultimate decree will be in his favor, appoint a receiver pending the suit. Id. p. 2026.

It might be inferred from these authorities that the court will in no case interfere against a party in possession, unless on evidence sufficient to satisfy it that he has no title. Such, however, we do not conceive to be law. The extracts from Daniell's Practice, above cited, refer to cases where the property is in possession of a party having the legal estate. In such cases much reluctance is undoubtedly felt by courts of equity to interfere by injunction. But even in such cases, the case of Lloyd v. Passingham impliedly sanctions the doctrine that where there is danger to the substance of the inheritance, and the damage apprehended is great and irreparable, the court will not confine its interposition to those cases alone, where it can declare itself satisfied that the defendant has no title. In the case of Perry v. Parker it does not appear that any irreparable injury was apprehended; and even in that case the court enters into an elaborate examination of the titles of plaintiff and defendant with an evident inclination to the opinion that the former is more than doubtful. Daniell, on the page succeeding that on which the last citation is found, states that though the court will not interfere on the mere ground of title, it will appoint a receiver at the instance of parties beneficially interested, even where there is no fraud or spoliation, provided it can be satisfactorily established that there is danger to the estate or fund, unless such a step is taken. In the case of Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272], Judge Story says: "The true rule seems to me to be that the question of dissolution of a special injunction, is one which after the answer (denying the whole merits of the bill) comes in, is addressed to the sound discretion of the court. In ordinary cases the dissolution ought to be ordered because the plaintiff has prima facie repelled the whole merits of the claim asserted in the bill. But extraordinary circumstances may exist, which will not only justify but demand the continuation of the special injunction. This, upon the principles of a court of equity, which will always act to prevent irreparable mischiefs and general inconvenience in the administration of justice, ought to be the practical doctrine; and I am not satisfied that the authorities properly considered establish a contrary doctrine." And this, says Judge Story, seems to have been the course which commended itself to the mind of that great equity judge, Chancellor Kent. Poor v. Carleton [supra].

We think that the opinion of Judge Story above cited, is sufficient authority for the position that in cases, like the present, of irreparable mischief, the court in examining the affidavits, assuming them to be admissible, will inquire whether the title of the plaintiff has such a probable foundation as to entitle him to be protected during the litigation by which it will finally be determined. And that in cases of threatened waste and destruction of the estate, where the apprehended injury is great and irreparable, as also in cases of the threatened destruction of heir-looms, works of art, &c., the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should interfere even in doubtful cases to preserve the parties in statu quo until the right can be determined. We will therefore examine to some extent the evidence which has been adduced on either side, and which has been so largely discussed at the bar, in order to see whether the complainant's title appears to have such a probable foundation, and the allegations of the bill are sustained by such proof, as to warrant the court in interposing to protect the estate until the determination of the right.

The title set up by the defendants consists of an alleged mining right or title, originally acquired by denouncement and registry under the mining laws of Mexico; and secondly, an alleged concession of two sitios de ganado mayer, made by the supreme government of Mexico. The evidence of the mining right or title is in the form of an expediente or record, consisting of two letters of Andres Castillero, addressed to Antonio Maria Pico, alcalde, and an act of possession purporting to be executed by that officer, in which he recites that he has given possession of the mine and of three thousand varas of land in every direction, to Castillero. The evidence of the two-league grant consists of a dispatch from Castillo Lanzas, minister of exterior relations of Mexico, addressed to the governor of California, but produced by the defendants. In this dispatch a communication to Lanzas from the minister of justice, is set forth. In that communication the minister of justice transcribes a communication addressed by himself to Segura, president of the junta for the encouragement of mining. In this last communication, the minister of justice informs Segura, that the president has been pleased to approve the agreement made with Castillero, to commence the exploration of the mine, and that the corresponding communication is made to the ministry of exterior relations, that it may issue the proper orders relative to what is contained in the 8th proposition with respect to the granting of lands in that department. The minister of relations, after reciting the above letter, adds: "And I have the honor to inclose it to your excellency (Lanzas) to the end that with respect to the petition of Senor Castillero, to which his excellency the president ad interim, has thought proper to accede, that as a colonist, there be granted to him two square leagues upon the land of his mining possession, your excellency (viz. Lanzas) will be pleased to issue the orders corresponding." Castillo Lanzas thereupon adds: "Wherefore I transcribe it to your excellency (viz. the governor of California), that in conformity with what is prescribed by the laws and dispositions upon colonization, you may put Senor Castillero in possession of the two square leagues which are mentioned. God and Liberty, Mexico, May 23, 1846. Castillo Lanzas. To His Excellency, the Governor of the Department of Californias." It is not pretended that this dispatch was ever delivered to, much less acted on by, the governor of California. On its face it purports to be merely one official communication reciting another, in which it is stated that the president has thought proper to accede to an application for a grant, and that fact is communicated to the governor in order that he, in conformity with the laws of colonization, may put the applicant in possession. Whether a dispatch of this kind, addressed by one Mexican functionary to another, never acted on by the latter, and which in all probability could not have reached him until after the subversion of Mexican authority in this country, and after the rights of the United States by conquest had accrued could convey any title either legal or equitable to a person who, during the existence of the Mexican authority, did no act whatever on the faith of it, it is not necessary now to decide. It is at least clear, that it is not a formal grant. It is at most, evidence that the president had acceded to a petition for two leagues of land. It is not addressed to the petitioner, nor intended as a muniment of title to him. It is but an order to the governor to make him a title and put him in possession. Whatever title, therefore, the defendants may claim under this official letter, it is evident that it can be at most but equitable and inchoate. And that, as the two leagues were never measured off to the applicant, nor was he put in possession by Mexican authority, the legal title and right of possession to the land vested by the conquest in the United States.

It was not contended at the hearing that any measurement was made or possession given of any specific tract of land by metes and bounds, or that the three thousand varas in every direction, mentioned in the act of possession, were marked upon the ground. It is also clear, that the mining judge, under the ordinances, had no right to give possession of a tract so extensive. It is claimed, however, that this act of possession was ratified and confirmed by the supreme government. No formal act of ratification is produced, or alleged to have been made. The evidence of the ratification is to be found, if at all, in the letter of Lanzas, already cited, and in the communications which it recites, and copies of which are produced, taken, it is alleged, from the Mexican archives. As Castillero, in his proposals to the mining junta, had asked that body to recommend the ratification of his mining possession, and as the communication from the minister of justice states that the president has been pleased to approve in all its parts the agreement made with Castillero, it is urged that that letter is evidence of such ratification. Whether or not it should so be considered, it belongs to another tribunal to decide. It is not claimed, however, that any possession by metes and bounds of this 3,000-vara tract was taken, nor was any survey or measurement effected until long after the conquest of the country, and after the rights of the United States had accrued. It is evident, therefore, that the defendants can claim no legal estate or prior adverse possession, either in the two-league tract which they have surveyed, and now occupy, or in the 3,000-vara tract, mentioned in the alcalde's act of possession. But all these documents are in the bill charged to be fraudulent, and antedated.

The evidence chiefly relied on in support of this allegation, is contained in a correspondence attached as an exhibit to the bill. The genuineness of all of these letters, except one, is admitted. The answer denies "that the said letters and communications were written by the said parties with intent to commit a fraud, or in furtherance of a conspiracy to fabricate a title, as charged in said bill, except so far as the said intention appears from said letters on the part of the said James Alexander Forbes." Section 32. Two of the defendants claim under James Alexander Forbes. As to him, the conspiracy to fabricate a title "so far as appears from said letters," is admitted. An examination of the letters will, however, convince us, that whatever fraudulent designs were entertained by James Alexander Forbes, were equally entertained by the parties whose agent he was, and with whom he was in correspondence, and that the somewhat anomalous case is not presented of a conspiracy by one person. The original act of possession, or registry of the mine, was obtained, as alleged by defendants, by Castillero for the benefit of himself and his socios or partners. On the 12th June, 1846, Jose Castro, in pursuance of powers given to him, as he recites, by his other partners, executed a power of attorney to one McNamara, authorizing him to enter into a contract for the three pertenencias of the mine with an English company "with exclusion of any other nation." This power of attorney, if its date be genuine, must have been executed on the occasion of McNamara's visit to California in May, 1846, as mentioned in Alexander Forbes' letter of May 11, 1846. He seems not to have immediately acted on it, for a letter is produced from him, dated at Honolulu on the 27th September, of the same year. As the alleged dispatch of Castillo Lanzas was written in Mexico on the 23d May, 1846, it is evident that at the time of executing this power of attorney, the only evidence of title to the mine which Castro could have possessed, or the existence of which he could have known, was the act of the alcalde, in which possession is given of three thousand varas in every direction from the mine. The power of attorney, however, exclusively refers to three pertenencias of the mine. In pursuance of this power of attorney, McNamara, on the 28th day of November, 1846, at Tepic, entered into a contract with Alexander Forbes for the working of the mine. It is, we think, evident from the letter of Alexander Forbes, of January 7, 1840, that Castillero was present at this negotiation. In that letter, Forbes says: "I had the pleasure to receive your very obliging letter of the 29th October last (1846), which chiefly relates to the mine of quicksilver about which I wrote you at so much length by Mr. McNamara. I had, previously to the receipt of your letter, been in treaty with D. Andres Castillero, and on the arrival of Mr. McNamara with powers from the other proprietors, the treaty was much facilitated; and I am now happy to inform you that I have contracted for the habilitacion of the mine, and have purchased a portion of Mr. Castillero's barras, all of which will be made known to you by Mr. Walkinshaw, who goes to California as my agent and attorney for the examination and working of the mine." If, then, as would seem to be the case, Castillero was present when the contract between Forbes and McNamara was entered into, it is strange that he did not himself become a party to it; and it is still more strange that the contract refers exclusively to the working of "the three pertenencias embraced in said quicksilver mine," and makes no allusion whatever to the two-sitios tract which Castillero must at that time have obtained. The instrument by which Castillero ratified this contract, and also that by which he sold a portion of his barras, are dated in Mexico on the 17th December, 1846. In the deed of ratification, for the first time allusion is made to the two square leagues conceded to Castillero, and a copy of the Lanzas dispatch is annexed to it. No reference is, however, made to the mining possession of three thousand varas in every direction, nor to any alleged confirmation of it, but the contract of McNamara for working the three pertenencias of the mine is alone referred to.

In the letter of James Alexander Forbes, in reply to that of Alexander Forbes, of January 7, 1847, and to another of the 27th January, which is not produced, he says: "It is of the most vital importance to obtain from the government of Mexico a positive, formal, and unconditional grant of the two sitios of land conceded to D. Andres Castillero, according to the decree appended to the contract, and also an unqualified ratification of the judicial possession which was given of the mine by the local authorities; including, if possible, the three thousand varas of land given in that possession as a gratification to the discoverer. These documents should be made out in the name of Don Andres Castillero." He then expresses the opinion that it will not be difficult to obtain these documents from the supreme government, and adds that they should be of the date of the decree of Señor Lanzas. This letter is relied on by the defendants, as showing that at that time the decree of Lanzas, as now produced, was in existence. It must be admitted that the reference to a dispatch of Lanzas, ordering a possession of two sitios to be given, is clear. Whether that dispatch is in all respects the same as that now exhibited, does not so certainly appear. But it is equally clear that the recommendation to procure other documents, the dates of which were to be false, is unequivocally and explicitly made. No letter is produced from Alexander Forbes, which discloses the manner in which this proposition was received; but in October of the same year, we find that the latter has come to California, and is actively engaged in exploring the mine. His proceedings while here will hereafter be referred to. Mr. Alexander Forbes seems to have remained in California until the end of March, 1848. In April of the same year, he appears to have sold his interest in the contract to various habilitadores, among whom, Jecker, Torre & Co. and the house of Barron, Forbes & Co., of Tepic, were chiefly interested. The first letter from these parties is dated on the 20th May, 1849, and is addressed to James Alexander Forbes. It commences as follows: "From certain circumstances you have communicated to us, it may be necessary to purchase some lands in the vicinity of the mine of New Almaden." It then empowers James Alexander Forbes to make such purchase at a sum not exceeding $5,000. On the 27th May, 1849, a memorandum was left with Alexander Forbes, at Tepic, by James Alexander Forbes, "of the documents which Castillero will have to produce in Mexico." The documents required were as follows: (1) A full approbation and ratification of all the acts of the alcalde. (2) An absolute and unconditional title for two leagues of land to Andres Castillero, with boundaries which are mentioned. (3) The dates to be arranged by Don Andres, and to be certified by the American minister. We will hereafter see that this memorandum was alluded to, and its contents repeated, in subsequent letters between the parties.

On the 28th October, 1849, James Alexander Forbes, in a letter to William Forbes, again alludes to the insecurity of the title on which the mine was held. After stating his apprehensions of the destruction of some important papers of the original registry of the mine; or, that a question might arise as to their legality; and, after adverting to the fact, "that no posterior grant of the government could authorize the occupation of the land of the Berreyesas, on which the mine is declared to be situated, in the original expediente of registry," he adds: "In view of these facts, it behoves you to obtain from the supreme government of Mexico, the full and positive grant of the two sitios of land upon the land of New Almaden, under date of the order to Castillo Lanzas, bearing in mind that this document must express the entire approbation of the supreme government of all the concessions made by the local authorities or alcalde of the district of San José, of the original grant or registration of the mine." He then proceeds to give the boundaries which should be mentioned in the concession. They are the same as those given in the memorandum above referred to. In the succeeding letter which, perhaps erroneously, has the same date as the last, James Alexander Forbes again calls the attention of William Forbes to the importance of his suggestions relative to the "perfecting of the title to the mine," and adds: "Without now entering into particulars, already explained to yourself and Mr. Alexander Forbes verbally, I desire only to impress upon your mind the vast importance of securing from the supreme government of Mexico the documents comprised in the memorandum left with Mr. Alexander Forbes when I was in Tepic, for Castillero." On the 30th October, 1849, he again recurs to the subject. In his letter of that date, he says: "You will now readily perceive the great importance of my advice to purchase a part both of the lands of Cook and of the Berreyesas. You were of opinion that this measure would not be necessary, in view of the supposed facility of getting the title to the mine perfected in Mexico. It is now more than five months since it was decided that Castillero should procure the necessary documents in that city, and that they should be sent as soon as possible. On the one hand, I depend on the precarious and illegal possession of the mine granted by the alcalde to Castillero, who was in reality the judge of the quantity of land given by the alcalde. On the other side, I am attacked by the purchasers of the same land declared by Castillero himself to comprise the mine." He concludes as follows: "I do entreat you to use every effort to send me the document of the ratification of the mine, and the grant thereon, at the very earliest opportunity—properly authenticated and certified, as explained by me when I was in Tepic." On the 30th November, 1849, Barron, Forbes & Co., reply to the communications of Jas. Alex. Forbes. As this is the first letter in which his suggestions are noticed by the parties with whom he was corresponding, it is important to see how they were received, and how far the allegation of the answer that the design of fabricating a title existed on the part of James Alex. Forbes alone, is sustained.

After acknowledging the receipt of letters and communications from Jas. Alex. Forbes, by the steamers "California" and "Panama," Barron, Forbes & Co. say: "We are glad that you have not been obliged to purchase Berreyesa's land. This is certainly a most important point, and we trust that the document sent will be of great consequence in that respect. But you will of course take care that no risk is run, and you will do in this affair as your best judgment shall direct you, keeping in view that at all hazards, and whatever cost, the property of the mine must be secured. Castillero, we expect, will soon be here, from Lower California, and if anything can be done in Mexico, he is the fittest person to procure what may be wanted." On the 1st December, 1849, Alexander Forbes writes to James Alex. Forbes, as follows: "The document sent up to you by the last steamer, for the grant of lands to D. Andres Castillero, was by mistake, not the one meant to be sent. I find now that the proper one was registered by me in Monterey, and the original deposited there. The one sent you was directed at foot to the governor of California, and the one deposited at Monterey was directed to Don Andres Castillero. The difference is, that by one the delivery by the governor was perhaps necessary to make the grant valid, whereas the other, being addressed directly to Don Andres, did not require that formality, nor was any other proceeding necessary, thus making it a better document than the greater part of the other titles for lands in California." He then proceeds to advise James Alex. Forbes to apply for a copy of the Monterey document, and to withdraw the one sent, and substitute the other. After reminding him of "another difficulty," viz. that the instrument made in the city of Mexico contains an exact copy of the document sent to him, and addressed to the governor, he concludes by leaving the whole subject to the discretion of his correspondent.

It is apparent from this letter, the genuineness of which is admitted, that two documents were then in existence, purporting to be concessions of land to Castillero. One addressed to the governor, which is that now produced, and one addressed to Castillero, which has disappeared. None such has been found at Monterey, where Alexander Forbes himself states he deposited it; nor do the defendants now claim that any such document was ever issued. If, as Forbes states, such a document was deposited in Monterey, it must have been fabricated. For the theory of this case on the part of the defendants is, that the dispatch to Lanzas, addressed to the governor, constitutes their only title for the two-sitios grant. On the 20th December, 1849, Jas. Alexander Forbes, in a letter to Barron, Forbes & Co., acknowledges the receipt of a certified copy of the grant of the two sitios to Castillero, and states at length his opinion that it is insufficient. He again urgently recommends that "Castillero, or some other fit person, should obtain from the supreme government of Mexico, a positive, explicit, and unconditional grant of the two sitios of land. In this document particular reference must be made to the concession of the mine by the alcalde of San Jose, approving of said concession, and conceding to Castillero and his associates in place of the three thousand varas, the said two sitios of land, citing dates, and making that of the said document to correspond with the imperfect and ambiguous document of which you have sent me the copy." At the close of this letter he adds: "I pray you not to be deluded into the belief that there will be no necessity for obtaining the document herein described." On the 29th January, 1850, James Alexander Forbes acknowledges to Alexander Forbes, the receipt of a copy of the contract of habilitacion, and adds: "As you request me to address myself to B., F. & Co. (Barron, Forbes & Co.) on the affair of the mine, I have now written upon this particular subject, to which I request their earnest attention, not as regards the habilitation, but another document which you know of." On the 3d February, 1850, Alexander Forbes writes to James Alexander Forbes as follows: "I have every reason to believe that the documents you mentioned will be found in the city of Mexico; and as Mr. Castillero will return there, they will no doubt be procured; but we are at some loss to know what is exactly wanted, and I beg you will by the next steamer give a sketch of the documents to which you allude, particularly a description of the limits of the grant. I think you must not have received the information sent you of the existence of the grant of the two sitios directly to Castillero and registered in Monterey; nor am I sure if that will mend the matter." After alluding to a last resort which he mentions "with great repugnance," viz. "the promotion of the invalidation of the title of the Berreyesas to their rancho, and adding that "if no opposition or disclosures are made, they may be left in possession," he proceeds as follows: "We think at present that it may be the best plan to get an authenticated copy of the approval of the Mexican government of the grant of 3,000 varas given by the alcalde. Castillero says such approval was given, and that on his arrival he will procure a judicial copy of it. This is the plan we shall adopt, if we hear nothing from you to alter this resolution. Since writing the foregoing, I have looked over your private letter to William Forbes, dated October 18th, and find you state the limits or boundaries as follows." Mr. Forbes then states the boundaries, and adds: "Castillero is not certain of accomplishing this latter plan, and thinks the first, that is, the three thousand varas, the best." And on the 6th February, 1850, Barron, Forbes & Co. write to Jas. Alex. Forbes, informing him that "they had hoped that the document lately sent for this grant to Castillero, would have been sufficient; but as you seem doubtful on this point, we have spoken to him, and his opinion is, that if this grant is not tenable, it will be better to go upon the three thousand varas of the alcalde, granted at the time of giving possession of the mine, and approved of by the Mexican government, which approval will be taken from the Mexican archives and sent on to you." On the 26th February, 1850, Jas. Alex. Forbes again addresses Alexander Forbes on the subject of the title. He says: "I really did have more faith in the tact and ability of Castillero to perceive the important objects set forth in my memorandum of what was to be done nine months ago by that eccentric individual, and that with the powerful influence he was to have exercised, and the efficient aid that was to be lent him, he would meet with no obstacle to the attainment of the important documents explained in that memorandum. But Castillero has deceived himself; for he thought that boundaries were not necessary, as I shall presently show you. He succeeded in obtaining the grant of two sitios to himself in the mining possession of Santa Clara, while that very act of possession declares that the mine is situated on the land of José Berreyesa, five leagues distant from Santa Clara, &c. Without troubling you with what I have so many times written and explained to you verbally on the importance of the acquisition of the document, I will only say now what it must be; and it is this." The documents so often mentioned are again described with the impressive injunction that "both must be of the proper date, and placed in the proper governmental custody in Mexico." On the 2d March, 1850, Barron, Forbes & Co. inform James Alex. Forbes that "Mr. Barron and Don Andres Castillero are about to proceed to Mexico, and will attend to what you have recommended." On the 16th March, 1850, Alexander Forbes writes to James Alex. Forbes: "Mr. Barron and Castillero have gone off to Mexico, and I wrote them to-day respecting the document you know of, which, if possible. will be procured." This letter significantly concludes: "Let us have quicksilver and all will be well." On the 7th April, 1850, Alexander Forbes informs Jas. Alex. Forbes that "Mr. Barron and Castillero have arrived in Mexico, and have every prospect of finding the documents you are aware of." With this letter of the 16th March, 1850, all information as to the operations of Barron and Castillero in Mexico ceases. It is not disclosed what unexpected obstacle prevented their "finding" in Mexico the documents so much desired, or whether the doubts which Castillero entertained of "being able to accomplish the latter plan" (i. e. the grant of two sitios by definite boundaries) were unhappily realized.

Comment on the evidence afforded by these letters of a conspiracy to fabricate titles on the part, not of Jas. Alexander Forbes alone, as the answer admits, but of Alexander Forbes, and of Barron, Forbes & Co., is unnecessary. The full and specific instructions for the documents "to be procured," and for the "arrangement of their dates," originally given by Jas. Alex. Forbes, and so frequently referred to and repeated; the recital, in the letter of Alexander Forbes, of February 3d, 1850, of the boundaries indicated in the memorandum left by Jas. Alex. Forbes at Tepic; the positive statement by the former that the documents mentioned would, no doubt, be procured by Castillero; the doubts as to the best "plan" to be pursued in their fabrication; the announcement by Barron, Forbes & Co. that Mr. Barron and Castillero "are about to proceed to Mexico," and would attend "to what Jas. Alex. Forbes had recommended;" the significant instruction of Alexander Forbes to Jas. Alexander Forbes that "the document you know of" will, if possible, be procured; and, finally, the announcement that they had arrived in Mexico, and "had every prospect of finding the documents you are aware of,"—seem to establish beyond doubt, the existence of the conspiracy to fabricate titles as alleged in the bill. The nature of the suggestions of Jas. Alexander Forbes is as clear as language can make it. No answers from Alexander Forbes or from Barron, Forbes & Co. are produced in which those suggestions are rejected with the natural indignation of honesty. On the contrary, they are received and acted upon.

It is urged, however, that these letters themselves disclose that the Castillo Lanzas dispatch, now produced, was in existence at least as early as May 5th, 1847; and that therefore it must be regarded as genuine, whatever designs may have been subsequently entertained to fabricate or to "procure" other documents. We have seen that this document for the first time appears in the instrument of ratification by Castillero, dated at Mexico, December 17th, 1846; that no mention is made of it in the contract of McNamara with Alexander Forbes, made at Tepic, and dated November 28th of the same year, although it would seem from Alexander Forbes' letter that Castillero was then present, and must have then been in possession of the Lanzas dispatch if it was issued at the time it is dated. Admitting, then, that the dispatch referred to by James Alexander Forbes in his letter of the 5th May, 1847, is the same as that now produced, a copy of which is appended to the contract of the 17th December, it merely proves that the dispatch was in existence at the latter date, which was after the entire subversion of the Mexican authority in California. If, however, the letter of Alexander Forbes of March 28th, 1848, be genuine, it is an express admission that all the documents produced by Castillero in Mexico as his title to the mine and lands were obtained long after the occupation of California by the Americans. In that letter Mr. Forbes says: "But this interest renders it necessary for me to have the control of all the shares, in order that I may dispose of the whole whenever an opportunity may offer, and save myself from the heavy loss that would ensue should it unfortunately leak out that in fact all the documents procured by Castillero in Mexico as his title to the mine and lands were all obtained long after the occupation of California by the Americans." "This unfortunate irregularity cannot easily be repaired, and serious objections might be made to our new act of possession." The authenticity of this letter is denied by the defendants. The original is not produced. It is stated by James Alexander Forbes to have been stolen from him. The existence of the original and the accuracy of the copy are sworn to by two witnesses, James Alexander Forbes and Robert Birnie. The latter swears that he was employed by one of the defendants to obtain from James Alexander Forbes any document that would be prejudicial to the mine, and he was informed that any such document would be liberally paid for. He accordingly made a copy of the letter of Alexander Forbes of March 28, 1848, which he gave to Mr. Barron, by whom he was paid at the time $200, and $200 a few days afterwards. That the copy now produced is the same as that left with Mr. Barron, and that the original was in the handwriting of Alexander Forbes, with which the witness is acquainted. James Alexander Forbes states that on the day on which he furnished a copy of this letter to be given to Mr. Barron, the letter was stolen from his carpet bag. The character of Mr. Birnie is unimpeached. No affidavits contradicting any of the statements made by him have been submitted. We are therefore not warranted in treating the allegation of the answer that this letter is forged, as sufficient to establish the fact.

We have seen from the letter of Alexander Forbes of the 1st December, 1849, and from his letter of 3d February, 1850, that at the date of the former there were at least two documents for the grant of lands to D. Andres Castillero: one, a notarial copy of which had been sent to James Alexander Forbes, which was directed at foot to the governor; the other, the original of which was deposited at Monterey, and which was "directly addressed to Don Andres," and therefore did not, in the opinion of Alexander Forbes, require a delivery by the governor to make it valid. This latter, as has been stated, has not been produced, nor is it pretended by the defendants that it ever existed. The fact that Mr. Forbes deposited at Monterey the original of a document which would thus seem to have been fabricated, may well suggest suspicions as to the genuineness of the other which is now produced.

In the exhibit attached to the deposition of Jose M. Lafragua, a copy of the Castillo Lanzas dispatch is found, together with a certificate of Jesus Vejar, a notary public, signed, as it recites, on the 1st March, 1850, "at the instance of Messrs. Barron, Forbes & Co." In this certificate the notary attests that the dispatch signed by Lanzas has "been respected under that signature, and obeyed by the Mexican authorities that governed in Upper California in the year 1846—according to insertions which said authorities made of said instrument in acts which they passed upon the subject of which they treat, and which I certify to have seen." Almost every statement contained in this certificate is admitted to be false. It is not pretended by the defendants that the dispatch of Lanzas was ever delivered to the governor, nor that it was even presented to, much less "respected and obeyed by the Mexican authorities of Upper California, in the year 1846." The "insertions of said instrument, made by those authorities, in acts which they passed upon the subject," and which the notary certifies to have seen, are purely imaginary. When a certificate of this character is procured from a Mexican notary, by some of the defendants in this case, and by them filed as an exhibit, the court is surely justified in regarding with suspicion, not only all documents which are authenticated in a similar manner, but also those the genuineness of which is assailed by other proofs.

We have thus far considered the case as it is presented by defendants, and as it appears from the letters admitted by themselves to be genuine, with the exception of one letter, the genuineness of which they deny. We have not thought it necessary to enter upon a minute examination of the mass of evidence which has been offered on either side. That duty properly belongs to the district court. Whether or not the letters are susceptible of an explanation consistent with the bona fides of the parties by whom they are written; whether or not the testimony of Lafragua, and other witnesses, the mention of this grant in his report, and the production of the document from the archives, and other evidence which may be offered hereafter, will be sufficient to satisfy that court of the genuineness of the titles produced by the defendants, we cannot now anticipate.

We have only entered upon the inquiry so far as was necessary to show, that the allegations of fraud in the bill are sustained by testimony sufficient to suggest grave suspicions as to the genuineness of the titles on which the defendants rely, and to justify the court in interposing, by injunction, in behalf of the legal title, to stay the destruction of the estate in controversy, pending the proceeding by which the validity of the title will finally be determined. Allusion has been made to the visit of Alexander Forbes to California in October, 1847. His proceedings on his arrival will now be adverted to, with a view of showing how the possession of the lands and mine now held by the defendants was acquired. In the letter of James Alexander Forbes to Eustace Barron, dated January 30, 1846, information is given that "Castillero, a sort of commissioner from the Mexican government, is working a quicksilver mine near the mission of Santa Clara." How long he continued in California does not appear except from the affidavit of Forbes, in which it is stated that soon after entering into partnership with his associates, he went to Mexico and never returned. It also appears from the same affidavit, that Padre Real, one of the partners, was left in possession. On the 22d September, 1846, James Alexander Forbes writes to Alexander Forbes: "I am now in charge of the quicksilver mine, and am going to work it until I hear from Castillero, and am upon the point of striking a bargain for four shares." The motive for thus transferring the possession to James Alexander Forbes is stated by Mr. Forbes in his affidavit, and is in itself probable. It was to place the mine under cover of English protection, as the American forces were in possession of California, and Mr. Forbes was British vice-consul. The possession so delivered to Mr. Forbes comprised the mine itself, a log-cabin and shed, together with some old tools and utensils. The cabin was not occupied; but an Indian sometimes slept in the mine. Up to this time, 2,000 lbs. of quicksilver had been extracted. It is further stated by Forbes that this possession was kept up by Indians whom he sent to work there, although during the winter of 1846 it was for a time entirely abandoned. Such seems to have been the situation of the property up to the time when Alexander Forbes acquired his interest in it by his contract with McNamara, and dispatched Walkinshaw to California as his agent. To him, Mr. James Alexander Forbes transferred the possession, and assays and observations were commenced. The scarcity of operatives and the indolence of the Indians appear, however, to have prevented any considerable operations. In the month of October, 1847, Mr. Alexander Forbes arrived in California, with tools and laborers. On his arrival, explorations were immediately commenced, and on the 24th November, 1847, he announces the discovery of the "cinta," or vein of ores, the direction of which had been before entirely mistaken. On the 19th January, 1848, he writes to James Alexander Forbes, as follows: "I am very much obliged to you for your very prompt attention to the business in hand, and return the expediente immediately. I am much surprised at the result of your assay, and shall try what I have. It will, of course, be better to say nothing about it, particularly as I have already written to Monterey that there is no mine; nor does there appear to be any quantity of this kind of stuff. I hope soon to see the alcalde."

It is admitted in the answer that in January, 1848, the alcalde, James W. Weekes, made on the petition of Alexander Forbes, "a concession to him of the said mine, to correct and reform what had previously been given." The extent of the possession so given is stated by James Alexander Forbes to have been four pertenencias, or two hundred by eight hundred varas. It is to this "new act of possession" that Alexander Forbes probably alludes in his letter of 25th March, 1848, when he says "that serious objections may be made to its legality." Shortly after this possession was obtained, Mr. Forbes caused two square leagues to be surveyed around the mine, which in 1852 were put under fence, and have ever since been inclosed, and are now in possession of defendants. It is obvious that neither the act of Weekes, by which possession was given of a tract of eight hundred by two hundred varas, nor the act of Forbes himself, by which possession was taken of two square leagues, can have any validity against the United States, who had already acquired the legal title to and constructive possession of the land. It is not claimed that at the time of the first possession any measurement was made or boundaries fixed of the three thousand varas of which possession was alleged to have been given. No evidence has been offered to show that the possession up to the time of Weekes' measurement was other than that described in the affidavit of Mr. Forbes.

It has already been stated that the mining-title relied on by the defendants is claimed to be founded on a registry and act of possession by Pico the alcalde of San José. At the time when Weekes, the American alcalde, gave the possession of the mine and four pertinencies above referred to, Alexander Forbes also procured from him a certified copy of the expediente of the mine. This copy was prepared by James Alexander Forbes from an original furnished to him by Alexander Forbes; and to this copy the certificate of Weekes is annexed, certifying it to be "a faithful copy made, to the letter, from its original, the expediente of the mine of Santa Clara, or New Almaden, which exists in the archives under my charge." This certificate is admitted to be untrue, or at least inaccurate. The original from the archives of the alcalde has since been produced, and it shows that the copy certified by Weekes is neither "faithful" nor "to the letter." It is evident that the copy certified to by Weekes could neither have been prepared from nor compared with "any original existing in the archives under his charge." The original expediente now produced, is stated by Capt. Halleck, the superintendent of the mine, to have been found by himself in the office of Mr. Belden, mayor of San José, in the winter of 1851. If this document be indeed the original denouncement and registry of the mine, and if from the time of the denouncement it had remained on file as an original record in the alcalde's office, it is strange that the superintendent and counsel of the mine should so long have been ignorant of its existence.

In the suit brought in 1850 for the possession of the mine, by Berreyesa against James Alexander Forbes and Walkinshaw in the district court for Santa Clara county, a motion was made to require the defendants to produce "all papers of a pretended grant for two sitios, together with all other paper or papers connected with the title to said Almaden mine or the land upon which the same is situated, upon which defendants intend to found their claim to said land or said mines, &c." This motion was granted by the court, and said papers "or copies thereof" were ordered to be produced according to said motion. To this order the defendants answered by affidavit. In this affidavit they allege that they "have exercised all diligence to procure the said documents; but have been unable to do so, but expect soon to receive them from the parties in Mexico who hold them." They further aver "that the said documents and others which they have sent for in Mexico, are necessary to enable them to proceed to the trial of the cause; and they specify the following documents as absolutely necessary to them before they can proceed to trial": (1) "The original denouncement of the mine of New Almaden, and the judicial possession given of the same in the year 1845." (2) "The confirmation of said denouncement and possession by the supreme government in 1846, and prior to the late declaration of war by the United States against Mexico." (3) "The original grant of land, including said mining possession, made by the supreme government of Mexico prior to the declaration of war as aforesaid to the owners of said mine." This affidavit is sworn to by Mr. Halleck, one of the attorneys for defendants. It is evident that at this time, viz. December, 1850, Mr. Halleck could not have been aware that the original denouncement of the mine and judicial possession of the same given in the year 1845, was not in Mexico but on file among the archives of the alcalde's office to which it belonged. Nor could he have been aware that the concession of two leagues and the ratification of the mining possession were not, as implied in his affidavit, contained in two documents, but in one, viz., the dispatch of Castillo Lanzas, and that that dispatch was not dated "prior to the declaration of war by the United States," but ten days subsequently. But at this very time Mr. Jas. Alex. Forbes, one of the defendants in that suit, had already received a notarial copy of the Lanzas dispatch, addressed to the governor of California; and the original of another, addressed to Andres Castillero himself, he had been informed by Alexander Forbes had been deposited and registered in Monterey.

Up to the time of filing the petition of Castillero to the board of land-commissioners, the original expediente on file in the recorder's office seems to have escaped observation; for the exhibit filed with that petition is a copy of the document certified to by Weekes, and not a copy of that since produced from the recorder's office. We are aware that all these circumstances may be explained, and that the genuineness of this document is testified to by a number of witnesses. We have referred to the manner and time of its production to show that it has not that proof of genuineness which would be afforded by its admitted production from the archives of a Mexican office, transferred to us on the acquisition of the country.

The defendants have also produced in support of their title a large number of documents, purporting to be copies of originals on file in Mexico. They consist of official communications from various officers in Mexico, and purport to be the proceedings of those authorities, on the application of Castillero to the junta for the encouragement of mining, and which resulted, it is claimed, in the concession of the two sitios, as shown in the dispatch of Lanzas. None of these documents are authenticated under the great seal of Mexico. They are certified by the secretary or chief clerk of the departments in which the proceedings purport to have taken place They have been recently procured in Mexico, by an agent of the defendants. Whether documents alleged to exist in the archives of Mexico, can be regarded by the court if unauthenticated by the political power of that country under its great seal, it is not necessary now to decide. But as they have been obtained since the visit of Mr. Barron and Castillero to Mexico, and as the last injunction of James Alexander Forbes to Alexander Forbes was to have the documents referred to by him "of the proper date, and placed in the proper governmental custody in Mexico," we are at least justified in regarding such documents with suspicion unless authenticated in the most satisfactory manner. But especially should we call for such proof, when we remember that the documents purport to be a grant of land in California, dated May 23d, 1846, and that the Mexican government, in the original treaty of peace with the United States, declared in the 10th article, "that no grants whatever of lands in any of the territories ceded to the United States had been made since the 13th day of May, 1846."

We have thus examined at greater length than was intended the evidence on which the United States rely, to sustain the allegations of fraud which are made in the bill. The evidence considered has been chiefly that afforded by a correspondence admitted, with the exception of one letter, to be genuine; and that relating to the production of the expediente of the mine, in great part presented by the defendants themselves. The examination has been prosecuted not with a view of reaching any conclusion upon the question involved, but merely to ascertain whether the allegations of fraud in the bill which are not positively denied by the answer, have such a probable foundation as to justify the court in interfering by injunction, to preserve the property during the investigation in which the validity of the title will finally be determined.

The results of the examination may briefly be recapitulated as follows: It appears from the letters of the defendants, or those under whom they claim, that in the years 1847, 1848, 1849, and 1850, plans were discussed, and the design was entertained to procure documents from Mexico, the dates of which were to be "arranged" by Castillero, and which were to be "placed in the proper governmental custody in Mexico," and certified copies of which were to be sent on. That in May, 1850, Mr. Barron and Castillero proceeded to Mexico, "to attend to what had been recommended" by James Alexander Forbes. That documents have since been produced "from the proper governmental custody in Mexico," which are claimed to be a grant of two leagues of land and ratification of the mining possession. That these documents are not attested by the great seal of Mexico, or officially authenticated and recognized as genuine by the political power of that country. That they are dated subsequently to the 13th of May, 1846; and that the Mexican commissioners solemnly and repeatedly declared to the government of the United States, that no grants whatever of lands had been made in the territory of California since that date. That in December, 1849, two documents, of nearly similar import, appear to have been in existence; both of which could not have been genuine. That the original of one of these, which was deposited in Monterey, has disappeared; while the other is authenticated by the certificate of a notary obtained, as it recites, at the instance of some of the defendants, nearly every statement of which is untrue. That the expediente of the mine originally produced, and which was by Alexander Forbes procured, to be certified by Weekes, to be a "faithful copy to the letter" of the expediente on file in his office is not a copy of the documents since produced from that office. That this last document was not discovered until 1851, and up to that time its existence seems to have been unknown to those of the defendants who were most likely to have known of it, and to their agent and attorneys. That no measurement of the land alleged to have been granted by the alcalde, or demarkation of its boundaries, was effected during the continuance of the Mexican authority in this country; but the possession of the mine itself, which had been kept up with occasional interruptions, by Indian workmen, was transferred after the occupation of the country, to the British vice-consul, in order to place it under cover of the protection of the English government. That the first formal possession, by metes and bounds, of the tract now held by defendants, was taken long after the occupation of California by the American forces, and after the title of the United States had accrued. That at the time this possession was taken, the existence of valuable ores on the land was studiously concealed; and that two leagues of land were subsequently taken possession of and inclosed by the defendants without any authority whatever. It further appears that the United States are now seized of the legal title of the land, and that the title of the defendants, assuming it to be a genuine but an imperfect or equitable title, is one the validity of which, under the Mexican mining and colonization laws, is open to grave doubts. All these circumstances are, in our opinion, abundantly sufficient to show, not only that there is a substantial ground of controversy between the parties, but that the allegations of fraud in the bill, which are met with no positive denial in the answers, are sustained by proofs of the fraudulent designs of the parties, and of the manner in which the documents are produced, which leave the question of their genuineness open to grave doubts.

In such a case, where the substance of the estate and that which constitutes its chief value, is being wasted and carried off in enormous quantities, and where the threatened injury is to an extent far greater than can be compensated by damages, it seems to us clearly the duty of the court to preserve the property pending the litigation by which the right to it will be determined.

Case No. 15,999.

UNITED STATES v. PARROTT et al.

[1 McAll. 447.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. Jan. Term, 1859.

EQUITY PRACTICE — COMMISSION TO TAKE TESTIMONY ABROAD—NOTICE—STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

1. A motion for the appointment of commissioners to take testimony abroad, is not grantable of course.

2. Special motions, unlike those grantable of course, require allowance by the judge, and previous notice to the adverse party.

3. The power to grant a dedimus potestatem, is given to the federal courts, to prevent the failure of justice, to be exercised according to "common usage."

4. Where motion is made to a court of equity, the usages and rules of chancery must apply.

5. The practice and jurisdiction of this court, as a court of equity, cannot be controlled by the practice of the state courts.

6. The materiality of the testimony, and the purposes for which it is invoked, will determine the action of the court.

Application for a dedimus potestatem to take testimony abroad. [An injunction pendente lite was heretofore granted. See Case No. 15,998.]

P. Della Torre, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Edmund Randolph and Edwin M. Stanton, for complainants.

A. C. Peachy, Gregory Yale, and Hall McAllister, for defendants.

McALLISTER, District Judge. In this case a bill was filed by the district attorney of the United States, in behalf of the government. Among other matters, it alleged that the title to the premises in dispute was in the United States; that defendants had taken tortious possession of them; that they consisted of a mine of great value; that defendants had extracted minerals therefrom to the value of $8,000,000; that they were extracting therefrom minerals to the annual amount in value of $1,000.000, and threaten to continue the waste; that they were unable to respond for the damages which had already accrued, and which would still accrue; that the defendants, in the name of one Andres Castillero, had presented a petition to the "board of land commissioners," under the act of congress approved March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631], which was pending on appeal from the decision of the commissioners, before the district court of the United States for the Northern district of the state of California, the object of which petition was to obtain from the United States a confirmation of the title which they pretended to hold from the Mexican government; that the title under which they held possession was forged, ante-dated, and fabricated in pursuance of a conspiracy to cheat and defraud the United States of their rights to the said property. The bill concluded by charging that defendants were destroying the substance of the mine, and prayed that an injunction might issue to stay the waste defendants were committing, and threatened to commit, until the determination of their alleged title by the tribunals to which the adjudication of it was confided, and that a receiver be appointed. To this bill an answer was filed, and on the bill and answer the motion for injunction was argued and decided. The charges in the bill specifically made, of forgery, and ante-dating of the documentary title under which defendants held, were not directly and fully denied; all that was averred was the ignorance of defendants of their existence, and their belief of the genuineness of the documents. In relation to the charge made in the bill of a conspiracy to cheat and defraud the United States, after admitting the genuineness of all the letters save one, appended to the bill, the answer, in response to the allegation of conspiracy, denies "that the said letters and communications were written by the said parties with intent to commit a fraud, or in furtherance of a conspiracy to fabricate a title, as charged in said bill, except so far as the said intention appears from said letters on the part of the said James Alexander Forbes." So far, then, as the intention of conspiracy appears from the letters, it was admitted that "Forbes," under whom two of the defendants claimed, may be guilty. In view of the insufficiency of the denials in the answer, the irreparable character of the mischief complained of, and the prima-facie title of the complainants exhibited by the bill, answer, and exhibits, the court granted the injunction, and refused the appointment of a receiver.

[1] [Reported by Cutler McAllister, Esq.]

The well-settled rules of chancery require that full, direct, and positive denials should have been given to the charges of fraud, forgery, ante-dating, and conspiracy. This doctrine is enunciated by uniform decisions. Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272]; Clark's Ex'rs v. Van Riemsdyk, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 160; Everly v. Rice, 3 Green, Ch. [4 N. J. Eq.] 553; Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202; Apthorpe v. Comstock, 1 Hopk. Ch. 143; Ward v. Van Bokkelen, 1 Paige, 100. Independently of authority, reason and common sense affirm the propriety of the rule. The facts charged in the bill were forgery and ante-dating. These were not denied, but the ignorance of the defendants of their existence and their belief in the non-existence of them averred. In Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202, Chancellor Kent has well said, "The defendants may have given all the denial in their power; but the fraud may exist notwithstanding, and consistently with their ignorance, or the sincerity of their belief."

It has been suggested, that the allegations of the forgery and ante-dating not having been sworn to from personal knowledge, that circumstance should modify the rule. No authority has, nor it is believed can, be invoked to sustain a proposition so novel. The allegations of a bill properly made, which so clearly charge the fraud as to make it perfectly intelligible to the defendants, entitle the complainant to such a denial as is prescribed by the rules of chancery. If such an one is not put in, the defendant cannot arrest the issue of an injunction on the ground that he has filed an answer denying the equity of the bill. Relax that rule, and what might not be the injurious results?

There are many cases in which rights may be violated under circumstances which may warrant an honest belief that atrocious fraud had been perpetrated; but those circumstances may have transpired at a distance from the party, and he unable to swear to them from personal knowledge. Can it be contended with any reason, that when the party comes into a court of equity, that tribunal will award to an answer whose denials of forgery and ante-dating are made "upon information and belief," the character which the law annexes to an answer where the denial of the fraud is on personal knowledge? The allegations of a bill, are mere pleadings; the averments in an answer responsive to them, are regarded as evidence equivalent to two disinterested witnesses, or one witness and strong corroborative circumstances. To consider that the denials of an answer on "information and belief" are to be deemed sufficient because the allegations of the pleadings are not sworn to from personal knowledge, is simply to confound the distinction which exists between pleadings and evidence. So to modify the rule, would exclude any application by way of information, through its officer, by a government. To every such application an answer on "information and belief" would be sufficient, for personal knowledge of facts is not to be expected from the government. Deeming the rule applicable to this, as it is to all similar cases, the court considered that the denials of the fraud, ante-dating, and forgery were not such as ought to arrest the issue of an injunction; that the case was one of irremediable mischief; and lastly, that the pleadings and exhibits in the case showed a probable foundation to entitle the complainants to be protected against that irreparable mischief, until the determination of the question of title in the tribunal in which it was pending,—this court, without pausing to dwell upon the title set up by defendants, independently of any alleged forgery of it, directed the injunction to issue, but declined for the present the appointment of a receiver. The injunction exists, the issue of title is still pending in the district court, there is no suggestion of any fact that has arisen since the decision of the court to change the relative attitude of the parties from what it was at that time, nor to alter the jurisdiction of the court in any way over the case. That jurisdiction was distinctly enunciated to be confined to granting the prayer of the bill, the court disclaiming at the same time all power to decide upon title, either on a motion to dissolve an injunction, or on a final hearing.

In this condition of things, an application is made to this court to designate commissioners to take testimony abroad. The facts expected to be proved go mostly to the establishment of the title of the defendants, and the genuineness of the documents by which they propose to sustain that title. The avowed object of invoking that testimony, is "to offer it in evidence on the trial of this case, or on a motion to dissolve the injunction which has been granted against the defendants therein, or for any other purpose in said cause to which such evidence shall be applicable." The grounds taken in support of this motion are,—1st. That it is matter of right, grantable of course; 2d. That the materiality of the testimony invoked, whether there is to be any hearing at all in the case, whether the testimony would be hereafter admissible, are all matters to be considered when the evidence is offered, not by anticipation. If the first proposition be correct, the second follows as a corollary from it.

The first ground which claims the action of this court as matter of right, and the granting of the application as matter of course, presupposes the act of the court to be merely ministerial. If this be so, it has no right to investigate whether the testimony be material, or whether it can be used when obtained. All it has to do, is to perform the mere ministerial duty which it is commanded to discharge, and the present application is needless. Whence the necessity of naming witnesses, the facts they are expected to prove, and the purpose for which their testimony is invoked, if this motion is grantable as a matter of course? Both these grounds will be discussed together, for each is involved necessarily in the other; for if the granting a "dedimus potestatem" is matter of course, the court has nothing to do with the materiality of the testimony, the use to be made of it, or any other matter connected with it. If, on the contrary, the power of this court to grant this application depends upon the materiality of the testimony, and the purposes for which it is invoked, it is evident that neither ground can be tenable.

To sustain the proposition that the granting of the present application is matter of right, reference is made to the 67th rule governing equity practice, as amended in 1854, by the supreme court of the United States, and to the 5th section of the act of congress of 22d August, 1843. By the 67th rule it is provided, that after a cause is at issue, commissions to take testimony may be taken out in vacation, as well as in term-time upon interrogatories filed by the party taking out the same in the clerk's office, ten days' notice being given to the adverse party to file cross-interrogatories before the issuing of the commission, &c. And the rule provides that in all cases the commissioners shall be named by the court, or a judge thereof. The amendment to this rule, to be found in 17 How [58 U. S.] vii., declares that the presiding judge of any court exercising jurisdiction, either in term-time or vacation, may vest in the clerk of said court general power to name commissioners to take testimony in like manner that the court or judge can now do by the 67th rule. The presiding judge of this court has never vested in the clerk any such power. We must look, therefore, to the former rule, the construction of which will necessarily determine the extent of any power which the judge could have delegated to the clerk; for the judge could not have delegated any power which he did not himself possess, and which by the requisitions of the amended rule was to be exercised by the clerk in the same manner as it could be by the judge. The fifth section of the act of 22d August, 1843 (5 Stat. 517), provides, that the district courts as courts of admiralty, and the circuit courts as courts of equity, shall be deemed always open for certain purposes, and that it will be competent for any judge at chambers, and in vacation as well as in term-time, to award all such process, commissions, rules, and proceedings, &c., whenever the same are not grantable of course, according to the rules and practice of the court. It is evident, then, from the act, that all commissions are not granted of course. Looking through the equity rules, it will be found that a distinction is preserved between special motions and those grantable of course. What constitutes a motion grantable of course, and a special one, is to be inferred from the 5th rule of equity. The distinction is, that a motion which requires an allowance from the judge or a notice to the opposite party is a special one; all others are grantable of course. This motion asks for the interposition of the judge to nominate commissioners, and requires that previous notice of ten days should be given.

In addition to foregoing rules and act of congress, reference has been made to Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1099, where that author discusses the question, what facts are necessary to be inserted in the affidavit on which the application for a commission is founded, and shows it is from the authorities, uncertain whether the names of the witnesses, or a statement of the points to which it is intended to examine them, are necessarily to be given in the affidavit. In relation to the names of witnesses, he states that according to the books of practice all that need be stated in the affidavit is, that the testimony of some of the witnesses whom it is proposed to examine is material, and that the party cannot proceed to trial safely without their testimony. He further states, when the application is made in an early stage of the case the court seldom denies the application for a commission; it will, however, exercise a discretion upon this subject, and he gives various instances where such applications were refused. As to the necessity of stating the facts to be proved, or the names of the witnesses in the affidavit, the conclusion to which he comes, after a review of the authorities, is, that in order to dispense with the necessity of stating them in the affidavit, the names of the witnesses, and the object to which their testimony is required, and the necessity for examining witnesses abroad, must be evident from the pleadings, if not made so by the affidavit; and he distinctly states, that the reason why Lord Eldon, in the case of Montizibel v. Machada, did not require those matters to be stated in the affidavit, was, that his lordship had looked into the case, as made by the pleadings, in order to see whether there were facts to which it was proper to examine the witnesses. The same author tells us, that it must appear that the facts relied on as to which evidence is sought, are such as can be made use of, either in support of the action or in defense of it. Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1096.

The foregoing authorities (all that have been cited by counsel) do not sustain the proposition asserted. There are but two sources of power to which this court can look for its action to obtain the testimony of absent witnesses. The first is by the issue of letters rogatory. There is no instance on record of these having been issued as a matter of course, nor is the present an application for such. The second source is statutory; nor can this court receive any aid, save by implication from that source. The two acts of congress upon this subject, are those of 24th September, 1789, and 24th January, 1827. The former, after describing minutely the mode of taking depositions de bene esse, limits the execution of commissions to an American magistrate. The latter act (1827, 3 Stat. 197) is limited in its terms to the execution of commissions within the limits of the United States and their territories. It would be a strange state of things, that without any express legislation as to the mode and manner of issuing commissions, parties would have the right to consider the issue of a commission to take testimony abroad grantable of course, and the nomination of commissioners a mere ministerial act by the judge. The only source of power to which this court can look, is the 30th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73); and from it derive that power by implication. That section provides, "that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any court of the United States from granting a dedimus potestatem to take depositions according to common usage when it may be necessary to prevent a failure or delay of justice." This act, like all laws made in derogation of the common law, should be strictly construed. No commission should be issued under it, unless necessary to prevent a failure or delay of justice, or in accordance with common usage. What is meant by common usage, when an application is made to a court of equity for a dedimus potestatem to authorize the taking of testimony abroad? It has been contended on this motion, that by the terms "common usage" in the statute of 1789, congress must have meant the practice of the courts of the states; and the case of Buddicum v. Kirk, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 293, has been cited to sustain this proposition. It is true that Conkling, in his treatise (page 421), states that the above case enunciates a proposition which he embodies in these words: "The circumstances under which a commission will be issued, and the mode of obtaining, executing, and returning it, in the several districts, depend upon the practice and laws of the respective states, and the rules of the several courts of the United States." If this text-writer intended to say that the rules of chancery, in relation to taking testimony abroad, were to be in accordance with the practice and laws of the different states, he asserts a doctrine totally indefensible. If such was his intention, his ingenuity has detected in that case what has escaped the sagacity of Mr. Justice Curtis; for the latter, in his head-notes (1 Curtis, Dec. 584), has failed to perceive, for he does not notice, any such doctrine. The case of Buddicum v. Kirk was a common-law case, and the question arose, whether service of a notice to take a deposition upon an attorney at law was equivalent to one upon an attorney in fact? As the law of Virginia required the notice to be made on the attorney in fact, the court, very properly, under the 34th section of the judiciary act, adopted the law of the state in a common-law case. That case is no authority to sustain the proposition that the practice of this court acting as a court of equity, is to be controlled by the practice of the state courts, whatever that may be. It would make the chancery jurisdiction and practice of the federal courts subservient to the practice of the courts of every state in which the federal court might sit; whereas, it must be uniform in all the states. In Gaines v. Relf, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 9, this question is fully discussed, and even in Louisiana, where there is no equity state court, it was decided that chancery practice prevails in the circuit court of that state, and must prevail in accordance with the rules prescribed by the supreme court, and where they are silent, according to the practice of the high court of chancery.

The question then arises, whether an application to a court of equity to take testimony abroad is grantable of course, and all considerations of the materiality of the testimony invoked, and the purposes for which it is sought, are to be postponed until the testimony is offered as evidence? Authorities have been cited to sustain the position, that a party has a right to move to dissolve an injunction, and even to renew such motion. This is doubtless true; but the right to make any number of such motions does not alter the nature of the evidence proposed to be offered to sustain them, or fix the propriety of granting the application to take testimony abroad. These are to be controlled by the usages and rules of a court of chancery.

The proviso to the 30th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 90) gives the power to issue a dedimus potestatem according to "common usage." When an application for such process is made to a court of equity, that common usage is to be ascertained by reference to the usages of chancery. One of the fundamental principles which control that court is, that as its object in compelling a discovery, or granting an application for a commission to take testimony abroad, is to enable itself, or some other court, to decide on a matter in dispute between the parties, the discovery or testimony sought must be material to the relief prayed for, or material to be used in some other suit actually instituted or proved to be capable of being instituted in another forum. If, therefore, the party does not show the testimony he seeks is material to enable him to support or defend a suit, he shows no title to what he seeks; and, consequently, if he seeks it by bill a demurrer will lie, if he seeks it by motion he is not entitled to it. Such is the doctrine enunciated by Lord Redesdale (Mitf. Ch. Pl. 192). It is illustrated by decided cases. Daniell in his treatise cites from the case of Shedden v. Baring, 3 Anstr. 880, to sustain the proposition that a bill for discovery or a commission to take testimony abroad must not only show that the action has been brought, but it must show that the facts relied on as to which evidence is sought are such as can be made use of, either in support of the action or in defense of it; otherwise, the bill will not lie. In England the usual mode is to apply by a bill for a discovery and a commission to take testimony abroad, or to take testimony abroad only. "A bill of this kind [says Daniell], for the mere purpose of examining witnesses abroad, is subject to nearly the same rules as bills for discovery in aid of an action at law." Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1096. There can be no stronger proof that an application to take testimony abroad is not matter of course, but is an application to the judicial discretion, than the fact that the ordinary course in England is to apply by bill in equity to obtain it. In Lousada v. Templar, 2 Russ. 561–564, Lord Eldon says "that though the circumstances were such that even if the plaintiff at law had obtained a verdict, he could not allow him to receive the money until it was ascertained what had been done in Peru, yet he would not grant commissions in aid of a defense to an action when he was not satisfied that the facts alleged as a defense would constitute a legal defense to the legal demand." "The court," he added, "ought never to grant a commission without examining strictly what is the state of the pleadings." It is evident from this statement of the lord chancellor, that when after his retirement from office he gave an opinion, as stated by Daniell, that the witnesses' names need not be inserted in the affidavit, he did not intimate they and the other facts were not necessarily made to appear in the pleadings and by other means. In the case of Martin v. Nicolls, 3 Sim. 458, there is a strong illustration of this doctrine. The principle asserted is, that a bill for discovery against a defendant, and a prayer for a commission to take the examination of witnesses, is demurrable. The facts in the case were, that a bill was filed alleging that a judgment had been obtained against complainant in Antigua, on which an action was pending in England against the complainant. It set forth certain facts to show the foreign judgment was void, prayed a discovery against the defendant, and stated that without proof of such facts the complainant could make no defense at law; it prayed also, that a commission might issue to take the testimony of witnesses at Antigua, and other places beyond sea. A demurrer was filed. The court after deciding (correctly or not is not the inquiry), that to the foreign judgment the facts if proved could not constitute a defense, for that reason sustained the demurrer. The chancellor said, "If I were to allow this bill to stand, I should be in effect saying, that the judgment obtained in 'Antigua' may be overruled in the court of common pleas." In the language of the chancellor in that case, this court may say, that if they allow the present application, so far as the evidence as to title goes, that it is in effect to say it has the right to try title. Lord Eldon has said, as we have seen in Lousada v. Templar, 2 Russ. 561, the court ought never to grant a commission without strictly examining the pleadings. This is for the purpose of ascertaining the issue to be tried by the court, and the materiality of the testimony to try it. When we look at the pleadings in this case, we find the relief prayed for is the issue of an injunction to arrest the destruction of property until an adjudication of it has been made by the tribunals to which it has been confided by law. The whole structure of the bill assumes the ground, and upon it asks the relief prayed, that the district court has sole jurisdiction between the parties on the question of title, and that all the power of this court is limited to granting an injunction, and thus extending a relief not within the sphere of the district court. In the answer, a demurrer is incorporated, which assigns as one of its grounds, that it appears from the bill itself, that no other than the district court can entertain jurisdiction of said claim. It has been contended throughout, by the defendants, that this court could not adjudicate upon title, it being within the sole jurisdiction of the district court, and that circumstance assigned as a reason why this court could not entertain jurisdiction of this bill, which asks for the issue of an injunction. The court, by decreeing the relief prayed for, asserted jurisdiction over the injunction, although it disclaimed all power to decide title. They did so, upon the ground that a court of equity would provide for the safety of property in dispute, pending a litigation, and sustained the position by reference to the action of the English chancery in relation to the preservation of property in dispute in the ecclesiastical courts. Now, the pleadings in this case are not changed; the issue is the same; title is no more now in issue in this court than it was; the jurisdiction of this court over this case is in no ways altered, increased, or diminished.

Under these circumstances, application is made to obtain testimony from abroad which relates to the title of defendants, to be used on the trial of this cause, or upon a motion to dissolve the injunction which has been granted. It is the ordinary practice of a court of chancery to dissolve an injunction already issued, after answer filed; and there is no objection to the renewal of such motion upon new and material testimony which would be admissible as evidence on the issue pending between the parties. Indeed, such motion may arise on any new matter which may have arisen since the issuing of the injunction. For instance, the injunction issued in this case has been granted to preserve property, the title of which is pending in another court. This tribunal will watch the conduct of the parties, and continue or dissolve the injunction, as the justice of the case may demand. If the conduct of the complainant be such as to intimate a desire to delay or postpone the trial of the title, this court would, upon motion, dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill. If, on the other hand, the conduct of the complainant be such as evinces a desire to go to prompt trial of the title, the injunction would be continued until the determination of the title by the courts to which it was confided by law. If that determination be in favor of defendants, a dissolution of the injunction would be decreed, and the bill dismissed. If in favor of complainant, it is unnecessary to prejudge the action of the court. But the result must be in one event, to decree a perpetual injunction; and in another, to dissolve the injunction, restoring the parties to their former relative position and respective rights, the court having accomplished its object—the preservation of the property pending the dispute. Whether a perpetual injunction be granted or the bill dismissed, the decree will be final on the only issue of which this court has jurisdiction.

Upon the ground, then, that the court has no jurisdiction to try title, and that it would be the assertion on its part of the right to do so if this application were granted; that the evidence as to title cannot be used in this court,—this tribunal in the exercise of the discretion reposed in it, as controlled by the usages and principles of a court of chancery, is constrained to deny the present motion. But there is another aspect in which this case must be viewed, and which must also control the discretion of the court. Whatever may be the legal effect of the adjudications of the tribunals to whom the question of title is confided by law, upon the rights of third parties, who have conflicting claims to the property disputed, and who were not parties to the proceedings in those tribunals, there can be little doubt, that, as between the claimants under the act of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 631), and the government of the United States, the provisions of that law cannot be disregarded by this court. By that act, congress prescribed the agencies, manner, and conditions on which the government consented to be sued, and through which, in which, and upon which they would surrender the legal title which had become vested in them by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to such as established a better title, in accordance with the provisions of that law. By it, that body delegated to certain special tribunals the adjudication of title, and limited the manner in which they were enabled to act, taking every precaution by the provisions of the law, to guard against fraud and imposture. The power of this court, as one of chancery, to grant injunction, and the application by the United States for such process, gives no additional jurisdiction to this court, nor confers power, beyond that which it has exercised as a court of equity, to preserve the substance of the property. To grant this application, would (to use the language of the chancellor, in Martin v. Nicolls, 3 Sim. 458, as we have seen) be in effect saying, that this court has jurisdiction to try title, and, consequently, to give relief if decided in favor of the defendants.

Was it within the power of congress to pass the act of 3d March, 1851, or is it in conflict with any clause in the constitution of the United States? In the case of West v. Cochran, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 415, the supreme court of the United States enunciate the following principles. "It was also competent for congress to provide, that before a title should be given to any one, the exact limits of his possession, and the title which the United States was to give, should be defined, and that this should be done by such agencies, and in such manner, as might be fixed by congress. This is in entire accordance with the provisions of the treaty, which guarantees to the inhabitants the rights of property secured to them; but it was not intended to provide for the particular modes and instrumentalities by which such rights should be ascertained and enforced,—these being left to the nation to whose powers they were confided; so that the question is, what has congress deemed expedient?"

Now, to ascertain what has been done in this case, we must look to the act of congress passed March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 631), entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the state of California." By it, they have confined exclusively to certain tribunals, the adjudication of title, with specially delegated powers, and which, not being courts of general jurisdiction, can exercise none not expressly granted, or directly and necessarily derived by implication. So far from conferring authority upon them, to send process to a foreign country, to procure testimony, a power exercised by courts of general equity powers, as we have seen with great caution, congress have excluded a conclusion that any such power can exist, by enacting that "no deposition taken by or in behalf of any such claimant, shall be received in any case, whether before the commissioners, or before the district or supreme court of the United States, unless notice of the time and place of taking the same shall have been given in writing to said agent, or to the district-attorney of the proper district, so long before the time of taking the deposition, as to enable him to be present at the time and place of taking the same; and like notice shall be given of the time and place of taking any deposition on the part of the United States." The introduction of this clause into the act, is a clear expression of the determination of congress, when they gave their consent that the government should be sued, that her rights were not to be affected by any deposition or testimony in writing, save such as had been taken in the presence of their agent, or of the district-attorney of the proper district. Now, that clause in the law may have been "gross injustice" or "oppression," and a refusal on the part of the present administration to amend the law, may be an "iniquitous attempt to suppress the means of truth," as zealously urged by one of the solicitors of those who are making this application. Congress may, however, have been impelled by what they deemed legitimate and prudent precaution to shield the rights of the government from the dangers of testimony taken in a foreign country, among a people who had just ceased to be avowed enemies of this country, without the checks and sanctions thrown around the proceeding by the presence of the agent of this government, and by the execution of the commission before an American functionary. The present administration may have been actuated by the same motives in refusing to amend the said act, as has been urged.

The general rule is, however, "that if the motive and design of an act may be traced to an honest and legitimate source, equally as to a corrupt one, the former ought to be preferred." Arredondo's Case, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 716. But with the motives of the government which passed the law, or the present administration which, it is urged, has declined to aid in its repeal, this court has nothing to do. Such legislation, if it be as represented, does not conflict with the constitution of the United States; and the highest tribunal in our country has decided that it is competent for congress to regulate the manner and agencies by which the title of claimants to lands shall be ascertained, and that such legislation does not violate any rights intended to be secured by the treaty. The conclusions to which the court has come, are:

1st. That an application for the appointment of commissioners to take testimony abroad is not grantable of course; but it is addressed to the judicial discretion which is controlled by the usages and rules of chancery practice, in accordance with which the present motion cannot be granted.

2d. The act of 3d March, 1851 (9 Stat. c. 31), cannot be disregarded; and this court ought not to violate the spirit and policy of that act, by granting its process to take testimony abroad, to be used in the trial of title in this cause.

The motion, therefore, must be denied.

Case No. 16,000.

UNITED STATES v. PARSONS.

[2 Blatchf. 104.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April, 1849.

POSTAL LAWS — EMBEZZLEMENT OF LETTER — DELIVERY BY MAIL CARRIER—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. The 22d section of the post-office act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 108), which makes it an offence for any person to open any letter which shall have been in a post-office, or in the custody of a mail-carrier, before it shall be delivered to the person to whom it is directed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, and for any person to secrete, embezzle or destroy any such letter, does not look beyond a possession of letters obtained wrongfully from the post-office or from a mail-carrier.

2. After the voluntary termination of the custody of a letter by the post-office or its agents, the rights of the real proprietor of the letter are under the guardianship of the local law, and not of that of the United States.

3. Where a letter, mailed at Boston and directed to a person at New York, reached the post-office there, and was taken by a letter-carrier for delivery: Held that, under section 41 of the act of July 2, 1836 (5 Stat. 89), such letter-carrier was a mail-carrier within section 22 of the said act of March 3, 1825.

4. But, the letter-carrier having given the letter to a person in the defendant's house, the defendant not being present, and not participating in the delivery, and that person having subsequently and at a different place delivered it to the defendant, and the defendant having opened it and embezzled money from it, it not being intended for him, but for another person of the same name, the letter, however, not having come into the possession of the defendant within view of the letter-carrier, or with his knowledge, or while he remained at the place where he left it: Held, that the defendant was not liable to indictment under section 22 of the said act of March 3, 1825.

[Distinguished in U. S. v. M'Cready, 11 Fed. 227. Cited in Re Burkhardt, 33 Fed. 28.]

5. All action and authority of the post-office department, in respect to the letter, terminated with its delivery to the third person, and section 22 of the act applies only while the letter is within the power and control of that department.

[Cited in U. S. v. Driscoll, Case No. 14,994; U. S. v. M'Cready, 11 Fed. 227; Re Burkhardt, 33 Fed. 28; U. S. v. Safford, 66 Fed. 944.]

6. Whether congress has power to pass laws governing the conduct of persons in respect to letters which have been mailed, after such letters have become strictly disconnected from the post-office department, quære.

The defendant [Charles H. Parsons] was indicted under section 22 of the post-office act of March 3d, 1825 (4 Stat. 108), which provides that any person who shall open any letter or packet which shall have been in a post-office. or in custody of a mail-carrier, before it shall have been delivered to the person to whom it is directed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, or to pry into another's business or secrets, or shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any such mail, letter or packet, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months. At the trial, a special verdict was found by the jury, that a letter was put into the post-office at Boston, directed to Charles H. Parsons, at the city of New York, and containing another letter addressed to Ann M. Parsons; that in the letter were inclosed thirty-three dollars in bank bills; that the mailed letter reached the post-office in New York, was taken by a letter-carrier for delivery, and was given by him to a person in the house of the defendant, the defendant not being present, and not participating in the delivery; that that person subsequently, and at a different place, delivered it to the defendant; that the defendant opened both letters, and embezzled the money enclosed; that the letter addressed to Charles H. Parsons was not intended for the defendant, but for another person bearing the same name; and that the letters did not come into the possession of the defendant within view of the letter-carrier, or with his knowledge, or while he remained at the place where he left them.

Lorenzo B. Shepard, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Alanson Nash, for defendant.

[Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.]

BETTS, District Judge. The facts found by the special verdict are within the letter of the statute. The letters had been in a post-office, and were opened, and their contents embezzled by the defendant, before they had been delivered to the persons to whom they were directed. The special verdict, however, raises the question, whether the intent and proper construction of the 22d section of the post-office act of March 3, 1825, embraces the case.

The 41st section of the act of July 2, 1836 (5 Stat. 89), gives to persons entrusted with the delivery of letters the character of mail-carriers, within the meaning of the 22d section of the act of 1825. Therefore, the letters in question in the present case, while in charge of such letter carrier, are to be regarded as in the post-office, or in the custody of a mail-carrier. What, then, is the true import and force of the phrase, "shall have been in a post-office or in custody of a mail-carrier," and of the phrase, "before it shall have been delivered to the person to whom it is directed"? Are they of unlimited extent, covering every condition of a letter, until it reaches its rightful destination? To give the language this construction, would be to continue letters which had been once in the mail still under the power and control of the federal government, in every change and transfer from person to person and place to place, and without limitation of time. Legislation of such scope and extent would clearly not be in furtherance of the functions and duties of the post-office department, but in protection of the private property of individuals, after it had become detached from that department, and was wholly out of the charge of its agents. Such legislation would thus necessarily take the quality and form of a municipal regulation, governing the relations and responsibilities of individuals to each other, in respect to letters and their contents which had been in the post-office, although not obtained from the post-office or any of its agents, or in the possession of a party through any act of fraud or deceit against the post-office laws. And congress would thus in effect be invested with the power to compel every person into whose possession a letter which had been in the post-office should come, to take upon himself the responsibility of carrying and delivering it to the person to whom it should be directed.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

We think that the object of this 22d section does not look beyond a possession of letters obtained wrongfully from the post-office or from a letter-carrier. Its design is to guard the post-office and its legitimate agents in the execution of their duties, in the safe-keeping and delivery of letters. After the voluntary termination of the custody of a letter by the post-office or its agents, the property in and right of possession to it belong wholly to its real proprietor, and his rights are under the guardianship of the local law, and not of that of the United States.

The delivery of the letter in the present case by the letter-carrier was to a person at the house, as was supposed by both, of the person to whom it was directed. The defendant was not then at the house, and in no way participated in the delivery. The person who received the letter supposed that it belonged to the defendant, and afterwards carried it and delivered it to him at a different place, as being rightfully his. All action and authority of the post-office department, in respect to the letter, terminated with its delivery to that third person; and, in our opinion, it was not intended that the act of congress in question should apply any longer than while the letter should be within the power and control of that department. From that time the law of the state takes authority over it, as the property of one of its citizens.

A question was raised on the argument, as to the power of congress to legislate on the subject indefinitely, and to pass laws governing the conduct of persons in respect to letters which have been mailed, after such letters have become entirely disconnected from the post-office department. But the construction we have given to the act, limiting its operation to letters yet remaining under the authority of the department, renders it unnecessary to consider this question. Judgment for defendant.

Case No. 16,001.

UNITED STATES v. PARSONS et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 726.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

LARCENY — INDICTMENT — OWNERSHIP OF GOODS.

If the goods stolen be charged as the goods of A. B., and if upon evidence, it appears that A. B. was a feme covert, and that the goods were the property of her husband, the court will not instruct the jury to find the prisoners not guilty, if the husband be absent, and not contributing to her support, and she keeping house by herself.

Joseph Parsons, John Callihan, and William Drane were indicted for stealing the goods of Ann Bell. It appeared upon the trial that Ann Bell's husband was temporarily absent seeking employment as a printer elsewhere, and did not contribute to her support; and that she kept house in Washington.

W. L. Brent, for defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they should be satisfied, by the evidence, that Ann Bell was a feme covert, and that the goods stolen were the property of her husband, they should find the prisoners not guilty upon this indictment.

But THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra), refused to give the instruction.

Verdict, "Guilty."

Case No. 16,002.

UNITED STATES v. PARSONS et al.

[1 Lowell, 107.] [2]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept., 1866.

SEAMEN—BOND FOR RETURN OF CREW—ACTION—LOSS OF CONSUL'S CERTIFICATE—EVIDENCE OF CONTENTS.

1. A shipmaster, who is sued on his bond for the safe return of his crew, may give parol evidence of the contents of a consul's certificate, authorizing the discharge of one of the men, on satisfactory proof that such a paper was once in existence and has been lost.

2. Notwithstanding the very sweeping language of section 3 of Act Feb. 28, 1803 [2 Stat. 203], and section 8 of Act July 20, 1840 [5 Stat. 395], requiring masters of American vessels to give bond for the return of all the crew, unless discharged in a foreign country with consent of a consul, &c., yet these sections, construed with the aid of the other parts of those statutes, cannot be held to require a master to return to the United States foreign seamen shipped at their own home, for a particular cruise, ending where it began, and discharged there, according to the terms of their contract, though without the consent of a consul.

3. The consent of a consul could not be rightly withheld in such a case, and there is no law requiring it to be asked.

4. Whether the bond is intended to be given for seamen, even if shipped in the United

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

States, who by the terms of their engagement are entitled to be discharged abroad, quære?

Debt on a bond given by the master of the ship William & Henry, as required by the act of Feb. 28, 1803, § 1 (2 Stat. 203), for the return to the United States of the company of the ship. The ship sailed from New Bedford, in 1860, on a whaling voyage to and in the Pacific Ocean, in the course of which the defendant William C. Parsons was deprived of his command by the owners, and came home, and the vessel was brought back by another master, who failed to produce to the boarding-officer five of the original crew, and five persons, not shown to be citizens of the United States and not shipping as such, who had shipped at Tombas, in Peru, for a whaling cruise which by its terms ended at Tombas, where they were discharged in accordance with their contract. As to none of these persons was there any consular certificate. By consent of parties the case was submitted to the court, without a jury. There was evidence that of the crew shipped at New Bedford, three had deserted, one had died, and one had been discharged by Captain Parsons, with the consent of the consul, to whom the three months' extra wages had been paid, and a fee for his certificate.

W. A. Field, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
E. L. Barney, for defendants.

LOWELL, District Judge. This master had no opportunity to comply with the literal tenor of his bond by exhibiting his crew to the boarding-officer, nor his consular certificates or satisfactory evidence of the death and desertion of certain of the men to the collector of New Bedford, because he was not permitted to bring the ship home, but came before the ship arrived, and without any of her papers. I cannot say that he is exonerated from his obligation under the bond by his discharge abroad, so far as his own acts or neglects are concerned; but he may now produce the evidence, which, if he had remained on board the ship, he should have given to the revenue officers. So far as four of the men shipped at home are concerned, the evidence is satisfactory that one died and three deserted. For the fifth he should have a consular certificate, and it has been held, that no other evidence of the consul's consent is admissible. U. S. v. Hatch [Case No. 15,325]. But the case here is, that such a certificate was paid for and promised, and, I may well presume, it was given. No case has decided that the contents of a lost certificate cannot be proved by parol; it is the consul's consent which cannot be so proved; and as Captain Parsons has not had the custody of the papers, and his successor may not have had his attention called to this man's discharge, it is not improbable that the papers may have been mislaid in the consul's office or on board ship.

The persons who were shipped for an intermediate off-shore cruise, and were discharged when their time was out, seem to be within the letter of the statutes of 1803, § 1 (2 Stat. 203), and of 1840, § 8 (5 Stat. 395); which require a bond to be given for the return of all the crew, including those shipped in a foreign port. And yet, it can hardly have been the intent of congress that foreigners, shipped in their own country, for a distinct voyage or part of a voyage, ending where it began, should be brought to the United States, unless some consul should consent to their discharge. Certainly, no consul would have any right to dissent in a case of that kind, and I know of no possible advantage which would accrue to such seamen by being discharged before a consul. Undoubtedly, such men are American seamen, within the protection of our laws, and can call on the consul to redress their grievances. Matthews v. Offley [Case No. 9,290]. But supposing them to have no cause of complaint, I do not know that they are deemed incapable of settling their own affairs with the master. The act of 1840, § 9 (5 Stat. 395), authorizes a consul to discharge any mariner who shall complain to him that the voyage is continued contrary to his agreement, or that he has fulfilled his contract; and if upon the face of the articles the consul finds the complaint to be well founded, he shall then require an advance of three months' pay, as provided by the act of 1803, unless he shall be satisfied that the contract has expired or the voyage been protracted by circumstances beyond the control of the master, and without any design on his part to violate the articles of shipment, in which case he may discharge the mariner without requiring the three months' additional pay. This statute seems to imply that, where the contract has expired, it is the first duty of the master to discharge the man, and that it is only when he fails to do so that the consul is to be applied to, and then the fact that the man has not already been discharged is prima facie evidence against the master on the question of additional pay.

It has never been decided that the bond must be given for seamen who, by the very terms of their contract, are to be discharged abroad. Such agreements may be rare, and may have been overlooked. The act of April 14, 1792, § 8 (1 Stat. 256), required the master of an American ship, which was sold in a foreign port, to send his crew back to the state where they entered on board, "unless the crew are liable by their contract, or do consent to be discharged" at the foreign port. The act of 1803 (section 3), provides for paying the consul three months' extra pay, for each man, when a ship shall be sold in a foreign country, and her company discharged, or when a seaman or mariner, a citizen of the United States, shall, with his own consent, be discharged in a foreign country. This act is silent concerning seamen who by their contract are liable to be discharged in a foreign country, though they are mentioned in the act of 1840, already cited. The words of the bond and of the statute establishing it, are more extensive, requiring the master to bring home all seamen who have not died, &c., or been discharged with the consent of a consul. Taking the whole law together, it seems reasonable to understand it as meaning that all those shall be brought home, who by their contract are entitled to be brought home, unless, &c. I cannot readily believe that the intent of the law is, that men who have freely, and for reasons satisfactory to themselves, agreed on a month's voyage, to end abroad, are to be paid three months' wages, and that the United States is to be paid for still another month, unless the consul shall remit it. And until 1840 the consul had no power to remit. It may be argued, that the policy of the legislature is to discourage the discharge of our seamen in foreign countries, and to guard the United States against the expenses of their support.

However this may be with citizens, or those who appear as such on the crew list, foreigners shipping abroad as such, and domiciled there, are never entitled to the extra pay, and the United States are not liable for their support; and there is no reason, as I have said, why the consul should be formally applied to to ratify their necessary discharge, unless they choose to invoke his power on account of some failure by the master to carry out the contract. Notwithstanding the very sweeping language of the statutes concerning the bond, I hold that it does not require the master to return to this country foreigners who ship in their own home for an intermediate cruise, which ends where it began; or if it does, that the condition is satisfied by their discharge at their home, in compliance with the very terms of their engagement, though without the consent of a consul. Such being the case here, there must be judgment for the defendants.

Case No. 16,003.

UNITED STATES v. The PARYNTHA DAVIS.

[1 Cliff. 532.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct. Term, 1860.[2]

SHIPPING—FISHING VESSELS—BREACH OF LICENSE—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. A libel under the thirty-second section of the act of February 28, 1793 (1 Stat. 316), need not specify the particular trade in which the vessel was engaged at the time of the seizure; it is sufficient, as a general rule, to bring the case within the words of the act of congress.

2. Where a vessel was libelled for forfeiture for breach of a license to catch codfish, by catching mackerel at a certain time and place, held, that parol evidence might be given of her catching mackerel at other times and places during the trip, as showing the real business of the voyage.

3. A fishing-vessel licensed to catch codfish cannot catch mackerel, except as bait or provision for the crew; and this incidental privilege ought to be exercised fairly and in good faith.

[Cited in The Grace Darling, Case No. 5,651.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

This was a libel of seizure against the schooner Paryntha Davis for a forfeiture, resulting from an alleged illegal employment of the vessel. The libel set forth that the schooner was regularly seized at Portland on the 12th of October, 1857, and that prior to the seizure she was a vessel of the United States, duly enrolled and licensed to carry on the cod-fishery, and that, being so licensed, was then and there employed in a trade other than that for which she was licensed. At the hearing it appeared that the schooner, on March 27, 1857, took out a license in the collection district of Barnestable, in the state of Massachusetts, for carrying on the cod-fishery, and was employed under that license until July 23d, when the license was surrendered and one taken out for the mackerel-fishery. The schooner held her mackerel license until September 22d, when she again surrendered it and took out a cod-fishing license. The schooner sailed from Wellfleet, September 24, 1857, and was seized October 11th at Hogg Island Roads, in Portland Harbor. When seized, she was at anchor by the side of another fishing-schooner, and had mackerel-lines all around the waist. Some fifteen or twenty barrels of mackerel were found on board, and also twenty empty mackerel-barrels. Mackerel recently caught were found in wash-barrels on the deck, and there were about fifteen barrels of salt on board. The hawser and chain cable of the vessel were not such as are suitable for deep-sea fishing. No codfish were seen on board, except a few dried or pickled, apparently having been caught more than a month. The first day the boarding officers went on board no cod-lines were discovered, but on a second visit they were shown some which were brought on deck by the crew, but the lines were without sinkers. The barrels containing the mackerel were stowed away on the bilge. There were porgies for floating bait, and a mill for preparing them. Inquiry from the master and others on board the schooner elicited that they were "catching anything that came along." It was in testimony that there was a complement of cod-lines on the vessel, and everything necessary for preserving the fish when caught. The testimony showed that during a course of several days more mackerel than codfish had been caught, although several attempts had been made at various places. It was set up that the mackerel were caught to be used for bait, although it did not appear that they were used for such purpose. Several barrels of mackerel were caught at different times, but no codfish of any amount. It was shown in evidence that a portion, at least, of the mackerel were split and corned. The vessel was on her trip some sixteen or seventeen days, at the end of which, returning to Portland for water, she was seized. Nine days afterwards she was delivered to the claimants, upon giving a bond in the usual form, shortly after which she took a license for the mackerel-fishery. The district judge was of opinion that the vessel was employed, if not exclusively, at least in part, in taking mackerel, not for bait or consumption by the crew, but as the proper business of the voyage. [Case No. 16,004.]

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming Case No. 16,004.]

B. F. Hallett, for claimants.

The information is insufficient, because it does not set out what other trade, and, though in the words of the statute, is uncertain where it should be specific. Dunl. Adm. Prac. 431; The Merino, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 391. The libel having alleged a specific time and place, "then and there" when the vessel was so employed, the libellants can give no evidence except of employment at that time and place. Macomber v. Thompson [Case No. 8,919]. To work a forfeiture under the thirty-second section of the act of 1793, the vessel must have abandoned her employment in the cod-fishery and engaged in some other. The catching of mackerel is not a trade separate from fisheries, because the act of 1793 (section 4) speaks of licensing vessels for the coasting trade and other fisheries. U. S. v. The Reindeer [Case No. 16,145]. The court will require the most determinate evidence that the mackerel-fishery was intentionally and exclusively carried on. The Harriet [Id. 6,099]. The decisions bearing on this case are The Active, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100; The Two Friends [Case No. 14,289]; The Eliza [Id. 4,346]; The Swallow [Id. 13,666]. The intent is no part of the evidence for or against condemnation. The law does not punish the intention to defraud the revenue; there must be an unlawful act. U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 311.

G. F. Shepley, U. S. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

The cod-fishery and the mackerel-fishery are severally "trades" within the legal meaning of the act of 1793, and each is a distinct trade from the other. The Harriet [Case No. 6,099]; The Nymph [Id. 10,389]; The Active, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100; The Eliza [Case No. 4,346]; 4 Stat. 312; 5 Stat. 16.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Forfeiture of the vessel is claimed under the thirty-second section of the act of the 18th of February, 1793. Omitting all such parts of the section as are inapplicable to this case, it provides, in effect, that if any licensed ship or vessel shall be employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo found on board her, shall be forfeited. 1 Stat. 316. As shown by the proofs, she was engaged in the mackerel-fishery, and it is insisted, on behalf of the United States, that the mackerel-fishery is an employment other than that for which she is licensed, within the meaning of the act of congress upon which the proceeding is founded. But it is objected by the appellants that the allegations of the libel are insufficient to support a decree of forfeiture, because it does not specify the particular trade in which the schooner was engaged at the time of the seizure. But it is quite obvious that the objection cannot be sustained. Technical rules of pleading are not so much regarded in libels of this description as in indictments and informations at common law. Where there are no technical words or phrases employed in the prohibition of the statute, it is sufficient, as a general rule, to bring the case within the words of the act of congress on which the information is founded. Repeated decisions have established that rule of pleading in cases of this description, and it is undoubtedly correct. The Samuel, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 9; The Hoppet, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 389; The Merino, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 401. No such objection was taken in the district court, and I am of the opinion it cannot prevail, especially after appearance and answer to the merits.

Looking at the testimony of the claimants alone, it would not be possible to hold that the crew were in good faith pursuing the business for which the schooner was licensed, and, when taken in connection with the testimony of the boarding officers, it clearly shows that the conclusion reached by the district court was correct. But it is insisted by the claimants that none of the parol evidence was admissible, except that offered to prove what the employment of the vessel was at the time and place as alleged in the libel. Two answers may be given to that objection, either of which is sufficient to show that it cannot be sustained: 1. All the evidence in the case as to what was done during the trip was introduced by the claimants, and clearly they cannot now object to testimony introduced in their own behalf. 2. Another answer, however, may be given to the objection, which perhaps will be more satisfactory; and that is, that the testimony would have been admissible if it had been offered by the government and seasonably objected to by the claimants.

As alleged in the libel, the charge is, that, prior to the seizure, to wit, at Portland on the 10th of October, 1857, the schooner was a vessel of the United States, duly enrolled and licensed to be employed in carrying on the cod-fishery, and that she was then and there employed in a trade other than that for which she was licensed. Whether that charge is true or not depends upon what had been done during the trip, and obviously evidence to show what had been done was admissible to make out the charge or to establish the defence. Unless the rule was so, it might be impossible to administer justice, as any evidence that could be offered as to what had been done on a given day might, and in all probability would, be unsatisfactory. Correct pleading requires that time and place should be specifically alleged, and if prior acts during the same trip should be held to be inadmissible, great injustice might be done. Without stopping to cite authorities to this point, suffice it to say that I am clearly of the opinion that on principle the objection is without merit. Lastly, it is insisted by the claimants that the catching of mackerel is not a trade other than that for which the schooner was licensed. It is a sufficient answer to this objection, to say that the rule of law as understood in this court is settled otherwise. Judge Ware held, in the case of The Nymph [Case No. 10,389], that since the act of the 24th of May, 1828, a vessel licensed for the cod-fishery is not authorized by her license to engage in the mackerel-fishery, because that act requires a distinct license for that business. 4 Stat. 312. That case was appealed to the circuit court, and after a very deliberate consideration, the decree of the district court was affirmed. Until the mackerel-fishery was, by the act of congress, separated into a distinct employment, says Judge Story in a later case, it was frequently carried on in common with, and as an incident to, the cod-fisheries; and he adds, somewhat unguardedly, that no one can now doubt that mackerel may still be caught in the cod-fisheries, if it be not so pursued as to supersede the principal employment, but is a mere accessory or incidental business. While it must be admitted that the closing paragraph of the sentence is rather broader than the rule laid down in the previous case, still it must be weighed in connection with the residue of the opinion, and, when so read and understood, the two opinions are entirely consistent. The Harriet [Case No. 6,099].

Undoubtedly a vessel licensed for the cod-fishery may take mackerel for bait and for consumption by the crew, as provisions during the trip; and as fresh mackerel make the best bait, the crew may take them as frequently and in such quantities as it may be reasonably necessary for them to do for those purposes; and where it appears that they pursued the proper business for which the vessel was licensed, in good faith, and on the return of the vessel, or at the time of her seizure, have only such quantity of mackerel on hand as may reasonably be inferred from the circumstances to have been taken in the fair exercise of that legitimate right, the law does not authorize the forfeiture of the vessel because there happens to be some excess. They must pursue the proper business for which the vessel is licensed, and in exercising the incidental right of taking mackerel for bait and for consumption by the crew, they must act reasonably and in good faith. Such in effect is the rule laid down by the two learned judges in the cases already cited, and I am of the opinion that it is correct. Reference is made by the counsel of the claimants to the case of The Reindeer [Id. 16,145], as asserting a more liberal doctrine, and it cannot be denied that there are some expressions to be found in that opinion which afford some countenance to the argument. But it does not purport to overrule the prior decisions upon the subject, and until the question is revised by the supreme court, I consider myself at liberty to adopt the earlier and, as I think, the better construction of the act of congress. The decree of the district court is therefore affirmed with costs.

Case No. 16,004.

UNITED STATES v. The PARYNTHA DAVIS.

[3 Ware, 159.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. July, 1858.[2]

SHIPPING—COD FISHERIES—BREACH OF LICENSE—TAKING MACKEREL.

1. The fishing business is a trade within the meaning of the license act of Feb. 18, 1793 [1 Stat. 305]. The meaning of the word "trade" in the act, is equivalent to "employment," and every act of trade beyond the scope of the license subjects the vessel to forfeiture under the 32d section of the act.

2. Since the act of May, 1828 [4 Stat. 312], authorizing a special license for the mackerel fishery, that is a trade distinct from the cod fishery.

3. A vessel with a cod-fishing license may take mackerel for bait, or for the consumption of the crew, but if she engages in this fishery as a business, she is liable to forfeiture.

In admiralty.

Mr. Shepley, U. S. Dist. Atty.

B. F. Hallett, for claimants.

WARE, District Judge. This was a libel in rem for a forfeiture. The schooner was regularly licensed on the 22d of September, 1857, in the collection district of Barnstable, in Massachusetts, for carrying on the cod fisheries, and on the 11th of October was seized, while lying in Hog Island Roads, in Portland, where she had gone to make a harbor, and for water, on a charge of being engaged in a trade other than that for which she was licensed. It was proved at the hearing, that the schooner took out a cod-fishing license the 27th of March, and was employed under that till the 23d of July, when it was surrendered, and a license taken for the mackerel fishery. This was held until the 22d of September, when it was surrendered and another license for the cod fisheries taken. It was while she held this license that she was seized on the 11th of October. The schooner sailed from Wellfleet on the 22d of September, completely equipped for the cod fishery, as is stated by the witnesses for the claimants, and as appears from other testimony, as well prepared for the mackerel fishery; and after stopping at Townsend over Friday night, sailed for the east Saturday morning. She tried for cod on the way, but took none, and went into Wellfleet Saturday night and lay there over Sunday. Monday she went to Long Island and remained there and in the waters about there about three days, trying for cod, but took very few, but she took two or three barrels of mackerel for bait. Thursday she went west without fishing, and stopped at Fox Island at night. There she was detained by the state of the weather the next day. Saturday she continued her westward course, and once in the forenoon and once in the afternoon tried the codfish, but found none. While fishing for cod a school of mackerel came to the top of the water, and three or four barrels were taken for bait. At night they went into Townsend and remained there over Sunday. Monday she went out and tried for cod about Damariscotta, but caught not more than half a dozen, and left for Seguin, and she caught a barrel of mackerel for bait. Leaving Seguin Tuesday they were off Portland trying for cod without taking more than half a dozen, but they took half a barrel of mackerel. They remained on this fishing-ground, fishing for codfish in the day time, and lying to at night. They got very few cod, but one day took three or four wash-barrels of mackerel. While they were seeking for cod, mackerel from time to time came to the surface of the water, and then a few were taken for bait. Saturday two or three codfish were taken, and three or four barrels of mackerel. Saturday evening they went to Portland for a harbor and a supply of water. Sunday morning the vessel was visited by the boat of the revenue cutter Caleb Cushing, and on an examination of the schooner her license was taken away, and Monday the vessel was seized. Such, in substance, is the account, given by Lombard, one of the crew, of the vessel's employment from the time that she took out her license in September, until she was seized on the 11th of October. The depositions of two others of the crew were produced at the hearing, but their statements do not materially vary from that of Lombard.

[1] [Reported by George F. Emery, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 16,003.]

The allegation in the libel on which a forfeiture is claimed, is founded on the 32d section of the act of February, 1793, commonly called the "License Act." The act provides generally for the licensing and regulating of vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and the section mentioned has a provision that if any licensed vessel shall be "employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, she shall be forfeited." At the time of the passage of this act, and down to the year 1828, the law provided but two forms of fishing licenses, one for the cod and the other for the whale fisheries. All the bank and coast fisheries were carried on under a cod-fishing license. But by that time the mackerel fishery had grown up to an important branch of business, and a special license was provided for that trade. A case arose in this district soon after the passage of the act of 1828, which involved the consideration of the construction and effect of that law. In that case it was held that the fishing business was a trade within the true intent and meaning of the 32d section of the license act of 1793. And that since the act of 1828, providing a special license for the mackerel fishery, that by itself constituted in a legal sense a trade separate and distinct from cod fishing, and required a special license to protect the vessel from the penalty of the law, and that when a vessel under a cod-fishing license engaged in the mackerel fishery as a business, she was employed in another trade than that for which she was licensed, and thereby became liable to forfeiture. That case was carried by appeal to the circuit court, and the decision was then affirmed, and it has been considered as settling the law on this subject. The Nymph [Cases Nos. 10,388 and 10,389]. Some doubt was indeed thrown over the doctrine of that case by the subsequent case of The Reindeer [Id. 16,145]. A doubt was then suggested, whether, as the cod and mackerel fishing business were both of the same generic nature, they could properly be considered as distinct and different trades. But it was expressly added by the court, that it was not its intention to overrule the case of The Nymph [supra]. The Nymph was under a cod-fishing license, and it was shown by the evidence that about one-half of her time she had employed in cod fishing, and the other half in taking mackerel. It was a case of mixed employment. But it is well-settled by a series of decisions, that any engagement in an unauthorized trade, any employment of the vessel beyond the scope of her license, works a forfeiture. The Active, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100, was the case of a vessel under a fishing license, which was loaded in the night, had left the wharf without a clearance, under circumstances which justified the belief that she was intended for a foreign voyage, and for this she was seized and adjudged to be forfeited. See, also, U. S. v. The Mars [Case No. 15,723]; The Eliza [Id. 4,346]; The Julia [Id. 7,574].

The only question then open in this case, is one of fact. The schooner was under a cod-fishing license, and did she, on her trip commencing Sept. 24th and ending Oct. 11th, engage in the mackerel fishery as a business, or trade, or was she engaged in a mixed business of cod and mackerel fishing? In either case she is liable to forfeiture. I do not ascribe so much importance to the fact that when taken she had a complete outfit for taking mackerel, for this reason. Her cod-fishing license authorized her to pursue that business in the customary manner, and for that purpose she must have her supply of bait and provisions for the crew, or obtain them in the course of the cruise. And it is the well-known custom of the trade, for vessels in the cod-fishery to supply themselves, in the season of mackerel, with this fish for bait, the fresh mackerel being found to be the best bait for cod. It is also an equally well-known custom for the crew to live, in part at least, on fresh fish. It is not, therefore, a circumstance of suspicion that she had mackerel lines aboard, nor perhaps that she had a full supply for a regular mackerel voyage, as her last trip had been in that fishery. To take mackerel for bait, or for the consumption of the crew, was no violation of the license. The instructions of the treasury department authorize this to be done, and these instructions are in conformity with the previous decisions of the courts. And if, in the course of the trip, it should so happen that somewhat more of mackerel are taken than are consumed in this way, it would be a harsh construction of the law to require the crew to throw overboard a small surplus that may remain, or expose their vessel to forfeiture, provided the cruise had been fairly and in good faith devoted to cod fishery.

The manner in which the crew were employed during the cruise has already been stated from the depositions of three of their number. Part of the time they were employed in fishing for cod, and part of the time in taking mackerel, as the witnesses state, for bait. The proceeds or result of that employment, was shown by the fish found on board the schooner, when she was seized. There was not a single cod found, but there were at least fifteen barrels of mackerel, if not more, for they were not counted. A small part of them were on deck in open wash-barrels, but the greater part were pickled, barreled up, and stowed under deck, as they would be if intended for the market, and not for bait. The cod-lines were put away, but the gear for mackerel-fishery were all rigged and ready for use. On this evidence I find it difficult to be persuaded that the crew had truly, and in good faith, employed themselves in cod-fishing as their exclusive business, and that no part of their time had been occupied in taking mackerel except for bait. I agree with what was said by the court in the case of the Reindeer, that the fishermen are to be considered with indulgence, and even with kindness. They are a hardy, industrious, careful, and highly meritorious class of men at all times, and invaluable to the country in the times of her greatest need. But there must be limits to this indulgence, and courts of justice are bound to execute the laws.

The unfavorable inferences which not unnaturally follow from the testimony of the claimants, are strengthened and fortified by the evidence offered by the government, of what took place at the time of the seizure. When the skipper was asked how it happened, that being under a cod-fishing license, he had mackerel and not cod, what was the object of his voyage, he answered that it was to take any kind of fish that came in his way, and that he had taken mackerel as he had a right to do. His previous trip had been under a mackerel license, and under that he was authorized by the act of 1836, c. 55, 5 [Stat. 16], to take all kinds of fish. But no such liberty is allowed under a cod license. The reason of the difference is, that the mackerel fishery is encouraged by a drawback of the duty on the salt used, but in the cod fishery, as a substitute for this, a direct bounty is paid for the time employed in proportion to the tonnage of the vessel.

My opinion on the whole evidence is, that this vessel was employed, if not exclusively, at least in part, in taking mackerel, not for bait, or for the ship's use, but as the proper business, in the whole or in part, of the voyage, and that consequently she is liable to forfeiture.

This case was appealed to the circuit court, and there the decree of the district court was affirmed at September term, 1860. [Case No. 16,003.]

Case No. 16,005.

UNITED STATES v. PASSMORE.

[4 Dall. 372.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1804.

REPEAL OF ACT—EFFECT.

[The repeal of the bankrupt law of 1800 was a bar to a criminal proceeding under that law.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Finlay, Case No. 15,099.]

The defendant, who had become bankrupt, was prosecuted by indictment, containing two counts, for perjury, in swearing before the commissioners, on the 20th day of September, 1803, that he "could not tell exactly the time, but believed it was the latter (end) of 1799, that he first owned the brig Abigail. He ceased to own her, he rather thought, in the year 1800," when in truth and in fact he never did own her, but had covered the property for an alien under his name. He had before sworn, at the custom-house (on the 31st of July, 1799) that he "was the true and only owner of the brig Abigail; that there was no subject, nor citizen, of any foreign prince, or state, directly or indirectly, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, interested therein, or in the profits or issues thereof:" but no information tending to falsify this oath, was received, until a prosecution was barred by the act of limitation. 1 Stat. 119, § 32.[2] On the 19th of December, 1803 (7 Laws [published by authority] 14 [2 Stat. 248]) an act of congress was passed, enacting, "that the act of congress, passed on the 4th day of April 1800 [2 Stat. 19], entitled 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy, throughout the United States,' shall be and the same is hereby repealed. Provided nevertheless, that the repeal of the said act shall in no wise affect the execution of any commission of bankruptcy, which may have been issued prior to the passing of this act, but every such commission shall be proceeded on, and fully executed, as though this act had not passed."

[1] [Reported by A. J. Dallas, Esq.]

The facts being laid before the jury, Rawle and Dickerson, made a defence, principally, upon two grounds: 1st. That the defendant was not guilty, upon the merits. 2d. That the oath, charged to be false, was taken before the repeal of the bankrupt law; and, in consequence of the repeal, could not be the subject of a prosecution, either under the bankrupt law, under the general penal law, or at common law.[3] On the first ground they cited 4 Bl. Comm. 136; 1 Bl. Comm. 60; 1 Hawk. P. C. 331; 2 Hawk. P. C. 84; Cro. Car. 852; Cro. Eliz. 148; 1 Salk. 374; Bankr. Law, § 18; 2 Esp. 281; 1 McNal. Ev. 3; 1 Ld. Raym. 396; 1 Hale, P. C. 706; 2 Salk. 513; 10 Mod. 335; Cro. Jac. 644; 3 Mod. 78; 2 Ld. Raym. 991; 1 Burrows, 543; 4 Burrows, 2026; Cowp. 297; Leach, C. L. 252, 268; Bankr. Law, §§ 15, 21, 51; 4 Laws (Folwell's Ed., Acts Cong.) 427, § 88 [1 Stat. 695]; 3 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 337 [1 Stat. 477]; 2 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 30; 2 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 21 [1 Stat. 229]; 4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 102, § 2 [1 Stat. 554]; 2 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 157, 193 [1 Stat. 287, 305]. And on the second ground they cited 1 W. Bl. 451; 1 Hale, P. C. 291, 525; 1 Hawk. P. C. 306; 4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 523, 202 [1 Stat. 596].

Mr. Dallas (the district attorney) submitted to the court three propositions: First. That, notwithstanding the repealing act, the perjury charged was indictable, according to the first count of the indictment, under the bankrupt law, as an incident to the execution of the commission. 5 Laws [Smith's Ed.] 61, § 21 [2 Stat. 27]; 6 Bac. Abr. 384, 390; 2 Leach, 810; Co. Litt. B. L. 7; 5 Geo. II. c. 30, § 44; 6 Laws [published by authority] 93, 95, § 14 [2 Stat. 156, 164]; 5 Laws [Smith's Ed.] 238; 1 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 113, § 32 [1 Stat. 119]; 2 Hawk. P. C. 87, c. 69, § 4; 6 Laws [published by authority] 80, § 5 [2 Stat. 153]; 3 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 163; 6 Laws [published by authority] 58, § 1 [1 Stat. 148]; 1 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 327, § 46 [1 Stat. 199]; 3 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 97 [1 Stat. 381]; 3 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 334 [1 Stat. 561]; 3 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 88 [1 Stat. 331]; 1 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 236 [1 Stat. 145]; 4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 446, § 112 [1 Stat. 704]; 4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 427 [1 Stat. 627]; 1 Hawk. P. C. 306; Brooke, Abr. 203; 1 Hale, P. C. 291, 525; 2 Hale, P. C. 190. Second. That the perjury charged, was indictable according to the second count of the indictment, independent of the bankrupt law, upon the general penal act (1 Laws [Smith's Ed.] 103 [1 Stat. 112]), inasmuch as the provisions of the bankrupt law, do not create the offence; are affirmative and not repugnant; and, with respect to the punishment, are cumulative. Cowp. 297; 2 Hale, P. C. 705; 4 Burrows, 2026; 23 Geo. II. c. 13; Leach, 253; 1 Hawk. P. C. 306, bk. 1, c. 40, § 5; Leach, 715; 2 Hale, P. C. 191, 2. And, third, that according to the opinions of some of the judges of the supreme court, (3) the perjury charged, was indictable at common law; and, in that case, the conclusion of the indictment, "against the form of the statute," was to be regarded as surplusage. 2 Hawk. P. C. 83; U. S. v. Ravara [Case No. 16,122]; William's Case, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 82, in note; U. S. v. Worrall [Case No. 16,766].

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the charge of the court at large, upon the points of law; but cautiously abstained from giving any opinion upon the facts. He considered the repealing act, as an absolute bar to the prosecution; and told the jury, expressly, that the defendant was, on that ground alone, independent of any question upon the merits, entitled to an acquittal.

On this charge, the jury immediately found a verdict of not guilty.

---

[2] In consequence of this, and other similar cases, occurring at the custom house, the time allowed for prosecuting offences under the revenue laws, was enlarged. 7 Laws [pub. by authority], 126.

[3] Before the jury were sworn, Rawle said, that, although he did not mean to move to quash the indictment, he should propose, under the sanction of the court, that the question of law, arising upon the repealing act, should be discussed, as soon as the jury were sworn, and before any evidence was produced. The attorney of the district objected to the novelty of such a proceeding. And by the Court: The trial must proceed in the usual course. The evidence and law must both be laid before the jury, who will then give a verdict, under the charge of the court. If the verdict should be against the defendant, his counsel may move the point of law in arrest of judgment.

Case No. 16,006.

UNITED STATES v. PATRICK.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 66.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1812.

RAPE BY SLAVE.

An attempt, by a slave, to ravish a white woman is punishable by death.

The defendant, a slave, was convicted of an attempt to ravish a white woman. The indictment was under the act of assembly of Maryland, 1751, c. 14, § 2.

Judgment of death was entered on the 30th of January, 1813, and executed on the 11th of March. The slave was valued by the court at 400 dollars, according to the 7th section of the act.

Case No. 16,007.

UNITED STATES v. PATTEN et al.

[Holmes, 421.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept., 1874.

SHIPPING—"COASTWISE" AND "FOREIGN" TRADE—DUTIES ON MATERIALS FOR REPAIRS.

1. The term "foreign trade" as used in the tenth section of the act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 238), includes trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States.

2. The term "coastwise trade," as used in that section, does not include trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States.

3. An American vessel previously engaged exclusively in foreign trade, was repaired in Boston, and thence sailed in ballast, via New York, to San Francisco for a cargo to Europe, and thereafter was engaged exclusively in foreign trade. In an action by the United States to recover duties on articles of foreign production withdrawn from the United States bonded warehouse in Boston under the tenth section of the act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 238), and used in the repairing, held, that the vessel was engaged exclusively in "foreign trade," and had not by the voyage to San Francisco engaged in "coastwise trade" within the meaning of those terms as used in that section; and that the articles withdrawn from bond and used in the repairing were exempt from duty.

[Cited in Russell v. U. S., Case No. 12,164.]

Action at law [against Jarvis Patten and others] to recover duties on materials used in the repair of the ship Matterhorn. The case was heard by the court on an agreed statement of facts, the material parts of which are stated in the opinion.

Nathan Webb, for plaintiff.

A. P. Gould, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The ship Matterhorn was built at Bath, in the district of Maine, in the year 1866. She was exclusively engaged in foreign trade after her first voyage from Bath to New Orleans in September, 1866, until her arrival in Boston from Calcutta in the fall of 1872. In October, 1872, she was repaired, and for the purpose of repairing her copper a quantity of yellow metal and composition nails were withdrawn from the bonded warehouse in Boston as free of duty, and used in the repair of the ship. The ship then sailed in ballast via New York to San Francisco for the purpose of obtaining a grain freight to Europe. With a cargo of grain the ship sailed from San Francisco to Havre, thence to New Orleans, thence to Antwerp, thence to Cardiff, and thence to Rio Janeiro, during which voyage this action was commenced. The action is brought to recover the duties on the yellow metal and composition nails, on the ground that the defendants, by sending the ship from New York to San Francisco, had engaged in the coasting trade for more than two months in one year, and thus rendered themselves liable for the duties on which a rebate had been allowed; and on the further ground, that the vessel was not exclusively engaged in the foreign trade.

The tenth section of the act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 238), provides: "That from and after the passage of this act all lumber, &c., and copper and composition metal, which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, and finished after the passage of this act, may be imported in bond under such regulations as the secretary of the treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been used for the purpose aforesaid, no duties shall be paid thereon: provided, that vessels receiving the benefits of this section shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States more than two months in any one year, except upon the payment to the United States of the duties on which a rebate is hereby allowed: and provided further, that all articles of foreign production needed for the repair of American vessels engaged exclusively in foreign trade may be withdrawn from bonded warehouses free of duty under such regulations as the secretary of the treasury may prescribe."

The first clause in the section relates to certain materials used in the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States and finished after the passage of the act for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade; and for the purposes of that clause in the section it defines the term "foreign trade" as "including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States." Materials described in the statute used for the construction and equipment of such vessels may be withdrawn from bond free of duty.

It is well known that vessels engaged in the foreign trade frequently sail from the ports of the United States in which they are built and registered to other ports in the United States to obtain a freight for a foreign port. This is the case with freighting ships built in Northern ports and sailing in ballast to Southern ports for a cargo of cotton. It is well known that such vessels, having discharged their cargo of cotton or grain in foreign ports, seldom return directly to the ports from which they sailed, but frequently take return cargoes of merchandise to New York or other ports, into which the importations are much greater. The result is that vessels engaged in the foreign trade must necessarily sail also very frequently between those ports in the United States where they discharge their foreign cargoes and the other ports from which they load for foreign ports. They must necessarily (unless they go in ballast, and perhaps even then) be engaged during some portion of the year in the coastwise trade. In view of this necessity, and in view of the fact that the benefits of the statute were only intended to encourage and revive the foreign carrying trade in American ships, the first proviso in the statute fixed the period of two months in any one year as the limit of time during which the ship could engage in the coastwise trade without being subject to the payment of the duties on which the rebate is allowed. This, it was evidently supposed, would cover the time during any year in which the vessel employed in the foreign trade would find it necessary to trade between any two or more home ports. But as no vessel could sail from an Atlantic to a Pacific port of the United States in two months, it is clear that if on making such a voyage the terms of the proviso would compel a payment of the duties, the proviso would nullify that part of the first clause which included the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States in the words "foreign trade." Such a construction would be repugnant to common sense and every established rule for the construction of statutes. The "foreign trade" in the first clause includes the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The coastwise trade in the first proviso as clearly excludes those ports. The term "foreign trade" in the first clause is used in a sense broader, and the term "coastwise trade" in the first proviso in a sense narrower, than the literal meaning of those terms. The terms "foreign trade" are then indisputably defined for the purposes of this section, as including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States. The second proviso relates to articles of foreign production needed for the repair of American vessels engaged exclusively in foreign trade. Foreign trade has been already defined in the same section, and it was not necessary to repeat the definition in the subsequent clauses. It is clear that the foreign trade in the second proviso is the same foreign trade as that which is distinguished from coastwise trade in the first clause and in the first proviso. It includes the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States. Great stress is laid on the word "exclusively" in this proviso. The proviso only extends the benefit of exemption from duty to articles needed for the repair of American vessels engaged exclusively in foreign trade. What foreign trade is, has already, for the purpose of this section, been clearly defined. A vessel is engaged exclusively in the foreign trade when she is trading between a port of the United States and a foreign port, or between two foreign ports, or between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States. The word "exclusively" was not used to limit the definition already given to foreign trade, but to limit the benefits of the section to vessels exclusively engaged in that trade, as already defined.

When the articles of foreign production are to be used in the construction of a new ship, the question of exemption from duty is determined by the fact of the ship being built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade. But even if built for that purpose or with that declared purpose, if she afterwards engages in the coastwise trade for more than two months in any one year she forfeits the benefit of the exemption. In the case of new ships that had not been engaged in any trade, the question was one of intent and purpose of construction. To prevent fraud on the act by building a vessel with a declared purpose of engaging her in foreign trade, and after obtaining remission of duty on the materials used in her construction and equipment, employing her in the coastwise trade, the first proviso was added providing for payment of duties in case of coastwise trade beyond a limited time. In the case of the vessel already built, the question is not one of purpose and intent, but one of past employment. Whether she is entitled to the benefit of exemption of duty depends upon the question of her employment. If engaged in the coastwise trade exclusively, she is not entitled. If engaged indifferently in the coastwise or foreign trade as opportunity is presented or interest may dictate, then she is not entitled. If engaged exclusively in the foreign trade she is entitled, and that foreign trade is the foreign trade defined in the section as including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports. If the word "exclusively" were not used, a shipowner might claim exemption from duty on materials used in the repair of a vessel which was engaged both in coastwise and in foreign trade, or he might take his vessel from the coastwise trade and employ her in a foreign voyage, and on her return repair and recopper her, and claim that the materials were free of duty because she was then engaged in a foreign trade, or under charter for a foreign voyage. To prevent such perversions of the policy of the statute, the word "exclusively" was used to show that the benefit of the statute was applicable only to materials used in the repair of vessels employed in foreign trade, and in foreign trade only.

In the sense in which those terms are used in the tenth section of the act of 1872, the Matterhorn was employed exclusively in the foreign trade, and the materials taken out of bond and used in repairing her were entitled to exemption from duty. If the second proviso is to be construed, as is suggested by the attorney for the United States, as in fact not a proviso affecting the construction or operation of the general provisions in the preceding part of the section, but as a separate and distinct enactment in relation to a different subject, the same result would follow. If that clause is to stand alone, without any reference to the clauses preceding it in the same section, then, if the vessel were a vessel engaged in the foreign trade when the repairs were made, the articles used in the repairs were free of duty. Whatever employment the vessel might subsequently be engaged in would not forfeit the right to exemption to duty under that clause alone without reference to what precedes it. The Matterhorn, up to the time when the repairs were made, had been engaged exclusively in the foreign trade in its literal sense. The materials used in her repair were entitled to exemption. If by reason of her subsequent employment in a voyage between an Atlantic and a Pacific port of the United States it is claimed that the duties which had been rebated became payable, it must be by reason of what is contained in the previous clause, but, as we have already seen, the previous clause does not embrace such a voyage in the coastwise trade.

Judgment for defendants.

Case No. 16,008.

UNITED STATES v. PATTERSON et al.
SAME v. BRENNEMAN et al.

[Gilp. 44.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Feb. 18, 1829.

OFFICIAL BONDS — ACTION TO RECOVER PUBLIC MONEYS—AUDITOR'S REPORT AS EVIDENCE.

1. The auditor's report of a balance due from a person, accountable for public money, is a guide to the comptroller as to the amount to be sued for, but not evidence for the court of the debt.

2. A certified statement of a balance due, and the report thereof to the comptroller, is not such a transcript from the books and proceedings of the treasury, as may be given in evidence under the second section of the act of March 3, 1797 [1 Stat. 512].

[Cited in U. S. v. Harrill, Case No. 15,310; U. S. v. Smith, 35 Fed. 492; U. S. v. Case, 49 Fed. 271.]

These were actions for debt [against John Patterson and Elizabeth, his wife, and Daniel Branley and Mary, his wife, administrators of George Lewis Lefler, and against Christian Brenneman, John Forrey, and Mary Gossler, executors of the last will and testament of Philip Gossler] on two bonds for twenty-five thousand dollars each, dated on the 14th October, 1799. George Lewis Lefler and Philip Gossler were sureties of Henry Miller, the principal obligor in the bonds, and a supervisor of the internal revenue of Pennsylvania. On the final adjustment of his account on the 25th September, 1811, it appeared that there was a balance of five thousand and thirty-seven dollars and forty-four cents, due from him at the time of his death. To recover this balance these suits were instituted against the legal representatives of his sureties.

Mr. Ingersoll, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Mr. Binney, for defendants.

The district attorney, to support the claim, offered in evidence the following document, certified by the register, and authenticated under the seal of the treasury department:

"No. 23,008. Treasury Department,

"Auditor's Office, July 6th, 1810.

"I have examined and adjusted the account of Henry Miller, late supervisor of the revenue for the district of Pennsylvania, and find that he stands chargeable as follows, viz:

To balance due on settlement of his account per report, No. 15,877...		$13,723 78
Peter Muhlenburg for commission on $287,908.47, (the amount of duties and bonds outstanding, and cash in hands of the collectors and inspectors transferred to said Muhlenburg) at $1^{18}/_{100}$ per cent.	$3,397 32
Deduct amount charged on account of said commission per report No. No. 14,504	2,834 43
		562 89
Tench Coxe, acting as supervisor, for commission on $65.70, (the amount of the balance due from officers, transferred to said Coxe, per report, No. 15,877,) at $1^{18}/_{100}$ per cent. which commission is to the credit of said Coxe, per report, No. 22,944.....		77
		$14,287 44

"I also find that he is entitled to the following credits, viz.:

By amount of the following warrants in favor of the treasurer, viz.:
No. 1669	$4,000 00
1684	2,250 00
1696	500 00
1702	2,500 00
		$ 9,250 00
That the balance due the United States amounts to.....		5,037 44
		$14,287 44

"As will appear by the statement and documents herewith transmitted, for the decision of the comptroller of the treasury thereon. R. Harrison, Auditor.

[1] [Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

"To Gabriel Duvall, Esquire, Comptroller of the Treasury."

Mr. Binney for the defendants objected: This document is not evidence. Of the large sum of thirteen thousand seven hundred and twenty-three dollars and seventy-eight cents, no particulars are given. It is brought here as the balance reported from a former account, respecting the items of which no information is given, nor how this balance is made. The act of congress of the 3d of March, 1797, makes a transcript from the books of the treasury evidence in suits between the United States and receivers of public money; but a mere certified balance of the account, in gross, is not a transcript from the books, within the meaning and objects of the act, which intended that the whole account should be submitted to the jury. 1 Story's Laws, 464 [1 Stat. 512].

There is besides another objection. If the transcript were full and in proper form, the act makes it evidence only against the principal debtor, or receiver of the public money, and not against his sureties.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. It is unnecessary to give any opinion on the second point, as the first is sufficient to exclude the evidence. The first section of the act of congress referred to, entitled, "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and receivers of public money," enacts, that when any revenue officer, or other person accountable for public money, shall neglect or refuse to pay into the treasury the sum or balance reported to be due to the United States, upon the adjustment of his account, it shall be the duty of the comptroller, and he is thereby required, to institute suit for the recovery of the same. The reported balance, thus made to the comptroller, is to be his guide and instruction for the amount he is to claim, and sue for, from the delinquent; and this is the whole office and effect of the report. It is the direction to the comptroller, but not the evidence for the court.

The second section of the act provides the evidence, which shall be received on the trial, in proof of the claim, if it is judicially resisted; and then we hear nothing of the report made to the comptroller, on which the suit is brought; but for this purpose, it is declared, that "a transcript from the books, and proceedings of the treasury, certified by the register, and authenticated under the seal of the department, shall be admitted as evidence;" by which, I understand that the whole accounts, as they appear in the books; the elements out of which the reported balance is formed; together with all the proceedings, which have been had concerning them, shall be certified, and submitted to the court and jury, that they may judge whether the sum or balance, for which the suit is brought, be fairly made up, and is justly due; that they may see and determine whether any unfounded or illegal charges have been made against the defendant; or any credits refused or omitted, to which he is justly or legally entitled. A full transcript from the books, containing the accounts, and also of the proceedings of the treasury in relation to them, in admitting or rejecting disputed vouchers, charges, &c. are indispensable to these objects; they can never be reached by the mere exhibition of the balance apparent on an adjustment made, ex parte, by the officers of the treasury, and reported to the comptroller for his information of the amount claimed by the United States, and for which he is to bring suit; but which is the very matter complained of; the very adjustment appealed from, by the defendant.

The question to be tried by this jury is the correctness of this adjusted, reported balance; but if it is allowed to prove itself, what is to be tried? If a treasury certificate that such is the balance reported to be due, is enough to entitle the United States to a verdict and judgment for that amount, the trial is a mere pretence; an useless form which might be dispensed with, and the judgment entered at once on the production of the certificate. This cannot be the intention of the law. The whole cause of controversy must be put into the possession of the court, as it exists in the treasury department; and thereupon the court and jury will pass their judgment. This construction is further manifest from the fourth section of the act. It directs that "no claim for a credit shall be admitted upon trial, but such as shall appear to have been presented to the accounting officers of the treasury, for their examination, and by them disallowed in whole or in part." How appear? Assuredly by the transcript from the books and proceedings of the treasury. But these things will not, and cannot appear, and the defendant will be shut out from all the defence allowed him by the act, if it be sufficient for the United States to produce a certificate of the balance claimed by them, as reported by their accounting officers to their comptroller; which may not be impeached by denial, nor penetrated by adverse testimony; which cannot be opened to admit credits unjustly refused, nor to withdraw charges unjustly made; which, in short, furnishes nothing to be tried. In other cases, we have seen the whole accounts transcribed and produced, which shows that it is not the usage of the department to give such transcripts as that now offered.

The evidence was rejected, and exceptions were taken by the district attorney.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants.

Case No. 16,009.

UNITED STATES v. PATTERSON.

[3 McLean, 53.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1842.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS — PAYMENTS TO DEPUTIES—PENALTIES—INFORMERS AS WITNESSES.

1. A marshal of the United States is bound to pay over to his deputies and assistants, in taking the census, the same funds, or their equivalent, which he may have received from the government.

2. And if he pay less, he is liable to the penalty of five hundred dollars, under the act of the 3d of March, 1839 [5 Stat. 336].

3. An informer is a competent witness, although he may receive a part of the penalty. This is not strictly the rule at the common law.

4. But it is founded on necessity and policy, and is now fully established.

5. A sale of treasury notes by the marshal for currency, at eight per cent. premium, and a payment of his deputy in such currency, is a violation of the law.

[This was an indictment against John Patterson, a United States marshal, charging him with paying his deputies in depreciated paper. See Case No. 16,010.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment against the defendant for having, as marshal of the United States for the district of Ohio, paid his deputies for taking the sixth census, less than he received from the government, for the same service. The eleventh section of the act of the 3d of March, 1839, in relation to the taking of said census, provides, "that if any marshal, in any district within the United States or territories, shall, directly or indirectly, ask, demand or receive, of any assistant to be appointed by him under this act, any fee, reward or compensation, for the appointment of such assistant to discharge the duties required of such assistant, any portion of the compensation allowed to the assistant by this act, the said marshal shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and shall forfeit and pay the amount of five hundred dollars for each offence, to be recovered by suit or indictment," &c.

As the informer, under this statute, receives one half the penalty, on conviction, being called as a witness, he was objected to, as incompetent. "An informer, who is entitled to any part of the penalty, is, in general, incompetent to give evidence; but in some instances the testimony of informers has been received, where a statute could receive no execution unless the party seeking to recover the penalty were admitted as a witness." 4 Phil. Ev. 166. Heward v. Shipley, 4 East, 180; Mead v. Robinson, Willes, 425. Although by the common law informers entitled to a part of the penalty are incompetent, yet by the particular provisions or policy of several acts of parliament, they may be admitted. "In a prosecution on St. 21 Geo. III. c. 37, against exporting machinery, the informer is competent. So on a prosecution for penalties under St. 9 Anne, c. 14, § 5, the loser of money at cards may prove his loss. And on a prosecution under St. 23 Geo. II. c. 13, § 1, for seducing artificers to go out of the kingdom, the prosecutor is a competent witness, although entitled to a moiety of the penalty." In neither of the above acts is it provided that the informer may be a witness. In U. S. v. Murphy, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 213, it was held that an informer was a competent witness, although he received a part of the penalty, "upon the ground of necessity and of public policy, and of attaining the manifest objects of the statute, and the ends of justice."

The informer, being sworn as a witness, stated, that being appointed by the marshal to take the census in the county in which he lived, was sworn as such; that he performed the work, and was entitled to receive as his compensation five hundred thirty-eight dollars and twenty-six cents; that he received from the defendant a letter enclosing a check for five hundred and twenty dollars and twenty-six cents, on the Columbus Bank; that eighteen dollars were retained under the pretence that the return was imperfect, and had to be corrected. The witness returned the check, and requested that he might receive his pay in treasury notes. Afterwards, when witness saw defendant at Columbus, he proposed to receive from him a thousand dollar draft, but the defendant refused to pay it, saying that he had no funds, but those in the Franklin Bank. This was about the 9th of July, 1841. Subsequently, defendant offered the witness a check on the receiver at Jeffersonville, to pay other claims which the witness might have, if he would pay specie in change, the check being large. This the witness could not do. The witness then received the check first transmitted to him, demanded specie of the bank, but was refused, and he was obliged to receive currency, which was at a discount of some six or ten per cent. He used the paper at a loss of ten per cent. Defendant refused to pay the witness the premium for which he sold the treasury notes. Witness offered to take less; but this also was refused. It was proved that treasury notes were worth nine or ten per cent. in currency. The treasury notes remitted to the defendant were sold by him for eight per cent.

The cause was argued before the jury, by the counsel on both sides.

THE COURT instructed the jury, that a payment in currency of less value than the treasury notes received by the government, was a violation of the act above cited, and subjected the defendant to the penalty prescribed by it; that no public officer can speculate upon the funds of the public placed in his hands for disbursement; that the act was designed to prevent such an use of the public money.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

But if a deputy, knowing his rights, should voluntarily receive in payment that which was of less value than specie, he would have a right to waive his claim in this respect. But, if he was ignorant of his rights, or if knowing them, was compelled by circumstances to receive less than the entire sum in specie, or its equivalent, the defendant must be found guilty. If the assistant, in this case, was paid in a currency of less value than treasury notes, by eight per cent., the defendant as much violated the law as if he had retained the same per cent., paying the balance in specie.

The jury found the defendant guilty, &c.

Case No. 16,010.

UNITED STATES v. PATTERSON.

[3 McLean, 299.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1843.

PENALTIES — INFORMERS AS WITNESSES — UNITED STATES MARSHALS—PAYMENT OF DEPUTIES.

1. An informer who receives one-half of the penalty on conviction is, notwithstanding, a competent witness.

2. This is chiefly placed on the ground of public policy.

3. A payment by a marshal to his assistant for taking the census in depreciated paper, is a violation of the census act of 1839 [5 Stat. 331]. And this is especially so, where good funds had been received by the marshal, to pay his assistants.

Mr. Anthony, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Hamer, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment under the act of the 3d of March, 1839, in relation to the census, the defendant being marshal of the district of Ohio, charging him with retaining from one of his assistants in taking the census, a portion of the compensation allowed by law for that service. The indictment contained several counts, charging the defendant with paying his assistant in depreciated paper, when he received from the government funds with which to pay them, equivalent to specie. The defendant gave bond, as marshal, in 1838. A certified transcript from the treasury showed the transmission to him of a large amount of treasury notes, and also a draft for $1960.17, payable at sight, on the order of the defendant, on the receiver of public moneys at Jeffersonville. Mr. Taylor stated that he acted as assistant in taking the census for Champaign county. On the 8th of July, 1841, having received in part his compensation, he demanded of the defendant the payment of the balance. Defendant said he could not pay his assistants in treasury notes, as they were large, but that he had made an arrangement to pay them through the banks. The witness offered to take treasury notes, but eventually received currency which was at a discount of ten per cent. Major Hunt was present when the above payment was made, and heard the marshal offer to pay in a draft on the receiver at Jeffersonville, Indiana. Mr. Swan stated that treasury notes were worth from seven to nine per cent. above their face, for currency. Witness purchased from the marshal from five to eight thousand dollars of treasury notes, for which he paid eight per cent. in currency. The treasury notes were one per cent. better than specie. Mr. Moody stated that the draft on Jeffersonville for specie was worth from six to seven per cent. above par in bankable money. Mr. Espy, cashier of the Franklin bank,—the bank at that time was in a state of suspension, as to specie payments,—stated that defendant had a deposit of $35,000, which was drawn for by him and paid by the bank in currency. The defendant took a receipt in full from the witness Taylor.

This prosecution rests on the 11th section of the above act, which provides, "that if any marshal, in any district within the United States or territories shall directly or indirectly ask or demand, or receive, or contract to receive, of any assistants to be appointed by him under this act, any fee, reward or compensation, for the appointment of such assistant to discharge the duties required of such assistant under this act, or shall retain from such assistant any portion of the compensation allowed to the assistant by this act, the said marshal shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and shall forfeit and pay the amount of five hundred dollars for each offence, to be recovered by suit or indictment," one-half to the informer, &c. An objection was made to the competency of Taylor, who was the informer, and who, should the defendant be convicted, will be entitled to one-half of the penalty. A distinction is made between a qui tam action and one like the present. An informer who sues for himself as well as for the state, recovers the amount of the penalty that he is entitled to, but in the present case the informer does not receive it under the sentence on the indictment, but must sue for it. This distinction, though made in the case of U. S. v. Murphy, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 210, appears to me to be unsustainable. In the case cited, the court say, "The general rule undoubtedly is, in criminal cases, as well as in civil, that a person interested in the event of the suit or prosecution, is not a competent witness. But there are many exceptions, which are as old as the rule itself." One exception is, where, from the nature of the offence, there can be no conviction if the party interested be not a witness. 1 Phil. Ev. c. 8, § 7. "So cases of necessity where no other evidence can be reasonably expected, as an indictment for robbery." Id. p. 120, c. 5, § 6. "Another exception is, that of a person who is to receive a reward for or upon the conviction of the offender." The rule is founded upon public policy, and is sustained by the decision in 16 Pet. [41 U. S.], above referred to, and the authorities there cited. On these authorities the court think that the informer in this case, is a competent witness.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

On the facts of the case THE COURT instructed the jury, that to pay an assistant in depreciated funds, nominally calling for the true sum, but intrinsically worth seven or eight per cent. less, is a violation of the eleventh section, and subjects the defendant to the penalty prescribed. That an exchange of the government funds for currency of less value, and a payment by the marshal in such currency is clearly within the mischief, to prevent which the statute was passed.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty.

[See Case No. 16,009.]

Case No. 16,011.

UNITED STATES v. PATTERSON.

[6 McLean, 466.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1855.

OFFENSES AGAINST POSTAL LAWS—EMBEZZLEMENT OF LETTER—INDICTMENT.

1. In an indictment for embezzlement, under the post office law, it is sufficiently certain to charge "that defendant was a person employed in one of the departments of the post office establishment of the United States."

2. When the embezzlement is of a letter containing a bank note, it is not necessary to describe the note.

[Cited in State v. Noland, 111 Mo. 487, 19 S. W. 716.]

3. In larceny such description is necessary.

4. The verdict being general, if one count is good, judgment will not be arrested.

George E. Hand, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Betham Duffield, for defendant.

WILKINS, District Judge. The motion made to arrest the judgment in this case is founded principally on two reasons:—1st. That the offense is not described in the indictment with sufficient certainty and precision. 2d. That no offense is charged against the defendant in the last four counts.

1. The offense in the fifth count is described thus:—"That Charles Patterson, a person employed in one of the departments of the post office establishment of the United States, a certain letter which came to the possession of him, the said Patterson, and which was intended to be conveyed by post, and containing a bank note of great value, viz.: of the value of $50, did then and there, with force and arms, feloniously embezzle," &c. Stripped of the verbiage descriptive of time, place, and circumstance, and what is the charge here specified? Is it not "that Charles Patterson, employed as stated, embezzled a certain letter which came to his possession as deputy post master?" The language employed is the language of the statute creating and defining the offense, which is sufficient. The time has gone by when the technical objections so ably urged in the argument, and for which there is so much authority in England and in our state tribunals, can be of any force in the courts of the United States The cases of U. S. v. Lancaster [Case No. 15,556], and U. S. v. Martin [Id. 15,731], cover the whole ground as to this objection; and certainly settles the law in the Seventh circuit until reversed by the supreme court. And the cases of U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 142, and U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460, declare the law of the United States to be "that it is sufficient to charge the offense in the words of the statute;" Mr. Justice Story intimating in the last case that any other description would be fatal. If the offense was the simple larceny of a letter and bank note, indictable at common law, a description of the letter and of the note would have been necessary. But the offense is embezzlement, a criminal breach of trust, and that the thing embezzled was a bank note of a certain value, is but an aggravating circumstance, and the description of the same not held essential. And the form in Archb. Cr. Prac. & Pl. 156, which was for the embezzlement, as clerk, of a bill of exchange, a particular description of the bill, other than its amount, is omitted. This objection is not sustained.

2dly. It is urged that it is not succinctly or grammatically charged that the defendant committed the offense. Separating the 1st clause of the charging matter from the concluding part, and making two sentences instead of one, there is doubt and obscurity as to the offender; but, considering the whole as one continuous sentence, there can be no misunderstanding as to the party accused. The court can reject the unnecessary word "that" as surplusage; as, in the case of Rex v. Cooke, 4 Harg. State Trials, the omission of the words "et ipse idem Petrus Cooke," which was not fatal. Consider the "Charles Patterson" in the first clause as the nominative case, and that he did embezzle the letter and money mentioned. Charles Patterson is charged with being employed in the post office department, and with embezzling a certain letter and bank note, which then and there came into his possession. The repetition of the nominative case, namely, "that he, the said Charles," did embezzle, might have saved the court and the counsel an argument and research; but its omission does not make the charge so equivocal as to warrant the arrest of the judgment, and the consequent discharge of the accused. It is clear, some intelligent being did the act, and equally clear that no other being is connected with the description of the offence than Charles Patterson, whose name is repeated twice in the sentence: once as being the person entrusted with the letter in question, and once as being employed in the post office at the time. To hold, judicially, that the indictment leaves it in doubt who is meant, would be grammatically straining words beyond their usual import. Some one mentioned did embezzle; who was it? Not White, for Patterson is described as his deputy, and "the deputy," or "the said Patterson," must be the nominative preceding, and giving signification to the verb. But could I have sustained this objection, it would have been of little avail to the defendant. Here, as in the 1st objection, English and state authorities may be considered as fully sustaining the position of defendant's counsel, but the United States cases are the other way.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The verdict is general on an indictment containing seven counts, two of which are unquestionably good; but it is authoritatively ruled by Mr. Justice McLean in Lytle v. Fenn [Case No. 8,651], and by the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Furlong, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 184, "that each count in an indictment is a distinct substantive charge, and that on a general verdict, if one be deemed bad, the judgment of the court may be pronounced upon that count considered sufficient." Here, the court hold all the counts as sufficient, and only allude to those U. S. authorities in order to remark that where such exist, and are applicable, this court will not regard as of any weight whatever, either the English or state decisions, and this intimation will supercede hereafter a laborious research, so commendable in counsel, but which must prove, eventually, labor lost. Motion refused.

Case No. 16,012.

UNITED STATES v. The PAUL SHEARMAN.

[Pet. C. C. 98.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. April Term, 1815.

NON-INTERCOURSE LAWS—FORFEITURE OF INSURANCE—PROOF OF POLICY—ADMISSION OF COPY—PRESUMPTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Condemnation of a vessel and cargo, under the act of congress prohibiting intercourse with Great Britain, &c. 4 Laws [Bior. & D.] 211 [2 Stat. 550].

2. A copy of a policy of insurance, proved to have been compared with the original register on the books of the insurance company, and notice given to produce the original, cannot be read in evidence. The register, in the hands of the company, should be exhibited, after proving the existence of the original policy.

3. Where a prohibited cargo was taken in at a port with which intercourse is prohibited by law, and brought into a port of the United States, it is to be presumed, that the cargo was laden with an intention to import the same into the United States; but this presumption may be repelled by evidence.

4. The burthen of proof, is placed on the claimant of property taken in delicto.

5. Liberty in a policy of insurance to touch at a place, does not justify trading, and trading would be a deviation, and avoid the policy.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey.]

This was a libel filed in the district court of New Jersey, on behalf of the United States, against this vessel and her cargo, for a breach of the non-intercourse law. The libel charges, that the cargo, being the produce of the Island of Jamaica, a British dependency, was, some time in June, 1811, taken on board at that island, with the knowledge of the master, with the intention of importing it into the United States; and that the same was in fact imported into the port of Perth Amboy, contrary to the act, "to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes." To this libel, an answer was put in by Peter M'Kinley, who claims the vessel and her cargo; stating that this cargo was sent on board, with intention to be carried to the Havanna, to be there disposed of, and the proceeds to be invested in the produce of the Island of Cuba, to be imported into the United States. But that the vessel was refused an entry at Havanna, on account of her having on board three Frenchmen, who, together with fourteen others, and about 10,000 dollars in specie, had been saved from a wreck on the coast of Cuba, by the captain of this vessel, whilst on her voyage to Havanna. That in consequence of this refusal, and the want of provisions and water for this increased number of persons on board, the captain had entered the waters of the United States, in order to land the persons so taken from the wreck, to obtain provisions and water, and to receive instructions for the further destination of the brig and cargo. The district court dismissed the libel [case unreported], from which sentence this appeal was taken.

It appeared in evidence, that this vessel arrived at Amboy on the 15th of July, 1811. On the next day, the captain delivered, to an officer of the customs, a manifest of the cargo, stating the voyage to have been from Havanna to Amboy. The second report and manifest, with the usual affidavit subjoined, was delivered to the collector of that port on the 23d July; in which the voyage is stated to have been from Jamaica to Amboy, by the way of Havanna; the cargo (except one puncheon of rum, belonging to the captain) being consigned to the claimant at New York. On the 17th July, before any attempt to break bulk, or to land the cargo, the collector made the seizure; and, on the same, or the next day, the captain made his protest. The clearance at Jamaica, was for the Havanna. The facts stated in the claim, were fully supported by the testimony of the master and of the supercargo. A policy of insurance, made at New York, dated the 11th July, 1811, on this vessel, on a voyage from Jamaica to the United States, with leave to touch at the Havanna, to return half a per cent. in case this privilege should not be used; was given in evidence by the claimant. The appellant offered in evidence, a copy of a copy of a policy of insurance on the cargo of the vessel, taken from the books of the insurance company at New York, and proved, by the deposition of a witness, to have been compared by him with the written parts of the said policy on said books, and to be a true copy. Notice to produce the original, was proved to have been given. To this evidence it was objected, that this is only a copy of a copy, and there is no evidence that an original policy had ever been executed, which ought to be proved. Peak, Ev. 96, 97.

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This evidence is inadmissible, for both the reasons mentioned. To introduce a copy of an instrument, or to give evidence of its contents, the party should lay a foundation, by some evidence tending to prove that there was a genuine instrument in existence. The register of policies of insurance, kept by the insurance company, is nothing more than a private memorandum, which ought to have been produced, after proving the existence of an original.

Mr. M'Ilvain, and Mr. Stockton, for the United States, contended:

First. That the intention, when the cargo was taken on board at Jamaica, was to bring it into the United States; the calling at the Havanna, was a mere pretence to cover the real destination. That the captain, being the shipper and consignee of one puncheon of rum, part of the cargo; and being answerable to the owners for his conduct, is an incompetent witness; although that puncheon of rum is omitted in this libel. This ground will condemn the vessel, as well as the cargo, as it is admitted, that the cargo was taken on board with the knowledge of the master. As to the incompetency of the master, they cited Reeve, Shipp. 262. Second. That the cargo must be condemned upon the ground of an illegal importation, the necessity set up to justify it, being clearly unsupported.

Messrs. Williamson and Ogden, for the claimant, contended, as to the first point, that the onus probandi lies upon the United States, to prove the criminal intention alleged, as cause of forfeiture. But the evidence is all the other way. The evidence of the master and supercargo are uncontradicted, and proves the destination to have been for the Havanna. As to the second point; there was no importation at the time of the seizure; and, if so, nothing done afterwards by the claimant, could furnish a ground of forfeiture. There can be no importation, unless there was an intention to import, manifested by breaking of bulk, landing, or attempting to land, part of the cargo. In this case, the vessel was forced in by necessity; and the seizure was made, before any evidence of an intention to import was given. The first section of the non-intercourse law, prohibits armed vessels from coming within the waters of the United States; but, as to merchant vessels, the 4th, 5th and 6th sections speak of importation, and not of a mere coming into the waters of the United States. The 7th section shows, that a vessel having prohibited goods, and goods not prohibited; may come in and land the latter, without incurring a forfeiture of the former. Cases cited to show what amounts to an importation: 2 Wils. 257; Reeve, Shipp. 203, 206, 207; Harg. Law Tracts, 216; Coll. Jurid. 80.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. It is contended for the claimant, that the United States, to effect the confiscation of this vessel and cargo, must make out a clear case of forfeiture; by proving that the cargo was taken in at Jamaica, with intention to import the same into the United States; or, that it was taken in, with the knowledge of the master, and was actually imported into the United States. The United States have proved, that the cargo, the produce and manufactory of a dependency of Great Britain, was taken in at Jamaica, and afterwards brought within the waters, and to a port of the United States. That the cargo was taken on board, with intention to import it into the United States, with the knowledge of the master, is a presumption arising out of the acts which are proved; because a man is always presumed to have intended to do, what he has actually done. But this presumption may be repelled by evidence on the other side, tending to show a different intention. Nothing is to be presumed in favour of a claimant in such case as this. His property is taken in delicto; and the burthen of proof is placed upon him, to explain his conduct, and to show the transaction to be innocent. It is always in his power, if he has acted bona fide, to exculpate himself from the charge to which appearances have exposed him; and, if he fail to do so, he must take the consequence of those acts, which, unexplained, amount to a breach of the law.

Let us see how the claimant in this case, has explained this transaction, and by what proof. He says, that his captain took in this cargo at Montego Bay, with an intention to carry it to Havanna, and there to dispose of it; and to invest the proceeds in sugar, to be transported to the United States. In proof of this intention, he shows the clearance from Montego Bay to the Havanna, and also produces the evidence of the captain and supercargo, to prove that such was the real destination of the vessel. The clearance, though a necessary paper to be produced by the claimant, amounts to very little in the scale of evidence; where a different voyage has in fact been performed, and the reality of the ostensible destination, is subject to suspicion. If the real destination of this vessel had been to the United States, it is not to be supposed, that it would have been disclosed in one of the ship's papers; but a fictitious destination would of course have been avowed. As to the captain's testimony, I lay it entirely out of the case; not only on account of the strong motives he must have felt, to prevent the forfeiture of the vessel and cargo; but on account of his uncandid conduct after his arrival at Amboy. To use the least harsh epithet in respect to him, he was guilty of a palpable equivocation in his oath, verifying his second manifest; and it is most apparent, that his first report was untrue, and was designed to mislead the officers of the government, and to induce a belief that his voyage had been from the Havanna, and was of course a lawful one. I cannot, therefore, believe this man. It is sufficient to destroy his credit with me, to prove him guilty of a suppressio veri, and of unfair conduct, in relation to this particular transaction.

The evidence of the supercargo is not impeached, and it would therefore go a great way towards supporting the case of the claimant, if it were otherwise free from suspicion. But the trade, stated by this witness to have been intended, is altogether of so extraordinary a nature, that something more than his testimony is necessary to obtain credit for it. West India produce and manufactures, are carried by a vessel of the United States, from one West India island to be sold in another; where the same articles are produced and manufactured for exportation. There might be circumstances which would justify such a trade; but their existence should be proved, in order to remove the improbability, which the general nature of such trade stamps upon the transaction. It will not be sufficient for claimant to suppose circumstances, which might render such an intercourse probable; and from thence to argue that they existed in this case. It is said, that the claimant may have had funds in Jamaica, produced by the sale of the outward cargo of this vessel, or of the cargoes of former voyages; and that it might have been his interest to invest those funds in the produce of that island, and to dispose of them again, though at a loss, in the Havanna. But where is the evidence on which to found this supposition? If it be real, it was in the power of the claimant to show it. Where are his letters to his correspondent in Jamaica, and particularly, his letter of instructions to his captain and supercargo? It is not also to be supposed, that he left these agents to act and to carry on such a trade, with his funds, as they or either of them pleased. And even if this had been the case, some authority for doing so, either written or verbal, would have been given, and might have been proved. It is said, that the claimant is an illiterate and irregular merchant, and probably kept no copies of his letters. But this assertion, so improbable in itself, is but an assertion, gratuitously made; and if well founded, was also susceptible of proof. Whilst speaking of the absence of the papers, and of evidence to clear away the strong presumption, which exists against the legality and fairness of this transaction; it may not be amiss to remark, that no bill of lading or invoice of this cargo, appears to have been produced in the district court, or has been produced in this court. These are the regular ship's papers, the absence of which ought to be accounted for. But this case is attended by circumstances, which scarcely leave a doubt as to the original and real destination of this vessel. In the first place, it appears by the report and manifest delivered to the collector on the 23d of July, that the cargo except one puncheon of rum, came consigned to the claimant, the owner of the vessel, on whose account it was purchased. This, in the absence of the usual ship's papers, before noticed, affords strong presumptive proof, that the real destination of this vessel, was to some port of the United States, where the consignee lived. In the next place, it appears that the vessel was insured, by the owner, from Jamaica to New York, with liberty merely to touch at Havanna. If the object of the voyage was, as has been supposed, to withdraw funds from Jamaica, and to invest them in the produce of the Island of Cuba; is it conceivable, that the claimant would pay a premium for an indemnity, which the contemplated act would forfeit? For the liberty to touch at Havanna, would not have justified a trading there; and the act of trading, would have amounted to a deviation, and have avoided the policy. Besides, the agreement to return a part of the premium, in case even the slight privilege of touching at the Havanna should not be used, taken in connection with the voyage insured, is conclusive to show, that the real destination was from Jamacia to the United States. Such was the voyage intended, and such was the voyage performed. It is said, however, that she came into Amboy for the purpose of landing the persons taken from the wreck, and to receive the orders of the owner. But, was any such intention even pretended by the captain or supercargo, until the lapse of two or three days; when it seems to have been thought prudent to draw up a protest? So far from it, that the first report delivered by the master to an officer of the customs, falsely stated a legal voyage from Havanna to Amboy; although the master has sworn in his deposition, that he did not even drop his anchor at that port. This circumstance alone, is sufficient to destroy the plea of ignorance in the captain, set up to excuse this statement. In short, I feel myself constrained to say of this case, that the illegality of the transaction, is attempted to be concealed by a drapery, too thin to impose upon the most credulous mind. The sentence below must be reversed, with costs, and the vessel and cargo condemned.

Case No. 16,013.

UNITED STATES v. PAXTON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 44.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1801.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—UNLAWFUL SALES.

A servant selling spirituous liquors for his master without license is not liable to the penalty.

[Cited in U. S. v. Shuck, Case No. 16,285; U. S. v. Voss, Id. 16,628.]

Indictment for retailing spirituous liquors without license.

THE COURT directed the jury that if they should be of opinion that the defendant sold the liquor as clerk, agent, servant, or barkeeper of Brown, then he was not guilty. It was the selling of Brown within the meaning of the act. See, also, U. S. v. Shuck [Case No. 16,285], Alexandria, Jan. term, 1802, and U. S. v. Voss [Id. 16,628].

Case No. 16,014.

UNITED STATES v. PAYNE.

[4 Dill. 387.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. 1877.

JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT — PROPERTY OF POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS—ACTION FOR MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

1. Without the assent of the general government, the probate courts of a state have no jurisdiction to administer upon the property or credits of Indians who were members of a tribe which maintains towards the United States its tribal relations.

2. The grant of administration on the estate of a member of the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians, by a probate court in Kansas, by virtue of the treaty of 1867 (15 Stat. 536, art. 8, of senate amendments), when such member is in fact alive, is void as respects the administrator, and money paid to him by the United States in that capacity may be recovered back.

This cause is submitted to the court upon the facts set forth in the petition, answer, and reply, which are severally admitted to be true. The petition states that, on June 10th, 1871, the defendant [Benjamin T. Payne] was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $6,111.84, for money before that time had and received by the defendant, to and for the use of the plaintiff. The answer states, "that, in January and May, 1871, the defendant was duly appointed by the probate court for Wabaunsee county, Kansas, administrator of the following named deceased persons: In-kuh-da-o-ks, Go-she-was-kpa-zo-mah, etc. (naming several other Indians having like names), and as such duly qualified; that said several persons were Pottawatomie Indians, and were, at the times of their several deaths, members of the Pottawatomie Tribe or Nation of Indians, and each owned real estate in said county, and was entitled to receive from the government of the United States, under treaty stipulations, $661.18, amounting in all to $6,611.80; that said sum was duly paid by the United States to this defendant, as such administrator; that defendant has duly accounted to the said probate court, and paid out under its direction, of the said moneys received from the United States, the sum of $4,271.22, and holds the balance subject to the orders of jurisdiction of the said probate court; that defendant has never received any other moneys of the United States." The replication states that the said Indians mentioned in the answer were alive, and members of the said tribe, at the time the defendant was appointed as administrator. The senate amendment to article 8, of the treaty of 1867, with the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians, is as follows: "Where allottees, under the treaty of 1861, shall have died, or shall hereafter decease, such allottees shall be regarded, for the purpose of a careful and just settlement of their, estates, as citizens of the United States, and of the state of Kansas; and it shall be competent for the proper courts to take charge of the settlement of their estates, under all the forms, and in accordance with the laws of the state, as in the case of other citizens, deceased," etc. 15 Stat. 536.

George R. Peck, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Martin & Case, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. It is admitted that the several Indians for whose estates the defendant was appointed administrator by the local probate court, were, at the time of such appointment, in full life, and members of the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians, and that the money received by the defendant of the United States was due to them by the United States under treaty stipulations with the tribe.

Where Indians maintain the tribal relations, their property is not subject to the laws of the state, or their estates to be administered upon in the probate court of the state, unless by the assent of the general government. The Kansas Indians, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 737, 757, 759; Mackey v. Coxe, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 100; Mungosah v. Steinbrook [Case No. 9,924]; Gray v. Coffman [Case No. 5,714].

It will be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the senate amendment to article 8 of the treaty of 1867, gave the probate court the authority to appoint administrators and settle the estate of deceased allottees of the tribe. But it gave the probate court no authority to appoint administrators of an Indian, unless he had been an allottee under the treaty, and was dead.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The weight of judicial opinion would seem to be in favor of the proposition, even if the Indians and their property were subject to the probate jurisdiction of the courts of Kansas, that the court had no jurisdiction, and could have none, to make an appointment of an administrator of a person who, at the time, was alive. Jochumsen v. Suffolk Sav. Bank, 3 Allen, 87; Griffith v. Frazier, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 9, 23; Fisk v. Norvel, 9 Tex. 13. Contra, by the court of appeals of New York, in Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst. [63 N. Y. 460], 15 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) April, 1876, p. 205, where the note in disapproval, by the late Judge Redfield, may be found. Much may be said on both sides of the general proposition last stated. Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst., just cited, may, possibly, be distinguished on solid grounds from such a case as the one before us. It was there held that a payment by a debtor in good faith to an administrator was valid, and would protect the debtor against a second payment, although the supposed intestate was alive at the time, and the letters of administration were subsequently revoked for this reason. The debtor was innocent, and acted on the faith of the grant of administration of the proper court. It may be a different question when it arises between an innocent third party and the administrator himself, which is the present case. It is possible that the case in the court of appeals of New York may be sustained on this ground, but we need not express any opinion on this point. We place our judgment in the case at the bar on the ground that under the treaty the probate court had no jurisdiction to make an appointment of an administrator for Indians who were alive at the time, and that its decision that it had jurisdiction, evidenced by the grant of letters of administration, is not conclusive in favor of the administrator, who, perhaps, had himself appointed, and who, at all events, voluntarily assumed that character, and held himself out to the world as sustaining that relation.

As the government owed this money to these Indians; as the defendant had no right to receive it; as the payment to the defendant did not absolve the government from the liability or duty to pay the amount to the Indians entitled thereto; and as the defendant, if he did not, indeed, apply for, voluntarily accepted and undertook to act as administrator, and does not claim that he has paid the money to the Indians entitled, or that the latter have ever ratified or confirmed the receipt of the money or its disposition by him, our judgment is that the United States may maintain this action to recover back the amount unlawfully received by the defendant.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Case No. 16,015.

UNITED STATES v. PAYSON et al.

SAME v. SANCHEZ.

[1 Cal. Law J. 235.]

District Court, N. D. California. Feb. 17, 1863.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—PAROL EVIDENCE—ACT OF POSSESSION.

[The record of the act of possession based on depositions containing statements upon which the alcalde acted cannot be contradicted by parol evidence of aged, illiterate, and infirm witnesses as to their recollection of what was done or intended by the alcalde.]

Settlement of the boundary between the Buri Buri and the Visitacion ranchos, in the neighborhood of San Francisco. [See Case No. 16,017.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. The official surveys of these ranchos are objected to by the owners of the former. The principal controversy relates to the location of the northern line of the Buri Buri, or Sanchez grant, which is also the southern boundary of the Visitacion Rancho, confirmed to Henry R. Payson et al. The grant to Jose De La Cruz Sanchez was issued on the 23d September, 1835. The only boundaries it mentions are "San Mateo and the Corral de San Bruno." The fourth condition describes the land as of the extent of four square leagues, as shown by the map. In the resolution of approval by the departmental assembly, the boundaries are mentioned with more particularity: "The tract conceded will include the lands now occupied, bounded by the Mission of San Francisco on the north, with the rancho of San Mateo on the south, with the esteros of the bay on the east, and with the rancho of La Costa on the east, which dimensions will be observed at the time of giving possession." The rancho of Cañada de Guadalupe Visitacion y Rodeo Viejo, granted to Jacob P. Leese, is described as bounded "on the east by the bay, on the west by the Camino Real and Portezuelo, on the north by the rancho of Don Cornelio Bernal, and on the south by that of Don Jose Sanchez." In order, therefore, to establish the southern boundary of the Visitacion Rancho, the northern boundary of the Buri Buri must be ascertained. The description in the decree in the Buri Buri case is taken from the record of the judicial possession of the rancho, given in 1835 to the grantee; and this record is referred to in the decree for a more particular description of the boundary. The record contains, as is usual: (1) The depositions of the witnesses who testify to the recognized boundaries of the rancho. (2) The account of the preliminary reconnoissance, or "vista de ojos," where the witnesses point out to the alcalde, on the ground, the boundaries and landmarks, previously described in their depositions. And (3) the record of the actual measurement and establishing of the boundaries, and the formal giving of the possession by the alcalde. The witnesses examined by the alcalde were Bartolo Bojorques, Jose Antonio Alviso, and Antonio Soto. They all describe the northeastern corner and the northern boundary line in the same terms. The eastern and the northern boundaries are the last mentioned, and they are described as follows: "Thence, following a direction to the north along the margin of the esteros of the bay of the port as far as the rincon called San Bruno, at the foot of that hill, and, from east to west, along the foot of that hill, 'cerro,' as far as a very short cañada," etc. Soto describes the line as running north, along the margin of the esteros "as far as the foot of the hill of San Bruno and rincon of the same name, and, from east to west, following the foot of said hill," etc., thus reversing the order in which the foot of the cerro and the rincon are mentioned by the other witnesses, but obviously intending, like them, to indicate a rincon at the south base of the hill of San Bruno.

In the account of the preliminary reconnoissance the alcalde describes the boundary pointed out to him by the witnesses as follows: "I ordered the aforesaid individuals to show me the places, limits, and boundaries, according to the indications they have made in their depositions and in conformity with them. They guided me toward the north as far as the foot of the hill ('cerro') named San Bruno, where enters an estero which looks towards the south, and, standing at that place and the point of said estero, which they told me was called the 'Rincon de San Bruno'; from thence beginning the examination with direction towards the west, following the foot of said hill, they showed me a small cañada," etc. After making this reconnoissance, swearing the measurers, measuring the cordel, &c., the alcalde proceeds to the formal measurement of the land and establishment of its boundaries. In his record of the proceeding, the measurement of the boundary in question, is described by the alcalde as follows: "They began said measurement from the 'Solar,' which looks towards the north, and is situated at the foot of the San Bruno hill, the rincon of that name, and the end of an estero which is there and looks towards the south; from said point directing their course towards the west, following the skirt (falda) of said hill," etc. From these descriptions it is very plain that no part of the hill of the San Bruno was included within the limits of the Buri Buri Rancho.

The depositions of the witnesses, the account of the preliminary reconnoissance, and the record of the formal measurement, clearly indicate that in following the eastern boundary in a northerly direction along the esteros they stopped on reaching the rincon or corner at the foot of the hill of San Bruno, and that the northern boundary ran from that point in a westerly direction along the base of the same ridge of hills. The indications of the diseño of the Visitacion grant are equally explicit. It is drawn by Vioget, a professional surveyor, and with more than usual care. The southern boundary of the Visitacion Rancho is indicated by a dotted line, which commences at the bay to the south of the hill or cerro of San Bruno, and running along the southern base of the range of hills of that name, terminates at the Camino Real. It cannot be doubted that it was intended to include within the limits of this map the hills of San Bruno, and that the boundary between the two ranchos was meant to be drawn at their base. The official survey, following literally the erroneous translation of the word "rincon," contained in the decree, has adopted as the point of beginning the "Punta de San Bruno," or the most easterly extremity of the hills of that name, where, projecting into the bay, they form a point or promontory. From thence the line has been surveyed in a westerly direction, running along the hills at a considerable elevation above their base, and in several instances following the line of their crest. But this survey is obviously inconsistent with the terms of the decree as well as with the very explicit language of the act of possession to which the decree refers, and which it was meant to adopt. The language of the decree is, "Beginning at the base of the hill of San Bruno at the point (rincon) of the same name, and the extremity of an estuary which is there and looks to the south, and running thence in a westerly direction along the side of said hill," etc. Read by the light of the act of possession, it is plain that the point of commencement herein referred to was the extremity of an estuary in a rincon or corner of land, lying at the southerly base of the San Bruno hill, and that the line was to be run thence along the base of the hills towards the Camino Real. The term "falda," which occurs in the record of measurement, is translated "side" in the decree. But in the depositions of the witnesses, and in the account of the preliminary reconnoissance, the word "pie," or "foot," is alone mentioned, and the term "falda," which means the lower slope of a hill, was undoubtedly used by the alcalde in the same sense. It is perhaps not easy precisely to define the limits of the tract described as the rincon of San Bruno; nor is it necessary. It was evidently a piece of land lying at the southern base of the hill of San Bruno, within which was an "estero" at the point or head of which the survey commenced. This estero is a natural object readily identified. It is pointed out by Galindo, one of the measurers who assisted at the act of possession. It is the only estero in the immediate vicinity, and its punta or extremity is immediately adjacent to the base of the cerro, and lies within the limits of the rincon. It is evidently the point of commencement established by the alcalde, and described in the decree. From this point it is plain that the line should run in a general westerly direction along the base of the hills so as to leave the latter on the north and within the limits of the Visitacion Rancho. An effort has been made to prove by the testimony of Bajorques and Alviso that the point of commencement fixed by the alcalde was a shell mound or site of an Indian rancheria, north of the estero but south of San Bruno point, adopted in the official survey as the point of beginning. But to this suggestion it is enough to say that it is inconsistent with the act of possession and with the language of the decree. Nothing can be clearer than that the point of commencement established by the act of possession and referred to in the decree was the extremity of an estero situated in a rincon at the base of the San Bruno hill. It is also sought by the testimony of the same witnesses to show that though the line was in fact run along the base of the hills, it was intended to follow their crest.

It is unnecessary to allude to the admissibility of parol testimony to vary the positive terms of a formal record of a judicial proceeding. The record itself discloses that the statement of the witnesses cannot be true. Their own depositions on which the alcalde acted, fix in the most explicit manner the northern line of the Buri Buri at the "pie" (foot) of the hills, and the alcalde certifies that they pointed out that line to him, and it was measured in their presence along the "falda." As against a formal record of this kind, the evidence of aged, illiterate and very infirm witnesses as to their recollection of what was done or intended by the alcalde is, even if admissible, entitled to no weight whatever.

It is also objected, on the part of the United States, that the northern line of the surveys is incorrect in not running in a straight line from the extremity of the estero to the "Laguna Alta." The effect of the alteration suggested would be to exclude from the Buri Buri a strip of land of a triangular shape, which it is contended would constitute a "sobrante" not included within either rancho. But it is evident from the terms of the act of possession that the line from the estero could not have been a straight line, for it is described as following the "falda" of the hills, and it was drawn to a small valley, which begins at the public road, and ends between the Laguna San Bruno and a wooden corral, also called the "Corral de San Bruno." These objects, the Laguna de San Bruno and the corral of the same name, are clearly identified, and I do not understand their position to be disputed.

All the witnesses before the alcalde mention the "Corral de San Bruno," which is at the margin and south of the laguna of the same name, situated in a small valley, or cañada, as the first boundary, or landmark, of the rancho, and they state that the line runs "from said place of the Corral de San Bruno in a westerly direction to the Laguna Alta." The principal ground for contending that the line should run directly from the estero to the Laguna Alta is the fact that the record, after describing it as following the falda of the hills to a small cañada between the Laguna and the Corral de San Bruno, states that it was continued "in the same direction" to the Laguna Alta. But it is not said that the line was a straight line, and we have seen that all the witnesses describe the line from the Corral de San Bruno to the Laguna Alta as running in a westerly direction. In point of fact its course will be considerably to the south of west; but it is highly probable that the alcalde, whose notions of courses by compass were probably as vague as those of the witnesses, assumed, as they did, that the line from the corral would run in a westerly direction, which would be in the same general course as that portion of it from the estero to the corral. But this slight discrepancy is clearly of too little importance to justify us in rejecting the explicit call for the little valley between the Corral de San Bruno and the laguna of the same name, contained in the act of possession, and adopted in the final decree of confirmation. The diseño is also appealed to to show that the line should run directly to the Laguna Alta; but it is evident that both the Laguna Alta and that of San Bruno are very inaccurately laid down on the map, the distance between them being much less than the actual distance. The dotted lines on the diseño seem to have been intended by the alcalde to indicate rather the breadth and length of the tract than its boundaries; for the easternmost line is drawn at some distance from and parallel to the shore of the bay, and yet it is not and cannot be denied that the bay was the eastern boundary. The northern line is drawn at right angles to the eastern line from the estero to the Laguna Alta, but passing near to the Laguna San Bruno at what was no doubt supposed to be the cañada, between the corral and the Laguna San Bruno.

The error already noticed, viz. the supposition that the line from the corral, or the little valley between it and the Laguna San Bruno to the Laguna Alta, would be in the same direction as the line from the estero to the corral, is reproduced on the diseño, and the line is represented as passing by the Laguna San Bruno, and continuing in the same course to the Alta. The whole delineation is very rude, and obviously inaccurate. It was no doubt made by the alcalde to indicate, roughly, the more important landmarks established by him when giving the possession; but it is of no weight when opposed to the explicit and unmistakable description of the lines actually run and the landmarks established, contained in the formal record of his proceedings. The objection last noticed is made by the United States. But it may well be doubted whether, if sustained, the effect would not be to give the strip of land in question to the owners of the Visitacion Rancho and not to the United States. That rancho is bounded on the south by the rancho of Sanchez. It was granted subject to the boundaries of the latter, with which it was intended to be colindante. These boundaries, therefore, when finally established by competent authority, would seem to determine the boundaries of the neighboring rancho, especially as it is shown that there is not enough land within the exterior limits of both ranchos to satisfy the calls for quantity. But the owners of the Visitacion Rancho make no objection to the northwestern corner as fixed in the official survey, and for the reason above given I am of opinion that the location is substantially correct. My opinion is that the official survey should be modified by drawing the northern line of the Buri Buri Rancho from the extremity of the estero, commencing at the stake pointed out by the witnesses, and adopted in the survey of that line by Milo Hoadley; thence following the base of the hills, as indicated in the diagram, marked "Exhibit No. 2," attached to the deposition of that witness, but changing the last course so that it shall terminate at the station marked "B. B., No. 2," on said diagram, and also on the official survey.

[See Case No. 16,016.]

Case No. 16,016.

UNITED STATES v. PAYSON.

SAME v. PIERCE.

[1 Cal. Law J. 325.]

District Court, N. D. California. April 8, 1863.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—CONSTRUCTION OF DEEDS—REFORMATION.

1. If the description in a deed is impossible or repugnant, the court will so correct it as to make it conform to the probable intentions of the parties.

2. Where no such repugnancy or impossibility exists, the court will not (as against third parties who purchased the remaining interest of grantor at sheriff's sale, ignorant of his intentions in making his previous conveyance, except so far as the deed disclosed them) entertain an application to reform the description in a deed, although it has no doubt of the error of the description.

3. The facts that the tract in question was confirmed by the board of land commissioners, in the same language as the description in the deed; that, in the same language, it was excepted out of the confirmation of another part of the same general rancho to another claimant; and that eleven years have elapsed since the presentation of the claim—operate strongly against such application.

[See Cases Nos. 16,015 and 16,017.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. The claim for the Rancho Cañada de Guadalupe, La Visitacion y Rodeo Viejo, granted by Governor Alvarado to Jacob P. Leese, July 31, 1841, was finally confirmed to Henry R. Payson, with the exception of a certain tract which had been sold by Ridley, the assignee of Leese, to parties from whom Pierce derived title. For this excepted tract William Pierce duly presented his claim and obtained a final decree of confirmation. In the decree in the Payson case the land excepted from its operation is described in the language of the deed under which Pierce claimed, and, in the Pierce suit the land confirmed to him is described in the same terms. As the deed describes the tract by courses and distances, and as its execution and validity are not disputed, it would seem that there should be no difficulty in running off and establishing the lines. But, on attempting to apply the calls of the deed to the ground, most embarrassing questions have arisen. It is found that of the three last courses mentioned in the deed one is partly, and two others are wholly, in the waters of the Bay of San Francisco. These courses, as given in the deed, are as follows: "Thence east, 37 chains 37 links; thence south, 75° 30′ east, 44 chains 16 links; thence north, 18° east, to place of beginning."

In running the lines called for in the deed and decree, taking them as true, the surveyor found that the first of these courses could not be completed without running into the bay. He therefore stopped at the shore, leaving the length of the course less by 3 chains and 2 links than that called for. The next course, if run in the direction and to the length called for, would have terminated at a point in the bay nearly 5/8ths of a mile distant from the point on the shore at which the surveyor stopped; while the last course would, in like manner, be wholly in the bay, terminating at a rock on the shore from which the survey began. It will be observed that, in each of these courses, except the last, distance is given as well as direction. It might seem, therefore, that the first two must have been surveyed and their lengths determined by actual measurement. But this, if the deed is to be literally followed, is evidently impossible; for the 14th, or next to the last, course in the deed, is a point on the bay more than half a mile distant from the shore, and inaccessible to the surveyor. It was therefore impossible for him to determine the length of this course by measurement, or to ascertain by observation how its points of termination bore from the point of beginning. It is possible, however, that the surveyor, after running out the previous courses on land, may have drawn the courses on his map and determined their length by calculation. But this seems highly improbable. The official survey has followed, with some slight variations, the calls of the deed—except that on reaching the shore in the 13th course, the margin of the bay is meandered to the place of beginning, and the remainder of the 13th, together with the 14th and 15th courses, is discarded, as including lands not embraced within the original grant.

To this survey the claimants of the tract and the United States object. It is contended that the line of a fence, erected in the winter of 1851–2, should be adopted as the true boundary of the tract. It appears that, in 1849, Leese, the grantee, conveyed the entire tract to Ridley. In January, 1851, Ridley conveyed to Hammond, Vokes, and Gorham the tract now in question, and known as "Visitacion Valley." In September, 1851, Gorham released to Hammond and Vokes, and in the same month Hammond conveyed to Vokes. In October, 1851, Vokes sold to Eaton and Bryant, but the deed was to Eaton alone. The present claimants derive title from Eaton. In July, 1851, all the right, title, and interest of Ridley in and to the remaining portion of the rancho was sold under execution by the sheriff of the county. The claimant, Payson, derives title from the purchaser at this sale. The fence in question was erected by Eaton and Bryant in the winter succeeding the sheriff's sale. It does not appear that any attempt was made to place it on the lines called for in the deed. On the northerly side a line indicated by some stakes was followed, but by whom these stakes were planted, or with what object, does not appear. On the southerly side of the valley the fence was erected on the hill side, about one-third the distance from the base to the crest, in accordance, it would seem, with a general idea derived by Bryant and Eaton from Vokes that the land purchased included the valley and the slope of the hills to about that distance. It does not appear that Ridley was aware of these proceedings. No proof is offered that he pointed out the land inclosed by the fence as the tract sold by him, or that he has in any way indicated an intention to sell any other tract than that described in the deed. An attempt is made by Mr. Matthewson, the surveyor, to reconcile the calls of the deed with the lines of the fence. He observed that the line of the fence begins at the rock admitted to be the point of beginning and ends on the shore of the bay at a point from which the point of beginning bears north 18° 23′ east magnetic. This last course agrees within 23′ of the last course mentioned in the deed, taking it, also, as magnetic. Mr. Matthewson was of opinion that this coincidence was too remarkable to be accidental, and therefore supposed that the fence was intended to be placed on the lines described in the deed, especially as it seemed far more probable that the last course was determined by observation, and that the surveyor obtained the bearings of the point of beginning by sighting it with an instrument placed on the land, than that he laid down by calculation two courses and part of a third wholly in the water. But in attempting to make the calls of the deed conform to the lines of the fence he is obliged to alter three of them by substituting a southwesterly for a northwesterly direction. But even with this alteration the lines do not exactly coincide. In fact no one of the courses of the fence corresponds with a course described in the deed. The difference, however, is slight, and the tract enclosed is substantially the same. The hypothesis of Mr. Matthewson derives some additional probability from the fact that the tract granted seems to have been known as "Visitacion Valley," though it is not so named in the deed. It would seem probable therefore that the whole valley was intended to be granted, bounded on either side by lines drawn along the slope of the hills at a uniform distance from their base. On the south side the line must be located along the falda or hillside, whether we take the courses of the deed as magnetic or as true, or adopt the line of the fence. It would seem probable that a corresponding line was intended to be adopted as the boundary of the valley on the northern side, and not a line running through and excluding a portion of the level land. On the other hand the area of the tract included in the survey, as proposed by Mr. Matthewson, is more than 1,100 acres, while the deed mentions the extent of the land at 700 acres, "more or less." That its extent was not accurately known is evident, but a difference of 400 acres between its actual and its supposed area is so great a discrepancy as to afford an argument of some force against Mr. Matthewson's theory. That the deed was intended to convey the tract surrounded by the fence is also rendered probable by another circumstance. If the order of the courses be reversed, not only will the last course, if taken as the first, strike the shore at or near the termination of the fence line, but the corner of the survey on the northwest will be found to be identical with the northwest corner of the fence—thus affording corroboration of the theory that the tract conveyed and the tract enclosed were intended to be the same.

It is also to be observed that on the hypothesis that the courses in the water were obtained by calculation it is difficult to imagine why the length as well as the direction of the last course was not given. The fact that the direction alone is mentioned leads to the inference that the surveyor must, after measuring the other courses on land, have fixed his instrument on the shore, and obtained merely the bearings of the point of beginning, being unable to measure its distance as the line ran across the bight of the cove, forming the chord of the curve formed by the shores of the bay. Again, if the courses were, in fact run, as mentioned in the deed, it would appear almost inevitable that the surveyor would terminate his land courses on the shore, leaving the remaining ones to be determined. It would hardly happen that any course would be partly on land and partly in the water; that is, would commence at a point some distance inland and terminate at the water. And yet this must have occurred, whether the courses are taken as true or magnetic.

All these considerations incline me strongly to the belief that an error in the description has occurred; and, probably, in the courses indicated by Mr. Matthewson. It seems very improbable that the purchasers would, within less than a year after they acquired title, have gone to the great expense of surrounding a tract of land with a fence, if they knew or suspected that the land conveyed to them had entirely different boundaries.

But, whatever be the plausibility or probability of this conjecture, I have been unable, after much consideration, to see that in this proceeding and at this stage, I am justified in setting aside the final decree and reforming the deed, the description of which it recites. The fence, we have seen, was erected in 1852. In 1853 a survey of the tract following the line of the fence was made. This survey must have apprised the owners that the boundaries of the tract enclosed, in no respect corresponded with the calls of their deed. No application was made to the board for a confirmation of any other tract than that described in the deed. A confirmation of that tract described in the language of the deed was obtained. And the same tract, similarly described, was excepted out of the confirmation to Payson, the claimant of the remainder of the rancho. No application to correct either of these decrees was made in this court; and they have both become final and conclusive. It is only where a survey is made under them that, after a lapse of nearly eleven years from the date of the presentation of the claim, that this court is asked under color of correcting the survey, to set aside the decrees and reform the deed in accordance with the alleged intention of the parties. If the description in the deed were impossible or repugnant, the court would, necessarily, be obliged to construe it and to correct its calls so as to make them conform to the probable intention of the parties. But the tract partly on land and partly on water, described in the deed, may have been intended to be granted, though it seems to me highly improbable. The surveyor who furnished the description may have measured the land courses and have obtained the others by calculation. And, as against third parties, who purchased the remaining interest of the grantor at sheriff's sale, ignorant of his intentions in making his previous conveyance, except so far as the conveyance disclosed them, it has appeared to me that this application to reform it cannot, in this proceeding, be entertained.

The official survey has strictly pursued the courses of the deed, taking them as true. But this seems at variance with the legal presumption in such cases. "A contract that land shall be surveyed in square, to the cardinal points, is well performed by a survey made according to the magnetic meridian. It being doubtful whether the true or magnetic meridian was meant, the popular and not the technical meaning must govern." Finnie v. Clay, 2 Bibb, 351. In Vance v. Marshall, 3 Bibb, 148, the magnetic, and not the true, meridian was held to be the proper guide for ascertaining the beginning of a survey. No proof is offered as to the person by whom, or the manner in which the survey on which the deed was founded was in fact made. The probabilities of the case are strongly in favor of the legal presumption, for at the date of the survey the true meridian had not been determined, as has been since done by the United States officers.

My opinion is that I have no alternative but to follow the description in the deed and decree, adopting the calls of the former, if any discrepancy arising from clerical errors be found—and that the courses are to be taken as magnetic. The survey is to stop on reaching the shore, which is thence to be meandered to the point of beginning. The land below high water was not included in the original grant, and, of course, cannot be included in the survey of a subgrantee. With regard to Payson's survey, the only objection is as to the location of the southern exterior boundary. It is claimed that the line should run from the Portezuelo, along the crest of the hills to the Miconada of San Bruno, the point of beginning. The grant describes the land as bounded on the west by the Camino Real and the Portezuelo, on the south by the rancho of Jose Sanchez. The diseño shows unmistakably that the southern line was intended to run along the southern base of the San Bruno mountains, from the bay to the road to San Jose, the road forming the western boundary. On the south lay the rancho of Sanchez, known as "Buri Buri." But for the ascertainment of this line between these ranchos, we are not left to the calls of the grants, or the indications of the diseños. A judicial possession was given, and measurement made of the boundaries of the Buri Buri. The true location of the line thus established was considered and determined by this court in the Buri Buri case, the owners of both ranchos and all others interested being parties to the proceeding. The establishment of the northern line of Buri Buri necessarily fixes the southern line of the adjoining rancho, as the grant of the latter calls for the former, as bounding it on the south. The official survey in this case has pursued the common boundary line from the bay to the Camino Real, running at or near the base of the hills, as indicated by the diseño, and as the line was fixed by the officer giving judicial possession. On reaching the road the boundary line turns to the north, following the road to and beyond the Portezuelo—thus forming the western boundary—the Camino Real and the Portezuelo the western boundary, as called for in the grant. It appears to me that the official survey is, in this respect, correct. It is therefore approved, except as to the lines by which the excepted tract confirmed by Pierce—which must be modified as hereinbefore directed. It being understood that said excepted tract shall in no case be surveyed so as to embrace lands within the exterior limits of the original grant and diseño—and that, if the lands of the deed, when run, are found to include any such lands they must be modified so as to exclude them.

Case No. 16,017.

UNITED STATES v. PAYSON.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 138.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

The validity of this claim is undoubted.

Claim [by Henry R. Payson] for two leagues of land in San Francisco county [known as the "Rancho Cañada de Guadalupe" and "Visitacion y Rodeo Viejo"], confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.
E. O. Crosby, for appellee.

BY THE COURT. The claim in this case was confirmed by the board, and it has been submitted on appeal without additional evidence, or the statement on the part of the appellants of any objection to the validity of the claim. I have however, as has been my practice, examined the transcript on file, but have discovered no ground for reversing the decision of the board. The authenticity of the original grant seems undoubted, and the expediente is produced from the archives confirmed by a record or note of the grant in the book in which such entries were made. The land was occupied by the original grantee within the time limited, and appears ever since to have been held by him and his grantees as its notorious and recognized owners. The mesne conveyances appear to be regular and to vest the title to the land claimed by him in the present claimant. A decree confirming the decision of the board must therefore be entered.

[See Cases Nos. 16,015 and 16,016.]

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

UNITED STATES (PEABODY v.). See Case No. 10,870.

Case No. 16,018.

UNITED STATES v. PEACO et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 601.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

RIOT—WHAT CONSTITUTES—PERSONS PRESENT AND COUNTENANCING—PRIOR CONVICTION OF ASSAULT—ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

1. To constitute a riot, it is not necessary that the violence and tumult actually committed should have been premeditated by three or more persons assembled with intent to commit the same; nor that there should have been promises of mutual assistance, before or at the time of committing the actual violence.

2. To charge a man with riot, who is seen in the crowd, after the commencement of the affray, it is not necessary to show that he was actively engaged in the affray, or actively countenancing or supporting the same, if present and ready to give his support when necessary.

3. A person convicted of assault and battery committed in a riot, may still be tried and convicted of the riot.

4. To constitute a riot, three or more persons must assemble, and either at the time of assembling, or afterwards, while assembled, intend, with force and violence, to do some unlawful act, and mutually to assist each other against any who should oppose them in doing such act; and the act must be done in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people.

5. It is no good ground of arrest of judgment, in a criminal case, that the marshal did not summon forty-eight jurors, and the clerk draw twenty-three grand jurors, by ballot, according to the Maryland act of 1797, c. 87, which was only applicable to the county courts; nor that one of the petit jurors had been summoned and had served on the petit jury of the next preceding term; such objections are too late, after the jurors are sworn.

Indictment for a riot, which originated in a quarrel between the members of the Typographical Society and some journeymen printers in the employment of General Duff Green, and which was immediately provoked by an attack made by Harvey, one of those journeymen, upon Lowry, the secretary of a meeting of the society, in which General Green's men were designated as rats (which means, unworthy members of the profession); a revised list of rats having been, on that day, published.

After the evidence was closed on both sides, Mr. W. L. Brent, for the defendants, having cited 1 Russ. Crimes, 247, 249; 2 Chit. Cr. Law, 487; and 1 Starkie, 524,—prayed the court to instruct the jury: "1st. That to constitute a riot, the violence and tumult must not only be premeditated, but the premeditation must be by three or four persons assembling, or already assembled together, with the intention to commit an act, and afterwards committing the same in a violent, turbulent manner, to the terror of the people. 2d. That should the jury be of opinion, from the evidence, that the disturbance, on the night of the 30th of May, spoken of by the witnesses, was not premeditated, and arose upon a sudden quarrel or cause, produced by the previous attack on Lowry, and without promises of mutual assistance, before, or at the time, the defendants are not guilty of a riot. 3d. That, should the jury be of opinion, from the evidence, that the defendants did engage in the affray, after they had assembled to assist Lowry, who had been beaten, they are not guilty of a riot, unless it has been proven, by satisfactory evidence, that, before their engaging therein, or at the time thereof, they formed themselves into a party of three or more, and made mutual promises to assist one another. 4th. That, should the jury be of opinion, from the evidence, that the defendants were seen in the crowd, after the affray began, they are not guilty of a riot, unless it be satisfactorily proven that they were actively engaged in doing, countenancing, or supporting the same, or ready, if necessary, to support the same. 5th. That, in the present case, should the jury be of opinion, from the evidence, that the only proof of Walter's being in the affray, is from his having assaulted Madden, he is entitled to a verdict of acquittal, because he has been tried and found guilty of the said assault, and cannot be again tried and punished for the same."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Which instructions THE COURT refused to give, but instructed the jury, that, before they can lawfully convict the defendants, upon this indictment, they must be satisfied, by the evidence, that the defendants, to the number of three or more, assembled; and, either at the time of assembling, or afterwards, while assembled, formed an intent, with force and violence, to do the acts charged in the indictment, or some of them, and mutually to assist each other against any who should oppose them in doing such acts; and that the defendants did the same in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people. That it is not material how suddenly that intent was formed, nor whether it was produced by the previous contest between Lowry and Harvey. Nor is it necessary, to the conviction of the defendants, on this indictment, that they should have actually made formal promises to each other, of mutual assistance, if they had such a mutual intent. Nor is it necessary to their conviction, that those who were assembled, with intent to commit the acts charged in the indictment, should have been actively engaged therein, if they were present, and ready to support, if necessary.

THE COURT refused to give the fifth instruction prayed by the defendant's counsel, because, although the assault on Madden should be the only evidence of his being concerned in the riot (if it was one) and although he should have been punished for that assault, yet if he was one of the rioters, he is jointly guilty with all the rest of the defendants, of all the other outrages committed by them in that riot; and the punishment for the assault will be considered (if he should be found guilty of the riot) when the court is about to apportion the punishment of the defendants according to their several degrees of guilt. Although an assault may be given in evidence upon a prosecution for a riot, yet it is not the only evidence necessary to support it. The true criterion of identity of cause of action, or of prosecution, is, that the same evidence will support both; the offences are quite distinct and different. An assault is not necessary to constitute a riot; nor are the ingredients of a riot necessary to constitute an assault. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 35; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 452.

After a verdict against the defendants, their counsel moved in arrest of judgment, because forty-eight jurors were not summoned by the marshal, and twenty-three grand jurors drawn, by ballot, by the clerk, according to the provisions of the Maryland act of 1797, c. 87, § 8; and because one of the petit jurors who sat upon the trial, had been summoned and served as a petit juror at the next preceding term, contrary to the 3d section of the same act.

THE COURT, however, overruled the motion, being of opinion that the eighth section of the act of 1797, c. 87, applied only to the county court of Maryland; as this court had decided at the very commencement of its practice, when the following order was entered upon its minutes: "Friday, July 10, 1801. Ordered, by the court, that twenty-four grand jurors, and thirty-six petit jurors be summoned to the next term;" and such has been the practice ever since that time. In Burr's Trial [Case No. 14,692d], it is said that any one, under a criminal charge, may, before the grand jury is sworn, except to an irregularity in summoning them; from which an inference is drawn, that after they are sworn the exception is too late. The third section of the act of 1797, c. 87, "that no person shall be summoned as a juror, by any sheriff or coroner of this state, to two general, or county courts successively," is for the ease of jurors, and merely directory to the summoning officer. It constitutes no valid exception to the qualification of the juror; and if it did, it is too late to take it after the juror is sworn.

Motion overruled; and judgment upon the verdict.

Case No. 16,019.

UNITED STATES v. PEACOCK.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 215.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1804.

CRIMINAL LAW—POSTPONEMENT OF VENIRE—FORGERY OF BILL OF EXCHANGE—INDICTMENT.

1. A venire may be postponed.

2. In an indictment for forging a bill in the name of a fictitious drawer and indorser, it is not necessary to state any real subsequent indorsements. They are no part of the bill. The indorsement by the prisoner may be given in evidence to prove his intent to defraud, although such indorsement be not set forth in the indictment.

3. The omission of the words "account of" was fatal to the indictment. After jury sworn the court will not quash the indictment. The prisoner has a right to a verdict.

[4. Cited in U. S. v. Brown, Case No. 14,658, to the point that the person whose name is forged may testify for the prosecution under a charge of forgery.]

Indictment for forgery. A venire was ordered to this day, Thursday, January 17, 1805, and upon request of the prisoner [B. W. Peacock] the trial was postponed until Monday next; whereupon the jurors summoned were ordered to attend on Monday. The like was done in the case of U. S. v. Williams [Case No. 16,709] at last term. This indictment was for the forgery of a foreign bill of exchange in the name of a fictitious drawer and payee and indorser, with intent to defraud Sperry & Barnes, to whom the prisoner had sold the bill and indorsed it.

P. B. Key, for the prisoner, objected to the bill being given in evidence; it being indorsed by the prisoner and W. Thornton, and by Crow, Wright & Co., and the indorsements not being set forth in the indictment.

Mr. Jones, for the United States. The indorsement is no part of the bill. As between the indorser and indorsee the indorsement is the drawing of a new bill; and as between the holder and the drawee it is only an assignment. In setting forth the intent to defraud any party, it is not necessary to set forth the manner; but the general intent is sufficient. This appears clearly from all the authorities. Gilb. (Lofft) Ev. 690; Rex v. Powell, 2 W. Bl. 787; 1 Leach, 77, Case 43. The manner is matter of evidence. Forgery at common law may be of an order to pay money. An objection was taken, in that case, that the indictment did not set forth that J. Ward had alum of the Duke of Buckingham in his hands whereby it would appear that the Duke of Buckingham could be injured by the draft. But it was held not necessary; if the Duke of Buckingham might be defrauded thereby, it was sufficient to constitute the crime of forgery at common law. Rex v. Ward, 2 Ld. Raym. 1461, 2 Strange, 747.

Mr. Key. The drawer and drawees are fictitious. If I draw a bill in the name of a fictitious drawer and drawee, and keep it in my pocket it is no offence; for it cannot be with intent to defraud persons not existing; no intent to defraud could be alleged until it was indorsed; the intent must be proved by acts; until indorsed there can be no evidence of the intent to defraud Crow, Wright & Co.; the intent did not commence until the bill was indorsed. The forgery in this case, if it exists, did not exist until it was indorsed and thrown into circulation with intent to defraud some person. It cannot appear to be a criminal act unless it be stated in the indictment that the bill was thrown into circulation. The indictment states that the bill was payable to the order of R. W. Peacock; and does not state that R. W. Peacock even appointed to whom it should be paid; and therefore there was no person who could receive the money; the bill had no operation until indorsed by R. W. Peacock. If the bill had been drawn in the name of a real person, then it might have been criminal; but being in a fictitious name, the indictment must show the facts by which it shall appear that injury could arise to some person. Instruments in indictments must be set forth in hæc verba; if the omission of a letter makes it a different word, it is fatal; a fortiori, the omission of the indorsement, which indorsement constitutes the essence of the offence. McNal. Ev. 511, 513. R. W. Peacock was a party on the face of the bill; and it was necessary (in order to show that the fact was criminal) to state his indorsement. This indorsement was essential to the negotiability of the bill. Upon this indictment they have charged the forging a bill never negotiated; and which without negotiation is an innocent paper. The case in Lord Raymond, as to forgery at common law, is not law. 2 McNal. Ev. 637. It was decided since the colonization of Maryland. By the common law there could not be a forgery of a bill of exchange. There is a difference between forging the name of a real person, and putting in a fictitious name; this cannot be to the injury of the fictitious person; but in the former case it may be to the injury of the real person; in the case of a fictitious person it can injure no one until indorsed; before indorsement it is an innocent act.

Mr. Jones. The only question is whether the indorsement constituted a part of the bill; the omitted indorsements are true, and therefore it is not necessary to state them. If the bill was forged with intent to defraud, although it might have been kept in his pocket and never negotiated, it is sufficient to constitute the offence The case of a forged lease and release (Rex v. Crooke, 2 Strange, 901), which were imperfect and therefore inoperative, was held to be a case of forgery; the intent being proved. It is not necessary to state that the forged bill was published (Rex v. Ward, Ld. Raym. 1461).

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT was of opinion that on the first count, in which the offence charged is the forging of the bill with the intent to defraud some person therein mentioned, this intent may be proved by after circumstances, without their being set forth. The indorsement of the bill by the prisoner is one of those circumstances, and is not a part of the bill; evidence may therefore be offered of the making of the bill produced by the attorney of the United States, notwithstanding the indorsements are not set out in the indictment.

Mr. Key objected to the bill going in evidence under the indictment, it having the words "account of" in it, which are not in the bill set forth in the indictment. This variance was admitted to be fatal.

Mr. Jones then moved the court to quash the indictment; but

THE COURT refused to quash it, being of opinion that the prisoner had a right to a verdict.

Verdict for the prisoner.

Mr. Jones, after verdict, renewed his motion to quash the indictment. Granted; no objection being made.

The prisoner was afterwards at the same term convicted upon another indictment, for a similar forging of another bill, on the trial of which the same objection was taken, that the real subsequent indorsements should have been set forth in the indictment. But the objection was again overruled by THE COURT.

To show that a fictitious bill may be forgery, the following cases were cited: Lewis' Case, Fost. Crown Law, 116; Bolland's Case, 1 Leach, 83, Case 47; Lyon's Case, 2 Leach, 597, Case 267; Taft's Case, 1 Leach, 172, Case 88; Taylor's Case, Id. 214, Case 106; and Moffatt's Case, Id. 431, Case 200.

Case No. 16,020.

UNITED STATES v. PEARCE.

[2 McLean, 14.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. Oct. Term, 1837.

POSTMASTERS—VACATION OF OFFICE—DETENTION OF LETTER—STEALING LETTER.

1. A postmaster, until the action of the postmaster general, does not vacate his office by remaining out of the neighborhood of the office.

2. If he keep the office by an assistant he is still responsible to the department and to individuals.

3. The 21st section of the postoffice law [4 Stat. 107] which prescribes a punishment for the detention of a letter or packet, refers to a letter or packet detained, before it reaches the place of destination.

[Cited in brief in Shirk v. People, 121 Ill. 63, 11 N. E. 888.]

4. The stealing or taking a letter, &c., as expressed in the same clause, in the 22d section, means a clandestine taking—not a taking through mistake, or with an innocent intent. It must be a taking with a criminal intent.

[Cited in U. S. v. Marselis, Case No. 15,725; Re Burkhardt, 33 Fed. 27.]

[Cited in Bloom v. City of Xenia, 32 Ohio St. 461.]

The district attorney appeared for plaintiff, and for defendant [Josiah Pearce].

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an indictment under the postoffice law. It contained two counts as follows: "That the defendant was employed in the postoffice department of the United States, as an assistant to Lemuel Brown, the postmaster of the United States at the said township of Shiawassee, and did then and there unlawfully and forcibly detain from the said Lemuel Brown, postmaster, as aforesaid, two packages of letters with which he, the said Josiah Pearce, was then and there intrusted, as such assistant to the said Lemuel Brown, postmaster, as aforesaid, against the peace," &c. "And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present that the said Josiah Pearce, to wit: on the 25th day of January, 1839, at the said township of Shiawassee, in the district aforesaid, unlawfully, fraudulently and deceitfully, did take from the mail of the United States three packages of letters, against the peace," &c. It was proved that Lemuel Brown was postmaster, and being about to leave the neighborhood for some months, he appointed Pearce, the defendant, assistant, the person who had acted as assistant in the office being unwell. After an absence of about three months Brown returned, and finding that the defendant had removed the office to his own house, and that there was complaint respecting the removal, he called on the defendant, at his house, in company with his former assistant whose appointment had not been revoked, and informed the defendant that he would relieve him from any further care of the office, and would take the papers, &c. Certain letters directed to the postmaster, received in his absence, and others received by the last mail, and the dead letters were handed to him; but the defendant refused to deliver the other letters, or pay over the money he had received for postage, and seizing a gun threatened to shoot the postmaster if he did not leave the house. The postmaster retired, and left the letters he had received with his former assistant, with instructions to act as his assistant. He did so, and handed out the letters in his possession as they were called for. The postmaster boarded at the house, with the assistant, at which the office was kept. In the course of two or three days after this, the defendant made oath before a justice of the peace that certain property had been stolen or fraudulently taken from him, specifying certain letters, &c., which were legally in his possession; on which a search warrant was issued, and the letters in the possession of the regular assistant taken from him, and he was arrested and taken before a justice of the peace. On examination the assistant was released, but the letters were delivered over by the justice to the defendant, who continued for some days to open the mail and hand out letters, claiming a right so to act by virtue of his appointment. The postmaster then applied to the authority of the United States, instituted a prosecution against the defendant, and, through the instrumentality of the marshal, obtained possession of the postoffice, letters and papers.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The defendant offered evidence to prove that the postmaster had agreed to resign the office in his favor; that he had sold him the case in which the letters were deposited; that he had removed from Shiawassee, and, consequently, had, under the law and instructions of the department, vacated the office. And in support of this last position the postoffice act was read, which provides that no person shall hold the office of postmaster who does not reside at the place where the office is kept. But THE COURT held that this provision was directory to the postmaster general, and, indeed, was imperative on him; but that until he acted, the postmaster and his sureties were responsible to the department, and to individuals who should be injured by any neglect of duty in the office. That if the postmaster had intended to remove, about which fact there was contradictory evidence, the weight of the evidence being decidedly against the allegation that he had removed, it could constitute no justification to the defendant.

The evidence being closed the district attorney claimed a conviction of the defendant under that part of the 22d section of the postoffice act of 1825, which provides, that "if any person shall steal the mail, or shall steal, or take from, or out of, any mail, or from, or out of, any postoffice, any letter or packet therefrom, or from any postoffice, whether with or without the consent of the person having custody thereof, and shall open, embezzle or destroy, any such mail, letter or packet, the same containing any article of value, &c., shall, on conviction thereof, be imprisoned not less than two, nor exceeding ten years." And it is insisted that a conviction should be had, also, under the 21st section, for the detention of letters, on the first count in the indictment. The 21st section provides, that "if any person employed in any of the departments of the postoffice establishment, shall unlawfully detain, or open, any letter, packet or mail of letters, with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come into his possession, and which are intended to be conveyed by post," he shall, on conviction thereof, be punished, &c. The evidence does not show that the defendant detained any letters which came into his possession, "and which were intended to be forwarded by mail;" and it is the detention of such letters that is punishable under this clause of the statute. It applies to letters in transitu, and which have not reached their place of destination; letters deposited in a postoffice to be forwarded, or handed to a mail carrier on his route, between postoffices, come within the provision if fraudulently detained. As there is no evidence against the defendant, showing the detention of such letters, he cannot be convicted on the first count in the indictment. More difficulty arises in giving a construction to the 22d section as applying to the facts proved. The language of the act is, if any person shall steal, or take from any mail or postoffice a letter, &c., shall be punished, &c. Now to give a literal construction to this language, the taking from the mail, or a postoffice, a letter, is punishable the same as for stealing it. This could not have been the intention of the legislature. A mere taking may be an innocent act, as if done through mistake, or, without any criminal intent; and we find in the latter part of the same section that, if any person shall take any letter or packet not containing any article of value, out of a postoffice, a very different punishment is inflicted. It could not have been the intention of the legislature to provide different penalties for the same act; and, consequently, the taking in the part of the section first cited, must either be limited to letters containing some article of value, or to a felonious taking. The taking of a letter which contains an article of value, is limited in this section to a taking with or without the consent of the person having the custody thereof, and where such letter is embezzled or destroyed. This provision does not embrace the class of offences provided for in the previous part of the section, which is stealing or taking. The design of the taking is shown by the embezzlement or destruction of the letter. But is a simple taking, without a felonious intent, punishable the same as for stealing? We think, when the statute is taken together, and its object and scope are considered, that such a construction cannot be sustained. To come within this provision of the statute, the taking must not only be unlawful but felonious; it must be a clandestine taking—such as would amount to larceny of personal property. This construction is not only justified by a different punishment being provided in the same section, for taking a letter from a postoffice, but by the first taking being placed in the same class and punished as for the stealing or the embezzlement of a letter.

The conduct of the defendant was highly reprehensible in refusing to surrender the office, on the demand of the postmaster; and still more so on his obtaining possession of the letters delivered to the postmaster, under the forms of law. This proceeding was an aggravation of his offence, and can only be palliated, in any degree, by the ignorance of those who were engaged in it. It was a prostitution of the forms of law to attain an illegal object. But unless the defendant in taking the steps he did take had a criminal intent, he is not guilty under the above section. If he was honestly engaged in the prosecution of what he supposed to be a right, and his whole conduct evinced nothing more than a disposition to hold the office and fairly to discharge its duties, he was not guilty of a felonious taking within the meaning of the statute. It is the intent, in all instances, which constitutes the crime, and which is ascertained by the acts of the offender. In many instances the act itself being a crime of great enormity, the whole burden of proving an innocent intent is devolved on the party accused. In this case enough appears in the evidence to show that the defendant did not intend to steal the mail, or any letters or packets from the postoffice. Of this, however, the jury can judge.

Verdict not guilty.

Case No. 16,021.

UNITED STATES v. PEARCE et al.

[2 Sumn. 575.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1837.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS—EMOLUMENTS—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

The act of congress of 1822, c. 107 [3 Stat. 693], provides, that whenever the emoluments of certain collectors of the customs "shall exceed $3,000 in any one year, &c. the excess shall in every such case be paid into the treasury of the United States." The defendant was collector of the port of Gloucester, and was removed from office July 29th, 1829. From January 1st of the same year to the day of his removal, he had received for salary, fees, and commissions $3,457.83; the excess of this over $3,000, after deducting certain legal expenses, he paid to the treasury of the United States. Held, that all the fees and commissions received by the collector are to be deemed to be received for his own use, until they exceed the maximum amount of $3,000; that the defendant was, therefore, absolutely entitled, in his own right, to the fees and emoluments of office, not exceeding $3,000, received during the seven months preceding his removal, although he did not continue in office a whole year from January 1st; and that the year of his successor in office commenced on the day of his appointment, and ended with the same day in the succeeding year.

[Cited in Hooper v. Fifty-One Casks of Brandy, Case No. 6,674; U. S. v. Wendell, Id. 16,666.]

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Debt by the United States upon the official bond of the collector of the port and district of Gloucester, in Massachusetts. Plea, non est factum. At the trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for the sum of $1,157 67, upon which judgment was rendered in the district court of Massachusetts district in favor of the plaintiffs. [Case unreported.] There was a bill of exceptions taken at the trial by the plaintiffs, upon which the present writ of error was brought. From that bill of exceptions it appeared, that the defendant, William Pearce, (the time of whose appointment did not appear,) was collector of the customs for the port of Gloucester, in 1829, and was removed from that office, by the president, on the 29th of July of the same year. Between the 1st day of January of the same year and the day of his removal from office, he had received, for salary, fees and commissions, the sum of $3,457 83, of which $144 70 was for salary, $473 35 for fees, and $2,839 78 for commissions. From this aggregate sum there was deducted the sum of $216 62 for official expenses during that period, and the sum of $241 21 paid over by Pearce to the treasurer of the United States. The balance, $3,000, Pearce claimed a right to retain as the maximum compensation for his services for the year 1829. The United States allowed to Pearce the sum of $1,736 41, the maximum compensation from the 1st of January, 1829, to the time of his removal from office, and insisted upon their right to the balance ($1,263 28). And the district attorney, at the trial, accordingly prayed the district judge so to instruct the jury; which instruction the district judge refused to give; and instructed the jury, that Pearce had a right, by law, to retain the whole of the said sum of $3,000 for his compensation from the 1st of January, 1829, to the day of his removal from office; and the jury, accordingly, in their verdict disallowed this claim of the United States.

J. Mills, U. S. Dist. Atty.

R. Choate, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The only question, arising upon this writ of error, is upon the instruction given to the jury by the learned judge of the district court, as set forth in the bill of exceptions. The question, then, is, whether this instruction is correct in point of law; and the solution of it depends upon the true interpretation of the statutes of the United States upon this subject. The only statutes upon this subject are the statute of 1799, c. 129, § 2 [1 Story's Laws, 664; 1 Stat. 704, c. 23], and the statute of 1822, c. 107 [1 Stat. 693]. The former statute provides for the payment to the collectors of the customs of certain fees and emoluments for their own use, the fees to arise from certain specified official acts and papers, and the emoluments to arise from a certain specified per centage on all moneys received by them on account of duties on goods imported, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels. And, in addition to the allowances above mentioned, it further provides, that certain collectors (among whom is the collector of the port of Gloucester) shall be annually paid the sum of $250. In another section it further provides, that, when a collector shall die, or resign, the commissions, to which he would have been entitled on the receipt of the duties bonded by him, shall be equally divided between him, or his personal representative, and his successor, whose duty it shall be to collect the same. It is very clear, that, under this statute all the fees and emoluments (exclusive of the salary, which would be governed by other principles,) actually received by any collector, during his continuance in office, would belong to him for his own use, notwithstanding his subsequent removal from office within the same official year. And unless the statute of 1822, c. 107, has made some different provision, changing this result, it is equally clear, that the United States have no title to demand the balance, which they now seek to recover from Pearce, the collector. We are, therefore, driven to the consideration of this last statute. After having limited, in the 8th section, the emoluments of the collectors of the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans, to a certain sum, the statute proceeds, in the 9th section, to provide, "that whenever the emoluments of any other collectors of the customs shall exceed $3,000, in any one year, after deducting therefrom the necessary expenses incident to his office in the same year, the excess shall, in every such case, be paid into the treasury of the United States." Now, in point of fact, Pearce has paid all the excess over the $3,000, received by him in the year 1829, into the treasury for the use of the United States. So that, in a literal sense. he has complied with the very terms of the act. But the argument for the United States is, that the $3,000 is intended by the statute as the maximum compensation for the services of the collector for the whole year; and that consequently, if he serves only for a part of the year, he is entitled at most only to a compensation pro rata for the proportionate period, less than a year, of his services. Now, assuming the first branch of the argument to be true in a general sense, there is nothing in the statute, which sustains the latter dependent branch, and authorizes a pro rata compensation for the services of the collector for a part only of the year. If he is entitled to such compensation, it is, because an equity is superinduced upon the statute, not comprehended by its terms, or its professed objects, but flowing from the general principles of natural justice. On the other hand, if we are to construe the language of the statute according to the natural import of the words, as founded upon, and not superseding the provisions of the same act, there is no necessity for any such superinduced equity. All the fees and commissions, received by the collector, are to be deemed to be received for his own use, until they exceed the maximum amount of three thousand dollars; and the excess only, afterwards received, belongs to the government. So, that until he has received $3,000, whatever he receives is for his own sole use without farther account; and there is not a word in the statute, which justifies the conclusion, that, what he has received primarily for his own use, is afterwards, by any subsequent events, to be treated as received for the use of the government. The language of the statute forbids any such interpretation. It declares, that the excess beyond the maximum amount, and not any portion received below that sum, shall belong to the United States. The right, or trust, attaches to the excess, and not to the whole sum received.

[1] [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

If the argument be well founded, then, if Pearce had received during his continuance in office only $500, for his salary, fees, and emoluments; and afterwards his successor in office had received $2,500 before the close of the same year (1829), Pearce would nevertheless, have been entitled to one moiety of the $3,000; that is to say, $1,000 beyond the fees and commissions, which accrued during the time, in which he was collector. Such a doctrine has never been maintained in any judicial tribunal; and, I presume, has never yet been asserted by the government. For, in effect, it would be to transfer from the collector for the time being the fees and emoluments, given to him by the very terms of the statute of 1799, c. 23, to another person, who was not the collector, when those fees and commissions accrued. But, let us put the case a little farther, and suppose, that the new collector, after having thus received $2,500 in the year 1829, should, during the residue of his first official year up to the time when his predecessor was removed, and he was appointed in his stead, have received only $500 more; then he would be entitled, according to the strict terms of the law, to retain the $500 for himself. But, according to the argument, he would be entitled to the $3,000, subject to the deduction of the $1,000 belonging to his predecessor; that is to say, he would be entitled to $2,000 only. Surely this cannot be a safe or just interpretation of the statute.

Again, suppose Pearce, before his removal from office, had received for salary, fees, and commissions $2,500 only. In such a case there would be no excess received by him while in office, in any one year; and, under such circumstances, the terms of the statute would not reach his case. He would be entitled to retain the $2,500. Why? Because the statute of 1799, c. 23, the only one, which gives him the right, gives the fees and emoluments to him for his own use, as soon as they accrue.

The truth is, that the statute of 1799, c. 23 (and in this respect it stands wholly untouched and unrepealed), gives to the collector fees and commissions for certain acts and services performed officially by him, as a compensation therefor. When the services are performed, and not till then, the right attaches; and all that the act of 1822, c. 107, professes to do, is to limit the aggregate amount of those fees and commissions (together with the fixed salary) to the maximum of $3,000, and to make the excess, received by the collector, a trust fund for the United States. This is the natural and appropriate meaning of the language. But the argument for the United States would give the fees and commissions, in many cases, not to the collector, who performed the services; but to another collector, by whom they had not been performed. And this not only in the case of a vacancy by a voluntary act of the collector, such as his resignation, and the case of a vacancy by inevitable accident, as his death; but also in case of a vacancy occasioned by the direct power of the executive in removing him from office. So that the collector, who has borne the burthen, and performed the service, is to yield up his rights, not to the government, as a case of excess, but to his fortunate and unburthened successor. Well might he exclaim in such a case, in the language of the poet, on another occasion, "Sic vos non vobis. Hos feci versiculos; tulit alter honores."

Besides; in my judgment, the true interpretation of the statute applies, and can apply, in its language only to one and the same collector. The words are, "whenever the emoluments of any other collector shall exceed $3,000 in any one year, the excess shall, in every such case, be paid into the treasury." The statute does not look to the case of two different collectors within any one year, or join them together for any period of a year. When does the year of any collector begin and end in the sense of the statute? Plainly, in my judgment, it begins on the day of his appointment, and ends with the same day of the succeeding year. It has nothing to do with the beginning or end of the official year of his predecessor, or with that of the calendar year. If the statute meant, what the argument supposes, its language would have been very different. It would have declared, that the emoluments of the collector or collectors of any other port shall not, in the aggregate, exceed in any one year, calculated from the 1st day of January and to the 31st day of December of the same year, the sum of $3,000; and when there shall be more than one collector of the same port in any one year, the emoluments of the whole year shall be apportioned among them pro rata, according to their respective terms of service. Now, this is the true scope of the argument; and upon the slightest examination it is apparent that it is not possible, by any straining of language, to bend the words of the statute to such an import. In short, the court would be making a new statute, instead of construing an old statute, by such an interpretation. I am not bold enough to undertake such an enterprise. It may be, that there would be more wisdom in such a provision, than there is in the existing law (though it may well be doubted). But that is a matter for the consideration of congress, and not for courts of justice. The case of a commission merchant, who is to receive a compensation for selling goods at a given per centage, not to exceed in the whole a given sum, which has been put by the district attorney, is certainly very much in point. But it is only changing the actors, and not the drama. It is the argument of idem ad idem, resolving itself into the old maxim of antiquity, "Nil agit exemplum litem, quod lite resolvit."

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that by the statute, the collector, who receives, while in office, the fees and emoluments of his office, not exceeding $3,000, is absolutely entitled to them in his own right, whether he continues in office during the whole year or not. The judgment of the district court is, therefore, affirmed.

Case No. 16,022.

UNITED STATES v. PEARL.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 392.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1838.

LARCENY—TAKING BY HACKNEY COACH DRIVER—INDICTMENT.

1. If the owner of goods, by mistake or accident, leaves them in a hackney coach, and the driver finds them there, and, knowing to whom they belong, takes and converts them to his own use with intent to steal them, he is guilty of larceny.

2. In an indictment under the penitentiary act [4 Stat. 448], for stealing bank-notes, quære whether, it is not necessary to state the name of the bank and the date of the notes?

Indictment, under the penitentiary act (section 9) [against negro Frank Pearl] for stealing "one silk reticule of the value of twenty cents, one silver pencil of the value of one dollar, one bank note to the amount of fifty dollars, of the value of fifty dollars, for the payment of fifty dollars; three bank notes, of the value of ten dollars each, to the amount of ten dollars each, for the payment of ten dollars each; of the bank notes, goods, and chattels of one Elizabeth Lee," "against the form of the statute," &c.

W. L. Brent and Mr. Dandridge, for defendant, objected to evidence being given upon the charge of stealing the bank-notes, because they were not sufficiently described in the indictment. The name of the bank should have been stated, and the date of the notes, that it may appear that there was any such bank in existence at the date of the notes. They cited Starkie, Cr. Pl. 216, 217, upon the statute of 2 Geo. II. c. 25, § 3, which provides for the punishment of persons for stealing "any bank-notes." An indictment under that statute describes the bank-note as being "a bank-note of the governor and company of the Bank of England." If it is sufficient to describe the thing in the words of the statute, this would have been a sufficient indictment if it had merely stated that the defendant had feloniously taken and carried away "the property of Mr. Lee, of the value of five dollars."

Mr. Key, contra, contended that it was sufficient to charge the offence in the words of the statute. The English precedents, under the statute of 2 Geo. II. c. 25, § 3, are so. They merely describe the note as "one bank-note." 3 Chit. 917, 973, note a, 974; Archb. Cr. Law, 130; 2 Leach, 1103; 2 East, P. C. 602; Rex v. Johnson, 3 Maule & S. 547; 2 Russ. Crimes, 170.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), said the question had better be reserved for a motion in arrest of judgment, and thereupon evidence was given as to the bank-notes.

Mr. Brent contended before the jury that if a man finds goods and converts them to his own use with intent to steal them, it is not felony; and cited to the jury several authorities, of which the court did not take a note.

Whereupon Mr. Key prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they believe, from the evidence, that Mrs. Lee left her reticule, pencil, and bank notes in the prisoner's hackney-coach by mistake or accident, and that the prisoner found them there, and knew them to belong to her, and took and converted them to his own use with intent to steal them, then he is guilty of larceny.

Mr. Key cited Wynne's Case, 1 Leach, 413; 2 East, P. C. 664; 2 Russ. Crimes, 101.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) gave the instruction as prayed.

Mr. Brent then prayed the court, in substance, to instruct the jury, that if Mrs. Lee lost the property, and the defendant found it and converted it to his own use, with intent to steal it, it is not felony.

But THE COURT refused.

Verdict, "Guilty."

There was a motion in arrest of judgment; but before it was argued, the president pardoned the defendant, and he died.

UNITED STATES (PEGRAM v.). See Case No. 10,906.

Case No. 16,023.

UNITED STATES v. PELLETREAU.

[14 Blatchf. 126.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 5, 1877.

OFFENSES UNDER POSTAL LAWS — EMBEZZLEMENT AND STEALING OF LETTERS.

1. Under section 5467 of the Revised Statutes, an indictment will lie which charges a person employed as a letter carrier in the postal service, with having embezzled a letter which was intended to be conveyed by mail and contained an article of value, and had been entrusted to him, and had come into his possession as such letter carrier.

[Cited in U. S. v. Wight, 38 Fed. 107; U. S. v. Larcher, 134 U. S. 632, 10 Sup. Ct. 628.]

2. Said section 5467 is not confined to the offence of stealing or taking things out of a letter, packet or bag.

[Cited in U. S. v. Falkenhainer, 21 Fed. 627.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Fuller, 4 N. M. 358, 20 Pac. 177.]

[This was an indictment against John Pelletreau for embezzling a letter from the United States mails. Heard on motion to quash.]

Asa W. Tenney, U. S. Dist. Atty.

John J. Allen, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a motion to quash an indictment framed under section 5467 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon the ground that the facts stated do not constitute an offence. The averments of the indictment are, that the accused was a person employed as a letter carrier in the postal service of the United States, and embezzled a certain letter, described, which was intended to be conveyed by mail, and which contained an article of value, described, which said letter had been entrusted to the accused, and had come into his possession as such letter carrier. The contention in behalf of the accused is, that the only offence created by section 5467 is that of stealing or taking things out of a letter, packet or bag. The section is in these words: "Any person employed in any department of the postal service who shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters intrusted to him, or which shall come into his possession, and which was intended to be conveyed by mail, or carried or delivered by any mail carrier, mail messenger, route agent, letter carrier, or other person employed in any department of the postal service, or forwarded through or delivered from any post office or branch post office established by authority of the postmaster-general, and which shall contain any note, bond, draft, check, warrant, revenue stamp, postage stamp, stamped envelope, postal card, money order, certificate of stock, or other pecuniary obligation or security of the government, or of any officer or fiscal agent thereof, of any description whatever; any bank note, bank post bill, bill of exchange, or note of assignment of stock in the funds; any letter of attorney for receiving annuities or dividends, selling stock in the funds, or collecting the interest thereof; any letter of credit, note, bond, warrant, draft, bill, promissory note, covenant, contract, or agreement whatsoever, for or relating to the payment of money, or the delivery of any article of value, or the performance of any act, matter or thing; any receipt, release, acquittance, or discharge of or from any debt, covenant or demand, or any part thereof; any copy of the record of any judgment or decree in any court of law or chancery, or any execution which may have issued thereon; any copy of any other record, or any other article of value, or writing representing the same; any such person who shall steal or take any of the things aforesaid out of any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters which shall have come into his possession, either in the regular course of his official duties or in any other manner whatever, and provided the same shall not have been delivered to the party to whom it is directed, shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor for not less than one year nor more than five years." It is contended that this section omits to say that persons doing any of the acts that are mentioned in the section prior to the last semicolon in it shall be liable to punishment, and makes punishable only the acts mentioned after the words "any such person who shall," following the semicolon. But this construction of the section is entirely too strict even for a criminal statute. It is conceded, that, if the conjunction "and" had been inserted between the semicolon and the words "any," the statute would be complete. But, the omission of the conjunction, by way of ellipsis, in such statutes, is a very common thing. Sections 5463 and 5464 just above, present several instances of such omissions. The intention of the statute is as plain without the conjunction as with it. Manifestly, two classes of offences are intended to be created, one relating to the embezzlement of letters, &c., the other relating to stealing the contents of letters; and this intention is carried out if we suppose an ellipsis, while, without an ellipsis, a very considerable part of the section is useless and void. According, then, to the familiar rule of construction, the statute should be read so as to render its language effective, and, by inserting the conjunction, this is done. So read, it creates the offence charged in the indictment. The motion to quash is, therefore, denied.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

UNITED STATES (PENDLETON v.). See Case No. 10,924.

Case No. 16,024.

UNITED STATES v. The PENELOPE.

[2 Pet. Adm. 438.] [1]

District Court, D. Pennsylvania. 1806.

NON-INTERCOURSE LAWS — TRADING TO ST. DOMINGO—PERSONS "RESIDENT" IN THE UNITED STATES.

[A British subject living in Bermuda, who came to Philadelphia in his own sloop to take his children home from school, and who, after remaining in the United States 13 days, purchased a cargo for St. Domingo, was not a person "resident within the United States," and therefore not within the prohibition of the act suspending commercial intercourse with certain parts of the Island of St. Domingo. 2 Stat. 351.]

[Cited in Burnham v. Rangeley, Case No. 2,176.]

[Cited in brief in People v. Cady (N. Y. App.) 37 N. E. 673.]

This was an information filed by A. J. Dallas, Esq. against the schooner Penelope and her cargo for a supposed breach of the first section of the act of congress, entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain parts of the Island of St. Domingo." [2 Stat. 351.] The facts of the case were these: Mr. Richard Wood, a native of Bermuda, and who had been established there for a great number of years, in partnership with Mr. Joseph Wood his brother, both British subjects, and owners of the sloop Penelope, had during the year 1805, placed his children at school in Philadelphia. Previous to this circumstance, Mr. R. Wood had not been in the United States for many years. With a view to take his children back to Bermuda, and not contemplating any particular commercial enterprise, he came to Philadelphia, on board the Penelope, on the eighteenth day of May, 1806. He found, after his arrival, the law prohibiting intercourse between the United States and certain parts of St. Domingo, in force; and at the instance of some of his friends, and exclusively on his own account, the Penelope took on board a cargo calculated for the markets of the prohibited island. This cargo was purchased by himself, and by Mr. Edward Russel, his brother-in-law, and paid for by Mr. Russel out of the funds of Joseph and Richard Wood. During his stay in Philadelphia, Mr. R. Wood remained at the house of Mr. Russel; and thirteen days after his arrival in Philadelphia, he sailed with his children for Bermuda, where he landed, and ordered the Penelope to Cape François. The Penelope entered Cape François under the American flag, in order, as it was said, to prevent her being interrupted by the British cruizers; but her British register was lodged at the custom-house there; and having disposed of her cargo, she received another on board, and returned to Philadelphia on the twenty-seventh day of August, 1806. She was immediately seized, and the present information was filed.

The cause was tried by a special jury, before the district court, on the 26th day of September. On the part of the claimants of the Penelope, it was said, that the only persons who were objects of the law prohibiting intercourse with St. Domingo, were citizens of the United States, or residents in the same; and that the short visit of Mr. R. Wood for the purpose before stated, and his short stay in Philadelphia, did not bring him within the meaning of the term "resident."

Mr. Dallas (district attorney) in support of the information, considered, first, the facts; and second, the law.

First, the facts. The sloop Penelope sailed from Philadelphia, touched at Bermuda, and went to Cape François, after the non-intercourse act was notified at the custom-house; and returned directly from the Cape to Philadelphia. If, therefore, she was owned, or employed, in part, or in whole, by a person resident within the United States, the voyage was unlawful, and the vessel was forfeited. The evidence on the point of ownership and residence proves, that the sloop was in part the property of R. Wood, a British subject, who came in her from Bermuda to Philadelphia, where he remained for several days; that while he was here, he shipped a cargo, through the medium of American merchants; that he returned in her to Bermuda (Capt. Dunscomb commanding her both when she sailed from and returned to Philadelphia), and then sent her on, with the cargo, to the Cape; that by the custom-house papers of the Cape she was described as "the American sloop Penelope of Philadelphia, Capt. Hatchet;" and that, consequently, for the purposes of the voyage, she had changed her ownership, her captain, and her flag.

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

Second, the law. From these facts it was urged, that the case came clearly within the pre-existing mischief of a trade, between the United States and the rebellious parts of the Island of St. Domingo, which the legislature meant to suppress; that it was within the scope of the particular remedy provided, as well as within the general spirit and policy of the law. That Wood, who owned and employed the sloop, in the voyage to Hayti, was resident, in fact, within the United States, at the time of her departure from Philadelphia, cannot be denied; but, it is contended, that a resident within the meaning of the act of congress, applies not to occasional, and transient visitors, but only to permanent, domiciliated inhabitants of the United States. In refutation of this defence, however, it was endeavored to fix upon a contrary ground, in the legislative sense, as well by a review of the mischief declared, the remedy provided, and the object of the law, as by the consequences of the claimant's doctrine; the provisions contained in acts of congress, in pari materia, particularly in the non-intercourse acts of 1798, 1799, and 1800 (4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 129, §§ 1-3, 5 [1 Stat. 565]; 4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 244, §§ 1-3 [1 Stat. 613]; 5 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 15, §§ 1, 2 [2 Stat. 7]), and the legislative use of the word "resident," upon analogous subjects. (2 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 132, §§ 2, 3, 5 [1 Stat. 287]; 2 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 142, §§ 11, 17 [1 Stat. 292]; 3 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 163, §§ 1, 2 [1 Stat. 414]; 4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 134 [1 Stat. 566].

Mr. James S. Smith, for the claimants.—The present case is important not only on account of the value of the property seized, but because it is the first in which an act materially affecting the mercantile interest has received a judicial examination. Yet it lies within a narrow compass, and turns upon a single point, viz. was the Penelope "owned, hired or employed," &c. by any person resident within the United States.

In discussing this point it is proper to enquire—(1) What constitutes a residence, or who is meant by the term "resident." (2) Was the Penelope "owned, &c. by any person resident within the United States." The word "resident" is defined by Dr. Johnson, "Dwelling or having abode in any place."—Johnson's Dict. It will not be contended on the part of the United States, that Philadelphia was Mr. Wood's dwelling place; yet, according to Johnson, dwelling place and place of residence are synonymous. Johnson's Dict. "dwell," "dwelling," "dwelling place." So too, "inhabitant" and "resident" are synonymous.—Johnson's Dict. Who is an inhabitant has been judicially decided. "A person coming hither occasionally as a captain of a ship, in the course of trade, cannot be called an inhabitant; nor does a person going from his settled habitation here, on occasional business to Boston, or elsewhere, cease to be an inhabitant." [Barnet's Case] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 153. Being resident at a place, means then, having a family there, a home, transacting business there, and above all, its being the place to which, when absent from it, a man always proposes to return. Such is not only the strictly correct meaning, but also the common acceptation of the word. What more common than the question, Where do you reside? What more absurd if "resident" means merely "being present." But "residence" is a term that has a definite legal meaning, established by numerous decisions. By an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania freeholders are exempted from arrest except in certain cases, one of which is where they have not been residents in the state for the space of two years next before the issuing of the writ. Yet the supreme court determined that a man who was in Georgia fifteen months previous to the issuing of the writ did not lose his privilege, because his family was here, and he meant to return. [Penman v. Wayne] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 241, 348. So too, in the case of a foreign attachment which can only issue where the defendant does not reside within the state, the court refused to quash the attachment only because it did not sufficiently appear that the defendant intended to return. [Taylor v. Knox] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 158. Similar case 2 N. Y. Term R. [2 Caines] 318.

By the constitution of Pennsylvania, art. 1, § 3, no person residing within any city, &c. which shall be entitled to a separate representation, shall be elected a member for any county. Suppose the case of a merchant whose counting house is in the city, and dwelling house in the county; he spends a great proportion of his time in the city; and, therefore, if the district attorney's construction of the term "resident" is correct, is eligible. Nay, according to that construction, it would only be necessary that he should remain in the city on the day of election. But admitting that the common acceptation of the word and its legal technical meaning are different, we must presume that congress meant to adopt the latter. This is a highly penal statute; it subjects to forfeiture the property of innocent persons knowing nothing of the vessel having been at St. Domingo, which may be on board at the time of her return to the United States. It is, therefore, according to a well established rule, to be construed strictly. 1 Bl. Comm. 88. To discover the intention and construction of congress, statutes in pari materia have been referred to. Not one, however, has been cited that will support the construction contended for on the part of the United States. Wherever the intention of congress clearly was to include persons actually within the United States, and not technically residing there, they have used other words in addition to that of resident.

The act to suspend the commercial intercourse with France (4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 129 [1 Stat. 565]), is in general terms like the present. "No persons resident," &c.; and it has been asserted, that like it, it applied to all persons within the United States. Congress, however, when it was about to expire, instead of merely passing an act to continue it, passed one in more general terms, thereby shewing their construction of the former act. Act Feb. 27, 1800; 5 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 15 [2 Stat. 7]. In that act we find the phraseology materially altered, "persons resident within the United States or under their protection," that is, persons actually within the United States, but who do not reside there. The local or temporary allegiance which an alien owes to the government within whose territories he is, and the consequent protection of his person and property by that government, are alluded to in the phrase used. No term could have been more properly applied to aliens transiently within the United States. It is said, however, that citizens of the United States resident in foreign countries were meant.—Not so: the next sentence provides for their case. The phraseology is again varied to apply to them:—"Citizens of the United States resident elsewhere." That the phrase was intended to apply to persons who did not technically reside within the United States, appears also from the second section of the act, which allows a clearance to vessels owned, &c. by persons "permanently residing in Europe;" that is not merely those persons within the United States whose place of residence is Europe, but those who have not left it. The title of that act deserves to be noticed. It is as general as the title of the act upon which this information is founded, which has been referred to to support the construction contended for on the part of the United States. Both are entitled, acts "to suspend the commercial intercourse," &c. yet in both we find excepted cases in which an intercourse is allowed, and a clearance may be granted. The title, therefore, does not in the least explain the intention.

The act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade (Act March 22, 1794, p. 22 [1 Stat. 347]) makes a distinction between persons coming into, or residing within the United States. The naturalization act (6 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 76 [2 Stat. 153]) requires, that persons applying to become citizens shall prove that they have resided five years within the United States, and one year within the state in which they apply. If "resident" means being personally present, those aliens who have been out of the state for one day during the year, could not be admitted. Such, however, has not been the construction given to the act.—Mariners are daily naturalized. They are considered as residents because they have families within the United States, and always propose to return. But waving further comparison with other acts, we assert that the intention of congress is apparent upon the face of the act itself. Had they meant to prohibit all persons within the United States from trading to St. Domingo, they would have omitted the word "resident," altogether. Their meaning then would have been clear, and much more forcibly expressed. It is a rule in the construction of statutes that they are to be so construed, that, if possible, every word may stand and have a meaning. 1 Bl. Comm. 88. This rule can be complied with in the present case only by adopting the construction contended for by the claimants.

It has been said, however, that the words "resident within the Island of St. Domingo," are also used; that the same construction must be given to "resident" wherever it occurs; and that if our construction is adopted, a person resident within the United States may trade to St. Domingo with a person not domiciliated or legally resident there. The same construction must undoubtedly be given to the term "resident" in both cases, but the consequence asserted will not follow. Residents within the United States, are not only prohibited from having any commercial intercourse with persons resident within the Island of St. Domingo, but their vessels are liable to forfeiture if they are carried, or destined to proceed to any port within that island.

The construction contended for on the part of the claimants renders the whole act intelligible and consistent, and therefore must be presumed to be correct.

(Mr. Smith, in reply to the observations of the district attorney, commented upon the evidence to shew that only British funds were employed—that the claimants did not act in a clandestine manner, &c.)

Mr. Tilghman was about to proceed in the argument on the part of the claimants of the Penelope and cargo, when the jury mentioned that they had already made up their minds in the case. The court was requested to give a decided direction to the jury on the law, in order to afford an opportunity to either party to remove the cause to another tribunal.

Mr. Dallas, for the United States.

Mr. E. Tilghman, Mr. Smith, and the Reporter, for the owner of the Penelope and cargo.

THE COURT (charging jury). I do not think that this case, being one I have not had much time to consider, should be left to rest on my opinion. Although not one so well digested, as more deliberation would have enabled me to deliver, I shall give a direction sufficiently decided to afford an opportunity of taking an exception to it. My habit is not to leave points of law to the jury; it being the province and duty of the court to take on itself the responsibility for them, where time is afforded to form a deliberate opinion; which can seldom be done in the hurry of a trial in new and extraordinary cases. In this case it is not necessary for you to embarrass yourselves (nor shall I set the example) with passing in review all the acts of congress alleged to be in pari materia. It is considered to be a proper course to pursue in argument by counsel, but it is a dangerous and unnecessary conduct for courts, to decide on a number of acts said to be in pari materia, when a question arises only on a construction of one. These acts may (as some of them have been) be brought before me for construction directly, and it would be unsafe to commit myself by an incidental opinion. Every law has something peculiar in its intention and object; the same words may on some subjects be of different import from that in which they are used on others. I often find one at a time an over match.

I join the counsel on both sides in recommending to you to divest yourselves of all political considerations and consequences. The only point is that of a forfeiture; and the only enquiry is whether the individual whose property is placed under your view, is of the description intended by the law to incur it. The facts are fairly and fully in proof. The arguments and suspicions adduced to suggest ideas of the investment of American capital, used for the outfit or lading of the vessel in question, are not conclusive, or grounded in proof: they are out of the case. A British subject, owning a British vessel, comes into a port of the United States with private views, to wit, to convey home his children, who had been placed here for education: having funds and commercial credit in our city, he was advised to use them in an enterprise inhibited to our own citizens, but, as he was taught to believe, not forbidden to aliens. On whatever ground he formed his opinion, he must take the risk attending it. Arguments of innocent, or mistaken intention, are to be used in applications for mitigations of forfeitures; but are here irrelevant. The power of relieving from penalties, is in another department. He had the law before him, and must hazard the consequences of any act which produced an infraction of it. What were his motives is not, with us, so material, as what were his actions. It seems clearly proved that he did not come here to establish his domicil; but for a particular and transient purpose. There seems no disagreement about the general meaning of the words "inhabitant and resident," but it is said that the act of congress, under consideration, means any personal residence, while the business was in operation which incurs the forfeiture. A commorancy for the shortest time is held to be a residence, to bring the person within the act. The words are not "residing or being," but "person resident," throughout. Other acts of congress wherein the word, or words, are used, are brought to explain this; and yet they may, on examination, be found to be as deficient in perspicuity as this; which, on some future occasion, may be enlisted to explain them. Reasoning founded on the pari materia plan, is frequently a petitio principii, a begging question, or expounding one of unknown or doubtful expression, by another. The act produced to elucidate, is as little clear as the other. I recollect no direct judicial decisions on those acts, affecting the point now before us. It is true that persons "being" within our jurisdiction, owe allegiance as it respects crimes, for the commission whereof they are punishable. But this is an highly penal act, and must have a strict construction. Here is a forfeiture declared in the case of a person, not only actually "being," but one who must be described by the words "any person or persons resident within the United States," to be included in its purview. Congress may have intended to comprehend one "residing or being." If resident means nothing but mere momentary commorance, where it is even coupled with "being," it might as well be left out. The question seems to be whether they inserted "resident" without the legal meaning generally affixed to it. If they have omitted to express their meaning, we cannot supply it. Our duty is to expound, and not to make acts of congress. In so penal a case what can we do better than to take the legal interpretation? That I may not mistake, I will read, from notes in other cases, what I have said on a similar point, over and over again. In the case of Hylton v. Brown [Case No. 6,981] in the circuit court, and cases in this court, the following has always been my definition of the words "resident," or "inhabitant," which, in my view, mean the same thing. "An inhabitant, or resident, is a person coming into a place with an intention to establish his domicil, or permanent residence; and in consequence, actually resides: under this intention he takes a house, or lodgings, as one fixed and stationary, and opens a store, or takes any step preparatory to business, or in execution of this settled intention.

The time is not so essential as the intent executed, by making or beginning the actual establishment, though it is abandoned, in a short or longer period." A mere transitory coming for a special purpose, a mere transient visit, does not fall within the legal meaning of the word "resident." He must have the intent of staying, or abiding, for permanent purposes; and begin it, though he does not continue to prosecute it. On the meaning, if doubts exist in common interpretation, we must be governed by the legal definition. The attorney of the district does not consider it a clear case, because he has taken great pains, and brought together a mass of information. For the purpose of affording opportunity for exception to my opinion, though I have had no time to consider it maturely: I say that this claimant is not a "resident," or within the meaning of the act of congress on which the prosecution is founded. It is a case of great importance in its consequences, and ought to be well considered. Though I have thus directed you, this being a case partaking of crime, a malum prohibitum, though not morally criminal, you have, perhaps, a latitude both as to law and fact; and under all these circumstances, and with this opinion of the law, I leave you to decide according to your unbiased judgments.

Verdict for the claimants.

No appeal was prosecuted in this case.

Case No. 16,025.

UNITED STATES v. PENN.

[13 N. B. R. 464.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1876.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—BANKRUPTCY—INDICTMENT FOR OBTAINING GOODS ON FALSE PRETENCES.

1. The examination of a witness before an examining court, where the witness has since died, is competent evidence in a trial upon indictment of the party for the same offense.

2. The statements of a party charged with absconding, made on his way from the place of his residence, as to his intention of returning, is competent evidence to disprove the charge.

3. Under an indictment based upon the ninth clause of the forty-fourth section of the bankrupt law (Rev. St. § 5132), charging the defendant with obtaining goods under the false pretense of carrying on business, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, it must be shown that the defendant represented to the person from whom the goods were obtained, that he was so carrying on business, that the person was induced to part with his goods by reason of such representation, and that he was not so carrying on business. But this representation may be by acts and conduct as well as by words.

[Cited in U. S. v. Myers, Case No. 15,848.]

4. Under the tenth clause of this section, it must be shown that the intent to defraud existed in the mind of the bankrupt against his creditors generally, and not against this particular creditor from whom the goods were obtained.

5. The rule as to the measure and character of proof in criminal cases.

Indictment for obtaining and disposing of goods in violation of the provisions of the bankrupt law.

The first count in the indictment in this case, alleges that on the 17th day of October, in the year A. D. 1873, Robert B. Smart commenced a proceeding in bankruptcy against the defendant, Samuel M. Penn, late of the county of Ross, in the state of Ohio, by filing in the district court of the United States, within the Southern district of Ohio, a petition, duly verified, and recites the allegations of the petition, giving jurisdiction to said court, and the act of bankruptcy, charged in said petition, to wit: That on the 10th day of September, A. D. 1873, the defendant departed out of and from the state of Ohio, with intent to defraud his creditors, and that on the 28th day of October, A. D. 1873, the defendant was adjudged by said court a bankrupt: And charges that the defendant, within three months next, before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy against him, did unlawfully, willfully and fraudulently, obtain on credit, from Meyers, Thieman & Co., certain goods and chattels, to wit: Two trunks of notions, white goods, hosiery, gloves, and ribbons, of the value of three hundred dollars, under color and pretense of carrying on business as a merchant at Bainbridge, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, which said color and pretense was false, and which goods and chattels were not obtained as aforesaid, for the purpose of carrying on business as a merchant, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade; he, the defendant, then and there, well knowing that the said color and pretense was false. The second count charges that the defendant, within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy against him, to wit: On the 17th day of September, A. D. 1873, did unlawfully, knowingly, and with intent to defraud his creditors, dispose of to one Mrs. Estelle, certain of his goods and chattels, to wit: Two trunks of notions, white goods, hosiery, gloves, and ribbons, of the value of three hundred dollars, otherwise than by bona fide transactions in the ordinary course of his trade, which had been obtained by him on credit from Meyers, Thieman & Co., and remained unpaid for. The third count charges that the defendant within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy against him, to wit: On the 17th day of September, A. D. 1873, did unlawfully, willfully, and fraudulently, obtain on credit, from John Shillito & Co., certain goods and chattels, to wit: One package of embroidery and laces, of the value of one hundred and fifty dollars, under color and pretense of carrying on business as a merchant and dealer in the ordinary course of trade, which said color and pretense was false, and which goods were not obtained for the purpose of carrying on business as a merchant, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade; the defendant well knowing that the said color and pretense was false, and intending there and then to defraud the said John Shillito & Co. The fourth count sets out in full the proceedings in bankruptcy, and charges the defendant with obtaining goods of John Shillito & Co., as in the third count charged.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

This prosecution is brought under the 5132d section of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The first, third, and fourth counts in the indictment are based upon the ninth clause of the section, and which provides, "that every person, who within three months before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, under the false color and pretense of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, obtains on credit, from any person, any goods or chattels with intent to defraud," shall be punished by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for not more than three years. The second is based upon the tenth clause of the section, which provides: "Or within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, with intent to defraud his creditors, pawns, pledges, or disposes of, otherwise than by transactions made in good faith, in the ordinary course of trade, any of his goods or chattels, which have been obtained on credit, and remain unpaid for, shall be punishable by imprisonment, with or without hard labor for not more than three years."

During the progress of the trial, counsel for the government, after having shown that there had been an examination of the defendant before a United States commissioner, upon the charge contained in the indictment, that upon that examination one Williams was sworn and examined as a witness on behalf of the government, and was cross-examined by counsel for the defendant, and that said Williams was dead. Offered in evidence the examination of said witness on said examination. To the admission of this evidence, counsel for the defendant objected, for the reason that the examination before the commissioner was not a suit, and that the issue was not the same.

HELD BY THE COURT. The examination by the commissioner, was such a judicial proceeding as would come within the rule, admitting such evidence, and the charge in one of the counts being the same as was the issue in the examination before the commissioner, to that extent that it was the same issue, and the general rule being that where a witness already examined in a judicial proceeding, between the same parties, involving the same issue, has since died, his former examination is admissible. Starkie, Ev. 51; 1 Greenl. Ev. 193; Tayl. Ev. 436, 440; U. S. v. Macomb [Case No. 15,702]; Wagers v. Dickey, 17 Ohio, 439; Hoover v. Jennings, 11 Ohio St. 624. The objection will, therefore, be overruled and the testimony admitted.

The counsel for the government introduced further evidence tending to prove that the defendant had absconded and left the state with the intention of remaining absent therefrom. The counsel for the defendant then offered to prove by a witness, what the defendant, while on his journey from the state, stated his intentions were in regard to returning, to which the counsel for the government objected.

BY THE COURT. The rule of law is, "That if a person changes his domicile or actual residence, or is upon a journey, or leaves his home, or returns thither, or remains, or secretes himself, or, in fine, does any other act, material to be understood, his declarations made at the time of the transaction, and expressive of its character, motive, or object, are regarded as verbal acts, indicating a present purpose and intention, and are, therefore, admitted in proof, like any other material facts; so upon an inquiry as to the state of mind, sentiments, or opinions of a person at any particular period, his contemporaneous declarations are admissible as part of the res gestæ." "And so extensive is the rule in its operation, that to a certain degree it overrules the rule which precludes a party's declarations from being evidence for himself." 1 Tayl. Ev. 521, 529; Starkie, Ev. 87, 467; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 108; Thorndike v. City of Boston, 42 Mass. [1 Metc.] 242; Lund v. Inhabitants of Tyngsborough, 63 Mass. [9 Cush.] 37; Inhabitants of Gorham v. Inhabitants of Canton, 5 Me. 266. The objection will therefore be overruled, and the testimony admitted.

W. M. Bateman and Mr. Richards, for the Government.

Job Stephenson and R. A. Johnston, for defendant.

SWING, District Judge. The offense created by the ninth clause of this section, and which is charged in the first, third, and fourth counts of the indictment, is composed of the following elements: First. That proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against the defendant. Second. That he obtained on credit from the parties named in the indictment the goods therein described. Third. That he obtained them within three months before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. Fourth. That he obtained them under the color and pretense of carrying on business, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade. Fifth. That such color and pretense were false. Sixth. That he obtained them with intent to defraud. Each one of which must be established by the evidence in the case before the jury will be justified in returning a verdict of guilty. There is no material controversy in regard to the existence of the first three facts, to wit: The commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy; the obtaining on credit from the parties the goods; and that it was within three months before the proceedings in bankruptcy. But the last three are the principal facts contested.

If you find from the evidence that proceedings in bankruptcy were properly commenced against the defendant, that he obtained on credit from the parties the goods described, and that it was within three months before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, you will then inquire whether he obtained them under the color and pretense of carrying on business as a merchant at Bainbridge, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade? In order to establish this fact, it must be shown by the evidence that the defendant pretended to the parties that he was carrying on business as a merchant at Bainbridge, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade. This pretense may, however, have been by conduct as well as by words. 2 Whart. Cr. Law, 2097, 2113; 2 Rup. Crimes, 292, 297; Reg. v. Boyd, 5 Cox, Cr. Cas. 502; U. S. v. Prescott [Case No. 16,084]. But the evidence must nevertheless establish its existence. And the evidence must further show that parties in consequence of this pretense were induced to part with their goods. And that this pretense was false, that is, that he was not in fact carrying on business as a merchant at Bainbridge, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade. It will be remarked that the statute is not against obtaining goods under all false colors and pretenses, but against the single one, that of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade. Reg. v. Boyd, 5 Cox, Cr. Cas. 502; U. S. v. Prescott [supra].

If you find from the evidence that he made the pretense—that he was carrying on business as a merchant at Bainbridge, dealing in the ordinary course of trade—that the parties in consequence of this representation and pretense parted with their goods, and that in fact he was not carrying on business as a merchant at Bainbridge, dealing in the ordinary course of trade, then you will inquire whether the defendant obtained such goods with intent to defraud. This is an important element in the offense, and its existence must be established by the evidence in the case. This, however, may be established by facts and circumstances. If, therefore, you find that the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against the defendant, that he obtained upon credit from the parties the goods described in the indictment—within three months before the commencement of said proceedings, that he represented to them that he was carrying on business as a merchant at Bainbridge, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade—and that the parties, by reason of such representation, parted with the goods, and that he was not in fact carrying on business as a merchant at Bainbridge, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade—and that he obtained the goods with the intent to defraud, the defendant would be guilty under the first count of the indictment, if the goods were obtained from Meyers, Thieman & Co., and under the third and fourth counts if the goods were obtained from Shillito & Co.

The offense created by the tenth clause of this section, and which is charged in the second count in the indictment, is composed of the following elements: First. That proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against the defendant. Second. That he sold the goods therein described. Third. That he sold them within three months next before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. Fourth. That the goods were obtained on credit, and unpaid for. Fifth. That the sale was not made in good faith, in the ordinary way of trade. Sixth. That the sale was made with the intent to defraud his creditors.

The first three elements constituting the offense under this clause, are the same as the first three elements constituting the offense under the ninth clause of the section, except in that, the goods were obtained and in this they were sold and it may be said of these as well as of the fourth element necessary to constitute the offense under this clause, that their existence is not seriously controverted. If you, therefore, find from the evidence in the case that proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against the defendant; that he sold the goods described; that he sold them within three months next before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that the goods were obtained on credit and unpaid for, you will then inquire whether the sale was made in bad faith and out of the ordinary way of his trade? This also may be established by facts and circumstances. If you find that the sale was made in bad faith, and out of the ordinary way of his trade, you will then inquire whether the sale was made with intent to defraud his creditors. This, too, may be established by circumstances, but it must be shown to the satisfaction of the jury by them that the intent existed in the mind of the defendant at the time the sale was made. A question is made whether this intent must exist against the particular creditor from whom the goods were purchased or against his creditors in general? I think it clear that it must have existed against his creditors in general, and not against the particular creditor from whom the goods were purchased. U. S. v. Clark [Case No. 14,806]. If, therefore, you find from the evidence, that proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against the defendant, that he sold the goods described, that the sale was within three months next before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, that the goods were obtained on credit and unpaid for, that the sale was made in bad faith out of the ordinary course of his trade, and that the sale was made with the intent to defraud his creditors, the defendant would be guilty under the second count in the indictment.

The legal presumption is that the defendant is innocent of the crime charged, and so strong is this presumption that it can only be overcome by evidence which establishes his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; in civil cases the preponderance of evidence will justify a verdict, but it is not so in criminal cases, for no preponderance of evidence which falls short of removing from the minds of the jury every reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, will justify a verdict of guilty. In a criminal case, it is competent for the accused to put in evidence his former good character in relation to the particular crime with which he stands charged. Thus, in the present case, the character of the defendant for integrity and honesty as a merchant, is evidence to be considered by the jury upon the question of his guilt, for the reason "that it may not be probable that a man who has sustained a uniform good character for integrity and honesty will forfeit it by the commission of a fraudulent and dishonest act." If, therefore, the evidence satisfies your minds beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, your verdict will be guilty, but if it does not so satisfy your minds it will be, not guilty.

Verdict of not guilty.

Case No. 16,026.

UNITED STATES v. PENNINGTON.

[Pet. C. C. 113.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1815.

INTERNAL REVENUE—REFINED SUGAR.

1. The act of congress passed July 24, 1813 [3 Stat. 35], which imposed "a duty on all sugar refined within the United States," after the first day of January 1814, did not subject to the duty sugar refined before that day and put into moulds.

2. In an action on the bond given in pursuance of that act, it would be sufficient for the defendant to show, that the sugar sent out for sale, was refined before the first of January, 1814.

The only question in this cause was, whether sugar, which had gone through the whole process of refining, and was, on 1st of January 1814, in moulds or in the store room; was subject to the duty imposed by the first section of the act of the 24th of July 1813,—4 Laws [Bior. & D.] 564 [3 Stat. 35],—which declares, that "from and after the first of January 1814, there be levied, collected, and paid, upon all sugar which shall be refined within the United States, a duty of four cents per pound." It was proved, by witnesses who had long been engaged in the business of refining sugar, that when it is fit to be removed into the cistern, where it is granulated, it is considered as refined, the subsequent processes being only necessary to mould, whiten and dry it. It was also proved, that under the law of June, 1794,—2 Laws [Bior. & D.] 428 [1 Stat. 384],—the sections of which are the same as those of the law under consideration, the duty was not demanded, or in any instance paid, upon sugar, which, prior to the 30th September, 1794, was in a state, similar to the sugar, respecting which the question in this case arose.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. It is contended, on the part of the United States, that unless the whole process of preparing sugar for market, was completed before the 1st of January, that it could not either technically, or to the common understanding of the world, be called refined sugar; and if any thing to render it so remained to be done, after the 1st of January, it is subject by law to the duty. 2dly. If it is not so, still the duty ought to be paid, although the whole process had been completed before that time, if it was sent out from the building, after that day.

First. The argument on this point might be more plausible, if the duty had been imposed upon refined sugar, or upon loaf or white sugar; as it might then have been said, that sugar does not in general obtain those appellations, until it is fully prepared for sale. But the duty is imposed upon all sugar, refined before a certain day, referring to a particular process in preparing the sugar for sale; and which it is proved, by abundant evidence, is terminated before the sugar is put into the moulds; the act of refining is completed, when it is fit to be granulated; and if this be accomplished before a particular day, it is absurd to say that it is refined after that day.

There is still less doubt on the second point. The 1st section of the law imposes a duty on sugar, refined after the 1st of January, and not upon sugar sent from the house after that day. But it does not become due, until it is sent out. Had the duty been laid upon all sugar, which might be sent out after a certain day; it is scarcely to be believed that any refiner would have had sugar subject to the duty, in his warehouse on that day; and consequently, a construction, which admits the inefficacy of the law, by the facility with which it might have been evaded, is not to be hastily adopted. But the condition of the bond, directed to be given by the 2d section, is conclusive. This bond is required to secure the United States, in the duties to be paid under that law; and it refers expressly to sugar refined after the 1st of January; and in an action upon that bond, it would clearly be sufficient for the defendant to shew, that the sugar sent out, was refined before the 1st of January, 1814.

Verdict for defendant.

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

Case No. 16,027.

UNITED STATES v. The PENNSYLVANIA CANAL BOAT NOS. 68 AND 69.

[30 Leg. Int. 249; 18 Int. Rev. Rec. 56; 8 Am. Law Rev. 162.] [1]

District Court, D. Maryland. July 12, 1873.

SHIPPING—TONNAGE DUES, ETC.

A canal boat is not a ship or vessel within the meaning of the act of congress of February 18th, 1793 [1 Stat. 305].

In admiralty.

GILES, District Judge. This case is submitted to me on libel and answer. The libel was filed for a decree for the sale of the said canal boat to pay certain tonnage dues and light money claimed to be due to the United States by virtue of the 6th section of the act of congress of 18th February, 1793. That section provides, that, after the last day of May next, every ship or vessel of twenty tons or upwards (other than such as are registered) found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, or carrying on the fishery, without being enrolled or licensed, or if less than twenty tons, and not less than five tons, without a license, in manner as is provided by this act, such ship or vessel, if laden with goods the growth or manufacture of the United States only, (distilled spirits excepted,) or in ballast, shall pay the same fees and tonnage in every port of the United States at which she may cruise, as ships or vessels not belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States, &c., &c. The answer states, that this canal boat hath no motive power attached thereto, hath no masts or sails, and is only moved by some power external to itself. And from a drawing filed in the case, it appears that this boat hath no permanent deck, but only a narrow plank running around inside the bulwarks, just sufficient for a man to walk on. The question is, is such a boat, a ship or vessel within the true meaning of the act of 1793? And I am of opinion that it is not. The general provisions of that act in reference to the enrollment or licensing of vessels, showing what is requisite for such enrollment, negatives the idea that congress could have intended its provisions to have embraced canal boats such as this. Nor does the language of the act warrant such an interpretation. Nor is the act of 1793 extended to include such boats by the provisions of the act of July 20th, 1846 [9 Stat. 33]. That act provides "that persons employed in navigating canal boats without masts or steam power, now by law required to be registered and licensed, or enrolled and licensed, shall not be required to pay any marine hospital tax," &c., &c. It excepts from the payment of such dues, persons navigating the canal boats therein described, if they were required to be registered or enrolled, but does not enact that such should be the case. It is at most, only a legislative interpretation of the provisions of the act of 1793. A boat navigated by oars might still be bound to pay the dues mentioned, so far as this law of 1846 extends. But in this case the canal boat has no oars, no sails, and no steam power, and is merely a box to carry goods, drawn by and attached to a steam vessel that is enrolled and licensed. When congress wished to include such a craft they used appropriate language to do so. The act of July 18th, 1866 [14 Stat. 178], to prevent smuggling, provides, "that for the purposes of this act, the term 'vessel,' whenever hereinafter used, shall be held to include every description of watercraft, raft vehicle, and contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means or auxiliary of transportation on or by water," &c., &c. In arriving at the conclusion I have, I am gratified to know, that I am sustained by a decision of the learned district judge of the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, (Judge Cadwalader), made last year in U. S. v. The Ohio [Case No. 15,915]. I will therefore sign a decree dismissing the libel filed in this case.

[1] [Reprinted from 30 Leg. Int. 249, by permission. 8 Am. Law Rev. 162, contains only a partial report.]

Case No. 16,028.

UNITED STATES v. PENSACOLA & G. R. CO. et al.

[11 Int. Rev. Rec. 78.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Florida. 1870.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — PAYMENT INTO TREASURY OF INSURRECTIONARY STATE.

[Payment of duties on goods imported into a port of the state of Florida in July, 1860, into the treasury of the state during the Rebellion in no way affected the right of the United States to recover the amount of the duties by action on the importer's warehouse bond.]

This was an action of debt on a bond executed by defendants to secure the payment of duties upon railway iron imported by them into the port of Fernandina, and deposited by them in a bonded warehouse in July, A. D. 1860. Felix Livingston was at that time collector of the customs of the United States for the port of Fernandina. The defendants filed a plea of payment, and on the trial, read in evidence the receipt of Felix Livingston, who appends to his signature the word "Collector," bearing date May 26, 1863. The defendants rest upon this evidence. Plaintiff then called Felix Livingston, who testified that in January, 1861, he sent his resignation as collector of the port of Fernandina, Florida, to the secretary of the treasury of the United States, but had some correspondence with the department at Washington afterward; that he then accepted the appointment of collector of the customs for the port of Fernandina from the president of the Confederate States; that in the year 1861, while the Confederate forces were in possession of Fernandina, he was requested by the Pensacola and Georgia Railroad Company, one of the defendants, to send this iron into the interior of Florida, which he declined to do; that the said defendant then against his consent, under an order of the military commander of the Confederate forces, took the iron and carried it away into the interior of Florida; that when the forces of the United States were approaching Fernandina, in the early part of 1862, witness removed to Madison, where he was living in May, 1863, when the defendants wrote to him to come to Tallahassee to arrange the duties on the said iron; that he did come, and was invited by defendants into the office of the treasurer of the state on the said 26th day of May, A. D. 1863, where he was told by the treasurer that the defendants had deposited in the state treasury the amount due for duties upon said iron, for which said treasurer gave to witness a receipt, and for which he gave to defendants the receipt which was read in evidence in this case; that he received no money, and saw no money paid.

BY THE COURT (charging jury). 1st. That to show a legal payment of the duties upon said iron it must appear that the defendants had paid the same in coin to some officer of the United States authorized by law to receive them.

2d. That a payment thereof into the treasury of the state of Florida was no payment to the United States.

3d. That the arrangement made between the state treasurer, the defendants, and the said Livingston, was an attempted fraud upon the United States, and was utterly void so far as the United States are concerned, and cannot operate to discharge either the principal or sureties in said bond; that the defendants were presumed to know the law, and consequently knew that a fraud was attempted in this transaction, and that the United States was no party to it, and gave no consent to it; that consequently there was no proof of payment, and the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for the amount of duties mentioned in the bond, with interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the time when it became due in coin; that such would be the proper verdict for the jury to find.

The verdict of the jury was in accordance with the foregoing charge.

Case No. 16,029.

UNITED STATES v. PERALTA.

[Hoff. Dec. 190; 1 Cal. Law J. 345.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1863.[1]

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — ABSENCE OF ARCHIVE EVIDENCE—SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

[Where the expediente was produced from the possession of the claimant, and bore as its last entry an order of a suspicious appearance purporting to be a direction by the governor that a title issue, but there was no evidence whatever from the archives, and the parol evidence that a grant was, in fact, issued, was unsatisfactory, held, that the claim must be rejected, notwithstanding the fact that the alleged grantee had, without objection, entered upon the land, and occupied the same for about a year prior to the conquest of the country. Applying U. S. v. Castro, 24 How. (65 U. S.) 350. Distinguishing U. S. v. Alviso, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 318.]

[Claim by Maria Teodora Peralta for the Rancho Buacocha, 2½ square leagues, in Marin county.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case is founded on an alleged grant by Pio Pico, made in the spring of 1846. The expediente which is produced by the claimant shows that in 1845 she petitioned the alcalde of San Rafael to obtain a report from the colindantes of a certain tract she desired to solicit from the government, in order that the report might accompany her petition to the governor for a grant of the land. On the same day the magistrate certifies that the colindantes had stated before him that the sobrante asked for was vacant and might be granted. On the 8th November, 1845, she presented a petition to the prefect, in which she set forth her previous application to the alcalde, and the report of that officer, and requesting him to take such further proceedings as might be necessary. This petition was referred by the prefect to the subprefect, and by the latter to the first judge of San Rafael. On the 29th November the first judge reports the land to be vacant. On the 20th December, Castro, the prefect, recommends to the governor that the title issue. And on the 18th February, 1845, the governor attaches to the expediente an order to that effect. The expediente containing all these documents is produced by the claimant. The archives contain no record or trace whatever of any of these proceedings. There seems no reason, however, to doubt the genuineness of any of the papers, except the last and most important of all, viz.: the order by the governor that the title issue. This order and the signature are evidently in Pico's handwriting; but his signature bears little resemblance to those elsewhere found in the archives, the uniform and striking peculiarities of which this court has had frequent occasion to comment on. But it resembles the mode of signing his name, and especially forming the letter "P," adopted by him at a much later period. No explanation is offered of the circumstance that the expediente is found in the claimant's possession. Had it ever reached the governor, and had he made the order for the issuance of the title, it is difficult to imagine how it found its way into the claimant's hands, and has since been preserved, while the title paper, which it is alleged was issued, has been lost. If, however, after obtaining Castro's recommendation, the claimant procured the expediente from that officer in order to send it to the governor, and through accident or neglect, omitted to do so until the war broke out, her possession of the expediente and the absence of a grant are easily understood. It is unnecessary critically to examine the testimony by which the existence of a grant and its loss were sought to be estabblished.

[1] [Affirmed in 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 434.]

In this case there is neither a grant nor archive evidence. What, in the absence of even the latter evidence alone, is the nature of the testimony the court will exact before confirming a claim, is very explicitly laid down by the supreme court in U. S. v. Castro, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 350; and by the authority of that case I am governed. I may add that the fact that the expediente is not found in the archives, but in the claimant's possession, is far stronger evidence to my mind that it was not presented to the governor than the somewhat inconsistent statements of the witnesses who have attempted to prove that a grant was in fact issued. Nor is this conclusion materially weakened by the circumstance that at the end of the expediente is an order that the title issue, for that order has a very suspicious appearance, and there are no means of knowing with certainty at what time Pio Pico appended it to the expediente. The fact, too, that in her petition to the board the claimant herself stated that no title was issued owing to the political disturbances is of some significance, for, although the petition was amended on the allegation of a mistake or misapprehension of those in charge of the claim, it seems highly improbable that a mistake on so important a matter could have been committed, or the claimant could have failed to apprise her counsel of the fact that she had received a grant, and that it had been lost. The confirmation of this claim is urged on the authority of U. S. v. Alviso, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 318. But that case differs from this in the circumstance that Alviso, so far back as 1838, obtained from the governor permission to occupy the land solicited, while the proceedings were pending to perfect the title. The report of the case states that it was proved that his occupation commenced in 1840, and had continued for fourteen years, during which time he had been recognized as owner of the land. "No imputation was made against the integrity of his documentary evidence, and no suspicion existed unfavorable to the bona fides of his petition, or the continuity of his possession and claim."

In the case at bar the circumstances are very different. It is by no means satisfactorily proved that the petition and accompanying reports were ever laid before the governor. No grant is produced, nor any corroborative proofs from the archives. The only evidence offered is parol testimony, some of which comes from witnesses well known to the court, and a brief order signed by Pio Pico, which may have been a very recent addition to the expediente. In Alviso's Case, the governor, after granting the provisional permission to occupy, naturally returned the papers to the petitioner for the reports, &c. required. It was therefore found in his possession, or that of the officers whose informes were asked for. But in this case, if the claimant's allegation be true, and the governor not only ordered the title to be issued, but actually signed and delivered it, there is no mode of accounting for the fact that the expediente was not retained by him, and archived as usual. The evidence of possession and occupation is far less strong and satisfactory than is Alviso's Case. Richardson swears that the claimant was occupying the land in 1844. Castro testifies that she was living there in 1845. Ma. B. Duarte de Valencia, the daughter of the claimant, swears to her reception of the grant, and that for about a year previous to its delivery she had occupied the land under a provisional license. But there is no record evidence whatever of any such provisional license. It certainly did not come from the governor, for the petition was sent to him for the first time in January, 1846, and the only action he is claimed to have taken on it was to issue the final title at once. It was not granted by the prefect, the subprefect, or the alcalde, for the expediente shows that no such grant was solicited; and that those officers merely made favorable reports to be laid before the governor. Pacheco swears that he gave her possession after the grant in his capacity as alcalde. But this statement seems quite incredible.

1st. The grant not having been approved, no judicial possession could regularly or legally be given.

2d. The grant being for a sobrante, no judicial possession could be given of it until the boundaries of all the colindantes were determined and the extent of the sobrante ascertained.

3d. The legal evidence of the giving of judicial possession is the formal record of the proceeding. No such record is produced, nor is its absence accounted for. The claimant has not even offered the testimony of any of the colindantes and neighbors, who must have been present at the ceremony. We have only the bare statement of the alcalde that he gave possession of the land at the time of the granting thereof.

It is probable, however, from all the testimony, that about the date of the first application to the alcalde and the certificate of the colindantes, that the land was vacant, the claimant went upon it, and erected a house, etc. This was in the summer of 1845. She had no written permission to do so, but it was probably not objected to because there seemed no obstacle to her obtaining the title. But that title she did not, in all probability obtain. At least there is no evidence sufficient, according to the rules laid down by the supreme court, to justify me in pronouncing that the grant issued. If, then, the petition was never presented, or not acted on by the governor, I am unable to discover in the fact that she moved on the land, and occupied it for about a year prior to the conquest of the country, any substantial equities which require or authorize a confirmation. The case is, undoubtedly, a hard one for the claimant, or rather her heirs, for she is now deceased. She is said to have been of a reputable family. And the reports of the alcalde, the prefect, etc., show that she would have had no difficulty in obtaining the land. But if by accident or neglect she failed to get it, I see not how this court can remedy the misfortune.

My opinion is that the decree of the board rejecting the claim should be affirmed.

[The decree of this court was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court. See 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 434.]

Case No. 16,030.

UNITED STATES v. PERALTA et al.

[Hoff. Dec. 212; Cal. Law J. & Lit. Rev. 41.]

District Court, N. D. California. Oct. 1, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—DECREE OF CONFIRMATION—AFFIRMANCE BY SUPREME COURT—OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY—AUTHORITY OF DISTRICT COURT.

[Where the supreme court, in affirming a decree of confirmation by the district court, delivers an opinion clearly showing that the land intended to be confirmed is that described in the title papers, but it is not clear from the decree of the district court that the boundaries fixed are the same as those described in the title papers, the latter court may, under the act of 1860, upon objections to the official survey, inquire, not merely whether the boundaries described therein are in accordance with the terms of its own decree, but whether they are in accordance with the title papers upon which the judgments of both courts were founded.]

[Claim of Domingo and Vicente Peralta for San Antonio in Alameda county. Claim filed January 21, 1852, confirmed by the commission February 7, 1854, by the district court January 26, 1855, and by the United States supreme court in 19 How. (60 U. S.) 343.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This cause comes up on objections filed to the official survey on the part of the United States and of certain parties who have intervened for their interests. The principal point in controversy is the location of the northern boundary or dividing line between the rancho of the Peraltas and that of Castro. The official survey has been made in conformity with an amended decree of this court. This amendment was allowed by the court on the supposition that the error to be corrected was merely clerical, and that the decree, as amended, expressed the intention of the court when the original decree was framed. The cause having been originally tried in this court by the late judge of the Southern district, I was, at the time of allowing the amendment, unacquainted with the merits, and assumed, perhaps too hastily, that the alleged error was merely accidental. It is now objected that the court had no power to make the amendment, and that, the decree having been affirmed in the supreme court, it is res adjudicata, and the law of the case, whatever be its correctness. I shall consider the question thus raised precisely as if no amendment had been made, and shall inquire whether, by the just construction and legal effect of the decree of the supreme court affirming that of the district court, I am precluded from examining into the true location of the northern boundary in question, and establishing the same as the proofs taken in this proceeding under the act of 1860 [12 Stat. 22], shall require.

It is not pretended that this court has any power to reverse or annul its own final decrees for errors of fact or law after the term at which they were rendered, unless for clerical mistakes, or that any change or modification can be made which will vary or affect it in any material thing. Ex parte Sibbald, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 491; [Cameron v. M'Roberts] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 591; [Bank of Kentucky v. Wistar] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 431. Still less has it any such power over the final decrees of the supreme court,—its duty being to execute the mandate,—and this though it should be discovered that neither it nor the supreme court had jurisdiction over the cause. [Skillern v. May] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 267; [Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 424; Id. 611. It is urged, however, that the proceedings in the cause, and the opinion of the supreme court, when considered in connection with the mandate, show that it was not the intention of the supreme court to determine the question now raised with respect to the location of the northern boundary; and further, it is contended that, by the act of 1860, all questions of location and boundary are referred to this court to be determined in a new proceeding between new parties and on additional evidence.

To arrive at a just appreciation of the true construction and effect of the decree and mandate of the supreme court, a brief review of the proceedings in the cause and the questions presented for decision is necessary. The claimants derived title under an order made by Governor Sola, in August, 1820, directing Luis Peralta to be put in possession of a tract of land extending from the creek of San Leandro to a small hill adjoining the sea beach, at the distance of four or five leagues. This was accordingly done, and the return of the officer, Martinez, describing the boundaries of the tract of which he gave possession, is produced. On the thirtieth of August of the same year, the governor, on the reclamation of the Mission of San Francisco, directed a portion of the lands assigned to Peralta to be withdrawn, and on the sixteenth of September, Martinez established new boundaries for the grantee, fixing them at a rivulet which runs down from the mountains to the beach where there is a grove of willows, and about a league and a half from the cerrito of San Antonio, in the direction of San Leandro (i. e. to the south). On the thirtieth of August, 1823, Governor Arguello made a decree, directing that "the land which, by the order of his predecessor, had been taken from Peralta after it had been granted to him and possession had been given, should be returned to him," and on the fourth of December, 1824, Martinez returns that in compliance with the order "the land which had been taken from Peralta has been returned to him, and he has been put in possession of the place called 'Cerritos de San Antonio,' and the rivulet which crosses the place to the coast, where is a rock looking to the north." On the eleventh of February, 1844, Ignacio Peralta, one of the heirs of Luis Peralta, petitioned the governor for a new title to the land, in consequence of the original title papers having been lost. This petition was accompanied by a diseño, or map. On the thirteenth of February, 1844, Jimeno reports that by the documents which Don Ignacio Peralta presents he shows that there was granted to his father the tract of land called "San Antonio," agreeably to the extent shown by the map which he presents, and that, as it is twenty-two years since the government of that period made the grant and ordered possession to be given, the interested parties having occupied the land since the year 1819, he believes there is no objection whatever to granting him a new title. On the same day the governor, Micheltorena, ordered the title to be issued. The usual decree of concession was accordingly drawn up. It declares Peralta owner in fee of the land bounded "on the southeast by the creek of San Leandro, on the northwest by the creek of the Cerritos de San Antonio, on the southwest by the sea, and on the northeast by the top of the range of hills." This document contains an order that "this expediente be transmitted to the departmental assembly for their approval," but nothing further appears to have been done, no formal title seems to have been issued, nor is the decree of concession signed by Micheltorena. On these documents it was contended before the board that: 1st. The officers were without power to make the grant, and 2d, that the northern boundary should be fixed at the creek of San Antonio, being the reduced limits fixed by Martinez when Peralta was deprived of a part of his land on the reclamation of the mission. A majority of the board confirmed the claim within these limits.

A dissenting opinion, however, was delivered by Mr. Commissioner Thompson, in which the right of the claimant was maintained to the whole tract originally assigned and subsequently returned to him by order of Arguello, and the boundaries of which are described in the report of Martinez, and in the decree of concession by Micheltorena, and delineated on the map which accompanied Peralta's petition to the latter. In this opinion the location of the northern boundary is discussed; and the attempt made to identify the rivulet issuing from the "mountain range and running along the foot of the cerrito of San Antonio, where, at the entrance of a little gulch there is a rock elevating itself in the form of a monument, looking towards the north," as described by Martinez, with the San Antonio creek, is pronounced incompatible with the proofs, which unmistakably establish the identity of the two cerritos of the brook which runs at the base of the larger one, and the rock at the entrance of the little cañada. The testimony of Berreyesa, who states that the southern and not the northern base of the cerrito of San Antonio was established by Martinez as a boundary, is referred to as constituting the only discrepancy in the evidence, and his statement is rejected "as directly in conflict with the return of the officer who gave the possession, and the other testimony which established the rivulet running at the base of the mountain as the boundary." The cause having been appealed to the district court by the claimants, it was again urged by the United States that the grant was invalid, and that the claim should be rejected in toto. But the court affirmed the validity of the claim presented in the petition to the whole extent of its bounds. In the decree the northern boundary is described as follows: "A line commencing on the Bay of San Francisco, at a point where there are close to the bay the two cerritos as described in the first possession given by Martinez to Luis Peralta on the 16th August, 1820, running from the said bay eastwardly along by the southern base of the cerrito of San Antonio up a ravine, at the head of which is a large rock, or monument, looking to the north, described in the evidence as the 'Sugar Loaf Rock'; thence by the southern base of said rock to the comb or crest of the Coast Range of Mountains." It does not appear for what reason the court thus described the northern boundary, nor is it easy, without doing some violence to the terms of the description, to adopt the Codornices creek as the boundary. The line is directed to be run from the bay "eastwardly along by the southern base of the cerrito of San Antonio, up a ravine, at the head of which there is a large rock, described in the evidence as 'Sugar Loaf Rock,' " etc. But we have seen that the boundary which, according to Martinez' report, divided and separated the land, was a "rivulet," and not a "ravine;" nor is any ravine found near either the northern base or the southern base of the cerrito, until the whole width of the plain is crossed, and the base of the mountains reached. If, then, the Codornices be taken to be the boundary intended, we must attribute to the court a singular inaccuracy of language, and this when the report of Martinez, which was evidently intended to be adopted, pointedly distinguishes between the arroyito or rivulet designated as a boundary, and the cañadita or little gulch, at the mouth or entrance of which was the penasco, or monumental rock.

Again, the decree speaks of a ravine, "at the head of which is a large rock, described in the evidence as the 'Sugar Loaf Rock,'" etc. But the sugar loaf rock described in the evidence at that time before the court was the remarkable rock near the Cerritos creek; and this is situated not at the head but "at the entrance of a ravine," and that ravine, or rather the brook which issues from it, is at the northern, and not the southern, base of the cerrito. If, then, we consider that the rock referred to in the decree is the same as that mentioned by Martinez in his report, and which had, up to that time, been alone spoken of by the witnesses, it would be impossible to adopt the Codornices as a boundary, for the rock is not near that creek, and no attempt had then, or has since been, made to show that at the mouth of the gulch from which it issues, any rock exists at all corresponding with the description given by Martinez. On the appeal from this decree, taken by the United States, it was again urged—1st, that the whole claim was invalid; and 2d, that the land did not extend beyond San Antonio creek. To these points the attention of the supreme court was exclusively directed. No question seems to have been raised as to whether the brook mentioned by Martinez as flowing at the case of the cerrito of San Antonio flowed at its northern or southern base. The identity of the two cerritos being satisfactorily established, the attention of the court was not called to the fact that there might still be room for controversy as to the particular rivulet mentioned by Martinez. The decree of the district court was, therefore, affirmed.

But the opinion of the court discloses that in settling the northern boundary the supreme court intended to adopt precisely the line described by Martinez in his first report; again, in his redelivery of possession under Arguello's order, and again in the title of confirmation given by Micheltorena. All these documents are expressly referred to by the supreme court, and the description of the line given by Martinez in his first report is even copied into the opinion totidem verbis. Indeed, any other interpretation of their decree would be absurd; for, the validity of the grant by Sola, and the subsequent restoration of the land by Arguello, being recognized, the only tract to which that grant could have referred was the tract of which the possession had been given by Martinez, and which is described in his report. If, then, on further examination, it appears that the land described in the decree affirmed by the supreme court is not the same as that whereof possession was given by Martinez, it has appeared to me to be the duty of this court, under the act of 1860, to conform to the obvious intention of the supreme court, rather than to the mere letter of its mandate, and to cause to be surveyed to the claimants the tract of which Martinez gave possession, and which he describes in his report.

I therefore think myself at liberty to inquire, not merely whether the official survey is in accordance with the terms of the decree of this court, affirmed by the supreme court, but whether it is in accordance with the possession given by Martinez, upon which the judgments of both courts were founded. Had the two reports of Martinez, the concession by Micheltorena, and the diseño presented by Peralta, been expressly referred to in the final decree for a further description of the land, there would then (if the decree describes a different tract from that described in those documents) have been such a repugnance on the face of the decree as would clearly have authorized the location of the land as required by the title papers, rather than by the description in the decree. But the opinion of the supreme court shows as clearly as if it had been so stated in the decree that the land intended to be confirmed was that described in the title papers; and the decree of the district court is affirmed and adopted, because it was supposed to describe the same land, no suggestion to the contrary appearing to have been made or considered. It is to be observed, in addition, that the objection to the official survey is made on the part of persons claiming title under Castro, the grantee of the rancho to the north of that of the Peraltas. That rancho is bounded on the south by the rancho of San Antonio. But even if, by reason of the point having become res adjudicata, the northern boundary of San Antonio should be fixed at the creek to the south of the cerrito, it would not follow that the same line would form the southern boundary of the Castro rancho. As between the owners of the latter rancho and the United States, it would still be open to show what were the true boundaries of the San Antonio; and, if the northern boundary of the latter should be found to be the northern base of the cerrito, that boundary would be the southern limit of the Castro rancho. Moreover, the decree in the Castro case, as well as the title papers, call for the "Cerrito de San Antonio" as its southern boundary. If, then, by reason of the acquiescence of the Peraltas in the decree of the district court, which fixed their boundary at a brook about half a mile south of the cerrito, they should be restricted to that line, the only effect would be to leave between the two ranchos a strip of vacant land, which the United States do not claim should be reserved. Unless, therefore, the line described in the decree in the case at bar should be found to be the true line of division between the ranchos, and such as the court would adopt in the Castro case, were that now under consideration, I am unable to perceive how the parties intervening in this cause can be benefited by a decision adopting the line contended for by them, not because it is the true line, but because the decree adopting it has become final.

I proceed to consider the question of location on its merits. The identity of the cerrito of San Antonio is not disputed. It is claimed that the rivulet mentioned by Martinez is the Codornices creek. This creek rises in the mountains, and flows in a nearly westerly direction toward the bay, not far from parallel with the Cerritos creek, and at the distance from it of about a mile, to the south. But this creek in several respects fails to answer the description given by Martinez. The creek described by him flowed at the base of the larger cerrito. The Codornices does not run into the bay, although its channel from the hills and to a considerable distance across the plain is clearly marked. But shortly after crossing the main road which traverses the plain from south to north, its channel disappears, and though, perhaps, as testified by the witnesses, its course at very high water may be traced by a superficial deposit of gravel, etc., there is nothing which could be called a channel, or which in ordinary seasons would reveal the existence of a brook or the bed of a brook. It is contended that its waters have been in some degree diverted by a small ditch recently dug; but this suggestion seems conclusively met by the diseño presented by Peralta to Micheltorena in 1844. On this diseño a creek is delineated running from the mountains, and sinking a short distance to the west of the road, precisely as it is represented on the recent and accurate topographical map of Stratton. The Codornices, moreover, if continued to the bay in the same direction, would pass by the cerrito at the distance of more than a quarter of a mile from its southern base, and when we remember that the possession of Martinez was given on the 16th of August, in the middle of the dry season, it is almost impossible to suppose that he could have intended to describe that brook as a "stream flowing at the base of the cerrito." On ascending the Codornices, we find no rock situated "at the entrance, or mouth of the little gulch." The high conical rock which it has been sought to identify with that spoken of by Martinez, is situated far up on the mountain. It is at a considerable distance to the north of the main branch of the creek, and to an observer approaching it from the west or southwest it seems to be nearly on the crest of the ridge. But by no one could it be described as "situated in the mouth of a little gulch, or cañadita." But the diseño of Peralta decisively settles any doubt which might be felt as to the creek referred to by Martinez. This diseño was drawn to indicate to Micheltorena the tract which had been granted to the father of the petitioner, and for which he asked a new title. With this diseño before him, and perhaps after referring to the Castro expediente, which was then in the archives, Jimeno reports: "By the documents which Don Ignacio Peralta presents, he accredits that to his father was granted a tract of land called 'San Antonio,' agreeably to the extent shown by the diseño which he presents." On this diseño the cerrito of San Antonio is plainly delineated, and to the north of it, flowing from the hills into an estero of the bay, is a creek, on the north side of which is written "Terreno de los Castros," and on the south "Terreno de los Peraltas," thus "dividing and separating the land." That this creek is the Cerritos creek, cannot be doubted. Its course and position with respect to the cerrito, exactly correspond, and it falls into an estero which puts up from the bay at right angles to the shore, or towards the east. At the point where the creek issues from the mountains, is a small triangular object, which seems almost certainly to have been intended to represent the rock spoken of by Martinez, and in fact there is found at the entrance of the little gulch in the hills from which the creek issues, and in a position corresponding to that of the object on the diseño, a very remarkable rock, of which photographic drawings have been exhibited, and which is identified by some of the witnesses who assisted at the act of possession, as the rock referred to by Martinez.

At the request of all the parties, and accompanied by their counsel, I have visited the rancho, in order to learn by personal observation the actual features of the country. I confess myself unable to see how any one with the diseño before him, could for a moment doubt what creek was there intended to be delineated as the northern boundary of the tract. Much testimony has been taken to show that the Cerritos creek did not, until recently, extend to the estero by any clearly defined channel. That on the present road, which runs much nearer the bay than that used by the old inhabitants of the country, the creek may be crossed in the dry season without attracting notice, is quite possible. But my own observation has shown me, and the photograph (Exhibit Watkins, No. 8) proves, that to one standing on the hills, its course is distinctly marked across the whole plain, and nearly, if not quite, to the point where it runs into the marsh and estero. The diseño, however, removes all doubt on the subject, for it demonstrates that whether or not its channel was discernible in 1850 and 1851, when the witnesses testify to crossing it with hay-wagons, etc., it was in 1844 known to flow in a well-defined channel from the mountains to the marsh and estero at the northern base of the cerrito. In fact, if it be once admitted that the diseño represents the land granted by Sola, and of which possession was given by Martinez, I cannot perceive how the location of the boundaries can be open to controversy. That the diseño does represent that tract is expressly stated by Jimeno, and the well-known carefulness and circumspection of that officer give to his statements great weight. The tract delineated on the diseño exactly corresponds with the description given by Martinez. We have the larger cerrito at a short distance from the beach, the creek flowing along its base, and the high rock at the entrance of the cañadita from which it issues. That Micheltorena intended to grant, or rather issue, a new title for the land delineated on the diseño, cannot be doubted. In his decree of concession, the creek of Los Cerritos de San Antonio is expressly mentioned as the northwestern boundary, and this decree, called by the supreme court the title of confirmation by Micheltorena, is referred to in its opinion as clearly describing the same monuments as those mentioned by Martinez. It is therefore clear that this claim must be considered precisely as if the diseño of 1844 had been attached to the report of Martinez, or the grant by Sola. And, if so, the location of the boundaries is unmistakable. A corroboration of these views is found in the expediente and diseño of Castro. By the grant to Castro, his rancho is bounded by the cerrito of San Antonio, and the same boundary is designated in the decree of confirmation, which has been acquiesced in by the parties. This description of itself, would, if the ordinary rule be applied, exclude the object named as the boundary. But the diseño removes all doubt. On it a conical hill is represented, and inscribed "Cerrito de San Antonio," while from its summit, or northeastern side, it is not easy to say which, a dotted line is projected, evidently intended to indicate the boundary. This line, though not extended to the hills, nevertheless shows that the boundary ran to the northeast, and that it did not commence at the southern base of the cerrito, and run towards the hills in a direction south of east.

If, however, the limits of the Castro rancho be fixed as is now contended for, at the Codornices creek, it will include not only all the cerrito, but a tract nearly a quarter of a mile wide to the south of it, and will embrace lands not even represented on the Castro diseño. Much testimony has been taken to show that Castro has occupied the tract in question with his cattle and cultivated fields, and that the Peraltas have at various times acknowledged the Codornices to be the boundary. But evidence as to oral admissions of this nature is at all times unreliable, especially when it is, as in this case, conflicting. That in 1844, Peralta claimed to the creek called "Cerritos," is clear from the diseño, and we learn by the report of Jimeno that his father had occupied the land agreeably to the extent shown by the diseño since 1819. One of the Peraltas testifies that Castro was the first squatter he ever had on his land, and it is clear that in 1830, when the diseño of Castro was drawn for him by Forbes, and in 1834 when Joaquin Isidro Castro presented it to the governor, the tract in dispute could not have been occupied or claimed by Castro, for it was not even represented on his diseño. That in times comparatively recent, the Castros had a cultivated field to the south of the Cerritos creek, seems to be established, but I see nothing in that fact or the other evidence showing Castro's occupation of the disputed tract, sufficient to justify us in disregarding the boundaries so unmistakably indicated by the report of Martinez, the diseño, and concession in the expediente of 1844, and the natural objects found upon the ground. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the location of the northern boundary is correctly located in the official survey, and that the objections to it should be overruled.

The official survey is also objected to on the ground that it embraces lands on the shores of the bay below the ordinary high-water mark. These lands have been treated as having passed to the state of California as incidental to her sovereignty on her admission to the Union, and they have been disposed of by the state as her own. I do not understand it to be denied that the call in the grant for the bay as a boundary bounds it by the shores of the bay, nor is it contended in this case that that term should not be construed to embrace only what at common law is considered to be the shores of the sea. It includes all lands below ordinary high-water mark; that is, the limits reached by those tides which happen between the full and change of the moon, twice in the twenty-four hours. Teschemacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 21; Ang. Tide Waters, c. 3, and cases cited.

It seems, from the deposition of Stratton, that the official survey embraces lands below ordinary high-water mark, and in this respect it is evidently erroneous. I think that the western boundary should therefore be modified so as to exclude those lands lying below that limit, whether they be situated on the bay itself, or on the shores of any navigable estuary that may extend from the bay into the interior.

Case No. 16,031.

UNITED STATES v. PERALTA et al.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 89.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. March 10, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND TRUSTS.

The validity of this claim fully established.

[Claim of Sebastian Peralta and José Henandez to the Rancho Rinconada de los Gatos, comprising a league and a half of land in Santa Clara county.]

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.
A. P. Crittenden, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The grant under which this claim is made was issued by Governor Alvarado on the twentieth of May, 1840. The original title is produced, and the signatures fully proved, and also a certificate of approval by the departmental assembly. The land seems to have been occupied prior to the grant, and a house was built in which the parties have ever since continued to reside. The land granted is described as the "Rinconada de los Gatos," and the third condition limits the quantity to one league and a half, as shown on the map. On recurring to the map, we find the tract solicited indicated with tolerable precision, and sufficiently so to enable a surveyor to locate it without difficulty. The claim was confirmed by the board, and we think their decision should be affirmed.

Case No. 16,032.

UNITED STATES v. PERALTA.

[Hoff. Op. 63; Hoff. Dec. 6.]

District Court, N. D. California. Nov. 28, 1859.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — LIMITATION AS TO QUANTITY — CONFIRMATION OF CLAIM — FINALITY OF DECREE — STIPULATION BY UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

[1. There is no authority which will justify the court in confirming to a claimant a tract four or five leagues in extent, under a grant which designates the quantity as two leagues, a little more or less.]

[2. An appeal was taken from a decree confirming a claim, but thereafter the district attorney, by a stipulation, consented that the order granting the appeal might be vacated and an order entered allowing the claimant to proceed under the decree of this court, as under a final decree. The stipulation was made upon a misconception by the district attorney, occasioned by misrepresentations upon the diseño, and by a witness, as to the extent of the land contained within the boundaries confirmed; and it subsequently appeared that these boundaries gave to the grantee more than twice the quantity granted. Held, that the stipulation would not prevent the court from so modifying the decree, in advance of the official survey, as to give only the quantity granted.]

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In this case a decree was entered at a former term by consent of the United States, confirming the claim. In the decree of the board the land was described as of the extent of two leagues, a little more or less, and the boundaries as contained in the grant were mentioned. In the decree of this court the boundaries set forth were those which are mentioned in the original decree of concession as well as in the titulo or final title, and the limitation of quantity was omitted. The cause was appealed and at a subsequent day, pursuant to instructions, the district attorney entered into a stipulation consenting that an order be entered vacating the order granting an appeal, and giving leave to the claimant to proceed under the decree of this court as under final decree. It was afterwards brought to the notice of the district attorney that the land contained within the boundaries mentioned in the decree is of the extent of about five leagues. A motion was therefore made to amend the decree by limiting the extent of land to the quantity mentioned in the grant.

In support of this motion it was shown by affidavit that the land was five leagues in extent, and the counsel for the claimant admitted in court that its area was about nineteen thousand acres, which would be something more than four leagues. It is quite clear that under no ruling of this court, or the supreme court, in this class of cases, can a claimant be entitled to a confirmation of a tract four or five leagues in extent, under a grant which designates the quantity as two leagues, a little more or less. If in any case it could be held that the governor intended to grant the large tract, notwithstanding the limitation of quantity mentioned in the grant, it could only be where it appears that he knew the quantity contained within the boundaries; that the boundaries are distinct and well defined, and that he granted all the land within them. But in this case only three boundaries are mentioned in the grant. The names of a rancho (San Antonio) and of two places ("parages"), viz: El Hombre and Monte del Diabolo, are given, to which the land granted is said to be contiguous ("colindante"). In the map which is found in the expediente, and to which the grant refers, the tract is delineated, and at the foot of it is a note signed with the rubric of one Zamorano, in which it is stated that the land "from north to south is a little more than two leagues, and from east to west a little less than one league." It was under these representations that the governor described the land as of the extent of two leagues, a little more or less, as shown by the map, and reserved the surplus to the nation. It was also testified by José Maria Amador, a witness produced by the claimant, that the distance between the two streams of Las Juntas and the San Ramon, from north to south, is a little more than two leagues, and the distance from east to west in some places two miles, in others a little less than one league. So far, therefore, as the record disclosed the facts, it appeared that the extent of land embraced within the boundaries was about two leagues.

It had previously been held by this court that, where all the boundaries of a grant were clearly defined, and where the conditions specified the extent as of a certain number of leagues, a "little more or less, as shown by the map," the whole land included within the boundaries should be deemed to pass by the grant, provided that the quantity over and above that specified did not exceed a fractional part of the usual unit of measurement, viz: one league, it being supposed that such excess might reasonably be considered to be covered by the words "more or less." It had also been held that for the purpose of ascertaining the boundaries resource was to be had not to the grant alone, but also to the petition, diseño, and to inquiries whether the name of the rancho indicated a place of known limits and extent. But in the case of U. S. v. Fossatt [20 How. (61 U. S.) 427], this view was held to be erroneous. The words "more or less" were rejected as having no place in our system of survey and location, and the grantee was restricted to the quantity clearly expressed. The grant in that case as in this, mentioned only three boundaries, but the court refused to refer to the petition, or diseño, to ascertain the fourth boundary, or to inquire if the name of the place granted "had any significance as connected with the limits of the tract." It is clear, therefore, that if the quantity of land exceeded two leagues (the quantity clearly expressed) by only a fraction of a league, the claimant would, under the decision of the supreme court, be limited to the precise quantity of two leagues; a portion must be so limited when the excess is from two to three leagues. If, then, this court has not lost jurisdiction over the cause, it is clearly its duty to reform the decree by designating the quantity of land confirmed. It is objected that this is a consent decree, and therefore cannot be reopened or appealed from.

With regard to the first consent, given by the district attorney, it is sufficient to say that it was merely a consent to a confirmation of the claim, and to an affirmance of the decision of the board. It cannot, in any case, be called a consent to the decree made by this court. With regard to the second consent, there is more difficulty. That consent was in the usual terms of the stipulation filed by that officer whenever instructed to dismiss an appeal to the supreme court. He consents that the order granting the appeal be vacated, and that an order be entered allowing the claimant to proceed under the decree of this court, as under final decree.

It will be observed—First: That this stipulation does not in terms purport to be a consent that a certain decree shall be made, but it consents that an appeal shall be dismissed, and that a decree previously made shall be regarded as final. If, then, that decree is to be considered a consent decree, it cannot be because it was made on a previous consent, but because a subsequent assent to its finality has given it that character.

Second: It appears that that consent, whatever be its effect, was given not only in ignorance of the facts, but on a misconception of them, occasioned by the misrepresentations as to the extent of the land contained in the note upon the diseño furnished by the grantee, and the testimony of Amador, a witness produced by the claimant.

As the court sees that this decree will, if suffered to stand, give to the claimant more than double the quantity of land which he solicited from the governor, and to which he is by the law, as declared by the supreme court, entitled, it seems to me that the technical objection which has been noticed ought not to be permitted to prevent the correction of the mistake, both as to the law and the fact, into which this court fell. But even if in an ordinary case, where the final decree of this court is exhaustive of its power, such a mistake could not, under these circumstances, be corrected, there can be no doubt that in the special class of cases, of which this is one, this court possesses such authority.

In the recent decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Fossatt, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 450, it is declared that this power of the district court over the cause does not terminate until the issue of a patent conformably with its decree. As that case was remanded, because the decree entered by this court was not a just decree, it was argued with much force that all decrees of this court were to be regarded as interlocutory until a final decree, embodying and adopting a survey was entered. It was held, however, by this court, that the decrees heretofore entered, by which the validity of the claim was ascertained, were to be regarded as final decrees in a sense to authorize a survey, as of lands "finally confirmed," to be made, or an appeal to be taken from them. But it was also held that such decrees did not exhaust the power of the court over the cause, and that it had authority to hear objections to the survey and location which might be made, and to direct the surveyor to correct or modify the survey, conformably to its opinion. This jurisdiction the court has since frequently exercised. If, then, a survey be made under the decree in this case, it will be the duty and within the power of the court to hear any objections to it that may be urged. If there be any ambiguity or repugnance in the decree, it will be the duty of the court to construe and explain it.

The decree, as has been stated, sets forth the boundaries of the tract confirmed. But, though it does not mention the quantity, it refers for more particular description to the grant and the diseño, with the note by Zamorano. In one of these documents the quantity of land is clearly expressed as "two leagues, a little more or less" (which the supreme court has decided to mean two leagues); and in the other its extent is declared to be a little more than two leagues in length, and a little less than one league in width. If then the grant and diseño are to be consulted and followed in these respects, the boundaries cannot be reached. If the land is surveyed according to the boundaries, the limitation of quantity contained in the grant must be disregarded. A case is thus presented where the decree must be construed and explained by the court; and, under the circumstances of this case, and the law as laid down by the supreme court, there can be no doubt as to what the construction should be. If the views taken by the claimant be correct, it would follow that, notwithstanding that the decree of the court was made on a misconception of the facts occasioned by evidence produced by the claimant himself, and notwithstanding that a motion to open the decree was duly made before the expiration of the term, yet by reason of a purely formal stipulation, given by the district attorney in ignorance of the facts, this court is not only powerless to amend its decree, but is bound to confirm a survey, giving to the claimant at least double, and it might be ten times, as much land as he is entitled to claim. Such cannot, it seems to me, be the duty of the court. As, then, this court has the right and may be required to construe and explain this decree, when a survey under it shall have been made, and to instruct the surveyor as to the manner in which a new survey shall be made, it is clearly within its power, when its attention is called to the decree in advance of the survey to explain and construe it in such a manner that a survey may in the first instance be made under it, such as it would if a survey had already been submitted to it, direct to be made. By this means the expense and delay of two surveys are avoided, and the surveyor is relieved from all embarrassments in the matter.

It is for the foregoing reasons the opinion of the court that the decree in this case should be amended, and that, as in the decree ordered by the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Fossatt [supra], the grant to the original grantees should be adjudged to be for two square leagues of land to be taken within the boundaries mentioned and decree of concession and delineated on the diseño in the grant, to be located at the election of the grantee or his assigns, under the restriction established for the location and survey of private land claims in California, by the executive department of this government; and that the claim of the claimant to one undivided half of the said two leagues be confirmed to him.

Case No. 16,033.

UNITED STATES v. PEREZ.

[2 Wheeler, Crim. Cas. 96.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept., 1823.

CRIMINAL LAW—DISCHARGE OF JURY FOR INABILITY TO AGREE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

[The jury having been discharged after being out only about four hours, and reporting that they were equally divided, and could not agree, the court was divided on the question whether the discharge was justifiable under the circumstances; Van Ness, Circuit Judge, being of opinion that the discharge was too soon, and Thompson, Circuit Justice, holding that the matter was in the sound discretion of the court under all the circumstances, and that it was not necessary that the jury should be so far exhausted as to be incapable of any further deliberation, or should be disabled by sickness or intoxication.]

[This was an indictment against Joseph Perez for piracy.]

In calling the jury the panel was exhausted and Dr. Roosa was selected as a talesman. He was objected to by the counsel for the prisoner, that he was a physician. The court overruled the objection, and a peremptory challenge was made. It was permitted by the court that the counsel for the prisoner might interrogate the jurors as they came to the book to be sworn, "whether they had expressed an opinion against the prisoner," and they were so interrogated. Captain Edward Johnson testified, that he was a citizen of the United States, sole owner of the schooner Bee, and principal owner of her cargo. He sailed with her from Charleston, S. C., on the 20th of July, 1822, on a voyage to St. Juan de Remedios, in the island of Cuba. The vessel was of about 50 tons, and the cargo consisted of flour, rice, butter, lard, codfish, tinware, watches, &c. On the 14th of August, being then about a mile and a half from the coast of Cuba, and not far from the place of destination, saw a small schooner of about 30 tons coming out from under the land. She was Baltimore built, schooner rigged, apparently about 30 tons burthen, without a topsail, and hoisted Buenos Ayrean colors. She hailed the Bee, on which the anchor was let go, and a boat sent from the Bee on board of her. When the boat returned, witness was forward stooping down, and paying out the cable. His first notice that the pirates were on board was their cutlasses, with which they began beating him with great violence. He had with him on board the Bee a sailing-master, whose name was Manuel Fernandez, a Portuguese, who spoke Spanish, James Deban, Joseph Porter, James Thompson, and a Portuguese passenger, who was taken in at Charleston, who spoke no English, and whose name the witness never knew. Fernandez interceded with the pirates, upon which they desisted from beating the witness. They then put a six-pounder, which was on board the Bee, into the boat, together with colors, trumpets, and other tight articles, and got the Bee under weigh, again running until within half a mile of land, when they brought her to anchor, and laid the piratical schooner on the larboard side, close to her. At this time there were about twenty of them on board. They took off the tarpaulin, and one of them, who, according to the best of witness' knowledge and belief, was Joseph Perez, the prisoner, took a crowbar and drove it in once or twice into the hatch. They called for the axe of the cook, but before anything was further done, witness was hurried on board the piratical schooner to assist in throwing out the ballast, for the purpose of lighting her so as to receive the cargo of the Bee. The witness then stated various acts of wantonness and cruelty during eight days, that were inflicted on them by the pirates; the manner in which they sold off the greater part of the cargo to the people who flocked down from the country to purchase, and the arrival of a British schooner from New Providence to whom the residue of the cargo was sold.

On the 22nd of August, having disposed of all the cargo, the pirates got both schooners under weigh, and beat out to the entrance of the Keys, five or six miles from the main land, when witness was told by the carpenter that they were about to run the Bee ashore. This was soon after done, after taking two or three stretches upon West Salt Key. A small boat like a canoe was brought alongside, with one sail, and one oar and a half, some beef and water. They then ordered witness into the boat. He went in. They then ordered him out again, and he came out. On this the prisoner, Perez, came up to him, and ordered him to take down his small clothes. Prisoner then examined the waistband and lining, searched witness' person for belts, and ripped open the lining of his hat and shoes, searching for money. Shortly afterwards the prisoner came up from below, and brought up a gold piece in his hand. He held it up towards witness' face, and said, "Dis for you," meaning, as witness supposed, have you any more like this on board? Witness answered him, "No gold in America;" when the prize master, who could speak English, said, "No, no—no gold in America." Witness was now standing by the gunwale, when, turning round, he saw the prisoner take a long knife from his side, and cut the standing part of the forepeak haulyards, for the purpose, as witness then thought, and still believes, of hanging the cook therewith. Prisoner called the cook, and made a grasp at him, when the prize master called out, "No, no!" and then he desisted. They ordered witness, the passenger, and all the crew, except Deban, into the boat. There were five in the boat. Capt. Fernandez said they must not stand in shore, or the pirates would kill them all. They accordingly continued to stand out, till they ran down the hull of the piratical schooner. They soon after saw the Bee in a blaze. They then made for the land, (as the boat leaked exceedingly, and had to be bailed constantly by two men,) and got into the mouth of a creek near Matanzas, after being about four days at sea, and landed at Matanzas on the 27th, in the evening.

These facts being proved to the court and jury, no doubt existed that they amounted to piracy. Witnesses, however, were introduced who testified to facts that left some doubt whether the prisoner was the same person who committed the piracy upon Captain Johnson.

The case was summed up to the jury by Messrs. Nevins & Hoffman, for the prisoner, and by Messrs. Haines & Tillotson, for the United States.

THE COURT charged the jury about eight o'clock in the evening. They retired to consider upon their verdict, and returned into court before ten the same evening, when some points of law were explained to them, and they were again sent out, and about twelve o'clock they were discharged; they having previously informed the court that they were equally divided, and that there was no prospect of their ever agreeing upon their verdict.

A motion was made to discharge the prisoner, by his counsel, on the ground that the court had no authority to discharge the jury but in extreme cases, and that this was not such a case.

The court were divided. VAN NESS was of opinion the jury were discharged too soon. THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, decided upon the motion, that there need not be a physical impossibility to a unity of opinion. He decided, the court had power to discharge the jury in criminal cases, and that it rested in the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; that it was not necessary the jury should be so far exhausted as to be incapable of further discussion and deliberation, nor was it necessary that they should be disabled by sickness, intoxication, or mental derangement. It was enough that they could not agree; that there was a moral disability. In this case the jury had been out near four hours; a length of time amply sufficient to agree upon their verdict, if they could. This was a plain question of fact for them to decide. There were no intricate questions of law in the case. A longer time ought to be afforded to the jury where a case involved a great number of facts and points of law. It depended more upon the nature of the case than upon any settled rule that could be laid down for the discharge of the jury. If the jury could not make up their minds and agree upon their verdict in four hours, where the identity of the prisoner was the only question before them, it was probable they never could agree.

As the court were divided, no judgment was given.

[NOTE. Upon a certificate of a division in the opinions of the judges the cause was taken to the supreme court, which decided that the prisoner was not entitled to be discharged from custody and might again be put on trial. 9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 579.]

UNITED STATES (PERKINS v.). See Case No. 10,990.

UNITED STATES (PEROTS v.). See Case No. 10,993.

Case No. 16,034.

UNITED STATES v. PETER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 98.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1814.

LARCENY—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES.

In Alexandria, a prisoner indicted under the act of congress, for larceny, has the right of peremptory challenge.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, admitted that under the Virginia law of November 13, 1792, p. 103, § 8, the prisoner [the negro Peter], who was indicted for larceny under the act of congress of April 30, 1790, § 16 (1 Stat. 116), was entitled to a peremptory challenge of twenty jurors.

Case No. 16,035.

UNITED STATES v. PETERS.

[2 Abb. U. S. 494.] [2]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. March Term, 1870.

COUNTERFEITING—REQUISITES OF INDICTMENT.

An indictment for "falsely making," &c., coin of the United States, under section 20 of the crimes act of 1825 [4 Stat. 121), need not aver an intent to pass the coin as true, nor an intent to defraud.

Motion to quash an indictment. The defendant, Frederick W. Peters, was indicted, under section 20 of the crimes act of 1825, for counterfeiting the coin of the United States.

Mr. Russell, for the motion.

Mr. Maynard, U. S. Dist. Atty., opposed.

WITHEY, District Judge. The indictment charges that Peters falsely made, forged, and counterfeited half and quarter-dollar coin, in the similitude of the silver coin of the United States, and also assisted in doing the same thing; but the offense is not charged to have been committed with intent to pass as true, nor with intent to defraud anybody.

The motion rests on the omission to charge the intent. The court is of the opinion that the intent to pass, &c., constitutes no part of the crime as defined by the statute. The crime consists in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting. This is a distinct offense, viz: to make with a false intent. The indictment charges, in the language of the statute, that defendant "did falsely make," &c. Under this charge it would be no proof of an offense to show that Peters made the coin from curiosity or amusement, or for other purposes, without any design to falsify the coin of the United States. Such false purpose may be shown by proof that it was with intent to pass, utter, publish, or sell, or with intent to deceive any person.

Another offense defined by section 20 of the act of 1825, under consideration, is the passing, &c., or bringing into the United States, with intent to pass as true, knowing the same to be false, with intent to defraud. Here, an ingredient of the offense is the intent to pass as true, and intent to defraud, and therefore must be charged in order to justify sufficient proof to convict.

We are entirely clear that the words of the section, "with intent to pass as true," and to defraud, do not relate to the falsely making coin in the semblance of the coin of the United States. Motion denied.

Case No. 16,036.

UNITED STATES v. PETERSBURG JUDGES OF ELECTION.

SAME v. PETERSBURG REGISTRARS OF ELECTION.

[1 Hughes, 493; 14 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 105, 238; 9 Am. Law Rev. 370.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. 1874.

ELECTIONS—ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1870—PREVENTING REGISTRATION—INDICTMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CITIZENSHIP.

1. An indictment charged that defendants unlawfully prevented, etc., from voting at a municipal election in Petersburg, certain legally registered voters qualified according to law. Another indictment charged that defendants refused to register certain legally qualified electors of African descent, as voters at the said election. On demurrer it was held, by Bond, Circuit Judge, that the indictments were sufficient, and that the motive of hostility as to race, etc., might be inferred from the acts charged; Hughes, J., contra, that the indictments were defective for not charging that the acts were done on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude, and that they should be quashed.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 14 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 105, and 9 Am. Law Rev. 370, contain only partial reports.]

2. Per Hughes, District Judge. The 4th section of the enforcement act of May 31, 1870 [16 Stat. 140], is not founded on the fifteenth amendment, and is unconstitutional.

3. Id. The federal courts have no jurisdiction to protect rights which accrue from the citizenship of a state, but only such as accrue from citizenship of the United States. The right to vote belongs to the former class. It is not a natural or inherent right, but a privilege conferred or withheld by the several states in their own discretion. The only guarantee of the United States in this connection is under the fifteenth amendment, that no state shall deny or abridge the privilege on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The only case in which the federal courts can entertain jurisdiction of any question upon this right is where violation of this guarantee is alleged.

4. Per Bond, Circuit Judge. The fourteenth amendment declares what shall constitute citizenship of the United States as well as of the several states, and gives congress the power to protect the citizen in all the franchises, rights, and privileges which belong to him either as a citizen of the United States or of a state.

[Cited in Ex parte Kinney, Case No. 7,825.]

5. The rights which are given to a citizen by a state, such as the right to vote when possessing certain qualifications, may be modified or taken away by the state, and the United States cannot interfere, but so long as the right remains, the United States has the power to protect him in its enjoyment and exercise.

6. Rights which do not arise from citizenship but accrue to men as men, such as the security of life and property, remain under the exclusive protection of the states.

7. The enforcement act of May 31, 1870, providing for the punishment of obstructing voters, is appropriate legislation to enforce the fourteenth amendment, and is, therefore, constitutional; and an indictment under it charging the prevention of legally qualified citizens of Virginia from voting, and the refusal to register such citizens as voters, is valid and sufficient, although it does not charge that the acts were done on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude of the citizens.

The cases first named above were indictments against the judges who held the municipal election of Petersburg in 1874, respectively at eight precincts in that city. They charged that at a municipal election held there on the 2d May, 1874, these defendants (respectively naming three at each precinct) did unlawfully prevent and obstruct from voting divers persons, to wit, A., B., etc., "citizens of the United States, twenty-one years old, residents of Virginia for more than twelve months, and of Petersburg for more than three months, resident and legally registered voters in said election, and otherwise qualified by law to vote at said election," at the said precincts respectively. The second cases above named were indictments against the defendants for refusing to register as voters certain citizens, etc.

The defendants demurred to the indictments on the grounds: (1) That there is no averment in any of the counts in the said indictment that the acts of commission and omission charged as criminal in said indictment were done or omitted to be done because or on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude" of the persons whose rights are averred to have been denied, diminished, impaired, or obstructed by the alleged acts of commission and omission of the defendants. (2) That the said acts and omissions are not averred to have been done under color or in execution of any state law or authority. (3) That the act of congress, or that part of it on which the said indictment is formed, is unconstitutional and void.

R. T. Daniel, for demurrers.

L. L. Lewis, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Before BOND, Circuit Judge, and HUGHES, District Judge.

BOND, Circuit Judge. It is conceded in the argument that had this been at an election for members of congress or for presidential electors the demurrer would have been bad; or that if the pleader had charged that the unlawful obstruction was on account of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of the electors, no fault could have been found with the indictment. But this was not at a federal election, nor does the indictment charge that the obstruction was made on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The question then is whether or not there is constitutional power in congress to protect a citizen of the United States, qua citizen, in the exercise of the elective franchise, either by force of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment of the constitution. Citizenship of the United States prior to the passage of these amendments was, to say the least, but an ill-defined relation. It was by many thought to be derivative, and not direct. A person became a citizen of the United States by force of his citizenship of some one of the states. It was as a citizen of a state that he had a right to sue in federal courts, and hence a large number of our fellow-citizens during the late civil war were led to think that as they first became citizens of the state, and indirectly through that relation citizens of the United States, their allegiance was first due to the state, and secondarily to the United States. It seems to me that the object of the first clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment was to settle this question of allegiance forever, and to make the United States a nation by declaring "that all persons born in the United States are citizens thereof," owing allegiance upon birth, and that consequently the power to protect such persons as owed this allegiance belonged to the United States as fully as the power to protect its citizens for the purposes of its organization inheres in any other nation. Whether a person's duty to the state or to the United States is paramount, was the question fundamental in the war; and after the expenditure of so much blood and treasure, the people through their legislatures thought it not right to leave the matter doubtful, and so declared in this amendment that not only are all persons born or naturalized in the United States citizens thereof, but are also citizens of the states wherein they reside, thus establishing not only what constituted citizenship of the United States, but, so far as this description of persons is concerned, what constituted citizenship of a state.

Congress is empowered to enforce these two relations created by this amendment by appropriate legislation. It has seen fit since the adoption of it to legislate upon the right to vote only. It is objected to this legislation, which, so far as these cases are concerned, is contained in the 4th section of the act of May 30, 1870, which provides "that if any person by force, bribery, threats, intimidation, or other unlawful means, shall hinder, delay, or prevent, or obstruct any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at an election," etc., that the right to vote is not a privilege or immunity of a citizen of the United States as such, and that, therefore, it does not come within the power of congress to legislate concerning it. But the constitution of the state of Virginia declares in its third article that "every male citizen of the United States, twenty-one years of age," who shall have the requisite qualifications, shall have the right to vote; and now the question is, as the right to vote at an election in Virginia is not a right absolute, dependent solely upon citizenship, but a right which the state may modify and control, has congress the power, where and while the right is given, to protect a citizen in the exercise of it?

It may be fairly concluded that what is meant by citizenship of the state is the same, so far as the power to protect that relation goes, though it may not be coextensive in the privileges given, as is meant by citizenship of the United States. A state has the undoubted right to control, protect, tax, and summon to arms its citizens to promote the objects for which it exists. And when the fourteenth amendment declares that all persons born within the jurisdiction of the United States are citizens of the state in which they reside, every such person becomes liable to these burdens and is entitled to this protection. This will be admitted. When the same amendment declares that such persons are also citizens of the United States, it must mean that they shall occupy the same relation to the general government so far as its purposes are concerned. These purposes we are not left in doubt about, for the constitution of the United States declares in its preamble that the object of the government is to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. Whatever, therefore, if a state had these objects for its organization, it might require its citizens to do or to refrain from doing to promote them, it seems to me the United States may require. The citizenship which owes its allegiance to each is now created by the same paragraph of the fourteenth amendment, and each may summon its citizens to enforce them, or defend them in so doing. In a republican form of government the duty of voting is as responsible a burden as that of bearing arms. The government cannot exist without the power to require both; and if it may protect the citizen in the one obligation, I see no reason, if it be desired to preserve its existence, why it may not do so in the other. If, therefore, a state, by virtue of a person's relation to it as citizen, claims, and has always claimed, the right to protect him in the exercise of a right granted by the United States, surely the United States is not claiming unlawful authority when it undertakes to protect one of its own citizens in a right granted by a state to him as a citizen of the United States. Now the right to vote at a federal election is bestowed by the constitution of the United States upon such citizens of the states as have the requisite qualifications for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature. The state prescribes the qualifications for such electors; but being designated by the state through qualifications prescribed, the United States grants them the right to vote at a federal election. Every state by its laws protects its citizens in the exercise of this right, with which, not the state, but the United States clothes them. If this be within the power of the state by virtue of the citizenship of its citizens, why may not the United States protect its citizens to the fullest extent in a right with which a state clothes them? But this fourteenth amendment goes much farther than this. It declares that all persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens of the state wherein they reside, and that congress shall enforce this by appropriate legislation.

That which constitutes citizenship, if it be not the mere privilege of calling oneself citizen, must be the prerogatives, franchises, rights and privileges which the state governments grant to those occupying that relation, in return for the performance of the duties which spring from allegiance and citizenship; and unless this amendment was inane, fruitless and ineffectual, it must mean that congress by appropriate legislation can protect the citizen of a state in the exercise of all the rights conferred upon him as such, and which distinguish him from those who are aliens or merely residents in the state. The exercise of this power on the part of the United States can in nowise interfere with the right of the state to prescribe the qualifications of citizens to vote, nor with their privileges and immunities in any other respect. That power remains as heretofore with the state, with the exception that they shall not make race, color, or previous condition of servitude a ground of distinction. It only asserts the power of the United States in return for his allegiance to protect the citizen in the rights which the federal government grants, and in such as the states from time to time voluntarily bestow upon him, and which they can continue or withdraw at pleasure. There is a citizenship of the states and a citizenship of the United States. What the states may do by reason of this relationship the United States may do. To give any other construction to the clauses of the fourteenth amendment we have been considering would be to say that everybody born or naturalized in the United States had a right to call himself citizen, and that the amendment drew the relation of citizenship no closer than before its adoption; and that in view of the great contest just over, the people adopted an amendment declaring every one born or naturalized in the United States a citizen, and that congress might enforce that nominal relation, and the empty claim to be called such, by appropriate legislation. To overrule this demurrer, it is necessary to claim only that the sovereignty of the United States is equal in its sphere for the protection of the rights and privileges of citizens, to that claimed by the states in the protection of their own. Nor does this construction of the amendment interfere with the rulings of the supreme court in what is known as the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 36.

The right to slaughter animals within the limits of the city of New Orleans was not a right appertaining to citizenship at all. Aliens might do it; but in these cases the right to vote is given to all citizens of the United States as such, and no one else can exercise it. It is an immunity, a defence, a privilege peculiar to that relation, and is not shared in common with all persons whatsoever. It was not personal to a man by reason of his manhood at common law. It is the endowment of the state, peculiar to citizenship. Before the state was, men had certain rights which belonged to them because they were men. As our Declaration of Independence declares, men are born with certain inalienable rights. These rights we do not contend the fourteenth amendment empowers the United States to protect. It is only such rights, privileges and immunities as the state or the United States, confers upon them because of their citizenship to the United States, that the laws of the United States can insure. The fear that this construction will draw into the United States courts all cases of offences against the person and property of individuals is groundless. The rights which are inalienable and belong to men as men, and not as citizens, are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The right to be secure in one's person or property is not peculiar to citizenship. Citizens share that with aliens. Offences against the person as well as those against property are cognizable in the state courts, except where the controversy arises between citizens of different states, a choice of forum is given; but all such privileges as are peculiar to citizenship this fourteenth amendment, it seems to me, was adopted to enforce. And all that the supreme court decided in the Slaughterhouse Cases, was that the United States by force of the fourteenth amendment was not clothed with authority to enforce the rights common to all men but those only peculiar to citizenship.

The right to vote is not the common right of all persons resident in Virginia. It is not the right of all citizens of Virginia per se, because a person might be a citizen of Virginia who is not a citizen of the United States, and the constitution of the state confers the right to vote upon citizens of the United States solely. The demurrer insists upon it, that as the state has passed no law abridging the right of citizens in any particular, the indictment is bad. This view leaves out of consideration the final clause of the fourteenth amendment, which empowers congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. The mischief to be prevented by the fourteenth amendment was the obstruction of the citizen in the exercise of the rights of citizenship, whatever they from time to time might be. There is no way as yet pointed out by which a state can be punished, and the mischief sought to be prevented might be flagrant in violation of state law, or without any color of authority under it. The white people in Virginia might, without law or in spite of it, determine that no colored man should vote, and the colored people in South Carolina might, in the same unlawful manner, unite to violently obstruct their white fellow-citizens from exercising the elective franchise. The mischief to be prevented would be flagrant, and yet if this demurrer be good, no remedy could be found. Now congress, in this view of the case, has thought it appropriate legislation to punish the individuals who commit the wrong, whether under color of state authority or without pretending to any authority at all. Who can say that this is not appropriate legislation? It remedies the existing evil; and a law which accomplishes or tends to accomplish a purpose required by the constitution to be effected, cannot be said by a judicial tribunal to be inappropriate. Fugitive Slave Law, Act Sept. 16, 1850 [9 Stat. 462].

In answer to the objection that these indictments do not allege that the obstruction had was done on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, it is sufficient to say that the statute under which the indictments are drawn uses no such language; and it is most generally sufficient in setting out in pleading a statutory offence, to use the words of the statute creating it. But if it be contended that the only power congress had to pass the statute was that granted by the fifteenth amendment, which prevents discrimination among voters on account of race, color, or previous condition, etc., and authorizes appropriate legislation to prevent such discrimination, there is answer to it in this, that it is impossible to prove, though the fact may be so, if a body of colored men in South Carolina assault and beat fifty white people at the polls and prevent their voting, and at the same time knock two colored people down, that this was done on account of race or color. Congress thought to cut the thing up by the roots, and enacted what is really and practically the only appropriate legislation, as any person who has seen the efforts to enforce this section must know, that no person shall disturb another at an election to prevent his exercise of the franchise; and as the greater includes the less, if he can do so from no motive he cannot do it because of race, color, or previous condition, etc.

And from these considerations we have drawn the following conclusions:

1st. That by the fourteenth amendment to the constitution the people have provided a citizenship to the United States, direct, positive and paramount, springing from birth within its jurisdiction, or by statutory naturalization.

2d. That what the states have claimed to do by virtue of their sovereign power over their citizens, the United States may do over its citizens by virtue of its sovereign power and the direct relationship thus established.

3d. That while the fourteenth amendment, in furtherance of this view, declares that no state shall make or enforce any law contrary to this provision, it likewise declares that congress shall enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation. And that as congress cannot punish a state qua state, it is appropriate legislation within the meaning of the statute to attain its end, i. e., the protection of the citizen in his right to vote by punishing the individuals who obstruct him in its exercise.

And that even under the fifteenth amendment, where experience has shown the obstruction of voters on account of race and color cannot be, in the judgment of congress, otherwise prevented, it is appropriate legislation to provide by statute that no such obstruction shall take place at all.

And that this construction of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments does not affect the rights of the states to define the rights of citizenship, nor does it draw into the jurisdiction of the United States courts the question of the invasion of the rights of persons or property, as such. It concerns only the rights which distinguish persons as citizens, and which they hold in that character.

HUGHES, District Judge. If the election described, instead of being for municipal officers, had been for a member of congress or presidential electors of the United States, these indictments, for reasons which need not here be set forth, would have been valid to give jurisdiction to this court, and would have been founded on those sections of the enforcement acts of congress which expressly relate to national elections. On the other hand, if the indictments had charged that the persons prevented from voting at this state election were persons of Saxon, Celtic, Mongol, African, or other descent, and that the defendants prevented them from voting on account of race, then, being founded upon those sections of the enforcement acts which were designed to enforce the fifteenth amendment of the national constitution, they would have given jurisdiction to this court: because the fifteenth amendment expressly declares that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The offence charged, however, is clearly not within either of these categories. If it had been, the jurisdiction of this court to try it would have been undeniable.

The indictments are really founded upon the 4th section of the enforcement act of May 31st, 1870, which declares that "if any person, by force, bribery, threats, intimidation, or other unlawful means, shall hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct, ... any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at any election (by the people in any state, territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision), such person shall for every such offence . . . . . be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be fined, etc., or imprisoned, etc., or both at the discretion of the court." This section is clearly not founded upon the fifteenth amendment, and, if constitutional at all, is so only by virtue of the clauses of the fourteenth amendment, which declare as follows: "All persons born and naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, ... nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article." If this language of the fourteenth amendment, giving to congress power to legislate for preventing the abridgement of the rights of citizens of the United States, were not qualified by another provision of that amendment, and were allowed its widest signification, then it is broad enough to cover the 4th section of the enforcement act of May, 1870, which I have quoted, in the broadest signification of that section's language; and the national courts would have jurisdiction to try any offence abridging any right of any citizen of the United States on any account; and the indictments at bar would give jurisdiction to this court over the offences charged.

But is this language to be so interpreted? Is it not rather to be limited by construction? If the latter, then the language is to be construed according to rules of statutory interpretation, which are as much a part of the statutory law as the statutes themselves. Although, as will appear in the sequel, it is unnecessary for me to do so with reference to the eight indictments under immediate consideration, I shall first treat this clause of the fourteenth amendment as if it were not qualified by any other clause in that amendment, or by the fifteenth amendment.

It is a settled principle of construction that all instruments are to be interpreted according to their real intention and object; and when statutes employ general terms, those terms are to be limited in giving effect to the statutes, according to the real meaning of their authors, rather than according to their literal meaning, so as to correct the evil and advance the remedy contemplated by them. The illustration of this principle, which is most familiar to the legal profession, is that given by Blackstone (book 1, p. 59). A law of Edward III. forbade all ecclesiastical persons to purchase provisions at Rome. If the term "provisions" had been given its widest meaning, it would have forbidden any of the English clergy who might happen to be at Rome from buying food; but the statute was construed with reference to its intention, which was to prohibit the purchasing of nominations by the pope to ecclesiastical benefices in England, which at that day were called "provisions." It is a general principle, that the language of statutes is, if possible, not to be so interpreted as to produce absurdity, or oppression, or evils greater than those designed to be remedied by them. Indeed, the very function and province of a court is to construe and apply the law according to its true meaning only, and for securing its real objects alone. It is, therefore, perfectly competent for the national courts to discriminate between "the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States," alluded to by the fourteenth amendment, and to limit the meaning of the acts of congress passed to protect them (the fourth section of the first enforcement act among others), so as to make them conform in practice to the spirit of the constitution of the United States, which regards the national government as one of limited, express powers, and the governments of the states as of general powers, not expressly enumerated. The authority of the courts to enlarge the powers of the national government by construction has always encountered more or less disfavor. Their authority to limit those powers by construction has never been regarded with jealousy. The only difficulty in thus discriminating lies in ascertaining the principle on which to proceed, and the line of distinction to be drawn in regard to the privileges of the citizens of the United States intended to be protected. I flatter myself, however, that this difficulty can easily be surmounted in considering the questions raised upon the indictments before us. The supreme court of the United States, in its decision in the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 36, has taken a part of the responsibility of this task off our hands. Those were cases in which the subject of complaint was an act of the legislature of Louisiana. That act created a joint stock company; empowered it to hold certain estate near the city of New Orleans; required that all animals which should be slaughtered within a large territory surrounding that city should be slaughtered upon the premises of this company; and gave it, in these and other respects, exclusive rights in abridgment of the like rights of other citizens, and especially of persons following the trade of butchering in the area described.

The United States supreme court held that the national courts had no jurisdiction to protect citizens of Louisiana, though they were citizens of the United States, in such privileges as were abridged in the act of incorporation complained of, passed by the legislature, and approved by the supreme court of the state. In its decision in these cases, pronounced by Justice Miller, the supreme court say (16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 77, 78): "Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no state should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the states to the federal government? And where it is declared that congress shall have power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the states? All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For, not only are these rights subject to the control of congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by state legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative powers by the states, in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper, on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction, followed by the reversal of the judgment of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the states on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the state governments by subjecting them to the control of congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them, of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the state and federal governments to the people; the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt. We are convinced that no such results were intended by the congress which proposed those amendments, nor by the legislatures of the states which ratified them." That august court accordingly decided that it had no jurisdiction to protect the privileges which were abridged by the act of incorporation complained of, the privileges abridged being those which belong to citizens of the state as such, and distinguished from those which attached to them as citizens of the United States. Its decision authorizes us to construe the clauses of the fourteenth amendment in question, and the acts of congress passed to enforce them, according to their direct historical object, rather than their mere literal meaning; and, more particularly, so to construe them as to discriminate between those rights of the citizen which he has as a citizen of the state and those which belong to him as a citizen of the United States.

In Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230], Justice Washington defined the privileges and immunities which belong to citizens of the states as such to be those which he called "fundamental;" such as "belong of right to citizens of all governments, and always belonged to citizens of the several states of this Union from the time of their independence." They embrace those rights which belong to a man as a member of society, together with those which the constitution and laws of his state confer upon its citizens. On the other hand, the rights which we have as citizens of the United States are such as are implied in the language of Judge Taney, when he declared that "we are citizens of the United States for all the great purposes for which the federal government was established." For instance, a man as a citizen of Virginia may carry on a business here by paying a certain tax: in virtue of which fact a citizen of Maryland, as a citizen of the United States, has a right to carry on the like business in Virginia by the payment of no greater tax. So, under the constitution of the state, a man born in Virginia is a citizen here after a certain age; by virtue of which fact he may become, under the constitution of the United States, a citizen of New York by a change of residence to that state. This parallel between the rights held by citizens, respectively, in their two characters, might be run out through many examples; but the distinction is too plain to need further illustration. For other decisions on the subject see [Gibbons v. Ogden] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 203; [Mayor etc. of City of New York v. Miln] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102; [License Tax Cases] 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 471; [Paul v. Virginia] 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 180; [U. S. v. De Witt] 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 41; and [Ward v. Maryland] 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 430.

Adopting this broad distinction, and availing of the authority given by the supreme court in its decision in the Slaughterhouse Cases, the national courts are justified in refusing to take cognizance of offences committed in violation of those rights which belong to a person as the citizen of a state, not created or conferred, but only guaranteed, by the national constitution; and in confining their jurisdiction to those rights which belong to persons peculiarly in their character as citizens of the United States. This much being settled, and inasmuch as the fourth section of the enforcement act of May, 1870, concerns only the citizen's right of voting, it is only necessary to inquire how the right of voting attaches to the citizen; whether in his character as a citizen of the state, or in that of a citizen of the United States.

Before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, a man was a citizen of the United States only derivatively, by virtue of his being a citizen of a state. Such was the principle of the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Dred Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 393, in which that court expressly decided that as a man of African descent was not the citizen of any state, therefore he could not be a citizen of the United States. By the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, the new status of citizenship of the United States, independently of that of citizenship of the state, was first established; but it does not follow that the incorporation of this new provision into our national policy has abolished or obliterated the line of distinction which the national courts had claimed the power to draw between the rights of a person as citizen of a state and those which he had as citizen of the United States. There is not yet any general act of congress clothing the citizen of the United States proprio vigore with all the rights of the citizen of the state where he resides, and giving the national courts express jurisdiction to protect those rights. Certainly there can be no law of congress found which directly purports to constitute any citizen of the United States a voter in the state in which he resides. Indeed, such a law would seem to be unconstitutional; for the fourteenth amendment itself contains a clause which leaves to the states the power, always before possessed by and conceded to them, of prohibiting citizens of the United States from voting, and of declaring who shall be voters, even in national elections.

That amendment. in the second paragraph, provides that "when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for president and vice-president of the United States, representatives in congress, the executive and judicial officers of a state, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such state, being twenty-one years old, and citizens of the United States, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens bears to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such state." Thus the right to vote, even of citizens of the United States, is left even by the fourteenth amendment itself, to be regulated and defined by the states, which had always held that power. The state of Virginia has accordingly exercised this prerogative, pursuant to her own uncontrolled views of justice and propriety, in the first clause of the third article of her state constitution, which is in these words: "Every male citizen of the United States twenty-one years old who shall have been a resident of this state twelve months, and of the county, city, or town in which he shall offer to vote three months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote upon all questions submitted to the people at such election;" following this general provision with the usual exceptions of persons committing crimes, etc. And here I will remark that the right to vote would seem to be not fundamental; not a natural right. The power to declare who shall be voters, who shall be constituents of the political sovereignty of a state, has been claimed by and conceded to each state from the beginning of our independence; and is expressly conceded by the clause of the fourteenth amendment which I last quoted. The right to vote would seem to be not an inherent right, but a conferred privilege; a privilege not derived from the United States, but from the state alone; a privilege belonging to the man as a citizen of the state, and not to him in his character as citizen of the United States. The noble liberality of Virginia in making every citizen of the United States resident within her borders a voter in every election, does not in any degree change the fact that he derives this right from herself. Nor does the obligation of the United States to guarantee to the states a republican form of government change the fact now existing, and which has existed from the founding of the Union, that to the states is left the power of defining and regulating the right of suffrage, a power without which a state could scarcely be considered as any longer retaining its autonomy.

It being, therefore, incontrovertible that the right to vote in a state election belongs to a man as the citizen of his state, it remains to ask what right connected with voting belongs to him as a citizen of the United States. Under the fifteenth amendment his right as a national citizen is—not to be prevented from voting "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude;" which is a right not involved in the indictments at bar. Has he any similar right in his national character under the fourteenth amendment? Whatever right the national citizen, as such, may have, under the general terms of the fourteenth amendment, not to be abridged in his privileges or immunities, so far as other privileges are concerned, yet that amendment gives him no such right as to the privilege of voting, because it expressly leaves to the states the power of regulating the right of suffrage in both state and national elections. It is therefore plain that not only is the right to vote derived from the state, and not only does it belong to the category of rights which it is peculiarly within the province of the state tribunals to protect, but it is excepted by the fourteenth amendment from those general privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which the states are forbidden to abridge. It is indeed a right which the states are expressly allowed to abridge in every other respect than on account of race, color, and previous servitude. If the constitution gives this permission to the states, then no act of congress forbidding the abridgment of this right on other account than of race, color, etc., is constitutional, and no indictment founded upon such a law is valid to give jurisdiction of the offence charged to the national courts.

It is contended that from whatever source a right comes to a citizen of the United States, yet, once attaching to him, it is competent for congress and the United States courts to protect him in it. This argument would confer the power and duty of protecting the citizen of the United States from any of the ordinary offences at common law, such as murder, false imprisonment, and the like. This cannot be a sound proposition. There is an obvious distinction to be made on this subject. Although still unnecessary to my argument as to the eight indictments mentioned, I will advert to the distinction which should be drawn between rights proper and those improper for the jurisdiction of the national courts. It is that so well stated by Mr. Justice Bradley in his opinion in the case of U. S. v. Cruikshank [Case No. 14,897], where the learned justice distinguishes between those provisions of the national constitution which guarantee fundamental rights, the duty of protecting which properly belongs to the states, and those provisions which either create rights or enjoin in affirmative legislation upon congress for their protection.

I cannot but express a cordial and full concurrence in the following remarks of Mr. Justice Bradley on that subject. He says: "With regard to those acknowledged rights and privileges of the citizen which form a part of his political inheritance derived from the mother country, and which were challenged and vindicated by centuries of stubborn resistance to arbitrary power, they belong to him as his birthright, and it is the duty of the particular state of which he is a citizen to protect and enforce them, and to do nought to deprive him of their full enjoyment. When any of these rights and privileges are secured by the constitution of the United States only by a declaration that the state or the United States shall not violate or abridge them, it is at once understood that they are not created or conferred by the constitution, but that the constitution only guarantees that they shall not be impaired by the state, or the United States, as the case may be. The fulfilment by the United States of this guaranty is the only duty with which that government is charged. The affirmative enforcement of the rights and privileges themselves, unless something more is expressed, does not devolve upon it, but belongs to the state government as a part of its residuary sovereignty." If this distinction be correct, then, as the right of voting is not conferred by the national constitution, nor even guaranteed by that instrument, except in a qualified and negative way by the fifteenth amendment, it is not one of those rights over which, when proposed to be exercised in a state election, congress or the national courts have jurisdiction.

Thus are we brought by legitimate argument founded upon the decision in the Slaughterhouse Cases, and the very able one in the Cruikshank Case [supra], to a conclusion against the validity of the eight indictments pending against the judges of election of Petersburg. But there is a much more direct method of reaching the same conclusion, which avoids a resort to the power of construction, and which renders useless the distinction drawn by the national courts in the cases alluded to between the rights belonging to a person respectively in his two characters of citizen of the state and citizen of the United States, and between the rights created or conferred, and those merely guaranteed by the national constitution. It is this: Admit for argument's sake, that the fourteenth amendment, in its first paragraph, was intended to prohibit the abridgment of any privilege of the citizen by the state, or by its citizens, on any account whatever: yet the second paragraph of the same amendment, which leaves to the states the power always held by them to prescribe the qualifications for suffrage at their pleasure in national and state elections, expressly excepts the right of voting from those general privileges; and the most that can be insisted upon is that the fourteenth amendment protects the citizen of the United States in all privileges except the right of voting, and leaves this right to be regulated ad libitum by the states. It was this latter fact which created the necessity for the fifteenth amendment, and that amendment would mean nothing, and would have been wholly unnecessary if before its adoption the states had not had uncontrolled power over the right of suffrage Its sole object was to limit the unrestrained power of the state over this right which had been conceded by the fourteenth amendment; but it undertook to limit the power only in one respect. It declared in substance that notwithstanding the states possessed uncontrolled power over this right they should be restricted in exercising their power at least this far, to wit: They should not deny or abridge the right of the citizen to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

I am, therefore, of opinion that any law of congress is unconstitutional which makes the preventing of a voter from voting in a state election penal on any other account than of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and that any indictment charging such an offence, though founded upon such a law or section of a law of congress, is invalid to give jurisdiction of such an offence to this court. I think, consequently, that the demurrers of the defendants to the eight indictments against the Petersburg judges of election are good, and that the indictments should be quashed.

II. The three indictments pending against certain registrars of election in Petersburg differ in two respects as to the questions which I have been considering, from those pending against the judges of election.

1. They allege that the persons who were prevented from registering were of African descent, but omit to charge that they were prevented from registering "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." These are not indictments, therefore, founded upon the fifteeenth amendment or any act of congress passed for enforcing it. We are not at liberty to infer from the mere circumstances that a man was of any particular race, and prevented from exercising a right, that he was so prevented on account of his race. That fact must be charged before it can be proved, and the failure to charge it is, I think, fatal to these indictments, so far as the fifteenth amendment and the statutes enforcing it are concerned.

2. These three indictments each charge in substance that the defendant "did refuse and knowingly omit to give to all citizens of the United States in his ward the same and equal opportunity, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, to register, etc.; but to the contrary thereof, refused and knowingly omitted to give A., B., C., D., and E. the opportunity to register which he gave to others, the said A., B., C., D., and E. being qualified, etc., and citizens of the United States of "African race and descent." By not charging that the refusal was on account of the race, etc., of the injured persons, these indictments, for the reasons I have stated, do not come under the fifteenth amendment. If they are valid at all, to give jurisdiction to this court it must be under the fourteenth amendment and the 4th section of the act of May, 1870. But, for reasons already abundantly stated, registration is a right conferred by the state. Each of the three indictments under immediate consideration expressly recites that the right is conferred by the laws of Virginia, and that the duties of the registrar were duties imposed by state laws. Nor do they charge that in consequence of the failure of the injured persons named to be admitted to registration they lost their right to vote either at a state election or an election held for officers of the United States. The denial merely of registration is an offence against the state, if it be on any other account than of race, color, etc. If the indictments had charged that the denial had been on account of race, etc., the offence would have been cognizable here; or if, after charging the denial, the indictments had gone on to charge that in consequence thereof the citizen of the United States was prevented from voting at an election held for a member of congress, or electors of a president of the United States, I am inclined to think that the offence would have been cognizable here. But a charge merely that a citizen of the United States was denied registration, without other allegation to make it appear that some right was abridged which belonged to the man as a citizen of the United States, is not sufficient to give cognizance of the offence to this court. I am, therefore, of opinion that the demurrers to these indictments against the Petersburg registrars ought to be sustained, and that the latter ought to be quashed.

The judges being divided in opinion, the case was certified to the supreme court of the United States.

UNITED STATES v. PETERSBURG REGISTRARS OF ELECTION. See Case No. 16,036.

Case No. 16,037.

UNITED STATES v. PETERSON et al.

[1 Woodb. & M. 305.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1846.

REVOLT OF SEAMEN—AUTHORITY OF MASTER—EXCESSIVE PUNISHMENTS—ALIEN SEAMEN ON AMERICAN SHIPS—INDICTMENT—JOINDER OF OFFENCES—NOLLE PROS.

1. Revolts on shipboard are to be considered now as defined by the act of congress of March 3, 1835, c. 40 [4 Stat. 775], and consist not only in attempts to usurp the command from the master, or to transfer it to another, or to deprive him of it for any purpose by violence, but in resisting him in the free and lawful exercise of his authority.

[Cited in U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. 205; U. S. v. Huff, 13 Fed. 637.]

2. So if no actual revolt is made, that act punishes, though in a milder manner, attempts to commit a revolt and various acts likely to lead to mutiny, and, among them, to assemble with others on board "in a tumultuous and mutinous manner."

3. The crew have no right to disarm the captain, though using a deadly weapon, if they are in a mutinous state, and exercising personal violence to resist his lawful commands.

[Cited in Fuller v. Colby, Case No. 5,149.]

4. Seamen must obey the lawful commands of a master, as well as refrain from acts of piracy and mutiny; and look for redress against excessive punishment, or illegal orders, to the tribunals at home, and the acts of congress for their protection, rather than to violence by themselves at sea.

[Cited in Fuller v. Colby, Case No. 5,149.]

5. Foreign seamen on board American ships, are as much subject to punishment for such disobedience or violence as Americans, and are alike to be protected and redressed on their return home.

6. To render a vessel American, so as to punish offences on board of her, it is enough to show, that she sailed from and to an American port, and was apparently owned and controlled by citizens of the United States.

7. If there be two counts in one indictment for offences committed at the same time and place, and of the same class, but different in degree, as one for a revolt and another for an attempt to excite it; the judgment will not be arrested, though a verdict of guilty is returned on both.

[Followed in U. S. v. Stetson, Case No. 16,390. Cited in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 252.]

8. The district attorney is allowed before judgment to enter a nol. pros. on one, if he deems it advisable.

9. It is not a misjoinder of offences in different counts in the same indictment, unless they belong to different families, or the judgments and punishments are inconsistent with each other.

[Cited in People v. Sweeney, 55 Mich. 588, 22 N. W. 50; State v. Smalley, 50 Vt. 741.]

This was an indictment against the prisoners [John Peterson and others] found at this term, in two counts.

The first count alleged, that one Baily Foster, on the 7th of May, 1846, was master on board the American vessel Charles Carroll, bound from New Orleans to Boston, and the prisoners, a part of his crew; and that, on the day aforesaid, upon the high seas, they resisted him with force, while "in the free and lawful exercise of his authority," and thus created a revolt, contrary to the act of congress in such case made and provided. The second count charged them, at the same time and place, with having assembled together in said ship, "in a tumultuous and mutinous manner," contrary to the same act of congress.

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

The prisoners on being arraigned, pleaded not guilty.

C. B. Goodrich, for prisoners.
R. Rantoul, U. S. Dist. Atty.

The latter relied upon the act of congress, passed April 30, 1790, § 1 [1 Stat. 112], as defining the offence described in the first count; and the second section of the same act, as defining that described in the second count. And, on being questioned by the counsel for the prisoners, whether he intended to rely on both counts for the punishment of the conduct of the prisoners on that occasion, replied in the affirmative, as the transaction, though a single one, might be considered on the evidence as constituting the second offence, if it did not amount to the first.

Evidence was then offered to show, that the Charles Carroll was owned by American citizens, and was fitted out and sailed under their orders, with Baily Foster as master, and the prisoners, a portion of the crew, were under contract at a certain rate of wages, from New Orleans to Boston.

This evidence being offered, and not the register of the vessel or the shipping articles, its admission was objected to by the counsel for the prisoners. But THE COURT overruled the objection.

The district attorney then, after showing those facts, proved, that on the day stated in the indictment, about twenty-eight miles from this port, the captain gave orders to have all hands come on deck and prepare the vessel for going into port. That the mate communicated these orders below, as well as to the portion of the crew then on deck; and they were promptly complied with except by the four prisoners. They constituted together one watch, that had recently been relieved. It appeared, that they refused to assist in clearing up and preparing the ship, as the captain and mate desired; objecting that the other watch had time enough to do all which was necessary before reaching Boston harbor, and that they were unwilling to do any thing which was directed except to aid about the anchor and chains. An altercation at once commenced on the subject between these men and the mate, which soon extended to other matters concerning the quality of the provisions which had been furnished to them on the voyage, and some difficulties with the second mate on the part of Peterson. The captain, being attracted by the loud conversation, came up to them, and asked what was the noise? and seeing that Peterson had an iron belaying pin in his hands, which he seemed to be swinging towards the mate, ordered him to lay it down. This Peterson did not do, and as the captain stepped forward to take it from him, Peterson struck at him with it twice, but the blows were avoided by the captain, who then run below for his pistols and sword. Some one cried out, "Draw knives," and one of the four did it, and all fell upon the two mates and the captain, as he returned with his weapons, and knocked the whole of them down, and disarmed him and broke one of his arms. After recovering their feet and going aft, they consulted together, and did not deem it safe to make any further efforts to enforce obedience to the captain's commands as to clearing and preparing the ship for coming into port. This was about eight o'clock, a. m., and at one o'clock in the day, when the men were called up again, all obeyed except Hanson, who was stated to be injured so as not to be able to work. Various threats and taunts, and many details of the rencounter and injuries were testified to, which need not be repeated.

On all the material facts there was little if any conflicting testimony, between the several witnesses on both sides. After the evidence and arguments to the jury were closed, the counsel for the prisoners requested the court to give the following instructions on the law of the case:

First count: (1) To sustain the first count in the indictment, the jury must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt, that the prisoners, or some one or more of them, usurped the command of the ship, and overthrew that of the master. (2) That they, or some one or more of them, took possession of the vessel against the will and in defiance of the authority of the master, or put another person in command and control of her navigation against his will. Second count: (1) To sustain the second count in the indictment, the jury must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt, that the prisoners, or some one or more of them, assembled with intent to overthrow the legitimate authority of the master, and to remove him from his command. (2) That they, or some one or more of them, assembled with intent to take possession of the vessel by assuming the government and navigation of her, or with intent to transfer their obedience from the master to some other person. General instruction: If the prisoners had reasonable cause to believe and did believe, the master intended to make an attack upon them or either of them, with any dangerous weapon or weapons, they had authority, in self-defence, to resist or disarm him.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, charged the jury, and, in relation to the law applicable to the subject, informed them that he did not feel justified in stating it to be as the counsel for the prisoners desired. He must decline giving it to them in charge, as requested, on any of the points, without important limitations and qualifications. However revolts may have been defined at common law, or under the act of congress of April 30, 1790, c. 9 [1 Stat. 112], they were now to be considered and punished only as provided by the act of the 3d of March, 1835, c. 40 (4 Stat. 775). That act, instead of punishing as a revolt only one kind of violence on shipboard, such as to usurp the command of the master; or another kind, such as to transfer his command to a different person, or another still, to deprive him of his command, without either usurping or transferring it, made each of them an offence; and also made it an offence to "resist or prevent him in the free and lawful exercise of his authority and command." Conceding that all the cases cited, as to decisions under other acts of congress and at common law, were correct, as the laws then existed for a guide, but on which he expressed no opinion (U. S. v. Sharp [Case No. 16,264]; U. S. v. Bladen [Id. 14,606]; U. S. v. Cassedy [Id. 14,745]; U. S. v. Smith [Id. 16,344]; U. S. v. Hemmer [Id. 15,345]; U. S. v. Savage [Id. 16,225]; U. S. v. Kelly, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 417), the law now in force made the mere resistance to the master's lawful authority punishable, and for that and that alone the prisoners were indicted, and were to be tried under the first count. To make them guilty of this offence, it was not necessary that they should either deprive the master of his command, or usurp it themselves, or transfer it to another; but it was enough, if he issued lawful orders which they disobeyed, and with violence resisted their enforcement.

So as to the second count, it was framed in order to reach another and milder offence, under the second section of this same act of congress, which consisted in behavior likely to excite to, or end in, revolt or mutiny, although no actual revolt should be believed by the jury to have occurred. Under the first section an actual revolt was liable to be punished with great severity, even to ten years hard labor and $2,000 fine, if of an aggravated and flagrant character. On the contrary, if of a mild character, the court was wisely vested with a discretion to inflict any small portion of the above fine and imprisonment, according to the nature and aggravation of the offence, and thus make it in a proper case, not so severe, as some bad attempts at mutiny under the second section, where the punishment may range as high as $1,000 fine and five years' imprisonment. The offence, under this last section, may be committed, likewise as under the first one, in various modes. One is, by endeavoring to make a revolt or mutiny on shipboard in any way; another is, by contriving with any person to do it; another, by soliciting or stirring up any of the crew to disobey or resist the lawful orders of the master, or to refuse or neglect their duty, or to make a riot on board, or unlawfully to confine the master; or, as in the second count in this indictment, "to assemble with others on board in a tumultuous and mutinous manner." You are instructed, that to convict of this last kind of outrage, it is not necessary to prove guilt of any of the other kinds described, either in the second or first section. But it is sufficient, in a tumultuous and mutinous manner, to collect together; that is, in a noisy and insubordinate state, endangering the police of the vessel, and likely to terminate in actual disobedience of orders, and actual resistance to the master's lawful authority.

In respect, also, to the general instruction, which the prisoners' counsel asks as to the right of the crew to disarm the captain, when about to attack any of them with a deadly weapon, it is clear that, if the master, without any disobedience of orders or resistance, is about to attack any of the crew, he might be disarmed, if done, repelling great violence, which is threatened and impending without any justifiable cause. But if the crew are disobedient, and resort to personal violence and seditiously resist the master in enforcing his lawful orders, he can then rightfully arm himself; and, if only intending to use his weapons, so far as is necessary to produce obedience and put down mutiny, he cannot be properly opposed or disarmed by his crew. The judge stated, that the safety of the lives of the crew as well as of the officers, and of the vast property afloat in our commercial marine, depended much upon the strict discipline and careful police enforced by commanders of vessels. And while the law exacted obedience to all lawful commands of the captain, as the wisest course to secure those important objects, judging from the experience of all ages, and justified also by his superior skill and intelligence, and the contract itself of the crew to obey him, it, on the other hand, carefully protected them from any abuse and oppression under such enlarged powers.

The very same acts of congress, which inflict heavy punishment on the crew for dangerous resistance to the master, inflict heavy penalties on him for unjustifiable blows, or unusual punishments, or insufficient or unwholesome food; and a seaman, when wronged abroad, can always rely with safety on ample redress at his return home, through the laws and the juries and judges of his country. It behooves him, then, with patience and order, as well as fidelity, to continue to discharge his own duties to the laws and flag of the Union, convinced as he should be unfalteringly, that none will be allowed to violate them with impunity. It is not sufficient to have no intention to assume the command of the vessel, or to destroy her, or carry her off like pirates, but there must be no insubordination, no disobedience, no violence, towards those who, by law as well as contract, are to rule and not be ruled on board the ship. However uneducated or inexperienced, seamen cannot but know, that they and the master on the deck of the vessel are not acting together in the same capacity, and like equals or citizens, adopting or opposing measures, by each one's taste, or by the popular vote, as at a town-meeting; but acting together for a time, one with large powers, for the benefit of all, and the others without those powers, for the same benefit of all, and by the previous agreement of all. And thus while this relation between them requires nothing from sailors but what they can perform—implicit obedience to lawful commands—it protects them from any illegal exactions, and punishes sternly all wanton abuse of their dependent condition.

It was objected, also, on the evidence, that the prisoners were born abroad, and have not been shown to be naturalized, and hence were not liable to be punished at all under the acts of congress, for mutiny or revolt. But the court give it to you in charge, that it is sufficient to render them liable, if the Charles Carroll was an American vessel, and they were on board engaged to serve as a part of her crew. This imposed a duty towards them, on the one hand, as in an American ship, whose deck for this purpose, while on the high seas, is as a part of our territory, and all within it—all under our flag—are entitled to protection, and are receiving the benefit of our laws in defence of their persons and property from outrage. On the other hand, it rendered them subject and responsible, while their service continued within our jurisdiction, to obedience to law and the lawful commands of the master. Indeed, they had virtually stipulated for this in their shipment, as well as in their voluntary selection of our government for their domicil. Beside this, a portion of the crews in American vessels are allowed by law to be foreigners; and, for aught which appears, these men, though born abroad, may have since become naturalized. But, without dwelling on these considerations, the vessel being in the possession and control of Americans, as owners, and having sailed from and to an American port, under an American captain, and under a contract for service made in this country, it is primâ facie, enough to render them liable under this act of congress, without the production in the first instance of any register of the vessel or the shipping articles. Abb. Shipp. 96; 3 Phil. Ev. 1151; Robertson v. French, 4 East, 130, 137. "There are many cases in which the possession of property and acts of ownership exercised over it, furnish presumptive evidence of a title to it; and some, also, in which the possession alone is sufficient to maintain an action, although the legal title may be outstanding in another." Abb. Shipp. 60; 5 Esp. 88; 2 Taunt. 302. And it has been decided in this country, that we may establish the national character of a ship by that proof, even in piracy. U. S. v. Furlong, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 184; [U. S. v. Amedy] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 392; 7 Johns. 308; 15 Johns. 298; 16 Mass. 336; U. S. v. Jones [Case No. 15,494]; 14 Johns. 201. Because certain documents are required to prove ownership for fiscal or international objects, but not for titles between individuals, or as to offenders. [U. S. v. The Pirates] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 199.

The jury returned a general verdict of guilty, against the prisoners.

Their counsel then moved in arrest of judgment, on the ground, that the two counts were for different offences, not alike in degree or punishment, and were, therefore, misjoined.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. I have taken some time to examine this motion in arrest of judgment, and shall be happy to give to the prisoners any benefit which can grow out of it; or if none, any mitigation in the punishment to be inflicted, which the circumstances in their case may show to be exculpatory. There certainly are some such circumstances, as the prisoners did not continue to persist in their disobedience, nor evince any disposition to alter the navigation of the vessel, or to destroy her, or assume permanently the command of her. But clearly for some time, they opposed the lawful authority of the master. They did this, also, in a tumultuous and mutinous manner; and they endangered the lives of the master and mates as well as their own, by their disobedience and violence, and prostrated all the salutary police and order of the vessel, for a time, as effectually as if they had meditated gross acts of piracy. They must, then, be made an example of, in order to deter others from like outrages, as well as to punish duly their own misconduct; and if it can be done legally under the present form of the indictment and the deliberate finding of their guilt by the jury, it must and should be. The rules, applicable to objections like this, have been much controverted; and though, in my view, there are still doubts as to some of them, they may be considered as settled to the extent I am about to explain.

1. Every indictment with only one count, and each count in itself ought, under the rules of good pleading, to describe but one distinct offence. 1 Chit. Pl. 201; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 252; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 215; 1 Moody & R. 71; 1 Starkie, Cr. Pl. 246. Most cases hold, that if it describes more, the prisoner, on motion, before trial, may require the prosecutor to try only one, in order to prevent confusion and distraction as to different offences and different kinds of challenges and evidence, that may be admissible at times in trials for different crimes. See 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 253, and notes; Rex v. Kingston, 8 East, 41, 46; Young v. Rex, 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 98, 103; Kane v. People, 8 Wend. 203; 2 Camp. 131; 3 Camp. 132; State v. Nelson, 8 N. H. 163; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 215; 2 East, P. C. 515. Some cases would seem to limit this privilege or indulgence to indictments for felonies and not misdemeanors. 8 Wend. 208;

Rosc. Cr. Ev. 215. But others seem to extend it to both. See 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 107, by Justice Grose. As illustrative of this rule, it may be seen that robbery and assault with an intent to rob, should not be united in one count, or in one indictment with a single count. Galloway's Case, 1 Moody, Crown Cas. 234. See other cases, 2 Moody & R. 71. And the court, in its discretion, will either make the attorney for the government select and try but one offence on such motion before trial, or on demurrer or motion quash the indictment, if the offences are of a different nature, and not requiring a like form of plea and judgment, and are both described in but one count. Rex v. Kingston, 8 East, 41, 46; People v. Wright, 9 Wend. 193; U. S. v. Sharp [Case No. 16,265]; 8 N. H. 163. But it has been held, that they will not require even that selection or quash the indictment, if the offences are as much alike in character and punishment, as "breaking and entering with intent to steal," joined in one count with "stealing." Com. v. Hope, 22 Pick. 1. See, also, Com. v. Tuck, 20 Pick. 356, and Com. v. Eaton, 15 Pick. 273. So if indicted in one count as receivers, and the other as principals. 1 Moody, Crown Cas. 234; Madden's Case, Id. 277. Or in one as principal in the first degree, and in the other in the second degree. Gray's Case, 7 Car. & P. 164; 1 Moody, Crown Cas. 351. So a receiver may be indicted as accessory in one count, and for a substantive felony in another. And though the judge might make the prosecutor elect, he will not, where it is clear there was but one offence, and the joinder cannot prejudice the prisoner. Rosc. Cr. Ev. 215; Jervis' Case, 6 Car. & P. 156; Rex v. Wheeler, 7 Car. & P. 170; Rex v. Austin, Id. 795. So in a prosecution for arson, it will not compel a selection if it was all one fire, and the houses of different persons were burned. Reg. v. Trueman, 8 Car. & P. 727. But where one count was for conspiracy and one for a libel, and no evidence against one defendant for the last, the court compelled a selection before a verdict. Reg. v. Murphy, 8 Car. & P. 297. It is for a reason somewhat similar to this, perhaps, and because the allegations for the higher offence include all which is necessary to constitute the smaller one of the same sort or family, that where the indictment is for murder, the prisoner may be convicted under it of manslaughter; or for assault with intent to kill, be convicted of an assault, and so onward through several classes and degrees of family crimes. Com. v. Briggs, 7 Pick. 177; Com. v. Cooper, 15 Mass. 187; State v. Shepard, 7 Conn. 54. But in Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. 496, 505, the court held, that this could not be done if one offence was only a misdemeanor, and the other a felony. For then a conviction would be no bar to another prosecution for the original offence.

2. So if there have been a trial and conviction of one or both of the offences, thus united in one count, or in one indictment with a single count, the court will not generally sustain a motion in arrest of judgment, unless the two offences belonged to a different class or family of crimes. People v. Rynders, 12 Wend. 425; 2 Camp. 132–134; Rex v. Kingston, 8 East, 41, 46; Rex v. Johnson, 3 Maule & S. 539, 542; State v. Nelson, 8 N. H. 163. Some cases hold, it will not be done, unless the two offences required different forms, not merely degrees of punishment. Com. v. Symonds, 2 Mass. 163; Rex v. Johnson, 3 Maule & S. 539, 542; U. S. v. Sharp [Case No. 16,264]. Other cases seem to hold, that the two offences should require different challenges and modes of trial. See those cited in Burk v. State, 2 Har. & J. 426. Without some of these material diversities between the two offences, there having been a conviction on a full hearing, it does not appear expedient or proper, after verdict, to disturb it; and the more especially does it not, when, on a previous motion to limit the trial to one offence, the request would, in the exercise of a sound discretion, have probably been granted; and the prisoner, without delay or expense, have been allowed virtually all he now asks. But none of these rules or illustrations reach the present case, as here the two offences are set out in separate counts.

3. In such cases it seems to be equally well settled, that if two offences are described separately in two counts in one indictment, and there is a general verdict of guilty, the judgment will not be arrested as for a misjoinder, unless the offences are of a nature and character radically different, as well as requiring different judgments, different in kind, and not merely punishments differing in amount or degree. U. S. v. Sharp [Case No. 16,265], where it is admitted; Case of The Pirates, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 184; U. S. v. Dickinson [Case No. 14,958]; Archb. Cr. Pl. 25, 26; Burk v. State, 2 Har. & J. 426; 8 N. H. 163. Where they are in different counts, they are, for most purposes, as if in different indictments. U. S. v. Sharp [supra]; 4 Hawks, 356; 2 Camp. 585. Some of the technical rules as to misjoinders in civil cases, do not apply here, as there; the forms of judgment in assumpsit and debt, &c., being different, prevent an union in the same writ of counts which sound differently as to the judgments required, though in one sense they may all belong to the large family of debts due, or contracts, though not to the smaller one of mere promises, or that of mere covenants. 2 Har. & J. 426. As illustrations of what is meant by this rule, it is laid down, that petit treason and murder may be united. 2 Hale, P. C. 173; 1 Hale, P. C. 378. Burglary and larceny. 2 East, P. C. 1023, 1028. Forgery of a writing and uttering it; or assault with an intent to kill, and a common assault. People v. Wright, 9 Wend. 193. The punishments in these cases are often much more widely different than in this now under consideration; as in some of them one offence is a felony, and the other a mere misdemeanor, and if punished somewhat alike in some of them formerly, when capital crimes were so numerous, they were not punished alike in all the cases. It will be seen, however, that they belong in each instance to one genus or class. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 255; 1 East, P. C. 408, 409. And in Rex v. Denon, 2 Leach, 608, the court censured the bringing of different indictments for different offences, if committed by the same person, and belonging to the same family of crimes. Some cases hold, however, that the court, before verdict, may exercise the same discretion as to selecting one of two distinct offences for trial, when set out in two counts, as when set out in one. Dunn's Case, 1 Moody, Crown Cas. 146. But this is a different question from that of objecting to the joinder, if in separate counts, by motion in arrest. Archb. Cr. Pl. 26. But in People v. Wright, 9 Wend. 193, there is at first an appearance of dissent from this result. It was there held, according to the marginal note, that if two offences are described in different counts, though of the same family, and they require different punishments, the court will arrest judgment. One punishment there was not less than ten years in the state prison. The other, not over five years. But in that case, on examining the details, it seems doubtful if any offence under the first count had been committed; and the court said they could not tell what punishment to inflict, unless they arbitrarily selected the second one, where the jury may have gone chiefly or entirely on the first. The indictment was said, by the court, to be drawn under one section of a law, when the offence was committed against or under another section. Hence the ground of the decision has been misapprehended, and subsequently in People v. Rynders, 12 Wend. 426, the court unhesitatingly held, a joinder of offences of the same family in different counts to be good, though the punishment of them was different; e. g., forging an instrument, and uttering it, knowing it to be false. They would not, even before trial, refuse to let the attorney proceed on both, if of like character, though liable to different punishments. U. S. v. Dickinson [Case No. 14,958]. And in Kane v. People, 8 Wend. 203, 208, it was held, that where two counts in the same indictment are for different offences, though felonies, it is no ground of error, or arrest, or demurrer. 2 Peake, N. P. 228, note. But if in such case, it is there said, the two offences are embraced in one count, the court may quash, or compel the attorney, before trial, to elect one, though they will not do even that in mere misdemeanors. Two counts often describe the same offence differently, and the jury return a general verdict, though only one offence is proved; and "no one (says the court,) ever supposed that formed a ground for arresting the judgment." And in such case, if one count is bad, the court say it will be presumed, that judgment will be rendered or has been, on the good one, rather than one which is defective. and the judgment will be good. 1 Johns. 320; U. S. v. Pirates, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 184. Lord Mansfield regretted it was not so in civil cases. Doug. 730.

4. Again, it has been deliberately adjudged, that if one of the counts be double, or it is doubtful whether it be properly joined with the other, as being for an offence somewhat different in character and punishment, the judgment, after a general verdict, will not be arrested, but rendered entirely on the other count. Rex v. Fuller, 1 Bos. & P. 180, 2 Leach, 926. So it has been held, that the attorney-general, after verdict, as well as before, may enter a nol. pros. as to one count, without the assent of a prisoner, or as to a part of a count, as for example, in burglary, to the breaking and entering, but leaving the larceny. Com. v. Tuck, 20 Pick. 356; Rex v. Butterworth, Russ. & R. 520; U. S. v. Keen [Case No. 15,510]. A nol. pros. may be entered after or before verdict, against some of the parties. Minor v. Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 74. Again, if advantage be not taken of a misjoinder of offences distinct in their character, by motion to try but one, or by demurrer, it is very doubtful if it can be objected to in arrest. Archb. Cr. Pl. 26. The twelfth rule in common law suits in this circuit, provides, that where a general verdict is rendered on several counts, the plaintiff may have leave to enter it on any one count, and strike out others. This is tantamount to what is requested here. These last views and cases appear fully sustained in rendering judgment here on the first count, after a general verdict, even if it were more doubtful than it is, as to the propriety of joining these two counts in one indictment, or if misjoined, of the propriety of taking advantage of it in arrest of judgment, rather than by motion before trial. The two offences, described in these counts, are certainly of the same family and nature, viz., revolts, and excitements to revolts. They are set out separately and distinctly. They are both defined in one statute, and both made punishable by fine or imprisonment, though there is this difference, that both of these last may be imposed in one case, and both must be in the other. The amount of both, too, may go higher in one than the other, but they do not differ in kind, except that one is "imprisonment," and the other "imprisonment to hard labor." These vary less than the punishments in assault with intent to kill, and a mere assault at common law, or burglary and larceny, which, it has been held, can be united. And "in a variety of cases, though the punishment be different, yet the counts can be joined," says Lord Ellenborough, in

3 Maule & S. 549, 559. See also, 2 Russ. Crimes, 1233, 1234. I should hesitate, however, if the punishments were so different as to be inconsistent or impracticable with each other, or if one of the counts was for a separate transaction, occurring at a different time, or belonged to a family of crimes wholly unlike, or required a trial by different kinds of evidence, or tribunals, or under different rights as to challenges. But none of those existing here, I do not feel justified in granting the motion.

Let judgment, then, be entered against the prisoners, on the verdict, upon the first count, and sentence of $50 fine against Hanson, Morgan and Bennett, and six months' confinement to hard labor; and $100 fine and one year's confinement to hard labor against Peterson.

UNITED STATES (PETERSON v.). See Case No. 11,036.

Case No. 16,038.

UNITED STATES v. PETTIS.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 186.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1831.

CRIMINAL LAW—ARRAIGNMENT.

In cases of felony, the prisoner is to be arraigned in the criminal bar, or dock.

Indictment [against F. H. Pettis] for perjury.

Baldwin and Giberson, for defendant, requested that the prisoner might plead without being arraigned. But THE COURT ordered him to be arraigned, and he pleaded without going into the criminal bar, or dock.

THE COURT, however (nem. con.), said, that in the case of U. S. v. Pittman [Case No. 16,053], in Alexandria, at April term, 1828, they had required that he should be arraigned at the bar, in the criminal dock, as in other cases of felony, and that in future they should adhere to the established rule and practice.

Case No. 16,039.

UNITED STATES v. PHELPS et al.

[17 Blatchf. 312.] [2]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 24, 1879.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—DAMAGE ALLOWANCE ON TRIAL—CONCLUSIVENESS OF LIQUIDATION.

1. One entry was made at the custom house of fruit imported in a vessel, which fruit belonged to several owners, and was embraced in several invoices. The duties were estimated at $4,648 and deposited and the goods were delivered. Afterwards a damage allowance for loss by decay on the voyage was applied for. The report showed that the damage sustained by various lots of the fruit was more than 25 per cent. of the quantities in such lots, but that the damage on all the fruit imported by the vessel was less than 25 per cent. of the whole quantity. The collector, by allowing the damage on the lots which were damaged more than 25 per cent., liquidated the duties at $270.40 less than the amount deposited, and refunded the $270.40. Afterwards the collector reliquidated the duties at $4,648, refusing to allow any damage, because it did not exceed 25 per cent. of all the fruit covered by the entry. The United States having sued, in the district court, to recover the $270.40, that court directed a verdict for the defendants. On a writ of error: Held that, under section 2931 of the Revised Statutes, the first liquidation was not conclusive as to the United States.

[Cited in U. S. v. Comarota, 2 Fed. 146; U. S. v. Campbell, 10 Fed. 819; U. S. v. Clark, 11 Fed. 79; U. S. v. Earnshaw, 12 Fed. 286; U. S. v. Schlesinger, 14 Fed. 685; U. S. v. Leng, 18 Fed. 17; s. c., 7 Sup. Ct. 445, 120 U. S. 113.]

2. The United States are entitled to recover according to the last liquidation.

[Cited in U. S. v. Campbell, 10 Fed. 818; U. S. v. Leng, 18 Fed. 21.]

3. The defendant could not be allowed to give evidence to show that the decision of the collector in the last liquidation was erroneous.

[Cited in Chase v. U. S., 9 Fed. 883.]

4. The district court ought to have directed a verdict for the United States.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

At law.

J. Dana Jones, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

A. J. Heath, for defendants in error.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This suit was brought in the district court by the United States against the defendants in error [Frank Phelps and Howard Phelps], to recover $270.40 in gold coin, with interest from March 6th, 1878. The complaint alleges that the defendants, on the 6th of March, 1878, imported into the port of New York certain fruit, subject to duties, and entered it at said port; that, thereupon, the collector of said port decided that the amount of duties to be paid thereon was $4,648 in gold coin; and that the defendants have paid thereon $4,377.60 and no more. The answer sets up, that the defendants paid, on entry, $4,648 in gold coin, as duties; that the defendants made a claim for an allowance of duties for damage to the fruit on the voyage; that the fruit was appraised and damage allowed; that the collector adjusted the duties and decided that the amount of duties was $4,377.60 in gold coin, and no more, and refunded to the defendants $270.40; and that the $4,377.60 was paid to and received by the United States in full settlement and payment of all the duties on said fruit.

The bill of exceptions sets forth, that, on the trial, the following facts were proved: On the 6th of March, 1878, the defendants imported into the port of New York, from foreign ports, by the steamship Olaf, 4,008 boxes and 2,227 cases of oranges. The oranges were shipped from Messina, Palermo and Valencia, and consigned by the several owners in those respective ports to the defendants at New York City, a separate invoice having been made for each separate lot or shipment by the several owners thereof, containing the date of shipment, the place from which shipped, the description and value of the goods so shipped, and the name of the owner or owners. There were in all eleven invoices of this character, upon which only one entry was made at the custom house. On the same day the duties upon the goods were estimated by the collector to be $4,648, which sum was then and there deposited with the collector, by the defendants, to secure the payment of the duties when finally ascertained, and the goods were delivered to the defendants, the consignees named in the entry. On the 12th of March, 1878, the defendants made an application for damage allowance for loss by decay of said fruit during the voyage. On the 26th of March, 1878, the report of the appraisers as to the amount of damage sustained by the said fruit on the voyage was made. Such report showed that the damage sustained by the various lots of the fruit was more than 25 per centum of the quantities contained in said several lots, but that the damage on all of the fruit imported by the Olaf was less than 25 per centum of the whole quantity imported. On this report, the collector, on the first of April, 1878, by allowing the damage on the various lots which had sustained more than 25 per centum of damage, liquidated the duties on the said goods, and fixed the same at the sum of $4,394. This amount of money was applied by the collector to the payment of the duties, and the sum of $254 (being the difference between $4,394 and $4,648) was refunded by him to the defendants on the 29th of April, 1878. On the 10th of May, 1878, the defendants called the attention of the collector to an error in this liquidation, which was corrected and the duties were reliquidated at the sum of $4,377.60 and the further sum of $16.40 was refunded to the defendants. On the 6th of July, 1878, the defendants filed with the collector a protest, addressed to him, in which they said: "We do hereby protest against the present system of liquidating entries for damage on boxes and cases of green fruit, and particularly in the case of our entry per steamship Olaf, made March 6th, 1878, and liquidated about April 25th, and reliquidated on June 26th, both times incorrectly, so far as the method of adding boxes and cases together indiscriminately, as by so doing we have, in the last instance particularly, been credited with $16.40 instead of $61.60, as would appear if the cases were either considered separately or figured upon at their relative value. We, therefore, look to you to have the entry liquidated in such a way that we can have a correct return and have the proper amount due us returned." Thereafter, on July 19th, 1878, an order was made by the collector that the entry should be amended, and the proper amount of duty fixed. This amendment was thereupon made, and, on the 20th of July, 1878, the duties were fixed by the collector at the sum of $4,648, the amount originally deposited with the collector. On this liquidation the collector refused to allow any damage, because the amount of damage did not exceed 25 per centum of the whole quantity of fruit imported and covered by the entry. There was only one appraisal of the goods, and the different ascertainments or liquidations were all based upon the appraisers' report of the damage sustained by the fruit on the voyage. The plaintiffs sued for $270.40 and $11.48 interest.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

On the foregoing facts, the counsel for the defendants asked the court to direct a verdict for the defendants. The counsel for the plaintiffs asked the court to direct a verdict for the plaintiffs, for $281.88, on the grounds, (1.) That the last liquidation by the collector was final and conclusive in this action brought by the United States for duties; (2.) That, if such liquidation was not final and conclusive, the $270.40 was due from the defendants as duties on the goods imported. The court denied the motion of the plaintiffs, and directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants. [Case unreported.] To such refusal and direction the counsel for the plaintiffs duly excepted. The jury thereupon, under the direction of the court, rendered a verdict in favor of the defendants. On this verdict a judgment was entered dismissing the complaint on the merits of the action, as against the plaintiffs.

It is contended, for the United States, that the court should have directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed, because the $270.40 was proved to be a part of the ascertained or liquidated duties on the goods imported by the defendants; that the fact that the duties had been twice previously liquidated did not deprive the collector of power to make the last liquidation; and that it was within his authority, on the same facts, to change his interpretation of the law, and correct the mistake he had made.

It is well settled, that the duties due upon all goods imported constitute a personal debt due to the United States from the importer; that the consignee is, for this purpose, treated as the owner and importer; that such debt is independent of any lien on the goods and of any bond given for the duties; and that the right of the government to the duties accrues when the goods have arrived at the proper port of entry. Meredith v. U. S., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 486. By section 2931 of the Revised Statutes the decision of the collector, in liquidating duties, as to the amount of duties on imported goods, is made final and conclusive against all persons interested in such goods, unless notice in writing of dissatisfaction with such decision is given to the collector, by the importer, within 10 days after the liquidation, and unless within 30 days after the liquidation there is an appeal by the importer from the liquidation to the secretary of the treasury. Such liquidation is not made final and conclusive as against the United States. There is nothing in the section which forbids a reliquidation or a new decision by the collector, even after the payment of all the duties fixed by a prior liquidation, or even after the refunding of money deposited beyond the amount of duties so fixed; or which forbids a new decision by the collector as to the law on the same facts, or a new decision as to facts, based on additional or new or different facts. This view is confirmed by the enactment of section 21 of the act of June 22d, 1874 (18 Stat. 190), which is as follows: "Whenever any goods, wares and merchandise shall have been entered and passed free of duty, and whenever duties upon any imported goods, wares and merchandise shall have been liquidated and paid, and such goods, wares and merchandise shall have been delivered to the owner, importer, agent or consignee, such entry and passage free of duty and such settlement of duties shall, after the expiration of one year from the time of entry, in the absence of fraud and in the absence of protest by the owner, importer, agent or consignee, be final and conclusive upon all parties." This provision was in force when the transactions in this case took place. It applies to the United States. The expression "all parties," includes the United States. By section 2931 of the Revised Statutes, there was no limitation imposed on the power of the collector to reliquidate, when such reliquidation was in the interest of the government. But, by section 21 of the act of 1874, a limitation is imposed on such power, so that, after the entry of goods, and after the liquidation and payment of duties on them, and after the delivery of the goods to the importer, such settlement of duties, if there be no fraud and no protest by the importer, is, after one year from the entry, final and conclusive even as respects the government. In the present case, the suit was brought before the one year expired. The collector, therefore, had power to make the reliquidation of July 20th, 1878; and there is nothing in the provisions of the act of March 3d, 1875 (18 Stat. 469), which affects such power. The complaint counts on such reliquidation, as made on the importation and entry of goods subject to duty.

The reliquidation at $4,648 being lawful, such reliquidation stands for the purposes of this suit as if it was the only liquidation. On a liquidation, the United States is entitled to recover, in a suit against the importer or consignee, under section 2,931 of the Revised Statutes, formerly section 14 of the act of June 30th, 1864 (13 Stat. 214), the amount liquidated, as duties, and evidence in such suit, on the part of the defendant, to show that the decision of the collector was wrong, cannot be received. The only remedy of the importer is in a suit to recover back the duties, after paying them, in a case where such a suit is allowed by the statute. This was the ruling in U. S. v. Cousinery [Case No. 14,878], in the district court for this district, following the decision of the supreme court in Westray v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 322. Such ruling was approved by Chief Justice Waite, in Watt v. U. S. [Case No. 17,292], and must be held to be the law, until it is reversed.

For these reasons, it was error in the court below to refuse to direct a verdict for the plaintiffs, and error to direct a verdict for the defendants. The first ground urged by the counsel for the plaintiffs, as a ground for directing a verdict for the plaintiffs, was a sound one, namely, that the last liquidation by the collector was final and conclusive against the defendants in this suit; and it is unnecessary to consider the question as to whether the collector was wrong in refusing to allow any damage, on the last liquidation.

The judgment is reversed, with costs to abide the event, and a direction to the court below to enter an order granting a new trial.

Case No. 16,040.

UNITED STATES v. PHELPS et al.

[20 Blatchf. 129.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 18, 1879.[2]

CUSTOMS DUTIES—CONCLUSIVENESS OF APPRAISEMENT—ALLOWANCE FOR DAMAGE.

Under sections 2927 and 2928 of the Revised Statutes, there can be an appraisement for an abatement of duties, on account of damage to goods sustained during the voyage of importation, after the goods have been entered at the custom house and the estimated amount of duties thereon have been paid.

[In error to the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

[This was an action brought in the district court against Frank Phelps and Howard Phelps, to recover certain duties alleged to have been illegally refunded to the defendant by the collector of the port of New York. The judgment was for the defendants. Case unreported.]

C. P. L. Butler, Jr., Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Charles M. Da Costa, for defendants in error.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Justice. This is a writ of error to the district court. The following facts appear by the bill of exceptions. The defendants in error (who were the defendants below and will be called the defendants), on the 7th of August, 1876, imported into the port of New York from a foreign port, 3,825 boxes of lemons.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Justice, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 107 U. S. 320, 2 Sup. Ct. 389.]

The value of said lemons in the foreign market, when and where they were purchased, was 74,521.09 francs, equal to $14,383. The duties thereupon, at the rate of 20 per centum ad valorem, amounted to $2,876.60, on which sum the plaintiff gave a credit of $2,013.60, the amount admitted by the complaint to have been paid, claiming to recover the balance, $863, as duties. The defendants, in like manner, imported, on the 15th of August, 1876, 2,930 boxes of lemons, of the foreign value, when shipped, of 49,861.89 francs, equal to $9,623. The duties thereon, at the rate of 20 per centum, ad valorem, were $1,924.60, on which sum the plaintiffs gave a credit of $1,636, the amount admitted by the complaint to have been paid, claiming to recover the balance, $288.60, as duties. After the plaintiffs had proved the foregoing facts, the defendants offered to prove that they made entry at the custom house in New York of the first above mentioned importation of lemons at the full invoice price on the 7th of August, 1876, and then paid to the plaintiffs $2,876.60, as the estimated amount of duty on said importation, if in sound condition, and afterwards, and on the 14th of August, 1876, applied for an allowance for damage to the same on the voyage of importation; that, thereafter, an examination and appraisement of the damage were made, and thereupon an allowance was made for said damage; that the amount of said damage allowance was $4,315; that the duties thereon, at 20 per cent., amounted to $863; that, in accordance therewith, the said entry was liquidated on the 3d of October, 1876; and that, on the 14th of October, 1876, the plaintiffs refunded and paid to the defendants the sum of $863. To this evidence the counsel for the plaintiffs objected, on the ground that the damage allowance should have been applied for, and the damage ascertained, before the entry of the goods; that, as the application was not made, nor the amount of damage ascertained, until after the entry, the proceedings therefor were irregular, and without warrant of law; and that the defendants could acquire no benefit or advantage from any allowance made in pursuance thereof. The court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence, and to such ruling and admission, the plaintiffs' counsel excepted.

As to the importation of August 15, 1876, the defendants offered to prove that an entry was made of the goods at their full invoice price on that day, and the sum of $1,924.60 was paid to the plaintiffs as the estimated amount of duty on said importation, if in sound condition; that an application for damage allowance was made August 22, 1876; that an examination and appraisement were thereupon made, and an allowance for damage was thereupon made, to the amount of $1,443, on which the duties amounted to $288.60; that the entry was liquidated on the 29th of September, 1876; and that, on the 11th of October, 1876, the plaintiffs refunded and paid to the defendants the said sum of $288.60. To this evidence the counsel for the plaintiffs objected on the same ground as before. The court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence, and to such ruling and admission the plaintiffs' counsel excepted.

The defendants then rested. The counsel for the plaintiffs thereupon requested the court to charge the jury, that, as the goods had been entered at the full invoice prices in the first instance, and the application for allowance, the examination and the appraisement were not made, nor the damage ascertained, nor the damage allowance made, until after the entries of the goods, the damage allowance was unwarranted by law, and the jury could not give the defendants any abatement of duties on account of such damage allowance. The court refused so to charge, and the counsel for the plaintiffs excepted to such refusal. The jury rendered a verdict for the defendants.

It is presented, as a question for decision, whether there can be an appraisement for an abatement of duties, on account of damage to goods sustained during the voyage of importation, after the goods have been entered at the custom house and the estimated amount of duties thereon has been paid.

Section 2927 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows: "In respect to articles that have been damaged during the voyage, whether subject to a duty ad valorem, or chargeable with a specific duty, either by number, weight or measure, the appraisers shall ascertain and certify to what rate or percentage the merchandise is damaged, and the rate of percentage of damage so ascertained and certified shall be deducted from the original amount subject to a duty ad valorem, or from the actual or original number, weight or measure on which specific duties would have been computed. No allowance, however, for the damage on any merchandise that has been entered, and on which the duties have been paid, or secured to be paid, and for which a permit has been granted to the owner or consignee thereof, and which may, on examining the same, prove to be damaged, shall be made, unless proof to ascertain said damage shall be lodged in the custom house of the port where such merchandise has been landed, within ten days after the landing of such merchandise." This is a re-enactment of like provisions in section 52 of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 666).

Section 2928 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows: "Before any merchandise which shall be taken from any wreck shall be admitted to an entry, the same shall be appraised; and the same proceedings shall be ordered and executed in all cases where a reduction of duties shall be claimed on account of damage which any merchandise shall have sustained in the course of the voyage; and in all cases where the owner, importer, consignee or agent shall be dissatisfied with such appraisement, he shall be entitled to the privileges of appeal, as provided for in this title." This section is taken from section 21 of the act of March 1, 1823 (3 Stat. 736), which section 21 was in these words: "Before any goods, wares, or merchandise which may be taken from any wreck shall be admitted to an entry, the same shall be appraised in the manner prescribed in the sixteenth section of this act, and the same proceedings shall be ordered and executed in all cases where a reduction of duties shall be claimed on account of damage which any goods, wares, or merchandise shall have sustained in the course of the voyage; and in all cases where the owner, importer, consignee or agent shall be dissatisfied with such appraisement, he shall be entitled to the privileges provided in the eighteenth section of this act." The words "in the manner prescribed in the sixteenth section of this act," found in said section 21 are not reproduced in section 2928 of the Revised Statutes. The manner prescribed in the sixteenth section of the act of March 1, 1823 (3 Stat. 735), is by appraisers to be appointed in a manner designated in that section. By the fifty-second section of the act of 1799, it was provided that, in the case of goods which had received damage during the voyage, the appraisement to ascertain such damage should be made by two merchant appraisers, one to be appointed by the collector, and the other by the importer. By the fifteenth section of the act of April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 437), it was provided as follows: "Before any goods, wares or merchandise which may be taken from any wreck shall be admitted to entry, the same shall be appraised in the manner prescribed by the ninth section of this act; and the same proceedings shall also be had where a reduction of duties shall be claimed on account of damage which any goods, wares or merchandise imported into the United States shall have sustained in the course of the voyage." The ninth section of that act provided for the appointment by the president and senate, in each one of six designated ports, of two appraisers, who, with a merchant appraiser, to be chosen by the importer, were to make appraisements in such six ports, and in other ports appraisements were to be made by two merchant appraisers to be selected by the collector, and one merchant appraiser to be chosen by the importer. This act of 1818 was to continue in force for two years. By the act of April 18, 1820, it was continued in force till March 4, 1823 (3 Stat. 563). Then came the act of March 1, 1823, before referred to. The sixteenth section of that act provides for the appointment, by the president and senate, in each one of seven designated ports, of two appraisers, who were to make appraisements in such seven ports, and in other ports appraisements were to be made by two merchant appraisers to be appointed by the collector.

A change was made by the act of 1818, and continued by the acts of 1820 and 1823, in the mode of appointing appraisers who were to appraise in the case of damaged goods. By the act of 1799, there were to be two appraisers, one appointed by the collector and the other by the importer. By the act of 1818 there were to be in certain ports two standing appraisers appointed by the United States, and one appraiser selected in each case by the importer, and in other ports two appraisers selected in each case by the collector, and one appraiser selected in each case by the importer. This was continued by the act of 1820. By the act of 1823 there were to be in certain ports two standing appraisers appointed by the United States, and in other ports two appraisers appointed in each case by the collector. The change made by the act of 1818 from the act of 1799, in the mode of selecting the appraisers, was a marked and a material one, as it gave to the United States the selection of two appraisers, and to the importer the selection of one, instead of giving to the United States the selection of one, and to the importer the selection of one. Hence, when the fifteenth section of the act of 1818 said that "the same proceedings shall also be had," on a claim to a reduction of duties on account of damage, the reference would seem to have been to an appraisement "in the manner prescribed" by the ninth section of that act, without any prescription that it should be either before or after the entry of the goods. The appraisement is a proceeding. By the fifty-second section of the act of 1799, appraisement to ascertain damage was to be made by appraisers appointed in a manner prescribed by that section. By the fifteenth and ninth sections of the act of 1818, such appraisement was to be made by appraisers appointed in a different manner. The requirement of the fifteenth section of the act of 1818 that goods taken from a wreck shall not be entered until they have been appraised, is clear and explicit. Prior to that act goods taken from a wreck could have been entered as other imported goods, before appraisement, and were within the provisions of law as to goods damaged during the voyage. Reasons can very well be suggested why a change was made in regard to wrecked goods, coming into the country in an irregular way, and not by the discharge of them at a landing wharf, directly out of the vessel which brought them, such change requiring them to be appraised before entry. But no satisfactory reasons can be assigned for a like change in regard to damaged goods landed in the regular way, and it ought to appear very clearly from the language of the statute, that a change was intended in regard to such goods. The system prescribed by the act of 1799, and continued in force, in regard to the landing of goods regularly imported, was that they should first be entered and the duties on them be paid or secured, and then a permit be obtained for their landing, and severe penalties were imposed for landing goods without a permit. Act March 2, 1799, §§ 49, 50 (1 Stat. 664, 665). It is impossible for an importer to ascertain, until he sees his goods, after they have been landed in pursuance of a permit following an entry, whether they have been damaged or not. Hence, the fifty-second section of the act of 1799 clearly provides for the entry, the payment of duties, the permit, and the landing, in the above order, and then for the allowance for damage. It ought to require explicit language to make a change in this order of proceeding. It was very proper to require that proof of damage should be lodged within ten days after the landing. But, to require appraisement before entry or landing, in the case of goods regularly imported, would be to prescribe a system impossible of practical execution. These views apply to the provisions of the twenty-first section of the act of 1823. The natural meaning of the words of that section, which provide that "the same proceedings shall be ordered and executed in all cases where a reduction of duties shall be claimed on account of damage which any goods, wares or merchandise shall have sustained in the course of the voyage," is the same as the natural meaning of the words in the fifteenth section of the act of 1818, which provide that "the same proceedings shall also be had where a reduction of duties shall be claimed on account of damage which any goods, wares or merchandise imported into the United States shall have sustained in the course of the voyage," and that is, that the appraisement proceedings shall be conducted in the manner before prescribed in the acts respectively, and not that goods regularly imported and bonded, and not "taken from any wreck," shall be appraised before entry.

In the case of Shelton v. Austin [Case No. 12,752], affirmed by the supreme court, as Shelton v. The Collector, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 113, the fifty-second section of the act of 1799 had not been complied with, in that proof to ascertain the damage had not been lodged within the ten days prescribed by that section. The goods were not taken from a wreck, but they were entered before they were appraised. Mr. Justice Clifford, in the circuit court, held that they must pay duties on their sound value, as entered, because, under the twenty-first section of the act of 1823, they were required to be appraised before entry, in order to warrant an allowance for damage on the voyage. In the supreme court no counsel appeared for the plaintiff in error. The court held that there could be no allowance for damage under the act of 1799, because proof had not been lodged within the ten days after landing; and that there could be none under the act of 1823, because there had been an entry before appraisal. The first ground was an adequate one for the affirmance of the judgment, and the United States alone were represented on the argument. In the present case the record shows that the requirement as to the ten days was complied with.

By section 5595 of the Revised Statutes, those statutes are declared to embrace the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, in force on the 1st of December, 1873. It follows that the provisions of the Revised Statutes are to be construed as the enactments in force on the 1st of December, 1873, would have been construed. Sections 2927 and 2928 of the Revised Statutes are both of them enacted as having been in force on the 1st of December, 1873. The regulations of the treasury department in regard to claims for damage allowance, in force and acted on since the Revised Statutes were enacted, clearly recognize the practice and the propriety of entering goods, and then claiming a damage allowance on them, and proceeding to an appraisement. Such was the practice in the present case, acted on by the collector, even to the paying back of the deposited duties on the amount of the damage.

It is contended for the United States, that, under the twenty-first section of the act of 1823, goods damaged in the course of the voyage, though not taken from a wreck, must be appraised before entry, in order to warrant an allowance for damage; and that as, in this case, the entry was made before appraisal, no allowance for damage was lawful. The district court took a different view. The practice of the treasury department and of the collector has evidently been contrary to what is now contended for by the United States, notwithstanding the decision of the supreme court in Shelton v. The Collector [supra]. This practice, it is fair to assume, has obtained because the treasury department did not regard that decision as disposing of the question finally. It is important that the question should be speedily decided by the supreme court, both in the interest of the government and of importers; and, in view of all the facts of the case, I think the most proper disposition of it is, to affirm the judgment of the court below, and thus enable the United States to obtain speedily a reconsideration of the question by the supreme court, instead of sending the case back for a new trial in the district court, with a long delay before it can reach the supreme court. The judgment is affirmed.

[Subsequently a writ of error was sued out from the supreme court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed. 107 U. S. 320, 2 Sup. Ct. 389.]

Case No. 16,041.

UNITED STATES v. PHELPS.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 89;[1] 4 Day, 469.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. 1810.

INDICTMENT—VARIANCE.

Where in a prosecution for resisting an officer of the customs the indictment improperly describes the office, the variance is fatal.

This was an indictment [against Stiles Phelps] for assaulting Edward Cheesebor-

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

ough, an inspector of the customs for the district of New London, duly appointed and sworn, knowing him to be such inspector, while executing the duties of his said office, under the direction of Jonathan Palmer, surveyor of the customs for said New London district, and for forcibly resisting him, the said Edward Cheeseborough, in the execution of his duty in said office.

The district attorney, in support of the indictment, offered in evidence a warrant under the hand of Jonathan Palmer, surveyor of the port of Stonnington, for the appointment of Cheeseborough as inspector of the customs.

Mr. Daggett (with whom were Goddard & Billings), for the prisoner, objected to this evidence, on the ground that the law requires the inspector to be appointed by the collector, and recognizes no other mode of appointment.

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and EDWARDS, District Judge.

THE COURT said the indictment must be strictly proved.

The attorney then observed that the surveyor had a right by law to appoint assistants in the execution of his office, and that it was penal to resist such an officer thus appointed; and contended that Cheeseborough was an officer of this description, and that the warrant of the surveyor was admissible to prove his appointment in this point of view.

THE COURT acquiesced in the position that the surveyor might nominate assistants, and that it would be penal to resist them in the execution of their office; but if a man is prosecuted for such an offense, the indictment must describe the assistants in their real character and capacity. Here Phelps is prosecuted for resisting an inspector of customs, an officer known and described in the law. It does not appear that Cheeseborough was appointed to that office; and although he might have held another office, and how penal soever it might be to resist him, it is clear that this indictment cannot be supported. If Phelps be guilty of any crime it is that of resisting an assistant of a surveyor; but he is charged with a different crime.

No other evidence being offered,

THE COURT directed the jury to find the prisoner not guilty, which they did without retiring from their seats.

UNITED STATES (PHILLIPS v.). See Case No. 11,107.

Case No. 16,041a.

UNITED STATES v. The PICAYUNE.

[New York Times, Nov. 7, 1863.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1863.

WAR—CONFISCATION ACTS—ENFORCEMENT OF FORFEITURE—PLEADINGS AND PROCEDURE.

[In a proceeding under the confiscation act of August 6, 1861 (12 Stat. 319), to forfeit an interest in a vessel, the pleadings and proceedings are subject to like rules as in ordinary cases of prize of war, and therefore the mere charge of the offence is all the specification that need be made in a libel alleging that the property was seized as prize.]

This was an information filed to forfeit two-sixteenths of the vesssel, as being owned by inhabitants of the state of Louisiana, under the act of congress of July 13, 1881 [12 Stat. 255], and the proclamations of the president dated April 15 [12 Stat. 125S] and August 16, 1861 [12 Stat. 1262]. The vessel was seized under the process. After the return of the process by consent of the district attorney the two-sixteenths was bonded in the sum of $3,125, its appraised value, by John H. Brooks, the master, with the condition that "claimants have the right to surrender the two-sixteenths in the same condition as when bonded, at any time previous to the forfeiture of the said bond for value."

The master afterwards filed an answer in the cause stating: 1st. That he had claimed and bonded the vessel and she had been delivered to him; 2d. That he denies all the statements in the libel; 3d. That he excepts to the libel that no cause of action is set forth or embraced within it; and 4th. That the libel does not disclose facts sufficient to justify a decree of condemnation. The case was submitted to the court on the pleadings.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for claimant.

HELD BY THE COURT (BETTS, District Judge). That these allegations are inadequate and faulty as matters of pleading, because Brooks does not connect himself in interest with the cause. That in point of form and regularity the pleading establishes no fact which can in law inure to the defence of the vessel. That if the paper can be accepted as a general issue to the information, it admits all the averments set forth in that pleading and can rely only on their legal inefficiency. That the pleadings are doubtless to be regarded within the spirit of the act of August 6, 1861, and subject to like rules of procedure as in ordinary cases of prize of war. In these cases, the mere charge of the offence is all the specification that need be made in a libel alleging that the property was seized as prize. That the allegations in this libel clearly place this vessel within a range of facts which make her confiscable by the law. It states: 1. That two-sixteenths of the vessel were the property of Albert Connor and Addison Cammack of New Orleans, La., and that it was seized within the navigable waters of this state. 2. That a state of insurrection and condition of hostility existed and still remains between the inhabitants of the state of Louisiana and the United States; and 3. That such steps had been taken by the president under existing laws, as to give full action and effect to the condemnatory provisions of the act of July 13, 1861, and to bring the vessel within that act. That these allegations mark out with adequate distinctness the corpus delicti imputed to the property, and nothing is discerned by the court disabling it from being executed in the condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel. Decree of condemnation and forfeiture accordingly.

Case No. 16,042.

UNITED STATES v. PICKERING.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 117.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1816.

SLAVERY.

An indictment will not lie against a person for dealing with a slave without his master's consent, the statute having provided a different mode of prosecution.

This was an indictment for dealing with a slave without the consent of his master, contrary to the act of Virginia of 17th December, 1792, (page 188, § 16).

E. J. Lee, for the United States.
Mr. Taylor, for defendant.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided, upon the authority of U. S. v. Simms, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 252, that an indictment will not lie; the statute having directed the prosecution to be by action on the case by the master for fourfold the value of the article bought or sold, and a penalty of $20 to be recovered by any person who will sue for the same, &c.

Case No. 16,043.

UNITED STATES v. PICKETT et al.

[1 Bond, 123.] [2]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1857.

RECOGNIZANCE—LIABILITY OF SIGNERS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

1. Where a defendant and another person signed a recognizance before a justice of the peace, conditioned for the appearance of the defendant, before the district court of the United States, to answer to a charge of stealing from the mail; and three days subsequently to said signing, a third person, whose name did not appear in the body of the recognizance, also signed the same: Held, that a joint action could not be sustained against all of said persons upon such recognizance, and that it did not, upon its face, import a joint liability on the part of all the signers thereof.

2. There is no statutory provision, either of the United States or of the state of Ohio, requiring parties to sign a recognizance.

3. An acknowledgment, without the signatures of the parties, certified by a justice of the peace, is all that is required to make a recognizance valid and obligatory.

[Cited in Heyward v. U. S., 37 Fed. 765.]

At law.

D. O. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.
W. M. Dickson, for defendant Harding.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The declaration in this case avers, that on September 9, 1854, Sophia B. Williamson, and on the 12th of September, in said year, William Harding, together with one Pickett, as to whom the process is returned not served, entered into a recognizance before Nathan Guilford, a justice of the peace for Hamilton county, by which they acknowledged themselves jointly and severally to owe the United States the sum of two thousand dollars, on the condition that the said Pickett should fail to appear before the district court of the United States, next to be held for the Southern district of Ohio, to answer to a charge of feloniously stealing from the mail of the United States. The declaration then avers that the said Pickett did not appear, and that the recognizance was duly forfeited, whereby the United States became entitled to said sum of two thousand dollars. The defendant, Harding, appeared by his counsel, and having craved oyer of the recognizance, has demurred generally to the declaration. It is on this demurrer that the question now to be decided is presented. No brief has been filed, nor any authority cited, by counsel on either side. After a good deal of examination the court has not been able to find any decided cases bearing on the point raised by this demurrer.

The question presented is, whether the recognizance, as to the defendant, Harding, is valid and obligatory. The facts, as they appear from the recognizance, and as averred in the declaration, are that on the 9th of September, Pickett, the accused person, and the said Sophia B. Williamson, appeared before the justice and signed the recognizance, acknowledging themselves jointly and severally to owe the sum before stated, on the condition set forth. To this the justice of the peace annexed his certificate, in the following words: "Taken and acknowledged before me, this 9th of September, 1854, Nathan Guilford, Justice of the Peace." On the 12th of September the defendant, Harding, appeared and signed the recognizance; and the justice thereupon added a memorandum, as follows: "Signed by William Harding, this 12th day of September, 1854, and acknowledged before me, N. Guilford, J. P." The name of Harding was not, however, inserted in the body of the recognizance. It is not necessary to decide whether Harding is liable, on the facts as they are before the court, to a separate suit, as on a recognizance entered into by him at a time subsequent to that by which the other parties became bound. The question immediately arising on this demurrer is, whether the recognizance on which this suit is brought, by fair legal construction, imports a joint liability on the part of Harding with the other parties, so that he may be joined with them in this suit.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

My reflections on this point have led me to the conclusion that there is no such liability, and that the demurrer to the declaration must be sustained. It is clear that the recognizance entered into by Pickett and Williamson, on the 9th of September, and certified by the justice, was a perfect and valid instrument. It was an acknowledgment of a joint and several liability on the condition set forth. This acknowledgment, without the signature of the parties, with the certificate of the justice, was all that was required to make the recognizance valid and obligatory. There is no statutory provision, either of the United States or of the state of Ohio, requiring the parties to sign a recognizance. Harding's name does not appear in the recognizance as one of the parties making the acknowledgment; and he is not otherwise connected with it than by the fact that he appeared on a subsequent day and put his name to it. The memorandum of the justice, that Harding appeared on the 12th of September and signed the recognizance and acknowledged such signing, did not make him a party to the instrument. It was, no doubt, competent for the justice to have taken a separate recognizance from him; and this would have been the correct course of procedure. But, without his name in the body of the instrument, his signature to the recognizance, at a subsequent day, did not make him a party to it, and thereby create a joint and several liability with the other parties. As before intimated, it may be that the certificate of the justice as to such signing might, by a very liberal construction, be deemed sufficient evidence that he did enter into a separate recognizance, but does not connect him with the instrument, already perfect and complete in itself, as a party to it.

The demurrer to the declaration must be sustained.

Case No. 16,044.

UNITED STATES v. PICO.

[Cal. Law J. & Lit. Rev. 78.]

District Court, N. D. California. Nov. 5, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — LOCATION OF BOUNDARIES — OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The grant in this case describes the land as known by the name of "Arroyo Seco," situated towards the cordilleras of the Sierra Nevada, and having for limits on the north the river Consumnes, on the south the Moquelumne, on the west the road of the Sacramento, and on the east the adjoining sierras ("las sierras immediatas"). The third condition recites that the land of which mention is made is of eleven square leagues within the limits of the diseño which accompanies the expediente. The claim having been finally confirmed [Case No. 11,127], a tract of eleven square leagues has been surveyed. This survey, which is an amended survey made under the immediate supervision of the late United States surveyor general, is objected to on the ground that it is not within the limits described in the grant and shown on the diseño.

The only question presented in the cause is as to the true location of the eastern boundary described in the grant as "las sierras immediatas" and represented on the diseño by a line of mountains inscribed "Sierra." The whole tract embraced within the exterior limits of the very rude map found in the expediente is, according to the scale of the diseño, as it is in fact, of much greater extent than the eleven leagues which, by the terms of the third condition, were to be taken within its boundaries. On the north and south, the Consumnes and Moquelumne rivers are represented as issuing from the sierra, and running nearly due west across the Sacramento road. Between these rivers, and running north and south, that road is laid down and inscribed "Camino del Sacramento." It forms the western boundary of the tract. On the east is represented a chain of mountains running from the Consumnes due south for about half the length of the tract, when its continuity is broken by a cañada, or narrow valley, which seems to penetrate it. To the south of this cañada the course of the range deflects considerably to the east, and is continued in a south-easterly direction until it reaches the Moquelumne river. In about the centre of the tract thus enclosed between the sierra, the road, and the two rivers, there is represented a valley lying between two nearly parallel ranges of "lomas muertas," or barren hills, and running nearly east and west, or at right angles to the general direction of the road and of the mountains. Through about the centre of this valley a creek inscribed "Arroyo Seco," is represented as flowing. It appears to issue from the sierra, and curving around the eastern end of the northerly line of "lomas muertas," it flows down the valley between the two ranges of "lomas," towards the Sacramento road. The southern range of "lomas" is also delineated as trending to the south, and terminating very nearly opposite the "cañada" before spoken of, as piercing the sierra on the east. The valley is thus drawn as narrowest to the west, or towards the road, and as gradually widening towards the east, or the sierra, as the hills which form its sides diverge. At the request of all the parties to the cause, and accompanied by their counsel, I have personally visited the lands.

The testimony, though very voluminous, is little else than a description of the general features of the country and the expression of the witnesses' opinions as to the identity of the natural objects indicated on the diseño. But these opinions are in no sense those of experts. To know the natural features of the country is all that is necessary to enable the surveyor or the judge who may be required to locate the land, to determine what objects are intended to be represented on the diseño, and the conclusions thus reached must be adopted by them, whatever may be the opinions of witnesses who have perhaps, from their want of familiarity with Mexican diseños, less means of forming a correct judgment. The valley of the Arroyo Seco, at a short distance east of the Sacramento road, is a clearly defined strip of bottom land, of the average width of nearly a mile, and skirted on either side by low hills, or elevated table or rolling land. As the valley is ascended, the stream bends to the north, or rather its course becomes southwest instead of west, which is its general direction lower down toward the road. The hills on the north also deflect in the same direction, and the stream passes by or through them, and, preserving the same general direction, traverses a valley now known as "Ione," and after receiving some confluents is traced to the mountains from which it issues. At about the point where this change of course first occurs, another creek, flowing from the same range in a nearly westerly direction, falls into the Arroyo Seco. This is known as "Jackson Creek," and on either side of it is a valley of considerable width. From the junction of these creeks, and running in a northerly direction, is a range of hills which it is claimed is the sierra of the diseño. There is also a range of low hills running nearly parallel with the course of Jackson creek, which serves to separate the valley of that name from the Ione valley on the north, while the range running north and south, before spoken of, in like manner separates Dry Creek valley from Ione valley on the east. These three valleys have thus come to be distinguished from each other in the common speech of the inhabitants, and are spoken of in the depositions as distinct natural features of the country. They in fact, however, seem to be but parts or branches of one large and irregular tract of alluvial and nearly level land. The line of hills which separates Dry Creek valley from Ione valley on the east, is for the most part easy of ascent, and in many places readily traversable by vehicles of every description. One or two of the hills rise to some height, but the majority are low and rolling, and admitting between them strips of nearly level land, affording ready communication from one valley to the other. The hills which are supposed to separate Ione valley from Jackson valley on the south are of the same general character.

An observer standing on any of the hills belonging to the range, if such it can be called, which serves to distinguish Dry Creek valley from Ione valley, and looking to the eastward, beholds the snow-covered chain of the Cordilleras, bounding his view at the distance of fifty miles, while at his feet lies the broad and fertile valley of Ione, bounded on its eastern side by the clearly defined line of the foothills of the great chain, whose snowy summits he sees in the distance. These foothills are of steep ascent, crowned for the most part with chemisal, and, whatever valleys may be found between them and the loftier peaks beyond, they seem unmistakably to form the base or commencement of the great sierra. If, however, from the standpoint supposed the eye be turned either to the north or the south, and it be attempted to trace the line of hills on which the observer is placed, it will be found difficult, if not impracticable, to do so. And it will appear inconceivable that any person sufficiently well acquainted with the country to draw the diseño, and desirous of obtaining the best land in the vicinity, should either have neglected to ask for the singularly attractive and beautiful valleys of Ione and Jackson, which stretch along the base of the mountains, or, with the mountain range full in view and bounding those valleys on the east, should have designated the low hills to the west of the valleys as the "sierra." But there is one indication of the diseño, which seems decisive as to the range of mountains represented upon it. On the theory of those who object to the survey, the mountains inscribed "sierra," are a range of hills lying to the west of Ione valley. On the diseño, the "sierra" is represented as a continuous chain running from the Consumnes to the Moquelumne, and pierced at but one point by a small valley or cañada. If then the range of hills intended be that supposed by the counsel for the United States, we should expect to find it extending continuously northwards to the Consumnes, and separating Ione valley from Dry Creek valley and the rolling plain of the Sacramento. But this range of hills wholly fails in this respect to satisfy the indications of the diseño. For a short distance north of the confluence of Dry and Jackson creeks it is more or less distinctly traceable as a line of hills; but further to the north the hills disappear, and a strip of level and fertile land of considerable width extends from Ione valley, past the northern termination of the range of hills, into the plain of the Sacramento. Beyond, and to the north of this level land, hills again occur, but they are of no great height, and evidently such as the diseño intended to indicate by the words "mesas y lomas muertas." They are certainly not such mountains as the draftsman of a Mexican diseño would have represented as a mountain chain marked "sierra." The fact, then, that the range of hills is not continuous, but is broken, as has been stated, would seem to be an unanswerable objection to identifying it with the "sierra" of the diseño.

It is urged that the foothills, or base of the Sierra Nevada, which have been adopted in the survey as the eastern boundary, cannot have been referred to in the grant, because that boundary is therein described as "las sierras immediatas," in contradistinction, it is said, to the "Cordilleras de la Sierra Nevada," "toward which" the tract is described as situated. But I see in this language no ground for supposing that by "sierras immediatas" a broken range of low hills was intended rather than the base of the great chain to the east, which would properly be described as the adjacent mountains, or the "sierras immediatas." By the "Cordilleras de la Sierra Nevada," was no doubt meant the distant chain of snow-covered peaks which, more than fifty miles to the east, bound the horizon. The "sierras immediatas" are evidently the mountains which form the eastern limit of the flat land, and which, rising abruptly and covered with chemisal, constitute the base or commencement of the vast mountain system which culminates in the lofty heights beyond.

Much testimony has been taken to prove what natural objects are meant by the "laguna" and a high peak to the south of the valley, represented on the diseño. If the theory of those who oppose the survey be true, there can be found in the lower valley, or bottom of the Arroyo Seco, a pond answering in some degree to the laguna of the diseño. There is also found on the hills to the south a peak higher than those in the immediate vicinity which may be supposed to have been intended to be represented. On the other hand, if the sierra of the diseño be the base of the main sierra, as contended for by the claimant, there is found in Ione valley, and to the south of the Arroyo Seco, a laguna, which may, with perhaps greater probability, be identified with the laguna of the diseño, while to the south is a high and conspicuous mountain called "Chaparal Peak," which would correspond with that represented on the map. The same observations apply to the "cañada" of the diseño. It is either the valley of Jackson creek, at or near its confluence with the Arroyo Seco, or it is its upper end, where, under the name of Buena Vista valley, it penetrates into the sierra. All depends, as the principal witness for the United States admits, on what line of hills be taken as the sierra of the diseño. Where the description in the grant is so general, and the delineation of the diseño so rude as in this case, it is perhaps not practicable to affirm with absolute certainty the exact limits of the tract intended to be granted. But the United States surveyor who has made the location, with ample opportunities to become as thoroughly acquainted with the natural features of the country as any of the witnesses who have expressed opinions as to the meaning of the diseño, has adopted the foothills or base of the sierra as the eastern boundary. My own personal examination of the tract, and comparison of its natural objects with the description in the grant and the representation on the diseño, have convinced me that the conclusion of the surveyor was correct. I think, therefore, that the official location and survey should be confirmed.

Case No. 16,045.

UNITED STATES v. PICO.

[Hoff. Dec. 65.]

District Court, N. D. California. May 20, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH.

[The only papers in relation to a claim consisted of a grant of June 6, 1846, and a certificate of approval by the departmental assembly on June 15, 1846. These papers were produced from the possession of the claimant, and the governor's signature thereto was different from that used by him on other documents of about the same date. The only papers produced from the archives was a communication signed by a deputy secretary of the assembly, informing the secretary of state that the grant was approved on July 15th. This communication was on a detached sheet, which could easily have been placed in the surveyor general's office by fraud. The journal of the assembly showed that the grant was not approved on the day mentioned in the communication. There was no evidence of occupation, or that the existence of the grant was known until after the conquest. Held, that the claim must be rejected.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was confirmed by this court [Case No. 11,129], but with much hesitation and grave suspicions as to its genuineness. On appeal to the supreme court that decree was reversed, and the cause remanded for further evidence. [22 How. (63 U. S.) 406.] It is apparent from the opinion of the court that the further evidence contemplated was either that derived from the archives, or secondary evidence from those records which the court has declared it will require. No such testimony has been given. The only additional evidence has been that of Pico. But he merely testifies to the genuineness of his signature, and that merely from the fact of seeing them on the documents, and not from any recollection of having made the grant. The only papers produced are the grants dated June 6, 1846, and a certificate of approval by the departmental assembly, dated June 15, 1846. Both of these are produced from the custody of the claimants. There is also produced a communication, signed "Botello, Deputy Secretary of the Assembly," addressed to "Moreno, Secretary of State," in which he informs the latter that the grant was, with two others, approved on the 15th July. With the exception of this communication, the archives contain no trace of the existence of this. There is no expediente; no petition or informes; no note of it "in the corresponding book"; no borrador of the title delivered to the party, nor any allusion to the grant in any document or record whatsoever. The communication signed "Botello," is on a detached sheet of paper, which could readily have been placed among the numerous documents in the surveyor general's office at any time previous to 1858, when they were collected and bound up in books. In the case of U. S. v. Limantour [Case No. 15,601], it was shown that the introduction of a fraudulent expediente into the archives was by no means impracticable.

But there are objections to this document. (1) The handwriting evidently differs from that of Botello contemporaneous with its date. (2) It conflicts with the certificate of approval signed by Pio Pico. One states the approval to have been given on the 15th June, the other on the 15th July. (3) At the date given by Botello, the journals of the assembly show there was no session of that body. (4) That this could not have been a clerical error, by which July 15th was substituted for June 15th, is shown by the record of the proceedings of June 15th signed by Botello himself. The record shows that on the 16th June the assembly was in session; that it transacted various business; that no proceedings with reference to this grant were had; and that, "there being no other business, the assembly adjourned." It thus appears that not only is there no archive evidence whatsoever of the existence of this grant, but that those records afford positive proof that a part at least of the alleged proceedings with regard to it could not have been had. Under the rulings of the supreme court, this objection alone would be an insuperable obstacle to the confirmation of the claim. U. S. v. Luco, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 543; U. S. v. Castro, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 346. There are other objections which are equally fatal: (1) The signatures of Pico are in his later style, differing essentially from all the signatures, with two exceptions, which appear on the very numerous documents signed by him during his official career. (2) There seems to have been no possession or occupation of the land, nor any evidence that the existence of the grant was known or suspected until subsequently to the American occupation. Neither could, therefore, under the colonization laws, have received a grant for more than one additional league. The grant was made, if at all, in June, about a month previous to the capture of Monterey. It was made without informes, and apparently without taking any of the steps required by the colonization laws. It had never been acted on, up to the conquest of the country; nor, so far as appears, had the land been even visited by the grantee. Supposing the grant to be genuine, it was evidently not made in the just exercise of the governor's powers, or with any idea of carrying out the policy of the colonization laws. In the language of the supreme court: "Besides the suspicious character of the grant, it appears to be wholly destitute of merit." [22 How. (63 U. S.) 406.] The claim must be rejected.

Case No. 16,046.

UNITED STATES v. PICO et al.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 172.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND CLAIM.

This claim not contested by the United States.

[Claim of Maria Antonia Pico to the Rancho Punta del Año Nuevo embracing four leagues of land in Santa Cruz county. The board confirmed the claim, and the United States has appealed.]

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

Stanly & King, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was confirmed by the board, and has been submitted to us without argument or observation, or the production of additional testimony. The grant is produced and proved, and the expediente is duly found in the archives of the former government. The occupation of the land by the grantee in 1840, two years before the title issued, is also shown; and it further appears that in 1842 another house was built by him, and that wheat, corn, beans, melons and potatoes were cultivated by him. There is nothing in the testimony to afford the slightest presumption of an abandonment of his grant by the grantee during the existence of the former government. The board, after an attentive examination of the grant and accompanying diseño, came to the conclusion that the intention of the governor was to grant by metes and bounds. The description of the boundaries is unusually precise, and there is no reason to suppose that the quantity of land included within them exceeds that mentioned in the grant. We think that the decision of the board should be affirmed and a decree of confirmation entered.

Case No. 16,047.

UNITED STATES v. PICO et al.

[Hoff. Op. 412.]

District Court, N. D. California. June 30, 1859.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH.

[An alleged grant of certain mission property in 1846 rejected, where the only evidence thereof was the original grant, together with a letter of the governor and a receipt for part of the purchase money, unsupported by any evidence whatever from the archives, or any evidence of assertion of title prior to the conquest, or of any knowledge of the existence of the grant by parties likely to know of it if it had in fact been made; there being also intrinsic and other evidence that the papers relied on were fabricated after the conquest.]

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was confirmed by the board, and it is submitted to this court on substantially the same evidence as that on which it was decided by the commissioners.[1] The original grant by Pio Pico, dated May 5, 1846, is produced, and its genuineness testified to by Pio Pico himself. The claimants have also produced an original communication from the minister of war and marine, dated March 10, 1846, to Pio Pico, which the latter alleges he received prior to making the grant in this case, and which contains, as he states, the authority under which he acted. There is also produced a receipt from Gov. Pico for $6,000, on account of the $12,000 for which the mission was sold; and one from Gen. Jose Castro for a like sum—the first dated May 15, 1846, the last July 28th of the same year. The claimants have also produced a document signed by Pio Pico, in which he recites an order from himself to the father president of the missions of the north, and dated May 5, 1846. In this order the governor informs the father that the government, in view of the urgent necessities of the nation, as communicated in the official note of the minister of war and marine of the 10th March, 1846, and pursuant to the decree of the departmental assembly of April 13, 1846, had sold the mission of San Jose, with all its lands, real and personal property, and other existing moveables, to Andres Pico and Juan B. Alvarado. The governor therefore directs the president to cause the said establishment to be delivered up without hindrance, reserving the parsonage house and ground pertaining to it for the use of the reverend father missionary. The claimants have also filed a certificate or statement made by Friar Jose Maria del Refugio Suares del Real, dated December 24, 1849, setting forth that Don Andres Pico had presented to him a deed of sale of the mission of San Jose, dated May 5, 1846, whereby the governor constituted the said Andres Pico and Juan B. Alvarado owners of the arable lands, and dwelling houses, recognized as belonging to the mission, which up to that time had been under his administration and tutorship; that in pursuance of said deed, as well as an order previously received from the governor to deliver said property to its owners, he went in person to the mission, and on the 22d November, then last past, made a formal and solemn delivery of the appurtenances of said establishment, except the church, cemetery, priest's house and adjoining huerta, to Don Andres Pico, who took possession, etc. There is also filed a petition addressed to Antonio Maria Pico, dated January 2, 1850, asking that the judicial possession of the lands, etc., ordered to be given, to which is attached the record of an act of judicial possession, made in pursuance of the petition, by H. C. Smith, alcalde, on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of February, 1850. The above, with certain agreements, mesne conveyances, etc., includes all the documentary evidence exhibited in the case on the part of the claimants.

It has frequently been remarked by this court that the only reliable evidence which can be offered in support of a grant is that furnished by documents found among the archives of the former government, and that afforded by showing an occupation, or at least a notorious assertion of title, before the acquisition of the country by the Americans. In the case at bar no one of the documents exhibited is found among the archives. The proofs of title rest, as has been seen, exclusively on the grantor deed of sale by Pio Pico, the genuineness of which is sworn to by that officer; and on two receipts, the authenticity of which is proved in a similar manner. The certificate of Padre Real is not only inadmissible in evidence as being nothing more than the unsworn statement in writing of a person not examined as a witness, but it is dated December 24, 1849, long after the treaty by which California was acquired, and about the time at which it is contended on the part of the United States the documents now produced were fabricated, and at which, as will hereafter be seen, the claim of the appellees was for the first time heard of.

The original order addressed to the father president of the missions is not produced. It is recited in a letter addressed to Andres Pico and Juan B. Alvarado by Gov. Pico, and dated May 5, 1846, the very day on which the grant purports to have been made. The grant itself contains at the foot the usual note or memorandum that a note of it has been taken in the corresponding book. No such note can be found. Among all the records, correspondence, and other papers in the archives, no reference or allusion to, nor any trace whatever of, this transaction appears. The order to the president of the missions was undoubtedly, if it was given, an official letter, a copy or borrador of which would have been preserved; and it is almost impossible that the draft of the letter to Andres Pico and Alvarado, in which that order is recited, would not also have been found among the archives. The sale of so considerable a property was an important transaction, which it is equally difficult to conceive to have occurred without some preliminary proceedings, traces of or allusions to which would exist among the official transactions of the former government; and the receipt by the government of so very considerable an amount as $12,000, $11,000 of which was in cash, would almost certainly have somewhere been evidenced by the records. The grant or deed of sale purports to convey to the vendees "the establishment or mission of San Jose, with all its lands, real and personal property, and other existing moveables, according to the inventory made by the commission appointed by this government." No such inventory appears in this case. It ought, if ever made, to be found in the archives.

[1] The district attorney having been, before his appointment to office, of counsel for the claimants, the case was argued on the part of the United States by Mr. Hartman.

In the case of U. S. v. Cambuston [20 How. (61 U. S.) 64] the supreme court, after alluding to the entire absence in that case of any documentary evidence of title of record, or found among the archives, says: "We think, for the reasons above stated, that the case in the court below was too defective to have warranted a confirmation of the title to the claimant as it was unsupported by the evidence; and also for the further reason that, for aught that appears in the proofs, the alleged grant has never been recorded in the proper book, or, indeed, in any book of the Spanish records. This is expressly required by the regulations of November, 1828, and enjoined in the grant itself. The record should have been produced, or its nonproduction reasonably accounted for."

It is urged that in this case (which is claimed to have been a sale, and not a grant) the governor did not act under the colonization laws, but under some authority conferred on him by the departmental assembly, or by the circular of Tornel, minister of war and marine of the republic of Mexico. But the grant itself recites that it is made in conformity with the law of August, 1824, and the regulations of 1828; and the memorandum at the end states that a note has been taken of it in the corresponding book. The nonproduction of this book is not in this case accounted for, but it is known to the court that the book of "Tomas de Razon," as it is commonly called, for the period at which this grant was made, is not found in the archives. The absence of any note of the grant is not, therefore, of itself a suspicious circumstance; but the entire absence of any trace or allusion to the grant in any report, correspondence, order, or other document in the archives, is a circumstance which to any one acquainted with the official habits of the former government, is pregnant with suspicion. If this grant be deemed to have been made under the colonization laws, the case of U. S. v. Cambuston [supra] is a decisive authority for the rejection of the claim; and even if it be deemed not to have been made under those laws, the observations of the supreme court in the case referred to, clearly inculcate the principle that in all cases evidence of some kind from the archives should be rigorously exacted, or its absence reasonably accounted for. But the evidence of occupation or the assertion of title under the former government is equally unsatisfactory. The only testimony which even tends to show that Andres Pico and Alvarado ever asserted any title to the mission before the end of 1849, or beginning of 1850, is that of Antonio Maria Pico and Joaquin Castro.

The first of these witnesses swears that he gave to Andres Pico and Alvarado possession of a garden, but under what title he does not recollect. It was done (he says) under an order of the governor, which he believes is among the papers. But, in the first place, no such order is produced; and, secondly, this possession was given, according to Antonio Maria Pico, in 1844, two years before the date of the grant now relied on. Joaquin Castro swears that certain debts due by the mission were paid by Andres Pico and Alvarado. The payment of those debts was one of the duties imposed on the grantees in the grant itself. Unfortunately, however, it appears by Castro's own statement that the 900 fanegas of wheat which the mission owed to Jesus Vallejo were paid by Andres Pico in 1850, and that he was told by Antonio Maria Pico in 1850 or 1851 that one hundred dollars which the mission owed him had been paid. When, he does not state, nor does Antonio Maria Pico himself, though he was examined as a witness for the claimants.

But there is more decisive proof that no title to the mission could have been asserted by the claimants until long after the change of flags. In the letter of Pio Pico to his brother and Alvarado he recites the order which, as he says, he had on that day (May 5, 1846) given to the father president of the missions for the transfer of the property to the vendees. It has already been observed that the original of this order is not produced, nor is the office copy found among the archives. If it had been issued, it is impossible to suppose that the vendees would not at once have insisted on its execution. The buildings, orchards, etc., of the mission were valuable and productive; and yet during the whole period from the date of the sale and of the order to the father president (May 5, 1846) up to at least the end of 1849, the mission lands and buildings were suffered by the vendees to remain in the possession and under the control of Padre Real and of the father president. Adolfo Carrenos testifies that in October or November, 1847, he took possession of an orchard of the mission by order of the padre, and that he kept possession thereof until January, 1849, when he surrendered it to a Mr. Bolcoff, by direction of the same priest. During all this time he, the witness, divided the produce of the orchard with the padre according to agreement. The same witness also states that after Bolcoff had remained in possession some months he agreed to surrender the land in consideration of the sum of $1,000, to be paid him by the priest. He also testifies that he never knew of Andres Pico asserting a claim to the mission lands until 1850, when he was told by Padre Real that certain persons occupying rooms in the mission must have an understanding with Andres Pico, as he had a title to the whole mission. He also adds that if such a claim had been asserted before 1850, he would probably have heard of it from the padre, with whom he was on terms of intimacy; and he states, on cross-examination, that previous to 1850 Padre Real rented some of the buildings, corrals, and portions of the lands to different persons, and that he (the witness) was employed by the padre to collect some of the rents. It is also shown on the part of the United States, by the record of a suit commenced by Padre Real against E. L. Beard, to recover possession of a portion of the land, that on the 17th July, 1849, Padre Real and the father president of the missions executed a lease of the mission lands to John B. Steinberger for the term of five years for the sum of $22,000. It was claimed by Padre Real in this suit that Beard entered under Steinberger. This Beard denied, but averred that he had entered on the premises as vacant public lands of the United States. The suit seems to have been prosecuted until November, 1850, when it was dismissed by consent; Beard having by that time acquired an interest under the alleged grant to Pico and Alvarado.

It would seem clear from these facts, not only that the alleged grantees for more than three years suffered Padre Real to deal with and use the property for his own benefit, without asserting either to him or his tenants their own title, but also that no order to deliver the possession to the vendees could have been issued by the governor to the father president on the 5th May, 1846. That he and Padre Real should, notwithstanding an official notification of the sale to Pico and Alvarado, and notwithstanding the positive order to deliver possession to them, have ventured to make a lease of the lands three years afterwards, is in the highest degree improbable. More especially, as by the lease it is expressly stipulated that the lessors should on no account be responsible in case the government of the United States or of the territory of California should annul the contract while no mention whatever is made of the far more probable contingency (if the facts averred by the claimants are true) that the real owners of the land might assert their title to it. I cannot but consider that if this lease was executed by Padre Real and the president of the missions, as alleged in the complaint of the former, we are justified in inferring that at that time they could not have heard of the sale of the mission to the present claimants; and that they could not have received three years before an order from the governor to surrender the possession—an inference strongly corroborated, as we have seen by the testimony of Carneros, and by the absence of all positive testimony as to the assertion of title by the claimants up to the end of 1849, except the statement of Antonio Maria Pico that he heard of the sale before 1848. Had this claim been asserted during the years 1846, 1847, 1848, and 1849, it is impossible that it should not have been heard of by some of the persons who occupied or desired to possess the buildings, orchards, gardens and fertile lands pertaining to the mission as well as the priest and the father president. But no such evidence, except the loose statement of Antonio Maria Pico, has been produced, and the court is authorized to assume that a fact so susceptible of proof, and which is not proved, does not exist. But if it be in a high degree improbable that the father president would, after being notified of the sale and ordered to deliver the possession, have made the lease referred to, it is still more improbable that the vendees, who had paid in cash so large a sum as $11,000, in current money, and obtained on the very day on which the sale was made an order for the immediate delivery of the possession, would, for three years and a half, have wholly neglected to avail themselves of the rights they had acquired; during all which time the padre continued in possession, and rented the land, buildings, etc., while their own title remained unasserted, and even unknown, so far as it appears, to any one but Antonio Maria Pico.

It thus appears, not only that the archives fail to furnish the slightest evidence in favor of this claim, but, that the absence of all allusion to or trace of its existence affords a strong presumption against its genuineness; and, secondly, that it is not only unsustained by any proof of the assertion of title prior to the conquest of the country, but its existence was unknown to parties who, if the papers are not antedated, could not have been ignorant of it, and it remained unasserted under circumstances, and for a length of time, which render the silence and neglect of the alleged grantees almost incredible. But there are other circumstances which tend to strengthen our suspicions as to the genuineness of this title. The receipt of $6,000, dated May 15, 1846, and the letter of Pio Pico in which he recites his order to the father president, dated May 5, 1846, are signed by Pio Pico in the mode now used by him, as it appears by the signature attached to the deposition. A slight examination of the archives shows that this mode of signature is unmistakeably different in the shape of the letter "P," which is the initial letter of both his names, from that uniformly adopted by him at the period when this grant purports to have been issued. On the very day when the documents we are considering are dated,—i. e. on the 5th and 15th May, 1846,—his signature appears on the departmental assembly records and other documents of undoubted authenticity, exhibiting its characteristic peculiarities and wholly dissimilar in the form of the letter referred to, to that appended to the document in this case. Nor is this all. The signature to the grant or deed of sale has evidently been altered. It is obvious on inspection that both the "P's" were originally written in the form used by him at the date of the grant, but those letters have since been altered so as to make them conform in shape to the signatures on the two other documents bearing his signature exhibited by the claimants.

This alteration is wholly unexplained. It suggests the suspicion that the deed of sale may have been made perhaps before the flight of Pico from California in 1846, when he would naturally have adopted the mode of signature then used by him; but the parties, perceiving that such a sale would be of no validity unless the consideration had been paid, and unless proved by some other evidence than the bare production of the title itself, have more recently, probably in 1849 or 1850, procured the ex-governor to sign the receipt and the letter ordering the mission to be delivered to the vendees. In signing these last, Pio Pico has inadvertently used his later mode of signature; and the parties, not willing that the papers should show him to have signed his name in two different ways on the same day, have altered his first signature to correspond with his last. Whatever probability there may be in this conjecture, the fact remains that the first signature has obviously been altered; and that the two others are similar to that attached to his deposition, but different from that officially used by him not only before and after the time at which the documents purport to have been signed, but on the very days on which they are dated.

Secondly. In the case of Larkin v. U. S. [Case No. 8,091], this court had occasion to review at length the legislation and policy of the Mexican government with regard to the missions of California. It was in that case considered that the order of the supreme government signed "Montesdioca," and dated November 14, 1845, which directed Pio Pico to suspend all proceedings relative to the sale of the property pertaining to the missions, applied to the buildings, orchards, gardens and other improved property which had been created by the industry of the missionaries and the Indians under their charge, but that it probably was not intended to deprive the governor of his general power of granting, under the colonization laws, the extensive tracts of vacant and entirely unimproved land which may at one time have pertained to those establishments.

The deed of sale in the case at bar includes not only the lands of the mission, but "all its property, real and personal, and other existing moveables, according to an inventory, etc., excepting only the priest's house, consisting of six rooms, with the ground thereto belonging." This order of Montesdioca was presented to the departmental assembly on the 15th April, 1846, two days after the alleged session of the 13th April, at which the grant in this case recites the power to sell the mission was given by that body to the governor. The sale was thus in open and flagrant violation of the peremptory order the governor had received less than three weeks before. That he should have so acted seems highly improbable.

Thirdly. The decree or resolution of the assembly to which the governor refers in his grant as having been passed on the 13th April, 1846, is not found among the proceedings of that body. On the contrary, it appears from their journals that the assembly met on the 30th March, and again on the 15th April; but there appears to have been no session during the interval. This mistake of Governor Pico might well have been made if the grant had beeen written after the lapse of a considerable time, and when he had no longer access to the archives. It could hardly have occurred within about three weeks of the supposed session, and when the governor himself had, two days after the supposed session, communicated to the assembly the order he had received to suspend all further proceedings relative to the sale of the missions.

Fourthly. We have seen that the only sources of power to which the governor refers in the grant are the decree of the assembly of April 13th, 1846, and the colonization law of 1824 and the regulations of 1828. In his letter to the president of the missions, dated on the same day, as also in his deposition, he states that he also derived his power from a communication of the minister of war and marine, dated March 10th, 1856. We have also seen that there was no decree of the departmental assembly of the 13th of April, 1846, nor was there any session of that body on that day.

In the case of Larkin v. U. S., before referred to, it was observed by this court that the communication from the minister of war and marine "appears to be a circular addressed to the commandant-general of California, amongst other functionaries. All of it except the address is marked as a quotation, and its object seems to have been to stimulate the public authorities to a vigorous defense of the national territory and the maintenance of the national honor. The only clause by which any authority to sell the missions can be deemed to have been conferred on the governor is that in which it is stated that the supreme government expects from your loyalty and patriotism that you will dispose such measures as you may judge most suitable for the defense of the department, for which object ample power is granted to you and Senor the governor. It is evident that the power here conferred was given to the commandant-general as amply as to the governor. It can hardly be pretended that under it the commandant-general could have sold the vineyards and orchards of the missions to whomsoever and at whatsoever price he chose. It appears to me that the object of this circular was merely to authorize and direct the general commanding to take the proper military measures for the defense of the country, and that, had it been intended to revoke or modify the order signed 'Montesdioca,' prohibiting the sale of the mission property, and which was issued only three months previously, that object would have been unequivocally expressed, and the governor directed to make sales of that property to procure resources for the war. The board of commissioners were unanimously of the opinion that this circular conferred no power to make the sale at bar, and in that opinion I concur." But supposing that Governor Pico considered that this circular did confer upon him the power to sell the missions, it is a little remarkable that he did not refer to it in the grant itself when alluding to the decree of the assembly of the 13th April, and especially when he is at pains to set forth the circular in his letter to the father president, dated on the same day as the grant. But it is still more surprising that the circular should at the date of that letter (May 5th) been received by him. The circular is dated at Mexico on the 10th March, 1846. The communication of Castillo Lanzas, addressed to the local authorities, and advising them of the approach of war, is dated on the 13th March, 1846. It does not appear to have reached California until about July 4th of the same year. The Montesdioca document, so often referred to, is dated November 14, 1845. It seems not to have been received until about April 15, 1846. It is therefore a remarkable circumstance that the Tornel circular, dated March 10th, should have reached California in the beginning of May, and been acted on by the governor on the 5th May; while another circular, equally important, and dated only three days afterwards, did not reach the government until two months subsequently. If to these considerations we add the fact that Moreno, the secretary, has not been called as a witness, although the grant is signed by him and is in his handwriting, and the circumstance that the amount alleged to have been paid in cash, viz., $11,000, is a sum which few Californians would at that time have been able to command or willing to devote to such a purchase, we are justified in saying that all the circumstances connected with this claim confirm the suspicions which the entire absence of evidence from the archives, or of proof of occupation or assertion of title prior to 1849, unavoidably excite.

I have not thought it fit to put the decision of this case on the ground of want of power in the governor to make the sale; though, as already decided by this court, I think that his power to grant mission property was confined to granting the vacant and unoccupied land adjacent to those establishments, and did not extend to the buildings, orchards, vineyards, etc., which the order of Montesdioca had expressly prohibited him from selling. I think, for the reasons above given, that in the language of the supreme court already quoted, "the case is too defective to warrant a confirmation of the title to the defendant, as it is unsupported by the evidence." The claim must therefore be rejected.

Case No. 16,048.

UNITED STATES v. PICO.

[1 Sawy. 347.] [1]

District Court, D. California. Sept. 21, 1870.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—EFFECT OF LONG POSSESSION—PROVISIONAL OCCUPATION.

[Where the papers relating to a grant were produced from the archives and were regular in all respects, including the approval of the grant by the departmental assembly, but there was a doubt as to its validity, arising from the fact that the grantee himself was acting governor, and made out the papers to himself, according to a petition presented to a previous governor and a provisional possession conferred long before, held, that the fact of such provisional occupation, which lasted some 16 years to the time of making the grant, was sufficient to entitle the claimant to a confirmation.]

L. D. Latimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Williams & Thornton, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It appears in this case that Pio Pico, on the twenty-second day of March, 1831, petitioned Governor Victoria for a provisional grant of the rancho of "Jamul." On the twentieth April, the governor granted to the petitioner the right provisionally to occupy one sitio on the place called "Jamul," for the purpose of cultivating the lands, keeping his stock thereon, etc., etc.

On the nineteenth July, Santiago Arguello, military commander of San Diego, and in charge of the civil jurisdiction of the same, in conformity with the governor's decree, put Pio Pico in provisional possession of the land, assigning to him boundaries, which are described in his report. Pico thereupon built a house upon the rancho, and occupied it with his family and servants until 1838, when he was driven off by an incursion of the Indians, and his house burnt.

After this time the rancho appears to have been in charge of Juan Foster, his brother-in-law. On Dec. 23, 1845, Pio Pico, who was then, as first vocal of the departmental assembly, acting governor, presented a petition, setting out the provisional grant previously obtained by himself, and praying a title for the land. On this petition he issued a regular title to himself, but immediately transmitted the expediente to the departmental assembly, by whom it was referred to the appropriate committee, and on the favorable report of the latter, was finally approved.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In 1853, Gen. Burton, late of the United States army, acquired Pio Pico's title under a sale made, it is said, without authority, by Juan Foster. Pio Pico has since quit-claimed to the widow and heirs of Gen. Burton his whole interest in the premises.

The documentary evidence on which the claim rests, is of unquestioned authenticity. The petition of Pio Pico, the governor's concession, and the record of the possession given by Arguello, are found in the archives.

Those records also contain the expediente of the grant by Pio Pico to himself, with the approval of the departmental assembly. The grant is also noted in Hartnell's continuation of Jimeno's index, and in the book known as "Toma de Razon."

There appears no room for doubt that, under the provisional grant, Pio Pico took possession, built upon, and occupied the land for about seven years, when he was driven off by the Indians, and that he continued to claim it, and exercise control over it by his brother-in-law up to the time when it was sold by Foster in 1851. In 1853, Gen. Burton acquired the title, and his family, and that of his wife, have continued in the possession and enjoyment of the land up to the present time.

I do not deem it material to consider in the abstract, whether a governor of California could, under the colonization laws, make a grant to himself, or what validity would in all cases be imparted to such a grant by the approval of the departmental assembly.

It may well be, that such a grant, even though confirmed, if made by Pio Pico in the last days of his power, and under the expectation of the impending conquest of the country—if preceded by no preliminary concession, occupation, or settlement, or other circumstance which would create an equity in the grantee's favor, and if followed by no fulfillment during the existence of the former government of those conditions, which under their system constituted the consideration for the grant, should be treated as invalid by the United States. But in this case, the circumstances are quite different. The provisional grant gave to Pio Pico an inchoate or imperfect right. It authorized him to occupy and improve the land under a just expectation, if not an implied promise that the full title should be given him. When under this authority, and with this expectation, he made his home upon the land, he acquired rights, which, so far as I am informed, were uniformly respected by the former government. No other person would have been able to obtain a grant for the land, and his own application for a full title would have been, unless political or personal hostility on the part of the governor prevented, at once acceded to.

The action of the departmental assembly, whether or not it be regarded as giving absolute validity to his own grant to himself, is, at least, a recognition of his equitable claims and of his right to be secured in his ancient possession.

In the case of U. S. v. Alviso [23 How. (64 U. S.) 318] the supreme court recognized and enforced the equities growing out of the possession of fourteen years, begun under a provisional permission to occupy while the expediente was being formed.

In the case at bar the possession had continued for more than sixteen years up to the time of the change of flags, since that time it has continued uninterrupted and undisputed up to the present moment, a period from its commencement of nearly forty years. I am clearly of opinion that the manifest justice of this claim, as well as the principles established by the supreme court, demands its confirmation.

A decree to that effect in favor of the widow and heirs of the late Gen. Burton, will accordingly be entered.

UNITED STATES (PICO v.). See Cases Nos. 11,127–11,130.

UNITED STATES v. PIERCE. See Case No. 16,016.

Case No. 16,049.

UNITED STATES v. PIGNEL.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 310.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1806.

PEACE OFFICER—WARRANT.

It is not necessary that a peace-officer should have a warrant to suppress an affray.

[Cited in U. S. v. Long, Case No. 15,625.]

Presentment, for opposing Clement Venable, a constable, in the execution of his duty; it having been proved that Venable had a warrant against the defendant, [Richard Pignel.]

Mr. Law, for defendant, moved that the warrant should be produced, and to instruct the jury to that effect.

Mr. Jones, contra. It is not necessary to produce the warrant. Venable took the man in an affray, and had a right to do so as a peace-officer.

THE COURT (nem. con.) instructed the jury that if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that Venable, the constable, was in the general execution of his office as a conservator of the peace, and as such endeavoring to suppress the affray, then it is not necessary to produce the warrant spoken of by the witness. But if the jury should be of opinion that he was only endeavoring to execute the warrant, then the warrant must be produced, or its non-production satisfactorily accounted for.

UNITED STATES v. PIKE. See Case No. 16,429.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 16,050.

UNITED STATES v. PINGREE.

[1 Spr. 339;[1] 19 Law Rep. 667.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1857.[2]

CUSTOMS DUTIES—TRANSPORTATION BONDS—STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS.

1. An instrument not in the form of a bond with a penal sum and condition, but containing the requirements of the statute of 1854, c. 30 [10 Stat. 270], and the obligors not being prejudiced by the form, was held a sufficient bond under that statute.

2. The "additional duty of one hundred per cent." secured by transportation bonds, under Act 1854, c. 30, § 6, is one hundred per cent. on the original duty, and not on the invoice value of the goods.

3. The transportation bond under that section, properly includes the original duty, as well as the additional duty, the bond first given for the original duty being cancelled.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Cutajar, 59 Fed. 1001.]

Messrs. Pingree & Co. imported certain bags of castana nuts, and placed them in the bonded warehouse in Salem, giving bonds for the import duties, which were $105. The invoice value of the nuts was $350. Being desirous of removing them to Boston for sale, in bond, they executed, with sureties, the instrument required of them at the Salem custom house, which is called a transportation bond. It was not in the usual form of a bond, with a condition and a penal sum, but was a covenant, under seal, that the goods should be transported to Boston and there re-warehoused within thirty days, and failing that, that the defendants would pay the import duty of $105, and a further sum of $350 as "an additional duty," under the act of 1854 (chapter 30). By a misapprehension on the part of the merchants who bought the nuts of the defendants, and without any intent to avoid re-warehousing, the nuts were not re-warehoused within the time. The government claimed a verdict for $455, which was so rendered, under pro forma instructions from the court. The defendants then moved in arrest of judgment.

B. F. Hallett, U. S. Dist. Atty.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for defendants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. Several grounds are taken in support of this motion. The first is, that the instrument in suit is not "a bond," within the meaning of the statute. It is not, to be sure, in the form of a bond with a penal sum and condition, but if its requirements are those of the statute, and no harm is done to the defendants by its form, and I cannot see that they are prejudiced by the form, I think they must be held by the instrument they have executed.

The second and chief ground is, that the bond is in too large an amount. This depends upon the construction to be given to the act of 1854 (chapter 30). And there is a singular difficulty in construing this statute. The act requires the collector to take a bond for transportation and re-warehousing; and then provides that if the goods are not duly re-warehoused, the collector shall levy and collect "an additional duty of one hundred per cent.," which additional duty shall be secured by said bond. The district attorney contends that this clause means an additional duty of one hundred per cent. on the invoice value of the goods. The bond was framed, the declaration drawn, and the verdict rendered on this theory. The defendant's counsel contends that it means one hundred per cent. on the original duty, or, in other words, a second duty of the same amount as the first.

Taking this statute alone, we find no antecedent to which to refer this language, except the import duty. The statute makes no allusion to invoice or value, but only to import duty. The percentage must be calculated upon something. That something must be the original duty, if we confine our view to this act, for the act presents no other subject-matter than the duty.

But on referring to the general tariff act, we find that all duties are ad valorem, that is, a percentage on the value of the goods. The original duty, then, being thirty per cent. ad valorem, it is argued that the "additional duty of one hundred per cent." must be one hundred per cent. ad valorem.

But, in reply, it is said that the act of 1854 is only supplementary to the act of 1846, c. 84 [9 Stat. 53], and that it must be construed in subordination to that act. The act of 1846 establishes the warehouse system. It allows of transportation from one warehouse to another, in bond; and provides that when goods are taken out of warehouse for transportation, a transportation bond shall be given in "double the duties." Under this act, if the goods were not re-warehoused, the utmost the government could recover was "double the duties," and as the bond could be chancered, the court could direct a sum to be paid less than the penalty.

I have made an examination into the regulations of the treasury department, and find the construction of the warehouse acts, and the practice under them prior to the act of 1854, to have been thus.—When the goods were originally warehoused, a bond was given in double the duties, conditioned to be void, if the duties were paid, or if the goods were withdrawn according to law. When goods were withdrawn for transportation, under bond, the condition of the original bond was considered as fulfilled, and it was cancelled. The goods being delivered to the owner, the only security which the government has for the original duties is the transportation bond; and this bond, under the act of 1846, was in a penal sum equal to double the duties. If the goods were duly re-warehoused, the transportation bond was cancelled, and a new warehouse bond given in the same form as the original.

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed by circuit court; case unreported.]

But it is said that, under the act of 1846, goods were frequently taken out of warehouse, as for transportation, on this bond, and never, in fact, re-warehoused, but put into the market, and the government officers collected only the original duty, the bond being treated as merely a new security for the duty. In this way the importer evaded the payment of cash duties, and obtained a credit, until his bond was payable and demanded. This may serve to explain the peremptory requirement in the act of 1854, that the additional duty "shall be levied and collected." If the goods are not re-warehoused, the original duty and the additional duty are both due, and must both be paid. The penal sum of the bond may be whatever is usual, but the whole additional duty must be collected, whatever may be the grounds for equitable relief, from accident, mistake, or otherwise.

I am satisfied that the practice of including the original, as well as the additional, duty in the transportation bond is authorized by the statute, the original bond being cancelled. This bond, therefore, properly secured the duty of $105. But as to the mode of calculating the "additional duty of one hundred per cent.," I am of opinion, after careful consideration, that it ought to be construed as one hundred per cent. on the original duty. If the other interpretation is put upon it, the owner, for a mere failure to re-warehouse within the time, perhaps through accident, mistake, or the fraud of others, must pay the duties, and also a sum equal to the whole value of his goods. The collector is obliged to collect the entire amount. No court can chancer the bond. And the case is not within the provisions authorizing the secretary of the treasury to remit the whole or part of a penalty upon a certificate. It can hardly be supposed that congress intended such a result. Taking, therefore, this act in connection with the act of 1846, and considering the mischief to be remedied, I am of opinion that it was intended to require only a second duty of like amount with the first.

It is argued, that the rest of the section which follows the requirement of the "additional duty," providing that the collector may, instead of the "additional duty," exact a forfeiture of the goods, shows that the duty must have been equal to the value of the goods. But the additional duty is absolute. The forfeiture is discretionary, and is accompanied by a power of remission. This, I think, shows that they were not considered by congress as equal to each other. The forfeiture is the greater penalty, to be inflicted in whole or in part, in cases justifying or requiring it. The additional duty is a lesser penalty and made absolute in all cases.

The bond having been given and the verdict rendered for a larger sum than the statute authorizes judgment must be arrested.

This decision was reversed upon appeal to the circuit court, May 7, 1857 [case unreported.]

Case No. 16,051.

UNITED STATES v. PITMAN.

[1 Spr. 196;[1] 15 Law Rep. 36.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March Term, 1852.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—PLUNDERING OF VESSEL.

1. The courts of the United States have jurisdiction over the offence of plundering, or stealing, property from, or belonging to a vessel, although she may be lying upon the shore; and even if the property has been plundered, after it has been separated from the vessel and thrown upon the shore.

2. Construction of the words "plunder or steal," in the "Crimes Act" of 1825, c. 65, § 9 [4 Stat. 116].

[Cited in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 250.]

[3. "Plunder," as used in this section, is a word of very broad and general description, including the criminal taking of the goods of another by open force, or by secret fraud and furtively, from a vessel in distress, etc.; and it also includes an embezzlement by the master and others.]

The prisoner, master of the ship Sterling, of Boston, was indicted, jointly with Samuel N. Dixey, master of the bark Missouri, of New York, and also separately, upon the 9th section of the statute of 1825, c. 65, commonly called the "Crimes Act." 4 Stat. 116. The statute provides, "that if any person or persons, shall plunder, steal, or destroy any money, goods, merchandize, or other effects, from, or belonging to any ship, or vessel, or boat, or raft, which shall be in distress, or which shall be wrecked, lost, stranded, or cast away, upon the sea, or upon any reef, shoal, bank, or rocks of the sea, or in any other place, * * * every person so offending, shall be deemed guilty of felony," &c. To the indictment, Dixey pleaded guilty, and Pitman, having put himself upon trial, was found guilty by the verdict of the jury. Motion for a new trial.

George Lunt, U. S. Dist. Atty.

R. Choate and Cyrus Cummings, for defendant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge.—The various points made for the prisoner, in this case, upon his motion for a new trial, resolve themselves into two. One is an objection to the jurisdiction; the other, that the verdict ought to be set aside, as against the evidence, and the weight of evidence. The defendant was tried upon three indictments, which, by agreement, were consolidated. These were so framed as to cover every contingency contemplated by the statute. Under the decision in U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72, if the evidence in this case had shown the property plundered to have been separated from the vessel, and taken upon the shore, the indictment would still have been quite sufficient, and the jurisdiction would have been sustained, under the power of congress to regulate commerce. The evidence submitted to the jury was, that the vessel missed stays, and went upon the beach, stern first. There can be no doubt that she was stranded when she touched the shore, nor any doubt that she was then within the jurisdiction of the United States. If afterwards she had gone high and dry, she would still have been stranded and wrecked, within the meaning of the statute. She was upon a beach, or shore, of the island of Sumatra, and upon an arm, or inlet of the sea, but still upon the sea.

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The money was, in fact, taken on the sea; it was taken from the wrecked vessel into a boat, to be transported to the Sterling, and thus, when plundered, was actually on the sea, and so, unquestionably, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

The other point raised is, that the verdict is against the weight of evidence, because the testimony did not sufficiently show that the money was plundered. A suggestion is made that the money was taken from the wreck, whereas, the averment of the indictment is, that the money was "belonging to the vessel." The statute is in the alternative. Its expression is, "from, or belonging to;" and it is evident that money, so taken from the wreck, was belonging to it. The indictment alleges, that this money the defendant did "plunder, steal, take, and carry away." As the statute makes it an offence to plunder or steal, if the evidence prove either of these alternatives, it is sufficient.

It is suggested, that the word "steal," involves the crime of larceny, and the 6th section of the statute is referred to in support of this view. But the 9th section has no reference to the 6th. The language of the statute is, "plunder or steal." Now, as to the word "plunder," I would remark, that no instructions were asked, as to the meaning of this word, nor was any argument made by counsel upon this point. It was left to the jury, therefore, to determine whether plundering was made out. The word is, in fact, used in this section in its popular sense, in such a sense as would be understood by seamen, for instance, and as it would be used and understood in ordinary conversation. The jury found no difficulty in understanding it. It is contended by counsel, that "to plunder," means to take by force. But although this is undoubtedly one sense of the word, it by no means expresses its full meaning. The various lexicographers, who have been quoted at the bar, inform us that it means as well, taking by fraud. And so in the quotation made from the Scriptures, by the district attorney, where the words "to spoil," ("To spoil the Egyptians." Exodus, xii. 35, 36,) which the lexicographers give as one of the original synonyms of "plunder," were applied to a taking of property, of which the possession was originally obtained by consent. But it does not rest here. So long ago as the time of Judge Peters, it was practically adjudged by him, that plundering was equivalent to embezzlement. Mariners v. The Kensington [Case No. 9,085]. And further, it will be found, by reference to the shipping articles used in England and this country, that the word "plunderage," is used in them, in a manner to imply, not a forcible taking, but a fraudulent taking, in fact, an embezzlement. And these words, "to plunder," are of very general meaning. They embrace robbery and fraudulent taking. A vessel may properly be said to be plundered, not only if openly attacked and robbed, but if property be taken from her furtively, in the night time, or after she has been abandoned by the crew. And I cannot doubt, that within the true meaning of this word, the evidence not only warranted, but required the verdict. The motion for a new trial is accordingly overruled.

Case No. 16,052.

UNITED STATES v. The PITT.

[2 Wheeler, Crim. Cas. 602.]

District Court, D. Delaware. 1818.

NAVIGATION LAWS—FORFEITURES FOR VIOLATION —STIPULATION BONDS.

[Vessels and cargoes libeled for forfeiture under the navigation act of April 18, 1818 (3 Stat. 432), which excludes from our ports all British vessels arriving from any colony which is closed by the British navigation laws to American vessels, may be delivered to the claimants upon a stipulation bond for their appraised value, as in other cases in admiralty, there being nothing in the statute indicating an intent to alter the practice of the courts in this respect.]

[These were libels filed respectively against the British sloop Pitt, her tackle, etc., and against the goods, wares, and merchandise laden on board of her, alleging a violation of the navigation act of April 18, 1818, and praying condemnation of both vessel and cargo.]

The preliminary question of the right of the claimants to a delivery of the vessel and cargo on stipulated bonds, was argued before FISHER, District Judge, by Mr. Read, Dist. Atty., on the part of the United States, and by Mr. Rodney, on the part of the claimants.

As the judge briefly recites the arguments of counsel in the opinion here given, they are omitted in their proper place.

FISHER, District Judge. The case now before this court arises on two libels filed on the part of the United States against the sloop Pitt (a British bottom), her tackle, apparel, and furniture; and also against her cargo, consisting of 46,000 lbs. of cocoa, a small number of raw hides, and seventy sticks or pieces of fustic. These libels are instituted upon an act of congress of the 18th of April last, entitled "An act concerning navigation." The act was passed with a view to exclude from the country, after the 30th of September last, all vessels owned by British subjects arriving from a colony which, by the British navigation laws, is closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States. In case of its violation, the act inflicts a forfeiture of vessel and cargo. In these cases, claims have been put in by Messers. Lewis, Haven and Co., merchants of Philadelphia, the consignees of the sloop and cargo against which the prosecutions are instituted. A preliminary question, of great importance, is submitted to the decision of this court, on a motion made by the claimants' counsel, praying an order for the delivery of the vessel and cargo, on bonds for their apprised value. To me it is a subject of regret that this question has not arisen in some other district, and been decided by a judge, to whose opinion the utmost deference would have been paid. As, however, this has not occurred, I must tread the unbeaten path, and dispose of the question to the best of my ability and judgment.

It is contended, on the part of the United States, that if the property in the present instance be delivered, the spirit of the law, which goes to exclude British bottoms arriving from prohibited ports, will be effectually defeated, that the defective apprisement of the property will be an encouragement to vessels of this description to enter our ports, and that thus the navigation act will be set at defiance, and become a dead letter; that if the property be perishable, which is admitted in the present case, a sale of it ought to be ordered by this court, and the proceeds of such sale should be retained in court in usum jus habentis; that the cases of delivery heretofore allowed by the practice of this court, were between the United States and their revenue officers, and our own citizens, and are distinguishable from the prosecutions which may arise under the navigation act, framed as it is, to shut our ports effectually against those British colonies which our vessels are not permitted to enter, by the laws of trade of the British government.

The argument on the part of the claimants is that it would be against equity to enforce a sale of property, which may have arrived innocently in our ports; that such a course would be presuming an intention to violate our law, when in fact no such intention had actually existed, that the practice of this court has heretofore been in accordance with the claimants' motion for a delivery of the property, and in cases, too, of goods prohibited by our restrictive laws, and not dutiable under any statute of congress; that the goods in the present case are dutiable provided they do not arrive from ports prohibited to our citizens by the ordinary laws of navigation of the British government; and that the fourth section of the act, on which the present libels are founded, recognizes the provisions and proceedings of the revenue laws of the United States, from the inception to the close of the prosecutions, which may be instituted under it.

In the case under consideration we are exercising the powers of a court of admiralty on the instance side of it, which generally, and, perhaps, always, proceeds in rem. We are now in a course of proceeding against a thing that is prohibited from entering our ports, by our navigation act. The confiscation or restoration of this rem or thing, will eventually be the subject of our consideration and decree, when the case shall be heard upon its merits. The question at present, therefore, is, shall we receive in court a substitute for this thing, or shall we retain and order it for sale, for the use of the party, in whom the right may ultimately be decided? It was the practice of this court, and of all the district courts of the United States, during the late war, to deliver vessels and cargoes on stipulation bonds, or on the claimant giving what is called in the books upon admiralty practice, a fide jussory caution. The Delaware district led the way to this practice, by the introductory decree in the case of U. S. v. The Good-Friends, Stephen Girard, claimant [Case No. 15,227]. The decree in that case became the law of the country (in prosecutions under the restrictive laws) by its adoption in every district of the Union. There was nothing to be found in our restrictive laws, either favoring or disallowing such a course; but it was viewed as being in accordance with the admiralty practice of England, on the instance, and very frequently on the prize side of that court. This practice was there adopted, as far back as the 11th of April, 1780, as appears from Marr. Forms, p. 5. See a decree for delivery on bond, in same authority, pages 221–223. How much longer the delivery of vessels and cargoes on bond had been adopted by the English admiralty, I have not now the means of ascertaining, since the first order of the kind, within my research, is the one first above cited. But I was of opinion, in the case of U. S. v. The Good-Friends [supra], and I still retain the same opinion, that that part of the 89th section of the collection law [1 Stat. 695], relating to delivery on bond, was framed with a view to what had been understood to be the usual course of admiralty practice. I could discover nothing in the cases commonly called the Amelia Island Cases, or in any prosecution arising under the restrictive laws, which ought to distinguish them from those of ordinary seizure and prosecution under the revenue laws of this country. It was under this conviction that this court formed its decree for delivery on bond in the case of The Good-Friends. The court was strengthened in its decision of that case, by the authority of the case of Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 23. In that case, Chief Justice Marshall, in speaking of the constitution and character of a court of admiralty, remarks as follows: "The proceedings of that court are in rem, and their sentences act on the thing itself. They decide who has the right, and they order its delivery to the party having the right. The libellant and claimant are both actors. They both demand from the court the thing in contest. It would be repugnant to the principles of justice, and to the practice of courts, to leave the thing in possession of either of the parties, without security, while the contest is depending." Does the navigation act contain any provision by which the practice of the courts should be remodelled, or in any wise altered, in relation to delivery of vessels and their cargoes on stipulated bonds? The spirit of the act is, no doubt, as has been contended, to exclude British bottoms from our ports, in case such bottoms came from colonies interdicted to the citizens of this country. But how will the spirit of this act be infringed by this court pursuing a practice, which has received the sanction of every district in the union, and which practice congress has not modified or abolished, by any provision of the navigation act? Had a new course been prescribed, this court would have considered itself bound to conform to legislative direction, and to refuse the application now made, though founded on a practice adopted upon much and able discussion, and after mature reflection. The only argument attempted to be given why the spirit of the act will be eluded by a delivery on bond is that defective appraisements will be made, and that they will operate as so many encouragements to the introduction of future vessels, in violation of the act. To this argument I respectfully reply that if defective or improper appraisements should be made, this court will be ever ready to afford that redress which is amply within its power, namely, by setting aside the appraisements, and appointing new appraisers as often as corruption or misconduct may have exhibited an inadequate estimate of the property. A vigilance of this kind will always secure an ample substitute for the thing proceeded against, which will remain within the power of the court, to respond to the United States, for the breach of their statute, made by the lawless intrusion of a vessel of a prohibited character. But will it be equitable to order the sale of a vessel and cargo, when possibly she might have entered our waters without any intention of violating the navigation act? Might not a sale operate as a premature penalty on an innocent person, and a decree of restoration remit to him the scanty proceeds of a hurried sale of his property? While in the case of a condemnation, the bonds will afford to the prosecution ample amends for the violation of a public and beneficial law.

Lastly, this court is of opinion, that the fourth section of the navigation act, recognizing, as it does, the course of proceeding prescribed by the revenue laws, in terms at once broad and comprehensive, (and inclusively, too, from the commencement to the close of the prosecution) impliedly, at least, adopts the provisions of the 89th section of the collection laws in relation to the delivery on appraisement and bond, and as holding nothing restrictive of any practice of the judiciary heretofore existing on the subject of delivery on bonds, is discoverable in the navigation act, the inference is a fair one that no alteration of such practice was in the contemplation of congress when the act was passed.

The decree of this court therefore is that the sloop Pitt, her [illegible] apparel, and furniture, together with her cargo, be delivered to the claimants, on their securing duties payable by law, entering into bonds to respond the appraised value, &c. &c.

Case No. 16,053.

UNITED STATES v. PITTMAN.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 289.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term; 1828.

CRIMINAL LAW—ARRAIGNMENT.

A prisoner arraigned for felony is to be placed in the criminal box, or dock, at the time of arraignment, but need not hold up his hand when called, if he admits himself to be the person indicted.

[Followed in U. S. v. Pittis, Case No. 16,038.]

Indictment for shooting John Corse, with intent to disfigure, maim, and kill him. The prisoner requested that he might be permitted to plead without going into the criminal dock, in which prisoners usually stand when arraigned, and which is set apart for that purpose. The attorney for the United States did not assent to it.

Mr. Neale, for the prisoner, cited Burr's Case, [Case No. 2,186], in which the arraignment was dispensed with.

THE COURT (nem. con.) said, that according to the practice in this court, and of other courts of criminal jurisdiction, for the purpose of preserving order and regularity, a certain place in court is assigned in which persons are to be placed by the marshal, to be arraigned. The record states that he is brought to the bar in the custody of the marshal, and the court think proper to adhere to the practice.

The prisoner then went into the prisoner's box. THE COURT told him that if he acknowledged himself to be the person indicted, he need not hold up his hand. He was then arraigned, and pleaded not guilty.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 16,054.

UNITED STATES v. The PLANTER.

[Newb. 262.] [1]

District Court, D. Missouri. March, 1852.

PROSECUTIONS FOR PENALTIES—INFORMERS—LIABILITY FOR COSTS—SHIPPING—ENROLLMENT AND LICENSE.

1. The eighth section of the act of 28th of February, 1799 [1 Stat. 626], in relation to prosecutions upon a penal statute, by an informer, contemplates an action in the name of the informer alone, as well as in the name of the United States, to the use, in whole or in part, of an informer.

2. If the informer, for whose use the suit is prosecuted, in whole or in part, is not an officer of the United States, the United States cannot be liable for costs in the cases mentioned in the said eighth section.

3. The informer is liable, although the United States may be a party on the record.

4. The court may require an informer to give security for costs, and in case of refusal, strike his name from the record.

5. An enrollment and license, duly executed, does not require delivery to give it validity.

6. Where a license was duly executed, sealed, signed, dated and numbered, but not delivered until a month thereafter, held, that it was a valid license from its date.

In admiralty.

John D. Cook, Dist. Atty., and Lyman D. Norris, for the United States and informer.

Benjamin F. Hickman, for owner of boat.

WELLS, District Judge. A libel was filed against the steamboat Planter for a violation of the act of congress approved 7th July, 1838 [5 Stat. 304], "To provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam." The libel states, that "the attorney of the United States for the said district of Missouri, upon the information on oath of Peter V. Skillman, now here in the name and on behalf of the United States, and on behalf and to the use of the said Peter V. Skillman, gives the court to understand and be informed," &c. An affidavit is filed with the libel by said Skillman, which sets forth that "in the name and on behalf of the United States of America, as well as in the name and on behalf of Peter V. Skillman, who presents to the court here this information, now here giveth the court to understand and be informed," &c. The second section of the above recited act provides that a fine of $500 shall be paid by the owners of any steam vessel which navigates the rivers, &c., without first obtaining a license therefor, "one-half for the use of the informer."

On filing the libel, no security for costs was given by the informer, and the owners, after filing their answer, moved the court for a rule on the informer to give security for costs. The United States appeared by the district attorney, and the informer by his proctor. The motion was opposed by the proctor of the informer.

By the 8th section of the act of 28th February, 1799 (1 Stat. 626), it is provided, that "if any informer on a penal statute, and to whom the penalty or any part thereof, if recovered, is directed to accrue, shall discontinue his suit or prosecution, or shall be nonsuited in the same, or if upon trial judgment shall be rendered in favor of the defendant, unless such informer be an officer of the United States, he shall be alone liable to the clerks, marshals and attorneys for the fees of such prosecution; but if such informer be an officer whose duty it is to commence such prosecution, and the court shall certify there was reasonable ground for the same, then the United States shall be responsible for such fees." See, also, the 5th section of the act of 8th May, 1792 (1 Stat. 277).

The statute contemplates not only prosecutions in the name alone of the informer, but also those in the name of the United States to the use in whole or in part of an informer, "to whom the penalty, or any part thereof, if recovered, is directed to accrue. If such informer be an officer whose duty it is to commence such prosecution, and the court shall certify there was reasonable ground for the same, then the United States shall be responsible for the same." It will also be seen that in case of an informer who is not an officer (which is the case here), the United States are not liable, and therefore if the informer be not liable, no costs can be recovered, no matter how malicious or vexatious the prosecution may be. The Antelope, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 559. "It is a general rule (says the supreme court) that no court can make a direct judgment or decree against the United States for costs and expenses in a suit to which the United States is a party, either on behalf of any suitor or any officer of the government.

I think it appears from the above that an informer is liable, although the United States may be a party on the record, and also that the United States are not liable in this case. Can the court require him to give security for costs? 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 356. "If both parties appeared on the appointed day, each was to give security stipulatio, or satisfactio; the plaintiff that he would prosecute his suit and pay the costs, if he lost his cause; the defendant that he would continue in court, and abide the sentence of the judge, i. e. bail to the action." This was the ancient civil law. The same practice prevails in the admiralty courts, on the instance side, or in other words in cases like the one under consideration. Id. 410, 411; Conk. Adm. 463, 464.

"In a suit in rem both parties are actors." Serg. Const. Law, 234. "All persons interested in the cause of action, may be joined as libelants." Dunl. Adm. Prac. 95. In this case the informer has an interest, the same as that of the United States, as he receives half the penalty, that is $250. It will be seen by reference to that part of the libel and affidavit above set forth, that he is made a party—a party on the record—and would be entitled to his part of the penalty when brought into the court by the marshal, and a decree or judgment would be given against him for costs if unsuccessful. His interest is separate and distinct from that of the United States, each being entitled to $250.

[1] [Reported by John S. Newberry, Esq.]

But to settle all controversy in regard to the matter, and for the information of all concerned in similar suits, the court made a general rule requiring an informer to give security for the costs when the libel is filed, and also providing that if not given when the libel was filed, a rule might be made on him to give such security; and if not given, that he should not be further recognized by the court as informer, and that his name should be stricken out, and that he should receive no part of the fine or penalty. Under this rule he was required to give security for costs, and being in court and declining to give such security, the rule was enforced against him. It will be seen that this proceeding leaves the United States free to prosecute either in the first instance, without an informer, or to prosecute after his name is stricken out. The necessity of establishing such rules and practice, and requiring security from informers, became manifest during the present term of the court. Eleven libels were filed against steam ferry boats for this term, by informers, without security for costs, and the boats arrested. No evidence was offered or alleged to exist, showing that they had been employed in any navigation other than that of ferries under licenses from state authority.

In the case of U. S. v. The James Morrison [Case No. 15,465], this court held that ferry boats were not liable for the penalties imposed by the act of 1838, above cited; the case was taken by appeal to the circuit court, and there affirmed. The opinion of this court in the case of U. S. v. The James Morrison [supra] was published, as was also the decision of the circuit court, affirming its judgment.

The circuit court is the court of last resort in such case. In the face of these decisions these eleven suits were brought. The suit then proceeded in the name of the United States alone. The libel was for running the boat without a license. The answer of the owners set up and exhibited a license upon its face, good in all respects. It appeared in proof that the owners had executed their bond according to law, and applied for license after the enrollment of their boat, which license was made out on the books of the office, by the surveyor and inspector, signed, sealed, dated and numbered; and the same on a separate sheet, also signed, sealed, dated and numbered. When the owners called at the office afterwards, it appeared that there had been no account or payment of the hospital dues: that the account could not at that time be made out, as the boat had, a short time before, been sold and transferred to the present owners, who did not know how many hands had been employed by the former owners, nor how long the boat had run, both of which it was necessary to know and state in writing: that a person rendering a false account was subject to a fine: that the former owners were absent, and therefore the information could not be obtained. Under these circumstances, the surveyor declined handing over the paper made out on the separate sheet, but gave the owners permission verbally to make the voyage they were prepared for; and on their return, the former owners being still absent, they made another voyage. For these two voyages this libel suit was commenced. On the day the writ was served, but after the service, the paper was delivered. The surveyor was not bound to grant license until the hospital dues were paid.

He states in his evidence that the enrollment and license were duly executed on the day they bear date, but the certificates were not delivered until afterwards; thus, treating the record in his office as the enrollment and license, and the papers delivered as evidence thereof. Be this as it may, he states positively, that the bond was given and the license was duly executed, was sealed, signed, dated and numbered; and the only question which can be raised is, "was delivery of the license necessary to give it validity?" He could grant a license before the hospital dues were paid, and the effect of which perhaps would be to make himself personally responsible for them; and this was his own understanding of the matter, as appears from the evidence of the chief clerk in his office.

A deed is an instrument executed by a private citizen, and is or was formerly only known to be his act and deed, because he delivered it as such. He has no public seal by which it can be known, and anciently when this law was established, not one person in a hundred, perhaps, could write his name; and his private seal was the impression of his tooth, or some other impression equally unknown to the public. Delivery is therefore essential to give it validity; and it takes effect only from delivery. 2 Black. Comm. 306. It is not thus in regard to the acts of public officers, attested by public seals, and recorded in public records in public offices.

Where is the law to make delivery essential to their validity? I confess I have never seen such law, and certainly none was produced or cited. In the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 177, 1 [Pet.] Cond. R. 273, the supreme court of the United States says: "But in all cases of letters patent, certain solemnities are required by law, which solemnities are the evidence of the validity of the instrument. A formal delivery to the person is not among them. In cases of commissions the sign manual of the president and the seal of the United States are those solemnities. This objection does not touch the case."

This was said by the court in answer to an objection, that delivery was essential to give validity to a commission. I have not been able to discover any difference which can be material in this respect, between a commission and a license; neither of them is a deed made by a private citizen, which can only be known to be his act, by his having delivered it as such. Both are acts of public officers, in their official capacity; both have their sign manual and public seals, and both are recorded in public records in public offices; both are letters patent, or of the nature of letters patent. Blackstone (2 Comm. 346) speaking of letters patent, says: "These grants, whether of lands, honors, liberties, franchises or aught besides, are contained in charters or letters patent, literal patentees, so called because they are not sealed up, but exposed to open view, with the great seal pendent at the bottom, and are usually directed or addressed by the king to all his subjects at large." This is precisely the case with commissions and licenses. They are both grants. A commission grants the right to hold and discharge the duties of a certain office. A license grants authority to do a particular thing—in this case to carry on the coasting trade. They are both open letters addressed to everybody and under public seals.

If an original license were lost, could a copy from the record be evidence? Certainly not, without proof that the original was delivered, if such delivery be necessary to give it validity; yet such copy is, I believe, uniformly received in evidence without such proof of delivery.

Let us see the effect in the present case, of the doctrine that a license is invalid until delivered. It was not delivered until one month after it was executed. The bonds executed by the owners are conditional that the boat shall not, during the continuance of the license, be engaged in any trade whereby the revenue of the United States shall be defrauded, and shall not be used for any other vessel, or in any other employment than as specified in the license. They were not in force until the license took effect. If suit were brought for a breach during the month, the action would be defeated, by showing that the license had not been delivered. The license is granted for one year. If it have no validity until delivered, that would be considered its date, and it would run one month into the next year. If it commenced at its date, but yet was inoperative, it would be a license for eleven months only. The law requires that a record should be made of the licenses granted. This record would be false, if the license did not take effect for one month after being granted and recorded. The law also requires the licenses to be numbered, commencing with the year, and copies sent to the register of the treasury. Both the numbers and copies sent would be false if the license had no validity until delivered. If a suit were brought for running without a license after the expiration of a year from its date, it might be defeated by showing that the license commenced only from delivery, and the year from that time had not expired. The effect would be to falsify the record of the surveyor's office, and the records of the treasury department, and introduce confusion and uncertainty into all the public business relating to our commerce and navigation.

If, on the other hand, the hospital dues be not paid, the surveyor is not bound to grant the license; if, however, he should do so, he may, perhaps, become responsible for them, but the non-payment would not avoid the license, and the owners would still be held liable for them.

For the above reasons, the court orders and decrees that the libel be dismissed, the bond given by the owners canceled, and the informer pay costs up to the time when his name was stricken out as informer.

Case No. 16,054a.

UNITED STATES v. PLATT.

[1 Betts, D. C. MS. 9.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1840.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FRAUDULENT ENTRIES—FORFEITURES AND PERSONAL PENALTIES—REPEAL OF STATUTE—LIMITATIONS.

[1. Section 66 of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 677), which provides, as a punishment for making entries under fraudulent invoices, that the goods, "or the value thereof to be recovered of the person making entry," shall be forfeited, was not impliedly repealed, at least so far as concerns the personal penalty, by any of the subsequent acts, and is still (1840) in force.]

[2. An intent to evade the payment of duties is essential to the maintenance of a prosecution for the personal penalty, and failure to aver the scienter renders the declaration fatally defective on demurrer; but the plaintiff will be allowed to amend as a matter of course.]

[3. It is not necessary to aver that the goods were invoiced below their actual value, for the statute requires the invoice to be at the "actual cost," by which is meant the purchase price.]

[4. The statute leaves it to the government to elect whether it will proceed for the forfeiture of the goods or for the personal penalty, and there is no requirement that there should be an attempt to proceed in rem, before a personal action can be maintained.]

[5. The limitation of three years contained in section 89 of the act was repealed and superseded by section 3 of the act of 1804 (2 Stat. 290), which declares that any person incurring any fine or forfeiture, "under the revenue laws of the United States," may be punished within five years, "any law or provision to the contrary notwithstanding."]

B. F. Butler, for the United States.
F. Cutting, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. This is an action of debt, brought under the 66th section of the act of March 2, 1799, to recover the value of goods imported by the defendant [John Platt] as a forfeiture declared by that act. The declaration is in 41 counts, upon so many different importations and entries made by the defendant in this port at different periods between the first day of September, 1834, and the 20th of March, 1839. The averment in each count is in substance that the respective entries were made in conformity to invoices produced by the defendant to the officers of customs, and that the goods were invoiced below their actual cost at the place of exportation, with intent to evade the payment of duties thereon.

The action was commenced in September, 1839. The defendant pleads the general issue to all the counts, and the statute of limitations to all charging the entry to have been made more than three years previous to the commencement of this suit, to which plea the plaintiffs demur. A general demurrer is also interposed by the defendant to all the counts. The validity of the two latter pleadings is now the subject of inquiry.

The defendant's demurrer rests upon two grounds: (1) That the 66th section of the act of 1799 is repealed, and (2) that, if the section is in force, the declaration is defective in substance, and that the plaintiffs can claim no judgment under it against the defendant. The 66th section being the substratum of the action, the leading inquiry in the case will be whether that provision is now in force. The enacting clause directly applicable to this issue is "that if any goods, wares or merchandize of which entry shall have been made in the office of a collector, shall not be invoiced according to the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties thereupon, or any part thereof, all such goods, wares and merchandise, or the value thereof, to be recovered of the person making entry, shall be forfeited"; and the argument is that the provisions of various subsequent acts of congress (of 1818, c. 74, § 11 [3 Story's Laws, 1682; 3 Stat. 436]; of 1823, c. 147, §§ 13, 14 [3 Story's Laws, 1887; 3 Stat. 735, c. 21]; of 1828, c. 55, § 9 [4 Stat. 274]; of 1830, c. 147, § 4 [Id. 410]; and of 1832, c. 224, § 14),—by legal implication abrogate so much at least of the act of 1799 as subjects the importer to a personal penalty. These subsequent enactments have been carefully collated with the 66th section by Judge Hopkins in a recent case (U. S. v. 25 Cases of Cloth [Case No. 16,563]) and the conclusion to which he arrives is that the section remains in force even in respect to the forfeiture of the goods. If his reasoning is sound in respect to that branch of the section, it is of stronger force in regard to the personal penalty, because the subsequent enactments from which the repeal of the 66th section is sought to be deduced have all relation to the goods,—to the effect of a false valuation or invoice upon the importation itself. I do not feel called upon to weigh the very able reasoning of the judge upon the latter point, for even if his conclusion in that particular should be adopted here, or should be found not in correspondence with the decisions of this court or the circuit court of this circuit heretofore made on the same subject (and which might conclude this court), they would come clothed with impressive influence in elucidation of the other branch of the section, which has never been before brought in review in this court. No direct repeal of the 66th section is asserted, and the implication which it is supposed establishes such repeal is raised from after-enactments providing remedies and pointing out a course of procedure which it is asserted are inconsistent with the provisions of that section. Congress designates an alternative penalty for the offences created by the section,—i. e. the forfeiture of the goods, or the value thereof, to be recovered of the person making entry. These penalties are distinct and positive in their character, so that the modification or repeal of the one need not necessarily affect the validity and operation of the other. No one would contend, if congress at the next session had repealed the personal penalty, that the forfeiture of the goods was also abrogated as a necessary incident. So even of criminal offences, made punishable by fine or imprisonment, an after-act, withdrawing imprisonment or modifying the fine, is not regarded as affecting the other branch of the punishment.

These principles show that to derive a repeal of such alternative penalties by implication from subsequent provisions of law, those after-enactments must have relation to both branches of the penalty or the offence itself, upon which they are founded. The most careful examination of the acts subsequently passed has not enabled me to discern any provision having a necessary application to this personal penalty, or the basis on which it is founded. The goods are made subject to various processes of interpretation, to enhanced valuation and imports, and the party importing them to an examination on oath, but in every instance for the purpose of ascertaining whether the duties should not be increased beyond the amount payable upon the invoice or entry, or whether the goods themselves should not be forfeited. Every enactment points to the representation of the importer at the custom house, whether by invoice or entry, as a cardinal fact, conducing to fix the fate of the goods, either to be subjected to increased duties or to confiscation. The invoice is in no statute thrown out of view.

It is made an essential part of the importer's vouchers, and must be verified by solemn oath, and, if not received with the goods, the party making the entry must swear he will produce it to the custom house whenever it comes to hand. The clear intent of congress, manifested in every import act, to hold the importer bound to exhibit a true invoice of his goods, and making the invoice a basis for entry or appraisement of the goods, supplies also a strong intendment that every section provided for securing the integrity of the instrument is to be continued and enforced. Congress might be induced from many considerations of policy or conveniency to waive the confiscation of goods because entered below their value, and be content with full duties thereon; but it is not to be inferred that such payment of duties would be regarded as expiating so gross a violence to the laws and the rights of the honest merchant, as making out and presenting a false invoice of goods with design to evade the payment of duties. To imply the repeal of a sanction thus fastened upon the party making the entry because a co-ordinate penalty attached to the goods so entered was modified or withdrawn would be giving an effect to such after-legislation more serious and broad than is recognized in any case cited on the argument which the court can discover. The judgment of the court in U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils [Case No. 15,924], on the 76th section, lays down principles in this respect as favorable to the defendant as any other decision of equally high authority, and the criterion pointed out by that decision is that the provisions of two acts upon the same subject-matter must be so differing that both cannot be carried into execution, in order to render the latter a repeal by implication of the former; and, applying that doctrine to this case, it is most manifest that no incompatibility or incongruity between the provision of the 66th section now under examination and any subsequent enactments interferes with its application or enforcement. I am accordingly of opinion that the personal penalty created by that section is now in force; and, the right of action therefore subsisting to the United States, the remaining considerations are whether it has been properly put in prosecution in respect to the form of proceeding and the period within which the action is brought. The objections to the structure of the declaration are that it does not aver the scienter of the defendant, or any mala fide intent on his part; that it does not aver the goods were invoiced below their actual value; nor that the collector had parted with possession of the goods when this suit was instituted.

The averments are so framed as to embody the provisions of the statute nearly in terms, and, though the general rule in pleading is that it is enough to follow the words of an act in setting out a cause of action or ground of defence (15 Johns. 188), yet in actions on penal statutes it is also a cardinal rule that every fact must be averred bringing the case within the intent of the act, and which is requisite to the support of the action. Com. Dig. "Action on Statute" (A, 3); Id., "Pleader" (C, 76); Goodwin v. U. S. [Case No. 5,554]. What circumstances, then, subject the party making an entry to a personal action for the penalty? The inverted form of expression used in the act may raise a doubt whether it does not look to the false invoice as the gist of the offence, and, when that is so constructed with design to evade the payment of duties, hold the goods entered or the party entering them subject to the penalty, without carrying forward the consideration of intent to the act of entry. It is certainly a familiar course of legislation to subject property to forfeiture in revenue cases, without regard to criminal participation of the owner in the act producing the forfeiture. The case before cited (U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils [Case No. 15,924]), is an instance of that mode of legislation; and there would therefore be no singularity in rendering the forfeiture of goods under the 66th section dependent upon the false invoicing, and a proceeding against goods might therefore be probably sustained without charging the owner with any fraudulent purpose himself, or knowledge of fraud in the act of his agents abroad. Does the act demand such construction when the action is against a party individually for the penalty? I have not been able to find any instance in the penal legislation of congress in respect to the revenue, which raises an offence against an individual and renders him punishable therefor where his criminal knowledge or intent is not made a cardinal ingredient: and I find that Judge Washington reads this section in the same sense.

In an action precisely similar to this, that judge decided that the offence in relation to the party was "the making of an entry upon an invoice below the actual cost with design to evade the duties," and held that the declaration was defective in substance for not containing an averment of such intent.

I think the language of the act will bear this interpretation and that even a construction more forced than that requires, might be sanctioned, to avoid the egregious injustice of subjecting a person to punishment for the fraudulent acts of another not charged to be known to or adopted by him. The declaration in this case charges that the defendant made entry, &c., and that the goods were invoiced in the invoice produced by the defendant in making the entry below their actual cost, with design to evade the duties. It does not aver that he made the invoice or participated in its preparation, and the penalty is demanded because of such entry, and for no other reason. The scienter or intent is no part of the gravamen alleged against the defendant otherwise than in so far as he may by intendment of law stand chargeable with the fraudulent purposes of the one who invoiced the goods. The frame of the sentence is such as to admit without violence to the language the term "with design" to be applied distributively to the acts indicated and preceding it,—the one, that of invoicing the goods; the other, that of making the entry,—and it seems to me that the court is compelled to adopt such construction as it is at war with first principles to subject a party personally to the operation of punitive laws, who acts without a design to do wrong or knowledge of any transgression. It is therefore indispensable to the maintenance of a prosecution in personam for the penalty that the declaration should aver that the entry was made with design to evade the payment of duties. This defect is one of substance, and is fatal on general demurrer, or might be taken advantage of by writ of error. It is competent, however, to this court to permit an amendment of the declaration, and that will be allowed almost as matter of course, if there are not other objections which bar the action entirely.

The second objection, that the declaration does not aver that the goods were invoiced below their true value, cannot prevail. The uncertainty that rested on the construction of this part of the act of 1799, and which led to differing decisions before two eminent circuit courts (U. S. v. Sixteen Packages of Goods [Case No. 16,303], Goodwin v. U. S. [supra]) was fully removed by the decision of the supreme court. [U. S. v. Amedy] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 410. Actual costs in the 66th section must be understood to import the purchase price, and an averment that the goods were invoiced below cost does not give place for the implication that they might be notwithstanding invoiced at the market value or to any other uncertainty. The declaration, therefore, by using the language of the statute, has made the charge with all the requisite precision and certainty, and it becomes matter of proof under that averment whether the invoice represents the true purchase price.

The third general objection to the sufficiency of the declaration is that there is no averment that the goods were not remaining in the hands of the collector when the suit was instituted. This objection rests upon the supposition that the present action is allowed only in case the one in rem cannot be pursued. It is very clear that these penalties are not cumulative, and, if one has been enforced, that would be a full bar to a suit for the others, by whichever mode of procedure the penalty was first recovered. But there is nothing in the statute indicating a priority of resort to the goods. Manifestly, an exception to an information against the goods that no suit had been brought for the personal penalty would be nugatory and inapt, and there is upon the statute no authority for demanding that the first proceeding shall be against the goods which would not equally require it against the person. The election is left uncontrolled to the government to adopt either remedy, and it is by no means a legal certainty that the greatest advantage would always result from forfeiting the goods. Especially if the value to be recovered of the person making entry is the value abroad, it might well happen that would largely exceed the saleable products of the goods where condemned; but, without regard to the consideration which remedy might be the most beneficial, it is sufficient upon the point to observe that the law has left an election to the government in that behalf, which the court is clothed with no power to counteract or limit. "All such goods, &c., or the value thereof, shall be forfeited," is the penalty demanded by the act and given to the government, and either may be prosecuted and recovered to the omission of the other. This is so upon the well-established principle that any one of various remedies may be employed where either will enforce the right or obtain the satisfaction to which the party is entitled. 1 Dane, Abr. 5; Smith v. U. S. [Case No. 13,122]. The penalty created by the act might be sued for by the common-law information or the ordinary action of debt. 1 Dane, Abr. 5; Ex parte Marquand [Case No. 9,100]; Bullard v. Bell [Id. 2,121]; The Nancy [Id. 10,008]; Adams v. Woods, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336. Debt being the form of suit, will not vary the application of the statute of limitations, for that has relation to the offence itself, and not to the mode by which it is prosecuted. Id.

The defendant contends that the 89th section of the act of March 2, 1799, limiting actions for penalties under that act to three years, applies to this case, and bars all suits on entries made more than 3 yrs. before the commencement thereof. The argument for the United States is that the act of March 26, 1804, § 3, enlarges the limitation to five years. The two clauses collated read as follows: "That no action or prosecution shall be maintained in any case under this act, unless the same shall have been commenced within three years next after the penalty of (qu. or) forfeiture was incurred." Act 1799; 3 Bior. & D. Laws, p. 222, § 89 [1 Stat. 696], "That any person or persons guilty of any crime arising under the revenue laws of the United States, or incurring any fine or forfeiture by breaches of the said laws, may be prosecuted, tried and punished provided the indictment or information be found at any time within five years after committing the offence or incurring the fine or forfeiture, any law or provision to the contrary notwithstanding. Act 1804; 3 Bior. & D. Laws, p. 611, § 3 [2 Stat. 290]. This latter section is included in an act entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,'" and being passed in express relation to the act of 1790, the terms common to both acts are to be understood in the same sense. By comparing the two sections, it will be perceived that the act of 1804 has transcribed in substance that of 1790, with some slight inversion of the members of the section. The language applicable to the present inquiry is, "nor shall any person be prosecuted, tried or punished for any offence not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall be found or instituted within two years from the time of committing the offence or incurring the fine or forfeiture aforesaid." 2 Bior. & D. Laws, p. 99, § 31 [1 Stat. 119]. The case of Adams v. Woods, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336, before cited, was an action of debt for a penalty given by the act of March 22, 1794. The defendant plead in bar the above limitation of the act of 1790. The attorney general demurred, and placed his objection to the plea principally upon the point that the limitation had reference to crimes, or to prosecutions conducted in a criminal form, by indictment or information, and did not apply to actions of debt.

The court, after consideration, decided that the act applied to every prosecution, trial or punishment, and was not limited to any particular mode of proceeding, and accordingly embraced the action of debt as well as informations, because almost every fine or forfeiture under penal statutes may be recovered indifferently in either form of suit. That therefore the act is not pleadable in bar of the particular action, but of the offence. The same interpretation must be given to the act of 1804. It cannot be restricted to the form of proceeding, but applies to the subject-matter. The party is exempt from the penalty after the limitation has attached, but it may be demanded against him by debt or information within that period. But it is urged that this case does not fall within the provision of the act of 1804, the penalties created by the act of 1799 having a special limitation affixed to them by that statute; and the provision in the act of 1804, being in pari materia with that of 1790, should be construed as having relation only to the cases governed by the limitation of that act; and the act of February 28, 1839 (9 Bior & D. Laws, p. 963, § 4 [5 Stat. 322]), is referred to as supporting the argument. This latter statute, it is admitted by the district attorney cannot supply the rule of limitation to the cases embraced within the pleadings, having been passed subsequetly to the expiration of the three years set up as a bar in those cases; but it is supposed to indicate the understanding of congress at the time that the laws then existing did not reach the cases provided for by it. There seems but feeble ground for this implication, nor, if it could be fairly raised, would it outweigh the direct adjudication of the supreme court in determining the import and operation of the antecedent laws. It is unnecessary to speculate upon the effect of a positive declaration by congress, in determining the meaning or application of a statute antecedent to such declaration, but this court would never attach to a mere inference or implication consequences outweighing the express decision of the supreme court upon the very subject. The act of 1839 may very properly be considered corresponding with that of 1790 as construed by the supreme court, and only extending the period of limitation from two to five years to that class of cases, and in this view of the operation it can afford no aid to the defendant in the interpretation he claims for the acts of 1799 and 1804. The argument must then rest exclusively upon the force and extent of the language used in the act of 1804, and whether it comprehends the cases provided for specifically by the act of 1799, or it is to receive such interpretation as to leave the latter in full operation. In its terms it applies to every fine and forfeiture incurred by breach of the revenue laws, and would indisputably embrace the penalties under the act of 1799, if no provision respecting them had been inserted in that act. The whole inquiry, then, is resolvable into this position: whether a subsequent statute does not necessarily repeal an antecedent one upon the same subject-matter, when the provisions of both cannot be executed. This point, it appears to me, is too firmly settled as a rule of construction to require any elucidation or discussion. The case U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils [supra], settles the principle at least for this court.

I am accordingly of opinion that the plea is bad in setting up the limitation of the act of 1799 as the bar in this case, and that the suit is to be governed in this particular by the act of 1804.

Judgment. Ordered, judgment for the defendant upon the demurrer as to so much of the plaintiffs' declaration as charges the offence against the defendant without also alleging that it was committed with intent or design to evade the payment of duties, &c., with leave to the plaintiffs to amend their declaration in this behalf within ten days after the rendering of this judgment. Ordered, judgment for the plaintiffs on the demurrer to the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations, and also on all the causes of demurrer alleged by the defendant against the plaintiffs' declaration other than the one above specified. And it is further ordered that the defendant have leave to plead over within ten days after the rendering of this judgment, and that the taxable costs of the defendant on the judgment in his favor be allowed and deducted from the costs taxed in favor of the plaintiffs on the judgment in their favor.

Case No. 16,055.

UNITED STATES v. PLUMER.

[3 Cliff. 1.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. July 2, 1859.

SUPREME COURT—JURISDICTION IN CRIMINAL CASES.

A writ of error does not lie from the supreme court to the circuit court in a criminal case.

[Cited in Sanders v. State, 85 Ind. 326.]

This was a petition for the allowance of a writ of error in a capital case, and for stay of execution until a hearing could be had in the supreme court, on the alleged errors. Plumer, with three others, had been indicted, tried, and convicted in the circuit court, Massachusetts district, and sentenced to be executed.

The material facts of the record were as follows:

United States of America.

Circuit Court of the United States of America, for the District of Massachusetts.

At a circuit court of the United States of America, for the district of Massachusetts, begun and holden at Boston, within and for said district, on the 15th of October, A. D. 1858.

Before the Honorable Nathan Clifford, Associate Justice, and the Honorable Peleg Sprague, District Judge. . . . .

(Here follows the indictment.)

The record then proceeds as follows, namely:

At this present October term of this court, A. D. 1858, said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, were severally set to the bar, and had this indictment read to them; and thereupon they severally said that thereof they were not guilty; and thereof for trial put themselves upon God and their country; and Benjamin F. Butler and Charles P. Chandler were assigned by the court as counsel for said Plumer; F. F. Heard and F. W. Pelton were assigned as counsel for said Carther; Thornton K. Lothrop and J. Q. Adams were assigned as counsel for said Herbert; and J. Hardy Prince and Samuel M. Quincy were assigned as counsel for said Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard; and said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, severally acknowledged that they had severally received a copy of the indictment, and a list of the jurors, agreeably to law, and more than two days before the date of their trial.

A jury was thereupon impanelled and sworn to try the issue, namely, John B. Chisholm, foreman, and fellows, namely, Willard Bacon, Daniel C. Bates, Lemuel Grant, Charles Humphrey, Asher Joslin, Charles B. W. Lane, Benjamin Norris, Hiel J. Nelson, William Parker, William Tinker, and Amasa Whiting, all of said district.

And the said jury afterwards returned their verdict that said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, is guilty of murder as alleged in said indictment; and William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, are severally guilty of manslaughter; and thereupon said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, by his counsel, moves the court for a new trial, as follows:

(Here follows the motion for a new trial; also the motion in arrest of judgment.)

The record then proceeds as follows, namely:

Time was allowed by the court for preparation of counsel therein, and the said motions were set down for hearing. And afterwards, at the same term, the counsel of said Plumer moved the court for leave to withdraw the said motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment. And said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, having been brought into court, and being inquired of personally, asks that such leave may be granted and that the said motions may be withdrawn. Whereupon the court did grant him leave to withdraw the said motions, and the same were accordingly waived and withdrawn by said Plumer; said Plumer was then asked if he had anything to say why judgment of death should not then be pronounced against him. And having replied thereto fully, and no good cause appearing to the contrary, and all matters in the case having been fully heard and understood by the court, it is considered by the court that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, be deemed guilty of felony, and that he, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, be taken back to the place from whence he came, and there remain in close confinement until Friday, the 24th of June next; and on that day, between the hours of eleven o'clock in the forenoon and one o'clock in the afternoon, he, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, be taken thence to the place of execution, and that he be there hanged by the neck until he be dead.

The Petition.

United States of America.

Circuit Court of the United States of America, for the District of Massachusetts.

To the Honorable Nathan Clifford, one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, sitting within and for the District of Massachusetts.

Cyrus W. Plumer now imprisoned in the district aforesaid, under sentence of death on a judgment, warrant, process, and proceeding of the said circuit court of the United States of America, for the district of Massachusetts, says that there is manifest error in the process, proceedings, premises, and judgment, and feeling aggrieved thereby, assigns as errors in said record, process, and proceeding the errors named and set forth in the paper hereunto annexed, marked "Assignment of Errors."

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The said Cyrus W. Plumer, plaintiff in error, begs the court to certify the errors in said assignment named and set forth, and that he may have leave to enter the same in the supreme court of the United States at the next December term of said supreme court, and that execution and all proceedings in said case, and in the premises, may be stayed until a hearing is had in said court on said assignment of errors.

Cyrus W. Plumer.

Boston, June 30, 1859.

Assignment of Errors:

United States of America.

Circuit Court of the United States of America, for the District of Massachusetts.

Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, Plaintiff in Error, v. The United States of America, Defendant in Error.

And now, to wit, on the 30th of June, A. D. 1859, cometh the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in his proper person, who is now imprisoned in the district of Massachusetts, under sentence of death, on a judgment, warrant, process, and proceeding of the said circuit court of the United States of America, for the district of Massachusetts, and immediately saith that in the record and process aforesaid, and also in the giving of the judgment aforesaid, against him the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, there is manifest error in these, to wit:

1. That in and by said indictment and record, there is no sufficient averment that the circuit court in which said indictment was returned and heard, had jurisdiction of the offence therein supposed to be charged.

2. That in and by said indictment and record, there is no sufficient averment that the person therein supposed to be injured was within, or under the protection of or jurisdiction of, the United States, or in the peace thereof.

3. That in and by said record it nowhere appears, or is set forth, that said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, was informed of, or permitted to exercise, or did exercise, his constitutional right of challenge of the jurors returned for his trial.

4. That in and by said record it nowhere appears or is set forth that said Plumer was present, either at the impanelling of the jury that tried him, or at the time said trial was had, or said verdict was rendered against him.

5. That in and by said record it nowhere appears that said Plumer was permitted to be heard by said jury so impanelled, either by himself or his counsel; and that in truth and in fact said Plumer was not permitted to address the jury in his own proper person.

6. That said verdict of guilty was rendered upon all the counts of said indictment, while one or more of said counts are defective and insufficient in law to support any judgment.

7. That it nowhere appears in and by said record of what (if any) felony said Plumer was adjudged guilty.

8. That it nowhere appears by said record of what "felony" the court "deemed" or adjudged the said Plumer to be "guilty."

9. That it nowhere appears by said record for what "felony" said Plumer was sentenced to suffer death.

10. That it nowhere appears in and by said record that Plumer received sentence of death for the particular murder of which the jury had found him guilty; but only for "felony" indefinitely, the particular felony not being described or in any manner designated.

11. That the verdict is repugnant to the general averment and clause in the indictment giving the court jurisdiction.

12. That said indictment does not appear to be signed by the foreman of the grand jury.

13. That it does not appear that the verdict of said jury was rendered in open court, and in the presence of the defendant.

14. That said record is in other respects informal, insufficient, erroneous, and the judgment thereon void and of no effect.

15. That by the said record it appears that judgment upon the indictment aforesaid was given against him, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in form aforesaid, whereas judgment by the said circuit court of the United States ought to have been given for the said Plumer that he be thereof acquitted and go thereupon without day. Therefore in that there is manifest error.

And the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, prays that the said judgment aforesaid, for the errors being in the record and process aforesaid, may be reversed and annulled, and absolutely be had for nothing, and that he may be restored to the common law of this land, and to all things which he hath lost on the present occasion.

Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer.

Boston, June 30, 1859.

Benjamin F. Butler, Geo. W. Searle, and F. F. Heard, for petitioner.

C. L. Woodbury, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Milton Andros, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Searle's argument:

The first proposition we attempt to maintain is this, that, as the acts of congress now stand, the supreme court is constitutionally bound to take appellate jurisdiction, in all cases whatsoever, both civil and criminal, arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, except where it has original jurisdiction, and that the decision of the supreme court (U. S. v. Moore, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 159), repudiating appellate jurisdiction in all cases, except where congress had specially granted it, was erroneous.

In other words, we attempt to maintain that the existing acts of congress, if rightly interpreted, make no "exceptions" whatever to the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court, as conferred by the constitution; and that it is only by false interpretations, that those acts have ever been held to exclude from the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court any case whatever, civil or criminal, arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, and not included in the original jurisdiction of that court.

This proposition, we claim, is established by the following arguments:—

1st. The entire jurisdiction, both original and appellate, of the supreme court of the United States is conferred by the constitution itself, and not by act of congress. Const. art. 3, § 2.

The language of the constitution on this point is:—

1. "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States," etc., etc.

2. "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the congress shall make."

2d. The supreme court itself has acknowledged that at least its original jurisdiction was conferred by the constitution itself, and not by act of congress. Thus they say:—

"Of all the courts which the United States may, under their general powers, constitute, one only, the supreme court, possesses (an original) jurisdiction derived immediately from the constitution, and of which the legislative power cannot deprive it. All other courts created by the general government possess no jurisdiction but what is given them by the power (congress) that creates them." U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32.

Here the court asserts that at least its original jurisdiction is derived immediately from the constitution. Yet its appellate jurisdiction is just as clearly conferred by the constitution as its original jurisdiction, as the clauses quoted from the constitution show.

The only difference in the two cases is this, that congress is authorized, if it see fit, to make "exceptions" and "regulations" as to the appellate jurisdiction, but have no such power in regard to the original jurisdiction.

Until "exceptions" are made by congress to the appellate jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, that jurisdiction includes all cases whatsoever, civil and criminal, arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, etc., except such as are included in the original jurisdiction.

The point we contend for is, that congress has no power whatever affirmatively to confer appellate jurisdiction on the supreme court. It only has a discretionary power to "make exceptions" to the general appellate jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, and also to "make regulations" by which this general appellate jurisdiction shall be exercised.

The supreme court itself virtually acknowledges this proposition. U. S. v. Moore, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 159.

Now we say that inasmuch as a general appellate jurisdiction in all cases, etc., whatsoever, except where the supreme court has original jurisdiction, is affirmatively conferred by the constitution itself; and inasmuch as congress has no power at all (on this precise point of the courts having appellate jurisdiction), save to "make exceptions" to this general appellate jurisdiction conferred by the constitution; and inasmuch also as all such "exceptions" are against equality and right, and adverse to the ascertainment of truth and the accomplishment of justice, and also adverse to uniformity and certainty in the law, all such "exceptions" must be expressly and affirmatively made. They cannot be implied from any acts of congress whatever, much less can they be implied negatively or unnecessarily from any acts of congress.

We now say further that congress has never expressly and affirmatively made any "exceptions" whatever to the general appellate jurisdiction conferred upon the supreme court by the constitution. The supreme court itself makes no pretence that any such "exceptions" have been expressly and affirmatively made by any act of congress.

All that congress has done is this: it has passed acts purporting affirmatively to confer upon the supreme court appellate jurisdiction in certain cases where the same jurisdiction had been previously conferred by the constitution.

All such grants by congress, of a jurisdiction already conferred by the constitution, and already possessed by the court, are obviously gratuitous, extra-constitutional, and void, since (it may be repeated) congress has no power to confer any appellate jurisdiction at all, but only to "make exceptions" to the appellate jurisdiction conferred by the constitution.

And yet, from these gratuitous, extra-constitutional, and void grants by congress of an appellate jurisdiction (already conferred by the constitution itself, and already possessed by the court) in certain cases, the court has implied, and that too, negatively and unnecessarily, an "exception" to, or denial of, the appellate jurisdiction conferred by the constitution in all other cases.

And this negative and unnecessary implication from these gratuitous, extra-constitutional, and void grants by congress of an appellate jurisdiction in certain cases, constitutes the only ground on which the court now repudiates the appellate jurisdiction conferred upon it by the constitution in all other cases. U. S. v. Moore, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 159.

Now we insist that the appellate jurisdiction conferred upon the supreme court by the constitution itself—a jurisdiction so important, not merely to uniformity and certainty in the law, but also to equality, truth, justice, and right—cannot be taken away by any such negative and unnecessary implication, from extra-constitutional and void acts of congress; but that it can be taken away only by constitutional and valid acts of congress specially and affirmatively "making exceptions" to the general appellate jurisdiction conferred by the constitution.

But let us see what is the argument of the court in favor of this implication. We give their opinion entire:

Marshall, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

"This is an indictment against the defendant for taking fees, under color of his office, as a justice of the peace, in the District of Columbia.

"A doubt has been suggested respecting the jurisdiction of this court, in appeals on writs of error, from the judgments of the circuit court for that District, in criminal cases; and this question is to be decided before the court can inquire into the merits of the case.

"In support of the jurisdiction of this court, the attorney general has adverted to the words of the constitution, from which he seemed to argue that as criminal jurisdiction was exercised by the courts of the United States, under the description of 'all cases' in law and equity, arising under the laws of the United States, and as the appellate jurisdiction of this court was extended to all enumerated cases, other than those which might be brought on 'originally,' 'with such exceptions and under such regulations, as the congress shall make,' that the supreme court possessed appellate jurisdiction in criminal as well as civil cases, over the judgments of every court, whose decisions it would review, unless there should be some one exception or regulation made by congress, which should circumscribe the jurisdiction conferred by the constitution.

"This argument would be unanswerable, if the supreme court had been created by law, without describing its jurisdiction. The constitution would then have been the only standard by which its powers could be tested, since there would be clearly no congressional regulation or exception on the subject.

"But as the jurisdiction of the court has been described, it has been regulated by congress, and an affirmative description of its powers must be understood as a regulation, under the constitution, prohibiting the exercise of other powers than those described.

"Thus the appellate jurisdiction of this court, from the judgments of the circuit courts, is described affirmatively. No restrictive words are used. Yet it has never been supposed that a decision of a circuit court could be reviewed, unless the matter in dispute should exceed the value of $2,000. There are no words in the act restraining the supreme court from taking cognizance of causes under that sum; their jurisdiction is only limited by the legislative declaration, that they may re-examine the decisions of the circuit courts, when the matter in dispute exceeds the value of $2,000.

"The court, therefore, will only review those judgments of the circuit court of Columbia, a power to re-examine which is expressly given by law (act of congress). On examining the act 'concerning the District of Columbia,' the court is of opinion that the appellate jurisdiction granted by that act is confined to civil cases.

"The words 'matter in dispute' seem appropriated to civil cases, where the subject in contest has a value beyond the sum mentioned in the act. But in criminal cases, the question is the guilt or innocence of the accused. And although he may be fined upwards of $100, yet that is, in the eye of the law, a punishment for the offence committed, and not the particular object of the suit. The writ of error, therefore, is to be dismissed, this court having no jurisdiction of the case." U. S. v. Moore, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 159.

This argument of the court has two palpable fallacies, inconsistent with each other, yet either of them sufficient to defeat the conclusion arrived at. The court attempt to blend these two fallacies. Or rather, they fly from one to the other, as occasion requires, as if to avoid being caught in either. The fallacies are these:—

1. One part of their argument seems to assume that the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court is derived from the act of congress, instead of the constitution; and that the court can therefore have no appellate jurisdiction, except what the act of congress confers. Whereas the truth is that its appellate, like its original jurisdiction, is derived wholly from the constitution, and not at all from the act of congress; and consequently exists in all cases enumerated in the constitution, unless congress have "made exceptions," or taken it away in specific cases.

2. Another part of their argument seems to assume that their appellate jurisdiction is derived from the constitution; and that it therefore necessarily exists in all cases enumerated in the constitution, unless congress have "made exceptions" thereto. So far well. But they then proceed to say that, congress having affirmatively described this appellate jurisdiction in civil suits, where "the matter in dispute exceeds the value of $2,000," this simple "affirmative description" of the jurisdiction in those cases "must be understood as a regulation under the constitution prohibiting" the appeal, not only in all civil suits for a less sum than $2,000, but also in all criminal cases whatsoever.

How monstrous this reasoning and conclusion are will be seen when it is considered that the "exceptions" and "regulations" which congress are authorized to make in regard to the appellate jurisdiction of that court are two wholly different things, and have wholly different objects in view. The object of the "exceptions" is to declare that the class of cases included in them shall not be appealed at all.

The object of the "regulations" is to prescribe the conditions under which, and provide the means by which, another class of cases may be appealed. There is, therefore, no analogy whatever between the "exceptions" and the "regulations" which congress are authorized to make. And yet the court have confounded the two; and solely on this confusion of the two they base their decision, withholding the appeal.

The language of the constitution is perfectly clear, as follows: "In all the other cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the congress shall make."

It is here plain that the words "exceptions" and "regulations" mean two different things, because the sole object of the "exceptions" (nobody can doubt) is to particularize what cases shall not be appealed, whereas the "regulations" relate only to those cases that are to be appealed. This is certain, since it is "under" the "regulations" that cases are to be appealed.

Now contrast the language of the court with this clear language of the constitution. Thus the court say: "But as the jurisdiction of the court has been described, it has been regulated by congress, and an affirmative description of its powers must be understood as a 'regulation' under the constitution, prohibiting the exercise of other powers than those described."

Here the court ignore altogether the word "exceptions," as used in the constitution, and then assume that it is by "regulations" that certain cases are to be excluded from appeal. Whereas the language of the constitution is explicit, to wit, that it is by "exceptions" alone that cases are to be excluded from appeal, and that it is "under" (that is, in conformity with, or by means of) "regulations" that other cases are to be appealed.

Suppose the words "with such exceptions" had been left out of the constitution, and that the clause had read (as it then would have done) thus: "In all the other cases before mentioned the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, under such regulations as the congress shall make."

Would congress then have been authorized to "except" any of the cases enumerated by the constitution itself from the appellate jurisdiction of the court? Plainly not. They would only have been authorized to make "regulations" "under" which all the cases enumerated by the constitution might be appealed.

If the words "exceptions" and "regulations," in this clause, had meant the same thing, the language of the constitution would not only have been tautological, but the powers granted to congress would have been widely different from what they are now. If, for example, the two words "exceptions" and "regulations" were to be held to mean the same thing, they must both be held to mean either "exceptions" or "regulations," for they could not mean the same thing, and yet mean both of these two different things. If then, the two words "exceptions" and "regulations" were held to mean only "exceptions," congress would have simply had the power to say that certain cases should not be appealed at all. They would have had no power to prescribe any "regulations" whatever, "under" which cases should be appealed. On the other hand, if the two words were to be held to mean only "regulations," then congress would have had no power to "make exceptions" of or to prohibit the appeal of any cases whatever. They could only have prescribed "regulations" "under" which all cases whatever might be appealed. But now, by giving different meanings to these two different words, congress gets two different powers, to wit, first, the power to forbid the appeal of certain cases; and, second, the power to prescribe the "regulations" "under" which all other cases may be appealed.

It being thus established that the words "exceptions" and "regulations," as used in this clause of the constitution, mean two wholly different things, and grant to congress two wholly different powers, there is left no foundation whatever for the decision of the court, that the regulations prescribed by congress, "under" which certain cases are to be appealed, must be considered as "exceptions" prohibiting the appeal of all other cases. These "regulations" apply only to the particular cases to which they purport to apply; and they leave all other cases to stand just as they would have done if the "regulations" had not been made.

These "regulations" governing the appeal in civil suits, where the matter in dispute exceeds $2,000, cannot legally be construed into "exceptions" prohibiting the appeal even of other civil suits, where less amounts are involved. Still less can they be construed into "exceptions" prohibiting appeals in criminal cases, which are not mentioned, and where not money, but life, liberty, and character are in issue. Such a construction would not only be legally absurd, it would be morally atrocious.

To hold that a regulation prescribing the mode of appeal in a civil suit where $2,000 are at stake, shall, by implication, be deemed a prohibition upon any appeal in a criminal case, where one's life is at stake, would be an interpretation of law as ludicrous and grotesque as it would be brutal and inhuman. It is a maxim of universal application, that all interpretations are to lean to life and liberty. And neither the supreme court, nor any other decent court, has any excuse for disregarding, or for pretending ignorance of this maxim. And nothing, it would seem, but deliberate corruption would induce them to disregard it in this case.

If it be asked, what could have been the motive of congress in providing "regulations" under which the appeal of civil cases, where the amount involved exceeds $2,000, is to be made, unless it were to exclude all other cases from the right of appeal? One answer is, that we have nothing to do with the private motives of congress, but only with the legal effect of their enactments, the intentions they have legally conveyed. Another answer is, that it is presumable that congress may have thought some special "regulations" would be useful or proper in those cases, which would not be useful or proper in other cases.

But perhaps it will be asked, how can any case be appealed, except congress have first made "regulations" for its appeal? The answer is, that there are writs and forms of proceeding well known to the law, by which a superior court reviews the decisions of inferior courts; and the judiciary act of 1789, § 14 [1 Stat. 81], enacts: "That all the before-mentioned courts of the United States (including the supreme court) shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law."

This provision alone would be ample to enable the supreme court to take appellate jurisdiction in all cases tried in subordinate courts. In addition to all this, the fifth amendment to the constitution provides that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

It would seem that no narrower interpretation could possibly be given to this provision, than that it secures to a defendant, in a criminal case, all processes known to the common law, and appropriate to his case. It includes, for example, trial by jury. No one will deny this. But it also as much secures all other common-law forms of proceeding, as it does this one of trial by jury.

This amendment is subsequent in date to the constitution, and annuls any part of that instrument that is inconsistent with it. It may be reasonably questioned, therefore, whether this amendment does not absolutely annul that portion of the constitution which gave congress any discretionary power whatever to withhold the right of appeal in any criminal case whatever. At any rate, it is clearly sufficient to condemn all such absurd and preposterous implications as that on which alone the supreme court have hitherto refused to take appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases.

There is something marvelous in the obstinacy with which the supreme court have refused to take this appellate jurisdiction in defiance of a plain mandate of the constitution itself, and in obedience only to an unnecessary implication drawn from an act of congress, which (in so far as it purports to grant what had been already granted by the constitution, appellate jurisdiction in any case) is gratuitous, extra-constitutional, inoperative, and, legally speaking, an entire nullity; and which, therefore, gives no color of authority for such an implication.

Mr. Heard's argument:

Mr. Heard followed upon the errors assigned, and commenced upon the thirteenth error, as follows: "13. That it does not appear that the verdict of said jury was rendered in open court, and in the presence of the prisoner." He cited Archb. Cr. Pl. (13th Ed.) 146, and contended that it must appear on the record that the verdict was rendered in open court and in the presence of the prisoner, and that in this the record was insufficient.

He next took up the twelfth error assigned, namely, "12. That said indictment does not appear to be signed by the foreman of the grand jury," which he contended was necessary, though no authority was found for this point at common law. Eleventh error. "That the verdict is repugnant to the general averment and clause in the indictment giving the court jurisdiction."

The clause referred to is made up of the last four lines in the body of the indictment, namely, "And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the district of Massachusetts is the district into which said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, were first brought after committing the aforesaid 'offence.'"

This point was argued at length, and the leading case in England was cited in its support. O'Connell v. Reg., 11 Clark & F. 155; also, Holloway v. Reg., 2 Denison, Crown Cas. 287. Mr. Heard contended that the letter "s" saved O'Connell, and that the principle applied in that case applies to the case at bar. He also contended that the word "offence" should have been in the plural, inasmuch as the several prisoners were indicted for several offences, as murder, manslaughter, etc.

The errors assigned from the seventh to the tenth, inclusive, were then considered, which are in substance, that it nowhere appears of what felony, if any, Plumer was "adjudged" guilty, or "deemed or adjudged guilty"; or for "what felony he suffered sentence of death"; or that he was sentenced to death for the particular murder of which he was found guilty by the jury. Whart. Cr. Law (2d Ed.) 151.

The second error assigned was then considered, which was that there was no sufficient averment that the person alleged to be injured was under the protection or within the jurisdiction of the United States. Under the general assignment of other errors and informalities in the record, the counsel raised the point that the action of the court was improperly put in the past tense, while he contended that it should have been put in the present tense, that the action of the parties might be in the past or present; reading from Gabbett (volume 2, p. 563), who also cited, in support of this point, Rex v. Perin, 2 Saund. 393 (6th Ed.). He also cited the case of U. S. v. Bird [Case No. 14,597], in support of another error, that no averment of issue joined appeared upon the record, and read also from Archbold in support of the same objection.

Again, under the general assignment, that it did not appear of what jury a list was acknowledged to be received by the prisoners "more than two days before the day of the trial." The record of U. S. v. Bird [supra] was cited as being correct on this point. It was also stated this case was the first under the crimes act of 1790.

Mr. Butler's argument:

Mr. Butler then addressed the court upon the general question whether a writ of error would lie in a criminal case to the supreme court. He said that if the errors assigned seemed mostly verbal and immaterial, there was no situation in which a man might better be excused for criticising such errors than one where he was contending for his life. He knew of nothing better calculated to fit any person for a full and fair examination of this case, than reading the opinion of Lord Mansfield in the Case of Wilkes [4 Burrows, 2527]. In the sparsity of writs of error in the circuit court of the United States, a degree of inaccuracy had crept into their records.

He said he referred to the originals of our laws on crimes which were to be found in the common law of England, and remarked that our laws had been modified by statutes and conformed to the institutions of our country. He said that the laws of the United States recognized two kinds of murder: one was murder and piracy on the high seas; and the other was wilful murder, which might be committed in any place.

He then took up the first and second errors assigned, and contended that in the indictment and record there was no sufficient averment of the jurisdiction of this court over the case at bar, and contended that a charge of piracy and murder "on the high seas" would fall under the jurisdiction of every nation or any which should first come at the offender.

But in an indictment of murder simply, the rule is different. It asserted that "it was on an American vessel." He contended that this would never be explicit enough until the time when our country shall comprise the whole of America.

There was also no averment that the vessel was under the protection of the United States, or that it was in the lawful business of the United States, nor that Archibald Mellen was a citizen of the United States; and that for all the record contained, he might have been a pirate, there being no averment that the injured person was under the protection of the United States.

He said that he was doing his whole duty in attempting to raise a reasonable doubt in the mind of the judge, and he contended that the prisoner should have the benefit of such a doubt now as much as when he was before the jury upon a question of fact.

In the third assignment there was nothing to show that the prisoner was allowed the privilege of challenging the jurors by whom he was tried; and he said that in a broad view this was not merely a technical point, but might be of great importance to those who shall come after us, if ever, hereafter, in stormy times, the country should be cursed with a Jeffreys on the bench. In Massachusetts, he said the right of challenge was almost taken away, which had resulted from the gradual encroachments of the courts, as well in this country as in England.

The fourth and thirteenth errors assigned were then considered, that there was no averment that the defendant was present at the time of impanelling the jury, during the trial, or at the return of the verdict. And in connection with this the counsel referred to the general error that the record was put in the past tense, citing copious authorities in support of this allegation of error. By the present tense the whole proceedings were recorded as they came up.

The fifth assignment was, "That in and by said record it nowhere appears that Plumer was permitted to be heard by the said jury so impanelled, by himself or his counsel; and that in truth and in fact Plumer was not permitted to address the jury in his own proper person." He said that here there was a double assignment, an error of law and an error of fact; and he argued that an error of fact would lie in the supreme court.

The sixth error was, that said verdict of guilty was rendered upon all the counts of said indictment, while one or more of said counts are defective and insufficient in law to support any judgment. One good count, the counsel was willing to allow, was sufficient upon which to find a verdict, but that the particular count on which the defendant is found guilty must appear in the record.

He then criticised the record in the errors assigned from the seventh to the eleventh assignments inclusive, as not expressing what felony the said Plumer was found guilty of, insisting that the statute in this regard was nomen collectivum, and only meant to express that the defendant should be found guilty of the felony with which the indictment charged him; and he believed that in this opinion he would be supported by every good lawyer, that "the felony of which he was convicted" should be entered on the record.

Mr. Butler continued his argument by dwelling upon the question of the power of the judge to stay the execution, believing that if it was in his power, it would be the pleasure of the judge. He argued this point briefly, when the judge said that he had no doubt of the power of the court.

In concluding this part of his argument, he said that he had labored to raise a reasonable doubt in the mind of the court, that in all this mass of errors there were some which should be corrected; and for himself and for his client he did not care whether his honor tried the case again himself with his associate justice, or whether it were taken to the supreme court.

He then passed on to speak of the possibilities of a "writ of error" under the constitution of the United States, reading from the constitution the appellate jurisdiction belonging to the supreme court, and citing various cases under it, and said that Chief Justice Marshall first suggested a doubt on the subject in 1805, the same justice having passed over the same point sub silentio in 1802. This was the case of U. S. v. Simms, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 252, and the opinion, the counsel believed, was given with a determination that the president should not appoint any judges to take a certain prisoner out of the hands of the court. He criticised this opinion fully, and declared that the great chief justice had confounded the regulations made for one purpose and the exceptions made for another. In continuing his remarks he cited [Clarke v. Bazadone] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 212; [Dorousseau v. U. S.] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 307; [U. S. v. More] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 159; The Young Mechanic [Case No. 18,180]; [Ex parte Crane] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 203, in which the point was ruled by obiter decisions merely.

In closing, Mr. Butler made an earnest appeal for the rights of the subject when prosecuted by the government. He declared that the criminal jurisdiction of the supreme court will have to be enlarged, so that the peace of the country and the rights of the citizen might be secured against the arbitrary decisions of political judges, by having such cases reviewed by the high court, consisting of learned judges from all parts of the country, who would not be swayed by local prejudice.

The argument was then concluded with an expressed desire that his honor would seal a bill of exceptions to the supreme court, to get the minds of that court upon the case.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Plumer, the petitioner, with three others, to wit, William H. Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, on the 30th of October, 1858, was indicted for the crime of murder committed on board the ship Junior on the high seas. He was charged as principal, and the other three were joined in the same indictment as principals in the second degree. They were all seamen on board the ship Junior, an American vessel employed in a whaling voyage, and the charge was that the prisoners, on the 26th of December, 1857, on the high seas, when the ship was in the Indian Ocean, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, murdered Archibald Mellen, the master of the vessel. Having been first brought into the district of Massachusetts after committing the offense, they were indicted in the circuit court for that district, under the fourth section of the act of the 3d of March, 1825, and the petitioner was found guilty, by the verdict of the jury, of the crime as charged in the indictment, but the other three were found guilty of manslaughter, and not guilty of the principal charge. Subsequent to the verdict, and before sentence, the petitioner filed a motion for new trial, alleging errors in the rulings of the court, and also a motion in arrest of judgment, alleging defects in the indictment, but both motions were afterwards withdrawn by the advice of his counsel, and at his own personal request, made in open court. Pending those motions, further proceedings in the case were suspended, but when they were waived and withdrawn, the district attorney moved for sentence, and the prisoner was set at the bar for that purpose. Inquiry was then made of the prisoner by the clerk, pursuant to the order of the court, whether he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced against him; and the court having heard and attentively considered his reply, and perceiving nothing therein to create any doubt as to the legality of his conviction, proceeded to pronounce against him the sentence of death set forth in the record as required by law. Throughout the trial both judges of the circuit court were present, and every ruling and proceeding in the trial were fully approved by both judges. Application is now made to the presiding justice at chambers for the allowance of a writ of error from the supreme court to the circuit court to remove the cause into the supreme court for the correction of certain alleged errors in the record, process, and proceedings in the trial, as specified in the paper accompanying the petition, called the assignment of errors. Some of the alleged errors are substantially the same as those which were set forth in the motion for new trial, and others are substantially the same as those set forth in the motion previously filed in arrest of judgment, both of which were waived and withdrawn before sentence. As assigned in the paper filed with the petition, the errors are fifteen in number; and the several assignments have all been very fully and ably argued by counsel appearing in behalf of the petitioner; but I do not think it proper to decide the questions presented in the assignment of errors, nor any one of them, as I am of the opinion that a writ of error will not lie from the supreme court to the circuit court in a criminal case, and consequently, that the judges of the circuit, whether sitting in court or at chambers, have no jurisdiction to grant the prayer of the petition. The power to allow a writ of error, after final judgment in a civil action, is impliedly vested in a judge of the circuit court by the twenty-second section of the judiciary act, subject to the conditions therein specified, and no doubt is entertained that the writ in all cases falling within that section, may be allowed by either of the judges of the circuit court, as well when the hearing is at chambers as when the application is presented in open court. An argument upon that point is unnecessary; but the prayer of the petition is denied expressly upon the grounds that the circuit court cannot grant a bill of exceptions in a criminal case, and that a writ of error from the supreme court to the circuit court will not lie to remove the judgment of the circuit court in such a case into the supreme court for re-examination. Bills of exceptions in the federal courts are required to be drawn as at common law, under the statute of Westminster II. (13 Edw. I. c. 31), passed in the year 1285, and of course they must be taken during the trial and before the jury retire from the bar, and must be seasonably sealed by the judge as therein required. 1 Pick. St. 206; 2 Tidd, Prac. 862; 1 Arch. Prac. (11th Ed.) 443; 2 Bac. Abr. 113.

Exceptions under that statute were never allowed in criminal cases in the courts of the parent country; and from the moment it was adopted as the rule of decision in the federal courts to the present time, its application, without any exception, has uniformly been confined to civil actions. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 622; 1 Lev. 68; 1 Sid. 65; Rex v. Stratton, 21 Howell, St. Tr. 1187; U. S. v. Gibert [Case No. 15,204]; People v. Holbrook, 13 Johns. 90; Ex parte Barker, 7 Cow. 143; People v. Vermilyea, Id. 108; 1 Phil. Ev. 997.

Authority to grant writs of error to the circuit courts to remove criminal cases into the supreme court for re-examination in matters of law, might undoubtedly be vested in the justices of the supreme court, but the insuperable difficulty in the way of exercising any such power at the present time is, that congress has not conferred any such jurisdiction. Such judicial power as belongs to the United States was created by the constitution, and the provision is that it shall be vested in one supreme court and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish; and the second section of the same article provides that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of congress, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, and to all the other cases and controversies therein enumerated, subject of course to the rule of construction and the limitation in the eleventh article of the amendments. Obviously, the words "all cases in law" are comprehensive enough to include criminal cases as well as civil actions, but the difficulty in assuming jurisdiction without an act of congress, arises from the provision contained in a subsequent clause of the same section, which will presently be noticed. Original cognizance of all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, is confided to the supreme court without any qualification; but the provision in respect to the appellate jurisdiction of that court is that "in all the other cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the congress shall make." No dispute, it would seem, can ever arise as to the original jurisdiction of the supreme court, as it is conferred in unambiguous terms and without any qualification, and the cases to which it extends are specifically enumerated; but the language employed in describing the appellate jurisdiction of that tribunal, is not quite so cautiously guarded, and it is conferred subject to such exceptions as congress may make, and must be exercised under such regulations as congress may prescribe. Unexplained, it would extend in all cases to the facts of the case as well as to the law; but the next clause of the same section provides that the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and the seventh amendment ordains that no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined than according to the rules of the common law. Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 447, 448. Exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court, as conferred in the second section of the third article of the constitution, it is conceded, may be made by congress, but the argument is that none have been made; and the petitioner insists that until exceptions are made by congress, the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court extends to all cases whatsoever, civil or criminal, arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, except such as are included in the original jurisdiction of that court. Ingeniously put and well argued as the proposition has been, the court might hesitate to reject it, if the question was res integra; but it is not, as is very properly conceded by the petitioner. Even viewed as a theory of new impression, the argument in support of it is not satisfactory, as it assumes that the jurisdiction exists unless it be shown that it is excluded by some express exception in an act of congress. Separated from the closing sentence of the clause in question, the construction suggested might be correct; but the whole clause must be read as it stands, and when so read it as clear that the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court, if congress legislates upon the subject, must be exercised under such regulations as congress shall prescribe, as it is that the appellate jurisdiction is conferred with such exceptions as congress shall make. Undoubtedly, the powers of the supreme court, both original and appellate, are given by the constitution, and not by the judiciary act, as is sometimes supposed; but the appellate jurisdiction of that tribunal is limited and regulated by the judiciary act and other kindred acts upon the same subject. Had congress organized the supreme court without any regulations as to the manner in which the court should exercise its powers, the appellate jurisdiction of the court, as conferred in the constitution, would have been as untrammelled as its original jurisdiction has been throughout our judicial history. Difficulties and embarrassments for want of such regulations would undoubtedly have been encountered at every step; but the better opinion is, that congress cannot defeat the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court by omitting to enact regulations for its exercise, as authorized by the constitution. Congress, it is true, has not declared in express terms that the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court shall not extend to criminal cases, nor to civil actions or suits in equity where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, does not exceed the sum or value of $2,000; but congress has described affirmatively the appellate jurisdiction of that court, and that affirmative description has always been held "to imply a negative on the exercise of such appellate power as is not comprehended within it." U. S. v. More, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 170; Durousseau v. U. S., 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 314.

Original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, is conferred upon the circuit courts, by the eleventh section of the judiciary act, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law, or in equity, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $500, and the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners, or an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state. 1 Stat. 78.

Unquestioned power is also conferred upon the supreme court by the twenty-second section of the same act, to re-examine upon writ of error final judgments in civil actions rendered in a circuit court, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $2,000; and detailed regulations are enacted, prescribing the steps to be taken in suing out the writ and defining the manner of exercising the power, as contained in the same and subsequent sections of that act; but they all have respect to the removal of civil actions at common law, suits in equity, or causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Criminal cases are not even mentioned in those regulations, nor is any one of them of a character to be applied in the removal of an indictment or judgment in a criminal case, from the circuit court into the supreme court for re-examination. Viewed in the light of those regulations, as the case should be, the implication is very strong that congress at that time did not intend that the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court, as therein described, should extend to any cases other than those to which those regulations applied; and the presumption that criminal cases were intentionally excepted therefrom is much strengthened by the fact that the original jurisdiction of the circuit courts over crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, is conferred by the same section in that act, which gives those courts original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of suits of a civil nature at common law and in equity. 1 Stat. 78.

Ample provision was made in that act for the re-examination of final judgments and decrees in civil actions and suits in equity, and in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $2,000; but no provision is made for the re-examination of criminal cases, or of cases of a civil nature, of any kind whatsoever, where the matter in dispute is less than the sum or value prescribed in the twenty-second section of that act.

Alterations have since been made in the regulations upon that subject, such as substituting appeals in the place of writs of error for the removal into the supreme court of decrees in equity, and decrees in admiralty cases, and of prize or no prize, and for writs of error in revenue cases, irrespective of the amount in dispute, but none of the new regulations afford any support to the present application, or give any countenance whatever to the theory that a writ of error under any circumstances will lie in a criminal case to a circuit court. Repeated decisions of the supreme court have established the opposite rule, and those decisions have been too long acquiesced in as sound expositions of the judiciary act to be changed without an act of congress. Ex parte Kearney, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 42; Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 201; Forsyth v. U. S., 9 How. [50 U. S.] 571; In re Kaine, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 120; Ex parte Watkins, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 568; Ex parte Gordon, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 505; Bish. Cr. Proc. § 940.

Efforts have been made in congress at different periods to extend the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court so as to include criminal cases, but the measure has never received much support, as it was foreseen that it would increase the business of that court beyond what the judges could accomplish, and would necessarily lead to such delays as would tend to defeat the great purpose intended to be accomplished in the administration of criminal justice.

Petition denied.

Mr. Butler.—I now make application for a writ of error coram vobis, returnable before the circuit court. [See Case No. 16,056.]

Judge CLIFFORD intimated that he was of the impression that in the practice of the circuit court, the writ coram vobis had been substantially superseded by the practice of a petition (with an assignment of errors annexed) to set aside the proceedings for informalities and defects in the record. It was then arranged that that course should be adopted, and the court agreed to hear the application, with Judge SPRAGUE, at Boston, on Tuesday morning next, at the circuit court room.

Case No. 16,056.

UNITED STATES v. PLUMER et al.

[3 Cliff. 28.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. July 6, 1859.

CIRCUIT COURTS—CRIMINAL JURISDICTION IN ERROR — WRITS OF ERROR — CRIMES COMMITTED ON SHIPBOARD—INDICTMENT—CHALLENGES OF JURORS—LIST OF WITNESSES—SENTENCE.

1. A writ of error coram vobis does not lie in the circuit court in a criminal case, either from its own judgment or the judgment of the district court.

2. Being without any common-law authority to try or punish offenders, except for contempt, they cannot exercise any power in a criminal case not derived expressly or impliedly from an act of congress.

3. No authority has been given in the acts of congress to the circuit court to re-examine, by writ of error or in any other manner, the rulings or judgments of the district court in criminal cases. No such authority is given by the fourteenth section of the judiciary act.

4. By that section congress only intended to vest the power to issue such other writs in cases where jurisdiction already existed, and not where the jurisdiction was to be acquired by means of the writ to be issued.

[Cited in Grantland v. City of Memphis, 12 Fed. 288.]

5. Difference between the writ of error coram nobis and the writ of error coram vobis explained and illustrated.

6. If the alleged error be in the judgment itself, and not in the process, a writ of error does not lie in the same court to correct it.

7. The indictment averred that the alleged crime was committed in and on board of a certain ship called the Junior, then and there owned by and belonging to the four persons therein named, all of whom are alleged to be citizens of the United States, and also contained the further allegation that all the criminal acts of the prisoner were committed within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of the court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the United States. Held, that there is a sufficient averment that the circuit court had jurisdiction, and that the injured party was within and under the protection of the United States, and in the peace thereof.

8. In this record it sufficiently appears that the prisoner was permitted his right of challenge.

9. By this record it sufficiently appears that the prisoner was present at the impanelling of jury, and when the verdict was rendered by the jury.

10. All the counts in this indictment held good; but granting that some are bad and some good, the verdict should stand.

11. The use of the past tense in this record is no valid objection to the record.

12. It sufficiently appears in and by the record that issue was joined.

13. When the docket entries show that the list of witnesses was furnished the prisoner in a capital case, and the record shows that prisoner acknowledged in open court, before the jury was impanelled, that he did receive it two entire days prior to that time, it sufficiently appears that such list was furnished as required.

14. It sufficiently appears in and by this record of what felony the prisoner was convicted and for what he was sentenced.

15. The designation "foreman," appended to the name of the person signing the indictment as such, is sufficient, as the designation "foreman" refers to the introductory clause of the indictment, and to the record, as verifying the legal inference that "foreman" means foreman of the grand jury.

The prisoner, with three others, was indicted in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts, for murder on the high seas. Plumer was tried and convicted. Motions for a new trial and in arrest were filed, but they were afterwards waived, and Plumer was sentenced to be executed. A motion was now made for allowance of a writ of error coram nobis.

Benjamin F. Butler, George W. Searle, and F. F. Heard for plaintiff in error.

C. L. Woodbury, Dist. Atty., and M. Andros, Asst. Dist. Atty., appeared for the Government.

The indictment, record, and docket entries were thus:

The Indictment.

United States of America.

Circuit Court of the United States of America, for the District of Massachusetts.

At a circuit court of the United States of America, for the district of Massachusetts, begun and holden at Boston, within and for said district, on the 15th of October, 1858.

The jurors of the United States of America, within and for the district aforesaid, upon their oath, present:

That Cyrus Plumer, mariner, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, late of New Bedford, in said district, William H. Carther, mariner, otherwise called Richard Carther, late of New Bedford, in said district, William Herbert, late of New Bedford, in said district, mariner, and Charles H. Stanley, mariner, otherwise called John W. Ballard, late of New Bedford, in said district, on the 26th of December, 1857, with force and arms on the high seas and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and on board of a certain vessel, the same then and there being a ship called Junior, then and there owned by and belonging to David R. Greene, Robert B. Greene, Dennis Wood, and Willard Nye, all citizens of the said United States, in and upon one Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did make an assault, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, with a certain gun, called a whaling gun, then and there charged with gunpowder and three leaden bullets, which said gun he the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in both his hands then and there had, and held at and against the body of him the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, did shoot off and discharge, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there with the three leaden bullets aforesaid, out of the gun aforesaid, then and there by force of the gunpowder aforesaid, by him the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there shot off, discharged, and sent forth as aforesaid, him the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and upon the left side of the body of him the said Archibald Mellen, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, did strike, penetrate, and wound, then and there giving to him the said Archibald Mellen, then and there with the three leaden bullets aforesaid, so as aforesaid by him the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there shot off, discharged, and sent forth out of the gun aforesaid, by force of the gunpowder aforesaid, in, upon, and against the left side of the body of him the said Archibald Mellen, and then and there penetrating into and through the body of him the said Archibald Mellen, one mortal wound, of which said mortal wound, the said Archibald Mellen, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, then and there on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, instantly died. And that the said William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Chares H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, then and there on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, were present, and then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, were aiding, abetting, comforting, assisting, and maintaining the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, the felony and murder aforesaid, in the manner and form aforesaid, then and there to do, commit, and perpetrate.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, him the said Archibald Mellen, did then and there, in the manner and form aforesaid, kill and murder. Against the peace and dignity of the said United States, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that Cyrus Plumer, mariner, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, late of New Bedford, in said district, William H. Carther, mariner, otherwise called Richard Carther, late of New Bedford, in said district, William Herbert, late of New Bedford, in said district, mariner, and Charles H. Stanley, mariner, otherwise called John W. Ballard, late of New Bedford, in said district, on the twenty-sixth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, with force and arms, on the high seas, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and on board of a certain vessel, the same then and there being a ship called Junior, then and there owned by and belonging to David R. Greene, Robert B. Greene, Dennis Wood, and Willard Nye, all citizens of the said United States, in and upon one Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did make an assault, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there, with a certain instrument of wood and iron, called a "hatchet," which he, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there, in his right hand, had and held, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and upon the back of the neck of him the said Archibald Mellen, then and there feloniously wilfully, and of his malice aforethought did strike, thrust, and penetrate, then and there giving to the said Archibald Mellen, in and upon the back of the neck of him the said Archibald Mellen, then and there with the hatchet aforesaid, by such striking with the hatchet aforesaid, in the manner aforesaid, one mortal wound, of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches, of which said mortal wound the said Archibald Mellen, on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, instantly died. And that the said William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, then and there, on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought were present, and then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought were aiding, abetting, comforting, assisting, and maintaining the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, the felony and murder aforesaid, in the manner and form aforesaid, to do, commit, and perpetrate.

And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, him the said Archibald Mellen, then and there, in the manner and form aforesaid, did kill and murder. Against the peace and dignity of the said United States, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that Cyrus Plumer, mariner, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, late of New Bedford, in said district, William H. Carther, mariner, otherwise called Richard Carther, late of New Bedford, in said district, William Herbert, late of New Bedford, in said district, mariner, and Charles H. Stanley, mariner, otherwise called John W. Ballard, late of New Bedford, in said district, on the twenty-sixth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, with force and arms, on the high seas, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and on board of a certain vessel, the same then and there being a ship called Junior, then and there owned by and belonging to David R. Greene, Robert B. Greene, Dennis Wood, and Willard Nye, all citizens of the said United States, in and upon one Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought did make an assault, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there, with a certain instrument of wood and iron, called a hatchet, which he, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there in his right hand had and held, the said Archibald Mellen then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and upon the neck, back, and shoulders of him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought did strike, thrust, and penetrate, then and there giving to the said Archibald Mellen, in and upon the neck, back, and shoulders of him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there with the hatchet aforesaid, by such striking with the hatchet aforesaid, in the manner aforesaid, several mortal wounds, to wit, one mortal wound in and upon the back of the neck of him, the said Archibald Mellen, of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches, and one mortal wound in and upon the back of him, the said Archibald Mellen, of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches, and two mortal wounds in and upon the left shoulder of him, the said Archibald Mellen, each of said two last-mentioned mortal wounds being of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches, of which said several mentioned and described mortal wounds, the said Archibald Mellen, on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, instantly died. And that the said William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, then and there, on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought were present, and then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought were aiding, abetting, comforting, assisting, and maintaining the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, the felony and murder aforesaid, in the manner and form aforesaid, to do, commit, and perpetrate.

And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there in the manner and form aforesaid, did kill and murder. Against the peace and dignity of the said United States, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that Cyrus Plumer, mariner, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, late of New Bedford, in said district, William H. Carther, mariner, otherwise called Richard Carther, late of New Bedford, in said district, William Herbert, late of New Bedford, in said district, mariner, and Charles H. Stanley, mariner, otherwise called John W. Ballard, late of New Bedford, in said district, on the twenty-sixth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, with force and arms on the high seas, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and on board of a certain vessel, the same then and there being a ship called Junior, then and there owned by and belonging to David R. Greene, Robert B. Greene, Dennis Wood, and Willard Nye, all citizens of the said United States, in and upon one Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did make an assault, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there a certain gun, called a whaling gun, then and there charged with gunpowder and three leaden bullets, which said gun the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in both his hands, then and there had and held at and against the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought did shoot off and discharge, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there with the three leaden bullets aforesaid, out of the gun aforesaid, then and there by force of the gunpowder aforesaid, by him the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, so as aforesaid shot off, discharged, and sent forth, him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and upon the left side of the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought did strike, penetrate, and wound; and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States. and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, then and there with a certain instrument of wood and iron, called a hatchet, which he, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there in his right hand had and held, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and upon the neck, breast, shoulders, body, and back of him, the said Archibald Mellen, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought did strike, then and there giving to him, the said Archibald Mellen, as well by the three leaden bullets aforesaid, so as aforesaid, by him, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, shot off, discharged, and sent forth out of the gun aforesaid, by force of the gunpowder aforesaid, at and against the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen, in the manner and form aforesaid, as by the instrument of wood and iron called a hatchet, as aforesaid, several mortal wounds, to wit, one mortal wound in and upon the left side of the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen, and then and there penetrating into and through the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen; and one mortal wound in and upon the back of the neck of him, the said Archibald Mellen, of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches; and one mortal wound in and upon the back of him, the said Archibald Mellen, of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches; and two mortal wounds in and upon the left shoulder of him, the said Archibald Mellen, each of said two last-mentioned mortal wounds being of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches, of which said several mentioned and described mortal wounds, he, the said Archibald Mellen, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, instantly died. And that the said William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, then and there, on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, in and on board the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought were present, and then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought were aiding, abetting, comforting, assisting, and maintaining the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, the felony and murder aforesaid, in the manner and form aforesaid, to do, commit, and perpetrate. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do say that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, the said Archibald Mellen, did then and there, in the manner and form aforesaid, kill and murder. Against the peace and dignity of the said United States, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that Cyrus Plumer, mariner, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, late of New Bedford, in said district, William H. Carther, mariner, otherwise called Richard Carther, late of New Bedford, in said district, William Herbert, late of New Bedford, in said district, mariner, and Charles H. Stanley, mariner, otherwise called John W. Ballard, late of New Bedford, in said district, on the twenty-sixth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, with force and arms, on the high seas, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and on board of a certain American vessel, the same then and there being a ship called Junior, then and there belonging to a citizen or citizens of the said United States (whose name or names is and are to the jurors aforesaid as yet unknown), in and upon one Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did make an assault, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there a certain gun called a whaling gun, then and there charged with gunpowder and three leaden bullets, which said gun the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in both his hands, then and there had and held at and against the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, did shoot off and discharge, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there, with the three leaden bullets aforesaid, out of the gun aforesaid, then and there, by force of the gunpowder aforesaid, by him, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, so as aforesaid, shot off, discharged, and sent forth, him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and upon the left side of the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, did strike, penetrate, and wound, and that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, then and there, with a certain instrument of wood and iron, called a hatchet, which he, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, then and there in his right hand, had and held, the said Archibald Mellen, then and there being in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, in and upon the neck, breast, shoulders, body, and back of him, the said Archibald Mellen, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, did strike, then and there giving to him, the said Archibald Mellen, as well by the three leaden bullets aforesaid, so as aforesaid, by him, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, shot off, discharged, and sent forth, out of the gun aforesaid, by force of the gunpowder aforesaid, at and against the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen, in the manner and form aforesaid, as by the instrument of wood and iron, called a "hatchet," as aforesaid, several mortal wounds, to wit, one mortal wound in and upon the left side of the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen, and then and there penetrating into and through the body of him, the said Archibald Mellen; and one mortal wound in and upon the back of the neck of him, the said Archibald Mellen, of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches; and one mortal wound in and upon the back of him, the said Archibald Mellen, of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches; and two mortal wounds in and upon the left shoulder of him, the said Archibald Mellen; each of said last-mentioned mortal wounds being of the length of three inches, and of the depth of two inches, of which said several mentioned and described mortal wounds, he, the said Archibald Mellen, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, instantly died. And that the said William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, then and there, on the said twenty-sixth day of December, in the year aforesaid, in and on board of the ship aforesaid, and on the high seas aforesaid, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the said United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, were present, and then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought were aiding, abetting, comforting, assisting, and maintaining the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, the felony and murder aforesaid, in the manner and form aforesaid, to do, commit, and perpetrate. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, the said Archibald Mellen, did, then and there, in the manner and form aforesaid, kill and murder. Against the peace and dignity of the said United States, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that the district of Massachusetts is the district into which the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, were first brought after committing the aforesaid offence.

A true bill. B. F. Copeland, Foreman.

Charles Levi Woodbury,
United States Attorney for the District of Massachusetts.

The Record.

At this present October term of this court, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, were severally set to the bar and had this indictment read to them; and thereupon they severally said that thereof they were not guilty; and thereof for trial put themselves upon God and their country; and Benjamin F. Butler and Charles P. Chandler were assigned by the court as counsel for said Plumer; F. F. Heard and F. W. Pelton were assigned as counsel for said Carther; Thornton K. Lothrop and J. Q. Adams were assigned as counsel for said Herbert; and J. Hardy Prince and Samuel M. Quincy were assigned as counsel for Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard; and said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, severally acknowledged that they had severally received a copy of the indictment, and a list of the jurors, agreeably to law, and more than two days before the day of their trial.

A jury was thereupon impanelled and sworn to try the issue, namely, John B. Chisholm, foreman, and fellows, namely, Willard Bacon, Daniel C. Bates, Lemuel Grant, Charles Humphrey, Asher Joslin, Charles B. W. Lane, Benjamin Norris, Hiel J. Nelson, William Parker, William Tinker, and Amasa Whitney, of said district.

And the said jury afterwards returned their verdict that said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, is guilty of murder as alleged in said indictment; William H. Carther, otherwise called Richard Carther, William Herbert, and Charles H. Stanley, otherwise called John W. Ballard, are severally guilty of manslaughter. And thereupon said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, by his counsel, moves the court for a new trial as follows:

(Here follow motions for new trial, and in arrest.)

Time was allowed by the court for preparation of counsel therein, and the said motions were set down for hearing; and afterwards, at the same term, the counsel of said Plumer moves the court for leave to withdraw the said motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment; and said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, having been brought into court, and being inquired of personally, asks that such leave may be granted and that the said motions be withdrawn. Wherefore the court doth grant him leave to withdraw the said motions, and the same are accordingly waived and withdrawn by said Plumer; said Plumer is then asked if he had anything to say why judgment of death should not now be pronounced against him; and having replied thereto fully, and no good cause appearing to the contrary, and all matters in the case having been fully heard and understood by the court, it is considered by the court that the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, be deemed guilty of felony, and that he, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, be taken back to the place from whence he came, and there remain in close confinement until Friday, the twenty-fourth day of June next, and on that day, between the hours of eleven o'clock in the forenoon and one o'clock in the afternoon, he, the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, be taken thence to the place of execution, and that he be there hanged by the neck until he be dead.

Among other entries of the clerk's docket were the following, namely: "No. 228. Oct. term, 1858. Oct. 30th. Indictment presented by the grand jury, Benjm. F. Copeland, Foreman. Nov. 1st. Copy of ind. given to each of the four prisoners; also list of petit jurors. Nov. 3rd. The court inquiring, all acknowledged that they had rec'd a copy of the indictment and jury list, and did not object to their arraignment. Dec. 2nd. Motion for a new trial filed, and motion in arrest of judgment, by Plumer. March 30th. The counsel for Plumer withdraws and waives his motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment. Plumer being brought into court asks leave to do so, and leave is granted by the court."

The Petition.

United States of America.

Circuit Court of the United States of America, for the District of Massachusetts.

To the Honorable the Justices of the Circuit Court of the United States of America, Sitting within and for the First Judicial Circuit, in the District of Massachusetts.

Cyrus W. Plumer, now imprisoned in the district aforesaid, under sentence of death, on a judgment, warrant, process, and proceeding of the said circuit court of the United States of America, for the district of Massachusetts, says that there is manifest error in the process, proceedings, premises, and judgment, and feeling aggrieved thereby assigns as errors in said record, process, proceeding, and judgment the errors named and set forth in the paper hereto annexed, marked "Assignment of Errors."

And said Plumer, by reason of the errors aforesaid, and other errors in the proceedings and record aforesaid, prays that the record and judgment be set aside, reversed, stayed, respited, reprieved, annulled, and held for naught, and that he be discharged thereof, and be suffered to go without day.

Cyrus W. Plumer.

Boston, July 2, 1859.

B. F. Butler,
F. F. Heard,
Geo. W. Searle,
Of Counsel.

United States of America.

District of Massachusetts, to wit:

Boston, 5th day of July, 1859.

Then personally appeared Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, and made solemn oath that all the errors in fact, named and set forth in the "assignment of errors," hereto annexed, are true, and every statement of fact in said assignment is true in substance and effect.

Before me, G. D. Guild,
United States Commissioner.

Assignment of Errors.

United States of America.

Circuit Court of the United States of America, for the District of Massachusetts.

Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, Plaintiff in Error, v. The United States of America, Defendant in Error.

And now, to wit, on the 2d day of July, A. D. 1859, cometh the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in his proper person, who is now imprisoned in the district of Massachusetts, under sentence of death, on a judgment, warrant, process, and proceeding of the said circuit court of the United States of America, for the district of Massachusetts, and immediately saith that in the record and process aforesaid, and also in the giving of the judgment aforesaid, against him the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, there is manifest error in these, to wit:—

1. That in and by said indictment and record, there is no sufficient averment that the circuit court in which said indictment was returned and heard, had jurisdiction of the offence therein supposed to be charged.

2. That in and by said indictment and record, there is no sufficient averment that the person therein supposed to be injured was within or under the protection of or jurisdiction of the United States, or in the peace thereof.

3. That in and by said record it nowhere appears, or is set forth, that said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, was informed of, or permitted to exercise, or did exercise his constitutional right of challenge of the jurors returned for his trial.

4. That in and by said record it nowhere appears, or is set forth, that said Plumer was present, either at the impanelling of the jury that tried him or at the time said trial was had, or said verdict was rendered against him.

5. That in and by said record it nowhere appears that said Plumer was permitted to be heard by said jury so impanelled, either by himself or his counsel; and that in truth and in fact said Plumer was not permitted to address the jury in his own proper person.

6. That said verdict of guilty was rendered upon all the counts of said indictment, while one and more of said counts are defective and insufficient in law to support any judgment.

7. Because all the acts of the court are stated in the past tense.

8. Because it does not appear on said record that issue was joined between the prisoner and the United States.

9. It does not appear on the record, that the prisoner received a list of the proper jurors as by law required.

10. That it nowhere appears in and by said record of what (if any) felony said Plumer was adjudged guilty.

11. That it nowhere appears by said record of what "felony" the court "deemed" or adjudged the said Plumer "to be guilty."

12. That it nowhere appears by said record for what "felony" said Plumer was sentenced to suffer death.

13. That it nowhere appears in and by said record that Plumer received sentence of death for the particular murder of which the jury had found him guilty; but only for "felony" indefinitely, the particular felony not being described in any manner designated.

14. That the verdict is repugnant to the general averment and clause in the indictment giving the court jurisdiction.

15. That said indictment does not appear to be signed by the foreman of the grand jury.

16. That it does not appear that the verdict of said jury was rendered in open court, and in the presence of the defendant.

17. That said record is in other respects informal, insufficient, erroneous, and the judgment thereon void and of none effect.

18. That by the said record it appears that judgment upon the indictment aforesaid was given against him. the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, in form aforesaid, whereas judgment by the said circuit court of the United States ought to have been given for the said Plumer, that he be thereof acquitted and go thereupon without day. Therefore in that there is manifest error.

And the said Cyrus Plumer, otherwise called Cyrus W. Plumer, prays that the said judgment aforesaid, for the errors being in the record and process aforesaid, may be reversed and annulled, and absolutely be had for nothing, and that he may be restored to the common law of the land, and to all things which he hath lost on the present occasion.

B. F. Butler, Geo. W. Searle, and F. F. Heard, for petitioner.

Charles Levi Woodbury, Dist. Atty., and Milton Andros, Asst. Atty., for the United States.

Mr. Searle, for the prisoner, contended that the petition and accompanying papers bring into controversy the validity and sufficiency of this record as a chronicle of legal justice, so formal and accurate as to justify the enforcement of its last, its highest, and its most awful penalty. In the unequal contest of the citizen with the government, it is his right, to the last breath in his body, to hold the line and the plummet to authority, and standing there, to insist that law shall be administered with all the forms and all the circumstances of legal justice. Between that power and the prisoner stand the rights of an accused man. He is now held by the strong arm of might; that arm must be upheld by the law, or its grasp is a nullity; that arm becomes the arbitrary oppressor of the prisoner, and not the representative instrument of justice, unless thus strengthened. The law assumes now to enforce its terrible penalty; it assumes to take human life,—what man cannot give.

The criminal law always, in its worst days, had its theoretical and even its real offsets of benefits and privileges, which were secured to the victim as an inheritance. These have always made up the forms of the criminal system. It is only by due process of law that a man is to be punished. All of this cause has now passed into the record; justice must stand on that record: and its grasp is powerless unless the forms of justice sustain it. Arbitrary power is no attribute of that criminal arm.

We have thought it proper to bring this record to the attention of the court. Now, as the gibbet looks down on a powerless man, we ask the representative ministers of human justice to pause, and with us review this criminal record, to see to it from beginning to end that it shows the forms of justice in all its parts, to the end that, if it be found valid, the law shall have its course and be glorified,—if it can be glorified by human blood; but, if it be found not so, to the end also that the great axe be arrested, and stayed at least until it can rise and fall with law to sustain it. I am desired merely and strictly to open the errors, others are to enforce them. They need no statement in detail.

What must the criminal record show, and does this record come up to the standard? That is in substance the whole question here at issue.

I. What now is this record of which we speak so much? The record may, perhaps with sufficient accuracy, be denominated the contemporaneous history of a judicial proceeding from beginning to end. That record imports absolute truth, and for it there can be no intendment and no presumption. This record has gone into parchment. For to-day and all time that is the history of this cause. See Sayles v. Briggs, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 421; Co. Litt. 260a; Com. Dig. "Record," A, F; Fowler v. Byrd [Case No. 4,999a]; 7 Com. Dig. tit. "Record," A.

II. What must and should that record of a capital felony contain? We claim that the only reliable answer to that question is contained in this proposition, namely:—

The record should contain an exact and formal statement in the present tense of every fact necessary to show demonstrably that judicial proceeding right and proper in all its stages,—showing clearly, without equivocation, doubt, or uncertainty, every fact necessary to justify the final act of sentence. It must be as exact as an indictment; if so exact it is sufficient, if not so exact and definite it is insufficient. The circuit court is one of limited and specific jurisdiction. This record must affirmatively show all the allegations necessary for that specific jurisdiction. Dyson v. State, 26 Miss. (4 Cushm.) 362.

III. This record is so faulty, defective, and insufficient as to impose upon the judicial function the imperative duty of setting it aside as a nullity, recalling the sentence, and retrying the prisoner.

1. The record must show the verdict of the jury in all cases of capital felony to have been delivered in open court in the presence of the prisoner. Co. Litt. 227b; 3 Inst. 110; 2 Hawk. P. C. (Ed. 1824) c. 47, § 2; 2 Hale, P. C. 300; Bac. Abr. "Verdict," B; 2 Gabb. Cr. Law (Dublin Ed. 1843) 529; Archb. Cr. Pl. (London Ed. 1856) 146.

2. The fourth and sixth assignments are valid. The entry of the proceedings in the past tense is fatal on error. 2 Saund. 393; 2 Gabb. Cr. Law, 563. The moment the criminal record comes to the past tense in the chronicle of the acts going on at the trial, we lose on the record the personal presence of the prisoner, without which, in all stages of a criminal proceeding, it is an absolute nullity.

3. The seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth assignments show that the record has no sufficient adjudication of guilt for the felony charged.

For all that appears on this record, Plumer may have been adjudged guilty of manslaughter; which sentence would not warrant the penalty of death. See form of entry of verdict on the record, in Archb. Cr. Pl. (1856) 147; also form of judgment, Id. 152.

IV. The criminal record once entered up, and the term of the court at which the record was made up being ended, that record becomes the property of the defendant, and in it he has a vested right; to it he and his posterity have a right to appeal in all coming time as the permanent history of the judicial proceeding; it cannot be altered or amended.

"When once the judgment is solemnly entered on the record, no court can make any alteration in it; but if any material defect appear on the face of it, it can still be reversed by writ of error." Archb. Cr. Pl. (Eng. Ed.) 153; Sayles v. Briggs, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 421.

"When proceedings have been entered upon the record, the common-law power of amendment ceases; for the judges at common law were prohibited from allowing alterations to be made in any record." Britton, Proem. 2, 2; Smith, Lead. Cas. Eq. (5th Ed.) p. 589, note 1; see Bull. N. P. 321; 3 Bl. Comm. 407; 1 Bac. Abr. tit. "Amendment," G. P. 167; 2 Sell. Prac. 458; Short v. Kellogg, 10 Ga. 182; Gibson v. Wilson, 18 Ala. 63; Id. 438; 2 Gude, Prac. 137; 1 Com. Dig. K, "Amendment"; St. 8 Hen. VI. c. 12.

The statutes of jeofails never extended at common law to the king's criminal process.

V. This petition with its assignment is the proper and established mode for reaching these questions in this court, and opens, like the general writ of error, "every substantial defect appearing on the face of the record"; including "irregularity in the verdict or judgment, or any manifest error on the face of the record." Archb. Cr. Pl. 161; 4 Bl. Comm. 391; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 747; Pickett's Heirs v. Legerwood, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 144.

1. It has been already adjudicated, contrary to our hopes and against our confident expectations, that no writ of error lies from the supreme to the circuit court in any criminal case.

2. It must follow then, that this is the highest court of error in a criminal case, and the remedy in error must be open before it. That is to say, it having been held that no writ of error lies from the supreme to the circuit court in such a case as this, it must follow that the circuit court is the supreme court having jurisdiction: for before all supreme legal tribunals, from which there is no appeal, the writ of error coram nobis lies, in the very nature of things.

3. The final remedy in error somewhere, is a fundamental element in every judicial system in both civil and criminal cases. There can, in the very nature of things, be no complete judicial system without this final redress for judicial mistakes. Whether the given case is a proper one for the remedy is one thing, but that there is such remedy is inherent.

4. The locality of the redress must be in the highest court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. If there is no remedy by error from the supreme to the circuit court in criminal cases, the circuit court is the highest court of criminal jurisdiction in such cases, and the writ of error coram nobis must be maintainable.

5. It is no answer to say that in this case some of the points were made and then waived on motion for new trial, or that all of them were open in arrest. All this is true of most questions raised in error.

6. Nor is it any answer to say that the circuit court, being created by statute, has no common-law jurisdiction or process, as it confessedly has the common-law procedure in pleading, practice, and evidence; and these questions plainly relate to procedure.

To an inquiry upon these several points, and to a more elaborate enforcement of these suggestions, my associates ask attention; and, that their better words may be heard, I give way to them.

Mr. Heard followed upon the same side. Most of his propositions are stated in the preceding case, and he supported them by the authorities there referred to, and many others to the same effect.

Mr. Butler then followed in vindication of the petitioner's right to the writ, and in support of the validity of the various errors assigned. He commenced by announcing what he claimed to be a canon of criticism and judgment upon a record in a case of capital felony in the United States courts, namely, that the record must be a memorial of all the proceedings of the court, and that nothing can be taken by intendment.

The United States were sometimes said to have no common law; but yet he claimed that they did have common law in definition, remedy, and procedure, though not in jurisdiction or power. It was not exactly the common law of England, but it might be well enough defined the common law of England as practised here. On this ground he supported and invoked the English decisions in cases of definition, remedy, and procedure. He then proceeded to discuss the validity of the errors assigned. If his canon was correct, he believed that the court must decide that this record was faulty to such a degree that they must set it aside.

He took up the errors assigned in the same order as that he adopted in arguing in support of the application in the preceding case, and he supported his propositions by the same authorities.

C. L. Woodbury, Dist. Atty., and Milton Andros, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

1. The process invoked is not included in the grant to this court by the process act. There is no criminal jurisdiction for the United States court in criminal matters.

2. The averments in the indictment regarding the nationality of the vessel are such that the jurisdiction of this court attaches. For the limitations which have been put upon this jurisdiction, see U. S. v. Bowers, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 197. For those refused by the court, see the applications in Furlong's Case, Id. 203, and in U. S. v. Holmes [Case No. 15,382].

The distinction between piracy and murder was elaborately argued by Mr. Marshall, afterwards chief justice, in Nash's Case [U. S. v. Robins, Case No. 16,175], which see.

The act of 1825 [4 Stat. 115] was passed to distinguish piracy from murder. See Act 1790 [1 Stat. 131]; also 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 197.

The jurisdiction extends on board any vessel not belonging to a foreign nation, and this is the gist of Nash's Case. No American ship loses her nationality, except by a sale to a foreigner.

Statutes also extend to ships built after the act, or before the act, or ships forfeited for breach of laws and to foreign wrecked vessels.

The averments of residence and character of vessel are sufficient. Jurisdiction is matter en pais. Ship's papers are not decisive. U. S. v. Bowers, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 199-204, 7th point, 206.

And the burden of proof is on the defendant. Lyle v. Rodgers, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 419.

Is the allegation that the owners were citizens of the United States sufficient? U. S. v. Furlong, Id. 203; U. S. v. Imbert [Case No. 15,438]. Jurisdiction is not limited to vessels owned by citizens of United States. Congress has police jurisdiction on the high seas, irrespective of the nationality of the vessel, under its power to regulate commerce. See U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72–78. Acts 1820–1825 on slave-trade. Act 1807, § 7, vessels hovering on the coast to land slaves. [2 Stat. 428.] Act 1847, § 1, alien vessels depredating on our commerce when there is a treaty with their country. [9 Stat. 175.] Act 1804, § 1, on burning ships. [2 Stat. 290.] Act 1825, § 4, murder or stabbing where the party dies on land. See, also, section 5 [4 Stat. 115, 116]. So also in piracy, see below, and other offences against the law of nations. Prima facie, parol proof of the averment was sufficient. U. S. v. Peterson [Case No. 16,037]; U. S. v. Bowers, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 204, 206. And the burden is afterwards on the defendant. Lyle v. Rodgers, Id. 419.

The regularity of the ship's papers has no relation under these acts (1825 or 1790) to the offence. U. S. v. Peterson [supra]; McClung v. Ross, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 119; U. S. v. Bowers, Id. 204, 206; Lyle v. Rodgers, Id. 418; U. S. v. Holmes [Case No. 15,382].

The authorities cited for the prisoner, which refer to the forfeiture of ships, are not applicable, as the nationality remains unchanged by the forfeiture. Reference is made to the registry act, but it does not limit the scope of the acts of 1790 and 1825. Its objects are purely commercial. U. S. v. Gibert [Case No. 15,204].

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Prior to the filing of the petition in this case, the prisoner had been indicted and convicted, in the circuit court for this district, of the crime of wilful murder upon the high seas, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, and having waived and withdrawn the respective motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment, which he filed subsequent to the verdict of the jury, he had been sentenced by the court to suffer the punishment of death, as provided by the act of congress under which the indictment against him was found. 4 Stat. 115. Convicted, by the verdict of the jury, of the crime charged in the indictment, and having received the final sentence of the law, he was remanded to prison, under a warrant issued in due form for that purpose, where he remained awaiting the execution of the sentence, until the 2d of July, 1859, when the petition in this case was filed. Though the prisoner had withdrawn the motions usually employed in criminal cases to correct errors in the rulings and instructions of the court, and for arresting the judgment when the indictment is defective and insufficient, he still insists that there are defects and errors in the process and proceedings, and also in the record and judgment in the case, as set forth in the paper annexed to the petition, and marked "assignment of errors," and prays the court that "the record and judgment may be set aside, reversed, stayed, respited, reprieved, annulled, and held for naught, and that he may be discharged thereof, and be suffered to go without day." Eighteen supposed errors are set forth in the paper annexed to the petition, but they were classified at the argument under twelve heads, and it will be convenient for the court to follow the order adopted at the bar. Before considering the respective errors, however, as set forth in the paper before referred to, it becomes necessary to inquire and determine whether the circuit court possesses the power to re-examine, reverse, set aside, and annul its own judgments in such a case, in this form of proceeding. Nothing is better settled than the rule of decision that the circuit courts have no common-law jurisdiction in criminal cases, and it necessarily results from that proposition that the answer to the inquiry as to the power of the court to grant the prayer of the petition must depend upon the construction of the act of congress organizing the judicial system of the United States, and other kindred acts upon the same subject. U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32; U. S. v. Coolidge, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 415; U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 563.

Acts not previously defined as an offence against the authority of the United States cannot be punished as such, as the United States have no unwritten criminal code to which resort can be had as a source of jurisdiction in such cases. Conkl. Treat. 168. Courts which originate in the common law possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by their common law, until some statute shall change their established principles; but courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, cannot transcend that jurisdiction. Ex parte Boleman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 93; U. S. v. Libbey [Case No. 15,597]; U. S. v. Wilson [Id. 16,731].

Circuit courts were created by the judiciary act, and they are courts of limited and special jurisdiction; and being without any common-law authority to try or punish offenders, except for contempt, they cannot exercise any power, in a criminal case, not derived expressly or impliedly from an act of congress. Exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States was conferred upon the circuit courts by the eleventh section of the judiciary act, except in cases where the same act authorized the district courts to exercise the same jurisdiction; and the same section provides that the circuit courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offences cognizable in the district courts. 1 Stat. 79. Those exceptions from the exclusive cognizance of the circuit courts over crimes and offences committed against the authority of the United States were comparatively few at that period of our history; but the third section of the act of the 23d of August, 1842, provides that the district courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit courts of all crimes and offences against the United States, the punishment of which is not capital. 5 Stat. 517. Indictments for all offences against the United States may be found either in the district or circuit court, and may, on motion of the district attorney, and by the order of the court where pending, to be entered on its minutes, be transmitted from one court to the other for trial; except that indictments for capital offences found in either court are triable only in the circuit court; and, if found in the district court, they must be remitted to the circuit court for that purpose. 9 Stat. 72. Except as to capital offences, the circuit and district courts, in the exercise of jurisdiction in criminal cases, are courts of concurrent and co-ordinate powers, the former bearing no relation whatever to the latter as an appellate tribunal. The authority to re-examine, by writ of error, final judgments in civil actions, rendered in a district court, is conferred upon a circuit court where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $50; but the acts of congress nowhere authorize the circuit courts to re-examine by writ of error, or in any other manner, the rulings or judgments of the district courts in criminal cases. District courts as well as circuit courts have power to grant new trials in all cases where there has been a trial by jury, for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law, meaning the common-law courts of the state; and that power extends to the setting aside of verdicts in criminal cases as well as in civil actions in courts of original jurisdiction. New trials may be granted, in favor of the accused, to correct an erroneous ruling of the court in admitting improper testimony or in rejecting proper and material testimony, for misdirection of the court, or for the misconduct of the jury, or for newly discovered testimony, or because the verdict is against the evidence or the weight of the evidence, as in civil actions at common law. Judge Story held, in U. S. v. Gibert [Case No. 15,204], that a new trial could not be granted in a case where the punishment was death; but it is now everywhere held that a new trial may be granted in such a case, on the application of the accused. U. S. v. Williams [Id. 16,707]; People v. Morrison, 1 Parker, Cr. R. 625; 2 Benn. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 464; Reg. v. Scaife, 2 Denison & P. Crown Cas. 281; Campbell v. Reg., 11 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 814; King v. Reg. 14 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 31.

Effective means are provided and ample facilities afforded to the accused, in a criminal case, for testing the jurisdiction of the court, and the sufficiency of the indictment, as far as such objects can be accomplished in the same court, without any such resort as that which is proposed in the case before the court. Before pleading, the accused may, if he sees fit, move to quash the indictment, setting forth as reasons one or both of those causes, and if that motion is overruled, he may demur to the indictment either generally or specially; and the settled practice of the court is, that if the demurrer is overruled, the judment of the court, if the charge is of the grade of felony, shall be respondeat ouster, as at common law. Both of these remedies are open to the accused before he is required to plead to the merits, and after verdict, if he does not prevail before the jury, he may file a motion in arrest of judgment, alleging the same defects; and the rule is equally well settled that such a motion, like a demurrer, not only calls in question the jurisdiction of the court, and the sufficiency of the indictment, but extends also to any error in law which is apparent in the record.

Since the decision in the preceding case, [Case No. 16,055] it may be assumed without further argument that a writ of error from the supreme court to the circuit court, or from the circuit court to the district court, will not lie in any criminal case, because there is no provision in any act of congress authorizing any such proceeding, whether the charge be felony, or only a misdemeanor; but if it be true that a writ of error may be sued out in this case, to be heard in the circuit court where the trial was had, and where the judgment was rendered, then the same right may be exercised in every criminal case as well in the district court as in the circuit court; and the rule is just as applicable in misdemeanors as in the case before the court, which is expressly declared by the act of congress to be a felony. Either the right exists without any limitation, or it does not exist at all; and if it does exist, it may be exercised in every criminal case, whether the judgment was rendered in the district or circuit court, and whether the charge is a felony, punishable with death, or a mere misdemeanor. Seventy years having elapsed, or nearly so, since our judicial system was organized, the conclusion would seem to be a reasonable one that if there is any foundation for the right claimed to be exercised in this case, some trace of a prior exercise of it, or of a claim to exercise it in a criminal case, would be found in some reported decision of the circuit or district courts; but no such decision is referred to, nor is it even suggested in argument that any such right in a criminal case was ever before claimed in either of those courts. Errors of fact in the process issued in a civil action, or such as happened through the fault of the clerk in the record of the proceedings prior to the judgment, might be corrected at common law by a writ of error sued out and returnable in the court where the action was commenced and where the judgment was rendered. When granted to re-examine a judgment rendered in the king's bench, the writ was called a writ of error coram nobis, because it was founded upon a record and process described in the writ as remaining "before us," in accordance with the theory that the sovereign of the kingdom presided in the court. 2 Tidd, Prac. (Am. Ed. 1856) 1137; Jaques v. Cesar, 2 Saund. 101, note 1; De Witt v. Post, 11 Johns. 460. Such writs might also be sued out in the common pleas for a like purpose, that is, for the correction of errors of fact in the process of a civil action, or such as happened in the record of the proceedings through the fault of the clerk; but the writ when sued out and returnable in the latter court was denominated a writ of error coram vobis, because the writ was directed to "you and your associates," meaning the chief justice and the other justices of that court. 1 Archb. Cr. Prac. (6th Ed.) 504. Apart from the fact that these formal differences designated the particular court in which the judgment was rendered, and to which the writ was returnable, they were never of any practical importance, as the office of the writ of error was the same in both courts. Where the error is one of fact, and not of law, a writ of error coram nobis in the king's bench, or coram vobis in the common pleas, lies in the same court, as where the defendant, being under age, appeared by attorney, or where the plaintiff or defendant was a married woman at the commencement of the suit, or died before verdict, or before interlocutory judgment. 2 Tidd, Prac. 1137; 1 Arch. Cr. Prac. 504; 2 Sell Prac. 363.

Errors of the description mentioned are usually corrected in the federal courts on motion to amend, supported, if need be, by affidavit; but reported cases may be found in which it was claimed that a writ of error would lie in the same court to reverse the judgment on account of such defects. Instances of the kind are not numerous, but the practice is not entirely unknown, though it has never received the sanction of the supreme court. Picket v. Legerwood, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 144. Resort to that remedy has certainly been had in a few instances in the circuit courts in civil cases, but the writ of error is usually denominated a writ of error coram vobis, as it is directed to the justices of the court where the judgment was rendered; and all the authorities agree that if the error be in the judgment itself, and not in the process, a writ of error does not lie in the same court to correct it; and the supreme court has decided that it is not one of those remedies over which the supervising power of that court is given by law. Picket v. Legerwood, Id. 148; Waldron v. Craig, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 576; 2 Sell. Prac. 399. Called by whatever name the writ may be, strong doubts are entertained whether the circuit courts are authorized to re-examine their own judgments even in civil cases in that mode of proceeding, as the judiciary act contains no regulations whatever for the exercise of any such power. Such a writ, that is, the writ of error coram nobis, will undoubtedly lie in the king's bench, as before explained, for the correction of errors of fact in the process, or for such as occurred through the misprision of the clerk; and it is equally clear that the power to revise such errors in that mode, extends in that court to criminal cases as well as to civil cases, and that when exercised in the re-examination of criminal cases, it extends to questions of law as well as questions of fact; but the better opinion is that the jurisdiction in criminal cases, except that it extends to questions of law as well as questions of fact, is no more comprehensive than in civil cases. Reg. v. O'Connell, 7 Ir. Law R. 356, 357; 9 Vin. Abr. 491; 1 Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 2. Proceedings in error under that process do not anywhere extend to the judgment in civil cases, as a writ of error for that purpose must be brought in another and superior tribunal. Picket v. Legerwood, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 148; Rolle, Abr. 746; Sell. Prac. 363; 3 Bac. Abr. 366, Error G, 366; 3 Bl. Comm. 407, note 3; 4 Petersd. Abr. 255, Error a, note 3.

Writs of error in case of treason or felony could never be sued out ex debito justitiæ and it was necessary at common law, even in cases below felony, to obtain the fiat of the attorney-general, before the proper clerk could issue the writ. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 369; Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burrows, 2551; Lavett v. People, 7 Cow. 340; Reg. v. Paty, 2 Salk. 503; 2 Gude, Prac. 219.

Applications for a writ of error were never granted at common law without being first subjected to some preliminary examination; and the same remark may be made of the practice in the state courts in all cases where the applicant stands convicted of an offence punishable with death. 1 Archb. Cr. Prac. 717. Direct authority to grant a writ of error in a criminal case is not conferred upon the circuit or district courts, nor is there an act of congress which contains any regulation upon the subject; so that if the right to the writ exists at all, it exists in every case, as a common-law right, whether the applicant was convicted and sentenced in the circuit or district court, and without any necessity that the writ should be previously allowed by the court or by the prosecuting officer. Dugdale's Case, 1 Dears. Crown Cas. 78; 2 Gude, Prac. 219; Reg. v. Paty, 2 Salk. 503; Archb. Pl. & Ev. (15th Ed.) 167. Authority to grant the writ of error in this case, it is contended, may be deduced from the fourteenth section of the judiciary act, which provides, among other things, that the federal courts "shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeably to the principles and usages of law"; but the jurisdiction of the court over the case, as given by the eleventh section of the act, was completed when the petitioner had been indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced, and remanded to prison, and was there remaining awaiting the execution of the final sentence of the law, and the case had passed from the docket of the court. Other writs besides writs of scire facias and habeas corpus may be issued, it is said, though not specially provided for by statute, if they are necessary for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court; and it must be conceded that such is the language of that clause of the section, but the very words of the section are, that such other writs may be issued when necessary for the exercise of their jurisdiction. Unless the writ is necessary to the exercise of jurisdiction already vested in the circuit court, the power to issue the writ cannot be deduced from that clause; but the uniform construction given to the provision is that congress only intended to vest the power to issue such "other writs" in cases where the jurisdiction already existed, and not where the jurisdiction was to be acquired by means of the writ to be issued. M'Clung v. Silliman, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 601; McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 506; Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 624.

Completed as the proceedings in the case were, the circuit court, at the date of this application, had no more power over it than if the indictment had never been found. Examined closely, it is quite clear that the theory of the petitioner does not assume that the writ is necessary to the exercise of any jurisdiction conferred by any other provision in any act of congress; but the argument is, that the clause in question confers the right to issue that writ, and that the power to grant the writ carries with it the power to exercise the jurisdiction under it as known and understood at common law. Grant that theory, and the consequence would be that the circuit courts would at once become courts of general jurisdiction, as the exceptions in the act of congress may be supplied by the act of the court in issuing the appropriate writ under that clause of the fourteenth section of the judiciary act. Apart from the power to issue "such other" writs in aid of jurisdiction already existing, there is no provision contained in the judiciary act which affords any support to the theory of the petitioner, nor does the act contain any regulations upon the subject; and the court is of the opinion that the construction attempted to be given to the clause referred to, is as unwarranted by its language as it is unsupported by the usages and practice of the circuit courts. Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment are common in the circuit courts; but the settled practice is, that the latter as well as the former must be made before the sentence is pronounced. Such certainly was also the general rule at common law, but authorities are not wanting which assert the doctrine that the court might under special circumstances alter the sentence, or even arrest the judgment, without any motion being made, at any time during the same term, for good cause shown, or for errors apparent in the record. King v. Price, 6 East, 323; King v. Waddington, 1 East, 146; 1 Archb. Cr. Prac. & Pl. 186; State v. Harrison, 10 Yerg. 542; Rex v. Lookup, 3 Burrows, 1901; Miller v. Finkle, 1 Park. Cr. R. 374; Com. Dig. "Indictment," note; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 663; Com. v. Hearsey, 1 Mass. 139; Rex v. Justices of Leicestershire, 1 Maule & S. 442; Holden's Case, 2 Leach, 1026. Extreme cases may be imagined where the court would be justified in exercising that extraordinary power, as if it appeared that the act of congress under which the indictment was drawn had been repealed, or if it appeared in a case like the present that the person alleged to have been killed was in full life. Influenced by that consideration, and in view of the fact that a motion in arrest of judgment as well as a motion for new trial was seasonably made in the case, and withdrawn and waived, the court will examine the several causes of error set forth in the assignment annexed to the petition. Causes one and two may be considered together, as they have respect to the jurisdiction of the court. They are as follows:—

1. That there is no sufficient averment in the indictment that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the offence alleged to have been committed by the prisoner. 2. That there is no sufficient averment therein that the supposed injured party was alleged to have been at the time within or under the protection of the United States, or in the peace thereof. Wilful murder, it is suggested, although committed upon the high seas, may not be cognizable in any circuit court of the United States, and the suggestion is doubtless correct; but the indictment in this case alleges in addition to those words, which are of essential importance, that the crime was committed "in and on board of" a certain ship called the "Junior, then and there owned by and belonging to" the four persons therein named, all of whom are alleged to be "citizens of the United States"; and the further allegation is, that all the criminal acts of the prisoner, including both the felonious assault, with malice aforethought, and the mortal wound which terminated the life of the deceased, were committed within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the said United States. Exception in point of fact is not taken to any of these general averments, but the real objection of the prisoner is, that the allegation that the ship is owned by and belongs to certain citizens of the United States is not sufficient to show that the Junior was a ship of the United States within the meaning of the acts of congress giving jurisdiction to the circuit courts in criminal cases. He refers to the first section of the act requiring ships and vessels to be registered, and insists that the first four counts of the indictment are bad because they do not contain the allegation that the Junior was a ship of the United States, but those counts and each of them do contain the allegation that the ship was "owned by and belonging to" certain persons therein duly described by their appropriate names, and it cannot be doubted that those words constitute a sufficient averment as to the ownership of the vessel, and inasmuch as the persons named as such owners are alleged to be citizens of the United States, the argument that the national character of the ship is uncertain on the face of the indictment, is entirely unsupported, and without any foundation. 1 Stat. 287. Ships and vessels are required to be registered or enrolled, it is conceded, in order to be entitled to the benefits and privileges which the register and enrolment confer, but those documents are not indispensable in a prosecution for piracy or murder on the high seas, as the register or enrolment of the vessel may be in the name of one person while the property of the vessel is in another; and the rule is well settled that the property or national character of a vessel is matter in pais, and that it may be proved by parol testimony. U. S. v. Griffin, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 205; U. S. v. Pirates, Id. 199. Indictments founded on the section under consideration must allege that the offence was committed out of the jurisdiction of any particular state as well as that it was committed upon the high seas, because those words are contained in the section defining the offence, and because the circuit courts have no jurisdiction of the crime of murder, even though the crime was committed on board a ship of the United States, as defined in the registry act, if the ship at the time was within the fauces terræ, as the enclosed or landlocked waters of a bay, creek, haven, or basin are not recognized, in criminal cases like the present, as forming a part of the high seas. U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 386; U. S. v. Ross [Case No. 16,196]; U. S. v. Smith [Id. 16,337]; U. S. v. Robinson [Id. 16,176]; U. S. v. Grush [Id. 15,268]; U. S. v. Griffin, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 205. Circuit courts, it must be conceded, do not possess jurisdiction of the crime of murder when committed on board a foreign vessel, except to a very limited extent, and never where the perpetrator of the crime, and the deceased, were both foreigners. On the contrary, the general rule is that such courts have no jurisdiction of the offence even when committed upon the high seas, except when committed on board a ship or vessel of the United States, unless it appears that the vessel was sailing under no national flag. But persons indicted under that section cannot be shielded from the punishment annexed to the offence, because the master of the vessel did not have on board the register or the enrolment of the vessel, nor can they be so shielded even if it appear that the vessel was never legally registered or enrolled, if she was owned by and belonged to citizens of the United States, and that the deceased as well as the prisoner was in and on board the vessel at the time the felonious homicide was committed. Proof of the most satisfactory character was exhibited to the jury that the deceased was a citizen of the United States, and that he was the master of the ship, duly appointed according to law; that the prisoner was in and on board the ship when he committed the felonious assault, and inflicted the mortal wound; that the ship was owned by and belonged to citizens of the United States residing at New Bedford, in this district; that she was duly registered at the custom-house in that collection district; that she sailed from that port on a whaling voyage; that the alleged offence was committed by the petitioner while the vessel was cruising for whales, in the Indian Ocean, under the protection of the flag of the United States; and the court is of the opinion that the allegations of the indictment are sufficient to warrant the introduction of those proofs, and consequently that there is no error in that part of the record. U. S. v. Pirates, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 199. Suppose it was otherwise, still the judgment ought not to be arrested for that cause, as the fifth count of the indictment contains the allegation that the Junior was an "American vessel then and there belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States." Two objections, however, are taken to that count, which will be briefly considered. 1. That the averment that the ship was an American vessel is not sufficient, as the words of the registry act before mentioned are "ships and vessels of the United States"; but there is no merit in the objection, as the two phrases are used indiscriminately in the acts of congress defining offences, and may well be regarded as synonymous in criminal pleading in the federal courts, as applied to ships and vessels belonging to private owners. 2. That the count is also bad because it alleges that the names of the owners of the ship are unknown, whereas their names are set forth in the four counts preceding; but the objection must be overruled, as the prosecutor is always allowed that privilege where the evidence is conflicting, or the real ownership is in any doubt. The next objection is founded on the third cause set forth in the assignment of errors, which is to the effect that the prisoner was not permitted to exercise his constitutional right of challenge to the jurors impanelled for his trial. Challenge for cause is doubtless a constitutional right, as without its exercise the prisoner might be deprived of an impartial jury, but the peremptory challenge is a privilege conferred by law, which may be enlarged, abridged, or annulled by the legislative authority. Twenty peremptory challenges, however, are allowed by law in the federal courts, to a prisoner charged with the crime of murder, and no trial in such a case would be a legal one if that privilege was not fully accorded to the prisoner. Four persons were joined in the same indictment in this case, and two counsel were assigned to each by the court, at their request, before they were required to plead to the merits, and they exercised the right of challenge to the full extent allowed by law, as was admitted by the counsel of the prisoner at the argument. They could not deny that fact; but the precise objection is that no such statement is set forth in the record of the case. Such facts are not usually set forth in the record, nor is it necessary that they should be where the right is fully enjoyed by the prisoner to his entire satisfaction and that of his counsel. Where objections are made, they should be entered in the minutes of the court, and if overruled, the court will save the question whenever thereto requested by the prisoner or his counsel. Causes four and sixteen will be considered together. They are as follows:—

1. That it does not appear by the record that the prisoner was present at the impanelling of the jury or at the trial; or, 2d, when the verdict was rendered by the jury. But it is not possible to sustain any one of those objections, as they are not correct in point of fact. By the record it appears that the prisoners were severally set at the bar, and had the indictment read to them, and that they severally pleaded that they were not guilty; that counsel were assigned to each as before explained; that they acknowledged that they had severally received a copy of the indictment and a list of the jurors, agreeably to law, and more than two days before the day of their trial; that a jury was thereupon impanelled and sworn to try the issue, and that the jury afterwards returned their verdict as set forth in the record. Tested by the record it appears that the whole proceedings took place on the same day, but the docket entries show the exact dates of the several steps in the trial, from the finding of the indictment to the verdict and sentence. Properly construed, the record does show that the prisoner was present at every stage of the trial referred to in those causes of error. The complaint is made, in the next place, that the prisoner was not permitted to address the jury in his own proper person; but the decisive answer to the complaint is that he never made any such request, nor did his counsel in any way signify to the court that he desired any such privilege. He was duly indicted by a grand jury; was informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; was furnished with compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; was confronted with the witnesses against him; was allowed to have the assistance of counsel, and was "permitted to make his full defence by counsel learned in the law." Two counsel were assigned to him of his own selection, and both were permitted to argue to the jury in the close.

Attention will next be called to the sixth cause of error presented by the prisoner, which is that the verdict was rendered upon all the counts of the indictment, and that one or more of the same were defective, and insufficient in law to support the sentence. Evidently the proposition concedes that some of the counts are good, and it may be added that the argument fails to convince the court that any one of them is bad. Grant, however, that one or more of the counts are bad, still as it is conceded that some are good, the court is of the opinion that the objection must be overruled. Undeniably the rule at common law was, that a valid judgment could not be given in a civil case on an uncertain verdict, and that a verdict must be regarded as uncertain if any part of the damages are referable to a bad count; but the rule as universally acknowledged in criminal cases was, "that if there is one good count to support the verdict, it shall stand good, notwithstanding all the rest are bad"; and that is the settled rule in the federal courts, and in all except one of the state courts. Peake v. Oldham, Cowp. 275; Rex v. Benfield, 2 Burrows, 980; Reg. v. Rhodes, 2 Ld. Raym. 886; Rex v. Hill, Russ. & R. 190; Reg. v. Ingram, 1 Salk. 384; Grant v. Astle, 2 Doug. 730; Young v. King, 3 Term R. 98; Rex v. Powell, 2 Barn. & Adol. 75; Rex v. Fuller, 1 Bos. & P. 180; Rex v. Mason, 2 Term R. 581. Where there are several counts, some bad and some good, it is competent for the court, though the verdict is general, to render judgment on the good counts only, but it is not indispensable that any such discrimination should be made, as the presumption of law is, that the sentence was awarded on the good counts. U. S. v. Furlong, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 201; Josslyn v. Com., 6 Metc. [Mass.] 236; Jennings v. Com., 17 Pick. 80; U. S. v. Burroughs [Case No. 14,695]; Parker v. Com., 8 B. Mon. 30; 2 Whart. Cr. Law, § 3047. Special attention is called to the case of O'Connell v. Reg., 11 Clark & F. 155; but it is impossible to adopt that rule, as a different doctrine prevailed in the courts of that country, prior to that decision, for nearly two centuries; and when our ancestors immigrated here, they brought that rule with them as part of the common law, which cannot now be changed by the federal courts. Irvine v. Kirkpatrick, 3 Eng. Law & Eq. 17. Sufficient to say that the matter of complaint set forth in the seventh cause of error is contradicted by the record and the docket entries. The allegation is that the acts of the court are stated in the past tense, but the theory of fact is not sustained in respect to any matter material to the validity of the judgment. Subsequent to the verdict the statement is, that the prisoner moves the court here that the verdict may be set aside, and a new trial granted for the causes therein set forth, numbered from one to ten inclusive, and that the prisoner after verdict and before judgment moves the court here that the judgment be arrested, etc., for the causes set forth in the motion filed at the same time, numbered from one to four inclusive, as appears by the respective motions on file. Time was allowed by the court for preparation, but the motions were set down for hearing at a given day. On the appointed day the counsel of the prisoner moved the court for leave to withdraw the motions, but the court refused to grant such leave until the prisoner was brought into court, and being inquired of personally, the record states that he "asks that such leave may be granted," etc., whereupon the court doth grant him leave to withdraw the said motions, and the same are accordingly waived and withdrawn. Continuing, the record also states, said Plumer is then asked if he has anything to say why judgment of death should not now be pronounced against him, and having replied fully, and no good cause appearing, and all matters having been heard and understood by the court, then follows the sentence of the court, which is in the usual form, and is expressed in the present tense. The eighth cause assigned is, that it does not appear that issue was joined between the prisoner and the United States; but it does appear that he was set at the bar for his arraignment; that the indictment was read to him, and that he said that thereof he was not guilty, and that for trial he put himself upon God and the country, which is all that is required in such cases. Prisoners indicted for the crime of murder are certainly entitled to a list of the jury summoned in the case, two entire days, at least, before the trial. The ninth error assigned is, that it does not appear by the record that such list was furnished as required; but the docket entries show that the list was furnished, and the record shows that the prisoner acknowledged in open court before the jury were impanelled, that he did receive it two entire days prior to that time. Following the order adopted at the argument, the tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth causes of error will be considered together, as they in fact involve but a single proposition. Taken together they allege that the record does not show of what felony the prisoner was convicted, nor for what felony he was sentenced. The offence is fully set forth in each of the five counts of the indictment, and the record shows that the jury found him guilty upon all of the counts, which is a complete answer to the first branch of the proposition. Sentences of the kind when pronounced by the court, are addressed to the prisoner, and of course are spoken in the second person, but the practice is to record the same in the third person, as in this case. Omitting redundant words, the sentence as recorded is to the following effect: it is considered by the court that the said Cyrus W. Plumer be deemed guilty of felony, and that he be taken back to the place from whence he came, and there remain in close confinement until Friday, the 24th of June next, and on that day, between the hours of eleven o'clock in the forenoon and one o'clock in the afternoon, he be taken thence to the place of execution, and that he be there hanged by the neck until he be dead. Apart from the first clause no objection is taken to the sentence, and none can be, as it follows in every particular the form used in every capital case in this circuit since our judicial system was organized. Uncertainty is the foundation of the objection, but two answers may be made to it, either of which is conclusive: 1. That the clause of the sentence, that the prisoner be deemed guilty of felony, is surplusage, and forms no part of the sentence required by law. 2. That the language employed must be construed as applied to the indictment and verdict of the jury, which are set forth in the record, and that the language, when so construed, is certain and free from any ambiguity. Founded as the indictment is upon the fourth section of the act of the 3d of March, 1825, it is clear that the statement that the prisoner be deemed guilty of felony was wholly unnecessary, as it is but the repetition of the legislative enactment, and that it is no part of the judgment of the court.

The repugnancy of the verdict to the clause giving jurisdiction to the court, is the matter included in the fourteenth cause. Five counts are contained in the indictment, and the verdict is that the prisoner is guilty. Sentence was passed upon all the counts; and the argument is, that in comparing the verdict with the jurisdictional clause of the indictment, the legal conclusion is that the prisoner stands convicted of more than one offence, and consequently that the verdict is repugnant to that clause which alleges that the prisoner was "first brought into the district of Massachusetts after committing the aforesaid offence," not offences, as it should have been in order to correspond with the verdict of the jury. But such criticism is too technical to prevail even in criminal pleading, as the several counts are obviously founded on the same homicide. They set forth the killing of the same person, on board the same ship, on the same day, and by substantially the same means; and, if it were otherwise, the proper conclusion would be, that the word "offence" in the jurisdictional clause applied severally to the respective counts, and not collectively, as contended by the counsel of the prisoner. Indictments must be signed by the foreman of the grand jury, but when the word "foreman" is appended to the name of the person signing the same as such, the signature is sufficient, as the designation "foreman" refers to the introductory clause of the indictment, and to the record, as verifying the legal inference that "foreman" means foreman of the grand jury. Remarks upon the last cause assigned, to wit, the eighteenth, are unnecessary, as it was conceded at the argument that it did not have respect to any defects, except such as are included in the special assignments to which reference has been made.

Case No. 16,057.

UNITED STATES v. PLYMPTON.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 309.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1833.

OBTAINING MONEY UNDER FALSE PRETENCES—INDICTMENT—VENUE.

1. An indictment cannot be sustained in Washington county, D. C., for obtaining money by false pretences made out of the county.

2. Quære, whether it is not necessary that all the facts which constitute the offence should have occurred in the county where prosecuted.

[Distinguished in U. S. v. Henning, Case No. 15,349.]

Indictment [against William Plympton] for obtaining money by false pretences. It appeared that the false pretences were made in Baltimore, where the acceptances obtained thereby were made and paid, although the defendant obtained money upon them by getting them discounted in Washington county, D. C.

R. S. Coxe, for defendant, moved the court to instruct the jury that there was no evidence to sustain the indictment, which instruction THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to give; and also refused to instruct the jury that, if the false pretences were made in Maryland, they should find the defendant not guilty, although the money should have been obtained here upon the discount of the bills.

Verdict, guilty; but THE COURT (nem. con.) granted a new trial because the false pretences, if made at all, were not made in this county; and the bills were accepted and paid by the prosecutor, in Baltimore.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, was inclined to think that if the money was obtained by the defendant in this county, it was sufficient to sustain the indictment.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, was of opinion that if the false pretences were not made in this county, the prosecution could not be supported.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, was inclined to the opinion, that all the facts necessary to constitute the offence must have occurred in this county.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 16,058.

UNITED STATES v. PLYMPTON.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 309.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1833.

UTTERING FORGED PAPER — VENUE OF OFFENCE.

A forged paper, inclosed at Baltimore in a letter directed to a person in Washington, D. C., and put into the post-office at Baltimore, is not an uttering of the note in Washington.

[Cited in Palliser v. U. S., 136 U. S. 267, 10 Sup. Ct. 1037.]

Indictment [against William Plympton] for forgery, by altering two checks on the Baltimore Savings Institution, 27th August, 1831; and for uttering them, knowing them to be so forged. The counts for forging the checks were abandoned. Upon the counts for uttering, &c., the uttering, attempted to be proved, was by putting the altered checks, inclosed in a letter, into the post-office in Baltimore in Maryland, directed to Richard Wright, in Washington, D. C.; which was like the case of U. S. v. Wright [Case No. 16,773], at December term, 1821, and April term, 1822, in this court, where the forged paper was put into the post-office in Tennessee, inclosed in a letter directed to a person in Washington; in which case this court, upon a special verdict, decided that the uttering was not in Washington county.

Upon the authority of that case, THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) instructed the jury that the facts proved did not show an uttering in this county.

Verdict, not guilty.

Case No. 16,059.

UNITED STATES v. POAGE.

[6 McLean, 89.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. April Term, 1854.

CRIMINAL LAW — EVIDENCE OF GOOD CHARACTER.

1. The defendant was intimately associated with the individual, who stole the letter containing a hundred dollar bank bill and a promissory note for eighty-two dollars. But he proved himself to be a man of irreproachable character and of high intelligence, by witnesses of undoubted respectability.

2. This would seem to be sufficient to protect him from suspicion, where no other fact is proved to implicate him.

3. He was formerly acquainted with Coyle in Virginia, who was, probably, the guilty party; and this may account for their intimacy.

Mr. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Pendleton, for defendant.

CHARGE OF THE COURT. This is an indictment against the derendant [Alpheus Poage], charging him with stealing from the mail, a certain letter, written by Nesbat, and directed to George H. Calvert, Cincinnati, which contained a bank bill for one hundred dollars and a promissory note for eighty-two dollars. Mr. Nesbat being sworn states, that he lives in Kentucky, at the Dry Ridge post-office; that on the 6th of January last, the above letter was written by him, and directed to George H. Calvert, containing a hundred dollar note, and his own promissory note for eighty-two dollars. On the 11th of the same month, the note was presented to witness for payment by a young man at his residence, with whom defendant was in company. The boy appeared to be fifteen or sixteen years of age, who said he was connected with an insurance company, and was sent out to collect. The note he said had been received from Mr. Calvert. Witness paid the note in cash, except each took a pair of gloves from his store. The note appeared to have been endorsed by George H. Calvert. The witness lives thirty-four miles from Cincinnati, and the letter must have reached the city the day it was mailed. Two letters were sent in the same post bill. Witness thinks the words of the boy were, "We are connected with an insurance company." The name of the young man or boy was James C. Adams. On examination, the witness found the post bill in the Cincinnati post office. Henry G. Galt, a clerk in the post office, opened the packet, at the Cincinnati post office, which contained the post bill and the two letters. Calvert, to whom it was directed, never received it. Mr. Suffield, who works for Calvert, receives his letters from the post office, and did not receive this one. Mr. Jackson, kept the Farmer's Hotel in Covington last January. On the 11th of that month, defendant boarded with witness. On the night of the 10th of January, Coyle staid at his house, and registered his name Adams. He had been once before at the house of witness. Heard him say that he was acquainted with Poage in Virginia. They lodged in the same room the night of the 10th, and the next day they went to the country together in a buggy. On the 12th they returned at about ten o'clock. Mr. Beal, states, that on the 10th of January, he met Mr. Poage early in the morning, who helped witness make a fire, and remained until about 12 o'clock. After some time Poage and the boy came together to the house, at between one and two o'clock. The boy showed a note, and said he had traded a galvanized watch for it, and that if he did not collect the note he would not lose much. The witness identifies the note. When he saw it, it was not endorsed, and he observed to the boy, without the endorsement of Calvert he could not collect the note. The boy soon went out to get the note endorsed, and when he returned, he said that he had met the man, who endorsed it. Mr. Brown, says he first saw defendant at Cabell county, Virginia, and found him fifteen miles beyond Guyandotte. The defendant said that he had known Coyle at Staunton, but had not seen him for some time before he met him at Cincinnati. He said Coyle was in the printing office. Here the evidence of the prosecution closed. Mr. Moore, a citizen of Virginia, was acquainted with the defendant, near Staunton, Virginia. He was then engaged as engineer on a railroad, and was a man of good character and respectably connected. Mr. Harrill, from the same neighborhood, spoke of the excellent character of the defendant, and that he was employed as an engineer on a railroad. Messrs. Walker, Wilson and Marcus all testified to the good character of the defendant in Virginia, where he was engaged in most respectable employments. Some of the above witnesses had been members of the Virginia legislature, and all of them had the appearance of gentlemen, and were intelligent.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

THE COURT observed to the jury, there can be no doubt, from the evidence, that the letter which contained the bank bill and the promissory note of Nesbat was stolen, and from the fact that Coyle had possession of the note and collected it, under false pretenses, he would be presumed to be the guilty person, if now on his trial. The only evidence against the defendant is, that he was associated with Coyle when he collected the note, and received a pair of gloves in the way of change. The association with Coyle before they rode out to Nesbat's and afterwards, lodging in the same room on the night of the 10th of January, was enough to excite suspicion against him. But his good character, being sustained by most respectable witnesses in Virginia, where the defendant was reared and respectably employed, should exonerate him from mere suspicion, founded on such circumstances. Good character can seldom fail to protect an individual from suspicion. A man of intelligence and reputable standing in society, is not likely to indulge in crime, or to do anything which shall forfeit his good name.

If the defendant had participated with Coyle in stealing the letter, he would without doubt have suggested to him, that the note must be endorsed, to enable him to collect it. If he was acquainted with Coyle in Virginia, their intimacy may be accounted for, without presuming any participation of the defendant in the crime charged. And you cannot find the defendant guilty, unless you shall find he participated in stealing the letter. The case is left with you, gentlemen, not doubting, that after deliberately weighing the testimony, you will come to a just conclusion.

Verdict of the jury, not guilty.

Case No. 16,060.

UNITED STATES v. POCKLINGTON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 293.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1822.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSIONS.

The confession of a prisoner, under hopes excited by the examining magistrate that his punishment would be thereby mitigated, cannot be given in evidence against him.

The prisoner [John Pocklington] was indicted for breaking open the storehouse of R. &. R. in Georgetown. He was examined before the mayor of that town, who informed him that one of the party had confessed a part of the charge; and that if he would confess candidly the truth, he would represent his case to the court, and it was probable his punishment might be thereby mitigated.

THE COURT refused to permit his confession, made under those circumstances, to be given in evidence.

Verdict, not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. POILLON. See Case No. 16,081.

Case No. 16,061.

UNITED STATES v. POLACK et al.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 284; [2] Hoff. Op. 32.]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1857.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — ABSENCE OF ARCHIVAL EVIDENCE—POSSESSION AND OCCUPATION.

When the archives contain no evidence or trace of the existence of a grant, the court will demand the fullest and most satisfactory proofs of possession and occupation during the existence of the former government, under a notorious and undisputed claim of title; and clear and indubitable evidence of the genuineness of the grant produced.

[Cited in Bouldin v. Phelps, 30 Fed. 567.]

Claim [by Joel S. Polack and others] for the island of Yerba Buena, or Goat island, situated in the Bay of San Francisco; confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

P. Della Torre, U. S. Atty., and William Blanding, for appellants.

E. L. Goold, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The title of the claimants is derived from a grant alleged to have been made by governor Alvarado, Nov. 8th, 1838, to Juan José Castro. The authority under which the governor acted is a dispatch from the secretary of the interior to the governor of the Californias, dated July 20th, 1838, directing him to grant the islands on the coast in private ownership. There can be no doubt of the governor's authority to make the grant. The only dispute is as to its genuineness. Neither the petition of Castro nor any other document is produced from the archives. So far as appears, the records of the former government do not contain the slightest trace of the alleged transaction. Even the grant itself is not produced, and the claimants rely upon an alleged copy recorded in the recorder's office of this city in 1849. To prove the existence and genuineness of the original, the claimants have introduced a large number of witnesses. The United States have, on the other hand, sought to show that the grant was made by Alvarado, in the city of San Francisco, in the year 1848, and antedated. Juan José Castro, the original grantee, testifies that he presented a petition to the governor in November, 1838, at Santa Barbara, and that the grant was issued in that month; that he put sheep, goats and hogs upon the island, and retained possession of it until 1848, when he sold it to Jones for $1,000, which was paid to him in the presence of one G. H. Nye; that Alvarado and Maria C. Miranda were present when the deed was made. He adds, "If the grant was not recorded in the archives, it was the fault of the officers, not mine." The witness further states, that at the time of the sale to Jones, he delivered to the latter the original petition and grant, and all the papers relating to the title. It may be observed, in passing, that it is strange that the grantee should have had possession of the original petition—a document which was usually retained by the government, and constituted a part of the expediente on file in the archives. It is also strange that Jones, when he delivered in 1849 (not 1848, as stated by Castro) his papers to be recorded, should have omitted this document, so important to show the regularity of the proceedings. Governor Alvarado testifies in positive terms that he made the grant in 1838. That the copy produced is a substantial copy of the grant made by him, and that he was present, together with J. B. R. Cooper and his wife, when Castro executed the conveyance to Jones. Joaquin Castro, brother of the grantee, deposes that he saw the grant in the possession of the grantee in 1838 or 1839; that it was on common paper; that he read it, and that the paper produced is a copy of it substantially; that he saw his brother take some sheep in a boat to put them on the island, and that he saw the remains of a house he built there in 1843 or 1844. José Castro testifies that he was at the office of Gov. Alvarado, in Santa Barbara, in 1838, where he accidentally saw lying on the table a grant which he examined, and found to be a grant of the island of Yerba Buena to Juan José Castro. Jesus Maria Castro testifies, that in the year 1838 his brother Juan José, the grantee, went to Santa Barbara to see Gov. Alvarado, and when he came back he brought a concession for the island; that in 1839 he saw the paper in his mother's hands; that all the papers relating to their rancho were in a little box; that on looking them over, he saw amongst them the title to Yerba Buena. It was signed by Gov. Alvarado, but had no seal. The witness states that he does not know whether his brother was in possession of the island when the Americans came; that he told him (witness) that he was going to put some sheep and hogs upon it. Antonio Ortega testifies, that in 1840 he asked for the island of Yerba Buena, that Gov. Alvarado said he could not give it to him, as he had already granted it to Juan José Castro; that afterwards in 1840, he with one Guerrero were in the house of a man named Hinckley when Juan José Castro arrived in a boat from San José with some hogs; that Hinckley asked what he was going to do with them, to which he replied that he was going to keep them on the island; that Hinckley asked if he would sell the island; that he said "Yes, for $3,000;" that he heard Castro tell many persons he had a title to the island. José Jesus Pico testifies that he was at the mission of San Antonio in 1839; that Juan José Castro came from below and stopped at his house; that this was in July or August of 1839; that while talking together of lands and ranchos, Castro showed him a concession of the island of Yerba Buena; that he read it—it had no seal, it was on white paper, and had a written and not a printed heading, and was signed by Gov. Alvarado.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The above are all the witnesses who testify to having seen the grant before the date of the sale to Jones, Dec. 7th, 1848. Henriques, who was the clerk to whom Jones, in 1849, delivered the grant and conveyance for record, testifies that he took particular notice of the paper; that it was Mexican paper and had a departmental stamp. Jesus Maria Castro says the title he saw had no seal. Pico says it had no heading or habilitacion. Juan José Castro says the copy produced is "an accurate copy;" but it has neither heading nor seal. Joaquin Castro says it was on common paper. It could therefore have had neither heading nor seal. José Jesus Pico says it was on white paper, and had a written and not a printed heading. That he did not pay any attention to any other part than the governor's signature, the name of the island and the heading of the paper, "as all concessions are alike." And finally, Gov. Alvarado describes it as being issued "in the usual form." These discrepancies are certainly calculated to suggest a doubt as to the reliability of the witnesses. That this concession was not "in the usual form," or like all other concessions, is obvious. Its language and form are peculiar. It contains no conditions. It refers to the superior order of Aug. 18th, 1838, instead of the laws of 1824 and the regulations of 1828. It is not signed by the secretary. It contains no direction "that a note be taken in the corresponding book." It has no seal, and has no heading or habilitacion, nor any note of the fact that common paper was used for want of stamped paper. It is difficult to imagine how the witnesses, if they really saw and if they recollect accurately the contents of the paper, could have supposed such a concession to be like all others, or "in the usual form." It is not meant, however, that there is anything conclusive in these inaccuracies. It is possible that they may have seen the title, remembered the names of the grantor, the grantee and the island, and have failed to remember precisely whether the grant had a seal or a heading. It is only when they undertake to speak positively on these points, and are found to be inaccurate, that a doubt as to their good faith is suggested. The concession is dated November 8th, 1838. Jesus Maria Castro testifies, as has been stated, that in 1838 his brother went to Santa Barbara to see Gov. Alvarado, and when he came back brought a concession for the island with him. Gov. Alvarado swears that he did not see Castro in Santa Barbara at the time of making the grant. And José Jesus Pico says that in July or August of 1839, Castro stopped at his house at the mission of San Antonio, on his way back from Santa Barbara, when he took out of his pocket, or out of the "traps" on his horse, the concession which he showed to the witness. The witness is positive as to the year 1839, and thinks that it was in July or August. If then, as Jesus Maria Castro testifies, the grantee went to Santa Barbara to procure the grant in 1838, and of course before its date, Nov. 8th, and if he, on his return from Santa Barbara in July or August, 1839, showed it to Pico, he must have taken eight or nine months to perform the journey. It would seem that so long an absence from his home could hardly have been forgotten by the grantee or his brothers; neither of them, however, mention this protracted absence, and Juan José Castro testifies that he presented a petition to Gov. Alvarado at Santa Barbara, in Nov., 1838, and that the land was granted at the date of the concession.

On the part of the United States, the principal witnesses are G. H. Nye and J. H. Brown. Nye testifies that he saw Alvarado sign a paper which he understood to be a grant of the island of Yerba Buena. That this was done at the house of John Cooper, commonly called "Jack the Soldier;" that Cooper, Alvarado, Castro, Tolivia, Jones and witness were present; that he met Jones on the way to Cooper's whither he (witness) was going to get a saddle; that he interpreted the document to Jones; that he made no remark about its being antedated; that Tolivia was asked to sign as a witness, but declined, saying he would not put his name to a false document; that but one document was made out on this occasion; that he was not asked to sign as a subscribing witness.

He further states, that after the conclusion of the business, Jones took the paper and went away; that when passing Leidesdorff's house, Jones rubbed his hands against an adobe wall, and then rubbed the paper between them, and that being asked the reason, he replied that it was to give the paper the appearance of age; that he accompanied Jones to his house, and soon after Alvarado, José Castro and the alcalde came in and the transfer to Jones was made. This witness was reëxamined in open court, after the case was removed on appeal. He then stated that the paper to which he referred was a deed from Castro to Jones, and that he saw but one document, and that it was signed by Castro and Alvarado. Jones' name was mentioned in it. The witness repeats the account of Jones rubbing the paper with his hands to give it an ancient appearance, and adds that afterwards Alvarado and Castro met at Jones' house, when the alcalde was called in, and the paper was signed by him. That the paper signed by the alcalde was the same paper he had seen at Cooper's house. Juan B. R. Cooper and Tolivia have both been called as witnesses by the claimants. Whatever the nature of the transaction at Cooper's house was, they are by Nye himself stated to have been present. In the copy of the deed to Jones, the name of Cooper and that of his wife, Cecilia Miranda, appear as subscribing witnesses. Cooper denies all knowledge of the ante-dated grant. He relates the circumstances of the interview, that some money was paid, and that he and his wife were called to sign a paper as witnesses; that he thinks it was a transfer or receipt for money. Tolivia Fanfaran testifies that he was present at the sale of the island by Castro to Jones; that Gov. Alvarado drew up a paper for the sale; that he was not asked to sign as a witness, nor did he decline to do so, as stated by Nye, and that the whole transaction, so far as he knew, was fair and honest.

The above testimony, with that of Alvarado, by whom, of course, the fabrication of the grant is denied, is all that relates to the transaction at Cooper's house. The theory of the United States rests on the testimony of Nye, uncorroborated, except indirectly by Brown, as will presently be noticed. Captain Nye's testimony is by no means reliable. He is shown to have sustained injury by a fall which has seriously impaired his faculties; and the evidence by him is contradictory. That a paper was drawn up and money paid by Jones at Cooper's house, is admitted. That Castro, Alvarado, Cooper, Nye, Cecilia Miranda and Tolivia were present, is also clear. The deed to Jones, a copy of which is produced, bears the signatures of Cooper, Nye, Cecilia Miranda and Alvarado. Cooper and Alvarado both swear that they signed as witnesses the paper drawn up on the occasion referred to. And Nye himself says there was but one paper, and that it was signed by Alvarado and Castro. If this be so, the paper must have been the deed to Jones, and not the grant, which was necessarily signed by Alvarado alone. If Tolivia was asked to sign, as stated by Nye, it must have been the deed he was requested to witness, and not the grant. To ask him to witness a grant by the governor, purporting to have been made ten years previously, would have been absurd. The only hypothesis on which we can suppose the grant to have been fabricated, as stated by Nye in his first deposition, is, that both the grant and the deed were drawn up at the same time. But Nye is positive that only one paper was drawn up, and this in his second deposition he states to be the deed. The story told by this witness is so confused, improbable and inconsistent and it is contradicted by so many witnesses, that it is impossible for the court to found a judgment upon the assumption of its truth. J. H. Brown testifies that he kept the City Hotel in this city, and while behind the bar heard a conversation between Alvarado and Jones, which was interpreted by Captain Nye. That the former agreed to make a title to Castro, by whom a deed should be given to Jones. That $2,000 was at first demanded, and subsequently $1,600 was agreed upon. That they agreed to meet at John Cooper's to prepare the papers. This witness describes with much particularity the place where the parties stood, and states that he attended on the court compulsorily, and only in obedience to the subpœna; that he never had heard what Nye had testified; that he had stated the circumstances three years ago to one Thompson, who was purchasing an interest in the island. Captain Nye, who was recalled after the deposition of Brown, emphatically denies ever having interpreted between Alvarado and Jones, as stated by Brown, as does also Governor Alvarado. To corroborate the proofs of the existence of the grant before 1848, the claimants have called W. H. Richardson, who swears that in 1839 he heard that Castro had a grant for the island; and Albert Packard, who testifies that in 1847 he made a translation of a grant for Yerba Buena to one of the Castros, of which he believes the paper produced to be a copy. Roland Gelston swears that in 1847 Jones asked him his opinion of its value, and stated that he had seen a grant for it to Castro. Manuel Torres testifies that on his arrival here in 1843, he asked Juan José and Joaquin Castro to whom the island belonged, and that Juan José said it was his. William Reynolds states that he was on the island in 1845, for the first time; that he there met with one Jack Fuller and Captain Hinckley; that Fuller said that the goats on the island belonged to him and one Spear, and they were on the island by permission of the owner, who was one of the Castros; witness does not recollect which. William F. Swazey, notary public, states that in 1846 he knew Spear intimately; that he frequently talked of the goats he had on the island; and that he always was led to believe from his conversations with Spear, Fuller and others that the title to the island was in one of the Castros, and that such was his impression from general report. On the other hand, Samuel Brannan, who came to San Francisco in 1846, Sherreback, who came here in 1841, Buckelew, Leavenworth and Captain Halleck testify that they never heard of the grant until 1848. Leavenworth was alcalde up to August, 1849, and from his position may be supposed to have had some means of information. Sherreback swears that on his first arrival in 1841 he had three or four men cutting wood on the island for his ship; that there were no houses on it from 1841 to 1845; that he never heard of a title to the island until August or September, 1848, when Jones told him he had purchased it from Alvarado. The witness is positive that Jones said he purchased it from Alvarado, and that Castro's name was not mentioned. He also states that he has seen Alvarado and Jones conversing together at his house several times, and that Nye interpreted between them—as Jones did not speak one word of Spanish. That on one occasion Jones, Alvarado and Nye came out of the sitting-room together; that Alvarado and Nye went away, but Jones stopped to pay for the refreshments they had had; and that Jones then stated he had bought the island from Alvarado. If this account be true, it disproves the testimony of Nye and Alvarado, who both deny ever having had such interviews. With regard to Jones' inability to speak "one word of Spanish," Sherreback is contradicted by Colonel Stevenson, who says that Jones spoke Spanish as well as Americans generally do; that Jones was an educated man, etc.

George Patterson, who came to this country as a sailor before the mast, and now keeps a bar for retailing liquor, says that he was on the island in 1840; that from that time until 1848 he has been there repeatedly; that he saw no cattle or cultivation of any kind, nor heard of any title until 1848; heard that Jones had a title, but never heard that Castro had; knows that Castro had a title to an island adjoining the Peralta claim, called "Brooks' Island"; that Fuller and Spear had goats on Yerba Buena island; and that in 1842 two men named Cozzens and Smith had sheep upon it. He never saw a hog upon it. The credibility of this witness is somewhat impaired, however, by his statements on cross examination respecting his intimacy with Castro, with whom he was evidently unable to communicate, as he cannot speak Spanish; by his denial that Dowling, who is principally interested in defeating this claim, ever spoke to him about the testimony he was to give, although he was subpœnaed by Dowling, and has since been twice at his house; and by his statement that when told the district attorney wanted to see him, "he could not imagine what it was for," &c., &c. Benjamin R. Buckelew testifies that at the end of 1848 or beginning of 1849, he had "a very distinct conversation" with Jones respecting the island. That he, witness, expressed, as he had previously done, his doubts whether Jones would get it acknowledged by the United States; that Jones asked his reasons: to which he replied, that Jones and himself and all the old settlers knew it to be vacant land; that Jones replied, "that would make no difference, as he had the title so fixed and fastened that the United States could not avoid acknowledging it." The witness adds that he frequently stated to Jones that if any one had a right to the island it was Fuller and Spear; that they were in possession of it when he and Jones came to the country, and up to 1848. He further states that up to 1848, there were no buildings on the island. Captain Halleck, who came to this country in 1847 as an officer of engineers, testifies that it became his duty to examine into and report upon the titles of places to be reserved for army and navy depots; that after inquiry, he found no title or claim to Yerba Buena Island, and reported it as vacant. He also states, that in a conversation with Jones in 1850, he mentioned to him the reports that the title was made in this town in 1850 and antedated, and that he subsequently admitted the fact. This admission was made, however, after Jones had sold the island, and cannot be received in evidence. The witness also states, on his cross examination, that amongst those of whom he inquired as to the existence of a title to the island, was W. A. Richardson; and that from no source did he learn that any existed, nor did he hear of any until the end of 1848 or beginning of 1849. It is to be remembered that Richardson swears that Castro built a house on the island; that he knew of the grant to Castro; and that he had Indians on it whenever he saw it—the last time being in 1841. A report made by Captain Halleck to Assistant Adjutant General Turner in 1847, is produced, in which Yerba Buena is mentioned, and a recommendation made that measures be taken to secure a title to it and other military points mentioned. Yerba Buena is certainly not in this report stated to be "vacant public land." If Capt. Halleck alludes to this report as that wherein he reported the island vacant, he is evidently mistaken. There is nothing however in the language of the report, or the suggestion that a title should be secured to the island, which is necessarily inconsistent with the idea on the part of the writer that the land was vacant. But whatever errors the witness may have fallen into with regard to the contents of his reports, it is almost impossible that he should be mistaken as to the fact which he states so positively, that he did not hear of any title to the island. He swears that Richardson, then collector of the port under the Americans, accompanied him and Capt. Warner to Angel island, Alcatras and Point Caballos; and that he showed them where to land on Yerba Buena island. As the object of these visits was to examine the sites, and the officers were directed to obtain information as to the titles of the various military points, it is impossible that they should not have been informed by Richardson of the title to Yerba Buena island, if the latter had then heard of any; nor is it conceivable that if informed by Richardson of Castro's title, Capt. Halleck should have forgotten it. The conflict, therefore, between Capt. Halleck's testimony and Richardson's is irreconcilable, unless we suppose Richardson, when inquired of by Halleck, to have willfully and without an object stated that there was no title, knowing all the time that, as he has since sworn, Castro had a title, and had built a house for Indians upon it.

Much other testimony has been taken in this case which I do not think it necessary particularly to examine. On reviewing the whole testimony, it is impossible not to feel that the claim set up is liable to the gravest suspicion. The only witnesses who pretend to have seen the grant before the American occupation differ from each other on all points except those essential to be established, viz., the names of the grantor and the grantee and of the island. The existence of the grant seems to have been known to but a very small number of people, and to have been unknown to persons such as Buckelew, Sherreback, Brannan and Leavenworth, who would probably have heard of it. The grant itself is not produced, that its genuineness might be judged of on inspection. No trace of its existence, or of any application for it, appears in the archives. There has been no occupation of the land, even if the claimants' witnesses are believed, which could be deemed to amount to a possession of it, or even to the assertion of a claim to it. The claimants' own witness, Ortega, testifies that in 1840 he applied for a grant of the island, which Alvarado refused. Admitting this to be true, it proves that Ortega at least thought it vacant—an idea incompatible with the exercise by Castro of open and notorious proprietary rights.

If the only question in the case was—"Have the United States proved the grant to have been fabricated in Cooper's house in 1848," perhaps, under the proofs, the answer would be in the negative. But amidst all the inconsistencies, contradictions and retractions in the depositions of Capt. Nye, he constantly adheres to the story of Jones rubbing the paper to give it an appearance of age. This story he repeats in his second deposition, although obviously willing at that time to qualify as far as possible his former testimony. It is told with a circumstantiality which gives to it the air of a narrative of an actual occurrence. The mental imbecility which the claimants have been at pains to prove, though it might lead him to confound one paper with another, would hardly allow him to invent such an incident, or after so long an interval to repeat the invention with so much accuracy. Brown, too, corrroborates his story. He is positive and clear, nor has his character been impeached. That Alvarado, Castro, Nye and Jones were present at the hotel, though positively denied by Alvarado, is testified to by Sherreback; and the suggestion that their conversation might have related to the mistaken date of the superior order under which Alvarado acted, and which was misunderstood, or has been misrepresented by Brown, admits that Alvarado has sworn falsely in denying that such interviews ever took place.

It seems to me that the case is one in which the court should require, before pronouncing in favor of the claim, either record evidence from the archives of the former government, or at least that proof of the genuineness and date of the grant afforded by a notorious and unequivocal occupation of the land and the assertion of a right of ownership to it. It is not pretended, or at least no proof whatever has been offered to show, that an expediente of the proceedings with reference to the grant ever existed. The petition itself was, if Castro is to be believed, delivered first to him, and then by him to Jones. It is unaccountable that it should not have been recorded with the other papers. The book mentioned in Capt. Folsom's deposition as having been burnt, contained merely a note or list of titles. No evidence is offered that this grant was among the number. Had a note been taken of it in the "corresponding book," a memorandum to that effect would in all probability have been made at the foot of the grant by the secretary, as was usual. But this grant contains none such, nor is it even signed by the secretary. The authority under which the governor acted directed him to grant "de acuerdo" with the departmental assembly. It would seem, therefore, that their concurrence or approval was required in this as in ordinary colonization grants. From 1838 to 1846, while the assembly was in session, it was never presented to that body. The only explanation offered is that given by Alvarado, viz.: That the assembly resolved "that the governor should act under the order without further advice from them." No resolution to this effect is produced. The fact rests on the bare statement of Alvarado. As against the Mexican government, this grant, even if genuine, is barren of all equities. The object of the superior order of the twentieth of July, 1828, was to protect the islands on the coast from settlement by foreign adventurers, and from becoming a resort for smugglers. It is difficult to see how placing a few sheep and hogs upon this island, supposing it to have been done, could have in any degree fulfilled the intentions of the granting power. If occupation and settlement were required in any case, it would seem that in a grant made under the motives and policy which dictated this, they should surely have been insisted on. That the island was never occupied by the grantee is, I think, established beyond reasonable doubt. Even his own brother is unable to state whether he ever took possession of it. From 1840 to 1847 no one was living on it. Capt. Nye swears that he has known it twenty-two years, and that in 1836 he put goats upon it. From these is probably derived its popular name of "Goat Island." The fact of Castro's placing hogs and sheep upon it, if he in truth did so, can neither be regarded as any substantial settlement or occupation, nor even as evidence of the assertion of a title to it in himself. If then the concurrence of the assembly be deemed to have been necessary to fully transfer the title of the Mexican nation to the grantee, the grant unapproved would constitute an inchoate or imperfect title, and the fulfillment of the implied conditions and the performance of the acts which constituted the only consideration for it, would seem necessary to perfect the equity of the grantee and entitle him to demand a confirmation at the hands of this or the former government. But this objection to the claim it is unnecessary further to consider, for the claim must be rejected on other grounds. In the recent case of U. S. v. Cambuston [20 How. (61 U. S.) 59], it is clearly intimated by the supreme court that in cases like that under consideration, record evidence of the grant should be produced, or its absence satisfactorily accounted for. Neither has been done in this case. The case presented is not that of a Californian, found at the acquisition of the country living on his rancho, under a claim of title notorious and undisputed, and who merely asks the United States to recognize his rights. On the contrary, the application is for a title from the United States to parties who have never inhabited, occupied or cultivated any portion of the land solicited. Engaged as this court has been for several years in the investigation of these cases, it is idle to disguise the fact already notorious in the country and so often painfully apparent to the court, that the parol testimony by which these claims have been sought to be established, is in many instances utterly unreliable. The best if not the only tests of the genuineness of an alleged grant are to be found in the record evidence contained in the archives, and in the fact that the land has been occupied under a notorious claim of title recognized by the former government. Under the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Fremont [18 How. (59 U. S.) 30], the latter of these tests cannot in general be applied; for the non-occupation can usually be excused or accounted for by parol proofs. The later case of U. S. v. Cambuston [20 How. (61 U. S.) 59] seems to indicate that the supreme court are resolved to apply the former test with rigor. But at least it may be asserted with confidence, that where there is no trace of the grant in the archives, no possession or unequivocal claim of ownership during the continuance of the former government, and the grant itself is not produced, the court should demand the clearest and most indubitable proofs of the genuineness of the title. If such be not offered, and if the testimony as in this case be conflicting and unsatisfactory, it is the duty of the court to pronounce the claim not proved. Such, after the most careful consideration, I feel to be my duty in the case at bar.

UNITED STATES v. POLER. See Case No. 16,075.

Case No. 16,062.

UNITED STATES v. POLHAMUS et al.

[13 Blatchf. 200.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 19, 1875.

NEW TRIAL — WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE — ACTION TO RECOVER EMBEZZLED MONEYS.

1. A paymaster in the army speculated in stocks, employing the defendants as his brokers. To make good his losses, and pay his obligations to the defendants, he embezzled funds of the United States, intrusted to him, and remitted to the defendants at least $358,000 of government funds, of which sum at least $93,000 had been sent in his official checks upon the assistant treasurer of the United States, in the city of New York, payable to the order of the defendants, and the residue in currency, or in checks on private bankers or on national banks. This suit was brought to recover the amount so received by the defendants, on the ground that they knew that the money was the money of the government, and had been improperly used, or that they received the money with notice of facts from which they could only properly infer that the paymaster was unlawfully expending the funds of the government in payment of his private debts. The jury found for the defendants. On a motion for a new trial, made by the plaintiffs, on the ground that the verdict was so against the evidence, or against the weight of evidence, that it was apparent that the jury were influenced by mistake, sympathy or prejudice: Held, that the motion must be granted.

2. The motion would not be granted if the claim were solely for the amount sent otherwise than in official checks.

3. The jury were properly charged, that, where a trustee delivers, in payment of his individual debt, property which is stamped with the insignia of ownership as trustee, the creditor takes the property with notice of the trust, and at his peril, if he does not make suitable inquiry as to the right of the trustee thus to dispose of the property.

4. The defendants, in explanation, gave evidence that their business was large, and that their time was so engrossed that they could not examine checks, and that they endorsed checks without looking at the face of the check, and that, therefore, they did not know that these were sub-treasury checks. The court was of opinion that the case, so far as it concerned such checks, turned, in the minds of the jury, on such evidence, and that the magnitude of the amount involved in the suit, and the serious detriment which would accrue to the defendants from a verdict against them, while such a verdict would be of very slight value to the plaintiffs, in consequence of the insolvency of the defendants, had some influence on the minds of the jury.

---

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[This was an action by the United States against James A. Polhamus and Eugene J. Jackson to recover a sum of money received by the defendants, which had been embezzled from the government. Heard on a motion for a new trial.]

Henry E. Tremain, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
Roger A. Pryor, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. Major J. Ledyard Hodge, a paymaster in the United States army, commenced, in the year 1863, to speculate in stocks in the city of New York, employing the defendants as his brokers. These stock speculations were at first of comparatively small amount, but increased, after the year 1867, until they had attained very large magnitude. From time to time they resulted very disastrously to Major Hodge, who, in order to make good his losses, and pay his obligations to his brokers, embezzled the funds of the United States, with which he was intrusted, until the deficit was discovered in the month of September, 1871, when he was dismissed from office, and pleaded guilty to charges of embezzlement. It was satisfactorily ascertained, either from his own confession, or by evidence derived from an examination of his accounts, that at least $358,000 of government funds had been remitted by him to his brokers, of which sum at least $93,000 had been sent in his official checks upon the assistant United States treasurer, in the city of New York, and the residue had been sent in currency, or in checks upon private bankers, or upon national banks. The checks upon the assistant treasurer bore respectively the following dates, and were for the following amounts: December 15th, 1865, $5,000; September 25th, 1869, $20,000; September 27th, 1869, $13,000; September 28th, 1869, $15,000; and July 18th, 1870, $40,000. An action of indebitatus assumpsit was thereupon commenced by the United States against the defendants, for the recovery of the amount which had been thus received by them, upon the ground that they knew that the money was the money of the government, and that it had been improperly used by Major Hodge, or that they received the money with notice of facts from which they could only properly infer that the trustee was unlawfully expending in payment of his private debts the funds of his cestui que trust. This action was tried before a jury, who returned a verdict for the defendants. The government thereupon filed a motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was so against the evidence, or against the weight of evidence, in the cause, that it was apparent that the jury were influenced by mistake, sympathy or prejudice, and upon the ground that the charge and rulings of the court were erroneous.

Upon the point that the verdict was against evidence, it is not strenuously urged that, as to the amount which was sent in currency, or in private checks, the evidence against the defendants was of such uniform character as to demand a new trial, though it is claimed that the verdict was against the weight of evidence in respect to those sums; but it is claimed that, as to the $93,000 which was sent and received in official drafts upon the sub-treasury, the jury mistook the charge of the court, and rendered a verdict palpably in violation of the evidence which was introduced. If the claim of the government against the defendants had been solely for the amount which was sent in currency, or in unofficial checks, I do not think that a court would be justified in directing a new trial. As to the amount which was sent in official checks, the case rested upon different principles from those which appertained to the residue of the plaintiffs' claim. These checks were the checks of Major Hodge, as paymaster of the United States army, upon the well known depository of the funds of the government, to the order of the defendants, and were sent directly to the payees, in payment of the private debts of the drawer, and were collected and credited upon the account of Major Hodge. Upon this part of the case, the court charged the jury in conformity with the rule of law, that, when a trustee delivers, in payment of his individual debts, property which is stamped with the insignia of ownership as trustee, the creditor takes the property with notice of the trust, and, if it is received without making suitable inquiry as to the right of the trustee thus to dispose of the property of the cestui que trust, the recipient takes it at his peril. He is guilty of negligence if no suitable inquiry is made. The general rule was laid down with sufficient fullness. But, the fact that the property bears upon its face the evidence that it is owned by the seller or the payer, as trustee, is not conclusive upon the liability of the defendant, who is always at liberty to show that he did make suitable inquiry. If he receives property which is known to be trust property, he is prima facie liable to the cestui que trust, and the burden is thrown upon the defendant of explaining his conduct to the satisfaction of the jury. The defendants in this case offered evidence which was proper to go to the jury in explanation and justification of their acts. They gave evidence that their business during the period which was included in their transactions with Major Hodge, was enormously large; that their time was so engrossed that they could not examine checks; that checks were endorsed, when presented to them, by the person whose business it was to make the deposits, without examination or without reading, or looking at the face of, the check; and, therefore, that they did not know that these were sub-treasury checks. I have reason to know that the case, so far as it concerned this class of remittances, turned, in the minds of the jury, upon the evidence which was thus offered by the defendants, of their want of knowledge upon whom the checks were drawn. I was of the opinion, at the time of the trial, that the case was not such as to justify a direction to the jury to find a verdict for $93,000 in favor of the plaintiffs. There was a question of fact which involved a large amount of property, and which involved, to some extent, the character of the defendants, which was proper to be submitted to a jury. I am still of the opinion that it should have been so submitted, or else that the principle of trial by jury is not to be regarded. But, I am of opinion, after careful consideration of the case, that the evidence was such that the supervisory power of a court should be interposed, and that the facts should be submitted to the scrutiny of another jury. It is not necessary for me to consider the subject of new trials upon the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. The principles of law are well known. It is sufficient for me to say, that if the plaintiff in this case was an individual cestui que trust, whose property had been thus placed by an unworthy trustee in the hands of the defendants, I should not feel satisfied that my duty had been discharged until I had remitted the question to the test of a new trial; and, although the treasury of the government is in the annual receipt of millions, and a favorable verdict for the amount which is at stake will perhaps be of no serious benefit to the United States, while a verdict against the defendants may have the effect of permanently crippling those whom financial reverses have already rendered insolvent, yet it is the duty of a court to regard solely its obligations as a court of justice, and not to be swayed by the comparative effect of its decisions upon the parties. The magnitude of the amount which is involved in this case, and the serious detriment which would accrue to the defendants from a verdict against them, while such a verdict would be of very slight value to the plaintiffs, I think had some influence upon the minds of the jury.

I have doubted whether the discretionary power of the court should be exerted in favor of a new trial, when an exceedingly intelligent and capable jury had once rendered a verdict, after an absence of only fifteen or twenty minutes, and when, in consequence of the insolvency of the defendants, a different verdict, if it should be rendered, would in all probability be of no pecuniary value to the United States, but I am satisfied that these considerations are subordinate to those which I have already stated.

The plaintiffs also moved for a new trial upon the ground of error of law in the charge and rulings of the court. It is not necessary to consider these questions, in view of the disposition which has been made of the motion

The motion for a new trial is granted.

Case No. 16,063.

UNITED STATES v. The POLLY AND JANE.

[2 Hall, Law J. 458.]

District Court, D. New York. Aug. Term, 1809.

EMBARGO—LADING WITHOUT INSPECTION.

[A vessel is liable to forfeiture under the statute of January 9, 1808 (2 Stat. 506), for taking on goods exceeding $400 in value in the aggregate, without permit and inspection, although they were taken at different times and places, and at no one time to the amount of $400 in value.]

[This was a libel of forfeiture against the sloop Polly and Jane for alleged violation of the embargo law of January 9, 1808 (2 Stat. 506).]

In this case the libel also charged a lading without permit and inspection, and it appeared in evidence that goods of a greater value than $400, were so taken on board the sloop, as composing her cargo for an intended illicit voyage, but that the lading was effected at different times and places and at no one time to the amount of $400 worth.

His honour held the different ladings of the cargo as aforesaid to be a continuation of the same transaction and one offence; and that the aggregate value of the goods so laden exceeding in amount the sum of $400, the vessel, &c. became liable to forfeiture.

Condemned.

Case No. 16,064.

UNITED STATES v. The POLLY AND NANCY.

[1 Hall, Law J. 483.]

District Court, D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 9, 1808.

EMBARGO—CARRYING PROHIBITED GOODS.

[Sea stores and provisions are not to be considered as a part of the cargo, so as to be forfeitable under the act of January 9, 1808 (2 Stat. 507), along with goods which the ship was prohibited from taking by the statute.]

This libel was filed by Mr. Dallas, the district attorney, against the schooner Polly and Nancy, John Russel, master, a British owned vessel, and her cargo, seized by the collector for a breach of the laws relating to the embargo, by taking on board prohibited goods.

Mr. Hopkinson appeared for the master, who was also the owner of the vessel; alleged that the illegal act was committed without the knowledge or approbation of his client; but submitted to the condemnation of the vessel and cargo, excepting the sea stores and provisions.

After hearing Mr. Dallas, on the one side, and Mr. Hopkinson, on the other, THE COURT decided that upon general principles, as well as upon the particular words of the fifth section of the act of the 9th of January, 1808 [2 Stat. 507], the sea stores and provisions could not be considered as a part of the cargo, liable to forfeiture.

Case No. 16,065.

UNITED STATES v. POMEROY.

[3 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 143.]

District Court, N. D. New York. July 10, 1844.

POST OFFICE LAWS — SENDING LETTERS BY EXPRESS.

A person who sends a packet of letters by a passenger in a railroad car over a post road, without the knowledge and against the consent of the owners of the car and their agents, is not subject to the penalty imposed by the nineteenth section of Act Cong. c. 275 [3 Story's Laws, 1990; 4 Stat. 107, c. 64].

[Followed in U. S. v. Hall, Case No. 15,201.]

Joshua A. Spencer, U. S. Dist. Atty.

S. Stevens and M. T. Reynolds, for defendant.

CONKLING, District Judge. This is a penal action [against George E. Pomeroy], founded on the nineteenth and twenty-fourth sections of the act regulating the post office department, passed March 3, 1825. By the nineteenth section it is enacted, that no stage or other vehicle, which regularly performs trips on a post road, or on a road parallel to it, shall carry letters: that for a violation of this provision, the owner of the carriage or other vehicle, shall incur the penalty of fifty dollars: Provided, that it shall be lawful for any one to send letters by special messenger. By other sections of the act many other acts are prohibited, and declared punishable. And the twenty-fourth section provides in general terms, that every person who, from and after the passage of this act, shall procure, and advise, or assist, in the doing or perpetration of any of the acts or crimes by this act forbidden, shall be subject to the same penalties and punishments as the persons are subject to who shall actually do or perpetrate any of the said acts or crimes according to the provisions of this act.

The declaration contains twenty counts, each charging the defendant with having procured. advised, and assisted a certain vehicle, to wit, a railroad car, performing regular trips on a railroad, in this district, such road being a post road, to convey letters contrary to the form of the statute. The evidence in behalf of the United States, assuming that the witnesses are entitled to credit, establishes the fact that many letters were received by the agents of the defendant, for the purpose of being conveyed, and were in fact conveyed for hire by his agents, acting under the name of messengers, on the roads designated in the declaration, in the cars of the owners of the roads; and the evidence tends to prove that this was done with the knowledge of the defendant,—its sufficiency for this latter purpose being, however, denied by the counsel for the defendant. On the other hand, it appears that the defendant's messengers travelled on the roads in question merely in the character of passengers, purchasing tickets for that purpose from time to time, and that the owners of the cars and their agents were ignorant of the fact of their having letters in charge. It is moreover admitted by the district attorney, that in order to subject the owner of a vehicle to the penalty provided by the nineteenth section of the act, it must appear that letters were conveyed in such vehicle with his knowledge and assent; and that no penalty has therefore been incurred under that section by owners of the cars now in question.

Under this state of the case I am called upon by the defendant's counsel to instruct the jury, among other things, that in order to render a person liable to the penalty provided by the twenty-fourth section of the act, it must be shown that by his procurement, assistance or advice, some other person has committed the act forbidden by the nineteenth section; and that the plaintiffs have therefore failed in point of law to establish a right of recovery. This proposition has been strenuously and very ably contested by the district attorney, who insists that the offence described in the twenty-fourth section taken in connection with the nineteenth section, is a distinct and independent offence, which may be committed by one person without the participation or agency of any other person. This is not a new question, though it is one of recent origin in the courts. It was involved in the case of U. S. v. Adams [Case No. 14,421], tried nearly a year ago in the district court for the Southern district of New York, though from the report of the case read yesterday by the defendant's counsel, the question does not appear to have been very distinctly presented to the court. The opinion of the court is however understood to have been favorable to the construction of the law insisted on by the defendant's counsel in the present case. But the case of U. S. v. Kimball [Id. 15,531], tried a few months since in the district court for the Massachusetts district, turned directly upon this question. The opinion of his honor, Judge Sprague, upon it, after argument, is elaborate, and apparently well considered; and it was in accordance with the instructions now asked by the defendant's counsel. He held that a person who sends a letter by a passenger in a railroad car is not liable to the penalty provided by the twenty-fourth section of the act, unless the owner of the car is liable to the penalty provided by the nineteenth section. The case was carried to the circuit court by writ of error, and the decision of the district court was affirmed by Mr. Justice Story. If these had been the only decisions upon this question I should have felt little hesitation in yielding to their authority. But a contrary decision having lately been made by the learned judge of the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, in the case of U. S. v. Fisher [Id. 15,100], and, as it would seem also from an imperfect report read by the district attorney, by the district court for the district of Maryland, in the case of U. S. v. Gilmour [Id. 15,208], I have felt it to be my duty to consider the question as an original one, and especially to scrutinize the conflicting judicial opinions pronounced in the Cases of Kimball and Fisher,—these opinions having, as it is understood, been published under the sanction of the learned judges themselves. In doing this, I have been essentially aided by the luminous arguments of the learned counsel by whom this trial has been conducted.

I had read the opinion of the judge of the Massachusetts district upon its first appearance two months ago, and was forcibly impressed with the course of reasoning by which his decision was fortified, and, as I have already intimated, should not have hesitated to acquiesce in it, had there been no conflicting decision, and but for the forcible argument of the district attorney in the present case. My attention has therefore been chiefly directed to the reasoning of his honor, Judge Randall, and that of the district attorney. The learned judge, in assigning his reasons for the conclusion at which he had arrived, is reported to have said, that "offences even of the highest grade, may be committed through the medium of an innocent agent, and the employer be answerable as principal, even although not present when the act was committed. Thus," he adds, "one who employs an idiot or a child, under the age of discretion, to do an unlawful act, is liable to punishment for it, although the act was done in his absence." This is undoubtedly sound doctrine; but I am not able to perceive any propriety in its application to the case in question. The reason why one who employs a child or an idiot, or instigates a mad man to commit a crime, is himself directly responsible as principal, instead of being but an accessory before the fact, is, that the immediate actor is irresponsible. For every offence committed, some one must necessarily be amenable as the principal offender. In the cases supposed by the learned judge, if the intermediate agents were accountable for their acts at all, it could only be as principals; but being irresponsible, he by whom their acts were prompted, is justly substituted in their place,—just as one who should maliciously unchain a wild beast in the midst of a populous town would be held accountable, as principal, for the injury which should accrue. But the reasons of this doctrine do not exist when the unlawful act is perpetrated by a person who is himself amenable to the law for his acts, and therefore the doctrine itself is inapplicable to such a case. The owner and conductor of the railroad car were such persons; and if they committed the act forbidden by the nineteenth section, they were responsible for it as principals.

But it was conceded that in the eye of the law they did not commit it,—and justly,—because, according to an old and well established legal maxim, it is the mind and not the act which constitutes the criminal. Neither was it pretended that the act prohibited by the nineteenth section—that of conveying letters in a vehicle regularly performing trips on a post-road—was committed by the defendant. The charge against him was that he procured and advised or assisted another to commit it. But a charge against one person of having advised and assisted another to commit an offence not in fact committed by him, involves in my judgment a degree of inconsistency wholly irreconcilable with that precision and certainty which the law demands in the administration of penal justice, and which are essential to the security of the citizen. Besides if the principles applied by the court in the Case of Fisher, had really been applicable to such a case, the defendant ought to have been prosecuted, not under the twenty-fourth section, for procuring, advising and assisting, &c., but under the nineteenth section, for actually conveying the letters. By this means the inconsistency just mentioned, at least, would have been avoided. It was further remarked by the learned judge, as appears by the report, that while it was true that penal statutes were to be construed strictly, they were "not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature, when that intention can be collected from the words used in the act." This position, in its just sense, is also incontrovertible; but in my opinion it does not warrant the decision in support of which it was adduced. The question was, whether a person who sends a packet of letters by a passenger in a railroad car over a post road, without the knowledge and against the consent of the owners of the car and their agents, is within the words of the act. I think there are no words in the act descriptive of such person.

No doubt the design of the act was to secure to the United States, so far as could be done without improperly trenching upon the freedom of the citizen, the entire emoluments arising from the transportation of letters on post roads. But this design, however obvious, does not authorize the judicial branch of the government to extend the act to descriptions of persons not embraced within its terms, however strongly and mischievously their acts may tend to defeat its design. It often happens that what the courts, in giving a construction to statutes, are bound, by the settled rules of interpretation, to consider the intention of the legislature, falls far short of the general policy and objects of the act. This remark may be well illustrated by reference to the 3rd section of the amendatory post office act of 1827 [4 Stat. 238], by which it is made penal to "set up any foot or horse post for the conveyance of letters or packets upon any post road." Now, it is very clear that the transportation of letters in railroad cars drawn by steam, is in direct conflict with the design of this prohibition; and yet it seems to be agreed on all hands that no penalty is incurred under it by the conveyance of letters in this mode, because the act contains no words descriptive of such an offence. For the same reason, the act of 1825 ought not, as I think, to have been construed to embrace the Case of Fisher. If congress had really intented to prohibit the conveyance of letters by passengers, it would have been easy, by apt terms, directly and plainly to declare such intent. The practice of sending letters by passengers in the public conveyances on post roads, has always and notoriously prevailed, and must have been known to congress in 1825. Until recently, letters were thus sent only occasionally, and were taken in charge, not for hire, but as a mere act of kindness or of social obligation. While the practice was thus restricted, it may reasonably be supposed that congress did not deem it necessary or just to interfere with it. The practice has now, on some of the principal post roads, become a regular systematized business, carried on for profit. But I cannot acquiesce in the argument that its extension has altered its legal nature or enlarged the jurisdiction of the courts. If it has become an evil requiring correction by the public authority, it is the province of the legislature to apply the remedy.

The district attorney relies chiefly on the term "procure," and his argument is, that, however it may be with the words "advise and assist," there is no absurdity in the charge against the defendant, of having "procured" the car to carry letters, because by paying his passage he acquired a right to a seat, and then used this right for the purpose of carrying letters. In my judgment this is an unwarrantable interpretation of the word "procure," as used in the act. It can, in my opinion, no more be applied to an inanimate thing, than the words "advise or assist," with which it is associated. It does not mean, to obtain or get possession of; but to induce, by persuasion, bribery, or by other means, acting on the will of an intelligent being. It is admitted that the offence described in the nineteenth section can only be committed by the wilful act of some person; and I hold it to be clear that no penalty can be incurred under the twenty-fourth section, except by procuring, advising or assisting the commission of that offence. Upon the whole, therefore, I shall consider it my duty to instruct the jury upon this point in accordance with the request of the defendant's counsel.

Another, and far more important question has been raised, viz.: whether the constitution confers upon congress the power to restrain a private citizen from carrying letters in competition with the mail of the United States. But upon this, as well as upon the other points relied on by the defendant's counsel, it is unnecessary to express any opinion, and I therefore forbear to do so.

Case No. 16,066.

UNITED STATES v. POMPEY.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 246.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1821.

SLAVERY.

Quære, whether an indictment will lie, at common law, for enticing away a slave.

Indictment [against the negro Pompey] at common law for enticing away a slave belonging to Judge Washington.

Verdict, guilty, and the jury assessed the fine at $50.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) were doubtful whether the indictment could be supported in law; but as there was no motion in arrest of judgment, it was entered up for the fine as assessed by the jury. See 1 Hayw. 13; 2 Hayw. 106.

Case No. 16,067.

UNITED STATES v. POND.

[2 Curt. 265.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1855.

INDICTMENT FOR MISDEMEANORS—MOTION TO QUASH—OFFENCES UNDER POSTAL LAWS—OPENING LETTERS.

1. A defect, pleadable only in abatement, is not ground for quashing an indictment.

2. In indictments for misdemeanors, it is sufficient to lay the charge in the words of the act of congress describing the offence, unless it appears, those words include cases not intended by the legislature to be embraced within the laws; in that event the indictment must show the case to be one not thus excluded.

[Cited in U. S. v. Henry, Case No. 15,350; Dewee's Case, Id. 3,848; U. S. v. Quinn, Id. 16,110; U. S. v. Winslow, Id. 16,742; U. S. v. Noelke, 1 Fed. 432; U. S. v. Britton, 107 U. S. 662, 2 Sup. Ct. 518.]

[Cited in State v. Miller, 60 Vt. 92, 12 Atl. 526.]

3. The twenty-second section of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 109), makes it an offence to open a letter which has been in a post-office, before delivery to the person to whom it is directed, with intent to obstruct his correspondence or pry into his business or secrets, though the letter was not sealed, and was not, at the time, in the lawful custody of any person, and even though it was written by the defendant himself. Nor is it necessary that the name to which the letter was addressed, should be the true name of the person for whom it was intended.

[Cited in U. S. v. McCready, 11 Fed. 229.]

4. In such an indictment it is not necessary to allege any venue of the unlawful intent, nor to allege that the opening was unlawful, nor that A. B., to whom the letter was addressed, was a real person, if it be alleged that the letter was opened with intent to obstruct

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

A. B.'s correspondence, or pry into his business or secrets, because it will intended he was a real person.

[Cited in U. S. v. Driscoll, Case No. 14,994; Re Coleman, Id. 2,980; U. S. v. Safford, 66 Fed. 945.]

This was a motion to quash an indictment under the 22d section of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 109), for the government of the post-office department, &c. The indictment, omitting the merely formal parts, was as follows:—"That on the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-four, one Abel Pond, at Holliston, in said district, did then and there open a certain letter directed to one 'Ebenezer H. Currier, Esq.' which letter had been in a post-office of the said United States, namely, in the post-office of the United States at Holliston, in said district of Massachusetts, and did so open the said letter before it had been delivered to the said Currier to whom it was directed, and did so open the said letter with a design to obstruct the correspondence, and to pry into the business or secrets of another, namely, of the said Ebenezer H. Currier, said letter not containing any article of value."

The motion was as follows: "And now before pleading, the above-named defendant comes and moves the court, that the indictment found against him at this term of the court be quashed,—for the following reasons: (1) That he is not named therein with any addition of mystery, degree, or occupation; nor with any addition of the town or place of which he is a resident. (2) Because admitting all the facts stated in the indictment, it does not charge the defendant with any criminal offence; more particularly in that it does not set forth that defendant unauthorizedly or unlawfully opened the letter in question; in that it does not allege that the letter was sealed, or that the opening was by means of any breaking, tearing, or cutting; in that it does not allege that the letter as aforesaid was at the time of said opening in the custody of any postmaster, letter carrier, or other person having lawful charge of the letter of another; in that it does not exclude the idea that said letter was the property and belonged exclusively to the defendant, and that he was lawfully opening it at the time of said opening; in that it does not allege that there was any such person in existence as Ebenezer H. Currier, to whom said letter is alleged to have been addressed; in that it does not aver an intent unlawfully or unauthorizedly to obstruct the correspondence, or to pry into the secrets of said Currier, (supposing that there was such a person in being at that time, for whom said letter was intended,) and that it does not generally exhibit and set forth facts enough to constitute any offence against the laws of the United States. (3) Because there is no venue or time laid to the allegation of the intent."

Geo. Bemis, for the motion.
Dist. Atty. Hallett, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. Without expressing any opinion respecting the necessity of an addition of the mystery or degree of the defendant, in an indictment, I think the first cause assigned insufficient to support the motion. The want of an addition, or a wrong addition, when required, is ground for a plea in abatement only. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 23, § 125; 2 Inst. 670; Rex v. Warren, 1 Sid. 247; Rex v. Checkets, 6 Maule & S. 91. A motion by a defendant to quash an indictment, must be founded on defects which would make a judgment against him, on that indictment, erroneous. Bac. Abr. "Indictment," K; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 146; Com. Dig. "Indictment," H. And there are many cases where the court, in the exercise of its discretion, refuses to quash an indictment even for defects which would cause an arrest of judgment. Bac. Abr. "Indictment," K. In Rex v. Wheatley, 1 Wm. Bl. 275, Lord Mansfield said: "If any distinction is made between quashing and arrest of judgment, that of quashing is the strongest way; because the indictment must be very grossly bad to have the court quash it at once." A defect only pleadable in abatement, and which is cured by pleading over, is not ground for quashing an indictment.

The cause secondly assigned, if found correct, would be sufficient In examining it, it must be remembered that this is an indictment for a misdemeanor, created by statute; and that, in general, it is sufficient to describe such an offence in the words of the statute. U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 138. This indictment follows the words of the statute. It is sufficient, therefore, unless the words of the statute embrace cases which it was not the intention of the legislature to include within the law If they do, the indictment should show this is not one of the cases thus excluded. In the case of The Mary Ann, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 389, speaking of an information, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said: "If the words which describe the subject of the law are general, embracing a whole class of individuals, but must necessarily be so construed as to embrace only a subdivision of that class, we think the charge in the libel ought to conform to the true sense and meaning of those words as used by the legislature;" and this is only another mode of expressing the same rule which I have stated above.

To apply these rules to this case; the first objection is that the indictment does not allege that the defendant unlawfully opened the letter in question. But, following the words of the act, it does allege such facts as, if true, amount to an unlawful opening; for it avers the letter was opened before it reached the person to whom it was addressed, with intent to obstruct the correspondence and pry into the business or secrets of another. This intent renders the opening of such a letter unlawful, and it would add nothing material to call it so. The court takes notice of its illegality. The next objection is the want of an allegation that the letter was sealed. I am of opinion that opening such a letter, though unsealed, with the intent charged, is an offence against this act, and therefore it was not necessary to allege it to have been sealed.

It is further objected that it is not alleged that at the time of the opening, the letter was in the custody of any postmaster, letter carrier, or other person, having lawful charge of the letter. The words of the act do not require that the letter, when opened, should be in the lawful custody of any one; but only that it had been in the post-office, or in the custody of a mail carrier, and was opened before delivery to the person to whom directed. And I do not perceive sufficient reason, why the language should not be literally construed. If a letter should be obtained by fraud or theft from a post-office by one person, and opened by a second, with design to pry into the business or secrets of another, or obstruct his correspondence, I think it would be an offence within this act. And so in any other case which has occurred to me, of a lawful or unlawful custody at the time of the opening, with such intent. But it is said the indictment does not exclude the idea that the letter was written by the defendant, and belonged to him at the time it was opened.

I think it does; for the intent charged in the indictment could hardly exist, if the defendant wrote the letter. Such a case, of a person opening a letter which he had himself written with intent to obstruct the correspondence, or pry into the business or secrets of another, cannot reasonably be supposed possible. But if it were possible, I do not know on what ground I could say it is not within this act. True, the mere opening of a letter by him who wrote it, and put it into the post office, is an innocent act. It may be done to correct a mistake, or for many proper reasons. But doing it for an improper and wicked motive may well enough be declared criminal; and if the legislature use language broad enough to embrace such a case, and it can be proved, in point of fact, in my opinion it must be deemed within the law, and subjects the offender to punishment.

It is further urged, the indictment should have alleged that Ebenezer H. Currier, to whom the letter was directed, was a real person. This proceeds upon one of two grounds; the first is, that letters addressed to real persons, under fictitious names, are not within the protection of the act. I do not think so. Many lawful reasons may exist for writing and receiving such letters. A desire to avoid publicity, though it generally accompanies crime, is also quite consistent with innocence. Much lawful and important correspondence is conducted under fictitious addresses. Nothing is more common than to see requests to address a particular number, or one or more letters of the alphabet. I do not consider it necessary that the address on the letter should have been the true name of any person. The other ground is that it does not appear that the letter was addressed to any real person, by a fictitious or real name. But the indictment charges an intent to obstruct the correspondence, and pry into the business and secrets of one Ebenezer H. Currier. This cannot be proved without showing that there is a real person in existence capable of having correspondence, and business, and secrets, affected by the letter in question, but also that his name is Ebenezer H. Currier. In an indictment for larceny, the property is laid in J. N. I never saw an averment made that J. N. was a real person. The allegation imports it, for none but a real person can hold property. So here the allegation that Ebenezer H. Currier had business, and secrets, and correspondence, imports that he was a real person.

The last objection is, that there is no venue, or time, laid to the allegation of intent. But venue and time are laid to the act of opening, and I am of opinion it was not necessary to lay them to the intent, which it is averred accompanied the act of opening, and so must necessarily have had its existence when and where the act was done.

The motion to quash is overruled.

Case No. 16,068.

UNITED STATES v. POPE et al.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 141.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

The validity of this claim fully established.

[Claim of Joseph Pope and others, heirs of Julian Pope, deceased, for the Rancho Locoallomia, consisting of] two leagues of land in Napa county; confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

McDougal, Aldrich & Sharp, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. In September, 1841, Julian Pope applied to General Vallejo for an order for the provisional occupation of the premises now claimed. The land having been reported vacant, permission to occupy and to apply for the usual title was given to the applicant. Julian Pope accordingly petitioned the government for a grant, and on the thirtieth of September, the usual title was issued by Jimeno, giving to Pope the place called Locoallomia, of two sitios de gañado mayor. The above facts are established by the grant, which is produced and duly proven, and by the expediente, which is found in the archives, and a copy of which duly certified is on file.

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 16,069.

UNITED STATES v. POPE.

[24 Int. Rev. Rec. 29; 3 Cin. Law Bul. 30.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan. 8, 1878.

EXTRADITION—ARREST IN ONE DISTRICT FOR TRIAL IN ANOTHER—INDICTMENT AS EVIDENCE.

1. Where a person is arrested and brought before a judge or commissioner to be held to bail for trial in another district, a certified copy of the indictment found in such other district is competent evidence against the defendant; but if such indictment be so inconsistent that an impossible offence is set forth therein, it is not evidence authorizing such judge or commissioner to hold the defendant to bail.

[Cited in U. S. v. Brawner, 7 Fed. 88; U. S. v. Rogers, 23 Fed. 661.]

2. The indictment in this case charged in substance that on the 10th day of June, 1874, in Louisiana, the defendant and others conspired to defraud the United States by procuring to be entered against the United States in the court of claims, an unjust judgment on the 18th day of May, 1874, and further sets forth that such judgment was in fact rendered on said 18th day of May Held, that such indictment is no evidence of guilt.

At law.

P. Cummings, Asst. U. S. Atty.

C. Allen, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. On the 6th day of June, 1876, an indictment was found in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana against August P. Noblom, Henry Peychaud, Theodore Valiade, and Robert H. Shannon, of the district of Louisiana, George Taylor and Oliver S. Lovell, of the District of Columbia, and Frederick G. Pope of the district of Massachusetts, alleging: That the defendants in and within the state and district of Louisiana, on the 10th day of June, 1874, conspired together with one Bouchard and others unknown to the grand jurors, with the intent and purpose to cheat and defraud the United States of the sum of $296,000; that in 1869 said Noblom together with one Bellocq and one Roy, claiming to be copartners in New Orleans under the firm of Bellocq, Noblom & Co., presented to the court of claims at Washington a petition which is fully set forth in the indictment. Its substance is that the petitioners had, before April, 1861, made large advances on 1,851 bales of cotton which had afterwards been seized, in April and May, 1863, by the military authorities of the United States, and sold by the treasury agents, and the proceeds paid into the treasury of the United States; that the cotton was never abandoned nor forfeited, and was not liable to confiscation under any act of congress and the petitioners claimed the proceeds of said cotton, or at least the amount of their advances, averring that they had never aided the Rebellion. The indictment proceeds to set out that a supplemental petition was filed in the court of claims by the defendant Peychaud, averring himself to be the assignee in bankruptcy of said firm, and repeating the allegation of the original petition; that issues were framed on this last petition, and the same was pending in the court of claims at the December term, 1873; that the defendants and the other conspirators at Louisiana on the 1st day of June, 1874, aforesaid, as the means of carrying out their conspiracy conspired to prosecute said action in said court of claims to a final judgment by false testimony to be presented to said court and thereby to procure an unjust judgment to be rendered against the United States for $296,000, and cause it to be executed and the money paid,—the conspirators well knowing that said petitions were in all material respects untrue, and that no judgment ought to be rendered thereon against the United States; that Peychaud at Louisiana, September 10, 1874, in pursuance of the conspiracy, permitted the action to be prosecuted to final judgment, which judgment was duly made and entered at Washington, May 18, 1874. It then sets out the judgment in favor of Peychaud as assignee in bankruptcy of said firm for the proceeds of 1,542 bales of cotton amounting in all to $296,064; that Peychaud, knowing the judgment to be wrong, etc., demanded and procured payment; that his comrade, Taylor, knowing, etc., agreed to receive part of the proceeds, etc. That the defendant Valiade (without date), gave testimony which was false; finally that the defendant, Pope, in October, 1873 (in fact, 1872), in pursuance of the conspiracy gave a deposition in Boston authenticating a certificate made by him in 1863, that as captain in a regiment of volunteers and by order of his commanding officer, he had seized four bales of cotton belonging to P. Noblom and deposed that the certificate was true, whereas he well knew that it was false and untrue and a fabrication of his own, and that it was made to aid the defendants in their conspiracy to obtain an unjust judgment in the court of claims.

The defendant, Pope, was complained of before Mr. Commissioner Hallett some months since in behalf of the United States, who asked that he might be ordered to give bail for his appearance at New Orleans to answer to the said indictment. After a hearing the commissioner discharged the defendant. Lately a fresh complaint was made before the district judge, and a hearing was had. The United States introduced a certified copy of the indictment, and evidence tending to identify Pope as the person indicted. The defendant produced evidence tending to show that he had not been in Louisiana since 1866, at the time he left the army; that he had seized a large amount of cotton in 1863 by order of his superiors, who required him to give receipts therefor when demanded; that he was not known or believed to be a friend of Noblom, and was known to have expressed publicly before the magistrate when his deposition was taken in October, 1872 (not 1873), his disbelief in the loyalty of the claimants. All this evidence for the defendant was objected to by the district attorney, and was admitted only de vene.

[1] [3 Cin. Law Bul. 30, contains only a partial report.]

From the very great pressure of business in the court this case has been delayed longer than I intend that any case shall be if I can prevent it. I know of no statute which authorizes the warrant of any court of the United States to be served on a defendant out of the district in which the indictment is found in any criminal case; though all witnesses and defendants in some few civil cases may be so served with process. I mean there is no statute which in terms authorizes such a warrant, and the weight of opinion is decidedly against the existence of such a power. See In re Alexander [Case No. 162], and the cases and opinions there cited; U. S. v. Haskins [Id. 15,322]; U. S. v. Yacobi [Id. 15,460]; opinions of Miller and Love in Re Bailey [Id. 730]. In these cases and all others that I have seen the mode adopted to procure the attendance of a defendant who is found out of the district where the offence is said to have been committed, is to apply to a commissioner or judge under the judiciary act, section 33 (1 Stat 91), now re-enacted in Rev. St. § 1014, and produce before him the evidence of criminality precisely as if the defendant's crime was alleged to have been committed within the district. Such applications are very common, and such is the case now before me. The usual course is to produce either witnesses or affidavits in behalf of the United States. It has been seriously doubted whether a copy of an indictment is evidence in such an examination. I decided in Alexander's Case, ubi supra, that it is. This was a very convenient decision for the United States and a sound one, but it rests rather on long usage than on any principle of law, because, generally speaking, an indictment is evidence of nothing but its own existence, unless there is some statute giving it a greater effect. It is but secondary evidence after all, or rather a statement of the result of evidence, and the better practice is to give primary evidence of criminality.

In extradition between the United States and other nations copies of the warrant and of the depositions on which it was founded are made evidence. Rev. St. § 5271. And in extradition between the states a copy of the indictment or of an affidavit is sufficient. Rev. St. § 5278. In both these classes of cases the executive authority, whether of the state or nation, has an ultimate discretion whether to surrender the supposed criminal or not; and they often refuse, though the papers are in due form and unimpeached, if there is good reason to believe that some ulterior object or sinister design is concealed under the regular forms. Examples of this are historical. Congress not having seen fit to authorize a bench warrant to issue out of the court in which the indictment is found, it becomes the duty of the magistrate to examine the evidence carefully as in any domestic case. Remarks of an eminent judge on this point will be found in Re Buell [Case No. 2,102]. In that case Judge Dillon, affirming Judge Treat, refused to issue his warrant, though the defendant was admitted to have written and published a criminal libel, because it did not clearly appear that he had published it in the District of Columbia, where the indictment had been found. When a fresh indictment was found, Judge Treat refused a warrant because the court in which the indictment was pending did not appear to have jurisdiction of the charge. Same case, note at end. Judge Blatchford refused such a warrant though everything was regular, and the information appeared valid, because he held that the law authorizing such an information was unconstitutional. In re Dana [Case No. 3,554]. Judge Withey refused to hold for trial a defendant who had been sent to his district by the judge of another district upon evidence which was merely the copy of an information not under oath. U. S. v. Shepard [Id. 16,273].

The only evidence in behalf of the government in this case is a copy of the indictment. It was proved by clear and uncontradicted testimony that this defendant was not in Louisiana when he is alleged to have conspired with the others to cheat the United States. Assuming that there may be a constructive presence in Louisiana of a person actually in Boston, there is no evidence of it in this case. The indictment nowhere states, excepting argumentatively, that any of the papers, affidavits, petitions, or anything else were false and fraudulent; but I should not regard that as very important in a case of this sort, where the indictment is merely evidence. It is open to more serious objections. Briefly stated, it charges the defendants with conspiring, June 10, 1874, to recover a judgment, which was entered May 18, 1874; and it charges this defendant with giving a deposition in 1873, which both sides admit he gave in 1872, to aid a conspiracy which was not formed until June, 1874. The indictment being filed June 6, 1876, it is likely that the conspiracy is laid June 10, 1874, to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, which was probably supposed to protect the defendants in two years, though the statute of April 13, 1876, which had not then been published, extends it another year. The conspiracy, if there were one, would probably be formed before the false petition was filed in the court of claims in 1869, and must have been formed before May 18, 1874, when that court gave the judgment which it was the object of the conspiracy to procure. However this fact may be, the allegation of the date of the conspiracy involves the indictment in contradictions which, if they are errors, must be corrected by evidence, and none is offered. The indictment itself must stand or fall by its own dates; and if they are repugnant or insensible the pleading is fatally defective. Com. v. Hitchings, 5 Gray, 482; U. S. v. Fox [Case No. 15,156]. So where it is produced as evidence it must be consistent and sensible, or it fails to prove guilt. Upon fresh evidence the government can apply again, as they have already applied twice, for an order for bail or committal. The evidence for the defence, though I consider it admissible, has not affected my decision.

I hold that Mr. Hallett was well warranted in discharging the defendant if the evidence before him was a copy of the indictment, as I suppose it was. The indictment charges the defendant with the impossible crime of conspiring in June to procure a false judgment to be entered in the preceding May, and to have done acts in October to aid a conspiracy which was formed in the following June. It is therefore worthless as evidence of a conspiracy, just as an affidavit would be which contained such inconsistencies. Whether, if these were proved to be clerical errors, it would be my duty to send the defendant to be tried in another district I do not intend to decide. It might possibly be so if it were shown that a fresh indictment might be found upon the evidence before me.

Defendant discharged.

Case No. 16,070.

UNITED STATES v. PORTE.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 369.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1806.

PUBLIC STATUTES—BANK CHARTERS—LARCENY OF BANK NOTES—INDICTMENT.

1. If a statute makes it felony to steal the notes of any particular incorporated bank, the statute, by which that bank was incorporated, thereby becomes a public statute.

2. An indictment upon the Maryland act of 1793 (chapter 35), making it felony to steal the notes of any bank established by a charter from the government of the United States, or of some individual state of the United States, must state of what bank the notes were, and whether incorporated by the United States or by an individual state. It is not sufficient to make the averment in the terms of the act.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Indictment [against Henry Porte] upon the Maryland statute of 1793 (chapter 35) for stealing bank-notes, charging the prisoner with stealing the "notes of some bank established by a charter from the government of the United States or of some individual state of the United States."

Mr. Morsell, for the prisoner prayed the court to instruct the jury that they must be satisfied, by the evidence, that the notes were of some bank having a charter from the United States, or from some particular state; that the act of incorporation, or charter of such bank must be produced properly authenticated; and that the statute-book is not sufficient evidence of a private statute.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, admitted that the jury must be satisfied by the evidence that the notes stolen were the notes of some bank incorporated, &c., but contended that, as in this country charters could only be granted by a legislative act, they were public laws, of which the courts were bound to take notice.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the supplementary act of April, 1792 (chapter 1), making it felony to steal the notes of the Bank of Baltimore, makes the original act of incorporation (Act 1790, c. 5) a public statute.

Verdict, guilty. But, upon motion, THE COURT arrested the judgment, because the indictment did not state of what particular bank the stolen notes were, nor whether the bank was incorporated by the United States, or by a particular state. DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent.

Case No. 16,071.

UNITED STATES v. PORTER.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 16,072.

UNITED STATES v. PORTER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 60.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1812.

INDICTMENTS FOR MISDEMEANOR—COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES—BARRATRY—LIMITATION—INDICTABLE FRAUD—ATTORNEYS—DISBARMENT.

1. Two or more counts for misdemeanor may be joined in one indictment.

2. The person defrauded is a competent witness for the prosecution, upon an indictment for the fraud.

3. Upon an indictment for barratry, no evidence can be given of specific acts, without notice.

4. Notice given after the commencement of the trial, is too late.

5. A witness is incompetent, who has been convicted of a conspiracy to defraud the creditors of an insolvent debtor.

[Cited in dissenting opinion in Green v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 566, 21 Pac. 541.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

6. A grand juror may be required to testify as to the evidence given before the grand jury.

7. The act of congress of 1790 [1 Stat. 112], limiting prosecutions for misdemeanor to two years, is applicable to common-law misdemeanors in the District of Columbia.

[Cited in U. S. v. Watkins, Case No. 16,649; U. S. v. Six Fermenting Tubs, Id. 16,296.]

8. Fraud is not indictable, unless it concern the public, or be committed by false tokens, or false pretences.

9. The court will strike an attorney from the roll, for malpractice, although it be not indictable.

[Cited in Ex parte Burr, Case No. 2,186. Cited in brief in Bradley v. Tochman, Id. 1,788.]

The defendant [James A. Porter] was an attorney of this court. The indictment contained five counts. 1st. For barraty; 2d, 3d and 4th, for being a common cheat and swindler, and fraudulently getting into his possession the property of his client, Jenkins; and 5th, for conspiracy with one McCutchen, to defraud McCutchen's creditors, by means of his discharge under the insolvent law.

F. S. Key, for the traverser, moved the court to quash the indictment, on the ground that it contained various counts requiring different judgments. Young v. Rex, 3 Term R. 98, 101, 106. Although this is not a good ground for arresting the judgment, it is good ground for quashing the indictment. The judgment for barratry, is fine and imprisonment, and incapacity to pursue his profession. Upon the counts for swindling, if the offences come under the statutes of 32 Hen. VIII. c. 1, of false tokens, or 30 Geo. II., of false pretences, they may be punished by fine, imprisonment, or pillory, or whipping, or transportation, or other corporal punishment, except death; and upon the count for conspiracy, there would be a villanous judgment. He also contended that the 2d, 3d, and 4th counts ought to be quashed, because they charged only a civil injury, not a public offence. A mere falsehood, or simple fraud, is not indictable. There must be a false token, or a false pretence. They charge that the traverser, under the pretence of being the attorney of Jenkins, fraudulently extorted and obtained the property mentioned. That was not a false pretence, for he was his attorney. The indictment must set forth the pretence, and aver it to be false. No fraud is indictable at common law, unless it be of a public nature, and effected by means which a prudent and intelligent man could not avoid. 4 Bl. Comm. 134; 1 Hawk. P. C. 193, c. 73, § 8; Rex v. Lara, 6 Term R. 565; East, P. C. 816; Rex v. Wheatly, 2 Burrows, 1128; 2 Hale P. C. 182, 184; 2 Hawk. P. C. (fol. Ed.) 226, c. 25, § 59; 1 Hale, P. C. 668; Trem. P. C. 104; Reg. v. Daniel, 1 Salk. 380; People v. Babcock, 7 Johns. 201; J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 Term R. 753; Rex v. Osborn, 3 Burrows, 1697. If an indictment for an offence, which was an offence at common law, concludes contra formam statuti, but the case is not brought, by the indictment, within the statute, it shall be quashed, and the party will not be put to answer it as an offence at common law. 2 Hale, P. C. 171.

Mr. Jones, contra. It is not a matter of discretion with the court to quash an indictment. The only authority cited is the dictum of Judge Buller, in Young v. Rex, 3 Term R. 98. There is no rule which prohibits the joinder of two counts for misdemeanor in one indictment. The judgments on these counts would not be inconsistent. The court may remove an attorney from practice upon conviction of any offence. But if the court has a discretion to quash this indictment, they will not, when the facts charged touch the character of one of its officers, who may be removed upon proof of those facts, although they should not amount to a crime in legal acceptation. But the court has no discretion to quash the indictment, unless it plainly appears that no judgment can follow conviction. The opposite counsel have mistaken the nature of the indictment. It is not under the statute of false tokens, or false pretences; it is for being a common barrator, and a common cheat and swindler.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH Circuit Judge, absent) quashed the 3d and 4th counts, but refused to quash the 2d, as they deemed it important to ascertain the truth of the charges against the traverser, who was an attorney of the court.

Upon the trial, Mr Jones, for the United States, offered to examine Jenkins as a witness.

Mr. Key, for the traverser, objected that he was the person supposed to be cheated, and had suits now pending against the traverser for the same property of which he is supposed by the indictment to have been cheated by the traverser. No witness can be permitted to invalidate an instrument signed by himself. Walton v. Shelley, 1 Term R. 296. Nor can the person whose name is supposed to have been forged, or whose property may be prejudiced by the forgery, be permitted to prove it by his own testimony. 2 Hawk. P. C. 433, bk. 2, c. 46, § 24. Nor can the person cheated be a witness to prove the cheat. Rex v. Whiting, 1 Ld. Raym. 396; McNally, Ev. 105, 124. So in U. S. v. Maxwell, for bigamy, at December term, 1810 [Case No. 15,749], the court rejected the testimony of a witness,—called to prove the first marriage, and who had a suit depending against the prisoner for goods furnished to his first wife.

Mr. Jones, contra. The case of Walton v. Shelley has been overruled by Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, 7 Term R. 601; and the rule, as to interest, is that if it be not a necessary and certain interest, it does not disqualify the witness. The objection is generally to his credit. The case of forgery is an exception to the general rule. Peake, Ev. 93-95;

Abrahams v. Bunn, 4 Burrows, 2255; Smith v. Prager, 7 Term R. 60; Bent v. Baker, 3 Term R. 27.

Mr. Key, in reply. There is no case overruling that of Rex v. Whiting. In the cases cited there was no civil suit pending. 1 McNally, Ev. 106, 107.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that Jenkins was a competent witness, and that the objection went only to his credit.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, then offered evidence upon the first count, which charged the defendant as a common barrator.

Mr. Key objected that no evidence can be given of specific acts of barratry, without notice.

Mr. Jones then offered in evidence an agreement between defendant and one Thomas Herty to commit barratry, and a letter, as general evidence; not of any specific item.

THE COURT said that the agreement and letter were premature evidence, before evidence had been given to any particular act of barratry.

Mr. Jones then offered Herty as a witness.

Mr. Key objected that he was incompetent because he had been convicted of a conspiracy to defraud the creditors of McCutchen, which is an infamous offence. It is the crimen falsi. The infamy is in the offence, not in the punishment. 1 Hawk. P. C. 178, 193 (fol. Ed.) c. 72; 1 McNally, Ev. 206; 1 Hale, P. C. 306; Peake, Ev. 86; Chater v. Hawkins, 3 Lev. 426; Rex v. Ford, 2 Salk. 690.

Mr. Jones, in reply No common-law offence is sufficiently infamous to exclude a witness, unless it be one to which the common law has annexed an infamous punishment. The crimen falsi, is only where forgery or perjury is charged; or a conspiracy to charge a person with forgery or perjury.

THE COURT, however, was of opinion that Herty was not a competent witness. The conviction and judgment upon the indictment for conspiracy with McCutchen to defraud his creditors by secreting property on taking the oath of an insolvent debtor, is a conviction of an infamous crime. It partakes of the crimen falsi.

Mr. Jones then offered to examine Mr. S. H. Smith, the foreman of the grand jury, to prove what the defendant stated and confessed before the grand jury on an examination before them.

Mr. Key objected that the grand jurors are bound to secrecy by their oath. 1 McNally, Ev. 253; Burr's Trial (reported by Carpenter) vol. 3, p. 289.

THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objection.

Mr. Jones then offered the defendant's receipt for papers, &c. from Jenkins, dated more than two years before the indictment.

Mr. Key and Mr. Caldwell, for the defendant, objected under the act of congress of 30th of April, 1790, § 32, which limits the prosecution to two years, and contended that this paper was not evidence upon that part of the indictment which avers that he fraudulently obtained possession of Jenkins's property.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) said that the gist of the indictment was the fraudulent application of, and refusal to account for, the property; and permitted the paper to be read.

Mr. Key then objected to evidence of acts of fraud committed more than two years before the finding of the indictment, and relied upon the 32d section of the act of congress of April 30, 1790, "for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." 1 Stat. 112.

Mr. Jones, contra. The act of congress does not apply to this case. It relates only to cases within the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and punishable by those courts. It does not apply to jurisdictions created subsequent to that act, nor to any offences but those which are created by the laws of the United States. The courts of the United States have no common-law criminal jurisdiction.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) was clearly of opinion that the act of congress of the 30th of April, 1790, § 32, applied to the case; and instructed the jury that they could not find the defendant guilty upon evidence of acts of fraud committed more than two years before the finding of the indictment.

After the trial had occupied one day, a notice of the particular acts of barratry intended to be proved was delivered to the defendant's wife.

THE COURT said it was not reasonable notice. 1 Hawk. c. 81, § 13; J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 Term R. 754.

Verdict, guilty, on the 2d count. The attorney for the United States, entered a nolle prosequi upon the other counts.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, doubting,) upon the defendant's motion, arrested the judgment, upon the ground that the fraud was not of a public nature; and not perpetrated by means of false tokens, or false pretences; they ordered the defendant's name to be stricken from the roll of attorneys of this court.

Case No. 16,073.

UNITED STATES v. PORTER.[1]

[2 Dall. 345; Whart. St. Tr. 174.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. 1795.

JURORS—CHALLENGE.

Indictment for high treason, committed in the county of Allegheny in the state of Pennsylvania, by levying war against the United States. After a long examination of witnesses it was discovered, that the defendant, though he was at Couche's Fort, had taken no part in the insurrection; that, in fact, he was not the person, liable to the charge, but another person of the same name; and, thereupon, the jury, by direction of THE COURT, found a verdict of not guilty.

[1] [This was one of the trials arising out of the so-called Whiskey Insurrection occurring in western Pennsylvania in the year 1794. For a full account of the proceedings see U. S. v. Insurgents, Case No. 15,443.]

The only occurrence, therefore, which it is material to notice on this trial, was the following: There were two of the petty jury (Thomas Coates and William Callady) who being called, and not challenged, alledged sickness in excuse for not serving, and they were, for the present, set apart: But the whole pannel having been eventually drawn out of the balloting box, without furnishing twelve names unchallenged, and those jurors persevering in their excuse, the counsel for the prisoner retracted his challenge of another juror, who was, thereupon, qualified by order of THE COURT.

Case No. 16,074.

UNITED STATES v. PORTER.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 54; [1] 3 Day, 283.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. 1808.

EVIDENCE—CONTRACT IN WRITING—HOW PROVED—INDICTMENT—MATERIAL ALLEGATIONS.

1. Where a party states a contract which from evidence exhibited on the trial appears to have been in writing, he must either produce it or show that it is not in his power to produce it; otherwise, no proof of its execution or contents will be received.

[Cited in U. S. v. Brown, Case No. 14,666.]

2. An allegation in an indictment which is not impertinent or foreign to the cause must be proved, though a prosecution for the same offense might be supported without such allegation.

This was an indictment charging "that before, on, and ever since the 1st day of February last, the public highway from the city of New York, on the road through Danbury, Litchfield, and Farmington, and from thence to Hartford, by force of the several acts of the congress of the United States relating to postoffices and post-roads was made, and still is, a post-road designated for the transportation of the public mails of the United States; and during all the period from and after the 1st day of December, in the year 1806, until the 1st day of April, in the year 1807, certain persons were, in virtue of the provision of the said several acts of the said congress of the United States, authorized, employed, and bound by contracts lawfully made by and with the postmaster-general of the United States, to transport and carry the said public mails of the United States from the said city of New York to the city of Hartford, and from thence back to said city of New York, on the route through Danbury, Litchfield, and Farmington; that on the 31st day of January now last past, in a certain four-wheeled carriage for that purpose provided, and drawn by four horses, they, the said persons so as aforesaid by the said postmaster-general authorized and employed, were, in compliance with and fulfillment of their said engagements, transporting a public mail of the United States from the city of New York to said city of Hartford, one Isaac Kellogg, a mail carrier, lawfully employed, and sworn to a faithful discharge of his said duty as such, as the laws of the said United States require, then having the care and charge of the said mail, carriage, and horses, so as aforesaid used and employed in the transportation of said public mail; that at Farmington aforesaid, on the 31st of January and 1st of February now last past, Joseph Porter of Farmington aforesaid, being not ignorant of but well knowing all the facts hereinbefore stated, with intent unlawfully and wilfully to obstruct, retard, hinder and stop the passage of said public mail of the United States, then and there, with force and arms, did seize and stop said horses and carriage in which said mail was then deposited; and with like force and arms, violence and strong hand, did seize the said Isaac Kellogg, then having the care and charge of said public mail, transported as aforesaid, and then in the act of driving and guiding said horses, and transporting said mail in the public highway, and on said post-road, on the route aforesaid; and said driver, horses, and carriage, with said public mail, did stop and forcibly drag said mail carrier from said carriage, and then, at Farmington aforesaid, him, the said mail carrier, with said public mail of the United States, and horses and carriage used in transporting the same, did knowingly and wilfully obstruct, stop, and detain for a long time, to wit, for the space of more than fifteen hours; contrary to the form, force, and effect of the act of congress of the United States in such case made, and then in force, entitled 'an act to establish the postoffice of the United States.'" 4 Stat. 102.

The District Attorney and Mr. Wolcott, for the United States.

Goodrich, Daggett & Dwight, for defendant.

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and EDWARDS, District Judge.

The defendant pleaded not guilty.

The district attorney offered a witness to prove the contract with the postmaster-general for the transportation of the mail, stated in the indictment. He was sworn and was about to testify to the terms of the contract, when LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, inquired if it was in writing.

The witness answered, yes.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Daggett, for defendant, objected to any parol evidence of this contract, insisting that the writing itself ought to be produced.

The district attorney said it was in the hands of one Ely of New York, who refused to give it up, and we could not compel him to produce it.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, said Mr. Attorney had shown that it could be produced; he had named the person who had it, and stated where he lived. Mr. Attorney ought to have compelled Ely to attend and produce the contract. Nothing is clearer than that proof of the contents of a writing cannot be received, unless it be shown that it could not be produced.

PER CURIAM.—The evidence offered is inadmissible.

Wolcott, for the prosecution. We shall take this ground, that the allegation in the indictment of a contract with the postmaster-general is mere surplusage, and consequently that no proof of it is necessary. The words of the statute are, "that if any person shall knowingly and wilfully obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or of any driver or carrier, or of any horse or carriage carrying the same, he shall, upon conviction, for every such offense, pay a fine," etc. 4 Stat. 104, § 3. That the mail should be carried in pursuance of a contract with the postmaster-general is a qualification not found in the statute. The mail is, in fact, carried on some of the most important routes in the United States, without any previous contract. It is so carried between Baltimore and Philadelphia, and between the city of Washington and New Orleans. There cannot be a doubt whether if the mail be obstructed on these routes the penalty shall accrue. If we prove all that is necessary to subject the defendant, there must be a verdict against him whether other matters stated in the indictment be proved or not.

Daggett, in reply. This allegation is not impertinent matter; it is in no sense foreign to the cause. The obstruction contemplated by the statute is of a mail carried by the direction and under the authority of the postmaster-general. The indictment sets forth the manner in which such direction was given, in which such authority was derived. Now, though this allegation be more particular than it was necessary it should be, yet having been made it must be proved. This is the rule even in civil cases. Bristow v. Wright, Doug. 665. It applies more strictly in criminal cases.

EDWARDS, District Judge, was of opinion that no prosecution for obstructing the passage of the mail could be supported without showing a written contract with the postmaster-general.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, inclined to think that an indictment might be so framed as to subject the defendant without proof of a written contract; yet as this indictment states a contract which is not impertinent or foreign to the cause, he was clearly of opinion that it ought to be proved. The court will be more strict, he added, in requiring proof of the matters alleged in a criminal than in a civil case.

The district attorney rose and said he would enter a nolle prosequi

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, observed that the defendant was entitled to a verdict of acquittal if he wished it.

The defendant's counsel said he wished for a verdict.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, then addressed the jury thus: No evidence at all being adduced against the defendant, it will be your duty, without leaving your seats, to find a verdict of not guilty.

The jury immediately found a verdict accordingly.

Indictment, material allegations in, must be proved. See State v. Stebbins, 29 Conn. 471; U. S. v. Brown [Case No. 14,666]; citing case in text approvingly.

Case No. 16,074a.

UNITED STATES ex rel. MURPHY v. PORTER.

[2 Hayw. & H. 394.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. 31, 1861.

WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS—SUSPENSION BY PRESIDENT—ENLISTMENT OF MINOR.

1. In this case President Lincoln had suspended the writ of habeas corpus, as a military necessity within the District of Columbia, and just prior to such suspension, Justice Merrick had issued the writ upon the petition of the father of James Murphy, who had enlisted into the military service of the United States, in the 12th regiment of New York volunteers, while under the age of eighteen years, for that reason asking for the discharge of said son from said military service, and made the said writ immediately returnable before him.

2. The marshal of the district was directed not to execute the writ upon Provost-Marshal Porter, and to make return. That he was ordered by the president of the United States not to serve the same, as the writ of habeas corpus had been suspended as regards soldiers in the army of the United States, within said district, by the order of the president.

3. In this case appears the reasons assigned by Justice Merrick for his non-appearance in court, upon the further consideration of the case and the protests of Judges Dunlop and Morsell against the action of the military authorities in thus interfering with the process of the court.

The application is as follows:

"To Col. S. S. Walrath, of New York 12th Volunteers. Your petitioner represents that his son James Murphy enlisted in your regiment of New York 12th volunteers, at Syracuse, New York, in Captain Church's Company H, and is now in your regiment in said company, as he is informed at Fort Onandago, where your regiment is now encamped. And your petitioner further represents that at the time his said son enlisted it was without his knowledge or consent, and that at the time he resided with your petitioner in the village of Manlius, Onandago county, and came to Syracuse and enlisted in said company, and when your petitioner found it out he tried to get him discharged, and tried to get him to return home. Your petitioner further says that at the time his said son enlisted he was only of the age of about 17 years, and will not be 18 until 12th day of April, 1862, being born in 1848. And your petitioner further represents that his said son is now anxious to return, and your petitioner is desirous of having him discharged from said company and regiment."

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and George C. Hazleton, Esq.]

D. D. Foley, for petitioner.

C. C. Carrington, for Geo. W. Philip, deputy marshal.

Petition for the writ of habeas corpus:

"To the Honorable Wm. Merrick, Judge of the Circuit Court of the D. C.: Your petitioner, John Murphy, father of James Murphy, respectfully represents that his son James enlisted into the service of the United States, in the state of New York, on or about the month of May, 1861, without the knowledge or consent of his said father; that the said James Murphy is under the age of 18 years, and that he is now in the custody of the provost-marshal [Andrew Porter] in said military service contrary to law. Your said petitioner therefore prays that your honor award to him a writ of habeas corpus directed to the said provost-marshal, or such other person in the District of Columbia as has the said James Murphy in his custody, requiring him to bring the body of the said Murphy before your honor to inquire into the cause of his detention, and grant such relief to your said petitioner as may be lawful and just. D. D. Foley, Attorney for Petitioner."

On the back of the petition was written the following:

"Let the writ issue as prayed, returnable before me at the city hall immediately. Wm. M. Merrick, A. J. October 19, 1861."

Letter of Judge Wm. M. Merrick:

"On Saturday, the 19th of October, 1861, Mr. Foley, a lawyer of this city, called upon me with a petition supported by affidavit in proper form, praying for a writ of habeas corpus to the provost-marshal, requiring him to produce before the undersigned one John (James) Murphy, who it was alleged was a minor under the age of eighteen years, and illegally detained by said provost-marshal as an enlisted soldier of the United States. The order was given by me to the clerk, who issued the writ in the usual form. I was informed by Mr. Foley on the afternoon of Saturday, that by reason of the many engagements of the deputy marshal of the D. C., he himself took the writ and served it, as by law he rightfully might do, upon the provost-marshal, Gen'l A. Porter; that when he delivered the writ to the provost he was told by him that he would consult the secretary (I think he said the secretary of state) whether he should respect the writ or not, and that he, Mr. Foley, must consider himself under arrest, but for the present he might go at large, as upon his parol. Later in the afternoon Mr. Foley again called at my house with one or two other persons, one I think was represented as the elder brother, or some man relative of the boy Murphy, and desired to know whether he were now to consider the boy as finally discharged and at liberty to return home to his friends, inasmuch as he had been dismissed from the guard house. I declined to make any suggestion to him in the premises, and told him that whatsoever I did in the matter must be done judicially, and after facts had been spread before me upon affidavit, and the appropriate motion, if any, made thereon; and that as the court would meet on Monday morning, the 21st, in regular term, I should adjourn all proceedings under the writ into court for the advice and action of the whole court. He stated that he would reduce all the facts to writing, make affidavit, and file them, for that he expected to be arrested. He then withdrew. On Monday morning, just before the meeting of the court, I went into the clerk's office, asked Charles McNamee, the deputy clerk, if Mr. Foley had filed any affidavits in the case; he examined the papers and reported there was none. I then directed him to endorse upon the papers that they were by my orders adjourned into court for its future action. After the adjournment of the court I was informed by a member of the bar that about eleven o'clock that morning Mr. Foley had been arrested and placed in the guard house by order of the provost-marshal, and he announced his purpose of applying for his release. I told him that whatever application he had to make must be in writing, upon proper affidavit, and that as the whole court is in regular session he must make it to that court in full sitting, and he withdrew to confer with some of his brother lawyers upon his course. After dinner I visited my brother judges in Georgetown, and returning home between half past seven and eight o'clock found an armed sentinel stationed at my door by order of the provost-marshal. I learned that this guard had been placed at my door as early as five o'clock. Armed sentries from that time continuously until now have been stationed in front of my house. Thus it appears that a military officer against whom a writ in the appointed form of law has issued, first threatened with and afterwards arrested and imprisoned the attorney who rightfully served the writ upon him. He continued, and still continues, in contempt and disregard of the mandate of the law, and has ignominiously placed an armed guard to insult and intimidate by its presence the judge who ordered the writ to issue, and still keeps up this armed array at his door, in defiance and contempt of the justice of the land. Under the circumstances I respectfully request the chief judge of the circuit court to cause this memorandum to be read in open court, to show the reasons for my absence from my place upon the bench, and that he will cause this paper to be entered at length on the minutes of the court alongside the record of my absence, to show through all time the reason why I do not, this 22d of October, 1861, appear in my accustomed place. W. M. Merrick. Assistant Judge of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia."

The reading of the communication (from Judge Merrick) having been concluded, DUNLOP, Chief Judge, announced that the two remaining judges (himself and MORSELL, Circuit Judge) had, after consultation, decided that the letter should be filed as requested by Judge Merrick, and it was so ordered. They also thought it might, as the writ (of habeas corpus) had been regularly issued, to state that the matter was now before the court to be tried. The statement of their brother judge presented a case where the progress of law is obstructed. It was the duty of the court to afford the remedy, and, if the facts are as stated, to cause the law to be respected. As the provost-marshal had obstructed a process of this court, it would order a rule to be served on General Andrew Porter, to appear before the court and show cause why an attachment for contempt should not issue against him. Judge MORSELL said that this was a palpable and gross obstruction to the administration of justice, to prevent a judge of this court from taking his seat because he issued a writ just such as the law requires. The placing of a sentinel before Judge Merrick's house was evidently for the purpose of embarrassing him in this particular subject, and to prevent his appearance in court. He (Judge MORSELL) would make the rule broader so as to have the provost satisfy the court as to both matters. The court has its duty to do, a duty the judges are sworn to do, and that duty is the administration of justice according to law. What is the real state of things? If martial law is to be our guide, we look to the president of the United States to say so. He (Judge MORSELL) did not pretend to controvert the right of the president to proclaim martial law, but let him issue his proclamation. The judges have their duty to do under the law, and are liable to be punished if they do not do it. "I intend to do my duty, and vindicate the character of this court as long as I sit here. I am an old man."

The following notice was written off by the judge:

"In the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia: The clerk is directed to file the letter of Judge Merrick, addressed this day to the chief judge of the court. And it is ordered this 22d day of October, 1861, that a rule to show cause be issued against General Andrew Porter, provost-marshal of the District of Columbia, requiring him, on or before the 26th of October, 1861, to show cause to this court why an attachment of contempt should not issue against him for obstructing the process and course of justice and administration of it in this court, in the particulars set forth in Judge Merrick's letter, that a copy of said letter accompanying the rule to show cause, and that the same be returnable on Saturday, the 26th of October, at 10 a. m. of that day, at the court-room in the city hall, Washington. By order of the court.

"Test: John A. Smith, Clerk."

In the circuit court on Saturday, October 26, 1861, Judges DUNLOP and MORSELL being present, THE COURT asked the clerk if there had been any return to the writ issued against General Porter, the provost-marshal of this city. The clerk answered there was none. Mr. Carrington, the district attorney, presented in behalf of the deputy-marshal (Mr. Philips) a paper, with the affidavit of Mr. Philips, stating that the rule had not been served, because he had been ordered by the president not to serve it, and because the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus had been suspended for the present by the president, in regard to soldiers in the army of the United States, within the District of Columbia:

"To the Honorable, the Judges of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia: George W. Philips, in whose hands the rule hereinafter mentioned was placed as deputy-marshal, respectfully represents to your honors that he did not serve the rule issued by your honorable court on the 22nd day of October, 1861, to be served on General Andrew Porter, provost-marshal of said district, because he was ordered by the president of the United States not to serve the same, and to report to your honorable court that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus has been suspended for the present, by order of the president of the United States, in regard to soldiers in the army of the United States within said district, and that he respectfully disclaims all intention to disobey or treat with disrespect the orders of this honorable court. G. W. Philips."

"District of Columbia, Washington County, to wit: On the 26th of October, 1861, personally appeared in open court, George W. Philips (above named) and made oath in due form of law, that the matters and things stated in the foregoing and annexed answer are true. George W. Philips.

"Test: John A. Smith, Clerk."

Mr. Carrington offered to submit an argument in behalf of Mr. Philips.

THE COURT announced that it did not propose to take any steps against Mr. Philips, but, as the return presented a grave question, THE COURT desired to hold it under advisement.

October 30, 1861.

DUNLOP, Chief Judge, after holding the above under advisement, announced the decision of the court in the case, as follows: The return made by deputy marshal the 26th of Oct., 1861, we will order to be filed, though we do not doubt our power to regard it as insufficient in law, and proceed against the officer who has made it. The existing condition of the country makes it plain that that officer is powerless against the vast military force of the executive, subject to his will and order as commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States. Assuming the verity of the return, which has been made under oath, the case presented is without a parallel in the judicial history of the United States, and involves the free action and efficiency of the judges of this court. The president, charged by the constitution to take care that the laws be executed, has seen fit to arrest the process of this court, and to forbid the deputy marshal to execute it. It does not involve merely the question of the power of the executive in civil war to suspend the great writ of freedom, the habeas corpus. When this rule was ordered to give efficiency to that writ, no notice had been given by the president to the courts of the country of such suspension here, now first announced to us, and it will hardly be maintained that the suspension could be retrospective. The rule on this case, therefore, whatever may be the president's power over the writ of habeas corpus, was lawfully ordered, as well as the writ on which it was founded. The facts on which the rule was ordered by the court are assumed to be true as respects the president, because the president had them before him, and has not denied them, but forbade the deputy marshal to serve the rule on General Andrew Porter. The president, we think, assumes the responsibility of the acts of General Porter, set forth in the rule, and sanctions them by his orders to Deputy Marshal Philips not to serve the process on the provost marshal. The issue ought to be and is with the president, and we have no physical power to enforce the lawful process of this court on his military subordinates against the president's prohibition.

We have exhausted every practical remedy to uphold the lawful authority of this court. It is ordered, this 30th day of October, 1861, that this opinion of the court be filed by the clerk, and made a part of the record, as explaining the grounds on which we now decline to order any further process in this case.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, submitted the following: As a member of this court, and on its behalf, I wish it understood that notwithstanding the blow levelled at this court, I do distinctly assert the following principles: (1) That the law in this country knows no superior. (2) That the supremacy of the civil authority over the military cannot be denied; that it has been established by the ablest jurists, and, I believe, recognized and respected by the great father of the country during the Revolutionary War. (3) That this court ought to be respected by every one as the guardian of the personal liberty of the citizen, in giving ready and effectual aid by that most valuable means, the writ of habeas corpus. (4) I therefore respectfully protest against the right claimed to interrupt the proceedings in this case.

UNITED STATES (PORTER v.). See Case No. 11,290.

UNITED STATES v. PORTER. See Case No. 14,820.

Case No. 16,075.

UNITED STATES v. POTTER.

[Boyce, U. S. Pr. 98.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June Term, 1858.

WITNESSES — SUBPŒNA AND ATTACHMENT — PRACTICE.

[Where a witness living in another state and district fails to obey a subpœna, and an attachment is issued for him, such attachment should be directed to the marshal of the court issuing the same, and not to the marshal of the district where the witness may be found.]

[In this case a witness residing in the state of Michigan was subpœnaed on behalf of the United States, and failing to attend, the district attorney asked for an attachment against him. The attachment was issued to the United States marshal for the Northern district of New York. It was objected that this practice was not regular.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The power to issue an attachment for defaulting witnesses is incident to the power to serve a subpœna, in criminal cases, beyond the limits of the district, and in any other district of the Union (1 Stat. 335, § 6); and our practice has been uniform to issue the attachment to an officer of the court, and not to an officer in the district or state in which the witness may be. The subpœna is also issued to such officer. This seems to be indispensably necessary in order to ensure the execution of process. The officer in a foreign district cannot be made responsible to the court issuing the precept, and, if he could, it would be impracticable, or attended with great delay and expense. I have always regarded the court under the 6th section above referrred to, as possessing jurisdiction for the purpose of issuing and enforcing the execution of a writ of subpœna in criminal cases throughout the Union; and that it is competent to send its own officer for this purpose into any part of it; and that this is the only reasonable and practical mode of carrying into effect the power thus conferred.

Case No. 16,076.

UNITED STATES v. POTTER et al.

[7 Reporter, 675;[1] 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 138, 186; 11 Chi. Leg. News, 256.]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. 1879.

FEDERAL OFFICERS—APPOINTMENT OF AGENTS BY HEADS OF DEPARTMENTS—WITHHOLDING SALARY—PAYMENT OF WARRANTS.

1. The head of a department of the federal government is authorized, in the administration of the duties of his office, to employ agents, and to determine when an exigency arises demanding their employment.

2. Section 1766, Rev. St., authorizing the salary of an officer in arrears to be withheld, forms no part of the contract with the sureties of such officer. Nor do sections 300, 307, 308, Rev. St., in relation to the payment of warrants after three years from issuance, form any part of such contract.

[This is an action on an official bond dated August 4, 1871, by Potter, as disbursing agent of the United States at Pembina. He retired from the office June 30, 1874. The principal item in controversy was a charge against Potter of $1,500, a draft for which sum was transmitted to him May 17, 1871, to cover disbursements for the quarter ending June 30, 1871, the facts concerning which sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court. It was contended on the part of the defendant, McIlrath, who was surety on Potter's bond, that he is not liable for this sum, on the grounds that there is no statutory authority for the appointment of disbursing agents, or for their giving bonds; that Potter's wrongful acts, if any, and the government's loss, occurred after the retirement of Potter from office; that the payment by the government of the money covered by the draft more than three years after its date was irregular and unlawful; and that, after Potter was known by the accounting officers of the treasury to be in default to the amount of the draft, they continued several years, contrary to the provisions of section 1766 of the Revised Statutes, to pay him his salary and commissions to an amount in the aggregate greater than that claimed by the government.][2]

W. W. Billsen, for the Government.

Geo. L. & Chas. E. Otis, for McIlrath.

NELSON, District Judge. The head of a department of the government is authorized in the administration of the duties of the office to employ agents and determine when an exigency arises demanding their employment. The law of 1854 (Rev. St. § 3614) recognizes the right and provides for a bond to be given by the agent for the faithful discharge of his duties. The act of March 3, 1849 (Rev. St. § 3617), required payment of all moneys received by Potter into the treasury "without abatement or reduction," and it became a necessity to appoint him a disbursing agent. He was appointed an agent for payment of salaries, commissions, incidental and other expenses of his office as receiver, and that of the office of register for the Pembina land district, so called. He made, on April 6, 1871, an estimate for salaries, fees, and commissions for the quarter ending June 30, 1871, in the sum of $1,500, and a treasury warrant dated May 17, 1871, was forwarded him. He received the warrant, did not pay commissions out of the moneys called for, never returned it, but charged himself in his report to the government with the amount, and on July 1, 1874, after his term of office expired, by indorsement passed it out of his control. His sureties are liable for government moneys received during his term of office, and his neglect to account for and pay over is a breach of trust and a failure "faithfully to execute and discharge the duties of his office," which was guarantied by them. Section 1766, Rev. St. U. S., authorizing the salary of an officer in arrears to be withheld, forms no part of the contract with the sureties. This statute was passed to secure and protect the government, and insure punctuality on the part of public officers, and although it in strong language inhibits the payment of salaries to any person in arrears, yet if an unauthorized payment is made by the proper officer, whose duty it is to pass upon and allow salaries, the government is not responsible for the misconduct of such officer, and the sureties are not discharged on that account. [U. S. v. Van Zandt] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 184; [U. S. v. Curry] 6 How. [47 U. S.] 106; [Gibbons v. U. S.] 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 274.

The certified transcript of Potter's accounts as disbursing agent shows a balance due the government, and that the warrant remitted to him during his term of office was not used in making disbursements for the government. This warrant not being presented for payment within three years after it issued, under sections 300, 307, 308, Rev. St., was subsequently paid from the moneys in the "outstanding liability account." It is charged this payment was illegal and the draft "died" in Potter's hands, and the holder at the time of payment was his agent, and the treasurer should have liquidated Potter's delinquent account by giving him credit for the return of the draft, and not paid it. I cannot agree to this view of the case. These sections, like others in respect of the duties of government officials, form no part of the contract with sureties upon an official bond. They establish the mode of payment of a class of outstanding drafts upon the treasury unpresented within the time specified, and designate, for the convenience of the government, the requisite procedings to obtain the money and the fund out of which payment is to be made. These laws are not passed to protect sureties, but to better secure the government. Laches is not imputable to the government. [Dox v. Postmaster-General] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 318; [U. S. v. Boyd] 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 208; [U. S. v. Van Zandt] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 190; [Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 81; [U. S. v. Nicholl] Id. 505; [U. S. v. Kirkpatrick] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 720; [U. S. v. Buchanan] 8 How. [49 U. S.] 105; [Gibbons v. U. S.] 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 274; [U. S. v. Powell] 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 502; [Jones v. U. S.] 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 663.

[1] [Reprinted from 7 Reporter, 675, by permission.]

[2] [From 11 Chi. Leg. News, 256.]

[Let judgment be entered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,500, with 6 per cent. interest from August 15, 1874, with costs.[1]

Case No. 16,077.

UNITED STATES v. POTTER.

[6 McLean, 182.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. Oct. Term, 1854.

CRIMINAL LAW — NEW TRIAL — NEW EVIDENCE — SEALED VERDICT—POLLING JURY.

1. Where, in the opinion of the court, the evidence preponderates in favor of the verdict, the court will not set it aside on the ground of testimony subsequently submitted, impeaching the credibility of one of the witnesses.

[Cited in Lowry v. Mt. Adams & E. P. Incline Plane Ry. Co., 68 Fed. 829.]

2. Where a cause has been closed at the evening of adjournment, and the parties agree to a sealed verdict, and the jury come in with a sealed verdict, to which all their names are appended, the court will not permit the jury to be interrogated as to their finding, but will order each juror to be asked, whether or not the sealed verdict is or is not his verdict; and on every juror replying that it is, will direct it to be recorded as such.

[See Case No. 16,078.]

[This was an indictment against Erastus Potter. For opinion on motion in arrest of judgment, see Case No. 16,078.]

Mr. Hand, for the United States.

Lathrop & Van Arman, for defendant.

WILKINS, District Judge. Five reasons are placed on record, why the court should grant a new trial. The first four were not pressed in the argument, and are certainly not founded either in law or in the facts of the case. That the court erred in refusing parol testimony of that which was matter of record by law, and which was in the power of the defendant to produce, might well be abandoned, when well considered. That the verdict was against the evidence of the case, or without evidence.

But I do not yield my assent to the proposition that either of these counts are essentially defective. It is conceded that the prosecutor cannot, in the same count, charge different offenses in the alternative, as, for instance, that the defendant did this, or did that, because, in pronouncing judgment, there would be no certainty in the finding of the jury, and consequently no basis of record for the sentence of the court. But I am inclined to question the construction of the statute, which makes two offenses, where but one was evidently contemplated. The statute declares cutting, or procuring to be cut, one offense, i. e., cutting, on the principle that the procurer is the doer; aiding or assisting one offense, as he who aids is of identity with him who assists; and removing or procuring to be removed, another offense. A count for aiding or assisting, would certainly not be defective, because aiding is assisting, and assisting is aiding. And so, in contemplation of law, he who procures or causes the cutting, is of identity as to the offense with the actual cutter, as, by the subsequent language, the latter is an offender, under the appellation of "being employed in cutting." But it is unnecessary to consume time on this particular exception, as the third count is, in the opinion of the court, entirely unexceptionable.

Motion to arrest overruled.

Case No. 16,078.

UNITED STATES v. POTTER.

[6 McLean, 186.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. Oct. Term, 1854.

CRIMINAL LAW — ARREST OF JUDGMENT — INDICTMENT.

1. Where an indictment contains several counts, one of which is good, the judgment will not be arrested, although the other three are bad.

2. It is not charging an offense in the alternative, where the language describes the same offense. Cutting, or causing to be cut, is one offense by the statute of 1831 [4 Stat. 472].

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. Bridges, Case No. 14,644.]

[Cited in brief in State v. Moore, 61 Mo. 278.]

[See Case No. 16,077.]

[This was an indictment against Erastus Potter for cutting timber on government lands.]

In arrest of judgment.

Mr. Hand, for the United States.

Mr. Lathrop, for defendant.

WILKINS, District Judge. The reasons set forth in this case, why the judgment should be arrested, are the same as in Thompson's Case [Case No. 16,490], with this exception, that it is further objected to this indictment, that three of the four counts charge the offense in the alternative. The third count, which charges the defendant with taking and removing timber, is unobjectionable, and will sustain the indictment, as the verdict is general. If one of several counts in an indictment is good, on a general verdict the judgment cannot be arrested. Such is the ruling in the courts of the United States. It was given in evidence, that the defendant built a shanty on the corner of lot No. 23, described in the indictment; that he was on the sections cutting; that he admitted to one Alexander Johnston, when on his way up to the place where the timber was cut, in the month of February, 1852, "that he was going up a-logging;" that one Dobbin was hired by him to move his tools, with which the timber had been cut and removed; that logs, numbering more than 800, were cut; that defendant hired men to bring or haul them to the river; that he claimed them as his; and that they were cut from the lands described in the indictment. Such being the evidence of Johnston, Dobbin, Bean, and Risdon, how is it possible for the court to entertain, for one moment, the proposition that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict. There was evidence submitted by the defendant, that he was in the employment of one McNeel, who owned lands adjoining, and that the cutting on the government lands was through ignorance and by mistake; and the court charged the jury that if they believed such to be the case, they should acquit. Mr. Samuel Potter, the brother of the defendant, was the only witness to this point, and, it seems, the jury did not believe the defense in this respect sustained.

[1] [From 11 Chi. Leg. News, 256.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The court entertains no doubt whatever, but what the jury were right, in the preponderance they gave to the evidence. But if I thought otherwise, I could not interfere. The jury had all the facts fully before them, and they had the right to credit or discredit the witnesses, and give such weight to the testimony as they believed it fairly entitled to. In such a case, the rules of law and the purposes of justice, do not call for the interposition of the court. A court is not authorized in setting aside the verdict of a jury, unless in a clear case of wrong, and where manifest injustice will be done, by sustaining the verdict of the jury. It is not how the judge considers the testimony, or the impression in his mind, that had he been on the jury, he would have found a different verdict, that should lead to the granting of a new trial. The two departments of trial are distinct. The province of the jury should not be ruthlessly invaded; and, unless he is satisfied from a careful examination of all the evidence, that the verdict cannot be right, it should not be disturbed by the judge.

Another ground is urged, based upon the affidavit of the defendant, stating that, "when the jury came in with a sealed verdict, it was opened and read: that something was then said between the court and counsel, as to the effect of the verdict's specifying on what count or counts, they found the defendant guilty. That one of the jury said in open court, and before the verdict was recorded in substance, 'that the jury had spoken of that, but had not acted upon it, or come to any conclusion whether he was guilty upon one or all of said counts.'" With this affidavit, by no means accurate or corresponding with the recollection of the court, is there a sufficient foundation laid for a new trial? The case had been given to the jury in the evening, and the defendant assented that they might seal their verdict, and bring it in in the morning. They did so, and on the opening of the court, the jury being present in their seats, and being called over by the clerk, the sealed verdict was handed in, signed by each juror; saying "that they found the defendant guilty in manner and form as he stands charged in the indictment, and assessed the damages at $83." After the clerk had read it, one of the counsel for the defendant, addressing the court, desired to know whether the jury applied their verdict to all the counts or any one count in particular. This remark elicited the opposition and comment of the district attorney; when one of the jurors observing that they had not considered a finding on each count necessary, the court stopped any further altercation by directing the verdict to be recorded as written out and signed by the jury, the paper itself to be filed for further reference; and on the application of defendant's counsel, the jury to be polled. The record shows the result. "And the jurors aforesaid, being each separately interrogated by the court, whether the foregoing verdict is his verdict as it stands recorded, each for himself separately answers, that it is." What more is necessary? Where is there room to doubt the action of the jury? Is it not their verdict, twice solemnly assented to by them in open court; once by their names recorded by each in his own hand-writing, and filed on record; and again as solemnly in the presence of the defendant, proclaimed by each juror, as his separate act, and as such, recorded on the journal of the court?

Wherefore should such a verdict be set aside? For irregularity? Whose? It was no error of the jury in writing out their verdict, and if they had changed their minds since that act, it was competent to retract or express such change, when specially interrogated by the court. That they adhered to their written opinion was not error. New trial refused.

[Subsequently a motion in arrest was overruled. See Case No. 16,077.]

Case No. 16,079.

UNITED STATES v. POWELL.

[65 N. C. 709.]

Circuit Court, D. North Carolina. June Term, 1871.

OFFICE AND OFFICER — DISQUALIFICATION BY ENGAGING IN REBELLION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

[1. One who, as constable of a county in North Carolina, took an oath to support the constitution of the United States, and afterwards engaged in the Rebellion, is disqualified by the fourteenth amendment, unless relieved in the manner provided, to hold any office, state or national, and is therefor indictable under section

15 of the act of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 140), for subsequently accepting the office of sheriff.]

[2. The expression "engaged" in insurrection, as used in the amendment, implies a voluntary effort to assist the insurrection, and acts done under compulsion of force, or of a well-grounded fear of bodily harm, do not come within the operation of the provision.]

[3. Accepting and holding the office of justice of the peace under the Confederate government was not, of itself, sufficient evidence of engaging in the insurrection.]

[Indictment of Amos S. C. Powell for accepting the office of sheriff when disqualified from holding office by the 14th amendment to the constitution of the United States.]

This was an indictment under the 15th section of the act of congress of the 31st May, 1870, entitled "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of this Union and for other purposes." [2] The indictment charged that the defendant knowingly accepted and held office under the state of North Carolina, to which he was ineligible under the provisions of the 3d section of the 14th amendment of the constitution of the United States. A witness, in behalf of the prosecution, testified that the defendant, prior to the commencement of the late Rebellion, held and exercised the duties of the office of constable, in Sampson county, to which office it was shown, by the records of the court of Sampson county, the defendant had been first appointed by the county court, upon a failure to elect by the people, and subsequently was elected by the people as the law provided; and in both instances qualified by taking the oaths required by law. Another witness, in behalf of the government, testified that in 1863 he (the witness) was a captain and was recruiting a company for the Confederate service, at Wilmington; that defendant came to him, and proposed to enlist in his company, provided he would accept a substitute, and relieve him from duty; that the defendant did enlist in the service, and tendered a substitute, as agreed upon, and, therefore, he granted to the defendant a certificate of exemption, as provided by a Confederate law. The prosecution further proved that the defendant applied for and received the appointment of justice of the peace for Sampson county in 1863, and qual fi d as such; that he had been elected sheriff of Sampson county in the year 1868, and qualified, and continued to perform the duties of the sheriff up to the present time.

The defendant offered a witness to prove that after the passage of the conscript laws by the Confederate government, and when the authorities had commenced to enforce the same, he was notified by the conscript officer, in his county, that he would be required to perform such service; that a day and place had been fixed for the meeting of conscripts, and he had been notified to attend; that he became alarmed, being averse to such service, volunteered to enable him to offer the substitute, and thereby obtain exemption for himself.

This evidence was objected to by the prosecution as irrelevant, but was admitted by the court.

The defendant offered further to prove by witnesses, who lived in the same county, and near him during the Rebellion, and with whom he frequently conversed during the time the conscript law was being enforced in this county, and about the time the substitute was furnished by him, that he was opposed to the Rebellion, and his opposition to serving in the army. This was also objected to by the prosecution, but was received by the court.

The counsel appearing for the government asked the court to instruct the jury that the office of constable before the war was such an office as rendered those who had held it, and thereafter engaged in the Rebellion, ineligible to any office now, by the provisions of the 3d section of the 14th amendment, unless relieved, as that amendment provides.

The counsel for the government further asked the court to instruct the jury that if the defendant had before the Rebellion so held the office of constable, and thereafter volunteered, though he offered a substitute, and did no actual military service himself, and though his purpose may have been to avoid the service, that he engaged in the rebel service within the meaning of the constitution; and further asked the court to instruct the jury that if the defendant (having been constable as aforesaid) accepted the office of justice of the peace under the rebel government of North Carolina, though he may have performed no duty as justice promotive of the Confederate cause, that the acceptance of the office, and taking the oath required of such office, was such aid or engaging in service of the enemies of the United States as disqualified him from holding the office of sheriff, without the relief required by law.

Dist. Atty. Starbuck and Bragg & Strong, for the United States.

Battle & Sons, for defendant.

Before BOND, Circuit Judge, and BROOKS, District Judge.

BOND, Circuit Judge (charging jury). The facts in this case have been plainly presented and thoroughly argued to you, and it remains only for the court to instruct you upon one or two strictly legal points, to enable you to find a true verdict. And in the first place, gentlemen, if you find from the evidence that before the late war the defendant held the office of constable in the state of North Carolina, and took the oath to support the constitution of the United States required of such office, and subsequently engaged in the Rebellion, it is necessary for you to know whether or not he is within the meaning of the provisions of the act of congress, under which he is now indicted.

[2] "Section 15. And be it further enacted, that any person who shall hereafter knowingly accept or hold any office under the United States, or any state to which he is ineligible under the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment of the constitution of the United States, or who shall attempt to hold or exercise the duties of any such office, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor against the United States, and, upon conviction thereof before the circuit or district court of the United States, shall be imprisoned not more than one year, or fined not exceeding one thousand dollars, or both, at the discretion of the court."

The words of the statute, gentlemen, are broad enough to embrace every officer in the state. There can be no office which is not either legislative, judicial, or executive; and there can be no question, it seems to the court, but that, unless it be possible to find some external reasons for giving this broad language a narrower meaning, it embraces every office in the state. But we can find no such reasons. The act, to be sure, is primitive, and it is argued that it was passed to punish those high in authority in the rebellious states at the time of the outbreak of the Rebellion, for their bad faith toward the government they had sworn to support, and was not intended to reach those who had minor offices. But while the act is primitive in its character, it was passed at a time when congress was endeavoring to restore order and government throughout the rebellious states; and it was thought that in this effort those who had been once trusted to support the power of the United States, and proved false to the trust reposed, ought not, as a class, to be entrusted with power again until congress saw fit to relieve them from disability.

The words of the act were made just exactly comprehensive enough to include such persons, and, in the opinion of the court, embrace the office of constable, which is an executive office, and in North Carolina, at the time defendant held it, was limited in its exercise and jurisdiction by county lines only.

If you find that the defendant did hold the office of constable before the war, and took the oath to support the constitution of the United States, you must, before you find him guilty under this indictment, find a further fact, and that is, that he engaged subsequently in insurrection and rebellion against the United States. To establish this the prosecution offers evidence to prove two facts, which, if you find to be true, the question arises, do these amount in law to engaging in rebellion or insurrection? The first is, that in February or March, 1863, he furnished a substitute for himself to the Confederate army. This fact, if proved without explanation, would, of itself, gentlemen, be sufficient to show the defendant was engaged in the Rebellion. But the defendant alleges, and offers evidence to show, that he did not do this voluntarily. That he was himself enrolled, and was about conscripted, and was overcome by force, which he could not resist, and the question is whether, if you find the facts alleged by the defendant to be true, these exceed or justify his conduct in law.

We are of opinion, gentlemen, that the word "engage" implies, and was intended to imply, a voluntary effort to assist the Insurrection or Rebellon, and to bring it to a successful termination; and unless you find the defendant did that, with which he is charged, voluntarily, and not by compulsion, he is not guilty of the indictment. But it is not every appearance of force nor timid fear that will excuse such actual participation in the Rebellion or Insurrection. Defendant's conduct must have been prompted by a well grounded fear of great bodily harm and the result of force, which the defendant was neither able to escape nor resist. And further, the defendant's action must spring from his want of sympathy with the insurrectionary movement, and not from his repugnance to being in an army, merely.

When you have determined these facts, gentlemen, and have applied the law as we have stated it to these two points, you will have no further difficulty, for, although it is further alleged by the prosecution that the defendant held a commission of justice of the peace in 1865, under the Confederate government, we are of opinion that he might well have held that office without giving adherence or countenance to the Rebellion. It was absolutely necessary that during that commotion there should have been some to preserve order and to restrain the vicious and licentious, who, without this, would have taken advantage of the turmoil to pillage and destroy friend and foe alike. He was a mere peace officer, and unless it be shown that under his commission the defendant did some act in aid of the Insurrection or Rebellion, the fact that he was justice of the peace is of no consequence in the determination of his guilt or innocence under this indictment.

Take the case, and remember that every reasonable doubt is to be given in favor of defendant, and by reasonable doubt we do not mean every indefinite uncertainty of mind which you may feel, but such a doubt as you can give a reason for or such a doubt as a reasoning man would entertain after careful consideration of the proof.

Case No. 16,080.

UNITED STATES v. POWER.

[14 Blatchf. 223.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 16, 1877.

NATURALIZATION BY STATE COURTS—WHAT COURTS COMPETENT.

It is provided by section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, that an alien may be admitted to be a citizen of the United States by "a court of record of any of the states, having common law jurisdiction, and a seal and clerk." A city court, which is a court of record and has a seal and a clerk, and has conferred upon it, by a statute of New York, all the power and jurisdiction of justices of the peace, and all jurisdiction and power, within the city, of the marine court in the city of New York, and whose judge is clothed with all the powers of a county judge and of a judge of the supreme court of the state at chambers, and which has civil jurisdiction in all actions for the recovery of money, when the amount recovered does not exceed $1,000, is a court having common law jurisdiction, within the meaning of said § 2165.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[Cited in Ex parte Tweedy, 22 Fed. 85.]

[Cited in Re Dean, 83 Me. 489, 22 Atl. 387.]

[This was an indictment against Martin Power upon the charge of perjury. Heard on demurrer.]

William Burke Cochran, for defendant.

Benjamin B. Foster, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The prisoner is indicted under section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for perjury committed by him in making an application to be naturalized before the city court of Yonkers. A demurrer to this indictment brings before the court the question, whether the city court of Yonkers had jurisdiction to entertain the prisoner's application to be made a citizen of the United States. If that court has not such jurisdiction, the indictment charges no offence, and the prisoner must be discharged.

The provision in the laws of the United States, upon this subject, is to be found in section 2165 of the Revised Statutes, where it is enacted, that an alien may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, upon making certain declarations on oath before "a court of record of any of the states, having common-law jurisdiction, and a seal and clerk." It is conceded, that the city court of Yonkers is a court of record, and that it has a clerk and a seal, but the question is, whether it is a court having common-law jurisdiction, within the meaning of the statute of the United States, above quoted. The jurisdiction of the city court of Yonkers is to be found in the laws of the state of New York. Chapter 866 of the Laws of 1872 confers upon that court all the power and jurisdiction of justices of the peace, and all jurisdiction and power, within the city of Yonkers, of the marine court in the city of New York, and it clothes the judge of that court with all the powers of a county judge and of a judge of the supreme court of the state at chambers. In addition to these powers, chapter 61 of the Laws of 1873 confers upon this court civil jurisdiction in all actions for the recovery of money, when the amount recovered does not exceed $1,000. It is manifest, that, by virtue of these statutory provisions. the city court of Yonkers is authorized to exercise some common-law jurisdiction, that is, it has jurisdiction to hear and determine causes which were cognizable by the courts of law, under what is known as the common law of England, although it has not jurisdiction of all such causes. It will be noticed, however, that the statute of the United States does not require of courts authorized to entertain applications for naturalization, that they shall have all the jurisdiction possessed by any court of law. If the court may exercise any part of that jurisdiction, it is within the language of the statute, and within its meaning, as well. Thus, the courts of Massachusetts, in Ex parte Gladhill, 8 Metc [Mass.] 168, held the police court of Lowell to be a court exercising a common-law jurisdiction, and, therefore, authorized to entertain applications to be made citizens of the United States, because it was by law authorized to "hear and determine all complaints and prosecutions, in like manner as justices of the peace," with "jurisdiction of all civil suits and actions cognizable by a justice of the peace." The reasoning of this decision was adopted by the circuit court of the United States for the First circuit, in Ex parte Cregg [Case No. 3,380], where, upon the same ground, the police court of Lynn was held, by the circuit court of the United States, to be a court having common-law jurisdiction, within the meaning of the United States statute. A like conclusion was reached by the supreme court of New Hampshire, in respect to the police court of Nashua. and upon the same ground. State v. Whittemore, 50 N. H. 245. In re Connor, 39 Cal. 98, a similar question in respect to tne county courts of California was considered, and it was there adjudged, that a court having jurisdiction to prevent or abate a nuisance was a court exercising common law jurisdiction, within the meaning of this statute of the United States. The court, in the case, say it is not necessary to have "jurisdiction over all classes of common law actions," and that "the act of congress does not require that the courts shall have all the common law jurisdiction which pertains to all classes of cases." See, also, the meaning given by the supreme court of the United States to the words "common law," as used in the constitution of the United States. Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 433, 446.

In the light of these decisions there seems to be no reason for doubting that the language of the statute is sufficiently broad to permit the city court of Yonkers to hear and determine the prisoner's application to be made a citizen of the United States. This is the only question that has been presented for my consideration, and, entertaining the opinion above expressed, I must overrule the demurrer, and direct the prisoner to plead to the indictment.

Case No. 16,081.

UNITED STATES v. POYLLON et al.

[1 Car. Law Repos. 60.]

District Court, D. New York. Nov., 1812.

EMBARGO LAWS—ACTION OF DEBT ON BOND—PENAL ACTION.

[An action of debt upon a bond given under the embargo laws. and conditioned that the cargo laden upon a vessel should be landed in some port of the United States, is, in effect, a penal or criminal action, as the right of recovery rests upon the violation of positive statutory prohibitions; and hence the jury in such an action are judges both of the law and the facts.]

This was an action of debt, on a bond for the sum of 23,000 dollars, given in December, 1808, under the first embargo law, conditioned, that a cargo of cotton, laden on board the schooner Clarinda, bound for Boston, should be landed in some port of the United States (dangers of the seas excepted). The defendants, Kip and Adams, one owner of the cargo, and the other master of the vessel, were principals, and the other defendants merely sureties in the bond.

In support of their plea, that the cargo was prevented from being re-landed in the United States by the dangers of the seas, the defendants produced one William Lea, who testified that he sailed about the 15th of December, 1808, in the British schooner Hercules, bound to St. John's, N B.; that on Wednesday, the 28th of said month, saw the Clarinda, crossing Nantucket shoals, hoist a signal of distress; upon which the Hercules, being seven or eight miles ahead, slackened sail; and when the Clarinda came up, Adams, the master, requested aid to save his vessel and cargo and the lives of his crew. The schooner Clarinda being in a sinking condition, the cotton was unshipped and taken on board the Hercules; being then about 20 miles from the land, and the Clarinda full of water up to the hatches, it was found necessary to abandon her. Upon his cross-examination, he stated that the Hercules, after passing through Hellgate, came to anchor about night; the next morning got under way, and proceeded as far as New-London, put in there, the weather being squally, and remained two or three days. That the Hercules next put into Tarpaulin Cove, on account of the weather being foggy, and lay there also two or three days; and on the third day proceeded to Holmes's Hole, where she continued several days, when he thinks she might have proceeded. That on the 27th the Clarinda also arrived there, and the captains of both vessels, with the supercargo of the Clarinda, went ashore together. The next morning the Hercules sailed, and was followed in about an hour afterwards by the Clarinda. The Hercules outsailed the Clarinda, so as to leave her nearly out of sight, except with a spy-glass, but did not shorten sail on that account until the signal of distress, which happened about one o'clock; and about 11 o'clock, the captain of the Hercules ordered the ballast to be levelled, and a chest, with two casks of water, to be removed from the run; and about 4 o'clock p. m. the vessels came along side of each other.

The defendants resting their evidence here, Baldwin, for plaintiff, opened; and, admitting that the Clarinda had twice struck,—once in coming out of New-London, and again off Connecticut Point,—proceeded to shew that the loss was notwithstanding fraudulent and by design; and for this purpose called one Daniel Boyles, who testified that he was a seaman on board the Clarinda during the said voyage; that they first fell in with the Hercules at Holmes's Hole, but had previously put into New-London and Tarpaulin Cove; that when at this place, Capt. Adams, seeing a vessel coming at a distance, said to the supercargo, Kip, "That is not the vessel"; and, again, when they descried the Hercules at Holmes's Hole, he heard Capt. Adams exclaim, "That is the vessel!" He further testified that the Clarinda first began to leak the day of their leaving Holmes's Hole, and was pumped dry by 10 o'clock in the morning; that when they went to dinner, she leaked again, upon which he wanted to try the pumps, but the captain or mate told him not to do it, but go and coil the cables and rigging; that he advised the captain to run her ashore on Nantucket Shoals, as she leaked so badly; but he replied, "We will go on board that schooner," meaning the Hercules, then in sight, and which had waited for them on perceiving their signal of distress. He gave it as his opinion, that the leak was occasioned by design, and not accident. On his cross-examination, he stated that he had been maintained three or four years by the custom-house at five dollars per week, to give testimony in this cause, and that Mr. Schenck paid his salary. A protest was also produced, in which he joined with the rest of the crew, attributing the leak to her striking on the rocks.

The plaintiffs next produced in evidence a petition presented by the defendants, Poillon, Busze, and Bergh, to the secretary of the treasury, for relief against the bonds in question, with their examination taken before Judge Tallmadge on that occasion, in which they confessed that they "believed" the loss to have happened by "fraud of the master and supercargo," but had "no knowledge" that such was the case.

The defendants' counsel opposed the introduction of this evidence, on the ground that the petitioners had objected at the time to being examined as to their "belief," but were forced to do it or to withdraw their petition. The court, however, admitted it.

The evidence being closed, Messrs. Baldwin and Ogden, in favor of the plaintiff, addressed the jury in a very able manner; and, bringing before them in a clear and luminous point of view, all the evidence which tended to establish their case, besought them to decide impartially between the two parties; and reminded them that they sat there, as jurors, not as legislators, and whatever might be their individual opinions as to the expediency of any particular law, still it was their duty, as good citizens, to support and execute it.

Mr. Griffin then alone summed up the evidence on the part of the defendants, with his usual animation and impressiveness.—(Col. Burr confining himself merely to the reading of some law to the court, and making a few appropriate remarks thereon.)—After an appeal to the sympathy of the jury, by shewing that a verdict for the plaintiff would be equivalent to a sentence of perpetual imprisonment on his unfortunate clients, as they were utterly unable to satisfy it with their property, he proceeded, in substance, as follows:

That the question to be decided was whether the Clarinda had been lost by the perils of the seas; that the present suit, though in form a civil action, was in effect a penal or criminal action, inasmuch as the plaintiff's right to recover (if at all) must be founded on the violation of a positive statute of the United States; and that his clients, therefore, standing in the doubly favored situation of defendants in a criminal or penal action, and sureties for others, were entitled to the judgment of the jury on both the law and fact, and to the benefit of all those mild and favorable rules and maxims which had been established by the benignant genius of the "common law," in the construction of the law and evidence.

The loss being proved to have happened at sea, it should be presumed that it had been occasioned fairly by the perils of the sea; fraud should not be intended, but must be strictly proved. How do the United States prove fraud in this instance? They cannot do it by endeavoring to impress into their service the enforcing act, which requires that the loss should be proved by all the crew (if living, and the proof of their death should lie on the defendants). To apply this law to the case arising under a different law, and before its enactment, would be to convert it into an ex post facto law; and however agreeable this might be to some gentlemen, by putting money into their pockets, and enabling them to ride in their carriages, and keep town houses and country seats, it will never be sanctioned, or tolerated by this court or jury. But, the plaintiffs triumphantly ask why, even if not bound to do so, we did not produce the mate and crew of the Clarinda. The answer is at hand—and when heard will be approved by the heart and judgment of every man: We were not rich enough to keep them here. They are scattered, perhaps, to the four winds of Heaven, by their different pursuits, or by the terrible penalties of the embargo law and its horrid train shaking over their heads. Our "poverty, not our will," consented to their departure. We have always been anxious to meet the trial. It might have been tried before, and had it not been thus long delayed, our witnesses would not have been thus scattered. Let not then what was our misfortune, be imputed to us a fault.

Do they prove the fraud by the movements of the Hercules? Are we to be answerable for them, even were they extraordinary or suspicious? But it was not at all extraordinary that a strange vessel, navigated by strangers, and in a strange and intricate sea, at an inclement season of the year, should frequently retire into port for shelter and safety; nor is it at all remarkable or suspicious that a cautious commander should level his ballast when passing over shoals.

Is the fraud proved to your satisfaction by Boyles, the great champion of the custom-house? How painful soever it may be to my feelings to speak harshly of the motives or conduct of a fellow-creature, I am compelled, by professional duty to my clients, to say this man stands before you convicted of perjury, either now or in his protest made at St. John's. Which is the most probable? Then, when by the loss of the vessel his pay had ceased; when if he had suspected any fraud he must have glowed with indignation at the conduct of the men who had thus wantonly endangered his life and put an end to his earnings; and when he nevertheless declared under oath that he verily believed the leak and subsequent loss of the Clarinda was occasioned by striking on the rocks?—Or, is he now perjured, when he comes before you, and audaciously contradicts his solemn protest, after being three or four years maintained by the custom-house at five dollars a week? On the rotten testimony of this man, I would not, gentlemen, condemn a dog to one day's imprisonment—much less would I consign four fellow-citizens to imprisonment for life, or at the mercy of the executive. I have no fear for the result of your decision. By the acquittal of the defendants, you will this day teach the gentlemen of the custom-house that this practice of maintaining witnesses at enormous wages for a length of years is equally useless and abominable.

Lastly, is the fraud proved by the extorted confession of the defendants' belief? It was no admission of facts; for they knew of none to admit, but such as they had already in the honesty of their hearts fully disclosed. But on what did they found their belief? Not on information derived from Kip or Adams; for it is not even to be imagined that these men would say to them thus: "You have benevolently become our sureties, and we, to repay your kindness, have acted like villains, have fraudulently destroyed the vessel, carried the cargo to a foreign country, and thereby subjected you to all the penalties of the law." Their belief was more probably founded on the hue and cry, the declarations and threats of the custom-house officers. In a moment of despondency they have perhaps imagined and believed whatever was most disastrous, and with a vague hope of mercy, indiscreetly avowed their fluctuating belief. To turn such confessions against them is cruel and ungenerous in the extreme. It is what every mind amongst you would revolt from without hesitation. But whatever may have been their belief—whatever may have been your own, uncertain belief, you must not judge according to that. You are sworn to decide upon the evidence; and the evidence must be strong and conclusive before you can conscientiously pronounce a verdict of guilty.

Is fraud to be inferred from the manner in which the vessel was lost? It appears that she began to leak and had four feet of water in her hold, when the Hercules was out of sight, except with a spy-glass, and they were distant many miles from land. Would men lightly expose their lives to such danger, with the weight of a guilty conscience hanging on them? And what are the assignable inducements to encounter these perils? The profits on a few bales of cotton, purchased by the certain loss of the vessel. You will reject them as insufficient, and will not suspect that fraud could have existed where there was so little motive for it.

Baldwin & Ogden, for the United States.
Radcliffe, Griffin & Burr, for defendants.

VAN NESS, District Judge (charging jury), said, among other things, that this was in its nature and essence, though not in its form, a penal or criminal action; and they were therefore entitled to judge both of the law and the fact; and that the enforcing act could not apply in this case.

The jury retired, and, after being out between one and two hours, agreed upon a verdict for the defendants, which was sealed up, and the next morning opened and pronounced in court.

Case No. 16,082.

UNITED STATES v. PRATT.

[2 Am. Law T. Rep. (N. S.) 238.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. April, 1875.

OFFENCES AGAINST POSTAL LAWS—SCURRILOUS COMMUNICATIONS.

A. mailed a postal card directed to B., having written upon it certain words which imputed illicit intercourse to C. and another, but in which no epithet, in the form of a substantive or adjective, was used. Held, that the offence was within the terms of section 3893 of the Revised Statutes.

[Cited in U. S. v. Britton, 17 Fed. 733.]

This was a motion to quash an indictment. The prisoner was charged with the offence of depositing and causing to be deposited in the post-office for mailing, a postal card, upon which was written indecent epithets, contrary to the provisions of section 3893 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:—"No obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, print, or other publication of an indecent character, or any article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion, nor any article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use or nature, nor any written or printed card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind, giving information, directly or indirectly, where or how or of whom or by what means either of the things before mentioned may be obtained or made, nor any letter upon the envelope of which, or postal card upon which, indecent or scurrilous epithets may be written or printed, shall be carried in the mail; and any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, any of the herein before mentioned articles or things, or any notice or paper containing any advertisement relating to the aforesaid articles or things, and any person who, in pursuance of any plan or scheme for disposing of any of the herein before mentioned articles or things, shall take or cause to be taken from the mail any such letter or package, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," &c.

The prisoner was charged with having mailed, at Jackson, a postal card, addressed to Geo. A. Mills, of Reilly, Muskegon county, Mich., upon which was written the following: "Jackson, Dec. 8th, 1874. To Mr. Mills: How does you and Mrs. (giving name) get along, that you show your private letters to and persuade her to stay away from her little ones. Your taste must be low after she has been catched locked up in a room with a man that had funny curly hair and such funny eyes. My advice to you is not to read her any more of your private letters; she will expose you." Pasted upon the back of this card, and in immediate proximity to the writing, was a picture representing the head of a colored man.

It was argued, by the counsel for the prisoner: (1) That the section relied upon by the government provides no punishment for the mailing of scurrilous postal cards. (2) That the matter written upon the postal card in question contains no "indecent epithets," and therefore is not within the statute.

Henry M. Cheever, for the prisoner.
J. W. Finney and H. H. Swan, Asst. U. S. Dist. Attys.

BROWN, District Judge. The section under which the indictment in this case is framed contains two distinct clauses, one prohibitory and the other penal. The prohibitory clause provides that the following articles shall not be carried in the mails: First, no obscene publication or picture; second, no article or thing intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of an abortion; third, no article or thing intended for an immoral use; fourth, no advertisement or notice giving information how or where either of the things before mentioned may be obtained or made; fifth, no envelope or postal card containing indecent or scurrilous epithets. The penal clause imposes punishment in terms for the following offences: Depositing for mailing or delivery any of the herein before mentioned articles or things, or any notice or paper containing any advertisement relating to the aforesaid articles or things; second, taking from the mail any letter or package in pursuance of any plan or scheme for disposing of any of the herein before mentioned articles or things.

It is claimed by the counsel for the prisoner, and argued with great ingenuity that the words "articles or things" mentioned in the penal clause refer only to the "articles or things" described by that name in the prohibitory clause, and set forth in the second and third subdivision of this clause, as above pointed out. Section 3895 provides that "all letters, packets, or other matter which may be seized or detained for violation of law shall be returned to the owner or sender, or otherwise disposed of;" and it was claimed that congress intended simply to empower postmasters to seize postal cards upon which indecent or scurrilous epithets are written, but did not intend to punish the mailing of them. Had the words "articles or things" not appeared in the prohibitory clause of the statute, it would scarcely have been argued that a postal card was not an article or thing within the meaning of the penal clause, and the only question is whether, by using those words in the prohibitory clause, congress designed thereby to restrict the application of the penal clause. Clearly it has not done so in terms. If congress has failed to provide a punishment for the sending of scurrilous postal cards, it has also failed to provide one for the articles mentioned in the first and fourth subdivisions, namely: obscene publications and pictures, as well as cards, advertisements, and notices giving information where these things may be obtained or made. It would also follow that the word "things," in the fourth subdivision, would be restricted to the things mentioned in the second and third subdivisions, and that the sending of advertisements or notices where indecent publications and pictures might be obtained would not be illegal. A reference to the history of the postal card system, and the evident design of the enactment in question, will show that the objection is wholly untenable. Although postal cards have been in use for a very few years their great convenience has made them universally popular as means of sending short messages to correspondents and of circulating business advertisements. At the same time, as they are in the nature of an open letter, the temptation afforded by the fact that they may be read by anybody has subjected them to great abuse, and in England has caused the abolition of the whole system to be seriously discussed. Congress evidently designed by this section to prohibit this abuse, and to punish the sending of all indecent and scurrilous matter through the mails, so far as it had the power to do this without violating the sanctity of private correspondence.

So far as I am able to ascertain, the section in question has received judicial construction in but one case, namely, U. S. v. Bott [Case No. 14,626], where it was held, that under the clause punishing the sending of "articles designed for the prevention of conception or the procuring of abortion," the defendant could not show that the article deposited would not, in fact, have any tendency to produce this effect, and that its harmless character was known to him when he deposited it, it being sufficient that the article, when deposited, was put up in a form described in and manner calculated to insure its use for that purpose. It was also assumed in this case, though the point was not discussed, that it was also a misdemeanor to mail any advertisement or notice, giving information where any such article could be obtained, and that it was immaterial whether, in fact, the article or thing was at the place designated.

I can see no good reason why congress should not punish the mailing of the articles specified in the first, fourth, and fifth subdivisions, as well as those specified in the second and third. Indeed the offence of sending scurrilous postal cards is more purely personal, more exasperating to the receiver, and more likely to lead to bad blood and to breaches of the peace than any other specified in the act. Had the words "articles or things" been contained in the subdivisions immediately preceding the penal clause, there might be some foundation for the claim that it referred only to them; but I cannot believe that congress intended to select out from the middle of the prohibitory clause certain offences, and provide a punishment for them, without expressing such intent in clearer words than it has done in this section. It would certainly be a forced construction of the law to hold that congress did not intend to punish the mailing of obscene publications, when by section 1785 it imposes a penalty upon employés of the government who aid and abet persons engaged in dealing in, sending or receiving them, thus punishing the accessary, but allowing the principal to escape. I have been somewhat aided in the interpretation of this act by the case of U. S. v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 385. The prisoner in that case was charged with embezzlement, under the act of 1846 [9 Stat. 63], known as the "Subtreasury Act," the 16th section of which provided: (1) That if any officer to whom it applied should convert to his own use, except as permitted by the act, any public money, every such act should be deemed an embezzlement. (2) That if any officer charged with the disbursement of public money should take a false voucher, every such act should be deemed a conversion of the amount specified. The penal clause then follows: "And any officer or agent of the United States, and all persons participating in such act, being convicted before any court, shall be sentenced," &c. It was held that this clause was to be taken distributively, and that it was clearly intended to apply to all the acts of embezzlement specified in the section, to those relating to moneys in the first category, as well as those relating to vouchers in the second.

Further objection is made to this indictment that the writing upon the postal card contains no "indecent epithet," within the proper meaning of the term. The word "epithet," as defined in dictionaries, is apparently limited to adjectives and nouns, expressive of some character, quality, or attribute. In the earlier edition of Webster it is extended to nouns as well as to adjectives; in the later editions, however, it seems to be confined to adjectives, the exact meaning of the word is discussed there, and its use in the sense of "phrase," "name," or "expression" is pronounced improper. Now if the court were confined, in the interpretation of this section, to the strict grammatical definition of the word "epithet," I should be of the opinion that the writing upon this card contains no indecent epithet. Obviously, however, it could not have been the intent of congress that the word should receive this restricted meaning, or that the conviction or acquittal of a prisoner should depend upon the fact whether he employed adjectives or verbs to express his indecent or scurrilous ideas. Clearly, to call a man a "thief," or "thieving rascal," would be within the statute. Would it not be equally within the intent of the statute to say of him that he is in the habit of stealing? It is unnecessary here to decide whether the words "indecent and scurrilous epithets" were intended to include all indecent and scurrilous expressions or language —such for instance as threats couched in indecent terms, although there is much force in the argument that congress intended to prohibit the use of postal cards for the purpose of sending any indecent expressions. I am clearly of the opinion that it was not intended to confine the use of the words to nouns or adjectives; but that any form of expression which imputes to a person any indecent or scurrilous characteristic or quality is within the statute. The original signification of the word "epithet" is sometimes "put upon," "attributed," "charged," or "imputed," whatever might be the form of words employed. It so happens that adjectives are most frequently used for this purpose, and hence the meaning of the word has been gradually restricted to nouns and adjectives, and, finally, according to the present usage, to adjectives alone. The gist of the word "epithet" in this section is the thought or imputation conveyed by the words employed, and not the particular parts of speech used to convey it. I am satisfied that congress did not intend to employ the word "epithet" in its restricted sense, and my only doubt is whether the statute was not intended to embrace all scurrilous and indecent communication.

I think the jury are at liberty to infer, from the postal card in question in this case, that the writer intended to impute to the woman whose name is mentioned an illicit connection with a colored man, and hence that it contains an indecent epithet within the meaning of the statute. It is true that penal statutes must be construed strictly. That is, as observed by Mr. Justice Story, in U. S. v. Winn [Case No. 16,740]: "That penal statutes are not to be enlarged by implication, or extended to cases not obviously within their words and purport; but where the words are general, and include various classes of persons, I know of no authority which would justify the court in restricting them to one class, or in giving them the narrowest interpretation, where the mischief to be redressed by the statute is equally applicable to all of them. But where a word is used in a statute which has various known significations, I know of no rule which requires the court to adopt one in preference to another, simply because it is more restrained, if the objects of the statute equally apply to the largest and broadest sense of the word. In short, it appears to me that the proper course in all these cases is to search out and follow the true intent of the legislature, and to adopt that sense of the word which harmonizes best with the context, and promotes in the fullest manner the apparent policy and objects of the legislature." While the liberty of the citizen is not to be taken away by an application of the statute to cases not clearly falling within the intent of the legislature, society also has its right, and the beneficent purpose of penal laws should not be frittered away by a rigid adherence to literalisms and grammatical definitions. In Winn's Case, above cited, the word "crew," as applied to seamen, was held to include the first mate; and in Hartwell's Case, supra, a clerk in the office of the assistant treasurer was held to be an officer within the meaning of the sub-treasury act. See, also, The Industry [Case No. 7,028]; U. S. v. Mattock [Id. 15,744]; U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; The Enterprise [Case No. 4,499]; U. S. v. Hartwell, supra. The motion to quash must be denied.

Case No. 16,083.

UNITED STATES v. PRENTICE et al.

[6 McLean, 65.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. Oct. Term, 1853.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS — SUIT ON OFFICIAL BOND—RIGHT OF SET OFF—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. In a suit brought by the United States against the marshal and his sureties, on his bond for the recovery of moneys collected in divers executions, issued at the suit of the United States, the defendants attempted to set off the items of an account, contained in a treasury transcript, which had been disallowed; but which transcript reserved a balance due the government, over and above such items, without including any of the moneys claimed in this suit. It was held that the set off could not be allowed.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

2. It makes no difference that the marshal might be able to plead the statute of limitation to a suit brought for such balance.

3. When a debtor has a set off equally applicable to the demands against him, the court will apply it according to the equity between the parties.

4. Besides, the marshal had presented this account to meet another claim of the government not included in this suit.

5. The statute of the state can have no influence on this question; it depends upon the act of congress.

6. There is no law of congress regulating set off in suits against officers; but several statutes imply that set off may be allowed.

At law.

Mr. Williams, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Lincoln & Logan, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. This is an action brought by the plaintiffs against [William] Prentice and his sureties for the recovery of moneys which the former had received upon sundry executions in favor of the United States, and which had come to his hands as marshal. The declaration only counts upon breaches of the bond, because the marshal has collected money which he never paid over. After the plaintiffs had introduced the various executions which are mentioned in the declaration, with the endorsements made on them by the marshal, the defendants offered an account of the items which they claimed as a set off in this suit, amounting to the sum of fourteen hundred dollars, and then offered a transcript from the treasury department, to show that the items claimed as a set off were disallowed. The defendants insisted it was competent evidence for that purpose. By agreement, the whole transcript was admitted subject to the opinion of the court upon the effect to be given to it. The transcript shows a balance of more than $2,000 against the marshal, so that if the $1,400 were allowed as a set off in this case, there would still be, according to the transcript, a balance of more than $600 due the government.

I am of the opinion that the account cannot be allowed as a set off, in this case. The government has not seen fit to sue the marshal on the account which contains these disallowed items, but has brought suit for money collected on divers executions. The government can properly object to this account in this suit, because it was presented by the marshal as a charge against the government, in another claim with which the subject matter of this suit has no concern. The defendants insist upon the set off here; because to the other claim, if suit is brought, they purpose pleading the statute of limitation. But this ground will not help them in this case. It would seem to be inequitable to suffer the defendants to avail themselves of an account which shows that so far from there being any set off for claims against the government, there is a balance against the marshal, independent of the amount in controversy here. Where a debtor has a set off equally applicable to two demands against him, he cannot select on which of the demands he will apply it; but the court will apply it according to the equity between the parties. See Tallmadge v. Fishkill Iron Co., 4 Barb. 392, which was a suit in equity, and which cites Collins v. Allen, 12 Wend. 356, which was a suit at law, where a party had two claims—a note and an account—against a man, and transferred the note overdue, he holding claims against the man sufficient to meet a set off which was attempted to be put in in a suit on the transferred note. It was held it was not a good set off, in that suit. But here there is great reason for saying that the marshal himself elected to apply the account offered, as a set off to another claim of the government against him, different from the one in suit here. And it would be manifestly unjust to allow him now to withdraw this account from that claim because it may be barred by the 4th section of the act of April 10, 1806 [2 Stat. 374].

The statute of the state can have no influence on this question. It is something which depends entirely upon the acts of congress. No state law can affect the question of set off, in suits by the government against its officers, because the rule on the subject must be uniform throughout the United States. U. S. v. Robeson, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 323. The courts have frequently allowed claims as set off against the government, which were not strictly legal, provided they were due ex equo et bono. U. S. v. McDaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 1.

It is to be regretted that there is no act of congress regulating set off in suits brought by the government. There are, however, various acts, such as the 3d and 4th sections of the act of March 3, 1797 (1 Stat. 514), and others—which imply that set off may be allowed.

Being of opinion that the defendants are not equitably entitled to the set off they claim, the judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

Case No. 16,084.

UNITED STATES v. PRESCOTT.

[2 Abb. U. S. 169;[1] 2 Biss. 325; 9 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 481; 4 N. B. R. 112 (Quarto, 29); 18 Pittsb. Leg. J. 21.]

District Court, D. Wisconsin. June Term, 1870.

BANKRUPTCY—INDICTMENTS.

1. In an indictment under section 44 of the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 539], it is not sufficient, either as to the proceedings or the jurisdiction of the court in bankruptcy, to rely merely upon a general averment. All matters necessary to constitute the offense as defined by the act must be pleaded.

[Cited in U. S. v. Penn, Case No. 16,025; U. S. v. Myers, Id. 15,848.]

[1][Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The description of the goods, in an indictment under the act, should be as definite as in a declaration in trover.

3. The word "feloniously" should be omitted in indictments under the act. The offenses made indictable are misdemeanors.

4. In drawing indictments, figures should not be used for dates.

5. Drawing indictments under the bankrupt act of 1867,—explained.

[Cited in Globe Ins. Co. v. Cleveland Ins. Co., Case No. 5,486; U. S. v. Myers, Id. 15,848.]

Motion to quash an indictment.

The defendant was indicted under section 44 of the bankrupt act, for fraudulently obtaining goods on credit; and now moved to quash the indictment upon grounds which appear in the opinion.

James G. Jenkins, for the motion.

G. W. Hazleton, Dist. Atty., opposed.

MILLER, District Judge. The first count of the indictment charges that on a certain day mentioned. in the district court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, under and pursuant to an act of congress, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, proceedings in bankruptcy were duly commenced against Alphonso Prescott, Leander F. Snyder, and R. H. Lovell (whose full Christian name is to the said grand inquest unknown), as insolvent debtors, and partners under the name of Prescott, Snyder & Lovell, who thereupon afterwards, to wit, on a certain day mentioned, were adjudged bankrupts; that prior to the dates last aforesaid, and within three months before the commencement of said proceedings in bankruptcy, to wit, on August 16, 1869, within the jurisdiction of this court, and at and in the district of Wisconsin, the said Alphonso Prescott, Leander F. Snyder, and R. H. Lovell, then and there representing themselves to be associated together as copartners, under the firm of Prescott, Snyder & Lovell, and holding themselves out as wholesale merchants, and jobbers of boots and shoes, under the false color and pretense of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade of wholesale boot and shoe merchants and jobbers, did then and there wrongfully, unlawfully, and feloniously obtain on credit, from one Lyman Dike, certain goods and chattels, to wit, a large quantity of boots and shoes, of the value of five thousand dollars, with the intent then and there, by the obtaining of said goods and chattels, to defraud the said Lyman Dike, contrary to the statute of the United States in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States of America. There are other like counts of the indictment, except as to the names of persons from whom goods had been obtained by defendants.

It is alleged in the motion to quash the indictment that it is defective in not setting forth the manner in which the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, and also in the description of the goods, &c.

The court exercises jurisdiction in bankruptcy as limited by the act; and proceedings must be commenced and prosecuted substantially as the act directs. Neither as to the proceedings nor the jurisdiction of the court in bankruptcy, is it sufficient in an indictment under the act to rely merely upon a general averment. All matters necessary to constitute the offense must be pleaded. It is not sufficient, as in this indictment, to aver that proceedings in bankruptcy were duly commenced. It must be pleaded and proven in order to convict, that a petition in bankruptcy was presented to the district court by a certain creditor, naming him, and also the amount of the debt of such petitioning creditor, and the alleged cause of bankruptcy, and the adjudication of bankruptcy. It must appear affirmatively that the creditor had a right under the law to prosecute proceedings in bankruptcy. The amount of his debt must appear, otherwise the court would have no jurisdiction. Of the bankrupt consolidated act of 12 and 13 Vict., section 44 of the act under which the indictment in question was framed, is almost a literal copy. Several decisions of courts in England, as to requirements in the prosecution and trial of indictments under their act, were made and published before the passage by congress of our bankrupt act, and to which I refer as proper for consideration: Reg. v. Lands, 33 Eng. Law & Eq. 536; Reg. v. Ewington, 41 E. C. L. 178; Rex v. Jones, 24 E. C. L. 156. It must appear that the bankrupt obtained goods within three months of the bankruptcy, by means of a representation which he knew to be false, that he was carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, and such representations must be actually made by him. Reg. v. Boyd, 5 Cox, Cr. Cas. 502.

The description of the goods obtained by defendants is too uncertain; instead of a large quantity of boots and shoes, a certain number of pairs of boots and also of shoes, or a certain number of packages in boxes of boots and also of shoes, should be described. This could be ascertained from the bills of sale. The description of the goods in an indictment should be as definite as in a declaration in trover.

The word "feloniously" should be omitted in indictments under the act. The offenses made indictable are misdemeanors. And in drawing indictments, figures for dates should not be used.

This being the first indictment in this court under the bankrupt act, I have prepared this opinion as a guide to the district-attorney in future. The indictment will be quashed. Order accordingly.

Case No. 16,085.

UNITED STATES v. PRESCOTT.

[2 Dill. 405.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. 1872.

BANKRUPT ACT—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE.

The compulsory examination of a bankrupt under oath cannot be given in evidence against him on a criminal proceeding.

Indictment under section 44 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 539)], charging the defendant with disposing of his property with intent to prevent it from coming into the possession of the assignee in bankruptcy. The defendant had, before being indicted, been compelled to submit to an examination under section 26 of the act, and that examination was reduced to writing and signed by the bankrupt. On the trial of the indictment the district attorney offered in evidence to establish the fraudulent disposition of the property charged in the indictment the above mentioned examination of the defendant in bankruptcy.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. It is our opinion that the evidence offered is not competent. The general rule certainly is that evidence given or statements made by a party under compulsion or order of court tending to criminate himself cannot be put in evidence on a criminal proceeding against him. Reg. v. Garbett, 1 Denison, Crown Cas. 236. This case falls within this principle. Evidence excluded.

Case No. 16,086.

UNITED STATES v. PRESSY.

[1 Lowell, 319.] [2]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1869.

PEDLERS — LICENSE AND SPECIAL TAX — INDICTMENT.

A pedler who has duly applied to the assessor for a license in April, is not indictable for carrying on business without payment of the special tax, between the 1st and 7th days of May, before the tax was, in the usual course of business, assessed upon him for that year, if he intended during that time to pay the tax when it should be assessed, although when the tax bill was presented him on the 21st of May he refused to pay it, having stopped business on the 7th.

The defendant [Samuel J. Pressy] was indicted under the seventy-third section of the act of 1864, as amended by that of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 113), for carrying on the trade or business of a pedler of the third class without paying the special tax imposed on that business by the same statute. The evidence tended to show that the defendant had duly paid his tax for 1867, and that in April, 1868, he duly applied to the assessor of internal revenue of his district to pay the special tax for that fiscal year, beginning with May 1, 1868; that four or five days afterwards he sold out his business, and had not carried it on since. The taxes were usually assessed about the 20th of May in each year, and the bills were sent in on the next day. The defendant's bill was sent him as usual, but he had neglected and refused to pay the tax, and was indicted in January, 1869.

M. F. Dickinson, Jr., Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
S. E. Floyd, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge, ruled that if the defendant had been guilty only of a neglect or refusal to pay his tax after he had ceased to carry on the business, he was not, for that alone, liable to indictment under the section cited. That the offence described in the law was the carrying on a trade or business without payment of a tax, and if the defendant, when he carried on the business before his tax was levied, had no intent to defraud the government, he could not be lawfully convicted. His application to be assessed was all that he could do, or was bound to do, until the bill was rendered. So that, while many defendants had been rightly convicted under this section who had never been assessed for a tax, because the failure to assess them arose out of their own wrong in not making application to the assessor, and therefore they could not be heard to object the want of assessment; yet this stringent penalty was not intended for delinquent taxpayers merely as such, if they had been guilty of no act or omission at the time they carried on their business. The government officers, in adopting what appeared to be a reasonable and perhaps necessary practice of giving credit for the tax for twenty days while their lists were preparing, did not thereby expose all tradesmen to indictment who took advantage of that credit.

The district attorney declined to go to the jury on the question of intent, and the defendant was acquitted.

Case No. 16,087.

UNITED STATES v. PRESTON et al.

[4 Wash. C. C. 446.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1824.

WRIT OF ERROR—RECORD—DUTY BONDS—PAYMENT BY SURETIES—SUBROGATION.

1. Where irregularities appear in records coming from the district to the circuit court, this court will in future decide on the record alone, disregarding the parol admissions of the parties.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

2. Under the sixty-fifth section of the duty act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 676], the surety having discharged the bond for duties to the United States, is entitled to no other advantages secured to the United States, except the preference and priority reserved to the United States to be first paid out of the estate of the principal. He is not entitled to proceed against the person and effects of executors and assignees in the cases mentioned in this section; to require special bail; to demand judgment at the first term; to sue in the federal courts when the parties are citizens of the same state.

[Cited in U. S. v. Ryder, 110 U. S. 740, 4 Sup. Ct. 201.]

[Cited in Grove v. Little, 11 Leigh, 195; Jackson v. Davis, 4 Mackey, 199; Zook v. Clemmer, 44 Ind. 29.]

3. Where the surety has paid the bond, he cannot maintain assumpsit in the name of the United States, against the assignees of the principal. The only remedy is for money laid out, &c. on the bond in his own name, under the privilege granted to him by the sixty-fifth section.

[Cited in U S. v. Ryder. 110 U. S. 740, 4 Sup. Ct. 201.]

4. Where one obligor, though a surety, pays the bond, he cannot maintain an action on it in the name of the obligee against his co-obligors, nor an action for money laid out and advanced, except in his own name.

[Cited in Edgerly v. Emerson, 23 N. H. 560.]

Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.

It appeared from the agreement of counsel, that a suit was brought in the court below by the United States against Joseph and Thomas Lea, and Perrit their surety, upon a duty bond, upon which a judgment was rendered, and the amount of it was paid by the surety, to whom the bond was surrendered for his reimbursement out of the estate of Joseph Lea, in the hands of the defendants, voluntary assignees of all his estate. [Case unreported.] The present action was assumpsit, brought in the name of the United States against the assignees [Preston and Bunker], but intended for the use of the surety; and upon a motion of the plaintiff's counsel to the court below to have the suit so marked, the court dismissed the suit. The counsel entered into a written agreement, in which certain questions are stated for the decision of the appellate court, which will appear in the opinion given by that court.

For the plaintiff it was contended, that under the terms "advantage, preference or priority," in the sixty-fifth section of the collection law of March 2, 1799 (1 Story's Laws, 631 [1 Stat. 676]), the surety is entitled to every advantage reserved to the United States by that section, and consequently may sue in the federal court, and may demand a trial on motion at the return term of the writ. (2) That the assignees can not make any equitable defence in this suit, which they could not set up against the United States. He cited the following cases: 2 Ves. Sr. 622; 1 Atk. 135; 1 Ch. Obl. R. 64; 1 Johns. Ch. 413; 17 Mass. 464; 2 Bin. 382; 2 Bos. & P. 268; 1 East, 220; 1 Caines, 122; Poth. pt. 2, c. 3, § 5; Id. c. 6, § 6; Id. pt. 3, c. 1, art. 6, § 2.

On the other side, it was insisted, that the debt to the United States having been paid by the surety, this suit, which is assumpsit, could not be maintained in the name of the United States, and further, that the only advantage intended by the sixty-fifth section of the collection law to be granted to the surety, is that of preference to be paid out of the effects of the principal in the hands of his assignees or executors. They cited 1 Serg. & R. 339; Whart. Dig. 315, § 65; Winchester v. Hackley, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 342; Clason v. Morris, 10 Johns. 524, 539, 546.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the district court. It was an action of assumpsit brought in that court in the name of the United States against Jonas Preston and Nathan Bunker, voluntary assignees of the estate and effects of Joseph Lea, in which a declaration was filed containing three counts. The first is for money had and received by the defendants from the estate and effects of Lea, to the use of the United States. The second is upon insimul computassent. The third count is special. It states, that on the 10th of August, 1822, the said Lea was indebted to the United States in a certain sum for duties, for the payment whereof he had executed a bond to the United States; and on the same day, the said Lea, being insolvent, made a voluntary assignment of all his estate and effects to the defendants, who accepted the assignment, by means whereof they received enough of the estate and effects of the said Lea to pay his said duty bond to the United States; in consideration whereof, and of the preference, priority, and advantage of payment by act of congress in such case made and provided, the defendants undertook and promised the United States to pay them the said sum due by Lea, out of the estate and effects so assigned to them. The conclusion of the declaration is in the usual form.

The plea of the general issue being filed, the district attorney, at a subsequent term, moved, in behalf of the United States, that this suit should be marked, to the use of John W. Perrit, the surety in the duty bond, and that it be proceeded in accordingly for his use, with the preference, priority, and advantage of the United States. This motion was overruled, and judgment was entered for the defendants; whereupon it was agreed by the counsel, that a writ of error should be sued out from the circuit court, and that the questions to be determined by that court should be, first, whether Perrit, the surety, might sue and recover in the district court, in the name of the United States, with the preference, priority, and advantage, by law secured to them? And, secondly, whether the defendants were entitled to make any equitable defence against the plaintiffs in this action, other than such as might be made against the United States?

Intending to confine my opinion to the questions which the counsel have agreed to submit to the court, or rather, to the first, I shall notice the loose and irregular manner in which this cause comes from the district court, with no other view but to condemn it. In the first place, it is to be remarked that, although the parties were at issue on the general plea, yet no trial appears to have been had, but judgment was entered (no doubt by the argument of counsel) for the defendants, upon a collateral motion, unconnected with the merits of the issue in the cause. In the next place, the payment of the bond by the surety to the United States, although all important to entitle him to recover, is no where stated in the record, and it is only from the information given to the court by the counsel, on both sides, that I know that to be the fact. It is obvious, in short, that the case is brought up, with a view to obtain the opinion of this court upon what must appear to me to be abstract questions; although they would seem to be connected with the real merits of the cause, not from the record, but from the arguments and the admissions of the counsel. These observations are intended to bring about more precision and strictness in the practice, for the purpose of preventing disappointments and injury to the parties; as I shall feel it to be my duty, in future, to decide causes coming here from the district court, upon the record, and upon that alone.

The first question propounded on this record, depends for its solution upon the true construction of the sixty-fifth section of the act of congress, commonly called the "Collection Law," passed the 2d of March, 1799. It enacts that, in all cases of insolvency, or where any estate in the hands of executors or administrators shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased, the debts due to the United States, on duty bonds, shall be first satisfied; and that any executor, administrator, or assignee, or other person, who shall pay any debt due by the person or estate from whom, or for which, they are acting, previous to the debt due to the United States, from such person, or estate, being first duly satisfied and paid, shall become answerable in their own persons and estate for the debt so due to the United States, or so much thereof as shall remain due and unpaid; and actions at law are directed to be commenced against them for the recovery of the same. After providing that, in all suits by the United States for the recovery of duties, or pecuniary penalties, special bail shall be required; the act proceeds to provide that, in the cases before mentioned, if any surety in such duty bond, his executors, administrators, or assignees, shall pay to the United States the money due upon such bond, he and they "shall have and enjoy the like advantage, priority, or preference, for the recovery and receipt of the said moneys, out of the estate and effects of such insolvent or deceased principal as are reserved and secured to the United States; and shall and may bring and maintain a suit or suits upon the said bond or bonds, in law or equity, in his, her, or their own name, or names, for the recovery of all moneys paid thereon." As the surety, after he has discharged the bond, is to enjoy the like advantage for the recovery and receipt of the money so paid, out of the estate and effects of the insolvent as is secured to the United States, it becomes material to inquire, what is the advantage secured to the United States? and I feel strongly inclined to the opinion, that the advantage spoken of is nothing more than the preference and priority reserved to the United States by the preceding part of the section. It was earnestly insisted upon by the counsel for the plaintiff, that, under this expression, the surety was entitled, in addition to the privilege of priority of payment, to call upon the collector forthwith to cause a prosecution to be commenced for the recovery of the money due to him; to proceed against the person and effects of executors and assignees, in cases where they have paid any debt of the insolvent, previous to that due to the surety being first satisfied; to require special bail in such action; to demand judgment on motion at the return term of the writ, unless the defendant shall make oath that an error has been committed in the liquidation of the duties demanded upon the bond, specifying the errors alleged to have been committed, and that the same have been notified in writing to the collector, prior to the commencement of the return term; to recover interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the time the bond became due, until payment thereof; and finally, to bring his suit in the federal court.

I think there are many serious objections to this construction of the section. What, for instance, has the collector to do with the prosecution of a suit, the fruit of which is not to go into the public treasury, but into the pocket of a private individual? As a public officer, and on the score of duty, he is enjoined to cause suits to be instituted on certain bonds due to the United States, with the history of which he is well acquainted, having been the agent in taking them, and is therefore enabled to give the necessary instructions to the law officer of the government, in case objections to a recovery should be made by the obligors. But what knowledge can he have of the transactions between the surety and his principal? and why should he be required to conduct a suit, which can be so much better managed by the person alone interested in the event of it? Again, what part of this section is it which grants to the surety the advantage reserved to the United States of proceeding against the person and effects of the executors or assignees, where they have paid any debt of the insolvent, previous to that due to the plaintiff being first satisfied? The recovery of the surety, spoken of in this section, is to be out of the estate and effects of such insolvent or deceased principal, and not out of the effects of his executors or assignees. It would seem as if congress intended to leave the surety to such remedy as a court of law or equity might afford him, as a privileged creditor, in case of an improper disposition of the estate of the insolvent, by those to whom the management of it was entrusted.

As to the right of the surety to require special bail, and to recover legal interest upon the money paid for the principal, no provision, in favour of the surety, was necessary, as he would, of course, be entitled to the former in an action upon the bond, and to the latter, either in the name of interest, or of damages. The provision respecting special bail, where the United States were plaintiffs, was necessary from the circumstance that pecuniary penalties are embraced in the same sentence which speaks of duty bonds, in suits for the recovery of which special bail could not regularly have been demanded; and the provision respecting interest was probably made for the purpose of fixing a uniform rate of interest to be paid on duty bonds throughout the United States.

The important advantages, after all, which are claimed for the plaintiff under this section, are (1) the right to demand judgment on motion, at the return term of the writ; and (2) to bring his suit in a federal court.

As to the first, it is apparent that great injustice might be done to the defendant by extending this extraordinary privilege to the surety. As between the United States and the principal, it can seldom happen that the latter can have any other defence than to prove a mistake in the liquidation of the duties, and to prove payment of the bond. The legislature would seem to have contemplated no other than the first, by providing for a continuance only when the defendant shall make oath that such an error has been committed, of which he had notified the collector prior to the commencement of the return term. But the defences of the defendants to the suit of the surety may be various, requiring time to put in proper pleas, and to prepare for the trial. He may have paid the debt to the United States; the plaintiff may have reimbursed himself out of property pledged to him for his indemnification; he may have offsets to oppose to the claim; the value of the property assigned to the defendants, or of the assets in the hands of the executors, may fall short of the sum demanded, &c. It is correctly admitted by the counsel for the surety, that these defences may be made by the defendant; and if this be so, how can they be effectually made, if the plaintiff may ask for judgment at the return term of the writ? But what satisfies my mind entirely that this advantage was not intended to be granted to the surety is, the indulgence allowed to the defendant to put off the trial, upon his taking the prescribed oath, in order that he may have an opportunity of diminishing the amount of the bond by showing an overcharge of the duties for which the bond was taken. But could such a defence be made by the principal, or his representatives, against the surety, who, ignorant of a mistake, which it was the duty of the principal to get corrected, had paid the full amount of the bond? I very much doubt if it could be admitted.

(2) As to the jurisdiction of the federal courts in suits by the surety, the question is not whether it ought to have been granted, as to which I entertain no doubt, but whether it is in fact granted by this section? The expressions, as to the United States, are, that the collector shall cause a prosecution to be commenced "in the proper court, having cognizance thereof." This might be either a federal or a state court. But the jurisdiction of the federal court was not reserved to the United States by this section, but by the judiciary law of 1789. Had the expressions before quoted been repeated in relation to the suit of the surety, would it have conferred jurisdiction upon the district or circuit court? I think it would not. They are not intended, or used, for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon any court, but merely to direct that the suit shall be brought in the proper court which then had cognizance thereof. But the district court had not then cognizance of this suit, it being between citizens of the same state. In every instance where congress has conferred jurisdiction upon a federal court, in cases arising under a law of the United States, it has been by terms clearly pointing out the particular court which was to exercise it. I refer particularly to the patent act, the copyright act, and the act incorporating the Bank of the United States.

My opinion, therefore, as to the construction of this section is, that the term "advantage" is used as synonymous with "preference and priority," which, in reference to the subject of insolvency in the principal, are clearly synonymous. A preference of payment is nothing more or less than a right to be first paid, and a right of priority is a preference of payment before the other creditors of the insolvent; and such a preference or priority is an advantage enjoyed by the United States, and is by this section conferred on the surety. Had the legislature intended to bestow upon the surety all the advantages secured and reserved to the United States, it is not likely that such an intention would have been expressed by the terms "the like advantage, preference or priority." But if I should be wrong in this interpretation of the section, I feel no hesitation in deciding that the present action cannot be maintained, either in a federal or state court. It is exposed to at least one fatal objection, which is, that it is an action by the United States to recover against the assignees of the principal in a bond, a debt which, it is admitted, had been paid by another obligor in the same bond. This would have been no objection to the suit of that other obligor upon the bond, because the sixty-fifth section of the above act authorizes him to maintain such a suit for the recovery and receipt of the money so paid to the United States, out of the estate and effects of the principal.

Nor is the question altered by the motion which was made in the district court "to mark the suit to the use of the surety in the duty bond," because I hold it to be perfectly clear, that where one obligor, though a surety, pays the bond, he cannot maintain an action upon the same bond in the name of the obligee against his co-obligor; nor can he maintain an action for money laid out and advanced for his principal, to recover the money so paid, except in his own name; for to him alone the debt is due. To be sure, the assignee of a chose in action, not assignable at law, must bring his suit in the name of the assignor, because the debt, though in equity due to the assignee, is, in the view of the law, due to the assignor, and the assignee, until the courts of law assumed an equitable jurisdiction over the case, for the purpose of protecting his interest, was obliged to resort to a court of equity. But in the case now under consideration, the legal remedy, either on the bond or for money paid, laid out and expended for the insolvent, is in the surety, and the United States, the nominal plaintiffs, have no right, either legal or equitable, to maintain this suit.

The second question stated for the opinion of the court, is not very intelligible to my mind, as I do not well understand what is meant by an equitable defence to a legal action, which this unquestionably is. If the particular defence which was intended to be set up had been stated, the solution of the question might have been attended with less difficulty. In its present shape it has too much the appearance of an abstract question to justify the court in attempting to answer it. At all events, an answer to it is rendered unnecessary by the decision upon the first point.

The judgment of the district court must be affirmed with costs.

Case No. 16,088.

UNITED STATES v. PRICE.

[3 Hall, Law J. 121.]

District Court, D. New York. 1810.

SUMMONING JURY IN FEDERAL COURTS — COMPLIANCE WITH STATE LAWS—CHALLENGE TO ARRAY—PRACTICE.

[1. The provision in the judiciary acts, requiring jurors to be designated in the federal courts, as nearly as practicable, in the same manner as in the state courts, does not require a compliance with the state laws when in the opinion of the court it is wholly impracticable to do so.]

[2. The provision in the statute that jurors shall be returned, as there shall be occasion for them, from such parts of the district, from time to time, as the court shall direct, so as to be most favorable to an impartial trial, etc., leaves it entirely discretionary with the court to give or not to give any directions as to the place from which the jurors shall be summoned. If defendant desires that such directions should be given, he should apply to the court therefor. In the absence of such application, it is no ground of challenge to the array that the marshal has summoned the jurors according to his own will.]

At the district court of the United States, held before his honor, TALLMADGE, District Judge, which commenced its sessions on the fourth instant, several of those suits which have been instituted to recover penalties under the embargo laws were noticed for trial. Among others the cause of the United States against Edward Price, which was an action of debt to recover against him, as master or person having charge of the schooner Regulator, or as being knowingly concerned in the lading of the said vessel, penalties for loading in the nighttime, without a permit, and without the inspection of the proper revenue officer. A great part of the jury which appeared to serve at this court were from Orange, a county fifty or sixty miles from the city, from whence they had been summoned by the marshal without any official direction of the judge, and were selected by the mere will of the marshal, without any attempt having been made to conform to the mode of forming juries in the courts of this state. By the judiciary act of the United States, passed in 1789 [1 Stat. 73], it is enacted "that jurors in all cases to serve in the courts of the United States shall be designated by lot or otherwise in each state respectively, according to the mode of forming juries therein then practised, so far as the laws of the same should render such designations practicable by the courts of the marshals of the United States; and that the jurors should have the same qualifications as are requisite for jurors by laws of the state of which they are citizens, to serve in the highest courts of law of such state, and should be returned as there should be occasion for them from such parts of the district, from time to time, as the court should direct, so as should be most favorable to an impartial trial, and so as not to incur an unnecessary expense, or unduly to burthen the citizens of any part of the district with such services." This law as to the mode in which jurors were to be designated refers to the time when it was passed, but, alterations having been afterwards made in the mode of selecting jurors in several of the states, and particularly in our state, by an act which provided that jurors in this state should be selected by ballot from a list annually returned to the clerk's office of every county, by certain persons designated in the law; congress, in May, 1800 [2 Stat. 82], passed a law, which, so far as relates to the mode of selecting jurors, is nearly in the words of the law of 1789, and declares that jurors to serve in the courts of the United States shall be designated by lot, or otherwise, in each state or district, respectively, according to the mode of forming juries to serve in the highest courts of law therein, then practised, so far as the same shall render such designation practicable by the courts or marshals of the United States. But the United States' law of 1789, so far as it relates to the courts directing from what part of the district the jury shall be taken, remains unaltered.

On Tuesday last, the district attorney moved to bring on the trial of the above-mentioned cause, when Mr. Griffin and Mr. Colden, who were of counsel for the defendant, filed a challenge to the array, alleging that the jurors were not legally returned, because they had been summoned by the marshal of his mere arbitrary will; that they had not been returned from a part of the district directed by the court. To this challenge the attorney of the United States demurred ore tenus; that is to say he made a parol declaration that no legal objections to the jury were shown by the defendant's challenge. The counsel for the defendant insisted that the attorney of the United States ought to be compelled to put his demurrer in writing, but the court determined, that a parol demurrer was sufficient, and the court also decided that the attorneys might immediately proceed to argue on the demurrer whether there was cause of challenge which they accordingly did.

The attorney of the United States contended that it was impracticable to select the jury by ballot, as was practised by the courts in this state, or in anywise to conform to the state laws in this respect; that the part of the United States law which provides for the jurors being returned from such part of the state as should be directed by the judge, was a provision merely intended for the ease and convenience of jurors, and gave the parties no rights; besides, that though the act of congress authorized the court to direct from whence the jury was to come, this authority was only to be exercised on application of the party who desired it to be executed, and the defendant having made no application to the court, he was not to be allowed to make the want of its direction an objection to the jury; and, lastly, the attorney of the United States insisted that the jury had been summoned according to what had been the practice of the court from its institution.

The counsel for the defendant insisted that as the attorney of the United States had demurred to the challenge, and took no exception to its form, he admitted the facts. He had admitted therefore that the jurors had not been elected by ballot according to the state laws as far as was practicable, and that they had not been summoned from a part of the district directed by the court; that therefore the only inquiry was, whether the laws of congress required that these things should be done, and the defendant had nothing to do but appeal to the statute book; that if the attorney relied on the impracticability of conforming to the practice under the state laws, he ought to have pleaded to the challenge, or have moved to quash it; but as the court had decided that it was now proper to discuss the points which the attorney had been permitted to state, the defendant's counsel would, in behalf of the defendant, answer the arguments which had been offered by counsel for the plaintiffs.

The defendant's counsel then proceeded to state that, as to the manner of electing the jury, it was to be observed, that the act of congress did not require a full compliance with the state laws; that the great object was to preserve to suitors in the courts of the United States, as far as was practicable, the invaluable right of having the jurors elected by ballot, and that this was by no means impracticable; that in every clerk's office, in the state, there was a book containing the names of the freeholders in the county qualified to serve on juries; that the judge might have directed from what county the jury should have been summoned, that the marshal might have applied to the clerk of that county for a copy of his list of freeholders; from that list he might have made his ballots, and he might have balloted for the panel in the presence of the judge or the clerk of this court, which would have been a very near approximation to the mode of electing jurors for the state courts; or the marshal, with the assistance of his deputies, might have made a list of freeholders in any part of the district that the court might have designated, and then there would have been no difficulty in making the ballot. But, at any rate, no sufficient reason had been offered for the neglect of part of the act which requires the court to direct from what place the jury should be taken. The terms of the law of congress left no discretion with the court in this respect. The words of the statute are not that the court "may," but that the court "shall," direct from what part of the district the jurors shall be returned. That it was absurd to say, that the defendant in such cause was to apply for the direction of the court, because jurors were summoned to try all the causes which might be brought on at a sitting; and, if such an application was to be attended to from each defendant, there might be as many panels returned as there were causes. That the defendant might not have had an opportunity of making such an application; for that the process to summon the jury might have been issued and executed before he received notice that his cause was to be tried. Besides, that it was a general principle, that the plaintiff must take care that the jurors that appeared, as well in respect to the manner of their being chosen as to their qualifications, were proper to try his cause, and if they were not, the defendant might take advantage of it, as was every day's practice for defendant to do. As to the former practice of the court, the defendant's counsel observed, that that ought to have no influence on his honour's decision, because it was well known that until very lately the causes which were submitted to a jury in this court were very few, and comparatively of very little consequence, and were seldom of a nature to excite any fears that the jury might have a bias to the one side or the other. That therefore the manner in which jurors had been selected had never excited any attention; but at this time the case was very different, for it was not an exaggeration to say that there were now millions depending on the event of suits which had been instituted for breaches of the embargo laws. That it was well known that libels were now upon the records of the court which proceed upon the ground that the president's proclamation of the 19th April last, opening the intercourse with Great Britain, was an illegal act. That he had no authority to issue it. That therefore it was a mere nullity, and that, of course, the nonintercourse act of the 1st of March, with all its denunciations of penalties and forfeitures, had always been in full force. That if the courts were to be of this opinion, there was hardly a merchant in the United States who was not at the mercy of the executive officers of the government, who might not have their property seized, and who might now be prosecuted in suits of this nature for enormous penalties. It became therefore now of the utmost importance to see that all the cautions which the laws had provided for an impartial selection of jurors should be observed. That the questions between the government and the citizens which were to be decided in this court under the embargo laws it was well known had greatly excited the public mind. It would hardly be denied that many might be found in the district who were so blinded by their political prejudices and by their passions, that they would never acquit a political opponent accused of a breach of the embargo laws, which were so dear to those who favor them; at the same time it was not meant to be denied, but that men might also be found as prejudiced against convicting. If then a marshal might run from one end of his district to the other to select just whom he pleased for trials of this nature, it was in fact putting it in the power of an individual to determine who should be convicted, and who acquitted, in the courts of the United States.

The counsel of the defendant called the attention of the court to the constitution of the United States and its amendments. The first provided that the trial of all crimes shall be by jury. But it being feared that this inestimable right was not sufficiently guarded by this simple provision, the seventh article of the amendment provides, that in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury. The counsel then asked whether it was possible to suppose, that the framers of the constitution or of its amendments could have imagined, that notwithstanding the provisions, a citizen might be subject to trial for his life, even by a jury selected at the mere will of a marshal who might be his prejudiced political opponent or his bitterest enemy. Had a defendant, the counsel asked, any security for an impartial jury in cases like this, where the jurors may be selected at the mere will of an officer holding his commission, at the pleasure of the officer of the government, at whose instigation the suit is instituted, and who has an eventual pecuniary interest in the conviction of the defendant; for if the penalties which are demanded in these cases are to be levied on execution, the marshal's share of them will be no inconsiderable fortune.

The counsel for the defendant both declared, that the attempt they made in this case was merely with a view to secure to suitors in this court the benefits of those provisions of the state laws which were so well calculated to guard against corruption and partiality, and which, perhaps, was a greater improvement in jurisprudence, than the institution of trial by jury itself. That in what they had said respecting the marshal and jurors, they referred entirely to what might be, without intending any insinuation as to what was or had been. That as to the present marshal, they had never heard anything to his prejudice, and they did not know anything of the jurors, from a distant part of the district, who were on the panel.

When the United States attorney had said a few words in reply to the arguments of the defendant's counsel, the judge told him it was unnecessary for him to proceed, as the court was satisfied on the subject.

We shall not attempt to detail the reasons his honour gave for his decision, for fear of mistakes. He, however, exactly agreed with the attorney of the United States in all points. He thought it was wholly impracticable to have any ballot or to conform in any respect to the state laws. That it was discretionary with the court to give or not, at its pleasure, any direction as to the summoning the jury; and that if a defendant was desirous that a direction should be given, it was his business to apply for it, and the judge ordered the clerk to enter on the minutes the demurrer of the attorney of the United States, and that, upon hearing counsel thereupon, the court gave judgment in favor of the United States. So that, according to the decision, the marshal of the United States in all cases, whether civil or criminal, whether the life or property of a defendant is concerned, or whether the defendant be his friend or enemy, has an uncontrollable power of selecting whom he pleases for jurors.

It would really seem a little difficult to reconcile the entries which appear on the records of the court with the provisions of the constitution and laws of the United States. The laws require that the jurors shall be selected, as far as is practicable, by ballot, and that they shall be taken from a part of the district designated by the court. The defendant alleges by his challenge, that neither of these provisions have been complied with.

The attorney of the United States by his demurrer admits these allegations to be true, and yet the judgment of the court is that the jury have been legally summoned.

Case No. 16,089.

UNITED STATES v. PRICE.

[2 Wash. C. C. 356.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1809.

DEPOSITIONS—VACATING COMMISSION.

A commission, which had been executed and returned, was set aside because it had been opened by one of the officers of the government, before it came into the hands of the clerk.

[Suit by the United States against Price's administrator.]

Rule to show cause why the commission for taking depositions should not be accepted as duly returned, or be sent back for a more regular return. The commission, in consequence of a misdirection of it by the commissioners, had been opened first by the secretary of war, and afterwards by some other officer of the government, before it came to the hands of the clerk of the court.

BY THE COURT. This rule was granted on account of the irregularity in opening the commission, as to which there is no doubt. If the objection had been to the execution of it, the rule would not have been granted. Let it be set aside. Issue a new commission, to which the original papers attached to the old commission, may now be annexed.

Case No. 16,090.

UNITED STATES v. PRICE.

[2 Wash. C. C. 460.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1810.

BILL OF EXCHANGE DRAWN BY PUBLIC AGENT — CONSIDERATION.

1. A bill of exchange was drawn by a public sub-agent, on the general agent of the United States, and payment of the same was at first refused, but it was afterwards made to the defendant, and soon after, it having been discovered that the sub-agent, who drew the bill, was unfaithful, notice was given by the general agent to the defendant, who held the money, as administrator of the payee, not to pay it over, as it was claimed by the United States.

2. Though a bill drawn for value received, might, prima facie, be considered as drawn upon a consideration, yet, when a strong ground is laid to show a want of consideration, the defendant ought to show that value was given for the bill.

One Taylor, a deputy military agent of the United States, at New-Orleans, drew two bills of exchange, for fifteen hundred dollars each, as agent, on Mr. Leonard, of Philadelphia, principal agent, in favour of one Elkin, who endorsed the same in blank, and they were brought by O'Neil to Philadelphia, and presented to the drawee for acceptance. The drawee, suspecting something wrong from the heavy drafts of Taylor, refused to accept, until he should receive from the secretary of war orders to do so. O'Neil expressed great anxiety to get the bills accepted, and offered him, as a premium, to accept, first two and a half per cent., and then one hundred dollars, which were refused with disdain. O'Neil then informed Leonard that he was about to leave town, and should deposit the bills with the defendant, Price, to whom he requested him to pay their amount. Leonard, afterwards receiving orders from the secretary of war to pay the bills, did so, within the days of usance; but, in a day or two after, hearing that Taylor was dead, and his suspicions of foul play being strengthened, he called upon Price, and requested him to repay the money, offering to re-deliver the bills to him. Price declined this, acknowledging that he still had the money; but apprehending that he might be answerable to O'Neil for the same, resolved to retain it until it should be determined who was entitled to it. O'Neil having afterwards died, Price took out letters of administration upon his estate. It was proved that Taylor was a sot and gambler, and played at the house of Elkins and O'Neil, who were partners in the business of gambling. That Taylor had before drawn bills on Leonard, in their favour, which they sold in the market at a great discount. There were other circumstances proved, tending to throw suspicion over the fairness of this transaction.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, then charged the jury, and stated, that although, prima facie, a bill drawn for value received, might be considered as drawn for consideration, yet, that when so strong a ground was laid, as is done in this case, to show the want of consideration, and to warrant the belief that these bills were drawn by a profligate public officer, to satisfy gambling debts, to those who were the payee and endorser of the bill, it behoved the defendant to clear the case of these suspicions, and to show that value was given for them. The evidence is certainly very strong in this case, against the fairness of the consideration paid by Elkins as well as by O'Neil. Of all this, however, the jury are the proper judges.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The jury found for the defendant.

Case No. 16,091.

UNITED STATES v. PRIMROSE.

[Gilp. 58.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Feb. 27, 1829.

SURETY ON REVENUE BOND — LIABILITY OF ADMINISTRATRIX—PLENE ADMINISTRAVIT.

In a suit of the United States, against the administratrix of a surety in a revenue bond, brought thirteen years after the breach, and twelve years after she had settled her administration account, without having had previous notice of the bond or forfeiture, she was held to be entitled to judgment, on pleading want of assets and fully administered.

[This was a suit by the United States against Violet Primrose, administratrix of John Primrose, deceased.]

This case was submitted to the court on the pleadings.

Mr. Ingersoll, U. S. Dist. Atty.

A. Randall, for defendant.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. Suit was brought on a bond dated on the 19th April, 1815, executed by John Primrose, in his life time, as surety for one Daniel Simpson, with a special condition, according to an act of congress, passed the 18th January, 1815, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares and merchandise, manufactured within the United States." 2 Story's Laws, 1471 [3 Stat. 180]. The declaration charges that the said Simpson did not conform to the requisitions of the said act of congress, and the conditions of his said bond, and the breach is laid on the 1st of May, 1815. On the 27th May, 1815, a few weeks after the execution of the said bond, Primrose died. His widow, the present defendant, administered to his effects, and immediately called, by a notice published in the papers of this city, on all persons having any claims on the estate, to present their accounts. The administratrix then proceeded in regular course, to file and settle her accounts in the register's office; which settlement, in August, 1816, was duly and finally confirmed in the orphans' court. By this settlement a balance appeared to be in her hands of two hundred and twenty-nine dollars, and ninety-one cents. The debts due from the intestate far exceeding this sum, the administratrix, according to the law of Pennsylvania, applied to the orphans' court to appoint auditors to apportion and distribute this balance among the creditors, according to their respective rights. No further proceeding appears to have taken place on this application; for, in fact, the whole balance had previously, to wit, on the 29th July, 1816, been paid into the hands of William Delany, attorney at law, and acting for the creditors. According to his receipt the money was paid to them, "to be distributed according to the claims of the creditors, on the adjustment of the proportions." Mr. Delany has been dead several years, but several receipts have been found among his papers for sums paid to creditors, as their dividends of the estate. Things remained in this situation until the 11th March, 1828, nearly thirteen years, when the present defendant received a note from the district attorney, claiming the penalty of the bond, to wit, three hundred dollars, which was followed by this suit, brought to May sessions, 1828. This was the first knowledge the administratrix had of the existence of the bond. The declaration recites the bond, and the condition, and alleges the breach in the same words. The defendant pleads "nil debet," which puts the alleged breach in issue; but it is now admitted that the bond was forfeited. She further pleads "want of assets, and fully administered before she received notice of the obligation mentioned in the declaration." This exposition of the circumstances of the case, is sufficient to show that no devastavit has been committed; and the defendant is entitled to a judgment.

[1] [Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

UNITED STATES (PRINCE v.). See Case No. 11,425.

Case No. 16,092.

UNITED STATES v. PRIOR.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 37.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1837.

INDICTMENT — JOINDER OF OFFENSES — LARCENY AND RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS—CONFESSIONS.

1. A count for stealing, and a count for receiving stolen goods, may be contained in the same indictment, and the attorney for the United States will not be put to his election upon which to proceed.

2. The whole confession must be given in evidence, if any part is given, but the jury have a right to judge for themselves of the truth thereof, or of any part of it.

Indictment. The first count was for stealing the goods of one Eckloff. The second count was for receiving them, knowing them to be stolen.

Brent & Brent, for defendant, contended that the court ought to oblige the attorney for the United States to elect the count upon which he would proceed; and they cited Russell on Crimes.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) refused.

R. J. Brent contended that the confession of the defendant must be taken altogether; and that if there is no evidence to contradict any part of the confession, the attorney for the United States cannot be permitted to argue to the jury that any part of the confession is false.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, said that the question has often been made in this court; and the court had always decided, that the whole confession must be given in evidence to the jury; but that they had a right to judge for themselves of the truth of it, or of any part of it. See Starkie, pt. 4, p. 48.

Verdict, not guilty.

Case No. 16,093.

UNITED STATES v. PROUT.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 203.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1804.

NUISANCE—DISORDERLY HOUSE.

The selling of spirituous liquors to negroes, in a public manner, assembled in considerable numbers, and suffering them to drink the same in and about the house on the Sabbath, constitutes it a disorderly house.

[Cited in State v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 733.]

[This was an indictment against W. Prout.]

THE COURT, in answer to a question from the jury, instructed them that the selling of spirituous liquors to negroes in a public manner, assembled in considerable numbers, and suffering them to drink the same in and about the house on the Sabbath, constitutes it a disorderly house. Verdict for United States.

The defendant had not an ordinary license. Fined $100.

Case No. 16,094.

UNITED STATES v. PROUT.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 301.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1833.

FORGERY—EVIDENCE—COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING—SLAVERY—ENTICING AWAY.

1. Comparison of hands is not evidence to prove forgery. Witnesses skilled in handwriting will not be permitted to give their opinion, upon inspection of the papers, whether the forgery was done by the defendant.

2. A count under the Maryland act of 1796 (chapter 67, § 19), for giving a pass to a slave, is bad if it do not aver that the master or owner was thereby deprived of the service of his slave. But upon conviction of a free person on an indictment under the tenth section of the Maryland act of 1751 (chapter 14), for enticing a slave to run away, and who actually ran away, the offender may be fined under the nineteenth section of the Maryland act of 1796 (chapter 67), without an averment of loss of service.

The defendant [John W. Prout] was tried, upon two indictments, by the same jury. The first indictment was for forging a certificate of freedom under the seal of this court.

Upon the trial, Mr. Key, U. S. Atty., offered to show to the jury, the prisoner's signature, written in the presence of the marshal, and to allow them to compare it with the handwriting of the forged certificate, and cited 4 Starkie, Ev. 570.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) rejected the evidence.

Mr. Key then offered to submit the papers to a witness skilled in handwriting, and to give the opinion of the witness in evidence, whether the paper was forged by the prisoner.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused; and upon that indictment the jury found the prisoner not guilty.

The second indictment had two counts. The second count in that indictment was under the Maryland act of 1796 (chapter 67, § 19), for giving a pass to the slave of one Lucy Miller, without averring that she thereby was deprived of the service of her said slave.

THE COURT said that this count was insufficient, and instructed the jury that the United States could not recover judgment upon it; and the jury found the prisoner not guilty on that count.

The first count of the second indictment was upon the Maryland act of 1751 (chapter 14, § 10), by which it is enacted, "that if any free person shall entice and persuade any slave within this province, to run away, and who shall actually run away, from the master, owner, or overseer, and be convicted thereof by confession, or verdict of a jury upon an indictment or information, he shall forfeit and pay the full value of such slave, to the master or owner of such slave, to be levied by execution on the goods, chattels, lands, and tenements of the offender, and in case of inability to pay the same, shall suffer one year's imprisonment without bail or mainprise." This first count of the second indictment charged that the defendant, "being a free person, did, on," &c., "at," &c., "entice and persuade a certain slave named Joseph Dozier, the property of Lucy R. Miller, of Washington county, the said slave then and there being in the said county, to run away, which said slave did then and there actually run away from his said mistress and owner, against the form of the statute," &c.

Upon this first count of the second indictment the jury found the prisoner guilty; and his counsel, Mr. W. L. Brent, moved the court in arrest of judgment as to any fine or corporal punishment. The conviction only gives the owner a right to recover the value of the slave, by a new action founded upon the verdict.

Mr. Key, contra, contended that the court must hear evidence of the value, and then render judgment according to the statute, for the value thus ascertained by the court. 11 Petersd. 718.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Miller, being sworn to testify to the court, stated the value of the slave to be $600. The slave, however, has been recovered by the owner, and the expense of recovering, and loss of service, were much less than the value of the slave.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, after a considerable investigation of cases analogous to this, suggested the following judgment (see Act Md. 1751, c. 14, § 10): Whereupon, all and singular the premises being by the court here seen and understood; and it further appearing to the court here that the said slave in the said first count in the said indictment mentioned, is of the full value of six hundred dollars current money of the United States: It is considered that the said United States recover against the said John W. Prout the sum of six hundred dollars, and the further sum of ——— for their costs, &c., the said sum of six hundred dollars being the full value of the said slave, to be paid to the said Lucy R. Miller in the said first count in the said indictment mentioned; she, the said Lucy R. Miller, being the mistress and owner of the said slave. The said sum of six hundred dollars to be levied by execution on the goods, chattels, lands, and tenements of the said John W. Prout; and in case of his inability to pay the same, then that the said John W. Prout shall suffer one year's imprisonment from this 4th day of May, 1833, without bail or mainprise. See Co. Ent. 368, b; Rastell's Ent. 218–220, tits. "Detinue," "Judgment," 5, 6, 8–13, 16–18, "Chattel," "Detinue of Chattels"; Rastell's Ent. 211, b, "Execution in Detinue," 216, b, "Execution," 8.

THE COURT, however (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra) gave judgment for a simple fine of $50, under the act of 1796 (chapter 67, § 19).

CRANCH, Chief Judge, was of opinion that the prisoner could not be punished under that act, because there was no averment of loss of service; which averment the court, on the trial, had deemed so necessary that they had instructed the jury that the United States could not recover upon the count founded thereon.

Case No. 16,095.

UNITED STATES v. PRUSSING et al.

[2 Biss. 344;[1] 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 34; 2 Chi. Leg. News, 385.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. July Term, 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE—VIOLATION OF LAWS—MANUFACTURE OF VINEGAR.

1. A certain percentage of alcohol being produced in the manufacture of vinegar, such manufacture is within the prohibition of the 4th section of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 126].

2. Any mash, wort or wash from which alcohol might be separated by distillation is "fit for distillation," even though such distillation might not be profitable, and the alcohol is never released from its impure state, but kept down by a sour ferment.

3. The intent of the act is to require all the alcohol used in any of the manufactures of the country to be so separated that the tax can be assessed and collected thereon.

4. Congress has the power to compel all parties using alcohol to use tax-paid spirit, instead of generating it within the mass where it is to be subsequently used.

This was in indictment against the defendants, Prussing and Hitz, for having made and fermented on premises other than a distillery duly authorized by law, to-wit: in the vinegar factory of said Prussing, a molasses wash, fit for distillation and the production of spirits. By agreement of the parties the case was submitted to the court for trial without a jury.

J. O. Glover, U. S. Dist. Atty.

I. N. Arnold and Leonard Swett, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. Although in this case there is some conflict of testimony, mainly as to the ferment used in making the wort, or wash, described in the indictment, yet, in the view I take of the case, I propose to dispose of it upon the facts developed by the defendant's testimony, which are substantially these: The defendant, C. G. E. Prussing, is a vinegar manufacturer in this city, and has been so engaged for many years past. Prior to the passage of the revenue law of July 20, 1868, and after the passage of the act of congress levying excise duties upon distilled spirits, he manufactured vinegar by distilling a grain mash, such as is used by distillers for the production of spirits, but instead of using a distiller's worm by which the vapor is condensed into spirits, the vapor was conducted directly into a tub of prepared water, where it was condensed until the requisite amount of alcoholic infusion was obtained, when the wash thus prepared was passed through the generators and converted into vinegar. At the time the act of July 20, 1868, was under consideration in congress, and about the time it took effect, he, Prussing, was in Europe, and on receiving from the defendant Hitz, who was his general superintendent in the business here, a copy of the proposed law, he wrote to Hitz that the distillation must cease as soon as the law went into effect, and that from that time forward he must manufacture vinegar by fermenting a molasses wash made in the proportion of one barrel of molasses to twenty barrels of water. Hitz, on receiving this instruction, consulted with Dr. Mahla, a leading chemist of this city, who, after some examination of the law, suggested the propriety of using vinegar or sour beer as a ferment in the wash, instead of using yeast, and in accordance with this suggestion the manufacture has since been carried on by making a wash in the proportion mentioned, and producing a fermentation by the addition of the necessary quantity of sour beer, that is, about one-third of a barrel of sour beer to a twenty-barrel tub of molasses and water.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The question to be considered and determined in this case is, whether the making of such a wort or wash is a violation of the 4th section of the act of congress above referred to. The portion of said act bearing upon this question is as follows: "Distilled spirits, spirits, alcohol and alcoholic spirit, within the true intent and meaning of this act, is that substance known as ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxyde of ethyl, or spirit of wine, which is commonly produced by the fermentation of grain, starch, molasses or sugar, including all dilutions and mixtures of this substance, and a tax shall attach to this substance as soon as it is in existence as such, whether it be subsequently separated as pure or impure spirit, or be immediately, or at any subsequent time, transferred into any other substance either in the process of original production or by any subsequent process; and no mash, wort or wash fit for distillation or the production of spirits or alcohol shall be made or fermented in any building or any premises other than a distillery duly authorized according to law, and no mash, wort or wash so made and fermented shall be sold or removed from any distillery before being distilled; and no person other than an authorized distiller shall by distillation, or by any other process, separate the alcoholic spirits from any fermented mash, wort or wash; and no person shall use spirits, or alcohol, or any vapor of alcoholic spirits in manufacturing vinegar or any other article or in any process of manufacture whatever, unless the spirits or alcohol so used shall have been produced in an authorized distillery, and the tax thereon paid. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be fined for every offense not less than $500, nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned for not less than six months, nor more than two years; provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to fermented liquors." 15 Stat. 125.

On the trial, the evidence of the three leading chemists of this city, namely, Drs. Mahla, Blaney and Mariner, was taken, all of whom concurred in testifying that the fermentation of any saccharine substance generated alcohol, and that acetic acid, or vinegar, could only be produced from such substances by first converting the saccharine matter into alcohol, and that the wash in question would contain about 4½ or 5 per cent. in volume of alcohol; that on being thus produced by fermentation, the alcohol existed as such in the wash, and that the process of distillation was only a mechanical method of separating the spirits from the other substances contained in the wash, the alcohol being the product of the vinous fermentation; that the use of a sour ferment, like sour beer or vinegar, caused the alcohol thus evolved to change more rapidly into acetic acid than yeast, and Dr. Mahla testified that the only object of using the sour ferment was to make a wash which would sour or acidify so rapidly as that it would be practically unfit for distillation and the production of alcoholic spirits; that is to say it could not be profitably distilled. The vinous fermentation by which alcohol is produced is the same whether generated by yeast or either of the sour ferments mentioned, the only difference being in the rapidity of acidification after the alcohol is generated. All agree that for the purpose of distillation for the production of spirits for the market this sour ferment essentially injures the wash or wort, although alcohol can be obtained, and was obtained by two of these chemists, on analyses from the wash described in the proportion of about four and one-half and five per cent. in volume to the whole quantity. Yet the quality of the alcohol thus obtained was much deteriorated by the amount of acetic acid which had already formed by the change of a portion of the alcohol to acetic acid and all concurred in the statement that the acidification or acetic decay, as some of them termed it, took place much more rapidly by the use of the sour ferment than by the use of yeast, but that before the acetic acid could be produced the saccharine matter must first become alcohol. In other words, it is evident from the proof that the use of the sour ferment does not prevent the production of alcohol, but only causes it to change into acetic acid more rapidly after it is produced. The same quantity of alcohol is evolved by one ferment as the other.

The question then turns upon the meaning of the words "fit for distillation," as used in the law above quoted. Certainly, according to the evidence, the wort or wash thus made, contains alcohol, which might be separated by distillation. Whether it could be profitably separated or not would depend on circumstances, such as the condition of the grain and other markets, the demand for the alcohol or the purpose to which it was to be applied after being produced. The alcohol is generated and brought into existence in the mass of the wort or wash by the process of vinous fermentation. Is the question of its fitness for distillation to be determined by the fact of whether it can be profitably separated from the mass by distillation or not?

The law declares that the tax shall attach to this substance "as soon as it is in existence as such," whether it be subsequently separated "as pure or impure spirit or be immediately or at any subsequent time transferred into any other substance, either in the process of original production or by any subsequent process." It would seem, then, that the purity or impurity of the spirit produced is not the test or criterion by which the fitness of the wash for distillation is to be determined, because the tax attaches to the spirit, whether pure or impure. So, too, the tax attaches to the spirit on its production, although it may be immediately or at any subsequent time transferred or changed into any other substance, either in the process of original production or by any subsequent process. Here the alcohol is generated and brought into existence as such, and by the peculiar qualities of the ferment used is rapidly, although not instantly or immediately, changed into acetic acid. I conclude, then, that the phrase "fit for distillation" is not synonymous with the phrase "fit for profitable distillation," but that it means capable of distillation and of the production of pure or impure alcoholic spirits.

The real question is, what did congress intend by this specific prohibition of the making of such wort or wash in a place other than a distillery. The obvious intent of the law was to levy a tax for revenue purposes upon all alcohol and alcoholic spirits entering into the composition of any of the known articles of manufacture in the country, and to require that the alcohol thus produced should be produced in authorized distilleries, where it could be measured and gauged, and its manufacture properly supervised by the revenue officers. The evidence shows clearly that alcohol is necessary for the manufacture of vinegar, and though the evidence shows that the defendants do use spirits that have paid the tax in their factory, yet I can see no reason why, if they can make a wash of saccharine material strong enough to produce four per cent. of alcohol, they may not make it strong enough to produce six or even ten per cent., and thus avoid the use of any distilled spirits, and prevent the receipt of any revenue from this source. The manufacture of vinegar by the vaporization of alcohol generated in such wash or mash as has been previously used by Prussing or other manufacturers prior to the passage of the act of July 20, 1868, is prohibited by this act, and the obvious intent of this law was to require all alcohol used in any of the manufactures of the country to be so separated as that a tax could be assessed and collected thereon. For many of the purposes of manufacture where a small proportion of alcohol only is demanded, the requisite amount could undoubtedly be generated by fermentation within the mass where it was to be subsequently made available; and were persons engaged in the manufacture of such articles to be allowed to generate their alcohol by fermentation without carrying the process forward to the separation of the alcohol by distillation, a large amount of the revenue derivable from the tax on alcoholic spirits would be lost to the government. That, at least, seems to have been the view taken by congress, and it is only for the court to inquire what congress meant. It is certainly within the power of congress to prohibit the production of alcohol in any except specified ways, and to throw such checks and guards around the production of this substance as to compel all parties using it to use tax-paid spirits, instead of generating the spirit, as in this case, within the mass where it is to be subsequently used, and there allowing it to remain or be changed as the case may be. The very clause under which this indictment is found sustains the view which I have taken of the object of the whole section. Why make it a highly penal offence to make any mash, wort, or wash in a place other than a distillery, unless it was intended to prohibit the production of the alcohol which would be generated in such wort, mash, or wash? The making of the wort, mash or wash in such place could produce no injury to any one except by reducing the demand for alcohol to the extent to which it might be thus generated and used.

It is contended on the part of the defense, that the proviso to the section, "provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to fermented liquors," authorized the fermentation of this wash, as shown in the proofs. But to my mind this saving clause of the section is intended to apply only to manufacturers of ale, beer, etc., and to protect them from the penalties of this section.

I therefore conclude after careful study of the law, that it was the intent of congress to prohibit absolutely the fermentation of any compound whereby alcohol should be evolved, unless the same was done in an authorized distillery. Taking this view of the law, I am obliged to find the defendants guilty.

[At the conclusion of this opinion it was intimated by the court and the United States attorney that this was not a case that called for the infliction of the punishments prescribed by law, but that the defendants should have an opportunity to adjust the matter at Washington.] [2]

Case No. 16,096.

UNITED STATES v. PRYOR.

[3 Wash. C. C. 234.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1814.

TREASON—FURNISHING PROVISIONS TO ENEMY.

1. Indictment for treason, in adhering to the enemy; charging the defendant, inter alia, with going from the British squadron to the state of Delaware, with intention to procure provisions for the squadron.

2. The going from the British squadron to the shore, for the purpose of peaceably procuring provisions for the enemy, did not amount to an act of treason; as this conduct rested in intention, which is not punishable by our laws.

3. Aliter, if a person has carried provisions towards the enemy, with intent to supply him, though that intention should be defeated.

4. If the intention of the defendant had been to procure provisions for the enemy, by uniting with him in hostilities against the citizens of the United States, his progressing towards the shore would have been an overt act of adhering to the enemy, though no other act was committed.

---

[2] [From 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 34.]

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

This was an indictment for treason. The first four counts, charged the prisoner [William Pryor] with adhering to the enemy, giving them aid and comfort; by taking on board at Philadelphia a cargo of provisions, and carrying it to the squadron which blockaded the Delaware, in April, 1813. The other counts charged the defendant with the same species of treason, by going from a British seventy-four, whilst lying in Delaware Bay, to the shore of the state of Delaware, with intention to procure provisions for the blockading squadron. The evidence given in behalf of the prisoner, so completely exonerated him from any treasonable conduct, under the counts which charged him with having adhered to the enemy in this district, that these counts were abandoned by the prosecuting officer, in his summing up to the jury. As to the court charging him with overt acts of treason, committed in Delaware Bay, and on the Delaware shore, the evidence was as follows: The prisoner, having, on his passage from Philadelphia to New York, loaded with flour, been chased by a British vessel of war, and captured, about forty miles to the north of the capes, was conducted, with the prize, to Commodore Beresford, who then commanded the British squadron in the Delaware Bay. He was received on board as a prisoner, where he met with many of his countrymen in the same unhappy situation. It appeared, that he frequently conversed with his fellow-prisoners upon the subject of attempting their escape; but the difficulties which seemed to attend every plan he proposed, appeared to be insurmountable. At length he inquired of one of the prisoners, if he could conduct him to any part of the Delaware shore, where he could obtain a parcel of bullocks for the use of the ship; and was answered in the affirmative. He then obtained a number of men from the commodore, to accompany him on shore for the purpose of obtaining live stock; and also a flag of truce, which was taken into the vessel which was to carry them to the shore. The men who accompanied him, took their arms and ammunition along with them. When they landed on the Delaware shore, the prisoner who had attended Pryor as a guide, deserted, whilst affecting to go after a parcel of cattle, seen at a distance. The prisoner, together with a British lieutenant, went about two miles into the country, and stopped at a house, where the former endeavoured to purchase some bullocks or other live stock, and urged strongly his request, that the countryman would sell to him, by stating his unhappy situation as a prisoner, separated from his family, who resided in Massachusetts; and that by obtaining the articles which he sought to purchase, it would be in his power to ransom, not only himself, his vessel and cargo, but his fellow-prisoners, from captivity. All his efforts, however, to procure provisions by purchase, proved abortive; and no attempt was made, or hinted at, in the most remote manner, to obtain them by force or intimation. In the course of that evening, whilst supping at the farmer's house, the militia made their appearance; and the prisoner, with his companion, were seized and sent to the governor of Delaware, who ordered them to Philadelphia, where Pryor underwent an examination, and was committed for trial. It appeared fully in evidence, that when he first landed, he inquired of a countryman, (from whom also he endeavoured to purchase provisions, professing the same motives which he afterwards urged to another countryman, as above stated,) out of the hearing of the British officer, whether there was any of the militia at hand; and being answered that they certainly would assemble at a particular place called the "Landing," he requested, and strongly urged the countryman, to accompany him to that place, with which he complied. It was near the Landing that he was taken. The commanding officer of the militia who took the prisoner, observed a party of the British soldiers, who had accompanied him on the shore with a flag, and approached them with a view to learn what were their intentions. He found them with arms in their hands, and at his request they accompanied him to the place where the militia were stationed, amongst whom they distributed all the ammunition which they had brought on shore.

It was stated by one witness, the man who came on shore to guide the party to the bullocks, that the prisoner informed him, before they left the seventy-four, that the flag was to be taken on board of the boat, to be used only in case they should be overpowered by the persons they might meet on the shore; and that in fact, it was not hoisted at the mast-head, at any time on their passage to the shore, or after they came to anchor. Two other witnesses proved, that they looked from the shore at the vessel, and could not see the flag. On the part of the prisoner, it was proved, by one witness who went in the vessel to the shore, that the flag was hoisted when they set sail, and continued so during the whole time previous and subsequent to their coming to anchor. In corroboration of this, a correspondence between the governor of Delaware and Commodore Beresford, was given in evidence, in which the former inquired into the cause of the landing which had been made, and complained of the conduct of those who had done so, in coming armed, whilst they pretended that they had come under the protection of a flag. The latter answered, that they had been sent with a flag, for the purpose of purchasing provisions; and he condemned the officer who commanded the party, for taking arms with him.

Mr. Dallas contended, that though the prisoner failed in his design of obtaining provisions for the enemy, after he landed in Delaware, yet, as his intention was treason-able, his getting into the boat and proceeding to the shore, in order to carry that intent into execution, was an overt act of adhering to the enemy. But, if not so, his going in hostile array, with a design to use the protection of the flag, only in case of the party being overpowered by the Americans, the proceeding a single step in execution of such an intention, was an overt act. He insisted, that, upon the evidence, it did not appear, that the flag was at any time hoisted. As to the motives attributed to the prisoner for engaging in this unlawful enterprise, viz. the obtaining the means of ransoming himself, or of escaping, they would not, if proved, be sufficient to excuse him from the charge of treason.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). That the prisoner went from the British seventy-four to the shore, with an intention to procure provisions for the use of the enemy, is incontestibly proved, and, indeed, is not denied by his counsel. If this constituted the crime of treason, the motives which induced him to attempt the commission of it, and by which there are the strongest reasons to believe he was most sincerely actuated, would certainly palliate the enormity of it. But the law does not constitute such an act treason, even although these motives had not existed; and, although intentions and feelings as disloyal as ever stained the character of the most atrocious traitor, were proved against the prisoner. Can it be seriously urged, that if a man, contemplating an adherence to the enemy, by supplying them with provisions, should walk towards the market-house to purchase, or into his own fields to slaughter whatever he might find there, but should, in fact, do neither one or the other of the intended acts, he has committed an overt act of adhering to the enemy? Certainly not. All rests in intention merely, which our law of treason in no instance professes to punish. Carrying provisions towards the enemy, with intent to supply them, though this intention should be defeated on the way, would be very different from the act of going in search of provisions for such a purpose, and stopping short before any thing was effected, and whilst all rested in intention. In such a case, the motives which induced the prisoner to use his exertions to procure provisions, would take from his conduct every possible imputation of disloyalty and disaffection to his country. The intention to procure the means of effecting the liberation of himself and his fellow-prisoners, had it even been carried into execution, would have been an honest and generous one; even although the law should not have excused the act. If the object of the prisoner was to break his parole, after he had got to land, and to escape; it is one which would not meet our approbation. We can never be the apologist of disingenuous conduct, let who will practise it; and we are firmly of opinion, that nations, as well as individuals, will always find their best interests to be promoted by fidelity to their engagements, and by manifesting a disposition, too proud to descend to artifices to deceive even an enemy. But, although, as moralists, we cannot approve of an intention in the prisoner to violate the promise he had plighted to the enemy, yet, as judges, we must pronounce, that by doing so, he would have offended against no law of his country. But, if the intention of the prisoner was to procure provisions for the enemy, by uniting with him in acts of hostility against the United States or its citizens, which is chiefly pressed against him by the district attorney; then, indeed, it must be admitted, that his progressing towards the shore, was an overt act of adhering to the enemy, although no act of hostility was in fact committed.

But how stands the evidence as to this fact. The only witness who proves any thing in relation to such an intention, is the black man who was applied to by the prisoner, to conduct him to some place where bullocks might be procured; and he states, that the prisoner told him that the flag was only to be used, in case it should be necessary to shield the party against superior numbers. Now, this is so highly improbable, that it is fair to conclude, that the witness must have misunderstood what the prisoner said to him. The prisoner could not have been ignorant of what every person must know, that no officer, in any army, would dare to violate a flag of truce, by attempting, under any circumstances, to use it as a cover for acts of hostility. No officer would expose himself to the punishment which the laws of war would compel his superiors to inflict upon him, and which it would be their interest not to disregard, if they meant, on any future occasion, to claim the immunities annexed to a flag of truce.

But it is denied, that this vessel, during her passage to the shore, or during her stay near to it, hoisted the flag, or appeared to seek its protection. The evidence of the same black man to this effect, is flatly contradicted by the pilot, who was on board during the whole time; and who declares, that it was flying at the mast-head during her passage to, at, and from the shore; and that many American vessels, which passed her, and who might otherwise have been seized as good prize, were suffered to proceed without inquiry or molestation. In short, during the whole time that this party was absent from the ship of war, all was peace with them. But what seems almost to conclude this point, is the official declaration of Commodore Beresford to the governor of Delaware, that this vessel went to the shore under the protection of a flag, with a view to purchase provisions. Now, this evidence is not to be discredited by saying that it proceeded from an enemy; because, all civilized nations are bound to give credit to the official declarations of the commander of the enemies' forces. There is no American, who would not feel a just indignation, if a British officer should venture to question the veracity of an American commanding officer, in relation to a fact which he stated officially as being within his own knowledge. There is no doubt, that accompanying the flag by armed men, was an irregularity; and Commodore Beresford very properly censures the officer who commanded the party, for carrying arms. Nevertheless, no act of hostility was attempted, nor is there the slightest reason to believe, that any was meditated by the prisoner, or by any of the party.

Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court, gentlemen, that the undertaking of the defendant to procure provisions from the shore, for the use of the enemy, and his proceeding to the shore with this intent, as laid in the eighth and ninth counts in the indictment, did not amount to overt acts of treason.

The jury, without leaving the bar, found a verdict of not guilty.

NOTE. It being the wish of the counsel for the prisoner, to try fairly all the charges which could be brought against him, to prevent his being sent to Delaware to be tried again, for the treasons alleged to have been committed in that state, no observations were made in the charge, upon the form of the eighth and ninth counts in this indictment; but the case was considered in the same manner, as if they had charged the prisoner with an intention to procure provisions by force, leaving the prisoner to move in arrest of judgment, if a verdict had been found against him.

Case No. 16,097.

UNITED STATES v. PUMPHREYS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 74.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1802.

CRIMINAL LAW—EXTORTED CONFESSION.

Extorted confession is not evidence against the prisoner.

Indictment for stealing.

THE COURT instructed the jury that no confession, extorted from the prisoner, by threats of punishment, or obtained by the promise of reward or favor, was evidence against him. 4 Bl. Comm. 357.

Case No. 16,098.

UNITED STATES v. PUSEY.

[6 N. B. R. 284.] [2]

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. March 5, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT DISPOSITION OF GOODS—INDICTMENT.

That clause of section 44 of the United States bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 539] which punishes by imprisonment any fraudulent disposition of the goods of a debtor obtained on credit and remaining unpaid for, within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, is constitutional and valid. Motion in arrest of judgment on this ground denied, and defendant sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

[Cited in Re Reiman, Case No. 11,673; Re Jackson, Id. 7,124.

The defendant was tried and convicted on an information under that clause of section 44 of the bankrupt act of 1867 which provides "that from and after the passage of this act if any debtor or bankrupt * * * shall, with intent to defraud his creditors, within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, pawn, pledge, or dispose of, otherwise than by bona fide transactions in the ordinary way of his trade, any of his goods and chattels which have been obtained on credit and remain unpaid for, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court in the United States, shall be punished by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a term not exceeding three years." The ground of the motion in arrest is that the above clause of section 44 is unconstitutional and void. There was another ground of motion stated, but it was not insisted on upon the argument. The argument in support of the motion is: first, that the clause in question assumes to punish an offense committed before commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and is therefore not a law necessary and proper for carrying into execution the power of congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy; and, second, that it is an ex post facto law.

Mr. Brown (Newberry, Pond & Brown), for the motion.

Mr. Swan, Asst. U. S. Atty., opposed.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. Among the powers of congress enumerated in the constitution (article 1, § 8), are, "to establish * * * uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," and, "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." Under the first power named congress established the bankrupt law of 1867. If, therefore, the clause of section 44 in question, is a law "necessary and proper" for carrying the bankrupt law into effect, it comes within the latter power named, and is constitutional and valid; otherwise it is not, because then it is a mere police regulation relating exclusively to the internal trade of the states, and does not come within the power of congress. U. S. v. De Witt, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 41.

Under the first proposition of the argument in support of the motion, it is important to bear in mind the distinction between the subject matter, bankruptcy, in regard to which congress is empowered to legislate, and the means, machinery or practice congress has prescribed for carrying that power into effect. It is with the former, the subject matter, we have to deal here, and not with the latter, any further than it may come in question incidentally. What then is "the subject of bankruptcy?" What does it include? What realm do laws upon that subject occupy? And what are necessary and proper laws for carrying such laws into effect? The Federalist (No. 32) alludes to the constitutional power of congress to establish uniform laws of bankruptcy as a power intimately connected with the regulation of commerce, and for the prevention of frauds. 2 Story, Const. § 1105. It is intimately connected with the regulation of commerce because it has for its subject the relation of debtor and creditor—a relation growing out of commercial transactions, and often, and it may be said to a very large extent, between citizens of different states, and, in fact, between citizens of the United States and those of foreign countries. That it is a power for the prevention of frauds on creditors has always been assumed whenever it has been exercised, and I believe has never been questioned. (See the former acts of 1800 and 1841, as well as the present act of 1867.) To this end these laws are made to reach back of the commencement of proceedings to defeat frauds, and, in fact, to constitute acts frauds, which by the laws of the states, and but for the bankrupt law itself, were entirely valid. Story on the Constitution (section 1106) says: "It may be stated that the general object of all bankrupt and insolvent laws is, on the one hand, to secure to creditors an appropriation of the property of their debtors pro tanto to the discharge of their debts, whenever the latter are unable to discharge the whole amount; and on the other hand, to relieve the unfortunate and honest debtors from perpetual bondage to their creditors, either in the shape of unlimited imprisonment to coerce payment of their debts, or of an absolute right to appropriate and monopolise all their future earnings." A very compact and pointed description, or definition of a bankrupt law occurs in the debates on a bankrupt bill in the house of representatives in eighteen hundred and eighteen. It was there said: "Perhaps as satisfactory description of a bankrupt law as can be framed is, that it is a law for the benefit and relief of creditors and their debtors, in cases in which the latter are unable or unwilling to pay their debts. And a law on the subject of bankruptcies in the sense of the constitution, is a law making provision for cases of persons failing to pay their debts." 4 Elliot, Deb. 282. The "subject of bankruptcy," in a general sense, concerns the relation of debtor and creditor, and in a particular and no doubt stricter sense, concerns such relation in cases where the debtor is unwilling or unable to pay his debts. Laws upon that subject have for their object the appropriation, either voluntarily or by compulsion, of the debtor's property to the payment of his debts, pro tanto, or in full, as the case may be, and the relief of honest debtors. To accomplish this object these laws are made to operate upon, affect and control the relations of the parties, so as to limit and circumscribe the rights of the debtor in, and his control over, his property, and the rights of others dealing with him, in regard thereto, in many particulars, before any proceedings in bankruptcy shall have been commenced by or against such debtor. Of this nature are the provisions of sections thirty-five and thirty-nine, invalidating preferences under certain circumstances when made within four months, and certain payments, sales, transfers, etc., when made within six months before commencement of proceedings; and all assignments, gifts, sales, conveyances or transfers, with intent to delay, defraud or hinder creditors, made at any time after the passage of the act. There are other provisions of the same nature, but the above are sufficient for illustration. The power of congress to enact the provisions giving the act the operation and effect just mentioned (and I am not aware that their right to exercise that power has ever been questioned), is derived solely from their general powers under article 1, § 8, of the constitution, to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect their power to establish laws on the subject of bankruptcy. It is to this same general provision of the constitution that we must look for the power of congress to make the law in question. It must be found there or it does not exist at all.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reprinted by permission.]

One object to be attained by the enactment of a bankrupt law, as we have seen, is the appropriation of the debtor's property to the payment of his debts. And this may be said to be the principal or primary object of all such laws. The relief of the debtor, although an important consideration, is really but incidental to the other. Story, Const. § 1106. Is the provision in question a law "necessary and proper," within the meaning of those words as used in the constitution, for carrying into effect the bankrupt law, and the object and purpose of its enactment? The meaning of the words "necessary and proper" has been judicially determined by the supreme court on full discussion and deliberation to be "needful," "requisite," "essential," "conducive to." McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 418. See, also, Story, Const. §§ 1248–1255, citing the above and other authorities, where the subject is very fully considered and the same construction maintained. In McCulloch v.

Maryland [supra], Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional." Here, as we have seen, the end sought is the appropriation of the debtor's property to the payment of his debts. The clause in question is for the prevention of frauds by debtors on their creditors, by which that end may be defeated or impaired. It certainly does not need argument to show that the provision is a means clearly conducive, and plainly adapted, to the end sought.

But it is claimed in argument, first—that the provision in question purports to punish an offense committed before commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and that, therefore, it can have no connection with the bankrupt act; and, second—that such offense (as is charged in the information in this case) is one committed by a debtor merely, one who may or may not become a bankrupt, and that, therefore, it has no connection with the act; and that for both reasons the offense concerns the internal trade of the states alone, and is not within the power of congress to be created or punished.

I think the ground occupied by the first objection is much too narrow. The proceedings in bankruptcy do not constitute the end to be accomplished by a bankrupt act. They constitute the machinery, so to speak, by which that end is to be obtained, viz.: the appropriation of the debtor's property to the payment of his debts. Therefore the prevention of the fraud denounced by the provision, being, as we have seen, conducive to that end, it can make no difference whether it relates to a fraud committed before or after the machinery provided for the accomplishment of the end is set in motion.

The second ground is more difficult of solution. The person who may commit the offense is described in the act as "any debtor or bankrupt," and in the case under consideration the defendant is described in the information as a debtor merely. In the English bankrupt acts, from which the provision in question was no doubt taken, the word "bankrupt" only is used, the word "debtor" having been added in our act. In order to be a bankrupt a person must first be a debtor. But a bankrupt, in the sense of the English act, as well as of our own, is a debtor, and something more. He is a debtor who has committed an act of bankruptcy, declared to be such by the bankrupt law. Rex v. Jones, 4 Barn. & Adol. 345; 24 E. C. L. 156; Reg. v. Lands, 33 Eng. Law & Eq. 536; Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 167; In re Black [Case No. 1,457]; In re Craft [Id. 3,317]. A "debtor" may or may not be a bankrupt. But, from the fact that both words, "debtor" and "bankrupt," are used, and in the disjunctive, it must be held that the former is used in the provision in question, as descriptive of a person who is a debtor, but who has not, at the time of committing the offense, become a bankrupt. And it is on this account, principally, that the difficulty arises. This difficulty, however, is only apparent, as we shall presently see. It grows less when we consider what, as we have already seen, is included by the expression "subject of bankruptcies," as used in the constitution—that in a general sense it concerns the relation of debtor and creditor, a relation existing largely between citizens of different states, and so, nearly related to, in fact constituting a branch of those great commercial relations over which the power of congress is also extended. True, the expression has a limited signification, that is, that it concerns the relation of debtor and creditor in cases where the debtor is unable or unwilling to pay his debts, yet it none the less concerns the relation of debtor and creditor, the limitation being in the instance only, and not in degree. And when we also consider that the leading object of a bankrupt law is the appropriation of the debtor's property to the payment of his debts, and to that end the prevention of frauds, reaching back of the commencement of proceedings, as the present law does (sections 35 and 39), and as the previous laws of 1800 and 1841 did, and invalidating and annulling contracts and transactions on that ground (some of which, but for the bankrupt law, were valid when made), within certain specified periods of time, and, in some instances, at any time after the passage of the act; and this, so far as I know or can ascertain, without question, or even a doubt suggested as to the constitutional power of congress so to enact. And the difficulty grows still less, in fact vanishes, when the foregoing considerations are taken in connection with the fact that the ascertainment whether the act described constitutes a crime is made to depend upon the debtor's committing some act of bankruptcy, on account of which he shall be declared a bankrupt, within so short a time after doing the act specified as to afford a reasonable presumption that he contemplated bankruptcy (or committing an act of bankruptcy, which is the same thing, as we have seen), when he did the act specified. The time specified in the provision is "within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy." Commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy is the filing of a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy by or against a debtor, upon which such debtor shall be adjudicated a bankrupt. Section 38; In re Patterson [Case No. 10,815]. If the petition is filed by the debtor, then that is the act of bankruptcy whereby he acquires the legal status of bankrupt. Section 11. If the petition is filed against the debtor, then the act or acts by which he acquired that status, and on account of which he is adjudged a bankrupt, must have been committed before the filing of the petition. So that in either case the debtor must have committed an act of bankruptcy within three months after the act specified in order to bring the case within the law.

Suppose congress had, in lieu of the present form of expression, provided that in order to constitute the specified act as an offense, it should be committed by a debtor contemplating, or in contemplation of bankruptcy; then I apprehend there could be no question of the constitutionality of the provision. But is not that the force and effect of the provision as it now stands? If congress had enacted as above supposed, it would have been left to courts and juries to determine what would constitute proof of contemplation of bankruptcy. Like all other questions of the intent or animus of the acts and conduct of persons, it would very rarely admit of direct proof, but in most cases would necessarily depend upon circumstantial evidence. There are provisions of the act by which the fraudulent character of transactions is expressly made to depend upon their having been had "in contemplation of bankruptcy." In such cases it has always been held that the fact that the transaction was had by a debtor at a comparatively recent period of time before becoming bankrupt, is presumptive evidence of the transaction having been had in contemplation of bankruptcy—stronger or weaker, as the time was more or less remote. But this leaves the matter to depend largely upon the uncertain and varying opinions of different judges and juries, and perhaps the fluctuating opinions of the same judges—an element which ought not to exist in penal enactments. Congress has, therefore, seen fit in the enactment in question, to withhold this question from courts and juries, and by express enactment to establish a rule as to the time, which shall be at once uniform and conclusive.

It was said in argument, that from the reading of the provision in question, it is not the doing of the act specified that constitutes the offense, but the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, by or against the offender. From the views already advanced the answer to this obejction is obvious. If the debtor commits the act specified, and at any time within three months thereafter, commits an act, on account of which he is liable to be declared by the court to be a bankrupt, he is, as we have seen, conclusively presumed to have committed the act in contemplation of committing an act of bankruptcy, and the offense is complete, upon committing the former act, whether proceedings for adjudication of bankruptcy are commenced within three months or not, except in the single instance where the act of bankruptcy is the commencement of such proceedings by the debtor. But the offense cannot be prosecuted unless such proceedings are commenced within three months. In this respect it is a limitation merely.

It was also objected in argument that the limitation to three months is purely arbitrary, that it might just as well be three years, or thirty years. That would simply be an abuse of power, which we have no right to presume any congress would be guilty of. Story on the Constitution (section 1252), citing the Federalist, Nos. 33, 34, says: "There is always some chance of error, or abuse of every power; but this furnishes no ground of objection against the power. * * * The remedy for any abuse or misconstruction of the power, is the same as in similar abuses and misconstructions of the state governments. It is by an appeal to the other departments of the government; and finally to the people, in the exercise of their elective franchises." And finally, the same objection might be made to sections 35 and 39, and to all limitation laws, which no one would think of making at this day.

From what has been said and written by early commentators, and by high authority, in regard to the power of congress over bankruptcies as well as from the nature of the subject itself, there is some ground for assuming that it extends to the regulation of all the relations of debtor and creditor, for the prevention of frauds, and otherwise, to the end of placing all creditors of the same debtor, not expressly preferred, upon one broad basis of equality, and of securing the honest appropriation of a debtor's property, not expressly exempted, to the payment of his debts, either with or without the commission of an act of bankruptcy, or whether bankruptcy was or was not in contemplation. But in this case it is unnecessary to go to that extent, and I therefore leave the point undecided.

Upon all considerations, I hold that the first ground of argument against the unconstitutionality of the law is untenable.

The second ground of the objection is, that the provision in question is an ex post facto law, and therefore unconstitutional, in this, that it purports to punish an act as an offense which was not such at the time it was committed. As we have already seen, the act which this provision purports to punish is an offense, when it is an offense at all, the moment it is committed. It is made necessary, it is true, to resort to the subsequent acts of the perpetrator, to ascertain the criminal character of such former act; but when thus ascertained, it relates back to the committing of it. Such subsequent acts do not invest such former act with any element it did not possess when it was committed, but simply ascertain what its elements were from the beginning. An ex post facto law, however, is, in common acceptation, a law enacted after the fact. Here the law was in existence at the time the act complained of was committed. The objection, therefore, is not germane.

The second ground of objection is, therefore, also untenable.

While the powers of the general government are all derived from the constitution, the powers of each branch, the legislative, the executive and the judicial, are entirely separate and distinct from each other. And while the judicial branch, under its powers to expound the law, possesses the power to annul legislative acts on the ground of unconstitutionality, it will never exercise that power except in cases entirely free from all reasonable doubt. So that if I even entertained doubts in this case, which I do not, I should still be obliged to hold the law valid.

The law in question is one that strongly commends itself to favor. A proper and enlightened enforcement of it, must tend largely to strengthen credit and inspire confidence in commercial transactions—consummations highly worthy of the fostering care of the government, especially in a country like ours, where credit enters so largely in the business transactions between merchants and traders. The creditor, when he parts with his property, necessarily relies largely upon the honesty and good faith of his debtor—that the latter will do nothing intentionally which shall impair his ability to pay at maturity, or failing to do so, that shall interfere with the honest appropriation of his property to the payment of his debts. It is both a moral and a legal right of the creditor so to rely, and it is both a moral and a legal obligation and duty of the debtor to observe that right, and nothing in my opinion will conduce more to its observance than a rigid enforcement of the law in question. Let it come to be understood that it is a crime for a debtor wilfully and intentionally to violate the faith and betray the confidence placed in him, constituting as they do, in most cases, the very foundation of his credit, a crime for which severe and certain punishment will be inflicted, and I firmly believe that we shall have less of fraud, and fraudulent practices—that corrupt and debilitating disease with which the body commercial has always been afflicted.

This case was transmitted from the district to the circuit court, on account of the novelty and importance of the questions here involved, in the hope that a hearing of this motion might be had before a full bench. But on account of the extensive and laborious duties of the circuit judge on his too large circuit, the end sought was found to be impracticable without considerable delay. I have, therefore, by the consent and acquiescence of all parties concerned, heard the motion without his valuable aid. I have, however, availed myself of opportunities to consult with him, and have laid the views expressed in the foregoing opinion before him, and I am authorised by him to say that he fully concurs in the result at which I have arrived.

The motion in arrest of judgment must be denied, and judgment must pass upon the verdict.

The defendant was sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

UNITED STATES (PUTNAM v.). See Case No. 11,484.

UNITED STATES (PYE v.). See Case No. 11,488.

Case No. 16,099.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[4 Ben. 349.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE—PERSONATION OF BONDSMAN — ESTOPPEL — AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY—COMPROMISE.

1. A surety, who had signed a stipulation for the release of property seized at the suit of the United States, and against whom judgment had afterwards been entered up, and an execution issued, applied to open the judgment, and set aside the execution, on two grounds: (1) That he signed the bond on the representation that it should also be signed by one S., and that it was not signed by S., but by one B., who falsely personated S. (2) That, after his property had been seized under the execution, it was agreed between him and the United States district attorney, that, if he would give certain information against two other parties, his property should be released; and that he gave the information, and the parties were indicted, and thereupon his property was released, but had now been seized again on an alias execution: Held, that it appeared, on the facts, that the surety was not only aware of the personation of S. by B., but himself procured such personation, and that therefore, B. was, to all intents and purposes, S., as against the surety and his liability on his bond.

2. His alleged agreement with the district attorney was not established, but, if it was, it would not avail him as a legal ground for the interposition of the court. The agreement set up being a compromise of a case arising under the internal revenue laws, would not be valid without the concurrence of the commissioner of internal revenue, the secretary of the treasury and the attorney general.

[This was an information against a quantity of distilled spirits, etc., found at Fifty-Fifth street, between Tenth and Eleventh, avenues.]

Robert N. Waite, for the motion.

T. Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a motion by Henry Stubbin, one of the sureties or stipulators for value on the bond or stipulation given on the release of certain of the property seized in this suit, to open the judgment entered against him herein, and to set aside the execution issued therein, as against said Stubbin. The grounds set forth in the moving affidavit, made by Stubbin, for granting the relief sought, are: (1) That he executed the bond at the solicitation of one of the real owners of the property seized, and on his representation and assurance that the other surety named in the bond should be a well known and wealthy man named Michael Shafer, that he, Stubbin, and a man who called himself Michael Shafer, and to whom Stubbin was introduced, and with whom he then went to the place where the bond was executed, executed the bond, that he, Stubbin, subsequently ascertained that the man who called himself Michael Shafer was not of that name, but that his real name was Morris Brockman, and that he had falsely personated Michael Shafer, and executed the bond with him, Stubbin, by a false and forged name. (2) That, after his property had been seized, under the said execution, he called with his counsel at the office of the United States district attorney, and made a representation of the foregoing facts, and, after two or three interviews with three of the assistant district attorneys, and one interview with the district attorney, it was agreed, that, if he would give all the information he possessed, and render what aid he could to the government, in a prosecution, at that time intended to be instituted against two persons for conspiracy to defraud the government, the execution against his property should be withdrawn, and he should never be disturbed in his quiet and peaceable enjoyment of the same; that, thereafter, criminal proceedings were commenced against such two persons, and he, Stubbin, was used as a witness against them, and did everything required of him by the government, and an indictment, on his evidence, and other testimony, was found against such persons, and was still pending against them; that, immediately after such agreement was made, the execution against him was withdrawn, and the keeper in charge of his property was removed, and he supposed that the proceedings against him were ended and determined; but that an alias execution had been issued, under which a deputy marshal had again seized his property, and the keeper had been placed in charge of it, and the district attorney had expressed his determination to sell the property.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Voluminous testimony has been taken, under an order of reference, in respect to the matters set up, as grounds for granting the motion. The result of a careful examination of such testimony leads to the undoubting conclusion, that, in respect to both of such grounds, the matters of fact alleged by Stubbin are not proved. On the contrary, the evidence shows satisfactorily, that Stubbin knew, when he signed the bond, and when the man who called himself Michael Shafer signed the bond, that such man was not Michael Shafer, but was really Morris Brockman, and permitted, and indeed himself procured, such man to represent himself to the officers of the government as Michael Shafer, and to execute the bond as Michael Shafer. This being so, such man was, to all intents and purposes, Michael Shafer, as against Stubbin and Stubbin's liability on the bond.

As to the agreement with the officers in the district attorney's office, the extent of it is evidenced by the written instructions given at the time by the district attorney to the marshal, which were only to the effect, that the marshal was to withdraw his keeper from the premises of Stubbin, and order such keeper to visit such premises occasionally, to see that all was right.

But, even if such agreement as set up were proved, it would not avail Stubbin, as a legal ground for the interposition of the court, The agreement set up is substantially a compromise of the claim against Stubbin. The enforcement of the claim was to be perpetually stopped in consideration of something to be done by Stubbin, other than paying the claim. The case being one arising under the internal revenue laws, and the suit having been commenced, no compromise of the case could be made without the concurrence of the commissioner of internal revenue, the secretary of the treasury and the attorney general. Act July 20, 1868, § 102 (15 Stat. 166); 12 Op. Attys. Gen. U. S. 536, 552.

The motion is denied, and the stay of proceedings must be vacated.

Case No. 16,100.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[6 Int. Rev. Rec. 188.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 1867.

FORFEITURE OF SPIRITS IN BOND.

[Spirits in bond may be forfeited for non-compliance with the provisions of the internal revenue laws.]

In the case of the United States against a quantity of distilled spirits and other property found at No. 194 East Twenty-Fifth street, an action to forfeit the property for non-compliance with the provisions of the internal revenue law in relation to distilled spirits, tried in the United States district court, before BLATCHFORD, District Judge, and a jury, the jury, after a short absence, found a verdict for the government condemning the property. The question of the validity of the recent regulation adopted by Commissioner Rollins, that spirits in bond should not be forfeited, was brought up in the case. A portion of this property being in bond, the claimant's counsel requested the judge to charge the jury that since the making of that regulation, spirits in bond could not be forfeited. THE COURT, however, declined so to charge, holding that the question of forfeiture must be determined by the law, and that under the law spirits in bond could be forfeited

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF DISTILLED SPIRITS. See Cases Nos. 11,493-11,495.

Case No. 16,101.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF DISTILLED SPIRITS AT NO. 133 MOTT ST.

[See Case No. 11,495.]

Case No. 16,102.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF MANUFACTURED TOBACCO.

[10 Ben. 9.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1878.

BONDS—SURETY—NOTICE OF DECREE — APPROVAL OF SECURITY ON APPEAL.

In an action against property for violation of the internal revenue laws, L. appeared as claimant of the property seized and gave a stipulation with O. as surety in which L. was named as proctor of the claimant. The decree in the district court being in favor of the United States, L. took the case by writ of error to the circuit court, and gave his own personal bond on the writ of error, which was approved by the judge in the usual form. The decree was affirmed by the circuit court and a writ of error was taken to the supreme court, on which L. again gave his personal bond without surety by consent of the district attorney; and this bond was also approved by the judge in the usual form. The supreme court affirmed that decree and a final decree was entered, and an order was made that notice be given to the sureties on the first stipulation to perform their stipulation or show cause why execution should not issue against them. Other proctors had during the progress of the cause been substituted for S. and this notice was served on such other proctors, who had agreed to notify O. of the entry of any decree. They failed to do so, however, and O. had in fact no notice, and an order was made by default that execution issue and it was issued accordingly. O. thereupon applied to open the default and to be allowed to come in and show cause and that the execution be set aside, claiming that the taking of the bonds on the appeals without surety and with the approval of the district attorney had discharged him, and that L. had given to the plaintiff $75,000 in government bonds as further security, which bonds it was alleged had been stolen: Held, that the default against the surety might be opened if he had shown any meritorious defence, but that the facts put forward by him furnished no defence against his liability on the stipulation.

D. McMahon, for petitioner.

Mr. Hill, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

CHOATE, District Judge. This was an information for violation of the internal revenue laws. The claimant, C. N. Lilienthal, gave a stipulation for value with one Olwell as one of his securities in the sum of $104,000. The stipulation was in the usual form and named Stephen D. Stephens, Jr., as proctor for the claimants, to whom notice of the order or decree of this court or the appellate court was to be given. The decree in this court being for the plaintiff, the claimant took the case by writ of error to the circuit court and gave his own personal bond on the writ of error, which was approved by the judge in the usual form, he being then responsible for the amount. The decree in the circuit court was for the plaintiff and the claimant took the case on writ of error to the supreme court and gave his own personal bond on the writ of error without surety. [Case unreported.] On this bond the district attorney made the following endorsement: "I agree to accept the foregoing bond of the claimant without sureties as a sufficient bond to secure costs in the supreme court on a writ of error to the circuit court in this action and as establishing the present sufficiency of the claimant and his responsibility for the amount of the value of the property condemned secured by bond in the district court, but not to affect the obligation of such bond on the claimant and sureties thereon." And the attorneys for the claimant wrote under this endorsement: "The foregoing bond is understood by the obligor to be given on the terms and with the effect mentioned in the foregoing acceptance of the United States attorney." This bond was also approved by the judge in the usual form.

The supreme court affirmed the decree below and a final decree was entered and an order was made that notice be given to the stipulators in the stipulation given in this court to perform their stipulation or to show cause why execution should not issue against them. The notice was given, not to Stephens, who is named as proctor for the claimants in the stipulation, but to other proctors who had been substituted for him as proctors for the claimants and had carried on the defence of the subsequent proceedings.

It appears by the affidavit of Olwell that he had made an arrangement with these substituted proctors to be notified by them whenever they received notice of the entry of the decree, but they failed to give him notice and he had no notice in fact, and the substituted attorneys of the claimant did not attend upon the return of the order to show cause.

Olwell, one of the sureties in the stipulation, now moves to open the default and to be allowed to come in and show cause why execution should not issue against him, and he also moves that the execution be set aside. If the surety showed any meritorious grounds on which if the default were opened he could be relieved, it would be proper to grant the motion to open the default, as it appears that he had no notice in fact. There was no irregularity in serving the notice on the substituted proctors for claimants. They were the proper persons to receive the notice. The surety so understood it himself, as is shown by the arrangement made with them for notice from them to him.

The only grounds on which upon the merits the surety claims to be relieved are:

[1][Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

that the plaintiff by taking the bonds of the claimant without sureties on the appeals discharged the sureties in the stipulation; secondly, that the qualified consent or acceptance endorsed by the district attorney on the bond given on error to the circuit court discharged the sureties in the stipulation; and thirdly, that the giving by the claimant to the plaintiff of $75,000 in government bonds as further security after the execution of the stipulation, which further security it is alleged was exacted by the plaintiffs as a condition to their giving their consent to the claimant's continuing his business, discharged the sureties in the stipulation.

As to the first and second grounds it is clear that the bonds taken complied with the statute, which provides that "every justice or judge signing a citation or any writ of error, shall, except, etc., take good and sufficient security." Rev. St. § 1000. The question of the sufficiency of the security must be determined by the judge. Brockett v. Brockett, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 258. There is no statute requiring one or more sureties if the bond offered is approved as sufficient. And if the bond is approved as sufficient it is immaterial that the district attorney may have assented to it, or may have given a qualified or restricted assent.

The position taken by Olwell is that by taking bonds without sureties and bonds thus assented to by the district attorney without his (Olwell's) assent, the terms of the undertaking in which he was bound as surety were altered, or at least that there was an implied covenant on the part of the United States with him that they would not take any proceedings with the principal which would increase the risks of the sureties or affect their remedy against the principal; that when Olwell entered into the stipulation for value it contemplated that he must pay when the district court rendered judgment of condemnation, or when the appellate court so ordered, if any appeal intervened;—that the appeal contemplated was the usual appeal with the usual security to stay the judgment, if there should be a stay, as provided for under existing laws; that it contemplated the giving of bonds on appeal with sufficient sureties, whose obligations would enure to the benefit of the sureties in the stipulation given below as between them and the principal.

If the petitioner were entirely correct in his view of the rights of the surety as to the implied covenant that the bond on appeal should be a proper bond according to existing law, it is entirely clear that the appeal was in the usual form and the security taken on appeal was such as existing laws provided for. It is not necessary therefore to consider whether the mere neglect of the government to enforce the decree below pending the appeals would have discharged the surety if it had appeared that one of the bonds given on appeal had been defective and such as would not operate as a supersedeas.

As to the alleged deposit of bonds, if it was made and the bonds were afterwards stolen, as the affidavits tend to show, it is not perceived that the deposit or the loss of the bonds can have had any effect upon the obligation of the sureties in this stipulation.

Motion denied.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF MANUFACTURED TOBACCO. See Cases Nos. 11,499, 16,104, and 16,106a.

Case No. 16,103.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF RAGS.

[77 Int. Rev. Rec. 123; 7 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 369.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April, 1868.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—ILLICIT DISTILLERY.

[Personal property found in buildings which are in the same enclosure with a building in which an illicit distillery is carried on, and in such juxtaposition to it that the owners thereof could not be ignorant of the existence of the still, is subject to forfeiture under section 48 of the internal revenue law.]

This was an action under the 48th section of the internal revenue law [13 Stat. 240], to forfeit certain personal property, upon the following state of facts: One Young owned a brick house situated upon the part of a city lot; against the rear wall of which a stable had been formerly erected. The adjoining lot was also owned by Young, and had been covered with a wooden building having wide doors at each end constructed and used for a livery stable. The rear of both lots was enclosed together by a single fence across the two, thus forming one enclosure, from which the only access to the street for vehicles was through the livery stable; a small gate opened from the yard in the rear of the lots, and a swinging door had been constructed opening from the rear stable building to the brick house in front; another door opened from the side of the brick house into the livery stable. Young occupied the front brick building as a junk-shop, and leased the livery stable to one Sherman for a livery stable, and since that he leased the rear stable to other parties. It appeared that the rear doors of the livery stable were, on Thursday prior to the seizure, found fastened by a spring lock capable of being opened without a key; the snow in the rear then gave evidence of the passing of persons from the livery stable to the rear stable, and in the rear stable was an illicit still with mash in fermentation; on Friday the still was in operation; on Saturday night the officers made a descent upon the place. The lock upon the rear door of the stable was found to have been changed. The distillery was then in full operation under the care of two men both of whom fled through the swinging door into the junk shop, and thence to the street, where one was arrested. No claim was interposed for the distillery property, but Young claimed the personal property seized in the junk-shop, and Sherman the horses, &c., seized in the livery stable. Both claimants denied any knowledge of the existence of a still in the rear stable. There was evidence that the smell of distillation in the rear building would necessarily be detected throughout the whole place. There was no evidence that either of them was interested in the still.

BENEDICT, District Judge, held, that under section 48 of the internal revenue law, the juxtaposition of the property proceeded against in the same place, or within the same enclosure with the illicit still, was sufficient to forfeit it; provided the owners of the property knew of the existence of the illicit still in the rear stable, and that under the evidence in the case the jury would not be warranted in finding that the existence of the illicit still was unknown to the owner of the place and the keeper of the livery stable. A verdict was accordingly directed in favor of the government.

Case No. 16,104.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF TOBACCO.

[Affirming Case No. 16,105. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 16,105.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF TOBACCO.

[5 Ben. 112; 3 Int. Rev. Rec. 158.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1871.[2]

INTERNAL REVENUE—EVIDENCE—FRAUDULENT INTENT—SALES—MANUFACTURED GOODS.

1. A fraudulent intent in respect to a particular importation of goods may be legitimately inferred by a jury from a previous fraudulent intent and previous fraudulent acts, shown in respect to previous importations.

2. The same kind of evidence is legitimate in prosecutions for the forfeiture of property under the internal revenue acts.

3. The internal revenue act of March 3d, 1865 [13 Stat. 468], which went into effect on the 1st of April, 1865, imposed a tax of thirty-five cents a pound upon certain tobacco, upon which the previous act had imposed a tax of twenty-five cents a pound. On the 31st of March, 1865, L., a tobacco dealer in New York, entered upon his sales-book a sale of about $60,000 worth of such tobacco to K. & W., who gave him their check for the amount. Two or three days afterwards he gave to K. & W. his check for the same amount. The tobacco never passed into the possession of K. & W., but L. kept it on his own premises, treated it as his own, and disposed of it as such. In connection with that alleged sale, he entered a quantity of the tobacco in the tax-book, at that date, and returned it as sold: Held, that, under the 94th section of the act of June 30th, 1864 [13 Stat. 264], it was illegal for L. to return that tobacco for tax, because it was not sold, nor was it "removed for consumption," under the 91st section of the same act.

4. The fact of this tax of twenty-five cents having been paid on this tobacco by L., under the above circumstances, was no reason for his not returning for tax a sale of a portion of it in April and May, 1867, although the tax upon such tobacco had at that time been reduced to fifteen cents a pound, by the act of July 13th, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], notwithstanding the provision of the 70th section of the latter act.

5. Under the 90th section of the act of 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13th, 1866, a manufacturer of tobacco is required to keep a book showing the goods manufactured by him as well as the goods he has sold.

6. Manufactured goods, under that section, means goods the manufacture of which is completed, so that the goods are in a condition to be sold.

[Cited in U. S. v. 16 Barrels Distilled Spirits, Case No. 16,300.]

7. It appeared to be the manner of doing business in the warehouse of L., to enter for tax on a certain day a large mass of tobacco, which was then taken down stairs into the retail counter department, where it was sold at retail, no record being kept of such sales: Held, that this was an illegal mode of doing business; that there was no sale when the property was taken to the retail counter; and that, under the 90th section of the act of 1864, as amended by the act of July 13th, 1866, a record of the sales at the retail counter should have been kept, and an abstract of such sales returned by the 10th day of every month.

[This was an information of forfeiture against a quantity of tobacco claimed by C. H. Lilienthal.]

Thomas Simons, Asst U. S. Dist. Atty.

Thomas Harland, Benjamin K. Phelps, and Daniel G. Rollins, Jr., for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge (charging jury). This case has occupied your attention for a long time, this being the nineteenth day since we entered upon its consideration. It is one of a class of cases which, as you have perceived, requires, in its examination by the counsel, the court and the jury, the exercise of patience and forbearance, in investigating matters of great tediousness. The consumption of time is inseparable from the character of the inquiry, and was, in my judgment, absolutely necessary. The trial was commenced in the expectation and with the intention, on the part of the district attorney, of saving the time of the court and jury from being taken up with an examination of the books, if an accurate transcript and faithful representation of their contents, made out of court, could be presented. But, on an examination, it was quite apparent that the "callings," as they have been denominated, which were made and were sought to be put in evidence, were not reliable. That fact was admitted by the district attorney. Therefore, great injustice would have been done to the claimant, if those "callings" had been put before the jury as a true transcript of the books, instead of having in evidence the books themselves. Moreover, an examination of the books by witnesses on the stand, in the presence of astute counsel on both sides, and of the court and jury, clears up everything as we proceed, and leaves nothing vague or doubtful. If any difficulty or embarrassment arises, the proper witness is on the spot to explain it. We have had an examination of these matters in Mr. Lilienthal's establishment, under circumstances the most favorable for the investigation, in a court of justice, of questions of this kind. We have had the gentlemen most intimately concerned in and connected with these transactions, the parties themselves who made the entries in the books, Mr. Denneker and Mr. Davis, gentlemen of intelligence, and who have given their testimony in a manner, so far as imparting information is concerned, entirely satisfactory to the court and the counsel, and, I doubt not, to yourselves. Again, all the books that have been called for have been presented. The district attorney, versed in these matters, has been assiduous, persevering and untiring. The counsel for the defence are gentlemen more eminently qualified for an investigation of this kind than any counsel at the bar, one of them having heretofore held the high position of deputy commissioner of internal revenue, under the government of the United States, and the others having fitted themselves for these investigations by long service in the district attorney's office, in the prosecution of like matters on behalf of the government. Therefore, nothing has been wanting, in this case, to the elucidation of the truth, so far as it can be ascertained from the books kept by Mr. Lilienthal, and from the testimony of his foreman and others in his establishment. And it is a result of this entire and thorough competency of the counsel on both sides, that that happens in this case, which rarely happens in any case tried before this court or any other court, that the court is able to assent, and does assent, as I shall hereafter state to you, to all the propositions of law presented on both sides of this case, as requests to the court to charge the jury, leaving merely a question of fact for your consideration. And I desire, gentlemen, to say to you, in the outset of my remarks, that it is for you solely, under your oaths, in the discharge of your duties as jurors, to pass upon that question of fact, uninfluenced, in your determination, by any suggestion or opinion that you may suppose the court holds on any matter of fact, taking the law as given to you by the court, and exercising your own independent, unbiassed, uninfluenced judgment upon the facts, to come to a righteous conclusion.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 158, contains only a partial report.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court; case not reported.]

The issue in this case is a very plain one. The prosecution is founded on the 48th section of the act of June 30th, 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13th, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), a section enacted at a comparatively early day in the history of the internal revenue acts of this country, and which has remained on the statute book, with some modifications, ever since, and has been enforced in a great many cases. Its provisions are these—that where any property, subject to a tax under a law of the United States, is found in the possession of any person with intent to sell it, or remove it, or dispose of it, without paying the tax upon it, or without having the tax paid upon it, or with intent to defraud the internal revenue laws of the United States, such property, so found, under such circumstances, in the possession of any person, with such intent, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized, as this property was in this case, and be proceeded against in the manner in which this property is being proceeded against in this suit. The same section provides, that if any raw materials are found in the possession of any person, he having the intent, in respect to them, when they are so found in his possession, of manufacturing them into articles subject to tax, in respect to which articles he intends that the tax shall not be paid, or that the revenue shall be defrauded, such raw materials shall be forfeited to the United States. The same section goes on to provide, that, under such circumstances, not only shall the articles subject to tax, and the raw materials, be forfeited, but all personal property, of any kind whatsoever, found on the same premises where such offending articles, so to speak, are found, shall be forfeited. There has been seized, in this case, not only tobacco in a manufactured state, subject to tax, but also a large quantity of raw materials—raw tobacco, and other raw materials—and a large quantity of personal property connected with this establishment. The report of the appraiser values the entire property at $104,000. In that amount it was bonded, and delivered to the claimant, and the government accepted what it regarded as a satisfactory bond, in place of the property. It is this $104,000 worth of property, consisting generally of tobacco subject to tax, raw materials, and other personal property, found in this establishment, that is the subject of this suit.

It is for the government to satisfy you that this property was in this establishment, with the intent mentioned, in respect to it, on the part of those in whose custody and control it was. For the purpose of making the matter clearly definite, I will read the language of the statute: "All goods, wares, merchandise, articles or objects on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law, which shall be found in the possession or custody, or within the control, of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold or removed by such person or persons in fraud of the internal revenue law, or with design to avoid payment of said taxes, may be seized by the collector or deputy collector of the proper district, or by such other collector or deputy collector as may be specially authorized by the commissioner of internal revenue for that purpose, and the same shall be forfeited to the United States, and also all raw materials found in the possession of any person or persons intending to manufacture the same into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, or with design to avoid the payment of said tax, and also all tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatsoever, in the place or building, or within any yard or inclosure, where such articles or such raw materials shall be found, may also be seized by any collector or deputy collector, and the same shall be forfeited as aforesaid." The district attorney has stated to you, in his summing up, the various grounds upon which he claims the forfeiture of the property seized, that is, the various grounds upon which he maintains that he has proved the existence of this intent, in respect to the taxable tobacco and the raw materials and other property seized in the factory of Mr. Lilienthal. As you have seen, the testimony is entirely testimony in regard to what are alleged to have been previous acts of omission and commission, on the part of Mr. Lilienthal and persons in his establishment, in respect to the conduct of their business at previous times, in relation to the internal revenue laws of the United States. That is a class of evidence which, as has been expressly adjudicated, in many cases, by the supreme court of the United States, is perfectly competent and legitimate evidence from which to infer a fraudulent intent in respect to existing property. It has been held in respect to the importation of goods at the custom house, that a fraudulent intent in respect to a particular importation of goods may be legitimately inferred by a jury from a previous fraudulent intent and previous fraudulent acts, shown in respect to property previously imported through the custom house. There is a large class of cases on that subject, and the doctrine has been recently applied to an action under the internal revenue laws, by the circuit judge of this circuit, in a case in the Northern district of New York, in regard to distilled spirits. It is, therefore, a class of evidence that can be legitimately appealed to, and is appealed to, in all cases of this kind. Sometimes it is accompanied by other evidence, in respect to an existing intent, in regard to property seized. Sometimes property seized is found concealed, and, to support the idea that fraud was intended in regard to it, previous fraudulent acts are given in evidence. Sometimes, as in this case, the evidence consists almost entirely of testimony in regard to previous acts, and to what is claimed by the district attorney to have been the fraudulent intent existing in such previous acts.

I shall call your attention particularly to the various matters that are relied on by the district attorney. The first one is in regard to what is called "extra long smoking tobacco," a species of tobacco in regard to which it may be generally stated, that it has in it a very large proportion of stems. It is a kind of tobacco which, according to the evidence, was manufactured in this establishment, as a part of its ordinary business, prior to the 1st of August, 1866, at which date commenced this series of returns, seventeen in number, which are the main subjects of consideration in this case. It is a species of tobacco that was manufactured previous to that time, and returned month by month in the monthly returns. That date is taken in this case, because it is the date when the act of July 13th, 1866, changing the rate of duty on various descriptions of tobacco, went into operation. Previous to that time, the act imposing a tax on tobacco was the act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 469). That act of March 3, 1865, divided smoking tobacco into two classes, for taxation. One class, made exclusively of stems, was taxed fifteen cents a pound; and smoking tobacco of all kinds not included and provided for under the fifteen cents clause, was taxed thirty-five cents a pound. It appears, from the evidence, that the "extra long smoking tobacco" so made in this establishment prior to August 1st, 1866, and so being made in it when the act of July 13th, 1866, was passed, had been, up to the 1st of August, 1866, returned by Mr. Lilienthal as "smoking tobacco," under this thirty-five cents clause, and not under the fifteen cents clause. Not being made exclusively of stems, it was not liable to the fifteen cents tax, and, therefore, it was liable to the thirty-five cents tax. It also appears that, for some twenty days or so after the 1st of August, 1866, when this new law of July, 1866, went into effect, this "extra long smoking tobacco," which had, before August 1st, 1866, been returned at thirty-five cents, was returned by Mr. Lilienthal as liable to a tax of forty cents, under a clause in the act which so went into effect August 1st, 1866, and was returned by him under the head of "chewing tobacco." The reason stated by the claimant for returning such tobacco as "chewing tobacco" is, that there was no place to insert it in the form of return, except under the head of "chewing tobacco." It had, however, been previously returned as "smoking tobacco," and it was called "smoking tobacco" in the price lists issued by the claimant. After it had been returned for some twenty days after the 1st of August, 1866, as liable to a tax of forty cents a pound, it was at all times thereafter returned by the claimant as liable to a tax of fifteen cents a pound. It was continued at that rate throughout all the returns, down to the 31st of December, 1867, and all the smoking tobacco of every kind that was returned by the claimant in all the returns made by him during all the seventeen months, was returned at fifteen cents a pound, and no smoking tobacco was returned at forty cents a pound. There was no class of thirty-five cents smoking tobacco in the act of July, 1866. The only classes of smoking tobacco in that act were these two—smoking tobacco, sweetened, stemmed or butted, forty cents per pound; and all smoking tobacco not sweetened, nor stemmed nor butted, including that made of stems or in part of stems, and imitations thereof, fifteen cents per pound. A great deal was said in this case, on the argument to the court, as to the proper construction of the act of July, 1866, in regard to the tax on this "extra long smoking tobacco." You will recollect that, during the greater part of the seventeen months after the 1st of August, 1866, all except a very small portion of the time, at the commencement, this "extra long smoking tobacco" was prepared by putting into it rather more stems, say ten pounds more in every ninety pounds of product, than they had been in the habit of putting in before the 1st of August, 1866. It always had had a large proportion—not a preponderance—of stems in it, although it was not made exclusively of stems. I do not consider it necessary, in this case, to determine what is the proper interpretation of this fifteen cents clause in the act of July, 1866, or under what head in that act, as a matter of law, this "extra long smoking tobacco," manufactured in the manner described by Mr. Denneker, properly falls. The facts, to recapitulate them, about which there is no dispute, in regard to this "extra long smoking tobacco," are, that at the time this act of July 13th, 1866, went into effect, Mr. Lilienthal was manufacturing this "extra long smoking tobacco;" that, previous to that time, he had returned it at thirty-five cents a pound, as "smoking tobacco," under the act of March 3, 1865; that, after the act of July, 1866, went into effect, and until about the 20th or 21st of August, 1866, he returned it at forty cents a pound; and that, after that time, the mass, if not all of it, during the entire residue of the seventeen months, was returned at fifteen cents a pound, there being no difference whatever in the tobacco during all the periods when it was so returned at the several rates of thirty-five, forty and fifteen cents, except that, during almost all of the seventeen months, commencing with August, 1866, it contained, in every ninety or one hundred pounds, ten pounds more of stems than it had, before August, 1866, been in the habit of containing. The quantity of it in the returns for such seventeen months was quite large. The district attorney claims that the average was about five thousand pounds a month; and, at all events, the quantity was considerable.

The district attorney has addressed to you an argument for the purpose of showing that, no matter what the interpretation of the act of July, 1866, may properly be, the conduct of Mr. Lilienthal in regard to this "extra long smoking tobacco" shows an intent on his part throughout to defraud the government in regard to the tax upon such tobacco. It is for you to say whether you believe that he has established the proposition for which he contends. The theory on the part of the defence is, that, because this tobacco had some stems in it, it was liable to a tax of fifteen cents a pound; that, at all events, Mr. Lilienthal, reading the law for himself, had a right to think that it was capable of a double interpretation; and that there could be no fraudulent design or intent on his part, until his attention was in some way called to the subject, or until the matter had been judicially determined. The district attorney on his part, contends, that if, to put any stems whatever into the tobacco, reduces it to a fifteen cents tax, it makes no difference how much stems there are in it, whether more or less; and that, therefore, the testimony in regard to putting more stems into this tobacco, has no bearing upon any honest transaction in regard to this matter. In other words he claims, that if the ground taken by Mr. Lilienthal at the time, that this tobacco was liable to the fifteen cents tax, because it had some stems in it, was correct, and that all tobacco, under the act of July, 1866, which had any stems in it, or was made in part of stems, was liable to fifteen cents a pound tax, and not forty cents, then it was absurd to put in any more stems, because the quantity of stems that was in already was entirely sufficient to bring the tobacco within the fifteen cents tax. It is for you to say what force and weight you will give to this argument. In that connection, the district attorney calls attention to the fact, that, all through the seventeen months, all the smoking tobacco that was returned by Mr. Lilienthal was returned at the fifteen cents rate, and none was returned at forty cents a pound. He also claims, that the books of Mr. Lilienthal show, that Mr. Lilienthal had a purpose to benefit himself, and not to deal honestly with the government, in this—that what was returned by him at forty cents a pound, during the short time he returned it at that rate, after the act of July, 1866, went into operation, appears by the books to have been sold at seventy cents a pound, and, when he returned the tobacco at fifteen cents a pound, thus reducing the tax by twenty-five cents a pound, he reduced his price to the purchaser by only ten cents a pound, for the same tobacco, with the same increased quantity of stems in it, thus making to himself a clear difference in his own favor, as is claimed, of fifteen cents a pound, out of the twenty-five cents a pound reduction in the tax. That is claimed by the district attorney to be a circumstance to be taken into consideration. It is also claimed by the district attorney, that there is no evidence to show that the government had any information until February, 1867, as to how this "extra long smoking tobacco" was made; that, at that time, when such information was communicated to Mr. Van Wyck, the collector, as is shown by his letter of March, 1867, to the internal revenue office, he supposed the state of facts to exist which is disclosed in that letter, namely, that the identical stems which were taken out of the tobacco for the purpose of being subjected to this treatment, which would assimilate them to leaf tobacco in appearance and, perhaps, in flavor, were put back with the leaves from which they were taken; that the internal revenue office, when, in August, 1867, it replied to the letter of Mr. Van Wyck, acted upon that idea, and in this way—that, while the act of July 13th, 1866, said that smoking tobacco stemmed should pay a tax of forty cents a pound, the commissioner of internal revenue stretched a point in favor of the tobacco manufacturers, by saying to them: "Although you take away physically the stems from the leaves, in the course of your manufacture, so that, in one sense, the tobacco is stemmed, nevertheless, for the purpose of giving you the privilege of putting those stems through this manipulation, we will consider that that tobacco is not stemmed, provided you put back those identical stems with the leaves to which they belong." The district attorney also contends, that, inasmuch as the claimant returned this tobacco, under the act of 1865, at the rate of thirty-five cents, and then returned it for a little while, under the act of 1866, at forty cents, and then changed the rate to fifteen cents, he has not shown honesty and good faith, because it does not appear that he laid all the facts before the internal revenue department, and asked what the tax on the tobacco should be, but put it down, month after month, at fifteen cents a pound, without raising the question whether the rate ought not, perhaps, to be forty cents. These I understand to be substantially the views urged on the part of the government in regard to that question. You will perceive that those views are, as I said before, entirely irrespective of any determination, as a matter of law, as to what in fact the tax on that tobacco was: and it is for you to say what inference you will draw from all this testimony, in regard to the intent Mr. Lilienthal had in respect to this "extra long smoking tobacco." The question applies to the entire series of months from August, 1866, to December, 1867. This seizure took place in March, 1868; and it appears, from the inventory of the property seized, that there was among it a considerable quantity of "extra long smoking tobacco," some of it loose, and some of it in papers. These are all the remarks which it seems necessary to make to you in regard to this "extra long smoking tobacco."

The next subject is the Orinoco tobacco, which was sent to California in April and May, 1867—on the 13th of April 3,600 pounds, and on the 29th of May 3,400 pounds. It is admitted, that this tobacco was not returned for tax at that time—April and May, 1867. There is no dispute that it was sent out of the establishment at that time; that it was removed for sale at that time; that it was sent to California to be sold at that time; and that it was not put into any return at that time. If it had been put into a return at that time, there is no dispute that it would have come under the fifteen cents tax, under the act of 1866, because it was tobacco which had not been in any manner stemmed. It was leaf and stem together, just as it grew, pressed into a mass, into a cake. Not having been stemmed, it was not subject to a duty of forty cents a pound, and it fell directly under the fifteen cents clause, as smoking tobacco, not stemmed. The history of that tobacco, as developed, is this: It was returned for tax, as a portion of a larger mass of the same description of tobacco, Orinoco tobacco, on the 31st of March, 1865, the day before the 1st of April, 1865, and the day before the act of March 3d, 1865, went into effect. That act of March 3d, 1865, imposed a higher tax upon that description of tobacco than it had been previously subject to under the act of June 30th, 1864. Under the act of June 30th, 1864, that tobacco was liable to a tax of twenty-five cents a pound. The provision of that act was—"Smoking tobacco, manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stem, twenty-five cents per pound." Under the act of March 3d, 1865, which was to go into effect on the 1st of April, 1865, this tobacco, which, up to the close of the 31st of March, 1865, was liable to a tax of twenty-five cents a pound, would have been liable to a tax of thirty-five cents a pound, being an increase of ten cents a pound. Mr. Lilienthal at that time went through the process that was developed on the trial, and stated by himself in his testimony of entering upon his sales book a sale, or a transaction as a sale, of the mass of the Orinoco tobacco of which this 7,000 pounds, which were afterwards sent to California, in April and May, 1867, formed a part, and of a large quantity of other tobacco, in all some $60,000 worth, to a house in this city, Kearney & Waterman. Kearney & Waterman gave him their check for that amount, and, two or three days afterwards, he gave to Kearney & Waterman his check for the same amount. The tobacco was not removed from his establishment, and never passed into the possession of Kearney & Waterman. Mr. Lilienthal kept it on his own premises, and, after he bought it back, (as the expression is), he treated it as his own, and disposed of it as such. In connection with such alleged sale in that way to Kearney & Waterman, on the 31st of March, 1865, Mr. Lilienthal put that Orinoco tobacco into the tax book, at that date, at the rate of twenty-five cents a pound, and returned it as sold. He told you frankly on the stand, that he went through this operation because, under the law of 1865, there was going to be a higher duty on such tobacco. He kept the tobacco on hand so long that there came another change in the law, and, by the time he sent it to California, if he had not paid any tax on it before, he would have had to pay on it a tax of only fifteen cents a pound. It is my duty to say to you, that that transaction was utterly illegal. The 94th section of the act of June 30th, 1864, under which Mr. Lilienthal was acting at the time he returned this tobacco for tax, on the 31st of March, 1865, before the act of March 3d, 1865, went into effect, provided as follows: "Upon the articles, goods, wares and merchandise, hereinafter mentioned, except where otherwise provided," which includes this tobacco taxable at twenty-five cents a pound, "which shall be produced and sold, or be manufactured or made and sold, or be consumed or used by the manufacturer or producer thereof, or removed for consumption or for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturer or producer, within the United States or territories thereof, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties, to be paid by the producer or manufacturer thereof." It is perfectly clear that that transaction was no real sale of the property. It was not intended to be a sale. It was, as it has been well characterized here, a perfect sham, from beginning to end. Now, it was illegal to return the Orinoco tobacco for tax, because it was not sold, nor was it removed for consumption. The words "removed for consumption," in the act of 1864, are defined by the provisions of the 91st section of the same act. The property must be removed from the premises of the manufacturer in good faith, with a then present intention to have it consumed, as against the will of the manufacturer and owner of it, giving a right to another person to put it into consumption, or the property in it must in some way be changed, or it must be sent for sale on commission, or, in some way or other, an intention to put it into the category prescribed by the act must be manifested in regard to it. But this property, you will remember, remained on the premises of Mr. Lilienthal, not disturbed in any manner, and was returned for tax under the circumstances stated.

It is claimed, on the part of the defence, that, inasmuch as the tax of twenty-five cents a pound had once been paid on this Orinoco tobacco, there was no obligation on the part of Mr. Lilienthal to make a subsequent return of it, and to pay another tax on it; and that this was the case, a fortiori, if, as was the fact, at the time the tobacco was sent to California, the tax on it would have been fifteen cents a pound. In this connection, reference was made to the following provision in the 70th section of the act of July 13th, 1866, which went into effect on the 1st of August, 1866, and was in force when this Orinoco tobacco was sent to California, in April and May, 1867: "All manufactures and productions on which a duty was imposed by either of the acts repealed by this act" (which embraces the provisions imposing duties on tobacco contained in the previous act of June, 1864, which was the act in force when this tobacco was returned for tax on the 31st of March, 1865), "which shall be in the possession of the manufacturer or producer, or of his agent or agents, on the day this act takes effect, the duty imposed by any such former act not having been paid, shall be held and deemed to have been manufactured or produced after such date." The defence contends, that the duty on this tobaccco had been paid, within this provision. But that is not the law. The law says—all manufactures "on which a duty was imposed," "the duty imposed" by the act of 1864 not having been paid. Now, no duty was imposed upon this Orinoco tobacco. A duty was imposed upon it only when it was sold in good faith or removed for consumption. There was no duty imposed upon it at the time it was returned for tax at twenty-five cents a pound. The claimant had no right to return it at twenty-five cents, particularly when it is acknowledged by himself, on the stand, that he did so for the purpose of getting rid of the coming thirty-five cents duty, and when, therefore, it is clear that there was an intent to commit a fraud on the government. The act of 1866 only applies to the payment of a duty which has been imposed. Otherwise, a party would be able to take advantage of his own wrong, by paying a tax of twenty-five cents a pound for the purpose of getting rid of a tax of thirty-five cents that was going into effect the next day, and paying the tax when the law gave him no right to pay it, and afterwards to say that, because he had paid it, there was no intent to defraud the government, and that thus the fraud so committed was condoned. The law is not so. The law merely says, that if a tax which has been imposed has been paid, no tax can be collected again on the same article. You are to consider the question not solely in the light of the fact that the law happened to be altered again, and the duty to be reduced from thirty-five cents to fifteen cents a pound, before the tobacco was sent to California, but, also, in the light of what Mr. Lilienthal did, and what his intent was, in regard to the tobacco, as bearing upon his intent in regard to the tobacco found in his possession when his establishment was seized.

The district attorney has called your attention, very properly, to the fact, that the law, in all its provisions, aims at this—that manufacturers of tobacco shall not be allowed to aggregate in their establishments large quantities of tax-paid goods. An account is to be kept of goods sold, as they are sold and removed. They are to be removed from the premises—removed for consumption. They are not to be returned in masses, at the pleasure of the manufacturer at a given time, without being disturbed in any manner or removed from his establishment, so that he may be enabled to have on hand a large mass of goods, from which he can say, at any time, that any particular goods sold which cannot be traced were taken. These considerations, addressed to you, are considerations of force, and are to be taken into view by you in judging of the intent with which a manufacturer aggregates upon his premises, without removing therefrom, a large quantity of tax-paid goods, such a practice being against all the provisions of the law, and directly unlawful in respect to this Orinoco tobacco so returned for tax on the 31st of March, 1865.

The next subject in regard to which the district attorney claims that a fraudulent intent is shown on the part of Mr. Lilienthal, is in respect to the account which, by the 90th section of the act of 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the act of 1866, is required to be kept by every tobacco manufacturer. We have had exhibited here all the books on the subject kept in this establishment. They appear not to be blank forms printed, but to be entirely in writing. This one is headed—"Account of tobacco and snuff sold by C. H. Lilienthal in the year 1867." The heading is all in writing. This one that preceded it appears to have a heading in print. But, in regard to both of them, it may be said, that they embrace nothing but goods sold. They in no manner embrace, or pretend to embrace, goods manufactured. The earlier book is headed—"Quantity of tobacco and snuff sold and consumed, and removed for sale or consumption from the factory;" and the later book is headed—"Account of tobacco and snuff sold." In regard to this matter the law is explicit. It requires every manufacturer of tobacco, snuff or cigars, to "keep in book form an accurate account of all the articles aforesaid thereafter purchased by him, the quantity of tobacco, snuff, snuff-flour or cigars, of whatever description, manufactured, sold, consumed or removed for consumption or sale, or removed from the place of manufacture." It is perfectly clear that in this case, no such book was kept by Mr. Lilienthal, and no book showing in any manner the manufactured goods, but showing only those that were sold. "Manufactured" goods means goods the manufacture of which is completed, so that the goods are in a condition to be sold, and so that all that needs to be done, if a purchaser asks for them, is to deliver them. No account of such goods was kept. When the manufacturer comes to make up his abstract and hand it in to the assessor, he is not required to hand in an abstract of goods manufactured. He is required to hand in only an abstract of goods purchased, sold or removed. But Mr. Lilienthal, as you perceive, had, in the abstracts returned by him, a column for goods manufactured, as well as one for goods sold and removed for sale. He had no book, however, from which he could obtain any entries to put into the column of goods manufactured, because no such book was kept, and therefore, that happened which you naturally expect would happen. He filled up the column of goods sold, in the abstract furnished to the government, from the book, kept by him, of goods sold; and, when he came to fill up the column of goods manufactured, having no record of them, he put down, in every case, as manufactured, the same quantity which he put down as sold.

It was a clear violation of law, not to keep an account of goods manufactured. The reason why the law requires this book of goods manufactured to be kept, although it does not require the abstract returned by the tenth day of each month to set forth the goods manufactured, is, that the manufacturer is required to furnish a statement or inventory every January, setting forth all the property he has on hand in his business, and what portion of the goods was manufactured or produced by him, and what portion was purchased from others. Therefore, unless a record be kept of goods manufactured, it is impossible for the manufacturer to comply with the law, by handing in every January a true statement of all the goods on hand, specifying which of them were manufactured or produced by him, and which of them were purchased.

The district attorney has also called your attention to the inventories furnished by Mr. Lilienthal, for 1867 and 1868, and to what he claims are discrepancies between them and the monthly returns made to the government. It is for you to say what inference you will draw therefrom with regard to any intent on the part of Mr. Lilienthal. The twelve returns for 1867, in respect to chewing tobacco, correspond throughout, in the columns for manufacture and sale, so many pounds being manufactured, and the same number of pounds being sold, in the same month. As a matter of course, the quantity of manufactured chewing tobacco set forth as on hand in the inventory of 1868 ought not to have been greater or less than the quantity on manufactured chewing tobacco set forth as on hand in the inventory of 1867; and yet the district attorney states that the two inventories differ in that respect. So, in regard to fine-cut shorts, the two columns for manufacture and sale are alike in the twelve returns for the year 1867, and yet the two inventories do not correspond in respect to fine-cut shorts. So in regard to smoking tobacco, the district attorney claims there is a like discrepancy. He also claims, that the Orinoco tobacco, if it was sold and bought back, ought to have been returned as purchased goods on hand on the first of January, 1867, whereas he claims it was not so returned. All these circumstances are commented upon by the district attorney, for the purpose of inferring from them an intent on the part of Mr. Lilienthal throughout, in the manner in which he kept his books, and in the manner in which he returned for tax, under the act of 1865, the tobacco which he had on hand when that act went into effect, and in the fact that he kept on hand a large quantity of tax-paid tobacco, contrary to the policy of the law, not to deal honestly with the government, but to violate the law, and thence of inferring a fraudulent intent in regard to the goods on hand in his establishment when it was seized.

The last subject to which attention was called by the district attorney, was the result of the examination of the books of the claimant. It appears from them, in respect particularly to that which occupied so much time in the investigation—the Orinoco tobacco, and the Killikinnick tobacco—that there are large quantities of granulated tobacco found in the order books that are not found, in the same specific items, in the tax books, and large quantities of granulated tobacco returned for tax in the tax books, which cannot be identified with any specific items in the order books. A great many items were identified, and, in regard to those which could not be, you will recollect the testimony of Mr. Denneker. When asked: "Where did the granulated tobacco come from which filled the orders in the order books, which cannot be identified as items in the tax books?" It was part, he said, of a large mass that had been entered for tax on a certain day, and taken down stairs into the retail counter department. Under the law, that was a wholly illegal mode of doing business. Mr. Lilienthal had no right arbitrarily to take a quantity of Killikinnick tobacco and return it for tax, and remove it down stairs into his retail counter department, or into any other part of his premises, and peddle it out by the pound from day to day for an indefinite period of time. When it was so entered for tax, as I stated before in regard to the Orinoco tobacco, it had not been sold, and it was not removed for consumption, within the law. Removing it from up stairs to down stairs was not a removal for consumption, within the meaning of the statute. In addition to that, it is admitted that, when tobacco so taken in masses, and returned for tax, and then taken down stairs to the retail counter, was sold at the retail counter afterwards, no record of those sales was kept, in any manner whatever. The 90th section of the act of 1864, as amended by the act of 1866, requires, that a record shall be kept of all sales, and that an abstract of such sales shall be returned by the tenth day of every month. This property, when it was taken from up stairs to the retail counter room, was not sold by Mr. Lilienthal to anybody. It was not sold to himself. It was not removed from his premises for consumption. It was taken from up stairs and brought down stairs, and, when it was so sold over the counter, no record of it was kept, in utter violation of the statute, and no abstract of it was returned, in violation of the statute. Mr. Lilienthal arbitrarily took three hundred or four hundred pounds and returned it for tax to-day, and then carried it down stairs, and then kept no record whatever of its subsequent sale. So that the purpose of the law was defeated by this transaction, because the government could have no means, when it got hold of Mr. Lilienthal's books, of tracing the sales of the tobacco. The fact that the government has been foiled in tracing such sales has been demonstrated here, because, no record of the sales having been kept, whenever any order which was found in the order book could not be identified with an item in the tax book specifically returned as so many pounds, Mr. Denneker testified that the order was filled out of the masses of tobacco which so went down stairs to the retail counter. The business, therefore, was conducted in such a manner as to deprive the government of what the law designed to provide, namely, a check over the transactions of tobacco manufacturers.

I have thus gone over the books of the claimant. It was necessary that I should show you what are violations of the law, in order that, if you should come to the conclusion, from the evidence, that such violations of law, in point of fact, took place, and that they showed an intent on the part of Mr. Lilienthal to defraud the revenue, you might have before you the law and the facts from which the district attorney claims that you have a right to infer a fraudulent intent on the part of Mr. Lilienthal, in respect to the tobacco on hand at the time of the seizure. I do not design to intimate any opinion whatever in regard to any intent on the part of Mr. Lilienthal in respect to these matters. But the facts in this case are undisputed. There is no serious contest about a single fact, except in regard to the every point of the law—the intent. On the part of the claimant, it is claimed, that the investigation before you has shown that, in point of fact, the government has not proved that it has been deprived of any tax; and, also, that it has been shown affirmatively, by an examination of the books, that the government has received all the taxes to which it was entitled, upon all goods which passed out of the establishment of Mr. Lilienthal prior to the seizure. You have heard all the evidence and the summing up on that subject, and it will be for you to say what is your belief on that subject, as bearing on the question of Mr. Lilienthal's intent in respect to the goods seized.

I shall now read to you the instructions prayed by the claimant. The instructions of law are twelve in number, to all of which I assent. The thirteenth and fourteenth instructions, which are requests to charge as to the facts, I decline to charge, as not being questions of law.

The first proposition on the part of the claimant is this, and I assent to it: "If the jury shall believe that the returns for taxation of the tobacco known as 'extra long smoking tobacco,' between August, 1866, and the date of seizure, were made in good faith, and with an honest belief on the part of Mr. Lilienthal and his agents concerned or employed in the preparation of said returns, that said tobacco was liable to the fifteen cents rate of duty, and to no other or higher rate, then, even though said tobacco was by law liable to the forty cents rate of duty, the jury cannot, for that cause, find a verdict for the government, under section forty-eight."

The second proposition is this: "In order to forfeit the property proceeded against in this action, or any part thereof, the jury must be satisfied, either, first, that, at the time of the finding thereof," that is, on the 25th of March, 1868, "the manufactured articles, or some of them, were held by the persons in whose possession they then were, with a purpose, then existing, of selling or removing the same in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with a design, then existing, to avoid payment of the taxes imposed thereon; or, second, that the persons in whose possession the raw materials were found, held them, at the very time of such finding, with intent to manufacture the same into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, or with design to evade the payment of said tax." That is correct.

The third proposition, to which I assent, is this: "Fraudulent intent and fraudulent acts long prior to the time of the finding and seizure of the property in this action, (if any such existed), cannot warrant a verdict of condemnation, unless accompanied or supported by evidence of fraudulent intent or fraudulent acts at a period nearly coincident with the time of seizure, and, if the jury believe that, for the ten months next prior to the seizure, the claimant properly made returns, and paid taxes upon his manufactures, they may fairly infer therefrom a discontinuance of any fraudulent intent which he might have had previously."

The fourth proposition I assent to: "Even if the jury find that a fraudulent intent existed in the mind of Mr. Lilienthal at the time of making the return of the Kearney & Waterman tobacco, so called, in March, 1865, that fact of itself would not justify them in finding the existence of a fraudulent intention on his part in respect to the property proceeded against, at the time that property was found or seized."

The fifth proposition I assent to: "If the jury should find that a fraudulent act was committed by Mr. Lilienthal in 1865, in respect to property then in his possession, this alone, unless supported by other evidence, is not sufficient to warrant them in finding the existence of a fraudulent intent on his part in regard to the property found in his possession in 1868, and will not justify a verdict of condemnation."

The sixth proposition I assent to: "The act of July 13th, 1866, did not require manufacturers of tobacco to make return to the assessor of the quantity of tobacco manufactured by them."

The seventh proposition I assent to: "If the jury shall find, as a fact, that Mr. Lilienthal made returns of goods manufactured by him, from month to month, in no other way than by reporting the amount of such goods sold or removed within the same periods respectively, that fact is no evidence to support a verdict of condemnation, unless the jury shall believe that that mode of making returns was adopted or used with fraudulent intent on the part of Mr. Lilienthal, or of the persons employed in making such returns." The mere fact amounts to nothing, unless you shall believe that there was a fraudulent intent in connection with it.

The eighth proposition I assent to: "If the jury find that Mr. Lilienthal failed to make return of all the goods sold which he had purchased of other manufacturers, such failure is no evidence to support a verdict of condemnation, unless it was with a fraudulent intent on the part of Mr. Lilienthal, or of the persons employed in making such returns."

The ninth proposition is this: "If the jury shall find that, in 1865,"—this is the Kearney & Waterman transaction again—"Mr. Lilienthal returned for taxation, and paid a tax of twenty-five cents per pound upon, thirty-four hundred pounds and thirty-six hundred pounds of tobacco shipped in 1867 to W. T. Coleman in California, then he became liable to no additional tax by reason of said shipment of said tobacco at that time." There is no doubt about that. If the government should sue Mr. Lilienthal to-day for fifteen cents a pound tax on that tobacco, it would be a perfect defence for him to show that he had paid twenty-five cents a pound tax upon it.

The tenth proposition I assent to: "If the jury shall find that, at the time of the shipment of the thirty-four hundred pounds and thirty-six hundred pounds of tobacco, in 1867, to W. T. Coleman in California, the claimant believed that all the tax due thereon to the government had already been paid, then his failure to return said tobacco for taxation upon said shipment is no evidence of fraudulent intent on the part of the claimant." That is a correct proposition. If you believe that Mr. Lilienthal, with his knowledge of that transaction of 1865, with the view of it held by him, which he testified to here, believed that the tax was due to the government at the time he paid it, he could have had no fraudulent intent; and it is for you to say what his belief was, in regard to its bearing upon the question of intent, but it must, as I have said before, have been a payment of a tax which Mr. Lilienthal honestly believed at the time he was bound to pay, and not a payment of a tax merely, because it was going to be raised the next day to thirty-five cents a pound.

The eleventh proposition I assent to: "The words, 'in fraud of the internal revenue laws,' as used in the forty-eighth section of the act of June 30th, 1864, are simply equivalent to the words, 'in fraud of the internal revenue.'"

The twelfth proposition I assent to: "Acts in violation of the internal revenue laws are not acts in fraud of the internal revenue laws, within the meaning of section 48, unless such acts are accompanied by an intent to defraud the United States." That is an abstraction which I certainly should not care to dissent from.

The other two propositions are questions of fact, addressed to me, to charge you that there is no evidence of this or that, which I decline to charge.

The propositions on the part of the government are substantially what I have already stated, but I will go over them, for the purpose of saying that I assent to them.

"First. If the jury find that the books, exhibits Nos. 138 and 138a, were kept by Mr. Lilienthal, or his agents, as and for the account in book form required to be kept by the provisions of the ninetieth section of act of June 30th, 1864, as amended by the ninth section of the act of July 13th, 1866, and that the said Lilienthal and his agents have therein kept no account of the quantity of tobacco or snuff manufactured by said C. H. Lilienthal at his factory in Washington street, from August 1st, 1866, to January 1st, 1868; that quantities of tobacco and snuff were removed for sale and removed from the said place of manufacture during said period, and that no account of the tobacco and snuff so removed was kept, as of removals thereof, and no accurate account of the tobacco and snuff so removed was kept in any manner in said books;"—that refers to the sales over the retail counter, of which no record was kept as sales—"that large quantities of granulated tobacco, and other descriptions of tobacco, manufactured, were sold by Mr. Lilienthal during said period, and that no account of such sales, as sales, was kept in those books; that quantities of purchased and manufactured tobacco were sold and removed from the said premises during the period from August 1st, 1866, to December 1st, 1867, and that no accurate account of such sales or removals was kept in said books; that exhibits numbered 1 to 17, both inclusive, were furnished to the assistant assessor of the district by said C. H. Lilienthal or his agents, as true and accurate abstracts of all such sales and removals, and were not true and accurate abstracts thereof;"—that means, not that they were not true and accurate abstracts of the books which Mr. Lilienthal kept, not that Mr. Denneker did not transfer them accurately from his tax book into the return, but that they were not, as recorded by Mr. Davis, true and accurate abstracts of the actual transactions—"that the annual inventories, exhibits 18 and 19, were made out and delivered by said C. H. Lilienthal to the assistant assessor of the district, severally, as true statements and inventories of the matters and things therein contained, as required by the said 90th section, as amended as aforesaid; that it appears, from said inventory and abstracts, that much more chewing tobacco and fine shorts was manufactured in said manufactory during the year 1867, than was declared upon said abstracts to have been manufactured; that a large quantity of smoking tobacco manufactured on said premises had been sold or removed during the year 1867, which had not been returned for taxation upon the said abstracts, and of which no account was contained therein, or in the said books, exhibits Nos. 138 and 138a—then, the burden of proof is upon the claimant to satisfy the jury that the tobacco so manufactured on said premises, and sold or removed, without due account, return and entry made thereof in the said books and abstracts, in the manner required by law, was not so sold and removed in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and with intent to evade the taxes thereon; and, if the claimant shall not have so satisfied the jury of his intent respecting the same, the jury may infer that the claimant's intent in respect of the same was fraudulent, and that his possession of the goods in suit was with the like intent."

I also charge the second proposition: "If the jury find that, prior to August 1st, 1866, when the act of July 13th, 1866, went into effect, changing, in some respects, the rates of taxation on manufactured smoking tobacco, a brand of smoking tobacco known as 'extra long smoking tobacco' had been manufactured by C. H. Lilienthal, by cutting together stripped or stemmed leaf, and stems, in certain proportions, and had been sold and returned for taxation by him as 'smoking tobacco,' subject to a tax of thirty-five cents per pound, under the existing law; that, from the time said act of July 13th, 1866, went into effect, the said 'extra long smoking tobacco,' manufactured as aforesaid, was entered by said Lilienthal in the account required to be kept in book form, by the ninetieth section of the act of June 30th, 1864, as amended by the ninth section of the act of July 13th, 1866, of sales and removals of manufactured tobacco, as 'chewing tobacco,' and was returned upon the abstracts of said accounts required to be furnished monthly to the assistant assessor of the district, by said section, as 'chewing tobacco,' subject to a tax of forty cents per pound, under the provisions of said act of July 13th, 1866; that, after the said 1st day of August, 1866, said C. H. Lilienthal varied the process of manufacturing said 'extra long smoking tobacco,' by merely increasing the proportion of stem, and, from the 21st day of August, 1866, in each monthly return during the years 1866 and 1867, returned for taxation sales and removals of large quantities of the 'extra long smoking tobacco' so manufactured, as 'smoking tobacco,' subject to a tax of fifteen cents per pound, under the provisions of said act of July 13th, 1866; that the said 'extra long smoking tobacco' returned as 'chewing tobacco,' for taxation, at the rate of forty cents per pound, was sold at seventy cents per pound, and the said 'extra long smoking tobacco,' returned as 'smoking tobacco,' for taxation, at the rate of fifteen cents per pound, was sold at the rate of sixty cents per pound; that no officer of internal revenue was advised by C. H. Lilienthal, or his agents, of the said practice of returning the said 'extra long smoking tobacco,' for taxation, at fifteen cents per pound; that the commissioner of internal revenue had published his instructions and opinion that tobacco so manufactured was subject, under the said act of 1866, to the tax of forty cents per pound, as 'smoking tobacco,' and never directly or indirectly countenanced or sanctioned the practice of said C. H. Lilienthal in returning the said 'extra long smoking tobacco;' and if the jury believe, from these facts, that said Lilienthal and his agents made the said change in the process of manufacturing the said 'extra long smoking tobacco,' and the said change in the manner of returning the same for taxation, during the said period from August 1st, 1866, to January 1st, 1868, for the purpose of selling and removing the same in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and with intent to evade the payment of taxes thereon, then they would have a right to infer that the claimant and his agents had the like intent with respect to the property in suit."

I believe those are all the considerations which it is necessary to present to you in regard to this matter. You have listened patiently to the evidence, and to the summing up of the counsel, which has been exceedingly clear and thorough on both sides, and it is for you to say, on your oaths, what you believe to have been the intent of Mr. Lilienthal in respect to this property so seized. If the government has not made out, to your satisfaction, that such intent to commit a fraud upon the law, or to evade the payment of taxes, in respect either to the goods on hand, or to the goods to be manufactured out of raw materials on hand, existed on the part of Mr. Lilienthal at the time the goods were seized, your verdict will be for the claimant.

Mr. Rollins (counsel for the claimant), after taking several exceptions to the charge, said: Your honor charged our 10th request, as requested, but, in commenting on it, you stated to the jury, that, if they should find that Mr. Lilienthal believed that he was bound to pay that tax in March, 1865, and did pay it, then his failure to return the tobacco for tax in 1867 was no evidence of fraudulent intent. I take exception to that part of your honor's charge, and request your honor to charge, that, if Mr. Lilienthal believed that he had a right to pay, independent of any question whether he was bound to pay, the fact that he did not subsequently pay in 1867 is no evidence of fraudulent intent.

THE COURT.—That is a new proposition, and is not embraced in the one you handed to me.

Mr. Rollins.—I ask your honor so to charge.

THE COURT.—I do so charge—that, if Mr. Lilienthal believed honestly, when he paid that tax, on the 31st of March, 1865, that, as between him and the government, he, as a tobacco manufacturer had, at that time, a right to pay that tax, there was no fraudulent intent in his so doing. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. Rollins.—I also take exception to your honor's charging as requested by the district attorney, in both instances. We endeavored to embrace in our requests all we deemed important, but one thing is suggested by your honor's charge, which, I have no doubt, your honor will charge, and that is this—that, if the jury shall believe that the mode of returning for taxation the goods sold over the retail counter, by returning them at the time they were transferred to such retail counter, was adopted for the convenience of the claimant, and used without any fraudulent intent on the part of Mr. Lilienthal or his agents in his business as a manufacturer, such fact furnishes no evidence in support of a verdict of condemnation in this case.

THE COURT.—Yes, that is true. The mere naked fact that that was unlawful does not amount to anything; but if, it being so unlawful, the jury believe there was a fraudulent intent in so doing, it is to be taken into consideration. If the jury believe there was no fraudulent intent in it, it is not to be taken into consideration.

Mr. Rollins.—We made no request to charge as to the rate of tax that was really due on the "extra long smoking tobacco," and we are inclined to think that the proposition of your honor, that it makes no difference, for the purposes of this case, what the rate of tax was, is correct, but, at the same time, as this case involves such a large sum of money, we are unwilling that any failure on our part to take proper exceptions should occur, and, therefore, we ask your honor to charge as follows: "If the jury find that, in the process of manufacturing the 'extra long smoking tobacco,' a portion of the stem was removed from the leaf, and an amount of stem fully equal to or exceeding the quantity removed was subsequently, during said process, added to and intermingled with the leaf, so that, in point of fact, the manufactured product was composed of both stem and leaf, and so sold, that tobacco was, between August, 1866, and the date of seizure, liable to a tax of only fifteen cents per pound, and was properly returned at that rate."

THE COURT.—I refuse to charge that.

Mr. Rollins.—To which refusal I except. I also ask your honor to charge, "that the 'extra long smoking tobacco,' if manufactured in the manner testified to by Mr. Denneker, was smoking tobacco made in part of stems, and was liable, under the act of July 13th, 1866, to a tax of fifteen cents per pound, during all the time subsequent to August 1st, 1866, and prior to the date of the seizure of the property proceeded against in this action."

THE COURT.—I decline to charge that.

Mr. Rollins.—To which I except. I also ask your honor to charge, "that, if the 'extra long smoking tobacco' returned as liable to the fifteen cents rate, was manufactured in the manner stated in the testimony of Mr. Denneker, and contained a quantity of stem as great as, or greater than, that which grew with the leaf contained in said tobacco, then the said tobacco was liable, between August 1st, 1866, and the time of the seizure of the property herein proceeded against, to the fifteen cents tax, as returned."

THE COURT.—I decline to charge that.

Mr. Simons, Asst. Dist. Atty.—As they have taken formal exceptions, we wish to do the same on our part. We ask your honor to charge as follows, which is the converse of their proposition on the law point: "That the tobacco manufactured by C. H. Lilienthal, and sold by him, from the 1st day of August, 1866, through the years 1866 and 1867, under the name of 'extra long smoking tobacco,' and returned for tax as 'smoking tobacco,' at the rate of fifteen cents per pound, was smoking tobacco stemmed or butted, within the meaning of the provisions of the ninety-fourth section of the act of congress, approved June 30th, 1864, as amended by the ninth section of the act of congress, approved July 13th, 1866, and subject, by such provisions, to a tax of forty cents per pound on such sales."

THE COURT.—I decline so to charge; and I refuse to charge in accordance with any of the propositions respecting the proper rate of tax on the "extra long smoking tobacco," not that I agree with, or dissent from, any of such propositions, but because I do not suppose it to be necessary for the purposes of this case so to charge.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the government, condemning the property seized.

[Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were subsequently overruled. See Cases Nos. 16,106 and 16,106a.]

All the rulings of the court, in its charge, were affirmed by the circuit court (Woodruff, Circuit Judge), on writ of error, in December, 1872. [Not reported.]

Case No. 16,106.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF TOBACCO.

[6 Ben. 68.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1872.[2]

INTERNAL REVENUE—TAX ON TOBACCO—PRETENDED AND ACTUAL SALE—EVIDENCE OF PREVIOUS EVASIONS OF THE REVENUE LAW—INTENT.

1. Under the 90th and 94th sections of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 224), as amended by the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 150), and the 61st and 84th sections of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 152, 153), a completed sale or a completed removal of manufactured tobacco is a necessary preliminary to the accruing, assessment and payment of the tax upon it.

2. But the provision in the 48th section of the act of 1864, as amended by the act of 1866, which provides for the forfeiture of goods "on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law, which shall be found in the possession or custody, or within control, of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold or removed by such person or persons in fraud of the internal revenue laws," does not require that there should have been a completed sale or removal of such goods.

3. The provision in the said 48th section, in respect to the forfeiture of raw materials, is not dependent on the provision in regard to taxable articles, so as to make the forfeiture of the raw materials dependent on their being seized in the possession of a person in whose possession forfeitable taxable articles are found.

4. Under the said 48th section the corpus delicti is the possession of the specified property with the specified fraudulent purpose or design, without the doing of any overt act in respect of it

5. Evidence of the manifestation of a like fraudulent intent at prior times, in respect to kindred matters, may be offered to prove the existence of the fraudulent purpose or design mentioned in the 48th section, as to the articles in question.

[Cited in brief in Doane v. Lockwood, 115 Ill. 491, 4 N. E. 500.]

6. Under the 94th section of the act of June 30, 1864, above cited, as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866, tobacco made of leaves from which part of the stems had been removed, and to which an equal proportion of other stems, prepared in a certain way, had been added, and which had not been sweetened, was taxable at forty cents a pound, after the 1st of August, 1866.

7. A manufacturer of tobacco made a pretended sale of a quantity of tobacco on the day before an act increasing the tax on it went into effect, and paid the tax as on a sale. The increased tax went into operation, and was afterwards reduced again below the former rate. After the reduction he sold the tobacco, but made no return of the sale and paid no tax on it: Held, that the transaction was illegal, and that the manufacturer had no right to pay the tax when he did.

[1][Reported by Robert D. Benedict Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2][Affirmed by circuit court; case unreported.]

8. It was also the course of business, in his establishment, to remove from the wholesale department to the retail department a quantity of tobacco at once, and to make a return and pay tax on it as one sale, and not to make any record, or return or pay any tax on the actual sales of it in the retail department: Held, that this was an illegal mode of doing business, and that it was for the jury to say what was the intent of the manufacturer in adopting that mode.

[This was an information of forfeiture against a quantity of tobacco, charging a violation of the internal revenue laws. A verdict of condemnation was returned by the jury (Case No. 16,105), and the claimant has now moved for a new trial.]

George T. Curtis, for claimant.
Thomas Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The first four grounds urged, on the part of the claimant, as a reason for granting a new trial in this case, are, that the court erred "in instructing the jury that they could find a verdict in favor of the United States on the issue made by the information and answer, without any proof, on the part of the United States, tending to show that any taxes had become due, or had been imposed, upon the manufactured tobacco seized on the claimant's premises, and without any proof, on the part of the United States, tending to show that the claimant had sold, or removed from his premises for consumption, or was, at the time of the seizure, engaged in selling or removing from his premises for consumption, any of the manufactured tobacco so seized;" and "in instructing the jury, in the absence of any proof that taxes had become imposed on the said manufactured tobacco, and that the claimant had sold or removed, or was engaged in selling or removing, any part of the same, without paying such taxes, that the jury could infer, from previous alleged evasions, or attempts at evasion, of the revenue laws, by the claimant, an intent to sell or remove the said manufactured tobacco without paying the taxes that might become due thereon, and, from such intent, so found, find a forfeiture of the said manufactured tobacco so seized as aforesaid;" and "in instructing the jury, in the absence of any proof that the claimant had sold or removed, or was engaged in selling or removing, any manufactured tobacco on which taxes had been imposed by law, without paying, and without intending to pay, the said taxes, that they could infer, from previous alleged evasions, or attempts at evasion, of the revenue laws, by the claimant, a purpose to sell or remove the manufactured articles which he might thereafter make from the raw materials seized, without paying the taxes that would become due thereon, and, from such purpose, so found, find a forfeiture of the said raw materials;" and "in refusing to give to the jury the instructions prayed for in the 13th and 14th of the claimant's prayers for instructions, and in giving to the jury the 1st and 2d of the instructions prayed for by the district attorney."[3]

The 13th and 14th of the claimant's prayers for instruction were as follows: "(13) That there is no evidence, in this action, that, at the time of the finding or seizure of the property in this action, the claimant had not paid all the taxes due on all the goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or objects, which had been, before that date, manufactured at his factory and sold or removed therefrom. (14) That there is no evidence, in this action, that any goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or objects on which taxes were imposed by the provisions of law, manufactured at the factory of Mr. Lilienthal, were ever sold or removed by him, or by any other person, in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with design to avoid payment of said taxes."

The prosecution in this suit is founded on that part of the 48th section of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), which is in these words: "All goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or objects, on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law, which shall be found in the possession, or custody, or within the control, of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold or removed by such person or persons in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with design to avoid payment of said taxes, may be seized by the collector or deputy collector of the proper district * * * and the same shall be forfeited to the United States; and also all raw materials found in the possession of any person or persons intending to manufacture the same into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, or with design to evade the payment of said tax; and also all tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatsoever, in the place or building, or within any yard or enclosure, where such articles, or such raw materials, shall be found, may also be seized by any collector, or deputy collector, as aforesaid, and the same shall be forfeited as aforesaid." It is claimed that the court put an erroneous construction upon these provisions of the 48th section, in its charge to the jury.

The point of the objection to the construction which the court gave to the section is, that the fact, or the corpus delicti, to be proved, under the section, is not a mere state of mind, or intent, on the part of the person in whose possession the goods, &c., or the raw materials, are found, to commit, at some time, the wrongful act, as against the government, specified in the section, but is the doing of a certain act, with a certain intent. It is conceded, that, if merely such intent is the thing to be proved, the evidence given in this case as to the former wrongful acts and omissions on the part of the claimant, was not only competent, but was sufficient, if believed by the jury, to establish the intent mentioned in the section and averred in the information. The trial was conducted throughout on the principle, that, to recover, it was only necessary for the government to prove the possession by the claimant, at the time of the seizure, of the manufactured goods and the raw materials, and the finding, in the prescribed situation, of the other personal property proceeded against, and the fact that the manufactured goods were taxable goods, and that the claimant intended to manufacture the raw materials into taxable goods, and that he had the fraudulent intent specified in the section in respect to such taxable goods, manufactured and to be manufactured. It is contended that this view of the statute is erroneous; that the proper construction of so much of the section as precedes the provision in regard to raw materials is, that, when any goods, &c., such as are described, have had taxes imposed on them by the operation of the law, they shall be forfeited if they are sold or removed without the payment of such taxes; that, by the 94th section of the act of June 30, 1864, both as it originally stood (13 Stat. 264), and as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 128), taxes do not become payable on manufactured tobacco, until it is sold, or consumed or used by its manufacturer, or removed for consumption, or for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturer within the United States, and, by the 90th section of the said act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the said act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 125), the tax imposed on the manufacturer of tobacco, snuff and cigars, is held to accrue upon the sale or removal from the place of manufacture, unless removed to a bonded warehouse; that the words, in the 48th section, "found in the possession, or custody, or within the control, of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold or removed by such person or persons," are equivalent to the words "found in the act of being sold or removed," because the tax is imposed in consequence of the sale or removal, and not in consequence of the existence of the purpose to sell or remove; that there must have been a sale or removal, or the goods must be found in the act of being sold or removed, for them to be in the condition prescribed of being goods "on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law;" that there can be no purpose to sell or remove in fraud of the law, or with design to avoid the payment of taxes, without an overt act of sale or removal done or attempted, because the overt act of sale or removal is what causes the taxes to be imposed, and the taxes the payment of which it is supposed there is a design to avoid, are taxes which have accrued or are accruing by the act of sale or removal; that, as a mere purpose in regard to sale or removal does not impose taxes on the goods, and no taxes are imposed until there is an act of sale or removal, done or attempted, the words, "avoid payment of said taxes," can only apply to taxes which have become payable; that a purpose to defraud the revenue of something can only exist in respect to something to which the revenue is at the time entitled; that, in respect to so much of the 48th section as relates to raw materials, and to tools, &c., the provisions mean, that, where a case of forfeiture exists, as specified in the preceding part of the section, in respect to goods on which taxes have become payable, not only may such goods be forfeited, but also all raw materials found in the possession of the same person in whose possession such goods are found, he intending to manufacture such raw materials into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, or with design to evade the payment of said tax, and also all tools, &c., in the place, &c., where such articles or such raw materials are found; that the clauses making up the provisions for forfeiture are not to be read disjunctively, but connectedly, the forfeitures being connected with each other and succeeding each other, when manufactured articles, raw materials, and tools, &c., are seized in the hands of the same person; and that the purpose of the act is to have a statute applicable to all manufacturers whose productions are liable to pay taxes, whereby, whenever any taxes have become due on any of the manufactured articles, and they have become liable to seizure and forfeiture under the 48th section, in the hands of the manufacturer, not only may they be seized, but his raw materials may be seized and forfeited, if his intent is to make them into taxable articles, and to sell or remove such articles without paying the tax on them, and all tools, &c., found on the same premises, may be seized and forfeited.

[3] For the 1st and 2d instructions prayed for by the district attorney, and here referred to, see [Case No. 16,105. See, also, Id. 16,106a.]

In support of the views urged on the part of the claimant as to the proper construction of the 48th section, it is alleged, that, if that section makes a mere intent a cause of forfeiture, it is the first time, in the history of such legislation, that a mere intent has been made a cause of forfeiture. It is also urged, that there is no reason to suppose that congress intended to make the possession of property, the mere possession of which generally is innocent, coupled with an intent to do something wrongful with it at some future time, a cause for the forfeiture of such property; and that a statute which should authorize the seizure and forfeiture of such property, on proof merely of an intent to violate the law in dealing with it in a certain manner at a future time, would be an unreasonable seizure, and in violation of the fourth amendment to the constitution of the United States.

Not only does the 90th section of the act of 1864, as amended by the act of 1866, before referred to, provide, that "the tax imposed upon the manufacturer of tobacco, snuff and cigars shall be held to accrue upon the sale or removal from the place of manufacture, unless removed to a bonded warehouse," but the 61st section of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 152, 153), provides, that "upon tobacco and snuff which shall be manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be collected and assessed the following taxes," and the 81st section of the last named act (Id. 160), contains the same provision in regard to cigars. So, also, by the 94th section of the act of 1864, as amended by the act of 1866, before referred to, taxes do not become payable on any of the manufactured articles specified in that section, until they are sold, or consumed or used by the manufacturer, or removed for consumption. It is quite apparent, from these provisions, that a completed sale, or a completed removal, of the manufactured article, is a necessary preliminary to the accruing, assessment and payment of the tax upon it. Until such completed sale or completed removal has taken place, the manufacturer is not compellable to pay the tax, and it has not accrued so as to be capable of being assessed and collected. If, then, the words "taxes are imposed," in the 48th section, require that the taxable article shall have been sold or removed, so as to cause the tax to have accrued and to be payable upon it, and if those words are equivalent to the words "have accrued and become payable," it is difficult to see how such article can ever be found in the hands of its manufacturer, with the intent to sell or remove it with design to avoid payment of the tax, so as to be subject to forfeiture in his hands, under that section. The section would, under such circumstances, be wholly inapplicable to manufactured articles in the hands of their manufacturer, where the application of the section is most beneficial, and would only apply to such articles after they had gone into the hands of purchasers from him.

The meaning of the words "taxes are imposed," as used in the 48th section, may be deduced from the meaning of the word "imposed," and of kindred words, where used in other portions of the internal revenue laws. Thus, the language, before cited, of the 90th section of the act of 1864, as amended by the act of 1866, is, that "the tax imposed" on the manufacturer of tobacco shall "be held to accrue upon the sale or removal from the place of manufacture." Here, the word "imposed" clearly means "declared to be collectable." The tax declared to be collectable on manufactured tobacco is to be held to accrue and become assessable and payable, on the sale or removal of such tobacco from the place of manufacture. In analogy to this use of the word "imposed," it is proper to say, that, where, in the 48th section, the words "articles on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law" are used, they mean "articles on which taxes are, by the provisions of the law, declared to be collectable, when such articles shall be sold or removed."

Again, the provisions of a subsequent part of the 48th section show what the word "imposed" means, in the previous part of that section, and what the words "subject to tax" mean, in the clause in reference to raw materials intended to be manufactured "into articles of a kind subject to tax." The section, after the forfeiture clauses, proceeds to say: "Any person who shall have in his custody or possession any such goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or objects, subject to tax, as aforesaid, for the purpose of selling the same, with the design of avoiding payment of the taxes imposed thereon, shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars, or not less than double the amount of taxes fraudulently attempted to be evaded, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction." If, in this clause, the words "articles subject to tax" are held to mean "articles on which taxes have accrued and become payable, because of a sale or removal," the clause can have no applicability to a manufacturer of the articles. But, the good sense of the words means "articles on which taxes are declared to be collectable," and, in respect to those, if the purpose exists of selling them with the design of avoiding payment of the taxes "imposed thereon" that is, payment of the taxes declared to be collectable thereon, the penalty attaches. So, the raw materials are materials intended to be manufactured into articles of a kind on which taxes are declared to be collectable. There is every reason to suppose that the word "imposed," in respect to taxes on articles, in the two places in which it is used in the 48th section, and the words "subject to tax," in respect to articles, in the two places in which those words are used in that section, mean the same thing: and there is no reason to suppose the contrary. If that be so, then the words "subject to tax" cannot mean "on which taxes have accrued and become payable because of sale or removal," because, in respect to the clause regarding raw materials, the manufactured articles have no existence, so as to be taxable. The fact, that the expression is "articles of a kind subject to tax," can make no difference, for, the second time the words "subject to tax" are used, the expression is "subject to tax as aforesaid," and the only time the expression "subject to tax" is previously used in the section is in the form of words "of a kind subject to tax."

In order to maintain the theory of the claimant, that the words "are imposed" mean "have accrued and become payable," it is also necessary that the further view should be maintained, that the three clauses of forfeiture are to be read connectedly, and not disjunctively. But, it would seem to be a conclusive objection to reading the clause in regard to raw materials otherwise than disjunctively in respect to the first clause, that the clause in regard to raw materials says, "all raw materials found in the possession of any person or persons," &c., and does not say, "all raw materials found in the possession of such person or persons," &c., referring to the person or persons in whose possession the articles on which taxes are imposed are found. The words of the statute are, "on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law." It is reasonable to suppose that the word "imposed," in the connection in which it is found in this clause, is used in the same sense in which it is used, in a like connection, in other provisions of the same statute, and in kindred provisions of other revenue laws. On examination, it will be found, that the word "imposed," in such connection, is not used in the act of June 30, 1864, and in other revenue laws, in the sense contended for by the claimant. The 173d section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 304), speaks of "the duty imposed by any existing law," and of no duty having been "imposed" "by any former act," and of the duty "imposed" "by the terms of this act;" and the same terms are used in the 70th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 173). The 176th section of the said act of 1864 (13 Stat. 305) speaks of a "tax or duty" "imposed by law." The 96th section (Id. 272) speaks of materials "upon which no duties have been imposed by law." The 97th section (Id. 273) speaks of "duties imposed by law enacted subsequent" to the making of a contract, on articles to be delivered under such contract. The 16th section of the act of March 3, 1865 (Id. 486) speaks of the "duty imposed by any previous act." Section 10 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 150) provides, that "no manufactured wire shall pay a greater tax than that imposed on number twenty wire gauge." Section 11 of the act of March 2, 1867 (Id. 476) speaks of the "taxes now imposed by law" on manufactures of iron. The 1st section of the act of March 2, 1867 (Id. 559) speaks of "the duties now imposed by law" on the articles mentioned in that section; and the 2d section of the same act (Id. 561) speaks of "the duties heretofore imposed by law" on certain articles. The language, before referred to, of the 90th section of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (Id. 125), is very marked, in this respect, where it says, that "the tax imposed upon the manufacturer of tobacco" "shall be held to accrue upon the sale or removal from the place of manufacture," clearly showing that, when the tax or duty is spoken of as "imposed" by the statute, that means that it is declared to be collectable when some event specified shall occur, although the tax or duty does not accrue or become payable on the particular article until the occurring of the event. Many similar instances could be referred to, of such use, in revenue laws, of the words "imposed by the provisions of law," and like words, in respect to taxes and duties.

A use of the words "subject to duty or taxation under the provisions of this act," analogous to the use, in the 48th section, of the words "subject to tax," may be found in the 37th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 238), where provision is made that revenue officers may enter, in the day time, all places where any articles "subject to duty or taxation under the provisions of this act are made, produced, or kept, to examine them, or the accounts required to be kept by their manufacturer respecting them." Under this provision, most certainly, the officers are not restricted to entering a tobacco manufactory, only when the articles made there have been sold or removed, so that the tax has accrued on them.

A reading of the 48th section, giving the usual accepted meaning to the words found therein, seems to me to lead conclusively to the view, that congress intended to forfeit taxable articles, when held, especially by their manufacturer, for the purpose of being sold or removed in fraud of the revenue laws, or with design to avoid the payment of the taxes which would accrue thereon by reason of such sale or removal, and also to forfeit all raw materials when held by a person intending to manufacture them into taxable articles for the purpose of fraudulently selling such articles, or with design to evade the payment of the taxes which would accrue thereon when sold or removed, and also to forfeit all personal property found in the place where any such articles, or any such raw materials, are found; and that possession, with the specified purpose, design or intent, is all that is necessary to work the forfeiture. The provision, in the same section, that the possession of the taxable articles, for the purpose of selling them, with the design of avoiding payment of the taxes, shall subject the possessor to a penalty of not less than double the amount of taxes fraudulently attempted to be evaded, is in harmony with the provisions in regard to forfeiture. The possession for such purpose renders the possessor liable to a penalty of double the amount of the taxes which, on a sale, would accrue on the articles. Such taxes are fraudulently attempted to be evaded when the articles are held for such purpose.

The legislation of congress on the subject shows a uniform design in harmony with this view. The 114th section of the act of July 1, 1862, the first internal revenue act (12 Stat. 487), provided, that "all articles upon which duties are imposed by the provisions of this act, which shall be found in the possession of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold by such person or persons in fraud thereof, and with the design to avoid payment of said duties, may be seized by any collector or deputy collector who shall have reason to believe that the same are possessed for the purpose aforesaid, and the same shall be forfeited to the United States; * * * and any person who shall have in his possession any such articles, for the purpose of selling the same, with the design of avoiding payment of the duties imposed thereon by this act, shall be liable to a penalty," &c. The 48th section of the act of June 30, 1864, as originally passed (13 Stat. 240), carried out the same principle, by re-enacting the provisions of the 114th section of the act of 1862, and extending them, by providing for the forfeiture of raw materials intended to be manufactured into articles to be sold in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with design to evade the payment of duties imposed by the provisions of law, and for the forfeiture of all personal property found in the same place with the articles on which duties are imposed, and intended to be used by the possessor of such raw materials in the fraudulent manufacture of such raw materials. The section was amended by the act of July 13, 1866, to read as before recited, being made more stringent as respected personal property, so as to cover all personal property found in the same place with either the articles or the raw materials, and without reference to the intended use of such personal property.

No direct adjudication is found as to the construction of this section, in respect to the point taken by the claimant. Yet many condemnations have been decreed under it, both in this court and in other courts, where the point was as open and proper to be taken as in this case. But it does not seem to have been raised. There are, however, several cases where the language of the court indicates the view, taken by it of the general scope of the section. In U. S. v. One Still [Case No. 15,954], Mr. Justice Nelson says, that the 48th section is very comprehensive, and was so designed, and that the reason for the seizure of the articles on which taxes are imposed by law, and of the raw materials, is, "for the fraudulent intent of the person in the possession or control of them, that is, an intent to defraud the public revenue by evading the tax." In U. S. v. Thirty-Six Barrels [Id. 16,468], Judge Woodruff says, that the object of the 48th section is "to enable the government to anticipate and prevent the sale or removal, and to proceed to a forfeiture before the overt act of fraud is perpetrated;" that "it is enacted in view of the very great difficulty, if not impracticability, of following distilled liquors, after sale or removal, or of identifying them, if found, and, also, in view of the ease with which they may be passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers;" that "the fraudulent intent or design" of the person in possession of the spirits "is the cause of forfeiture;" that the object of the statute is to "prevent the accomplishment of meditated evasion and fraud;" that "it should be construed, so far as a fair interpretation of its language will permit, in a manner adapted to effect the purposes of its enactment;" that the section "has respect to the intentions, purposes, and designs of the party" in possession, which intentions, purposes, and designs are "the ground of the forfeiture, entirely irrespective of the difficulties which may lie in the way of accomplishing his intention;" and that the terms of the section must not receive "a narrow construction," "not called for by their fair, natural, and legal meaning," but must be construed "so as most effectually to accomplish the intention of the legislature in passing it." The principles laid down by the supreme court of the United States, in its decision in the recent case of U. S. v. 100 Barrels, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 44, seem to me to fully sustain the construction I place upon the provisions of the 48th section.

There seems to me to be no warrant for saying that there is any evidence to be found, in the 48th section, of any intention to make the provision in regard to raw materials dependent upon, and connected with, the provision in regard to taxable articles, and to make a forfeiture of the raw materials depend upon their being seized in the possession of a person in whose possession forfeitable taxable articles are found. The language manifests a plain intention that all raw materials found in the possession of any person who intends to manufacture them into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, or with design to evade the payment of taxes thereon, shall be seized and forfeited, without reference to the question whether manufactured articles of a kind subject to tax are or are not found in the possession of the same person. In such case, all personal property whatsoever, found in the same place, building or inclosure where the raw materials are found, may be seized and forfeited. In the present case, the raw materials were found in the possession of the claimant, and the bill of exceptions states that there was evidence tending to show that he intended to manufacture them into articles of a kind subject to tax by the provisions of the internal revenue law in force at the time, and shows that evidence was given tending to show that the claimant had the purpose of fraudulently selling the manufactured articles to be made out of such raw materials, and designed to evade the payment of the taxes thereon. Such evidence was, in my judgment, sufficient to warrant the verdict condemning the raw materials. If they were properly condemned, then all the taxable manufactured articles, and other items of property, that were seized, were properly condemnable under the description of "all personal property whatsoever," because they were found in the same place with such raw material. In this view, it is of no importance whether any manufactured articles on which taxes had in fact accrued, were or were not found in the possession of the claimant.

Criticism is made on the fact, that the information, after averring the seizure, states that, "prior to said seizure, taxes were imposed, by the provisions of law, upon the said tobacco," that is, the manufactured tobacco, "and the same, being so subject to the payment of taxes as aforesaid, were found," &c.; and, it is urged, that this language of the pleader shows that he interpreted the 48th section as requiring that taxes should have accrued and become payable on such manufactured tobacco, and that, having alleged this fact, it ought to have been proved, and was not proved. But the averment is not fairly susceptible of this interpretation. It goes on to say that such tobacco was found in a certain possession, for a specified purpose, against this 48th section. It refers to the section as the foundation of the forfeiture. As the section does not require that the tax should have accrued or become payable, the words "subject to the payment of taxes as aforesaid," having reference solely to the expression immediately preceding, that taxes were imposed on the tobacco by the provisions of law, are equivalent to no more than the expression "subject to tax as aforesaid," which, as has been shown, is only a synonym for the words "on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law." The allegation, that, "prior to said seizure, taxes were imposed by the provisions of law" on the manufactured tobacco seized, is equivalent to no more than the allegation, that, when such tobacco was seized, it was an article of a kind on which, under the law, a tax could accrue without its being further manufactured.

Legislation equally stringent with that found in the 48th section, for the purpose of preventing meditated fraud, is to be met with in various parts of the internal revenue laws. The 43d section of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 142), provides, that any railroad company, or transportation company, or person, who shall have in possession, with intent to transport, or to cause or procure to be transported, any empty distilled spirits cask having on it a brand or stamp required by law for a cask containing distilled spirits, shall forfeit $300 for each such cask had in possession with such intent. The 72d section of the same act (Id. 156) provides, that any person who shall give away or accept any empty stamped tobacco- or snuff-box, shall be fined $100 and imprisoned for not less than twenty days and not more than one year. The 89th section of the same act (Id. 162) provides, that any person who shall receive, give away, or have in his possession, any cigar tax stamp removed from any box of cigars, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. As, under the 48th section, the corpus delicti, and the only one, is the possession of the specified property, with the specified fraudulent purpose or design, without the doing of any overt act in respect of it, there is no reason why the general principle, that intent may be proved by proving manifestations at prior times of like fraudulent intent in respect of kindred matters, should not be applied to the proving of the fraudulent purpose or design mentioned in the 48th section. In Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342, 361, it is said, that, whenever a fraudulent intention is to be established, collateral facts tending to show such intention are admissible proof. The principle was applied by Judge Woodruff in U. S. v. 36 Barrels [Case No. 16,469], and in U. S. v. 18 Barrels [Id. 15,033]. In the present case the seizure took place on the 25th of March, 1868, and the testimony as to the intent of the claimant in respect of the taxable tobacco and the raw materials seized, was entirely testimony in respect to previous acts of omission and commisison in his establishment, in conducting its business, in its relations to the internal revenue laws, which acts were claimed to have been in violation and fraud of such laws, and to have had in them a fraudulent intent on the part of the claimant. Those acts are concisely summed up in the two requests to charge on the part of the government. They consisted of a failure to keep the required account of tobacco and snuff manufactured from August, 1866, to January, 1868; of the removal for sale, and the removal from the place of manufacture, during that period, of quantities of tobacco and snuff, without any account thereof being kept, as of removals, and without any accurate account of the tobacco so received being kept in the statutory books; of the sale, during that period, of large quantities of manufactured tobacco, without any account of such sales, as sales, being kept in such books; of the sale and removal from the claimant's premises, during all but the last month of that period, of quantities of purchased manufactured tobacco, without any accurate account of such sales or removals being kept in such books; of the rendering to the assistant assessor, during the whole of that period, of untrue and inaccurate abstracts of such sales and removals; of the manufacture of much more chewing tobacco and fine cut shorts in the claimant's manufactory, during 1867, than was declared, on such abstracts, to have been manufactured; of the sale and removal, during 1867, of a large quantity of smoking tobacco, manufactured on said premises, which was not returned for taxation on said abstracts, and of which no account was contained therein or in the statutory books; and of certain acts of the claimant (set forth in the second request to charge on the part of the government, before recited) in respect to the manufacture of "extra long smoking tobacco," and in respect to returning it for taxation, during the period before mentioned, evincing not only a purpose of selling and removing such tobacco in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and an intent to evade the payment of taxes thereon, but resulting in the commission of such fraud and the evasion of the payment of a large amount of taxes.

In respect to all of these acts, except those relating to the "extra long smoking tobacco," the court charged the jury, that, if they believed such acts were done by the claimant, the burden of proof was on the claimant to satisfy them that the tobacco so manufactured on his premises, and sold or removed without due account, return or entry being made thereof in such books and abstracts, in the manner required by law, was not so sold and removed in fraud of the internal revenue laws and with intent to evade the taxes thereon; and that, if the claimant had not so satisfied the jury of his intent respecting the same, they might infer that his intent in respect of the same was fraudulent, and that his possession of the goods in suit was with the like intent. In regard to the acts relating to the manufacture of the "extra long smoking tobacco" and the returning it for taxation, the court charged the jury, that, if they found that such acts were done by the claimant for the purpose of selling and removing such tobacco in fraud of the internal revenue laws and with intent to evade the payment of taxes thereon, they would have a right to infer that the claimant and his agents had the like intent with respect to the property in suit. Elsewhere the court charged the jury, in substance, that, if the acts of the claimant between August, 1866, and January, 1868, in respect to the "extra long smoking tobacco," showed an intent to defraud the government in regard to the tax upon such tobacco, and if his acts during the same period in regard to what was called the Orinoco tobacco, such acts being contrary to law, showed an intent to defraud the government, and if his acts in violating the law in regard to the keeping of the statutory books, and the unlawful and irregular character of the inventories and returns he made, showed an intent not to deal honestly with the government, but to violate the law, the jury had the right to infer that a fraudulent intent existed in regard to the goods on hand in his establishment when it was seized. I perceive no error in these instructions. In criminal cases, the law presumes every unlawful act to have been criminally intended until the contrary appears, and throws on the accused the burden of disproving the intent; and the same presumption arises in civil actions, where the act complained of was unlawful. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 34. In Cook v. Moore, 11 Cush. 213, the question was whether, to prove a wilful concealment of property by the defendant with a fraudulent purpose, contrary to the bankruptcy act of 1841, it was competent to show an intent, prior to the passage of that act, to defraud the plaintiff of his debt by a fraudulent concealment and conveyance of property. The court held that it was. They say: "Whenever the intent of a party forms part of the matter in issue, upon the pleadings, evidence may be given of other acts, not in issue, provided they tend to establish the intent of the party in doing the acts in question. The reason for this rule is obvious. The only mode of showing a present intent is often to be found in proof of a like intent previously entertained.

Particular objection is made to the instruction as to the burden of proof, contained in the first prayer on the part of the government. The acts recited therein were unlawful acts, contrary to the statute, and, therefore, presumed to result in defrauding the government. The instruction was, that, if the unlawful sales or removals of the tobacco, from August, 1866, to January, 1868, were proved, and the unlawful neglects in respect to the not entering such sales and removals in the books, abstracts and returns were proved, then, as the legal presumption therefrom was that such sales and removals took place in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and with intent to evade the taxes on the tobacco, the burden of proof was on the claimant to satisfy the jury that such sales and removals were not in fraud of such laws and with intent to evade such taxes; and that, in view of such legal presumption, if the claimant had not rebutted it, the jury had a right to infer a fraudulent intent in respect to such sales and removals, and also to infer that the claimant's possession of the goods in suit was with the like intent. In addition to the observations already made, I regard the propriety of this instruction as having been sanctioned by Judge Woodruff in U. S. v. 18 Barrels [Case No. 15,033], where, only slight evidence having been given, in behalf of the government, tending to show that the claimant of distilled spirits had not made true and exact entry and return, it was held that this cast the burden on the claimant, to show that he had complied with the statute. In U. S. v. Brewery Utensils [Id. 14,641], it was held by Judge McCandless, that, from a neglect by a brewer to obey the law, an intent to evade its provisions would be presumed, in the absence of any explanation. See, also, Clements v. Moore, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 299; The Luminary, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 407; The Slavers, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 350, 366, 375.

As to the 13th and 14th of the claimant's prayers for instructions, if they are understood as raising the question of the proper construction of the 48th section, that has been passed upon. If they are understood, as it appears from the bill of exceptions the court understood them at the trial, as involving propositions of fact, as to the evidence, addressed to the court, and which were solely questions for the jury, there was no error in declining to charge in accordance with them.

This disposes of all the questions involved in the first four grounds urged as reasons for granting a new trial. It is proper to say, that the point now raised, as to the construction of the 48th section, was not in fact presented to the mind of the court at the trial, and was not raised at the trial otherwise than as it may seem to be involved in some of the exceptions to the charge, and in some of the exceptions to refusals to charge in accordance with requests on the part of the claimant, and which exceptions present it, if at all, in ambiguous language, capable as well of another interpretation as of an interpretation that they raise this point; and that the point is raised by counsel who took no part in the trial.

The fifth ground urged for a new trial is, that the court erred "in instructing the jury that it was immaterial to any issue in this case, what was the lawful rate of tax payable on the said 'extra long smoking tobacco,' embraced in seventeen returns made by the claimant, and in not instructing the jury that the lawful rate of tax payable on the said tobacco was fifteen cents per pound." It is contended, for the claimant, that this tobacco was made partly of leaf and partly of stems, all chopped up together, not sweetened, and put up and sold as smoking tobacco, the stems having undergone a secret process of dyeing, to assimilate them in color to the leaf; that, as it was made in part of stems, it was, under the 94th section of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 133), subject to a tax of only fifteen cents per pound; and that the claimant violated no law in returning such tobacco for tax at fifteen cents per pound. If the lawful rate of tax on such tobacco from and including August 1, 1866, to and including January 1, 1868, embracing the period during which the claimant returned it at fifteen cents per pound, was greater that that rate, it follows that there was not, in the instruction, any error prejudicial to the claimant.

Under the 94th section of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the 1st section of the act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 477), these were the taxes on manufactured tobacco other than snuff, cigars, and chewing tobacco: "On * * * all * * * kinds of manufactured tobacco, not herein otherwise provided for, forty cents per pound. On tobacco twisted by hand, or reduced from leaf into a condition to be consumed, without the use of any machine or instrument, and without being pressed, sweetened, or otherwise prepared, thirty cents per pound. * * * On smoking tobacco of all kinds, and imitations thereof, not otherwise herein provided for, thirty-five cents per pound. On smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, and so sold, fifteen cents per pound." Under those provisions, this "extra long smoking tobacco" was subject to a tax of thirty-five cents per pound. The act made the tax only fifteen cents per pound on smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, made of the inferior part of the tobacco leaf, and having none of the leaf part in it; while on all other manufactured tobacco it imposed taxes of thirty, thirty-five and forty cents per pound. The same distinction is found in the 94th section of the act of June 30, 1864, as originally enacted (Id. 270), where smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems is taxed fifteen cents per pound, and all other manufactured tobacco has taxes imposed on it of twenty-five and thirty-five cents per pound; and in the 75th section of the act of July 1, 1862, as amended by the 1st section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 717), where smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in, or made exclusively of stems, is taxed five cents per pound, and all other manufactured tobacco fifteen and twenty cents per pound; and in the 75th section of the act of July 1, 1862, as originally enacted (Id. 463), where smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems is taxed two cents per pound, smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in, five cents per pound, and all other manufactured tobacco, ten, fifteen, and twenty cents per pound.

Such was the course of legislation on this subject. The 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 133), further amended the 94th section of the act of June 30, 1864, by providing that, on and after the 1st of August, 1866, the following should be the taxes on manufactured tobacco: "On snuff, manufactured of tobacco, or any substitute for tobacco, * * * forty cents per pound. On * * * all * * * kinds of manufactured tobacco, not herein otherwise provided for, * * * forty cents per pound. On tobacco twisted by hand, or reduced from leaf into a condition to be consumed without the use of any machine or instrument, and without being pressed, sweetened or otherwise prepared, and on fine cut shorts, * * * thirty cents per pound. On fine cut chewing tobacco, whether manufactured with the stems in or not, or however sold, * * * forty cents per pound. On smoking tobacco, sweetened, stemmed or butted, * * * forty cents per pound. On smoking tobacco, of all kinds, not sweetened, nor stemmed, nor butted, including that made of stems, or in part of stems, and imitations thereof, * * * fifteen cents per pound." In these provisions, there is the same indication of an intention to tax at a low rate tobacco either made wholly of stems, or having in it all its natural stems, and to tax all other tobacco at a higher rate, the former being taxed at fifteen cents per pound, and all other manufactured tobacco being taxed at thirty and forty cents per pound.

This "extra long smoking tobacco," being manufactured tobacco, was, if not otherwise provided for in the act, taxable at forty cents a pound. So, also, if it was smoking tobacco stemmed or butted, it was taxable at forty cents a pound. It is insisted by the claimant, that, having some stems in it, and not being sweetened, it was taxable at fifteen cents a pound, on and after August 1, 1866. The bill of exceptions shows that the mode of making this "extra long smoking tobacco" was, to take the entire tobacco leaf, and remove from it from one-half to three-fourths in length of the woody central stem that runs through the leaf from end to end, so as to leave in the leaf at its top not enough stem to be noticeable in the product after cutting, and then to cut up together the residuary leaf with stems previously soaked in a certain dye stuff without being sweetened. Prior to August 20, 1866, for several years, the proportion of such residuary leaf to such dyed stem was seven pounds of the former to two pounds of the latter, and, after that date, the proportion of such residuary leaf to such dyed stem was two pounds of the former to one pound of the latter. It having been ascertained, by experiment, that the average proportion, by weight, of the butts or portions of stem extracted from the leaf, in making this tobacco, was one-fourth of the weight of the entire leaf, it was intended, in making this tobacco, after August 20, 1866, to cut up, with a given weight of the residuary leaf, at least as much dyed stems as would equal in weight the average quantity of stems taken out of the leaf. When ready for sale, the stem was not distinguishable from the leaf. In the understanding of tobacco manufacturers, leaf tobacco is "stemmed" when the whole of the central stem has been removed from the leaf; and it is "butted," when the thick end or lower portion of the stem is drawn out of the leaf, leaving more or less of the upper part of the stem still in the leaf. It was not practicable, in the process actually employed by the claimant, to restore or replace the identical portions of stem extracted from the leaf. All of such tobacco returned by the claimant for August, 1866, after the 20th, and for the sixteen succeeding months, was returned by him as liable to a tax of fifteen cents per pound, under the act of July 13, 1866, and was classified, in the returns, as "smoking tobacco, not sweetened, stemmed or butted, including that made of stems," and he paid taxes on it at that rate only.

The contention, on the part of the claimant, is, that the statute says that smoking tobacco made in part of stems, that is, smoking tobacco having in it some stems, and not sweetened, shall pay a tax of only fifteen cents per pound; that this tobacco had some stems in it, and, therefore, was made in part of stems, and was not sweetened; and that, consequently, it was liable to a tax of only fifteen cents per pound. It is urged, for the claimant, that it is immaterial, under the statute, whether the identical stems were put back with the residuary leaf, or whether an equal quantity of stems was put back with it, or whether the same proportion was maintained, in the ultimate product, between stem and leaf, that existed in the tobacco as grown; and that, as long as the tobacco is not sweetened, and is smoking tobacco, and is made wholly of stems, or partly of stems and partly of leaf, it is within the fifteen cents a pound clause.

An analysis of the provisions of the statute will aid in ascertaining its meaning. The words "on smoking tobacco, sweetened, stemmed or butted, a tax of forty cents per pound," mean, "on smoking tobacco manufactured from leaf tobacco which has been sweetened, or stemmed, or butted, a tax of forty cents per pound." The words, "on smoking tobacco, of all kinds, not sweetened, nor stemmed, nor butted, * * * a tax of fifteen cents per pound," mean, "on smoking tobacco manufactured from leaf tobacco which has not been sweetened, and has not been stemmed, and has not been butted, * * * a tax of fifteen cents per pound." This last clause embraces, also, smoking tobacco "made of stems, or in part of stems, and imitations thereof." This "extra long smoking tobacco" was made from leaf tobacco which had been butted, stems separately prepared being afterwards added to the residuary leaf. As smoking tobacco manufactured from butted leaves it was within the forty cents a pound clause. If it had had no separate stems added to the residuary leaf, but had been made solely of the residuary leaf left after butting, it would have had in it at least one quarter in length of the central stem left in the leaf after butting, and thus would have been made "in part of stems," and so been subject to the fifteen cents a pound clause, under the reading of that clause contended for by the claimant, although, being smoking tobacco merely butted, it would clearly have been within the forty cents a pound clause. A construction of the fifteen cents a pound clause, which would put such butted tobacco within that clause, when it is manifest the intention was that it should be solely in the forty cents a pound clause, cannot be admitted, if both clauses are capable of such a construction as will not allow any one article to fall within both of them. I think that the forty cents a pound clause as to smoking tobacco manifestly includes all smoking tobacco in which sweetened leaf is a constituent, and all in which stemmed leaf is a constituent, and all in which butted leaf is a constituent. In direct contradistinction to this, the fifteen cents a pound clause says that smoking tobacco made of tobacco leaves in their natural state as to stem and leaf, and not at all sweetened, and in which stemmed leaf is not a constituent, and in which butted leaf is not a constituent, shall pay only fifteen cents a pound tax. It will not do to go outside of the plain language of the statute to open wide a door to fraud, by saying that you may butt the leaves, and then restore other butts equal in quantity to the removed butts, and call the product tobacco not butted; or stem the leaves, and then restore other stems equal in quantity to the removed stems, and call the product tobacco not stemmed. The stem is the least valuable part of the tobacco. It is allowed to be cut up in and with and as a part of the leaf as it grew, as smoking tobacco, at the low rate of tax. If it is so cut up, there is sure to be in the product a certain average quantity of stem. If the stem or butt is allowed to be removed, what is left becomes at once more valuable than the whole was, and liable to the forty cents a pound tax; and it cannot for a moment be supposed that congress intended that the putting back a part of the removed stem or butt should reduce the tobacco to the fifteen cents a pound clause, while the manufacturer would be able to impose on the public by selling the product as one of a quality taxable at forty cents a pound.

In view of these considerations, and in harmony with them, an interpretation can be given to the words, "including that made of stems, or in part of stems, and imitations thereof," entirely consistent with the language, and not open to the objection of including within the fifteen cents a pound clause smoking tobacco already clearly put into the forty cents a pound clause. The stems being the least valuable part, congress first provided, in the fifteen cents a pound clause, that smoking tobacco made by cutting up the natural leaf, and, therefore, including all the stem which grew in the leaf, should pay only fifteen cents a pound. It then passed to an inferior grade of smoking tobacco, by providing that smoking tobacco made wholly of stems, without any admixture of leaf, should pay only fifteen cents a pound. It then passed to a still lower grade, by providing that smoking tobacco made, as to part of it, of tobacco stems, and, as to the rest of it, of imitations of tobacco stems, should pay only fifteen cents per pound. If the words "in part of stems" are to be so construed, as contended by the claimant, as to put into the fifteen cents a pound clause smoking tobacco having but a small quantity of stem in it, and the rest nearly all pure leaf, making a product nearly equal, perhaps, in quality, to stemmed leaf paying forty cents a pound, we not only have congress opening the way to the government's being defrauded readily of twenty-five cents a pound on large quantities of smoking tobacco, but we have it making an enactment which allows, as said before, smoking tobacco made of butted leaf and having in it some stems to be within both the forty cents a pound clause and the fifteen cents a pound clause. The words "in part of stems, and imitations thereof," would naturally indicate a lower grade of tobacco than that "made of stems," whereas, on the interpretation contended for by the claimant, a grade of tobacco nearly up to pure stemmed leaf may be included in the words "in part of stems." The words "in part of stems, and imitations thereof," have no other meaning than if they read "of stems in part and imitations thereof," that is, of stems partly, and, as to the rest of the constituents, of imitations of stems; and no other meaning than if they read "in part of stems, and in part of imitations thereof." The words are not happily chosen, but it is not possible, in my judgment, to give them a meaning which would allow this "extra long smoking tobacco" to have been subject to any other tax than that of forty cents a pound.

Not only is this construction in harmony with the prior legislation of congress in regard to manufactured tobacco, but subsequent legislation confirms these views. The 61st section of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 153), imposes a tax of sixteen cents per pound "on all smoking tobacco exclusively of stems, or of leaf with all the stems in, and so sold, the leaf not having been previously stripped, butted, or rolled, and from which no part of the stems have been separated by sifting, stripping, dressing, or in any other manner, either before, during, or after the process of manufacturing, on all fine cut shorts, the refuse of fine cut chewing tobacco which has passed through a riddle of thirty-six meshes to the square inch, by process of sifting, and on all refuse scraps and sweepings of tobacco;" and on all other manufactured tobacco and snuff a tax of thirty-two cents per pound.

The court charged the jury, that it was not necessary to determine what was the proper interpretation of the fifteen cents clause in the act of 1866, or under what head in that act the "extra long smoking tobacco" fell. It also charged the jury, in accordance with the first proposition on the part of the claimant, that, if they should believe that the returns for taxation, of the "extra long smoking tobacco," between August, 1866, and the date of seizure were made in good faith and with an honest belief, on the part of the claimant and his agents concerned in the preparation of said returns, that said tobacco was liable to the fifteen cents rate of duty, and to no other or higher rate, then, even though said tobacco was, by law, liable to the forty cents rate of duty, the jury could not, for that cause, find a verdict for the government, under section 48. But the court refused to charge, as requested by the claimant, that the "extra long smoking tobacco," if composed of both stem and leaf, or if made in part of stems, or if it contained a quantity of stem as great as, or greater than, that which grew with the leaf contained in said tobacco, was liable to a tax of only fifteen cents per pound. Although it may have been erroneous to charge the jury, as was done in substance, that it was immaterial to any issue in this case what was the lawful rate of tax on the "extra long smoking tobacco," yet, as such lawful rate was, in fact, forty cents a pound, the error, if any, was prejudicial only to the government, and not to the claimant, and it was not erroneous to not instruct the jury that the lawful rate of tax payable on such tobacco was fifteen cents per pound.

The sixth ground urged for a new trial is, that the court erred "in instructing the jury that it was illegal for the claimant to return for tax the Orinoco tobacco in the bill of exceptions mentioned, under the circumstances therein mentioned," and "in instructing the jury that they could infer from the transactions in the bill of exceptions described an intent to defraud the revenue thereby." The facts in regard to this Orinoco tobacco, as set out in the bill of exceptions, are these: From a period prior to March, 1865, and down to April and May, 1867, the claimant had in his factory, stored in its lofts, 7,000 pounds of smoking tobacco, called "pressed Orinoco tobacco," manufactured by him, being leaves having all the stems in, and the leaves not having been sweetened or butted or stripped from the stems. In his monthly return for March, 1865, of sales and removals of manufactured tobacco during that month, he returned said 7,000 pounds as sold during that month, and subject to a tax of twenty-five cents per pound, under the act of June 30, 1864, and paid tax on it at that rate. In his book of sales, under date of March 8, 1865, appeared an entry of a sale of $60,000 worth of manufactured tobacco (including the said 7,000 pounds) to Kearney & Waterman, a commission paper house. A bill of the goods was made out to Kearney & Waterman, but the goods were never delivered to them, and were not removed from the factory. The claimant himself testified, that the goods were never intended to be delivered to Kearney & Waterman; that it was understood between him and Kearney & Waterman that the goods were sold and bought back; that this proceeding was for the purpose of returning the said goods as sold, in his monthly return for taxation for March, 1865, in order to avoid the payment of an increased rate of taxation to which said goods would be liable under the act of March 3, 1865, which was to take effect April 1, 1865; that, prior to said transaction with Kearney & Waterman, he consulted with some members of the senate committee on finance, and with several members of the house committee of ways and means, as to whether, in respect of goods on hand when the said act of March 3, 1865, should go into effect, he would have a right to return the same for taxation under the act of June 30, 1864, and was advised by them that he would have such right; and that he had no purpose to defraud the government, but considered that such a transaction warranted him in returning the goods as sold. The 7,000 pounds of Orinoco tobacco remained in the claimant's factory until April and May, 1867, when he sent it to California for sale. When it was so removed for sale he did not return it for taxation, and he did not keep any account, in the statutory book, of such removal for sale of such tobacco. If it had been then returned, it would have been liable to a tax of only fifteen cents a pound. Under the 94th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 270), it was liable to a tax of twenty-five cents per pound, as "smoking tobacco, manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stem." By the amendment made by the 1st section of the act of March 3, 1865 (Id. 477), to the 94th section of the act of 1864, which amendment was to take effect on and after the 1st of April, 1865, it would have been liable to a tax of thirty-five cents per pound, as being smoking tobacco not made exclusively of stems. This rate of tax on it continued until August 1, 1866, after which date, by the amendment made to the 94th section of the act of 1864, by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 133), the tax on it was fifteen cents per pound, as smoking tobacco, not sweetened, nor stemmed, nor butted; and that was the rate of tax on it in April and May, 1867, when it was removed to California for sale.

On this state of facts the court charged the jury, that this transaction of the claimant's was illegal; that it was illegal to return the tobacco for taxation in March, 1865, because it had not been sold or removed for consumption; that, under the 94th section of the act of 1864, under which the tobacco was returned for taxation in March, 1865, the tax of twenty-five cents a pound was leviable, collectable, and payable on the tobacco only when it was sold, or consumed or used by its manufacturer, or removed for consumption or for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturer within the United States or territories thereof; that there was no real sale of the tobacco in March, 1865; and that a removal for consumption, as defined in the 91st section of the act of 1864 (13 Stat. 263), required that there should be a removal of the tobacco from the premises of the manufacturer, in good faith, with a then present intention to have it consumed, as against the will of the manufacturer and owner of it. On the trial it was contended, for the claimant, that, as he had returned this tobacco in March, 1865, and paid a tax on it of twenty-five cents a pound, he was under no obligation to make a return of it afterwards and pay another tax upon it, especially if, at the time it was afterwards sold or removed for consumption, the tax on it was fifteen cents a pound; and that it was lawful for the claimant to return this tobacco for taxation in March, 1865, and pay a tax on it then. In support of these views, the 70th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 173), was referred to, which was in force when this tobacco was removed from the claimant's factory in April and May, 1867. That section provides, that "all manufactures and productions on which a duty was imposed by either of the acts repealed by this act"

(which includes the provisions of the act of June 30, 1864, imposing duties on tobacco, and which were the provisions in force in March, 1865, when this tobacco was returned for taxation, and also includes the provisions of the 9th section of that act, as amended by the act of March 3, 1865, and which latter provisions were in force, taxing tobacco, from April 1, 1865, to August 1, 1866), "which shall be in the possession of the manufacturer or producer, or of his agent or agents, on the day when this act takes effect," August 1, 1866, "the duty imposed by any such former act not having been paid, shall be held and deemed to have been manufactured and produced after such date." The effect of this provision, in respect to this tobacco, was contended by the claimant to be, that, although this tobacco was in his possession, as its manufacturer, on the 1st of August, 1866, yet it could not be deemed to have been manufactured on or after August 1, 1866, because the duty imposed on it by the act of June 30, 1864, had been paid in March, 1865. But the court charged the jury, that, as no tax was leviable, collectable or payable on this tobacco, under the act of 1864, until it was sold or removed for consumption, the case was not one where a duty imposed by that act had been paid, within the meaning of the provision of the 70th section of the act of 1866; that the claimant had no right to return this tobacco for taxation at twenty-five cents a pound, especially when he acknowledged that he did so to get rid of the coming thirty-five cents a pound tax, and when he had an intent to commit a fraud on the government; and that the policy of the law was manifest, not to permit tax-paid goods, unsold, to be kept in masses on the premises of their manufacturer. In reference to this Orinoco tobacco, the court further charged the jury, as requested by the claimant, that, even if they should find that a fraudulent intent existed in the mind of the claimant at the time of making the return of such tobacco in March, 1865, that fact of itself would not justify them in finding the existence of a fraudulent intention on his part in respect to the property proceeded against, at the time that property was found or seized; that, if they should find that a fraudulent act was committed by the claimant in 1865, in respect to property then in his possession, that alone, unless supported by other evidence, was not sufficient to warrant them in finding the existence of a fraudulent intent on his part in regard to the property found in his possession in 1868, and would not warrant a verdict of condemnation; that, if he paid the twenty-five cents a pound tax on this tobacco in 1865, he became liable to pay no additional tax on it by reason of its shipment to California in 1867; that if, when he shipped it to California, he believed that all the tax due on it to the government had been paid, his failure to return it for taxation on such shipment was no evidence of fraudulent intent on his part; and that, if in March, 1865, when he paid the tax, he believed that such tax was due, he could have had no fraudulent intent, but it must have been the payment of a tax which he honestly believed at the time he had a right to pay, and not the payment of a tax merely because it was going to be raised the next day to thirty-five cents a pound.

It is contended, on the part of the claimant, that it was not unlawful for him to return this Orinoco tobacco for taxation in March, 1865, and pay upon it at that time a tax of twenty-five cents a pound; that the fact of the so-called sale to Kearney & Waterman is an immaterial and irrelevant fact; that the motive which governed the claimant in paying the tax before the 1st of April, 1865, instead of waiting until a future day, is immaterial; that he had a lawful right to pay it, even though he did so for the purpose of avoiding the higher duty that was to go into effect on the 1st of April, 1865; that any person holding property on which a tax will become due on the doing of some act by him, such as a sale or a removal of such property, may himself dispense with the doing of that act, and tender and pay the tax to the government; that the paying of the tax to the government is waiver of the necessity of doing the act on the doing of which the tax would properly accrue; that the act of sale or removal, considered as a prerequisite to the accruing of the tax, is an act not in the interest of the government, but an act in the interest of the tax-payer, and prescribed for his convenience, and, therefore, an act which he may disclaim or waive the doing of, by anticipating the payment of the tax; that no harm can result to the government from an accumulation of tax-paid manufactured articles in the hands of their manufacturer; and that what the claimant did in regard to this Orinoco tobacco has no tendency to show that he intended to commit a fraud on the government.

The proposition advanced on the part of the claimant is, that, although the statute provides that a certain tax shall become payable on manufactured tobacco when it shall be sold or removed, and the government cannot enforce the payment of such tax by the manufacturer until the tobacco shall be actually sold or removed, the manufacturer may lawfully pay the tax on it, as sold or removed, although it is not sold or removed. Of course, if he may do so at all, he may do so in view of the coming into operation of a higher tax on the article, and thus secure an advantage over other manufacturers, in respect of tobacco in fact sold or removed after the coming into operation of the higher tax. In this case, the claimant made a false representation to the government. He returned the tobacco as sold when it was not sold. The return was sworn to as true when it was not true; the tax was received on the faith of the representation that the tobacco had been sold; the tax could not accrue until the tobacco had been sold or removed; an increased tax of ten cents a pound was to go into effect the next day; and it is seriously contended that this was a lawful and honest transaction, that the claimant was only waiving and dispensing with a restriction that was for his benefit and convenience, that, if he chose to pay the tax without selling or removing the tobacco, the government has no cause of complaint, and that there was nothing in the transaction showing an intent to defraud the government. No principle that has ever been applied to the interpretation of a revenue statute sanctions this doctrine. There is a mutuality in the provisions for taxation. The government can enforce the tax only under certain circumstances. The non-payment of it is unlawful only when those circumstances exist. E converso, the payment of it is lawful only, when those circumstances exist. Otherwise, the claimant would have had a right to compel the officers of the government to receive the tax although the tobacco had not been sold or removed. He did not, however, claim any such right at the time. He falsely represented that the tax had in fact accrued because the tobacco had been sold. He paid the money on that false pretence. There was no power in the collector to receive the tax, except as a tax on tobacco sold. If the tobacco had been sold afterwards, at a time when the tax on it was thirty-five cents a pound, the government could not have been prevented from collecting the additional ten cents a pound tax on it, by the fact that the twenty-five cents a pound had been received on it by the collector, on the false representation that it had been sold before that amount had been paid on it.

The course pursued by the claimant in regard to this Orinoco tobacco was not warranted by any statute in force at the time of the transactions of March, 1865. The 70th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 173), was enacted long afterwards. This Orinoco tobacco was in the possession of the claimant on the 1st of August, 1866, when that act took effect, but the duty imposed on it by former acts had not been paid, within the meaning of such 70th section. It was, therefore, to be deemed to have been manufactured on or after August 1, 1866. In the special sense in which the word "imposed" is used in the 70th section, in connection with the words "not having been paid," the tax may properly be said not to have been "imposed" in such special sense, by the 1st of August, 1866. The provision means, that, where the tax, declared by the former act to be collectable, has been paid when enforceable and payable, the taxable articles in the hands of a manufacturer on the 1st of August, 1866, on which such tax has so been paid, shall not be deemed to have been manufactured on or after the 1st of August, 1866; but, otherwise, they shall. In this sense, the word "imposed" may properly be regarded as having a different meaning, in the phrase, "the duty imposed by any such former act not having been paid," from that which it has in the 48th section of the act of June 30, 1864, where it is used merely in the phrase, "imposed by the provisions of law," without any reference to the payment of the tax or to the time when it becomes payable. The succeeding provision in the 70th section of the act of 1866, to the effect, that "whenever, by the terms of this act, a duty is imposed upon any articles, goods, wares, or merchandise, manufactured or produced, upon which no duty was imposed by either of said former acts, it shall apply to such as were manufactured or produced, and not removed from the place of manufacture or production, on the day when this act takes effect," shows the intention of congress in respect to the whole subject. It was, that where manufactured articles were taxable by former laws, and the taxes had accrued and been paid on them, they should not be taxable under the new law; that where they were not taxable by former laws, they should, if taxable by the new law, be so taxable, although manufactured before the new law went into effect, provided they were not removed from the place of their manufacture at the time the new law went into effect; that where accrued taxes had been paid on manufactured articles taxable by the former laws, such articles should not be regarded as manufactured under the new law; and that where manufactured articles not taxable by the former laws had been removed from the place of their manufacture, they should not be regarded as manufactured under the new law.

I see, therefore, no error in the instruction to the jury that it was illegal for the claimant to return the Orinoco tobacco for tax, in March, 1865, under the circumstances set forth in the bill of exceptions, and no error in instructing them that they could infer from the transactions in respect to such tobacco an intent to defraud the revenue thereby, especially in view of the fact, that the court, in compliance with the fourth prayer of the claimant, instructed the jury that the existence of a fraudulent intent in the mind of the claimant, at the time of making return of this tobacco, in March, 1865, would not of itself justify them in finding the existence of a fraudulent intent on his part in respect to the property in suit, and that the court, in compliance with the fifth prayer of the claimant, instructed the jury that the commission of a fraudulent act by the claimant in 1865, in respect to property then in his possession, was not, alone, unless supported by other evidence, sufficient to warrant them in finding the existence of a fraudulent intent on his part in regard to the property in suit, and that the court, in compliance with the third prayer of the claimant, instructed the jury that fraudulent intent and fraudulent acts long prior to the time of the seizure of the property in suit, would not warrant a verdict of condemnation, unless supported by evidence of fraudulent intent or fraudulent acts at a period nearly coincident with the time of seizure, and that, if, for the ten months next prior to the seizure, the claimant properly made returns and paid taxes upon his manufactures, the jury might fairly infer therefrom a discontinuance of any fraudulent intent which he might have had previously.

The seventh ground advanced for a new trial is, that the court erred "in instructing the jury that, because the claimant did not keep in book form a separate account of the tobacco manufactured by him in 1867 and 1868, he committed a violation of law from which the jury could infer an intent to sell the manufactured tobacco seized in this case without paying the taxes that might be due thereon, &c." It is admitted, by the claimant, that the 90th section of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 124), provides, that every tobacco manufacturer shall keep in book form an accurate account of the quantity of tobacco he manufactures, and shall return a sworn inventory every year of the quantity of tobacco held or owned by him on the 1st day of January in such year, setting forth the various kinds of articles manufactured by him separately from those purchased by him, and shall return monthly a sworn abstract of his purchases, sales and removals. The section goes on to provide, that, in case of refusal or neglect to return the inventory, or the abstract, or to keep the account, the manufacturer shall forfeit $500, to be recovered, with costs of suit. It is contended, that because this penalty is imposed for a neglect to keep the account in book form of manufactured tobacco, therefore, the fact of such neglect cannot be resorted to as collateral evidence from which to infer an intent to defraud, within the 48th section, in respect to the property in suit; and that, because the neglect to keep such an account is not an offence of the same class or character with the offence sought to be established under the 48th section, it cannot be resorted to as collateral evidence, in regard to an intent respecting the property in suit. The court charged, that the claimant violated the law in not keeping an account of goods manufactured by him, and that the keeping of such account was necessary in order to enable him truly to make up the annual inventory required to be returned. This neglect in keeping the account, in connection with certain alleged discrepancies between the inventories for 1867 and 1868 and the monthly returns, and with the transactions in regard to the Orinoco tobacco, and with the accumulation in the hands of the claimant of a large quantity of tax-paid tobacco manufactured by him, which had never been sold or removed, were submitted to the jury as circumstances which, if proved, warranted the inference of an intent throughout, on the part of the claimant, not to deal honestly with the government, but to violate the law, and also the further inference that he had a fraudulent intent in regard to the goods in suit. Under the rule before stated in regard to what is proper evidence on the question of intent, I see no error in these instructions. All the unlawful acts and omissions of the claimant as a manufacturer of tobacco, in the discharge of his duties as such towards the government under the internal revenue laws, were proper evidence to be taken into consideration by the jury, and if they believed, from the evidence, that, by such acts and omissions, he intended to defraud the government, they had a right to infer a like intent in regard to the property in suit. The instructions throughout proceeded upon the express statement to the jury that unlawful acts and omissions were nothing, unless the jury believed that there was in them an intent to defraud.

The fact of the imposition of a penalty for the mere neglect to keep the account, without any intent to defraud, cannot have the effect to remove from consideration the intent in a neglect, if such intent was one to defraud; and an intent to defraud in neglecting to keep an account of goods manufactured, is an intent of no different quality, class or character from an intent to defraud in selling or removing manufactured goods without paying the taxes on them.

The eighth ground for a new trial is, that the court erred "in instructing the jury that it was illegal for the claimant to return for tax the goods removed from his manufactory to his retail department, before such goods had been actually sold." The instruction was, that it was unlawful for the claimant to return for tax, on a certain day, a quantity of tobacco manufactured by him and not sold or removed from his premises, and then take it into his retail department on the same premises, and sell it by retail there over his retail counter, without keeping any record of such sales, and without returning any abstract of such sales. It was shown that the claimant had done this. This instruction involves the same question before considered in regard to the right of the claimant to pay taxes at his pleasure on masses of tobacco manufactured by him and not sold or removed; and the further question of his right to sell tobacco manufactured by him, and not before sold or removed, and to omit any record or return of it as sold when it was in fact sold, because he had previously falsely returned it as sold or removed. In this connection, the court instructed the jury that, if they should believe that the mode of returning for taxation the goods sold over the retail counter, by returning them at the time they were transferred to such retail counter, was adopted for the convenience of the claimant, and used without any fraudulent intent, in the business of the claimant, as a manufacturer, such fact furnished no evidence in support of a verdict of condemnation in this case; that the mere fact that what the claimant did was unlawful amounted to nothing; that if, it being so unlawful, the jury believed there was a fraudulent intent in it, it was to be taken into consideration; and that, if the jury believed there was no fraudulent intent in it, it was not to be taken into consideration. It appears, by the bill of exceptions, that the government gave evidence tending to prove that, during the period from August 1, 1866, to January 1, 1868, large quantities of manufactured tobacco were sold and removed from his factory by the claimant, without due return thereof for taxation and payment of the taxes thereon, as required by law. In view of this fact, and of the neglect of the claimant to keep or return any account of the sales of the goods so removed to his retail department, as sales therein, and of the untruth of his returns, returning, as sold or removed, goods which were not sold and were not removed from his premises, or, in the sense of the law, from the place, street or number where his manufacturing of them was carried on, and of the opportunities for fraud afforded by the course adopted by him, it was for the jury to say what was the intent of the claimant in adopting such course, as bearing on his intent in reference to the goods in suit.

I have reviewed this case at great length because of the large amount of property involved in it, its importance to the parties, and the earnestness with which the grounds urged for a new trial were pressed upon me by the learned counsel for the claimant. But I am unable to see that any error was committed in any of the particulars urged, and, therefore, the motion must be denied.

[A motion in arrest of judgment was also overruled. Case No. 16,106a. Upon appeal the judgment was affirmed by unreported decisions of the circuit court. See Id. 16,104, 16,104a.]

Case No. 16,106a.

UNITED STATES v. QUANTITY OF TOBACCO.

[5 Ben. 457; 16 Int. Rev. Rec. 132; 15 Int. Rev. Rec. 19.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 19, 1872.[2]

INTERNAL REVENUE—FORFEITURE—FORM OF VERDICT.

1. In an action brought to forfeit, for violation of the internal revenue acts, a quantity of manufactured tobacco, and a quantity of raw materials, and certain tools and other property, the jury rendered a verdict "in favor of the United States, condemning the goods." On a motion to arrest judgment on the verdict: Held, that the verdict was a verdict in favor of the United States on each of the three issues presented to the jury.

2. The words "condemning the goods" did no harm, but might be rejected as surplusage.

3. Under the 32d section of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 91), the court was authorized to give judgment as the right appeared, without regarding any imperfection or want of form in the verdict, if such had existed.

[This was an information of forfeiture against a quantity of tobacco claimed by C. H. Lilienthal. Upon the trial a verdict of condemnation was returned. Case No. 16,105. A motion for a new trial was afterwards denied (Case No. 16,106), and the claimant has now moved in arrest of judgment.]

George T. Curtis, for the motion.

Thomas Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., opposed.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an information brought by the United States, in a cause of seizure on land, under the internal revenue laws of the United States. The information alleges, that, on the 25th of March, 1868, a collector of internal revenue, who is named, "seized the following described property, for a forfeiture incurred under the laws of the United States, that is to say, a quantity of manufactured tobacco, and certain tools, vessels, utensils, implements, instruments, etc., etc., being all the personal property found at the tobacco manufactory of C. H. Lilienthal, 221 Washington street, and now has the same in custody within such Southern district, as forfeited to the United States for the following causes: That, prior to said seizure, taxes were imposed by the provisions of law upon the said tobacco, and the same, being so subject to the payment of taxes, as aforesaid, were found by the said collector in the possession and custody, and within the control, of some person or persons to the said attorney unknown, for the purpose of being sold and removed by such person or persons in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and with design to avoid payment of said taxes, against the 48th section of the act of congress, approved June 30th, 1864, entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' as amended by the act of July, 13th, 1866; that the said articles of raw material were found in the possession of some person or persons to the said attorney unknown, the said person or persons then and there intending to manufacture the same into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, and with design to avoid the payment of said tax, against the 48th section aforementioned, as amended as aforesaid; that the said tools, implements, instruments, and personal property were found in the place or building, and within certain yards and enclosures, where said tobacco and said raw materials were found as aforesaid, whereby they became liable to forfeiture by the provisions of the 48th section aforesaid, as amended as aforesaid." The information then avers, that, "by reason thereof, and by force of the statutes in such case made and provided, the aforementioned goods, wares, and merchandise became and are forfeited to the use in the said statutes provided." The prayer is, "that due process issue in that behalf, as well of attachment to bring said property within the custody of the court, as of monition to all parties in interest; * * * and, due proceedings being had thereon, that, for the causes aforesaid, the said goods, wares, and merchandise be condemned by decree of forfeiture, and the proceeds of the sale, or such other disposition thereof as the court shall direct, distributed according to law." On the 4th of April, 1868, a claim to the property seized was filed, entitled, "A quantity of manufactured tobacco, &c., &c., found at No. 221 Washington street, asm. The United States." The claim says: "And now, Christian H. Lilienthal, owner of the abovenamed property, intervening for the interest of himself in the said property, appears * * * and makes claim to the said property, &c., as the same are attached by the marshal, under process of this court, at the instance of the United States; and * * * avers that he was in possession of the said property at the time of the attachment thereof, and that he is the true and bona fide owner of the said property, and that no other person is the owner thereof; wherefore, he prays to defend accordingly." The monition to the marshal commanded him to attach the property, by commanding him to attach "the said goods, wares, merchandise, and articles," which were thereinbefore described by the same words as in the information. The return of the marshal was, that he had attached "the quantity tobacco, &c.," described in the monition. The answer, which was filed on the 4th of June, 1868, says: "And now, Christian H. Lilienthal, the claimant of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, for answer to the libel of information filed against the same, comes and answers the said information as follows: The said claimant denies that the said goods, wares, and merchandise, or any part thereof, became or are forfeited in the manner and form in the said information alleged." On the 13th of April, 1868, an order was made, entitled in the case as one against "a quantity of manufactured tobacco, &c., factory of C. H. Lilienthal, 221 Washington street," appointing three appraisers, on motion of the counsel for the claimant, "to appraise the value of the property proceeded against herein," and directing that "the said property" be released to the claimant on his filing due claim and giving bond in double the appraised value, to be approved according to law. The report of the appraisers, entitled in the case as one against "a quantity of manufactured tobacco, &c., found at the factory of C. H. Lilienthal, No. 211 Washington street," and filed May 1st, 1868, says: "The undersigned, having been duly appointed and sworn as appraisers to appraise the value of the property proceeded against herein, do report that we have examined and appraised said property, and do find that said property (as per schedule hereto annexed) is worth the sum of one hundred and four thousand three hundred and ninety-one dollars seventy-eight cents ($104,391 78)." A schedule of appraisement of values by items is annexed to the report. On the 12th of June, 1868, an order was made, entitled in the case as one against "a quantity of manufactured tobacco, &c., found in the factory of C. H. Lilienthal, 221 Washington street," ordering, on the motion of the proctor for the claimant, that "the said property" be released to the claimant upon his giving bond in the appraised value, to be approved according to law, instead of in double that amount.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 15 Int. Rev. Rec. 19, contains only a partial report.]

[2] [Affirmed by the circuit court. Case unreported.]

The issues joined in the cause were tried before the court and a jury, and the minutes of the court, of the 8th of May, 1871, state, that, after the charge of the court to the jury, they retire, and, upon their return, say, "that they find for the United States, condemning the goods, and so they say all:" and that then it was ordered that the claimant have thirty days from that date to make a case, or turn the same into a bill of exceptions. [See Case No. 16,105.]

No judgment has yet been entered on such verdict, and now the claimant moves that judgment on the information be arrested, and that the trial be declared to have been a mistrial, (1) because no verdict of the jury was recorded or filed before the jury were discharged; (2) because no verdict of the jury was returned before the jury were discharged; (3) because, when the jury returned into court, after considering of their verdict, and were inquired of, by order of the court, if they had agreed upon their verdict, it appears by the minutes of the clerk that the answer was, "They find for the United States, condemning the goods," and no other or different answer was made by the jury before they were discharged, and no other or different record was made thereon before the jury were discharged, and the jury were discharged and separated immediately after they had made the answer aforesaid, and the answer of the jury, so minuted, is not, and was not, a verdict upon the issues put to the jury under the information and the answer or pleas of the claimant, lawful and sufficient to authorize the rendition and entry by the court of a judgment of forfeiture of the property seized, or any part thereof.

The objection is, not that the verdict received and recorded—that the jury "find for the United States, condemning the goods"—was not received, and recorded in those words, by the court, in the minutes, before the jury separated or were discharged, but, that such verdict is not a verdict on which a judgment of forfeiture of the property seized, or any part thereof, can be rendered by the court.

The ground urged in support of the motion is, that, by the pleadings, three distinct issues were raised: one as to the manufactured tobacco; one as to the articles of raw material; and one as to the tools, implements, instruments, and personal property; that the answer denies a forfeiture of the property, or of any part of it, in manner and form alleged in the information, and therefore traverses each allegation of the information; that the verdict does not find the facts of each or of any one of the issues on which the judgment of forfeiture depends; and that the verdict does not embrace enough to enable the court to amend it, or to render a judgment in accordance with the issues. It is claimed, as a rule of law, that, where the issue involves facts which govern the right of the plaintiff to have judgment in his favor, the verdict must find those facts, or no judgment can be rendered; and that, in the present case, the verdict finds no fact whatever under either of the distinct issues. It is also claimed, that, although, under the 32d section of the act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 91), the court has the power to cure defects in the forms of verdicts, the verdict must be substantially sufficient to enable the court to render a judgment in accordance with the issues; that the statute cannot reach this case; that the verdict does not enable the court to see that the jury intended to find one, or two, or all three of the issues for the United States; that the verdict is as consistent with a finding of one only, as with a finding of two or three, and as consistent with the finding of all as of one; that, to enter a judgment of forfeiture of all the three kinds of property, on the assumption that there was but one issue, which comprehended all the property seized, and that such issue has been found for the United States, would contradict the pleadings, the evidence, and the justice of the case; that, under the information, and according to the statute, the raw materials cannot be forfeited because the manufactured articles are proved to be subject to forfeiture, nor can the tools, &c., be forfeited because the manufactured articles and the raw materials are forfeited, unless it is proved that the tools, &c., were found in the same place with the manufactured articles or the raw materials; that, although there was evidence, on the trial, that the claimant was a manufacturer and seller of articles of a kind subject to tax, and that articles of such a kind were found in his possession, and that he had, in regard to them, an intent to sell them without paying the tax on them, the verdict does not find any one of those facts, or contain anything that enables the court to see that the jury intended to find those facts; that, although there was evidence, on the trial, that raw materials of the kind used by the claimant in his business were found in his possession, and that he intended to manufacture them into articles of a kind subject to tax, and intended to sell such articles without paying the tax on them, the verdict does not find any one of those facts, or show that the jury intended to find for the United States on the issue as to the raw materials, because their verdict is just as good for the first issue as for the second; that, as to the tools, &c., there was no evidence that they were found in the same place with the manufactured articles or the raw materials, and the verdict finds nothing that enables the court to see that the jury intended to find the third issue for the United States; that, if the jury had said that they had found for the United States on all the issues, the verdict, though bad in form, could have been cured; that the verdict does not affirm, or purport to affirm, all the issues, and the court cannot conjecture that the jury intended to affirm all the issues; that the substantial meaning of the verdict is not manifest, as it might have been returned on only one issue as well as on two or three issues, and the court has no means of determining on which issue to render judgment; and that the indeterminate character of the verdict further appears by the words, "condemning the goods," leaving it doubtful whether the jury intended all the articles seized, or a part only, and, if a part only, which part, there having been evidence which, under the instructions of the court, might have warranted a verdict for the United States on the first issue, or on the second issue, but no evidence that would have warranted a verdict for the United States on the third issue.

I have detailed at some length the views urged on the part of the claimant, in order that it may be seen that they are understood. But I am unable to appreciate their force, as applied to the facts of this case. It is entirely clear, that "the property" and "the personal property" spoken of in the information as seized, and "the aforementioned goods, wares, and merchandise" spoken of in the information as forfeited, and "the said property" against which the information prays for process, and "the said goods, wares, and merchandise" which the information prays may be condemned, and "the above named property" and "the said property" spoken of in the claim, and "the said goods, wares, merchandise and articles" and "the personal property" spoken of in the monition, and "the quantity tobacco, &c.," spoken of in the return to the monition, and "the said goods, wares and merchandise" spoken of in the answer, and "the property proceeded against herein," and "the said property" spoken of in the order of April 13th, 1868, and "the property proceeded against herein" and "said property," spoken of in the report of the appraisers, and "the said property" spoken of in the order of June 12th, 1868, are expressions, all of which comprehend the same identical articles and quantity of property, namely, the property alleged in the information to have been seized "for a forfeiture," and to be in custody "as forfeited to the United States," and set forth in the schedule annexed to the report of the appraisers, and which the information prays may "be condemned by decree of forfeiture." The information, in specifying the causes of forfeiture, assigns the statutory causes to the three several descriptions of property seized —the manufactured tobacco, the articles of raw material, and the tools, implements, instruments and personal property found in the same place with the manufactured tobacco and the raw materials. The claimant claimed all the property that was seized and attached, and against which the information was directed, and answered as to the whole of such property, calling it "the said goods, wares and merchandise," and denying that it became or was forfeited. This was a denial that any of it was forfeited—a denial that any one of the three several causes of forfeiture specified in the information in regard to the three several classes of property seized, existed. It was these three issues that were tried. It was necessary for the government to prove the affirmative of each issue, in order to have a verdict condemning all the property seized. If it proved the affirmative of any particular issue, it would have a verdict condemning the property embraced in such issue. It is admitted there was evidence given tending to prove the affirmative of each of the first two issues. But it is denied that there was any evidence given that the "tools, implements, instruments and personal property" embraced in the third issue were found, as the information alleges, "in the place or building, and within certain yards and enclosures, where said tobacco and said raw materials were found as aforesaid," that is, as before alleged in the information, "at the tobacco manufactory of C. H. Lilienthal, 221 Washington street." This is an error of fact. The bill of exceptions, settled, signed, and filed in the case, states, that, "to maintain the issues on the part of the United States, the district attorney gave evidence tending to show that the claimant was a manufacturer and seller of tobacco in the city of New York, at and for a long time prior to the seizure in the information set forth, namely, prior to the 25th day of March, 1868, and that, at the time of the seizure, the claimant had in his possession, at his manufactory at Nos. 217, 219, and 221 Washington street, New York, the several quantities of manufactured tobacco and of raw materials, and the other personal property described in said information, and attached by the marshal, and claimed and released to the claimant as aforesaid." The words, "other personal property described in said information," mean the personal property other than the manufactured tobacco and the articles of raw material covered by the first and second issues, and mean the "tools, implements, instruments and personal property" covered by the third issue. The statement of the bill of exceptions is, that the evidence tended to show that, at the time of the seizure set forth in the information, that is, the seizure of all the personal property found at the manufactory of the claimant, 221 Washington street, he had in his possession, at such manufactory, all the property described in the information under the three heads. This necessarily means, that all of such property was found and seized at such manufactory, as one place or building.

There being evidence, then, to warrant a finding for the United States on each of the three issues, the jury returned a general verdict, saying, that "they find for the United States, condemning the goods." This verdict can mean nothing else than that they find for the United States on each and all of the issues. The words, "condemning the goods," create no uncertainty. The information asks that all the property, calling it "the said goods, wares and merchandise," "be condemned by decree of forfeiture." The claimant defended the property, by his answer, by the description of "the said goods, wares and merchandise." The word "goods," in the verdict, can mean, in reason, nothing else but all the property covered by all three of the issues. "Condemning the goods" means "condemning the property proceeded against herein." A verdict for the United States as to all the property was, necessarily, a verdict of condemnation. The words, "condemning the goods," do no harm. Still, they may be rejected as surplusage, if necessary. Under the evidence, a general verdict for the United States was perfectly good. This was such a verdict, whether the words, "condemning the goods," be retained or rejected. Such a verdict covered all the issues, and found all and each of them in favor of the United States.

A reference to the bill of exceptions shows that no other interpretation can be put upon the verdict than that which I have given to it. The court, after calling the attention of the jury to the statute on which the information was founded, the 48th section of the Act of June 30th, 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the Act of July 13th, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), stated to them, that there had been seized in the case, in addition to the manufactured tobacco and the raw materials, a large quantity of personal property connected with the establishment, the whole valued by the appraisers at $104,000, and that it was such property, consisting of the three classes, "found in this establishment," which was the subject of the suit; that the facts in the case were undisputed; that there was no serious contest about a single fact, except in regard to the very point of the law—the intent; and that, if the government had not made out, to the satisfaction of the jury, that the intent to commit a fraud on the law, or to evade the payment of taxes, in respect either to the goods on hand, or to the goods to be manufactured out of the raw materials on hand, existed on the part of Mr. Lilienthal at the time "the goods" were seized, their verdict would be for the claimant. There was no exception, on the part of the claimant, to any portion of these instructions, and the jury found "for the United States, condemning the goods." It cannot be doubted that this is a verdict on which a judgment of forfeiture can be entered against all the property seized. The word "goods" was used in the pleadings, and by the court in its charge, and by the jury in their verdict, as synonymous with the words, "property proceeded against herein."

The verdict did not vary from the issue, nor did it fail to find the entire issue. It was a general verdict, and not a special verdict. There is nothing to show that all the jurors did not find each of the issues in favor of the government, as, under the instructions and the evidence, they were warranted in doing. It was not necessary for them to say that they found each of the issues in favor of the government. Moreover, on the evidence in the case, the jury could not find an intent in regard to either the manufactured tobacco or the raw materials, which did not exist in regard to both, and, under the statute, the existence of the forbidden intent in regard to either condemns all personal property found in the same place. The issue was, therefore, really a single one in regard to the intent respecting the manufactured tobacco and the raw materials, and there was no other issue of fact to be considered by the jury.

But, in any event, this would be a proper case for the court, under the 32d section of the act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 91), to give judgment according as the right of the cause in law appears, without regarding any imperfection, defect, or want of form in the verdict, and to amend any such imperfection, defect, or want of form. Roach v. Hulings, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 319; Parks v. Turner, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 39. I do not mean, however, to suggest, that the verdict in this case was not a proper verdict, or was not a general verdict, or was not proper in form as a general verdict, or that a general verdict was not the proper verdict to be rendered in this case.

The form of verdict rendered and entered in this case is that which has been used for many years in this court, in cases where a general verdict for the United States, in a suit in rem on a seizure of property on land, is proper. It seems to me to be correct in form, and not open to criticism.

The motion in arrest of judgment is denied.

This decision was affirmed by the circuit court on writ of error. [Case unreported.]

Case No. 16,107.

UNITED STATES v. The QUEEN et al.

[4 Ben. 237;[1] 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 42.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1870.[2]

INFORMATION AGAINST BRITISH VESSEL AND HER MASTER—SMUGGLING—AMENDMENT—JURISDICTION—TRIAL BY JURY—JOINDER.

1. An information was filed against the steamship Queen and her master, alleging that the vessel belonged, in whole or in part, to a citizen or citizens of the United States, and charging that certain merchandise, not included in the manifest on board, had been imported by her into the United States, contrary to section 24 of the act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 644], which, for such offence, imposes upon the master a forfeiture equal to the value of the goods not included in the manifest, and that, by section 8 of the act of July 18, 1866 [14 Stat. 180], the vessel is holden for the payment of the penalty against the master, and becomes liable to be seized and proceeded against, by libel, to recover the same, in this court. The answer of the owners of the vessel denied the allegations of the information, and especially that they were citizens of or residents in the United States, and excepted to the information as alleging no cause of action against the vessel, inasmuch as it did not show that the master or owners of the vessel had been convicted of the acts complained of. The answer of the master also denied the statements of the information and excepted to it, in that it did not set forth a joint cause of action against the vessel and the master, and in that parties were improperly joined, and in that the parties joined were entitled to different modes of trial, and in that this action could not be sustained against the vessel and the master jointly. The suit, as to both vessel and master, was tried before the court without a jury, as a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction: Held, that it was clearly proved that the violation of the law set forth in the information was committed.

2. The vessel was a British vessel, and as, under the law, it is immaterial whether the offending vessel is a vessel of the United States or a foreign vessel, the information might be amended without terms, in respect to the ownership of the vessel, and by averring a violation of section 25 of the act of 1866, which extends the provisions of the act of 1799 to vessels owned, in whole or in part, by foreigners.

3. The court had jurisdiction to enforce the penalty against the vessel, in such a proceeding as this, without a trial by jury.

[Cited in U. S. v. The Missouri, Case No. 15,785.]

4. The vessel might be proceeded against for the penalty, irrespective of any proceeding against the master.

[Cited in The Helvetia, Case No. 6,345. Followed in Pollock v. The Sea Bird, 3 Fed. 575; The Paolina S., 11 Fed. 174. Cited in The Sidonian, 38 Fed. 442.]

5. The suit to recover the penalty against the master was a suit at common law, and he was entitled to a trial by jury, under the seventh amendment of the constitution of the United States.

6. The right to recover against the vessel in the present form of proceeding was clear, and, as the answer of the master excepted to the information on the ground that the suit could not be maintained against the vessel and master jointly, and because they were entitled to different modes of trial, and the answer of the vessel did not except to such joinder, the information would be dismissed as to the master, and a decree entered against the vessel.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 16,108.]

In admiralty.

William Stanley, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Charles Donohue, for master and claimants of the vessel.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an information filed on the 13th day of February, 1869, by the district attorney, on behalf of the United States, against the steamship the Queen and Francis Grogan, her master. It alleges, that the vessel is within this district, on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, and is under seizure by the collector of customs for the city of New York. It also alleges, that the information is filed in a cause, civil and maritime, of forfeiture, for breach of the revenue laws of the United States. The articles of the information set forth: (1) That, on the 9th of February, 1869, the vessel was a vessel belonging, in the whole or in part, to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants, of the United States, and Grogan was the master or person having charge or command of her. (2) That, on that day, sundry merchandise, which is specified, of the value of $2,440, was imported and brought into the United States, in the vessel, which merchandise was not included in the manifest on board, as required by the twenty-third section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 644), contrary to the twenty-fourth section of said act; that thereby Grogan forfeited and became liable to pay the said sum of $2,440, the value of the said merchandise; that the premises are within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of this court, and that, by reason thereof, and by force of the eighth section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 180), the vessel is holden for the payment of the penalty against the master, and became liable to be seized and proceeded against summarily, by libel, to recover the same, in this court. The information prays for a decree for the forfeiture against Grogan and against the vessel, for $2,440, as a lien thereon, and that the vessel may be condemned and sold to satisfy the lien.

The National Steamship Company, as owners of the vessel, answer the information and say, that they are a British corporation, and are subjects of Great Britain, and are not citizens of or residents in the United States. They deny the statements of the information and except to it, by their answer, in that it does not set up a cause of action against the vessel, and in that it does not shew that the master or owners of the vessel, or either of them, has or have been convicted of the acts complained of, and allege that no cause of action arises against the vessel until such conviction.

The answer of Grogan denies all the statements of the information, and excepts to it, in that it does not set forth a joint cause of action against the vessel and Grogan, and in that parties are improperly joined, and in that the parties joined, under the cause of action stated, are entitled to separate modes of trial, and in that this action cannot be sustained against them jointly.

The twenty-third section of the act of 1799 provides, that no merchandise shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place, in any vessel belonging, in the whole or in part, to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants, of the United States, unless the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel shall have on board a manifest in writing containing, among other things, a just and particular account of all the merchandise taken on board of such vessel. The twenty-fourth section of the same act provides, that if any merchandise shall be imported or brought into the United States in any vessel belonging, in the whole or in part, to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants, of the United States, from any foreign port or place, which shall not be included or described in a manifest on board, agreeably to the directions in the twenty-third section, in every such case the master or other person having the charge or command of such vessel, shall forfeit and pay a sum of money equal to the value of such goods not included in such manifest.

By the twenty-fifth section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 184), as amended by the third section of the act of February 18, 1867 (Id. 394), it is provided, that on and after the 1st day of March, 1867, the several provisions of the said act of March 2, 1799, relating to manifests, shall apply as well to vessels owned, in whole or in part, by foreigners as to vessels of the United States. The eighth section of the same act of July 18, 1866, provides, that in any case where a vessel or the owner, master or manager of a vessel, shall be subject to a penalty for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States, such vessel shall be holden for the payment of such penalty, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily, by libel, to recover such penalty, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offence.

The case was tried before the court without a jury, as a cause on the instance side of the admiralty court. It was so tried as respected both the vessel and Grogan. It was proved, beyond question, that the violation of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth sections of the act of 1799, set forth in the information, was committed. It was not shown, as alleged in the information, that the vessel was a vessel of the United States, and it was shown that she was a British vessel. But, as, under the law, it is immaterial whether the offending vessel is a vessel of the United States or a foreign vessel, the information may, if desired, be amended, without terms, under the authority of rule 24 of the rules in admiralty prescribed by the supreme court, in respect to the averment of the ownership of the vessel, and, also, by averring a violation of the twenty-fifth section of the act of 1866, as well as of the other statutory provisions referred to in the information.

The ground taken in defence, at the hearing, was, that no joint cause of action is given by the statute against the vessel and her master; that the intention of the statute is only to make the vessel a security for the penalty denounced against her master; that the cause of action is not one within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of this court; that the statute does not authorize the enforcement of the penalty in admiralty; that the penalty cannot be recovered from the master personally without a trial by jury is given to him; that a recovery must be had against the master, for the penalty, before the vessel can be proceeded against for it; and that, if this suit be dismissed as to the master, it must be dismissed as to the vessel.

As respects the vessel, I am satisfied that this court has jurisdiction, to enforce the penalty against her, by a proceeding such as has been taken in this case, without a trial by jury being necessary.

The information alleges that the vessel is under seizure by the collector. The act of 1866 does not say that the vessel shall be forfeited, but that she shall be holden for the payment of the penalty. There is to be a forfeiture sub modo, to the extent of the payment of the penalty, and she may be "seized and proceeded against summarily, by libel, to recover such penalty, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offence." The case is made by the information one of forfeiture and seizure. The vessel is alleged to be in this district, on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, and under seizure for the forfeiture created by the violation of the statutes to which the information refers. This court has, by the ninth section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 77), exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws of impost, navigation or trade of the United States, where the seizures are made on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, within this district. Under this provision, it has always been held, that, in cases of seizure on land, the right of trial by jury exists, although the proceedings in the suit are otherwise in general conformity to the course in admiralty; but that, where the seizure is made on navigable waters, the course of admiralty may be strictly observed. Union Ins. Co. v. U. S., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 759, 764.

Nor have I any doubt that the vessel may be proceeded against, for the penalty in question irrespective of any prior or contemporaneous proceeding against the master therefor. The objection that a proceeding against the master must precede a suit against the vessel was considered and overruled by Judge Benedict, in a case which arose under the same statutes as those involved in this case. The Missouri [Case No. 9,652].

The remaining questions are, as to whether there can be a joint suit against the vessel and the master, and as to whether the master is entitled to a trial by jury, and as to whether this suit, if not maintainable as to both vessel and master, can be dismissed as to the master, and yet a decree be rendered in it against the vessel.

As regards the enforcement of the penalty against the master, he is entitled to a trial by jury. The seventh amendment[9] to the constitution of the United States provides, that, in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved. The expression, "suits at common law," as there used, means all civil suits, in which legal rights are to be ascertained and determined, which are not of equity or admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar forms of such suits. Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 433, 447. The ninth section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 76, 77), declares, that the trial of issues of fact, in the district courts, in all causes except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be by jury. The suit against the master, under the statute in question, for the penalty imposed, is not made by statute cognizable in admiralty, nor is there any provision that the penalty may be recovered against the master summarily, by libel, as there is in respect to the vessel. It is contended, on the part of the United States, that, as the bringing in of the goods by the vessel, in the prohibited manner, while she was under the command of the master, is made, by the statute, the foundation for the forfeiture by the master of a sum of money equal to the value of the goods, and as, by the act of 1866, the vessel is to be holden for the payment of the penalty imposed on the master, the master must be suable therefor in the admiralty quite as much as the vessel is; that the cause of action is as fully a maritime one in respect to the master, as it is in respect to the vessel; and that the case is one where jurisdiction in personam against the master exists in this court, within the decision in the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchant's Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, 392. The answer to this view is, that no such jurisdiction or form of remedy is given, by any act of congress, against the master, as is given by the eighth section of the act of 1866, against the vessel. U. S. v. Three Hundred and Fifty Chests of Tea, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 486, 498. No authority has been cited to show that any statutory penalty has ever been recovered by a suit in personam, in the admiralty, in a case like the present, and I must hold that the right to recover the penalty from the master must be enforced by a suit at common law, and that he is entitled in that to a trial by jury.

As the right to recover against the vessel, in the present form of proceeding, is clear, and as the answer of the master excepts to the information on the ground that the suit cannot be sustained against the vessel and the master jointly, for the reason that the parties joined are entitled to separate modes of trial, and as the claimants of the vessel have not excepted, by their answer, or by any other form of pleading, to such joinder, but only except, by their answer, that the information sets forth no cause of action against the vessel, and does not show that the master has been convicted of the acts complained of, the information will be dismissed as to the master, with costs, and a decree will be entered against the vessel for the $2,440, with costs.

[Upon an appeal to the circuit court the libellants were held entitled to a decree against the vessel, with costs. See Case No. 16,108.]

Case No. 16,108.

UNITED STATES v. The QUEEN.

[11 Blatchf. 416;[1] 19 Int. Rev. Rec. 14.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 24, 1873.[2]

SMUGGLING—INFORMATION OF FORFEITURE—PROSECUTION OF MASTER—KNOWLEDGE OF MASTER.

1. Under sections 23 and 24 of the act of March 2, 1799, (1 Stat. 645, 646,) and sections 8 and 25 of the act of July 18, 1866, (14 Stat. 180, 184,) the United States may proceed in rem, against a vessel, to recover a penalty for importing or bringing goods into the United States, which are not included or described in the manifest, according to the course of proceeding in a cause in admiralty, and may proceed against the vessel immediately and directly, without the delay incident to the previous prosecution of the master of the vessel, to recover such penalty.

[Cited in Pollock v. The Sea Bird, 3 Fed. 575. Followed in The Paolina S., 11 Fed. 174. Cited in The Sidonian, 38 Fed. 442.]

2. Where a suit in admiralty is brought against such vessel and her master jointly, to recover such penalty, it is proper to dismiss the suit as to the master, on the ground that he is entitled to a trial by jury, and to proceed with it as against the vessel.

[Cited in Hatch v. The Boston, 3 Fed. 809.]

3. In such a suit, proof that the master of the vessel had no actual knowledge that the goods were on board is not sufficient to exempt the vessel from liability.

[Cited in U. S. v. Curtis, 16 Fed. 189.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming Case No. 16,107.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

[This was an information of forfeiture against the steamship Queen for alleged violation of the revenue laws. On appeal from the district court. See Case No. 16,107.]

Thomas Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
Charles Donohue, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The decision of this court in U. S. v. The Missouri [Case No. 15,785], must be taken as settling, in this court, that the proceedings herein were rightly prosecuted in the court below as a cause in admiralty, and according to the course of proceeding in such a cause. The case of Union Ins. Co. v. U. S., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 759, 764, sustains the jurisdiction, and approves that course of proceeding.

I think it clear that the government, under the acts of March 2, 1799, and July 18, 1866, (1 Stat. 645, 646, §§ 23, 24; 14 Stat. 180, 184, §§ 8, 25,) are at liberty to proceed against the vessel immediately and directly, without the delay incident to a previous prosecution of the master, to recover the penalty for importing or bringing goods into the United States, which are not included or described in the manifest. The extension of the act of 1799 to foreign vessels would, in general, prove idle and fruitless, if they could not be proceeded against before such a recovery. At the termination of a suit against the master the vessel would not be here. The purpose to charge the vessel with the penalty, and the express declaration, not only that the vessel "shall be holden for the payment," but that she "may be seized and proceeded against summarily," both indicate an intent that she may be proceeded against so soon as the violation of the law appears.

The amendment of the proceedings by discharging the master, on the claim that he was entitled to a trial by jury, was not erroneous. Courts of admiralty have a large discretion to amend their proceedings and conform them to the justice of the case before them; and the correction of the supposed error in including the master in the same suit wrought no injustice to the claimants. On the contrary, had the technical objection that the libellants, having erroneously joined the master, were concluded, been suffered to prevail, the vessel would have wholly escaped the liability which the statute imposed upon her.

On the merits, I must adhere to the observations made on deciding the case of U. S. v. The Missouri, above referred to. I do not think that the acts above referred to can be made practically useless and inefficient for the purposes of their enactment, by a construction which makes proof that the master had no actual knowledge that the goods were on board sufficient to exempt him from the penalty and the vessel from any responsibility. The averment made by an amendment of the answer allowed in this court, that the master had no means of knowledge of the importation, was not sustained by any evidence. The case stands on the naked statement of the master, that he "did not know of the goods on board and not on the manifest." This language is itself equivocal. It may mean that, although he knew that the goods were on board, he did not know that they were not on the manifest. To this it is sufficient to say, it was his duty to see that they were on the manifest. But, taking the testimony to mean distinctly that he did not know that the goods were on board the vessel, that is not enough, in my opinion, to exempt the vessel from liability. If it were to be so held, the door to smuggling would be open so wide that these statutes would be a dead letter.

If it be conceded, that, when, notwithstanding a faithful exercise of his authority and control over the lading of his ship, and his right to exclude all goods not subjected to entry upon the ship's papers, parcels were fraudulently concealed, so that he could not discover them in person, nor by the aid of his subordinates, the penalty could not be enforced against him, (see U. S. v. The Stadacona [Case No. 16,371]), even that concession would not avail in this case. The custom house officers had no difficulty in finding these goods. And, as suggested by the court, in the case of U. S. v. The Missouri, if the manifest was made and filed in good faith, without knowledge that the goods were on board, the master is furnished, by the act of 1799 (section 24), with an opportunity to correct the mistake, by showing that the defect in the manifest was owing to a deceit and fraud practised on himself. Any other construction of the act would relieve the master and the vessel from liability, although every officer on board except the master knew that the goods were on board, and were parties to the attempt to introduce them in violation of law.

The libellants are entitled to a decree, with costs. [Case No. 16,107.]

Case No. 16,109.

UNITED STATES v. QUEEN.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 420.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.

ADMINISTRATORS—ACTION ON BOND.

The act of assembly of Maryland of 1720 (chapter 24), respecting suits upon administration bonds, before return non est or fi. fa. against the executor or administrator, is in force in the county of Washington, D. C.

[Suit by the United States, for the use of Robinson, against N. L. Queen.]

Debt on the administration bond of George Lindsay's administratrix. Plea, that there was no return of non est on a capias ad respondendum, nor of a fieri facias against the administratrix, as required by the Maryland act of 1720 (chapter 24). General demurrer.

THE COURT rendered judgment upon the demurrer for the defendant, being of opinion that the act of 1720 is still in force, notwithstanding the act of 1798, c. 101, subc. 8, § 9, which authorizes an execution against the administrator, upon the report of the auditor, ascertaining the plaintiff's proportion of the assets. (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.)

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 16,110.

UNITED STATES v. QUINN.

[8 Blatchf. 48; [1] 3 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 180; 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 151.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 2, 1870.

ELECTIONS—VIOLATION OF REGISTRATION LAWS—INDICTMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. The 20th section of the act of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 145), providing for the punishment of persons who illegally register, or attempt to register, at a registration of voters for an election for a representative in congress, and enacting that a registration made under the laws of a state shall be deemed to be a registration within such act, is not invalid, as being an infraction of the constitution of the United States.

2. Such section does not establish a test of the qualification of an elector, or affect such qualification, and is not repugnant to article 1, § 2, of the constitution, which prescribes the qualifications of electors of members of the house of representatives.

3. Authority to enact such section is derivable from article 1, § 4, subd. 1, of the constitution, which provides, that congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter regulations as to the time, place and manner of holding elections for representatives in congress, and from the last subdivision of article 1, § 8, which provides, that congress shall have the power to make all laws necessary or proper for carrying into execution powers thereinbefore given.

4. Article 1, § 5, subd. 1, of the constitution, which provides that each house of congress shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members, commented on.

5. The offense created by such 20th section being a misdemeanor, it is sufficient, in an indictment, to describe it in the words of the statute, adapted to the particular circumstances involved in the offense charged.

6. The averments, in the indictment in this case, as to the existence and action of the board of inspectors of registry, upheld as sufficient, on demurrer, the court taking judicial notice of the statutes of New York in respect to such board, such statutes being referred to in the indictment.

7. No suggestion being made to the court that the defendant had any defense to the indictment, judgment absolute was rendered against him on the overruling of a demurrer to the indictment.

This was an indictment against the defendant [Terence Quinn], founded on the

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

20th section of the act of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 145). It contained thirteen counts. The first count alleged, "that, under and in pursuance of acts of the legislature of the state of New York, a board of inspectors of registry, theretofore, in pursuance of said laws, duly appointed, and at the times hereinafter stated, duly acting for the Fourteenth election district of the Sixteenth ward, of the city of New York, in the county of New York, in said state of New York, and in the district and circuit aforesaid, and duly organized, did, at the said election district, on the certain days for that purpose prescribed by the laws of the state of New York, commencing the eighteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, proceed to make a list of all persons qualified and entitled to vote in the said election district, and to enrol such applicants for registration as should be qualified voters in the said election district at a general election of officers by the people of the state of New York, to ensue in the said state of New York, on the eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, at which general election, among other officers, a representative in the congress of the said United States, for the Sixth congressional district of the state of New York, was to be elected, and at the said election district voted for; that Terence Quinn, late of the city and county of New York, in the district and circuit aforesaid, yeoman, heretofore, to wit, on the eighteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, at the Southern district of New York, and within the jurisdiction of this court, the said last mentioned day being one of the said prescribed days, appeared at the said election district of the Sixteenth ward of the city of New York, in the county and state of New York, and in the district and circuit aforesaid, before the said board of inspectors, then and there proceeding as aforesaid to make the list aforesaid, and to enrol as aforesaid, and did wilfully, and unlawfully, and knowingly apply to the said board to have his said name entered upon the list aforesaid of qualified voters aforesaid, and the said board of inspectors did thereupon, on the said Terence Quinn applying as aforesaid, then and there place his said name upon said list of qualified voters, he, the said Terence Quinn, not then and there being lawfully entitled to be registered therein, then and there, against the peace of the said United States, and their dignity, and against the form of the statute of the said United States, in such case made and provided." The second count alleged, "that, at the Fifteenth election district of the Sixteenth ward of the city of New York, in the county and state of New York, and in the district aforesaid, at a registration of voters in the said election district, for an election for a representative in the congress of the United States, which said registration was then and there made under the laws of the state of New York, and which said election was to be held on the eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, and at which said election a representative in congress for the Sixth congressional district of the state of New York was to be elected, and, at the said election district, the same being part of said congressional district, to be voted for, Terence Quinn, yeoman, late of the city and county of New York, in the district and circuit aforesaid, at the Southern district of New York, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did unlawfully, knowingly, and wilfully, fraudulently register, and cause his name to be entered upon the list of voters in the said district, as a voter residing in said election district, and entitled by law to vote therein for a representative in the congress of the United States, whereas the said Terence Quinn did not then and there reside in the said district, as he, the said Terence Quinn, well knew, and was not, by reason of said non-residence, a lawful voter in said district, or entitled to be registered as a voter, as he then and there well knew, then and there, against the peace of the said United States, and against their dignity, and against the form of the statute of the said United States in such case made and provided." The third and fourth counts were like the second, except as to the number of the election district. The fifth count alleged, "that heretofore, to wit, on the eighteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, at the city and county aforesaid, and in the Southern district aforesaid, a registration of voters for an election for representatives in the congress of the United States, and for a general election to be held on the eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, at which election a representative in congress was to be chosen, in and for the Sixth congressional district of said state, in which said congressional district the Sixteenth election district of the Sixteenth ward of said city and county was, and is, situated, and is a part, was held under and pursuant to the laws of the state of New York, in and for the said Sixteenth election district of the Sixteenth ward of said city and county of New York, for which registration of voters, proper officers had been and were appointed to receive the applications of persons lawfully entitled to vote at the said election district, and to register and make lists of the names of such persons, pursuant to the provisions of the laws of the state of New York, which said officers were then and there acting as a board for the purpose of receiving, registering, and entering upon such list the names of such persons, the said Terence Quinn, not being a resident of said election district, and not being lawfully entitled to be registered therein, and not being a voter therein, with intent then and there to deceive, injure, and defraud the lawful electors of said district, and the good and lawful people of the said state of New York, did then and there wilfully, knowingly, and fraudulently appear before the said officers, being such board, and cause and procure his name to be entered and registered upon the list of voters of said election district, as one of the persons entitled to vote therein at the aforesaid election district, wherefore the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, say, that the said Terence Quinn did, at the time and place aforesaid, unlawfully and fraudulently register in the election district aforesaid, against the peace of the said United States and their dignity, and against the form of the statute of the said United States in such case made and provided." The sixth and seventh counts were like the fifth, except as to the number of the election district. The eighth count alleged, "that, under and in pursuance of acts of the legislature of the state of New York, a board of inspectors of registry, theretofore, in pursuance of said laws, duly appointed, and, at the time hereinafter specified, duly acting, for the Fifteenth election district of the Sixteenth ward, of the city of New York, in the county of New York, and in the district and circuit aforesaid, and duly organized, did, on certain days for that purpose prescribed by the laws of the state of New York, commencing the eighteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, proceed to make a list of all persons then qualified and entitled to vote in the said election district, and to enrol such applicants for registration as should be qualified voters in the said election district, at a general election of officers by the people of the state of New York, to ensue on the eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, at which general election, among other officers, a representative in the congress of the said United States for the Sixth congressional district of the said state of New York, was to be elected, and at the said election district voted for; that Terence Quinn, yeoman, late of the city and county of New York, in the district and circuit aforesaid, heretofore, to wit, on the eighteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, at the Southern district of New York, and within the jurisdiction of this court, he, the said Terence Quinn, not then and there residing at a house numbered one hundred and fifty-six, in West Nineteenth street of said city of New York, the day last aforesaid being one of the prescribed days of registration as aforesaid, appeared in his proper person before said board of inspectors, proceeding, as aforesaid, to make the list aforesaid, and to enrol as aforesaid, and did wilfully, knowingly, and unlawfully and falsely say and represent to said board that he then and there resided at said house, numbered one hundred and fifty-six, and in West Nineteenth street, of said city of New York, and did apply then and there unlawfully, knowingly, and wilfully, to said board proceeding as aforesaid, to place his name upon said list and enrolment as residing in said house, numbered one hundred and fifty-six, in West Nineteenth street, of the city of New York, and, upon such application, the said board did then and there place his name upon said list and enrollment, and thereunto placed said number one hundred and fifty-six, in West Nineteenth street, as the residence of said Terence Quinn, whereas, in truth, the said Terence Quinn did not reside at said house and number, as he well knew; and so the jurors aforesaid say, that the said Terence Quinn did, on the day and in the year aforesaid, and in manner and form aforesaid, and at an election as aforesaid, fraudulently register, then and there, against the peace of the said United States, and their dignity, and against the form of the statute of the said United States, in such case made and provided." The ninth and tenth counts were like the eighth, except as to the number of the election district. The eleventh count contained the same allegations as the eighth as to the board of inspectors of registry, and then averred that the defendant, "having been theretofore, to wit, on the twenty-sixth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, at the court of general sessions, in and for the city and county of New York, duly convicted of an infamous crime, to wit, the crime of an attempt at grand larceny, the same then being a felony by the laws of the state of New York, and the said Terence Quinn not then and there having been pardoned for said offense and conviction, or restored by pardon to the rights of a citizen, and then and there well knowing that, by reason of the premises, he was not a qualified voter at said election, or entitled to registration as a voter at said election, did then and there knowingly, and unlawfully, and wilfully apply to said board to place his name upon said list as a legal and qualified voter, and, upon such application, the said board did then and there place his name on said list as aforesaid, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said Terence Quinn was not a lawful voter, and was not entitled to be registered as aforesaid; and so the jurors aforesaid say, that the said Terence Quinn did, on the day and in the year aforesaid, and in manner and form aforesaid, and at an election as aforesaid, fraudulently register, then and there, against the peace of the said United States, and their dignity, and against the form of the statute of the said United States, in such case made and provided." The twelfth and thirteenth counts were like the eleventh, except as to the number of the election district. The defendant demurred to the indictment.

The 20th section of the act of May 31, 1870, was as follows: "If, at any registration of voters, for an election for representative or delegate in the congress of the United States, any person shall knowingly personate and register, or attempt to register, in the name of any other person, whether living, dead or fictitious, or fraudulently register, or fraudulently attempt to register, not having a lawful right so to do; or do any unlawful act to secure registration for himself or any other person; or by force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer, or promise thereof, or other unlawful means, prevent or hinder any person having a lawful right to register, from duly exercising such right; or compel or induce, by any of such means, or other unlawful means, any officer of registration to admit to registration any person not legally entitled thereto, or interfere in any manner with any officer of registration in the discharge of his duties, or by any such means, or other unlawful means, induce any officer of registration to violate or refuse to comply with his duty, or any law regulating the same; or knowingly and wilfully receive the vote of any person not entitled to vote, or refuse to receive the vote of any person entitled to vote, or aid, counsel, procure, or advise any such voter, person or officer to do any act hereby made a crime, or to omit any act, the omission of which is hereby made a crime, every such person shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and shall be liable to punishment and prosecution therefor, as provided in section nineteen of this act for persons guilty of any of the crimes therein specified: provided, that every registration made under the laws of any state or territory, for any state or other election at which such representative or delegate in congress shall be chosen, shall be deemed to be a registration within the meaning of this act, notwithstanding the same shall also be made for the purposes of any state, territorial or municipal election." The punishment provided in section nineteen was, "by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court," and the payment of "the costs of prosecution."

Edwin W. Stoughton and George T. Curtis, for defendant.

Noah Davis, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Before WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and BLATCHFORD, District Judge.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge (orally). The demurrer to the indictment now before the court, which was the subject of discussion at our yesterday's session, presents two questions. The first is, whether the law of the United States under which the indictment is found is constitutional, or, in a more general form, whether it is a valid enactment, it being assailed, however only upon the ground that it is an infraction of the constitution of the United States. The second is, whether the indictment sufficiently charges an offense under the law. The court will not endeavor to discuss with great minuteness or particularity these two questions. The shortness of the interval which has elapsed since the argument closed has precluded the elaboration of an opinion upon the points which are raised.

Had the court entertained serious doubt of the correctness of the conclusions which they have reached, they would have taken time for greater deliberation, and, if it seemed to them fit, would have endeavored to throw light upon the subject by an extended discussion. But, entertaining no doubt, and deeming it unnecessary and unprofitable that the progress of the public business should be delayed for the purpose of indulging in an elaborate exposition of constitutional or other law, we feel not only at liberty, but constrained, to confine ourselves to a very brief statement of the leading grounds upon which the conclusions which we have reached must rest.

First, then, as to the constitutionality of the act in question. It is important, perhaps—certainly we deem it wise in approaching that subject—to state just what the question is which we are called to consider, and to what a narrow point of inquiry the questions involved in the present demurrer bring us. The section of the act of congress upon which this indictment is found is single. It is a single section of a single statute. Its validity involves the consideration of no other sections of the same or other statutes. Its discussion does not bring into view numerous questions which were alluded to in the progress of the argument, which might or might not be fit subjects for discussion, if other statutes or other sections of the present statute were before us for review.

Without reading the section under which this indictment is found at length, or attempting to speak of it in technical terms, it must suffice to say, that it is an act which makes a fraudulent registration, or a fraudulent attempt to register, by a person not having a legal right so to do, for the purposes of an election of a member of congress, a crime against the United States of America; and the validity and constitutionality which we are to consider, rests upon the single question—Has congress the power, under the constitution, to declare a fraudulent registration, or a fraudulent attempt to register, for the purpose of voting for a representative or delegate in congress, a crime against the United States? We therefore enter into no consideration of various topics which were alluded to, referring to other details of other laws, or of the act of which this section is a part.

There are four provisions of article 1 of the constitution of the United States, reference to which is pertinent to the inquiry before us, namely:

Section 2: "The house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states, and the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature."

Section 4, subdivision 1: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing senators."

Section 5, subdivision 1: "Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

Section 8, last subdivision: "The congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Does the act in question infringe the provision of the constitution which I have read, which provides that the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature? It is argued with great ingenuity and ability, that the act in question infringes that clause of the constitution, because it seeks to establish a test of qualification—seeks to affirm the evidence of qualification—and, by so doing, ex vi termini, imposes qualification itself. We apprehend that that argument rests upon no solid basis. The act in question neither professes, nor, by any implication, can it, we think, be construed to affect the qualification of any elector anywhere. It imposes no duty to register. It prohibits no registration that is required in the state in which the elector seeks to exercise his franchise. It touches no qualification of the elector in any other respect. It leaves the power of the state to prescribe the qualifications of electors for the most numerous branch of the state legislature, in the largest and fullest extent, untouched and unaffected. It says, and only says, that, when the qualification of registration is imposed by the state law, (leaving the expediency or wisdom of such a law entirely to the judgment of the state), it shall be an offense against the laws of the United States to contribute, by fraud and violation of the state registry laws, to the sending of a representative to the congress of the United States who is not clothed with the authority which a true expression of the popular will would give; and that is all.

But, it is said, that congress, having nothing to do with the question of qualification, cannot treat of the subject of qualification at all; and that, to require that the elector shall have the qualification which the state law imposes, and make his voting or registration an offense if he has not that qualification, is, on the part of congress, to impose a condition itself on the right to vote. The court do not feel called upon to say, however little doubt they may feel upon the subject, whether or not the congress of the United States might, if they saw fit, make it a condition, throughout these United States, that all who come to elect members of the house of representatives shall first register their names. We do not conceive that that question is involved; but, that the prescription of such a condition is no infringement of the elector's right to vote, we have no doubt, and we refer, with confidence and with satisfaction, to the constitution of the state of New York, as the exposition of the views of her people and her legislature, at least, upon that precise question. It is provided, in her constitution of 1846 (article 2, § 1), that "every male citizen of the age of twenty-one years who shall have been a citizen for ten days, and an inhabitant of the state one year next preceding an election, and for the last four months a resident of the county where he may offer his vote, shall be entitled to vote, at such election, in the election district of which he shall at the time be a resident, and not elsewhere, for all officers that now are or hereafter may be elective by the people"—a declaration of qualifications, and the sole qualifications, which, under the constitution of the state of New York, it is competent to prescribe. And the framers of this same constitution, not deeming this unqualified declaration of the qualification of voters to be infringed in any degree, have, in section 4 of the same article, provided, that laws shall be made for ascertaining, by proper proofs, the citizens who shall be entitled to the right of suffrage hereby established. Our reflections lead us, therefore, to the conclusion, and without hesitation, that the prescription of a mode of ascertaining and certifying the qualification of him who shall present himself to exercise the elector's privilege, is no infringement of the clause that declares what shall constitute the requisite qualification, and is no attempt to prescribe to the states—to this state or to any other state—any condition for the exercise of the right of suffrage, and no attempt to prescribe the qualifications of an elector. If we are right in this, then the second section of the first article of the constitution is no impediment to the legislation of congress upon this subject.

The next clause of the constitution to which we refer—section four, subdivision one—declares, that the times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof, but the congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators. Upon this affirmative provision of the constitution, and in support of the legislation which is now assailed, it is insisted, that this clause of the constitution warrants the passage of the act in question, on the one hand, while, on the other, it is denied, first, that this section includes the authority claimed, and second, that the authority attempted to be exercised is within it.

The framers of the constitution of the United States placed its government, all its strength and vigor, and all its permanent capacity for usefulness to the people, for whom it was made, in the votes of the people themselves. The debates in the convention by which the constitution was framed, and the discussions which were had by way of exposition when the constitution was presented to the states for their acceptance, both of which were cited to us in the argument, show, in the fullest manner, that those framers of the constitution did not, for one moment, lose sight of the indispensable condition—on which alone a government of the people could be safe to the people themselves or could secure the beneficent ends for which it was instituted—that her popular vote should be the true expression of the opinions and choice of the electors. Hence, we say, this section four, subdivision one, of the first article of the constitution; and hence, as was aply and clearly exhibited in the argument of the learned counsel for this defendant, the framers of the constitution—either through an apprehension that, in some possible change of events, the states might become indifferent to the general good, and so neglect their duty, or warned, perhaps, by experience had, under the previous articles of confederation, on that subject, or with wisdom forecasting the possibility that, at some distant period, circumstances might arise in some state, in which obstacles would be interposed to the full and fair expression of the popular voice, and, so, conscious that the very preservation of the government itself, for all its useful ends, demanded that its perpetuation through a popular vote should be secured—by this first subdivision of the fourth section conferred power upon congress for that self-preservation. Time might some where be so arranged, and for some end other than the well-being of the whole nation, that the popular voice might be denied a full expression. Place might be so fixed as in that mode to defeat the general and the indispensable purpose. The manner of holding an election might be such as to operate to prevent an open, fair expression of the popular voice. Or—to use an illustration freely used in the discussions had when those men who went into the various states and elsewhere wrote in explanation of the provisions of the constitution, that the people might understand it—elections might be so conducted, either through an indifference of the states or otherwise, that the general government might find itself unsupported by the very people in whose will the foundations of the government rested. Hence, we say, the scheme pointed out by this first subdivision of section four, and hence, we say, the explanations which were given by the great and good men who expounded it.

It seems to me that we ought to pause but a moment upon the suggestion, that, in the enforcement of a law such as we have now before us for consideration, intended to secure an election of members of the house of representatives by the giving of all legal votes and by the giving of none that are fraudulent, the government of the United States has no interest. "The government of the United States"—what is that? It may be conceded to be an artificial thing, which men call "the government," and which is sometimes looked upon as the source as well as the exhibition of power, and not capable of interest more than it is of thought or feeling. But, the government of the United States, in the true sense, is the people of the United States, one and all, throughout the length and breadth of the land. And the people of the United States, here and everywhere, have not only an interest, but an interest that is vital, in the preservation of their institutions and in the preservation of all that is pure, just and honest in the popular vote, on which, for their safety and security, their institutions and their government rest.

Now, it is conceded, if I have rightly apprehended the arguments that have been addressed to us, to be within the constitutional grant of power to congress, to proceed, under this power, to regulate the time, place and manner of holding elections, and to make such regulations as to each, that all the electors in every state shall have full and fair opportunity to declare their will. And the illustration chiefly used in the discussions to which I have referred, was an illustration drawn from the supposition, that, possibly, the intervention of congress to secure that end might become necessary. It is important that no one who is not an elector shall be permitted to defeat the will of those who are, by interposing his vote at such elections. It is equally important that no one shall be permitted to deposit more votes than he is entitled to. And both these possible evils rest precisely upon the principle on which it was declared that this clause might be useful, and the exercise of the power might become necessary, in order that all legal voters should have full and fair opportunity to deposit their votes. The court are not able to see the difference in principle between a regulation to enable all to vote who are entitled to vote, and a regulation to prevent men from voting who are not entitled, or to prevent men from voting more times or in more places than one. If not, then the power to do the one involves the power to prohibit the others. The power to make a regulation that shall secure to every man entitled to vote a safe and convenient exercise of his privilege, involves the power to see to it that no one who is not entitled to vote shall be permitted to exercise that right. All this leaves, as I have already stated, the subject of the qualification of electors untouched—leaves the laws of the states—leaves the laws of the state of New York—to operate in their full force. Though it be true that the laws of the state of New York cannot be relied on as the source of authority, or as giving any vigor to the enactment, yet, if it be necessary to refer the power of congress to pass this enactment to a grant to be found in the constitution, wholly independent of state authority, then the court must say that it has it in the section before us. And, if it be true, that the existence of that power in congress is exclusive, so that, when exercised, it takes the place of existing state law and the imposition of state penalties, be it so. This involves no new principle. The court and the people of this country have long been familiar with the doctrine which is now conceded, and, indeed, insisted on here, that the legislation of congress on the subjects intrusted to it by the constitution is exclusive.

This brings within view another consideration connected with this subject—that, for eighty years, as is urged, congress has not seen fit to exercise the power which is conferred by the first subdivision of the fourth section. On that subject, two observations are pertinent. The first is, that failure to exercise the power hitherto is shown, by the history of this government, to furnish no argument against its existence. The debates to which I have referred, the discussions to which I have referred, all breathe the confidence the framers of the constitution had, not only in the patriotism, but in the intelligence and wisdom and fidelity, of the people of the states. In the congress of the United States, which was convened and has continued to be convened from that time onward, that same confidence that the people of the states would, on this subject, make all due and needful regulations, has been exhibited. If it be true that the time has come which the contemporaneous expositors of the constitution contemplated as possible and designed to anticipate and guard against, in which it would be expedient for congress to intervene and exercise the power, then that time has come, the anticipation of which furnished the occasion and the ground for introducing this clause into the constitution. Whether that time has come, in which just apprehension warrants legislation—whether occasion, therefore, exists, which makes it best and wisest that congress shall exercise the power, is a question with which a tribunal of justice has nothing to do. Of that, congress is the sole and proper judge.

The other observation having reference to this lapse of time which I propose to make is this—that there are numerous powers conferred by the constitution upon congress, which, for a time, remained dormant in their hands. There are powers which even now remain dormant in their hands; and the history of adjudication on this subject shows it to have been well established by decisions of the supreme court of the United States, that the circumstance that states have legislated, and legislated through periods of years, upon a subject, without question, and without interference by congress, in no degree impairs the force of the constitutional grant to the congress of the United States, and their neglect to exercise the power in no sort defeats the power itself. On the contrary, until the congress of the United States acts in the exercise of the power—until then, the states, in matters not directly inhibited, legislate, and their legislation has full force and validity. When the act of congress comes, then that act is exclusive. And again, therefore, I say, if it be true, if the argument be sound, that the power of the state of New York to punish cannot co-exist with the power of congress to impose punishment under the law which we have before us, then the exclusive legislation of congress must prevail; and it is reasoning reversely to assume or to argue that the two cannot co-exist, that the legislation of the state does exist, and that, therefore, the act of congress cannot stand. It is reversing the order of argument. The true statement is this: If the two cannot co-exist, the act of congress is controlling, and the state law gives way. Perhaps I have not done justice to the argument as it was presented; but these observations seem to me pertinent to one of the views which was presented to us in the discussion.

I have anticipated, in what I have said, the force and effect of the last subdivision of the eighth section of the first article—the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." If, according to the view which we take of the section already considered, congress has power to regulate the time and manner of holding elections, so as to secure as well a full and fair opportunity to vote at all elections for members of congress, as also to see to it that no one fraudulently exercises the privilege of voting, then it follows, under such subdivision, that congress has the power to pass all laws which shall be necessary to give effect to those regulations; and we know of none so efficient as to add the sanction of a penalty.

There is another section upon which I desire to make a single observation—section five, subdivision one: "Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." We do not think it necessary to rest our views of the constitutionality of the law upon that section, and yet the argument, to our minds, is plausible in a high degree, if, indeed, we ought not to regard it as satisfactory alone considered, namely, that when the constitution confers upon each house the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and then authorizes congress to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested in any department of the government, it authorizes congress to make such laws touching the conduct of elections and returns, as will operate, first, to furnish to each house of congress appropriate evidence of the validity of the commission or appointment of any man who comes there claiming the right to a seat, and, second, to prohibit the intervention of any obstacle which might embarrass or prevent the exercise of the right of each house to judge of the election of any man who claims a right to a seat. It is familiar to us all, that, when a contest arises—I refer to this as the practical exposition of the subject—congress feels itself at liberty to probe the matter of the election of a representative to its very foundation, and to look through and beyond all forms of authentication and certificate, and inquire and determine the actual fact, whether or not he who claims a seat is entitled thereto; and our statute book contains numerous provisions having for their object the facilitating of the inquiry. Can it be, that when congress is clothed with full power to pass all laws to carry into effect this power conferred upon a department of the government, it may not make it an offence against the laws of the United States to effect a fraudulent registration, which is to stand as prima facie evidence that the vote which is cast is a legal and proper vote? I will not enlarge upon that branch of the subject, but there are considerations tending strongly to the inference, that the power contained in the last two clauses which I have named, is full and ample to sustain the constitutionality of the section on which this indictment is founded.

Our conclusion, then, is, that the section of the act in question upon which this indictment rests—the twentieth section—which assumes the power of congress to make it an offence against the laws of the United States to fraudulently register, is a constitutional enactment.

The next inquiry is, whether the indictment in question is a sufficient indictment under the act. That question involves no constitutional considerations. It involves no principles that are not generally applicable to an ordinary inquiry into the sufficiency of indictments. And, in reviewing this subject, and looking at the history of adjudications, particularly in the United States courts, but sustained by the courts of the states of New York and of Massachusetts, and others, we find ourselves in no doubt. This being a misdemeanor created and declared by statute, it is sufficient to describe the statutory offence in the words of the statute itself—in the words of the statute, adapted, of course, to the particular circumstances involved in the offence which is charged. This doctrine seems to us abundantly sustained by decisions. U. S. v. Bachelder [Case No. 14,490]; U. S. v. La Coste [Id. 15,548]; U. S. v. Pond [Id. 16,067]; U. S. v. O'Sullivan [Id. 15,974]; U. S. v. Wilson [Id. 16,730]; U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 138; Campbell v. People, 8 Wend. 636. The case of U. S. v. Wilcox [Id. 16,692], has singular significance in reference to a branch of the discussion upon this point. In that case, a man was indicted for perjury under the statute, for taking a false oath before a commissioner, which indictment was held insufficient because the commissioner was described as "a commissioner of the United States"—a description of so general a character as not to import an authority to administer an oath. But, notwithstanding the indictment was held insufficient, the court took occasion to say, that, setting forth the commission, or the particular powers of the commissioner, or the source whence they were derived, is not necessary, provided he is alleged to hold an office which apparently confers upon him the authority to administer the oath in the particular case specified, and that, that being done, the general allegation that he had competent authority to administer the oath, is sufficient.

This indictment, in our view, follows the words of the statute. Its departures are not properly departures. They are adaptations of the charge to the particular facts alleged, and, within every view, they are in substantial conformity to the statute.

It is suggested by my associate, and very properly, that it becomes a necessary part of our judicial duty, in construing this indictment, and in applying the inquiry whether it is substantially in conformity with the statute, that we take judicial notice of the statutes of the state of New York, which are referred to in the indictment itself.

Upon both of the points, therefore, involved in the discussion, we are of the opinion that the indictment should be sustained, and that the demurrer of the defendant should be overruled.

No suggestion being made to the court that the defendant had any defence to the indictment, judgment absolute was rendered against him on the demurrer, and he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the Albany county penitentiary, and to pay the costs of prosecution.

Case No. 16,111.

UNITED STATES v. QUITMAN.

[2 Am. Law Reg. 645.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Louisiana. July, 1854.

NEUTRALITY LAWS—POWER OF FEDERAL COURTS—BONDS TO OBSERVE LAWS—GRAND JURY.

1. A judge of the United States has power, on just grounds of suspicion, to require bond to observe the neutrality laws.

2. A grand jury charged with inquiring as to the existence of an organization whose object was the invasion of the territory of a friendly power, presented that the principal witnesses examined before them, and who were rumored to be the leaders in the unlawful enterprise, had refused to answer questions propounded to them on the subject, on the ground that it would criminate themselves. The grand jury also presented that, though they were unable to elicit any facts on which to base an indictment, or to show the existence of any actual military organization, yet that they believed that some such organization was in contemplation. Held, that there were sufficient grounds for requiring from the parties who declined to testify before the grand jury, bonds to observe the neutrality laws of the United States.

CAMPBELL, Circuit Justice. This case originated in a requisition by the court upon the defendant [John A. Quitman] to show cause why he should not give a bond to observe the laws of the United States in reference to the preservation of their neutral and friendly relations with foreign powers, contained in 3 Stat. 447.

The occasion for this requisition was made by a report of the grand jury, of which the following is an extract: "Report of the Grand Jury.—The grand jury beg leave to report to your honor that, in the discharge of the duty confided to them by the court, they have cited from among their fellow citizens a number of persons as witnesses to testify, and to prove from them, if possible, evidence in relation to the rumor in this city of an expedition, said to be on foot, the tendency and purpose of which would be to violate the neutrality laws of the United States. Among the witnesses cited were several whose names figured most prominently with the rumored expedition; and from the refusal of some of them to testify (as is known to the court) on the ground they could not do so without criminating themselves under the ruling of the court, the obvious inference left upon the minds of the grand jury was, that those rumors were not altogether without foundation; and from collateral evidence brought to their notice in the course of the investigation, they are further left to infer that meetings have been frequently held upon the subject of Cuban affairs, and that what are termed 'Cuban Bonds' have been issued, that funds have been collected, either by contributions, sale of these bonds, or promises to pay, to a very considerable amount, which was, or would be hereafter, at the disposal of whomsoever might be chosen to the command of an expedition purporting to be in aid of the Cuban revolutionists; but from a strict and searching investigation of the witnesses through the district attorney, the grand jury have been unable to elicit any facts upon which to found an indictment against any one. Although the grand jury strongly incline to the opinion that these meetings and collections of funds have for their end the organization of an expedition either for the purpose of assisting in a Cuban revolution, or of making a demonstration upon that island, yet the plan, whatever it may be, seems altogether in the prospective, and, aware as we are, that a great deal has been said and written about the extensive and formidable preparations on foot for the purpose of revolutionizing Cuba, we believe it has been very much overrated and magnified—nothing like a military organization or preparation having been brought to our notice."

At the time the report was made, the name of the defendant was returned with others who had declined to answer the interrogatories of the jury, and a printed statement of the facts which had occurred while he was before the jury has been filed. By that statement it appears that a printed circular, marked "private and confidential," signed by J. S. Thrasher as "corresponding secretary" of an association, was handed to the witness, was examined by him, and he was asked for an account of the meetings and proceedings described in it. That the witness declined to give information because his answers would criminate him. The printed circular referred to is also filed. It discloses the facts of several meetings in New Orleans, for the purpose of considering upon the means of liberating Cuba from the government of Spain; that there is a junto which acts in the name of "Frec Cuba" and represents its "aspirations;" that this junto has collected a large sum of money ($500,000), and holds intercourse with military men in the United States, relative to that object; that it issues bonds in the name and upon the pledge of the independent island and proposed government, and makes contracts with citizens of the United States to be trustees and treasurers of the movement, and to take the military control of it It contains the contract of a board of American trustees to hold its money, and the declarations of an eminent military leader, who agrees to take the command of the expedition when a million of dollars are collected. That the meetings are all in the design of fulfilling this requisition of this leader, whose name is not given. The bonds are issued to the subscribers at one-third their par value, and the military leader is pledged, should the expedition prove successful, to employ his influence to procure their assumption as a public debt of "Free Cuba." The circular discloses the fact that Cuba is in no condition to effect her own liberation; that the strength of the government and the vigilance of its police exposes every revolutionary movement in the island to defeat. The whole plan is addressed to citizens of the United States, and is for their execution. The military chief, selected from the United States, is the soul of the enterprise. The defendant is known to be an accomplished soldier, having a large share of the public confidence, and especially of those states which border on the Gulf of Mexico. The report of the grand jury is, "that his name has figured prominently with the rumored expedition," and for that reason he was cited to afford evidence "in relation to the rumor in this city of an expedition, the tendency and purpose of which would be to violate the neutrality laws of the United States." The circular I have described was handed to the defendant, and was inspected by him, and it contains a description of a person and the report of a speech, which, perhaps, might be attributed to the defendant without great injustice, whenever the fact is ascertained that he would consent to implicate himself in an enterprise like that set forth. The defendant confessed the fact of a connection of a kind which rendered it a matter of impropriety for the grand jury to press any question upon him relative to the details of the movement. "The obvious inference," say the grand jury, "is that these rumors were not altogether without foundation," and they find from other evidence, that an expedition is on foot, "for the purpose of assisting a Cuban revolution, or of making a demonstration upon the island."

The questions presented to the court are, is there a reasonable ground for the belief that the defendant is connected with the preparation of such an enterprise? Does the existence of such a suspicion impose a duty upon the court? The defendant contends that I have no right to rest any proceeding upon the inference of the grand jury, or to deduce any conclusion unfavorable to him from this conduct. The constitution of the United States does not allow the examination of a witness in any criminal case against himself, except with his consent. The common law of evidence extends the exemption, and he is not required to answer in any case either as a witness or a party, the effect of which answer might be to implicate him in a crime or misdemeanor, or subject him to a forfeiture. Burr's Case [Case No. 14,692e]; Cloyes v. Thayer, 3 Hill, 564. This privilege belongs exclusively to the witness. The party to the suit cannot claim its exercise, nor object to its waiver by the witness. 2 Russ. Crimes, 929; People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 195. The witness asserts this privilege on oath. The assertion is direct and positive that his answer will implicate him in a prosecution or forfeiture, and the court accepts his declaration without an inquiry as to what his answer will be. The inquiry of the court is, may the answer be such that it can be used as evidence against him? If the witness claims the privilege falsely and corruptly, he is guilty of perjury, and if by his falsehood he deprives a party of the benefit of necessary testimony, he is answerable for the damage he occasions in a civil action. Poole v. Perritt, 1 Spears, 128; Warnen v. Lucas, 10 Ohio, 336. The profound author of the "Treatise on Judicial Evidence" inquires whether, if all the criminals of every class had assembled and framed a system after their own wishes, is not this rule the very first which they would have established? Innocence can have no advantage from it; innocence claims the right of speaking, must speak, while guilt alone invokes the security from silence. The supreme court of Ohio say, in the case last cited, "For a witness to refuse to testify, because his testimony may criminate him, is at once to pronounce his own turpitude. Not one man in a thousand would, without reason, venture upon so perilous a situation." It was for a time supposed that questions addressed to a witness tending to criminate him, could not be propounded. This notion has been discarded, and the witness is driven to plead his exemption. When this plea is made in the case of third persons, no inference can be drawn unfavorable to the parties to the record. The plea is not theirs, and their suit should not be affected by the act of a stranger. 2 Starkie, N. P. 157, 158; 1 Russ. & M. 382, note. Though this doctrine is impugned by high authority. 2 Russ. 939; 1 Russ. & M. 382, note.

The case before me is not this case. The grand jury representing the United States, were taking an inquisition of the crimes against their authority, and were entitled to the information which their fellow citizens had. They have ascertained the existence of acts in violation of law. The defendant excuses himself from affording information he possesses, because his relations to those acts are such that his answers would criminate him. He has conducted himself so that an ordinary, but a most important duty cannot be fulfilled. It is my duty to afford to defendant every exemption that the laws have conferred. The constitutional exemption originated in the righteous abhorrence of our ancestors for the proceeding of those tribunals of the continent of Europe, where the rack and torture wrung from the accused, in the agony of their pain, words admitting guilt. I do not compel the defendant to answer.

It is said, that drawing a conclusion unfavorable to the defendant's innocence, from his refusal to answer, is equivalent to compelling a confession. The objection is specious, but without any application to the case in which it is preferred. The requisition upon the defendant involves no criminal prosecution nor charge of guilt, nor is the requisition a punishment. In the times of the Saxon constitution, every subject of England was held to give securities for his good behavior, who were to produce him to every legal charge; and if he did wrong, and escape, to bear what he ought to have borne. 1 Spence's Inquiry, 352, 3. Blackstone describes this as a preventive justice, "applicable to those as to whom there is a probable ground to suspect of future misbehavior." That the precaution spoken of is intended merely for prevention, without any crime actually committed by the party, but arising only from a probable suspicion that some crime is intended, or likely to happen, and consequently is not meant as any degree of punishment. 4 Bl. Comm. 252; 1 Term R. 696, 700. The statute of Edward III. defined the powers of magistrates in the exercise of this jurisdiction. That statute invested justices with authority to take and arrest all those that they may find by indictment or by suspicion, and put them in prison, and "to take of all that be not of good fame, where they shall be found, sufficient surety and main prize of their good behavior;" "to the intent that the people be not by such rioters troubled, nor endangered, nor the peace blemished." The interpretations of this statute comprehend all whom the magistrate shall have just cause to suspect to be dangerous, quarrelsome, or scandalous. Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 8, § 16. Dalton enumerated twenty classes of offenders who fall within it, including rioters, common quarrellers, such as lie in wait to rob, steal, make assaults, put passengers in fear, libellers, persons guilty of mischief to animals, and concludes whatsoever act or thing is of itself a misdemeanor, is cause sufficient to bind such an offender to the good behavior. Dalt. Just. 124. The cases in which this jurisdiction has been exercised are numerous. A person who said "he would do everything in his power to annoy another, short of actual violence," was held to give surety, the court declaring "we should be poor guardians of the public peace, if we could not interfere until an actual outrage had taken place, and perhaps fatal consequences ensued." "If a party inform the court or a justice of the peace, that he goes in fear and in danger of personal violence, by reason of threats employed against him, and pray protection of the court, the court, will grant it." 12 Adol. & E. 599. Nor will the defendant be allowed to controvert the facts or bring counter evidence. 13 East, 171. The whole rests on the principle that this is not a criminal proceeding, nor designed as a punishment. 1 Durn. & E. [1 Term R.] 700. I have thus traced the nature and extent of this jurisdiction in England, for the reason that it is the model upon which the same jurisdiction in Louisiana has been framed. Crimes, offences and misdemeanors mentioned in her statutes, and the modes of proceeding and rules of evidence, are construed, intended and taken with reference to the common law of England, except as otherwise provided. Rev. St. 213. Justices are allowed to take securities of the peace, when there is a just cause to apprehend that a breach of the peace is intended. Rev. St. 220, § 48. The laws regulating the internal police of the state, under the title "vagrants, vagabonds, and suspected persons" (Rev. St. 587 et seq.), confer a jurisdiction similar to that described by Hawkins and Dalton, under the statute of Edward III. Persons found under circumstances of suspicion, and whose conduct awakens apprehension for the security of property or of life, or for the maintenance of order and decorum, persons whose conduct jeopards the tranquility of society, or the supremacy of laws, are subject to arrest, under these statutes, and may be held to security or sent to the house of correction. I find no words in any English statute or commission more broad and comprehensive. It is true that these statutes affect the loitering, idle, vagrant and pauper population, and seem to have been framed for that class. But the law is not a respecter of persons, and if the proud and powerful place themselves, by crime, in the ranks of the suspicious, or vagrant, the law does not regard their pride or power. The supreme court of Louisiana, at an early period, exercised the power in question in a case of libel, and rested upon common law authorities. Nugent's Case, 1 Mart. (La.) 103. The authority of this court is derived from the act of congress of 1793 (1 Stat. 609, c. 82). The judges of the supreme court by that act "have power and authority to security of the peace, and for good behaviour in cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, as may or can be lawfully exercised by any judge or justice of the peace of the respective states in cases cognizable before them." Crimes against the United States are ascertained from their statutes. Those laws, like the laws of the states, are designed to secure the public peace and to promote domestic tranquillity. The powers granted to the justices of the supreme court extend only within the limits of that department of the public order which has been committed to the oversight of the federal government. The assembly of a body of men for the purpose of disturbing the peace of a city, or to invade private property, or to assail a particular person, would be an unlawful assembly or court, or if followed by an unlawful act, a riot under state laws. And first in the list of the offences described by Dalton and Burns, which fall within the remedial statutes we have considered, are those. By the treaties with Spain and by the neutrality laws, the United States have placed the territories of that kingdom under their protection against military and naval expeditions or enterprises from their borders or conducted by their citizens. They are in our peace; the attempt of a citizen to disturb that peace, by beginning, or setting on foot, or providing means for a military or naval expedition, is a breach of that peace. The statute pronounces those acts to be misdemeanors. The most restricted construction of statutes which authorize the requirement of securities for good behaviour must comprehend the cases arising under this statute.

The question now arises, under what circumstances can this requisition be made? The authorities say, "that the justices have power to grant it either by their own discretion or upon the complaint of others; yet that they should not command it, but only upon sufficient cause seen to themselves or upon the complaint of other very honest or credible persons." Hawkins and Blackstone define the discretion to be a legal discretion, to be put in exercise upon a just cause of suspicion. The facts disclosed in the report of the grand jury, with the explanatory evidence accompanying that report, leave me no room for hesitation or doubt. I have set forth at large the reasons for the judgment I have given, that there may be no misconstruction nor mistake of the grounds upon which this court acted. I have explained, in the charge addressed to the grand jury, my sense of the importance of the act of congress involved in this discussion, and my opinion of the policy in which it is founded. The honor of our country, the fair repute of its citizens, in my opinion, require an exact observance of that act. It is a law binding upon our whole people, and the principles, which justify its violation, menace the order and repose of the whole confederacy. But if my opinions were the reverse of what they are, in the position I occupy, I have but a single duty to perform. To the full extent, and no further, of the powers conferred upon me, I must enforce its execution. The defendant has, before a portion of this court, declared his inability to fulfill the public duty of affording information of practices involving a breach of the laws. That this inability arises from some undisclosed connection with those who are thus engaged. The president of the United States has admonished the country that there is danger of a violation of these important statutes, and the grand jury, after a patient investigation, certify that this admonition has a legitimate foundation. Public rumor has attached suspicion to the name of the defendant, according to the certificate. I will say with the chief justice of England, already quoted, "We should be poor guardians of the public peace, if we could not interfere until an actual outrage had taken place, and, perhaps, fatal consequences ensued."

Case No. 16,112.

UNITED STATES v. RADOWITZ.

[8 Reporter, 263.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 30, 1879.

EVIDENCE—TRANSCRIPT OF AUDITOR'S BOOKS.

In an action for moneys alleged to have been paid to defendant by mistake of a government disbursing officer, a transcript of the books of the second auditor's office is not competent evidence. Section 886, Rev. St., applies only to suits against persons accountable for public moneys as such.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

Action for moneys alleged to have been paid to a defendant by mistake of a government officer. In the court below a verdict for the defendant was directed. [Case unreported.]

WAITE, Circuit Justice. It was not error to exclude the certified transcript from the books of the second auditor's office as evidence. Section 886 of the Revised Statutes relates to suits against persons accountable for public money as such. Radowitz was sued for money alleged to have been paid him by mistake by one of the disbursing officers of the government. The records of the treasury department contain no evidence of any transaction between him and that department directly. All payments to him were made by paymasters in the army, and the entries in the second auditor's office were made from vouchers furnished by these paymasters, showing the manner in which they had disposed of the public moneys placed in their hands. If these vouchers are correct the account against Radowitz is properly stated, but if not it is wrong. The accounts which have been stated from the vouchers cannot be of any use upon the trial of such an issue. Neither was it error to exclude the vouchers as evidence of actual payment when it appeared affirmatively that Radowitz had never received the money. The judgment below should not be reversed until it is made affirmatively to appear that it was wrong. As the bill of exceptions confessedly does not contain all the evidence, I must assume there was enough to justify the court in directing a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 16,113.

UNITED STATES v. RAGSDALE.

[Hempst. 479.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. April, 1847.

INDIAN TRIBES—ADOPTION OF WHITE MAN—CONSTRUCTION OF PENAL STATUTES.

1. A white man who is incorporated with an Indian tribe at mature age, by adoption, does not thereby become an Indian, so as to cease to be amenable to the laws of the United States.

2. He may, however, by such adoption, become entitled to certain privileges in the tribe, and also make himself amenable to their laws and usages.

3. Therefore, the second article of the treaty of Washington, of the 6th of August, 1846, between the United States and Cherokee Indians (9 Stat. 871), had the effect to pardon an offence previously committed by an Indian, in the Cherokee country west of Arkansas, against a white man who had been adopted by that tribe, and become a part of it.

4. The case of U. S. v. Rogers, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 571, cited.

5. In the construction of penal statutes, it is a general rule that an offender who is protected by its letter, cannot be deprived of its benefit, on the ground that his case is not within the spirit and intention of the law.

[Cited in Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 337.]

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

6. Where there is no ambiguity there is no room for construction.

Indictment [against Thomas Ragsdale] for murder.

S. H. Hempstead, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Daniel Ringo and F. W. Trapnall, for prisoner.

Before DANIEL, Circuit Justice, and JOHNSON, District Judge.

JOHNSON, District Judge. Thomas Ragsdale, a Cherokee Indian, has been indicted in this court for the crime of murder, charged to have been committed upon a certain Richard Newland, a white man, in the country now occupied by the Cherokee Indians. After putting in the general issue of not guilty, the defendant has pleaded three additional pleas: in the first of which he avers that the said Richard Newland, in the year 1835, legally intermarried with a Cherokee woman, who was a member and citizen of the Cherokee tribe, in their country east of the Mississippi; and according to the laws and usages of the Cherokee Nation, said Newland was incorporated into and became a citizen of said tribe, for all the purposes of citizenship, and by virtue of said marriage became and was entitled to all the rights and privileges, civil and political, which belonged to any other citizen of said Nation. That when the United States removed the said tribe to their country west of the Mississippi, in the year 1838, said Newland was removed with them, and received from the United States his transportation money, rations, and year's subsistence after arriving in the country assigned to them west of the Mississippi, as a citizen and member of said tribe. That after said Newland was removed to the Cherokee country west of the Mississippi, he was and continued to be by virtue of his marriage and in accordance with the constitution, laws, and usages of said Nation, until the time of his alleged murder, entitled to all the rights and immunities, civil and political, which appertained to any and all other citizens of the tribe, and was subject and amenable to the laws and regulations of the Cherokee Nation. That said Newland, at the time of his said supposed murder, was an individual of the Cherokee Nation, within the meaning of the second article of the treaty made and concluded at Washington on the 6th day of August, 1846, between the United States and the Cherokee Nation of Indians; and that the murder of said Newland, if committed at all by the defendant, which he denies, was an offence by a citizen of the Cherokee Nation against an individual thereof, within the meaning of the said second article of said treaty, and was thereby fully and for ever pardoned.

The motion to strike out this plea made by the district attorney, is in the nature of a demurrer, and admits it to be true, for the purposes of this investigation. The second article of the treaty of Washington, of the 6th of August, 1846, contains the following provision: "All difficulties and differences heretofore existing between the several parties of the Cherokee Nation are hereby settled and adjusted, and shall, as far as possible, be forgotten, and for ever buried in oblivion. All party distinctions shall cease, except so far as this may be necessary to carry out this convention or treaty. A general amnesty is hereby declared. All offences and crimes committed by a citizen or citizens of the Cherokee Nation against the Nation, or against an individual or individuals, are hereby pardoned." Acts Cong. 1846, 9 Stat. 871. The only material inquiry presented by this plea is, whether the person charged in the indictment with the commission of the crime, and the person against whom it was committed, were, at the time, citizens or individuals of the Cherokee Nation, or tribe, for if they were, it is manifest that the offender has received a full and plenary pardon, by virtue of the second article of the treaty, above cited. The defendant Ragsdale is averred in the indictment to be an Indian of the Cherokee tribe, and not a white man; and consequently he is a citizen of the Cherokee Nation. Thomas Newland, upon whom the murder is charged to have been committed by Ragsdale, is averred in the plea to have incorporated himself with the Cherokee tribe of Indians as one of them, and was so treated, recognized, and adopted by the said tribe and the proper authorities thereof, and exercised all the rights and privileges of a Cherokee Indian in the said tribe, and was domiciled in their country, and that by these acts he became a citizen or an individual of the Cherokee Nation.

The question here arises, Whether a white man can become a member of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and be adopted by them as an individual member of that tribe? It is certainly true that the United States have never acknowledged or treated the native tribes of Indians as independent nations, nor regarded them as the owners of the territory they respectively occupied. On the contrary, they have always considered and treated them as dependent nations or tribes, subject to their dominion and control, and have exercised legislative power over them, by the punishment of crimes committed within their limits, no matter whether the offender be a white man or an Indian. But this dependent condition has never prevented them from having laws and usages, for their own internal government, and of adopting other persons as members of their tribe. This, however, is not an open question, but is expressly affirmed by the chief justice in delivering the opinion of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Rogers, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 571 [Case No. 16,187]. He uses the following language: "We think it very clear, that a white man who, at mature age, is adopted into an Indian tribe, does not thereby become an Indian, and was not intended to be embraced in the exception above mentioned. He may, by such adoption, become entitled to certain privileges in the tribe, and make himself amenable to their laws and usages; yet he is not an Indian, and the exception is confined to those who, by the usages and customs of the Indians, are regarded as belonging to the race. It does not speak of members of a tribe, but of the race generally, of the family of Indians; and it intended to leave them, both as regarded their own tribes and other tribes also, to be governed by Indian usages and customs." The above language is too clear to be misunderstood; that in the opinion of the supreme court, a white man may incorporate himself with an Indian tribe, be adopted by it, and become a member of the tribe. The plea avers that the said Newland did so incorporate himself, was adopted, and became a member of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and continued to be a member thereof, to the time he is charged to have been murdered by Ragsdale.

The language of the treaty granting the pardon is clear, and free from ambiguity. Its language is, that "All offences and crimes committed by a citizen or citizens of the Cherokee Nation against the Nation or an individual or individuals, are hereby pardoned." It cannot be doubted that the latter clause of the above sentence means "against an individual or individuals of the Cherokee Nation." The offence of the defendant, then, is expressly embraced by the second article of the treaty granting a pardon, and the plea, if true, is a good bar to the indictment. It has, however, been earnestly contended on the part of the United States by the district attorney, that even admitting that the letter and words of the treaty apply to and embrace the defendant's case, that it is clearly not within the spirit and intention of the treaty. It is a sound rule in the construction of penal statutes, that if the case of the accused is clearly within the letter of a statute in his favor, the court will rarely, if ever, take his case out of it, upon the ground that it is not within the spirit and intent of the act. 4 Term R. 665; 6 Term R. 286; 1 Leach, 73; Dwar. St. 736; U. S. v. Wilson [Case No. 16,730]. The case must be clear and free from all doubt, to justify the court in making this construction. It is also a maxim of the law, that where there is no ambiguity, there is no room for construction. U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 95, 96. But looking at the spirit, object, and intent of the treaty, I can see no reasonable ground for the opinion that the crime charged against the defendant was not intended to be embraced. One great object of the treaty was the restoration of peace and harmony among the hostile parties of the Cherokee tribe, who by their conflicts and civil wars had disturbed the peace and threatened to deluge their land in blood; and to effectuate this desirable end a general amnesty of all past offences was declared, and as far as possible to be forgotten and buried in oblivion. In this plenary pardon to all native born Cherokees, why should it not also extend to adopted members of the tribe? After adoption they became members of the community, subject to all the burdens, and entitled to all the immunities of native born citizens or subjects; and it is reasonable, in my judgment, to suppose that they were intended to be included in the general amnesty.

The two remaining pleas are in substance a former trial, and acquittal for this offence under the Cherokee laws in the Cherokee country. These pleas are, in my judgment, clearly insufficient, upon the ground that the Cherokee court had no jurisdiction of his case. As for us, congress legislates for the punishment of crimes committed in the Indian country; that legislation is, in its nature, exclusive. The reasons upon which this position is based, I have not time at present to state, nor indeed do I deem it material, as I consider it free from doubt, and the reasons for it will suggest themselves to every reflecting mind.

The third and fourth pleas of former acquittal are ordered to be stricken out; but the motion to strike out the second plea of pardon is overruled. Ordered accordingly.

The prisoner was discharged on his plea of pardon.

Case No. 16,114.

UNITED STATES v. RAILROAD BRIDGE CO.

[6 McLean, 517;[1] 3 Liv. Law Mag. 568.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July Term, 1855.

PUBLIC LANDS — MILITARY RESERVATION — ABANDONMENT AND SALE — PUBLIC ROADS AND BRIDGES—OBSTRUCTIONS TO COMMERCE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. A military reserve may be abandoned by the government, when it becomes useless for public purposes, and by giving notice through the secretary of the treasury, now the secretary of the interior, it may be considered as a part of the public lands, from which it was temporarily reserved.

2. Such lands having been surveyed and offered at public auction, may be open to entry as other lands.

3. The reserve on Rock Island, though surveyed, never having been offered for sale at public auction, does not come technically within the act of 1852, authorizing railroad companies to locate their roads through the lands of the United States. The act of 1819 [3 Stat. 520], authorizing the sale of military reserves, &c., which had become useless, embraced only those lands which had been reserved and become useless, at the time the above act was passed. The power given to the defendant to construct the road and build a bridge across the Mississippi, is not controverted.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

4. In all the Western states, within which there have been public lands, it has been the uniform practice to make public roads through the lands of the United States. This every state may do, under its power of eminent domain.

[Cited in Jones v. Florida C. & P. R. Co., 41 Fed. 72.]

[Cited in brief in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 122 Ill. 476, 13 N. E. 140.]

5. And this power is exercised by a state, subject to no power vested in the federal government. The proprietary right of the United States can in no respect restrict or modify this exercise of the sovereign power by a state.

[Cited in Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co., 3 Fed. 110; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 26 Fed. 478; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Leavenworth, N. & S. Ry. Co., 29 Fed. 729.]

[Cited in People v. District Court (Colo. Sup.) 17 Pac. 301; Burt v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 106 Mass. 360; Flint & P. M. Ry. Co. v. Gordon, 41 Mich. 428, 2 N. W. 653; Simonson v. Thompson, 25 Minn. 453.]

6. It is essential to the welfare of the citizens of the states, that this power should be exercised.

7. So far as easements by establishing public roads, are concerned, within a state, by its legislature, the jurisdiction is exclusive.

8. The power to regulate commerce among the states is vested in congress, but the judicial power cannot act until congress shall prescribe the rule in regard to commerce.

[Cited in Gatton v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. (Iowa) 63 N. W. 595.]

9. Where there is an obstruction to commerce which operates to the irreparable injury of an individual, the court may act to prevent the injury.

10. This was the ground on which the jurisdiction was sustained against the Wheeling bridge, at the instance of the state of Pennsylvania.

11. And in a similar case, relief could be given to the United States.

12. But the facts in regard to the injury done to the land on Rock Island, do not authorize such an interference.

13. If the amount of injury were to be considered, to the land on Rock Island as alleged, the benefits conferred would be as five to one.

14. The bridges to be constructed over both branches of the Mississippi, at Rock Island, with the draws proposed, at the place selected, will not cause any appreciable obstruction to commerce.

[Cited in Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Edmonds, 3 Mackey, 538.]

15. The bridge is thrown over a sluggish current more than half a mile below the rapids, which are only half the width of each of the two draws.

This is an application by the United States for an injunction against the Railroad and Bridge Company, to prevent them from constructing their railroad across Rock Island and bridges connected therewith, over both channels of the Mississippi river.

The Attorney General of the United States, and Mr. Hoyne, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Reverdy Johnson and Sargeant & Judd, for defendants.

BY THE COURT. The bill states that as early as 1812, the western extremity of Rock Island was occupied as a military post, called "Fort Armstrong"; that various buildings and fortifications were erected thereon by the United States, which were occupied for military purposes from 1816 to 1836, at which date it was evacuated by the troops of the United States, and ceased to be a military garrison. In April, 1825, the island was reserved for military purposes by the secretary of war, of which the commissioner of the general land office was informed, and by him due notice was given to the register and receiver of the land office in which the reservation was situated. By the order of the secretary of war in 1835, the whole of Rock Island was reserved for military purposes, and the register and receiver of the land office at Galena, a new land district, which included the island, were duly notified by the commissioner of the general land office. Since the troops were withdrawn from the island, it has been occupied, as the bill states, by the Indian Department, by the ordnance department, as a depot for arms, &c., and by agents of the quarter-master's department, for the protection of the property of the United States, up to the time of filing the bill. And the complainants allege, that the defendants have located their railroad over the island and by their agents have made large and deep excavations of earth and embankments, on the line of the road over the island, removing rocks and cutting timber, greatly to their injury and the injury of the soil, for which injuries no adequate remedy can be had by an action at law. And the complainants also allege, that preparation has been made by the company for the construction of a bridge over the western channel of the river, which will materially obstruct the navigation of steamboats, many of which ply upon the river, several hundred miles above Rock Island; that steamboats, in carrying on a commerce on the river, frequently take boats or barges in tow on each side of them, which would require a much wider draw to pass down the river than the one proposed to be made in the bridge, and that it would at all times be difficult and dangerous, from the rapidity of the current, for a steamboat to pass through the draw. On these grounds substantially, and on the ground that the power to regulate commerce among the several states is vested in congress, &c., an injunction is asked.

The defendants rely on two acts of the legislature of the state of Illinois, one dated in 1847, and the other in 1851, incorporating and authorizing them to locate a railroad, with one or two tracks, by the way of La Salle, from Chicago to the town of Rock Island, on the Mississippi river; and they allege that on the 17th day of January, 1853, the legislature of Illinois created the defendants a body corporate with power to build a railroad bridge across the Mississippi at or near Rock Island, or so much thereof as is within the state of Illinois, and to connect by railroad or otherwise, with any railroads in the states of Illinois or Iowa, in such manner as shall not materially interfere with or obstruct the navigation of the river, &c. And the defendants set up the following report of the secretary of war, dated the 30th of December, 1847: "Sir,—In compliance with a resolution of the senate of the 22d instant, requiring the secretary of war 'to inform the senate, if Fort Armstrong, on Rock Island, in the state of Illinois, is now occupied as a fort; and if not, how long the same has been abandoned, in whose charge the same is, and on what terms; and also that he communicate his opinion, if the interest of the government requires that said site should be reserved from sale for military purposes,' I have the honor to transmit, herewith, reports from the adjutant general, the acting chief of ordnance, and the quarter-master general, containing the information desired; and to state that in my opinion, the interest of the government does not require that said site be longer reserved from sale for military purposes. (Signed,) Wm. L. Marcy."

The adjutant general reported that Fort Armstrong, on Rock Island, was evacuated May 4th, 1836, in pursuance of general orders, No. 9, dated January 25th of the same year. He says it was subsequently used by the ordnance department as a depot on a small scale for arms and munitions; but it is understood the stores were all removed some years since. Rock Island, he states, is not believed to be of any value for military purposes, and is considered as finally abandoned. The quarter-master general reported "that Fort Armstrong is now in charge of his department; and that Thomas Drane is employed at a compensation of sixteen dollars per month to take care of it." It is of no further use to the public as a military site, and he recommended that it be transferred to the land department. The chief of ordnance reported that as far as regards the ordnance department, he considered the reserve no longer necessary for military purposes. On the 11th of February, 1848, the secretary of war enclosed the above report to the secretary of the treasury, and says: "that the site of Fort Armstrong is no longer required for military purposes, and it is therefore hereby relinquished and placed at the disposal of the department which has charge of the public lands. (Signed) Wm. L. Marcy."

A return of the survey of the land on Rock Island, as public lands are surveyed by the surveyor general, is in evidence. Under the act of June 14th, 1809, which authorized the president of the United States to erect such fortifications as may be necessary in his opinion for the protection of the northwestern frontier, Fort Armstrong was built. But the reserve was not made in form until 1825, as above stated. By the act 3d March, 1819, the secretary of war was authorized, under the direction of the president, to cause to be sold such military sites belonging to the United States, as may have been found, or become, useless for military purposes. And the secretary of war is thereby authorized, on the payment of the consideration agreed for, into the treasury of the United States, to make, execute and deliver all needful instruments for transferring the same in fee, and the jurisdiction over the reserve ceded by a state shall cease. In 1830, the secretary of war instructed the adjutant general to write to Col. Mason, directing the sale of the reservation on Rock Island, on terms most favorable to the United States. In three or four months afterwards a telegraphic despatch postponed the sale "until further orders." By the act of the 4th of August, 1852 [10 Stat. 28], the right of way was given to all rail and plank roads or macadamized turnpike companies, that were or might be chartered over and through any of the public lands of the United States, &c., with the following proviso: "That none of the foregoing provisions of this act shall apply to, or authorize any rights in any lands of the United States, other than such as are held for private entry or sale, and such as are unsurveyed and not held for public use, by erection or improvement thereon."

The case involves several very important questions, some of which have not been heretofore raised for judicial consideration. The suit is brought by the general government, not in its sovereign capacity, but for the protection of certain public trusts, committed to it, which require, as is supposed, the exercise of the judicial power. This is more in accordance with the principles of our government, than a resort to military force. The president, under existing laws may remove trespassers from the public lands, by a military order, or by a civil action, or an indictment. Where a suit is brought by a state, or by the general government, it is subject to the forms of pleading and the rules of procedure applicable to suits between individuals; and wherever an injury is inflicted on the public rights protected by law, a remedy, civil or criminal, is given.

Congress has the exclusive power, under the constitution, to regulate commerce between two or more states, and it is contended that, in virtue of this power, the complainants have a right to maintain this suit, on the ground that the bridge proposed to be constructed will be an obstruction to commerce, and this presents a new question. The commercial power of the constitution is that which the federal government exercises in its sovereign and legislative capacity. It has regulated commerce on the Mississippi river and the other navigable rivers of the United States, so far as navigation by steamboats is concerned; and ports of delivery have been established. This regulation has extended on the Mississippi a great distance above Rock Island. But this commercial power can only be exercised and carried out by legislation; and when this shall be done, any violation of the laws will subject the offenders to the penalties provided. The instrumentality of the judiciary can be invoked only by the government to give effect to its laws, civil or criminal, but the judicial power cannot precede that of legislation. The rule of action on all questions of policy, within the federal powers, must be prescribed by congress. There is no federal common law which pervades the Union, and constitutes a rule of judicial action. But in all the states the common law is in force, in a greater or less degree. Its existence and extent are shown by the statutes of the states respectively, and the usages of the courts. But there is no common law in regard to regulations of navigation. These must be adapted to the peculiar circumstances of a country, and the facilities which exist for traffic. In this respect, the legislation of congress is the only remedy known to the constitution. If it be admitted that the bridge would be an obstruction to the commerce of the Mississippi river, is there any power in the judiciary to remedy the evil? The commercial power is in congress, but until it shall prescribe the rule, the power is dormant. Congress has power to punish the counterfeiting of the current coin of the Union, the violation of the mail, and many other acts, but, until the law shall fix the punishment, the courts of the United States cannot punish. Neither can a proceeding by indictment or information be instituted in the judicial courts of the Union, without statutory authority. The law of redress must be enacted before redress can be given. In this respect, as a suitor, the government occupies the same position as an individual or a corporation. If there be an obstruction in or over a navigable water which injures private right, redress may be found by an action. On this ground the supreme court sustained the complaint of the state of Pennsylvania against the obstruction of the Wheeling bridge, because it was an injury to the line of transportation over its roads and canals, which it had constructed, and from which a revenue was derived. The state sued as an individual might have sued, on the ground of an injury, which, at common law, was irreparable. For such an injury the general government may obtain an injunction. But no such special injury to the property of the government is alleged in this case, except as to the reserved land on Rock Island, which allegations will be hereafter examined. The power to regulate commerce is not property, nor is it in this view a subject of judicial action where it has not been exerted.

Under the commercial power, congress may declare what shall constitute an obstruction or nuisance, by a general regulation, and provide for its abatement by indictment or information through the attorney-general; but neither under this power, nor under the power to establish post roads, can congress construct a bridge over a navigable water. This belongs to the local or state authority, within which the work is to be done. But this authority must be so exercised as not materially, to conflict with the paramount power to regulate commerce. If congress can construct a bridge over a navigable water, under the power to regulate commerce or to establish post roads, on the same principle it may make turnpike or railroads throughout the entire country. The latter power has generally been considered as exhausted in the designation of roads on which the mails are to be transported; and the former by the regulation of commerce upon the high seas and upon our rivers and lakes. If these limitations are to be departed from, there can be no others, except the discretion of congress. It is admitted, that in the regulation of commerce as a question of policy, the only limitation imposed by the constitution is, that no preference can be given to a port in one state over those of another.

Was Rock Island a military reserve at the time the alleged trespass was committed? That it was reserved for military purposes in 1825 is clear. The secretary of war, acting under the president, and by his authority, reserved it, and it was so entered on the books of the land offices at Edwardsville and Galena. And it was occupied as such until the year 1836, when it was abandoned as a military post; the troops were withdrawn, and sometime afterward the buildings were sold. The abandonment of Rock Island as a military post, and for all public purposes, was as complete as its reservation had been, by all the public authorities by whom it was selected or used. The suspension of the sale under the act of 1819 was ordered by Mr. Poinsett, secretary of war, not because it was wanted for public purposes, but on the ground that the act did not authorize its sale. On the 8th of November, 1838, he wrote to the general land office that "the reservation would not be sold under the above act, and that it was left to the general land office to take such measures for the sale of the reservation as it may deem proper under existing laws." In this view Mr. Poinsett was correct. The act referred to provided "That the secretary be, and he is hereby authorized, under the direction of the president of the United States, to cause to be sold such military sites, belonging to the United States, as may have been found or become useless for military purposes." "And the secretary of war," the act provides, "is hereby authorized, on the payment of the compensation agreed for, into the treasury of the United States," to execute a deed, &c. This law, from its language, was not intended to be a general regulation; but authorized the sale of military reserves, which, at that time, had become useless. It changed the settled mode of selling public lands, as it authorized the secretary to sell for a price agreed on, which precludes, or at least renders unnecessary a sale by public auction, as the general law for the sale of the public lands required. This consideration, as well as the purport of the section, showed that it was not a general regulation, but was intended to operate upon military reservations which then existed and which were unnecessary.

The attorney-general contends that "the frequent interposition of congress, especially authorizing the sale of military reservations, negatives the idea that they could be sold without statute authority." When land has been purchased by the United States for military or other purposes, it is admitted the land cannot be sold without the special authority of congress. In such cases the purchase is made for a specific object, and being purchased with the consent of the state, under the federal constitution, there is a cession of jurisdiction as well as of property. Now, to transfer property so acquired and relinquish the jurisdiction, the authority of congress is indispensable. And this shows the reason why the act of the 28th of April, 1825 [4 Stat. 264], was passed. It provides in the first section, "that in all cases where lands have been, or shall hereafter be conveyed to or for the United States, for forts, arsenals, dock yards, light houses, or any like purpose, etc., which shall not be used as necessary for the purpose for which they were purchased or other authorized purposes, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, to cause the same to be sold for the best price to be obtained, and to convey the same by grant or otherwise." Now, from this act it does not follow, that where the government reserves its own land from sale, for any public purpose. that a special act of congress after its abandonment is necessary for the sale of it. The president, under a general power given him by the act of 1808 [2 Stat. 496], selected a part of the land on Rock Island for a military site, on which Fort Armstrong was built. And when he finds the place no longer useful as a military post, or for any other public purpose, he has a right to abandon it, and notify the land offices where the reservation was entered. The entry on the books of the land offices within which the reserved site is situated, and the occupancy of the place by the government, are the only evidence of the reservation. And when this evidence is withdrawn, and the site is abandoned, the reserve falls back into the mass of the public lands subject to be sold under the general law. But before such land can be sold at private sale under the general system, it must, by proclamation, be offered at public auction. The proclamation should give notice of the sale of the reserved tract as other lands. In this mode, I think, the sale would be a valid one.

The right claimed in the case of Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 509, was a preemption under the act of 1834, which declared that "no entry or sale of any land shall be made under the provisions of the act, which shall have been reserved for the use of the United States, or which is reserved for sale by act of congress or order of the president, or which may be appropriated for any purpose whatever." Before the entry was made as a pre-emptive right by Beaubin, a light house upon the reserve was built by the government, and the possession of it for public purposes had never been abandoned. Under the circumstances stated, Rock Island cannot be considered as a military reserve. The possession of it was abandoned, and the right of government released through the same authority, by which it was appropriated. And no act has been done by the government, by which a new appropriation of the ground for military or any other public purpose is shown or can be presumed. The buildings had been sold by the government. The sale of the reserve was suspended, it is presumed, because there was no power to sell by the war department under the act of 1819. That the suspension of the sale was in no respect influenced by a desire to retain Rock Island for any public purpose, appears by the subsequent action of the war department.

The next inquiry is, whether the land in question is within the provision of the act of congress of August 4th, 1852, which grants the right of way through the public lands to all roads, etc. The first section of that act grants right of way to "all railroads and McAdamized turnpike companies, that may be chartered within ten years, over and through any of the public lands of the United States, may be authorized by an act of the legislature of the respective states in which public lands may be situated," etc. To the 3d section of that act there are several provisos, the last of which is: "That none of the foregoing provisions of this act shall apply to or authorize any rights in any lands of the United States, other than such as are held for private entry and sale, and such as are unsurveyed and not held for public use by erections or improvements thereon." This act required the proper officers of such road to transmit to the commissioner of the general land office, "a correct plan of the survey of the road, together with the survey of sites for depots, which were granted on the line of such selection, which shall become operative." This survey of the road and of sites for depots on it, was transmitted to the commissioner of the general land office, as the act required. In a report of the commissioner of the general land office to the secretary of the interior, dated 19th of January, 1854, the commissioner says, by way of note: "As regards the right of way for the road, (now under consideration,) it is already granted by the general act entitled, 'An act to grant the right of way to all railroads,' &c." In the same report the commissioner states, "that several bills have been reported to congress of late years, materially changing the mode of disposing of such reservations, which are now on special file." The opinion of the commissioner, as to the right of way or the necessity of legislation, before reserves can be sold, whether right or wrong, can have no influence in the decision of this case. A part of the land on Rock Island has been granted, and it is proposed to make, in addition, one or more private grants. This shows, at least, that the reserve does not, in the opinion of congress, remain to the extent of the island. Although this land cannot be now considered a military reserve, yet it is not "held," in the language of the law, "for private entry and sale." Under the general law, no public land can be so considered, which has not been offered at public auction, under the proclamation of the president In giving a construction to this act, the court is not at liberty to change the meaning by changing the copulative conjunction into a disjunctive. If effect could be given to the argument, in this respect, it would pervert the meaning of the act. But this reading, if it were admissible, would not change the effect of the act. Land is not held for private entry, which has not been offered at public sale; nor is land held for sale in the meaning of the law, which has not been so offered. It is true the land was directed to be sold under the act of 1819; but as that act did not authorize such a sale, the land cannot be considered to have been held for private sale. The other member of the sentence describing lands within the act is: "And such (lands) as are unsurveyed and not held for public use by erection and improvements thereon." Now this provision applies to the period of time, when the right is claimed by the railroad. The ground in question was appropriated for military purposes, but when the entry on the land complained of was made, it was not a military reservation; and any improvements thereon had been, not only abandoned and sold, but the former reservation was relinquished and annulled. To hold then, under the circumstances, that the land was still a military reservation for any public use, would disregard the facts in the case. Whether the government might not have again reserved the land for some public purpose is a question not involved in the decision. It would be in it, if there were any evidence that such reservation had been made. To presume such a reservation would be against the evidence.

The improvements under the above statute having been abandoned and sold, may be considered as not having been made, and so as to the reservation. But still the provision is not technically within the statute. It refers to lands "unsurveyed," and the lands on Rock Island have been surveyed. This is a technical objection, and to such objection some minds on the bench and at the bar are strongly inclined. My taste does not lie in this line, as it often defeats the great ends of justice, and preserves nothing of any value. The charter granted by the state of Illinois, to the defendants, authorizes them to locate and construct their road, to purchase the right of way, to condemn the land where necessary, and have the damages assessed as provided for in the charter. And in regard to the construction of a railroad across the Mississippi river, the company is vested with power to build, maintain, and use a railroad bridge over the river, or that portion of it which is within the jurisdiction of the state of Illinois, at or near Rock Island, in such manner as shall not materially obstruct or interfere with the free navigation of the river; and to connect by said road or otherwise, such bridge with any railroad, either in the state of Illinois or Iowa, terminating at or near said point; to unite or consolidate its franchises and property with any or all bridges or railroad companies in either of said states." That the state of Illinois had power to grant the charters for the road and bridge, has not been questioned. A doubt might once have been entertained, whether a state could, under the power of eminent domain, confer the power of appropriation to private companies; but this power has been so long exercised and acquiesced in, that it is now, probably, too late to question it.

Whether a state has power by an act of incorporation or otherwise, to authorize a rail or turnpike road through the lands of the United States, has not, it is believed, been raised or judicially decided. The first impression would be, probably, that a state cannot exercise such a power. But first impressions are rarely to be followed on constitutional questions. They should be deliberately and deeply considered, in relation to their bearing on the federal and state powers. That the federal government is one of enumerated powers is not controverted; nor that the states reserved to themselves all powers not conferred on the general government, absolutely or by necessary implication. In the admission of new states into the Union, compacts were entered into with the federal government, that they would not tax the lands of the United States. This implies that the states had power to tax such land, if unrestrained by compact. The constitution provides, "that congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Under this provision congress organized territorial governments. Having power to sell the public lands, beyond the limits of any state, a territorial government was the only mode by which the purchasers and occupants of those lands could be protected in their rights of persons and property. Hence the implied power to establish such a government. The constitution was adopted a short time after the ordinance of 1787 was passed; and as that ordinance provided for the government of all the territory owned by the United States, no express provision for a territorial government was deemed necessary. In that ordinance it was declared that the states to be formed out of the territory "should never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States, in congress, nor with any regulation congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to bona fide purchasers." Within the limits of a state, congress can, in regard to the disposition of the public lands and their protection, make all needful rules and regulations. But beyond this it can exercise no other acts of sovereignty which it may not exercise in common over the lands of individuals. A mode is provided for the cession of jurisdiction when the federal government purchase a site for a military post, a custom-house, and other public buildings; and if this mode be not pursued, the jurisdiction of the state over the ground purchased remains the same as before the purchase. This, I admit, is not a decided point, but I think the conclusion is maintainable, by the deductions of constitutional law.

Under acts of congress, trespasses on the public lands are liable to a civil or criminal prosecution. And yet the statutes of congress are numerous, giving the settlers upon those lands without authority (which makes them trespassers,) pre-emption rights. And this latter policy has become so popular as to induce settlers to take possession of the best portion of the public lands, before they are surveyed or offered for sale. This policy of punishing acts in some, which are rewarded in others, seems to be inconsistent. The only excuse for the provision is, that he who takes the timber from the ground, renders it less valuable and enriches himself; while the other settles on the land with the view of purchasing it. But he is not obliged to make the purchase, and while in possession he may take from it the most valuable timber.

[In the case of Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 543, it was held, "a state has a perfect right to legislate as she may please, in regard to the remedies to be prosecuted in her courts, and to regulate the disposition of the property of her citizens by descent, devise or alienation. But congress is invested by the constitution with the power of disposing of the public lands, and making needful rules and regulations concerning it."

[The proprietary right to lands in a state held by the federal government is, in many respects, similar to that of an individual. A compact may exempt the lands of either from taxation. An action may be brought by either, for an injury done to the soil or timber. A conveyance of the title is made by the federal government under its own laws, and by the individual under the law of the state. The principal distinction under the two proprietorships is, that the government makes the conveyance under its own laws, and sues in its own courts, whilst an individual proprietor conveys under the laws of the state, and prosecutes under those laws for an injury done. But the important inquiry is, whether the public lands are subject to the sovereignty of the state in which they are situated.] [2]

It is a fair implication, that if the state were not restrained by compact, it could tax such lands. In many instances the states have taxed the lands on which our custom houses and other public buildings have been constructed, and such taxes have been paid by the federal government. This applies only to the lands owned by the government as a proprietor, the jurisdiction never having been ceded by the state. The proprietorship of land in a state by the general government, cannot, it would seem, enlarge its sovereignty or restrict the sovereignty of the state. This sovereignty extends to the state limits over the territory of the state, subject only to the proprietary right of the lands owned by the federal government, and the right to dispose of such lands and protect them, under such regulations as it may deem proper. The state organizes its territory into counties and townships, and regulates its process throughout its limits. And in the discharge of the ordinary functions of sovereignty, a state has a right to provide for intercourse between the citizens, commercial and otherwise, in every part of the state, by the establishment of easements, whether they may be common roads, turnpike, plank or railroads. The kind of easement must depend upon the discretion of the legislature. And this power extends as well over the lands owned by the United States, as to those owned by individuals. This power, it is believed, has been exercised by all the states in which the public lands have been situated. It is a power which belongs to the state, and the exercise of which is essential to the prosperity and advancement of the country. State and county roads have been established and constructed over the public lands in a state under the laws of the state, without any doubt of its power, and with the acquiescence of the federal government. In this respect the lands of the public have been treated and appropriated by the state as the lands of individuals. These easements have so manifestly conduced to the public interest, that no objection, from any quarter, has hitherto been made. And it is believed that this power belongs to the states.

It is difficult to perceive on what principle the mere ownership of land by the general government within a state, should prohibit the exercise of the sovereign power of the state in so important a matter as the easements named. In no point of view are these improvements prejudicial to the general interest; on the contrary, they greatly promote it. They encourage population, and increase the value of land. In no respect is the exercise of this power by the state inconsistent with a fair construction of the constitutional power of congress over the public lands. It does not interfere with the disposition of the lands, and instead of lessening enhances their value.

[2] [From 3 Liv. Law Mag. 568.]

Where lands are reserved or held by the general government for specified and national purposes, it may be admitted that a state cannot construct an easement which shall in any degree, affect such purposes injuriously. No one can question the right of the federal government to select the sites for its forts, arsenals and other public buildings. The right claimed for the state has no reference to lands specially appropriated, but to those held as general proprietor by the government, whether surveyed or not. The right of eminent domain appertains to a state sovereignty, and it is exercised free from the restraints of the federal constitution. The property of individuals is subject to this right, and no reason is perceived why the aggregate property, in a state, of the individuals of the Union, should not also be subject to it. The principle is the same, and the beneficial result to the proprietors is the same, in proportion to their interests. These easements have their source in state power, and do not belong to federal action. They are necessary for the public at large, and essential to the interests of the people of the state. The power of a state to construct a road, necessarily implies the right, not only to appropriate the line of the road, but the materials necessary for its construction and use. Whether we look to principle, or the structure of the federal and state governments, or the uniform practice of the new states, there would seem to be no doubt that a state has the power to construct a public road through the public lands. A grant to this effect is sometimes made by congress, as in the act of 1852; but this does not show the necessity of such a grant. Generally, congress appropriates to the road a large amount of lands. The positions are believed to be irrefragable—first, that the right of eminent domain is in the state; and secondly, that the exercise of this right by a state is no where inhibited, expressly or impliedly, in the federal constitution, or in the powers over the public lands by that instrument, in congress.

If this view be correct, the question is narrowed to the simple inquiry, whether the construction of the road, through Rock Island, connected at both ends by bridges over both channels of the river, which include the island, will do an irreparable injury to the public land on the island. Several witnesses have been examined on this point, and, as usual, there are among them differences of opinion. But the weight of the evidence does not show an irreparable injury. On the contrary, it appears that the works complained of will add greatly to the value of the island. From the nature of the improvement, this is so palpable as to require no illustration. By the flow of the river, on either side of the island, its inhabitants are cut off from all intercourse with the shores, except by a ferry. But the bridges proposed, and the railway, will connect the island with both shores, and bring over it a line of travel for passengers, and for the transportation of merchandise, which must add several hundred per cent. to the value of the island and its products.

The testimony in regard to the obstructions to commerce by the proposed bridge, is contradictory. Many witnesses have been examined on both sides, and while those called by the plaintiffs say the bridge will, in a great degree, destroy the commerce of the river, those called by the defendants think it will be no material obstruction. This discrepancy manifestly arises from a mistake in the locality of the bridge. The defendants' witnesses live in the neighborhood of the structure, and speak of it as located, whilst the witnesses of the plaintiffs fix the bridge much higher up the river, and where, from the rapid current occasioned by the falls and the ledges of rock which confine the water to a width of sixty feet, at the foot of the rapids, there is a short turn to the left in the channel, very near the proposed bridge, which would render the passage through the draw, if not impracticable, extremely dangerous. But the experienced engineer, Mr. Brayton, who superintends the building of the bridge, has taken the soundings of the river, and surveyed and measured the distance on it from the side of the bridge to the falls, and above them. This work is laid down on a map which he refers to. He says: "From the bridge up and on the sides of the river there are two chains of rock which at the bridge are widest apart, and gradually converging as you ascend, until at the distance of about two-thirds of a mile above the bridge, the channel becomes quite narrow, not exceeding in width sixty feet; that this narrow opening is in nearly a right line with the channel, as it runs through said point to the proposed draw in the bridge." And it appears from the soundings that the bridge is thrown over the deepest water in that part of the river. The engineer says "the plan upon which the bridge is being constructed is a wooden superstructure, built upon Howe's patent, supported by two stone abutments and six piers, laid in water cement. The span between the piers is two hundred and fifty feet in the clear, except the draw. The draw is to be a turn-table draw, two hundred and eighty-four feet in length, supported in the center by a circular stone pier of solid masonry, leaving an opening on each side of such turn-table pier, one hundred and twenty feet in the clear. That such draw is over the main channel and deepest water of the river on the line where the bridge crosses;" and that it is the line of navigation uniformly taken by the boats running up and down.

Except the earth used for the embankment across the island for the road, but few of the materials for the work have been taken from the island. The rock on the island was unfit for masonry, and some of it has been used to fill up the unexposed part of the abutments of the bridge and a small amount of rif-raf work. The embankment is shown to be half a mile from the principal building at Fort Armstrong. Convenient passage ways have been made under the railroad, so that there is no obstruction to the passage from one end of the island to the other. It seems that about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars have been expended by the company on the road over the island, and on the bridges. Thirteen acres and a half of the land on the island appears to be occupied by the road. Several of the witnesses estimate the value of the land without the bridge and the road, at one hundred and fifty dollars per acre; the road being made, and the bridges, they suppose it will be worth one thousand dollars per acre.

One of the witnesses for the defendants states, that he has long acted as a pilot for steamboats and rafts over the rapids, and is well acquainted with the river; that for more than half a mile above the bridge, the channel from the draw up is straight, running to the opening in the rocks, known as "Shoemaker's Chain," and that the velocity of the current from the chain to the bridge, is little more than two and a half miles per hour. The piers, except where the draws are placed, are two hundred and fifty feet apart, which affords ample space for rafts, the bridge being elevated above low water some thirty-three feet, and twenty feet above high water. The falls, it would seem, must, from the rapidity, sinuosity, and narrowness of the channel, present the principal obstructions to the navigation of this part of the river. Rafts or barges attached to steamboats are loosened, before descending the falls, and they are floated down under the direction of a pilot. This, it is said, is never done in the night, unless the river is high. Whatever improvements may be made in widening this channel, it is hardly probable that it will be extended to double its present width, which would make it equal only to either of the draws below. And if this were done, the passage of the draws over a deep, straight and sluggish current, would be much safer than the rapids. Indeed, from the concurrent views of the witnesses who speak of the bridge where it is being constructed, there will be but little or no delay or hazard in passing the draws. If any injury should result to boats from any want of attention by the bridge company, or the structure of the draw, they being managed with reasonable care, an action at law may be resorted to, as in other cases of wrong.

Having considered this great case, in regard to the legal principles involved under the federal and state governments, the magnitude of the enterprise, the interest of the public in the road and in the commerce of the Mississippi river, I am brought to the conclusion that the complainants are not entitled to the relief asked; and, therefore, the motion for an injunction is overruled.

Case No. 16,115.

UNITED STATES v. RAMSAY.

[Hempst. 481.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. April, 1847.

MURDER—ACCESSORY BEFORE THE FACT—CRIMINAL JURISDICTION.

1. There is no act of congress punishing an accessory before the fact of murder, and an indictment for that offence will be quashed.

2. To commit murder and to be accessory to it, are different and distinct offences.

3. The courts of the United States are only authorized to try and punish such crimes as congress expressly, or by necessary implication, has designated and affixed known and certain penalties to, and such courts have no common law jurisdiction in that respect.

The indictment charged, in substance, that certain persons to the grand jurors unknown, in the Indian country west of Arkansas, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, murdered one Charles Butler, an Indian, and that John Ramsay, a white man, was accessory thereto before the fact.

E. H. English, for prisoner, filed a motion to quash the indictment, on the ground that there was no law of congress punishing the offence charged in the indictment, and this point he argued at length.

S. H. Hempstead, U. S. Dist. Atty., in his argument in opposition to the motion, insisted on the following points, namely: (1) The law of congress of the 30th of April, 1790, § 3, declares that the crime of murder shall be punished with death. Gord. Dig. 937 [1 Stat. 113]. (2) That if a statute enacts an offence to be felony, though it may mention nothing of accessories before or after the fact, yet virtually and consequentially they are included. 1 Russ. Crimes, 35; 1 Hale, P. C. 613, 614, 704; 3 Inst. 59. (3) That accessories before the fact and principals were subject to capital punishment at common law, and as the above act punishing murder, ex vi termini, embraces accessories according to a well-settled rule of construction; therefore, accessories before the fact must be punishable capitally under that law. 4 Bl. Comm. 39; 3 Inst. 188. (4) That the only reason originally for the distinction between principals and accessories was the benefit of clergy; but in contemplation of law and morals, the accessory before the fact is guilty of as deep enormity as the actual perpetrator of a murder, and therefore he ought to receive the same punishment. (5) That it cannot be supposed that congress meant to exempt accessories from punishment, and the fact that there is no specific legislation with regard to them is almost conclusive proof that they were intended to be included in the general law against murder, and to receive the same punishment as principals.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

JOHNSON, District Judge. It is true, as urged by the district attorney, that he who advises or counsels the commission of a murder, is, in point of morals, as guilty as the principal, and should, doubtless, be punished accordingly. In legal language, however, he is not guilty of murder, but is only accessory to it; and this distinction is preserved in all the books on criminal jurisprudence. It is said that the act of congress punishing murder necessarily embraces an accessory before the fact, and subjects him to the punishment of death. I cannot assent to the correctness of this position; but, on the contrary, applying the known rule that penal statutes must be construed strictly, I entertain no doubt that the point made by the prisoner's counsel is well taken and must be sustained. Certainly, to commit the crime of wilful murder, and to be accessory to it, are different offences; and in the trial of Burr [Cases Nos. 14,692-14,694a], for treason, Chief Justice Marshall very clearly lays down that proposition. That an accessory before the fact ought to be punished will not be questioned by any one, for he is, indeed, frequently involved in deeper guilt than the principal. This is a question, however, for the consideration of the legislative department, and this court is only authorized to try and punish such crimes as congress expressly or by necessary implication have visited with known and certain penalties, and the court has no common law jurisdiction in that respect. The defects in the Criminal Code of the United States, have been severely felt, but it is for congress, not this court, to interpose and apply the corrective; and as I should not feel warranted in pronouncing sentence of death on the prisoner in case of conviction, I shall sustain the motion to quash the indictment, and direct him to be discharged, regretting, at the same time, that there is no law to reach his case.

Prisoner discharged accordingly.

Case No. 16,116.

UNITED STATES v. RAND et al.

[4 Sawy. 272.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July 30, 1877.

MARSHAL'S BOND—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Section 786 of the Revised Statutes, limiting the time within which actions must be commenced on marshal's bonds, does not apply to actions instituted by the United States.

At law.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

John M. Coghlan, U. S. Atty.

Latimer & Morrow, for defendant.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. This is an action upon a United States marshal's official bond. The sureties demur on the ground that it appears upon the face of the complaint that the action is barred by the statute of limitations. The defendant [Charles W.] Rand, as appears from the allegations of the complaint, went out of office on September 1, 1869; and the breach alleged is, that the amount claimed, about $900, was then in his hands, which he neglected and refused, and which he still neglects and refuses to pay to the plaintiff. The complaint was filed August 30, 1876, so that more than six years elapsed after Rand ceased to be marshal before this action was commenced.

The United States attorney makes the point that the statute of limitations, relating to marshals' bonds, does not apply to actions brought by the United States, but only to actions upon the bond in favor of private parties. Section 786 of the Revised Statutes provides "that no suit on a marshal's bond shall be maintained, unless it is commenced within six years after the right of action accrues, saving, nevertheless, the right of infants, married women, and insane persons, so that they sue within three years after their disabilities are removed." Section 784 authorizes persons injured by breaches of the conditions of marshals' bonds to institute suits thereon in their own names, and for their own use. It is insisted by the United States attorney that statutes of limitations do not embrace the government, unless specially named; that the United States is not named in this statute, and as there are private parties to whom the provision can apply, the ordinary rule upon the subject must prevail.

In Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 98, the supreme court say that "the statutes of a state prescribing periods within which rights must be prosecuted are not held to embrace the state itself, unless it is expressly designated, or the mischiefs to be remedied are of such a nature that it must necessarily be included." In the provisions of the Revised Statutes, it is not pretended that the United States is "expressly designated." The form of expression is that usually adopted in statutes of limitations relating to actions upon contracts. I do not perceive that there is any reason for supposing the mischief to be remedied is of such a nature that the United States must necessarily be included, that does not apply with equal force to all cases of contracts with the government, and I know of no other bonds or contracts to which any statute of limitations is made applicable, except postmasters' bonds; and in this case, the limitation is made applicable to the United States in express terms. Rev. St. § 3838.

It was doubtless intended by these provisions of the Revised Statutes to continue in force the provisions of the acts of congress as they before existed. By referring to the statute as it stood before the revision, it will be found that the latter part of section 783, sections 784–786, are copied from the act relating to marshals' bonds of April 10, 1806 (2 Stat. 372), and that they constitute the whole of that act. A consideration of the act as it originally stood, will afford the best means of ascertaining the meaning intended to be expressed. It will be seen that the whole subject-matter of that act is the rights of private parties in marshals' bonds. The first section requires all marshals' bonds to be recorded in the clerk's office, and provides that certified copies shall be competent evidence. This is to enable parties having an interest in the bond to obtain access to it, and make it easily available to them in instituting and maintaining their suits upon the bond. Section 2 gives a right to every party injured by a breach of the conditions to institute and maintain an action on the bond in his own name and for his own use. Section 3 provides for repeated actions till the amount of the bond is exhausted by the successive recoveries. And section 4 provides the time within which the actions must be brought, saving the rights of infants, femes covert and persons non compos mentis, until a specified time after the removal of the disability. The subject-matter of the fourth section, is evidently the same subject-matter as that embraced in the preceding sections, and there is nothing to indicate that it was intended to embrace any other.

Construing the whole act together, it is evident to my mind that it was only intended to give a remedy, in their own names, to private parties sustaining injuries from breaches of the conditions of marshals' bonds, and to limit the time within which the remedies provided should be pursued. There is no allusion whatever anywhere in the act to the rights of the United States in the bond.

As the provisions have been copied into the Revised Statutes, in the same language, the same construction must be given to them as is given to the act as it originally stood.

The demurrer is overruled, with leave to answer upon the usual terms.

UNITED STATES v. RAND. See Case No. 15,008.

Case No. 16,117.

UNITED STATES v. RANDALL.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 412.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1823.

CRIMINAL LAW—DISCHARGE OF JUROR.

After the jury is sworn, in a capital case, and the cause has been opened, the court cannot, without the prisoner's consent, discharge a juror, at his own request.

Indictment [against the negro Randall] for a rape on Maria Scheals.

After the jury was sworn, and the attorney for the United States had advanced considerably in opening the case, John Morgan, a quaker, one of the jurors, asked the court to excuse him from serving on the jury in this case, as he could not, consistently with his feelings, serve in a case of life and death.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) said they could not now excuse the juror, without the consent of the prisoner; which was not given; and the juror was not excused.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 16,118.

UNITED STATES v. RANDALL.

[Deady, 524.] [1]

District Court, D. Oregon. Jan. 23, 1869.

CRIMINAL LAW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES—LARCENY FROM MAILS.

1. The verdict of a jury regularly given is presumed to be right until the contrary appears, and should be sustained by the court, if the evidence, by any fair construction, will warrant such a finding.

2. False and contradictory statements by the defendant about the material circumstances of the crime with which he is charged, are badges of guilt.

3. The falsification of records by the defendant, with reference to a matter in which he is charged or suspected of wrong-doing or liable to be so suspected or charged, is strong presumptive evidence of guilt.

4. Special circumstances not consistent with defendant's innocence, together with a particular opportunity and temptation to commit the crime charged, to be considered in support of verdict of guilty.

5. Section 2 of the act of March 3, 1868 (13 Stat. 500), regulating peremptory challenges in criminal cases, does not give the right to such challenge except in capital cases, because when the act was passed such right did not exist by law in any other cases, but was only permitted by rule of court.

[Cited in U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. 200.]

6. When it appears from the evidence that the defendant has made a false statement about the circumstances of the commission of a crime, with which he is charged, he may show that he had good reason to believe at the time the statement was true.

7. Gold dust in packages not weighing more than four pounds and paying letter postage, is mailable matter, and whether it is not, under section 12 of the act of July 1, 1864 (13 Stat. 337), any person employed in the post-office who steals the same from a letter in the mail, is guilty of a crime.

[8. Cited in State v. Coosaw Min. Co., 45 Fed. 808, to the point that the courts of the United States take judicial notice of the acts of congress, and they need not be set forth or specially referred to in any proceeding before them.]

The indictment in this case was found under section 12, of the act of July 1, 1864

[1] [Reported by Hon. Matthew P. Deady, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

(13 Stat. 337), and filed in this court on November 11, 1868. It charges that on July 28, 1868, one Thomas Smith, of Auburn, in Baker county, Oregon, deposited in the post-office at Auburn, a registered letter numbered 36, enclosed in registered package envelope numbered 28; and that said registered letter contained 12½ ounces of gold dust, of the value of $200, the property of said Smith, and was addressed to Yee Kang, in San Francisco, and intended to be conveyed by post to said last mentioned place. That the defendant [E. G. Randall] on August 3, 1868, was employed in the postoffice at Portland, Oregon, being then and there postmaster thereof, and that on said day, said registered letter, registered and numbered as aforesaid, came into the possession of the defendant, who then and there unlawfully opened the same, and did steal therefrom the 12½ ounces of gold dust aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statutes, etc. On November 11, the defendant was arrested upon a bench warrant, and gave bail in the sum of $10,000, with two sureties.

On November 14, the defendant by his counsel demurred to the indictment, and for causes of demurrer specified: (1) That gold dust is not mailable matter, and the taking the same is not an offence against the laws of the United States; and (2) that the indictment contains two offences which are separate and distinct—namely, opening a letter and taking from the same an article of value. After a cursory examination of the subject, the demurrer was overruled, with the understanding that the first question made by it could be made in arrest of judgment, if necessary. The second question made by the demurrer was abandoned on the argument, and not particularly mentioned or considered in the disposition of it. Thereupon the defendant pleaded not guilty to the indictment. On Monday, November 23, a jury was formed in the case and heard it until the following Wednesday, when the case was given them in charge. On November 26, the jury being unable to agree, were discharged without giving a verdict. Thereupon, on motion of the defendant, the case was set for trial on Monday, January 4, 1869. On the last mentioned date, the case was, on the motion of the United States, continued until the Wednesday following, on account of the absence of a material witness. On Wednesday, January 6, a jury was formed in the case and heard it until the following Friday, when the case was given them in charge, and on the day following the jury returned into court, and gave their verdict that the defendant was guilty as charged in the indictment, and also recommended him to the mercy of the court. Thereupon, on motion of the United States, it was ordered that the defendant give bail with sufficient sureties in the sum of $15,000, and that in default thereof, he be committed in close custody; and the defendant gave bail accordingly. On motion of the defendant, it was ordered that he be allowed until Monday, January 11, to file a motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, or either of them.

On the last mentioned date the defendant filed a motion for a new trial, for the reasons and causes following: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. (2) That the verdict is against law. (3) Error of law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the defendant, namely: I. Refusing to allow defendant's peremptory challenge to Charles Sweigle, a juror. II. Refusing to admit the letter marked No. 3, from one Koontz, at Umatilla, Oregon, dated October 1, 1868, in evidence.

And also a motion in arrest of judgment—Because the facts stated in the indictment do not constitute a crime in this—that gold dust is not mailable matter.

Both motions were submitted by the defendant's counsel, with an appeal for delay in the consideration of them, to give counsel an opportunity to examine the subject, and also to give time to the defendant to obtain further testimony on his behalf. The application for delay was taken under advisement by the court until Saturday, January 16. On the last mentioned day the application for delay was refused by the court; and thereupon, the motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were argued by counsel. The court took until Saturday, January 23, to consider the matter.

David Logan, for the United States.

William Strong and Joseph N. Dolph, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. Before proceeding to consider the motions made by defendant, I deem it proper to state briefly the reasons for refusing the application for delay on last Saturday. A court will not delay judgment indefinitely in any case, merely to give the defendant time to discover, or rather to try to discover new evidence on which to ask a new trial. Such an arbitrary exercise of power, it appears to me, would be an abuse of judicial discretion, amounting to a maladministration of justice. The defendant has not been hurried into this trial against his will and without due preparation. On the contrary, he has chosen his own time. The second trial was set for January 4, in the same term as the first, against the remonstrance of the United States attorney, who insisted that the case should go over to the March term, according to the usual practice of the court. At the same time, if there were any questions of law arising upon either of these motions, affecting the right and justice of the case, and about which there was room for serious doubt, it would be proper to continue the matter for further consideration and argument; and even to adjourn the case into the circuit court, to await the presence there of the justice of the supreme court, assigned to this circuit. In the meantime, if the defendant, from any source not now apparent, should be able to discover any testimony, tending to show his innocence, he might have the benefit of his discovery on the hearing of his motion for new trial. With a view of giving the defendant the benefit of this delay, if it should appear there was good ground for it, the questions of law arising on these motions were carefully examined and considered. In my judgment they did not admit of serious argument or doubt. Therefore the application for delay was refused.

The motions must now be disposed of. The first ground of the motion for new trial raises the question: Is the verdict contrary to the evidence? The testimony given to the jury was sufficient proof of the following facts and circumstances: That on July 28, 1868, one Thomas Smith, being then postmaster at Auburn, Oregon, mailed at Auburn, for himself, 12½ ounces of gold dust of the value of $200, to Yee Kang, in San Francisco, and that Smith duly registered the letter containing the parcel of dust and numbered it 36, and enclosed the same in registered package envelope numbered 28, directed to Sacramento, Distributing Postoffice, Cal. That this registered package 28 arrived at The Dalles on the evening of Saturday, August 1, in good condition, and that the same was duly forwarded from thence, in the Portland pouch, in like condition, on Monday, August 3, to the office at Portland. That the mail from the Dalles to Portland was then carried by steamboat and railway, and usually arrived at Portland about the middle of the afternoon of the day on which it left The Dalles. That the mail from Portland to Sacramento was then carried in a through pouch under a brass lock, daily, and left Portland at or about 6 a. m., and then reached Sacramento in from 5½ to 6 days—the latter being the schedule time. That on August 10, registered envelope 28 with registered letter 36 enclosed, reached the office at Sacramento in bad condition—the end of the letter and registered envelope being torn open and the contents of the former abstracted.

These, in brief, are the facts proved concerning the mailing of the letter containing the dust and the loss of the latter while being conveyed by post from Auburn, Oregon, to San Francisco, California. The reasonable inference from these facts is, that the gold dust was taken from the letter by some one in the Portland office. Indeed, during the argument to the jury, counsel for the defendant substantially admitted this to be a correct conclusion. Now let us see what facts and circumstances were proven concerning the question of who took the dust from the letter. On August 17, the postmaster at Sacramento wrote to Mr. Quincy A. Brooks—at Portland—the special postal agent for Oregon, Washington and Idaho, enclosing registered envelope 28 and calling his attention to the matter. Owing to absence from home, Brooks did not receive this letter until about August 29. Thereupon he made minute of the affair and called upon the defendant at his postoffice, to learn what he could concerning the missing package in that office. The defendant or being requested by the agent, went to his record of registered matter in transit, accompanied by the latter, and examined it, particularly the page containing the entries of packages arriving from August 1 to 7 inclusive, and could find no entry concerning envelope 28. At the same time the agent looked over the defendant's shoulder, and could not see any entry concerning the package. The defendant then told Brooks that he recollected the package and that it passed the Portland office all right. On September 4, Agent Brooks sent a circular letter of inquiry (form 46) concerning envelope 28, to the postmasters on the route beginning with the one at Baker City—the first office west of Auburn—and directing each one to state in writing thereon what condition the envelope or package was in when it passed his office, if at all, and what he knew about the missing enclosure, and to then forward it to the next postmaster on the route, and so on to Sacramento, from which office the letter was to be returned by mail to Agent Brooks at Portland. In reply, the postmasters on the route between Auburn and Portland—seven in number—certified that registered package envelope 28, mailed at Auburn July 28, and directed to Sacramento, passed their respective offices in good order at the dates following—arrived at and left Baker City in mail pouch marked Umatilla, way, on July 29; passed Union on July 30; arrived at La Grande, evening of July 30, and left morning of July 31; passed Orodell on July 31; passed Cayuse on July 31; passed Umatilla on August 1; arrived at The Dalles on August 1, and left in Portland pouch for Sacramento, August 3. This circular letter with the foregoing endorsement on it reached the defendant not later than September 19. He did not, as therein directed, at once state in writing thereon his answer to the inquiry of the agent, and then forward it to the postmaster at Sacramento. But he retained the circular letter until October 12 or 13, when he mailed it to Sacramento, first making his statement thereon as hereinafter set forth. Early in the morning of Sunday, August 2, 1868, in the Blue Mountains, in the vicinity of Pelican ranch, and a few miles west of Orodell, and about fifty miles west of Auburn, and near a one hundred miles west of Umatilla, the mail, then being carried in a stage, on the route between Auburn and Portland, was robbed by armed men. In this robbery, registered package envelopes, numbered 26 and 30, and directed to Portland, and 31 directed to Sacramento, and 32 directed to Umatilla, were torn open and their contents abstracted.

The envelopes, except No. 32, came to Portland in due course of mail, without their contents, on the afternoon of Tuesday, August 4, and then passed into the possession of the agent. The one numbered 32, he soon after received. The news of this mail robbery and the opening of registered package envelopes therein, reached Portland, by telegraph from The Dalles, on the afternoon of Monday, August 3, and was published that afternoon in the Evening Commercial, a paper then published and circulated in Portland. About September 6, the defendant and Brooks met in the Portland postoffice, when the defendant, without being in any way interrogated upon the subject, said to Brooks, that he thought that registered package envelope 28 had been robbed in the Blue Mountain mail robbery above mentioned. About September 18, the defendant called upon Agent Brooks at his office in Portland, and asked to be shown envelope 28, and also the four envelopes which were torn open and robbed in the Blue Mountains. Brooks showed them to him and he made a minute of the examination and went away. About September 26, defendant told Agent Brooks that he was satisfied that envelope 28 was robbed in the Blue Mountain mail robbery, and that he could prove it.

In reply to the inquiry in the circular letter, the defendant stated as follows: "Post-Office, Portland, Oregon, Oct. 3, 1868. Reg. Pkg. Envelope No. 28 reached this office Aug. 4th; left on the morning of the 5th in locked sack marked Sacramento. Nothing unusual was noticed to create suspicion. (Signed) E. G. Randall, P. M." In this circular the word "passed" was first written and then a line drawn through it and the word "reached" written above it; and the figure 3 was first written after the word "Aug.," and afterwards the figure 4 written over and upon it. On October 9, the defendant, without being called upon by the duties of his office so to do, voluntarily wrote to the postmaster at Sacramento as follows: "Sir: From the enclosed letters, and those of a similar nature from postmasters along the route, I have reason to believe that registered letter 36 in Pkg. Envelope 28, mailed at Auburn, 28th July, for your office, was in the mail that was robbed August 2, but which passed this office without being detected. Yours respectfully, (Signed) E. G. Randall, P. M."

On November 10, Thomas Smith, the postmaster at Auburn, called on the defendant at the postoffice in Portland, to inquire about registered package envelope 28, and told the defendant the amount of gold dust in it when mailed at Auburn. Defendant then said to Smith that he remembered something about the envelope going through the Portland office, but that it was torn open at the time, and he thought it did not contain any package —that the contents were gone. That he ought to have stopped the envelope and called Brooks' attention to it, and that he thought he had done wrong. Smith then said, that if such was the case, the envelope must have been broken open at The Dalles, to which the defendant replied, that he did not know. On September 19, the defendant wrote to Thomas Smith at Auburn, concerning envelope 28, and also envelopes 30, 31 and 32 which were broken open in the robbery of the mail in the Blue Mountains. To this Smith replied under date of September 26, in which he stated substantially, that envelope 28 was mailed by himself on July 28, and contained $200 in gold dust, and that it could not have been in the mail that was robbed, unless it had been detained; and that he was afraid it had been robbed by some brother postmaster. That envelopes 30, 31 and 32 were mailed at Auburn on July 31, 1868, and that 30 and 31 were mailed by Chinamen, and each contained $50, and that 32 was mailed by himself, and contained $200 in gold dust. On September 21, defendant wrote to the postmaster at Baker City, and also to the one at The Dalles. Of the latter he asked the question—When did registered envelopes 30 and 31, mailed at Auburn July 31, pass your office? To this The Dalles postmaster replied on same sheet, by return mail—They arrived at this office on Monday, August 3, and left in Portland pouch, on Tuesday, August 4. Of the former the defendant asked the question—When did registered envelopes 28, 30 and 31, mailed at Auburn, July 28 and 31, pass your office? I desire to know if they were in the same mail. To this the postmaster at Baker City replied, on same sheet, under date of September 25, that envelopes 30 and 31 were forwarded from that office on August 1. Envelope 28 may possibly have been in same mail, but that it was entered on register of registered matter in transit on July 29, and was forwarded the day following. That 30 and 31 were entered on register on August 1, and were forwarded either the same or the following day.

The circular letter of Agent Brooks and the letter of the defendant, dated October 9, and addressed to the postmaster at Sacramento, and professing to cover letters from postmasters on the eastern end of the route, reached Sacramento by mail on October 19 —one month after the circular reached Portland. They were all immediately returned to Portland by mail—the circular being addressed to the agent. A few days before November 1, the agent found his circular and defendant's letter to the postmaster at Sacramento, with several letters to defendant from postmasters on eastern end of route, enclosed in an unsealed envelope, in his box at the Portland office, and addressed either to himself or defendant, he is not certain which. The agent took them into possession, and produced them on the trial. On the circular, and at the end of the last and incomplete line of the certificate of the postmaster at La Grande, there is written in pencil, the words—"arrived August 1, left August 2"—and at the left end of the certificate at right angles with the lines, in pencil also, the words—"left August 2." These words were not written by the postmaster at La Grande. They were not on the circular when it left Sacramento for Portland. They were on it when the circular was taken from the office by Brooks, and the writing strongly resembles that of the defendant's. The envelopes that were robbed in the Blue Mountain mail robbery, did arrive at La Grande on August 1, and departed August 2. The inference is reasonable that these words were clandestinely written upon the circular in the Portland office for the purpose of misleading the agent and others who might be engaged in the investigation, into the conclusion that envelope 28 left La Grande August 2, and was therefore robbed in the Blue Mountains, and not in the Portland office. The presumption is that the circular was addressed to Brooks at Portland, by the Sacramento postmaster. That was the direction of the circular. But the agent found it in his box in an unsealed envelope with letters belonging to the defendant. This being so, some one in the Portland office must have intercepted the circular, and taken it out of the envelope, and after making this interpolation in, or addition to the certificate of the postmaster at La Grande, placed it in the agent's box.

In August, 1868, the defendant was postmaster at Portland, and had been for the period of near three years. At that time he had two clerks in his employ—D. F. Fox and Lyman Chittenden. The former had been in the postoffice some time, and the latter since the June previous. The mail from The Dalles was usually opened upon its arrival in the afternoon, by Fox and Chittenden—the defendant being generally present, but seldom assisting in the opening or distribution. The Sacramento mail was made up the next morning before six o'clock, the hour of departure, by Fox and Chittenden, the defendant being very seldom present. The book containing the record of registered matter in transit, was in the special charge of the defendant, and was kept by him either in his private back office in an adjoining building, or in his desk in the front of the postoffice room. At the opening of the mails, it was customary for the clerks to lay all registered package envelopes one side of the table where they were sorting the mail, and the defendant, if present, took them for the purpose of making the necessary entry concerning them in the register. If the defendant was not present, one of the clerks took them and laid them on his desk in the postoffice for the same purpose. On November 14, Agent Brooks, acting under instructions from the department at Washington, took possession of the Portland office and official books and papers. Among these was the record of register matter in transit kept by the defendant, and examined by him and the agent with reference to envelope 28. This book the agent took into his private custody and produced it on the trial. It is not a book of the printed blanks such as the postoffice regulations require to be kept, but a common blank book of foolscap paper, ruled for the purpose. One page of it is covered with the entries made between August 1 and 7 inclusive of both dates. Only two packages are entered as arriving August 3, 1868, the one mailed at Fisher's Landing on the same day, and destined to San Francisco, and the other mailed at Salt Lake, July 14, and destined to Oregon City. Three packages are entered as arriving August 4—the first mailed at Sacramento, July 30, and destined to Sauvie's Island; the second, mailed at Rickreall, July 27, and destined to "Contract Office, Salt Lake;" and the third, mailed at Astoria, August 4, and destined to Salt Lake. No entry concerning envelope 28 is now apparent to ordinary observation, but between the two lines on which the entries are made concerning the second and third packages arriving on August 4, an entry has been made concerning envelope 28, and since erased. When attention is called to it, some portions of the entry can be distinguished and read with the naked eye, but with the aid of a magnifying glass, the whole entry can be readily made out. The month and the day of the month of this interlined and erased entry are indicated by the use of the points or marks which are ordinarily substituted for ditto, under the word "August" and figure "4." These are not erased. Then comes the number of the envelope (28), next the place of mailing (Auburn), then follows the date of mailing (the ditto marks for July and the figures 28), and lastly the place of destination (Sacramento). The "S" in Sacramento is a peculiarly shaped letter, and bears a striking resemblance to the other capital "S's" in the record, and also to those in the letters of the defendant to the postmasters at Baker City, The Dalles, and Sacramento. The letter "A" in Auburn is not a proper capital "A," but a small "a" enlarged, and used as a capital. Elsewhere in this record where "a" begins a word, it is written in the same way. The word "Auburn" occurs often in the record, and appears very much like the word "Auburn" in this erased entry. The fair inference is, that this entry was made after the one above and below it, or otherwise it would have been written upon a line and not between them, and from the same facts there is much reason to infer that the entry was not made when it purports—August 4—but afterwards. There can be no doubt but that this entry was erased after the one on the line below it was entered, for in making the erasure the tops of the capital letters in the words of "Astoria" and "Salt Lake," in the line below, were scratched off, and have since been touched up, but as the surface of the paper was broken by the erasing, the ink used in amending these letters spread out, so that the amendments are very palpable.

