UNITED STATES v. MORSE.

[3 Story, 87.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1844.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS—EMOLUMENTS—ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION AS INSPECTOR.

1. Under the act of 1822, c. 107 [3 Stat. 693], the offices of deputy collector and of inspector may be held by the same person at the same time.

2. The 15th section of the same act, limiting the emolument of the deputy collector to $1,000, applies only to the emolument received by him as deputy collector, and does not prevent him from receiving additional compensation for independent offices in the customs held by him at the same time.

3. A deputy collector is not bound by that act to perform the duties of inspector.

4. Where the words of a statute, prescribing compensation to a public officer, are loose and obscure, and admit of two interpretations, they should be construed in favor of the officer.

Debt.

This case was submitted by Mr. Parks, U. S. Dist. Atty. (the successor of Mr. Holmes, U. S. Dist. Atty., who died pending the proceedings), and by Mr. Hobbs, for defendant, upon the following statement of facts:

The defendant [Samuel A.] Morse, was appointed collector of the customs for the district of Passamaquoddy on the —— day of June, 1836, and entered upon the duties of his office, July 2, 1836. John A. Balkam was appointed an inspector of the said customs, April 1, 1831, and served in that office, and received the per diem allowance as inspector, from that time until April 9, 1839. The said Balkam was appointed a deputy collector for the said district, Nov. 1, 1833, and performed the duties of that office, and received the commission therefor established by law out of the emoluments of the office of the collector, while acting and receiving his per diem allowance as inspector of the customs. The said Balkam was reappointed as deputy collector by the defendant, Morse, on July 2, 1836, and from that time to January 1, 1839, performed the duties of the said office, and was paid therefor by the defendant out of the emoluments of the office of collector, the sum of $2,407, and, at the same time, from the customs, his per diem allowance as inspector, and the same so paid said Balkam as deputy collector and inspector were charged in the defendant's quarterly accounts, as they had been in those of the defendant's predecessor in office, and were settled and allowed, from time to time, at the treasury department. It is further agreed, that, previous to the commencement of these suits, accounts of monies, thus paid by the defendant, were submitted to the consideration of the treasury department, and rejected by them, after they had been allowed and settled as aforesaid, and it is further agreed, that any official transcript or other official documents from the treasurer may be referred to by either party.

The points submitted were as follows:

For the government it was contended, that the defendant, Morse, wrongfully paid monies of the United States to one John A. Balkam, as deputy collector, he being also an inspector of the customs, and that he could not hold the two offices of deputy collector and inspector, and receive the pay and emoluments at the same time, under the act of congress (chapter 107, § 14) passed in 1822 [3 Stat.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

693]. And further, that if the said Balkam could, by the said act, hold the offices of inspector and deputy collector at one and the same time, yet that, by the 15th section of the same act, the said Balkam, acting as aforesaid, could not receive "more than one thousand dollars in any one year for any services he may have performed for the United States in any office and capacity."

For the defendant it was contended, that such is not the true construction of the said act, and that the said offices are not inconsistently held by one person; and also, that, by section 10 of the said act of 1822, the said payment to Balkam is provided for as an incidental expense of the office of collector. And the defendant referred to the 18th section of the said act, as aiding in ascertaining the legislative intention.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The sole questions arising in this case are: First. Whether the deputy collector could be appointed as inspector, and hold both offices at the same time, and receive the emoluments thereof, under the act of 7th of May, 1822 (chapter 107, § 14). Secondly. Whether the limitation contained in the 15th section of the same act of the compensation of the deputy collector to $1,000, applies to the case where he also holds the separate office of inspector; and performs all the duties of both offices.

As to the first question, it appears to me to be too clear for argument. There is nothing in the nature or duties of the offices of deputy collector and inspector of the customs, which make them incompatible with each other. The 14th section of the act of 1822 (chapter 107) declares "that in the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans, no person shall be an inspector, who at the same time holds any other office in the collection of the customs, in either of the said ports." Now the very enumeration here includes only certain specified ports, and, of course, excludes all other ports, upon the known maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." The policy of the section doubtless was, that, in the enumerated ports, the duties of deputy collector would or might occupy all the time of that officer, and that it would be a public inconvenience, and perhaps lead to the gross abuse of creating sinecures, to allow him to hold another office at the same time, the duties whereof he could not adequately perform, or might injuriously to the public service neglect.

As to the second question, the fifteenth section of the act of 1822 (chapter 107) provides, "that the secretary of the treasury may from time to time limit and fix the number and compensation of the clerks to be employed by any collector, naval officer, or surveyor, and may limit and fix the compensation of any deputy, of such collector, naval officer or surveyor; provided, that no such deputy in any of the districts of Boston and Charlestown, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah, or New Orleans, shall receive more than one thousand five hundred dollars, nor any such other deputy more than one thousand dollars, for any services he may perform for the United States in any office or capacity." It is upon the last clause only, that the whole controversy hinges. It is certainly obscurely drawn; and the question is, what is the proper interpretation to be given to the words, "in any office or capacity." After weighing the subject with a good deal of care, I have come to the conclusion, that the true intent and meaning of the clause is to limit the emoluments of the deputy collector in that office to the sum specified, and to make no allowance to him on account of any incidental services he may perform, or emoluments he may receive beyond that sum; and that it was not intended to say, that if he actually performed the duties or services of any other independent office, such as inspector, in any of the nonenumerated ports, he was not entitled to receive the emoluments thereof. In short, I read the language, as if it were, "in any such office or capacity." The 18th section of the same act contains a provision, having a similar policy and operation, as to the incidental services and compensation, which might be claimed, virtute officio, by a collector, naval officer, or surveyor.

The office of inspector is an entirely distinct and independent office from that of deputy collector, having different duties, and requiring different services. Indeed, deputy collectors were not expressly authorized by law to be employed in the customs until the act of 3d of March, 1817, c. 282, § 7 [6 Bior. & D. Laws, 243; 3 Stat. 397], made perpetual by the act of 6th of May, 1822, c. 56, § 4 [7 Bior. & D. Laws, 55; 3 Stat. 681]. "In any office or capacity," may well be interpreted to mean "in any one office or capacity." If it were necessary to look back upon the pending terms of the 15th section of the act of 1822 (chapter 107), to seek for another as the true use of the language, it would be by no means a forced construction to suppose, that as the compensation of clerks of the collectors, as well as deputies, was to be fixed, that the object was to prevent a deputy collector from receiving at the same time compensation as clerk, the duties of the latter belonging as an appropriate incident in many cases, if not in all, to that of deputy. In this view, also, the interpretation of the section would steer wide of the objection raised by the United States, for the duties of inspector are not incident to the duties of deputy collector, as those of a clerk are and may be.

It appears to me, also, that, it ought not to be presumed, that the government, when it fixes the compensation of a deputy collector, means that he shall be compellable to perform the duties of inspector gratuitously; nor can it be presumed, that the government, when it fixes the compensation of a deputy collector, looks to any other thing than a remuneration of the duties, which he is to be called upon to perform as such. I know of no authority given by law to the secretary of the treasury to compel, or to require, any officer appointed to one office to perform the duties of another independent office, either as a condition of his appointment, or otherwise. The law, as I conceive, adjusts, or intends to adjust, the measure of the compensation of every officer to the duties to be performed in that office, and not in another independent office. It does not seem to me, therefore, that the court, except upon the most clear and positive language of a statute, ought to adopt any such conclusion; and where the words are loose or obscure, and admit of two interpretations, it seems to me, that the construction ought to be favorable to the claims of the officer, who performs the duties of two independent offices. It has always appeared to me, looking historically to the legislation upon the subject of compensation of officers of the customs, that the great object of the legislature was, not to cut down the reasonable emoluments of officers holding different offices, but to prohibit their union, when incompatible with public policy, or to prevent and suppress the growing evil of extra compensation claimed for services purely incidental to a single office.

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the judgment ought to be rendered, upon the state of facts, for the defendant, for his full compensation as inspector, independent of his claim as deputy collector.

Case No. 15,821.

UNITED STATES v. MORTIMER.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan. 4, 1845.

RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS—GOODS BROUGHT FROM ANOTHER STATE.

The receiving of stolen goods in this District, knowing that the goods were stolen in another state or jurisdiction, is an offence within the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia.

The defendant [Albert Mortimer] was indicted by the grand jury of Alexandria county, for receiving stolen goods. The goods were stolen in Maryland, and brought into Alexandria and received by the defendant, who knew them to be stolen. The indictment is in substance: That Albert Mortimer with force and arms, at the county aforesaid * * * of the goods and chattels * * * before then feloniously stolen, taken and carried away feloniously did receive and have (he the said Albert Mortimer then and there well knowing the said goods and chattels to have been feloniously stolen, taken and carried away) against, &c. The defendant plead not guilty in manner and form, &c. A juror was withdrawn and the case was adjourned from the criminal court of Alexandria county to this court on a question of law.

Philip R. Fendall, for the United States.
Wm. L. Brent, for defendant.

The United States through their attorney offered evidence tending to prove that the goods charged in the indictment to have been stolen were stolen in the state of Maryland, that after being so stolen they were brought into the county of Alexandria in the District of Columbia by the person who stole them, and that they were after being so brought into said county received by the prisoner in said county with knowledge on his part that they were stolen, whereupon, the prisoner through his counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury that the prisoner is entitled to an acquittal. The question arising on said prayer was whether the receiving in the county of Alexandria of stolen goods, with knowledge on the part of the receiver, that said goods had been stolen in the state of Maryland and which goods were brought as aforesaid by the thief into said county of Alexandria, be an offence within the jurisdiction of the criminal court of the District of Columbia.

The following authorities were relied on by the attorney for the United States in support of the indictment: People v. Burke, 11 Wend. 129.[2] This was a case under a New York statute, but the remarks of Savage, C. J., were as to the general principle underlying the case. Cullins' Case, 1 Mass. 115; Ellis' Case, 3 Conn. 185; Andrews' Case, 2 Mass. 14; [3] Lord's Case, cited Id. 16; Rex v. Peas, 1 Root, 69; Somerville's Case, 21 Me. 14, cited in Law Magazine, for April, 1844, pp. 206, 207; U. S. v. Mason [Case No. 15,738], May Term, 1823; U. S. v. Tolson [Id. 16,530]; U. S. v. Haukey [Id. 15,328].

The counsel for the defendant offered the following: Tolson's Case, Dec. term, 1805. This was a case in which the prisoner stole a watch in Maryland and brought it to Washington. The prisoner was convicted of larceny. Haukey's Case, cited by the attorney for the United States. The prisoner was convicted. A horse was stolen in Maryland and brought to Washington. In the case of U. S. v. Bladen [Case No. 14,605], July term, 1809, indicted for manslaughter, the blow was given

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and George C. Hazleton, Esq.]

[2] The court in this case says: The statute recognizes the common law, by which the possession of stolen property in contemplation of law remains in the owner, and the thief, therefore, is guilty of theft in every place into which he carries the stolen goods. This principle applied to the case of property stolen in one state and carried into another state.

[3] In this case the unanimous opinion of the court affirming the Case of Cullins was, that the offence charged is the receiving the goods, knowing them to have been stolen. If the principal could be tried and convicted in this county the accessory may be tried and convicted also. The same reason applies to the case of stealing goods in one state and bringing them into another.

in Alexandria and death occurred in Maryland. Judgment was arrested.

Upon consideration of the authorities cited, THE COURT held that the receiving in the county of Alexandria, of stolen goods, with knowledge on the part of the receiver that the said goods had been stolen in the state of Maryland, and brought by the thief in said county of Alexandria is an offence within the jurisdiction of the criminal court of the District of Columbia, and it is ordered to be certified accordingly.

Case No. 15,822.

UNITED STATES v. MORTON.

[1 Lowell, 179.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1867.

SHIPPING — PASSENGER REGULATIONS — LIABILITY OF MATE ACTING AS MASTER.

Under St. March 3, 1855, § 1 (10 Stat. 715), a mate who is appointed master at a foreign port, and leaves the port with intent to bring certain passengers to the United States, and does bring them, in excess of the number permitted by that statute, is liable to the fine imposed on masters, though the agreement with the passengers had been made by the former master, if the defendant had knowledge of the facts, and opportunity to annul the illegal contract before leaving the foreign port.

[Cited in U. S. v. Nicholson, 12 Fed. 524.]

Indictment under section 1 of the act of March 3, 1855 (10 Stat. 715). The case was, that the defendant [David H. Morton] was duly appointed master of an American vessel, in a port of the West Indies, on the death of the former master, and brought thence to the port of Boston certain passengers in excess of one to every two tons of the vessel. The evidence tended to show that the former master had made some oral agreement with the passengers, and that they were perhaps on board before the defendant's appointment. The judge ruled, that the defendant was not bound by the illegal agreement of the former master; but if he knew the number of passengers on board and had time and opportunity to correct the mistake or fault of his predecessor, and failed to do so, and left the port with intent to bring the passengers to the United States, and carried out that intent, he was liable.

J. F. Pickering, for defendant, moved for a new trial, on the ground that the defendant did not take the passengers on board, within the meaning of the law.

H. D. Hyde, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

LOWELL, District Judge. I am satisfied with the rule laid down at the trial. A construction of the statute which should hold the master responsible only for contracts made by him personally would annul it. In many cases, perhaps in most, the contract is made with the consignee or agent of the ship, and the passengers may come on board without the master's previous knowledge or assent. The statute requires him to see that its provisions are respected; and it must be held, that his permitting such passengers to remain on board is a taking on board. The mere physical fact of coming to the ship is not the material thing. They might come in one capacity as stevedores, &c., and remain in another. The phrase is used to explain the intent, as being something within the master's control, and to distinguish those cases where he has been deceived or misled without fault of his own.

The defendant being new to the office, and perhaps ill-informed of the law, no imprisonment is asked for; but the fine, which is a fixed sum, must be imposed. Motion denied.

Case No. 15,823.

UNITED STATES v. MOSELY.

District Court, S. D. New York. 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE—EJECTING DEPUTY INSPECTOR.

The defendant was indicted for obstructing and hindering a deputy collector in the exercise of the duties of his office. Mosely is a dealer in leaf tobacco and cigars, and the deputy called at his store to inquire respecting certain boxes of cigars taken in that day, May 16, 1871, some of which he was informed by the drayman were not stamped. After some conversation, in which the deputy stated his errand, not the least unfriendliness having been evinced on either side, Mosely, without warning, ejected the deputy forcibly into the street, the officer falling heavily in the gutter and suffering a fracture of the hip, which endangered his life, he being seventy-two years of age, and somewhat lame. The defence argued that the deputy having fulfilled his errand and stated that he was satisfied, had no more to do or say in the premises; Mosely had a right to eject him. THE COURT declared that officers must have free and peaceable egress as well as ingress to the places where they are authorized to make examinations, and that Mosely had no right to eject him in the manner he did.

The jury very promptly rendered a verdict against the defendant. A stay of sentence was granted, to allow argument on the law points raised.

UNITED STATES v. MOSES.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1804.

WITNESS—INCRIMINATING TESTIMONY.

A witness is not bound to answer a question, the answer to which may tend to criminate himself.

E. J. Lee, for the United States, produced Billy, a witness. The confession of Moses had been given in evidence, that he bought the goods of Billy, (the goods having been proved to have been stolen.) The question was asked of Billy, whether he sold them to Moses. Objection by Mr. Jones, that it tended to criminate the witness.

THE COURT sustained the objection.

COUNTERFEITING—INTENT—WITNESS—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

1. In a criminal prosecution, the officer who apprehended the prisoner being examined as a witness for the United States, is not bound to disclose the name of the person from whom he received the confidential information which led to the prisoner's detection.

[Cited in Re Quarles, 158 U. S. 536, 15 Sup. Ct. 961.]

[Cited in State v. Soper, 16 Me. 295; Worthington v. Scribner, 109 Mass. 491; People v. Laird, 102 Mich. 135, 60 N. W. 457.]

2. The same witness being asked, if A B had told him if he would come to a particular house, (being that where the forgery, the offence charged, was carrying on,) on a certain day, he would have the prisoner there? The court required him to answer the question.

3. In a prosecution for forging the notes of the bank of the United States, it is necessary to prove that it was committed with intent to defraud some corporation or person, and that the notes stated in the indictment and given in evidence as forged, and those alleged to be forged, are the same.

[Cited in U. S. v. Shellmire, Case No. 16,271.]

The prisoner [Reuben Moses] was tried upon five indictments, three of which were for counterfeiting the notes of the bank of the United States, of different denominations, and the other two for having in his possession bank notes of different denominations, engraved and printed after the similitude of notes issued by the said bank, with intent to use them in forging the notes of the said bank.

Upon the trial of these indictments, the following points of evidence were ruled by the court: That the officer who apprehended the prisoner is not bound to disclose the name of the person from whom he received the information, which led to the detection and apprehension of the prisoner. Such a disclosure can be of no importance to the defence in this case, and may be highly prejudicial to the public in the administration of justice, by deterring persons from making similar disclosures of crimes which they know to have been committed. 1 Starkie, Ev. 106; Burr's Case [Cases Nos. 14692–14694a] in the circuit court of Virginia; 2 Starkie, Ev. 400. The witness was then asked, whether Bernard Johnson, the person, in whose house the defendant was apprehended whilst sitting on a table on which the counterfeit bank notes mentioned in those indictments were lying, had told him, that if he would come to his house on a certain day, being the day on which the prisoner was apprehended, he would have the prisoner Craig there. This was objected to by the district attorney, but the objection was overruled. The evidence may be all important to the defence, by showing or laying a ground for presuming that he was innocently at the place where the officer found him, in consequence of an insidious invitation given to him by Johnson. This is a very different question from the former.

Mr. Ingersoll, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Randall & Philips, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The crimes charged against the prisoner in the indictments, on which the jury have to decide, are: (1) The counterfeiting of certain bank notes of various denominations, purporting to be notes of the bank of the United States. (2) Having in his possession certain blank notes, engraved and printed after the similitude of the notes issued by that corporation, with intent to use them in counterfeiting notes issued by that corporation.

That the prisoner did counterfeit the notes under the first head, with intent to defraud the bank of the United States, or some other corporation or person, and that the notes set forth in the indictment and given in evidence, and those alleged to be counterfeit, are the same; ought to be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, to warrant them in convicting the defendant. As to the identity of the notes, the evidence is as follows: The officer who found the counterfeit notes as well as the blank ones on a table at which the defendant was sitting, swears that he bundled them up in different parcels, and delivered them to the mayor; who, upon his examination, has stated that he delivered the same notes to the district attorney; who, with his assistant in drawing these indictments, retained the possession of them until they were delivered by the district attorney to the foreman of the grand jury, who has returned them with the bills to the clerk of the court. To prove that the notes alleged to be counterfeit are so, one of the tellers of the bank has been examined, and testifies that the signatures of the president and cashier, as well as the filling up of the blanks, are all false and counterfeit. No evidence has been offered to contradict, or to discredit this witness.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The only remaining inquiry is, were the notes charged to be counterfeited, counterfeited by the prisoner with intent to defraud the bank of the United States or any person? It is not necessary to the conviction of the accused that these facts should be established by positive proof. Circumstantial evidence is sufficient, if it be such as to satisfy the minds of the jury of the existence of the facts which it is intended to prove. These circumstances as stated by the witnesses in the present case, are the following: McClean, one of the high constables of the city, having received information that on a certain day he would find the prisoner and Craig at the house of B. Johnson, and employed in the business of counterfeiting; approached the house on that day, having with him two other constables, and finding the outer door unfastened, they entered and rushed up stairs; where, in a room in the third story, they found Johnson standing at a table, and the defendant seated at it, both of them with their coats off. On the table was a large number of counterfeit notes of the bank of the United States, and of blank notes in the similitude of the notes of that bank. The prisoner appeared to be greatly alarmed, and being asked by McClean what he was about, muttered something which the witness did not understand. On the table were three phials of ink and a couple of pens then wet with ink. On the first alarm the defendant suddenly rose from his seat and seized with one of his hands a bundle of notes which were on the table. He gave no explanation whatever when spoken to by McClean, tending to account for the situation in which he was found, or in any other way to exculpate himself. Among the articles found on the table were papers filled with the names of Nicholas Biddle and Thomas Wilson, the president and cashier of the bank; and on one of these papers was found the name of the prisoner three times written. Johnson, the prisoner, and Craig, who had been arrested on the stairs, were then taken to the mayor's office, when, upon an examination of the notes, four or five of them, amounting to $140, were found to be genuine, and were claimed by the prisoner as his property. A few days afterwards, some parts of a press were found in a cellar closet, at the house of the prisoner, which exactly fitted a press about the same time discovered in a privy of a house occupied by his brother. These are the material circumstances which have been given in evidence, and it is for this jury to say whether they are sufficient to establish the guilt of the prisoner, as charged in any or all of the indictments.

The jury found the prisoner guilty on all the indictments.

Case No. 15,826.

UNITED STATES v. MOTT et al.

[1 Paine, 188.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April Term, 1822.

INSOLVENCY—GOVERNMENT PRIORITY—EXECUTION CREDITOR—PARTIES.

1. Under the 5th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1797 [1 Stat. 515], an assignment, to entitle the United States to their priority, must be an assignment of all the debtor's property; but it need not be for the benefit of all his creditors.

2. An assignment made by a debtor of the United States, when his property was about being levied upon, under judgments obtained against him by one of his creditors, in trust, first for the debt of such creditor, and then for the debt of the United States, was held to be a voluntary assignment, and fraudulent and void against the United States, notwithstanding the creditor gave up his intention of levying, in consideration of such assignment, and that the property might be sold under it to the best advantage, for the benefit of the sureties to the United States.

3. And on a bill filed by the United States, to obtain their priority in such a case, against the creditor and sureties, who were joint assignees of the debtor's estate, the court refused to suspend its decree in favour of the United States, against the assigned property, until they should have proceeded to execution on their judgment against the sureties, or to make any decree in favour of the creditor against the sureties, notwithstanding the assignment had been received by the creditor for their benefit, and at their request, and they, by becoming parties to it, had covenanted for the execution of its trusts.

4. Whether such relief would have been afforded the creditor if the sureties had been properly before the court for that purpose? Quære.

This was a bill in equity, filed on behalf of the United States, under their priority acts, praying that certain property assigned by their debtor against whom they had obtained judgment, to two of the other defendants, might be subjected to the execution of the complainants, or that the assignees might pay over to them the proceeds of such property.

The bill stated, that on the 1st of January and 10th of April, 1815, and the 12th of January, 1816, Noel Blanche, to secure duties on distilled spirits, executed to the United States, his three several bonds for the penal sums of 15,000 dollars, 4505 dollars and sixty cents, and 4194 dollars and seventy two cents, with William Coulter and the defendant Jeremiah Vanderbilt, as his sureties, on which bonds judgments were recovered in 1819, at the May term of the district court of the Southern district of New-York, on which execution had been issued, and Blanche and Vanderbilt been taken. That these judgments were still unsatisfied. That Coulter died before the recovery of said judgments, leaving the defendants, Casparus Prior and Josiah Hornblower, his executors. The bill further stated, that Blanche, being insolvent, within the meaning of the act of congress entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and the receivers of public monies," passed March 3d, 1797, and the act entitled "An act to regulte the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the 2d of March, 1799 [1 Stat. 627], made an assignment of all his property to the defendants, Vanderbilt, Coulter, and John Mott, but that the United States are, notwithstanding, entitled to a priority of payment under the said acts. That the defendants, John Mott and his copartner Richard S. Williams, and the defendants, Vanderbilt and Coulter, or some of them, had received sufficient property, under the said assignment, to satisfy the judgments of the United States, but refused so to apply it. That they had, on the contrary, applied it to the payment of debts due from Blanche to the said Mott and Williams. The bill also stated, that they had sold a part of the property to the defendants, Uriah R. Scribner and John Hitchcock, and prayed that they might be enjoined from paying, &c. It was also stated, that Blanche and Vanderbilt had presented their petitions to the president and secretary of state, and that their bodies had been discharged from execution. All the facts stated in the bill were either admitted or proved.

Mott and Williams in their answers stated, that Blanche being indebted to them in the sum of 5,424 dollars, on the 3d of April, 1816, confessed judgments for that amount in New-York and New-Jersey, which judgments were still unsatisfied. They also stated that the assignment from Blanche, mentioned in the bill, was made in order to prevent their taking out execution upon the said judgments, against the property of Blanche, and thus forcing a sale of it at a great sacrifice; and that had they not expected to be made perfectly secure by the assignment, they should have proceeded, as they were prepared to do, to levy upon his property. They stated that this was the understanding of all the parties to the assignment, and the motive for making it. That it was expected at the time of its execution, that the property assigned would more than pay their debt, which was preferred, and would pay a portion of the debt due the United States, which was next provided for; but that it was understood and agreed, that whatever might remain due to the United States, should be paid by Coulter and Vanderbilt, the sureties. And they insisted, that as this was the understanding of the sureties when they became parties to the assignment, the United States ought, in the first place, to exhaust their remedies against them, before they resorted to the assigned funds in the hands of Mott and Williams, who had been induced to relinquish their executions at the request and for the benefit of the sureties. They further stated, that Coulter's estate in the hands of his executors, the defendants, Prior and Hornblower, was more than sufficient to pay the United States; and that the United States had obtained judgment against them, but that execution had been stayed at the request of the executors, and without their consent. That the bill of the United States in this suit had been filed at the request and for the benefit of the sureties. Annexed to their answer was an account of the proceeds of the property received by them under the assignment, with their disbursements, by which it appeared that they had not received enough to pay their own debt.

The assignment made by Blanche, after stating his indebtedness to Mott and Williams, and that Vanderbilt and Coulter had become his sureties to the United States, and that he was unable to satisfy these engagements, proceeded, in consideration of the premises, to assign to Mott, Coulter, and Vanderbilt, who also executed it, certain real estate and all the personal estate of the assignor in trust, first, to pay the debt of Mott and Williams; secondly, the debt due to the United States, so that the sureties should be completely indemnified and saved harmless; and lastly, the residue to be applied to pay certain other debts. There was a covenant, on the part of the assignees, faithfully to perform and execute these trusts, according to their true intent and meaning.

It appeared by the testimony of the defendant, Vanderbilt, who was examined as a witness, that at the time the assignment was executed, it was understood by the parties to it, that Mott and Williams were about levying on Blanche's property, and that the assignment was agreed upon as a substitute for that course, in order that Mott and Williams might be first paid, and as much be made out of the property as possible for the benefit of the sureties. Mott and Williams were satisfied with their judgments, and considered themselves perfectly secure, and the assignment was proposed by Vanderbilt himself, to prevent a sacrifice of the property, and agreed to by Mott and Williams, entirely for the benefit of the sureties. It was believed at the time that there would be enough to pay the debt of the United States as well as the debt of Mott and Williams.

The record of the judgments of the United States against Coulter's executors were produced in evidence, by which it appeared that the judgments were obtained by default. Two hundred and thirty dollars of the assigned property had been received by Coulter, and Scribner and Hitchcock were indebted for a part which they had purchased of the assignees. The residue was received by Mott and Williams.

A cross bill had been filed in the cause by Mott and Williams, for the purpose of bringing Coulter's executors directly before the court, but it was never brought to a hearing, in consequence of the suit's being compromised on the coming in of the master's report at the next term.

R. Tillotson, U. S. Dist. Atty.

J. O. Hoffman and H. Wheaton, for defendants, Mott and Williams, insisted—

(1) That the assignment here was not a voluntary assignment within the meaning of the act of 1797. It was made by Blanche under such circumstances as showed that it was not an act of consent on his part, but of absolute necessity.

(2) That the nature of the transaction rebutted every presumption of fraud. The only motive of the parties was a desire to benefit the United States and the sureties on the bond, instead of defrauding them. It was also an assignment for a new and valuable consideration.

(3) The priority of the United States does not attach until the insolvency of the debtor is testified by some overt act. [U. S. v. Fisher] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 381. In this case the first act which would be so considered, was the execution of the assignment, and the equity of Mott and Williams was older than the assignment.

(4) Coulter, by becoming a party to the assignment, was estopped from denying its validity. Yet this suit is manifestly by the procurement of his executors, to reverse the order of the trusts in their favour.

(5) The court are bound to look at the relative equities of the defendants. The United States can resort to the property of Coulter as well as the assigned property. But Mott and Williams, although as against Coulter they are entitled to hold the assigned property, yet if deprived of this, they are without any remedy against his estate. It is precisely analogous to the case of two funds, where a court of equity will compel a party who can resort to either, to proceed so as not to injure another party who can resort to one only. 1 Vern. 445; 10 Mod. 488; Amb. 614; 8 Ves. 388, 391; 9 Ves. 209. And this rule applies as well to the crown as to individuals. 8 Ves. 388. That the estate of Coulter was amply sufficient to pay the debt due to the United States, is admitted by their suffering judgment to pass against them by default. If they had not sufficient assets, they should have pleaded the fact.

For these reasons it was insisted, that the court ought not to make a decree against Mott and Williams, until the United States should have taken out execution and levied on the estate of Coulter; or that they should make a decree in favour of the United States, directly against the executors of Coulter; or that, in the event of a decree's being made against Mott and Williams, one should also be made in their favour against the estate of Coulter.

D. B. Ogden, G. Griffen, and B. Haight, for defendants, Prior and Hornblower, replied,—

That the doctrine of election between two funds did not apply: it might, had both funds belonged to Blanche. If it did apply, however, as against a surety the court would not turn the United States round. It does not appear that there is any other fund than the assigned property. Non constat that Coulter's executors have any of their testator's property. At any rate, there is no evidence that the fund is adequate. Besides, Coulter's executors are not before the court so that a decree of the kind asked for, can be made against them. They are brought here to answer only for the property assigned by Blanche. It is admitted, that Mott and Williams have no remedy at law against Coulter's estate, and a court of equity will not charge a surety any further than he is chargeable at law. If Coulter were answerable here for the effect of his covenant in the assignment, that covenant is only to execute the trusts and not to indemnify Mott and Williams. Besides, it is evident Coulter became a party to the assignment, under a mistake as to the facts. He, as well as the rest, supposed that the property would be sufficient to pay all Blanche's debts—or the other parties deluded him into the assignment by such a representation. If the doctrine of election between two funds were not inapplicable here, a case cannot be produced where the property of the principal debtor has been left, and that of a surety resorted to. But the assignment is illegal and void; and if for one purpose, it is for all, and no body can claim under it. It is a fraud upon the United States. It also creates a preference, which equity discountenances. Equality among creditors is equity. Prec. Ch. 538. Equity will not decree the performance of an unjust agreement. 2 Brown, Parl. Cas. 296. Nor will it indirectly lend its aid to an agreement of which it will not decree a specific performance. If Coulter was bound by the assignment to indemnify Mott and Williams, they can sue his executors for whatever they may be obliged to pay the United States.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. Whether the United States are entitled to the priority, which it is the object of their bill to establish, and which is the first question arising out of the pleadings, is one of no difficulty, considering the decisions which have already been made on the fifth section of the act, to provide more effectually, for the settlement of accounts between the United States and receivers of public money, passed the 3d March, 1797. The words of this section, as far as they bear on the present case, are, that "where any revenue officer, or other person, hereafter becoming indebted to the United States, by bond or otherwise, shall become insolvent, the debt due the United States shall be first satisfied; and the priority hereby established shall be deemed to extend, as well to cases in which a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, shall make a voluntary assignment thereof, as to cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy shall be committed." The debt of Blanche to the United States being admitted, as also the execution by him of the deed, bearing date the 20th of May, 1816, it remains only to examine the character of this instrument, and the situation of the grantor at the time of its execution. If he had not then sufficient property to pay all his debts, and if it were a voluntary assignment of his property—which has been decided to mean all the debtor's property—the right of preference in the United States must necessarily follow. It was argued by all parties as if it were necessary, that the assignment should appear to be for the benefit of all the creditors of the insolvent. This would be necessary if these bonds were for the payment of duties, in which case the assignment must not only be voluntary, but for the benefit of creditors, which words are not found in the act which governs the present case—But if the counsel are right and the court be mistaken in this respect, and the assignment, to give rise to the priority here claimed, ought to be for the benefit of creditors or of all the creditors, there well be no difficulty in fixing on it this characteristic also. That the assignment, although for a valuable consideration, was voluntary within the meaning of the act of congress, that is, made freely and without any legal compulsion, is not denied. There is some controversy whether it included all the property of the debtor, without which, under the decision in the case of the United States against Hoe and others, a priority would not attach, unless indeed it should appear, that for the purpose of evading the provisions of the law, a trifling part of the estate had been omitted. If the court had nothing for its guide but the assignment itself, it would not be a very forced construction of the instrument, taken altogether to regard it as a conveyance of all the debtor's property. It is professedly so of all his personal estate, without any exception, and it also comprises, as appears by the recitals, all his real estate in New-Jersey and New-York. This taken in connexion with the object of the assignment, would leave but little room to suppose that there might be lands elsewhere than in the states of New-York and New-Jersey, which were not included in this deed.

But whatever doubt might otherwise rest on this part of the case, it is dispelled by the following testimony produced by the United States, who have very properly taken on themselves the burthen of proving the fact; the deed not being as explicit as it might have been. Besides other witnesses who were well acquainted with the situation of Blanche, and who establish the fact, in a manner which ought to be satisfactory, the debtor himself has been examined as a witness,—and settles beyond controversy, that the deed did cover the whole of his property.

It is objected that Blanche is interested: but whatever feeling he may have, it must in point of interest be unimportant to him whether the United States succeed in this suit, and if they do, whether they are paid out of the estate assigned to Mott, Vanderbilt, and Coulter, or out of the private property of the latter. If the United States fail in this action, he continues their debtor—if they be paid out of the assigned property, his debt to Mott and Williams will be revived pro tanto; and if the plaintiffs are paid out of the assets in the hands of Coulter's executors, he will become a debtor to the amount of such payment to his estate. It is equally clear, if that be necessary to be proved, from the testimony of Blanche, and the terms of the assignment, that when he made it, he had not sufficient property to pay all his debts.

All the allegations of the complainants being thus admitted or proved, which were necessary to bring their case within the meaning of the act of the 3d of March, 1797—nothing would remain but for the court to make a decree pursuant to the prayer of their bill. But it is supposed by the counsel of the administrator of John Mott, and of his surviving partner Williams, that, instead of making them account immediately for the trust property of Blanche, a decree should be made in favour of the United States, in the first instance against the estate of Coulter, and leave the executors of his will to their remedy for reimbursement, if they have any, against Mott and Williams; or that if a decree be made against Mott and Williams in favour of the complainants, one should at the same time pass in their favour and for their indemnity against the estate of Coulter. It has been argued that the United States should have their remedy in the first place against the estate of Coulter, because he is a party to the deed of assignment, and thereby consented to postpone the debt for which he was surety, to that of Mott and Williams. It is also said in favour of such a decree, that there being two funds, out of which the United States can be paid, and but one from which Mott and Williams can have satisfaction, they have a right to compel the complainants to resort in the first instance to, and exhaust the one on which they can have no claim.

A defendant who asks of a court of chancery not to touch the only fund to which he can resort, while there is another one out of which the complainant can obtain satisfaction, ought to show not only that he has a clear and indisputable title, which will be respected in equity, to the fund which he desires may be held sacred for his use, but that there are in reality two funds, of which an election can be made; and that by such election no injustice will be done to any of the other parties before the court. Thus where one person has two mortgages on different estates, and another has a mortgage only on one of them, nothing is more reasonable than to force him who holds the two mortgages to proceed first against that estate on which the other has no security—and to leave the other untouched in case the first estate be sufficient to satisfy him. There were not only two funds, but they were both before the court, and the title of neither party was liable to any doubt, nor could the mortgagor have any objection to such a decree. It would, therefore, have been most manifestly unjust to have acted otherwise.

The first answer then, to this course of proceeding on the present occasion is, that the two funds here spoken of, that is, the property mentioned in the deed of assignment or its proceeds, and the estate of Coulter, admitting it sufficient to pay the debt, are not both before the court, so as to justify any decree against the latter. Although it may be collected from the proceedings that Coulter was a co-debtor with Blanche to the United States, and that he may have property enough to pay the debt, nothing would be more unjust or improper than to make a decree against his estate, under the present bill, which, notwithstanding its general prayer, most manifestly confines any relief that may be afforded, to such as the United States may be entitled to out of the estate of Blanche, in consequence of the execution of the assignment by him before-mentioned. Coulter's representatives, therefore, have not been called upon, nor have they had an opportunity of contesting the right of the complainants to a decree against his estate. Nor have they been put on their guard by any intimation or allegation in the bill to dispute the grounds on which two of their co-defendants have placed the propriety of such a decree. If the United States had sought by their bill a decree against the estate of Coulter, on any other ground than as one of the trustees in the deed of assignment, a demurrer might have been interposed, their remedy on the judgment confessed by the executors, being clearly a remedy at law, unless for the purpose of discovery, they had thought proper to bring the executors into a court of chancery. It is not enough to put the executors of his will on their defence, that the suggestion has been made in a separate answer of one or more of the defendants.

Thus far the court has proceeded on the supposition, that there are two funds before it, out of which satisfaction may be had. But non constat that Coulter has left any estate at all;—nor, if he has, that any of it remains in the hands of the executors of his will; nor, that they are able, if they have inadvertently admitted assets by their plea in New Jersey, to pay so large a sum, or any part of it. It is believed that a court of chancery has in no case prevented a party, who had a clear and undoubted right, from proceeding against a particular fund to which another might also claim a title, although a subordinate one, without presenting to it another equally certain, if not as productive. In the present case, therefore, it would be unjust to delay the United States by a decree which might prove illusory, against an estate which might not produce a cent; when they ask for and have a right to receive payment out of a fund to which as far as it extends, the law has given them a title.

But if the reasoning of the court thus far be incorrect, there are other obstacles in the way of such a decree as is sought for by Mott and Williams. If Coulter has agreed, by being a co-trustee with Mott and Vanderbilt in the deed of assignment, that this property should first be applied to the payment of the debt of Mott and Williams; if this distribution be deranged by operation of law, and the decree of a court—it does not follow that he would be bound to find other property to satisfy Mott and Williams, or to indemnify them for what they might thus lose. Still less evident is it that the United States, or this court, are under an obligation to pursue any course, which should have for its object the securing to Mott and Williams indirectly the very benefit under this assignment which the law has taken from them—and the more especially as the instrument on its very face, avows the intention of creating a preference in their favour to the prejudice of the government, and against the policy and provision of all the laws which have been passed on this subject. Would not such a course of decision encourage rather than discountenance similar attempts? But there is another objection to such a decree, which if not conclusive of itself, is entirely satisfactory to my mind. It is admitted by all, that the debt due by Coulter is only as the surety of Blanche. Would not then a decree, operating in the first instance on the estate of the surety, if any such there were, and abstaining from the fund of the principal debtor, until the former were exhausted, be pregnant with injustice, and at variance with the whole course of chancery proceeding?

It is no answer to this difficulty to say, that the surety by his own act has justified this mode of proceeding. Such assent, may have been given on a belief that the property assigned would pay both debts, not meaning, however, to guaranty the payment of Mott and Williams, if the United States should think fit, notwithstanding this arrangement, to assert their priority. At any rate, before such conclusion be drawn, if it ever can be, the executors of Coulter's will should have an opportunity of controverting in a suit with Mott and Williams, matters which they have not been called upon in this suit to take any notice of; and which, for any thing that yet appears, may defeat their right to any relief against him. But as it is intended to leave these parties to litigate either here or elsewhere, as they may be advised, it is not intended to express an opinion on any claim that Mott and Williams may set up against the estate of Coulter, to make good their loss by this suit, or on any defence which his executors may interpose to such claim. I only mean to say, that in the present suit, they are entitled to no relief against the estate of Coulter; and this being my view of the subject, I shall make the following decree.

This cause came on to be heard on the bill, answers, replication, and depositions, and was argued by the district attorney for the United States, by Hoffman and Wheaton for the defendants Mott and Williams, and by David B. Ogden, Griffen, and Haight for the defendants Casparus Prior and Josiah Hornblower, executors of the last will and testament of William Coulter, deceased. Whereupon this court doth order, adjudge, and decree, that the monies brought into court by the defendants, Uriah R. Scribner and John Hitchcock, be paid to the complainants, in part satisfaction of their demand against the defendant, Noel Blanche. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that it be referred to William Ironside to ascertain and report what sum will remain due to the complainants, on the several bonds mentioned in their bill, as being executed by the defendant, Noel Blanche, by the said William Coulter, and by Jeremiah Vanderbilt, after crediting thereon, the sum which has been brought into court as aforesaid, and which is, by this decretal order, directed to be paid to the complainants. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said William Ironside do also ascertain and report what property was conveyed by the deed of assignment in the pleadings mentioned, bearing date the 20th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1816, that is to say:—All the particulars, whether real or personal, of which the same consisted, and what part or parts thereof have been sold by the trustees therein named, or by either of them, and to whom, and for what prices, and what sums of money have been received by the said trustees, or by either of them, under and in virtue of the said deed of assignment, and how the same have been applied, and what part of the estate, real or personal, granted by the said deed, remains unsold, or in the hands of the said trustees, or either of them, and what is the value thereof. And also that the said William Ironside report, whether there were any and what encumbrances, and of what kind and nature, and to what extent, on any part of the real estate mentioned in the said deed of assignment; and whether any and what part of such estate has been sold in virtue thereof. And it is further ordered, that in taking the said account, the said William Ironside may examine on oath, the district attorney for the Southern district of New-York, or any of either of the defendants, as well as any other person or persons. And any further direction or decree is reserved until the coming in of the said report.

Case No. 15,827.

UNITED STATES v. MOULTON.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1830.

CRIMINAL LAW — LARCENY ON HIGH SEAS — "PERSONAL GOODS" — MONEY.

Money and bank notes and coin are "personal goods," within the meaning of the sixteenth section of the crimes act of 1790, c. 36 [1 Story's Laws, 83; 1 Stat. 112, c. 9], respecting stealing and purloining on the high seas.

[Cited in U. S. v. Canoe, Case No. 14,718.]

[Cited in Com. v. Rand, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 476; State v. Williams, 19 Ala. 15.]

Indictment [against Henry Moulton], founded on the crimes act of 1790, c. 36, § 16 [1 Story's Laws, 83; 1 Stat. 112, c. 9]. It contained several counts The first alleged, that the defendant, on the high seas, &c., one piece of foreign gold coin, called a sovereign, of the value of $4.60; one other piece of foreign gold coin, called one eighth of a doubloon, of the value of $2.00; one piece of foreign silver coin, called a seven pence half penny, of the value of 12½ cents; twelve pieces of foreign silver coin, called Spanish dollars, each of the value of $1.00; one piece of silver coin of the United States, called a half dollar, of the value of 50 cents; twenty-four pieces of foreign silver coin, called quarters of a dollar, each the value of 25 cents; one other piece of foreign silver coin called a nine-pence, of the value of 12½ cents; one piece of silver coin of the United States, called a quarter of a dollar, and of the value of 25 cents; one bank bill of the New-Haven Bank, of the denomination of five dollars, and of the value of $5.00; one other bank bill of the State Bank of Boston, of the denomination of three dollars, and of the value of $3.00; one other bank bill of the bank of the United States, of the denomination of five dollars, and of the value of $5.00, of the personal goods of one John L. Bowman, did then and there feloniously take and carry away, with intent to steal and purloin, against the peace &c., and the form of the statute &c. The second count alleged the larceny to be of one piece of gold, of the value of &c.; one piece of silver, of the value &c.; enumerating the same coin as in the first count. There were two other counts, one of which was for a larceny of the foreign coin, and the other of the coin of the United States, in the first count mentioned.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

The defendant pleaded guilty; and having no counsel, Dunlap, Dist. Atty., stated to the court, that there was a question of law open upon the record, how far the coin and bank bills, or either of them, were "personal goods," within the purview of the statute.

Dunlap argued as follows:

The indictment contains four counts. In the first, the defendant is charged with stealing sundry pieces of coin, and three bank bills; in the second, with stealing sundry pieces of gold and silver not alleging them to be coin or money, of a certain alleged value; in the third, with stealing certain pieces of foreign gold and silver coin; and in the fourth, with stealing certain coin of the United States. In the second, third, and fourth counts, the property described is admitted to be the same as the coin described in the first count. The question is, whether these bank bills and this coin, or either of them, are "personal goods" within the true meaning of the statute of 1790, c. 36, § 16 [1 Story's Laws, 83; 1 Stat. 112, c. 9], which prohibits and punishes the offence of taking and carrying away on the high seas, and in certain specified places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, with intent to steal or purloin, the "personal goods of another." It is admitted, that there are various authorities in the English books; decisions made in favorem vitæ, on account of the anxieties of judges administering the bloody code of Great Britain, to find loops to hang doubts on, and which tend to show that bank notes and money are not goods and chattels in penal statutes. Some of the authorities are to be found referred to and examined in the case of the U. S. v. Davis [Case No. 14,930], where it was holden, that a larceny of a promissory note, a chose in action, was not within this act of congress, because not the "personal goods of another." To the authorities of Jac. Law Dict. "Goods," "Chattels," Co. Litt. 118; Com. Dig. "Biens"; 2 East, P. C. 587–948; 2 Russ., Crimes, 1093, —may be added Fost. Crown Law, 79, where it is said, that money is not within the act of 10 & 11 Wm. III., against privately stealing goods in ware-houses, &c.; 2 Strange, 1133; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 946; Dyer, 5; Leigh's & Grimes' Cases (decided in 1764) 1 Leach, 52, where it was holden, that dollars of Portugal money, and guineas, being money, were not "goods, wares, and merchandise," within the statute of 24 Geo. II. c. 45; Guy's Case (decided in 1782) 1 Leach, 241, where it was holden, that money is not within the meaning of the words "goods and chattels," within the statutes of 3 W. & M. c. 9, § 4, and 5 Anne, c. 31 § 5; and Davidson's Case, contained in a note to Guy's Case to the same effect, decided in 1766; Sadi's Case (decided in 1787) 1 Leach, 468, where it was holden, that bank notes are not "goods and chattels" within the before mentioned statutes of William & Mary and Anne; 6 Johns. 103, where it was holden that a larceny could not, at common law, be committed of a letter; and Perry v. Coates, 9 Mass. 537, where it was holden, that bank notes were not "goods, effects, or credits," within the statute of Massachusetts, respecting foreign attachments. These were the leading authorities and cases in favour of the defendant and in support of the doubt, whether money and bank notes were "personal goods" within a penal statute.

It would be contended on the part of the United States with great confidence, that money and bank notes are "personal goods." Some aid might be derived from recurring to the various definitions of larceny, and it would be found, that the most ancient and modern definitions were the most broad and sensible. In Bract. 3, c. 32, it is said, "quod furtum est secundum leges contractatio rei alienæ fraudulenta, cum animo furando," the word is "rei," the most extensive in its signification; and the only word in the definition which shows, that it must be even personal property is the barbarous word "contracetatio," a word, it is believed, unknown in the Latin language, implying that the thing stolen must be something which can be removed or taken and carried away. In the third Institute, 107, it is true, the definition is more strict, and the offence of larceny is described to be the "felonious and fraudulent taking and carrying away, by any man or woman, of the mere personal goods of another." In 2 East, P. C. c. 16, § 2, the same expression, "mere personal goods," is preserved in the definition of larceny. But in a recent case, Hammon's Case, 2 Leach, 1089, a definition of larceny is given by Grose, J., more conformable to the ancient definition in Bracton,—"the felonious taking of the property of another." Under the word "rei" in Bracton, and the word "property" in the modern definition, it would seem, that money and bank notes were included. Money and bank notes are "personal goods." Things personal, according to 2 Bl. Comm. c. 24, are things moveable, or which may be carried about with and attendant upon a man's person. Certainly, money and bank notes are of this description of property, and indeed money is expressly mentioned in this description, by Blackstone. A chose in action is said to be a thing not in occupation or enjoyment, but merely "a bare right," to be recovered by an action; hence its name. But neither money, nor bank notes good and current, which are the representatives of specie, are choses in action. In form a bank note is a chose in action, and when dishonoured, it becomes the evidence of a right of action, a document for a debt; and the case in 9 Mass. 537, was of dishonoured bank notes.

The suspicion of the necessity of a law-suit to enforce the payment of a bank note would destroy its currency, which is its essence, and gives it its character of money. While therefore it circulates, it is as money, and Lord Mansfield lays it down decidedly, in the case of Miller v. Race, 1 Burrows, 457, 459, that bank notes are "not securities, nor documents for debts," but "money" and "cash." Money does not fall within the reason of the rule, why choses in action are not considered goods and chattels, so as to be the subject of larceny. The reason of that rule is said to be, because choses in action have no intrinsic value, and so far has this notion been carried, that the intrinsic value of the parchments on which they have been written, and even of the box containing them, has been disregarded. 2 Strange, 1188; 3 Inst. 109; 2 Russ. 1112; 2 East, P. C. 591; Hawkins, bk. 1, c. 25, § 33. But there is an intrinsic value in the metal, of which the money is made, without reference to the "form and pressure," which makes it coin. Ancient medals are not now money, yet they were once so (Priestley's Lectures on History, Lect. 6); and in an indictment, would now be described as goods and chattels. Another reason is assigned in Hawkins, in the passage already cited for the rule, that choses in action are not, at common law, the subject of larceny, as goods and chattels, because, being of no intrinsic value, and "of no manner of use to any but the owner, they are not supposed to be so much in danger of being stolen, and therefore need not to be provided for in so strict a manner." Surely, gold and silver coin, and current bank notes, are not within the reason of this rule, and cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex.

Upon a close examination of the cases in which such a strict interpretation has been given to the word "goods," in favorem vitæ, by the English courts in construing penal statutes, it will be found, that it has been on account of the accompanying words, "wares and merchandise," which are not in the act of congress; hence it has been ruled, according to the maxim, "Noscitur ex sociis," that "goods" were to be understood as "ejusdem generis" with "wares and merchandise." Fost. Crown Law, 79. But there has been a later case than any of those cited which make in favour of the defendant, and in effect overruling them, Dean's Case, decided in 1795, and reported in 2 Leach, 693, where it was ruled, that a bank note was within the words "goods, wares, and merchandise," in the statute of 12 Anne, c. 7. In this court also, specie has been held to be "goods, wares, and merchandise," under the penal provisions of the revenue law of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 627], and liable to forfeiture when unladen without a regular entry, and a custom-house permit. In Holbrook's Case, 13 Johns. 90, and Richard's Case, 1 Mass. 337, it was held, that bank notes, in an indictment for larceny, might be described as goods and chattels. In the chancery court in England, at first view, apparently different opinions have been entertained upon the question, whether money or bonds ought to be considered as goods. In 1 P. Wms. 267, it was decided, that a devise of all one's goods passes a bond; and in 3 P. Wms. 112, it was decided, that under a devise to one of "household goods and other goods, plate, and stock, within doors and without," with the residue of the personal estate to another, the ready money and bonds did not pass. But the latter case does not contradict the former, for the decision was upon the ground of the intention of the testator, indicated by the residuary bequest, which would have been inoperative and ineffectual if the bonds and cash had passed by the general words of the first bequest.

In relation to the strict construction of penal statutes, often defeating the intention of the legislature, the favouring of astute quibbling exceptions has been lamented by the greatest judges as a blemish to the administration of justice, and less strict notions on this subject now prevail than anciently. Formerly, it was held under the statute of Edw. VI. c. 2, against stealing horses, that he, who stole but one horse, could not be convicted on that statute, 1 Bl. Comm. 89. But in Hassel's Case, 1 Leach, 1, it was held, that a person who stole but one bank note, was within the statutes 2 Geo. II. c. 25, § 3, and 13 Anne, c. 7, against stealing "bank notes." In the United States, where the laws are not written in blood, and where the people are governed by a mild and merciful system established by themselves, there has been less disposition in the courts than in England, to favour fanciful constructions of penal statutes enabling offenders to elude justice. In Fisher's Case, 17 Mass. 46, an unbroken series of adjudged cases giving a construction to the British statute of 7 Geo. II. c. 22, against the forgery of orders for the delivery of goods, of which the Massachusetts statute of 1804 (chapter 120, § 1), upon which the defendant was indicted, is almost a transcript, was entirely disregarded, and the court say, that the English cases cited for the defendant, though decidedly in point as to the construction of the English statute, admitted to be similar in its language to the Massachusetts statute, were "in favour of life," and sanctioned "a stricter construction" than they thought it necessary to give to the statute of Massachusetts, by which "the life of the offender is not put in jeopardy." To the same effect are the cases of People v. Johnson, 12 Johns. 292, and State v. Holly, 2 Bay, 262. In the celebrated work of that distinguished American jurist, Edward Livingston, the penal code prepared for the state of Louisiana, the rule of the English courts of favourable and unfavourable construction of statutes according to the civil or criminal character of the cause, is abolished, and "all penal laws are to be construed according to the plain import of the words taken in their usual sense." Pen. Code La. bk. 1, c. 1. In the supreme court of the United States, as well as in this court, it has been declared, that though penal laws are to be construed strictly, they are not to be construed so as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76–94; The Industry [Case No. 7,028].

It is therefore contended, that the defendant's case is within the statute upon which he is indicted, and that the money, as money, and bank bills, are "personal goods," and that at all events, the defendant may be indicted and convicted for stealing the gold and silver money, described in the second count not as coin, but simply as pieces of gold and silver metal, on account of the intrinsic value, for in this count the property is described with all the accuracy the law requires, by number, species, and value. 3 Maule & S. 539, 547, 548.

In conclusion, it may be remarked, that in the latter part of the section, upon which the defendant is indicted, the word "property," which is broad enough to include money and bank notes, is used as of the same force and meaning, as the expression, "personal goods," in the first part of that section.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The 16th section of the crimes act of 1790, c. 36 [1 Story's Laws, 83; 1 Stat. 112], provides, "that if any person &c., upon the high seas, shall take and carry away, with an intent to steal or purloin, the personal goods of another, the person &c. shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding the fourfold value of the property so stolen," &c. The question is, whether foreign coin, and domestic coin, and bank bills, or any of them, are "personal goods" within the intent of the statute. In the strictest sense of the common law, "personal goods" are moveables belonging to, and the property of, some person, which have an intrinsic value. And even in this, the strictest sense, there cannot be any legal doubt, that the foreign and domestic coins, enumerated in the indictment, are "personal goods," for they have an intrinsic value. In a more large and liberal sense, the term "goods" may embrace moveables not having any intrinsic value, such as choses in action and monied securities, notes, bonds, and other debts, and evidences of debts. Thus, a bequest by a party of all his goods and chattels, without any other restrictive or explanatory words, would carry choses in action, bonds, &c., as well as money and other valuable moveables. And this upon the plain import of the words, as expressive of the intention of the testator. Anon. 1 P. Wms. 267. But in construing penal statutes, courts of law have often, in favour of the citizen, interpreted the word "goods" in its strictest sense; and, indeed, in capital felonies, have sometimes, in favour of life, adopted a far more limited meaning, savouring too often of unseemly nicety, if not of extravagant refinement.

The words of the present enactment approach very near to the definition of larceny at the common law. The usual definition of that offence is, the felonious and fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person of the mere personal goods of another (4 Bl. Comm. 229; 3 Inst. 107; 2 East, P. C. 553; 2 Russ. Crimes, 1032); and according to Bracton (liber 3, c. 32), "furtum est secundum leges contractatio rei alienæ fraudulenta, cum animo furandi, invito illo domino cujus res illa fuerit," answering very nearly to the description given by a late learned judge, that it is the felonious taking of the property of another, without his consent and against his will, with intent to convert it to the use of the taker. Hammon's Case, 2 Leach, 1089; 2 Russ. Crimes, 1032, 1033; 2 East, P. C. 553; Curwood's Hawk. bk. 1, c. 19, and note, Id. In the above definition, "personal goods" has always been construed to mean such moveables only, as have an intrinsic value; and therefore as not comprehending mere choses in action. The common law did not deem the latter the subject of larceny, because they were not of any intrinsic value, and did not import any property in possession of the person, from whom they are taken. 4 Bl. Comm. 234; 2 Russ. Crimes, 1112; 2 East, P. C. 597; Anon., Dyer 5; Rex v. Morris, 2 Leach, 525; 3 Inst. 107, 109; Co. Litt. 118b; Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 33a. It was upon this ground that this court thought itself constrained to hold, in the case of U. S. v. Davis [Case No. 14,930], that mere choses in action (such as a private promissory note for money,) were not personal goods within the purview of the act of 1790. It was presumed, that as the legislature made use of language importing, almost in the very words of the common law, a definition of larceny, such "personal goods" only, as might be deemed property in possession at the common law, were within the contemplation of the act. But to carry the exception farther, and exclude money and coin of foreign or domestic coinage, which are in the strictest sense "personal goods," having an intrinsic value, would, in our judgment, be to indulge a latitude of construction not properly belonging to judicial tribunals. The natural sense of the terms of the act ought to be adopted, unless the context affords clear proof of some more restrictive application of them. Very little light can be gathered from the decisions of the English courts, upon the construction of their own statutes, to assist us in this part of the inquiry. In the first place, as has been already intimated, courts of law, in cases of capital felonies, have been very astute, perhaps unjustifiably so, to escape from the literal meaning of the words, and to create conjectural exceptions. Such a proceeding, if it may be properly allowed in cases affecting life, is wholly inapplicable to cases of mere misdemeanors, and to other cases not capital. There is much masculine sense in the distinction taken on this subject by the court, in the case of the Com. v. Fisher, 17 Mass. 46. In the next place, there is not a single decision in the English books to our knowledge, which, in point of authority, ought to govern in the construction of the present act; for, in no English statute are the objects or the language substantially the same with ours. There are other accompanying words, or other clauses in the context, explanatory of the legislative intent, which might well authorize, if they did not absolutely require, the court to adopt the narrower construction, in favorem vitæ. It will be sufficient to cite a few of the more prominent cases in order to establish this position. In Rex v. Leigh, 1 Leach, 52, it was held by the court, that stealing money was not a capital larceny within the statute of 24 Geo. II. c. 45. The words of that statute are, "all and every person &c., who shall feloniously steal any goods, wares, or merchandises, of the value of 40 shillings, in any ship, barge, &c. upon any navigable river, or in any port, &c. or upon any wharf or quay, adjacent to such river or port." The court thought, that the construction ought to be confined to such goods and merchandises as are usually lodged in ships, or on wharfs and quays. Reliance was also placed upon the accompanying words, "wares and merchandises," (noscitur a sociis,) and upon the clause as to wharfs and quays; and very properly, for it was difficult to presume, that the legislature had a different intent, as to goods in ships, and on wharfs; and money is not usually lodged on wharfs. Fost. Crown Law, 79; 2 East, P. C. 647.

In the act of 1790, there are no such accompanying words; "personal goods" stand alone in the text, without any qualifying clause. In Rex v. Guy, 1 Leach, 241, which was an indictment for receiving two guineas, which were stolen, it was held, that under the statutes of 3 Woodb. & M. c. 9, § 4, and 5 Anne, c. 31, § 5, there cannot be an accessory after the fact for receiving money. The statute of W. & M., c. 9, provides, that "if any person &c. shall buy or receive any goods or chattels, that shall be feloniously taken or stolen from any other person, knowing the same to be stolen, he &c. shall be taken and deemed an accessory &c. to such felony, after the fact." The statute of 5 Anne, c. 31, provides, that "if any person &c. shall receive or buy any goods or chattels, that shall be feloniously taken or stolen &c.," in the same general terms, as that of W. & M. 2 East, P. C. 743, 744. The judges, in the construction of these statutes, seem uniformly to have held, that the words "goods and chattels" mean such goods and chattels, whereof larceny could be committed at the common law, upon the plain ground, that the legislature did not intend to create any accessorial offence, except in cases where there was a principal offence already committed. It is certain, that guineas are "goods and chattels," in the common law sense of the terms, and as such, subjects of larceny; and it is somewhat difficult, therefore, to account for the decision in Rex v. Guy, upon the principle above stated. Mr. East supposes the decision to have proceeded upon the ground, that the statutes extended only to the receipt of such kind of goods and chattels, the property in which, being generally, and in its own nature, capable of being ascertained by outward marks and circumstances, made it more difficult for the thief to dispose of them without the aid of a receiver, by whom he was encouraged and protected, whereas money has no such distinguishing marks. 2 East, P. C. 748; 2 Russ. Crimes, 1307, 1308. This ground seems wholly unsatisfactory; for if larceny might be of money at the common law, which cannot be doubted (Hawk. P. C. bk. 1, c. 32, § 35; 2 Bl. Comm. 387), there seems no just reason, why the accessorial offence should not, if the words of the acts did not convey any restriction, be held co-extensive with the principal offence. The ground, however, such as it is, is inapplicable to the principal offence, and is limited to receivers. In Rex v. Morris, 2 Leach, 525, it was decided, that the receiver of bank notes, knowing them to be stolen, was not punishable as an accessory under the statute of 3 W. & M. c. 9, and 5 Anne, c. 31, notwithstanding the express declaration in the statute of 2 Geo. II. c. 25 (2 East, P. C. 598), that if any person shall steal any bank notes, &c. "he shall be deemed guilty of felony, of the same nature and in the same degree, &c. as if the offender had stolen or taken any other goods of like value, with the money due, &c." upon the ground, that the latter statute did not reach receivers of bank notes as accessories under the former statutes, but applied only to the principal offender in the larceny. But this case has been since shaken by the decision in Rex v. Dean, 2 Leach, 693. See 2 East, P. C. 646, 749; 2 Russ. Crimes, 883, and note; Id. 1307, 1308. These are the most material cases, and they fall far short of establishing the proposition, that "personal goods" in the act of 1790, do not include coin, or money. In our judgment, it would be an unjustifiable departure from the language of the legislature to hold, that coin and money are not included within the prohibition. They are equally within the terms and the reason of the enactment.

In respect to the bank bills included in the indictment, there is much more difficulty. I agree to the doctrine of Lord Mansfield, in Miller v. Race, 1 Burrows, 457, that bank notes are usually treated in the common business of life as money and cash, and not as goods and chattels, or securities for money. But that case turned upon very different considerations from those, which govern in the construction of penal statutes. There the only point was, whether bank notes, being used as currency, the owner could, in case they were stolen, recover them against a subsequent bona fide holder. The court adjudged, that he could not, upon sound principles of public policy. Now, there is strong reason to believe, that bank notes were not, before the statute of 2 Geo. II. c. 25, held to be "goods or chattels," within the meaning of the statutes of W. & M., and Anne, above referred to. This is not decisive; but it affords a presumption, that in the opinion of parliament, it was necessary to punish the larceny of bank notes by a specific description, eo nomine. Technically speaking, bank bills are merely promissory notes for the payment of money; and they may be declared on as such. Young v. Adams, 6 Mass. 182; Perry v. Coates, 9 Mass. 537. They are not in all cases treated as money, though in most instances, for the purposes of civil justice, they are so. In Com. v. Carey, 2 Pick. 47, the court declared, that a bank note might, in an indictment for theft, be described as a promissory note of the bank; and in this respect it was not distinguished from other private choses in action. In Spangler v. Com., 3 Bin. 533, the court seem to have treated bank notes as no otherwise the subjects of larceny than as statutable enactments had made them so. And Yeates, J., on that occasion said, that bank and promissory notes are mere choses in action. But in Com. v. Boyer, 1 Bin. 201, upon an indictment for larceny of bank notes, the court thought, that a description of them as the "goods and chattels" of the true owner was sufficient. The same doctrine is implied in Com. v. Richards, 1 Mass. 337. In People v. Holbrook, 13 Johns. 90, the point was directly decided; and it was held, that in such a case, "goods and chattels" implied property or ownership. But in each of these cases there was a state statute, which made the larceny of bank notes a substantive offence; and in two of them, the state statute was to the same effect as that of 2 Geo. II. c. 25; and it is not impossible, that these considerations had an influence upon the decision.

The doctrine in New York has gone farther; and bank notes have been held liable to be taken in execution upon a fieri facias, as money. Handy v. Dobbin, 12 Johns. 220. This decision would be entitled to very great weight, if it stood wholly uncontradicted. But in Massachusetts, an opposite doctrine has been maintained. Perry v. Coates, 9 Mass. 537. Still, there is this material difference between bank notes and other promissory notes, that the former in the common transactions of life are treated as money, and circulate as currency, and therefore have, in themselves, an intrinsic value in the common estimation of mankind. They are at least as much within the policy of the act of 1790 (chapter 30), and as important to be guarded against larceny as any personal property whatsoever. Under such circumstances, the court has been anxious to ascertain, whether bank bills have been in any cases of a penal nature treated differently from any other choses in action; and especially, whether in cases of statutable larcenies, they have been distinguished from other negotiable notes. In Rex v. Dean, 2 Leach, 693, the indictment was for stealing a bank note of the value of $20, the property of J. M., in his dwelling house. The statute of 12 Anne, c. 7, § 1, makes stealing "any money, goods, chattels, wares or merchandises of the value of 40 shillings," a capital offence. It was objected, that bank notes were not "money, goods, chattels, wares or merchandises," within the purview of the statute. But the judges were unanimously of opinion, that they were; for that the statute was intended to protect every species of property. But the statute of 2 Geo. II. c. 25 (2 East, P. C. 597, 598), already referred to, doubtless had great influence in the decision, since it put the stealing of bank notes upon the same footing as to nature, degree, and punishment, as the stealing of any other goods; though this ground does not expressly appear in the opinion of the judges. In Rex v. Clarke, 2 Leach (4th Ed.) 1036, the indictment was for larceny of certain bankers' notes, and for certain pieces of paper, of the value, &c. each stamped, and re-issuable, as bankers' notes, payable to the bearer. It appeared in evidence, that the notes had been taken up by the bankers' agents, and were stolen from a parcel in their transit to the bankers for the purpose of being re-issued. The objection was, that the notes, having been paid, were of no value, and consequently, not the subject of larceny. The prisoner was convicted; and the judges held, that he was rightly convicted. 2 East, P. C. 646, 749; 2 Russ. Crimes, 984, 1307, 1308; Rex v. Hammon, 2 Leach, C. C. (4th Ed.) 1089. Mr. Justice Grose, in delivering their opinion, said: "The question submitted in this case to the consideration of the judges was, whether the paper and stamps are, under the circumstances of the case, the subjects of larceny at the common law; or in other terms, whether they are the property of, and of any value to, J. J. and A. L., (the bankers,) who were unquestionably the owners. These gentlemen have paid for the paper, the printing, and the stamps of these papers, which once existed both in character and value as promissory notes. Their character and value as promissory notes were certainly extinct at the time they were stolen. But even in this state, they bore about them a capability of being legally restored to their former character and pristine value. It was a capability, in which these owners had a special interest and property. The act of re-issuing them would have immediately manifested their value, as papers, &c. In what sense or meaning, therefore, can it be said, that these stamped papers were not the valuable property of their owners? They were indeed only of value to those owners; but it is enough, that they were of value to them. Their value to the rest of the world is immaterial. The judges are, therefore, of opinion, that to the extent of the price of the paper, the printing, and the stamps, they were valuable property belonging to the prosecutors." See, also, Id., 2 Russ. Crimes (2d Eng. Ed. 1828) 147, and note. It cannot escape observation, how strongly every word of this opinion applies to the case of bank notes, which are outstanding; and it is to be considered, that the question on the counts, to which alone the opinion applies, was, as to the larceny at the common law. If bankers' notes payable to bearer were of the value of the stamps, and paper, and printing, because re-issuable, and therefore to be deemed valuable property, the subject of larceny, a fortiori, bank notes, for which the holder must be presumed to have given value, and which have in his hands a present value as currency, must be deemed such. There is, indeed, such a persuasive good sense in the opinion, that one feels very great difficulty in escaping from its conclusive effect in cases of the larceny of other mere choses in action. Rex v. Ransom, 2 Leach, 1090, is not so strong in its application. But Rex v. Vyse, 1 Moody, Crown Cas. 218, not only affirmed the doctrine in Rex v. Clarke, but proceeded a step farther. It was there held, that bankers' notes, so paid and re-issuable, were not only subjects of larceny at common law, but might be described in the indictment, (as in that case they in fact were described,) as "goods and chattels" of the owners.

These cases distinctly show, that in modern times, courts of justice in penal, and even in capital cases, are disposed to look at the real nature of the things stolen, and though they are in form choses in action, yet, if possessing a real value in possession, to hold them subjects of larceny. The choses in action, which were held originally not to be the subjects of larceny at the common law, were those, which had no intrinsic value, (bank notes were not then in existence,) and did not import any property in possession of the person. Can it be truly said, that bank notes, payable to bearer, and passing as currency, have no present value in possession? The present indictment has described them as of the value, which they purport on their face to promise to pay. They pass as money; they are received as money. In courts of justice, they are treated as money. On a declaration for money had and received, proof, that the defendant received bank notes for the use of the plaintiff, would be sufficient to maintain the action. They have a present value in possession, not as a mere promise to pay money, but as money of an immediate, positive, exchangeable value. It seems to us, therefore, that it would be an over refinement to hold, that they are not "personal goods" within the sense of the act of 1790. They are far better entitled to the appellation of "goods and chattels," than the paid bankers' notes in Clarke's and Vyse's Cases above mentioned.

Besides, the bank notes of the bank of the United States, by the express provisions of the charter (of which, as a public act, we are bound judicially to take notice,) are receivable in payments to the United States; and they have, therefore, a present value, for such purposes, as cash. The same cannot be said of the other bank notes, stated in the indictment. But we are still entitled to consider them as of the present value of their respective denominations, as they are so alleged in the indictment.

If this were an indictment at common law, we might, as to the latter bank notes, have some hesitation, though the Cases of Clarke and Vyse would certainly go far to remove any technical scruples. One reason, why, at the common law, bonds and other choses in action were not deemed subjects of larceny, was, that they could not be used as property in possession by the thief, but were suable only by the owner. But bank notes, payable to bearer, are not now liable to such a consideration; for they are of present worth and value to the holder, and pass by delivery. We are now construing a public statute; and if we can perceive, that the words of the statute, in common and legal understanding, are large enough to comprehend bank notes, and that the policy of the statute applies to them with at least the same force, that it does to "personal goods" in the most restrictive sense of the terms, we are bound to give that interpretation, which carries the words to the extent of the mischief. We may say, as the judges did in Dean's Case, 2 Leach, 693, "that the statute was intended to protect every species of property," which may be deemed valuable property in possession. In the case of Rex v. Robinson, Id. 869, the judges held, that bank notes were a valuable thing under the statute of 9 Geo. I. c. 22, respecting threatening letters, which uses the words "money, venison, or other valuable thing." See, also, Rex v. Aslett, 2 Leach (4th Ed.) 958; 2 East, P. C. 1110; 2 Russ. Crimes, 1830, &c. But a private promissory note has been held not to be so. Rex v. Major, 2 Leach, 894; 2 East, P. C. 118. A distinction is here manifestly taken between choses in action, which are mere evidences of a debt, and those, which have a present value as currency. It can scarcely be doubted, that under the statute of 30 Geo. II. c. 24, respecting false pretenses, bank notes must have been deemed "money, goods, wares, or merchandises," although there is no case, now recollected, which turned on that point. See 2 East, P. C. 832.

Upon the whole, the court are of opinion, that the bank notes stated in the indictment, equally with the coin, are personal goods within the act of 1790, and therefore sentence must be passed upon the prisoner accordingly.

Case No. 15,829.

UNITED STATES v. MOUNTJOY.

District Court, D. New Jersey. July 9, 1866.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FRAUDULENT RETURNS—USE OF UNAUTHORIZED FORM.

In the United States district court, Monday, July 9, the trial of George Mountjoy, of the firm of Mountjoy & McGinniss, of Rahway, for making fraudulent returns to the United States assessor, was resumed. [For prior proceeding, see Case No. 15,678.]

THE COURT called D.P. Southworth, United States assessor for the Fourth district of Pennsylvania, who had been charged with the investigation of the frauds charged in this case. It appearing by his evidence that the alleged return was made on an old form, such as was required under the law of 1862 [12 Stat. 432], and that the form prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, under the act of 1864 [13 Stat. 227], had never been used by the assistant assessor at Rahway, and the witness testifying that the return in evidence would not have been accepted by him, and was in no sense in compliance with the act of 1864, THE COURT interrupted the further progress of the case.

FIELD, District Judge, said that this was a difficulty that had occurred to his mind from the first, and now it appearing as a fact that no return had been made, he could not charge the jury that such a return had actually been made, and that it was for them to decide whether it was false and fraudulent or not. This difficulty arises from the fact that the assistant assessor, A. S. Bonney, of Rahway, N. J., to cover up his own deficiencies, and to subserve his own private ends, it appearing that he was deeply interested in the return, had arranged his monthly account, at least, in a way to suit himself. THE COURT felt it was only proper to state this to the district attorney, leaving it for him to make such statement as he might deem proper under the circumstances.

Mr. Keasbey, United States district attorney, said that this was a difficulty he had been called upon to consider at the outset of the case, and he had drawn the indictments with reference to it. He could not control the facts of the case, and if the court considered the objection an insuperable one, he must, of course, submit. He had tried to do his duty, and in future, as in this case, where evidence of fraud was presented to the grand jury, he should endeavor to secure a conviction.

THE COURT then directed the jury to return a verdict of "Not guilty," and under the direction of the court, the verdict was returned.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1812.

WITNESS—COMPETENCY—INTEREST—INDICTMENT FOR USURY.

Upon an indictment for taking usury, the borrower is a competent witness for the prosecution, if he has paid the money, and be not the informer.

[Cited in U. S. v. Anderson, Case No. 14,452.]

Indictment for taking usury from William Calder.

The attorney of the United States offered William Calder as a witness.

Mr. Morsell and Mr. Key, for defendant, objected that he was interested. First, because he is the informer, and entitled to half the penalty, under the Maryland law of September, 1704, c. 69, § 3; and secondly, because he is offered to invalidate his own contract. If he has paid the money he may recover it back; if he has not paid it he is interested to set aside the contract. 1 McNal. Ev. 105; Rex v. Whiting, 1 Salk. 283, 1 Ld. Raym. 396.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the witness was competent; having declared upon the voir dire, that he was not interested; and had paid the money, and it being admitted that he was not a voluntary informer.

UNITED STATES v. MUHLENBRINK.

[1 Woods, 569.] [2]

Circuit Court, N. D. Georgia. Sept. Term, 1873.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION—END OF WAR—FEDERAL COURTS IN GEORGIA.

1. The suspension of the statute of limitations provided for by the act of congress, approved June 11, 1864 (13 Stat. 123), did not continue in Georgia after the proclamation of the president, of April 2, 1866 [14 Stat. 811].

[Cited in Stoughton v. Hill, Case No. 13,501; Amy v. City of Watertown, 22 Fed. 420.]

2. The fact that no term of the United States court for the Northern district of Georgia was held until September 10, 1866, and no clerk of that court appointed until that date, did not continue the suspension of the statute until that time.

This cause was submitted upon the motion of defendant, Hans Muhlenbrink, for a new trial.

Geo. S. Thomas, Asst. U. S. Atty.

L. E. Bleckley and L. J. Gartrell, for defendant.

Before WOODS, Circuit Judge, and ERSKINE, District Judge.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. This action was brought on the 19th of January, 1867, on the official bond of William T. Wilson, as postmaster of Atlanta, on which defendant Muhlenbrink was one of the sureties. Wilson died before suit brought, and the other surety was never served with process; Muhlenbrink was therefore sole defendant. He pleaded that the default of Wilson occurred on the 31st of December, 1859, and that the suit was not brought within two years after the cause of action accrued. The plaintiff replied that said default did not occur more than two years before the commencement of the action, after deducting the time during which the state of Georgia was in rebellion, and during which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings in the state was interrupted in consequence of the Rebellion, and that the Rebellion and interruption of judicial proceedings continued from the 19th of January, 1861, to the 10th day of September, 1866. To this replication the defendant rejoined that after the default there was an interval of more than two years before the commencement of the action, after allowing all proper deductions of time for the causes mentioned in the replication. Upon this the plaintiff took issue, the parties went to trial and the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $5,198 principal, and $50 interest. The court charged the jury that in computing the time during which the statute of limitations had run against plaintiff's cause of action, the period between the 19th of April, 1861, and the 10th of September, 1866, should be excluded. Defendant Muhlenbrink claims that this charge was erroneous, and on that sole ground moves for a new trial.

The question presented for decision is this: How long was the running of the statute of limitations obstructed between the 31st day of December, 1859, the date of the default of Wilson, and the 19th day of January, 1867, the date of the commencement of the action by reason of the matters alleged in the plaintiff's replication? In the state of Georgia, the late war of Rebellion began on the 19th of April, 1861, the date of the proclamation of blockade in that and six other states (12 Stat. 1258), and ended by the proclamation declaring the war closed on the 2d of April, 1866 (14 Stat. 811). The Protector, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 700. If the running of the statute of limitations was suspended only during the period of actual war, as that period was defined in the case of The Protector, namely, between the 19th of April, 1861, and the 2d of April, 1866, then the bar intervened before the bringing of this action, two years, one month and six days having elapsed, exclusive of the period aforesaid, after the default and before the bringing of the suit.

But it is claimed in behalf of plaintiff, that all the time, from the beginning of the war on April 19, 1861, to the commencement of the first term, after the war, of the United States court for the Northern district of Georgia, on September 10, 1866, should be included in the period during which the statute was suspended. To support this claim, reliance is placed on the act of congress approved June 11, 1864 (13 Stat. 123). This act declares that, "whenever, during the existence of the present Rebellion, any action, civil or criminal, shall accrue against any person who, by reason of resistance to the execution of the laws of the United States or the interruption of the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, cannot be served with process for the commencement of said action or the arrest of such person; or whenever, after such action shall have accrued, such person cannot, by reason of such resistance to the execution of the laws of the United States, or such interruption of the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, be arrested or served with process for the commencement of the action, the time during which such person shall be so beyond the reach of legal process shall not be deemed or taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of the action." 13 Stat. 123.

The claim is put forward that, because no term of the federal court was held in Northern Georgia until September 10, 1866, therefore there was such an interruption of the ordinary course of judicial proceedings as prevented the service of process. As a matter of fact, were the United States courts closed in Georgia until the 10th of September, 1866, as a consequence of the Rebellion? We think that public history, the proclamations of the president, and the conceded facts in this case, show that such was not the case. On the 17th day of June, 1865, President Johnson issued his proclamation appointing James Johnson provisional governor of Georgia, and directing that the district judge for the judicial district in which Georgia is included, proceed to hold courts within said state, in accordance with the provisions of the act of congress, and that the attorney general instruct the proper officers to libel and bring to judgment, confiscation and sale property subject to confiscation, and enforce the administration of justice within said state in all matters within the cognizance and jurisdiction of the federal courts. 13 Stat. 764. On the 2d of April, 1866, the president issued his proclamation declaring that "no organized armed resistance to the authority of the United States existed in the state of Georgia, and that the laws could be sustained and enforced therein by the proper civil authorities, and that the people of said state were well and loyally disposed." 14 Stat. 812.

The conceded facts are these: The last term of the United States court, for the Northern district of Georgia, held before the passage of the ordinance of secession, began in September, 1860, and no other term of the court was held until the 10th day of September, 1866. John Erskine was commissioned United States judge, for the districts of Georgia, on July 10, 1865, and soon after qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties. A marshal was appointed during the same year, for the two districts into which the state was divided; but no clerk was appointed for the Northern district until the 10th day of September, 1866. The first term of a United States court actually held in Georgia after the Rebellion was held in the Southern district, at Savannah, in May, 1866, and on the 16th of that month the judge, sitting in chambers at Savannah, made an order in a cause pending in the Northern district. The state courts were opened for the administration of justice in the fall of 1865, and thenceforward continued in the uninterrupted discharge of their duties. The failure of the judge to appoint a clerk is not one of the causes named in the act of congress, the existence of which suspended the running of the statute. It was the impossibility of serving process, arising from resistance to the execution of the laws, or the interruption of the ordinary course of judicial proceedings during the existing Rebellion, that suspended the running of the limitation, and that alone.

Lord Coke in his First Institute (volume 3, p. 40) says: "And therefore when the courts of justice be open, and the judges and ministers may, by law, protect men from wrong and violence, and distribute justice to all, it is said to be a time of peace. So when by invasion, insurrection, rebellion or such like, the peaceable course of justice is disturbed and stopped, so as the courts of justice be as it were, shut up, et silent leges inter arma, then it is said to be time of war. And the trial hereof is by the records and judges of the courts of justice, for by this it will appear whether justice had her equal course of proceeding at that time or no, and this shall not be tried by a jury." Tested by this passage, it seems to us that the courts of the United States were open in Northern Georgia at least as early as April, 1866. The records of the court, the proclamations of the president and the public history, of which this court will take judicial notice, all concur in establishing the fact that, at and before that time the Rebellion was subdued, the war over, peace returned, resistance to the laws at an end, and the ordinary course of judicial proceedings reestablished. If the suit of the plaintiff could not then have been brought, it must have been for some other reason than those named in the act of congress. When peace and order are restored, and judicial officers appointed, the suspension of the statute of limitations does not continue until it shall be convenient for them to act. Peace opens the courts, and a reasonable time after the end of actual hostilities having passed for the courts to resume their functions, the suspension of the statute of limitations must cease. As this action was not commenced within two years after the default, making all proper allowances for the suspension of the statute of limitations, we think the action was barred, and that a new trial ought to be granted.

UNITED STATES v. MULLANY.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1808.

WITNESSES—COMPETENCY — FREE-BORN NEGROES.

Free-born negroes, not subject to any term of servitude by law, are competent witnesses in all cases. Color alone is no objection to a witness.

[Followed in U. S. v. Douglas, Case No. 14,988.]

Indictment [against Michael Mullany] for assault and battery. The defendant was a white man.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. Several free-born negroes and mulattoes are offered as witnesses to support the prosecution. The counsel for the traverser have objected, and contend that they are not competent witnesses, being disqualified by the act of assembly of Maryland, (1717, c. 13,) by which it is enacted "that no negro or mulatto slave, free negro, or mulatto born of a white woman, during his time of servitude by law, or any Indian slave, or free Indian, native of this or the neighboring provinces, be admitted and received as good and valid evidence in law, in any matter or thing whatsoever, depending before any court of record, wherein any Christian white person is concerned." It is contended that the words "during his time of servitude by law," are applicable only to the "mulatto born of a white woman," and not to the "free negro." So that a free negro, whether under an obligation of servitude or not, is wholly incapacitated to become a witness in any case wherein a Christian white person is concerned. On the other side it is contended that the free negro, at all times except "during his time of servitude by law," is a competent witness in such a case. In order to support the traverser's construction of the statute, much reliance is placed on the word "his." It is said that if the legislature meant to apply the expression respecting servitude by law, to the free negro as well as to the mulatto, they would have said "during their time of servitude by law." The word "his," it is said, in grammatical construction, must apply to the last person antecedent, namely, the mulatto, and cannot comprehend both the mulatto and the free negro. This construction, it is also said, derives support from the third section of the act, in which it is provided that "where other sufficient evidence is wanting against any negro or mulatto slaves, free negro, or mulatto born of a white woman, during their servitude by law, the testimony of any negro or mulatto slave, free negro, mulatto born of a white woman, or Indian," &c., "may be received as evidence, provided it do not extend to the depriving them, or any of them, of life or member." It is said that the legislature having used the pronoun in the plural number in the third section, and in the singular in the second, it is evident, they meant in the one case to refer only to the mulatto, and in the other to both mulatto and free negro. It was also said to be an absurdity in terms, to speak of the time of servitude of a free negro. That the expression, "during his time of servitude by law," was peculiarly applicable to the mulatto born of a white woman, because such mulatto, by the act of 1715, c. 44, § 27, was declared to be a servant until the age of thirty-one years; but that the expression was not applicable to the free negro, because there was no servitude by law imposed upon him.

The argument drawn from the circumstance that the pronoun personal is used in the singular number, is not considered of much weight, because the words "free negro" and "mulatto," are joined by the conjunction disjunctive "or"; and in such case the idiom of the English language admits the use of the singular pronoun as applicable to each member of the sentence so joined. In such a sentence, the word "his" may have the same force and effect, as the word "their"; and it is evident that in this very act, the legislature have used the words indiscriminately to the same effect. If the words of a statute be doubtful, and if recourse be had to construction, the first inquiry is, what was the evil which the legislature intended to remedy? In the present case, we are not left to conjecture upon that point; for the legislature in the preamble to the statute have expressly declared the evil for which they contemplated a remedy. They say, "Whereas it may be of very dangerous consequence to admit and allow as evidences in law, in any of the courts of record," "any negro, or mulatto slave, or free negro, or mulatto born of a white woman, during their servitude, appointed by law, or any Indian," &c. The evil complained of, is not the admission of free negroes and mulattoes as witnesses generally, and in all circumstances, but only "during their servitude, appointed by law." Here the meaning of the legislature cannot be misunderstood; the words "their servitude" must mean the servitude of the free negro, as well as that of the mulatto; they cannot be confined to the case of the mulatto, without charging the legislature with the grossest grammatical blunder. It is evident that the legislature contemplated some case in which a free negro could be subject to servitude by law; and by turning to the act of 1715, c. 44, (the same act which declares the mulatto born of a white woman to be subject to servitude,) we find a number of cases in which a free negro may be subjected to servitude by law. Thus in section 4, a free negro harboring a servant, or slave, forfeits one thousand pounds of tobacco, and if unable to pay, he is to make satisfaction by servitude. By section 6, a free person, taken up on suspicion of being a runaway, and unable to pay the reward of two hundred pounds of tobacco, shall make satisfaction by servitude. By section 7, a runaway, if not a slave, is to reimburse the county by servitude. By section 19, a runaway shall satisfy the reward by service, when free. By section 20, if such person be free and unable to pay the reward, he may be committed to prison until he give security, or make satisfaction by servitude or otherwise. By section 27, a free negro, the begetter of a child on a white woman, shall become a servant for seven years. By section 30, a free man, the father of a bastard begotten of a female servant, shall satisfy the damage by servitude or otherwise. So by the act of 1715, c. 26, § 2. A free person convicted of stealing, shall pay fourfold, and if unable to pay, shall satisfy by servitude. And by section 7, the fees of criminals may be paid by servitude.

These are some of the cases in which by the laws prior to 1717, a free negro might be subjected to temporary servitude by law. They are enough to show that the expression, "during his time of servitude by law," might with as much propriety be applied to the free negro as to the mulatto, and that his case was within the same reason. Why should the legislature limit the disability of the mulatto to his time of servitude, and not that of the free negro also? or why permit a free-born mulatto to be a witness, and reject the free-born negro? We can see no reason for such a whimsical distinction, and the legislature cannot be presumed to have had an intention to make it, unless such intention be very clearly expressed. The legislature, when in the third section they say "free negro, or mulatto born of a white woman, during their servitude by law," evidently mean the same thing as they had before expressed by the same words in the preamble, and by the words "free negro, or mulatto born of a white woman, during his time of servitude by law," in the second section. It was argued that by the third section, the legislature meant to exclude free negroes, as witnesses even on the trial of a slave, in cases which might affect his life or member, and a fortiori, on the trial of a Christian white person. By this section, slaves and free negroes and mulattoes, under all circumstances, that is, as well during their time of servitude by law, as otherwise, are admissible witnesses on the trial of a slave, in a case not affecting life or member. But how can it follow from thence, that on the trial of a slave in a case affecting life or member, a free negro or mulatto, not under servitude, would be excluded? Before the act of 1717, there was no law which excluded free negroes from being witnesses; that act only imposes a disability upon them during their servitude by law. It was the condition of servitude that the legislature justly supposed ought to render them incompetent witnesses; for the same reason that slaves are incompetent. It was probably supposed that while under the control of a master, they might by means of fear or threats of ill treatment, or actual ill treatment, be induced to conceal the truth, and that it was not safe to trust to their testimony. That reason could justify their exclusion only while their state of servitude continued. This construction of the act seems to have been adopted by the legislature in 1796 (chapter 67, § 5), when they declared that no manumitted slave should be entitled to give evidence against any white person; for if all free negroes were already excluded by law, such a provision respecting those who were free by manumission, was unnecessary.

For these reasons, I am clearly of opinion, that free-born negroes, not in a state of servitude by law, are competent witnesses in all cases, or rather that color alone does not disqualify a witness in any case. At the time of the argument, I supposed the question had been decided by this court. But upon a careful examination of my own notes, and those of the late chief judge, I do not find any such case. In the case of U. S. v. Barton [Case No. 14,533], (a free mulatto), in Washington, July term, 1803, two manumitted negroes were admitted as witnesses against him, on an indictment for stealing. In the case of U. S. v. Swann [Id. 16,425], (a free mulatto,) a summons for a slave to testify for the defendant, was refused by the court; the court being inclined to the opinion that the slave was not a competent witness. But in U. S. v. Shorter [Id. 16,284], (a free black), at December term, 1806, a slave was admitted as a witness for the traverser. These are all the cases respecting the admission of people of color as witnesses of which I can find any notes. But see the case of U. S. v. Fisher [Id. 15,101], at July term, 1805. Fisher, a white man, was indicted for beating his wife. Lucy Butler, a free-born black woman, was admitted by the court as a witness against him.

NOTE. The court was full when the question was argued, but when this opinion was delivered. Duckett, Circuit Judge, was absent, and Fitzhugh, Circuit Judge, having some doubt, it was agreed to hear a motion for a new trial, upon the ground of admitting improper evidence. The verdict being against the defendant, the question was further considered upon the motion for a new trial in this case, and in that of Davis v. Swann [unreported], at this term, when the other judges gave their full assent to the above opinion.

The following is written by Judge Fitzhugh, in his note-book, in page 84: After stating the opinion in this cause at length, as above "the court intimated that they would hear a motion for a new trial—on the argument of which A. B. D. attended, and the court were unanimously satisfied with the opinion expressed in this cause."

Case No. 15,833.

UNITED STATES v. MULVANEY.

[4 Parker, Cr. Cas. 164.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1859.

OFFENCES AGAINST POSTAL LAWS—OPENING LETTERS, ETC.—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS.

[1. Defendant was indicted for opening a letter, which had been in custody of a mail carrier, before delivery to the person to whom it was directed, with design to obstruct the correspondence of another, etc. The evidence was that the letter was directed to another person, in care of defendant, at defendant's house; that it was left there by a mail carrier, with defendant, without any artifice on his part to obtain possession of it; and that it was then opened and destroyed by him. Held, that this was insufficient to warrant a conviction under the statute.]

[2. A person cannot be convicted of this offence where the only evidence of the corpus delicti is the confessions of defendant that he opened and destroyed the letter.]

[This was an indictment against John Mulvaney for opening a letter addressed to another, which had been in custody of a mail carrier, etc.]

Before HALL, District Judge.

The defendant was brought to trial upon an indictment which was in the words and figures following:

"Southern District of New York, in the Second Circuit. At a stated term of the circuit court of the United States of America, for the Southern district of New York, in the Second circuit, begun and held at the city of New York, within and for the district and circuit aforesaid, on the last Monday of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, and continued by adjournment to and including the third day of March in the same year.

"Southern District of New York, ss: The jurors of the United States of America, within and for the district and circuit aforesaid, on their oath present: That John Mulvaney, late of the city and county of New York, in the district and circuit aforesaid, laborer, heretofore, to wit: on the seventeenth day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, at the city of New York, in the Southern district aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did open a letter which had been in custody of a mail carrier, before it had been delivered to the person to whom it was directed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, to pry into another's business and secrets, against the peace of the United States and their dignity, and against the form of the statute of the said United States, in such case made and provided.

"Second Count. And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, do further present: That John Mulvaney, late of the city and county of New York, in the district and circuit aforesaid, laborer, heretofore, to wit: on the seventeenth day of January, in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, at New York, in the district and circuit aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did destroy a certain letter, which had been in custody of a mail carrier, before it had been delivered to the person to whom it was directed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, to pry into another's business and secrets, against the peace of the United States and their dignity, and against the form of the statute of the said United States, in such case made and provided.

"Theodore Sedgwick, U. S. District Attorney."

The defendant pleaded not guilty. The government proved, that on or about the seventeenth day of January, 1859, a city mail carrier left with defendant at his place of business (82 Catharine street), a letter directed to "John Stewart, Care of John Mulvaney, 82 Catharine Street, New York City"; that defendant at first objected to receiving it, but took it, and said he would see that it was delivered to the person to whom it was directed. Stewart testified that the letter was never delivered to him. Several witnesses testified that defendant, upon being asked whether he had received the letter, at first denied it, but afterwards admitted that he had received the letter, opened and read it, and then burnt it.

Henry L. Clinton, for defendant, contended that, inasmuch as the letter was delivered by the mail carrier, at the place to which it was directed, defendant having resorted to no fraud or artifice to get possession of it, the letter had passed out of the jurisdiction of the United States. Mr. C. also contended that there must be proof of the corpus delicti aside from the confessions of defendant; and as there was no testimony showing either the opening or destruction of the letter, except defendant's admissions, on this ground the jury should acquit. On this point, counsel cited People v. Hennessey, 15 Wend. 147.

After hearing Mr. Dwight, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., THE COURT sustained both points taken by the defendant's counsel, and directed an acquittal.

Verdict, "Not guilty."

UNITED STATES v. MUNDELL.

[1 Hughes, 415;[1] 6 Call, 245.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Dec. 9, 1795.

CRIMINAL LAW — PROSECUTOR — BAIL — RESISTING OFFICER—CONFLICT OF LAWS—PENALTIES.

1. It is not necessary that the name of the prosecutor in the courts of the United States should be written at the foot of the indictment.

2. In indictments for misdemeanors in the courts of the United States, the court, and not the jury, should assess the fine.

3. When a statute of the United States makes any provision upon a subject within the scope of the powers of the general government, the state laws upon the same subject cease to operate.

4. The existing statute of a state, applicable to any case at the time of the enactment of the act of congress, which refers to the laws of the states as rules of decision, must be considered in the same manner as if the words of the state law had been adopted, and specially re-enacted by the act of congress.

5. But such statute of the state must be completely applicable to the case, for if there be any part qualifying and modifying the rest, of which a party cannot have full benefit in the courts of the United States, this is not a case in which congress have given authority to adopt such part, since the whole law is not applicable, as the authority refers to entire law, and not to parts, which themselves are qualified by other parts, not applicable to the United States.

6. The authority given to the courts of the United States, to regulate the forms of proceedings, when exercised, is as binding as if it had been a specific part of the court system established by congress.

7. But the authority to demand bail is not of that description, and must depend upon some precise law.

8. Upon the principles of society, every person is bound, and has virtually agreed, to pay such sums of money as are charged on him by the sentence, or assessed by the interpretation of the law, and therefore, whatever the laws order any one to pay, that instantly becomes a debt, which he hath beforehand contracted to discharge.

9. The nature of the common and statute laws of the state, with alterations made in them by the Revolution, the Articles of Confederation, and the constitution of the United States, considered.

10. A revolution does not abolish all laws and throw people into a state of nature, therefore the Declaration of Independence did not totally abrogate all laws subsisting before, but only such as became inconsistent with the new form of government.

11. The laws of the states in regard to that share of legislative power retained to themselves, remained unaltered by the adoption of the constitution of the United States, and could only be changed by the states themselves, or by a treaty made within the legitimate objects of the treaty-making power.

12. The rule in England that the king is not bound by a general law, unless he be specially named, is confined to cases where he might otherwise be deprived of some personal or legal right, and not to provisions of general law arising from principles of public policy only.

13. Where a statute, with regard to process, is directory to the court or the clerk, and not to the sheriff, the latter is bound to obey the writ as he receives it, but as the indorsement of the true species of the action upon the writ is required by the act of assembly, that the sheriff may see whether bail is to be demanded or not, he must be judge himself, and act at his peril.

14. Bail is not requirable in an action of debt for the penalty of a statute.

15. Therefore, where there were two writs of capias ad respondendum against the same defendant, one for the penalty of a statute, and the other for a duty on stills, and the marshal demanded bail upon both, which the defendant refused to give, and resisted the marshal, who meant to imprison him for want of bail, the resistance was lawful, and therefore an indictment against the defendant for that cause was not sustainable.

16. For although he was authorized to demand bail for the duty, he could not demand it upon the writ for penalty, notwithstanding the indorsement by the attorney for the United States.

17. For an indorsement, even by the court itself, unless in cases where they have a discretion, would not justify the marshal in requiring bail, where the act did not authorize it, because it would be altogether extrajudicial.

The defendant was indicted under the act of congress of April, 1790, c. 9, § 22 [1 Stat. 117], for resisting the deputy marshal when serving two writs of capias ad respondendum upon him, to wit, one for eleven dollars and eleven cents for the duty due upon a still; and the other for two hundred dollars, for penalty alleged to have been incurred under one of the revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. Wickham, for defendant, moved to quash the indictment, because the name of the prosecutor was not written at the foot of the indictment according to the directions of the act of assembly, passed in 1786, which he said ought to govern in this case, agreeably to the provisions of the act of congress, adopting the state laws (Sept. 1789, c. 20, § 34 [1 Stat. 92]) as the statutes of the United States, which had made no provision for it.

Mr. Campbell, U. S. Dist. Atty., insisted that the act of assembly was made for a purpose not applicable to this case, for that was intended to guard against the malice of individuals, who might attempt to harass each other without just cause, but this was a prosecution instituted by the attorney as part of his official duty, upon discovering that an offence had been committed against public justice and the authority of the United States.

The point was saved, and the jury sworn upon the plea of not guilty, when a question arose whether the jury, if they found the prisoner guilty, should assess the fine agreeable to the directions of the above-mentioned act of assembly, or should merely declare him guilty, and leave it to the court to impose the fine.

IREDELL, Circuit Justice. It is extremely clear that it was not necessary, at common law, that the prosecutor's name should be written at the foot of the indictment; and although the act of assembly requires it to be done, where the prosecution is at the instance of an individual, for the sake of rendering him liable for cost if he fails, that does not prevent the attorney for the public from preferring an indictment ex officio, or the grand jury from finding one of their own accord. For, besides the authority which the attorney had at common law, which is not taken away by the state statute, the act of congress makes it his duty, if he sees cause, to prosecute, ex officio, "all delinquents for crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States." Act Sept. 1789, c. 20, § 35. And it is incident to the nature of the grand jury, to indict when they receive information of a crime. The latter was said to be a presentment merely, and not an indictment; but that is not strictly correct, for the difference between them is this: if the grand jury present of their own knowledge it is a presentment only; but if on knowledge of others, it is an indictment. Independent of that, however, the object of the act of assembly was merely to provide for costs. But upon that subject congress have acted themselves, and directed that the informer, if the prosecution fails, shall have the costs, without prescribing that his name shall be written at the foot of the indictment. Act May, 1792, c. 36, § 5 [1 Stat. 277]. And as the state statutes can be referred to only where the laws of the United States had not taken up the subject, nor made any provision concerning it, we think that the indictment ought not to be quashed. And upon similar principles we are equally clear as to the other point; for the act of assembly is a general provision, applying to all cases, and leaves the fine indefinite, except that it is to be according to the degrees of the fault and the estate of the defendant; but the act of congress provides for the very case itself, and declares the defendant on conviction, "be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months, and fined not exceeding three hundred dollars." Act Cong. May, 1790, c. 9, § 22. So that congress have not only taken up the subject, but have prescribed the limits to the punishment not to be found in the act of assembly, which, consequently does not apply to the case. The common law practice, therefore, must be adhered to; that is to say, the jury are to find whether the prisoner be guilty, and if unfortunately that should prove to be the case, the court must assess the fine. We should gladly have left the unpleasant service to the jury, but we are not at liberty to do so; for we are not to supply supposed omissions of congress upon the grounds that they have not gone far enough, or to confer authority where they have not thought proper to confide it. We must administer the law as we find it, and, under that point of view, we should not be justified in relinquishing a jurisdiction vested in the court, and which it will be our painful duty to exercise.

Mr. Wickham insisted on the trial, that there was no resistance, for the deputy marshal had actually served the writ without obstruction; and the resistance was against being committed for refusing to give bail, which the deputy marshal was not authorized to demand, on the writ for the penalty, but would have been guilty of false imprisonment if he had committed the defendant upon it, because he refused to give the bail. In support of which he said that both by the common law and state statutes, the defendant was not liable to be held to bail in an action for a penalty given by a statute. Act Assem. 1788, c. 67, § 27. And as laws of the United States had made no provision upon the subject, the state laws must prevail.

Mr. Campbell, contra. By the state practice the capias is the first process, and commands the sheriff to take the body, and have it forthcoming, which he must do at his peril, unless in cases of special exception by some statute, and there is none such here. Consequently, as the act of congress directs that writs in the courts of the United States shall be like those of the states in similar cases (Act Cong. Sept. 1789, c. 21, § 2 [1 Stat. 93]), the defendant might have been lawfully held to bail. But some regard ought to be had to the situation of the officer, for the rule insisted on by the defendant's counsel would involve him in inextricable difficulties.

Mr. Wickham. At common law the defendant was not liable to be held to bail in actions of this kind. The original process in actions of debt was a præcipe quod reddat; which, if the defendant failed to obey, the capias went in consequence of the disobedience; but that proving tedious, the capias, at length, went in the first instance, upon a feigned disobedience of the original. That presumption, however, was not made to the prejudice of the defendant, for bail was dispensed with upon the capias. 3 Bl. Comm. 287. The writs were marked as follows: Upon that for penalty the indorsement is: "For a penalty under the act of congress of the United States. Appearance bail required. Alexander Campbell, Attorney for United States." And upon that for the duty on the still the indorsement is in these words: "For duties on still unpaid. Appearance bail required. Alexander Campbell, Attorney for the United States." The jury found the defendant guilty; but the verdict was to be subject to the opinion of the court whether the deputy marshal was authorized to demand bail.

Mr. Campbell. When the sheriff arrests the defendant he must either take bail or commit the prisoner, or an action lies for the escape. 1 Bac. Abr. 205. At common law nothing but imprisonment would suffice (2 Rolle, Abr. 112); and notwithstanding St. 23 Hen. VI. c. 9, authorized the sheriff to take bail, yet the plaintiff was not bound to accept the bond, but might require the body to be produced upon the return day of the writ (1 Vent. 55, 85; 1 Bac. Abr. 205; 1 Salk. 99; St. 4 Ann. c. 16, § 20), although the court would, upon motion, permit the defendant to give common bail (Boh. Inst. Leg. 48; 1 Bac. Abr. 209; 1 Salk. 100; T. Raym. 74; 1 Ld. Raym. 767). The inflexibility of the rule will appear by a short review of the statutes of bail. By that of 23 Hen. VI. c. 9, the sheriff was authorized to take reasonable sureties, but if they were not given he was bound to commit. By that of 13 Car. II. c. 2, § 2, the cause of action was to be inserted in the process, but still bail was to be demanded; and by that of 12 Geo. I. c. 29, the sum is to be indorsed upon the writ; but if bail be not given, the sheriff must imprison. 3 Bl. Comm. 287, 288, 290. So that notwithstanding the capias in practice has long ago become the first process (3 Bl. Comm. 282), the rule of the common law continues in force, and therefore the defendant must in every case give bail or go to prison.

Mr. Wickham. There is no difference between us where the capias was either the first or second process at common law, for in both the body could always be required, and the authorities cited by the attorney prove nothing more. But where the capias was not originally the first or second process, but became first by fiction of law, there a different practice obtained, unless the debt was verified, and the defendant was personally bound to pay it. Now a capias in debt could not issue, in the first instance, at common law; for, before the statute 25 Edw. III., the original process in that action was a præcipe quod reddat, and if that was disobeyed, a capias, grounded on the statute, followed (Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 263; 3 Bl. Comm. 280, 287; 3 Coke, 11; 5 Coke, 89), upon which the body might be required, as the contempt of the summons showed that a voluntary appearance was not to be expected. But when the præcipe fell into disuse, and the capias became the first process under color of an imaginary summons and contempt, the law, according to the rule in Liford's Case, 11 Coke, 51, that, "in fictione juris semper æquitas existit," would not subject the defendant to inconvenience, upon the pretence of disobedience to a writ which had never issued; and therefore, unless there was a breach of the peace, or the debt was due from the defendant himself, and verified either by a specialty, some sentence of the law or an affidavit, the defendant was not liable to be committed or bound to find sureties for his appearance (3 Bl. Comm. 287); which is the reason why executors, heirs-at-law, and femes covert cannot be held to bail. It is not true, therefore, that the sheriff must in all cases obey the writ to its literal expression; for, although the cepi corpus is the proper return, he may add that John Doe and Richard Roe are the bail for appearance, and if he had done so in the case in 1 Vent. 85, or had pleaded that the writ was a capias in the first instance, and that John Doe and Richard Roe were appearance bail, and got leave to amend his return accordingly, he would have been justified. Consequently, as there was neither a breach of the peace, a specialty, or an affidavit in the present case, the defendant was not bound to give bail or go to prison. But whatever may be the rule in England, the question is completely settled here by the act of assembly of 1788, c. 67, which says that "in all actions to recover the penalty for breach of any penal law not particularly directing special bail to be given," the sheriff shall "be restrained from committing the defendant to prison or detaining him in his custody for want of appearance bail, but shall return the writ executed; and if the defendant shall fail to appear thereto, there shall be the like proceedings against him only as is directed against defendants and their appearance bail, where such is taken." This is decisive, as the act was made before the act of congress adopting the state laws, passed, and therefore is embraced by it as effectually as if the very words were inserted in the congressional statute.

Mr. Campbell, in reply. The act of assembly had nothing to do with the case; for penal laws of a country are local to that country, and therefore those of Virginia, being local to Virginia, cannot bind the United States. Nor was it intended by congress that they should; for uniformity of proceeding in all such cases was, and should be, the object. The man of Massachusetts should not, in this respect, be in one condition, and him of Virginia in another. Cur. adv. vult.

IREDELL, Circuit Justice, after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The question is, whether, upon two capiases found by the special verdict, bail was requirable by the marshal. I say upon two, because, if requirable upon the one, and not upon the other, the marshal ought to have made a distinction, and not demanded bail generally. It was for this reason the question was reserved as to both, and not as to either singly. The only one upon which the doubt arises is as to the capias in debt for two hundred dollars, indorsed as follows, "for a penalty incurred under an act of the United States. Appearance bail required." Signed by the attorney for the United States for the district of Virginia.

The single question then is, "whether in an action of debt, at the instance of the United States in this court, for a penalty under an act of congress, the marshal has a right to require bail of the party." As the indorsement does not specify under what particular act of congress the penalty was recoverable, some doubt might have arisen in case there had been a distinction in any of the acts of congress, the demand of bail being warranted upon actions for some kind of penalties, but not upon actions for others. But, as I believe there is no such distinction, nor any penalty of a nature similar to any of the exceptions in the state law, this circumstance may be laid out of the case. If bail is requirable, it must be in virtue of some law of the United States; the whole of this subject, as is admitted, and is clear, depending, so far as the United States are concerned, on the authority of their own legislature. The congress have made some express provisions in regard to bail in criminal cases. They have made none that I can discover in civil cases.

It is scarcely necessary to stop here to observe that the proceeding in question was not a proceeding in a criminal case, within the meaning of the provisions of congress, but was, in truth, a civil suit; though for an act of disobedience for which a criminal prosecution might possibly have been commenced, if the act of congress does not expressly, or impliedly, exclude it, a point not material to consider, because the civil suit has, in this instance, been in fact adopted. A criminal proceeding, unquestionably, can only be by indictment or information. The proceeding in question was neither. There being, therefore, no express provision of any act of congress on this subject, it is our duty to see if there be an implied one. The provisions by congress material to be considered for this purpose are the following: In the act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States" (passed the first session of the first congress), there is a provision to this effect: "Sec. 34. That the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision, in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." The act of the first session of the second congress, entitled "An act for regulating processes in courts of the United States," etc., provides: "Sec. 2. That the forms of writs, executions, and other process, except their style, and the form and mode of proceeding in suits in those of common law, shall be the same as are now used in the said courts respectively, in pursuance of the act, entitled 'An act to regulate processes in the courts of the United States,' in those of equity, and in those of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, according to the principles, rules, and usages which belong to courts of equity, and to courts of admiralty respectively, as contradistinguished from courts of common law; except so far as may have been provided for by the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, subject, however, to such alterations as the supreme court of the United States shall think proper, from time to time, by rule, to prescribe to any circuit court, or district court, concerning the same."

In the first act mentioned (section 17), there is a power given to all the courts of the United States, "to make and establish all necessary rules for the orderly conducting business in said courts, provided such rules are not repugnant to the laws of the United States." In an act also of the second session of the second congress (chapter 66), entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States,'" there is the following provision: "That it shall be lawful for the several courts, from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective courts directing the returning of writs and processes, the filing of declarations, and other pleadings, the taking of rules, the entering and making up judgments by default, and other matters in the vacation, and otherwise, in a manner not repugnant to the laws of the United States, to regulate the practice of the said courts respectively, as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and especially to that end to prevent delays in proceedings."

Two different constructions have been contended for by counsel on both sides. One that, in this case, the law of Virginia alone is to be the rule by which we are to decide whether bail was demandable or not. The other, that some general law must be the rule, it not being supposable that in a case of this kind congress meant to refer to any local laws of the particular states, which might be inapplicable in all their circumstances to the cases of the United States, which, it was contended, was the case expressly in this instance, the act containing exceptions in no wise applicable to the condition of the United States. It has, therefore, been insisted upon that in this instance we must be governed by the general laws of England, which were the original groundwork of our own, detached from the local laws of Virginia in particular.

Upon the suggestion of these two constructions, the following preliminary observations occur:

1. That in the formation of laws for a new government, so peculiarly circumstanced as that of the United States, wherein each state had a separate government of its own for internal purposes, with a system of laws originally in substance the same, but varying in a number of particulars, as the different habits and views of thinking of so many unconnected communities would naturally occasion, it would have been very unwise, if at all practicable, to have suddenly changed their methods of proceeding in all such cases upon which congress had authority to legislate, in pursuit of a new, untried system of their own, the consequences and extent of which could not easily be foreseen.

2. That an attempt to establish such a system would, necessarily, have consumed more time than the exigency required; and any regulation they could have adopted would, in all human probability, in the end, have been found extremely defective, from an impracticability which every professional man must be convinced would have existed in making special provisions of their own, adapted to every possible contingency within the sphere of their legislative power.

3. That under these circumstances, congress, as a wise and discreet legislature, had no better resource than in respect to all cases requiring legislative provisions, where they could not devise a satisfactory special provision of their own, to refer generally to the laws of the different states, which before the institution of this government had possessed the whole legislative authority (with very few, if any, exceptions), as well in cases of general and local concern; and, therefore, might be presumed to have laws adapted to all the subjects recently appropriated to their own cognizance.

4. That in case of any such reference, we must consider of what nature the existing laws in each state were at the time of the reference, and whether they are applicable. In which case they must be considered in the same light as if the words of the act itself had been adopted and specially re-enacted by the legislative authority of the United States itself.

5. That this law must be completely applicable; because, if there be any part of the law qualifying and modifying the rest, of which a party cannot have the full benefit, this is not a case in which congress have given any authority to adopt such part, since the whole law is not applicable, of which alone congress speaks, and to which alone they can be supposed to refer; otherwise part of the law might be impracticable, which in itself would be oppressive; but, with the qualifications (inapplicable, and, therefore, rejected), might be wholesome and beneficial. It would, therefore, be altogether in the nature of a new law, and, of course, its adoption altogether unwarranted by any authority permitting only the application of an existing one.

6. That, as an exception from the general principle of a reference to the state laws in cases not specially provided for by their own, they have given a certain authority to their courts in regard to the form and method of proceeding, which authority, when exercised pursuant to the power given, is also equally binding, as if the regulation, accordingly made by the courts, had been a specific part of the court system established by the legislative authority itself.

These general principles being premised, let us inquire (1) whether this be a case within the general reference of congress to the laws of the states, or within the power given to the courts, or which is to be guided by some other law. (2) Whether, under the authority which is to guide us on the present occasion, bail was, or was not, demandable in the instance before us.

In considering the first point, if the court possessed any authority, so far as that has been exercised, it is certainly in favor of a reference to the state law. But, as to this subject, I really think, with the counsel for the United States, that the admission or non-admission of bail is a subject of legislation so important, and in which the liberties of the citizens are so concerned, that a power merely of directing the practice of the courts cannot justly be extended to a case of this kind, but it must depend upon some precise law. The same distinction would serve in respect to the process act, if that applied, which I conceive it does not; because "suits at common law" certainly mean suits in a court of a common law jurisdiction, as contrasted with courts of an admiralty and maritime or equity jurisdiction, which every one knows are termed civil law courts, and proceed upon principles different from those which usually govern the courts of common law, though within their proper sphere recognized and protected by them. We are, therefore, to consider if this be a case which comes within the meaning of a reference to the state law, or is to be guided by some other law.

The words of the section comprehending a reference to the state law are as follows: "That the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in all trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply." [1 Stat. 92.]

First, it is proper to consider the import of these words, "in all trials at common law." Is this a trial at common law? A distinction is sometimes taken between a suit at common law and a suit upon a statute, where the latter is grounded upon different principles from the former, in which case perhaps it may properly be said that the one is a trial at common law, the other upon the statute. But it is evident that that cannot be the meaning in the instance before us, because all "provisions under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are excepted." That plainly shows that, in the sense of the legislature, unless that exception had been made, cases arising upon the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States might have been decided, according to the laws of the states, within the general reference to those laws, "as rules of decision in trials at common law." It must, therefore, have some other meaning. What can that meaning be, "but trials in a court of common law jurisdiction, when exercising that authority," as contrasted with the courts of admiralty, and maritime, or equity jurisdiction, which are directed to proceed according to the principles, rules, and usages which peculiarly belong to them? This brings the expression exactly to the same sense as the words "common law" are used in the process act. Thus, in this case, though it be an action on the statute, it is an action of debt, which is a common law action, and will be tried in a common law manner, and no otherwise deviates from the common law than that "the ground of the debt is not immemorial," as the general principles of common law are.

Neither would a debt contracted by bond by an individual to-day. Yet nobody would hesitate to call an action of debt, grounded on that bond, a common law action. Indeed, an action of debt, being an action on contract, could only be upon express or implied contract. Accordingly, Blackstone treats an action of debt of this description upon that very principle. "From these express contracts the transition is easy to those that are only implied by law, which are such as reason and justice dictate, and which, therefore, the law presumes that every man has contracted to perform, and, upon this presumption, makes him answerable to such persons as suffer by his non-performance. Of this nature, and first, such as are necessarily implied by the fundamental constitution of government, to which every man is a contracting party, and thus it is that every person is bound, and hath virtually agreed, to pay such sums of money as are charged on him by the sentence, or assessed by the interpretation of the law. For it is a part of the original contract, entered into by all mankind who partake of the benefits of society, to submit in all points to the municipal constitutions and local ordinances of that state of which each individual is a member. Whatever, therefore, the laws order any one to pay, that instantly becomes a debt which he hath beforehand contracted to discharge. On the same principle it is (of an implied original contract to submit to the rules of the community whereof we are members) that a forfeiture imposed by the by-laws and private ordinances of a corporation upon any that belongs to the body, or an amercement set in court lett, or court baron, upon any of the suitors of the court (for otherwise it will not be binding), immediately create a debt in the eye of the law, and such forfeiture or amercement, if unpaid, work an injury to the party or parties entitled to receive it, for which the remedy is by action of debt. The same reason may with equal justice be applied to all penal statutes, that is, such acts of parliament whereby a forfeiture is inflicted for transgressing the provisions therein enacted. The party offending is here bound by the fundamental contract of society to obey the directions of the legislature, and pay the forfeiture incurred to such persons as the law requires." 3 Bl. Comm. 159, 160, 161.

The truth is, it is sometimes necessary to distinguish between actions of debt at common law and actions of debt upon a statute, for particular reasons not applicable to the mode of trial. For instance, it is necessary to show it to be "an action on the statute," because otherwise no cause of action will appear, a penalty in the case not existing at common law, and therefore creating no such contract. But when the cause of action is shown, the principles of common law pervade the whole of the trial. There may be other differences arising from particular provisions in a statute, but this is the leading one. But to open this exposition more fully, and lead directly to the considerations upon which the construction in question ought to be founded, I will consider the nature of the common and statute law of this commonwealth as they existed before the Revolution, and then inquire what alterations were made in either by the Revolution itself, the Articles of Confederation, or the present constitution of the United States. The detail, if not immediately necessary, has a close affinity with the present subject, and will not be uninteresting, if the principles can be traced with any degree of certainty.

It has constantly, I believe, been considered to be law in this state, as in others, that the common and statute law of England, as they existed in England at the time of the first settlement of the country, and so far as they were applicable to its situation, were in force, except in those cases where there was a special law of the Virginia legislature itself. I need not, at present, take any notice of any qualification to this principle, arising from any parliamentary right supposed to have existed before the Revolution, in any case where the then American provinces were specially named in any act of parliament; no such exercise of power having been attempted, I conceive, upon a subject of this kind.

The laws of Virginia, therefore (so far as our present subject is concerned), consisted before the Revolution, (1) of the common law; (2) of the statute law. The first comprehended all such parts of the common law as were such in England, unaltered by any statute law, at the time of the first settlement of this country, and applicable to its situation, and which had not been altered by any act of its own legislature afterwards. The second comprehended two subjects: (1) The statute law of England as it existed at the time of the first settlement of this country, and so far as it was applicable. (2) The statute law of Virginia (as distinguished from the former), consisting of laws specially passed by the legislature of Virginia. All this body of law was of equal authority, and to be viewed in the same light, as if the whole had originally existed in Virginia itself, and no part of it had been adopted from another country, the adoption of it making it completely its own.

Instead of names, therefore, which may serve to confound us, we may more properly distinguish this body of laws as the common and statute law of Virginia generally, than speak of any part of it (unless merely to show its origin) as the common and statute law of England; by which means we may view the latter as it really is, repealable in the very same manner as any special act of the Virginia assembly, and by no means standing on any independent footing, which appears to have been the light in which it has been sometimes considered. In the most arbitrary countries, even where the people have no share in the government, the sacred right of the people to choose their government is so far respected that the whole origin of power is alleged to be grounded, where they attempt to reason at all, only upon an implied consent of the people at large. Consequently, every government, whatever be its form, exercises its trusts for the benefit of the people; and it is to be considered as having their authority for every act it performs in pursuance of its constitutional power. In this sense every legitimate act of government is in effect an act of the people themselves; it emanating from their authority either expressly or impliedly given. If the people could act in person, no one can doubt that whatever they once enacted as a rule, either of government or law, must remain such until altered by themselves. Their inability to act personally necessarily occasions a delegation of their power to others, but when delegated it is of the very same nature as if exercised by themselves in person. Therefore, every act of authority by their representatives must remain in being until altered by themselves, or by some future act exercised by persons possessing an equal share of power. Whence it follows that when the people of this state, by their representatives, declared their former government dissolved, and established a new constitution; so far as what they in this respect did was inconsistent with what had been done by their authority before; a new law was introduced and the old one changed; but every other part of it remained entire.

By the word "law" in this sense I do not mean law as distinguished from the constitution, under which a particular law has been enacted or adopted, and which is its most usual meaning, but I mean "the whole law of the state," including the constitution and all laws enacted, or being, under it; the only difference being that a constitution, while in existence, is the fundamental law of the state, not alterable by its ordinary legislature; but all other species of laws are. I know that some are of opinion that a resolution ex vi termini abolishes all laws, and throws the people into a state of nature, but this I can never conceive to be the case (if it be in any country) in one where all the laws of every kind are derived mediately or immediately from the authority of the people themselves, who never have admitted, and I trust never will admit, that they hold any rights as mere appendages of particular persons in power, which can alone, as I conceive, afford any foundation for the opinion I am considering. If government be a mere trust for their benefit; if all its officers are their officers, and their authority of consequence but as originally sanctioned by them; and if they think proper to choose a new mode, in which new laws are to be made and all laws properly enforced, what reason can there be for saying that merely doing this (which is simply the case of voluntary revolution) without doing or saying anything more, is in fact doing more than this? that is to say, not merely providing a new government for themselves, but actually abolishing all laws of every kind whatsoever which subsisted under the old one.

A constitution is one thing, particular and repealable laws subsisting under the constitution are another. Consequently, the former may be changed, and not the latter; and, as the authority of the people is absolutely necessary to change the one, so it is also (in some mode, whatever they may be) to change the other. The result of my observation (if I am not mistaken in my principles) is, that the Revolution of 1776 did not totally abrogate all laws subsisting before, but only such as became inconsistent with the new form of government assumed and the new constitution established. The common and statute laws of Virginia, then, stood as follows: (1) Such parts of the common law as were unaltered by any English statute at the first settlement of the country, applicable to the situation of the people, and not altered by any subsequent act of the legislature of Virginia afterwards, and were not inconsistent with the new constitution adopted. (2) Such parts of the statute law of England, as were in force at the first settlement of the country, applicable to the situation of the people, and not unaltered by any subsequent act of the Virginia legislature, together with the addition of all other acts, then in force, which were originally passed by the Virginia legislature itself; so far as the whole was applicable to the new situation of the people, under the change of the government and the adoption of the constitution.

If these principles are right, it equally, or more strongly, follows that under the two great subsequent changes, arising from the Articles of Confederation, and the present constitution of the United States, no subsisting law was altered, but where it was plainly inconsistent with the powers, in the particular cases, transferred to the government of the United States. In order to illustrate this point, let us consider, in particular, the nature of the change operated by the present constitution of the United States. By that constitution, all legislative subjects were divided into two branches; one surrendered to the government of the United States, one retained to the state. In some instances the authority of both was a concurrent power (as in the instance of taxation, with a few exceptions); in other instances the power of the general government I consider as exclusive, as in the authority given "to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, throughout the United States." The laws of the states, in regard to that share of legislative power retained to themselves, after the adoption of the constitution, remained unaltered, and were only alterable by the legislatures of the states themselves. Of this kind, for instance, is the law of Virginia relative to a descent of lands. The legislature of the United States have no power to alter the rules of descent of lands, nor can they be affected in any manner by the government of the United States, unless by treaty, in some singular instances where it may be fairly presumed certain regulations concerning them come within the legitimate objects of a treaty. Abstracted from this exception, if any person, having a right to sue for the recovery of lands in court, bring such a suit, he can only entitle himself to recover under the laws of Virginia as they existed at the time when the suit was brought.

In regard to the share of legislative power exclusively surrendered to the United States (which is the only part of it which concerns our present subject), the effect of this I take to have been (unless there was a manifest inconsistency in their continuing in being) that the subsisting laws as to such subjects did not ipso facto cease; but that they would remain as they then stood, until congress exercised its legislative authority. Of this kind, perhaps, is the power as to bankrupt laws, which I before noticed. The moment that power is exercised all state bankrupt laws cease; but until it is exercised it is at least questionable whether they do not remain in being; though I presume no separate legislature of the United States had a right to pass a new law upon the subject. The law concerning bail is perhaps of this nature. It is in no manner inconsistent, that I can perceive, with the change of government; and therefore I should have been strongly inclined to think that congress made no express reference to the laws of the different states as rules of decision, that until they made a law concerning such subject the state law in relation to it would have been in force. But I have no doubt that under the express reference, by the act of congress, to the laws of the several states, as rules for our decision, fortified by the considerations I have stated, the law, of Virginia, whatever it may be, concerning the requisition of bail in actions of debt by the public upon penal statutes, is that by which we are bound to decide on the present occasion.

The question then is, what is the law of Virginia upon that subject? The act of assembly produced, being the latest law on the subject of bail by which we can be governed, must be the guide in this instance, if this particular case is comprehended within its provisions.

If it be not, then we must consider what is the law of Virginia regulating cases of this description; whether it be a part of the common law, unaltered by any statutes, or a statute law relative to this subject, originally passed in England, but by adoption forming a part of the statute law of the commonwealth, or some particular act on the subject, passed in Virginia itself, if any.

The first inquiry is, whether a case like the present is within the act of assembly contended for at the bar, as the only rule of decision. Two objections are to be considered: One insisted upon by counsel for the United States, that the Virginia act containing exceptions not applicable to the situation of the United States, the whole law is not applicable; and, therefore, is not within the meaning of the act of congress. The other is an objection suggested by the court, whether this act extends to suits by the commonwealth, or only to suits at the instance of private persons.

As to the first,I do not think it a sufficient objection, because it in no respect changes the principle of the application. If there be no case existing, or which can exist, under the government of the United States of the nature of those constituting exceptions as to the law in question, the exceptions stand, as to them, as if no such exceptions existed. If there be a possibility of any case, under the government of the United States, of the nature of the excepted cases, the law as to the exceptions will then prevail as to such cases under the government of the United States as it does in the general, in cases not within the exception; and, therefore, in every instance, either the general law as to bail, or the special law as to the exceptions, will have the effect intended by either. As to the objection taken by the court, and which came from myself, I am convinced on reflection it is of no weight. It is a general rule in England, from whence our principles of law are generally derived, that the king, who is the sole representative of the public there in all suits at law, is not bound by any act of parliament, immediately affecting his rights, unless particularly named. This, in some instances, may be grounded on mere prerogative, without any good reason, so far as it respects the public. But in many instances that privilege exists for the benefit of the public, and to prevent their sustaining an injury.

This may be exemplified as to the old doctrine 'Nullum tempus occurrit regi." So that a general statute of limitations affecting lands was held not to extend to the king; because the law presumed, from the variety of his public functions, that he could not have such opportunities of knowing of encroachments upon his landed property, formerly of great extent, as an individual could of encroachments upon his; and, of course, could not naturally be expected to be as vigilant in bringing suits to redress himself. This was a case wherein the public evidently had an interest as well as the king personally. A few years afterwards a limitation was put upon this prerogative, which had been abused. To a certain degree I presume that this privilege belongs to this commonwealth, as the public officers, in the immense territory comprised within this commonwealth, cannot be expected to have early or exact information of encroachments upon public rights. Other instances might be shown in which the possession of such a privilege by the public may be deemed proper. But, upon examining authorities, I find that though the rule I stated as in England be a general one, it admits of many exceptions; and, indeed, the privilege seems to be confined to cases where the king might otherwise be deprived of some personal or legal right, and not to provisions of general law arising from principles of policy alone.

Upon the present occasion congress, by creating the penalty and not superadding any new provision, by leaving it to be recovered at the option of the officer (which it expressly does by general words having that operation in another place) by action of debt, leaves it to the usual fate of actions of debt for penalties whatever may be the consequences that attend them. The words of the law being general, and there being no reason for excepting the case of the public on account of any peculiar privilege to which this subject has no relation, I conceive the act of assembly in question is that by which, under the general reference by congress, we are to be governed on the present occasion. This opinion is further strengthened by what was mentioned at the bar, that in common actions of debt by the commonwealth this act has been uniformly considered as the guide in the state courts. If the commonwealth is bound by the general words of the act in that case, no reason can be given, that I can suggest, why the commonwealth is not equally bound by the provisions of the act in every other case coming within its provisions. Even under the English law as now in practice (however introduced), though special bail is required in actions of debt for money upon a common contract, yet in actions of debt upon penal statutes it is not; and the reason assigned shows that whatever construction is given in favor of a defendant in the former case applies a fortiori to the latter. In 1 Bac. Abr. 210, it is said: "On a penal statute the defendant is not held to bail, because the penalty on a statute is in the nature of a fine or amercement, set on the party for an offence committed; and, therefore, no person ought to suffer any inconvenience by reason of such law till he is convicted of the offence." For which he cites Yel. 53; Brownl. & G. 293.

The act of assembly being thus established to be a rule of decision in the present case, for the reasons I have given, the next inquiry is, what is its operation? Upon this there can be no doubt. A capias is to be taken out, served on the party, and returned executed, but no bail to be required. I admit that if this act was only directory to the court, or to the clerk, but not to the sheriff, he would be bound to obey the writ he received, accompanied with the directions given, if any, and could not be said to act illegally in requiring bail, when under no injunction to the contrary. But the indorsement required by the act is an indorsement of the true species of action, in order that the sheriff may himself see whether bail was or was not requirable by the act. An indorsement as to the requisition of bail or not, even by the court itself, unless in cases where they may have a discretion, would not justify him in requiring bail where the act did not authorize it, because it would be altogether extrajudicial. The indorsement in this instance, therefore (as was properly observed at the bar,) is only an indorsement of a highly respectable official character, whose opinions justly deserve very great deference, but are not conclusive. The greatest lawyers, even the greatest judges, are liable sometimes to mistakes in opinion. Lord Mansfield has, at least on twenty occasions, changed an opinion positively given. Lord Hardwicke has in some instances. So have many other illustrious characters. The greatest abilities are indeed generally accompanied with the greatest candor, and a desire, uninfluenced by any former conviction or prepossession, to do right under any circumstances whatever. The present instance was a case attended with many novel and difficult circumstances. They have served to embarrass the consideration of the court itself, anxious in a new case to proceed upon principles well examined and reflected upon.

The consequences of our decision cannot altogether be overlooked, because the nature of these subjects, upon which penalties may be enacted by the legislature of the United States, may reasonably require a different law from what prevails in cases under the law itself. The latter may indeed operate upon foreigners, but in most cases it will operate on citizens and residents of the country, and whose escape from prosecution may, therefore, be less apprehended. The penalties of the United States must from their nature as frequently, if not more so, operate upon foreigners as well as citizens, upon men who having no residence in the country, and having committed an offence, may avoid the penalty annexed to it by speedily quitting the country. These are consequences which may probably make a new law necessary. They are such as might well make the attorney for the United States cautious how he advised against requiring bail, unless he had the sanction of the court for such immunity. But they are consequences which cannot alter the construction of the law, where the law is clear, as I think it is upon all the considerations I have stated, though not perhaps obvious, upon a slight reflection. It may be lamented, in this case, that a man guilty of a most daring violation of the peace of the country, and an inhuman assault upon an innocent and meritorious officer, should escape punishment proportioned to his offence. But no passion must mingle in the administration of justice. The law alone ought ever to be, and I trust ever will be, the guide of our decision.

Upon the present occasion, we cannot give judgment against the defendant without saying that the marshal had a right to require special bail from him upon both of the precepts which were issued. But we are of opinion, for the reasons I have given, that he had no right to require special bail upon one of them. The consequence of which is, that there must be judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 15,835.

UNITED STATES v. MUNROE et al.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1830.

INSOLVENCY—GOVERNMENT PRIORITY—ASSIGNMENT—EQUITY—REFORM OF INSTRUMENTS.

1. To entitle the United States to a priority of payment, under the 65th section of the collection act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 630 (1 Stat. 676, c. 22)], out of the funds in the hands of assignees, there must be a general assignment by the debtor of all his property. A partial assignment of a portion, however large, without fraud, is not sufficient.

2. In what cases a court of equity will reform a written instrument, upon the ground of mistake. The mistake must be made out by the clearest and most unequivocal evidence.

[Cited in Babcock v. Smith, 22 Pick. 69; Shepard v. Shepard, 36 Mich. 179; Southard v. Curley, 134 N. Y. 152, 31 N. E. 331.]

3. Semble, that the court would not reform it to the prejudice of bona fide purchasers without notice.

This was a bill in equity, brought by the United States against the defendants [Washington Munroe and Elijah Loring] as assignees of Samuel Langton, to enforce their right of priority of payment of debts out of the effects of Langton, assigned to the defendants for the payment of his creditors. The cause was brought to a hearing upon the bill, answers and evidence.

Mr. Dunlap, Dist. Atty.

The celebrated rule of reasoning, laid down by Lord Bacon in his Reading upon the Statute of Uses, may well be adopted in this case. He says, "The nature of an use is best discerned by considering what it is not, and then what it is; for it is the nature of all human science and knowledge to proceed most safely, by negatives and exclusives, to what is affirmative and inclusive." So here it would be better ascertained what cases were included within the statutes giving a priority to the United States, by first considering what cases were excluded from these statutes. The cases decided against the priority of the United States, are, where mortgages and pledges of certain specified property, partial conveyances in the course of business, as contradistinguished from general assignments, have been upheld against the United States. In the case of U. S. v. Hoe, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 91, a mortgage of part of the debtor's property was upheld, and the court there say, that "there must be such a general divestment of property as would be equivalent to insolvency in its technical sense," to entitle the United States to a priority. In Bartlett v. Prince, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 431, the court consider the words "insolvency" and "bankruptcy" as "synonymous," and in Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 439, the court say, "Insolvency, in the sense of the statute, relates to such a general divestment of property, as would, in fact, be equivalent to insolvency, in its technical sense." In U. S. v. Clark [Case No. 14,807], the court say, that the omission in an assignment of a part "to evade the statute," is not the only illustration, and that the assignment must be "the assignment of all, as contradistinguished from a partial assignment." In 1 Cooke, Bankr. Law, 102, the distinction is taken between partial assignments which are in the course of fair trade, and those which are considered general and technically total, though there may be omissions of some small portions of a debtor's property. In the latter case, the exceptions or reservations do not prevent the assignment from being considered general. From these authorities it is inferred and contended, that where, instead of a legal insolvency, a party makes a voluntary bankruptcy, and delivers over and assigns the bulk of his property to assignees, to secure the payment of his debts, the assignment is a general, as contradistinguished from a partial one, although there may have been some reservations by the debtor, either with a fraudulent design against the United States, or creditors, or from accident. In most cases of assignments, there is a reservation of household furniture, or a small allowance to the insolvent debtor; and if such reservations, as one of a library of books, or a little family plate, and things of that sort, can prevent such assignments from being considered general, the priority of the United States in those states where there are no bankrupt laws, is in fact destroyed.

Mr. Fletcher, for defendants, è contra.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The present bill seeks payment of certain judgment debts due to the United States upon custom-house bonds, out of the effects of Samuel Langton, assigned to the defendants, Munroe and Loring. The collection act of 1799, c. 128, § 65 [1 Story's Laws, 630 (1 Stat. 676, c. 22)], gives a priority of payment to the United States in certain cases of insolvency, and among others, in cases "in which a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his or her debts, shall have made a voluntary assignment thereof for the benefit of his or her creditors" The bill asserts two grounds, upon which the United States may maintain their claim: (1) That there was in this case, a general assignment by Langton of all his property; (2) that it was the intention of all the parties to the assignment, that the clause in the assignment, providing for a priority of payment upon custom-house bonds due to the United States, should apply to all the bonds of Langton then owing to the custom-house, and not, as the terms of the assignment purport, to those bonds only, upon which Munroe was surety.

In cases, where the United States seek to enforce such a priority upon the ground of a general assignment, it is necessary, that the bill should expressly aver, that the assignment does cover and convey all the property of the debtor. If the assignment be general in its words, so as to include all his property, the allegation may be in general terms referring to the assignment. But where, as in the present case, the assignment purports upon its face to convey specific property only, and not to be universal in its operation, it is necessary, that there should be a direct averment in the bill, that the assignment did in fact, though not in form, include all the debtor's property, so as to operate virtually as a general assignment. If any portion be omitted fraudulently to evade the statute, or unintentionally and by mistake, when the object was a general assignment, in each of these cases the bill should include an averment to meet the case, and obviate the difficulty. So in relation to the case of an asserted mistake in the language of the instrument, differing from the intention of the parties, if the bill seeks to correct that mistake, and reform the instrument, and obtain the consequent relief, it is not sufficient to allege generally, that the intention was different; but there must be an express averment, that the instrument, as existing, differs from the intention of the parties, stating the particulars; and the bill must conclude with a prayer for the correction of the mistake, and a decree according to the reformed instrument. It might be questioned, whether upon a critical examination the averments are so perfectly explicit in this bill, as to preclude all doubt. However, I throw out these observations rather for consideration in other cases, as the parties have taken no objection, and the cause has been argued upon the merits.

There is another question as to parties, whether all the proper parties are now before the court. Langton is no party to the bill, though he has, in writing, expressed a willingness to be made one, and to submit to any decree made by the court. But he is certainly the primary debtor, and might, if he pleased, contest the debts due to the United States, or prove a satisfaction of them. He is certainly, therefore, a proper party for the protection of his own interests, as well as those of the assignees.

But the answer of Munroe discloses another important fact; and that is, that since the assignment was made, he has himself become insolvent, and has assigned to certain persons all his property, including all that passed for his benefit under the assignment of Langton; and his (Munroe's) assignees are not parties to the bill. Now, in point of fact, it appears, that Munroe was the principal creditor of Langton; that he was also indorser and surety for a large amount; and the assignment of Langton provides for the entire payment of all debts due to, and liabilities of Munroe, before the satisfaction of any other debts. The answers also establish that the proceeds of the property under the assignment fall far short of indemnifying Munroe for these debts and liabilities. The other assignee, Loring, is but nominally interested. If, therefore, the object of the present bill be (as it in fact is) to reach the effects of Langton in the hands of the assignees of Munroe, they ought to be made parties to the bill. If the object were only to charge Munroe and Loring personally (the latter does not appear to have any part of the property in his hands), and to get a decree against them for the amount, it might be otherwise. But as to Munroe, a personal decree would be useless, for he is already insolvent.

The questions, however, which the parties before the court are most anxious to dispose of, if decided in favour of the defendants, will render the further consideration of the question of parties unnecessary. How far, then, are the grounds of the bill maintained, in point of fact and evidence? In the first place, was this the case of a general assignment? The doctrine of the supreme court of the United States, is, that no assignment is within the statute unless it is general, and includes all the debtor's property. It must be such an assignment, as amounts to a total devestment of all his interest and estate. If it be a partial assignment only, it is wholly immaterial, how much or how little it includes; whether nine-tenths or ninety-nine hundredths; so always that the omission be not by fraud or mistake. Now, the answer of the defendant Munroe utterly denies, that in point of fact the assignment did include all the debtor's property, or was intended to include all. The assignment does not, in form, purport to convey all; but only specific and enumerated portions of property. The whole evidence, including that of Langton himself (who is a witness for the government), admits, that a small portion was not included. The amount is not great, being about $1000, and constituting not more than one twentieth of the debtor's property. The omission of this property is proved by all the testimony to have been by design, and not by accident. It was reserved to pay particular creditors, and not fraudulently to evade the statute. How, then, can the court give effect to this as a general assignment, when it conveyed a part only of the debtor's property? When the reservation was in good faith, and not by mistake?

In the next place, as to the asserted mistake in the draft of the assignment. The language of the instrument is perfectly unequivocal. In terms, it gives priority of payment to custom-house bonds, on which Munroe is surety, estimating them at $8,400. It is true, that the bonds on which Munroe is surety, fall short of that amount; and the bill avers, that all the bonds owing Langton, fall short of it. The sum, therefore, was adopted as a conjectural amount, and no light arises from that circumstance. The answer of Munroe explicitly denies, that any other bonds than those, on which he was a surety, were intended by the clause, the principal object of the instrument being to give him a universal priority or preference in payment of his debts and liabilities. How is this answer met? By general testimony from one witness, that he understood all bonds were to be included; and by the testimony of Langton, to the same effect. But Langton, if a competent witness, is not now without some bias; for it is now manifestly his interest to escape from being arrested in execution upon the outstanding judgments of the United States; and if taken in execution, he cannot be released except by some act of the government, or its authorized officers. In cases of asserted mistake in written instruments, it is not denied, that a court of equity has authority to reform the instrument. But such a court is very slow in exerting such an authority; and it requires the strongest and clearest evidence to establish the mistake. It is not sufficient, that there may be some reason to presume a mistake. The evidence must be clear, unequivocal and decisive; not evidence which hangs equal, or nearly in equilibrio. Now, in the present case, the scrivener who drew the instrument, has not been examined; and if examined, he could have stated his instructions. And if the draft conformed to the actual instructions given by both parties, and especially by the debtor, any antecedent loose conversations would not be entitled to much weight. They would be deemed merged in the more deliberate results of the written instrument. Besides, here the question is not merely a question of the correction of a mistake between the original parties. Munroe's assignees and creditors are essentially interested. They may have released their debts upon the faith of the validity of the assignment of Langton, in the original shape. Unless they had some notice of the mistake, it would be very difficult, even if they were parties before the court, to reform the assignment to their prejudice. As the case is presented before the court, my judgment is, that the bill ought to be dismissed. But there was reasonable cause for filing the bill, and I shall so certify. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 15,836.

UNITED STATES v. MURDOCH et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1824.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — LIEN ON GOODS AFTER BOND TAKEN — CONSIGNEE.

1. The United States have no specific lien on imported goods, for the duties, after having taken bond and security therefor, and delivered the goods to the consignee.

2. The consignee is to be considered, under the sixty-second section of the collection act of 1799 [1 Stat. 673], as the owner. The con-signor never was debtor to the United States for the duties.

Bill in equity by the United States, against Murdoch, Youille, Wardrope, & Co. of Madeira, and James H. Hooe, administrator of William Hodgson, deceased. It charges that M., Y., W., & Co. shipped certain casks of wine to Hodgson in his lifetime, either on consignment, or as a sale to him. That Hodgson gave bond and security for the duties, upon which judgment was recovered by the United States against Hodgson in his lifetime, and remained in full force until his death. That the defendant J. H. Hooe took letters of administration on his estate (no execution having been levied upon his property to secure the debt), and obtained possession of his personal estate, and effects, among which is the very wine upon which the duties accrued; and that whether the wine belongs to M., Y., W., & Co. or to W. Hodgson's estate, the United States consider it liable for the duties, and that it may be subjected to the payment of the judgment against Hodgson, &c. The defendants, M., Y., W., & Co. answered, that William Hodgson was only their agent, and had no interest but in his commissions upon the sales of the defendants' wines. That in the year 1818, they shipped to him a cargo of wine by the brig Hebe, part under special orders procured by Mr. Hodgson, and part for sale generally for account of these defendants. That Mr. Hodgson secured the duties to the satisfaction of the United States, on that part of the cargo which was shipped upon their account, and which was thereupon delivered to him; and that the duties upon the residue of the cargo were secured by the persons upon whose orders it was shipped, and it was delivered to them. That Mr. Hodgson had charged these defendants with $518, being the amount of the duties which he had secured upon that part of the cargo consigned to him by these defendants for sale. That after allowing him credit therefor, he died indebted to these defendants in the sum of $1,679.45, which yet remains unpaid. They deny that the United States have any lien upon the wine for the duties after they have been secured, and the wine delivered. The answer of Mr. Hooe admits that sundry casks of wine came to his possession as administrator of Mr. Hodgson, upon which the duties had been secured by him in his lifetime but not paid; but that when the duties were secured to the satisfaction of the collector, the wine was delivered to the consignees.

Mr. Taylor, for defendants, contended that the lien of the United States upon the wine ceased with their possession, and cited the opinion of Mr. Justice Story in the case of U. S. v. Lyman [Case No. 15,647]. He also contended, that for all the purposes of paying or securing the duties, the importer or consignee was, under the sixty-second section of the collection law of 1799 (1 Stat. 673) to be considered as the sole owner of the goods imported, and alone responsible for the duties. The words of that clause of the section are as follows: "And to prevent frauds arising from collusive transfers, it is hereby declared, that all goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed and held to be the property of the persons to whom the said goods, wares, or merchandise may be consigned, any sale, transfer, or assignment, prior to the entry and payment or securing the payment of the duties on the said goods, wares, and merchandise, and the payment of all bonds then due and unsatisfied by the said consignee, to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. Swann, contra, contended that the owner of the wine was debtor to the United States for the duties, and that this proceeding was in the nature of a chancery attachment of their effects in the hands of their agent, or his personal representative, the defendant, Mr. Hooe, as garnishee; Mr. Hodgson was the factor and agent of the defendants, Murdoch, Youille, Wardrope, & Co.; and their effects in his hands were liable to attachment for their debt. Although the consignee, for the purpose of giving bond and security for the duties, may be considered as the debtor of the United States, yet he is not the only debtor. He was only their agent, and although he may be bound himself, yet he bound his principal also, who must see that his agent discharges his bond.

Upon a reference, by consent, to a master commissioner, a balance of $1,679.45 was found due from Hodgson, at the time of his death, to the defendants, Murdoch, and others, and the cause having been set for hearing upon the bill, answers, and report of the master commissioner,

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion, that by taking the bond and security for the duties, and the delivery of the wine to the consignees, as mentioned in the bill and answers, the United States have relinquished their specific lien on the wine; and that, under the sixty-second section of the collection law of 1799, the consignee is to be considered, for the purposes of that act, as the owner of the wine; and that the consignors are not, and never were, debtors of the United States for the duties thereon; and if they were to be considered as the original debtors of the United States for those duties, yet, that that debt was extinguished by the taking of the bond and security, and prosecuting the same to judgment, and delivery of the wine; there being no evidence of any fraud in the case. It is therefore decreed and ordered, that the complainants' bill be dismissed.

The complainants prayed an appeal, but never prosecuted it.

Case No. 15,837.

UNITED STATES v. MURPHY et al.

[1 Cal. Law J. 217.]

District Court, N. D. California. Jan. 10, 1863.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—FINAL DECREE—REHEARING—"PENDING CASE"—PRACTICE.

Where a decree has been rendered, and a motion for a rehearing made thereon, until that motion for rehearing is finally disposed of, such case is still "pending;" and the act of 1860 [12 Stat. 35], whose provisions apply to all "pending cases," takes effect as to such case, though the decree was rendered previous to the passage of the law.

[This was a claim by Daniel Murphy and others for San Francisco de Las Llagas, six square leagues in Santa Clara county, granted February 3, 1834, by José Figueroa to Carlos Castro. Claim filed February 9, 1852. Confirmed by the commission August 22, 1854, and by the district court October 22, 1855 (case unreported), containing 22,979.66 acres.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The official survey in this case was originally ordered into court for examination prior to the passage of the act of 1860. The cause was heard and a decree made, setting the survey aside and adopting a previous survey, made by A. W. Thompson, United States deputy surveyor. A motion was subsequently made for a rehearing, but it remained unargued and undisposed of up to the date of the passage of the act of 1860. As by that law, all pending cases were subjected to its provisions, it was considered by the court that the operation of the decree, as a final judgment, was in effect suspended by the motion for a rehearing, and that the case was "pending," within the meaning and intent of the law. Proceedings, as required by the act of 1860, were accordingly had. Advertisements were published, and time afforded to the claimants and to the parties intervening to produce testimony.

No evidence whatever, in addition to that before the court at the time of making the decree adopting the Thompson survey, has been produced on the part of those who object to that survey. The claimants, however, have offered testimony corroboratory of that on which the decree was made. The final decree of confirmation entered in this court declares the land confirmed to be the tract embraced within the limits of a judicial possession given to the grantee, and approved and confirmed, after some contest, by the Mexican authorities. No limitation of quantity is mentioned in the decree, and in the engrossed copy in the decree book, a clause stating the quantity to be two leagues —a little more or less—has been erased by order of the circuit judge, by whom the decree was rendered.

The only question, therefore, is as to the limits of the judicial possession. The measurements, as specified in the record of possession, are evidently erroneous, and afford no means of ascertaining the limits of the tract; but the monuments set up at the corners and the delineation of the tract whereof possession was given, which was marked on the original diseño by the judicial officers, enable us to ascertain, with reasonable certainty, the limits of the tract measured off to the claimant. The record states that, at the end of each line, a flag was placed and a boundary-mark established. These marks are now pointed out and identified by the two surviving witnesses who assisted at the proceeding. They consist of ancient marks on trees. No testimony in opposition to their statements is offered, nor is any attempt made to show by examining the annulations of the wood that the marks were not made at the time the judicial possession was given. The lines thus established correspond with tolerable exactness to the rude delineation made on the diseño by the judicial officer. They have been followed in the survey by Mr. Thompson, and I see no reason to doubt that they are those established by the officer giving possession. They are, therefore, the boundaries of the land to which by the final decree the title of the claimant was confirmed. It appears, however, that a part of the land is included in the Solis rancho, which has been surveyed and patented. This portion the claimants in this case have agreed to relinquish, and have consented that the Thompson survey be modified so as to follow the line of the Solis rancho, so far as the two ranchos are co-terminous. A decree to that effect will be entered.

UNITED STATES v. MURPHY.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—WIFE'S PERSONALTY—LARCENY—INDICTMENT.

The goods of the wife, are the goods of the husband, and must be so averred to be, in an indictment for larceny, although the wife kept a milliner's shop in Washington and the husband a tinman's shop in Alexandria, but the wife's shop was not for her separate use.

Indictment [against Patrick Murphy] for stealing the goods of Ann Hill. It appeared in evidence that Ann Hill was a feme covert; that her husband kept a tinman's shop in Alexandria, and his wife a milliner's shop in Washington, but not for her separate use. They lived together, that is, he came to Washington three or four times a week.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent, and THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting) told the jury that in law the goods stolen were the goods of the husband, and

MEXICAN LAND GRANT.

No objection urged to the confirmation of this claim.

Claim for three leagues of land in Santa Clara county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

[This was a claim by Bernard Murphy for Las Uvas, granted June 14, 1842, by Juan B. Alvarado to Lorenzo Pineda; claim filed January 22, 1852; confirmed by the board September 19, 1854,—containing 11,079.93 acres.]

Thornton & Williams, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This case has been submitted without argument on the part of the appellants; nor has any reason for reversing the decree of the board been suggested to us. On looking over the record, it appears that the genuineness of the original grant was fully established, and indeed does not seem to be controverted now. The evidence discloses a substantial compliance with the conditions of the grant, and the boundaries of the land are distinctly indicated by natural objects. The land thus bounded has been found, on a survey, to contain less than the quantity called for in the grant. We are unable to discover any reason for refusing to confirm the decree of the commissioners. A decree to that effect must therefore be entered.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—RESIDENCE.

The validity of this claim fully established.

Claim for one league of land in Santa Clara county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

[This was a claim by Bernard Murphy for the rancho La Polka, granted January 19, 1833, by José Figueroa to Ysabel Ortega; claim filed February 17, 1852; confirmed by the commission August 15, 1854,—containing 4,166.78 acres.]

Thornton & Williams, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It is unnecessary in this case to recapitulate the facts, which are fully stated in the opinion of the board of commissioners. The genuineness of the grant, and the residence of the grantee and his children on the land for more than twenty years, are fully established. The only difficulty in the case is obviated by the form of decree entered by the board, and which it is now prayed may be affirmed by this court. No objections having been raised on the part of the appellants, and none having been discovered by us, a decree as prayed for must be entered.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—SUTTER GENERAL TITLE.

The validity of claims under the Sutter general title affirmed in Hensley's Case [unreported].

Claim for four leagues of land in Sacramento county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

[This was a claim by James Murphy for the rancho Casadores, granted December 22, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Ernest Rufus. Claim filed August 14, 1852. Confirmed by the commission July 17, 1855.]

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

Thornton & Williams, for appellee.

BY THE COURT. The claim of the appellee in this case is founded on the general title issued by Micheltorena in 1844, the validity of which has already been affirmed by this court in the case of U. S. v. Hensley [unreported]. The testimony of Gen. Sutter shows the original grantee, Ernest Rufus, to have been one of those in whose favor the general title issued. It also appears that the conditions of occupation and cultivation were fully complied with, and the diseño which accompanies the petition indicates the tract granted with clearness and precision. The claim was confirmed by the board, and the case has been submitted without argument or objection on the part of the United States. The decision of the board must therefore be affirmed, and a decree of confirmation entered.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1803.

LARCENY—BANK NOTES.

Quære, whether stealing a bank-note is larceny within the act of congress of the 30th of April, 1790, § 16 [1 Stat. 116].

[Cited in U. S. v. Canoe, Case No. 14,718.]

Indictment [against Francis Murray] under the statute, for stealing a watch, the property of Ben Brady, and a ten dollar bank-bill of the bank of ——, and twenty dollars in silver.

E. J. Lee, for defendant, objected to evidence being given as to the bank-note, it not being larceny to steal a promissory note, or bond, &c., and cited Morris' Case, 1 Leach, 468; 8 Coke, 33a, b; 4 Bl. Comm. 234.

Mr. Mason cited no authorities but argued generally.

THE COURT were of opinion that the evidence might go to the jury; they were inclined to be of opinion that bank-notes were within the meaning of the words, "personal goods," in the act of congress (1 Stat. 116); that the case in Leach, 468, was upon the construction of the act of parliament, and not binding as to the construction of the act of congress. That if the jury should find the prisoner guilty of stealing the bill only, the question might come on again on a motion in arrest of judgment. If they should find him generally guilty, they would consider the question in fixing the fine.

The jury found the prisoner "guilty of stealing the watch only."

E. J. Lee, for the prisoner, moved in arrest of judgment, that the jury had not found him guilty or acquitted him of the other things charged in the same count, to wit, the bank-note and the silver dollars, so that if he should be indicted again he would not be able to plead the conviction or acquittal.

But THE COURT overruled the motion and gave the judgment—39 stripes and 10 dollars fine, &c.

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. April Term, 1851.

PUBLIC LANDS — CUTTING TIMBER — REPARATION.

1. Where full reparation was made for a trespass on the public lands, by purchasing the land in part, and by paying the purchaser of the other part, for the trees cut on it, a nominal fine only was imposed.

2. The trespasser seemed to have no intention of defrauding the public.

[This was an indictment against Jacob Murray.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The United States District Attorney, for the United States.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment for cutting oak and other timber on the land of the United States. The defendant confessed that he was in the employment of an individual, and cut, say, two thousand trees for ties for railroad. That the man who employed him intended to enter the land, and did enter two quarters of it, but the other quarter was entered by another individual. That he paid the individual who entered the quarter section for the trees cut on it. And the other entry covered the land on which the other trespass was committed. The trespass was not an aggravated one, and, in fact, did injury to no one, that was not satisfactorily settled. The land was sold at the price fixed by law, having been previously offered, but not sold at public sale. Upon the whole, the court will impose a nominal fine, as there was no intention, it would seem, to defraud the public. The defendant was fined five dollars and costs.

UNITED STATES v. MYERS et al.

[2 Brock. 516.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1836.

EQUITY — CONCURRENT JURISDICTION — TRUSTS — PARTIES.

1. It is a general principle of equity, that wherever a party has a perfect remedy at law, he cannot come into a court of equity to enforce his rights: some defect in the legal remedy being the very foundation of the equitable jurisdiction. But where, superadded to this legal remedy, a trust is expressly created, either by the deed of the parties, or by the operation of law, or both, a court of equity has a concurrent jurisdiction with the court of law; and the party may proceed, at his option, either to enforce his legal security, or, may come into equity to enforce the trust.

[Cited in Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11,152.]

[Cited in Hempstead v. Watkins, 6 Ark. 317.]

2. Although, a court of equity, will not interfere to adjust equities between a debtor defendant, and his debtor, upon a bare possibility that a resort may ultimately be had to the latter, yet, where the foundation of the suit is a trust, and the trust subject is distributed among several, the cestui que trust, has a right to call for an account of the trust subject, in whatever hands it may be found.

3. Where the jurisdiction of the federal courts has once attached, no subsequent change in the relation, or condition of the parties, in the progress of the cause, will oust that jurisdiction. The strongest considerations of utility and convenience require, that the jurisdiction being once vested, the action of the court should not be limited, but, that it should proceed to make a final disposition of the subject.

[Cited in Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11,152; Davis v. Tileston, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 120.]

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

4. Where the jurisdiction depends upon the party, it is the party on the record.

5. The United States being plaintiffs and their debtors being entitled, by the award of commissioners under the treaty with France, to a sum of money more than adequate to the payment of their debt, held, that, although the United States may elect to retain the amount of their debt, it is altogether discretionary with them whether they will do so or not; and the right to retain, constitutes no impediment to the prosecution of their suit in a court of equity.

Moses Myers and John Myers, trading under the firms of Moses Myers & Son, and John Myers & Co., being largely indebted to the United States, for duty bonds, with Richard Drummond as their surety, by two several deeds, dated respectively in October, 1819, and March, 1820, conveyed all their property, whether real or personal, in possession and in action, to William B. Lamb and Richard Drummond, surety as aforesaid, in trust, to receive the debts due to them, and to sell and dispose of all their estate and effects, and after paying the reasonable charges of the trust, to apply the proceeds to the payment of their debts in classes, giving the preference to the debts due to the United States. Before the execution of these deeds, the Messrs. Myers had employed Myer Myers, then in Europe, as their agent, to collect a debt due to them in Norway, and particularly specified in a schedule attached to the deeds. A judgment at law was obtained by the United States against the obligors in the bond, which was in part satisfied. A portion of the debt not having been paid, the United States brought their suit in equity in this court, at the instance, as it would seem, of Drummond, the surety in the bonds, for the purpose of recovering it out of the trust fund, making Moses and John Myers, Lamb, and Drummond, the trustees, and Myer Myers, defendants. A motion was made at this term, to dismiss the bill, as against Myer Myers, upon the ground, that as against him, this court had no jurisdiction of the case.

Before BARBOUR, Circuit Justice, and DANIEL, District Judge.

DANIEL, District Judge. The objections to the jurisdiction of the court, urged by the counsel for this motion, are substantially these: 1. That this suit, although in form, a suit in the name and on behalf of the United States, is, in reality, a controversy between citizens of Virginia, and, therefore, proper for a state court only. 2. That, admitting this suit to have been properly instituted as against Moses Myers & Son, and that the United States had a direct and substantive claim against them, still that there never was just ground for joining Myer Myers as a party defendant, and this suit ought, therefore, as to him, to be dismissed. 3. That admitting the regularity of this suit, originally, as to all these defendants; yet the claim of the United States having been satisfied, the court should arrest its proceedings at this point, and not go on to adjudge the controversy as between the defendants.

1. In support of the first of these objections, it is pressed upon the court, that there never was any interest or necessity operating upon the United States to compel them to the course they have adopted. That by means of their judgment against Moses Myers & Son, and their surety, they had a perfect remedy at law, which they were bound to carry out to its utmost extent; and that the sufficiency of that security (nowhere called in question) relieved them from all necessity for resorting to other sources. For these positions, the case of Linney v. Dare, 2 Leigh, 588, is relied on. The principle, that wherever there exists a right or remedy exclusively legal, and perfect in its character and operation, a court of equity cannot take cognizance, is fully recognised: and, it is likewise conceded, that a court of equity will never interfere merely to settle equities between a debtor, and his debtor, upon a bare possibility that resort may ultimately be had to the latter. This last principle, and nothing else, I conceive to have been settled in Linney v. Dare, for in that case, there was no trust, nor other foundation for equitable interposition. The surviving partner and his surety were both living, and recourse to them, at law, was perfectly unobstructed. How is it with the case under examination? Here is a trust expressly created by deed. The United States, both by the terms of the conveyance and by operation of the statute, are made the cestui que trust. They have the right, I conceive, to enforce their legal security, or to proceed under the trust, ad libitum; and in the latter event, they have the consequent right, to call for an account of the trust subject in the hands of whomsoever it may be. In the latter event, too, the residence of the parties is wholly immaterial, for it is in virtue, not of the residence, but of the character of the plaintiffs, that the jurisdiction attaches. No importance is here yielded to the objection, that the United States are said to have sued upon notice and demand from the defendant Drummond; they had the right, upon the above view of the case, to sue independently of such requirement, though perhaps they were bound to use their right so as not to visit injury upon others. I can perceive then, neither from the pleadings, the evidence, nor the argument, that this first objection can be sustained.

2. With respect to the second objection, it would seem, that if the plaintiffs are rightfully in court, as cestui que trust, they have the right by regular consequence, to call for and pursue the subject, wherever it may be. I should think, that putting aside the proof or the confession of agency, for the trustees or their grantors, in the management of the subject, and simply upon the facts of possession, and indebtedness, or either of them, on the part of Myer Myers (once admitting the right to the trust subject), it would be competent, on principles of justice, and advisable, on the score alike of prudence or celerity, to proceed against him, conjointly with the original debtors, and their trustees. But I do not think that, upon the pleadings in this cause, Myer Myers stands, prima facie, in a contingent attitude of creditor or debtor, wholly separated from the management of this fund. It seems, on the contrary, that he has had material agency in the management of the specific subject. Whatever, then, may be his ultimate responsibility, upon a full adjustment between the parties, I must regard him as an agent, taking upon himself the management of this subject, with full notice of its connexion with the rights of the cestui que trust, and emphatically, therefore, liable to account whenever a settlement should be called for. This opinion is in conformity with the decisions of Newland v. Champion, 1 Ves. Sr. 105; Utterson v. Mair, 2 Ves. Jr. 95; Alsager v. Rowley, 6 Ves. 748; and Burroughs v. Elton, 11 Ves. 29.

3. The third and last point, at first view, seems encompassed with rather more of difficulty than surrounds the two former; yet, this difficulty will, it is thought, upon nearer inspection, be found to be rather in appearance than reality. It may here, too, be remarked, that the question now presented, is, at this time somewhat premature; the facts assumed for its basis, not being formally before the court. There is no proof, direct and certain, that the United States have received, or will receive, satisfaction of their claim against Moses Myers & Son, from any source other than the trust subject.

The objection now considered, concedes the jurisdiction of the court at the time when this suit was instituted; but insists upon the assumption of a subsequent satisfaction, as having destroyed that jurisdiction admitted to have been once perfect. The authority of the court to adjudge the rights of the parties once admitted, it may naturally be asked, how that authority can have been impaired by a recognition of the rights of, or by a satisfaction made to, either party? Such recognition or satisfaction, does not change one legal feature or principle of the case, nor the positions in which the parties stand to each other, or to the court, but is, on the contrary, rather an admission, or confirmation of all these. In the case at bar, there is not the slightest change, either of parties, contracts, or duties; all these remain as at the institution of the suit; what possible ground, then, can there be, for changing the rules which were applicable to them at that period? I can perceive none whatever, in any supposed necessity for restricting the courts of the United States within their proper orbit, for that they cannot transcend, while they honestly limit their action to cases in which the United States are fairly and necessarily parties; and to such, they are imperiously bound to extend their action, whoever may be directly, or incidentally, embraced with it. If there be no paramount constitutional necessity for a change of forum, none surely can doubt the advantages as to economy, either of time or expense, of a system which terminates in a single proceeding, matters that otherwise would be drawn out in multiplied and costly litigation. A course like this, is, moreover, sanctioned by the inveterate practice of courts of equity, which, when once properly invested with jurisdiction, will never parcel out the subject of controversy to different tribunals. Should a practice like that proposed by the present motion, prevail in this court, the mischiefs incident to its establishment, are easily anticipated. Few instances will ever occur, where the priority of the United States will be asserted, which will not involve an examination of various and conflicting interests, because such cases will almost uniformly be those of absolute insolvency, or of different creditors claiming under specific liens upon the same subject, or by substitution in the place of those who may have been preferred. Again:—Where the United States may have no concern, suppose there should be several incumbrances upon the same subject, the last of whom should be a citizen of another state? In either of these cases, it would, probably, be indispensable to examine into the foundation, and to settle the rank, of the respective claims; to ascertain, by accounts to be stated, their precise extent, and to convert the subject pledged into funds applicable to some or all of the demands upon it. The representatives of all the different interests are convented, their rights adjusted, the subject converted into money and actually brought into court. What shall be done? Shall the court, dispensing justice to some of the parties only, turn from its door the residue, whom it had not only power to call, but whom it was compelled to call before it; and with their expulsion, cast from it as a waif, the remainder of the fund, to be struggled for in a different forum? The evils of such a proceeding, would, indeed, be grievous; and its absurdity most glaring, from a contrast with the admission, that over persons and subject the court once had complete jurisdiction; but that such jurisdiction has been taken away, the character of both parties and subject remaining wholly unchanged! But the question here discussed, appears to me not one of the first impression, or to be dependent solely upon reasonings from principle. It seems to have been considered by the supreme court, and by that tribunal, in effect, if not in terms, decided. Thus, in the case of Conolly v. Taylor, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 556, it is ruled, that "where there is no change of parties to a suit during its progress, a jurisdiction depending upon the condition of the parties, is governed by that condition, as it was at the commencement of the suit." So, too, the case of Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 2, cited and relied on by the counsel for this motion, appears to me to coincide with the authority just quoted, and to operate strongly, if not conclusively, against the present application. In the latter case from Peters, a judgment in ejectment had been obtained in the state of Ohio, by a citizen of Virginia against citizens of Ohio, and an injunction to this judgment at law granted: the plaintiff at law, the defendant in equity, then dying, the suit was revived in the name of his representative, a citizen of Ohio. Upon this case, the question of jurisdiction was raised, the parties being then all citizens of Ohio. The court say, that although the defendant in equity, is a citizen of Ohio, yet, he was the representative of the plaintiff at law, who was a citizen of Virginia, and "this fact" (that is, his citizenship in Ohio) "will not deprive the court of an equitable control over the judgment." And again—"Of the action at law the circuit court had jurisdiction, and no change in the residence or condition of the parties can take away a jurisdiction which has once attached." Finally, regarding this motion as neither enforced by any overruling authority by which the judgment of this court must be controlled, nor as consistent with justice to all the parties, I am constrained to refuse it.

BARBOUR, Circuit Justice, after stating the case, said:

Various points have been made in support of this motion, which I will briefly examine in the order in which they were presented.

1. It is contended, that this is substantially a contest between Drummond, the surety in the custom-house bonds, one of the trustees, and also one of the defendants, and Myer Myers, his co-defendant, and that the United States are only nominal parties: and, that, consequently, the court has not jurisdiction, because they are both citizens of Virginia. If this were so, then the consequence contended for would follow. But are the United States only nominal parties? It is not denied, that a debt is due to them, that it was originally due from Moses Myers & Son, and that it is charged upon the fund conveyed by them in trust, and that, independently of that charge, created by the parties, the law, in case of an assignment of the debtors' whole estate, as in this case, gives them a priority of payment; and this is a bill brought to enforce that charge, and that priority in behalf of a real creditor, competent to sue in this court. 1 Story's Laws, p. 465, c. 74, § 5; Act March 3, 1797 [1 Stat. 515, c. 20]. I understand the term, "nominal party," to import one to whom nothing is due, but who is suing in his name for the benefit of another. Now, here, there is something due to the United States, and this bill is brought to enforce the recovery, and the decree must be in favour of the United States. The counsel for the defendants relied upon the case of Brown v. Strode, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 303. That was a suit brought by the justices of a county court, to whom, as obligees, the defendant, an executor, executed an official bond, for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office. The nominal plaintiffs and defendants were all citizens of Virginia, and yet the supreme court held that this court had jurisdiction; but why? Because it appeared upon the record, that they sued, not for themselves, but for an alien creditor, having claim against the estate; they were, in truth, but nominal parties: to themselves, nothing was due: for themselves, they claimed nothing; but the suit was brought in their names, as by law it was obliged to be, for the benefit and at the relation of another, who was an alien creditor; the fact of his being an alien creditor, appearing, as it was necessary it should appear, upon the record, this case is in direct contrast with the one at bar, in the important particulars, that here, the United States are suing, not for another, but for themselves; not at the instance of a relator appearing upon the record, and who, under a decree in their name, would receive the amount; but prosecuting their own claim, at the request, indeed, as appears from Drummond's answer, of one of the defendants, in the spirit of a liberal justice, to make the burden fall where it ought to rest. If this would make the person at whose instance this course is pursued, the substantial party, as well might it be said, that if a principal and surety were to execute a joint and several bond, and the creditor were, at the instance of the surety, to prosecute his action against the principal only, that the surety was the substantial party plaintiff. We consider the principle settled, nay, it is said, in 4 [Pet.] Cond. R. 128, note [Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. (15 U. S.) 290], that it may be laid down as a rule without exception, that in all cases where the jurisdiction depends on the party, it is the party on the record. Now, the party plaintiff here, is the United States, who are undoubtedly competent to sue here as plaintiffs; and all the defendants, as far as the jurisdiction depends on citizenship, are citizens of Virginia, and, considered in that respect only, are clearly suable here as defendants.

2. It is argued, that the court cannot take jurisdiction of this case, because the United States having obtained judgment, for their claim against Drummond, the surety, who is solvent, they have complete remedy at law. Let us examine the application of this principle to this case. It is, indeed, enacted by the sixteenth section of the judiciary act, that suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, where plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law. 1 Story's Laws, 59 [1 Stat. 82]. It has been decided, again and again, that this is nothing but an affirmance of the well known principle of equity; and it is said in Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 210, that to prevent resort to equity, the remedy at law must be as practical and efficient to the ends of justice, and its prompt administration, as the remedy in equity. The principle, which we are now considering, applies to those cases in which, ordinarily, the only remedy is at law; but the party comes into equity on the ground, that by reason of some impediment in the way, or some unfair legal advantage acquired by his adversary, justice cannot be done him at law. The court inquires, whether such impediment, or legal advantage exists; and, accordingly, as it does, or does not, grants, or withholds relief. But it does not apply to those cases, in which the courts of equity and law, have a concurrent jurisdiction. In those cases, although the concurrent jurisdiction of the court of equity most probably originated, from the consideration, that there was not, or might not be, an adequate remedy at law, yet where that concurrent jurisdiction has been established, if a party elect to come into a court of equity, it is no objection to its jurisdiction in the given case, that the party might have remedy at law, even, although, in that particular case, the remedy might be adequate. Thus, if one man appoint another his bailiff, or receiver, I suppose there is no doubt that if money be received, and not accounted for, the party may bring a suit in equity for an account, or an action of account or assumpsit at law; and the equity jurisdiction will not be ousted, because these concurrent remedies lie at law. Again:—A party may now have remedy at law upon a lost bond; but that does not oust the ancient equity jurisdiction. But what is more in point, is, the case put by Mr. Johnson, which is admitted in all the books, that if a party have a mortgage and a bond for the same debt, he may even pursue both simultaneously, until he gets satisfaction. That is, in effect, the case here, for here, there is a specific lien, which places this case upon the same footing with the mortgage. If it were true, that where the United States had remedy at law, they could not be entertained in equity, then they never could come into equity, in cases of custom-house bonds, where the sureties are solvent, for they always have remedy on them at law; and yet, not to mention other cases, in U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108, and Hunter v. U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 173, they were plaintiffs, as here, seeking to charge a trust fund, in cases of custom-house bonds, and in the first of these cases, as here, a judgment, as appeared by the bill, had been obtained against the surety; and it does not appear in the case, that he was unable to pay.

3. It is contended, that the court cannot take jurisdiction against Myer Myers, who, it is said, stands in the relation of debtor to the plaintiffs' debtors, and, as such, cannot by them be called to account; and the case has been likened to one of a debtor to a decedent's estate, against whom, it is said, and we think correctly, the creditor of the decedent can have no remedy, except under special circumstances, such for example, as collusion with the executor, &c. We do not consider the cases alike. We look upon Myer Myers as standing in the relation, not of a mere debtor, and the plaintiffs as mere common creditors at large; but if Myer Myers has received and not accounted for any portion of the trust subject, then we consider him as the actual holder of part of a fund, as to which the plaintiffs are entitled to priority of payment, by operation of law, and to a specific lien, by the deed of the parties. Considered in this aspect, we think it can be shown on principle, that he is liable to account to the plaintiffs. But we forbear to pursue the reasoning on the subject, because we think the question is closed by authority. In U. S. v. Howland, before cited, Shoemaker and Travers were indebted to the United States on duty bonds; the principals became insolvent, and assigned all their estate, particularly the cargo on board a particular ship, to pay their debts, and that to the United States first. The United States obtained a judgment against the sureties, which was unsatisfied. The sureties filed their bill to subject the proceeds of that cargo to their claim, and made Howland and Allen, the owners of the ship, and who had received the proceeds of the cargo, defendants. It was objected, as here, that they were improperly made defendants, but the supreme court held otherwise. That we consider as a case directly in point, to prove that Myer Myers was properly made defendant. We give no opinion upon the state of his indebtedness; at present, the inquiry is, whether we can rightfully take jurisdiction, at the instance of these plaintiffs, as against him? Whether he holds anything liable to their claim, and if so, how much, will be the subject of future inquiry?

4. It is insisted, that under the treaty with France, sums of money have been awarded to Moses and John Myers, more than the claim of the United States, which they can retain in satisfaction of their debt, and, therefore, they ought not to prosecute their claim here. The United States may, if they elect so to do, apply so much of the money thus awarded, as will satisfy their claim. This they actually did in the case of the Spanish indemnity, by an act of congress, providing, that no part of the sums awarded to any of their debtors, should be paid to them without retaining the amount of their debts, respectively, to the United States. Whensoever, in relation to this case, they shall elect to pursue this course, it will be then proper to consider what bearing that will have upon the subject. That, however, is not the present posture of this case; and, we think, that the power to retain, until exercised, constitutes no impediment to the prosecution of this suit.

5. The fifth and last point, is this: Whether it is competent for this court to decree, as between co-defendants, in a case where plaintiffs and defendants are rightfully convened before the court, though on account of the citizenship of these defendants, one of them could not have maintained an original suit in this court against the other? Upon this point,

I acknowledge, I have felt a serious difficulty. On the one hand, such a course seems, in some sense, to be obnoxious to the objection that the court was thus taking jurisdiction between parties indirectly, which they could not take directly. On the other, the inconveniences of a contrary course are so great, that the argument, ab inconvenienti, presses with great weight. Thus, take the case of a citizen of Virginia, dying intestate, leaving all his distributees, but one, also citizens of Virginia, and also administration taken out by a citizen of Virginia. The foreign distributee brings his bill in this court against the administrator and co-distributees. This suit is rightly instituted, both in respect to plaintiff and defendants. Must a decree be made, assigning the plaintiff only his share, making no disposition of the remainder? Let us put another case. A citizen of Virginia, mortgages real estate in Virginia, to two or three citizens successively, and then makes a further mortgage to a citizen of another state; the last mortgagee brings his bill in this court, against the mortgagor, and all the prior mortgagees, praying a sale of the subject, and asking that what may remain, after satisfying the previous liens, shall be applied in discharge of his debt. The subject is sold: what shall be done with the proceeds?

We incline to think, that the true principle is this:, that all inquiries as to the character of parties in this court, are, in their nature, preliminary; and, that when the court is once satisfied that all the plaintiffs are such, as may properly come into this court, and all the defendants are such, as may properly be brought into this court, it is then competent to make any decree which a state court might make; in a word, that, although this court is limited, as to the persons for whom, and against whom, it may take jurisdiction, yet, when the suit is rightly constituted, as between plaintiffs and defendants, it is not limited in its action on the whole case. And our impression is that the cases may be explained on this principle. Thus, without going into them in detail, take the strongest one,—Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 1. There all the complainants, and all the defendants were citizens of Ohio; but, as it was an injunction to the circuit court of Ohio, the court sustained jurisdiction as against one defendant who was the representative of the plaintiff at law; but declined jurisdiction as to all the other defendants, who had not been parties to the suit at law. Even taking jurisdiction against the one, seems to be, in some degree, a departure from the strict rule, as all the parties were citizens of the same state; but it being necessary so to do, to stay the execution of their own judgment, they did so, whilst, as to the other defendants, this principle not applying, they disclaimed jurisdiction. No case has been found deciding this very point, but there being no case the other way, considering the great inconvenience, nay, mischief, which might result from a contrary course: that it seems rather to be a question of jurisdiction between the parties, than a question of power over them, after jurisdiction vests: that here all the parties are rightly constituted: that in any state court, a decree might be made under the circumstances stated between co-defendants: that the supreme court has said, in [Gassies v. Ballon] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 761, that the cases on the question even of jurisdiction as to the parties, have gone as far as it would be proper to go, we incline to think that a decree between co-defendants, though both citizens of Virginia, may be made in this court. The result of these views is, that the motion is overruled.

Case No. 15,845.

UNITED STATES v. MYERS.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1806.

ASSAULT.

It is an assault to double the fist and run it at another, saying, "If you say so again I will knock you down."

[Cited in State v. Painter, 67 Mo. 87.]

Presentment, for an assault on Jane McGrath. The evidence was that the defendant [Samuel Myers] doubled his fist and ran it towards the witness, saying, "If you say so again, I will knock you down."

Mr. Key, for defendant, contended that it was not an assault. The words explain the act, and show the intention not to be to commit a battery. It was like the case of the man putting his hand on his sword, and saying, "If it were not term time or assizes, I would kill you," &c.; and he moved the court to instruct the jury that it was no assault.

Mr. Jones, for the United States.

THE COURT, (nem. con.) refused to give the instruction.

Verdict, "Guilty." Fined five dollars.

UNITED STATES v. MYERS et al.

[3 Hughes, 239; 5 Reporter, 364; 24 Int. Rev. Rec. 44; 25 Pittsb. Leg. J. 143.] [2]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Feb. 7, 1878.

INTERNAL REVENUE—DISTILLERY—ASSESSMENT—TESTIMONY—NEW TRIAL.

1. In a suit by the government on a distiller's bond for the amount of an assessment made by the commissioner of internal revenue under section 3182, Rev. St. U. S., it is competent for the defendant to produce evidence to show the incorrectness of the assessment, and to contradict it, although he has not first appealed to the commissioner of internal revenue against the assessment.

[2] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 25 Pittsb. Leg. J. 143, and 5 Reporter, 364, contain only partial reports.]

2. Where the government, in such a trial, fails to show by positive evidence that frauds (which might as probably or more probably have been committed at the rectifying-house) were committed at the distillery, and the defendant, by all the testimony that could well be brought to establish a negative, shows that the frauds were not committed at the distillery, and that they were probably committed at the rectifying-house, and the jury refuses to find a verdict for the government merely on the presumption that the frauds were committed there, the court will refuse to grant a new trial asked for on the ground that the verdict for the defendant was against the law and evidence.

Action of debt. Plea of conditions performed.

This was an action of debt against the late firm of M. [Myer] & E. [Ezekiel] Myers, as distillers of spirits, in the second district of Virginia, and their sureties [William Loftin Williams, Solomon Benjamin, and William W. Myers]. It was brought for the recovery of $47,800 claimed for taxes due and unpaid, as shown by an assessment of the commissioner of internal revenue. It was tried on the 22d January, 1878, and a verdict found for the defendants, whereupon the United States attorney moved for a new trial. The action was brought to recover an amount shown by an "Assessment List, Special No. 2," to be due for taxes on 68,400 gallons of distilled spirits at 70 cents per gallon, accruing from May 1st, 1874, to February 10th, 1875, amounting to $47,800. This list is a large folio sheet and contains at the bottom of it a certificate in these words: "I hereby certify that, as authorized and required by law, I have made inquiries, determinations, and assessments of the taxes specified in the foregoing list, and find to be due the amount specified in columns 8 and 9, of said list, from the persons against whose names said amounts are respectively placed. D. D. Pratt, Commissioner. Internal Revenue Office, Washington, November 18, 1875." The taxes thus assessed are claimed to have been due over and above the taxes which were regularly paid by the distillers while they were engaged in business, from May, 1874, to March, 1875. At the trial the government presented this "assessment list" in evidence, and proved its authenticity. It then insisted that this document was a final "determination" by a competent authority of the amount of taxes still due and unpaid by these distillers, for which they and their sureties were bound; and claimed that it was not necessary on its part to bring forward other evidence to show that the amount of taxes thus assessed and determined was in fact due; and, moreover, that it was not competent for the defendants, by any evidence on their part, to contradict this "determination" of the commissioner of internal revenue. But the court ruled that in the present trial, and especially as against the defendants, Benjamin and Williams, solvent sureties in the bond of these distillers, this "assessment list" was not conclusive proof of the amount of taxes really due; and that it was competent for the defendants to show, by other evidence, either that the amount assessed was not due, or that no amount was due, or that some other amount, and what, was really due. After this ruling, the trial proceeded on evidence produced by the parties on each side. The government showed that there had been found in New York and elsewhere 219,720 gallons of rectified spirits which had come from the rectifying-house of M. & E. Myers; whereas they had reported and paid taxes on only 193,119 gallons—an excess of 26,100 gallons, or 607 barrels, thus appearing against them; this excess calling for $18,270 of taxes more than they had paid, they having paid but $135,183; whereas there had accrued on 219,720 gallons the gross sum of $153,800. In short the government showed that 607 barrels had gone from the rectifying-house more than had been reported, and tax paid; on which $18,270 more of taxes were due than had been paid. But the government produced no evidence to show that an excess as large as 68,400 gallons (equivalent to 1590 barrels) had been actually distilled, except this "Assessment List, Special No. 2;" or to show that as much as $47,800 was still due of taxes in excess of the taxes that had been paid. The defendants produced no evidence in denial of the fact that 607 barrels more of distilled spirits had been sent from the rectifying-house than had been reported at and removed from the distillery. They proved that the rectifying-house was about half a mile from the distillery. They produced the two government storekeepers (one of them the day keeper, the other the night) who were on duty during the period from May, 1874, to March, 1875, who testified that they saw no illicit spirits removed from the distillery; that they would have known of the removal, if it had occurred to any extent; and that they did not believe that there had been any removal. Defendants proved that these witnesses were men of good character. They proved by all the men (save one) who had been employed in the distillery that they had seen no irregular removal, that they must have seen it if it had gone on to any extent, and that they did not believe that there had been any irregular removal. The whereabouts of the single employé not examined was unknown to the defendants. These employés were averred and appeared to be respectable laboring men. Defendants produced evidence tending to show that whatever frauds were practiced were practiced at the rectifying-house; that there was nothing in the regulations of the government to render it impracticable for barrels of rectified spirits to be sent from the rectifying-house containing less, by 5 to 8 gallons each, than called for by the gaugers' marks and stamps; an average short-filling of four gallons a barrel on 193,119 gallons (4500 barrels) being 18,000 gallons (418 barrels), which would account for the larger part of the deficiency of 607 barrels charged against them. They adduced evidence tending to show how, in other feasible ways, an additional excess could result between the quantity of spirits dumped from the distillery at the rectifying-house, and the quantity sold from the rectifying-house; and how this could be done consistently with the government's receiving every dollar of the taxes due it on the spirits really distilled; the only fraud practiced being upon the purchasers of the spirits in receiving in the barrels less spirits than the gaugers' marks indicated. They presented evidence to show that all that was necessary to enable the rectifiers to put this fraud upon the public, was that they should be able to influence the government's gaugers in the discharge of their duties; and they presented evidence tending to show that the gaugers who had officiated at their rectifying-house had been as facile as could have been desired, in respect to these matters; and that some of them had been convicted of misdemeanors in connection with this same business. In short, the evidence of the defendants tended to prove that no frauds had been committed at the distillery; that in fact the government had received the taxes due to it on all the spirits which were actually distilled; that whatever irregularities had been committed had been committed at the rectifying-house; and that, even from these irregularities, the government had sustained no loss of taxes really due to it. The jury, on the evidence thus briefly described, took the case into consideration, and found a verdict for the defendants. Whereupon the United States attorney moved that the verdict be set aside as contrary to the law and the evidence. He moved for a new trial on this ground, and also because of the misruling of the court in admitting evidence at the trial in contradiction of the certificate of the commissioner of internal revenue, given in "Assessment List, Special No. 2," to the effect that he had "inquired, determined, and assessed" that $47,800 was due.

L. L. Lewis, U. S. Atty.

John S. Wise and John Lyon, for defendants.

HUGHES, District Judge. The first question arising upon the motion for a new trial is, whether the court erred in ruling that the "determination" of the commissioner of internal revenue was not conclusive upon the jury in the trial of this cause.

I. The various acts of congress relating to the internal revenue give ample powers to the revenue officers of the government for the collection of all taxes assessed by law; and the provision which has now taken the form of section 3224 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, prohibits the courts from interfering between collecting officers and taxpayers. The courts are glad to obey this injunction of the law, and are reluctant to interfere with the collection of any taxes assessed by revenue officers. It is necessary to the effective conduct of the government that these taxes be paid as they are assessed; and the courts, whenever they are at liberty to refrain, will refuse to interfere with the collection. It is the duty of citizens to pay the taxes as they are assessed, even though wrong and excessive taxes are levied. Having paid an unjust tax, the law gives the taxpayer a right of action against the collecting officer, to recover back in a court of justice the amount wrongly paid; but it provided, before 1872, that he should first have appealed to the commissioner of internal revenue against the assessment of the local assessor, and that his appeal should have been overruled by that officer. After such appeal and rejection, the law, as it stood before 1872, gave the taxpayer the right to sue the officer who had received the tax for a return of it. The law of December 24th, 1872, c. 13 (17 Stat. 401), abolished the local assessors of internal revenue, and consolidated their duties with those of the local collectors. But it provided that assessments should be made in the first instance by the commissioner of internal revenue, and by so doing, as it seems to me, it virtually abolished the provision, that before a suit could be brought by a taxpayer against the collecting officer, he should have first appealed against the assessment to the commissioner at Washington. For, an appeal to an officer who had already made a final determination against him, would seem to be a mockery. Even, therefore, if this were a suit by M. & E. Myers against the local collector, it would, in my judgment, be competent for them to have shown errors in the "Assessment List, Special No. 2," notwithstanding they might not have appealed from the assessment to the commissioner, and been overruled in their appeal. But this is not a suit of that sort. It is a suit by the government against M. & E. Myers and their sureties; and section 3226 of the Revised Statutes does not apply, even if an appeal to the commissioner of internal revenue as a court of final resort did now lie from a "determination" of this same commissioner as an officer of the revenue. Nor is this present suit one that has been brought in aid of the current collection of the revenue. It was not brought for more than a year after the business of M. & E. Myers ceased. It has not been pressed to trial until nearly three years after that business closed; and the effect of any ruling of the court in the case cannot be to impede or obstruct the prompt collection of the revenue.

I have carefully examined the voluminous laws of congress relating to the internal revenue, and if there is any provision in them which prohibits a court of the United States, in a suit brought by the government against a taxpayer, from hearing legal evidence on issues of fact without restriction, and from rendering judgment in the course according to the law and the evidence, I have failed to discover it. Certainly no such law has been cited, and I do not believe it to exist. Moreover, I have looked carefully into all the decisions of the federal courts bearing upon this subject, and I find nothing in them to prohibit me from going behind "Assessment List, Special No. 2" in this case, except the cases which were cited at the trial by the United States attorney, of U. S. v. Hodson [Case No. 15,376], and U. S. v. Black [Id. 14,600]. I was much staggered by the able and learned opinion delivered respectively by Judges Hopkins and Shipman, who presided in the trial of these cases; which were actions by the United States against distillers and their sureties, precisely as in the present case; and in which it was held, that, in such actions, the assessment and determination of the assessor was conclusive against the taxpayer, even though there was no express statute to that effect.

It seemed to me, in view of well-settled elementary principles of jurisprudence and civil government, that it would not have been competent for congress to confer judicial functions, in matters of property, upon any officer of the executive department of the government; that judicial functions belong exclusively to the judicial courts of the country, and cannot be divested from the judiciary and transferred to the executive, and that any law to that effect would not only violate that cardinal theory of republican government which keeps distinct, separate, and independent, the executive, legislative, and judiciary departments of government; but would violate the fundamental law of the land (Const. U. S. Amend. 5), which provides that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. In the numerous cases which have been decided by the United States supreme court, in which that court has passed or could have passed directly or incidentally on this question, although it has studied to promote the prompt administration of the revenue laws, and to avoid placing obstructions in the path of revenue officers; yet it has laid down no such principle and made no such ruling, as that a court when a suit has come properly before it, shall not decide it according to law and the evidence of the case. See Insurance Co. v. Ritchie, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 541; Philadelphia v. Collector, Id. 731; Nicholas v. U. S., 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 122, 129; Baltimore v. Baltimore Railroad, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 552; U. S. v. Wright, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 648; Assessor v. Osbornes, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 567; Peabody v. Starke, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 240; Collector v. Hubbard, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 182; Dandelet v. Smith, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 642; Pohlman v. Collector, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 189; and Bailey v. Railroad Co., 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 604. In the present case the ruling in U. S. v. Hodson [supra] and U. S. v. Black [supra] would have perpetrated a monstrous injustice; for here, the government in its proofs did not pretend that there was an excess liable to taxation of more than 607 barrels of spirits, over and above the quantity on which the taxes were paid; or that more than an additional $18,270 of taxes remained due; whereas the commissioner of internal revenue, by a purely perfunctory act, no opportunity having been afforded to the defendants for counter proof or appeal, had "determined" that the excess was 1590 barrels, calling for an additional tax of $47,800. Certainly the sureties of M. & E. Myers ought not, on the palpably erroneous determination of an executive officer in Washington, to be held accountable for nearly 1000 barrels of spirits, and made to pay nearly $30,000 of money which the government itself has offered no proof to show that they are accountable for. No case could be presented of a greater injustice resulting from a vicious ruling than the one now under consideration; and, even if I could find no warrant in the authorities for doing so, I should feel constrained to overrule the cases of Hodson and of Black, on principle. But since those cases were decided the supreme court of the United States has ruled in a manner which I conceive to have been more consistent with the requirements of the ancient tenets of English jurisprudence. The case of Clinkenbeard v. U. S., 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 65, was, like the present one, an action of debt on a distiller's bond where there was a plea of conditions performed. This very question of the conclusiveness of an assessment had been raised at the trial below; and the judge who had presided in the circuit court had ruled that the assessment, not having been appealed from, was res judicata, and conclusive; and that the defendant was precluded from showing to the contrary. The case arose before the law of December, 1872. It arose while assessments were made by local assessors; while liberal provisions of law allowing taxpayers an appeal and a hearing before these local assessors previously to the collection of taxes, were in force; and while taxpayers were allowed, besides an appeal to the local assessor, a right of final appeal to the commissioner of internal revenue. Well might the law, after making these careful provisions (all now swept away) for the protection of taxpayers against unjust assessments, go on then to command that they should pay the taxes when thus settled, and forbid them to sue for their return until final appeal had been taken to the commissioner.

The case of Clinkenbeard v. U. S. [supra] was a suit by the government on a distiller's bond given in 1868; and, as has already been stated, it had been contended by the government, that, no appeal having been taken to the commissioner by the distiller, from the assessment sued for, the defendant was precluded from showing that the assessment was erroneous. But the supreme court, after drawing the obvious distinction between a suit by a taxpayer which could not be brought until after appeal, and a suit by the government, said: "No statute is cited to show that the defendant cannot when sued (by the government), set up the defence that the tax was illegally assessed, although he may not have appealed to the commissioner. * * * The decisions of an assessor, like those of all other administrative commissioners, are of a quasi judicial character, and cannot be questioned collaterally, when made within the scope of their jurisdiction. But, if they assess persons, property, or operations not taxable, such assessment is illegal, and cannot form the basis of an action at law for the collection of the tax, however efficacious it may be for the protection of ministerial officers charged with the duty of actual collection by virtue of a regular warrant or authority therefor. When the government elects to resort to the aid of the courts, it must abide by the legality of the tax. When it follows the statute, its officers have the protection of the statute, and parties must comply with the requirements thereof before they can prosecute as plaintiffs." This decision settles the law of the present case, and the objection of the district attorney to the action of the court in admitting evidence to contradict "Assessment List, Special No. 2" is not well taken, and furnishes no ground for setting aside the verdict.

II. As to the facts, there is less reason for setting aside the verdict. The affairs of this distillery have been before me so often, that I have learned to be pretty familiar with the facts of the case. There were two trials before me of the libel for the forfeiture of the distillery, and I believe I have tried one or two of the indictments against the government officers officiating at the distillery and rectifying-houses of M. & E. Myers. We also went through the trial of this case the other day. I can therefore speak with some confidence of its facts. There is no doubt but that the government has proved that M. & E. Myers sent to their customers in several places 607 barrels of spirits over and above the quantity on which they paid the proper taxes; that is to say, the government proves that they paid taxes on about 193,119 gallons of spirits, and they sold to their customers about 219,220 gallons. There is, therefore, but one single matter open to doubt. Did they commit these irregularities as rectifiers or as distillers? As rectifiers, did this excess of 26,100 gallons (607 barrels) represent additional proof spirits sold, upon which taxes were justly due, or did they represent merely the short-fillings of barrels refilled from the rectifying-house, and other frauds practiced by M. & E. Myers on their customers? The government has failed to produce any evidence proving affirmatively that any irregularities occurred at the distillery. It has failed to show any positive facts occurring on the distillery premises, which could raise a suspicion of the practice of irregularities there. And the defendants have proved as abundantly as there can be proof of a negative that no irregularities were committed there. The only question of evidence, therefore, is, whether the single fact of the existence of 607 barrels in nominal excess of the quantity on which taxes were paid, is a sufficiently strong presumption to warrant the conclusion that the fraud was practiced at the distillery. Two or three juries, who have had this issue of fact before them, have refused to find a verdict on this presumption; and I think they were right in doing so. Circumstantial evidence is in some cases even stronger than direct testimony; but experience has shown that it is never reliable, unless subjected to certain tests. One of these tests is, that the fact which it goes to establish shall be inconsistent with every reasonable theory which can be conceived in contradiction of it. Is that the case here? I think not. No one who has heard the evidence upon which the jury found for the defendants, can fail to have recognized, not only the possibility, but the probability, that the irregularities indicated by the re-use of 607 barrels, which had been removed regularly from the distillery, was effected by the connivance of the gaugers, and by manipulations at the rectifying-house. My own mind came to that conclusion, after the second or third trial of these Myers Cases in this court; and I have concurred with the juries in their reluctance to find verdicts against the distillery, and against these people as distillers, on the mere presumption that the fraud was committed at the distillery. In this conviction I believe that the verdict of the jury was in accordance with the evidence, and I must decline to award a new trial. I am well persuaded that no jury will ever find a different verdict.

Case No. 15,847.

UNITED STATES v. MYERS.

[14 Int. Rev. Rec. 14.]

District Court, D. Maryland. December Term, 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE — OPPOSING AND RESISTING A REVENUE OFFICER.

At law.

In the case of United States v. John Myers, George Snyder, and John Voight, indicted for conspiring and combining to and actually resisting a United States revenue officer, GILES, District Judge, delivered his decision upon the prayers offered on behalf of the defence. The prayers were as follows:

First. That the defendants cannot be convicted unless the jury are satisfied by proof that they resisted by force or with any such show of force as to intimidate the officer, Herold, knowing at the time that he had a distraint warrant, and that he was then endeavoring to execute it.

Second. The defendants cannot be convicted under the first count unless the jury are satisfied by proof that they concerted and combined together to resist by force the execution of a distraint warrant, previously to the attempt by Herold to seize the horse in question.

Third. That the distraint warrant offered in evidence is not legal process within the meaning of the twenty-second section of the act of 1790 [1 Stat. 117], and therefore the defendants cannot be convicted under the indictment in this case.

Fourth. That if William Myers was dead before the issue of the distraint warrant, the same was not legal, and the defendants cannot be convicted.

Fifth. That Herold was not justified in seizing the horse of John Myers under a distraint against William Myers, and the said John cannot be convicted for resisting the seizure of the said horse.

Sixth. That the warrant of distress was not authorized by the revenue laws, because there was no publication in a newspaper; therefore the defendants cannot be convicted.

GILES, District Judge, in delivering his opinion said: This is an indictment under the twenty-second section of the act of 1790, and the late act of the 2d of March, 1867 [14 Stat. 471]. It is an indictment for a conspiracy to resist a revenue officer. The question which meets us on the threshold is, does the evidence in the case bring it within the act of congress upon which it is founded? and that depends upon the true construction of the act of 1790. The United States district attorney contends that the process of distraint is such a legal process as is referred to in that act, but to this proposition I cannot assent. The contrary is clearly shown by both legislative and judicial authority. If the view of the district attorney was correct, there would not have been any necessity for the passage of the subsequent acts upon this subject.

Judge GILES then referred to and read these acts, viz. the act of 1793 (1 Stat. 173), and the act of 1799 (Id. 678).

These acts, said the judge, would have been nugatory if the construction put by the United States district attorney upon the act of 1790 were correct. Similar provisions are also to be found in 3 Stat. 185, and in 4 Stat. 63. The internal revenue law itself, passed recently, also provides for the punishment of offences of this kind in its 38th and 67th sections. Now all these acts show that the act of 1790 does not include the case at bar; but in addition to these, there have also been direct decisions upon this point. The judge then referred to a decision of Judge Curtis (U. S. v. Stowell [Case No. 16,409]), and also to U. S. v. Wilson [Id. 16,731].

These authorities are to the effect that the act of 1790 was never intended to protect anything but process issued by the courts, magistrates, or commissioners of the United States in pursuance of its laws. Such being my opinion, I must grant the third prayer of the defendants, and that puts an end to the case.

Mr. Stirling then requested the court to decide the other points raised by the defendants' prayers, but the judge declined to do so, saying that he had not considered them, and intimating that it was his opinion that if the officer was about to take the property of John Myers (and whether it was the property of John Myers was a fact that he would have to leave to the jury) for the taxes due by William Myers, then he was not protected by his warrant, and the defendants could not be prosecuted for resisting him.

The judge then instructed the jury to render a verdict of "not guilty," which they did, and it was entered by the clerk.

The case of U. S. v. Keene [unreported], who had been jointly indicted with the persons above named, but who had severed his case from theirs, was then called, a jury sworn, and a verdict of "not guilty" also entered, in accordance with the instructions of the court to that effect.

The evidence upon the part of the United States in the above case was that the deputy collector, Mr. Herold, in pursuance of instructions from the collector of internal revenue, Mr. Samuel M. Evans, undertook to execute a warrant of distress by seizing a horse, at the Belair Market, for the amount of $7 taxes due by a certain William Myers for a license as a produce broker, and that he was resisted while so doing by Myers, Voight, Snyder, and a number of others, who threatened him, pushed and crowded upon him and assaulted him, so that he was compelled to call to his assistance a constable and policeman; that those resisting him while doing so declared that the tax on market people was illegal, and that their counsel, Mr. Keene, had advised them to resist, and that when the above-named parties were brought before United States Commissioner Rogers, Mr. R. G. Keene said that he had so advised them.

The testimony on the part of the defence was that William Myers, against whom the distraint warrant was issued, had died some time before; that the horse seized belonged to John Myers; and that the objection made and resistance offered was because the officer wanted to take John Myers's horse for the tax due by William Myers.

Case No. 15,848.

UNITED STATES v. MYERS.

District Court, E. D. Virginia. Nov. 27, 1877.

BANKRUPTCY — OBTAINING GOODS UNDER FALSE PRETENSES—INDICTMENT.

1. An indictment under section 5132, Rev. St. U. S., will lie before an order of adjudication in bankruptcy.

2. An indictment for obtaining goods under false pretenses, founded upon the ninth clause of section 5132, need not charge an intent to defraud creditors generally.

3. Such an indictment need not contain the negative averment that the accused was in fact not carrying on business and dealing in the regular course of trade when he obtained credit for goods on false pretenses.

This was an indictment [against Jacob E. Myers] for violating the 9th clause of section 5132 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The case is heard on a motion to quash the indictment. The grounds of the motion are set forth in the judge's decision.

The indictment charges that proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced on the 15th November, 1877, against the accused, upon the petition of Edward Mahon and J. Francis Mahon, creditors of the accused, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided; and that accused did, within three months next preceding the commencement of said proceedings in bankruptcy, to wit, on divers days and times from the thirty-first day of August to the day and year last mentioned, under the false color and pretense of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, obtain on credit from the said Mahons a large quantity of goods and chattels, to wit, twenty-five cases of shoes of the value in all of eighteen hundred dollars, with intent then and there to defraud the said Edward Mahon and J. Francis Mahon, and other persons to the grand jurors unknown, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

L. L. Lewis, U. S. Atty., and B. W. Hoxsey, his assistant, for prosecution.

A. G. Holladay and D. J. Godwin, for accused, on motion to quash the indictment.

HUGHES, District Judge. Counsel for the accused base their motion on three grounds:

(1) They say that there has been no adjudication upon the petition in involuntary bankruptcy filed by Mahon & Co. against the accused, and hold that the court has no jurisdiction to try the indictment; citing among other authorities U. S. v. Prescott [Case No. 16,084].

(2) They say, further, that the intent charged by the indictment ought to have been an intent to defraud creditors generally, and not merely the creditors signing the petition in involuntary bankruptcy, holding that the addendum, "and other persons to the grand jurors unknown," used by the pleader, has no value; and they cite among other cases U. S. v. Clark [Case No. 14,806], and U. S. v. [Penn Id. 16,025].

(3) They say, in the third place, that the affirmative charge in the indictment of obtaining the goods on credit, "under the false color and pretense of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade," is not sufficient, and that there should have also been the negative averment, that the accused was not, in fact, carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade. They cite in support of this objection to the indictment the decision of Mr. District Judge Miller in U. S. v. Prescott [supra].

I. As to the first point, it is not well taken. It is true that under the law as it was before the adoption of the Revised Statutes of the United States, on the 22d June, 1874 [18 Stat. 178], there could be no indictment under section 44 [14 Stat. 539], until after there had been an adjudication in bankruptcy. Until then the language of that section was: "From and after the passage of this act, if any debtor or bankrupt shall, after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy," do certain acts, or "within three months before the commencement of proceedings of bankruptcy," obtain goods on false pretenses, "he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction" be punished, etc. And section 28 of the act as it then was provided that "the filing of a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy, either by a debtor in his own behalf, or by any creditor against a debtor, upon which an order may be issued by the court, etc., etc., shall be deemed and taken to be the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy under this act." The language of the law as it stands in the Revised Statutes of 1874 is different. Section 5132 provides that "Every person respecting whom proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced, either upon his own petition or upon that of a creditor, . . . who, within three months before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy," obtains goods on false pretenses, etc., etc., "shall be punishable by imprisonment," etc.; and section 4991 provides that "the filing of the petition for an adjudication in bankruptcy, either by a debtor in his own behalf, or by any creditor against a debtor, shall be deemed to be the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy." While it was a question, therefore, in 1870, when the case of U. S. v. Prescott [supra], was decided, whether an indictment for obtaining goods on false pretenses would lie before adjudication, there is no such doubt now. The mere fact of "filing the petition" in involuntary bankruptcy fixes the date and fact of the "commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy," and renders the right and power of prosecution wholly independent of the adjudication.

II. Nor is the second point of the accused's counsel well taken. The indictment in the case of U. S. v. Clark [supra] was for fraudulently disposing of goods which had been obtained on false pretenses with intent to defraud creditors, and was founded upon the tenth clause of section 5132. In such a case it is necessary to charge an intent to defraud creditors generally. But for the bankruptcy law, the laws of most of the states allow a debtor to dispose of his property for the benefit of some creditors to the prejudice of others. But the bankruptcy law makes such disposal a fraud upon others, and makes it a criminal offense. It was therefore necessary to make the intention to defraud creditors generally a necessary ingredient of the offense defined in the tenth clause of section 5132. But the case of obtaining goods on false pretenses is quite a different one. If the goods are obtained from one person only, the intent to defraud that person alone makes a complete offense, and therefore it is only necessary to charge the intent as having existed with respect to that person.

III. I have more difficulty in regard to the third point taken by counsel for the accused. If they had stated their proposition less broadly, I might possibly have sustained them. But stated in the breadth which they give it, I do not feel authorized in sustaining it. If I may, by way of argument and illustration, refer to the case as set forth against the accused by the petition in bankruptcy, it is, that being a regular dealer in dry goods and shoes of long standing, and until lately of high credit and standing, he did, while carrying on business in the regular course of trade, yet obtain a very large quantity of goods on pretense of meaning to use them in his regular business, with intent to dispose of those particular goods out of the regular course of trade, at a sacrifice for ready cash, with intent to defraud the jobbers who trusted him for the price of the goods. Now, my opinion is that this offense, committed by a regular dealer, is indictable under the ninth clause of section 5132. But the proposition of the counsel of the accused is, that a regular dealer cannot commit the offense denounced by that clause. They claim that the indictment should have contained the negative averment, that the accused was not, in fact, carrying on business and dealing in the regular course of trade at all. I think that such an averment is not essential. It was not made in this case because it could not have been made with truth. The accused was a regular dealer; and his false pretenses were only held out in regard to the purposes for which he was purchasing on credit the particular goods which he is charged as having diverted, and having intended to divert from the regular course of his trade. I would prefer to have seen a negative averment as to these particular goods in the indictment; but as the absence of it is not complained of by counsel for the accused, the trial must go on, and that matter must take care of itself at a future stage of the proceeding. On this and on all the points of objection to the indictment made by counsel the motion to quash is overruled.

FRAUDS ON GOVERNMENT—LAND WARRANTS.

In the case of U. S. v. Myler, in which the accused was indicted for defrauding the United States of a land warrant, the counsel for the prisoner raised the point of law that the act of congress of 1823, c. 38, under which the indictment against the prisoner was framed, was intended only for the punishment of those charged with defrauding the government of sums of money, and that therefore the accused could not be convicted under it.

THE COURT sustained the objection, and instructed the jury to render a verdict of acquittal.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FRAUDS IN DISTILLATION OF SPIRITS—FORFEITURES—PENALTIES—HOW RECOVERABLE.

1. Under section 54 of the internal revenue act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 452), which declares, that the owner of any still or other vessel used in distillation shall, for certain violations of law, forfeit all the liquors and the vessels used in distillation, together with the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered, with costs of suit, "which said liquors, * * with the vessels, * * may be seized by any collector * * and held by him until a decision shall be had thereon, * * provided, that such seizure be made within thirty days after the cause for the same may have occurred, and that proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall have been commenced * * within twenty days after the seizure thereof, and the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem," an action in personam, to recover the forfeiture of $500 therein provided for, will lie, although the seizure of property provided for by that section has not taken place.

2. Such action is, under that section, to be a separate suit from the proceeding in rem against the property seized, for its forfeiture.

Mynderse, to recover penalties. The cause is now heard on a writ of error.]

William Dorsheimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Theron R. Strong and William F. Cogswell for defendant in error.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. This case presents a question touching the construction of section 54 of the internal revenue act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 452). By that section, it is enacted: "That the owner, agent, or superintendent of any vessel or vessels used in making fermented liquors, or of any still, boiler or other vessel used in the distillation of spirits, on which duty is payable, who shall neglect or refuse to make true and exact entry and report of the same, or to do or cause to be done any of the things by this act required to be done, as aforesaid, shall forfeit, for every such neglect or refusal, all the liquors and spirits made by or for him, and all the vessels used in making the same, and the stills, boilers, and other vessels used in distillation, together with the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered, with costs of suit; which said liquors or spirits, with the vessels containing the same, with all the vessels used in making the same, may be seized by any collector of internal duties, and held by him, until a decision shall be had thereon according to law: provided, that such seizure be made within thirty days after the cause for the same may have occurred, and that proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall have been commenced by such collector, within twenty days after the seizure thereof And the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture of said property, shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem, in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district where such seizure is made, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction."

This action was brought to recover several sums of five hundred dollars, liability for the payment of which is alleged to have been incurred by the defendant, by sundry violations of the 45th section of the same act, at sundry times in the declaration stated. On the trial, proof of such violations was given, on the part of the plaintiffs; but it was conceded that no seizure of the property of the defendant had been made, and that no proceedings to enforce the forfeiture were commenced within fifty days after the cause for the same occurred. Thereupon, the question arose—Can the action to recover the several sums of five hundred dollars be maintained; or, are a seizure of the liquors, spirits, stills, boilers, and other vessels, within thirty days after the cause for the same occurred, and the commencement of proceedings to enforce the forfeiture, necessary and precedent conditions to the right to recover from the owner personally the five hundred dollars? The seizure of the property, and the commencement of proceedings to enforce the forfeiture, within the times respectively mentioned, were held, on the trial, to be indispensable conditions precedent to a recovery of the five hundred dollars from the owner; and the jury were, therefore, on that sole ground, instructed to find a verdict for the defendant. [Case unreported.] The plaintiffs, by their writ of error, seek to review such rulings, and allege that it was an erroneous construction of the act.

In support of the ruling below, it is insisted, that the 54th section, upon which the action is based, contemplates one entire forfeiture, and only one proceeding for its enforcement, including therein the condemnation of the property seized, and a judgment against the owner personally for the five hundred dollars, or several sums of five hundred dollars, if he be liable for more than one; and that the proviso forbids any seizure or forfeiture, unless such seizure be made within the number of days mentioned after the cause of seizure occurred.

The statute is expressed in terms which are, in many respects, liable to criticism, and the structure of the section is somewhat confused. Its meaning is, nevertheless, sufficiently clear and intelligible; and, I think, it does not at all import that there shall be but one proceeding founded upon a violation of the law. The purpose was, to secure obedience to the statute, by subjecting its violators to a loss of the property produced and the instruments employed in the production, and to impose upon them personally a penalty. The penalty is to be recovered, with costs of suit This language is to be understood in the usual sense in which it is employed, namely, in a suit to be brought therefor, in which the person liable may be charged by a judgment against him, with costs. The statute uses the ordinary form of the ideo consideratum est, which embodies and declares the judgment of the court in an action for the recovery of money. On the other hand, the section says, expressly, that the proceedings to enforce the forfeiture of the property shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem. In such proceeding, there is no personal judgment, and the property is defendant. Indeed, if, in such proceeding, the owner of the res does not see fit to appear and claim, he will not be before the court at all, to be charged by any judgment. The giving of a recovery, with costs of suit, indicates, per se, a discrimination intentionally made between the action for the penalty and the proceeding in rem; for, in the latter, all that is secured to the plaintiffs is the res itself, for condemnation and appropriation to their use; and, where the owner does not see fit to appear and claim, the whole subject of condemnation goes to the plaintiffs, and no more, whether the costs are greater or less. The costs of suit, spoken of, are not costs of the proceeding in rem, but costs of a suit for the five hundred dollars. No mode is pointed out by which the owner can be required to appear in the proceeding in rem; and the construction in this respect would deprive the plaintiffs of any power, by any practice of the courts of law, to obtain such judgment against the owner personally, if he preferred not to intervene by claiming the property. There can be no just reason to suppose that congress intended to prescribe the practice of courts of admiralty, for the enforcement of this statute.

The proceeding in rem must, by the terms of the section, be taken in the district where such seizure is made. The owner of the property seized may reside in another district. Is it to be held, that, by this section, congress intended a constructive repeal, pro hac vice, of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79), which declares, that no civil suit shall be brought against any defendant, being an inhabitant of the United States, out of the district in which he resides or may be found? If so, then, by what process, citation or notice can the court acquire jurisdiction of his person? Can the district court send its capias ad respondendum to another district? Upon its mandate, can the marshal of the other district act, in serving a citation, or other process or notice? Can the defendant be made a party by advertisement? Clearly, it is competent for congress to devise and provide for these and all like questions, and construct a proceeding which may accomplish the condemnation of the property, and give jurisdiction to order a recovery of the money penalty, with costs of the entire proceeding; but, in my judgment, they have not done so, or attempted to do so. The learned attorney for the United States has forcibly and, I think, justly and truly, suggested the reason why, under other rules and principles governing the subject, congress cannot be deemed to have intended, by the section under consideration, to work such a result as would flow from holding the proceeding to be necessarily single, and for both the condemnation of the property and the collection of the money from the owner, namely, that it "confounds modes of procedure which have always been held to be distinct—seeks in one action remedies wholly dissimilar—invents a new form of action, in which an individual and his property shall be pursued at the same time—an action, a part of which might, by the death of the owner, abate, and another part survive, and in which there must be two judgments, one to be enforced by writ of execution, the other by an order of sale. To one side of such a hybrid, mongrel proceeding any person having a claim to the property might become a party. To another side or part of the proceeding, he who had incurred the penalty would be the party, as sole defendant." I repeat, that, conceding the power of congress to do all this, they have not, in this 54th section, done so. Although not so expressed in distinct terms, the intention sufficiently appears, to authorize a suit for the recovery of the five hundred dollars, with costs, and a proceeding in the nature of a proceeding in rem, to enforce the forfeiture of the property, by its condemnation to the use of the plaintiffs. So far, therefore, as the support of the ruling below depends upon the idea that there can be but one suit or proceeding, I think it fails.

But the views above stated are not necessarily conclusive upon the principal question under examination. It is insisted that, whether the condemnation of the property and the recovery of the pecuniary penalty from the owner are to be effected by one or by two suits or proceedings, the condition annexed to both is, that a seizure must be made within thirty days, and proceedings to enforce the forfeiture be commenced within twenty days thereafter; and that the entire penalty and forfeiture, or whatever consequence the statute denounces for the violation of the law, is dependent on the performance of that condition.

Although the disposition of the first point above stated is not necessarily conclusive upon the present one, it is, nevertheless, of great significance, and at once lets in with great force the inquiry—what reason can exist for making the collection of the penalty from the owner dependent upon the seizure of the property also? I have had occasion to observe, in substance, in another case, recently argued (U. S. v. 36 Barrels [Case No. 16,468]), that this statute is not to be construed with rigid strictness, so as to favor any possible construction by which a defendant may be saved from the consequences of its violation, but that, on the contrary, it is to be interpreted with just and fair liberality, so as to promote the object of the statute and secure obedience to its requirements. The argument in behalf of the defendant in error places great stress upon the contrary rule of interpretation, namely, that a penal statute should be construed strictly, and, if there may be two constructions, that which is most in favor of the citizen should prevail. But, in the language of the court in the case of Cliquot's Champagne, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 114, 145, substantially borrowed from the opinion of the court in Taylor v. U. S., 3 How. [44 U. S.] 197: "Revenue laws are not penal laws, in the sense that requires them to be construed with great strictness in favor of the defendant. They are rather to be regarded as remedial in their character, and intended to prevent fraud, suppress public wrong and promote the public good. They should be so construed as to carry out the intention of the legislature in passing them and most effectually accomplish these objects." Construed in this spirit, I think the proviso should be held to relate to the forfeiture of the property, or rather to the seizure of the property. Indeed, it is no violence to the words or to the structure of the section to say, that it qualifies the paragraph immediately preceding, and that only, to wit, "which said liquors, &c., may be seized, &c., provided that such seizure be made within thirty days, &c." There is reason for some limitation of the right to seize the liquors or spirits. They may pass lawfully into the hands of innocent third parties; and so, also, the stills and boilers and other vessels may be sold. It was, therefore, fitting that the right of seizure for past offences by the owner should have a limit in respect of time, which could have no application to the personal liability of the offender. If such seizure were declared a condition of such liability, on the rule of strict construction which is invoked, another question would at once arise—how extensive must the seizure be? The literal meaning of "such seizure," in the proviso, is a seizure of "all the liquors and spirits made," and the stills, boilers and other vessels used in distillation. These are what the collector is authorized to seize. Now, if the liability of the owner for the five hundred dollars depends on the making of the seizure, who shall say that the condition is satisfied by anything less than a seizure as extensive as the terms authorize? Authority being given to seize all the spirits made, and it being a condition that "such" seizure shall be made, can the court say that a seizure of a part of the spirits, &c., satisfies the condition? Not if the statute is to be construed with such literal strictness as would apply the proviso to the liability of the owner. On the other hand, a just construction in respect to the proceeding for a forfeiture of the property is, that what is seized may be condemned, and, obviously, no more than is seized can be. Any other construction would defeat the statute; for, obviously, portions of the property might be disposed of or eloigned, so that they could not be seized.

This brings into view another consideration in support of the views of the plaintiffs' counsel. The seizure of property has no relation to the owner's liability or the suit that is brought to collect the five hundred dollars from him. On the other hand, the seizure of property and the proceeding in rem to enforce the forfeiture are distinctly related, the latter being, in its very nature, dependent upon the former.

If the intention of the legislature, in enacting this section, may be inferred from subsequent legislation, or, if we may be aided by the latter in ascertaining such intention, then the provision introduced into the 68th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 248) by the amendment of March 3, 1865 (Id. 462), furnishes, as was, I think, well insisted by the counsel for the plaintiffs, a significant, if not conclusive, guide to their meaning. By such 68th section, as amended, it is provided, that the offending party shall be punished by imprisonment; and the declaration of that punishment is introduced after, and in immediate connection with, the declared liability for the five hundred dollars and costs of suit, as follows: "together with the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered, with costs of suit, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year." The construction contended for by the defendant would, therefore, involve the serious absurdity, that, unless a seizure of the property of the owner was made within thirty days, he could not be prosecuted at all for his offence against the law, nor punished for his misdemeanor.

Upon the most careful reflection, I am constrained to conclude that the ruling upon the trial was erroneous. The judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

HALL, District Judge. This case was argued before me alone in March, 1869, and in the ensuing vacation I prepared the annexed opinion sustaining the demurrer. Before the term at which judgment could be entered in accordance with that opinion I determined to order a re-argument of the case. The order for a re-argument was made at the October term, and the case was accordingly re-argued at the last March term. Being still of the opinion that the main question presented has been settled by repeated adjudications, and that until such adjudications shall be overruled by higher authority they should be followed in this court, the annexed opinion is adopted as my opinion upon the re-argument.

This was an action of debt, upon a bond executed by the defendants and one Jane Goodwin. The declaration was in the following words:

"The United States of America, plaintiffs in this suit, by William Dorsheimer, their attorney, complain of Jane Goodwin, Edward Mynderse, and Charles D. Mynderse, defendants herein, being in custody, etc., of a plea that they render to the said plaintiffs the sum of $18,000 which to them they owe, and from them they unjustly detain. For that the said defendants heretofore, to wit, on or about the 23d day of February, A. D. 1863, by their certain writing obligatory, sealed with their seals, and now shown to this court, acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound unto these plaintiffs, under the name of the United States of America, in the sum of $18,000, to be paid by the said defendants to these plaintiffs. Which said writing obligatory was and is subject to certain conditions thereunder written, whereby, after reciting that the said defendant Jane Goodwin had made application to the collector of internal revenue for the Twenty-Fifth collection district of the state of New York, for a license as distiller at the distillery situated in the town of Torrey, in the county of Yates, and state of New York, it was conditioned that if the said defendant Jane Goodwin should truly and faithfully conform to all the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the government and pay interest on the public debt,' approved July 1, 1862 [12 Stat. 432], and of such other actor acts as were then or might thereafter be in that behalf enacted, then the said obligation to be void and of no effect, otherwise it should abide and remain in full force and virtue. And the said plaintiffs further allege that although the said defendant Jane Goodwin continued to be and was distiller of spirits and spirituous liquors and the owner and possessor of a distillery situated in said town of Torrey, with certain stills, boilers, and other vessels used for the purpose of distilling spirits and spirituous liquors, from and including the 1st day of March, A. D. 1863, to and including the 5th day of May, 1864, yet the said defendant Jane Goodwin did not during that time or any part thereof truly and faithfully conform to all the provisions of the said act of congress, entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the government and to pay interest on the public debt,' approved July 1, 1862, and of such other act or acts as were thereafter in that behalf enacted. And for a further breach of the said obligation the said plaintiffs allege that the said defendant Jane Goodwin, at the town of Torrey aforesaid, in the said Twenty-Fifth collection district of New York, from and including the month of March, A. D. 1863, to and including the 5th day of May, A. D. 1864, was and continued during all that time to be a distiller of spirits and spirituous liquors as aforesaid, and was the owner of certain stills, boilers, and other vessels used and intended to be used for the purpose of distilling spirituous liquors, and had such stills, boilers, and other vessels under her superintendence on her own account, and used and intended to use such stills, boilers, and other vessels for the purpose of distilling spirituous liquors as the owner thereof, and neglected and refused, from day to day, to make true and exact entry, or cause to be entered in a book kept by her for that purpose, of the number of gallons of spirituous liquors distilled by her, and also of the number of gallons thereof sold or removed for consumption or for sale, and the proof thereof, and neglected and refused to keep such book always open in the day-time, Sundays excepted, for the inspection of said collector, and neglected and refused to allow such collector to take any minutes, memorandums or transcripts thereof, and neglected and refused to render to the said collector on the 1st, 10th, and 20th days of each and every month in each year, or within five days thereafter, or at any time, a general account in writing taken from her books of the number of gallons of spirituous liquors distilled and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, and of the proof thereof, for the period or fractional part of a month preceding said day, or for such portion thereof as may have elapsed from the date of said entry and report to the said day which next ensued, and neglected and refused to keep a book or books in form duly prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, and which form had theretofore been duly prescribed by him, wherein was entered from day to day the quantities of grain, or other vegetable productions, or other substances, put into the mash tub for the purpose of producing spirits, and neglected and refused to keep such book or books open at all reasonable hours for inspection by the assessor and collector of the said district, and neglected to verify or cause to be verified the said entries, reports, books, and general accounts, by oath or affirmation, taken before the said collector or some other officer authorized by the laws of the state to administer the same according to the forms required by law, and neglected and refused to pay to the said collector the duties on spirituous liquors so distilled and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, and in said accounts mentioned at the time of rendering an account thereof, or when such account should have been rendered; and neglected and refused to do any and every of the things by law required to be done by her as duly required by the 45th section and against the 45th section of the act of congress, approved July 1, 1862 [12 Stat. 432], entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the government, and to pay interest on the public debt,' and the several amendments thereof.

"And these plaintiffs, for a further breach of the condition of the said writing obligatory, allege that the said defendant Jane Goodwin was and continued to be a distiller of spirits and spirituous liquors at the said town of Torrey, in said Twenty-Fifth collection district of New York, from the first day of March, A. D. 1863, to and including the fifth day of May, A. D. 1864, and during that time at Torrey aforesaid made, manufactured, and distilled and sold, and removed for consumption and sale, a large amount of spirits and spirituous liquors, liable to duty and tax under the act of congress before mentioned and the various acts amendatory thereof to wit, 487,756 56-100 gallons of spirits and spirituous liquors, upon which there was due and owing to the said plaintiffs for duties and taxes under and pursuant to the said several acts of congress, the sum of $122,744 82-100, from the said Jane Goodwin, and which said duties and taxes the said defendant Jane Goodwin of right and law and under the provisions of the said act of congress hereinbefore mentioned, should have and was required to pay on the spirits and spirituous liquors made and distilled and sold, and removed for consumption and sale, by her on the 1st, 10th and 20th days of each month during said time, or within five days thereafter, to the collector of said district, upon the amount of spirits and spirituous liquors so made, distilled, and sold, and removed for consumption and sale by her during such periods or parts of such month respectively. Yet the said defendant Jane Goodwin did not make and render true account and reports thereof, or pay the duties and taxes due thereon to the collector for the said Twenty-Fifth collection district on the 1st, 10th and 20th days of each month or within five days thereafter during said time, nor did she pay or cause to be paid to the collector for said district the duties and taxes upon the said spirits and spirituous liquors made and distilled and sold and removed for consumption and sale as aforesaid during said period from March 1, 1863, to May 3, 1864, as of right and law according to the condition of the said bond she should have done; but on the contrary thereof the said defendant Jane Goodwin, of the said spirits and spirituous liquors so as aforesaid made, distilled, sold, and removed for consumption at Torrey aforesaid, during the period between March 1, 1863, and May 5, 1864, aforesaid, has at various times during that time returned to and paid the tax and duties due and owing as aforesaid to the collector for the said Twenty-Fifth district only upon 435,099 85-100 gallons thereof and no more, to wit, the sum of $107,708.76, and no more, and has hitherto fraudulently neglected and refused to return and pay the taxes upon 54,656 51-100 gallons of spirits and spirituous liquors so as aforesaid by her during said time between March 1, 1863, and May 5, 1864, at Torrey aforesaid, made and distilled and removed for consumption and sale, upon which there was due and owing from her to these plaintiffs for such duties and taxes under the acts of congress aforesaid the sum of $15,066.05, contrary to the condition of the said written obligations hereinbefore firstly set forth. Whereby an action hath accrued to these plaintiffs to demand, and have of and from the said defendants, the said sum of $18,000, the sum above demanded. Yet the said defendants, although often requested so to do, have not paid to the said plaintiffs the said sum of $18,000, or any part thereof, but to pay the same or any part thereof have hitherto wholly neglected and refused, and still do neglect and refuse, to the damage of the said plaintiffs of $18,000, and therefore they bring suit," etc.

After an imparlance, it was suggested upon the record, and admitted by the plaintiffs, that the defendant Jane Goodwin had died since the last continuance; and thereupon it was ordered that no further proceedings should be had against the said Jane Goodwin. The other defendants filed a general demurrer to the declaration. The plaintiffs joined in demurrer and the questions thus presented were brought before the court at the last term.

Mr. Cogswell, for defendants, made the following points:

1. The bond in question, being purely a statutory bond, given by virtue of a statute specially providing for the condition thereof, and not conforming in any respect to such statutory condition, is void.

2. The declaration is bad for not alleging the delivery of the bond; or, if it can be regarded as alleging the same argumentatively, for not alleging the circumstances under which it was executed.

3. The declaration is bad because it alleges several breaches in one count.

4. The second and third objections may be urged, although not specially assigned as cause of demurrer.

In support of these points, the counsel for the defendants cited the following authorities: U. S. v. Morgan [Case No. 15,809]; Dixon v. U. S. [Id. 3,934]; U. S. v. Gordon [Id. 15,232]; U. S. v. ——— [Id. 14,413]; Chit. Pl. 295; and he insisted in his written brief, that this is not the case of a bond taken by the proper authorities for the proper discharge of official duties, where the condition of the bond is not specially directed, or where the bond departs in some particulars from the condition prescribed, and that the cases cited by him, as above stated, were not affected by the cases of U. S. v. Tingey, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 114; U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 343; and U. S. v. Linn, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 290.

William Dorsheimer, U. S. Atty., made the following points:

1. The bond is sufficient. It is conditioned that the principal shall faithfully conform to all the provisions of the law referring to it, and such a condition is sufficient. So, surplusage will not vitiate a bond.

2. The case of U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 343, lays down a rule broad enough to cover this case.

In addition to the case of U. S. v. Bradley, the attorney of the United States, under his first point, cited the case of U. S. v. Maurice [Case No. 15,747], and upon the argument he relied in part upon the three cases referred to by the defendants' counsel as above stated.

HALL, District Judge. The second, third, and fourth points made by the defendants' counsel cannot be maintained. The assignment of several breaches in the same count may perhaps be a valid objection when made by a special demurrer, but the defect is one of form merely, and the objection can be made available only when it is specially assigned as cause of demurrer. Indeed, these three points were abandoned at the hearing, the defendants' counsel expressly waiving all merely formal objections to the declaration.

The first point presents a very serious question, and in the present state of the pleadings one quite difficult of determination. It will be observed that in the recital contained in the condition of the bond declared on it is set forth that Jane Goodwin, the principal in the bond, had made application to the collector of internal revenue for the Twenty-Fifth collection district of the state of New York for a license as a distiller; but it is not stated that such bond was required as a condition precedent to the granting of such license; nor is there in the condition of the bond, or in any part of the declaration, any statement that such bond was given in order to procure such license; or that such license was ever issued to the applicant. Indeed, the circumstances under which the bond was executed and delivered do not appear upon the record, in the form of a special plea or otherwise; and from this state of the pleadings arises one of the most embarrassing questions in the case. The law in force at the time this bond is alleged to have been made required the execution of a bond before the issuing of a license to a distiller. It also expressly prescribed in explicit and unequivocal language the precise conditions of such bond; and thus clearly defined and limited the extent of the liability to be imposed upon the distiller and his sureties. The provisions of this law are contained in the 39th section of the internal revenue act of July 1, 1862, which is as follows: "Sec. 39. And be it further enacted, that it shall be the duty of the collectors within their respective districts to grant licenses for distilling, which license shall contain the date thereof, the sum paid, and the time when the same will expire, and shall be granted to any person, being a resident of the United States, who shall desire the same, by application in writing to such collector upon payment of the sum or duty payable by this act upon each license requested. And at the time of applying for said license, and before the same is issued, the person so applying shall give bond to the United States in such sum as shall be required by the collector, and with one or more sureties, to be approved by said collector, conditioned that in case any additional still or stills, or other implements to be used as aforesaid, shall be erected by him, his agent or superintendent, he will, before using or causing or permitting the same to be used, report in writing to the said collector the capacity thereof, and information from time to time of any change in the form, capacity, ownership, agency, or superintendence which all or either of the said stills or other implements may undergo, and that he will from day to day enter or cause to be entered in a book kept for that purpose the number of gallons of spirits that may be distilled by said still or stills or other implements, and also of the quantities of grain or other vegetable productions or other substances put into the mash tub, or otherwise used by him, his agent, or superintendent, for the purpose of producing spirits, which said book shall be opened at all times during the day (Sundays excepted) to the inspection of the said collector, who may make any memorandums or transcripts therefrom; and that he will render to the said collector on the 1st, 10th, and 20th days of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, during the continuance of said license, an exact account in writing taken from his books of the number of gallons of spirits distilled and sold, or removed for consumption or sale by him, his agent, or superintendent, and the proof thereof, and also of the quantities of grain or other vegetable productions or other substances put into the mash tub, or otherwise used by him, his agent, or superintendent, for the purpose of producing spirits, for the period or fractional part of a month then next preceding the date of said report, which said report shall be verified by this act; and that he will not sell or permit to be sold or remove for consumption or sale any spirits distilled by him under and by virtue of his said license until the same shall have been inspected, gauged, and proved, and the quantity thereof duly entered upon his books as aforesaid; and that he will at the time of rendering said account, pay to the said collector the duties which by this act are imposed on the spirits so distilled; and the said bond may be renewed or changed from time to time, in regard to the amount and sureties thereof, according to the discretion of the collector." Upon the argument it was assumed that the bond declared upon was given in order to obtain the license provided for in this section, and it was conceded to be in the form prescribed for the bond of a distiller by the commissioner of internal revenue. It was insisted by the defendants that the bond was void, because its condition was entirely different from that prescribed by law, and imposed upon the obligors a liability not only different from but much more burdensome than that authorized to be imposed by the act of congress under which it was taken. On the part of the United States it was urged that the bond, even though void in respect to that portion of the condition which required the defendant Jane Goodwin to conform to the provisions of acts of congress other than those relating to a distiller contained in the act of July 1, 1862, under which it was taken, was nevertheless good to the extent of the obligation authorized to be required under the provisions of such act. It was also insisted upon the authority of the case of U. S. v. Maurice [supra] that the reference to the provisions of the law contained in the condition of the defendants' bond was, in legal effect, the same as though such provisions had been contained within the condition itself; that surplusage did not vitiate; that so much of the condition as was not authorized by the statute should be rejected as surplusage; and that the bond should be enforced to the extent of the liability authorized to be imposed upon a distiller and his sureties, at the date of the execution of the bond.

Although the principles and effect of the cases cited by the defendants' counsel were somewhat discussed at the hearing, the question whether, under the pleadings in this case, the bond declared on should be considered as one voluntarily given or as a statutory bond, exacted by the collector colore officii, as the condition of issuing a license to Jane Goodwin, as a distiller, was not argued; although it is believed to be an important question upon the present demurrer. This will sufficiently appear upon a careful consideration of the cases which will be presently referred to. If the bond in this case is to be considered as a bond exacted from the distiller and her sureties as a condition precedent to the issuing of the ordinary distiller's license, it must necessarily be declared void. The officer by whom and the occasion on which a distiller's bond, with sureties, might be required, and the precise conditions which it should contain, are all prescribed by statutes, and the rule of law applicable to such statutory bonds is well settled. In the case of Hawes v. Marchant [Case No. 6,240], this rule was stated by Mr. Justice Curtis with the clearness and accuracy which characterize all the opinions of that distinguished jurist. In that case he said: "It is to be governed by the laws applicable to such obligations, among which is the rule that if a public officer, authorized to take a bond, has illegally exerted his official authority, and thereby compelled the obligee to enter into an obligation not required by law, it is not binding. This rule is settled by the highest authority. In U. S. v. Tingey, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 115, the defendant, who was a surety of a purser in the navy in a joint and several bond, pleaded that the condition of the bond differed substantially from the requirement of the act of congress, and that the same was extorted from the purser and his sureties as the condition of his retaining his office. The court held the plea good. In conformity with this are a great number of decisions, some of which are U. S. v. Gordon, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 287; U. S. v. —— [Case No. 14,413]; U. S. v. Gordon [Id. 15,232]; U. S. v. Morgan, [Id. 15,809]; Beacom v. Holmes, 13 Serg. & R. 190; Purple v. Purple, 5 Pick. 26. And the cases in which it has been held that if the condition of a statutory bond contains stipulations which are not required by the statute, but separable from those which are required, the latter may be enforced and the former rejected, silently, at least, acknowledge the same rule, by requiring that one should be separable from the other, and by denying all efficacy to those provisions which have been inserted without warrant of law. Among the latter class of cases are U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 343; U. S. v. Linn, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 315; Hall v. Cushing, 9 Pick. 395; Van Deusen v. Hayward, 17 Wend. 67; Ring v. Gibbs, 26 Wend. 502; Shunk v. Miller, 5 Barr [5 Pa. St.] 250. The rule which avoids such bonds rests upon the want of authority in the public officer to take them, and upon the policy of guarding the citizen against oppression by the illegal exercise of official power. It is well stated by Sewall, J., in Churchill v. Perkins, 5 Mass. 541, that where the plaintiff demands the fruit of an obligation obtained colore officii, it must be shown that the demand is justified by some authority of the office, otherwise it is against sound policy, and is void by the principles of the common law. By 'colore officii,' however, must be understood some illegal exertion of authority, whereby an obligation is extorted which the statute does not require to be given. If all parties voluntarily consent to enter into the bond, and the departure from the precise requisitions of the statute is made by mistake, or accident, and without any design to compel the obligees to enter into an undertaking not required by law, the bond is not invalid simply because it contains something which the statute does not authorize. U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 364; U. S. v. Linn, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 290. Whether it can be enforced or not depends upon the possibility of separating the part of the condition authorized and required from the residue of the condition, where the condition is not wholly in conformity with the law; and that is the only objection to the bond." Under what circumstances of compulsion or constraint a bond or other obligation shall be considered as extorted or exacted without legal right or authority, and therefore void, or as voluntarily given, and therefore valid, is sometimes a question of much difficulty, and in respect to which, as in respect to the question of what shall be regarded a voluntary payment, there has not been an entire unanimity of opinion. Apparently conflicting decisions upon these questions have been made in different states. The decisions of the courts of the United States have not, perhaps, been entirely uniform, but it is believed that it may be properly assumed upon the authority of those decisions that a bond not given by the obligor of his own free will, but illegally exacted by a public officer, as a statutory bond and as a condition precedent to the exercise of any legal right, is void. A careful review of the authorities bearing upon this question, or upon other questions arising in this case, will not be attempted, but several cases which it is supposed may have an important bearing upon some of those questions will be referred to, and a brief statement of some of the points decided will be made. It will perhaps be useful to consider most of these cases in chronological order:

In 1808, in U. S. v. Hipkin [Case No. 15,371] in the district court of the United States, at Norfolk, Va., it was insisted that a bond given for the enrolment of a vessel was void because its condition was not authorized by, but was contrary to, the express provisions of the law which required a bond on such enrolment, and also because it was hostile to the genius and spirit of the laws upon the subject of navigation and commerce. The question arose upon a general demurrer to the declaration. This declaration set out the bond, and the condition annexed; but it did not (so far as appears from the report of the case) set out the circumstances under which the bond was given, or any requirement by the collector that the bond should be given in the form adopted. After the argument on the part of the defendant had been concluded, Mr. Hay, the attorney of the United States, expressly admitted "that a condition in a bond taken by a public officer which was not authorized by the law which required the bond was void, and that no action could be maintained for the breach of such a condition." He also admitted that "if the laws referred to by the defendant's counsel were the only laws upon the subject, the argument which had been urged was unanswerable." He then asked time not only to examine the acts of congress upon the subject, but to consult with the officers of the customs in order to ascertain whether there was not some authority for taking a bond with the condition set out in the declaration. This being granted, the case was continued for several days. In the end Mr. Hay stated that he had not only made every examination into the subject he could, but had also applied to the officers of the customs for their aid in the research; that it had been in vain, for no other laws could be found applicable to the case; that the position for which the defendant's counsel contended he could not deny, and he should therefore dismiss the cause. The report states that this was done, and that at the same time several other causes instituted on similar bonds were also dismissed. It is true that there was no decision by the court in this case, but the distinguished character and the great legal learning and ability of Mr. Hay give to his deliberate opinions, thus expressed and thus acted upon, the force of a legal adjudication. It will, however, be observed that the question whether under the pleadings the bond ought to be considered as voluntarily given, or as having been illegally exacted, was not discussed; and that the case was apparently disposed of upon the conceded invalidity of the bond, upon the facts, as understood by the district attorney, irrespective of the form of the pleadings and without any discussion of the question whether if the bond had been voluntarily given it might have been enforced.

In 1811, in U. S v. Morgan [supra], in an action upon an embargo bond, Mr. Justice Washington decided that a statutory bond which bound the obligors to do more than the law required, was not the bond which the officer was authorized to take, and was void. The question arose upon demurrer to the defendant's plea, but the facts alleged by it are not set forth, and the only reference to the question of the validity of a voluntary bond, or to the allegations of the plea bearing upon that question, is to be found in that part of Mr. Justice Washington's opinion in which he says: "The court will not say that if such a bond be voluntarily given, it would on that account be valid. But there is no ground for saying that the bond in question was voluntarily given, since the reverse is stated by the defendant, and admitted by the United States."

In the same year, in Dixon v. U. S. [supra], Mr. Chief Justice Marshall sustained a demurrer to a declaration upon an embargo bond, the condition of which imposed upon the obligors a liability beyond that required by statute. This was caused by inserting in the condition of the bond a clause not authorized by law, and by the omission (in the required condition for re-landing the goods in respect to which it was made in some port of the United States) of the words "dangers of the seas excepted," as provided in the statute. The particular circumstances under which the bond was executed do not appear to have been set forth in the declaration demurred to, and the question whether the bond was voluntarily given or illegally exacted does not appear to have been discussed. In delivering his opinion in respect to the validity of the bond in question, the chief justice said: "A clause is inserted in the condition not warranted by law, and an exception is made by the law which is not inserted in the condition. The bond, therefore, does not pursue the statute. The question is, whether the variance be such as to avoid the bond as a statutory obligation? That the member of the condition not required by the statute cannot be permitted to prejudice the obligors is admitted by the attorney of the United States. But he contends that it cannot affect so much of the condition as pursues the statute. The plaintiffs in error insist that it vitiates the whole bond, because it makes the instrument a different one from that which the collector was authorized to demand. The cases adduced by neither party appear to me to decide the question, nor have I been able to find one that does. If a statute renders a bond void, which is taken for a particular object, and one be taken with a condition in part for this illegal object, and in part for other objects not illegal, it is clear law that the illegal part vitiates the whole instrument. It is also believed that if a bond be given at common law, when both the obligor and obligee are free agents, acting for themselves on an equal footing, and a part of the condition be void, but there is no statute annulling the bond on account of that condition, the instrument is valid as to so much as is lawful. But the case of a bond taken under a statute by an officer specially empowered to take it, and containing additional conditions not warranted by that statute, differs essentially from either of these cases. The general policy of the law must require that the statute should be pursued, and the nature of the case requires that the power should be executed conformable to the act creating it. If the form of the bond and condition were prescribed, there could be no doubt of the necessity of pursuing that form strictly and literally, but the form of the condition is not prescribed, and it must be sufficient that the bond conform substantially to the statute. But may the statute be exceeded? It would certainly be mischievous to allow officers to insert in the bonds they are empowered to require, conditions not warranted by law. Although courts and lawyers may know that such conditions have no effect, obligors may not know it, and this abuse of official power may very materially affect the interest of individuals, who may regulate their conduct on the opinion that they are bound to the full extent of the instrument they have executed. That in this particular case, the condition inserted may not be in hostility to the general views of the legislature, cannot materially vary the question, for it is not warranted by the statute; and if the officer be at liberty, under the color of office, to introduce such conditions as his own judgment may approve, then his judgment and not the statute becomes the director of his conduct. Yet it is going far to say, that, for the insertion of even a material condition not warranted by law, not only the unauthorized condition but the bond, in other respects lawful, becomes absolutely void. The question, if considered in a general point of view, is certainly not without its difficulties. But there is a particular aspect belonging to the case itself which ought not to be entirely overlooked. It is said, that if this bond be void under the statute it is good at common law. That is, that if the statute had directed no bond, still judgment might be obtained on this obligation, as on a voluntary contract by which the obligors bind themselves not to do an act which the policy of the law prohibits. If this argument be correct, then these obligors are liable at common law, under this bond, for the breach of that part of the condition which is now under consideration. The third section of the first supplemental act—2 Story's Laws, 1072 [2 Stat. 451]—subjects the vessel and cargo to forfeiture in the very case which this condition contemplates; and on the failure to seize them renders the owner or owners, agent, freighter, or factor, liable for the double value. This forfeiture is not secured by bond. If, then, for the fact of going to a foreign port, the obligors are liable at common law, under this bond, and are also liable under the statute, this circumstance seems to strengthen very much the reasons for requiring, that bonds taken under color of office should contain no condition not warranted by law. This condition is exceptionable in other respects; it omits the words 'dangers of the seas excepted.' Original act of December 22, 1807, § 2. The attorney for the United States admits that if these words be material, the omission is fatal. I should have been astonished had he not admitted it. * * * There is still another part of this bond, which, in my judgment, deserves consideration. The vessel is averred in the declaration to have been a registered vessel, and the court must understand this to be the fact. If a licensed vessel, that part of the condition which stipulates that the vessel shall not proceed to any foreign port or place conforms to the statute. It is consequently a material part of the condition which binds the obligors, unless they could be permitted to contradict their bond, and could be certain to find evidence to support their plea. These are difficulties to which the collector has no right under the statute to expose them. The obligors could escape the effect of this argument only by maintaining that the bond is void as a bond given by a coasting vessel because it does not appear to have been executed by the owner as well as the master. But the owner and master may be the same person. One court has already decided that this objection would not be valid, and I am not confident that other courts might not affirm the decision. If so, the condition which is introduced without the authority of law is a material one. But if these points could be decided against the defendant, it is, in my opinion, not for an officer taking a bond under a statute to exclude a condition prescribed by law, because, in his opinion, its insertion is useless. It is a point on which the judgment of the officer is not to be exercised; and whether right or wrong, the effect will be the same. He is a ministerial officer, whose business it is to pursue the statute, and if he fails to do so the statute will not sanction his act. Although the operation of the bond should be the same, whether the condition prescribed by law be inserted or not, the law considers that condition as material, or it would not have been prescribed. The record, then, as it appears in this court, exhibits a bond not demandable under the statute from a registered vessel, which this is admitted to be, and a suit on such bond cannot be sustained under the statute. If, as is my present opinion, the whole penalty be recoverable in a suit on a statutory bond, yet it is not recoverable on a bond rendered valid only by the common law, and deriving aid from the statute. This is a contract said to be good at common law, and if it be, then being a contract made in Virginia, the United States could only recover according to the laws of Virginia the damage actually sustained. In the judicial act it is declared that in such cases the court shall give judgment only for so much as is equitable, which must, on the application of either party, be referred to a jury. But I am strongly inclined to the opinion that bonds taken to the government by one of its officers to prevent the commission of an act rendered culpable by statute, if not valid under the statute, cannot be supported at common law so as to recover damages. I can perceive no criterion by which damages may be ascertained. I am by no means clear in this opinion, but as the award of a writ of inquiry, with directions to consider the penalty as no guide to the jury in estimating damages, would be obviously a proceeding never contemplated by the law in these cases, I shall not award one, but shall sustain the demurrer."

In the case of U. S. v. Gordon [Case No. 15,232], decided by the chief justice during the same year, it was held on demurrer to the defendant's plea that an embargo bond exacted and taken in a penalty greater than that prescribed by the statute was void; the plea having alleged that the bond was taken for more than thrice the value of the vessel and cargo instead of twice their value as required by statute; and that the obligors were constrained to execute the bond by the collector to clear the vessel until the bond was executed. In the case of U. S. v. —— [supra], decided by the same learned judge, at the same term, it was held that the embargo bond declared on was void because the words "dangers of the seas excepted" were omitted in the condition, as they had been in the case of Dixon v. U. S., supra. It was nevertheless intimated that a statutory bond, which superadds a condition that the statute does not authorize, is not vitiated by the surplus matter, but that the court would reject the surplusage as a mere nullity, and construe the bond as if such surplus matter was not contained in it. It is supposed, however, that this must be understood as referring to bonds voluntarily given.

In Armstrong v. U. S. [Case No. 549], decided the same year by Mr. Justice Washington, it was held that a bond given by a collector of internal revenue, and his sureties under an act of congress ought to conform, in substance at least, to the requisitions of the statute, and that if it went beyond it was void, so far as it exceeded such requisitions. The question arose upon a bill in chancery to restrain the enforcement of a claim under that portion of the condition which was not required by the statute. Neither in this case, nor in that of Gordon, does it appear that the question of the validity of such bond, when voluntarily given, was discussed by the counsel or passed upon by the court.

In the case of U. S. v. Sawyer [Case No. 16,227], decided by Mr. Justice Story in 1812, the pleadings were informally and incorrectly drawn, and the case is only important as tending to maintain the position that in order to avoid a bond for being illegally taken colore officii, all the facts which show such illegality should be specially set up by the plea of the defendants, unless indeed they fully appear on the face of the declaration.

In the case of U. S. v. Maurice [supra], decided by Chief Justice Marshall in 1823, the action was brought on a bond, the condition of which recited that Maurice had been appointed an agent for fortifications, and then provided that he should "truly and faithfully execute and discharge all the duties appertaining to the said office of agent." It was held that Maurice had never been legally appointed to such office; that, therefore, the bond was not valid as a statutory official bond; that it might nevertheless be considered as an obligation to perform the duties appertaining to the office of agent of fortifications; that those duties were prescribed by the army regulations; and "an undertaking to perform the duties prescribed in a distinct contract or in a law, or in any known paper prescribing those duties, is equivalent to an enumeration of those duties in the body of the contract itself." There was no allegation that the bond was not voluntarily given, and it was held good as a common-law instrument voluntarily executed by the obligors. The chief justice in his opinion declared that the capacity of the United States to contract was co-extensive with the duties and powers of government; that every contract which subserved to the performance of a duty might be rightfully made; that a contract executed by an individual and received by the government was prima facie evidence that it was entered into between proper parties; and the authority of an agent or officer of the government employed in making the contract, is acknowledged by the individual when he makes the contract, and by the United States when the government asserts any rights under it.

In the case of U. S. v. Howell [Case No. 15,405], decided in 1826, Mr. Justice Washington expressed the opinion "that when a statute requires an official bond to be taken, and prescribes substantially the terms of it, it must conform to the requisitions of the statute, and if it goes beyond them it is void so far at least as it exceeds those requisitions;" but he added, "I have no doubt that the officers of the government may legally take bonds or other securities for debts due to the United States, although no act of congress authorizes their being taken in the particular case."

In U. S. v. Brown [Case No. 14,663], decided by Judge Hopkinson, 1831, the question "whether if the condition of a statutory bond contains more than is required by the statute the bond is wholly void," was very elaborately and ably discussed. The suit was brought upon a bond executed by a collector of direct taxes and his sureties. The statute directed that the collector should give a bond with sureties "for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office according to law, and particularly for the due collections and payments of all moneys assessed, etc.," and the condition of his bond as given was that "the said Nicholas Kern" (the collector) "has truly discharged, and shall continue truly and faithfully to discharge the duties of his said office." The objection to the bond was that it had a retrospective operation while the bond directed by the statute had not; and Judge Hopkinson stated that the question to be decided was not whether they could give to the bond a retrospective effect, as that was not pretended on the part of the plaintiffs, but whether by this departure from the statute the obligation was entirely void. It was not alleged by the defendant's plea that a bond containing that portion of the condition which was intended to give it a retrospective operation was required of the collector, by any other officer or any department of the United States. In deciding the question presented, Judge Hopkinson examined and at considerable length discussed the purport and effect of several prior decisions. The case under consideration was compared with the case of U. S. v. Morgan, supra, and, after declaring that there was an important difference between them, Judge Hopkinson said: "The condition of that bond was not, as ours is, in its nature or terms divisible. There was not in it a part which was bad, and a part which was good, and so set forth that they might be separated from each other; that the one might be retained and the other rejected; that the obligation might stand good for the one and not for the other; that the United States might say on the record, we ask for a judgment only on so much of this condition and its forfeiture as is according to law. It is impossible to make the bond in Morgan's Case conform to the law by taking away any part of it. You must make altogether a new and a different condition; you must add an important qualification or exception given by the act of congress and not given by the bond, and must essentially change, indeed expunge, another part of the condition which was not warranted by the law. In short, you must make a new contract between the parties. It was a very plain case, and this may account for the little attention that was given to the argument." In referring to the case of U. S. v. Hipkin, supra, Judge Hopkinson said: "No opinion was given by the court, nor was any necessary. The objection to the bond was that the condition was contrary to the express provisions of the law. It was not a case of a condition with several stipulations divisible from each other, some according to law and others not so. The district attorney admitted that no recovery could be had for a breach of a condition that was not authorized by the law which required the bond." The bond in Brown's Case was held by Judge Hopkinson to be binding to the extent of the condition directed by the statute, the learned judge stating in conclusion that the good part of the condition might be easily separated from the bad; that nothing was required to be added to the contract, and nothing to be taken from it, but what is favorable to the obligor, by diminishing the extent of his liability.

The cases thus far considered have been cases decided by judges of the district or circuit courts of the United States; but three cases decided by the court of last resort will now be referred to.

The first of these (U. S. v. Tingey, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 115) was decided in 1831. The suit was upon the bond of a purser of the navy and his sureties. The statute required that the official bond of a purser should be "conditioned faithfully to perform all the duties of purser of the navy of the United States;" while the bond actually given, instead of limiting the liability of the obligors to the duties or disbursements of the purser as such, made them liable for all moneys received by him, and for all public property committed to his care whether officially or otherwise. In this difference between the actual condition of the bond and that required by the statute, the case was not very unlike that now under consideration; but the pleadings in the two cases are widely different. In that case the defendant by special plea alleged that the navy department caused the bond to be prepared and transmitted to the purser, and required and demanded that the same should be executed by him, with sufficient sureties, before he should be permitted to remain in the office of purser or to receive the pay and emoluments attached to his office; and "that the same was under color and pretence of the said act of congress, and under color of office, required and extorted" from the purser and his sureties. On demurrer to this plea judgment was given against the United States. Referring to these allegations of the plea, Mr. Justice Story, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "There is no pretence then to say that it was a bond voluntarily given, or that though different from the form prescribed by the statute, it was received and executed without objection. It was demanded of the party, upon the peril of losing his office; it was extorted under color of office, against the requisitions of the statute. It was plainly then an illegal bond, for no officer of the government has a right, by color of his office, to require of any subordinate officer, as a condition of holding office, that he should execute a bond with a condition different from that prescribed by law. That would be not to execute, but to supersede the requisitions of law. It would be very different when such a bond was, by mistake or otherwise, voluntarily substituted by the parties for the statute bond without any coercion or extortion by color of office." The capacity of the United States to enter into a contract or take a bond, in cases not previously provided for by law, whenever it was proper to do so in the exercise of the constitutional powers confided to the government, was expressly affirmed, and it was declared that the government, through the instrumentality of the proper department to which its powers are confided, might enter into contracts appropriate to the just exercise of such powers, and not prohibited by law.

In the case of U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 343, decided in 1836, the suit was upon a bond taken from a paymaster in the army and his sureties, and it was contended that the bond was void because the condition did not cover all the responsibilities required by the statute to be covered by the paymaster's official bond, and also because it imposed other responsibilities not required by the statute. The defendant's plea did not allege that the bond was extorted or required; but it was insisted that a bond void when required contrary to a statute (referring to Tingey's Case) was equally void when taken contrary to such statute. And the defendant's counsel also strongly resisted the claim on the part of the United States that the bond was good because voluntarily given, and that it was at least good so far as it conformed to the statute, even if void for the residue. Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the court, again declared that a voluntary bond taken by the United States for a lawful purpose, but not prescribed by law, was valid. And he also declared that upon the face of the pleadings the bond must be taken to be a bond voluntarily given, there being no averment that it was obtained by extortion or oppression, under color of office, as there was in Tingey's Case. He further said: "It has been urged, however, in the present case, that the act of 1816, c. 69 [3 Stat. 297], does, by necessary implication, prohibit the taking of any bonds from paymasters, other than those in the form prescribed by the sixth section of the act, and therefore that bonds taken in any other form are utterly void. We do not think so. The act merely prescribes the form and purport of the bond to be taken of paymasters by the war department. It is in this respect directory to that department; and doubtless it would be illegal for that department to insist upon a bond containing other provisions and conditions differing from those prescribed or required by law. But the act has nowhere declared that all other bonds not taken in the prescribed form shall be utterly void; nor does such an implication arise from any of the terms contained in the act, or from any principles of public policy which it is designed to promote. A bond may, by mutual mistake or accident, and wholly without design, be taken in a form not prescribed by the act. It would be a very mischievous interpretation of the act to suppose that under such circumstances it was the intendment of the act that the bond should be utterly void. Nothing, we think, but very strong and express language, should induce a court of justice to adopt such an interpretation. Where the act speaks out, it would be our duty to follow it; where it is silent, it is a sufficient compliance with the policy of the act to declare the bond void as to any conditions which are imposed upon a party beyond what the law requires. This is not only the dictate of the common law, but of common sense. We think then that the present bond, so far as it is in conformity to the act of 1816, c. 69, is good; and for any excess beyond that act, if there be any (on which we do not decide), it is void pro tanto. The breach assigned is clearly of a part of the condition (viz., to account for the public moneys) which is in conformity to the act; and therefore action is well maintainable therefor."

In U. S. v. Linn, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 290, decided in 1841, it was held that an obligation, not under seal, voluntarily given by a receiver of public moneys and his sureties as security for the faithful performance of his duties as such receiver, was valid, although the act of congress directed that he should give a bond with approved security. The court again decided that a voluntary contract or security, taken by the United States for a lawful purpose and upon a good consideration, although not prescribed by any law, is not void. And the validity of such voluntary contracts was again affirmed in Tyler v. Hand, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 573, decided in 1849.

Prior to the decision of the two cases last referred to, in 1839, the case of Tabor v. U. S. [Case No. 13,722], was decided in the circuit court by Mr. Justice Story, upon a statement of facts agreed by the parties, and an agreement that if the defendants were not required by law to execute the bond in question in order to enable the ship therein mentioned to proceed on her voyage, judgment should be entered for the defendants. This was then the only question, and it was held that they were not. Mr. Justice Story, in disposing of the case, said: "I am of the opinion that no action can be maintained on the present bond, as it seeks to enforce a supposed statute duty, and is in the nature of a penalty, and has been exacted by the officers of the government under a mistake, as well of their duty as of law." The bond had been taken by the collector as a bond required by statute, in a case not within its provisions; but the statement of facts agreed upon does not contain an admission that it was extorted or exacted, although it may justify the inference that it was required by the collector.

The cases above referred to, and others not cited, are sufficient to sustain the conclusion before stated, that the bond declared on in this suit if illegally exacted from the principal therein, as a condition precedent to the issuing of a distiller's license, is wholly void, but there being nothing in the pleadings to show that the bond was illegally exacted, or that it was not prepared, executed, and delivered without any previous requirement of the collector, it must, under the authority of the case of U. S. v. Bradley, supra, be held to have been voluntarily given. The cases above cited also show that a bond voluntarily given to the United States to secure the performance of any lawful act or the discharge of any legal duty is valid, if the United States, in its political and corporate capacity, has a legal pecuniary interest in the performance of the condition of the bond, although such bond is not required by any act of congress; and that a bond executed by a public officer or private individual, and his sureties, of their own free will, without any exaction or requirement on the part of the officer or agent taking the same on behalf of the government, and purporting to impose obligations not required by any statute, as well as obligations so required, is not wholly void, simply because it was erroneously supposed to be required, and was given, taken, and accepted as a bond required by an act of congress. It is true that the language of some of the earlier cases would seem to lead to a different conclusion, but in the more recent cases it is held that where the different obligations can be separated, the one from the other, the obligations in excess of the statute requirement may be rejected as surplusage, and the bond enforced to the extent of the obligations required by the statute. If the obligation in excess of the requirements of the statute thus voluntarily assumed would be held to be binding if not connected with the obligation directed to be taken by the statute, it might, in the absence of the cases deciding the question, be considered extremely doubtful whether an obligation, which, if standing alone, would be lawful and valid, should be held unlawful and void, merely because it was contained in the same instrument with another entirely lawful and valid obligation which happened to be required or provided for by statute. But at this time and in this court, the question must be considered as one of authority; and it is believed that the cases which hold such bonds to be good to the extent of the obligations required by statute, and void as to the excess, are so numerous and so authoritative that they must be followed in this court, until overruled by the court of last resort. And when, as in this case, the precise form and extent of the statutory obligation to be imposed is distinctly and exactly prescribed by statute, it must be conceded that there is much reason for saying that a bond which imposes other and very different obligations is against the policy of the statute and the intentions of the legislature; and that all obligations in excess of such statutory requirements, found in any such statutory bond, are therefore void. Assuming, then, that a bond voluntarily given as a statutory bond, but purporting to impose obligations in addition to those required by statute, may be good in part and void in part, as above stated, it becomes necessary to determine whether the bond declared on in this case is to be considered as a bond of that character, and whether, under the declaration, the United States are entitled to recover. The recital in the condition of the bond, and the statements made in assigning breaches of its condition, are deemed sufficient (independent of the admissions made upon the argument) to justify the assumption that this bond was executed and taken as and for the bond of a distiller under the act of 1862. Indeed there is nothing in the declaration to show that the United States had any other reason for taking the bond or have now any interest in enforcing its obligations, except as against the principal obligor as a distiller.

In this view of the case it is necessary to consider whether, under the cases cited, the United States can have judgment upon the ground that the bond declared on may be enforced in respect to a portion of its condition, although other portions of such condition, which are in excess of the condition authorized by statute, are illegal and void. And this depends upon the question whether the portions of such condition which are in excess of the statutory requirement are so separable from the other portions of the condition of the bond that they may be rejected as surplusage, and the residue of the condition then be of such tenor and effect as to allow a recovery upon the breaches assigned. It will be seen by the extract which has been made from the opinion of Mr. Justice Curtis, in the case of Hawes v. Marchant, that it was said by that learned judge that the cases in which it has been held that if the condition of a statutory bond contains stipulations which are not required by the statute, but separable from those which are required, the latter may be enforced and the former rejected, require that the one should be separable from the other; and that in the case of a voluntary bond the question "whether it can be enforced or not, depends upon the possibility of separating the parts of the condition authorized and required from the residue of the condition, when the condition is not wholly in conformity with the law, and this is the only objection to the bond." And this statement is fully sustained by other cases. Where there is no doubt in regard to the interpretation or construction of the language of the obligation, this separation is to be made, not by arbitrarily restricting the effect of the language of such obligations, but by rejecting as surplusage whatever is unauthorized; thus reading and construing the writing as though such surplusage was stricken out. As was said in substance by Judge Hopkins in U. S. v. Brown, supra, there must be a part which is good and a part which is bad, so set forth that they may be separated from each other and one retained and the other rejected. Courts cannot make a new and different condition or contract, but may reject as surplusage any separate or separable words or sentences which have been improperly introduced. Thus in the present case there is no difficulty in rejecting as surplusage the words, "and of such other act or acts as are now or may hereafter be in that behalf enacted," but the difficulty is in going further. It is impossible to make the bond conform to the statutory requirement by striking out any part of the remaining condition which requires that "Jane Goodwin shall truly and faithfully conform to all the provisions of the act of 1862." In order to give such effect to the condition much more would be required. The provisions of that act relating to income returns, and to manufacturer's returns, to the payment of income and other taxes and duties, and to the affixing of stamps, are all in terms and effect covered by this condition, as much as the provisions of the 39th section under which a distiller's bond is required, and in order to make the bond conform to the statute an entirely new condition must be made. In short, the good and bad parts of this condition are not separable, and the bond cannot be made to conform to the statute in the only mode in which common law courts are authorized to reform such contracts. The bond must therefore be held to be wholly void. See Hawes v. Marchant, decided by Judge Curtis, and U. S. v. Brown, decided by Judge Hopkinson, hereinbefore referred to, and the cases there cited, and Lee v. Coleshill, Cro. Eliz. 529, and Chater v. Beckett, 7 Term R. 201.

But even if the bond in this case could be held to be good and valid to the extent of the obligations imposed by a bond properly executed and properly taken under the 39th section of the act of 1862, and with the condition therein specified, there would still remain another question of great importance which was not discussed on the argument, but in respect to which little doubt can be entertained. It is supposed that the only ground upon which the United States would be entitled to recover more than nominal damages, under the breaches assigned in the declaration, is the nonpayment of the duties legally due upon the spirits distilled by the principal in the bond; and the 39th section of the act of 1862, in prescribing the condition of the distiller's bond, intended to secure such payment, provides only for the payment of "the duties by this" (that) "act imposed" on the spirits so distilled. Now the act of 1862 imposed a duty of twenty cents a gallon only, and it was not until the passage of the act of March 3, 1864, that this duty was increased; by that act the duty on such spirits subsequently distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption previous to the 1st day of July then next, was increased to sixty cents the gallon. The declaration alleges that Jane Goodwin continued to be a distiller to and including the 5th day of May, 1864, that is, for two months after the duty was increased to sixty cents by the act of 1864; and that she distilled up to and including said 5th day of May, 1864, 489,756 76-100 gallons of spirits, upon which there was due for duties and taxes under the several acts of congress the sum of $122,744.82; and it then admits the payment of $106,708.76, or nearly $10,000 more than a tax of 20 cents per gallon upon such distilled spirits would have amounted to; and there is nothing to show that any of the unpaid taxes were imposed in the act of 1862. It would seem then that under this state of the pleadings nothing beyond nominal damages could be recovered upon this bond, even if it should be held to be valid to the extent of the obligation required to be assumed by the distiller and her sureties in the bond required to be executed under the 39th section of the act of 1862. But this question relates rather to the amount of damages than to the bare right to recover at least nominal damages; and, therefore, it has been necessary to examine other and more embarrassing questions. The defendants are entitled to judgment upon the demurrer, but the plaintiffs will be allowed to amend their declaration.

[There was a difference of opinion between Judge Hall and Judge Woodruff, in consequence of which the case was certified to the supreme court. The opinion of Judge Hall above was reversed. 154 U. S. 580, 14 Sup. Ct. 1213. For opinion of Judge Woodruff, see Case No. 15,851.]

Case No. 15,851.

UNITED STATES v. MYNDERSE et al.

[11 Blatchf. 1;[1] 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 104.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June, 1870.[2]

INTERNAL REVENUE — DISTILLER'S BOND — NON-COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS—VALIDITY—SURPLUSAGE.

1. The 39th section of the internal revenue act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 446), describes the bond to be given to the United States by distillers, on application for a license to distil, and specifies the several conditions of such bond in detail. The declaration herein averred, that G. made application to the collector of internal revenue for a license as a distiller, and that the defendants thereupon became bound, by writing obligatory, sealed, &c., to the United States, in the sum of $18,000, conditioned that the said G. should truly and faithfully conform to all of the provisions of the said act, and of such other act or acts as were then, or might thereafter be, in that behalf enacted: Held, that the bond was a valid bond, and the defendants were liable thereon.

[2] [Affirmed in 154 U. S. 580, 14 Sup. Ct. 1213.]

2. Where a statute makes it the duty of a public officer to require of another an official bond, or a bond on granting a license, or the like, such bond is not necessarily invalid because it contains conditions which the statute does not prescribe, or exceeds the requirements of the statute.

3. When such bond is voluntarily given, and is not exacted or extorted colore officii it is binding.

4. When conditions in excess of the statute requirement are inserted therein, such conditions may be rejected as surplusage, and the bond be sustained as to the others.

[This was a suit by the United States against Edward Mynderse and Charles D. Mynderse.]

William Dorsheimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.

William F. Cogswell, for defendants.

Before WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and HALL, District Judge.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. It is conceded, on the argument of the defendants' demurrer to the declaration herein, that the only question to be considered is, whether the bond declared upon is a valid instrument. It recites, that Jane Goodwin had made application to the collector of internal revenue for the 25th collection district of the state of New York, for a license as distiller, at the distillery situated at the town of Torrey, in, &c., and is conditioned, that, "if the said Jane Goodwin shall truly and faithfully conform to all the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the government, and to pay interest on the public debt,' approved July 1st, 1862, and of such other act or acts as were then, or might thereafter be, in this behalf, enacted, then the said obligation to be void, and of no further effect, otherwise," &c. By the 39th section of the act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 446), referred to in the bond, it is made the duty of collectors, within their respective districts, to grant licenses for distilling to any person, being a resident of the United States, who shall desire the same, by application, &c., upon payment of the sum or duty prescribed; and it is provided, that, "at the time of applying for said license, and before the same is issued, the person so applying shall give bond to the United States, in such sum as shall be required by the collector, and with one or more sureties, to be approved by said collector, conditioned," (1) "that, in case any additional still or stills, or other implements to be used as aforesaid, shall be erected by him, his agent or superintendent, he will, before using, &c., report in writing to the said collector the capacity thereof, and information from time to time of any change in the form, capacity, &c., which either of the said stills, &c., may undergo;" (2) "that he will, from day to day, enter, or cause to be entered, in a book to be kept for that purpose, the number of gallons of spirits that may be distilled by said still or stills, &c., and, also, of the quantities of grain, or other vegetable productions, or other substances, put into the mash tub, or otherwise used by him * * * for the purpose of producing spirits, which said book shall be open at all times during the day (Sundays excepted) to the inspection of the said collector, who may make memorandums or transcripts therefrom;" (3) "and that he will render to the said collector, on the first, tenth, and twentieth days of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, during the continuance of said license, an exact account, in writing, taken from his books, of the number of gallons of spirits distilled and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, * * * and the proof thereof, and, also, of the quantities of grain, &c., * * *. put into the mash tub, or otherwise used by him, * * * for the purpose of producing spirits, for the period or fractional part of a month then next preceding the date of said report, which said report shall be verified by affidavit in the manner prescribed by this act;" (4) "and that he will not sell, or permit to be sold, or removed for consumption or sale, any spirits distilled by him under and by virtue of his said license, until the same shall have been inspected, gauged, and proved, and the quantity thereof duly entered upon his books as aforesaid;" (5) "and that he will, at the time of rendering said account, pay to the said collector the duties which by this act are imposed upon the spirits so distilled."

It is, of course, conceded, that the bond described in the declaration is not in the words of this 39th section. It is conditioned for conformity by the distiller to "all the provisions" of the act, and of such other acts as were then, (i. e., at the time of the execution of the bond,) or might thereafter be, in that behalf, (i. e., in regard to the duty of distillers,) enacted. Now, if the condition of this bond, in its broad generality, did, in fact, require, as a condition, nothing which is not included in the details enumerated in the section describing the bond, the only question would be—is the bond void, because it does not follow the words of the section, but, in lieu thereof, employs general language, having no greater meaning; or, in another form, if the bond prescribed by the 39th section, literally followed, would be conditioned for the performance of specific acts and duties, which, in truth, embrace all the duties imposed by the act, does the failure to enumerate all those duties in detail invalidate the bond? I think not. In such case, the words, "conform to all the provisions" of the act, are, in meaning and in legal effect, the same as, "do and perform the several things in detail, enumerated in the act." Grouping the various duties in one phrase, and describing them as "conformity to all the provisions," is exactly equivalent to an enumeration of each in detail. Such a bond is no more onerous to the principal obligor, or to the sureties, and binds them to nothing which the statute did not require that they should, by the bond, be bound to do and perform.

But, laying out of view, for the present, that part of the condition of the bond in suit which requires conformity to the provisions of acts which may thereafter be enacted, I am not ready to agree that a bond voluntarily given upon an application for a license as a distiller, conditioned for the performance of all the duties imposed on distillers by the act under which the license is granted, is invalid, even if the applicant might have claimed such license upon tender of a bond less comprehensive in its scope. The cases relied upon by the defendants do not affirm such a proposition, but rather the contrary. It is to be carefully observed, that it does not appear that the collector, in the case before us, required, exacted, or extorted the bond in the particular form in which it was given; but, only, that Jane Goodwin was a distiller of spirits, and owner of a distillery in the said town of Torrey, &c., and the defendants, by their certain writing obligatory, sealed, &c., recited an application to the collector for a license as distiller, and acknowledged themselves bound to the United States in the sum of $18,000, conditioned, nevertheless, that the said Jane Goodwin should truly and faithfully conform to all of the provisions of the act under which such license was permitted. It is an undertaking, upon the granting and acceptance of a license to distil, that she will obey the statute which regulates her conduct as a distiller.

In the first place, as we must assume that such a bond was voluntarily tendered, the rule, and the cases which hold that a bond exacted by a public officer, colore officii, is void, if it embrace conditions which he is not authorized to require, have no application to the case. U. S. v. Tingey, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 115; Hawes v. Marchant [Case No. 6,240]; U. S. v. Gordon [Id. 15,232].

On the other hand, in the case of U. S. v. Tingey [supra], in which the rule last mentioned is stated and applied, the opinion of the court distinctly and unequivocally declares, that "it would be very different where such a bond was, by mistake or otherwise, voluntarily substituted by the parties for the statute bond, without any coercion or extortion by color of office." In that case, the statute required that a purser should give bond "conditioned faithfully to perform all the duties of purser in the navy of the United States." The bond actually given was construed to require him to account for all moneys received by him, and for all public property committed to his care, whether officially as purser, or otherwise, and was deemed clearly not in the terms of the act, and Mr. Justice Story, in giving the opinion of the court, says: "Upon this posture of the case, a question has been made, and elaborately argued at the bar, how far a bond voluntarily given to the United States, and not prescribed by law, is a valid instrument, * * * in other words, whether the United States have, in their political capacity, a right to enter into a contract, or to take a bond, in cases not previously provided for by some law. Upon full consideration of this subject, we are of opinion, that the United States have such a capacity to enter into contracts." Upon further discussion, and full affirmance of this doctrine, the opinion of the court places the decision of the case upon the sole ground, that the bond was (as the demurrer was held to admit) required and extorted by the secretary of the navy, under color of office. Upon the principles declared in the opinion, it cannot be doubted, that, had the bond then in question been found a voluntary bond, executed without duress or requirement, it would have been binding according to its terms, and would have bound the sureties for any public property committed to the care of their principal.

The case of Speake v. U. S., 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 28, necessarily involves the same principle. There, the statute required the execution of a bond in double the value of a vessel cleared from a port of the United States. The defence was, that the bond in suit was taken in a greater sum. But, in the absence of allegations that it was unduly obtained by the collector, colore officii, by fraud, oppression, or circumvention, the sureties were estopped to allege that the value of the vessel and cargo was less than one-half the penalty. This, of course, affirms that the bond was valid according to its terms, and must operate according to its common-law import; whereas, if any excess in amount, though voluntarily inserted, would render it void, it could have no operation between the immediate parties, even by estoppel.

In the state of New York, the statute (2 Rev. Laws, p. 139, § 5) required the treasurer of a county to give a bond conditioned "that he shall well and faithfully execute the office of treasurer of such county, and pay all moneys which shall come to his hands as treasurer, according to law, and render a just and true account thereof to the said supervisors, or to the comptroller of the state." In Supervisors v. Van Campen, 3 Wend. 48, a bond executed by a county treasurer was held a valid bond, although, instead of being conditioned according to this specification in the statute, it was simply that the said M. V. C. "shall well, truly, and faithfully execute and perform the duties of treasurer of said county, according to law."

In U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 343, a bond voluntarily given by a paymaster, though not in conformity with the statute prescribing the bonds of such officers, was held valid, notwithstanding it purported to bind the sureties to a broader extent than the act prescribed. It is true, that, in that case, the breaches alleged were of the very condition which the statute required to be inserted in the bond, namely, that he account, &c.; and it was not necessary for the court to decide whether the sureties would be liable for a breach of duty mentioned in the condition of the bond, but not specified in the statute prescribing the condition; and the court, therefore, while they reaffirmed the doctrines of the opinion in U. S. v. Tingey, decided all that was material, when they held the bond valid as to the conditions prescribed by the statute, and effectual to charge the sureties for the breaches against which the prescribed bond was intended to protect the government.

It is to be observed, that the case now before us charges only breaches of the very condition mentioned in the statute (section 39), describing the bond to be given by a distiller; and we are, nevertheless, asked to hold, that, because the bond is conditioned for the performance of all the duties required of a distiller under the act, it is not good as to those duties which the statute requires shall be secured by bond.

The case of U. S. v. Linn, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 290, reaffirms, in a still stronger case, the validity of an instrument executed to the United States, not conforming to the statute requirements, and upon the principle of the case above stated.

I am quite aware, that it has been insisted, that, when a statutory bond contains conditions required by the act under which it is taken, and other conditions which are not so required, it is void as to the latter. See Armstrong v. U. S. [Case No. 549]; U. S. v. Howell [Id. 15,405]. And this proposition finds some color in the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in Dixon v. U. S. [Id. 3,934]. But, it will be seen, that, in that case, his language relates to conditions introduced by the officer taking the bond, under color of office, which conditions are not warranted by law, and that the point in judgment was, whether the bond was wholly void. And in U. S. v. —— [Id. 14,413] he held, in conformity with the remarks in the former case, that, in dealing with a statutory obligation, matter inserted in the obligation, which the statute did not require might be rejected as surplusage, and the bond stand valid for the residue. Observations of a similar purport appear in the opinion of Mr. Justice Story in U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 343, above referred to

This distinction may well exist where the bond has no legal existence except by force of the statute which has prescribed the taking of the bond; and, if it is applicable to all cases in which congress have assumed to direct the taking of a bond, it should not be applied to a bond in substantial conformity with the statute, and containing no condition that is not within the clear duty imposed by the act itself. But, conceding that the bond now in suit is to be tested by the views last adverted to, what conditions are inserted in it which the statute requiring the bond does not contemplate? The condition is, that the distiller shall truly and faithfully conform to all the provisions of the act of July 1, 1862 (being the act which authorizes the license to distill), and of such other act or acts as were then, or might thereafter be, in that (or this) behalf, enacted. Now, the 39th section of the statute does not provide for a bond to comply with future enactments. So far, then, as it relates to duties created by future statutes, let the words, "or might thereafter be," be struck out as surplusage, according to the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall. What, then, is embraced in the condition, which the statute did not prescribe? The duties of a distiller, in keeping books, and making entries therein, of the spirits distilled, and of the materials used, to be open to inspection, and in making returns to the collector, on the 1st, 10th, and 20th of each month, of sales made or spirits removed, and in paying the duties thereon, are prescribed in section 45 of the act, and almost in the words of the 39th section, which prescribes the bond to be given: and it is the violation of the requirements of this 45th section which constitutes the breach of the bond in suit. The bond clearly embraces the alleged defaults. The statute clearly requires that the bond shall be conditioned against such defaults. Had the bond been conditioned in the very words of the statute, it would have been broken by the alleged defaults on which the action is founded. There is no pretence that the defendants are now sought to be drawn into a new liability or subjected to one which the statute did not contemplate. Had the words of the statute been followed, the defendants would have been in the same condition in which they now are. It is the defendants who are seeking, on grounds highly technical, to avoid a just liability. Why, then, is not the bond effectual? It is said, that other violations of the act may be committed, which would be a breach of this general condition of the bond, and that the court cannot sustain the bond, because the language of the bond includes both indiscriminately. If the fact be as assumed, I could not assent to the inference.

The propositions stated are, that the conditions which are inserted in the bond, but which are not mentioned in the statute, are inoperative; that the general words of the bond include both; that the court cannot reform the language of the bond, and, to strike out any of the words, would be to destroy the whole condition; and that the court cannot, by construction, limit the operation of the bond to what it might lawfully require, and must, therefore, of necessity, hold the bond altogether void. This argument may be illustrated by an example. If the bond was, by the statute, required to enjoin obedience to the 45th section, and it was so drawn as to require obedience to the 45th and 56th, the court could treat all reference to the 56th as surplusage, and hold it good as to the requirements of the 45th, but, if in terms drawn so as to require obedience to all the provisions of the act, the court cannot regard any portion of it as surplusage, or limit its operation to the 45th, even though it should appear that only those two sections create or impose any duty. This does not seem to me reasonable, or as resting upon any sensible ground. In my judgment, the present case is fairly illustrated by the above example. I do not find in the act any duty imposed upon a distiller, in the behalf mentioned in the bond in this case, (except what is contained in the 56th section of the act,) which the bond prescribed in the 39th section, (and which, in every view, it was lawful to take,) does not embrace.

It was suggested, in the argument, that the bond, as now framed, would make failure to pay the license tax, to make manufacturer's returns, or to comply with the stamp act, breaches of the condition. Not so. They have no relation to the duties of distillers, as such. The distiller has not to make manufacturer's returns, other than what are mentioned in the 39th, 45th, and 56th sections. The single duty which I find imposed upon distillers, the performance of which is not required to be made by the 39th section a condition of the bond, is, that he will make monthly returns to the inspector. All else is properly embraced in the bond, as prescribed. The objection to the bond comes, then, to this—it is conditioned for conformity to all the requirements of the act. The section directing the giving of the bond does not require that the distiller shall give a bond conditioned to make the monthly returns to the inspector, and, in that respect, the bond in question exceeds the requirement. It seems to me more in accordance with good sense, with the maxim which prefers that "res magis valeat quam pereat," with the spirit and intent of the decisions above referred to, and with what is just to both parties, to say, that this bond is in substantial, though not literal, compliance with the statute; that it was voluntarily given, to secure what it was not only lawful, but the duty of the distiller, to do; that it was manifestly taken in good faith, for the single purpose of securing those things which it was intended such bond should secure, and has in it no taint of illegality whatever; and, finally, if its terms are so comprehensive as to embrace a duty to render an account, which duty, if separately specified, would have been rejected therefrom as an excess or surplusage, that it is our duty to regard the requirement embodied in the general words used as not, in point of law, including it, and to hold that the breach which is alleged, and which is clearly one which constitutes a breach of the bond described in the statute, is covered by the condition.

These views lead me to the conclusion that the plaintiffs should have judgment on the demurrer.

HALL, District Judge, did not concur in the foregoing opinion, but came to the conclusion that the defendants were entitled to judgment on the demurrer. See his opinion [Case No. 15,850a]. The case was then certified to the supreme court, upon a difference of opinion. In that court, the bond was held valid, in affirmance of the conclusion of Judge WOODRUFF, and, on the return of the mandate, judgment for the plaintiffs, on the demurrer, was ordered. [154 U. CRIMINAL LAW—INFORMATION—SIGNATURE OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

1. The fact that an indictment against a person has been quashed because of insufficient averments is no ground for quashing an information subsequently filed by the district attorney against the same person for the same offence.

2. It is no objection to an information filed in open court by the sworn assistant of the district attorney, that the signature of the district attorney to the information was written by such assistant by virtue of a general authority conferred upon him by the district attorney.

Sutherland Tenney, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Augustus F. Bays, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The fact that these same defendants were indicted by the grand jury for the same offence described in this information, which indictment was quashed because of insufficient averments, affords no ground whatever upon which to ask that this information be quashed. The district attorney had the right to proceed by information notwithstanding the fact that, on a former occasion, he had elected to proceed by indictment and had submitted the case to the consideration of a grand jury.

It is no objection to an information filed in

NON INTERCOURSE—PROHIBITED ARTICLES—CONTINUITY OF VOYAGE—INTENT IN LADING.

1. The prohibited articles, the importation or the putting on board of which, with intent to import the same, is made a cause of forfeiture by the 5th section of the act of March 1, 1809 [2 Stat. 529], are, as well those which are prohibited on account of the place at which they were laden, as those which are the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the offending nation.

2. Although the merchandise, which is the subject of this information, was landed, and the duties paid thereon, at Amelia Island, in Florida, and thence trans-shipped to Philadelphia—yet, as the goods were originally put on board the vessel, with intention to import them into the United States, no question can arise as to the continuity of the voyage; the offence under the law consisting, not in the importation, but in the intention with which the merchandise was put on board.

3. The non-importation law of March 2, 1811 [2 Stat. 651], which revived the act of March 1, 1809, the provisions of which extended to the possessions, as well as the colonies and dependencies, of Great Britain, did not extend to the possessions, but only to the colonies and dependencies of that power.

4. Malta was not a dependency of Great Britain.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. These are informations, filed on behalf of the United States, against the brig Nancy and her cargo, and also against the cargo of the Caroline, for breaches of the non-importation laws of the United States. The Nancy is claimed by an American citizen; and the goods in the two vessels are claimed by Willing & Francis, for themselves, and on account of certain persons residing at Malta. The facts, in these cases, are—that the goods imported into the port of Philadelphia in these vessels, were shipped at the island of Malta, in the ship Union, by the jurats of the university of the four cities of Malta, some time in the month of February, 1811, consigned to Willing & Francis at Philadelphia, to be sold by them, and the proceeds to be invested in a return cargo of flour. It appears, by the letters from the shippers of this cargo to their consignees, that in case the non-importation law as to Great Britain should be renewed, the Union, with the cargo on board, was to be ordered to Amelia Island, where her cargo was to be taken out and replaced by a cargo of flour, which the consignees were to send forward to that place. On the 6th of May, 1811, Willing & Francis received information of this consignment, and immediately sent orders to the master of the Union, who had then arrived on the coast of the United States, to proceed to Amelia Island; to which place, they informed him, they would despatch two vessels with flour, to load the Union, and also to receive her cargo to bring to Philadelphia. The flour was accordingly sent to Amelia Island in these two vessels, the Nancy and the Caroline, in which the cargo of the Union was imported into Philadelphia, some time in August, 1811. A pro forma decree having been made by the district court, dismissing the information [case unreported], appeals were entered to this court.

The questions arising in these causes, are—(1) Was the cargo of the Union, in whole or in part, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the island of Malta? (2) Was the importation into the United States to be considered as having been made from that island, or from Amelia Island? (3) Was the island of Malta a dependence of Great Britain?

1. As to the first question, there can be no doubt, upon the evidence, that the articles composing this cargo are not produced in the island of Malta for exportation; and that this particular cargo was imported into that island from Italy and other places, not belonging in any respect to the British government.

2. In order to arrive at a clear understanding of the subject, to be considered under the second head of argument; it will be proper to take a brief view of the different acts of congress, which interdicted commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain.

The act of March 1, 1809, prohibits, after the 20th of May following, the importation into the United States, of any goods, &c., wherever grown or manufactured, from any port or place situated in Great Britain, or France, or in any of the colonies, or dependencies; or in the actual possession of either of those nations. It also prohibits the importation of any goods, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of those countries, or of their colonies, dependencies, or places, in their actual possession, from any port whatever. The 5th section of this law declares, that all such prohibited articles, imported into the United States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act, or which should be put on board of any vessel, with intention of importing the same into the United States, together with all other articles on board of the same vessel, belonging to the owner of the prohibited articles; should be forfeited. The sixth section provides, that if the said prohibited articles should be put on board, with intent to import the same into the United States, with the knowledge of the owner, or master of such vessel, the vessel also should be forfeited. The operation of this law as against Great Britain, was suspended for a short time, by the president's proclamation, issued on the 19th of April, 1809 (5 Am. Reg.), in consequence of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine; and was to take effect on the 10th of June following—and was again revived by proclamation, dated the 9th of August, 1809. But it at length expired, by its own limitation, in May, 1810, no law having been passed, during that session, further to continue it. By the act of May 1, 1810 [2 Stat. 605], it was however declared, that in case either Great Britain or France should, before the 3d of March, 1811, so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States—which fact, the president was to declare, by proclamation; and if the other nation should not, within three months thereafter, do the same thing, in relation to her edicts, that the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, and 18th sections of the act of March 1, 1809, should, from the expiration of the said three months from the date of the said proclamation, be revived against the dominions, colonies, and dependencies, and the articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions, colonies, and dependencies of the nation so refusing, or neglecting to revoke, or modify her edicts; and that the restrictions imposed by this act, (which relate only to the prohibition of our waters to the armed vessels of those two nations,) should, from the date of the proclamation, cease, in relation to the nation so revoking her decrees. On the 2d of November, 1810, the president issued his proclamation, declaring that France had complied with the conditions of the law of the 1st of May, 1810; in consequence of which, the above sections of the act of March 1, 1809, were brought into operation against Great Britain, her colonies and dependencies, to take effect from the 2d of February, 1811, unless, before that time, Great Britain should repeal her offensive edicts. Then came the act of March 2, 1811, which enacted, that until the president should, by his proclamation, declare, that Great Britain had revoked, or so modified her edicts, as that they had ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the provisions of the above sections of March 1, 1809, should have full force, and be immediately carried into effect against Great Britain, her colonies and dependencies.

From this view of the above laws, the two following positions appear to the court to be perfectly clear; 1st, that the prohibited articles, the importation of which, or the putting on board of which, with intention to import the same into the United States, is made, by the fifth section of the act of the 1st of March, 1809, a cause of forfeiture, are, as well those which are prohibited on account of the place at which they were put on board, as those which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of the offending nation. The object of the law was to interdict all commerce with the ports, as well as in the products of Great Britain and France, so far as related to importations into the United States; and a violation, or intention to violate this policy of our government, was, in reason, as well as by the plain construction of the law, made punishable in either case. If then the island of Malta should be determined to be a prohibited place, and the intention of the owners of this cargo, at that place, was to import the same into the United States; or, without such intention being proved, the importation was made, either directly or indirectly; the forfeiture was complete, as soon as the cargo came within the jurisdiction of the United States, notwithstanding the landing, and paying of duties, at Amelia Island, and the trans-shipment at that place, for the port of Philadelphia. In the latter case, that is, of an original importation, from Malta to Amelia Island; there can be no doubt, but that if the cargo had been bona fide sold at Amelia Island, the purchaser might have imported it into the United States, without incurring a forfeiture; because the continuity of the voyage, from the forbidden place, would have been substantially broken, and not in form merely. Contrivances to evade a law, may sometimes be so deeply laid, as to elude detection, notwithstanding the strictest examination of all the circumstances that can be brought to light. But whenever it is made clearly to appear, that the law, in its obvious spirit and intention, has been violated by covert means, a court of justice would forget its duty, by affording its sanction to such contrivances. But, when it appears, that the cargo was originally put on board, with intent to import the same into the United States, no question, it is conceived, can arise, as to the continuity of the voyage; for here the offence consists, not in the importation, but in the intention with which the cargo was put on board. Now, as to the facts in this case, there can be no doubt. The letters from the owners at Malta, to their consignees, and from those consignees to the master of the Union, and to their agent at Amelia Island, as also to the person whom they sent in the Nancy—all prove clearly, that the cargo was put on board at Malta, with an intention to import the same into the United States; directly, if the laws would permit; and if not, then indirectly, by trans-shipping it at Amelia Island.

The second position which arises out of the view before taken, of the different acts of congress on this subject, is, that the non-importation law of March 1, 1809, which interdicted commerce with the possessions, as well as with the colonies and dependencies of Great Britain, was revived only against that nation, her colonies, and dependencies; and this conducts us to the third and most difficult question in the cause. Is Malta to be considered as a dependence of Great Britain? In deciding this question, the court has not had an opportunity to derive much information from books. The precise meaning of the word "dependency," as it is used by congress, in the law under consideration, cannot be ascertained with any degree of certainty. It may, however, be safely concluded, that it imports some civil and political relation, which one country bears to another, as its superior, different from that of a mere possession. The introduction of the words "actual possession," into the act of March 1, 1809, and the omission of them in that of May 1, 1810, afford strong evidence, that congress did not consider a dependency, as synonymous with a possession; but, on the contrary, the difference was so material, as to induce congress to sanction a trade with the former, which had been previously interdicted with both. As soon as this distinction is established, the mind of a legal man is irresistibly led to annex to the one, the idea of possession, accompanied by title, in opposition to a mere naked possession, obtained either by force, and against right, or rightfully acquired, and wrongfully withheld from the legal sovereign; and this, the court is strongly inclined to think, is the true definition of a dependency;—that is, a territory distinct from the country in which the supreme sovereign power resides, but belonging rightfully to it, and subject to the laws and regulations which the sovereign may think proper to prescribe. It is not a colony, because it is not settled by the citizens of the sovereign, or mother state; but it is lawfully acquired or held, and the people are as much subjects of the state which has thus obtained it, as if they had been born in the principal state, and had emigrated to the dependent territory. The usual ways by which such acquisitions are made, are by purchase, or by conquest in war. The first, being made with the consent of the sovereign, is permanent and indefeasible; but the latter is subject to uncertainty, and liable to restoration to the sovereign, from whom it was taken, unless confirmed by a treaty of peace, or unless it be voluntarily relinquished by such sovereign. When so confirmed, or relinquished, and not before, it seems to be, in the true sense of the word, a dependency; that is, it is durably incorporated into the dominions of the conqueror, and becomes a part of his territory, as to government and national right. Conquests in war, are, by the best authorities amongst elementary writers on national law, and according to the modern practice of nations, considered only as temporary possessions, held by force, and subject to be defeated by re-capture, or by the peace. Barbeyrac, in a note on part of the 8th chapter of Grotius, expresses the general idea on this subject. "But the object of a just war, does not require of itself, that one should acquire over the vanquished, an absolute and perpetual sovereignty. It is only a favourable opportunity of gaining dominion; and it requires always, beyond this, a consent either express, or tacit, of the conquered; otherwise a state of war always continues. The sovereignty of the conqueror, is nothing more than a title by force, and endures no longer than the conquered people are in a state of incapacity to throw off the yoke." "It is true," he adds, "that neutral powers are not to call in question this conquest, or say that it is unlawful, or the war unjust." But this does not alter the nature of the case, or give to the possession perpetual right and duration. It remains a conquest, liable to all the vicissitudes of war, and not a dependency—durably, legally, and indisputably attached. The dominion is only temporary, and it cannot be considered as a national territory and domain, being held on condition, and not in perpetual right. Vattel is full upon this subject. "Immovable lands, towns, provinces," &c. he says, "pass under the power of the enemy, who makes himself master of them; but it is only by the treaty of peace, or the entire submission and extinction of the state to which these towns and provinces belong, that the acquisition is completed, and the property becomes stable and perfect." Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 3, c. 13, § 197. So, also, section 198. See, also, Puff. Law Nat. bk. 8, c. 6, § 20.

It is not within the province of this court, to settle disputed rights between nations. But it is under the necessity of expounding laws, and of discovering, for our guidance, the meaning of the terms in which they are expressed. The court has not had an opportunity to enter into a minute investigation of the actual or political state of the island of Malta. But, on a general view of the books which detail its history, from the time it was invaded by the French, until the period when this shipment was made, it does not seem to have been at any time permanently or rightfully incorporated with the domains of Great Britain. It continues a possession, gained by conquest from France, and not from the people or ancient government of the island; and consequently, the law of nations imposed an obligation upon the conquerer to restore the island to the people, and not to bring it under subjection to a new master. Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 3, c. 13, § 203. The island appears to be under a military government, notwithstanding the commander is styled "civil governor," or "commissioner;" and the officers of police, and a judge of the admiralty, are appointed by the military and civil governor. See Eton's Materials for a History of Malta, p. 89. The ancient laws of the island, executed by native magistrates, are yet in force—as is often the case in conquered countries, held in temporary subjection. No doubt, these magistrates are subject to the power and control of the occupant by conquest, for the time being. But the natives have never ceased to claim an independent right to the government and soil; although, from a detestation of their former oppressors and perfidious betrayers, the knights of St. John, they have frequently requested, and have as often been denied, the privileges and laws enjoyed by British subjects. See Pasley, pp. 306, 390, 391, 31, Memorial of the Maltese Deputies. Nothing shows more strongly that they are not considered by Great Britain herself as part of her subjects, or the island as part of her territories. By the treaty of Amiens, (after the offer of the Maltese to place themselves under the British government,) the British administration agreed to re-deliver the island to the knights, contrary to every stipulation, actual or implied, with the inhabitants. Quart. Rev. 1813, pp. 4, 5. This was a breach of confidence, palliated by her own writers only on the principle of expediency, and the advantages to be derived to England, either positively, or as a prevention to its falling into the hands of the French, to whom the knights were alleged to be devoted. Still, however, Great Britain bound herself, by this treaty, to abandon any claim she might have acquired to the island, and to restore it to its ancient government. After this, her title by conquest, imperfect and defeasible as it was, changed entirely its character. Before this agreement to restore the island, she had but a mere possession; but that possession was rightful—the continuance of it, after the treaty, was wrongful.

Under all these circumstances, the court is of opinion, that the island of Malta has been, and now is, held by Great Britain, by force, without right, in direct contravention of a solemn treaty. It is not the period, long or short, of such forcible possession, but the stability and right of the occupant, which, in the opinion of the court, will satisfy the true meaning of the term "dependency." It is only a foreign possession, without certain permanence or settled right. The decree of the district court affirmed.

Case No. 15,855.

UNITED STATES v. NARVAEZ.

District Court, N. D. California. July 25, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—LOCATION OF QUANTITY—EXTENSION BEYOND BOUNDARIES OF GRANT—OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY—ESTOPPEL.

[A grantee reserved to himself a given quantity of the lands granted, and sold the excess. The purchasers of the excess themselves laid off the quantity reserved, and in so doing extended the line beyond the limits of the grant to include a strip of which the grantee had long maintained possession. Held, that the ancient possession and cultivation of this strip, the general recognition of the boundary by the grantee's neighbors, and impliedly by the former government in granting the adjoining ranch according to such boundary, the act of the purchasers of the excess in making the location, together with the fact that the United States did not complain thereof, was sufficient to warrant the court in confirming a survey which adopted the boundary in question.]

[This was a claim by José Augustin Narvaez for San Juan Bantista, two square leagues, in Monterey county, granted March 30, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to J. A. Narvaez. Claim filed February 27, 1852; rejected by the commission November 15, 1853; confirmed by the district court July 15, 1855. Case unreported. It is now heard upon objections to the survey. Vanderslice & Clarkson and Branham & Lewis, intervenors.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. By the final decree in this case there were confirmed to the claimant two square leagues of land to be located within the boundaries described in the grant. The petition of Narvaez to the board, after setting forth the grant, etc., represents that within its exterior boundaries are contained about three leagues and one-tenth. That he has caused two leagues to be accurately surveyed, and that the same are indicated by red lines on the map of the survey of the whole rancho, which he submits to the board. He therefore prays that his title may be decreed to be valid for all the land embraced within the exterior boundaries. But if the board should be of opinion that he is only entitled to two leagues, then that the said two leagues may be confirmed to him, and surveyed so as to embrace the land inclosed with red lines on the map. In the same case a supplemental petition was filed by Vanderslice & Clarkson. This petition, after setting forth the grant, and the ancient occupation and settlement of Narvaez, alleges that on the 11th April, 1850, Narvaez conveyed to the petitioners the whole of the said rancho, excepting two leagues, which he reserved to himself, and which were to be measured off by the petitioners; that this was done accordingly. The petitioners further represent that the original grant, the deed of Narvaez to themselves, and maps of the land claimed by them, with a duly authenticated plat of survey, are already on file in the case. They therefore pray that their title may be decreed to be valid to the whole of the land, excepting the two leagues set apart and measured off to Augustin Narvaez.

The deed from Narvaez to Vanderslice & Clarkson confirms the statements of their petition, and it expressly mentions that the land intended to be conveyed is the sobrante or excess above two leagues, which may be found within the exterior boundaries of the rancho.

It is evident that the claim of Narvaez was restricted to the two leagues which had been, in accordance with his agreement with Vanderslice & Clarkson, measured off to him, and which, on the map referred to, in both petitions, was indicated by red lines; while the claim of Vanderslice & Clarkson was for the sobrante, which on the same map is inclosed in green lines. By the final decree of this court the claim was confirmed to the extent of two leagues only. The application for a confirmation of the sobrante was therefore in effect rejected. There has accordingly been surveyed to Narvaez the two leagues reserved by himself, and in accordance with the plat of survey presented by him and by Vanderslice & Clarkson to the board. To this survey the United States make no objection. Objections, however, are filed by certain intervenors claiming under Vanderslice & Clarkson, and under another conveyance from Narvaez, which will hereafter be noticed.

It is urged that the two leagues are located to the north and west beyond the exterior limits of the diseño; that the boundary line on the northwest, thereon delineated, is not the Los Gatos creek, but an imaginary line to the southeast of it, and that the line of the survey should be drawn, as indicated by the diseño, so as to cross the Alisal at a point to the south of its present location. By thus cutting off a considerable tract to the northwest, the quantity of two leagues can only be obtained by a corresponding extension to the southeast, and thus a portion of the sobrante conveyed to Vanderslice & Clarkson will be included, which they, or their representatives, claim to hold by virtue of Narvaez deed. The inequitableness of this pretension is apparent. It is plain that Narvaez intended to sell, and Vanderslice & Clarkson supposed they were buying, only the excess over and above two leagues, which might be found within the exterior limits. The petition of Narvaez indicates, by the alternative form in which his prayer for confirmation is expressed, that he had little expectation that his title would be deemed valid for more than two leagues, and we may presume that the consideration paid for the assignment of his possible title to the sobrante was much less than the value of the land, if his title to it had been clear. If, in measuring off the two leagues and separating the sobrante, a mistake has been committed, it was the mistake of Vanderslice & Clarkson, by whom the measurement was made. Their claim to the tract, inclosed in green lines, proceeded on the hypothesis, and indeed the express allegation, that there had already been measured off within the exterior limits to Narvaez the two leagues reserved by him; and his claim to the tract within the red lines was, in like manner, founded on the idea that that tract was wholly within the exterior boundaries, and would constitute the two leagues which he reserved. When, therefore, the claim of Vanderslice & Clarkson for the sobrante was rejected, they lost all to which they could assert any title. And the speculation on which they bought the sobrante failed, it being decided that there was no sobrante which could have been conveyed to them.

The attempt now made by them, or their representatives, to change the location made by themselves of the two leagues reserved by Narvaez, and by making it include a part of what they acquired as a sobrante, claimed as a sobrante, and measured off under their deed, because it was a sobrante, seems to me palpably unjust. If successful, the effect would be to deprive Narvaez of a portion of the two leagues which it was well understood by all parties he was to retain, and, profiting by their own mistake in measuring the land, to permit them to acquire under a deed for the sobrante, or excess beyond two leagues, a portion of the two leagues which their grantor expressly reserved to himself. It seems to me that by their own measurement, plat, and survey, filed with the board, by the terms of their deed and their petition, they and their representatives are estopped to contend that the two leagues measured off to Narvaez were not correctly located, or that the land, or any part of it, deeded to them beyond the red lines, was a part of the two leagues reserved by Narvaez, or other than the sobrante or excess over and above those two leagues.

But the intervenors also claim the right to object to this survey by virtue of a conveyance from Narvaez to Isaac Branham and Jackson Lewis, of a certain portion of the rancho not included in the survey. In this conveyance the part of the description material to notice is as follows: "Thence southeasterly along said line to the southeast corner of the land of said Bassham; thence southwesterly along said Bassham's line, and in continuation thereof, until the same strikes or arrives at the original boundary line of the said Rancho San Juan Bantista or Narvaez Rancho; thence along and with the line of said original boundary of said Narvaez Rancho, in a southeasterly direction, to the Arroyo de los Capitancillos; thence down and along with said Arroyo," etc.

It is contended on the part of the claimants that the "original boundary line of the Narvaez Rancho, "referred to in this description, is the boundary of the rancho proper, as the same was established by the survey of Vanderslice & Clarkson; and that, therefore, the deed embraces no part of the sobrante, and all the land conveyed to Branham and Lewis is within the official survey. Hence they have no right or interest to object. On the other hand, it is urged that the reference to the original boundary line of the rancho is too explicit to be mistaken. That the land of Bassham extended to the boundary which divided the two leagues of Narvaez from the sobrante, and inasmuch as the deed describes the northerly line of the premises conveyed by it as running "along Bassham's line, and in continuation thereof, in the same direction," it must have been intended to run beyond the dividing line between the two leagues and the sobrante at which Bassham's line stopped. To this it is replied that the westerly line is described as "running with said original boundary line in a southeasterly direction to the Arroyo de los Capitancillos;" and that the exterior boundary line cannot be meant, for that line runs in a direction nearly due south, and terminates at the Sierra Azul, and not at the Arroyo de los Capitancillos. It is also urged that, even if a portion of the sobrante conveyed to Clarkson & Vanderslice be included within the boundaries mentioned in the deed, that instrument, by an express exception, excludes from its operation "all lands or portions of the same included in the description, which may have heretofore been legally and properly sold by the said parties of the first part, and in accordance with law."

It is certainly not easy, if the line referred to in this description be the boundary of the two leagues measured to Narvaez, to account for that part of the description which calls for a boundary along said Bassham's line, and in continuation thereof, until it strikes or arrives at the original boundary line of the Narvaez. On the other hand, if the exterior boundary be meant, that boundary corresponds, neither in its course or points of termination, with the description of it in the deed; for it is described as running in a southeasterly direction, and terminating at the Capitancillos creek, whereas the exterior boundary of the rancho, or the line of Hernandez, runs in a nearly southerly direction, and terminates at the sierra.

Mr. Bassham, by whom, as agent for Narvaez, the negotiations were made and the sale effected, swears that it was well known to all parties that the land beyond the boundary of the two leagues had already been sold to Vanderslice & Clarkson, and that the reservation in the deed was understood to apply to that land, if any of it were embraced within the general description. The tract officially surveyed to the claimant is precisely that measured off for him by Vanderslice & Clarkson, and for which his claim was presented to the board. The grant describes the disputed boundary "as the place or rancho of Hernandez, and the Pueblo of San José, without passing the Alizal which pertains to the latter." The line of Hernandez is not disputed. It forms the western boundary of the rancho. The only designation of the northern boundary, which is the boundary in controversy, is the call for the "Pueblo without passing the Alizal." But the Pueblo and Alizal can only serve as a limit on the easterly end of the northern boundary. For the location of the remainder of that line we must have recourse to the diseño. On this diseño we find a dotted line, which, on its upper or western portion, was evidently intended to indicate the boundary of Hernandez; but the lower or northwestern and northern portions seem equally clear to have been drawn to mark the limits of the rancho in those directions. This line is at a considerable distance to the south of the Gatos creek, and if this indication be scrupulously observed, that creek cannot be reached. It has, notwithstanding, been taken as a boundary in the official survey; and the line, when produced across the Monte, includes a larger portion of the Alizal, and strikes the Guadalupe creek at a greater distance from the San Juan Bantista hills, than would seem to be warranted either by the delineation on the diseño, or the calls of the grant. This strip of land lying along the "Gatos" appears to have been from an early period occupied, and a portion of it cultivated, by the grantee. At a place within it, called the "Abra," he established one of his sons; and the "Gatos" seems to have been generally recognized as his boundary by his neighbors. At the time he obtained his title, the grant to Hernandez had already been made. This latter rancho lay at the base of the sierra, and extended on both sides of the Gatos, a considerable distance down that stream. The diagonal dotted line, on the westerly corner of the diseño, was intended to mark the boundary of Hernandez. But Hernandez' land does not extend along the creek the whole distance from the sierra to its mouth, and there would seem to have been no motive for assigning to Narvaez an imaginary and arbitrary line for a boundary, instead of allowing [him] to come to the creek below the line of Hernandez, and where he would interfere with no one. The only boundary on this side, mentioned in the grant, is the pueblo of San José; and it appears that out of the lands of that pueblo a grant of a place called "Los Coches" was subsequently made, the diseño of which shows that it lay below the rancho of Hernandez, and on the lower portion of the Gatos. But that creek forms its southern boundary, and is inserted "Arroyo de la Mojonera," a circumstance which may justify the inference that the government, when granting Los Coches up to the Gatos, and no further, supposed that the rancho of Narvaez, on the opposite side of the creek, also extended to it. Such seems to have been the understanding, not only of Narvaez himself but of the vecinos and colindantes; and, as before remarked, the principal part of his cultivation was on lands between the dotted line and the creek.

As early as 1850, the survey of Day was made, which was intended to segregate the two leagues reserved by Narvaez from the sobrante conveyed by him to Vanderslice & Clarkson. The location appears to have been acquiesced in by all parties. No objection to it is made by the United States, or by any colindante. The only exception to it is taken by parties who acquired their interests with full notice and understanding that any lands outside of this location were conveyed as part of the sobrante, and that no title passed unless it should be held that the grant to Narvaez was not restricted to the quantity of two leagues, but embraced all the land within the exterior boundaries.

For the reasons already given, it has appeared to me that the representatives of the grantees of the sobrante cannot now be heard to object to the location made by themselves, and on the faith of the correctness of which, the supposed sobrante was conveyed to them. The right of the representatives of Branham to object is more open to debate. But it has seemed to me that the deed to him, as limited by the reservation contained in it, cannot be construed to embrace any lands not included within the two leagues which had been measured off to Narvaez; and, even if any such lands were included, that it was understood that they were to be taken out of what was recognized on all hands as the sobrante.

I am aware that to confirm a location which extends beyond the exterior limits of the diseño or grant is an apparent departure from the principle by which the court is required to be governed. But in this class of cases no rule can be inflexibly observed, nor any principle be of universal application. The whole of the two leagues measured off to Narvaez has been sold, and the contest is, in effect, between those who have bought the land claimed to be without the external boundaries and those who have bought lands supposed to be part of the sobrante. The ancient possession and cultivation of Narvaez—the general recognition of his boundaries by his neighbors—and impliedly by the former government in their grant of the adjoining rancho of Los Coches—and the express and emphatic recognition and adoption of the same boundaries by the purchasers of the sobrante when laying off the two leagues reserved by Narvaez, with the fact that if these boundaries be now changed the practical effect will be to deprive the representatives of Narveaz of a part of the two leagues intended to be reserved, and to give to the intervenors, as a part of the rancho proper, lands that they bought as a sobrante,—these considerations, and the fact that the United States acquiesces in the location, and that no colindante objects, have led me to the conclusion that I ought not to disturb a location so long recognized, and which there can be no doubt would have been adopted and confirmed by the former government, or by the officer giving judicial possession, if called on to perform that duty. I think, therefore, that the survey should be approved.

Since the foregoing opinion was delivered, it has been suggested to the court that the official survey does not exactly conform to the division of the rancho made in pursuance of the deed to Vanderslice & Clarkson. Leave was therefore given to the counsel for the claimant, by whom the slight discrepancy had been overlooked, to file objections to the official survey nunc pro tunc; and, in accordance with the views expressed in the opinion, the survey must be modified so as in all respects to conform to the lines agreed upon as has been stated.

February 3d, 1863.—It having been found that the modification of the survey above indicated will embrace lands now occupied by certain parties claiming under the United States, and the intervenors Easeley et als., through their counsel, J. J. Williams, Esq., having signified to the court their willingness to waive any modification of the official [survey], and to accept the same as a correct and proper survey of said rancho, and the United States having opposed no objection to an approval of the same, it is now, on motion of Mr. Williams, ordered that he have leave to withdraw the exceptions of Mr. Easeley to said survey heretofore allowed to be filed nunc pro tunc—and that a decree be entered approving said official survey as returned into this court.

Case No. 15,856.

UNITED STATES v. NASH et al.

[4 Cliff. 107.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1869.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—TENDER—WAIVER—WEIGHTS—PRINCIPAL MARKETS—TEAS.

1. Under § 18, 13 Stat. 216, teas imported from London were subject to a duty of 25 cents per pound, and also 20 per cent ad valorem.

2. Certain importers of teas stated to a deputy collector of customs that they would make a tender of a certain amount of duties due on the same, and he told them they need not do so, as he would acknowledge the tender. Held, no tender, especially as none was pleaded.

3. A deputy collector of customs has no authority to make such a waiver.

4. When teas are bought in England for export, what is delivered as one hundred pounds actually weighs more, and importers into this country reckon their profits with reference to the difference between the weight there and here. Held, that the customs officers here were not bound by the invoice weight.

5. Ad valorem duties, where they are required to be assessed on a given weight, must be so assessed on the actual weight when landed, as ascertained by the proper officer of the customs.

6. Appraisers determine the actual market value, or wholesale price, of the merchandise in the principal markets of the country from which the same were imported; but they have no authority to determine the weight or quantity of the importation.

7. Appraisers must determine what are the principal markets of the country from which the goods were imported, in order to determine what was the actual market value or wholesale price there at the period of exportation; but their powers do not authorize them to extend their inquiries beyond what is necessary to enable them to appraise the value of the merchandise as required by law.

8. Although included in the invoice, goods lost on the voyage are not subject to duty.

[Cited in Balfour v. Sullivan, 17 Fed. 232. Distinguished in U. S. v. Bache, 8 C. C. A. 258, 59 Fed. 764.]

9. Where the United States weigher ascertained the exact weight of the teas, the collector was bound to adopt that quantity, and the value ascertained by the appraiser as the legal basis for the assessment of the duties.

The case was submitted on the following facts agreed: This was an action of assumpsit to recover the sum of $1,048.25 in coin, with interest from Dec. 4, 1865, the time when payment of said sum was demanded of the defendants [Nathaniel C. Nash, Spaulding & Co.] by the United States. The defendants imported into New York, per ship "Cella," from London, Sept. 20, 1865, a lot of teas, of different grades and prices, purchased by them and invoiced to them in London as 2,558 packages, 100,179 pounds, at a total cost of £8,030. 13s. 10d. The same were entered for consumption by the defendants at the port of New York, Sept. 20, 1865. The proper samples and the invoice were sent to the appraisers, who appraised the same and reported invoice value correct by writing on the back of the invoice the word "correct" and signing the same. The teas were then duly weighed by the United States weigher in New York, and he reported the weight to be 103,808 pounds avoirdupois. The estimated duty of 25 cents per pound on 100,179 pounds ($25,044.75) and 10% ad valorem on £8,030. 13s. 10d. ($38,869÷10=$3,886.90), being the number of pounds, and the value named in the invoice, amounting to $28,931.65, was paid by the defendants, and the teas were delivered to them, the United States not thereby waiving any claim for duties.

On the receipt of the reports of the appraisers and weigher, the collector of the port of New York assessed the duty and liquidated the entry, Dec. 4, 1865, as follows: 25 cents per lb. on 103,808 lbs., $25,952.00; less already paid (25 cents on 100,179 lbs.), $25,044.75,—due, $907.25. Multiplying the value per pound as stated in the invoice by the number of pounds reported by the weigher as the weight of the several packages, the collector estimated the value of the teas to be $40,279, on which he assessed a duty of 10%, $4,027.90; less amount already paid, $3,886.90,—$141.00. And he claimed that there was due to the United States $1,048.25 in coin.

The defendants offered to pay the said sum of $907.25 in coin, and saw Mr. Hanscom, then the deputy-collector in New York, and said to him they had that amount of gold, which they admitted was due the United States, and would make the tender of it; to which he replied that they need not do that, as the government would acknowledge the tender, and that suit should be brought, merely to settle the matter in dispute. This sum the collector refused to receive. No money was paid into court.

The defendants duly protested, and appealed to the secretary of the treasury, whereupon the secretary affirmed the decision of the collector. This suit is brought to recover said $1,048.25.

The 2,558 packages imported and weighed at the custom-house were the same packages which the defendants purchased in London for the said sum of £8,030. 13s. 10d., and which they expected to receive, which the seller intended to deliver to them, and which were in fact delivered to them, as and for the weight and price in said invoice mentioned. The purchase was made at the actual market rate in London, and the invoice contained all charges and commissions that ought to be included, and there was no change in the market rate at London up to the time of shipment. The standard pound avoirdupois fixed by law in England and the United States is the same. The weighing at the custom-house gives the exact weight in pounds avoirdupois. Although the standard pound is the same in England as in America, by the general custom and usages of the exporting and importing trade, well known to merchants in the United States and in England, better weight is given in England than in America, so that what is bought for and delivered in England as one hundred pounds of tea weighs more than one hundred pounds exact weight, and it is in consequence of this customary and usual mode of weighing in England, that the weight of the tea in New York was found to be greater than the invoice weight, which is its weight in England. Purchases and sales are always made, and prices quoted and stated in England, with reference to the manner of weighing in England, and importers in the United States reckon their profits with reference to the difference between the English weight and the American weight. The court was to draw any inference which a jury would be authorized to draw, might hear and determine any facts it deemed material not herein agreed without the intervention of a jury, and might render such a judgment as the law requires. The teas were all goods, wares, and merchandise of the growth and produce of countries east of the Cape of Good Hope, and were imported from a place west of the Cape of Good Hope.

W. A. Field, Asst. U. S. Atty.
J. J. Storrow, for defendants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Merchandise of the growth or produce of countries east of the Cape of Good Hope, except raw cotton, was subject to a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, in addition to the duties imposed on any such articles when imported directly from the place or places of their growth or production. 13 Stat. 216, § 18. Id. 493, § 6. When imported directly from the country of their growth or production, teas were subject to a duty of 25 cents per pound. 13 Stat. 203, § 1. Imported as these teas were from London, they were subject to the duty of 25 cents per pound, and also to the duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, because not imported directly from the country of their growth or production. The amount of duties is estimated on the number of pounds, and the value of the merchandise, as given in the invoice, was $28,931.65; and the defendants paid that amount, and the teas were delivered to them, the United States not thereby waiving any claims for any balance that might be due. Payment of the estimated amount of the duties does not affect the rights of the parties in this suit, nor does the delivery of the importation, as the payment and delivery were made with the understanding that neither party waived any of their legal rights. On receipt of the report of the appraisers and the weigher, the collector assessed the duties in conformity to those reports. Adjusted in that manner, the balance due, as specific duties, was $907.25, and the balance due for the ad valorem duties was $141.00, making in all the precise sum claimed by the plaintiffs in their writ and declaration.

The defendants admitted that the amount claimed, as the balance for the specific duties, was due to the plaintiffs, and offered to pay it; but the collector refused to receive payment of that sum unless the other sum claimed was paid at the same time. They stated to the deputy-collector that they had that amount of gold, and that they would make a tende· of it, to which he replied, that they need not do that, as the government would acknowledge the tender. No other tender was made, and no money has been paid into court. Argument to show that the conversation between the defendants and the deputy-collector was not equivalent to a tender is unnecessary, as the statement of what occurred is sufficient to disprove any such theory. Authority to make such a waiver is not vested in the deputy-collector, and if it was, the conversation was too indefinite to amount to any such agreement. Apart, therefore, from the question as to the sufficiency of the sum which the defendants offered to pay, it is quite clear that the conversation between them and the deputy-collector, cannot avail them as a tender, especially as no tender was pleaded, and no money was paid into court. Tender of the whole amount claimed is not pretended, and if it was, the proposition could not be adopted, as it would find no support in the evidence. Unable to make any satisfactory adjustment with the plaintiffs, the defendants protested against the action of the collector, and appealed to the secretary of the treasury, and the department affirmed the decision of the collector. They protested against the doings of the collector, upon the ground that the weight of the teas, as reported by the weigher, was excessive, and they now contend that the plaintiffs, under the circumstances of the case, were bound by the weight as expressed in the invoice.

Fraud is not imputed to the defendants in respect to the invoice. On the contrary, the parties agree that by the general custom and usage of the exporting and importing trade, well known to merchants engaged in the trade, better weight is given in England than in the United States, so what is bought for and delivered in England as one hundred pounds of tea, actually weighs more than one hundred pounds, and that it was in consequence of that custom and usual mode of weighing there, that the weight of the tea here was found to be greater than the invoice weight Purchases and sales are always made, and prices are quoted and stated in England with reference to the manner of weighing in that country, and importers here, as the agreed statement shows, reckon their profits with reference to the difference between the weight there and in this country. But the standard pound avoirdupois is the same in both countries, and much of the difference in the result, as shown in this case, arose from the fact that the weigher here weighed a large number of the packages at one draft, instead of weighing each package separately, as the practice is in England. Some allowance is necessarily made for draft, in order to secure good weight; and the greater the number of the drafts, the greater must be the aggregate of the allowance, to secure that object. But ad valorem duties, where they are required to be assessed on a given weight, must be assessed upon the actual weight when landed, as ascertained by the proper officer of the customs. Appraisers determine the actual market value or wholesale price of the merchandise, in the principal markets of the country from which the same was imported; but they have no authority to determine the weight or quantity of the importation. They must determine what are the principal markets of the country from which the goods were imported, in order to determine what was the actual market value or wholesale price there at the period of exportation; but their powers do not authorize them to extend their inquiries beyond what is necessary to enable them to appraise the value of the merchandise as required by law. Stairs v. Peaslee, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 521; Marriott v. Brune, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 619; U. S. v. Southmayd, Id. 637; Lawrence v. Caswell, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 488; Belcher v. Linn, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 508. Goods lost on the voyage are not subject to duty, although included in the invoice; and goods imported are subject, though not included in the invoice.

Guided by these rules, it is clear that the court must give judgment for the plaintiffs, as the parties agree that the United States weigher ascertained the exact weight of the teas. Such being the case, the collector was bound to adopt that quantity, and the value ascertained by the appraisers, as the legal basis for the assessment of the duties.

SLAVE TRADE—STATUTES.

History and construction of the statutes in relation to the slave trade. Act March 22, 1794 [1 Stat. 347], is still in force.

At law.

BETTS, District Judge. The defendant was arrested upon capias for a fine and penalty imposed by the act of congress of March 22, 1794 (1 Stat. 349–352), and is held to bail upon the arrest under an order of a judge of the court. He now applies to the court to discharge the arrest and action on the ground that the act of 1794 is no longer in force. The statute has not been expressly repealed by congress, but the argument insists that the subsequent legislation on the matter amounts to a repeal by implication. A collation of the statutory provisions on the subject will bring the point distinctly to view, and tend to solve the question more satisfactorily than a diffuse dissertation upon the general theme touching the operation of posterior enactments in working a repeal of antecedent ones. The provisions of the act of 1794 relate (1) to the consequences to the ship, directing if the master, factor or owner shall build, equip, load, or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel within the United States, or shall cause her to sail from any port of the United States for the purpose of procuring from any foreign country inhabitants thereof, to be transported to any foreign country, to be sold as slaves, &c., the penalty of forfeiture of the vessel. (2) The punishment of every person "so building, fitting out, equipping, loading, or otherwise preparing or sending away any ship or vessel, knowing or intending that the same shall be employed in such trade or business," penalty $200 fine. Vessels suspected of being intended for the slave trade, required to give bonds on clearing out for the coast of Africa not to receive natives of the coast on board within nine months. A forfeiture imposed of $200 each for all persons taken on board for the purpose of selling them as slaves. The title of the act is "An act to prohibit carrying on of the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country." The succeeding act of March 2, 1807 [2 Stat. 426], is entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States," &c. The act in ten consecutive sections enacts provisions for enforcing that purpose. The second and third sections adopt the language of the first and second sections of the act of 1794, with the difference that the prohibition in one applies to transporting persons from one foreign place to another, to be held and sold as slaves, and in the other the particular classes of persons are designated, and the prohibition is for causing them to be transported to any place within the United States, to be sold and held as slaves. The penalty upon the ship is the same in each statute, but, on the persons, the fine in the act of 1807 is $20,000.

This statement of the provisions of the two statutes demonstrates that they no way conflict with each other. They look to wholly different objects, and are leveled against distinct offences,—the first acting against the slave trade abroad and applying to the transportation of inhabitants of one foreign country to be sold to slavery in another foreign country, without discrimination of color; and the other being limited to negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, and the dispatch of vessels from the United States to any foreign port or place for the purpose of procuring such persons to be transported from such foreign country to the United States, to be held to service or labor. The interpretation of the latter act, as operating a repeal of the former, contended for by the defendant, cannot, accordingly, be maintained. The act of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 450], is entitled "An act to prohibit the introduction (importation) of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, &c., and to repeal certain parts of the same," and by the tenth section the first six sections of the act of 1807 are repealed. Within those repealed sections are included the provisions above adverted to, and it is manifest that, inasmuch as they did not when in force affect the enactments in the act of 1794 upon a correlative subject, their absolute repeal can have no legal bearing upon those enactments. Congress framed the two statutes diverso intuitu, the one in relation to the foreign slave trade, and the other to the domestic. The act of 1818, as its title denotes, has exclusive reference to the importation of slaves into the United States. It goes beyond the repealed act of 1807, in embracing foreign vessels in the interdiction, but it introduces no description of offences which are prohibited by the act of 1794. Its enactments may be so directly in pari materia with those included in the repealed sections of the act of 1807, as to amount to an implied repeal of those provisions, if no express repeal had been declared, but as before shown, the existence or removal of the act of 1807 no way touches the act of 1794, in the particulars in question.

It is to be observed that there is a further radical distinction between the enactments on this subject in both the preceding acts. The offence therein created and described, upon which the pecuniary punishment was to be inflicted, was the fitting out or sending away a vessel, "knowing or intending that she should be employed" in such trade or business. But in the act of 1818 the offence consists in fitting out or sending away the vessel, or procuring it to be done, "with intent to employ such ship or vessel in such trade or business." The distinction between these transactions is palpable. The guilt of the one is equipping or sending away a vessel for the purpose of enabling third persons to employ her in the forbidden traffic; and of the other, the immediate and personal participation in the crime by the party accused, —fitting out or sending away the vessel with intent to employ her in the illicit trade. The supreme court regards this distinction as cardinal, and holds that the two phrases are not convertible in a true interpretation of the act of congress. U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460. I am, therefore, of opinion that the act of congress of March 22, 1794 (section 2), upon which this action is founded, remains in full force.

The motions on the part of the defendant are accordingly denied.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1821.

WITNESS—COMPETENCY—FREE NEGRO.

A free colored man who has resided in this district eight years, and publicly acted as a freeman, and so generally reputed to be, is a competent witness for the United States against a free colored person.

Indictment for assault and battery.

THE COURT permitted Edward Pleasants, a black man, to be sworn as a witness for the United States, after proof that he had publicly lived and acted as a freeman for eight years, and was generally reputed to be free.

UNITED STATES v. NEID.

[28 Leg. Int. 36; [2] 8 Phila. 169; 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 28.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE ACT—MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF CIGARS.

[Where cigars are made in the back part of a room, and sold in the front part thereof, the back part is to be regarded as a manufactory, and no cigars can be removed therefrom to the front part without first branding and stamping them.]

McCANDLESS, District Judge. Julius Neid was indicted in the United States district court at Erie for violations of sections 78, 82, 86, and 89 of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 125]. The indictment contains five counts: (1) Manufacturing cigars without posting the collector's certificate of the number of cigar makers for whom bond had been given. (2) Not keeping correct books. (3) Removing cigars from the "place of manufacture" to the "place of sale" without the stamps, marks, brands, etc., required by law. (4) Selling manufactured tobacco not stamped. (5) Not placing manufacturer's notice on cigar boxes. H. C. Rogers, the collector of the Nineteenth district, accompanied by J. H. Manley, revenue detective assigned to the Western district of Pennsylvania, visited the manufactory of Julius Neid, in the city of Erie, on the 29th of December. The retail department and manufactory were in the same room. Along one side of the room, toward the rear end, were the tables or benches where the cigars were made. On the other side was a counter and show-case, with shelves. On these shelves they found thirty-five boxes of cigars unstamped, and only one of them had the manufacturer's notice. They found a caddy of tobacco open, with part of the tobacco gone, and no stamp upon it.

[2] [Reprinted from 28 Leg. Int. 36, by permission.]

Also two glass jars upon the shelf with plug tobacco in them. There was no collector's certificate posted on the wall. The stamp account showed that he had purchased stamps for 230,700 cigars—while his books showed the sale of 251,800, leaving a discrepancy of some 18,000 cigars, for which no stamps had been bought. The last entry of cigars made, was on Sunday, December 18, 1870. Various lots of tobacco were purchased by him, and not entered in his book.

The defence, which was conducted by E. Camphausen, Esq., turned chiefly on the third count. It was alleged that the whole room was the manufactory—that the cigars found on the shelves were placed there to dry—that none were sold, or removed from the room without stamps, etc.

District Attorney Swoope contended that a fair and proper construction of the act of congress required that the place of manufacture should be kept separate and apart from "the place of sale;" that if both branches of the business were carried on in the same room, there must be a dividing line, and that boxes of cigars could not be placed on shelves where other articles were exposed for sale, until they were stamped, marked, and branded according to law.

McCANDLESS, District Judge, charged the jury substantially as follows:

The defendant is indicted for five distinct offences under the act of congress regulating the manufacture and sale of tobacco and cigars. It may seem to you trifling and unimportant that all these minute details should be specified in an act of congress, or that the government should take cognizance of these apparently mere technical violations of law. But in no other way could the revenue, the great bulk of which is properly derived from liquors and tobacco, be collected. In this case you observe that some 18,000 cigars have been made on which no tax had been paid. When you consider the number of similar establishments all over the land, you can form a proximate idea of the immense aggregate out of which the government would be defrauded. Hence the necessity for these minute specifications in the act of congress, and in the regulations made by the treasury department, which are in effect a part of the law itself. They are designed to secure the collection of the revenue, and would simply prove abortive if they were suffered to be disregarded and disobeyed. The facts, gentlemen, are for you, and you must say whether the defendant is guilty of these several charges, and before you can pronounce him guilty you must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt. The defense seems to have been directed more especially to the third count in the indictment, which charges the defendant with the removal of cigars from the place of manufacture without the stamps, marks, and brands, required by law. In McDonald's Case, tried at Pittsburgh, there was a board partition between the place where the cigars were made and where they were sold. The evidence in that case further showed that a work bench was placed in the front room, where one of the hands, when not engaged in retailing, manufactured cigars. We held there that the back room, notwithstanding the bench in the front room, was the manufactory. [Case unreported.] In the case now under consideration, there was no partition—the cigars were made in the back part of the room, and sold in the front. We instruct you that the back part is the manufactory, and no cigars can be removed from that part of the building to the place where they are offered for sale, although it may be in the same room, without first branding and stamping them. Any other construction of the law and the regulations of the department, would deprive the government of a large portion of its legitimate revenue.

The jury, after a brief absence, returned a verdict of guilty on all the counts.

Case No. 15,861.

UNITED STATES v. NELSON.

[1 Abb. (U. S.) 135.] [1]

District Court, W. D. Michigan. Oct. Term, 1867.

COUNTERFEITING—SELLING SPURIOUS NOTES.

1. Under a statute which punishes one who shall "utter" or "pass" spurious notes, knowing them to be such, with intent to defraud, and which does not in terms require that they be uttered as true or genuine (Act June 30, 1864; 13 Stat. 221, § 10), a defendant may be convicted of uttering or passing, upon proof that he sold and delivered the notes as spurious notes to another person with intent that they should be passed upon the public as genuine.

[Cited in State v. Painter, 67 Mo. 87. Distinguished in State v. Watson, 65 Mo. 120.]

2. The words "uttering" and "passing," used of notes, do not necessarily import that they are transferred as genuine; the terms include any delivery of a note to another for value, with intent that it shall be put into circulation as money.

3. The fact that other provisions of statute exist which expressly provide a punishment for selling spurious notes, does not prevent convicting a defendant under an indictment for passing, uttering, and publishing such notes, upon proof that he sold them as spurious, with intent that the purchaser should cause them to be put in circulation as genuine.

Motion for a new trial upon an indictment.

WITHEY, District Judge. The respondent, Theodore Nelson, was indicted in May last, and tried at the present October term on a charge of passing, uttering, and publishing a counterfeit United States fractional note with intent to defraud the United States. The trial consumed ten days, and resulted in a verdict of guilty.

At the coming in of the verdict, a motion was made for a new trial, on the ground of evidence improperly admitted. The proof was, that a person employed by the government officials, as a detective for the purpose, applied to Nelson for counterfeit money, to be, by the detective, put in circulation.

Negotiations were had between them, and resulted in Nelson selling to Mitchell, the detective, four hundred and ten dollars of spurious United States notes, for which he received in good money and a promissory note, one hundred and thirty-three dollars.

When the testimony was offered objection was made, that on a charge for passing, proof of selling was not admissible. The objection was overruled, and the testimony admitted. It is this ruling that forms the basis of the motion for a new trial.

It is urged by learned counsel in behalf of the respondent, that it is no offense, under the act of June 30, 1864, to utter, pass, and publish counterfeit notes as and for spurious; that the offense charged is committed only when the notes are passed, uttered, or published as true; that the words "pass," "utter," "publish," import "as true;" that to pass is to put into circulation, as Worcester defines "pass," and therefore to dispose of false notes as and for spurious is not passing, —i. e., is not putting them into circulation.

It is said that congress has by another statute, viz: the act of February 5, 1867 [14 Stat. 383], created the offense of selling, under which Nelson might and should have been indicted; hence selling spurious notes is a distinct offense for which there can be no conviction under a charge of having passed, uttered, and published; that the charge should have been for selling.

It is true, that it has been held that uttering is a declaration that the note is good, and that to offer it as genuine is an uttering—that to constitute an uttering there must be an intent to pass the note as good. U. S. v. Mitchell [Case No. 15,787], and cases there cited.

But what is the statute under which the indictment is found, and what its meaning? The act of June 30, 1864, defines the offense to be, "to utter, pass, publish, or sell counterfeit United States notes, knowing them to be such, with intent to deceive or defraud." There is an omission of the words "as true or genuine," or any equivalent words.

Whatever reason may have existed in the mind of the pleader who drafted the indictment for omitting to charge the respondent with having sold the notes, is not important to know. The single question which I find it necessary to determine is, whether, under the statute last referred to, any delivery of a spurious note to another for value, for the object or purpose of being passed or put into circulation as and for money, is a passing within the meaning of the act of congress.

Mr. Justice Baldwin, in the case referred to, says: "The note is uttered when it is delivered for the purpose of being passed. When put off it is passed." In the case of State v. Wilkins, 17 Vt. 151, the indictment charged the defendant with having "uttered, passed, and given in payment one certain false, forged, and counterfeited bank note, with intent to defraud;" and the supreme court say: "It is objected to this indictment that it is not alleged that the bill was passed as a true bill." The court also remark, the statute 15 Geo. II. provided "that if a person should utter or tender in payment any false or counterfeit money, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, he should on conviction be subject to certain penalties." Under this statute, in the case of Rex v. Franks, 2 Leach, 644, the indictment charged the respondent simply with uttering a piece of false and counterfeit money, and it was held that the offense was complete, even though it was uttered as base coin. In that case the indictment did not state the uttering to have been in payment as and for a piece of good money, and if it had, the evidence in the case would have rebutted the charge. The court further on say, neither in the statute of 1818, nor in the Revised Statutes of Vermont, is it made a part of the description of the offense that the counterfeit bill should have been uttered, passed, or given in payment as and for a true bill; and the court held the indictment good.

Again, in the case of Hopkins v. Com., 3 Metc. (Mass.) 460, when the statutory offense was having in possession any counterfeit bank bills, with intent to pass, knowing the same to be counterfeit, and the indictment charged in the language of the statute, the supreme court of Massachusetts say the omission of the words "as true," strengthens the conclusion that the legislature intended to prohibit the passing of counterfeit bills as money, or to be used or passed as money, by any person at any rate of discount, or otherwise, whether as between him and the immediate receiver they were passed as true or not.

And further on in the case, the court say: "The word 'pass,' as used in the statute, and generally as applied to bank notes, is technical, and means to deliver them as money, or as a known and conventional substitute for money." And therefore to sustain such indictment,—i. e., an indictment for passing, —"it must be proved that the party who is charged, passed the counterfeit bill to another for some valuable consideration, or otherwise as for money, or as to be used for money, with the guilty purpose of defrauding the community."

I find no case in conflict with those I have referred to; hence the conclusion at which I arrived when the question arose on the trial is not shaken but confirmed.

The congress of the United States has defined it an offense to utter, pass, publish, or sell a counterfeit United States note, with intent to deceive or defraud, omitting the words "as true," or any equivalent words. The manner of passing, or the terms upon which the notes are put off or disposed of, are not material, so long as the delivery or putting off of the false notes be as and for money, in lieu of money, or to be used as and for money, with intent to deceive or defraud.

And whether the receiver knew the notes were false or not; whether he took them at what their face purported, or for one-half, or one-third, or any other value, if the purpose was to put them into circulation as money, it is not only passing, but as the tendency would be to defraud the government, it must be held to be passing with intent to defraud the United States. A sale and delivery for circulation of forged notes is a felonious passing within the act of congress.

Pass, utter, publish, and sell, are in some respects convertible terms, and, in a given case, "pass" may include utter, publish, and sell. So far as the act of February 5, 1867, is repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the act of June 30, 1864, it should be held to repeal the latter; but I am not inclined to take the view that there is any repugnancy. I think a given case may be presented under either statute, and this case is one of them. In the one case, under the act of June 30, 1864, the indictment must charge the passing to have been with intent to deceive or defraud; to prosecute for the same act of passing under the statute of February 5, 1867, the indictment must charge the passing to have been with intent that the false note will be passed as true.

In conclusion, I would remark, that I have, by letter, referred the questions arising under this motion to my learned brother, Justice Swayne, who writes me he has examined the authorities, and is satisfied that I decided aright. Sustained by the high authority of this learned justice of the supreme court of the United States, I am doubly assured that the judgment which I pronounce is no denial of legal rights to the respondent.

The motion for a new trial is denied.

Case No. 15,862.

UNITED STATES v. NELSON et al.

[2 Brock. 64.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1822.

BONDS — EXECUTION IN BLANK — AUTHORITY TO FILL BLANKS—VALIDITY—SURETIES.

1. A. and B. consented to become sureties in an official bond. A printed paper in the usual form prepared for official bonds was signed by them. At the time that A. and B. signed it, all those parts which are usually written, including the penalty, the names of the obligors, &c., were blank; and C., the principal, had not yet signed it. A. and B. signed it with a perfect knowledge of the purpose for which it was designed, but the blanks were afterwards filled up in their absence, and without any express authority from the sureties, and the bond so executed was accepted by the proper authorities of the United States, as the official bond of C., with A. and B. as his sureties. Held, that such bond is not obligatory on A. and B.

Debt for $7,000 against Thomas Nelson and Samuel Myers, surviving obligors of John Archer, Thomas Nelson, and Samuel Myers. This action was founded on an instrument purporting to be an official bond executed by the above parties in the penalty of $7,000, the condition whereof was, that the said Archer should faithfully discharge the duties of paymaster of the twentieth regiment of infantry, of the army of the United States, The declaration assigned various breaches of the condition of the bond, and the defendants pleaded severally a special non est factum. The jury found a special verdict presenting the following state of facts, viz.:

That John Archer, the deceased co-obligor of the defendants, was, previous to the date of the paper writing in the declaration mentioned, appointed paymaster, &c., and, as such, was by the law of the United States bound to give such bond and security as the bond in this case purported to be: that the said paper writing, purporting, &c., was signed, sealed, and delivered, by the defendants as their act and deed, and when it was so signed, sealed, and delivered, none of the manuscript parts (the formal parts of the bond being printed) were written. (The bond, with the manuscript parts aforesaid in italics, is in the words and figures following, viz.:)

"Know all men by these presents, that we, John Archer, lieutenant in and paymaster of the twentieth regiment of infantry in the army of the U. S. of North America, Thomas Nelson and Samuel Myers, are holden and stand firmly bound and obliged unto the United States of North America, &c. in the penal sum of seven thousand dollars current money, &c. well and truly to be paid, &c. for which payment faithfully to be made and done we the said John Archer, Thomas Nelson, and Samuel Myers, do bind ourselves, &c. Signed with our hands, and sealed with our seals, this first day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve. The condition, however, of the above obligation is such, that whereas the above bounden John Archer, is appointed paymaster of the twentieth regiment of infantry of the army of the United States aforesaid: Now, if the said John Archer shall well and truly execute, and faithfully discharge his duties, &c. then this obligation to be void, else, &c. Done at Richmond, in the state of Virginia, the day and year above written. John Archer, (L. S.) Thomas Nelson, (L. S.) Samuel Miles, (L. S.)

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of William Powers as to the two last, William Y. Archer as to ditto, William Woodford as to the first.

"I, John Archer, do solemnly swear that I will diligently and faithfully execute and perform the duties of paymaster of the twentieth regiment of infantry, of the army of the United States of North America, according to the best skill and abilities of which I am possessed—so help me God. Sworn and subscribed to at Fredericksburg, in the state of Virginia, this fourth day of September, eighteen hundred and twelve, before me, J. Newly, J. P."

That the manuscript parts had been written in the absence of the defendants, and that the said paper had not, since the same was written, been sealed, or acknowledged, as the deed of the defendants by either of them, and at that time, the name of John Archer, the principal obligor was not subscribed to said paper. That the defendants, when they so signed, sealed, and delivered, as aforesaid, the said paper in blank, in the respects aforesaid, well knew that the paper aforesaid was to serve as the bond of the said deceased obligor, and of the defendants, as his sureties, for the duties of his said office, and by their signing, sealing, and delivering, aforesaid, the defendants intended to bind themselves as sureties in the official bond of said deceased obligor. That the said manuscript parts of said paper, afterwards, as aforesaid, inserted, were so inserted without any other authority from, or consent of, the defendants, than that which is given by, or implied from, their said act of signing, sealing, and delivering the said paper in blank, aforesaid, with full knowledge of the object and purpose aforesaid, intended to be attained thereby, and their consent, at the time of such signing, sealing, and delivering the said paper, it should serve that purpose: That the said paper so, as aforesaid, signed, sealed, and delivered, was accepted by the proper authorities of the United States, as the official bond of said deceased obligor, and of the defendants as his sureties.

Upon this state of facts the jury submitted to the court the question, whether the paper in question be, or be not, the deed of the defendants? If it was their deed, then they found for the plaintiffs the debt in the declaration mentioned to be discharged by the payment of $1932 74, the amount of Archer's defalcation; otherwise, for the defendants.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. John Archer was appointed paymaster of the twentieth regiment of infantry, in the army of the United States. The defendants, Nelson and Myers, agreed to become his securities, and to execute such bond as was required by law. A printed paper, in the usual form prepared for official bonds to be given by paymasters, was presented to and executed by them. At the time of its execution and delivery, all those parts which are usually written, including the penalty, the names of the obligors, and the date, were blank. John Archer, the principal, had not executed it. This blank bond was afterwards filled up in the absence of the said Nelson and Myers, without their knowledge, and without any authority from them, other than is implied from their having executed the said paper with intention to bind themselves as the sureties of the said Archer, and with full knowledge of the object of the said bond. The jury further find, "that the paper so as aforesaid signed, sealed, and delivered, was accepted by the proper authorities of the United States as the official bond of the said Archer, and of the defendants as his sureties."

The defendants pleaded a special non est factum, and the jury has found the facts, and referred to the court the question, whether this be the deed of the defendants? At the common law, all instruments under seal were considered as deeds. Every contract not under seal was considered as a parol contract To the consummation of every deed, the solemnity of a delivery is indispensable. Opinion of Marshall, C. J., in Bank of U. S. v. Danbridge, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 90. Until delivery, the writing does not become the deed of the party who had sealed it. It is also necessary to the validity of a deed that it be in writing. Shep. Touch. p. 76. These two circumstances must concur, or there is no deed binding on the party whose seal is affixed to the paper. The rule requiring that the deed should be written, implies, necessarily, that it binds no further than the writing binds. Perk. Com. § 118, says: "If a common person seal an obligation, or any other deed, without any writing in it, and deliver the same unto a stranger, man or woman, it is nothing worth, notwithstanding the stranger make it to be written that he who sealed and delivered the same unto him is bound unto him in £20." There are many other authorities to the same effect. It would be useless to quote them, because the principle is not denied. In the case now under consideration, there being no sum of money mentioned in the bond, the defendants were no more bound by the instrument they had executed, at the time of its execution, than if the paper had been all blank. The United States could not have availed themselves of the bond in its then condition. The whole question then, is, whether the defendants have authorized any other persons to fill up this bond, in such manner as to create an obligation which did not exist when it was delivered.

It is found by the jury that the defendants executed this bond with the knowledge that it was to be received as an official bond, and with an intention to bind themselves as the sureties of John Archer, as paymaster, by this sealing and delivery of it, but that no special authority was given to any person to fill it up, nor any authority whatever, other than is implied from their sealing and delivering the paper. Does this act authorize any person whatever to insert the penalty and other written parts in the bond—and does it make the writing, in its present form, their deed? If this question depended on those moral rules of action which, in the ordinary course of things, are applied by courts to human transactions, there would not be much difficulty in saying that this paper ought to have the effect which the parties, at the time of its execution, intended it should have. But there are certain technical rules growing out of the state of things, when many of our legal principles originated, which are firmly ingrafted on the law, and still remain a part of it, though the circumstances in which they had their birth are totally changed. Perhaps every distinction between a sealed and an unsealed instrument is of this description. But the distinction, and the rules which are founded on it, have taken such fast hold of the law, that they can be separated only by the power of the legislature. Till that authority shall interpose, the courts must respect the rules as they are found in adjudged cases Those cases must be referred to in order to determine whether this be the deed of the defendants. In the case stated in Perkins, the inference to be fairly drawn from the sealing and delivery of a paper, on which nothing was written, is, that the person to whom it was delivered was authorized to write over the signature and seal, if not any obligation he pleased, an obligation for some certain thing previously agreed on by the parties, and that the person making the instrument confided in him to whom this implied authority was given, for its faithful execution. It means this, or it means nothing. Yet the obligation written over this signature was declared to be of no validity It follows, that the sealing and delivery of a paper does not imply an unlimited power to write even what had been previously agreed on by the parties. Shepherd, in his Touchstone (page 54), referring to this section of Perkins, says: "The agreement must be all written before the sealing and delivery of it; for if a man seal and deliver an empty piece of paper or parchment, albeit he do withal give commandment that an obligation or other matter shall be written in it, and this be done accordingly, yet this is no good deed." This declaration, if it be law, is conclusive, with respect to a paper which is sealed and delivered as the act and deed of the party, but which, at the time of the sealing and delivery, has nothing written in it. I proceed to those cases in which an obligation is written on the paper, which is incomplete at the time, and is afterwards made complete, or in any manner varied.

The case of Markham v. Gonaston, which is reported in Cro. Eliz. 626, Moore, 547, was argued at great length, and considered by the court. That case depended on the question, whether an obligation executed with blanks for the Christian name and place of residence of a person named in it, became void by filling up those blanks. The point was argued in three different suits. The first suit was brought against Fox, on an obligation made by Sir Francis Willoughby and said Fox, and upon the plea of non est factum being pleaded, the plaintiff became nonsuited. The party injured then brought an action on the case against the person who made the alteration, who pleaded that he had written the obligation by the command of Sir Francis Willoughby, with those blanks in it: that it was in this state executed by Fox: that the blanks were then filled up by order of Sir Francis Willoughby, with the assent of Fox: after which Sir Francis executed the obligation. This plea was held ill on demurrer, and the court said, that the alteration was material, and that it avoided the bond. Moore in his report of this case, says (note) that the plaintiff afterwards brought a new action on the obligation against Fox, who pleaded the special matter, and concluded that it was not his deed. The plaintiff replied, that it was filled up with the assent of both of the obligors; and upon demurrer it was adjudged for the plaintiff in B. R. The note in Moore does not give us the words of the replication, but the term "assent" certainly implies an assent expressed, and the special plea of the person who made the alteration, as appears from Coke, was, that the alteration was made by order of one of the obligors with the assent of the other. Hargrave and Butler, in their notes on Co. Litt. quote this case in the following terms: "Obligation, with a condition to save harmless, against Tracy, with a blank. A stranger, after the delivery, fills up the blank with a Christian name, with the assent of the obligor, yet adjudged to avoid the deed because material. But if the addition is not material, as the addition of a county, and it be by a stranger, it doth not avoid the deed, though if by the party himself, it doth avoid it." In the case of Zouch v. Clay, reported in 1 Vent. 185, 2 Lev. 35, the defendant pleaded, that at the time of his executing the bond, there was a blank in it, which was afterwards filled up, with the name of another obligor, and so it is not his deed. The plea was held ill. Ventris says, the court considered the insertion of the name of a new obligor, as not affecting the person who had previously executed the obligation, it remaining the same as to him. Levinz, in his report of the case, says, that the name was inserted with the consent of all the obligors, and, therefore, the obligation was still binding. In these cases, the obligation was complete, although the blanks had never been filled up. The alteration did not create or enlarge the obligation, or vary it to the injury of the obligor. They do not, therefore, contradict the law, as laid down in Perkins and Shepherd's Touchstone. In the case put by them, the obligation, if it exists, is created by the writing inserted after delivery. In the subsequent cases which have been noticed, the obligation was complete when it was delivered. The alteration was in the words, not in the obligation of the instrument, and that alteration was made with the assent of parties. I understand this to be an assent to the specific alteration; and to be an assent, not implied, but expressly given.

A case has been cited from 5 Mass. 538 (Smith v. Crooker), decided by a judge, whose opinions deserve to be greatly respected, and whose decisions must always have great influence with any court in which they are quoted. The case is this: An official bond was prepared for C., with a blank for the name of the surety. Cushing, afterwards agreed to become surety, and executed the bond. The blank was filled up with his name in his absence; and then C. also executed it. Cushing pleaded non est factum to this bond, but it was determined to be his deed. No person will controvert this decision. The alteration was immaterial, and not being made by the obligor himself, could not, on any sound principle of law, affect the instrument. But a principle is laid down in the opinion, which goes much farther than the decision. Judge Parsons lays down the general rule, that any material alteration will avoid the bond, but states as an exception to this rule, an alteration made by consent of parties. He adds that, "the party executing the bond, knowing that there are blanks in it, to be filled up by inserting particular names or things, must be considered as assenting that the blanks may be thus filled, after he has executed the bond." Any distinction between an express and an implied assent, in a case where the implication is so strong, as it must be where a blank is to be filled of course "with a particular name or thing," is here denied. In such a case, there is undoubtedly, good sense in the opinion which rejects this distinction; but I am not sure that it is sustained by law. He who adds to the obligation of another, must do so by the authority of that other; and I know of no case, in which, as respects a deed, such authority is implied in a court of law, certainly of none, when not even the person is designated, by whom the authority is to be executed. But the proposition laid down by the very able judge who gave this opinion, does not necessarily extend to the case at bar. He lays down his principle, in a case "where a blank is to be filled by inserting particular names or things;" that is, where the blank is to be filled up only in one manner. But this principle does not apply to a blank to be filled up with a sum of money, which sum is not precisely fixed. It is also observable that in reviewing the cases on which he founds his opinion, the judge takes no notice of Perkins or Shepherd; and the case before him, as well as that which he supposes in giving his opinion, was not produced by a paper which was blank, or of no obligation whatever, when it was delivered. A blank of such vital importance, that the paper, while it remained, was a nullity, does not seem to have been in his view. For this reason, too, whatever authority may be ascribed to the opinion of Judge Parsons, and no person acknowledges his authority more willingly than myself, its application to the case at bar may well be doubted.

In Russel v. Langstaffe, Doug. 496 (2 Doug., Frere's Ed., 514) it is determined by the court, that "the indorsement on a blank note, is a letter of credit for an indefinite sum." The same principle is asserted by this court, in Violet v. Patton, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 151, 2 Pet. Cond. R. 214. If these decisions apply to sealed instruments, they decide the cause now before the court; for the presumption is at least as strong, that the defendants intended, when they executed this bond, to allow the blank to be filled with such sum as the government would require in the official bond of a regimental paymaster, as that the person who signs a blank paper, intends to give indefinite credit to the person who receives it. They, would, too, completely overturn the principles laid down in the old books. But there are certain diferences in law between sealed and unsealed instruments, which make it difficult to apply the principles of one species of contract to the other; all unsealed instruments being considered as verbal contracts, they require neither writing nor delivery; they were not governed by those technical rules which are founded in the necessity of writing and delivery. General and liberal principles, therefore, which are laid down in such cases, cannot safely be applied to sealed instruments, unless the courts have expressed the intention so to apply them.

But the case on which most reliance is placed, is that of Speake v. U. S., 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 28.[2] Speake, Beverly, and Eliason,

[2] 3 Pet. Cond. R. 244. See, also, Steele's Lessee v. Spencer, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 552. In an action of ejectment, a deed was produced exehad executed an embargo bond, and afterwards the name and seal of Eliason were removed, and those of Ober substituted in their place. To an action brought on this bond, the defendant, Beverly, pleaded that this alteration was made "without his consent, license, or authority." The plaintiff replied that the alteration was made "with the assent, and by the concurrent license, direction, and authority of all the defendants, and of the said Ebenezer Eliason." The defendant demurred to this plea, and the court overruled his demurrer. On appeal to the supreme court, the judgment was affirmed.

The pleadings present the case of an express authority to make the alteration, and the only questions were, whether this express authority could avail the obligee, and whether it could be given by parol. Whatever previous difficulty might have existed on this point, there is none now. The case of Speake v. U. S. [supra], has settled them; but that case goes no farther; it does not decide that an obligation may be created originally, by virtue of an authority which is not expressly given, but is implied from the sealing and delivery of a paper, which, in its existing state, can avail nothing. This point does not appear to have been ever decided in the case of a sealed instrument. The case of Speake v. U. S., in determining that parol evidence of such assent may be received, undoubtedly goes far towards deciding it; and it is probable that the same court, may completely abolish the distinction, in this particular, between sealed and unsealed instruments. In this place I do not feel authorized to disregard it. In the English courts, from which the rules applicable to this subject are derived, the distinction is still maintained in a case which bears some analogy to this. The right of one partner to bind another, so far as respects the business of the trade, and the partnership property, is unquestioned; yet, if a partner affix a seal to the instrument, by which he promises in the name of the company to pay money, the English judges, with what propriety I shall not now say, have determined that the company is not bound by it.[3]

I say with much doubt, and with a strong belief that this judgment will be reversed, that the law on this verdict is, in my opinion, with the defendants.

Notwithstanding the strong distrust expressed by the chief justice, of the correctness of the above decision, no appeal was taken from it. [See White v. Vermont & M. R. Co., 21 How. (62 U. S.) 578.]

cuted by Spencer, in which Steele was grantee, but it was apparent that the deed had been altered in this, viz., that the name of the grantee wherever it occurred, was written on an erasure, and with ink of a different colour; as also the words "Ross," and "Ohio," in describing the residence of the grantee, and these alterations were not accounted for in any manner by the testimony in the cause. The court below instructed the jury, that if the deed was altered in a material part, after it was sealed, attested, and acknowledged, such alterations made the deed absolutely void. But the supreme court said this was error, although it might be true that a material erasure or alteration in a deed, after its execution, might avoid the deed, yet, the instruction ought not to have been given in the terms used by the court. Whether erasures and alterations had been made in the deed or not, was a question of fact proper to be referred to the jury; but whether they were material or not, was a question of law which ought to have been decided by the court.

SLAVE—PUNISHMENT FOR LARCENY.

A slave, convicted of larceny, is to be punished by whipping, although not charged as a slave in the indictment.

The prisoner [negro Nelson] was convicted of stealing a hair cap, of the value of one dollar and twenty-five cents. It appears, in evidence, that he was a slave, although not charged as such in the indictment.

THE COURT (nem. con.) sentenced the prisoner to be whipped with twenty stripes.

PUBLIC LANDS—CUTTING TIMBER—LAND OCCUPIED AS MINING GROUND.

1. The enactment of the pre-emption, homestead and mining laws by congress has modified the operation of the act of March 2, 1831 (section 2461, Rev. St. [4 Stat. 472]), prohibiting absolutely the cutting or removal of timber on the public lands, so that persons occupying portions of such lands under such laws may, before becoming the owners thereof, cut and use the timber thereon so far as the same may be necessary to accomplish the purpose for which the land is occupied.

chase the same, but until he does so, he has a mere license to work the ground for the precious metals therein, and has no right to cut or use any timber growing or found thereon, except as the same may be necessary to enable him to mine the same conveniently.

3. The defendant occupied seventy acres of public land as mining ground and cut timber from four acres thereof in advance of his mining operations, and disposed of the same for his own benefit, assigning as a reason therefor, that by cutting the timber in advance of the mining operations the stumps would rot and therefore be more easily removed: Held, that this cutting was not necessary to the mining operation and therefore unlawful.

Information for cutting timber on the public land in violation of section 2461 of the Revised Statutes.

Rufus Mallory, for plaintiff.

L. O. Stearns, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. On November 24, 1877, an information was filed in this court by the district attorney against Levi W. Nelson, charging him with cutting and removing from the lands of the United States, to wit, a certain described portion of township 9 south, range 39 east, in the district of Oregon, five hundred pine trees, of the value of one hundred and twenty-five dollars, for his own private advantage and profit, contrary to section 2461 of the Revised Statutes. The defendant pleaded "not guilty;" and the case was submitted to the court for judgment upon an agreed case, that was stipulated and agreed should be deemed and taken as a special verdict.

The special verdict substantially finds: (1) That between January 1, 1875, and November 1, 1877, the defendant cut and removed timber, as alleged, but that there were only one hundred and fifty of the trees, of the value of twenty-five cents each; (2) that in 1870 the defendant took up and claimed the premises, containing about seventy acres, for the purpose of placer mining, and in August, 1872, caused the same to be duly surveyed and platted as a placer mining claim; (3) that in 1873 the defendant made due proof of the performance of the conditions necessary to entitle him to a patent from the United States for the premises, except the payment of the price fixed by law therefor, which has never been paid, and that said premises are not within any organized mining district; (4) that said premises are "placer mining ground;" and it is necessary, to successfully mine the same, to remove the trees standing thereon, and "that it is better for the purpose of such mining that the timber be removed so far in advance of the work as to give opportunity for stumps to rot and so be more easily disposed of;" (5) that between 1870 and 1877, the defendant, for the purpose of working the premises as a mining claim, constructed buildings, flumes and ditches thereon to the value of two thousand five hundred dollars; and has worked said ground continuously during the mining season of each year by employing from fifteen to twenty miners during such period; (6) that it is the business of the defendant to work such mining ground during the mining season, and he expects to continue the same permanently; (7) that about one third of an acre of said ground is worked over each year, and that said one hundred and fifty trees were taken from about four acres of the same.

Neither the information nor the special verdict states according to what meridian the township containing the locus, is nine south and thirty-nine east. But as there is but one meridian in this judicial district, the Wallamet, it must be construed as referring to that. This locates the premises in Baker county, Oregon. Section 2461, supra, upon which this information is founded, is section 1 of the act of March 2, 1831. It prohibits absolutely the cutting or removal of any timber from the public lands for any purpose "other than the use of the navy of the United States," under a penalty of not less than three times the value of the timber, and imprisonnient not exceeding twelve months. The pre-emption, homestead and mining laws of subsequent date which confer the right of occupation of limited quantities of the public lands upon settlers and miners for agricultural and mining purposes, and with a view of enabling them to obtain patents therefor, are laws upon the same subject—in pari materia—with the timber act of 1831, and must be construed with it. It is not to be supposed that congress authorized the occupation of the public lands by the laws aforesaid for the purposes of agriculture and mining, without intending to so modify the operation of the timber act as to permit the occupants thereunder to cut and use the timber upon their respective claims so far as the same is necessary for the purpose for which they are occupied. By the enactment of these laws, the timber act is so far repealed. Such has been the ruling of this court in giving instruction to juries in several unreported cases.

In Re U. S. v. McEntee [Case No. 15,673], the defendant was sued in the district court for Minnesota, to recover the value of timber cut by him on the public lands. The defendant justified the cutting upon the ground that he occupied the premises under the homestead act of 1862 [12 Stat. 392]. The court (Nelson, J.), instructed the jury that "everything necessary for the cultivation of the land and manifesting an intention to make permanent occupancy and bona fide settlement, is legitimate and proper to be done. The land can be cleared and timber sold, if cut down for the purpose of cultivation; but if sale and traffic is the only reason for severing the timber, and it is not done with a view of improving the land, the intentions of the lawgiver are subverted."

The jury found a verdict for the United States.

Section 2319, Rev. St. (section 1, Act May 10, 1872 [17 Stat. 91]), declares that "all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase by citizens of the United States," under certain regulations as to quantity and work thereon during the period between selection and purchase. Among the conditions upon the keeping of which this right of occupation rests, is the performance of a certain amount of labor upon the premises annually. If the claim is a vein or lode, the occupant may purchase the same upon proof of the performance of the conditions precedent by paying therefor at the rate of five dollars per acre, or if, as in this case, it be a "placer," at the rate of two dollars and fifty cents per acre. Title 22, c. 6, Rev. St. It is manifest from the reading of the whole of this chapter of the Revised Statutes that in contemplation of the law this right or privilege of exploration and occupation is only given as preliminary to a purchase by the occupant, and that if it shall be ascertained that the location contains "valuable mineral deposits," he will proceed without unnecessary delay to obtain a patent from the United States therefor, by making proof of the location and labor thereon and the payment of the purchase price therefor. But, as was held in Chapman v. Toy Long [Case No. 2,610], there is no specific provision of the law, compelling the occupant to purchase, and he may continue to hold the claim by occupation and labor, so long as he desires, and then abandon it. The defendant in this case occupies the premises under this law, and claims the right to cut and remove the timber therefrom as incidental to and in aid of his right to mine thereon. But he is not the owner of the land until he pays for it, and obtains the United States patent. It is a part of the public domain. In the meantime the defendant is occupying it under a mere license from the government, which may be revoked at any time by the repeal of the act giving it. The defendant, however, is not to be considered in default for not having paid for the land. His license under the statute to occupy and to work it as mining ground is sufficient for that purpose until withdrawn by congress, without purchasing it. But in considering the question whether this land is occupied by the defendant solely as mineral land or in whole or in part for its timber; and whether the trees in question have been cut and removed only as a necessary and convenient means of working the ground as a placer mine, and not otherwise, the fact that he has occupied it under the act of 1872, for nearly six years, as land containing "valuable mineral deposits," without availing himself of his right to purchase it at the mere nominal price of two dollars and fifty cents per acre cannot be overlooked. If the land or the greater portion of it is of little or no value as mining ground but valuable for its timber, the defendant might occupy it for a few years until he had stripped the tract of its timber, and worked out the few acres that really contained valuable deposits, and then abandon it to the government. In the region where this land is situated timber is very scarce and valuable. The temptation to locate one hundred and sixty acres of timber land as mining ground, and by putting a few dollars' worth of labor upon it annually, be thereby enabled to dispose of the timber upon it at from fifty to one hundred dollars an acre, is very great, and if the defendant's construction of the law is to obtain there is nothing to prevent its being done. No proof is required as to the amount of mineral deposit in the land; and the only security against the law being used as a cover to strip the public lands of their valuable timber is to limit the right of the locator of a mining claim to the use of such timber thereon as is necessary to the actual working of such claim.

Apply these suggestions to this case. The defendant has located seventy acres of land under the mining law, and occupied it as a mining claim for several years. During this time he has worked over two or three acres of the ground, and cut timber off of four other acres, and disposed of it for his private benefit—probably sold it for firewood. It is admitted that the defendant has a right to cut down or destroy the trees so fast as the earth in which they stand is dug or washed away in the process of mining; and it may also be admitted that such timber may be used or disposed of by the locator in any way that is most profitable to himself rather than to let it remain on the ground to decay. But whether the cutting of the timber is merely incidental to a bona fide mining operation, or the mining operation is a mere pretext for appropriating and disposing of the timber is a question of fact to be determined in each case by its own circumstances. But when a party goes beyond this, and removes and disposes of acres of timber in advance of his mining operations for no better reason than that "it is better" for the purpose of mining to remove the timber "so far in advance of the work as to give opportunity for the stumps to rot" before the bank on which they stand is sluiced or dug down, in my judgment, he is speculating in United States timber rather than mining for the precious metals. If the law were construed so as to permit four acres of timber to be removed to give the stumps time to rot before mining operations were commenced, that from ten, fifty, or one hundred acres might be removed for the same reason. The removal of timber from a mining claim to be justifiable should proceed pari passu with the operation of mining. Whoever wants to go further or faster than this, and for any reason appropriate the timber to his own use in advance of his mining operations, can only do so safely by paying the purchase-price of the land, and becoming the owner thereof.

There must be judgment for the plaintiff on the verdict. In arriving at this conclusion it is not necessary to impute to the defendant a conscious purpose to practice any of the devices which it has been shown his construction of the law would permit. They have only been suggested to show that the consequences of such a construction would be a material perversion and abuse of the law, and therefore it ought not to prevail. The defendant may have been honestly mistaken as to his rights, or he may have become so accustomed to the violation of the law with the apparent consent of the government, that he regarded it as of no effect.

Since the settlement of this coast the law has been enforced by fits and starts, most oftenly against the "small-fry." The executive department, in case of the large operations at least, has usually nullified the action of the courts by arbitrary pardons, or ignored the law by compromising in advance with the trespassers in consideration of a trifling compensation, called "stumpage." In 1864, a party who had openly taken hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of a rare and most valuable cedar timber from the public lands near Port Orford, and manufactured and sold the same in the San Francisco market, was found guilty in this court of violating the statute and fined the comparatively small sum of eighteen thousand seven hundred dollars—the smallest fine the law allowed. Shortly after, the executive department without consulting the district attorney, or having any information concerning the merits of the case except the ex parte and interested statements of the defendant, granted him a full and unconditional pardon.

Under these circumstances I do not deem it expedient to punish the defendant further than the law requires. The government by its indifference and neglect to enforce the law has encouraged its violation.

The defendant will be sentenced to pay a fine equal to triple the value of the timber cut and removed—seventy-five dollars.

OFFENSES ON HIGH SEAS — LEAVING MARINER IN FOREIGN PORT.

1. The crimes act of 1825, c. 276, § 10 [3 Story's Laws, 2001; 4 Stat. 117, c. 65], enumerates three distinct offences, viz.: (1) maliciously and without justifiable cause, forcing an officer or mariner on shore, in a foreign port; or, (2) maliciously or without justifiable cause, leaving any officer or mariner behind in a foreign port; or (3) maliciously and without justifiable cause, refusing to bring home again all the officers and mariners of the ship in a condition to return, and willing to return. It is not necessary, to complete the first or second of the enumerated offences, that the officer or mariner should be in a condition to return, and willing to return. These latter words apply only to the third and last of the enumerated offences.

2. Where a mariner applied for a discharge, which was refused by the master, and he thereupon used abusive language to the master, for which he was imprisoned by the master, so that he was unable to return, and the ship sailed without him; it was held, that the leaving him behind was an offence within the intent of the crimes act of 1825, c. 276, § 10 [3 Story's Laws, 2001; 4 Stat. 117, c. 65].

Indictment against the defendant [George E. Plea, not guilty.

The facts being established, the case ultimately turned upon the question of the true construction of the statute.

Mr. Mills, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

B. R. Curtis, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The tenth section of the crimes act of 1825, c. 276 [3 Story's Laws, 2001; 4 Stat. 117, c. 65], provides, "that if any master or commander of any ship or vessel belonging in whole or in part to any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall, during his being abroad, maliciously and without justifiable cause, force any officer or mariner of such ship or vessel on shore, or leave him behind in any foreign port or place, or refuse to bring home again all such officers and mariners of such ship or vessel, whom he carried out with him, as are in a condition to return, and are willing to return, when he shall be ready to proceed in his homeward voyage, every master or commander so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, &c." In my judgment, this section enumerates three distinct and independent offences: (1) The maliciously and without justifiable cause, forcing any officer or mariner on shore in any foreign port; (2) the maliciously and without justifiable cause, leaving such officer or mariner behind in any foreign port; and (3) the maliciously and without justifiable cause, refusing to bring home again all the officers and mariners of the ship in a condition to return and willing to return on the homeward voyage. It is not necessary, therefore, as the argument at the bar supposes, that the officer or mariner should have been forced on shore, as well as left behind, or refused to be brought home, in order to constitute an offence within the true intent of the statute. It is sufficient if the officer or mariner is either forced on shore, or left behind, or refused to be brought home. In the present case, there is no pretence to say, that the mariner was forced on shore. But it is perfectly clear, that he was maliciously (that is, wilfully and designedly) and without justifiable cause, left behind in a foreign port. It is also said, that the mariner was not willing to return home in the ship, and therefore the case is not within the provisions of the statute. But this (as has been already intimated) is not necessary to a completion of the offence of maliciously, and without justifiable cause, leaving him behind in a foreign port. The grammatical order and connexion of the language requires the words, "as are in a condition to return and willing to return," to be read as a part of the last clause of the section, and not as a part of the prior clauses of forcing ashore, or leaving behind. It would sound strange to say, that if the master shall force any officer or mariner on shore, he would not be within the penalty of the statute, unless such officer or mariner were in a condition to return and willing to return in the ship. And yet the words must be applied equally in all the cases stated in the section, unless they are limited to the last clause, viz. the refusal to bring home the officer or mariner. In this connexion, they have their just and natural import and effect. In the present case, indeed, the defendant had no option at all allowed him. He went on shore voluntarily, it is true, in the ship's service; but the master thereupon put him in gaol, and there had him kept in confinement until the ship sailed from the port. It is true, that the mariner had previously applied to the master to be discharged, and was willing to be discharged from the ship. But the master refused to discharge him; and inflicted upon him the imprisonment, as a punishment for some real or supposed abusive language, used by the mariner, in consequence of his refusal to give him a discharge. In short, the master maliciously and without justifiable cause, sent the mariner to prison, and left him behind, without even giving him an opportunity to express willingness or unwillingness to return. It is one thing to have a free discharge in a foreign port, and quite another thing to be left in prison there, under the pretence of promoting the wishes of the party.

Upon this intimation of the opinion of the court, the defendant, with the consent of the district attorney, withdrew his plea of not guilty, and pleaded nolo contendere, and thereupon received the sentence of the court.

[N. Y. Times, Nov. 2, 1859.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Nov. 1, 1859.

ROBBING THE MAILS—PRINCIPAL AND ACCESSORIES—INDICTMENT.

[An accessory after the fact cannot be tried as a principal, under the statute, for the crime of robbing the mails, unless the indictment shows either that the principal has been convicted, or has fled from justice, or cannot be found to be put upon his trial.]

Jacob New and Adolph New were put on trial under an indictment against them as accessories after the fact to a robbery of the post-office by one Lewis Stern, who took out of the office a letter addressed to "L. Stein," containing various valuable coupons, and which afterwards came into the possession of the defendants.

Judge Whiting appeared for the defendants, and after a jury had been impanelled, moved to quash the indictment, on the ground that the section of the statute which allows parties accessory to be tried as principal offenders only allows it in case "the principal offender has fled from justice or cannot be found to be put on his trial," and that there was no allegation in the indictment that Stern had either been convicted as the principal, or had fled from justice, or cannot be found to be put on his trial.

INGERSOLL, District Judge, after argument, sustained the objection to the indictment; but on his suggestion a juror was withdrawn, in order that the question might be brought before him subsequently on more formal argument, and that the trial might proceed, in case he should change his views on the point involved.

UNITED STATES v. NEW BEDFORD BRIDGE.

[1 Woodb. & M. 401; [1] 10 Law Rep. 127.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. April 15, 1847.

NAVIGABLE WATERS—BUILDING BRIDGE—OBSTRUCTION TO NAVIGATION—CONSTITUTIONAL GRANT OF POWER—CONTEMPTS.

1. In an indictment against a corporation for obstructing the navigation of a river, but which had been authorized by a state law, the construction as to its acts must be liberal in its favor. Nothing can be deemed an offence by such a corporation in the courts of the United States, except what has been made so by the constitution, or a treaty, or an act of congress. These courts being of limited jurisdiction under a government of limited powers, a case must be clearly within its jurisdiction, or it will be dismissed, whenever and however the objection is made.

[Cited in Heriot v. Davis, Case No. 6,404.]

2. A grant of power to congress, probably, does not prevent the states from continuing to act on subjects within the grant till congress legislates fully concerning it, and so as to conflict with the doings of the state, unless there is an express prohibition on the states to act further in the matter, or it is implied strongly from the nature of the case. Where the states do not grant to congress powers over their internal commerce or police, those powers can continue to be exercised to any extent by them till they conflict with the proper exercise by congress of other powers, which are granted to it, such as those over foreign commerce and the revenue, and then the acts of the state, so far as repugnant and conflicting with the due exercise of the other powers by congress, must yield.

3. A grant of powers to congress, in the constitution, over certain subjects, does not invest any particular courts with that authority till congress confer it by a law, except in some specified powers given in the constitution to the supreme court.

4. The authority to punish for contempt is granted as a necessary incident in establishing a tribunal as a court. The common law cannot be resorted to for aid in giving jurisdiction in the courts of the United States, but only in deciding certain questions after jurisdiction is otherwise obtained.

5. The grant of power to congress to regulate foreign commerce, and the declaration that the judicial power shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, do not enable a court to punish any act as a crime, unless some part of the constitution, or a treaty, or some law of congress, makes it a crime, and confers authority on that court to punish it.

6. The act of 1789 (chapter 20), as to the powers of the circuit court, neither makes such act a crime, nor confers on this court authority to punish the erection of a bridge over tide water, or the obstruction of navigation in navigable waters. Semble, it might have done the last, if it had been declared to be a crime. Nor to the treaties with foreign powers, allowing ingress and egress to our ports for trade, do either; nor the acts of congress creating the port, where the obstruction is, a port of entry; or making a collection of duties there; or giving coasting licenses; or punishing breaches of the revenue laws. The old states had, before the constitution, sovereign power over tide waters, as well as others navigable, and could obstruct them by bridges or otherwise, whenever they deemed it demanded by the public interests. They still retain the powers before possessed, except where granted to congress and legislated on, unless prohibited. But individuals could not obstruct them, without being liable at common law in most of the states to a prosecution for a nuisance. If individuals owned the soil beneath or adjoining such rivers, it was subject to the easement of navigation by the public, the jus publicum being not inconsistent with the jus privatum in the soil.

7. The states composed from the Northwestern Territory cannot obstruct their navigable rivers, they being by the ordinance declared to be forever public highways.

[Cited in Huse v. Glover, 15 Fed. 296.]

8. When the old states obstructed their own navigable rivers by laws, the persons acting under those laws are not punishable in the state courts for such acts, unless the acts are contrary to some clause in the constitution, or a treaty, or an act of congress. Then they are, and also in the courts of the United States, if some act of congress make it a crime, and gives power to this court to punish it.

9. When an individual suffers special damage by such an obstruction, he may have civil redress by a suit, though the obstruction be authorized by a state, if it is contrary to, or conflicts with some clause in the act of congress, such as a coasting license. The admiralty law as to crimes at no period has yet been adopted en masse by the constitution, or any act of congress; and the adoption of it as to civil cases, without defining at what period, and in what place, and with what restrictions, has proved embarrassing to the courts. By the admiralty law as to crimes, such an offence as the one charged in this indictment could not be punished in the courts of admiralty in England, since 15 Rich. II.; nor is it known that it could be in the vice admiralty courts in the British colonies. It is doubtful whether any misdemeanors, as this is, were punishable in the admiralty courts at all since 28 Hen. VIII., but merely felonies. Certainly no offences, committed like the acts in this case, within the body of a county, and not on the high seas, and not in great ships in great rivers below the bridges, would be punished in an admiralty court.

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

10. The only mode of punishing acts, as crimes, which obstruct the navigation of rivers and ports within the limits of a state, and are not now crimes under the laws of a state, or the United States, is by further legislation by congress, under its authority to regulate foreign commerce, and that between the states, declaring what obstructions shall be penal, if not removed or modified, and in what court the offence shall be tried.

This was an indictment, found by the grand jury at the last term, and to which the respondents pleaded not guilty. The indictment alleged, that there was a river in the state of Massachusetts, called the "Acushnet," which was navigable, and in which the sea ebbed and flowed with its tides, running by and forming the port of New Bedford, a port of entry on the one side, and the port of Fairhaven, a town lying on the opposite and eastern side thereof. That the citizens of this district and of the United States were accustomed to pass and repass on the waters of said river and ports, and that the respondents being a bridge corporation, under the direction of William Roach, Jr., and others, have, by force and arms, raised an embankment in the channel of said river on its bed, and erected a bridge across the river eight hundred yards in length and one hundred feet in width, and, from A. D. 1820, till the finding of the indictment, have kept up the bridge, so that navigators and citizens cannot pass to and from the sea into New Bedford and Fairhaven as they before did and of right ought to do, thus injuring the coasting and foreign trade of other nations in alliance with this country, as well as our own citizens. There were two other counts substantially like the first, except containing averments, that sand, rocks and wood were placed in the channel of said river, at points within the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; and that the import and export trade were injured by these obstructions, the channel made more shallow, and the danger of navigation increased; and that the directors of the bridge ought to remove these obstructions, but neglected it, to the injury of out citizens and the public, and against the laws and statutes in such case provided. When the trial of this indictment came on, and after the case had been opened to the jury on the part of the United States, the following motion was submitted for the respondents: "And now the said defendants come and move the court here that the said indictment be quashed, for that congress has not declared the act charged in the indictment to be an offence against the United States, and so this court hath not jurisdiction to try the same, or render judgment therefor."

B. R. Curtis, R. Choate, and J. H. W. Page, for respondents.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. This motion has been argued on both sides with a fullness and ability suited to the importance of some of the questions involved in it. I have taken time to examine those questions, and shall now proceed to dispose of them with as much brevity as is consistent with their difficulty and number, and the wide interests connected with them. They include national and constitutional considerations of great moment, and a decision on them involves results which affect practically most of the states in the Union. Most of them have authorized bridges to be built over navigable waters, and several of them have done it within the ebb and flow of the tides of the sea, and at, if not below the limits of some ports of entry as well as of delivery, and to the obstruction in some degree and generally to the delay of all navigation above them. Their power to do this in the progress of internal improvements and of turnpikes, canals and rail-roads, with a view to advance internal commerce and travel, is to be considered, on the one hand, as well as the authority of the general government on the other hand, to check, prevent or suppress such works, whether bridges, or aqueducts, or viaducts, whenever injurious to that foreign commerce of the country which is placed under its regulation, and whenever impeding the navigation between the states as well as foreign navigation, and whenever conflicting with the full use of the ports of entry or delivery within the United States by other nations in friendly alliance with us.

In considering the jurisdiction of this court to punish the respondents for doing what is alleged against them in this indictment, and which is the sole question presented by the motion now under consideration, it may be proper to notice in the outset, that the acts done by the defendants are justified under authority from the state of Massachusetts as early as 1795, and have thus been allowed not merely for the private gain of the stockholders, but for facility to public travel, and the internal trade and intercourse of that portion of the state and Union. The acts of the respondents, then, are not wanton acts of wrong, nor conduct undertaken merely for the purpose of private emolument. They are virtually the acts of the state. The respondents, in substance, justify under the state; and the merits of the case are the same as if the parties were the United States against the state of Massachusetts herself. Consequently the respondents are not to be punished by this or any other proceeding, unless their acts were authorized originally by the state without constitutional power; or unless their acts now come in collision with some subsequent and lawful legislation by congress; or unless, in the lapse of time, what was done at first, without affecting injuriously public navigation, has caused accumulations of sand and a shoalness in the channel, so as to obstruct passing and repassing with vessels; or, unless, by the increased size of vessels and steam-boats the draw of the bridge has become too narrow for them to go through, or the large additions to their number prevent them from being accommodated within more restricted limits, and in passing through a single draw. Such being the grounds on which alone the respondents could be convicted, the general inquiry is, if this court possesses authority to sustain an indictment against them for the acts done.

The motion in excepting to the jurisdiction of this court to try a case like the present, specifies, as the ground of it, the omission or refusal by congress to have such acts as are charged in the indictment declared to be an offence against the United States. And if for that or any other reason, it should appear to this court a question of real doubt whether it possesses any jurisdiction in such a case over the subject-matter, it will be its duty not to proceed further in the trial (Maisonnaire v. Keating [Case No. 8,978]); because, being a court of limited jurisdiction, it cannot transcend those limits, though the parties make no objection, but is bound, itself, to pause ([Capron v. Van Noorden] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 126; [State of Rhode Island v. State of Massachusetts] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 719; Kemp v. Kennedy [Case No. 7,686]); and in any stage of the case (Kitchen v. Strawbridge [Id. 7,854]; Davison v. Champlin, 7 Conn. 244; Perkins v. Perkins, 7 Conn. 559); whereas in England, their higher courts have general jurisdiction, and proceed till it is excepted to; and the presumptions are not as here, that a case is without their jurisdiction, till the affirmative is clearly shown ([Turner v. Bank of North America] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 11, Ellsworth, C. J.; [Kemp v. Kennedy] 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 185).

In the courts of the United States, jurisdiction must be derived from the constitution itself, or treaties, or acts of congress, and the question here relates first to jurisdiction by the United States over the subject-matter, as a crime, in the place of this transaction; and next, whether that jurisdiction is vested in this court, if it exists over the subject. Though the motion speaks only of no act of congress giving us jurisdiction, yet the argument in its favor proceeds on the ground, that in order to give to this court jurisdiction, there must be some clause in the constitution, or a treaty, or an act of congress, making proceedings like those by the respondents an offence, and conferring on this court the trial and punishment of it, and that there is no clause of that kind in either. While, on the other hand, on the part of the government, doubting whether any such special legislation is necessary, it is contended, that the constitution and treaties, as well as several acts of congress, make such conduct as that of the respondents illegal, and devolve the punishment of it upon this court. The conduct of the defendants being permitted by the state, as described in this indictment, can hardly be deemed a crime on its face. All sovereignties, bordering on the seashore, have a right to exercise jurisdiction over the waters adjoining. Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 1, c. 231; Bevans's Case, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 337; Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 212; Just. Inst. bk. 2, tit. 1, § 294. This usually does not extend outside of capes and ports, and beyond low water on the open coasts, except as hereafter explained, for revenue, fishing, &c., and as to foreigners, sometimes a cannon shot from shore. Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 1, c. 23, §§ 281–295. It has been settled, however, in Massachusetts, that power over those waters or obstructions in them by bridges, can be authorized by the state, but cannot be authorized by commissioners of roads, or any power short of the state itself, through legislation. Vatt. Law Nat. 43, bk. 1, c. 9; 12 Pick. 467; 4 Pick. 460; 2 Mass. 492; Inhabitants of Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 70; 2 Pick. 344; 5 Pick. 199; Com. v. Inhabitants of Charlestown, 1 Pick. 180; Ang. Tide Waters, 45, 46, 128; 15 Wend. 113; Mayor, etc., of Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 91; State v. Town of Hampton, 2 N. H. 22. Where a stream, as here, is within the limits of a state in its whole course, I see no reason, as a general principle, why that state might not obstruct its navigation, or suspend it. In Rex v. Montague, 4 Barn. & C. 598, it was held, that a right to navigate in a river or creek might be taken away by act of parliament, or by the commissioners of sewers, or by natural causes, e. g. filling up or the recess of the sea. Vooght v. Winch, 2 Barn. & Ald. 670. If a road exists there now, courts may presume that the right to navigate was extinguished before, if no proof is given where or how it was done. Before the federal constitution existed, it is, therefore, not to be doubted, that each state, as sovereign, could govern, within its own limits, roads, ferries, bridges, regulations of quarantine and health, ports of entry, navigation and commerce, internal and external. When forming that constitution, they conferred the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between states, and to collect revenue from imports, on the general government, retaining still the powers over the other matters as before, and not to be restricted in them unless their exercise should in some case conflict with the due exercise of the paramount powers granted to congress. [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 387; 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 617 App The states, then, can of course continue forever to regulate and punish what they have not delegated to the general government. [Chisholm v. Georgia] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 432–435; [Ex parte Bollman] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 75; [Ex parte Watkins] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 201; [Kendall v. U. S.] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524; Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 212. Besides this, they can continue, probably, to do the same as to what they have delegated, but not exclusively, (and where they are not expressly forbidden to act,) until congress legislate in respect to it, in such a manner as to supersede their action. But of this last proposition more hereafter.

Under these views of the relations between the states and the general government, since the constitution was formed, it has been held, that navigable rivers themselves for some purposes and the soil under them, as well as the tide-waters within the capes and counties, still belong to the states where they are situated. [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 383; [Martin v. Waddell] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 410; [Pollard v. Hagan] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 212. So all other rights over her waters, not ceded for navigation merely remain in a state; e. g. as to fisheries; and hence she can continue to regulate them in subordination to the other. Ang. Tide Waters, 105; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 383. Regulations of rights of property in lands and fishing on the coasts of a state, are not regulations of commerce, and do not conflict with the constitution or any act of congress. Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230].

States may regulate ferries, roads, inspections, &c., without violating the grant over commerce to congress, (though in some degree and indirectly affecting commerce,) if it does not come in clear and direct conflict with some legislation by congress. Corfield v. Coryell [supra]; [Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co.] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 245. But the jus privatum in the state must be so exercised as not to impair or obstruct the higher jus publicum in the United States and the people at large. Corfield v. Coryell [supra]; [Pollard v. Hagan] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 230; 1 Story, Const. 432; Peirce v. New Hampshire, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 504; 15 Wend. 113. And it was laid down generally, in U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 337, 389, that admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, ceded to the general government, did not pass the waters where that jurisdiction exists, or any territory, and hence, no general jurisdiction over them, but only over that specific matter of admiralty jurisdiction, the rest remaining in the state contiguous. A bay or haven, however, must be out of the jurisdiction of a state, to make an offence punishable there under many of the acts of congress, as congress has not, if it can, extended powers over waters in a state always concurrent with the state, and made offences there punishable. If congress can punish them under any ceded power, it has not yet. I think it may punish obstructions or nuisances, if necessary to regulate foreign commerce, preserve buoys and break-waters, or collect revenue, but perhaps only what is necessary to enforce that grant and others as to maintaining a navy, &c. [Pollard v. Hagan] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 230.

A state retains the powers before named, because not granted away, and the exercise of them by congress is invalid, because not granted to it, on the same ground that its exercise of others is valid only because they are granted to it. Hence, on the subject of roads, a state thus sovereign and unlimited in its own constitution, could, as to its own citizens and powers, pass a law to stop up any of its public roads or navigable rivers, or to erect bridges and viaducts over them without draws or with insufficient draws. [Pollard v. Hagan] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 212, 229; [Martin v. Waddell] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 410. It would rest in its discretion, to make the interests of those concerned immediately in the coasting and foreign trade, to yield to those engaged in interior commerce. So on the subject of floating logs on those rivers, it is a local species of business if it be commerce, and may be regulated by a state, and clearly so, till congress act on it differently. Scott v. Willson, 3 N. H. 321. It has been customary, therefore, for all the seaboard states to authorize bridges across navigable streams, under certain limitations, connected with common highways, turnpikes and railroads. In Massachusetts alone there have been since Charles river bridge, in 1785, fourteen or fifteen special licenses and acts of incorporation of that kind. See 1 Sp. Laws, p. 93, and onward; Sp. Laws, vols. 2–7. This, without objection till now, is strong evidence of the right. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 257, 318. The legislature has always been in the habit of thus promoting its domestic or internal commerce and convenience in traveling, when of an opinion that its people would gain more by the bridge than the navigation under it without the bridge. 1 Pick. 180. But not forgetting navigation, they seldom if ever allow such an obstruction without a draw of sufficient width to accommodate navigation and ship-building, and vessels wishing to pass through. Incorporations of bridges in such places have frequently been recognized by state judiciaries, as suitable exercises of power by states. 17 Conn. 64; 8 Cow. 146; 1 Pick. 180; 7 N. H. 35. In the states within what was governed by the ordinance for the Northwestern Territory, perhaps, this could not be done, as that ordinance declares that all navigable rivers within it shall continue to be "common highways." 3 Ohio, 496; Spooner v. McConnell [Case No. 13,245]; [Pollard v. Hagan] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 224. But I speak of states without any such restriction, or any in their own constitutions, or in the assent to their admission given into the Union by congress. Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 212. Or where no treaty by the general government, like that of 1783 and 1794, stipulated for the free navigation of a river like that one of the Mississippi. "The navigation of the river Mississippi from its source to the ocean shall forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States." Article 8 of treaty of Sept. 3, 1783 (8 Stat. 83). "The river Mississippi shall, however, according to the treaty of peace, be entirely open to both parties." Article 3 of treaty of 1794 (8 Stat. 117).

It is yet unsettled, whether if a river navigable above one state, then runs into another before it joins the ocean, the lower state may not obstruct it or exact tolls. This point was not started, nor decided, though it would arise in [Mayor, etc., of Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co.] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 97, nor need it be settled here, as all this stream is in one state. The free navigation of the Mississippi or of the Florida rivers, however, was never yielded to us, while Spain, a foreign state, owned the territory at their outlets. Nor is that of the St. Lawrence or of the St. Johns owned by the British, yielded except by treaty and for a quid pro quo. The arguments in favor of their freedom in such cases, though plausible, have never yet been admitted as rendering the question a settled one in national law in their favor. 1 Am. St. Papers, "Foreign Relations," 252, 253, 260; 3 Am. St. Papers, 341; Jour. of Old Cong. 1787; 1 Lyman, Dip. of U. S. 239, 267; 2 For. Rel. 101. Even the Sound duties in the Baltic for passing through an arm of the sea, are acquiesced in by most nations, though it is rather to defray the expense of keeping it lighted, as light-money is paid on other coasts, and to remove and replace buoys yearly, as the ice forms and disappears, and keep the passage free from piracies, than any departure from the general principle that the sea is free to all, however rivers may be, as the sea is the great highway of nations rather than of one nation; and the outlet usually is not enclosed by the territory of any one government. The case of the Black Sea may be an exception, at the Straits, as there that is preserved a close sea by Turkey, and its passage obstructed and regulated as if a navigable river, entirely within her territory, though resisted, and at times, successfully, by other nations. See on these, Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 1, c. 23, §§ 281–295. But that not being this case, nor this being an obstruction by an individual, without a claim of authority from the state, I feel compelled to admit that the state itself may set up her state rights to legislate concerning the waters where this bridge exists clearly within her limits, and partially obstruct them, if she thinks it beneficial, till her acts conflict with some law of congress connected with foreign commerce, or that between the states. Kellogg v. Union Co., 12 Conn. 7.

But while conceding such rights to states over their navigable waters, I think that corresponding duties are imposed on them to treat wanton or careless obstructions in them by individuals, as offences, and to punish or remove them as nuisances. This is the doctrine of both the common and the civil law. Spooner v. McConnell [supra]; Mayor, etc., of Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 91; Bac. Abr. "Nuisance," B.; 2 Ld. Raym. 1163; 10 Mass. 70; Coop. Just. 68, and note, 455; Ang. Tide Waters, 15, 16; Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 1, c. 22; 20 Johns. 98; 17 Johns. 195; 3 Caines, 319; 2 Conn. 481. The passing upon such rivers belongs to the public or people at large, as public highways, and can be obstructed only by acts of parliament in England, or the states here; or, perhaps, in some cases by congress, when under the execution of some of its special powers. Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 367, 410; Hale, De Jure Maris, 11; Com. v. Ruggles, 10 Mass. 391. Thus in England, while the king owns the soil between high and low water, the sea and navigable waters are open to be used in common by the people, whether for navigation or fishing, unless the former is stopped by the sovereign power before named, or the fishing is in fresh water owned by an individual on both sides. There is a jus privatum and a jus publicum. Ang. Tide Waters, 16, 19, 109; 5 Com. Dig. 102; 10 Coke, 141; 1 Salk. 357; 1 Mod. 105; Rex v. Smith, 2 Doug. 441; 5 Coke, 107. And if fishing, as one public right, should conflict with navigation, another, the former, as of minor importance, must yield, and the parties take in their seines. Ang. Tide Waters, 32, 95; Post v. Munn, 1 South. [4 N. J. Law] 61. In Massachusetts, the province or colony so changed the common law principle on this subject, that the soil on the sea-shores belonged to the contiguous owners rather than the king, (or the province, and afterwards the state,) for one hundred rods, when the tide ebbed out so far. 1 Pick. 180; 6 Mass. 153, 435. And, by some usage or common law, it has been held, that the owner may build houses or wharves on the flats one hundred rods, and thus obstruct the navigation there, but leaving it open beyond. Ang. Tide Waters, 154, 155; Austin v. Carter, 1 Mass. 231; Adams v. Frothingham, 3 Mass. 352. It is otherwise, if not left open beyond. Ang. Tide Waters, 157; 2 Davies' Abr. 697. But in Respublica v. Caldwell, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 150, it is held, that one cannot build a wharf encroaching on navigable water, though room enough beyond is left for navigation. So in England, semb. 2 Starkie, 511, 3 Serg. & Lowb. 453. Generally, however, whether the soil under the tide, and under navigable rivers is owned by individuals or the states, it is, till changed by special legislation, subject to the public easement of passing over it as a water highway. Ang. Tide Waters, 53, 109; Adams v. Frothingham, 3 Mass. 352. Such right was expressly reserved in the Massachusetts charter (pages 1, 148). And if an individual owns the soil on both sides of a navigable river or arm of the sea, he cannot erect a bridge across, so as to impede or injure the jus publicum for navigation. Com. v. Inhabitants of Charlestown, 1 Pick. 180. If done by an individual, or any persons without authority from the state, such obstacles to navigation are and should be punishable, and usually are under the local government.

Without going into discriminations as to different kinds of obstruction and the different modes of redress, whether the former be by bridges, or ballast, or sunken ships, or the latter by a suit for damages, or an injunction or indictment, information or abatement as of a nuisance, it is sufficient here to refer to the following cases. Russ. Crimes, 485; 1 Cowp. 86; Ang. Tide Waters, 29, 31, 45, 101; 10 Mass. 70; Harg. Tr. 36. See appropriations by congress to remove obstructions in the Mississippi and other rivers, and in harbors, as in New Bedford, and especially sunken ships near Savannah and Baltimore; and 5 Coke, 101; 2 Salk. 459; 3 Bl. So in England, a grant of land covered by the sea, does not justify the grantee in putting up obstructions to the free navigation. 10 Price, 350, 378. See post, Ang. Tide Waters, 141, 150; 8 Brow. T. R. 18. The public rights to navigate, &c., go to ordinary high water (Ang. Tide Watters, 67; 2 Johns. 337; Com. v. Inhabitants of Charlestown, 1 Pick. 180); while private rights begin at the same place (Id.). From all this it is manifest, that the place where this bridge is situated and the subject-matter of it, and of nuisances in the river there, are within the scope of state authority to punish or permit, till congress legislate for some of the objects within its sphere, in such a way as to come in collision with the action of the state.

If it be asked, then, whether the state laws make these acts a crime, it may be answered from what has been stated, that but for their special legislation, allowing this bridge, those acts doubtless would be a nuisance, and punishable as a crime in the state courts as at common law. But an obstruction of a public highway within the limits of the state, by its own permission, probably could not be punished as a crime there, if the act of incorporation by the state permitting it be constitutional. 15 Wend. 114; [Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co.] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 245; Dover v. Portsmouth Bridge, 17 N. H. (Strafford county, 1846) 200. It would be difficult to regard that as an offence against state laws which has been done in conformity to them, under an act of incorporation from them. She is, perhaps, the best judge on all local matters, all sections and interests being represented in her public councils; and at least if she, for public considerations, authorizes a bridge under certain restrictions and limitations, which she deems safe, it would be an anomaly for her herself to consider its erection a crime. If she authorizes it injudiciously, and injures navigation to her ports more than she benefits interior travel and trade, she is the chief sufferer.

Such being the condition of state powers, state rights and state laws on this subject, without reference to the constitution of the United States, the next inquiry is, how have these been affected by that constitution, either by prohibitions to the states, or by the grants to the general government before referred to, and the legislation which has taken place under them? After the federal constitution was adopted, if a law by a state on this subject violated any prohibitory clause in it, or any act of congress, duly enforcing any grant of power from the states, it would of course be unconstitutional; but whether it would then be a crime, under the federal government, and punishable by indictment in this court, as legislation now stands, depends on still other considerations, which will soon be examined. Before deciding what part, if any, of the constitution, the acts done by the respondents violated in any degree, we must ascertain what authority in respect to such subjects the states parted with. The powers not granted by the states remained as before; that is, they were reserved to the states or the people, as either may have exercised them before. Thus in Miln v. New York, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102, 139, it is held, that the powers reserved to the states are usually unaffected by the federal constitution. Again, the states may continue to legislate for internal commerce, for police, for roads, ferries, canals, &c., and regulate all, and "the use of them, where such regulations do not interfere with the free navigation of the waters of the state for purposes of commercial intercourse, nor with the trade within the state, which the laws of the United States permit to be carried on." Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230]. Three kinds of commerce are confided to the general government,—foreign, between the states, and with the Indians. Hence, congress possesses the power to regulate them, over those navigable waters, and to punish offences in public vessels sailing upon those waters. [Pollard v. Hagan] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 230; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 387. In this instance, it is contended, that the doings by and under the state interfere with and obstruct foreign commerce and that between the states. But this is not done eo nomine, nor was such the avowed design; for Massachusetts was regulating domestic or internal commerce, and hence acting on a subject not granted at all to congress, but among those reserved. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 419, 452 (Thompson, J.); Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, 194 And the only ground of complaint in such a case is, that the state has so exercised her power over that reserved subject as to impair the rights of the public and the general government, as to foreign commerce or that between the states. Do the acts, authorized to be done by Massachusetts, violate then any thing delegated to the general government over foreign commerce, or that between the states? And if so, is such a violation made a crime by the general government, and the trial of it devolved on this court?

In order to consider a state law as void, because conflicting with one of the United States, it must not only affect the subject-matter, have some influence over it, but be directly incompatible or repugnant,—an extreme inconvenience to it. 1 Story, Const. 432. Then must interpose, but not till then, the supremacy of the laws of the general government within its proper sphere, prevailing over those of the states, when so using their own as to encroach on others. If "clashing sovereignties" come before us —if one claims a right to set up what the other claims a right to pull down, or one to use powers of taxation so as to abuse them, and violate what is confided to the general government—then we must decide which is right, and if the general government is, then its laws must be paramount, and prevail. Holding the laws of the state to be subordinate when in conflict, is not giving to the United States any odious supremacy; but merely saying, that when the states have parted with certain powers to congress, they shall not so continue to exercise what are reserved as to impair the grant and use of those they have, for paramount public objects, confided elsewhere. Verba fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem. The exercise of reserved powers by the state, when conflicting with legitimate acts of congress, must yield, if so used as to be repugnant, as must the exercise of concurrent powers by the states, when becoming repugnant. Otherwise the general government could not move on, and its constitution and laws be paramount even within their proper sphere. [City of New York v. Miln] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 103, 137, 147, 156; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, 195, 209; [Brown v. State of Maryland] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 419, 446; 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 515; Com. v. Kimball, 24 Pick. 359, 365; U. S. v. Hart [Case No. 15,316]; Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 540, 574. This is necessary by the constitution itself (article 6). "This constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." So clearly was it supposed when the constitution was adopted, that the acts of congress under it would prevail over conflicting state laws, that the only objection was, they would ride over the state constitutions also. But Mr. Madison, in the 44th number of the Federalist, shows clearly that they must prevail over state constitutions, also, when conflicting; or there would be no uniformity of laws in operation, over all the Union, but some would be nullified in one state by its constitution, but be in full force in others.

In Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230], in speaking of the power to regulate commerce invested in the general government, the judge says it "comprehends the use of a passage over the navigable waters of the several states," and further, it "renders these waters the public property of the United States for all the purposes of navigation and commercial intercourse, subject only to congressional regulation." Hence, I cannot doubt that the power to regulate commerce abroad and between the states, conferred on congress, authorizes it to keep open and free all navigable streams, from the ocean to the highest ports of delivery or entry, if no higher, and protect the intercourse between two or more states, on all our tide waters. De Lovio v. Boit [Id. 3,776]; [Pollard v. Hagan] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 230; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1; New York v Miln, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102, 135; Ang. Tide Waters, 50. Congress may remove unauthorized obstructions, or punish them by acts of congress, and it may punish injuries on land, if they tend to interfere with foreign commerce and navigation, or those between different states, though mere admiralty powers may not go above the sea. U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72. See in detail, Miln v. New York, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102, 155, by Justice Story.

In the recent case of Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, it has been settled, that jurisdiction in admiralty exists over torts, by collision of vessels, committed above the sea or tide water, however far it flows into the body of a county. But this is not the English law; and it is to be hoped will never be extended in this country to crimes, the subject we are now considering. The powers of congress, however, embrace much wider matters than those of mere admiralty on account of its authority over our foreign relations, and the regulation of our commerce, not only with foreign nations, but between the states. And, as one evidence, that the framers of the constitution meant that the latter should cover matters on land often, as well as at sea, power was given to congress, not only "to define and punish felonies committed on the high seas," but "offences against the law of nations." These last happen as often on land as water; as do offences against the revenue, and the purity of our coin and the security of the mails, and of all public property. Mere admiralty authority is much more restricted. By that, also, as well as by the authority to regulate commerce, no soil may pass. The right to the soil is one thing, the right to navigation in the water over it another, and is vested elsewhere, for some purposes, in our government, as well as in other governments.

It seems, that now in England, where a grant is made to a town or city of lands between high and low water mark, it is not to be construed as giving a right to obstruct free navigation, carried on by any, or all people under general rights of trade, such as are enjoyed under our federal government. And where obstructed, a bill may be filed in the exchequer by the attorney general, to restrain and abate the obstruction as a nuisance. Attorney General v. Burridge, 10 Price, 350; Attorney General v. Parmeter, Id. 378. If towns here claim jurisdiction over waters navigable below low water, they have no right to the water, nor any to the soil below high water. Palmer v. Hicks, 6 Johns. 133. For purposes of foreign commerce, and of that from state to state, the navigable rivers of the whole country seem to me to be within the jurisdiction of the general government, with all the powers over them for such purposes (whenever they choose to exercise them), which existed previously in the states, or now exist with parliament in England. So by the civil law, "navigable rivers," "the sea and its shores," are destined to common use (1 Domat, lib. 8, § 1, art. 1), and the common use here for conveyance is with the Union. They are a species of highway, and, therefore, cannot be appropriated to private use, except temporarily, either by individuals or corporations. New Orleans v. U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 662, 724, 729. Certainly not, in a permanent manner, unless authorized by the paramount government, which supervises and controls them as highways. There is a very instructive case on this subject in 10 Price, 350 (Attorney General v. Burridge), which seems to have escaped the research of the counsel. It was an information by bill, praying that the defendants might be restrained from obstructing Portsmouth harbor, "so that the sea may again flow and reflow over the piece or parcel of ground mentioned in the bill." The obstruction was by buildings on piles over navigable portions of the harbor, and it was justified under a grant of the soil from the king. It seemed to be conceded, that the king may own the shore between high and low water, and grant any private interest in it. See pages 369 and 401. Such is the doctrine as to the states. [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 383. But it was, also, held, that the people, or, in other words, the public, have a right to the navigation, and an interest in all ports. 10 Price, 372. Hale, De Portibus Maris, pt. 2, c. 7. The king or his grantees have the soil, jus privatum, but subjects generally and alien friends, have a right to navigate the water, a jus publicum; and hence, if the buildings are a nuisance, they can abate them (10 Price, 373, 378), as if on a public highway (2 Anstr. 603). Individuals must use their own so as not to injure others. 10 Price, 378. Sic utere tuo ut non alienum lædas. What does encroach on or straiten the harbor, or lessen the depth of water and navigation, is a fact, questio facti. Id. 374. But when done, it is an offence against the power which supervises the general commerce of the country. Hale, De Portibus Maris, 35, 84. See, also, next case, Attorney General v. Parmeter, 10 Price, 378, 412; Attorney General v. Richards, 2 Anstr. 603, 608. But though congress is enabled to make laws, keeping navigable rivers and navigation unobstructed, as high up at least as the ports of entry and delivery, if not as high up as the waters are navigable, and impose punishments for such obstructions as crimes, yet if it has not been so done, can we punish it as a crime? If we cannot, this stands in the threshold against sustaining the present indictment in a court of the United States, and the act of incorporation by the state, allowing the bridge to be built, stands in the way of punishing the obstruction by it as a crime in the state courts.

Some hold, that a grant being made to congress to regulate foreign commerce, and extend its judicial power to all cases in admiralty, and collect a revenue from imports, and maintain a navy, those grants alone, without any action on them, by the general government, as to bridges and other obstructions, divest the states of all authority to make laws in connection with navigable waters, and that hence such an act of incorporation as exists in this case is unconstitutional and void, and is to be put out of the case as if not existing. While others contend, that as the states have not granted the power to congress over their internal commerce, that remains exclusively in the states, and that under this, they may erect bridges connected with that internal commerce, without being amenable to any supervision or check by the general government; and certainly not, unless the legislation conflicts in point of fact with some which has actually taken place under congress. My own views do not accord exactly with either of these general positions. I think (1) that the power is, by the grants above referred to, vested in congress over navigable waters connected with our foreign and coasting trade, and for purposes of revenue, but does not by those grants prevent the states from continuing their former legislation over them, and especially as to reserved objects, till it conflicts with some laws passed by congress under those grants, or some treaties made, or some express provisions of the constitution. [Holmes v. Jennison] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 594. And (2) that when the states exercise the powers reserved, as to their internal commerce and police, they may do it with impunity, while not in conflict with any thing before done on the part of the general government. But when in conflict, the express grant to congress, and the action on it properly by the paramount government, must overrule and control all which is done repugnant to it by the state. 12 Conn. 7.

If it was necessary to admit that the state here, as contended by the prosecution, was exercising a power to regulate that foreign commerce, such as is confided to the general government in the constitution, its conduct was perhaps still valid, till it conflicted with some act passed by congress, or some duty or right under its federal relations. [City of New York v. Miln] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 103; [U. S. v. The Arnistad] 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 574. But it would hardly be necessary in this case to go into that, if all admitted that a state might do this act of empowering a bridge to be erected here, under its reserved rights as to internal commerce. For then of course it would be valid, till conflicting with some paramount act of congress under its conceded authority to regulate foreign commerce and that between the states. [Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co.] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 245. Yet this, as before remarked, being contested, and it being considered by some vital against the constitutionality of the state laws, if affecting a matter of foreign commerce, or that between the states, though not conflicting with any act yet passed by congress, I shall make a few remarks on it here, and refer to others made by me in Peirce v. New Hampshire, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 554, 618.

I think it the safer and sounder opinion, that a mere naked power, unexercised and dormant in the general government, with no prohibition, express or implied, to the states, to act on the same matter, could not make the state legislation upon it nugatory or unconstitutional, much less render acts crimes, which are done under state laws of that description. Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 245. Such are laws as to weights and measures. Besides these, as to disciplining the militia, and on bankruptcy, and regulating the army. Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 449. The subject under consideration now, as to roads and bridges, was, however, never of that mere doubtful character, but was among the powers supposed to be reserved to the states, where it before belonged. [Gibbons v. Ogden] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 203. It was always to continue to be exercised by them for domestic or interior commerce within each state, that branch of commerce not having been granted at all to the general government. And, as hereafter explained, it could never be questioned in its exercise till it impaired or encroached on some power over foreign commerce, or that between the states, which had been confided to all the states united. If the states can and will, till special legislation by congress, punish such acts as they deem injurious to the public interests, and do it either under their reserved or concurrent powers, no necessity exists for any forced construction to enable this court to act, in order to prevent such wrongs from going unprosecuted. If done under their reserved powers, and able to be vindicated under them, their right is clear. But if done as a concurrent power, and relating to some local matter, connected with foreign commerce, either allowing or punishing it, their right is less clear, but in my view, can be successfully vindicated.

Supposing that I have not succeeded in showing this act of incorporation, and the conduct of the defendants under it to be legal under the reserved powers of the states, it seems to me legal as before intimated, under a concurrent right in the states to legislate on local matters connected with foreign commerce, till coming in actual and serious collision with some measures by congress. My reasons for this opinion are these. The states were the great fountains of legislation, the bulwarks of social and civil rights. Where they had acted before the constitution, they would be likely to continue to provide as to local matters within their own limits, till congress got ready to provide for them, when the power was granted to congress. This would especially be the case as to such pressing and interesting matters as commerce. The constitution, when not expressly forbidding the states to act longer on the matter, nor forbidding it by necessary implication, seems to allow it, and the continuance of some local state cognizance over it is often requisite for the public peace and safety. Hence, it has become the more prevailing doctrine among jurists and statesmen in these cases of powers bestowed on congress, and not expressly, or from the nature of the case, prohibited to the states; that till congress find it expedient to make specific laws under them, the authority of the states must be regarded as still continuing, in order to preserve order and the public tranquility, and to regulate and punish, or license and uphold local measures according to the views of each state, or the interests of the community within its boundaries. Because otherwise, there could be no punishment for some of the most flagrant outrages, and because the makers of the constitution well knew, that congress could not at once and forthwith provide for the full exercise of all its clear powers, if it wished, and would find it expedient not to use some, till time and occasion might develop the necessity of using what had been confided to it, and then would provide for the emergency by further and specific legislation. In the mean time, considering the states as still legally entitled to preserve the public interests and peace within their limits, and punish violations of them, in cases where they did it before, would not be derogatory to the general government, nor strip it of any legitimate authority; it would treat the continued exercise of such powers by the states as only concurrent, or rather subordinate, till the general government found it expedient to legislate, and then of course the concurrent or subordinate authority of the states, yielding to the exercise of the same authority by the general government, which it had been empowered to use, and whose exercise of it, where once commenced, would be paramount.

The following books and cases sustain this course of reasoning: 4 Elliott, Deb. 367; 3 Jeff. Sp. 425–429; Peck, Tr. 401, 434, 435; [Fisher v. Blight] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 397; 3 Serg. & R. 179; [Sturges v. Crowninshield] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 196, 198. See others, post, and in Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 1, 49; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 196; Willson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 245; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539, 627, 655, 664; 9 Johns. 568; Miln v. New York, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 103, 132 (by Thompson, J.); [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 386; Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 386; 1 Kent, Comm. 364. This view is not limited to that class of cases, where the states have not granted to the general government any power, though bordering closely on express grants, as in case of fisheries. They still retain the power to regulate these on their rivers and on their coasts as before, and have never parted with the power over them. Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230]; Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 367. So as to quarantine laws, police regulations, ferries, and roads and bridges, the states retain the general power over them all. Miln v. New York, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102, 141, 142, 151.* So in respect to pilots, they continue to legislate by the express assent of congress; and it is not, in my view, a truth that the states and the people have not granted power to congress, which may affect ferries, roads, and bridges, in certain cases, by granting authority to the general government to regulate commerce, foreign and between the states, but probably that, till congress act on the subject, the states should continue to act for reasons before stated, and when congress have legislated on a part only, should afterwards continue to act so far as congress have not come in collision with the state laws.

The cases of the militia, and of bankrupt laws, weights and measures, taxation of land, &c., have been before referred to, and are familar cases, where the states have continued for half a century to act, when congress did not conflict with them, though they are powers clearly and expressly granted to the general government, in the same language and article with those as to commerce, but not seeming to be exclusive in their character. And in numerous other instances, since the first years of the operations of the government, the courts of the United States have, for the first time, been specially empowered to try for offences in cases, where previously they possessed no such authority to do it, and where previously even the acts complained of were not offences by any laws in force under the government of the United States. See many cases as to crimes, in the act of March, 1825. It is, at the same time, conceded that the courts of the United States have felt indisposed to decide cases on this ground, when able to dispose of them on other grounds. Hence, in Miln v. New York, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102, the judgment was rendered on the ground, that the state was exercising a reserved right, and so in Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 509; and so a part of the court in Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 540, 580. But Justice Thompson, in the former, held this doctrine, and Chief Justice Taney seemed to do it in the latter, though he said [Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. (40 U. S.) 509] it was not yet decided, nor was it necessary to decide, whether a state law was not good as to foreign commerce, till it conflicted with some act by congress.

In the recent decision in what are called the "License Cases," 5 How. [46 U. S.] 504, some members of the court went into this question, and held, that if the license laws were regulations, affecting our commerce abroad or between the states, they were defensible as local measures, not intended to encroach on the acts of congress, and not in fact impugning any of their provisions to produce uniformity, and regulate generally, the trade of navigation of the country. They were like colonial laws in respect to a parent country, or by-laws of cities, towns, and corporations, as compared with their charters, or rules of the navy and war departments, and of courts under general provisions organizing them. All are permissible, yet all subordinate, and none are void till repugnant and inconsistent. See the License Cases, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 504. Thus, for illustration, congress has made no provision for keeping many of our ports and harbors free from sand-bars and deposits of mud, so as to enable vessels engaged in the foreign or coasting trade to enter and depart under the general regulations of commerce for that purpose; and some have deemed it unconstitutional for congress to expend money on such objects. But cannot the states remove those bars and deposits? States and cities have often done this. Because congress has made the place a port of entry, can the states do nothing in relation to it, under the idea that the power of congress is exclusive? Cannot the states and cities under them, also, appoint harbor masters to regulate ballast, and the place of anchorage of the foreign vessels? Cannot they make or authorize wharves, at which the vessels can unload? or prescribe how their fires shall be extinguished or guarded while in port, so as to prevent conflagration to the shipping and the town?

It is not mere quarantine or health laws, or inspection laws, or police laws, or pauper laws, or bridges and roads, or laws as to internal commerce within the state, all of which may be considered as reserved, and the power over them never granted, but much as to the improvement and regulation of harbors and vessels in port in other respects, the loading and unloading, and various minutiæ, some as to pilotage, and some as to the crews, all connected with the vessels engaged in foreign navigation, as well as others, but not directing any thing in respect to them, which conflicts with any actual existing legislation by congress.

In [Holmes v. Jennison] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 579, the chief justice and a majority of the court, held, that unless the power was exclusive in the general government, a state might continue to exercise it, if she had done it before the constitution; and that it was not exclusive, unless expressly forbidden to the states, or in its character, one which should be exercised alone by the general government, and implies an exclusion of the states entirely; e. g. legislation over the District of Columbia (page 589). On such principles if, says Justice Barbour, "they can be construed as being exclusive," "then the necessary consequence is, that the states cannot exercise them, whether the general government shall or shall not think proper to exercise them. If, on the contrary, they are not exclusive, but concurrent, then the states may rightfully exercise them, and no question of repugnancy can ever arise whilst the power remains dormant and unexecuted by the general government." As some powers are expressly prohibited to the states, this raises a presumption that all are, which it was meant should be. And as these local powers in connection with foreign commerce are not expressly forbidden to the states, they were not to be so considered, and have not been in practice for the last half century. The advocates of the exclusiveness of this power in congress, will no more allow the states to act, where congress has not acted, than where it has. They hold, that the power is gone from the states entirely, and that congress by its silence as emphatically speaks, that nothing shall be done, as by its legislation that something shall be. The Chusan [Case No. 2,717]; Golden v. Prince [Id. 5,509]; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539, 618; [Gibbons v. Ogden] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 209; Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 504 (by McLean, J.), 511 (by Baldwin, J.); Miln v. New York, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 158 (by Story, J.); [Houston v. Moore], 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 1, 21, 22; [Brown v. State of Maryland] 12 Wheat. 438. But how does this tally with the fact that the general government, under the new constitution, went into effect March 3d, 1789? Owens v. Speed, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 420. Most of the important laws as to imposts, ports of entry, and the judiciary, did not pass for some months after. See 1 Laws by Litt. & B. 24, 27, 72. Hence, on this theory it is obvious, that an entire interregnum of law has existed, and must exist in many cases, till congress legislate expressly on matters that have been confided to it.

I am not here going into the powers expressly reserved to, and left with, the states, but those which are granted, though in their nature not granted exclusively in every respect, local or otherwise, and not exercised in hostility, but in allegiance and subordination to the general government. [M'Ilvaine v. Cox] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 297; 9 Johns. 507; 3 Serg. & R. 179. A regulation by a state may aid or co-operate with an act of congress, be a friend and not an enemy, and though it is not a police one, yet if within the legislative scope of the action of a sovereign state, it may move on till impinging against something actually prohibited to the states, or actually and legitimately done by congress contrary to it. See case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539, 657, views of the minority. The idea, that because congress can act on the matter, but have not, all state action, though favorable and assisting the object, is ipso facto void, seems to me entirely untenable. Daniel, J., page 657, and Thompson, J., page 635. And it is equally void in the views of some if the action of the state coincides and aids any exercise of powers by congress, as if conflicting with it. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 651. All permitted to the general government, is not enjoined to be done, and at once, but only when necessary, useful or required by public exigencies, e. g. to declare war, to borrow money, to lay and collect taxes, as well as to regulate commerce. And when some loans are needed, or some taxes, or some regulations of commerce, it does not follow that all are, or all these powers at once are to be acted on and exhausted; or that the states cannot continue to borrow money, or collect taxes, or pass any local laws concerning commercial matters, when not expressly prohibited, and not conflicting with those by congress for general and uniform purposes. [Turner v Bank of North America] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 11; [Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux] 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 61.

All the powers have never yet been legislated on, which are given to congress in the constitution. [M'Intire v. Wood] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 504; Ex parte Cabrera [Case No. 2,278]; Corfield v. Coryell [Id. 3,230]; Livingston v. Van Ingen [Id. 8,420]; [Turner v. Bank of North America] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 10; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 387. The constitution has merely empowered congress to regulate certain matters when its members please. But till they please to do it, and in all which congress do not please to touch at any time, the states may usefully continue to regulate the subject within their respective limits, till congress finds it expedient and a duty to act, for the whole. See cases before cited. In one part of the constitution (article 1, § 10) the states are at once and absolutely prohibited longer to do certain things, and then of course there is no concurrent power; as for instance, "no state shall declare war," "no state shall make any thing but gold and silver a tender," "no state shall emit bills of credit," &c. But in other places, and especially as to the regulation of commerce, it is not so. It is not "no state shall longer regulate commerce," but "congress shall have power" "to regulate commerce, or foreign," &c., and so is the grant. That is, congress shall have power to regulate it whenever and to whatever extent it pleases, but in the mean time till it chooses to regulate it, and in all it leaves unregulated of a local character, the states are not prohibited to do what they before had a right to do. Congress may in terms, also, be at times invested exclusively with a power, or its further exercise by a state may be inconsistent, incompatible, or absurd. Such is the government of the District of Columbia, or of the navy. They stand, of course, like prohibitions, and are governed accordingly. Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 49.

It is not a little singular, that amidst so high-toned and broad constructions as Hamilton generally adopted, he still acquiesced in this system of construction concerning the grants of judicial power to the general government, and held them never to oust that of the states before existing, unless clearly contradictory. In No. 82 of the Federalist he says: "But as the plan of the convention aims only at a partial union or consolidation, the state governments would clearly retain all the rights of sovereignty, which they before had, and which were not, by that act, exclusively delegated to congress. This exclusive delegation, or rather this alienation of state sovereignty, would only exist in three cases; where the constitution in express terms granted an exclusive authority to the Union; where it granted, in one instance, an authority to the Union, and in another prohibited the states from exercising the like authority; and where it granted an authority to the Union, to which a similar authority in the states would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant." But can it be pretended, that the action by a state on mere local matters of a commercial character, and about which congress has not yet legislated, is contradictory or repugnant? Certainly not, till congress do something concerning this particular matter, and then, as before shown, its laws and regulations must be considered paramount. [Groves v. Slaughter] 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 509. The chief importance in settling the true construction of grants like these, to be such as not to prevent the state courts and state legislatures from continuing to act till congress legislates, is, that it takes away any apology for forced and broad constructions, and a resort to common and admiralty law analogies and aids, without acts of congress evidently and clearly made in order to punish offences. For without such a dangerous construction and resort, they can be punished by the states, if the states please. But if they could not be either so punished or allowed, how would the argument stand? An act would merely go unpunished till congress choose to denounce it as a crime, and provide what court should try it. And for this reason can limited courts like this, under a limited government like that of the United States, assume, that because the people and the states have empowered congress to regulate commerce, and define piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and given to its courts authority over all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the offences connected with these matters are sufficiently defined in the constitution itself? Surely not.

The next question to be examined in detail, and with the care its deep interest to the state and the general government deserves, is, whether the conduct described in this indictment, though at a place where the powers of congress may reach for commercial purposes, can be regarded as a crime by this court, unless it has been clearly so declared by the constitution, or a treaty, or an act of congress, and its trial devolved on us? Various decisions have been made, which hold that some act of congress, or at least the constitution or a treaty, must expressly define a crime and grant jurisdiction over it to the circuit court, before the latter can sustain an indictment for any conduct supposed to violate the public rights or public peace. And, in accordance with these, it has been further held, that a matter must be presented to a court of the United States in some authorized form, before it becomes a case under the constitution or laws. Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738; [American Ins. Co. v. Canter] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 511. The decisions, above referred to, proceed upon the ground, that the general government itself is one of limited powers, and hence possesses no authority to punish conduct, beyond what is expressly granted to it, or is necessary and proper to carry into effect what is expressly granted. That it hence follows, no conduct can be declared a crime by congress, which does not come within such power. That the constitution, being an organic instrument and form of government for general purposes, does not usually establish courts, and limit their jurisdiction, and parcel out among them and define various offences, but leaves that duty to congress. The definition of treason in article 3, § 2, is almost the only exception.

It is furthermore held, that if congress does not declare particular acts to be offences, and prescribe the extent of punishment and place of trial, though the subject-matter is within the powers granted to the general government, no particular court has any right to try a person for doing these acts, or affix any punishment to them, as every court under the general government is limited to the trial and punishment of such matters, and such only as congress has been pleased to confide to it. [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16

U. S.] 389; [M'Culloch v. State of Maryland] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 407; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 657, 721; 3 Kent, Comm. 333, 341, 364; 1 Kent, Comm. 363.

It has been repeatedly held, that though certain powers are granted to the general government, it is considered that no acts done against them can usually be punished as crimes without specific legislation. Thus, it is said: "The legislative authority of the Union must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the court that shall have jurisdiction of the offence." See U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 34 (Johnson, J.); [Turner v. Bank of North America] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 10, in note to Stanley v. Bank of North America. And again, that acts of congress, as well as the constitution, must generally unite to give jurisdiction to a particular court. 1 Kent, Comm. 294; [Turner v. Bank of North America] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 8; Clarke v. Bazadone, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 212; McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 504. The circuit courts cannot act, unless the power is conferred by congress. Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230]; Barry v. Mercein, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 103. It is unlike the king in England, who has divided all his judicial power among his several courts. So, generally, it is not enough to constitute an act a crime, that it is opposed to some law or the constitution, unless they declare it to be criminal or punishable. It often is but a civil injury or wrong. Evans v. Foster, 1 N. H. 374. Though in many cases, from the nature of the opposition or violation of a law, it may be criminal on common law principles, in other cases it would not be. Is it then an offence under the constitution by construction and a resort to any common law principle? In Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 75, 93, the true guide in answering this question is given: "Courts, which originate in the common law, possess a jurisdiction, which must be regulated by the common law, until some statute may change their established principles; but courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, cannot transcend that jurisdiction" (Marshall, C. J., and page 102, Johnson, J.). Treason is defined in the constitution; but when cases are not clearly within it, courts will leave them to receive such punishment as the legislature in its wisdom may provide. Page 127.

It may also be deemed an exception to the requirement of a specific act of congress in every case, and for all purposes, if the constitution or a treaty should define a crime with precision, as the former does treason, and the latter do at times the crimes where surrenders shall be made, and in the latter the matter should also be within the authority of the treaty making power. (See the extradition treaties with France and England.) But unless they went further and in the constitution or treaty, or elsewhere, designated the court or magistrate to try or examine the offence, that must still be done by legislation, or the jurisdiction in any particular court could not be sustained. (See case of the British Prisoners (Case No. 12,734].) For all the courts of the United States being, as before explained, formed under a constitution of limited powers, and being courts of limited jurisdiction, a case must come within what is confided to any one of them before they can try it. The grant in the constitution of judicial power does not vest it in any court. But by another clause it is vested in the supreme court and such inferior courts as congress may from time to time establish. Congress, therefore, must say how much or what shall vest in one inferior court, and what in another; and how much by one act, and when the residue.

In Livingston v. Van Ingen [Case No. 8,420], the court holds, that when an action at law is given in circuit courts, it does not follow that it may enjoin on the equity side, as no such express grant of jurisdiction is made; but it has been given since by act of congress in 1819. There is no power even in civil matters in this court to take cognizance of them, unless an act of congress has given it. Livingston v. Van Ingen [supra]. If so limited in civil cases, it is a fortiori in criminal cases. Courts when established, get only what is conferred on them by congress, and not what is in the constitution given to congress, except some jurisdiction which is there given to the supreme court, and will soon be referred to in detail. Much power remains dormant in congress, which it is not expedient to exercise at particular periods, or about which congress have not yet agreed how to legislate. Livingston v. Van Ingen [supra]; Corfield v. Coryell [supra].

To enable this court to act, a case must not only fall within the judicial power of the United States, as conferred by the constitution, but jurisdiction over it must have been conferred on the circuit court by some act of congress. Conk. Prac. 69, 88. Such cases alone are those described in the judiciary act, as "cognizable under the authority of the United States." U. S. v. Ravara [Case No. 16,122].

The same doctrine prevails as to a mandamus, except in the District of Columbia. McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 504; [Kendall v. U. S.] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524. So as to suits by the first United States bank, the act of incorporation being silent. Bank of U. S. v. Devereaux, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 61. So as to crimes. U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32; U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336; U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; U. S. v. Smith, Id. 153, 157; U. S. v. Grush [Case No. 15,268]; [U. S. v. Coombs] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 73; [Turner v. Bank of North America] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 10; 3 Kent, Comm. 363. It continues in this way till congress calls into action its otherwise dormant powers, which, as before remarked, it evokes slowly but seldom fully. [McClung v. Ross] 5

Wheat. [18 U. S.] 115, note; Conk. Prac. 70, 71; [Carneal v. Banks] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 190. Indeed we must look entirely to the constitution, treaties, and acts of congress, to see what constitutes an offense in this court. The United States has no unwritten code to give it jurisdiction, though the common law, as before remarked, may be resorted to for analogies and definitions, where jurisdiction is conferred. Over civil cases in admiralty, jurisdiction is expressly given to the district courts by congress by a general grant, and to circuit courts an appeal in them, but not over criminal cases in admiralty, either to the district or circuit courts. Jurisdiction cannot be exercised over the last except as parcelled out and granted by particular acts of congress, or by some general transfer to this court of all cases of a criminal character in admiralty. Conk. Prac. 82, 83; [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 387. The only cases contrary to this are U. S. v. Coolidge [Case No. 14,857], overruled in [U. S. v. Coolidge] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 415, and dicta in De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776], and remarks in the note to [M'Clung v. Ross] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 115, and in U. S. v. M'Gill [Case No. 15,676], by Justice Washington. If concurrent jurisdiction is given to state courts in some cases, then the exclusive jurisdiction in the circuit courts is thus far modified. Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 29. And a judgment in either, is probably a bar to a suit in the other. U. S. v. French [Case No. 15,165]. Id.; 11 Johns. 519. But a mere arrest is not a bar. So a circuit court has no cognizance of military offences, that being by law conferred on courts martial. Id.; 3 Kent, Comm. 341. That is, probably, if happening on the high seas. 1 Kent, Comm. 362. Op. Atty. Gen. 114, 120.

I acquiesce in these principles and in this course of reasoning, as the safest and soundest in our complicated system of government, and one which has the sanction not only of the contemporaneous construction to this effect, placed on it by some of the framers of the constitution, afterwards seated on the bench of the supreme court, but of succeeding times, and of many of the statesmen and jurists of the last half century. It is an exception to a part of this reasoning for the previous action of congress, where the constitution itself provides for a supreme court, and declares some of the matters which shall belong to its jurisdiction, and hence takes from congress any power to dispense with such a tribunal, or to confer the trial of those specified topics on any other tribunal. See article 3, §§ 1, 2. Thus, "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in the supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Section 1. And "in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction. This last has been amended. Amendment 11. In all the other cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the congress shall make." Section 2. This prevents congress from conferring original, or any but appellate jurisdiction on the supreme court in any cases except those specified. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 137, 173; 3 Croke, 75; [Ex parte Kearney] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 42; [U. S. v. Hamilton] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 17. And it is another exception, or perhaps more properly speaking, an incident to the establishment of such a court and other inferior courts under the constitution, that they, like the legislative bodies of the senate and house of representatives, possess authority to punish for contempts in the transaction of the business entrusted to them. It is considered an authority inherent in such bodies appurtenant and indispensable, never necessary under any other governments to be conferred by particular laws, though open as this has been to subsequent legislation, modifying and regulating it, as was done after Judge Peck's impeachment, in respect to courts. See Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 204; [Ex parte Kearney] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 45; Act March 3, 1831; 4 Johns. 317; 9 Johns. 395; U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 33, 34; 6 Johns. 357; 14 East, 1; 5 Dow. 165; [Ex parte Bollman] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 94.

Having thus seen that this indictment cannot be sustained in this court, unless some law of the United States has declared it to be a crime, and given to this court jurisdiction over it, a necessity exists in the next place to examine whether any portions of the constitution, or treaties, or acts of congress have in fact done this; whether any of them have really prohibited as crimes such acts as those of the respondents, and empowered this tribunal to punish them. It is more convenient often, and therefore I am inclined to consider these last questions together, as they depend on like principles and precedents. I do not understand it to be contended that any part of the constitution, or treaties, or acts of congress specifically declares the placing such obstructions as those in navigable tide waters, like those at New Bedford, to be a nuisance, or any other offence against the United States, and punishable by fine or otherwise in this court. But the reliance is chiefly on general provisions and principles involved in them, supposed to be comprehensive enough to include this case.

The discussion on this branch of the case has taken a very wide range, and will receive, as it requires, some detail in its consideration, in order to cover the whole ground. I am not aware of any clauses in the constitution, relied on so much for this purpose, as that in section 8, art. 1, which provides that "congress shall have power" "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes;" and that in the second section of article 3, declaring that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority," and "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction."

We will therefore examine the effect of these clauses first. It will be seen that both of them relate to the powers conferred on congress by the people of the states, and not to the powers conferred by congress on any of the courts of the United States. They merely prescribe the extent to which congress may go in legislating as to commerce, and instead of themselves providing for details in the constitution, they wisely leave to congress to make such regulations as to commerce as it shall deem useful and proper, to define what shall be crimes against it, and declare how they shall be punished, and in what courts. U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72. They proceed, also, to authorize congress in express terms "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations" (section 8), but do not attempt it in the constitution itself. It will be manifest from all the expressions, no less than from the character of the instrument as a more general frame of government, and not one filling up and providing for details of legislation, that these clauses lay down rules as to the powers of congress, rather than the powers of this court and its jurisdiction. It leaves the latter powers as they should be left, to the discretion of congress and the public necessities and welfare, as these may from time to time require congress, within the scope of the authority thus conferred on it, to define and parcel out for trial whatever it may deem unlawful and properly punishable by the judicial tribunals of the United States.

Judge Chase says in a note to Stanly v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 10: "The notion has frequently been entertained, that the federal courts derive their judicial power immediately from the constitution, but the political truth is, that the disposal of the judicial power, except in a few specified instances, belongs to congress. If congress has given the power to this court, we possess it, not otherwise; and if congress has not given the power to us or any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal," and concludes it is not best for congress at once to go as far as it may. [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 387. See cases before. And such would seem to be the conclusion as to crimes by the admiralty law, by like analogies and reasons, except for the expression before referred to in the constitution, saying that the judicial power shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." But that is only one of the enumerated subjects like that "to regulate commerce," which before belonged to the sovereign control of each state, and which by the constitution it was provided should be thereafter placed under the control of the general government, and be acted on by its judicial tribunals. Chief Justice Marshall says in Bevan's Case, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 387: "It proves the power of congress to legislate in this case, not that congress has exercised the power." After that provision, it was still necessary, in order to enable one of its tribunals to try cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, whether civil or criminal, to confer such authority on them to try all such cases, or to try only that portion of them, which congress might then choose to legislate on, and define and entrust to such tribunals. The same necessity existed for the action of congress in this respect, as in respect to another enumerated grant to the judicial power over controversies "between citizens of different states." No court after being created by congress could have ventured to try such a case, under that grant merely in the constitution, without some legal provision, conferring that particular power on that court. And so as to "all cases in law or equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority," though placed within the judicial power of the Union rather than of the states, not one of those cases, whether of a civil or criminal character, could be tried by any particular court of the United States, till an act of congress empowered that court in particular to try it, with the exception before alluded to of cases affecting "ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party," and which with appeals are, by the constitution itself, conferred on the supreme court. The convention knew that admiralty power under the Confederation had been exercised by each state, except at times as to prizes. 1 Mad. Papers, 91, 105; 2 Mad. Papers, 712. They knew that in order to produce uniformity and regulate commerce, the power should thenceforward be exercised by the general government. Hence in the early drafts of the constitution to the supreme court was given jurisdiction over "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." 2 Mad. Papers, 743, 744, and it was to be original there at first. The convention was at first opposed to having any courts but state tribunals and a supreme court of the United States; and after letting the former try all cases, permitted appeals to the supreme court. It, therefore, at first gave also to that supreme court admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as being a matter not suitable for the state tribunals, and at one time struck out entirely any power in congress to establish "inferior courts." 2 Mad. Papers, 729. At last it restored inferior courts, and gave to the supreme court still jurisdiction over admiralty cases and others now in the constitution granted to the judicial power. But it provided, that in other cases, except the trial of the president when impeached, jurisdiction might be devolved on inferior tribunals. 2 Mad. Papers, 1238. Towards the close (page 1556) it assumed the present form, and the jurisdiction of "the judicial power" was extended to admiralty cases, rather than that of the supreme court. But what is decisive, that in doing this they did not mean to adopt the whole admiralty code, criminal and civil, and confer jurisdiction over it on any particular court, but leave that to congress; as it might find it expedient, to define or adopt parts of it from time to time, it proceeded in another clause expressly to authorize congress to make definitions of piracies and maritime felonies. This would have been unnecessary and improper, if the whole admiralty code as to crimes had already been adopted. The reasons for this were, that different punishments in different states existed for these felonies, and as they were under admiralty power, and refer to foreign commerce, and are vague at common law, it was best to enable congress to make them more certain. 9 Mad. Papers, 1348, 1349, and in the Federalist (No. 42) it is also said: "But neither the common nor the statute law of that (Great Britain) or any other nation, ought to be a standard for the proceedings of this, unless previously made its own by legislative adoption." No. 42, by Madison.

When all the powers, not expressly granted to congress, or not necessary and proper to carry those granted into effect, are reserved cautiously to the people and the states, it would hardly answer to enlarge the powers of courts by a very broad construction. If the immediate delegates of the people were to be strictly restrained, much more should be their delegates in the judiciary, whose members are not subject to re-elections and short terms of office. These clauses, then, not seeming to grant these powers to this court, but rather to congress, can they be aided so as to make out the definition of a crime in this case, and confer the trial of it on this court by a resort to any other clause of the constitution or to the common law, or the admiralty law in connection with the constitution?

Looking for a constitutional definition of the present offence, and the power conferred on this court over it, and nothing being found done or completed in either of the great and leading clauses on this subject, that have already been considered, it was not likely to have been done in any other clauses, if not accomplished in those already examined, so important and so germain to the subject. It belonged to topics of commerce and admiralty jurisdiction, and to the power of courts rather than other matters, unless we were justified in expecting the unqualified adoption of some whole code of laws in a constitution. Had there been a provision in it like that of our ancestors at Plymouth Rock, respecting the Mosaic Code, directing the laws of any country or sovereign to be in force till congress could make better ones, and offences under them to be prosecuted in any courts created by congress, the difficulty in this case would have been cured, if the conduct of the respondents should amount to an offence under those laws. Or had there been a provision of a like tenor, adopting the common law, or the civil law, or the admiralty law, as a whole, and placing the execution of them in charge of this court, then our jurisdiction would be clear, if the acts complained of were made an offence under and by them. But no such clause exists, and none was likely to exist for reasons, some of which have already been alluded to, and others that will occur to every reflecting mind. Beside the circumstance, that a constitution is generally designed to regulate the legislative department, as well as others, rather than to make the laws themselves, it is obvious from the great extent of territory and different systems of jurisprudence and numerous people to be operated upon by laws of the United States, that their agents could not find time in one convention to make a constitution and code of laws also, or consider how much of any existing code it was best to adopt absolutely. That they were not delegated to meet for the latter purpose; that, therefore, they did not attempt it; and consequently, instead of doing it or adopting any general code as a guide, they merely empowered congress within certain limits to legislate on certain topics, and, with a view to prevent an interregnum, left of course the state laws in force till congress should do this, except where prohibiting expressly, or by strong implication, the further action of the states on certain subjects. Nor was the convention which formed that instrument ripe and ready to adopt absolutely even the common law, much less the civil or admiralty law, with all their details and with many uncertainties and much vagueness, as to their extent at different dates, and discriminating from which date they should be regarded, as taking effect. [U. S. v. Smith] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 182, by Livingston. The different states had conducted differently as to each of them; some introducing the common law as existing when their ancestors first emigrated hither; some as existing at the Revolution; and some, with large exceptions from it at both periods, of what did not accord with our situation and habits and new form of government. Again, some had adopted much of the civil law in their courts of equity and courts of probate, and others but little, and that only as an appurtenant to their common law tribunals and jurisdiction, and some from their interior position, had adopted nothing of the admiralty law, and others little if any of it as existing peculiarly on the continent of Europe, and others more or less, perhaps, of what prevailed in England at the time of our Revolution. Hence it was wise not to wrangle and divide, as they must, by attempting to introduce, by means of the constitution, the common law of England, or of any one state, or of all the states, so far as it might be in force in all. The uncertainty, as to its extent, the difficulty of fixing it in cases of doubt, and the specific or general exclusion of all parts of it not suitable to our condition, were matters too formidable to be encountered in connection with their other great labors. It is also very inconvenient to adopt in any constitution any code as a part of the law of the land, without at the same time proceeding to make it alterable by legislation alone, as the interests and wants and experience of society might require. Otherwise the smallest change, however urgent, could not be effected, but with all the delay, expense, and formality of amending a constitution, or the whole organic form of government for a great people. Hence the common law of England has been considered as not put in force, directly or indirectly, by means of any clause in the constitution of the United States, so as to create, make, or help to make, any thing an offence, which has not been made so by the constitution itself, or acts of congress passed under it. Dup. Jur. p. 9, says: "The common law of the United States is no longer the source of power or jurisdiction, but the means or instrument through which it is exercised." See, also, Wheaton v. And however courts may properly resort to the common law to aid in giving construction to words used in that constitution and those laws (U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 610, e. g. "robbery"), the body of the common law, as such, does not alone give jurisdiction in any case, and enable the court to declare any acts to be offences under the United States and to try them, where the constitution and the acts of congress have been silent concerning them. [U. S. v. Hudson] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32; [U. S. v. Coolidge] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 415; [Gelston v. Hoyt] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336; [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76.

At the same time, in deciding on private rights in civil cases, which must often be according to the laws of the respective states, the common law will govern us so far as it is in force in each state. U. S. v. Stephenson; U. S. v. Lancaster [supra]; [Elmendorf v. Taylor] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 158. But it will be as the law of that state rather than of the United States. So as to the admiralty law, as a code in civil or criminal matters, it is not adopted and put in force in this court by any part of the constitution. But congress is merely authorized to confer jurisdiction on its courts in cases arising under that law, though it has not yet done so except to the district court in civil cases, as we have already shown.

There being no definition of this particular offense as a crime in the constitution and no right to aid it in such a definition by the common or the admiralty law, and there being also no grant in the constitution to this court to exercise jurisdiction over it, but only a grant to congress to legislate upon such matters, the next inquiry is, has this defect been supplied by any provision in any treaty made in pursuance to the constitution? A treaty being, by the sixth article of the constitution itself, declared to be "the supreme law of the land," it will govern this case if full and detailed upon it. Sometimes treaties may require no appropriations to carry them into effect, or any change of existing laws, being minute enough and explicit enough to be enforced without any new or additional provision, and in such case, it may be the duty of the judicial tribunals to execute them without any act of congress. See British Prisoners [Fed. Cas. No. 12,734]. In other cases and generally, modified, or at least, declaratory, laws will be first necessary. But there is no pretence here that any treaty between this country, and any other, stipulates that obstructions like the bridge of the respondents and its consequences shall be deemed an offence, and be punished by this court on account of its injury to alien friends and their vessels in entering and departing from our ports and harbors. Such obstructions, however, may be prejudicial to foreigners, and to their rights under treaties if allowing trade and navigation here to be interrupted, whether the obstructions be temporary or permanent. But it would be difficult to try them as crimes, when no where declared to be so, or to try them by this court, unless jurisdiction over them is in some appropriate manner clearly conferred on it. Such an obstruction seems to violate the spirit of the treaty of November 19, 1794 (article 3), with England. It stipulated for each party "freely to pass and repass by land or inland navigation, into the respective territories and countries of the two parties on the continent of America," "and to navigate all the lakes, rivers, and waters thereof, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other." 8 Stat. 116. It did not admit vessels "into seaports, harbors, bays, or creeks of his majesty's said territories, nor into such ports of the rivers in his majesty's said territories, as are between the mouth thereof and the highest port of entry from the sea," except in small vessels between Quebec and Montreal, nor yield the admission of British vessels from the sea into rivers of the United States beyond the highest ports of entry for foreign vessels from the sea. But it meant to permit such free navigation up to the highest port of entry here for foreign vessels from the sea; yet no clause has been found in this or any other treaty, making obstructions like these crimes, if placed within the limits of such ports or below them, and giving this court cognizance of them. Whether a civil action would not lie in such case for delay and damage by an alien friend, against the respondents, or by one of our own citizens, without any further legislation, and under existing treaties and existing laws, is a different question, and one to which some attention will be given before I close.

The only other legitimate source of power by this court over this case, is some act of congress. Conk. Prac. 57. None giving it, eo nomine, has been referred to; none is pretended to exist. The one most relied on in support of it substantially, is that of 1789, which in section 11, gives to this court jurisdiction "of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where this act otherwise provides, or the laws of the United States shall otherwise direct." 1 Stat. 79. But this seems to relate rather to the power of the circuit court to try this case, if a crime, than to make it a crime.

Though it is contended by the counsel for the government, that it is an adoption and grant to this court of jurisdiction over all offences which exist under admiralty and maritime law, because all such are "cognizable" under the constitution, and hence "under the authority of the United States," and that the acts now in question are crimes by admiralty law. But if the words "cognizable under the authority of the United States," were meant here to embrace all offences over which the judicial power was extended by the constitution, it would cover all other offences, under that constitution or treaties, without any acts of congress being necessary to define them and confer jurisdiction over them on this court. Again, "cognizable under the authority of the United States," used here as applied to a court, means of course, "triable," or placed under its jurisdiction by the constitution, or treaties, or laws of the United States. See Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524, 637, 648. The word is so used by Blackstone in speaking of "injuries cognizable by the courts maritime or admiralty courts." 2 Bl. Comm. 106. So Bayley, J., says: I think the true construction of this statute is to restrain the operation of the 4th section to cases cognizable in the superior courts. Rex v. Crisp, 1 Barn. & Ald. 282, 287. This act might mean, that the circuit court should exercise jurisdiction over all matters which were made crimes by the constitution or laws, when no particular court was otherwise designated that should try them. But it still leaves the question open, What is a crime by that constitution or those laws? And till the acts complained of in this case are declared to be crimes by the constitution or laws, this court, though having cognizance of all crimes which exist under them, cannot pronounce any acts to be crimes within their purview.

A different construction, if competent under the words of this act of congress, does not seem to accord with its spirit or cotemporaneous construction by congress and the courts. It was early seen that a different course would leave the whole criminal code vague, loose, undefined and uncertain, where certainty in all countries is most desirable. That specific legislation under the general grant in the constitution, would be much safer to property, liberty and life. And finally, that the construction, limiting the expression, "cognizable under the authority of the United States," to what was made cognizable as a crime by any part of the constitution or by any act of congress, was more in unison with the strictness belonging to all criminal codes. Accordingly, under this view, specific legislation at once commenced defining special offences, which otherwise would have been unnecessary. Besides this, the courts of the United States at once held, as before shown, that this kind of legislation was first proper and necessary, in order to make even ordinary offences "cognizable under the authority of the United States," so as to be tried by this court. Other considerations tended to sustain the idea, that this expression as to "authority," referred to what was implicitly enacted by congress,. or expressly declared in the constitution to be crimes, rather than all which might possibly be done by congress under the constitution. Again, had congress declared, that all acts criminal by admiralty and maritime law should be so here, (and certainly, if going further, had said, also, that they should be tried by this court, as offences under the constitution of the United States,) then, probably, they might have been cognizable by us under its "authority," in the same way that congress, having conferred the trial of all civil cases in admiralty on the district courts, they are all triable there. Similar provisions would probably have been made in both cases if the course meant to be pursued was the same in both; and if nothing was said as to the kind of punishment, it might perhaps be as the punishment was in admiralty generally, (or possibly by fine and imprisonment,) and be prosecuted by indictment. For, whatever the law declares to be a crime, it is said must be prosecuted here by indictment, unless a remedy by information is specially given. U. S. v. French [Case No. 16,165]; U. S. v. Mann [Id. 15,718]; [U. S. v. Tyler] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 285. But considering the jealousy of our ancestors as to courts of admiralty, on the ground, that except on confession, for which torture was once used, the proof must be equal to two witnesses, and that no trial by jury was allowed till 28 Hen. VIII., with other reasons hereafter alluded to, the framers of the constitution would not be very likely to mean to adopt its criminal code en masse. Under 28 Hen. VIII., the definition of crimes remained, but not the rules of evidence or trial without a jury. 5 Dane, Abr. 342. And though some of the ancient objections to the admiralty are obviated here by trial in crimes by jury, yet those in respect to its system of proofs in criminal cases might remain, and the prejudices on this subject prevented the exercise of much admiralty power over crimes before the Revolution in any of the thirteen provinces, and still less on any matter during the Revolution and afterwards till the adoption of the constitution, except as connected with subjects of prize. Bains v. The James & Catherine [Case No. 756]. Perhaps I ought to except revenue matters, as by 7 & 8 Wm. III., admiralty courts were allowed to control those here, and punish in a king's court rather than in a colonial one, in order to deprive the colonists of trial by jury when enforcing obnoxious laws of trade. 6 Dane, Abr. 342. If this was in one sense acquiesced in after much resistance, as hopeless to be remedied (see [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 384, 385, arguendo the history of it), it was considered a great grievance in principle, as will be hereafter shown, and a topic of loud, long and most indignant remonstrance, till ended by the Revolution. See on this the opinion of the minority of the court in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. To the illustrations there given, may be added the express provision in the bill of rights in the constitution of New Hampshire (article 20), that the trial of jury shall be sacred in all cases, except those happening "on the high seas," and "seamen's wages."

It is true at the same time, that when forming a general government, whose chief duty was in respect to foreign affairs and foreign commerce, and its regulation not only abroad, but between the states, the sagacious framers of the constitution saw that it should be invested with all the admiralty and maritime powers which might be proper to be exercised within our own territory. Hence they conferred the exercise of them on that government, but still left that government in its legislation to bestow at once, or gradually, all or a part of the civil powers in admiralty on such courts as it deemed most appropriate, and all or a part of the criminal powers in admiralty in a like manner, under such limitations and restrictions of every kind as it might think useful. Hence, likewise, congress, in order to carry on at once the ordinary business in admiralty, connected with commerce and navigation, bestowed all power "in civil cases" on the district courts. But it saw and knew the difference between the clause in the constitution and their own legislation, and instead of copying it so as to embrace "all cases in admiralty," limited the power given to only "civil cases" in admiralty. Now, if congress intended to reserve the criminal cases in admiralty, and bestow a jurisdiction over them generally on the circuit court, it would probably have proceeded to do so in terms ipsissimis verbis. But, instead of that, it then and since merely selected out particular cases of admiralty offences, defined them, and conferred jurisdiction on this court over them under certain limitations and without specifying whether it exercised power over them as crimes in admiralty, or under its authority to regulate commerce, or under some other constitutional grant. Indeed, it is hardly to be presumed that congress intended by the act under consideration to confer power on this court to try, as a crime, any thing which might be made a crime, but which had not been made nor defined to be one, either in the constitution itself or any law, when such caution was used in defining some crimes, and imposing restrictions and limitations as to others.

The act of March 3, 1825, which defines so many, and makes them, like others enumerated in the act of 1790, specifically punishable in the circuit court, generally does not give jurisdiction to this court, unless the offence is defined and its punishment prescribed, if on the water, as committed on the "seas," or "upon the high seas, or in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin or bay within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state." See sections 4, 6.

Generally, too, cases of crimes come to this court only where a state has no jurisdiction. [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. Such was the definition by Blackstone of the admiralty court, to try cases without the jurisdiction of the common law courts on the seas. It is a wise policy to leave as much with the states as may be, though congress has the power to go further in some cases if it pleases. [Turner v. Bank of North America] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 11; [Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux] 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 61; Bains v. The James & Catherine [supra]; [Rhode Island v. Massachusetts] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 721; [Martin v. Hunter] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 326; [M'Culloch v. Maryland] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 407; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 389.

Another forcible reason why congress did not mean to have any criminal cases in admiralty, "cognizable" as such by this court, originally, was, that this was not the admiralty and maritime court created by congress under the constitution. Jensen v. Vrow Christina Magdalena [Case No. 7,216]. That was the district court. [Glass v. The Betsey] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 6. And had congress intended to confer general criminal jurisdiction in such cases on any court, it would have been likely to have given it to that court as it did the civil cases, and allowed the trials in the former to be by jury there, as they must have done under the sixth amendment of the constitution, as well as under a provision in the body of it. Article 3, § 2. Appeals in cases criminal as well as in civil could have been allowed to this court; but without an express allowance, this court never has got any jurisdiction by general grant or implication as a court of admiralty, because it was not such a court originally, and was never converted into one since. The Vrow Christina Magdalena [supra].

It is another decisive objection to a construction of the act of 1789, which would, under the words "cognizable under the authority of the United States," embrace all admiralty crimes, as existing here or abroad at the Revolution, that this branch of our criminal code would thus be left very uncertain as to the crimes themselves thus intended to be embraced. Laws defining crimes should be precise and clear, so that all men may know easily what they are to avoid. U. S. v. Sharp [Case No. 16,264]. And it is most dangerous, by mere construction, to convert that into an offence which is otherwise permitted. By the opposite view it would be left uncertain at what era and place the admiralty law, as to crimes, was meant to be adopted, and thus doubtful whether this very offence, described in this indictment, was intended to be embraced, and questionable whether the kind of punishments in any case, where the punishments happened to vary, was to be affixed according to Rhodian or Roman law, the assizes of Jerusalem or the consular system, the Danish, French or English codes, or those of some other period and people since the voyage of the Argonauts.

It is a matter of some regret that congress had not been a little more slow, cautious, and discriminating, when they conferred jurisdiction in all civil cases, and had not either enumerated what it considered properly as civil cases in admiralty, specifying subjects and places, or referred to some era, or code, or country as to its civil admiralty jurisdiction as a guide. Misera est servitus ubi lex est vaga aut incerta. For now in that, as we should be obliged to do in crimes, had power over them been given, one judge thinks he ought to go to the Rhodian laws for the test, another to the Consulato del Mare, another to the laws of Oleron, another to those of Wisby, another to the era before Richard II., another to the black book of the admiralty, another to 13 and 15 Rich. II., another to the act of parliament of 28 Hen. VIII., and others to periods still later. See [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. Some trace the power which is to be the standard, to Saxon, some to Norman, some to Saracen or Carthagenian, some to Roman, and some to Turk or Crusader. Again, one judge gets admiralty jurisdiction both criminal and civil by the locality of the act, as if on the ocean at all; another, if on it, where the tide ebbs and flows; another, if on it, without the limits of a country; another, if on great rivers navigable below their bridges, though not salt; another, by the subject-matter, if maritime or not; another, by the parties, if seamen or landsmen. See cases in the precedent last cited. This same uncertainty exists about what are maritime contracts, as may be seen by the order of the supreme court at the same session for a re-argument in New Jersey Co. v. Merchants' Bank [6 How. (47 U. S.) 344], in a libel on a domestic charter party in admiralty, where the court was supposed to be equally divided as to jurisdiction. Such vagueness and uncertainty, even in civil cases, have agitated the courts of the United States the whole half century of their existence, and it may have been foreseen, as still more objectionable, in respect to the crimes punishable in admiralty, and probably this helped to lead to a refusal to legislate in the same general way as to them. As to them they have selected out particular and urgent cases for punishment, within careful limits, as to the places where they occurred, and made them punishable in such cases only, leaving the others to the state tribunals, till some failure of justice or emergency for new power to prevent guilt from escape, should justify and require further provisions for punishment by the courts of the general government.

That these are no imaginary uncertainties, which stand in the way of supposing such a code was meant to be adopted in cases where life and liberty were at stake, some judges have deliberately held, that we should go to the continent of Europe to ascertain what our admiralty law is, and not to England. See cases in the precedent just referred to. Others, that we must go to England alone. They differ vitally, also, as to eras of the admiralty, when its laws and practice are in force here, whether civil or criminal, and going only to England for the law, as most do. U. S. v. McGill [Case No. 15,676]. Some hold, that the constitution referred to the admiralty law as existing in England before the important legislation of 13 and 15 Rich II. See in [M'Clung v. Ross] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 114, note; Conk. Prac. 145; The Amiable Nancy [Case No. 331]. And again and again it is insisted that these statutes, the great landmarks of admiralty law in England, are not in force here at all. See The Jerusalem [Case No. 7,294]; De Lovio v.

Boit [Id. 3,776]; Hall, Prac. 17 Pref.; Stevens v. The Sandwich [Case No. 13,409]; Steele v. Thacher [Id. 13,348]; [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. While others maintain that they involved the inestimable trial by jury, and the highly prized principles of the common law against the civil code of a foreign conqueror, and came here with our fathers as much as Magna Charta itself, and were in as full force in Maine and Georgia as in the county of Kent or Bristol in England. See [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441 (opinion of minority). Others hold the admiralty law throughout to be as it was in England when our ancestors emigrated here. Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 612; (Johnson, J.); 1 Kent, Comm. 377; Conk. Prac. 155. Others limit it as in use in America at the time of our Revolution, and thus collecting it rather from the obscurity and darkness of colonial practice than any other more certain sources. De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]; Hart v. The Littlejohn [Id. 6,153], note; The Amiable Nancy [Case No. 331]; Peele v. Merchants' Ins. Co. [Id. 10,905]; Bains v. The James & Catherine [Id. 756]; Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 638 (Johnson, J.). Others modify the time to the period of the adoption of the constitution, which is much the same in effect. 1 Kent, Comm. 377; Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 446. The sounder opinions seem to me those which incline to these last eras. U. S. v. M'Gill [supra], and cases in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. And if a foreign code be thus adopted in the grant of power to congress over it, or in the act of congress as to civil admiralty cases in the district courts, it must probably be considered the code as then existing, and not as at some prior period. Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524. Thus in England, the control and curtailments which had been exercised by the common law courts, were recognized as proper and obligatory, according to some, and the admiralty courts had at last submitted in England to the claims of the common law courts, and the contest was at a rest. 1 Law J. 425; Hall, Adm. But the supreme court ([Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441) has recently, by five to three of its members, given a judgment in a case of collision of vessels on the Mississippi, two hundred miles above the ocean, and where it is very doubtful whether the influence of the tides is felt at all, and within the heart of a county in Louisiana, for reasons entirely different from some which have been suggested by me as the true test of what admiralty law ought to prevail here. But those reasons being dissented from by four to four of the court, I do not undertake to state or adopt them, though the judgment of the court on the point then in controversy is binding, and will be respected by me till changed. But that judgment is confined to maritime torts, not embracing the subject of crimes now under consideration. In short, then, if we look to English decisions as to crimes, being those referred to in "cases of admiralty" in the constitution, and in the act of 1789, the English precedents are to control us. There the admiralty court is governed by the civil law, the law marine and law merchant, unless where those laws are controlled by the statute law of the realm or by the authority of the municipal courts, which unquestionably possess a superintending power, and might restrain that court, should it overstep the just limits of its jurisdiction. The Neptune, 3 Hagg. Adm. 129, 136. See "Prohibitions," 3 Bl. Comm. 112; Curt. Merch. Seam. 344; Zane v. The President [Case No. 18,201]; 6 Bane, Abr. 350, "Prohibitions." Except in prize admiralty jurisdiction, these powers must extend or contract as "authorized usage and established authority" require, but not go beyond these, as it is a suspected jurisdiction, not being exercised with juries. 2 Hagg. Adm. 55. In fine, then, according to such views, the maritime laws of England, in force or existing at our Revolution, must be the chief guide. Few admiralty decisions were then reported, and we must go to common law courts for cases and rules, as to them, when in collision. Gardner v. The New Jersey [Case No. 5,233]; Thompson v. The Catharina [Id. 13,949]. Next the Roman and civil law, where no English cases or statutes are to be found. Walton v. The Neptune [Id. 17,135]. We must include in English, the laws of Oleron, &c., except as by statute overruled and disused in case of punishments harsh and barbarous. Walton v. The Neptune [supra]; Com. Dig. "Admiralty," E. 112; Percival v. Hickey, 18 Johns. 257, 292.

Courts of admiralty do not proceed according to the law of nations, except in cases of prize (18 Johns. 271, arg.); or unless suits are brought in admiralty under the law of nations, on the instance side of the court (18 Johns. 279, arg.; Doug. 648). There if the common law is resorted to for a definition or principles, it covers the law of nations, as whatever is penal by the law of nations is by the common law. [U. S. v. Smith] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 176, note.

But to show still further uncertainties in the admiralty law, if adopted en masse as to crimes, some others, in the teeth of all this, hold, that the decisions of the common law courts in England, restraining and limiting the admiralty jurisdiction, though well settled before A. D. 1776, are not to be respected and enforced here. The Jerusalem [Case No. 7,294]; Ex parte Lewis [Id. 8,310]; Plummer v. Webb [Id. 11,233]. Those who hold these doctrines, and go to ages before 13 Rich. II., and to the continent of Europe for guides on points well settled in England by statutes and decisions before our Revolution, make every thing vague and afloat on a sea of uncertainty.

If we go to those early ages, to the birthplace of admiralty law in the Mediterranean, where consular courts may have preceded those called admiralty, and where those of the "fisc" may have embraced some admiralty as well as revenue powers, and where under different nations, different forms of government, and in different advances of civilization, different punishments and crimes and rules of admiralty law clearly did prevail on many points, which are we to be governed by? If we were to take the admiralty law as in force here about crimes, and "cognizable under the authority of the United States" by this court, and as it existed elsewhere than in England, or here at the Revolution, which is insisted on in this case as in many others ([Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, and cases cited), all would be uncertain, not only on this, but still other accounts. In Holland, the care of mounds and dikes was confided to the admiralty; in Denmark and Sweden, of the marine; in England, of the navy; in France, of the fisheries. Stevens v. The Sandwich [supra]. It was of little consequence, comparatively, on the Continent, to preserve any settled lines between the admiralty and other courts, as all of them followed the civil law, and had no trials by jury. But when an attempt was made to transfer admiralty courts and powers to England, in which the common law and not the civil prevailed, and the barons, as in Magna Charta, avowed that they were unwilling the laws of England should be changed, nolumus leges Angliæ mutari quæ hujuscunque usitatæ sunt et approbatæ, it soon became important, to protect themselves in the enjoyment of the common law and of the trial by jury, to limit admiralty jurisdiction as was done by 13 and 15 Rich. II., and again, as further modified, in 28 Hen. VIII. It is just as important in this country as in England to discriminate between what really belongs to the admiralty system and courts as admiralty, and what not, and what has of late been conferred on them by statute, which did not belong to them on mere admiralty principles. Indeed it is more important here on account of state laws and state rights; because in the last, as in other things not theirs, not belonging to courts of admiralty at our Revolution, the trial of jury is still a right of the people, and the course of the common law in evidence and a court composed of more than one judge, and a trial by neighbors in their own state tribunals and by their own laws, rather than at a distance and by a different code.

Finally, these conflicts and uncertainties as to what belonged to the admiralty as such, even in civil cases, is one of the strongest reasons for not adopting by a forced construction merely of the constitution, under the act of 1789, the still more vague and doubtful code of admiralty as to crimes.

But there are stronger objections to the idea that our fathers intended by the act of 1789 to confer on this court a cognizance of all the admiralty crimes that existed in England or on the continent in the fourteenth century. A brief reference to the establishment and curtailment of the admiralty power in England, will demonstrate this. The admiralty court was considered by the people of England as an intruder from abroad, not tolerated in its large claims for a single half century, and more and more obnoxious here as well as in England, to the very moment of the Revolution; and hence its powers were not likely to be extended or enlarged here, or hastily adopted and enforced as to crimes. Even the word "admiral" or "admiralty," however long existing in France, or Turkey, or the Mediterranean, or in Arabia ([U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 106, note), appears in the English language but seldom before the fourteenth century, and then Edward III. first organized the admiralty court as a court. Note to [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 113; 2 Bl. Comm. 64, 69; Bac. Abr. "Court of Admiralty." All the records and commissions before King John, if any existed, are said to be lost. Com. Dig. "Admiralty Court"; Selden, Mare Clausum, bk. 2, c. 14. But it is very probable that the whole regular establishment of the admiralty did not exist two generations before 13 and 15 of Rich. II., the immediate successor of Edward III., limited and checked by the parliament, as it deprived the barons of some privileges as to wrecks, and introduced new laws, as the civil, and new modes of trial, as not by jury, and new kinds of evidence, by forced confession or two witnesses. See 28 Hen. VIII.

The practice before Richard II. had been for admiralty without juries, certainly in contracts, and by rules of the civil law to extend jurisdiction so far, that more than half of the commercial jurisprudence of the realm was absorbed in it. [Ramsay v. Allegre] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 616 (Johnson, J.). Its power was not perhaps so much an usurpation on what was practised in other courts on the continent, all of whose tribunals were governed chiefly by the civil law and without juries, and hence magnifying and enlarging admiralty power, did not encroach on the rights of parties there and rules of decision, and on judicatories governed by different laws. But in England, it was a deep and sudden inroad on the former laws of the realm and rights of the people, and was strenuously resisted. The Conqueror was regarded in the eleventh century as prostrating English liberties (Thompson on Magna Charta, p. 1), and one of the new instruments for it, under his successors, was the court of admiralty. One of the great engines by the barons and the people, to protect themselves, was the first charter about the year 1100, under Henry I., and again the great charter, towards the close of that century, under King John, and in which, in article 25th, it was expressly guaranteed, that thereafter persons be tried "according to the judgment of their peers in the king's courts." Thompson's Charter, p. 54, and also p. 55, art. 29. And after the continued breaches of these charters so as to require from thirty to forty compulsory renewals and confirmations of them, a further resort was had to acts of parliament of a more stringent and precise character against the encroachments by the admiralty courts. The nature as well as cause of the curtailment then made of its general claims as to criminal jurisdiction, is no where so well embodied as in the terse and pointed language of the act of parliament itself (13 Rich. II.): "Chapter 5. What things the admiral and his deputy shall meddle. Item.—Forasmuch as a great and common clamor and complaint hath been oftentimes made before this time and yet is, for that the admirals and their deputies hold their session within divers places of this realm as well within franchise as without, accroaching to them greater authority than belonged to their office, in prejudice of our lord the king and the common law of the realm, and in diminishing of divers franchises and in destruction and impoverishing of the common people, it is accorded and assented, that the admirals and their deputies shall not meddle from henceforth of any thing done within the realm, but only of a thing done upon the sea, as it hath been used in the time of the noble prince, King Edward, grandfather of our lord the king that now is." 1 Stat. 385, Ruffhead. To remove any evasions by the general expressions here used of the realm or the sea, this was followed in two years by another statute (title 15, Rich. II. 1391): "In what places the admiral's jurisdiction doth lie." There had been complaints of his encroachments and injuries to king and cities, and is herewith "established that all manner of contracts, places and all other things rising within the bodies of the counties as well by land as by water, and also of wreck of sea, the admiral's court shall have no manner of cognizance, power nor jurisdiction," but shall be tried "by the laws of the land." "Nevertheless of the death of a man and of a mayhem done in great ships being and hovering in the main stream of great rivers only beneath the bridges of the same rivers nigh to the sea, and in none other places of the same rivers the admiral shall have cognizance." This. it will be seen, first limited the criminal as well as civil jurisdiction to acts not done within the body of a county, whether on land or water, except in great ships on great rivers, murder and mayhem, and thus excluded the present case. This is still the law in respect to crimes, in England. Co. Litt. 260; 2 Browne, Adm. & Civ. Law, 487; De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]; La Caux v. Eden, Doug. 594; 4 Coke, 137. If the exception there, "beneath," that is, "below" the bridges, used the word "pountz," in Norman French, which meant points or capes of the land and not "pons," bridges, as some contend (Owen, 122; [Talbot v. Three Brigs] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 106, note; 3 Rowe, Hist. E. L. 198, note), then the places below them were deemed a species of haven outside of the county, and was in keeping with the rest of the act. But no similar provision exists in our legislation about crimes, and if it enlarged admiralty power any in England, we have in this respect shown a disposition to limit or narrow it more than even in 13 Rich. II.

In the struggles of the two following centuries, further curtailments rather than enlargements took place in England in respect to crimes. Hence, after passing first 13 and then 15 Rich. II., throwing the common law jurisdiction over most offences, instead of admiralty, and especially within the body of counties, though on navigable water, next came 28 Hen. VIII., bringing under the cognizance of common law judges in part, and of juries and of common law principles, all the crimes before left for trial in the admiralty courts, and committed even on the high seas and without the body of a county, 2 Browne, Adm. & Civ. Law, 458; [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76, 115, note. See the whole statute in 4 Pick. St. 441, and interesting matters connected with it. 3 Inst. 111; 6 Dane, Abr. 350; Bains v. The James & Catherine [Case No. 756]. It was under this statute that the notorious Captain Kidd was tried at the Old Bailey in 1701, for offences committed in India and elsewhere, charged to be "in admiralty jurisdiction," and by a commission, partly of common law judges, "to execute the office of lord high admiral." 14 How. State Tr. 230, 297. It is said in some books (see cases before cited, and Hall's Prac. XVII. Pref.) that these two statutes do not extend to the colonies in terms. This is true, because these colonies did not then exist. And in Stevens v. The Sandwich [Case No. 13,409], Judge Winchester thinks those statutes, as construed in England, did not apply here. So Steele v. Thacher [Id. 13,348], and De Lovio v. Boit [Id. 3,776]. But in all these, the remarks concerning them are in connection with contracts and not crimes. Our fathers had grown up under those statutes, were attached to their principles, and that of 28 Hen. VIII. came here so, and continued so, as regards crimes. See fully [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. Why not then take admiralty law as in England, at our Revolution, and not as before Rich II., as respects crimes, except as changed in England in the form of trial before our Revolution, by 28th Hen. VIII.? All these statutes, when enacted, extended to all Englishmen, English rights and English liberties, and they have been carried with them, when emigrating to every quarter of the globe as their birthright. All such statutes, as well as the common law, when not inapplicable to our condition (Halsey v. Fairbanks [Case No. 5,964]), were insisted on as a part of our colonial and inestimable privileges. See the case of Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, and cases cited there, and Mayo v. Wilson, 1 N. H. 53, 58; Houghton v. Page, 2 N. H. 42; State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550; 1 Story, Const. 140, note; [Wheaton v. Peters] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 688. They were conformed to in most of the colonies, and their vice admiralty courts, as regards the limits of counties, the common law and juries as to crimes committed within them, till the Revolution, and even to the adoption of the constitution, so far as any traces of such trials can be found here. [Ramsay v. Allegre] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 638, semb.; Bains v. The James & Catherine [Case No. 756]. And crimes never appear in our colonial existence, to have been tried here in admiralty courts, or on admiralty principles, and by the civil law in force there, without juries, except under two express statutes, under Wm. III. and Geo. I., passed to tyrannize over the colonies, crimes were sometimes attempted to be tried by commissioners in vice admiralty courts without a jury. In such a case, in 1769, that court held it had the power to try in Massachusetts a seaman, who had killed a lieutenant for attempting to impress him. But under a vehement public indignation, he was acquitted. Hutch. Hist. of Mass. Bay, p. 236. The admiralty, likewise, was none the less liked by our fathers, because it was one of the instruments used at home, as well as here, to enforce impressments. Com. Dig. "Admiralty, G." Beside this, by 7 and 8 Wm. III. the admiralty courts were made the instruments to punish violations of the laws of trade and navigation in the colonies, and the appointment of their judges were taken by the crown from the lord high admiral (3 Hagg. Adm. 279), and penalties were prosecuted there, and our fathers stripped of jury trials in such cases, and subjected to vexatious forms of proof, the burthen being flung on the claimants in case of seizures, rather than the government, and the informer shielded from costs.

This was resented no where more highly than in Massachusetts, and instead of being acquiesced in gradually, was resisted till the Revolution itself. Thus the Massachusetts house of representatives, in the preliminary contest some years before the Revolution, passed the following resolve (State Papers Mass. p. 51, 1768–1770): "(13) Resolved, that the extension of the powers of the court of admiralty within this province, is a most violent infraction of the right of trials by juries; a right which this house, upon the principles of their British ancestors, hold most dear and sacred; it being the only security of the lives, liberties, and properties of his majesty's subjects here." See Steele v. Thacher [Case No. 13,348].

A volume of similar expressions of censure on the admiralty encroachments here on jury trials and other rights of the colonies, might be presented. In the old congress, in 1774, it was declared to be a special and great grievance to be tried in admiralty for acts "arising within the body of a county." Bains v. The James & Catherine [supra]. In the Declaration of Independence, too, one grievance was "for depriving us in many cases of the benefit of trial by jury." See more fully on this, Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441 (opinion of the minority). Beside what is stated there, it is not a little curious that our forefathers, in only three years after landing at Plymouth Rock, "ordained, 17th December, 1623, by the court then held, that all criminal facts, and also all matters of trespass and debts between man and man should be tried by the verdict of twelve honest men, to be impannelled by authority in the form of a jury on their oaths." Russell's Guide to Plymouth, 169, note. It is shown fully in [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, how tenaciously our fathers insisted that they brought with, and continued in force in the colonies, all laws and rights favorable to the subject, and as to them were stern as the barons of old, in Magna Charta, against changes and encroachments. So, unless by positive statutes at home, admiralty power continued here unenlarged, and rather restricted from what it then was in England, than widened, as many have conjectured. Probably the admiralty in England submitted at first to curtailment with more grace, as the lord high admiral, whose "deputy" the judge in admiralty is (2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 457), was still allowed to hold naval courts martial in fleets and ships, for trying all naval offences, and thus keeping up a police, and preserving the public peace, not only in ships of war, but on the great highway of nations. Id. 487. And the odium attached to capital trials and punishments by courts martial without a jury, would have been such as tending to abolish them, if the parties had not by the terms of enlistment voluntarily stipulated for such trials by military peers, and the exigencies of war did not often render their speedy and summary mode of procedure almost indispensable.

In the mutiny act of 22 Geo. II., a special proviso is introduced, that the powers of naval courts martial shall not extend to any matters still left to admiralty jurisdiction. 1 McArthur, "Courts Martial," 174; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 360, note. And an additional reason, corroborating all this, is, that the admiralty court had not for two centuries in England as an admiralty court, but only through a commission, including other judges and a trial by jury, had any jurisdiction over felonies; and it was doubted whether it had any over misdemeanors at all. Indeed, another strong illustration of the strength of public sentiment in England against trials in the admiralty for any offences whatever, is, that though 28 Hen.

VIII. is in terms relating, not to misdemeanors, but only felonies, yet since its passage, no crimes whatever, whether misdemeanors or felonies, are tried in the court of admiralty by the judge of admiralty alone; but they are all tried by a jury, and all prosecuted in the courts of common law or under a commission, or under special statutes. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, No. 3 App. 519; 2 Chit. Bl.; Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230]. In truth, the better opinion is, that admiralty courts, at the time our constitution was adopted, did not punish misdemeanors; and hence there must be an act of congress to punish such misdemeanors, or no jurisdiction over them exists in the circuit courts. Corfield v. Coryell [supra].

In accordance with this view, by 29 Geo. III., it was enacted, that all other offences than felonies, committed on the high seas, be tried by a commission as by 28 Hen. VIII. Russ. & R. 1, note. And so far from there being any disposition evinced here to depart from such restraints, that the framers of the constitution, in giving congress a power to define "piracies and felonies committed on the nigh seas," undoubtedly meant to go as far as had been gone by 28 Hen. VIII., and cover all offences tried in the admiralty since then, and leave nothing to loose and general construction, as to what was and what was not an offence merely by admiralty law. They meant further, by the 4th and 6th amendments of the constitution, to secure the use of a grand jury in all cases of crimes formerly tried otherwise in admiralty, and a "trial by an impartial jury," and by witnesses face to face. 1 Tr. Bl. 72, 73. And the legislation since (Bains v. The James & Catherine [Case No. 756]), from the start to the present moment, has corresponded by saying, in almost every crime committed on water, that to give the courts of the United States jurisdiction over them, they must, as by 15 Rich. II., be committed out of the body of a county, or, in other words, "out of the jurisdiction of any state." They do not except even those in great ships on the great rivers below the bridges, if within any part of a state.

It is doubtful whether many of the framers of the constitution thought of any criminal jurisdiction in extending judicial powers to cases in admiralty. It was "civil cases." It was those that belonged to commerce. It was a separate grant to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and probably thinking that power had not been embraced in giving authority over cases in admiralty.

When congress came to legislate about cases in admiralty, it did, in order to prevent any doubt, confer on the admiralty court jurisdiction over civil cases only. And it gave cognizance of crimes in admiralty neither to that court nor any other, as over crimes in admiralty, but gave cognizance of several specified offences to the district court, and of several to this court. It is most important to have as much as possible granted by congress under the power to regulate commerce, &c., rather than by admiralty merely, as in the last case no jury is allowed by the constitution, but in others one is, and the trial is also by the state laws, or those of congress, and not by a foreign code. The whole leaning of this court, therefore, in case of any doubt, should be towards obtaining jurisdiction over commercial questions or crimes against navigation and trade by special legislation of congress, rather than by broad constructions of any grants of mere admiralty power. Because there a jury can be used, under the power to regulate commerce. The only prominent attempt to revive here the ancient admiralty jurisdiction over crimes by construction, when committed on the water, within the jurisdiction of a state, has been in U. S. v. Coolidge [Case No. 14,857]. This has been overruled in [U. S. v. Coolidge], 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 415. Some others have been noticed as to revenue seizures and torts, in the case of the Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. And though some have supposed that the word "maritime," added in the constitution after the word "admiralty," might be construed as extending the present meaning of the word "admiralty" (De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]; 3 Story, Const. 527, and note to [M'Clung v. Ross] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 113), yet it would seem to me to raise an implication that it was restrictive, and if any thing had got into admiralty which was not strictly maritime, or happening on the seas, (mare) it was not to be embraced, as the cases must be as admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, that is, of both, must be of things on the sea maritime as well as called admiralty. See, also [The Thomas Jefferson] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 418, 429; [The Orleans v. Phoebus] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175; Thackarey v. Farmer of Salem [Case No. 13,852]. At the utmost, "maritime" and "admiralty" courts are treated as the same, and the expression a plecnasm in Selden on Fleta, and Federalist, No. 8, p. 531. See, also, "Courts Maritime or Admiralty Courts," 3 Bl. Comm. 68, 106.

Again, in another view, the difference now is merely nominal between admiralty and maritime, since the admiralty court has ceased to be military. Stevens v. The Sandwich [Case No. 13,409], note. Hence maritime in the constitution may be to show that no military or naval power is granted in it, but only maritime; and thus, too, it is restrictive rather than enlarging. Now after all this, to suppose that our ancestors intended in any statute, like that of 1790 or 1789, unless their language was more clear and explicit to that effect, to grant a power to this court to try and punish every thing as an offence in particular places which was one in admiralty in England or on the Continent in the fourteenth century, though never since, or on the Continent in 1789, is presuming against what was probable from the whole subject-matter, and the history of ourselves no less than our ancestors, both legal and political. Showing, then, that an act like this was prosecuted in admiralty in England, in the fourteenth century, is not enough to make it a crime now, unless such continued to be the law and usage there at the time of the adoption of our constitution.

The references have been very full by the counsel for the government to prove that the admiralty courts on the continent of Europe formerly, and in England before Richard II., exercised a power over such subjects. And it may not be disputable, that for a brief period, they did, if looking to the ancient commissions and inquisitions, and the usages in France and some parts of the Mediterranean. But the conflicts which quickly arose in respect to the exercise of this and other criminal jurisdiction by the admiralty court in England, led, as before seen, to the restraining statutes of 13 and 15 Rich. II. The struggle was afterwards only occasionally renewed, till it led to a still more restraining, and in some views, more important statute of 28 Hen. VIII., A. D. 1520, which took from the court of admiralty as such all important criminal jurisdiction, and devolved it on a commission, composed of judges at common law as well as in doctors' commons, and required all the trials of crimes to be by a jury. Hence, if congress, in the act of 1789, had expressly conferred on this court jurisdiction to try all criminal cases in admiralty as it did on the district court to try all civil ones, and had declared, that what was criminal by admiralty laws should be so considered and punished by this court, this would have made a stronger case. [U. S. v. Smith] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 153. But still, doubt would exist, whether the acts of the respondents amounted to an offence in admiralty. Certainly they would not, if the correct test as to such an offence be what was understood to be one in England or here when the constitution was adopted, however little doubt might exist if we looked to what was a crime in admiralty before 13 and 15 Rich. II. in England, or since, on the continent of Europe. This will be seen in what has already been stated in respect to the boundary of admiralty jurisdiction, before and after those celebrated curbs on its encroachments.

But beyond this, to render it very improbable that many matters, before treated as crimes in admiralty, continued to be so treated, many will doubtless remember the long struggle between the court of admiralty and courts of common law in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, for jurisdiction over offences as well as civil cases, on navigable waters within the body of a county, and which led to the restraining statutes of Rich. II., and was one with many other quarrels, which terminated in the hanging of some of the judges on both sides. The Chief Justice Tresilian seems to have headed one party, and Arundel, the lord high admiral, the other. 1 Henry, Hist. Eng. 258, 263; 1 Harg. St. Tr. 1.

After such a warning, the admiralty court would not be very likely to encroach again soon into the bodies of counties, and punish as crimes in admiralty there what the common law courts and parliament itself by the restraining statutes of Richard considered as offences to be tried only in the latter tribunals, and which it was afterwards made penal to prosecute in admiralty. Though some of the old commissions to the admirals may have retained their old forms, as to an inquiry into nuisances by seines and weirs for fishing, and rubbish, obstructing navigation, as quoted by Sir Lionel Jenkins and others. See Zouch, Adm. 92; Clerke, Prac. 99; 7th Article of the Practice of the Court of Admiralty, in the Black Book; Bract. p. 12, § 6; Spel. Relics Adm. 286; Constable's Case, 5 Coke, 106; 2 Hale, P. C. 11–20; Rich. I.; Edw. III.; Rich. II.; Hen. VIII. (Ruffhead's Ed. pp. 6, 260, 329, 424, 448); 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 463, 465, 474. Yet in many cases the inquiries were limited to places below or beneath the lowest bridges. See before, and (Zouch, Adm. 92), usually "below" them, or only up to them from the sea (Lex Mercatoria, p. 88; 2 Hale, P. C. 18). They seldom if ever extended into the body of a county, unless sometimes on salt water when the tide was in. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 30; Bac. Abr. "Court of Admiralty"; Constable's Case, 5 Coke, 106. And the common law courts had concurrent jurisdiction as to those crimes in rivers. 2 Hale, P. C. 16, 54; 1 Starkie, 16. Or unless the collection of gravel or rubbish actually obstructed navigation or periled ships and life in great rivers in fresh or "sweet" waters towards the sea below the bridges (Clerke, Prac. p. 119); and this was all before 15 Rich. II., or violated that statute, if the rivers were in the body of the county. See Black Book Adm. c. 34, p. 109. See, also, the Inquisition of Queensboro', in Hall, Adm. Prac. 20, Pref. See the articles drawn up under James I., as to the power of the court of admiralty. Pref. of Hall, Adm. Prac. 24; 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 79; 2 Hale, P. C. 16, 118; Dunl. Adm. Prac. 7. It is true that the Inquisition of Queensboro' was in Edward III. 49 (A. D. 1376.) Zouch, Adm. 34; 4 Partesue Col. 200. But this was before 15 Rich. II., and centuries before our Revolution. As before remarked, Sir Lionel Jenkins also attempted to revive the ancient jurisdiction, and in his charges went nearly as far as before Rich. II. He says, inquire of "all such as have cast ballast, rubbish or filth into our navigable rivers below the bridges next the sea," or stones for lighters to fasten to, and not laid a yard deep in the ground, so harbors not become "choaked up." Curtis, Adm. Dig. 341, Ap. 530, 532. Strictly speaking, he might mean to confine these inquiries to the sea and below bridges, as he says, "all nuisances and abuses upon our salt waters and navigable rivers beneath those bridges which are next the sea" (page 540), and hence not like the present case. But if he did not mean to confine himself to the high seas, or to the era before Rich. II., as to offences, his views are a departure from express statutes and the actual jurisdiction exercised in admiralty as well as common law. [Ramsey v. Allegre] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 635 (Johnson, J.). If he meant to go as far as the words in the ancient and obsolete forms of commissions, as shown in the Black Book of Admiralty, in Clerke's Practice, he meant to violate express acts of parliament, unless keeping below the bridges. The old inquest or inquiry run (article 14, Clerke, Prac. translated into Latin) into "alias causas quascunque super mare, et infra quoscunque rivos, aquas seu rivulos maris," but takes care to add, "usque ad primum pontem emergentes terminare." So in a note to the 14th article in felonies, "felonias spoliationes," the power run to sweet or fresh waters, "aquis dulcibus" as well as "super mare;" but it was only in them "ubi dominus magnus admirallus Angliæ habet aut habere consuevit auctoritatem sive jurisdictionem," i. e. below the first bridges in cases of murder and mayhem. The same attempt was made, by construction of old phrases and otherwise, to depart from the true limits of admiralty jurisdiction, that is, "the high seas," in Massachusetts, when a colony, and was resisted in a remonstrance by the house of representatives, in 1770, as first in the list of their grievances, and by a committee, of which John Hancock and Samuel Adams were members. "We have seen of late innumerable encroachments on our charter; courts of admiralty, extended from the high seas, where, by the compact in the charter, they are confined, to numberless important causes upon land;" followed by a list of other grievances. Mass. State Papers, p. 47.

The modern commission or patent to the judge of admiralty includes several things as of old, but not now by law in his power. 1 Hagg. Adm. 312. Indeed, a great part of the powers given by the terms of the commission are totally inoperative. Id. See, also, The Little Joe, Stew. Vice. Adm. 407. Again, by the resolutions of the judges (Feb. 4, 1632), an attempt was made to revive the ancient jurisdiction of the admiralty concerning obstructions in rivers. This was placed, not on any ground except to try mayhem and murders there in great vessels below the bridges, but as to the admiral, it was said, that "by exposition and equity thereof, he may inquire of and redress all annoyances and obstructions in those rivers that are an impediment to navigation or passage to or from the sea," and not be prohibited. See Dunl. Adm. Prac. 14; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 367, note; Hall, Adm. Prac. 24, 25, Pref. But beside this being probably below only, and not at or above the bridges, those resolutions were not laws, could not abrogate the laws, and were disavowed afterwards as assented to by several of the judges. Hall, Adm. Prac. 26, Pref.; T. Raym. 3; [Ramsay v. Allegre] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 617; Clinton v. The Hannah [Case No. 2,898.] They do not appear ever in this respect to have been practised on. Bac. Abr. "Court of Admiralty, A." Again, this was an exception in a statute of only murder and mayhem in great ships; and it would be most extraordinary to consider an exception expressed, as a good reason for making other exceptions not expressed. On the contrary, the sound legal maxim is expressio unius est exclusio alterius. So of many other matters cited in old books as admiralty powers. They were such as are now obsolete since Rich. II., and with the growth of cities and distribution of such powers among municipal officers and other courts. Thus, when an inquiry in admiralty was ordered as to the anchorage of vessels and their injury to each other in port (Zouch, Adm. p. 97), it related to a maritime matter, and was before Rich. II., and hence took place in admiralty. So as to the demeanor of seamen and ferrymen, and to repress their uncivil manners, it related to maritime men, and was previous to that statute., Zouch, Adm. 91; Lex Mercat. p. 77.

The admiral, at first, merely governed and punished seamen by a sort of naval rather than commercial code. After the navy was separated, and merely protected the mercantile marine, he continued to settle disputes as to matters happening any where on the sea flood, out of the body of counties, as the county magistrates and juries did not exist there, and it seemed to be the appropriate theatre of his power. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 30. Though restrained within the counties, he was powerful without, and the claim of the king to the four narrow seas, and his ancient admiralty jurisdiction over them, were never relaxed. They were beyond the corpus comitatus. See Selden's Right and Domain of the Sea, "Ownership of the Sea," 384; Hale, De Portibus Maris, pp. 85, 86. All nations were in them for a time made to "veil the bonnet." 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 469, 470.

Shutting the admiralty court, then out of all criminal jurisdiction since 13 and 15 Rich. II., and certainly since Hen. VIII., in England, as to matters happening within a county, how could the framers of the constitution or the authors of the act of 1789 mean to use language broad enough to make the present case "cognizable" in admiralty, a case happening several miles within a county? I will not undertake to say, that some of the members of the supreme court, in the recent case [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, have not gone far enough to make the admiralty law, as existing in England in the most remote ages, and as on the continent in more modern times, the true rule for deciding what are or are not within the jurisdiction of admiralty courts here in certain civil cases. The decision will speak for itself. But believing that a majority have not said so, if any of them mean so as to crimes, I do not feel justified in regarding as guides in this instance, any thing which was not deemed proper matter for admiralty cognizance in England at our Revolution, unless made so here by colonial changes or made so since by our constitution and acts of congress. See more fully on this, my dissenting opinion, and the cases there cited.

Look a moment to the facts in the present indictment. Though the acts complained of were committed on salt water, within the ebb and flow of the tide, and where the river was navigable, yet the obstruction is not below, but above, and at the bridge, and is within the body of the county. Where is the instance in England of treating one of the bridges on the great rivers as itself a nuisance, either since or before Rich. II.? But there is no doubt that such an act unauthorized, if an obstruction to navigation, whether by throwing in rubbish or timber, would be a nuisance at common law, and punishable not only there, but in most of the state courts for the trial of crimes and questions at law, rather than of equity or admiralty. See cases, post. As strong proof that the admiralty has not for many centuries punished any nuisances, all the cases reported of prosecutions for nuisances are either in common law courts or in the exchequer by a bill for an injunction. None are found in admiralty, though Sir Lionel Jenkins (1 Zouch, Adm. 88, 96) claimed the power in ports and navigable rivers. Com. Dig. "Admiralty, E." 13. But where is the case of its undisputed exercise in admiralty since Rich. II.? Where at the time of our Revolution? "The water, banks, &c., within ports and havens, are within the power of the commission of sewers." Com. Dig. "Navigation, D." Cal. 38. A penalty for throwing ballast into them is imposed by 19 Geo. II., and is a fine collected before a magistrate and not in admiralty. Id.

The city of London has, by patent or grant, charge of the Thames, as well as the soil under it, and assesses taxes to repair wharves and remove rubbish. Calth. Cas. pp. 122, 123. We have, also, already shown, that the admiralty courts in England punished no misdemeanors when our Revolution took place; and that all their criminal jurisdiction was probably intended by the framers of the constitution to be parcelled out, and indeed conferred on congress, to grant to its courts under other heads, and not as mere admiralty offences.

But to consider that an offence in admiralty, which was committed within a port, within the fauces terræ, the promontories of it, within the jurisdiction of a state, within the body of a county, within the reach of state laws and the state courts, not on board a public ship, or in a fort or lighthouse, or navy-yard under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, not in any ship whatever; and yet, in this age or that of the framers of the constitution, to be regarded as clearly within the cognizance of an admiralty court merely as such, and having no aid from specific acts of congress otherwise reaching and punishing the act as injurious to commerce, or to some other subject like revenue or navigation, placed under its regulation and protection; that, I think, would be a pretty bold stride, whatever may have been the law in England at the time of the Crusades, or in the Mediterranean, where the pliable principles of the civil law, rather than those sturdy and jealous ones of the common law, predominate. Seeing all this difficulty as to what powers of admiralty, at what era and in what country, are in force here, and the doubts even in some civil cases not yet removed ([Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441), it is perhaps fortunate, that congress adopted a different course as to criminal cases, and instead of conferring all power over them in the gross on this or any other court, merely granted it in detail, in particular cases, from time to time, as the public exigencies and obvious expediency required congress to act. In this way congress did not disturb the colonial prejudices against such a broad jurisdiction in admiralty as we and our ancestors had for so many centuries been opposing, and especially in criminal matters. In this way, also, the prejudices in favor of trials in the common law courts, or courts acting on their law side, and on common law principles, and in common law forms, were acquiesced in, and left to the tribunals in each state, without any action on them by congress, or the offences specially defined by acts of congress, and the jurisdiction over them specially given to the circuit court, and given to it, not as a court of admiralty, but as a law court. In this way they avoided collision with the states, the state courts, state jealousies, state jurisdiction and state rights; selecting only for offences acts committed without state jurisdiction, or on the high seas, or in places expressly ceded to the United States.

Having shown, from this cursory view of the history of the curtailment of admiralty jurisdiction in England, that the construction claimed by the prosecution as to what is "cognizable under the authority of the United States," in the act of 1789, could not, on any fair grounds, be intended by its makers, as it thus would become necessary to ride back, and ride over all changes in admiralty since the beginning of the fourteenth century, and having shown that a transaction like this, an obstruction in any waters within a county, has not for centuries been deemed a crime cognizable in admiralty in England or in this country, however exceptionable and punishable it once was in admiralty, or may at times be now in the courts of common law, I might stop as to this. But it is very doubtful whether the place of this offence, even were the act a crime in some places and cognizable in admiralty, was within the criminal jurisdiction of admiralty courts in England or here at the time of the Revolution. An act may be a crime in one place against admiralty law, which is not, if done in another place. This act was not done on the high seas, nor out of the body of a county, though within tide water. Locality in crimes, as in torts, has ever been considered the chief test of admiralty jurisdiction. The very acts of congress which punish crimes connected with maritime affairs, usually require in express terms, that they shall have been committed out "of the jurisdiction of a state;" but the bridge and the nuisance, if any in this case, are confessedly within the body of a county; and though over tide water, are not on the high seas, nor on a narrow arm of the sea or harbor without the boundaries of a county.

This question is in some aspects like the last, but in others is different, and fortifies it, because developing the local boundaries of all criminal jurisdiction in admiralty, whether for nuisances in public waters, or other offences to be without the locus in quo here. I shall, under this head, say nothing of the character and locality of this particular offence as charged in the indictment, except by showing, that all jurisdiction of all crimes in admiralty, with a single exception before named, was in England, both in 1776 and 1789, excluded from a place like this. The general rule is, that the admiralty jurisdiction in crimes, after 15 Rich. II., was only on the sea without the body of a county. Com. Dig. "Admiralty, E," 5, note; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 152. A revolt, under the statute of April 30, 1790, need not be on the high seas, as the statute does not say in this crime it must be out of the jurisdiction of the state, or on the high seas, but only in some ship. U. S. v. Hamilton [Case No. 15,291]; 1 Bro. Laws, 113. But congress makes this a crime within the body of a county, not by its power over admiralty matters, as those matters in crimes do not arise within the county. It is rather by its power to regulate commerce, and punish offences committed in the prosecution of it and in vessels. This may be done on land as well as water in several cases, as congress governs the commerce between the states, often wholly on land. [Brown v. State of Maryland] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 446. The revised act of March 3, 1835, punishes a revolt, if "on the high seas, and in their admiralty jurisdiction," but does not say, out of the limit of a county. 4 Bro. Laws, 776. Hence its meaning in this respect is to be settled, though in other cases the high seas have been held to be the unenclosed ocean. See before, U. S. v. Grush [Case No. 15,268]. Confining a captain on board an American ship, if in port, is punishable. U. S. v. Stevens [Case No. 16,394]. Yet it is not an admiralty case, but one under the power to regulate commerce.

I should have much confidence in this view as to the locality of crimes, in order to give admiralty jurisdiction over them; and that this indictment must fail on this account alone, if on no others, had it not been equally strong as to a like locality of maritime torts being necessary to give admiralty jurisdiction over them; and the supreme court recently, in [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, held that locality in the latter to confer such jurisdiction, need not be on the ocean or outside of a county. They held it might be any where on tide water, though two hundred miles in the interior of a state, and in the centre of one of its counties. To be sure, the decision is carefully confined to the case of collision between vessels, and does not in terms extend to other torts, or to contracts or crimes. But I must confess that my opinion is weakened in respect to this ground concerning crimes. And I abandon all analogies, which had before been relied on by me, on account of a like rule in torts generally. The cases in respect to them may be seen, however, in [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, collected in the dissenting opinion. So also may be seen there the reply as to any contrary reasoning or analogy derived from the locality of contracts, and of cases of seizures for breaches of the laws of revenue and trade on the water.

In other matters more than crimes, connected with admiralty jurisdiction, it may be important at times to discriminate between the sea and the high sea, a river navigable and not navigable, whether the tide ebbs and flows at a particular place or not, and whether jurisdiction does not extend for some purposes to other than our own vessels, beyond the seashore. But I apprehend, that in crimes, "the seas," or "the high seas," or "the ocean," mean much the same (6 Dane, Abr. 348), and that in other matters "the ebb and flow of tide," "the flood mark," or "the sea flood," were often much the same, though not always (De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]). So when it becomes material to decide what is navigable or not, as in the act for revenue seizures on streams navigable from the sea by boats of ten tons burthen, the act of congress in this way itself virtually defines what is meant by the term navigable for that purpose. There may be many places, also, where the tide ebbs and flows, which are not navigable (Mayor of Lynn v. Turner, Cowp. 86); or if navigable, are not public (Id.; 5 Taunt. 86). They may be not public, though the tide ebbs and flows, if made navigable by expense of the owners, and the use by them has been exclusive. Miles v. Rose, Id. 705. But I shall not go into this inquiry, though an interesting one, it not being necessary to dispose of the present motion. Some of the leading cases on it are, Hooker v. Cummings, 20 Johns. 98; People v. Platt, 17 Johns. 195; 3 Caines, 319; 2 Conn. 481; 4 Burrows, 2162; Dav. Ir. K. B. 55; Ang. Tide Waters, 63, 91; Rex v. Smith, 2 Doug. 441; The Planter, 7 Pet. [32 U. The leading views on them may be seen in Soult v. L'Africaine [Case No. 13,179]; Jennings v. Carson's Ex'rs [Id. 7,281], note; 1 Azuni, Mar. Law, 195; 8 Geo. I. c. 12; 3 Hagg. Adm. 289.

A provision, making acts like those of the respondents a crime, and entrusting the trial of them to this court, not being found in the act of congress of 1789, in express words, nor the power being embraced in or under it, by any clear reference to any admiralty code of any age or people, as meant to be adopted by it, nor being likely to be meant as included, from its vagueness, and the exclusion of an offence like this within a county, from the English admiralty code since Rich. II., and admiralty jurisdiction over offences generally not reaching a place like this in England, either in 1776 or 1789, it may next be asked, if this matter was acted on in admiralty in this country, while we were colonies, and has thus, by any implication connected with the act of 1789 and the constitution, become a crime? It seems to be contended, and perhaps ought to be conceded, that if the admiralty code in England had been departed from here, by any voluntary law, or general and uniform usage in this or other matters freely adopted, so as to be likely to be well known and recognized, at the time the constitution was adopted, such modification might be supposed to be adopted by implication. But such an usage on any point in any one of the thirteen colonies, not recognized or acted on in the residue of the thirteen, could not be regarded as thus operating in the minds of the framers of the constitution. This matter, however, has in all its ramifications been examined by me, so far as any means exist in relation to our colonial history, colonial reports, and colonial statutes, in the case of [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. And it will be only necessary to refer to these here, and to say, that in my opinion, notwithstanding the broadness of commissions, copied from old and obsolete forms, the doings under them prove clearly a very close conformity by the vice admiralty courts in the British colonies to the admiralty jurisdiction and principles at home, except where in one or two instances altered by express acts of parliament to harass and oppress them. And if the feelings prevalent here before the Revolution in respect to admiralty powers are evidence of what was meant in the constitution by "cases in admiralty," or in subsequent acts of congress, no doubt can exist, that a restriction rather than enlargement beyond the English practice, even as then existing, was desired, and the trial by jury meant to be more widely secured.

There is not a more striking illustration, that Massachusetts refused to tolerate or approve any of the enlargements and encroachments of admiralty jurisdiction, which in some respects were forced on them while colonies, by statutes at home, than the indignant remonstrances she so often put forth on the subject, emanating from some of her most intelligent patriots. See one specimen before given. This view would not prevent congress, under its power to regulate commerce, and allowing a trial by jury if desired, expressly to invest the district court or this court with jurisdiction over both torts and crimes within the body of a county on tide waters, as it has already invested it with jurisdiction in cases of seizures for breaches of the laws of trade and revenue. But this was never possessed in England by the court of admiralty. It belonged there to the exchequer, and was made an appurtenant here to the admiralty, both before and since the Revolution, because no court of exchequer existed here, and not because it ever was or ever can be in its nature an admiralty power, when the seizure is not only above the ocean and above tide water, but as far into the interior as a boat of ten tons burthen can be floated.. See [Waring v. Clarke] 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. In a like manner, congress, under that power to regulate commerce, has conferred on the district court jurisdiction over maritime matters on the tideless lakes in our interior, but not as belonging to it by means of its admiralty jurisdiction, else this specific grant would have been unnecessary, the court before having cognizance of all civil cases in admiralty, and else the allowance given of a trial by jury would not have been in symmetry. And how much better it is that new powers should thus be conferred and doubtful ones invested in it with certainty, than to force them within it by construction only of grants not specifically embracing them, will be strikingly manifest, when if thus expressly conferred, the inestimable trial by jury exists, and the principles of evidence applied may generally be those of the common law; while in the other grant no trial by jury is allowed, certainly none in civil cases, and they are tried by a different code of law and evidence from what we and our fathers have been much accustomed. Many things look now as if belonging to the admiralty jurisdiction, which do not in modern times belong to it here or in England. Such are lighthouses. But they were granted to the Trinity House, and placed in their charge as early as Hen. VIII. Bac. Abr. "Court of Admiralty." So buoys and beacons, once in charge of the admiralty (1 Sid. 158), have not been of late, except by a patent or grant from parliament. And who ever dreamed here, that the expenditure of the vast sums which have been appropriated in this country for the improvements of rivers and harbors, and the removal of snags, and sawyers, and sand-bars, belonging to the care of the district courts as courts of admiralty in all civil cases? On the contrary, here and in England these have ever been matters of special legislation and general supervision, entirely under other legislative powers. McCulloch's Dict. "Buoys and Beacons." Though lighthouses and beacons have at times, under a special patent, been erected by the admiralty, the duties collected on them and the charge of them belonged to the Trinity House, long before the Revolution. See 8 Eliz.; 4 Inst. 149; Com. Dig. "Navigation, H. Beacon and T." 3.

The powers exercised here by the general government over commerce, and matters and waters connected with it, are not all of admiralty origin and character, but much wider.

So when congress erects lighthouses, and builds breakwaters and a navy, and goes far beyond the admiralty in England at the Revolution, in removing snags and sand-bars, and making moles and piers, and marine hospitals. Bac. Abr. "Court of Admiralty, B." Many of the offences connected with these are new and not of admiralty origin, and are within capes and headlands, and some within the body of counties, and on the land. In truth, with the power to regulate commerce, and carry on our foreign relations, and build forts, and navy-yards, and lighthouses, maintain a navy, &c., a code of criminal law has grown up connected with these powers and for their protection, which belongs to the whole matter, and not to admiralty alone. See post.

What they then were in England, and since have been till 1776 or 1789, are the guides as to what must now be understood as the extent of the criminal jurisdiction meant to be allowed to congress to confer on the courts of the United States, as mere admiralty powers, or as being, per se, admiralty powers. The learning and labor of the counsel for the government, as to earlier periods, have been interesting, and shed much light on the antiquity of different kinds of admiralty power. But the practices in such remote ages, and under governments so different from that of England, cannot control the present case, under the laws as existing when the constitution was adopted, with the modifications and additions since made by acts of congress. And as the growth of the country is developed, and national exigencies arise, the further exercise of its just powers will often be called for, entirely independent of any grants of admiralty jurisdiction, and leaving more and more doubtful what parts, if any, as to crimes, were ever meant to rest merely on those grants. Stanly v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 10, note. It is by no means certain, if the grant of admiralty jurisdiction had been omitted entirely in the constitution, that the other grants to regulate commerce, maintain a navy, declare war, and collect a revenue from imposts, and establish courts, &c., would not have enabled it to confer on those courts all the criminal jurisdiction, if not the civil, which they now possess, connected with maritime affairs. The admiralty code of criminal law was also one in some respects too bloody for us and this age, as for example, death to remove a buoy. Curt. Adm. Dig. 544; Jenkins' Works.

As the ground has been taken I shall next proceed to inquire briefly, if the acts complained of in this indictment are made punishable by the force of any other act of congress than that of 1789, either directly or by construction. In examining any other acts, we are met not only by the presumption, that congress would not mean to do indirectly or circuitously what ample reasons showed they would be inclined to do directly, and which they did not do directly, but by the impropriety of holding that to be an offence, and prosecuting it as such, which is so only by construction, or inference, or implication. The act chiefly relied on, as being violated indirectly by this obstruction, and rendering it illegal, is that making New Bedford a port of entry. See it in 1 Stat. 629. It is made to "include all the waters and shores within the towns of New Bedford, Dartmouth," &c. This bridge is within the limits of that port, as a "port" would usually be defined, i. e. the waters within the gate, or door, or outlet towards the sea. This port is allowed by congress to be a place for shipping produce to foreign countries or other domestic ports, and for introducing merchandise from abroad for home consumption. It is an encroachment on it to place bridges across it without draws sufficiently wide for all vessels to pass and repass, or to throw stone and gravel into its bed so as to make parts of the channel too shoal for navigation. It is a very important port, possessing over one hundred thousand tons of shipping, equal in that respect to any in England or America except four in each of them, and superior to any whatever in France. Its freedom from improper obstructions ought, therefore, to be carefully watched over and preserved. And it is contended, that any encroachment on it, or violation of the rights existing, when it was made a port of entry, ought to be considered a crime or misdemeanor. But supposing that it should be, can it be considered as made a crime or offence by this act of congress? This act merely allows exports and imports there, but does not punish any obstruction in its waters. In England, many important and exclusive privileges have been conferred on certain ports, as the Cinque ports, and the ports of London and Hull. But here, no preference can, by the constitution, be given to one port over another (article 1, § 9); and whatever power properly belongs to congress in regulating commerce and establishing ports of entry and delivery, to protect them by penalties from encroachments and obstructions by wharves, buildings and bridges, it is in this case sufficient to say that congress has not yet exercised that power. But if wharves or bridges are so made as to obstruct a port or any navigable waters, they are undoubtedly illegal under the laws of Massachusetts, unless authorized by the city, or state, or general government, which may possess authority over this matter. Whether illegal, so as to constitute a crime, or only a civil wrong, must depend on the laws of the government possessing jurisdiction over the place and subject. If made a crime by that government, they may be criminally prosecuted as the laws shall specify, in those courts having jurisdiction over the place and subject. The state of Massachusetts possesses the jurisdiction over this place for many purposes, though navigable water, as before shown; and can and would punish an obstruction as a nuisance in a highway, if she had not herself authorized it. Such bridges and wharves, when built out of the territory over which congress exercises exclusive legislation, such as the District of Columbia, are erected by state authority, and regulated entirely by state laws, or are constructed at individual pleasure and responsibility. They are, as here, within the limits of the state, and one of its counties; and though in regulating commerce congress might probably make laws, which would render penal any obstructions to foreign navigation, whether placed there with or without state permission, yet till congress do this, can such an obstruction be said to violate this act of congress, merely creating the port of New Bedford into a port of entry? Much more, can it be a crime under that act? The officers of such a port are usually state officers; its warden, its health officers, its harbor masters. The general government usually places no person there except for purposes of revenue, such as the collector, and his subordinates. If there be light-houses or forts near, then there are other officers, in connection with them, rather than the port as a port.

In ancient times, when some harbors or ports were secured by chains, and the chain master or master of the key, opened it for vessels to pass, and collected revenue or tolls, he may have had authority to look into and prosecute such matters; and in France, he was required to report offences of this kind to the admiralty. French Laws, bk. 4, tit. 2. See Laws, 254–257, 340. Though in some instances he was appointed probably by the city authorities, rather than by the central government or the admiralty. Such is the case here, usually, as before remarked, as to wardens of ports, harbor masters, &c. Those who commanded the forts at the entrance, as well as the navy for defending the port, were public officers of the government, but they never had, and cannot here have, any concern with the domestic or civil police and erection of bridges and wharves within the harbor. It is difficult then to hold, that by the express words of the act creating the port of New Bedford to be a port of entry, or by implication from analogies and usages elsewhere, that the punishment of obstructions, like this bridge, belongs to the general government or any of its officers. On the contrary, it belongs usually to the local authorities, and though congress may be authorized under the constitution to regulate and punish them, yet till done by specific laws for that purpose, its courts cannot regard such acts as an offence against the United States, however they may be in some cases crimes and private injuries under the state or local laws.

The free ingress and egress of our people to all ports of entry in the Union; the obstructing navigation in one of them, and especially one so important as New Bedford, is not to be countenanced when done by individuals without authority, and could effectually be punished as nuisance in the state courts. Nor can it be shut up in part, or entirely, as the port of Boston was by the Boston port bill before the Revolution, without working inequality and partiality, whether it be done by a license or order from the state, or the United States, and by force of a law, or by rocks, wood, or chains across its mouth, by individual and private speculation. And if a wrong or injustice has been perpetrated, under color of law, and cannot be prosecuted in the state courts while that law remains in full force, and cannot be redressed as a crime in the United States' courts, till some further legislation occurs defining or declaring it to be a crime, and empowering them to try it, yet it is a misfortune, which might soon be obviated by congress, and one which now might perhaps, as will soon be examined further, be relieved against in a civil remedy by damages to the person aggrieved specially by it, so as at an early day to correct the evil, provided this conduct delays, or interrupts, or injures the navigation of the country. See post.

But it is next contended, that if no jurisdiction over the matter is obtained by the act, making this port a port of entry, it is conferred by force of the acts appointing custom-house officers there and collecting revenue. See section 2, Act March 2, 1799, c. 22 (1 Stat. 627). The like reasoning applies to this position as to that concerning the port as a port of entry, except that the officers to collect the revenue are officers of the general government, and the revenue also belongs to that government. All which they are authorized to do, may, therefore, be connected with the federal power and federal supervision, and any obstruction to their rightful acts may be an offence punishable in the federal courts. Such is the course of some of the laws on this subject, and such have been the decisions where such specific laws have existed, but not without. Here, however, no clause in any of them is pointed out, which make obstructions like these a violation of any revenue law. It is true, that the tendency of such obstructions may be to lessen the amount of business and revenue at New Bedford, but it will increase them probably at other ports, to which business may be thus diverted, and hence not injure the revenue of the country as a whole.

So, it is argued that the "Force Bill," as it has been called, conferred larger powers on custom-house officers to remove custom-houses when the collection of revenue at them was obstructed, and gave to this court wider jurisdiction to punish them. But it was only where the obstructions were not to the navigation by stoue, or gravel, or timber, but by the interference of the state authorities, or of unauthorized individuals, to prevent the entry of foreign merchandize, and the payment of duties thereon. That law was passed March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 999). It was passed entirely diverso intuitu as all know, who were actors in those scenes, and never contemplated the punishment of obstructions like these. It was against "unlawful obstructions, combinations or assemblages of persons" (section 1). The additional jurisdiction there given to the circuit court, was to try in civil cases persons guilty of such assemblages, and injuries by them (section 2), and to try offences against the revenue laws, where jurisdiction has not been already conferred. This was all. The act authorizing coasting licenses, and for regulating the same, is also supposed to be violated by this obstruction. See the act of February 18, 1793 (1 Stat. 395), and March 2, 1819 (3 Stat. 493). It is certain that this act was meant to empower such vessels to go and trade in all the navigable waters of the United States, and on its coasts, and that any prevention of this would violate the spirit of those acts. [Gibbons v. Ogden] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1. It speaks of the going on "seacoasts" and "navigable rivers." Hence in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, it was held, that a law of New York, excluding steam-boats with such licenses from navigating the Hudson river, or giving an exclusive right to certain boats to do it, was deemed unconstitutional and void. And for aught I see, an obstruction placed in navigable waters by an individual, without constitutional authority, would violate such license, and be a ground for civil redress in damages. It disturbs navigation, and navigation is one branch of commerce, and a law of congress covering it, is thus violated. See [Gibbons v. Ogden] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1. It is, perhaps, this idea in connection with the right which belongs to vessels to go to ports of entry and delivery, unimpeded and undelayed, that the counsel in People v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co., 15 Wend. 113, 121, conceded that a bridge, though with a draw, if below a port of entry, was unconstitutional. If so at all, it must be because it restricts and curtails, in some degree, the full privileges of licensed and registered vessels to egress and ingress, as to all parts of such ports in the pursuit of their lawful business. It also violates the rights before alluded to, by some of our treaties, given to foreigners tc visit such ports, and these considerations may confer a power on the general government to remove obstructions below such ports that do not exist above. See the Maysville road veto. I do not understand the court, in 15 Wendell, to hold that any bridge at or above a port of entry like New Bedford, with a draw in it, is unconstitutional, if only somewhat incommoding navigation, but only when it stops or cuts off some of it entirely (page 132). New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102. But the same difficulty exists here as in the other acts of congress, in regarding the obstruction as a crime against the United States, without some clause in the constitution or in an act of congress declaring it to be one.

The acts complained of in the indictment, being then authorized by the state, and hence not a crime under its laws, the states having power to authorize them till conflicting with some provision in the constitution, or a treaty, or an act of congress, and there being no such conflict with any, that makes these acts a crime, or confers power on this court to punish it, the conclusion follows, that we have no jurisdiction to sustain the indictment. I am strengthened in this conclusion, till congress legislate further, by the consideration, that even now any individual, suffering by this obstruction in his rights to free navigation, is not probably without redress. The power then in the state of Massachusetts to incorporate the New Bedford bridge with a draw to allow vessels to pass, existed in 1795; and this exercise of it violates no prohibition in the federal constitution, no treaty, and no act of congress enforcing the granted powers under it to the general government, unless it be that giving coasting licenses. It violates that, perhaps, only as to vessels which from their size cannot pass through the draw, or as high up the harbor, from deposits, as they used to; and the owners of such, when actually obstructed and delayed by means of this bridge, might probably have redress in damages, or by way of injunction against it in chancery. Spooner v. McConnell [Case No 13,245]; People v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co. 15 Wend. 113, 135. But even they could not prosecute the bridge as for a crime, in the federal courts, when no clause in the federal constitution or the acts of congress declare such an obstruction to be a crime. No prosecution for a crime can now be sustained any where, even in the state court, for reasons already given, unless the act of incorporation to the defendants should be held void by those courts, as trenching on the powers of the general government, or on the rights of coasters under acts of congress. How that might be, they must decide for themselves, when appealed to. Civil redress, however, in the cases before described, seems obtainable in the courts both of the states and United States, notwithstanding the decision in [Foster v. Neilson] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 253, as there, it does not appear that any port of entry existed above, and here it does; and that the stoppage of some navigation to some parts of it is as entire as the state prohibition in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, 221. We may say with Chief Justice Holt, when we agree that one hath a right, "if so, then they must have some remedy to come at it" (Rex v. Hornby, 5 Mod. 57; 1 Term R. 512; 2 Ld. Raym. 953); ubi jus ibi remedium. And the "judicial powers should be coextensive with the legislation, so far at least as they are to be enforced by judicial proceedings." Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 527. But the question of a right is first to be settled, and then where the remedy is to be sought. At law; or in equity; before courts martial; or in admiralty; or before the legislature; and in state courts and legislatures, or in the United States? Though there is then no part of the constitution, or treaties, or acts of congress appearing on their face to make such an obstruction a crime, there is no necessity to give a forced construction to bring the case within those acts in order to punish it, there being full redress without doing this, to such individuals as specially suffer by it.

We have already shown, that in the absence of legislation by congress, making acts crimes, which may be within some of the constitutional grants of power to congress, such as the regulation of commerce and cases in admiralty, the states possess concurrent or subordinate authority over such matters, till the paramount action by congress takes place, if it choose to make the acts crimes, but if not, then to give civil redress, if the acts be contrary to its own laws or those of the United States. The establishment of courts of the United States did not in many cases divest the state courts of any jurisdiction before exercised. It would seldom do it, unless on matters vested exclusively in the general government as crimes against it, or in its jurisdiction, and forbidden to the states. See Federalist, No. 82. And it is every day's practice for a citizen, though able to sue in the federal courts, to prosecute his rights in the state courts. For some acts on navigable waters, redress may be had in either. Corfield v. Coryell, supra. Congress, in the act of February, 1838, granting admiralty jurisdiction over the lakes, specially reserved all concurrent rights in state courts and at common law. See before. In Alabama, their supreme court has entertained a libel against a steam-boat for wages. 9 Port. 112, 181. Yet the better opinion seems to be, that when an exclusive power like that in admiralty is conferred on the courts of the United States, no concurrent remedy, except a common law one, exists in the state courts. 3 Story, Const. 534, 553, note. See, also, 1 Kent, Comm. 351, 377, note; Rawle, Const. 202; American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 512, 546; [Martin v. Hunter] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 337; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246, 312, 313; The Chusan [Case No. 2,717].

I have added several cases connected with this question, without stopping to enter into the consideration of their bearing in detail. If the act of incorporation in this case should be held void, as contrary to some act of congress, it is obvious, that then both the old civil and criminal remedies might exist in the state courts, for such an obstruction of navigable waters, but only a civil remedy in this court, from the want of some law making the obstruction a crime against the United States, and punishable in this court.

The objection against treating as a crime what has not been made so by any clause in the constitution or an act of congress, does not apply to a civil suit. For by the 34th section of the judiciary act, private rights and civil remedies are to be governed by the laws of the states, if none exist of the United States, even when tried in the federal courts, in cases where the latter have jurisdiction over the question and the parties. See before. And though that could not be deemed a private wrong or civil injury, any more than a crime, which a state law authorized, in conformity to its constitution and that of the United States, yet it might be considered criminal under the state laws, as to highways and nuisances, if considering the act of incorporation under which it was done, as unconstitutional, it being then in conflict with some power or law of congress, and might be open to a civil action in the federal courts, as being illegal both under such state laws as are valid, and also by the laws of the United States.

In the course of the argument it has been asked, if a state can with impunity levy and collect duties on tonnage and imposts, or forbid entries of vessels into a port? The reply is now obvious, that it cannot; and any such act by a state, conflicting with any rights under existing acts of congress, would be actionable, and civil redress be had in this court, and civil if not criminal in the state courts. Such virtually was the case of Gibbons v. Ogden. States may continue to use old and concurrent powers on these matters till congress legislate on them, when the states must yield. McCulloch v. State of Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 316; [U. S. v. Gratiot] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 535; Commissioners of Erie v. Dobbins, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 435. There is little doubt, that laws enough now exist to protect in this court, by appropriate civil suits, all the rights and interests of the United States in any lands within them, or any personal property, or any easements on land or water, or any franchises. So they can try the rights of others in these, where the parties reside, so as to give us jurisdiction in that respect. Full civil jurisdiction to that extent is conferred by the 34th section of the judiciary act, before quoted. On the civil remedies and rights of this character, in such cases, in behalf of the United States, this court has recently given its views at length in U. S. v. Ames [Case No. 14,441]. But no law or section confers on this court all jurisdiction in such cases to punish acts considered as crimes by the admiralty, or maritime laws, or by common law; nor is there any such section or act, that makes an obstruction in navigable waters, a nuisance or other crime, and gives jurisdiction over it to this court.

The 34th section of the judiciary act has been thought by some to be broad enough to give relief here. It is: "That the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." It might be inferred by some from the face of this, that we could get from the state laws some common law jurisdiction and principles, if not statute law, to give us authority to punish in this case. Dup. Jur. 43, 44. But there are several objections to that view. We must first obtain jurisdiction by the constitution or acts of congress over a crime or civil suit, before we can apply in the trial the laws, statute or common, of a state. The Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175; The Planter, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324, 337. And that jurisdiction we have not yet got, as yet ascertained over this as a crime.

In the next place, after getting jurisdiction, the application of the state laws to the trial of the case is only where it is a civil and not a criminal case. 2 Burr. Tr. p. 180, Append. Otherwise the court might entertain jurisdiction over most of the crimes in most of the states in the Union. 1 Kent, Comm. 398. Cases in chancery are in doubt also in this respect whether the state laws can be applied in equity trials by this court, as they and the practice in them rest on general principles of the civil law and usage in England, applicable here, and are not "trials at common law." See Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 657, 697. And finally, if the state laws, after we got jurisdiction, were to govern in the trial, they would prevent our punishment of this act complained of, though open to be done usually. For here it has been authorized by the state in incorporating the respondents, and allowing them to erect this bridge, and must be conformed to, unless the measures of the state and of the respondents under them are void for repugnancy to some act of congress.

Under these doubts as to the validity of the various grounds urged in support of this indictment, I feel compelled to dismiss it. In all questionable cases in courts like this, of limited jurisdiction, instead of leaving so much to construction by courts, and leaving so many uncertainties and conflicts, both in civil and criminal cases in admiralty, it seems to me wise for congress to legislate freely, as difficulties may appear, regulating the future, and removing that vagueness as to the law, which is so great a curse to the community. As the country increases in wealth and population, and the interior commerce and travel may outgrow its foreign and preponderate in the state legislatures, and lead to bridges for turnpikes, or viaducts for rail-roads, and aqueducts for canals, obstructing seriously the navigation of our great rivers and arms of the sea, and, as in this case, not requiring draws suitable to the dimensions and passage of modern steam vessels, it may become necessary for congress to exercise more of its powers to regulate commerce. It may be proper to protect the foreign trade and that between state and state by water, against inroads upon its freedom by those, looking more to land travel and land freights. And though obstructions in navigable waters by state authority or without, may injure some of the towns and some of the business of that state more than the business of other portions of the Union, or of alien friends trading here, yet other portions and other business of the state may reap more than a proportional benefit, and hence, as a state measure, it may on the whole be useful. But when looking at its influence on other parts of the Union and their citizens, who trade thither only by water, and treating it, as must be done under the government of the Union, as a national matter, and its influence as on the whole nation, it may be an unmitigated and uncompensated evil to many other states, and in respect to some alien friends under treaties, be a measure wholly unjustifiable. In such case, on looking to such events, and in the rapid multiplication of such bridges and obstructions, it may become necessary for congress to wake up more of its dormant powers to regulate commerce, and provide relief and redress, criminal and civil, in all cases of this kind clearly within its authority, and clearly requiring punishment or redress. I should be one of the last to desire to see such legislation take place prematurely or hastily, or at first with severity, as the subject is one possessing much delicacy, and many ramifications of deep interest. But it is more and more exciting public attention; and an era is approaching, if not come, when the general powers of the central government for the whole on matters connected with the interests of the whole, may be called for to protect private rights and remote privileges, and overcome local combinations of wealth and influence, seeking their own profit rather than looking to national duties and rights in respect to others; and, likewise, to correct errors of state legislatures in granting unlimited powers as to time to keep up a bridge over a navigable river, which by a change of business may have become a great public evil; or limited and unchangeable powers as to time, and the width of a draw for vessels to pass, which last, by an unexpected change in the size of vessels, has become useless, and a total obstruction to that class of ships; or powers, supposed not injurious to the river below, or at the bridge for navigation, but which have unexpectedly been followed by accumulations of sand and mud, obstructing most seriously and permanently the whole commerce of a large river.

In some cases, the legislation of congress might not require the bridge itself to be removed, but only draws widened, so as not to damage the commerce between states or abroad, if the states themselves cannot and will not correct them by legislation or otherwise. In some cases it might require the obstructions collected in deposits of stone, gravel or mud, to be removed; and in others, the whole bridge to give way for a ferry, if the injury to navigation was great, and could in no other mode be obviated. As the states have exercised this power of erecting bridges across navigable streams over half a century, and in numerous cases, over navigable waters, where the tide ebbs and flows, in Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, &c., and congress have followed their example in the District of Columbia, any new and restrictive legislation by the general government would be unjust, if not suited to the exigencies of the case, and of course, go no further than is necessary to discharge its duties in relation to the powers confided to it for the benefit of the states and the people as a whole. Its true attitude is one not seeking collision, or being punctilious as to trifles, nor acting with harshness, where a fair exercise of ancient powers and usages has been indulged in, and where by a double government and some concurrent powers over like subjects, some difficulties are unavoidable, and are to be met always in a charitable, conciliatory and compromising spirit. It must act only in cases worthy the government of the whole Union, and in a manner becoming the government of the whole Union, dignus vindice nodus.

After such legislation, there would need be no grounds of jealousy or distrust as to its effect, as the laws will be made by our own delegates in the general government, under our own constitution, the cases tried, as in the states, by juries, rather than without, and by our own jurors, before our own judges, under our own ameliorated codes of law, and the punishments be as mild and suited to modern notions of civilization in the states. But in doing this, it would not be enough, as before suggested, for congress to vest jurisdiction in this court in all cases of mere admiralty and maritime crimes, even if enumerating and defining them when misdemeanors as well as felonies, because the power of congress over commerce is much broader as to both territory and subjects, than what belongs to admiralty courts as such. It is unrestricted as to commerce between the states as well as abroad, and is increased by the powers to maintain a navy, and defend the country by forts, and improve harbors, and make breakwaters and hospitals, and collect revenue on imports. Hence, it can extend to numerous cases, which in England were under the jurisdiction of other courts than the admiralty, and can well be entrusted to the circuit court, as is most of its other powers, not as admiralty ones, except appeals from the district tribunals. Nor will it be necessary in any of these cases, to make the jurisdiction exclusive of the state courts, except where the power that is executed by it is exclusive in its nature. In all other cases, the rights, and remedies, and duties and liabilities of our people can be taken care of in the state courts, except where the laws of the latter may conflict with those of congress on the same subject.

This opinion was mostly prepared before the decision in the case of Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, although it was not delivered until after.

CIVIL RIGHTS—REFUSAL OF HOTEL CLERK TO RECEIVE NEGRO.

The act of congress March 1, 1875 [18 Stat. 336], is authorized by the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, and a clerk in charge of the reception of travelers at a hotel may be liable to conviction for a violation of the provisions of the act.

The evidence for the prosecution showed that the defendant was in charge of the office at a hotel called the Bingham House; that Fields Cook, a Baptist minister, from Alexandria, Va., a man of color, applied for accommodation, and was refused a room by defendant; that Cook left and returned and was allowed to sit in a side room all night; that some eighteen other persons were admitted to rooms during the night. It also appeared that another guest of the house, a witness, applied to the defendant, stating his willingness to receive Fields Cook in a room occupied by the witness and two others, in which there was a spare bed, but defendant said he did not desire to have anything to do with Cook. The defendant told him that he had refused him the room because of his color.

Mr. Valentine, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Mr. Hazlehurst, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

B. H. Brewster, for defendant.

CADWALADER, District Judge (charging jury). The fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States makes all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, citizens of the United States, and provides that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. This amendment expressly gives to congress the power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. An act of congress of March 1, 1875, enacts that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theatres and other places of public amusement, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, and makes it a criminal offence to violate these enactments by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color * * * the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities or privileges enumerated.

As the law of Pennsylvania had stood until the 22d of March, 1867, it was not wrongful for innkeepers or carriers by land or water to discriminate against travelers of the colored race to such an extent as to exclude them from any part of the inns or public conveyances which was set apart for the exclusive accommodation of white travelers. The legislature of Pennsylvania, by an act of March 22, 1867, altered the law in this respect as to passengers on railroads. But the law of the state was not changed as to inns by any act of the state legislature. Therefore, independently of the amendment of the constitution of the United States and of the act of congress now in question, the conduct of the defendant on the occasion in question, might, perhaps, have been lawful. It is not necessary to express an opinion upon this point, because the decision of the case depends upon the effect of this act of congress.

I am of opinion that under the fourteenth amendment of the constitution, the enactment of this law was within the legislative power of congress, and that we are bound to give effect to the act of congress according to its fair meaning. According to this meaning of the act, I am of opinion, that if this defendant, being in charge of the business of receiving travelers in this inn, and of providing necessary and proper accommodations for them in it, refused such accommodations to the witness Cook, then a traveler, by reason of his color, the defendant is guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted.[2] If the case depended upon the unsupported testimony of this witness alone, there might be some reason to doubt whether this defendant was the person in charge of this part of the business. But under this head the additional testimony of Mr. Annan seems to be sufficient to remove all reasonable doubt. If the jury are convinced of the defendant's identity, they will consider whether any reasonable doubt of his conduct or motives in refusing the accommodations to Fields Cook can exist. The case appears to the court to be proved; but this question is for the jury, not for the court. If the jury have any reasonable doubt, they should find the defendant not guilty: otherwise, they will find him guilty.

Jury found defendant guilty.

[12 Pittsb. Leg. J. 140.]

District Court, N. D. Ohio. Oct., 1864.

CRIMINAL LAW — REMOVAL OF PRISONER TO ANOTHER DISTRICT—PROCESS—ARREST.

Before a warrant for the removal of a prisoner to another district in which a warrant for his arrest issued on indictment found, can be granted, some proof must be offered showing that the defendant committed the crime charged, or in lieu thereof, the information or affidavit on which the warrant issued, or copies of the same certified by the magistrate issuing the warrant, or a copy of the indictment with a certificate of the clerk of the court, in which the indictment was found, of its genuineness, and that the same is still pending, must be produced.

The defendant, upon application of the marshal of Indiana, alleging that Newcomer was indicted in that district, had been arrested upon a warrant issued by the district judge, the Honorable H. V. WILLSON, and now R. F. Paine, Esq., district attorney, moved the judge to issue a warrant removing the defendant to Indiana for trial, and to sustain said motion offered in evidence a capias in the usual form, issued from the district court of Indiana, directing the marshal to arrest Henry Newcomer to answer an indictment found in that court. He also offered an affidavit of one Lockhart, a deputy marshal of Indiana, stating that said indictment was still pending.

B. White opposed the motion.

[Before WILLSON and McCANDLESS, District Judges.]

Held by WILLSON, District Judge, that, before the warrant of removal can be granted some proof must be offered showing that the defendant committed the crime charged; or in lieu thereof, the information or affidavit on which the warrant issued, or copies of the same certified by the magistrate issuing the warrant or a copy of the indictment with a certificate of the clerk of the court in which the indictment was found, of its genuineness, and that the same is still pending must be produced. As the proof offered does not meet either of these requirements the defendant is discharged.

Case No. 15,870.

UNITED STATES v. NEWMARK.

[3 Sawy. 584; [1] 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 114.]

District Court, D. California. March 28, 1876.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURES—UNDERVALUATION—CONSIGNEE.

Where, in a suit brought by the United States to recover the value of certain goods alleged to have been fraudulently invoiced below their true cost, it appeared that the defendant was not the owner or shipper of the goods, but merely a consignee thereof for the purpose of selling them: Held, that knowledge on his part of the fraudulent undervaluation was necessary to establish the "actual intention to defraud the United States" within the meaning of the sixteenth section of the act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 189].

[This was an action at law by the United States against J. P. Newmark.]

Walter Van Dyke and John M. Coghlan, for the United States.

Latimer & Morrow, C. A. McNulty, E. B. Mastick, and Eastman & Neuman, for defendant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This is an action brought by the United States to recover the value of certain hides alleged to have been fraudulently imported into this port by the defendant. The alleged fraud consisted in entering the goods by means of false and fraudulent invoices, which stated the cost of the goods at the place of exportation to be a less sum than the actual cost thereof, with intent to evade a part of the duties thereupon and legally chargeable thereon.

By the sixteenth section of the act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. 189), it is in substance provided that in all actions to enforce a forfeiture or to recover the value of goods by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs revenue laws, it shall be the duty of the court to submit to the jury as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and to require upon such proposition a special finding by the jury, and if the cause be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court to pass upon and decide such proposition as a distinct and separate finding of fact, and unless intent to defraud shall be so found, no fine, penalty or forfeiture shall be imposed.

Two separate issues are thus presented in this case: (1) Were the goods undervalued in point of fact and the invoices thereof false; and (2) were the entries of the goods made with an actual intention on the part of the defendant to defraud the United States.

The evidence as to the actual cost or market value of the goods at the places of exportation is very voluminous and conflicting. I have not thought it necessary to enter into an elaborate analysis of it, as the plaintiffs have, in my judgment, failed to prove the actual fraudulent intent on the part of the defendant which the statute requires the court to find as a distinct and separate proposition before a forfeiture can be imposed. In discussing the evidence bearing upon this proposition, I shall therefore assume that the goods were in fact invoiced at less than their cost. The question is, did the defendant know it? The number of false entries upon which the action is brought is twenty-seven. They were made during a period extending from July 29, 1869, to February, 1872. If the defendant was the owner of the goods, or, if the importations were made on his account, the inference would be irresistible that he was aware of the false valuation. He could not have failed to know what prices he paid for them. But he contends that in every instance he was a bare consignee, that he had no knowledge of the price paid by his consignor, and that he merely sold the goods and placed the net proceeds to the credit of the latter.

To these facts the defendant testifies in the most positive manner. To meet this proof the government has produced the entries made at the custom house with the oaths and invoices that accompany them. From these entries it appears that in twelve instances out of twenty-seven the defendant on entering the goods took the "owner's oath" instead of that of a consignee. It is replied that this was done through the mistake of the broker who prepared the papers, and in support of this averment the defendant appeals to his books. The entries from the custom house show that on the first five importations the defendant took the consignee's and not the owner's oath. The entry of the sixth importation is missing. But in all of these instances the journal of the defendant shows that the proceeds of the goods were credited to the consignor. The book containing the copy of the account of sales of these shipments rendered to the shippers is not produced. It is alleged to have been destroyed. The evidence on that point will be considered hereafter.

On the seventh importation the defendant took the owner's oath. He claims that this was by the mistake of his broker, and in support of his assertion refers to the fact that the consular certificate presented with the invoice to the custom house shows that the consignor was the shipper and owner. He also exhibits the entries in his journal where the proceeds are duly credited to the consignor, and his press-copy account of sales, in which an account is rendered to the consignor of the proceeds of and charges upon the goods.

The circumstances are similar in regard to the eighth importation. The defendant took the owner's oath. But the consignor declares before the consul that he is owner and shipper, and the journal and account-sales-book show that an account of sales and charges was duly rendered to the shipper, and a corresponding credit given in the journal. It is unnecessary to state in detail the circumstances as disclosed by the custom house papers and the defendant's books with regard to each importation in which he has taken the oath as owner. They may be summarized as follows:

In six instances out of the twelve the papers show that the shipper declared before the consul that he was the owner of the goods shipped. In the other cases he declared himself to be the shipper. In every instance but two, both the journal and the account-sales-book show that accounts of sales of the goods were duly rendered to the shippers, and credits duly given in the journal. In the two instances referred to, the entries in the journal cannot be found. But the accounts of sales are produced. In every other instance the oath taken by the defendant is that of a consignee. The journals show a credit given to the shipper, and the account-sales-book an account rendered to him, except as before stated in the case of the first six importations, the account-sales-book relating to which has been destroyed.

The broker employed by the defendant corroborates in the most positive manner the testimony of the defendant. He states that his instructions invariably were to enter the goods in the name of defendant as consignee, and that if the form of oath as owner has been filled out and submitted for his signature it was through mistake. He attributes the error to the great haste with which business of this nature is necessarily conducted. He might with probably equal truth have added that such errors arise from the laxity and carelessness which universally prevail when any "custom-house" oath is to be taken or administered. The broker's statement as to his mistakes or those of his clerk is confirmed by the fact that in several instances where the owner's oath was taken by the defendant the papers themselves disclosed that the shipper was the owner. No proof has been offered on the part of the United States to rebut the evidence on this point produced by the defendant. The correspondence between himself and the shippers of the goods for a considerable period has not been produced. The district attorney suggests that it may have been purposely destroyed. But the defendant has shown by his own testimony, by that of his partner, and by the porter in his employment, that the papers in question were packed in a box and placed in a cellar where they became saturated with water and rat-eaten. His partner ordered them burnt up as useless, which was done by the porter. This occurred, they assert, before this suit was commenced or anticipated. This evidence is uncontradicted except by some testimony tending to show that it was possible that the defendant might have been aware that some investigations with regard to these importations were on foot.

We are, I think, justified in concluding that the government has failed to establish a guilty knowledge of the falsehood of the invoices, and the consequent intent to defraud, from any relation of the defendant to the goods as owner. But if he had that knowledge as agent, merely, it would be sufficient to establish the fraudulent intent. But of this there can scarcely be said to be any proof. The defendant had, as he testifies, no interest whatever in the shipments, not even by way of commissions. His remuneration was derived from commissions on purchases made by him at this place, of goods to be shipped to his correspondents. No commissions were charged by him on goods consigned to him for sale.

The price at which the goods in question were valued in the invoices had been for a long time uniform and universal among all the importers. They appear to have valued them at one dollar and fifty cents each, irrespective of their quality or condition. This valuation had been for years accepted as just by the custom-house authorities. I see no reason for supposing that the defendant, receiving the goods as he did, would be more likely to know their real cost or true value than the officers of the government charged with the duty of ascertaining those facts. If, however, the facts were clear and the undervaluation gross and undeniable, we might still suspect that the defendant must, in the course of his business, have become aware of it. But even after the very full investigation which the subject has undergone in the trial of this cause, the evidence remains very conflicting, and the conclusion to be reached open to doubt. It is, I think, plain, that parties at this place who sought to engage in the trade were unable to obtain at Mazatlan, La Paz, and Cape St. Lucas, hides at the price at which these goods were invoiced. The explanation of this fact, given by the defendant's witnesses, is that the trade in hides is at these places in the hands of a small number of persons who enter into contracts with the rancheros to take all their hides, of whatever quality, at a fixed price, and to make advances to them on the credit of the hides to be subsequently delivered. They thus have, it is said, a kind of monopoly which not only enables them to secure hides at a lower rate than that which a foreigner would be obliged to pay, but also to advance the prices at the ports of shipment. It is also testified that when "culls," or damaged hides, bull hides, etc., are taken into account, an average price of one dollar and fifty cents is not an unfair statement of the cost, although selected lots might be worth much more. A large number of witnesses testify to these facts, among them three ex-consuls of the United States, who are acquainted with or have been engaged in the trade.

What conclusion should be reached after a careful consideration of all the testimony, I have not determined, and it is unnecessary now to decide. I advert to the state of the proofs merely to show that the undervaluation, if any, was not so gross and indisputable as to justify the belief that it was notorious to all engaged in the trade, and consequently was known to the defendant. On the issue, therefore, upon which, by the terms of the act, I am required to pass as a distinct and separate proposition, I find that it is not proved that the acts alleged in the complaint were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States.

Judgment must, therefore, be entered for the defendant.

UNITED STATES ex rel. RANGER v. NEW ORLEANS.

UNITED STATES ex rel. PETERKIN v. SAME.

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1876.[2]

MANDAMUS — TAX LEVY — STATUTORY LIMITATION OF DEBT—PRINCIPAL OF DEBT.

1. The purpose of the writ of mandamus is to enforce, not to create legal duties.

2. It will not issue to compel officers of municipal corporations to levy and collect a tax unless the legislature has, either expressly or by implication, made it the duty of such officers to levy and collect such tax.

3. The imposition of taxes is the exercise of a legislative, not of a judicial function.

4. A general statute of Louisiana prohibited municipal corporations from incurring any debt or liability unless in the ordinance creating the same full provision was made for the payment of principal and interest; at the same time a special statute prescribed the form of the ordinance by which a particular debt might be created, and declared that such ordinance must be submitted to the legal voters of the corporation, and the assent of a majority of such voters was made a condition of its validity. Held, that where such ordinance, so submitted to the voters for their approval, contained no provision for the levying of any tax to pay the principal of the debt, but did contain another provision, which was evidently deemed ample for such purpose, it was the evident intention of the legislature that the principal debt should not be paid by taxation, and in such case the writ of mandamus to compel the levy of a tax to pay such principal was refused.

5. The acts of the legislature and the ordinance mentioned in the preceding headnote being in force, and the statute having declared that certain stock therein named should be perpetually pledged for the payment of the principal of the debt which the municipal corporation was, by the same statute, authorized to contract, the predecessors of respondents made a sale of said stock for the sum of $350,000, which sum had long since been spent for other purposes, and no part of which was, or ever had been, in the possession or under the control of respondents. Held, that relators were not entitled to the writ of mandamus to compel the application of the sum of $350,000 to the payment of the principal of their debt.

These were applications for writs of mandamus, to be addressed to the mayor and administrators of the city of New Orleans, comprising the common council thereof, commanding them to levy and collect a tax sufficient to pay the principal of certain bonds issued by the city in the year 1854. The return made by the respondents showed the following to be the facts: In the year 1854, the general assembly of the state of Louisiana authorized the city of New Orleans to subscribe for stock in certain contemplated railroads centering in said city. To pay for said stock, the city was authorized to issue bonds equal in amount to the stock at its par value (see Acts 1854, Nos. 108–110). Judgments had been obtained in this court for the principal of the sum named in said bonds, and an execution had been issued thereon, which had been returned nulla bona. [See Cases Nos. 11,026 and 11,564.] The return then alleged that there was no provision in these statutes, or any other statute of this state, for the levying and collection of this tax, and referred to this statute, especially the second section, to show that the legislature did not intend that any tax should be levied to pay the principal of these bonds, but that it intended that the principal should be paid out of the stock and its revenues. To this return the relators demurred, and the question was, whether upon this state of facts the court would grant the writ.

BILLINGS, District Judge. I think the proposition cannot be questioned that this court is without authority to direct a levy of a tax unless it be in accordance with the provisions of some law which makes it the duty of the city common council to levy the same. In other words, that this court cannot create, but can only enforce a clear legal duty.

Mr. Justice Bradley, in Heine v. Levee Commissioners [Case No. 6,325], whose decision was affirmed by the supreme court, says: "The power of taxation belongs to the legislative branch of the government. The judicial department has no general power over the subject. If the officers who are charged with the duty of levying or collecting taxes refuse to perform their functions, the courts, in a clear case of failure, and at the instance of the party directly interested, can, by the prerogative writ of mandamus, compel them to perform acts which are ministerial, as distinguished from those which are judicial or discretionary. This is all the judicial department can do on the subject, unless the legislature has expressly conferred upon it further powers." The question is, has the duty or power to levy this tax been committed by the legislature to the city administration?

It is urged by the counsel for the relators that prior statutes, namely, those of 1835 and 1836, gave this authority, and that the power to levy and collect a tax may be fairly deduced from the permission to contract the debt. The act of 1835 (section 6) provides: "The said mayor and city council shall have power to raise by tax, in such a manner as to them may seem proper, upon the real and personal estate within said city, such sum or sums of money as may be necessary to supply any deficiency for the lighting, cleaning, paving and watering the streets of the said city; for supporting the city watch, the levee of the river, the prisons, workhouses and other public buildings, and for such other purposes as the police and good government of the said city may require. It seems to me that subscriptions to works of internal improvement are excluded from all the purposes here specified. The act of 1836 (page 31, § 4) continued to the several municipalities into which the territory of the old city was then divided, the powers of the old corporation, and those powers were again continued when the different municipalities with additions were consolidated. But there is here no power given to levy this tax.

This brings me to consider the second and principal point urged by the relators' counsel, viz: That the legislature, by authorizing the incurring of the debt, authorized the levy of the tax to pay it. The decisions of the courts of last resort of several states were cited, which it is not necessary for me to consider, because they depend upon the statutes of these states; nor need I, upon this point, refer to more than one decision of the supreme court of the United States. The result of what it has said upon the general subject may be summed up in this: It has held that the collection of judgments of the United States courts may be aided by mandamus whenever there is a refusal or failure on the part of the officers to perform any ministerial act clearly imposed by law; it has treated the repeal of laws in force at the time of the issuance of the bonds, and which carried with them substantial rights, as void; and, generally, has given in behalf of parties obtaining judgments in the courts of the United States, the same aid to which parties similarly situated would have been entitled in the courts of the state in which the cause of action arose; but it has never assented to the unqualified proposition that legislative permission to issue bonds carried with it the authority to tax.

The principle upon which alone such a deduction is maintainable is, with its appropriate restrictions, clearly stated by Mr. Justice Miller in the case of Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 655. The question was as to the validity of certain interest coupons upon which an ordinary suit had been brought. The defense was that taxation could only be invoked for purposes distinctively public, and that permission to issue the coupons carried with it the right to a tax to pay them, and that as the purpose for which these coupons were issued was not a public one, the statute authorizing them and the obligations themselves, were void. He had said that ordinarily the debt of municipal corporations had to be paid by means of taxation. He adds (page 660): "It is therefore to be inferred that, when the legislature of a state authorizes a county or city to contract a debt by bond, it intends to authorize it to levy such taxes as are necessary to pay the debt, unless there is in the act itself, or in some general statute, a limitation upon the power of taxation which repels such an inference."

I think it to be indisputable that the absence of any permission by the legislature for a tax, and the substitution of some other means of payment which was deemed fully adequate, would as completely repel the inference that a resort to taxation was intended, as would a restriction upon the power of taxation itself.

Now, it is urged by the counsel for the city, that the statute by which these bonds were authorized shows that the legislature intended that the principal should be paid by means other than taxation. An examination of this statute has convinced me that the belief of the legislature was that the principal sum could, and its intent was that the principal sum should, be paid out of the stock and its revenues. The act pledges in perpetuity the stock for that purpose; it gives the right to the bondholder to convert his bond into stock; it provides that all dividends derived from the stock above six per cent. should be devoted to extinguish the principal; and while providing with extreme rigor for the payment of the interest, in case dividends from the stock should not be altogether sufficient, and, while providing that until the ordinance levying this yearly tax to pay the interest had been passed by the common council, no valid resolution could be adopted, it is profoundly silent as to any tax to pay the principal. The implication is that the legislature intended the bondholders should, for the collection of the principal sum, look to the stock, at least to the exclusion of taxation.

But, among the statutes of the state, with reference to the city of New Orleans, and among the general statutes of the state, are found acts that give the absence of any particular means of payment in a city ordinance creating a debt a special significance. The act of 1852, No. 51, entitled "An act to consolidate the city of New Orleans and provide for the government," etc. (section 37, p. 54), contains the following provision: "And no ordinance (of the city of New Orleans) creating a debt or loan, shall be valid, unless for some single object, or work distinctly specified therein, and unless such ordinance shall provide ways and means for the punctual payment of running interest during the whole time for which said debt or loan shall be contracted, and for the full and punctual discharge at maturity of the capital borrowed or the debt incurred."

The act of 1853 (No. 258, p. 234) provides "that the police juries of the several parishes of this state, and the constituted authorities of incorporated towns and cities in this state, shall not hereafter have power to contract any debt or pecuniary liability without fully providing, in the ordinance creating the debt, the means of paying the principal and interest of the debt so contracted."

A subsequent section provides that "whenever police juries or authorities of incorporated towns or cities shall have provided for the payment of a debt by levying a tax, and shall fail or refuse to cause said tax to be collected, the court rendering judgment may issue its mandate," etc.

Now, since the general statute, and the statute with reference to the city of New Orleans, struck, with nullity, all obligations of cities, unless the ordinance creating the same, fully provided for the payment; and since one of the same statutes makes special enactments with reference to cases where "the provision for payment shall be by levying a tax," thereby showing that taxation was included in the term "means," it seems to me, that, when a contemporaneous legislature authorized a city to issue bonds and prescribed the form of the ordinance which the city common council should adopt, creating the obligation, the failure of such ordinance, to prescribe any provision for taxation, and the insertion in such ordinance of other means of payment which appear to have been deemed abundantly adequate, of itself, repels the inference that taxation was intended.

The legislature knew that the ordinance was void unless it contained full provision for payment. It meant, therefore, to set forth all the "means" which were to be considered as provided, and any addition of means by way of inference is excluded.

It follows, therefore, that since the legislature of the state of Louisiana has not by any general or special statute expressly or by implication made it the duty of the common council to levy this tax, this court is without any authority to direct its imposition.

It remains for me to consider the special circumstances in the case of Morris Ranger. The petition alleges, and the return admits, the sale of this stock by the predecessors of the present common council, provided they had the power to sell the same, and that they received therefor the sum of $320,000. The return then states that "no part of said proceeds of said so called sale is now in the treasury of the city, or in the possession, or under the control of these respondents; that the said proceeds have long since been used and expended, and no portion thereof ever came into the possession or under the control of these respondents, the present authorities of said city. These respondents show that no writ of mandamus can issue to compel the payment of the relator's demand out of said proceeds, because said proceeds are not in existence." Courts cannot issue a writ commanding the performance of an admitted impossibility.

If there are no funds arising from this sale in the treasury of this city, now under control of respondents, and they were spent years since by respondents' predecessors, then it would be idle to issue a mandate to the respondents to pay the relator out of them. Whatever may be the remedy of the relator by reason of the special facts of this transaction, it is clear that he is not entitled to a mandamus.

Let the demurrers be overruled, and the writs of mandamus refused.

[Writs of error were sued out by the relators in the supreme court, when the judgments of this court were reversed, and the causes remanded, with direction to issue the writs of mandamus as prayed. 98 U. S. 381.]

INTERNAL REVENUE—FAILING TO MAKE RETURNS—PENALTY—ASSESSMENT OF TAX—PLEADINGS.

1. Under the provisions of sections 110 and 120 of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 277), as amended by the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 136), but one penalty is imposed for all failures to make the returns required to be made, prior to the commencement of a suit to recover penalties for such failure.

[Followed in U. S. v. Erie Ry. Co., Case No. 15,056; U. S. v. Brooklyn City & N. R. R., 14 Fed. 285. Cited in Re Snow, 120 U. S. 286, 7 Sup. Ct. 562.]

2. To a claim to recover a tax due under the internal revenue law, on an allegation that a less tax than was due had been paid, the defence was interposed, that the amount paid was determined to be the true amount by the assessor of internal revenue, and to this defence a demurrer was interposed. Held, that the defence was one which would more properly be passed on at the trial, and that the demurrer must be overruled.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

This case came before the court on a demurrer by the defendant to the second, fourth and sixth of the causes of action stated in the complaint, and a demurrer by the United States to the second defence set up in the defendant's answer. In the second cause of action on behalf of the United States, it was alleged that the defendant was a bank engaged in the business of receiving deposits as such, and that it became the duty of the defendant to render to the assessor of internal revenue for the proper district, monthly, for each month from November, 1865, to August, 1872, a true and accurate return of the amount of its deposits, with a declaration annexed thereto, and the oath of the president or cashier of the defendant, that the same contained a true and faithful statement of the amounts subject to tax; that the defendant had neglected to make such returns; and that thereby the defendant became liable, at the end of each of said months, to pay a penalty for each such neglect and refusal respectively, of two hundred dollars. The fourth cause of action was similar, for neglecting to make monthly returns of capital for each month from November, 1865, to December, 1872. In the sixth cause of action it was alleged, that it became the duty of every person having the care and management of said corporation defendant, to render to the assessor of internal revenue for the proper district, on or before the 10th of January, 1871, and on or before the 10th of August, 1871, and on or before the 10th of February, 1872, a true and complete return of the amount of income and profit declared in the preceding month and of the taxes thereon; that no person made such return, but the defendant made default in respect thereto; and that the defendant forfeited to the United States, for each such default, the sum of one thousand dollars.

The defendant demurred to these three causes of action, because several causes of action had been improperly united in each of said causes of action, each of them being for the recovery of numerous alleged penalties, each of which, if ever incurred, constituted a separate liability and cause of action, and the defendant, if liable at all, being liable for only one penalty for all the alleged violations of law charged in each cause of action respectively.

The provisions of the statute under which the claims for these penalties were made, were sections 110 and 120 of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 277), as amended by the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 136). By the first, third and fifth causes of action in the complaint, the United States sought to recover various amounts of taxes which were alleged to have become due under the provisions of the internal revenue law. The causes of action contained allegations that various amounts of taxes therein stated had become due; and that the defendant had paid certain smaller amounts and was indebted for the remainder of the taxes unpaid. To these causes of action the answer of the defendant set up two defences, the second of which was, that the defendant was always ready to pay any tax which it was liable to pay; that, by the due determinations of the assessor of internal revenue of the proper district, the amount of tax which the defendant was liable to pay was fixed and determined at the amounts alleged to have been actually paid by the defendant; and that the defendant acted in good faith upon said determinations and the same ought to be binding on the plaintiffs. To this defence the plaintiffs interposed a demurrer.

R. M. Sherman, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
William Allen Butler, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I am of opinion that the provisions of section 110, respecting penalties for neglect to make return and payment of tax as to amount of deposits and capital, require only a single return to be made covering deposits and capital, and impose only one penalty of $200 for all neglects or defaults prior to the commencement of the suit. The penalty is not imposed for each and every refusal or neglect, but for any refusal or neglect. Nor is the case varied by the fact that the tax is required to be paid each month upon deposits and each month upon capital, and that the return of deposits and capital is required to be made monthly.

So, also, under section 120 respecting penalties for neglect to make return as to dividends, only one penalty of $1,000 is imposed for all defaults prior to the commencement of the suit. The demurrer of the defendant to the second, fourth and sixth causes of action is therefore allowed.

As to the demurrer of the plaintiffs to the second defence set up in the amended answer, I overrule the demurrer, on the ground that the defense is one which it is most proper should be passed upon at the trial.

[9 Ben. 413;[1] 24 Int. Rev. Rec. 118.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1878.

INTERNAL REVENUE—LEGACY TAX.

Under section 124 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 285), and section 125 of that act, as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 140), the United States sued a trustee under the will of a person who died in 1868, to recover a legacy tax of one per cent. on a sum of money which the trustee received and held in trust under the will for F., on the ground that F. had become entitled, in 1875, to the possession and enjoyment of such sum. By section 3 of the act of July 14, 1870

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

(16 Stat. 256), the taxes on legacies were repealed on and after October 1, 1870, saving taxes "assessed or liable to be assessed, or accruing" under former acts. It appearing that F. had not, on October 1, 1870, become entitled, under the will, to the possession or enjoyment of, or to the beneficial interest in, any of the principal sum of said money, it was held that the tax sued for had not accrued to the United States before October 1, 1870, and could not be recovered.

R. M. Sherman, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
John J. Townsend, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The 124th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 285), provides, that "any person or persons having in charge or trust, as administrators, executors or trustees, any legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property, where the whole amount of such personal property, as aforesaid, shall exceed the sum of one thousand dollars in actual value, passing, after the passage of this act, from any person possessed of such property, either by will or by the intestate laws of any state or territory, or any personal property or interest therein, transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor or bargainor, to any person or persons, or to any body or bodies, politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, shall be, and hereby are, made subject to a duty or tax, to be paid to the United States as follows, that is to say: First, where the person or persons entitled to any beneficial interest in such property shall be the lineal issue or lineal ancestor, brother or sister, to the person who died possessed of such property, as aforesaid, at the rate of one dollar for each and every hundred dollars of the clear value of such interest in such property." The 125th section of the same act, as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 140), provides, "that the tax or duty aforesaid shall be due and payable whenever the party interested in such legacy or distributive share or property or interest aforesaid shall become entitled to the possession or enjoyment thereof, or to the beneficial interest in the profits accruing therefrom, and the same shall be a lien and charge upon the property of every person who may die, as aforesaid, for twenty years, or until the same shall, within that period, be fully paid to and discharged by the United States; and every administrator, executor or trustee, having in charge or trust any legacy or distributive share, as aforesaid, shall give notice thereof to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district where the deceased grantor or bargainor last resided, within thirty days after he shall have taken charge of such trust; and every executor, administrator or trustee, before payment and distribution to the legatees or any parties entitled to beneficial interest therein, shall pay to the collector or deputy collector of the district of which the deceased person was a resident, the amount of the duty or tax assessed upon such legacy or distributive share, and shall also make and render to the assessor or assistant assessor of the said district a schedule, list or statement, in duplicate, of the amount of such legacy or distributive share, together with the amount of duty which has accrued or shall accrue thereon, verified by his oath or affirmation, to be administered and certified thereon by some magistrate or officer having lawful power to administer such oaths, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, which schedule, list or statement shall contain the names of each and every person entitled to any beneficial interest therein, together with the clear value of such interest, the duplicate of which schedule, list or statement shall be by him immediately delivered, and the tax thereon paid to such collector; and, upon such payment or delivery of such schedule, list or statement, said collector or deputy collector shall grant to such person paying such duty or tax a receipt or receipts for the same in duplicate, which shall be prepared as hereinafter provided. Such receipt or receipts, duly signed and delivered by such collector or deputy collector, shall be sufficient evidence to entitle such executor, administrator or trustee to be credited and allowed such payment by every tribunal which, by the laws of any state or territory, is or may be empowered to decide upon and settle the accounts of executors and administrators. And, in case such executor, administrator or trustee shall refuse or neglect to pay the aforesaid duty or tax to the collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, within the time hereinbefore provided, or shall neglect or refuse to deliver to said collector or deputy collector the duplicate of the schedule, list or statement of such legacies, property or personal estate, under oath, as aforesaid, or shall neglect or refuse to deliver the schedule, list or statement of such legacies, property or personal estate, under oath, as aforesaid, or shall deliver to said assessor, or assistant assessor a false schedule or statement of such legacies, property or personal estate, or give the names and relationship of the persons entitled to beneficial interests therein untruly, or shall not truly and correctly set forth and state therein the clear value of such beneficial interest, or where no administration upon such property or personal estate shall have been granted or allowed under existing laws, the assistant assessor shall make out such lists and valuation as in other cases of neglect and refusal, and shall assess the duty thereon; and, in case of wilful neglect, refusal or false statement by such executor, administrator or trustee, as aforesaid, he shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding one thousand dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit; and the collector shall commence appropriate proceedings before any court of the United States, in the name of the United States, against such person or persons as may have the actual or constructive custody or possession of such property or personal estate, or any part thereof, and shall subject such property or personal estate, or any portion of the same, to be sold upon the judgment or decree of such court, and from the proceeds of such sale the amount of such tax or duty, together with all costs and expenses of every description to be allowed by such court, shall be first paid, and the balance, if any, deposited according to the order of such court, to be paid, under its direction, to such person or persons as shall establish title to the same. The deed or deeds, or any proper conveyance of such property or personal estate, or any portion thereof, so sold under such judgment or decree, executed by the officer lawfully charged with carrying the same into effect, shall vest in the purchaser thereof all the title of the delinquent to the property or personal estate sold under and by virtue of such judgment or decree, and shall release every other portion of such property or personal estate from the lien or charge thereon created by this act."

This suit is founded on a liability claimed to have been created by the foregoing statute, and is brought by the United States against the New York Life Insurance & Trust Company. On the 1st of November, 1868, Frederick Bronson died, leaving three children (two daughters and a son, Frederick), having duly made his will, by which he bequeathed and devised to his executors the residue of his estate, real and personal, on the following trusts: First, that they should divide the same, from time to time, as soon and to as large an amount as its condition might admit, into three equal shares or portions, and set apart and designate one of such shares or portions to each of his children. Second, that they should pay to the New York Life Insurance & Trust Company (the defendant) one-third of each of such shares or portions, to be held by such company in trust for each child, as follows, to wit, to invest the same, with the proceeds or income thereof, from time to time, in securities designated in the will, and to pay the income, or the portion thus deposited in said company, for his daughters respectively, if demanded, to such daughter semi-annually, and, on her death, the whole of such portion, with the accumulations thereof, if any, to go to her children, unless devised by her, as thereinafter provided; and to pay over to his said son, after he should attain the age of twenty-one years, the whole of the annual income of the accumulated sum of that portion held in trust for him, if demanded, in semi-annual payments, and, on his attaining the age of twenty-five, the whole principal sum so held in trust for him, with the accumulations thereof, except the sum of seventy thousand dollars, which should be held by said company in trust, to pay over to him the income thereof semi-annually during his life, and, at his death, the whole of the estate held in trust for him, as well as the said seventy thousand dollars, to be paid according to his will, if he should die married or leaving children him surviving; but, in case he should die unmarried, leaving no children, then to his sisters or their children, the latter taking per stirpes and not per capita. The will then provides, that the executors shall invest the residue of the several portions of the estate in securities designated in the will, and apply the income of that portion then belonging to the son according to their discretion, not exceeding $3,000 annually, to his education and support, until he should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, and, after that time, the whole of such income, until he should reach the age of twenty-five, at which time they should transfer the principal sum, with the accumulations, if any, to him, except that portion thereof so devised in trust for him to the New York Life Insurance & Trust Company. After that the will contains the following clause: "I hereby authorize my son, in case of his marriage before attaining the age of twenty-five, to dispose of the whole sum herein devised to him by last will and testament, and, in case he dies intestate, leaving lawful issue, the same shall descend to such issue; but, in case of his death before reaching the age of twenty-five years, unmarried, and without lawful issue, then the whole of such sum shall go to his sisters, or their children, the latter taking per stirpes and not per capita; but, in case of his death during the lives of his sisters, or either of them, said share shall be held in trust for them, in the same manner as is provided for their shares."

The complaint alleges, in its first count, that the defendant received, as a trustee, the shares or portions which it was so to receive for the son for said purposes; that the amount thereof exceeded the sum of $1,000; that the principal sum and accumulation thereon of the share or portion of the son, held in trust by the defendant at the time such son attained the age of twenty-five years, after deducting the sum of $70,000 therefrom, amounted to the sum of $281,593; that such son attained the age of twenty-five years on the 1st of November, 1875, and became entitled to the possession and enjoyment of the principal sum and accumulation thereon aforesaid, and thereupon a duty or tax of one dollar for each and every hundred dollars of the said sum of $281,593, to wit, $2,815.93, became due and payable to the United States from the defendant; that thereafter, and within the time prescribed by law, the commissioner of internal revenue duly assessed said tax against the defendant; and that said tax is unpaid. There is a second count, which claims to recover fifty per centum of such tax, as a penalty for not making a return of such tax and paying it. The complaint demands judgment against the defendant for the tax and the penalty, with interest on the tax from November 1, 1875.

The answer of the defendant, after a general denial, alleges, that the testator bequeathed all his personal estate to his executors in trust, who in due time gave due notice thereof to the assessor of the district where the deceased last resided, and, before payment and distribution to the defendant or any party entitled, paid to the collector of said district the amount of the duty or tax assessed upon the distributive share directed to be paid to the defendant in trust for the said son, and also made and rendered to said assessor a schedule, in duplicate, of the amount of all legacies or distributive shares passing by the will of said testator, with the amount of duty which had accrued or should accrue thereon, duly verified and in due form as required by law, and delivered the duplicate thereof to the said collector; that said tax so paid was duly assessed upon the clear value of the interest of said son in the whole estate, then ascertained to be $292,171, according to the true intent and meaning of said will; and that such valuation was made, and such tax assessed upon the executors, by the assistant assessor and assessor of said district, and returned by them to the said collector of said district in the list for the month of May or June, 1870. The answer prays judgment if the United States ought to be admitted, against the record of the valuation of the interest of said son in said personal property, and the record of the assessment of $2,921.71, assessed, as aforesaid, as the tax to be paid, at the rate of one per centum of the clear value of such interest, to maintain this action or to make any assessment whatever against the defendant.

The case has been tried before the court without a jury, on an agreed statement of facts. At the trial the plaintiffs moved to strike out of the first count the allegation as to an assessment, and to strike out the second count entirely. The will, dated December 19, 1864, was put in evidence, containing the above recited provisions. It was admitted to probate November 17, 1868. The defendant accepted the position of trustee under the will, and in that capacity had in charge and trust for the son certain sums of money and securities, of the value altogether, in money, of $164,425.34, which were received by it at five several dates, from November 2, 1869, to February 1, 1873. The son attained the age of twenty-one years on the 23d of June, 1870, and attained the age of twenty-five years on the 23d of June, 1874. There was paid to him by the defendant, as trustee under the will, from the 23d of June, 1870, to the 23d of June, 1874, inclusive, under the clauses of the will providing that he should receive the income of the principal sum from the time he should become twenty-one years of age until the time he should become twenty-five years of age, the sum of $36,370. The defendant, as trustee under the will, paid to the son, on the 11th of July, 1874, as the amount which, by the terms of the will, he was entitled to receive on attaining the age of twenty-five years, money and securities of the value altogether, in money, of $98,084.22. The defendant, as trustee under the will, retained the principal sum of $70,000, which it has hitherto held, and still holds, in accordance with the directions in that regard in the will. The executors of the testator gave notice to the assessor of the proper district of the terms of the will, and of all the particulars of the estate which passed from the testator, and delivered to the assessor of the proper district a schedule or list, and to the collector of the district a duplicate, which was in fact prepared by the assessor. The list was handed back to the executors by the assessor, and at the same time the assessor delivered to the executors a written paper, as a statement of the amount of tax due, based on the information which the executors had given to the assessor. In this statement the entire net personal estate of the testator was put down at $1,054,780.14. One-third of that amount for each of the three children was put down at $351,593.38. The values of the life estates of the two daughters severally in the sum of $351,593 were put down at the sums of $278,087 and $285,661 severally. The value of the life estate of the son in the sum of $351,593 (deducting $1,000) was put down at the sum of $292,171. The total value of the three life estates was put down at the sum of $855,919 and the tax thereon, at one per centum, was put down at $8,559.19. The assessment was put by the assessor into his monthly list for June, 1870. On the 23d of July, 1870, the executors paid to the collector, as the amount of the tax so assessed, $8,559.19, and received his receipt for the same. All the property which passed to the defendant in trust under the will was included in the property embraced in said lists, statement and receipt.

The United States, on the foregoing facts, claim to recover from the defendant a tax of one per centum on the value, at the death of the testator, November 1, 1868, of an annuity for seven years, on $164,425.34, computed by the Northampton tables, with interest on the amount of such tax from November 1, 1868; also a tax of one per centum on $98,084.22, with interest on such tax from June 23, 1874; also a tax of one per centum on the value, on the 23d of June, 1874, of an annuity for the life of the son, on the sum of $70,000, computed by the Northampton tables, with interest on such tax from the 23d of June, 1874.

By the third section of the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 256), it is provided, that, on and after the 1st of October, 1870, the taxes on legacies and successions imposed by the internal revenue laws then in force are repealed. The seventeenth section of said act of 1870 provides, that "all acts and parts of acts relating to the taxes herein repealed, and all the provisions of said acts, shall continue in full force for levying and collecting all taxes properly assessed or liable to be assessed or accruing under the provisions of former acts, or drawbacks, the right to which has already accrued, or which may hereafter accrue, under said acts, and for maintaining and continuing liens, fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under and by virtue thereof; and this act shall not be construed to affect any act done, right accrued, or penalty incurred under former acts, but every such right is hereby saved."

It was entirely uncertain, under the terms of the will, whether the son would ever be entitled to the possession or enjoyment of any part of the principal or income of the one-third share put in trust for him in the hands of the defendant, or to any beneficial interest in such share, except, perhaps, in the income or profits accruing therefrom. He could not have any of the income of such share until he attained the age of twenty-one years, nor could he have any of the principal of such share until he attained the age of twenty-five years. He might have died before he became twenty-one. The testator died November 1, 1868. The son became twenty-one on the 23d of June, 1870. If the son had died before he became twenty-one, unmarried, leaving no lawful issue, the estate held in trust for him by the defendant would not have passed under any disposition of it made by him by will, but would have gone, under the terms of the will, to his sisters or their children. On the 1st of October, 1870, when the repealing act took effect, the son had become entitled, at most, to the possession or enjoyment of, and to the beneficial interest in, nothing but the income, for his life, of the share held in trust for him by the defendant. He had not, at that time, become entitled to the possession or enjoyment of any of the principal sum which he was entitled to have on reaching the age of twenty-five, or to any beneficial interest therein, as a principal sum. If, on or after the 1st of October, 1870, he had died before reaching the age of twenty-five, without marrying, leaving no lawful issue, the estate held in trust for him by the defendant would not have passed under any disposition of it made by him by will, but would have gone, under the terms of the will. to his sisters or their children.

On the foregoing facts the question arises, whether any of the taxes sued for or claimed to be recovered herein had "accrued" to the United States before the 1st of October, 1870. None of them were due or payable, by the terms of the statute, until the son became entitled to the possession or enjoyment of the moneys in respect of which the tax is claimed, or to the beneficial interest in the same or in the income thereof. The taxes were repealed before the son became so entitled to anything, except, perhaps, the income for life of the share held by the defendant in trust for him, and, when the taxes were repealed, it was uncertain, under the terms of the will, whether the son would ever be entitled to anything more. Under these circumstances the defendant could never be called upon to respond for any tax on the share held by it in trust for the defendant, except, perhaps, the legacy tax on his life estate in such share, the value of such life estate being the clear value of his beneficial interest in such share.

The purport of the decision in May v. Slack [Case No. 9,336], is, that a tax "accrues" on a pecuniary legacy on the death of the testator, only where the legacy becomes vested by the death of the testator, and would pass under the will of the legatee, or to his personal representative, or could be assigned by him. In the present case, even if the right to the income for life of the trust share in the hands of the defendant accrued to the son when the testator died, and before the son became twenty-one, so that the legacy of such life estate became vested by the death of the testator and would thereafter pass by the will or assignment of the son, yet no right to anything else, or to the principal of the trust share, accrued to or became vested in the son before October 1, 1870.

On the 1st of October, 1870, it was uncertain when any legacy tax or duty would have to be paid in respect of any of the estate held in trust by the defendant, except, perhaps, the life estate of the son therein, or whether the son would ever enjoy anything but such life estate, or to whom the estate, beyond such life estate, would pass. The son's sisters and their children might all of them die before the son, and then he might die before reaching the age of twenty-five, and then the property held in trust by the defendant might pass to others. In such a case, according to the decision in Mason v. Clapp [Case No. 9,233], no tax would have accrued before the repeal took effect. In that decision, Judge Shepley, commenting on May v. Slack [supra] points to the fact, that, in May v. Slack, the tax accrued before the repeal, because the person who was to receive the legacy had before that been ascertained, and it was absolutely due to a specific legatee. But he holds that the evident intention of the exception in the repealing act was to provide for levying and collecting such taxes as should have been assessed before October 1, 1870, and such tax as before that time had accrued against any particular person, where, as against him, the right had accrued and become absolute. .

In Mason v. Clapp [supra], the devise was of real estate, to the testator's widow for life, and, on her death, to the plaintiff. The effect of the succession tax statute in that case was the same as the effect of the will in the case now before us, that is, to prevent the saving clause in the repealing act from reaching the case. The views of Judge Shepley are adopted by the supreme court in Clapp v. Mason, 94 U. S. 589. There is nothing inconsistent with those views in the decision of Judge Shepley in Mason v. Sargent [Case No. 9,253]. In that case the legacy was to the testator's widow for life, and on her death, one-half of it to his son and the other half to his daughter. They were both of them living and of full age at the time of his death.

In the present case a tax of one per centum on the value of the life estate of the son at the time the testator died, in $351,593, namely, on $292,171, was paid. The only tax sued for in the complaint is a tax of one per centum on $281,593, as the principal sum, and accumulation thereon, of the share of the son which was held in trust by the defendant at the time the son attained the age of twenty-five years, after deducting the $70,000 therefrom. The complaint avers, that the son attained the age of twenty-five years, and became entitled to the possession and enjoyment of the principal sum and the accumulation thereon, at a date long subsequent to the 1st of October, 1870, and that the tax sued for became due and payable when the son attained the age of twenty-five years, and the complaint claims interest on such tax from the time when the son attained the age of twenty-five years. The complaint claims nothing in respect of any tax on the value of any life estate of the son. It follows, that the United States have no valid claim to recover from the defendant the tax sued for in the complaint.

The case was tried by the parties on the theory that the plaintiffs would be allowed to claim a recovery in the case for all or any of the three taxes before stated to be claimed by them from the defendant, if entitled to recover such tax or taxes on the facts proved, although the form of the complaint was limited to the specific tax claimed in it. I, therefore, proceed to consider the claims for those three taxes.

The claim to the tax on the $98,084.22 paid to the son by the defendant, after he attained the age of twenty-five years, is the same claim that is set forth in the complaint, the $281,593 being, on the evidence, really only $98,084.22. The defendant received $164,425.34, and paid to the son $98,084.22. The difference, $66,341.12, represents substantially the $70,000 directed by the will to be retained. The claim to a tax on the value of an annuity for the life of the son on the $70,000 must be rejected, for the same reason for which the claim to a tax on the $98,084.22 is rejected.

The remaining tax claimed is a tax of one per centum on the value, at the death of the testator, of an annuity for seven years on the $164,425.34 paid to the defendant, from time to time, in trust for the son. The tax is imposed by the statute on the share passing by the will, from the testator to the distributee, and is imposed on the clear value of the beneficial interest of such distributee at the time the share passes by the will, that is, at the death of the testator. In the present case, the clear value of the beneficial interest of the son in the one-third of the personal estate of the testator, at the time of the death of the testator, was, under the will, at most, the value of the estate for life of the son in such one-third. Such one-third, according to the statement of facts agreed on at the trial, included all the property which passed to the defendant in trust under the will. Such one-third was, as appears by the will, to be one-third of both real and personal estate. One-third of the personal estate, according to inventory, was $351,593. One-third of that, given in trust to the defendant for the son, was $117,197.67. The difference between that sum and the $164,425.34 paid to the defendant as one-ninth, if not presumably to be accounted for as the proceeds of real estate, or as accretion of value of personal estate after the death of the testator, is not explained. On the evidence, the United States received, in receiving the $8,559.19, a tax of one per centum on the clear value, at the time of the death of the testator, of an estate for the life of the son in all the personal property which passed to the defendant, under the will, in trust for the son. This includes a tax on the value, at the same time, of an estate for seven years, or of an annuity for seven years, in or on such personal property, and includes the tax now claimed. Such tax has, therefore, been paid.

It results, therefore, that there must be judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 15,874.

UNITED STATES v. NEW YORK, N. H. & H. R. CO.

[10 Ben. 144; [1] 24 Int. Rev. Rec. 341.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1878.

INTERNAL REVENUE — DISTRICTS — JURISDICTION.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 733, which is a re-enactment of the 41st section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 239), as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), and which provides that "taxes accruing under any law providing internal revenue may be sued for and recovered, either in the district where the liability for such tax occurs or in the district where the delinquent resides," a suit will not lie to recover such tax in a district other than that in which the tax accrues or that in which the delinquent resides, although he may be found and served with process therein.

Mr. Hill, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

H. C. Robinson, for defendant.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a suit brought to recover a tax alleged to have accrued against the defendant, a railroad corporation, in the year 1864, under the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 275). The defendant pleads to the jurisdiction that the tax, if any is due, accrued in the district of Connecticut, and that the defendant is not a New York corporation, but incorporated under the laws of Connecticut, and not a resident of this district. To this plea the plaintiff demurs.

The question raised is whether a suit for this tax can be brought in a district, other than that where the defendant resides or where the tax accrues, or whether it can also be brought in the district where the defendant shall be personally served. It is conceded by the learned counsel for the defendant that under the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, § 11,—Rev. St. § 739 [1 Stat. 73],—which prohibits the bringing of a civil suit against an inhabitant of the United States "in any other district than that of which he is an inhabitant, or in which he is found at the time of serving the writ," a corporation may be sued out of its domicile, if found in another district; and the defendant does not contend that this defendant was not "found" within this district within the meaning of that section. The claim of the defendant is that by Rev. St. § 733, the plaintiff is restricted to the district where the tax accrues and the district where the defendant resides for the purpose of this action. That section is as follows: "Taxes accruing under any law providing internal revenue, may be sued for and recovered either in the district where the liability for such tax occurs, or in the district where the delinquent resides." In the absence of any statute regulation as to the courts where such a suit is to be brought, no doubt the United States could sue in any district where the defendant could be found. And it is argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the language of section 733 is permissive, merely, and not restrictive, the words being "may be sued for," etc., and that the section adds another district in which the suit may be brought, namely, that in which the tax accrues, to those in which under the general terms of section 739 it could otherwise alone be brought, namely, those in which the defendant resides or can be found. Section 733 is a re-enactment of part of the 41st section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 239), as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111).

The act of 1864 (chapter 173, § 41) provided as follows: "That it shall be the duty of the collectors aforesaid or their deputies, in their respective districts, and they are hereby authorized, to collect all the duties and taxes imposed by this act, however the same may be designated, and to prosecute for the recovery of any sum or sums which may be forfeited by virtue of this act, and all fines, penalties and forfeitures which may be incurred or imposed by virtue of this act, shall be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate form of proceeding, qui tam, or otherwise, before any circuit or district court of the United States, for the district within which said fine, penalty or forfeiture may have been incurred, or before any other court of competent jurisdiction." It will be observed that under this statute no special provision was made as to the district in which suits for taxes should be brought; such suits were therefore liable to be brought and could be only brought in the district where the defendant resided or in the district where he was found, while suits for fines might be brought in the district where the fine was incurred, and also "in any other court of competent jurisdiction," which included certainly a circuit or district court of the United States for the district where the offender might be found. Section 41 of the act of 1864 was amended by the act of 1866 so as to read as follows (page 111): "That it shall be the duty of the collectors aforesaid, or their deputies, in their respective districts, and they are hereby authorized to collect all the taxes imposed by law, however the same may be designated, and to prosecute for the recovery of any sum or sums which may be forfeited by law; and all fines, penalties and forfeitures which may be incurred or imposed by law shall be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States in any proper form of action or by any appropriate form of proceeding, qui tam or otherwise, before any circuit or district court of the United States for the district within which said fine, penalty or forfeiture may have been incurred, or before any other court of competent jurisdiction. And taxes may be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States in any proper form of action before any circuit or district court of the United States for the district within which the liability to such tax may have been or shall be incurred, or where the party from whom such tax is due may reside at the time of the commencement of said action." A provision as to suits for fines, penalties and forfeitures differing only in some unimportant respects was also made by the 179th section of the act of 1864 (13 Stat. 305), in connection with a provision imposing on collectors the duty of collecting such fines, etc. And this also was verbally amended by the act of 1866 (14 Stat. 145), but not in any particular varying its terms in respect to the courts having jurisdiction of suits and proceedings therefor.

A comparison of these two statutes shows, I think, that the purpose of amending the statute was to restrict the plaintiff in a suit for taxes to the two districts, that in which the tax accrues and that in which the defendant resides. Some change in the mode of collecting fines or taxes was intended by this amendment. In the original act the collectors are required to collect taxes, but no court was specified to which they are to resort. In the amending act, fines are still to be sued for in the circuit or district court of the United States, for the district where the fine is incurred or in any other court of competent jurisdiction, the same as before. The change made is, by adding the provision as to taxes, that suits may be brought in the district where the liability for the tax is incurred or in the district where the defendant resides. Now if the purpose of this amendment had been merely to allow the United States to sue for a tax in the district where the liability was incurred, that purpose would have been well expressed by simply providing that the suit may be brought in that district. The language being in form permissive only, the United States would seem not, by that language, to be restricted from suing in any other district in which, by the existing law, it could already sue, namely, the district where the defendant resides or the district where he may be found; and if it was the purpose of this language, as claimed on the part of the United States, to confer a new right as to the place of suit, the words "or where the party, etc., resides," are wholly unnecessary and unmeaning. They are unnecessary because the right to sue thus conferred already existed; they are unmeaning because the existing alternative right to sue thus referred to, if it be supposed that it was intended to express by these words the existing alternative right, is only half expressed by the language used. The words are not apt nor broad enough to be supposed to have been used ex majore cautela to guard against the possible construction that the liberty to sue in the district where the tax accrues was intended to be exclusive, and the only place in which suit could be brought, and so that these added words were intended to save existing rights to sue. This is obviously not the intention, because the words used plainly express a distinct part and only a part of the existing right as to the place in which the suit may be brought, that right as then existing embracing, besides the district where defendant resides, the district also where he may be found. But words thus introduced into a statute, particularly by way of amendment, must be held to have been deliberately used and to have some force and meaning; and the only construction that can be put on these words, as it seems to me, to give them any sensible meaning or application, is that they are restrictive, limiting the right to sue to the district where the defendant resides, and the district where the tax accrues,—that they were intended to regulate the whole matter of the place of such suits. It seems impossible to give the words any proper force or to account for their being introduced into the statute on any other theory. Further support is given to this view by the juxtaposition of the two provisions, one as to fines, the other as to taxes. In the one the language used in the alternative to the new right given, is "any other court of competent jurisdiction," which includes the district where the offender can be found. Immediately follows the provision as to taxes. And different language is used for a similar alternative provision. It must be assumed that this difference of language was intended, and that the purpose had in view in using the expression employed as to suits for taxes would not have been effected by using the same language adopted as to fines. Such marked differences in language used for a similar purpose in the same act and the same section, cannot be held to have been accidental.

Moreover, it may well have been thought that the privilege given to the government to sue for a tax in the district where the tax accrues, and in the district where the defendant resides, afforded ample and convenient means of collecting the tax, and that it was unnecessary to preserve the right to sue, also, in the district where the defendant may be found. There seems to be nothing unreasonable in this arrangement as to suits for taxes, while as to suits for fines, penalties and forfeitures it has been thought wise to preserve to the government all existing rights to sue, while specially granting the new right to sue where the fine, penalty or forfeiture was incurred.

These provisions of the act of 1866 were embodied in sections 732 and 733 of the Revised Statutes with a change of form, but hardly of substance, as to suits for fines. Section 732 provides that suits for fines, etc., may be brought in the district where they accrue or in the district where the offender is found. And by section 733, as above cited, suits for taxes may be brought in the district where the tax accrues, or in that where the defendant resides. Thus the revisers appear to have indicated their understanding that the distinction in the act of 1866 was an intended difference in the two cases, by preserving the same distinction of language in the revision. Certainly this re-enactment detracts nothing from the reasons in favor of holding that the words were used in a restrictive sense in the act of 1866. And the presumption is against any change being intended by the substantial re-enactment of these two clauses taken from that section of the act of 1866, in these two sections of the Revised Statutes.

Demurrer overruled and judgment for defendant.

UNITED STATES v. NICHOLLS.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1831.

GUARDIAN — ACTION ON BOND — LIABILITY FOR MONEY RECEIVED IN ANOTHER JURISDICTION—DECLARATION.

1. A guardian appointed by the orphans' court of the county of Washington, D. C., is liable, upon his bond given here, for money received by him in Maryland, for the use of his ward.

2. In an action upon a guardian's bond for not delivering up the property of the ward agreeably to an order of the orphans' court, it is not necessary to set forth in the breach all the grounds and reasons of that court for making the order; nor all the facts which would justify such an order.

This was an action of debt against the defendant as surety for John H. Beale, in his bond as guardian of Anne Lee Beale.

The declaration recited the bond with its condition, and assigned two breaches: (1) In not paying over to David Butler, Jr., who had been appointed guardian in his place, the sum of $288.87 due by him to his ward upon the settlement of his guardianship account to that time, the orphans' court having revoked his letters of guardianship and appointed the said Butler in his place. (2) In not delivering up and paying over to the said Butler $150 received by the said Beale for rent of the said Anne L. Beale's share of the rent of land in Calvert county in Maryland, according to a like order of the said orphans' court.

At the trial of the cause on the 24th of December, 1831, the defendant took a bill of exceptions, which stated that the plaintiffs, to support the issue on their part, offered in evidence to the jury an account of the said J. H. Beale, as guardian of the said Anne L. Beale, showing a balance of $288.87 due by him to his ward, and one of the items charged to him was the sum of $151.88 for "his ward's proportion of the interest on $12,656.69 (being an undivided legacy from the late Dr. William Potts in the hands of his executor,) for one year." Whereupon the defendant's counsel offered evidence to show that the said Dr. William Potts died in Frederick county, in the state of Maryland, and that Richard Potts of the said county and state, is the executor referred to in the said account; and also produced the will of the said Dr. William Potts. And thereupon prayed the court to instruct the jury that the defendant was not liable upon this bond on account of any moneys received by the said J. H. Beale, unless the same was received by him as guardian of his said ward on account of lands of the said ward lying in Washington county in this district, or from a personal estate of a deceased intestate or testator, of which estate administration hath been granted in the same county.

But THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, absent) refused to give the instruction, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, for the $288.87, with interest.

Key & Dunlop, for defendant, then moved for a new trial and in arrest of judgment; and contended that the said J. H. Beale, the guardian, was not liable here for money received in Maryland. That he had no right to receive his ward's money in Maryland, and Dr. Potts' executor had no authority to pay it to him, and is still liable to her for the same. That he could only discharge himself by payment to a guardian appointed in Maryland. That the first breach assigned is bad. It ought to have shown that the money was received on account of lands or estate in this county. That the bond only covers what he had a right to receive; and that he had no right to receive money out of this district. That the breach assigned ought to show the authority of the orphans' court to remove Beale from the guardianship, and to appoint Butler in his place. The only case in which the orphans' court can remove a guardian, is where he refuses to give new security when required by the court. Neither breach shows any such refusal, or any other ground for his removal. That court is of limited and special jurisdiction, and all the circumstances which will justify the removal ought to appear upon the face of the proceedings.

Mr. Hellen, in reply, was stopped by THE COURT, who said they would hear him if they should think it necessary.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra), overruled both motions.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, thought the breach bad in not averring that Beale had refused to give new security.

UNITED STATES v. NICHOLS.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1833.

GUARDIAN — ACTION ON BOND — LIABILITY FOR MONEY RECEIVED IN ANOTHER JURISDICTION —REVOCATION OF AUTHORITY.

1. A guardian appointed by the orphans' court for the county of Washington, D. C., is liable to account there for money received by him for his ward in Maryland.

2. A guardian, whose authority is revoked, is bound by his bond to pay over the money in his hands to the person appointed by the orphans' court to receive it, although the person so appointed had not given bond as guardian.

Debt against a surety in a guardian's bond.

The condition of the bond was that the guardian should faithfully account with the orphans' court as directed by law; and should "also deliver up the said property to the order of the said court, or the directions of law," &c. The declaration averred two breaches of the condition of the bond: (1) By not paying a balance in his hands of $78.87 to David Butler, according to the direction of the orphans' court; the said David Butler "being" appointed guardian in the place of John H. Beall, whose letters of guardianship were revoked. (2) By not paying to the said David Butler, according to the directions of the orphans' court, $150 which the said John H. Beall had received for rents of the orphan's real estate in Maryland. The pleadings resulted in a demurrer, the principal questions in which were, whether the guardian was bound to account here, for money received in Maryland; and whether the orphans' court could lawfully order the money to be paid over to the new guardian before he had given bond for the faithful discharge of his duty.

Key & Dunlop, for defendant, contended that the defendant, who is a surety, is only liable for such property as the guardian here had a right to collect; and that he had no right to collect the effects of the ward in Maryland; and that, although a guardian may be liable in an action for money had and received, yet it is only because he has received it; and he is only liable as any other person would be, who has received the money of the ward. That the person from whom Beall received the money in Maryland was not justifiable in paying it to Beall, and is still liable for the same. That the surety who is about to sign the bond, considers the amount of property which the guardian would have a right to receive, and ought not to be made liable for more. They cited the act of Maryland of 1798, c. 101; Id. c. 12, §§ 1, 4; Williams v. Storrs, 6 Johns. Ch. 353; Morrell v. Dickey, 1 Johns. Ch. 153; and Genet v. Tallmadge, Id. 3.

Mr. Hellen, contra, cited Raborg's Adm'x v. Hammond's Adm'r, 2 Har. & G. 49.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the pleas were bad, and said (among other things):

The first plea admits the receipt of the money, and the order to pay it over; but denies that it was money for which the said John H. Beall was liable to account as guardian. The court, however, is of opinion that, although the money came from the funds existing out of the District of Columbia, yet, as it was received by him under color of his authority as guardian, he is bound to account for it as guardian. For if a stranger receive the rents and profits of an infant's estate, he may charge him and call him to account as guardian. Bac. Abr. "Guardian," I; 1 Rolle, Abr. 661; Cro. Car. 221; Yallop v. Holworthy, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. p. 7, pl. 10; Newburgh v. Bickerstaffe, 1 Vern. 295; Falkland v. Bertie, 2 Vern. 342. And his bond covers all that he is bound to account for as guardian.

The second plea is, that at the time the order was made to pay the money over to Butler, he had not given bond as guardian, and, therefore, was not lawful guardian to receive the money. This plea assumes that the orphans' court had no authority to order the guardian to pay the money over to a stranger, and that such an order is absolutely void, and, therefore, it was no breach of the bond to disobey the order. But it does not appear that the orphans' court might not lawfully order the money to be paid over to Butler, although he had not been appointed guardian; or had not given bond. He might have been appointed a receiver for safe keeping. The declaration does not aver that Butler had been appointed guardian before the order was made, or before the money was to be paid; it merely describes Butler as "being appointed guardian." But if it were necessary that Butler should give bond and security before he could lawfully receive the money, the order to pay it over would not be illegal, as no time of payment was specified in the order stated in the declaration; and if previous security were necessary, the order would be considered as conditional, and to become absolute upon the security being given. It does not, therefore, necessarily follow that the order was void because the security was not given until after the date of the order.

The court is of opinion that all the pleas are insufficient.

Case No. 15,877.

UNITED STATES v. NICHOLSON et al.

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1878.

ELECTIONS — CONGRESSIONAL REPRESENTATIVES — BALLOT BOXES.

1. The purpose of section 5515 of the Revised Statutes was only to punish a violation of the state laws regulating elections, when such violation affected the election or the result of the election of a delegate or representative in congress.

[Cited in Ex parte Perkins, 29 Fed. 906.]

2. The election law of the state of Louisiana, approved April 11, 1877, does not authorize the use, by the commissioners of election, of two ballot boxes, one for the election of state and parish officers, and the other for the election of representatives in congress.

This was an indictment [against Daniel Nicholson and others], under section 5515 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, against three commissioners of election appointed under the state law to conduct an election for member of congress, state, parish and ward officers, in one of the wards of Caddo parish, in the state of Louisiana. The charge of the court can be understood without any recital of the facts.

A. H. Leonard, U. S. Atty.

J. R. Beckwith, B. F. Jonas, C. H. Luzenberg, and J. C. Egan, for defense.

WOODS, Circuit Judge (charging jury). The defendants in this case are charged in an indictment containing two counts. The first count alleges that at the general election for members of congress, held on the fifth of November, 1878, in the Fourth congressional district, in this state, two of the defendants, to wit, Daniel Nicholson and Samuel Fells, were the commissioners of said election, and the other defendant, Thomas B. Chase, was clerk thereof; and that they, the officers of such election, did unlawfully, feloniously and with intent to affect the result of such election, furnish for use at the said election two boxes for the reception of ballots, in addition to the one provided for by law, and required said boxes to be used as follows: One of the boxes as the exclusive receptacle for all ballots cast for representative in the congress of the United States, one box as a receptacle for all ballots cast for officers of the Fourth ward of the parish of Caddo, and the remaining box as the receptacle for all ballots voted for officers of the parish and members of the state legislature.

The first count further charges that the commissioners at the said election announced and proclaimed that all ballots to be voted for representative in the congress of the United States were required to be deposited in the box set apart by them for the reception of such ballots; and that all ballots voted for ward officers were required to be deposited in the box designated for the reception of such ballots; and that all ballots to be voted for the parish officers and members of the state legislature were required to be voted in the box designated for the reception of such ballots by the commissioners. And that the commissioners of the election further proclaimed that any ballot deposited in a box other than the one designated by them for its reception would neither be listed nor counted. The first count of the indictment further alleges that the said officers of the election refused to count two hundred ballots cast at such election by duly qualified voters of the state and precinct for a representative in the congress of the United States. The second count charges that the defendants, being officers at said election, as mentioned in the first count, did refuse to perform their duty as such, and did neglect and refuse to count two hundred ballots cast at said election by duly qualified voters of the parish and state, for J. Madison Wells for member of congress for the United States.

As to this second count, I say to you, if there is any evidence at all in support of it, it is sufficient to prove the allegation, and it is your duty, therefore, to render a verdict of not guilty on that count. You will, therefore, address yourselves to the consideration of the question, whether or not the United States have succeeded in establishing the guilt of the accused upon the first count of the indictment. The presumption of law is, and you will bear it in mind, that the defendants are innocent until it is satisfactorily established that they are guilty, and guilt cannot be satisfactorily shown unless it is proved beyond reasonable doubt.

What is the charge brought against these defendants by the first count? It is that they did an act unauthorized by law, with a view and purpose of affecting the result of the election for member in congress of the Fourth congressional district of Louisiana. I instruct you that congress has no power to punish a state officer for a violation of a state law, if it only affects the election of state, parish or ward officers, and that section 5515 of the Revised Statutes of the United States does not undertake to punish state officers for a violation of state law, so far as such violation only affects the election, or the result of the election, of state, municipal or parish officers. That section (5515) declares that "every officer of an election at which any delegate or representative in congress is voted for, whether such officer be appointed or created by or under any law or authority of the United States, territorial district or municipal law or authority, who neglects or refuses to perform any duty in regard to the said election required of him by any law of the United States or of any state or territory thereof, or who violates any duty so imposed, or who knowingly does any act thereby unauthorized, with intent to affect any such election, or the result thereof, or who fraudulently makes any false certificates of the result of such election in regard to such representative or delegate, or who neglects, withholds, conceals or destroys any certificate of record so required by law respecting the election of any such representative or delegate, or neglects or refuses to make and return such certificate as required by law; or who aids, counsels, procures or advises any voter, person or officer to do any act by this or any of the preceding sections of this act made criminal, or to omit to do any duty the omission of which is by this or any preceding section of this act made criminal, shall be punished as prescribed by section 5511 of this act." It is clear that the purpose of this law was only to punish a violation of the state regulations, so far as such regulations affected the election, or result of the election, of a member of congress, and no further.

Now, as to the charge against these defendants under the first count: The state law requires or authorizes the use of one, or at most of not more than two ballot boxes. It is charged that at the general election held on the fifth of November last, these defendants, "with the intent to affect the result of an election for representative in congress, held on that day, employed three ballot boxes, and required that all votes for members of congress should be deposited in one box, and that all votes for parish officers and members of the state legislature should be deposited in another box, and that the votes for ward officers should be deposited in a third box." It is alleged, further, that defendants declared that any votes for members of congress which might be deposited in a box designated for either the state or parish officers, or for ward officers, would not be counted. And it is further alleged, under the first count, that the object of the defendants in this action was to affect the election, or the result of the election, for member of congress.

The first question for your determination is this: were the acts which are charged against the defendants in this indictment committed by them. There is no dispute between the counsel for the prosecution and the counsel for the defense on this point. It seems to be conceded that three boxes were used at the elections held in Caddo parish, at the precinct named, on the fifth of November last.

A question of law arises here, and it is whether or not three ballot-boxes were or were not authorized to be used by the law of this state. It seems that on the tenth day of April, 1877, an act was approved by the governor of this state, providing, among other things, for the election of justices of the peace and constables, and on the eleventh of April, 1877—the next day—an act was approved which provided for the election of the various state officers, and also for the election of members of congress, and this act ended by repealing all laws on the subject of elections, excepting those relating to contested elections.

Under the view I take of this case, it is immaterial whether the act of the tenth of April, 1877, is in force or not. Whether or not it was repealed by the act approved next day is not important. My judgment is, that the state of Louisiana, by the act of April 11, 1877, did not authorize the employment, by commissioners of election, of a separate ballot-box for state officers and parish officers, and another ballot-box for members of congress. Section 2 of the act of April 11, 1877, declares, "that the election of members of the general assembly shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November." Section 3 provides that all other officers, the time and place of whose election is not otherwise provided for by law, shall be elected at the time and place provided for the election of senators and representatives. Section 7 declares that all general elections for representatives in congress shall be conducted in the same manner as elections for representatives to the general assembly. Now, this act, you will see, provides for the election, as I have already stated, of twenty-two members of the general assembly and other state officers, and members of congress. Section twenty-three of the same act declares, that all the names of persons voted for shall be written or printed on one ticket, and that the names of the persons and offices voted for shall be accurately printed or written on the tickets. If this law is followed, it is impracticable that there should be two ballot-boxes, one for parish officers and members of the legislature, and the other for members of congress. In my judgment these commissioners were not in any event authorized, under the law of the state, to employ more than two ballot-boxes for ward, state and parish officers and members of congress. I think that a fair construction of Act No. 58 of 1877, shows that the use of one box for the reception of ballots for parish officers and members of the legislature, and another for ballots for members of congress, as it was conceded was done by the defendants, was authorized by law.

The vital question in this case is, what was the intent of the commissioners in using the three ballot-boxes? The prosecution charges that it was done for the purpose of affecting the election of a member of congress, or the result thereof. No matter how much it affected the results of the election for ward officers, parish officers or members of the state legislature; we have nothing to do with that. And unless the purpose of the defendants was to affect the election of members in congress there can be no conviction in this case. The rule of law is that every man intends the natural result of his act. Now, if the natural result of the act of these defendants was to affect the result of the election of a member of congress, you might infer that such was their purpose.

A question for your consideration is, did the use of three ballot-boxes naturally affect the result of the election of a member of congress? If it did not affect it, that is the end of this case. If it did affect it, then you are to inquire further whether the presumption arising from the nature of the act has been rebutted by the proof. The defense claims that no such implication would necessarily follow from such an act, and if it did, that they have succeeded in rebutting such implication. On this point the defense has introduced evidence tending to show that one of the defendants, or two of them, perhaps, took legal advice as to what their duties were under the Acts Nos. 57 and 58 of 1877, of the legislature of the state of Louisiana, and that they were advised that these laws did not prohibit the employment of two or even three ballot-boxes. I instruct you that if these defendants sought this advice in good faith, with the design and purpose of honestly arriving at what their duties were, and followed that advice in good faith, they cannot be convicted under this indictment. If the evidence on the part of the prosecution does not satisfy you that the employment of those three boxes, and the manner in which the defendants proclaimed that the different ballots should be deposited therein, were intended to affect the result of the election of a member in congress, you shall find the defendants not guilty. But if you are satisfied, from the evidence, that they did these acts with a design and purpose to affect the election of a member in congress, and not under an honest mistake as to their duty, if you are satisfied of this beyond a reasonable doubt, it is your duty to return a verdict of guilty as to those defendants who participated in the act, its design and purpose. Chase, one of the defendants, testified, as I recollect the evidence, that he had nothing to do with the procuring of the two additional boxes, and the defendant Fells testified that the three boxes were at the poll when he arrived there. If the boxes were there, whether they procured them or not, and if the defendants Chase and Fells concurred in the use to which they were put, it is immaterial who brought the boxes to the polls.

You will take the case and determine whether or not the guilt of the defendants has been made out, and if you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that every necessary ingredient of the offense charged has been established, you will return a verdict of not guilty. But if you are convinced by the proof that the additional boxes were used by the defendants in the manner charged in the indictment, and for the purpose and with the intent charged, and not under an honest mistake as to their duty, you will find them guilty.

Case No. 15,878.

UNITED STATES v. NICKERSON.

SAME v. TAYLOR.

[17 Law Rep. 266; 1 Spr. 232.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1854.

PERJURY—FISHING BOUNTY.

1. The seventh section of the act of congress of July 29, 1813, c. 35 [3 Stat. 52], the act providing for the payment of the fishing bounty, does not require any oath to the agreement referred to in that section.

[Cited in U. S. v. Howard, 37 Fed. 667; U. S. v. Bedgood, 49 Fed. 56.]

2. The act of July 29, 1813, c. 35 [3 Stat. 52], expressly prescribes the kind of proof of compliance with the requirements of that act, necessary to entitle the owner of a fishing vessel to claim the bounty, and it is not, therefore, competent for any officer of the United States to require new oaths, so as to make the false taking of them legally criminal.

Indictments were found by the grand jury of the district court for the March term against Lindsey Nickerson, Jr., one of the owners, and Hezekiah Taylor, the late master, of the schooner Silver Spring, charging each of them with perjury in having sworn falsely in matters to which an oath was required by the statute of July 29, 1813, in order to obtain the bounty or allowance on the said schooner Silver Spring, for the fishing season of 1853.

The indictment against Nickerson, though it had but one count, charged him with swearing falsely in two particulars: First. As to the national character of the fishermen on board the Silver Spring. The certificate of the owner, signed and sworn to by Nickerson, declared that three-fourths of the crew were "citizens of the United States, or persons not the subjects of any foreign prince or potentate." The indictment alleged them to be foreigners, subjects of Victoria, queen of Great Britain, etc. Second. With swearing falsely, that the paper (a common fisherman's paper), produced to the collector at the custom-house on claiming the bounty, was the original agreement between the owners, master and men on board the said schooner, during the season of 1853, when it was not so, and when in fact the men were shipped on wages and not on their lay.

The indictment was brought under the seventh and ninth sections of the statute of July 29, 1813. The first of these provides, that "the owner or owners of every fishing vessel of twenty tons or upwards, his or their agent or lawful representative shall, previous to receiving the allowance made by this act, produce to the collector who is authorized to pay the same, the original agreement or agreements which may have been made with the fishermen employed on board such vessel as is herein before required, and also a certificate to be by him or them subscribed, therein mentioning the particular days on which she sailed and returned on the several voyages, or fares she may have made in the preceding season, to the truth of which he or they shall swear or affirm before the collector aforesaid." The ninth section provides, that "any person who shall make any false declaration in any oath or affirmation required by this act, being duly convicted thereof, in any court of the United States, having jurisdiction of such offence, shall be deemed guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury."

THE COURT (SPRAGUE, District Judge), on the reading of the indictment expressed an opinion that the first charge, if sustained, could not authorize a conviction for perjury under the statute of July 29, 1813, because that statute contained no requirement that three-fourths of the crew should be citizens of the United States.

C. B. Goodrich, and T. K. Lothrop, for defendant, contended, that the seventh section did not require an oath as to the agreement; but merely an oath as to the truth of the certificate of the days of the vessel's sailing and returning. And, therefore, that the first charge in the indictment could not warrant a conviction for perjury, even supposing the defendant to have sworn falsely as to the agreement as alleged; the oath to the agreement being not required, and idle. That the word "certificate" in the seventh section was the only required antecedent of the relative pronoun "which," and that the statute being penal must deceive a strict construction.

Mr. Hallett, U. S. Dist. Atty., argued, that the whole statute must be construed together, and not a single section by itself; that the whole statute should receive that construction which would best support the intention of congress in its enactments; that the intention of congress to require an oath as to the agreement, as well as one to the certificate, was perfectly clear; and that the rules of grammar would be perfectly satisfied by referring which to both the words "agreement" and "certificate."

[1] [1 Spr. 232, contains only a partial report.]

THE COURT (SPRAGUE, District Judge). The precise question, here, and it is a question of importance not only in this particular case, but as regulating the proceedings in future cases arising under this statute is, whether the seventh section of the statute requires the oath of the owner to the truth of the agreement and of the certificate described in that section, or to the truth of the certificate alone. That section requires two things: First, that the owner should produce the original agreement made with the fishermen; second, and also a certificate specifying certain particulars, to the truth of which he is required to make oath. The whole question thus turns on the force and effect of the word "which." Does it refer to "certificate" alone, or does it embrace both "certificate" and "agreement"?

The first observation which I have to make on this point is, that the force and effect of the word "which" is entirely satisfied grammatically and philologically by the word "certificate." It may include the other; but the word certificate is a sufficient antecedent for it to answer all the rules of grammatical construction. Is the meaning and intent of the section satisfied by this construction? It is suggested by the district attorney, that if you strike out the words specifying the contents of the certificate, which are, as it were, parenthetical, and may be omitted without injury to the sense, so that the clause will read, "shall produce the original agreement, and also a certificate to be subscribed by him to the truth of which he shall swear," etc., the construction will then be clear, and the intention of the legislature to require an oath, as well to the truth of the agreement as to that of the certificate, certain and manifest. Is this so? Is the language of the section appropriate for this construction, if you strike out the intermediate clause? I think not. Persons do not swear to the truth of an agreement, but to its genuineness, or that it is the original agreement. And here the printed oath to which the owner is required to swear is divided to suit this difference. And he swears that the certificate is true, and that the paper produced is the original agreement. Is this oath, that the paper produced is the original agreement made with the men, the same as an oath to the truth of the agreement? It may be so, but perhaps it is not. For part of the case here may be that there was another verbal agreement originally, and that this written one was made subsequently. We all know the minute description of the oath required in an indictment for perjury. Can we say, therefore, that when the oath is that the agreement produced is the original one, that an indictment setting forth this oath, and charging the defendant with perjury in having taken it falsely, will satisfy a statute requiring an oath as to the truth of the agreement, and providing that this oath, if taken falsely, shall subject the person so taking it to the pains and penalties of perjury. I only adduce this to show that in requiring an oath to the agreement it has been found necessary to alter the phraseology of the statute.

But, further, there is nothing in the seventh section of the statute of July 29, 1813, which requires that the two acts therein made requisite for obtaining the fishing bounty should be done at the same instant. They may be done at different times. The certificate may be made at one time and the agreement produced at another, a week, a month, or six weeks later, it is immaterial. The word "also" has besides to a legal ear a peculiar force and significance. It indicates that you are going to a distinct and independent matter, and if this statute was drawn by any one familiar with legal language, there was probably a purpose in its insertion. At all events the language is at least so doubtful that no court of justice would allow a person to be convicted of so grave an offence upon language so vague, ambiguous, and indeterminate. Congress may have intended to require an oath as to the agreement, or they may have not. It is so uncertain that I cannot say.

It is argued on the part of the government that two things are necessary to qualify a vessel to obtain the fishing allowance: First, that the vessel should have been four months at sea; second, that a certain specified written agreement should have been made with the fishermen employed; that an oath of the owner is required to prove a compliance with the laws in the first particular, and that there is equal reason for requiring it as to the agreement. But the question is not what congress might have done, but what they have done. And I see a ground of distinction that may have induced congress to require an oath as to the certificate when they did not as to the agreement. It is provided by another section of the same statute that fraud in producing the agreement, or in any proceeding necessary to obtain the bounty, shall cause a forfeiture of the vessel. This is a heavy penalty, and congress may have been satisfied that this was a sufficient punishment for fraud relating to the agreement. The owner is to produce to the collector who is to pay the bounty a certificate of the days on which the vessel sailed and returned. This is the only document required by the statute. The circular of the secretary of the treasury obliges the owner of a vessel claiming the bounty, to produce the log book kept on board the vessel during her fishing voyage. But the only thing the statute requires is the certificate. The time the vessel has been in port during the season is necessarily excluded in the computation of the time she has been engaged in fishing, and in the absence of a log book—and the statute, as already stated, makes no provision for the existence of such a book—there is great difficulty in proving this, and so the oath of the owner was required by the statute to the certificate of the days of the vessel's sailing and returning, as proof that she was the proper time at sea. Courts of justices are not inclined to increase or extend custom-house oaths. In the present case the legislature probably did not intend to require an oath as to the agreement.

Upon learning this opinion of the court, the district attorney proposed to prove that the oath as to the agreement was taken in pursuance of instructions of the secretary of the treasury to the collectors, relative to the payment of the fishing bounty, and contended upon the third section of the statute of March 1, 1823, c. 37 [3 Stat. 730], and the case of U. S. v. Bailey, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 238, that the secretary of the treasury had a right to require an oath as to the agreement, and that such an oath so required would be a legal one, the false taking of which would sustain an indictment for perjury.

THE COURT (SPRAGUE, District Judge), without expressing an opinion on this point, held the evidence inadmissible, in support of the present indictment, which rested upon different grounds, and charged the defendant with perjury, committed by falsely swearing in an oath required by the statute of July 29, 1813, and thereupon ordered the jury to return a verdict of not guilty.

In the case of Taylor, the master of the vessel who was charged with a similar offence under the same statute, the jury, under the direction of the court, returned a verdict of not guilty. A motion was thereupon made for his discharge.

Mr. Hallett, U. S. Dist. Atty., objected on the ground that further proceedings would be instituted against him under the statute of March 1, 1823, c. 37, § 3 [3 Stat. 770], which provides that "any person who shall swear falsely touching the expenditure of public money, or in support of any claims against the United States, shall, on conviction therefor, suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury"; and he cited the case of U. S. v. Bailey [supra], to show that such an indictment might be maintained.

THE COURT (SPRAGUE, District Judge). It is proper for the court on a motion for the discharge of a defendant to see whether he may be liable on any new charge, and whether he should therefor be detained in custody to answer further proceedings. The defendant in this case is charged with swearing falsely that the agreement produced by him to the collector is the original agreement made with the fishermen on board the schooner Silver Spring, during the last season. The indictment was brought under the statute of July 29, 1813, and the court have already decided that no oath to the agreement is required by that act, and the jury under the direction of the court have returned a verdict of not guilty. A motion has been made for the discharge of the defendant, to which the district attorney objects on the ground that he wishes to retain him in custody, that he may institute new proceedings against him for the same offence. He states that the oath as to the agreement was taken in compliance with the instructions of the secretary of the treasury, and in conformity with the usage for the last forty years in all cases where claims have been made for the fishing bounty, and he cites the decision of the supreme court of the United States in U. S. v. Bailey, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 236, to show that the secretary of the treasury has power to require oaths to be taken in support of claims, and that they are legal oaths.

The case in 9 Pet. [34 U. S., supra], though the decision of the supreme court, and therefore binding on this court, is undoubtedly the very extreme of the law, and is not to be extended. Let us compare it with the present case, and see if there is any distinction between them. In that case an act of congress authorized the treasury department to adjudicate upon and settle certain claims on the state of Virginia, for pay for military service, which had been assumed by the United States. There was no provision as to the kind of proof the secretary might require, and the adjudication of the department was, I think, final. The supreme court say that congress must be supposed to have acted with reference to the well-known usage of the department to require the oath of the claimant in support of claims payable there. And therefore that the secretary had authority to insist upon the oath in that case, and that the oath so taken was a legal one. But by the statute of July 29, 1813, congress has seen fit to prescribe expressly the kind of proof of compliance with the requirements of that act, for obtaining the fishing bounty, which shall be necessary to entitle the owner of a fishing vessel to claim the bounty. It has directed that the owners of vessels of more than twenty tons, shall produce the agreements made with their fishermen, and also a certificate of the days of the vessel's sailing and returning, and of the time that she was at sea. And it has further required the oath of the owner to the truth of the certificate. There are other requisitions for boats and vessels between five and twenty tons, and when these proofs have been made, the collector is to pay the bounty. Now when congress, the supreme legislative authority, has thus directed precisely what shall be done to entitle a party to receive the bounty—what papers shall be produced, and to which of them an oath shall be required, it is not competent for any officer to require new oaths, so as to make the false taking of such oaths legally criminal. The difference between this case and that in 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] is that in that case no mode of proof was provided by law; in this, congress has seen fit to prescribe the amount and manner of proof.

I might further say that in this case the secretary of the treasury has no authority by the statute. And that the power of deciding on the claims is left entirely to the collector. As to the power of the secretary or of the collector to regulate the proof necessary in relation to matters required by other statutes, in which no mode of proof is provided, I have no occasion to express any opinion. The only oath which it is alleged that the defendant Taylor took falsely is the oath as to the agreement. And as the production of the agreement is one of the requirements of the statute of July 29, 1813, while no oath regarding it is required by that act, the oath alleged to have been taken could not have been a legal one, and could not therefore be the ground of an indictment for perjury. For these reasons the defendant must be discharged.

[NOTE. In the circuit court the defendant Nickerson joined in the demurrer to his former acquittal, and the judges were divided in the opinion as to whether or not that plea was good in bar to the indictment. The question was certified to the supreme court, where it was held that the special plea pleaded by defendant was a good plea in bar to the indictment. 17 How. (58 U. S.) 204.]

Case No. 15,879.

UNITED STATES v. NICOLL et al.

[1 Paine, 646.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New York. Oct. Term, 1826.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY — POWER TO SELL — AFFIRMANCE OF TORTIOUS SALE.

1. Under the 3d section of the 4th article of the constitution of the United States, no property belonging to the United States can be disposed of except by the authority of an act of congress.

2. The war department has no authority, express or implied, to sell the public property put under its management and superintendence; nor is any such power vested in the treasury department.

[Cited in U. S. v. Ames, Case No. 14,441.]

3. A commandant of an arsenal of the United States sold a quantity of lead, belonging to the United States and placed in the arsenal, to the defendants, but afterwards, by a fraudulent collusion with the defendants, converted the sale into a loan of the lead to a third person, who was in a few months to return it to the arsenal, the defendants guaranteeing its return. On a suit by the United States for the price of the lead, held,—that the commandant was a mere agent for safe keeping, and that the sale by him was a tortious act, and the subsequent loan void; but that as no agent or department of the United States had power to sell originally, they could have no power to waive the tort and affirm the sale for the United States, as in cases of individuals; and that as the treasury department had no such authority to sell, their directing the suit to be commenced was not an affirmance of the sale.

R. Tillotson, for plaintiffs.

T. A. Emmet and C. Graham, for defendants.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This is an action of assumpsit [against Francis H. Nicoll and others] for goods sold and delivered. Upon the trial of the cause several exceptions were taken, on the part of the defendants, to the charge of the court to the jury, and a bill of exceptions was duly sealed. A verdict was found for the plaintiffs. No judgment, however, has been entered upon the verdict, and a motion is now made for a new trial, considering the bill of exceptions in the nature of a case made for that purpose. In the view which I have taken of the present motion, it will be unnecessary for me to notice very particularly the facts which appeared upon the trial. It is sufficient to state, generally, that the property in question consisted of a quantity of lead, belonging to the United States, and placed in the arsenal in this city, then being under the command of Captain Edward Tyler. In August, 1815, Captain Tyler sold the lead to the defendants for six thousand two hundred and twelve dollars sixty-four cents, for which they gave their note payable sixty days after date. In October, of the same year, by the procurement of the defendants, this sale was converted into a loan of the lead, by Captain Tyler to George W. Murray, to be returned by the 1st of March then next; and which return was guaranteed by the defendants. For which change of the transaction Captain Tyler, by arrangement between him, George W. Murray, and the defendants, received for his own benefit one dollar on each hundred weight of the lead; amounting to about five hundred and sixty dollars.

The jury were instructed by the court, that as no evidence had been offered touching the authority of Captain Tyler to sell the lead, his powers in this respect must be governed by his legal authority, growing out of the situation in which he was placed. That, as commander of the arsenal, he had no right to sell the public property. That he was a mere agent for safe keeping; and that in selling the lead, he violated his duty and transcended the authority with which the law had clothed him. But admitting him to have been an agent to sell, this would not imply a right to loan; and if the sale was valid, Captain Tyler could not rescind it and convert it into a loan.

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

The sale having been made, his powers were at an end, and his subsequent conduct in converting it into a loan to George W. Murray was without authority and void. So that neither the defendants by the sale, nor Murray by the loan, acquired any legal right in the property, and the title still remained in the United States. But that the plaintiffs had a right to waive these tortious acts, and confirm the sale, and bring an action for goods sold and delivered. That they were not bound to bring the action upon the note: It was not a sale for the note of a third person. And where goods are sold, and a note given by the purchaser for the consideration, the seller may bring his action upon the original sale, when the rights of third persons are not involved, and the note is brought into court and cancelled upon the trial. And the note in this case having been delivered up to the defendants, no objection lay to the present action on that ground. It was submitted to the jury to decide from the evidence, whether the defendants were chargeable with a fraudulent collusion with Captain Tyler; with instructions, that if they should be of opinion that they were not, then the defendants were entitled to a verdict; but if they were, a verdict ought to be found against them; that the bringing of this suit for goods sold and delivered, was a ratification of the sale made by Captain Tyler to the defendants; and that in cases of this kind there was no distinction between the United States and individuals.

These are briefly the points upon which exceptions were taken, and which have been argued upon the present motion for a new trial. But the conclusion to which I have arrived, renders it unnecessary for me to notice any of them, except the last branch of the instructions to the jury. It may not, however, be improper for me to observe, that I have examined all the other points presented, and am confirmed in the view taken of them upon the trial; and which, under the finding of the jury, would establish the plaintiff's right of recovery, if there was no impediment growing out of the form of the action. The merits of the case being clearly with the verdict, I have examined this question with a strong desire to surmount the difficulty, but have not been able to sanction the doctrine laid down at the trial, without violating what I deem to be an important principle in the administration of the government, with respect to the disposition of public property. That Captain Tyler was a mere agent for safe keeping, and without authority to sell the lead in question, cannot be doubted. As between individuals, where an agent wrongfully, and in violation of his authority, sells the goods of his principal, the principal may affirm the act of his agent, waive the tort, and maintain an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. But the affirmance of the act, in such case, is by the party who is owner of the property, and has the absolute right to sell; and his subsequent ratification of the act of his agent is equivalent to an original authority to sell. But that principle cannot be brought to bear on the present case. The lead being the property of the United States, nothing short of the authority of an act of congress would justify its sale originally. And it would require the like authority to ratify the unauthorized conduct of the agent, and convert his tortious acts into a sale of the lead. This grows out of our constitution, and the organization of the different departments of the government.

The constitution declares (article 4, § 3) "that congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, and other property belonging to the United States." No public property can therefore be disposed of without the authority of law, either by an express act of congress for that purpose, or by giving the authority to some department of the government, or subordinate agent. No law has been shown authorizing the sale of this lead. Nor is any such authority to be inferred from the general powers vested in any of the departments of the government. This power, if lodged any where, would seem most appropriately to belong to the war department. But there is no such express or implied power in that department, to sell the public property put under its management and superintendence; and there is nothing contained in any of the laws regulating the ordnance department, which in the least countenances the right of selling or loaning the public property. See Acts 14th May, 1812, and 8th Feb., 1815 (4 Laws U. S. 430, 792 [2 Stat. 732; 3 Stat. 203]). But the case furnishes no evidence whatever that this sale has been ratified or approved by the war department, or any other branch of the government, except what is to be inferred from the mere act of bringing the present suit for goods sold and delivered. If the principle I have laid down be correct (and I think it cannot be denied), that no one can ratify the act of the agent in such case, and convert his tortious disposition of the property into a legal sale, except he who had the right to sell, it will necessarily follow, that the simple act of bringing an action for goods sold and delivered, will not amount to such ratification. Such suits are brought under the direction of the treasury department; but that department has no right to sell public property without the authority of an act of congress for that purpose

By the act of the 3d March, 1817 (section 10, 6 Laws U. S. 201 [3 Stat. 366]), it is made the duty of the first comptroller to superintend the recovery of all debts due to the United States, and to direct suits, and legal proceedings, and to take all such measures as may be authorized by the laws, to enforce prompt payment of all debts to the United States. By the act of 15th May, 1820 (6 Laws U. S. 520 [3 Stat. 592]), this duty is transferred to another officer. The president is authorized to designate some officer of the treasury department, as agent of the treasury, whose duty it shall be to direct and superintend all orders, suits, or proceedings in law or equity, for the recovery of money, chattels, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in the name, and for the use of the United States. By no possible construction, however, can this authority be converted into a power to sell and transfer public property. It is the mere right of superintending suits, and enforcing the claims and demands of the United States, as he shall find them. Nor is it to be inferred, that the United States have ratified this sale, from the circumstance that the suit is brought by the district attorney, who is a public officer of the United States. By the last mentioned act (section 7), he is required in the prosecution of all suits, to conform to the directions and instructions of the agent of the treasury. Our government being a government of laws, it speaks to its agents through its laws; and it is to them only that we are to look for the authority of such agents. And no law having been shown authorizing the sale of the lead in question, or vesting in any department of the government any general authority to sell public property, no such sale can be inferred from any of the circumstances appearing in this case. And an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered cannot be maintained. The verdict must therefore be set aside.

Case No. 15,880.

UNITED STATES v. NIHOLS.

[4 McLean, 23.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1845.

PERJURY — FALSE BANKRUPT SCHEDULE — OATH — POWER TO ADMINISTER.

1. An intentional omission to place a part of his property on a schedule, in an application under the bankrupt act, which he swears to, as containing a true account of all his effects, is perjury, under the act of congress.

2. A deputy clerk, being authorized to act, the same as the principal, has a right to administer oaths in bankruptcy.

[Cited in U. S. v. Evans, 2 Fed. 152.]

3. Such oaths are presumed to be administered in the presence of the court, and by virtue of its authority.

[Cited in U. S. v. Evans, 2 Fed. 152.]

4. The act of 1825 [4 Stat. 115], in relation to perjury, being a general law, applies to all subsequent cases which come within it.

Mr. Bates, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Vandyke, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment for perjury, under the 1st and 7th sections of the bankrupt law [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440, 446)]. The act of congress (Gordon's Dig. 737) makes false swearing perjury. The indictment charges that the defendant, in applying for the benefit of the bankrupt law, in the schedule attached to his petition, did not state all his property, as the law requires. That he had a right, or credit, against one King, of one hundred dollars, which was not returned. That a debt due from Benjamin King of two hundred dollars, was not included. That he had other rights and credits against King, which were not placed upon the schedule.

The defendant's counsel filed a demurrer to the indictment, for "the reason that the act of 1825 does not govern cases of false swearing under acts passed subsequent to that act; and that the petition was sworn to before a deputy clerk, George G. Bull, who was not authorized to administer the oath. The act of 1825 is an act defining the crime of perjury generally; and it is not confined in its operations to acts passed anterior to that time, but is applicable to false swearing under the bankrupt law, as well as in other cases. The bankrupt law must be construed with the act of 1825, as in pari materia. Under the proceedings in bankruptcy, the false swearing charged must be considered as having been done in court. The bankrupt court was always open. Swearing to the petition was a proceeding in court, within the law, and if false, subjects the petitioner to punishment as for perjury. An affidavit to hold to bail, is a proceeding in court, if the oath be administered in the presence of the court, or under its requirements. 7 Term R. 315; 2 Chit. Cr. Law, 312; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 758.

But it is contended that the deputy clerk had no authority to administer the oath. This position is laid down too broadly. Admit that Bull, as deputy clerk, had no authority to swear the defendant to the truth of his petition; yet it will scarcely be contended that he had not the power to do so in the presence of the court, and by its express order.

There is another view of this case which is equally conclusive. The bankrupt court ordered on the 16th of January, 1843, that "during the absence of the clerk, his deputy may receive and file petitions, administer the oath to petitioners, and perform all the duties required of the clerk of this court." The word "deputy," here, is used as descriptive. The power to act is derived from the court. We think that the power to administer the oath to the petitioner was undoubted; and also that the perjury is well assigned, if proved by the evidence.

The demurrer is overruled.

At the same term, on the traverse of the indictment, the defendant was acquitted by the jury.

UNITED STATES v. NINE CASES.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 15,881.

UNITED STATES ex rel. AMES v. NINE HUNDRED AND FIVE PACKAGES OF TOBACCO et al.

[10 Int. Rev. Rec. 124.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. June 10, 1869.

FRAUDS AGAINST INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—FALSE RETURNS—TOBACCO TAX.

The 905 packages are claimed by D. M. B. Brown, who also claims 172 of the 272 caddies. The remaining 100 caddies are claimed by Gen. E. B. Brown. The value of the tobacco and machinery involved in the case is estimated at about $15,000. W. H. Powell, the inspector whose name has been frequently mentioned in the progress of the case as having attempted to defraud the government, is in Canada, where, it is stated, he fled from justice. The factory of M. B. Brown was burned after its seizure by the United States marshal, but the origin of the fire has remained unknown.

Gen. Noble and Gen. Chester, for the United States.

Mr. Harding and H. B. Lightheuser, for claimants.

The evidence in the case having been all adduced, Mr. Lightheuser addressed the jury for the claimants, and argued that they had no connection with Powell. Mr. Dietrich had come upon the stand and showed that there was a nice little arrangement between himself and Powell by which he (Dietrich) was to make a clear profit of one half the taxes on the tobacco he manufactured. Mr. Dietrich was afraid he would be discovered, and he states he was sent by Powell to Mr. Brown to get some instructions as to keeping his books; but Mr. Brown told him that he kept no sales book and that he entered his sales in a day book. Dietrich's testimony did not establish anything against Mr. Brown. The latter did not tell him that he was keeping his books with a fraudulent intent. The evidence of this witness only went to show that Mr. Dietrich went to Brown and disclosed to him his fraudulent intent, and Mr. Brown said nothing. Dietrich had testified that Brown's instructions were to show to the inspector heads of caddies which had been inspected, for reinspection. Where the tobacco which had been in caddies was damaged tobacco, and was being remanufactured, it was very proper that the old inspection should be presented to the inspector that they might not be charged twice for one inspection. But what was their conduct with respect to these caddy heads thus taken from this damaged tobacco? As had been shown by the head pressman, it was their universal habit to burn them up. He referred to the demeanor of Dietrich while on the stand, and argued from it that his testimony was not to be believed; for while he pretended to remember conversations had over a year ago, he could not say a word of a conversation had not three weeks since. Everything showed that his story was a fabrication, plainly and palpably false on the face of it. That part between the witness himself and Powell was, he thought, true. He thought his anxiety about his own suits has made him over-zealous in his efforts for the government in this case. He contended that no jury should disbelieve the evidence of Dietrich so far as it relates to Mr. Brown. Powell and Brown undoubtedly had a conspiracy; if they had not, the latter would not have turned state's evidence. He hoped the government would let Mr. Dietrich off, as the servant was worthy of his hire, and he had come up nobly for them. It seemed to him it would take an immense sight of money to make a man come up in a court of justice, and acknowledge his guilt, as Dietrich had done; no man would do it voluntarily; it must be involuntarily. He did not know whether the district attorney intended to accuse them of having committed murder, or of having burned the factory. What motives could they possibly have for doing so? They had no interest in the destruction of the factory, but every interest in its preservation; and now that it has been destroyed, the government and its officials are anxious to bring about a conviction or a forfeiture, as they know the claimants will have to have restitution of this property, if a verdict is rendered in their favor. He asked the jury to give such a verdict.

Gen. Harding followed with an address in behalf of the claimants. In the course of his remarks he said it would have been the height of folly for a merchant of Mr. B. Brown's standing to have done what he was charged with, in any effort to defraud the government of its taxes. He would have been the veriest fool in St. Louis. The district attorney had said that two serious blows had been struck at the government: one was the burning of the factory and the other the murder of a man by the name of Christian. He (Gen. Noble) had taken pains enough to say that he did not charge this claimant, not even by insinuation, with having anything to do with these matters, and he, the speaker, conceived all through the case why it was that he was eternally bringing them up, and making it necessary for them to show that Mr. Brown was absent in New York, and had been in Washington city before, when the factory was burned; making it necessary to show that with all that property there, he had but one policy of insurance upon it, and that but for $3,000, while there were 905 caddies of tobacco, worth nearly $10,000, besides the machinery in it. The attempt to connect Mr. B. Brown with Powell had utterly failed. Mr. M. Matteson, formerly governor of Illinois, went on Mr. Brown's bond, and it was signed at Gen. Brown's office as the most convenient for him, he having then been but a short time in the city.

Gen. Noble put an interrogatory—Did he wish to know what "Governor" Matteson is now doing? Dealing in whisky in New Orleans.

Gen. Harding continued. It had been stated that Powell had pursued an extraordinary course—inspecting tobacco and returning only 1/5 as inspected, then dividing 4/5 with his accomplices. But there was no evidence to this effect upon which he would hang a dog. Supposing there were, the attempt to connect the claimant with it had signally failed. Mr. Harding then compared the returns and accounts, and stated there was a considerable discrepancy in the exhibit of Mr. Ames. If their books had not been destroyed their accounts would have been seen to have been all correct.

Gen. Noble addressed the jury for the government. He commenced by adverting to the necessity which exists of the law being stringently enforced, to prevent fraud and protect the honest manufacturer and dealer. Who is the man entitled to the protection of law, he asked? Is it the thief, who is evading by every means in his power the payment, not only of the tax on the tobacco which he reports, but on that which he does not report? Or is it the man who pays the tax into the treasury from the money he receives from the consumer, and, if necessary, goes and puts his paper, with his friend's name to it, in the bank and pays whatever is required by law? The internal revenue law is just one of those laws that if a man is a friend of his country he will endeavor to see enforced strictly, constantly, unremittingly, and bring to justice those who do not observe it. He will endeavor to bring such a case as this before the bar, and have it investigated by the people, instead of it being compromised and so have no investigation at all. Let the law, the guardian law of our country, have its due operation, and every man will bear an equal burden. We ought all to rejoice that a case like this has not been compromised, and that it has been brought to a trial. There are some ideas, some principles connected with this case, that involve not only the relationship of the mercantile classes, but enter our homes, say who shall prosper, whose family shall be provided for, whose bills of credit shall be met, who shall be protected by the virtue and the bright confidences of justice, and who shall suffer. If suffering there be, it is far better that the man who cheats, who attempts to defraud, should be deprived of his property by the justice which we all admire, while honest men who attempt to compete with him in the market, like Mr. Rucker, who testified that he has had to abandon his business after 44 years of labor, are compelled to close their factories. He did not know how tobacco was manufactured so cheap then; because there was an ingredient in it; he did not choose to deal in fraud. He would not make a false oath; he said he was an old man, and had lived too long in this country to cheat the government. So honest manufacturers have fallen off by the hundred, like the leaves of a tree whose roots have been poisoned. While there is a resemblance of honesty in this fraud there is death to the revenue in it and any one who comes in contact with it. The law is that the tax on tobacco shall be paid before it is removed. Were it otherwise he might postpone it for years and never pay the tax at all. This is the point in this case. This man was removing and absolutely selling far more than he ever reported to the government. M. B. Brown had been a manufacturer in Cairo, Ill., and, though it did not appear distinctly, it seems there had been some difficulty, and a change of base became necessary. You do not find him here any more (referring to Mr. Brown not being present in court). He has retired early from this contest, and left Mr. Lightheuser to bear the brunt of the battle. (Subdued laughter). The gentlemen smiled, and could hardly restrain their laughter as the government opened, but as it has proceeded, a deep shade of melancholy has taken possession of their souls. Dr. Brown came from Cairo in September, and Powell commenced to operate in October. Where was Dr. Brown to be found? In W. H. Palmer's, on Olive street, which Mr. Lightheuser had defined the "common loafing place for the most respectable citizens in St. Louis." (More subdued laughter.) He was to be found more frequently there than at his office. He (Gen. Noble) had expected that M. B. Brown or E. B. Brown would have come upon the stand and testified. They could have been witnesses and testified in their own case. Why did they not do it? Why did they not come to strengthen their own case? Why did not M. B. Brown take the stand? He was afraid to do it. Why did not E. B. Brown come and prove where he bought Reid's tobacco. He knew that he could not do it, and that as big a lie has been told as was ever perpetrated in a court of justice. Why did he not come forward and tell you when he bought it; he was in this court while this trial was progressing. I subpenaed him so that they could not say he was away. Matteson, who was stated to have been governor of Illinois, had no right to go on Dr. Brown's bond. If he was a governor, what kind of a governor was he? It is well known in this Western country who "Governor" Matteson was. He took advantage of his official position to deprive that state of its revenue. He was not a resident in this district, and had no right to have his name on the bond. Have we no men in the state of Missouri who can go on a tobacco bond?

Gen. Noble continued his remarks, and argued that steps were taken to secure the appointment of Powell as inspector, and a conspiracy between him and Dr. Brown. He then gave a lengthy résumé of the accounts to demonstrate that Brown had manufactured a great deal more tobacco than he had reported. He commented on the ever enlarging proportion of fraud, and the interest the community had in the case being tried. Dr. Brown did not keep the books required by law. Mr. Harding had said that Mr. E. B. Brown could not afford to have mercantile transactions in his own name; he was pension agent, and perhaps did not know that the bribe offered to an officer of the government would not be received; he expected the trial to be compromised; he was pension agent, and had influence. The speaker drew a picture of how the government can be cheated—a plan which, if carried out, would be successful; he said the plan would be to get a bar-keeper appointed an inspector, drink with him early and often, have him keep the records, get your friends to swear to your returns, have your bank in your pocket; if the factory is seized, let it be burned down, destroy the records, and collect the insurance money, if there is any; to have some one destroy the chief witness in the case, bribe the prosecuting witness and have your lawyer to betray the confidence of any witness that tried to come in. Well may the witnesses for the United States, like Mr. Dietrich, stand in awe and fear in the presence of the fate of Henry Christian. I do not say these men, this man, or either of these men, did it. But I say there was a happy collusion of circumstances in their favor throughout this cause. It was proved to you that the government had no interest in the destruction of the factory. He (Christian) may have been intemperate in his habits, and received a blow from some one with whom he may have quarreled. This case, he said, will purify the atmosphere; it is worth thousands of dollars to the United States, whether you give a verdict for the United States or not. It lets them understand there is some place where men are called to justice, and there is a community looking on hearing the words of the witnesses, and the result in the community is the same; those men are marked. He believed he recognized in the jury a purity of soul, an experience in life, that would enable them to give a just verdict, and he concluded with an earnest appeal to their sense of right and justice.

THE COURT instructed the jury, and reviewed the several counts in the informations. The first information, against the 905, narrows itself down to the investigation whether M. B. Brown made a true or a false return for the month of April. If it is true, that ends the matter so far as he is concerned. But if it is not true,—if he manufactured more than he reported in that return, or sold more than he reported,—they would find a verdict for the plaintiff. The second information referred to 272 caddies found in various mercantile houses about the city. It is charged with reference to this, that all of that tobacco was removed from M. B. Brown's factory, with intent to defraud the United States of its tax. Of this, E. B. Brown claimed 100 caddies, on the ground that he is the owner of them, and had bought them in good faith. The enquiry divided itself. First, were the 172 caddies, M. B. Brown's, in his possession or under his control in the hands of these commission merchants, and if so were they there for the purpose of being sold with a view to defraud the government of its tax? And, so far as these 100 caddies, claimed by E. B. Brown, were they his or M. B. Brown's?

The jury retired, and came into court in about four hours. The foreman stated that one of them disagreed. A juryman said they wanted to know if they had to take into consideration criminal intent. Some thought that if a false return was made that was sufficient without reference to any criminal intent.

Gen. Noble beseeched the court to keep the jury until a verdict had been given. The verdict should be given. If they passed over Sunday, he was confident they would never get a verdict in the case. Now or never is the decision to be made, one side or the other, he did not care which.

THE COURT decided to allow the jury to separate, and said it would give fuller instructions on Monday. THE COURT trusted to their personal integrity not to converse with any one on the matter. THE COURT adjourned, and the jury scattered.

On Monday, a verdict for the United States, on all the articles of information, was rendered.

entries, and the claimant sets up mistake as an excuse, the circumstance that probable cause of seizure has been made out, does not impose on the claimant the necessity of making out an unusually clear case of mistake. All he has to do is to produce ordinary proof.

2. Circumstances must be of a controlling and irresistible nature to justify a disregard of positive testimony.

3. It was holden a sufficient and legal excuse for an incorrect entry of goods, that they were entered from an invoice made out in great hurry and agitation, while the goods were packed at Caen, in the absence of the owner, in order to secure them by removal from an apprehended pillage by the Prussian soldiery, who occupied the place.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was an appeal from a sentence of the district court of the Southern district of New York. A part of the goods libelled, had been condemned, and a part restored in the district court [case unreported], and both the libellants and claimant appealed from the decree.

The cause of forfeiture alleged in the libel was, that the goods which had been imported from France, were entered at the custom-house at less than their real quantities. It was alleged that nine packages of linen, two packages of silk, two packages of crapes, two packages of gloves, one package of stockings, one package of linen and napkins, one package of flounces, two packages of shawls, and twelve packages of clocks, were on suspicion of fraud opened and examined in the presence of two respectable merchants, and found to contain greater quantities than the quantities at which they were entered. The difference in the quantities as stated, amounted to from one-half to one-sixth in the dry goods, and the twelve cases of clocks which were entered as containing twelve clocks were stated to have contained nineteen.

The defence set up in the claim of William Vintroux Hersan, was, that the goods were not incorrectly entered with the intention of defrauding the revenue, but in consequence of mistake and accident. That the goods were packed at Caen in France, when that place was in possession of the Prussians and threatened with pillage, in great haste and confusion for the purpose of removal, and that if the entry was wrong, it was owing to this circumstance. That a large part of the merchandise imported had been found on examination to contain no more than the quantity at which it was entered. William Vintroux Hersan claimed the clocks as the property of John Louis Vintroux of Paris, and the rest of the goods as his own property.

A great number of witnesses were examined in the cause on both sides, some of them residing at home and others abroad, for the purpose of showing the circumstances under which the goods were purchased, packed up and sent to America, their situation here both before and at the time of the seizure, and the variation of the real quantities from the invoice and entries.

There were thirty-three packages of goods libelled. These packages were a part of seventy-two packages or boxes, with various marks, shipped by the claimant (who came with them) at Havre, in the ship Ann Williams, about the 1st of October, 1815, and consigned to Joseph Bouchaud of New York. On their arrival at New York, some delay in entering them was occasioned by a variation between the marks of two or three packages in the invoice and bill of lading. After the entry was made, a part of the goods were sent to Bouchaud's store and a part remained at the public stores. A part of those sent to Bouchaud's store were also removed to the house where the claimant lived, for the purpose of being unpacked and exposed for sale. While the claimant was engaged in unpacking them, the whole were seized for the causes alleged in the libel. Examiners were appointed by the collector to ascertain the real quantities contained in the packages. The thirty-three packages libelled were found to exceed the quantities at which they were entered, as stated in the libel. The rest of the seventy-two packages were found correct. Of the packages libelled, ten contained linen, and twelve contained clocks. These were condemned in the district court. The remaining eleven packages, containing crapes, silk goods, gloves, shawls, and stockings, were acquitted.

The excuse set up by the claimant was, that there was no intention to defraud the revenue, but that the variances in quantity were the result of accident. It appeared that the claimant kept a dry goods and jewelry store at Caen in France. He left that city for Paris about the 25th of August, 1815, to buy goods. France was then in the possession of the allied armies, and goods were very low. In the course of the month, he bought and sent considerable quantities of goods to Caen, intending them for the United States. About the 1st of September, learning from his wife that the Prussians, who then occupied Caen, were committing great excesses, and threatening the city with pillage, he sent her word to pack up all the goods in his store with as much haste as possible and send them immediately to Havre, to be shipped for the United States. The claimant remained in Paris. John Louis Vintroux, the father of the claimant, who lived at Paris, had consigned at one time a box containing six clocks, and at another time a box containing twelve clocks, to the claimant at Caen for safety; the troops at that time occupying Paris, but not Caen. He also learning the state of things at Caen, wrote Madame Vintroux, directing her to send the eighteen clocks to Havre, to be shipped for the United States. He at the same time sent her an invoice of the clocks, footing the amount of each consignment separately. The claimant disclosed his proceedings to several persons then in Paris, and who afterwards came over with him to this country.

At Caen there were twenty thousand Prussians and Cossacks, and from six to fifty Prussian soldiers were quartered on each citizen. Their presence is described to have been troublesome, alarming, and dangerous in the highest degree. They threatened to pillage the place, and it was once published in the Paris gazettes that it had been pillaged. Affrays continually occurred between the troops and citizens. The inhabitants hid their goods in the cellars and buried their valuables. Many secretly built partitions in their cellars, behind which they packed up their goods and sent them away. Six soldiers were billeted on Madame Vintroux when she received the direction to pack up her husband's goods. His clerk, who was used to packing goods, with the assistance of a servant or porter, packed them up in the cellar in the best way they could, and made out the accompanying papers in great agitation, hurry, and confusion. This was done in the night while the Prussians were asleep. The clerk made out the invoices after the packing was all finished, from the memorandums made at the time. The servant called off the ticket attached to each piece, and the clerk took it down. The goods were sent from Caen in the day time in the diligence and a private wagon. Madame Vintroux and the clerk went with the goods to Havre, and shipped the greater part of them before the arrival of the claimant.

The claimant's clerk in making the invoice of the twelve cases of clocks, which stood in the cellar, supposed that each case contained a clock, and made the invoice out accordingly. This invoice corresponded with the invoices of the consignment of the twelve clocks sent to Madame Vintroux by John Louis Vintroux. A large box containing shawls, which the clerk had already packed, but had forgotten it, was standing among them, and he supposed it contained the other six clocks. This he put in the invoice as containing six clocks, and charged the prices the same as in the invoice (of the other six) sent from Paris. The linens were purchased in August by the claimant at the fair of Guybray, of M. Despierre of Alençon the manufacturer. He testified that in consequence of the precipitation with which the linens were put up at Alençon, owing to their fear that the place would be pillaged, all the mistakes made in the entry at New York were made in invoicing the goods before they were sent from Alençon to Caen. On discovering the errors, he claimed the difference of Madame Vintroux, who desired him to wait until she could hear from her husband in New York, as she had not ascertained the contents of the packages of linen before they were shipped. This testimony corroborated, and was corroborated by a letter written by Madame Vintroux to her husband, informing him of this mistake, and produced on the trial.

Twenty-five merchants of Caen, and the chamber of commerce of that city, as well as numerous other witnesses, examined in the cause, bore testimony to the high character of the claimant as a merchant. Each of the most material facts above stated was proved by several witnesses who were uncontradicted. Claimant went from Paris to Havre where he met his wife, and found part of his goods already shipped. The rest were shipped with difficulty and in confusion, owing to the great press to ship goods in the vessel. While at Havre, claimant suddenly resolved to come out with his goods.

After his arrival in New York, where he was examining some of the packages at his room, assisted by two clerks, and in the presence sometimes of other persons, he first discovered the errors in the quantities. He at first complained of these, and then declared that he would go and inform the officers of the customs. His clerk told him to wait and see if there was any excess. The box of shawls which was invoiced as containing six clocks, was opened in the presence of several persons, and claimant expressed his surprise at the mistake. They had only opened six packages when the seizure was made. The dry goods, including the linens, were found packed in some instances, two pieces in one bundle, and this was the way in which they overrun the invoice. The ticket on one or the other piece in the bundle generally corresponded with the invoice, as did the number of bundles in the packages. Two of the examiners testified that it was not unusual to find silks, crapes, &c., packed two pieces in a bundle, but they had never known the same thing occur in opening linens. They said that a bundle of the goods which they examined, composed of two pieces, might be easily mistaken by a porter for one piece. Two other of the examiners testified that the packages were so large that any one accustomed to the kind of goods could tell by looking at the outside, that they contained more than the invoice quantity of pieces. They also stated that the goods were very well packed.

T. A. Emmet and C. Graham, for claimant.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. The goods, mentioned in this libel, were proceeded against in the district court for the Southern district of New York, as forfeited under the sixty-seventh section of the collection law (3 Bior. & D. Laws, 199 [1 Stat. 677]), because, as was alleged, the packages containing them differed in their contents from the entry which had been made of them at the custom-house. The property was claimed by William Vintroux Hersan, for himself, and John Louis Vintroux, of Paris; that is to say, all the merchandise libelled, was stated to belong to the former, except the twelve cases of clocks, which were said to belong bona fide to the latter. The claim, without in terms denying that the contents of the packages differed from the entry of them, insists, that if such difference existed, it proceeded from accident or mistake, and not from an intention to defraud the revenue—and alleges, that the cases were packed up at Caen, in France, while that place was in possession of the Prussian troops, and after it had been threatened to be pillaged by them, which circumstance occasioned the goods to be packed in great haste and confusion, and may have caused a difference between the invoice and the actual contents of the packages. After a hearing in the district court, the clocks and linens mentioned in the libel were condemned, and all the other articles acquitted. The United States and the claimants have both appealed.

This is a case not without its difficulties, and has been argued with an ability due to its importance and intricacy. There is no doubt that the allegations in the libel are substantially made out, and that there were many, and in some instances considerable variations between the actual contents of the packages, and their contents as exhibited by the entry at the custom-house. If the court, therefore, were not permitted to look beyond that fact, it would be difficult for any of the articles libelled to escape confiscation. But the law, under which these proceedings have been instituted, supposes that such differences will sometimes intervene by accident or mistake; and if that can be made out to the satisfaction of the court, in which the prosecution is depending, a forfeiture shall not attach.

The court will now proceed to examine how far the claimant has established his innocence. If he has designedly attempted to impose on the officers of the customs, he must submit to the consequences, penal and calamitous as they may be; but if he has succeeded in establishing any facts, which may reasonably account for the differences complained of, it will be the duty of the court, and must always be a pleasant one, to restore to him his property. That part of the case which relates to the linens will be first disposed of.

It has been said in argument, that probable cause having been shown for the seizure, a very clear case must be made out by the claimant, to entitle him to a restoration of the property; and the court has been cautioned not to place too much reliance on positive and direct testimony, if it shall appear to be in conflict with the many and strong presumptive circumstances which appear in the case. Notwithstanding the fact is made out on which the seizure proceeded, and which unexplained would have been followed by forfeiture, all the claimant has to do, is to prove the mistake on which he relies, in the ordinary way, and the court is not authorized to call upon him to present a clearer case, than it would have a right to require in the investigation of any other matter of fact. It is no less melancholy than true, that a court is sometimes compelled, however reluctantly, to reject the most positive declarations of witnesses, although delivered under the high and sacred sanctions of an oath, when opposed to presumptive circumstances, which it is not easy to reconcile with such testimony. A court will not, however, easily suspect the truth of such declarations, when corroborated by many witnesses, who have a fair character, and who have no interest in the matter in controversy; but rather than reject, will do all in its power to reconcile them with such circumstances; and if that cannot be done, the latter must be numerous and of the most controlling and irresistible nature to justify an entire disregard of the positive testimony.

With respect to the linens, there are no circumstances to induce the court to believe, that the mistake in this article may not have been accidental, and altogether unknown to the claimant, until after their examination in this country. These linens appear by the testimony of Mr. Despierres, jun. a merchant of Alençon, (which has been taken under a commission since the cause came from the district court,) to have been purchased of him at a fair at Guibray for the claimant, for the sum of seven thousand four hundred and fifteen francs and ninety-two centimes, which is the price at which they were invoiced, and on which duties were calculated at the custom-house. This witness, in addition to the very important fact which he establishes of their being invoiced at the price of their actual cost, also proves that shortly after the sale, and as soon as they had recovered at Alençon from the fear of being pillaged by the foreign troops, he discovered errors against himself in the sale of the linens, of which he immediately apprized Madame Vintroux and claimed from her the difference. That lady begged his forbearance, in order to refer the matter to her husband, to whom the linens had been sent without examination of them. These mistakes proceeded, as the same witness informs us, from the precipitation under which they were packed, to withdraw them from the pillage, from which Alençon narrowly escaped, having already experienced all the horrors of war. Relying on the probity of Mr. Vintroux, with whom he had had dealings before, Mr. Despierres consented to the delay.

That this story is no fabrication of recent date, to answer the purposes of the claimant, appears by a letter written by Madame Vintroux at Caen to her husband, on the 15th of October, 1815, very shortly after his leaving France, and which it is proved, by witnesses on the spot, was received by him not many days after his arrival in this country, in which letter the reclamation of Mr. Despierres is distinctly stated, and Mr. Vintroux is requested to take proper measures to ascertain the extent of the error that had taken place. On this testimony, although it does not appear what excess was claimed on the linens, yet as there is no contradictory evidence on this point deserving of any attention, the court feels itself bound to order a restoration of the linens to the claimant. It is proved positively, that the linens cost no more than the sum at which they were invoiced, and of course, unless the mistake committed at the fair of Guibray, was known to Mr. Vintroux, at the time of the entry of them, which is not proved, his conduct as far as concerns this article is free from every imputation.

The allegation against the clocks will be next examined. It is, that the twelve packages of clocks, marked and numbered W. No. 1, on to W. No. 12 inclusive, were found to differ in their contents from the entry, in this; that these packages were entered, as containing twelve clocks, and that the same contained nineteen. Another box containing six clocks and marked V. H. No. 1, was entered at the same time, so that in all eighteen clocks only were entered, and duties paid on them. On examination, however, it was found, that the whole number of clocks entered were found in the cases marked W. No. 1 to 12. Hence suspicions were excited (V. H. No. 1 having also been entered as containing six clocks,) that twenty-four clocks had been imported by the claimant instead of eighteen. If the actual importation of that number had been proved the libellant would have made out a clear case, so far as relates to this article; but although attempts were made to establish that fact, they were quite unsuccessful; and notwithstanding the pains which were taken with that view, there is no evidence in the cause, that any one of the persons, who were about the claimant after his arrival in this country, some of whom assisted in examining his goods, ever saw any of the six clocks, which it is supposed were fraudulently subtracted from an entry. Nor has any person, who deals in this article in this city, been found, who can fix on the claimant, or any agent of his, the sale of more clocks than were entered, although two witnesses, who were dealers in clocks, were examined with that intent. If the allegation, therefore, in the libel be true, that in the twelve cases were more clocks than they were entered as containing; yet if it shall appear that no clocks were contained in any other case, which was entered as containing six, no fraud has been committed on the revenue, nor could any have been intended, and of course no forfeiture has been incurred. The claimant, not relying on the absence of all positive proof, on this point, has endeavoured to satisfy the court, that all the clocks imported by him in the Ann Williams were regularly entered; and that, although in the cases which were supposed to contain only a dozen, eighteen or nineteen were found, not a single clock was discovered in any other package.

The court is greatly mistaken if the claimant's proof on this part of his case, will not be found very satisfactory. There is no doubt, that the eighteen clocks were an adventure, belonging, not to the claimant, but to his father at Paris, by whom they were sent to Madame Vintroux at Caen to be forwarded to the United States. The first we hear of them is in a letter written by the elder Mr. Vintroux to the wife of the claimant. Mr. Bellair, who put up the goods belonging to claimant, declares that he packed no clocks for him; and knows of none, except those in the box marked V. V. or W. No. 1 to 12—and a wooden clock, and two which were entered on the invoice made by him as contained in the package marked V. H. No. 22. This witness also informs us how it happened, that each of the boxes from No. 1 to 12 were entered as containing each one clock, and another box as containing six. After he had packed the goods of the claimant, Madame Vintroux gave him the bill of parcels of the clocks, which came from Paris By this he found there were eighteen clocks, and supposed that the cases marked from one to twelve contained only one clock each. The other six, therefore, he supposed were contained in a large case which was among the others, and although this case was one, which he had packed himself, yet not adverting to that circumstance at the time, he marked it V. H. No. 1; and entered it in the invoice, under that mark, as containing clocks.

This corresponds with the information which the claimant gave to another witness on his passage to this country, that he had only eighteen clocks which belonged to his father, which declaration, although it comes from a person now interested, is entitled to some attention, considering the time and circumstances under which it was made. This same witness, Mr. Collet, was also present when a box was opened, which the claimant expected to contain clocks, but in it were only Angora shawls or gloves. This box, he says, was opened in the street, because, as he supposes, the entry of the house, before which it stood, was too small to admit of its being taken up stairs. Mr. Demolliens proves the same thing, although he is somewhat more particular in his relation, and unless we believe him guilty of wilful perjury, we must be satisfied that the case marked No. 1, V. H., notwithstanding the invoice, did not contain a single clock. He was directed by Mrs. Vintroux, in order that the watchmakers might examine the clocks, to bring it to his chamber, where it was found, on examination, to contain articles which were invoiced as being in another package. Mr. Scheffelin also proves that two large cases were opened which contained Angora shawls, gloves, &c. Mr. Bouchaud, whom all parties appear willing to believe, declares that he never saw any clocks in the possession of the claimant, except those which came from the public store. Considering how much Mr. Bouchaud had to do with this cargo, and how frequently he must have been with the claimant, after his arrival, this circumstance is entitled to very great consideration. It seems impossible that these clocks, which are now supposed to have been disposed of, should not have been seen by this gentleman before they were sold. Yet neither he, nor any other person about the claimant, ever saw them.

But without pursuing this subject farther, the court is satisfied, that this part of the libellant's case is not made out, unless no explanation can be received to establish the innocence of a transaction, which unaccounted for, must have drawn after it all the consequences of a confiscation. But this explanation, in the opinion of the court, has been given, and can only be got rid of by opposing to it some circumstances, which although sufficient to raise doubts, ought not to be permitted to outweigh so much of positive testimony, with which this part of the claimant's case abounds. If the court does not stop to notice these circumstances, it is not because they have not been attended to, but because it is of opinion, after full consideration, that all of them together will not justify a sentence of condemnation. The clocks therefore must also be restored.

The case of the other articles libelled will now be considered. The circumstances attending them are so much alike, that they must all be liable to the same judgment. The excuse, which applies particularly to this portion of the importation, is, that it was packed up at Caen in the absence of the proprietor, and in such haste and confusion, in consequence of apprehensions entertained at that place of the Prussian troops, that all the mistakes and inaccuracies which have been discovered are attributable to those causes, and did not proceed from any intentional fraud on the part of the owner. This defence has been treated with great levity by the counsel for the United States, and attempts were made to induce the court to believe that the testimony, which appears in support of it, has all been fabricated, to suit the purposes of the claimant. But such a body of evidence, whatever suspicions may be entertained by those who have an interest in disbelieving every part of it, must have its influence on a court, so long as it is mindful of its duty, and does not think itself absolved from every obligation to decide according to the proofs before it. Both of the persons, who packed these goods, Mr. Bellair, a clerk of the claimant, and Joseph Boissellier, a resident of the city of Caen, prove that the packing took place at night in a cellar of the claimant. That this was done in much haste and confusion, from an apprehension of being discovered by the Prussians, some of whom were quartered in the house of Mr. Vintroux. The packages were sometimes marked the same night, and sometimes not until the next day, which may account why the contents of some of them were marked as being in another.

It was doubted on the argument, whether this apprehension of the Prussians, was well founded, and much was said of the tranquillity of France after the return of Louis XVIII., which was effected by the battle of Waterloo. But whatever might have been the condition of other parts of that kingdom, more than twelve witnesses have been examined, most of them residents of Caen, who describe the conduct of the military, who occupied that place, during the fall of the year 1815, as well calculated to excite the fears of the inhabitants about the safety of their property. So great and general was this apprehension, that many buried their valuable effects to place them beyond the reach of the soldiery. It would appear indeed, that previous to Madame Vintroux's receiving directions from her husband, who was then in Paris, to pack up his goods at Caen, to be sent to America, she had determined to have it done merely to send them to some place of greater safety. But it was not only at Caen that excesses were committed by the army of occupation; for it appears, from the examination of Mr. Despierres, a merchant who resides at Alençon, that the inhabitants of that place were also under apprehensions of a military pillage.

There is nothing to detract from the credit due to such a mass of corresponding testimony, but the solitary declaration of one witness who was but two days at Caen, and saw no obstructions to business, the shops being open as usual. Now this may very well be, and yet none of the material facts, on which the claimant relies, are disproved by it. The town may have been very quiet the two days which this witness passed on his party of pleasure at Caen; and yet the soldiers may have behaved very much amiss both before and after; and the alarms and fears, which are spoken of may well have been very general at that place. The troops there were very numerous, and had already committed many outrages. When they might proceed to others still greater, no one could say. Nor is it any thing against the truth of this representation, that these goods were publicly removed from Caen, and in the day-time. Property in that situation would not be so liable to pillage in a place where any discipline at all was observed, as if it were concealed from public view, but in places to which the troops might easily have access, and that at a time when their officers, or those who might feel disposed to check them, were asleep.

The absence of Mr. Vintroux at Paris, while these goods were packing, and his going direct from that city to Havre, without his ever having been at Caen, since his leaving it in the latter end of August, 1815, is as well, if not more certainly established, as that part of his defence which arises out of the irregularities and violences of the Prussian army. Nor was this an unimportant fact to make out, for it will readily be conceded that more indulgence is due to a merchant whose goods are packed in his absence, than if he had been on the spot to attend to the business himself. The letter signed by him, and annexed to the invoice, although dated at Caen, is proved to have received his signature at Havre, having been previously written at Caen by Mr. Bellair, under the direction of Madame Vintroux, who appears herself to have been a merchant. The regular name in which the invoice is made out, has also been urged as an argument against the haste under which it is alleged, that these packages were made up. This is accounted for by Mr. Bellair, whose relation is no way improbable. The invoice was made by him, at his leisure, from the memoranda preserved at the time of packing, and he supposed, and so informed Mr. Vintroux, that it was correct.

The sudden resolution of the claimant to come to this country is also treated as a mere pretence. It is not improbable that such intention was first conceived at Havre; but the court does not think it worth while to employ any time in ascertaining the truth of this representation, feeling, as it does, a repugnance which it is not desirous of overcoming, at condemning a valuable property on a doubtful circumstance, which has not a very important or direct bearing on the immediate point in controversy. With the same remark it might dismiss all consideration of the very great surprise which has been expressed at this property's being consigned to Mr. Bouchaud, and being entered by him, after the owner had determined to accompany it, and actually did arrive with it in this city. If it be true, as the court believes, that this property was put up in the absence of Mr. Vintroux, and the invoice made out by his clerk, it is not easy to conjecture any improper motive for applying to Mr. Bouchaud to make the entry. Mr. Vintroux could very conscientiously have taken the usual oath. A motive, and a fair one therefore, may be assigned for this part of his conduct. This gentleman, being a stranger, might well employ Mr. Bouchaud, who was on the spot, and better acquainted with the manner of doing business at our custom-house. He might also have found it necessary, in order to obtain security for the duties, to place them in the hands of Mr. Bouchaud, who might then as well make the entry also.

It has likewise been imputed, as something more than an oversight, to Mr. Vintroux, that he omitted to apprize the collector of the mistakes, as soon as they were discovered. If the examination had been finished before the seizure, and his silence had then continued, there might have been some ground for this imputation; but a seizure took place so soon as to render impossible any communication, that would have been satisfactory; for, that the claimant contemplated informing the collector of the errors which might be discovered, as soon as the examination was closed, there is some ground to believe, from part of the testimony in the cause. It may be, that the apprehension of a seizure deterred Mr. Vintroux from a disclosure. Such neglect would have been improper, and would have exposed him to very just suspicion. And yet, during the present term, a sentence of restitution has proceeded on the very ground, that a prosecution took place in consequence of such information having been given to the custom-house, and in good faith, by the importer himself.

It is but just here, to remark, that the conduct of Mr. Vintroux, after he was apprized of a determination to seize, was ingenuous and very different from what would be looked for, in a person who had, from the beginning, laid a plan to defraud the goverument. Instead of concealing any part of the property, which might easily have been done, the whole of it being under his control, we find him pointing out where it was, and affording every facility in his power to the officers of the customs. This may not be an improper place to remark on the character of the claimant, which, in a proceeding of this nature, is not to be entirely disregarded. All the witnesses, who have had occasion to speak of it, represent him as a gentleman of probity and property, and very highly respected in his own country, and consider him incapable of meditating a fraud of this, or any other kind. It is indeed difficult to persuade oneself that a man of good standing, and fair character in his own country, and of large property, should commence his career in a country, of which he intended to become a member, with a fraud, so easy of detection, from which indeed a miserable saving might have resulted, but not without great hazard, not only of losing a large portion of his fortune, but of fixing on his reputation a stain, which no time could wash away: for it must be remembered that a fraud of this nature cannot be practised, without wilful perjury in the party himself, or, (which would be almost as culpable,) without his procuring or permitting another to swear to what he himself knew to be a falsehood. There was no adequate motive for so deep and unequal a game, nor is it to be reconciled with the former habits and character of the claimant; which, as has just been mentioned, are proved to have been honourable and upright.

The court considers it evincive of the good faith and integrity of the claimant, that, in order to explain this transaction, he has taken so much pains, and gone to such an expense in examining so many witnesses in a foreign country, and that too in his absence, which he would hardly have done, but under a consciousness that they could testify to the truth of the circumstances, on which he relied as proofs of his innocence. But admitting the correctness of Mr. Bellair's relation and of the other witnesses, it was insisted that his gross negligence, as it was termed, either in the packing of the goods, or in not informing Mr. Vintroux of the manner in which it was done, must be regarded as a fraud in his principal, under whose instructions, the presumption is, that he acted as he did. The court is at a loss, how such an inference is to be made consistent with the testimony of this gentleman, who discloses no such instruction, and declares that the goods were packed as well as could be done, under existing circumstances, and that nothing was said on the subject to Mr. Vintroux, because, notwithstanding the precipitation which attended the putting up of the goods, he believed the invoice would be found correct.

The veracity of this witness has also been called in question, on a supposition that he must be incorrect in the cause which he assigns for Madame de Vintroux's not accompanying her husband to the United States. This is considered as an invention of his own, as that lady was not confined until several months after the Ann Williams left Havre. Now it so happens that Mary Botte, who resided in the family of the claimant at Caen, proves the same fact; and there is no doubt at all, that although there was no immediate expectation of his wife's confinement when the claimant left Havre, yet her situation must have been such as is described by Mr. Bellair, and as might well have deterred her from undertaking a voyage to this country. Nor is it quite correct, as was asserted on the hearing, that all the differences which were discovered between the invoice and the actual contents of the packages, were uniformly in favour of the claimant: for some of the packages were correct, and others contained less in quantity than was represented on the entry. Some packages, therefore, were not seized, and others which had been seized, were returned.

Upon the whole, it is the opinion of this court, that whatever differences existed in this case between the entries at the custom-house, and the real contents of the packages, the claimant has succeeded in exculpating himself from all intention of fraud; and that therefore the sentence of the district court must be affirmed so far as it acquitted any part of the property libelled, or adjudged that there was probable cause of seizure, and ordered the claimant to pay the costs of that court; and reversed as to the residue of said decree. Each party must pay his own costs on the appeal.

Case No. 15,885.

[22 Int. Rev. Rec. 317.]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Sept. Term, 1877.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—ILLEGAL IMPORTATION—REMOVAL FROM VESSEL.

1. The act of July 18, 1866 [14 Stat. 178], applies to all dutiable goods, wares and merchandise, and, under the provisions of section 44 of this act, their irregular importation forfeits the goods and subjects the importer to fine or imprisonment.

[Cited in U. S. v. Jordan, Case No. 15,498.]

2. The construction is too liberal which treats the wharf as constructively a part of the vessel; and the removal of dutiable goods from the vessel to place them upon the wharf or dock, subjects them to the hazard of seizure and forfeiture.

[In error to the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey.]

STRONG, Circuit Justice. After much reflection I have come to the conclusion that a new trial should be ordered in this case. The information claimed a forfeiture of the merchandise under the act of congress of July 18, 1866, and also under the fiftieth section of the act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 665]. The first mentioned of these acts is entitled "An act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," and it is enacted by the fourth section, that "if any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, or assist in so doing, any goods, wares or merchandise contrary to law, * * * such goods, wares and merchandise shall be forfeited." The fiftieth section of the act of 1799, enacts that no goods, wares or merchandise brought in any ship or vessel from any foreign port, shall be unladen or delivered from such vessels within the United States but in open day, nor at any time without a permit from the collector and naval officer, if any, for such unlading and delivery.

It was claimed at the trial that the property seized was subject to forfeiture under the act of 1866, because it had been imported "contrary to law." The undisputed evidence was that the claimant was a manufacturer of female clothing in New York, that in March, 1874, he went to London for the sole purpose of buying silks and other goods for his trade. He reached London on the 23d of March, and remained until April 4th. While there he ordered the goods subsequently seized from Marshall & Snellgrove, amounting in value to $10,000 or upwards, and directed them to be sent to his lodgings, where they were sent in parcels wrapped in paper. He asked and received only a single invoice or bill. Having received the goods he went to several stores and purchased eight second hand trunks, which had been much used, and some of which had upon them the initials of former owners. These trunks he directed to be sent to his lodgings. There he packed in them the goods which he had purchased from Marshall & Snellgrove, putting some in another trunk which contained some of his personal apparel. There was also included a new silk dress, which had been ordered by another party. He placed upon the trunks no other marks than those which were upon them when he bought them. Having thus packed the goods he took them in a cab to the railway station, went with them to Liverpool, and left the trunks at the station until the next day. He then sent the hotel porter with his bag, and had it with the trunks put on board the steamer as his personal luggage. He made no inquiry for a consul, and procured no triplicate invoice as required by the act of congress of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 742]. He communicated to no one on the steamer that the trunks were filled with merchandise. He put down the number as nine in the list of the passengers with their luggage, and they were entered, as, of course, upon the ship's manifest as passengers' baggage. When the ship arrived at quarantine, New York, and the revenue officer was engaged in the cabin in taking baggage declarations of the passengers, the claimant told the officer he had some trunks containing merchandise, and the officer being busy told him to wait. He did not however, wait, but went upon the deck, and neither then, nor at any time, made or offered to make any baggage declaration. When the ship came to the dock the trunks were unladen and placed on the wharf, under a permit to land passengers' baggage. There was no permit to land them as merchandise. While they were being landed the officer accosted the claimant, and was told that he had some trunks containing merchandise. He was then asked for the invoice, and he gave to the officer Marshall & Snellgrove's bill, with the heading torn off. The officer then told him he was liable to arrest for importing goods in that way, whereupon he immediately left the ship and the dock, returning no more to the dock, nor going to the custom house, though he heard of the seizure of the property on that day, or the next.

In view of this state of facts, exhibited by the evidence, the first question considered by the district court, and upon which instructions where given to the jury, was whether the property was imported by the claimant "contrary to law," within the meaning of the act of 1866, and whether it was, therefore, subject to forfeiture. The learned district judge was of opinion, and so in effect charged, that the provisions of the act of 1866 had no applicability to the case. That importing goods, subject to duties, without procuring triplicate invoices, and a consular certificate and without their entry upon the ship's manifest as merchandise, is not such an importation as the law permits so far as relates to its mode, and that it is contrary to law does not seem to have been doubted. The act of 1863 applies to all invoices of goods, wares and merchandise. But the district judge held that the fourth section of the act of July 18, 1866, which enacted that any goods, wares and merchandise imported contrary to law be forfeited, and that the importer should be fined or imprisoned, applied only "to the importation either of special articles where the importation is wholly prohibited, or of merchandise admitted under some conditions or circumstances, and subject to duty, or forbidden under others," and that "it did not include the importation of dutiable goods without the payment of duties." With this construction of the act of 1866, I find myself unable to concur. I agree that the act is to be construed in view of other acts relating to the same subject matter; and, so far as possible, in harmony with them. But if a new provision is introduced into a statute, effect must be given to it, though it changes the prior existing law. It is true the act of 1863, which required triplicate invoices, with a consular certificate, did not prescribe a forfeiture for neglecting to obtain them. It only declared that without them the goods should not be admitted to entry. Forfeiture was prescribed for making entries by means of false invoices or certificates. But all this is not inconsistent with the power of congress to provide other penalties for importing goods without pursuing the prescribed forms of law. The manifest purpose of the act of 1863 was to protect the revenues against smuggling and other frauds. Hence the requisition of triplicate invoices and of the consular certificate, which could not be given without a minute and particular declaration, specifying facts very material to be known by the revenue officers. The act of 1866 professes by its title to be an act further to prevent smuggling. It is practically a remedial act, therefore, in a very just sense, though some of its provisions are penal. It is to be construed with reference to the mischiefs it was intended to remedy. Now, it is plain, the mischiefs in view were not only the introduction into the country of goods, the importation of which was prohibited, but illegal importation of dutiable articles. That dutiable goods were in contemplation of congress is made manifest by the provisions of the third section, which authorizes a search for goods "subject to duty," or "which have been introduced into the United States in any manner contrary to law," and in case they are found, authorizes a seizure of them and a forfeiture. Then follows the fourth section, containing a more general provision, which prescribes forfeiture of any goods imported contrary to law, and imposes a penalty upon the importer. Goods imported in the manner in which the goods now in controversy were imported are, in my judgment, imported contrary to law, as much as if they had been goods which could not legally be imported at all. And I find no warrant for restraining the language used by congress beneath its natural meaning. If it be restrained, as it was in the district court, the act ceases to be what it professes to be, an act to prevent smuggling, and there exists no penalty for smuggling dutiable goods in the country.

The act of August 30, 1842 [5 Stat. 548], which provides for the punishment of introducing into the United States secretly or clandestinely goods, wares or merchandise subject to duty, and which should have been invoiced, without paying or accounting for the duty, has been omitted in the Revised Statutes, probably because it was supposed to have been supplied by the fourth section of the act of 1866. I cannot think it would be dangerous to hold that the latter act does not apply to illegal importations of goods subjected by law to duties. The only argument against this construction of the act which addresses itself with force to my mind is that it seems harsh. It is said it may result in the forfeiture of goods imported without any criminal intent of the importer. A person it is urged may not know of the act of 1863, or of any of the acts which prescribe the mode in which importations may be made, or he may bring in his trunk, with his personal apparel, a single article which is subject to duty, intending to submit it to the inspection of the revenue officers, and to pay the duty charged upon it. To subject it, under such circumstances to forfeiture, it is urged, would be unnecessarily severe and unreasonable. To this, however, it may be replied, not merely that every person who comes into the country must be presumed to know the law, but that ample provision is made to protect an importer against suffering in consequence of innocent mistakes. The secretary of the treasury is authorized to remit fines, penalties, and forfeitures, if, in his opinion, they have been incurred without wilful negligence or any intention of fraud. This is a sufficient shield to every honest importer. I am aware that in U. S. v. Thomas [Case No. 16,473], Judge Hall, of the Northern district of New York, appears to have entertained an opinion different from that I have expressed. The circumstances of that case were very unlike the facts of the present. It was an indictment not against an importer, but against a person charged with having knowingly and unlawfully received and concealed goods subject to duty, which had been imported without the payment of the duties. The district judge held that the offence charged was not covered by the act of 1866. For aught that appears, the importation in that case was lawful, and all that was unlawful was conduct after the goods had lawfully come into port, or in other words, been imported. In this case the unlawfulness consisted in bringing the goods into port at all, without triplicate invoice and a consular certificate. It must be admitted, however, that the language of the judge implies, though it does not positively assert, that the fourth section of the act of 1866 applies only to importations of articles entirely forbidden, or of articles allowed to be imported in some specified form or condition. And following the reasoning of Judge Hall, the very learned judge of the district court of New Jersey, so decided in U. S. v. 95 Boxes [Id. 15,891]. After giving careful attention to the subject, I am not convinced that such is the meaning of the statute, and I must therefore hold that there was error in the instruction given to the jury in the present case that the provisions of the fourth section of the act of 1866 were inapplicable to it. It is the uniform practice, as I learn from the highest authority, to treat as subject to forfeiture under this act and the act of 1799, importations through the mails.

I think also there was error in charging the jury, as was done in effect that the removal of the property from the vessel to the dock or wharf, in virtue of a permit to examine and land personal baggage, did not work its forfeiture under the 50th section of the act of 1799. There was no permit to land it as merchandise. The prohibition of the act is that "no goods, wares or merchandise brought in any ships or vessels from any foreign port shall be unladen or delivered from such vessel within the United States but in open day, nor at any time without a permit from the collector and naval officer if any, for such unlading or delivery." This is a prohibition to the carriers as well as to the importer. The carriers only can unlade or deliver. It is intended for greater security to the revenue. Goods, wares and merchandise are not so secure against illegal removal where placed upon the wharf as they are when remaining on the vessel, and I think the construction is too liberal which treats the wharf as constructively a part of the vessel, and a removal of the goods to the wharf as no unlading, though it be made for the purpose of a more convenient examination; it would hardly be contended, I think, that all the cargo entered on the manifest as such, might lawfully be removed, without permit, to the dock, though such removal might possibly facilitate examination. In such a case it could hardly be held that the dock was in any sense a part of the vessel, and that there had been no unlading. The acts of congress, as well as the regulations of the treasury department, recognize a distinction between dutiable goods and personal luggage. Now, if the latter may be placed upon the wharf or dock, it is quite clear the former may not be without a permit, unless at the hazard of seizure and forfeiture. I do not attach as much importance as seems to have been attached to it in the district court to the question whether the claimant procured the unlading of the property. If it was unladen without a permit to unlade merchandise, it was subject to forfeiture under the act of 1799. This is not a proceeding against the importers. It is against the goods imported. They are treated as guilty. If the officers of the ship unladed them in violation of law and of the rights of the importer, they, or the ship, may be responsible to him. But in this case the jury might very correctly have found that the claimant procured the unlading under a permit to unlade passenger's baggage, and therefore under no sufficient permit. He shipped the trunks and their contents as baggage in Liverpool. He had them put among passenger's baggage in the hold. He gave the officers of the vessel no intimation that the property was not what it appeared to be, passenger's luggage. He did not have it placed upon the ship's manifest. This was as clear an intimation as he could give that it was passenger's baggage, and that it was proper to land it as such. True, he told the revenue officer, he had merchandise in some trunks, but when told to wait until the officer could attend to his case, he left and made no effort to make a baggage declaration. He did not point out his trunks to the officer, nor tell him in which, or in how many of the trunks he had merchandise, and he never told the officer of the vessel that any of his trunks contained dutiable articles. In view of this it is difficult to come to any other conclusion than that the unlading of the trunks, and their transfer from the vessel to the dock, was at his instance and with his consent. Whether it was or not, that it was a violation of the law, I cannot doubt, and I think the jury should have been so instructed. The opinion I have thus expressed harmonizes with the ruling of Judge Blatchford in U. S. v. Three Cases of Merchandise [Case No. 16,498], and with the decision referred to therein. It is in harmony also with U. S. v. Four Packages of Human Hair [unreported], decided by Blatchford, J., in the Southern district of New York, the judgment having been subsequently affirmed in the circuit court. See, also, U. S. v. The Sarah B. Harris [Id. 16,223], and U. S. v. Twenty Cases of Merchandise [Id. 16,559]. And I know of no practice that ought to force a different construction of the act; nor of anything in the treasury regulations. See Judge Blatchford's decision above cited.

I have thus considered the two most important questions in this record. There are some minor ones which it is not important to discuss, in view of what I have said. I concur with the district judge in holding that the act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 186], applies to the case, and that the case is not taken out of that act by the exception contained in the twenty-sixth section. While therefore the question whether there had been collusion between the claimant and the officers of the customs, may have had some bearing upon the other question whether their acts tended to prove a fraudulent intent in the claimant, the absence of such a collusion, if it was absent, does not, it seems to me, negative the illegality of the importation or the fact of unlading without a permit, and the consequent liability of the goods to forfeiture, provided the importer intended to defraud the United States. The court was right in submitting to the jury to find whether such an intent existed. If it did, and the goods were imported contrary to law, or unladen without a permit to unlade merchandise or such goods, the United States were entitled to a verdict, whether there was collusion between the claimant and the custom house officers or not. The case must go back for another trial. Judgment reversed and a venire de novo ordered.

[On the new trial there was a judgment in favor of the United States. Case unreported. This judgment was affirmed by the circuit court. Case No. 15,886.]

Case No. 15,886.

UNITED STATES v. NINE TRUNKS.

[6 Wkly. Notes Cas. 542; 24 Int. Rev. Rec. 327; 6 Reporter, 613; 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 38.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Sept., 1878.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—VIOLATION OF LAWS—INFORMATION OF FORFEITURE—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

[1. In a proceeding to forfeit imported goods on the ground of fraud, the goods themselves are regarded as the defendant and offender, and therefore it is no objection to the admission of proof of communications made to the revenue officers that they were made in the absence of the claimant.]

[2. Where goods have been seized for illegal importation, it is competent to prove that the fact of an intended illegal importation was previously known to the revenue officers, and that they acted thereon in making the seizure. Such information may properly be regarded as so connected with the illegal act itself as to constitute part of the res gestæ. U. S. v. 661 Bales of Tobacco, Case No. 16,297, approved.]

[3. In a suit to forfeit goods, after the passage of the act of June 22, 1874, which requires proof of an actual intent to defraud the government, there is no error in charging the jury that, after an actual importation in violation of law has been shown, if the claimant knew that his method of importation was contrary to law, the burden is upon him to show affirmatively that he did not adopt such method with intent to evade payment of duties.]

[In error to the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey.]

An information was filed by the United States attorney against nine trunks and one bag, containing principally silks alleged to be subject to duty as imports, and which were imported into the United States on board the steamship Russia, and landed without the permit of the collector or naval officer of the port, and without payment of duty; whereby, under the fiftieth section of the act of congress of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 665], they became forfeited to the United States. The information alleged that the goods were landed without permit, with intent to evade the payment of duties, and prayed the appropriate process that the goods might be condemned and the proceeds appropriated according to law. Subsequently B. G. Bean filed a petition of intervention, claiming the goods, and answered and pleaded to the information that the goods and merchandise therein mentioned did not become forfeited in manner and form as alleged.

A trial was had in the court below, and a verdict rendered for the claimant, under the ruling of the district judge that the act of congress of July 18, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], did not apply to goods of this character, but only to goods whose importation was wholly forbidden, and, that under the act of 1799, the landing of these goods, with passengers' baggage under a general permit, was not an unlading and delivery that subjected them to forfeiture. This judgment was subsequently reversed on error to this court, Mr. Justice Story holding that the goods were forfeitable, under the act of 1866, if they were shown to have been imported contrary to law, of which fact he said there was no doubt, under the evidence, and that under the proofs touching their transfer to the wharf from the vessel they were forfeitable under the act of 1799. He further decided that the act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 186], passed during the trial, which provided that there should be no forfeiture of the goods unless the jury were satisfied that there was an actual intent to defraud the government, was applicable to the case; saying that the court was right in submitting to the jury to find whether such an intention existed, and that if it did, and the goods were imported contrary to law or unladen without a permit, the United States were entitled to a verdict, whether there was a collusion between the claimant and the customs officers or not. [Case No. 15,885.]

On the second trial of the case the following facts appeared: Bean, the claimant, purchased in Europe the goods seized, and packed them in eight second-hand trunks, which he bought there, and in one other trunk of his own; that the trunks were entered on the manifest of the steamer Russia, by which he was a passenger, as his own personal baggage; that no certified invoice was obtained by him of the goods, and no declaration of the contents of the trunks was made by him. There was evidence that Bean was a dressmaker in New York, and intended to use the silks in his business. On the arrival of the steamer at her dock in the port of New York, these trunks were placed, according to the usual custom, with other passengers' luggage, on a portion of the dock set apart for the purpose of examination by the revenue officers, and that no baggage could be removed from this part of the dock without due examination and permission of the proper officers. It appeared that it was customary for the inspector after the examination of any particular trunk, and payment of duties, if any were found to be due, to mark each trunk so examined with his initials, the number of his badge, and the word "Passed." After the trunks in question were upon the dock, one of the inspectors marked them in this manner, and the trunks were then moved up the dock by the workmen on the pier to the pile of "passed" baggage. This was done after Bean had left the vessel, and by the direction of one Brackett, a special agent of the treasury who was on the dock watching these trunks. Bean not appearing, Brackett made seizure of the trunks, and took them to the custom house. At this stage of the testimony Brackett was asked, as to an inquiry made by himself of one Gross, an employé of the steamship company having charge of their dock, Bean not being present at the time: "What did you ask Mr. Gross relative to these trunks of Bean, and what reply did Mr. Gross make?" Objected to as hearsay, and that a statement of a third party, not shown to be connected with Bean, in his absence, was incompetent and irrelevant. Objection overruled, evidence admitted, and exception. Answer: "I asked him if these trunks had been regularly passed, and he replied that they had been. I then ordered their seizure." Brackett, it appeared had gone to the steamer to look for Bean, in pursuance of information which had been given at the office of the special agent of the treasury. He was asked, on his examination, from whom he had obtained the information that these silks were to be brought on in the Russia, and what the information was. Objected to. Objection overruled, and exception taken.

The Court (Nixon, District Judge) charged the jury, inter alia, that (the law declared the goods to be forfeited, under the circumstances of this importation, if they were satisfied that the claimant intended, by what he did, to bring into the United States these goods and merchandise without the payment of the duties which the statute imposed; and that it was a question of fact for them to decide whether the claimant adopted this method of importation to secure that result, or that he did it for the purpose of saving time and freight, intending that the silks should be entered for the payment of duties after his arrival.) * * * (You must commence your inquiry with this proposition, that the importation of the goods was contrary to law. That much has been settled in the case on the previous trial. Then if you are of the opinion, from the facts shown, that Mr. Bean knew that his method of bringing in the merchandise was unlawful, the burden rests upon him, to satisfy you, by affirmative proof, that he did not adopt this method for the purpose of evading the payment of duties, but for some other and lawful purpose; as, for instance, to save freight, or to save time in the manner of transportation.) But if you are of the opinion that he was not aware that such a mode of bringing in or unloading of the goods was contrary to law, then the government is obliged to establish by positive proof to your satisfaction that all the steps taken by him in the direction of their transportation were taken with a fraudulent intent, to wit, for the purpose of getting the merchandise into the country without the paying of duties.

Verdict for the United States, and judgment of condemnation and forfeiture was subsequently entered thereon. The claimant, Bean, thereupon sued out this writ of error, assigning for error, inter alia, the admission of the testimony excepted to as above, and the portions of the charge inclosed in parenthesis.

Stanley, Brown & Clarke, for plaintiff in error.

A. D. Keasby, contra.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The court below permitted the United States to prove, by the officers who made the seizure, upon what previous information they acted and from whom that information was derived, and also by their informant, what he had told them, touching the proposed illegal importation of the goods. The conversations offered to be proved occurred in the absence of the claimant, and were objected to as hearsay, and it is now urged that the proof of them ought to have been excluded upon that ground. If the claimant were the subject against which the proceeding was directed and was, therefore, necessarily a party to it, there might be force in the objection, as the reason of the rule which excludes hearsay evidence might be invoked in his favor. But he was a voluntary intervener, the goods themselves being the defendant and offender, if there was any offence, and subject to the punitive consequences of a violation of the law committed by any person in reference to them. In U. S. v. 661 Bales of Tobacco [Case No. 16,297], Judge Blatchford said: "If any person does so and so, in regard to goods, they are forfeited. In all the statutes the merchandise is personated, the merchandise is called the offender; and if any person does in regard to that merchandise,—and, for the purposes of this case, I will limit it to any person lawfully connected with the merchandise,—if any person does the forbidden acts, the merchandise is forfeited. It is not like an indictment, in a criminal case, where personal guilt must be brought home to the individual, and where he is not responsible criminally for the acts of another; but in this case, and in all cases of this kind, the merchandise is responsible for the forbidden act of any person connected with it." So also, said Mr. Justice Strong, in his opinion in this case: "This is not a proceeding against the importers. It is against the goods imported. They are treated as guilty."

It is plain, therefore, that if the communications to the revenue officers, proposed to be proved, were relevant to the inquiry in hand, they were not objectionable because they were made in the absence of the claimant. There was evidence to show that the goods were imported, and were removed from the vessel in violation of law, and it was necessary to determine whether a violation of law was actually intended. Was it not then pertinent to show, that what was done in reference to the goods was in pursuance of a prearranged plan; that the fact of an intended illegal importation was known to the officers before hand? And if the subsequent mode of dealing with them by the person in whose control they were accorded with the information given to the officers, as to what was proposed to be done, may not the essential illegal intent be impressed upon the goods? If an illegal act is committed, may not information communicated to an officer, within the scope of his duty, of a purpose to commit it and of the manner of committing it, although not derived directly from the wrong doer, be considered to characterize the intent with which the act was committed? Indeed, I think, where a seizure has been made, and the question is whether it was warrantable, information of a purpose to do an act, touching the subject of it, which is verified by the commission of the act, may properly be regarded as so connected with the act itself, as to constitute part of the res gestæ, and is provable as such, in proceedings of this kind. Evidence of a kindred character was allowed in the case of U. S. v. 661 Bales of Tobacco, supra, the judge saying, "It was admissible under the decisions of the supreme court, not for the purpose of proving the body of the offence, but for the purpose of characterizing the intent with which a given act may have been done."

I do not understand the court below as having unqualifiedly instructed the jury that the burden of proof, as to fraudulent intent, was upon the claimant. The language of the judge was: "You must commence your inquiry with this proposition, that the importation of the goods was contrary to law. That much has been settled in the case in the previous trial. Then, if you are of the opinion, from the facts shown, that Mr. Bean knew that his method of bringing in the merchandise was unlawful, the burden rests upon him to satisfy you by affirmative proof, that he did not adopt this method for the purpose of evading the payment of duties, but for some other and lawful purpose, as, for instance, to save freight, or to save time in the matter of transportation. But, if you are of opinion, that he was not aware that such a mode of bringing in or unloading of the goods was contrary to law; then the government is obliged to establish by positive proof to your satisfaction, that all the steps taken by him, in the direction of their transportation, were taken with a fraudulent intent, to wit, for the purpose of getting the merchandise into the country without the paying of duties." There is no error in this. Its obvious import is, that, if the claimant knew he was violating the law, an intent to evade the duties might fairly be imputed to him by the jury, and that hence it devolved upon him to present satisfactory counter proof that he was actuated by a lawful purpose. In other words, that the presumption of fraudulent intent arising from wilful violation of the law, shifted upon the claimant the burden of proving the absence of such intent. This does not confound guilty knowledge with fraudulent intent, but correctly states, that an intent to evade the payment of duties and thus to defraud the government, may properly be inferred from an overt wilful violation of law, and that the duty of disproving this unfavorable inference devolved upon the claimant.

No special notice of the other errors assigned seems to me to be necessary. It is sufficient to say, that I do not think they are sustained. The judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES v. NINETY DEMI-JOHNS AQUADIENTE.[1]

[MS.]

District Court, S. D. Florida. Nov., 1879.[2]

FORFEITURES—VIOLATION OF TARIFF LAWS—INTENT TO DEFRAUD—ADMIRALTY PRACTICE.

1. A violation of the requirement in Schedule D of the act of 1870 (Rev. St. § 2504 [16 Stat. 256]), that "wines, brandy, and other spirituous liquors imported in bottles shall be packed in packages containing not less than one dozen bottles," does not subject liquors not so packed to forfeiture, for there is no statute declaring such a forfeiture, and a constructive forfeiture is not justified except in cases of the most urgent necessity.

2. To entail a forfeiture, it is not sufficient that there has been a violation of law by means of the thing sought to be forfeited, but there must have been such a violation as will bring it directly under the letter of the law declaring the forfeiture.

3. The act of June 22, 1874, § 16 [18 Stat. 189], which makes the finding of an intent to defraud a prerequisite to forfeiture of goods, though in terms restricted to cases in which issue of fact is joined, may nevertheless be considered applicable to suits in rem, in admiralty, even when there is no answer or appearance; since the admiralty practice is adapted to protect the rights of the absent owner.

G. Bowne Patterson, U. S. Atty.

LOCKE, District Judge. This is the second libel against this property on account of irregularities in the packages in which it was found, it being, as is alleged, in large bottles, to wit, demijohns, and not packed in packages of not less than twelve. The question at issue is whether the portion of Schedule D, Act 1870 (section 2504, Rev. St.), which provides that "wines, brandy, and other spirituous liquors imported in bottles shall be packed in packages containing not less than one dozen bottles in each package," authorizes a forfeiture of such property if not so packed. It is admitted that there is no forfeiture declared by the language of any statute, nor has any law or decision been cited, under which or wherein it may or has been enforced; nor am I aware of any. Forfeitures are not favored in law, and, in my opinion, there can be none without a direct violation of a positive enactment for which they have been declared to be the penalty. Implications either of violation of law or character of penalty will not justify them. In order to entail a forfeiture, it is not sufficient that there has been a violation of law by means of the thing sought to be forfeited, but there must have been such a violation as will bring it directly under the letter of the law declaring the forfeiture. I consider this principle so well established that nothing but the most urgent necessity would justify a constructive forfeiture, and I do not consider such a construction necessary for the protection of the revenue any more than supported by authority. If it has not been declared by legislation, it cannot be assumed to have been intended as a penalty. Had all importations in any manner irregular been declared contraband, and the general penalty of forfeiture been declared, or no penalty been attached, so that the general penalty of forfeiture might attach for a violation of law by presumption, it might be regarded with more favor; but such is not the case, and the very presence of the declaration of forfeiture under other circumstances, as, for instance, in this same section, where it is declared that all liquors imported in casks of a less capacity than fourteen gallons shall be forfeited, makes the absence of such declaration presumptive evidence of the absence of intent in the legislators to affix it as a penalty.

There is another question presented in this case aside from the one of the insufficiency or absence of any law justifying a forfeiture not positively declared, and that is the provisions of the 16th section of the act of June 22, 1874, which provides that in all actions, suits and proceedings for the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise the distinct proposition whether the acts alleged to be done were done with intent to defraud the United States shall be inquired into, and, unless the intent to defraud be found, there shall be no forfeiture. The language of the section confines it to actions in which an issue or issues of fact are joined, but it may well be considered whether in admiralty issues of fact are not joined by the force of law and practice, even though there may be no answer or appearance. This question has been discussed and decided to a certain extent in the affirmative by Justice Bradley in U. S. v. The Mollie [Case No. 15,795], and there appear to be good grounds for so considering them, and requiring strict proof in every cause in admiralty, even though the parties in interest may be in default.

Admiralty practice is adapted to, and in a vast majority of cases founded upon, actions in rem, against the thing, not able to answer for itself, while the actual owner is absent, either entirely uninformed as to the condition of his property, or unable to respond in person, often too ill informed as to its circumstances to respond understandingly at all. The very liberality of such practice is intended to throw around the property of absent owners all the protection which the court having it in possession can grant, and although it may not be so much demanded today with steam and telegraphic communication as in the past, yet the spirit of protective equity which has made courts of admiralty trusted abroad as well as at home requires that it should not be disregarded.

In seizures made on land a judgment of condemnation is made on default, but where the seizure is made on water "the court shall hear the case ex parte, and adjudge therein as to what law and justice may appertain;" treating such case as if issue were joined on any question of fact essential to a condemnation. In one of these cases the presumption is that the seizure is from the custody of the actual owners; in the other, that the owners receive no personal notice, and perhaps none at all. Under the section quoted, it is made the duty of the court, where issue of fact has been joined, to consider the proposition of the presence of an intent to defraud, and it seems but reasonable that the same proposition may be considered in cases where it is the privilege and duty of the court to deem such issue of fact joined in practice as in the case of admiralty seizures.

If this position is correct, as I consider it is, it precludes any forfeiture, as there is no allegation of an intent to defraud, nor do the circumstances point to any such intent, and the libel must be dismissed.

INTERNAL REVENUE ACT—FORFEITURE BY AGREEMENT—RIGHTS OF INFORMER.

[Where liquor is forfeited by consent in pursuance of an agreement made by the commissioner of internal revenue, and upon a relinquishment by the government of a portion of the proceeds of sale, very convincing evidence is necessary to entitle one to share in such proceeds on the ground that he furnished sufficient facts to the government to condemn the property.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before me upon a motion to confirm the report of a commissioner to whom it was referred, to ascertain and report the person, if any, entitled to share as informer in the proceeds of the forfeiture of certain distilled spirits condemned and sold in this action. The report of the commissioner is that one Joseph G. Ward is the person who first informed of the matter whereby the forfeiture was incurred; to which report objection is made by the district attorney, who, on the part of the government, insists that under the facts disclosed no person is entitled to share as informer. I have examined the evidence with care, and am unable to agree with the commissioner in his conclusion.

It appears that the forfeiture in this case was by consent in pursuance of an agreement made by the commissioner of internal revenue; and upon a relinquishment by the government of a portion of the proceeds of sale, so that in point of fact the government has realized less than the amount of tax to secure which the spirits were in bond at the time of the seizure. Under such circumstances very convincing evidence would be necessary to justify the conclusion that facts sufficient to condemn the property had been communicated to the officers of the government by any person. Here the evidence is far from convincing to my mind, and viewed in its most favorable aspect, does not present a state of facts upon which I can feel justified in adjudging that a forfeiture of this property has been incurred by reason of any matter or thing first communicated to the proper officers of the government. The report, therefore, must be set aside, and the fund distributed to the proper officers of the government.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept. Term, 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE — STAMPING AND BRANDING CASKS—FORFEITURE.

1. Wholesale dealers are bound to "cause" their casks to be stamped and branded in the cases which come under sections 25 and 47 of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 136, 144).

2. A knowing and wilful failure to comply with section 25 will cause a forfeiture of the goods by virtue of section 96, because no other penalty or punishment is anywhere provided for such failure. Otherwise with a neglect of the requirements of section 47, because that section provides a penalty for a breach thereof.

[Cited in U. S. v. 4,800 Gallons of Spirits, Case No. 15,153; U. S. v. 1,412 Gallons Distilled Spirits, Id. 15,960.]

LOWELL, District Judge. The demurrer to this information raises two points: (1) Whether, under statute of July 20, 1868, it is the duty of wholesale dealers, etc., to cause their casks to be stamped in the cases mentioned in sections 25 and 47; (2) whether their neglect to do so will work a forfeiture of these goods under section 96. See 15 Stat. 136, 144, 164.

The first question has been answered in the affirmative by two judges in U. S. v. One Rectifying Establishment [Case No. 15,952], and U. S. v. One Hundred and Thirty-Three Casks, etc. [Id. 15,940]; and in the negative by one in U. S. v. Thirty-Seven Barrels, etc. [Id. 16,466].

I consider the question a nice one, but on the whole incline to the former opinion. It is true that the government gauger is to do the work; but he cannot in fact do it nor be held responsible for its neglect unless the owner shall notify him when and where to do it. Then, considering the peculiar language of section 96, which punishes the wilful neglect to do or cause to be done any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of the business, which last phrase, "cause to be done," seems to refer to acts which the owner is not to do personally nor by his mere agent, and that this phrase is dropped presently when the section speaks of doing prohibited acts; and considering that these are civil penalties, it seems to me that section 96 imposes these penalties on the owner who wilfully neglects or omits to see to it that the business is properly conducted, in accordance with the act. If he has notified the officer, and the real neglect is on the part of the latter, the case would fail.

As no penalty or punishment is imposed on wholesale dealers nor on their property for neglect of the things required by section 25, it follows that if a wilful neglect is made out under that section, the forfeiture is incurred, by the general words of section 96.

Not so with section 47, which forfeits the casks or packages, and those only which are without the marks required by that section. Here is a penalty imposed, and section 96 applies only to acts or omissions for which no penalty or punishment is imposed by any other section. It is argued that section 96 is to be divided, and to read thus: If no other penalty or punishment is imposed, there shall be a penalty of $1,000; and the offenders, whether punishable under any other section or not, shall forfeit their gooods.

There is no sufficient ground for so distorting the words of the act. The whole paragraph is connected, and the qualification extends to the pecuniary penalty and to the forfeiture. The language is so clear and explicit, that any paraphrase is rather likely to obscure it than to make it more plain. It means: If there be any wilful omission, and no other penalty or punishment has been provided, then we impose this payment and forfeiture. It was argued that the forfeiture of the unmarked goods imposed by section 47 is neither a penalty nor a punishment; but the statute often uses "penalty" and "forfeiture" interchangeably, as where it says the distiller shall forfeit the sum of, etc., and in other places, shall pay a penalty, etc.; and besides, a forfeiture is a penalty, and is so treated by section 96 itself. I have carefully read a charge to the jury reported to have been given in Quantity of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 11,495], which if correctly given,[1] which I take leave to doubt, seems to hold that these penalties are imposed for all wilful acts and omissions in addition to the penalties imposed for the same acts and omissions if not wilful. Now, in the first place, it is very doubtful whether "knowingly" and "wilfully," in section 96, qualify anything but neglects, omissions, and refusals. I am inclined to think they do not, and that the careful qualification as to mere neglects that they must be knowing and wilful, and which much strengthens the argument on the first point, is purposely omitted when prohibited acts are spoken of, which are personal and must be presumed to be wilful. But however this may be, I cannot believe that congress intended to forfeit one thousand dollars and the stock in trade for the same acts and omissions for which it had already denounced a great variety of punishments, some much larger and including the same goods, and some much less, and amounting to only a very small fine. Indeed, if there were no express reservation of previous penalties, there would be a necessary contradiction in saying that the stock should be forfeited for an act or omission for which already a different penalty had been established. It might in such a case be necessary to adopt the later section as overruling the former; but this is a rude and artificial contrivance, not to be adopted except in the last resort, from which we are relieved by the clear language of section 96. In this construction I am supported by the deliberate judgments of two learned judges in the cases first above cited, to which I am happy to be able to refer. U. S. v. One Rectifying Establishment [Case No. 15,952], and U. S. v. One Hundred and Thirty-Three Casks [Id. 15,940].

The demurrer to the second count is sustained, to the first count overruled.

[NOTE. The parties having reformed the pleadings, the claimant filed a second demurrer, and on the hearing of the cause, the demurrer was sustained on both counts. Case No. 15,890.]

UNITED STATES v. NINETY-FIVE BARRELS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[14 Int. Rev. Rec. 6.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE—UNSTAMPED PACKAGES.

The forfeiture of distilled spirits by section 57 of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 150], is general, and that section imposes a penalty for a violation of section 25 in case the unstamped packages contain more than five gallons.

R. M. Morse, Jr., for claimant Lotan Gassett.

J. C. Ropes, Asst. U. S. Atty.

LOWELL, District Judge. Since this case was before me on demurrer the parties have by consent reformed the pleadings, and the claimant has filed a second demurrer, which raises the single question whether section 57 of the statute of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 150), does not impose a penalty or punishment for a violation of section 25. In my former decision [Case No. 15,889] I expressed the opinion that there was no penalty imposed for a violation of section 25, and three district judges have expressed a like opinion. U. S. v. One Rectifying Establishment [Id. 15,952]; U. S. v. Thirty-Seven Barrels, etc. [Id. 16,466]; U. S. v. One Hundred and Thirty-Three Casks [Id. 15,940]. And this was agreed to be the case by both counsel at the former hearing. But it seems that section 57 contains a clause which, taken literally, is broad enough to reach every neglect to brand or stamp or cause to be branded or stamped any cask or package of more than five gallons. It is: "And all distilled spirits found after thirty days from the time this act takes effect in any cask or package containing more than five gallons without having thereon each mark and stamp required therefor by this act shall be forfeited to the United States." It is argued by the district attorney that the meaning is to punish merely the violation of this section, and that "act" in the latter part of the clause should read "section;" and such was the opinion of Judge Ballard in one of the cases above referred to. In none of the other decisions that I have seen has this section been construed or cited, and it is not clear that the point was fully argued in that case. There is great force in the argument from proximity of place and context; all the remainder of that section refers to spirits already distilled and held for sale at the date of the passage of the act, and this forfeiture is interposed in the middle of a sentence of which the former part relates only to such spirits.

It was very frankly admitted by the district attorney that a great many forfeitures have been adjudged here on informations framed under the broad construction of this clause in defaulted cases; and it never occurred to me, in reading or hearing these informations, as I always do in such cases, that there ought to be an allegation that the spirits were in existence and owned by some persons who intended to sell them at the time of the passage of the act, which would be necessary to bring them within the more restricted construction. Of course, the government must abide by the same interpretation when it will relieve the goods as when it will forfeit them; but I understand their position now to be, that any informations that may have been brought against unstamped spirits by virtue of this clause were ill-advised excepting where the spirits were held for sale at the date of the passage of the act; and as this is the first time the point has been distinctly raised, they certainly ought not to be precluded from taking their present position. Upon the best consideration I can give the question, I am of opinion that the forfeiture is general and not to be limited by the context. The language is unambiguous that all distilled spirits found in any cask, etc., not having each mark and stamp required by the act, shall be forfeited. There appears no reason of justice or policy for confining the meaning of "act" to "section," but rather the contrary. It is proper and usual that the goods which are not stamped should be forfeited, and it is so provided in respect to cigars and tobacco by sections 70 and 90 of this act; but there is no general provision forfeiting unstamped spirits unless it be the clause now under consideration. To limit the meaning will not only require us to read "act," as if it were "section," but to disregard "each" because there is but one particular stamp required by this section, and this would naturally be mentioned as "the stamp required by this section," or by some such expression. I consider the more reasonable construction to be that congress having by this section put all spirits on an equality in this respect, namely, that all must be stamped and branded whether made before the statute was passed or afterwards, intended to say that all spirits which were not properly stamped and marked should be forfeited, whatever the previous history of the spirits might be, or whatever the special marks or stamps which ought to be put upon them. I must, therefore, sustain the demurrer on both counts and dismiss the information, leaving the United States to their remedy by writ of error.

UNITED STATES v. NINETY-FIVE BOXES, ETC.

SAME v. TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-EIGHT BOXES, ETC.

[19 Int. Rev. Rec. 101.]

District Court, D. New Jersey. March 21, 1874.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — ENTRIES AS PASSENGERS' BAGGAGE — FORFEITURES.

Where dutiable merchandise was imported as passengers' baggage, but no attempt was made by the owners and consignees to have it passed as such, and the owner, without knowledge of the seizure by the officers of customs, offered the goods, with correct bills of lading and moneys, for entry at the custom house, held, that such goods were not forfeitable either under the 50th section of the act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 665], the 1st section of the act of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 742], or the 4th section of the act of July 18, 1866 [14 Stat. 179].

A. Q. Keasbey, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Stanley, Brown & Clarke, for claimants.

NIXON, District Judge. The claimants, the principles involved, and the facts, in the two cases above stated are substantially the same. The goods described in the informations were seized by the collector of customs of New York, at Hoboken, in this district, and informations were filed claiming their forfeiture under section 50 of the act of March 2, 1799, section 1 of the act of March 3, 1863, and section 4 of the act of July 18, 1866. Sacks & Herzberg, merchants and importers, doing business in New York, put in claims and duly filed answers to the informations. On the trial of the first stated case, the result of which, by consent of counsel, was to determine the second, no question was raised, in regard to the facts, and the court directed a verdict for the government, subject to the opinion of the court upon the questions of law; and also requested the jury to find specially whether or not the claimants were guilty of intentional fraud, and design to evade the payment of duties. This was done for the information of the secretary of the treasury, if the case should afterwards come before him on application in behalf of the claimants for remission of the forfeiture. A general verdict for the government was found, as directed, but the jury failed to agree upon the question of fraud.

The facts in the two cases are substantially as follows: The goods in question were owned by the claimants, Sacks & Herzberg, importers of dress trimmings in New York; one member of the firm, Sacks, residing in New York, and the other, Herzberg, in Berlin. They had been in the habit of importing goods from Hamburg, which were shipped from time to time by their agents in that city. Morris L. Sacks, father of one of the claimants, was in Germany in the winter of 1872-3, visiting his relatives, and when about to return to this country, in the month of February, received a letter from his son requesting him to go to the shipping agent of the firm in Hamburg, and ascertain whether there were any goods prepared for transportation, and, if so, to bring them with him. He did so, and found two cases of goods ready for shipment. They were put on board the Frisia by their agent, and marked "personal luggage" of Mr. Sacks, the elder, who had taken passage in that steamer. The reason assigned for so marking the cases was to save, in part, the costs of transportation. Each passenger was allowed by the steamship company a certain number of cubic feet for his baggage, and, as he had little of his own, he would be obliged to pay on this merchandise only for the space occupied by it in excess of the usual allowance for baggage. The Frisia was to sail on the 19th of February. On the 18th, Mr. Sacks, in consequence of sickness, found that he was unable to go on board, and endeavored to have the goods withdrawn from the steamer, but was unsuccessful, in consequence of their being stowed in the hold of the vessel. They came over among the personal baggage of the steamer; were not entered in the ship's manifest; were landed on the wharf at Hoboken, with the passengers' baggage under the general permit granted by the collector for that purpose, and no one claiming them, they were seized by the officers of the customs, and sent to the seizure room for forfeiture. Mr. Sacks, the elder, sailed a week later in the Westphalia. Four other cases were then ready for shipment, and were taken by him on board, and marked as, and deposited with, the personal baggage. They were put upon the manifest of the ship as passengers' baggage, and not as merchandise, and on the arrival of the steamer in Jersey City were landed upon the dock for examination under the permit to remove personal baggage, where, as in the other case, they were seized. None of the cases contained anything except merchandise, subject to duties.

Upon this state of facts, it is insisted by the district attorney in behalf of the United States, that the mode of importation was an experiment by the parties, to ascertain whether the payment of duties could be avoided by inducing the officers of customs to allow the goods to pass without inspection, as passengers' baggage exempt from duty, and ultimately intending to pay the duties if payment should be demanded, and he claims that the goods are forfeited under the 50th section of the act of March 2, 1799, and also under the 1st section of the act of March 3, 1863, and the 4th section of the act of July 18, 1866.

The facts place the case before me, so clearly outside of the provisions of the sections of the two last recited statutes, that I shall not stop to particularly consider them. The penalty of forfeiture authorized by the first section of the act of 1863, refers to frauds or attempted frauds in regard to the entry of goods by the owner, consignee, or agent; and is only incurred by some overt act, after their importation, in respect to their entry at the custom house for the payment of duties. The alleged unlawful or fraudulent practices here complained of were in connection with the importation and not the entry of the goods, which are quite distinct matters. The importation is complete before the time for entry begins. Waring v. Mayor, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 118; Act 1799, § 36. The goods were seized before an entry was attempted to be made. The 4th section of the act of 1866 prescribes the penalty of forfeiture in cases of the fraudulent importation of goods contrary to law, and as was held by the late Judge Hall in U. S. v. Thomas [Case No. 16,473], refers not to the importation of dutiable goods without the payment of duties, but to the bringing in either of special articles whose importation is wholly prohibited or of merchandise admitted under certain circumstances and subject to duty, or forbidden under others, as for instance importing cigars in boxes containing more than five hundred and brandy or other spirituous liquors in casks of a capacity less than thirty gallons. It is for the wisdom of the legislature to impose these prohibitions and restrictions in its discretion, and the importing of such articles in any other than the prescribed mode might be deemed an importation contrary to law. But it is not as a general rule against the law to import or bring into the United States goods subject to duty without first paying or securing the duties, for nothing is due or payable thereon until after the importation has taken place, and the necessary entries have been made and the duties ascertained.

We are then brought to the single question whether these goods are liable to forfeiture under the provision of the 50th section of the collection act of 1799. The prohibition of the section is that, "no goods, wares, or merchandise, brought in any ship or vessel from any foreign port or place, shall be unladen or delivered from such ship or vessel within the United States, but in open day; nor at any time without a permit from the collector and naval officer, if any, for such unlading or delivery." The goods in controversy were taken from the steamer and placed upon the dock for examination under permits, from the collector and naval officer to examine personal baggage. These permits were issued by virtue of the 46th section of the collection act, which provides "that whenever the collector and naval officer, if any, shall think proper, so to do, they may and are hereby authorized in lieu of the provisions and directions before mentioned" (in reference to the entry of personal baggage by the owner and in his behalf), "to direct the baggage of any person arriving within the United States to be examined by the surveyor of the port or an inspector of the customs, and to make a return of the same, and if any articles shall be contained therein, which in their opinion ought not to be exempted from duty, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, due entry shall be made therefor and the duties thereon paid or secured to be paid; and provides, that whenever any article or articles subject to duty shall be found in the baggage of any person arriving within the United States, which shall not at the time of making entry for such baggage be mentioned to the collector before whom such entry is made by the person making the same, all such articles shall be forfeited," etc. These provisions are intelligible and require the officers making the examination to pass the personal baggage, and to hold all goods, not falling properly within the designation, for entry and payment of duties, and they authorize the seizure and forfeiture of those articles only which are found to be withheld from the collector when the entry is made.

It was in proof, that for many years past no examination of passengers' baggage has taken place on shipboard; that it has been the custom, on account of the practical inconveniences of making a proper examination in the hold of the vessel, to have everything imported as personal baggage, placed on the dock where it remains under the inspection and control of the officers until examined and passed by them; that the inspector of customs directs the removal from the ship to the dock by virtue of the permits of the collector and naval officer, authorizing the examination, and that it is made solely to facilitate such examination. The permits in this case, of which the following are copies, were produced and admitted: The naval officer says: "The inspector on board the steamship Frisia from Hamburg, will examine the baggage of all the passengers, and if nothing be found but personal baggage, permit the same to be landed and send all other articles not permitted in due time to the public store." The collector's general order is substantially the same: "The inspector on board the steamer Frisia, E. Mier, master, from Hamburg and Havre, will send to the public store No. —— Hoboken stores, all packages when landed, and for which no permit or order shall have been received by him contrary to this direction, except perishable articles, gunpowder and explosive substances, not permitted for consumption, which you will retain on board and send notice of to this office. The usual weighing, gauging and measuring to be done before sending goods under this order." These authorize the examination of the baggage by the inspector according to the proviso of the 46th section above mentioned, and direct all articles or packages not falling within the description of personal baggage to be sent to the public stores for entry and the payment of duties.

It is claimed on behalf of the government that the removal of the goods which came as personal baggage, but which, in fact, were not personal baggage, from the ship to the dock, for the special and only purpose of examination, was such an unloading or delivery of the articles from the vessel, as to bring them within the forfeiture of the 50th section. This would seem to be a harsh and strained construction of the act. The goods are in the possession and under the sole direction of the officers. They are removed to a portion of the dock assigned for the purpose by his order and for his convenience, and remain as fully under his control there as in any part of the ship; and in view of the special object of the transfer, it does no violence to language to hold that no unlading or delivery has taken place, and that, constructively, they are still on board of the vessel. If such removal, in itself, subject the goods to seizure and forfeiture under this section, then the other penalties of the section may be enforced, and the master of the ship and all other persons—including the inspectors that order and superintend the transfer—who are knowingly concerned or aiding therein, forfeit and become liable each to pay for every offence the sum of four hundred dollars, and are disabled from holding any office of trust or profit, under the United States, for a term not exceeding seven years; and when the value of the goods amounts to four hundred dollars, the vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture are subject to like seizure and forfeiture. I do not say that such results, however startling and severe, should deter the court from enforcing the plain provisions of a statute; but they are properly adverted to, and entitled to weight, in cases like the present, involving construction. This interpretation of the laws is in harmony with the practice of the government, and is confirmed by the rulings of its officers for many years past, and, so far as it appears, from the beginning.

The counsel for the claimants put in evidence the printed instructions of the surveyor of the port to the inspectors, from which I make the following extracts bearing upon the case: "It is expressly enjoined on officers of the customs that they must be careful that, while no unnecessary delay or needless embarrassment is occasioned, proper scrutiny must be made to detect and report for entry and payment of duties or security therefor, in pursuance of law, all articles found among the baggage liable to duty. They are cautioned, however, that the prime object of their labor is to secure the duties of the United States, and that they are to avoid making seizure of baggage because of the presence of dutiable articles, unless the intention of fraudulent importation is evident." "In the absence ot the entry clerk or appraiser, dutiable articles, taken from passengers' baggage, will be sent by the inspector, as soon as possible, to the appraiser's stores, and the passenger will be furnished by the inspector with the usual baggage certificate." "Baggage agents and all other persons (without the permission of the surveyor) will be excluded from the vessel and from so much of the dock as is used for examining the baggage, until the examination of all the baggage is completed." "The inspector stationed at the gate on the arrival of a steamer must not allow any trunk or package to be removed from the dock unless it is properly passed and checked by the examining inspector. All baggage remaining on the vessel or dock not claimed within a reasonable time by any passenger, must be sent by the inspector to the public store designated in the general order."

The counsel also read in evidence from the printed regulation of the treasury department, issued by the secretary, as follows: "It is expressly enjoined on officers of the customs that they must be careful that, while no unnecessary delay or needless embarrassment is occasioned, proper scrutiny must be made to detect and report for entry and payment of duties or security therefor, in pursuance of law, all articles found among the baggage liable to duty. They are cautioned, however, that the prime object of their labor is to secure the duties due to the United States, and that they are to avoid making seizures of baggage, because of the presence of dutiable articles, unless the intention of fraudulent importation is evident." "Should any passengers' baggage contain dutiable articles to the value of five hundred dollars, it will be sent to the appraiser's store for regular entry and appraisement, as provided by law." It is submitted, in passing, that if the officer had obeyed these plain instructions in the case, and sent the goods to the public store instead of the seizure room, no fraud upon the revenue could possibly have been committed, and the present controversy would not have arisen. The claimants were advised by letter of the shipment. A bill of lading was sent, and invoice in triplicate regularly made and forwarded, according to the act of 1863, and they received their first knowledge of the seizure of the goods when they went to the custom house with the bill of lading and invoice, for the purpose of entry and payment of the duties. The following letter of the secretary of the treasury to the collector of the port of New York, in reference to the seizure of goods belonging to one Levi, made May 8, 1873, was also exhibited, to show the construction which the highest officer of the department has given to the law: "Washington, June 10, 1873. Sir: Your letter of the 23d ultimo is at hand, reporting on the application of M. B. Levi for release of certain new wearing apparel, seized for the reason as reported by the seizing officer—that they were landed as passengers' baggage, and found to be merchandise not on the ship's manifest. The department is unable to see any ground for the seizure in the reason assigned; only goods belonging or consigned to the master, mate, officers, or crew of a vessel are liable to forfeiture when omitted from the manifest, and dutiable goods, found in baggage, are forfeitable only when regular entry has been made in the manner prescribed in section 46, act of March 2, 1799; and such dutiable goods have not been mentioned to the collector at the time of making the entry. As it does not appear that Mr. Levi was an employee of the vessel, or that he made a sworn entry of baggage, it is the opinion of the department that the property should be considered as detained for duty, and not as seized." This is not quoted, of course, as an authority or rule of decision for the court, but to reveal the fact that the mode of procedure of the subordinate officers in this case is not in accordance with the views of their superior.

I have given to the questions involved a careful consideration, because a different construction of the act was most ably and earnestly pressed by the district attorney, and because the result at which I have arrived differs, as I learn, from U. S. v. Three Cases, etc. [Case No. 16,498], from a number of decisions of Judge Blatchford, whose judgment in such matters is entitled to great weight. For this reason, and because serious doubts existed respecting the interpretation of the law, under the peculiar circumstances of the case I shall give a certificate of reasonable cause.

The method of importation adopted by the claimant is exceptional, and is not to be encouraged. It is liable to suggest to the subordinate officers of the customs, suspicions and intentions to defraud when no such intentions were in the mind of the parties. I find none in the facts of the present case, but if I did, it must be remembered that the law does not punish intentions, but attempts to evade its provisions. The verdict must be set aside, and judgment in both cases be entered for the claimants.

UNITED STATES v. NINETY-TWO BARRELS OF RECTIFIED SPIRITS.

[8 Blatchf. 480.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 20, 1871.

FORFEITURE—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY—SEIZURE—JURISDICTION.

1. Jurisdiction to proceed by information for the condemnation of property forfeited under the revenue laws, depends upon the possession of the property, actual or constructive.

2. Property was seized, as forfeited for a violation of the internal revenue laws. Before any information was filed, the property was bonded, under section 48 of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), and surrendered. An information was then filed against the property, counting on a violation of the said 48th section, and also of section 26 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 154). On the trial, in the district court, there was a verdict for the claimant on the count based upon the said 48th section, and a verdict for the United States condemning the property, on the count based upon the said 26th section: Held, that the verdict of condemnation could not be sustained, because, when the information was filed, the property was not, actually or constructively, under seizure, as respected proceedings for a violation of the said 26th section.

3. Nor was the difficulty remedied by the fact, that, after the information was filed, the property was reseized, and then taken possession of by the marshal, on a monition founded on the information, and then bonded by its owner.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.]

Joseph R. Swan, for plaintiffs in error.
William Dorsheimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. Jurisdiction to proceed by information for the condemnation of property forfeited under the revenue laws, depends upon the possession of the property, actual or constructive. There must be a seizure, and that seizure must continue, unless, as in section 48 of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), there is special authority given to the officer or person making the seizure to take a bond for its value, which, in such case, is treated as a substitute for the property itself.

In this case, the property was seized on the 26th of September, 1867, but, before any information was filed, the collector making the seizure had surrendered the possession of the property to the owner. He received, on such surrender, a bond for its value, as authorized by the said 48th section, when a seizure is made for the cause mentioned in that section. By taking such bond and surrendering the property, the collector did not waive the claim to a forfeiture. On filing such bond, it would become the duty of the district attorney to proceed, and the court had jurisdiction of the matter; but, to make such jurisdiction effectual, the process of the court must be served by notice to the parties executing the bond, and, thereupon, the proceeding would have like effect as if, after the seizure, and before the surrender, the proceeding had been commenced, and the property had been taken by the marshal under process In such case, the bond is required as a substitute for the property. But the district attorney, although he filed an information on the 7th day of October, did not proceed as for property bonded under the 48th section. He counted upon a violation of that section as one ground of forfeiture, but no notice was given to the parties executing the bond. The proceedings upon that count failed on the merits, and the judgment against the claimant and his sureties cannot be sustained by the 48th section, not only because that section was not complied with by giving the notice prescribed therein, and because the rules of the court were not observed, but also, and conclusively, because the verdict of the jury was for the claimant upon that count of the information.

If the judgment can be sustained at all, it is by the second count in the information, which is for a violation of the 26th section of the act of July 13th, 1866 (14 Stat. 154). When a seizure is made for a violation of the provisions of that section, the seizing officer has no authority to take a bond and surrender the property. No such bond can, therefore, be regarded as a substitute for the property seized. When, therefore, the information was filed, there was no property actually or constructively in possession, warranting a proceeding by information in rem.

An effort was made to remedy this defect. The collector, being advised that his surrender of the property was improper, made, on the 22d of October, a reseizure, after which a monition, founded on the information theretofore filed, was issued to the marshal, and, by virtue of that process, the marshal took possession of the property. Thereupon, the owner claiming the property applied to the court and gave bond for its value, and obtained possession thereof, according to the customary and proper practice in proceedings to enforce a forfeiture, where the property is liable to perish or to become greatly reduced in value by keeping, &c. This did not preclude the claimant from insisting, as he did, by answer to the information filed before such re-seizure, that, when the information was filed, there was no jurisdiction to proceed for a condemnation of the property under the second count of the information. He was at liberty to defend the suit by all just and legal defences. The owner of goods seized by the marshal is not compelled to submit to their loss by perishing or their being wasted by keeping; nor does his appearance and giving bond to avert that result preclude his alleging that the information filed did not warrant a taking of the property by the marshal.

After the reseizure by the collector, a new information should have been filed, counting upon that seizure and alleging the grounds of forfeiture. Then, the court would have had jurisdiction; and then a verdict of the jury, finding the cause of forfeiture under the 26th section, would have warranted the condemnation of the property, and a judgment against the parties giving bond, (if such bond had, in that case, been given,) would have been regular and legal. But the present judgment stands only upon an information filed against property not under seizure, and of which there was no possession, actual or constructive, warranting condemnation under the 26th section, under which alone the judgment was pronounced. This conclusion necessarily results from the decisions in The Ann, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 289; The Josefa Segunda, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 312; and The Abby [Case No. 14], where it is held, that, to sustain a condemnation, there must be a good subsisting seizure at the time when the information is filed. These cases nor the present regard a forcible, tortious, or fraudulent dispossession of the seizing officer as invalidating or displacing a seizure; and I do not suggest that a proceeding may or may not be valid where the owner voluntarily waives actual seizure and voluntarily appears and answers to an information, as to which see U. S. v. The Henry [Id. 15,352]. Here, the proceeding was altogether hostile. When the information was filed there was no subsisting seizure, and the bond given was necessarily given to save the property.

I am of opinion that the judgment is erroneous and should be reversed.

Case No. 15,893.

UNITED STATES v. NISSLEY et al.

[13 Int. Rev. Rec. 174; 1 Dill. 586.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE — ESTIMATED PRODUCTION OF DISTILLERY.

Under section 20 of the internal revenue act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 125), a distiller is bound to pay taxes on 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery, although this may be on more than the amount of spirits actually produced.

This was an action on a distiller's bond dated 26th day of August, 1869, and containing the usual conditions. The breach is alleged in the following terms: "That the defendant did not comply with all the provisions of the law in relation to his duties as a distiller, in this, to wit: that in operating his distillery in the months of March and April, 1870, he only paid the assessment on the amount of spirits actually produced, whereas he was bound by the acts of congress to pay on 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of the distillery during the period aforesaid, making a difference of $3,164 between the amount of spirits actually produced by the defendant during the said two months, and the amount legally due the United States when estimated upon the basis of 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of the defendant's distillery." To recover this difference the action is brought, and it is alleged that the amount claimed has been duly ascertained and assessed by the assessor of the district. The defendant [Samuel H. Nissley] demurred to the petition, and the question argued thereon was whether the defendant, having paid the tax on all the spirits actually produced, was bound to pay also the difference between that sum and 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery? The opinion of the court (in which all the judges before whom the cause was argued concurred) was orally pronounced by Mr. Justice MILLER, who examined and commented on various sections of the act of July 20, 1868.

Mr. Sapp, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Mr. Lowe, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

[1] [1 Dill. 586, contains only a partial report.]

Mr. Leffingwell, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. It is the opinion of the court that under the 20th section of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 125), the defendant is liable to pay the amount which the government seeks to recover. Under the act, the distiller is bound to pay taxes on all the spirits distilled or produced by him, and hence the various provisions contained in it requiring oaths, books, reports, etc. But in order the further to guard against fraud, the act provides for surveying, estimating and determining the true producing capacity of every distillery (section 10); and it makes it the duty of the assessor each month to determine whether the distiller has accounted in his returns for the preceding month for all the spirits produced by him (section 20), and it prescribes a legislative test or mode of determining the quantity to be accounted for—to wit: forty-five gallons of mash are declared to represent not less than one bushel of grain, and seven gallons of mash not less than one gallon of molasses. If the distiller returns less than the amount this test requires, he is to be assessed for the deficiency. Then follow the concluding words of the section, "but in no case shall the quantity of spirits returned by the distiller, together with the quantity so assessed, be for a less quantity of spirits than 80 per centum of the producing capacity of the distillery as estimated under the provisions of this act." Upon a survey of all the provisions of the statute, the intention of congress seems to be plainly this: The distiller must pay on all he manufactures, even if he produces up to 95 or 100 per cent. of the capacity of the distillery, and therefore we find in the act that the government anxiously provides so many checks against frauds. But to set a limit (which congress deemed to be reasonable) to the extent to which the government might be defrauded, the act declares that the distiller shall absolutely account for 80 per centum of the producing capacity of his distillery. He will have to pay more than this if he actually produces more and it can be shown; but in no event can he escape paying less than 80 per centum of the amount which, as estimated by the act, the distillery has the capacity to produce during the time it is in operation. Demurrer overruled.

Case No. 15,894.

UNITED STATES v. NOAH.

[1 Paine, 368.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April Term, 1825.

SHERIFF — ESCAPE OF DEBTOR — TAKING BOND — ASSIGNMENT OF BOND—SURRENDER BY SURETY—PROCESS.

1. Under the act of congress of 6th January, 1800 [2 Stat. 4], the sheriff of a county is bound to take a bond for the limits, as provided by the state laws, from a prisoner confined on process from the courts of the United States, and false imprisonment would lie on his refusal.

2. Such a bond has in all respects the same incidents and the like legal effect with a bond taken under the state laws.

3. It is assignable, and an assignment discharges the sheriff from liability for a subsequent escape.

4. The United States are expressly named in the act, and bound by it, and an assignment of a bond to them when they are plaintiffs, is valid.

5. The secretary of the treasury having accepted such an assignment, the court presumed that he was authorized, and held the plaintiffs bound by his acceptance.

6. The term "process," in the act, includes executions as well as mesne process.

7. After a prisoner has been enlarged upon a limit bond, the sheriff can confine him again only on the bail's becoming insufficient. He cannot accept a surrender of him—certainly not after an assignment of the bond.

Error to the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New-York.

The plaintiffs brought an action of debt in the court below against the defendant [M. M. Noah] as sheriff of the city and county of New-York, for the escape of one Joseph Wilson, a prisoner committed to his custody on a capias ad satisfaciendum, at the suit of the plaintiffs. At the trial it appeared that the plaintiffs on the 4th of May, 1819, issued a ca. sa. on a judgment against Wilson, directed to the marshal of the district, on which he was taken, and afterwards delivered over under the act of congress to the sheriff of the city and county of New-York. The defendant on coming into office received the prisoner from his predecessor, and on the 10th of April, 1821, enlarged the prisoner upon a bond for the limits, which bond was afterwards assigned under the statute of the state to the plaintiffs, and the assignment accepted by the secretary of the treasury through the district attorney. After the assignment of the bond, the surety offered to surrender the prisoner, and demanded that the bond should be cancelled, both which were refused by the defendant; and subsequently, on the 28th day of November, 1822, the prisoner escaped.

R. Tillotson, U. S. Dist. Atty.

E. W. King, for defendant.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This case comes up on a writ of error to the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New-York, on a judgment in favour of the defendant in error. The suit in the court below, was an action of debt, against the defendant as sheriff of the city and county of New-York, for the escape of one Joseph Wilson, a prisoner committed to his custody on a capias ad satisfaciendum, at the suit of the United States. Wilson, after his commitment, was not permitted to go at large, nor did the alleged escape take place, until he had duly entered into bond for the jail liberties pursuant to the law of the state of New-York; and the only questions which arise here are, whether the sheriff was authorized to take such bond and set the prisoner at liberty, and whether such bond, having been assigned to the plaintiffs, an action can be sustained against the sheriff for the escape.

Congress, by a resolution of the 23d of September, 1789, recommended to the legislatures of the several states, to pass laws making it the duty of the keepers of their jails to receive and safe keep therein, all prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, until they should be discharged by due course of the laws thereof, under the like penalties, as in the case of prisoners committed under the authority of such states respectively. The state of New-York, in 1801 (1 Laws N. Y. 208, K. and R. revision), passed a law making it the duty of the sheriffs of the several cities and counties of the state, to receive into their respective jails, and safely keep, all prisoners who shall be committed to the same, by virtue of any process to be issued under the authority of the United States; and in case any prisoner should escape out of the custody of any sheriff or keeper to whom such prisoner might be committed, such sheriff or keeper is made liable to the like actions and penalties, as he would have been, had such prisoner been committed by virtue of any process issuing under the authority of the state. By an act of congress passed the 6th of January, 1800 (3 Laws [Bior. &. D.] 301 [2 Stat. 4]) it is provided "that persons imprisoned on process issuing from any court of the United States, as well at the suit of the United States, as at the suit of any person or persons in civil actions, shall be entitled to like privileges of the yards or limits of the respective jails. as persons confined in like cases on process from the courts of the respective states are entitled to, and under the like regulations and restrictions."

These laws and the resolution of congress are in pari materia, and to be construed together. The object of congress was to obtain permission from the respective states, to have the use of their jails for the safe-keeping of prisoners committed under process from the courts of the United States. This state granted this permission, and congress adopted the state laws as to the privileges of the yards and limits of the jails, to be allowed to such prisoners. Under the act of congress, Wilson had a right to demand of the sheriff to be admitted to the privilege of the limits in the same manner as if he had been committed on process from a state court, and we must look to the state law to ascertain what that right was; and by that law (1 Rev. Laws, 429) it is expressly made the duty of the sheriff, to permit any prisoner who shall be in custody on civil process only, to go at large within the limits of the jail liberties, provided he gives a bond with sufficient sureties, in double the amount of the sum for which he is confined; conditioned to remain a true and faithful prisoner, and not to escape or go without the limits of the liberties of the jail until discharged by due course of law. Such bond was duly made and delivered to the sheriff; and he no longer had any authority over the person of Wilson, to prevent his going at large wherever he pleased. The sheriff however is not exonerated from an action for the escape, should the prisoner go without the limits, and he must look to his bond for indemnity. Such bonds however are made assignable, and it is made the duty of the sheriff, upon the request of the party at whose suit the prisoner was confined, to assign the bond to such party who is authorized to bring a suit thereon as assignee of the sheriff. If the party does not choose to take an assignment of the bond, but bring an action against the sheriff for the escape, the court where the suit is prosecuted is authorized to stay the proceedings, until the sheriff shall have had a reasonable time to prosecute the bond. The bond in the present case was duly assigned to the plaintiffs, and the assignment accepted by the district attorney of the United States for the Southern district of New-York, he being authorized so to do by the secretary of the treasury, and the escape for which the sheriff was prosecuted took place after such assignment and acceptance.

It is not pretended on the part of the plaintiffs that in the state courts, under like circumstances, an action could be sustained by a private person, against the sheriff for the escape. But it is contended: 1. That the laws of the United States do not authorize the taking of bonds for the privilege of jail liberties. 2. That the sheriff was bound to accept the prisoner Wilson, when offered to be surrendered, and by refusing so to do, made himself liable for the subsequent escape.

Neither of these positions appears to me tenable. The state laws on this subject would not be obligatory upon the courts of the United States, unless such laws had been adopted by the United States; but I think they have been so adopted. It cannot be necessary where the laws of the United States adopt and sanction any state law or practice, to incorporate the detailed provisions of such law or practice; a general reference thereto is sufficient. The act of congress of the 6th of January, 1800, is very general in its provisions, and seems obviously intended to adopt the state law in all respects, so as to place prisoners confined under process from the courts of the United States, on the same footing with those confined on process from the state courts. The words of the act are very broad—"shall be entitled to like privileges of the yards or limits." Prisoners under

United States process have by the express provision of this act a right to demand the liberty of the limits. And what is the sheriff to do? Would it not be false imprisonment in him to refuse this liberty? The act does not to be sure by detailed provisions point out the duty of the sheriff in such case, but refers him to the state laws to ascertain what he is to do; and declares that the privilege is to be granted, "under the like regulations and restrictions" as to prisoners confined in like cases on process from the state courts; and that, as has been already shown, is to admit the prisoner to the privilege of the limits of the jail on his giving the bond and sureties as directed by the statute, which bond must have the same legal effect, as in like cases of prisoners under state process. Any other interpretation would fall short of what was obviously the intention of congress. So long as the state jails were to be used for the United States' prisoners under United States process, it was highly fit and proper they should be dealt with as prisoners under state process. The state officers would then know and understand their duty, and not be likely through ignorance of the law to expose themselves to penalties and consequences not understood. And the law of this state subjects the sheriff in case of escape to the like actions and penalties, as he would have been subject to had such prisoner been committed by virtue of process under the authority of the state. The whole duty of the officer is imposed by the state law, and he is entitled to the protection of that law for his indemnity. No law of the United States could compel him to receive a prisoner arrested under process from the courts of the United States. It was by virtue of the state law that Wilson was received in custody; if not, he was received without authority; and the plaintiffs must look to their own officer, the marshal, for the escape: but no such consequence is involved in the case. The law of the state made it the duty of the sheriff to receive Wilson into the jail of New-York; and the United States law, not only authorized, but made it his duty to admit the prisoner to the privileges of the jail limits, and under the like regulations and restrictions as prisoners confined on process from the state courts are admitted. This was by taking bond with sureties as has been done in this case, and all the other provisions attached to such bond follow of course. It becomes assignable at the request of the party plaintiff in the suit. The act of congress of the 6th of January, 1800, extends in terms to prisoners confined on process issuing from courts of the United States, as well at the suit of the United States as other persons in civil actions, and the law of this state makes the bond assignable to the party in the suit. The United States are the plaintiffs, and the assignment to them is no doubt valid. If they are competent to bring a civil suit, the cause of action must be vested in them, and they are as competent to take a bond or an assignment as a natural person.

The record in the suit against Wilson is not before me, and the present case does not show what was the cause of action. It is fairly to be presumed that it was an action under the direction and control of the secretary of the treasury, or he would not have undertaken to give any authority to accept the assignment of the bond to the sheriff. The United States must necessarily act by some agent, and must be bound by the acts of their authorized agents. I must therefore assume that the assignment of the bond for the jail liberties has been accepted by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were not bound to take an assignment of the bond. They might have resorted to the sheriff for the escape, and left him to look to his bond for indemnity; but having voluntarily taken the assignment, they have waived their remedy against the sheriff; he is chargeable with no negligence or misconduct. There was no escape until after the bond had been assigned; and it would be the extreme of injustice to make the sheriff responsible, after the plaintiffs had taken from him all the means in his hands to indemnify himself.

It was suggested on the part of the plaintiffs in error, that the term "process" in the act of congress of the 6th of January, 1800, does not extend to executions, but is to be restricted to mesne process. For this construction however there can be no foundation. The term is broad enough to embrace all process upon which a party is imprisoned, and there is no reason why it should not be taken in this general sense; and this construction is fortified by the provision in the second section, which is applicable only to cases where the imprisonment is on execution, and the term is then qualified and called process of execution.

2. It remains only to inquire in the second place, whether the defendant, by refusing to receive Wilson in custody when offered to be surrendered by his surety, has made himself responsible for the escape, and upon this question no doubt can be entertained. The sheriff, after having taken the bond for the limits, lost all authority and control over the prisoner except in one single event, which was, if he should discover to his satisfaction, that the bail taken was insufficient; the law then authorizes him to confine the prisoner in jail, until other good and sufficient bail for the liberties be offered. The sheriff had therefore no authority to receive the prisoner or to detain him in custody, unless the bail was insufficient. Such is the plain and obvious construction of the act, and the one that has been given to it by the supreme court of this state, in the case of Sullivan v. Alexander, 19 Johns. 233. But admitting that the surety might, in exoneration of himself surrender the principal in any case, it must be done whilst the sheriff has possession and control over the bond. In the present case the offer to surrender was after the assignment of the bond, which being made assignable by law the sheriff had parted with all his interest in, and control over it. The whole right and interest in the bond had become vested in the plaintiffs, which the sheriff could not devest by any act of his.

I am accordingly of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Case No. 15,895.

UNITED STATES v. NOBLE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1837.

COUNTERFEITING — BANK NOTE — UTTERING — POSSESSION OF OTHER COUNTERFEITS.

1. An indictment under the 18th section of the charter of the late Bank of the United States (April 10, 1816), for uttering as true a forged note of that bank, must aver that it was made "in imitation of, or purporting to be, a bill or note issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the said bank."

2. But without such averment, it may be a good indictment under the 11th section of the penitentiary act for the District of Columbia, of the 2d of March, 1831 [14 Stat. 449].

3. Notwithstanding the expiration of the term for which the corporation was created, its corporate capacity continued to exist, under the 21st section of the charter, for two years, for the final settlement and liquidation of its affairs; and during that period the bank was liable to be injured by the forgery of its notes, and such forgery committed within the two years, was properly averred in the indictment to be "to the prejudice of the right of, and with intent to defraud the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States."

4. An indictment, under the 11th section of the penitentiary act for the District of Columbia, for uttering as true a forged paper writing, must aver that the uttering was to the prejudice of the right of some person, body politic or corporate, or voluntary association, and with intent to defraud such person, body politic, &c.; but quære, whether it is not a good indictment at common law?

5. Upon an indictment for uttering forged bank notes, evidence may be given on the part of the United States, that a parcel of counterfeit checks and drafts on other banks, and others printed on bank paper, not filled up, were found in the defendant's possession.

Four indictments were found by the grand jury gainst the defendant [Nathaniel Green Noble].

(1) The first contained four counts. The 1st count charged that the defendant, on the 16th of July, 1837, "had in his possession and custody, one hundred and thirteen blank notes engraved and printed after the similitude of notes issued by the corporation of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, with intent to use said blanks, and to cause and suffer the same to be used in forging and counterfeiting notes issued by the said corporation, with intent to defraud the said corporation, against the form of the statute," &c. The 2d count was like the first, except that it charged the intent to be "to defraud the person or persons to whom the same should be uttered and passed." The 3d count charged that the defendant "had in his custody and possession, three forged and counterfeited engraved papers, purporting to be bank-notes of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, for the payment of $10 each, after the similitude of the notes of the said corporation of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, with intent to utter and pass the said forged and counterfeited engraved papers, as and for the genuine notes of the said president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, with intent to defraud the said president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States against the form of the statute," &c. The 4th count was like the third, except that the notes were said to be "after the similitude of the notes of the said bank," and "with intent to defraud the person and persons to whom the same should be uttered and passed." The other three indictments, Nos. 154, 155, and 156, were for uttering three forged notes of $10 each, purporting to be bank-notes of the Bank of the United States. These indictments were all alike, except the description of the note in each. Each indictment contained two counts. The 1st count charged that the defendant, on the 16th of July, 1837, passed as true, a certain false, forged, and counterfeited paper writing, purporting to be a bank-note of the Bank of the United States, which note, dated March 14, 1836, is set out verbatim, "to the prejudice of the right of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, he then knowing the same to be false," &c. "against the form of the statute." The 2d count states that the defendant "feloniously did falsely pass as true, a certain other false" &c. "paper writing, purporting," &c. as in the first count, "with intent to defraud one Fontaine D. Merritt, knowing," &c. against the form of the statute, &c. To all these indictments, the defendant filed a general demurrer.

By the 7th section of the charter of the bank (10 April, 1816) the corporation was to continue until the 3d day of March, 1836, and by the 21st section, it is provided, that, "notwithstanding the expiration of the term for which the said corporation is created, it shall be lawful to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purposes of suits, for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal and mixed; but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation." By the 18th section of the charter, "if any person shall pass, utter, or publish, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish, as true, any false, forged, or counterfeited bill or note, purporting to be a bill or note issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the said bank," "every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony, and being thereof convicted by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labor for not less than three years, nor more than ten years; or shall be imprisoned not exceeding ten years, and fined not exceeding five thousand dollars." By the 19th section, "if any person" "shall have in his custody or possession, any blank note or notes, bill or bills, engraved and printed after the similitude of any notes or bills issued by said corporation, with intent to use such blanks, or cause or suffer the same to be used in forging or counterfeiting any of the notes or bills issued by the said corporation," "every such person, being thereof convicted by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labor for a term not exceeding five years; or shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years, and fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars."

Mr. R. J. Brent, for defendant, contended that the first count of these three indictments, was defective as a count upon the 18th section of the charter, because it did not aver that the forged note purported to be a bill or note issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States. That the bank charter expired on the 3d of March, 1836, and therefore the corporation, on the 14th of March, 1836, the date of the forged note, had no power to make such a note. That it was not a good count under the 11th section of the penitentiary act, because the bank, not being in existence on the 16th of July, 1837, when the offence is charged to have been committed, could not be prejudiced; it had no right that could be prejudiced. That the 2d count was bad under the 18th section of the charter, for the same reasons; and was also bad under the penitentiary act, because it is not averred to be to the prejudice of any person or body politic, &c.

Mr. Key, contra, contended that both the counts were good under the penitentiary act, and at common law. By the 11th section of the penitentiary act for the District of Columbia "every person duly convicted of having passed, uttered, or published, or attempted to pass, utter, or publish as true, any such falsely made, uttered, forged, or counterfeited paper writing, or printed paper, to the prejudice of the right of any other person, body politic or corporate, or voluntary association, knowing the same to be falsely made," &c. "with intent to defraud such person, body politic," &c. "shall be sentenced," &c.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. It is contended that the first count of the indictments for uttering the forged notes, is not good under the eighteenth section of the charter of the bank, of the 10th of April, 1816, because it does not aver that the note purported to be a bill or note issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States; and because, neither on the 14th of March, 1836, the date of the note, nor on the 16th of July, 1837, when the offence was committed, had the Bank of the United States any legal existence; its charter having been limited to the 3d of March, 1836; nor had the bank, then, any right or authority to issue any such note. And that it is not a good count under the penitentiary act for the District of Columbia, because the bank, having no legal existence, could neither be prejudiced nor injured. I am of opinion that the first count is bad under the eighteenth section of the charter, because it does not aver that the forged note purported to be a bill or note issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the said bank. But I think it a good count under the penitentiary act; because I consider the bank as still in existence for this purpose; that is, to protect itself during the period of two years from the 3d of March, 1836, given by the twenty-first section of the charter, which declares, that "notwithstanding the expiration of the term for which the said corporation is created, it shall be lawful to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits; for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation; and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed." It is not said by whom the corporate capacity may be used for those purposes. The use is not confined to the corporation. Their capacity to sue, and to be sued, continues. The United States may use it for the purpose of vindicating the laws of the United States, and for the punishment of offenders. The corporation may use it for all purposes necessary to the final settlement and liquidation of their affairs. In order that such settlement should be justly made, it is necessary that they should be protected from forgeries, by which they may unquestionably be injured. They have still the capacity to be injured; and, therefore, it was right and correct in this count, to aver that the passing of the forged note was to the prejudice of the right of, and with intent to defraud the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States.

2. The second count is not good under the eighteenth section of the bank charter, and, I presume, was not framed in reference to that section. Nor is it good under the penitentiary act, because it does not aver that the act was done to the prejudice of the right of any person or body politic. I am inclined, however, to think that it may be supported as a count at common law; but I shall be willing to hear a motion in arrest of judgment if the verdict should be against the defendant upon that count only.

There is another indictment (No. 146), against this defendant, the two first counts of which are framed upon the nineteenth section of the bank charter, for having in his possession blank notes engraved and printed after the similitude of notes issued by the corporation of the Bank of the United States with intent to use them in forging and counterfeiting notes issued by that corporation; the first count says with intent to defraud the said corporation; the second count says, with intent to defraud the person or persons to whom the same should be uttered and passed. I do not see any valid objection to these two counts. The third and fourth are for having in his possession three forged and counterfeited engraved papers purporting to be bank notes of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States for the payment of ten dollars each, after the similitude of the notes of the said corporation, with intent to utter and pass them as true with intent (in the third count) to defraud the Bank of the United States; and (in the fourth count) with intent to defraud the person or persons to whom the same should be passed, contrary to the form of the statute, &c. I do not know under what statute these third and fourth counts have been framed. They are not good at common law.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred as to the indictment No. 146, and as to the second count of the other indictment; but not as to the first count; because he thought the Bank of the United States was not in existence for this purpose, and therefore could not be prejudiced or injured. (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.)

Demurrer overruled as to the two first counts in the indictment No. 146; and sustained as to the third and fourth counts. Sentence, one week's imprisonment and one dollar fine only; MORSELL, Circuit Judge, being very doubtful as to the first count, which charged the intent to be to defraud the Bank of the United States. As to the other indictments, the demurrer was overruled, and the defendant was permitted to plead the general issue.

Upon the trial, THE COURT (nem. con.) permitted evidence to be given by the United States, that a parcel of counterfeit checks and drafts on other banks, and others printed on bank-paper, not filled up, were found in the defendant's possession. See U. S. v. Shuster [Case No. 16,287] at March term, 1835, in this court, where the court permitted the United States to give evidence that certain instruments for picking locks, &c., were found upon the prisoner.

Verdict, "guilty upon the four indictments"; and the prisoner was sentenced, in full court as follows: Upon the two first counts in the indictment No. 146, fine and imprisonment, as mentioned above. Upon the indictment No. 154, to the penitentiary for two years next after the expiration or other termination of his term of imprisonment in No. 146. Upon the indictment No. 155, for two years next after the expiration, or other termination of his term of imprisonment in No. 154; and upon the indictment No. 156, for three years next after the expiration or other termination of his term of imprisonment in No. 155; making seven years in all.

UNITED STATES v. NOBLOM et al.[1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Feb. 18, 1878.

CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD THE UNITED STATES — TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS —PRESUMPTIONS—EVIDENCE OF GOOD CHARACTER—OVERT ACTS.

[1. A conspiracy to do an unlawful act, formed in one district, and in part executed there, is punishable in that district, though it was consummated in other parts of the United States.]

[2. In a criminal case, where the syndic of a firm is charged with a conspiracy to defraud the United States in preferring a claim under the captured and abandoned property act, there is no invincible presumption that he had acquired all the knowledge from the books of the firm which a proper execution of his trust would have required him to gain; but the question of his knowledge is one for the jury to determine, upon a consideration of the character of the books, the degree of access which defendant had to them, the magnitude of the claim, the duty defendant owed both to the estate and the government to make a satisfactory examination before making affidavit of his belief in the validity of the claim, etc.]

[3. Evidence of good character may always be considered by the jury, and should lead them to scrutinize the evidence against the defendant, and, further, should be considered as an independent fact in his favor; but if, after giving such testimony this effect, the whole evidence in the case is sufficient to warrant a conviction, the jury are not authorized to withhold from the other evidence its proper effect, or to refuse to draw from it the legitimate conclusions.]

[4. An agreement whereby a commissioner taking evidence in support of a claim against the United States is to have a contingent fee of $5,000 is open to very serious objections, but is not necessarily a guilty agreement.]

[5. Where the existence of an unlawful conspiracy is proved, an overt act by one of the parties thereto becomes the act of all, and they are all alike guilty.]

[This was an indictment against Augustus P. Noblom, Henry Peychaud, R. H. Shannon, and others, charging them with conspiring to defraud the government.]

[1] [Not previously reported.]

George S. Lacy, U. S. Dist. Atty., and John S. Blair, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the United States.

Wm. H. Hunt, for Henry Peychaud.

John E. Austin, for R. H. Shannon.

BILLINGS, District Judge (charging jury). The indictment charges that the defendants Henry Peychaud and Robert H. Shannon conspired with each other, and with the several other persons named in the indictment, and with divers other persons to the grand jury unknown, to defraud the United States of America of the sum of $296,000, the property and the moneys of the said United States; that the firm of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. had preferred a false claim against the government of the United States in the court of claims for the proceeds of 1,851 bales of cotton, upon which they alleged they had made advances, and which they had the right to reduce to possession, the same having been seized by the federal military forces as captured or abandoned property; that said cotton was situated on the plantations of various parties, planters, in the parishes of Avoyelles, St. Landry, and St. Martin, within the state of Louisiana; that the defendant Henry Peychaud subsequently became the syndic of the said firm of Bellocq, Noblom & Co., and on the 23d day of March, 1874, filed an amended petition in the court of claims as such syndic, in which he alleged that the firm of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. were the owners of the said cotton; that all of said cotton was purchased and paid for, or taken for advances on the same, during the years 1861 and 1862, and prior to the 1st day of May, 1862. This petition is sworn to in the following language: "Personally appeared, before me, Henry Peychaud, syndic aforesaid, a resident of the city of New Orleans, La., who, being first duly sworn, deposeth and saith that he is the claimant above described in the above petition; that no assignment or transfer of said claim, nor any part thereof, nor any interest thereof, has been made, except as in said petition stated; that the claimants are still entitled to the amount therein claimed from the United States, after allowing all just credits and offsets; and that he believes the facts as stated in the said petition are true." The indictment then proceeds to allege that, by the presentation of false untruthful testimony and deposition of witnesses, and of false and untrue exhibits and prooofs presented to the judges of the said court of claims, a judgment was fraudulently obtained by the defendants for the said sum of $296,000 against the government of the United States; that said Henry Peychaud subsequently received the payment of the said money. The indictment then proceeds to allege various overt acts of the several persons charged with this conspiracy, who, it is alleged, well knew that the whole claim was a fraud upon the government; that said Peychaud appropriated, of said moneys, the sum of $50,000, to his own use; that, in furtherance of the said conspiracy, the said Henry Peychaud did unlawfully agree and contract with Theodore Vallade, one of the defendants, to give said Vallade a valuable consideration, to the grand jury unknown; that he, the said defendant Vallade, should appear as a witness in said case, and give testimony which should be used in said court of claims, in order to procure the said judgment; that the testimony of the said Vallade was in all material matters false and untrue, and was fraudulently obtained and used by the said defendant Henry Peychaud. Other overt acts are charged in the indictment to have been committed by the other alleged conspirators, which it is not necessary for me here to enumerate. The indictment alleges that the conspiracy on the part of the defendants was formed within the district of Louisiana, and was carried out and consummated in part within this district, and in part within various other districts of the United States.

So far as relates to the time at which the offense is alleged to have been committed, I charge you, as matter of law, that a conspiracy is a continuous thing; and, if you find that a conspiracy has been established in the manner and form as alleged, and that the conspiracy continued down to and after the 10th day of June, A. D. 1874, the date charged in the indictment, and that the overt acts charged were committed subsequently, and during the continuance of the conspiracy, that in that case the offense charged has been committed. As to the place of the commission of the offense the general rule, under the constitution of the United States, is that a party can be tried for an offense only within the district in which it was committed. The exception is that, where an offense has been commenced in one district and consummated in another, the venue may be laid and the trial may be had in either district. If you find, as a fact, that the conspiracy to do the unlawful act alleged in the indictment was formed within the district of Louisiana, and in part executed here, and that the offense was consummated in the United States, but in some other district than the district of Louisiana, but that all that was done, was done in pursuance of the conspiracy here formed, then, so far as relates to venue, the offense is cognizable by the United States courts within this district.

This indictment is framed under section 5440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that, "if any two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner, or for any purpose, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not more than $10,000, and to imprisonment for not more than two years."

It was incumbent upon the prosecution, in order to establish the case against these defendants, to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that there was a conspiracy on the part of these two defendants, or one of them, with some one or more of the persons named in the indictment, to defraud the government of the United States, by means of the collection of this claim, through and by means of the judgment obtained in the court of claims, and, further, that some one or more of the overt acts charged in the indictment were committed by one or more of the persons alleged and proved to have been conspirators.

First, as to the existence of the conspiracy. I will give you the definition of the nature of a criminal conspiracy, and an exposition of the evidence which may be adduced in support of it, in the language of one of the ablest of English writers upon the subject of criminal law: "The evidence in support of an indictment for conspiracy is generally circumstantial, and it is not necessary to prove any direct concert, or even any meeting of the conspirators, as the actual fact of conspiracy may be collected from the collateral circumstances of the case. Although the common design is the root of the charge, yet it is not necessary to prove that the defendants came together, and actually agreed in terms to have the common design, and to pursue it by common means, and so to carry it into execution, because in many cases of the most clearly established conspiracies there are no means of proving any such thing. If, therefore, two persons pursue by their acts the same object, often by the same means, one performing one part of an act, and the other another part of the same act, so as to complete it, with a view to the attainment of the object they were pursuing, the jury are at liberty to draw the conclusion that they have been engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object." The conspiracy is set forth in the indictment with great fullness, and it is alleged that it consisted in the combination for the presentation and collection from the United States through the court of claims of a false and fraudulent claim between divers persons and these defendants. In the first place it must be shown that there was this combination for that object; that is, to effect the presentation and collection of this claim through the defendant Peychaud, as syndic of the estate of Bellocq, Noblom & Co.; (2) that this claim was false; (3) that its false character was known to the defendants.

The next question, then, for the jury to determine, is, excluding for a moment the question of lawfulness or unlawfulness, was there a combination, on the part of the defendants and others, in which each labored with the common purpose of collecting this claim? The evidence which has been put before you by the government tends to show that the defendant Peychaud, as syndic, presented the claim; that the evidence was taken before the defendant Shannon under circumstances and with an agreement upon which I shall hereafter speak. The evidence on this point is not contradicted, nor attempted to be contradicted. If, then, this combination existed to collect this claim, the next question for the jury to consider is, was this a false and fraudulent claim? In this connection I will call the attention of the jury to the statute of the United States under which all petitioners or claimants have to act in the court of claims. The act of February 26, 1853, being an act entitled "An act to prevent frauds upon the treasury of the United States" (10 Stat. 170), in section 1, provides that "all transfers and assignments hereafter made of any claim upon the United States, or any part or share thereof, or interest therein, shall be null and void unless the same shall be made and executed after the allowance of such claims and the ascertainment of the amount due and the issuing of the warrant for the payment thereof." And the act to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, found in 12 Stat. 820, provides that "any person claiming to have been the owner of any such captured and abandoned property may at any time within two years, etc., prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the court of claims and on proof to the satisfaction of the court of his ownership of the said property and his right to the proceeds thereof, after the deduction of any expenses, may receive the proceeds."

It will thus be seen that to have enabled the defendant Peychaud to have brought the claim which he, as syndic of the firm of Bellocq, Noblom & Co., presented to the court of claims, within these statutes, the interest of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. in this cotton must have existed at the time of its seizure by the federal military forces, to wit, in March, 1862, and that any transfer of any claim against the United States, arising out of the seizure of this cotton, after that time, or the transfer of any receipt or voucher therefor, would have been in violation of the statute. There has been no evidence offered that there was any transfer of any interest in the claim, from those who held the same, at a date after the issuance of a warrant in payment of the same by the treasury department, and the statute renders void all transfer of claims unless they are made after the issuance of the warrant for their payment. It further appears, by these statutes, that any person seeking to recover the proceeds of captured or abandoned property, which had been seized by the United States and sold, and the proceeds paid into the treasury, must establish, in the first place, his ownership of said property, and his right to these proceeds. It was under these statutes that the claim of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. was presented by the defendant Peychaud, and was carried through the court of claims.

It is insisted by the prosecution that, with the exception of a few inconsiderable lots of this cotton, the firm of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. had no right, title, or interest in or to any of this cotton at the time of its seizure by the authorities of the United States. For the purpose of supporting this view, it has brought before you the testimony of many of the persons enumerated in the tabular statement attached both to the original and amended petition, from whose plantations the cotton was taken, who testified that they owned the same, and they have in express terms denied that the firm of Bellocq, Noblom & Co., or the defendant Peychaud, as their syndic, had, at any time, any right, title, or interest in or to this property or its proceeds. There has been no contradictory testimony introduced to show any title in Bellocq, Noblom & Co., or in the defendant Peychaud as their syndic, excepting that which comes from the evidence given in the court of claims and the books of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. If the jury are satisfied that the claim of Bellocq, Noblom & Co., as presented by them, and by the defendant Peychaud as their syndic, to the whole of this 1,851 bales of cotton and its proceeds, was a valid claim, then that conclusion would end this case, and your verdict must be, "Not guilty"; for there could be no conspiracy to present and collect a fraudulent claim where the claim alleged to have been presented and collected was valid. But if, on the other hand, the jury are satisfied that the claim presented originally by Bellocq, Noblom & Co., and subsequently by Henry Peychaud, the defendant, as their syndic, was false or fraudulent, in whole or in part,—that is to say, if any portion of the 1,851 bales of cotton claimed by them, or him, the proceeds of which was recovered and received by him, did not belong to Bellocq, Noblom & Co.,—then to that extent the claim was false; and the jury will have to pass to the second question, did the defendants, at the time when they performed their several acts in the presentation or collection of this claim, know of the false and fraudulent character of the same?

First, as relates to the defendant Peychaud. I shall first present to you in a summary manner the leading facts which the government has attempted to establish in this case, and then shall present to you the leading facts which the defense has attempted to establish. The government, in the first place, has offered in evidence the amended petition of Henry Peychaud, in which he avers, not only, as in the original petition of Bellocq, Noblom & Co., that the said firm had made advances upon this cotton, with the right to reduce the same into possession, but he avers that they became the owners, and that all of the said cotton was purchased by them or taken for advances on the same, and possession taken thereof, during 1861 and 1862, prior to the 1st day of May, 1862. The second fact which the government has brought before you is an agreement between Peychaud, as syndic, and Bouchard and Bernard. In connection with this agreement, the government has offered the testimony of Bouchard. So far as his testimony is concerned, I deem it my duty to say to you that an accomplice or co-conspirator, who is called as a witness, and testifies to his own criminal acts, does not occupy the position of an ordinary witness, so far as relates to credibility. He may tell the truth in spite of his proclaimed turpitude, but, as a rule, he is not to be believed, unless and except so far as his evidence is corroborated by that of other witnesses, or by independent circumstances. It is, therefore, to the other evidence adduced by the government from other sources that your attention will be largely directed. As to this agreement between Peychaud, as syndic, and Bouchard and Bernard, it is not denied that the agreement was executed by the defendant as syndic. The agreement itself recites that it is for the services which Bouchard and Bernard were to render in this case, and Peychaud, as syndic, agrees to give them two-thirds of the amount which he should collect from the United States by means of the suit, they paying the fees of the various attorneys; that is to say, that the estate of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. was to receive one-third of the amount collected from the government, and Bouchard and Bernard the remaining two-thirds, they paying the various attorneys. It is for the jury to say what was the real purpose of this agreement, and what inference should be drawn from its execution, and whether a syndic, in a case where there were three lawyers already employed, and where he believed there was no fraud in a claim, would have engaged the services of a man of such reputation as the evidence shows Bouchard to have been, and would have left the conduct of such an important cause to him, and would have reserved to the estate only one-third of the amount recovered. There was a second agreement offered in evidence by the government, which is a mere reiteration of this one for the most part, and which seems to have been written with the view of securing to the parties named as attorneys a lien or privilege upon the judgment which should be recovered.

The next piece of evidence which the prosecution has introduced was the agreement between Bouchard and Bernard on the one part and Theodore Vallade on the other part, wherein it is recited that Vallade is the owner of 263 bales of the cotton, for the recovery of the proceeds of which suit had been brought by Bellocq, Noblom & Co., and wherein they agree that they will pay to him one-third of what may be recovered by the estate of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. on these 263 bales. This agreement is executed by Bouchard and Bernard, but is witnessed by Peychaud. The government has attempted to establish that there was an impediment as to these 263 bales of cotton arising from the claim of Vallade thereto, and that this agreement was made with him to remove that impediment; that, in pursuance of this agreement, Vallade appeared and testified that the cotton which this agreement recites belonged to him was the property of Bellocq, Noblom & Co.; that Peychaud recovered the amount of the proceeds of these 263 bales; and that there was paid to Vallade one-third of this amount, being $14,848. If you are satisfied that Peychaud, the defendant, when he witnessed this agreement, or at any time before he collected the money upon the judgment which was rendered in the court of claims, knew what it contained, and knew that this cotton belonged to Vallade; that he afterwards used, or allowed to be used, in support of the claim which he as syndic preferred and collected, the testimony of Vallade, who testified in substance that the cotton belonged to Bellocq, Noblom & Co.; or if he ascertained these facts after the testimony had been used, but before he had made the collection,—then, and in either of these cases, so far at least as these 263 bales are concerned, he knew of the false and fraudulent character of the claim of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. thereto.

In connection with this, the government has urged the payment by Peychaud of $5,000 to the defendant Shannon, of which I shall speak more particularly in another place, and of his leaving in the hands of Joseph S. Bouchard, as the attorney of A. Bouchard and Bernard, $14,848, which, according to the receipt produced by the defendant Peychaud, signed by Joseph S. Bouchard as the attorney of his father, was "to meet other demands." You will, in this connection, recall the testimony of Father Subileau, and you will say, from the amount left in Bouchard's hands,—that is to say, from the numerical figures of that amount, as compared with the net proceeds of 263 bales,—and from all the circumstances in evidence before you, whether Mr. Peychaud knew that this amount was to go to Vallade. Whatever you find to be the fact as to this money being left in the hands of young Bouchard, you will consider, as reasonable men, in connection with this agreement of Vallade, witnessed by Mr. Peychaud, and with the other facts in this case. It is immaterial whether Peychaud paid the money to Vallade, or whether it was paid by Bouchard, provided Peychaud knew of Vallade's ownership of the cotton, of Vallade's testimony, and of its use in a suit against the United States wherein he was the plaintiff. It is for you to consider why the defendant Peychaud was selected to be the attesting witness to this agreement; whether he knew of the terms of the agreement which he witnessed; whether Vallade did or did not require that he should witness it, in order that, since the money was to go through the hands of Peychaud, he should have that added security that the proportion covenanted to be paid to him should reach its destination. You will observe that this paper recites that Vallade was the owner of these 263 bales of cotton to which Peychaud, as syndic, was at the time of its execution urging his claim in the court of claims, and that the agreement goes on to provide for the distribution of the proceeds in case there is a recovery by Peychaud as the property of Bellocq, Noblom & Co.

I think these are the chief circumstances which the government has attempted to establish. On the other hand, the defense has adduced evidence tending to establish that the conduct of the cause pending in the court of claims was left chiefly to Bouchard. The books of Bellocq. Noblom & Co. have been introduced before you, as well as the evidence of several experts who have examined the same. And, lastly, by the testimony of many of our most excellent citizens, has been shown the high character of the defendant Peychaud, for a life of 60 years passed in their midst previous to this transaction. So far as the defendant's knowledge from the books of Bellocq, Noblom & Co. is concerned, in a criminal case there is no invincible presumption that a man had acquired the knowledge which a proper execution of his trust would have required him to gain. It is not a matter of arbitrary presumption. You are to take the books as they existed. You are to take the degree of access which the defendant Peychaud had to them, the magnitude of the claim, the duty which the defendant Peychaud owed, alike to the estate and to the government, to have made a satisfactory examination of this claim before he proceeded to make any affidavit as to his belief of its validity, and all the circumstances which have been given in evidence, and then are to say whether the defendant Peychaud knew, directly or indirectly,—that is, of himself or through others,—what the books said on this subject, and what was his belief as to the validity of this claim, both at the time when he made the affidavit, and during all the intervening time down to the period when he collected the money. If, at any period of this time, he believed the claim, or any portion of it, was fraudulent, then all his subsequent acts would be affected by this knowledge, and from that moment he would be deemed, in law, to have joined the conspiracy to collect a fraudulent claim.

So far as relates to the proof of good character or the reputation enjoyed by the defendant Peychaud, the good character of an accused person is always a fact to be considered by the jury. It should lead the jury to scrutinize the evidence adduced in support of the commission of the crime charged, and their own process of reasoning upon that subject; and, further, should be considered as an independent fact in favor of the accused. Nevertheless, if, after this application of the testimony in favor of good character has been made, and this effect given to it, the whole evidence in the case is sufficient to warrant a conviction, the jury are not authorized to withhold from the other evidence its proper effect, or to refuse to draw from it the legiti-mate conclusions. While good character is always an element to be considered, and there are cases in which it would furnish evidence which would create a reasonable doubt of guilt, there are also cases in which the former spotless character of the accused could not overcome the weight of testimony in support of guilt. That is to say, good character is always to be considered and weighed, but it is to be considered and weighed along with the other testimony, and must not be allowed to obscure from your observation the other testimony in the case. Again, it is urged by the defense that the defendant Peychaud was a mere syndic in his action with reference to this claim. That is to say, it is urged that he presented this claim, for the most part, as the representative of the estate of Bellocq, Noblom & Co., and those who were associated with him. If the evidence fails to show that any portion of the proceeds of this cotton was intended to be retained, or was retained, by the defendant Peychaud, beyond his commission as syndic, this fact does not obliterate the other facts you will find to have been established; but it is to be considered by you, along with all these other facts. It diminishes the strength of the motive for the commission of the crime charged, but, beyond that, leaves the other facts in the case such as you find the evidence to have established them to be.

Next, as to the defendant Shannon. If the jury find there was a combination, and that the claim was fraudulent, then, as to the defendant Shannon the same inquiry must be made as I have stated should be made with reference to the defendant Peychaud, as to his knowledge of the falsity and fraudulent character of this claim. The prosecution have introduced evidence tending to show the fact that the defendant Shannon had an agreement by which he was to receive a contingent fee of $5,000 for taking the evidence in this case. An agreement of this nature, by a commissioner, with reference to the taking of testimony is open to very serious objections; that it would expose the commissioner to severe criticism, and would open a wide door for temptation to him. But it is not, necessarily, a guilty agreement. The jury are to judge whether, in this case, the agreement was evidence of any knowledge of the falsity of the claim, or of any understanding between the defendant Shannon and those with whom he made it that there was to be anything unfair or partial in the manner of taking the testimony. Bouchard has made a statement as to what passed between him and the defendant Shannon. In connection with the evidence relating to the defendant Peychaud, I have already laid down the legal propositions which should be considered by the jury in weighing the testimony of a witness such as is Bouchard. There is the testimony of the witness Wilde, and there is a letter from the defendant Taylor, and also a letter from the defendant to J. S. Bouchard, which I think comprises all the evidence which has been urged against the defendant Shannon. On the other hand, you have heard the evidence of the younger Mr. Conrad, and of Mr. Rouse, who represented the government, and that of Judge Emerson, and you have had the manner in which the depositions were taken shown to you from the depositions themselves.

In regard to the defendant Shannon no evidence as to general character was introduced. In such a case the law assumes that the character of the accused is of ordinary fairness and respectability. The attorneys who have testified have testified that the method and manner of the defendant Shannon were, so far as they could perceive, proper and impartial, and it is for you to say, upon the whole evidence, whether you are satisfied that the defendant Shannon had a knowledge of the falsity of the claim, and fraudulently aided in establishing a false claim. If you find, from the evidence, that the defendant Shannon knew that the claim was a false one, then he had a guilty knowledge. If you find that he did not know that the claim was false or fraudulent, and that the evidence taken before him was, so far as he knew, truthful evidence, then he has not been affected with any guilty knowledge. If you find that the combination is proved, and that the fraudulent character of the claim has been established, and that either or both of these defendants had no knowledge of the false or fraudulent character of the claim, then they are, or the one that had not such a guilty knowledge is, entitled to an acquittal. If, on the other hand, you find that the conspiracy existed, and that both of these defendants, or either of them, knew of the false and fraudulent character of this claim at the time they participated and aided in presenting or collecting it, then the remaining question will be, were any of the overt acts charged in the indictment committed? Because the rule of evidence in connection with a criminal conspiracy is that, where an unlawful combination is established, the act of one of the parties is the act of all. If, for example, the conspiracy has been established, and you find that the defendant Peychaud took out of the treasury of the United States this money charged to have been taken out by him, or any portion of it, during the continuance and in furtherance of the conspiracy, then his act is the act of all those whom you find, from the evidence, to have been conspirators, and who are named in the indictment.

So far as the degree of proof is concerned, it is the duty of the prosecution to establish the case by evidence which excludes a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. But the doubt which the prosecution must remove is an actual and substantial doubt, and not a mere possibility or speculation. Says one of the most eminent of the American jurists: "It is not a mere possible doubt, because everything relating to human affairs depending upon moral evidence is open to some possible or imaginary doubt. It is that state of the case which, after an entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of the jurors in that condition that they cannot say, with a full and abiding conviction, as to the moral certainty of the truth of the charge."

The importance of the duty which you, as jurors, have been called upon to discharge, when duly considered, can scarcely be overestimated. Without trials by jury, on the one hand, would disappear much of the security of the citizen from the unjust and tyrannical forms of investigation, and the consequent imposition of undeserved punishment. On the other hand, without the fearless consideration of causes by juries, the government could not long administer its criminal laws, and its power to protect all would thus be seriously paralyzed. Much, therefore, not alone of the right of innocence to be protected, but of the efficacy of the law as a protective agency, rests in the intelligence and integrity with which jurors render their verdicts. Your verdict should not be the exponent of your sympathies, either for the government or for the accused, but should be a conscientious declaration of your judgment upon the evidence as it has been adduced before you.

UNITED STATES v. NOLTON.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. July 11, 1867.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — SMUGGLING FROM CANADA — MANIFEST.

1. An indictment for smuggling goods from Canada into the United States, charging that the goods were brought in without an invoice, and without the payment of duties, cannot be maintained under the 19th section of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 565).

2. Such importations are governed by the act of March 2, 1821 (3 Stat. 616), which requires only the delivery to the collector of the verified manifest of goods imported from an adjacent foreign territory and the payment of the duties.

This was a motion to quash an indictment [against George B. Nolton] for smuggling, founded on the 19th section of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 565). The gravamen of the indictment was, smuggling from Canada into the collection district of Cape Vincent, in the Northern district of New York. The indictment charged, that the goods were liable to duties and should have been invoiced and the duties paid, but that they were brought in without an invoice and without the payment of duties.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The objection to the indictment is, that the 19th section of the act of August 30, 1842, does not apply to the case of goods imported from an adjacent foreign territory; and that such importations are governed by the act of March 2, 1821 (3 Stat. 616), which requires only that a manifest of the goods, duly verified, shall be delivered to the collector, and the duties paid, and that, in case of default, the goods shall be forfeited, together with the vessel or vehicle, and the party be subject to a penalty of $400, altered and increased by the act of March 3, 1823 (3 Stat. 781), to a penalty of four times the value of the goods. The law has now been changed by the 4th section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 179).

As the alleged offence was committed before the act of 1866 was passed, I do not see how this indictment can be upheld, and must, therefore, grant the motion to quash it. See U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,319].

[1 Cranch, C. C. 411.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1807.

CRIMINAL LAW—PUNISHMENT.

Where a statute merely alters the punishment of a common-law offence, the statutory punishment may be inflicted, although the indictment does not conclude contra formam statuti.

The defendant [Isaac Norris] was convicted of manslaughter upon an indictment for the murder of John Doyle, on the 17th of May, 1807, and a question arose whether, on a common-law indictment, the statutory punishment can be inflicted.

The judgment of THE COURT was that he pay a fine of twenty dollars, and be imprisoned for twelve calendar months, including this day (June 26, 1807), and stand further committed until his fine and costs should be paid. This sentence was under the act of congress of 30th April, 1790 (1 Stat. 112). The court being unanimously of opinion that where the statute does not add any circumstance to the common-law description of the offence, but merely alters the punishment, it is not necessary that the indictment should conclude contra formam statuti, to authorize the court to give judgment according to the statute.

The following opinion of CRANCH, Chief Judge, was prepared but not read in court, as DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, had some doubts as to some of the arguments therein used:

This is a verdict for manslaughter, on an indictment at common law for murder; and the question is, what punishment can the court inflict? (1) It is a felony by the common law, but is within the benefit of clergy by 25 Ed. III., St. 3, c. 4; and no subsequent statute having taken away the benefit, the party is entitled to it. (2) But sundry statutes have annexed certain conditions to its allowance to the secular clergy and to mere laymen. Thus by 4 Hen. VII., c. 13, a person not in orders was to be marked with a T on the brawn of the left thumb in open court. And by the 18 Eliz. c. 7, § 3, he may be imprisoned at the discretion of the court, not exceeding one year; which was in lieu of the purgation and punishment which the ecclesiastical courts were supposed formerly to inflict. These statutes were all in force at the time of the first emigration to Maryland; and there is no doubt that the statute of 25 Ed. III., c. 4, extending and confirming the benefit of clergy, was by experience found applicable to the local and other circumstances of the inhabitants. Nor is there any reason to doubt that the statutes of 4 Hen. VII. c. 13, and 18 Eliz. c. 7, § 3, were likewise found applicable. Many persons have been admitted to the benefit of clergy in Maryland, and burnt in the hand, which can only be done by virtue of the statute of 4 Hen. VII., and the subsequent statutes which explain the mode of marking to be by burning. I am therefore of opinion that the courts in Maryland may, in their discretion, by virtue of the statute of 18 Eliz. c. 7, § 3, superadd imprisonment to the burning in the hand, upon allowing the benefit of clergy. Under the act of assembly of Maryland of 1793, c. 57, §§ 10 and 28, the courts of that state had, on the 27th of February, 1801, a power either to give judgment of burning in the hand, and imprisonment under the statute of Elizabeth, or, in their discretion, to sentence the offender to labor on the public roads; and that, in cases where the indictments did not conclude against the form of the statute.

Another question arises, whether the court cannot lawfully render such judgment against the prisoner as is prescribed by the act of congress of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 113). Under this head the first question, which arises, is whether that act is in force within the District of Columbia. Its words are,—"If any person shall, within any fort or other place, or district of country, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, commit the crime of manslaughter, and shall be thereof convicted, such person shall be imprisoned not exceeding three years, and fined not exceeding one thousand dollars." The District of Columbia is a district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Prima facie, therefore, the law applies; and it has never been expressly repealed. It has been said to be impliedly repealed by the act of 27th February, 1801 (2 Stat. 103), which adopts in toto the laws of Maryland. But the adoption of the law of Maryland would not have that effect unless the law of Maryland were either expressly or virtually repugnant to the act of congress of 1790. But the provisions of the two laws are not repugnant to each other. By the act of Maryland the punishment is burning in the hand and imprisonment, or hard labor. By the act of congress, fine and imprisonment. I imagine both laws may stand together, and the court may adopt either mode of punishment in their discretion. This court has often decided that larceny may be punished under this same act of congress, and such has been the constant practice ever since the change of jurisdiction. But here we are met by what is called a settled principle of criminal law, that the court cannot, upon a common-law indictment impose a statutory punishment. The authority relied upon is 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 116, who says,—"It seems that judgment on a statute shall in no case be given on an indictment which does not conclude contra formam statuti." And again he says, in the same section, "it seems to be taken as a common ground, that a judgment by statute, shall never be given on an indictment at common law." These dicta seem to be only inferences which he draws by reasoning from analogy to the case of an action upon a statute; but he cites no case of an indictment in which the principle has been decided. If he is to be understood as the counsel for the prisoner seem to understand him, he is contradicted by the English every-day practice. By 5 Anne, c. 6, a person convicted of theft or larceny may be committed to the house of correction, to be there kept at hard labor not less than six months nor more than two years; and by 4 Geo. I. c. 11, and 6 Geo. I. c. 23, felonious stealing of goods is punishable by transportation; and yet the indictments for those offences never conclude against the form of those statutes, although those punishments are generally inflicted; and there is no case in which the right of the court to inflict such punishments, upon such indictments, has been questioned. I understand Hawkins as referring only to such statutes as add some circumstance to the common-law definition of the crime. But where the statute uses only the common-law technical name or description of the offence, and declares it shall be punished in a certain manner, there the indictment need not conclude against the form of that statute to justify the infliction of the statutory punishment. The offence, in such case, is really not against the statute, but against the common law. The statute does not create the offence, nor add any circumstance to its description. The term used by the act of congress is simply "manslaughter," the technical common-law name of the crime of felonious homicide, without malice prepense. So under the act of Maryland, of 1793, it was never supposed necessary that the indictment should conclude against the form of the statute in order to authorize the court to impose the statutory punishment of hard labor. I am therefore of opinion that the court may, in its discretion, sentence the prisoner to be burnt in the hand and imprisoned under the statute 18 Eliz. c. 7, § 3, or to hard labor upon the roads, under the Maryland law, or to fine and imprisonment under the act of congress.

UNITED STATES v. NOTT.

[1 McLean, 499.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1839.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSIONS—OFFENCES AGAINST POSTAL LAWS.

1. Confessions to be excluded from the jury, must have been made by the prisoner under some hope of advantage, or extorted by some apprehension of danger. Some of the modern cases in England, have perhaps, been carried further than the reason of the rule requires, in refusing to admit, as evidence, the confessions of the prisoner.

[Cited in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 255.]

2. Each case must be governed by its own circumstances.

[Cited in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 254.]

3. Under the 21st section of the post office law of 1825 [4 Stat. 102], no one can be convicted who is not employed in the post office department.

4. Some evidence is necessary of the genuineness and value of bank notes, charged to have been stolen out of a letter.

5. Taking the notes greatly aggravates the offence, and the taking must be charged and proved, as a substantive part of the offence.

6. To constitute the offence it is not necessary that the letter stolen should have been taken out of the post office building.

7. To convict a person of stealing a letter, &c., who is employed in the department, such employment must be distinctly alleged and proved.

[This was an indictment against Leoneal C. Nott, charging him with abstracting bank notes from a letter.]

The District Attorney, for the United States.
Swayne & Miner, for prisoner.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant having been indicted at the present term for stealing bank notes, out of a letter received in the post office at Akron, pleaded not guilty, and went to trial. The indictment contained twelve counts which will be more particularly noticed hereafter. Francis Dod, a witness, states John Dod wrote a letter at his request to Elizabeth Dod, directed to Akron, in which were enclosed two ten dollar bills; one on the State Bank of Indiana, and the other on the Cleveland Bank. He identifies the notes presented at the trial. The letter not being received by Elizabeth Dod, the witness went to Akron to enquire after it, about the 8th May last. On enquiry at the office, the letter was handed to him, which he opened and found that the money had been taken out. The letter had been first charged with 12½ cents postage, but had subsequently been charged 37½ cents. Witness complained to Mr. Johnson, the post master, of the loss of the money; and while they were conversing on the subject, the defendant happened to pass by. The defendant before this had been a regular assistant post master at Akron, but a short time before had left the office. He still, however, at the request of the post master, gave occasional instruction to the assistant in the office, who had little or no knowledge of the business. The post master spoke to the defendant and enquired whether he had any knowledge of the letter, the witness at the same time handing him the letter. The defendant said that the boy in the office, informed him the letter had been opened by Elizabeth Davis, supposing it was intended for her, but finding it was not, she returned it, and the letter was resealed, that the letter contained two bank notes, which induced the defendant to alter the charge of postage to thirty-seven and a half cents. The post master states, that the next day being in company with the defendant and several others, he charged the defendant with stealing the money. Some one present observed, how can this matter be settled, and the defendant observed, how can it be, seeing he, the post master, was so determined. The post master observed that he had nothing against the defendant but this, and that he had no vengeance to gratify; but that the transaction should be prosecuted and exposed. The defendant then asked the post master to walk with him. They went up to the third story of the house where the defendant lodged, and the defendant stepped into another room and soon returned with one of the notes, which the letter contained, in his hand. The other he had passed away to a person in town. He confessed that he took the money, &c. And the defendant's counsel moved the court to exclude this testimony from the jury, and also the whole evidence that has been heard, being connected with it, on the ground that the confession was made under such circumstances, as to render it inadmissible. And 19 E. C. L. 519, 533, 444; 2 Russ. 648, 645; 2 Starkie, 27, and 6 Hals. [11 N. J. Law] 183, were read to sustain the position taken.

Confessions, as has been often said, should be received with great caution, for experience has shown that they often mislead, and sometimes convict an innocent person. Under a charge of a highly criminal offence, the mind must always be agitated, and may be influenced by hopes or apprehensions, which it is difficult, if not impossible sometimes to comprehend. To make a confession, therefore, evidence, it must be made, so far as can be ascertained, in the absence of any excitement which creates a hope to obtain favor, or to avoid a threatened punishment. But the court in such cases must judge of the motives which induce the confession, from the confession itself, and the circumstances under which it was made. The modern doctrine on this subject in England, seems to have been carried great lengths in favor of the prisoner. And in one of the cases read, the confession was excluded because a by-stander, unknown to the prisoner, and who had no right to interfere, observed in his hearing that he had better confess. This was going farther to exclude confessions than the reason of the rule would seem to require. And in some of the cases, all subsequent confessions are supposed to have been made under the influence which at first operated; and on this ground they have also been excluded from the jury.

It is difficult to lay down any precise form of words which, if addressed to the prisoner, shall exclude his confessions. Every case must be governed by its own circumstances. In the present case, so far as the facts are developed, there seems to have been no promise held out to induce a confession, nor any threat to extort one. On the contrary, the post master, by his remarks, guarded the defendant against any such motive. For, while he informed him that he had no vengeance to gratify, he declared that the case should be prosecuted, and the whole matter exposed. There is, therefore, no ground, under any of the cases cited, to exclude the confession. But if a promise had been made as an inducement to the confession, the facts connected with the confession could not be withdrawn from the jury. And in this case the facts connected with the confession of the defendant, unless explained, go strongly to fix the offence upon him. In company with the witness, he went to his lodgings, and there he handed to the witness one of the notes, which is proved to have been enclosed in the letter. Now unless he shall show how he came by this note, the presumption that he feloniously abstracted it from the letter is strong. But the whole confession is clearly admissible to the jury. In a subsequent part of the case, a witness, being called by the defendant, proved, that before the confession of the defendant, stated by the post master, an assurance was given him, that the whole matter, might, perhaps, be compromised, if he would confess, and that the prosecutor would, probably, be satisfied on the reimbursement of his expenses. And the court then stated to the counsel that the facts which the first witness does not contradict, change the aspect of the evidence, and render the confession inadmissible. And they remarked that in their charge to the jury they should exclude, as evidence, the confession.

The evidence being closed, the defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury that they could not find the defendant guilty, under the first, second, and twelfth counts in the indictment, unless they are satisfied from the evidence that at the time the offence is alleged to have been committed the letter in question was "intended to be conveyed by post." In the three counts specified, the letter is described as a "letter intended to be conveyed by post." By the 21st section of the act to regulate the post office, &c. it is provided "that if any person employed in any of the departments of the post office establishment shall unlawfully detain, or open, any letter, packet, or mail of letters, with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and which are intended to be conveyed by post, on conviction shall be punished, &c." And if such letter contain a bank note or any article of value, the punishment is greatly increased. This provision is only applicable to a person employed in the post office department, as a carrier, a post master or assistant post master, into whose possession letters intended to be conveyed by post, ordinarily come. It does not, therefore, apply to any one disconnected with the post office, who may steal a letter from a post office or the mail. Under the regulations of the department it is made the duty of a carrier to receive letters, between post offices, and he is required to deposit them to be mailed in the first post office on his route. Should be purloin a letter thus received, instead of depositing it in a post office, he would be guilty of violating the law. The letter was intended to be conveyed by post, and it came into his possession, in the line of his official duty. So a letter, intended to be conveyed by post, comes into the possession of a post master or assistant post master, when deposited in a post office, to be forwarded by post. And the section, undoubtedly, reaches the case, where a letter is purloined by a person employed in the department, either from the office to which it was directed or on its passage to such office. But the counts must charge the defendant, as employed in the post office department, and it must be shown that he was thus employed before he can be found guilty, under this section of the statute. The court are also requested to charge the jury that they cannot convict the defendant under the seventh, eighth, ninth and tenth counts, unless they are satisfied from the evidence, that the notes in question are genuine and are of some value. The 22nd section of the post office act, under which this indictment seems principally to have been framed, provides, that "if any person shall steal the mail, or shall steal or take from, or out of, any mail, or from, or out of, any post office, any letter or packet; or if any person shall take the mail, or any letter or packet therefrom. or from any post office, whether with or without the consent of the person having custody thereof; and shall open, embezzle or destroy, any such mail, letter or packet, the same containing any article of value, &c., shall be punished, on conviction, as therein provided."

In a late case in England it has been decided (Rex v. Ellins, Russ. & R. 188) that the genuineness of an instrument enclosed in a letter, under a provision somewhat similar to the above, need not be proved. The statute contemplates that the article enclosed shall be of some value; and on this ground the punishment inflicted is much more severe, than where a letter is abstracted which contains no article of value. This article would seem, therefore, to constitute an important part of the offence, and some evidence of its value must, therefore, be given. It is clearly not necessary to prove the hand writing of the presidents and cashiers, whose signatures appear on the face of the notes, by one who has seen them write. Any one whose business or profession leads him to an acquaintance with such notes, may prove them to be genuine. And the jury, in the exercise of their judgment, may find them to be genuine from an inspection of them, and the acts of the defendant. The defendant passed one of the notes, as appears from the evidence, at its full nominal value, and if this and the other evidence in the case shall satisfy the jury that the notes or either of them were genuine and of some value, they can act accordingly. A counterfeit note being of no value, or a note on a bank which never existed, or is wholly insolvent, would not constitute the offence under the statute. In these cases the notes enclosed in the letter stolen, are seldom recovered, and the only evidence of their genuineness is that they appeared to be so, to the person who enclosed them; and that being on solvent banks, they were of value. This evidence has often been held sufficient, to go to the jury, and on which convictions have been had.

The court are further requested to charge the jury that they cannot find the defendant guilty under the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth counts, unless they are satisfied from the evidence that the letter therein mentioned was taken from and out of the office by the defendant. And an authority is cited from 19 E C. L. 533, sustaining the instruction asked. In this report the British statute is not recited, so that it can be compared with the act under consideration. The words of the act are, if any person "shall steal from, or out of any post office." And the instruction supposes that the offence is not perpetrated under this section, unless the letter shall be taken out of the post office building. That if the letter be feloniously taken and rifled of its contents, by an individual who returns it before he leaves the post office room, the offence is not committed. This would indeed be a singular construction of the statute. The words "post office," as used in this section, do not mean the building in which the post office is kept, but the case or pigeon holes, where the letters are deposited. And when a letter is feloniously taken from the place where it is ordinarily and properly deposited, the offence is consummated. And it is of no importance to enquire, whether the offender remained in the room, or went out of it. In the present case, if the prisoner opened the letter, took out the money, resealed the letter, and returned it to the place of deposit, before he left the room, he is guilty of the offence under the statute.

And the defendant's counsel further ask the court to instruct the jury that they cannot find the prisoner guilty under the first, second, third, fourth and twelfth counts, which charge the prisoner as an assistant post master, unless they shall be satisfied from the evidence, that he was at the time the offence is alleged to have been committed actually employed under a valid contract as an assistant. Where a person not employed in the post office department, shall be convicted of stealing a letter from the mail or a post office, which contains bank notes, &c. he is punishable by imprisonment not less than two nor more than ten years. But if such person be employed in the department, he is punishable by imprisonment not less than ten years, nor more than twenty-one years. This difference of punishment in the two cases, shows how much, in the opinion of the legislature, the offence is aggravated, when committed by a person employed in the department. The fact, then, of his employment must not only be stated in the indictment, but it must be distinctly proved. The employé within the law is not a casual assistant, who may occasionally be in the post office, and assist in distributing or making up the mail. But he must be a regular assistant employed by the post master, and whose duty it is to perform the various functions which appertain to the office. The prisoner, it appears, had been a regular assistant in the post office at Akron, but some time before this occurrence he had left the office, and engaged in other business. He was under no obligation to act as assistant post master, nor did he receive a compensation. The extent of his engagement was, in the absence of the post master, to give some instructions to the boy in the office respecting his duties, of which being inexperienced, he was ignorant. This, we think, is not an employment within the law. We do not say that a regular written contract would be necessary, but we are of the opinion that the person, to come within the law, must be a regular assistant.

The jury will disregard the confessions of the prisoner, because made under circumstances which ought to exclude them from consideration. But they will give full weight to the facts connected with the confessions. The notes taken out of the letter were in possession of the prisoner, and he has wholly failed to show in what way he received them.

Much has been said, gentlemen of the jury, of the high importance of this case, and of the ruinous consequences of a conviction. The case is important, but the court and jury must be governed by the facts and the law, and are not answerable for the consequences. If these shall cover the defendant with infamy, and blight his future prospects, it is the result of his own acts. His reproaches should be against himself, and not against the law or the administrators of the law.

The jury, after a short retirement, returned a verdict of guilty. And at a subsequent day of the term, the prisoner being brought to the bar, and having nothing to allege by himself or his counsel, why sentence should not be pronounced, the court addressed him as follows:

You have been indicted, tried, and convicted of a highly penal offence. An ample opportunity has been afforded you to meet the accusation; and, you have been aided in your defence by able, experienced, and zealous counsel. Nothing has been left undone which could, with propriety be done, to shield you from the legal consequences of your own voluntary act. The court are satisfied with your conviction. The jury were bound by their oaths and the testimony in the case, to find you guilty; and no doubt can exist of your guilt. You are young. The morning of your life has not yet passed away; and how deeply is it to be lamented, that that morning is overcast, by so dark and heavy a cloud. There is but little in the future to cheer you. That future which promises so much to our hopes, and which is so well calculated to mitigate the misfortunes of life. You cannot expect to regain what you have lost. One step, one act, has fixed your destiny in this life. You had a hard struggle to overcome the upbraidings of conscience, in the perpetration of the offence; and when it was consummated, this faithful monitor, by your own confession, left you ill at ease. Truly the way of the transgressor is hard. You repented, but repentance came too late. The law had been violated and its penalty incurred. You must be cut off from society; and from your nearest and dearest connections. You must put on the badges of disgrace, and be associated with men rendered infamous by crime. There is but one resource to which you can look for consolation; but that is a source which never fails. It is found in the mercy of Him, who pardons the vilest offenders. Rest not until you shall obtain his pardon, and then you shall have a hope that strengthens and brightens, when all around you shall fade away and die. You are not hardened in vice. Your character is proved to have been good, and this, perhaps, is the first offence which has rendered you obnoxious to the laws of the country. Submit to your punishment, as the only atonement you can make to a violated law; and amidst the discouragements with which you are surrounded, thoroughly reform your life. If this shall be your determination, you need not despair. Your youth, your former good character, and the remorse which you have evinced, are taken into view by the court in fixing your punishment. The court sentence that you be confined in the penitentiary of this state, at hard labor, for two years from this time.

Case No. 15,901.

UNITED STATES v. NOURSE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1831.[2]

DISBURSING OFFICER — COMPENSATION — REGISTER OF TREASURY.

A register of the treasury of the United States is entitled to a reasonable compensation as agent for disbursing the money appropriated for the contingent expenses of the treasury department, library of congress, and other appropriations for public purposes, although, at the same time, he discharges the duties, and receives the pay, of register of the treasury, and such compensation is not barred by the statute of limitations.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia.]

This suit was commenced on the 14th of July, 1829, by a treasury warrant issued under the hand and seal of S. Pleasonton, "Agent of the Treasury," under the second section of the act of congress of the 15th of May, 1820 (3 Stat. 592), entitled "An act providing for the better organization of the treasury department;" directed to the marshal of the District of Columbia, and commanding him to proceed immediately to levy and collect the sum of $11,769.13, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the said Joseph Nourse, giving ten days' notice of such sale; and should there not be found sufficient goods and chattels to satisfy the said sum, he was thereby commanded to commit the body of the said Joseph Nourse to prison, there to remain until discharged by due course of law; and should the said Joseph Nourse be committed to prison as aforesaid, or should abscond, and sufficient goods and chattels should not be found to satisfy the said sum, the marshal was thereby commanded to levy upon and expose to sale, at public auction, for ready money, to the highest bidder, the lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the said Joseph Nourse, or so much thereof as might be necessary, &c., upon three weeks' notice, and to make return of the said warrant "to this office," that is, the office of the agent of the treasury.

[2] [Reversed in 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 470.]

By the 4th section of the act, any person considering himself aggrieved by such a warrant, may prefer a bill of complaint to any district judge of the United States, who may grant an injunction, upon bond and security, and the same proceeding shall be had on such injunction as in other cases, except that no answer shall be necessary on the part of the United States. The fifth section provides, that such injunction may be granted in, or out of, court; and the sixth section enacts, that any person aggrieved by the refusal, or the dissolution, of any injunction, may apply to a judge of the supreme court, who may grant the injunction or permit an appeal, upon which the same proceedings may be had in the circuit court, as in the district court.

This warrant having been levied by the marshal, on the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of Mr. Nourse, he preferred his bill under the fourth section of the act, on the 25th of August, 1829, to the chief judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, who, by virtue of that office, is sole judge of the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia; in which bill, after stating that since his recent removal from the office of register of the treasury, (May 31, 1829), his public accounts as register and agent of the treasury department in disbursing certain funds, and settling certain accounts of contingencies, and other miscellaneous matters, and as agent for the joint library committees of congress, matters altogether distinct from, and unconnected with, his duties as such register, have been settled at the treasury, and a pretended balance found against him of $11,250.26, for which a warrant had been issued against his lands, tenements, goods, and chattels, under the act of May, 1820, and levied upon the same in his absence. He avers that the said account is unjust and illegal; and that so far from any balance being due to the United States, a considerable balance should have been struck thereon in his favor, as appears by an account filed by him, and which he declares to be just and true. That he took upon himself this distinct branch of duty at the special instance and request of the proper department of the government, having competent authority to engage him or any other agent in that capacity. That the performance of those duties devolved upon him great labor, responsibility, and risk, independent of, and apart from, his proper duties as register, and occupied a great portion of his private hours; that is, of those hours when, according to the established order and routine of his department, he was altogether discharged and free from the proper duties appertaining to his office of register, and had his time at his own disposal, but for his employment as special agent as aforesaid. And that besides the great labor and consumption of time induced by this extra employment, he was exposed to considerable pecuniary losses from the ordinary errors that occasionally occur in the accounts of the best accountants, from the multiplicity and minuteness of the various accounts and vouchers to be settled and preserved. That when he undertook this branch of public employment, the precise nature and amount of compensation therefor were not ascertained by any particular stipulation. That the usage of the treasury department, and other departments of the government, has invariably been, since the organization of the general government, to allow such commissions, or percentage, not only to unofficial persons so employed, but to official persons and clerks of the departments, when such duties were distinct from the stated duties of their offices, although such official persons were in the receipt of fixed salaries for their stated duties. That as early as the year 1800 he made out an abstract of these services, claiming to be allowed a compensation therefor; which original abstract is on file in the treasury department. That he has duly made out and presented his account to the proper accounting officer of the treasury, charging his commission at the rate of two and a half per cent. on the amount of his disbursements, which, if allowed, would, after a full and fair settlement of all his public accounts, leave the United States indebted to him in a balance of $9,886.24; which he has good reason to believe, and does believe, to be justly and equitably due to him from the United States, as stated in his annexed account. That the accounting officers of the treasury have rejected his said charge, and denied him any manner of compensation for his extra services as such special agent as aforesaid; not on the ground or pretence that his charge of commission is too high or unreasonable, if he were entitled to any compensation; but that he is not entitled to any compensation whatever for such extra services. He denies that he is within the description of persons, or officers, over whom the act gives jurisdiction to the agent of the treasury; which opinion he supports by an extended argument in his bill; wherefore he prays that the parties may be remitted to the ordinary process of law, so as to have a fair trial on the merits before execution be had of his body or estate, and an injunction to stay proceedings on the warrant altogether.

The injunction was granted, and served upon the agent of the treasury, with a citation to appear and answer the bill at the next district court at Alexandria; when and where Mr. Swann, the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, appeared and answered, that upon a settlement, by the proper accounting officers of the treasury, of the complainant's general account, comprehending the different agencies under which he acted as register of the treasury, he was found indebted to the United States in the sum of $11,769.18, as appears by the account, a copy of which the complainant has exhibited with his bill, with the letter of Joseph Anderson, comptroller. which shows the grounds upon which the United States claim the balance of $11,769.18; and that the difference between that and the complainant's account consists of the commissions at two and a half per cent. claimed by him on his disbursements. The answer denies that the complainant is entitled by law to those, or any commissions, and prays that the injunction may be dissolved.

On the 20th of December, 1830, the district judge, having heard the parties by their counsel, made the following order and decree: "That the said Joseph Nourse has produced satisfactory evidence that he did, for a long course of years, render various services and disburse large sums of money for the use of the United States, and at their request, from time to time, made through the respective secretaries of the treasury, for the time being; which services and disbursements were performed and made by the said Joseph Nourse over and above the services required by the duties of his office as register of the treasury of the United States, for which said extra services and disbursements he has never been allowed any compensation in the settlement of his accounts in the treasury department; and it being deemed by the court expedient to ascertain by the report of auditors to be appointed by the court for that purpose, the value of those services, and the compensation to which the said Joseph Nourse is equitably entitled therefor, and for his disbursements as aforesaid: It is further ordered that Robert J. Taylor, Phineas Janney, and Colin Auld, be, and they are hereby appointed auditors to ascertain the said value and compensation, and to report thereon to this court without delay; and that such of the papers and evidence in this cause as relate to that subject. be submitted to the said auditors for their better information thereon."

On the 31st of December, 1830, the auditors reported: "That it appears from the documents and evidence submitted to them, that from the 10th of April, 1790, to the 31st of May, 1829, thirty-nine years, one month, and twenty-one days, the complainant, as agent for the payment of contingent expenses of the treasury department; for stationery and printing of public accounts; for payment of the superintendent and watchmen of the state and treasury departments; for miscellaneous disbursements, comprising fifteen different agencies; for advances made to sundry persons who brought from the several states the votes for presidents and vice-presidents of the United States; and on account of the congressional library; disbursed the sum of $943,308.83; the services rendered in which said agencies, and in making said disbursements, were over and above the services required of him by the duties of his office of register of the treasury of the United States. We find that for similar services, where no special provision had been made by law, a commission of two and a half per cent. has been, heretofore, in many cases, allowed at the treasury of the United States; and we are of opinion that a commission of two and a half per cent. on the said sum of $943,308.83, amounting to the sum of $23,582.72, is an equitable compensation for the services so as aforesaid rendered to the United States by the said Joseph Nourse; and that the said services are equitably worth the said last-mentioned sum."

Whereupon the following decree was made by the district judge, on the 4th of January, 1831. "And at a court continued and held for the said district on the 4th day of January, 1831, the auditors, Robert J. Taylor, Phineas Janney, and Colin Auld, to whom," &c., "having made and returned their report," &c., "and no sufficient reasons having been presented to the court against the confirmation of the said report of the said auditors, it is, therefore, this 4th day of January, 1831, ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said report be, and the same is hereby, in all particulars confirmed and made absolute; and the said cause now also coming on for final decision upon said report, and the bill, answer, replication, exhibits, depositions, and other evidence admitted by the parties, and upon the equity reserved under and by the said interlocutory order, it is further ordered, decreed, and adjudged, that the injunction, heretofore granted in this cause, be, and the same is hereby perpetuated; and that the said defendants be, and they are hereby perpetually enjoined from proceeding further against the said complainant upon the warrant of distress in the bill mentioned for or on account of the claim or demand for the recovery of which the said warrant of distress was issued."

The United States appealed to the circuit court of the District of Columbia, where a motion was made by Mr. R. S. Coxe, to dismiss the appeal, and contended that this was a summary proceeding in derogation of common right, and the jurisdiction must be limited to the express provisions of the act which gives the remedy. It does not give the United States any right to appeal. The district court had no jurisdiction in any suit against the United States. This proceeding is not a suit. No judgment can be rendered in it against the United States. It is not such an action as is intended by the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73), where an appeal is given. It is a power given only to the judge, not to the court; and it is given to the judge of any district. A district judge in Georgia may enjoin a warrant levied in this district. There can be no jury to ascertain facts. It is no action. It is like the case of claimants in Missouri, &c., a special commission; and the power given to the chancellor in bankruptcy. The jurisdiction begins and ends in the statute which gives it. There can be no appeal because none is given by the statute. In lunacy, the authority is personal in the chancellor. The appeal is to the king in council; not to the house of lords. It is to the king as parens patriæ. Sheldon v. Aland, 3 P. Wms. 107; Saul v. Wilson, 2 Vern. 118; 2 Mad. 446. In Bulloch's Case, in the district court of the United States in Georgia, the circuit court decided that no appeal lies under the act of 15th May, 1820.

Mr. Swann and Mr. Key, contra. This is a suit or action. The bill prays for an injunction, and for general relief. The judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73) gives an appeal, or writ of error, in all cases over $50. It applies to new jurisdictions as well as to the old. If the district court should dismiss the bill on final hearing, it would be hard if the debtor could not have an appeal. So it is strange if the legislature should give a right to appeal upon an interlocutory decree and not upon a final decree; and should give the complainant a right of appeal upon an interlocutory decree, and not reserve to the United States a right to appeal upon a final decree against them. The fourth section says: "The same proceedings shall be had as in other cases." An appeal is expressly given upon refusing or dissolving the injunction, because a decree of refusal or dissolution is only an interlocutory decree; and an appeal, by the former law, could only be taken to a final decree. And the allowing of such an appeal from an interlocutory decree, does not deprive the party of his appeal upon a final decree. By the act of the 3d of March, 1803 (2 Stat. 244), an appeal is given upon every final decree. A decree for a perpetual injunction is a final decree. This is the judgment or decree for a court, and being in its nature final, an appeal lies of course under the act of 1803.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, not sitting) was of opinion that the United States had a right to appeal; and on a subsequent day, THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court (CRANCH, Chief Judge, not sitting on the appeal):

The great question, in this cause, is: "Is the appellee, as agent for the disbursement of certain contingent funds of the treasury department, library of congress, and other appropriations for public purposes, entitled to compensation for those disbursements?" It is a single and a simple question; and can admit of no doubt, if the defendant be not barred by considerations connected with and growing out of his official duties as register of the treasury. The first point, then, is to examine those official duties. See the law declaring those duties. Here we see his duties as register, defined, among which we cannot discern that of receiving and paying public moneys. It is plain that he was not bound, as register, to receive or pay away public moneys, but he has, for a long course of years, received, paid away, and accounted for very large sums of public money. This must have been an extra duty, in nowise incident to his office of register. How came Mr. N. to have this duty imposed on him? We are told in the certificate of Oliver Wolcott, in the year 1801, that Mr. Nourse had been "employed" as agent for defraying the incidental and contingent expenses of the treasury department. Here we have evidence of the way in which Mr. Nourse became agent. He was "employed." This is a strong expression, and deserves consideration. It carries with it the idea, and almost the essence of a contract. What other more forcible expression would have been used if a contract had been made with any private person? If the secretary had a right to require this duty of Mr. Nourse as register, would he have used the term "employed"? Would he not rather have said, Mr. Nourse has been required, ordered, directed, or appointed? Suppose Mr. Nourse had refused the agency, would there have been any violation of his official duty? None whatever. Then one of two consequences follows. This burthensome agency, (for that it was onerous and troublesome is proved by the depositions of Mr. Michael Nourse, Mr. Charles J. Nourse, Mr. Rush, Mr. Crawford, and the certificate of Mr. Wolcott,) was undertaken gratuitously, or compensation was expected. Was it undertaken gratuitously? That it was not is proved by the intended application to congress for compensation, as far back as 1801, as appears by the memorial to congress exhibited in the argument, with Mr. Wolcott's certificate indorsed. Then it is evident Mr. N. expected compensation, and the then secretary of the treasury was apprised of it. Here was notice that Mr. N. expected compensation; and, of course, he acted neither gratuitously nor under the impression that he was, in executing this agency, discharging any duty belonging to his office of register, but an extra duty for an expected compensation.

But it is contended that if Mr. N. is entitled to compensation, it is a right founded upon no law, and dependent entirely upon the will of congress. A right not to be asserted in a court of law, is a solecism. A strange argument has been used to maintain this principle,—that because Mr. Nourse proposed to apply to congress for remuneration, he has acknowledged that he had no legal remedy. How so? Does a man forfeit his right to compensation for services rendered because he has misconceived his remedy? But how did he misconceive his remedy? He could not have sued the government; and therefore had no means to enforce his claim in a court of law. But it is asked, why did he not prefer his accounts to the treasury department at the time he thought of the memorial to congress? Because, in the first place, he might have been, and probably was ignorant of his rights, or apprehended that the secretary of the treasury had no power to allow them; or he might have been apprehensive of giving offence to the government, and as he was a removable officer, that he might have endangered his office of register; and, moreover, as he had always large sums of public moneys in his hands, there was, in fact, but little necessity for having the legal point settled at that time. But, for none of these causes can I discern that he has waived or forfeited his right to compensation. Admitting, then, that Mr. Nourse was doubtful, at that period, of his claim to compensation, little doubt exists, at this day. The practice that has uniformly prevailed since, in transactions of this nature, has settled the point. The opinion of Mr. Wirt in Governor Cass' Case [2 Ops. Attys. Gen. 189], the allowance by Colonel Bomford for extra services of this sort rendered by army officers; of General Gratiot, by engineer officers, all go to show compensation for extra services in disbursing money by officers who receive regular pay as such; and in private transactions compensation by way of commissions to agents receiving and disbursing moneys, is too well settled to be disputed. Then if Mr. Nourse always expected compensation for this extra service, and the government was apprised of it in 1801, (see O. Wolcott's certificate,) and he has not forfeited it, as I have endeavored to show, by either ignorance of his rights, or by not asserting them sooner, because, having, as I observed, already large sums in his hands, and had, until now, no necessity to assert them, I see no reason why he is not entitled now to this compensation; and in this I am supported by Mr. Crawford, late secretary of the treasury; and as two and a half per centum is the rate of allowance established for similar services, (see Bomford and Gratiot's certificate,) and has been reported reasonable by the auditors, whose report stands unexcepted to, I am of opinion that the decree of the district judge should be affirmed by this court.

A strange argument was used to show that Mr. Nourse would have had the same duties to perform as register, had he not acted as agent, as he has had, having acted as such; that he would still have had the accounts of the agency to register and enter on the books of his office, and so as register he would have had this duty to perform let who will have been agent; and he had all this to do, although he was himself the agent. But, in fact, the concerns of the agency are entirely distinct from and independent of his functions as register. What have contracts for wood, paying superintendents of buildings, watchmen, paying drafts of the library committee for books purchased, paying painters, glaziers, carpenters, bricklayers for work done on the public offices, and the multifarious and innumerable private claims on the contingent fund, and many of these payments, and indeed most of them, not in office hours, drawing checks, &c. &c., keeping private books of these transactions, producing vouchers for every, even the smallest payment in settling his accounts, to do with his duties as register of the treasury? Nothing. They are entirely distinct. But Mr. Nourse was "employed" to do all this; and if he was employed, why should he not be paid? If no special contract was made, then he is entitled, on the principle of a quantum meruit, which creates an implied assumpsit, to pay, on the part of the government, and the quantum of two and a half per cent. is settled by the usage established by other officers of the government in similar cases; by the report of the auditors and by all the analogies to the cases of private agents.

As to the statute of limitations; in the first place, it is not pleaded; in the next place, it cannot avail against a party who could not assert his claim by law. Mr. Nourse could not sue the government; therefore could not avoid the operation of the statute. He was obliged to wait to be sued. Besides, we are bound to decide on principles of justice and equity. The statute, if otherwise available of, seems to be overruled by this directory provision. But the government would be disgraced by pleading the statute of limitations, and if so, we ought not to allow it. Moreover, the policy of the statute, however wise and wholesome as to transactions between private persons, is in nowise applicable to government concerns. The prevention of litigation, the peace and quiet of the community, and the security of the citizens against stale claims, were the objects of the statute; none of which seem at all to bear on the interests or the weal of the government; and therefore the government ought not, and cannot take shelter under it. Again, the United States are not bound by the statute, and it is not right that they should have the benefit of it; the benefit should be reciprocal.

As to the want of a replication, it appears, from the record, that a general replication was agreed to be filed, in the judge's order of the 2d of January, 1831, (see page 7, of the record; see, also, the final decree of the judge,) who says, "The cause coming on for final decision, on said report, and the bill, answer, replication," &c., "admitted by the parties," so that there appears to have been a replication.

The decree of the district court is affirmed.

NOTE. Reversed by the supreme court of the United States (6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 470), on the ground that the United States had no right to appeal from the district to the circuit court; which, in effect, affirmed the judgment of the district court.

[Subsequently the United States instituted an action of assumpsit upon a transcript from the treasury. The circuit court gave judgment for the defendant, and on error that judgment was affirmed by the supreme court. 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 8.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. March, 1876.

INTERNAL REVENUE — REMOVING SPIRITS — CONCEALMENT—CONSPIRACY—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. It is not necessary to prove that the precise quantities were removed, in an indictment for removing distilled spirits, on which the tax had not been paid; proof of any quantity removed, less or more than is alleged, upon which the tax has not been paid is sufficient.

2. It is not indispensable to the prosecution that the removal of the spirits took place at the precise times stated; but it must be at, or about the time stated, and evidence of removals considerably anterior will be inadmissible.

3. In a count of an indictment for removal and concealment, conviction may be had if removal is proved, though concealment is not shown.

4. If a person in interest in the business of the distillery, for himself, either alone or with others, directed, prescribed, ordered or set on foot the alleged removal or removals of spirits, or aided or abetted therein, he may be convicted of such removal or removals, although he may not have been personally present at the time.

5. Where a person with unlawful purpose or intent designs the commission of a criminal act, and to carry out that purpose or effect the unlawful object, another is employed to do the act, that act becomes the act of the principal, and he as well as the agent is criminally responsible.

6. A conspiracy is formed when two or more persons agree together to do that which is unlawful, and when one or more of the parties does any act to effect the object of such conspiracy. A mere agreement or combination to effect an unlawful purpose, not followed by any act, does not constitute the offense; there must be both the corrupt agreement or combination and an act done in pursuance thereof to make the punishable offense under the statute.

7. A general discussion of the law on the question of conspiracy. Many authorities cited and commented upon.

8. Identity of conspiracy is not destroyed by the connection at a subsequent time of new parties therewith.

This was a trial on an indictment [against Jacob Nunnemacher and others] for removal of distilled spirits from a distillery to a place other than a distillery warehouse, and for conspiracy.

J C. McKinney and L. S. Dixon, for the United States.

Winfield Smith and James G. Jenkins, for defendant Nunnemacher.

DYER, District Judge (charging jury). The indictment in this case contains four counts. The substance of the first count is, that on the 18th day of December, 1874, the defendant on trial, Jacob Nunnemacher, and the other persons named in the indictment, removed and aided in the removal of 3500 proof gallons of distilled spirits, on which the tax then due and owing to the United States, and required by law to be paid, had not been paid, from the distillery of the defendant, Christian Guenther, to the place of business of the defendant, August Hauske, and to a place other than the distillery warehouse of the said Christian Guenther, and concealed and aided in the concealment of these spirits.

The second count is like the first, except that the time of alleged removal and concealment of spirits is therein named as the 21st day of December, 1874, the quantity of spirits then alleged to have been removed is stated to be 3000 proof gallons, and the place to which and where they are alleged to have been removed and concealed is stated to be a railroad car in the city of Milwaukee.

The third count is like those that precede it, except that concealment is not charged, and except that the time of alleged removal of spirits is therein named as the 23d day of April, 1875; a railway car in the city of Milwaukee is the place to which these spirits are alleged to have been removed, and the quantity of such spirits is said to be 3500 proof gallons

The fourth count charges, that on the 18th day of December, 1874, the defendants named in the indictment, including the defendant, Jacob Nunnemacher, conspired together by producing and distilling large quantities of distilled spirits at the distillery of Christian Guenther, and to transport and remove the same from the distillery out of this collection district, without payment of the taxes required by law to be paid on distilled spirits, unlawfully to defraud the United States of the tax on said spirits; and as acts charged to have been done, to carry out the purpose of the conspiracy, it is alleged that on different days named in the count, the defendants produced and distilled at the distillery of Christian Guenther various quantities of spirits which are enumerated, and did not pay the tax thereon required by law to be paid, and removed such spirits from said distillery to a place and to places other than the distillery warehouse provided by law.

This is distinguished from the other counts, as the conspiracy count, in this indictment.

The first three counts are based on section 3296 of the Revised Statutes, which provides, that "whenever any person removes or aids or abets in the removal of any distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, or conceals or aids in the concealment of any spirits so removed," he shall be liable to certain penalties.

The fourth count is based upon section 5440 of the Statutes, which provides, that "if two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable" to certain penalties.

Both in the testimony and the arguments of counsel, you have been informed, not only of the different processes involved in the distillation of spirits, but also of many of the requirements of law that must be regarded in carrying on the business. Among those requirements is one to the effect that there shall be a distillery warehouse connected with every distillery, where all spirits manufactured at the distillery shall be deposited and kept under the charge of a government officer, until the tax thereon has been paid and until it may be lawfully removed therefrom for sale or other disposition; and it is, as we have seen from a statutory provision I have quoted, an offense for any person to remove or aid in the removal of any distilled spirits upon which the tax has not been paid, to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law.

To establish the offenses charged in the first three counts in this indictment, as against the defendant on trial, it must be shown:

As to the first count, that on the 18th day of December, 1874, or at about that time, there were spirits at the distillery in question upon which the government tax had not been paid; that they were removed to the place of business of August Hauske, or after such removal were there concealed; that this was a place other than a distillery warehouse provided for or authorized by law; and that the defendant removed or concealed after removal, or aided in or abetted the removal or concealment of such spirits.

As to the second count, the same state of facts must be shown, except that the alleged removal or concealment of spirits must be proved to have taken place on the 21st day of December, 1874, or about that time; that the alleged removal was made to a place other than a distillery warehouse in the city of Milwaukee; and that the place of concealment was a railway car.

As to the third count, again the same state of facts must be shown, except that the alleged removal of spirits must be proved to have taken place on or about the 23d day of April, 1875, and that the place to which the spirits were removed if at all, was a railway car in the city of Milwaukee. Concealment, as I have stated, is not alleged in this count. The offense here charged is simply the act of removal.

In each of these counts, particular quantities of spirits are alleged to have been removed—as in the first, 3500 proof gallons, in the second, 3000 proof gallons, and the third, 3500 proof gallons. Nevertheless, it is not necessary to prove that these precise quantities were so removed. So far as quantity is concerned, proof of any quantity removed, less or more than is alleged, upon which the tax had not been paid, is sufficient. You will bear in mind, that it is essential that it be proved that the spirits, if any, removed or concealed as alleged in the first and second counts, and removed as alleged in the third count, were spirits upon which the government tax had not been paid, that the places of removal and concealment were as alleged, and that the defendant, Jacob Nunnemacher, was a party to or aided in or abetted the commission of the acts charged.

Particular times of removal, and removal and concealment of spirits are alleged in these three counts. It is not however indispensable that the prosecution prove that these alleged transactions took place at the precise times stated. If it be shown that the removal of spirits alleged in any one of these counts or the concealment of spirits alleged in the 1st and 2d counts, were made at or about the time therein stated, this is sufficient. The time to be proved must be at, or about, or near the time stated, so that it may be plain that the proof is not of some other transaction than that alleged.

Evidence has been introduced tending to show removals of spirits from the distillery mentioned, to places other than the distillery warehouse, at periods considerably anterior and even several years prior to the times stated in either of these three counts in the indictment. Concerning this evidence, I have to say, that it was only permitted to be given in support of the fourth or conspiracy count in the indictment, and that evidence is not to be considered by you as at all bearing upon the first three counts or either of them. Evidence of removals of spirits in previous years would not support the allegations in either of those counts. To use it for such purpose, would be to accept proof of one offense to convict of a different offense, and this could not be permitted. Conviction on either of the first three counts must be of the specific offense therein charged, and the evidence to establish such offense must be of the transaction or transactions alleged and occurring at or about the time stated.

I have said that to convict this defendant on either of these counts, it must be shown that he was a party to, or aided in, or abetted the commission of one or more of the acts charged. In this connection I may say that, although the first two counts allege both removal and concealment, if it be proved that the defendant removed, or aided in or abetted the removal from the distillery, of spirits upon which the tax had not been paid to the place or places stated, at or about the time or times alleged, conviction may be had upon the count under which removal may be proved, if at all, though concealment be not shown.

Now gentlemen, the three counts in question allege the commission of illegal acts. This defendant is charged with committing those acts. I may first state to you as a general proposition, that to establish this charge, there must be shown participation in or connection with the alleged removal or concealment of spirits on the part of the defendant, with intent to accomplish or forward the commission of the act. If he personally, with guilty knowledge or intent, did the act either for or by himself, or jointly with others, that of course ends the question. To instigate, encourage, incite, advise, procure or assist in the removal of spirits on which the tax has not been paid from the distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse, with a design to accomplish, or promote, or facilitate such removal, is to aid in and abet the commission of the act. With these general propositions in mind, let us come to more particular statements. And what I now say, you will keep in mind when we come to consider the count for conspiracy, for the same general rules or principles apply under that count as under those we are now considering.

If this defendant was a party in interest in the business of this distillery, or was a party participating in the profits of the business, and for himself or with others, directed, prescribed, ordered or set on foot the alleged removal or removals of spirits, then he may be convicted of such removal or removals, and that, too, though he may not have been personally present at the time. U. S. v. Blaisdell [Case No. 14,608]. If he was not such a party in interest, but personally and knowingly participated in the act or acts of alleged removal, then his relation to the transaction would be the same in point of responsibility as before. If he leased his distillery or furnished for hire or otherwise, teams and teamsters for the purpose or with the intent of providing the means or affording the opportunity to facilitate or accomplish the removal of spirits upon which the tax had not been paid, from this distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse, or with knowledge that such instrumentalities were to be so used, and with such instrumentalities so furnished and employed, the alleged removals or either of them were made, then it could be said that he was influenced by an unlawful purpose, that he derived profit or advantage from the prosecution of that purpose, and he would be in that case a guilty participant in the act or acts. In other words, gentlemen, in such case, where a person with unlawful purpose or intent designs the commission of a criminal act and to carry out that purpose or effect the unlawful object, another is employed to do the act, that act becomes the act of the principal, and he, as well as the agent is criminally accountable. This is upon the principle that "he who commands or procures a crime to be done, if it is done, is guilty of the crime." So too, if these spirits were removed as alleged, and the defendant knew them to be spirits upon which the tax had not been paid, though he had no interest in the distilling business or in the spirits alleged to have been unlawfully removed, if he intentionally aided in or abetted the removal within the meaning of those terms, as I have before stated it to you, then he offended within the meaning of the statute.

I have said that intentional participation in or connection with the alleged unlawful acts must be shown. From this it follows that proof of mere suspicion, or bare knowledge that the act is being done by others without such participation in it or connection with it, is not sufficient. If therefore the defendant leased this distillery and let his teamsters and teams, without knowledge that they were to be employed for the purpose of making or accomplishing unlawful removals of spirits, and without any purpose, intent or design of furnishing the means for such removals, but leased and let them so far as his intent was concerned, in good faith for the transaction of lawful business, and did not participate either as a party in interest, or otherwise in the alleged removals, or intentionally aid in or abet such removals, I do not think that, while such original letting of the distillery and teams and teamsters was continuing, mere subsequently acquired knowledge that the alleged unlawful transactions were in progress, would justify conviction under either of the first three counts in this indictment. Knowledge of the commission of unlawful acts may, however, be taken into consideration by the jury, in connection with whatever facts and circumstances may be proved, to aid in determining whether or not the defendant was a participant in or a party to the alleged unlawful acts, if such acts or either of them be shown.

Now it is claimed on the part of the government, that at the times stated in the first three counts of the indictment, this defendant was in fact a party in interest in the distilling business at the Kinnikinnic Distillery, although others were having the active management; that the connection of Guenther with the business as a manager was a mere cover or subterfuge adopted to facilitate the manufacture and removal of illicit spirits from the distillery, for the benefit of Jacob and Hermann Nunnemacher; that this defendant, whether directly a party in interest in the business or not, leased the distillery and furnished teamsters and teams for the purpose of removing such spirits from the distillery to places other than the distillery warehouse, and had knowledge that they were to be and were so used, and that all the circumstances show his participation and intentional co-operation in the alleged unlawful acts charged in these counts of the indictment. This is the claim on the part of the prosecution.

On the contrary, it is claimed on the part of the defense, that he was not in any manner interested in the business of distilling; that he had leased the property, and that others operated the distillery and conducted, controlled and had the avails of the business, without any participation therein by him, except that he received, as he claims, rents for the use of the property, stipulated compensation for the employment of his teams and teamsters, and a portion of the slops of the distillery for his cattle and other stock; that he was engaged in carrying on his farm, dealing in cattle and hogs, and that his business was entirely disconnected from the manufacture of spirits, and that he had no interest therein. It is claimed further in his behalf, that there was no participation by the defendant, with guilty knowledge or intent in the removal or concealment of illicit highwines; that he knowingly rendered no aid, assistance or encouragement in the removal of such spirits, and that his attention to teams owned by him and assisting in the distillery business, was merely to see that they were not overlooked and were properly used and cared for; and it is also claimed that the testimony is wholly inadequate and insufficient to establish either of these three counts as against this defendant.

The judge then recapitulated the points under the first three counts in the indictment upon which the jury must find, and proceeded:

Upon the fourth count in the indictment, the questions requiring your attention are these: (1) Was there such a conspiracy as is alleged, and if there was, were any or either of the overt acts charged in this count committed as alleged, in execution of the conspiracy, or to carry into effect its object? (2) If such a conspiracy was formed and existed, was the defendant connected with it as one of the conspirators?

A conspiracy is formed when two or more persons agree together to do that which is unlawful—in others words, when they combine to accomplish, by their united action, a criminal or unlawful purpose; and the statutory offense is complete, when such agreement is made or such combination is entered into and one or more of the parties does any act to effect the object of such conspiracy. To illustrate, if two or more persons agree together that by fraudulent practices they will deprive or defraud the government of the tax required to be paid on distilled spirits, and one or more of these persons does any act to effect the object of such agreement, they are guilty of the offense of conspiracy.

"It is not necessary, to constitute a conspiracy that two or more persons should meet together, and enter into an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme, or that they should directly by words or in writing, state what the unlawful scheme is to be, and the details of the plan or means by which the unlawful combination is to be made effective. It is sufficient if two or more persons in any manner or through any contrivance, positively or tacitly come to a mutual understanding to accomplish a common and unlawful design." U. S. v. Babcock [Case No. 14,487].

A mere agreement or combination to effect an unlawful purpose, not followed by any act done by either of the parties to carry into execution the conspiracy, does not constitute the offense. There must be both the corrupt agreement or combination, and an act done by one or more of the parties to effect the illegal object or design agreed upon, to make the punishable offense under the statute. If the conspiracy is formed by all or some of the parties charged, and the act to effect the object of the conspiracy is done by only one of the parties, this constitutes a complete offense as to both or all of the members of the conspiracy, for in that case the act of one becomes the act of both or all. I say to you further, that such connection with or relation to a conspiracy as the law takes notice of and punishes, is not dependent upon personal, pecuniary interest in the result of the unlawful adventure. Where there is an attempted attainment of an unlawful end by two or more persons, who are actuated by a common design of accomplishing that end, and who in any way and from any motive work together in furtherance of the unlawful scheme, each one of the persons becomes a member of the conspiracy. In determining whether the person charged is one of the alleged conspirators, it is obviously proper and important for the jury to inquire whether any interest or motive, pecuniary or of any other character, existed, for participation in the unlawful enterprise, and this may oftentimes materially aid in a determination of the question, as to whether the person accused was or was not one of the parties to the alleged conspiracy.

To establish the commission by the defendant of the offense here charged, you must be satisfied upon the testimony, that a conspiracy was formed to defraud the United States of the tax upon distilled spirits, distilled and produced at the distillery in question; that the defendant, Jacob Nunnemacher, was a party to that conspiracy, and that to effect the object of such conspiracy, one or more of the defendants named in the indictment did one or more of the overt acts therein alleged. The overt acts charged in this count are the removals of certain quantities of distilled spirits, upon which the government tax had not been paid, to a place and places other than the distillery warehouse provided by law. It is not essential that the precise quantity of spirits named in the count should be proven, nor is it necessary that the alleged conspiracy should be shown to have been formed at the precise time alleged. It is sufficient if it be shown that there was a quantity or were quantities of spirits distilled and produced at the distillery named, upon which the tax was unpaid, that at about the time charged in the indictment, there was a conspiracy between any two or more of the persons who are alleged to have conspired together to defraud the government of the tax on such spirits, that the defendant on trial here, was connected with, or a party to such conspiracy, and that the unlawful combination was followed by one or more of the alleged acts done by one or more of the defendants, for the purpose of accomplishing its object. There must be at least two parties to a conspiracy, and the defendant Jacob Nunnemacher, may be convicted under the allegations of the fourth count of this indictment, if it be established beyond reasonable doubt, that he either conspired with any of the defendants named in the count or with any person or persons unknown to the government and the jury, or with any of the defendants named, and any person or persons so unknown, to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits mentioned.

To establish a conspiracy, it is not, as I have already said, necessary that there should be "an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme" between the parties, nor is it essential that direct and positive proof be made of an express agreement to do the act forbidden by law. In such cases it is frequently impossible to produce such proof, because conspiracies are not usually meditated and planned in the presence of witnesses not parties thereto, nor in the terms of express stipulations. Hence it is competent to prove the alleged conspiracy by circumstances. The understanding, combination or agreement between the parties in the given case, to effect the unlawful purpose charged, must be proved, because without the corrupt agreement or understanding there is no conspiracy. But as I have just said, circumstantial evidence may be resorted to, to show the agreement or conspiracy. The acts of parties, the nature of those acts, with the accompanying circumstances, the character of the transaction or series of transactions, as the evidence may disclose them, should be investigated and considered, and are sometimes the only sources from which to derive the evidence of an agreement which may be express or implied to do the act which the law condemns.

If you find the existence of the conspiracy as alleged, your inquiry upon this count will be narrowed to a single ultimate question of fact, namely: was the defendant one of the conspirators—a fellow conspirator with the officers and other persons named in the indictment. The government affirms it and must prove it by legal and satisfactory evidence in order to ask a verdict in its favor. * * *

In this connection, I say to you further, that the identity of a conspiracy is not necessarily destroyed by the connection, at a subsequent period, of new or additional parties therewith. In other words, a conspiracy may be formed between certain persons, other persons may join it in its succeeding stages, and so its existence as one prolonged conspiracy may be continued. As the defendant is indicted for conspiracy with the persons named in the indictment, it is clear that the charge implies that the defendant knew there was such a conspiracy, and, with such knowledge, knowingly aided the conspirators in their unlawful scheme, and the alleged guilty knowledge and participation must be proved by the government.

Guilty connection with a conspiracy may be established by showing association by the person accused, with others in and for the purpose of the prosecution of the illegal object. Each party must be actuated by an intent to promote the common design, but each may perform separate and distinct acts in forwarding that design. "If two persons pursue by their acts the same object, one performing part of an act, and the other another part of the same act, so as to complete it with a view to the attainment of the object they were pursuing, the jury are at liberty to draw the conclusion that they have been engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object." 3 Archb. Cr. Prac. 622.

Co-operation in some form must be shown, though that co-operation need not be prompted by personal pecuniary interest. There must be intentional participation in the transaction, with a view to the furtherance of the common design and purpose, though that participation need not be active and may be subordinate. If parties in any manner work together to advance the unlawful scheme, having its promotion in view, and "actuated by the common purpose of accomplishing the unlawful end," they are conspirators. If a person, understanding the unlawful character of the transaction, encourages, advises, counsels, or in any manner, with a view to forwarding the enterprise or scheme, assists in its prosecution, he becomes a conspirator. * * *

Mere knowledge that a conspiracy has been formed or is in progress, unaccompanied by such acts or relation to it as show intentional connection with or participation in the conspiracy, is not sufficient to charge the person with the offense; though in such case, the fact of knowledge, when proved, may be considered in connection with the conduct of the person and all the circumstances, in determining whether or not he is a party to the conspiracy.

The judge then reviewed the testimony at length and explained the character of evidence necessary to conviction.

Verdict, "Guilty under the conspiracy count, and not guilty as to the first three counts in the indictment."

Case No. 15,903.

UNITED STATES v. NUNNEMACHER et al.

[7 Biss. 129.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. April, 1876.

INDICTMENT—DUPLICITY—CONSPIRACY—INTERNAL REVENUE.

1. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 3296, an allegation of the removal of spirits on which the tax had not been paid to a place other than the distillery warehouse, and the concealment thereof, is equivalent to alleging the concealment of spirits which have been removed, etc., and on which the tax had not been paid, and an indictment drawn as above is not bad for duplicity.

[Cited in U. S. v. Lancaster, 44 Fed. 894; U. S. v. Thomas, 69 Fed. 590.]

2. In drawing an indictment it is not necessary that the exact words of the statute be used, if their precise equivalent is expressed, and the words "in execution and pursuance of" are equivalent in meaning to the words "to effect the object of."

3. In the statement of a conspiracy, certainty to a common intent is sufficient.

4. The allegation that the tax on the spirits "had not been paid" is sufficient without an allegation that it "was still due and owing."

5. The time when the spirits were distilled is not material.

6. Many cases cited and commented upon.

Motion to quash indictment. It is alleged in the first count of the indictment that the defendants [Jacob Nunnemacher and others], on the 18th day of December, 1874, did remove and did aid and abet in the removal of 3500 proof gallons of distilled spirits on which the tax then due and owing to the United States, and required by law to be paid, had not been paid, from the distillery of Christian Guenther, where said distilled spirits had theretofore been distilled, to a place other than the distillery warehouse of the said Guenther, and did then and there conceal and aid in the concealment of said distilled spirits so removed, and on which the tax had not been paid. The second count is like the first, except that the time of the alleged removal and concealment of spirits is stated in that count to have been December 21st, 1874, and the quantity of spirits removed and concealed, to have been 3000 proof gallons.

J. C. McKinney and L. S. Dixon, for the United States.

Winfield Smith and Jas. G. Jenkins, for defendant Nunnemacher.

DYER, District Judge. The statute (Rev. St. § 3296) provides that "whenever any person removes, or aids or abets in the removal of any distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, or conceals or aids in the concealment of any spirits so removed, or removes or aids or abets in the removal of any distilled spirits from any distillery warehouse, or other warehouse for distilled spirits authorized by law, in any manner other than is provided by law, or conceals or aids in the concealment of any spirits so removed, he shall be liable" to certain penalties.

The two counts mentioned are based upon the first general division of this section, and a motion is made to quash these counts on the ground of duplicity, it being claimed that the removal and concealment of spirits as mentioned in the statute and according to the terms of the statute are distinct and independent offenses which cannot be properly joined in one count.

It will be noticed that the section of the statute in question contains two general divisions—1st, the removal of distilled spirits to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, or the concealment of spirits so removed—2d, the removal of distilled spirits from a distillery warehouse or other warehouse authorized by law, in any manner other than is provided by law, or the concealment of spirits so removed. I have had some doubt whether each of these divisions of the section was not intended, on its face, to express substantially one offense. But I am not willing to rest the question absolutely on such a construction.

It is a general rule that a count in an indictment which charges two distinct, independent offenses is bad, and should be quashed on motion. 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 382. A capital offense and a misdemeanor cannot be charged in the same count. U. S. v. Sharp [Case No. 16,265]. An indictment for forgery, stating two distinct offenses, as the forging of a mortgage and of a receipt indorsed thereon, and requiring different punishments, has been held bad. 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 382. A count charging horse stealing and ordinary larceny, for which offenses different punishments are imposed, cannot be sustained. State v. Nelson, 8 N. H. 163. The general rule that the joinder of two or more distinct offenses in one count is not permitted, is elementary. The point of difficulty is what are two or more offenses within the rule.

There are certain exceptions to the rule in the case of particular offenses, as in burglary, adultery, &c., where the specific accusation includes an offense of an inferior degree. 1 Whart. Cr. Law, §§ 383, 384. But these are not material here.

Recognizing the rule on this subject as general and elementary, I find as the result of my examination of the numerous cases where the principle has been enforced, that the prevailing feature of these cases is, that the offenses charged in the same count, were either inherently repugnant, or so distinct that they could not be construed as different stages in one transaction, or involved different punishments. These I think are the main characteristics of the class of cases in which the rule is asserted. Green-low v. State, 4 Humph. 25, 26; Com. v. Symonds, 2 Mass. 162, 163; U. S. v. Sharp [supra]; State v. Nelson, 8 N. H. 163; Miller v. State, 5 How. (Miss.) 250.

There is a class of cases, where, although offenses appear, by the use of the disjunctive in statutes declaring the offenses to be distinct and separate, it is nevertheless held that they are in effect but one offense and may be stated conjunctively, in one count. As where a person is charged with doing the thing which constitutes an offense, and causing it to be done, it being held that it is the same in law to cause a thing to be done as to do it. Bish. Cr. Proc. § 434. For example, to charge a person with falsely making, forging and counterfeiting, and with causing and procuring to be falsely made, forged and counterfeited, is not objectionable, although each of the acts may be stated in the disjunctive in the statute, because the whole is in law one offense. Rasnick v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 356; State v. Hauseall, 2 Rice, Dig. 346; Mackey v. State, 3 Ohio St. 363; State v. Morton, 1 Williams [27 Vt.] 310. So a charge that the defendant administered and caused to be administered poison. Ben v. State, 22 Ala. 9. Of this class of cases is Com. v. Eaton, 15 Pick. 273, where it was held that although a statute forbade a person to sell or offer for sale a lottery ticket, it was proper to charge that the defendant offered for sale and sold such a ticket, for the reason that a sale, ex vi termini, includes an offer to sell, and there is actually but one offense. So in Com. v. Twitchell, 4 Cush. 74, where the statute imposed a penalty on any person who should set up, or promote an exhibition without license, it was held that setting up and promoting, constituted one offense and could be alleged as such, conjunctively in one count. In this class of cases, the offenses though disjunctively stated in the statutes creating them, constitute essentially one offense, and as argued by counsel for defendant, they do not reach the precise point we have here.

Let us now go a step further. Mr. Bishop says (1 Cr. Proc. § 436) that if a statute declares "that the doing of this or that, or the other thing, shall subject the doer to a punishment which it specifies, plainly a man may incur the penalty by doing any one of the three things. And by doing the three things at different times and as separate transactions he incurs the penalty three times, and three times he may be punished. But suppose instead of this, he does the three things at once and as one transaction, the doctrine appears to be that he incurs the penalty but once, the same as though he had done only one of them. Whence we have the general proposition, that, subject perhaps to exceptions depending upon the peculiarities of cases and the particular language employed, if a statute forbids several things in the alternative, it thereby creates but one offense; and since the offense may be committed in different ways, distinguished in the statute from one another by the disjunctive 'or' or committed by combining more than one or all the ways in one transaction, an indictment upon the statute may, in a single count, charge the defendant with all the acts, using the copulative 'and' where the statute employs the disjunctive 'or.'"

Following this principle it has been held that a person may be indicted for the battery of two or more persons in the same count. Rex v. Benfield, 2 Burrows, 980, 984. "In felonies also, the indictment may charge the defendant in the same count with felonious acts with respect to several persons, as in robbery, with having assaulted A and B, and stolen from A one shilling and from B two shillings, if it was all one transaction." 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 437.

Wharton says (1 Cr. Law, § 390) "where a statute * * * makes two or more distinct acts connected with the same transaction, indictable, each one of which may be considered as representing a stage in the same offense, it has in many cases been ruled they may be coupled in one count." "Setting up a gaming table, it has been said, may be an entire offense; keeping a gaming table and inducing others to bet upon it may also constitute a distinct offense; for either, unconnected with the other, an indictment will lie. Yet when both are perpetrated by the same person at the same time, they constitute but one offense, for which one count is sufficient, and for which but one penalty can be inflicted." Hinkle v. Com., 4 Dana, 518.

In the case of State v. Murphy, 47 Mo. 275, cited on the argument, it was held that "when a statute in one clause forbids several things, or creates several offenses in the alternative, which are not repugnant in their nature or penalty, the clause is treated in pleading as though it created but one offense, and they may be united conjunctively in one count." In the case of State v. Fletcher, 18 Mo. 425, a distinction is taken on this question between misdemeanors and felonies. A statute declared that no person should set up or use any gambling device for the purpose of gaming, &c. The count in the indictment charged that the defendant set up and used and permitted games of chance to be played on the gambling device. A motion to quash for duplicity was sustained at the circuit but overruled by the supreme court.

Our own supreme court in the case of Byrne v State, 12 Wis. 525, uses this language. "The rule is well settled where a statute makes either of two or more distinct acts, connected with the same general offense and subject to the same measure and kind of punishment, indictable separately and as distinct crimes, when each shall have been committed by different persons or at different times, they may, when committed by the same person at the same time be coupled in one count, as constituting altogether but one offense. In such case the several acts are considered as so many steps or stages in the same affair, and the offender may be indicted as for one combined act in violation of law; and proof of either of the acts mentioned in the statute and set forth in the indictment will sustain a conviction."

Now it is not to be denied that a person may violate the statute in question by simply removing distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, to a place other than the distillery warehouse, and without concealing the spirits. From the peculiar language of the statute, it would seem that to make a case of concealment there must have been a removal. Admit that the statute provides for two distinct acts, indictable separately and as distinct crimes where each shall have been committed by different persons or at different times, the question remains whether a count is double when it charges the commission of both acts by the same person as one transaction and at the same time. The words of the statute are "removes or conceals." For both the acts the same measure and kind of punishment are imposed. Are those acts inherently repugnant to each other, especially in the light of the language of the statute, "conceals or aids in the concealment of any spirits so removed?" Are the acts of such a character, that they cannot under the allegations of the indictment be construed as different stages in one transaction? I can have no doubt upon the point. The counts in question charge, that on a certain day, the defendants removed a certain quantity of distilled spirits from a certain distillery to a place other than a distillery warehouse, and did then and there conceal the spirits so removed. Here are two things, which were done at different times, and as separate transactions involve two penalties, but, when done as one transaction, the penalty is but once incurred as for one offense. There is a combination of the acts of removing the spirits and concealing the same spirits so removed. It has been said that there may be removal without concealment, which is true. It has also been said that concealment does not involve removal. But the words of the statute are "conceals any spirits so removed," which imply a removal and then concealment. So that the charge in the indictment may be regarded, if it were necessary, as a charge of concealment. But in this view it is contended that the charge should be that the defendants concealed spirits which had been removed to a place other than the distillery warehouse, &c.; thus first affirmatively alleging the concealment. But in the reasonable use and connection of words, it would seem that an allegation of removal of spirits on which the tax had not been paid, to a place other than the distillery warehouse, and the concealment thereof is equivalent to alleging the concealment of spirits which had been removed, etc., and on which the tax had not been paid. My conclusion is that the first and second counts are not bad for duplicity.

Another objection urged to these counts is, that it is not alleged that the tax on the spirits removed was due, and owing. The allegation is, that the defendants removed certain distilled spirits on which "the tax then and there due and owing to the United States and required by law to be paid, had not been paid." It is conceded that if the words "which was" had been inserted before the words "then and there" the allegation would have been complete. It is alleged affirmatively that the tax had not been paid, and I think the reasonable construction of the sentence is that the tax was due and owing. In the case of U. S. v. Hesing [unreported] in the Northern district of Illinois, one of the overt acts charged in the indictment to have been done to effect the object of a conspiracy, was the unlawful removal of certain spirits to a place other than a distillery warehouse, upon which spirits the tax imposed by law had not been paid, and this, it would seem from the opinion of Judge Blodgett, was the whole allegation in relation to a tax due and unpaid. It was held that the indictment in all its parts, conformed to the requirements of the law in regard to what an indictment should contain.

I do not regard the objection well taken, that the time is not stated when the spirits mentioned in these counts were distilled. It is alleged that the tax on the spirits had not been paid; that they were removed from a distillery to a place other than a distillery warehouse. The time when the spirits were distilled is not material. The statute forbids the removal of any distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, to a place other than a distillery warehouse provided by law. It makes no allusion to the time or place when or where the spirits are distilled.

To the fourth count which is a count for conspiracy it is objected, that the overt acts charged are not alleged to have been done to effect the object of the conspiracy set forth in the count. The allegation is that the defendants "in execution and pursuance of and according to said conspiracy, combination and agreement had as aforesaid, did produce and distill," &c. The words of the statute are "and one or more of the parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy," &c. It is insisted that the pleader should have employed the precise words of the statute, "to effect the object of the conspiracy" instead of the words "in execution and pursuance of and according to said conspiracy," &c. A ruling upon this point such as is insisted on by counsel for defendant, would require unnecessary exact-ness. While a particularity and clearness are required which will inform a defendant of the charge he has to meet, and the court of the offense claimed to have been committed, so that it may pronounce judgment if there be a conviction, the validity of indictments should not depend upon too great niceties of language. I do not understand that the exact words of the statute must be used, if their precise equivalent is expressed. The words "in execution and pursuance of" are equivalent in meaning to the words, "to effect the object of," as the respective definitions of the terms given by Webster, show. The case of U. S. v. Boyden [Case No. 14,632] was cited by the attorney for the United States on this point. It was there held, that "the overt acts need not be laid as having been done 'to effect the object' of the conspiracy, although these are the words of the statute; it is enough to say that they were done 'in pursuance' thereof, which are the usual words in conspiracy;" and Judge Lowell in his opinion refers to cases in New York, and a case in New Jersey, where the statutes require an act to be done to "effect the object" of the conspiracy and says indictments follow the more usual language, charging the acts as having been done "in pursuance of" the agreement.

Another, and the last objection to the fourth count is that the object of the alleged conspiracy is not stated with sufficient certainty. It is alleged in substance that the defendants intending to defraud the United States of large sums of money in respect of the taxes upon distilled spirits, on the 18th of December, 1874, conspired together by producing and distilling large quantities of distilled spirits; and to ship, transport and remove said distilled spirits from the distillery of Christian Guenther, and out of this collection district without payment of the tax and taxes required by law to be paid on distilled spirits to the United States; unlawfully to defraud the United States of the tax on said spirits; to cheat and defraud the said United States of divers large sums of money in respect of the taxes upon distilled spirits; and to commit divers offenses against the said United States and against the internal revenue laws thereof. Then followed the overt acts which relate solely to the production, distillation and removal without payment of the tax required to be paid by law, of certain quantities of distilled spirits at certain times. The objection is urged that the language of the count "to commit divers offenses against the said United States and against the internal revenue laws thereof," is too general, neither the time, place nor particular character of these offenses being stated. If this were the sole allegation in relation to the object of the conspiracy, clearly the count would be bad. For to simply allege the intent or object of a conspiracy to be to commit divers offenses, without specifying any particular offense is repugnant to the elementary principles of criminal pleading. But here it is stated as an object of the alleged conspiracy, that the defendants conspired to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits before mentioned, and of large sums of money in respect of the taxes upon distilled spirits. Here are specific, particular objects alleged. Does the further statement "and to commit divers offenses," etc., vitiate the count?

"The general rule is, that the charge must be laid in the indictment, so as to bring the case within the description of the offense as given in the statute, alleging distinctively all the essential requisites that constitute it." U. S. v. Staats, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 44. "All matters necessary to constitute the offense must be pleaded." U. S. v. Prescott [Case No. 16,084.] An indictment must set forth the particular facts and circumstances constituting the offense charged. Allen v. State, 5 Wis. 335; Fink v. Milwaukee, 17 Wis. 26; Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 125. These are elementary principles. The allegations of the count wherein are set forth the particular purpose or object of the alleged conspiracy, namely, to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits described, and to cheat and defraud the United States of divers large sums of money in respect of the taxes upon distilled spirits are beyond question sufficient. This, with the alleged overt acts following the conspiracy clause, points out with sufficient clearness the offense charged, so that the defendants can be advised of the nature of the offense, and prepare for trial. In Stoughton v. State, 2 Ohio St. 562, Judge Thurman holds the true rule, "that unreasonable strictness ought not to be required, and where an indictment clearly charges a crime and fairly advises the defendant what act of his is the subject of complaint, the principal object of pleading is attained. The highest degree of certainty is not required. Certainty to a common intent is sufficient." The statement of one of the objects of the conspiracy as being "to cheat and defraud the United States of divers large sums of money," is sanctioned by the precedents and by the highest authority. Whart. Prec. Ind. 638. We have then a count containing apt allegations covering a statutory offense, and then an added allegation of a further purpose of the alleged conspiracy, namely, "to commit divers offenses" without enumerating them. Does the whole count fall because of the insufficiency of the last mentioned averment?

In the case of U. S. v. Clark [Case No. 14,804], cited by defendant's counsel, the indictment charged one offense, perjury: and the entire charge failed because the indictment did not throughout allege the offense to have been committed in any court of the United States, nor in any deposition taken pursuant to its laws. There was a failure to allege any offense whatever within the purview of any statute.

In Rex v. Fowle, 4 Car. & P. 592, the indictment simply charged the defendants with conspiring "to cheat and defraud the just and lawful creditors of W. F." That was all. There was no further statement of the conspiracy nor of any overt act, and the case is radically dissimilar to that at bar.

Hartmann v. Com., 5 Pa. St. 65, would be an authority supporting strongly the position of defendant's counsel, if no statutory offense, as the object of the conspiracy, were particularly set forth in the indictment.

The case of U. S. v. Bettilini [Case No. 14,587], also cited, is a strong authority to the point that an indictment should embrace "a certain description of the crime of which the defendant is accused, and a statement of the facts by which it is constituted;" and upon this elementary principle there can be no controversy. As I have said, if this indictment simply charged a conspiracy to commit divers offenses against the United States and the internal revenue laws thereof, it would be unquestionably bad. No evidence can be permitted to be given under that allegation in this count. Why may it not be rejected as surplusage, when precise and specific offenses are previously alleged as among the purposes of the supposed conspiracy?

Mr. Bishop (1 Cr. Proc. § 497) says that "if an indictment is founded on a statute, and it contains allegations covering all the terms of the statute and making a complete offense, and then if it adds something by way of making the offense appear more enormous, the latter matter may be disregarded as mere surplusage." Again he says (section 480), "suppose there is matter in the indictment defectively alleged; yet if rejecting all this, enough remains to meet the requirements of the law, the indictment is good; the surplusage passes for naught." The case cited by counsel for the government, of Com. v. Bolkom, 3 Pick. 281, upon this question, seems to be in point. In that case, it was held that in an indictment charging an innholder with suffering persons "to play at cards and other unlawful games, the words 'unlawful games,' might be rejected as surplusage." In the case of Com. v. Arnold, 4 Pick. 251, where an indictment charged the defendant with permitting persons to play "at the game of cards," it was held that the words "the game" might be rejected. Of course where the rejection of an allegation would vitally impair the structure of an indictment, or render it meaningless, such allegation cannot be disregarded as surplusage. So where the averment is essentially descriptive of the sole offense charged, as in the case of U. S. v. Thomas [Case No. 16,473].

The motion to quash will be denied.

UNITED STATES v. NUTT.

[6 Am. Law Rec. 302; 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 386; 10 Chi. Leg. News, 60; 1 Month. Jur. 499; 2 Cin. Law Bul. 263, 269.] [1]

District Court, N. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1877.

OFFENSES AGAINST POSTAL LAWS—APPROPRIATING ANOTHER'S LETTERS—INTENT—DEFENSES.

1. On an indictment under section 3892 of the Revised Statutes, for taking a letter from a post-office with intent to obstruct correspondence, the defendant may be convicted without evidence of an unlawful, clandestine or fraudulent taking.

2. In such case "correspondence" may be "obstructed" within the statute by an intentional non-delivery of the letter so taken from a post-office.

3. A party indicted for such taking of a letter with intent "to pry into the business or secrets of another," can not be convicted, if he knew the contents of the letter before he received it.

4. It is no defense for a party indicted for such taking of a letter that it related in part to his business, or business in which he was interested.

5. In such case it is no defense that the accused, in good faith, believed that the letter was of no value to the person to whom it was addressed, even if such be the fact.

6. The writer of a letter, which has passed from the office where mailed, has no right to intercept it, or authorize its delivery to a person other than the one to whom it is directed. [Quoted in United States v. McCready, 11 Fed. 231.]

7. It is no defense that the letter was voluntarily delivered to the defendant by the postmaster.

The indictment is under section 3892 of the Revised Statutes, and charges that in said district, defendant, on April 11, 1877, "did unlawfully take a certain letter, then and there directed to one Isaac Baughman, Quincy, Ohio, from the post-office at Quincy, in said district, the said letter not then and there containing any article of value, and before the same had been delivered to the person to whom it was as aforesaid directed, with a design then and there to obstruct the correspondence, and to pry into the business and secrets of another, contrary to the form of the statute," etc.

Wm. Lawrence and Wm. B. Neff, for defendant, moved to quash the indictment because the count contained three misdemeanors; did not allege that the letter was ever in the mail or care of a post-master, and did not aver whose business or secrets defendant intended to pry into. Whart. Prec. Ind. 1099; U. S. v. Mulvaney [Case No. 15,833]; U. S. v. Sander [Id. 16,219].

J. C. Lee, U. S. Dist. Atty., entered a nolle.

The grand jury immediately reported another indictment, substantially in the same form, containing three counts, one charging an intent to obstruct the correspondence of Baughman; and a second charging intent to pry into business of Baughman; and a third, an intent to pry into the secrets of Baughman.

The case was tried to a jury. There was evidence tending to show that John M. Nutt, of Sidney, and Wm. A. Nutt, of Quincy, were partners as Nutt Brothers, having a warehouse, and dealing in grain at Quincy; that in June, 1876, Baughman stored 500 bushels of wheat at the warehouse, to be kept until he should elect to sell it; that in March, 1877, Baughman requested Wm. A. Nutt to inform him when the price reached $1.50 per bushel, and said that he would then sell; that on the 9th of April, John M. Nutt sent in the mail from Sidney a letter to Baughman at Quincy, signed "Nutt Brothers," offering $1.50 per bushel, and requesting Baughman to let them know; that on the 10th of April, Wm. A. Nutt went to Sidney, where John M. Nutt informed him the letter had been sent, told him its contents, and gave him a written order, signed "Nutt Brothers," to the post-master at Quincy, to deliver the letter to Wm. A. Nutt, who returned to Quincy, and on the 11th of April asked and obtained from the post-master the letter to take to Baughman, and left the order with the post-master; that on the 11th of April he took the letter two miles, to Baughman's farm, where he offered the letter to Baughman (though Baughman denies that it was so offered), and Nutt then offered to buy his wheat at $1.50; that Baughman declined to receive the letter, saying the writing of a letter would not sell his wheat; that during the interview it was agreed that Nutt Brothers should have the wheat at $1.52 per bushel; that on the 13th of April, Baughman got some mail matter from the post-master at Quincy, who informed him that he had given the letter to Nutt; that Baughman, having learned that wheat had advanced in price, had some controversy with Wm. A. Nutt as to the sale, and the cost of storage, and asked Nutt about the letter, when Nutt replied, "Oh, I forgot;" and, taking a package of about a dozen letters from his pocket, offered the letter to Baughman, who, observing that it had been opened, declined to take it. Nutt proved an unblemished reputation.

Wm. Lawrence, and for defendant on the trial, objected to the evidence that a letter was sent in the mail, because the indictment did not aver that it had been in the mail or in the care of a post-master.

WELKER, District Judge, overruled the objection because it was alleged in the indictment that the letter was "taken from the post-office," being a substantial following of the words of the statute.

Wm. Lawrence, in the argument, made the following questions of law to the court:

(1) If the post-master voluntarily and without any fraud of Nutt delivered the letter to him, this is not a "taking" within the statute. To "take" "from a post-office" is one thing—to receive from a post-master is very different. The word "take" is copied from section 22 of the post-office act of March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 108], by which it is made an offense to "take a letter from a post-office," and another offense to take with intent to destroy, and another to take with intent to obstruct correspondence or pry into business. But in all the taking must be clandestine or fraudulent. The law now in force is copied from this, and must receive the same construction. All doubt is to be resolved for defendant in construing the statute. U. S. v. Pearce [Case No. 16,020]; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 828, 249, 133; Bish. St. Crimes, §§ 189–196; Webst. Dict. "Take"; U. S. v. Mulvany [Case No. 15,833]; U. S. v. Parsons [Id. 16,000].

(2) The words of the statute, "with a design to obstruct the correspondence," do not apply to the non-delivery of a letter, but only to a case where there is a design to prevent an answer or other correspondence. The word "correspondence" is derived from "con" and "respondere," meaning an answer to a letter sent—a response. The statute is to be strictly construed. Bish. St. Crimes, §§ 189–196; 1 Bish. Cr. Law (3d Ed.) § 249.

(3) If Nutt knew the contents of the letter before he received it, he can not be convicted of prying into the secrets or business contained in it

(4) If Nutt was a partner in the firm of Nutt Brothers, and interested in the letter, he can not be guilty of prying into the business of "another" The statute was designed to protect the privacy of correspondence against the inspection of parties having no interest in it This is the necessary meaning of the words "the business of another."

(5) If the defendant in good faith believed that the letter became of no value to Baughman, and in fact was of no value, because Wm. A. Nutt purchased the wheat for Nutt Brothers at $1.52 a bushel, when the letter only offered $1.50, and for that reason failed to deliver it, this is a complete defense.

He made and argued other propositions of law which were not controverted.

Wm. B. Neff, for defendant.

The writer of the letter had a right to control it. If defendant received it from the post-master on the written order for it, this is a defense. U. S. v. Tanner [Case No. 16,430].

J. C. Lee, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Edward S. Meyer, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

WELKER, District Judge (charging jury). The defendant, William A. Nutt, is charged in the indictment with three offenses against the post-office laws. The first count charges him with having at a certain time taken out of the post-office at Quincy, Ohio, a letter addressed to Isaac Baughman, with the design to obstruct the correspondence of said Isaac Baughman. The second charges him with having taken out of the same post-office, the same letter, with the design to pry into the business of said Baughman. The third count charges him with having taken the same letter out of the post-office, with the design to pry into the secrets of said Baughman. In the consideration of this case, you may regard the last two counts as being substantially one charge. To all of these charges the defendant has interposed a plea of not guilty. You are to start off in the investigation of these charges against the defendant with the presumption that the law, as a shield, throws around every man charged with a crime that he is innocent of the alleged charges; and to hold the government to strict proof of all the material allegations, and the charges of crime against the defendant. You are to hold the government in the proof, to the establishment of all the facts necessary to constitute a violation of the statute; not by a mere preponderance of proof, but to establish each one of the necessary facts to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt; not a captious, but a fair and well founded doubt that may arise in relation to any one of the necessary facts. Holding the government to this proof, you will proceed to the investigation of this case in the light of the evidence you have had presented to you. In the first place, it is necessary that the government establish the fact of the taking of the letter out of the post-office at the place named. As to this fact, a question of law has been raised in regard to the nature of the taking, upon which it is important I should instruct you. It is not disputed that the defendant did get the letter directed to Baughman out of the post-office by the consent of the post-master, and without the consent or direction of said Baughman. You may regard that as a conceded fact. But it is claimed by the defendant, that if the letter was obtained from the post-office with the assent and consent of the post-master, it was not a taking under the provisions of the statute making it an offense. I direct you on that subject that the taking of a letter out of the post-office in which it was regularly received, by a person other than the person to whom it was addressed, and without his consent or direction, but with the consent of the post-master, who voluntarily delivers it to him to be delivered to the proper person, if taken or received by such person with the design, at the time, to obstruct the correspondence or pry into the business or secrets of the person to whom it is addressed, is a violation of the statute. The consent of the post-master in delivering the letter to the defendant does not screen him from violation of the statute, provided he took it with the design specified in the statute; or, in other words, it is not a defense to show that the post-master voluntarily delivered the letter to the defendant. It is not necessary to show that the letter was unlawfully or clandestinely taken from the office by the defendant, to make the taking, with the design specified, a violation of the statute. The principal question in this case is as to the design of the defendant at the time he took the letter out of the post-office. The evidence must satisfy you of this design and purpose at the time the letter was taken out of the post-office; for if an offense or crime was committed it must have been such at the time the defendant obtained the letter, for it consists in taking it out with the design to obstruct correspondence, or pry into the business or secrets of Baughman. Look into the evidence there, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the government has established, beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant at the time he took the letter out of the office, did so with the design named in the statute. Evidence was presented to you showing a wheat transaction between Baughman and the defendant. You are not to try the question of fraud that may have been practiced on one side or the other in that transaction. It was allowed to go to you for the purpose of throwing light upon the design and intent of the defendant at the time he took the letter, and is to be regarded by you in no other light. It does not matter to you whether the defendant bought the wheat at a lower figure than he ought to have purchased it at, or whether he paid more than its value. Evidence has been introduced on behalf of the defendant for the purpose of showing that the proposition in the letter was for one dollar and fifty cents per bushel, and that the defendant, when he went to negotiate for the purchase of the wheat, had offered one dollar and fifty cents. Evidence has also been introduced tending to show that before the defendant went to the post-office he had been informed by his brother, the writer of the letter, what the proposition was, and what was contained in the letter. If it shall appear to your satisfaction that when the letter was taken out of the office by the defendant he knew the contents, and the proposition contained in it, it can hardly be said that he took it out with the design and intent to pry into the business or secrets, which he knew before he got the letter. Look at that branch of the case, with the evidence before you, and it is for you to say whether you are satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he took the letter with the design to pry into the business or secrets of Baughman.

The main charge in the case is the allegation that the letter was taken out of the office with the design and intent to obstruct correspondence. What is obstructing correspondence? Is it to cut it off entirely, or is it to retard or delay it? If the evidence shows that at the time the letter was received by the defendant it was his intention not to deliver it, or to delay the correspondence by keeping it in his possession for a time after it ought to have been delivered, that is a violation of the statute. It is not necessary to show that the letter was destroyed absolutely, but it is sufficient if the evidence shows obstruction or delay in the correspondence. How is this intent and design to be made out? Intent in the commission of a crime must necessarily be established by a variety of facts, and gathered from circumstances. Men do not usually declare, when they perform an act, what their intent and purpose is in doing it. An intent is properly to be made out by circumstantial proof by showing what took place at the time or after the delivery of the letter to the defendant. Therefore I have allowed to go in evidence for your consideration all of the circumstances surrounding this whole transaction, to enable you to determine the intent of the taking of the letter. These various circumstances tending to show that are to be considered by you to enable you to determine the purpose, and the weight and effect of them is with you to settle. It is claimed on behalf of the defendant that the first opportunity he had he offered the letter to Baughman, and it was refused by him, because it was opened. I direct you that if at any time Baughman had been offered the letter, and refused to take it because it had been opened, you may regard that as a delivery to him, and it was his duty to have taken it. It is claimed by the defendant that such offer was made on the day of the sale of the wheat, the 11th of April, and, on the other side, that it was not done until the 13th of April. You will determine when that offer was made. In relation to the question of design and intent I direct you that if a person take a letter out of the post-office addressed to another, without the authority or direction of the person to whom it was addressed, with the declared purpose of delivering, and does not deliver it the first opportunity he has, the law raises the inference by that fact, that when he got the letter he did not intend to so deliver it. But that inference, like every other presumption of the law, may be overthrown by showing facts and circumstances that occurred between the parties afterward, showing what was the original design and purpose. The mere taking the letter out of the office is no crime unless done with the design described in the statute. Does the evidence, as a whole, satisfy you that the defendant designed and intended originally to obstruct correspondence? It does not matter whether the defendant knew it was a violation of the law or not. If he performed an act which is a violation of the law, you are to hold him to such knowledge. If it shall appear to your satisfaction, in the light of all the proof, that the defendant did intend when he took the letter out of the post-office, to deliver it, and that anything occurred between Baughman and the defendant afterward in their subsequent transactions that led the defendant to conclude not to deliver it, that change of opinion and purpose, after such receipt of the letter, does not constitute a violation of the statute. But it is for the defendant to show a reason for such change, such as will satisfy you that he did not intend originally to obstruct or delay the correspondence.

Another question was raised by counsel for the defendant. The evidence shows that the defendant's brother, the writer of the letter, gave to the defendant an order to the post-master, directing him to hand over to the defendant the letter directed to Baughman, which he took with him and presented to the post-master at the time he received the letter, which the post-master refused to recognize as authority for its delivery. It is claimed that the defendant had a right, under that order, to get possession of the letter. I direct you on that subject that where a letter is placed in the hands of the officer charged with the duty of mailing, and has been mailed and passed the mailing office into the custody of the post-office department for delivery, the writer loses control of it, and the alleged writer has no right to take it out of such custody, or prevent or delay such delivery. It is no defense in this case that the letter related in part to the business of the defendant, or business in which he was interested with Baughman. Nor is it any defense that the defendant, in good faith, believed at the time he took it out of the post-office that it was of no value to Baughman. Evidence has been given to you showing the general good character of the defendant. In all criminal prosecutions, and also for offenses, it is always competent for the defendant to give in evidence his general good character in relation to the character of the charge against him—in this case, for honesty and integrity. If there is any fair doubt in your minds as to the original criminal intent of defendant in relation to this letter, and the defendant has established in the proof a good character in relation to honesty and integrity among his neighbors and acquaintances, such doubt ought to be solved in favor of the defendant, and entitle him to an acquittal.

I am asked by counsel for defendant to say to you that a defendant can not be guilty of a crime unless he does an unlawful act and with a criminal intent. I have already said that to you substantially, and now say to you that it is a correct general proposition.

I am also asked to say to you that if it appear from the evidence that the failure to deliver the letter was through the forgetfulness and mere neglect of the defendant, that he did not violate the statute. I direct you that if through mere carelessness and neglect the defendant did not deliver the letter, and that carelessness and neglect is explained to your satisfaction, in the circumstances of the case, that would exonerate him from the criminal intent, for it must appear affirmatively that the design to obstruct correspondence was in the mind of the defendant at the time the letter was procured from the office. Take the case, gentlemen, look into all the evidence, and, in the light of all the proof and under the rules of law I have given you, say whether the defendant is guilty or not guilty of the charges alleged against him in the indictment.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. NYE et al.

[2 Curt. 225.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1855.

SEAMEN—ATTEMPT TO REVOLT—APPOINTMENT OF MASTER—UNSEAWORTHINESS.

1. If seamen are induced to ship by a false representation as to the person who is to command, whether they are bound by the contract, quære. But the owners may change the master after they have shipped.

2. A combination by the crew to prevent the vessel from going to sea, pursuant to the order of the master, is an attempt to commit a revolt.

[Cited in U. S. v. Huff, 13 Fed. 637.]

3. If seamen have reason to believe, and do believe a vessel is unseaworthy before the voyage is begun, they may lawfully refuse to go to sea in her. But they must prove these facts.

[Cited in The Heroe, 21 Fed. 528.]

The four defendants [Alfred Nye and three others] were put on their trial for the offence of endeavoring to make a revolt, on an indictment found under second section of the act of March 3, 1835 (4 Stat. 776). The evidence showed that they were regularly shipped for a voyage from Boston to East Florida, in the brig Leghorn. The shipping articles which they signed named one Burgess as master; but it appeared that one Rose had been spoken of to one of the men, as master, before the articles were signed. He was expected by the owners to go as master, but before the articles were drawn up, Burgess was substituted in his place. The defendants constituted the entire crew. At the appointed time, the defendants were taken on board the brig by the shipping master; but when the pilot came on board, and orders were given to get the anchor and make sail, to go to sea, they all refused to do ship's duty, and declared they would not go to sea in the brig. In answer to the order of the master to go forward and make sail, they refused; and declared they would not go to sea in the vessel. They said the brig was not seaworthy, but specified no particular defect, and did not ask for a survey. They were perfectly sober, and offered no violence. They only unitedly refused to obey the orders of the master to make sail, or get the anchor. There was evidence that the vessel was sea-worthy, and that after these men had been removed, a new crew was obtained, and the brig went to sea. There was other evidence that many of the rattlings were broken and the standing rigging required much repair; but it did not appear that it was in such a condition as to render it unsafe for the vessel to proceed on the voyage.

J. H. Prince, for the defence, contended that, the first section of this act had defined the offence of making a revolt; that mere refusal to do duty in a harbor, no force being used, or threatened, did not amount to that offence; and that the offence of endeavoring to make a revolt, described in the second section, was not committed, because the defendants attempted to do nothing but what they did, that is, refuse to do duty. He further insisted that, if the men were shipped under the belief that they were to go with Captain Rose, and this was held out to them as an inducement, without which they would not have engaged, they were not bound to go to sea with another master. He also insisted that, if the men honestly believed the brig was not sea-worthy, they were justified in refusing to go to sea in the brig.

These points were briefly spoken to by him and by Mr. Hallett, U. S. Dist. Atty.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. Since the adjournment of the court I have looked into the authorities, and considered the points made at the bar. As to the change of master, there is no evidence that the men were induced to ship by a false representation that Rose was to go as master. If they were, it would deserve very serious consideration, whether they were bound by the contract. The evidence is, that Rose had been spoken of as master to one of the men, but not as certain to go; that Burgess had in fact been appointed, before the articles were signed, and his name is in the articles. Even if Rose had been master when the defendants shipped, the owners had power to change him for another. U. S. v. Haines [Case No. 15,275]; U. S. v. Cassedy [Id. 14,745]. This point cannot avail the defendants.

The objection arising from the alleged defect of evidence to prove the offence decribed by the act of congress, is attended with more difficulty. The crimes act of April 30, 1790, § 12 (1 Stat. 115), made it an offence to "endeavor to make a revolt." It contained no other description of the offence, and no definition of a revolt. It was under this act, the cases of U. S. v. Haines [supra], U. S. v. Gardner [Case No. 15,188], and U. S. v. Barker [Id. 14,516], were decided. In the first of these cases, it was held that, a total suspension of the command of the master, by the illegal refusal of the men to obey any and all his orders, was a revolt; and that a combination so to refuse, followed by an actual refusal in some one instance, was an endeavor to make a revolt. And this continued to be the law laid down by this court in subsequent cases. The act of March 3, 1835, § 1 (4 Stat. 776), has defined the offence of revolt, and among other things which may constitute it, is "unlawfully, wilfully, and with force, or by fraud, threats, or other intimidations, deprive the master of his lawful authority and command." Now the argument is—that in this case, the men used no force or fraud, and uttered no threats, and did nothing to intimidate the master. But this does not meet the point. They are not indicted for making a revolt, but for endeavoring to make one; and therefore, though they did not make one, but did in fact deprive the master of his lawful authority, and this by means of a combination which embraced the entire crew, and left the master without means to enforce his authority, the question is, if this was not an endeavor to intimidate him; or if this was not so, whether their combination to refuse to do duty, if it existed, did not also include a combination to resist the lawful commands of the master, to make sail and go to sea. In the case of U. S. v. Cassedy [supra], Mr. Justice Story, in the trial of an indictment under this act, instructed the jury that the question was, "whether there was among the defendants a common confederacy to refuse to do further duty on board the ship, and to resist the lawful commands of the officers in regard to the sailing or preparation for the voyage." This would include a confederacy to resist by force, threats, or intimidations of any kind. The proper instruction in this case, I consider to be this: if there was a confederacy and combination by the defendants, to refuse to go to sea in the brig, and to prevent the brig from sailing, pursuant to the orders of the master, while they were on board, and this determination was made known to the master, there was an endeavor to commit a revolt, within the meaning of the act of congress. Reg. v. McGregor, 1 Car. & K. 429.

The other question, of the right of the crew to refuse to go to sea in the brig, on account of alleged unseaworthiness, was considered by Mr. Justice Story, in U. S. v. Ashton [Case No. 14,470]; and also by Mr. Justice Woodbury in U. S. v. Staly [Id. 16,374]. I think the correct rule is, that after the men have rendered themselves on board, pursuant to their contract, and before the voyage is begun, they may lawfully refuse to go to sea in the vessel, if they have reasonable cause to believe, and do believe, the vessel to be unseaworthy. But the presumption is that the vessel was sea-worthy; and the seamen must prove that they acted in good faith, and upon reasonable grounds of belief that the ship was not in a fit condition to go to sea, by reason of unseaworthiness. If they prove this, they are justified in their refusal, and are not guilty of any offence in this case.

The jury found the defendants guilty.

Before sentence, the court remarked that, though satisfied with the verdict, which affirmed the seaworthiness of the vessel, the evidence showed some of the standing rigging to have been in bad order; and that it was not a proper practice to send a vessel to sea, with the rigging in such a condition, as to impose on the crew the labor of very considerable repairs at the outset of the voyage; that though the conduct of the men was unjustifiable, it found one palliating circumstance, in the state of the rigging, and another, in the fact that they came on board sober, and fit for duty, and offered no actual violence to either of the officers. In addition to the imprisonment of fifteen days, already suffered, the sentence was, a further imprisonment of fifteen days.

UNITED STATES v. OBERMEYER.

District Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 27, 1872.

INTERNAL REVENUE — BREWER'S BOOK — ENTRIES — PENALTY.

The forty-ninth section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 164), provided that every brewer should "enter or cause to be entered, in a book to be kept by him for that purpose," the number of barrels of fermented liquor made by him on each day. The fifty-first section of the same act provided that every brewer who "shall intentionally make a false entry in said book, or in said statement, or knowingly allow or procure the same to be done, shall forfeit, for every such offence, all the liquors made by him or for him, and all the vessels, utensils, and apparatus used in making the same, and be liable to a penalty of not less than $500, nor more than $1,000, to be recovered, with costs of suit, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year. And any brewer who shall neglect to keep the books, or refuse to furnish the account and duplicate thereof, as provided by law, * * * shall, for every such neglect or refusal, forfeit and pay the sum of $300." Held, that the latter clause of the section did not affix the penalty of $300 to the omission to make proper entries in a book kept by him, but to the failure to keep any book at all.

This case came up on a motion in behalf of the United States, for a new trial, the court, on the trial, having directed a verdict for the defendant [David Obermeyer].

John J. Allen, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Kaufman, Frank & Pryor, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. In this case, the question reserved at the trial was, whether the omission by a brewer to enter in his brewer's book a true account of the barrels of fermented liquors made by him, as required by section 49 of the internal revenue act of 1866, renders him liable to forfeit and pay $300, under the provision of the last clause of section 51 of the same act, notwithstanding it appears that the brewer had provided himself with a book in proper form, and had made and put in it what purported to be the account required by section 49, the items of which, however, were not correct.

By section 51, any fraudulent neglect or refusal to make true and exact entries in the brewer's book is made punishable by forfeiture and fine and imprisonment. The section next provides for a false entry in the book, intentionally made, which is also punishable by forfeiture, fine, and imprisonment; and then the section declares, that "any brewer who shall neglect to keep the books, or refuse to furnish the account, and duplicate thereof, as provided by law, * * * shall forfeit and pay the sum of $300." The government contends that the words in this last clause, "as provided by law," must be held to apply to the keeping of the books, as well as to the refusal to furnish the account, and that the provision must be construed to cover every case of failure to make correct entries in the book, as required by section 49. On the part of the defence, it is insisted that the clause in question was intended to provide for the case of a total omission to have any book, containing what purports to be the account required by section 49 to be entered in the brewer's book. I am of the opinion that the latter is the true construction of the clause, and that, where, as in this case, the brewer has kept a book, which contains what purports to be an account such as is required by section 49, he is not liable to an action for the $300, provided for in the fifty-first section. So construed, the section provides a punishment for any fraudulent omissions in the account, and also for any false entries intentionally made therein, but does not punish an accidental omission of an item, or an unintentional error in the account as kept, and its effect will be reasonable and just. The words, "keep the book," are elsewhere used, but not always, if ever, as equivalent to the words, "make correct entries in the book," which is what the government contends for here. Thus, in the seventh section of the act, in respect to cotton, the provision is, "if any person shall neglect to keep such book, or make false entries in such book." That the distinction indicated in the seventh section is intended to be made in section 51 is shown, I think, by the provisions of the section. Were there no provision in regard to the entries in the book, a different construction might be maintained.

The motion for new trial is accordingly denied, and judgment will be entered for the defendant.

UNITED STATES v. O'BRIAN.

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. Nov. Term, 1873.

CRIMINAL LAW—"FLEEING FROM JUSTICE"—LIMITATION OF PROSECUTIONS.

A "fleeing from justice" within the meaning of the act of congress limiting criminal prosecutions, is to leave one's home, residence or known place of abode, within the district, or to conceal one's self therein, with intent, in either case, to avoid detection or punishment for some public offence against the United States.

[Cited in Malme v. Handley, 81 Ala. 117, 8 South. 189.]

The defendant [Thomas M. O'Brian] was indicted under the act of February 5, 1867, § 1 (14 Stat. 383), for selling to Hines & Eaves, bankers in Leavenworth, a check drawn by the pay-master of the army of the United States, upon the assistant United States treasurer of New York, with a forged indorsement of the name of the payee thereon, with the intent by the said act prohibited. Under the plea of not guilty, the main question in the case was whether the offense was barred by the statute of limitations (1 Stat. 117, § 32; 1 Brightly, Dig. 322, § 107). To take the case out of the statute, the government relied upon the proviso that the act shall not "extend to persons fleeing from justice." In relation to this defense, the jury was charged orally as given below.

C. I. Scofield, Dist. Atty., and Thomas Ryan, for the United States.

Thos. P. Fenlon, and J. W. English, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The offense is charged to have been committed on the 31st day of December, 1867, and the indictment was not found until the 6th day of May, 1873, —more than five years afterwards. The indictment alleges also that the defendant is a person fleeing from justice in this district, and that he has been thus fleeing since the 1st day of December, 1869.

The limitation statutes of congress require an indictment for an offense, such as that here charged, to be found within two years from the time the offense was committed; but the statute contains a proviso, that the bar or the limitation shall not "extend to any person or persons fleeing from justice."

It becomes necessary to construe this proviso. It is in evidence that the defendant left the district of Kansas in August, 1869, and that he was afterwards publicly employed in the pay-master's department of the army in New Orleans, and that he afterwards resided for a time in Little Rock, in St. Louis, and in Colorado, where he was arrested after this indictment was found. Before August, 1869, he had resided for some years in Leavenworth, doing business as a claim agent and was well known there, and evidence has been introduced by the defendant to show that after he left Leavenworth, he was seen by different citizens of that place, in the cities above named, and that his whereabouts was generally known in Leavenworth and among all his acquaintances.

There is also evidence that there was a criminal proceeding pending against him when he left Kansas, in the state court at Leavenworth for a violation of the laws of the state. There is no evidence that the defendant voluntarily returned to the district of Kansas, or had been therein since his departure in 1869.

It is necessary to determine upon the evidence, the motives of the defendant in leaving the state in the summer of 1869,—or more specifically to determine whether he at that time fled from justice.

What is "fleeing from justice," within the meaning of the statute? Having reference to the facts in this case, my answer is, it means to leave one's home or residence or known place of abode, with intent to avoid detection or punishment for some public offense against the United States. It results from, or is implied in this definition, that if the defendant left his home in Leavenworth solely to avoid the criminal justice of the state of Kansas, and not to avoid the criminal justice of the United States, this will not deprive him of the two years limitation.

The criminal codes of the general government and of the states are entirely distinct, as was held by this court in U. S. v. Hawthorne [Case No. 15,332], and in my opinion it cannot be supposed that congress intended to make any provision in respect to persons fleeing from the justice of the states.

It is implied also in the definition above given, that mere departure by the defendant from the limits of the district of Kansas, irrespective of the motives and purposes of such departure, is not a fleeing from justice. An offender may flee from justice, within the meaning of the statute under consideration, though he never left the limits of the district; as for example, by secretly concealing himself, or by not being usually and publicly known as being within it. If the defendant, after his departure from Kansas, publicly resided in various places in the United States, did not conceal his whereabouts, and kept up an open correspondence with his friends in Kansas, these facts may be properly taken into view by the jury in connection with other circumstances in evidence, in forming their opinion of his intent and purpose in leaving the state in August, 1869.

The jury found for the defendant, on the ground that the prosecution for the offense was barred.

NOTE. The decisions upon the proviso of the act of April 30, 1790, as to "fleeing from justice," are not numerous. It was decided by Chief Justice Ellsworth, in Williams's Case [Case No. 17,708], that it need not be a fleeing from prosecution already begun,—so stated by Mr. District Judge Edwards in U. S. v. Smith [Id. 16,332], which was a case in the circuit court for the district of Connecticut, 1809, and where the same view was taken. Nor need it be fleeing from process issued. U. S. v. White [Cases Nos. 16,675, 16,678, and 16,679].

Whether mere departure from the United States is a fleeing from justice, or whether if the defendant fled the district, but within two years openly returned to it, he can avail himself of the statute—see the cases above cited. The Case of O'Brian seems to be the first one which has ruled the point that the fleeing must have been from the criminal justice of the United States—and that is not sufficient if the sole motive of the defendant in leaving his known place of abode was to avoid the criminal justice of the state. The point, however, is not free from difficulty.

Although the indictment in O'Brian's Case alleged that the defendant had fled from justice, this is not necessary. The defendant may avail himself of the statute of limitations, either by special plea or under the general issue. If he pleads specially, the government may reply that he fled from justice. And under the general issue, the prosecutor may introduce evidence to bring the defendant within the exception of the statute. U. S. v. Cook, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 168, decided at the December term, 1872, of the United States supreme court, where the subject is fully examined by Mr. Justice Clifford; same case with valuable note, 12 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 682.

Case No. 15,909.

District Court, D. New Jersey. 1868.

INTERNAL REVENUE ACT—FRAUDULENT DISTILLER'S BOND.

[1. On a prosecution for executing and signing a false and fraudulent bond, it is no defense that defendant knew nothing of his sureties, but hired a man to obtain them, and that they swore to all that was required by law.]

[2. Testimony, by a subscribing witness to the bond, that three of the signers thereof signed in his presence, but that the bond was taken away for the other party to sign, and that it was returned with his signature, which the witness proved, having seen him write his name to another bond, is sufficient proof of the execution of the bond by such absent party.]

This was an indictment under section 42 of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], against Luke O'Brien, William H. Hooper, and others, charging the defendants with executing and signing a false and fraudulent distillers' bond.

A. Q. Keasbey, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Henry Young, Asst. U. S. Atty.

Jonathan Dixon, Jr., and Isaac W. Scudder, for defendant.

When the case was called, the defendant's counsel who appeared only for the principals, moved for a separate trial as to them, which was consented to on the part of the government. Mr. Dixon then asked leave to withdraw the plea of not guilty, for the purpose of moving to quash the indictment, which was granted.

The motion to quash was urged on the following grounds: (1) Because the alleged fraudulent bond was not set out at length in words and figures. (2) Because the allegations in the indictment that the bond was required by the internal revenue laws and regulations, and was attempted to be used in fraud of the internal revenue laws, were made in general terms, without showing how it was required, or in what manner it was attempted to be used. (3) Because the allegations of the false and fraudulent character of the bond were not made with sufficient certainty. (4) Because the statute does not declare the act to be a crime or misdemeanor, and therefore an indictment will not lie.

After argument the judge overruled the motion, stating that the quashing of an indictment was entirely a matter of discretion, and that it would never be done where the defendant had pleaded, and had ample time to make the objection, but had delayed until the witnesses were summoned and the case ready for trial, unless in a case entirely clear of doubt. The court would leave the defendants to their motion in arrest of judgment. The judge went on to discuss the objections made to the indictment, and stated that he was satisfied that none of them could be maintained, and ordered the case to proceed.

FIELD, District Judge (charging jury). This is an indictment for executing and signing a false and fraudulent bond, attempted to be used in fraud of the internal revenue laws. The case is important from the fact of its being the first indictment for this offence that has ever been tried, at least in this district. The whole country is ringing with reports of enormous frauds committed against the revenue laws. They have reached a magnitude perfectly appalling, and unless checked, they threaten to sap the foundations of public credit, to rob the government of its means of support, to bring the law into contempt, and load with reproach our national character. A prolific source of these frauds, the machinery by means of which many of them are effected, is the use of false and fraudulent bonds. Prevent the use of such bonds, and you nip these frauds in the bud.

Let me explain this to you, for it is a matter that may be unfamiliar to most of you. Before a man can engage in the business of distilling whiskey or oil, he must give a bond to the United States, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the collector, with a condition that he will comply with the requirements of law; that he will keep books in the form prescribed, and make true entries of his business, and make faithful returns of his production, and pay all the taxes due thereon, so that, before whiskey could be withdrawn from a bonded warehouse for exportation, re-distillation, or transportation (before the recent change in the law), a bond must be given in like manner; and if these bonds be really good and sufficient, they afford protection to the government against frauds by the distiller, and stand in the place of spirits removed from bonded warehouses. Thus, you perceive, that an easy mode of committing frauds is by palming off upon the collectors false and fraudulent bonds. It is an alarming fact, that many of all such bonds given in relation to the immense trade in whiskey within the last year or two, have been found to be absolutely worthless, and the treasury has thus been defrauded of millions.

But this case is also important from the character of the defense set up. If it is good in this case, it will be good in every indictment for a similar offence. It was admitted that this bond was false and fraudulent. It could not be denied. The testimony of Mr. Vanwinkle, deputy collector, and Mr. Merwin, an inspector, detailed for the special duty of examining revenue bonds, leaves no doubt on this point. Mr. Vanwinkle proves the execution of the bond, and that the sureties, Wm. L. Thomas and Joseph Gregory, were brought to him by O'Brien, and represented by him to be good; that they testified before the collector, on what is known as form 33, in which Thomas swore he lived at 165 Schermerhorn street, Brooklyn, and Gregory, that he was a commission merchant at 27 South street, New York, and owned a house and lot No. 162 West Twenty-seventh street, on the corner of Tenth avenue; and both swore that they were worth $5,000 after all their debts were paid. Mr. Merwin testifies that he went to 165 Schermerhorn street, and found indeed, a Mr. Thomas living there, but not Wm. L. Thomas; it was Wm. M. Thomas, a man of respectability and property, who is also called as a witness, and swears that he never saw or heard of the bond. Mr. Merwin also swears, that he ascertained that Gregory had no place of business, and no business at all but what little he picked up about the wharves, and that there was no such house as 162 West Twenty-Seventh street, near the corner of Tenth avenue, or owned by Gregory.

Having shown the execution of the bond by the defendants, their representations that the sureties were good, and the false and fraudulent character of the bond, the government rested. Now, upon this evidence, the defendant's counsel might have gone before the jury, and with some plausibility have contended that the defendants did not know that the bond was false; that they might themselves have been deceived; that there was nothing to show fraud or guilty knowledge, and that the most that could have been charged was culpable carelessness. But they did not take this course; they asked the court, indeed, to arrest the further progress of the case, and say to the jury that there was no evidence of fraud. This the court could not do. And then they opened their defence, and called one witness to prove it. And it is the nature of that defence, as I said, that gives the case its chief importance. It seems to me an extraordinary defence. Am I mistaken in my view of it, or is it true, that this tide of demoralization has risen so high and spread so widely, that it has swept away all our old-fashioned notions of honesty, blunted our perceptions of truth, and confounded all our distinctions between right and wrong? What is this defence, and what is the testimony by which it is sustained? The character of the defence is revealed by the evidence of their only witness, Edmund Kimball. He lives in Brooklyn, and calls himself a commission merchant. He was employed by an oil inspector named Elisha W. Hinman, on behalf of the defendants, to get sureties on an oil bond. Not, so far as appears, upon any particular bond, but upon an oil bond generally. Not one word said as to the party for whom the surety was to be given—no explanations as to amount, or place, or business, or the means of the principal. He was simply to get sureties on an oil bond. He was to get $90, and pay the sureties out of this fund. He did get two sureties, Fernald and Van Ness, not for this bond, but the first bond given the week before. He paid them $20 each. They were rejected. I will say nothing now about this bond; I wish, for the present, to keep out of view the testimony of Fernald. But the first bond was rejected, and he had to get new sureties. He told Van Ness he must procure them. Van Ness did so. Kimball knew nothing about them. He met them for the first time when he took them to Jersey City. He there introduced them to the defendants as their sureties. They took the required oaths, which, as has been seen, were false in every particular. The bond was taken by the collector and sent to the revenue board.

This is the only evidence offered by the defendants, and this, their counsel say, is a good defence. It is shown that the defendants knew nothing of these men, and had never seen them before. It did not seem to enter into the minds of the defendants' counsel that there was any impropriety in this course of procedure. They insist, and with sincerity I have no doubt that this was a perfectly fair business transaction, that all business is now done by brokers, that a man may sell his credit as he may sell any other commodity, and they ask what harm is there in doing this kind of business through a broker. Gentlemen, did these men sell their credit, and had they any credit to sell? Did they sell credit worth $5,000 to a stranger for $20? Ought not the defendants to have known that they had no credit? The offering of such testimony shows the extent to which the public mind has become debauched on the subject of frauds on the revenue. This is a kind of brokerage which does not seem to have been recognized by the framers of the United States revenue laws. They have taxed every calling they could imagine, and brokers of all kinds and classes but surety brokers seem to have escaped. I know that there are men who haunt the purlieus of the criminal courts, and are paid for getting bail for persons charged with crime, but it is the first time I ever heard such employment called a fair business transaction. If this defence is good, all a man has to do is to prove he knew nothing of his sureties, but hired a man to get them, and that they swore to all that was required. It will be a good defence to every indictment under this law. A man need only fold his arms and shut his eyes, and hire two vagabonds to swear that they are worth the amount named in his bond. It cannot be that this is a good defence. A man who resorts to these practices is bound to know the sureties are good. He takes the very steps to get bad ones. I do not say a man may not pay another to become his surety, but it must be under circumstances showing an honest effort to procure a good one. These defendants took the very course that made it certain that their bond would be false and fraudulent.

I have said nothing as to Fernald's testimony. If the defendants ought not to be convicted without it, you might very properly disregard it. He was one of the sureties on the first bond. He says that he came over with Van Ness at Kimball's request, and went with the defendants to the collector's office to sign the bond. That he asked if he ought not to give his residence in New Jersey, and that one of the defendants told him it would be better to do so, and asked him if he had it ready. That he inquired if the collector was fixed, and was told that he was a friend of the defendant O'Brien, and was all right; that he and Van Ness swore to false residences, and that they owned property which had no existence. All this, so far as you may give it credit, tends to show more clearly the intent of the defendants, and that they did not mean to give a good bond so long as a false one would answer. Fernald is loaded with vituperative eloquence by counsel, but it must be remembered that he is the man whom these defendants offered as their surety, a good and sufficient freeholder residing in Hoboken. You must judge which is the worse, the poor wretch who is picked up in the streets of New York, perhaps suffering for bread for his family, and tempted by a surety-broker to sell his worthless credit for $20, or the business man who hires him for twenty dollars to do it, and stands beside him when he takes the oath for his benefit.

As to the proof of the execution of the bond by Hooper, I think it is sufficient. One subscribing witness was called, and proved that three of the parties signed in his presence, but that the bond was taken away for Hooper to sign, and returned with his signature, which the witness proves, having seen him write his name to the other bond. It must be treated as having been signed in the presence of a witness, and is properly proved.

The questions for you are, whether the bond was false and fraudulent, whether it was executed by the defendants, and whether they had not such knowledge of its character as to make them responsible in justice, in reason, and in morality, for the execution of it, in violation of the statute.

The jury retired, and after an absence of about fifteen minutes returned with a verdict of guilty. The defendants were thereupon immediately sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

2. Though offences of different classes may not be joined. This is the English rule.

3. Offences of the same class, under a statute and at common law in England, may be united in the same indictment.

4. But a late act of congress, requires offences which may be joined, to be included in the same indictment.

5. Offences committed by substantially the same act, it would seem, ought not to be punished as acts committed at different times and under circumstances wholly disconnected.

[This was an indictment against Timothy O'Callahan for passing counterfeit money. Heard on motion to quash.]

Mr. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Backus, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant's counsel move to quash this indictment, on the ground that it contains several charges of distinct offences. In point of law there is no objection to the insertion of several distinct felonies of the same degree, though committed at different times, in the same indictment against the same offender, and it is no ground either of demurrer or arrest of judgment. Upon this ground it has been holden, that an indictment on 37 Geo. III. c. 70, may, without any repugnancy, charge the double act, that the defendant endeavored to incite a soldier to commit mutiny, and also to incite him in traitorous practices. Thus, too, in arson, counts at common law, and on the statute may be joined, without danger; a count for a robbery may be joined with another for stealing privately from the person; and burglary and theft, forcible entry and detainer, have been frequently united in the same proceeding. A count for embezzlement on 39 Geo. III. c. 35, may be joined with a count for a larceny on 2 Geo. II. c. 25, because these offences are felonies; and a count for embezzling bank notes upon 39 Geo. II. c. 85, may be joined with a count for larceny at common law. 2 Hale, P. C. 173; 2 Leach, 1103; 12 Ward, Just. 425; 8 East, 41; 3 Term R. 2, 106; Croke, 6 c. 41; 8 Ward, Just. 211; 1 Bos. & P. 180; 2 Leach, 799; 1 Leach, 473; 2 East, P. C. 935, 936; 2 Leach, 1108; 3 Maule & S. 539. In Archb. Cr. Pl. pp. 55, 56, he says, if a defendant be charged with two or more offences in the same count of an indictment, the count will be bad for duplicity, except in one or two excepted cases. But he remarks, "as to charging a defendant with different offences in different counts, it admits of a different consideration." A defendant, he says, ought not to be charged with different felonies in different counts of an indictment; as for instance, a murder in one count, and a burglary in another.

But a late act of congress has a bearing upon this question and settles it. In the first section of the act "to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States," &c. [10 Stat. 161], it is declared, "That whenever there are or shall be several charges against any person or persons for the same act, or transactions connected together, or for two or more acts or transactions of the same class of crimes or offences which may be properly joined, instead of having several indictments, the whole may be joined in one indictment, in separate counts; and if two or more indictments shall be found in such cases the court may order them consolidated."

The distinct offences, charged in the indictment before us, belong to the same class; it being a charge for passing counterfeit coin, purporting to be gold and silver pieces, at different times, and on different occasions. This may, perhaps, have been done to meet the proofs. But, however this may be, the act of congress referred to, with the view of saving costs, authorizes the charges as they are made; and if distinct indictments had been found, on the separate charges, the act of congress would authorize the court to consolidate them.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

I should be extremely reluctant, where an offence was committed, under a law, in several distinct ways. by the same transactions, to hold the defendant punishable under each. This would be contrary, it seems to me, to the genius of our laws, and to the humanity which characterizes them. Still it must be admitted, where offences of the same class may be charged in the same indictment, committed at different times and under different circumstances, that the punishment, appropriate to each, must be inflicted.

The motion to quash is overruled.

UNITED STATES v. O'FALLON et al.

[15 Blatchf. 298.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 28, 1878.

VERDICT—PARTIES—NEW TRIAL—CONDITIONS.

In an action of assumpsit by the United States against O. and K. and B., K. pleaded the general issue severally, and O. and B. joined in their plea. The cause of action was joint and several. At the trial, the plaintiffs made no claim against B. The jury were instructed by the court that B. was entitled to a verdict. The jury found a verdict against O. and K., but made no finding as to B. Before judgment was entered, all the defendants moved in arrest, and to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was irregular because the issue as to B. was not found: Held, that if the plaintiffs should discontinue the suit as to B., judgment would be entered against O. and K.; that, on such discontinuance, the motion would be overruled; and that, if a discontinuance was not entered, or an amendment not made, B. would be entitled to a new trial, but not the other defendants.

At law.

E. C. Ingersoll and A. B. Herrick, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Sullivan, Kobbé & Fowler, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is an action of assumpsit against James J. O'Fallon, Eugene Kelly, W. D. W. Barnard and one Pride. Pride was not served. The other defendants appeared and pleaded the general issue. Kelly pleaded severally. O'Fallon and Barnard joined in their plea. The alleged cause of action was joint and several. The evident theory of the government, in joining the defendants, was, that they were all partners. Upon the trial, it plainly appeared that O'Fallon and Kelly only were partners, and that Barnard was merely an agent of their firm. The counsel for the government told the jury, in his closing argument, that the plaintiffs made no claim against Barnard. The court charged the jury that Barnard was entitled to a verdict, and that the other two defendants were the real defendants in the case. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs against O'Fallon and Kelly, and made no finding in regard to Barnard. Before the entry of judgment, the three defendants moved in arrest, and to set aside the verdict, and for a venire facias de novo, upon the ground that the verdict was fatally irregular, in that the issue in regard to Barnard was not found.

It is true, as a general rule, that a verdict is bad if it finds only a part of that which was in issue. Patterson v. U. S., 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 221; Cattle v. Andrews, 3 Salk. 372; Jenkins v. Parkhill, 25 Ind. 473. The present case presents, however, but the merest technical omission on the part of the jury. The counsel for the plaintiffs had abandoned their suit against Barnard. The court instructed the jury that he was entitled to a verdict, and, in effect, withdrew the case as to him from their deliberations. The question of Barnard's liability was not actually in issue before them. They did not pass upon it, probably because they were told that Kelly and O'Fallon were the only real defendants.

Notwithstanding the general rule, "if it appears that the whole question in the case between the parties is settled by the verdict," the verdict is not to be set aside "unless the omission to find the other issues can in some way prejudice the party complaining." White v. Bailey, 14 Conn. 271. The defendants Kelly and O'Fallon are not harmed by the omission, because all the issues between them and the United States have been found, and, whatever their liability, as partners, to the government, may be, it is not in dispute that Barnard was not a member of their firm. Barnard will not be practically harmed by the omission, if the United States formally enter upon the record the discontinuance as to him which they verbally announced to the jury upon the trial. It is true, that a nolle prosequi or a discontinuance does not operate as a full release and discharge, but is an agreement not to proceed further in the suit as to the person to whom it is applied, and, therefore, if a nolle is entered, Barnard is not technically released; but there is, under the circumstances of this case, no danger to Barnard that he will be called upon to respond to any suit upon this cause of action.

The subject of a discontinuance or a nolle prosequi in a civil action was fully considered by the supreme court in Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 46. The court held, that, in an action of assumpsit upon a joint and several cause of action, against several defendants, where the defendants plead severally, whether the pleas are to the merits, or set up merely a personal discharge, the plaintiff can enter a nolle prosequi against one defendant whose case had not been tried, either before or after judgment against the other defendants. The rule in regard to a nolle prosequi is not necessarily controlled by the fact that the defendants have pleaded severally. The more important requisite to the right of discontinuance is the several character of the alleged cause of action. In this case, inasmuch as Barnard is manifestly not liable, the mere fact that he had united in the plea of the general issue with another defendant, is not sufficient to affect the question of discontinuance. "In the administration of justice, matter of form, not absolutely subjected to authority, may well yield to the substantial purposes of justice." Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 46.

A discontinuance as to the defendant in regard to whose liability the jury has not found, and an entry of judgment upon the verdict against the defendant who is found liable, if the court is satisfied with the verdict, is in accordance with the practice of the supreme court of the state of New York. Porter v. Mount, 45 Barb. 422. So, also, in a criminal case, where the jury had omitted to find on one of the counts, the court permitted such count to be discontinued, and rendered sentence in accordance with the verdict, upon the other counts. U. S. v. Keen [Case No. 15,510].

Section 723 of the New Code of Procedure of the State of New York provides, that "the court may, upon the trial, or at any other stage of the action, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as it deems just, amend any process, pleading or other proceeding, by adding or striking out the name of a person as a party," &c.

If the plaintiffs enter, within fourteen days, a discontinuance as to Barnard, judgment will thereafter, and after the expiration of the stay already directed, be entered upon the verdict, against the other defendants. Upon such discontinuance, the motion for a venire facias de novo will be overruled. If a discontinuance is not entered, or an amendment is not made, Barnard will be entitled to a new trial, but not the other defendants.

UNITED STATES v. The OHIO.

[Newb. 409.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. Nov., 1849.

SLAVERY—IMPORTATION—PRESUMPTION OF FREEDOM—FORFEITURE.

1. The United States district attorney for this district, filed a libel in rem against the bark Ohio, to have her declared forfeited, for having brought into the United States a colored person from a foreign port or place, in violation of the 1st section of the act of congress of the 20th April, 1818 (3 Stat. 450).

2. The provisions of this act were not intended to apply to a case where a colored person, born and reared within the United States, sails to a foreign port or place on board of an American ship and returns to a port of the United States.

3. And where it appears from evidence, that the negro boy came on board of the vessel in the port of Baltimore in the capacity of a servant, and that he had for several years resided in New Jersey or New York, in the family of the master of the ship, the presumption is that he was free, notwithstanding the declaration of the custom officer, that the master claimed him as his slave.

4. In no event can this libel in rem for a forfeiture be sustained, since it does not appear from evidence, that the master, even if he brought the colored boy in question from a foreign port or place, did so on board this particular vessel.

In admiralty.

Mr. Durant, for the United States.

Mr. Bradford, for respondent.

McCALEB, District Judge. This action is brought against the vessel to have her declared forfeited in consequence, as it is alleged, of her having brought into this port a colored person from a foreign port or place.

It is shown by two officers of the customhouse in this city, that when they went on board the vessel shortly after her arrival in port, that the master declared that the negro boy on board was his slave. This declaration unexplained would doubtless raise a strong presumption against the master, as to his intention of holding the negro in involuntary servitude. But all the evidence must be taken together. Two of the crew of the vessel were examined, and testified that the boy came on board the vessel at Baltimore as a servant, and had continued on board in that capacity during the voyage to several foreign ports and back to this port. Another witness testifies that he knew the boy as long ago as 1842 in the city of New York, where he was then employed as a servant in the family of the master. He also testifies that he was the son of a free woman in Rio Janeiro, who was herself employed in the family of the American consul at that port.

Without taking into consideration the testimony of the master or his wife, which was received subject to objection upon the ground of interest, I am unable to discover any violation of law so far as this vessel is concerned. It is not shown that this master while in command of this vessel, brought the negro boy from a foreign port or place. It is clearly shown, on the contrary, that the boy came on board in the capacity of a servant before the vessel sailed from the port of Baltimore. It is also shown that he was several years before that time residing in New Jersey or New York in the family of the master. The fair presumption on the mind of the court, notwithstanding the declaration of the custom-house officer, that the master claimed him as his slave, is, that he was free before he ever sailed on the last voyage of this vessel. There is nothing in the acts of congress to prohibit the employment of colored people on board of an American vessel, and in this case, the master, at the earliest opportunity, gave bond to take this negro boy away with the vessel according to the requisitions of the state law.

Let us suppose that this boy was a slave when he left Baltimore; still, in the absence of all proof that he had been imported from a foreign port or place on board of this vessel, there would be no ground for forfeiture. If, by this master he were really imported in another vessel, there is no principle in law or justice which would justify the forfeiture of the property of the present innocent owners. Even regarding the boy as a slave when he sailed from Baltimore, the case before the court cannot be distinguished from that of U. S. v. The Garonne, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 73.

In that case certain persons, who were slaves in Louisiana, were by their owners taken to France as servants, and after some time, were by their own consent, sent back to New Orleans. The ships in which these persons were passengers, were libeled for alleged breaches of the act of congress of April 20th, 1818, prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States. It was held by the supreme court of the United States, that the provisions of the act of congress do not apply to such cases. The object of the law was to put an end to the slave trade, and to prevent the introduction of slaves from foreign countries. The language of the statute cannot be properly applied to persons of color who were domiciled in the United States, and who were brought back to the United States—to their place of residence—after a temporary absence.

In view of the law and evidence of this case, I am of opinion that no decree of forfeiture can be given against this vessel.

Case No. 15,915.

UNITED STATES v. The OHIO.

[29 Leg. Int. 252;[1] 9 Phila. 448.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Aug. 9, 1872.

SHIPPING — PUBLIC REGULATIONS — CANAL BOAT.

1. A laden boat, which, having no sail, oars, or other motive power of its own, is drawn, by horses, through a canal, and from thence, through navigable waters of the United States, by a steamer, to a market, is not within the description of a ship or vessel in the act of congress of February 18, 1793 [1 Stat. 305], "for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same."

[Approved in U. S. v. Pennsylvania Canal Boat Nos. 68 and 69, Case No. 16,027.]

2. The applicability of the act is not, in this respect, enlarged or altered by the act of July 20, 1846 [9 Stat. 38], exempting such canal boats without masts or steam power as were then by law required to be registered, licensed, or enrolled and licensed, from hospital dues, and from official fees, &c., or by the tonnage measurement act of May 6, 1864 [13 Stat. 69], or by any other legislation of congress in which the phrase vessel, or ships and vessels, may have been variously defined or applied.

The following are the principal sections of the act of congress of February 8, 1793 (1 Stat. 305), which have been cited with reference to the proceedings in this suit:

Section 1: "That ships or vessels, enrolled by virtue of 'An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes,' and those of twenty tons and upwards, which shall be enrolled after the last day of May next, in pursuance of this act, and having a license in force, or if less than twenty tons, not being enrolled, shall have a license in force as is hereinafter required, and no others, shall be deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the privileges of ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade or fisheries."

Section 37: "That nothing in this act shall be construed to extend to any boat or lighter not being masted, or, if masted and not decked, employed in the harbor of any town or city."

Section 6: "That after the last day of May next, every ship or vessel of twenty tons or upwards (other than such as are registered) found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, or carrying on the fishery, without being enrolled and licensed, or if less than twenty tons, and not less than five tons, without a license, in manner as is provided by this act, such ship or vessel, if laden with goods, the growth or manufacture of the United States only, (distilled spirits excepted,) or in ballast, shall pay the same fees and tonnage in every port of the United States at which she may arrive, as ships or vessels not belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States; and if she have on board any articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, other than sea stores, the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the lading found on board, shall be forfeited. Provided, however, if such ship or vessel be at sea, at the expiration of the time for which the license was given, and the master of such ship or vessel shall swear or affirm that such was the case, and shall within forty-eight hours after his arrival deliver to the collector of the district in which he shall first arrive, the license which shall have expired, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, nor shall the ship or vessel be liable to pay the fees and tonnage aforesaid."

The boat libelled was not registered, or enrolled and licensed, or licensed. The purpose of the libel was to enforce the payment of the fees and tonnage dues which would have been payable if the boat were a foreign vessel. This boat was of a kind, which, in one of the opinions quoted below, was described as follows: "The boats in question are of peculiar character, not corresponding closely, or in any other than a most general way, with any other description of water-borne vessel. They are vessels in one sense, because they are things which can and do contain coal, and are moved upon the water; but for substantive and independent use, they do not come within the popular notion of a ship or vessel, any more than any other water-tight box would do. They are a mere capacity of holding and floating, and being pulled by an external power, and nothing more. When the boat is passing through a lock, it is a box about 42 feet long, 10 feet wide, and 4½ to 5 feet deep: A running board of about one foot wide extends along each side and across one end, to form a passage-way for the hands. At the other end there is a platform planked over for about eight feet in extent, to furnish accommodation to persons employed aboard, and to strengthen the work. The coal within is exposed to view, there being no deck, nor hatches, constituting a temporary or occasional deck. When two or more sections of the same description have passed the lock and come into the canal or river, they are connected end to end by hinges, and are moved in this connection together. On a canal they are moved by one or more horses or mules on the towing path of the canal. In a river they are moved by a steam tug. A man and two boys, or a woman in the place of one of the boys, are the working hands, the horse or mule being ridden or driven by a boy, and the man and woman or the other boy remaining on board. When attached to the steam tug, the horses or mules are commonly taken on board the tug, and the operatives are without employment until the horse or mule begins the work of towing, in the canal. The vessel or boat, call it by what name is thought best, has no moving power within itself, nor can it be moved otherwise than in the mode thus described. On a canal, a horse or mule, or some other animal power, is indispensable, to give it the capacity to transport anything. On a river, a steam tug, or a vessel that has a moving power within itself, is as necessary to give the boat the capacity to transport anything, as the animal power is on the towing path of a canal. The boat has, from its being water-tight, capacity to contain coal or anything else on the water without sinking; but of itself, or by virtue of any machinery, whether mast and sail, or anything else, it has no capacity whatever to carry or transport anything; and when it is on a river or open water, it must be attached to a vessel that has a mast and sail, or machinery for motion, and it is only as an appurtenance to such a vessel for the time being, that it has any practical use in transportation."

Such boats, having first come into use long after the commencement of the present century, a question which arose in 1845, and has never been decided, was, whether they were vessels within the meaning and application of the act of 1793. In May, 1845, the president of the Lehigh Coal & Navigation Company, and certain officers of other canal companies, addressed letters to the Honorable Robert J. Walker, then secretary of the treasury, saying that their business was threatened with serious interruption from the proposed application to their scow-boats employed in the transportation of coal of the provisions of the act of 1793. They contended that the act did not apply to their boats, which could not with any propriety be considered as "ships or vessels" within the meaning of the act; which are navigated by persons without the slightest pretensions to the character of "seamen;" which are not engaged in the "coasting trade;" which are incapable of being employed without immediate detection in any attempt to evade the revenue laws; which have no masts, and were not in existence or use at the time of the passage of the act.

Accompanying these communications were the following opinions of counsel. The first of them, after giving the description of the boats as above, proceeded:

"If the question, whether such a boat is within the act of 18th of February, 1793, were to be decided by the fact of there having, or not having, been a particular intention to include it, there could be no doubt that it is not within the act, because there could have been no particular intention to include a description of vessel, which, at the date of the law had no existence. Neither canals, nor canal boats, were at that time, or for many years afterwards, known in the country. The boats and the mode of pulling them in an open river or bay, are altogether of subsequent invention or adoption. But this consideration is by no means decisive of their not being embraced by the enrolment act of 1793. No new variety of structure of boat or vessel can be deemed exempt from the operation of the law, if the general intent and provisions of the law embrace it, merely upon the ground that there was no particular intention to comprehend it. If such boats are within the general scope of the enrolment and license act, they will be comprehended by it, notwithstanding they are of recent invention and use. The general scope of the act is first to be ascertained. If that is so broad as to comprehend every species of vessel that is water borne, and is capable of holding cargo, and of being moved by the power of another boat, then there is no ground for exempting from its operation the boats or vessels above described, since they are water borne, and are capable of containing cargo, and are so moved. But if the scope of the act is narrower than this, and only comprehends ships or vessels of certain characteristics, then the inquiry will be, whether these canal boats have the requisite characteristics.

"The first head of inquiry then is, whether such boats are entitled to be enrolled and licensed under that act, and to enjoy the privileges of ships and vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries. The act of 1793 does not expressly require that ships and vessels to be included within it, shall have a particular character, and that if they have not, they shall be excluded. It requires affirmative qualifications, and if any kind of water borne vessel is excluded, it is by implication, and not by express terms. Its first provision in its first section is, that ships and vessels enrolled and licensed, or if less than twenty tons, having a license in force, and no others, shall be deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the privileges of ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade or fisheries. There is nothing in any subsequent part of the act, which repeals or impairs the force of this enactment in regard to any description of vessel whatever. If a vessel is not enrolled and licensed, or if of less than twenty tons, is not licensed, she is not a ship or vessel entitled to the privileges of ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade or fisheries. What the consequences are which arise from her not having those privileges, must be ascertained from other parts of the act; but it is clear that enrolment and license are indispensable to confer those privileges. No ship or vessel indeed is, by force of anything in the act, compelled to take out an enrolment and license. She is free to go without it, or without any papers at all, if she does not claim to exercise the privileges of an enrolled and licensed vessel. But if she is found doing certain things mentioned in the 6th section, without an enrolment and license, then she is acting in violation of the law, and the penalty prescribed by the law attaches, if she and her acts and doings come within the description in that section.

"Although there is no express exclusion by the act of any vessel from the benefit of enrolment, it is nevertheless true that the second section of the act does prescribe certain qualifications and requisites, without which a ship or vessel cannot be enrolled or licensed. That section is explicit in requiring that for the enrolment of any ship or vessel, she shall have the same qualifications, and the same requisites in all respects shall be complied with, which are made necessary by the act entitled, 'An act concerning the registering and recording ships or vessels, passed the 31st December, 1793'; and without enumerating all of them, there are some which may be referred to as being necessarily confined to vessels of a certain description, and not applicable to such a kind of boat as is used for the transportation of coal upon canals, and is hereinbefore described. The carpenter's certificate may first be referred to as setting out what the law regards as the general or rather universal description of every ship or vessel that is entitled to enrolment and license. It must set forth besides other particulars, the number of her decks and masts, her length, breadth, depth and tonnage. There are others, but these are the only qualifications stated in the carpenter's certificate, which it is necessary to refer to. They may be regarded as descriptive merely, or required only for the purpose of identification; and doubtless they are so in part; but as regards one of these qualifications, that of a deck, not only does it necessarily enter into the character of a sea-boat, without which it is wholly out of the question to speak of her as a coaster or as engaged in the sea-fisheries, but it is also a fundamental part of an enrolled ship or vessel, without which the act of congress cannot be executed in regard to her.

"The rule prescribed for ascertaining her tonnage, necessarily implies that she has at least one deck; for an element in the admeasurement of the tonnage, is the depth of the vessel from the under side of the deck plank to the ceiling in the hold; and if she has no deck, she has no certain tonnage within the law, either to be inserted in the enrolment or to be the basis on which her duties are to be estimated under the law. It is quite possible that an arbitrary line may be taken from where the under side of the deck plank would probably be if the boat had one; but that is not within the enactment of the law, nor will it give the tonnage which is the lawful tonnage by which duties are estimated. The lawful tonnage is the tonnage under deck, and if the vessel has no deck, she has no such tonnage. Her tonnage may be what she will carry without sinking the boat, or falling overboard; but that is not the tonnage contemplated by the act of congress. In fine, the law does not recognise an enrolled vessel without a deck; and there is no matter of surprise in this, seeing that it would be preposterous to suppose that the owner of a vessel without a deck, would ask for the privileges of the coasting trade, fisheries, &c., which she could not enjoy. Such a vessel wants qualifications that are indispensable to a registry, and they are equally so to enrolment and license.

"The certificate of enrolment, a form of which is given, descriptive in general terms of all vessels that are within the law, and which is accompanied in the act by directions for filling the blanks in the printed form with words descriptive of every vessel that can be properly enrolled, in like manner implies, if it does not more than imply, that the vessel is a decked vessel. It purports that the surveyor has certified that she has at least one deck, for it directs the number of decks to be inserted in a particular blank, and sets forth that the owner or person acting in his behalf has agreed to the description. It is possible that in practice a carpenter may certify that the vessel has no deck, and the custom house may fill the blank in the certificate of enrolment accordingly. But if they do, they deviate from the act of congress, and reject what the act expressly requires, giving the privilege of enrolment to a vessel that congress has made no provision for, but the contrary. When a deck is wanting, and her tonnage measurement is certified, it is impossible that it should be any thing more than conjectural tonnage. It cannot be ascertained according to the rule prescribed by congress, which is the only rule, and is the effective rule by which, and by which only, her tonnage duty is ascertained.

"Not only the objects of the enrolment law, but its language in many parts do so describe the ships and vessels comprehended by the act, as to show that open boats without the power of navigation in themselves, are not within its provisions, and have not the qualifications necessary for enrolment. When forfeiture is inflicted for trading without a license, or using a forged or altered license, or the license of another vessel, it is inflicted on the ship or vessel with her tackle, apparel and furniture. Forfeiture is never inflicted without this description of accompaniments of a ship or vessel, in the commercial sense, being annexed; and it is known that in the law of insurance, these words comprehend and cover the sails, yards, rigging, cables and the like, the accompaniment of not only a decked, but a masted vessel. Such is the general commercial import of the words. The words 'ship or vessel,' of themselves, imply, in the ordinary acceptation of merchants and mariners, a vessel competent for the sea. And in an act concerning the coasting trade and the fisheries, this must emphatically be their signification. It is wholly inadmissible to extend them to a scow, or to a boat, without a deck, that would be swamped by the ordinary waves of the sea. Such things do not rise to the dignity even of a barge or row boat.

"After a careful examination of all parts of the act, I entertain the opinion that such a boat as is described in the first part of this opinion is not entitled to enrolment. She wants the requisite qualifications. She cannot be measured according to law. Her tonnage, which means tonnage under deck, cannot be ascertained, for she has no deck. She can carry whatever can be put into her without sinking her; but though she has a tonnage capacity, she has no tonnage measurement. She has no mast and no deck, no power to avail herself of the privileges granted, and it would be preposterous to claim the privileges for her, because, without the aid of another vessel that is also enrolled, she could not exercise any of them.

"The thirty-seventh section of the act of February 18, 1793, may be thought to militate against this view. That section enacts that nothing in the act shall be construed to extend to any boat or lighter not being masted, or, if masted and not decked, employed in the harbor of a town or city. It exempts from the operation of every part of the law, a decked boat without masts, and a masted boat without decks, however employed in the harbor of a town or city. From which it may be inferred that a boat without masts or deck is within the law, and may be enrolled. But I regard this as a misapprehension of the design of that section. Within the harbor of a town or city, such as New York for instance, and Philadelphia, boats and lighters are necessary for the transportation of merchandise, foreign as well as domestic, from place to place, within the same district, and possibly from one district to another. In a large sense, such boats may be regarded as performing an act of trading, as often as they are so employed, and as going from place to place in the same district when they go from New York to Brooklyn or Staten Island, or from Southwark to Kensington. To prohibit their use in this way, would be to deprive the trade of a city of an essential accommodation: and it would be prohibition if they were exposed either to forfeiture or to foreign duties, if found so trading without enrolment and license. The section means therefore, to exempt boats so employed with masts only, or with decks only, from the operation of the act altogether. It does not imply, that such boats, and still less that boats without either masts or decks are entitled to certificates of enrolment, but it exempts boats with one only of the qualifications, from the penalties of the law, if their employment be thus limited. It implies rather that boats without either masts or decks, are not within the act, by excepting boats that are only masted or decked, and not both, as not being within the operation of any part of the act.

"It being clear then, according to my opinion, that a canal boat such as I have described, is not within the act entitled to enrolment, as wanting the essential qualifications required by law, the next inquiry is, whether such a boat is made incapable by law of the use to which it is applied in the carrying of coal in the manner stated from district to district, or from place to place within the same district. And this, it will readily be seen, is a question of great importance; for if such boats have not the legal qualifications for enrolment and license, they cannot be enrolled and licensed; and if without enrolment and license they cannot be used in the manner described, the carrying of coal from Bristol to Philadelphia, or to New York, through the Delaware and Raritan Canal, is almost necessarily destroyed, for it can hardly be carried in any other boats. If they cannot carry it, there must be transhipment into an enrolled vessel at Bristol, and if the enrolled vessel cannot pass through the Delaware and Raritan Canal, there must be another transhipment at Bordentown, and again at Brunswick. Canals for the transportation of coal may be regarded as almost superseded by the interpretation. The impediment to the use of these boats in the manner stated, if found anywhere in the act, is to be found in the sixth section, which enacts that every ship or vessel of twenty tons and upwards found trading between district and district, or betweeen different places in the same district, without being enrolled or licensed, or if less than twenty and not less than five tons, without a license, if laden with goods the growth or manufacture of the United States, distilled spirits excepted, shall pay the same fees and tonnage in every port of the United States where she may arrive, as ships or vessels not belonging to citizens of the United States; and if she has on board foreign goods, &c., or distilled spirits, the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the lading found on board, shall be forfeited.

"The force and effect of the prohibition, lie in the words, 'every ship or vessel found trading,' &c. The penalty can attach only to such a boat as is a ship or vessel, within the meaning of the act, and is found trading in the manner restrained or prohibited by the act. Now I apprehend, in the first place, that such a canal boat as has been described, is not a ship or vessel in the sense of the act. She has hardly any more of the attributes of a ship or vessel, in either commercial or common language, than a raft of logs on the water. Boards might be placed upon such logs, and coal might be placed upon the boards—and the whole might be moved by the same power that moves such canal boats. The circumstance of the raft's containing or holding coal, and being moved upon the water, would not make it a ship or vessel in the sense of the act, though in a very general sense, it might be regarded as a vessel. The canal boat described, is a series or succession of connected boxes, which, whether separate or united at the hinges, is incapable of coasting, either on the sea or in a river, or of being moved by any power within itself. It has no independent or internal capacity whatever, except that of holding the coal. Its practical use, its practical existence indeed, is as an adjunct to something else. It cannot be conceived of as a practical instrument of any kind, except in connection with something external, that is to say, some external animal power, on the shore, or some external wind or steam power on the water. The act cannot be understood by its general language to comprehend such a thing. The policy of the law in regard either to ships or seamen, cannot be understood to embrace such machines as these, or such persons as are employed to drive the horses or mules, or to attend to mere laborers' duty on board. No one interest of either shipping or seamen, can be considered as involved in them.

"But the material consideration remains; and that is a consideration which opens a view of the subject which shows both practically and legally that these boats are never in the predicament which brings on the penalty of the law. While they are within the canal, and are towed by a horse, it is understood that, whatever may have been the doubt at one time, it has long been the settled understanding, that the enrolment law takes no cognizance of them. It is only when they become an adjunct to a steam tug, that the lawfulness of their employment is questioned.

"It is obvious that the act of congress, in all its provisions, has reference to separate, unconnected, independent ships or vessels, moved or propelled by a power within themselves, and trading from district to district, or between different places by their own capacity. The ship or vessel is always spoken of in this character. She is represented as the acting, moving, trading, and transgressing body; and no one can doubt that this was the only acceptation in which the words 'ship or vessel found trading, from district to district,' could have been received at the passage of the act. A scow or boat drawn by another boat, and depending wholly upon it for motion and change of place, is not such a ship or vessel. For all purposes of trading, as well as for change of place, the acting, moving, trading, and transgressing body, is the vessel that moves, and the canal boats only as part of her. If the moving or propelling boat is moving, and trading in violation of law, the penalty is incurred; but if her moving and trading are lawful, the manner in which she transports cargo does not make her trading unlawful. If the steam tug herself is not qualified to carry on such trade from district to district, or between different places in the same district, the law is violated by her. But if she is so qualified, then no offence is committed, for in fact, as well as in law, it is the steam tug that is found trading, and not the boxes or boats that contain the coal. The law regards the ship or vessel as an offending agent—as a body that by her own capacity carries on the trade—and if she is a mere scow or floating box, attached to another vessel that pulls or moves her, her character is lost in that of the moving and acting vessel that carries her along.

"Put the case that a steam boat has a constant attachment to her sides, of two such boats carrying coal or other merchandize; can it be doubted that the steam tug is the trader, and that her papers protect the trade? If unlawful trade is carried on with, or from, the boats, can it be doubted that the bond given upon the enrolment of the steam boat, to secure the United States against her being employed in an unlawful trade, is forfeited? And it is this that constitutes the security of the government against unlawful trading by such boats; that they are a part, or adjunct of the vessel that navigates them, and as much a part of her, as her own boats during the whole voyage from beginning to end—for they are connected with her from the moment they are attached to her, and are incapable of motion to or from different districts, or different places in the same district, without her. If the steam tug is not the vessel found trading, then she would not be so, if she placed merchandize in her own boat, and towed it at her own stern; and if such canal boats are to be regarded as found trading, then the boat of the steam tug, if laden, would be so regarded, and the bond of the steam boat would not be answerable for any unlawful trading with or from the boat. Such a view of the act cannot be defended. There is no law that compels a coaster to carry her cargo in her hold. She may carry it on her deck. She may stow it in her boats on deck. If necessary, or convenient, she may tow her boat with cargo in it. Whatever she tows and moves from district to district, or between different places in the same district, is her trading. If lawful to her, it is lawful to the goods she carries, and to the boats in which they are carried. If unlawful to her, her bond is forfeited.

"Again, unless some distinction is made in behalf of open boats, not decked, in carrying coal from district to district, when drawn by another boat, I know not how the most ordinary intercourse between different districts on the same river is to be carried on. From Bristol, in Pennsylvania, to Burlington, in New Jersey, coal must be transhipped at Bristol, into an enrolled coaster, and carried under deck to Burlington, on the opposite side of the river. I think it cannot be protected in the open boat, under the section which exempts from forfeiture boats employed in the harbor of a city or town. The coal boats are not so employed; and the harbor of Bristol is not the harbor of Burlington, nor vice versa. The evils of the contrary construction seem to be immense.

"After careful consideration of the case, under the acts of congress, I am of the opinion that the boats in question cannot be legally enrolled and licensed; and that, whether in a canal, pulled by horse or mule, or on tide water, or in an open river or bay, attached to a steam tug which draws them with their loading of coal, they are not in violation of law, nor is the law violated in any way, in their being drawn from district to district, or between different places in the same district, by a steam tug, if the steam tug herself is enrolled and licensed to carry on the coasting trade.

"Hor. Binney.

"Philada., May 13, 1845."

"A suggestion has been made by one of the managers of the company, which, as an illustration of part of the preceding opinion, appears to have great force. The penalty under the sixth section for trading with domestic produce, is the payment of the same fees and tonnage as ships or vessels not belonging to the United States. But the tonnage is matter of admeasurement depending on a deck. How then can the penalty be applied to an undecked boat? This also shows that congress did not mean to include such a boat within the prohibition.

"Hor. Binney.

"Philada., May 14, 1845."

"Philada., May 14, 1845. I fully concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Binney.

"J. K. Kane."

"I do not doubt that the floating coal chests or boxes used on the Lehigh and Delaware Canals, and particularly described in the opinion of Mr. Binney, would be embraced by the general phrase 'vessel' employed in the repealed act of congress of the 1st of September, 1789, and in the subsisting act of the 18th of February, 1793, relating to the coasting trade. Their rough and primitive character, and their being without masts, or decks, or keels, or rudders, could not withdraw them from the comprehensiveness of that term. Nor do I doubt that such vessels, although unprovided with a motive power within themselves, being without sails, or steam, or even oars or pushing poles, might, nevertheless, if dragged from one side of a river in one collection district, to the other side, and into a different collection district, by means of open wherries or batteaux, or by long ropes, as it is still common with ferry boats or scows, fall within the general scope of those acts of congress, if otherwise liable to do so. Yet, I am clear in the opinion, that by these laws, the enrolment and licensing are mere modes of receiving particular privileges and immunities to certain descriptions of American vessels—not to all American vessels—and that these floating coal chests or boxes do not, and really cannot, come up to the requirements on which only they could be entitled to enrolment and license, or be held subject to the fees and tonnage of foreign vessels. These requirements are fully adverted to by Mr. Binney, or I would repeat them.

"G. M. Dallas.

"May 17, 1845."

Before and after the date of these opinions, canal boats of other kinds, with motive power of their own,—sails, oars, or steam,—were also used for transporting coal and other cargoes through canals, and from thence, through navigable waters, to market. In the Delaware and Raritan Canal, in 1843, four canal boats with sails, and four others propelled by steam, were thus in use. In the slack water and canal navigation of the Connecticut, small steamers had been previously, and were afterwards used; and on the state canals of New York, steamers have since been used. Some of the boats, large and small, drawn by horses through canals, have always been provided with oars for use after leaving the canals. The number of such boats with oars has been reduced since the commencement of the use of steam tugs.

An act of July 20, 1846 (9 Stat. 39), "to exempt canal boats from the payment of fees and hospital money," was in the words, "The owner or owners, master or captain, or other persons employed in navigating canal boats without masts or steam power, now by law required to be registered, licensed, or enrolled and licensed, shall not be required to pay any marine hospital tax or money; nor shall the persons employed to navigate such boats receive any benefit or advantage from the marine hospital fund; nor shall such owner or owners, master or captain, or other persons, be required to pay fees or make any compensation for such register, license, or enrolment and license; nor shall any such boat be subject to be libelled in any court of the United States for the wages of any person or persons, who may be employed on board thereof, or in navigating the same." And all acts, &c., repugnant to this act, were thereby repealed.

"An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States," was passed on May 6, 1864 (13 Stat. 69). In section 3 of this act, the phrase "open vessel," is used to designate a vessel without a deck. The section prescribes the manner of ascertaining by admeasurement, the register tonnage of vessels with a deck or decks, and also provides for ascertaining the tonnage of open vessels by admeasurement. Section 4 limits the charge for the measurement and certifying of tonnage, so that it shall not exceed one dollar and fifty cents for each transverse section under the tonnage deck, and three dollars for measuring each between decks above the tonnage deck, and one dollar and fifty cents for each poop, or closed in space, available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers, or officers and crew, above the upper or spar deck. The act contains no express provision for any charge or compensation whatever, as to open vessels. Section 5 is in the words: "The provisions of this act shall not be deemed to apply to any vessel not required by law to be registered, or enrolled or licensed, and all acts, or parts of acts, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed."

The concluding clause of the act of March 3, 1851, limiting the liability of ship owners (9 Stat. 635, 636), provides, that the act shall not apply to the owner of any canal boat, barge, or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatsoever, used in rivers or inland navigation. The revenue act of July, 1862, § 15 (12 Stat. 558), imposed an additional tonnage duty on all ships, vessels, or steamers, entered at any custom house in the United States, from any foreign port or place, or from any port or place in the United States, or belonging wholly, or in part, to subjects of foreign powers, provided, that the tax or duty should not be collected more than once in each year on any ship, vessel, or steamer, having a license to trade between different districts of the United States. The internal revenue act of June 30, 1864, § 103 (13 Stat. 275), imposed a duty of 2½ per cent upon the gross receipts of every railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or any stage coach, or other vehicle engaged or employed in transporting passengers, or property for hire. The amendatory act of March 3, 1865, § 4 (Id. 493), increased the tonnage duty still further; and exempted the receipts of vessels paying tonnage duty from the tax of 2½ per cent. The ninth section of the internal revenue act of 13th of July, 1866 (14 Stat. 136), amended the 103d section of the act of 1864, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and substituting enactments imposing a tax of 2½ per cent on the gross receipts from passengers and mail carried by railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel or stage, coach or other vehicle, with incidental regulations, and with certain exceptions and qualifications. It was further provided, that all boats, barges, and flats, not used for carrying passengers, nor propelled by steam or sails, which are floated or towed by tug boats or horses, and used exclusively for carrying coal, oil, minerals, or agricultural products to market, should be required hereafter, in lieu of enrolment fees or tonnage tax, to pay an annual special tax of five dollars, for each boat of a capacity exceeding twenty-five, and not exceeding one hundred tons, and ten dollars for each boat of greater capacity. This proviso is repealed by the act of July 14, 1870. Section 33 of an amendatory act of March 3, 1867 (14 Stat. 484, 485), was in the words: "The tonnage duty now imposed on all ships, vessels, or steamers, engaged in foreign or domestic commerce, shall be levied but once within one year; and, when paid by such ship, vessel, or steamer, no further tonnage tax shall be collected within one year from the date of such payment."

An act further to prevent smuggling, &c., passed July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 178), § 1, enacts that, for the purposes of the act, the term vessel, whenever therein used, shall be held to include every description of water-craft, raft, vehicle, and contrivance, used, or capable of being used, as a means or auxiliary of transportation, on or by water; and the term vehicle, to include every description of carriage, wagon, engine, car, sleigh, sled, sledge, hurdle, cart, and other artificial contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means or auxiliary of transportation on land. Section 28 enacted, that all vessels, which, under the provisions of the above mentioned fifteenth section of the act of July 14, 1862, and fourth section of the amendatory act, of March 3, 1865, were exempted from paying tonnage duties more than once in a year, should pay the same at their first clearance in each calendar year; provided, that all licensed, and enrolled and licensed vessels, should pay the duty when taking out their respective enrolments or licenses, if the same had not been previously paid; and provided further, that nothing in the act should be construed to prevent customs officers from collecting such tonnage duty at the entry of any vessel during the year, if not previously paid; and provided further, that all vessels, which were subject to enrolment or license, should thereafter, be liable to the payment of the fees established by law, for services of customs officers incident thereto.

The twenty-fifth section of the act of July 14, 1870, to reduce internal taxes, &c. (16 Stat. 269), so amended section 15 of the act of July 14, 1862, and section 4 of the amendatory act of March 3, 1865, that no ship, vessel, steamer, barge, or flat, belonging to any citizen of the United States, trading from one port or point within the United States, to another port or point in the United States, or employed in the bank, whale, or other fisheries, should thereafter, be subject to the tonnage tax or duty provided for in those acts; "and the proviso in section 103" of the act of June 30, 1864, "requiring an annual special tax to be paid by boats, barges, and flats," was repealed. The intended subject of this repeal, was obviously the proviso contained in that part of the ninth section of the act of July 13, 1866, which had been thereby substituted for the 103d section of the act of June 30, 1864. The effect of the act of 1870, was to exclude wholly the application of previous and existing internal revenue laws to the boats in question.

The district attorney, Mr. A. H. Smith, and the assistant district attorney, Mr. Valentine, contended that the act of 1846, and the tonnage register act of 1864, were in effect legislative declarations that the act of 1793 was applicable to such boats, that the enactment in the revenue law of 1866, imposing a special tax, in lieu of enrolment fees or tonnage tax, was a legislative declaration, that such boats had been liable to such fees and tonnage tax, and that the repeal of the latter act in 1870, revived this two-fold liability. They contended, therefore, that if there had otherwise been doubt of the applicability of the act of 1793, the doubt was removed by the subsequent legislation.

Mr. Gibbons, for the claimant [Boyle], denied the applicability of the act of 1793, to such boats. He relied upon reasons and arguments contained in the above opinions of counsel. He also contended that the act could not be understood as applicable to vessels of a kind unknown when it was passed; that the transportation of coal in these boats, was not a trading within the meaning of the act; that the act of 1846, left open to future decision the question of the effect of the former act, exempting the boats from fees and charges, whether otherwise liable to them or not; that the tonnage act of 1864 did not annul the exemption, or create any new liability of such boats.

CADWALADER, District Judge. The word "trading" may have meanings which vary with its different applications. In laws concerning navigation, every vessel carrying a cargo or passengers may in general be considered as trading. Boats of the kind in question, though, in the language of the repealed proviso of the internal revenue act of 1866, "used exclusively for carrying coal, oil, minerals or agricultural products to market," would be considered as trading, within the meaning of the act of 1793, if it were otherwise applicable. See [Gibbons v. Ogden] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 215–219. I think that the act of 1793, if the thirty-seventh section had been omitted, would have been applicable to everything afloat, navigable by motive power of its own, and transporting a cargo, whether the motive power were that of oars, that of sails, or that of steam, whether the vessel were of a kind which was known at the date of the act or not, and whether she had a deck or was open. If a more limited meaning were attributed to the phrase ship or vessel, purposes of the act might be frustrated. The thirty-seventh section shows, that an express exception was considered necessary, in order to prevent the act from being applicable to boats of more than five tons, moved only by oars. If the section had been omitted, there would be no more reason to exclude steamers from the application of the act of 1793, than to exclude vessels propelled, in the primitive manner, by oars, of whose use the frequency has been diminished by the innovation of steam tugs. See [Gibbons v. Ogden] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 219, 220.

Here, two alternative, and very different interpretations of the thirty-seventh section, must be considered. The section, according to one interpretation, excludes from the operation of every part of the act, all boats or lighters whatsoever, which are not masted; and, of boats and lighters which are masted and not decked, excludes only such as are employed in the harbor of any town or city. According to the other interpretation, the qualification of being employed in the harbor of a town or city, extends to all the subjects of the section; so that the exception from the operation of the act includes no boat or lighter not masted, unless it is employed in such a harbor. According to the former interpretation, the boats in question, as they have no mast, could not be subjects of the act of 1793, for any purpose. According to the latter interpretation, the question of the applicability of the act, cannot thus be summarily disposed of. In deciding between the two interpretations of the thirty-seventh section, it must be remembered, that punctuation of a statute forms no part of it, and is not recognizable as controlling its interpretation. 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 65, 66; L. R. 3 C. P. 519, 521, 522; 9 Gray, 385. And see [Ewing v. Burnet] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 54. But it is necessary to find, if possible, a meaning and purpose for every word of the section.

If the first of the interpretations be adopted, every word will have its fair and full effect. "Nothing in the act" will then "be construed to extend to any boat or lighter not being masted—or, if masted, and not decked, employed in the harbor of any town or city." But, according to the second interpretation, the word "and" has no effect, which is not repugnant or embarrassing. Therefore, if the question were new, I would have no difficulty in deciding that the thirty-seventh section of the act of 1793, excluded the boats in question from the application of the act of 1793, if it would otherwise have been applicable to them. But the second interpretation of the section, appears to have been so generally adopted, though I do not see for what sufficient reason, that I am constrained to doubt the correctness of my opinion upon the point. Therefore, as I am also of opinion that, although the second interpretation were the correct one, the conclusion would nevertheless be the same, I will, in what follows, consider the question of the applicability of the act of 1793 to these boats upon the assumption, which seems to have been so general, that the thirty-seventh section does not apply to them, but applies to such boats only as are employed in the harbor of a town or city. I think the act inapplicable to the boats in question, because they are without oars, or masts, or steam, or motive power of any kind which can be called their own. For this reason, they are not included in the ordinary general description, of ships or vessels, which is the only designation contained in the act.

A vessel of private ownership represents an organization which is part of the social system of the country to which she belongs. In this representative character, she has legal attributes, and legal rights, and may incur legal responsibilities, however and by whomsoever she may be navigated. [The China v. Walsh] 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 53. And see [The James Gray v. The John Fraser] 21 How. [62 U. S.] 191, 192. The sole purpose of this organization is her navigation, and its incidents. That which cannot be made navigable through any internal command of a propelling force, cannot, in a strict sense, be, nautically speaking, a vessel, though she may be called such for the convenience of identifying her with what was once navigable, and may, in some cases, become so again. This remark applies variously under different circumstances. It may apply to a vessel when she is laid up in a port, at home or abroad, or when she is an absolute wreck, whether stranded or afloat; and may have a qualified applicability to a vessel's own boat when it is towed astern. The case of a sailing vessel which is lashed to the side of a steam-tug, is also temporarily an example. The supreme court have said, that "whenever the tug, under the charge of her own master and crew, and in the usual and ordinary course of such an employment, undertakes to transport another vessel which, for the time being, has neither her master nor crew on board, from one point to another, over waters where such accessory motive power is necessarily, or usually employed, she must be held responsible for the proper navigation of both vessels; and third persons suffering damage, through the fault of those in charge of the vessels, must, under such circumstances, look to the tug, her master or owners, for any injuries that vessels or cargo may receive by such means." [Sturgis v. Boyer] 24 How. [65 U. S.] 122. When the towage is by a hawser, the vessel towed is not liable except so far only as her movements are at her own command, and she is in fault, or negligent in respect of them. [The James Gray v. The John Fraser] 21 How. [62 U. S.] 193, 194.

The reason is much stronger, and its application more simple, in the case of the boats in question. They are absolutely, at all times, without motive power at their command. Though ordinarily called boats, they have been also more properly designated as floating trunks or boxes. They are not subject to admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Judge Nelson was inclined to this opinion. He thought that they were not ships or vessels, when upon public navigable waters, because they had no power as respects navigation upon such waters. The Ann Arbor [Case No. 408], A. D. 1858. The intimation was extrajudicial, the decision upon the merits being against the libellant. There had, however, been a previous decision of Judge Grier against the admiralty jurisdiction. He said that such boats were not ships or vessels in the maritime sense of the term; and added, that they do not take out a coasting license. Jones v. The Coal Barges [Id. 7,458], A. D. 1855. This dictum is in point upon the present question. But it will be necessary to consider the question upon original grounds, because the case before Judge Grier was that of one of the canal boats on the Monongahela, which are described in the report somewhat differently from the description of the boats in question here; and also because laws concerning navigation may apply incidentally to what are not subjects of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

Certainly, however, such a boat as is here in question is not a vessel in any sense in which the word is ordinarily used in laws concerning navigation. In the act of 1851, limiting the liability of ship owners, the general phrase, "ship or vessel," must be understood as applicable only to a vessel responsibly navigated. Therefore, if the concluding provision, that the act shall not apply to the owner of any canal boat, barge or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatsoever, used in rivers or inland navigation, had been omitted, the former general phrase, if applicable to canal boats, would not have included any others than such as have sails, oars, or steam power of their own. To make the word vessel, or boat, in an act of legislation of any kind, applicable to the boats in question, superadded words of special description have been considered necessary. Thus, in the repealed proviso of the internal revenue act of 1866, they were described as boats not propelled by steam or sail, which are floated or towed by tug-boats or horses. In the first section of the act of the same year against smuggling, it was thought necessary to provide expressly that for the purposes of that act the term vessel should be held to include every description of watercraft, raft, vehicle and contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means or auxiliary of transportation, on or by water. This amplified form of description would not have been adopted, if the word "vessel," unexplained, had been deemed of coextensive import. If the description, thus amplified, includes the boats in question for the purposes of that act, they are so included by force of the phrase "means or auxiliary of transportation on or by water."

Vessels to which the act of 1793 applies, and which, on compliance with its requirements, are entitled to the privileges and exemptions conferred by it, must be owned and commanded by citizens of the United States. Before any boats like those in question were known, an act of congress of March 12, 1812 (2 Stat. 694), allowed steamboats employed only in rivers or bays of the United States, owned wholly or in part, by resident aliens, to be enrolled and licensed as if they belonged to citizens of the United States, according to, and subject to, all the conditions, limitations and provisions contained in the act of 1793. The tugs which tow the boats in question may thus be owned by resident foreigners. The enactment of 1812 was not mentioned in the argument of this case. But my attention was drawn to the act by an observation of counsel, that a great many of the boats in question are owned, or in the charge of resident aliens. If such a fact has been wholly disregarded for the greater part of half a century, the most rational explanation is, that the exemption of the steam tug, which alone has the motive power, has been regarded as including that of the tow which has no independent navigability. The suggestion that the character and amount of the fees and charges for transporting coal, or any thing else, from the interior of the country to a domestic market by towage, may vary as the Irishman, German or Englishman owning the tow or having charge of it, has, or has not, become a naturalized citizen, seems absurd.

If the foregoing views are correct, the words of the act of 1793 do not apply to canal boats having no motive power of their own, but, according to the second interpretation of the thirty-seventh section, apply to canal boats of a certain tonnage, which, though without masts or steam-power, have oars. That the latter boats, when in rivers and bays, have the command of their own movements, with consequent responsibilities, might be a sufficient reason, that they should be requirable to be licensed, or enrolled and licensed. But that they should incur the incidental burdens of coastwise maritime navigation was nevertheless very incongruous to the nature of inland navigation. This may explain the purpose, or one of the purposes, of the act of July 20, 1846. It may have been a reconciling purpose to remove this incongruity, and yet fulfil the exigency of the act of 1793, by relieving canal boats with oars of all maritime burdens without dispensing with the requirement of a license or enrolment and license. Another purpose of the act of 1846 may have been to meet provisionally in like manner, any future decision of the case of canal boats like those now in question, which had then been a disputed case. If this two-fold purpose existed it would have been attained by defining in the act, the subjects of it as "canal boats without masts or steam-power," and exempting them from the peculiarly maritime burdens of hospital dues, fees and charges of registering, enrolling or licensing, and subjection to libels for wages. The boats thus exempted, whether provided with oars or not, were according to this interpretation, such boats only as were then, "by law, required to be registered, licensed, or enrolled and licensed."

The opinions of counsel which have been mentioned in the course of the argument, and the accompanying letters from the officers of canal companies, were filed in 1845, in the treasury department, where they now remain. There can be little doubt, if any, that these papers were before the eyes of the framer of the act of 1846. It is, therefore, extremely probable that he had in view the two-fold purpose which has been suggested. But, unless the words of the act sustain the consequently suggested interpretation, it cannot be adopted. The intention of a law maker is to be legally deduced, not from what may thus have been his probable purpose, but from the meaning of the words which he has used. Here I doubt greatly whether the meaning of the words authorize the suggested interpretation of the act of 1846. In the contexts of this act, wherever the phrase canal boats without masts or steam power occurs, it is never used otherwise than in connection with persons employed to navigate them. It is true that the former expression is once used with a disjunctive relation to the owners. But it is also twice used without any possibility of such an alternative relation. The words, "nor shall the persons employed to navigate such boats receive any benefit or advantage from the marine hospital fund," and the provision against libelling any such boat for the wages of any person or persons employed on board or in navigating her, are thus applicable to such canal boats only as have oars. Therefore, I incline to the opinion that the application of the words of the act is limited to such as have oars. The provision against libeling for wages would otherwise be insensible, as well as the provisions concerning persons navigating the boats. The only doubt is, whether the act applied likewise to the boats in question. This doubt is, to say the least, very great.

The point is quite immaterial, if I am right in thinking as I do, that there is no intention apparent in the act of 1846, to determine to what boats the act of 1793, applied. It was, however, in the argument, assumed that the act of 1846 indicates a belief on the part of congress, that all canal boats without masts or steam power, including the boats in question, were, by law, required to be registered or licensed, or enrolled and licensed; in other words, a belief that the act of 1793 applied to all such boats. Though I think the assumption erroneous, it will not be amiss to consider whether, if the words of the act of 1846 imported such a legislative belief, they would affect the decision. If such were the meaning of the words they would, as we have seen, misconstrue the act of 1793. Words of legislation importing an erroneous construction of a pre-existing statute have not the effect of a law establishing the construction as valid for the future, unless they also import a declaratory or other enactment. This rule, however well established, is very seldom applied, because there is no invariable form of a declaratory statute, and the legislature may at present enact how a prior one shall be construed in future. We have also constant experience that successive statutes on the same subject may be read in connection with one another and harmonized, as if they together constituted one and the same law. These explanations and qualifications of the rule do not abrogate it. My predecessor, Judge Hopkinson, stated the rule too broadly perhaps, when he denied that a legislature had a right to impose upon a court their construction of their statutes previously passed. He said that it was for the court to construe the law; but added that it was the right and duty of a judge to look into all the statutes made upon the same subject to discover what was the intention of any of their provisions, thus to ascertain the true meaning and construction by his own judgment, and not by any subsequent legislative declaration of intention or construction. 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] Append. 734. The rule, and a proper qualification of it, were stated with precision by Chief Justice Marshall. He said that a mistaken opinion of the legislature concerning the law, does not make the law, but that if the mistake is manifested in words competent to make the law in future, there is no principle which can deny them this effect, and that a law, not in form declaratory, though inoperative on the past, may act in future, by expressing the sense of the legislature on the existing law as plainly as a declaratory act. [Postmaster-General v. Early] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 148, 149. In an English case, Le Blanc, J., said, that a court if clear in their construction of a statute, would be bound to give it effect, though they should be of opinion that an erroneous construction had been put upon it by subsequent statutes. 16 East, 326. In that case, the framers of a statute had, in reciting a prior statute, misconstrued it. Lord Ellenborough said that he might be under a compulsion, through subsequent statutes, to put a perverse and unnatural interpretation on the original statute, but that he would endeavor as far as he could, without violating the fair rules of construction, to maintain the integrity of the original text, unvitiated by subsequent construction, if he might so say. Id. 319, 320. After stating and explaining the misconstruction, which consisted in misreciting the effect of the original statute, he asked whether the framers of the misconstruing statute had imposed upon the court, by any enactment, the necessity of adopting that which he must assume to be their error if the words of the prior act were intelligible in themselves. In his opinion the recital in the subsequent act could not overrule the plain intelligible sense of the prior one. Id. 324, 325. Where a perpetual statute, English or colonial, was, through legislative inadvertence, continued in force by the words of a subsequent statute, until the end of the legislative session, or for two years, the perpetual statute was not abrogated, but continued in force after either period limited. Hobart, 215; T. Raym. 397. An act of the legislature of Pennsylvania subjected all real estate within one of the corporate municipalities of a county to a lien for assessments, to which all real estate in the county had, by a former act, been made subject The supreme court of the state said that the passing of the subsequent act, at most, only proved that the legislature were not then aware that the assessments had been made liens by the previous act; and added that it could not be sustained for a moment, that the legislature's mistake or misapprehension of the law in this respect would make it different from what it really was. 5 Rawle, 317. A series of English statutes prohibiting and restricting commerce, &c., with enemies were forensically reviewed in 1794. 6 Durn. & E. [6 Term R.] 38–44, 47–50. Many of these enactments indicated that the parliament received the prohibitions necessary in order to make such trading and intercourse illegal.

Most of the legislative provisions on the subject were otherwise unnecessary. But they were wholly disregarded in this respect by decisions of the king's bench, (6 Durn. & E. [6 Term R.] 23, 35; 8 Durn. & E. [8 Term R.] 548, 561), and had previously been so disregarded by the court of admiralty (1 C. Rob. Adm. 196, 220).

If the law of 1846 had contained words of equivalent effect with a recital that the boats in question were included in the law of 1793, the only enactment in the law of 1846 would be the concession of an exemption from certain supposed liabilities. Such a legislative concession would not constitute an enactment including the boats in that description, or otherwise enlarging the effect of the act of 1793. The authorities which have been cited therefore, show that the decision of this case cannot be affected by the act of 1846. It is not necessary to consider the tonnage measurement act of 1864, because the fifth section excludes the application of the act to any vessel not required by the law to be registered, or enrolled or licensed.

As to every question in this case, the act of 1870 has excluded wholly the application of the internal revenue laws of 1862, 1864, 1865, and 1866. If they had continued in force, the only question which would have required attention, has, in principle, been disposed of in considering the act of 1846. This question would have arisen upon the words "in lieu of enrolment fees or tonnage tax," in the proviso contained in that part of the ninth section of the revenue act of 1866, which was thereby substituted for the 103d section of the revenue act of 1864. If these words indicated a legislative belief that the boats in question were subject to the payment of enrolment fees or tonnage tax, they were words not of enactment, but recital, and misrecited the existing law. But the repeal of the proviso deprives the question of any importance which might otherwise have been attributable to it. The only act of congress, which has not been sufficiently considered, is a provision of the twenty-eighth section of the act of 1866, against smuggling. The provision is, that all vessels, which were subject to enrolment or license, should thereafter be liable to the payment of the fees for services of customs officers, incident thereto. This provision, considered as an isolated enactment, would be of no significance in the case. If, as to those canal boats which are included in the description of vessels, in the act of 1793, the provision repealed the exemption from certain maritime charges, of which such canal boats had been relieved by the act of 1846, the process of legislation to deprive them of the exemption, was indirect, and the exposition of the purpose to do so was obscure. But, if such was the legislative intention, it could not extend beyond the subjects of the former exemption; and, if I have rightly interpreted the act of 1846, which conceded the exemption, the act applied only to such canal boats, without masts or steam power, as have oars.

The point of inquiry is, however, different. The question is upon the effect of the 1st section of the act against smuggling on this provision of the twenty-eighth section. The first section, which has already been quoted, extends, for the purposes of the act, the meaning of the word vessel, so as to make it, for such purposes, include every description of watercraft and means or auxiliary of transportation on or by water. The title of the act is "An act further to prevent smuggling and for other purposes." The provision of the twenty-eighth section applies to all vessels subject to enrolment or license; and the argument for the United States, if I rightly understand it, is, that the provision must be read as if its words were: "All vessels, including every description of watercraft and contrivance used or capable of being used as a means or auxiliary of transportation on or by water, which are subject to the enrolment or license, shall hereafter be liable to the payment of the fees established by law for services of customs officers incident thereto." If this were the actual phraseology of the twenty-eighth section, it would have no effect beyond subjecting to payment of the fees, all such watercraft, &c., as were already subject to enrolment or license. Whether it would be wise or unwise to abrogate thus far the exemption conceded in 1846, the purpose to do so would be intelligible. But the phrase, "purposes of this act," in the act of 1866, would be extravagantly extended beyond its fair import, if made to enlarge inferentially the purposes of other statutes whose provisions may be supposed incidentally in question.

To effectuate the legitimate purposes of the act against smuggling, boats, trunks or boxes, like those in question, may in certain cases, be forfeitable, as appendages of the tug which tows them, for her violations of penal enactments. Whether, in other cases, they may, when themselves peccant receptacles of smuggled property, or when otherwise used unlawfully, be forfeitable independently of such tug, is an inquiry foreign to the question whether they are, when towed by her, subject to distinct enrolment or licensing under the act of 1793. The purpose of the first section of the act of 1866, was merely to prevent its own provisions in subsequent sections, from being liable to evasion through any mis-description, or doubtful description of watercraft. It was no purpose of the act to duplicate requirements of the act of 1793, by requiring enrolment or license of the tows which are without motive power, and of whose tug a license was already required. As these tows, though innavigable, float when detached from their tug, legislation requiring them to be named, and enrolled, or licensed, might be useful to prevent smuggling, or facilitate its detection. But the inference of such a motive of legislation, from words of enactment imposing charges which are properly incidental to such navigation only, as whether coast-wise or foreign, is peculiarly maritime, would seem irrational.

Libel dismissed.

Case No. 15,916.

UNITED STATES v. OKIE.

[5 Blatchf. 516.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 19, 1867.

OFFENCES AGAINST POSTAL LAWS—EMBEZZLEMENT—INDICTMENT.

1. An averment, in an indictment, under the 12th section of the act of July 1, 1864 (13 Stat. 337), for embezzling and destroying a letter containing money, which had come into the possession of the defendant as dead-letter clerk in the post-office at New York, that the letter was intended to be conveyed by post, and that it was a letter addressed and directed to a person named, at Philadelphia, is not an averment that the letter was intended to be conveyed by post from New York to Philadelphia.

2. It is not necessary to aver, in such indictment, that the letter embezzled was intended to be conveyed to any particular place, an averment that it was intended to be conveyed by post being sufficient.

[Approved in U. S. v. Laws, Case No. 15,579.]

3. Nor is any averment as to the ownership of the money necessary, in such indictment.

This was a motion in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial. The defendant [Benjamin F. Okie] was indicted, under the 12th section of the act of July 1st, 1864 (13 Stat. 337), for embezzling and destroying a letter containing money, which had come into his possession as dead-letter clerk in the post-office at the city of New York, and was found guilty.

Benjamin K. Phelps, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Robert D. Holmes and Edward D. McCarthy, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The first point taken is, that the indictment charges the embezzlement of a letter intended to be conveyed by post from New York to Philadelphia, whereas the evidence showed that the letter, although mailed in New York, and addressed and directed to Francis Keyser at Philadelphia, was deposited without prepayment of postage, with the intention of having it go through the hands of the defendant, on its way to the dead-letter office in Washington, where it must by law be sent, because the postage was not prepaid. This position is based upon an erroneous reading of the indictment. There is no averment in the indictment that the letter in question was intended to be conveyed from New York to Philadelphia. The averment is, that the letter was intended to be conveyed by post, without fixing the termini of the conveyance. In the latter part of the indictment, it is averred, that the letter "was addressed, directed to one Francis Keyser, at the city of Philadelphia." This is, however, a mere description of the letter, not of the intent as to its conveyance.

But it is urged, that, if this be so, then the indictment must be held defective for omitting to designate any place to which the letter was to be conveyed; and the case of U. S. v. Foye [Case No. 15,157], is cited as authority. The decision in that case does not sustain the position. All that was decided in that case was, that, when the indictment does designate the place to which the letter is to be conveyed, the proof must conform to the averment. In that case, the averment was, that "a letter addressed to John Blake, Ipswich, was mailed, to be conveyed by post to the town of Ipswich aforesaid"—a very different averment from that in the present case. Furthermore, that case arose under the act of March 3d, 1825 (4 Stat. 102), while this case is under the act of July 1st, 1864 (13 Stat. 337), which differs from the former act in this, that it provides, that "the fact that any such letter * * * shall have been deposited in any post-office * * * or in charge of any postmaster, assistant postmaster, clerk, carrier, agent or messenger, employed in the post-office establishment of the United States, shall be taken and held as evidence that the same was intended to be conveyed by post, within the meaning of this statute." Whatever may have been necessary under the act of 1825, it is quite clear, under this provision of the act of 1864, that, inasmuch as it is not necessary to prove more than the fact of the deposit of the letter in a post-office, or in charge of a post-office agent, it cannot be necessary to aver that it was intended to be conveyed to any particular place. The averment, in the words of the statute, that the letter was "intended to be conveyed by post," is sufficient, if indeed it was necessary to state more than that it was a letter deposited in the post-office, or in charge of a post-office clerk.

The only remaining point urged in behalf of the prisoner is, that the indictment is fatally defective in omitting to lay the ownership of the money in the letter, as being in some other person than the accused. As to this, it is sufficient to say, that the offence created by the act and charged in the indictment, is the embezzlement and destruction of a letter of a certain description, to wit, containing money. The gist of the offence is the taking and destroying the letter, not the converting of the money in the letter. Larceny of money in a letter is elsewhere in the statute made a separate offence, but that is not the charge made here. In this provision of the statute, the taking of the money is not made an element of the crime, and, therefore, no averment as to its ownership is necessary.

The motion must, accordingly, be denied, and judgment be entered on the verdict.

Case No. 15,917.

UNITED STATES v. OLIVER.

[4 Law Rep. 197.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug. 6, 1841.

OFFENCES AGAINST POSTAL LAWS — ILLEGALLY OPENING LETTER—ANONYMOUS LETTERS.

1. Under the circumstances of this case, it was held, that the defendant in breaking open a letter, deposited in the post office had not violated the act of congress of 1825, c. 275, § 21 [3 Story's Laws, 1991; 4 Stat. 107, c. 64].

2. Whether anonymous letters were intended to be protected by that act,—quære.

This was a complaint against the defendant, as postmaster of Lynn, for opening a letter, which contained only scrawls and incoherent nonsense, without signature, and was addressed to one Barker, of Lynn, who, it appeared, lived in that place. The letter was dropped into the Lynn post office. It appeared, that the prisoner had been informed that many letters of this description had been in the post office, and that this bore the same appearance and handwriting; that he thereupon opened it, and when Barker called at the office, he delivered it to him, saying that he had taken the responsibility of opening it.

Mr. Dexter, U. S. Dist. Atty., stated that the complaint was founded upon the 21st section of the post office act of 1825, which makes it criminal for any person employed in any of the departments of the post office establishment, to open any letters "with which he shall be entrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and which are intended to be conveyed by post." The allegation in the complaint was, that the defendant, being postmaster, had opened a letter which had come to his possession and was intended to be conveyed by post.

Mr. Ward, for defendant, contended that the words "intended to be conveyed by post," in the 21st section, were to have some meaning; that they qualify what precedes, and show that there were some letters contemplated to come into the post office establishment, not to be conveyed by post; which could be no other than box letters, so called, that is, letters to be delivered in the place where they were lodged. He cited the 36th section, which provides that "for every letter lodged at any post office, not to be carried by post, but to be delivered at the place, where it is so lodged, the post master shall receive one cent of the person to whom it shall be delivered," and he contended that box letters were here expressly described as letters "not to be carried by post." He further contended, that this was the only provision in the act for box letters being received into the post office; that no postage was imposed on them; that the 13th section, which prescribes the rates of postage, does not extend to them, and that the one cent received by the postmaster, under the 36th section, goes to his own use alone. He insisted further, that there was no evil intent in this case.

Mr. Dexter replied, that he did not contend there was any bad intention on the part of the prisoner; but he insisted that such intent was not necessary; that by the 21st section, the opening a letter was made criminal without reference to the intent or design; that opening a letter with intent to pry into business or secrets, or obstruct correspondence, was a distinct offence, so made by the 22d section, which he cited, and which makes it criminal, if any person "shall open any letter or packet which shall have been in a post office or in custody of a mail carrier, before it shall have been delivered to the person to whom it is directed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, to pry into another's business or secrets." As to the other point, he argued that box letters came within the mischief intended to be guarded against in the 21st section, and ought, therefore, to come within the remedy and the sanction; that great evils would arise, if they were not thus included; and that they might be deemed letters intended to be conveyed by post, although the 36th section describes them as letters, not to be carried by post, because there was a distinction between "conveyed" by post and "carried" by post.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, delivered his opinion very briefly, observing that the complaint was founded wholly upon the 21st section. No offence under the 22d section was charged, or presented for his consideration. The complaint alleged, that the letter in question was intended to be conveyed by post: this allegation followed the language of the statute, and was admitted to be essential to constitute the offence charged. It would seem, that the language was intended, as some qualification of the terms which preceded it, and contemplated two classes of letters as coming to the possession of the post master; one to be conveyed by post, and the other not to be so conveyed. What letters were embraced in the latter class? The same statute in the 36th section said, that letters to be delivered in the place where they were lodged, were letters "not to be carried by post." Thus the law itself defined and described certain letters as not to be carried by post; but it was insisted, that there was a distinction between the words "carried" and "conveyed," and that box letters were to be "conveyed" by post, although not to be "carried" by post within the meaning of the law. The whole question, then, presented for the consideration of the court, was, whether there was such a distinction, between "conveyed" by post, and "carried" by post, as to be the foundation of a crime; for it was only on this distinction, that the complaint was attempted to be maintained. He thought, as the law itself had placed box letters in the class not to be carried by post, it would be refining too much to consider them still as belonging to the class to be conveyed by post, that he could not build up a crime upon a distinction so nice and critical, and he must, therefore, discharge the defendant. He suggested further, that a doubt might arise, whether such a missive as this, being mere scrawls and incoherent nonsense, without signature, would be within the protection of the penalties of the law, it being really no communication, but a fraud upon the person to whom addressed and upon the post office department, tending to prejudice the government. But he suggested this point only as a matter of inquiry, upon which he had formed no opinion.

LOTTERIES—TAX—TOWN LOT SCHEME.

1. A scheme for the disposal of town lots, by the terms of which a number of lots are sold, and others are reserved to be distributed by lot among the purchasers of the first portion, so that the chance of obtaining one of the reserved or prize lots forms a part of the inducement or consideration for which each purchaser pays the price agreed on for the lot sold to him, is a "lottery" within the operation of a law imposing a tax on lotteries, for purposes of revenue.

3. A revenue law ought to be liberally construed, with a view to attain the object for which it is enacted,—viz: the raising a revenue.

[2] [This action was brought to recover the sum of $100, alleged to be due the United States from the defendant, as a special tax for engaging in the business of a lottery dealer. It was commenced October 17, 1867, and tried by the court, without the intervention of a jury. The facts of the case are stated in the findings of the court, as follows: (1) That the defendant, on March 15, 1867, at Astoria, in the district aforesaid, being the owner of a large number of town lots in such town of Astoria, did then and there divide the greater portion of the same into six hundred parcels, for distribution by lot among the persons who should become the purchasers thereof, as hereinafter stated. (2) That three hundred of such parcels consisted of one lot each, of not less than fifty dollars value; and the other three hundred of such parcels, in and by such division and the scheme hereinafter stated, were denominated prize parcels, and consisted of two, four, and six lots each, of the value of fifty dollars each, and single lots varying in value from one hundred to six hundred dollars, and one house and lot of the value of one thousand dollars; and also, one cottage and three lots of the value of five thousand dollars. (3) That afterwards the defendant prepared a scheme for the sale and distribution of such parcels of lots and presented the same to the public by advertisements in different newspapers in general circulation, and by a descriptive pamphlet, widely circulated, for the purpose of inducing the public to purchase tickets or shares, representing parcels in such scheme. (4) That by the scheme aforesaid, each of the parcels of property aforesaid, were offered for sale at an uniform price of fifty dollars; and that on and before May 15, 1867, the defendant sold all the tickets or shares aforesaid, at the uniform price aforesaid, and thereupon in pursuance of the scheme aforesaid, the number of the lot or lots constituting each parcel was written on separate ballots and sealed up and placed in a box, and the name of each purchaser was written on as many separate ballots as he had purchased tickets or shares, and sealed up and placed in another box; and thereafter, on the day last aforesaid, under the supervision of a committee of three persons, selected in pursuance of such scheme, a ballot was drawn from each of the boxes aforesaid, and the name of the purchaser and the description of the property thus drawn were recorded by a clerk, and then another ballot was so drawn from each of such boxes, and recorded by the clerk as aforesaid, until all ballots were drawn from each box, and recorded as aforesaid; and thereupon the persons whose names were thus drawn; were, in pursuance of such scheme, declared to be the purchasers of the parcel or parcels of property so drawn by them, and the defendant executed deeds to them, therefor, accordingly. (5) That about one third of the contracts for the purchase and sale of the tickets or shares in the scheme aforesaid, were in writing, in two parts, one of which was signed by the defendant, and in these words: "Astoria, May 1, 1867. This certifies that Paul Corno has subscribed for twenty shares in my scheme for the sale and distribution of town lots in Astoria, Oregon, and will be entitled to a warranty deed for the property, which shall be drawn to him according to the prospectus, on payment of the note given for the purchase money. (Signed.) Cyrus Olney." And the other of which was signed by the subscriber, and in these words: "$1,000. Astoria, May 1, 1867. For value received, I promise to pay to the order of Cyrus Olney, one thousand dollars, in gold coin. This note is given for twenty shares in the Astoria town lot distribution, and is payable when the deed is ready for delivery, according to the prospectus. (Signed.) Paul Corno." (6) That the defendant during the period and between the dates aforesaid, or at any time thereafter, on account of the scheme and drawing aforesaid, did not pay to the United States the special tax, or any part thereof, by law imposed upon lottery ticket dealers. And, as a conclusion of law from the premises, the court finds that the defendant on and between the dates aforesaid, in selling the tickets or shares as aforesaid, in the scheme aforesaid, was engaged in the business of a lottery ticket dealer; and that thereby such defendant became and still is liable to pay to the United States a special tax of one hundred dollars.] [2]

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the sum of one hundred dollars, alleged to be due the United States from the defendant, as a special tax for engaging in the business of lottery dealer. It was commenced October 17, 1867, and tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, on November 13 thereafter, and has since been continued from term to term for deliberation and advisement. The facts of the case are stated in the findings of the court.

The law imposing this tax is found in subdivision 6 of section 79 of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 116), which reads as follows: "Lottery ticket dealers shall pay one hundred dollars. Every person, association, firm, or corporation which shall make, sell, or offer to sell lottery tickets or fractional parts thereof, or any token, certificate, or device representing or intending to represent a lottery ticket or any fractional part thereof, or any policy of numbers in any lottery, or shall manage any lottery, or prepare schemes of lotteries, or superintend the drawing of any lottery, shall be deemed a lottery ticket dealer."

The statute imposes a tax upon a dealer in lottery tickets, and also declares who shall be deemed such dealer, but it does not define or limit the signification of the word "lottery." A person to be liable as a dealer in lottery tickets must, in some of the modes or instances mentioned in the statute, be engaged in the preparation, conduct, or management of a lottery, so that the liability of the defendant turns upon the question, what is a lottery? The answer to this question must be found in the meaning of the word, as established by usage and authority. I assume, with the argument for the defendant, that the legal and popular meaning of the term coincides, and that it is used in the statute according to its primary and general acceptation. Indeed, I am not aware that the word has any technical or peculiar significance.

The word "lottery" is defined and used as follows by lexicographers and writers: "A distribution of prizes and blanks by chance; a game of hazard, in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining a larger value either in money or other articles." Worcest. Dict. "A disposition of prizes by lot or chance." Webst. Dict. "A scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance." Bouv. Dict. "A kind of game of hazard, wherein several lots of merchandise are deposited in prizes for the benefit of the fortunate." Rees. Cyclopædia. "A sort of gaming contract, by which, for a valuable consideration, one may by favor of the lot obtain a prize of a value superior to the amount or value of that which he risks." Am. Cyclopædia. "That the chance of gain is naturally over-valued, we may learn from the universal success of lotteries." Smith, Wealth Nat. bk. 1, c. 10.

All these authorities agree that where there is a distribution of prizes—something valuable—by chance or lot, that this constitutes a lottery. But the definitions from Worcester and the American Cyclopædia are the most complete. From each of these it expressly appears that a valuable consideration must be given for the chance to draw the prize.

Tried by this standard, it is manifest that the scheme prepared and carried out by the defendant for the sale and distribution of these town lots was a lottery. True, the purchasers of tickets or shares were in any event to get something—at the least, a lot, for the purposes of this scheme estimated to be worth fifty dollars. But it is not probable that any one would have purchased a ticket if it was certain that he would have received nothing in return but one of these so-called fifty dollar lots. If the first three hundred lots could have been sold for fifty dollars each on account of their market value, certainly the defendant would not have been improvident enough to put the other three hundred prize parcels into market at the same price, while their actual value was from one hundred dollars to five thousand dollars each. This is neither reasonable nor probable.

The chance of obtaining five thousand dollars for fifty dollars was the enticing object which the scheme held up to the public as an inducement to purchase the shares, and this "chance of gain," upon which depends "the universal success of lotteries," was to be determined by lot. This scheme has all the attributes and elements of a lottery. It is a distribution by lot of a certain number of prizes among twice the number of persons; and that, too, of prizes very unequal in value. The certificate of purchase issued by the defendant to each purchaser is a ticket which entitled the holder to the chance of drawing a prize of from two to one hundred times the value of the price of the ticket. It is evident that the first three hundred lots could not have been sold by any ordinary method at fifty dollars each, if at all. This is also probably true of many of the prize parcels. Whatever may have been their intrinsic or future value, the evident aim of the scheme was to sell them for more than their market value, and this was to be accomplished by an appeal to the universal passion for playing at games of chance. The purchase of the ticket and the payment of fifty dollars was made for the chance of obtaining one of the prize parcels, represented to be worth many times that sum. This was a lottery according to the common acceptation of the word. It was a lottery within the definitions in the dictionaries.

It matters not, even if the purchaser was to receive the full value of his money in any event. As a matter of fact, the money was paid for the chance of the prize also, and would not have been paid without this inducement. The sale of the ticket by the defendant gave the purchaser this chance to obtain something more than he paid for. This was dealing in lottery tickets within the purview of the revenue act.

The argument of the defendant assumes that the purchasers of the property bought six hundred parcels in common, and after thus becoming the owners of the same, adopted this method of distributing or dividing it among themselves.

If persons already owning family plate, pictures, or other property, not susceptible of division, or even equal division, choose to distribute by an appeal to lot what has thus come to them before they had any scheme of so distributing it, they are not within the definition of a lottery, nor liable to this special tax. They have not given a valuable consideration for the chance of obtaining something of much greater value—a prize.

The argument of the defendant is ingenious and plausible, but it is based upon an incorrect assumption. It ignores the fact—the mainspring of the whole transaction—that the tickets were sold and purchased for the avowed purpose of giving to each of the purchasers a chance to obtain a prize parcel by means of this subsequent allotment. The division by lot was not an afterthought of the purchasers, but a prominent part of the original scheme of sale and distribution as prepared by defendant. No purchaser bought any particular lot or parcel, or any undivided interest in the whole property. Each purchaser bought the right to have, by allotment, one of the three hundred lots, estimated to be worth fifty dollars each, and the chance of obtaining instead of such lot one of the three hundred prize parcels, represented to be worth from one hundred dollars to five thousand dollars. The chance of obtaining one of these prizes, and even the most valuable one, rather than the fifty-dollar lot, induced the purchaser to buy, and enable the defendant to sell the certificate of purchase. Indeed, the sale of the first three hundred lots, in three hundred parcels, for fifty dollars each, upon the condition that they should be distributed among the purchasers by lot, would itself be a lottery, unless the lots were in fact of equal value, which is very improbable.

The case is in almost every respect the counterpart of the celebrated case of the American Art Union, decided in New York in 1852. The scheme of the art union was that by paying five dollars, any person could become a subscriber, and entitled to an engraving and certain numbers of The Bulletin containing the proceedings of the society, and the chance of obtaining one of a number of valuable paintings which in December of each year were to be distributed by lot among the members. The drawing was to be conducted precisely as in this case, by placing the name of the subscriber in one box and the name of the painting in another. A number being drawn from the latter box, a name was drawn from the former one, and the person whose name was thus drawn was to be the owner of the prize represented by that number.

The supreme court decided that this was a lottery. 13 Barb. 577. The case was then taken to the court of appeals, and argued on behalf of the art union with great ability. The court of appeals affirmed the decision of the supreme court that the scheme was a lottery. 7 N. Y. 228. The proceeding in the New York courts was to enforce the forfeiture of the property proposed to be distributed by this scheme, and the case turned upon the construction or interpretation of the word "lottery" in the prohibition contained in the constitution of the state: "No lottery shall hereafter be authorized in this state."

This action is simply to enforce the collection of a tax imposed by the United States upon all lotteries. A revenue law is not to be strictly construed, but rather the contrary, so as to attain the ends for which it was enacted. With the policy or impolicy of allowing lotteries the revenue act does not interfere. It simply provides for taxing them, whenever and wherever they in fact take place. They are specially and heavily taxed, not for the purpose of encouraging or prohibiting them, but upon the same ground that many other special taxes are laid; because, as a rule, it is well known that their owners and managers receive from the public large gains, without giving any equivalent therefor.

Keeping this end in view, it is apparent that the revenue act ought to be so construed as to include every case of the distribution of property or money which contains the essential elements of a lottery—the payment of a valuable consideration for a chance of obtaining by lot something more valuable in return.

It is true, the defendant may have engaged in this scheme without any thoughts of becoming a dealer in what the law deems lottery tickets. Indeed, other motives than actual gain may have induced him to make the sale and distribution that he did. In the prospectus of the scheme, published by him, he asks the question: "Why is this property put into a raffle at prices which average less than half the selling rates?" and answers it as follows: "Only because the sale to citizens, for actual improvement, at full prices, at the rate of three to five thousand dollars a year, on time, as heretofore, is no longer adapted to the circumstances of the proprietor, who has become an invalid, and must hasten to complete the improvements and enterprise which he has in hand."

But even upon this mild view of the scheme, for the purpose of taxation it must be considered, or rather is, a lottery. By it many persons are induced to buy property which has no present market value, and which they otherwise would not purchase at any price, because there is set before them the chance of obtaining by lot a certain prize or piece of property of much greater value than the consideration advanced.

Let judgment be given for the plaintiff for the sum demanded in the complaint, and the costs and expenses of the action. Judgment accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. OMEARA.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1804.

CRIMINAL EVIDENCE—INTENT—ARREST.

1. Words accompanying actions may be given in evidence to show the intent.

2. An officer having a warrant against a person in his custody, may hold him under it, without informing him that he is arrested upon it.

Indictment [against Francis Omeara] for rescue of W. Aubrey, and assault and battery upon Abercrombie, the constable.

Under the act of assembly of Virginia of December 26, 1792 (Old Revised Code 287), disturbers of religious worship may be restrained by a justice present. Abercrombie was ordered by Mr. Hoffman, a justice who was present, to take Aubrey into custody. He had also a warrant from Mr. Faw, another of the justices.

THE COURT decided, that the words which the defendant spoke accompanying his actions, should be given in evidence against him, to show the intention of the defendant in his interference and in aggravation of the penalty.

Mr. Mason prayed the court to instruct the jury that Omeara, being in custody of Abercrombie, under the order of Mr. Hoffman, was also in his custody under the warrant of Mr. Faw, although he did not inform the prisoner that he arrested him on that warrant.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, cited Countess of Rutland's Case, 6 Coke, 54, that it is necessary to inform the person arrested that he is arrested under a particular warrant, or he cannot be held under it.

THE COURT gave the instruction as prayed by Mr. Mason.

[New York Times, Jan. 19, 1863.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1862.

PRIZE — SPOLIATION OF PAPERS — VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—CAPTURE BY UNAUTHORIZED VESSEL.

[1. Absence of log book, invoice, and bill of lading of a vessel captured off a blockaded coast, far out of the route of her ostensible voyage, after a long chase, and with a contraband cargo, furnishes a vehement presumption of the intentional destruction of the papers by the ship's company.]

[2. It cannot avail the claimant that the capturing vessel was herself a prize which had been placed in the service of the government before condemnation; for, if the captured vessel was violating the law, she is subject to trial and condemnation, whether the persons or means employed in making the seizure were authorized or not.]

[This was a libel against the steamer Onachita for an attempt to violate the blockade, etc.]

This vessel was captured, at sea, by the United States steamer Memphis, on Oct. 14, 1862. She was chased from 6 a. m. to 3 p. m., and in the chase threw overboard her entire cargo. Thomas S. Bagbie intervened in the cause, and alleged that he was a British subject, resident in London, and that the vessel was no prize, because the Memphis, which seized her, was a British merchant vessel, of which he himself was a part owner, and was unlawfully placed in the use of the United States before her condemnation, and is not yet finally condemned, the sentence against her being appealed to the circuit court. The vessel had on board a register to Bagbie, dated at London, Jan. 14, 1862, and an agreement, dated Aug. 4, 1862, with her master and crew, for a voyage from London to British North America, the American States, &c., &c., to final discharge in the United Kingdom. A letter to the master was also found on board, from Benj. W. Hart, giving instructions how to conduct his vessel to avoid the Yankee cruisers, and another letter to Bagbie, without signature or address, giving cautions about United States cruisers. There was also a memorandum of cargo on board, consisting wholly of contraband of war, dated Oct. 30, 1862, but without signature or place of execution. These papers were all that were found on board, but the master testified that when she left Bermuda she had on board a register, clearance, invoice of cargo, one bill of lading, and the letter of Hart, and the mate speaks of keeping a log. The vessel cleared at St. George's, Bermuda, on Sept. 30, 1862, bound for Havana. She was captured about 32° north lat. The master did not know the longitude, but supposed she was 150 to 200 miles off the coast. The mate supposed that the vessel was 50 or 100 miles off the coast.

HELD BY THE COURT [BETTS, District Judge]: That the vessel must have been wide of any reasonable route from Nassau to Havana. That the suspicion is impressive and cogent that the representation on her clearance that she was bound to Havana was simulated and false, and that she was so immediately in the course towards blockaded ports as to justify the presumption that she was attempting to enter one of them. That the absence of the log-book, invoice, and bill of lading, unexplained, furnishes vehement presumption of their intentional destruction or suppression by the ship's company. That her cargo was contraband of war, and her owner was part owner of the Memphis, recently condemned for violating the blockade. That the objection raised by the claimant to the right of the capturing vessel to make the seizure is of no weight. If the vessel arrested was acting in violation of public law, she was amenable to trial and condemnation therefor in behalf of the United States, whether the persons or means employed in making the seizure were authorized or not. It is enough that the government comes into a national court demanding the condemnation of an offender, and the court never inquires whether the party or thing proceeded against has been regularly or irregularly brought under attachment or complaint. The government is entitled to have the violated laws vindicated by the punishment of the offender, without questions as to the propriety of the acts or agencies used in bringing the offence to judgment. Vessel condemned and forfeited.

THE COURT also ordered the master's nautical instruments be not delivered to him, he being actively engaged in acts of hostility against the rights of the United States and against public law.

UNITED STATES v. O'NEALE et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1819.

CRIMINAL LAW — OPPOSING EXECUTION OF WARRANT.

It is an indictable offence to combine to oppose the execution of a warrant issued by a justice of the peace, without knowing the nature of it, and assaulting one of the parties attempting to execute it. Upon the validity of the warrant the court expressed no opinion.

Indictment [against O'Neale, Desmukes, and others] for assault and battery on one Murray, a constable. It appeared in evidence that Mr. Faw, a justice of the peace, issued his warrant against A. Locke and B. Locke for an assault upon one James Middleton, and a battery on a negro, the execution of which warrant was prevented by force; whereupon Mr. Hoffman, another justice of the peace, issued his warrant to Murray, the constable, to summon a posse, and to take the said A. and B. Locke, "and all others who had obstructed or should obstruct the execution of Mr. Faw's warrant." After the jury had retired, they came into court, and prayed the instruction of the court as to the legality of the warrant.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, admitted that the warrant of Mr. Hoffman was illegal, so far as it required the arrest of "all persons as had obstructed," &c., without naming them, or describing them, or stating that their names were unknown. But he contended that it was immaterial whether the warrant was legal or not, because the defendants had made the first assault. The warrant, however, was not wholly void; it was good as to the arrest of A. and B. Locke. Besides, the warrant was altogether unnecessary; it was the duty of all persons to aid in the execution of the former warrant, and to suppress the riot.

Mr. Hewett, for defendants, contended that the warrant could not be good in part and void in part.

THE COURT (nem. con.), at the prayer of Mr. Jones, instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that the traversers and others were combined to oppose the execution of the warrant, without knowing the nature of it, and actually assaulted one of the constable's party before any assault had been made by any one of the constable's party in attempting to execute the warrant, the traversers were guilty.

The jury found some of the traversers guilty, and others not guilty.

INTERNAL REVENUE—SEIZURE—FORFEITURE.

Section 68 of the excise act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 218], confers no authority for the seizure of distillery and lot on which situate or for subjecting such real estate to decree of forfeiture.

ernment, approved June 30, 1864, c. 172 (13 Stat. 218). The alleged causes of seizure by the collector are for neglect of the owner and superintendent of the distillery to keep books, and make daily entries therein, and to make returns, and pay the duties as required by section 57 of the act. The information is against the whiskey distilled, and the distilling apparatus, and also against the distillery, and the lot of ground whereon it is situated. By section 68, the owner, agent, or superintendent of any still, boiler, or other vessel used in the distillation of spirits on which duty is payable, who shall neglect or refuse to make true and exact entry and report of the same, or to do or cause to be done any of the things by law required to be done as aforesaid shall forfeit for every such neglect or refusal all the liquors and spirits made by or for him and all the stills, boilers and other vessels used in distillation, together with the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit, which said liquors or spirits with the vessels containing the same, with all the vessels used in making the same, may be seized by any collector or deputy collector of internal duties, and held by him until a decision shall be had thereon according to law. It will be observed that the stills and boilers are expressly subjected to forfeiture with other vessels used in distillation; but there is no express authority for the seizure by the collector of the stills and boilers. The articles made subject to seizure being loose and easily carried away, the collector is required to hold them until a decision shall be had. The stills and boilers, usually of a more permanent nature, from being built into or composing part of the distillery, it may be that the authority to seize and hold them was not considered necessary. But of this I give no opinion. At all events, the stills and boilers are subject to forfeiture. There is no authority in that section for the seizure of the distillery and lot by the collector, or for subjecting such real estate to a decree of forfeiture. It is contended by the district attorney, that for the non-payment of duties with ten per cent added in pursuance of section 69, a lien is created on the distillery and lot, and thereby a decree of forfeiture and sale is the appropriate remedy. The section provides that until such duties with such addition shall be paid, they shall be and remain a lien upon the distillery where such liquors have been distilled, and upon the stills, boilers, vats, and all other implements thereto belonging, and upon the lot or tract of land whereon the distillery is situated, until the same shall have been paid. And in case of refusal or neglect to pay said duties with the addition, within ten days after the same shall have become payable, the amount thereof may be recovered by distraint and sale of the goods, chattels and effects of the delinquent. There is clearly no express authority given by this section, for this proceeding against the distillery and lot. The section provides that the duties with the addition of ten per cent. shall remain a lien upon the distillery until paid. And the remedy is given for nonpayment for the recovery of the amount thereof by distraint and sale of the goods, chattels, and effects of the delinquent. The distraint is not confined to the distillery, apparatus or utensils, but may be generally of the goods, chattels, and effects of the delinquent. The rule is that when a statute creates a duty, and prescribes a remedy, the proceeding directed must be followed. The distillery and lot will not be entered in the decree.

Case No. 15,922.

UNITED STATES v. ONE CASE.

[6 Ben. 493; [1] 17 Int. Rev. Rec. 181.]

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1873.

INTERNAL REVENUE—IMITATION SPARKLING WINE MADE FROM DOMESTIC GRAPES.

The 48th section of the internal revenue act of July 20th, 1868 [15 Stat. 125], as amended by the 12th section of the act of June 6th, 1872 (17 Stat. 240), imposes a tax, to be collected by affixing a stamp on each bottle, "on all wines, &c., made in imitation of sparkling wine or champagne, but not made from grapes grown in the United States." An information was filed against certain wines, alleging that they were imitation sparkling wines, made "by the direct injection of carbonic acid gas, by a wholly mechanical process, into wines made from grapes grown in the United States, not in and as a part of the process of fermentation and manufacture of said last mentioned wines, but as a new and additional process of manufacture, by using such wines (the same being already the completely fermented juice of said grapes) with said carbonic acid gas injected therein as aforesaid, to make a new product known as and being an imitation sparkling wine or champagne." The claimant of the wine demurred to the information. Held, that the article was none the less free from tax, as being "made from grapes grown in the United States," notwithstanding the carbonic acid gas was injected by a separate process of manufacture.

Thomas Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Edwards Pierrepont, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought by the United States against a case containing certain "bottles of imitation sparkling wine," seized as forfeited under the internal revenue laws. The information sets forth, "that the contents of the said bottles contained in the said case of imitation sparkling wine, were then and there wines, liquors or compounds, known or denominated as wine, and were made by a certain manufacturer of imitation sparkling wine or champagne, to wit, by J. N. Blum, at his manufactory of such wines in the city of New York, by the direct injection of carbonic acid gas, by a wholly mechanical process, into wines made from grapes grown in the United States, not in and as a part of the process of fermentation and manufacture of said last mentioned wines, but as a new and additional process of manufacture, by using such wines (the same being already the completely fermented juice of said grapes), with said carbonic acid gas injected therein as aforesaid, to make a new product known as and being an imitation sparkling wine or champagne;" and "that the said wines, liquors or compounds, known or denominated as wine, and made in imitation of sparkling wine or champagne, as aforesaid, and found and seized as aforesaid, were subject then and there, and when made as aforesaid, to tax, by the statute of the United States in such case made and provided and, when found and seized as aforesaid, the same had been sold by the said manufacturer thereof, and had been removed from his said manufactory, without having on the said bottles containing the same any stamps affixed denoting the tax thereon, nor has any tax in any manner ever been paid on said wines, liquors or compounds, contrary to the form of the statute of the United States in such case provided, whereby, and by force of the statute of the United States in such case provided, the said contents of the said bottles, and the said bottles and case, became and are forfeited to the United States." The claimant demurs generally to the information.

The 48th section of the act of July 20th, 1868, as amended by the 12th section of the act of June 6th, 1872 (17 Stat. 240), imposes a tax, per bottle or package (to be collected by affixing a stamp on each bottle or package containing the article, by the person manufacturing it, before removal from the place of manufacture), "on all wines, liquors or compounds known or denominated as wine, and made in imitation of sparkling wine or champagne, but not made from grapes grown in the United States."

The information in this case states that the article seized is known or denominated as wine, and is made in imitation of sparkling wine or champagne. The information does not state that the article is not made from grapes grown in the United States. The tax is not imposed on an article made from grapes grown in the United States. The information aims to aver, argumentatively, that, inasmuch as the article was made in imitation of sparkling wine or champagne, "by the direct injection of carbonic acid gas, by a wholly mechanical process, into wines made from grapes grown in the United States not in and as a part of the process of fermentation and manufacture of said last mentioned wines, but as a new and additional process of manufacture, by using such wines (the same being already the completely fermented juice of said grapes), with said carbonic acid gas injected therein as aforesaid, to make a new product known as, and being, an imitation sparkling wine or champagne," it was, therefore, not made from grapes grown in the United States. But, the information avers that grapes grown in the United States were made into wines, and that such wines were the completely fermented juice of said grapes, and that the wines so made were afterwards converted into an imitation of sparkling wine by the additional mechanical process of directly injecting carbonic acid gas into them. It further says that, by such process, the article seized was "made," and that such process was a process of "manufacture," and was used to "make" a new product, being the article in question, and that the article, when so made, is an imitation sparkling wine, and is "made" in imitation of sparkling wine. The information, therefore, substantially avers, that the article in question was made from grapes grown in the United States. If so made, it was not taxable.

It is urged, that the expression, in the statute, "made from grapes grown in the United States," means, made by the natural process of fermentation, and that the article is not, in the sense of the statute, "made in imitation of sparkling wine or champagne," "from grapes grown in the United States," if the carbonic acid gas is injected into the wine directly by mechanical means, instead of being created in the wine by the process of fermentation taking place therein. The word "made" occurs, in the clause in question, in two places. But there is no warrant for saying that that word can have a different meaning attached to it, where it occurs in the one place, from what it has where it occurs in the other. The tax is imposed, in terms, "on all wines, liquors or compounds, known and denominated as wine, and made in imitation of sparkling wine or champagne, but not made from grapes grown in the United States." When the article is put into such a condition as to imitate sparkling wine, it is spoken of as "made" and as "made in imitation." Whatever the process by which the imitation is produced, the article is not "made in imitation" until the process is finished. If, therefore, it is an article made from grapes grown in the United States, it cannot be any the less an article made from such grapes because the process of making it into an article in imitation of sparkling wine was performed upon it after it was in a condition to be already called an article made from grapes grown in the United States, though not yet in a condition to be called an imitation of sparkling wine. The word used in both instances is "made." I understand the information in this case to aver that the claimant took an article which was properly nothing but a wine made from grapes grown in the United States, and was not otherwise a liquor or compound, and was a completely fermented juice of such grapes, and was nothing else, and that he did nothing to it but directly inject into it carbonic acid gas by a wholly mechanical process; and I cannot come to any other conclusion than that, within the words of the clause in question, the product, when made, by such process, to be an imitation of sparkling wine, must be regarded as made from grapes grown in the United States.

The section in question evinces a clear design to relieve from taxation certain articles made from grapes grown in the United States, and to impose a tax on certain articles not made from grapes grown in the United States. All that is intended now to be decided is, that the article described in the information, as above understood, is not taxable. The article is not understood to be a compound, otherwise than as it is a compound of a wine which is the completely fermented juice of the grape, with carbonic acid gas. What other compounds, known as wine, and made in imitation of sparkling wine, could be considered as made from grapes grown in the United States, and so not taxable, it will be sufficient to decide, as the cases arise.

There must be judgment for the claimant on the demurrer, with leave to the informants to amend their information.

Case No. 15,923.

UNITED STATES v. ONE CASE OF CASHMERE SHAWLS.

[5 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 247.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April 12, 1847.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — FRAUDULENT INVOICES — RULE AS TO VALUATION—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE.

[1. The act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 548), so far changes and modifies the provisions of section 66 of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 677), section 4 of the act of May 28, 1830 (4 Stat. 410), and section 14 of the act of July 14, 1832 (4 Stat. 593), in respect to the nature and contents of invoices, that the price or value of the goods must be stated according to the actual market value or wholesale price at the time of purchase in the principal markets of the country from which the imports are made; otherwise, these sections remain in full force and operation.]

[2. Therefore, to support an information for a fraudulent purchase, under the 14th section of the act of July 14, 1832, it is not enough that the jury have found that an invoice of merchandise imported from Lyons, France, does not contain the true market value thereof at Lyons, and that the undervaluation was fraudulent and with intent to evade payment of the duties; there being no evidence or finding as to whether Lyons was one of the principal markets of France, or as to the value of the goods in such markets.]

[3. A false and fraudulent valuation in an invoice not demanded by the statutes, and which can be of no avail at the custom-house, is not, of itself, sufficient to justify condemnation of the goods.]

This was a libel of information by the United States, upon a seizure by the officers of the customs, for an alleged fraudulent importation from France. The information contained six counts, the first averring that the package and invoice were made up with intent, by false valuation, extension, and otherwise, to evade and defraud the revenue, in this, that the goods, having been procured otherwise than by purchase, were charged in the invoice at a less price than the actual value thereof at the time and place where and when procured, contrary to the 4th section of the duties act of May 28, 1830; the second, that the invoice was made up with like fraudulent intent, in this, that the goods were not invoiced at the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, contrary to the same act and section; the third, that the goods were invoiced at a less price than the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties contrary to the 66th section of the act of March 2, 1799; the fourth, that the package was made up with like fraudulent intent, in this, that the goods, having been procured otherwise than by purchase, were falsely valued in the invoice, and charged therein, at a less price than the market value of the goods, at the place when and where procured, against the 4th section of the act of May 2, 1830; the fifth, that the package was made up with intent to evade and defraud the revenue, in this, that the goods were falsely valued in the invoice, and charged therein at a less price than the actual cost of the goods, at the place when and where procured, contrary to the same act and section; and the sixth, that, the goods being composed wholly or in part of wool or cotton, the package was made up with intent to evade and defraud the revenue, contrary to the 14th section of the act of July 14, 1832, without specifying the manner in which it was made up, or the particulars showing the intent. Charles Pages and Blein, of Lyons, having put in a claim, the cause was tried on the 28th and 29th of September, 1846. The questions of law were reserved, and the case was submitted to the jury, upon the questions of fact, whether the invoice contained the true market value at Lyons, and if not, whether the undervaluation was made with intent to evade the payment of duties. The jury found a verdict for the United States.

A motion in arrest of judgment was then made, and was argued on the 10th of October, 1846, and the 23d and 24th of February, 1847, by

D. D. Field, for claimants, who relied upon the following points.

1. The libel of information contains six counts; the 1st, 2d, 4th and 5th, on the 4th section of the act of May 28, 1830; the 3d on the 66th section of the act of March 2, 1799; and the 6th on the 14th section of the act of July 14, 1832. These sections are all repealed by the act of August 30, 1842, §§ 16–19, 21, 23, 26. The act of 1799 forfeits the goods not invoiced "according to the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties." The act of 1830 forfeits the package or invoice, if "made up, with intent by a false valuation, extension or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue." The act of 1832 forfeits the package, if made up "with intent to evade or defraud the revenue." In the act of 1842, the 26th section declares, "that all provisions of any former law, inconsistent with this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed." The foregoing provisions of the acts of 1799, 1830, and 1832, are inconsistent with this act, in the following respects: (1) This act imposes new and different penalties for false or fraudulent invoices; by the 17th section a penalty of 50 per cent. added to the duty, and by the 19th section, fine and imprisonment. If these penalties are held to be cumulative to the former, then it follows, that for a false or fraudulent invoice, the goods may be made to pay a penalty of 50 per cent., and be forfeited besides, and the party also fined and imprisoned; a consequence impossible to uphold. (2) It also declares, that the appraisement shall "be final, and deemed and taken to be the true value of said goods, and the duties shall be levied thereon accordingly, any act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding." This imports that the goods are not to be forfeited, but to be admitted to entry and passed. The rest of the section declares what is to be done, if they are undervalued. (3) The act of 1842 covers the same ground as the other acts. It is in fact a revision of them. It is another declaration of the will of congress upon the same subject. The old will and the new cannot both stand. On comparing the act with the previous ones, it will be seen, that sections 16 and 17 are a revision of sections 7 and 8 of the act of 1832, with the addition of much that is new. The 16th section directs an appraisement in all cases of ad valorem duties. The 17th authorizes the appraisers to inform themselves by an examination of the importer and the production of papers. If the importer is dissatisfied he may, as he did in this case, appeal, and then two merchants are to decide. The appraisement thus made is final, and to be deemed the true value, and the duties levied accordingly. Whenever the value thus ascertained exceeds by 10 per cent. the invoice value, then in addition to the duty, there shall be levied 50 per cent. of the duty imposed on the same when fairly invoiced. Section 18 assigns the collectors to take the duty in the article itself—a new provision. Section 19 declares, that any person making out a false or fraudulent invoice shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to fine and imprisonment—also a new provision. Section 21 is a revision of such parts of the 4th section of the act of 1830, and the 14th section of the act of 1832, as are not within the purview of the previous sections of this act. It provides for the case of a package containing an article not specified in the invoice, and applies to all goods, whether subject to ad valorem duty or not. Section 23 is like the 9th section of the act of 1832, except by the insertion of the words "or wholesale price thereof." Section 26 is like the 12th section of the act of 1832, except that it is more full and explicit. But the provisions in the act of 1842 that "the appraisement thus determined shall be final, and deemed and taken to be the true value of said goods, and the duties shall be levied thereon accordingly, any act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding;" that in case of undervaluation a penalty of 50 per cent. be imposed; and that the making out of a false or fraudulent invoice shall be punished by fine and imprisonment—are in neither of the three other acts. Moreover under the act of 1842, ad valorem duties are in all cases to be calculated on the market value or wholesale price, in the principal markets of the country whence imported. Whereas by the 66th section of the act of 1799, they were to be calculated on the actual cost; and by the 4th section of the act of 1830, on the actual cost or value, in the place where purchased or procured.

2. Even if the sections, upon which the information is filed, were all in force, it would still be insufficient to sustain a judgment of forfeiture. All the counts are defective, in not averring that the entry was made according to the invoice. The offence enacted by the sections consisted, in making an entry upon an invoice below the value, with design to defraud. For aught that is charged, the entry may have been according to the true value, even if the invoice was fraudulent. The law punishes, not the intention, but the attempt, to defraud the revenue.

B. F. Butler, U. S. Dist. Atty., contra.

The 66th section of the act of March 2, 1799; the 4th section of the act of May 28, 1830; and the 14th section of the act of 14th July, 1832 (the provisions counted on the information), are, each of them, in force, neither of them being inconsistent with the act of 30th August, 1842. The title of the act of 1842 shows that it was not intended to repeal the former laws, except so far as they were expressly changed. It retains the pre-existing system, but with certain changes and modifications. The 26th section accordingly expressly retains in force the laws existing on the 1st day of June, 1842, for the collection of the duties imposed by this act on goods imported into the United States; thus recognizing the continuance of the laws of 1830 and 1832, excepting so far as those laws were in conflict with the law of 1842. The sections of the act of 1842, to which the former laws are said to be inconsistent, are the 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 21st, 23d, and 26th, but these sections contain nothing to abrogate those parts of the acts of 1793 [1 Stat. 836], 1830, and 1832, on which the information counts. The 16th is substantially the same as the 7th section of the act of 1832, except that it requires the appraisement to be made according to the "market value or wholesale price, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported," instead of the "actual value at the place of exportation," as prescribed by the act of 1832, or the actual cost at such place, as prescribed by the act of 1799, § 66. This alteration does not affect the present question.

The first part of section 17 is substantially the same as section 8 of the act of 1832. The latter part is a substitute for the 3d section of the act of 1830, from which it differs by providing: 1st. A different mode of making the re-appraisement. This alteration does not affect the present question. 2d. That the re-appraisement shall be conclusive. But this is only declaring in express terms, what had been determined to be the effect of the former laws of 1830 and 1832. See Rankin v. Hoyt, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 327. This clause has reference merely to the payment of duties, and does not affect the question of forfeiture. 3d. By directing, that if the goods be appraised 10 per cent. above the invoice value, there shall be collected, in addition, 50 per cent. on the duty when fairly invoiced. This additional 50 per cent. is entirely irrespective of fraudulent intent on the part of the importer. It was not intended, by its framers, that it should be substituted in lieu of forfeiture in case of fraudulent undervaluation. On the contrary, they intended to make the law more stringent and severe.

It is perfectly consistent with the continued existence and application of the forfeitures, prescribed by the former laws, and is conclusively shown by the fact, that the tariff act of 1823 [3 Stat. 729], along with various provisions forfeiting goods in case of undervaluation, contained a provision like the one in question (section 13 of the act of 1823). The tariff act of 1828 [4 Stat. 274] contained the like provision (section 9). Whether it was politic or liberal to return to this system, was a question for the congress of 1842, which with the judiciary cannot interfere. Section 18 empowers the collector to take the duties in the article itself—a new provision, but one that has no bearing on the point in question. Section 19 declares (1) that any person who shall knowingly, &c., smuggle or clandestinely introduce into the United States, goods subject to duty, and which should be invoiced, without paying or accounting for the duty, or (2) make out, pass, or attempt to pass through the custom-house, any false, forged, or fraudulent invoice: shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by fine or imprisonment, or both. The first of these provisions is not contained, in hæc verba, in either of the foregoing laws; but it is not entirely new, for the 50th section of the act of 1799 forfeits goods unladen without permit, and subjects all persons concerned therein to indictment, and on conviction, to a penalty of $400, and to disability to hold office for seven years. The second clause making the use of false, forged or fraudulent invoices, an indictable offence, is new; but it is evidently cumulative, and in addition to other penalties. That congress had the power to make this addition to the other penalties, cannot be doubted. That they intended to do so may be inferred from the character of the law of 1842, the guarded language of the repealing statute (section 26), and from the omission in section 19 to say that it should be in lieu of the forfeiture of the goods provided for by prior laws.

There are many such cases in the acts of congress, in which, in addition to the forfeiture of the goods, fines and penalties are imposed on the person; and whether it should be done in this case or not, was a matter for the decision of the legislature. It would be against the evident scope of the whole act of 1842, to suppose, that in the case of a fraudulent invoice, the only redress left to the government, beyond the increase of 50 per cent. on the duty, was the very uncertain remedy of indictment under the 19th section.

Section 21 differs from section 4 of the act of 1830, and section 14 of the act of 1832, in the following particulars: 1st. One package out of every 10, instead of 20, to be designated by the collector. This alteration does not affect the present question. 2d. It introduces new provisions in regard to articles not specified in the invoice. This alteration affects, very materially, cases of that sort, but does not bear on the present question.

Section 23 is a re-enactment of section 9 of the act of 1832, authorizing the secretary of the treasury to establish rules and regulations. The words "market value" and "wholesale price" introduced. This section has no bearing on the present question. Section 26, as already remarked, shows most conclusively, that the pre-existing laws, as to fines, penalties and forfeitures, were intended, as a general system, to be retained in force, and it forms, therefore, a decisive objection to the argument of the other side. Repeals of the former laws, thus retained, or of any portion of them, by implication, are not to be favored; and the repugnance must be positive and insuperable, before the court will pronounce in favor of the alleged repeal. That there is no such repugnance here, has been shown by the foregoing analysis of the statutes, and will be illustrated by reference to the decisions of the courts of the United States in the cases of U. S. v. Blackburn, in the Pennsylvania district, before Judge Hopkins [Case No. 14,603], and U. S. v. Wood, in the supreme court, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 262, in which it was held that forfeitures given by the 66th section of the act of 1799, and the 4th section of the act of 1830, are left in force by the act of 1832.

Each count in the information is good and sufficient, although it is not averred that the entry was made according to the invoice. Neither of the statutory provisions counted on, makes the offence to consist, or the forfeiture to depend, on the fact of entering the goods below their value; on the contrary, the offences denounced in the statutes, counted on, are "the not invoicing the goods according to the actual cost thereof, with design to evade the duties" (66th section of act of 1799), "the making up of the package or invoice, with intent, by a false valuation, &c., to evade or defraud the revenue" (4th section of act of 1830), and "the making up of the package with intent to evade or defraud the revenue" (14th section of the act of 1832). The different counts follow the language of the statutes on which they are founded; and the terms employed in the description of the offence have the same meaning and force in the pleading which they have in the statutes. No greater particularity is required. The suggestions of the claimant's counsel, that "the entry may have been according to the true value, even if the invoice was fraudulent, and that in such case, the goods would not be forfeitable, is erroneous both in its premises and conclusion. The jury have found by their verdict that the invoice was fraudulent, and the averment being, that on the entry being made, the fraudulent invoice was produced and left with the collector, the fair inference is, that the entry conformed to the invoice; and even if it were necessary, in order to obtain a forfeiture, that the information should aver that the entry was made according to the invoice, still, after verdict, it is too late to take the objection. The forfeiture will take place notwithstanding the entry be made according to the true value, provided the invoice which is produced and left with the collector, at the time of such entry, be false, and fraudulently made up. The production of the false and fraudulent invoice at the time of the entry, is not a mere intention to defraud, but an actual attempt to defraud, whatever may be the character of the entry.

On the 23d of March, THE COURT made the following decree:

This cause having been heard on a motion in behalf of the claimants to arrest judgment on the verdict rendered in the cause, and argued by the counsel for the respective parties, and due deliberation being had in the premises, it is considered by the court, that the provisions of the act of congress, entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1842, so far change and modify the provisions of the then existing laws in respect to the nature and contents of invoices required by them to be produced, on the importation of goods, wares, and merchandise, into the United States, as that the prices or value of such goods, wares and merchandise, must be stated therein according to the actual market value, or wholesale price thereof, at the time when purchased, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported into the United States. Wherefore, it is considered by the court that the first, second, third, fourth and fifth counts of the information filed in this case are insufficient in law to support the verdict rendered in behalf of the United States in this cause. It is further considered by the court, that the sections of the various acts of congress, counted upon by the plaintiffs in the said information are in other respects in full force and operation, not being repealed by or repugnant to the provisions of the said act of August 30, 1842. It is therefore considered by the court, that the sixth count in the said information is sufficient in substance to support the verdict rendered upon the pleadings in this case in favor of the plaintiffs. Wherefore, it is ordered and adjudged by the court, that the motion in behalf of the claimants in this cause to arrest judgment on the verdict aforesaid, be overruled and denied.

Thereupon, a motion was made for a new trial in respect to the issue upon the sixth count on the following point:

As to the sixth count, the only one now to be regarded, the claimants are clearly entitled to a new trial. The case was put to the jury upon two questions, which in this respect were immaterial. Whether or not the invoice contained the true market value at Lyons, has nothing to do with the issue whether the package was fraudulently made up, and much less decided such issue—and so of the other question put to the jury, whether, if the invoice did not contain the true market value at Lyons, the undervaluation was made with intent to evade the payment of duties.

BETTS, District Judge. The motion for a new trial rests on the want of evidence on the part of the United States to support the sixth count, the only one admitted by the court to be legally sufficient; and because the matter of fact submitted by the court to be found by the jury, was immaterial to the issue upon that count. The sixth count charges the forfeiture of the goods to have accrued on its being found on examination and inspection at the custom-house, that the package was made up with intent to evade and defraud the revenue. The count is framed upon the provisions of the 14th section of the act of July 14, 1832, and embraces all the allegations necessary to bring the case within that section. [Clifton v. U. S.] 4 How. [45 U. S.] 242. It seems conceded that all the evidence offered on the trial which could be applied to this count, consisted in the invoice representing the value of the goods at Lyons, and testimony conducing to show that the goods were not stated at their true market value in Lyons at the time the invoice was made up. There can be no question but that an invoice falsely varying from what the statute requires, would be evidence proper to be submitted to the jury in support of the averments of the sixth count. It is not necessary in this case to assert the principle, but I see no ground to doubt its correctness, that the jury might be justified on evidence clearly establishing the fraud of such invoice, in finding that the package it purported to represent and describe, was prepared and made up to evade and defraud the revenue, and consequently subject to forfeiture under the act of 1832. But the invoice could not produce such consequences, unless it was made up in plain violation of the statute; a false valuation or description of the goods in a paper not demanded by the statute, and of no avail at the custom-house, could not, of itself, subject the goods to condemnation under any existing provisions of the revenue laws. The invoice the importer is required to present, since the act of August 30, 1842, is one representing the true market value of the goods at the time of purchase in the principal markets of the country from which they were imported, and if it was not indispensable to aver in the information, that Lyons was such market of France, it was necessary to prove it before the invoice made up with reference to that place, could be made evidence to the jury on this issue. But even if this piece of testimony was allowably admitted, it is clear that the facts agreed between the counsel to be submitted to the jury, had no legal relation to the averments of the sixth count. There must be evidence in the case to show that an invoice being false, it necessarily violates the law in relation to it, to render it available in support of the information. The case states, "It was agreed that all the questions of law in this case should be reserved, and that the cause should be submitted to the jury upon questions of fact, whether the invoice contained the true market value at Lyons, and if not, whether the undervaluation was made with intent to evade the payment of duties." The jury found a verdict for the United States, thus negativing the first, and affirming the second, inquiry. There being no other representation of value than the invoice, the verdict of the jury cannot be taken on the case as presented, to have found the fact of a general false representation with intent to evade the payment of duties, if that could be regarded a fact involving the forfeiture of the goods under this count. The verdict asserts that the invoice does not contain the true market value of the goods at Lyons, and that the undervaluation was fraudulent, with intent to evade the payment of duties. It is not a presumption of law to be raised by the court, that the true prices and value of goods at Lyons, are those of the general markets of France, and thus by inference pronounce the claimants guilty of a violation of the law. Nor would the jury be authorized to adopt that as a presumption or inference of fact. There was accordingly no testimony before the jury pertinent to the special facts required to be found, which can justify the verdict rendered. Therefore, both because of the want of proofs to sustain the issue on the part of the United States, and because the facts the jury were required to find were not, of themselves, a cause of forfeiture under the act of 1832, nor without the aid of other facts or circumstances, evidence from which the fraudulent act charged in the sixth count, could be legitimately inferred, the verdict must be set aside.

It is accordingly ordered that the verdict of the jury given in this case be set aside, and that a new trial be had therein.

UNITED STATES v. ONE CASE OF HAIR PENCILS.

[1 Paine, 400.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. April Term, 1825.

DEPOSITION—OBJECTIONS TO COMPETENCY OF WITNESS—CUSTOMS SEIZURE—INQUIRY AS TO ACCIDENT OR MISTAKE.

1. Objections to the competency of the witness should be made at the time of taking a deposition under the 30th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 88], if the party attend, and the objections are known to him, in order that they may be removed. Otherwise, he will be presumed to have intended to waive them.

[Cited in Shutte v. Thompson, 15 Wall. (82 U. S.) 160.]

2. But the objection may be made at the time of reading the deposition, if the facts constituting the objection were not known to the party when it was taken.

3. Where goods are seized as forfeited, under the act of the 20th of April, 1818 [3 Stat. 433], for being entered at the custom house differently from the invoice, the inquiry cannot be made at the trial, whether such difference proceeded from accident or mistake, the question being referred exclusively to the secretary of the treasury.

4. Nor has the collector a right to make such inquiry on the seizure of goods under this act.

5. The provision in the act of the 2d of March, 1799 [1 Stat. 627], allowing such inquiry to be made by the court or collector, is impliedly repealed by the act of 1818, rules of construction as to the repeal of statutes by implication.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.]

R. Tillotson, U. S. Dist. Atty.

G. Griffen, for defendants.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The libel filed in this case in the court below, alleges a forfeiture of the merchandise therein set forth, by reason of a false entry of the goods at the custom-house. [Case unreported.] It is founded upon the 22d section of the act of the 20th April, 1818 [6 Bior. & D. Laws, 306; 3 Stat. 433]. Upon the trial a bill of exceptions was taken, and the case comes before this court upon a writ of error. And the questions presented by the bill of exceptions are: (1) Whether the deposition of John S. Cornell, whose name appeared on the bond as one of the sureties for the appraised value of the goods in question, was admissible in evidence. And, (2) whether the judge erred in submitting to the jury to determine, whether the false entry was by mistake and accident, and not with an intention to defraud the revenue.

1. It has not been denied, but that Cornell was interested, and that his testimony ought to have been excluded, if the objection had been made in due time. But it is said, that the objection is waived by the plaintiff's counsel appearing and cross-examining the witness when his deposition was taken. This deposition was taken de bene esse, under the provisions of the 30th section of the judiciary act. 2 Bior. & D. Laws, 68 [1 Stat. 88]. And the absence of the witness out of the district, and at a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of trial, was duly proved. So that the sole question is, whether the cross-examination of the witness precluded the party from making the objection at that time?

The rule by which courts of justice have been governed, as to the time when the objection is required to be made to an interested witness, has undergone a considerable change. It was at one period considered, that the objection came too late, after the witness had been sworn in chief, and examined and cross-examined. And this strictness seemed to meet the approbation of Lord Mansfield, in the case of Abrahams v. Bunn, 4 Burrows, 2252, although he did not so expressly rule. But this rule has been relaxed, and it is now well settled in trials at law, that a witness who, in any stage of his examination, discovers himself interested, is to be rejected, and his evidence entirely set aside. Phil. Ev. 96; 1 Term R. 719; 6 Johns. 538. And the same rule prevails as to the depositions of witnesses in chancery proceedings, and to which the present case is more analogous. The examination of witnesses there, is always de bene esse, and with a saving of all just exceptions; and whether so expressed in the rule or order for examination, or not, it is always so understood. 1 Har. Ch. Prac. 589; Phil. Ev. 97, note; 3 Johns. 593, 607; 6 Johns. 538; 2 Vern. 463.

It is not pretended, that the district attorney had any personal knowledge or actual notice that Cornell was security in the bond, or that any objection would be made to his testimony when he attended the examination; and I cannot think that the United States are to be concluded by any presumed knowledge of the fact by the district attorney. He is not officially charged with the business and duty of taking such bonds, and it would be carrying the doctrine of constructive notice to an unreasonable length, to bind the United States thereby, in a case like the present. I have no difficulty in saying, as a general rule, that when the objection is known at the time of taking the deposition, it should be then made. It is no more than just and reasonable to presume, in such case, that the party intended to waive the objection.

But there can be no presumption of a waiver, where the party is ignorant of the fact from which it is to be presumed, and where the law does not cast upon him any such knowledge. Good faith and fair dealing require the objection to be made at the time of the examination of the witness, when known, in order to give the party an opportunity of removing the objection. This, in ordinary cases, might be done by a release; but in the present case it was not in the power of the party to discharge the interest. Nor could this have been done by the commissioner; he had no authority to substitute any other security. The objection, therefore, in this case could have only had the effect of giving notice to the party, so as to enable him to apply to the proper authority to change the security, and have the deposition afterwards taken. The claimant knew of the interest, and he ought not to be permitted to speculate upon the event of such knowledge by the opposite party, but should have called upon him to know whether the objection would be insisted upon.

To preclude the objection at the trial, when the fact upon which it is founded is discovered, without imputing any negligence to the paty from whom the objection comes, would, I think, be unjust, and against the sound and wholesome rules of evidence, and would be going beyond what has been sanctioned by any of the cases cited on the argument, or which have fallen under my observation.

In the case of Bland v. Archbishop of Armagh, 3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 622, the evidence was voluntary affidavits taken at the commencement of the suit by the consent of parties. The objection was not on the ground of interest, but bias or partiality growing out of circumstances well known to the party at the time the affidavits were taken, and he had also consented to a hearing in the cause after publication, without taking an objection to the evidence. If the objection would, therefore, at any time have gone to the competency of the testimony, it was a strong case of waiver, with full knowledge of the circumstances. So also in the case of Corporation of Sutton Coldfield v. Wilson, 1 Vern. 254. The objection was, that the witness was a member of the corporation, and he had been cross-examined, not only as to his being a member of the corporation, but on the merits. Here then was full knowledge of the interest, when the cross-examination was gone into. And when the court, therefore, say the cross-examination makes a witness competent, though otherwise liable to exception, it must be taken in reference to the circumstances appearing in that case, and which brings the case within the rule I have laid down.

The same remarks are applicable to the case of Ogle v. Paleski, Holt, N. P. 485, which was much relied upon on the argument. The action was against the defendant as owner of a ship, which by negligence in the management had injured the plaintiff's brig. The cause had been put off on a former occasion at the instance of the defendant, with liberty reserved to the plaintiff to examine witnesses on interrogatories. And the evidence offered was the answers of the captain of the plaintiff's ship; and the first answer discloses the fact, that the witness was on board the ship at the time of the accident. The objection was, that his examination could not be read without showing a release before it was taken. The answer was, that the objection was apparent on the examination, and should then have been made, before cross-examining the witness; that the objection might be waived, and that it had been waived, by not taking it at the time when it might have been disposed of by a release. And Chief Justice Gibbs said, the objection ought to have been made in a former stage of the cause, and not having been thus made, when it might have been cured, it ought not to prevail. This was a decision in perfect harmony with the rule which governed the other cases I have referred to, and to which I yield my full assent. But the present case does not fall within it. There is an essential, and, I think, a controlling fact which distinguishes it; the want of either actual or constructive notice of the interest of the witness, when the deposition was taken. The judgment must, therefore, be reversed, which would supersede the necessity of examining the other question. But as it has been fully argued, and will doubtless arise, should the cause be again tried, it may not be amiss for me to express my opinion upon it.

2. By the 22d section of the act of the 20th of April, 1818 (6 Bior. & D. Laws, 306 [3 Stat. 433]), upon which the libel is founded, the collectors are required "to cause at least one package out of every invoice, and one package at least out of every fifty packages, of every invoice of goods, wares, or merchandise imported into their respective districts, to be opened and examined; and if the same be found not to correspond with the invoice thereof, or to be falsely charged in such invoice, a full inspection of all such goods, wares or merchandise, as may be included in the same entry, shall be made; and if any package is found to contain any article not described in the invoice, the whole package shall be forfeited." It is necessarily implied in the bill of exceptions, from the statement of the objection, that in point of fact, the entry at the custom-house did not correspond with the invoice. And the point of inquiry is, whether the judge erred in submitting to the jury the question, whether such difference proceeded from accident or mistake, and not from an intention to defraud the revenue?

I did not understand the counsel for the claimant as contending that, under the provisions of the act of 1818, this would be a proper inquiry for the jury. But it is said, that the proviso to the 67th section of the act of the 2d of March, 1799, is still in force, and applicable to the case. The enacting clause in this section authorizes the collector, after entry made of any goods, &c. on suspicion of fraud, to open and examine, in the presence of two or more respectable merchants, any package or packages, and if found to differ in their contents from the entry, then the goods, wares, or merchandise contained in such package or packages shall be forfeited. Provided, that the said forfeiture shall not be incurred, if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the collector, &c. or of the court in which a prosecution for the forfeiture shall be had, that such difference proceeded from accident or mistake, and not from an intention to defraud the revenue. If this proviso is to be considered in force, the question was properly submitted to the jury. For although the proviso in terms refers the question to the court, yet at the time this act was passed it was generally understood, that seizures upon land as well as upon the water were to be tried by the court. And as under the decision of the supreme court seizures on land are now to be tried by a jury, it would be no more than a reasonable construction of this proviso to consider the jury as substituted in the place of the court to try the question of mistake or accident.

But I think this proviso cannot be considered in force, but is repealed by implication by the act of 1818. It is true, this latter act purports to be supplementary to the act of 1799. And it is admitted, that a repeal by implication of a former by a latter statute, is not to be favoured. But such effect and operation is indispensable in some cases. As when the subsequent statute is inconsistent with the former, and the two cannot be reconciled. So where the latter is on the same subject matter with the former, and introduces some new qualifications, or modifications; the former must necessarily be repealed, the two cannot stand together. And in most cases the question resolves itself into the inquiry, what was the intention of the legislature? Did it mean to repeal or take away the former law, or was the new statute intended as merely cumulative? Affirmatives in statutes that introduce new laws, imply a negative of all that is not in the purview. So that a law directing a thing to be done in a certain manner, implies that it shall not be done in any other manner. 6 Dane, Abr. 591, 593, cases there cited.

Let us test the present case by these rules. The subject matter of the 22d section, of the act of 1818, is the same with that of the 67th section of the act of 1799, viz.: To ascertain whether the contents of the packages corresponded with the entries made at the custom-house, and to declare the whole package forfeited when they disagree. But the mode and manner in which this is to be ascertained, and the duty imposed upon the collectors of the customs in relation thereto, differ in the two acts. In the act of 1799, it is left discretionary in the custom-house officers, to make the examination or not. It is made lawful for them so to do when fraud is suspected; and this examination is to be made in the presence of two or more respectable merchants. The examination in this case is bottomed on the suspicion of fraud. And under the proviso the collector and naval officer, as well as the court, are authorized to judge whether the difference proceeded from accident or mistake; and not from an intention to defraud the revenue. Under the act of 1818, it is made the duty of the collectors in all cases, whether fraud is suspected or not, to cause to be opened and examined, at least one package out of every invoice, and one package at least out of every fifty packages of every invoice; and the only inquiry he is authorized to make on a full inspection of the goods, is whether the packages contain any articles not described in the invoice; nothing is said about fraud or accident. The forfeiture is declared to have been incurred, when the fact of such difference between the entry and the invoice is found to exist. Would the collector be authorized under the act of 1818, to inquire whether the difference arose from mistake or accident, and to relinquish the seizure if it should be so found? I apprehend not. But if the proviso remains in full force, it preserves the power and authority of the collector in this respect, as well as that of the court; both are coupled together, and must stand or fall together. Under the act of 1818, a different tribunal is expressly substituted, to determine whether the difference arose from mistake or accident, and not from fraud. By the 25th section it is enacted, "that all penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of this act, may be mitigated or remitted in the manner prescribed by the act of the 3d of March, 1797." (2 Bior. & D. Laws, 585 [1 Stat. 506]). By which power is given to the secretary of the treasury, "to mitigate or remit, fines, forfeitures, or penalties, or any part thereof, if in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud in the persons incurring the same." This is the very inquiry authorized by the act of 1799, to be made by the collector or by the court. And when the act of 1818, submits this question to the decision of another tribunal, it is, within the authorities I have referred to, an implied repeal of the former provision on the same subject.

This was undoubtedly a question resting in the sound discretion of congress; and many weighty considerations might be suggested as affording reasonable grounds for the substituted provisions on this subject. Under the law of 1799, when the court decided the question, there must have been either an entire acquittal, or a total forfeiture. Under the authority given to the secretary of the treasury, he may remit in whole or in part, so as to meet the equity of the various cases that may occur. He is entrusted with equitable powers to grant relief, when by the letter of the law a penalty, or forfeiture, had been incurred. It is not an unlimited discretion, however, with which he is intrusted; he can only grant relief when the forfeiture has in his opinion been incurred, without wilful negligence or any intention of fraud.

That it was intended by the act of 1818, to repeal or do away the proviso to the 67th section of the act of 1799, as well as the enacting clause, is strongly corroborated by the 15th section of the act of 1st March, 1823 (2d Sess. 17th Cong. c. 20 [3 Stat. 729]). The enacting clause here, is substantially the same as the 22d section of the act of 1818; but to which is added a proviso, "that the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby authorized, to remit the said forfeiture, if in his opinion the said article was put in by mistake or without any intention to defraud the revenue." This is no more than incorporating by way of proviso to this section, what was contained in the act of 1818, by reference to the act of 1797, where general power is given to the secretary of the treasury to grant relief in such cases. Should a seizure be made under the 15th section of the act of 1823, for want of a correspondence between the invoice and the package, it would not I presume be contended, that upon a trial for the forfeiture, it would be a question for the jury to decide, whether this arose from mistake, and without an intention to defraud the revenue. And if not under this act, I am unable to discover why it would be proper under the act of 1818; which contains the same provision, although in a little different form and shape. Under both acts, I consider the secretary of the treasury the only proper authority to decide, whether the want of correspondence between the package and invoice, arose from mistake and not design; and that the court below erred in submitting this question to the jury. If such variance did in point of fact exist, the law has pronounced the forfeiture, and relief is only to be had through the secretary of the treasury.

The judgment of the district court must therefore be reversed.

Case No. 15,925.

UNITED STATES v. ONE CASE OF SILK.

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1871.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — PROCESS — SEIZURE — ATTACHMENT OF PROPERTY IN CUSTODY OF COLLECTOR.

1. A libel of information was filed against goods, to forfeit them for alleged violation of the revenue laws, and process was issued to the marshal, commanding him to attach the property and detain it in his custody. The marshal returned, that he had been unable to attach the property and to detain it in his custody, and an alias monition was issued to him. On the record in the cause, and an affidavit showing that the goods had been, previous to the filing of the libel, seized by the collector of the port of New York, and remained in his custody, and that a certificate to that effect had been issued to the marshal, an application was made, on behalf of the United States, for an order that the alias monition be modified, so as to conform to the provisions of the 31st section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 186). Held, that the provisions of the 4th section of the act of May 8, 1792 (1 Stat. 277), requiring the marshal to take custody of all goods seized by any officer of the revenue, were abrogated by the 31st section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 186).

2. The 9th admiralty rule of the supreme court, in view of the provision of the act of 1866, was not applicable to the case, it being a case, in the language of that rule, "otherwise provided for by statute."

3. The alias monition would, therefore, be modified, so that it should command the marshal to attach the property by leaving with the collector, or other person having the property in custody, a copy of the monition and a notice requiring such collector or other person to detain such property in custody until the further order of the court respecting it.

T. Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

John Sedgwick, for the marshal.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libel of information in this case avers that the property proceeded against was "seized on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen," by the collector of customs for the port and collection district of the city of New York, as forfeited to the United States for violations of the 24th and 68th sections of the act of March 2d, 1799, in relation to duties on imports and tonnage. The prayer of the information is, "that due process issue in that behalf, as well of attachment, to bring the said property within the custody of the court, as of monition, to all parties in interest, to appear on the return of such process and duly intervene herein, by claim and plea to the premises," and that the property be condemned, by decree of forfeiture, to the use of the United States.

On the filing of the libel of information, a writ was issued to the marshal of the Southern district of New York, commanding him to attach the property and to detain it in his custody until the further order of the court respecting it, and to give due notice, &c. The writ was returnable September 27th, 1870. The return to it made by the marshal on that day was as follows: "I certify, that, after due diligence, I have been unable to attach the property described in the within monition and to detain the same in my custody. George H. Sharpe, U. S. Marshal."

An affidavit is now presented to the court, on the part of the United States, made by a deputy collector of the customs at the port of New York. It sets forth, that such deputy collector has, under the collector, the care and custody of all goods seized within this district, on account of alleged violations of the customs revenue laws, and of the institution of proceedings for the recovery and enforcement of fines, forfeitures and penalties under such laws; that there has been ever since April, 1869, and was for a long time prior thereto, in the custom-house at the port of New York, a room specially assigned for the storage of seized goods; that there are employed in said room a storekeeper, an opener and packer, and a laborer, all under salary; that, until recently, ever since April, 1869, and for a long time prior thereto, it was the custom, where goods had been seized and placed in the seizure room, and a suit had been instituted for their condemnation, for the marshal of the district to call at the custom-house and make inquiry if the goods were in the possession of the collector, and, thereupon, to make return upon the monition, of the attachment of the goods proceeded against; that, some few months since, the marshal made claim to remove from the seizure room, and from the custody of the collector, goods against which he held a monition; that, thereupon, such deputy collector was led to investigate the law, and to consult with the district attorney of the United States; that such investigation and consultation resulted in the collector's deciding to retain possession of the goods until final adjudication, unless otherwise ordered by the court; that, after some time had elapsed, and after various attempts to procure a submission of the question to the decision of the court, the marshal, on the presentation of a monition, and, in one or two instances of an alias monition, demanded the possession of the goods therein described; that, thereupon, such deputy collector gave to the marshal a certificate signed by him, in substance, as follows: "This may certify, that the goods" (giving marks, &c.,) "described in the monition now exhibited to me by the United States marshal, dated, are in the seizure room of the custom-house, and in the custody of the collector of the port of New York. In accordance with section 31 of the act of July 18th, 1866, and acting under the advice of the United States district attorney, the collector declines to deliver the same to the order of the United States marshal, but holds the same to abide adjudication, subject to the order of the court;" that a certificate the same in substance as the foregoing was given in the present case to the marshal or his deputy, upon his presenting the monition and demanding the goods proceeded against; that a like certificate has been given, under like circumstances, in other cases which have been instituted since this question was first raised; that the custom-house is a fire-proof building, and under the care of watchmen during the night; that the place assigned for the storage of seized goods, and known as the seizure room, is immediately underneath the rotunda in said building, and is not accessible from the street, and is securely locked and barred at night; that all seized goods are kept therein, without any expense chargeable upon the goods for storage or insurance; that the only expenses charged upon goods coming into the seizure room, are the incidental expenses for cartage to the seizure room from the place of seizure, and occasional small sums for labor, such as the cooperage of leaking casks; that it has been the practice of such deputy collector to require, in all cases where goods against which a suit has been commenced, have been, for any cause, released, a direction for their release, from the marshal; that such was the practice when such deputy collector assumed the duties of his office, in April, 1869; that he has continued to require such direction, as being evidence of the direction of the court in the premises, and also evidence that the marshal has received all fees and costs to which he is entitled; and that it has been the practice to deliver goods which have been condemned, to the marshal, or his order, for sale.

An alias monition, with directions like those in the original monition, as to the attachment and detention of the property, has been issued, in the case, to the marshal. On the records in the cause, and the foregoing affidavit, a motion is now made to the court, on the part of the United States, for an order that such alias monition be so modified in respect to the clause therein contained, commanding the marshal to attach the property, and to detain it in his custody until the further order of the court respecting it, as to conform to the provisions of the 31st section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 186), or that he make return thereto, stating the fact that such property was found in the custody of the collector, and is left in his custody, under the provisions of said act. Such motion is made on notice to the marshal, and is opposed by the marshal.

In order to understand fully the question presented on this motion, it will be necessary to refer to the course of legislation and judicial decision on the subject involved. By the first statute passed by congress to regulate the collection of customs duties, that of July 31, 1789 (1 Stat. 29), provision was made for the seizure of vessels, goods, wares and merchandise by officers of the revenue, as forfeited, for violations of that act. The 25th section of that act (page 43) contained the following provision: "All goods, wares and merchandise which shall be seized by virtue of this act, shall be put into, and remain in, the custody of the collector, until such proceedings shall be had, as by this act are required, to ascertain whether the same have been forfeited or not; and, if it shall be adjudged that they are not forfeited, they shall be forthwith restored to the owner or owners, claimant or claimants thereof." This act of 1789 was repealed from and after October 1, 1790 by the 74th section of the act of August 4, 1790 (1 Stat. 178), but the 49th section (page 170) of such act of 1790 was a re-enactment, verbatim, of the provision above cited from the 25th section of the act of 1789, except that, after the word "collector" were added the words, "or such other person as he shall appoint for that purpose."

Then followed the 4th section of the act of May 8, 1792 (1 Stat. 277), entitled, "An act for regulating processes in the courts of the United States, and providing compensation for the officers of the said courts, and for jurors and witnesses," which provides, that "the marshal shall have the custody of all vessels and goods seized by any officer of the revenue, and shall be allowed such compensation therefor as the court may judge reasonable." That provision has never been expressly repealed.

The act of August 4, 1790, was repealed from and after June 30, 1800, by the 112th section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 704), but the 69th section (page 678) of such act of 1799 is a re-enactment, verbatim, of the provision so found in the 49th section of the act of 1790, except that the words, "goods, wares and merchandise," are changed to "goods, wares or merchandise." This provision of the act of 1799 has never been expressly repealed.

The first time that these provisions of law appear to have come under judicial cognizance was in the case of Burke v. Trevitt [Case No. 9,163], in 1816, where Mr. Justice Story remarked, that, where property is seized as forfeited under the revenue laws, it is the duty of the seizing officers immediately to institute the proper process to ascertain the forfeiture; that, as soon as the process is commenced, the property is in the custody of the law; that it is a general rule, in all proceedings in rem, that the custody of the thing in controversy belongs to the court in which the suit is pending; that the provision in the 4th section of the act of May 8, 1792, directing that the marshal should have the custody of all vessels and goods seized by the revenue officers, was altered, as to goods, by the provision of the 69th section of the act of March 2, 1799, declaring that all goods seized under that act should be put into, and remain in, the custody of the collector or his agent. He added: "This act, however, does not change the legal custody, after process is served upon the property. It is still, in contemplation of law, in the custody of the court; and the collector remains as much responsible to the court for the property, and as much bound to obey its decrees and orders, as the marshal is, as to property confided to his care. The collector is, in fact, quoad hoc, the mere official keeper for the court."

The question thus discussed by Mr. Justice Story came before Judge Betts, in this court, in 1831, for direct adjudication, in the case of the jewels stolen from the Princess of Orange, which were libelled in rem, by the United States, after being seized for a violation of the customs laws. Process was issued to the marshal, to attach the property. The collector claimed, under the act of 1799, the right to retain the property, and the marshal claimed the right to take the custody of it, under the process, and the act of 1792. The question in controversy was brought before Judge Betts, and he decided that the custody of the goods seized belonged to the marshal, as soon as proceedings were instituted to ascertain whether they were forfeited. The minister of the king of the Netherlands having requested from the president the delivery to him of the jewels, as the property of the Princess of Orange, the secretary of state, in November, 1831, submitted the opinion of Judge Betts, a copy of which does not now seem to be accessible, to the attorney general, Mr. Taney, (afterwards Chief Justice Taney,) for his consideration. He came to the conclusion (2 Op. Attys. Gen. U. S. 477), that Judge Betts was wrong and Judge Story was right; that, under the act of 1799, the custody of goods seized belonged to the collector, not only until the libel was filed, but also until the question of forfeiture was adjudicated; that so much of the act of 1792 as gave the custody to the marshal was repealed, and intended to be repealed, by the act of 1799; that, in legal contemplation, the goods were in the custody of the court as soon as the process was issued; that, although the actual possession and care of them was committed to the collector, he held them as the official keeper of the court, and was bound to obey its order and direction, whether conveyed to him through the marshal or in any other form; and that, whether the custody was in the collector or the marshal, the goods would be under the control and power of the court, and subject to its direction. Mr. Taney concluded his opinion by saying, that he thought the point decided by Judge Betts ought to be subjected to revision or put at rest by an explanatory act of congress.

Neither course was taken, and the question remained in this shape until December, 1838. At that time, certain goods which had been seized by the collector of New York, as forfeited for a violation of the customs laws, were libelled in rem, by the United States, in this court. Thereupon, a monition and warrant was issued to the marshal, directing him to attach the goods, and to detain the same in his custody until the further order of the court respecting the same, and to give notice, &c. The collector then made a motion to this court, that the clause in the monition, by which the marshal was directed to detain the goods attached in his custody until the further order of the court respecting the same, might be stricken out on the ground that it was repugnant to the 69th section of the act of 1799, and was, therefore, illegal and void, or that the monition should be so amended, that the goods should remain in the custody of the collector, or such person as he should appoint for that purpose, until the proceedings commenced for the forfeiture of the goods should be determined, and it should be judicially ascertained whether the same had been forfeited or not. This court denied the motion of the collector. Thereupon, the collector made a motion to the supreme court (Ex parte Hoyt, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 279), at the January term, 1839, for a mandamus to be directed to the district judge, commanding him to vacate the order denying the motion of the collector, and to grant the motion, or so much of it, and in such form, as the supreme court should direct. The question was elaborately argued on the merits by counsel for the collector and the marshal, Chief Justice Taney and Mr. Justice Story being members of the court. The statutes on the subject were commented on, and the views expressed by Mr. Justice Story, in Burke v. Trevitt, and by Chief Justice Taney, in his opinion in the case of the jewels, were urged by the counsel for the collector. Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court, and refers to the decision of Judge Betts in the case (which is not now to be found) as an elaborate opinion, reviewing the whole series of laws on the subject. The supreme court held that the case was not one in which it had the power to issue the writ asked for. But it nevertheless went on, through Mr. Justice Story, to say: "As there appears to have been some diversity of construction, in the different districts of the United States, of the laws on this subject, and as it is a matter of general concern throughout all the commercial districts, and applicable to the daily practice of the courts, and the point has been fully argued, we think it right to say, that we are of opinion, that the construction of the laws of the United States, maintained by the district judge in his opinion, is the correct one, to wit, that, by the sixty-ninth section of the collection act of 1799, the goods, wares and merchandise seized under that act are to be put into, and remain in, the custody of the collector, or such other persons as he shall appoint for that purpose, no longer than until the proper proceedings are had, under the eighty-ninth section of the same act, to ascertain whether they are forfeited or not; and that, as soon as the marshal seizes the same goods under the proper process of the court, the marshal is entitled to the sole and exclusive custody thereof, subject to the future orders of the court." These views, though not of binding force as an adjudication on the merits involved, are those of all the judges except Mr Justice Baldwin, who concurred in the view that the case was not one for a mandamus, but declined to give any opinion on the merits. It is quite apparent, that both Chief Justice Taney and Mr. Justice Story no longer adhered to the opinions they had before expressed, as to the proper construction of the acts of congress on the subject, and had come to concur with Judge Betts.

From that time the question remained at rest. Congress passed no further act on the subject, until 1866. On the 18th of July, 1866, an act was passed, the 31st section of which (14 Stat. 186) provides, that "all goods, wares, merchandise, or property of any kind, seized under the provisions of this act, or any other law of the United States relating to the customs, shall, unless otherwise provided for by law, be placed and remain in the custody of the collector, or other principal officer of the customs of the district in which the seizure shall be made, to abide adjudication by the proper tribunal, or other disposition according to law." It is insisted, on the part of the United States, in advocacy of the motion now made by them, that this provision of the 31st section of the act of 1866 has the effect to require that the custody of all property seized under the customs laws shall remain in the custody of the collector, notwithstanding it is libelled in a suit in rem, in this court, and process is issued to the marshal to attach it, and that it shall so remain until it is adjudicated upon finally in the suit.

It can hardly be necessary to vindicate the correctness of the construction put by Judge Betts, and by the justices of the supreme court, upon the provisions of law on this subject, as they stood before the act of 1866. No decision to the contrary of such construction can now be cited; and I am satisfied it was the correct view. The custody in the marshal, intended by the 4th section of the act of 1792, and the custody in the collector, intended by the 69th section of the act of 1799, were two different descriptions of custody. The custody in the marshal was a custody obtained through the process of the court. When such custody was given, in 1792, the provision of the 49th section of the act of 1790, before referred to, still remained in force, and it never could have been supposed, for a moment, that the general provision of the 4th section of the act of 1792, giving to the marshal the custody of all vessels and goods seized by any officer of the revenue, intended that he should have such custody in any case except where he was called upon to take such custody by the process of the court. As to custody after seizure by the collector, and before the issuing of the process of the court to the marshal, such custody remained in the collector, under the act of 1790. But, when such process was issued, the collector was to yield the custody to the marshal. The two enactments were to stand together. The act of 1792 was an act to regulate processes in the courts, and to provide compensation for its officers, and for jurors and witnesses. For the custody which, under it, the marshal was to have, he was to be allowed such compensation as the court might judge reasonable—that is, the court issuing the process under which such custody should be taken. The court had nothing to do with adjudging a compensation to the collector, or a compensation for any custody except a custody taken and held under process. The custody of the collector was a custody obtained through the power of seizure given to him by law, outside of process issued on a direct proceeding in rem. When the 69th section of the act of 1799 replaced, in substantially the same terms, the 49th section of the act of 1790, the 4th section of the act of 1792 was left in force, and the custody of the collector, spoken of in the act of 1799, was as distinct from the custody of the marshal, spoken of in the act of 1792, as the latter custody was distinct from the custody of the collector, spoken of in the act of 1790. When, under the act of 1799, such proceedings were had as were required by that act, to ascertain whether the goods had been forfeited, then the custody of the collector was to be given up to the marshal. The proceedings referred to were those prescribed by the 89th section of the act of 1799—libelling and prosecution in the proper court. These proceedings were, the filing of a libel or information against the forfeited property, the issuing of a writ to the marshal, commanding him to attach the property, and to give the notice required by the 89th section, and the execution of the writ by the marshal. Conk. Prac. (Ed. 1842) pp. 120, 361, note a.

Such was the law from 1799 to 1866. The practice under it was well defined. The writ, generally called a monition, commanded the marshal to attach the property, and detain the same in his custody until the further order of the court respecting the same, and to give due notice, &c. Conk. Prac. (Ed. 1842) p. 590. Under such a monition, the practice has been for the marshal to arrest the property so previously seized, by taking it into his custody. Id. p. 361. Judge Conkling, in his treatise (Ed. 1842, p. 120, note a), says, that, under the 4th section of the act of 1792, and the 69th section of the act of 1799, the marshal is, by virtue of the monition and attachment, to take into his custody all other descriptions of property, as well as vessels. Judge Betts, in his Admiralty Practice (Ed. 1838, p. 68, § 12), says, in regard to property seized as forfeited for violations of the laws of the United States, that, after being seized, it is to be proceeded against by libel, as in ordinary cases. He adds: "It seems to be considered, in some of the United States courts, that the collector, on his seizures, holds the property until final condemnation and sale, and, during the pendency of proceedings in court respecting it, becomes virtually the officer of the court in regard to the property seized. A different interpretation is put upon the various acts of congress, in this court, and the collector, like the master of the public ship, is considered as holding the property under his seizure only until 'seized, libelled and prosecuted in the proper court,' pursuant to the directions of the statute, his custody thus becoming qualified, and being superseded and discharged when the process of the court acts upon the property. The act of May 8th, 1792 (section 4), applies to the case after the property is 'seized, libelled and prosecuted,' as directed by the act of March 2d, 1799 (section 89)." He also says (page 69) that the attachment against the property is served by the marshal, by his taking the property into his own custody. By rules 181 and 13 of this court, adopted in 1838, the proper process, on an information in rem, was defined to be an attachment in rem, united with a monition. By rules 183 and 32, the return of the marshal, in case of process in rem, must express the day of the seizure of the property. Rules 49 and 50 prescribe fees to the marshal for the custody of vessels and goods "seized by any officer of the revenue, and seized, libelled and prosecuted for forfeiture."

In regard to the provision of rule 172 of this court, that, in summary proceedings in rem, in behalf of the United States, where the matter in demand does not exceed fifty dollars, and the goods are under seizure by the collector, and in his possession, the clerk may, at the instance of the district attorney, omit the attachment clause in the monition issued, and the provision of rule 173, that if, in such case, the monition also contains an attachment, and the marshal returns that the goods are in the custody of the collector, he shall stand acquitted of all responsibility for their safe keeping or production to answer the decree, and the provision of rule 174, that, in such case, the service of the monition shall be by leaving a copy or notice thereof with the collector or person having the goods in keeping, and also making like service on the owner or his agents, if known to the marshal and resident in the city, which rules apply to process on informations on seizures both upon land and water (rules 179, 183), Judge Betts states, in his Admiralty Practice (page 81), that the court, under those rules, proceeds upon the assumption, that the collector, by his own assent and that of the district attorney, or by the presumption of law, becomes, quoad hoc, the officer of the court, subject to its jurisdiction, respecting the detention and disposal of the property seized, but that such practice is contrary to the usual procedure of the court, and that such authority over the collector would be cautiously exercised, if objected to by the collector. In view of what had been held to be the law as to the custody, under the act of 1792, after process, of goods seized for forfeiture, and libelled and prosecuted in rem, it seems very doubtful whether the practice thus prescribed in respect to summary proceedings in rem, in behalf of the United States, was warranted by law, and whether the power assumed, under the 7th section of the act of March 2, 1793 (1 Stat. 335), to prescribe such practice, as a regulation of the practice of the court, was not outside of the authority granted by that section, because "repugnant to the laws of the United States." At all events, such practice could not stand, consistently with the provisions of the admiralty rules of December term, 1844, prescribed by the supreme court, hereafter referred to.

By the 9th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 77), exclusive original cognizance is given to the district courts, of "all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws of impost, navigation or trade of the United States, where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, within their respective districts, as well as upon the high seas," and also of "all seizures on land, or other waters than as aforesaid, made, and of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred, under the laws of the United States." Prosecutions following such seizures on waters so navigable, are held to be civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and, therefore, triable without the intervention of a jury; but prosecutions following other seizures are held to be suits at common law, within the 7th amendment to the constitution, and, therefore, not triable otherwise than by a jury. In the case of a seizure on the high seas or on waters so navigable, the case being then strictly a case of admiralty jurisdiction, the first pleading filed by the prosecution is properly known as a libel of information; and, in the case of a seizure on land or on waters not so navigable, the case being one not strictly of admiralty jurisdiction, such first pleading is properly known as an information. Conk. Prac. (Ed. 1842) p. 350. Rules 1 and 5 of this court speak of libels and informations, and rule 179 speaks of "informations on seizures upon land or water." Judge Betts, in his Admiralty Practice (Ed. 1838, p. 69), speaks of libels or informations filed against property seized as forfeited. An examination of text books and decisions shows that the pleadings filed to forfeit property seized have been generally called, indifferently, libels of information and informations, whether the seizures were on land or on water.

The 6th section of the act of August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. 518), provides, that the supreme court shall have power, among other things, to prescribe and regulate and alter the forms and modes of framing libels and other pleadings, in suits at common law or in admiralty pending in the circuit and district courts of the United States, and generally the forms and modes of proceeding to obtain relief, and generally to regulate the whole practice of the said courts. Under this authority, the supreme court, at its December term, 1844, promulgated certain rules, which took effect from and after September 1st, 1845, as rules "for the regulation and government of the practice of the circuit and district courts of the United States in suits in admiralty on the instance side of the courts." The 1st rule shows that the rules cover all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction commenced by libel or libel of information. The 22d rule provides, that "all informations and libels of information upon seizures for any breach of the revenue, or navigation, or other laws of the United States, shall state the place of seizure, whether it be on land or on the high seas, or on navigable waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States." All of those rules, unless altered by the act of 1866, apply to the present case, because, this being a seizure on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, is, within all the decisions, from the case of La Vengeance, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 297, to the present time, a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and it is a case on the instance side of the court, and not a case in prize. The 9th of those rules provides, that, "in all cases of seizure, and in other suits and proceedings in rem, the process, unless otherwise provided for by statute, shall be by a warrant of arrest of the ship, goods or other thing to be arrested; and the marshal shall thereupon arrest and take the ship, goods or other thing into his possession for safe custody, and shall cause public notice thereof and of the time assigned," &c., to be given. This rule provides for process of arrest, "unless otherwise provided for by statute," and prescribes, that, on such process, the marshal must take the property into his possession, for safe custody. His right and duty, therefore, prior to the passage of the act of July 18th, 1866, to take custody of property under process from the court, in cases of seizures cognizable in the admiralty, were clearly provided for, not only by the act of 1792, notwithstanding the act of 1799, but also by the 9th rule in admiralty; and his right and duty, prior to the passage of such act of 1866, to take custody of property, under process from the court, in cases of seizures not cognizable in the admiralty, were clearly provided for by the act of 1792, giving him the custody, under and after process, of "all vessels and goods seized by any officer of the revenue."

The question, then, is—What effect has the 31st section of the act of 1866 on the prior legislation, and on the 9th rule in admiralty, in respect to this case? The 43d section of that act (page 188) repeals all acts and parts of acts "conflicting with or supplied by" that act. The 31st section relates to all seizures under any law relating to the customs—to seizures of vessels as well as to seizures of other property—to seizures on land as well as to seizures on the water. The 69th section of the act of 1799 only related to seizures of goods, wares and merchandise. It did not include vessels. Vessels and goods both were named in the 4th section of the act of 1792, but the collector never claimed the custody of vessels, under the act of 1799. The act of 1866, however, covers "all goods, wares, merchandise or property of any kind," seized under any law relating to customs. It declares, that such property shall, "unless otherwise provided for by law," be placed and remain in the custody of the collector or other principal officer of the customs of the district in which the seizure shall be made, "to abide adjudication by the proper tribunal, or other disposition according to law." When congress made this enactment, provision by law existed for the custody of property after its seizure by officers of the customs and before prosecution. In respect to a vessel, it would necessarily remain in the custody of the customs officer seizing and securing it under section 70 of the act of 1799, until a suit to enforce the forfeiture should be commenced against the vessel, under section 89 of that act. In respect to goods, wares and merchandise, they would, under section 69 of that act, be put by the seizor into, and remain in, the custody of the collector or his appointee, until the commencement of a suit against them to enforce the forfeiture of them. In respect to both classes of property, the marshal would, under the act of 1792, take custody of the property, under process in the suit. Now, certainly, on this state of facts, it must be held, that congress intended, by the act of 1866, to make some change in respect to the custody of property seized. Was the change intended only a change of the custody of vessels, so that, before and until suit, they should go into and remain in the custody of the collector or his appointee, instead of remaining in the custody of their seizor? I think not. Yet that is the only change made, if the marshal is to take custody, as before the act of 1866, of all seized property, after process. The act of 1799, as construed, gave custody of goods to the collector only until the institution of proceedings against them by suit. The act of 1866 gives to the collector custody of all seized property—vessels and goods—"to abide adjudication by the proper tribunal, or other disposition according to law." The words, "to abide adjudication by the proper tribunal" mean, to abide or await a determination by such tribunal as to whether the thing seized is forfeited or not—to remain in the custody of the collector until such tribunal makes such determination, and while the proceedings are going on in the suit brought to obtain such determination. When we speak of an adjudication, we mean a judgment determining the right; and congress must be regarded as having intended that meaning.

But, it is claimed, under the words, "other disposition according to law," that the custody of the property is to remain in the collector only to abide some lawful disposition of the property, and that the taking of the property by the marshal under process in the suit was a disposition of it according to law, provided for at the time the act of 1866 was passed, and, therefore, such taking of it must, under the act of 1866, be regarded as a disposition of it according to law. What is the meaning of the word "disposition," as used in the act of 1866? There were in existence, at that time, several modes of finally disposing of seized property, both before and after suit. The forfeiture of it might be remitted by the secretary of the treasury, under the 1st section of the act of March 3d, 1797 (1 Stat. 506), or under the 16th section of the act of July 18th, 1866. It might be delivered to the claimant on appraisement and bond, under the 89th section of the act of 1799. It might, if not over $500 in value, be sold by the collector, under the 12th and 15th sections of the act of July 18th, 1866. These dispositions of it would be dispositions of the same character with a disposition of it by the court by a sale of it after condemnation, as provided for by the 90th section of the act of 1799. They would finally dispose of the property as a res, as between it and the United States. I think these and these only are the dispositions intended by the word "disposition" in the act of 1866—dispositions ejusdem generis with a disposition by adjudication—final dispositions of the res—not a mere change of its custody before final disposition.

Then comes the phrase, "unless otherwise provided for by law." Property seized is, "unless otherwise provided for by law," to remain in the custody of the collector, to abide adjudication, &c. If it be held, that the phrase, "unless otherwise provided for by law," has the effect to leave in force the provision as to custody by the marshal after process, then the provision of the act of 1866 makes no change except to put vessels into the custody of the collector before and until process. These words, "unless otherwise provided for by law," must be construed in connection with the provision of section 43 of the same act, repealing all "parts of acts conflicting with or supplied by this act." Custody until adjudication, and after as well as before process, is supplied by the act of 1866. It was supplied by previous legislation. Custody after process was, by previous legislation, given to the marshal. It is, by the act of 1866, given to the collector. The former provision for such custody by the marshal after process conflicts with the new provision as to custody by the collector after process. "Every affirmative statute is a repeal by implication of a precedent affirmative statute, so far as it is contrary thereto." Dwar. St. 673. The words, "unless otherwise provided for by law," cannot be held to embrace the prior provisions of law which are thus in conflict with and supplied by the act of 1866. On the contrary, such prior provisions must be held to be superseded and repealed.

Nor is the question one which involves the jurisdiction or authority of the court over the res that is prosecuted, or its jurisdiction over the suit in rem. The property having been seized as forfeited, and the seizure having been adopted by the United States, by bringing the suit in rem to enforce the forfeiture, the court has jurisdiction to decree such forfeiture, and jurisdiction and authority to order the property, under the 89th section of the act of 1799, to be delivered to the claimant on appraisement and bond and the payment of duties, and to cause the property, under the 90th section of the same act, if not bonded, to be, when condemned, sold by the marshal or other proper officer of the court, even though the property remains in the custody of the collector until adjudication. The views of Mr. Justice Story and of Chief Justice Taney, before cited, are sound in reference to a case where in fact the collector and not the marshal is to have custody after process. The property is, in contemplation of law, after process, in the custody of the court, although the marshal does not take it into his custody, provided it remains in custody, under a seizure for forfeiture, while the proceedings in court against it are pending. The collector is its official keeper, for the court, after process, and the court has, after process, as full control over it in the hands of the collector, and as full power to compel obedience by the collector to all orders of the court respecting it, as if it were in the hands of the marshal, under process. Such appears to have been the view of Judge Betts in respect to custody by the collector after process, under the rules of this court in regard to summary proceedings in rem in behalf of the United States, where the matter in demand did not exceed fifty dollars; and it is a necessary view in respect to all property prosecuted for forfeiture, where the custody after process is given by statute to the collector.

It follows, that not only is the provision of the 4th section of the act of 1792 abrogated by the act of 1866, but the 9th rule in admiralty, in view of the provision of the act of 1866, does not apply to cases like the present one. Such cases are, in the language of that rule, "otherwise provided for by statute."

Such being the interpretation of the act of 1866, what relief is to be granted on the motion in this case? I think the proper course is, to amend the alias monition, so that it shall command the marshal to attach the property by leaving with the collector or other person having the property in custody a copy of the monition, and also a notice requiring such collector or other person to detain such property in custody until the further order of the court respecting it, and to give due notice, &c. This will be the proper form of monition to be issued in all cases where property is under seizure as forfeited for violations of the customs laws, and is in the custody of the collector or other principal officer of the customs.

[1 Spr. 467;[1] 22 Law Rep. 79.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1859.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—IMPORTATION OF INDECENT ARTICLES—VERDICT—PACKAGE.

1. If a verdict finds facts not put in issue by the pleadings, it is so far nugatory.

2. By Statute 1857, c. 63 [11 Stat. 168], if an invoice or package of imported goods contains some articles which are indecent, or obscene, and others which are not, the whole are liable to forfeiture. The indecent or obscene articles are to be destroyed, and the others to be sold.

[Cited in U. S. v. Males, 51 Fed. 43.]

3. An information was filed against one case of stereoscopic slides, alleging them to be indecent and obscene, and praying that they might be condemned and destroyed, and the general issue was pleaded. The jury found that a part of the slides imported in the case were indecent, and that the rest were neither indecent nor obscene.

4. Under such pleadings, only those found to be indecent can be condemned, and the residue must be acquitted.

5. If a verdict find that two kinds of slides were in the same case, it is not a finding that they were in the same package.

C. L. Woodbury, U. S. Dist. Atty.

B. F. Hallett, for claimant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This prosecution is founded on Statute 1857, c. 63, prohibiting the importation of indecent or obscene articles, prints, paintings, lithographs, &c. The seizure was made on land. A trial has been had by a jury, who have returned their verdict, and the question now is, what judgment shall be entered.

The information sets forth, that "on the 30th of December, 1858, Arthur W. Austin then and now collector of the customs for the revenue district of Boston and Charlestown, in said district of Massachusetts, did, at said port of Boston and Charlestown, and on land, seize as forfeited to the use of the said United States of America, one case of stereoscopic slides, marked J. B. 111, imported into the United States from a foreign port or place, in the steamship Arabia, and now hath the same in his possession, as being forfeited and subject to destruction, for that the said stereoscopic slides are indecent and obscene articles."

The information concludes with praying, "that the said case of stereoscopic slides be condemned by the definitive sentence and decree of the said judge, as forfeited and subject to destruction, and that the same may be destroyed after condemnation."

Walter P. Cottle appeared and put in a claim, as owner, to all the stereoscopic slides, excepting fifty-nine. Those fifty-nine are admitted to be indecent, and subject to condemnation. The residue, being 1924 in number, the claimant defends, and has put in a plea denying the truth of the allegations in the information, that is, amounting to the general issue. Upon this plea, the jury have returned the following verdict: "The jury find that the case of stereoscopic slides, named in the said information, was imported by the said W. P. Cottle, and said case did contain fifty-nine stereoscopic slides that are indecent, and that as to all the other stereoscopic slides contained in said case, and claimed by said W. P. Cottle, the same are not indecent or obscene."

The district attorney now moves that judgment be rendered against all the stereoscopic slides, as forfeited, and that the fifty-nine which have not been claimed or defended, and are admitted to be indecent, be ordered to be destroyed, and that the residue be ordered to be sold for the benefit of the United States.

As to the fifty-nine, there is no controversy. They were a part of the contents of the case proceeded against, in the information, as indecent, and being found to be such, must be condemned and destroyed. But as to the 1924 which have been claimed and defended, the motion of the district attorney encounters two difficulties. 1st. The only allegation against them in the information is that they are indecent and obscene, but the verdict finds that they are neither indecent nor obscene. It is urged, however, that they were imported in the same package with others that were indecent, and for that reason are subject to forfeiture. But this ground of forfeiture is nowhere alleged in the information. The charge in the information is quite different. They are charged not with being merely in bad company, but with being themselves corrupt, and the sentence denounced by the law for these two offences is by no means the same; for the one they are to be forfeited and sold, for the other they are to be condemned and destroyed. The information asks only for this latter judgment, and presents a case warranting only that judgment. How, then, can I make a decision upon grounds not set up in the pleadings, and render a judgment not called for, or warranted by them? It is urged that I may do so, because the verdict finds sufficient to authorize condemnation. But this position is untenable. The verdict can legitimately find no fact that has not been put in issue, and so far as it goes beyond the allegations of the pleadings, it is inoperative and void. The jury can decide only the questions which have been submitted to their determination by the pleadings. If, therefore, it were true, as assumed in the argument, that the verdict contains enough to warrant a judgment of forfeiture, still such judgment could not be pronounced upon this information, and the plea of general issue.

But there is still a further difficulty. The verdict does not find facts enough to warrant condemnation. It finds, indeed, that the 1924 stereoscopic slides which were not indecent, were imported in the same case with the fifty-nine which were indecent. The statute prohibits the importation of indecent or obscene articles, and says, that "all invoices and packages, whereof any such articles shall compose a part, are hereby declared to be liable to be proceeded against, seized and forfeited." The verdict does not find that the stereoscopic slides, claimed and defended in this case, were in any invoice or package of which the fifty-nine which were indecent composed a part. It is only found that they were in the same case. Now although a package is not always a case, yet it may be true that a case of goods, in the language of importers, is always a package; but this I cannot judicially know. It is a question of the meaning of a term used in a particular trade or business. The statute relates to importation from abroad, and the names which it uses, in describing articles of importation, have the meaning which has been given to them by those engaged in that business. What is the meaning of such terms, or of technical words in any art or science, is a question of fact to be submitted to the jury. Thus, under the revenue laws, whether a certain article imported was loaf sugar (U. S. v. Breed [Case No. 14,638]) and in another case whether the article was hemp; and in another whether it was crude saltpetre, was submitted to the jury. Indeed, this has been done in a great many cases, and as to a great variety of goods. The jury not having found that the case in which all these stereoscopic slides were imported was a package, I do not know and cannot assume it to be so. The verdict, therefore, does not show that the 1924 slides claimed by Mr. Cottle were imported contrary to law, and as to them, on both grounds of objection, the judgment must be that the United States take nothing by their information, and that the bond which was given by the claimant to obtain a delivery of those articles, be cancelled.

UNITED STATES v. ONE CASE OF WATCHES, MARKED U. H. B. D.

District Court, N. D. New York. Dec. 19, 1861.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—UNDERVALUATION—FORFEITURES.

This was an action brought to forfeit the goods on the ground of undervaluation with intent to evade the payment of duties. The goods were imported in October, 1860, on board the Vanderbilt, by the claimant, Bernard Daws. The government gave testimony to show that the watches were undervalued in the invoice some 330 francs, or over ten per cent. The claimant gave evidence tending to show the accuracy of the invoice. The amount of difference in the duty between the invoice value and that put upon the goods by the appraisers, was less than five dollars. The jury went out at the adjournment of the court.

[Before HALL, District Judge.]

The jury this morning brought in a sealed verdict in this case. The verdict was for the United States condemning the goods for undervaluation.

UNITED STATES v. ONE COPPER STILL.

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Sept., 1878.

INTERNAL REVENUE — FORFEITURE — PERSONAL PROPERTY—KNOWLEDGE OF FRAUD—OWNERSHIP.

1. Personal property situated upon distillery premises and used in the business of illicit distilling is subject to forfeiture by the government, irrespective of its ownership.

2. Neither the owner of personal property, nor his mortgagee, though innocent of any knowledge of its fraudulent use, can maintain a claim thereto paramount to the rights of the United States, in proceedings for the condemnation of the same for use in illicit distillation.

3. Where a statute in direct terms denounces a forfeiture of property as a penalty, the forfeiture takes place at the time the offense is committed, and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government.

This was an information against certain property described as one copper still, one copper column, one mixing tub, one dumping tub, one alcohol tub, and other property of a similar character, seized at the rectifying house of the South Side Re-distilling Company, on July 2, 1877. The information alleged:

[2] [That on the 2d July, 1877, and during the months of November and December, 1876, and January, February, March, April, May and June, 1877, Richard Hatzfeld was carrying on the business of a distiller at the said rectifying house with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him; that is to say, that he distilled spirits from molasses during the period before mentioned, at said rectifying house, and in such business used and employed the property before mentioned, and that all of said property was found on the day of seizure in the rectifying house, or in the building, room, yard and inclosure connected therewith, and used with or constituting part of the premises on which the rectifying house was situated. That at the date of the seizure and for six months previous, Hatzfeld carried on the business of a distiller at the rectifying house, without having given the bond required by law. That after having given a notice to engage in the business of rectifying spirits at said rectifying house, Hatzfeld, on or about November 1st, 1876, entered into a conspiracy with other parties, by means of which molasses was purchased and conveyed to the rectifying house to be manufactured into alcoholic spirits, and which were so manufactured and distilled by Hatzfeld at said place, in violation of law.

[It was then averred that by reason of the premises, and of the statutes of the United States, the property mentioned became forfeited to the United States, and the information, in suitable terms, prays for the usual process, and that the property may be condemned as forfeited.

[On the 7th day of August, 1877, and previous to decree and sale, the present petitioners claiming to have a mortgage upon a portion of the property described in the information, intervened by petition which alleged the following state of facts: That the property was seized by the collector July 2d, 1877, and turned over to the marshal July 7, for the purpose of condemnation under the provisions of section 3281 of the Revised Statutes. That on the 10th April, 1877, one Carl Delmanzo was the owner of a portion of said property, and to secure to one Hugh P. Reynolds the payment of $800, executed to Reynolds his promissory note for that amount, payable in one year, with interest at ten per cent., and also executed to him a chattel mortgage upon the undivided half of so much of said property as is described as one copper still, one boiler pipe, rectifying tubs, one steam pump and all tools, pipes, and fixtures upon the premises described, which mortgage was given to secure the payment of the note. That prior to the 2d July, 1877, Reynolds indorsed and transferred the note and mortgage to petitioners, who have since been the bona fide holders of the same. That the mortgage was not recorded, but was given to secure a bona fide indebtedness, and that the property covered by it forms part of the property claimed to have been forfeited to the United States. The petition then alleged that neither the petitioners nor Reynolds were parties to any attempt to commit a fraud upon the revenue laws, or to violate any law, and were not cognizant of any fraud or attempt to defraud the United States until after the information was filed, and were without knowledge as to whether Hatzfeld had violated any law as charged in the information. That the note and mortgage remain unpaid, and that there is due to petitioners thereon, $800, as principal, except the sum of $185 paid thereon with interest. The prayer of the petition was that in case the property should be condemned and sold, such condemnation and sale might be made subject to petitioners' rights and alleged lien which were claimed to be paramount, and that upon sale the petitioners might be paid from the proceeds, the amount claimed to be due them as a first lien upon the property. This petition having been filed before decree and sale, the court was asked by petitioners' counsel to then adjudicate their rights, but it was the view of the court that decree should be entered, and that the sale had better proceed, and that thereafter the rights of the parties should be passed upon and with the same force and effect as if adjudicated when the petition was filed. Objections having been filed by the attorney for the United States to the petition, the petitioners' case was to be determined as if heard before sale, their rights, if any, being unprejudiced thereby. The objections to the petition were, that under the statute applicable to the case, the petitioners could not acquire any rights in the property in question, in the manner set forth in the petition, and that it appeared from the petition that Delmanzo did not claim to have any title to said property until after the same had been forfeited to the United States, and at a time when he could not acquire any title thereto as against the United States.] [3]

G. W. Hazelton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Murphey & Goodwin, for petitioner.

DYER, District Judge. Considering the case precisely as it stood before condemnation and sale, what were and are the rights of the parties? The information charged violations of law by Hatzfeld, who was in possession of the property. By non-appearance and default, he confessed the allegations of the information. The property was therefore liable to forfeiture, and was forfeited to the United States, so far as he and his interests were concerned. The offenses producing the forfeiture were committed in the several months between November 1, 1876, and July 2, 1877. On the 10th of April, 1877, admitting the allegations of the petition to be true, Delmanzo was the owner of a portion of the property used by Hatzfeld in the business, and on the premises, and on that day made the mortgage thereon, now claimed to be a lien paramount to the interest of the United States. Neither the petitioner, nor Reynolds the mortgagee, was a party to the alleged illicit manufacture of spirits, or had any knowledge thereof, but both were innocent parties holding the mortgage in good faith to secure a bona fide indebtedness.

[2] [From 11 Chi. Leg. News, 9. 8 Biss. 270, gives only a condensed statement of the allegations.

[3] [From 11 Chi. Leg. News, 9.]

[3] [It was contended on the argument by counsel for petitioners, that in analogy to proceedings in admiralty as authorized by the 34th rule in admiralty, petitioners should be permitted to contest the existence of the alleged causes of forfeiture; i. e. the existence of the alleged facts which rendered the property liable to seizure. The claimant, Hatzfeld, was the distiller possessing and using the property; as before remarked, he made no defense to the information. He confessed its allegations. By non-appearance and default he admitted the illicit transactions charged against him which made the property liable to seizure. And not only is this so, but no issue is made upon the merits by the present petitioners. They merely aver their own innocence of any fraud, and the innocence of the mortgagee. It is not in any manner denied that Hatzfeld committed the offense charged in the information. How, then, when no issue is made upon the question can these intervenors be heard upon such an issue? Admitting that under the rules and practice in admiralty, a person having either a proprietary interest or a mere lien, might "according to the course of admiralty proceedings," contest a forfeiture by seeking to show that no original causes of forfeiture existed, it could only be done upon suitable allegations propounding that issue. As the case is presented, we must then accept as facts the possession by Hatzfeld, at the time alleged, of the property in question; its use by him in the illicit distillation of spirits, as charged, and therefore that the alleged grounds of forfeiture existed. Further, that the mortgage lien set up by the intervenors was attempted to be created by Delmanzo, as the owner of an undivided interest in the property, that petitioners are the holders in good faith by assignment from Reynolds of the mortgage in question, and that both Reynolds the mortgagee, and the petitioners were ignorant of the alleged violations of law by Hatzfeld, and in their relations to the property and to the alleged mortgage lien, are innocent parties. Upon this state of facts, is the mortgage to be recognized as a lien paramount to the claim of the United States, and should the forfeiture and condemnation of the property be held subject to the mortgage interest of the intervenors? The bona fides of the mortgage being shown, it is claimed by the learned counsel for the intervenors, that the government can only forfeit and have condemned the interest of Hatzfeld in the property, and as he did not own the interest of the mortgagee, that interest is not and cannot be forfeited by reason of illegal transactions on the part of Hatzfeld.] [4]

Upon this state of facts, is the mortgage to be recognized as a lien paramount to the claim of the United States, and should the forfeiture and condemnation of the property be held subject to the mortgage interest of the intervenor?

The good faith of the mortgage being shown, it is claimed by the learned counsel for the intervenor, that the government can only forfeit and condemn the interest of Hatzfeld in the property, and as he did not own the interest of the mortgagee, that interest is not and cannot be forfeited by reason of illegal transactions on the part of Hatzfeld.

Section 3281, Rev. St., provides, that "every person who carries on the business of a distiller, without having given bond as required by law, or who engages in or carries on the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or of any part thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined * * * and imprisoned. * * * And all distilled spirits or wines, and all stills or other apparatus fit or intended to be used for the distillation * * * of spirits * * * owned by such person, wherever found, and all distilled spirits or wines and personal property found in the distillery or in any building, room, yard or inclosure connected therewith, and used with or constituting a part of the premises; and all the right, title and interest of such person in the lot or tract of land on which such distillery is situated, and all right, title and interest therein of every person who knowingly has suffered or permitted the business of a distiller to be there carried on, or who has connived at the same, and all personal property owned by or in possession of any person who has permitted or suffered any building, yard or inclosure, or any part thereof, to be used for purposes of ingress or egress to or from such distillery, which shall be found in any such building, yard or inclosure, and all the right, title and interest of every person in any premises used for ingress or egress to or from such distillery, who has knowingly suffered or permitted such premises to be used for such ingress or egress, shall be forfeited to the United States."

By this section, a forfeiture is denounced, first of spirits, wines, stills and other apparatus owned by the distiller, wherever found; second, of all distilled spirits, wines and personal property found in the distillery, or in any building, room, yard or inclosure connected therewith, and used with or constituting a part of the premises; third, of all the right, title and interest of the distiller in the lot or tract of land on which such distillery is situated; fourth, all right, title and interest therein of every person who knowingly has suffered or permitted the business of a distiller to be there carried on, or who has connived at the same; fifth, all personal property owned by or in the possession of any person who has permitted or suffered any building, yard or inclosure, or any part thereof, to be used for the purposes of ingress or egress to or from such distillery, which shall be found in any such building, yard or inclosure; and, sixth, all the right, title and interest of every person in any premises used for ingress or egress to or from such distillery, who has knowingly suffered or permitted such premises to be used for such ingress or egress.

Thus it will be seen, a distinction is made in some respects between real estate and personal property. As was said by Judge Woodruff in U. S. v. Distillery at Spring Valley [Case No. 14,963]: "In this section, congress seems to have anticipated a possible discussion, whether it was intended to forfeit property found upon the premises, or used for the purposes of distillation, not belonging to the distiller, and to have purposely been so explicit as to preclude inquiry into mere questions of title, and at the same time, in respect to the real estate, to protect one whose land, under lease or out of possession may, without his knowledge and consent, or perhaps even against his will, when he has no power to prevent, be used in or for the purposes of a distillery."

Further, in the same opinion it is said, that the second of the foreitures enumerated, "is declared irrespective of ownership. It plainly includes property not owned by the distiller. All spirits, wines, stills and other apparatus owned by the distiller, had already been declared forfeited, whether found on the distillery premises or not. It would have been meaningless to declare again, that the same should be forfeited when found there. Spirits, etc., owned by the distiller are brought into distinct contrast with the other spirits, etc., named. The latter are only forfeited when found on the distillery premises; the former are forfeited wherever found."

Such is the construction that has been placed upon this statute, and in view of its plain provisions, no other, in my opinion, is sound. Now, applying the law, as so construed, to the present case, the following conclusions necessarily result. Taking the averments of the information as undenied, the alleged infractions of law were committed, both before and after the making of the mortgage in question. Where a statute in direct terms denounces a forfeiture of property as a penalty, the forfeiture takes place at the time the offense is committed, and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government. U. S. v. 56 Barrels of Whiskey [Case No. 15,095]. And in the case just cited it was so held against persons who had in good faith purchased the property before the commencement of suit for condemnation. The property in question was therefore already forfeited to the United States when the mortgage was made. It was so forfeited as to both Hatzfeld and Delmanzo, because, as we have seen, the forfeiture of such property occurs irrespective of ownership. If Delmanzo's ownership could not avail against the forfeiture, then he could create no lien that would be operative against it, and his mortgagee and the assignee of the mortgage occupy no better position than does the owner and mortgagor. These conclusions are only to be avoided by showing that no grounds of forfeiture existed, and upon this question no issue is made. The objections to the intervenor's petition must be sustained.

UNITED STATES v. ONE DISTILLERY.

District Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1865.

FORFEITURES—INFORMATION—AVERMENTS—ILLICIT DISTILLATION.

1. An information under the Internal Revenue Law claiming a forfeiture of a distillery, and things connected with it, for a violation of that law, must describe with reasonable certainty the things on which a judgment of forfeiture is asked. It is not sufficient to describe them as "all the boilers, stills, and other vessels used in the distillation of spirits, and all the distilled spirits—being about twelve barrels—now in the distillery owned by Samuel W. Walts."

[Cited in U. S. v. Fifteen Barrels of Distilled Spirits, 51 Fed. 423.]

2. A pleading on a statute is not required to negative an exception in a proviso to it.

3. An information of this kind must aver that the property sought to be adjudged forfeited, was used in the illicit distillation charged, or (being spirit) was the product of such distillation.

John Hanna, U. S. Dist. Atty.

McDONALD, District Judge. This is a proceeding in rem, for the forfeiture of "all the boilers, stills, and other vessels used in the distillation of spirits," and twelve barrels of distilled spirits, the property of Samuel W. Walts. The forfeiture is claimed on the ground that Walts has failed to comply with certain provisions of the internal revenue law concerning distillers of spirits.

The information contains four counts, attempting to charge four distinct violations of the revenue law. Walts appears and files two separate demurrers—one to the whole information, and one to each of its counts severally.

Without inquiring whether a demurrer is the proper method of testing the validity of an information in the nature of a libel in rem, we will proceed to inquire whether the objections urged against this information are valid.

1. Under the general demurrer to the whole information, it is objected that the property proposed to be forfeited is not sufficiently described. It is described thus: "All the boilers, stills, and other vessels used in the distillation of spirits, and all the distilled spirits —being about twelve barrels—now in the distillery, owned by and (until seized) in the possession of Samuel W. Walts, and situated in the township of Greenville, county of Floyd, and state of Indiana."

The rules of pleading in this kind of cases are very lax as to matters of form. As to matters of substance, however, the better opinion is that "every fact and circumstance material in law to the maintenance of the suit must be set forth with precision, clearness, and reasonable certainty." Conk. Treat. 516; The Hoppet v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 389; The Caroline v. U. S., Id. 496; The Anne v. U. S., Id. 570. There is no good reason why an information of this kind should not be as clear and certain as a declaration in an action at common law. At common law, the declaration must describe goods and chattels, when they are subjects of the suit, with reasonable particularity and certainty; and it must generally state their quantity and number. Steph. Pl. 296. A declaration in trover or replevin, for divers horses or cattle, without stating their number, would doubtless be bad. In the present case the information does not state how many boilers, stills, or other vessels are claimed to have been forfeited. It, indeed, describes the spirits which it claims have been forfeited as being "about twelve barrels." But this is too loose a description either of the quantity or number. For these reasons I think that the whole information is defective.

2. It is objected that the information does not, by proper averments, take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations. The act on which this prosecution is founded, after declaring the offense and forfeiture, adds this proviso: "Provided, that such seizure be made within thirty days after the cause for the same shall have come to the knowledge of the collector or deputy collector; and that proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall have (been) commenced by such collector within twenty days after the seizure thereof." 13 Stat. 248. The rule is, that if the exception is contained in the enacting clause, the pleading must negative it; but that if it is superadded, by way of proviso, the party who would avail himself of it, must do so by a pleading setting up the proviso. 1 Chit. Pl. 223; Teel v. Fonda, 4 Johns. 304; Smith v. Moore, 6 Greenl. 278. Therefore, if Walts would avail himself of this proviso, he must do it by pleading, not by demurring.

3. The first count of the information charges that, from the first of May till the fifteenth of July, 1864, said Walts was "engaged in distilling spirits" without having procured from the proper collector any license authorizing him to do so, and without having made any application to the proper assessor for such license. There are several fatal objections to this count. It is bad for not stating that the distilling charged was done in the use of the property sought to be adjudged forfeited. The count, indeed, avers that Walts "was engaged in distilling spirits"; but it fails to inform us whether in doing so he used the implements sought to be forfeited, and whether the twelve barrels of spirits claimed to have been forfeited were the product of the illicit distillation charged. All the other counts of the information are equally defective for the same reasons. And a particular examination of them would, therefore, serve no good purpose.

The demurrers are sustained.

NOTE. That, in pleading, it is not necessary to negative a proviso in the statute, consult The Mary Merritt [Case No. 9,222], opinion by Drummond, J. Com. v. Fitchburg Railroad Co., 10 Allen, 189; Matthews v. State, 24 Ark. 484; Kline v. State, 44 Miss. 317. As to particularity, consult U. S. v. Scott [Case No. 16,241], and U. S. v. Case No. 15,930.

UNITED STATES v. ONE DISTILLERY.

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FORFEITURE—EVIDENCE—RECORD—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE.

1. Where in a proceeding for the forfeiture of property, under the internal revenue statutes, on the ground of fraud, the information in different counts avers several frauds, under different sections of the statute, a verdict of forfeiture will be sustained, if there is one count setting forth a fraud, within the words of any one of the sections.

2. An accomplice in the commission of the frauds charged, is a competent witness, but his testimony is to be received with great caution; and a jury should hesitate to base a verdict upon it, unless corroborated by other reliable testimony.

[1] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

3. The record of a court of competent jurisdiction in a case between the same parties, involving the same property, and prosecuted for the same object as the second suit, is conclusive of the facts appearing in it.

4. But where, as in this case, the proceeding is for the forfeiture of a distillery, and numerous articles of property pertaining to it, specified in the information, for fraudulent distillation, a record proving the forfeiture of spirits from the same distillery, for alleged frauds, by the decree of another court, is not conclusive evidence of the frauds charged in this information.

5. But such record is admissible to the jury as a circumstance strengthening the presumption of the frauds charged in this case; and also as corroborative of the witnesses testifying for the United States, who were accomplices in the commission of the frauds.

Warner M. Bateman, Dist. Atty., and Lewis H. Bond, for the United States.

Burnett, Follett & Wright, for claimant.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). Under the authority of the proper officer of the government, a distillery and the other property connected with it have been seized for an alleged violation of the revenue laws. The information in the case asserts various frauds in the conduct and management of the distillery, subjecting it, with all its appurtenances, to forfeiture, under several provisions of law, among others section 44 of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 125]. I will not detain you by a special notice of the different counts, or articles, in the information, or an analysis of the sections of the statute on which they are based. Many legal propositions and points have been presented, touching the sufficiency of some of the counts or charges set forth in the information. It will, however, be obvious to the jury that the main inquiry is, whether there has been illicit and unlawful distillation of spirits at this distillery, and such frauds committed, as by law will justify a verdict of forfeiture. And, if there is but one count or charge in the information, meeting the provisions of but one section of the statute, as a ground of forfeiture, it will justify a verdict against the claimant, if the evidence, in the judgment of the jury, sustains the charge. It will probably simplify the inquiries of the jury, and make their duty more plain, to state that whatever doubts or difficulties may exist in the mind of the court, as to the sufficiency of some of the counts or charges in the information, or the true construction of the sections of law, on which they are framed, the court is clear in saying that the fifth count or charge is good, as describing and setting forth an act of illegal and illicit distillation within the words and meaning of section 41 of the statute. This section, in plain and comprehensive language, strikes at and prohibits all frauds in the business of the distillation of spirits. And it may be proper here to suggest to the jury, if satisfied from the evidence that the frauds charged in the fifth count are proved, they may base their verdict on that count.

Joseph R. Huston is the claimant of the distillery and other property sought to be forfeited in this proceeding. He has filed his answer, admitting the ownership of the distillery, as a lessee, but denying all the allegations of fraud charged by the United States.

The theory on which the attorneys for the United States claim the forfeiture of the property in question is, that in August, 1868, certain parties—Hoffman, Musson, Huston, the claimant, and one Schelberger—rented a rectifying distillery owned by William Harries, in the city of Dayton, and were to carry on business as rectifiers, as a firm, under the name of Musson & Co. By the agreement, which was verbal, it is claimed by the government, Huston was to furnish the spirits to be rectified, and the profits of the business were to be divided in the proportions agreed upon. There is some conflict in the testimony as to the persons constituting the firm of Musson & Co. This, however, is not a material inquiry, if the testimony proves that Huston, as the owner of the distillery at which the spirits were manufactured, was connected with the frauds charged. It is claimed by the United States that seven different lots of spirits, of fifty barrels each, manufactured at Huston's distillery, were sent, in the fall of 1868, to the rectifying establishment, and passed into the market and were sold, without the payment of the full legal tax, with the knowledge of Huston, who participated in the fraud, and shared in the pecuniary profits arising therefrom.

The method by which, as claimed by the government, the alleged frauds were perpetrated, was by falsely branding and marking the barrels at the distillery below the real proof, and paying the tax according to such false branding and gauging, whereby the government was defrauded to the amount of tax at $2 the gallon, on from ten to fifteen gallons on every barrel. The aggregate of the sum of which the United States was thus defrauded, on the three hundred and fifty barrels alleged to have been furnished by Huston to the rectifier, would be very considerable, and would be clear profit to the parties concerned. If the jury are satisfied that this ingenious device was practiced with the knowledge of Huston, and that he participated in the fraud, there can be no question that it affords a sufficient basis for a verdict of forfeiture, as claimed by the district attorney. It was a palpable fraud, and clearly within section 44 of the act of 1868, and other provisions of that statute. It takes nothing from the repulsive character of the fraud, that it must have been committed with the knowledge of a government official, acting under the obligation of an oath. If the false branding charged was practiced, it could not have been done without the corrupt connivance of the revenue official, whose sworn duty it was to see that the barrels were correctly branded, as to the quantity and proof of the spirits distilled.

The case, so far as the jury are concerned, resolves itself into the single inquiry, whether the alleged frauds are proved to their satisfaction. I shall not detain the jury by any attempt to recite or even advert specially to the evidence adduced. This is wholly unnecessary, if it were proper. It will doubtless be obvious to the jury, that their verdict depends mainly on the credibility of the witnesses. If the jury give credit to the testimony of Hoffman and Musson, the principal witnesses for the government, they can not hesitate to find that the frauds charged are proved. On the other hand, if their testimony is rejected as unworthy of belief, and the testimony of the claimant, Huston, and other witnesses in his behalf, is received by the jury as entitled to credit, the allegations of fraud are not substantiated. The witnesses, Hoffman and Musson, occupy a somewhat peculiar position before you. They admit that they were cognizant of, and parties to, the frauds charged in this information. They were what the law terms accomplices in the commission of the fraudulent acts charged. Hoffman had obtained an assurance in writing from the commissioner of the internal revenue department, that upon his making a full disclosure of these alleged frauds, he should be protected from prosecutions for his complicity in them. As to the witness, Musson, it does not appear that any such promise was made, but it is proved that he is the informer in this case, and has a direct interest in the result. As the question of the credit to be given to the testimony of these witnesses may have a decisive influence with the jury in making their verdict, it is proper for the court to state the law applicable to it. And I may remark, that it is obvious that the fact that a witness has been an accomplice in a crime, or a fraud charged upon others, is suited to impair confidence in his testimony. He testifies with a taint in his moral character, which naturally induces a suspicion of his veracity. But the law, except after a conviction for an infamous crime, does not deprive him of the right of being a witness. He may be used as such, and his credibility left to the jury. It is well settled, however, that his testimony should be received with great caution, and where the accusation is for a felony, involving great moral turpitude in its commission, it is unsafe to return a verdict of guilty upon the sole evidence of an accomplice. If, however, an accomplice, used as a witness, is sustained and corroborated by credible testimony, in the material facts sworn to, there is, of course, no reason why he should be deemed unworthy of credit as to such facts.

The attorneys for the United States claim that the witnesses, Hoffman and Musson, are substantially corroborated by other reliable testimony, and that they are to be accredited as truthful witnesses of the gross frauds charged; and, also, that Huston, the claimant, is directly implicated in those frauds. It is insisted that the books of the rectifying establishment clearly prove the receipt of large quantities of spirits directly from Huston's distillery, with his knowledge, and that these spirits passed from the rectifier, and were sold by Huston and those associated with him, in the fraudulent manner to which the court has before adverted. These books are before the jury, and will be for their inspection. If they find, as claimed by the attorneys for the United States, that Huston received the payment for any part of the spirits sent from the rectifier, or that any of the entries made in the books were made by him, such proof would certainly be corroborative of the testimony of the witnesses, Hoffman and Musson.

Another fact relied on by the counsel for the United States, as evidence of the frauds charged, and as sustaining the testimony of the two witnesses named, is a record of the trial and condemnation, in November, 1870, of fifty barrels of spirits, shipped from the rectifier by Huston to Baltimore, and there seized by the collector. Huston filed a claim to the fifty barrels, and in his answer denied all the allegations of fraud. He also testified as a witness in the case. The trial was in the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland. The jury found, by their verdict, that the frauds charged were proved, and there was a judgment of forfeiture. All these facts appear from the record of the court. The jury will, doubtless, remember that this record, when offered in evidence by the counsel for the United States, was objected to by the counsel for the claimant, as not being legally admissible in this case. The court overruled the objection, and permitted the record to go to the jury. The attorneys for the United States claimed that it was conclusive to prove the frauds charged in this case. The court, however, on this point, instruct the jury that it has not this far-reaching effect. There is no question that the record of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive as to all facts which appear to have been passed upon in a case between the same parties, involving the same property, and where the second suit is brought for the same object or purpose as the first. The record is conclusive to prove that fifty barrels of whisky, claimed by Huston, were fraudulent, and were forfeited by the judgment or decree of the court; but it is not conclusive to prove that the distillery of Huston, and all the other property specified in this information, are subject to forfeiture for the frauds charged in this case. But the record in question may be taken into consideration by the jury; first, as tending to corroborate the testimony of Hoffman and Musson, in proving the fact that the fifty barrels of spirits shipped by Huston to Baltimore were infected with fraud; and, secondly, as a fact or circumstance bearing on the question of the frauds charged in this case. In either of these aspects, this record is competent testimony, and may be considered by the jury.

I will not further detain the jury, except to remind them of what has been before suggested, that the case turns, as it seems to the court, wholly on the credit to be given to the witnesses for the opposing parties. There is direct conflict in their testimony, in reference to material facts, involving the merits of the case. And the jury will probably find it impossible to reconcile these conflicts consistently with the integrity and truthfulness of the witnesses on both sides. They will be forced to the unpleasant conclusion that the sworn statements of the opposing witnesses can not both be true, and that from the character of the facts to which they have testified, there is too much reason to conclude there has been willful falsification. But it is the exclusive province of the jury, in the exercise of their best judgment, to decide upon the credit due to the evidence.

The jury returned a verdict for the United States.

Case No. 15,931.

UNITED STATES v. ONE-HALF BARREL BRANDY.[1]

District Court, D. California. Sept. 1, 1879.

INTERNAL REVENUE — REFILLING FOREIGN CASKS WITH DOMESTIC SPIRITS.

[Section 12 of the act of March 1, 1879 [20 Stat. 342], when read in connection with sections 11 and 13, shows a plain intention that the exterior of the package shall in all cases unmistakably indicate the nature of the contents; and therefore it is unlawful to refill with domestic tax-paid spirits any casks in which foreign spirits have been imported, even where the brands, stamps, and marks required by law have been removed.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This is an amicable suit brought to procure the decision of this court upon the question whether a cask in which foreign distilled spirits have been imported, and from which, after being emptied, the brands, stamps, and marks required by law have been removed, can lawfully be refilled with tax-paid domestic distilled spirits. Section 12 of the act of March, 1879, amongst other things, provides that "no cask or other package, such as is hereinbefore mentioned, in which distilled spirits, wines, or malt liquors have been imported, shall be used to contain domestic distilled spirits, under penalty of the forfeiture of such reused casks or packages and the contents thereof." The phrase, "cask or other package, such as is hereinbefore mentioned," obviously refers to the "pipes, hogsheads, tierces, barrels, casks, or other similar packages" mentioned in the preceding section of the act, and is employed to obviate the necessity of re-enumeration. The language of section 12, above cited, is so plain, precise and peremptory as to leave no room for misconstruction or evasion. If, therefore, this provision stood alone, I should be compelled to hold that the use of foreign casks to contain domestic distilled spirits is prohibited by law. An examination, however, of the other section of the act, which relates to the subject of imported liquors, will disclose that the provision in question is a part of a system deliberately adopted by congress, and enforced by appropriate legislation in the other section of the act. Section 11, among other things, enacts that: "Whenever any cask or package of imported distilled spirits of not less than five wine-gallons is filled for shipment, sale or delivery, on the premises of any wholesale liquor-dealer, the same shall be stamped with a special stamp for imported spirits under such rules and regulations as the commissioner of internal revenue has prescribed or may hereafter prescribe, in the case of domestic distilled spirits." The object of this provision is evident. It is that every package of not less than five wine gallons, with which imported distilled spirits have been transported, shall bear a stamp indicating the nature of its contents. Section 13, in its first clause, forbids "the purchase or sale with the imported liquor stamp herein required remaining thereon, or any of the marks or brands which shall be placed thereon, in accordance with the laws or regulations concerning imported liquors remaining thereon, of any cask or other package, after the same has been once used to contain imported liquors, and has been emptied." The second clause of the same section forbids the use, or having in one's possession, of such cask or package, with any imitation of such marks or brands, for the purpose of placing domestic distilled spirits therein for sale. The third clause prohibits "the manufacture, use, or having in possession for the purpose of placing domestic distilled spirits therein, for sale, of any cask or package made in imitation of or intended to be in the similitude of such imported casks or packages, with any imitation of such marks or brands thereon." It will be seen from these provisions that not only is the use of foreign packages to contain domestic spirits forbidden, but the use of any packages, whether domestic or foreign, made in imitation of such packages, and bearing the imitations of the marks and brands required by law to be on such packages of foreign spirits. Whether the object of these provisions was to protect the revenue against frauds, or the public against imposition, or both, it is unnecessary to inquire. The intention is plain that the exterior of the package shall in all cases unmistakably indicate the nature of the contents, and that a casual inspection of a cask of spirits should at once disclose whether its contents are foreign or domestic. The meaning and object of the law being thus plain, the court has no alternative but to enforce its provisions.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HEMPEN CABLE AND ONE HEMPEN HAWSER.

[41 Niles' Reg. 273.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. 24, 1831.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—VIOLATION OF COLLECTION LAWS — OMISSIONS FROM MANIFEST — LIBEL OF FORFEITURE — CERTIFICATE OF PROBABLE CAUSE OF SEIZURE.

[1. Articles, such as cables and hawsers, purchased abroad, in the course of the voyage, for the bona fide purpose of substituting them, as part of the ship's equipment, for articles lost or deteriorated by use, are not subject to duty, and need not be entered in the manifest.]

[2. Hempen cables and hawsers are not "vessel and cabin stores," within the meaning of the twenty-third section of the collection law (1 Stat. 644); nor are they "sea stores," within the meaning of the forty-fifth section. These expressions mean stores or provisions laid in for cabin or steerage, for officers, passengers, or crew; or, if capable of further extension, can only be applicable to articles of consumption which perish in the using, and not to the tackle and apparel of a ship, the sails, rigging, cable, or anchors.]

[3. The court will grant to the collector a certificate of probable cause of seizure where it appears that the seizure was made in good faith, in the belief that the law was being violated, and after consultation with the surveyor, naval officer, and district attorney, and recurrence to instruction from the treasury department in cases considered analogous.]

[This was a libel of forfeiture against one hempen cable and one hempen hawser, which were seized by the collector because they were not entered on the manifest of the vessel.]

A. Dunlap, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Charles G. Loring, for claimants.

DAVIS, District Judge. These articles, brought into the port of Boston, in the brig Moscow, from Cronstadt, were seized on the 14th of September last by the collector of the district of Boston and Charlestown, on the ground, as the libel alleges, that they belonged to, or were consigned to the master, mate or crew of that vessel, and were not described or included in the manifest or manifests of the cargo, by which, and by force of the statute of the United States in such case made and provided, it is alleged that they have become forfeited to the uses specified in the statute.

The claimants in their answer on oath declare that they are the lawful owners of the brig Moscow; that she arrived at Boston on the 5th of September last, from Cronstadt, having in her outward voyage, first proceeded to Matanzas, in the Island of Cuba, the said John Norris, one of the joint owners, being the master; that, on the passage to Matanzas, by a casualty which they particularly describe, part of the stream cable—about twenty-five fathoms—was necessarily cut away and lost, with the anchor to which it was attached, and that, from this circumstance, as well as from the age, long-continued use and decay of that cable, it became necessary to procure a substitute, which was accordingly done by the master of the brig, at Cronstadt, for the necessary use of the vessel, and for no other purpose; that, in like manner, a substitute was there provided for the hawser, belonging to the brig—the old hawser, it is averred, being strained, weak and unfit for use; that said new stream cable and hawser were taken on board said brig at Cronstadt, as part of her ground tackle and equipment, and solely for the purpose of being used as such; that they were purchased in the ordinary manner for immediate use, were stowed in that part of the vessel, where the stream cable and hawser, in actual service, are always stowed and kept; that during the passage from Cronstadt to Boston there was no other stream cable nor hawser on board of said vessel, used or intended to be used, as a part of her ground tackle, or equipment, nor kept nor stowed in the place where such cable and hawser are or ought to be stowed and kept, and that in all particulars the same were intended to be, and were kept to be used, as being the ordinary tackle and furniture of the vessel; the stream cable and hawser, thus purchased, intended and applied, they aver to be the same that are mentioned in the libel; they deny that those articles belonged to, or were consigned to the master, mate or crew of the vessel, saving the interest of the master as part owner, or that they were brought or imported in said vessel as merchandise, or contrary to law; and in answer to an interrogatory propounded with the libel, the respondents further declare, that said cable and hawser were purchased by said Norris, in his capacity as master and part owner of said brig, on the 14th of June last, at Cronstadt, and that they belonged to the claimants, as owners of that vessel, being, as they aver, part of her necessary tackle and equipment.

Numerous witnesses were examined, at the hearing, as to that portion of the claimants' averments respecting the insufficiency of the old stream cable and hawser, and as to the necessity or expediency of procuring new substitutes for the proper use of the vessel in the accomplishment of her voyage; and I am fully satisfied, from that examination, and from the testimony of the mate, contained in his deposition, that the claimants' averments in their defence are true. The loss of so considerable a portion of the stream cable would alone, in my opinion, justify the purchase of a new one, and entitle such substitute to be considered as part of the tackle and furniture of the vessel, and as such, free of duties, and the decided testimony given of the condition of the hawser, leaves no doubt of the propriety of procuring a substitute for that article also. The articles libelled being of this character, truly and fairly part of the ship's furniture or equipment, it was not requisite to insert them in the manifest. It is argued, on the part of the government, that, in the true construction of the statute, those articles would come under the denomination of sea stores. This would appear to me a strained interpretation of the statute, and the uniform practice, from the earliest date of our maritime and fiscal regulations, gives no support to such construction. "Vessel and cabin stores," is the expression in the 23d section of the collection law; in the 45th section, it is, "sea stores of a ship or vessel." These expressions are understood to mean, and naturally do mean the stores or provisions laid in for cabin or steerage, for officers, passengers or crews, or if further extended, can only be applicable to articles of consumption, perishing in the using, and not to the tackle and apparel of the ship, the sails, rigging, cables or anchors. These are to be considered as attached to the ship, and so belonging to the ship that it is no more necessary to include them in the manifest than the ship itself. The sails and tackle, says Lord Holt, in the case of Edmonson v. Walker, are part of the ship—and under the circumstances of that case, were so considered, though they were on the shore. 1 Show. 177. It may be remarked, that if the articles, in question in this libel, are to be considered as falling under the denomination of vessel's stores, the prosecution could not properly be founded on the 24th section of the collection law which it recites, but on the 45th section. It being satisfactorily proved, that these articles were purchased and intended for the vessel, by the master, they became thereby the property of the owners; and even if they constitute an unnecessary supply, under the circumstances in which the vessel was placed, and so to be considered as merchandise imported, still, being the claimants' property, they would not be liable to forfeiture by the section of the act, unless it were for the master's proportion, he being likewise a part owner of the vessel, it is unnecessary, in this case, to express or form an opinion. On other distinct ground, already expressed, from the suitable and proper connection of the stream cable and hawser with the vessel, as part of her tackle and apparel, I have no hesitation in decreeing that they be restored to the claimants.

It remains to be considered whether the certificate of reasonable cause shall be entered for the collector's protection, who may be otherwise exposed to a prosecution for an exercise of official duty. There were, it appears, some circumstances attending this transaction, producing a degree of excitement which had not entirely subsided in the interval between the seizure and the hearing; and counsel for the claimants has made a strong appeal to the court, urging a denial of the certificate; at the same time, the generous eulogy which he bestows on the collector, in which he is understood to express the prevailing sentiment of the commercial community, would seem to render the apprehension of unworthy or improper motive in this seizure, improbable, and not to be imputed to the collector without the fullest evidence. That mutual courtesy between the officers and the merchant, without relinquishment of right on one side, or dereliction of duty on the other, which commenced in this collection district, with the venerable General Lincoln, has been laudably continued with his successors, and the present collector is understood fully to estimate the high considerations which recommend such dispositions and deportment, and to exhibit the influence of such sentiments in official transactions, interesting from their magnitude, and often perplexing in their character, have proceeded to a satisfactory conclusion, in a manner, and with a temper, which it is gratifying to contemplate. I may ask allowance for grateful indulgence in these recognitions. The duties of the situation in which I have been placed, through a greater part of the period to which I have adverted, have been greatly relieved by the dispositions which have prevailed in this highly commercial district, in which a great portion of the business of this court usually originates. The incident controversies and concerns of trade and revenue would have been rendered particularly irksome, but from a manifestation of a liberal spirit, which looked at objects in their substantial character and relations, and seldom gave to the legal arena any discomposing features.

It seems to have been intimated, or imagined, that the collector was influenced by some improper feeling or suspicion in reference to the owners of the Moscow or some one of them. I see no evidence of this. Capt. Rich, the senior owner, and who had the principal agency in the intercourse with the collector, on this subject, doubtless, fully believed that the Moscow was no more than suitably and reasonably supplied with articles which were necessary or important for her use, and for her safe navigation, on her homeward voyage. The collector, it should be supposed, was equally honest and sincere in the belief, that the vessel was sufficiently well found, for the purpose of her voyage, in what is called ground tackle, without the supply of the new stream cable and hawser; and indirect or unworthy motives, on either side, should not be hasitly adopted and entertained. While the addition of necessary articles of ship's furniture, abroad, free of duty, from their attachment to the ship, is admitted, it is apparent that the practice is liable to abuse. In England, we find it became necessary to guard against such abuses by statute provisions. A law imposing duties on foreign sails or sailcloth was only applicable, in terms, to such as should be brought into the kingdom by way of merchandise. "But this act was evaded," says the authority (Parker, Rev. Cas.) to which I refer, "for it requiring foreign sails or sailcloth to be brought in by way of merchandise, British ships used to go upon voyages with old worn-out sets of sails, and buy sets of sails abroad; and to put a stop to this evasion, the act 19 Geo. II. c. 27, enacts that every master of a ship, belonging to any of his majesty's subjects, navigated with any foreign made sails on board, shall make an entry and report of them, and that every ship built in Great Britain, or his majesty's plantations in America, on her first setting out, should be furnished with a set of sails manufactured in Great Britain." We have no statute provisions expressly framed or calculated for keeping an admitted practice, of liberal and indulgent character, within fit and reasonable limits; and an excess in procuring, abroad, articles professedly for vessel's use, and introducing them free of duty, can only be obviated or prevented by proper notice on the part of officers, of cases which may occur, falling under their cognizance.

In the present instance there was no sudden movement on the part of the collector. The ground tackle of the Moscow, on her departure from the United States, consisted of a chain cable, a hempen bower, and stream cable, and hawser. She returned with the addition of a new hempen bower cable, a stream cable and hawser, and the old articles of corresponding description still remained on board. The collector was of opinion that there was an excess in this additional supply, and that all the articles, thus purchased and taken on board at Cronstadt, should be entered, as liable to duty. The ultimate seizure of the stream cable and hawser, was the result of several days' deliberation, and after consultation with the surveyor and naval officer and the district attorney, and recurrence to instructions from the treasury department, in cases considered analogous. In finally determining on the seizure the bower cable was omitted, because it appeared it had been bent for use, as occasion should require, in the passage from Cronstadt. In the seizure of the articles, which will now be decreed to be restored, there was mistake in fact or in law. If the facts had sustained the collector's opinion, that the articles were not necessary for the vessel's use, and it still should have clearly appeared that they belong not to the master, mate or crew, they were not liable to condemnation and seizure. In such case, the seizure would be under a mistake as to the law, unless it should be thought maintainable for the proportion belonging to one of the part owners, who was master of the vessel. But it is of little importance to inquire, particularly, whether the mistake were in fact or in law, according to the rule of law on this subject by which we are governed. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, in the case referred to by the district attorney (U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 311), observes that as the construction of the law was liable to some question, the court would suffer the certificate of probable cause to remain. "A doubt," it is added, "as to the true construction of the law, is as reasonable a cause for seizure as a doubt respecting the fact." In the present case, the collector, as appears to me, acted with a sincere conviction that he was in the correct and requisite performance of his official duty, without any culpable or unworthy motive. I shall therefore accompany the decree of restoration, with a certificate of reasonable cause.

Case No. 15,932.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HORSE.

[7 Ben. 405; [1] 20 Int. Rev. Rec. 63; 22 Pittsb. Leg. J. 9.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1874.

INTERNAL REVENUE — COSTS OF DISTRICT ATTORNEYS AND CLERKS.

In suits brought to enforce forfeitures under the customs revenue acts, the district attorney of the United States is entitled to tax, as costs, two per cent. on the amount of proceeds realized under execution, in accordance with the 11th section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 741), and the clerk is entitled to tax the one per cent. on such proceeds allowed him by the 1st section of the act of February 26, 1853 (10 Stat. 161), notwithstanding the passage of the 2d section of the act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. 186), repealing all provisions of law under which moieties of fines, penalties or forfeitures under the customs revenue laws, or commission thereon, are paid to officers of the United States.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The sum of $444 37 is in the registry of this court, as the gross proceeds of an execution issued in this suit against stipulators for the value of the property seized and proceeded against therein, which was seized and condemned as forfeited for a violation of the laws relating to the revenue from customs duties. The district attorney presents, for taxation, an allowance claimed by him to be payable to him out of such proceeds, amounting to $8 88, being two per centum on the amount of such proceeds. The clerk presents for taxation a bill of costs in this suit, one item of which is the sum of $4 44, being one per cent. on the amount of such proceeds, claimed by him to be payable to him as a fee for receiving, keeping and paying out the amount of such proceeds. Questions are raised as to whether such two items are now taxable, in view of the provisions of the act of June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend the customs revenue laws and to repeal moieties."

The 2d section of the said act of 1874 provides, "that all provisions of law under which moieties of any fines, penalties or forfeitures under the customs revenue laws, or any share therein, or commission thereon, are paid to informers, or officers of customs, or other officers of the United States, are hereby repealed, and, from and after the date of the passage of this act, the proceeds of all such fines, penalties and forfeitures shall be paid into the treasury of the United States." The provision of law existing when the act of 1874 was passed, for distributing the proceeds of fines, penalties and forfeitures incurred under the customs revenue laws, was the 1st section of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 546), and was in these words: "From the proceeds of fines, penalties and forfeitures incurred under the provisions of the laws relating to the customs, there shall be deducted such charges and expenses as are, by law, in each case, authorized to be deducted, * * * and the residue of the proceeds aforesaid shall be paid into the treasury of the United States, and distributed under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, in the manner following, to wit, one half to the United States, one fourth to the person giving the information which has led to the seizure, or to the recovery of the fine or penalty; and, if there be no informer other than the collector, naval officer or surveyor, then to the officer making the seizure, and the remaining one-fourth to be equally divided between the collector, naval officer and surveyor; * * * but, where any fine, penalty or forfeiture incurred by virtue of the laws relating to customs shall be recovered in consequence of any information given by an officer of a revenue cutter, the proceeds thereof shall, after the legal deductions, including the deductions herein authorized, have been made, be disposed of as follows, one-fourth to the United States, one-fourth to the officers of the customs, as hereinbefore provided, and the remainder to the officers of such revenue cutter, to be divided among them in proportion to their pay."

The item claimed by the district attorney to be taxable and payable to him, is claimed under the provisions of the 11th section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 741), which is as follows: "There shall be taxed and paid to district attorneys two per centum upon all moneys collected or realized in any suit or proceeding arising under the revenue laws, conducted by them, in which the United States is a party. The act in relation to costs, approved February twenty-sixth, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, shall not apply to such allowances, and the same shall be in lieu of all costs and fees in such suit or proceedings." The act of February 26, 1853 (10 Stat. 161), thus referred to, was a bill prescribing what costs and fees should be allowed to various officers, and among them, district attorneys and all other attorneys and clerks of courts, and its 1st section provided, that, "in lieu of the compensation now allowed by law" to such officers, "the following and no other compensation shall be taxed and allowed." One item under the head of "clerks' fees," in said act, is this: "For receiving, keeping and paying out money, in pursuance of the requirements of any statute or order of court, one per cent. on the amount so received, kept and paid." Under this provision the clerk claims the allowance in question.

It may be suggested, that, as the district attorney and clerk are officers of the United States, the two per cent. to the district attorney, and the one per cent. to the clerk, constitute a share in the forfeiture in this case, or, at least, a commission thereon, and that, therefore, the act of 1874 repeals the provision for the two per cent. to the district attorney, in the 11th section of the act of 1863, and the provision for the one per cent. to the clerk, in the act of 1853. Do the two per cent. and the one per cent., under the statutes which allow them, constitute shares in, or commissions on, moneys received for forfeitures, in the sense of the act of 1874? I think they do not. The act of 1863 gives the two per cent. to the district attorney in lieu of costs and fees in the suit, and, manifestly, as a compensation to him for conducting the suit on behalf of the United States. It expressly declares that he shall have no other costs or fees in the suit, and none under the act of 1853. It substantially repeals the act of 1853, as regards the suits mentioned in the act of 1863. If the act of 1874 repeals the 11th section of the act of 1863, then the district attorney is left without any compensation allowed him by law in the suits named in such 11th section; because, the 3d section of the act of February 25, 1871 (16 Stat. 431), provides, that, "whenever an act shall be repealed which repealed a former act, such former act shall not thereby be revived, unless it shall be expressly so provided." Thus, all provision for costs and fees to the district attorney in such suits would be repealed, while he would still receive the two per cent. as costs and fees in suits under the revenue laws in which the United States is a party, other than suits for fines, penalties or forfeitures under the customs revenue laws, and the fee bill in the act of 1853 would give him costs and fees in suits not within the purview of the acts of 1863 and 1874.

So, in regard to the clerk, the act of 1853 gives the one per cent. to him as fees for receiving, keeping and paying out the money. If he is deprived, by the act of 1874, of such one per cent. for receiving, keeping and paying out moneys which are the proceeds of fines, penalties or forfeitures under the customs revenue laws, there is no provision of law under which he can receive any fees or compensation for receiving, keeping or paying out such moneys, while he will still be entitled to receive the one per cent. for receiving, keeping and paying out all other moneys.

It is not to be inferred that any construction of the act of 1874 was intended by congress, which will work such a result, when there is a plain and reasonable construction of it which will avoid such a result. The act of 1874 has no relation to the subject of costs or fees, either generally or specifically. It relates to the customs revenue laws alone. The provisions of the 1st section of the act of 1867 answer fully the description, in the 2d section of the act of 1874, of provisions of law under which moieties of fines, penalties and forfeitures under the customs revenue laws, or shares therein, or commissions thereon, are paid to informers, and to officers of the customs, and to other officers of the United States. Under the provisions of the 1st section of the act of 1867, shares of fines, penalties and forfeitures under the customs revenue laws are paid to informers, and other shares thereof are paid to collectors, naval officers and surveyors, who are officers of the customs, and other shares thereof are paid to the officers of revenue cutters, who are "other officers of the United States." These shares are paid specifically as shares of the fines, penalties and forfeitures, and because the moneys shared in are the proceeds of the fines, penalties and forfeitures, and the persons receiving the shares have not, under any statute, any share in any other moneys. The district attorney and the clerk do not receive their percentages because the moneys are the proceeds of fines, penalties and forfeitures, and they receive the same percentage on other moneys. The statutes which give the percentages do not, in either case, call the percentage a "commission." Nor does the act of 1867 call the one-half or the one-fourth which it names a "commission." Yet, it is no less proper to call such one-half or one-fourth a "commission" than it is to call the percentages named, "commissions." The word "commission," in the act of 1874, is, therefore, satisfied by referring it to the act of 1867. Certainly, the words "moieties" and "share" are thus satisfied.

The district attorney is an officer of the United States, and, if the percentage given to him by the act of 1863 be regarded as a commission, it may be suggested that the mischief intended to be reached by the 2d section of the act of 1874 extends to him, because he is concerned directly in prosecuting for and recovering the fines, penalties and forfeitures, and can influence the prosecution by his conduct of it, and that the act of 1874 must have been intended to apply to him as well as to informers and officers of the customs. But this suggestion loses its force when it is considered that the same construction which would include the district attorney would include the clerk. Yet the clerk has no concern in the conduct of the suit, and his duty and services for which the percentage is given commence with the receipt of the money when the suit is practically at an end.

The act of 1874 declares, that, from and after the date of its passage, the proceeds of all fines, penalties and forfeitures under the customs revenue laws shall be paid into the treasury of the United States. This is no new provision in that act. The 1st section of the act of 1867, as before cited, provided, that, from the proceeds should be deducted the charges and expenses authorized by law to be deducted, and that the residue of the proceeds should be paid into the treasury of the United States, and then be distributed. There is nothing in the act of 1874 which indicates that the word "proceeds," in its 2d section, is intended to mean other than the net sum remaining to be disposed of by the officers of the treasury, after paying the proper costs and fees incidental to, and lawfully chargeable for, the collection of the moneys. That is what was paid into the treasury under the act of 1867, and that is what is to be paid into the treasury under the act of 1874.

In an abstract sense, detached from all context, the acts of 1853 and 1863 are provisions of law under which the district attorney and the clerk, in receiving percentages on moneys collected for fines, penalties and forfeitures under the customs revenue laws, receive shares in such moneys, because they receive portions of such moneys measured out as aliquot parts thereof, and because, but for the existence of such acts, they would not receive such percentages. But, as before shown, the act of 1874 is satisfied fully by holding it to repeal only such provisions of law as give shares in the proceeds of fines, penalties and forfeitures, eo nomine, to informers and officers of customs and other officers of the United States.

As respects the clerk, it is to be observed, that the item in this case, if allowed, does not enure to his personal benefit, but enures solely to the benefit of the United States, and goes to meet the expenses of his office, as regulated by the proper accounting officers. The percentages in question must, therefore, be taxed, allowed and paid to the district attorney and the clerk.

Case No. 15,932a.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED FIFTY BALES UNWASHED WOOL.

[N. Y. Times, Feb. 21, 1862.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 20, 1862.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—UNDERVALUATION—FORFEITURES.

[If goods imported are invoiced at their actual purchase price, they cannot be forfeited for un-dervaluation, although in fact the price stated was below the market value at the place of exportation.]

This was an action to forfeit the goods on the ground that they were fraudulently undervalued on entry at the custom-house here with intent to evade the payment of duties. The wool was imported from Cape Town, in March, 1860, by the firm of Siffken and Ironsides. It was invoiced by them at 10 per cent. sterling, per Dutch pound, making about 20 cents per pound English. On appraisal here the appraisers raised the price of one bale to 18 per cent. sterling and the rest to various amounts, down to 11 pence, raising the whole invoice from £2,374. 11s. 10d. to £3,052. 12s. 5d., and therefore this action was brought. Evidence was given on both sides as to the market value of wool at Cape Town, which was entirely contradictory, but the claimants proved that they bought the wool at the price at which they invoiced it. It appearing on the trial that one bale of the wool was washed, while it was all invoiced as unwashed, the district attorney sought to make this a distinct ground of forfeiture; but the court declined to allow it, as no such ground of forfeiture had been set up in the information.

Judge Roosevelt, for the United States.

Platt, Gerard & Buckey and Mr. Craig, for claimants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge, charged, among other things, that if the jury were satisfied that the claimants had purchased the wool and invoiced it at the purchase price, they must find for the claimants, though that price were below the market value.

The jury found a verdict for the claimants, and against the government.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURE FOR UNDERVALUATION—REPEAL OF STATUTES—CRIMINAL INTENT.

[1. Section 66 of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 677), and section 4 of the act of May 28, 1830 (4 Stat. 409), which provide for the forfeiture of goods invoiced below their actual "cost," are still in force (1861), and have not been modified by subsequent legislation so as to require the invoice to be according to the "value" in the place of purchase, instead of actual cost. The cases, however, in which the actual cost is to be stated, are perhaps limited to purchases in the open market in the ordinary course of trade, thus excluding cases of purchase under circumstances calculated to depress the price below the market value.]

[2. To entail a forfeiture for undervaluation, under these sections, there must be a concurrence of undervaluation, and intent to evade the payment of duties; and hence there can be no forfeiture of a bale of wool of superior grade and value, which was included, by mistake, with a shipment of bales of a lower grade, and invoiced at the same price with them.]

Judge Roosevelt, for the United States.

Gerard & Craig, for defendants.

Before SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a libel of information in rem, founded upon the seizure of 150 bales containing unwashed wool, imported into the United States from Cape of Good Hope about the 27th of March, 1860, in the ship Tartar. The seizure was upon land, within this district. The cause having been tried by the jury, and a verdict rendered for the claimants [Case No. 15,932a], the libellants move for a new trial on the grounds, 1. That the verdict is against the evidence. 2. For a misdirection of the judge to the jury. The act of congress, March 3, 1857 [11 Stat. 192], among other articles, exempts from duty unmanufactured wool of the value of 20 cents per pound, or less, at the place of exportation. This wool in question was invoiced and entered at the custom-house at a little less than 20 cents per pound, and, if that was its true value at the place of exportation, it would of course be exempt from duty. If its value at the place of exportation was over 20 cents, then it was subject to a duty of 24 per cent. ad valorem. The collector had the wool appraised, and, the value fixed by the appraisers being over 20 cents, the wool was seized on the ground that it had been invoiced and entered at less than its value at the Cape, with intent to evade the payment of duties thereon, and was therefore forfeited. The libel is founded upon the 66th section of the act of March 2, 1799, and the 4th section of the act of May 28, 1830. The section of the former relied on provides that "if any goods, wares or merchandise, of which entry shall have been made in the office of a collector, shall not be invoiced at the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with a design to evade the duties thereon, or any part thereof, all such goods, wares and merchandise, or the value thereof, shall be forfeited." The 4th section of the act of 1830, after providing for the examination of packages by the collector, enacts that if such goods be subject to ad valorem duty, the same shall be appraised; and if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or if such package or invoice be made up with intent, by false valuation, or extension, or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited.

So far as this motion for a new trial is founded upon the claim that the verdict was against the evidence, I am clear that it should be overruled. The evidence for the claimants was full and explicit, and, moreover, was that kind of evidence which the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Clifton v. U. S., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 242, held to be the best in such cases. It was that kind of evidence which the libellants in this case failed to produce, although an open commission was sent to the Cape of Good Hope to take testimony, where they had a consul residing, and where the value of this wool could have been shown to be above 20 cents per lb., if such had been the fact.

It appeared on the trial, that one of the hundred and fifty bales seized, contained washed wool, of a fine quality, and that this bale was greatly undervalued, and it is insisted by the government, that this bale, at least, should have been forfeited by the jury, and that to that extent their verdict was clearly against the evidence, if the statute forfeited the merchandise solely on the ground of undervaluation. But the statute is explicit on this point. There must concur with the act of undervaluation, the "intent to evade and defraud the revenue." The tendency of the evidence went to show that this bale of washed wool was included in the consignment and in the invoice and entry by inadvertence and mistake. The testimony of the consignees is that they never knew that there was any such article in the consignment, until informed by the custom-house officers long after the seizure; that they offered the whole one hundred and fifty bales (including the washed bale) at the same price, supposing it all to be unwashed wool. It was conceded on the trial, or at least assumed by the court, upon the evidence, that this bale of washed wool was greatly undervalued in the invoice and entry, and the jury were instructed that if any such undervaluation was with intent to evade the payment of duties, they should forfeit it. The jury must have found that there was no fraudulent or illegal intent, and I see no reason for disturbing the verdict on that point. This motion, therefore, for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence, must be denied.

But it is claimed as another ground for a new trial, that the construction given by the court in the charge to the jury, of the two acts of congress referred to, and especially that given to the 66th section of the act of 1799, was erroneous. This was the main point of controversy on the trial.

The first count of the libel or information is founded upon the 66th section of the act of 1799, and the jury were instructed that if they should find that the wool was purchased bona fide at the Cape, in open market, in the ordinary course of trade, and that the invoice and entry truly stated the actual cost of the same at the place of exportation, it could not be forfeited, and their verdict must be for the claimants. But if the wool was obtained by the consignors in any other mode than by such bona fide purchase, they must then inquire what was its true value at the Cape, and if the price at which it was invoiced and entered truly stated such value, then their verdict must be for the claimants. But, if the price on the invoice and entry was below the true value, and was inserted with intent to evade the duty, then their verdict must be for the government. It is strenuously insisted that this instruction to the jury, so far as it relates to the invoicing and entry of goods at their actual cost, under the act of 1799, is erroneous, although no case is cited in support of this claim. I am referred by the attorney for the government to the frequent use of the word "value" in the act of 1799, and in subsequent acts relating to the same subject, and it is urged that the only just and consistent construction is that which reads the words "actual cost" as meaning "actual value." A brief examination of the authorities will show that this claim is not well founded. This 66th section has been frequently subjected to judicial construction. In the case of U. S. v. Sixteen Packages [Case No. 16,303], decided in 1819, which was an information founded on this section, Mr. Justice Story held that forfeiture was not inflicted if the goods were invoiced and entered at the actual cost of a bona fide purchase, although that might be below the actual value. In Ninety-Five Bales of Paper v. U. S. [Id. 10,274], decided in 1829, it was held, on appeal, by Livingston, C. J., that the term "actual cost" applied also to goods manufactured abroad by the importer, and by him exported to the United States. In that case it was decided that all that was to be added to the cost of the raw material was the price or value of the labor employed in the manufacture, and the expense of transportation to the seaport whence it was shipped to the United States, and that the sum of these three items was the proper one to be entered in the invoice and entry as the actual cost. From the remark of the secretary of the treasury, in his report to the house of representatives, 17th January, 1817, this would seem to be the view entertained by the collectors, and in accordance with their practice under it. As the law then stood it worked injustice to the merchant who purchased his goods in the foreign market, paying the market price for them; for it is obvious that the cost price of purchased goods, upon which cost price duties were to be assessed, would ordinarily be enhanced by an amount equal to the profit of the manufacturer, and thus, in effect, the purchaser of foreign goods who imported them would be compelled to pay a higher rate of duty than the foreign manufacturer who sent to the United States the goods to be manufactured. The act of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 433], and especially the act of March 1, 1823 [Id. 729], remedied the unequal operation of the law in some particulars. But the test of forfeiture of goods purchased in the foreign market, as fixed by the 66th section of the act of 1799, still remained in full force. Indeed, the basis of valuation upon which duties were to be assessed remained unchanged notwithstanding the 5th section of the act of 1818 provided that the owner or importer should declare on oath that the invoice exhibited the true value of the goods in their then state of manufacture. In Tappan v. U. S. [Case No. 13,749], decided in 1822, Mr. Justice Story held, after a thorough discussion of the subject, that the cost price and not the real value was still the basis of valuation for the assessment of duties. A fortiori goods entered at their cost price in a bona fide purchase could not be forfeited because entered at cost. The same construction was given to the statutes as they then stood, by the supreme court of the United States, in U. S. v. Tappan, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 419. The latter case was argued by eminent counsel, and an elaborate opinion given by the court. In U. S. v. 12 Casks [Case No. 16,553], which was an information on the 4th section of the act of 1830, decided in 1834, Mr. Justice Hopkinson held that, "Two tests of value are given by the revenue laws: 1. In case of the purchase of goods in a foreign place, exported to the United States, the true value at which they must be invoiced and entered is the actual cost and price at which they were sold and purchased. 2. In case of goods sent to this country by the manufacturer, on his own account, the true value at which they must be invoiced and entered, is the market price or value at the place of exportation." These are the precise tests submitted to the jury in the case now under consideration, with the liberal qualification for the government added that the purchase must be in the open market, in the ordinary course of trade, thus excluding such purchases as might be made under circumstances calculated to depress the price paid below that of the general market. This rule is believed to be not only warranted by the statute, but eminently just and reasonable in itself. No better or safer standard of value can be found than that which is fixed by the scale of prices paid in the market, in the course of bona fide sales. In Alfonso v. U. S. [Case No. 188], decided in 1843, which was a libel of information on this 66th section of the act of 1799, while deploring the endless embarrassments arising out of any attempt to fully harmonize and reconcile all the various separate acts of congress relating to the collection of the revenue, Judge Story still adhered to the construction of the act of 1799, as laid down by him in the cases in Mason, already cited. The supreme court of the United States have repeatedly held that the 66th section was not repealed, but remained in full force. This was either assumed or directly decided in Woods v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342; Clinton v. U. S., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 242; Buckley v. U. S., Id. 251. The controversy has been renewed from time to time, and as late as 1854 reappeared in the supreme court. In the case of U. S. v. Sixteen Packages, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 85, and in the three cases that follow in the same volume, it was held that the 66th section of the act of 1799 was still in full force. I judge from an examination of that case that the information was founded solely upon that section. And it was argued that it was repugnant to and repealed by the 13th and 15th section of the act of 1823, and by the 17th section of the act of 1842, and the court below so held. But the supreme court held that the latter acts had no such effect, and that the 66th section was still in force, reversing the judgment below. But the government concedes that this 66th section is not repealed, in the strict sense of that term. One of the counts in this information is founded upon it. Still it is earnestly urged that it is modified; that the word "cost" therein has lost its original signification, and by subsequent legislation has been transformed in meaning into "value." In other words that congress has, in effect, struck out of the section the "cost," and inserted that of "value." We have already shown that this claim is not warranted by the decided cases, and we think it has no foundation in reason, or in any sound rule of construction. Such an interpretation would be calculated to mislead the unwary, and would convert a highly penal statute into a trap for the honest importer.

It is hardly necessary to add that the grounds upon which this case is disposed of do not reach the question as to the present basis of valuation, upon which duties are to be assessed. This is quite another and different subject. The penalties for mere undervaluation, whether in form of fines or additional duties, rest upon their own ground. In the case of this wool, if its value at the place of exportation was over 20 cents per pound, then it was liable to a duty of 24 per cent. But that is not the question now before the court, nor the one presented to the jury. The only question disposed of is, can this wool, having been purchased at the Cape of Good Hope, bona fide, in the open market, in the ordinary course of trade, and invoiced and entered at its cost truly stated, be forfeited? I think it cannot. The motion for a new trial must therefore be overruled, and judgment be entered for the claimants, discharging the goods from the custody of the marshal.

Case No. 15,933.

[2 Int. Rev. Rec. 22.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July, 1865.

NON-INTERCOURSE ACT—CONFISCATION OF GOODS.

[Merchandise ordered from China by merchants of Richmond, Va., and originally consigned to them, but for which, three days before the president's proclamation of August 16, 1861, declaring that part of Virginia in a state of insurrection, and prohibiting intercourse with the inhabitants thereof, such merchants executed an assignment to New York creditors to cover advances previously made by the latter, and which merchandise, on its arrival at the port of New York, passed into the care and custody of such assignees, and was discharged under a general order by which the rest of the cargo was discharged, and was then placed in the public stores, was not liable to confiscation, under such proclamation and the act on which it was based, as "proceeding" to a hostile state.]

The facts of the case were substantially as follows: The tea was shipped in May, 1861, by Russell & Co., of Shanghae, on board the ship Dora, bound to New York, and was consigned to Edmund Davenport & Co., of Richmond, Virginia. In October, 1861, the vessel arrived in this city, and the tea was seized here by the collector of the customs. Messrs. Paxson's Son & Co., the New York agents of Davenport & Co., put in their claim for the tea, under an assignment of Davenport & Co., made to them a day or two before the issuing of the proclamation under the non-intercourse act. The letter containing the assignment reached the postmaster-general, but not Paxson's, Son & Co. They did nothing in relation to the property, except put in this claim. The questions which arose were very interesting and complicated, but after thorough argument upon the verdict originally obtained for the government, the tea was awarded to the claimants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. In the spring of 1861, one hundred and fifty-six packages of tea were shipped from China to the port of New York, consigned to and owned by Edmund Davenport & Co. This firm was located in Richmond, Virginia, where its members resided, and were large dealers in groceries, including teas. Samuel C. Paxson's Son & Co. were merchants in and resided at the city of New York, and had for a long time been correspondents of Davenport & Co., had taken charge of the goods consigned to the latter at New York, and when proper forwarded the same to them at Richmond, Va. The latter also acted generally as the agents of the former in New York, purchased goods for them, and received consignments for them from different parts of the world. Prior to the 13th of August, 1861, Paxson's Son & Co. had purchased for Davenport & Co. a large quantity of flour, which had been shipped abroad, and had made advances on the same, for which the latter firm were indebted to them in the sum of $16,158.20. On the 13th of July, 1861, congress passed an act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes," the fifth section of which provides "that whenever the president, in pursuance of the provisions of the second section of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the calling forth of the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions, and to repeal the acts now in force for that purpose, approved February 28, 1795,' shall have called forth the militia to suppress combinations against the laws of the United States, and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and the insurgents shall have failed to disperse by the time directed by the president, and when said insurgents claim to act under the authority of any state or states, and such claim is not disdained or repudiated by the persons exercising the functions of government in such state or states, or in the parts thereof in which such combination exists, nor such insurrection be suppressed by said state or states, then in such case it shall be lawful for the president by proclamation to declare the inhabitants of such state or any section or part thereof where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the laws of the United States, and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same, and the citizens thereof, and the citizens of the rest of the United States, shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue, and all goods, chattels, wares and merchandise coming from said state or section, into the ports of the United States, and all proceeding to such state or section by land or water, shall, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to or from such state or section, be forfeited to the United States." There are provisions to this section, but they have no material bearing upon the case now under consideration. The contingency contemplated by this act having arisen, the president, in pursuance thereof, on the 16th day of August, 1861 [12 Stat. 1262], issued a proclamation declaring certain states and sections, including that part of Virginia in which Richmond is situated, in a state of insurrection, declaring unlawful and prohibiting commercial intercourse between the inhabitants thereof and other parts of the United States, and forfeiting to the United States all goods, chattels, wares and merchandise coming from or proceeding to said hostile states or section, from other parts of the United States, without the special license and permission of the president. On the 13th of August, 1861, three days before the issuing of this proclamation, Edmund Davenport & Co. at Richmond executed an assignment of the teas in question to Samuel Paxson's Son & Co., of New York, directing the latter to hold the same to cover advances made by them for the Richmond firm, and for which there was then due to Paxson's Son & Co. the sum of $16,158.20. This assignment was endorsed in a letter directed to S. C. Paxson's Son & Co., New York, with a United States three cent postage stamp on the envelope, and was no doubt immediately despatched on its way to New York. It, however, never reached the parties to whom it was directed, but in some way came into the hands of one of the assistant postmasters-general of the United States, and was by him transmitted to the custom house authorities at New York. Subsequently, on the 12th of October, 1861, the teas arrived at New York by the British ship Dora. The discharging of the ship was proceeded with under a general order, under the supervision of an inspector of customs. These teas, were, however, kept on board by the direction of Deputy Surveyor Brown, until the balance of the cargo was nearly or quite all discharged, when they were finally taken to the public stores Nos. 56 and 58 Greenwich street, where they remained until the 12th of November, 1861; when they were seized and forfeited to the United States. A libel of information was filed in the district court for the Southern district of New York, alleging a forfeiture on the ground that the goods were, at the time of the seizure, proceeding to the state of Virginia, in violation of the act of congress and the proclamation of the president heretofore cited; and also on the further ground that they were intended to be used for insurrectionary purposes contrary to the 1st section of the act of August 6, 1861 [12 Stat. 319], entitled "An act to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes." Samuel C. Paxson's Son & Co. have filed a claim for the teas, alleging that at the time of the seizure they were the lawful owners thereof and entitled to possession of the same; and also a plea denying that they were forfeited to the United States. The case was tried by the jury, and as there was no dispute about the material facts, by request and assent of counsel on both sides, the court directed a verdict for the United States, subject to the opinion of the court on the questions of law arising on the conceded or proved and undisputed facts. The question now is, shall the verdict stand, or be set aside, and the libel dismissed?

These goods must have been ordered by Davenport & Co. long before the commencement of hostilities. They were one of the ordinary classes of merchandise in which the firm had long dealt, and there is no fact in the case from which an inference can be drawn that they were intended for insurrectionary purposes. No plausible ground has been shown for confiscating these goods under the act of the 6th of August, 1861. The only other question is, were they "proceeding" to Richmond in any sense of the word, at the time of their seizure? They had come by sea from China, in due course of trade, to New York; and though originally owned by and consigned to Edmund Davenport & Co., of Richmond, when they arrived at New York they passed, under an established arrangement entered into long before, into the care and custody of Paxson's Son & Co., and were discharged under the general order, by which the rest of the cargo was discharged. They were discharged and placed in the public stores, where they remained some two or three weeks, when they were seized as forfeited to the United States on the ground that they were proceeding to Virginia, in violation of the act of July 13, 1861, and the proclamation of the president in pursuance thereof. What is the undisputed evidence on this point? The goods were not in fact proceeding to Virginia, but were lying in the public stores in New York. Now, in view of the undisputed evidence can they be said to have been in construction of law, in transit to Richmond? As they were not in fact being transported, whether they were constructively so or not, must depend on the intention of the parties who had the disposition of them. The uncontradicted proof is that the New York firm whose duty it was to take the care and custody of these goods here, did not intend that they should proceed to Richmond, but on the other hand they intended to retain the goods, subject to the order of Davenport & Co. The latter were heavily indebted to them, and their interest was strongly in favor of retaining the goods in New York. The ports of Virginia were already, and for a long time had been blockaded by the United States, and there is nothing in the case which throws the remotest suspicion upon the loyalty of Paxson's Son & Co., or can authorize the court to infer that they were intending to ship these goods to Virginia, in violation of the blockade, the statute, and the president's proclamation. Their whole interest was to keep the goods here, and I think the undisputed evidence conclusively shows that such was their intention. These teas, then, resting in the storehouses at New York, subject to the control of no one there except the authorities of the custom house and Paxson's Son & Co., were not by any intendment of either, either in fact or constructively, proceeding to Richmond. On the other hand, what was their status, so far as Edmund Davenport & Co. were concerned? On the 13th of August, three days prior to the proclamation of the president, Davenport & Co. executed and sent forward the assignment and order already referred to directing Paxson's Son & Co. to hold these teas in New York, as an offset to the debt due the latter from the former firm for advances. True, this paper did not reach Paxson's Son & Co., but did reach the custom house authorities, and they had it in their hands when they seized the teas. This document, whether valid as an assignment or not, clearly rebuts the presumption of any intention on the part of Davenport & Co., to have these teas proceed to Richmond. On the contrary, it is the most cogent evidence of their intention that they should not proceed to Richmond, but should be held in New York and applied in the discharge of the debt due their New York correspondents. These goods, then, were neither in fact nor constructively, through the intendment of any party, "proceeding" to Richmond or any other hostile section, in violation of any law of congress or proclamation of the president. They were, both by Davenport & Co., and Paxson's Son & Co., intended to remain in New York. The order from the former to that effect was made before the proclamation interdicting commercial intercourse between the two sections, and was lawfully made, and the transmission of it by mail or otherwise contravened no statute or proclamation. Nay, more, it was an act which Davenport & Co. were in duty bound to perform, both to prevent an infraction of law and to protect their New York creditors, and was, therefore, in compliance with, and furtherance of, the very object of the statute and proclamation upon which this prosecution is founded. It follows from these views that the verdict must be set aside, and that the libel should be dismissed.

Case No. 15,934.

[6 Int. Rev. Rec. 203.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FORFEITURE—ILLEGAL DISTILLATION.

In the case of the United States against 153 barrels distilled spirits and the distillery, and all property therein, at 136 Cedar street, BLATCHFORD, District Judge, directed the jury to the 26th, 48th, and 45th sections of the internal revenue law [13 Stat. 223], which applied to this case. The jury, after a short absence came into court and asked to have the 48th section explained. The judge read the section, by which it is provided that by a violation of the section, not only the whiskey, but the entire stock of property of whatsoever kind, became forfeited to the government. The jury again retired, and after an absence of five minutes returned with a verdict for the government, under the three sections referred to.

D. C. Birdsall, for claimants, moved for a stay of judgment for twenty days.

S. G. Courtney, Dist. Atty., opposed the motion, and said he would oppose motions for postponement of judgment in all cases where juries find for the forfeiture of the spirits, and further, that he would, on Saturday next, move the court that the stay of twenty days granted in two cases last week should be vacated.

Case No. 15,935.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIX THOUSAND SIX HUNDRED AND FIFTY CLAPBOARDS.

[4 Cliff. 301;[1] 20 Int. Rev. Rec. 98.]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1874.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — FALSE VALUATION — INTENT — COLLATERAL FACTS.

1. In cases of false valuation of goods in the invoice, legal evidence of other fraudulent acts of a similar nature committed at about the same time, and when the same motive may be supposed to exist, is admissible to show the intent of the actor with respect to the matter charged against him in the information.

2. Positive proof of fraudulent acts is not generally to be expected, and the law allows a resort to circumstantial proof to ascertain the truth.

3. When the intent or guilty knowledge of a party is material to the issue, collateral facts tending to establish such intent or knowledge, are properly admissible in evidence.

4. In this case it was proper to show that the value given in the invoice was less than the actual market value of the merchandise, and that the party making the entry knew that fact. Therefore proof of correct entries made about the same time, of the same kind of goods, by the claimant, was admissible to show that he knew the real value of the merchandise.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island.]

Libel of information in rem, by the United States attorney, against 146,650 clapboards [Israel Meritt, claimant], seized by James Shaw, Jr., collector of the port of Providence, in this district. Trial in the district court by jury. Verdict for claimant. [Case unreported.] Error to the district court. Due seizure on land was made of the merchandise described in the record, and the district attorney on the 10th of June, 1871, filed in the district court for this district an information against the same, claiming that it was forfeited to the United States, for the reason therein set forth, as follows: (1) That the merchandise was falsely valued, in the invoice presented to the collector, at a less price than the actual market value thereof, at the time and place when and where the same was procured or manufactured; that the said invoice was then and there made up, with intent, by the said false valuation, to evade and defraud the revenue. (2) That the said owner, consignee, or agent, then and there knowingly entered, or attempted to enter, the merchandise by means of a false invoice, or by a false certificate of a consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent, or by means of an invoice which then and there did not contain a true statement of all the particulars required by the act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue. 12 Stat. 738. Service was made, and the claimant appeared and filed an answer, denying all the material allegations of the information. Issue was duly joined upon the allegations set forth in the information, as denied in the answer, and the parties went to trial. Evidence was introduced by both parties, and the jury returned their verdict for the claimant. Exceptions were taken by the United States to the ruling of the court, in the progress of the trial, and to the instructions given by the court to the jury. Two errors were assigned by the United States: (1) That the court erred in refusing to admit the invoice dated June 6, 1870, offered by the district attorney, as tending to show that the claimant shipped from the same port, about that time, a cargo of clapboards of a quality inferior to that of the cargo seized, and entered the same at the port of Providence, at a much higher valuation than the invoice value of the cargo seized, it appearing that the market value of such lumber at the two periods was substantially the same. (2) That the district judge erred in the instruction given to the jury that they could not return a verdict for the United States, even if they found that the invoice value of the merchandise, as given in the invoice presented to the collector, did not conform to the value of such goods in the actual markets of the country of production, unless that they should also find that such discrepancy was not the result of honest error on the part of the owner, consignee, or agent, in respect to matters of law or fact; but that it was made knowingly, and with design to evade the payment of the duty which he knew was legally chargeable on the said merchndise.

John A. Gardner, U. S. Atty.

Samuel Currey and Wingate Hayes, for claimant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Goods imported into the United States, subject to ad valorem duty, could not be admitted to entry under the act of March 1, 1823, unless a true invoice of the same was presented to the collector at the time of the entry, except as provided in section 2 of that act; and section 4 of the act of May 28, 1830, provided that if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or if such package or invoice be made up with intent, by a false valuation or extension, or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited. 3 Stat. 729; 4 Stat. 410. Regulations of a similar nature, but much more minute in their character are contained in section 1 of the act of March 3, 1863, and the same section provides that if the owner, consignee, or agent shall knowingly make or attempt to make an entry thereof by means of any false invoice or false certificate of a consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent, or of any invoice which shall not contain a true statement of all the particulars required, or by means of any other false or fraudulent document or paper, or of any other false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, said goods or their value shall be forfeited and disposed of as other forfeitures, for violation of the revenue laws. 12 Stat. 738.

Cases of fraud like the one charged in the information are among the well-recognized exceptions to the general rule, that other wrongful acts of the respondent are not admissible in evidence on the trial of the particular charge immediately involved in the issue. Legal evidence of other fraudulent acts of a similar nature, if committed at or about the same time, and when the same motive may reasonably be supposed to exist, are admissible in cases of this description, with a view to establish the intent of the actor in respect to the matter charged against him in the information. Decided cases may be found which go further, and hold that such evidence is admissible as affording a ground of presumption to prove the agency of the respondent in the matter charged; but whether so or not, it is clearly competent to show the intent or guilty knowledge of the actor in respect to the matters immediately involved in the issue on trial. Cary v. Hotailing, 1 Hill, 311; Irving v. Motley, 7 Bing. 543; Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. 307; Castle v. Bullard, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 186. Intent and knowledge were distinctly put in issue by the pleadings, and in such cases it is allowable, as well in civil as in criminal cases, to introduce evidence of other acts and doings of the respondent, of a kindred character, in order to illustrate or establish his intent, knowledge, or motive in the particular act directly in judgment. All experience shows that such must be the rule, as in no other way would it be practicable, in many cases, to establish the real intent or motive of the actor, especially in transactions where the single act, if taken by itself, would not be decisive either way.

Guilty knowledge is in many cases an essential ingredient of crime, and in the trial of such cases, evidence of the commission of other kindred offences about the same time is always admitted as tending to prove that ingredient of the charge. Many cases of fraud also require the application of the same principle, as the charge of fraud usually involves the motive and intent of the party charged, which can only be deduced from a great variety of circumstances, no one of which is absolutely decisive. Positive proof of fraudulent acts is not generally to be expected, and for that reason, among others, the law allows a resort to circumstances as the means of ascertaining the truth. Whenever the necessity arises for a resort to circumstantial evidence, either from the nature of the inquiry or the failure of direct proof, objections to testimony on the ground of irrelevancy are not favored, as the force and effect of circumstantial facts, usually and almost necessarily, depend upon their connection with each other. Circumstances altogether inconclusive if separately considered, may, by their number and joint operation, especially if corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient to constitute conclusive proof. Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 360. Hence, it is held, that whenever the intent or guilty knowledge of a party is material to the issue, collateral facts, tending to establish such intent or knowledge are properly admissible in evidence. U. S. v. Four Cases Printed Merinoes [Case No. 15,146]; Bottomley v. U. S. [Id. 1,688]; Alfonso v. U. S. [Id. 188]; Taylor v. U. S., 3 How. [44 U. S.] 207; Buckley v. U. S., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 259. Concede all that, and still it is contended that the evidence offered was properly rejected because the entry of the merchandise described in the invoice offered in evidence was not made about the time of the supposed fraudulent act charged in the information, and the argument is, that the evidence of other fraudulent acts is never properly admissible, even to show a criminal or fraudulent intent or guilty knowledge of the respondent, unless the acts were of a kindred nature, and were done and committed about the time of the alleged criminal or fraudulent act, for which the accused or respondent is on trial. But the evidence rejected in this case was not offered to prove a prior criminal or fraudulent act, nor does the offer of proof, as disclosed in the bill of exceptions, assume that the prior entry was made to defraud the revenue, or to evade the payment of the lawful duties. On the contrary, the offer of proof assumes that the prior entry was made in good faith, and that the merchandise described in the invoice was correctly valued. Plainly the evidence was not offered for any such purpose, but to show that the importer well knew that the merchandise imported was of much greater value in the markets of the country where it was produced than the price given in the invoice presented to the collector. Beyond all doubt, it was proper to show that the value as given in the invoice was less than the actual market value of the merchandise, and that the party making the entry knew that fact.

Direct proof of those allegations could hardly be expected, and it follows that the prosecutor might properly resort to circumstances to support the charge. Great latitude is justly allowed by the law to the reception of circumstantial evidence, whenever a resort to it becomes necessary, either from the nature of the inquiry or the failure of direct proof. Collateral facts may be proved in such a case, though, when considered separately, they are quite insufficient to establish the given hypothesis, if it appears that by their joint operation they tend to support the theory they are offered to sustain. Tested by that rule, it is clear that the evidence offered and rejected had some tendency to prove that the invoice value of the merchandise was less than the market value of the same, and that the importer knew that fact at the time he made the entry, and it is equally clear that if the importer knew what the market value of the merchandise was, it is wholly immaterial when or by what means be acquired such knowledge. It was assumed by the United States, that the price of such merchandise was substantially the same at the two periods, and if such was the fact, it is difficult to see why the evidence was not admissible. They offered to prove that fact, and the ruling having been made with the understanding that, if the evidence was admitted, it would be followed up by proof to that effect, I am of the opinion that the ruling was erroneous and that the objection to its admissibility should have been overruled. 2 Grah. & W. New Trials, 665; Hill. New Trials, 310. Suppose it were otherwise, still I am of the opinion that the judgment must be reversed, for the reason given in the second error assigned. Much discussion of that proposition is unnecessary, as the instruction given to the jury is directly opposed to the rule adopted by the unanimous decision of the supreme court. Barlow v. U. S., 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 410; Cambioso v. Maffet [Case No. 2,330]; U. S. v. Eighty-Five Hogsheads of Sugar [Id. 15,037]. Mistake of law in such a case is no defence to an information for a forfeiture, nor is there any thing in the act of congress under which the information in this case was drawn, to take the case out of the general rule established by the authorities cited by the United States.

Judgment reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-ONE CASKS OF GLASSWARE.

District Court, S. D. New York. 1836.

FOREIGN STATUTES—HOW PROVEN.

[The statutes of England may be proven by the printed publications thereof obtained from the queen's printer.]

On the trial of this cause now before the court and a jury, the district attorney offered to read in evidence printed acts of parliament 5 & 6 Wm. IV. and 1 & 2 Vict., in relation to exportation and the drawback duty on glass, and called a witness who testified that he was in London in 1838, and went to the parliament printing house, to procure the said acts of parliament, but was referred to the queen's private printer as the only one who could furnish them; that he accordingly went to the store of the queen's printer, and there purchased the acts in question.

Mr. Patterson, for claimants [Booth & Co.], objected to the admissibility of the statutes as evidence, contending that the district attorney must prove them by producing exemplifications under the general seal of England, authenticated by the secretary of state for foreign affairs, or by a sworn copy compared with the rolls of parliament. Mr. Patterson cited many cases to show that such was the rule of evidence.

BETTS, District Judge, remarked that the ancient strictness of the rule respecting proof of foreign laws had been much relaxed in England, and more so in the United States, of late years. That the cases cited by counsel showed what the law had been on the subject, and also indicated some of the modifications of its former rigor, which had become incorporated in the modern practice; and it might have been added that in this state, until comparatively a recent period, not only was such strictness of proof exacted in respect to the laws of foreign nations, and of our sister states, as foreign laws, but even the statutes of our own legislature could not be read, of right from the statute book. At this day, it is believed that in most of the states, and in the courts of the United States, the public laws are read from the printed statute books of the respective states and such publications are accepted as at least prima facie evidence of the law.

I am not aware of any higher authority than a like usage and general acquiescence in it, for reading the acts of congress in this court from the statute book, nor why, if the rule adverted to is to be administered as it was formerly laid down, the district attorney should not be driven to produce exemplifications of every statute of congress offered in evidence here. In whatever terms the rule may be sometimes expressed, it seems to me, such cannot be its spirit; and if executed according to the letter, clearly the highest or best evidence would not be an exemplification under a foreign seal, but the oath of the king himself, perhaps, who sanctioned the law, or of the public functionaries who were present when it was enacted or passed through all the forms rendering it completely a law.

The cases speak of foreign law as facts to be proved by the best evidence; but certainly the spirit of cases, particularly in the courts of the United States, regard the promulgation or publication of the foreign laws as the fact to be proved, and not the formula of its enactment or registration. It is no less the law if the law-giver declares it by proclamation or insertion in a newspaper, than if inscribed in the roll of the tower, and accordingly it would seem that the only essential matter to be proved is, whether it has been published and promulgated as the law of the country. The fact of publication may be proved by evidence competent to establish any other fact en pais. The act being that of a sovereign, does not necessarily demand a different order of proof, than if it was the declaration or notification of a private person.

In this point of view, I think the evidence is admissible. But, in my opinion, foreign statutes in relation to the navigation, exports, and imports of a country may be read in evidence as history of its policy, and upon the same principle that its annals are read to prove changes of succession, changes of dynasty, or other political events, and facts of a public and notorious character. If the offer of the proof rested upon the statutes only, I should receive it as sufficient prima facie evidence, because, if the rule in this behalf is yet unsettled and dubious, it is time that the highest tribunal of this land should declare and determine it. And I may add, I should regret to see the United States behind England in recognising and administering this rule of evidence, upon liberal and philosophical principles, and that, whilst the public laws of this country are read there, in the first instance, without question, we should exclude from our courts like proof of the laws of England.

The judge accordingly decided that the statutes should be read. Counsel for claimants excepted to the decision.

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1879.

NEW TRIAL — VERDICT AGAINST EVIDENCE — FORFEITURE FOR VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS.

A verdict in favor of the defendant, in a suit for forfeiture of goods for violation of the internal revenue laws, will not be set aside as against the evidence, though as to a small part of the goods proceeded against, the court entertains no doubt that upon the evidence the verdict is wrong.

Edward B. Hill, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
Thos. Harland, for claimant.

CHOATE, District Judge. In this case, which is a suit by information against 117 boxes of tobacco, the forfeiture of the goods is sought for on the grounds that the stamps on the boxes were old stamps used a second time, and also that the stamps were not cancelled by the government die. The tobacco was manufactured in North Carolina, and consigned for sale to a commission merchant in New York, where it was seized. The jury have found a verdict for the defendant. The trial occupied three days. No exceptions were taken on the trial and the jury were out several hours. The plaintiff now moves for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of evidence. The evidence relied on by the government was the appearance of the stamps themselves, and the opinions of experts, upon which it is claimed to have been demonstrated that the stamps were old stamps and also that they were not and could not have been cancelled by the government die. On the part of the defence the claimant who manufactured and shipped the tobacco was called as a witness, and he swore positively that all the stamps used by him were new stamps, and that they were all cancelled by the government die. The deposition of his foreman was read to the same effect.

As to the evidence on the question whether the stamps were old stamps or not, it is clear that it cannot be claimed that the proofs of the government were so overwhelming that they proved the point beyond all doubt. The testimony of the claimant, as to the mode in which they were attached, and as to their being occasionally torn and re-pasted and re-varnished, and the evidence as to the usage the boxes had received, was such as to make it clearly improper, against the positive testimony of the claimant and his foreman, to disturb the verdict, however confident was the opinion of the experts on this question, and however suspicious the appearance of the stamps themselves.

On the other question, there is more ground for the motion. The testimony of the manufacturer of the government dies, and other testimony, as well as the inspection of the cancellations themselves, on two or three of the boxes, leave no doubt in my mind that the cancellations on these boxes were made by some other instrument than a government die. On the claimant's part, it is proved that during a part of the time, during which the tobacco was shipped, and, so far as anything positively appears to the contrary, during the time these two or three boxes were shipped, he had a government die which was injured, and which he afterwards surrendered to the internal revenue officers. This die, though in the possession of the government officers in North Carolina, was not produced on the trial, although the United States district attorney for North Carolina attended the taking of depositions in that state, and the fact of the imperfection in that die was then testified to by the witnesses examined. One of the points made by the claimant's counsel upon the trial, was that the injury to that die would account for the alleged irregularities in the appearance of these cancellations. I am not able to say that from any evidence in the case these irregularities could have been so caused. Indeed, they are of a character quite distinct from any effect which the injury shown to have been sustained by that die would have produced. Upon the whole testimony, I think the verdict on this point, as to the two or three boxes referred to, is so decidedly against the weight of the evidence that, were this an ordinary case between parties to a controversy for the recovery of money or property, it would be the duty of the court to grant a new trial, that the question might be submitted to another jury.

But the case is of such a character that it would not be proper, nor in accordance with the decisions of the courts, to disturb the verdict. The proof above referred to extended to but two or three out of one hundred and seventeen boxes. It is true that the testimony of the government's witnesses was to the general effect that all the stamps showed more or less of the same suspicious appearances that were observed and pointed out on the seven or eight boxes exhibited to the jury, in respect to the re-use or unlawful cancellation of the stamps; and it is true that as the tobacco was all held in the same store for sale, on account of the claimant, it was sufficient to prove the charge against one box to ensure the forfeiture of the whole. But nevertheless, the forfeiture of goods not proved to have been unlawfully stamped or unlawfully cancelled, because found with other guilty goods, is a proceeding highly penal in its character, though doubtless justified by good reasons of public policy. Even if the proof were equally strong against all the boxes, the decided weight of authority is that the court should not grant a new trial in an action for a forfeiture, where the verdict is for the defendant. Within the meaning of the rules relating to new trials, I think an action of this character is clearly a penal action. And no precedent is cited which justifies the granting of this motion. On the contrary, it has been often held that the court will not disturb a verdict for the defendant, where there has been no misdirection, in an action where the effect of the verdict is to shield the defendant from a penalty. Ranston v. Etteridge, 2 Chit. 273; Rex v. Mann, 4 Maule & S. 337; Brook v. Middleton, 10 East, 268; Brooke v. Middleton, 1 Camp. 450; Comfort v. Thompson, 10 Johns. 101; Baker v. Richardson, 1 Cow. 77; Hall v. Green, 24 Eng. Law & Eq. 453. And especially where, as in this case, the government might have made a stronger case by the production of evidence in its possession, and the value of the goods actually inculpated is very trifling, and the cost and expense incurred by the claimant in defence of the action has been large, and he can in no event recover his costs, the impropriety of disturbing the verdict is obvious.

A motion is also made on the part of the plaintiff, for a certificate of probable cause. This is opposed on the part of the claimant. But I think it clear that the appearance of the stamps on these boxes was such as to justify the seizure, as one based on probable cause for forfeiture.

Motion for new trial denied. Motion for certificate of probable cause granted.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-THREE, ETC., BARRELS OF WHISKEY.

[5 West. Jur. 150.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. April, 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE — INFORMERS — JUDGMENT — POWER OF COURT TO MODIFY AFTER TERM.

1. Where upon an information of forfeiture for violation of the internal revenue laws, a judgment has been entered, distributing the proceeds in the registry in accordance with the rights of different parties, as found by the court, the judgment cannot be modified or altered by the court after the close of the term. Any errors in the proceedings, not merely formal, must be corrected by proceedings in the appellate tribunal; and even at the suggestion of the treasury department, the court cannot alter or change its records.

2. Informations were filed against several lots of whiskey for violations of the internal revenue acts. By order of court the several cases were consolidated, and upon the trial a verdict was found in favor of the government, Feb. 28, 1870, for the value of the whiskey for which the claimant had given bond. Pending a motion for a new trial, the claimant by an arrangement with the department, paid into the registry the sum of $12,221.07, instead of the value assessed at $27,781.31, and on May 27, 1870, the motion for new trial was overruled and judgment entered. In one of the cases the former collector was entered as informer, and in another, one Hunter was found to be the first informer, and the order was made for the payment of the money in the registry of the court to the collector, to be by him distributed in conformity with the judgment of the court on Sept. 28, 1870.

[This was a motion made by the collector for leave to return into the registry money paid to him under a final judgment rendered in a proceeding for the forfeiture of 163, 143, and 163 barrels of whiskey, Matteson and others claimants.]

TREAT, District Judge. A motion was made by the collector of internal revenue for the First Missouri district, pursuant to instructions received by him from the acting commissioner, for leave to return into the registry money paid to him under a final judgment rendered by this court at a prior term in case 1476. Said motion was filed January 9, 1871, and a rule entered the same day on the informer to show cause on the 19th of said month why said leave should not be granted. On said 19th, the informer filed these objections; and the legal propositions arising were presented by his counsel and the district attorney respectively.

By the judgment of this court at a former term it was ascertained that Barton Able was the "first to inform in the cause whereby judgment of forfeiture," was rendered in case No. 1476, and John A. Hunter in case No. 1477. Pursuant to the final judgment then rendered the money to which the United States and the informer in No. 1476 were respectively entitled, was paid to the collector to be by him distributed accordingly. Thus the judgment of a former term was not only rendered, but duly executed so far as the records of this court are concerned. The acting commissioner at the time being of opinion that the case of Dorsheimer v. U. S., 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 166, ought to have controlled the former action of this court, and consequently that its judgment was erroneous, instructed the collector to dispose of the money paid to him out of the registry under that judgment, differently from the terms of the judgment. It is obvious that the collector was thus placed in an embarrassing position. The only money that passed into his hand was received by him pursuant to that judgment and subject to its requirements. On further representation of the matter to the commissioner he was required to make the pending application. The informer was cited in, not because the court supposed it had any further control over the judgment, but that if he chose to agree to a surrender of his legal rights he might do so of record. As he insists upon his rights as fixed by that judgment which this court has now no power to alter, modify or annul, no action can be had to disturb or affect it. If error was committed the law indicates the proper mode and time for correcting the same, and does not permit this court to vacate or change its judgments after the expiration of the term at which they were rendered. That doctrine is too well settled to admit of question; and this court can detect no possible object in view by this motion, except such as would practically violate said well established and essential rule of law. If said money were returned to the registry, it would still be subject to said judgment; otherwise the repeated decisions of the United States supreme court in like cases are of no obligatory force. It certainly is desirable that uniformity of action should exist between the courts and revenue officers; but the courts must construe the statutes for themselves and enforce their provisions in all cases before them, subject to review only by the proper appellate tribunals, even if perchance their judgments do not accord with the views or rulings of said executive officer. In this case there was no exception or writ of errors, and therefore the power of this court over such has ceased, only so far as may be necessary to enforce the judgment. The case referred to in the 7th Wallace is for many reasons deemed inapplicable to the case here. The power to remit so far as informers are concerned is somewhat different before and after judgment. When a suit in rem results in a judgment of forfeiture that judgment is ordinarily enforced by a sale of the res the proceeds of which pass into the registry to be distributed according to the terms of the final order. If a remission as to a part of said proceeds is had the residue remains to be paid over. If the proceeds were $28,000 for instance, and $18,000 were remitted, there would remain $10,000 for division between the informer and the United States. The reasons inducing the remission of a part are not considered by the court, for the power to remit is exclusive of its authority. The fact that the res was released on stipulation at the appraised value does not change the legal principle. It was the res that was condemned, and that, on remission in whole or part, was to be restored or after the sale the whole or part of the proceeds thereof. Under the stipulation the principal and sureties were to pay into the registry the value of the property. Of that sum a part was remitted, leaving the residue to be distributed between the United States and the informer. The court in its judgment of the forfeiture of the res had nothing to do with the collection of taxes in New Orleans or outside propositions. If before the trial the suits had been dismissed after compromise, on payment to the collector of specified sums for taxes, penalties, &c., then the secretary of the treasury would, under section 179 of the internal revenue law (July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98]), and subsequent acts, determine what part, if any, of the compromise fund should be paid to one claiming to be informer; but where a trial is had, and the informer is ascertained by the court, and the money passes through the registry, it is apprehended that a different rule obtains. However that may be, this court cannot change its judgment of a prior term, whereby an essentially new judgment will be substituted, prejudicial to the rights of informers, or others in interest.

This motion has been entertained and is now formally passed upon, in order that the action of the court may, if practicable, be reviewed by the appropriate judicial tribunal. Whether the requirements of the law concerning informers, are politic or impolitic, congress must decide. The courts can only enforce the law as it exists. Under the practice here established, informers are compelled to give security for costs, and thus make themselves directly answerable, therefore, if the suits fail. Consequently they are expected to render efficient aid, not only in the detection of officers, but in their successful prosecution. In the case under consideration, there was protracted litigation, advances of money by the informers, testimony taken in New Orleans and elsewhere at great expense, and under difficult circumstances, and a final judgment, together with the decision of the court determining that Barton Able was the legal informer. If there had been no partial remissions, the amount paid would have been three times the amount actually received. The legal power to remit, caused a corresponding reduction of the amount to be received by the United States and the informer, respectively. The object in view by this motion, as disclosed by the letters of the late acting-commissioner, is to so far alter, or cause to be altered, the former judgment of this court, as to deprive the informer of a large portion of what, under an ordinary remission, he would still be legally entitled to. The mode proposed to effect that purpose is to have the money which has been actually paid over under the judgment, returned to the registry, so that the court may make a different distribution thereof, from what its former judgment required—an indirect mode, it seems, of having this court do what the law forbids, viz.: to alter a judgment of a former term to the prejudice of rights thus judicially determined. It is not necessary to review the terms of the original letter announcing the conditions of the compromise, further than to state that if its purpose was to have a definite sum paid to the proper officer, as taxes due, and another sum as a specific penalty contra-distinguished from a forfeiture, then it left no sum whatever for the court to distribute through the registry for the benefit either of the United States or the informer in the case tried; for the suit and judgment here was not for unpaid taxes, nor for the enforcement of any one of the many penalties in personam. Other suits might have been instituted and possibly have been successful to that end; but voluntary payments to revenue officers by way of compromise for alleged liabilities in personam without the institution of suits for the recovery thereof, are entirely outside the cognizance of courts, as they have and can have no jurisdiction over other than judicial proceedings. Hence if the claimants were supposed to rest under liabilities other than what this court had judically determined, payments made to compromise them were purely executive questions, to be settled without reference to the judgment of forfeiture in this case, were questions with which this court had nothing to do, and for the details of which its registry could not be used. Money once in the registry can be removed therefrom only on the order of the court; and the court can make no orders except in cases pending before it. What revenue officers should collect taxes on spirits distilled in New Orleans, and not removed in bond, and what officers should receive payment for specific penalties, made without suit for violation of the internal revenue law, where said spirits were distilled, it is not necessary to inquire. The question is partly one of law and partly one of treasury modes of accounting among its officers. It suffices that in this case no such question is here for solution. But, it is said the intention was that after the compromise payments had been made (to whom to be made no intimation was given directly by the commissioner) the district attorney was to discontinue further proceedings. That suggestion omits due regard to the state of the record here. There had been no new trial granted, and no stay of proceedings or of execution. This court could at any moment, in conformity with law, at the suggestion of the informers or any other party in interest, have enforced judgment upon the verdict rendered. And further, after judgment, the usual modes of discontinuing proceedings would have been satisfaction thereof duly entered, or a perpetual stay of proceedings thereunder. If the perpetual stay had been sought, with or without terms, the action of the court would have been required, and its records of the case disclosed the final determination thereof. If satisfaction were entered, the amount of the original judgment would remain to be accounted for.

Without pursuing the inquiry further, it must suffice that this court did not consider originally, that the Case of Dorsheimer in the 7th Wallace was at all applicable to the facts and circumstances before it, especially as one of the consolidated cases had been to the United States circuit court whose mandate this court was bound to obey; and further that whether it committed error or not, its power over the judgment then rendered is at an end.

It may not be improper to add that if any informality exists or error was committed, it probably was in not insisting rigidly upon compliance with the literal terms of the statutes. On examination of the papers on file in this case, and those with which it was consolidated, it appears that the terms of the compromise were received by this court as if legally determined upon the strength of a letter signed only by the late acting commissioner, in which he recites that the secretary of the treasury and the attorney-general had agreed thereto. There is nowhere on file in these cases duly authenticated evidence of a compromise with the permission in writing of the secretary of the treasury and of the attorney-general, nor of the opinion of the solicitor, first filed in the office of the commissioner. And as a suit in court had been commenced, and even a verdict had, it may be that duly authenticated evidence ought to have been submitted to the showing that the terms of the several acts of congress on which the power to compromise depends had been complied with. Section 7 of act of March 31, 1868 [15 Stat. 60], and section 102 of act of July 20, 1868 [Id. 166]. If the judgment could be now opened, the informer would have a just right to insist upon the enforcement of the original judgment for the full amount thereof, unless duly authenticated evidence was given that the power to compromise had been exercised according to the conditions prescribed, and on compliance with which the power alone lawfully can be used.

All of the many suggestions which would arise if this court could now review its original action in the premises need not be considered. It has entertained this motion that, if practicable, the district attorney may procure from the circuit court a correction of errors here, if any exist. Hence the motion will be overruled and the district attorney can except thereto: taking such action in the premises as he may deem the law permits, for securing a review by the United States circuit court if such review can be had.

Case No. 15,938.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY BARRELS OF WHISKY.

[1 Bond, 587.] [1]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1865.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FORFEITURE—TRIAL BY JURY—PROCEEDING IN REM.

1. In a proceeding in the district court of the United States against property seized as forfeited under the internal revenue laws, to which a claim is interposed, the claimant has a constitutional right to a trial by a jury.

2. Congress has no power by legislation to provide for any other mode of trying a case, in which the right of trial by jury is secured by the constitution.

3. The provision of the statute, declaring that "the proceeding to enforce said forfeiture of said property shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem," is not to be construed as authorizing a trial on strict admiralty rules, and without the intervention of a jury.

Flamen Ball, Dist. Atty., and H. C. Whitman, for the United States.

J. B. Stallo, for claimant.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The motion before the court is for a trial by jury in four distinct informations, prosecuted in behalf of the United States, for the forfeiture of about one hundred and thirty barrels of whisky, alleged to have been manufactured and sold in violation of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 223]. The whisky was seized in this district, and is now in the custody of the law. Claimants have intervened in each of the four cases, and in the answer and claim of each the reasons and ground of forfeiture alleged in the several informations are denied. The question is, whether these claimants are entitled, in the trial of the issues made, to the intervention of a jury.

It is insisted by the counsel for the United States, that these informations are before this court as cases in admiralty jurisdiction, and must be tried according to the known and settled usages of courts of admiralty, in which the trial by jury is unknown. On the other hand, it is claimed, that as the seizures of the property in question were on the land, they must be tried as cases at law, in which the right of a jury trial is secured by the constitution of the United States. The seventh amendment to the constitution declares that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." And it is too clear to admit of doubt, that if these are cases at common law, they are within this clause of the constitution, and the parties are entitled to a trial by jury. It is equally clear that congress has no power under the constitution to deprive a suitor of this right, by declaring that a case not properly within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, shall be treated and dealt with according to the known principles of courts of admiralty. In defining the judicial power of the national government, the constitution declares (article 3, § 7), among other things, that it shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." The congress of the United States, in giving effect to this constitutional provision, have enacted that the district courts shall have exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures made under the laws of import, trade, or navigation, on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden. These courts are also vested with exclusive original cognizance of all seizures on land, or other waters than as aforesaid. Section 9, Act Sept. 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 73). The same section reserves to suitors the right of a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it; and also provides "that the trial of issues of fact in the district courts in all causes, except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be by jury."

It is obvious that in this legislation congress had in view the distinction between cases of proper admiralty jurisdiction and cases of seizure on land, or on water-courses, not properly within the scope of that jurisdiction. And in the latter class of cases, jurisdiction is vested in the district courts, not because they are courts of admiralty, but because they are courts created under the constitution. But in confining this jurisdiction, the statute is careful to reserve to suitors the right of trial by jury, in all cases of seizures which are not of admiralty cognizance. Now the cases before the court arise under section 68 of the act of June 30, 1864, which imposes the penalty of a forfeiture for any refusal or neglect to comply with the law regulating the duties payable by the distiller of spirits. By such neglect or refusal, not only the vessels and machinery used in distillation, but the liquor manufactured, are subject to forfeiture. And at the close of the section it is provided, that "the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture of said property shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem, in the circuit or district courts of the United States for the district where such seizure is made, or in any court of competent jurisdiction."

It is so clear as scarcely to need a word of argument, that congress have not conferred, and did not intend to confer, on the courts named, admiralty jurisdiction in the sense of requiring that cases arising under section 68 should be tried as cases of strict admiralty jurisdiction. It would be an impeachment of the intelligence of that body to suppose they intended a seizure on land should be considered as one within the scope of such jurisdiction. In declaring that the proceedings should be in the nature of a proceeding in rem, nothing more was intended than to provide for a summary and effective mode of enforcing the act of congress. The thing—the property subject to forfeiture is to be seized and held in possession subject to the action of the court. And this for the obvious reason, that a proceeding against the person merely would not give an available remedy for a fraudulent attempt to evade the law. It is true the right to a forfeiture of the property in question is set forth in the form of a libel, a term used as appropriate to proceedings in admiralty. But this can not change the character of the suit, nor bring the subject of it within the range of the admiralty jurisdiction of this court. It might as well have been presented by a petition or declaration, or any other convenient mode. The sole question is, are the facts such as to show that the party proceeded against has a right to a trial by jury. And on this subject, the case of Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 433, is an authority in point. The opinion of the supreme court of the United States in that case was prepared by the learned Judge Story, in which he holds: "That the amendment to the constitution of the United States, by which the trial by jury was secured, may, in a just sense, be well construed to embrace all suits which are not of equity or admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar form they may assume to settle legal rights." To the same effect is the decision of the supreme court in the case of The Sarah, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 391. It was a case prosecuted for a forfeiture under the revenue laws of the United States then in force. Although the property seized was a ship, it appears the seizure was made on land. And the court say: "In cases of seizure on land under the revenue laws, the district court proceeds as a court of common law, according to the course of exchequer informations in rem; and the trial of issues of fact is to be by jury." INTERNAL REVENUE—WHOLESALE LIQUOR DEALER—FORFEITURE.

1. The knowing and willful omission, neglect and refusal of the wholesale liquor dealer to cause packages of distilled spirits to be gauged, inspected and stamped, as required by section 25 of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 136], expose the distilled spirits and liquors owned by the wholesale liquor dealer to the forfeiture denounced in the 96th section of the act.

15,960; U. S. v. Two Hundred Barrels of Whiskey, 95 U. S. 575.]

2. The language of section 96 of the act of July 20, 1868, denouncing the forfeiture is not uncertain. "All distilled spirits or liquors owned by him shall be forfeited," is to be construed to mean all distilled spirits and liquors. It was not intended to discriminate between distilled spirits and liquors, and to create an alternative forfeiture of one exclusive of the other, but to include within the general term "liquors," whatever the more special term "distilled spirits" might not embrace.

3. The provisions of the 69th section of the act of July 20, 1868, do not apply to infractions of the provisions of the 45th section.

W. W. Morrow, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
Robert Harrison, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The demurrer to the informations in these cases, present two questions: 1st. Does the 25th section of the act of July 20, 1868, make it the duty of the wholesale liquor dealer, whenever any cask or package of distilled spirits shall be filled for shipment, sale or delivery, on the premises of any wholesale liquor dealer, to cause the same to be gauged, inspected and stamped, as provided for in that section; and does the knowing and willful omission, neglect and refusal, to do so expose the spirits and liquors owned by the wholesale liquor dealer to the forfeiture denounced in the 96th section of the act? 2d. Do the provisions of the 96th section apply to infractions of the provisions of the 45th section?

1. The clause of the 25th section under which the forfeiture in these cases is supposed to have been incurred, is as follows: "Whenever any cask or package of distilled spirits shall be filled for shipment, sale, or delivery, on the premises of any wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder, it shall be the duty of a United States gauger, to gauge and inspect the same and place thereon an engraved stamp signed by the collector," etc., etc.

The 96th section provided, "that if any distiller, etc., shall knowingly and willfully omit, neglect, or refuse to do, or cause to be done, any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited * * * all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him, or in which he has any interest as owner, * * * shall be forfeited to the United States."

The question thus arises: Has the liquor dealer in this case knowingly and willfully omitted, neglected, or refused to do, or cause to be done, any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting his business?

The duty of inspecting, gauging, and stamping, is that of the gauger. But the inspecting, gauging, and stamping, are clearly "things required by law in the carrying on of the business."

These it was the duty of the liquor dealer to cause to be done, by calling on the gauger to perform his duty, and the information charges that the liquor dealer has knowingly and willfully neglected to cause them to be done. When the statute makes the neglect to cause a thing to be done an offense, it is clear that the thing is to be done by some other person than the offender, and that the guilt of the latter consists in his neglecting to procure the services of the former.

If, then, this clause of the 96th section is to have any operation, it must apply to a case like the present, where the liquor dealer has neglected to cause to be done one of the most important things required by law in the conducting, and carrying on of his business, viz: the inspection, gauging, and stamping of his casks.

If the 96th section is to be construed as applying only to omissions to do any of those things which the law expressly makes it the duty of the offender to do, the phrase "or cause to be done" would be inoperative. The insertion of that phrase seems to indicate the intention of congress to make the omission to cause to be done any of the things required by law, an offense in cases where it is not the duty of the offender himself to do them; and in this view, the words "knowingly and willfully" find an appropriate place in the statute; for they restrict the operation of the statute to those cases where the offender, knowing what is required by law in the carrying on of his business, and what are the duties to be performed by the gauger, willfully neglects to call upon or notify him to perform them, and thus "omits to cause to be done the things required by law in the carrying on of his business."

I am aware that on this question there is a conflict of authority.

A construction similar to that adopted above, was given to the statute by Judge Hall, of the United States district court for the Northern district of Mississippi,—U. S. v. One Rectifying Establishment [Case No. 15,952],—while an opposite view was taken by Judge Ballard, of the United States district court for the district of Kentucky.

It is, therefore, not without doubt that I announce my conclusion.

It is also objected, that the ninety-sixth section is inoperative for uncertainty, the language being, "all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him shall be forfeited."

I do not find that the objection has been taken in any reported case. The meaning of the statute is unmistakable, and the word "or" is to be construed to mean "and," or the phrase is to be taken to be one of those pleonasms so common in legal phraseology, where a second and more general word is introduced, out of abundant caution to cover and include whatever by possibility may not be embraced by the first.

It was not intended to discriminate between "distilled spirits" and "liquors" and to create an alternative forfeiture of one exclusive of the other, but to include within the general term "liquor" whatever the more special term "distilled spirits" might not embrace. But all the articles under either denomination are to be forfeited.

The demurrers to the first and second counts of each of the informations are therefore overruled.

The third count in each of the informations is admitted to be defective, and the demurrers are sustained.

The objection to the fourth count in each information is also well taken.

The informations are based upon the idea, that the provisions of the ninety-sixth section can be applied to infractions of the provisions of the forty-fifth section.

The penalties and forfeitures imposed by the ninety-sixth section are, by its terms, limited to those cases "where no specific penalty or punishment is imposed by any other section of the act for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing, or causing to be done, the things required or prohibited."

But the forty-fifth section does provide a specific penalty and punishment for the violation of its provisions. The ninety-sixth section can, therefore, have no application to cases arising under that section.

On this point I have nothing to add to the very clear and conclusive argument contained in the opinion of Mr. J. Hall, already cited.

It is further objected to the information against two packages of distilled spirits, that they are not averred to be liquor or distilled spirits. But the seizure of two packages of distilled spirits is distinctly alleged, and the goods are described as such throughout the information. The averments seem to me sufficient, as are also those relating to the ownership of the property, and the time of the commission of the offenses.

Case No. 15,941.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-NINE PACKAGES.

[2 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 419.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. Sept., 1862.

FORFEITURE—INTERCOURSE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES—INTERDICT—STATUS OF TERRITORY —HOW DETERMINED.

1. The act of congress of July 13, 1861 [12 Stat. 255], is not a penal but a revenue statute, and is to be construed liberally, so as to accomplish its proposed object.

2. Where a party for fraudulent purposes mixes up goods prohibited by a revenue act with those not prohibited, the whole will be forfeited.

3. A citizen may be forbidden by a municipal law to do what would be lawful for a neutral to do on the high seas.

4. A sale of contraband property to a belligerent in a neutral territory is a violation of neutrality, and, à fortiori, such sale in one belligerent country by a citizen or domiciled person thereof, is a breach of allegiance.

5. Hence the act of July 13, 1861, prohibits every act done towards the execution of a design to carry on, without a "permit," commercial intercourse between the interdicted and other states, and it is violated not only when a vessel has actually sailed with the goods on board, but the moment the goods are started, even on land, towards the forbidden destination. The application for a "permit" is evidence of the intention to proceed, and the use of fraudulent invoices to procure the "permit," shows the intention to be fraudulent. The shipment of goods under color of that permit, is a step taken in execution of that fraudulent intent—is an overt act. Such goods are "proceeding to" the interdicted port within the meaning of the act of July 13, 1861, and the shipper, under the act of May 20, 1862 [12 Stat. 404], is guilty of an "attempt" to transport them in violation of law.

6. The condition of peace or war, public or civil, in a legal sense, must be determined by the political department of the government, and the courts are bound by that decision.

[Cited in Perkins v. Rogers, 35 Ind. 155.]

7. By the act of July 13, 1861, the prohibition of commercial intercourse is to be in force "so long as such condition of hostility shall continue." The same power which determines the existence of war or insurrection, must also decide when "the condition of hostility" ceases. In a legal sense the state of war or peace is not a question in pais for courts to determine. It is a legal fact ascertainable only from the decision of the political department.

8. Hence, when the president has proclaimed a state to be in insurrection, the courts must hold that this condition continues until he decides to the contrary.

9. The same rules apply as to the exceptions from the interdict, of such parts of the insurrectionary states "as may maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the constitution, or may be from time to time occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of said insurgents." Such exceptions, and the legal status of such parts of the said states, are to be determined by the president.

Libel of information under the act of congress, July 13, 1861 [against one hundred and twenty-nine packages, W. H. Probasco, claimant].

W. W. Edwards and C. S. Hayden, for the United States.

J. K. Knight, for claimant.

TREAT, District Judge. The facts submitted in this case are substantially these: The claimant, proposing to make a shipment of merchandise to Memphis in the state of Tennessee, applied to the surveyor of the port of St. Louis for a permit, under the regulations of the secretary of the treasury, pursuant to the act of July 13, 1861 [12 Stat. 255]. He represented that the proposed shipment contained, among other things, 100 barrels of cement. A "permit" having been granted for the specified goods, the claimant sent on board of a steamer, bound for Memphis, said 100 barrels and the 129 packages now in litigation. The surveyor caused said shipment to be examined after it was on board of said steamer, and whilst she still lay at the wharf here, and detected, that instead of 100 barrels of cement, there were 100 barrels of whiskey packed in cement for the purpose of concealing the same. Thereupon the whole shipment was seized.

The agreement of the facts, as filed, states that Memphis, the port of destination, is not now "in a condition of hostilities" against the United States, and that it is "occupied and controlled by forces of the United States, engaged in the dispersion of the insurgents." The claimant does not interpose a claim for the 100 barrels of cement and the whiskey packed therein, but solely for the 129 packages which contain no prohibited goods.

The first proposition urged by his proctor is that the statute of July 13, 1861, is a penal statute, in derogation of common right, and consequently it is to be strictly construed. Common right, it must be observed, requires the bonds of society to be preserved so as to prevent anarchy, and the consequent destruction of all safeguards for persons and property. Every member of society is directly interested in its preservation. Governments are instituted for the common good; and when a blow is aimed thereat, every citizen's rights are assailed. Measures adopted for the common safety are therefore, generally construed liberally, or so as to effect the proposed object. The theory upon which that rule depends was fully considered in this court in the cases of U. S. v. The Hannibal [Case No. 15,298]; Same v. Champion [Id. 14,779], decided at the November term, 1861. The statute of July 13, 1861, being a revenue statute, is to be construed according to the rules governing such acts, and not as a mere penal enactment. In the case of Taylor v. U. S. 3 How, [44 U. S.] 210, the supreme court of the United States held: "In one sense every law imposing a penalty or forfeiture may be deemed a penal law; in another sense such laws are often deemed, and truly deserve to be called, remedial. The judge was, therefore, strictly accurate when he stated (in the court below) that 'it must not be understood that every law which imposes a penalty is therefore, legally speaking, a penal law—that is, a law which is to be construed with great strictness in favor of the defendant. Laws enacted for the prevention of fraud, for the suppression of a public wrong, or to effect a public good, are not in the strict sense penal acts, although they may inflict a penalty for violating them.' And he added: 'It is in this light I view the revenue laws, and I would construe them so as most effectually to accomplish the intention of the legislature in passing them.' The same distinction will be found recognized in the elementary writers; as, for example, in Blackstone's Commentaries (1 Bl. Comm. 88); Bac. Abr. 'Statutes' 1, 7, 8; Com. Dig. 'Parliament' R. 13, 19, 20; and it is also abundantly supported by authorities." Similar decisions may be found in The Harmony [Case No. 6,081]; [Sundry Goods v. U. S.] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 358; [Wilkinson v. Leland] Id. 627; [Wood v. U. S.] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342. The justice of that rule was, in the cases referred to as decided November term, 1861, fully discussed by this court in the light of right reason, of the nature, objects, and necessity of social and governmental organization, and also of the essential elements of individual safety and happiness. Surely such statutes, adopted for the existence of government against armed efforts for its overthrow, upon the faithful observance of which the peace of society depends, should receive such a construction as will according to their scope and object effect the public end designed. Hence, in the interpretation of the act of July 13, 1861, courts are bound to give to it no such narrow and technical construction as may defeat its salutary purposes. Allegiance is a primary tie, and treason the greatest of crimes; for inasmuch as allegiance is the bond by which society exists, so the breach of that allegiance by direct overt acts, is an attempt to dissolve social and governmental organization, reducing society to chaos—a condition in which moral, as well as political, obligations give way to physical force and blind passion. The right of each and all, or "common right," is not assailed when constitutional and remedial measures are adopted for the common good. The history of the existing Rebellion fully illustrates the doctrine. The untold calamities it has devolved upon all citizens of the republic, are too keenly felt to need exposition.

But whatever rule of interpretation is adopted in this case, the same result will follow. The claimant admits that he undertook a fraud upon the law. If the act of July 13, 1861, was either an ordinary revenue act, or a simple penal act, he would still fall within its provisions. He chose for fraudulent purposes to mix up with unprohibited goods, those directly prohibited. He knew that the vast interests at stake, civil and military, would admit of no relaxation of the interdict against intercourse under the act of congress and the president's proclamation, so far at least as the shipping of whiskey to the insurrectionary states, and to our camps there, was concerned; yet for his individual gain he was willing, not only to jeopardize those public interests, but to do so by a resort to falsehood and fraud. There can be no pretence that he was actuated by any higher motive than a sordid lust of gain, which ignored all considerations of law or justice. He knew that he was violating the law; and he attempted to defraud the government, not in the matter of dollars and cents alone. Still he appears before the court with the strange request, to have it unravel for him the tangled skein of fraud which he has deliberately woven, and then restore to his possession such parts as would have been untainted if he had not wound them into one promiscuous mass. No principle known to law or equity tolerates such a procedure. He has mixed up the good with the bad, and the mass must be treated as he has voluntarily made it. Neither at common law, nor in equity, would a court aid in such unclean work. In international law, as illustrated in prize cases, the owner of a contraband cargo never receives restitution of any portion of it, when thus tainted with fraud against the belligerent. It is a universal maxim, in every department of jurisprudence, "ex turpi causa, aut ex dolo malo, aut ex maleficio, non oritur actio;" and in admiralty every claimant is an actor. If he cannot establish his claim, except through fraud, he is left in the position he assumed. [La Nereyda] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 147; [The Venus] 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 276, [The Sally] Id. 382; [U. S. v. One Thousand Nine Hundred and Sixty Bags of Coffee] Id. 398; [The Bello Corrunes] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 169; [U. S. v. Four Hundred and Twenty Two Casks of Wine] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 547; [The Palmyra] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 1; [U. S. v. Three Hundred and Fifty Chests of Tea] Id. 486; [Murray v. The Charming Betsy] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 72; 3 Phil. The intermixture of fraudulent goods with those not prohibited may, or may not, in some cases be designed to conceal the fraudulent from detection; but the law pronounces the whole mass tainted. The purpose, however, in this case, is transparent. The design was fraudulent, and the act fraudulent. The whole shipment was one transaction. If the goods had not been included in one "permit," yet, if they were shipped by the same owner, on the same voyage, and in the same vessel, they would have shared the same fate. By the law of prize the concealment of spoliation of papers, or defective papers, call for explanation from the claimant. An assertion of a false claim, in whole or part, is a substantive cause of condemnation. A vehement presumption of bad faith, or gross prevarication or fraud, or gross misconduct, or illegality, will cause forfeiture. A party must act in entire good faith, or restitution is not awarded. The rule extends so far, that if a shipowner lends his name to cover a fraud with respect to cargo, that circumstance alone will subject the vessel to condemnation. The fraud taints all it touches. The Pizarro, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 241; The Fortuna, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 236; The Venus, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 127; The London Packet, Id. 132; The Amiable Isabella, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 1; The Dos Hermanos, Id. 76.

But as the vessel had not left port, or started on the voyage, it is contended that there has been no violation of the statute; the language of which is "all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise, &c.. proceeding to such state or section, by land or water * * * shall be forfeited." Were the goods in question "proceeding to" the interdicted section, within the meaning of the act? It is a well-established rule, that sailing with an intention to evade a blockade is a beginning to execute that intention, and an overt act constituting the offence. From that moment the blockade is fraudulently invaded. The Columbia, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 156; The Frederick Molke, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 86; The Hoffnung, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 112, 117; The Vrow Johanna, 2 C. Rob. [14 U. S.] 62. A concealed illegal destination is proof of a real intention to break a blockade. The James Cook, Edw. Adm. 261. So a sale in a neutral country of contraband articles to a belligerent is a violation of neutrality. 3 Phillim. Int. Law, 321. These rules spring from the inflexible duty of neutrals to observe strict impartiality. There must be no fraudulent act against belligerent rights—no attempt to depart from rigid neutrality. An intermixture or combination of neutral and hostile operations by the same person, taints the whole transaction. [The Fortuna] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 236; [The Pizarro] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 241. The loading of a contraband cargo in a neutral port, or the preparation of a vessel to run a blockade, though violative of international law, will not enable a belligerent to enter, lawfully, into such a port and capture the contraband cargo or vessel; for such an act would be a violation of neutral territory. [The Santissima Trinidad] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 283. Besides, a breach of blockade requires some movement towards the blockaded port. It may be far away from the neutral country; yet the sailing of the vessel with intent to enter that far-off port, is always considered an overt act. The belligerent cannot trespass upon neutral sovereignty, by entering the neutral port itself, or making a capture within the marine league; for belligerent jurisdiction does not attach until the vessel is on the high seas, or within the municipal control of the belligerent captor. When, however, a government in the exercise of its municipal sovereignty passes a law of non-intercourse, there can be no question of neutral rights raised within its territorial jurisdiction; that is, its municipal laws are supreme within its own territory. Congress has passed penal laws against fitting out vessels in American ports for the slave trade, and it has, also, for the preservation of peace, and as an act of good faith towards other nations, forbidden the fitting out of hostile expeditions, and the enlistment of soldiers, to act against other powers with which the United States are in amity. Any act done within this country in violation of those statutes, by foreign subjects or our own citizens, is a direct breach of our municipal laws, subjecting the offender to the prescribed penalties. The act of July 13, 1861, is a municipal and revenue statute.

Waiving all discussion of the constitutional question (which is purely municipal or intra-territorial), and looking only to the international laws of blockade, neutrals cannot sail on a voyage, with the intent to enter a blockaded port, without becoming lawful prize under the law of nations. A citizen of the United States, subject to the municipal law, may be forbidden by that law to do what a neutral would have a right to do on the high seas. A neutral, for instance, may lawfully enter any unblockaded port of the adverse belligerent, with a cargo not contraband, and depart therefrom; but if an American citizen (the United States being the other belligerent), should attempt to do so, the United States might subject him to severe penalties personally and confiscate his vessel and cargo, if thus found "adherent to the enemy," as was done by the act of July 6, 1812 [2 Stat. 778]. He is subject both to the law of nations and to the municipal law of his own domicil. It is competent for the United States, as has been judicially determined, to adopt embargo or non-intercourse acts with reference to foreign nations, and the existence of a similar power with respect to any part of this country in rebellion, has also been judicially maintained by several United States courts, since the present civil war commenced. If, then, a sale of contraband property, in a neutral country, to a belligerent, is a violation of neutrality under the law of nations (which law attempts to reconcile the rights of neutrals with the rights of belligerents), how under a municipal statute, which forbids all commercial intercourse, should a clearance of a vessel for an interdicted port, with or without contraband cargo, be considered? The allegiance of the citizen is due to his country, and he is bound by its laws. He is forbidden to trade with an insurrectionary district; "all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States, shall cease and be unlawful;" "and all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise, coming from said state or section into the other parts of the United States, and all proceeding to such state or section by land or water, shall, together with the vessel or vehicle, &c., be forfeited to the United States." The overt act is not confined to actual entrance into the interdicted district —the success of the fraudulent voyage. If the offence was not complete until success crowned the enterprise, the object of the law would be defeated. The design of the statute is to prevent supplies from reaching the foe. Any movement towards aiding him —any act in furtherance of such a purpose, whether on land or water, is within the spirit of the statute. "Proceeding to" is a comprehensive phrase. If the prohibited intercourse is attempted on land, and a person loads a wagon and starts in furtherance of his illegal design, is he not proceeding in his fraudulent scheme—"proceeding to" violate his duty to the government? At what point on the journey will the offence become complete, if not at the first start? Is the rule different if the contemplated intercourse is through the agency of a vessel—to be by transportation on water instead of land? The goods are within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and owned by a United States citizen, and consequently are subject to the intra-territorial law. Every act done intra-territorially is subject to that law. If a sale of contraband property to a belligerent, in a neutral territory, is a violation of neutrality, à fortiori, such a sale in one belligerent country by any citizen or domiciled person thereof, is a breach of allegiance. This is not left to mere deduction from general principles. The act of August 6, 1861 [12 Stat. 319], provides that all property, of whatsoever kind, purchased or acquired, sold or given, with intent to use the same or suffer the same to be used, in promoting the insurrection, shall be confiscated. The act of May 20, 1862, supplementary to the act of July 13, 1861, after making provision for clearances in specified cases, and directing a refusal of clearances in others, whether the transportation is to be by land or water, imposes the penalty of forfeiture for an attempt to transport goods, &c., in violation of that act, or the regulations of the secretary of the treasury in pursuance thereof. The alleged offence in this case was subsequent to that act, and in violation of its provisions and of the regulations of the secretary of the treasury. The claimant had so far "proceeded" in his fraudulent operations as to procure a permit and actually to ship his goods. He had entered upon the interdicted enterprise. It was an "attempt" by which the penalty was incurred under the act of May 20, 1862, if not under the act of July 13, 1861. But there seems to be no difference in the true meaning of the terms employed between an "attempt" to transport and "proceeding to" transport. The scope and object of the two acts are the same, viz.: to prevent the interdicted intercourse. If such, however, is not the true construction of the act of July 13th, the goods in question would be held under the act of May 20th, and the necessary amendment of the libel allowed. The act of July 13th, properly construed, forbids each and every act done towards the execution of a design to carry on, without a license or permit, commercial intercourse between the interdicted and other states. It is violated not only when a vessel has actually sailed on the voyage with the goods on board, but the moment the goods are started, even on land, towards the forbidden destination. The application for the "permit" is evidence of the intention to proceed, and the exhibition of fraudulent invoices in order to procure the needed permit, shows the intention to be fraudulent. The shipment of the goods under color of that permit is a step taken in execution of that fraudulent intent—is an overt act. Such goods, within the meaning of said statute, are "proceeding to" the interdicted port; and the shipper, under the act of May 20th, is guilty of an "attempt" to transport them in violation of the law. The act of July 6, 1812 (2 Stat. 778), was entitled "An act to prohibit American vessels from proceeding to, or trading with, the enemies of the United States, and for other purposes." It imposed forfeiture on every vessel that should depart from a United States port for a foreign port; and fine and imprisonment upon the master guilty of violating the act. Like penalties were provided against "an attempt to transport" by land. The decisions with reference to that and other statutes for non-intercourse and embargoes, indicate that the phrase "proceeding to" has received the construction given above. A departure, under one of its sections, and an attempt to transport, under another section, were respectively overt acts of "proceeding to" the interdicted port or district. The William and Grace, Hay & M. 76; The Rebecca, Id. 197; The Julia [Case No. 7,573]; The Friendship [Id. 5,124]; [The Penobscot v. U. S.] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 356; [The Richmond v. U. S.] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 102; [The Active v. U. S.] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100; [The William King] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 148.

The next two points as presented depend for solution upon the same principles. By the language of said act of July 13th, the prohibition is to be in force only "so long as such condition of hostility shall continue," and the president's proclamation of August 16, 1861, excepts from the interdict such of the states therein named (including Tennessee), and such parts of said states "as may maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the constitution, or may be from time to time occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of said insurgents." The claimant's proctor contends that "the condition of hostility," &c., is matter in pais, upon which the court is to hear the testimony of witnesses. He offers to prove by such witnesses that no such condition existed at Memphis when his shipment was made; also, the loyalty of that city, and that it was then occupied and controlled by United States forces. Indeed, for the purposes of this trial, the district attorney admits, as a matter in pais, that Memphis was so occupied and controlled at the time, and that hostilities were not flagrante bello, actually raging in that city at the time; submitting to the court, however, the question as to the competency of such modes of proof. The doctrine involved has been fully discussed in several cases decided by this court during the last fifteen months, and was virtually settled long ago by the United States supreme court. The judiciary, under the constitution, cannot declare war or make peace. It is clothed with no such power, and cannot be clothed with it. Whatever power is vested by the constitution in one department of the government cannot be usurped by another. If one should wholly refuse to act, or should undertake to divest itself of, or abdicate, its legitimate functions, it would by no means follow that another department, expressly limited to specified duties, would thereby acquire ungranted powers. The abdication of executive functions by the executive, for instance, would not constitute the judicial the executive department of the country; nor would a failure or refusal of the legislative to pass needed statutes constitute the executive the law-making power. Each department has its true boundaries prescribed by the constitution, and it cannot travel beyond them. U. S. v. Ferrera, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 40; Little v. Bareme, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 170. The condition of peace or war, public or civil, in a legal sense, must be determined by the political department, not the judicial. The latter is bound by the decision thus made. The act of 1795 and the act of July 13, 1861, vest the president with the power to determine when insurrection exists, and to what extent it exists. The United States constitution vests congress with the power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion;" "to declare war, * * * and make rules concerning captures on land and water." In the execution of that power, congress passed the acts cited above.

By the act of 1795 [1 Stat. 424], the supreme court says: "The power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the government of the United States is bound to interfere, is given to the president. * * * After the president has acted and called out the militia, is a circuit court of the United States authorized to inquire whether his decision was right? Could the court, while the parties were actually contending in arms for the possession of the government, call witnesses before it and inquire which party represented a majority of the people? * * * If the judicial power extends so far, the guarantee contained in the constitution of the United States is a guarantee of anarchy and not of order. Yet if this right does not reside in the courts when the conflict is raging; if the judicial power is at that time bound to follow the decision of the political, it must be equally bound when the contest is over. * * * At all events it (the power to decide) is conferred upon him (the president) by the constitution and laws of the United States, and must therefore be respected and enforced in its judicial tribunals." [Luther v. Borden] 7 How. [48 U. S.] 43, 44; also, see Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 29–31. The same doctrine has been uniformly maintained from the commencement of the government. The absurdity of any other rule is manifest. If during the actual clash of arms, courts were rightfully hearing evidence as to the fact of war, and either with or without the aid of juries, determining the question, they should have power to enforce their decisions. In case of foreign conflicts neither belligerent would be likely to yield to the decision: and in case of insurrection, the insurgents already in arms against the constitution and laws, would not cease their rebellion in obedience to a judicial decree. In short, the status of the country as to peace or war, is legally determined by the political and not the judicial department. When the decision is made the courts are concluded thereby, and bound to apply the legal rules which belong to that condition. The same power which determines the existence of war or insurrection, must also decide when hostilities have ceased,—that is, when peace is restored. In a legal sense, the state of war or peace is not a question in pais for courts to determine. It is a legal fact ascertainable only from the decision of the political department. [The Fortuna] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246; [U. S. v. Palmer] Id. 610; [The Divina Pastora] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 52; [The Neustra Senora De La Caridad] Id. 497; [The Santissima Trinidad] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 283; [Martin v. Mott] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 19; [Rose v. Himely] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 241; [Foster v. Neilson] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 253; [Garcia v. Lee] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 511; [M'Elmoyle v. Cohen] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 315; [Luther v. Borden] 7 How. [48 U. S.] 1; [Kennett v. Chambers] 14 How. [55 U. S.] 46; [Christy v. Scott] Id. 283.

Under the act of July 13th, the president, on the 16th of August, 1861, proclaimed Tennessee in a state of insurrection. The legal status thus determined must remain so long as the condition of hostility continues. He has never made a counter proclamation, nor has peace been officially announced. As a legal condition that status is independent of actual daily strife in arms. A legal condition of hostilities may exist between this and a foreign nation, long after the last battle has been fought between the opposing armies. That condition ceases when peace is concluded through competent authority; not before. The distinction is between war flagrante, and nondum cessante. So far, however, is it from being true that the condition of hostilities does not still exist, that it is evident, even as a matter in pais, that Tennessee is still in an insurrectionary position. The presence of the United States armies in Memphis and elsewhere within that state, for the purpose of maintaining federal authority against armed insurgents, is a well-known necessity. There has been as yet no return of that state to a peaceful status under the constitution and laws; enabling the civil tribunals, by ordinary process, to enforce United States authority. Within any construction which could be fairly given to the president's proclamation, no "part of that state maintains as yet a loyal adhesion to the Union and constitution." It is the duty of the president, however, to decide that point. Until he decides to the contrary, the court must hold that the legal condition of hostility continues. The exceptions in the proclamation, so far as made by the president, courts can and must enforce. But, if it be correct that by the terms of that proclamation the president intended to devolve on the courts the duty of determining judicially the status of a state, or part of a state, by an inquiry into its loyalty, or its occupation from time to time by United States forces, irrespective of a decision thereon by the executive; still courts could not thus acquire the power. The limits upon their constitutional and legal functions could not thus be enlarged. Political power could not be so delegated to them. They cannot be charged with any duties not judicial; "judicial power" alone is vested in them under the constitution; and the cases to which it extends are clearly defined. U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 40. They cannot go beyond that well-defined limit. But the act of July 13th gives the conditions on which the proclamation issues, and declares its effect. It must pronounce what states or part of a state are in insurrection; for it is the official promulgation of the fact as found by the president. The exception quoted above does not change the rule. At the date of that document (August 16, 1861), Tennessee was proclaimed to be in insurrection, except as to such parts thereof where a certain condition of affairs existed, or might from time to time exist. How can any part of that state be brought within the exception for judicial cognizance? Only by the action of competent authority. The status of the part can be determined by the president alone. Has he officially decided the status by force of which the exception would operate, or courts can judicially ascertain Memphis to be no longer in hostile condition? Or, was not that language used solely with a view to the proviso in the 5th section of the act? It can hardly be supposed that he contemplated opening to unrestricted intercourse every town or district of an insurrectionary state, which the United States armies might occupy from time to time, on their march, irrespective of further action; thus leaving a town open to trade to-day and closed to-morrow, according to the shifting exigencies or convenience of military operations and without any treasury regulations therefor. It is evident, however, that the language used in that exception was not designed to leave so important a question open to doubt, uncertainty, or the contingencies of military movements from day to day. It was employed, perhaps, out of abundant caution, so as to announce that from time to time, exceptions would be put into practical effect by him according to the rules stated; or to bring such parts of those states within the terms of the proviso, so that the secretary of the treasury might make the needed regulations therefor. A practical exemplification thereof is found in the case of South Carolina and Louisiana. Those states were included in the proclamation of August 16, 1861, and also in the previous proclamation of blockade; yet by another proclamation dated May 12, 1862, the president declares, that, by virtue of the powers vested in him by said act of July 13, the blockade of the ports of Beaufort, Port Royal, and New Orleans, should cease after the first day of June following, except as to contraband "persons, things, and information," and commercial intercourse be thereafter restored subject to the treasury regulations made for the purpose. Those ports had been for some time "occupied and controlled by United States forces." Again, under the act of June 7, 1862 [12 Stat. 422], the president once more (July 1, 1862) proclaimed Tennessee and the other states named therein, to be "in insurrection and rebellion," and there was no such exception as that quoted from the prior proclamation of August 16, 1861. True, the proclamation of July 1, 1862, had reference to the act of June preceding; but it serves to indicate the status of Tennessee as then officially recognised.

Under the proviso of the 5th section of the act of July 13, 1861, and by virtue of the act of May 20, 1862, the secretary of the treasury has made regulations, by compliance with which persons may trade with Memphis. The claimant sought a "permit" as required, so that he might have the benefit of the exception. He succeeded by fraud in procuring the desired paper, and then undertook, in further fraud of the law, to take contraband or prohibited articles to that port. Tennessee is interdicted to commercial intercourse, except on the specified conditions, and by special permit. The claimant must bring himself within the exceptions. [Murray v. The Charming Betsy] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 72; The Harmony [Case No. 6,081]. He not only has failed to do so; but on the contrary admits that he exhibited fraudulent invoices to the surveyor of the port, and violated the conditions on which alone a permit could be procured. The statute pronounces the penalty of forfeiture against his whole shipment. The packages in question are therefore declared forfeited, and costs and expenses awarded against the claimant.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIX BALES OF PADDING.

[43 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 585.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1860.

FRAUD ON THE REVENUE — UNDERVALUATION OF IMPORTED GOODS.

The libel in this case alleged that Collector Schell, in September last, at the city of New York, seized as forfeited to the United States, the 126 bales of padding imported into the port of New York, subject to duties and entered; that an invoice was produced and left with the collector; that upon an examination and appraisement the packages and invoice were found to have been made up with intent, by false valuation, extension and otherwise, to evade and defraud the revenue of the United States in this, that the goods contained in the packages were valued in the said invoice at a less price than the actual market value or wholesale price abroad of the goods at the period of exportation to the United States, thereby intending to defraud the United States by paying less duty on said goods than the amount which the same were required to pay by law on the importation thereof into the United States. Also that the goods were invoiced at a much less price than the actual costs thereof, with intent to evade and defraud the revenue; and that the goods, by reason aforesaid, became forfeited to the government. The libel prayed for a decree of the court condemning the goods. George Brown, of the firm of Smieton and Brown, intervening for James Smieton and others, of Dundee, in Scotland, appeared and claimed the merchandise, averring that the said firm were in the possession thereof, at the time of the seizure by the marshal, as agents of James Smieton and others, the owners. The claimant, George Brown, also put in an answer by James B. Craig, Esq., his proctor, claiming that the merchandise did not become forfeited, as alleged. A consent was given by the proctor for the claimant that a decree of condemnation and forfeiture be entered, and the merchandise be delivered to the claimants, upon payment by them of $18,300 25—the appraised value—into the registry of the court. The United States district attorney consented that the merchandise be discharged from custody, upon the claimants filing sworn claim, paying into the registry of the court $18,300 25—being the appraised value of the same—and consenting to a decree of condemnation and forfeiture.

THE COURT [BETTS, District Judge] entered a decree, which, after reciting that the goods having been attached by the marshal, and no defence to the libel of information having been interposed, and the claimants having paid into the registry of the court $18,300.25, as the appraised value of the goods, on filing consents of United States district attorney and proctor for claimants, ordered that the goods be condemned as forfeited to the United States, and that out of the proceeds paid by the claimants into court the clerk pay the taxed costs, and pay the balance of the money to the collector, to be by him distributed according to law. Amount paid to collector $17,962.75.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-THREE CASKS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[1 Abb. U. S. 573.] [1]

District Court, N. D. Ohio. 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE—PRACTICE—AMENDMENT TO INFORMATION.

1. The district courts have an undoubted power, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, to permit a libel to be amended.

2. If an application to amend a libel proposes to introduce a new cause of action, it is usual to allow the amendment when the new cause of action corresponds in character and is kindred in nature to that presented in the original libel; but if the amendment introduces a new substantive cause of action and a new charge against the defendant, it is disallowed. [Cited in U. S. v. Cigars, 18 Fed. 150.]

3. A libel of information was filed under a section of statute imposing punishment for disposing of property subject to internal revenue tax, in fraud of the revenue laws. The government applied for leave to amend by adding a count founded on another section of the statute, which imposed punishment on a manufacturer, &c. who should neglect to make returns of his manufactures to the proper revenue officer. Held, that this was a substantially new charge, and that the leave must be refused.

Motion to strike out a count from a libel of information.

R. F. Paine and R. P. Ranney, for the motion.

B. White and B. T. Dickman, opposed.

SHERMAN, District Judge. The libel of information was filed on February 19, 1866. The property was duly seized, but no further proceedings were had until February 12, 1869, when the claim and answer were filed, when a motion was made by the district-attorney and granted, for leave to amend the information. On the same day a new information was filed.

The first information was founded on section 48 of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 223]. The first count of the new and amended one was founded on the same section, and is a copy of the original libel; but the second count was founded on section 68 of the same law.

A motion was made to strike off the amended and second count. It is claimed by the defendants that section 68 defines a new and different cause of forfeiture, the prosecution of which is limited by the proviso to the section to twenty days after the seizure.

Section 48 provides that all goods, wares, &c. &c., on which duties are imposed by law, which shall be found in the possession or custody of any person, for the purpose of being sold or removed, in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with the design to evade the payment of any tax, shall be forfeited to the United States, and the forfeiture shall be enforced by proceedings in rem; but there is no limitation when the seizure shall be made, or the prosecution commenced.

Section 68 provides that the owner of any vessel, still, or boiler, used in the manufacturing of any distilled spirits or fermented liquors, on which duty is payable, who shall neglect or refuse to make entry and report of the same, or to do the things required by law to be done, shall be subject to a seizure and forfeiture of such vessels, stills, and boilers, besides being subject to a penalty: provided that such seizure be made within thirty days after the cause thereof came to the knowledge of the collector, and that proceedings to enforce the forfeiture be commenced within twenty days thereafter.

That the court has a right to allow amendments at any stage of the case, is undoubted; and this is applicable in revenue cases as in cases at common law. The motion is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court. If the amendment, as in this case, adds a new count, which introduces a new cause of action, corresponding in character with the original count, and kindred in its nature, these courts have always allowed it; but if the amendment introduces a new substantive cause of action, and a new charge against the defendant, it is disallowed.

This principle of law is well illustrated in the two cases cited by the counsel,—the one Tiernan v. Woodruff [Case No. 14,027], cited to support the government to its right to file this new count, and in The Harmony [Id. 6,081], cited by defendant to support this motion. The case of Tiernan v. Woodruff [supra], was an action at law, where in effect the plaintiff asked leave to amend his declaration by adding a third count on a note given to the plaintiff by the defendant, of the same character and founded on the same transaction as the other two notes declared on. The court permitted the amendment. The case of The Harmony [supra], was a libel for the forfeiture of a vessel for a violation of the custom laws. The first and original libel charged the vessel with landing goods without a permit; the second count in the libel, offered as an amendment, charged the vessel with receiving goods on board from another vessel. Both charges were violations of different sections of the same act. The amendment was refused.

Apply these principles to this case. If the charge in the second count is a new substantive charge, then the amendment is improper.

The original information, founded on section 48, punishes a party having property in his possession subject to a tax, who sells and disposes of it in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with intent to avoid the payment of tax. The second and amended count on section 68, punishes the party being a distiller or manufacturer, who neglects or refuses to make a daily or tri-monthly report and return to the collector of the liquors and spirits made by him. One provides against fraudulent acts, and with fraudulent intents. The other is against neglect to keep proper books, and making proper returns. The one is generally against fraudulent acts, purposely committed. The other is against the omission or neglect to do certain acts. The two offenses are distinct in their nature and character. One is a general crime, and the offender may be proceeded against at any time, and upon the complaint of any person. The other is special; and seemingly the seizure and proceedings must be made by the collector, and within a limited time.

I therefore think that the second count contains a charge that is a new substantive cause of action; that it does not correspond in character, and is not kindred in its nature with the original information, and, therefore, should be stricken off.

Motion denied.

Case No. 15,944.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED AND TWO PACKAGES DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[22 Int. Rev. Rec. 187.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1876.

INTERNAL REVENUE — DISTILLERY FRAUDS — COMMISSIONER'S REGULATIONS.

A common device in connection with the great whiskey ring frauds in the West to procure stamps for rectified spirits, was the false return by rectifiers to the collector of internal revenue, of spirits as emptied for rectification, the spirits being actually shipped to other markets, and their place supplied in the rectifying houses by illicit spirits from some "crooked" distillery, run in complicity with the rectifying houses. The issue of stamps for rectified spirits is regulated by these returns of spirits "dumped," which returns are known as "dumpers," or "Form 122."

Demurrer to the information. The second count of the information based upon section 3451, Rev. St. U. S., alleged that Bensberg, a rectifier at St. Louis, in the First collection district of Missouri, had owned these spirits, and had then and there made a return to the collector of internal revenue upon a form prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, known as "Form 122"; that he had emptied these packages of spirits for rectification, and that he had procured a United States gauger's return, to be made to that effect; while in fact Bensberg had shipped these spirits to New York, and had conveyed to the claimant [Thomas Thatcher, 72 Courtlandt street] all the title to them which, in view of these facts, he could convey. The demurrer rested upon the want of power in the commissioner to make the regulations, requiring Form 122, and upon the point that the false Form 122 did not forfeit the spirits described therein, but those which could be unlawfully placed upon the market, by means of its false character.

Roger M. Sherman, Asst. U. S. Atty.
Thomas Harland, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge, held that the regulations requiring Form 122, were made in the reasonable and lawful exercise of the authority conferred by several sections of the Revised Statutes upon the commissioner of internal revenue, and that Form 122 was covered by the language in section 3451, "any document required by regulation made in pursuance of the provisions of the internal revenue laws," and that the property to which, in this case, the Form 122 relates is that described in the instrument itself.

Judgment for the United States.

Case No. 15,945.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED BARRELS OF CEMENT.

[3 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 735.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. Sept., 1862.

FORFEITURE—INTERCOURSE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES—STATUS OF CITIZENS OF REBELLIOUS STATES—LICENSE—REGULATIONS.

1. By the act of congress of 13th July, 1861 [12 Stat. 255], and the president's proclamation in pursuance thereof, citizens of the rebellious states have prima facie become, for purposes of commerce, quasi enemies, and cannot sue in the United States courts.

[Cited in Brown v. Hiatt, Case No. 2,011.]
[Cited in Perkins v. Rogers, 35 Ind. 138.]

2. But the president having power, through the secretary of the treasury, to make regulations permitting trade in certain cases, the granting of a license, in pursuance of this power, restores the standing of the grantee, so as to enable him to be heard in the United States courts.

3. The act of foreign nations in recognizing the so-called Confederate States as a belligerent, estops their subjects from disputing the lawfulness of captures on the high seas by the United States forces. But such recognition has no influence on the courts of the United States, who are guided solely by the action of the political department of their own government.

4. Therefore, in determining the status of Rebel persons and property, the courts are guided by municipal and not by international law.

5. The acts of congress of 13th July, 1861, and 20th May, 1862 [12 Stat. 404], are prohibitory acts, and the forfeiture under them of goods "proceeding to" rebellious states can only be avoided by the production of such a license as is provided in the acts. Therefore, a license obtained through error or mistake or fraud will not prevent the forfeiture.

Libel of information [against one hundred barrels of cement; Hicks & Cocke, claimants] for violation of the 5th section of the act of congress approved July 13th, 1861.

W. W. Edwards and C. S. Hayden, for the United States.

J. K. Knight, for claimants.

TREAT, District Judge. The material facts are substantially as follows: In July last, Messrs. Hicks & Cocke, copartners in a hotel business at Jackson, Tennessee, were residents and citizens of that state, and loyal to the United States. Messrs. Harman & Daily, of the same place, were copartners in a saloon. Early in that month Messrs. Harman & Daily, with Mr. Cocke, visited St. Louis, Missouri, and purchased respectively the goods contained in lot No. 41. Messrs. Harman & Daily bought twenty-one half-barrels of whiskey, had the same packed in barrels of salt for concealment, and caused the same to be shipped on the steamer G. W. Graham, consigned to Messrs. Hicks & Cocke, at Jackson. Mr. Cocke bought the other goods in said lot No. 41, and had the same shipped on said steamer also. Mr. Harman applied at the custom-house, in the name of Hicks & Cocke, for the necessary permit for all the goods, filed what purported to be copies of the invoices, made the required oath, and received a permit for Hicks & Cocke to ship to Jackson the whole lot named, to be delivered to them at the latter place. After said goods were on board the steamer, they were seized, the whiskey concealed in the salt having been detected; all of the goods were included in the same permit, and shipped on the same steamer for the same destination, and consigned to the same persons. The regulations of the treasury department for such shipments contained at that time the following provisions: "All applicants for permits to ship and trade, shall make and file with the officer granting the permit, an affidavit that the values of all merchandise are correctly stated in the invoices, true copies of which shall be annexed to the affidavit, and that the packages contain nothing except as stated in the invoices; . . . and furthermore, that the applicant is loyal to the government of the United States, and will in all things so deport himself." "No permits shall be granted to ship merchandise to states, or parts of states, heretofore declared to be in insurrection, except for delivery to such persons residing or doing business therein, as shall be recommended therefor by an officer of government, duly authorized to make such recommendation." "No permits shall be granted to ship intoxicating drinks," &c. The object of these conditions is obvious, viz., to prevent from being forwarded to the insurrectionary states, any merchandise which may be used in aid of the insurgents, or for the demoralization of the United States army there.

All commercial intercourse with Tennessee was interdicted from the date of the president's proclamation of August 16th, 1861 [12 Stat. 262], except so far as the president had relaxed, or might relax, such interdict with respect to any particular part of the state, or with respect to specified persons. The rule is similar to that recognised by publicists, as in force during foreign wars, viz., that "all intercourse by a citizen of one nation with the adverse belligerent, except by special license of the sovereign, is unlawful, subjecting vessel and cargo to forfeiture; and a licensed vessel is to be treated as belonging to the country under whose license she sails." Every citizen therefore who, during a war, carries on intercourse with the enemy's country without such special license, is faithless to his allegiance, and subjects himself personally to such punishment as his sovereign may impose, and the property shipped, to confiscation as lawful prize. Waddington, 16 Johns. 438. As then all commercial intercourse with Tennessee was legally interdicted, all goods shipped to that state without a license were forfeited to the United States. By the terms of said act, the president was authorized to grant special licenses for trade, under such regulations as might be prescribed therefor by the secretary of the treasury. The political department alone has the power to decide the status of a state, or rather of its inhabitants, as to "a condition of hostilities" or "insurrection" against the United States government; and when its decision is made, the courts must apply the rules applicable thereto. That status must remain, in a legal sense, until the same authority decides it to be at an end. Such is the true interpretation of the statute and proclamation. U. S. v. One Hundred and Twenty-Nine Packages [Case No. 15,941], decided by this court at this term; [Rose v. Humly] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 241; [Fosker v. Neilson] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 253; [Martin v. The goods in question having been seized for "proceeding to" an insurrectionary state, and the fact that they were so proceeding having been established, the onus is on the claimant to show that he had the required license or permit. If he were before the court, in a formal manner, prior to default taken, contesting by claim and answer the question of forfeiture, the United States district attorney could only by an exceptive allegation, or by a plea of abatement, dispute his right to be heard, or his persona standi in judicio. U. S. v. Four Hundred and Twenty-Two Casks of Wine, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 547; Adm. Rule Sup. Ct. 26; Adm. Rule Dist. Ct. 45. By consent, the default in this case was set aside, and these claimants permitted to put in their claim and answer.

The first proposition presented to the court relates to the legal standing of the claimant. "An alien enemy cannot sue, nor can he be heard as claimant in the courts of the belligerent captors." The position of the insurrectionists towards the United States government, at this time, is one of open hostility, and all the inhabitants are quasi enemies, but not alien enemies. Like American citizens domiciled in England during the war of 1812, although they still owe paramount allegiance to the United States, and are, therefore, neither aliens nor enemies, technically, yet their personal property follows their domicil,—"mobilia sequuntur personam,"—and is, when afloat on the high seas, pronounced in law, "adherent to the enemy;" for they are under the dominion of the insurrectionary forces, and within the territory over which hostile sway is maintained. The act of 1861 and the proclamation recognize this as an organized insurrection, extending over the states and parts of states named; and the so-called Confederate government, at an early day, ordered all who did not adhere thereto, to leave those states within a prescribed period, under the penalty of being treated as alien enemies. The same general principles which regulate the status of persons, as to their personal property during foreign wars, were incorporated into this act of congress, so far as commercial intercourse is concerned. The reasons of the rule, therefore, forbidding alien enemies to sue, are just as applicable to resident citizens of the insurrectionary states now, as to the subjects of an adverse belligerent during a foreign war, viz., the necessity of stopping intercourse with the insurgents, and of preventing them from drawing supplies from the loyal states. Two countries cannot carry on war against each other whilst the citizens of each maintain and pursue all the conditions and relations of peace. Two nations cannot, in other words, be at war, and their citizens at peace. The fact of war makes all the citizens of each belligerent power, in law, the enemies respectively of each other. So in an insurrection, every loyal citizen is, in a certain sense, in a legal condition of hostility towards every insurgent. He is bound, when duly called upon, to aid in suppressing the insurrection; just as, in times of peace, he must become part of the posse, when summoned therefor, to assist in the arrest of an offender, and in the dispersion of those who obstruct the officer whilst attempting to enforce process. Indeed, every citizen not only may arrest, but ought to arrest, a criminal, flagrante delicto; and as an insurgent is a traitor, why is not every citizen clothed with power to arrest him when caught in the act of treason? In every such case, the offender, when so arrested, would be turned over to the civil magistrate. But in belligerent operations the government, for essential and universally recognised reasons, commissions officers, and musters forces under their command, to conduct its military affairs, and confines the conduct of war to them. Were this not done, gross irregularities, pillage, and general lawlessness might ensue, the policy of the government in prosecuting the contest be defeated, and each citizen, by assuming the attributes of sovereignty, thwart at will the great public purposes in view. Independent of the necessities of discipline, modern warfare forbids all private and irregular warfare, which is apt to degenerate into mere freebooting. War is the act of the state, and can be carried on lawfully only by the state.

Whether the war, or military operations, be carried on against a foreign nation, or revolted colony, or insurrectionary district, the inhabitants of such nation, colony, or district, may, in a legal point of view, be treated as occupying similar relations of hostility, so far as commercial transactions are to be affected. Such evidently is the scope and object of the act of July 13th, 1861, and such the relation in which the citizens of the insurrectionary states now stand towards the United States government. Their property afloat on the high seas, or being transported by land or water, for interdicted purposes, or unlawful commerce, is being used in violation of a positive prohibitory statute. So, whether viewed by the rules of public or municipal law, the same result would follow. As citizens, however, owing allegiance to the United States, the inhabitants of Tennessee are bound by that prohibitory statute. If quasi enemies, or even if treated as citizens of an adverse belligerent, they would be held to the same rules. In accordance with these doctrines, the United States circuit court for Missouri has held that, pending the insurrection, the resident citizens of the insurrectionary states cannot maintain suits in that court. But in the case now before this court, it is not necessary to decide all incidental propositions connected with such a rule. If the claimants, as citizens of Tennessee, have no personæ standi at this time, by force of the general rule which would treat them as quasi enemies, are they not entitled to be heard on producing a license to trade? During a foreign war, a sovereign may license one of his own subjects to trade with the enemy, and such license would exempt the latter and his licensed property from the ordinary penalties. But if, in the course of such licensed trade, a controversy should arise as to the right of property in a cargo, between him and a subject of the adverse belligerent, with whom he had negotiated the purchase thereof; and if that cargo should be the subject of adjudication before the courts of his sovereign, whether such an alien enemy would be permitted to contest the matter, or be treated as capable of having a standing in the court, by the implications resulting from the license, it is not now necessary to discuss. The reasons of the rule, viz., that all intercourse should cease, and that no property or proceeds thereof should be transferred from or to the adverse belligerent country, must, in such a case, have been decided by the sovereign to be inapplicable to that particular transaction, otherwise the license would not have been granted. The licensed person is permitted to trade, and as a necessary consequence to complete his sales and purchases. No sale or purchase could be made without two parties thereto. Whatever might be decided in such a case, or with respect to an alien enemy under license to trade, the proposition before this court has distinguishing features, which it may be well to first consider. The citizens of Tennessee are, as to their trade, quasi enemies. The Rapid [Case No. 11,576]. They are not enemies in the full legal signification of the term; for no citizen or subject is technically an enemy. In the law of treason, a subject may be a traitor, but never an "enemy," for the moment he is pronounced an enemy, he owes no allegiance, and cannot therefore be guilty of a breach of a nonexistent obligation. "Enemy," in a legal sense, is the equivalent of the Latin word "hostis," which implies that the person is a stranger to the country—a foreigner, an alien. Hence the rule, as laid down by publicists, that an alien enemy cannot sue, is so phrased because an alien may be in a state of amity as well as of enmity. As his persona standi depends on his friendly or hostile status, the term "enemy" is used in connection with the word "alien," to designate that hostile status. The claimants here are not aliens; they are not technically enemies; they are only "enemies in a qualified sense," as Justice Nelson has correctly said. They still owe paramount allegiance to the United States—are not citizens of any other recognised power. They are de jure subject to the United States laws. Those laws forbid them to carry on commercial intercourse with the loyal states, except on the conditions named. The prohibition rests not on the law of nations, but on a municipal statute or act of sovereignty, and the exception to the general prohibition is created by the same act. It probably was the intent of congress to allow such discriminations to be made between the loyal and disloyal in the insurrectionary states, as the exigencies of the government would from time to time permit. Hence the power lodged in the president by the terms of the proviso to the 5th section, under which the permit in this case was obtained; also the terms of section 8, as to remission of forfeitures. The condition of quasi enmity, under which all inhabitants of Tennessee were placed by the proclamation, was subject therefore to those exceptions, as to districts and persons, which the president might make from time to time. The temporary disqualification covering all its inhabitants, is removed as to those who have special exemptions granted to them, which exemptions are evidenced by licenses duly obtained. Alienage, the president could not remove if it existed; but the legal status of quasi enmity or hostility as to districts, or individuals thereof, he is especially empowered to remove. Hence, the simple fact that the claimants are citizens of Tennessee, might, in the absence of any other fact, deprive them temporarily of the right to sue, or appear as claimants here; but when the other fact is proved, that they have been relieved of that temporary disability, their persona standi in judicio must be considered as fully restored. Such is the rule under this statute, and such is also the rule, as will be shown, in analogous cases during foreign wars. But was said license or "permit" lawfully or fraudulently procured? This question has a double aspect. If it were not valid, then have the claimants personæ standi? Are they exempt from the general rule of disability or disqualification? And on the other hand, if it is fraudulent or invalid, then the goods were forfeited, wholly irrespective of the citizenship or personal status of the claimants. It is impossible, therefore, to decide that question without reaching a conclusion covering both points; that is, without ascertaining a fact which, if found, would be at the same time good, both in abatement and in bar. In some stages of a case it might be important to treat the question distinctively, in reference to one or the other of those pleas; but as the formal plea in abatement, or exceptive allegation, raises the question only in an inconclusive form, it is better to consider the case upon the merits rather than on the mere technical plea or exceptive allegation. The regulations of the secretary of the treasury require, among other things, that the applicants for a permit shall submit true copies of the invoices, shall swear to their accuracy, shall take the oath of loyalty, and, if residents of a state heretofore proclaimed in insurrection, shall produce a recommendation from some duly authorized officer. In order, then, to receive such a permit, an affidavit had to be made, complying with those requirements; and as all shipments of whiskey were forbidden, except under special circumstances (the existence of which is not pretended in this case), it is evident that there was no disclosure of the real facts,—indeed, that there was a false affidavit filed at the custom-house. Harman made the application in the name of Hicks & Cocke, but the application, affidavit, invoices, recommendation, and oath of loyalty, are not produced in evidence here, nor is any one of those documents shown to the court. If the permit carries with it the usual presumption, that whatever is done by a public officer, is presumed to have been rightly done (omnia rite acta), then is not that presumption repelled by the proof that twenty-one half-barrels of whiskey were included in the permit, in direct violation of the regulations? The whiskey was concealed in barrels of salt, manifesting a design to defraud the government. Is it not also to be presumed, that if the invoice had mentioned whiskey, the officer would have done his duty by refusing a permit therefor? The claimants must bring themselves within the exceptions—the onus is on them—and when the permit is shown to have been, as to part of the goods included in it, obtained through fraud and false swearing, what credit is to be given to that paper?

Without stopping here to inquire whether such a permit, based on fraud, would be received as good for any purpose?—whether a person who has to make good his claim through such a document, will receive the aid of the court, under any circumstances, in unravelling the same, so as to separate the false from the true?—whether a false documentation is not always fatal, unless used merely to save property from the enemy?—or whether a person, acting through an agent who perpetrates a fraud, is not bound by the acts of that agent when he avails himself of what was done?—or, in other words, whether a principal is permitted to hold on to all the benefits of a fraudulent act, and at the same time escape from all the disadvantages thereof?—without going into those general inquiries, or determining whether the fraudulent act must not be repudiated or affirmed as a whole, it may be sufficient for this case to look at the testimony closely, so far as the same touches the claimants personally and directly. There is no dispute that the permit was made by fraud and false swearing, to cover the packages in which the whiskey was concealed. It appears that Cocke, who was in St. Louis at the time, did not visit the custom-house at all. Harman acted for himself and for the claimants. He used the names of the latter to cover the prohibited articles, and procured a permit in their names, in which they are licensed both as the shippers and the persons to whom, in Jackson, the goods were to be delivered. Did the claimants know of the fraudulent use to which their names were put, and assent thereto? Independent of direct testimony, it would seem probable that persons coming here under the circumstances, and knowing the necessity of procuring a permit, and the consequence of not complying with the law, would ascertain first, whether a permit had been obtained, and secondly, whether it was correct. If Harman had caused his own goods and those of the claimants to be included in one permit, then there must have been some reason therefor. If he had not been previously empowered to use their names, why, before affirming his act or adopting it, did they not ascertain the truth? Their names had been used to cover a fraud; their goods were included in the same document with contraband goods; the whole lot, honest and fraudulent, was consigned to them; they were represented as the owners of the whole, yet they rested content therewith, without inquiry or precaution. The regulations required an oath of loyalty from the applicant himself, and a recommendation from some public officer as to his fitness to receive the goods. By looking at the permit, they must have seen that some one had evidently personated them, and represented them to be the shippers of fifty-eight packages, instead of only twenty-nine. They knew whether they had made the required affidavit; whether they had produced the needed recommendation, or furnished true copies of their invoices, and whether their invoices covered fifty-eight packages. If they did not make the application in person, did they intrust Harman with their papers, and constitute him their agent for the purpose? The testimony throws no light upon the subject. Harman swears "that neither said Hicks nor Cocke knew anything of the contraband nature of the goods shipped (the whiskey) under the same license or permit issued to said firm of Hicks & Cocke." That is very vague. When did they not know?—and why did Harman venture to make a fraudulent use of their names and papers? He could have explained the whole transaction by his testimony, and why did he not do so? His silence is suggestive. He is the only witness produced to clear up the triple fraud, and he stands before the court confessedly guilty of fraud and false swearing in this very transaction. True, Haskell swears that neither Hicks nor Cocke was present at the purchase or shipment of the whiskey, and states that Harman & Daily said to him their goods were consigned to Hicks & Cocke to save expense. That statement was evidently false; at least to the extent of creating the false impression that no other purpose induced that consignment. It is obvious that the design of Harman & Daily was fraudulent, and that their acts were equally so. As to their conduct no dispute exists. No claim is interposed for the whiskey. The simple inquiry under this head is concerning the part which these claimants took in the transaction; whether they were cognisant thereof, and suffered their names to be used for the contraband purpose. "Noscitur a sociis." Does their failure to take the proper steps to procure for themselves the necessary permit, and their adoption of that obtained by Harman for them, place them in the dilemma of either having no permit at all, or of having a fraudulent one? either alternative being fatal to their claim. Law, 313, 314; 1 Kent, Comm. 143. Justice Story held in such cases that nothing but the most explicit proofs by the claimants could relieve the transaction of the presumption of illegality which arises from the fraudulent character of the papers. The Emulous [Case No. 4,479]. Similar views were expressed in The Rugen, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 62; The Pizarro, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 241; The Dos Hermanos, Id. 76; The Venus, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 127; The London Packet, Id. 132. Indeed, that principle is a clear one, in the light of sound morals, right reason, and settled adjudications. A claimant, as actor in a cause, appears before a court to make out his right to restitution. When the documents on which he relies are fraudulent, he must certainly clear himself of the taint before his claim can be established. Doubtful or unsatisfactory testimony will not suffice. Nothing but a legal permit would entitle him to restitution. These claimants produce an illegal and fraudulent paper, and offer an excuse, personal to themselves, for the fraudulent character of that document, which, if legally permissible, they must sustain by the clearest evidence. Considering the statute, however, as the exercise of municipal or intra-territorial sovereignty, prohibiting certain commercial operations, the claimants, no matter where residing within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, were bound thereby, irrespective of state citizenship or residence. All citizens, loyal or disloyal, are alike subject to the law. Hence, a decision of the question as to such citizenship or residence, on the one hand, or as to the loyalty or disloyalty of claimants, on the other, is not necessary in this case. The analogies drawn from the laws of war, as laid down by publicists, may assist in solving the constitutional questions which arise concerning the powers of the federal government in suppressing insurrections, and may aid also in the interpretation of the statutes passed concerning such a condition of hostilities; but the case before the court is not one to be decided by international law, but by municipal statutes. The voyage was not between this and a foreign country during a foreign war, does not affect any supposed neutral right, and necessarily involves, therefore, no doctrine of international law regulating warlike operations between foreign belligerents. The questions are intra-territorial entirely, and relate solely to the powers and duties of the federal government, intra-territorially, under the constitution. As the power of that government to pass the act in question and to enforce the same, is conceded, or if not conceded, was satisfactorily demonstrated and decided in this court last November, the views expressed now might have been confined exclusively to the interpretation of the statute itself, and the application of its provisions to the case presented. The position of foreign nations with respect to this insurrection, it must be remembered, does not determine its status in American courts. The latter follow exclusively the decision of the political department of the United States government on that question. Even if other nations had recognised the so-called Confederate government as an independent power, their recognition would bind themselves and their subjects alone—not the United States. Those foreign nations which have recognised a state of belligerency, and assumed the position of neutrals, estop their subjects from disputing the lawfulness of captures on the high seas, according to the laws of maritime warfare. The ships and cargoes of their subjects are to be judged accordingly. But rebel property thus captured is amenable to municipal authority. All American courts are bound to treat the insurrectionary states as integral parts of the Union, and subject to its constitution and laws. In the adjudication of all such questions arising here, the United States statutes would furnish the rules of decisions. In other words, as to all foreign nations, the United States government is absolutely sovereign within its own territorial limits, and over its own subjects. Its internal constitution is a subject with which foreign powers have no right to intermeddle. The equality and independence of nations could not otherwise exist. However much the great powers of Europe have, in times past, violated that rule, they have so far recognised its rightfulness, as to offer, always, in excuse for their violations of it some real or supposed emergency, which they claimed worked a legitimate exception to its otherwise universal application—thus doing homage to the principle even when practically assailing it.

To what extent, therefore, sovereignty is lodged in any department of our government, is an intra-territorial question exclusively. It is not to be solved by the law of nations, but by constitutional law. Each nation must settle for itself the policy of its municipal code. True, in modern civilization, the so-called public opinion of the world is not to be despised, but it is no more the law of nations than is popular opinion at home the municipal law. Public opinion, ever shifting, cannot be substituted by courts for constitutions and statute books. "Misera est servitus, ubi jus est vagum aut incertum." The statute of July 13th, 1861, is a prohibitory statute. As an act of prohibition, its violation is not necessarily or generally dependent on questions of intent. As a measure of great public policy, congress determined that all commercial intercourse mentioned therein should be stopped, except on prescribed conditions. Mistakes, accidents, or absence of evil intentions, form no exceptions. There must be no commercial intercourse, except on the conditions named—"Ita lex scripta est." If, however, a case arises calling for a relaxation of its rigor, the 8th section of the act provides a mode for securing a remission of the penalty. [The Friendschaft] 4 Wheat. [17 U. In the absence of a license, then, whatever goods, wares, or merchandise are seized whilst "proceeding to" an interdicted state, must be condemned. But, as in this case a license existed, it is proper to consider more fully the rules governing such transactions.

It has been clearly settled, that a license granted to an alien enemy removes all his disabilities; that the trade as to him becomes lawful, and his persona standi is restored. 1 Duer, Ins. 606; 3 Taunt. 555; 13 East, 332; 5 Taunt. 674; 15 East, 419, 525. As the license is an act of sovereignty, it is to be construed, as to the grantee, stricti juris. In some cases it has been treated strictissimi juris, and in others liberally. It is apprehended, however, that the apparent contradictions and confusion referred to in text-books, concerning the rule of construction, have no real existence. This fundamental rule of construction is adhered to in all the adjudicated cases, viz., that whilst private grants are to be construed most strictly against the grantor, public grants are interpreted most strictly against the grantee. The design or intent of the sovereign granting the license cannot be ignored, and the licensee must confine himself strictly within the terms of his license. Whenever a liberal construction is given to its terms, it is for the purpose of effecting the object for which it was granted; of carrying out the intent of the sovereign, and not of the grantee. Its validity depends on the good faith with which it was procured. If terms or conditions precedent are named, they must be complied with. Any fraudulent conduct, misrepresentation, or suppression of material facts renders it void, ab initio. 2 Wildm. Int. Law, 250; 1 Duer, Ins. 594, 602; 5 C. Rob. Adm. 269; 6 C. Rob. It is not negotiable, and cannot be used to cover the property of other persons than those named, or any property not named. The licensee cannot use it to cover even the property of those for whom he sees fit to act as agent. 2 Dod. 48; 1 Dod. 508; 1 Taunt. 122; 16 East, 3; 2 Wildm. Int. Law, 254; 4 C. Rob. Adm. 263, 267. A slight deviation as to quantity, when not attributable to design, or involving fraud, will not be held fatal; but no deviation as to quality of goods is permissible. Each case will be scrutinized so as to reach the bona fides of the transaction, and effect the sovereign's intent. Quantity may not always be of importance, but quality; that is, a difference in kind, or as to the contraband character of goods, may be of serious import. 1 Edw. 363, 365, 371, 336, 337; 1 Dod. 241; 4 C. Rob. Adm. 11, 96; 5 C. Rob. Adm. 141. A fraudulent application always vitiates the license, and exposes to confiscation all goods embraced within it, whether innocent or contraband in quality; nor in all cases is the fraudulent applicant the only party who suffers. A person whose goods are included in the terms of the license, may be deprived of its protection, although he was not a party to the fraud. 1 Duer. Ins. 618. The grantee, when named, must be truly described, and the privilege granted must be exercised by him in the character which the licensee attributes to him. 14 East, 484; 4 Taunt, 605; 1 Bing. 473. If it requires the goods to belong to him, he must prove property, absolute or special, to be in him, and a consignment to him by a general bill of lading is not sufficient. 1 Duer Ins. 606. Similar doctrines run through the cases in all branches of this department of law. Thus all goods on a vessel, belonging to the same owner, share the fate of the contraband portion. 3 Phil. Ev. § 275; 1 Duer, Ins. 625; 4 C. Rob. Adm. 199, 260; 5 C. Rob. Adm. 275, 325, and cases cited in U. S. v. One Hundred and Twenty-Nine Packages, supra. By the ancient rule, a ship with contraband cargo on board was lawful prize, but by the modern, she is not condemned therefor, although she always suffers the loss of freight and expenses. If her destination, however, was false, or her owner was in privity with the contraband shipper, or was guilty of concealment, or of misconduct, or was owner of any part of the contraband cargo, or in any manner tainted with the contraband transaction, then his interest in the ship is confiscable. 3 Phil. Ev. § 276; 1 Duer, Ins. 625; 1 Act. 25; 1 C. Rob. Adm. 288, 329; 16 East, 13; 3 C. Rob. Adm. 178, 221, 295; 2 C. Rob. Adm. 6; 6 C. Rob. Adm. 125; 4 C. Rob. Adm. 68; 1 Duer, Ins. 594 et seq. It is thus seen that the doctrine of licenses, as laid down by publicists and courts, requires the licensee to act in entire good faith; first in procuring the license, and next in the use made of it. He is always held to the terms of the grant. If it is confined in its privileges to a particular person, or to that person as acting in a specified capacity, or to particular kinds of goods, or to trade between named ports, or to specified voyages, or routes of travel, it cannot be used otherwise. If the modes of procuring it are specifically defined, there must be no material deviation therefrom. It is, in short, a special privilege granted by the sovereign, not for the benefit of the grantee, but for the good of the state. The sovereign, therefore, determines on what conditions the grant is to be made, and in what manner the privilege may be used. Every one of his subjects, and every subject of the adverse belligerent, having been placed in a condition of legal hostility by the sovereign act of declaring war, no one can be excepted therefrom without another exercise of the same sovereign power. To what extent and under what circumstances the rigors of war, as to a particular person or place, may be relaxed, the sovereign alone can determine. His decision is based on grave reasons of state policy, connected with the objects for which the war is waged, or with its successful prosecution. If he deems it wise, in furtherance of the national design, to permit one of his own subjects, or even an alien enemy, to carry on a particular trade, or prosecute a particular voyage, or hold prescribed intercourse between the adverse belligerents, he can grant the necessary license therefor, on such conditions, and subject to such restrictions or limitations, as he deems the public good demands. The paramount consideration in all such cases is the public good, and the licensee must, in no respect, lose sight thereof, or fail to act in entire good faith with respect to any of the conditions or terms of the license granted to him.

The act of July 13th, 1861, the supplementary act of May 20th, 1862, and the regulations for permits, are based on similar legal principles. All commercial intercourse with Tennessee is prohibited, except in such cases as are licensed, and the licensees must always confine themselves strictly to the terms of the grant, and be in nowise guilty of thwarting the national objects for which such grants are made. As the leading object of the government is the suppression of the existing insurrection, and consequent restoration of constitutional supremacy over all the insurrectionary states, its policy in the furtherance of that object, as the competent authorities have decided, demands temporary suspension of all commercial intercourse with the insurrectionary districts, except under specified circumstances. What those circumstances may justify, from time to time, is to be ascertained from the regulations as made. The application of these rules to the case under consideration leaves no room for doubt. The claimants, in person, complied with none of the required conditions. Harman was their agent, or he was not. If he was their agent, by authority previously derived from them, or by their subsequent ratification, they are bound by his acts. The permit which he procured was obtained by false invoices and false swearing. He evidently was furnished with copies of their invoices, either by themselves or by their vendors; and from the evidence it is manifest that the copies must have been obtained from them. That permit is therefore fraudulent and void. But whether he was their agent or not, it is the only permit under which the goods were shipped. From the evidence in the cause, they have not satisfactorily explained their connection therewith. It was for them, by clear and explicit proofs, to establish their case. They have not done so. Their goods stand affected by the fraud, and must share the fate of the contraband articles. If Harman was not their agent in this transaction, then they shipped the goods in dispute without any permit whatever, and the same legal consequence follows. Independent of the apparent fraud, the permit covered none of Harman & Daily's goods, and could not be lawfully used for such a purpose. They were not named in the permit as applicants or consignees. The license was personal to Hicks & Cocke; it covered only their shipments; it was not negotiable or transferable; it could not be made to include anything not specified in it. The attempt to use it otherwise, worked a forfeiture of the whole shipment. The claim is dismissed, with costs, and the property declared forfeited.

INTERNAL REVENUE—INFORMERS—WHO ARE—OFFICERS.

1. Under section 179 of the act of 1864 [13 Stat. 305], as amended by that of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 145), officers of internal revenue may, in many cases, be informers.

2. The informer, under that statute, is he who first gives to some officer authorized to act upon it information which leads, in fact, to the seizure and forfeiture.

[Cited in U. S. v. Card, Case No. 14,720a.]

3. An officer who obtains such information through the examination of witnesses compelled to testify before the grand jury, or one who acts on information furnished him as an officer, and intended by his informant to be given the government, and does not discover new facts by his own diligence, or who merely makes certain what was suspected, is not the informer.

These four lots of whiskey, amounting in all to two hundred barrels, were seized in Boston and informed against under section 45 of the statute of July 13, 1866, c. 184 (14 Stat. 163), and, after default, were condemned and sold. Against the proceeds of sale seven persons filed petitions as informers.

It appeared, in evidence, that in August, 1867, three hundred barrels of whiskey were taken from a warehouse (class A) attached to Perry's distillery in Buffalo, upon bonds for transportation to a certain warehouse in Boston. The bonds were not in evidence; but it was said to be the course of business, that goods so taken might be sent to any lawful warehouse in the designated district, and that thirty days were usually allowed for the transportation, and that the bonds gave thirty days' time for the transportation. When such goods reach the warehouse, the collector and certain other officers of the district should examine the goods, and compare them with the permits, and certify that they had been received in warehouse, and their gauge, &c., and when this certificate was produced to the collector of the former district, and payment had been made for any loss by leakage or otherwise beyond what is allowed by law, the transportation bonds would be cancelled. In this case, certificates in due form were produced to Mr. Root, the collector at Buffalo; and Mr. Sprague, a deputy collector there, examined them, and discovered errors and discrepancies in carrying out or adding some of the figures, and the collector, at his request, sent them back to General McCartney, the collector here, for correction. Mr. McCartney at once discovered that the certificates were forged, and so telegraphed to Mr. Root, who, in reply, asked that the facts might be kept secret for a time, until he could make further investigation. Some days after, Mr. Root sent Mr. Hawley, a special revenue agent, to Boston, with instructions to investigate the fraud. Mr. Hawley found that General McCartney had gone to Washington, but he consulted with the assessor and with the district attorney, and some other officers, and then went with Mr. Sanderson, an inspector, to the station of the Albany Railroad Company, where they examined books and made other inquiries, and discovered that the whiskey had been brought to Boston and delivered at a certain storehouse. Here they lost trace of it; but they obtained the names of some of the teamsters who had carried it either to or from the storehouse. These facts and names they reported to Mr. Hyde, assistant district attorney, who summoned the teamsters before the grand jury, then in session, and by his inquiries thus prosecuted—but how immediately or remotely his results depended on Hawley's information did not at all appear—he was led to suspect that some of the whiskey had been carried to certain places in Boston. Many searches were made, and many of the conjectures proved to be unfounded; others were more fortunate. Among other things, Mr. Hyde told Mr. Horton, an inspector, that some contraband whiskey would probably be found in some warehouse in Lowell street; and Mr. Horton proceeded to examine the warehouses in that street, and in one of them found one hundred barrels, part of the goods which were seized and condemned. There were no inspection marks whatever upon these barrels; and whether or not they were a part of the Perry whiskey was disputed, and there was but little evidence upon the subject. Mr. Hyde afterwards received some information of a vague character, which led him to suspect that some of the whiskey would be found in the warehouse of a Mr. Johnson, on or near Northampton street, if Mr. Johnson had any such warehouse, which was only suspected. He asked Mr. Hayes, an inspector, to search; and Hayes found such a warehouse, and the fifty barrels proceeded against in one of these suits. By their marks they appeared to be a part of the Perry whiskey. Again, Mr. Hyde traced, as he thought, a part of the spirits to the shop of certain persons on Worcester street, and there lost the clew, and he told Mr. King, who keeps a stable near that shop, that if he would find the goods he would be entitled as informer; Mr. King succeeded in finding the twenty barrels. These had no inspection marks. The remaining thirty barrels were seized by Mr. Hayes, upon information given him by W. H. Swift that certain barrels were stored in a cellar, hired by the informant's brother, in Federal street, under suspicious circumstances. The marks upon these barrels warranted the inference that they were from Perry's distillery. Swift testified that he had no knowledge of the search for Perry's whiskey, or of any facts excepting those which he himself discovered. Mr. Sprague, the deputy collector in Buffalo, alleged himself to be the first informer in all the cases, because he discovered the clerical errors which led to the discovery of the forgery; General McCartney did the like, because he first discovered the forgery which rendered it certain or highly probable that some fraud had been committed; and Mr. Hawley, likewise, because he discovered some facts which enabled Mr. Hyde to discover others which led to the seizure of much of the whiskey; Mr. Horton claimed against the hundred barrels which he seized in Lowell street; Mr. Hayes against the fifty found by him in Johnson's warehouse; and Mr. King and Mr. Swift against the twenty and thirty barrels discovered by them respectively.

LOWELL, District Judge. The statute under which the petitioners proceed is section 179 of the statute of 1864, as amended by that of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 145, 146), which declares that all fines, penalties, and forfeitures which may be imposed or incurred (under the act), may be sued for, &c., and that a certain part shall be to the use of the person, to be ascertained by the court which shall have imposed or decreed any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, who shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing whereby such fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred.

A good deal of stress was laid, in the argument, upon this language; and it was contended that no one was included in its terms who did not give information of the precise fraud, by the commission of which the goods became liable to forfeiture. My opinion is, that the meaning of this law is not substantially different from that of the customs act of 1799, § 91 (1 Stat. 697), which gives the share in one clause to the person in pursuance of whose information the forfeiture, &c., are recovered, and in another, to any officer of a revenue cutter in consequence of whose information they are recovered. "Fines, penalties, and disabilities are not incurred," says Mr. Justice Thompson, "and do not accrue in the technical sense of the terms until judgment. U. S. v. Morris, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 299. In the ninth section of the act of 1866 (14 Stat. 101), the share of the fine therein referred to is for the person who shall give the information whereby it is imposed; and in still another section, the share is to go to the informer, if there be any, without further description. Under this statute, as under the other, and under the ordinary offers of reward for detection of a criminal or discovery of lost property, the first informer is he who first gives to a person authorized to receive it important information, which, in fact, leads to the desired result. And the offer is not necessarily confined to persons who shall expose the details of the fraud. Thus, if the government officers were already aware of the offence, but were unable to trace the goods, and the informer supplied the necessary facts; or if the informer, without knowing precisely what fraud had been perpetrated, knew of suspicious circumstances sufficient to justify a seizure, &c.; in these and similar cases, the person who gave the information by which the forfeiture was in fact decreed or imposed, would be within the fair intent of the act.

Accordingly, I have no hesitation in deciding that W. H. Swift is the first informer in respect to the thirty barrels found in his brother's warehouse in Federal street. It was in consequence of his information that they were seized and forfeited, and it does not appear that any facts of importance were furnished by any one else; and whether he was fully cognizant of the cause which rendered them liable to forfeiture or not, he was sufficiently so for all the practical purposes of the government. All the information it already had would have been useless without him, and his was sufficient, independently of what they possessed. It is not essential that an informer should act as prosecutor or be called as a witness; it is enough that the result is in fact reached primarily through his means. Sawyer v. Steele [Case No. 12,406]; Besse v. Dyer, 9 Allen, 151; Crawshaw v. Roxbury, 7 Gray, 374; Smith v. Moore, 1 C. B. 438.

Similar considerations govern the case of King. The officers had exhausted their clew, and had traced the whiskey as far as they could, and abandoned the search, and the assistant district attorney, who gave King some information, makes no claim. It is clear that one who does not choose to be an informer may enable another to become so, even as against his own subsequent demand. Fallick v. Barber, 1 Maule & S. 108. And it appears to me that Mr. King is entitled to the benefit of whatever knowledge he derived from Mr. Hyde, and is the informer in respect to the twenty barrels which he discovered. I do not mean to say that Mr. Hyde could himself be the informer.

The cases of the several officers of the revenue service present more difficulty. If the point were new, it might perhaps be open to argument that an inspector or other officer owes his whole time to the government, and that there is no consideration for a promise to pay him a further reward for the zealous discharge of his duty. But the treasury department and the courts have acquiesced in the decision of Judge Ware, in Hooper v. 51 Casks of Brandy [Case No. 6,674], and it must be taken as settled that an officer of the revenue may, in some cases, be an informer. And the practice has been similar under the internal revenue laws, and rightly, as the statutes themselves show. Still it is clear that an officer cannot always be considered an informer merely because he as an officer acquires information useful to the government. If this knowledge is acquired in the ordinary discharge of his duty touching the very subject-matter, or under a special retainer to investigate that matter, I cannot hold him entitled to a gratuity.

I may take an illustration from the case of Mr. Hyde, whose information appears to have been of great use to the government, but who, in pursuance of a settled policy adopted in the district attorney's office, makes no claim as informer. His knowledge was obtained by the examination before the grand jury on oath of witnesses whom he compelled to attend; in other words, it was obtained by virtue of the great powers which the government confides to its prosecuting officers; but it is evident that the information obtained by the exercise of such a power must be for the use of the government in whose name and behalf it is demanded of the witnesses, and not for that of the prosecuting officer, the jury, or the witnesses themselves.

Similar considerations apply to all officers who are clothed with the duty of making an investigation on behalf of the government, whether with more or less ample powers. In my view the cases in which an officer may be an informer are, where he incidentally and not in the direct prosecution or course of his duty or of any special retainer for that purpose, makes a discovery; as if an inspector put on board a vessel merely to keep the cargo safely, discovers smuggled goods concealed; or where an officer sent to inquire into a particular charge discovers something entirely different and before unsuspected; or where he is told by some one, as a friend and not as an officer, of facts which his informant, not wishing to be known, refuses to bring forward himself, but tells him for the very purpose of enabling him to give information in his own name; in these cases an officer may be informer. I do not at present think of any others.

Mr. Hawley's case, which has given me more trouble than any other, must be governed by these considerations. In my judgment his retainer as a revenue agent, under pay, to investigate these frauds, makes his time the time of the government, and his information the information of the government, and he cannot justly lay claim to any share of this reward.

And so of General McCartney and Mr. Sprague. They merely in the course of their duty pointed out to the persons to whom they were bound to point them out, the mistake in figures and the forgery which they respectively discovered; they had no choice to give or withhold the information, and their action had no reference to any forfeiture. I doubt if the fact in either case was of sufficient importance to entitle them as informers; but if it were, its bearing on the forfeiture was only incidental; the act was a mere statement of a fact occurring in the course of their business, which they could not but state if they did their duty, and the mere stating of which cannot make them informers in the sense of the law.

Mr. Horton and Mr. Hayes were merely the seizing officers, and I have held before, and shall continue to hold until otherwise instructed by superior authority, that an officer who has merely followed instructions and made a seizure which he was asked to make, although he may have exercised great skill and ingenuity, is not an informer. A recent customs act gives the seizing officer a share of forfeitures in cases where there is no informer, and I dare say this law may be wise and expedient so long as the policy of paying informers is adhered to, but it only confirms the view that a seizing officer, as such, is not an informer. It is strongly urged that the barrels seized by Mr. Horton are not proved to be a part of the Perry whiskey, and that if they are not he is the sole discoverer, because Mr. Hyde sent him to find only Perry's whiskey. But in such a case the burden is very strongly upon the officer to show that they are different. He was asked to look in Lowell street for contraband whiskey, without any particular description of it; he looked there and found some, and there is very little evidence either way concerning the article found. The presumption is almost irresistible that it is the same whiskey he was looking for. The argument that this whiskey, if Perry's, ought to have been condemned under a different section of the statute, proves too much; for eighty of the barrels were Perry's, and were condemned under this section. That argument might have availed a claimant; but as it is admitted that Perry's whiskey was liable to forfeiture under another clause, and as there was no defence, it may well be that the court did not inquire as carefully as it otherwise might have done, whether the evidence pointed more strongly to one or another violation of the act. I do not mean to say, however, that there was not sufficient prima facie evidence to entitle the government, in a defaulted action, to a condemnation under section 45.

Upon the whole, I grant the petitions of King and Swift, and deny the others. Ordered accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. ONE HUNDRED BARRELS OF HIGH WINES.

[23 Int. Rev. Rec. 10.]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Dec. 17, 1876.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FORFEITURE—INNOCENT PURCHASER.

[1. Cited in Boyd v. U. S., Case No. 1,749, to the point that ownership, at the time of the seizure, by the guilty party, was necessary to bring the property within the operation of the clause of forfeiture of section 44 of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 142).]

[2. Cited in U. S. v. Feigelstock, Case No. 15,084, to the point that the forfeiture operates not when the statute is violated, but at the time of the seizure of the property.]

This case was instituted by the United States to forfeit one hundred barrels of high wines found in the possession of Ulman and Co., of Baltimore. The information alleged that the liquor was "distilled spirits owned by one G. G. Russell, who carried on the business of distiller in the First internal revenue district of Illinois, with the intent to defraud the United States out of the tax on the spirits by him distilled, and who, whilst so carrying on his business with such intent, distilled the high wines aforesaid, contrary to section 3281 of the Revised Statutes." Ulman and Co. pleaded in defence that at the time of the seizure they were the owners of the liquor and not Russell, and that they were bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration, without knowledge of fraud. The United States demurred to their plea, and the case was tried before GILES, District Judge, in the district court last March.

It was maintained by the government that said Russell, at the time the high wines were sold, was carrying on an illicit distillery. The spirits in question were fraudulent, and could be followed into the hands of innocent purchasers and seized wherever found; that forfeiture took place at the time of distillation and not at the time of finding and the fact of the tax being paid and the barrels being properly marked, branded and stamped, which was the present case, made no difference.

The court decided that if this view was correct it would destroy the whole liquor trade, and that no purchaser would be safe; that the law applied to spirits owned by the illicit distiller, and not to those in the possession of bona fide purchasers, when the tax had been paid and all the requirements of the law had been complied with, and therefore overruled the demurrer and decreed in favor of Messrs. Ulman and Co. [Case unreported.] The United States took an appeal to the circuit court, and Dec. 17th, BOND, Circuit Judge, affirmed the decision of the district court.

The government has an appeal to the supreme court at Washington, the amount involved being over $7,000.

INTERNAL REVENUE—TAX ON DISTILLERIES—FORFEITURES—INNOCENT PURCHASER.

1. The courts will not construe a law imposing a forfeiture, as extending to property which, before seizure, has been sold to a person innocent of the offense by which the forfeiture is incurred, and who has purchased in good faith, unless the intention of congress that the forfeiture should be absolute and instantaneous on the commission of the offense, be manifest and unmistakable.

2. Revenue laws inflicting penalties for their violation, are not to be construed strictly, nor with excess of liberality; but in such a manner, looking at their policy, purpose, spirit, and language, as will best effectuate the legislative intention.

3. Under the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 98), a removal by a distiller, of spirits distilled by him, from the place of distillation to a bonded warehouse, is a legal act; and it cannot be predicated of such a removal, where this is the only overt act charged, that it was done to defraud the United States of the tax thereon, so as to bring the case within those contemplated by section 14 of the act.

4. Under the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866, as amended March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483), distilled spirits purchased in good faith by the claimant, while they were in a bonded warehouse of the United States, to whose collector he paid the taxes due thereon, cannot afterwards be seized in his hands and condemned as forfeited by reason of the previous failure of the distiller in the course of the manufacture thereof, to keep the books and to make the tri-monthly reports required of him by law.

5. Repeals by implication are not favored, particularly in revenue laws, and will only be held to exist when the repugnance is positive, and then only to the extent of such repugnance.

[2] [Reversed in 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 44.]

6. Section 5 of the act of March 31, 1868 (15 Stat. 58), is not a repeal of that part of section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483), which denounces penalties against distillers, for failing to make the entries and reports required of them by law.

7. The legislation of congress respecting forfeitures against distillers,—reviewed; and the conclusion reached that it shows a uniform policy, from the beginning, not to extend forfeitures to property in the hands of innocent third persons.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Missouri.]

Hearing upon a writ of error.

This cause was a proceeding in rem commenced in the United States district court for the Eastern district of Missouri, against one hundred barrels of distilled spirits, to enforce a forfeiture for violations of internal revenue laws.

It was alleged in the information, and admitted by the claimant in his answer, that seizure was made on land, in St. Louis, by the collector, September 1, 1868.

The fourth count of the information was in these words: "Fourth. That the said one hundred barrels of spirits were manufactured at some place within the United States to the said district-attorney unknown, and between the first day of September, A. D. 1866, and the date of said seizure, by some person or persons to the said attorney unknown, and were there and then goods and commodities on which tax was there and then imposed by provisions of law, and the same were removed from the place where distilled, with intent to defraud the United States of such tax, the same being then and there unpaid, contrary to the form of the statutes in such case made and provided."

The fifth count in the information was as follows: "Fifth. That said spirits were manufactured at some place within the United States to said attorney unknown, between September 1, 1866, and the date of the seizure, September 1, 1868, by the use of certain boilers, stills, and other vessels, of which said unknown person or persons there and then had the superintendence, and that during the time said unknown person or persons carried on the business aforesaid, and both before said spirits were distilled, and while they were in his or their possession, said unknown person or persons neglected and refused from day to day to make or cause to be made a true and exact entry in a book kept in such form as the commissioner of internal revenue has prescribed, of the number of pounds and gallons of materials used for the purpose of producing spirits distilled, the number of gallons of spirits placed in warehouse, and the proof thereof, the number of gallons sold, with the proof thereof, and the name, &c., of the person to whom sold, contrary," &c.

The sixth count was the same as the fifth, just quoted, as to the manufacture of the spirits, and charged that the person having superintendence of the distillery: "Both before said spirits were distilled and afterward, and while the same were in his possession, did neglect and refuse on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, to render the assessor, or assistant assessor, an account in duplicate, taken from his books in the particulars hereinbefore (in the fifth count of the information) mentioned of all the facts occurring after the last day of account preceding, contrary, &c., whereby and by force of said statutes the said property became and is forfeited to the uses in said statutes specified." One Henderson, of New Orleans, appeared as claimant, and filed an answer denying the material averments of the information as to grounds of forfeiture, and alleging "that said one hundred barrels of spirits were purchased by him while the same were in a bonded warehouse, and that he, the claimant, paid the tax imposed thereon by law before he moved the same from said bonded warehouse," &c.

The parties waived a jury, and submitted the cause to the court upon the following agreed statement of facts: "It is stipulated and agreed as follows: First. That John Henderson, claimant, purchased said spirits while in a bonded warehouse in New Orleans, after the same had been placed therein by the owner of the distillery at which they were made; that the claimant paid to the United States collector the taxes due on the said spirits, and moved the same from the said warehouse according to law, without knowledge on the part of Henderson, at any time before seizure, of any fraud on the part of the distiller, either actual or alleged; that he was an innocent and bona fide purchaser, and himself paid the tax on the spirits. Second. That Henderson shipped them to St. Louis, and had constructive possession thereof when they were seized. Third. That said spirits were manufactured and distilled in Louisiana in May and June, 1868, in a distillery run in the name of N. Johnson, by the use of boilers, stills, &c., of which Johnson was superintendent and owner; and that each and all the facts averred in the fifth and sixth counts of the information (above copied), averred as to a certain unknown person, are true as to said Johnson and the said spirits. Fourth. That the fourth count in the information (above copied) is true; but that the said Henderson, claimant, subsequently to the removal from the distillery, and before the removal from the bonded warehouse, and before the seizure, paid the tax on said spirits, and was a bona fide and innocent purchaser thereof. Fifth. That said Henderson was not a purchaser from the United States, and the United States at no time sold said spirits."

[No evidence was produced, and on the facts above stipulated the court adjudged that the property in question was not forfeited. To reverse this judgment the United States sued out the writ of error which brings the case into this court.][3]

The attorney for the United States founded his claim for a forfeiture upon the facts alleged in the fourth count of the information above copied, under section 14 of the act of July 10, 1866 (14 Stat. 151), which is as follows: "That in case of goods or commodities for or in respect whereof any tax is or shall be imposed, or any materials, utensils, or vessels proper or intended to be made use of for or in the making of such goods and commodities shall be removed, or shall be deposited or concealed in any place, with the intention to defraud the United States of such tax or any part thereof, all such goods and commodities and all such materials, utensils, and vessels respectively, shall be forfeited," together with casks, vessels, cases, &c., containing such goods; and every person guilty of or concerned in such removal, deposit, or concealment, with intent to defraud the United States of such tax, shall be liable to a fine or penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars.

[It is proper here to notice that section 45 of the same act (14 Stat. 163) relates specifically to the removal of spirits from places where distilled, and is in substance as follows:][3]

Section 45 of the same act (14 Stat. 163) relates specifically to the removal of spirits from places where distilled, and is in substance as follows: "That any person who shall remove any distilled spirits from the place where the same are distilled, otherwise than into a bonded warehouse, as provided by law, shall be liable to a fine of double the amount of tax thereon, or to imprisonment for not less than three months. All distilled spirits so removed, and all distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid, shall be forfeited to the United States, or may, immediately upon discovery, be seized, and after the assessment of the tax thereon, may be sold by the collector for the tax and expenses of seizure and sale." After providing for mode of procedure and burden of proofs, the section continues thus: "And any person who shall aid or abet in the removal of distilled spirits from any distillery otherwise than to a bonded warehouse as provided by law, or shall aid in the concealment of spirits so removed, shall be liable, on conviction thereof, to a fine of not less than two hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for not less than three nor more than twelve months." The only other sentence in the section provides for the punishment of illegal removal of spirits from any bonded warehouse.

The fifth count of the information, above recited, which alleged the failure of the distiller of the res to keep the book and make the entries prescribed by the commissioners, and the sixth count, which averred the failure of the distiller to make certain returns, were founded by the district-attorney upon section 31 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 157), and section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483), which are claimed by the district-attorney to be in substance the same as sections 57 and 68 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 243, 248). Section 31 in the act of 1866, is of the same general character as section 57 in the act of 1864; section 68 in the act of 1864 was the one which denounced the penalty for the acts or omissions made illegal by section 57, but no section corresponding to section 68 was contained in the act of July 13, 1866. This omission was supplied by the act of March 2, 1867, section 25, which is of the same general character with said section 68 of the act of 1864; but it contains some additions, particularly in relation "to materials fit for use in distillation found on the premises," which are regarded by the claimant as being very material, as showing the intention of congress not to forfeit spirits unless found upon the premises of the distiller.

To sustain the fifth and sixth counts in the information, the district-attorney relied upon section 31 of the act of July 13, 1866, and section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867. Section 31 requires the distiller to keep a certain book, and to make true and exact entries of certain facts therein, and also to make trimonthly accounts, taken from the books, &c. It was admitted that the distiller of the liquor seized did not comply with the abovementioned requirements of the law.

Section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867, before mentioned, was also cited as material in the controversy, and is in these words: "That the owner, agent, or superintendent of any still, ... who shall neglect or refuse to make true and exact entry and report of the same, or do or cause to be done any of the things by law required to be done concerning distilled spirits, shall, in addition to other fines and penalties now by law provided, forfeit, for every such neglect or refusal, all the spirits made by or for him, and all the vessels used in making the same, and the stills, boilers, and other vessels used in distillation, and all materials fit for use in distillation, found on the premises, together with the sum of five hundred dollars for each offense, with costs, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year," &c. 14 Stat. 483.

It was admitted that the spirits which are now in controversy were manufactured in May and June, 1868, at which time the act of March 31, 1868 (15 Stat. 58), had gone into effect, and was in force; and it was contended by the claimant that section 5 of this act repeals, by implication, the penalties denounced by previous acts, or that, being the later expression of the legislative will, it is the one which fixes the rights of the parties. This section is as follows: "That every person engaged in carrying on the business of a distiller, who shall defraud or attempt to defraud the United States of the tax on spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him, and all distilled spirits, and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits, found in the distillery and on the distillery premises, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years." 15 Stat. 50.

The judge of the district court was of opinion that section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867, taken in connection with the act of 1866, did not work a forfeiture eo instanti; that the language of those sections being in futuro, they did not apply to property which, prior to the seizure, had passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser. The court accordingly gave judgment that the property in question was not forfeited. [Case unreported.] To reverse this judgment, the United States sued out the present writ of error.

Chester H. Krum, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Edmund T. Allen, for defendant in error.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The property in controversy between the United States and the claimant consists of one hundred barrels of distilled spirits. The seizure was made September 1, 1868, in the city of St. Louis. It is admitted by the written stipulation of the parties, that these spirits were manufactured by one Nimrod Johnson, in the state of Louisiana, in the months of May and June, A. D. 1868; and that the claimant, Henderson, purchased them while they were in a bonded warehouse in New Orleans, after the same had been placed there by the owner of the distillery; that the claimant paid the United States collector the taxes due thereon, and moved the same from the warehouse according to law, without knowledge on his part, at any time before seizure, of any fraud on the part of the distiller, either actual or alleged. And it is distinctly admitted by the government that the claimant is a bona fide purchaser of the property. Judgment of forfeiture is sought, not for any violation of the law by the claimant, but for the violation of it by the distiller without the knowledge of the claimant, and at a period prior to the time when the res was placed in the government warehouse, and when the government collector received from the claimant the amount of taxes due on the property.

If the government is right, the claimant loses not only the spirits, but the large amount of taxes which he paid thereon—loses these entirely, or as to one is thrown on an uncertain resort upon his vendor, and as to the other, upon the sense of justice of the government. Where it is claimed that a law works such results, against which it is almost impossible for a purchaser to guard, the intention that it should do so ought to be unmistakable.

Before proceeding to examine the several grounds of forfeiture relied on by the United States, it may be advisable to notice two general propositions of law adverted to by counsel, and which bear upon the question to be determined.

The first is, that after the repeated decisions of the supreme court of the United States, it is to be taken as settled doctrine, that when a statute in terms denounces a forfeiture of property as penalty for violation of law, without alternative of value, or other qualifications or provisions, or language showing a different intent, the forfeiture takes place absolutely and instantaneously on the commission of the offense; title vests in the government from that moment, and it is not within the power of the offender or former owner to defeat the forfeiture by a subsequent transfer even to a bona fide purchaser. U. S. v. Nineteen Hundred and Sixty Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 338; Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342; Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366; Clifton v. U. S., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 242, 248.

Another undisputed principle of law is, that penalties annexed to violations of general revenue laws do not make such laws penal in the sense which requires them to be construed strictly. Nor, on the other hand, are they to be construed with an excess of liberality. But it is the duty of the court to study the whole statute, its policy, its spirit, its purpose, its language, and, giving to the words used their obvious and natural import, to read the act with these aids in such ways as will best effectuate the intention of the legislature. Legislative intention is the guide to true judicial interpretation. Taylor v. U. S., 3 How. [44 U. S.] 197, 210; Cliquot's Champagne, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 114.

The way is now cleared for a consideration of the several grounds of forfeiture insisted upon by the government. We shall notice first that which is set out in the fourth count of the information, the words of which are given above. The substance of this is, that these spirits, being subject to a tax imposed by the internal revenue law, were removed from the place where distilled with intent to defraud the United States of such tax. By whom removed, or to what place removed, is not alleged in the information. But on the agreed statement of facts it is admitted that the spirits were "placed in a bonded warehouse at New Orleans, by the owners of the distillery at which they were made; that the claimant paid the taxes thereon," &c. It is also admitted "that the fourth count in the information is true; but that Henderson, claimant, subsequently to the removal from the distillery, and before removal from the bonded warehouse, paid the tax on the spirits, and was a bona fide purchaser."

Thus, the facts admitted by the parties are, that the spirits were removed by the distiller to and placed by him within the bonded warehouse of the government, and it is charged in the fourth count of the information, that the removal therein alleged was made with intent to defraud the United States of the tax imposed by law upon such spirits. And, as noticed above, the written stipulation admits that the fourth count in the information is true.

The attorney for the United States maintains the sufficiency of this ground of forfeiture under the facts thus alleged and admitted, and relies upon section 14 of the act of July 13, 1866, which, together with the substance of section 45 of the same act, is set out in the statement of the case preceding this opinion. 14 Stat. 151.

Section 14 is general and broad enough in its terms to embrace the removal of spirits, on which there is a tax, when this is done with intent to defraud the United States of the tax, but section 45 is the one specifically relating to the removal of spirits from the place where they are distilled. By this section, the removal of "distilled spirits, from the place where the same are distilled, otherwise than into a bonded warehouse, as provided by law," is prohibited, and is made punishable by penalties differing from those provided in section 14. It is, then, not an illegal act to remove spirits from the distillery to the bonded warehouse. It is to secure the government the tax, that they are thus allowed to be removed. How it can reasonably be predicated of a removal of spirits by the distiller into a bonded warehouse of the government, which is under the custody of its own officer, that it was done with intent to defraud the United States of the tax thereon, is not readily perceived, and is not explained in the pleadings, in the admission of facts, nor in the argument of counsel.

Without putting a strained or nice construction upon the language of the fourth count, and of the written admission respecting it, it is our opinion that the case, as made, does not fall within those contemplated by the abovementioned section 14 of the act of July 13, 1866. The removal is the overt, illegal act alleged, and this was rightful; all that is left of the count under consideration is the intent with which the removal was made. We have said above, that it is difficult to see how it could have been made to defraud the United States of the tax; and a mere intent to defraud, formed or existing in the mind of the distiller, which intention has never been executed, or attempted to be, is not made a ground of forfeiture. The only execution, or attempt to execute the unlawful intent alleged, viz: to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits, is the removal of the spirits by the distiller to the warehouse of the United States, which removal was legal, and not an illegal act.

For these reasons, our opinion is that the spirits in controversy were not forfeited by reason of the facts set forth in the fourth count of the information, and in the written admissions of the parties.

The other grounds of forfeiture relied on by the government are those set forth in the fifth and sixth counts of the information, which allege the failure of the distiller of the spirits in question to make the entries required by law in the book prescribed by the commissioner, and to make tri-monthly reports from the said book. It is admitted that the allegations of the information in this respect are true.

By examining critically the language of the information and of the written stipulation, it will be seen to admit of doubt whether the distiller, Johnson, was guilty of the aforementioned neglects at and during the period when the spirits in controversy were distilled, or whether his neglect was before or after the distillation of these spirits; but it is clear that the neglect of the distiller in this respect existed at a time when these spirits were in his possession.

Suppose, as the government contends, that section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867, applies to the case, and that the distiller was not in default as to entries and reports at the time the spirits in question were made, but that he made default in these respects while these spirits remained in his possession, are they forfeited by this section, which includes "all spirits made by or for him," or is this language limited to such spirits as are made by or for him while the neglect or refusal to make the required entries or reports continues?

As the counsel for the claimant has not rested his case upon any such ground, we waive its consideration, and proceed to examine the questions made by the respective counsel, so far as it is deemed necessary to do so.

The attorney for the government bases the claim to condemn the property as forfeited, by reason of the facts alleged in the fifth and sixth counts of the information, upon section 31 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 157), which imposes upon the distiller the duty of making the entries and tri-monthly report, and upon section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483), which denounces the penalty of forfeiture for the neglect or refusal of the distiller to perform this duty. But to what the forfeiture extends, or when it is worked, are disputed questions in the case. The attorney for the claimant contends that the above-mentioned section 25, as to penalties, is repealed or superseded by section 5 of the act of March 31, 1868 (15 Stat. 58), which was in force when these spirits were made, and by which the forfeiture is limited to spirits found on the premises, or, at most, to those owned by the fraudulent distiller, if found elsewhere.

If the act of March 31, 1868, could be considered as entirely repealing the previous act, the conclusion of the claimant's counsel would be correct, viz: that under the act of 1868, spirits which before seizure had passed through a bonded warehouse, from the hands of the distiller into those of the bona fide purchaser, would not be forfeited for the previous frauds or acts of the manufacturer. But the law does not favor repeals by implication, particularly in revenue statutes, the provisions of which, to prevent fraud, are complicated, and enacted frequently at different times to meet special exigencies or defects in previous enactments. To operate a repeal by implication, the repugnance must be clear and positive, so as to leave no doubt as to the intent of congress. U. S. v. Sixty-seven Packages of Books, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 85, 93.

By recurring to section 5 of the act of 1868, it will be seen that it is limited to punishing distillers for defrauding, or attempting to defraud the United States of the tax on spirits distilled by them; and to convict the distiller, or to condemn property as forfeited under this statute, an intent to defraud must exist in the mind of the distiller, and be established by evidence. Whereas, under the act of 1866, section 31, and of 1867, section 25, an intent to defraud existing in the mind of the distiller is not made essential; if he neglect to make the entries or report required, the forfeiture in law attaches, although he may be able to show, as matter of fact, that his neglect was innocent of any fraudulent design. The penalties in section 5 of the act of 1868 being different from those in the former act, it is a repeal by implication, so far as it and the provisions of former acts provide for the same offense but no further. Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 439; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 125; Nichols v. Squire, 5 Pick. 168; State v. Whitworth, 8 Port. (Ala.) 434.

Being of opinion that the act of 1868 is not a repeal of that part of section 25 of the act of 1867, which denounces penalties against distillers for failing to make the entries and reports required of them, it is necessary now to consider another position taken by the claimant's counsel, viz: Admitting that section 25 of the act of 1867 is yet in force, and is the one applicable to this case, still, the spirits in controversy are not, under the agreed facts, forfeited by virtue of its provisions, because they were not found on the premises of the distiller, but in the possession of an innocent purchaser. The argument is, that the words, "found on the premises" relate to, and qualify the whole list of forfeited articles, including distilled spirits.

Upon an examination of the language of this section in the light of its legislative history adverted to in the statement of the case, and in the light of other provisions of the statutes relating to forfeitures denounced against distillers, it is our opinion that his position is substantially correct; in other words, that it was not the intention of congress to denounce an absolute and instantaneous forfeiture on the commission of the offense, of all spirits, but only those either found on the premises at the time of seizure or information given, or, if found elsewhere, still owned by the party guilty of the wrongful act or omission.

This conclusion, reached, it must be confessed, after some hesitation, and adopted with some lingering distrust of its soundness, rests full more upon the general spirit and purpose of the legislation of congress respecting the rights of third persons, than upon the particular words of section 25 of the act of 1867, if these stood alone with nothing beyond to aid in their interpretation. This conclusion is fortified by supposing congress in its legislation to have been regardful of the ordinary sense of justice, and not to have designed to make the innocent suffer for the acts of the guilty, and to visit the laches of officers of the revenue upon those guilty of no wrong and no neglect. And it is still further strengthened if we have regard alone to considerations of mere policy. Revenue is the sole purpose of all the complicated official machinery pertaining to the manufacture of spirits. The duty levied is high, the temptation to fraud correspondingly great. Congress will be presumed to have seen, unless the contrary clearly appears, that revenue would be promoted by making it safe to buy manufactured spirits, and would be injured by legislation of a contrary character, by which a "secret taint of forfeiture is indissolubly attached to the property, so that at any time, and under any circumstances, within the limitations of law, the United States might enforce their rights against innocent purchasers." Per Story, J., U. S. v. Nineteen Hundred and Sixty Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398, 406.

The policy of congress to confine the forfeiture to the property of the guilty, at least not to extend it to innocent persons, may be seen by section 130 of the act of 1864 (13 Stat. 306), which protects bona fide purchasers from forfeitures by frauds. The fraudulent vendor forfeits value, but the article bought bona fide and paid for cannot be pursued in the hands of the purchaser. So in the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 153), if the distiller fails to pay the tax for carrying on his business (section 23), or fails to give bond, or gives a false or fraudulent notice (section 24), he forfeits only such liquors as are owned by him, or found upon the premises; which evidently means owned by him at the time of seizure or date of information given. So in section 5 of the act of March 31, 1868 (15 Stat. 58), so often mentioned, it is provided that the distiller who defrauds or attempts to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, shall forfeit, among other things, "all distilled spirits and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits found in the distillery and on the distillery premises."

This section, as above observed, does not repeal all prior laws inflicting penalties and forfeitures upon distillers, but repeals them only so far as they relate to the same offense. But being in pari materia with section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867, relied on by the district-attorney, and which governs this case, it may be properly resorted to when endeavoring to discover the meaning of that section. Under the act of 1868, spirits, which had passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser, and not found in the distillery building or premises, would not be liable to be condemned as forfeited. So by the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 142, § 44), passed soon after the spirits in controversy were made and before they were seized, but which saves forfeitures already incurred (Id. 166, § 105), all obscurity as to extent of forfeiture is removed, and the forfeiture is in terms limited to "distilled spirits owned by such person (the offending distiller), wherever found, and all distilled spirits and personal property found in the distillery," &c. (Id. 142, § 44); and see sections 5, 7, and 19 of same act. This legislation shows quite satisfactorily a uniform policy on the part of congress from the beginning not to extend the forfeiture to innocent third persons.

In the light of these considerations, and of this legislative policy, we may now recur to section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867, which is the one relied on by the government, and we repeat it as our opinion that, under it, a neglect or refusal by a distiller to make entries and reports as required by law, does not forfeit spirits not "found" on the premises, and not, at the time when "found," the property of the offending distiller. It would, indeed, be strange if such a neglect or refusal, which is not necessarily fraudulent in fact, as we have before stated, should have the effect to forfeit spirits in the hands of bona fide purchasers, when by other provisions of the statutes, as, for example, that of March 31, 1868, an actual fraud, accompanied with a fraudulent intent, would not have that effect.

The judgment of the court is, that under section 25 of the act of March 2, 1867, a forfeiture eo instanti is not worked for omissions of the distiller to make the entries and reports required of him.

This view, if correct, results in affirming the judgment of the district court, and renders it unnecessary to consider the other proposition of the claimant's counsel, which is, that if forfeiture attached to these spirits, eo instanti with the commission by Johnson, the distiller, of the offenses charged, the United States waived any right of property acquired of such forfeiture, when they accepted from Henderson, the claimant, the amount of the taxes due on these spirits, and surrendered them into his possession, he being innocent of fraud. We content ourselves with remarking, that the proposition, as stated, is of questionable correctness, for waiver would imply a power in the revenue officers which they do not possess, and perhaps, also, a knowledge of the forfeiture, which it is not shown they had, when the taxes were received from the claimant and the spirits were surrendered to him. If any proposition could be maintained, it would be the one, that in view of the peculiar provisions of the law for detecting frauds, the ample facilities it supplies its officers, its system of bonded warehouses, the government, by accepting and retaining the taxes paid to it by the claimant is estopped to say the property all the time belonged to it by reason of a previous forfeiture of title by the vendor of the claimant. Whether the view is correct, or whether the case could be successfully distinguished from those in which the supreme court has held, under the customs revenue acts, that the forfeiture might be enforced against the property in the absence of innocent and subsequent purchasers, we pass without deciding, resting our determination of this case upon the grounds before stated.

The judgment of the district court must be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

BRIBERY—INDICTMENT—SCIENTER.

An allegation that the defendant knowingly offered to give O. a bribe to vote, the said O. being then under twenty-one years of age, held to mean that the defendant knew O. was under age when he offered him the bribe.

John F. Caples and Julius C. Moreland, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. The indictment in this case contains but one count, and that is similar to the first one in U. S. v. Hendric [Case No. 15,347]. The demurrer alleges that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime, but no particular cause of demurrer is stated. On the argument the same objections to the sufficiency of the indictment were urged as in U. S. v. Hendric, aforesaid, and also that it does not appear from the indictment that the defendant knew Ollar, to whom it is alleged he offered the $2.50, to be a minor. The indictment alleges that the defendant knowingly offered to give Ollar this bribe to vote, the said Ollar being then under twenty-one years of age. Now it is not necessary to allege that he offered the money knowingly, because he could not have done that simple act unknowingly—without knowledge of the fact. The term "knowingly" was evidently intended by the pleader to apply to the whole allegation of offering to give the money to Ollar, a minor. There was no occasion to use it, except to qualify that part of the allegation which related to the non-age of Ollar. Doubtless the scienter might have been stated more artistically, and certainly, as, for instance, that Ollar not being qualified to vote, etc., because of his non-age, the defendant, well knowing the premises, did offer to give, etc. My impression is that the allegation is sufficient.

The demurrer must be overruled for the reasons here given, and in U. S. v. Hendric, aforesaid.

COSTS—TO WHAT LIMITED.

1. The act of February 26, 1853 [10 Stat. 161], repealed all antecedent legislation of congress on the subject of costs, and changed the existing usages and practice of courts therein, and limited costs to the specific appointments of that statute.

2. The taxation of costs according to former statutes, and the former usage and practice of the court for services not mentioned in the statute, disallowed. The opinion of the attorney general of the United States, contra, not followed.

BETTS, District Judge. This is an appeal from the taxation of the bill of costs of the United States attorney, made by the clerk, and has been brought before the court and submitted to its decision upon arguments, in writing, in behalf of the respective parties. The goods were seized by the collector, as forfeited to the United States, and a libel of information in the usual form was filed to procure their condemnation. The claimant petitioned the secretary of the treasury for a remission of the forfeiture, which was granted upon the condition that the claimant pay the taxable costs in the cause. The United States attorney submitted to the clerk a bill of costs, containing the following items: Retaining fee, $8; drawing information, fol. 12, $3.16; engrossing, $1.58; copy of same, $1.58; counsel perusing and amending, $2.50; drawing, engrossing and copy of report to solicitor of the treasury, $1; motion that marshal return monition, $3; attending on return of monition, $1; drawing, engrossing, and copy of additional report to solicitor of the treasury, $3.62½; drawing, engrossing, and copy report to solicitor of suit pending, $1; drawing costs and attending taxation, $1.25; copy taxed bill to file, $1; drawing, engrossing and copy report of suit decided, $1; drawing and engrossing consent for time to answer, 50c.; proctor's and advocate's fee on motion to bond, $3.62½; discontinuing cause, $5; filing remission, with certificate, $1; two depositions taken and admitted as evidence in the cause, $5. The attorney claimed that by the law as it now stands he was entitled to their taxation to that amount. The claimant of the goods objects to the allowance of any fee or taxation other than $5 for discontinuance of the cause. The clerk taxed $5 for discontinuance and $5 for taking the two depositions, and rejected all the other items of the bill, amounting to $35.82.

The counsel for the claimants insist that the act of February 26, 1853, is peremptory, and excludes the allowance of any costs not specifically given by the statute. The United States' attorney maintains that the act should be interpreted as fixing a compensation only in respect to the particular services designated, and that all other services necessarily performed in a cause are to be compensated according to the law of costs as it stood previous to the enactment of the statute. He offers, in support of this construction of the act of 1853, the official opinion of the attorney-general of the United States, given to the secretary of the interior, on the very point. That opinion is as follows:

"Attorney-General's Office, 16th June, 1853. Sir: In answer to the inquiry of the marshal of the Southern district of the state of New York, referred to me by your note of the 13th ult., I state as follows: The act of congress of February 26, 1853, to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the courts of the United States, provides as marshal's fee 'for transporting criminals, ten cents per mile for himself, each necessary guard and each prisoner.' If the language were 'for transporting prisoners,' it would have disposed of the case presented as a subject of inquiry, namely, that of a witness in custody for safe-keeping; but it does not, and this case is not provided for by the act. It is a casus omissus. I think for such duty—that is, the transportation of a witness in custody—the marshal is entitled to charge the fee of the nearest analogous case, that of transportation of a criminal as allowed by the act of congress, or actual expenses to be certified by the court. The act, it is true, declares at the outset that in lieu of the present compensation of clerks, attorneys, marshals, and others, 'the following and no other compensation shall be allowed.' But this must be understood as the following and no other compensation 'for any services mentioned in this act.' If the attorney, clerk or marshal, is compelled by law to perform a service, or incur a charge, in a matter not specified by the act he is to receive a reasonable allowance therefor, notwithstanding the above-cited phrase of general conclusion. I have the honor to be your obedient servant, [Signed] C. Cushing. Hon. Robert McClelland, Secretary of the Interior."

Although the subject was considered by the court in March term last, and a decision was then made which gave to the act of February, 1853, the effect of excluding all costs to the officers of court which are not specifically appointed by the statute, (Thorne v. The Victoria [Case No. 13,988]), yet I willingly review the point, under the aid of the able argument of the respective counsel, and with the benefit of the opinion of the first law-officer of the government. The exposition put upon the statute by the attorney-general, and which is claimed to be the correct one by the United States attorney, is that it is exclusive or restrictive in respect to the allowance of fees or compensation, only in cases in which a fee or compensation is mentioned in the act; and that, where a service required by law is performed, or a charge is incurred, by an officer of court, in a matter not specified by the act, he is entitled to receive a reasonable allowance therefor, and the measure of compensation pointed out is 'the fee of the nearest analogous case.' In the case of no other officer of court can the justness, and, indeed, necessity, of the principle recognised by the attorney be more strongly illustrated than in respect to the compensation of the United States attorney, and of which the bill of costs now under consideration is one of the feeblest instances. The only items of charge named in the statute, are "for discontinuing the cause," and "depositions taken and admitted as evidence," neither of them requiring the personal action or even attendance of the United States attorney, and which are acts ordinarily done by others upon his mere assent, whilst the examination and study of the invoices and entries, the statutes and decisions applicable to the subject, the preparation and settling the libel of information, matters all requiring deep professional learning and careful personal attention and labor, as also for attending court and taking measures to speed the cause and resist delays on the part of the claimants of the property seized, and to protect the interests of the United States against the admission of inadequate or incompetent bail, all involving his official and professional responsibility as well as the occupation of his time, are not specified in the act as services to be compensated, and if any fee is allowed for them it must be under the exposition given the statute by the attorney-general.

This case, it is stated, affords a weak instance of the operation of the law, because there is no reason to presume that the services of the attorney, out of court, in presenting and protecting the laws and interests of the government, were special or beyond those of the most ordinary classes of litigation. But it is to be remarked, that the rule governing the taxation of costs in this case must be applied to those of the highest magnitude, often falling under the management of the United States attorneys, in which the revenue is implicated to vast amounts of money, and which present the most intricate and perplexing questions of law and fact which the courts, on the law and equity side, are called upon to determine. For drawing and revising pleadings and proceedings in such cases, and advising and attending upon the various applications and motions made necessary out of court, the United States attorney can receive no compensation, unless the act of 1853 admits the construction put upon it by the attorney-general.

Feeling the impressive justice of the claims of the United States attorney in this case, and being also persuaded that the public interests are intimately concerned in providing a reasonable compensation to so important an officer in the position he occupies, for the services imposed upon him by law, I have reconsidered my former judgment in the matter, with a strong desire (I am conscious of no judicial impropriety in acknowledging the bias) to coincide with the opinion of the attorney-general, and to regard the failure of the act to make provision, in a case so manifestly important and just as a casus omissus, which it is competent to the court to supply by intendment and construction. The re-examination of the subject under such prepossession has failed to convince me that the act admits the interpretation proposed. On the contrary, it appears to me that, carrying out the reasoning upon which the construction contended for is based, it not only in effect nullifies the statute, but enacts and re-establishes a law in its place which congress by this act expressly repudiated. The act of March 3, 1842 (5 Stat. 484), fixed the tariff of compensation to the officers of the United States in both districts of New York at the fees and emoluments allowed by the laws of the state of New York to like state officers in the highest court of original jurisdiction of the state, according to the nature of the proceedings, for like services therein. Those provisions congress declares by the act of February 26, 1853, confine these officers to the fees allowed by the state law, and then repeals the provisions themselves in express terms. 10 Stat. 167.

Taking the view of the subject most favorable to the claims of the United States attorney, this explicit abrogation of the law of 1842 placed the officers of the New York courts under the law of costs applicable to all other courts of the United States, or pre-existing usages and practices, particularly in reference to the courts of this state.

The act of March 3, 1841 (5 Stat. 427), had established a special law of costs for officers of the United States courts, to the following effect: "In lieu of all fees, emoluments, and receipts now allowed in districts where the present entire compensation of any of the officers hereinafter named shall exceed the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, it shall and may be lawful for the United States clerks, attorneys, counsel, and marshals, in the district and circuit courts of the United States, in the several states, to demand and receive the same fees that now or hereafter may be allowed by the laws of the said states, respectively, where said courts are held to the clerks, attorneys, and counsel and sheriffs in the highest court of the said states, in which like services are rendered; and no other fees or emoluments, except that the marshals shall receive in full for summoning all the jurors for any one court, $30; and shall receive for every day's actual attendance at any court, $5 per day; and for any services, including the compensation for mileage performed by said officers in the discharge of their official duty, for which no compensation is provided by the laws of the said states, respectively, the said officers may receive such fees as are now allowed by law, according to the existing usage and practice of said courts of the United States,"—and limited the amount of fees and compensation to be retained by such officers. This law was in force in this state, in common with the rest of the Union, until modified and restricted in relation to the New York courts by the now repealed act of 1842. I apprehend there can be no ground to question that the act of February 26, 1853, operated a repeal of the act of 1841 not less effectually than that of 1842, both by the declared purpose and effect of the act of 1853, and also by force of the repealing enactment of section fifth.

It is to be remarked that the act of 1841 sanctioned the costs established by the long-established usage and practice of the United States courts, by declaring that in cases where no appropriate fee was provided by the state law in compensation of services rendered, "the said officers may receive such fees as are now allowed by law according to the existing usage and practice of said courts of the United States." The act of 1853 removes the distinction before existing between the officers of the United States courts in this state and those in other states, and then establishes a new law of costs governing the entire Union, declared to be "in lieu of the compensation now allowed by law" to those officers. To make this declaration more efficacious, congress not only introduces a general repealing clause in section 5, in the emphatic words "that all laws and regulations heretofore made, which are incompatible with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed and abrogated;" but an enactment is superadded to the two above-stated methods of rescinding all antecedent laws on the subject, that "no district attorney, marshal or clerk, or their deputies, shall receive any other or greater compensation for any services rendered by him, than is provided in this act; and all acts and parts of acts, allowing to either of them any other or greater fees than is herein provided, are hereby repealed, and to receive any other or greater compensation is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor." 10 Stat. 169. The intention of congress to displace any authority in force by statute or usage, or discretion of courts, giving fees or costs to the officers named, and to establish the provisions of the act of 1853 as the exclusive law of costs to the United States' courts, it seems to me cannot be matter of doubt, under the declarations and interdictions of that act. The act signifies plainly that congress had in contemplation all antecedent legislation on the subject, and the existing usages and practice of the courts, from which was derived authority to award costs to the officers of court, and meant by direct and strong language to repudiate all of them, and, in lieu of every such power, to limit and confine costs to the specific appointments of the statute.

Only two items in the bill of costs now under consideration are named in the act of 1853. The others are taken from the state statutes and the usages and practice of the United States' courts in this district. To sanction their allowance would be, in my opinion, to reinstate the act of 1841, and to hold by judicial construction that the legislature intended to give those officers a suitable compensation for every service they are required to perform, in contradiction to the positive assertions of the statute. It is not the province of the court to meet any equity, however urgent, by enacting a new law to satisfy it. The wisdom of congress deemed it expedient in this case to deny all fees and compensation to the United States attorney for instituting and managing a litigation, in support of the interests of the government, and to give him a reward only for discontinuing the cause. It is my duty to carry that will of the legislature into effect without consideration of the operation of the rule upon the rights of the officer or the interests of the public.

If the views of the attorney-general were to be adopted, there would be embarrassment, if not an utter impracticability, in attempting to bring this case within the principle announced by him, for I can find no service specified and compensated by the act, which bears an analogy to those charged for in this bill of costs, other than in this: that the services named in the statute have relation to conducting a suit in court, and those charged in this bill have that character, and in our system of practice are necessary to that end. With all respect for the judgment of the eminent public officer, I am compelled to say that it does not appear to me within the competency of the courts or accounting officers to introduce into this particular statute a method of compensation not designated and directly sanctioned by it. The taxation of the clerk is accordingly affirmed. This includes the charge of $5 for taking two depositions. The charge is in the words of the act, and the court must assume that the services have been rendered. The attorney is accordingly entitled to receive $5 for discontinuance of the cause, and $5 for two depositions taken and admitted as evidence in the cause, and the residue of charges for services appropriate to the case, and allowable under the laws as they existed prior to this statute, amounting to $35, must be disallowed.

Case No. 15,952.

UNITED STATES v. ONE RECTIFYING ESTABLISHMENT.

District Court, N. D. Mississippi. Dec. Term, 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—ACT OF 1868, § 96—PENALTY—KNOWLEDGE AND INTENT.

1. The penalties prescribed in section 96 of the internal revenue act of 1868 [15 Stat. 164], held to apply to those who knowingly and wilfully do or omit to do the thing forbidden or required only when there is no specific penalty imposed by any other section of the act.

2. And to incur the penalties under section 96 the violator of the law must have a knowledge that he is doing or omitting to do the act forbidden or required, and intends so to do.

The questions presented for the decision of the court arise upon the demurrer of claimants [Bowling & Reed] to the information filed by the district attorney upon the part of the United States. The first count in the information alleges, in substance, that the property seized and sought to be forfeited was found in a building which was then, and had for a long time before that time been used as a rectifying establishment of liquors, compounders of liquors, and wholesale liquor dealers, and that all the property seized was then being used for that purpose; that the said liquors had been removed from a distillery warehouse without being gauged, stamped, and branded, as required by the 25th section of the act of 1868, imposing taxes on distilled spirits, and for other purposes, approved the 20th of July of that year. This count also contains an allegation that said claimants as such rectifiers of distilled spirits on said premises, filled for shipment and sale rectified spirituous liquors in casks and packages without having the same inspected, gauged and stamped, as required by law; also as wholesale liquor dealers, they filled in casks and packages, on said premises, spirituous liquors for the shipment, sale and delivery, without having the same gauged, inspected, and stamped, as required by the 25th section of said act; all of which omissions were knowingly and wilfully omitted and neglected. The grounds of demurrer to this count are: 1. That section 25 imposes no penalty on the owner of the spirits. 2. That the number of gallons is not stated. 3. That the number of gallons placed in each cask is not stated. 4. That the number of gallons placed in each cask filled for shipment, sale, or delivery, is not stated.

Edwin Hill, U. S. Dist. Atty.

H. W. Walters and W. S. Featherston, for claimants.

HILL, District Judge. After a most careful examination of the question raised upon the first ground of demurrer, I am satisfied that the law does impose a duty upon the rectifier or wholesale liquor dealer in the 25th section, the knowingly and wilfully omitting and neglecting of which, under section 96, does forfeit all the spirituous liquors owned by such party. The second clause in section 25 provides that whenever any cask or package of rectified spirits shall be filled for shipment, sale, or delivery, on the premises of any rectifier who shall have paid the special tax required by law, it shall be the duty of the United States gauger to gauge, inspect, and stamp the same as therein directed. The third clause makes the same provisions in relation to wholesale dealers. It is true that the gauging, inspecting, and stamping is to be done by the United States gauger, but it is equally true that the rectifier or dealer, when he does have his casks filled, is to call upon the gauger to perform his duty, and he is not permitted to fill his casks without causing the same to be gauged, inspected, and stamped, as required by law. The object of the law is that the revenue officers, upon an inspection of the casks in such establishments, may know whether or not the law has been complied with. This section does not impose any penalty on the rectifier or dealer; hence the application of the 96th section. The case provided for in section 47 is where distilled spirits are drawn from one cask and placed in another cask, containing not less than ten gallons, intended for sale, no matter by whom done, or where done, the spirits filled shall be again inspected and gauged, and the cask into which they are placed shall be marked or branded, etc. Section 25 is confined to rectifiers and wholesale dealers, and is not limited to the quantity, as in section 47. Wholesale liquor dealers are those who sell in a quantity not less than five gallons; consequently all sales of five gallons or more must be inspected, gauged, and stamped; and, as to rectifiers, all casks filled by them for shipment, sale, or delivery, no matter in what quantities, must be inspected, gauged, and stamped. But to render the party liable to the penalties under section 96, the filling of the casks, and the omission to cause the same to be so inspected, gauged, and stamped, must be alleged and proved to be knowingly and wilfully done, or neglected to be done, as the case may be; all of which is averred in this count. so that this ground of demurrer is not well taken. The second, third, and fourth causes of demurrer are substantially the same; the allegations as to quantity are sufficient. There is however a cause of demurrer, which in argument was not insisted on, or set down as a cause of demurrer, but which as a general demurrer does apply to this count; and that is, it contains two distinct offences, for which a different penalty is imposed by way of forfeiture. First, it is charged that the spirits were removed from a distillery warehouse, without having been inspected, gauged, and stamped, as required by law; this is in substance a charge that they were so removed without having been removed according to law. The spirits so removed, and only such spirits, became, under section 36, forfeited. The forfeiture under section 96, as above stated, forfeits not only the spirits filled up, but all the spirits owned by the rectifier or dealer. These two charges, therefore, should have been embraced in separate counts, and for this cause the demurrer to this count is sustained. The second count avers that said spirits so seized were removed from a distillery warehouse without being removed according to law. The cause of demurrer thereto is that neither the quality nor number of casks is designated. This is unnecessary. The demurrer to this count is therefore overruled.

The third count avers that claimants knowingly and wilfully omitted to make the entries required by section 45 in relation to the spirits seized. The forfeiture under this count is claimed under section 96 of the act of 1868. It is insisted for claimants that section 96 does not apply to this offence, the penalty for the omission stated being fixed in section 45. Thus a construction of the true intent and meaning of section 96 becomes important, not only in this case, but in numerous others of like character. Upon the original argument of this question, in this and other cases of a similar character, the district attorney, with both zeal and ability, insisted that the penalties imposed by this section apply to acts or omissions knowingly and wilfully done or omitted to be done, which were forbidden or required by any other section of the act, although there is a penalty specifically imposed for the mere act or omission without more. The converse of this proposition was also zealously and ably argued by counsel for the respective claimants. The question was then a new one, without any judicial construction upon it, so far as I knew. After a most laborious examination of the question I came to the conclusion that the construction claimed by the district attorney was not the correct one, but that congress only intended this section to apply to violations by commission or omission for which no specific penalties were imposed by any other section of the act, and not then unless the thing forbidden was both knowingly and wilfully done, or if the offence was by omission, that it was both knowingly and wilfully omitted. And with this conclusion I was satisfied, until I met with Judge Blatchford's opinion in which he maintains fully the position claimed by the district attorney. Quantity of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 11,495]. Finding myself opposed in my construction by so able a jurist, and one for whose judicial opinions I entertain the highest regard, I at once questioned the correctness of my own conclusions, and requested a re-argument, with such additional light as might be thrown upon the question by the opinion of the learned judge. I have listened with deep interest to the able re-argument, and have examined closely the opinion mentioned, and with these aids have re-examined the questions, with a desire to at least satisfy my own mind as to a correct construction of the intention of congress in reference to this section, and also desirous to agree, as far as possible, with the distinguished jurist who had already given it his construction, and thereby preserve uniformity in the enforcement of this law; but instead of coming to that agreement in opinion, I find myself unable to change the conclusions to which I had before arrived. In many of the conclusions of the learned judge in the case mentioned I fully concur; the only point of difference is that he believes the act throughout makes a distinction between an act knowingly and wilfully done or omitted, and one in which such knowledge and intention is wanting; that to the former the 96th section applies, and to the latter the specific penalties enumerated. In this I cannot concur. It is clear to my mind that when a specific penalty is imposed, whether the act or omission was a knowing or wilful one or not, such specified penalties alone are imposed, and that the 96th section was only intended to apply to such acts or omissions mentioned in the different sections, for which no specific penalties are imposed, and only then when such act or omission was both knowing and wilful. By reference to sections 9, 11, 15, 16, 17, 23, 25, 48, and other sections, it will be found that many things are required or forbidden, for which no specific penalty is imposed; and when omitted or done knowingly and wilfully, the penalties imposed by this important section will be enforced. The section reads as follows: "That if any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, shall knowingly and wilfully omit, neglect, or refuse to do, or cause to be done, any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this act for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done, the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of one thousand dollars; and if the person so offending be a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him, or in which he has an interest as owner; and if he be a manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, all tobacco or cigars found in his manufactory, shall be forfeited to the United States." It will be seen that after the imposition of the penalty of one thousand dollars, it further provides, that if the person so offending be a distiller, etc. It is clear to my mind that that language was intended to apply to those who knowingly and wilfully do, or omit to do, the thing forbidden or required, and for which no specific penalty is imposed by any other section of the act. Had the section read, "he shall, in addition to the other penalties imposed, pay a penalty," etc., then the construction contended for by the district attorney would have been the correct one; but this sentence is not to be found in the section, and is not necessarily implied to give full meaning and effect to it; and language should not be interpolated into a penal act, which will change its meaning from its ordinary construction and sense. The position contended for by counsel that the violator must know that the thing done or omitted is a violation of law, and that he purposely intends a violation of law, before he can be held a violator of the law, is incorrect. No man is under obligation to engage in these pursuits; but if he does, he is under obligation to inform himself of what the law requires or forbids, and if he fails so to do, must bear the consequences of his acts and the requirements of the law violated; but to incur the penalties under this section, he must have a knowledge that he is doing or omitting to do the act forbidden or required, and intend to do it. It is to be hoped that this important question will be speedily settled by the supreme court, so that the law may be uniformly enforced in every part of the Union. The result of the conclusion to which I have again arrived requires that the demurrer to this count be sustained.

The fourth count charges the claimants with having been the owners of a distillery in the town of Holly Springs, which they carried on and operated without having given the bond required by said act of July 20, 1868; also that they carried on said distillery with intent to defraud the United States out of the tax on the spirits so distilled, or some part of it; also that they carried on said distillery without having the same with its appurtenances constructed, painted, arranged, etc., according to the requirements of section 17 of said act, which omission was knowingly and wilfully done. The objection to this count is that it embraces three distinct offences, the first and second of which work a forfeiture of not only the spirits, but the wines, stills, and appurtenances fit to be used, or intended to be used, in the distillation, rectification, or compounding of liquors; the latter forfeits only the spirits owned by the claimants, if the facts alleged should be proved. When separate offences are alleged requiring a different judgment of forfeiture, they should be charged in different counts. For the reason that these separate and distinct offences are charged in the same count, the demurrer to this count is sustained, but with leave to the district attorney to amend the first and fourth counts by striking out such of the charges as he may desire, and adding new counts.

Case No. 15,953.

UNITED STATES v. ONE SORREL HORSE.

[22 Vt. 655.]

District Court, D. Vermont. May Term, 1847.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—ACT OF 1821—IMPORTATION OF HORSE—SALE—USE OF OWNERS.

1. A horse, brought from an adjacent foreign territory into the United States for the purpose of sale, or of being kept here, either for use or sale, is within the sense and object of the first section of the statute of 1821 [3 Stat. 616], which provides, that every person, coming into the United States from an adjacent foreign territory, with "merchandize" subject to duty, shall deliver at the office of the collector of customs a manifest of the merchandize.

But a horse brought in, not for any such purpose, but as a mere instrument of conveyance in the prosecution of a temporary journey on business, or a visit, is not brought in as merchandize, and is therefore not within the purview of the statute.

2. Reasonable cause, sufficient to justify seizure, means probable cause; it imports a seizure under circumstances which warrant suspicion.

[Cited in Averill v. Smith, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 93.]

This was an information against a horse, seized as forfeited for having been imported or brought from Canada into the United States in violation of the revenue laws thereof. The facts constituting the alleged importation, as specially found by the jury, under the direction of the court, were, that the horse was driven by the claimant, harnessed before another horse, in a single sleigh containing no goods, wares, or merchandize subject to duty, from Canada into the district of Vermont, not for sale or to be kept in the country for use, but in the prosecution of a journey to the state of Maine, on business of a temporary nature, with the intention of returning with the horses and sleigh to the claimant's place of residence in Canada, immediately after the accomplishment of his business. The question was, whether, upon the facts so found, there having been no report or entry made, manifest delivered, or duties paid, the horse was liable to seizure and forfeiture.

C. Linsley, U. S. Dist. Atty.

L. B. Peck, for claimant.

PRENTISS, District Judge. The forfeiture claimed in this case, if it can be claimed under any of the provisions of the revenue laws, must be claimed under the provisions of the act of 1821. The ninety-fourth section of the act of 1799 [1 Stat. 699] is confined, by its terms, to importations of "horses, cattle, sheep, swine, or other beasts," by water, in vessels or boats; and the one hundred and sixth section of the same act is applicable only to cases of "vessels, boats, rafts, and carriages," arriving in districts on the northern and northwestern boundaries of the United States, "containing goods, wares, or merchandise subject to duty." The first section of the act of 1821 is broad enough to embrace, and undoubtedly does embrace, every mode whatever of importing or bringing into the United States, from an adjacent foreign territory, merchandize subject to duty, either by land or by water. It provides, that every person, coming into the United States from an adjacent foreign country, with merchandize subject to duty, shall deliver at the office of the collector of customs a manifest of the merchandize; and, on neglect to do so, the merchandize, imported or brought in, shall be forfeited. Horses may not be usually included in the term "merchandize;" but being objects of trade and commerce, they may be called merchandize, within the meaning and intention of the act, whenever they are imported or brought into the country as such. A horse brought from an adjacent foreign territory into the United States for the purpose of sale, or of being kept here either for use or sale, horses being subject to duty, is within the sense and object of the act. But a horse brought in, not for any such purpose, but as a mere instrument of conveyance in the prosecution of a temporary journey on business, or a visit, is not brought in as merchandize, and is therefore not within the purview of the act. To hold otherwise would be to adopt a construction, which would not only be particularly embarrassing and vexatious in its effects upon the ordinary intercourse between the residents on the opposite sides of the frontier line, but would be productive of much inconvenience in its more general operation. The case under consideration, then, on the facts found by the jury, being not within the meaning, intention, or policy of the act, the horse in question was not subject to seizure and forfeiture. It was said in argument, that this construction of the act would open the way to fraudulent evasions of the law, and exposes the officers of the customs to peril in the execution of their duties. To be sure, it may be difficult always to know what the intention of a traveller is, in regard to the horse he is riding or driving. The real purpose may be different from the ostensible or professed purpose; but in every case the officers will act as the circumstances may require. If they make a seizure, exercising reasonable discretion in the matter, they will incur no hazard; for they will be protected from an action by a certificate of reasonable cause. The objection of fraud or evasion, then, supposing a different construction of the act not absolutely precluded by the considerations which have been presented, is of little weight, since the officers of the customs are at liberty to make seizure, and will be protected in doing so, in very case where there is reasonable cause of suspicion. There must be judgment therefore on the verdict for the claimant.

A motion for a certificate of probable cause was subsequently filed.

PRENTISS, District Judge. The motion for a certificate of reasonable cause for the seizure has been in some measure anticipated in the remarks made upon the merits of the case. Reasonable cause must be understood to mean the same as probable cause. "Probable cause," says Marshall, C. J., "does not mean prima facie evidence, or evidence which, in the absence of exculpatory proof, would justify condemnation. It means less than evidence which would justify condemnation. It imports a seizure made under circumstances, which warrant suspicion. This is its legal sense." Locke

v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 339. Again he says: "A doubt as to the true construction of the law is as reasonable a cause for seizure, as a doubt respecting the fact." U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 311. Adopting the definition of reasonable cause thus given, the facts attending the case, supposing there to have been no ground for doubt as to the law, afforded reasonable cause for the seizure. The seizing officer had such information beforehand, from Canada, of the design to bring the horse, which was a valuable and saleable horse, into the United States, as would naturally induce a belief, that an evasion of the revenue laws was intended; and, when brought in, the horse was driven before another horse in a single sleigh, with a harness upon him made of the cheapest materials, appearing to have been put together to answer a temporary purpose, with one person only, and no loading in the sleigh, in a manner to warrant suspicion. A certificate, therefore, ought to be granted.

Case No. 15,954.

UNITED STATES v. ONE STILL.

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. June 10, 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE—ACT JUNE 30, 1864—GROUND OF FORFEITURE—FRAUDULENT INTENT—BURDEN OF PROOF—EVIDENCE—SUBMISSION TO JURY.

1. Under the 48th section of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 240), as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), where personal property is seized, because it is found in the place or building, or within the yard or enclosure, where the articles or raw materials previously mentioned in that section are found, the fraudulent intent or purpose of the person in the possession, or having the control, of such personal property, does not constitute an element of the ground of forfeiture.

[Cited in U. S. v. Quantity of Tobacco, Case No. 16,106.]

2. Where personal property is found in the condition specified in such 48th section, the onus is on the claimant of it, to make out that its situation was consistent with his entire innocence of complicity with the offences for which such articles or raw materials were seized.

[Cited in U. S. v. Two Hundred and Seventy-Eight Barrels of Distilled Spirits, Case No. 16,580.]

3. Such 48th section embraces the article of distilled spirits.

4. Where the evidence on a question is all one way, the court is justified in not submitting the question as one of fact to the jury.

[Cited in Weil v. Nevitt, 18 Colo. 10, 31 Pac. 488.]

This was an information against certain personal property seized for a violation of the internal revenue laws. The property consisted of two stills and their appurtenances and some whiskey, and also of a dwelling-house and a lager beer saloon and a brewery and its appurtenances, the whole being enclosed in one enclosure by a high board fence. The stills and their appurtenances and the whiskey were condemned by default. On a trial as to the brewery and its appurtenances, a verdict was rendered for the government, and the claimant now moved for a new trial.

Benjamin F. Tracy, U. S. Dist. Atty.

William H. Hollis, for claimant.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BENEDICT, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The seizure, in this case, was made during the night of the 13th of January, 1867. Barrels of whiskey were found in several of the different rooms or apartments of the buildings on the premises, including the brewery. One of the stills, a copper one, was in operation, and the other, a wooden one, in an upper loft, had recently stopped, as was apparent from the heat of it. This last was heated by the same engine and boiler that were used to supply steam to the brewery, and the engine and boiler occupied a part of the same room in which was the copper still that was in operation. There was, also, a communication between this room and the brewery. The claimant insists that he was engaged exclusively in making lager beer, and occupied only a portion of the premises, consisting of the brewery, the engine and boiler room, and the malt room, stable and hay loft, and that he had no connection with the other parts of the building, occupied for the distillation of whiskey; and he produces a lease of the particular part occupied by himself. The revenue officers seized not only the stills, and the property connected therewith, and the whiskey, but also the brewery and all the personal property appurtenant thereto. No one appeared to claim the stills, &c., which it is said were occupied by one Smith, under a lease from the father of the claimant, who owned the premises, and had leased to the latter the portion he occupied. The question is, whether or not the officer was justified in the seizure of the property connected with the brewery.

Section 48 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 240), as amended by the ninth section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 111), is as follows, so far as relates to the present case: "All goods, wares and merchandise, articles or objects on which taxes are imposed by the provisions of law, which shall be found in the possession or custody, or within the control, of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold or removed by such person or persons, in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with design to avoid payment of said taxes, may be seized by the collector or deputy collector of the proper district, or by such other collector or deputy collector as may be specially authorized by the commissioner of internal revenue for that purpose, and the same shall be forfeited to the United States; and also all raw materials found in possession of any person or persons intending to manufacture the same into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, or with design to evade the payment of said tax; and also all tools, implements, instruments and personal property whatsoever, in the place or building, or within any yard or enclosure, where such articles or such raw materials shall be found, may also be seized by any collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid; and the same shall be forfeited as aforesaid; and the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem, in the circuit or district court of the United States," &c. This section is very comprehensive, and, as is obvious, was so designed. It embraces, first, all goods, articles, or objects on which taxes are imposed by law, found in the possession or within the control of any person, for the purpose of being sold or removed in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with intent to avoid payment of the taxes; second, all raw materials found in like possession or control, intended to be manufactured into articles of a kind subject to tax, with the intent to sell the same in fraud of the revenue, or to evade the payment of the tax; and third, all personal property whatsoever found in the place or building, or within the yard or enclosure, where the articles or raw materials previously referred to were found or seized. The reason for the seizure of the articles enumerated in the first and second class, is obvious enough. It is for the fraudulent intent of the person in the possession or control of them, that is, an intent to defraud the public revenue by evading the tax. The seizure of the articles in the third class stands on different grounds, namely, association with the guilty classes or articles. The fraudulent intent or purpose of the person in the possession, or having the control, of the articles does not constitute an element of the offence or ground of forfeiture. The reason for embracing this latter class is said to be, that personal property thus situated was frequently used to facilitate the accomplishment of the frauds provided against in the fore part of the section—for example, it is said, that distilleries were established in the rear of a livery stable, the latter being used not only as a blind, but being conveniently employed in the fraudulent removal of the distilled products.

The seizure of the property connected with the brewery in the present case was made under this section, the government claiming that it was within the same building and enclosure within which were found the guilty articles, namely, the stills, whiskey, &c. The evidence in this case leaves no doubt of the fact; and hence, prima facie, at least, this property fell within the clause in section 48, and called for explanation on the part of the claimant. This he undertook by attempting to establish that his business was wholly independent of the business of distilling whiskey, and that he occupied premises distinct and separate from those occupied by Smith the distiller. But the testimony is conclusive to show that, in respect to several parts of the premises, they were occupied in common, and that the engine and boiler of the claimant, for carrying on his brewery, were used for working a still in an upper loft to which access could be had only through apartments which it is admitted he occupied.

This provision of the law concerning articles of themselves innocent, but associated with guilty articles, is so specific and unqualified, that it might with great plausibility be contended that, if the former articles are found in the building, yard or enclosure, no explanation is admissible. We do not, however, concur in this conclusion. The provision is penal, and necessarily implies some degree of guilt in the condition of the property subjected to forfeiture. If the condition, however, in which it is found brings it within the words of the clause in the section, the onus is upon the claimant to make out, to the satisfaction of the court and jury, that the situation of the property was consistent with his entire innocence.

It is very strongly argued, that the forty-eighth section does not embrace the article of distilled spirits, and that other portions of the act, from section 23 onward, provide for that article. But we find nothing in those sections inconsistent with or repugnant to the section in question; and the article falls directly within its words.

It was also argued, that the court should have submitted the question, as one of fact, to the jury, whether the articles claimed were in the place, or within the building, yard or enclosure, where the distilled spirits, and the raw materials for making them, were found and seized. But the evidence was all one way on this point, and no question of fact could be raised upon it. The court rightfully disposed of it. We perceive no ground for granting a new trial, either upon the law or the evidence. New trial denied.

Case No. 15,955.

[6 Int. Rev. Rec. 67.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE — FORFEITURES — INFORMER'S SHARE.

[An informer's share, under section 179 of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of July 13, 1866, and under the regulations of the secretary of the treasury of August 4, 1866, is to be calculated upon the gross proceeds of the forfeitures, without deducting the costs. Reaffirming Case No. 10,534.]

[This was an information of forfeiture, under the internal revenue laws, against one still boiler, etc.]

It was heretofore decided in this case that the informer's share should be calculated on the gross proceeds of the forfeiture and not on the net proceeds after payment of costs, according to the practice that has hitherto obtained. See One Still [Case No. 10,534]. The district attorney obtained leave to re-argue the question, and the judge has now rendered his decision on the re-argument.

S. G. Courtney, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Henry & Clarkson, for the informers.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge, after setting forth the law as fixed by the 9th section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], and the regulations of the secretary of the treasury made in pursuance of that section, proceeded:

It is contended on the part of the government that it is the meaning of the statute that the informer's share, whatever it may be, shall be estimated on the sum actually received by the government; that until recently the marshal, on the sale of forfeited property, paid its proceeds into the registry of the court, and the clerk then paid out of such proceeds the costs and expenses of the suit, and paid over the remainder to the collector of internal revenue for distribution; that in such case the sum received by the government was the sum received by the collector, and not the sum paid into the registry of the court, the clerk receiving the money from the marshal, not as the agent of the United States, but as the officer of the court; that where, as now, the practice is for the clerk to pay the informer's share directly to him, and the balance directly to the proper government officer, the government does not, any more than in the other case, receive that portion of the proceeds which have been consumed in the payment of costs; that this view is supported by the decision made by Judge Benedict, in the case in the Eastern district of New York, of U. S. v. Seven Large Fermenting Tubs [Case No. 16,254], who, while holding that under the statute and the general regulations made by the treasury department, the percentage of the informer is to be calculated upon the gross proceeds of the forfeited property, also held that the costs of the proceedings, through which the fund in court is realized, are a charge upon the whole fund, and must, in the distribution, be paid out of the proceeds of sale before the share of the informer can be distributed to him; that in this view the government cannot be said in any proper sense to receive the costs so as to distribute a portion of them to the informer, and that the informer has nothing to do with anything but what the government actually receives.

The whole argument on the part of the government is based on a fallacy. The share given to the informer by the statute is such share of the fine, penalty or forfeiture, whether it is recovered with or without judgment or decree (but not exceeding one moiety nor more than $5,000 in any one case) as the secretary of the treasury shall prescribe by general regulations. The statute confides the whole matter of the amount of the informer's share to the discretion of the secretary, to be exercised by general regulations, subject to the limitation fixed by the statute. In the case of a fine, penalty or forfeiture recovered by suit, the statute requires that the court decreeing the recovery shall ascertain who was the first informer, and in the case of any sum paid without suit or before judgment in lieu of fine, penalty or forfeiture, the statute requires the secretary to determine under general regulations to be made by him, who was the first informer. * * * The statute contemplates that the general regulations shall assign to an informer, one and the same share of a fine, penalty or forfeiture, whether it is recovered by suit or whether a sum is paid in lieu of it, by way of compromise; and the secretary has so interpreted the law. The shares he prescribes are for shares of all proceeds and moneys whether recovered by judgment or paid without suit or before judgment, and are applicable to all fines, all penalties and all forfeitures received under the internal revenue laws. The fallacy of the view taken by the government is in the idea that under the statute or the general regulations, the informer's share is to be estimated on the sum received by the government. There is in the first place, nothing in the statute to uphold this view. That portion of the section which speaks of the vesting of a right in the informer, has reference solely to the time when the right shall vest in the informer, and says that no right shall accrue to or be vested in the informer until the fine, penalty or forfeiture is fixed by judgment or compromise, and the proceeds or amount shall have been paid, and that then the informer shall become entitled to his legal share of the sum adjudged or agreed upon and received. There is nothing in this provision which necessarily restricts the informer's share to a share of the proceeds or amount paid to or received by the government. The provision has no reference to amount, but concerns only the question of time, and was intended to guard against all claim by an informer to a vested right in a fine, penalty or forfeiture incurred; nor, in any view, can the word paid or the word received, in this provision, mean paid to the government or received by the government. The provision, so far as the import of the words paid and received is concerned, means that until, in the case of a recovery by judgment, the fine, penalty or forfeiture is fixed by the judgment, and the amount or proceeds shall have been paid thereunder, and until, in the case of the payment of a sum without suit or before judgment, in lieu of fine, penalty or forfeiture, the sum is fixed by compromise and paid, the informer shall have no right, or title, or vested interest to or in any share of it. The words paid and received have no reference whatever to the payment to. or the receipt by, the government of its share of the amount or proceeds of the recovery, or of its share of the sum paid by way of compromise. In the present case, under the decree of condemnation, the right of the informer did not vest until the payment to the marshal of the proceeds of the sale of the condemned property; but where those proceeds were paid to the marshal, then the informer became entitled to his legal share of those proceeds. That share is a percentage, to be calculated, according to the general regulations, on the gross amount of the proceeds so paid to the marshal. Those gross proceeds are the forfeiture, or in other words, the property condemned as forfeited and ordered by the decree to be sold by the marshal; and the general regulations give to the informer, as his share, a percentage, to be calculated on the amount of the forfeiture, that is, on the amount of the gross proceeds of the sale of the property condemned as forfeited. If any interpretation were to be given to the provision of the statute which says that the informer shall be entitled to his legal share of the sum adjudged or agreed upon and received, as in any way defining the amount of the share, such interpretation would be that the informer is entitled to a share of the sum adjudged, or the proceeds of the property adjudged, to be the forfeiture or the sum agreed upon in lieu of the forfeiture and received, and thus to a share in the present case of the gross proceeds of the sale of the property condemned as forfeited. But the whole question of the amount of the share, within the limits fixed by the statute, is left to the secretary. He may, by general regulations, make it greater or less. He might have followed the example set by the 91st section of the tariff act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 697], which says that all fines, penalties and forfeitures recovered by virtue of that act shall, "after deducting all proper costs and charges," be disposed of in a certain way. He might have directed that the costs and expenses of the suit should be first deducted, and that the informer should then have a certain percentage of the net proceeds remaining. But he has not seen fit to do so. He has said, as strongly as negative language can say it, that the costs and expenses of the suit shall not be first deducted, but that the informer shall receive a percentage, to be calculated on the amount paid as a fine or penalty by the person on whom the fine or penalty is imposed, or on the proceeds of the sale of the property condemned as forfeited, and that no part of the costs or expenses shall be charged upon the share of the informer. The secretary had a right to say this. He had a right to give to the informer such share, within the limits fixed, as in the exercise of his discretion he thought calculated to promote the objects aimed at by the statute. The statute was intended to encourage persons to inform as to causes of forfeiture, and the presumption is that the secretary deemed it wise on the whole to hold out to informers the inducements offered by his regulations, by saying to them that no part of the costs or expenses should be charged upon the share resulting from the percentage affixed to a given case. And in this connection I am free to say that I do not concur with Judge Benedict in his view that the costs and expenses of the proceedings through which the fund in court is realized are a charge on the whole fund, and must be paid out of the proceeds of sale before the share of the informer can be distributed to him, if the conclusion from that view is that the informer's share, ascertained by computing his percentage on the gross proceeds, can be made liable for a portion of the costs and expenses, if the residue beyond the informer's share is not sufficient to defray those costs and expenses.. The result is that I am confirmed in the conclusion at which I before arrived, and that an order must be entered in this case, declaring William H. Craig to be the person who first informed of the cause, matter or thing whereby the forfeiture of the property condemned in this suit was incurred, and that he is entitled to have the share or percentage of such forfeiture to which as such person he is entitled, computed on the gross amount of the proceeds of the sale by the marshal under the decree herein of such property.

Case No. 15,956.

[6 Int. Rev. Rec. 220.]

District Court, D. Kentucky. Dec., 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE—WHO ARE DISTILLERS.

[Persons who make, by the same process and machinery which distillers use, alcoholic vapor, but do not condense this vapor into spirits or alcohol, and have no machinery adapted to that purpose, but who, on the contrary, conduct it into a large vessel containing a mixture of water, vinegar, and yeast, with which it instantly mingled, are not "distillers," either within the meaning of the 21st or 23d sections of the act of July 13, 1866, or the 16th section of the act of March 2, 1867; nor are they subject to the special tax under the joint resolution of February 5, 1867.]

[This was an information of forfeiture against one still, etc., for alleged violation of the revenue laws.]

BALLARD, District Judge. This is a proceeding by information in which the plaintiffs seek to have one still and one mash tub adjudged forfeited on account of certain violations of the internal revenue laws. The first count in the information is founded on the 23d section of the act approved July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 153), and the second is founded on the 25th section of the same act. The first count alleges, that on the first day of July, 1867, at the district of Kentucky, the said still and mash tub were used by, and found on the premises of R. T. Durrett, John S. Cain, and D. C. Freeman, who were then and there carrying on the business of distillers, and who had not then and there made payment of the special tax as in that behalf required. The second count alleges, that on the day aforesaid the persons above named did use the said still and mash tub for the purpose of distilling on the premises where vinegar was then and there manufactured. The offenses here charged are certainly embraced by the sections above mentioned, and, therefore, it is unnecessary to quote the sections themselves.

The claimants, in their answer, admit that they own the still and tub seized, and that they have not paid any special tax as distillers, but they deny that they have carried on the business of distillers, as alleged in the first count, or that they have at any time used said still and tub for the purpose of distilling on the premises where vinegar was manufactured, as is alleged in the second count. By agreement of parties a jury was dispensed with, and the cause tried by the court, as provided in the act of March 3, 1865, entitled "An act regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes" (13 Stat. 501). All the facts were agreed by the parties, and such of them as are deemed material by me are as follows: "It is further admitted that the process used by claimants conforms to the plan proposed by the specifications annexed to Freeman's patent (paper A), submitted to the commissioner of internal revenue as aforesaid. As to the process used by claimants, it is admitted that the mashing of the grain, the making of the beer, and the generation of the alcoholic vapor is substantially the same as that used by the distiller. But from that point forward the apparatus differs essentially in this; the alcoholic vapor, when produced, is not passed through any worm or cooling medium; nor is any machinery attached or used calculated to condense the vapor into alcoholic spirits. On the contrary the alcoholic vapor passes by pipes into a tank containing vinegar ferment (composed of a mixture of water, vinegar and yeast), and there instantly mingles with and forms part of the ferment, producing at once an aldehydrous liquid, and not alcohol or spirits. The amount of alcohol which enters into the aldehydrous liquid is not exceeding from 5 to 8 per cent. of the liquid produced. The tank in which the alcoholic vapor is mingled with the vinegar ferment has a movable top which renders it unfit for use for the purpose of condensing alcoholic vapor into spirits. If any portion of the alcoholic vapor is condensed into liquid before its contact with the vinegar ferment it is incidental and not intended, as what is claimed as chiefly valuable in Freeman's process is the immediate and intimate mingling of particles produced by the contact of the alcoholic vapor with the vinegar ferment, and the machinery is constructed with the view of producing this result at a temperature as nearly as 80° (the most favorable for oxidization) as can be obtained. The aldehydrous liquid produced is drawn off into vats for further fermentation into vinegar, and is not valuable for any other purpose. There is no complication in the machinery, and it is not furnished with the necessary apparatus for the most indifferent distillery of alcohol or spirits. A fluid produced by distillation containing less than thirty per cent. of alcohol is not a commercial article. Fifty per cent. of alcohol is called 'proof.' The presence of yeast in the liquid would destroy the commercial value as alcohol. It is further agreed that a mixture in any proportions whatever of alcohol or spirits with water will not produce vinegar by mere exposure to the atmospheric air, and that the aldehydrous liquid produced by claimants will turn to vinegar by mere exposure to atmospheric air. It is further agreed that in practice by claimants that they pour into their inner tank about twenty gallons of vinegar and a half gallon of yeast produced on the premises, and then run the vapor into that compound for two and a half hours, when water is added to make the compound measure about five barrels, sometimes the water is added with the vinegar and yeast before the vapor is run in. The latter is claimed by defendants to be the better plan, when they ascertain by practice the proper quantity, but either mode may be used. It is also agreed that the diagram marked section of vinegar apparatus is a fair, substantial representation of claimants' tank and pipes in which the aldehydrous liquid is produced. It is further agreed that either party may read in argument such scientific works as they may deem material to a proper understanding of the subject."

I do not deem it necessary to insert here the specifications of Freeman's patent, because his invention and the method of using it sufficiently appear in the agreed facts already set forth.

The question then arises on the first count. Are the claimants distillers within the meaning of the act of congress? If they are, the property seized must be condemned. If they are not, it must be restored to the claimants. The act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 253), defines a distiller to be "any person, firm, or corporation who distills or manufactures spirits for sale." The similar act of July 13, 1866, contains two definitions—the first on page 117, and the second on page 153, 14 Stat. By the first it is declared "that every person, firm or corporation, who distills or manufactures spirits, or who brews or makes mash, wort or wash for distillation, or the production of spirits, shall be deemed a distiller." By the second, "that every person, firm or corporation, who distills or manufactures spirits or alcohol by continuous distillation from grain, who brews or makes mash, wort or wash for distillation or the production of spirits, shall be deemed a distiller." The act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 481), contains still another definition. It declares that "every person, firm, or corporation who distills spirits or alcohol, or who brews or makes wort or wash for distillation, or the production of sprits, shall be deemed a distiller."

It is unnecessary to point out the differences between these several definitions, because a proper decision of the present question does not in any respect depend upon such difference. To constitute one a distiller, under any one of the definitions, he must distil or manufacture spirits or alcohol, or he must brew or make mash, wort, or wash for the distillation or production of spirits. It matters not that he brews or makes mash, wort or wash for other purposes, if he does not brew or make them for the distillation or production of spirits, he is not a distiller. True, the act provides "that the making or keeping of grain, mash, wash, wort or beer prepared or fit for distillation, together with the possession of a still, boiler or other apparatus capable of use for distilling upon the same premises, shall be deemed and taken as presumptive evidence that such person is a distiller;" but this, like every other presumption, is of course, liable to be rebutted or repelled by proof of the actual facts.

Now, the agreed facts show that the claimants do not distil or manufacture spirits or alcohol. They make, by exactly the same process and machinery which distillers use, the alcoholic vapor, but they do not condense this vapor into spirits or alcohol, nor have they any machinery adapted to such a purpose. The vapor is not passed through any worm or condenser, such as is used by distillers, but it is taken directly into a large vessel, having a loose cover and containing a mixture of water, vinegar and yeast, when it instantly mingles with and forms part of the ferment, producing at once an aldehydrous liquid and not alcohol or spirits. If it produces neither alcohol nor spirits, what ground is there for contending that the claimants are distillers within the meaning of the acts? They do, it is true, brew or make mash, wash or wort fit for distillation, and they do, by the ordinary apparatus used by distillers, convert this wort, or some of it, into vapor; but they have no apparatus, such as distillers use, to condense this vapor, nor is it in fact so condensed as to form either alcohol or spirits. The facts, then, which would, under the statute, presumptively constitute the claimants distillers, do not exist, or, if such a presumption could be indulged from some of the facts admitted, it is completely repelled by the further admitted fact that neither spirits nor alcohol is produced.

But the plaintiffs insist that the alcoholic vapor which claimants produce, is made by the process of distillation, that it is alcohol, though in the form of vapor, and therefore that the claimants are distillers. In support they refer to Ure's dictionary of the manufactures and arts, title "Distillation." They quote Dr. Ure as saying that "distillation comprehends the four processes of mashing the vegetable material, cooling the worts, exciting the vinous fermentation, and separating by a peculiar vessel called a still the alcohol combined with more or less water." They assume that Dr. Ure here means by the term "still," that part of the machinery used by a distiller which is called a "still' in common parlance, and is employed only to vaporize the worts; hence they conclude that when the vapor is formed the process of distilling is complete. This argument is based on a misapprehension of Dr. Ure's real meaning. That he does not mean by the term "still" what counsel supposes, that is, simply that part of the machinery by which vapor is generated, is tolerably manifest from his statement "That it is the vessel by which the alcohol is separated," for the machinery by which the vapor is condensed into a liquid is as essential a part of the separating apparatus as that by which it is generated. That Dr. Ure means to comprehend under the term "still" the vapor-condensing as well as the vapor-generating apparatus is, I say, tolerably manifest from what he here says, but it is made absolutely certain if we turn to his definition of "still." He defines "still" to be "a chemical apparatus for vaporizing liquids in one part called the 'cucurbit' and condensing the vapors into liquids in another part called the 'refrigeratory,' the general purpose of both combined being to separate the more volatile fluid particles from the less volatile." That is, if possible, made still more certain if we look to the definition of "distillation" to be found in his supplement, page 454. He there says: "Distillation consists in the conversion of any substance into vapor in a vessel so arranged that the vapors are condensed and collected again in a vessel apart." "The word is derived from the Latin 'dis,' and 'stillo,' 'I drop,' meaning originally to drop or fall in drops, and is very applicable to the process since the condensation generally takes place dropwise." This definition accords with that which I find in every dictionary and scientific work which I have consulted. See Webster, Worcester, New American Encyclopedia (volume 7), and Stockhardt's Principles of Chemistry (page 42). See also the report of Commissioner Rollins to the present congress (page 24), where the process of distillation is, I think, more accurately stated than it is by Dr. Ure. "Distillation," then, according to its scientific as well as its popular sense, embraces "condensation." It is its primary meaning, and more nearly expresses the full sense of the term as it is used in scientific works, and in the statutes of the United States, than the mere generation of vapor. The generation of vapor is not distillation, else every old woman who boils her teakettle is a distiller, and every steamboat is a distillery—not of spirits, it is true, but of water. The chemist or other person who boils sea or other water and thus vaporizes the more volatile parts, and then condenses the vapor into water, is, in truth and in fact, a distiller, and the product is distilled water; but if the vapor be never condensed and collected there is no distillation. The vapor which escapes into the air from every boiling vessel is, in fact, condensed or distilled in nature's laboratory, and falls in the shape of rain or dewdrops; but he who caused the vessel to boil is not in a popular or scientific sense a distiller, because he neither condenses the vapor nor collects the product. Surely, then, if as we have seen, condensation be a part of distillation, the claimants do not make themselves distillers by merely generating alcoholic vapor, for, if they should allow all their vapor to escape into the open air, and never condense or collect it in any form, I imagine plaintiffs themselves would not gravely insist that they would be distillers of alcohol.

The plaintiffs, however, insist that the alcoholic vapor generated by claimants is condensed into alcohol when it comes in contact with the colder liquid in the tank, and, therefore, that claimants are distillers; but they have agreed that it is not condensed into alcohol or spirits, and they cannot be heard to argue against the agreed facts. They have agreed that the liquor in the tank, after the infusion of the alcoholic vapor, is an aldehydrous liquid, and "not alcohol or spirits." Nor does it appear that the alcoholic vapor is first condensed and then mingled with the other liquid; the agreed facts state "that it passes by pipes into a tank containing vinegar ferment, composed of a mixture of water, vinegar and yeast, and then instantly mingles with and forms part of the ferment, producing an aldehydrous liquid, and not alcohol or spirits." Even were it otherwise—were it admitted that the alcoholic vapor, after permeating the vinegar ferment, and before mingling with it, is condensed into alcohol, and that it is there mixed with it mechanically, not chemically—I should hesitate long before pronouncing the process a distillation of alcohol, because the alcohol so produced being, before it is formed, mixed with a large quantity of water and vinegar is not alcohol in the commercial sense, and cannot be made so, if at all, without redistilling the whole compound, and thus separating the alcohol from the other liquid. If, however, the facts were still different, if it were shown that the vapor is condensed into spirits in the pipes leading to the tank which contains the vinegar ferment, and thus it is converted into alcohol before it is mixed with the ferment, the question would be quite different. But I cannot decide either of these questions, and I do not wish to be understood as even intimating an opinion respecting them. They are not presented. The agreed facts exclude all idea that the alcoholic vapor is ever condensed into alcohol or spirits, and I only decide on these facts: that the claimants are not distillers within the meaning of either the 21st or 23d section of the act of July 13, 1866, or the 16th section of the act of March 2, 1867.

This disposition of the question arising on the first count, and under the 23d section of the act of 1866, also disposes of the question arising on the second count and under the 25th section. For nothing is plainer than that the term "distilling," used in this section, means a distilling of alcohol or spirits, and, as claimants distilled neither the one nor the other, they are also acquitted of the charge contained in this count. I understand the plaintiffs to substantially concede, that this decision is right if the questions are to be resolved solely by the acts of 1866 and 1867, but they insist, with much apparent confidence, that the decision must be otherwise if reference be had to the joint resolution approved February 5, 1867 (14 Stat. 566). This resolution provides "that alcohol made or manufactured of distilled spirits upon which the taxes imposed by law shall have been paid, and burning fluid made or manufactured from alcohol, or spirits of turpentine, or camphene upon which the taxes imposed by law shall have been paid, shall be and hereby are exempt from tax and so much of section ninety-six of the act of June 30, 1864, as relates to alcohol and burning fluid is hereby repealed, and all products of distillation, by whatever name known, which contain distilled spirits, or alcohol on which the tax imposed by law has not been paid, shall be considered and taxed as distilled spirits."

The argument is, that claimants' vinegar ferment does contain alcohol on which the tax has not been paid, and therefore the whole ferment is to be considered "distilled spirits" by virtue of this resolution. But plaintiffs here again forget that by the "agreed facts" the alcoholic vapor manufactured by claimants is never converted into alcohol, and that no assertion contrary to such fact can be received by the court. The agreed facts, however, do state that "the amount of alcohol which enters into the aldehydrous liquid is not exceeding from 5 to 8 per cent. of the liquid produced;" but this statement must be taken in connection with the other fact admitted, to wit, "that no alcohol is produced," and so taken, it only means, that the infusion of the alcoholic vapor into the vinegar ferment, consisting of water, vinegar and yeast, adds to the volume from 5 to 8 per cent. It cannot mean that the alcoholic vapor is converted into alcohol, for it had just been admitted that it, with the water, vinegar and yeast, is converted into an aldehydrous liquid and not spirits or alcohol. Supposing, however, the vinegar ferment does contain 5 or 8 per cent. of alcohol, which might, by distillation or chemical process, be separated, it never yet has had separate existence as alcohol in the commercial sense, which is the sense in which I understand the term is used in the statute. But surely the whole vinegar ferment is not a "product of distillation." It is not pretended that more than eight per cent. is such product, and even this pretense, we have seen, when considering the question arising on the first count of the information, is dispelled. And if the vinegar ferment is not a product of distillation, how is it to be considered or taxed as distilled spirits under this resolution? It is only "products of distillation" which, by the terms of the resolution, are to be so considered and taxed. It is not enough that an article contains spirits or alcohol it must itself be a "product of distillation."

The suggestion here made by the plaintiffs, that the spirits contained in the vinegar ferment is a product of distillation, and that it should be considered and taxed as distilled spirits, is only a reproduction of the same matter which we have already noticed in the first part of this opinion. Of course, if the spirits contained in the vinegar ferment is distilled spirits, it is a product of distillation, and is taxable under the statute quite independently of this resolution, but if it is not distilled spirits, which is the fact, as I have before shown, then it is not a "product" of distillation, and I see not how this resolution can apply to it. I am not sure that I know the meaning of the resolution; but I think it means (so far as it relates to alcohol and spirits) this and this only: that alcohol made of distilled spirits on which the tax has been paid shall be exempt from the tax, but that alcohol or other article distilled (thus making it a "product of distillation") from alcohol or distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, shall be considered and taxed as distilled spirits. This is all I can make out of it. No other construction, it seems to me, is warranted by the words, or by any supposed mischief intended to be remedied. That it can receive a construction so wide as to hold that vinegar shall be considered and taxed as distilled spirits, if it happen to contain a small portion of alcohol bought regularly in the market, on which the tax has not been paid, is, I think, impossible; and yet this is the construction which must be adopted if plaintiffs' argument have any force. Construing the joint resolution as I do, it has no application to the case before me.

The views here presented are fully supported by the opinion of the learned district judge of the district of Wisconsin in the case of U. S. v. Two Barrels Containing Liquor [Case No. 16,575]. If I were even more doubtful then I am of the correctness of my own conclusions, I would be inclined, for the sake of uniformity, to follow his decision. Upon the whole it is adjudged that the claimants have supported their claim, and are entitled to restitution.

District Court, E. D. Tennessee. Aug., 1869.[1]

CONFISCATION ACTS—WAR OF THE REBELLION—SEIZURE OF COTTON—PROCLAMATION OF AMNESTY—JUDICIAL NOTICE — CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES.

1. The president's proclamation of pardon and amnesty issued Dec. 25, 1868, removed the guilt from parties who had sold, given, purchased, or acquired cotton with intent that the same should be used in aiding or abetting the insurrection, and thereby relieved the property itself from being a lawful subject of prize and capture under the act of August 6, 1861 (12 Stat. 319).

2. The courts will take judicial notice of the fact that the hostilities of the late Civil War ceased and peace was restored by the surrender of the last armies of the Confederacy west of the Mississippi in May, 1865.

[This was an information of forfeiture against 1,500 bales of cotton, under the confiscation act of August 6, 1861.]

TRIGG, District Judge. The information charged, first, that the cotton (1,500 bales) had been sold or given, purchased or acquired, with the intent to be used in aiding, abetting and promoting the late insurrection, and that the same was used by the owners, or by their consent, in aiding, abetting and promoting said insurrection, in violation of the act of congress approved the 6th day of August, 1861 [12 Stat. 319], and thereby became a lawful subject of prize and capture; second, it was charged that the cotton had been purchased in and was being transported from a state or district in insurrection against the United States, into some one of the loyal states, and that the same became thereby forfeited to the United States, being in violation of the act of congress approved July 13, 1861 [Id. 255]. The issues were made upon these two charges in the information, and a vast amount of testimony, oral and written, was given to the jury. The verdict of the jury in favor of the claimant upon the first charge in the information, I think, resulted mainly from the charge of the court as to the effect of the proclamation of pardon and amnesty issued by the president on the 25th day of December, 1868.

The court charged the jury, substantially, that if the cotton in controversy had been sold or given, purchased or acquired, with the intent that the same should be used in aiding, abetting or promoting the insurrection in the spring of 1865, or if the owners consented that the same might be so used; that the proclamation aforesaid, of the 25th of December, 1868, had the effect to remove the guilt of the party thus selling or giving the cotton to be used, and also the guilt of the owner consenting to such use, and thereby relieved the property itself from being a lawful subject of prize, and capture under and by virtue of the said act of August 6, 1861. The second charge in the information —to wit, that the cotton had been purchased in a state or district in insurrection, and was being thence transported into some one of the loyal states, in violation of the act of July 13, 1861—was decided in favor of the claimant, mainly, I think, upon the charge of the court to the effect, substantially, as follows: That the act last mentioned, commonly termed the "Non-Intercourse Act," prohibited all commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of the states or parts of states declared in insurrection and the rest of the United States, and such commercial intercourse should be unlawful as long "as such condition of hostility should continue." That the act, by its own limitation, would cease to be operative whenever the insurrectionary forces threw down their arms, surrendered to the authority of the United States, and their hostile demonstrations had ceased.

It was contended on behalf of the government that the court could not judicially know that hostilities had ceased unless that fact had been brought to its attention by plea or motion, and not until the president had issued his proclamation so declaring. But the court being of the opinion that, inasmuch as no formal declaration was necessary in a domestic war, the courts would take judicial cognizance of the fact that war existed, so likewise when the war was ended and peace restored would the courts take judicial cognizance of the fact that it was ended. It could hardly be supposed that this court should affect ignorance of a great fact in the history of the country, which was known to every man, woman and child throughout the length and breadth of the land, and keep its eyes closed until they should be opened by the formality of a plea and the proclamation of the president. The court accordingly instructed the jury that the Rebel forces on the west side of the Mississippi river, being the last to do so, having surrendered to the authority of the United States on the 24th or 25th of May, 1865, if they should believe from the evidence that the cotton in controversy was not shipped from within the Rebel lines until after that time, that then the "Non-Intercourse Act," as it is called, had ceased by its own limitation to be operative, and the cotton was not forfeited under said act by coming from an insurrectionary state or district into a loyal state or part of a state not declared in insurrection.

There were other points in the instructions given to the jury, such as permits claimed to have been issued by the secretary of the treasury and Mr. President Lincoln, which may have had some weight with the jury, but as those stated doubtless mainly influenced the decision of the case in favor of the claimant of the cotton, I deem it needless at this time to recur to any other questions of law stated in the charge of the court.

[This cause was carried, on writ of error, to the circuit court, where the decree of this court was reversed, and a venire de novo awarded. Case No. 15,958.]

Case No. 15,958.

UNITED STATES v. ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED BALES OF COTTON.

[15 Int. Rev. Rec. 137; 4 Chi. Leg. News, 245; 1 Am. Law Rec. 93; 6 Am. Law Rev. 766.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. May, 1872.[2]

JUDICIAL NOTICE—MATTERS OF HISTORY—DATE OF MILITARY SURRENDER—CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES—SALE TO THE CONFEDERACY UNDER COMPULSION—LAWS OF CONFEDERACY—COERCION.

1. Courts will take judicial cognizance of the public history of the country, and in the modes of its ascertainment it is treated like a question of law, and investigated in the same manner in its own proper sources; thus public documents and histories are to be consulted.

2. Without deciding whether the court below should have taken judicial cognizance of the precise date when the surrender of the rebel general Kirby Smith occurred, or whether, when such accuracy becomes material, the proofs which the parties desire to present must be submitted to a jury, this is certainly clear that if the court assumes the duty of its determination it must decide it correctly; and it is as much an error for a court to mistake an historical fact of which it has taken cognizance as to mistake a principle of law. Thus the charge to the jury that the rebel general Kirby Smith surrendered on the 24th of May, 1865, was error. The common histories of the country, the Annual Encyclopedia, and repeated judgments of the courts show it to have taken place on the 26th of May, 1865.

3. It was conceded by the court below that if the cotton in question—which had been laden on the steamboat on the Red and other rivers in that portion of the state of Louisiana, then proclaimed to be in insurrection, and which was in the actual military occupation of the rebel military forces, commanded by General Kirby Smith—had started upon said steamboat, before the actual surrender of General Smith, for transportation to Memphis, Tenn., which was within the lines of federal military occupation, then the same would be forfeited under section 5, Act July 13, 1861 [12 Stat. 257], and amendatory acts prohibiting commercial intercourse between citizens of states in insurrection and citizens of the rest of the United States. Thus, upon the theory of the learned judge himself, said cotton was forfeited, because it had started on its transit before said surrender, it having left on May 25, and said surrender taking place on the 26th of May, 1865.

4. The legal consequence deduced from the erroneous assumption as to the time of the surrender of General Kirby Smith, that trade and intercourse became lawful between Louisiana and Tennessee and hostilities ceased upon the said surrender was no better grounded in the law than was the fact itself in the history of the country. The proclamation of the president, or other political recognition of the return of peace, was necessary to work such a consequence. The conditions of war and peace, the political status of governments and people in our system, are purely of political, and not judicial determination. The entire legislative history and public action of the country in reference to the late Rebellion conclusively show that such has been the theory upon which our courts and the government have proceeded in its suppression, and dealing with its consequences. The supreme court of the United States in repeated and literally applicable judgments have so decided, and thus have set the matter wholly at rest.

5. It was error to suppose that the cessation of hostilities was synonymous with the surrender of organized armies, and that peace meant the disbanding of military forces, instead of a full return of the masses of the people to loyalty and good citizenship.

6. Where cotton had been sold to the Confederate government upon the understanding that it should sell and divide the proceeds, no forfeiture of such cotton will be incurred under section 1, Act Aug. 6, 1861 [12 Stat. 319], to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes, where it appears that the owners of the same were compelled by force or bodily fear to make such sales; but the mere existence of a law prescribed by an insurrectionary government in itself is insufficient to justify those who owe allegiance to a lawful sovereignty. And therefore the charge to the jury that a mere law without more was an excuse for obeying it was erroneous.

7. The Confederate government could make no law. Its prescriptions imposed no obligations, political or moral, and the only justification for obedience which the citizen could make to his rightful sovereign was deadly coercion by violence or threats.

[Error to the circuit court of the United States for the Western district of Tennessee.]

[The information in this cause charged—First, that the cotton had been sold or given with the intent of aiding in the insurrection; and second, that the cotton had been purchased in and was being transported from, a state in insurrection, to a loyal state, thus forfeiting the cotton to the United States, according to act of congress of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 255). Verdict was rendered in favor of claimants (Case No. 15,957), and this writ of error was brought.]

H. E. Hudson, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Haynes & Stockton, Henry Croft and Thomas R. Smith, for defendants in error.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge. This was a writ of error to reverse the judgment in the district court. The forfeiture was claimed upon two grounds. That the cotton had been voluntarily sold and delivered to the Confederate government in aid of the rebellion—and that it had been unlawfully removed from a district within the rebel lines to one within the lines of federal occupation. The writ of error brings up a written record of very voluminous character. We cannot but presume that it in some degree fails to represent the actual history of the trial. Nothing is more common than for a written record, by omissions overlooked by court and counsel when it is made up, to misrepresent most substantially the real judgment of the court. The decision here must necessarily be upon the bill of exceptions as it is, but our respect for the learned judge who tried this cause—our knowledge of his other judgments and rulings, so clearly evincive of opinions at war with some of those contained in this record—induce the belief that there must be a failure in some degree to reproduce the trial just as it occurred. The cause was argued many months since, and the court entertained no doubt whatever that manifest errors appeared. Upon inquiry of counsel, they were at the moment unable to find in the record the exceptions which were necessary to bring them here for consideration. The character of the charge and rulings were immaterial unless they were excepted to by the party aggrieved. The cause stood over for counsel to prepare their briefs, referring to the record for the facts material to the judgment, and especially to the exceptions—if any there were. The government's counsel aver they have long been ready, but from courtesy the counsel of the defendant in error, who were not so, the cause although several times referred to from the bench, was not again called to our attention until a few days since. A full, satisfactory and learned written argument is now before us for the plaintiff in error. The exceptions are ample to bring in review the faults complained of in the charge.

A single fault renders reversal as necessary as though there were many. As the cause will stand for a new trial in the circuit court, no opinion will be expressed upon questions not necessary for the decision, although they may be involved in a rehearing of the cause. There are, too, quite a number of points discussed and decided adversely to our opinions, which will, in all probability, not again arise in another trial.

A single question will be considered, and upon its answer alone the reversal of the judgment will rest. Did his honor the district judge correctly lay down the law in the following portion of his charge? It was made in disregard of a carefully drawn request to give contrary instructions. After remarking that the courts without any congressional resolution or law, or presidential proclamation, or other governmental action, must take judicial notice, without proofs, that civil war existed, he said:

"If the court will take judicial cognizance of the existence of the war, then they ought also to take cognizance of the fact of peace being restored. Will the court not take cognizance of the proof that Kirby Smith's surrender took place on the 24th of May, 1865? The war was then over. There were then no organized bodies of men arrayed against the government. Prisoners were paroled and sent to their homes. Everybody knew this, and will it be said that this court will close its eyes to the fact and not know it until told so by the president?

"The jury having returned into court asked 'if the opinion of his honor as to the time when hostilities ceased, was binding upon the jury?' His honor replied that it was—that hostilities ceased on the 24th or 25th of May, 1865, and that fact he took judicial notice of. A juror then said, 'Your honor did not charge us in relation to the count in the information in regard to gold and foreign bills of exchange.' His honor stated that there was no proof to show that gold was used to pay for the cargo of the Decatur, and that he did not consider it necessary to charge in regard to that count, as the cessation of hostilities covered the case, and virtually repealed those laws."

We do not consider the erroneous assumption here that there was no proof of a fact which was largely contested before the jury. It is noticed only to say it is not impliedly sanctioned. This charge embodies several substantial errors. The court will take judicial cognizance of the public history of the country. It is treated, in its modes of ascertainment, like a question of law, to be investigated in the same manner, in its own proper sources. Public documents and histories are to be consulted without deciding whether the court should have taken judicial cognizance of the precise date when the surrender occurred, or whether, when such accuracy becomes material, the documentary, historical, and other proof which parties chose to present must not be submitted to a jury, it is of course clear that if the judge assumes the duty of its determination, he must decide it correctly. It is as much an error for the court to mistake an historical fact of which it has taken cognizance, as to mistake a principle of law. That his honor was in error when he told the jury that General Kirby Smith surrendered on the 24th of May, 1865, is now conceded. It is unnecessary to refer to the original documentary proof which demonstrates his mistake. The common histories of the country and repeated judgments in the books show it. The Annual Encyclopædia for 1865, p. 84, states it to be upon May 26. Phillips v. Hatch [Case No. 11,094] states it the same date. There is no difference of opinion anywhere. This was a turning point in the case below. The vessel left upon the 25th. It was conceded by his honor that if the surrender had not been until the 26th, so that within his own theories hostilities continued until that time, the cotton was forfeited to the government because it started on its transit before. The legal consequence which the learned judge deduced from this fact, thus erroneously assumed as taking place on the 24th, was no better grounded in the law than was the fact itself in the history of the country. Both were alike untrue. Trade and intercourse did not become lawful between Louisiana and Tennessee, and hostilities did not cease, upon the surrender of General Smith. The proclamation of the president, or other political recognition of the return of peace, was necessary to work such a consequence.

It has not been seriously argued that this part of the charge is law. The conditions of war and peace, the political status of governments and people, is in our system one purely of political and not judicial determination. If there were, as there is not, any doubt of this necessary rule of general law, the entire legislative history and public action of the country in reference to the late rebellion conclusively shows such has been the theory upon which our courts and the government have proceeded in its suppression and in dealing with its consequences. In reference to a subject where repeated and literally applicable judgments of the supreme court of the United States set the matter wholly at rest, it could not "be useful or even in good taste to go behind them for reasons to justify what they so plainly say." In U. S. v. Anderson, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 56, the statute limited prosecutions in the court of claims to two years after the suppression of the rebellion. It was held that the limitation did not begin to run, and that the rebellion was not in a legal sense suppressed until the final proclamation of the president, August 20, 1866. The argument of the court shows most clearly that we must rely upon the action of the political department as the criterion in this class of cases. At page 70 it is said, "In a domestic war, like the late one, some proclamation or legislation would seem to be required to inform those whose private rights were to be affected by it of the time when it terminated." We do not understand by this that as matter of law necessarily in all cases that legislation or proclamations are indispensable to terminate the legal condition of public political hostility. Nor do we in this judgment suggest even that such is the law. In reference to the point in judgment, it was natural for the court to say, especially where such definite action had in fact been had, that "it would seem to be required." Nothing more is meant, I apprehend, than that it was required by good government, in order to remove uncertainty in reference to private action. The government has thus far carefully pursued this manifest policy. It has from time to time declared the cessation of hostilities and the return of peace, and restored intercourse and trade, as state after state assumed the condition which, in the governmental judgment, rendered safe and politic such action. But if, on the contrary, without legislation or proclamations of any kind, it had suffered all these interests to assume their old channels, the courts would look to and accept this acquiescence as an implied recognition of a changed political status, as fully as though it were testified in more direct modes and more fixed forms. The principle is alike in both cases. The courts would in all instances await the public action, in none anticipating the decision of the government. Before any such question can arise, time must elapse, public sufferance must be unquestioned, and such a condition exist as manifests an undoubted public consent to the new peaceful relations. No such situation existed here, and the ruling had no reference to such a principle. In Mrs. Alexander's Cotton, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 404, at page 419, in deciding that Mrs. Alexander's cotton was subject to seizure, because she resided in the enemy's country after taking the oath under the amnesty proclamation, Chief Justice Chase says that the belligerent relation having once been recognized by the political power, that "all the people of each state or district in insurrection must be regarded as enemies until by the action of the legislature and the executive, or otherwise, that relation is thoroughly and permanently changed." In Levy v. Stewart, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 244, deciding that the statutes of limitation were suspended during the Civil War, the court rely upon the legislation of congress and the proclamations of the president, as fixing the period when it commenced and closed. Stewart v. Kahn, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 493. The act of 1864, providing that a period during which a defendant could not be served with process should be deducted from statutes of limitations being under consideration, Justice Swayne, speaking of the duration of this condition in a legal sense and the effect of the several presidential proclamations, at page 506 says, "The decision of all such questions rests wholly in the discretion of those in whom the substantial powers involved are confided by the constitution." Speaking of the continuance of hostilities, and the power of suppressing them, at page 507, he adds: "In the latter case the power is not limited to victories in the field and the dispersion of insurgent forces. It carries with it inherently the right to guard against the renewal of the conflict, and to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress. This act (that of restraining the effect of the statutes of limitations) falls within the latter category." The whole judgment is a clear assertion of the federal political right to regulate the conditions of peace, and the duty of the courts to accept, when they are constitutional, the action of the government as entirely conclusive. U. S. v. One Hundred and Twenty-Nine Packages [Case No. 15,941]: In violation of the act of July 13, 1861, goods were laden on board a vessel in Missouri with the intention of transporting them to Memphis before the proclamation of the president declared the cessation of hostilities. Memphis at that time was in the occupation of the federal forces. It was held that the goods were forfeited for violation of the statute. Judge Treat announces that this is a political question and says, "The absurdity of any other rule is manifest. The state of the country as to peace or war is legally determined by the political and not the judiciary department. The same power which determines the existence of war or insurrection must also decide when hostilities shall cease." He cites the following cases as sustaining principles from which this doctrine is deduced: [Gelston v. Hoyt] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246; [U. S. v. Palmer] Id. 610; [The Divina Pastora] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 52; [The Neustra Senora De La Caridad] Id. 497; [The Santissima Trinidad] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 283; [Martin v. Mott] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 19; [Rose v. Himely] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 241; [Foster v. Neilson] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 253; [Garcia v. Lee] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 511; [McElmoyle v. Cohen] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 315; [Luther v. Borden] 7 How. [48 U. S.] 1; [Kennett v. Chambers] 14 How. [55 U. S.] 46; [Christy v. Scott] Id. 283. All these judgments, save those in 12 Wheat. and 7 How., relate to the recognition by political power of foreign governments, or the belligerent status of revolted foreign provinces. It is not perceived that the doctrines they lay down are not directly applicable, as they have in fact been applied by the same court to cases of domestic violence. In 12 Wheat., it was said the statute devolved upon the president the political duty of determining when armed force should be called out to put down insurrection in the states. It was for him to decide when the exigency occurred. The courts had no concern with it. In 7 How., it was said, whether this rebel government of Dorr, or that under the old constitution of Rhode Island was in force, was one wholly for the government to decide. In an action of trespass, the courts, it was said, could hear no testimony whatsoever upon such a point. What the government recognized, the courts must conclusively deed the lawful power. Chief Justice Taney, in this case, fully illustrates the incompatibility of such a power in the courts with the conditions and consequences of the inquiry. If one jury should upon evidence decide that the government was supreme, another might decide differently. The court's judgments must be enforced by the political power, and its decision that it did not exist would be nugatory, and it was of necessity that it confined its decisions to the meaning and force of laws made by, and not the determination of the lawfulness of the government itself. Whether there was any necessity of the exercise of the power of the president to call out the militia, it said the court could not determine. His decision was final. The court could not call witnesses to prove which party represented a majority of the people. If the judicial power were thus extended, he said, the guaranty in the constitution of a republican form of government was a guaranty of anarchy, not of order. Equally incongruous results would follow if courts, instead of the government, were to decide when hostilities are ended, and when trade and intercourse should be resumed. In a case under the same act (U. S. v. One Hundred Bbls. Cement [Case No. 15,945]), the same judge (Treat), after saying that a condition of hostilities is to be determined by the political department, adds, "that the status must remain in a legal sense until the same authority decides it to be at an end. Such is the true interpretation of the statute and proclamations." Phillips v. Hatch [Id. 11,094]: 1871 A note was made in Texas, after the surrender of Kirby Smith on the 26th of May, 1865, but before the proclamation of the president in August of that year, declaring that hostilities had ceased. In deciding that the note was void, because made between belligerents, Dillon, J., says: "From the nature of the question, from the fair implication of the act of July 13, 1861 (the one here in question), from the confusion which would ensue from any other rule, it is the opinion of the court that the Rebellion must be considered as in existence until the president declared it at an end in the proclamation of August 20, 1865." Judge Dillon adds an instructive review on the statutes, proclamations, and judgments in full justification of his ruling. In a note to Brown v. Hiatt [Case No. 2,011], it is said that Judges Dillon and Caldwell decided that the Rebellion in Arkansas did not end until the proclamation of the president so declaring.

These unquestioned doctrines have not been extemporized for the modern and exceptional exigencies of the late Rebellion. They belong to the jurisprudence of all countries, and were adopted as part of that of our own from its earliest history. Our most conservative judges—Marshall, Story, and Taney—have been foremost in announcing them. No citizen would challenge the justness and the necessity of this rule. Judges have their peculiar duties, which, if faithfully and learnedly studied, have little tendency to make them familiar with current and rapidly changing conditions, upon which depend the important political questions of whether it is safe to relax on the instant military rule and restore intercourse and trade. In possible exigencies it may be true, as the learned judge said, that we know when peace is restored "without being told by the president." But all will concede that the safe depositary for this power is with a president and cabinet, and the congress, all of whom being specifically charged with the duty, constantly engage in ascertaining the facts upon which the policy of political action depends, and in full official communication with all the best sources of information, must necessarily be better informed in reference to situations, and better qualified to determine when peaceful relations should be reinstated with public enemies than a single judge. The mistake of his honor consisted in supposing that the cessation of hostilities was synonymous with the surrender of organized armies; that peace meant the disbanding of military forces, instead of a full return of the masses of the people to loyalty and good citizenship. If armies disband only to disseminate their violence in private force or individual wrongs, governmental military rule may be necessarily continued, or restored after its discontinuance. The history of the country has shown that, in political opinion, this has been often necessary, and, whatever the judiciary may think, as citizens, of the policy of its exercise, the fact of its existence and duration must even be accepted by it as inexorably as it accepts any other political condition. The only resort for a tribunal, in any case, is that sad one, of which we have had too much experience, when violence renders impossible the longer recognition of the sovereignty which created it.

For the purpose of this reversal it is necessary to look further into the record. There is one other portion of the charge, however, which we desire briefly to notice. It appeared that the cotton had been sold to the Confederate government upon the understanding that it should sell and divide the proceeds. In order to produce a forfeiture it must appear that the owners of the property were not compelled, by force or bodily fear, to make the sale. In reference to this subject, the district judge said: "If this property was the property of the Confederate States authorities by any law, or was received by the agents of these Confederate States authorities acting under any military order requiring the citizens to furnish it as a tax or exaction, that should not be considered a voluntary act on the part of the original owners of the property, and would not subject it to seizure. The war was a civil war, as declared by the United States government, and the Confederates were accorded their rights, and treated as belligerents, and therefore they had the right to make rules and laws for the government of all within their lines. They had the right to levy taxes and perform other functions. The military commanders had the same rights as other military commanders under the government with which they were at war. They had the right to make exactions to carry on the war. They had the right to raise taxes, and to have the citizens comply, and give up their property on such terms as levied or ordered by the government." It is not for the purpose of saying that the accident of a pretended government, and laws, and officials, may not in any circumstances affect the question of the citizens' intent. There may be such wholesome fear of force and injury as to induce acquiescence in unlawful demands, without its actual infliction. This is fully conceded. These facts may not be without their force upon retrial to show the absence of a voluntary sale by the owners of this cotton. But that the mere existence of a law prescribed by an insurrectionary government is sufficient to bind the conscience or justify the action of those who owe allegiance to a lawful sovereignty is a doctrine finding no warrant in the history of any government in the world. U. S. v. Keehler, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 83. The defendant was postmaster before the war, and gave bond as such. In virtue of a Confederate statute he paid over to a mail contractor, whom the federal government owed for services, the money in his hands. It was held this pretended law was no justification for such payment. At page 86, Justice Miller, for the court, says: "It certainly cannot be admitted for a moment that a statute of the Confederate States, or the order of its postmaster-general, could have any effect in making the payment to Clemmens valid. The whole Confederate power must be regarded as a usurpation of unlawful authority, incapable of passing any valid laws, and certainly incapable of divesting, by an act of its congress, or an order of one of its departments, any right or property of the United States. Whatever weight may be given under some circumstances to its acts of force on the ground of irresistible power, or whatever effect may be allowed in proper cases to the legislatures of the states while in insurrection, we propose to decide only when they arise. The acts of the Confederate congress can have no force as law in divesting or transferring rights, or as authority for any act opposed to the just authority of the federal government." The act now before the court was a sale in order to aid the overthrow and promote the destruction of that government. It being further urged in Keehler's Case that the Confederate government had ample military forces at the place where the defendant resided to compel obedience to its laws, and it did so enforce it like other governments, this position is answered as follows at page 87: "It will be observed that this statement falls far short of showing the application of any physical force to compel the defendant to pay the money to Clemmens. Nor is it in the least inconsistent with the fact that he might have been desirous and willing to make the payment. It shows no effort or endeavor to secure the funds in his hands to the government to which he owed both the money and his allegiance. Nor does it prove that he would have suffered any inconvenience, or been punished by the Confederate authorities, if he had refused to pay the draft of the insurrectionary post-office department upon him. We cannot see that it makes out any such loss of money by inevitable overpowering force, as could even on the mere principle of bailment discharge a bailer. We cannot concede that a man who, as a citizen, owes allegiance to the United States, and as an officer of its government holds its money or property, is at liberty to turn over the latter to an insurrectionary government, which only demands it by ordinances and drafts drawn on the bailer, but which exercises no force or threat of personal violence to himself or property in the enforcement of its illegal orders." Hickman v. Jones, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 197. During the Rebellion the plaintiff in this action was arrested and tried for treason against the Confederate government. He now brought suit against the members of the court and all the officers in any way connected with the arrest and trial. The supreme court held that every act of the defendants was to be treated as if they were ordinary trespassers—that the Confederate constitution, government, and laws afforded no warrant whatever for their action. On page 200 Justice Swayne, for the court, said, "The rebellion out of which the war grew was without any legal sanction. In the eye of the law, it had the same properties as if it had been the insurrection of a county or smaller municipal territory against the state to which it belonged. The proportions and duration of the struggle did not affect its character, nor was there a rebel government de facto in such a sense as to give any legal efficacy to its acts. It was not recognized by the national nor by any foreign government. It was not at any time in possession of the capital of the nation. It did not for a moment displace the rightful government. The government was always in existence, always in the regular discharge of its functions, and constantly exercising all its military power to put down the resistance to its authority in the insurrectionary states. The union of the states for all the purposes of the constitution is as perfect and indissoluble as the union of the integral parts of the states themselves, and nothing but revolutionary violence can in either case destroy the ties which hold the parts together. For the sake of humanity, certain belligerent rights were conceded to the insurgents in arms. But the recognition did not extend to the pretended government of the Confederacy. The intercourse was confined to its military authorities. In no instance was there intercourse otherwise than of this character. The Rebellion was simply an armed resistance to the rightful authority of the sovereign. Such was its character in its rise, progress, and downfall. The act of the Confederate congress creating the tribunal in question was void. It was as if it were not. The court was a nullity, and could exercise no rightful jurisdiction. The forms of law with which it clothed its proceedings gave no protection to those who, assuming to be its officers, were the instruments by which it acted." It is unnecessary to quote from the numerous other judgments in the supreme and circuit courts, expressly and impliedly sustaining this undoubted position. This subject has been referred to only because an elaborate charge, so wholly disregarding them, had been delivered to a jury in an important and exciting case; it was thought a duty to reproduce a few of the many concurring judgments which so fully demonstrated the error of the learned district judge. The case of Smith v. Brazelton, decided by the supreme court of Tennessee [1 Heisk. 44], is supposed by counsel to assert a contrary doctrine. We do not stop to reconsider that case. It was before us in Riddle v. Pillow [unreported]. We then said the question was one depending upon the constitution and laws of the United States, and in reference to which the rulings in the federal courts were mandatory; and, although we very confidently disapproved what we deemed its manifest errors in according to the Confederate government equally belligerent rights, we took pains to say no judgment was passed upon the peculiar facts in contest in that case; we said "hostilities existed and armies were on the march; the general commanding took what he did to warm and shelter his soldiers;" and, without deciding whether physical necessity, and to prevent suffering and want would constitute, in any possible case, a justification for the forcible appropriation of property, we denied then, as we do now, that it would derive the slightest additional support from the immaterial accident that the claim to do so was predicated upon any pretended authority derived from a rebel government. In reference to a question about which there is not a conflict in tribunals whose judgment we have any right to regard, it is unnecessary to follow the frequent repetitions which have applied it in so many different exigencies. All, without exception, say the Confederate government could make no law. Its prescriptions imposed no obligations, political or moral, and the only justification for obedience which the citizen could make to his rightful sovereign was deadly coercion by violence or threats. No such proof appears upon this record. The charge which informed a jury that a mere law, without more, was an excuse for obeying it, was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire de novo will issue, returnable to this court.

Case No. 15,959.

UNITED STATES v. ONE THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED AND SIX BOXES OF SUGAR.[1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 25, 1862.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—CLASSIFICATION OF SUGARS.

This was an action brought to forfeit the sugar for alleged violation of the revenue laws. The sugar was shipped in Havana, by Sama Sotolongo & Co., consigned to L. Van Horn & Co., by the ship Kerelan, and arrived here December 23, 1861. In the invoice all the sugars, except 14 boxes, were described as Quebrado sugars. The 14 boxes were described as Cucuruchos. Van Horn & Co., the claimant, entered all the sugars, using this invoice; and in the entry they described all the sugars as raw sugars, and paid duty thereon, at the rate of two cents a pound. By the then existing tariff, of August 5, 1861, § 1 [12 Stat. 292], a duty was imposed "on raw sugar, commonly called 'Muscovado' or brown sugars, and on sugar not advanced above No. 12, Dutch standard, by clarifying or other processes, and not yet refined, 2½ cts. a lb." The sugars were examined at the custom house, and on examination, it was reported to the collector, that all of them, except the fourteen boxes, were advanced by boiling, clarifying, or other processes, above No. 12 Dutch standard. The sugars were accordingly seized, and the information in this case filed against them, under the 67th sections of the act of 1799 [1 Stat. 677], and the 4th section of the act of 1830 [4 Stat. 410]. The counts under the act of 1799 alleged the forfeiture of the goods, by reason of false description in the entry, and the counts under the act of 1830 alleged that the invoice was made up, with the intent to evade the payment of duties by calling the sugar "Quebrado" sugar, when it was not such.

The testimony for the government, given mainly by sugar refiners, tended to show that there were four lots of the sugars, and that three of them, amounting to about 1,100 boxes, were partially refined, and belonged to the three highest of the four grades into which sugars are distinguished. That the term "Quebrado," is applied to sugars between the grades of No. 10 and Nos. 12 & 14, Dutch standard, and that all these sugars were above No. 12, except the 14 boxes. It also appeared that these sugars were made by what is known as the "De Rosue" process, by which the sugar is clarified, as it is made from the cane, and that the mode was similar to that of refining sugars here. Merchants were called to testify for the claimants, and their testimony tended to show that in Cuba, as well as in New York, all sugars were known as "raw" sugars, except sugars manufactured from sugar, and that no sugars, known in commerce as "refined" sugars were ever imported from Cuba; and that the term "Quebrado" applied to all grades of sugar from No. 10 to No. 20, Dutch standard, and that none of these sugars were above No. 20.

Webster & Craig, for the United States.
Mr. Evarts, for claimants.

The jury (BETTS, District Judge) brought in a sealed verdict for the claimants, releasing the goods.

UNITED STATES v. ONE THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED AND TWELVE GALLONS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 24, 1873.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS — FORFEITURES — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

1. The provision of the 96th section of the internal revenue act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 164), "that, if any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, shall knowingly and wilfully omit, neglect or refuse to do, or cause to be done, any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this act, for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done, the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of $1,000, and, if the person so offending be a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him, or in which he has any interest, as owner, * * * shall be forfeited to the United States," does not authorize such forfeiture of spirits or liquors to be imposed for a violation of the 45th section of the same act, for the reason that a specific penalty or punishment is imposed by the 45th section for a violation of the 45th section.

2. A statute which is of doubtful or double meaning, should not be construed in its harshest possible sense, when persons to whom it applies may have been led to trust in a less severe construction of it, but one equally satisfying its terms.

3. Apart from the consideration last stated, the construction of the act, above stated, is deemed the most natural and to best conform to the intention of congress and the design of the act.

Thomas Simons, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.
Harland & Rollins, for claimant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The information herein alleges a violation of section 45 of the internal revenue act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 143), and claims, that, for such violation, the spirits in question became forfeited to the United States, under and by force of the 96th section of the same act (Id. 164). Section 45 requires rectifiers, wholesale liquor dealers, and compounders of liquors, to keep certain books, make certain prescribed entries therein, and keep such books open for inspection, with other special requirements designed to enable the revenue officers to learn various particulars, in order to prevent frauds upon the revenue; and, for refusal, neglect, or violation of its provisions, the section declares, that the rectifier, wholesale dealer, or compounder, shall pay a penalty of one hundred dollars, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than three years.

From the passage of the internal revenue law of 1862 down, the legislation of congress manifestly looked to distilled spirits and distillers, and to tobacco and its manufacturers, for a considerable revenue; and the provisions of the several enactments to provide internal revenue were very stringent in their requirements tending to secure the payment of the taxes imposed. The law was amended, from time to time, as experience showed to be necessary, to prevent frauds and evasions of the tax. Fines, penalties, and punishment by imprisonment were annexed to various sections of the law, and new provisions, as well as amendments, were devised, to the same end. In 1868, the law, so far as related to distillers and distilled spirits, and to tobacco and tobacco manufacturers, was revised, and the act of that year prescribed the duties of distillers, rectifiers, compounders of liquors, and tobacco manufacturers, with great particularity, and, as to a large extent was true of previous laws, annexed to most of the sections both prohibitory and prescriptive penalties, fines, forfeitures, or punishment by imprisonment, as the consequence of a violation of its commands, apparently measuring the severity of the infliction by the estimate the legislature had of the magnitude of the evil contemplated in the several sections; and yet, some few sections were left without any specific prescribed penalty for their violation. The former laws, however, relating to the same subjects, were not, in terms, repealed, but only so far as the act of 1868 was inconsistent therewith. In some sections, a pecuniary penalty alone was prescribed; in others, a fine; in others, a fine and imprisonment; in others, forfeiture of property, such as forfeiture of the spirits seized, or forfeiture of the tools and instruments, also; while, in two sections (22 and 44), relating to distillers, rectifiers, &c., for a violation thereof, the forfeiture was, not only of all distilled spirits owned by them, wherever found, but, also, the stills and apparatus, and all personal property found in the distillery, store or other place of business, or in the building or enclosure, and all the right, title and interest of the party in the lot of ground, &c. After a very full specification of such cases and particulars as the experience of years had shown to be necessary, the 96th section further provided as follows: "And be it further enacted, that, if any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, shall knowingly and wilfully omit, neglect, or refuse to do, or cause to be done, any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this act, for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done, the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of one thousand dollars; and, if the person so offending be a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him, or in which he has any interest, as owner, and, if he be a manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, all tobacco or cigars found in his manufactory, shall be forfeited to the United States." This would seem to be a section added to the other provisions, in order to fully cover the subject, and to punish all violators of the law, whether by knowing and wilful omission, or by actual transgression, not in terms required to be knowing or wilful.

The demurrer in this case is urged on the ground, that this 96th section does not apply to a violation of the 45th section above recited, because there is a specific penalty prescribed in the 45th section itself, namely, a penalty of $100, a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than three years. The question depends solely upon the true construction of the 96th section; and that construction alone has been discussed by the counsel for the government and the counsel for the claimant.

On behalf of the government, it is insisted, that former acts had prescribed forfeiture of all the spirits, in general terms, for any violation of their requirements; that this section is a modified re-enactment of such general provisions; that this section was intended to provide, and does provide, a specific penalty of one thousand dollars, for all knowing and wilful omissions, and all active violations, for which no specific penalty or punishment was imposed by any other section, but the residue of the section applies to all persons who knowingly and wilfully omit, neglect or refuse compliance with the act, or do anything by the act prohibited, whether specific penalties or punishment have, in other sections, been imposed or not; that, in short, it was a part of the intent and purpose of this section (whatever punishments had in other sections been provided) that whoever, of the persons named, should knowingly and wilfully omit, neglect or refuse to do, or cause to be done, anything whatever required by law in the business of distilling, &c., and whoever should do anything by the act prohibited, should forfeit all distilled spirits and liquors owned by him, or in which he has any interest, as owner.

On behalf of the claimant, it is insisted that the sole object of this 96th section was to provide for cases not otherwise fully provided for, by imposing a penalty, and declaring a forfeiture, if, and only when, no specific penalty or punishment was imposed by any other section. Who is "the person so offending," or, rather, what is the meaning of "so offending?" It was argued by counsel, and it seems quite clear, that, if this be determined, it decides the controversy. The person "so offending" forfeits his spirits to the United States. Is he one, and every one, who is guilty of the knowing and wilful omission, neglect and refusal, or who does the thing prohibited by the act; or is he one, and only one, who is guilty of a knowing and wilful omission, neglect or refusal to do what is required, or does something which is prohibited, for which no specific penalty or punishment is imposed by any other section of the act? It cannot, I think, be denied, that either construction would satisfy the words used in the section; and the question is one upon which intelligent and fair minds, studying the section with single purpose to ascertain its just meaning, may differ. Such a difference has arisen in the district courts. Quantity of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 11,495]; U. S. v. One Rectifying Establishment [Id. 15,952]; U. S. v. Thirty-Seven Barrels of Apple Brandy [Id. 16,466]; U. S. v. One Hundred and Thirty-Three Casks of Distilled Spirits; [Id. 15,940]; U. S. v. Ninety-Five Barrels of Distilled Spirits [Id. 15,889]; U. S. v. Four Thousand Eight Hundred Gallons of Spirits [Id. 15,153]; U. S. v. Thirty-Four Barrels of Distilled Spirits [Id. 16,461]. I concur with those who hold that the forfeiture here declared applies only to cases for which no specific penalty or punishment is imposed by other sections. The 96th section clearly admits of that interpretation. The fact that intelligent and fair minds have been in doubt, and have differed on the subject, and an examination of the section itself, both concur to show, that, at most, the construction claimed by the government, though it be possible, is doubtful. In construing a severe statute, declaring a heavy forfeiture, (and, according to one construction claimed, for small offences,) it is just to say, that those who are called upon to conduct their business affairs in view of all its provisions, ought to be fairly apprised of its requirements, and of its penalties, of whatever kind. They are bound to know the law, but lawmakers owe to them the duty to make the law intelligible; and those whose business it is to construe or expound a law which is of doubtful or double meaning, should not incline to the harshest possible meaning, when it is obvious that those to whom it is to be applied may well have been led to trust in another which is less severe, but equally satisfying its terms. This is not saying that laws of the kind in question are to be strictly construed in favor of the subject and against the state, but, only, that they should be construed with reasonable fairness to the citizen.

But, independent of this consideration, I am of opinion, that the most natural construction of the language of the section is that which confines its operation to cases for which no penalty or punishment is imposed by other sections; that the person "so offending" is one who has offended under the conditions previously stated; and that the immediate connection between the penalty and the forfeiture, expressed by the conjunction "and," expresses and shows an intent to express an addition to the penalty, wherever the penalty of one thousand dollars has been incurred, and nothing more. Had the section declared, that the person first described as omitting, neglecting, or refusing compliance with the law, or doing what is prohibited, should, if no specific penalty or punishment was elsewhere imposed, pay a penalty of one thousand dollars, and that all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him should be forfeited, it would be entirely plain, that the forfeiture could only apply to cases not otherwise specifically provided for, that is, to persons who incurred the penalty of one thousand dollars. Obviously, I think, it would have so read, had the section embraced, in its description of offenders, only distillers, rectifiers and compounders of liquors; but, manufacturers of tobacco were included in the description of the offenders. It was necessary that such forfeitures should be distributively declared, so as to forfeit tobacco in the case of the tobacco manufacturers, and spirits and liquors in the case of distillers, &c. Hence, the terms of distribution employed when the forfeiture was added to the penalty.

I am aware, that it is of little use to multiply words, in discussing the meaning of the language of the section. It is possible to say much in support of either view, if attention be confined to the mere phraseology. The section may be paraphrased, its form changed, its parts transposed, and either meaning made more apparent. For example, if the word "also" had followed "and"—"and, also, if the person so offending be a distiller, &c., all distilled spirits, &c., shall be forfeited, &c."—the meaning would have been plain; and yet, the word "and" alone may properly be deemed to have that precise import. But, without too rigid attention to mere word criticism, the meaning must be declared according to the impression left upon an intelligent mind, after bringing into view the subject matter, the previous provisions of the act, the design of the statute, and the whole language of the section itself. My own conviction conforms to that insisted upon by the claimant in this case.

Without attaching too great importance to the argument, that congress will not be presumed to intend to accumulate penalties or forfeitures, upon penalties, forfeitures and punishments previously annexed to specific acts or defaults, graduated as the latter are by the importance or gravity of the several specified offences, the construction insisted on by the claimant gains much support in the fact, that there are two previous sections which impose forfeiture, not only of the spirits owned by the offender, wherever it may be, but, of the tools, implements and all personal property found on the premises, and the lot of land, also (sections 22 and 44). Now, to suppose that congress, by the 96th section, meant to declare, that those who violated the law in any particular should, notwithstanding the specific penalty or forfeiture previously declared in any other section, forfeit, also, all spirits owned by them, is to impute to them little less than an absurdity. In the sections referred to, forfeiture of all spirits, and much more than that, was already imposed. It is not to be supposed, that, by the 96th section, those previously declared forfeitures were made less. Besides, the argument, that the 96th section spreads forfeiture of all spirits, &c., over the whole act, including those two prior sections, and some others containing similar forfeitures, involves incongruity between parts of the statute, and would raise the question of law, whether the 96th section did not operate as a quasi repeal, or revocation, of the prior forfeitures specifically declared.

Without prolonging discussion upon the question, I must hold, that the forfeiture of spirits declared by the 96th section does not apply to cases or offences described in other sections, wherein a specific penalty or punishment therefor is imposed for the offence. The demurrer is, therefore, sustained.

E. Delafield Smith, U S. Dist. Atty.

Bowdoin, Larocques & Barlow, for Leroy M. Wiley.

BETTS, District Judge. The court assumes, upon the face of the pleadings presented in this suit, that an actual and earnest contestation in law is contemplated between the parties seeking to be heard, respecting the real ownership and disposition of the considerable property involved in the pending action. Aside of the interests sought to be guarded or enforced, in respect to Leroy M. Wiley, individually, the Great Western Railroad Company of 1859 have also intervened, by their agent, and put in an answer and claim, in opposition to the libel of information filed by the United States, setting up a legal authority or interest in themselves to the property prosecuted, which claim, if properly made, is entitled to be heard and adjudged upon, according to the principles of law and justice; but it cannot be permitted that a party, without having a lawful standing in court, shall intercept or intermeddle with the orderly action of the law in its due processes, if he be destitute of a capacity to act as a suitor before the court. The present motion proceeds upon that doctrine. The gist of the application of the libellants is that Leroy M. Wiley has no personal standing in a court of the United States, in respect to claims, property, interests, or trusts of any description, in suit or prosecution before that court, he being an alien enemy of the United States, and thus disqualified from being a volunteer party in respect to civil suits before those tribunals, resting upon contracts or legal liabilities; unless, perhaps, ransom bills, or bills of exchange for personal subsistence, drawn by prisoners of war, and held by alien enemies (1 Kent. Comm. 68, passim; 2 Wildm. Int. Law, 274, 275), may be exceptions. No such privilege attends the demand of the claimant in this instance. Wiley, by intervening and attempting to enforce a supposed title or lien in respect to the railroad shares and dividends, would become a party actor in the suit, equally as if prominent in its inception. This, in a judicial sense, is the legal relation of both parties to the suit in actions in rem, as each side acts affirmatively in carrying on the processes and remedies imparted to them respectively by the action, and seeks positive adjudication in his favor in the disposal of effects and interests within the jurisdiction of the court.

The answer and claim interposed and placed on file in this suit declares upon its face that the claimant, "Leroy M. Wiley, is of Eufaula, in the state of Alabama," and that fact is also asserted and attested to in the test oath accompanying the claim when filed. The court must take judicial notice that Alabama is an insurrectionary state, having been, at the commencement of this suit, and yet continuing, in a condition of rebellion and actual hostility against the United States. That condition constitutes all the inhabitants of that state alien enemies of this country. This is indisputably so on the principles of international law, in regard to residents in countries foreign to each other. 3 Phillim. Int. Law, c. 6, § 82; Halleck, Int. Law, c. 29, § 6; 1 Kent, Comm. 76. In Jecker v. Montgomery, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 112, the supreme court say: "In a state of war between two nations, declared by the authority in whom the municipal constitution vests the power of making war, the two nations, and all their citizens or subjects, are enemies to each other." Still more emphatically and pertinently, in respect to the existing Rebellion in this country, the same court declares that the residents of the several states in war with the United States are enemies to this country, to the same effect as if citizens or subjects of a foreign nation. Cranshaw v. U. S. [unreported], decided March, 1863.

It is unimportant to determine on this motion whether the right of Wiley in the subject-matter of the suit before the court is determined definitely by the subsisting state of hostilities between the place of his residence and the United States, or only suspended during such war; this decision goes no further than to rule that he is disqualified and inhibited from becoming a party to the pending action. I do not in this decision discuss the regularity of practice pursued in making appearance and answer for Wiley. I consider him effectively barred by law of all powers to intervene in court. The application of the libellants is therefore granted, and it is ordered that the answer and claim interposed in this suit on behalf of Leroy M. Wiley has been irregularly and improperly admitted on file in the cause, and that the same be stricken therefrom.

[NOTE. A motion by the United States to strike out an answer filed in behalf of the Great Western Railroad Company was subsequently granted (Case No. 15,960b), and a decree was thereafter given for libellants. On appeal this was reversed by the circuit court, and the libel dismissed. Id. 15,961.]

cuted in rem in this suit was filed August 25, 1863. Process of attachment and monition in due form of law was issued to the marshal, under the seal of the court, the same day, against the property named in the information, returnable in court the 15th of September thereafter. On that day it was returned by the marshal, with a certificate endorsed thereon, officially, that he had, on the 25th day of August, 1863, attached the above described 1,756 shares of stock, and given due notice to all persons claiming the same, &c.

It is unnecessary to detail the intermediate steps taken by parties attempting to intervene and make defenses in the suit, or all the past proceedings before the court, in respect to the same. It is sufficient to say, that in November term, 1863, the court, on motion of the United States attorney, and after hearing the respective parties, ordered the answer and claim interposed in the case, in defence of the suit in favor and support of the alleged ownership or interest of Leroy M. Wiley in the stocks and property seized in the suit, to be stricken or withdrawn from the case, because he was a resident in one of the Confederate States, and an enemy of the United States, and as such incapacitated to maintain an action, or become a party litigant in his own right, in a civil cause of action in a court of the United States, during such disability. October 17, 1863, an answer and claim were put on file in the cause in the name of the "Great Western Railroad Company of 1859, intervening for the benefit of themselves, and as trustees of such other persons as may be entitled to 1,756 shares of the capital stock of the said company, and to $53,000, or thereabouts, alleged to be due, owing, and unpaid upon certain coupons or certificates of indebtedness and promises to pay, belonging to, and alleged to be cut off and detached from certain bonds of the said corporation." [The suit was discontinued as to everything but the stock, and dividends thereon.] Under the representation of title or right vested in themselves, that corporation attempts to claim a legal right to intervene and contest the subject-matter involved in the suit initiated in this information, and defend the suit, as against (1) the act of forfeiture charged therein; (2) the jurisdiction of the court in the case; (3) the liability of the property seized for any culpability of Wiley, the party charged. On the 14th of November thereafter, the United States attorney obtained an order from the court, for four days' further time, to file exceptions to the above claim and answer, but such proceedings seem to have been taken by mutual understanding between the respective counsel, that ultimate action was not perfected by the submission to the court of their differences in regard to the pleadings for consideration, until the 16th of February, 1864.

The points for determination on the merits accordingly now are, whether the railroad company has perfected a lawful appearance in the cause upon any rights of their own, in relation to the subject in litigation, or whether there is on the evidence any lawful right of representation in the suit, with Leroy M. Wiley individually, or independent of his personal appearance, through the instrumentality of the railroad company or its agents.

I perceive no reason for reviewing the ground taken in the previous appearances in defence of Wiley himself, under this same prosecution, that he has no standing in court as a volunteer party. The rule seems to be unequivocally determined both in the English and American practice, that an alien enemy is incapable of maintaining a suit while he retains that character. Story, Eq. Pl. § 51. As an enemy in rebellion or insurrection in open hostility against his own country, he is stamped with all the disabilities of an alien. Jecker v. Montgomery, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 112; The Prize Cases, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 635. I think the fair import of the intervention of the railroad company, although nominally in a corporate form, is virtually based upon no other interests than those resting personally in Wiley, and consequently cannot be sustained in an American judicatory. Palpably it is only because he cannot vindicate an individual interest in this property by force of law, that an impalpable interest is surmised and put forward as possessing vitality enough to retain for his benefit, directly or circuitously, through the assumption of equities resting in his agents or creditors, the property which would, under the laws of his just allegiance, be doomed to the expiation of his crimes against his country. That property is returned in court as under actual seizure by the marshal on the process issued against it. Its situs was at the time accordingly within the jurisdiction of the court, whether placed in charge of a foreign or alien, natural or political person. If technically there might be ordinarily impediments to carrying on suits for private debts or claims against property held out of the regular scope and action of the machinery of the law, that consideration cannot avail against confiscation statutes, which remove all limitations and restrictions of the government in that respect, and authorize the arrest of the inculpated property and its forfeiture wherever it may be found, or however it may be represented. Act July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 591, § 7). The statute places the captured property, subject to all the liabilities if arrested here, in the actual keeping of a remote corporation, as if it was within the authority and vaults of a bank or railroad corporation of the city of New York.

Independently of these general principles which subject the effects of traitors to confiscation by means of summary actions appointed by statutory provisions free of the common law formalities, the parties attempting to intervene in this suit and litigate the rights of the government in prosecution, do not qualify themselves to intermeddle in the matter. The 26th rule in admiralty of the supreme court requires every person, in order to be received as a defendant, entitled to controvert the right to property of any kind seized in rem by another, "to verify his own claim on oath, stating that the claimant, by whom or on whose behalf the claim is made, is the true and bona fide owner, and that no other person is the owner thereof." No such proof is affixed to the claim in this instance; nothing beyond a hypothetical and equivocal intervention is furnished at all, and that is by a person having no personal interest in the matter, and not being a legal representative of the corporation attempting to appear, and who is supposed to apprehend it may incur a contingent liability in respect to the effects seized. No adequate evidence is therefore before the court, authorizing the railroad to appear in this cause to resist its progress, or question the full right of the informants to press the same to a legal decision. The case of Brown v. U. S., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 110, cited by the claimant's counsel, fortifies the principle of this decision. The seizure of the property was there adjudged illegal, because there was no authority of law justifying its condemnation, whilst this proceeding is sanctioned by express statute. Acts Aug. 6, 1861 [12 Stat. 319], July 17, 1862 [12 Stat. 591]. The motion on the part of the United States attorney to strike the claim and answer from the files of the court in this suit is granted.

[Thereafter a decree was rendered for libellants, but was reversed, and the libel dismissed by the circuit court in Case No. 15,961.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 29, 1865.

CONFISCATION—CIVIL WAR—PROPERTY EMPLOYED IN AID OF REBELLION — INFORMER'S SHARE — JURISDICTION — SEIZURES ON LAND — INTERNATIONAL LAW—PRACTICE—PARTIES.

1. Under the act of August 6, 1861 (12 Stat. 319), a forfeiture of property is provided for only in case the property is employed, with the knowledge or consent of its owner, in aid of insurrection.

2. By that act, one-half of the proceeds of a forfeiture under that act goes to the informer.

3. The whole of the proceeds of a forfeiture under the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 589), goes to the United States.

4. A district court of the United States in New York cannot acquire jurisdiction in rem, to declare a forfeiture, under those acts, of shares in the capital stock of an Illinois corporation.

5. The seizure of enemy property, by the United States, as prize of war, on land, jure belli, is not authorized by the law of nations, and can be upheld only by an act of congress.

6. Under the said acts of August 6, 1861, and July 17, 1862, the proceedings to condemn enemy property, when seized, must conform to the proceedings in admiralty and revenue cases.

[Cited in U. S. v. Stevenson, Case No. 16,396.]

7. An alien enemy has, under those acts, a right to appear as claimant of his property sought to be condemned, as forfeited, by a prosecution in rem under those acts, and to answer and defend the suit.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel of information, filed in the district court, by the United States, against 1,756 shares of the capital stock of the Great Western Railroad Company of Illinois, a corporation created under the laws of the state of Illinois, praying its condemnation, as having been the property of one Leroy M. Wiley, and as being forfeited to the United States. The district court decreed in favor of the libellants. The decree ordered the stock to be sold, and the proceeds, after the payment of a private debt of Wiley's, and of the costs of the suit, to be paid, one-half to the United States and the other half to the informer mentioned in the libel. Wiley and the company, who appeared and put in claims and answers, appealed to this court.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The libel in this case is founded upon two acts of congress, one passed on the 6th of August, 1861 (12 Stat. 319), and the other passed on the 17th of July, 1862 (Id. 589).

The 1st section of the act of August 6, 1861, declares, that if any person or persons, &c., shall purchase or acquire, sell or give, any property of whatsoever kind or description, with the intent to use or employ the same, or suffer the same to be used or employed, in aiding or abetting such insurrection or resistance to the laws, or any person or persons engaged therein, or if any person or persons, being the owner or owners of any such property, shall knowingly use or employ, or consent to the use or employment of the same, as aforesaid, all such property is declared to be lawful subject of prize and capture, wherever found, &c. The 2d section declares, that such prizes and capture shall be condemned in the district or circuit court of the United States, &c., or, in admiralty, in any district in which the same may be seized, or into which they may be taken and proceedings first instituted. The 3d section provides, that the attorney-general, or any district attorney of the United States, may institute the proceedings of condemnation, and, in such case, wholly for the benefit of the United States, or, any person may file an information with such attorney, in which case the proceedings shall be for the use of such informer and the United States in equal parts.

The 6th section of the act of July 17, 1862, declares, that if any person, &c., being engaged in armed rebellion against the government of the United States, or aiding or abetting such rebellion, &c., all the estate and property, moneys, stocks, and credits of such person shall be liable to seizure as aforesaid, and it shall be the duty of the president to seize and use them as aforesaid, or the proceeds thereof. The 7th section declares, that proceedings in rem shall be instituted in the name of the United States, in any district court thereof, &c., within which the property or any part thereof may be found, or into which the same, if movable, may first be brought, which proceedings shall conform as nearly as may be to proceedings in admiralty or revenue cases; and, if said property, whether real or personal, shall be found to have belonged to a person engaged in rebellion, or who has given aid or comfort thereto, the same shall be condemned as enemies' property, and become the property of the United States, and may be disposed of as the court shall decree, and the proceeds thereof paid into the treasury of the United States.

Leroy M. Wiley appeared by his proctors, and put in a claim to the stock in question, and also his answer to the libel of information, which were afterwards stricken, by order of the court, from the files. [Case No. 15,960a.] The Great Western Railroad Company also appeared by its proctors, and filed a claim and answer, which also were subsequently stricken from the files, by like order. [Id. 15,960b.] Afterwards, a decree of default was entered against the parties claimants. Proofs were then taken, ex parte, of the facts charged in the libel of information, and a decree of condemnation of the stock was entered, directing a sale of it by the marshal, and that the proceeds, after the payment of the costs and charges, be distributed to the United States and the informer in equal parts. The claim and answer of Wiley were stricken from the files, as appears from the papers and the opinion of the court, upon the ground that it was shown that he was a resident of the state of Alabama, a state declared to be in insurrection against the United States, and hence an alien enemy, and that he had no persona standi in court. The claim and the answer of the railroad company were stricken out, upon the ground, substantially, that they had intervened for the benefit of Wiley, a stockholder in the company.

It will be observed, that the principle or ground of proceeding, with a view to the condemnation and forfeiture of the property under the two acts of congress, is different. The first act places the forfeiture upon the fact of the use or employment of the property in aiding, abetting or promoting the insurrection or resistance to the laws. All such property is declared to be lawful prize, and liable to confiscation. The real issue under that act is, whether or not the property seized has been so used or employed with the knowledge and consent of the owner. The owner may or may not be an alien enemy; and, even if he be an alien enemy, his property is not the subject of a proceeding under the act, unless it can be shown to have been used or employed for the purpose mentioned. This particular use or employment lies at the foundation of the forfeiture. Now, the property sought to be confiscated in the present proceedings, is stock in an incorporated company, in the state of Illinois. Its situs is in that state; and there is great difficulty in perceiving how such an interest or species of property is capable of being used or employed in contravention of the provisions of the statute. But, waiving this, although the court required proof of the fact of the use or employment of the stock in aiding or abetting the insurrection, within the meaning of the act of congress, before condemnation, we find no evidence whatever in the record on the subject; and yet the forfeiture is declared under the act of August 6, 1861, as one moiety of the proceeds is directed to be paid to the informer. Under the act of July 17, 1862, the whole of the proceeds go to the government. This decree must have been an oversight, as all the proofs on the record apply exclusively to the offence charged in the latter act. There is some confusion of ideas in the libel of information, which, probably, misled the court in the decree; for, while the libel embraces both acts of congress, which, as we have seen, are different in principle and ground of proceeding, it concludes by praying that the proceeds, after condemnation and sale of the stock, be distributed to the government and the informer in equal parts; and the decree is in conformity with the prayer. The libel of information and the decree are under the act of August 6, 1861, while the proofs are all under the act of July 17, 1862.

Besides the irregularities in the proceedings, already stated, it is quite clear that the court below never acquired jurisdiction of the res, by any lawful seizure of the stock in question. The property consisted of an interest in the capital stock and dividends of an incorporated company in the state of Illinois, and which, as respects the legal proceedings in the Southern district of New York, is, in judgment of law, to be regarded as a foreign corporation, as much so as a corporation in London. The process of the court could not reach it. The situs of the property was beyond this district, and out of the jurisdiction of the court. It appears that the company had an agent in the city of New York, in charge of a transfer book of their stock, and who was simply authorized to receive and enter transfers of stock; and the seizure attempted and sought to be maintained was made through this agent. The act of August 6, 1861, provides, that the prizes and captures shall be condemned in the district or circuit court of the United States in any district in which the same may be seized, or into which they may be taken, and the proceedings be first instituted. By the act of July 17, 1862, proceedings in rem may be instituted in any district court within which the property may be found, or into which the same, if movable, may first be brought. Now this stock of the Illinois corporation belonging to Wiley, and which is the subject of condemnation by the decree of the court, could be seized only in the district in which the corporation is situated. It could neither be seized in this district nor be brought into it. Nor could it be seized or condemned without instituting proceedings against the corporation, the stock of which is sought to be condemned. It may be that a suit might be instituted against the owner in personam, and such proceedings be had as would lead to condemnation and forfeiture. But, in the absence of the owner, and in a proceeding in rem against the stock itself, which is the present case, the seizure and condemnation could take place only in the district in which the corporation is situated.

We come now to what I regard as the most important question in the case, and that is, whether or not the court below was right in striking from the files the claim and answer of Wiley, and in entering his default, on the ground that he was an alien enemy, and could have no standing in court. The act of July 17, 1862, provides, "that, to secure the condemnation and sale of any such property, after the same shall have been seized, &c., proceedings in rem shall be instituted, in the name of the United States, in any district court, &c., which proceedings shall conform as nearly as may be to proceedings in admiralty or revenue cases; and, if said property, whether real or personal, shall be found to have belonged to a person engaged in rebellion, or, who has given aid or comfort thereto, the same shall be condemned as enemies' property, and become the property of the United States," &c. The act of August 6, 1861, speaks of the seizures, as prizes and captures to be condemned either in the circuit court. or in admiralty, in the district court. These acts provide for the seizure of enemies' property, as prize of war, on land, jure belli, which, according to the case of Brown v. U. S., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 110, is not authorized by the law of nations, and can be upheld only by an act of congress; in other words, by the municipal law of the nation seeking to enforce the forfeiture. The law of nations authorizes captures, as prize of war, on the high seas—these acts of congress, on the land; and, in the latter case, the acts expressly provide that the proceedings shall conform to the proceedings in admiralty and revenue cases, and that, if the property is found to belong to a person engaged in the rebellion, it shall be condemned as enemies' property. These acts of congress are but an extension of the rule which, according to international law, has always been applied, jure belli, to enemies' property at sea. Now, the principle that an alien enemy has no standing in court, and cannot appear and defend his property seized as prize of war on the high seas, does not appear to have ever been applied to a claimant in the admiralty. On the contrary, the books are full of cases in which the very question involved was the national character of the claimant—whether he was a neutral or an enemy. I need refer to only a few of them: The Indian Chief, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 12; La Virginie, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 98; The Fama, Id. 106; The Boedes Lust, Id. 234; The President, Id. 277; The Gerasimo, 11 Moore, P. C. 88; The Baltica, Id. 141. In many of the prize cases growing out of the recent Rebellion, the main point involved turned upon the fact whether or not the claimant was a neutral, or a loyal citizen, or an enemy. Indeed, at the very last term of the supreme court, these questions were before it and were fully discussed and decided. All of these cases are applicable to and control the question in the present case. The two proceedings—the one a capture on the high seas, the other a capture on land—are analogous, not merely in their nature and purpose, but are made so by the acts of congress.

I have not deemed it necessary to discuss the question raised, whether or not the claimant can be regarded as an alien enemy, he having been a citizen of the United States at the breaking out of the war, and being still a resident of one of the states, inasmuch as, according to the cases already referred to, even if he be an alien enemy, he is entitled to appear as a claimant, and contest the allegations in the libel.

Several other questions of great interest and importance have been discussed in the course of the argument, going to the merits; but, as the views already expressed dispose of the case, I forbear to notice them.

The decree of the court below must be reversed, and the libel of information be dismissed.

CUSTOMS LAWS—SEIZURE FOR UNDERVALUATION—AMOUNT OF BOND.

[In bonding merchandise seized by the collector for alleged undervaluation, the amount of the bond should equal the appraised value of the goods, and the collector cannot require a bond covering the appraised value plus the amount of the duties.]

Sidney Webster, for claimants.

Ethan Allen, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

The collector lately seized 1,382 hogsheads of sugar, claimed by F. Luling & Co., on the ground that they were undervalued. The appraised value of the goods was $28,000. The duties on the same were $15,000. The collector of the port instructed the district attorney in bonding the goods to demand a bond for $43,000, covering both the duties and the appraised value. To this the claimant demurred, and came before the court for its order in the premises. The attorney for the claimants contended the government could demand a bond for $28,000 only, that being the appraised value; that upon withdrawing the goods under the bond, the claimants were bound in any event to pay $15,000 duties, and that if this $15,000 should also be included in the bond, and the bond should be forfeited, that then the $15,000 would be necessarily paid by the claimants the second time, which would be unjust. Upon hearing argument on the other side, the judge said "that this matter had been decided before." He had previously given his decision that the government could claim for only the appraised value, and directed the entry of the following order:

"On motion of Sidney Webster, Esq., for the claimants, for bonding the merchandise in this suit, and upon hearing said proctor in support of said motion, and upon hearing Ethan Allen, Esq., assistant United States district attorney, in opposition thereto, it is hereby ordered that the merchandise in question be bonded at their appraised value, exclusive of the duties; and if the parties do not agree as to the appraised value, that an appraiser or appraisers will be appointed by this court to determine the value thereof."

The goods were bonded for $28,000, accordingly.

NEW TRIAL — CUSTOMS LAWS — EXAMINATION OF GOODS.

1. Grounds upon which a court of common law may grant a new trial.

2. It seems that the proper construction of the act of 1799, c. 22, § 67 (1 Stat. 677), requires that each package shall be examined by a custom-house officer in the presence of two merchants, and that, to constitute such presence, the merchants must be in such a situation as to be able to witness such examination, and to see and testify to a part at least of the contents of each package.

C. L. Woodbury, for claimants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. In this case there has been a verdict for the United States, and the claimants of the property move for a new trial.

The question how far the power of the court extends in granting new trials has been elaborately discussed by the counsel for the United States.

It is admitted that if the verdict rests on wrong instructions, or if, with correct instructions, it rests on a mistake or disregard of the law by the jury, or if it is the result of bias, or mistake of facts,—in short, if the verdict is not the result of the judgment of the jury on the facts in evidence with a correct application of the law,—the court may order a new trial; but it is contended that if the result is a verdict of the jury, in the sense of law,—that is, a result of the judgment of the jury upon a correct application of the law,—the verdict must stand; and it is urged that to grant a new trial for other reasons is to infringe upon the constitutional right of trial by jury.

It is to be remembered that a new trial does not remove the cause from the jury to the court, but from one jury to another. The question is not which tribunal, the court or the jury, shall decide the case, but how far a verdict of one jury is conclusive against a motion for a re-trial before another jury.

The idea that the constitution renders a first verdict sacred, so as to interfere with the allowance of a second trial, is of recent origin. Formerly, in Massachusetts, the losing party could have a second trial as of right by merely claiming an appeal. If the second verdict was the same as the first, it was conclusive unless the court, in its discretion, should see fit to set it aside. If the result of the second trial was different from that of the first, the losing party had a right, by a process of review, to have another trial. The losing party in this third trial, having had two verdicts against him, was concluded thereby, unless the court should grant him a new trial. By this system it was not thought safe to rely upon the finding of a single jury. A party could claim a re-trial as matter of right until two verdicts had gone against him, and even then the court had the power to grant another trial if in their discretion they should deem it proper. This system commenced at an early period, and was in operation for a long time. It continued for some years after Maine became a separate state. I had there some agency in bringing about a change.

The first step was to take away the right of a third trial, that is, the process of review. Those in favor of this change did not contend that the constitutional right to trial by jury was infringed or impaired by allowing a second and third trial. That idea was never suggested. Their arguments rested wholly upon expediency. It was insisted that such protracted litigation was unnecessary, and created great expense, vexation, and danger of perjury. No one contended that a single verdict ought to be conclusive. On the contrary, the advocates for the abrogation of the old system urged that the known power of the court to grant new trials would be a sufficient safeguard against erroneous and improper verdicts, and that it should be left to an impartial tribunal to determine whether justice required a re-investigation, rather than to the will of a biased, perhaps heated and vindictive party.

The constitution secures a trial by jury, without defining what that trial is. We are left to the common law to learn what it is that is secured. Now the trial by jury was, when the constitution was adopted, and for generations before that time had been, here and in England, a trial of an issue of fact by twelve men, under the direction and superintendence of the court. This direction and superintendence was an essential part of the trial. The question really is, what is the extent of the superintending power? The court was undoubtedly authorized to exercise a supervision over verdicts, and to sustain them or set them aside. This power was given for the furtherance of justice. But the law did not specify the cases in which verdicts should be set aside and new trials granted. That was left to the judgment of the court. It rested wholly in the discretion of the judge to determine under what circumstances and for what causes a verdict should be set aside. And his decision was final, being subject to no revision by appeal or writ of error. Yet, as in other cases of discretion, it was not intended to be an arbitrary or capricious, but a judicial discretion, to be exercised for good reasons. But each judge must determine for himself the sufficiency of the reasons. He should indeed welcome all the light that could be thrown upon his path, and carefully examine the decisions of his predecessors, to see how far the practice of the courts has gone, and what rules or principles could be deduced therefrom. These rules could not indeed bind his own judgment; but, having been practically adopted by enlightened jurists, they would, to some extent, aid and influence the formation of his own opinions. Prior decisions were examined, not because they could make or authoritatively declare the law prescribing the circumstances under which a new trial should be granted, but as tending to show how a discretionary power could be most wisely exercised.

It appears, then, that at the time of the adoption of the constitution, it was a part of the system of trial by jury in civil causes that the court might, in its discretion, set aside a verdict. This power had for a long time been frequently and freely exercised without question; and if a judge does not go further in granting new trials than the known practice of the courts at the time of the adoption of the constitution he cannot be justly charged with encroaching upon the trial by jury. On the contrary, he may be said to uphold it, because each party, the losing as well as the winning, has a right to the legitimate trial by jury, with all its safeguards, as understood when the constitution was adopted. As to the practice in our own courts, we have no reports of decisions prior to the Revolution, but it is known that they were founded upon and followed those of the common-law courts in England. Mr. Dane, who was an eminent public man and a learned lawyer during the Revolution and at the time of the adoption of the constitution, lays it down without qualification in his great work on American Law, that the granting of new trials rests in the discretion of the court, and that it is a maxim that a new trial should be granted when justice requires it. He refers to some of the English decisions to show in what cases this power had been exercised. Those decisions are very numerous, and show that the court had little hesitation in granting a second trial where the result of the first had not been satisfactory. The mere certificate of the judge who tried the case that he was not satisfied with the verdict, was sometimes sufficient cause for setting it aside. I shall not attempt an enumeration of the English decisions, but refer to one which took place just previous to our Revolution, and which more than covers the case now before me. It is Norris v. Freeman, 3 Wils. 38, decided in 1769.

The question for the jury in that case was whether the signature to a release was genuine. There were two attesting witnesses, one of whom was called and testified to the signature, and said that the release was signed at the plaintiff's house. The same party called witnesses acquainted with the handwriting of the supposed signer who testified to their belief that it was genuine. The other side called witnesses who testified that the parties to the instrument were not, and could not have been, at the place of signature at the time of the date of the instrument. It did not, however, appear positively that the date was not inserted prior to the time of the alleged signing. They also called persons familiar with the handwriting, who testified against its genuineness. The other attesting witness was not called by the party relying upon the release, nor was any reason given for not calling him. The verdict established the release. It was set aside, not on the ground that it was unjustifiable on the evidence before the jury, but because the party setting up the release might have called the other attesting witness; and, in such a state of the evidence, there ought to be a new trial in order that the available direct testimony might be produced. Yet in that case the jury might and should have weighed the fact of the non-production of that witness as bearing against the party setting up the release.

In the case now before me, one question put in issue was whether the goods had been examined as prescribed in the 67th section of the statute of 1799, c. 22 [1 Stat. 677]. The government held the affirmative, and to maintain it called four witnesses, a custom-house officer and three merchants. The officer and one of the merchants testified in general terms that they all four went to the place where these bags were deposited, and there made an examination of them, but they did not describe the manner of that examination. The next merchant called went one step further and said that the bags were laid out in rows, and that the examination was made by passing along by the several rows. The other merchant, being the one last called, testified that there were twelve or thirteen rows of bags, and that he examined only a part of them. And thus the evidence was left without particular inquiry or description of the mode in which the examination was made. The fair inference to be drawn from this testimony was that there had been a division of labor, by each merchant taking a separate row, and examining the contents of every bag in that row; and thus every bag was examined by some one of the merchants, but not by two of them. This seemed to be the necessary conclusion from the testimony of the last two merchants, and entirely consistent with that of the other merchant and the officer, who both testified in general terms that all the bags were examined, without stating that any one of them was examined by two persons, or by the officer when any two of the merchants were in a situation to see any part of the contents thereof.

Upon recurring to the statute, I was of opinion that it required that each package should be examined by a custom-house officer in the presence of two merchants, and that, to constitute such presence, the merchants must be in such a situation as to be able to witness such examination, and to see and testify to a part at least of the contents of each package. In this view of the law, it seemed to me that the evidence of the examination was incomplete, and that a further statement as to the manner in which it was made was desirable. I thereupon stated my view of the requirements of the statute, and suggested to the counsel for the government that he might, if he saw fit, recall his witnesses to state fully the manner in which the examination of the packages was made But neither of them was recalled. In charging the jury, I laid down the law as to the construction of the statute, as I have above stated it, and endeavored to make them comprehend it. I recapitulated the evidence respecting the examination, but did not deem it necessary to make any remarks upon it.

The jury returned a verdict for the government. This was unexpected. It seemed to me that they must have misunderstood or disregarded either the law or the evidence. There was no conflict of testimony. All the evidence came from the four witnesses introduced by the government, the custom-house officer, and three merchants selected by him. No one of them had detailed the manner of the examination so as to make it clear that it was such as the statute required, while one of them, at least, had made a statement from which it was to be inferred that it was not. All doubts and difficulties might have been removed by recalling these witnesses or a part of them. They must have well known their own mode of proceeding. It was not known to the claimants, they not being present. I think that this case not only comes within the authorities already cited, and the practice of courts previous to and at the time of the adoption of the constitution, but within the most restricted exercise of the power of granting new trials which has ever been known in our courts.

The question whether the examination of this merchandise was such as the statute requires, must be submitted to another jury. Under the second plea, the jury have found that the contents of the packages differed from the entry. I do not think it necessary that this or the other matters embraced by the verdict should again be tried; and the new trial will be granted upon such conditions that the contestation before the jury shall be confined to the mode in which the examination of this merchandise was made, saving, however, to the claimants the benefit of all exceptions which were taken to the rulings and instructions of the court.

Case No. 15,965.

UNITED STATES v. ONE THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-ONE BALES OF TOBACCO.

[2 Lowell, 107;[1] 14 Int. Rev. Rec. 172.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1872.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURES—FORFEITABLE VALUE—RELEASE BOND.

1. An importer who, for illegality, has forfeited his goods to the United States, loses the whole value of the goods in the home market; this, whether the goods are seized before or after entry.

2. The forfeiture is the same whether the importer has given a warehousing bond, or has paid the duties, or has neglected to enter them.

3. When goods are seized in bond, the importer who wishes to have them released must stipulate for the value after the duties are paid, and not merely for their value in bond.

[This was an information containing several counts against 1,291 bales of tobacco seized while on storage in an United States bonded warehouse, and alleged to be forfeited to the government because entered by means of a false invoice, and other false and fraudulent practices and appliances, under section 1, act March 3, 1863, c. 76 (12 Stat. 737). Samuel A. Way appeared as claimant, and filed a petition that said goods might be delivered to him upon filing a bond for their appraised value, and that the appraisers might be ordered to appraise said goods at their value in the bonded warehouse, less the amount of duties payable thereon.][2]

F. W. Hurd, for the United States.

H. D. Hyde, for claimant.

LOWELL, District Judge. Imported goods having been seized in the bonded warehouse for an alleged violation of section 3 of the act of 3d March, 1863 (12 Stat. 738), the claimant applies to have them delivered to him in the warehouse, upon his filing a stipulation for value, and that the appraisers be instructed to estimate them at their market price, less the duties. The district attorney maintains that the value should be the full market price. The question has been decided differently by district judges of learning and ability, and this want of agreement will necessitate a new examination of the question. Judge Blatchford's opinion is in favor of the claimant's position. Four Cases of Silk Ribbons [Case No. 4,986]. Judges Hoffman and Cadwalader have required the bond to be for the full market value. U. S. v. Twelve Thousand Three Hundred and Forty-seven Bags of Sugar [Id. 16,555]; U. S. v. Segars [Id. 16,249].

Leaving out of view the question of a possible re-exportation of the goods, which I shall speak of later, it is very clear that an importer who has committed some fraud or illegality, by which his goods are forfeited to the United States, loses the full value of his goods at the home market, and not their value less the duties, which is a compromise between the home and the foreign value. This is admitted to be so if he has paid the duties; and he is not to be benefited by having smuggled them. The duties form part of the value here; and whether the goods are seized before or after entry, the importer is personally liable to pay the duties; and, to avoid circuity of action, section 89, Rev. St. 1799 (1 Stat. 696), requires, that, upon his giving a bond for value, he must also pay or secure the duties before receiving delivery of his goods. That section is scarcely more than declaratory of the common law; because the duties are a debt, and the government has a lien on the goods for it, and there would be an action for the amount, whichever way the suit was decided. It has, therefore, been the usual, as it is the proper, practice to appraise goods seized before entry, or before the duties are paid, at their full market value, and to require the duties to be paid besides. It is an entire fallacy to say that the importer is thus made to pay the duties twice; for they are a part of the original price, and he does not lose the goods and their price too. Take this case, where the duties are sixty per cent of the whole value. If the importer gives a stipulation for $40,000, as he asks leave to do, and then forfeits it and pays the duties, he will have lost $40,000, and not $100,000, nor $140,000; because he has received goods worth $100,000, and out of this he has paid his duties, and the forfeiture, which together are exactly that amount, and his loss is the original $40,000, which represents the prime cost abroad, and the freight and charges, but not the duties; and the government has received the duties, which it was entitled to in any event, and has then remitted an equivalent amount in favor of a fraudulent importer. The mode of appraisement which I uphold follows inevitably from the principle that the goods are subject to a duty for which the importer is personally liable, and are also subject to forfeiture if illegally imported.

No reason has been given, nor can I find any, why the importer's position should be different, if he has given a bond for the duties, from what it is if he has paid them, or neglected to enter them. Whenever they happen to be seized, his position is the same,—he must pay the duties, if he has not already done so; and if he has committed the fraud, he loses the goods, and, if not, he saves them, neither more nor less.

It is admitted that if the government holds these goods, and they are forfeited, the government will receive the full value, and collect the duties besides; but it is insisted that in that event the claimant will lose but $40,000, though the government will have gained $100,000. This is a mistake. It is impossible that the government should gain by the forfeiture itself more than the claimant will lose by it, or that the claimant's loss, if he is able to pay his bond for the duties, will be any less than the value of the goods which he forfeits, or that the loss will vary, excepting so far as interest on his payments is concerned, whether the duties are paid before or after the suit is decided, or before or after seizure. The value of these goods in the warehouse, as the district attorney has well shown, is $100,000, and not $40,000. A purchaser at the latter price must give satisfactory indemnity against the importer's liability for the duties; and this is, in fact, a part of the price, whatever the form of the sale may be. Such a purchaser, if the goods were forfeited, would lose $100,000, if the importer could enforce his obligation to pay the duties; but if the fraud of the importer absolved the purchaser from this, then he would lose $40,000, and the importer would lose $60,000, which together make up the $100,000. Neither more nor less, in any event, and by whomsoever borne, will be lost by the forfeiture of these goods than their exact value, unless, indeed, they are now released on a stipulation for less than their value.

If it were true in fact that the value of these goods to the owner is less than their value to the government, it would by no means follow that he should have them by giving bond for the lesser value. It is never a question in judicial controversies of value to the one party or to the other, when there is a market price; but even granting that it were, yet the government, or any one else having possession of property, and being asked to give it up, must have an equivalent. It is nothing to the plaintiff that the defendant does not estimate the property at its full market value, or that it has not cost him so much: he is entitled to that value before he surrenders it; "melior conditio possidentis."

I have considered the case thus far as if the goods were intended for home consumption; and I apprehend that they must be bonded as if they were so intended, and this for several reasons. 1. Goods that are warehoused are in fact almost always so disposed of. 2. Goods really intended for re-exportation will not be fraudulently imported, unless in connection with some allied domestic fraud; because there is no motive to commit any fraud in that case. 3. If the rare and improbable case should happen of a fraud, real or suspected, in the importation of such goods, the rule still holds that the owner should give an equivalent for what he receives; and, theoretically, he loses nothing by the application of the rule, because he obtains goods for their exact value. Practically, he may be obliged to make a larger investment than he had intended. But we must have a general rule; and the only safe and reasonable rule is the market value here. [It is agreed by both parties that the goods should properly be delivered to the claimant in the bonded warehouse, and subject to the bond to pay the duties or re-export the goods, that bond being a sufficient security for the duties within section 89 of the act of 1799, c. 22 (1 Stat. 696), if that section applies to this case. It probably does not apply; but the common law reaches the same conclusion, and requires the claimant to become bound in court for the full home value of the goods, besides remaining bound to the government for the duties. The application to bond is granted, but the appraisers are to be instructed to ascertain the true cash value of the tobacco in the market.] [3]

Bond to be given for full value.

Case No. 15,966.

UNITED STATES v. ONE WATER CASK.

[10 Int. Rev. Rec. 93.]

District Court, D. Kentucky. Sept., 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—FORFEITURES—RECTIFIERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS—BOOK ENTRIES.

1. Where a rectifier and wholesale liquor dealer, acting under section 26 of the revenue act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98], entered in the prescribed books certain spirits bought and received by him, and the names of the manufacturers or rectifiers thereof marked on the barrels, as the persons from whom purchased, instead of the names of the actual vendors—held, he had not complied with the requirements of the law in so doing, and had incurred the forfeiture denounced by said section, from which the court had no power to relieve.

2. The forfeiture denounced by said section applies only to the spirits, apparatus, and articles in the possession of the offender at the time of the act or neglect whereby forfeited, and not to such as he might thereafter acquire and be found in his possession.

BALLARD, District Judge. This is a proceeding for the condemnation of one water cask, thirty-four barrels of spirits and other articles, as forfeited to the United States. The information is founded on the 26th section of the internal revenue act of 1866 (14 Stat. 98), and contains three counts. The first count alleges in substance, that said water cask, spirits, &c., were, on the 5th of May, 1868, the day of the seizure, found in the possession of one W. L. Weller, who was then and there a rectifier, and as such purchased and received and sold and delivered a large quantity of spirits, and used said water cask and other apparatus, tools and implements, in rectifying spirits, but neglected and refused to enter daily in a book kept for that purpose, the number of proof gallons of spirits purchased and received, of whom purchased and received, and the number of proof gallons sold and delivered. The second count alleges that said Weller was a wholesale dealer in distilled spirits, and it also alleges the same acts of neglect set out in the first count. The third count alleges that said Weller was a rectifier and wholesale dealer, and then it proceeds substantially with the same allegations contained in the first and second counts, except that it sets out with more particularity the form of book prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue to be kept by rectifiers and wholesale dealers in spirits.

The whole of the property seized is claimed by W. L. Weller. In his answer claimant says he did keep the book, and did make all the entries therein required to be made as he understands the statutes and the regulations of the commissioner; that on the 17th of December, 1867, he purchased of one Sherman, 50 barrels, 2,251 gallons of spirits, that he entered said spirits in his books as purchased of Eastman & Warner, that the entry was made on the proper day, and was in every particular correct, unless the entry of the names of Eastman & Warner as the vendors, and not the name of Sherman, the actual vendor, was incorrect; that the names of Eastman & Warner were entered as the vendors because they were on the barrels as the manufacturers or rectifiers, and his habit was to copy into his book the brands on barrels purchased by him as a compliance with what he understood to be the requirements of the statute and the regulations of the commissioner, and as furnishing the best means of identifying and tracing the spirits so purchased. The answer further states that the claimant, on the 8th of January, 1868, purchased of one Begen, 50 barrels of whisky, containing 2,208½ gallons, which were entered as purchased of Eastman and Warner for the same reason assigned in respect to the entry of the 50 barrels purchased on the 17th December. The answer further states that on the 24th December, 1867, he purchased 50 bbls. of spirits, which through inadvertence entirely he failed altogether to enter in his books. To this answer the district attorney has demurred.

The 26th section of the statute above mentioned provides "that every rectifier or wholesale dealer in distilled spirits shall enter daily in a book or books kept for the purpose, under such rules and regulations as the commissioner of internal revenue may prescribe, the number of proof gallons of spirits purchased or received, of whom purchased or received, and the number of proof gallons sold or delivered, and every rectifier or wholesale dealer who shall neglect or refuse to keep such record, shall forfeit all the spirits in his possession, together with the apparatus, tools and implements used." As the claimant, by his own admission, failed to enter in his book of whom he purchased or received the spirits purchased and received on 17th December, 1867, and 8th January, 1868, respectively, and especially as he failed altogether to make any entry of the spirits purchased and received on the 24th December, 1867, it follows that he did not comply with the terms of the statute, and that the forfeiture denounced by it has been incurred, unless the court can relieve the parties from the consequence of inadvertent omissions. It is not, however, seriously insisted, that the court has any such power, and it is substantially conceded that a technical forfeiture has taken place, especially for failure to make the proper entries on the 24th of December. The demurrer must therefore be sustained.

After the demurrer was sustained as above indicated, the claimant filed an amended answer in which he alleges that at the several times mentioned in his original answer, he did not own nor have in his possession several of the articles seized; but that he subsequently acquired them. The amended answer then sets out in detail the articles so subsequently acquired, and it appears that they consist entirely of whisky and other distilled spirits, and in no part of "apparatus, tools or implements used." To this amended answer the district attorney has also demurred.

It will be seen that the amended answer does not purport to be an answer to the whole action. It purports to support the claim, not to the whole of the property alleged to be forfeited, but to a part of it. Now, if upon the facts set out in it, the articles enumerated are not forfeited to the United States, but belong to the claimant, the demurrer cannot be sustained. Thus, the interesting and important question is presented, whether the rectifier or wholesale dealer in distilled spirits, for a neglect or refusal to keep the record required to be kept by the 26th section of the act of July 13, 1866, forfeits all the spirits found in his possession at the time of the seizure, or only the spirits in his possession at the time the delinquency takes place. It will be observed that no question is made respecting the "apparatus, tools, and implements used." The only question raised, I repeat, respects "distilled spirits."

The general rule, under the internal revenue statutes and other statutes relating to revenue, unquestionably is, that whenever a forfeiture is denounced it attaches to the thing which has offended, or to it and other things connected with it. The forfeiture takes place at the time the offence is committed, and operates at that moment as a statutory transfer of the rights of property to the government. U. S. v. 1,960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; U. S. v. The Mars, Id. 417; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 311; Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 381; U. S. v. 56 Barrels of Whisky [Case No. 15,095]. The decision in the last case was rendered by this court, and was founded on the 57th and 68th sections of the internal revenue act of 1864 [13 Stat. 223]. The 57th section of the act of 1864 corresponds substantially with the 31st section of the act of 1866, and the 68th section substantially with the 25th section of the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 471], and the two combined substantially with the 26th section of the act of 1866, under which this proceeding is had. Now if the forfeiture under the 68th section of the act of 1864 takes place the moment any distiller fails to make the entry required to be made by the 57th section as was decided in the case of U. S. v. 56 Barrels of Whisky, supra, it is manifest that the forfeiture under the 26th section of the act of 1866 takes place at the time the rectifier or wholesale dealer fails to make the entry required by it. The statute does not, as the information seems to assume, forfeit the spirits &c., found in the possession of the rectifier or wholesale dealer. If this were its language the forfeiture might refer to the time of the finding of the spirits &c., in the possession of the delinquent. The forfeiture is of the spirits in his possession and by necessary intendment attaches only to the spirits in his possession at the time the act of neglect which causes the forfeiture is committed. If it attaches to other spirits subsequently acquired, and which at some subsequent period are found in the rectifier's possession, it is difficult to perceive that such forfeiture would cease to operate as a transfer of all spirits acquired by him at any time whilst he should continue in business. I cannot believe that the statute should receive a construction so harsh and so opposed to the whole tenor and spirit of revenue laws. The 26th section does not, like the 68th section of the act of 1864, in terms denounce a forfeiture for neglecting or refusing to make the entry, &c., but for neglecting or refusing to "keep such record," still, I think, there is no substantial difference. In either case the party is required to enter daily, in a book kept for the purpose, certain matters, and the offense in each case consists in neglecting or refusing to make the entries at the time specified in the "books kept for the purpose." I do not think that the offense was, as the district attorney contends, a continuing one. It was complete when the entry was not made in the proper book on the day the spirits were purchased and received. No entry on a subsequent day could condone or wipe out the offense already committed, nor would the failure to make the entry on such subsequent day be a new offense or a repetition of the old one.

The demurrer to the amended answer must therefore be overruled.

Case No. 15,967.

UNITED STATES v. OPEN BOAT.

[5 Mason, 120.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct. Term, 1828.[2]

NONINTERCOURSE LAWS — OPEN BOATS — VESSELS OWNED BY DOMICILED BRITISH SUBJECTS.

1. An open boat is not a ship or vessel within the purview of the statutes of 1820, c. 122 [3 Stat. 602], and 1823, c. 150 [3 Story's Laws, 1893 (3 Stat. 740, c. 22)], which prohibit commercial intercourse from the British colonies. [Followed in U. S. v. Open Boat, Case No. 15,968.]

2. It seems, that, notwithstanding those statutes, open British boats may visit the United States, if not destined for trade.

3. British ships or vessels excluded from our ports by those statutes, are such as are owned by British subjects, having a British domicil, and sailing under the British flag, and not ships or vessels owned by British subjects domiciled in the United States.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

Libel of seizure for violation of the navigation and intercourse acts of 15th of May, 1820, c. 122, and of 1st of March, 1823, c. 150 [3 Story's Laws, 1893 (3 Stat. 740, c. 22)] against an open boat and her tackle and lading. The information alleged, (1) that this was a boat or vessel, owned wholly, or in part, by British subjects, and that she came and arrived by sea, from some part of the province of New Brunswick, within the port of Eastport; (2) that sundry goods, not of the growth and manufacture of the United States, comprising the boat load, were shipped and waterborne on the waters of the Bay of Passamaquoddy, for the purpose of being exported into New Brunswick in said boat, &c. not being a vessel of the United States. The facts, as proved, were as follows. The boat was under five tons in burthen, and was without a deck, and had on board, at the time of the seizure, 28 barrels of tar and pitch, with which she was bound from Eastport to St. Andrews, in New Brunswick. She had no custom-house papers on board at the time of the seizure, and it did not appear, that such papers had at any time been taken out for her. She was owned by British born subjects, who, with their families, had resided and been domiciled at Eastport for several years; and her home was admitted to be at Eastport. The goods on board were claimed by Joseph C. Noyes, a citizen of the United States, residing at Eastport. [The district court decreed a restoration of the goods. Case No. 10,549.]

Mr. Shepley, U. S. Dist. Atty.

The first inquiry is, whether this boat is included within the class of vessels excluded from the United States by the act of May 15, 1820. The word "vessel," as applied to maritime affairs, is understood to mean any vehicle used for transportation on the water; and if the word is used in the act according to its common acceptation, the act clearly excludes boats owned by British subjects, from our waters. And if such is the sense in which the word is used in the laws of the United States generally, it may safely be concluded to have been so used in this act. In the first registry act of September 1, 1789, c. 11 (Brozen's Ed.) [1 Stat. 55], the language used is, "ship or vessel," to designate all water-craft; and when it is intended to exclude any of the small craft, a limitation is made by stating the tonnage. In section 22, it is provided, that "the master or owner of every vessel of less than twenty tons and not less than five tons"—"shall cause the name of such vessel to be painted," &c. In the coasting act of February 18, 1793, c. 52 [1 Story's Laws, 285 (1 Stat. 305, c. 8)], §§ 1, 4, 6, "ships or vessels," of less than twenty tons, are spoken of; and in section 26, "ships or vessels" of more than five tons; and in the 37th section is a provision, that the act shall not extend to boats or lighters of a specific class, thereby implying, that it does extend to other boats and lighters. In the collection act of March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 92 [1 Story's Laws, 656 (1 Stat. 697, c. 22)], foreign merchandise is required to be imported on "ships or vessels" of less than thirty tons, except in certain districts, thereby implying, that such importation in those districts may be made in "ships or vessels" of less tonnage without limitation. In the act of July 29, 1813 [3 Stat. 49], granting "allowances to certain vessels employed in the fishery," section 5, "ship or vessel" is used, and the limitation established by the tonnage. In the 6th section, "boat or vessel" is used, and the limitation is made by the tonnage. And so in sections 7 and 8, "vessel" and "ship or vessel" are the terms used. It is believed the term "vessel" is used in the laws of the United States, as including all water-craft, and that a limitation is expressed where one is intended. Where the language of a statute is plain, courts will never look after the motives of the lawgiver, or the objects intended to be effected; they do so only where the language is obscure or contradictory, or where from some other cause the mind is left in doubt, whether the statute embraces the case. Believing that this statute is neither doubtful nor obscure, but that it determines clearly, that vessels of all classes from New Brunswick, owned by British subjects, are excluded from our waters under penalty of forfeiture; the propriety of arguing whether a particular class, to wit, boats, come within the evils intended to be remedied by the statute, is not admitted; but while it is not admitted, such an inquiry is not to be feared. The object of Great Britain seems to have been, to give to her own subjects the navigation and trade to her colonies in the West Indies. The object on our part, to counteract that policy and prevent the intended effect of it. The British, by excluding us from the West Indies, hoped to secure for themselves "the long voyage" from these provinces, or from our country to the West Indies. The United States hoped, by excluding all these provincial vessels from our ports, to operate as strongly against their navigation, as their own laws were calculated to operate in its favour. Whatever, therefore, would tend to depress and injure their shipping interest, and to deprive them of the fruits they intended to reap, would be in furtherance of the policy of this government. Hence we should expect to find our government extending the exclusion as far as it might lawfully do. It could not extend the exclusion beyond the provincial vessels, without a violation of the commercial convention of 1815. And it has done what would be expected of it. It has not stopped at the exclusion of British West India vessels, but has excluded all her provincial vessels without discrimination. To limit the exclusion to a particular class of these vessels, would be doing less than this government had a right to do, and less than her counteracting policy required should be done. And just so far as a limitation of the exclusive system is made, so far the British shipping remains uninjured, in the enjoyment of the advantages intended to be extended to it by the British laws. If a distinction is to be made in the classes of vessels excluded, and not excluded, by what rule is the court to be guided in making it? What shall be the tonnage of those not excluded? Will the court look into a foreign statute book to fix this rule, and so make the rule change, as foreign legislation varies? Can any limitation be adopted, confining the operation of the statute to British subjects domiciled abroad? Such a construction would be contrary to our whole system of navigation as exhibited in the registry and coasting acts; and would give all the trade to British built vessels, changing only the domicil of the owners. Suppose at the passage of the act of 1820, amendments had been offered, limiting the act to vessels navigating according to the regulations of the British plantation trade; or to vessels documented as British vessels; or to vessels with decks; can one doubt that each of these propositions would have made a material alteration in the act, and would have required and received very grave deliberation before it had been adopted? "De minimis non curat lex" cannot be applied to the boat navigation; it would be out of place.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

On what is believed to be another erroneous construction of the statute, is founded an objection to the sufficiency of the first allegation in the libel. The words "shall enter or attempt to enter" the ports of the United States, are supposed to mean something more than coming within those ports. It is not perceived what other meaning can be attached to them, unless they require an entry at the custom-house. Such a construction would make congress declare, that British vessels should be excluded from our ports, and yet might come within them and do as they pleased, if they would avoid the custom-house. On a careful examination of the act it will be perceived, that the coming "by sea" is applied to the vessels of Lower Canada only, and the reason of it is obvious; Lower Canada being the only place mentioned in the act where arrivals in any other mode, to any extent, could be expected.

In relation to the second allegation in the libel it may be remarked, that the exports by the act of March 1, 1823, § 5, are limited to "any vessel of the United States or any British vessel," navigated, as prescribed, to the enumerated ports. By the 6th section, the act "so far as the same shall apply" to the intercourse "in British vessels, shall cease to operate in their favour," on the president's issuing his proclamation,—and by the proclamation it has so far ceased to be operative, and no farther. The act, then, remains in force to require exports "in any vessel of the United States" to be made to the enumerated ports; and to prohibit exportation in vessels, not vessels of the United States, by confining the exports to vessels of the United States. To adopt any other construction, is to erase the words "in any vessel of the United States," and read the act as if those words had never had place in it. But why is there such language used in the other section, that the president's proclamation shall cause the act to cease so far as respects British vessels, if nothing was intended to be regulated but British vessels? Why was not the act in terms suspended entirely, if such was the intention? Why such pains-taking, in the language of the act, to exclude the very result now contended for, if nothing was intended by it? Although the policy of confining exports to our own vessels, and in those, to certain enumerated ports, may not be seen; the inquiry is not whether the policy is wise, but whether congress has so enacted. Judicial tribunals do not assume the responsibility of erasing certain parts of a statute, because the wisdom of its provisions is not seen. Great might be the alterations in statutes, if such a rule were adopted.

C. S. Davies, for claimant.

The navigation of the United States, in the sense in which it comes into view by international regulations, is defined by the early acts of congress. What shall be deemed vessels of the United States, is determined by the provisions of our registry and coasting laws; settling how they shall be constructed, documented, owned, and manned, to entitle them to privileges of that national description, and discriminating the rates of tonnage established in their favour against foreign vessels. The lowest scale of tonnage, coming within the description of vessels of the United States, in the terms of their navigation acts, is five tons. Nothing in the provisions of the act for regulating the coasting trade and fisheries (section 37) extends to any boat or lighter not masted, or not decked (open), employed in the harbour of any town or city. The colonial intercourse, sought for by the government of the United States, is not capable of being carried on in vessels of a description inferior to what are legally denominated "vessels of the United States," and against which the measures of British legislation are directed. The act of 1820 is only pointed against British vessels arriving by sea. There is nothing in any of the respective provisions of Great Britain or the United States, that looks to a conflict of boat navigation. There has been no controversy on that subject; no measure for retaliation on our part existed in the English system. Such light boats are not recognized in the respective registry or enrolment acts, and navigation laws, of either power, more than birch canoes or timber rafts. They are not required to be built, owned, or navigated in any particular manner; they are not subject to tonnage duties; nor reached by any provisions of national policy. The allegation in the first article in the information certainly is, that this boat was a British vessel, within the meaning of the act of 1820. What sort of British vessel was contemplated by the policy of the acts of 1818 and 1820? The answer is, those that were protected and set apart, by the policy of the English navigation and plantation system, for the engrossment of the commercial intercourse between her American dependencies, and the United States. The act of 1818 touched, if I may so say, the very pupils of the British system. It bore immediately on British vessels, which had directly "cleared out" from, or circuitously touched at, any port or place in the British dominions, from which our navigation was excluded. It forbid their entering or attempting to enter the ports of the United States, under forfeiture of vessel and cargo. And every British vessel which should duly "enter" our ports, and take on board productions of the United States, was required to "give bond" (pursuing the pattern of the English plantation provision,—28 Geo. III. c. 6, § 3), also (act of navigation,—St. 12 Car. II. c. 18, § 19), to land them without any part of the British dominions from which our vessels were debarred by the British laws of navigation. There is nothing in all these provisions, that relates to the regulation of boats. The act of 1818 is defined to be a "non-intercourse, in British vessels, with ports closed, by British laws, against the vessels of the United States." Documents 19th Cong. (2d Sess. 1826) No. 2, p. 43; Letter of Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush, June 23. 1823. The supplementary act of 1820, was intended to arm and invigorate the act of 1818. It applied a special interdict to British vessels; vessels owned wholly or in part by British subjects; coming or arriving by sea from any part of the British dominions in this hemisphere. It prohibited their entry, or attempting to "enter," under pain of forfeiture, as before; and bonds were again required of British vessels duly entered, not to discharge articles of the produce of the United States shipped on board, for exportation, in any of the prohibited places. The 3d section prohibited importation into the United States from any of the foregoing

British dependencies, of any articles not produced therein, specially. This act established "a non-intercourse in British vessels with all the British American colonies, and a prohibition of all articles" except the produce of each colony respectively imported directly from itself. Documents of Congress, ut supra.

By the act of 1823, congress suspended the provisions of the acts of 1818 and 1820, in respect to certain British colonial and provincial ports, and authorized importation in certain British vessels, coming directly therefrom, of colonial produce, on one condition, that the same might be exported therefrom to this country, on equal terms, in vessels of the United States, the British vessels thereby admitted "being navigated by a master and three fourths of the mariners, at least, British subjects." The next section (section 3) provided for equalizing the duties on tonnage. The act of 1823, was apparently designed as a counterpart to St. 3 Geo. IV. c. 44 (1822). That statute allowed American built vessels, lawfully navigated, to import certain goods directly to the West Indies, and export colonial produce in their own bottoms. The trade authorized by this statute (like that secured by the commercial convention to be carried on with the East Indies) was to be conducted in ships built in the United States, whereof the master and three fourths of the mariners, were American. This act established the free ports enumerated in our act of 1823, and authorized the importation of certain specified articles, either in British built vessels, owned and navigated according to law, or in vessels of the build and ownership of the country, in which the articles imported had their origin, and authorized exportation, in the same description of vessels, direct to the country where the vessel belongs. By St. 3 Geo. IV. c. 45, the national commerce of the colonies, in exports and imports, is limited to British vessels, owned and navigated according to law The act of congress of 1823, corresponding to these provisions (section 5), enacted, that it should be lawful to export to any enumerated British port, in any vessel of the United States, or in any British vessel, navigated as required by the 2d section, and having come directly from any of the enumerated ports, articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, or imported therein, under the restriction therein provided. The proviso to the section relates exclusively to exportation in British vessels, and requires, that when exported in any such British vessel, bond shall be taken by the collector of the port, at which she shall have entered, for the due landing of the goods at the enumerated port, for which she shall have cleared out. The bond was to be given before shipment. No goods were allowed to be exported to any other than one of the enumerated ports, nor to be shipped on board any British vessel, except one coming direct from such port. And it was further enacted by the proviso, that "in case any such articles should be shipped or waterborne for the purpose of being exported contrary to the act, they should be forfeited." This act of 1823, was intended to meet and reciprocate the act of parliament of 3 Geo. IV. c. 44, establishing the free ports enumerated by our law. The regulations respecting exports and imports are understood to have been, in a legislative sense and measure, squared with the provisions of that act. The intercourse which was opened to our vessels in direct voyages to the free ports by the act of parliament, was opened also to British vessels, coming directly from, and returning directly to, the same ports, by the act of congress. British vessels, such as are privileged in the "trade and intercourse" before mentioned, were the subjects of this reciprocal measure; and the original retaliatory interdict was left to operate upon the same privileged vessels, either coming from, or going to, any other than one of the free and enumerated ports. And the previous interdict was further armed by the clause condemning goods either shipped, or waterborne, for the purpose of shipment, contrary to the force of this determined regulation. The whole measure seems to have had a final relation to the West India trade and intercourse; and the object appears to have been, to prevent exportation directly on board such British vessels, or indirectly and clandestinely by intermediate conveyance. British and American vessels, the respective objects of national protection, are thus brought into opposition by the principles and terms of the two corresponding acts; and the act of congress makes a special provision to prevent the liberty allowed to British vessels, from exceeding the measure granted to ours. The two acts of parliament and congress, taken together, constituted a sort of legislative convention, for the time being. Hence the language of the 5th section of the act of 1823, that "it shall be lawful to export from the United States, directly to any of the British colonial ports enumerated, in any vessel of the United States, or in any British vessel navigated," as the 2d section prescribed, &c. The terms employed are mutual; but the power of the act does not operate on vessels of the United States. So far as our laws were concerned, our vessels were at liberty before; and the only obstruction was from British legislation. After this act of 1823, was passed, there was nothing else, besides the act of parliament, to limit our vessels to the free or enumerated ports. Our act did not extend to prevent them from going to any other ports. In regard to them, viz. "vessels of the United States," its words had no legal meaning. The restrictive terms of the act of 1823, apply emphatically to British vessels, "being navigated by a master and three fourths at least, of the mariners, British subjects." Its force is ex-
