These facts and inferences concerning the question who took the gold dust in the Portland office, are proven by the evidence of the prosecution, except the letter of the postmaster at Baker City to the defendant in reply to his, which was introduced by defendant. On the trial, neither party cast any suspicion upon Chittenden, but the defendant insisted that Fox alone committed the crime with which the former was charged. Upon this question other evidence was introduced by both parties, which I prefer, for the present, to state substantially, rather than to say what facts were or were not proven by it. On Thursday, November 12, the judge of this court, upon the application of the United States attorney, issued a warrant for the arrest of Fox as a material witness for the prosecution in this case, under section 7 of the act of August 8, 1846 (9 Stat. 73). On the same day, Fox gave bail to appear as a witness in the case in the sum of $5,000, with two sureties, one of them being his wife's brother, Dr. Jacob S. Giltner. Before daybreak the next morning, the other surety in the undertaking of bail surrendered Fox, and he has remained in the jail of this county, as a witness, ever since. Putnam Smith, a broker, being called by the defendant, testified, that on August 6, 1868, he purchased of some one, he did not know who, 12 ounces and six pennyweights of gold dust, for which he gave $15¼ an ounce. That he made an entry in his book of the purchase at the time, as of "mixed dust," by which he meant dust taken from different camps or diggings; and that he bought dust once of Fox, but could not say when or what amount. He could not say that it was in August, but thought it must have been before the state fair at Salem, in 1868, and that nothing was said by Fox as to where he got the dust. That on November 10, Fox came into his place of business and placed the following letter, enclosed in a sealed envelope and addressed to Put. Smith, on his desk, and went out without saying a word, O. B. Gibson being in the room at the time: "Portland, Tuesday Morning—Mr. Put. Smith, Dr. Sir: Randall tells me that that Regt. Package affair, has been taken before the grand jury. When called upon I must clear everything. Need I fear anything? Drop me a line, good Put., and oblige. Yours, to serve always"—without any signature. That this letter was written by Fox, was not seriously questioned. Being the statement of a person out of court, and not a party to the action, it was not admissible in evidence upon the trial of the defendant, but when offered by the defendant, the prosecution consented to its being read to the jury, and it was read accordingly. In answer to the testimony of Putnam Smith in regard to the purchase of gold dust, the prosecution proved by Thomas Smith that the gold dust stolen from envelope 28 was placer dust of superior quality and all from one diggings.

To show the guilt of the defendant, either singly or in conjunction with Fox, the prosecution called as witnesses, the wife of Fox and her brother, Dr. Jacob S. Giltner. The former testified, that a few days after the indictment was found and after Fox had been surrendered by his bail, she visited the defendant to ascertain if he was a friend of her husband's. In this conversation the defendant said to witness that if Fox would do as he had agreed or as his friends said he would, that defendant and his friends would be Fox's friends, but that if not, he could not expect any help from him. That gold dust was not mailable matter, and stealing it from the postoffice was not a crime. That defendant was not guilty and would be cleared. That Fox would be in trouble about it but a little while, as defendant had influence with the senators and would get him pardoned immediately. On the cross-examination this witness, when asked if defendant did not say, that if Fox would come out and tell the truth about it, the defendant and his friends would be Fox's friends, answered, "Yes." When asked again by the prosecution to state in her own words what defendant said to her in this particular, she replied substantially as at first—that if Fox would do as he had agreed or as his friends said he would, etc. The examination and cross-examination on this point was carried on some time without any change of result, the witness continuing to state on the examination what she did at first, and on cross-examination to answer "Yes" to the interrogative statement of defendant's counsel. Giltner testified that in the night of November 12, defendant came to his office and said that Fox had confessed, and that he had better leave on the steamer for Victoria and from there he could get to the Sandwich Islands. That witness had better get Fox out of the way, as it would be a disgrace to witness, his brother-in-law. That witness had better get Fox off on the steamer, and the one going to leave that night at four o'clock. Witness declined to follow defendant's advice, saying that he could not afford to pay Fox's bail of $5,000, and that he wanted him to tell the truth about it. Defendant then said to witness, that gold dust was not mailable matter, and that the case would be taken out of the United States court; but if this failed, then defendant and witness with their influence with Senators Williams and Corbett could get Fox pardoned. The defendant proved that neither the Wright nor Active were in this port on November 12, and that at that date no other steamers were running between this port and Victoria; and also that the defendant had maintained a good reputation for honesty in this community, in which he had lived for several years before this charge was made.

On the evening of Thursday, January 7, at the close of the testimony, the defendant offered to read in evidence, for the purpose of impeaching a witness called by the prosecution, what purported to be the record of the conviction of one Jacob Giltner of a crime of counterfeiting, at Danville, Pennsylvania. The reading of the paper was objected to, because it lacked the certificate of the presiding judge to the attestation of the clerk. The court took the matter under advisement until the next morning, when counsel for the defendant asked leave to withdraw the offer to read the paper, which was allowed.

This is the case upon which the jury found the defendant guilty, and now the court is asked to set their verdict aside. If it is contrary to the evidence it ought to be set aside, but not otherwise. A verdict without evidence or against evidence, ought not to be allowed to stand in any court or case, but a verdict which is warranted by any fair construction of the testimony ought not to be set aside, although the court upon the same evidence would come to a different conclusion.

U. S. v. Martin [Case No. 15,731], was an indictment under the same statute substantially as this. The defendant being a mail carrier, was indicted for embezzling a letter from the mail bags in his custody containing bank notes. The evidence was wholly circumstantial, but the defendant was found guilty. A motion was made to set aside the verdict because it was contrary to evidence, which was denied, and the defendant sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. In considering the motion, Mr. Justice Holman, delivering the opinion of court, says: "In reviewing the verdict of a jury regularly given, the verdict must be presumed to be right until the contrary appears, and it should be sustained by the court, if the evidence, by any fair construction, will warrant such a finding. A court is not authorized to set a verdict aside simply because, if they had been on the jury, they would have found a different verdict. It is not sufficient that the verdict may possibly be wrong, but that, after giving a proper weight to all the evidence, it cannot be right. This verdict is given on what is called circumstantial evidence, and the court feel disposed to give due weight to the arguments which have been drawn from reported cases, where innocent individuals have been convicted and punished for supposed crimes, which were never committed or committed by others. These arguments show the necessity of extreme caution in convicting on circumstantial evidence, but do not prove that circumstances may not be sufficiently strong to authorize a conviction, or that circumstances are not to be relied on in proof of guilt. If a train of circumstances are not deemed sufficient to produce conviction, the penal laws in relation to many offences, especially these against the postoffice regulations, would be a dead letter." This is good law and sound sense, and the circumstances of the case in which it was delivered, make it particularly applicable in this case. This verdict was fairly given. There had been a former trial, so that the defendant was well informed of the nature of the evidence and arguments which would be used against him. He has had every facility and aid in making his defence that able counsel, wealth, zealous friends and position could give him or command. The jury were strangers to him, and as a whole as intelligent and respectable as I ever saw in this state or elsewhere.

Notwithstanding the proof, it is possible that the defendant is innocent. But absolute certainty is not required or attainable in matters depending upon human testimony or judgment. Moral certainty is all that is expected in the verdict of a jury. It will not be denied but that the circumstances proven point to the conclusion that either the defendant or Fox committed this crime singly, or that they were accomplices, and committed it together. The jury, having come to either of two of these conclusions, must have found the defendant guilty. They were the judges of what facts were proven, and of the proper inference to be drawn from them respecting the guilt or innocence of the defendant. This court cannot say that in deciding these questions they were clearly wrong, or that they acted contrary to the evidence, and therefore it ought not to disturb their verdict. Indeed I am constrained to think that the most reasonable conclusion from the facts and circumstances proven is, that the defendant, either alone or with the assistance of Fox, committed the crime.

Consider for a moment the extraordinary and inconsistent conduct of the defendant concerning the package from the time it reached his office until the time of his indictment and arrest. By the postoffice regulations he was required to register every registered package envelope that passed his office, and note its condition. If anything unusual appeared about the package, it was made his duty to notify the postal agent of it at once. According to the division of labor in the Portland office, the keeping of this register was the business of the defendant. No entry was made of the transit of this package through the office. This, although a circumstance to be considered, of itself concludes nothing. The defendant may have failed to register the package from mistake or carelessness, or it may not have reached his hands or come to his knowledge. But in any event, when called upon to give information concerning the matter, by the postal agent, he was required to tell the truth, and nothing but the truth, so far as he knew, and the presumption is that an innocent man would. On August 29, defendant said to Brooks, that he recollected the package and it passed the office all right. On September 6—That he thought the package was robbed in Blue Mountain mail robbery. On September 26—That he was satisfied that package was robbed in Blue Mountain mail robbery, and that he could prove it. October 3, in writing on the circular letter—That the package reached the Portland office on August 4 and left on August 5—nothing unusual was noticed to excite suspicion—which was equivalent to certifying that the package passed in good order. October 9, in a letter to postmaster at Sacramento—That he had reason to believe that package robbed in Blue Mountain mail robbery on August 2, but passed Portland office without being detected. November 10, to Thomas Smith—That he remembered something of the envelope going through the Portland office, but that it was torn open at the time and he thought contents abstracted. Here are six different statements about this package, made by the defendant, not casually or inadvertently to strangers or unconcerned persons, but with more or less deliberation to officers of the postoffice department and the owner of the stolen dust, all of which were, as a matter of fact, false, and involved three different and irreconcilable accounts of the matter. The certificate endorsed upon the agent's circular was a deliberate official act in writing, done upon the requirement of a superior officer and under the solemn sanction of an official oath. There never was any ground for the defendant's believing or saying that the package was robbed in the Blue Mountains. On the contrary, at the time he made his certificate on the circular and wrote to the postmaster at Sacramento, he had positive evidence before him, in the letters from postmasters on the eastern end of the route and their official certificates on the circular, that the package reached Umatilla on Friday, July 30—two days in advance of the mail that was robbed and near a hundred miles west of the place of the robbery. The defendant's efforts to put the agent and the Sacramento postmaster on this false scent, betrays a consciousness of something wrong, and a fear of the truth. The package did reach the Portland office on August 3, and of this there can be no doubt. So the defendant, acting apparently under the influence of the fact, first wrote in his certificate. Afterwards he altered the date to August 4, so as, apparently, to make it possible that the package might have been in the mail that was robbed. The certificate should have stated the truth known to the defendant that his official register contained no entry of the package. These contradictions and misstatements and attempts at misleading the officers and person intrusted are all badges of guilt. But this is not all of the defendant's statements about the package. On the former trial, J. H. Koontz, the postmaster at Umatilla, in August, 1868, testified that in October he had a conversation with defendant upon the subject of registered package envelope 28, when the defendant said, "He remembered about the package, but had no note of it in his office, and that he thought contents either dropped or taken out at The Dalles." True, this testimony was not given to the jury that found this verdict, because the witness was unable to attend this trial on account of sickness. But in a motion to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial, it is proper to consider all the testimony that appears to exist in the case.

Then we come to the interlineation and erasure concerning envelope 28 in the record of registered matter in transit, kept by the defendant. This was an entry after the fact, and therefore suspicious. It was not in the book when examined by the defendant and Brooks on August 29, although it should have been made for nearly a month previous. The defendant then said there was no entry in the register concerning the package, and Agent Brooks looking on, over defendant's shoulder, saw none. The entry must therefore have been made long after the package arrived at the office, and after the inquiry had been set on foot as to what had become of it and who had stolen it. The register is an official book and kept for the public and subject to public inspection. The defendant is bound only to make true entries therein and those to be made contemporaneous with the fact to which they relate. He has no right to destroy the book or erase entries once made in it. The falsification of records, either by interlineations or erasures, with a reference to a matter, in which the party making such falsification, is suspected or charged or liable to be suspected or charged with neglect or wrongdoing, is strong presumptive evidence of guilt. This interlineation was a change of the record—an afterthought, as an answer to the suspicions which the defendant must have seen, were pointing towards his office as the place of the theft of the package. The erasure was another afterthought, so as to make the record comport with the later explanations of the defendant—that the package had been torn open and lost its contents or been robbed of them east of Portland. Such a statement would be flatly contradicted by the entry that the package had arrived in good order. Therefore it was erased. This, of course, was in legal effect and office understanding an entry of arrival in good order—because the entry said nothing to the contrary. That this interlineation and erasure were made by the defendant the jury might fairly presume from the fact of his having the special custody of the book, and it being his special business to make the entries therein. But the fact that sufficient remains of the entry, to show that it was in the handwriting of the defendant, puts the matter beyond dispute. It being shown to a moral certainty that the envelope arrived at the defendant's office with the package of gold dust, and that the latter was abstracted from the envelope while there, the circumstances of the false and contradictory statements of the defendant concerning the package, and the interlineation and erasure of the entry relating to it, were sufficient to authorize the jury to conclude, that the defendant, either alone, or with the assistance of Fox, stole the dust.

As to the testimony of Mrs. Fox and Dr. Giltner, I have not taken it into account in the foregoing consideration. The jury within their power of judging of the credibility of a witness, and the true import of conversations which are based upon prior conversations, or occurrences known to both the witness and defendant, but only incidentally or imperfectly shown to them, might have fairly drawn some conclusions from the testimony of these witnesses, none of which would tend to show the defendant's innocence, but the contrary. For instance, the conversation between defendant and Mrs. Fox indicates that already some friends of the defendant had been trying to induce Fox to take upon himself the whole guilt of the crime, and thereby save the defendant harmless. In return, the defendant, by himself and friends, was to save Fox from actual punishment, either upon the plea that gold dust was not mailable matter, or by procuring him an immediate pardon. The interview between the defendant and Giltner points to the same conclusion. If the defendant was conscious of his own innocence and of Fox's guilt, the most natural and proper course for him to have pursued was to have complained of him, instead of furtively bargaining for Fox's testimony on his own behalf, upon the promise of procuring the former an immediate pardon—a promise which the defendant had neither the right to make nor the power to perform.

It is also proper to consider the fact that the robbery of the mail on August 2, was known to the defendant about the hour that envelope 28 came to his office. This may have suggested the feasibility of abstracting the contents of this envelope, and escaping detection by attributing the loss to the robbery. In pursuance of this plan, the envelope when relieved of its contents, would be detained over the next day, August 4, and started for Sacramento on August 5, so as to arrive at the latter place, in point of time, as if it had been in the mail that was robbed in the Blue Mountains. The accompanying "Return registered letter bill" would be detained also, so as to keep company with the registered envelope. This was easily done. There was no other envelope arrived at Portland in the mail of August 3, directed to Sacramento distributing postoffice, but No. 28. The return bill enclosed in a common envelope and similarly directed would necessarily be the one which related to envelope 28. This theory accords with the fact as to when the plundered envelope and return bill arrived at Sacramento. The usual time then occupied in making the trip between Portland and Sacramento was 5½ days. The schedule time was six. The envelope and letter bill reached Sacramento about one o'clock p. m. of August 10. If the envelope and letter bill had left Portland at six o'clock a. m. of August 4, then it would have been 6½ days on the way—more than the schedule time, and a full day more than the usual time. But supposing that they left in the mail of the morning of August 5, then the time consumed in the transit would be the usual time, at that season—5½ days. It being morally certain that envelope 28 and the return letter bill reached the Portland office, in good order, on the afternoon of August 3, and that they reached the Sacramento office, with the contents of the former abstracted, on the afternoon of August 10—after a period of 6½ days—it is a very reasonable conclusion, not only that the envelope was robbed in the Portland office, but that it and the letter bill were detained there for that purpose and on that account, from the morning of August 4 to that of August 5.

The letter of Fox to Put. Smith, to say the least of it, is evidence of more or less conference and confidence between the defendant and Fox on this subject. It would seem that they had a common interest in, or knowledge of the matter. The defendant seems to have been watching the action of the grand jury then in session engaged in the investigation of crimes, and the accusation of criminals. At this time, if defendant was wholly innocent, he must have been satisfied that some one in the office was guilty. He retained Fox in his employ—made no complaint against him—but communicated to him the private intelligence that the matter was to be taken before the grand jury, which the latter, in turn, hastened to communicate to the receiver of the dust, and ask his advice in the premises. This scrawl, read by the light of all the other facts in the case, indicates that Fox knew of this theft, and probably had been used as a tool to dispose of the stolen dust.

Besides all these, there are other circumstances which tend to support the hypothesis of the defendant's guilt. His detention of the circular letter for nearly a month, instead of answering the question propounded and sending it forward at once to Sacramento. He was not charged with the investigation of the matter, but was asked a question concerning his own office. If he knew nothing about the envelope, and there was no entry in the register concerning it, he should have certified so at once. Impliedly his certificate asserts that there was an entry concerning the envelope in his register, when there was not, unless it be the interlined and erased one. The letters which the defendant wrote to the postmasters, appear to have been written with a design to suggest that envelope 28 was in the mail robbery of August 2. The very fact that defendant stepped out of his sphere to write them at all, tends to show that he had some fear that if the investigation was left to the postal agent, it might not result as he, the defendant, desired it to do.

In the motion for a new trial, no objection is made to the ruling of the court refusing to allow Fox's statement out of court, to be given in evidence. But in the argument of the motion and everywhere else, we are met with the plea that Fox has confessed the theft, and the defendant is not guilty. The fallacy of this must be apparent to every one who will dispassionately consider the matter for a moment. If Fox's admissions could be given in evidence to prove the defendant's innocence, when Fox was placed on trial he might show that these admissions were false, and were made for the purpose of wrongfully procuring the acquittal of this defendant, or he might show that he was many miles from the place when the crime was committed, and therefore it was physically impossible for him to have committed it. Upon the trial of defendant, Fox's statements out of court are mere hearsay. Besides Fox might confess his guilt in pursuance of an agreement with the defendant's friends, for the purpose of procuring the acquittal of defendant, for a consideration, or when in fact they were both guilty. Fox was the best witness as to what he knew, and if the defendant wanted it to go to the jury, he should have called him as a witness. On the first trial this was done. Fox answered all the questions asked him by defendant except two, which he declined answering on the plea that the answers might criminate himself. These questions were—Whether any package of gold dust came down in the mail bags from The Dalles about August 1? and, Whether he had any gold dust transactions with Put. Smith? For aught that appeared, this might have been a mere pantomime, enacted before the jury, in pursuance of a previous agreement, for the purpose of leading their minds to the conclusion that Fox was guilty, and the defendant not. To prevent this, the court instructed the jury that the defendant was on trial and not Fox, and if Fox declined to answer a question, as he might, no inference was to be drawn from the refusal, either for or against the defendant. On the second trial the defendant called Cartwright, the district attorney, as a witness, who swore that since the first trial, he had promised Fox, that if he would tell all he knew about the theft, and he should be satisfied he told the truth, he would make him a government witness, and he should not be prosecuted. For this reason the defendant declined to call Fox as a witness on the second trial, and the prosecution being satisfied to submit the case to the jury without his testimony, he was not examined at all. But counsel for the defendant, while acknowledging the correctness of the general rule laid down by the court on the question of admitting Fox's outside statements to the jury, on Randall's trial, still indirectly complain that they were not permitted to do so; even when they declined to call him, and let the jury hear his account of the matter, given under the sanction of an oath, and in the presence of the defendant. Either Fox would tell the truth as a witness or not. If he would, then the failure of the defendant to call him, gives reasonable ground to presume that his testimony would tend to convict the defendant. If, however, the defendant had reason to believe that Fox could not be trusted to tell the truth on the witness stand, then certainly, and independent of the fact that they are mere hearsay, the defendant ought not to ask his admissions or statements made out of court without the sanction of an oath to be received in evidence—admissions made too in pursuance of a promise from the defendant and his friends, to save Fox from punishment if he should get convicted himself on account of them.

The second ground of the motion for a new trial—that the verdict was against law—was not argued by counsel and needs no particular consideration by the court. Indeed, I am not certain as to what question is intended to be raised by it. The charge to the jury was in the main oral, and time will not permit its being written out now. No exception was taken to it by either party, and I understood from defendant's counsel that the defence was well satisfied with it. The verdict is not against the law given the jury by the court, for under the charge the jury were at liberty to find the defendant guilty or not guilty, according as the facts and the proper inferences from those facts might in their judgment require.

The first error of law alleged to have occurred at the trial, was the refusal of the court to allow the defendant's peremptory challenge to Charles Sweigle, juror. According to the rules and practice of this court, established since 1864, by the adoption of section 155 of the Criminal Code (Or. Code, p. 467), the defendant was entitled to six peremptory challenges, and no more. Before challenging Sweigle, the defendant had challenged peremptorily six jurors, which challenges had been allowed. At common law, strictly speaking, a peremptory challenge to a juror was not allowed in any case. But in progress of time a practice grew up to allow them, in favor of life, in capital cases. Beyond this, peremptory challenges were not allowed at common law. In modern times, in most of the United States, the practice or law has gone to the other extreme, so that the number of peremptory challenges allowed a defendant enables him, in many cases, to form a jury that is morally certain to acquit or at least to disagree.

By section 30 of the act of April 30, 1790 (1 Stat. 117), peremptory challenges in United States courts are limited to treason and other capital cases. The laws of the states allowing peremptory challenges in other cases do not apply, unless made a rule of court. U. S. v. Cottingham [Case No. 14,872]. The case last referred to arose under section 21 of the act of March 3, 1825, substantially the same as this. A clerk in the Albany postoffice was indicted for opening a letter and stealing therefrom. The court, Mr. Justice Nelson presiding, held that the defendant was not entitled to any peremptory challenges under the laws of the United States, nor under the law of the state of New York, as the latter had not been adopted by the court. On March 3, 1868, an act was passed, "regulating proceedings in criminal cases and for other purposes" (13 Stat. 500). The second section of this act provides, that in capital cases the defendant shall have but twenty peremptory challenges, and the United States five; and, also, that "in a trial for any other offence in which the right of peremptory challenge now exists, the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to two peremptory challenges." Heretofore this court has always construed this statute as not extending the right of peremptory challenge to any case not capital, on the ground that the right could not be said to exist when it was not given by law, but merely depended upon a rule of court. If otherwise, then this act, instead of establishing an uniform rule upon this subject, which appears to have been the object of it, would allow peremptory challenges in this state, because there is already a rule of court allowing them here, and exclude them in New York, because there is not such a rule there. This provision of the statute is evidently founded upon a misapprehension of the subject, and is nugatory. The question is a technical one and the decision of it in no way affects the justice of the case.

The second error of law alleged to have occurred on the trial, was the refusal to admit in evidence a letter of October 1, 1868, written by J. H. Koontz, and addressed to the defendant. Koontz was postmaster at Umatilla in the early part of August, 1868, but his brother, J. A. Koontz, was his deputy and performed the duties of the office. J. H. Koontz wrote the letter sometime after he had ceased to be postmaster. He was a witness at the former trial, but absent at this on account of sickness. The letter was offered in evidence to show that the defendant, when he wrote to the Sacramento postmaster under date of October 9—had reason to believe that envelope 28 was in the mail that was robbed August 2—did have a reason so to believe at that time, even if it was a mistake. The right to introduce this letter to show that fact was rested on the ground that this Koontz letter was enclosed in the letter to the Sacramento postmaster, and therefore entitled to be read as a part of that admission of the defendant. The court ruled that the defendant might read to the jury any letter that was enclosed in the one to the Sacramento postmaster, because the prosecution having read that to the jury the defendant was entitled to read the other as a part of the same statement or admission. The court also ruled, that any letter which the defendant sent the Sacramento postmaster with his of October 9 as the ground of his belief therein mentioned, might be read to the jury to show how far the defendant was warranted or justified in expressing the opinion or making the statement to the Sacramento postmaster that he did, but that information or letters not mentioned or disclosed at the time of making a statement in regard to envelope 28, could not be read by the defendant to the jury.

Taking these rules as a guide in the premises, the court refused the Koontz letter to be read to the jury, because it did not appear from the testimony that it was enclosed in the defendant's of October 9, addressed to the postmaster at Sacramento. This is the only ruling made in the case that upon reflection I am not satisfied with. The difficulty was in the facts and not in the law, and grew out of the indistinctness of the testimony as to what letters reached Sacramento with the defendant's, or in it; and as to how the letters of the defendant's were returned to the Portland office and came into Brooks' box. Lewis remembered but two letters in the Sacramento postoffice with the defendant's, and this is not one of them, though he knew there were others; and it might have been placed in the open envelope in Brooks' box by the defendant, without having been to Sacramento at all. Yet I am inclined to think that it would have been safer to have inferred that it was one of the inclosures in the defendant's letter, from the fact that it was found in company with it in Brooks' box after the return of the latter from Sacramento. But if this were an error of judgment, I am satisfied that it worked no possible harm to the defendant. It will not be contended that this letter in any way bears directly upon the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence. It was only offered to qualify the effect of a circumstance from which, with others, the jury were asked to infer the defendant's guilt. In other words, it was offered to prove that the defendant had good reason or some reason to write the postmaster at Sacramento that he believed envelope 28 was in the mail robbery of August 2, and therefore we are not to infer, because the envelope was not in the robbery, that he was telling a willful falsehood for the purpose of putting the department on the wrong scent, and keeping the pursuit from himself.

But the letter from J. H. Koontz does not show that envelope 28 was in the robbery of August 2, nor furnish any reason or ground for the defendant thinking or saying so. Here is the letter: "Postoffice, Umatilla, Oregon, Oct. 1st, 1868.—To E. G. Randall, P. M., Portland. Dear Sir: At the request of the P. M., I write you in answer to yours of Sept. 21. Reg'd Pkg., envelope No. 28 came to this office on the 1st of August, being Saturday, and left in the mail on Monday at the same time that those four packages left that were broken open and robbed on the morning of the 2d of Aug. The mails that arrive at this office Saturday lay over till Monday, and in the meantime, on Sunday evening, another mail from east arrives, and both go down on Monday. I can't say certain that all went down in the same lock-sack, but such might have been the case, as we were sometimes compelled to put both mails together, in order to keep sufficient sacks to go on the two routes above, namely, Wallawalla and Boise City. So No. 28, mailed at Auburn July 28, left this office August 3." Now this letter says that envelope No. 28 reached Umatilla Saturday, August 1, and that the mail robbery took place on Sunday, August 2, in the Blue Mountains, near one hundred miles east of Umatilla. Can any one pretend that this is authority or even a decent excuse for the defendant's writing to the Sacramento postmaster that envelope 28 was in the mail that was robbed in the Blue Mountains of August 2? Certainly not. Besides, the defendant had made this statement to Brooks before he had any of these letters. Again, at the time the defendant wrote this letter to the postmaster at Sacramento, he had all the official statements of all the postmasters on the route before him, on the circular letter. These all concluded in stating that envelope 28 was two days ahead of the mail that was robbed, and that it left The Dalles for Portland in good order on the morning of August 3. This Koontz letter is a mistake in regard to envelope 28 not leaving Umatilla until August 3. It left on Saturday morning, August 1, and went to The Dalles by land. On the last trial, Koontz explained it in his testimony. The mail leaves Umatilla six times a week for The Dalles—Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays by water, and Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays by land. It comes up on opposite days. For instance, the land mail comes to Umatilla from The Dalles on Friday evening, and returns on Saturday morning, but not until the eastern stage comes in —which often comes in in the night. The mail is made up for The Dalles the next morning, and a letter that came in from La Grande on Friday evening, July 31, would be entered on the register as of Saturday, August 1, and go in The Dalles the same day. This was the fact in regard to envelope 28. J. H. Koontz was the postmaster, but his brother attended to the business, and when he wrote this letter, some time after he went out of office, he saw envelope 28 was registered on Saturday, August 1, and he inferred that it came on the evening of that day, and as there was no mail carried on Sunday, he rightly concluded from these premises, that it left for The Dalles on Monday, August 3, in same mail with robbed packages, but he was mistaken in his premises. But, be this as it may, the letter so far from countenancing the opinion that envelope 28 was in mail robbed in the Blue Mountains on August 2, shows directly the contrary—that the envelope was in Umatilla on August 1, from twelve to twenty-four hours ahead of that mail.

The motion for a new trial is overruled.

As to the motion in arrest of judgment, a statement of the statutes in regard to the matter and a few comments will dispose of it. Section 12 of the act of July 1, 1864 (13 Stat. 337), re-enacting section 21 of act of March 1, 1825 (4 Stat. 107), provides: "If any person employed in any department of the post-office establishment, etc., shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any letter, packet, etc., with which he or she shall be intrusted, or which shall have come into his or her possession and intended to be conveyed by post, etc., such letter, packet, etc., containing any note, bond, draft, check * * * or other article of value, etc., or if any such person, etc., shall steal or take any of the same out of any letter, packet, etc., such person shall, on conviction of any such offence, be imprisoned not less than ten years, not exceeding twenty-one years, etc." Tried by this definition, the act committed by the defendant was a crime. The defendant was a person employed in the postoffice. Envelope 28 came into his possession and was intended to be conveyed by post. It contained an article of value—12½ ounces of gold dust—and the defendant by the verdict of the jury is found to have taken the same out of such envelope or letter therein. Even if the statutes defining mailable matter do not include gold dust in the category, still the taking or stealing it from a letter in the mail by a person employed in the postoffice would be a flat violation of the section just read, and a crime. It does not follow that because an article is not enumerated as mailable matter that therefore it can be stolen from the mails by those interested with their conduct and transportation, with impunity, or in the pithy language of counsel for the United States, "because gold dust is not mailable, it does not follow that it is stealable." As argued by counsel for defendant, a postmaster might object to being responsible for articles not permitted to be carried in the mails, but no one should object that he is prohibited from stealing from the mails, whether the article be rightfully there or not.

Section 16 of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 704), provides: "No postmaster shall receive to be conveyed by the mail any packet or package which shall weigh more than four pounds, except books published and circulated by order of congress." The reasonable inference from this section is, that the mailability of matter depends upon its weight, and not its kind or quality. To the same effect is section 25 of the same act, which reads: "On all matter not enumerated as mailable matter and to which no specific rates of postage are assigned, and which shall nevertheless be mailed, the rate, if the same shall be forwarded, is established at the rate of letter postages." Section 456 of the postoffice regulations prescribes: "Money and other valuables, sent by mail are at the risk of the owner, but in case of loss the department will endeavor to discover the cause, and where there has been a theft, to punish the offender." These instructions being promulgated by the postmaster general, under authority of an act of congress, have the force of law. Section 32 of the act of March 3, 1863, authorized the postmaster general to establish a uniform plan for the registration of valuable letters. Under this system, envelope 28 was being carried, through the mails, when broken open.

In U. S. v. Marsellis [Case No. 15,724], on a special verdict, judgment of conviction was given against the defendant for taking two letters containing each a twenty-five cent piece in silver. The case was argued before Justices Nelson and Betts, and no question seemed to be made that it was not a crime to steal coin from the mails, because it was not mailable matter. This judgment was given in 1849, while the post-office act of 1845 [5 Stat. 748], which the defendant relies on, was in force. There is no statute of the United States which provides specifically that coin is mailable matter, any more than gold dust. Yet I apprehend that a packet of either of them, not weighing over four pounds and prepaid at letter postage rates, is mailable matter; and whether this be so or not, there can be no doubt but that it is a crime against the United States to take or steal either of them from the mails.

To conclude: after a long and careful examination of the case, I can find no sure ground upon which to question the legality or rightfulness of this verdict or to arrest or delay the judgment of conviction which the law declares shall be given against the defendant in consequence of it.

Sentence: Thereupon the district attorney moved for judgment, and the court asked the defendant if he had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon him. The defendant rose and said: "Your Honor:—I am innocent of this crime, as sure as there is a God in Heaven, and every one connected with the prosecution knows this full as well as I do. It is the most damnable piece of persecution that was ever perpetrated against a white man. I feel certain that time will reveal my innocence and bring the guilty to justice."

The court then pronounced sentence as follows: You have been indicted by the grand jury of the district, for the violation of an important trust—the commission of a grave and serious crime. After a fair trial, in which you have had the aid of able, experienced and devoted counsel, and the sympathy and prayers of many warm friends, you have been found guilty as charged, by an honest and intelligent jury of your country. By a motion for a new trial, argued ardently and at great length in your behalf, the court has been compelled to review the testimony upon which this verdict was given. After a careful examination and consideration of the facts and circumstances proven against you, the court is bound to approve of the verdict and pronounce upon you the sentence which the law has provided for those who violate it. I will not harrow your feelings nor prolong this painful duty by indulging in any reflections or suggestions upon your present unfortunate condition and future prospects. The occasion will suggest to you and those present, all that I could say, and more. The jury have recommended you to the mercy of the court, and your former good reputation is in proof. So far as the court knows or can see, this is your first crime. The amount stolen is comparatively small, and no one but the Omniscient can know or estimate the force of the temptation which in an evil hour for yourself and friends, caused you to stumble and fall. The law provides that in the discretion of the court you may be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for a period not less than ten nor more than twenty-one years. In consideration of the circumstances just enumerated—particularly the recommendation of the jury and your past good reputation, the court has concluded to fix your imprisonment at the term of twelve years; and does now sentence you to be imprisoned at hard labor for the term of twelve years from this time. And as the legislature of this state has not yet provided for the admission of United States convicts into the state penitentiary, it is ordered that this sentence be executed in the jail of Multnomah county, so far as the discipline of such prison will permit, until the further order of this court, or it is otherwise by law provided.

UNITED STATES v. RANDALL.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1853.

CUSTOMS LAWS—DUTY OF MASTER TO REPORT ARRIVAL—POWERS OF COLLECTORS.

1. By St. 1799, c. 22, § 36 [1 Stat. 655], the master of a vessel arriving from a foreign place, must repair to the office of the chief officer of the customs, and there make report to him.

2. The master is not in default, if there be no such office, or no person in attendance to receive the report.

3. An officer of the customs has no dispensing power, and cannot excuse any person for neglecting a statute duty.

4. But where that duty cannot be performed, by reason of the neglect of the officer to do that which is a prerequisite, the statute is not violated.

[Cited in U. S. v. Curtis, 16 Fed. 189.]

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

This was an information for a penalty under the United States act of 1799 (chapter 22) filed by the district attorney for Massachusetts, against the master of the brig Nitheroy, for not making a report of the arrival of his vessel to the deputy collector of the port of Holmes' Hole, in accordance with the 36th section of the above act.

G. Lunt, U. S. Dist. Atty.
N. Morse, for defendant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The 24th and 30th sections of the act under which the information is filed, seem to contemplate the boarding officer and the chief officer of the customs at the port at which the vessel arrives, as two different persons. Here those offices were united in the same person. That person went on board of the vessel upon her arrival, was informed by the captain of the place from which she came, and the time of her arrival, was informed, by the captain, of the place fest, and made a certificate on the original; and it appeared that for thirty years last past, not more than one master in thirty had made any other report of arrival. An officer of the customs has no dispensing power, and cannot excuse a party from duties required by statute; but here the government were to do certain things, by their officer, before the act required could be performed by the master. The master was to repair to the office of the chief officer of the customs, and make report to him. The designating a place as his office, by the chief officer of the customs, and the presence of some one authorized to receive the report, were necessary before the master was required to repair to the office and there make report. Whether any one could be authorized to receive such report, except the chief officer, need not now be considered. It was, by the statute, left to the officer to designate the place at which such report should be made; and whenever he does so, and is present at that place, and actually receives the report, the master cannot be required to make it at any other place. It is in the power of the officer to change the place of his office at pleasure, or he may discontinue his office either for a long or a short time, or on a particular occasion; and if he actually transacts the business of receiving the report at any place within his district, it must be considered that such place has been adopted by him, and that he has discontinued or changed any other office which he may previously have had; so that he either has no office to which the master can then repair and make the report, or that his office, for that purpose, is at the place where he actually transacts the business by personally receiving the report. And especially must this be so, when that is the place where the officer has been in the practice of transacting this business for at least thirty years. That this would be true, if the two offices were held by different persons, and the deputy collector should make it his invariable practice to go on board of every vessel, and there receive the report of her arrival, can hardly be doubted, whether he went at the same time with the inspector, or not. Nor does it make any difference that the deputy collector and inspector are united in the same person, and the business of both offices is transacted at the same time, viz., the receiving the report of the arrival, and the copy of the manifest and certifying the original. A penalty is claimed for not doing a vain and nugatory act. This claim the court will not sustain, unless compelled to do so by language in the statute, so clear, when applied to the subject-matter and the circumstances of the case, as to admit of no other fair and reasonable construction. The report which was actually made, accomplished all the purposes of the law, and a further report, merely of her arrival, would have been utterly useless. There was no violation of the statute, and no penalty incurred.

UNITED STATES v. RANDOLPH.

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. May Term, 1853.

STATUTES — TITLE OF LAWS — OFFENSES AGAINST NATURALIZATION LAWS—FORGERY OF CERTIFICATE.

1. The title of an act of congress, when at variance with its provisions, deserves no consideration, though it may sometimes serve to explain a doubtful meaning of part of it.

2. Defendant was indicted under the thirteenth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1813 [2 Stat. 811], for forging, etc., a certificate of naturalization. Held, that the penalties provided in that section applied to that indictment, and that the district court had jurisdiction.

IRWIN, District Judge. The defendant was indicted in the district court, at May term last, "for wilfully and feloniously passing and uttering on the 11th of October, 1852, as true and genuine, a false, forged and counterfeit certificate of citizenship, purporting to be issued pursuant to the laws of the United States, and attesting that a certain John Gray had been admitted to become a citizen of the United States, he at the same time being an alien and a subject of the queen of Great Britain and Ireland." At the same term the court was moved to quash the indictment for the following reasons: (1) Because the district or circuit courts of the United States have no jurisdiction of the offence charged in said indictment. (2) No offence of the nature and character as alleged in said indictment is created by any act of congress. (3) Because said indictment charges the said alleged offence to be a felony. These points being new, and involving important matters, were removed to the circuit court for its opinion.

The offence charged is supposed to be embraced by the thirteenth section of the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1813, entitled "An act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States." That section is in the following words: "Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, that if any person shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, any certificate or evidence of citizenship referred to in this act; or shall pass, utter, or use as true, any false, forged or counterfeited certificate of citizenship, or shall make sale or dispose of any certificate of citizenship to any person other than the person for whom it was originally issued, and to whom it may of right belong, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony; and on being thereof convicted by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labor for a period of not less than three, nor more than five years, or be fined in a sum not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, at the discretion of the court taking cognizance thereof."

From its having been intimated that the decision of this case will determine many other prosecutions of a similar nature with that now pending, the court has given the points certified full consideration. It has rarely happened in acts of congress, that subjects have been introduced of a nature widely different from that expressed in the title and it is conceded that if the several sections of an act can be reconciled with each other, and with the single purpose of legislation, as indicated in the title, that it would be wrong to infer that congress intended to embrace more than that purpose, although it may contain words susceptible of a different construction.

Before and during the last war with Great Britain, the impressment of seamen from American vessels, was a constant topic of discussion and controversy, which congress prospectively deemed it expedient to prevent, by passing the act of the 3d of March, 1813, which, with certain exceptions, makes it unlawful, after the war, to employ on board the public and private vessels of the United States, any persons except their own citizens, native or naturalized, and not the latter unless they should produce to the commander of the vessel, or the collector of the customs, a certified copy of the act by which he shall have been naturalized, the naturalization, and the time thereof.

The indictment, it is supposed, cannot be sustained by the thirteenth section of the act, for that, by looking to its general scope, subject-matter, and title, it must refer to seamen situated as the first eleven sections refer to, and to no other persons, and that although the words, "If any person shall falsely make, forge," etc., might be broad enough to include others than seamen, if standing unconnected with the particular subject of legislation, yet if connected with that subject, they should be so construed as to harmonize with it, without enlarging their meaning beyond the obvious provision of the act, and that to effect this object nothing more is necessary than to introduce the word "such" after the word "any," at the beginning of the section, and that the word "such" was probably accidentally omitted in framing the act.

If this were the only difficulty, the argument, if not conclusive, would be entitled to great weight; but it is proper to give effect to all the material words of one section of a statute, if they can be reconciled with or have an obvious reference to the words or enactment of another section, and whenever this can consistently be done, we are not at liberty to presume that congress intended to qualify or restrain the only meaning which the words employed naturally and grammatically import. Following this rule, and connecting the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the act, it will be apparent that the words in the thirteenth section, "If any person shall make, forge," etc., are intended to be general in their operations, and not confined to seamen employed in the public and private vessels of the United States.

The twelfth section provides: "Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no person who shall arrive in the United States, from and after the time when this act shall take effect, shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, who shall not for the continued term of five years next preceding his admission as aforesaid have resided within the United States, without being at any time during the said five years, out of the territory of the United States."

The act of 1813 is the only one purporting to be general in its features, which requires a continued residence of five years, preceding admission to citizenship, a provision, it may be assumed, introduced as the best evidence of bona fide expatriation, and probably not admitting, by construction, a temporary absence, during the five years, out of the territory of the United States, which construction would include all persons besides seamen, who left the territory upon business for a temporary period. But to show that any temporary absence for any purpose, during the five years, would disqualify from naturalization, the twelfth section further provides that the alien must have resided in the United States, "without being at any time during the said five years, out of the territory of the United States." It is not improbable that, to get rid of the injury and inconvenience which a general application of the words in italics might produce, a disposition was felt and perhaps judicially sanctioned, to limit the act of 1813 to seamen alone, and if so, and the intention of congress had not thereby been misinterpreted, there would not have been any necessity for any further legislation on the subject. But to show that such could not have been the intention of congress, the act of the 26th of June, 1848, was passed, by which the words in italics were repealed, so that, after that time, there could be no foundation for an opinion, that the twelfth section embraced only a particular class of persons. Connecting it, then, with the thirteenth section, we cannot avoid the conclusion that the penalties presented in the latter apply to the indictment before us, and that the district court of the United States has jurisdiction of the offence charged.

The title of an act of congress, when at variance with its provisions, deserves no consideration, though it may sometimes serve to explain a doubtful meaning of part of it. In this case the body of the act shows that its title is singularly narrow, and that, besides being intended for the "regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States," it introduced important enactments, in addition to the pre-existing naturalization laws, and that these additions are its main features, restricted, indeed, in all its sections, except the twelfth and thirteenth, to seamen; but as regards them making provisions far beyond mere "regulations." The excepted sections, as the court have construed them, are consistent with the object and provision of the rest, and in accordance with what may fairly be presumed to be the intention of congress by the repealing act of 1848, from which it may be inferred that the words "continued residence," do not, as it would be most unreasonable they should, deny the privilege of naturalization to one who, after his application to be admitted a citizen, should find it necessary to go beyond the limits of the United States before the time prescribed for naturalization.

It is ordered that this opinion be certified to the district court.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—JURY TRIAL IN CIVIL CASES—WAIVER OF RIGHT—EFFECT OF STATE LAWS.

5. The reference act of New York is not at variance with the constitution of that state.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

[This was an action by the United States against William P. Rathbone.]

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The general question presented by the record sent up from the district court is, whether that court had authority to order the cause to be referred to referees. It has been urged, however, on the part of the defendants in error, that this general question does not necessarily arise in this case, for that by the record it appears that the reference was by consent of parties, and not the act of the court. If such be the fair construction of this record, the judgment ought not certainly to be reversed. For, admitting the court had no authority to order the cause referred, yet there can be no doubt this could be done by the consent of parties. It is not a question of jurisdiction, but simply whether the parties will waive the right of trial by jury, and resort to that of trial by referees. The right of trial by jury, secured by the constitution of the United States, is for the benefit of the parties litigating in courts of justice, and is a privilege they may dispense with if they choose. This is a proposition too clear to require any argument or authority in support of it; but if any was wanted, it is found in the case of Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 235.

The first inquiry then is, whether it is fairly to be inferred from the record, that the reference was by consent of parties. If we look at the rule of court by which the reference was ordered, and which comes up as a part of the record in the court below, it will be seen that the cause was referred on the application of the defendants, and upon notice given to the opposite party of the intended motion; which clearly shows a hostile proceeding, and is at war with any presumed consent. But if this rule is not to be taken as a part of the record, technically considered, still it appears to me that the record proper does not show such consent on the part of the plaintiffs below as to preclude them from taking the exception here. Whenever a party is concluded by his own act, and held to have waived any right or privilege, such act should not be left doubtful, but should plainly and explicitly appear. Every reasonable presumption should be made against the waiver, especially when it relates to a right or privilege deemed so valuable as to be secured by the constitution. The record, so far as it relates to the reference, states that, "it now appearing probable to the court here that the trial of the matters aforesaid, between the parties aforesaid, will require the examination of a long account, it is therefore ordered by the same court, now here, that the matters aforesaid, in controversy between the parties aforesaid, be and the same are referred, according to the statute in such case made and provided, to J. G. S., &c., referees agreed upon and named by the parties aforesaid, to hear and examine the matters aforesaid, and report," &c. The statute here referred to in the record must be the statute of the state, for there is no act of congress on the subject; and it is reasonable to conclude, from this form of record, that the state practice under that statute has been pursued throughout; and the record shows no more than that the parties agreed upon the referees. The appointment of referees was necessarily, in order of time, an act posterior to the order to refer, and does not imply an assent to such order. The record states that order to have been the act of the court, founded upon the fact that it appeared probable that the trial of the matters in controversy would require the examination of long accounts, and not upon the agreement or consent of parties.

The examination of long accounts is the ground upon which a reference is authorized, under the state law; and it was evidently this law and the state practice under it by which the district court was governed. That law could not, however, control the rights of parties in the courts of the United States, and take away privileges secured by the constitution and laws of the United States. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs in error are not precluded by any consent they have given to the order of reference, from raising that objection here; and the question is open for consideration, whether the district court had authority to order the reference against the consent of either party. The convenience and utility of adopting this mode of trial by referees, where the controversy involves the examination of long accounts, have led me to look at the question with a wish to find the practice sanctioned by the constitution and laws of the United States, but have not been able to find any ground upon which such authority can be sustained. The constitution (Amend. art. 7) declares that, in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.[2] And the judiciary act of 1789 (2 Bior. & D. Laws, 60 [1 Stat. 73]) provides for the trial of issues of fact in all the courts of the United States, in conformity with this provision. The ninth section declares that the trial of issues of fact in the district courts, in all causes except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be by jury. The twelfth section contains the like provision for trials in the circuit courts: "The trial of issues in fact in the circuit courts, shall, in all suits, except those of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, be by jury." And the thirteenth section declares that the trial of issues in fact in the supreme court, in all actions at law against citizens of the United States, shall be by jury.

These provisions are too plain to be mistaken, and too positive to be disregarded. If the power to order a cause referred to referees in any case whatever, is possessed by the courts of the United States, where is the limitation of that power to be found? There is no act of congress on the subject, even admitting the constitution not to stand in the way of such a law. There is no law restricting this power to cases involving the examination of long accounts; and if the power exists at all, it may be exercised in every case, and the trial by jury abolished by the courts. The thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act, which declares, "that the laws of the several states, except where the con-

[2] The provisions in the constitution of the United States, that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law; that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation; and that in suits at law, where the amount in controversy exceeds $20, the trial by jury shall be preserved, are restrictive only upon the general government and its officers. Livingston v. Mayor, etc. of New York, 8 Wend. 85. The trial by jury, secured by the constitution of this state, applies only to cases of trials or issues of fact in civil and criminal proceedings in courts of justice, and has no relation to assessments of damages of the owners of property taken for streets or other public use. The mode of ascertaining such damages belonging to the legislature, they may direct the assessment by a jury, or by commissioners. Id. The words, "by the law of the land," and "by due course and process of law," contained in the constitution, import a suit, trial and judgment, according to the course of the common law. Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140. The constitution of this state (article 7, § 2) relating to the right of a trial by jury, &c., has no reference to proceedings intended merely to prevent the commission of offences. Duffy v. People, 1 Hill, 355. A statute authorizing a magistrate, summarily and without jury, to convict one who has abandoned his family, of being a disorderly person, and to require from him sureties for good behavior, is not unconstitutional. Id.

stitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply," has no application whatever to this case, so as to require the adoption of the state law on the subject. [Wayman v. Southard] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 24; Serg. Const. Law, 149, 150, and cases there cited. And that law, at all events, falls within the excepted cases; the constitution and laws of the United States having provided for trial of issues in fact by jury, instead of by referees. How far this view of the case may affect the validity of the state law is a point not drawn in question, or intended to be considered. Although the constitution of the state of New York secures the trial by jury (article 41), it is a modified provision not at variance with the reference act; it declares, "that trial by jury, in all cases in which it hath heretofore been used in the colony of New York, shall be established, and remain inviolate forever." And references were authorized under the colonial laws as early as the year 1768. See 2 R. L. 516, note, and Id. (U. S. Ed.) 517.[3]

In whatever light this case is considered, I can find no ground upon which the order of the district court, referring the cause to referees for trial, can be sustained. The judgment must, accordingly, be reversed, and a venire de novo issued returnable in this court.

[3] The right to refer is not unconstitutional. The provision in the constitution of the United States relates to such courts only as sit under the authority of the United States. As to the provision in the constitution of the state, requiring that "the trial by jury, in all cases in which it has been heretofore used, shall remain inviolate forever," the answer is, that references were sanctioned by statute, and practiced by the courts, long before the adoption of the constitution. Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 337. At all events, it is too late to object on the ground of unconstitutionality, when the parties have mutually consented to the reference in writing. Id. A reference can be had only in cases of accounts existing between the parties; actions of tort are not referable: Silmser v. Redfield, 19 Wend. 21. Where an action of tort is referred, and a report obtained, the plaintiff cannot enter a rule for judgment thereon, unless expressly authorized by the rule of reference; nor will the court, in an action of tort, review the doings of the referees. Id. If the trial requires the examination of a long account between the parties, although the action be covenant, it seems a reference would be ordered. Thomas v. Reab, 6 Wend. 503. In cross actions and cross applications for a reference, a joint reference will be made, and the referees authorized to hold their meetings so as to accommodate the parties. Hart v. Trotter, 4 Wend. 198. In an action upon a policy of insurance, if the defendants admit their liability for the loss, and the controversy relates only to items of injury, and the amount of loss sustained by the assured, the court will refer the matter to referees to adjust the amount. Samble v. Mechanics' Fire Ins. Co., 1 Hall, 560. In mixed questions of law and fact, where long accounts are involved, it is the practice of the court to hear the cause until the questions of law are disposed of, and then refer the accounts to referees. UNITED STATES v. RAVARA.

[2 Dall. 297;[1] 1 Whart. St. Tr. 90.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1793.

JURISDICTION OF SUPREME AND CIRCUIT COURTS—CRIMES BY FOREIGN CONSULS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

[The provision of the constitution which vests in the supreme court "original jurisdiction" in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, does not make that jurisdiction exclusive; and therefore, by the provision of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 73), which vests in the circuit courts jurisdiction of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, the latter courts have jurisdiction to try an indictment against a foreign consul for offences committed in this country. Iredell, Circuit Justice, dissenting.]

[Cited in Gittings v. Crawford, Case No. 5,465; U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge, Id. 15,867; Texas v. Lewis, 14 Fed. 67.]

The defendant, a consul from Genoa, was indicted for a misdemeanor, in sending anonymous and threatening letters to Mr. Hammond, the British minister, Mr. Holland, a citizen of Philadelphia, and several other persons, with a view to extort money.

Before the defendant pleaded, his counsel (Heatly, Lewis & Dallas) moved to quash the indictment, contending that to the supreme court of the United States, belonged the exclusive cognizance of the case, on account of the defendant's official character. By the second section of the third article of the constitution, it is expressly declared, that "in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction." By declaring in the sequel of the same section "that in all the other cases before mentioned the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction," the word original is rendered tantamount to exclusive, in the specified cases. But surely an original jurisdiction established by the constitution in the supreme court, cannot be exclusively vested by law in any inferior courts. The thirteenth section of the judicial act provides, that "the supreme court shall have exclusively all such jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors, or other public ministers, or their domestics, or domestic servants, as a court of law can have or exercise consistently with the law of nations; and original, but not exclusive, jurisdiction of all suits brought by ambassadors, or other public ministers, or in which a consul, or vice consul shall be a party." This provision obviously respects civil suits; but the eleventh section declares, that "the circuit court shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where this act otherwise provides, or the laws of the United States shall otherwise direct, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offences cognizable therein." This is a criminal prosecution, not otherwise provided for; and if the jurisdiction can be exclusively vested in the circuit court, it destroys the original jurisdiction given by the constitution to the supreme court. In justice to the legislature, therefore, such a construction must be rejected; and the cognizance of the case be left, upon a constitutional footing, exclusively to the supreme court. The argument is the more cogent from a consideration of the respect which is due to consuls, by the law of nations. Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 2, c. 2, § 34.

Mr. Rawle, U. S. Dist. Atty., stated in reply, that there was a material distinction between public ministers, and consuls; the former being entitled to high diplomatic privileges, which the latter, by the law of nations, had no right to claim; and he contended, that the supreme court has original, but not exclusive, jurisdiction of offences committed by consuls; that the district court had jurisdiction (exclusively of the state courts) of all offences committed by consuls, except where the punishment to be inflicted exceeded thirty stripes, a fine of one hundred dollars, or the term of five months imprisonment; and that the circuit court had, in this respect, a concurrent jurisdiction with the supreme court as well as the district court. If indeed this is a crime "cognizable under the authority of the United States," it is within the express delegation of jurisdiction to the circuit court.

Before WILSON, and IREDELL, Circuit Justices, and PETERS, District Judge.

WILSON, Circuit Justice. I am of opinion, that although the constitution vests in the supreme court an original jurisdiction, in cases like the present, it does not preclude the legislature from exercising the power of vesting a concurrent jurisdiction, in such inferior courts, as might by law be established. And as the legislature has expressly declared, that the circuit court shall have "exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offences, cognizable under the authority of the United States," I think the indictment ought to be sustained.

IREDELL, Circuit Justice. I do not concur in this opinion, because it appears to me, that for obvious reasons of public policy, the constitution intended to vest an exclusive jurisdiction in the supreme court, upon all questions relating to the public agents of foreign nations. Besides, the context of the judiciary article of the constitution seems fairly to justify the interpretation, that the word "original," means "exclusive," jurisdiction.

PETERS, District Judge. As I agree in the opinion expressed by Judge WILSON, for the reasons which he has assigned, it is unnecessary to enter into any detail.

The motion for quashing the indictment was accordingly rejected, and the defendant pleaded not guilty; but his trial was postponed, by consent, till the next term.

[2 Dall. 299, note.] [1]

INTERNATIONAL LAW — OFFENCES BY CONSULS — THREATENING LETTERS—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS.

[A foreign consul, notwithstanding his official character, is indictable in this country, and triable in the federal courts, for the common-law offence of sending anonymous and threatening letters with intent to extort money.]

[This was an indictment against the consul from Genoa, for a misdemeanor in sending anonymous and threatening letters to various persons named, with a view to extort money. A motion to quash the indictment was heretofore overruled. Case No. 16,122.

[The defendant was defended on the following points:] (1) That the matter charged in the indictment was not a crime by the common law, nor is it made such by any positive law of the United States. In England it was once treason; it is now felony; but in both instances it was the effect of positive law. It can only, therefore, be considered as a bare menace of bodily hurt; and, without a consequent inconvenience, it is no injury public or private. 4 Bl. Comm. 5; 8 Hen. VI. c. 6; 9 Geo. I. c. 22; 4 Bl. Comm. 144; 3 Bl. Comm. 120. (2) That considering the official character of the defendant, such a proceeding ought not to be sustained, nor such a punishment inflicted. The law of nations is a part of the law of the United States; and the law of nations seems to require, that a consul should be independent of the ordinary criminal justice of the place where he resides. Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 2, c. 2, § 34. (3) But that, exclusive of the legal exceptions, the prosecution had not been maintained in point of evidence; for, it was all circumstantial and presumptive, and that too, in so slight a degree, as ought not to weigh with a jury on so important an issue. 2 Hale, P. C. 289; 4 Smol. Hist. Eng. p. 382, in note.

Mr. Rawle, in reply, insisted that the offence was indictable at common law; that the consular character of the defendant gave jurisdiction to the circuit court, and did not entitle him to an exemption from prosecution agreeably to the law of nations; and that the proof was as strong as the nature of the case allowed, or the rules of evidence required.

In support of his argument he cited the following authorities: 4 Bl. Comm. 142, 144; 1 Lev. 146; 1 Keb. 809; 4 Bl. Comm. 180; Strange, 193; 4 Bl. Comm. 242; Crown Cir. Before JAY, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

THE COURT were of opinion in the charge, that the offence was indictable, and that the defendant was not privileged from prosecution in virtue of his consular appointment. The jury, after a short consultation, pronounced the defendant guilty; but he was afterwards pardoned, on condition (as I have heard) that he surrendered his commission and exequatur.

UNITED STATES v. RAY.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1817.

CORPORATIONS—POWER TO ISSUE NOTES.

1. The Independent Manufacturing Company of Baltimore might authorize their president and treasurer to issue promissory notes, having the form of bank-notes, in bona fide payment for materials furnished, and services rendered for the use of the company, if done without fraudulent intention.

2. But they had no right to pass them away for the purpose of putting them into circulation as a current circulating medium, and not in payment for materials, &c., for the use of the company in the ordinary course of their business as a manufacturing company, and, if so issued and passed by the defendant as a circulating medium, with intent to defraud or injure any person, he is guilty of an indictable offence.

This cause was, by consent, tried upon the presentment, which was in these words: "District of Columbia, Washington County Court, June Term, 1817. The grand jury for the body of the county aforesaid, on their oaths present Andrew Ray, of Baltimore, styling himself president of 'The Independent Manufacturing Company of Baltimore,' for fraudulently passing and attempting to pass certain promissory notes in the form and appearance of bank-notes, stating them to be payable to —— or bearer, by 'The Independent Manufacturing Company of Baltimore,' said Ray knowing such notes to be spurious and void; the funds and property of the said company not being bound to redeem or pay the same, they not being under the seal of the said company as required by their charter, on the information of John Peter, mayor of Georgetown, on or about the 29th of May last. John Ott, Foreman."

Mr. Law, for defendant, moved the court to instruct the jury, that the facts proved did not amount to any crime or offence.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, contended that the corporation had no power to issue such notes; that they could only contract under their corporate seal; or that if they can issue promissory notes, it can only be for the purchase of materials, &c., in the regular course of their business as manufacturers.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) instructed the jury, that if they should be of opinion, from the evidence in this cause, that the traverser gave the notes in the presentment mentioned, in bona fide payment for materials, or articles purchased by him as the agent and for the use of the manufacturing company in the presentment mentioned, or for services bona fide rendered for the use of the said company, or in payment of his expenses as agent of the said company; and that he was, by a vote of the directors of the said company, instructed to use the said notes in that manner: and that the said notes were signed by him as president, and by Edward Gillespie, treasurer of the said company, by an order of the said board of directors, and that he was appointed by the said company as their agent to make such purchases or payments; and that he as agent as aforesaid, in making such payment, had no intention to defraud any person, then he was guilty of no offence in so uttering or passing, or paying away the said notes. But if the jury should be of opinion, from the evidence in this cause, that the traverser passed away the said notes for the purpose of putting them into circulation, as a current circulating medium, and not in payment for goods, materials, services, or expenses for the use of the said company, in the ordinary course of their business as a manufacturing company, with a view to defraud or injure any person, then he was guilty of such an offence as would support an indictment.

Verdict, "Not guilty."

CRIMINAL LAW—BREAKING STOREHOUSE—LARCENY.

Upon an indictment for feloniously breaking the storehouse of Cook & Clare, and taking therefrom goods of the value of more than four dollars, contrary to the act of Virginia of the 26th of December, 1792 (section 2), which takes away the benefit of clergy, the jury may find the prisoner guilty of simple larceny.

Indictment [against William Read] for feloniously breaking the storehouse of Cook & Clare, and taking therefrom goods of the value of more than four dollars. The jury having inquired whether they might find the prisoner guilty of simple larceny upon this indictment,

The jury accordingly found the defendant guilty of stealing the goods, but not of breaking the storehouse.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 18.] [2]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1853.[3]

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—CONFIRMATION.

When the conditions of a grant have been performed cy prés, though no approval has been given by the departmental assembly, the claim is entitled to confirmation.

[Claim by Pearson B. Reading for the Rancho Buenaventura, embracing a tract of six square leagues. Confirmed by the board of land commissioners, and appealed by the United States.]

S. W. Inge, U. S. Dist. Atty.
V. E. Howard, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. Two objections to the confirmation of this claim are urged by the district attorney: (1) That the claimant had no capacity to take, being a foreigner. (2) That the conditions of the grant have not been substantially complied with.

First. The grant itself recites that the claimant was a naturalized Mexican citizen, at the time it issued, and it is shown that letters of naturalization were, in fact, issued to him. No fraud in obtaining them is pretended to have been committed by the claimant. Whether or not he was strictly entitled to receive them by Mexican law, is immaterial, for that question having been passed upon by Mexican authority, and the claimant in fact naturalized, it cannot now be contended that he was not, at the time of receiving his grant, a naturalized Mexican citizen. It is proper to observe that the proofs on this point were only furnished after the district attorney had taken his objection.

Second. With respect to the performance of the conditions, the proof shows that in August, 1845, less than one year after the date of the grant, the claimant went on the land, took possession, and selected a site for his house, which he left his servant to build. It was completed within a year, and inhabited until the person in charge was driven out by hostile Indians and the house burnt. A crop of wheat was raised on the land in 1845, and another in 1846; the latter was burnt with the house.

During the year 1845, Major Reading appears to have been called into service by General Sutter, in consequence of the political disturbances which then agitated the country. In 1846, he joined the Americans under Fremont, and continued in active service during the greater part of the year. In 1848, he returned to his rancho and has ever since resided on and cultivated it.

Under these circumstances, we look in vain for evidence of a willful abandonment of his grant, or even a neglect to perform substantially its conditions. The object of the Mexican government in making grants undoubtedly was to secure the cultivation and settlement of their vacant lands, and that object was attained in this case. Even if the conditions of the grant be construed to require the personal residence of the grantee on the land, the excuses shown by him for his omission to do so, are such as should in equity be received. In the year 1845 he was unexpectedly called upon to perform public duties which he had no right to decline; and the reasons for his neglect in 1846, are certainly such as should receive the favorable consideration of this government. Had no effort been made by the claimant to comply with the conditions of his grant, or had his only excuse been the existence of obstacles which equally existed and were known to him when he undertook their performance, the ruling of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. De Villemont [13 How. (54 U. S.) 261], and other cases, would have compelled me to reject this claim. But under the facts as proved the case seems clearly within the principles laid down in Sibbald's Case, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 313. I think, therefore, that the partial performance of the conditions of this case within the time limited, and the excuses offered for the absence of full performance, are sufficient, under all the circumstances, to raise an equity in favor of the claimant, which entitles him to a confirmation.

UNITED STATES v. REAGAN.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. 1872.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS — LIQUOR DEALERS — KEEPING BOOKS.

1. A retail dealer in liquors who also purchases and sells malt liquors in quantities of more than five gallons at the same time is not required to keep the book provided for in Act July 20, 1868, c. 186, § 45 (15 Stat. 143).

2. The book is to be kept only by wholesale dealers in domestic spirits, and a person does not become such a dealer by taking out a wholesale license for selling ale, though he also sells domestic spirits at retail.

[This was an action at law against Robert Reagan to recover the penalty of $100, for alleged failure to keep the book required, in the case of a wholesale liquor dealer, by the internal revenue laws.]

E. P. Nettleton, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

H. D. Hyde, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. By section 1 of the act of April 10, 1869, c. 18 (16 Stat. 42), "every person who sells or offers for sale foreign or domestic distilled spirits, wine or malt liquors, in quantities of not less than five gallons at the same time, shall be regarded as a wholesale liquor dealer." By section 45 of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 143), every wholesale liquor dealer must keep a book in a form to be prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, and make entry therein of all spirits received and sent out by him, with dates, names of buyers and sellers, gauge, proof, and many other particulars. This action is brought to recover the penalty of one hundred dollars for a neglect to keep the book; and it is agreed that the defendant had a wholesale dealer's license, but sold only ale in the quantity of five gallons or more, and sold domestic spirits by retail. The character of the required entries makes it plain that only wholesale dealers in domestic spirits are referred to in this section, and not those who buy and sell only ale, wine, and foreign spirits, nor those who deal by retail even in domestic spirits.

This defendant is not a dealer in domestic spirits by wholesale, and is, therefore, not within the section. It being admitted as it must be and always has been, that neither a wholesale dealer in ale nor a retail dealer in spirits is bound to keep the book, this case is ended, because there is nothing in the statute to impose any greater obligation in this respect on a person who carries on both trades than on two persons each of whom carries on one of them. This suit was brought to test the question, because some officers believed that the law was otherwise. But there is no ground for this opinion. The statute refers only to wholesale dealers in domestic spirits and to the entries of their business as such. The defendant is called a wholesale dealer, but the fact is that he deals by wholesale in malt liquors only. One suggestion is that he might enter his purchases as if he were a wholesale dealer, and then discharge himself by entering the same spirits as sold to himself. No doubt he might do so, but the law does not require it. He does not buy of himself, nor buy in one capacity and sell in another, nor become a wholesale dealer within section 45, by dealing largely in ale. The suggestion amounts to this—that he ought to keep half a book, though it is plain that he cannot keep a whole one, because all the sales of a retail dealer cannot possibly be entered on the book, and are not expected to be entered. There is no warrant of law for the suggestion. The simple fact is that for the purposes of assessment for special taxes, all persons are called wholesale dealers who sell either of several different articles in quantities of five gallons or more, but it is only those who deal in that way in spirits who are to keep the book; it is a mere verbal juggle to confound the two. The argument is, that because they are all called wholesale dealers in section 1 of the act of 1869, they must all be within section 45 of the act of 1868, though the terms of that section show with entire clearness that the definition is different.

It is said that the defendant has a right, under his license, to sell spirits as well as ale by wholesale. This is true, but until he does so he is not bound to the obligations of that situation. Judgment for the defendant.

UNITED STATES v. The RECORDER.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. July 2, 1847.

NAVIGATION LAWS — IMPORTATIONS OF COLONIAL PRODUCTS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

1. The construction of the navigation act of March 1, 1817 (3 Stat. 351), is no longer an open one to the United States. The contemporaneous construction of the act, corroborated by an undeviating usage of thirty years, must now govern.

[Cited in Barney v. Leeds, 51 N. H. 266. Cited in brief in Burritt v. Commissioners of State Contracts, 120 Ill. 322, 11 N. E. 181.]

2. Therefore, as the United States have never, since the act of 1817, questioned importations of colonial products made in vessels of the mother country from her home ports, and as the secretary of the treasury, within six months after the passage of the act, instructed the collectors of the customs that the act allowed such importations, which instructions remained unaltered for twenty-five years, held, that the United States cannot now insist that the act does not allow the importation from London into New-York, in a vessel owned by British subjects residing in England, of goods, the growth, production or manufacture of the British East Indies.

3. If it were doubtful whether the trade in question was allowable under the act, or even if the intention of the act to the contrary were manifest, the contemporaneous exposition by the government, followed the concurrent practical construction, ought to govern.

4. But that construction was a correct one, and the act does not compel the productions or manufactures of the dependencies of Great Britain out of Europe, to be imported in vessels belonging to the place of production or manufacture.

5. The word "country" in the first section of the act, means the entire nation, and not merely a section or portion of territory belonging to the nation.

6. The act has in view foreign governments and nations, and their vessels, and not the localities within which the individual owners reside.

7. Nor does the act exact a direct trade from the port of production or of usual shipment, when the importation is in a vessel belonging to the country in which the goods are produced.

8. It does not appear that Great Britain prohibits the importation in vessels of the United States, of the productions of our territories or dependencies, shipped from a port of the United States to which they had been transported from the place of production.

9. Nor does it appear that vessels of the United States are prohibited by the British government from importing into this country from England, goods, wares or merchandise, the growth, production or manufacture of her East India dependencies.

This was a libel of information, which charged that the ship Recorder, not being a vessel of the United States, nor a foreign vessel truly and wholly belonging to the citizens or subjects of the British East Indies, on the 22d of May, 1847, imported from London into New York, various goods described, being the growth, production or manufacture of the British East Indies, from which place they had usually, since March, 1817, been shipped for transportation; by reason whereof, and by virtue of the act of congress of the 1st of March, 1817, the said ship, her tackle, &c., and the said cargo, became and were forfeited to the United States, and prayed process and a decree of condemnation, &c.

The claimants, averring themselves to be natural born subjects of the queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and resident in England, within the United Kingdom, pleaded specially to the libel, that the said ship, at the time, truly and wholly belonged to them, and still did; that the British East Indies were, at the time, provinces of, and part and parcel of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of her majesty's dominions; and that the said goods were the growth, production and manufacture of the dominions of her majesty, and were received by them on board said ship, at the port of London, for transhipment to the port of New York; and averred their right to make such importation. The United States demurred to the special pleas, and the claimants joined in demurrer.

Benjamin F. Butler, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Francis B. Cutting, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. The question raised by the issue of law is, whether the trade in which this ship was employed, is inhibited by the act of congress "concerning the navigation of the United States," passed March 1, 1817 (3 Stat. 351).

The first section of the act provides "that after the thirtieth day of September next, no goods, wares, or merchandize, shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture; or from which such goods, wares, or merchandize can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation: Provided, nevertheless, that this regulation shall not extend to the vessel of any foreign nation which has not adopted, and which shall not adopt a similar regulation." The second section declares that the vessel and cargo coming into the United States in violation of those provisions, shall be forfeited.

It is not stated in the pleadings, nor was it admitted by the claimants on the argument, that Great Britain has adopted regulations similar to those established by this act; and the claimants, therefore, in strictness of law, may be entitled to the objection that the construction insisted on by the government does not bring the vessel and cargo within the condemnation of the statute. We think, however, that if the navigation laws of Great Britain, notoriously restraining the trade in American vessels with her colonies, within limits more strict than the regulations of this statute, are not to be judicially noticed by the court, the provisions of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, of the 3d of July, 1815, must be regarded as part of the law of the case; and, in that convention, Great Britain reserves to herself, and adopts, by implication, regulations similar in this respect to those established by the act of congress in question. 8 Stat. 228.

It is admitted by the pleadings, that goods, wares, and merchandize, the growth, production or manufacture of the British East Indies, have, since the passage of the act of congress, been usually shipped for transportation from the ports of the East Indies. The district attorney, on the part of the government, accordingly contended, that the course of trade attempted in this instance, is prohibited to British vessels, first, by the direct language of the act of congress, and secondly, by its intent and policy, as gathered from antecedent and contemporaneous facts leading to its enactment.

We think, upon general principles of law, that the question as to the construction and bearing of the act of congress, in this respect, is no longer an open one to the government. In September, 1817, on transmitting the act to the officers of customs throughout the United States, the secretary of the treasury instructed them that "the term 'country,' in the first section, is considered as embracing all the possessions of a foreign state, however widely separated, which are subjected to the same executive and legislative authority. The productions and manufactures of a foreign state, and of its colonies, may be imported into the United States, in vessels owned by the citizens or subjects of such state, without regard to their place of residence within its possessions."

This exposition of the act does not appear to have been called in question or doubted by the United States until the 30th of June, 1842, when an opinion was given by the attorney general as to its meaning and operation, which, on the 6th of July, 1842, was transmitted by the secretary of the treasury to the collectors of the customs. The secretary, in his circular, instructs the collectors to be governed thereafter by the opinion of the attorney general, and "to take care that the penalties of the law are enforced in all cases coming under its provisions." The seizure in the present case is made in execution of those instructions. The attorney general intimates that the language of the first section of the act is not entirely free from ambiguity, but declares his opinion to be, "that it does not in any case authorize an indirect carrying trade by foreign ships." He says: "The proviso was intended to restrain the privilege extended to foreign vessels in the enacting clause. By this they are allowed, where they belong wholly to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth or manufacture, to bring these goods into our ports. By the proviso, this is confined to cases where a reciprocal privilege of the same kind is extended to our vessels." This interpretation of the act is entitled to the highest respect, and if we regarded it as removing or meeting the difficulties raised on this issue, we should give it the most careful consideration. We should probably feel considerable hesitancy in accepting, as the true key to the interpretation of the act, the idea put forth in the opinion, that the enacting clause extended a privilege to foreign vessels, and that the proviso confined it to cases where a reciprocal privilege of the same kind was extended to our vessels. It rather appears to us, that the natural reading of the act gives it a retaliatory and prohibitive character, restrained by the proviso from being enforced against any nation not having adopted like prohibitions or restrictions against the United States. But we forbear an examination of this point, because the case submitted to the attorney general had none of the features marking this. That was the case of a Belgian vessel which imported into the United States a cargo from Buenos Ayres, the product of the latter country; and the question to be decided was whether such indirect trade was open to her in articles of foreign growth or production. The attorney general was of opinion, that the act of the 1st of March, 1817, did not authorize it. The case would have been apposite, if the Belgian ship had been laden, at her home port in Europe, with productions of a Belgian colony or territory in the East or West Indies or in Africa, and if the United States were debarred from importing the same goods, except directly from the place of their production. There is no evidence before us that the treasury department, or the officers of the customs, have, since the act of 1817, arrested or questioned importations of colonial products, made in vessels of the mother country, from her home ports; and we must regard the contemporary exposition of the act given by the secretary of the treasury as the one acquiesced in and put in practice by the government from that period, except in the instance above referred to; and there is no evidence before us, that the attorney general's interpretation has ever been enforced in a case similar to this.

We hold the government, if not all other parties, to be now precluded, by that long usage and practical construction of the law, from questioning its correctness and disturbing the course of its execution. Admitting that, on the face of the act, it is doubtful whether the trade now attempted to be prosecuted can be allowed; or even conceding that the intention of the statute to the contrary is manifest, and that the treasury department misapprehended and misinterpreted its provisions, in the instructions of September, 1817, we think the settled rules of law, and the principles governing the interpretation of human language, with whatever solemnity and to whatsoever purpose it is employed, require us to adopt and adhere to the contemporaneous construction, corroborated by an undeviating usage of thirty years, as that which must be applied to the statute and govern the case. We deem it unnecessary to state arguments or to analyze cases supporting this proposition. The principle is recognized and illustrated by the highest legal authorities. Dwar. St. 693; Bac. Abr. "Statute," I, 5; 3 Pick. 517. The supreme court of the United States has given the most solemn sanction to the doctrine, in declaring that a contemporary exposition of the constitution, practised and acquiesced in for a period of years, fixes its construction (Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 299), and, in pronouncing the practical construction of a statute, to be the one which must be enforced, although clearly unauthorized by the terms of the law itself (McKeen v. Delancy's Lessee, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 22). In the first case, the period of acquiescence had been comparatively of short duration—about twelve years. The supreme court of Massachusetts, in a case most maturely considered, held that "a contemporaneous, is generally the best construction of a statute. It gives the sense of a community, of the terms made use of by the legislature. If there is ambiguity in the language, the understanding and application of it, when the statute first comes into operation, sanctioned by long acquiescence on the part of the legislature and judicial tribunals, is the strongest evidence that it has been rightly explained in practice. A construction under such circumstances becomes established law." Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 144; Rogers v. Goodwin, 2 Mass. 477.

The navigation law, adopted by congress in 1817, would be one eminently calculated to attract the notice of the business community. It provided for cases of deep public moment; and most especially has it tended to meet in some degree the embarrassment which our trade suffered from the navigation laws of Great Britain, and from her commercial regulations affecting intercourse with her colonies. These had been topics of agitating interest in the negotiations between the two countries preceding the war of 1812, and in those leading to the termination of that war and the adjustment of new relations of peace. The Fourteenth congress, which came into power with the close of the war, must have been strongly imbued with the common tone of feeling, and familiar with the state of those commercial regulations as enforced by Great Britain and with their effect upon the interests of the United States. The president, in his message to congress on the 3d of December, 1816, adverted in strong language to the state of trade with the British colonies out of Europe, its partial and injurious bearing on our navigation, and the refusal of that government to negotiate on the subject. The merchants of New-York and Portland memorialized congress on the subject, urging that importations of goods, &c., into the United States, should be prohibited, "except in vessels of the United States, or in vessels built by, and actually belonging to the citizens or subjects of the nation in which such articles have been produced or manufactured, &c." 11 Niles' Register (2d Sess.) 273; 14th Cong. Doc. No. 81.

It is not supposable, that in this aroused state of public opinion, the exposition placed by the secretary of the treasury on the act of March, 1817, could escape the notice of the executive and legislative branches of the government, and of the community at large; and that construction, therefore, under those circumstances, stands augmented with presumptions supporting its justness, stronger in force than even the lapse of thirty years' acquiescence. It is not to be credited that the president, congress, and the whole body of merchants, would permit an interpretation of the statute, which failed to carry out the spirit and meaning of its enactment, to govern our trade and revenues and it is difficult to put a case where contemporaneous construction could, with more confidence and justness, be relied upon as the expression of the true meaning of a law.

We feel, therefore, that we could, with great propriety, rest the decision of this case upon the application of that principle, as recognized and enforced in the authorities referred to, and supported by the special circumstances surrounding this law. But in a case presenting a question of grave import to our own mercantile interests, and also to the relations between the United States and Great Britain, we have considered it proper to examine with attention the statute itself, aided by the arguments of the respective counsel, and shall proceed to assign briefly the reasons leading us to the conclusion that the construction heretofore adopted is correct and should still be adhered to.

It seems to be maintained on the part of the United States, that the act should be understood to restrain the importation by British vessels, to articles, the production or manufacture of her European possessions, and to compel the productions and manufactures of her dependencies out of Europe, to be brought here in vessels belonging to the place of production or manufacture. This construction is founded upon the assumed import of the term "country," employed in the act, in connection with the supposed policy of the statute to establish a condition of reciprocity in respect to the navigation and trade of the country, where that was not already regulated by the convention of July 3, 1815.

It may be admitted that the term "country," used in the act, in its primary meaning, signifies place, and, in a larger sense, the territory or dominions occupied by a community, or even waste and unpeopled sections or regions of the earth; but its metaphorical meaning is no less definite and well understood, and, in common parlance, in historical and geographical writings, in diplomacy, legislation, treaties, and international codes, not to refer to sacred writ, the word "country" is employed to denote the population, the nation, the state, the government, having possession and dominion over the country. Thus Vattel says: "The term country seems to be well understood by everybody. However, as it is taken in different senses, it may not be unuseful to give it here an exact definition. It commonly signifies the state of which one is a member." "In a more confined sense, this term signifies the state, or even more particularly the town or place of our birth." Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 1, c. 9, § 122. "When a nation takes possession of a distant country and settles a colony there, that country, though separated from the principal establishment or mother country, naturally becomes a part of the state, equally with its ancient possessions. Whenever, therefore, the political laws or treaties make no distinction between them, every thing said of the territory of a nation ought also to extend to its colonies." Id. bk. 1, c. 18, § 210. The whole of a country possessed by a nation and subject to its laws, forms it territories; and it is the common country of all the individuals of the nation. Id. bk. 1, c. 19, § 211.

It is very apparent, upon the provisions of the act of 1817, that congress understood and used the term "country" in the enlarged sense given by Vattel. Thus "nation," in the proviso to section 1, "foreign prince or state" in section 3, and "foreign power" in section 4, all represent, in their connection, the same idea as "country" in the first section. The special designation of "citizens or subjects," does not mark with more precision that the law had reference to political powers and agencies, than does the mere word "country,"—the thing containing, being, by a familiar form of speech, used for that which it contains; and besides, persons could, with no propriety of language, be styled "citizens or subjects of a country," without understanding "country" to mean the state or nation, and not merely a section or portion of territory belonging to the nation. So, in the preamble to the convention of 1815, "countries," "territories" and "people," are used by the two governments as having one import; and, in the first article, "territories" is employed as the correlative of "inhabitants." Other instances are frequent in our statutes and treaties and diplomatic correspondence, in which foreign countries and territories are referred to as the people, state or nation, occupying and governing them.

But, in the present case, it seems to us that the phraseology of the first section of the act, indicates, more distinctly even than the use of the ordinary word "country," that the regulation had a view to foreign governments and nations, and their vessels, and not to the localities within which the individual owners might reside or where the vessels might be employed. The expression of the law is: "In such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production or manufacture." It has been shown that, by the well known principles of public law, colonies are parts of the dominion and country of the parent state, and the inhabitants are her subjects and citizens. It follows, as a necessary consequence of that relationship, that there can be no citizens or subjects of the colonies, as distinct and separate from the mother country, and that they can possess no shipping, which, in its character, ownership or employment, will be foreign to other nations, in any sense other than as belonging to their common country. By the English law none but vessels wholly owned by British subjects resident within the British dominions, can be registered. Holt, Shipp. c. 2, §§ 3, 5; Wilk. Shipp. 240, 248. Congress thus most manifestly had reference to the nationality of vessels in the designation of them as "foreign," because the vessels must truly and wholly belong to citizens and subjects,—terms necessarily importing a state or government to which such owners appertain. This consideration, furthermore, supports the interpretation placed by the court upon the word "country," for the term is introduced into this law in connection with expressions demonstrating that the shipping interest and products of foreign states were in contemplation, and not merely of the parts or places where the products were grown or the ship owners resided.

The "Act to Regulate Trade in Plaster of Paris," passed March 3, 1817 (3 Stat. 361), strongly imports that the navigation act of the 1st of March, was intended to have application to the foreign state, and not to any of its particular members or parts, and is a significant exposition of its scope and purpose, as viewed by congress. The two enactments were of a kindred character in their subject matter, and the later one, if not both of them, was in effect aimed at the restrictions of the British navigation laws. There were circumstances in the regulation of the Nova Scotia plaster trade, particularly offensive to this country, and congress, two days after enacting the law in question, passed a special act providing: "That no plaster of Paris, the production of any country, or its dependencies, from which the vessels of the United States are not permitted to bring the same article, shall be imported into the United States in any foreign vessel." [3 Stat. 61.] It is to be remarked upon this statute, that it was wholly supererogatory, if the construction now claimed on the part of the United States for that of the 1st of March, is correct; because the interdiction of the prior law, being universal, would necessarily include this particular description of importation in foreign vessels, it being denied in return to vessels of the United States. A strong presumption is thus afforded that congress did not intend, by the act of the 1st of March, to exact and enforce a reciprocity of privileges with foreign vessels, in the trade to and from foreign countries, in the sense of giving our vessels the right to bring foreign products from any port of a foreign country, from which the vessels of that country might import them. It denotes, moreover, that congress considered it necessary to designate dependencies as places of production, when it was intended to discriminate them from the mother country; and also impressively shows, that congress understood the antecedent act as authorizing the importation of plaster of Paris in foreign vessels, from countries and their dependencies from which the vessels of the United States were not permitted to bring the same article. That such was the understanding and aim of congress is more distinctly manifested by the act passed the succeeding session, and which will be adverted to hereafter.

The grievance under which our navigation labored was, clearly, not the carrying trade of the East India colonies of Great Britain, nor the direct trade between them and the United States. Those subjects were embraced in the then recent convention of 1815, and we had given and accepted stipulations regulating both. We yielded to Great Britain the exclusive right, as to us, to carry on the coasting and foreign trade to and from those dependencies, expressly agreeing that the vessels of the United States should not carry any article from the ports to which they were admitted, to any port or place except to some port or place in the United States where it should be unladen. Convention of July 3, 1815, article 3. In the message of the president to congress, and the memorials of merchants, before cited, no reference was made to British regulations of the East India trade, as injurious to us or objectionable. Nor was it suggested that the carrying trade of Great Britain from her colonies was cause of complaint on our part, further than that it indirectly aggravated the injury of our exclusion from the direct trade. But what Mr. Madison and the merchants pointed to as oppressive to our navigation, was its total exclusion from a direct trade with the colonies. The president said: "The British government enforcing now, regulations which prohibit a trade between its colonies and the United States in American vessels, whilst they permit a trade in British vessels, the American navigation suffers accordingly; and the loss is augmented by the advantage which is given to the British competition over the American, in the navigation between our ports and the ports in Europe, by the circuitous voyage enjoyed by the one and not enjoyed by the other." Message, Dec. 3, 1816. This wrong, of course, was committed in respect to other dependencies of Great Britain than the East Indies; for, the second section of the retaliatory act of April 18, 1818 (3 Stat. 432), specially passed to countervail the English colonial navigation laws (14 Niles' Reg. 111), saves all the provisions of the convention of July 3, 1815.

Congress, in the first measure adopted, seems to have stopped at the point of restriction to which our trade had been subjected by foreign powers, and to have intended the law to be applicable to all nations with whom we had commercial intercourse. They in substance adopted the English navigation act of 12 Car. II. c. 18. Reeves, Shipp. pt. 1, p. 107; 1 Chit. Commer. Law, c. 6. It was notorious that the operation of the act of March 1, 1817, under its proviso, would in effect be limited to British navigation. That this act was not designed to meet the mischiefs suffered by our trade under the regulations of the British colonial policy, is, therefore, indicated plainly by the subsequent act of March 3, 1817, and appears to us to be demonstrated by the provisions of the act of April 18, 1818, before referred to, and the two acts supplementary and in addition thereto, passed May 15, 1820, and May 6, 1822 (3 Stat. 602, 681). These statutes, containing the most rigorous inhibitions on the introduction, directly or indirectly, of the productions of British colonies into the United States, in British vessels, when not allowed to be imported in return with equal privileges in vessels of the United States, are plainly limited to the British West India and North American dependencies. Rep. of Comm., 11 Niles' Reg. 111. We think these various enactments, made under the suggestion of the executive, at the instance of our shipping merchants, accompanied by earnest diplomatic efforts and expostulations, in respect to the trade with the English dependencies in North America and the West Indies, conclusively support the meaning originally applied to the act of March 1, 1817, and which we adopt,—that it does not render illegal the trade attempted in this instance.

We perceive nothing in the provisions of the second clause of the first section of the act of March 1, 1817, bearing upon this question. The information avers that the productions of the East Indies have usually been first shipped for transportation from the ports of the East Indies, and the plea in substance admits the fact. Yet, as already indicated, the act, in our judgment, does not exact a direct trade from the port of production or usual shipment, when the importation is in a vessel belonging to the country in which the goods are produced. It places no limitation of place upon her right to bring the productions of her own country. If a foreign ship were to engage in such carrying trade, the act might probably require that her voyages should be from a home port, which should also be the country from which such goods, wares or merchandize can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation. But we do not undertake to define the effect or application of this clause, further than to say, that it does not restrain the exportation, in vessels owned by citizens or subjects of the country, to the port of production or usual shipment in that country.

We are also led to observe upon the proviso, that it does not appear from the pleadings, or any regulations of trade made by Great Britain which we have examined, that she prohibits the importation, in vessels of the United States, of the productions of our territories or dependencies, shipped from a port of the United States to which they had been transported from the place of production. Nor does it appear that vessels of the United States are prohibited by the British government, from importing into this country from England, goods, wares or merchandize, the growth, production or manufacture of her East India dependencies. As already intimated, therefore, there is ground for doubt, whether, upon the construction of the act assumed on the part of the government, a case is made showing any violation of its provisions by the importation in question.

Without adverting to many other topics of argument, opened by the case and discussed by counsel, the defence made by the special pleas is, in our judgment, a bar to the action; and the demurrers taken on the part of the United States must be overruled, and the vessel and her cargo be discharged from arrest and delivered up to the claimants.

[July 3, 1847. It being considered by the court, that the matter specially pleaded by the claimants to the libel and information filed in this cause, amounts in law to a bar thereof, and to the prosecution aforesaid for the matters in the said libel specified,—it is ordered by the court, that judgment be rendered for the claimants, upon the demurrer interposed on the part of the plaintiff to the plea aforesaid. It is further ordered by the court, that the said ship, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the cargo in the pleadings specified, be discharged from arrest in this cause, and be delivered up to the claimants therein.] [2]

[Subsequently the collector of the port of New York made an application for a certificate of reasonable cause of seizure. The court decided that he was entitled to the certificate, although there had been laches in making application for the same. Case No. 16,130.]

UNITED STATES v. The RECORDER.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 23, 1849.

NAVIGATION LAWS—SEIZURES BY COLLECTOR—CERTIFICATE OF PROBABLE CAUSE—COSTS.

1. Where a vessel was seized by a collector for an alleged violation of the navigation laws of the United States, but was discharged from arrest by this court on a hearing of the libel filed against her, on the ground that the statute had not been violated, and the collector afterwards applied to the court, under section 1 of the act of February 24th, 1807 (2 Stat. 422), for a certificate of reasonable cause for the seizure, and it appeared that the vessel was seized upon a construction of the statute adopted by the secretary of the treasury, in conformity with the opinion of the attorney-general, and that the collector acted under the instructions of the former officer in making the seizure: Held, that the certificate must be granted.

2. It makes no difference whether the collector acted under a mistake as to facts on which he had reason to rely, or as to the law.

3. A reasonable ground of suspicion is reasonable cause for a seizure.

[Cited in Averill v. Smith, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 93; Stacey v. Emery, 97 U. S. 646.]

4. Where the application for the certificate was not made until more than two years and four months after the decision of the cause, and until after the claimant had brought suit against the collector for the seizure: Held that, although the lapse of time was not a bar to the application, yet, as there had been laches in not making it until after the claimant had brought such suit and incurred consequent expenses, those costs must be paid him.

This was an application on the part of the collector of the port of New-York, for a certificate of reasonable cause of seizure. The application was made in pursuance of the provisions of the 1st section of the act of February 24th, 1807 (2 Stat. 422). The vessel had been seized by the collector as forfeited to the United States under the act of March 1st, 1817 (3 Stat. 351), for an alleged violation of that act, and a libel filed praying her condemnation. On demurrer to special pleas, the vessel was ordered to be discharged from arrest and delivered up to the claimants. [Case No. 16,129.] This application was not made until more than two years and four months after the decision of the cause, and until after the claimants had brought suit against the collector for the seizure.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. The omission to apply for this certificate on the decision of the cause, or for the period which has since elapsed, is not set up as a bar to the application; and the motion must stand, as to its merits, on the same footing as if it had been made at the earliest appropriate opportunity.

The seizure of the vessel was made upon a construction of the act of March 1st, 1817, adopted by the secretary of the treasury, in conformity with the opinion of the attorney-general. This court decided, on the hearing of the cause, that there had been no violation of the statute, and discharged the vessel from arrest. The case turned upon the construction of the statute, and of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, of July 30th, 1815 (8 Stat. 228), and presented points of considerable intricacy and difficulty. The official opinion of the law officer of the government to the head of a department, and the instructions of that department to the collector, afforded to that officer a fair reason for believing that the law had been infringed, and will, in a moral point of view certainly, excuse his having obeyed those instructions in seizing the vessel.

It makes no difference whether the collector acted under a mistake as to facts on which he had reason to rely, or as to the law. This has been explicitly settled by the supreme court. U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 311. The court say: "A doubt as to the true construction of the law is as reasonable a cause for seizure as a doubt respecting the fact." A reasonable ground of suspicion, less than evidence which would justify a condemnation, is probable cause for a seizure. Munns v. Dupont [Case No. 9,926]; Locke v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 339; The George [Case No. 5,328].

We think that the collector is entitled to a certificate of probable cause. But, as there has been laches in not applying for it until after suit has been brought by the claimants and expenses have consequently been incurred by them, we shall direct that those costs be paid them.

Case No. 16,131.

UNITED STATES v. RECTIFYING ESTABLISHMENT.

District Court, N. D. Mississippi. 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE—SPECIAL TAX—INFORMATION OF FORFEITURE.

1. In omission to pay taxes imposed by the revenue laws, intention to so omit or to defraud the United States, forms no part of the offence. The offence is constituted if it be averred and proved: 1st, that the business was carried on, and 2d, that the special tax was not paid.

2. To constitute a violation of section 44, Act July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 143], it need only be proved that the business was carried on without payment of the special tax therein imposed. To a count alleging these facts, it is not a sufficient demurrer that it is not averred that said special tax was assessed, or that payment was demanded and refused, or neglected to be paid.

[This was an information of forfeiture against a rectifying establishment, and the fixtures, apparatus, and liquors found therein, which are claimed by S. Sloss & Co. On demurrer to the information.]

E. Hill, U. S. Atty.

Messrs. Inge, Beene, Reynolds, Boon, and others, for claimants.

HILL, District Judge. The questions now presented arise upon the demurrer of claimants to the information filed by the district attorney, on behalf of the United States.

The first and second counts, consisting entirely of recitations of the different provisions of the act approved July 20, 1868, imposing a tax on distilled spirits, tobacco, and for other purposes, need not be noticed.

The third count charges that said claimants were carrying on the business of rectifying spirituous liquors in their establishment seized, under the firm name and style of S. Sloss & Co., and were in November, 1868, furnished with the books required by the act of July, 1868, and that they knowingly and wilfully neglected and omitted to make the entries therein, as required by said act in section 45 thereof, and that thereby the property seized became forfeited to the United States. The causes of demurrer stated to this count are: 1. That no forfeiture is imposed by this section of said act. 2. That there is no time stated when the liquors were received, or sent out, for which the entries were omitted to be made. 3. That it is not stated from whom the liquors were received or to whom sent. It is admitted by the district attorney that section 45 does not make the forfeiture of the property a part of the penalty, but it is claimed that the omission stated does work a forfeiture under the 96th section of the act; but by reference to the provisions of that section, I am satisfied such is not the case. That section by its terms was intended only to embrace such portions of the act as required something to be done or forbid the doing of something, when the act done or omitted to be done was knowingly and wilfully done or omitted, and for the doing or omitting to do which no specific penalty was imposed by any other provision of the act. For the neglecting or omitting to make the entries required by section 45, the penalty is fixed by the section itself to be a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than three years. Such being the case, the 96th section has no application to this offence, and this cause of demurrer is well taken; but the second and third causes are not well taken. It is not necessary to aver the time the liquors were received or sent out, or from whom received, or to whom sent; if the claimants made the proper entries, as they should have done, they have the proof to meet any charges of omission that may be attempted to be established by the proof; but for the first cause the demurrer to this count must be sustained.

The fourth count need not be noticed, it being only a recitation of the provisions of the 44th section of the act, the violation of which is averred in the fifth count.

The fifth count avers that said rectifying establishment was run and carried on by said S. Sloss & Co., from the 1st day of May, 1869, until the 1st day of July, 1869, without having paid the special tax imposed by the act approved July 20, 1868. The causes of demurrer to this count are: 1. That said count does not aver an intent to defraud the United States out of said tax. 2. That it is not averred what particular tax was neglected to be paid. 3. That said count is too vague, general, and uncertain to require an answer. 4. That it is not averred that said special tax was assessed, or that payment was demanded and refused, or neglected to be paid. By reference to section 44, I am satisfied that three distinct offences are created. The second and third refer only to distillers, and need not be noticed here; the first is that any person who shall carry on the business of a distiller, rectifier, compounder of liquors, wholesale liquor dealer, retail liquor dealer, or manufacturer of stills, without having paid the special taxes required by law, shall for every such offence be fined not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years; and further, that all distilled spirits or wines, and all stills or other apparatus, fit or intended to be used for the distillation or rectification of spirits or for the compounding of liquors owned by such person, wherever found, and all distilled spirits or wines and personal property found in the distillery or rectifying establishment, or in the store or other place of business of the compounder, or in any room, building, yard, or enclosure connected therewith, and used with or constituting a part of the premises, and all the right, title, or interest of such person in the lot or tract of land in which said distillery is situated, etc., shall be forfeited to the United States. The forfeiture of the real estate is confined to distillers, but not so as to the spirits and apparatus for distillation, rectification or compounding of liquors found on the premises owned by the person carrying on either of the kinds of business enumerated. It has been earnestly urged by claimants' counsel, there is no violation of this section, unless there was an intention to defraud the United States out of the tax or some part of it; but this position is untenable. Some offences are by omission, others by commission; ordinarily the former is without intention, and most usually the latter is by intention. When intention constitutes the whole or in part the offence, it must be alleged and proved; but to constitute the offence charged in this count but two things are necessary to be averred and proved: First, the carrying on the business; and secondly, that the special tax was not paid as required by law. The second cause presents no greater difficulty; the special tax imposed by the act referred to is found in the 59th section, which is, for every 200 barrels or less, the sum of $100.50 on each barrel in excess of 200 barrels. To the third cause it may be said that there is no uncertainty or vagueness of which claimants can complain. The fourth cause presents a question of more difficulty. Although the ruling of one of my brother judges at first view would indicate that to create a violation of this section an assessment and neglect to pay the tax on demand are necessary, yet when that opinion is closely examined its principle will not apply to this case. That was in the case of a distiller who had given his bond, which had been accepted and approved, and secured the payment of the tax; and with all due respect for the learning and ability of the judge who decided the case, I must say his reasoning, even in the case stated, is far from convincing to my mind. It was with him, as he states, a question of first impression; he admits that the giving of the bond was a prerequisite to commencing business. I can see no distinction between giving of the bond and the payment of the special tax. Every man engaged in the business for which this tax is imposed is presumed to know the law, and that whether he rectifies much or little he must pay a special tax of one hundred dollars, and how much more depends upon quantity rectified, of which he is required to make his monthly reports, so that he himself knows at the end of each month what is due if anything. His books, if the proper entries are made, show exactly what is due; and if he commences without the payment of the one hundred dollars, or continues after the additional tax has become due, and without its payment, he renders himself liable to the penalties imposed. In considering these questions presented in this and similar cases, I have not turned a deaf ear to the earnest and zealous appeals made by the numerous and able counsel to the clemency of the court, to give the most liberal construction in favor of the manufacturers and dealers in spirituous liquors, and for the reason that a strict construction would not only ruin claimants and those engaged in the business, but would retard this kind of manufacture in the state. I regret exceedingly to witness the ruin of individuals, but all good men must regret still more to see the laws violated with impunity, and the tax-payers of the state and nation required to pay additional taxes for the purpose of making up for those who derive all the profits that others do, and neglect to pay their part to defray the expenses of the government which gives them the same protection. Without intending to be severe, I must say that the man engaged in making or handling an article, the use of which only tends to destroy the constitution and lives of his fellow men, would receive but little sympathy on the ground that if required to desist, it would be his financial ruin; and with all due respect for the many honorable men engaged in the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors, it is apparent that the use of a very large proportion of the liquors made and used in this country not only ruins the consumer, but destroys the peace, happiness, and prosperity of all with whom he is connected. But little can be truthfully urged in behalf of the manufacture of the article in this state, at least when the grain that goes to make the liquor can be so much better applied to feed the hungry. Those who see proper for the sake of the money, and no other object can be perceived, to engage in these pursuits, take upon themselves all the risks of a violation of the law; and if no penalties are imposed except those plainly provided in the law, they ought not to complain at its enforcement. The demurrer to the count is not well taken, and is therefore overruled.

The sixth count in substance, states that said claimants under the firm name of S. Sloss & Co., carried on said business as compounders of liquors, and also as wholesale dealers in liquors, without having paid the special tax therefor. The ground of demurrer stated is, that it charges two distinct offences, and that the pleading is therefore double. The averment that they carried on the business as compounders of liquors is simply surplusage. The act approved April 10, 1869 [16 Stat. 41], provides that all compounders of liquors shall be taken and held as rectifiers. The time charged in which the violation is alleged to have been committed was subsequent to the approval of the act; consequently that offence could not then have been committed, but that averment is regarded as surplusage. The count is good, as charging the parties with having carried on the business as wholesale dealers in liquors, without having paid the special tax therefor. The result, therefore, is that the demurrer to this count is not well taken and must be overruled.

The district attorney, if he desires it, may amend the sixth count by striking out so much of it as applies to the compounding of liquors. As before stated, the first, second, and fourth counts charge no offence, and require no answer, and may be regarded as surplusage, and can only become important as a question of costs, in the event that judgment should be rendered against the claimants for costs.

STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS—CONFLICTS OF JURISDICTION—CRIMINAL IN CUSTODY.

[When a person is in custody under the state authority, this court has no power to take the accused from such custody; nor has a state court power to remove, by a habeas corpus, a defendant from the custody of a court of the United States.]

[Cited in brief in Ex parte Holman, 28 Iowa, 94.]

The defendants [Nelson Rector and Smith A. Ellis] are charged, in this court, of counterfeiting the coin of the United States. They are now in jail, on a criminal charge under the process of the state court; and a motion is made in behalf of persons who were bail for their appearance at this term, for a habeas corpus to bring the defendants before this court, and from the custody of the state.

THE COURT said, where a person is in custody under the state authority, this court has no power to take the accused from such custody; nor has a state court power to remove by a habeas corpus a defendant from the custody of a court of the United States. A habeas corpus should be applied for to the state court with the view of bringing the defendants, by the order of that court, before this court, to answer the charges against them here; after which they can be remanded to the state court. Or, if the defendants shall be first tried in the state court, this court can direct a capias to the marshal to arrest them, so soon as they shall be discharged from their present imprisonment. Under the circumstances, no step will be taken against the bail in this court. After the release of the defendants from state custody, the bail here will be liable for their appearance. Their recognizance will be continued.

CUTTING TIMBER ON PUBLIC LANDS—INDICTMENT.

1. Under the act of congress, it is not necessary to describe in an indictment for trespass on the public lands, every kind of timber that was cut.

2. It is sufficient to name one or more species, and in the words of the statute allege other timbers.

3. An indictment will lie for cutting timber on any of the public lands, though it may not have been reserved for naval purposes.

Mr. Mason, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Morton & Leland, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment for cutting walnut and other trees on the public lands of the United States. It was objected that no other timber except what is named in the indictment can be proved. But THE COURT held that under the allegation of other timber, proof other than walnut trees was admissible to the jury.

An objection was also made, that an indictment would not lie for a trespass on the public lands, unless such lands had been reserved for naval purposes. But THE COURT ruled an indictment could be sustained, under the decisions, for the cutting of timber on the public lands which had not been reserved for naval purposes.

THE COURT instructed the jury must be satisfied that the person who cut the timber, was employed by the defendant, and that the timber was cut by his direction. If this be proved, the defendant is answerable, under the law, the same as if the defendant had in person committed the trespass.

The jury found the defendant not guilty.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct., 1852.

FEDERAL GRAND JURIES — SELECTION AND QUALIFICATIONS—STATE LAWS—CHALLENGES TO ARRAY —VENIRE—DISCRETION OF COURT—EVIDENCE BEFORE GRAND JURY—WITNESSES—OATH—FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

1. The judiciary act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 88, § 29), the act of May 13th, 1800 (2 Stat. 82), and the act of July 20th, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), adopt the state regulations respecting the procurement of grand and petit jurors to serve in the federal courts, and apply to those courts the state regulations respecting the qualifications and the exemptions of grand and petit jurors.

[Approved in U. S. v. Tallman, Case No. 16,429. Cited, contra, in U. S. v. Williams, Id. 16,716; U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. 199; Brewer v. Jacobs, 22 Fed. 234.]

2. A challenge to a grand juror for favor, on the ground that he is the prosecutor or complainant upon a charge, or that he is a witness on the part of the prosecution, and has been subpœnaed or been bound in a recognizance as such, goes to the qualifications of the juror.

3. A challenge to the array of the grand jury in a given case, on the ground that they have been selected, summoned and returned by a person unfit to summon an indifferent jury in the case, touches the qualifications of the panel.

4. Therefore, state regulations respecting such challenges are applicable in the federal courts.

[Cited in U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. 199; Approved in U. S. v. Tallman, Case No. 16,429.]

5. But peremptory challenges in criminal cases in the federal courts are regulated by the common law.

6. The absence of a venire for the summoning of a grand jury, in a case where it is required, is a ground of challenge to the array.

[Approved in U. S. v. Tallman, Case No. 16,429; U. S. v. Antz, 16 Fed. 123; U. S. v. Richardson, 28 Fed. 69.]

7. Challenges to the array of grand jurors are abolished by the laws of New-York, and are consequently also abolished in the federal courts in New-York.

[Cited in U. S. v. Tuska, Case No. 16,550.]

8. But still, where there has been any improper conduct on the part of the officers employed in designating, summoning and returning the grand jury, an accused person who is prejudiced thereby has his remedy by motion to the court for relief.

9. All objections, however, to the proceedings in the selection and summoning of grand jurors, over and beyond the right of challenge, are presented to the court for the exercise of its sound discretion, and, although there may be technical irregularities, it will not interpose, unless satisfied that the accused party is prejudiced by them.

[Cited in People v. Lauder, 82 Mich. 135, 46 N. W. 964.]

10. Under the act of August 8th, 1846 (9 Stat. 73, § 3), providing that no grand jury shall be summoned in the federal courts except upon an order for a venire, to be made by a judge, a venire should be issued by the clerk of the court, in pursuance of the order.

11. A verbal order given by a judge to the clerk in such case is sufficient, though no order be filed or entered of record.

12. The omission to issue a venire in such case, if a ground of challenge to the array, and if taken advantage of at the proper time, is fatal to the pannel.

13. But, if not a ground of challenge, or if the time for making the challenge be passed, it is only a ground for a motion to set aside the pannel for cause.

14. The mere omission, however, to issue the venire, is not such cause, where the application is addressed to the sound discretion of the court.

15. By the law of New-York (2 Rev. St. p. 724, §§ 27, 28), persons "held to answer," that is, arrested and held to bail to appear at the term of the court at which the grand jury attends, to answer such complaints as may be presented against them, are the only persons who can challenge either the array of grand jurors, or the individual grand jurors for favor.

16. Where a party appeals to the sound discretion of the court to set aside an indictment for irregularities in drawing or summoning the grand jury, he must implicate the good faith of the officers concerned in discharging those duties.

17. Those officers, in New-York, are bound to use the state boxes and the state ballots in drawing grand jurors, as the same are furnished to them by the state officers, and have no right to change or alter either.

18. It is the uniform practice, in the federal and state courts, for the clerk and assistant of the district attorney to attend the grand jury and assist in investigating the accusations presented before them. That practice must be regarded as settled; but any abuse or improper conduct on the part of any person admitted to the grand jury, will be investigated by the court.

[Cited in State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 322, 10 S. E. 640.]

19. The court has no power to inquire into the mode in which the examination of witnesses was conducted before the grand jury, for the purpose of invalidating an indictment.

20. It will inquire, however, into the manner of swearing the witnesses, when they are sworn in open court, and into the competency of the evidence, whether oral or documentary, and into the manner of authenticating the latter species of evidence.

21. Where witnesses before a grand jury are testifying in regard to facts about which they have previously made ex parte affidavits, it is not improper for them to consult those affidavits, to refresh their recollection; nor is there any objection to their swearing that certain facts, of which they have previously made statements on paper, are true.

22. Evidence before a grand jury must be competent legal evidence, such as is legitimate and proper before a petit jury.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

23. On a criminal charge against several persons, for a participation in the rescue of a person from the hands of a public officer who held him in custody, the witnesses who were to testify before the grand jury were sworn in open court in the following manner: The clerk of the court was furnished with a general description of the persons accused—"The United States v. M. S. and Others"—and then administered to the witnesses this oath: "You, and each of you, do severally solemnly swear, that the evidence you shall give to the grand inquest touching charges against M. S., and others, concerning which you shall be interrogated, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God." Upon the testimony given under this oath, twenty-four bills of indictment were found against twenty-four different persons, one against each. No indictment was found against "M. S. and others," nor was any indictment found against any two persons jointly. On a motion by E. R., the defendant in one of the indictments, to quash it, on the ground that the oath was void as to him: Held, that the oath was free from objection.

24. A general oath to give evidence touching criminal charges to be laid before the grand jury, without reference to any particular person, is unobjectionable.

25. If the oath embraces one or more persons by name, whose cases are about to be laid before the grand jury, and in respect to which the oath is administered, and nothing more, evidence cannot be given under it in support of any accusation against others.

26. The court has no power to revise the judgment of a grand jury upon the evidence, for the purpose of determining whether or not the finding was founded upon sufficient proof, or whether there was a deficiency in respect to any part of the complaint.

[Cited in brief in Com. v. Bannon, 97 Mass. 218.]

27. When, under section 6 of the act of September 18th, 1850 (9 Stat. 463), known as the "Fugitive Slave Act," a warrant is issued by competent authority, that is sufficient to justify the arrest and detention of the fugitive until he is discharged by due course of law, and any person concerned in rescuing or attempting to rescue such fugitive out of the custody of the law, subjects himself to the penalties of the act.

This was a motion to quash an indictment found in the district court at Buffalo, in November, 1851, and transmitted to this court. The indictment was founded upon the 7th section of the act of congress of September 18th, 1850 (9 Stat. 464), commonly called the "Fugitive Slave Act," and the alleged offence consisted in rescuing from the custody of the United States marshal, at Syracuse, Jerry, a person lawfully in his custody under that act, as a fugitive from service or labor. The indictment contained two classes of counts—one averring that the person rescued was held to service or labor in the state of Missouri, and was a fugitive from such service, and, as such in the lawful custody of the marshal when the rescue took place—and the other averring that the person rescued was an alleged fugitive from service or labor, and was, at the time of the rescue, in the custody of the marshal, under a warrant duly issued by a United States commissioner under said act, he having jurisdiction of the case, and proceedings being in progress before him under said warrant, to determine whether the person rescued was such fugitive or not. The motion was founded upon affidavits, and affidavits were read in opposition. The defendant [Enoch Reed] had not pleaded, but was now brought into court for the first time, and arraigned, nor had he been arrested, or held to answer in any way, before the indictment was found.

David D. Hillis, for defendant, stated two general grounds for the motion: (1) Irregularities in obtaining the grand jury by which the indictment was found. (2) Irregularities in the proceedings by and before the grand jury, after they were empanneled. Under the first point he was proceeding to urge: (1) that there were irregularities on the part of the deputy marshal at Buffalo, in drawing the grand jury; (2) that one of the grand jurors was a volunteer, not having been summoned by the deputy marshal; (3) that no order was made by the district judge for a venire to summon the grand jury, as required by the 3d section of the act of congress of August 8th, 1846 (9 Stat. 73); (4) that no venire or precept was issued by the clerk of the court to the marshal, authorizing him to summon the grand jury.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and HALL, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. A preliminary question suggests itself in this case, whether the provisions of the Revised Statutes of New York (2 Rev. St. p. 724, §§ 27, 28), prescribing the objections that may be taken to the organization of grand juries, are not binding on this court, and whether, under those provisions, we are not precluded from looking into the objections which are raised. The act of congress of July 20th, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), is the act now in force regulating the drawing and impanelling of grand and petit juries in the federal courts. That act adopts the state regulations, not only those existing when the act was passed, but any changes that might be thereafter made by the state in the mode of selecting and impanelling juries. That act also authorizes the federal courts to adopt the state regulations by rule, so far as it may be practicable to do so. And a rule (46) has been made by the district court for this district, under that act, adopting the regulations of the Revised Statutes, as respects the organization of grand and petit juries. The state law regulates the length of notice required for drawing grand jurors, the notice necessary in summoning them, their qualifications, and the numbers necessary to constitute a quorum for business, and to find a bill. For regulations as to these matters in the federal courts, we must look into the Revised Statutes. There, also, we find that the legislature has limited the objections that may be taken to grand jurors, either to the array, or to any particular member. We desire the counsel to turn his attention to the point suggested, because, if we take the Revised Statutes as a guide in determining what objections may be looked into, the necessity of examining those now raised may be superseded. It is, therefore, proper to inquire whether we can go behind the indictment, and entertain objections to the organization of the grand jury beyond those which are prescribed by the state regulations.

Mr. Hillis read the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to (2 Rev. St. p. 724, §§ 27, 28):

"Sec. 27. A person held to answer to any criminal charge may object to the competency of any one summoned to serve as a grand juror, before he is sworn, on the ground that he is the prosecutor or complainant upon any charge against such person, or that he is a witness on the part of the prosecution, and has been subpœnaed or been bound in a recognizance as such; and, if such objection be established, the person so summoned shall be set aside.

By the law of New-York, certain preliminary notices are necessary in getting together a grand jury. Can these notices be entirely dispensed with, and a mere voluntary body come together as a grand jury, and yet no objection be afterwards made by a party indicted by such body? Suppose the case of a grand jury not drawn at all, but admitted to have been packed. Can a man indicted by it be cut off, by the provisions of the Revised Statutes, from raising the objection?

In the present case, a man served on the grand jury who was not summoned, and there was no order made by the district judge for a venire, and no venire issued to the marshal to summon the jury. The defendant had no notice of these irregularities before he was indicted. He was not bound over before indictment, and he now appears in court for the first time, and is arraigned. Is it a sufficient answer to his objections to say that he might have objected to any individual grand juror on the ground that he was a witness or prosecutor, and that, not having been present to challenge for those prescribed causes, he cannot now object for any others? If we are bound by the statute, a jury might be packed, because that is no ground of challenge under the statute; or half of the jury might be volunteers, instead of the jury being, as Chief Justice Marshall, in Burr's Case [Case No. 14,693], said it must be, the jury summoned; or less than the legal number of jurors might be impanelled. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. How far the Revised Statutes go upon the point of precluding objections other than those specified in the statute itself, is a question we desire to hear discussed. Are we tied down to the irregularities specified, or can we go into others?) A grand jury may have been drawn by a constable, or it may be confessedly corrupt. Are all these objections cut off by the statute of New York?

No case can be found in which a court has refused to look into the conduct of its own officers in drawing, summoning and impanelling a grand jury. People v. Hulbut, 4 Denio, 133, 136; 6 Car. & P. 90; People v. Jewett, 3 Wend. 314; and 6 Wend. 386; U. S. v. Coolidge [Case No. 14,858]; People v. McKay, 18 Johns. 212. The cases cited are authorities to show that a court will thus inquire when irregularities are brought to its notice.

The language of the Revised Statutes does not confine the party to the objections specified. It would be absurd for it to do so, where gross irregularities are perpetrated, and when, as here, a citizen applies for redress at the first opportunity.

It was decided by Chief Justice Marshall, in U. S. v. Hill [Case No. 15,364], in 1809, that neither the 29th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 88), nor the act of May 13th, 1800 (2 Stat. 82), applied to grand juries in the federal courts. These acts prescribed the mode of procuring juries in all cases. They were amended by the act of July 20th, 1840, referred to, which speaks of "jurors to serve," &c. The language in all three of the acts is equally general, and, as the first two were held not to apply to grand juries, the last does not.

James W. Nye, on the same side.

The objections raised here ought not to be confounded with challenges or a right to challenge. Such right existed at common law. The statute has only pointed out what shall be causes of challenge in particular cases. The 27th and 28th sections referred to, limit the right of challenge to a person who is "held to answer," one recognised to appear at a given time and place, to answer any charge that may be preferred against him by a grand jury then and there to sit. If, in this case, the defendant had appeared at Buffalo, and objected to any grand juror for any cause specified in the statute, he would have been told that he had no right to be heard because he was not held to answer there. But, the want of a venire was not ever the ground for a challenge. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. It was a ground of challenge to the array.) Then, no one could take advantage of it, unless "held to answer." And the statute leaves it still the duty of the court, as it ever was, to see that all the steps taken in empanneling the grand jury were regular.

Our objection lies back of the grounds of challenge specified in the Revised Statutes. The proceedings of the grand jury were void for the want of a venire. The body which found the indictment was no grand jury, but a tribunal unknown to our laws.

James R. Lawrence, Dist. Atty., and Joshua A. Spencer, for the United States.

The objections to the proceedings in empanneling the grand jury are merely a challenge to the array. If the statute of New-York regulates the challenge to the array in the federal courts, then all the objections fall to the ground. Because, if the challenge could not now be made directly, it cannot be made in an indirect way by a motion to quash.

Congress had power to say that these proceedings should be regulated by the state law, and the state had power to make the regulations it has made. The object of the law as to challenges was, that the proceedings should not be always open for a party to object to every little irregularity. And this is no hardship, because the trial before the traverse jury will always sufficiently protect the rights of a defendant.

It is said that the 27th section of the Revised Statutes referred to, only applies to persons brought into court on recognizance. But the 28th section applies to every person. "No challenge," that is, by any person, "shall be allowed," but for the two causes mentioned in the 27th section.

This regulation is, under the acts of congress and the rules of court made in pursuance thereof, applicable to the federal courts. Dist. Ct. Rule 46; Conk. Prac. (2d Ed.) 541; Cir. Ct. Rule 3, Id. 528.

The objections made here to the mode of designating the grand jurors, that one of them was a volunteer, that there was no order for a venire, and that there was no venire or precept, all come under the head of a challenge to the array, and are covered by the 28th section of the Revised Statutes.

Charles B. Sedgwick, in reply.

1. The act of congress of 1840 does not include regulations made by the state statute in regard to challenges, nor does the 46th rule of the district court apply to grand juries. 2. Admitting the 27th and 28th sections of the Revised Statutes to be applicable to the federal courts, they do not embrace the objections raised in this case.

Challenges both to the array and to the polls are to be taken before the swearing of the jury. A challenge to the array is made on account of favor, bias or relationship on the part of the officer who summons the jury, but never on account of any irregularity or want of process. There is a distinction between a challenge and a motion to set aside an indictment for irregularity. A challenge is to be brought before the court at a given point in the course of the proceedings, and to be then entirely disposed of. A want of process always appears by the record. A challenge does not. A want of process may be taken advantage of by error or certiorari; what is a ground of challenge cannot be. The want of a venire is not a ground of challenge to the array. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 533; People v. McKay, 18 Johns. 212; Nicholls v. State, 2 Southard [5 N. J. Law] 539; Chase v. State, 1 Spencer [20 N. J. Law] 218; State v. Williams, 1 Rich. Law, 188.

The state statute limits the right of challenge to narrow bounds, and if, in consequence, all irregularities which occur before the grand jury are actually sworn are cut off, there is no way of reaching some of the worst evils. It is no answer to say that the rights of a party will be protected because he will have his trial before the petit jury. This view strikes at the provision of the constitution which requires a due presentment by a grand jury before trial. Every safeguard of the liberty of the citizen should be maintained, but, according to the construction of the prosecuting attorney, no forms are of any importance, if only the defendant be fairly tried by the petit jury.

If a venire is required, it is the foundation on which the grand jury stands. If it be wanting, there is no ground for challenge, but the grand jurors have no right to act, and their proceedings are a nullity.

Under the 27th section of the Revised Statutes, a person previously held by recognizance is the only one who can make the challenges specified. If it be held that that section embraces other persons, then those others would be cut off without an opportunity of making even the objections specified. It is said that the 28th section enlarges the exclusion. But, the two sections are to be construed together. If a person not held to answer cannot challenge or obtain relief by motion, but is shut out forever, then the provision of the constitution that a person charged with crime must be regularly presented by a grand jury, is entirely brushed away.

If, however, the court should be against us on these objections to matters occurring before the empanneling of the grand jury, we still have some objections to discuss in regard to matters which arose after the impanelling of the grand jury.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. We have looked into the question which we suggested to the counsel yesterday, and to which we desired them to turn their attention, and are prepared to express our opinion upon it. The question is, perhaps, somewhat a new one, in the aspect in which it has been presented. But the general principle, that is, the adoption of the state regulations in designating, summoning and returning grand jurors, is, so far as it is involved, not new, but has always prevailed in the federal courts since their organization. The judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 88, § 29), the act of May 13th, 1800 (2 Stat. 82), and the act of July 20th, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), adopt the state regulations in respect to the procurement of grand and petit jurors to serve in the federal courts, and each of those acts, especially the act of 1840, applies to the federal courts, in express terms, the state regulations respecting the qualifications and the exemptions of grand and petit jurors.

The question in the present case is, whether or not the provisions of the state act (2 Rev. St. p. 724, §§ 27, 28), which regulate the rights of a prisoner in the challenging of grand jurors, are applicable to the organization of grand juries in the federal courts. Those provisions are as follows:

"Sec. 27. A person held to answer to any criminal charge, may object to the competency of any one summoned to serve as a grand juror, before he is sworn, on the ground that he is the prosecutor or complainant upon any charge against such person, or that he is a witness on the part of the prosecution, and has been subpœnaed or been bound in a recognizance as such; and, if such objection be established, the person so summoned shall be set aside.

We entertain no doubt that these two sections bear upon the question of the qualifications of grand jurors and their competency to serve as such. If this be so, it follows that the regulations prescribed by these sections come directly within the act of 1840, which, in express terms, adopts the state acts in regard to the qualifications and exemptions of grand jurors.

A challenge to an individual grand juror may be made on behalf of a prisoner, on the grounds that he has not the requisite freehold qualification, or that he is not of competent age, or that he has formed a fixed opinion of the guilt of the accused, or that he is his enemy, and various others which it is not necessary to enumerate. It is too obvious to require any argument that the challenges to an individual grand juror for favor, which are prescribed in the two sections in question, go directly to the qualifications of the juror as a fit and competent person to serve in that capacity.

The challenge to the array, at common law, or according to the English understanding and definition of that term, is founded on the allegation that the sheriff who summoned the grand jury was an improper and unfit person to discharge that duty, as by reason of his being related to one of the parties—his relationship to the prisoner being a ground of challenge on the part of the king—and it being a ground of challenge by the accused that the sheriff is his enemy, or that the relations between them are such that, in view of a proper administration of justice, the sheriff is not a proper person to summon the grand jury who are to be the triers of the accused. It being thus a ground of a challenge to the array, in a given case, that the jury have been selected, summoned and returned by a person unfit to summon an indifferent jury to sit and judge in the case, and it being the presumption that such a person would summon a jury not indifferent, but prejudiced, as respects the case to be heard, the challenge to the array, so authorized, necessarily, though perhaps more remotely, touches and reaches the proper qualifications of the panel to sit and act in the particular case.

So that, in point of law, as well as in truth, both the challenge to the favor and the challenge to the array, directly or indirectly, in each case, go to the determination of the proper qualifications of grand jurors, either as individuals or as a panel. And, if we are right in our premises, it follows that the two sections in question are directly within the act of congress of 1840, and are applicable in regulating the selection, summoning, returning and organization of grand juries in the federal courts.[2]

Whether the fact that a venire or a precept has not been issued by the proper authority in cases where it is required by law for the purpose of summoning and returning a grand jury, is a ground of challenge to the array, may be, perhaps, an open question, or one admitting of some observation and doubt. We are inclined to think, however, that if an objection were made on that ground, at the proper time, it might be made as a challenge to the array. Because, in judgment of law, if a grand jury has been summoned and returned by a person who is not authorized to designate, summon and return the pannel, the array of the jury thus summoned and returned would seem to be objectionable as a pannel, and therefore objectionable under a challenge to the array or to the pannel. If, then, the absence of a venire or of a precept,

[2] The principles here laid down are not applicable to peremptory challenges in criminal cases in the courts of the United States. Such challenges in those courts are regulated by the common law. U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480; U. S. v. Wilson [Case No. 16,730]. The acts of congress on the subject of jurors do not regulate peremptory challenges to jurors in criminal cases. The 29th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 88) enacts that "jurors in all cases to serve in the courts of the United States," "shall have the same qualifications as are requisite for jurors by the laws of the state of which they are citizens, to serve in the highest courts of law of such state;" and the act of July 20th, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), provides that "jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, in each state respectively, shall have the like qualifications and be entitled to the like exemptions as jurors of the highest court of law of such state now have and are entitled to." A peremptory challenge not being made for any assigned cause, and having no reference to the qualification or exemption of the juror, the acts of congress above referred to do not cover it. And the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 92), which provides that "the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply," does not apply to criminal cases. U. S. v. Reid, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 361. See U. S. v. Douglass [Case No. 14,989].

in a case where the law requires one, is a ground of challenge to the array, which we are inclined, upon principle, to think it is, the challenge is abolished by the 28th section of the statute referred to, and it is, consequently, also abolished in the federal courts.

It is very probable that the legislature of New-York were induced to abolish the challenge to the array on account of the change from the English mode in the system adopted for the purpose of designating and summoning grand jurors. In England, (and so it was in the federal courts until the act of congress was passed adopting the state regulations,) the sheriff, on receiving the venire, makes a selection of the jurors from the body of the county, at his discretion. Hence the importance that is there given to the proper qualifications of the sheriff, in respect to the parties concerned, to summon the jury; because, if he is disposed to summon one to accomplish a particular object, it is entirely within his power to do so. But, according to the system prevalent in the state of New-York, the law provides for the selection of the members of the grand jury with great care and particularity. In the first place, they are selected from the body of the county by the board of supervisors, and separate ballots containing their names are placed in a box kept by the clerk of the county, from which the requisite number are drawn by lot to form the jury, and the names so drawn are the persons to be summoned and returned. If, therefore, the law is complied with in the selection and summoning of grand jurors, none of the officers employed in the discharge of that duty can exercise any discretion whatever, and hence, no doubt, the legislature came the more readily to the conclusion that the right of challenge to the array was not of the same importance under our system as under the system that prevails in England.

We are quite free to say, however, that although the challenge to the individual members of the grand jury for favor is abolished, except in the two cases specified in sections 27 and 28 of the statute referred to, and although the challenge to the array is wholly abolished, it by no means follows that the accused has no remedy in a case where there has been any improper conduct on the part of the public officers employed in the designating, summoning and returning of the grand jury. If there has been any improper conduct on the part of those officers in performing that service, or if any fraud has been committed, through their instrumentality, in the drawing, summoning or organization of the grand jury, of course, the accused who may be prejudiced thereby has his remedy, by motion to the court for relief in consequence of such irregularity or fraud. Because, the selecting, summoning and returning of grand jurors are proceedings which are always under the general supervision and control of the court, and the court will guard them, and will see to it that no one shall be prejudiced thereby. The court has general power to preserve the pure administration of justice, and its sound discretion will always be exercised freely for the purpose of securing that end.

These objections, however, to the proceedings in the selection and summoning of grand jurors, over and beyond the right of challenge, are presented to the court for the exercise of its sound discretion. It will, therefore, look into the facts presented, on which a charge is made against the regularity of the proceedings in the selection and summoning of grand jurors in a given case, and will hear the explanations on the other side, and its judgment will be determined accordingly. If it sees that there has been improper conduct in the public officers, which has resulted prejudicially to the party accused, it is bound to set aside all the proceedings. On the contrary, although there may be technical objections to the proceedings in point of strict regularity, yet, unless the court is satisfied that they have resulted or may result to the prejudice of the party accused, it will not set them aside, because its interposition in the case will not be required on the ground of justice either to the accused or to the public.

We are inclined to think that the question, whether or not the absence of a venire, where it is required by law, forms a ground of challenge to the array, is of no practical consequence in this case; because, even if it were a ground of challenge to the array, and the party had not made the challenge, not having had notice of the facts on which it could be grounded, yet, if it could be shown that corruption or fraud had entered into the selection, summoning or returning of the grand jury, the court would hear an application for relief founded upon its power and duty to control and regulate the proceedings so as to prevent injury and oppression. The only difference between the two cases is, that where a challenge to the array is made, it is, if maintained, fatal to the pannel, and the pannel becomes invalid by operation of law; but, where the party is obliged to make a motion to set aside the pannel on the ground of improper conduct on the part of public officers, there is then no inflexible rule of law applicable to the case, but it rests in the sound discretion of the court to see that no injury results from the impropriety. The court will look, therefore, into the facts, to see whether there is any thing to satisfy their minds that the jury thus summoned is not a fit body to exercise the powers conferred upon it.

If the absence of a venire is not a ground of challenge to the array, the result is still the same. The conduct of public officers in summoning the jury, if improper, is not thereby protected, and the injured party has his remedy by motion. In either case, the appeal is to the discretion of the court.

The act of congress of 1840, in connection with the 46th rule of the district court for this district, provides for the designation, summoning and returning of grand jurors without any venire or precept of any kind. Such has been the practice in this district ever since the adoption of the 46th rule, no doubt on a sound construction of the act of 1840. That act conferred full authority on the district court to adopt the 46th rule, which simply requires a notice by the clerk, within a proper time, to the marshal, to summon the jurors. The marshal then draws and summons them according to the state regulations as far as practicable, and makes a return on the jury list, which is filed, and which furnishes all the authority necessary for impanelling the jury.

Were it not for the act of August 8th, 1846 (9 Stat. 73, § 3), no question would arise as to a venire. The act of 1846 changed the law as it then existed, but the obvious extent of that change, as designed by congress, and as appears from the face of the law, was to remove the necessity that previously existed of summoning a grand jury at every term of the circuit and district courts, with a view to diminish expenses. Therefore, the act provides that no grand jury shall be summoned for any term of a circuit or district court, unless the judge, in the exercise of his discretion, or on the application of the district attorney, shall order a venire to be issued to summon a grand jury. Now, although the purpose of that act was to get rid of the necessity for the regular attendance of a grand jury at every term, and it, therefore, devolves power on the judge to order a grand jury when necessary, yet it does provide in terms that a grand jury shall be summoned by an order for a venire, to be made by the judge. And, undoubtedly, in compliance with the terms of that act, a venire should be issued by the clerk of the court in pursuance of the order of the judge. For, although the act only says that there shall be an order for a venire, yet it implies that a venire shall issue in pursuance of the order.

In this case, a verbal order for a venire was given to the clerk. If he had fulfilled his duty he would have entered it on the records of the court. What the clerk does by the authority of the judge is done by the judge himself. It is not necessary that the judge should put an order on file, but an order, if entered by the clerk, is of the same effect as if it were entered by the judge with his own hand. Here, an order was made by the judge, and the only point of objection in the case is the omission by the clerk to issue a venire. If the omission of the venire were a ground of challenge, and the party had availed himself of it at the proper time, it would have been fatal. But, if not a ground of challenge, or if the time for making the challenge be passed, then it is only a ground for a motion to the court to set aside the pannel for cause shown. But, the mere technical omission on the part of the clerk to issue a venire is, of itself, no cause for the action of the court, where the appeal is not to the application of an unbending principle of law, but to the sound discretion of the court. The general principle is, that the omission of an officer to do his duty will not be allowed to operate to the prejudice either of an individual or of the public, unless it is shown to have operated to the prejudice of the party who complains of the omission.

It has been urged by the counsel for the prisoner, that the 27th and 28th sections of the statute referred to apply only to persons who have been arrested and held to bail to appear at the term of the court at which the grand jury attends, to answer such complaints as may be presented against them. That is true, and they are the only persons who can challenge either the array or the individual jurors for favor; because, these challenges must be made at the time the grand jurors are called and empanneled, and only those persons who are bound over to appear have the right or the opportunity to make either of these challenges. At common law, persons not bound over never had the right or the opportunity to challenge either the individual grand jurors or the array. Hence those persons could never avail themselves of any improper conduct in summoning or returning the grand jury, except by way of motion, addressed to the sound discretion of the court, to prevent any prejudice to the rights or interests of the accused.

From these views it results, that the question at this stage does not stand upon the doctrines applicable to challenges, but upon the allegation on the one side and the denial on the other, that the grand jury has been drawn, summoned and returned improperly or through fraud, and in a way that has resulted to the prejudice of the accused, and that the court is, therefore, bound, in the exercise of its sound discretion, to look into the proceedings. The question will turn on the aspect of the case as presented by the affidavits on the part of the accused and those upon the other side; and we shall be obliged to determine it upon our view, not of the technical irregularities and objections, but of the case generally, as respects justice between the individual and the public. If we shall be satisfied that there was nothing in these proceedings, although they may have been irregular, which could work to the prejudice of the accused, we cannot, in the exercise of a sound discretion, set them aside. If, however, we shall be satisfied that they have worked injustice, we shall be bound to interpose.

There are two or three questions presented by the counsel for the prisoner, which are not embraced in the view we have taken, that the proceedings in question must be regulated by the provisions of the Revised Statutes of New York in respect to challenges. Those questions are founded on matters arising after the impanelling of the jury, and are open for observation, without regard to the application of any one of those provisions. Upon those questions we are, of course, disposed to hear any observations that counsel may desire to present, as we are also ready to hear any views they may desire to present in regard to any prejudice or injustice that has been suffered through the manner in which the jury has been designated, summoned and impanelled.

Hillis then proceeded to argue that the defendant might have been and was prejudiced by the mode of designating the grand jurors. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. The right of challenge in this case being cut off, the remedy of the party is narrowed to an appeal to the sound discretion of the court, in case any irregularities have occurred in drawing or summoning the grand jury, which may have operated to his prejudice. But the good faith of the officers concerned in discharging the duties of drawing and summoning must be implicated.) We insist that, if an officer puts himself in motion to summon a grand jury without a venire, the question of his good faith in doing so is involved. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. We have held that the question as to the venire is not open. The counsel, in order to avail himself of the ground left open, must present a case in which he implicates the good faith of the officers concerned in selecting, summoning and returning the grand jury.)

The box from which the ballots in this case were drawn, instead of having a small hole in its top for that purpose, had a sliding cover, and, when that was drawn out, the ballots were in full view of the person drawing. Nor were the ballots folded so as to render the names invisible, as required by the statute. 2 Rev. St. p. 721, § 6. These were irregularities which would almost surely work to the prejudice of the defendant, in a case where the officer drawing had any feeling in the matter. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. How can the officer be held responsible for the construction of the box and the formation of the ballots? He has no control over them. He is to take the box furnished by the state officers. He has no right to fold the ballots, or interfere with them in any way, except to draw them. He must take the state ballots. The act of congress having adopted the state box and the state ballots, and made it the duty of the officer to draw, we do not see how it can be objected that the ballots were drawn from that box and from among those ballots.)

I pass now to irregularities in the proceedings after the grand jury was sworn and empanneled.

A son of the district attorney, not sworn in any manner, was permitted to mix with the grand jury while it was in session, and to participate in the proceedings before it. Such a practice destroys the secrecy of the institution of the grand jury, which is its most important feature. No person should be permitted to be present at its sessions except the witnesses and the sworn officers of the court. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. The only point that can arise on this branch of the case is, whether the person admitted to the grand jury was guilty of any improper conduct while there, which operated unduly on the minds of the jurors. It is the uniform practice, in the federal and state courts, for the clerk and assistant of the district attorney to attend the grand jury, and assist in investigating the accusations presented before it. That has been the practice, to my knowledge, without question, ever since I have had any connection with the administration of criminal justice. In England, even the prosecutor may appear before the grand jury and aid the representative of the crown in respect to the evidence and the management of the case. We cannot, at this late day, overturn a uniform practice that has been settled for so long a time. You must assume that the attendance of the clerk of the district attorney before the grand jury, to aid in bringing out the testimony, is admissible. But, if any abuse has been committed by him, or by any other person, it is a proper subject for investigation by the court.) We charge no abuse, except the mere fact of his being present.

The next point is, as to the oath administered in open court to the witnesses who testified before the grand jury. They were sworn in this manner: "You, and each of you, do severally solemnly swear, that the evidence you shall give to the grand inquest, touching charges against Moses Summers and others, concerning which you shall be interrogated, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God." Upon the testimony given under this oath twenty-four bills of indictment were found against twenty-four different persons, one against each. No indictment was found against "Moses Summers and others," nor was any indictment found against any two persons jointly. Could any person who swore falsely against the defendant be indicted for perjury on this oath? The witnesses were not sworn at all so far as the defendant was concerned, and the indictment against him was found on testimony not on oath. Swith v. Clark, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 21; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 322; U. S. v. Coolidge [Case No. 14,858]. The oath here was not a general oath, naming no person, and swearing the witnesses as to any matters they might be inquired of before the grand jury. But it was a particular oath, confined to a particular cause. And an indictment will be quashed unless the witnesses are regularly sworn. 6 Car. & P. 90; State v. Roberts, 2 Dev. & B. 540; Whart. Cr. Law, 124; State v. Cain, 1 Hawks, 352; State v. Fellows, 2 Hayw. (N. C.) 340; People v. Hulbut, 4 Denio, 133.

Another objection we have to urge is, that ex parte affidavits were used before the grand jury instead of oral testimony. Those affidavits were made originally for the purpose of issuing warrants against the parties accused. On the examination of the parties after arrest, the same affidavits were again used. And they were used a third time before the grand jury, where they were read and the witnesses asked if the statements in them were correct. This was an irregularity. In an ex parte investigation as to a person not present, the witnesses should have been interrogated as to what they remembered concerning the transaction. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. Have you any authorities that go to permit an inquiry into the mode of proceeding before the grand jury in the taking of testimony, or into the weight or sufficiency of the testimony, for the purpose of invalidating an indictment? As regards the manner of swearing the witnesses, when they are sworn in open court, and the competency of the evidence, whether oral or documentary, and the manner of the authentication of the latter species of evidence, we can inquire. But, so far as regards the mode of conducting the examination of witnesses who are properly before the grand jury, we are aware of no principle which authorizes us to revise the proceedings of the grand jury. Now, the affidavits in question here were, as we understand it, used before the grand jury in the course of the examination of the witnesses themselves who made the affidavits. The witnesses were called to testify in regard to facts about which they had previously made affidavits. The affidavits were used to refresh their recollections and to save time. The witnesses, being present before the grand jury, were to be examined according to the discretion of that body, over which we have no control. It is no new practice for witnesses to consult, for the purpose of refreshing their recollections, statements which they have previously made, although they cannot swear from the statements. There is no objection, however, to the witnesses swearing that certain facts, of which they have previously made statements on paper, are true.)

Again. An ex parte affidavit, purporting to have been taken in Missouri, and to have been made by the alleged owner of Jerry, was the only evidence before the grand jury that Jerry was a slave, that he owed his alleged owner service, that he escaped from Missouri to New York, and that the person rescued was the identical Jerry who escaped. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. Evidence before a grand jury must be competent legal evidence, such as is legitimate and proper before a petit jury. Lawrence.) The affidavit of the owner referred to was annexed to the warrant, and was the same affidavit that was used before the United States commissioner, and on which he issued his warrant in the case. It was produced before the grand jury by the commissioner himself, who was sworn as to the issuing of the warrant upon it, and the only object for which it was used before the grand jury was to show what the commissioner who issued the warrant had before him, with a view of showing that he had jurisdiction to issue it, and that it was valid in the hands of the officer, and that the rescue was in violation of the act. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. Can a motion to quash an indictment be made on the ground that the grand jury found it on insufficient evidence, or even without any evidence as to any particular point? Can you produce any authority for setting aside an indictment on that ground?) In Low's Case, 4 Greenl. 439, the affidavit of a grand juror was received to show that an indictment was found by less than twelve of the jury. In U. S. v. Coolidge [supra], an indictment was set aside on the ground that it was found on the evidence of witnesses who had not been sworn at all. (NELSON, Circuit Justice. In this last case, the inquiry was in regard to a fact that transpired, not before the grand jury, but in open court. HALL, District Judge. The affidavit of the party here, as to the alleged defect in the evidence before the grand jury, is merely on information and belief. If objection be made by the defendant, no affidavit of a grand juror, or of the district attorney, or of any person who was present before the grand jury, can be used to rebut it. If, in such a case, an affidavit on information and belief be held sufficient, every indictment must be quashed. I am aware of no case where any court has ever re-examined the evidence before a grand jury, to see whether it was sufficient. The result of such a practice would be, that in every case the court would be obliged to try a party on affidavits, on a motion to quash the indictment.) Affidavits of grand jurors are always admitted to sustain an indictment. Besides, in this case, the affidavits on the other side admit our allegation, as to the defect of evidence, to be true, by not denying it. (HALL, District Judge. Can you show, by authority, that the affidavit of a grand juror is competent for the purpose of showing that sufficient evidence was given to find the indictment? The position that your allegation is admitted because it is not denied, begs the question, which is, whether your affidavit is sufficient to call for either an admission or denial. You can have no legal information as to the fact that there was no evidence before the grand jury. The indictment itself is evidence that it was founded upon sufficient testimony, while you are speaking, upon information and belief and mere hearsay, on a subject as to which you can have legally no information. And this, you maintain, shall control an indictment presented by a grand jury upon oath.) The doctrine suggested would go so far, if carried out, as to allow no remedy, even if it appeared that there was no proof at all before the grand jury on which to find an indictment.

Mr. Spencer, for the United States.

All the questions raised by the defendant have been disposed of except three. (1) As to the oath administered to the witnesses. (2) As to the affidavits used before the grand jury. (3) As to the want of sufficient evidence on which to find the indictment.

1. As to the oath, the argument for the defendant has proceeded on the assumption that a suit was pending between the government and the defendant, at the time the oath was administered. This is a mistake. The proceedings were merely initiatory. It was wholly unknown who would be implicated in the transaction.

The oath was equivalent to a general oath, which is sufficient. Ward v. State, 2 Mo. 120. It required the witness to speak the truth as to any matter about which he should be interrogated before the grand jury. The oath related to the matter, and it was not necessary it should be limited to any particular individual.

It is objected that separate bills were found against the several parties implicated. The transaction was a misdemeanor, in which all were principals, and all jointly and severally liable for everything that was done while they were acting in concert. Whether the indictments would be joint or several was unknown, and was a matter within the election of the district attorney, and could make no difference in the deliberations of the grand jury.

The investigation was as to one entire transaction, a simple proceeding, and the oath was, to give evidence as to any matter about which the witness should be interrogated, in relation to that transaction, respecting Moses Summers and all others who might have been engaged in it.

It is said that perjury could not be predicated on this oath. This is not so. It would sustain a count that false evidence was given against the party who complains. The witnesses were bound to speak the truth in regard to each and all of the persons concerning whom they should be interrogated.

The oath administered was the only one which could have met the exigency of the case. It cannot be that the grand jury are to suspend their proceedings, and that a witness is to stop in his testimony, every time a new name is introduced, in order that the witness may be sworn as to that particular individual.

2. As to the use of affidavits before the grand jury. Each affidavit became common law evidence the moment the witness said that the statement to which his name was signed was true. The affidavit was not read to the grand jury as an affidavit. But it was read to the witness, and, when he said it was true, the evidence was the same, in legal effect, as if given orally. It was only a brief way of examining the witness.

3. The last point is not open for inquiry. The question whether there was sufficient evidence before the grand jury on which to find the bill, is a field into which the court will not enter. It is a startling proposition, that a court is to be allowed in every case to inquire whether, on the whole, the grand jury were warranted in finding a bill.

The question here is not whether the bill was found without any evidence, but whether it was found on sufficient evidence. The indictment, presented on oath, and a matter of record, is conclusive evidence that it was found on sufficient testimony. It is only before the traverse jury that the evidence can be gone into again. When the grand jury admits improper evidence and abuses its trust, the court sometimes interferes. But the door is not open to inquire whether there was sufficient evidence on which to find the bill.

In Low's Case, 4 Greenl. 439, where the bill was found by less than twelve of the grand jury, it had no jurisdiction, and consequently the indictment was no indictment.

But, the allegation that the evidence was not sufficient is made only on information and belief. Can the court inquire into the matter on the mere suggestion of the party? What, in such case, becomes of the presumption that every public officer discharges his duty? We are under no obligation to speak in answer to such an allegation. The law does not presume that we have the means of speaking.

But the indictment contains two sets of counts—one set founded on the allegation that Jerry was a fugitive—the other on the allegation that he was an alleged fugitive, and that proceedings were in progress to determine the fact. There is no pretence that the evidence was not sufficient to support the latter class. Rosc. Cr. Ev. 233; Whart. Cr. Law, 133; Respublica v. Cleaver, 4 Yeates, 69; State v. Baldwin, 1 Dev. & B. 198; State v. Mathis, 3 Pike, 84.

Mr. Sedgwick, in reply.

There is a distinction between the oath here and a general oath. In an indictment for perjury, the oath must be stated exactly as it was administered; and, under the oath here, if an attempt were made to prove that the witness swore falsely in a proceeding against the defendant, the variance would be fatal.

There was here no joint indictment, and the oath was taken in a case in which no indictment was found, and no oath was taken in the case against the defendant. The oath was not equivalent to a general oath.

As to the admission of incompetent evidence. The accused has no access to the grand jury room, to obtain proof. He cannot compel, nor will the court permit, the grand jurors to disclose what took place before them. Nor can he compel the district attorney or his clerk to give their affidavits as to what transpired in the grand jury room. The only way, then, that a party can know of an irregularity is by information and belief, and all that is left to him is to make a suggestion to the court. If, then, incompetent testimony vitiates an indictment, and if the only mode of reaching the question is by a motion to quash, and if the affidavit of the party on information and belief is the only foundation that can be had for the motion, then, such an affidavit requires an answer from the district attorney, who can call on the grand jurors to give evidence in reply, and can give it himself.

No witness was produced before the grand jury as to the ownership or escape of the slave. The only evidence on those points was by affidavit. The case was not one of insufficient evidence, but of a want of evidence as to vital points.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. Several of the questions raised on this motion on behalf of the defendant to quash the indictment, having been already disposed of in the course of the argument, we shall only refer to those remaining and which are deemed worthy of notice.

The first is in respect to the oath administered to the witnesses who were sent before the grand jury. They were sworn in open court, on a criminal charge against several persons for a participation in the rescue of a person from the hands of a public officer who held him in custody, and in the following manner: The clerk of the court was furnished with a general description of the persons accused,—"The United States v. Moses Summers and Others,"—and then administered to the witnesses, in due form, an oath, as follows: "You, and each of you, do severally solemnly swear, that the evidence you shall give to the grand inquest, touching charges against Moses Summers and others, concerning which you shall be interrogated, shall be the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. So help you God." The argument is, that this oath was void, as it respected all persons accused before the grand jury, or, at least, as it respected all except the one particularly named; and that the evidence, therefore, given before that body, and upon which the indictment was founded, was not delivered under the sanction of an oath.

It was admitted on the argument, and we suppose there can be no doubt as to the correctness of the position, that a general oath to give evidence touching criminal charges to be laid before the grand jury, without reference to any particular person, would be unobjectionable. This seems to be the practice adopted in some of the state courts. But it is supposed that the description attempted to be given of the persons accused, in the instance before us, and to which the oath refers, vitiates it.

It is true, if this description had embraced one or more persons by name, whose cases were about to be laid before the grand jury, and in respect to which the oath was administered, and nothing more, the objection would have been well founded, so far as concerned evidence given in support of any accusation against others. It must then have been confined to complaints against the persons specified. But, in the case before us, the oath was not restricted to any specified number of persons mentioned, or to the single person named. The witnesses were sworn to give evidence touching charges against him and any other persons concerning whom they should be interrogated by the grand jury. And, if a general oath to give evidence touching charges against any and all persons concerning whom they might be thus interrogated, would be unexceptionable, of which we think there can be no doubt, it would seem difficult to maintain the objection made to the oath in this instance. It is no more general and unrestricted, as it respects the persons against whom complaints may be made before the grand inquest, in the one case than in the other, but applies to every complaint presented for examination.

There are no authorities to be found in the English books upon this question; as the mode of proceeding before the grand jury in England, in finding bills of indictment, differs from the practice usually adopted in this country. There, the indictment is drawn by the proper officers before the case is presented for examination, and the witnesses are sworn in the particular case. Here, the initiation of the proceedings is by swearing the witnesses and sending them before the grand jury, and the bill is drawn after they have agreed upon it. There is no cause pending in court, or even before the grand jury, in the legal sense of the term, at the time the witnesses are sworn, and, in consequence, no title to the proceedings can properly be given, or be necessary to the validity of the oath. If the person to be accused before the grand jury is named, it is simply for the purpose of giving application to the oath, or to the evidence under it; and, as we have seen, this application has been regarded as sufficiently direct and explicit when the oath is administered generally, and as relating to all persons concerning whom charges are to be made before that body.

Indeed, if the description of the case given to the clerk could be properly regarded as a title to the proceedings, in a technical sense, there might be some difficulty in maintaining the validity of the oath to these witnesses, as no such proceeding was then pending, in contemplation of law. An affidavit taken in a suit in which the title is given, is invalid if no such suit is pending. But, we do not regard the memorandum given to the clerk, as already referred to, in this case or in any other, even where the accused are all specially named when the oath is administered, as a title, within the technical meaning of that term, but, as used simply for the purpose of giving application to the oath and to the evidence to be given thereafter under it. And, as the oath may be general as it respects all persons who may be accused, it would seem to follow, necessarily, that the form in which it was administered in this case is not liable to any well-founded objection.

Another ground taken in support of the motion to quash the indictment is, that there was no evidence laid before the grand jury tending to prove that Jerry was a person held to service in the state of Missouri, or that he was a fugitive from such service, at the time of his arrest and detention by the officer, or when the rescue took place, and that for this cause the indictment is founded on insufficient evidence, and, as it respects this fact, in the absence of evidence.

The indictment contains two classes of counts, one embracing an averment of these facts, and the other omitting this averment, and resting the counts upon a statement of facts showing that the magistrate had jurisdiction of the case, the issuing of the warrant, the arrest, &c.

The affidavit upon which this ground for sustaining the motion is founded, charges the absence of this evidence before the grand jury upon information and belief only—a charge, as is obvious, that may be readily made by the accused in any case where an indictment has been found, and which, if maintainable on such an allegation, might devolve upon the public prosecutor and the courts, in all cases, the necessity of going into the evidence before the grand jury, for the purpose of re-examining and revising the adjudication of that body; and this, without any authentic record of the evidence produced before them, or any means of arriving at that evidence. They are not bound to keep a record of the evidence taken before them, and are prohibited from disclosing their proceedings, and so, also, are all other persons who have access to or are permitted to participate in those proceedings. They are allowed by statute in some of the states to testify whether the evidence of a witness examined before them is consistent with or different from the evidence given by him before the court, and also upon a complaint for perjury, or upon a trial for that offence, to disclose the testimony given by any such witness; and, perhaps, evidence in these cases might be given by them at common law and without the aid of the statute. It is even doubtful whether they will be allowed to disclose the fact that a bill of indictment was found by a less number than twelve of their body, the authorities being contradictory. Rex v. Marsh, 6 Adol. & E. 236; Low's Case, 4 Greenl. 439; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 192; People v. Hulbut, 4 Denio, 133; Reg. v. Cooke, 8 Car. & P. 582; People v. Jewett, 3 Wend. 314; Whart. Cr. Law, 129. The rule is founded upon public policy, to guard against abuses that might arise from a disclosure of their proceedings to the accused, and to protect witnesses who may have given evidence before them, from being exposed to the ill-will and resentment of parties indicted. The permission to disclose in the case of a complaint for perjury, or for the purpose of contradicting a witness, seems to remove every well-grounded objection to the rule.

No case has been cited, nor have we been able to find any, furnishing an authority for looking into and revising the judgment of the grand jury upon the evidence, for the purpose of determining whether or not the finding was founded upon sufficient proof, or whether there was a deficiency in respect to any part of the complaint; and the grounds and reasons which we have briefly alluded to, account sufficiently for the absence of any such precedent.

The unfitness and inconvenience of an inquiry into the evidence before the grand jury, in this ex parte and informal manner, afford, also, strong grounds of objection to any such practice. The re-examination and revision of the evidence before them, attempted to be established by ex parte statements, and upon the allegation of information and belief by interested parties, would necessarily lead to abuses in the administration of criminal justice, besides involving it in endless and profitless litigation. It pre-supposes improper, if not dishonest conduct, in the members constituting the body, and seeks to establish the fact in this loose and imperfect mode of arriving at the truth, and under circumstances in which the jurors themselves are precluded from vindicating their proceedings. For, it was well remarked by the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in the case of People v. Hulbut, 4 Denio, 133, upon this subject, that "the evidence which the defendant proposed to give could amount to nothing less than an impeachment of the grand jurors. They had found a bill charging the defendant with five different offences, and the substance of the offer was to show that only one offence had been proved before them." "It cannot be proper," he further observed, "to allow the jurors to be thus assailed. To permit the question to be tried over again in another place, whether the indicting jurors had sufficient evidence or any evidence to warrant their finding, would be plainly contrary to the policy of the law, which, in everything that may affect the jurors themselves, has placed the seal of secrecy upon their proceedings." These remarks were made in a case where the evidence to impeach the proceedings was offered on the trial, a mode much less exceptionable in arriving at the truth, than upon ex parte affidavits.

In the administration of criminal justice, confidence must be reposed somewhere; and it must be admitted that there are few bodies concerned in it that may be more safely trusted than the grand inquest of the county. They are selected for their intelligence, probity and character, from the whole body of the county. In the county of Erie, whence this jury were drawn, the list out of which it was selected is limited to the number of three hundred, in a population of some one hundred thousand; a fact that more strongly illustrates the high character and qualifications of the grand inquest of the county for the discharge of the important duties devolved upon them, than any remarks we could make.

But, assuming that we may be mistaken in these views, there is another, which it is proper to notice, equally decisive of this motion. We have already stated that this indictment contains two classes of counts, and that one of them rests upon a statement of facts showing that the magistrate had jurisdiction of the case to issue the warrant, the issuing of the same, the arrest, &c. If this class of counts is well founded, and of which we entertain no doubt, then the indictment must be sustained, even conceding the absence of the evidence as alleged by the affidavits upon which the motion is founded.

By section 6 of the act of September 18, 1850 (9 Stat. 463), it is provided, that when a person held to service, &c., shall escape, &c., the person to whom such service is due, &c., may pursue and reclaim such fugitive, either by procuring a warrant from some one of the courts, judges or commissioners, for the apprehension of such fugitive, &c., or by seizing and arresting such fugitive where the same can be done without process, and by taking or causing him to be taken forthwith before such court, judge or commissioner, whose duty it shall be to hear and determine the case of such claimant, &c. If the facts, as presented before the commissioner, brought the case within his jurisdiction, and authorized the issuing of the warrant for the arrest, then the ministerial officer had full authority to make the arrest, and was bound to make it; and any person who knowingly rescued or attempted to rescue the fugitive from the custody of such officer, or aided, abetted or assisted in such rescue, was guilty of the offence charged in the indictment. The person thus arrested under the warrant is in the custody of the law, and any one engaged in the attempt to take him forcibly out of such custody, subjects himself to its penalties. When the warrant is issued by the authority of the law, it is made the duty of the marshal and deputy marshal, under heavy penalties, (section 5,) to obey and execute it; and it would be absurd to hold, that such officer could not be protected in the execution of the process, when the proof before the magistrate was sufficient, under the statute, to confer jurisdiction to issue it. In this, as in every other case of legal proceedings of an analogous description, it is sufficient to justify the arrest of the person, and his detention in custody until he is discharged by due course of law, that the warrant was issued by competent authority. The officer must be protected in its due execution, if the law of the land is to prevail; and any person concerned in the endeavor to obstruct it, or to take the person arrested forcibly out of his hands, becomes a public offender, and liable to the punishment the law annexes to the offence.

The question, whether the person is a fugitive from service or not, or whether such service is due to the claimant or not, is a question the authority to determine which, at the final hearing, is conferred by law upon the magistrate issuing the warrant—not upon the marshal, the ministerial officer, whose duty it is made to execute it. If these facts are sufficiently established before the magistrate to authorize the process, the marshal is authorized to arrest and detain the person until the hearing has taken place according to the provisions of the statute, and until the truth or falsity of the facts is established by the evidence. The question is one exclusively for the magistrate to determine, and, until that determination, the person arrested is in the custody of the law.

These principles are too common and familiar to require illustration or authority; and, in our judgment, upon any sound construction of the provisions of the act of congress on this subject, must govern the case. We have examined these provisions with some care, and the above are the deliberate conclusions at which we have arrived.

There is a remaining question in the case, which it is proper to notice—namely, the charge impeaching the conduct of Mr. Gates, the deputy marshal, whose duty it was made to draw the grand jury from the box of jurors for the county of Erie, and also to summon them for the term of the district court held at Buffalo, when this indictment was found. This charge is founded upon the affidavit, on information and belief, of one of the parties indicted. We have the affidavit of the deputy marshal, of the clerk of the county, and of a third person, who were present at the drawing and witnessed it, and they show that the charge is utterly unfounded, and most unjust as it respects this officer. The drawing took place in the usual way, and in strict conformity to the law. There is not the slightest ground for the imputation against the fairness and good faith of the deputy in the discharge of his duty, either in the drawing or the summoning of the jury, and it never should have been made.

For the reasons above given, the motion to quash the indictment must be denied.

Case No. 16,135.

UNITED STATES v. REED et al.

[13 Int. Rev. Rec. 148.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAW—DISTILLERY TAX.

[Under Act July 20, 1868, the "deficiency" tax for which a distiller is liable is based on the quantity of spirits actually produced by him, unless this is less than 80 per cent. of the capacity of his distillery, in which case the tax is to be estimated on such 80 per cent.]

[This was an action by the United States against James W. Reed and others, on a distiller's bond.]

WITHEY, District Judge (charging jury). The principal and sureties of the bond sued on are charged by the United States with liability for what is termed deficiency tax, barrel tax, and per diem tax, together with the penalty of five per cent. on the taxes alleged to be due and unpaid, and with interest of one per cent. per month on the taxes from the time they severally became due. There is no dispute, gentlemen of the jury, but that defendants are liable for the per diem tax, which the proofs satisfy you has not been paid, together with the five per cent. penalty thereon, and interest at one per cent. per month. But the defendants say Reed, the distiller, paid taxes on all the whiskey manufactured, and therefore no recovery can be had for the deficiency tax assessed for the months of December, 1868, March and April, 1869. On the other hand, the government claims that, as the distiller paid taxes only on what his returns show he actually manufactured during those months, and which was not equal to 80 per cent. of the distilling capacity of his distillery, the additional tax assessed on such deficiency, viz., on the number of gallons which the distiller's returns for those months was less than 80 per centum of the producing capacity of his distillery, as estimated under the provisions of law, is owing on this bond. The attention of the court is challenged by defendant's counsel to a decision made by the circuit court of the United States, in the Northern district of Illinois, fully sustaining the view urged by the defence, in the case of U. S. v. Singer [Case No. 16,292]. The district attorney challenges the attention of the court to the provisions of the internal tax law, of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 125], claiming that the decision cited is not supported by the statute. Sitting in a circuit other than that in which the case of U. S. v. Singer was decided, I am not at liberty to adopt the opinion in that case, if on examination I am satisfied that court has for any reason fallen into an error; and I am compelled to say, after carefully studying the sections of the law controlling this question, that in my judgment the distiller was liable to be assessed up to 80 per cent. of the capacity of his distillery, whether he manufactured that quantity or not.

Ordinarily, I would not, before a jury, enter into the reasons which control my judgment on the construction of a statute, but it is desirable in this instance. The rule that the different provisions of a statute should be made to harmonize if possible, is never to be lost sight of if we would reach correct views of a statute, the various provisions of which are apparently conflicting. The first section of the statute in question declares that "every proprietor of a still, distillery, or distilling apparatus shall be jointly and severally liable for the taxes imposed by law on the distilled spirits produced therefrom," etc. Section 5 requires every person engaged in distilling, or intending to so engage, to give notice in writing to the assessor of his district, stating the place, etc., of his distillery, the kind of stills, the cubic contents thereof, and all information to enable his capacity for distilling to be readily ascertained. Other sections require further specific information to be given to the assessor, designed to put that officer in possession of every fact necessary to enable him to make the exactions which the law commands from the distiller. The 10th section requires, in addition, that the assessor and another party, appointed by the commissioner of internal revenue, shall make a survey of the distillery, and "estimate and determine its true producing capacity." There is a provision that every distiller shall provide a warehouse, to be situated on and to constitute a part of his distillery premises, to be used only for the storage of distilled spirits of his own manufacture. The 19th section requires entries to be made, from day to day, in books to be kept for the purpose, showing truly, among other things, "the quantity of grain or other material used for the production of spirits," and other facts designed to aid in investigation into the quantity distilled. He is also, by this section, to render the assistant assessor, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each month, an account taken from the books, stating the quantity and kind of materials used for the production of spirits each day, and the number of wine gallons and of proof gallons of spirits produced and placed in warehouse. This is made on oath. There is a provision in section 22, whereby a distiller, on notice to the assistant assessor, may suspend work and have his distillery closed and locked by the officer. During the time it is so closed no tax accrues.

In view of all these provisions, the question is, What is the proper construction of section 20, which provides "that on return of the distiller's first return in each month, the assessor shall inquire and determine whether said distiller has accounted in his returns for the preceding month for all the spirits produced by him; and, to determine the quantity of spirits thus to be accounted for, the whole quantity of the materials used for the production of spirits shall be ascertained; and forty-five gallons of mash or beer, brewed or fermented from grain, shall represent not less than one bushel of grain. . . . In case the return of the distiller shall have been less than the quantity thus ascertained, the distiller . . . shall be assessed for such deficiency at the rate of fifty cents for every proof gallon, together with the special tax of four dollars for every cask of forty gallons, and the collector shall proceed to collect the same as in case of other assessments for deficiencies; but in no case shall the quantity of spirits returned by the distiller, together with the quantity so assessed, be for a less quantity of spirits than 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of the distillery, as estimated under the provisions of this act." Thus we find provisions which, viewed separately, would give different rules for taxing the distiller, but there is no conflict. The 1st section makes the distiller liable "on the distilled spirits produced." By the 19th section he is to render a sworn account of the "number of wine gallons and of proof gallons of spirits produced," etc.; and by section 20 the assessor is to determine whether the distiller has accounted in his returns for the preceding month "for all the spirits produced by him." All of which clearly indicates that the quantity actually produced is all that can be taxed. On the other hand, it will be noticed that section 5 requires the distiller to report such facts as the kind of still, the cubic contents thereof, and information for determining the capacity of distilling. Other sections have the same object. The 10th section requires a survey to be made and on it an estimate and determination of the "true capacity" of the distillery. Then the work may be suspended on notice, when the officer locks the still, etc., and no tax accrues while the works are thus closed; and finally, the last clause of section 20, that in no case shall the quantity returned by the distiller, in connection with the quantity assessed as deficit, be less than 80 per cent. of the capacity of the distillery as estimated. Here there is a clear requirement that the distiller shall pay on nothing less than 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery.

Now it is clear that these provisions can easily be reconciled. Thus, the tax shall be on the quantity actually produced whenever it equals or exceeds 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of the works; whenever, on the contrary, the amount does not equal that quantity, then the tax shall be on a quantity within 20 per cent. of the producing capacity; that is, on 80 per cent. The distiller is fully advised, by section 20, that if he enters into the distilling business he will be required to pay a tax on 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of his works. This is evidently designed to protect the government against fraud in the reports. It is no secret to any one that the devices and practices resorted to by whiskey manufacturers and others dealing in the article, to evade the tax imposed, have taxed the ingenuity of congress and of the revenue department to institute means which shall, in some degree, if not wholly, check such frauds. If the distiller is not able, for want of materials, to produce eighty per cent. of the capacity of his distillery, he may avoid any tax by giving the required notice and having his works put under lock and key. It is not presumed, under this law, that a manufacturer of spirits will keep his distillery in operation, month after month, when he is producing less than eighty per cent. of its capacity, as by doing so he must pay a larger tax than the business will afford.

The court does not see that when the actual amount produced is less than eighty per cent., the distiller must make a false return under section 19, for in such case he is to return the true amount produced, on oath, and to this he should add the deficiency, to make the eighty per cent. not in order to show actual product, but to form the basis of the tax for which he is liable to be assessed. We see no good reason for holding that the tax is to be on less than eighty per cent. of the producing capacity, simply because the provisions of the act are 'multifarious and complicated," nor because "the complex and expensive arrangements and safeguards to prevent fraud, thrown around the manufacturer of distilled spirits, could be dispensed with." The object of the legislation by congress was, undoubtedly, "to ascertain the product and thus compel payment of a tax on the whole of the article manufactured." But in view of the great inducements to fraud in rendering the accounts required to be made of actual product, and in view of frauds which had been practised, congress designed by this law to insure taxes on at least eighty per cent. of the capacity of the distillery—thus rendering the margin for frauds within the limits of twenty per cent. of capacity. Thus, it seems to me, we determine what the law is. With its justice or injustice the court has nothing to do, when once congress has said what the obligation of the distiller is. In brief, gentlemen, such are the reasons for holding that defendant Reed was bound to pay a tax on eighty per cent. of the producing capacity of his distillery; and if you find that he did not, then you will find what deficiency existed, and give a verdict for the government for the tax of fifty cents a gallon on such deficiency in each month, together with the per diem tax, the barrel tax, the penalty of five per cent., and the interest, at one per cent. a month, from the time when due.

I remark in conclusion, that my learned Brother Judge EMMONS, the circuit judge, informs me that he has already ruled in another district of his circuit substantially the point made in this case, holding in harmony with the conclusion I have reached. Thus forfeited, I cannot feel that the ruling in this case is other than is demanded by the statute.

The jury, without retiring, returned a verdict for the government for $3,049.94.

Case No. 16,136.

UNITED STATES v. REED.

[1 Lowell, 232.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1868.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—DISTILLERIES—NOTICE TO COLLECTOR—INDICTMENT.

1. The doctrine of charging an offence in the words of the statute, considered.

2. Section 25 of the act of 1866 (14 Stat. 154), requiring the maker of a still to be used for the purpose of distilling, to notify the collector where such still is to be used or sent, and by whom it is to be used, and of its capacity, &c., means that the maker of every still intended for distilling spirits within the United States must notify the collector of internal revenue of the district in which it is intended to be so used, of these particulars, and an indictment should supply the omissions of the statute, and allege the offence according to its true meaning.

3. A charge that the defendant made a still, "to be used for the purpose of distilling," and that the same was removed with the defendant's knowledge and consent "to a district within the said United States, to your jurors unknown, without notifying the collector of the district in which said still was intended to be used" of the requisite particulars, is defective for not alleging affirmatively that the still was intended to be used within the United States, and for distilling spirits, and that the defendant failed to give the notice, and that the district in which it was to be used was unknown to the jury.

[This was an indictment against William G. Reed upon the charge of violating the internal revenue law. Heard on a motion in arrest of judgment.]

H. D. Hyde, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

R. Morris, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. The defendant has been convicted under section 25 of chapter 184 of the statutes of 1866 (14 Stat. 154) for a failure to notify a collector of internal revenue concerning a still which he had made, and now moves in arrest of judgment for alleged defects in the indictment.

The law enacts, that any person who shall manufacture any still, to be used for the purpose of distilling, shall, before the same is removed from the place of manufacture, notify the collector where such still is to be used or sent, and by whom it is to be used, and of its capacity, &c., and if he fail to give such notice, he shall be fined. It is apparent that this statute leaves much to be supplied, and is not an easy one on which to frame an indictment. It means that when a still is made for the purpose of distilling spirits within the United States, the maker is to notify the collector of internal revenue of the district in which it is intended to be so used where it is to be used or sent, and when, and by whom, &c. I have underlined the words which the statute omits, and an indictment ought to supply them, or something which, to a common intent, will fairly express the same meaning. The general rule that the words of a statute are to be followed in an indictment is not absolutely and always true. On the one hand it is often sufficient, when the statute expresses a simple and clear meaning in one way that the indictment should give the same meaning clearly in another way. And on the other hand, when the statute is itself elliptical so that its meaning must be gathered from the context or from other parts of the same or other statutes, the indictment, which has not the advantage of such aids in its interpretation, must of itself allege a crime according to the true intent of the statute. Both these exceptions or explanations amount only to this, that the statute crime may and must be laid with reasonable certainty according to the true meaning of the law.

In this case the charge in the indictment is, that the defendant made the still at his shop in Chelsea, "said still to be used for the purpose of distilling," and that after it was made, the said still was removed with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, "to a district within the said United States, which said district is to your jurors aforesaid unknown, without notifying the collector of internal revenue of the district in which said still was intended to be used" of the requisite particulars.

This indictment fails to charge affirmatively, that the still was intended to be used within the United States, or for distilling spirits, or that it was the defendant that failed to give the notice. The statement that the collector of the district in which the still was intended to be used was not notified, is not an affirmation that there was any such district. Every fact here charged would be true of a still for making petroleum, and removed from Chelsea to Boston for shipment to Canada, and of a failure by the person who removed it to notify the collector, and of a still intended to be used in a district well known to the grand jurors; for their ignorance is of the district to which it was removed which is not averred to be the same in which it was intended to be used.

I do not find Here the certainty of allegation which the criminal law, wisely or not, requires in charging an offence. Judgment arrested.

UNITED STATES v. REESE.

[5 Dill. 405; [1] 8 Cent. Law J. 453.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Arkansas. May Term, 1879.

INDIAN LANDS—"LANDS OF THE UNITED STATES"—CUTTING TIMBER THEREON—GRANT OF LANDS BY TREATY—PENAL STATUTES.

1. The Cherokee tribe of Indians hold their lands by a title different from the Indian title

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

—by occupancy. They derived it by grant from the United States. It is a base, qualified, or determinable fee, without the right of reversion, but only a possibility of reversion, in the United States.

[Cited in U. S. v. Rogers, 23 Fed. 664; Re Wolf, 27 Fed. 615; Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas R. Co., 33 Fed. 905.]

2. The lands of the Cherokee tribe of Indians cannot, therefore, be held to be "lands of the United States," in the sense of the language used in section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

3. Penal statutes are to be construed strictly. If there is a fair doubt whether the act charged in the indictment is embraced in the criminal prohibition, that doubt is to be resolved in favor of the accused.

[Cited in U. S. v. Garretson, 42 Fed. 25.]

4. The treaty-making power of the United States can make a sale or grant of land to an Indian tribe without an act of congress.

5. Congress has no constitutional right to interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political.

The defendant is charged, by an information preferred by the district attorney, and filed on the 5th of April, A. D. 1879, with violating section 5388 of the statutes of the United States, "by unlawfully cutting timber on lands situated and lying in the Cherokee Nation, in the Indian country, in the Western district of Arkansas, which said lands, in pursuance of law, may be reserved and purchased by the United States for military or other purposes." To the information the defendant, by his counsel, filed a demurrer, setting up (1) that the matters and things stated in the information do not constitute an offence, and (2) that this court has no jurisdiction of the offence charged in said information.

W. H. Clayton, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Duval & Cravens, for defendant.

PARKER, District Judge. The first ground of the demurrer is the only one I propose to notice; because, if this act charged against the defendant is one which is declared an offence by the section referred to in the statement of the case, I have no doubt the court has jurisdiction. Of course, if it is no offence, then it has no jurisdiction to try and punish, because there is nothing to which jurisdiction can attach. It is conceded in this case that the timber charged to have been cut by defendant was cut on lands formerly ceded by the United States to the Cherokee tribe of Indians. There are certain things which make up this offence. These are the elements which enter into it, and go to constitute it. They consist of the positive acts of the party charged, as well as the existence of other facts, all of which must exist before it can be held that the defendant is subject to the penalty prescribed by the law. In this case there must be a cutting of the timber by the defendant. It must be unlawfully done—that is, done wrongfully, without authority of the United States or her agents. These are the positive acts of the defendant. In addition thereto, the cutting must be done on lands of the United States which, in pursuance of law, may be reserved or purchased for military or other purposes.

The pertinent question in this case is, Was this done upon "lands of the United States?" It is conceded that it was done upon lands which have been heretofore granted by the United States to the Cherokee Indians. Does the United States still have such a title to these lands as that they can be called lands of the United States in the sense of the law upon which this prosecution is based? If she has such a title thereto, this act of the defendant is a penal offence, and he is amenable to the punishment prescribed by the section above referred to. If she does not have such a title, this prosecution must fail, as being an act, although a gross outrage and a grievous wrong, not prohibited by law. To determine the question whether these are lands of the United States, requires a consideration of the title by which they are held by the Cherokee Nation. To any one who has given any attention to this subject, it presents a question not free from doubt or intrinsic difficulty. The Cherokee Nation of Indians derived their title to their lands from the United States by grant. This grant is by virtue of different treaties made between them and the United States. By the 2d article of the treaty of May 6, 1828 (Rev. Ind. Treat. 54), "the United States agrees to possess and guarantee to the Cherokees, forever, seven millions of acres of land, and this guarantee is hereby solemnly pledged." This land is a part of the country now occupied by them. On the 28th of May, 1830, congress passed a law, the 1st section of which provided that "it shall and may be lawful for the president of the United States to cause so much of any territory belonging to the United States, west of the river Mississippi, not included in any state or organized territory, and to which the Indian title has been extinguished, as he may judge necessary, to be divided into a suitable number of districts, for the reception of such tribes or nations of Indians as may choose to exchange the lands where they now reside, and remove, and to cause each of said districts to be so described by natural or artificial marks as to be easily distinguished from every other." Section 3 of said act provides "that in the making of any such exchange or exchanges, it shall and may be lawful for the president solemnly to assure the tribe or nation with which the exchange is made, that the United States will forever secure and guarantee to them and their heirs or successors the country so exchanged with them, and, if they prefer it, that the United States will cause a patent or grant to be made and executed to them for the same: provided, always, that such lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon the same." [4 Stat. 411.]

By section 1 of the treaty of the 14th of February, 1833 [7 Stat. 414], concluded between the Cherokees and the United States (Rev. Ind. Treat. 63), "the United States agrees to possess the Cherokees, and to guarantee to them forever, and that guarantee is hereby pledged, of seven millions of acres of land, to be bounded" as set out in said article. By the 3d article of the treaty of the 29th of July, 1835 [7 Stat. 478], it is provided "that the lands ceded by the treaty of the 14th of February, 1833, including the outlet and those ceded by this treaty, shall all be included in one patent executed to the Cherokee Nation of Indians by the president of the United States, according to the provisions of the act of May 28, 1830" [Id. 311]. In pursuance of the terms of this treaty, the president of the United States, on the 31st day of December, 1838, executed to the Cherokee Nation a patent for the seven millions of acres of land, for the outlet west, as well as the eight hundred thousand acres of land granted to them by the treaty of the 29th of July, 1835. The granting clause of this patent is as follows: "Therefore, in execution of the agreements and stipulations contained in the said several treaties, the United States have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant, unto the said Cherokee Nation the two tracts of lands so surveyed and hereinbefore described, containing in the whole thirteen million three hundred and seventy-four thousand one hundred and thirty-five and fourteen one-hundreths acres; to have and to hold the same, together with all the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, to the said Cherokee Nation forever; * * * subject, also, to all the rights reserved to the United States in and by the articles heretofore recited, to the extent and in the manner in which the said rights are so reserved, and subject, also, to the condition provided by the act of congress of the 28th of May, 1830, and which condition is, that the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States if the said Cherokees become extinct or abandon the same."

Now, the question arises, what kind of a title do these several treaties, and this law of 1830, give the Cherokees to their lands? If it were not for the treaty of 1835, the treaty of 1833 is broad enough in its terms to convey a fee-simple title. This treaty is subsequent in date to the act of 1830, which contained the clause that the lands should revert to the United States if the Indians "become extinct or abandon the same." There is no limitation to the title conveyed by the United States under the treaty of 1833. If such treaty is inconsistent with the law of 1830, it repealed so much of it as was inconsistent. Besides, the act did not make any grant; it only provided that it might be done.

The treaty-making power was not limited by its terms, as the authority to make a treaty with the Indian tribes was one which the treaty-making power derived from a source higher than an act of congress, to-wit, the constitution. And by this power the president and senate of the United States could make a treaty with any Indian tribe, extending to all objects which, in the intercourse of nations, had usually been regarded as the proper subject of negotiation and treaty, if not inconsistent with the nature of our government, and the relation between the states and the United States. This treaty-making power could make a sale or grant of land without an act of congress. It could lawfully provide that a patent should issue to convey lands which belong to the United States without the consent of congress, and in such case the grantee would have a good title. Holden v. Joy, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 247; U. S. v. Brooks, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 442; Meigs v. McClung, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 11.

Congress has no constitutional right to interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political. Holden v. Joy, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 247; Wilson v. Wall, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 89; Insurance Co. v. Carter, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 542; Doe v. Wilson, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 461; Mitchell v. U. S., 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 749; The Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 737; 2 Story, Const. § 1508; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 254; Crews v. Burcham, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 356; Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 562; Blair v. Pathkiller's Lessee, 2 Yerg. 407; Harris v. Barnett, 4 Blackf. 369. If title passed by the treaty of 1833, there were no restrictions upon it.

But it may be asked how could this title be held to be a title in fee when the word "heirs" was not used in the grant. At the common law, by a rule which in this country is purely technical, the word "heirs" is necessary. But this rule did not apply to grants to a corporation aggregate. The fee passed without the words "heirs or successors," because in judgment of law a corporation never dies, and is immortal by means of perpetual succession. 4 Kent, Comm. 7. This tribe of Indians may be regarded under the law as a corporation aggregate. It has been claimed by some that this title obtained under e treaty of 1833 could not be a fee-simple title because it was taken under the general law prohibiting the alienation of Indian lands, and that this was such a restriction upon the title as to take away its fee-simple character. But this act was not in existence until the 30th day of June, 1834. But it is said the treaty of 1833 did not operate to convey the lands described therein. This point is not entirely free from doubt. But it does seem to me that the words used in the 1st section of the treaty are sufficient to operate as a cession of the land mentioned in the treaty: "The United States agrees to possess the Cherokees, and to guarantee to them forever, and that guarantee is hereby pledged, of seven millions of acres of land." The United States agrees to possess what? Why, the land described. And to guarantee what, and for how long? Why, not the possession, but the land, and forever. It does seem to me that this was a cession of the land described. This opinion is confirmed by the language of the 2d article of the treaty of 1835. Rev. Ind. Treat. 68. It is: "The United States also agrees that the lands above, ceded by the treaty of February 14th, 1833." This language is a recognition of the cession of the lands. If they had already been ceded to the Cherokees forever by the treaty of 1833, then the agreement by the United States, by the 3d article of the treaty of 1835, to give them a patent for these lands, according to the provisions of the act of congress of May 28, 1830, was a mere nudum pactum. It was an attempt to place a restriction upon a title which had already passed, and which, according to the 1st section of the treaty of 1833, was to be evidenced by patent.

I am unable to see what consideration passed to the Indians to induce them to take a title of less grade, under the 3d article of the treaty of 1835, when they, by the terms of the 1st article of the treaty of 1833, had one of a higher grade. Now, unless the treaty was afterwards modified by some other treaty or law, and my construction of it is the correct one, it cannot be held that these lands of the Cherokees are "lands of the United States," in the sense of the language of section 5388 of the General Statutes. Although the construction may be at fault, still it throws some light on what must have been intended by the treaty of 1835.

But suppose the condition contained in the patent is valid—let us see what effect that has upon the title. The condition is that the lands revert to the United States if the said Cherokees become extinct or abandon the same. Now, the first of these conditions is one which would be silently engrafted on the grant independent of any express words. When there is a grant, and the grantee and his heirs become extinct, the land escheats to the state, whether the grantee be an individual or a body of individuals. In an ordinary patent, absolute from the government, the implied right of escheat to the sovereign lies behind the patent. In this case it is expressed. Therefore, that expressed condition does not take away the character of a fee-simple title. But the other one, against abandonment, does. This leaves the title less than a fee. But what character does it have? Blackstone (book 2, c. 7, p. 109) says: "A base or qualified fee is such a one as hath a qualification subjoined thereto, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. As in the case of a grant to A. and his heirs, tenants of the manor of Dale. In this instance, whenever the heirs of A. cease to be tenants of the manor the grant is entirely defeated. * * * This estate is a fee, because by possibility it may endure forever in a man and his heirs. Yet, as that duration depends upon the concurrence of collateral circumstances which qualify and debase the purity of the donation, it is, therefore, a qualified or base fee." Chancellor Kent (volume 4, p. 10, of his Commentaries) says: "A qualified, base, or determinable fee is an interest which may continue forever, but the estate is liable to be determined without the aid of a conveyance, by some act or event, circumscribing its continuance or extent. It is the uncertainty of the event, and the possibility that the fee may last forever, that renders the estate a fee, and not merely a freehold." If the condition attached to the fee is one which is certain to happen, then there is a reversion. If such condition is one which may never happen, there is not a reversion, but only a possibility of reversion. 4 Kent, Comm. 9; 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 90, pl. 86–88. Mr. Washburn (in vol. 1, pl. 88, p. 90) says: "If the estate be to A. and his heirs till B. comes back from Rome, the right to have it when he comes back is not a reversion, but a mere possibility. He may not come back, and if he were to die before he came back, the estate would become absolute in the grantee."

Here is a grant made to the Cherokees, having conditions which may never happen, and, in view of the facts that the Cherokee Indians are not likely to become extinct, and that they are now occupying the lands, with no intention of abandoning the same, there is only a remote possibility of either event happening. In such case there is not an absolute right of reversion in the United States, but only a possibility of reversion. There is a broad distinction between the rights of the grantee in case of a reversion and a mere possibility of reversion. When there is only a possibility of reversion, all the estate is in the feoffee, notwithstanding the qualification. 4 Kent, Comm. 11; 2 Bouv. Inst. § 1699, p. 220; 1 Washb. Real Prop. pl. 89, p. 90. This Indian title being a base, qualified, or determinable fee, with only the possibility of a reversion, and not the right of reversion, in the United States. all the estate is in the Cherokee Nation of Indians. I cannot, therefore, see how these lands, which have been depredated upon, can be held to be "lands of the United States," in the sense of the language used in section 5388.

It must be remembered that this is a penal statute, and it must, therefore, be construed strictly. In the office of the interpretation of statutes, courts, particularly in statutes that create crimes, must closely regard and ever cling to the language which the legislature has selected to express its purpose. And when the words are not technical, or words of art, the presumption is a reasonable and strong one that they were used by the legislature in their ordinary, popular, and general signification. Statutes enjoin obedience to their requirements, and, unless the contrary appears, it is to be taken that the legislature did not use the words in which its commands are expressed in any unusual sense. Therefore, the law is settled that in construing statutes the language used is never to be lost sight of, and the presumption is that the language used is used in no extraordinary sense, but in its common, every-day meaning. The legitimate function of courts is to interpret the legislative will, not to supplement it or to supply it. The judiciary must limit themselves to explaining the law; they cannot make it. It belongs only to the legislative department to create crimes and enjoin punishments. Accordingly, courts, in the construction of statutable offences, have always regarded it as their plain duty cautiously to keep clearly within the expressed will of the legislature, as otherwise they may hold an act or an omission to be a crime, and punish it, when, in fact, the legislature had never so intended. U. S. v. Clayton [Case No. 14,814]. Statutes creating crimes will not be extended by judicial interpretation to cases not plainly and unmistakably within their terms. If there is a fair doubt whether the act charged in the indictment is embraced in the criminal prohibition, that doubt is to be resolved in favor of the accused. U. S. v. Whittier [Id. 16,688]; U. S. v. Morris, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 694; U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; U. S. v. Sheldon, 2 Wheat [15 U. S.] 119; U. S. v. Clayton, supra. Therefore, in the face of these principles of the law so well sustained by authorities, if it does not clearly appear to the judicial mind that these lands granted to the Cherokee Indians are "lands of the United States," in the sense intended by its makers to be attached to the statute, then the act of the defendant is not one covered by the terms of the law, and he is not subject to its penalty. It is to be regretted that it cannot be held to be an offence, as the complaints of depredations upon the timber of the Indian lands are constantly being made to officers of this court. There is a class of men on the borders of the Indian country who revel in the idea that they have an inherent, natural right to steal from the Indians. This right is not to be questioned. They think it a tyrannical use of authority if they are interfered with.

There should be a law enacted, the penalty of which would teach persons that Indians have rights which should be respected as well as the rights of citizens. This is with the law-making power, and not with this court. That it is the right of congress to pass a law protecting the timber on the lands of these people, is clear; the duty of congress to do so, in the face of the pledges of the government of the United States, made by her treaties and her laws, to protect these Indians from unlawful intrusions from without, and from violations of their rights by any and all persons, is manifest.

If the law-making power will give us a law, we will lay its mailed hand upon its violators in such a way that the timber in that Indian territory will be protected from the rapacity of those who are now stealing it. It remains with us to execute the law, not to make it. And it is with regret that we must hold in this case that the offence, for the reasons already given, is not within the terms of section 5388. The demurrer is, therefore, sustained. Judgment accordingly.

Case No. 16,138.

UNITED STATES v. REESE.

[4 Sawy. 629.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. Oct. 9, 1866.[2]

FRAUD AGAINST UNITED STATES — FORGERY OF MEXICAN LAND GRANT PAPERS — PERJURY — JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—BAIL.

1. The first section of the act of March 3, 1823, for the punishment of frauds committed on the government of the United States (3 Stat. 771), applies only to instruments altered or forged for the purpose of obtaining moneys from the United States, their officer or agents.

[Cited in U. S. v. Moore, 60 Fed. 739.]

[Distinguished in U. S. v. Spaulding, 3 Dak. 85, 13 N. W. 362.]

2. There was no act of congress, previous to that of May 18, 1858 (11 Stat. 290), covering cases of the altering or forging of documents or title-papers, or the uttering or publishing them as true, for the purpose of establishing against the United States a claim to land in California.

3. It seems that an indictment found for an act which does not constitute an offense under the laws of the United States, is still "a suit, controversy, matter or cause depending," in which perjury may be committed.

4. Although there are no offenses against the United States, except such as are declared by special enactment, and the criminal jurisdiction of the circuit court is in this respect limited, yet it has jurisdiction to inquire into and pass upon all acts charged by competent authority to be public offenses, and presented to it by such authority for its consideration.

[Cited in U. S. v. Eldredge (Utah) 14 Pac. 45.]

5. If, whilst objections to an indictment are under consideration, the accused is admitted to bail, the recognizance will be of binding obligation though the indictment should eventually be adjudged void.

[Cited in U. S. v. Evans, 2 Fed. 150.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Eldredge (Utah) 13 Pac. 679.]

6. A recognizance of bail embracing the amounts required upon two separate indictments, is not on that account objectionable.

This was an action upon a recognizance of bail, and was tried upon stipulation of the parties by the court without the intervention of a jury, at the June term of 1866. The court found for the United States. The facts are sufficiently stated in its opinion.

Delos Lake, U. S. Atty. for the United States.

E. Casserly, for defendant.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. In December, 1856, Jose Y. Limantour was indicted by the grand jury of the circuit court of the United States for uttering and presenting as true to the board of land commissioners, created under the act of March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631], to ascertain and settle private land claims in the state of California, a false writing, purporting to be a grant of certain described lands from the Mexican government, with intent to defraud the United States, knowing the same to be false. To this indictment Limantour appeared and pleaded not guilty. He was then admitted to bail on motion of his counsel, the amount being fixed at $30,000.

Soon after the issue was thus joined, a motion was made on the part of the United States to set the case for trial early in January, 1857. This motion was resisted, and at the same time application was made on the part of Limantour for a continuance of the cause, and in support of the application his affidavit was read, in which he asserted the genuineness of the grant alleged by the United States to have been forged; and that it was made at the time and by the officers as averred by him. For alleged perjury in making this affidavit, the grand jury soon afterward found a second indictment against him. To this indictment he also appeared and pleaded not guilty, and upon the motion of his counsel was admitted to bail, its amount being fixed at $5000.

By order of the court the recognizance of bail was taken in one instrument, the obligation of the sureties being the amount required in both cases. The defendant Michael Reese and one Manuel Castro became the sureties of Limantour, binding themselves jointly and severally in the sum designated. It is upon this recognizance that the present action is brought. It recites the finding and presentment of the two indictments, the commitment of the defendant thereon, and the order of the court for his discharge on furnishing the required bail, and is conditioned that the defendant shall personally appear at the next term of the court, and at any subsequent term thereafter, "to answer all such matters and things as shall be objected against him," and to abide the order of the court, and not depart therefrom without leave first obtained. This recognizance is dated the fifth of February, 1857.

At a subsequent term of the circuit court in August of that year, the defendant appeared for trial in both cases, with witnesses in attendance from the city of Mexico. The district attorney thereupon moved for a postponement of the trials. At this time two cases of Limantour for land claimed under alleged Mexican grants were pending in the district court of the United States, on appeal from decrees of the land commissioners, by whom the claims had been confirmed. One of the cases was for a claim under the alleged forged grant. The witnesses in attendance were persons who had been brought from Mexico to testify in the land cases. It was therefore stipulated between the counsel of the parties: on the one side, that the postponement desired by the government should be assented to; and on the other side, that neither of the criminal actions should be brought to trial until after final decrees had been rendered in the two land cases by the district court; and if both or either of the decrees were in favor of the claimant, the criminal actions should be dismissed by the United States; but if the decrees were adverse to the claimant, reasonable time should be given him to prepare for the trial of the criminal actions, and to procure the attendance of such of his witnesses as resided without the state of California. The stipulation was entered on the minutes of the court, and the postponement desired was granted in accordance with its terms.

In December, 1858, the district court, by its decrees, rejected the claims of Limantour in the land cases [see Case No. 15,601]; and soon afterward the district attorney moved that the criminal actions be set for trial. After repeated adjournments, the motion was finally argued and decided in March, 1859, and the trials directed for the twenty-fifth of April following. On the latter day the two cases were called, but Limantour did not answer to the call in either of them, and the recognizance of his bail was ordered to be forfeited.

As a defense to the action, the defendant relies upon several grounds, the principal of which are: First, that the acts charged in the two indictments did not, at the time of their alleged commission, constitute any offense under the laws of the United States; and as a consequence, that the indictments and all proceedings thereunder, including the requiring of bail for the appearance of the defendant, were void; second, that if the indictment and proceedings thereunder were not void, the stipulation of August, 1857, for a postponement of the trial, released the sureties from liability on their recognizance; and, third, that the recognizance was void in embracing the amount required as bail upon both indictments.

The acts charged in the first indictment, the uttering and publishing as true the alleged forged grant, were undoubtedly deemed to fall within the class of offenses defined by the first section of the act of congress of March 3, 1823, "for the punishment of frauds committed on the government of the United States," and not under the act of March 3, 1825, as supposed by the counsel of the defendant. That section provides that "if any person or persons shall falsely make, alter, forge or counterfeit; or cause or procure to be falsely made, altered, forged or counterfeited; or willingly aid or assist in the false making, altering, forging or counterfeiting, any deed, power of attorney, order, certificate, receipt, or other writing, for the purpose of obtaining or receiving, or of enabling any other person or persons, either directly or indirectly, to obtain or receive from the United States, or any of their officers or agents any sum or sums of money; or shall utter or publish as true, or cause to be uttered or published as true, any such false, forged, altered or counterfeited deed, power of attorney, order, certificate, receipt, or other writing, as aforesaid, with intent to defraud the United States, knowing the same to be false, altered, forged or counterfeited; or shall transmit to, or present at, or cause or procure to be transmitted to, or presented at, any office or officer of the government of the United States, any deed, power of attorney, order, certificate, receipt, or other writing, in support of or in relation to any count or claim, with intent to defraud the United States, knowing the same to be false, altered, forged or counterfeited, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony; and being thereof duly convicted, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept at hard labor for a period not less than one year, nor more than ten years, or shall be imprisoned not exceeding five years and fined not exceeding $1000." 3 Stat. 771.

The indictment uses the language of the second paragraph of this section, and was supposed to cover a case embraced by its terms. But we are of opinion that the section applies only to instruments altered or forged for the purpose of obtaining moneys from the United States or their officers or agents. The first paragraph covers the altering or forging of such instruments; the second paragraph the uttering or publishing them as true; and the third their transmission or presentation to any office or officer of the government. Neither of them applies to an instrument forged for the purpose of obtaining a cession of land from the United States, or the confirmation of a claim to land alleged to have been granted by the Mexican government. There was no act of congress which reached a case of this nature until the eighteenth of May, 1858, when an act was passed covering all cases of the altering or forging of documents or title papers, or uttering or publishing them as true for the purpose of establishing against the United States any claim to lands in California. 11 Stat. 290. That act was passed, it is believed, in consequence of the defects in existing legislation, suggested by this case of Limantour.

As to the second indictment, there is much greater doubt whether the act alleged was not in fact at the time an offense under the laws of the United States. The objection is, that perjury cannot be affirmed of any testimony under oath upon an indictment for an act not constituting an offense, a position to which we are not prepared to yield our assent. The act of 1790 speaks of this offense as one which may be committed "in any suit, controversy, matter, or cause depending in any of the courts of the United States." We do not perceive how it can justly be said that the first indictment, with issue joined upon a plea of not guilty, did not constitute "a suit, controversy, matter, or cause depending."

But admitting that neither of the indictments allege acts constituting a public offense at the time of their commission, and that on a demurrer it would have been so held, the conclusion asserted by counsel does not follow that all the subsequent proceedings of the court thereon, including the requiring of bail for the appearance of the defendant, were void.

The circuit court of the United States has cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States. Judiciary Act of 1789, § 11 [1 Stat. 78]. Its cognizance is exclusive in capital cases and concurrent with that of the district court in all other cases; and although there are no offenses against the United States—except such as are declared by specific enactment, and the criminal jurisdiction of the circuit court is in that respect limited, yet the court having jurisdiction to inquire into all public offenses thus declared by law, must, as a necessary consequence, have jurisdiction to inquire into and pass upon all acts charged by competent authority to be public offenses, and presented to it by such authority for its consideration. The authority provided by law for making such charges and presenting them to the court is the grand jury of the district. Its special duty is to inquire into all public offenses against the United States committed or triable within the district, and to make true presentment of them to the court. The law does not assume the infallibility of this body, but provides for its possible errors arising from imperfect knowledge of the statutes, or a misapprehension of their provisions, or ignorance of the established forms of procedure. It therefore subjects such action, whatever it may be, legal or illegal, valid or void, to the supervision and correction of the court. When its action is presented, the jurisdiction of the court attaches to consider it, and to determine its validity. But the time and manner in which its validity shall be considered must depend upon the business pending and the established practice of the court. To the proper and efficient administration of justice there must be some order and system in all judicial proceedings. The party complained of has a right to be heard, and of securing the aid of counsel, if desired; time, therefore, to prepare his objections and procure his counsel must be afforded. If he claim that the action of the grand jury is illegal or void, he may ask to have the indictment quashed, or he may interpose a demurrer, or he may plead not guilty to the indictment and reserve his objections until the trial. But whether he pursue one course or the other, some time will be consumed, amounting in the great majority of cases to several days. If whilst these proceedings are going on, and the objections taken are under advisement, the defendant asks a discharge on bail, it is competent for the court to allow it, and the recognizance of bail given in such case will be a binding obligation, even though the indictment should eventually be adjudged void. The authority of the court to pass upon the validity of the action of the grand jury, and over the defendant whilst this validity is under consideration, is not an usurped authority, but an authority essential to the exercise of the general jurisdiction with which the court is clothed over all offenses cognizable under the laws of the United States.

The error of the argument of the learned counsel of the defendant consists in not distinguishing between the action of a court invested with this general criminal jurisdiction, and the action of a court having no criminal jurisdiction whatever. In the one case authority to inquire whether an act alleged to be an offense be in truth such offense, is an essential accompaniment of the jurisdiction over the act when once it is adjudged to be an offense. In the other case the attempt to inquire into the matter at all would be an act of pure usurpation. The argument of the counsel would be good if applied to criminal proceedings commenced in a probate court of the state, that court having no criminal jurisdiction whatever. If it were good when applied to criminal proceedings in the circuit court, such proceedings would be a constant source of apprehension to the officers of the court, and would often prove more injurious to them than to the defendant himself. And this singular result would follow: if the court should refuse to look into the indictment and to pass upon its validity, the judges would be justly censurable for neglect of duty; but if the court detained the defendant in custody whilst considering its validity, the judges would be liable to an action for false imprisonment if their ultimate decision should be that the indictment was void.

It follows that the court had authority to require bail of Limantour; and the recognizance in question is not void by reason of the insufficiency of the acts charged in the indictments. The condition annexed to the instrument is usual in such cases; and is not fulfilled unless the defendant personally appear as provided; unless he answer all matters then objected against him; unless he abide the order of the court; and unless he remain before the court until permitted to depart. A compliance with one or more of these provisions will not suffice; he must comply with all of them. It often happens that the indictment under which an arrest is ordered is set aside, or a nolle prosequi is entered, or a verdict of acquittal after trial is had, and yet in the progress of the case such evidence is developed as shows that an offense has been committed by the defendant which requires other and different proceedings. The condition of the recognizance is intended to meet all possible disclosures of crime, and to secure the appearance of the defendant to answer "all matters and things which may be objected against him;" and therefore he is not allowed to depart without leave of the court, although the particular ground of his original arrest may be removed. Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 15, § 84; State v. Stout, 11 N. J. Law, 124; Champlain v. People, 2 N. Y. 82. In this case the defendant, even if he had succeeded in obtaining a discharge from arrest upon the indictments, might perhaps have been detained to answer a charge for perjury or subordination of perjury in the land cases before the board of commissioners or the district court.

The stipulation of August, 1857, as observed by counsel, is most unusual in all its features, and yet under the circumstances may be justified. The grant alleged to be forged, and in swearing to the genuineness of which the forgery was charged, had been adjudged valid by the board of land commissioners, and the appeal from its decree was at the time pending undetermined. The postponement of the trial until this appeal was disposed of was a very proper exercise of the power of the court, provided the accused waived his right to a speedy trial and assented to the postponement. In this act we do not perceive any ground upon which the bail can claim exemption from liability on their recognizance. They were not bound to continue as sureties any longer from this circumstance than without it. They could at any time afterward have surrendered the defendant and been exonerated. In the theory of the law he was in their custody, as jailors of his own choosing, subject to be surrendered at any moment. If they failed to exercise their power over him they must bear the responsibility attached to the position they voluntarily assumed.

The objection that the decrees of the district court were not final at the time of the alleged forfeiture of the recognizance, because they were for five years subsequently subject to appeal to the supreme court, and to reversal by that tribunal, is untenable. The stipulation evidently had reference to the immediate action of the district court upon the appeals pending, and not to its possible ultimate action after the cases had been passed upon by the supreme court; nor did it contemplate a delay of five years from the entry of the decrees before the trials should be had in case no appeal to that tribunal was taken.

The objection to the recognizance that it embraced the amount required as bail upon both indictments is equally untenable. The indictments constituted the occasion for the arrest of the defendant, but the recognizance was not that he should appear in court and answer them, but that he should appear and answer "all matters and things" which might be objected against him. The fact that there were two indictments undoubtedly governed the court in fixing the amount of the bail; they constituted the moving cause, so to speak, of the action of the court; but they did not control the form of the recognizance, or determine the extent of the liability of the sureties. They are referred to in the instrument by way of recital to the conditions annexed, but in no respect qualify or restrain them.

We have given to the objections of the learned counsel of the defendant the most careful consideration, but are unable to perceive in them anything which will defeat a recovery by the plaintiffs. Judgment will, therefore, pass for the United States for the amount of the recognizance: namely $35,000, and costs.

NOTE. September 24, 1866. This case was taken to the supreme court of the United States, and was there reversed on a single point, viz.: that the stipulation of August, 1857, for a postponement of the trials until the appeals on the land cases were disposed of, released the sureties from liability on their recognizance. Mr. Justice Field wrote the opinion of that court, reversing his own decision on the point referred to. See 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 13.

Case No. 16,139.

UNITED STATES v. REEVES et al.

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1878.

QUALIFICATIONS OF JURORS—GRAND JURORS—PREVIOUS SERVICE.

1. Where a juror was summoned to the November term, 1876, and was impaneled and sworn on December 11, 1876, and afterwards was summoned as a juror to the November term, 1878, and was impaneled and sworn on December 14, 1878: Held, that he was not liable to challenge under section 812 of the Revised Statutes, although his service as a juror under the first summons extended to April 27, 1877.

2. Defendants who have not had any earlier chance to object to the composition of the grand jury by which they have been indicted, may do so by plea in abatement.

3. The fact that a grand juror had, on a previous summons, attended the court as a juror within two years, does not constitute such a disqualification under section 812 of the Revised Statutes as will render bad any indictment found by the grand jury of which he is a member.

A. H. Leonard, U. S. Atty.

W. F. Mellen, D C. Labatt, and Julius Aroni, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The pleas in abatement are based on section 812 of the Revised Statutes, which declares: "No person shall be summoned as a juror in any circuit or district court more than once in two years, and it shall be sufficient cause of challenge to any juror called to be sworn in any cause that he has been summoned and attended said court as a juror at any term of said court held within two years prior to the time of said challenge."

One plea alleges, in substance, that P. E. Bechtel was summoned as a juror at the November term, 1876, of this court, and was impaneled and sworn as a grand juror on December 11, 1876, and continued to serve as such grand juror until April 27, 1877; and that the same P. E. Bechtel was summoned as a juror at the November term, 1878, of this court, and was impaneled and sworn as a grand juror on December 14, 1878, and continued to serve as said grand juror until March 1, 1879, and until the indictment in this case was found and returned, and was of the panel by which said indictment was found and returned.

The other plea alleges that J. B. Glandin was summoned to serve as a juror in this court for the November term, 1877, and was sworn and impaneled as a petit juror in November, 1877, and served as such until January 22, 1878, and that said Glandin was summoned as a juror for the November term, 1878, of this court, and on December 14, 1878, was impaneled and sworn as a grand juror in this court, and continued to serve as such up to March 1, 1879, and was of the panel by which said indictment was found.

To these pleas the United States attorney has filed a demurrer on the ground that the same were bad in law.

As to the first plea, it is obvious to remark that the facts stated do not bring it within the terms of the section on which it is predicated. It does not appear from this plea that Bechtel was summoned "more than once in two years," nor does it appear that the juror has been summoned and attended said court as a juror at any term of said court held within two years prior to the time of said challenge. It does not appear from the plea precisely when the juror named was summoned, but it is stated that, in the first instance, he was summoned to the November term, 1876, and in the second to the November term, 1878. The period of two full years had elapsed between the beginnings of these two terms.

According to the plea under consideration, the juror was impaneled and sworn on the grand jury on December 11, 1876, and was not again impaneled and sworn until December 14, 1878, a period of more than two years. Even supposing he had been challenged on the day he was sworn, the challenge would have been ineffectual, for the juror had not been summoned and attended as a juror within two years, for at least a part of the term at which he last attended was held more than two years previously.

I do not think that the fair construction of this section is that twenty-four months must elapse between the close of the term at which a juror is summoned and serves and the beginning of the next term at which he is competent to serve. In this district this construction would render a juror incompetent for nearly two years and six months, for the November term of the court invariably lasts until the third Monday of April following. But the law in effect is, that he may be summoned as often as once in two years. It cannot be that the law allows a juror to be summoned as often as once in two years and at the same time forbids him to serve oftener than once in two years and six months. The juror named in this plea has not been summoned oftener than that.

This has, so far as I know, been invariably the construction put in this circuit upon the section under consideration. This plea is, therefore, bad, because the case of the juror named therein does not fall within the terms of section 812.

So far as the lapse of time is concerned, the second plea is not open to this objection. The grand juror named in this plea served on the grand jury by which the bill was found and also served on the grand jury impaneled in November, 1877.

As the defendants have not before now had an opportunity to object to the composition of the grand jury by which they were indicted, they may take advantage of any disqualification of any of the grand jurors by plea in abatement: U. S. v. Hammond [Case No. 15,294], and cases there cited.

The question is, therefore, squarely presented whether the facts set out in this plea render the indictment bad and liable to be quashed.

That depends on whether section 812 imposes a disqualification to serve as grand jurors upon persons who fall within its terms.

It seems doubtful whether section 812 applies at all to grand jurors, especially the second clause of the section, which declares: "It shall be sufficient cause of challenge to any juror called to be sworn in any cause, that he has been summoned and attended said court as a juror, at any term of said court held within two years prior to the time of said challenge." Grand jurors are not called to be sworn in any cause. They are sworn to investigate offenses against the criminal law generally, and causes which they institute where there has been no previous arrest are not in existence until their duty in reference thereto is fully completed and ended. The clause just quoted would not, therefore, seem to apply to them. It appears rather to be aimed at jurors taken de talibus circumstantibus—persons not regularly summoned as jurors, but called in as talesmen from the by-standers.

But, conceding that the entire section applies to grand as well as petit jurors, the question is, does the section impose such a disqualification on a grand juror as would render an indictment found by a jury of which he was a member bad?

It is easy to perceive that it was the object of congress, by the enactment of section 812, to secure the selection of jurors who were from the body of the district, and they should not be professionally or habitually called into the courts of the United States.

To effectuate this object they made two provisions, the first of which is a direction to those who select the array that they shall not summon any person who has been summoned within two years; and, second, that if, through ignorance of the facts any person should be twice summoned within two years, and should have attended within that period he might, when called to be sworn in any cause, be challenged. Congress has not seen fit to impose any consequence of invalidity upon verdicts, either by direct language or by necessary implication, when jurors were not challenged for this cause, who might have been.

The language of this section is guarded with great precision, and is in marked contrast with that of section 820. There is a distinction to be observed between a positive disqualification and a cause of challenge. Thus section 820 declares certain acts done by a person summoned as a juror to be a cause of disqualification and challenge. The use of the word "disqualification" has some purpose, and implies that there may be causes of challenge which are not positive disqualifications.

In U. S. v. Hammond [supra] I have held that section 820, by its very terms, rendered a juror disqualified, and thereby necessarily invalidated the finding of the jury in cases where there could be no waiver. But the language of the section now under consideration leaves the juror competent, not disqualified, though liable to challenge when called to be sworn, as manifestly as section 820 affects him with absolute disqualification.

In Munroe v. Brigham, 19 Pick. 368, Chief Justice Shaw makes this distinction, and held in effect that the fact that a juror was over the age of sixty-five years, which, by the law of Massachusetts, was not only a ground of exemption from jury duty, but also a ground of challenge by either party to the suit, did not absolutely disqualify the juror from sitting in the case, or furnish ground for setting aside the verdict returned by the jury of which he was a member.

I think the distinction rests on solid grounds. Pleas in abatement being dilatory are not favored. O'Connell v. Reg., 11 Clark & F. 155; Com. v. Thompson, 4 Leigh, 667; State v. Newer, 7 Blackf. 307.

In the case of People v. Jewett, 3 Wend. 321, the defendant and one Burrage Smith were indicted for having, with others, conspired without legal authority or justifiable cause to carry off and transport one William Morgan to a place unknown.

Objection was taken to the indictment that one Benjamin Wood, one of the grand jurors, had, before the finding of the bill of indictment, in repeated conversations declared that the defendant was concerned in the abduction of Morgan, aided in carrying him off, was guilty thereof, and ought to be punished therefor; and it was alleged that the defendant had not been apprised of any criminal proceeding against him, not having been arrested or required to enter into recognizance.

In reply to this objection, Savage, C. J., said: "The books are silent on the subject of such exception after indictment found, and in the absence of authority I am inclined to say, in consideration of the inconvenience and delay which would ensue in the administration of criminal justice were a challenge to a grand juror permitted to be made after he was sworn and impaneled, that the objection comes too late."

In the same case Marcy, J., said: "As the defendant was not recognized to appear at the sessions when the indictment was found, he did not know that any charge would be laid before the grand jury against him, and consequently he had no opportunity to object to the jurors before they were sworn and had presented their indictment. * * * Though I feel the force of the argument, that the defendant should be allowed the benefit of an exception to a partial grand juror, I cannot turn my view from the consideration of the great delays and embarrassments which would attend the administration of criminal justice if it was to be obtained in the way now proposed. No authority for adopting this course was shown on the argument, and I have not since been able to find any."

And in Munroe v. Brigham, supra, Chief Justice Shaw remarks: "Upon general grounds, unless presumptively required by statute, it would be inconsistent with the purposes of justice to allow such an exception to a juror. * * * Where no other incapacity exists, and no injustice is done, nothing but a positive rule of law would seem to require that a verdict should, on that account be set aside."

This authority is cited merely to show how reluctant the courts are to interfere with the indictments of a grand jury by reason of the unfitness of one or more of the grand jurors. Nevertheless, courts will interfere where there has been a positive disqualification imposed by statute. But as, in my judgment, the fact that the juror has served within two years as a juror in the court is not made by section 812 a positive disqualification, but only a ground of challenge, I do not think that it can be urged as a reason for quashing the indictment.

UNITED STATES v. REID.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 74.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

The validity of this claim is beyond question.

[Claim by Juan Reid for the Rancho Corte de Madera del Presidio, embracing one league of land in Marin county. Confirmed by the board of land commissioners, and appeal taken by the United States.]

S. W. Inge, U. S. Dist. Atty.

McDougal & Sharp, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The land claimed in this case is shown to have been granted to Juan Reid by Governor Figueroa on the 2d of October, 1834. The original title is produced, and the signatures duly proved. The expediente—a traced copy of which is filed in the case—contains the petition on which the grant and a record of the proceedings of the territorial deputation on the 2d of October, 1835, approving the concession previously made by the governor. It is also shown by documentary proof that judicial possession of the granted land was given on the 28th of November, 1835. It is also shown that previous to obtaining the grant, and subsequently until his death, the grantee resided with his family on the land, and that since his decease his family have continued to occupy the land.

The case seems to present one of the few instances where every requirement of the law has been fully complied with. No reason is perceived by the court or suggested on the part of the appellants for refusing to confirm the claim. A decree must therefore be entered affirming the decision of the board of commissioners.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

The validity of this claim not controverted.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was affirmed by the late board of commissioners. No additional testimony has been taken in this court, and the case has been submitted without argument or objection on the part of the United States.

The grant under which the claim is made was issued by Governor Micheltorena on the 20th of January, 1844. The signatures to the original document, produced by the interested parties, are fully proved, and the expediente is found in the archives and duly certified by the surveyor general. That the grant was made does not seem to admit of any question, and though from an error in drawing the diseño the positions of the San Joaquin river on one side and the serranias on the other are incorrectly delineated, and should be reversed, yet the calls in the grant, the natural objects mentioned in the diseño, the specification of the lindero or boundary of Higuera's rancho as one of the boundaries of the tract now claimed, together with the deposition of Hernandez contained in the transcript, are abundantly sufficient to explain and correct the error.

With regard to the occupation and settlement of the land, it is shown that the conditions were in that respect complied with within the time limited. The fact that owing to the depositions of the Indians the grantees were driven from their property after the murder of Linsay, cannot of course prejudice their claim. The mesne conveyances are proved and appear to be regular, and there seems to be no reason for reversing the decree of the board. A decree of confirmation must therefore be entered.

UNITED STATES v. The REINDEER.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1861.[2]

CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION—VESSEL ATTACHED BY STATE PROCESS — FORFEITURE FOR PRIOR ACT OF OWNER — SLAVE-TRADE — ACT OF MARCH 22, 1794.

1. A vessel was seized under the act of March 22, 1794 [1 Stat. 347], as being fitted and prepared for the slave-trade. At the time of the service of the monition by the United States marshal she was in the possession of a state sheriff, by virtue of an attachment issued from a state court. Held, that this court still had jurisdiction, because forfeiture of a vessel arises from the wrongful act of the owner, or some person in charge of the vessel, and wherever the forfeiture is made absolute by an act of congress. the forfeiture attaches at the time the wrongful act is committed, and consequently the owner is divested of his title eo instanter, and the same becomes vested in the United States.

2. The possession of a sheriff, under civil process, whether from state or federal court. will not defeat the operation of the revenue laws of the United States, or impair a forfeiture for engaging in the slave-trade, or for fitting a vessel for the same.

3. Under the first section of the act of March 22, 1794, a vessel is liable to be prosecuted and condemned for engaging in the slave-trade, in any of the circuit or district courts where the vessel may be found and seized. Therefore where a vessel had been fitted and prepared for a traffic of this kind in New York, it was held that she was properly condemned by the district court of Rhode Island, having been seized there.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island.]

This was a libel of information filed by the district attorney, in behalf of the United States, and claiming forfeiture of the vessel. It was founded on the first section of the act of March 22, 1794, the first section of the act of May, 1800 [2 Stat. 70], and the second section of the act of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 450]. The libel was filed in the court below, August 7, 1861, and the case came before this court on appeal from a decree condemning the vessel as forfeited to the United States. [Cases unreported.] It was alleged that the bark Reindeer, of the burden of two hundred and forty-eight tons, was, on the 26th of January, 1861, by a citizen or citizens of the United States, either as master, factor, or owner, fitted, equipped, and prepared, within the port of New York, for the purpose of carrying on the trade or traffic in slaves to some foreign country, contrary to the first-named act of congress. Other counts were contained in the libel which were drawn upon the other acts above named. According to the libel, the bark arrived at the port of New York on July 11, 1861, and it was alleged that she was seized by the collector of the port on the 1st of August following. Claim was filed by Gregorio Tejedor on August 19th, averring that he was the true and bona fide owner of the cargo, and the charterer of the vessel, and praying that he might be admitted to defend. He subsequently filed an answer, denying every statement of the libel. Certain other parties also appeared and made claim to the vessel, and were admitted to defend. They were David M. Coggeshall, sheriff of the county of Newport, and Henry P. Booth and James E. Ward, claiming the vessel as attaching creditors. Answer was also filed by them, denying all the material allegations of the libel, and also pleading to the jurisdiction of the court. In the ninth article of their answer they alleged that David M. Coggeshall, on July 1, 1861, and up to the time of the hearing, was sheriff of the county of Newport, and that on the 20th of that month, and again on the 26th, he seized and attached the bark, her cargo, apparel, and furniture, by virtue of several attachments duly issued out of the supreme court of the state; that he thereby became possessed of the bark, her cargo, &c., and that by reason thereof this court had no jurisdiction of the vessel or her cargo. They also alleged that the several acts in the libel charged to have been done were stated to have been so done in the port of New York, and not within the district of Rhode Island, wherefore they averred that the court had no jurisdiction of the charges. During the hearing, claim was also filed by the vice-consul of Spain, stating the bark, her cargo, &c., to be the property of Gregorio Tejedor, before named. Appeal from the decree of the district court to this court was taken by the sheriff of the county of Newport and the attaching creditors. Tejedor was allowed an appeal, upon condition of his filing a bond to prosecute the appeal, but he never complied with the condition, and did not perfect his appeal.

The following was a cargo list of the vessel:

A. Payne and Gilbert Deane, for appellants.

The United States court in admiralty has no jurisdiction in this case. The thing sought to be effected by the proceeding having been, at the time of the commencement of these proceedings, in the custody of an officer of the state court, that custody and jurisdiction is exclusive, and there can be no concurrent jurisdiction. Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 593, and cases cited; Pars. Merc. Law, 523. The supreme court of the United States has often decided the converse of this proposition in cases where the court acquired the first jurisdiction over the person or property, namely, that no state court can impede or oust the jurisdiction thus obtained, and that the same rule obtains where the jurisdiction of a state court has first attached. The fact that the marshal took manual possession does not affect the question, the state court never having renounced its jurisdiction and control. The United States government having granted to this vessel a clearance from the port of New York, and she having sailed under it and delivered her cargo in Havana, they are estopped from setting up or saying that the vessel was at that time fitted out as a slaver in the port of New York. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 207; Kennedy v. Strong, 14 Johns. 131. But if they were not estopped, the evidence is clear and uncontradicted that at that time she was fitted out for and sailed on a legitimate voyage. No forfeiture of vessel or cargo will be presumed; like other penal laws these will be strictly construed. Clark v. Strickland [Case No. 2,864]; U. S. v. The Emily and Caroline, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 381. The fitting out of this vessel, her apparel, tackle, or furniture, are neither of them within the language or the intention of the statute of 1794, and that statute does not confiscate the cargo. This case does not come within the prohibition of the statute of 1818, because the Reindeer did not sail from any port within the United States at the time she had on board this cargo which is claimed to be suspicious, and which furnishes the only evidence against her. It is under this section of the statute only that the cargo is affected by the intended or actual employment of the vessel. There is no evidence that a single article of cargo on the Reindeer, when she was seized, was put on her in New York. But the claimants have proved that every article of cargo was laden on her in Havana.

The only remaining question is that arising upon the statute of 1800, which declares: "It shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or for any person residing within the United States, to hold or have any right or property in any vessel employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another." The Reindeer has not been "employed in transporting slaves from one foreign country to another." The decisions of the court in The Alexander [Case No. 165] and U. S. v. The Catherine [Id. 14,755] fully sustain the position of the counsel for the claimants. The supreme court in U. S. v. Morris, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 473, define the term "employed," as used in the statute, as, "not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it, to be under contract or orders to do it." Applying this authoritative and common-sense exposition of the statute to this case, is there any pretence that the Reindeer was "employed" in the transportation of slaves? This vessel was not so "employed," "engaged to do it," "under contract to do it," unless the charter-party of Captain C. was valid; if he ran off with or stole the vessel, or violated his duty as captain, in signing that paper, then the vessel was not so "employed" while on her voyage to Africa or any other place, because there was no valid contract of employment. There is no evidence whatever that the owner of this vessel (Pearce) had any knowledge of the "employment" which it is claimed is to work a forfeiture; and the reasoning of the court in the case of U. S. v. The Catharine [supra], as well as common justice, shows that the property of no citizen can be forfeited without a voluntary crime on his part. The testimony of these pretended or professed experts should be entirely disregarded by the court. None of them have any knowledge on the subject on which they have testified. All of them speak from hearsay, and not from knowledge. Each of them contradicts the other, and they only say this cargo is one which might be proper for a legitimate or an illicit voyage. In such case the vessel is to be discharged. U. S. v. The Catharine. In no event can the cargo which is the property of a Spanish citizen be condemned. No law of congress authorizes it. International law forbids it.

Wingate Hayes, U. S. Dist. Atty.

The sheriff of Newport, and the said Henry P. Booth, and James E. Ward & Co. claim the vessel and cargo upon the ground that they had, before the marshal served the monition, attached the vessel and cargo as the property of Pierre L. Pearce. The claimants deny the jurisdiction of this court in this case, upon two grounds. 1. Because the vessel and cargo being, as they say, at the time of the service of the monition in the custody of an officer of a state court, that custody and jurisdiction is exclusive, and there can be no concurrent jurisdiction. 2. Because the offence having been committed, if at all, in the district of New York, the vessel was amenable to that jurisdiction only. Considering the questions of jurisdiction in their order, the libellants say:

This court has jurisdiction, notwithstanding the alleged attachment. The forfeiture of the vessel attaches at the time of the commission of the act inducing forfeiture, thereby eo instanti divesting the owner of all title, and vesting the same in the government. Hence the sheriff could not attach Pearce's interest, for he had none to attach. The alleged attachment was a nullity. That a forfeiture made absolute by statute dates back by relation to the time of the commission of the offence, and not to the date of the judgment, see U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 338; U. S. v. Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; U. S. v. Mars (affirms last case) Id. 417; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246; Certain Logs of Mahogany [Case No. 2,559]; The Florenzo [Id. 4,886]; Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366; Fontaine v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 11 Johns. 293; Roberts v. Wetherhead, 12 Mod. 92; Wilkins v. Despard, 5 Term R. 112; Conk. Tr. (Ed. 1842) 331. Possession by the sheriff under a civil process from a state court will not prevent the operation of the laws of the United States in cases of forfeiture, or oust the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States courts. The Florenzo [supra]; Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 609; Certain Logs of Mahogany [supra]. In the last-named case, Judge Story said: "No doubt can exist that a ship may be seized under admiralty process, for a forfeiture, notwithstanding a prior replevin or attachment of the ship then pending." If the doctrine contended for by the claimants be law, then the penal laws of the United States relating to revenue navigation, the slave trade, &c., will, by means of collusive attachments, be rendered null and void. Not a case has been or can be found sustaining the proposition of the claimants in cases of forfeiture. The case of Taylor v. Carryl [supra], and all the cases therein cited, refer solely to maritime liens such as seamen's wages, claims for collision, &c., where the state and federal courts generally have concurrent jurisdiction. The leading case of Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] does not refer nor is intended to apply to cases of forfeiture. Judge Taney's opinion in that case (page 609). The sheriff in fact exercised no control of the vessel after the service of the monition. The marshal removed cargo, and, as he swears, had exclusive jurisdiction. The libel is properly filed in this district. The district court of the district where the seizure is made has exclusive jurisdiction. The Little Ann [Case No. 8,397]; U. S. v. The Betsy, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 452; Keene v. U. S., 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 310; The Bolina [Case No. 1,608]; The Abby [Id. 14]. "The vessel is liable to be seized, prosecuted and condemned, in any of the circuit courts, or district court for the district where the said ship or vessel may be found or seized." Act March 22, 1794, § 1, being one of the acts under which the libel is filed. Judge Betts, in the case of The Kate [unreported], says: "The doctrine is clearly settled, that in prosecutions for penalties or forfeitures, evidence less than what would amount to probable cause, and which would only be a reasonable ground of suspicion against the party proceeded against, is competent and proper proof upon which such forfeiture may be adjudged, if not satisfactorily contradicted, or explained by countervailing proofs;" and cites Murray v. The Charming Betsey, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 122; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 488; The Josefa Segunda, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 338. See, also, The Catherine [Case No. 14,755]; The Josefa Segunda, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 312; The Struggle, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 71.

The Reindeer was found with a fit-out, preparation, and cargo, that indicated beyond all question that she was destined on a voyage for slaves. Though it is not necessary that the vessel should be completely fitted out, any preparation for the slave trade being sufficient (The Emily and Caroline, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 381; The Plattsburgh, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 133); yet in the case of the Reindeer, scarcely anything was wanting to indicate her complete fitment as a slaver. See case of The Plattsburgh, Id. 133. That the Reindeer was not on a legitimate voyage, but was bound for the coast of Africa for slaves, is evident from the ship's papers, especially the sea letter and manifest, and from the protest of the captain. The manifest declares the vessel to be bound for Falmouth for orders. The captain in his protest swears she was bound for Falmouth. The Spanish sea letter, enclosed in a sealed package, declares the destination to be San Antonio. Honest traders do not have conflicting papers. The cargo is neither adapted to the Falmouth nor San Antonio markets. At the present hearing, this fact is admitted; though the record shows that witnesses were cross-examined at length to prove that the cargo was suitable for either market. No evidence, however, has been offered by claimants to show the true destination of the vessel. The character and destination of the Reindeer is shown by her cargo. The character of the cargo always affords strong evidence. A cargo of cotton is presumed for some place of cotton manufactures; of molasses, not for Cuba, or of coals for Newcastle. The cargo occupies not over one third of the vessel, consisting chiefly of articles usually found on board slave vessels, and of some articles never found on board other vessels, but indispensable in slavers; nearly all the suspicious articles are disguised on the manifest, or not manifested at all. Not a tittle of explanatory evidence is offered, although the claimants could show the true destination of the cargo without difficulty. A bark of two hundred and forty-eight tons, bound to the coast of Africa, with a captain, crew, and two supercargoes, irons, chains, padlocks, sweeps, lime, biscuit, jerked beef, mess-kettles, sauce-pans, flag mattings, sponges, medicines (adapted in quantity and kind for a slave voyage), chloride of lime and disinfecting fluid,—all to obtain sixty-five wine pipes of palm oil! The vessel was fitted, equipped, otherwise prepared, and caused to sail, by Pearce, or Cunningham, her master, either as owner or master, for themselves or for some other person. The vessel was fitted, equipped, otherwise prepared, and caused to sail from New York, for the purpose of carrying on traffic in slaves. Unless clear and satisfactory explanation be furnished by the claimants to the contrary, it will be presumed that the vessel was fitted, equipped, prepared, and caused to sail, and intended for the purpose of carrying on the business in which she was found to be engaged. See rule of evidence in slave cases. Judge Betts's opinion in The Kate. The burden lies on the claimants to show this by clear and unequivocal testimony. The Catherine [Case No. 14,755]; The Josefa Segunda, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 338. The claimants have not even attempted to explain anything in relation to the cargo, its destination, the objects of the voyage, or the presence of Garcia and Pinto on board. They set up two antagonistic excuses: 1st. That the vessel was chartered to Tejedor. 2d. That she was sold by Pearce to Tejedor, and that Pearce knew nothing of her use; that in fact the bark was on a new voyage. The Reindeer, having been admitted to be owned by an American citizen, and proved to have been found employed in the slave-trade, must be condemned under the act of congress of May 10, 1800, § 1. A vessel bound for Africa, for slaves, is "employed" in the slave-trade, within the meaning of the act. The Catherine [supra]; The Alexander [Case No. 165]. A captain has a right to charter a vessel in a foreign port. Abb. Shipp., passim. If a vessel be so "employed," she will be forfeited, though the owners be innocent. U. S. v. The Malek Adhel, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 210. The act of 1800 was made to meet cases like this, where there were pretended transfers and other evasions. Where the proceeding is in rem, the vessel may be held guilty, whoever be the owner. Courts will not strain the law or facts to find loopholes for vessels, virtually admitted or proved to be slavers, to escape through. It is as much a violation of the law to fit out, prepare, and cause a vessel to sail for the purpose of selling or chartering her to be used as a slaver, as to use her one's self for that purpose; especially, where the risk of retention of the legal title, so as to get the protection of our flag, is run and paid for.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Two questions of jurisdiction are presented by the pleadings, which will first be considered.

It is insisted by the claimants that this court has not jurisdiction, because the vessel and cargo, at the time of the service of the monition by the marshal, were in the custody of the sheriff of the county of Newport, under a process of attachment issued from the state court. But the proposition cannot be sustained, for several reasons, which will be briefly stated. Forfeiture of a vessel arises from the wrongful act or acts of the owner, or some person or persons in charge of the vessel; and whenever the forfeiture is made absolute by an act of congress, the forfeiture attaches at the time the wrongful act is committed, and consequently the owner is divested of all title eo instanti, and the same becomes vested in the United States. Where the United States have an election to proceed against the vessel, as forfeited, or against the person who committed the wrongful act, no such consequences follow, until the election is made. Accordingly, it was held in Certain Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398, that the forfeiture of goods for a violation of the non-intercourse act takes place upon the commission of the offence, and avoids the subsequent sale to an innocent purchaser. But where an election was given to proceed against the vessel, or against the person who took a false oath to procure a registry of the vessel, the court held that the forfeiture did not take place until that election was made. U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 338; The Mars, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 417; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246; Certain Logs of Mahogany [Case No. 2,559]; The Florenzo [Id. 4,886]; Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366; Fontaine v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 11 Johns. 293. Evidently the case under consideration falls under the first branch of the rule; but the objection to the jurisdiction may be overruled upon another ground. Possession by the sheriff under a civil process, whether from a state or federal court, will not, in my opinion, defeat the operation of the revenue laws of the United States, or the laws imposing forfeiture for engaging in the slave-trade, or fitting, equipping, or preparing vessels for that purpose. The respondents rely upon the case of Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 609; but in the opinion of this court, the opinion in that case was never intended to be extended to cases of this description.

In the second place, it is insisted by the claimants that the alleged forfeiture is cognizable in the district court of the United States for the district of New York, and not in the district court for this district. Provision is made by the first section of the act of the 22d of March, 1794, that the vessel shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned, in any of the circuit courts or district courts where the said ship or vessel may be found and seized. "Where found and seized," are the words of the act; and while it is not admitted that the circuit courts have any original jurisdiction in such cases, not a doubt is entertained that the libel was properly filed in the court below, and that the case is now properly here on appeal. 1 Stat. 349; The Little Ann [Case No. 8,397]; The Betsey, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 452; Keene v. U. S., 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 310; The Bolina [Case No. 1,608]; The Abby [Id. 14].

Having disposed of the questions of jurisdiction, it becomes necessary to consider very briefly the merits of the controversy. Numerous positions are assumed by the respondents to show that the evidence is not sufficient to justify a decree of condemnation; but in the opinion of this court, it is full and complete, and substantially without conflict or contradiction. Her fitment, preparation, and cargo furnish very decisive evidence that her destination was such as is charged in the libel. That she was not on a legitimate voyage is strongly indicated by her papers. While her manifest declares the vessel to be bound to Falmouth for orders, the protest of the master states that she was bound for Falmouth, and the sea letter, which was enclosed in a sealed package, declares her destination to be for San Antonio; and the evidence shows that her cargo was adapted to neither place. No satisfactory evidence is offered to show where she was bound, but the clear inference from the facts and circumstances is that she was bound on a voyage for slaves. Nothing else can be inferred from her cargo, and such is the opinion of all the experts in the case. A specification of the articles composing the cargo is unnecesary, as they comprise nearly everything which is usually to be found in vessels fitted out for the slave-trade. Certain articles were not included in the manifest, and all or nearly all such were of the class to be found in vessels engaged in that trade. Suspicion also arose in the same direction, from the presence of certain passengers on board, and their conduct, and especially from the conduct of the master and owner.

All explanation is declined, and the claimants rely mainly upon insufficiency of the evidence adduced for the government. Under the circumstances, it is not thought necessary to present the details of the evidence, which would be merely to repeat what is very well stated in the brief of the libellant. Suffice it to say, that, after full consideration, I am of the opinion that the district court could not have decided otherwise upon the evidence. Extended argument upon questions of fact is of no service to either party, and except in cases of real doubt, it will not be attempted. Regarding the case as a clear one, I shall, without hesitation, affirm the decree of the district court with costs.

[The case was taken to the supreme court on an appeal, where the decree of this court was affirmed. 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 383.]

Case No. 16,145.

UNITED STATES v. The REINDEER.[1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June, 1848.

COD AND MACKEREL FISHERIES — BREACH OF LICENSES—FORFEITURE—CERTIFICATE OF PROBABLE CAUSE OF SEIZURE.

1. By the act of congress of February 18, 1793 [1 Stat. 305], "if any vessel is employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, such vessel shall be forfeited." By the act of July 29, 1813, special licenses were granted to vessels engaged in the cod fishery, and bounties were given on the vessels complying with certain conditions. By the act of May 24, 1828 [4 Stat. 312], special licenses were granted to vessels engaged in mackerel fishing. Under these statutes, and in fact, how far cod fishing and mackerel fishing should be considered different trades or employments, —quære.

[Cited in U. S. v. Paryntha Davis, Case No. 16,003; The Grace Darling, Id. 5,651.]

2. But whether cod fishing and mackerel fishing are, under these statutes and in fact, different trades or not, vessels under a license to catch cod will not be forfeited by catching mackerel, so long as the catching of mackerel is incidental merely, and not the main object of pursuit.

3. To work a forfeiture under these statutes, the old employment must have been abandoned, and a new trade must be permanently and exclusively pursued.

4. The seizure of a vessel, which under a cod fishing license, had incidentally caught mackerel, is a municipal seizure, expressly provided for by acts of congress as justifiable, if a certificate of probable cause is given.

5. A certificate of probable cause will be given, if the officer making the seizure acts in good faith, and has reasonable grounds to suppose that the law has been violated.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island.]

This was a libel, instituted in the district court on the 23d of June, 1847, in behalf of the United States and Edward Wilbur, collector of Newport, and others interested. It alleged, that the schooner Reindeer, on waters navigable for boats of twenty tons, within this district, was seized on the 21st of June, 1847, for a violation of the laws of the United States, inasmuch as that she was licensed by the collector of Newburyport for the cod fisheries, and, while so licensed, engaged in the mackerel fisheries, and thereby became forfeited. The answer was put in by William Stover, as agent for the owners, and averred: First, that the Reindeer had not been duly licensed for the cod fisheries, because, though enrolled for those fisheries, she had not asked for and obtained the previous examination and certificate which were necessary in the cod fisheries. Secondly, that if duly licensed for the cod fisheries, it was for one year, and that before the term expired she had a right to take mackerel, if time enough remained afterwards, as here, to fish for cod, the full period required by law. And thirdly, that a usage had long existed at that port to take out a cod license early in the season, and if mackerel were found in greater abundanee than cod, to catch them; but not to count the time spent in taking them, in order to obtain the cod bounty; and that this usage applied to all cases where catching cod was meant to be the permanent employment, and mackerel only incidental. That such was the intent and employment of the Reindeer in this instance, and the mackerel taken, being 130 barrels, were caught only under such circumstances and intent; that time enough remained to fish for and catch cod, if they were found, so as to complete the usual period for doing it in order to obtain the bounty; and if mackerel should have been caught till too late for that object, the cod license would have been surrendered, and no bounty claimed, and a mackerel license taken out. The evidence in this case on both sides was very voluminous, and in some respects conflicting. The substance of it will appear in the opinion of the court.

Dist. Atty. Burgess and Mr. Pearce, for the United States.

Choate & Hallett, for respondents.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. In this case, the evidence on the part of the United States showed, that the usual license for the codfishery issued to the Reindeer on the 5th of May, 1847, for one year; and that there was on file in the custom-house at Newburyport the usual certificate required of her inspection and fitness for the codfishery, bearing the same date. This certificate was made a prerequisite for the bounty by a circular from the first comptroller, dated February 22, 1842. It was further shown by the libellants, that the Reindeer had lines, hooks, gaffs, a machine to grind bait, and all the tackle suitable for the mackerel fisheries, with a large number of barrels and salt. Several witnesses on the part of the United States testified, also, that the South Shore fishery, where the Reindeer was employed, between the Capes of the Delaware and Cape Cod, was a mackerel rather than codfishery in the spring. That some other vessels in company with the Reindeer had mackerel licenses, and were equipped in like manner; and that since the act of congress of February, 1828, authorizing a separate mackerel license, it was not customary to fish for mackerel under a cod license. And it was contended, that the business of catching mackerel had so increased then and since, as to constitute a separate employment and trade.

[1] For the better appreciation of this case it should be stated, that fourteen fishing vessels, of which the Reindeer was one, that had taken refuge from a storm in the harbor of Newport, were seized at the same time, and informations filed against them separately, in the district court. Answers were put in. When the cases came on for trial, the government not being ready, the libels were dismissed. An appeal was taken to the circuit court, and allowed on the terms that the government should select one case as a representative case, the decision in which should settle all the cases. The government selected the case of the Reindeer, and the result is above given. The vessels were owned all along shore, and the great number of parties and the large amount in issue, as also the fact that the privileges of a class were at stake, gave the case great interest and importance.

On the part of the respondents, several witnesses testified that long before the act of 1828 it was customary, under a license for catching cod, to take mackerel if the latter offered in great numbers so as to make it more profitable, and to relinquish the bounty for cod in that event, if not fishing for the latter exclusively as long as four months in the year. It was farther shown, that in 1820 the secretary of the treasury issued a circular, requiring an oath, before receiving the bounty for cod, that four months at least had been spent in fishing for cod, without counting the time devoted to catching mackerel; and that most of the collectors who gave licenses to fishermen, had been in the habit of considering it legal still to take mackerel, when they appeared in abundance, though having a cod license, if catching the latter was only an incident to the former, or was not the chief employment contemplated when the vessel sailed; and that no forfeiture was claimed, if the time so spent in taking mackerel was not counted in order to obtain the bounty; that it was the usage since 1828 to issue a mackerel license in the first instance only, when the party had no intention to fish for cod during any portion of the time. It was further proved by the respondents, that different kinds of fish were often caught on the same ground; that one or the other would at times unexpectedly predominate; that if the opportunity to take the kind most plentiful was not at once improved, it was likely to be wholly lost by returning to port for a different license; and hence that a cod license was better for the success of the fisheries as a business, no less than for individuals, if other fish were allowed to be taken under it as an incident, or subordinate, when they offered in greatest abundance, and would not injure the government if no bounty was claimed on account of the time spent in taking other fish, whether mackerel, hake, or halibut. It appeared, moreover, that taking a mackerel license, under the law of 1828, as modified by that of 1836, though allowing the fishermen to catch any kind of fish most abundant, would deprive him of the bounty which was intended by the government, and was useful to encourage this nursery for seamen, if he happened to find cod most abundant, and devoted the proper time to catching them.

Some of the testimony showed it was customary, at certain ports, to deduct the time spent in catching other fish under a cod license, and some to deduct the whole trip. It was also proved that the Reindeer was equipped with tackle, &c., to take cod; though in the South Shore fishery so many spare lines and hooks are not needed, as on the Grand Banks, because so near the coast and places to receive supplies; that she was likewise prepared to take other fish, such as mackerel, if they offered in greater abundance, and that the general outfit in the South Shore fishery was much the same for cod and mackerel, except in the lines and hooks; that, in the cod fishery, fresh mackerel were caught always when practicable, for bait and for provisions on board, and that bait mills were often used; that the Reindeer had fished for cod daily, while at sea, since she reached the fishing ground, but had caught only a few quintals, and that mackerel had been the principal catchings, having been so abundant for three or four days of the time, while out, as to enable her to catch the large quantity she had on board; and that she had no intention to apply for the bounty, unless she fished for cod exclusively, before her license expired, the required length of time. It did not appear that any other instructions or circulars had been issued by the treasury department, bearing on this matter, than those before referred to; or that this seizure had been made by its direction, or after consulting it.

The present proceeding was founded on the 32d section of the act of congress of Feb. 18th, 1793 (1 Stat. 305). Among other things, that act provides, as to "any licensed ship or vessel," that: "If any such ship or vessel shall be employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, or shall be found with a forged or altered license, or one granted for any other ship or vessel, every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo found on board her, shall be forfeited." By this act, likewise, there is required an oath, "that the license shall not be used" for any other employment than that for which it is specially granted, and the license itself provides that the vessel shall not be employed "in any trade or business, whereby the revenue of the United States may be defrauded." The 4th section of the act also requires a bond to be given, to pay a penalty, if the "vessel has been employed in any trade, whereby the revenue of the United States has been defrauded during the time the license granted to said ship or vessel remained in force." Id. 307. Whatever may be the reason for the provision to forfeit the whole vessel, if engaging in any "other trade," it partakes more of the severe spirit of the last century, than of the present age, to impose so heavy a penalty for so slight an offence. The 5th section had already provided that any license should be in force, only while the vessel was owned by citizens, and not "in any other business or employment, than that for which she is specially licensed." But it did not forfeit the vessel in such cases, affixing such a severe penalty, only when the license was forged, or used for a ship not originally intended. The 32d section, however, extended the forfeiture to all those cases, however light, but whether by inadvertence or design, is conjectural, and, to my mind, somewhat doubtful. To ascertain the real object of this harsh enactment, considering it as designed, is very important, in order to decide correctly whether it has been violated in the present instance. It can hardly be supposed, that so severe a penalty could be designed to punish a departure from a mere custom-house regulation, for the purpose of having accurate statistics or returns of the quantities of tonnage engaged in different branches of business. On the contrary, congress probably was looking more to the coasting than fishing licenses, both being embraced in the same law, and was regarding more the danger likely to be caused to the revenue, by the former engaging in the foreign trade and smuggling, rather than by the latter drawing bounties from the treasury, when in a different employment or trade from that of catching codfish. Hence it was made very penal to engage in what was different, so as to endanger the treasury by smuggling. So far as looking to the fisheries, it was designed, doubtless, merely to prevent getting bounties, without the training and exposure connected with the codfishery, as a great nursery for seamen. It looked, likewise, to security against bounties being obtained, when fishermen did not bring into the country the additional food and wealth, drawn from the depths of the ocean, in that fishery, and which it was a national object on that account, also to foster; or when they did not labor in competition with rival nations, encouraged by bounties in that fishery, and who would otherwise become triumphant over ourselves, and exclude us entirely from that great mine of riches and nautical skill.

The whole spirit of the penal part of the law and of the policy which led to it, so far as regards the fisheries, seems then to be to visit so severe a punishment only on those, who seek to obtain the public funds and public favor, while engaged in pursuits not made the object of those funds and favor. But if no forfeiture is incurred by such a culpable departure from the object of the statute, other consequences less penal may properly flow from a non-compliance with the laws, and were doubtless intended to be visited. Being engaged otherwise than the license specifies, whether it happen by fraud or misconception of the laws, or even by accident and mistake should probably deprive them of the bounty, though having a license valid on its face, because they would not do what is by law a condition precedent to the bounty. So, if engaged in one branch of business alone, but with an invalid license, it would prevent them from having the rights and privileges of an American ship, as contradistinguished from a foreign one. That is, she would be obliged to pay duties on tonnage and light money, like a foreign vessel, which once were very heavy, and she must do this, because suitable American papers from the custom-house are alone allowed to exonerate vessels from such duties. That is virtually the effect of the 4th section before quoted, the license merely becoming null in such cases. See U. S. v. Rogers [Case No. 16,189]. And perhaps the chief object in requiring all American vessels to take such papers, was to furnish due evidence of such exemption, rather than preserve accurate data of the amount of tonnage employed in different branches of business, and from the different ports and states. But the failure to obtain the exemption from duties, would seem to be the usual and a sufficient punishment for neglect to take out valid papers. Something more ought to be done, and of a more dangerous character, before exacting a forfeiture of a vessel. In the case of a coasting vessel changing her employment to the foreign trade, which it is the chief object of the 32d section to prevent, the circumstances are very different. There the change is easily defined and understood, and the danger to the revenue by smuggling foreign goods on board is much enhanced, and hence a forfeiture in such a case may often not have been too severe. But in case of a vessel, licensed for the cod fishery; not changing her employment to either the coasting or foreign trade, so as to increase the facilities for smuggling; not making any change from the general business of fishing, compared with other employments in navigation, so as clearly to come within the penal provision at all; not asking nor receiving any bounty so as to injure the treasury while taking mackerel, rather than cod; not committing nor even alleging in the libel that she meditated any fraud, much less offering clear proof of either; and being induced to take papers and fish as she did, by advice of the revenue officers, and by long usage at the port whence sailing; all this surely makes out any thing but a plain case for inflicting such a severe penalty. If by strict law a penalty can be deemed thus incurred, it must be only where the facts show the vessel engaged in a different employment, and that the different employment was followed manifestly as a different trade, and under circumstances conflicting with the spirit as well as the letter of the act of congress. That this last is the proper rule in the construction of such penal statutes may be seen in the following cases. The Enterprize [Case No. 4,499]; 3 Cow. 89; [Wilkinson v. Leland] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 662; [Minor v. Merchants' Bank of Alexandria] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 64; [Elliott v. Swartwout] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 151; U. S. v. Kimball [Case No. 15,531]; Taber v. U. S. [Id. 13,722]; U. S. v. Wonson [Id. 16,750]. But while adopting this rule, I do not of course hold, that ignorance of the law is an excuse for the owners in violating it, though that ignorance existed in both them and the officers of government. "Ignorantia juris non excusat."

But some might doubt here, whether it was not ignorance in part of the fact, which led to this course; of the fact, that catching mackerel for a few days without abandoning the codfishery, was a different trade or employment; and ignorantia facti excusat (2 Coke, 3b; Plow 343; Broom, Leg. Max. 122); or at least they might doubt whether it was not a mixed point of law and fact of which they were ignorant, and as to which they might therefore be excusable, penally.

Again, as to the defence here connected with the long usage. An usage or custom which violates an express law, created by statute or perhaps any other way, may not protect one who breaks the law. See Taylor v. Carpenter [Case No. 13,785]; Noble v. Durell, 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 271; U. S. v. Buchanan, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 83. Certainly not, either instance, in civil cases, and from civil and not penal consequences, unless both parties, by an agreement or an usage, known and acted on publicly, and which virtually dispenses with the law so far as regards their own private rights, gives efficacy to the agreement or usage, without a strict conformity to a statute. Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 326; [Bank of Washington v. Triplett] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 25; 2 Burrows, 1221; [U. S. v. Tappan] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 420. A party may, by assenting to a custom or usage, waive his rights under a statute; and in this way, too, may make a thing legal, which otherwise might not be "Consuetudo pro lege servatur." See cases, 2 Bac. Abr. "Customs," C. A public officer, however, possesses no power to dispense with the penal provisions of a public law, whether from usage or a mistake in its construction; and an offender cannot claim an exemption on that ground, when prosecuted criminaliter. Usage can be proved, also, to explain whether a voyage has been properly pursued or not under an insurance. Noble v. Kennoway, 2 Doug. 510; 1 Burrows, 341; 1 Camp. 503, 508, note. What course in certain places it may be customary to sail; in what manner a trade may be carried on at anchor, and probably what fish may be captured without amounting to a deviation, can all be proved aliunde the policy, and will protect the insured while acting within the usage. So usage to construe a law in a particular, is some evidence that the construction is right, or should remain. U. S. v. McDaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 14.

But there is another aspect of this objection, which possesses more force by its rebuttal of the criminal intent, necessary to constitute guilt in most cases. It is often very doubtful, whether an act can be deemed penal, where all the customary and natural presumptions of guilt, sufficient when standing alone to convict, are repelled, and every criminal intent is expressly disproved. See The Harriet [Case No. 6,100]. If long silence on the part of the public organs to complain, does not, as in private affairs, often give consent ([Bank of Augusta v. Earle], 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 591; [Holmes v. Jennison] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 577), it is certain by a general rule, that there must be a malus animus in the accused to constitute an offence (U. S. v. Libby [Case No. 15,597]). An evil intent, to be sure, is to be inferred often from certain acts, and among them one is wilfully doing what the law forbids. 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 457; 2 Adol. & E. 612; Strange, 1146; 5 Burrows, 2667. Yet it deserves consideration, if shown that the circumstances, under which the act was done, rebut all intention to violate the law, whether punishment is proper; and it is very questionable, whether they do not constitute a perfect defence to the prosecution criminaliter. See The Emden, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 16. See also, cases of contraband on board, not known to the master or owner (1 C. Rob. Adm. 67, 104; 3 C. Rob. Adm. 143, 178), and U. S. v. Libby [supra], where persons came on board, not known to be slaves. In all these, the penal intent being wanting, the prosecution failed. So where, by advice of counsel, one swore to the truth of his schedule, though certain property was withheld under a supposed right, the case was considered to lack the criminal intent, necessary to constitute perjury. U. S. v. Conner [Case No. 14,847]. If the circumstances contradict the gist of the charge, this should be a bar to the prosecution, and not a mere ground of appeal to the uncertain mercy of the pardoning power. All are familiar likewise with the rule in cases of imputed fraud, that it is to be proved and not presumed, and the necessity which exists, of a fraudulent intent, generally, even to avoid proceedings, in civil matters on account of fraud. And no general maxim is sounder or more frequently applied to crimes—not civil liabilities—than "actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea." 3 Inst. 107. See cases, passim.

But I do not despair of the libel on these grounds alone, as they might be deemed in some respects novel, and are not necessary. Yet they appeal strongly to the court in favor of a liberal construction to protect a confiding class of people, who, in this case, did the acts complained of under the sanction, if not advice of the officers of government themselves, that had the execution of this branch of the laws in their charge, and who did these acts in conformity to a custom construing these laws in that manner in those places, very uniformly from the period of their enactment. Nor do I dwell on the hardship to honest, plain men being visited by penalties for breaking laws when adhered to, as read or interpreted erroneously to them by the public officers. That, however, furnishes a strong reason, by means of contemporaneous and long construction, to show that such a construction was the true one. Stuart's Case, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 299. The fact, too, of its open existence for such a length of time, rebuts any intent of citizens, by conforming to it, to do what is wrong by such conformity, and is another powerful argument in favor of adhering to this construction. Thus, Lord Ellenborough, observes: "It has been sometimes said, communis error facit jus; but I say, communis opinio is evidence of what the law is, not where it is an opinion merely speculative and theoretical, floating in the minds of persons, but where it has been made the groundwork and substratum of practice." Isherwood v. Oldknow, 3 Maule & S. 396; Garland v. Carlisle, 2 Cromp. & M. 95; Co. Litt. 186a. It becomes a very grave question, where law-makers and law-executors have long slept over conduct, as if not a departure from the law, whether the construction should suddenly be changed, and really innocent persons be insnared and prosecuted by a new construction. [Adams v. Jones] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 210. "Cotemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege." 7 East, 199; 4 East, 327.

Finally, a construction so long and publicly prevailing, and this by the sanction of the local officers, and without any dissent by the treasury department, through instruction, correspondence or circulars, operates strongly in its support. 3 Atk. 576; 10 Ves. 338. "Quod non valet ab initio, tractu temporis valet." 1 Dod. 394, 395. And it is fortified even by the silence of congress itself, not legislating more specifically to prevent it, when knowing, as it must, the views which its own officers and the community had taken of the proper construction of the existing laws. Nor does this conclusion violate what seems a true rule to reach the proper construction, and enforce the real design of the law; because, under all the circumstances, what would appear to be the most appropriate course to settle, under the 32d section, the design or meaning of the words, "different trade, or employment"? Surely to adopt a construction, not departing from what has been long sanctioned, unless a contrary one is inflexibly required by law; surely the broadest and most liberal views, to sustain what accords with usage, and what prevents a forfeiture where no penal intent has existed. The design chiefly intended by this penalty, having, as already shown, been to prevent fraud on the revenue, the Reindeer, unless attempting that in some way, has not violated that main design. She had never asked for the bounty before or since her seizure, and no evidence exists that she ever meant to, even if continuing permanently to fish for mackerel, or if not fishing exclusively for cod, at least four months of her license, that being all the time required by law.

The cases which have so often been complained of, in and out of congress, in connection with the fisheries, are all of a different character. Those, where the bounty has been obtained by adding the time spent in catching mackerel to that spent in catching cod, and thus obtaining a bounty as well as drawback on the pickled mackerel, which the law did not in terms or spirit allow, led to the original circular of 1820, requiring an oath on that point, and led to actions for recovering the bounty back from 1829 to 1832. 3 Sen. Doc. No. 120, A. D. 1833, Report of Treasury Department. Others, which supposed unsuitable vessels for fishing on the Grand Bank, were fitted out, and the bounty obtained by not much either of exposure or fishing, led to the circular of 1841, requiring an inspection as to the condition and fitness of the vessel when licensed.

The precedents of these descriptions, then, apply to a state of facts radically different, and none of them stand in the way of exonerating these respondents from this penalty. But there are other strong reasons to show, that a forfeiture has not been incurred here. Two leading objections exist to a forfeiture in this case, besides the minor ones specifically examined already, and besides, that the spirit and design, as well as words of the law, contemplate no forfeiture when there has been no fraud on the revenue attempted, or no probability of fraud. They are, that by the letter of the law, the vessel must resort to a different employment from that named in the license, and follow it as "a trade," that is, as a business with permanency and constancy, or she cannot be condemned; and neither of these clearly happened here. Looking to general considerations and general principles, I should doubt much whether the catching of mackerel rather than cod is a different general employment, as it is still fishing, as much as the catching of cod was fishing. The case of a different general employment, in The Active, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100, was that of transporting merchandise for hire, and this to parts unknown, and in violation of other laws. That was not only a distinct general employment, but required a different outfit, and fewer men training; as few for a vessel of 300 tons as for a fisherman of 80 tons; and hence not within the spirit of the bounty, to form a nursery for seamen; while in the present case, catching mackerel was not only the same general trade of fishing, but required a like outfit and like number of men. The bounty, to be sure, could not be claimed for the time spent in catching mackerel, because the act of congress gave it only for catching cod, and allowed a drawback for the salt used in pickling the mackerel, when they are exported, instead of a bounty. But still this does not impair the position, that for other purposes, and in other views, the employments, as employments, are similar, as being in the fisheries, and those of a like character as to outfits, skill, and habits. The words "trade," and "employment," should have a fair construction, looking to the complicated and mixed character of the business, and not a construction metaphysical or insnaring. 5 Mass. 380; 15 Mass. 205; 4 Mass. 534; 12 Mass. 253; 7 Mass. 310, 523; 3 Mass. 215; 11 Pick. 487.

In most cases, "trade" is used in the acts of congress as contradistinguished from the "fisheries," rather than being a term applicable separately to every kind of fishing. Thus they speak of vessels engaged "in the coasting trade, or fisheries." 1 Stat. 7, 94, 360, 288. In most cases, also, of penalties, a word must mean in its commercial sense what would be a violation of the law, and not merely in a technical or etymological sense. See cases as to "sugar," "teas," &c. Taber v. U. S. [Case No. 13,722]; U. S. v. Breed [Id. 14,638]; [Scott v. Lloyd] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 438; [U. S. v. One Hundred and Twelve Casks of Sugar] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 277; [Elliott v. Swartwout] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 150. And before a penalty should be deemed incurred, a transaction must come within both the word and the spirit of the law, as shown in the cases before cited. Such a construction would require us here, independent of the usage, to consider the employment or trade in fishing, not a different trade when it related to the same general business. So perhaps, though employed in a branch or ramification of fishing different in name, but not different in character, exposure, risks, and training. More especially would this be the proper construction, if it had been, as here, contemporaneous, long in force, and acquiesced in both by the public officers and congress. Still more proper would it be, if no fraud had been attempted under it, and no danger existed by it, not being without ample guards against any injury by it to the revenue or the treasury. And finally, what other construction could be expected to be put on the law, by the plain fishermen for whose government it was made, than that a different trade or employment from theirs was one not of fishing; and who, ever since this class followed their honest labors on the Lake of Galilee, have been accustomed to consider fishing, without reference to the kind of fish, as one general trade or employment; contradistinguished, for instance, from agriculture or manufactures, or the navy or merchant service. Such a class of citizens would seldom trouble their minds with metaphysical distinctions, and never think of cutting up the fisheries, like the polypus, into as many different trades as there were countless species of fish to be caught, from the sprat or alewife and smelt, to the halibut and whale. In short, it is all practically regarded as the trade or employment of fishing, rather than the coasting or foreign trade; and it seems conclusive on the preference of such a construction, if, beside all this, the different branch of business pursued was only incidental and temporary, or only subordinate, and not intended to be exclusive of the other, unless longer pursued and ultimately substituted for the other, and without then claiming any peculiar privileges or benefits belonging to the first branch. It is believed that of this last character was the catching of mackerel by the Reindeer in the present case while sailing under a codfish license. This is a question of fact as well as law on the facts. Now, in point of fact here, the cod and mackerel fisheries on the South Shore were so much alike as to require similar equipments and supplies, except in lines and hooks, and here she started with hooks and lines for cod as well as mackerel. Here she was certified to be suitable in strength and tackle for cod, and took the proper papers for catching them. Here, by positive evidence, she actually caught several quintals of cod, and fished almost daily for more. She had devoted but a few days to mackerel catching, though during those days they were found in great abundance, and most of her catchings had therefore been of them. She had come to no determination, however, not to fish more for cod, or not to devote exclusively four months to it before her license expired. There was yet ample time for doing this during her license, and during the fishing season. She had applied for no cod bounty whatever, and had evinced no intention to apply for it, unless fishing exclusively for cod full four months during her license. The case of The Harriet [Case No. 6,099] was just the reverse of this on the facts. The Reindeer also could not include the time, if she wished to do it, while catching mackerel beyond what she needed for bait and food, unless committing perjury through her owners or officers. The treasury had not thus, or in any other way, been defrauded, nor was it likely to be. To be sure, a door was open to it, as is always the case in all voyages, but perjury is not to be anticipated or presumed in any of them; and the guards, beside oaths, are strong, by information by revenue cutters, who speak these vessels, and write to the various ports where they belong if they are catching mackerel; and and examination of their cargo and crew, if suspected, can likewise be made. Often too in the end the fruits of their employment are the strongest witnesses by which to know what it has been. Nor is the government injured if pickled mackerel are on board beyond the quantity needed for provisions and bait, because time will be deducted equal to that probably spent in catching them, on account of the drawback likely to be obtained on them if exported, and the manifest impropriety of getting both that and a bounty for cod during the same period. So that full time must and can be left for the cod bounty, and full time for catching the mackerel, on which a drawback may be obtained. In this way, also, the government lose nothing, as it means to pay the cod bounty when four months have been spent in toils and dangers, and also allow the drawback on pickled mackerel, when caught in other periods not included in the time counted for the cod bounty.

There is also a great gain to individuals and the public in this construction, as well as no tax to the treasury beyond what the law meant to impose. More fish are caught by the same number of persons, in the same voyage and same space of time. If cod offer, they can be taken; if mackerel, they can be taken; and this is not properly forbidden or ridiculously tabooed till the vessel can go back to port and obtain a different license, and the fish in the mean time have escaped to other seas. It is national as well as private economy to take at once whatever fish offer which are valuable and abundant; and the revenue cannot suffer thereby, if the times devoted to such are kept separate, and the case is not falsified by perjury so as to avoid detection of the real truth. But nothing of this last description had happened or been attempted here, and hence no fraud actually practised, which should work a forfeiture of the vessel. It is supposed, however, by the libellants, that notwithstanding these general reasons for not considering the catching of mackerel, as in the present case, a different trade from the catching of cod, as intended by the act of congress of 1793, it is meant to be regarded as different by the act of 1828. Without any judicial decisions on this point, I should have been inclined to hold, that though different for some purposes under the act of 1828, it is not by that act or any other declared to be different so as to incur a forfeiture, if pursued when under a cod license, and if no attempt is made to compute the time towards the four months required to obtain the cod bounty. But if the adjudged cases hold otherwise, and if, because mackerel are not the same specific fish caught, and not placed under the same specific license as cod since the act of congress of 1828, nor rewarded nor encouraged by congress in precisely the same form, these differences amount to enough to constitute in law a different trade or employment; then the next and last general defence to be relied on here is, that the catching of mackerel in the present instance had not been pursued long enough and exclusively enough to violate the act of 1793, and incur a forfeiture of the vessel. In other words, that here, the catching of mackerel, as a trade, had not in fact been followed as a separate employment or trade, distinct from that of catching cod, and the latter abandoned. If it had, though no bounty had yet been demanded for the time so spent, and none may have been meant to be, it is argued that the act of congress has been violated, and the forfeiture incurred. It is supposed by the libellants, that both of these principles were settled against the respondents in the case of The Nymph [Cases Nos. 10,388 and 10,389]; and have been again confirmed in the case of The Harriet [Case No. 6,099]. See, also, The Active, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100; The Eliza [Case No. 4,346].

I do not feel disposed here to go into and impugn the law on this subject, so far as actually settled there, though the construction adopted was very vigorous for a penal prosecution. In my apprehension those cases do seem to decide the first objection against the respondents. They hold that now the mackerel fishery, when exclusively pursued as an employment, constitutes a distinct employment from catching cod; and that though this was not the rule formerly, it is so since the act of 1828, granting a mackerel license, reinforced by the act of 1836, permitting all kinds of fish to be taken under a mackerel license 4 Stat. 312; 5 Stat. 16. The reasons of this construction do not all strike me with force as already explained; and besides that, a mackerel license is only "authorized," but not required by the act of 1828. But supposing those reasons to be sound for the purpose of the inquiry in the present case, the other question, how far on the facts the catching of mackerel must be followed, in order to constitute a separate employment or trade in it, or in other words, to make one be considered engaged in it as a trade, was not decided there, except on the particular facts of those cases. The facts there differ materially from those here. The facts in the case of The Nymph, which is the leading case, are in some important respects so unlike those here, as to require and fully justify very different conclusions, as to the mackerel catching having become a different trade on board the vessel. There, the time spent since the vessel sailed, had been so long devoted to mackerel, as not to leave enough to become entitled to a cod bounty, though the rest of the term should be devoted wholly to codfishing. The fact was entirely the reverse here. There, likewise, more than half the whole period of the license had been devoted to a different species of fish than the license covered. But here not one eleventh of the whole period of the license had been so devoted; and but a few days, very successful ones to be sure, of only the thirty-two or three since she had reached her fishing ground. There, in fine, the catching of cod seems to have been long and entirely abandoned, while here the catching of cod had been continued or attempted almost daily, up to the seizure, though not with great success. But ample time was still left for it to be successful, if fish offered; and yet to be pursued exclusively quite four months before the license expired. It is not a fault in the vessel if cod do not bite; provided the crew try to catch them, they fulfill their duty. In point of fact, there as well as here, the employment or trade, originally licensed or contemplated, viz., the catching of cod, had not here been abandoned, and another employment or trade assumed instead of it. In The Harriet [supra], Justice Story says, as to the fact of pursuing another kind of fishery as an employment, such as the hake fishery, so as to incur a penalty,—"Before I should be prepared to adopt such a conclusion, I should require the most determinate and satisfactory evidence, that the hake fishery was intentionally and exclusively carried on during the season, as a principal employment of the Harriet, in contradistinction to the cod fisheries." So the case of The Nymph no less than The Harriet, concedes, that a vessel under a cod license may pursue other business, which is incidental, or which does not amount to an entire change of her original business, being as a species of interlude, or an "aside," or parenthesis in it. She may catch mackerel, for instance, for bait, or for food on board ship, any thing which is incidental, merely. But beyond that, if, in doing what is incidental, she happens to strike such large schools, as to pull in more than are so needed at once, it cannot be that she must halt midway in their biting, and refrain to pull in one extra mackerel, or forfeit the whole vessel. That is a kind of self-restraint not to be expected of a fisherman. On the contrary, the true meaning of the case of The Nymph, especially as explained in The Harriet, corresponds with what is a rational view of the act of congress itself, that to constitute a different trade or employment. other fish-catching must not be carried on for so long a time, and to such an extent as to become a new permanent business, and the old one appear to be abandoned. Such clearly had not become the case here, where this seizure took place, whatever it might possibly have become before the voyage would have ended, if undisturbed. It may happen frequently that much can be done in one trade or employment, which is not strictly incidental or closely attached to that, yet so entirely subordinate to it as not to be considered a new trade or employment. It is occasional, and not constant or permanent. As in most professions or trades pursued by individuals, other business, like agriculture with lawyers or physicians, or some mechanic art with farming is at times attended to, not as a distinct or separate trade or calling, but as a minor or subordinate business, mixed with the other when leisure may permit, or taste or relaxation require it. The other avocations also may be profitable, but still they are not the profession or business of the individual, unless the principal pursuit is abandoned or changed for them. That is the test. Thus in The Harriet, large quantities of hake were fished for and caught. But that was not enough. It must become an exclusive employment. Justice Story said:—"If under color of a codfishery license, the mackerel fishery was in fact carried on as an exclusive employment, the practice was an abuse of the license," &c. The Nymph [supra]. But it was only these. This is a rational view, looking to the whole subject-matter.

From the very nature of ocean fisheries, where so many different kinds of fish abound, and live in the same seas and latitudes, and even on the same feeding grounds, the fisherman is often compelled, in some degree, to take different kinds of fish, whether he seeks them or not. The same hook, bait and line will answer for several different kinds, and till they come to the surface, or are drawn into his boat, the fisherman cannot determine which he has caught. To be sure, where different hooks and lines are necessary, then the chance is greater with him; but the technical departure from the strict license of the law, as to cod alone, is committed in either case. But in either, can the law be so harsh, unless he makes a real and permanent change in his trade or employment, as to punish him with a penalty for catching any thing except cod? or require him to throw into the ocean again every thing which is drawn to the surface, except cod? As if he derived his right to catch any kind of fish in the ocean from government, instead of God and nature, and was a criminal, if not confining himself to such fish alone, as congress specially permits in any one license. However valuable the halibut, or hake, or mackerel, or however fine a whale offers on the coast, he is not voluntarily, if impelled by the ruling passion, to hook, or harpoon, or catch him in any way in his power, and add so much to the common wealth of the country. No, what the law forbids, is fraud, is evasion of the revenue, is an entire change of business, permanently, without duly following it up, with a change of papers or license, as soon as is convenient and practicable.

But the law, in a case like this, never meant to restrain capturing what was wild, and taking "the good the gods provide," when no prior rights of others are violated. Nor can one or two indulgences of this kind, or parts of one or two weeks thus employed, while in the pursuit of codfishing also, though with less success, be regarded as making it a new and exclusive and permanent employment, and the former one as abandoned. To forfeit the whole vessel, there must be a clear departure from the law, a clear change of business, as a business, and not acts of a temporary and subordinate and innocent character in interludes, and under a strong temptation, and without injury to any one. But the evidence here does not show an entire abandonment of one employment, and an exclusive occupation in another. There is still another difficulty in connection with this. I entertain doubts whether this seizure was not in every view premature, and it certainly was before sufficient proof existed of any intent, either to defraud the revene, or change the employment for the voyage as a voyage. It seems to me, that in a penal law, where a forfeiture is demanded for a change of employment, without a new license, the government and its officers before seizure, must wait till it becomes clear that no new license to cover the change of employment, if at sea, is meant to be taken out, as well as that the employment has been permanently changed, so as to require a new one. In such cases, the change of fishing happens on the ocean, where the old papers of the ship cannot be surrendered, and new ones taken out. It is an exigency which must be improved at the moment to take other fish, when offering in large numbers, or not take them at all. The argument ab inconvenienti, by a different course could hardly be stronger in any case. The bounties of Providence are to be slighted, and its gifts refused, or the other fish must be taken, and nobody injured thereby. Why not let them be taken in such a tempting crisis; in such an opportunity to add to national and individual wealth; in such a privilege of hunting and fishing on the great highway of the world, as is not per se wrong, and belongs to all mankind, by nature and the law of nations? Why is such an act to be punished as a crime, and the useful fisherman, when indulging in it, to be insnared by penalties, before he can come home with his honest earnings, and change his license, if he has been induced to change entirely the employment contemplated when he sailed? The object of the license seems to some extent to have been misconceived. We have no royal fish here like the whale on the coasts of England, belonging to royalty, and to be taken only under licenses from government, or used only by the government. The real object of the license here is, not to confer a right to catch any animal that swims in the ocean, that right being derived from a higher source than government. 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term. R.] 437; 2 Branch, 472; Gro. de J. B. c. 2, § 2, note 3. And it is protected by the law of nations, on the ocean; and even on its shores it belongs here rather to the regulating sovereign power of the States, than of the general government. See U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge [Case No. 15,867], and citations there. But the license, or the action of government in respect to it here, is merely to confer an incipient claim, if afterwards duly perfected, to receive a bounty or drawback, and to be exempted from certain duties imposed on vessels not duly registered, enrolled, or licensed as American vessels. There is a case (U. S. v. Rogers [Id. 16,189]) where a vessel, engaging in a new trade, on going to a new place, different from that licensed or stipulated, was held even to cease to be American, so that a revolt on board would not be punished by American courts. Generally as to duties on tonnage, they must also be paid as if foreign vessels, unless having proper American papers, and any question as to the bounty cannot be decided, till the voyage is ended, or till it has gone so long as to show clearly what must be its principal employment, and hence whether the claim to it should be enforced. It is not merely that a locus penitentiæ exists till his voyage has ended, which was the case of the Nymph, and no change in papers was there made or proposed; but it is that till the voyage is ended or chiefly ended, no decisive evidence is usually furnished, whether the business or trade has been permanently changed or not; and whether the vessel has still time enough left to fish for cod alone, so as to be entitled to the bounty, or means during the season to change the license, so as to correspond with any new employment permanently pursued.

By various considerations, the character of the employment in fishing during most of the voyage, is to fix it for the trip or season, and not its character for a few weeks, or even months, perhaps short of a majority of the whole. Hence, in the case of The Harriet [Id. 6,099], the court looked to the new or changed employment, "during the season." And though the words of the act of congress are, shall not, &c., "during the period for which licensed," do thus and so, yet it would be too narrow, if construed so as to require them to do this for the whole period, in order to commit an offence, instead of some time within the period. This done, some time must, however, be continued, sufficient to give a character to the act. The new employment must be long enough, or so clearly different, as to show a permanent change in the vessel's business. See The Harriet [supra]. A rule like this, requiring clearly a new permanent employment or trade, is clear as laws should be, and not vague, nor uncertain, like "some," or "considerable" other employment. It is also the common sense aspect of the subject, the only practical one which has any fixed principle as a guide. Like questions of domicile, this looks to intents, as well as acts, to decide whether a change has occurred; see Burnham v. Rangely [Case No. 2,176]; and intents not ambiguous, and acts not equivocal, but both clearly developed in favor of a permanent change of trade. In the case of The Active, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100, the fishing was utterly abandoned, and a cargo of produce or merchandise taken in, doubtless, for the foreign trade, and a sailing commenced in the night for ports unknown, and in violation of the embargo law, and at a place where new papers could be at once obtained, if desiring and entitled to them. This showed clearly, not only a new trade or employment resorted to in that case, but permanently, and without any view of taking out a new license to cover the new trade and the new illegal voyage. See, also, U. S. v. The Mars [Case No. 15,723]; The Eliza [supra].

In the present case, no new trade was permanently and exclusively pursued; no determination had yet been formed or evinced to abandon entirely the old employment, and, consequently, no occasion had yet arisen to decide whether to take out new papers, or to attempt it, or not. The seizure, therefore, was premature. It was before the facts showed clearly that a forfeiture was proper, and that a violation of the 32d section of the act of 1793 had been manifestly committed. It is the end which usually crowns the work, and which usually must unite to designate the nature and character of the voyage. Taber v. U. S. [Id. 13,722]. By these conclusions we are happy not to come in collision with any sound principle, or any precedents.

It ought, perhaps, to be added here, that the inspection on file at the custom-house, showing that the Reindeer was well manned and equipped for the codfishery, prevents her from being acquitted on the first ground set up in the defence, that she never had been duly inspected as well as licensed. It may not prove that the owners requested it, but that the inspection was duly made, is clear. Something ought perhaps to be said as to some general features of the case, which have been urged earnestly in the argument, and some of which relate to the existence of probable cause or not for filing these libels. On the one hand, the idea of instituting qui tam actions, or extorting forfeitures of vessels from fishermen, merely because they caught some other fish than cod, while sailing under a cod license, without intending or attempting to count the time to obtain a bounty while so employed, and without intending to abandon the codfishing while finding cod to catch, during the rest of the voyage without changing their regular employment, or if changing it, without meaning not to change their license as soon as they returned, probably never entered into the heads of congress, and certainly not of the treasury department. The last does not appear ever to have given any such instructions, nor to have been consulted on the present occasion, nor made any attempt to take a penal advantage of any innocent error.

But the seizure appears to have been made by subordinate officers; and in their behalf, it is some excuse, that they had been concerned in another district in the seizure of the Nymph, and had some reason for supposing that the conduct of these vessels was not legal on account of its similitude, in part at least, to what was censured there. No wanton wrong was, therefore, probably intended by these seizures, though they were very disastrous ones, and hardly necessary in anywise till the voyage and season were ended, considering how much of it remained, and that the vessels all belonged to ports near by. Certainly it is a great misfortune, that some fourteen of these vessels, without any consultation or advice from the proper department, so easily communicated with, should, early in their voyage,—quietly at anchor in the harbor of Newport, their grand rendezvous in bad weather,—be all, with 130 men, on board, seized like outlaws and foreigners, and a whole year's industry in many cases frustrated if not destroyed, though known to belong to a neighboring state, where they could be prosecuted after their voyage was ended, if doing wrong, as was the Nymph, the case relied on for a precedent. While, under all these circumstances, it is difficult to suppress sympathy in behalf of so hardy, and honest, and gallant a race of men, as the American fishermen, and while courts in all cases, and as to all classes, should feel anxious to protect innocent intentions and honest industry, and particular services, from severe penalties, intended only for illegal attempts on the treasury, or for wilful and wanton departure from the laws, the community may be assured that any self-willed or fraudulent evasions of the acts of congress can never be entertained by this tribunal.

Believing in this case, however, that no breach of the laws was really meditated or committed, I am happy to be able, on legal principles, to relieve the owners from the entire loss of their vessels, which, in addition to their other disappointments and onerous expenses in the vindication of their rights, would be so fatal to them. As in this case, also, I shall always be most happy to find, that acts of the citizen, which the officers of the government have long considered as lawful, and have long allowed to be done with impunity, and which, so done openly for many years, have never been by new proceedings more clearly forbidden by congress, can be shielded from prosecution and forfeiture, by a fair construction of the laws, and without any new or peculiar danger to the revenue.

It is a further consolatory reflection in this case, that if congress wishes to have the law different from this construction, it is very easy to effect it, though it should be unfortunately by throwing new restrictions and difficulties in the path of the honest fisherman, and new obstacles in the rearing up, in this fine nursery, more of our young men to fight the battles of the republic on the ocean; and by imposing new burthens on them in competition with this more privileged class in other countries, and new penalties and forfeitures, though not trying improperly to draw bounties or drawbacks, but only to exercise freely on the waves the sacred natural right from Providence, of taking every fish, which may offer, for their own advantage, as well as for the increase of our national wealth and greatness.

The libel must be dismissed.

This case was argued at Providence, November, 1847, and the opinion delivered there in June, 1848, at an adjourned term. At Newport at the regular session, during the same month, a decree was made that the libel be dismissed, without any taxable costs against or in favor of either side. But in the district court the claimants had paid certain fees of the clerk, marshal, &c., which in all the fourteen cases depending amounted to the sum of $588. This they moved to have refunded, and opposed any certificate of probable cause for the seizure to the officers who made it, and who had applied for such a certificate.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The court considered it proper, that the claimants of the vessel, discharged on the merits, should not be compelled to pay any kind of costs. Unless by a positive requirement of statute, an innocent party ought never to be mulcted in costs any more than in damages. It was hard enough when acquitted to be deprived of costs, and would be much more so if forced to pay costs. The decree will therefore be, as to all the fees of officers from the commencement of this case, that they be paid as the act of congress of Feb. 28, 1799 [1 Stat. 624], directs: which is in substance, that the officer informing must pay them when the vessel is not forfeited, unless the court certifies that a reasonable ground existed for the seizure. If they certify that, then the fees must be paid by the United States. This provision was made to protect the officer, when acting in a public capacity, if he appears to have acted reasonably, and on probable grounds of belief that the laws had been violated. This course is not burthensome to the government, while it is just to their agents if faithful. The only remaining inquiry here is, were they faithful? and are they entitled to such a certificate? That those officers erred in this case, has already been decided by us. But that is not enough to deprive them of such a certificate, or officers never could have one. Because it is only in cases of error that they need a certificate. What then is the true test as to the propriety of granting one? It is, that though the seizure was wrong, there was ground for suspicion of a breach of the law. Locke v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 339. Here, a large quantity of mackerel on board, and only a small quantity of cod, furnished some such ground. Another test is, whether, though the property seized is discharged, real doubts exist as to the true construction of the law. U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 311. Here such doubts existed, according to the opinion of the court heretofore delivered, and the forfeiture was overruled only after a careful scrutiny and serious difficulty in construing the law supposed to be violated.

Still another test is, whether the officer informing appears to have honestly entertained an opinion, that the forfeiture had been incurred. Otis v. Watkins, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 339. Here, though the seizure was a most unfortunate one for the owners, for reasons before assigned, yet nothing of malice or oppression is disclosed under all the circumstances. No rivals in the mackerel fishing or mackerel selling appear to have interfered and instigated the seizure, but the captain of the cutter, who informed, seems to have acted from his former experience, in the case of The Nymph. He appears, however, to have overlooked the fact, that the voyage there had advanced much further, and the change of employment to have become certain and fixed; and he does not seem to have been aware of the subsequent doctrines laid down in the case of The Harriet, that a forfeiture is not incurred, unless another kind of fishing is pursued, so long and so exclusively as to show the old kind abandoned, and a new one substituted, not merely subordinate or temporary. We do not see, however, but that he acted in good faith, and had reasonable grounds to doubt whether the law had not been violated. It is suggested, finally, that this is a municipal case, and that no power exists to give a certificate in such a case. Dunl. Adm. Prac. 309. But if that impression was correct, the certificate could do no harm. It is, however, a case connected with the revenue, with shipping papers to affect the national character of the vessel, and the tonnage duties imposed on her, and sometimes the duties on the fish brought in, whether American or foreign. A prize case, or a seizure jure belli, needs no certificate for protection, if probable cause in truth existed. The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 1; The Marianna Flora, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 1. Probable cause, however, is no justification of seizure in a municipal case, as contradistinguished from a prize case, unless some statutory provision makes it so. The Appollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 373; The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 1. But the present case is one of those municipal seizures, expressly provided for in several acts of congress, as justifiable, if certificate of probable cause is given. See Acts of March 2, 1799, § 89 [1 Stat. 695]; 28th Feb., 1799 [1 Stat. 622]; 24th Feb., 1807 [2 Stat. 422]. And if the certificate be refused in such cases, the party seizing is liable in damages. The Appollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 373; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246. Let a certificate of probable cause be prepared.

Case No. 16,146.

UNITED STATES v. REITER.

UNITED STATES v. LOUIS.

[4 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 534.]

Provisional Court,[1] State of Louisiana. July, 1865.

WAR—BELLIGERENT OCCUPATION—AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT.

1. At the time of the establishment of the provisional court for Louisiana, a considerable part of the territory of that state was held by the forces of the United States, in armed belligerent occupation.

2. In a country so held, the authority of the occupying force is paramount, and necessarily operates the exclusion of all other independent authority in it.

3. Government from some source is a necessity, and while the power to give and administer government is exclusively with a party occupying a country, there can be no doubt that the right and the duty are his to furnish a government and supply that want.

4. The establishment of the provisional court for Louisiana, by the president, as commander-in-chief of the forces of the United States, while they held the territory in which it was to exercise its functions, was an act warranted by the law of nations.

[1] [This court was established by an executive order of the president of the United States, October 20, 1862, a copy of which is given in the opinion of the court. See, also, The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 129. The records of the provisional court were transferred to the district court by Act July 28, 1866 (14 Stat. 344, c. 310)].

5. So long as the authority of the United States shall continue, the right and the duty of it as the party dominant there to afford to the country a government will continue.

6. Said court has, from the time of its foundation to the present time, rightfully exercised its functions in territory in which the government of the United States has been by force of its arms sovereign, and will continue rightfully to exercise them there, so long as its commission shall remain unrevoked and the power of the United States shall continue to support it in the exercise of them.

The accused were tried before Judge Peabody and a jury, and were severally convicted; [Augustus] Reiter of murder, and [John] Louis of arson. After the convictions a motion was made in each case in arrest of judgment.

Mr. Whittaker, for Reiter.

Durant & Horne, for Louis.

Geo. D. Lamont, Pros. Atty., for the United States.

PEABODY, Provisional Judge. These two cases may without inconvenience or danger of confusion be considered together, although they have in fact no connection with each other. The same objection to the proceeding of the court to pronounce sentence upon the accused and in arrest of judgment, is made by both the defendants, and although the objection is urged on different grounds in the two cases, still the objection is proper to be considered on all the grounds in each case. It is urged that this court is not authorized to try these defendants, and that its proceedings have not the sanction of law in the premises. If for any reason this be the case, no further steps should be taken. If for any reason the authority is wanting in one case it is equally so in the other, and the court should refrain from going further in either case. The accused have been indicted separately and tried separately on charges wholly different and having no connection the one with the other, and the consideration of their cases together rather than separately, now, is a matter of convenience solely. One of the accused, Reiter, has been indicted for murder, in causing the death of his wife by violence. The other has been indicted for arson, in burning a building used as a mansion or dwelling-house. Each has been tried before a jury of this parish and been duly convicted of the offence charged in the indictment, and each is now before the court on a motion in arrest of judgment, and in each case the arrest is urged on the ground that the court is not authorized in law and has not jurisdiction to try the case. The counsel for Reiter claim that the court, in its constitution and creation, had not originally the warrant of law to try the accused. The counsel for Louis concede that the court had authority originally to entertain and try such a case, but insist that for causes occurring since, its authority has ceased; that certain steps taken in Louisiana toward the re-establishment of a civil state government have superseded the powers once possessed by the court, and that it is now without jurisdiction or power. The offences of which the defendants stand convicted, by the laws of Louisiana are punishable with death, and nothing would be more agreeable to the court than to proceed with the utmost caution in considering these objections to its jurisdiction. The accused have been indicted, tried, and convicted under and pursuant to the law of the state of Louisiana.

The first question to be considered is whether the court has ever had, from the nature of its origin and constitution, authority to try cases like these; and if this question shall be decided in the affirmative it will remain to examine.

The second question, namely, whether the power to try or the jurisdiction over such a case, once possessed by this court, has been withdrawn or lost,—whether the court in fact has been in any way deprived of it by subsequent events.

It must be conceded that the court, in its origin and structure, is quite out of the usual course and novel. It has not its origin or foundation in any constitutional or legislative enactment—is not the creature of any regularly-organized constitutional or legislative body. Ordinarily the judicial tribunals of the land are the creations of the legislative departments either of the state or federal government, and for the regularity of their creation and the character and extent of their powers depend on the action of the legislative branch of the one or the other of these powers. In such cases, the first thing to be done in ascertaining the legality or powers of a court, is to consult the constitution and legislation of the government from which it claims to hold commission, and in the letter of these is found the act of its creation and the extent and limit of its powers. Not so with this provisional court, which depends for its existence on the law of nations, and on that part of the law of nations relating to war—the law by which parties and neutrals are guided in their treatment of each other in a state of war; and that portion of it which relates to and determines the rights and duties of a belligerent, a conqueror in the territory of an enemy and holding it in armed occupation. On that law must depend the decision of the question presented by this motion, of the validity in law and the powers of this court. On that law alone must this court rely for the power and jurisdiction it has exercised for a considerable time, in a large number of cases involving amounts usually very large. It was in that law that the president of the United States, pressed by the urgent wants of the community here, found his warrant for the establishment of this court in the midst of the country of an enemy held by him jure belli in armed belligerent occupation.

The authority of this court is derived from the president of the United States, the chief executive of the nation and commander-in-chief of its forces military and naval. It is conferred by an order, of which the following is a copy:

"Executive Order, Establishing a Provisional Court in Louisiana.

"Executive Mansion, Washington,
"October 20, 1862.

"The insurrection which has for some time prevailed in several of the states of this Union, including Louisiana, having temporarily subverted and swept away the civil institutions of that state, including the judiciary and the judicial authorities of the Union, so that it has become necessary to hold the state in military occupation; and it being indispensably necessary that there shall be some judicial tribunal existing there capable of administering justice, I have, therefore, thought it proper to appoint, and I do hereby constitute a provisional court, which shall be a court of record for the state of Louisiana, and I do hereby appoint Charles A. Peabody, of New York, to be provisional judge to hold said court, with authority to hear, try, and determine all causes, civil and criminal, including causes in law, equity, revenue, and admiralty, and particularly all such powers and jurisdiction as belong to the district and circuit courts of the United States, conforming his proceedings, so far as possible, to the course of proceedings and practice which has been customary in the courts of the United States and Louisiana, his judgment to be final and conclusive. And I do hereby authorize and empower the said judge to make and establish such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the exercise of his jurisdiction, and to appoint a prosecuting attorney, marshal, and clerk of the said court, who shall perform the functions of attorney, marshal, and clerk, according to such proceedings and practice as before mentioned, and such rules and regulations as may be made and established by said judge. These appointments are to continue during the pleasure of the president, not exceeding beyond the military occupation of the city of New Orleans, or the restoration of the civil authority in that city and in the state of Louisiana. These officers shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the war department, compensation as follows: * * * Such compensations to be certified by the secretary of war. A copy of this order, certified by the secretary of war, and delivered to such judge, shall be deemed and held to be a sufficient commission. Let the seal of the United States be hereunto affixed. Abraham Lincoln.

"By the President:

"William H. Seward, Secretary of State."

"War Department, Washington,
"23d October, 1862.

"I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy, duly examined and compared with the original of the executive order of the president of the United States, constituting a provisional court for the state of Louisiana.

"Witness my hand and the seal of the war department.

"Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

"Attest: John Potts, Chief Clerk."

This order, by its terms, no doubt embraces cases like these under consideration, as indeed it does, perhaps, all others which can occur in life, or become the subject of judicial investigation. The language of the order "to hear, try, and determine all causes, civil and criminal, including causes in law, equity, revenue, and admiralty," is clear and unquestionable, and embraces this class of cases, with all others of every description. The president then sought to give power to this court to try and determine cases of this kind, and having made an order to that effect, has given it that power, if he himself had authority to confer it. The only question remaining to be answered on this point, is whether the president had authority to confer such powers and jurisdiction.

The authority of the president of the United States to create this court, and invest it with powers which should embrace these cases, depends, to some extent at least, on the constitution of the United States, which creates the office exercised by him, and determines its functions. That constitution (article 2, § 1, par. 1) declares as follows: "The executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America." It also provides (article 2, § 2, par. 1): "The president shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states when called into the actual service of the United States." As president, chief executive, and commander-in-chief of the army and navy, he would not ordinarily have power to establish tribunals for the determination of questions civil and criminal, arising in civil life. Was there anything in the condition of affairs existing at the time the order was made which could give him the power to establish them, and if so, what was there in the condition of affairs then existing to give him power in this respect not ordinarily possessed by him as one of the attributes of his office? Between the government of the United States and a people inhabiting a portion of country lying on the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico, and extending north beyond the northern boundary of the territory in question, and embracing within its borders that section of territory theretofore known, and still most conveniently designated, as the state of Louisiana, a war had for some time been waged. This fact is notorious, and moreover it is conclusively settled by the president, the ultimate arbiter of the fact, by his proclamation to that effect. As to its existence, therefore, as well as the existence of some other facts to which I shall have occasion to refer, equally well known, no time will be consumed in attempting to prove them, but they will be assumed. It is a matter of public knowledge and notoriety that this war had been pending, and that the country over which the jurisdiction of this court is in question, and heretofore known, and in the order establishing this court described as the state of Louisiana, had been for many months held and occupied by those people and their forces, military and naval. That it had been for a long time previous to, and also since the commencement of this war, inhabited, cultivated, and owned by the same people who had entered into and carried on war with the government of the United States, and that it was still so inhabited by a people whose relations with the government of the United States had for some time been and were still those of enmity. That it had, in the course of the war, been by force of the arms of the United States wrested from the enemy, and was at the time the order establishing this court was made, held by the forces of the United States in armed belligerent occupation. That the armed belligerent forces of this enemy of the United States had been, by force of the arms of the United States, expelled from this country, and that they were at the time held out of it by the armed forces of the United States, and that war was still waged between those belligerents. The civil institutions of the country thus held, including the tribunals for the administration of justice, had been formed and established by the enemy of the conquering power, and were by it administered at the time of the conquest. These institutions having been formed, established, and administered by the government existing previous to and at the time of the conquest confessedly hostile to the government of the United States, were the only institutions found there at the time the military authority of the United States was by force of its arms established there.

By the conquest of the country, in this case as in others, the previously-existing government and the power by which it was administered were subverted and swept away, and those of the conquering power were substituted in their places. This is the necessary consequence of a conquest of a country —a transfer of the control, government, and sovereignty of it from one party to another. The old power is conquered and extinguished, and the new one of the conqueror is instituted in its place. The old institutions, if not abandoned and extinguished, are at least suspended in their action. They may be transferred to and adopted by the new governing power and may be used and operated by it, just as an old machine, detached from the power that has usually moved it, and abandoned for use as a whole, may furnish isolated pieces of machinery which can profitably be introduced into a new machine having different qualities, moved by a new and wholly another power, and used to accomplish on the whole, perhaps, purposes quite different. However there may be retained in use by the new governing power some of the features or institutions of the government which has been supplanted, it is nevertheless wholly another government, and derives its life and all its vital qualities from a new source—the new sovereignty installed by the conquest. A conquest necessarily operates the extinguishment of the power of the party conquered in the country which is the subject of conquest, and the establishment there of the power of the conqueror. Without this there is no conquest of a country, and there can be none. When the power previously dominant in a country has been extinguished by that of another party, and rendered incapable of governing it further, and a new one has been established in its stead, it is both the right and the duty of the party thus coming into power to see to it that a government wholesome and salutary shall be established and administered, and, as in such a case there is only one power, that of the new party succeeding, capable of giving and administering the government, it follows that it is the duty as well as the right of that power to do it. No country can exist without a government of some kind. The rights of the inhabitants must be protected—crime must be restrained and punished—the virtuous must be protected against the vicious—the weak against the strong—order must be preserved and security to person and estate assured. The party dominant for the time being has the power to do it, and no one else has the power, and it follows from the necessity of the case that he must exercise it. So the government of the United States, having conquered and expelled from the territory of country, theretofore known as the state of Louisiana, the power by which the government of it had been theretofore administered, and having established there its own power, was bound by the laws of war, as well as the dictates of humanity, to give to the territory thus bereft a government in the place and stead of the one deposed or overthrown, such an one as should reasonably secure the safety and welfare of the people thus reduced to subjection; in some manner, not inconsistent, to be sure, with the proper interests of the governing power, and the maintenance of it in its supremacy there. The power established there was the military power of the United States, and the president of the United States, as we have seen, the commander-in-chief of the forces, military and naval, of the United States, was at the head of that power, and had the right and duty to exercise and direct it. It was incumbent on him, representing for this purpose the sovereignty of the United States, to see that the duty devolving on his government should be properly performed. He acted in obedience to this duty, and in accordance with this right, when he attempted to establish there a judicial tribunal capable of deciding controversies and administering justice.

But how does this question stand on the authority of adjudged cases? In the case of Cross v. Harrison, in the supreme court of the United States, in 1853, reported in 16 How. [57 U. S.] 164, the court held that a civil government formed in California, under the direction of the president of the United States, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, shortly after the conquest of the country, and while it was held in military occupation by the forces under him, was an act warranted by the laws of nations, and that the formation of such a civil government was the rightful exercise of a belligerent right over a conquered country. It appeared that the port of San Francisco had been conquered by the arms of the United States in 1846, and that shortly afterwards, the United States holding military possession of all Upper California, the president authorized the commander of the forces of the United States there, to exercise the belligerent rights of a conqueror, and form a civil government for the conquered territory, with powers to impose duties on imports and tonnage, for the support of the government and of the army which held the country as a conquest in possession. This was done, and duties were levied and collected for a time. Afterwards, a treaty of peace was made with Mexico, by which Upper California was ceded to the United States. After this treaty, and after the cession to the United States of the territory, the military governor continued to collect import and tonnage duties as he had done before, but at the rate authorized by acts of congress in other parts of the United States; and for that purpose appointed the defendant in this suit collector there. He, as such collector, without any legislation of congress on the subject, collected those duties to a large amount from the plaintiffs, who sought in that suit to recover them back again. The question presented was, whether the United States, after the cession of this territory to it, and in the absence of any legislation by congress on the subject, had a right by its military governor to collect those duties. The governor, it appeared, collected them of his own motion, and without any instructions on the subject from his government at home. No question of the right of the government to levy duties as it pleased, while the country was held by right of conquest in strictly military occupation, appears to have been made; but the continuance of that right after the treaty of peace, and after the cession of the country to the United States, seems to have been chiefly in question. The court sustained the right in the broadest manner, putting their decision on the ground that the formation of the civil government when it was done, was the lawful exercise of a belligerent right over conquered territory. That that government being in existence when the territory was ceded to the United States, its powers did not cease by reason of the cession of the country to the United States, or of the restoration of peace, and that it was rightfully continued after peace was made with Mexico, until congress should legislate otherwise. The decision covered the whole ground that the duties were lawfuly collected by the civil military governor of California, an instrument of the provisional government of the United States in that country whilst the military occupation was continued; and that it was so afterwards from the ratification of the treaty of peace until the revenue system of the United States was put in practice, under acts of congress passed for that purpose; in effect deciding that the provisional government of the United States there was rightful and legal, and that it continued in force a legal rightful government through the time the country was held in military occupation, and after that occupation ceased, and that it was, in fact, in force until some other system was provided according to law to supersede it.

For the doctrine that a conqueror in a conquered country may establish a government and courts for the administration of justice, the case of Leitensdorfer v. Webb (decided by the supreme court of the United States, in 1857) 20 How. [61 U. S.] 176, is an authority directly in point. In that case the conduct of the government of the United States by General Kearney, the officer in command of its forces there, was brought in question. It appeared that after the conquest of that country by the arms of the United States, General Kearney, in command of the forces there, established a government and provisional courts for the administration of justice. Those courts, in the case referred to, were adjudged to be legal, and their decisions obligatory as warranted by law. The power to establish the government and the courts was directly in question, and was directly passed upon by the court, and was sustained on the ground of the right of conquest. In that case, moreover, it appeared that the country conquered was subsequently, by treaty, ceded to the United States, and it was claimed that by the act of cession the right of the United States to govern the country and enforce the laws made by the provisional government while it was held in military occupation, was terminated.

It was not seriously questioned that the United States might, while it held the country in military occupation, establish and administer a system of government—make laws by which to govern the inhabitants and regulate their rights and intercourse among themselves, and set up courts by which the laws so made should be administered. That right was deemed to be too evident to be seriously questioned. It was, however, in issue, and was necessarily passed upon by the court. The doctrine chiefly contended for, was that by the cession of the country to the United States, the right to govern it by that provisional system adopted when it was held a conquest of arms, was terminated, and that the United States had, after the cession, only the right to govern it like other territory of the United States, by laws emanating from congress—the constitutional law-making power of its own government—enacted in reference to it as territory of the United States. This position was not sustained by the court, but was overruled and adjudged not warranted in law. The court says: "Of the validity of these ordinances of that provisional government there is made no question with respect to the period during which the territory was held by the United States as occupying conqueror, and it would seem to admit of no doubt, that during the period of their valid existence and operation, these ordinances must have displaced and superseded every previous institution of the vanquished or deposed political power which was incompatible with them. But it has been contended, that whatever might have been the rights of the occupying conqueror, as such, these were all terminated by the termination of the belligerent attitude of the parties, and that with the close of the contest, every institution which had been overthrown or suspended would be revived and re-established." "The fallacy of this pretension," the court proceed to say, "is exposed by the fact, that the conquered territory never was relinquished by the conqueror, nor restored to its original condition or allegiance, but was retained by the occupant until possession was matured into absolute, permanent dominion and sovereignty." The court then proceed to decide when the institutions of the provisional government would terminate. They say: "We conclude, therefore, that the ordinances and institutions of the provisional government could be revoked or modified by the United States alone, either by direct legislation on the part of congress, or that of the territorial government, in the exercise of powers delegated to it by congress." The question there presented was the validity of an ordinance of the territorial government, authorizing attachments of property of debtors, enacted by the provisional government, while the country was held in military occupation, and before the cession of it, but sought to be enforced by the provisional territorial court after the cession of the country to the United States, and after the military occupation had ceased. The court upheld the law in its origin, and also in its continuance in force, and the administration of it by the provisional territorial court after the cession of the country, and after the military occupation had ceased.

In the case of Jecker v. Montgomery, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 498, decided in 1854, the same supreme court of the United States incidentally recognise the legality and powers of those provisional courts, and while deciding that, for reasons peculiar to cases of prize, and not at all applicable to any others, they could not legally act in cases of that class, the court admit their powers and jurisdiction in other cases: making three decisions of the court of last resort of the government of the United States quite in point. Either of these should be sufficient authority for such a principle, if indeed a principle so plainly proper and necessary, can be thought to need authority of precedent at all. But at the risk of being tedious and doing work of supererogation, which charges I am persuaded might well be maintained against me, I will add to these authorities already commented on, still another one, which has a bearing quite material on this case at more than one point. I mean the case of U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 246. That case, as well as those already cited, decides that by the conquest and military occupation by one nation of a portion of the territory of another, the portion so acquired passes from the operation of the laws and government of the nation to which it had previously belonged, and comes under the laws and government of the nation making the conquest. It also decides that while such territory is held by the conqueror, it is the right of the party so holding it to govern it, and for that purpose to make laws by which to govern it. That while a portion of territory is so held, the laws of the conqueror holding are in force there, and the laws of the party from whom it has been taken are in abeyance not only de factor but also de jure; that while it is so held, the conqueror has de jure as well as de facto all the rights of dominion and sovereignty over it, and may exercise them at his pleasure, and that the former sovereign, overcome or expelled, has no right there, and his laws have no effect there; that acts done there with the authority of the conqueror are legal and proper, but those done in violation of his laws, even though done in obedience to the laws of the sovereign expelled, are not legal, but contrary to law. In short, that, by conquest, the sovereignty and right to rule of the conqueror are introduced and established, and the sovereignty and right of rule in the party expelled are extinguished; and that the duty of allegiance in the people remaining there is transferred in like manner from the vanquished to the victorious party; in fact, that by such an act the change of the sovereignty and allegiance are complete, and new rights and duties in both parties are created accordingly. I think that all these conclusions certainly follow from what is decided, if, indeed, they are not all actually decided there. That case, like each of the others cited, was decided by the supreme court of the United States—the court of highest human authority on that subject—and as the decision was against the United States, and in favor of the authority of Great Britain, its enemy in the war, and was made shortly after the occurrence of the war out of which it grew; and while no department of this government was inclined to magnify the rights of Great Britain or disparage those of its own government, there can be no suspicion of bias in the mind of the court in favor of the conclusion at which it arrived, and no doubt that the law seemed to the court to warrant and demand such a decision. That case grew out of the war of 1812, between the United States and Great Britain. It appeared that in September, 1814, the British forces had taken the port of Castine, in the state of Maine, and held it in military occupation; and that while it was so held, foreign goods, by the laws of the United States subject to duty, had been introduced into that port without paying duties to the United States. At the close of the war the place was by treaty restored to the United States, and after that was done the government of the United States sought to recover from the persons so introducing goods there while in possession of the British, the duties to which by the laws of the United States, they would have been liable. The claim of the United States was that its laws were properly in force there, although the place was at the time held by the British forces in hostility to the United States, and the laws, therefore, could not at the time be enforced there; and that a court of the United States (the power of that government there having since been restored) was bound so to decide. But this illusion of the prosecuting officer there was dispelled by the court in the most summary manner. Mr. Justice Story, that great luminary of the American bench, being the organ of the court in delivering its opinion, said: "The single question is whether goods imported into Castine during its occupation by the enemy are liable to the duties imposed by the revenue laws upon goods imported into the United States. * * * We are all of opinion that the claim for duties cannot be sustained. * * * The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was, of course, suspended, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced there, or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remained and submitted to the conquerors. By the surrender the inhabitants passed under a temporary allegiance of the British government, and were bound by such laws, and such only, as it chose to recognise and impose. From the nature of the case no other laws could be obligatory upon them. * * * Castine was therefore, during this period, as far as respected our revenue laws, to be deemed a foreign port, and goods imported into it by the inhabitants were subject to such duties only as the British government chose to require. Such goods were in no correct sense imported into the United States." The court then proceed to say, that the case is the same as if the port of Castine had been foreign territory, ceded by treaty to the United States, and the goods had been imported there previous to its cession. In this case they "say there would be no pretence to say that American duties could be demanded; and upon principles of public or municipal law, the cases are not distinguishable." They add at the conclusion of the opinion: "The authorities cited at the bar would, if there were any doubt, be decisive of the question. But we think it too clear to require any aid from authority." Does this case leave room for a doubt whether a country held as this was in armed belligerent occupation, is to be governed by him who holds it, and by him alone? Does it not so decide in terms as plain as can be stated? It is asserted by the supreme court of the United States with entire unanimity, the great and venerated Marshall presiding, and the erudite and accomplished Story delivering the opinion of the court, that such is the law, and it is so adjudged in this case. Nay, more: it is even adjudged that no other laws could be obligatory; that such a country, so held, is for the purpose of the application of the law of its former government to be deemed foreign territory, and that goods imported there (and by parity of reasoning other acts done there) are in no correct sense done within the territory of its former sovereign, the United States.

No part of the remarks of the court in this case is more fully warranted or proper than the last, to the effect that the case is too clear to require aid from authority. The right, therefore, of a conqueror in a conquered country to ordain a system of government for it, and among other institutions to erect courts of justice, and maintain them in the discharge of their proper functions, is as well established and free from doubt when considered on authority, as it is in principle; and about as well in each as any proposition which could find among men an advocate to question it, could in the nature of things be expected to be.

But it may be said that this reasoning, if correct as to territory foreign to the conqueror, and as to which his rights and duties are simply and solely those of a conqueror by force of arms, is not applicable to the case in question, for this Louisiana is a part of the territory of the United States, over which the powers and duties of the president and the other departments of the government were already fixed, and are dependent on the constitution and laws of the United States, and limited to the powers and duties conferred by them; and that those laws do not give the president the power to establish a court like this, and therefore that he has not that power. It is quite certain that ordinarily he would have no such power; and hence, instead of looking for it to the constitution and laws of the United States alone, I have looked elsewhere and to other facts than his merely occupying the place of president at the time. I have invoked also the fact that he was by virtue of that office, as commander of the forces of the United States, holding in armed belligerent occupation the country in which the court was established, and in which its powers and authority are now brought in question. Is this country, for the purpose of determining the powers and duties of the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, to be deemed domestic, or is it to be deemed foreign territory? What are the relations of the forces of the United States, and of their commander, to these districts of country as they enter them, expelling the forces of the enemy? Is he the chief executive of the country of which these districts are a part, and is he nothing more; and are his powers and duties those of chief executive only? Has he in this country subjected to his arms, and while in armed belligerent occupation of it, with the forces under his command, has he by law the same powers and duties as he would have in Massachusetts or New York in time of profound peace, and has he no others? Has war given him no powers in law in addition to those possessed by him in time of peace? Having in war broken down the hostile power of it, and driven its forces out of it by the military force under his command, has he no new powers there by reason of that fact? When his subordinate officer, Admiral Farragut, landed there from the deck of the Hartford, did he carry with him no right to power not commonly enjoyed by the president in other territory of the United States? Did his rights as conqueror cease the moment his power in that character was established? Having entered Louisiana as commander-in-chief, at the head of his forces victorious, was he at once remitted to the position, powers, and duties of a peace president in times of peace, and limited to them? Had he none of the powers or duties of a conqueror in a country subjected to his arms? What was this country to do for a government when the old hostile one had been reduced and expelled? Was it to get along without one as best it could? Was it to do this until some new one could spring up to supply the want? Were all the rights of persons and property, natural and acquired, the right to life, security, liberty, and property, to be at once suspended, and was the rule of physical force to override them all? The right of a conqueror to govern a country held by him by right of conquest, is well established on authority. The cases which establish this right, however, relate to the conquest of a country foreign to the conqueror, and as to which he has no rights and is under no restraints, except those which come from the fact of conquest alone, and not to one which is of right a part of his own proper domain. In this case, the territory over which the government of the United States had acquired, as we have supposed, some rights in the nature of rights of conquest, belonged of right to it as a part of its own domain, and it remains to be considered whether that fact makes any difference in respect to the right by the laws of war to govern a country conquered.

It may be said that the act of the United States in this case, had not the usual effect of a conquest of foreign territory; that instead of acquiring anew the rights of a conqueror, the United States by this conquest (as I for the sake of convenience have called it) has but removed the obstacles to the enjoyment of its pre-existing rights, and has not acquired any new ones of a conqueror. As we have seen, the foundation of the right of a conqueror to govern conquered territory, and for that purpose to establish provisionally civil institutions in it, is necessity, and that chiefly the necessity of the conquered country and its inhabitants. A government of some kind they must have, for no community can exist without it. The power of the conqueror has overridden and subjected all other power, and this necessity can be supplied from no other source than him, for he holds for the time being all power. Whilst this continues to be the case, what is there in the case in question of Louisiana which should make it different from a foreign country? The inhabitants of that country owed allegiance to, and were entitled to the protection of the government of the United States, it is said familiarly, and this is quite true in the sense in which the remark is usually made. But did the United States ever at any time, or under any circumstances, owe the people of this territory a protection and government which would supply all, or any considerable part of their wants in this respect? If the government of the United States should afford to this country all the protection and aid—should perform for it all the governmental offices, which it by virtue of the constitution and laws of the land was ever bound, or had a right to do, how far would this go towards supplying the wants of the country in that respect? Is it not quite certain, on looking into the law on the subject of the relations, rights, and duties of the federal government to the tract of country in question, or any other tract embraced within the state, that with the federal government in full function, and all its duties fully performed, a very small portion of the governmental necessities of the country would be supplied?

It is a fact familiar to us all, that under our system of government, almost all the governmental aid needed by our people is due to them from the local depositories of power, the state governments—for most purposes within their own territory sovereign. These governments, under our system, are the repositories of nearly all of the powers of government in ordinary times in familiar use among us, and whether they be applied by the state itself, by its own officers directly, or be allotted out in parcels to smaller governmental districts, such as counties or parishes, cities, towns, or villages, to be applied by the officers of those localities respectively, still the state and not the federal government is the reservoir from which they are drawn, whether it be for distribution or exercise; and the state, and not the federal power and officers, administer and execute them. The man of commerce, the seaman, a traveller on the highway of nations, the soldier, whether at home or abroad, the direct instrument of the government, and at once its representative and defender, and the traveller in a foreign land, experience and realize the power and the protecting hand of the federal government, its value and beneficence; but in the ordinary walks of life, at home, among plain people, very few—probably not one in a hundred—have occasion in a lifetime to invoke or experience any office or effect, enabling or restraining, protective or punitory, of that government, whose duty relates in ordinary times and circumstances almost exclusively to the foreign relations of the country, happily almost always so secure and free from threatening aspect or cause of anxiety as to attract little or no consideration.

From which government comes the system of police by which order in society is maintained from one end of the land to the other? From which the judicial power—the one in question here and now—by which, in ordinary cases, crime is punished and repressed, controversies decided, and the rights of persons and property established and maintained? and what is certainly quite in point, from which source comes the power by which these very unfortunate criminals now before me would ordinarily on a basis of peace be tried, and justice be meted out to them? What law of the United States, as laid down in the constitution and statutes thereof, did Reiter violate, when (forsaken of his God) he took the life of his wife, the partner of his bosom, on that hopeful, holy morning of the anniversary of the birth of our Saviour, in the year of that event one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two? What law of the United States did Louis—poor benighted Louis—whose eyes have scarcely been blessed with the sight of himself free to seek his own security or happiness—violate, when he applied the fatal torch to the fated house, the residence of a human being? It is quite certain that the government of the United States, remitted to its ordinary constitutional functions within one of the states as in times of peace, could not supply a government at all adequate to the necessities of society, and especially could not have taken cognisance of, or punished at all, either of the offences in question by any tribunal it ever had or had the right to establish.

The necessity for a provisional government here, for nearly all the purposes for which a government is necessary, and especially of a provisional tribunal for dispensing justice generally, and in cases like these now under consideration, was the same as, and none other than it would have been if this tract of country in question had been a part of the domain of a government wholly foreign to that of the United States, and over the territory of which it had no other rights than those growing out of war and conquest. Indeed, it may well be doubted whether, in reference to governmental rights and duties in matters of this kind, there is any difference between the citizens of the several states and those of foreign territory. Certain it is from what has been said, that this territory is not, by the nature of our system of government, under the dominion of the federal government as to most matters of local administration, but is exclusively under the state and local government, and the federal government was never bound and never assumed or pretended to furnish government to any section of the states as to their internal or local matters generally, and has not, and never had the duty, right, or power to do so. But this district of territory had been in insurrection against the government of the United States, had openly withdrawn from all connection with that government under the forms of law and civil legislation, had allied itself with others hostile and at war with it, and had, by force of arms, for a considerable time maintained this attitude external and hostile, resisting successfully the efforts of the government to subject it to law and duty. However the act of secession was ineffectual in law, this district had in fact and practically withdrawn from all relations with the government of the United States, and had arrayed itself in armed hostility to it. Its duties remained unchanged no doubt, but its rights to the filial relation—its rights to receive from the federal government the consideration and care of a parent rather than the imperious commands of a military master, may have been much changed by the events which had transpired, and I think that they had been. Having taken for itself the attitude of a foreign state, and that too of one hostile and at war with the United States, and formed and adapted all its civil institutions, and in every respect bent itself to that condition, and claimed and asserted it, and practically maintained it by force of arms for a time, and having been at this time overcome and subjected to the arms of the government of the United States, it may very well be that while it has acquired no new rights by virtue of its pretensions, it has resigned and forfeited old ones, and is no longer entitled to demand the benefits of a relation it has renounced and repudiated, however it may have failed in establishing at that time its freedom from the duties attendant upon it.

The counsel for the prisoners Reiter and Louis, however, take different grounds on this motion. The former insists that the whole structure of the court in its origin was without warrant in law. That inasmuch as the constitution and laws of the United States give no authority to the president to establish such a court, he has none, and that his act in attempting to establish it is ineffectual, from want of constitutional and legal power in him; while the learned counsel for the accused Louis concede that the president, as commander of the forces of the United States, had authority by the laws of war to establish it, and that it had originally all the powers by him attempted to be conferred, but insist that these powers have ceased, by reason, as I understand the argument, of the organization of a civil government here which supersedes the military. I pass to consider the question presented by this argument. If a conqueror in a conquered country have a right to set up a government in it, when does that right cease? Or, rather, if he have such a right, and exercises it, when does the power of the government so set up cease? I answer, first, it will terminate necessarily whenever the power which formed it shall terminate, or become unable to support it. And, secondly, whenever that power shall for any cause voluntarily bring it to an end. That the power of the federal government here has not been terminated, I need no argument to prove. It certainly has not been expelled, and it quite as certainly has not been withdrawn. It remains, we all feel and realize, the great, beneficent, paramount, and only power here; able ever to support and supporting itself, and furnishing and supporting every government office and function here. But on this point, as well as the one to which I have cited the cases above referred to, some of those cases speak as authorities. In two of those cases, at least, in which the power of the provisional government and the provisional courts was sustained by the supreme court of the United States, it was so upheld in territory belonging, aside from military occupation and of right to the domain of the United States, and over which that government had powers of government, full and complete, for all purposes, as any sovereign or state has ordinarily within its own territory; rights not limited to its external matters alone, or chiefly, as are those of the United States in territory lying within one of the states, but embracing powers for all the details of local administration, legislative, executive, and judicial. And even there, where the United States had by the constitution, powers of government ample for all purposes, the power to continue in force a provisional government long after military occupation had ceased, and when the rights of the United States there depended not at all on military power or belligerency, but wholly on compact between the former sovereign and itself—even there, in territory confessedly belonging to the United States, and in time of peace, and in the absence of military power or military necessity, the provisional government and the provisional courts were upheld to the fullest extent, and were adjudged to continue legally and practically in force as instruments of the federal government until it should, by its constitutional action, through its legislature, otherwise provide. In the earlier of those cases (Cross v. Harrison, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 164) the court say: "Our conclusion from what has been said is, that the civil government of California, organized as it was, from a right of conquest, did not cease or become defunct in consequence of the signature of the treaty or from its ratification. We think it was continued over a ceded conquest, without any violation of the constitution or laws of the United States, and that until congress legislated for it, the duties upon foreign goods, &c., were legally demanded and lawfully received by Mr. Harrison, the collector of the port, who received his appointment, &c., from Governor Mason."

These cases, in deciding that a provisional government may be maintained by the military power of the United States in territory belonging to it, not held in military occupation, or jure belli, go far to prove that the fact that this country belonged, for some purposes, to the United States, aside from those coming from conquest and military occupation, did not take it from the application of the general principle that the conqueror in conquered territory, has the right to govern it and to establish government as he may deem expedient; but that such territory, on the contrary, is on the same footing in that respect as territory strictly and for all purposes foreign.

There is no pretence that the federal government has in any manner directly brought, or sought to bring, the labors of this court to a close. Having established it, and bade it proceed in the performance of its mission, it will continue (the power which established it continuing) until that power shall revoke its commission, or otherwise decree its discontinuance. But it is said that a civil government has been established here, and that therefore the proper functions of the provisional one, and among others, the functions of the provisional court, have ceased. It is quite true that some measures apparently tending to the establishment of a civil government have been taken. Members of congress were elected in 1862, and were admitted to seats in the national legislature. Several other officers—a governor, attorney-general, and others, have also been elected more recently under the direction of the military authorities. A convention for the revision of the constitution of the state has been elected and convened. These things look like measures for the organization of a state government, and measures of this kind pursued may in course of time lead to such a consummation, at the pleasure of the federal government. That all these things have been done under and by virtue of the fostering care of the federal government, as exercised by the military arm of it, no one at all acquainted with the facts will doubt.

Waiving for the present, however, as unnecessary to be considered here, the question whether these movements have their foundation in and derive their vital principle from the state or from federal sources; and, whether in use, as some of them are, they are in fact instruments in the hands of the defunct state, or of the living federal power, it is quite certain and sufficient for present purposes, that the federal government has not voluntarily abdicated and resigned to them, all or generally, the functions of government, certainly not those of the provisional court. Such a general surrender alone could have divested the power of this court, for there is no pretence that the federal government has singled out certain powers, and among them the powers heretofore exercised by this court, and so parted with them as to be unable to recall or exercise them. The whole argument, on the contrary, proceeds on the idea that civil government as a whole, has been established here, and all the power to exercise it resigned into the hands of state authorities. In short that the state is again in possession of all the governmental powers which of right, under our system, belong to the state, in contradistinction to the federal government, and that the United States retain only what are designed under our system of government, ordinarily to be exercised by the federal government in all the states in times of peace, and that both parties are, in fact, remitted to their own positions in the constitutional government formerly occupied by them, and the same as are now occupied by the loyal states. At the time this motion was made (and everything must relate to that time) there was not a court in the part of Louisiana within the federal lines having any reasonable pretence of authority from any other source than the federal government. The United States district and circuit court, then in operation here, were and are the constitutional courts of that government. All else were creations of the military power of the federal government.

The learned argument of Mr. Lamont, the prosecuting attorney of this court, on that point, was entirely correct. All the governmental functions in exercise here at that time, not only courts of justice, but all others, and all the judges, officers, and instruments by which they were performed and operated, were those of the federal government, and were appointed, commissioned, animated, sustained, and moved by that power alone. The provisional court for the state of Louisiana—the court of the federal government—retains all the powers it ever had and will continue to exercise rightfully a jurisdiction commensurate with its charter, so long as the president or the government he represents, shall will it, and shall uphold it for that purpose; and whatever other institutions may have been brought, or allowed to come into existence in the mean time, this court will not cease, or go out of existence, or be shorn of any of its powers or proportions by reason of the fact that some modicum of them or of other powers of civil government, have been allotted by the common parent—the federal government—to other institutions or instrumentalities.

Something was said on the argument about the laws which these courts should administer. The laws of the conquered country, like everything else connected with its government, are entirely under the control and subject to the will of the conqueror. He makes and adopts them in use at his pleasure. Those found in use at the time of the conquest may be continued in use by him or laid aside at his pleasure. If continued in use, however, they become his, and derive their force and efficacy from him and his adoption of them. In the cases cited above, a new code was made and introduced by General Kearney, representing the government of the conqueror, called the "Kearney Code." In the absence of any provision on the subject, in such a case courts of justice are not bound to adhere to any particular system. This court is commissioned to administer justice, and no code of laws is prescribed for it. It may adopt such rules as may seem wise and expedient, whether corresponding to the system in use here at the time of the conquest, or differing from it. It has always administered justice according to the Code of Louisiana, and so have all other courts here, not because it was bound by that Code, as law of the state, but because it seemed expedient and wise to continue along under the system found in use here, rather than introduce a new one. That system had had the sanction of the previous state government, and was no doubt suited to the occupations, habits, and wants of the people. The transactions which would become subjects of investigation had been entered into under and in reference to it as the system by which they would be construed and enforced. Moreover, it was already in use, and had better be continued in use and a change avoided, unless for some decided cause a change was deemed necessary. Having adopted that as the rule in the courts here it became law to them as well as to society here, and they were bound to adhere to it and administer justice according to it so long as it continued to be the rule. The courts here have always done that, and it is not probable that the laws of Louisiana have ever been more closely adhered to in the administration of justice here than they have been during the time of the government of the country by the federal authorities, since the occupation of it by their forces.

In the cases cited above from California (Cross v. Harrison, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 164; Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 176; and Jecker v. Montgomery, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 498) the previously-existing systems of law were ignored and a new and original system introduced, which course received the sanction of the supreme court of the United States in those cases; and in the case cited from Maine (U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 254) the British government made a new and different law and administered it while the territory was held by it, and that course received the sanction of the same court of highest authority, in the case referred to.

I have not cited authority for everything I have said in this opinion—perhaps not for every doctrine I have declared. I have, however, referred to the court of highest authority in such cases of any tribunal known among men, and to the decisions of that court, quite in point, for every principle and doctrine claimed in this opinion, which is not so plain and evident as to make reference to cases for authority unnecessary and inexpedient, and for the omission to cite them to such points, I have the very high authority of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 254, above referred to, that in cases like that "too clear to require aid from authority," it is not well to encumber an opinion with them.

In addition to the cases already commented on, I will refer to several more having important bearing on this question, not as establishing any new principle or sustaining any old one not better sustained by more modern and unquestionable authority already referred to, though equally conclusive of the principle with them; but as furnishing, perchance, to some mind, some new view, reason, or illustration of a principle better established on authority by cases already introduced. Grotius De Jure B. ac. P. l. 2, c. —, § 5 et seq.; Id. l. 3, c. 6, § 4; Id. c. 9, §§ 9, 14; Puff. Laws Nat. (by Barbeyrac) l. 7, c. 7, § 5; Id. l. 8, c. 11, § 8; Bynkershoek, Q. J., Pub. I. 1, cc. 6, 16; Duponceau's Transl., 46, 124; Voet ad Pandect, l. 39, tit. 4, note 7, De Vectigalibus; Id. l. 19, tit. 2, note 28; Id. l. 49, tit. 15, note 1; U. S. v. Hayward [Case No. 15,336]; The Fama, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 106; The Foltina, 1 Dod. 450; 30 Hogsheads of Sugar, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 191; Reeves, Shipp. 98 et seq.; U. S. v. Vowell, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 368; U. S. v. Arnold [Case No. 14,469], 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 106; Empson v. Bathrust, Winch, 20, 50; Winch, Ent. 334, cited Poph. 176, Hut. 52; Com. Dig. "Officer," H.

My conclusions, therefore, are: That at the time of the establishment of the provisional court for Louisiana, a considerable part of the territory of that state was held by the forces of the United States, in armed belligerent occupation. That in a country so held, the authority of the occupying force is paramount, and necessarily operates the exclusion of all other independent authority in it. That government from some source is a necessity, and while the power to give and administer government is exclusively with a party occupying a country, there can be no doubt that the right and the duty are his to furnish a government and supply that want. That the actual military occupation of that territory by the United States has continued from that time to the present, and still continues, and the right and duty of government, therefore, continue with the United States. That the establishment of the provisional court for Louisiana, by the president, as commander-in-chief of the forces of the United States, while they held the territory in which it was to exercise its functions, was an act warranted by the law of nations. That so long as the authority of the United States shall continue, the right and the duty of it, as the party dominant there to afford to the country government will continue. That said court has, from the time of its foundation to the present time, rightfully exercised its functions in territory in which the government of the United States has been by force of its arms sovereign, and will continue rightfully to exercise them there, so long as its commission shall remain unrevoked, and the power of the United States shall continue to support it in the exercise of them.

NOTE. The counsel of libellants in the case of The Grapeshot [Case No. 5,703], referred to in the article on the authority of the provisional court (4 Am. Law Reg. [U. S.] 388), desire us to state that that case was transferred by written agreement of parties, and they believe that no case has occurred of a compulsory transfer of causes from the United States courts to the provisional court.

Case No. 16,147.

UNITED STATES v. RENDELL.

[1 Curt. 369.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1853.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—COLLECTION LAWS—REPORTING ARRIVAL TO COLLECTOR.

Under the 30th section of the collection act of 1799 (4 Stat. 649), if the master make report of arrival, he is not liable to the penalty, though he do not repair to the office of the principal officer of customs for that purpose.

This was a writ of error to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, bringing up the record of an information filed by the district-attorney against [Benjamin] Rendell, as master of the American brig Nithroy, for not making report, within twenty-four hours, of the arrival of the brig at the harbor of Holmes's Hole, in the district of Massachusetts, from a foreign voyage, pursuant to the act of March 2, 1799. At the trial of the information in the district court, there was a verdict of not guilty [case unreported], and the following bill of exceptions was taken by the district-attorney.

"At the trial of this cause before the jury, the United States, by George Lunt, their attorney, claimed that the defendant was liable to forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars, penalty, for neglecting and omitting to comply with the provisions of the thirtieth section of the statute of the United States, approved March 2, 1799, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;' which section provides, 'that, within twenty-four hours after the arrival of any ship or vessel from any foreign port or place, at any port of the United States established by law, at which an officer of the customs resides, or within any harbor, inlet, or creek thereof, if the hours of business at the office of the chief officer of customs at such port will permit, or as soon thereafter as the said hours will permit, the master, or other person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, shall repair to the said office, and shall make report to the chief officer of the arrival of the said ship or vessel.' The defendant was master of a certain vessel called the brig 'Nithroy,' which arrived from a foreign voyage into the harbor of Holmes's Hole, in the collection district of Edgartown, at or about 9 o'clock, p. m., on the 14th day of February, in the year 1851. From this harbor she departed towards her port of final destination in the evening of the 17th day of the same month. At this harbor of Holmes's Hole, there resided one Henry P. Worth, who was, and had been for a long time, the deputy of the collector of Edgartown, and an inspector of the customs, by him appointed. He was the only officer of the customs there resident, and had no clerk, and acted himself also as boarding-officer, under the provisions of the 25th section of the same act. He had an office in one of the chambers of his dwelling-house, but no person was there to act for him when absent. Over the principal door of his house was the sign, 'Custom-House'; and there was evidence offered by the government, tending to prove that upon the outside of the door of the office within, was posted a written notice of business hours, viz.: 'Office-hours from 9 a. m. to 12 m., and from 2 p. m. to 4 p. m.;' and that he had such hours. There was evidence on the other side, tending to prove that he had no such hours. Evidence was given to show that, at this harbor of Holmes's Hole, many vessels, perhaps three thousand sail in the course of each year, were boarded by Mr. Worth; that five hundred of them at least would be under a foreign register; that he was absent from his office a great, and perhaps the principal, part of the time, in discharge of his duties as boarding-officer; but that he was always there when he had reason to expect that any business was to be done. During the period while the Nithroy lay at Holmes's Hole, so far as known to the officer, neither the defendant, nor any other person having charge or command of the vessel, made the report required by the act, at the office before described. The defendant, to maintain the issue on his part, gave evidence that Mr. Worth went on board the Nithroy, upon her arrival; was there informed by the master of the place whence she came, and of the time of her arrival, and that he also received a copy of the manifest, and made a certificate on the original; and it appeared, that for more than thirty years last past, not more than one in thirty had ever made, or been required to make, any other report of arrival. Evidence, also, was given, tending to prove that it was the custom and practice of Mr. Worth to board all vessels immediately upon their arrival at that port under a foreign register, and to receive the report of their arrival on board, and sometimes he informed masters that he required no other report, unless they remained there over forty-eight hours. Upon the exhibition of this evidence, the United States contended that the penalty provided by the statute was incurred by the defendant. But the judge instructed the jury, that, if the officer of the customs actually transacts the business of receiving the report of arrival at any place within his district, such place must be considered as adopted by him, and that he has discontinued or changed for the time any other office which he may heretofore have had; so that he either has no office to which the master can then repair and make the report, or that his office for that purpose is at the place where he actually transacts the business, by personally receiving the report; and especially must this be so, when that is the place where the officer has been in the practice of transacting that business for at least thirty years;" and that the report which was actually made, accomplished all the purposes of the law, and a further report merely of the arrival would have been utterly useless. Whereupon the United States, by their attorney as aforesaid, excepted to these instructions of the judge, and asked that their exceptions might be allowed; and they are allowed accordingly. P. Sprague, Judge.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

Mr. Lunt, U. S. Dist. Atty.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. It is not denied that in this case a report of the arrival of the vessel was made by the master, to the only officer of customs resident at the place of arrival, or that this report was made within the prescribed time, and contained all the required particulars. The objection is, that it was not made at the right place; that the act imperatively requires the report to be made, at the office of the principal officer of the customs; and that the penalty is to be inflicted upon the master, if it be made elsewhere. The act undoubtedly directs the master to repair to the office of the chief officer of the customs, as well as to make report; but it does not necessarily follow, that it inflicts a penalty upon the omission to repair thither. The penal clause applicable to this case, is as follows: "And if the master, or the person having the command of such vessel, shall neglect or omit to make the said report, or shall not fully comply with the true intent and meaning of this section, as the case may be, he shall, for each and every offence, forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars." 1 Stat. 649–651. It is to be considered, then, whether it was the intention of congress to impose a penalty only upon the omission to make the required report, or also upon the omission to repair to the office of the principal officer of customs to make it. And in the first place, it is to be observed, that in terms, it is only the omission to make the said report, or fully to comply with the true intent and meaning of the section, which renders the master liable to the penalty. And if, in point of fact, he do not omit to make the report, the only question would seem to be, whether he has not fully complied with the true intent and meaning of the section, by making the required report at a place within the port, where the officer actually received it. It is somewhat remarkable, that among all the acts required to be done by masters of vessels, in the way of reports and otherwise, there is no other case, under this statute, in which express mention is made of doing an act, at the office of the principal officer of the customs. Thus, in the 19th section, vessels bound to ports of delivery, are required to come to, at the port of entry of the district, "and there make report and entry in writing," &c. And so in very many other cases, the act is required to be done at the port, but not at any particular office. Nor do I find that the statute requires the principal officers to keep one stated and fixed place as and for an office. The 21st section directs them to attend in person at the ports to which they are respectively assigned, but does not make it necessary for them to transact their business at any one place therein. Undoubtedly, this section under consideration implies an expectation on the part of congress, that the officer will have an office, as it does that he will have stated hours for business. but it makes no requisition to that effect, and leaves both these particulars to be regulated by the executive. And whether the officer shall have one fixed place, or several different places, for the transaction of his business, is manifestly a matter entirely beyond the control of masters of vessels. arriving from foreign ports, who must make the reports to the officer, where he chooses to be found and to receive them. Moreover, if the required report is in fact made in person to the proper officer, and is received by him, the substantial purpose of the law is answered. It might tend to produce somewhat more regularity and exactness, to have these reports made and received at a stated office; but to secure these, cannot be considered as forming a substantial part of the purpose of a law, which does not even require such an office to be kept, but leaves them to be secured by proper regulations of the treasury department, the head of which has ample powers for that purpose.

I am strongly inclined to think, that what is said in this section concerning repairing to the office, was designed for the relief of masters, by affording them, in some cases, an excuse for not making a report, and to limit more distinctly their obligation to do so, rather than to impose upon them the necessity, in all cases, of repairing thither. It exempts the master from the necessity of looking elsewhere for the officer. But however this may be, I am of opinion, that if the master does make the required report, in due season, to the proper officer, who receives it, he is not liable to the penalty for omitting to repair to the office, because for this last omission, the act does not in terms impose a penalty, and because the master has, on his part, fully complied with the true intent and meaning of the act, by doing all that is needful to answer its purpose; the clause respecting his repairing to the office, being directory merely, and not intended to compel him to go thither, if the business can be, and in fact is, completely done elsewhere, within the port.

For these reasons I am of opinion, that there was no error in the judgment; for though the court below, apparently for the purpose of submitting a question of fact to the jury, took a somewhat different view of the act, the substantial result arrived at was, that a report, seasonably made to the officer, at the port, and received by him, was a compliance with the act. The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

Case No. 16,148.

UNITED STATES v. REPUBLICAN BANNER OFFICERS.

Circuit Court, D. Tennessee.[1] 1863.

REBELLION—CONFISCATION ACTS—CONSTITUTIONALITY AND CONSTRUCTION.

Construction of the confiscation act of 1861 [12 Stat. 319]. It is constitutional, and applies to real estate.

Before CATRON, Circuit Justice, and TRIGG, District Judge.

TRIGG, District Judge. This cause is submitted to the court upon a motion to quash the information filed by the United States attorney, upon the ground that the real estate mentioned therein was not subject to seizure by virtue of the act of August 6, 1861, under which the proceeding in this cause has been instituted.

The question then to be decided by this court is: Does the act of August 6, 1861, embrace real estate within its provisions, and make that, as well as personal property, for the causes mentioned in said act, a subject of seizure, confiscation, and condemnation? It is not denied that the words of the act, "any property of whatsoever kind or description," are very comprehensive, and in their terms would embrace real, as well as personal, property. But it is insisted that congress did not intend to include all kinds of property by the broad and comprehensive language employed, and that this is manifest from the words used in the act in denouncing the penalty against the property used or employed, or intended to be used or employed, as therein stated. The act declares that "all such property is hereby declared to be lawful subject of prize and capture wherever found"; and it is argued that the words "prize and capture" are purely technical in their meaning, and apply alone to personal property, real estate not being a subject of prize and capture, and that these words, therefore, must be understood to have been used in their technical sense. And the words "prize and capture," being thus technical in their meaning, must control the previous words, and limit and confine their operation to that description of property to which "prize and capture" are applicable.

The words of the statute are ordinarily to be understood in their common, popular sense, regard being had to the connection in which they are used, and the subject to which they relate. But it is equally a rule of construction, as contended for by the counsel of the claimants, that technical words must be understood in their technical sense, as applicable to the subject of the statute in which they are used. They must be technical to the subject of the particular statute, and not to any other subject.

The more common application, however, of this rule is to words and phrases which have obtained a peculiar legal signification. In law phrase many words have an exact technical sense, unlike or more limited or extended than their popular ones; and in this sense they are ordinarily to be construed in statutes. 1 Bish. 368–370.

Now let us test the application of these rules to the statute we are considering, and see how far those technical words, "prize and capture," on which the argument of the counsel of the claimants is based, should be permitted to govern its construction. The question presented to the court is not without difficulty, but it is clear, from what has been before stated, that, in giving a construction to this statute, it will not do to be limited by the mere technical sense of the words "prize and capture," for in that case it is apparent that a large and distinct class of property would be excluded from its operation. And it is manifest, from the reading of the act, that property, other than such as might be captured on the sea, was intended to fall within its provisions. For the act, independent of the sweeping provision, "any property of whatsoever kind or description," expressly declares that "all such property is hereby declared to be lawful subject of prize and capture wherever found." To give a just construction, therefore, to the statute, we must ascertain what the congress intended, and to do this, after looking at the words of the act itself, we may look to the surrounding facts and circumstances which would probably have influenced congress in its passage. And in order that technical words used in the act may not be deprived of their just weight in fixing its construction, we must regard the subject of it, and see whether those technical words are technical to its subject, for if they are, they must be understood in their technical sense. If the words used are not technical to the subject of the act, they are improperly or inaccurately used, and it is a rule of construction that if words or expressions are used inaccurately, they will be construed in the sense intended, where that sense appears upon the whole face of the act. Now, what is the subject of the act we are considering? It is the confiscation of property used for insurrectionary purposes; and it is difficult to perceive that the technical words relied upon to govern the construction of the act are or can be technical to that subject. For by said act a new class of forfeitures, if we may so term them, is created, growing out of the present unhappy condition of our country, and which were never before known to our laws. These technical words, then, cannot control us in our construction, and we must look to the whole body of the act, ascertain the intention of congress in passing it, and construe the technical words "prize and capture" in the sense intended by them, and not in the strict legal sense in which they are usually understood.

The act declares that if "any person or persons, his, her, or their agent, attorney, or employee, shall purchase or acquire, sell or give any property of whatsoever kind or description, with intent to use or employ the same, or suffer the same to be used or employed, in aiding, abetting or promoting such insurrection or resistance to the laws, or any person or persons engaged therein; or if any person or persons being the owner or owners of any such property, shall knowingly use or employ the same as aforesaid, all such property is hereby declared to be lawful subject of prize and capture wherever found, and it shall be the duty of the president of the United States to cause the same to be seized, confiscated and condemned." The language of this act is broad and comprehensive, and looking to the surrounding facts and circumstances at the time, there being then a formidable rebellion in progress, the intention of congress, in enacting this law, must have been to deter persons from so using and employing their property as to aid and promote the insurrection, and thereby to diminish and weaken the power of the Rebellion—and perhaps it was also intended, by taking from him his property so unlawfully employed, to inflict upon the party a penalty for his misconduct in thus aiding and promoting a resistance to the laws. What, then, is included, it may be asked, under that broad language of the statute, "any property of whatever kind or description," which is lawful subject of prize and capture, and liable to be seized, confiscated and condemned? We answer that it is manifestly any property of whatever kind which is capable of being used or employed in aiding, abetting, or promoting the insurrection.

The only question, then, is whether real estate can be so used or employed, for if it can, there is no more reason why it should not be seized or confiscated than any other description of property. Certainly the mischiefs to result from such use of it would be as great as those from the use of property of any other kind. Suppose that a person, with the avowed purpose of aiding the insurrection, should purchase a piece of ground suitable for his object, and proceed to erect upon it the necessary buildings and machinery for the manufacture of guns and other small arms, and he does proceed, in accordance with his previous intent, to the manufacture of such weapons of war to supply the rebel army—can it be contended that such property, real estate if you choose, is not used, and as effectually used, in aiding, abetting, or promoting the insurrection as any movable property whatever? And, if so, why should it not be as much a subject of confiscation as any other? All property used in its ordinary and legitimate mode is exempt from the operation of the act, but the moment it is purchased or acquired, sold or given, with intent to use or employ it in aiding the insurrection, or if the owner knowingly and intentionally uses or employs his property for such a purpose, it immediately becomes the subject of seizure and condemnation under the act, whether it be real or personal property. The words "prize and capture," in the act, were intended to have the same meaning which is given to the word "seizure" in the act of July 17, 1862 [12 Stat. 589], and to apply as well to real as personal property.

The second section does not effect or in any manner conflict with this construction of the act. That section only provides for the condemnation of the property seized, and directs in what courts it should be made. It declares "that such prize and capture shall be condemned in the district or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of the amount, or in admiralty in any district in which the same may be seized, or into which they may be taken and proceedings first instituted." The plain interpretation of this provision is, that no doubt it was so intended, that the district court, and where the value of the property seized shall amount to the sum of five hundred dollars, the circuit court, concurrent with the district court, shall have cognizance of such seizure when the same shall be made on land, or on waters not navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden. But if the seizure be made upon the high seas, or on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden, then the proceedings must be instituted in admiralty, and, of course, in the district court, which, by the act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], has exclusive cognizance of admiralty cases.

The question raised by claimant's counsel in the closing argument, as to the constitutionality of the act, was not made upon the original motion as the same was entered, and was not argued on behalf of the United States. No authority, however, was produced, and it seems to me that the arguments relied on to sustain its constitutionality would be as applicable to any other law of congress imposing the penalty of forfeiture as to the act we are considering.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the information filed in this case ought not to be quashed.

Case No. 16,149.

UNITED STATES v. REYMERT.

Circuit Court S. D. New York. 1865.

DEPOSITARIES OF PUBLIC MONEYS — SHORTAGE OF ACCOUNTS—EVIDENCE.

[Where a receiver of public moneys was charged with a shortage of some $6,000 in his accounts, but claimed that the money had been stolen from him, held, that it was decisive against him that he had never in any manner presented to any accounting officer of the treasury a claim for a credit in that sum, and had not at the trial shown himself to be in possession of any vouchers not before in his power to procure.]

This action, brought to recover the amount remaining due on the official accounts of the defendant [James D. Reymert], late receiver of public moneys and designated depositary at Hudson, Wis., came on for trial on the 10th instant. The plaintiffs introduced and proved the original bond of the defendant, and a treasury transcript showing a balance of $6,000 due to the United States treasury; and also called Mr. P. F. Wilson, special agent of the treasury department, who testified that in the early part of the summer of 1861, he went out to defendant's office and examined the books, which showed that there was due to the treasury from defendant about $9,400; that defendant subsequently paid to the United States marshal at Chicago about $1,500, and to the witness at St. Croix Falls, Wis., about $1,850, leaving just $6,000 due the treasury as above; that defendant had no money in the safe, and told Mr. Wilson that this amount had been stolen from him; but nevertheless promised to pay it, and gave to Mr. Wilson certain conveyances (which were not produced) which Mr. W. said he understood at the time were given as collateral to defendant's official bond, and as a further security for the $6,000.

On the part of the defendant evidence was introduced to show the insecurity of the safe furnished to defendant and the precautions he took for greater safety; that the safe contained the exact balance shown by the books of the office on the 28th of February or March 1, 1861; that on the 4th of March following, large amounts were received from two other receivers, and a large payment made to Mr. Mix, Indian agent; that on the evening of that day, on making up his accounts, and examining the money on hand, $6,000 was found to be missing; and that the money was kept in bags. Defendant also introduced evidence to show that he had actually incurred expenses for clerk hire and guarding the money, which expenses had been disallowed by the accounting officers of the treasury.

E. Delafield Smith, U. S. Dist. Atty., P. F. Wilson, and F. B. Clarkson, for United States.

George W. Stevens, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge, said he must direct the jury to bring in a verdict for the plaintiffs; that without entering into the question whether defendant was entitled to a credit on his accounts for money lost by theft or robbery, it was decisive of this case that he had never in any manner presented to any accounting officer of the treasury a claim for credit for the $6,000; nor had he on the trial shown himself to be in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure. Acts March 3, 1797, § 4 (1 Stat. 512). The judge further said that as to the claims made and disallowed for credit on account of expenses incurred, the defendant had not in any manner shown himself authorized to incur such expenses, and it did not appear, therefore, that they had been improperly disallowed (Acts Aug. 6, 1846, § 13; 9 Stat. 59), and the transcript of the books of the treasury department, introduced by plaintiffs, showing that the defendant is indebted in the sum of $6,000, it is incumbent on him to prove conclusively that he is not.

The jury accordingly rendered a verdict for the United States for $6,000 and interest from August 5, 1861.

INTERNAL REVENUE—AUTHORITY OF INSPECTORS—EXAMINATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

1. The law under which the national banks are incorporated does not exempt them from examination by the internal revenue officers mentioned in section 3177 of the Revised Statutes.

2. A clerk of a supervisor of internal revenue is, however, not such an officer.

At law.

John K. Valentine, U. S. Atty.

Charles S. Pancoast, for defendant.

CADWALADER, District Judge (charging jury). Section 3177 of Revised Statutes of the United States enacts, that "any collector, deputy collector, or inspector, may enter in the day time, any building or place where any articles or objects subject to tax are . . . kept within his district, so far as it may be necessary for the purpose of examining said article or articles, and that any owner or person having the agency or superintendence of such building or place, who refuses to suffer such officer to examine such article or articles, shall for every such refusal, forfeit five hundred dollars." Section 3163 enacts, that every supervisor, under the direction of the commissioner, shall see that all laws and regulations relating to the collection of internal taxes, are faithfully executed and complied with, etc. The present suit is to recover $500, a penalty alleged to have been incurred by the defendant, who is president of a national bank, by refusing to suffer a person who was acting under the direction of Mr. Tutton, the supervisor of internal revenue, to examine such checks of customers of the bank as were kept in it, in order to discover whether any, and which of them were unstamped, contrary to the provisions of the internal revenue law upon the subject.

It is alleged that there was an application to the defendant, to suffer such an examination to be made, and that the defendant refused to suffer this to be done. The defendant contends that the revenue officer had no right to make the examination requested. The ground of this contention is, that the law under which the national banks are incorporated provides for the occasional examination of their affairs, and for reports of their condition to the controller of the currency, and enacts that they shall not be subject to any visitorial powers other than are authorized by the act, or are vested in the courts of justice. These banks are fiscal agents of the government of the United States, and it would be most extraordinary that congress should have exempted their customers from a necessary and proper scrutiny under the revenue laws in a matter which has no legitimate connection whatever with the affairs of the banks. As to the position thus taken by the defence, I am of the opinion that it is wholly unreasonable and unfounded in law. If you believe the testimony of Mr. Tutton, he told the defendant that there was no desire or intention to examine into the affairs of the bank, or the accounts of its customers, and stated that the sole purpose was to ascertain whether checks in its keeping were unstamp-

[1] [Reprinted from 33 Leg. Int. 258, by permission.]

ed. If unstamped, they were subject to tax under the revenue law. The visitorial powers over a corporation are the subject of a distinct head under the law of corporations. The examination of such checks under the revenue law is not the exercise of a visitorial power under the act of congress relative to the banks. This part of the defence, therefore, fails in law. It appears, however, that the person who asked to make the examination in this case was a clerk to the supervisor. Such a person is not an officer within the meaning of the law. The words of section 3177 are, "any collector, deputy collector or inspector;" and a clerk to the supervisor is not included in this description. If the supervisor was himself authorized to make such an examination, he could not delegate this power to his clerk. Your verdict should, therefore, for this reason, be for the defendant.

UNITED STATES v. RHODES.

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. 1866.

INDICTMENT—CIVIL RIGHTS BILL—ITS CONSTITUTIONALITY.

1. An indictment need not aver the existence or the provisions of a public statute upon which the prosecution is founded.

[Cited in U. S v. Goodwin, 20 Fed. 239.]

2. An indictment for burglary in entering the house of T. in Kentucky, averred that T. was of African descent, and a citizen; that she was, by the laws of Kentucky, denied the right to testify against the defendants, they being white. There was a public statute of Kentucky, enabling white persons under similar circumstances to testify. Held, that the indictment was sufficient, and that the circuit court might take jurisdiction under section 3 of the act of April 9, 1866, (14 Stat. 27) known as the "civil rights" bill, notwithstanding there was no averment of the statute of Kentucky. The circuit court should take judicial notice of such statute, and the indictment should be construed in the same manner as if the statute were averred.

3. A prosecution for burglary is "a cause affecting" the owner of the building entered, within the meaning of section 3 of the civil rights bill, giving the courts of the Union jurisdiction of all causes affecting persons who cannot enforce in the courts of the state any of the rights secured to them by the first section. If the owner of the building entered, is, on account of color, incompetent, by the law of the state where the offense is alleged to have been committed, to testify in support of the indictment as a white person might, the circuit court has jurisdiction.

4. The criminal jurisdiction conferred upon the circuit and district courts by section 3 of the civil rights bill, is not confined to offenses committed by colored persons. It extends to prosecutions against white persons for offenses affecting persons who cannot enforce in the state courts the rights secured to them by section 1.

5. The civil rights bill is not a penal statute. It is a remedial one, and is to be liberally construed.

6. The history of the adoption of the first thirteen amendments to the constitution, and the objects and proper construction of them, explained.

7. Free persons of color, born within the allegiance of the United States, are citizens; and have always been entitled to be so regarded.

[Cited in McKay v. Campbell, Case No. 8,840.]

8. The dicta to the contrary, in Scott v. Sanford. 19 How. [60 U. S.] 393, disapproved.

9. The emancipation of a native born slave, by the thirteenth amendment, removed the disability of slavery, and made him a citizen of the United States; subject, however, to any lawful restrictions imposed upon his right to vote, or other powers or privileges.

[Cited in Le Grand v. U. S., 12 Fed. 581; U. S. v. Harris, 106 U. S. 640, 1 Sup. Ct. 610.]

10. The act of April 9, 1866 (14 Stat. 27) known as the "civil rights" bill, is constitutional in all its provisions. It is an appropriate method of exercising the power conferred on congress by the thirteenth amendment.

[11. Cited in Re Bogart, Case No. 1,596, to the point that since the organization of the supreme court, but three acts of congress have been pronounced by that body void for unconstitutionality.]

Motion in arrest of judgment.

SWAYNE, Circuit Justice. This is a prosecution under the act of congress of the 9th of April, 1866 [14 Stat. 27], entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication." The defendants having been found guilty by a jury, the case is now before us upon a motion in arrest of judgment.

Three grounds are relied upon in support of the motion. It is insisted: I. That the indictment is fatally defective. II. That the case which it makes, or was intended to make, is not within the act of congress upon which it is founded. III. That the act itself is unconstitutional and void.

I. As to the indictment, if either count be sufficient, it will support the judgment of the court upon the verdict. Our attention will be confined to the second count. That count alleges that the defendants, being white persons, "on the 1st of May, 1866, at the county of Nelson, in the state and district of Kentucky, at the hour of eleven of the clock in the night of the same day, feloniously and burglariously did break and enter the dwelling house there situate of Nancy Talbot, a citizen of the United States of the African race, having been born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, who was then and there, and is now, denied the right to testify against the said defendants, in the courts of the state of Kentucky, and of the said county of Nelson, with intent the goods and chattels, moneys and property of the said Nancy Talbot, in the said dwelling house then and there being, feloniously and burglariously to steal, take, and carry away, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States."

The objection urged against this count is, that it does not aver that "white citizens" enjoy the right which it is alleged is denied to Nancy Talbot. This fact is vital in the case. Without it our jurisdiction cannot be maintained. It is averred that she is a citizen of the United States, of the African race, and that she is denied the right to testify against the defendants, they being white persons. Section 669 of the Code of Civil Practice of Kentucky gives this right to white persons under the same circumstances. This is a public statute, and we are bound to take judicial cognizance of it. It is never necessary to set forth matters of law in a criminal pleading. The indictment is, in legal effect, as if it averred the existence and provisions of the statute. The enjoyment of the right in question by white citizens is a conclusion of law from the facts stated. Averment and proof could not bring it into the case more effectually for any purpose than it is there already. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 188; 2 Bos. & P. 127; 2 Leach, 942; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. §§ 52, 53. This right is one of those secured to Nancy Talbot by the first section of this act. The objection to this count cannot be sustained.

II. Is the offense charged, within the statute? The first section enacts: — "That all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens, of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery," . . . . "shall have the same right in every state and territory in the United States, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, sell and convey real and personal property; and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding."

The second section provides:—"That any person, who under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any state or territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having at any time been held in the condition of slavery," . . . . "or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," &c.

The third section declares:—"That the district courts of the United States within their respective districts, shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several states, cognizance of all crimes and offenses committed against the provisions of this act, and also, concurrently with the circuit courts of the United States, of all causes, civil and criminal, affecting persons who are denied or cannot enforce in the courts or judicial tribunals of the state where they may be, any of the rights secured to them by the first section of this act; and if any suit or prosecution, civil or criminal, shall be commenced in any state court against such person, for any cause whatsoever," . . . . . "such defendant shall have the right to remove such cause for trial to the proper district or circuit court in the manner prescribed by the act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases, approved March 3, 1863, and all acts amendatory thereof."

It will be observed that jurisdiction is given to this court "of all causes, civil and criminal," affecting persons who are denied or cannot enforce in the local state courts "any of the rights secured by the first section of this act." The denial of any one is as effectual as the denial of any other or of all. But it is said the cause set forth in the indictment is not one affecting Nancy Talbot, in the sense of the law, and that therefore this court has no jurisdiction. U. S. v. Ortega, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 467, is relied upon as authority for this proposition. That case is as follows: The constitution provides (article 3, § 2) that—"In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction."

Ortega was indicted in the circuit court for "infracting the law of nations by offering violence to the person" of Salmon, the charge d'affaires of Spain in the United States. The judges of the circuit court were opposed in opinion upon two questions, which were thereupon certified to the supreme court. They were: (1) Whether the case was one affecting a public minister within the meaning of the constitution; (2) and whether in such cases the jurisdiction of the supreme court is exclusive.

The supreme court decided only the first question. It was held that the case did not affect the charge d'affaires. This rendered it unnecessary to decide the other question. and it is still unsettled. It will be observed that the language of the statute is different. It is "causes, civil and criminal," and not "cases."

Burrill, in his Law Dictionary, thus defines "cause": "The origin or foundation of a thing, as of a suit or action; a ground of action. 1 Const. 470." The phrase "causes, civil and criminal," must be understood in the sense of causes of civil action and causes of criminal prosecution. These do unquestionably affect the plaintiff in the one case, and the party against whose person or property the crime is committed in the other.

The soundness and authority of the judgment in the case of Ortega are not questioned; but it is by no means true, as a universal proposition, that none are affected in the legal sense of the term, by a case, but those who are parties to the record. The solution of the question must always depend upon the circumstances.

In Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 584, the court said: "If a suit be brought against a foreign minister, the supreme court has original jurisdiction, and this is shown in the record; but suppose a suit be brought which affects the interests of a foreign minister, or by which his servant, or his secretary, becomes a party to the suit, but the actual defendant pleads to the jurisdiction and asserts his privilege. If the suit affects a foreign minister it must be dismissed; not because he is a party to it, but because it affects him."

It may be asked, what is—if this is not—the proper construction of the statute? It has been answered that none are affected in criminal cases but the sovereign prosecuting and the defendants; and that hence colored persons only can be prosecuted under its provisions. When the act was passed there was no state where ample provision did not exist for the trial and punishment of persons of color for all offenses; and no locality where there was any difficulty in enforcing the law against them. There was no complaint upon the subject. The aid of congress was not invoked in that direction. It is not denied that the first and second sections were designed solely for their benefit. The third section, giving the jurisdiction to which this question relates, provides expressly that if sued or prosecuted in a state court under the circumstances mentioned, they may at once have the cause certified into a proper federal court.

The fourth section requires district-attorneys, marshals and their deputies, commissioners, agents of the freedmen's bureau, and other officers specially empowered by the president, to institute proceedings at the expense of the United States, against all persons violating the provisions of the act; and "with a view to affording reasonable protection to all persons in their constitutional rights of equality before the law, without distinction of race or color, or previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude," it is made the duty of circuit courts of the United States to increase the number of their commissioners.

The fifth section imposes a heavy fine on marshals who shall refuse to receive or neglect to execute any process issued under the act; and it authorizes commissioners to appoint persons to serve such process issued by them.

The sixth section renders liable to fine and imprisonment any person who shall obstruct an officer or other person in the execution of such process; or who shall aid a person arrested to escape; or conceal a person for whose arrest a warrant has been issued.

Section eight authorizes the president to direct the judge, marshal, and district-attorney to attend at such place and for such time as he may designate, "for the purpose of the more speedy arrest and trial of persons charged with violations of this act."

The ninth section authorizes the president to employ such part of the land and naval forces of the United States, and of the militia, as shall be necessary to "prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of this act."

It is incredible that all this machinery, including the agency of the freedmen's bureau, would have been provided, if the intention were to limit the criminal jurisdiction conferred by the third section to colored persons, and exclude all white persons from its operation.

The title of the act is in harmony with this view of the subject. The construction contended for would obviously defeat the main object which congress had in view in passing the act, and produce results the opposite of those intended.

The difficulty was that where a white man was sued by a colored man, or was prosecuted for a crime against a colored man, colored witnesses were excluded. This in many cases involved a denial of justice. Crimes of the deepest dye were committed by white men with impunity. Courts and juries were frequently hostile to the colored man, and administered justice, both civil and criminal, in a corresponding spirit. Congress met these evils by giving to the colored man everywhere the same right to testify "as is enjoyed by white citizens," abolishing the distinction between white and colored witnesses, and by giving to the courts of the United States jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, which concern him, wherever the right to testify as if he were white is denied to him or cannot be enforced in the local tribunals of the state.

The context and the rules of interpretation to be applied permit of no other construction. Such was clearly the intention of congress, and that intention constitutes the law.

This, with the provision which authorizes colored defendants in the state courts to have their causes certified into the federal courts, and the other provisions referred to, renders the protection which congress has given as effectual as it can well be made by legislation. It is one system, all the parts looking to the same end.

Where crime is committed with impunity by any class of persons, society, so far as they are concerned, is reduced to that condition of barbarism which compels those unprotected by other sanctions to rely upon physical force for the vindication of their natural rights. There is no other remedy, and no other security.

It is said there can be no such thing as a right to testify, and that if congress conferred it by this act, a cloud of colored witnesses may appear in every case and claim to exercise it. There is no force in this argument. The statute is to be construed reasonably. Like the right to sue and to contract, it is to be exercised only on proper occasions and within proper limits. Every right given is to be the same "as is enjoyed by white citizens."

It is urged that this is a penal statute, and to be construed strictly. We regard it as remedial in its character, and to be construed liberally, to carry out the wise and beneficent purposes of congress in enacting it. Bac. Abr. tit. "Statute," 1.

But if the act were a penal statute, the canons of interpretation to be applied would not affect the conclusion at which we have arrived. U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 96; Com. v. Loring, 8 Pick. 374; U. S. v. Morris, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 475; U. S. v. Winn [Case No. 16,740]; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, 236. This objection to the indictment cannot avail the defendants.

III. Is the act warranted by the constitution? The first eleven amendments of the constitution were intended to limit the powers of the government which it created, and to protect the people of the states. Though earnestly sustained by the friends of the constitution, they originated in the hostile feelings with which it was regarded by a large portion of the people, and were shaped by the jealous policy which those feelings inspired. The enemies of the constitution saw many perils of evil in the center, but none elsewhere. They feared tyranny in the head, not anarchy in the members, and they took their measures accordingly. The friends of the constitution desired to obviate all just grounds of apprehension, and to give repose to the public mind. It was important to unite, as far as possible, the entire people in support of the new system which had been adopted. They felt the necessity of doing all in their power to remove every obstacle in the way of its success. The most momentous consequences for good or evil to the country were to follow the results of the experiment. Hence the spirit of concession which animated the convention, and hence the adoption of these amendments after the work of the convention was done and had been approved by the people. The twelfth amendment grew out of the contest between Jefferson and Burr for the presidency. The thirteenth amendment is the last one made. It trenches directly upon the power of the states and of the people of the states. It is the first and only instance of a change of this character in the organic law. It destroyed the most important relation between capital and labor in all the states where slavery existed. It affected deeply the fortunes of a large portion of their people. It struck out of existence millions of property. The measure was the consequence of a strife of opinions, and a conflict of interests, real or imaginary, as old as the constitution itself. These elements of discord grew in intensity. Their violence was increased by the throes and convulsions of a civil war. The impetuous vortex finally swallowed up the evil, and with it forever the power to restore it. Those who insisted upon the adoption of this amendment were animated by no spirit of vengeance. They sought security against the recurrence of a sectional conflict. They felt that much was due to the African race for the part it had borne during the war. They were also impelled by a sense of right and by a strong sense of justice to an unoffending and long-suffering people. These considerations must not be lost sight of when we come to examine the amendment in order to ascertain its proper construction.

The act of congress confers citizenship. Who are citizens, and what are their rights? The constitution uses the words "citizen" and "natural born citizens;" but neither that instrument nor any act of congress has attempted to define their meaning. British jurisprudence, whence so much of our own is drawn, throws little light upon the subject. In Johnson's Dictionary, "citizen" is thus defined: "(1) A freeman of a city; not a foreigner; not a slave; (2) a townsman, a man of trade; not a gentleman; (3) an inhabitant; a dweller in any place."

The definitions given by other English lexicographers are substantially the same. In Jacob's Law Dictionary (Ed. 1783), the only definition given is as follows: "Citizens (cives) of London are either freemen or such as reside and keep a family in the city, etc.; and some are citizens and freemen, and some are not, who have not so great privileges as others. The citizens of London may prescribe against a statute, because their liberties are reinforced by statute." 1 Rolle, 105.

Blackstone and Tomlin contain nothing upon the subject. "The word 'civis,' taken in the strictest sense, extends only to him that is entitled to the privileges of a city of which he is a member, and in that sense there is a distinction between a citizen and an inhabitant within the same city, for every inhabitant there is not a citizen." Scot v. Schwartz, Comyn, 677. "A citizen is a freeman who has kept a family in a city." Roy v. Hanger, 1 Rolle, 138, 149. "The term 'citizen,' as understood in our law, is precisely analogous to the term subject, in the common law; and the change of phrases has entirely resulted from the change of government. The sovereignty has been changed from one man to the collective body of the people, and he who before was a subject of the king is now a citizen of the state." State v. Manuel, 4 Dev. & B. 26.

In Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 247, the supreme court of the United States said: "During the war each party claimed the allegiance of the natives of the colonies as due exclusively to itself. The Americans insisted upon the allegiance of all born within the states, respectively; and Great Britain asserted an equally exclusive claim. The treaty of 1783 acted upon the state of things as it existed at that period. It took the actual state of things as its basis. All those, whether natives or otherwise, who then adhered to the American states, were virtually absolved from their allegiance to the British crown, and those who then adhered to the British crown, were deemed and held subjects of that crown. The treaty of peace was a treaty operating between the states on each side, and the inhabitants thereof; in the language of the seventh article, it was a 'firm and perpetual peace between his Britannic majesty and the said states, and between the subjects of one and the citizens of the other.' Who then were subjects or citizens was to be decided by the state of facts. If they were originally subjects of Great Britain and then adhered to her and were claimed by her as subjects, the treaty deemed them such; if they were originally British subjects, but then adhering to the states, the treaty deemed them citizens."

All persons born in the allegiance of the king are natural born subjects, and all persons born in the allegiance of the United States are natural born citizens. Birth and allegiance go together. Such is the rule of the common law, and it is the common law of this country, as well as of England. There are two exceptions, and only two, to the universality of its application. The children of ambassadors are in theory born in the allegiance of the powers the ambassadors represent, and slaves, in legal contemplation, are property, and not persons. 2 Kent, Comm. 1; Calvin's Case, 7 Coke, 1; 1 Bl. Comm. 366; Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sand. Ch. 583.

The common law has made no distinction on account of race or color. None is now made in England, nor in any other Christian country of Europe. The fourth of the Articles of Confederation declared that the "free inhabitants of each of these states, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the United States," &c. On the 25th of June, 1778, when these articles were under consideration by the congress, South Carolina moved to amend this fourth article by inserting after the word "free" and before the word "inhabitants," the word "white." Two states voted for the amendment and eight against it. The vote of one was divided. Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 575. When the constitution was adopted, free men of color were clothed with the franchise of voting in at least five states, and were a part of the people whose sanction breathed into it the breath of life. Scott v. Sanford, Id. 573; State v. Manuel, 2 Dev. & B. 24, 25.

" 'Citizens' under our constitution and laws means free inhabitants born within the United States or naturalized under the laws of congress." 1 Kent, Comm. 292, note. We find no warrant for the opinion that this great principle of the common law has ever been changed in the United States. It has always obtained here with the same vigor, and subject only to the same exceptions, since as before the Revolution.

It is further said in the note in 1 Kent, Comm., before referred to: "If a slave born in the United States be manumitted or otherwise lawfully discharged from bondage, or if a black man born in the United States becomes free, he becomes thenceforward a citizen, but under such disabilities as the laws of the several states may deem it expedient to prescribe to persons of color."

In the case of State v. Manuel, supra, it was remarked: "It has been said that by the constitution of the United States, the power of naturalization has been conferred exclusively upon congress, and therefore it cannot be competent for any state by its municipal regulations to make a citizen. But what is naturalization? It is the removal of the disabilities of alienage. Emancipation is the removal of the incapacity of slavery. The latter depends wholly upon the internal regulations of the state. The former belongs to the government of the United States. It would be dangerous to confound them." Id. p. 25.

This was a decision of the supreme court of North Carolina, made in the year 1836. The opinion was delivered by Judge Gaston. He was one of the most able and learned judges this country has produced. The same court, in 1848, Chief Justice Ruffin delivering the opinion, referred to the case of State v. Manuel, and said: "That case underwent a very laborious investigation by both the bench and the bar. The case was brought here by appeal, and was felt to be one of very great importance in principle. It was considered with an anxiety and care worthy of the principle involved, and which give it a controlling influence upon all questions of similar nature." State v. Newsom, 5 Ired. 253.

We cannot deny the assent of our judgment to the soundness of the proposition that the emancipation of a native born slave by removing the disability of slavery made him a citizen. If these views be correct, the provision in the act of congress conferring citizenship was unnecessary, and is inoperative. Granting this to be so, it was well, if congress had the power, to insert it, in order to prevent doubts and differences of opinion which might otherwise have existed upon the subject. We are aware that a majority of the court, in the case of Scott v. Sanford, arrived at conclusions different from those we have expressed. But in our judgment these points were not before them. They decided that the whole case, including the agreed facts, was open to their examination, and that Scott was a slave. This central and controlling fact excluded all other questions, and what was said upon them by those of the majority, with whatever learning and ability the argument was conducted, is no more binding upon this court as authority than the views of the minority upon the same subjects. Carroll v. Carroll, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 287.

The fact that one is a subject or citizen determines nothing as to his rights as such. They vary in different localities and according to circumstances. Citizenship has no necessary connection with the franchise of voting, eligibility to office, or indeed with any other rights, civil or political. Women, minors, and persons non compos are citizens, and not the less so on account of their disabilities. In England, not to advert to the various local regulations, the new reform bill gives the right of voting for members of parliament to about eight hundred thousand persons from whom it was before withheld. There, the subject is wholly within the control of parliament. Here, until the thirteenth amendment was adopted, the power belonged entirely to the states, and they exercised it without question from any quarter, as absolutely as if they were not members of the Union.

The first ten amendments to the constitution, which are in the nature of a bill of rights, apply only to the national government. They were not intended to restrict the power of the states. Barrows v. Mayor, etc., 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 247; Withers v. Buckley, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 84; Murphy v. People, 2 Cow. 818.

Our attention has been called to several treaties by which Indians were made citizens; to those by which Louisiana, Florida, and California were acquired, and to the act passed in relation to Texas. All this was done under the war and treaty making powers of the constitution, and those which authorize the national government to regulate the territory and other property of the United States, and to admit new states into the Union. American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 511; Cross v. Harrison, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 164; 2 Story, Const. 158.

These powers are not involved in the question before us, and it is not necessary particularly to consider them. A few remarks, however, in this connection will not be out of place. A treaty is declared by the constitution to be the "law of the land." What is unwarranted or forbidden by the constitution can no more be done in one way than in another. The authority of the national government is limited, though supreme in the sphere of its operation. As compared with the state governments, the subjects upon which it operates are few in number. Its objects are all national. It is one wholly of delegated powers. The states possess all which they have not surrendered; the government of the Union only such as the constitution has given to it, expressly or incidentally, and by reasonable intendment. Whenever an act of that government is challenged a grant of power must be shown, or the act is void.

"The power to make colored persons citizens has been actually exercised in repeated and important instances. See the treaty with the Choctaws of September 27, 1830, art. 14; with the Cherokees of May 20, 1836, art. 12; and the treaty of Guadeloupe Hidalgo, of February 2, 1848, art. 8." Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 486, opinion of Curtis, J.

See, also, the treaty with France of April 30, 1803, by which Louisiana was acquired (article 3); and the treaty with Spain of the 23rd of February, 1819, by which Florida was acquired (article 3). The article referred to in the treaty with France and in the treaty with Spain is in the same language. In both the phrase "inhabitants" is used. No discrimination is made against those, in whole or in part, of the African race. So in the treaty of Guadeloupe Hidalgo (articles 8 and 9), no reference is made to color.

Our attention has been called to three provisions of the constitution, besides the thirteenth amendment, each of which will be briefly adverted to.

1. Congress has power "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." Article 1, § 8. After considerable fluctuations of judicial opinion, it was finally settled by the supreme court that this power is vested exclusively in congress. Collet v. Collet, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 294; U. S. v. Velati, Id. 370; Golden v. Prince [Case No. 5,509]; Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 259; Houston v. Moore, Id. 49; Federalist, No. 32.

An alien naturalized is "to all intents and purposes a natural born subject." Co. Litt. 129. "Naturalization takes effect from birth; denization from the date of the patent." Vin. Abr. tit. "Alien," D. Until the passage of a late act of parliament, naturalization in England was effected by a special statute in each case. The statutes were usually alike. The form appears in Godfrey v. Dickson, Cro. Jac. 539, c. 7. Under the late act a resident alien may accomplish the object by a petition to the secretary of state for the home department.

The power is applicable only to those of foreign birth. Alienage is an indispensable element in the process. To make one of domestic birth a citizen is not naturalization, and cannot be brought within the exercise of that power. There is a universal agreement of opinion upon this subject. Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 578; 2 Story, Const. 44.

In the exercise of this power congress has confined the law to white persons. No one doubts their authority to extend it to all aliens, without regard to race or color. But they were not bound to do so. As in other cases, it was for them to determine the extent and the manner in which the power given should be exercised. They could not exceed it, but they were not bound to exhaust it. It was well remarked by one of the dissenting judges, in Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 586, in regard to the African race:

"The constitution has not excluded them, and since that has conferred on congress the power to naturalize colored aliens, it certainly shows color is not a necessary qualification for citizenship under the constitution of the United States."

It may be added that before the adoption of the constitution, the states possessed the power of making both those of foreign and domestic birth citizens, according to their discretion. This power, as to the former, they surrendered. They did not as to the latter, and they still possess it.

"The powers not delegated to the United States by this constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people." Const. Amend. What the several states under the original constitution only could have done, the nation has done by the thirteenth amendment. An occasion for the exercise of this power by the states may not, perhaps cannot, hereafter arise.

2. "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." Const. art. 14, § 2. This provision of the constitution applies only to citizens going from one state to another. "It is obvious that if the citizens of each state were to be deemed aliens to each other, they could not take or hold real estate, or other privileges, except as other aliens." "The intention of this clause was to confer on them, as one may say, a general citizenship, and to communicate all the privileges and immunities which the citizens of the same state would be entitled to under the same circumstances." 2 Story, Const. § 187.

Chancellor Kent says: "If citizens remove from one state to another, they are entitled to the privileges that persons of the same description are entitled to in the states to which the removal is made, and to none other." 2 Kent, Comm. 36. This provision does not bear particularly upon the question before us, and need not be further considered.

3. "The United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence." Article 4, § 4.

Mr. Justice Story, adopting the language of the Federalist, says: "That but for this power a successful faction might erect a tyranny on the ruins of order and law, while no succor could be constitutionally afforded by the Union to the friends and supporters of the government." . . . "But a right implies a remedy, and where else could the remedy be deposited than where it is deposited by the constitution?" 2 Story, Const. 559, 560. This topic is foreign to the subject before us. We shall not pursue it further.

Congress, in passing the act under consideration, did not proceed upon this ground. It is not the theory or purpose of that act to apply the appropriate remedy for such a state of things. The constitutionality of the act cannot be sustained under this section.

This brings us to the examination of the thirteenth amendment. It is as follows:

"Article 13, § 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Before the adoption of this amendment, the constitution, at the close of the enumeration of the powers of congress, authorized that body "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof."

In McCullough v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 421–423, Chief Justice Marshall used the phrase "appropriate" as the equivalent and exponent of "necessary and proper" in the preceding paragraph. He said: "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to the end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional." . . . . "To use one" (a bank) "must be within the discretion of congress, if it be an appropriate mode of executing the powers of government." . . . . "But were its necessity less apparent" (the Bank of the United States), "none can deny its being an appropriate measure; and if it is, the degree of its necessity, as has been justly observed, is to be discussed in another place."

Pursuing the subject, he added: "When the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects entrusted to the government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity, would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground. This court disclaims all pretensions to such a power."

Judge Story says: "In the practical application of government, then, the public functionaries must be left at liberty to exercise the powers with which the people, by the constitution and laws, have entrusted them. They must have a wide discretion as to the choice of means; and the only limitation upon the discretion would seem to be that the means are appropriate to the end; and this must admit of considerable latitude, for the relation between the action and the end, as has been justly remarked, is not always so direct and palpable as to strike the eye of every observer. If the end be legitimate, and within the scope of the constitution, all the means which are appropriate, and which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, may be constitutionally employed to carry it into effect." 1 Story, Const. § 432.

These passages show the spirit in which the amendment is to be interpreted, and develop fully the principles to be applied. Before proceeding further, it would be well to pause and direct our attention to what has been deemed appropriate in the execution of some of the other powers confided to congress in like general terms.

(1) "The power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imposts." This includes authority to build custom houses; to employ revenue cutters; to appoint the necessary collectors and other officers; to take bonds for the performance of their duties; to establish the needful bureaus; to prescribe when, how, and in what the taxes and duties shall be paid; to rent or build warehouses for temporary storing purposes; to define all crimes relating to the subject in its various ramifications, with their punishment; and to provide for their prosecution.

(2) "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." This carries with it the power to build and maintain lighthouses, piers, and breakwaters; to employ revenue cutters; to cause surveys to be made of coasts, rivers, and harbors; to appoint all necessary officers, at home and abroad; to prescribe their duties, fix their terms of office and compensation; and to define and punish all crimes relating to commerce within the sphere of the constitution. U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72; U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 407.

(3) "To establish post-offices and post-roads." This gives authority to appoint a postmaster-general, and local postmasters throughout the country; to define their duties and compensation; to cause the mails to be carried by contract, or by the servants of the department, to all parts of the states and territories of the Union, and to foreign countries, and to punish crimes relating to the service, including obstructions to those engaged in transporting the mail while in the performance of their duty. The mail penal code comprises more than fifty offenses. All of them rest for their necessary constitutional sanction upon this power, thus briefly expressed.

(4) "To raise and support armies." This includes the power to enlist such number of men for such periods and at such rates of compensation as may be deemed proper; to provide all the necessary officers, equipments, and supplies, and to establish a military academy, where are taught military and such other sciences and branches of knowledge as may be deemed expedient, in order to prepare young men for the military service.

(5) "To provide and maintain a navy." This authorizes the government to buy or build any number of steam or other ships of war, to man, arm, and otherwise prepare them for war, and to dispatch them to any accessible part of the globe. Under this power the naval academy has been established. U. S. v. Beavan, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 390.

These are but a small part of the powers which are incidental and appropriate to the main powers expressly granted. It is Utopian to believe that without such constructive powers, the powers expressed can be so executed as to meet the intentions of the framers of the constitution, and to accomplish the objects for which governments are instituted. The constitution provides expressly for the exercise of such powers to the full extent that may be "necessary and proper." No other limitation is imposed. Without this provision, the same result would have followed. The means of execution are inherently and inseparably a part of the power to be executed.

The constitution declares that "the senators and representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several state legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several states, shall be bound by oath to support this constitution." No other oath is required, "yet he would be charged with insanity who would contend that the legislature might not superadd to the oath directed by the constitution such other oath of office as its wisdom might suggest." McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 416.

The Bank of the United States, with all its faculties, was sustained because it was "convenient" and "appropriate" for the government in the management of its fiscal affairs. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 316. Perhaps no measures of the national government have involved more doubt of their constitutionality than the acquisition of Louisiana and the embargo. Both were carried through congress by those who had been most strenuous for a strict construction of the constitution. Mr. Jefferson thought the former ultra vires, and advised an amendment of the constitution, but expressed a willingness to acquiesce if his friends should entertain a different opinion. 2 Story, Const. 160.

The Second Bank of the United States was a measure of the same class of thinkers. The acquisition of Florida involved the same question of constitutional power as the acquisition of Louisiana. It was universally acquiesced in; and the constitutional question was not raised.

It is an axiom in our jurisprudence, that an act of congress is not to be pronounced unconstitutional unless the defect of power to pass it is so clear as to admit of no doubt. Every doubt is to be resolved in favor of the validity of the law. "The opposition between the constitution and the law should be such, that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 128. "The presumption, indeed, must always be in favor of the validity of laws, if the contrary is not clearly demonstrated." Cooper v. Telfair, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 18. "A remedial power in the constitution is to be construed liberally." Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 476.

"Perhaps the safest rule of interpretation, after all, will be found to be to look to the nature and objects of the particular powers, duties, and rights, with all lights and aids of contemporary history, and to give to the words of each just such operation and force, consistent with their legitimate meaning, as may fairly secure and attain the ends proposed." Prigg v. Com., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 60.

Since the organization of the supreme court, but three acts of congress have been pronounced by that body void for unconstitutionality. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 137; Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 393; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 334.

The present effect of the amendment was to abolish slavery wherever it existed within the jurisdiction of the United States. In the future it throws its protection over every one, of every race, color, and condition within that jurisdiction, and guards them against the recurrence of the evil. The constitution, thus amended, consecrates the entire territory of the republic to freedom, as well as to free institutions. The amendment will continue to perform its function throughout the expanding domain of the nation, without limit of time or space. Present possessions and future acquisitions will be alike within the sphere of its operation.

Without any other provision than the first section of the amendment, congress would have had authority to give full effect to the abolition of slavery thereby decreed. It would have been competent to put in requisition the executive and judicial, as well as the legislative power, with all the energy needful for that purpose. The second section of the amendment was added out of abundant caution. It authorizes congress to select, from time to time, the means that might be deemed appropriate to the end. It employs a phrase which had been enlightened by well-considered judicial application. Any exercise of legislative power within its limits involves a legislative, and not a judicial question. It is only when the authority given has been clearly exceeded, that the judicial power can be invoked. Its office, then, is to repress and annul the excess; beyond that it is powerless.

We will now proceed to consider the state of things which existed before and at the time the amendment was adopted, the mischiefs complained of or apprehended, and the remedy intended to be provided for existing and anticipated evils.

When the late Civil War broke out, slavery of the African race subsisted in fifteen states of the Union. The legal code relating to persons in that condition was everywhere harsh and severe. An eminent writer said: "They cannot take property by descent or purchase; and all they find and all they own belongs to their master. They cannot make contracts, and they are deprived of civil rights. They are assets for the payment of debts, and cannot be emancipated by will or otherwise to the prejudice of creditors." 2 Kent, Comm. 281, 282.

In a note, it is added: "In Georgia, by an act of 1829, no person is permitted to teach a slave, a negro, or a free person of color to read or write. So in Virginia, by a statute of 1830, meetings of free negroes to learn reading or writing are unlawful, and subject them to corporal punishment; and it is unlawful for white persons to assemble with free negroes or slaves to teach them to read or write. The prohibitory act of the legislature of Alabama, passed at the session of 1831–2, relative to the instruction to be given to the slaves or free colored population, or exhortation, or preaching to them, or any mischievous influence attempted to be exerted over them, is sufficiently penal. Laws of similar import are presumed to exist in the other slaveholding states, but in Louisiana the law on the subject is armed with ten-fold severity. It not only forbids any person teaching slaves to read or write, but it declares that any person using language in any public discourse from the bar, bench, stage, or pulpit, or any other place, or in any private conversation, or making use of any sign or actions having a tendency to produce discontent among the free colored population or insubordination among the slaves, or who shall be knowingly instrumental in bringing into the state any paper, book, or pamphlet having a like tendency, shall, on conviction, be punishable with imprisonment or death, at the discretion of the court."

Slaves were imperfectly, if at all, protected from the grossest outrages by the whites. Justice was not for them. The charities and rights of the domestic relations had no legal existence among them. The shadow of the evil fell upon the free blacks. They had but few civil and no political rights in the slave states. Many of the badges of the bondman's degradation were fastened upon them. Their condition, like his, though not so bad, was helpless and hopeless. This is borne out by the passages we have given from Kent's

Commentaries. Further research would darken the picture. The states had always claimed and exercised the exclusive right to fix the status of all persons living within their jurisdiction.

On January 1, 1863, President Lincoln issued his proclamation of emancipation. Missouri and Maryland abolished slavery by their own voluntary action. Throughout the war the African race had evinced entire sympathy with the Union cause. At the close of the Rebellion two hundred thousand had become soldiers in the Union armies. The race had strong claims upon the justice and generosity of the nation. Weighty considerations of policy, humanity, and right were superadded. Slavery, in fact, still subsisted in thirteen states. Its simple abolition, leaving these laws and this exclusive power of the states over the emancipated in force, would have been a phantom of delusion. The hostility of the dominant class would have been animated with new ardor. Legislative oppression would have been increased in severity. Under the guise of police and other regulations slavery would have been in effect restored, perhaps in a worse form, and the gift of freedom would have been a curse instead of a blessing to those intended to be benefited. They would have had no longer the protection which the instinct of property leads its possessor to give in whatever form the property may exist. It was to guard against such evils that the second section of the amendment was framed. It was intended to give expressly to congress the requisite authority, and to leave no room for doubt or cavil upon the subject. The results have shown the wisdom of this forecast. Almost simultaneously with the adoption of the amendment this course of legislative oppression was begun. Hence, doubtless, the passage of the act under consideration. In the presence of these facts, who will say it is not an "appropriate" means of carrying out the object of the first section of the amendment, and a necessary and proper execution of the power conferred by the second? Blot out this act and deny the constitutional power to pass it, and the worst effects of slavery might speedily follow. It would be a virtual abrogation of the amendment.

It would be a remarkable anomaly if the national government, without this amendment, could confer citizenship on aliens of every race or color, and citizenship, with civil and political rights, on the "inhabitants" of Louisiana and Florida, without reference to race or color, and can not, with the help of the amendment, confer on those of the African race, who have been born and always lived within the United States, all that this law seeks to give them.

It was passed by the congress succeeding the one which proposed the amendment. Many of the members of both houses were the same. This fact is not without weight and significance. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 401.

The amendment reversed and annulled the original policy of the constitution, which left it to each state to decide exclusively for itself whether slavery should or should not exist as a local institution, and what disabilities should attach to those of the servile race within its limits. The whites needed no relief or protection, and they are practically unaffected by the amendment. The emancipation which it wrought was an act of great national grace, and was doubtless intended to reach further in its effects as to every one within its scope, than the consequences of a manumission by a private individual.

We entertain no doubt of the constitutionality of the act in all its provisions. It gives only certain civil rights. Whether it was competent for congress to confer political rights also, involves a different inquiry. We have not found it necessary to consider the subject.

We are not unmindful of the opinion of the court of appeals of Kentucky, in the case of Brown v. Com. [4 Metc. (Ky.) 221]. With all our respect for the eminent tribunal from which it proceeded, we have found ourselves unable to concur in its conclusions. The constitutionality of the act is sustained by the supreme court of Indiana, and the chief justice of the court of appeals of Maryland, in able and well-considered opinions. Smith v. Moody, 26 Ind. 299; In re A. H. Somers.

We are happy to know that if we have erred the supreme court of the United States can revise our judgment and correct our error. The motion is overruled, and judgment will be entered upon the verdict.

Motion overruled.

UNITED STATES v. RHODES.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1807.

COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES—LARCENY BY SLAVE.

The owner of goods stolen by a slave is not a competent witness for the prosecution, because he is entitled to one half of the fine which the court must impose under the act of congress.

Indictment [against Milly Rhodes, a slave] for stealing a piece of Russia linen, the property of Mr. Vowell.

Mr. Jones contends that Vowell is a competent witness, because as a slave can have no property, there ought not to be a fine, and if no fine, no interest.

But THE COURT said, the act of congress under which she is indicted makes the fine a necessary part of the punishment, and Mr. Vowell will be entitled to one half of the fine.

Case No. 16,153.

UNITED STATES v. RICE.

[1 Hughes, 560.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. North Carolina. May, 1875.

HOMICIDE—KILLING BY UNITED STATES MARSHAL—RESISTING ARREST.

If a person charged with an offence against the law, after making public threats against the life of an officer ordered to arrest him, when that officer proceeds to make that arrest, so acts with rifle in hand, as to make that officer believe that he intends to execute his previous threat, the officer is justified in the instant of danger to himself in taking the life of the person to be arrested.

On the 15th of last September, Andrew Woody, of Spring Creek, Madison county, was killed by Noah H. Rice, a United States deputy marshal, who was endeavoring to serve a capias on him for violation of the internal revenue laws. From facts developed before the court it appears that Woody had expressed a determination to resist any process which might issue against him, and had threatened to kill the defendant Rice if he attempted to arrest him. When this officer came upon Woody the latter was armed with a rifle. His demeanor was hostile, and when commanded to surrender he so acted as to impress the officer with the belief that his intention was to shoot him, and in self-defence he fired upon Woody with fatal effect. Rice came to Asheville and surrendered himself to the authorities, was examined by Commissioner Watts on application for bail, and committed to jail. His case was finally removed to the United States court, on Tuesday, May 11, 1875. He was placed upon trial for his life. The jury having requested full instructions from the bench, they were given as follows by DICK, District Judge (charging jury). As this is a case of considerable importance to the defendant, and also to the due administration of justice, I have deemed it proper to commit to writing my instructions to the jury upon the questions of law involved. In this court in a trial for crime before one judge, defendants have no right to appeal, and the only remedy which they can have for misdirections to the jury on the part of the judge, is a motion for a new trial to be heard before the other judges of the court who were not present at the trial; then, upon a certificate of a division of opinion between the judges upon questions of law, the case may be carried to the supreme court for review. In all capital felonies tried by me sitting alone, I will allow defendants who may be convicted the benefit of these remedies; and I will always reduce to writing my instructions to the jury so that if I commit an error it may be corrected by the other judges who are authorized to preside in this court. All persons whose lives are put in jeopardy by a trial in court ought to have the benefit of all remedies afforded by law to guard against error and injustice. The humane and remedial provisions of the law ought to be fully afforded by courts of justice in favor of human life. The defendant in this case is charged with murder by an indictment found in the state court, and removed under the provisions of an act of congress to this court. This court has no original jurisdiction of the offence charged, but the case must be tried in the same manner as cases originating in this court; that is, the forms and modes of proceeding and the rules of evidence must be regulated by the course and practice of this court in criminal trials. The law which defines the offence is the criminal law which prevails in this state. This indictment is not founded upon a state statute, but is for an offence at common law. The laws of this state declare that the common law, with certain specified modifications, shall be in full force in this state. If the indictment was founded upon a state statute, we would be bound to regard the construction and exposition placed upon such statute by the supreme court of the state as a rule of decision. As it is founded upon the common law, we will look to the decisions of the state supreme court as highly important guides, but not as absolute authorities. We are at liberty to derive information as to the principles of the common law from the decisions of all the courts of England and this country which profess to administer criminal justice according to that wise, just, and time-honored system of law.

It is conceded that the alleged homicide was committed by the defendant, and he places his defence upon the ground that he was a regularly constituted officer of the United States, and had in his hands at the time of the homicide the process of law which authorized and commanded him to arrest the deceased for a crime against the United States; that the deceased resisted the execution of such process with a deadly weapon in his hands, and had manifested a purpose to use such deadly weapon in resistance; and that the homicide was necessarily committed in the attempt to make an arrest. This defence necessarily leads us to inquire what protection the common law affords to ministerial officers, and how far they are authorized to go in the performance of their public duties. Social order and political government are dependent upon the observance of law by the citizen. The mandates of the law are executed by officers provided for such purposes, and such officers are invested by the law with the authority necessary to execute its mandates, and it affords them all the protection possible in the rightful performance of the duties imposed. This rule is absolutely necessary for the advancement of justice, and is founded in wisdom and equity and in the principles of social and political order. The law must be supreme within the sphere of its operation, or its influence would be nugatory, and there would be no certain rule to regulate human conduct in society and government, and all the rights and liberties of citizens would soon be lost in a chaos of anarchy. Mr. Justice Foster says: "Ministers of justice while in the execution of their offices are under the peculiar protection of the law." Fost. Crown Law, 308. If an officer is killed while performing his duty, the law deems such killing murder of malice prepense. This protection is not confined to the precise time when the officer is performing his official duty, but extends over him while going to, remaining at, and returning from the place of action. Any opposition, obstruction, or resistance intended to prevent an officer from doing his official duty, is an indictable offence at common law, and the punishment is regulated by the nature of the offence.

An officer is authorized to summons as many persons as may be necessary to assist him in the performance of his legal duties, and such persons are bound to obey such summons, and they are under the same protection afforded to officers, as they are for the time officers of the law. The law imposes upon private persons the duty of suppressing affrays, preventing felonies from being committed in their presence, and arresting such offenders and bringing them to justice; and such private persons, while performing their duties, are under the protection of the law. We may confidently lay down the broad general principle, that when any person is performing a public duty required of him by law, he is under the protection of the law. An officer of the law who has legal process in his hands is bound to execute it according to the mandate of the writ. If he is resisted in the performance of this duty, he must overcome such resistance by the use of such force as may be necessary for him to execute his duty. If necessary, the law authorizes him to resort to extreme measures, and if the resisting party is killed in the struggle the homicide is justifiable. Garrett's Case, 1 Winst. 144. If unnecessary and excessive force is used, after resistance has entirely ceased and the defendant in the writ has manifested his willingness to submit to the mandates of the law and be arrested, then if the said defendant is killed the officer will be guilty of manslaughter; and if the blood had time to cool, the killing would be murder. 2 Whart. Cr. Law, 1030, 1031, and authorities referred to in note. If, however, the defendant in the writ only ceases his resistance upon the officer desisting from his attempt to arrest, and still keeps himself in a condition to renew the resistance with a deadly weapon, if the officer should renew the effort to arrest, and the officer cannot make the arrest without great personal danger, he would be justified in killing the defendant. The submission of the defendant in such a case is not complete, and as long as he refuses to be arrested he is in a state of resistance; and if he is armed with a deadly weapon, and has manifested an intent to use it, and still keeps the weapon in his possession convenient for an emergency, and the officer has reasonable grounds for believing that the weapon will be used if an arrest is attempted, the officer is not required to risk his life in a rencounter, or desist from an effort to perform his duty. When a person puts himself in an armed and deadly resistance to the process of the law, he becomes virtually an outlaw, and officers are not required to show him the courtesy of a chivalrous antagonist and give him an open field and fair fight. It is only when a criminal submits to the law that it throws round him the mantle of protection and administers justice with mercy. It is the duty of every offender charged with crime in due process of law to quietly yield himself up to public justice. State v. Bryant, 65 N. C. 327; State v. Garrett, 1 Winst. 144.

A known officer, in attempting to make an arrest by virtue of a warrant, is not bound to exhibit his warrant and read it to a defendant before he secures him, if he resists; if no resistance is offered, the officer ought always, upon demand made, show his warrant to the party arrested or notify him of the substance of the warrant, so that he may have no excuse for placing himself in opposition to the process of the law. This is only a rule of precaution. A defendant is bound to submit to a known officer; to yield himself immediately and peaceably into the custody of the officer before the law gives him the right of having the warrant read and explained; when in resistance, the law shows him no favor. A defendant, knowing the arresting party to be an officer, is bound to submit to the arrest, reserving the right of action against the officer in case the latter be in the wrong. When a person acts in a public capacity as an officer, it will be presumed that he was rightfully appointed. 1 Whart. Cr. Law, §§ 1289, 2925; Cooley's Case, 6 Gray, 350. One who is not a known officer ought to show his warrant and read it, if required; but it would seem that this duty is not so imperative as that a neglect of it would make him a trespasser ab initio, when there is proof that the party subject to be arrested had notice of the warrant, and was fully aware of its contents, and had made up his mind to resist its execution at all hazards. Garrett's Case, supra.

The law, in its humanity and justice, will not allow unnecessary force to be used in the execution of its process. If a defendant, without any deadly weapon or manifestation of excessive violence, makes resistance, an officer is not justified in wilfully shooting him down; but if a defendant has a deadly weapon, and has manifested a purpose to use it if an arrest is attempted, the officer is not bound to wait for him to have an opportunity of carrying his purpose into effect. If the warrant is for a misdemeanor and a defendant attempts to avoid an arrest by flight, the officer has no right to shoot him down to prevent escape, nor even after an arrest has been made and defendant escapes from custody. Forster's Case, Lewin, Crown Cas. 187. The rule is different in cases of felony. Bryant's Case, supra. If an officer has process in his hands issuing from a court of competent jurisdiction over the subject-matter, authorizing and commanding him to arrest a defendant, he is entitled to the protection which the laws afford officers acting under process, although the process in his hands is informal and irregular. If the process is illegal and void on its face, or is against the wrong person, or its execution is attempted out of the district in which it can alone be executed, then the officer would not be under the protection of the law; but it would seem that if he kills a resisting party under such circumstances, he would only be guilty of manslaughter, unless he had actual knowledge of his want of authority, or acted from express malice.

I have stated to you many points of law which do not directly arise in the case before us; but it is important that they should be known and well understood in the country, where, in recent years, so much violence has been committed—violence in the name of law and violence in defiance of law. The principles of law involved in this case having been explained to you by the court, it is now your duty to ascertain the facts from the testimony and apply them to the law as laid down by the court.

In performing this important and solemn duty there are three points worthy of your special inquiry: (1) Whether the prisoner on trial was a known officer of the law and had in his hands, at the time of the homicide, legal process authorizing and commanding him to arrest the deceased. (2) Whether deceased made resistance to the execution of legal process with a gun in his hands, and had manifested and continued to entertain a purpose to use such gun if an arrest was attempted. (3) Whether the resistance, if made, had entirely ceased, and the deceased had yielded himself quietly and willingly into the custody of the officer, and no longer had any purpose of resistance.

Upon the first point I will state, as a conclusion of law, that it is the duty of a court to recognize its regular officers and process. I therefore instruct you that the defendant was a regularly constituted officer of this court and the process under which he professed to act was due process of law. The only questions left for you to determine on this point are: Did the prisoner have such process in his hands at the time of the homicide? Was he endeavoring to execute such process? Was he a known officer of the law? And did the deceased have good reason to believe that there was an indictment against him which made him amenable to legal process?

The second and third points presented involve questions of fact which you must ascertain and determine from the testimony in the case. To aid you in the performance of this duty, I will now, in obedience to the requirements of the law, proceed to recapitulate the testimony, and will carefully endeavor not to express an opinion on the subject. I solemnly warn you not to allow your verdict upon questions of fact to be influenced by any impressions that you may form as to the conclusions of my mind. You must form your opinions upon questions of fact from the testimony, and allow no prejudice or outside influence to control your action.

From this recapitulation and your own recollection you will perceive that the testimony is very conflicting. It is your duty carefully to consider the whole testimony and reconcile, as far as you can, any apparent conflicts; and when this cannot be done, you must believe that which you think, under all the circumstances, is entitled to the most credit. If, upon any question, you have a reasonable doubt as to the truth of the matter, you must render this doubt in favor of the defendant. This is the humane rule of the law in all criminal trials, but it is specially important and imperative in trials for capital felonies.

There are some circumstances connected with this case which I feel it to be my duty to call to your special attention, in order that they may not have an improper influence upon your action. The revenue laws have been the subject of much exciting discussion. Some persons advocate their rigorous enforcement, while others denounce such laws as unjust, inexpedient, and oppressive. All persons engaged in the execution of these laws have their warm friends and bitter opponents. No such influences should enter into and control your deliberations. A citizen on trial for crime is entitled to be confronted in court by his accusers and have them solemnly sworn to tell the truth. He is also entitled to be tried by a jury of his peers, who are free from all prejudices, and who in their action will have an eye single to justice and truth. These rights are as old as the common law; they constitute fundamental principles of English and American freedom, and have been secured in the federal and all state constitutions. They extend to all trials for crime, but they ought to be especially regarded as sacred and inviolable where human life is put in jeopardy. You, gentlemen of the jury, acting under the solemn obligations of your oath, and as fair-minded and impartial men, should discard all opinions and prejudices which you may have formed for or against the defendant, and try him as all citizens charged with crime ought to be tried—according to the law and the testimony.

Gentlemen of the jury, if you come to the conclusion, after weighing all the testimony, that the deceased made resistance to the execution of legal process with a gun in his hands, and had manifested and continued to entertain a purpose to use such gun if an arrest was attempted, then you will find the defendant not guilty. (2) If you find that resistance was made but had entirely ceased and the deceased had yielded himself quietly and completely into the custody of the officer, and no longer had any purpose of resistance, then the prisoner is guilty of manslaughter; and if sufficient time had elapsed for the prisoner to get over the excitement caused by the resistance, then he is guilty of murder. If you have any reasonable doubts upon these questions, then the defendant is entitled to the benefit of these doubts.

The jury, after a retirement of two hours, found a verdict of "Not guilty."

UNITED STATES v. RICHARD.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1823.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—LARCENY.

Although a confession, made under a promise of favor, is not, in itself, evidence against the prisoner, yet the fact of the prisoner's going to the place where the property was secreted, and identifying it, is evidence against him.

Indictment for stealing planks, the property of Mr. James McGuire, a lumber merchant. The prisoner [the negro Richard], upon a promise that he should not be prosecuted, was induced to confess his guilt, and to go and return the stolen articles, and to select those which belonged to Mr. McGuire.

Taylor & Fendall, for the prisoner, contended, and Mr. Swann, for the United States, admitted, that he must identify the property, independently of the confession.

THE COURT said that the fact that the prisoner selected Mr. McGuire's lumber was evidence against him.

Verdict, "Guilty."

ASSAULT—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

If a man raise a club over the head of a woman within striking distance, and threaten to strike her if she open her mouth, this is an assault in law. He has no right to impose such a condition.

Indictment for an assault upon one Susan Shelton. The evidence was that the defendant [Allison Richardson] came into the house where Mrs. Shelton was sitting at a window. He was armed with a musket and a club; and raising the club over her head in an attitude for striking, and within striking distance, said to her that if she said a word (or if she opened her mouth) he would strike her; and this without any provocation on her part.

Bradley & Hoban, for defendant, contended that this was not, in law, an assault; that there can be no assault without a present intent to strike; and his saying, "if she opened her mouth," showed that he had not such a present intent, and they cited the old case, "If it were not the assizes, I would stab you."

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said that he had no right to restrain her from speaking; and his language showed an intent to strike upon her violation of a condition which he had no right to impose. Suppose a stranger comes to my house armed, and raises his club over my head, within striking distance, and threatens to beat me unless I will go out of and abandon my house, surely that would be an assault. So if a highwayman puts a pistol to my breast, and threatens to shoot me unless I give him my money, this would be evidence of an assault, and would be charged as such in the indictment.

Verdict, "Guilty." Fined ten dollars.

The rejection of the surveys of the Martinez ranchos: No. 205. Rancho El Pinole. Rancho Las Juntas. No. 87. Rancho Cañada del Hambre. No. 308.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. Objections to the surveys of these three ranchos have been filed on the part of the owners of E Pinole and of Las Juntas. It is contended that the Rancho Cañada del Hambre has been so located as to embrace a considerable area which is clearly within the exterior limits of the Pinole and Las Juntas Ranchos without regard to the rights of election of the claimant of those two ranchos.

In behalf of the claimants of the Cañada del Hambre Rancho, it is contended—

(1) That the Del Hambre Rancho, as surveyed, does not include any lands comprised within the exterior limits of the other two ranchos, and,

(2) That the Mexican government, by granting the Cañada del Hambre to the extent of 3 leagues, ascertained and declared that there was a sobrante or overplus between the two ranchos Pinole and Las Juntas, and those two ranchos cannot now be located so as to exclude the tract between them, which has thus been granted to another. To this it is replied that the claim for the Cañada del Hambre is fraudulent, and it is contended that the claimants have a right to show that fact, notwithstanding that the validity of the grant has been affirmed by the United States tribunals; the claimants of the adjoining ranchos not having been parties to that proceeding, nor even permitted to intervene in it for the protection of their rights.

The decree in the Del Hambre case confirms to the claimants "so much of the land known at the date of the grant as the 'Cañada del Hambre,' as shall remain overplus from the ranchos of Pinole and Mr. Welsh, not to exceed three leagues after the latter shall have been duly located and surveyed by the proper officer." By the terms of this decree it is evident that those three ranchos must first be located and surveyed. In determining, then, the true location of the three leagues of the Las Juntas Rancho, it will be necessary, first, to ascertain what were the exterior limits of the tract granted; and, second, how far the right of election to the particular location of that quantity of land is modified or controlled by the alleged grant to Soto of the Cañada del Hambre. The expediente in the case of Las Juntas shows that on the 9th of June, 1834, Welsh petitioned for the place called "Las Juntas," on which he says he had resided two years, as shown by the document annexed; that he had cattle, a house, fields, etc. The "document annexed" was a previous petition to the alcalde for two leagues in the place called "Las Juntas," and an order of the alcalde, dated October 20, 1832, conceding it as a loan, subject to the approval of the government. On the margin of the petition to the governor is an order of reference to the ayuntamiento of San José and the padre of the mission for information. No report appears to have been made by either. On the 9th of February, 1844, Welsh presented a petition, in which, after referring to his unsuccessful efforts to obtain the place called "Monte del Diablo," he states that in 1832 he obtained a loan from the alcalde of the place called "Las Juntas," which, as shown by the map, lies to the west of the tract of Juana Sanchez and of the Monte del Diablo. He therefore solicits the place which he has occupied for ten years, and, referring to the map, says it is bounded towards the north by the Arroyo del Hambre, east by the Arroyo de las Nueces, south and west by lands of Pacheco and Moraga; that it is all pasture land, has but one permanent spring, and that its greatest extent from north to south may be three leagues, and from east to west, one-half to three-fourths of a league. On the same day, Pico, alcalde of San José, certifies that the western part of Las Juntas has been occupied for 13 or 14 years by Welsh, and that it has never belonged to any other individual. That its limits are: to the northward, the Arroyo del Hambre; to the eastward, the Arroyo de las Nueces, which also divides it on the south from the place of Lorenzo Pacheco; and on the west it is bounded by Senor Moraga. On the 19th February, Jimeno, the secretary, to whom the petition was referred, reports that from October, 1832, until 1838, Welsh had occupied the land with a house and property. That he left it on account of sickness, which was also the reason why the proceedings commenced on the 9th June, 1834, to obtain the title, were stopped. He, therefore, recommends the grant, as it can injure no one, the place being surrounded by known arroyos. And he deems it unnecessary to refer to the colindantes, as the alcalde of San José has given his certificate. On the 20th February the governor makes his decree of concession, in which he describes the land as "bounded by the Arroyo de las Nueces and by that of El Hambre, without prejudice to the boundaries of Lorenzo Pacheco, Juana Sanchez, Moraga or Martinez," and orders the title to issue for two square leagues. The grant issued on the same day. It describes the land as on the decree of concession, refers to the map in the expediente, and orders the land to be measured, reserving the surplus. The decree of confirmation is for two leagues, and describes the land as bounded east by the Nueces and lands of Juana Sanchez; south, by the Nueces and lands of Lorenzo Pacheco; west, by said arroyo and lands of Moraga; and north, by the Arroyo del Hambre and lands of Ignacia Martinez.

It might seem that there could be no difficulty in ascertaining a tract of which all the boundaries are well known arroyos. On referring to the diseño, we find that the Arroyo de las Nueces is represented as rising in the sierra on the west. After following in a southerly direction for a considerable distance it makes an abrupt bend, and, joined by two tributary streams, it runs in a direction nearly north into the Straits of Carquinez. Those straits are not by name laid down upon the map, but the creek is represented as falling into what are inscribed

"Esteros." The topographical map exhibited in the cause shows the creek, at or near the point where the diseño represents it as falling into or becoming an estero, enters a salt marsh, through which it pursues a somewhat sinuous course to the straits. The "Arroyo del Hambre" is also laid down upon the map, but it is represented as flowing from west to east, nearly at right angles to the course of the other streams, and as falling into the esteros at a short distance from the mouth of the Nueces. The tract delineated thus assumes nearly the shape of an inverted triangle—the Nueces curving around its lower extremity as has been described, and forming the two legs of the triangle, while the Del Hambre, running from west to east, forms its base. It is found, however, that the draughtsman of the diseño, though he has correctly laid down the courses of the streams on the east and west, has wholly mistaken that of the Del Hambre. The latter stream rises in the hills on the west not far from the source of the Nueces, or Reliez creek, as it is called, and flowing in an opposite direction, and in a course nearly due north, falls into the straits at a considerable distance to the west of the mouth of the Nueces. The Del Hambre, therefore, cannot serve as a northern boundary. If admitted as a boundary at all, it will form a portion of the western boundary, the northern boundary being the Straits of Carquinez.

Under these circumstances, it is contended on behalf of the claimants of the Rancho Cañada del Hambre that the northern boundary of Las Juntas, as called for in the papers, not being found to exist in nature, must be disregarded, and the quantity called for must be surveyed within the other lines; that if the straits had been intended as a northern boundary, they would have been mentioned in the papers, or in some manner referred to; that as the northern boundary called for in the papers cannot be found, the court must fix an imaginary line, enclosing the proper quantity between it and the other natural boundaries; that the tract is described as surrounded by arroyos, whereas it has arroyos only on three sides of it, and the fourth side must of necessity be bounded by an imaginary line, so as to include the required quantity.

It will be perceived that all these propositions rest upon the hypothesis that the intention of the grantor was to fix a northern boundary for the tract, and that he designated the Del Hambre solely because he supposed it to flow in the direction represented on the diseño, and across the land so as to form a northern boundary. If such was the predominant idea in the governor's mind, it might, with much reason, be urged that, as the brook cannot serve as a northern boundary, the call for it must be rejected, and the northern line be determined by quantity, or by drawing a line corresponding in position and direction to the supposed course of the Del Hambre. But, on the other hand, it may well be supposed that the intention of the grantor was to adopt certain well known and natural objects as the limits of the tract; and though, in the rude sketch submitted to him, the position and course of one of the brooks may have been erroneously laid down, yet his intention was to extend to that brook wherever it might, in fact be found. The Arroyo del Hambre is described by all the witnesses as publicly and notoriously known by that name since 1808. It derived its name from the circumstance that a body of Spanish soldiers, encamped near it, underwent in that year, much suffering from hunger. The same name was applied to the Bolsas, towards its upper waters, and to the cañada, or narrow valley of level land through which it flows as it approaches the straits. This Cañada del Hambre is represented on the diseños of the ranchos on the east and on the west, where its position and course are indicated with considerable accuracy. The grants for both of these ranchos are of older date than that for Las Juntas—one having been issued in 1834, and the other (Pinole) in 1842. It may therefore be supposed that the governor was not unacquainted with the true course and position of the Del Hambre. That the brooks were "known" appears from Jimeno's report, in which it is stated that the place is "surrounded by known arroyos,"—an observation which is cited by the counsel for the Soto claim as indicating that Jimeno must have supposed the Del Hambre to flow across the tract from west to east, so as to join its northern boundary, but which appears to me equally accurate and natural, if Jimeno had been acquainted with the true course of the stream, and knew that the land solicited was bounded on three sides by known arroyos, and on the fourth by the straits. It is not pretended that the lands of Martinez extended further east than the Cañada or Arroyo del Hambre; and yet throughout the whole proceedings in the case of Las Juntas, from the petition of the alcalde in 1832, down to the grant, the rancho of Martinez is mentioned as one of its boundaries. The alcalde, who in 1832 conceded to Welsh two leagues, by way of loan, states the lands loaned by him lay between the two brooks, the Nueces and the Del Hambre; and the proofs show that so early as ——, Welsh built a corral, and employed Vaqueros, who resided on the Del Hambre, at a short distance from its mouth. All the witnesses concur in the statement that the Del Hambre was universally recognized as the boundary between the two ranchos, and that Welsh, though his house was built further south, and at the lower part of the tract, always claimed to that stream. The attempt made to identify the Arroyo del Hambre of the diseño with Dry creek is wholly abortive. For, independently of the overwhelming mass of testimony, which establishes beyond doubt what creek was known, from a very early period, by the name Del Hambre, the diseño itself represents Dry creek in its true position, and by the name "Arroyo Seco," which, translated, it still retains. It is also to be noted that neither the concession nor the grant call for the Del Hambre as a northern boundary. Those documents merely describe the land as bounded by the Arroyo de las Nueces and by that of Del Hambre. It is only by referring to the petition, the informes, and the diseño that we discover that that arroyo was supposed to be a boundary on the north. It has, for these reasons, seemed to me wholly inadmissible to construe the grant as intended to designate the Del Hambre as a northern boundary; and, if it cannot form such a boundary, to reject a call altogether. On the contrary, it should be construed in accordance with the universal understanding of the colindantes and neighbors from a period antecedent to the date of the grant, as calling for the Del Hambre creek and the lands of Martinez as boundaries, notwithstanding that the course and position of the creek may have been erroneously represented on the diseño.

The next inquiry is whether the right of the claimants of Las Juntas to select the three leagues granted within the exterior limits of the tract has been modified, and ought now to be controlled by the alleged grant to Teodora Soto. It may be admitted that if the Mexican government have within the exterior limits of the grant to Welsh, ascertained and cut off a sobrante or excess beyond the quantity granted, and have granted this sobrante by metes and bounds, or by other adequate description, the sobrante grantee would have the right now to insist that Las Juntas should be so measured as not to include the tract subsequently granted to himself. But the inquiry whether such a grant was, in fact, made, was had in a suit between the claimants under the Soto grant and the United States. The claimants of Las Juntas were not permitted to intervene for the protection of their rights, and have not been heard. The 15th section of the act of 1851 declares that the final decrees in this class of cases shall be conclusive only as between the United States and the claimants, but shall not affect the interests of third persons.

It is evident that the claimants of Las Juntas are "third persons," and that their interests would be seriously affected if the confirmes of the Soto grant are permitted to deprive them of the right of locating their grant so as to embrace the most valuable land within its exterior limits. I proceed, therefore, to inquire, notwithstanding the decree of confirmation, whether, as between the claimants of the Las Juntas and those of the Cañada del Hambre, the latter have, by virtue of a valid grant of the sobrante, the right to control the election of the former as to the location of the tract. The expediente in the Soto case discloses that on the 4th of May, 1841, Teodora Soto presented a petition, in which she stated that about four years before, her deceased husband, Barcenas, had obtained a provisional grant for the Cañada del Hambre, and had placed numerous cattle upon it; that soon after a fire compelled him to remove from the place, and that shortly afterwards he died. She therefore asked a grant of the land, even though it be provisionally, and until she can present a sketch of it. On the 4th May, 1842, José Castro, the ex-prefect, certifies that in 1839 he granted the land to Barcenas provisionally, and that the expediente ought to be amongst the papers of the prefecture. On the 6th of May, Estrada, the then prefect, certifies that the expediente is not found in his office. On the 8th May, the governor orders that a provisional grant issue. The petitioner presents a map, etc., subject to the usual reports.

There is no reason to doubt the genuineness of these documents. They are found in the archives, and bear every mark of authenticity. There was also produced by the claimants a translation of an alleged grant, dated December 14th, 1841, to Teodora Soto, of the Cañada del Hambre, "not to exceed three leagues of that which shall be left over after the ranchos of Welsh and Martinez shall have been measured." This document, it was alleged, was delivered by the claimant to M. G. Vallejo, who caused it to be translated. Vallejo swears to the genuineness of the original, and he and Frisbie to its loss. The translator swears to the accuracy of the translation. Proofs were also adduced to show occupation of the land by Soto from a period anterior to the date of the grant. The decision of this court was rendered at a time when the completeness and value of the archives, both as negative and positive proofs, were imperfectly understood; nor had the court then become aware how unreliable, in most instances, is the parol proof offered in support of grants of which the archives contain no trace. As the genuineness of the expediente was not questioned, it was not considered by the court most probable that a grant was in fact issued in accordance with the governor's order, and that he might have deemed the rights of the colindantes, Welsh and Martinez, sufficiently protected by directing the three leagues to be taken only out of the sobrante which should result after the adjoining ranchos were measured. Under this view, it was supposed that the translator had mistaken the date of the grant, and that it in fact issued in 1842, after the date of the governor's order of May 8th, of that year. The grant intended to be confirmed was therefore a supposed grant, dated subsequently to May, 1842; but by some oversight the decree refers to and confirms the alleged grant of 1841.

That no grant could have issued at that date is evident:

1. No petition or document whatsoever, relating to such a grant, is found in the archives.

2. None was believed to exist; else, why consult Estrada as to a previous provisional concession by a prefect?

3. Teodora Soto's own petition of May, 1842, asking for a concession of the Cañada del Hambre, even "tho' it be provisional," negatives the idea that she already had an unconditional grant for the same lands; as does also her reference to a supposed provisional concession to her husband, some four years before, and her entire silence as to an absolute grant to herself, made less than five months before the date of her petition.

4. The governor, if he made the grant of 1841, must be supposed to have granted the sobrante of two ranchos, for neither of which a title in full property had as yet issued; and this without any evidence that the limits of those ranchos contained a sobrante of three leagues, or any other quantity.

5. The subsequent grants of Pinole and Las Juntas omit all mention of the alleged previous grant of the Cañada del Hambre, although the Pinole grant calls for the cañada as one of its boundaries, and the Las Juntas is bounded by the Arroyo Del Hambre. In the latter grant the governor is at pains to declare that it is without prejudice to the boundaries of Pacheco, Juana Sanchez, Moraga or Martinez, but he does not mention Teodora Soto, who is alleged to have obtained her grant two years previously.

For these and other reasons that might be adduced, I think it proved beyond a doubt that no grant could have issued at the date mentioned by Vallejo. It may be said, however, that a grant may have issued in 1842, and that the translator has made a clerical error in copying it. But this hypothesis appears inadmissible. In the document presented not only is the date (December 14th, 1841) attached, but a translation is given of the habilitation at the top of the page, by which it appears that the paper was habilitated for the years 1840 and 1841. It would seem, therefore, that there could have been no mistake in the translation. That no such title could have issued before June 2d, 1842, the date of the Pinole grant, may be inferred from the fact that that grant makes no mention whatever of the Cañada del Hambre rancho, though the cañada itself is referred to as a boundary. On the 8th of June a grant is made for the Rancho Boca de la Cañada del Rinole, bounded by the ranchos of Welsh, Martinez, and Velencio; but without reference to any rancho of Soto, though it appears that she was the daughter-in-law of the grantee, and then residing on the Rancho Boca de la Cañada del Rinole. And finally, when, in 1844, Las Juntas was granted to Welsh, without prejudice to the ranchos of his neighbors, some of whom are expressly mentioned, all reference to any previous grant to Soto is omitted.

It has already been shown that the grant of 1841, relied on by the claimants, and the only one as to which proofs were offered, could not have been issued. It has been shown that the paper which was translated must have been dated in 1841, for it is impossible to suppose that the translator would not only have mistaken the date, but the purport of the printed habilitation at the head of the paper, which shows it was made for the bienno 1840 and 1841. The grant, therefore, which was translated, must have been a forgery. Gen. Vallejo and Frisbie are the only witnesses who testified to having seen it. The direct proof of its genuineness consists of the statements of Gen. Vallejo alone It follows that if any grant did issue subsequently to the date of the governor's order of May 8th, 1842, it has not been produced, nor has any evidence been taken to prove its existence. The hypothesis, therefore, of a grant in 1842, is an assumption wholly unsupported by proofs. The proceedings of the government with regard to the three other ranchos which have been referred to, and especially with regard to Las Juntas, render it highly improbable that up to 1844, the date of the latter grant, Teodoro Soto could have been known as a colindante of either. But there is found in the records of the former government evidence which I cannot but regard as decisive of the fact that no grant could have been issued to Teodora Soto. On the day on which the title for Pinole issued, a communication was addressed to the justices of the peace of Contra Costa, by Estrada, the prefect, in which he informs him that on that day he had received a dispatch from the secretary of state, notifying him that a title had been issued to Martinez for El Pinole, with all the lands pertaining to it, and ordering that the justices of the peace for San José, Contra Costa and San Francisco be informed of the order, that they may make it known to those in the neighborhood, and particularly to Teodora Soto, who is to be informed that the pretension she has made to occupy the Cañada del Hambre is not admissible, because it pertains to Pinole. The genuineness of this document seems indisputable. It is traced to the possession of Estudillo, at that time alcalde of the district in which the land lay, and the borrador or office copy of the dispatch from the secretary to Estrada is found in the archives. It proves what was the final result of Teodora Soto's application of May, 1842, and definitely establishes that her petition was rejected.

It is unnecessary to do more than refer in general terms to the mass of testimony which disproves the statement of Vallejo that Teodora Soto occupied the cañada from the year 1829. In 1845 and 1846 she was living at the rancho of Boca del Pinole, the home of her mother-in-law, where she put up the walls of an adobe. This she would hardly have done if she owned three leagues in the immediate neighborhood. Several witnesses, who have long resided in the cañada or its vicinity, testify that they have never heard of any claim of Teodora for lands in the Cañada del Hambre. Another witness deposes to a declaration of Teodora that she had no land. And numerous witnesses testify that she went to the cañada for the first time in 1847. If to this be added the fact that in her deed to James she describes the grant as for one league, in her petition to the board as for two leagues, while in her deed to Vallejo no description whatsoever is given, together with the fact that Vallejo, when testifying before the board, was directly interested in the claim, it cannot, I think, be doubted that Teodora Soto never obtained a grant from the Mexican government. The claimants of Las Juntas, being thus found to have the right to elect the quantity granted within the exterior limits, without regard to the alleged grant to Teodora Soto, it remains to be considered whether that right has been properly exercised. The rancho was, in 1850, surveyed under the direction of the claimants, and the exact quantity of three leagues was located so as to extend from the Las Juntas to the straits, and embracing all the land between Arroyos del Hambre and Nueces, from the mouth of each of those streams up to a point on the Del Hambre, some two miles from the town of Martinez, from which point a line was measured in a southeast direction to Arroyo de las Nueces, so as to include the house of Welsh, and to leave the sobrante or excess not included on the southwesterly side, bordering on the Reliez creek, and contiguous to the lands of Moraga. This survey was recognized and adopted in the decree of the probate court of Contra Costa county, by which the lands of William Welsh were divided amongst his heirs. Nearly all the lands thus included have been sold by the claimants of Las Juntas; the first sales having been made so far back as 1849 of lots in the town of Martinez, situated at the mouth of the Arroyo del Hambre. The aggregate amount received by the claimants on these sales exceeds the sum of $66,000. On the lands so sold, especially those near the town of Martinez, the purchasers have made improvements to the value of more than $100,000. The land excluded from this survey, and admitted by the claimants to be public land, has been in great part taken up as public land by settlers, who have made improvements thereon to the value of $25,000. These lands are included in the official surveys. It is also shown that since the survey of 1850, the claimants have uniformly declared that they claimed no land outside of that survey.

It thus appears that the claimants have, in the most emphatic and solemn manner, made their election of the three leagues granted to them; that important interests have grown up and large expenditures on the faith of that election, not only by the purchase and improvement, at great expense, of lands within the survey, but by the settlement and improvement under the laws of the United States, of lands without it. No objections to the location of the grant thus elected by the claimants of Las Juntas are suggested on the part of the United States, or of the owners of the adjoining ranchos, except, of course, the claimants under the confirmation to Teodora Soto. As the latter, for the reasons already given, cannot be heard, there seems no reason why the important interests which have vested under the location adopted by the claimants at so early a date, should now be disturbed. I think, therefore, that the official survey of Las Juntas should be rejected, and the land surveyed in accordance with the claimants' survey of 1850.

The objections to the official survey of El Pinole remain to be considered. It appears from the expediente that in August, 1834, Martinez presented a petition to the commissioners on colonization, setting forth that in 1823 he had obtained a grant for the place called "Pinole y Cañada del Hambre," and that he had lost or mislaid it. The commissioners recommended that the papers be returned to him, that he may make his application in due form. The same proposition was presented to the departmental assembly. In the report of the committee on colonization and vacant lands, it is noticed that Martinez had represented to them that he was in possession of the place called Pinole and Cañada del Hambre, along the Straits of Carquinez; that he had lost or mislaid the title issued to him by Arguello, in 1832. They therefore propose "that the papers be returned to him, that he may present the same in due form." This report was approved by the assembly. On the 10th November, 1837, Martinez presented his petition to the governor, setting forth that in 1823 El Pinole was granted to him, but that the paper had long since been lost or mislaid; that he was therefore obliged to present a second petition for the place already solicited, being three leagues, but that now, from the increase of his cattle, it was necessary that there should be granted to him one sitio more, so that he may have an extension of four leagues; that although this may appear considerable, yet the greater part is not fit for pasturage, being composed of rocky hills and swamps. "The better portion is on the side of the 'Siscar,' and the Cañada del Hambre," wherefore he asks that his petition be granted as charged by the supreme government in the annexed document. The document annexed is an order from the president of Mexico, directing the governor to grant to Martinez the lands solicited. On the 25th December, 1837, the governor refers Martinez' petition to the ayuntamiento of San Francisco, reminding them that the petition is for four leagues. On the 10th September, 1838, the ayuntamiento reported favorably to the petition for a grant of four leagues. On the 1st June, 1842, the governor makes his decree of concession in which he declares Martinez owner of the place called "El Pinole," having for limits the mouth of the Cañada del Pinole, thence eastwardly with the same to the Corral de Galinde, from this point to the Cañada del Hambre, and along it (por ella) to the Straits of Carquinez, and terminating at the mouth De la Cañada del Pinole on the Bay of San Francisco. The final title issued on the same day. It describes the land in the same terms as the decree of concession. The third condition declares its extent to be four square leagues, a little more or less, as explained on the diseño, and it directs the magistrate who shall give the possession to cause it to be measured, reserving the surplus to the nation for its convenient uses. On the same day the communication heretofore referred to was addressed to the justice of the peace of Contra Costa and San Francisco, directing that Teodora Soto be informed that the pretensions to the Cañada del Hambre were inadmissible, as the land belonged to Martinez. The decree of confirmation describes the boundaries precisely as they are given in the grant. No quantity is specified, but the usual reference, for greater certainty, is made to the map and expediente, and to the deposition of W. A. Richardson. It is contended that the grant is by metes and bounds, and that all the land within the exterior limits should be surveyed to the claimants. But this claim seems to me wholly inadmissible. It had never been considered by this court, that when the grant mentioned a certain quantity of land, adding the words "poco mas ó menos,"—"a little more or less,"— any greater excess over and above the quantity specifically mentioned could pass than a mere fractional part of a league, which was the common unit of measurement. Such seemed the reasonable, though, of course, somewhat arbitrary, interpretation of the phrase alluded to, and such an operation was attributed to it in those cases only where all the exterior boundaries were well defined, and where the proceedings showed that the governor intended to grant all the land within the limits specified, and where it appeared that the quantity within those limits exceeded the number of leagues mentioned only by such an excess as might reasonably be deemed to have been contemplated and provided for by the introduction of the words "poco mas ó menos." But this view was held by the supreme court to be erroneous, and the words "poco mas ó menos" were entirely disregarded, as "having no place in a system of surveys like the American." The quantity embraced within the exterior limits of El Pinole is about seven leagues,—nearly twice the quantity mentioned in the grant. It is plain, then, that neither the previous ruling of this court nor the decisions of the supreme court would authorize the confirmation of this claim for a greater quantity than four leagues.

It is said that the case of U. S. v. Rosa Pacheco [22 How. (63 U. S.) 225], is an authority for the confirmation of the whole tract; but the cases are essentially different. In that case, not only were all the boundaries distinctly mentioned, but the governor was informed by the petition and by the reports of the informing officers (by whom testimony was taken as to the extent of the land) that the tract solicited was two leagues in length by about two leagues, or little more or less, in width. With this information he proceeds to grant "the tract solicited," specifying all its boundaries; and the grant in that form was approved by the departmental assembly. In making out the title, however, the draughtsman, it would seem, by a clerical error, mentioned in the condition that the land was of the extent of two leagues. The supreme court held that all these circumstances showed an intention to grant a tract of the dimensions reported to the governor, and confirmed the tract to four leagues. But in this case all the proceedings show that quantity, and not boundaries, was the prominent idea in the governor's mind and in that of the grantee. The petition, as we have seen, states that the former grant, which had been lost, was for three sitios, but that he now asks for an additional sitio; that its extent asked for may seem large, but that the greater part is unfit for pasturage, etc. In his order of reference to the ayuntamiento, the governor is careful to remind them that the quantity solicited is four leagues. In the report of the ayuntamiento, the quantity of four leagues is again referred to; and, finally, in the grant, the extent of land granted is again specified as four leagues, "a little more or less," and it is ordered to be measured, the surplus to remain to the nation for its convenient uses. It will be perceived that this case is almost the converse of that of Rosa Pacheco, for here the intention to ask for and to grant a definite quantity of land is apparent throughout the whole proceedings. To permit, under such circumstances, a tract of land, of nearly double the extent solicited, to be taken from the public domain, seems to me wholly inadmissible. The decree of the board does not restrict the confirmation to any specified quantity; but, in their opinion, the deposition of Richardson is referred to as showing that there are not more than four leagues in the grant. The omission, therefore, to restrict the confirmation to the quantity mentioned in the grant is evidently due to the reliance placed on the erroneous statement of Richardson, the claimant's own witness, as to the extent of land included within the exterior limits.

I think it clear that the claimants are only entitled to four leagues of land, to be located within the exterior limits of the grant at their election. For the reasons already assigned with regard to Las Juntas, the election of the claimants of El Pinole cannot now be controlled by the representatives of Teodora Soto. The exterior boundaries, within which the election is to be made remain to be considered. The only serious question appears to be with regard to the eastern boundary. The boundaries mentioned in the grant are: the mouth of Cañada del Pinole, thence eastwardly with the same to the Corral de Galinde, and from this point to the Cañada del Hambre, and along or through it ("por ella") to the straits, and terminating at the mouth of "El Pinole." It is urged that by the terms of the grant, and from the language of the petition, it is plain that the land was bounded by, but did not include, the Cañada del Hambre. In the last act of the expediente given in the printed brief filed by the counsel for Teodoro Soto the petition is translated so as to read that: "The extent of land solicited appears large; but the greater part is not fit for pasturage, being composed of stony hills and marshy lands. The last sitio solicited lies in the direction of the Siscar and Cañada del Hambre, which is the place the cattle most resort to, as is known to all the neighbors." But this translation is evidently inaccurate. Martinez makes no mention of the last sitio. He says the quantity of land may appear too great; but the greater portion is unfit for pasturage. The best part is on the side of the Siscar and Cañada del Hambre, etc. The petitioner had already mentioned that his last grant from Arguello had been for three leagues, "which were the Cañada del Pinole and that called 'Del Hambre,' on the Straits of Carquinez, and looking toward the Bay of Sonoma, as far as the mouth of the Cañada Pinole," as shown by the accompanying map. This same land he again solicits, with the addition of another sitio. On the map, the Cañada del Hambre is distinctly represented, and its name inscribed upon it. That the sitios first granted included that cañada is expressly stated in the petition, and it is also stated that owing to the loss of his document he is obliged to present a new petition for the same place. The excuse assigned for asking for the large quantity of four leagues is that the greater portion is unavailable, the best part being on the side of the Siscar and the Del Hambre. It is plain that he could not have intended to exclude from his application lands embraced in his previous grant, and which he specifies as the best part of the tract solicited in his second application. The grant has been translated as bounding the lands by the Cañada del Pinole, thence eastwardly with the same to the Corral de Galinde, thence to the Cañada del Hambre, thence to the straits, and thence to the mouth of the Cañada del Pinole. But, in fact, the grant does not call for the cañada as a boundary on such terms as would exclude it. The language is, "from that point (i. e. the Corral de Galinde) to the Cañada del Hambre, and through it or along it to the straits,"—precisely the same expression as is used with reference to Cañada del Pinole, which is on all hands admitted to be included in the grant.

Looking at the terms of the grant alone, I can see no reason why both cañadas must not be excluded if either be, for both are mentioned as boundaries, and the line is said to run with respect to each, "por ella" or por "la misma." But even if the intention of the petitioner or that if the governor were doubtful, the document issued on the same day, in which it is ordered that Teodora Soto be informed that her application for the Cañada del Hambre is inadmissible, as that that cañada belongs to Pinole, would seem to be decisive. If, in addition, we consider that on the diseño of Las Juntas the Arroyo del Hambre is distinctly delineated as the boundary between the two ranchos, the lands to the west of it being inscribed "Terreno de Martinez," together with the fact testified to by all the witnesses that the Arroyo del Hambre was universally recognized as forming the common boundary line of El Pinole and Las Juntas, no doubt can, I think, be entertained, that portion of the Cañada del Hambre lying to the west of the arroyo was included within the exterior limits of the Pinole.

It is said that if any of the cañada be included all must be, and the adoption of the arroyo as a boundary is purely arbitrary. The cañada in question is a long and narrow valley, not exceeding, in average width, a few hundred yards. Throughout the greater part of its course the Arroyo del Hambre, after entering the cañada, flows along the base of the eastern hills, leaving by far the larger portion of the valley on the west of it. The adoption, therefore, of a well known object like an arroyo as the boundary would be most natural, as it left almost all the cañada to Martinez, and satisfied the call of his grant, which required him to run through it "por ella" to the straits. In the subsequent grant for Las Juntas, the arroyo is expressly designated as the boundary of the latter, and the line so fixed has been recognized and adopted from that day to this. It appears to me, therefore, that the claimants of Pinole have the right to locate four leagues of land at their election, within the exterior limits, as ascertained in this opinion, viz., the Cañada del Pinole, thence along or through it to the Corral de Galinde thence to the Arroyo del Hambre, thence to the straits, and thence along the bay to the mouth of the Cañada del Pinole. When their election shall have been made, the enquiry will still be open whether they have exercised their right conformably to the rules and principles by which the right of election, in such cases, is governed.

ADMINISTRATORS—DEVASTAVIT—SURETY ON COLLECTOR'S BOND—JUDGMENT.

1. If the administrator of the surety in a collector's bond pay away the assets of his intestate in payment of the intestate's debts, before notice of the claim of the United States, such payment is not a devastavit.

2. The United States, in an action upon a collector's bond, cannot obtain judgment against the surety for more than the penalty of the bond.

Debt upon the official bond of C. Simms, late collector for the port of Alexandria, in the penalty of $10,000, and in which bond the defendant's intestate, J. T. Ricketts, was a surety. The defendant had paid away the assets of the estate of his intestate, J. T. Ricketts, in the payment of his debts, before notice of the claim of the United States for the balance due by the collector to them, amounting to $17,000.

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant, contended that the payment of the debts of the intestate, by his administrator, the defendant, was not a devastavit, and cited the case of U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 390, where Chief Justice Marshall, in a note, gives his own opinion that such a payment, without notice, is not a devastavit.

The question being submitted, this court was unanimously of the same opinion, and also that in this action the judgment could not exceed the penalty of the bond.

UNITED STATES v. RICO et al.

[Hoff. Dec. 48.]

District Court, N. D. California. Jan. 25. 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—CONFIRMATION OF CLAIM—CONCLUSIVENESS.

[In a proceeding to correct a survey under the act of 1860, the district court has no jurisdiction to review and reverse the final decree, whereby the genuineness and validity of the claim was established.]

[Claim of Francisco Rico and J. A. Castro to the Rancho del Rio Estanislao, comprising eleven leagues of land in Stanislaus county. On objections to the survey.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was confirmed by the board, and that decision was affirmed in this court, though not without much doubt as to the genuineness of the title papers. Case No. 16,161. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, which was subsequently ordered to be dismissed by the attorney general. The usual stipulation was thereupon made by the district attorney, and an order entered vacating the order granting an appeal, and allowing the claimants to proceed under the decree of this court as under final decree. A survey of the land confirmed has accordingly been made, and it was returned into court on the application of the United States, pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1860. On the return of the survey objections to it were filed, and the parties permitted to take proofs.

The only objection presented on the part of the United States is, that the grant is false and fraudulent, and the signature of the governor and seals upon the papers forgeries. Proofs in support of this allegation have been taken, and the question is now presented, whether these proofs are admissible, and whether the court has jurisdiction, at this stage of the cause, to reopen it for further proofs, and to review and reverse the decree heretofore rendered.

It may be observed that the proofs offered are of a nature to leave no doubt as to the fraudulent character of the claim, and if the court has jurisdiction to receive them, and decree accordingly, the claim must certainly be rejected. It must also be mentioned that the present parties in interest are innocent, bona fide purchasers, who paid a large consideration in money after the dismissal of the appeal and the filing of the consent of the district attorney that the claimants might proceed under the decree of this court, as under final decree.

The point is thus presented in the strongest form in which it could arise. On the one side, an unquestionably fraudulent claim confirmed by a decree of this court, which has become final by express stipulation and consent; and on the other side, the rights of innocent third parties, who have acquired their interests and parted with their money relying on the supposed final adjudication of the court. Prior to the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Fossatt [21 How. (62 U. S.) 445], it had been supposed, both by the bench and the bar, that the jurisdiction of this court was limited to deciding on the validity of claims, together with such questions, as to extent and boundary, as might be incidentally presented; but that the location and survey were to be determined by the surveyor general, under the instructions of the proper executive department of the government. In the case referred to, it was decided by the supreme court that this court has the power to direct a survey to be made, and to review and correct the surveys of the surveyor general, made in pursuance of its decree; and the court declares that "the jurisdiction of the district court over the cause does not terminate until the issuance of a patent conformably to its decree." U. S. v. Fossatt, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 450.

It is contended that the supreme court have, by this declaration, in effect affirmed the jurisdiction of the district court over the whole cause until the patent is issued, and that it has power at any time prior thereto to re-open it for proofs on a proper showing, and to review and reverse the decree it may have previously entered. But such I do not consider to be the true construction of the language of the supreme court.

1. The doctrine enunciated by the supreme court, though it embraced in general terms all cases, must have more especially referred to the case before them. If, then, the construction of their language contended for be wholly inadmissible with respect to the case under consideration, it follows that it would be equally inadmissible with reference to other cases. The claim of Fossatt had already been finally passed upon by the supreme court. By its decree, delivered at a previous term, it had been adjudged to be valid to the extent of one league, to be taken at the election of the grantee or his assigns, within the southern, eastern, and western boundaries mentioned in the grant, and this court was directed to declare those boundaries. The boundaries within which the league was to be taken were accordingly declared by this court, but no survey was made and approved, nor was the precise location of the league fixed by its decree. On appeal, the supreme court held that the decree of this court declaring the three external boundaries of the tract within which the league was to be taken was not a final decree, but that the league be surveyed and located by the surveyor general, under the direction of the court. In answer to the objection that this court had no means of ascertaining the specific boundaries of the confirmed claim, and no power to enforce the execution of its decree, the supreme court observed, in effect, that the court had power to enforce the execution of its decree by the surveyor general, and added that its jurisdiction over the cause did not terminate until the issuance of a patent conformably to its decree.

It will be perceived that the principle thus laid down referred exclusively to the jurisdiction of the court to enforce a decree admitted to be final; and it merely affirmed its right to take such further proceedings to secure the due execution of its decree as might be necessary. But it could not have been intended to declare that in that case this court would have had the authority to reopen the cause and to take further proofs as to the validity of the grant, or the extent of the granted land, and to reverse the solemn adjudication of the supreme court by which those questions had been finally determined. If then, the language of the supreme court cannot be interpreted, as is claimed, with reference to the case before it, neither can it be so interpreted with reference to other cases.

It is urged that the fact that this court has jurisdiction, after decree and survey, to correct the latter, proves that the whole cause remains sub judice until patent issued, that the decree is therefore not a final decree, but that it may be vacated or modified, on a proper showing such as would authorize the granting of a re-hearing, or have to file a bill of review, and that the purchasers from the confirmee are bound by the rules applicable to all purchasers pendente lite. It has already been shown that the supreme court could not, in the passage referred to, have intended to declare that its own adjudication could be reversed by this court, and that therefore the power over the cause, which was held not to terminate until the issuance of the patent, must be taken to mean not the power over the whole cause, including every question of validity and authenticity already determined by that court or the supreme court, but power to enforce the execution of the decree, and to control and modify the action of the surveyor general under it.

That the decree of this court, affirming the validity and extent of the claim, is a final decree, is evident from the fact that every appeal which has yet been taken to the supreme court, and passed upon without objection, has been from such a decree. It is therefore too late to say that those decrees were not final at least in the sense of being appealable. Again, the surveyor is, by law, authorized to survey claims which have been "finally confirmed." Unless, then, the decree confirming the claim be a final decree or confirmation, no survey can regularly be made, and yet until a location be made, and the lines run, the court is without the means of making any other decree than the general decree of confirmation. It is plain, therefore, that this decree is regarded by the law as the final decree of confirmation under which the survey is to be made, and this is evidently the view of the supreme court, as explained in the case of Hendricks' v. Castro, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 442. In that case it is stated that "though in the Case of Fossatt it was held that if questions of a judicial nature arose in the settlement of the location and boundaries of grants the district court was empowered to settle those questions upon a proper case, submitted to it before the issue of a patent, yet that it was not expected that the surveyor would make returns to the district court in every instance, nor was it implied that the validity of a survey depended on the recognition of that court or its incorporation into a decree of the court."

From these observations it is clear that the interposition of this court may be invoked in a proper case to arrest a location by the surveyor general in its final decree, yet its interposition is not in every case necessary; that the survey is valid if not objected to, and the decree of the court remains not only its final decree, in a technical sense, but its last act in connection with the clause. Again, the proceeding by which this survey has been brought into court has been taken under the provisions of the act of 1860, by which the power of this court to correct surveys as declared by the supreme court to exist, was regulated and defined. By the provision of this act only those surveys made by the surveyor, under the provisions of the thirteenth section of the act of 1851, can be ordered to be returned, and these surveys must be, as has been already remarked, of lands finally confirmed. The fourth section provides that on the return of the survey evidence may be taken as to any matters necessary to show the true and proper location of the claim; and the court is authorized to approve the survey, or to correct and modify it, and the surveyor to cause a new survey to be made in obedience to the direction of the court. It is clear that this act in no manner authorizes or contemplates the introduction of evidence as to any matters except those necessary to show the true location of the claim which has been confirmed, and the power of the court is limited to making a decision upon the correctness of the survey, and giving the proper instruction to the surveyor. All testimony, therefore, relating to the validity and authenticity of the claim, is, in a proceeding under the act of 1860, clearly inadmissible. If, then, the meaning of the supreme court in the passage cited from its opinion in U. S. v. Fossatt were doubtful, the subsequent definition and regulation by statute of the power of the court as to surveys made after final decree must be taken as a restriction of its jurisdiction to the matters specified in the statute, and as a legislative definition of the extent and nature, and mode of exercise, of its power after final decree. But the meaning of the supreme court, as explained by Hendricks and Castro, cannot, I think, be mistaken, and it merely affirms the jurisdiction of this court to enforce the execution of the final decree of confirmation, for the exercise of which the subsequent statute prescribes more precise regulations. The proceedings under the act of 1860 are, therefore, closely analogous to a bill in equity, filed to enforce the execution of a decree. In such case it is clear that the original decree, though obtained by fraud, cannot be set aside, except by original bill, nor can the fraud be set up on the answer to the bill to enforce it. 16 Cal. 550, 551; Caldwell v. Giles, 1 Riley, Eq. 120 [2 Hill, Eq. 548]; 1 Bland, 120; 4 J. J. Marsh. 497; 1 Sandf. Ch. 103; Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1788; 2 Hill, Eq. 548.

It is conceded that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain a bill of review under the special powers conferred by the statute in this class of cases. But even if it had, and if this was an application for leave to file such a bill, it is not clear that it ought to be granted.

This claim was presented to the board in March, 1853. It was presented to a tribunal instituted for the sole object of ascertaining the validity of claims of the class to which it belonged. The genuineness of the title papers was, of course, the first question to be inquired into. After an investigation extending over a period of more than two years and a half, the board decided that the papers were genuine. The case was appealed to this court, and an opportunity afforded to the United States for further investigations and additional proofs. On the tenth day of November, 1856, more than three and a half years after the appeal, the claim was confirmed in this court, with evident reluctance, and doubt as to the authority of the title papers. It would not be easy to convey a clearer intimation that the case required further investigation than was contained in the opinion of this court. An appeal to the supreme court was taken. It remained pending, for on the 1st April, 1857, the district attorney, under instructions from the attorney general, withdrew the appeal, and formally consented, in writing, that the decree of this court should stand as the final decree of confirmation. It was after the abandonment of the appeal, and the filing of this consent, that the present owners effected their purchase. They are not denied to have been innocent purchasers for a large consideration in value.

The evidence of fraud and forgery which it is now sought to introduce is derived from the archives of the former government. These archives have, since the commencement of the suit, been in the possession of the United States. They would at any time, if carefully examined, have afforded incontrovertible proofs of the true character of this claim. The fact that the seal known as the "Limantour seal" is forged, was proved in court in November, 1857. It was probably discovered sometime previously. It was therefore known to the United States less than six months after the dismissal of the appeal,—nearly five years have elapsed since the decree became final by consent,— and nearly four years since the spuriousness of the seals was detected.

Under all these circumstances, it may well be doubted whether a court, possessing full equity powers, would suffer a bill of review to be filed. The United States, as a suitor in court, is bound by the rules and principles which determine the rights of individuals. For more than three years and a half, during which this case was pending before the board and the district court, the United States have omitted to present testimony as to the principal points in issue, which a diligent search could have obtained. No new document has been discovered, nor any new evidence suddenly brought to light. A comparison has merely been made between the seals on papers, and those on others admitted to be genuine. Of both the United States was, from the beginning, the appointed custodian. Though apprised by the opinion of this court that the case was open to the gravest suspicions, the United States have, through their appointed agents, formally acknowledged the validity of the claim, and consented that the decree confirming it should be treated as final. Under these circumstances, I think it more than doubtful whether a bill of review could be permitted and a decree obtained, the effect of which would be to divest the title of those who have parted with their money on the faith of the formal acknowledgment of the government that the claim was valid, and the decree of confirmation not only final but just. 12 Johns. 521; 3 Ves. 448; 5 Johns. Ch. 550; Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1726; [Thomas v. Harvie] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 146; Massie v. Graham [Case No. 9,263]; 1 Barb. Ch. 273.

But whatever be the true view to be taken of this question, it is enough to say that in a proceeding to correct a survey, under the act of 1860, this court has no jurisdiction to review and reverse the final decree whereby the genuineness and validity of the claim have been established; and this whether the final decree is that of the board or this court, which has become final by the dismissal of the appeal, or is the decree of the supreme court.

No other objection being made, the survey is approved.

UNITED STATES v. RICO et al.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 161.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—CONFIRMATION.

This claim, though subject to suspicion as to the bona fides of the grant, must be confirmed on the testimony presented.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.
Jeremiah Clarke, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was confirmed by the board of commissioners. We have examined the testimony contained in the transcript, and, though there is room for doubt as to the genuineness of the grant, we have found nothing to justify us in reversing the decision on the ground that it is a forgery. It is true that a fatality not usual seems to have attended this grant, for not only do the signatures of Jimeno and Micheltorena present a somewhat suspicious appearance, but the expediente, which might have confirmed or dispelled doubts as to the authenticity of the grant, has been lost while in the custody of an officer to whom such documents were not ordinarily entrusted. But whatever doubts may be suggested by these and other circumstances, we are met by the positive testimony of witnesses who saw the grant executed, as they swear, and one of whom actually drew it up. The board who heard the witnesses testify, and who had other means of judging of their credibility than this court possesses, confirmed the claim; and the case has been submitted to this court without argument or observation of any kind on the part of the United States. No additional testimony has been taken since the decision of the commissioners, and we are left to confirm or reverse the decision of the board, with only such light as to the merits of the case as is afforded by a perusal of the transcript. To pronounce this grant a forgery, we should entertain something more than a suspicion as to its genuineness; and as the board, who saw the witnesses and examined the original grant, confirmed the claim, we do not feel authorized to reverse its decision. A decree of confirmation must therefore be entered.

UNITED STATES v. RIDDLE.

[4 Wash. C. C. 644.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1827.

SEAMEN—AUTHORITY OF MASTER—ASSAULT—EVIDENCE—LEAVING MATE IN FOREIGN PORT.

1. Indictment against the master of a ship for an assault with intent to kill, and for maliciously forcing the mate on shore at a foreign port, and leaving him there. To support the first count, an intention to kill is essential; it is not sufficient if it was merely to punish or to torture.

[1] [Originally published from the MS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.

2. The second offence may be committed although no physical force was used; as if the mate left the ship under a well founded fear of his life had he remained on board.

The defendant was tried by the same jury upon two indictments. One was for an assault committed at sea by defendant, master of the ship, on his mate, with intent to kill. The other for maliciously, and without justifiable cause, forcing the mate of his ship on shore at Batavia, a foreign port; and leaving him there.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). That, upon the first indictment, the jury must be satisfied, not only that the assault was committed after the 3d of March, 1825, when the act of congress was passed; but that the intention with which the assault was made was to take the life of the person assaulted. If the jury should believe that it was made with intent merely to give pain, or to torture the person assaulted, however cruelly, the defendant cannot be found guilty; unless they are also satisfied that the intention was to kill, that being the offence stated in the indictment.

Upon the second indictment, the offence may be committed, although no actual, physical force was used in putting the mate on shore; as if he left the ship under a well grounded fear of danger to his life from the defendant if he continued on board to perform the return voyage. Mere general ill treatment by the defendant, committed on the mate, on the outward voyage, would not amount to that kind of moral force which would bring the case within the tenth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1825, c. 65 [4 Stat. 115].

The jury acquitted the defendant, on both indictments.

LARCENY—INDICTMENT.

In larceny, "one silver coin of the value of fifty cents," is a sufficient description of the property stolen.

[Cited in Com. v. Gallagher, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 240; Porter v. State, 26 Fla. 56, 7 South. 145.]

The defendant [Eliza Rigsby] was convinced of larceny.

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant, moved in arrest of judgment, that "one silver coin of the value of fifty cents of the goods and chattels of one John Kinchelow," is too vague and uncertain a description of the property stolen. It does not state the value in the current money of the United States, or of any other country.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), after looking into precedents, overruled the motion.

7. Congress has power to pass a law imposing a license duty on those who are engaged in a business which is a subject of police regulation by the states.

The defendant [James Riley] was indicted for a misdemeanor, in carrying on the business of a retail dealer in liquors, without having taken out a license therefor, as required by the act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 432), commonly known as the "Internal Revenue Act," and by the amendments to that act made by the act of March 3, 1863 (Id. 713). The defendant was convicted, and now moved for a new trial.

E. Delafield Smith, U. S. Dist. Atty.

John McKeon, for defendant.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. I will notice the grounds urged on the motion for a new trial in this case, in the order in which they have been presented to the court.

The first is, that, after a jury had been empanelled and sworn, they were dismissed from the box and a new jury was empanelled and sworn, which tried the cause. It is insisted that the defendant was twice put in jeopardy, by this proceeding. The facts are these: The jury was empanelled and sworn, by inadvertence, before the prisoner had been arraigned, or had in any manner answered to the indictment. The prisoner was, in contemplation of law, coram non judice. The proceeding in empanelling the jury at that time was a mere nullity. The defendant could not have been required to proceed to trial. It was, therefore, not merely in the discretion, but it was the duty, of the court, to disregard the irregular proceeding, and, after the prisoner had been arraigned and had pleaded to the indictment, to direct the jury to be empanelled in the regular order. No injury was done to the defendant. The jury which tried him were drawn from the whole panel, including all those who had been irregularly sworn. The defendant had not been put in any jeopardy. No step had been taken in the proceedings, that affected him, or that could, in any manner, have resulted in touching his rights. No case has been cited which would warrant the claim set up by the defendant, that he has been put twice in jeopardy. Courts have some discretion in protecting the administration of justice, and they have gone much farther, in the exercise of that discretion, than the court went in this case. U. S. v. Morris [Case No. 15,815]. The motion on this ground cannot be sustained.

The second ground upon which a new trial is asked is, that the court refused to instruct the jury, that they, and not the court, were judges of the law, in criminal cases. This is no new question in the courts of the United States. Whatever may have been the views of some of the judges of those courts, in the early days of the republic, it is well understood, that the settled practice of those tribunals has, for many years, been in accordance with that followed on this trial. Nor does this view of the law rest, as the counsel for the defendant seems to suppose, on the single decision of Mr. Justice Story, in the case of U. S. v. Battiste [Id. 14,545], cited and criticized on the argument. The same question was considered at length, after full argument, by that eminent jurist, Mr. Justice Curtis, in the case of U. S. v. Morris [supra]. In a luminous and able opinion, he considers the state of the English law at the time of the adoption of the federal constitution, and conclusively shows, that, when that constitution was founded, it was the settled rule of the common law, that, in criminal cases, the court decided the law, and the jury the facts. He also shows, that the legislation of congress has proceeded on the idea that such was the law, for, the 6th section of the act of April 29, 1802 (2 Stat. 159), provides, that, in case of a division of opinion between the judges of the circuit court, on any question arising in a criminal case, such question may be certified to the supreme court, "and shall, by said court, be finally decided," and that "the decision of the supreme court, and their order in the premises, shall be remitted to the circuit court, and be there entered of record, and shall have effect according to the nature of the said judgment and order." Mr. Justice Curtis well puts the question: "Now, can it be, after a question arising in a criminal trial has been certified to the supreme court, and there, in the language of this act, finally decided, and their order remitted here, and entered of record, that, when the trial comes on, the jury may rightfully revise and reverse this final decision?" I think but one answer can be given to this question, and, if it were an open one, I should have little hesitation in overruling the claim of the defendant in this case. But I regard it as already authoritatively settled, and I cannot conclude this brief reference to the law, in more impressive and fitly chosen words, than those with which the learned judge closes the opinion which I have already cited: "A strong appeal has been made to the court by one of the defendant's counsel, upon the ground that the exercise of this power by juries, is important to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the citizen. If I thought so, I should pause long before I denied its existence. But a good deal of reflection has convinced me, that the argument drawn from this quarter is really the other way. As long as the judges of the United States are obliged to express their opinions publicly, to give their reasons for them, when called upon in the usual mode, and to stand responsible for them, not only to public opinion, but to a court of impeachment, I can apprehend very little danger of the laws being wrested to purposes of injustice. But, on the other hand, I do consider that this power and corresponding duty of the court, authoritatively to declare the law, is one of the highest safeguards of the citizen. The sole end of courts of justice is to enforce the laws uniformly and impartially, without respect of persons or times or the opinions of men. To enforce popular laws is easy. But, when an unpopular cause is a just cause, when a law, unpopular in some locality, is to be enforced there, then comes the strain upon the administration of justice; and few unprejudiced men would hesitate as to where that strain would be most firmly borne. I have entered thus at large into this important question, in the course of a jury trial, with unaffected reluctance. Having been directly and strongly appealed to, and finding that no judge of any court of the United States had, in any published opinion, examined it upon such grounds that I could feel I had a right to repose on his decision without more, I knew not how to avoid the duty which was thus thrown upon me. My firm conviction is, that, under the constitution of the United States, juries, in criminal trials, have not the right to decide any questions of law; and, if they render a general verdict, their duty and their oath require them to apply to the facts, as they may find them, the law given to them by the court."

The third error alleged is, that the court required the counsel to argue the question of the constitutionality of the law under which the defendant was indicted, to the court instead of the jury. It is difficult to see what error there could be in this. The main question, as to the branch of the court to which belonged the power of deciding the law of the case, had been determined, and it would seem that ordinary regularity and decorum would require that the argument on that question should be addressed to that branch of the court which was to decide it, instead of to the one which had no rightful power over it. The court certainly understood the counsel, when the question was raised on the trial, to acquiesce entirely in this view of the matter. But, in any aspect of the question, the court is of opinion, that the direction given, to argue the question of the constitutionality of the law to the court, was no more an error, than it would have been to direct the counsel to go to the jury on the facts. While the jury are the exclusive judges of the fact, the court is the exclusive judge of the law, and the orderly and decorous conduct of a trial would seem obviously to indicate, that the arguments of counsel upon each of these features of the case, should be severally addressed specially to that branch of the tribunal to which their decision appertains.

The fourth ground on which this motion rests is, that the court allowed a witness to give evidence of a specific sale of liquor by the defendant, at his place of business, after the day alleged in the indictment. The indictment was for carrying on the trade or business, &c. It was, in the nature of the case, a continuous transaction, and, although a day had to be alleged, the exact time is never material, in such a case, on the proof. The evidence of this witness went to the jury, with caution from the court, that the fact of the sale made on the day testified to by him, was not conclusive proof of the fact alleged in the indictment, but only tended to prove it. The day alleged was the 6th of June, and the witness stated, as I find from my minutes, that the transaction alluded to by him took place on or about the 7th. The fact went to the jury with the remark of the court, addressed to them, that the fact testified to was only to be regarded by them, so far as it tended to prove the business carried on by the defendant at the place in question, on or before the 6th of June. The fact that the defendant sold the witness a glass of liquor on the 7th, from a store long occupied by him, and in a bar room in that store, fitted up with all the paraphernalia of a regular retail liquor shop, certainly tended to prove that the same business was carried on there the day before.

The fifth and last ground on which a new trial is asked, is the allegation that the act requiring the license to be taken is repugnant to that clause of the constitution of the United States which provides, that "all duties, imports, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." The court is referred to the 37th section of the act, which recognizes the well known fact, that the execution of the law might be resisted, and even temporarily prevented, within the limits of some states or other territory of the United States, and provides for the collection of the tax as soon as the de facto authority of the government should be re-established therein. But this recognition of this possible and probable state of things by congress, furnishes no valid objection to the law itself. The law is uniform, and thereby conforms to the constitution. Its validity does not depend on the celerity or uniformity with which it can be executed in some disturbed districts of the country. Tax laws, both state and national, are required to be uniform. This is an elementary principle of legislation, resting upon the solid foundation of justice. But it is a novel doctrine that a law, uniform in its provisions, can be annulled by the refusal of a portion of those on whom it is designed to operate, to comply with its provisions. If this notion were to prevail, civil commotion, or foreign invasion, within a small district of the country, would paralyze the government, and repeal the fundamental law upon which its existence depends. The very resistance of this defendant thus far to the law, shows that its execution has not been uniform; but it would not be soberly argued that this fact has the remotest effect upon the validity of the act itself. The recognition of the fact by congress, in the act itself, that its execution might be forcibly delayed in some parts of the country, by combinations of individuals, until they should be put down by arms, can no more affect its binding force, than could the recognition of the fact that its execution might be delayed by this defendant, or any number situated like him, until its enforcement upon him or them should be effected through the power and according to the forms of a judicial tribunal.

Some suggestions were made, on the argument, as to the power of congress to pass a law imposing a license duty on those who are engaged in a business which is a subject of police regulation by the states. These questions have been disposed of by Mr. Justice Nelson, and, therefore, require no discussion in this place.

I have given the questions raised in this case as full an examination as the brief time since the argument yesterday would allow, and am entirely satisfied that the motion should be overruled on all the grounds.

UNITED STATES v. RINDSKOPF et al.

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. Dec., 1874.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS — CONSPIRACY — OVERT ACTS—VENUE OF TRIAL.

1. Conspiracy, under the revenue act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 471], is a combination between two or more persons to effect the purpose declared by the act to be illegal. The agreement may be expressed or implied, and the gist of the offense is the illegal conspiracy, the particular manner in which it was done, or to be done, not being material.

[Cited in U. S. v. Dennee, Case No. 14,948.]

2. It is not essential that any but the leading conspirator know the exact part which another was to perform.

3. If two are shown to have conspired, the acquittal of others jointly indicted does not prevent the conviction of such two.

4. The fact that the overt acts charged and proven were severally criminal, is no answer to an indictment for conspiracy, and an overt act, in itself criminal, may be proven, to show the existence of the conspiracy charged.

[Cited in U. S. v. Bayer, Case No. 14,547.]

5. Many cases cited and commented upon.

6. The defendants may be tried in any district where the overt acts were committed.

The defendants [Samuel Rindskopf and others] were indicted for conspiracy under section 30, Act March 2, 1867. It was alleged in the indictment that Alexander L. Rogers was the owner of a distillery at Middleton, and for the purpose and with intent to defraud the United States out of the tax upon the spirits manufactured thereat, conspired with Samuel Rindskopf, liquor dealer, of Milwaukee, Albert Mueller, his distiller, and James W. Bull, store-keeper at said distillery, to aid and assist him in carrying out such purpose; and that they did, in pursuance thereof, manufacture, dispose of, and defraud the government out of the tax upon large quantities of spirits manufactured thereat, and setting forth the various and illegal means and devices used for that purpose.

Before the trial commenced a nolle prosequi was entered as against the defendant Alexander L. Rogers. On the trial against the other defendants, he was called as a witness, and testified that he went into the business for the purpose and with the intent to manufacture illicit spirits; that after he had commenced, he went to Milwaukee and saw Rindskopf, and there told him, in substance, that he was engaged in manufacturing illicit spirits, and that he could get them from the still or government warehouse to his rectifying house without paying taxes, but he did not know how to get them from there upon the market, and asked Rindskopf to assist him, and that Rindskopf then told him he would go in with him and take the wines, and pay him Chicago prices, less twenty-two cents, which he was to retain as his share of the speculation or risk; that Rindskopf told him how to proceed to get them to his house, to wit, that he (Rogers) should put them in new barrels at the rectifying establishment, and get the gauger here to gauge them as whisky, and put on whisky stamps and ship them to his firm as such; and that they would receive them at the depot, and pay for them at the prices named. And he further stated that, under that agreement, he sent to them highwines under such false labels, from time to time, and that they were received and paid for upon the terms of that agreement; stating the mode and amount of two of the payments. Rogers stated that after that he continued to manufacture illicit spirits, and that Mueller was the distiller and did the work, or superintended it, and that Bull, the store-keeper, had full knowledge of it, and received from him $100 per month for neglecting his official duty, and permitting him to use what material he wished, and to take the spirits from the warehouse without payment of the tax. He further stated that, after some trouble with the revenue officers in February, he was ordered to send them two-stamp goods, and, if not detected, he would not enter them on the books.

Henry Lacher, another witness, testified that he had charge of the rectifying house under Rogers first, and afterwards under Rogers & Bunker, and that spirits were often received at the rectifier and dumped, upon which the government tax had not been paid, and described the means adopted to accomplish that purpose, particularly, and that such spirits or highwines were afterwards placed in other barrels and marked whiskies, kimmel or bitters, and stamped by the gauger either as whisky at 66 or 68 proof, or as bitters, no proof, and that they were shipped by rail to Rindskopf Bros., Milwaukee; that they were entered on their book at the rectifier according to the gauger's mark, and Rindskopf Bros. were charged with them at the market rates for such goods. This, he said, continued up to about the 11th of February, when he changed and shipped them as highwines with two stamps, but that they were, with a few exceptions, got out of the warehouse and placed in stamped barrels and no tax paid thereon. He further said that he received statements of sale and account and that they were paid for as highwines at the rate stated by Mr. Rogers, to wit: Chicago prices and twenty-two cents off; that those statements and letters accompanying were returned to Mr. Rindskopf at his request after seizure. Other testimony was given sustaining and corroborating these general facts.

H. S. Orton, Geo. B. Smith, P. L. Spooner, Gregory & Pinney, G. W. Goodwin, and H. M. Lewis, for defendants.

HOPKINS, District Judge (charging jury). The defendants were indicted under section 30 of the act of March 2, 1867 (United States revenue laws), for a conspiracy. This section reads as follows: "If two or more persons conspire, either to commit any offense against the laws of the United States or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of said parties to said conspiracy shall do any act to effect the object thereof, the parties to said conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars, and not more than ten thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not exceeding two years." 14 Stat. 484. The act declares what illegal purposes constitute a conspiracy. But in construing it, it becomes necessary to ascertain what is meant in this act by conspiracy. It may be defined as an agreement or combination between two or more persons to effect the purpose declared by the act to be illegal,—to do one of the things prohibited in the act. The indictment here in substance charges the conspiracy to be to defraud the United States out of the tax upon certain spirits to be distilled at the distillery of Alexander L. Rogers, in Middleton.

In the first count the charge of an agreement to manufacture illicit spirits at that place is expressly alleged. In other parts it is also alleged that the agreement was to do so by breaking seals and stamps placed upon certain tubs, and to use them unlawfully for the purpose of manufacturing illicit spirits. I have ruled during the trial that the gist of the offense was the illegal conspiracy to manufacture, and that the particular manner in which it was done, or to be done, was not the material question in the case; that the question to be determined under this count was whether there was a conspiracy between the parties to manufacture and remove spirits so manufactured without the payment of the lawful tax, to defraud the United States. Now the question is, did the parties, or any two of them, enter into a scheme to illegally manufacture spirits, with intent to defraud the government out of the tax by law imposed thereon. If they did, it constituted a conspiracy within the meaning of the act above mentioned, and on that question it is immaterial whether a seal or stamp was broken or not.

In order to charge the parties as conspirators, I do not think it necessary to prove an express agreement between all the parties to do the illegal act. It would be enough if you should find that all of them had the same illegal purpose in view and each acted a certain part to accomplish or tending to accomplish it. But you must be satisfied that each had the same common design and acted to carry such design into effect. In other words, if you should find that Rogers' purpose was to unlawfully manufacture spirits and remove the same from his distillery, and place them upon the market without paying the tax thereon, and that as a part of such corrupt purpose, he induced the storekeeper, Bull, to abstain from doing his official duties, so that he could obtain the material contrary to law, to use for such purpose, and employed Mueller, his distiller, to secretly manufacture the same into spirits, and, to assist him in his unlawful purpose aforesaid, employed Lacher to receive and conceal such spirits in the rectifying establishment of said Rogers, and by an agreement with the defendant Rindskopf, and at his suggestion, Lacher and the government gauger were employed to place said spirits into other barrels and gauge them as whisky and other articles of less proof, and then ship them under such false and fraudulent stamps to the defendant, or to the house of which the defendant was a partner, and that said defendant personally knew of their receipt under such false labels and stamps, and concealed or aided in concealing such facts, to defraud the government, and for the purpose of enabling the said Rogers to defraud the government, out of the legal tax thereon and share the proceeds with him,—you might be at liberty to infer from these facts that the parties acting for the common purpose were all guilty of conspiracy. It would not, in such a case, be necessary to show that the parties had any previous acquaintance, or, with the exception of Rogers, knew of the exact part the other was to perform. In such a case, each might be considered a co-conspirator with Rogers, and being so, would be responsible for his acts in carrying out the illegal purposes. And if you should find such acts to have been done in the carrying out of such illegal purpose, and that the illegal purpose was common to all, you would be authorized to find that the conspiracy was established as to all. If they knew the intention of Rogers, in procuring them to do such acts, to be to defraud the government, and that their acts respectively aided and assisted him to carry into effect such illegal purpose, and that they did the several acts to them assigned, on purpose to enable Rogers to successfully carry out his illegal designs, it would be a conspiracy as to all of such parties, if their overt acts are satisfactorily proven.

In determining the question of conspiracy, Rogers may be reckoned as one, so that if either of the others conspired with him to do the acts alleged in the indictment, although you might find that the other defendants did not conspire with them, you might find that one guilty under this indictment, provided the overt act to effect it is satisfactorily proven.

The defendants were all found guilty by the jury.

On Motion for New Trial and in Arrest of Judgment.

HOPKINS, District Judge. The defendants having been convicted by the jury of the conspiracy charged against them, now move the court for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, and have, in the argument in support of the motion, mainly relied upon the following points: (1) That the court erred in its charge as to what constituted a conspiracy; (2) that as the overt acts set out and proven were severally criminal, and the parties committing them were liable to a specific punishment, after such acts had been performed the parties could not be held liable for a conspiracy to do them; and (3) that the verdict is against evidence.

The first two are those mainly relied upon. As to the first, after listening to the able and ingenious argument of the learned counsel, and after a careful and critical re-examination of my charge on the question, I am thoroughly satisfied that I correctly instructed the jury on that point. The instruction and charge on that question is supported and warranted by the following authorities: Rex v. Cope, 1 Strange, 144; People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 260 et seq; Rex v. Parsons, 1 W. Bl. 392; Gardner v. Preston, 2 Day, 205; U. S. v. Cole [Case No. 14,832]; Com. v. Warren, 6 Mass. 74; Reg. v. Murphy, 8 Car. & P. 297; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 93; 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 187.

The law upon the second point I find too well settled and uniform against the defendants to be at this time questioned. The fact that each of the overt acts constitutes an offense is no answer to this indictment for conspiracy. Upon a charge of conspiracy, an overt act, which is itself criminal, may be proven, to show the existence of the conspiracy charged. Conspiracies, from their very nature, are usually entered into in secret, and are consequently difficult to be established by direct evidence. It has been, therefore, universally held that they may be inferred from circumstances. The common design is the essence of the charge, and may be shown by circumstances and the acts performed by the different alleged conspirators; and the fact that the several acts constitute separate criminal offenses, does not exonerate the parties from the crime of conspiracy, or bar a prosecution therefor. This is sustained by an almost unbroken chain of authorities, both in this country and England.

In Reg. v. Boulton, 12 Cox, Cr. Cas. 87, in court of queen's bench, before Chief Justice Cockburn, in 1871, although the course of receiving proof of the commission of the substantial crime is not regarded as satisfactory, yet it is decided that such a course is legal, and in that case, it being a charge of conspiracy to commit a felonious crime, proof of the commission of the crime itself was allowed. The chief justice cited and relied upon the authority of the late Lord Cranworth in Reg. v. Rowlands, 5 Cox, Cr. Cas. 497, note. In that case the parties had been indicted, not for the offense they had committed, but for a conspiracy to commit it, and the judge, after stating that it would have been more satisfactory if the parties had been indicted for what they had done and not for conspiracy to do it, stated "that the course pursued was no doubt legal, and, being legal," he said, "I shall not now step out of the path of my duty by speculating upon the policy that has been adopted in this case. It would be much more satisfactory to my mind if parties had been indicted for that which they have directly done, and not for having previously conspired to do something, the having done which is proof of the conspiracy. It never is satisfactory, although undoubtedly it is legal." I have quoted this language as expressive of my first view of the question when raised during the trial, and I can say now as I said then, that the better way, in my judgment, would have been to have indicted all parties here for the particular offense committed by each, but under the law it seems I have not the right to say they must be so prosecuted. The course pursued in this matter by the government attorney, in the language of those cases, is "undoubtedly legal," and I can, therefore, only consider the case as it is presented on this indictment.

These cases, if followed, dispose of the second question so strenuously pressed by defendants' counsel. The case of Com. v. Kingsbury, 5 Mass. 106, laying down a contrary doctrine, does not seem to have been followed in that state, for the same judge (Parsons), in Com. v. Warren, 6 Mass. 74, refused to arrest a judgment on a charge of conspiracy, where the overt act was a felony, and was completed and the avails of the crime divided; and in Com. v. Davis, 9 Mass. 415, it is held that acts in execution of the conspiracy may be shown, in aggravation. In the case in U. S. v. Boyden [Case No. 14,632], being an indictment under the same act and section as this, this question was raised and examined upon principle and authority, and Judge Lowell, before whom it was tried, arrived at the conclusion that though the act concerning which the conspiracy was formed was completed, and there was a specific penalty for doing that act, still the government could elect under which to proceed. This doctrine is also supported by People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 259; Collins v. Com., 3 Serg. & R. 220. The dictum in the opinion of Senator Spencer, in Lambert v. People, 7 Cow. 103, I do not think entitled to much weight, as the case there did not turn on any such question. Indeed, it is impossible to tell what principle was settled in that case in the court of errors. [The senators seemed to have embarked on an uncertain sea of generalities, and to have spent their energies in magniloquent declamation, better suited to the forum than the bench. The plain, simple sentences in the opinion of Chief Justice Savage in same case, on page 166 of same volume, are far more satisfactory, reasonable, and convincing. The law on this question is too well established to be now overturned.] [2]

On the other point, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, I need only say that if the jury believed the testimony of Rogers and Lacher, the charge was most clearly made out. Assuming their testimony to be true, the fact of an unlawful conspiracy to defraud the government out of the tax upon spirits to be manufactured at Rogers' distillery, as charged, is established beyond all controversy. The section of the act declaring the conspiracy expressly provides that the parties may be tried in any district where the conspiracy is committed, or an overt act is done in furtherance of the illegal purpose. The overt acts were performed in this district, and the case is properly triable here.

[During the trial several questions were raised of a technical character, as to the particular means by which illicit manufacture was effected. I then overruled them as not tenable, and as too critical, and since that time my attention has been called to section 8 of the amended practice act of 1872 (17 Stat. 198); and, if I had any doubts upon the questions before, that section has removed them. The objections have not, however, been renewed in this motion, and I presume the counsel are satisfied that they are made unavailing by the section of the act above referred to, even if they were good before its passage.] [2]

The motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment is overruled.

UNITED STATES v. RINDSKOPF et al.

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. April 23, 1879.

ASSESSMENT AGAINST DISTILLER—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The validity of an assessment against a distiller may be inquired into by defendants answering a bill by the United States to subject to the payment of such assessment, lands transferred to them.

2. When the defendants have rebutted the presumption of law as to the validity of the assessment the burden of proof is shifted upon the government to establish its validity.

G. W. Hazleton, for the United States.

Before DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, and DYER, District Judge.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. This is a bill founded on an assessment which was made against [Lewis] Rindskopf by the United States for taxes which were due by him as a distiller, and for not making a true return of the spirits manufactured from December 1, 1874, to July 1, 1875. It is a claim for an indebtedness due from him for a violation of the internal revenue laws, and because, as the bill alleges, he had incumbered his property fraudulently, and there was real estate belonging to him which could be taken for the debt due upon the assessment, if the incumbrances upon it were removed.

The bill is filed under a special statute of the United States which authorizes a bill to be filed for the purpose of enforcing any lien which may exist against the property of a distiller, or rectifier, and which declares that the parties in interest shall be made defendants to the bill, and that the case shall be heard by the court, and decided conformably to the equities. Rev. St. § 3207.

The question for the court to determine is, whether this bill under the facts, is maintainable; and we think that it is not. I will state very briefly why we have reached that conclusion.

We concede that the assessment made is prima facie a valid assessment, and must be regarded as binding when made by the officers, as required under the law of the United States; but while this is so, we hold that it is not conclusive against all parties, and that it is competent for those who may not be directly affected by the assessment (as in this case where it is sought to make the assessment binding against property in which other parties claim to have an interest), to contest its validity. We admit that it is necessary for them to show that the assessment is invalid, and the inquiry is, whether on the facts of the case they have done so. We think that they have. The evidence shows the capacity of the distillery. It also shows the amount of returns that were actually made by Rindskopf to the proper officers, and that upon the returns thus made the taxes were paid. The capacity of the distillery is ascertained under the laws of the United States, and they require that there should be a tax assessed against the party running the distillery to an amount equal to 80 per cent. of its capacity.

It appears that, taking the capacity of the distillery during the six months under consideration, it was 188,630 $^{61}/_{100}$ gallons. Upon this capacity returns were made to the amount of 83½ per cent., on which the tax was paid.

[2] [From 21 Int. Rev. Rec. 326.]

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 8 Reporter, 426, contains only a partial report.]

It is claimed there were a little over 62,000 gallons produced which were not returned. Including what was returned with what is assessed, it is much greater than the capacity of the distillery during the time covered by the assessment. It is said that it was possible for the distillery to produce this amount; that the capacity as fixed by the statute does not show the actual compass of the distillery; that more spirits can be produced than the capacity, taking the data prescribed by the statute, would return; but we think this is the position of this part of the case: that while the assessment is prima facie evidence of its validity, the defendants have presumptively shown by evidence that the assessment is invalid; and taking the facts altogether tending to indicate the returns as made, in connection with the capacity, if they do not show true returns, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that they were not true returns. In other words, the defendants having rebutted the presumption that the law makes in relation to the validity of the tax, the burden of proof is shifted from the defendants to the plaintiff, and they must show that this assessment is a valid assessment. Now, how is that proposed to be done? In no other way than by some admissions made, it is claimed, by Rindskopf, in which he said he was running "crooked whiskey" at the rate of one hundred barrels a week. We think that is a very improbable statement, considering the capacity of the distillery, and what he actually returned, and that we cannot, upon that ground, hold that the proof has been made out which it is incumbent on the plaintiff to establish, that the assessment was a valid assessment, as against the evidence produced on the part of the defendants, especially when we consider the evidence from the employés of Rindskopf, all of whom state that they had no knowledge of "crooked whiskey" being run at that time. And this is stated by the storekeepers, as well as the employés of Rindskopf. Rindskopf himself contradicts all these admissions which he is said to have made; and while there may be suspicion, we cannot decree against the interests of persons on mere suspicion, without competent evidence to prove the fact which it is alleged actually existed.

Now, taking all these things together, we think the testimony of the United States has not satisfactorily met the proof which has been offered by the defendants that this was an invalid assessment.

We have looked into the question of the validity of the mortgage made to Wirtheimer, and the sale, but the view we have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to give an opinion on the validity of the mortgage and of the sale.

We hold, as the case stands, that it is wanting in an indispensable requisite, namely, satisfactory evidence to show that the assessment was a valid assessment. Therefore, we shall dismiss the bill.

Case No. 16,167.

UNITED STATES v. RINGGOLD.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1837.

GAMING—INDICTMENT.

1. An indictment for keeping "a faro-bank" is bad, unless it aver the faro-bank to be a common gaming-table.

[Distinguished in Marcus v. United States, Case No. 9,062a. Cited in Stettinius v. United States, Id. 13,387.]

2. An indictment for keeping "a certain public gaming-table called 'faro-bank,'" is bad.

3. An indictment for keeping "a gaming-table," is bad.

[Cited in People v. Spousler, 1 Dak. 289, 46 N. W. 460.]

There were three indictments against the defendant [Benjamin Ringgold].

The first (No. 140) had only one count, which charged that the defendant "did keep a faro-bank," against the form of the statute, &c.

The second (No. 141) had two counts. The first charged that the defendant "did keep a certain public gaming-table called faro-bank." The second count charged that the defendant "did keep a faro-bank."

The third indictment (No. 142) also had two counts. The first charged that the defendant "did keep a gaming-table." The second charged that the defendant "did keep a faro-bank." All these counts concluded, against the form of the statute.

By the first section of the penitentiary act for the district of Columbia of 2d March, 1831 [4 Stat. 448], it is enacted, among other things, "that every person who shall be convicted" "of keeping a faro-bank, or other common gaming-table," "shall be sentenced to suffer punishment, by imprisonment and labor, for the time and times hereinafter prescribed, in the penitentiary act for the District of Columbia." And by the twelfth section, it is, among other things, enacted, "that every person duly convicted" "of keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table, shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment and labor, for a period not less than one year, nor more than five years."

Mr. Dandridge, for defendant, moved to quash these indictments, because neither of them averred that the defendant kept a common gaming-table; and he contended that it was not sufficient to charge the defendant with keeping a faro-bank, without averring that a faro-bank was a common gaming-table. Every faro-bank is not a common gaming-table; and, unless it be, it is not indictable.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), took time to consider.

ly: U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,328], at November term, 1835; U. S. v. Cooly [Id. 14,859], at March term, 1836, for keeping "a certain gaming-table called a 'faro-bank'"; U. S. v. McCormick [Id. 15,661], at the same term, for keeping "a certain public gaming-table called a 'faro-bank'"; and U. S. v. Smith [Id. 16,330], at the same term, who was indicted for taking insufficient bail on an indictment against one Miller, for keeping "a certain gaming-table called a 'faro-bank'"; and Craven's Case, Russ. & R. 14.

In Cooly's Case, the court (nem. con.) upon the authority of Craven's Case, quashed the indictment, "being of opinion that the indictment must charge the offence to be the keeping either of a common gaming-table, or the keeping of a faro-bank; not merely a gaming-table called a 'faro-bank.'" In that case Thruston, J., suggested that the best way of charging the offence would be to charge it as the keeping of a faro-bank, the same being a common gaming-table. In McCormick's Case, the court (Morsell, J., absent,) on the authority of Cooly's Case, quashed the indictment. In Smith's Case, the court (Morsell, J., absent,) held, that the indictment against Miller, which was for keeping "a certain gaming-table called a 'faro-bank,'" did not describe an indictable offence. On the last day of the term, the court being full, but Mr. Key, the district attorney, absent on account of the illness of one of his family, and after the court had given notice that it was about to close the session, Mr. Dandridge and Mr. Bradley argued the case again. They said that Mr. Key admitted that a faro-bank might be innocently kept, and that it is not punishable unless it be a common gaming-table; and, upon that admission, THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, argued that the term "faro-bank" was too uncertain in itself to support an indictment.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, said: I think the first count of the indictment No. 141, which charges that the defendant kept "a certain public gaming-table called 'faro-bank,'" is bad, upon the authority of Cooly's and McCormick's Cases. And that the first count of the indictment No. 142, which charges that he kept "a gaming-table," is also bad, because it is not charged to be a common gaming-table. I think the counts, charging that he kept a faro-bank, are good, because the words "a faro-bank or other common gaming-table," necessarily imply that a faro-bank is a common gaming-table; so that it would be tautology to say a "common faro-bank." Nor do I think it necessary to aver that a faro-bank is a common gaming-table, because the keeping of a faro-bank is, per se, made an offence. If it should be averred to be a common faro-bank, the defendant might, perhaps, deny that it was common; and prove that guards were placed at the door to prevent the approach of the officers of justice, and all others who might inform against them; which class might include a large proportion of the community. To prevent such cavilling, the word "common" might have been, by the legislature, designedly omitted before the term "faro-bank," from abundant caution. I am of opinion that the counts which charge the keeping of a faro-bank, are good under the statute; and that the other counts are bad, and should be quashed.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, not being prepared to give an opinion, the court took time to advise until the next term.

At March term, 1838 THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, absent,) quashed these indictments, because, as it is understood, neither count charged the defendant with keeping a common faro-bank, nor a common gaming-table.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, was prevented by severe indisposition from attending at this term, except a few days.

SALARY OF STATE'S ATTORNEY—LIABILITY TO INCOME TAX.

[1. One's compensation as state's attorney is not liable to the income tax.]

[2. The compensation of a state officer cannot be applied to the satisfaction of the $1,000 exemption from the income tax.]

In 1869 Mr. [John] Ritchie was state's attorney for Frederick county, and in assessing the internal revenue tax upon his income for that year, the assessor included as taxable the money received as compensation for his services as state's attorney. Mr. Ritchie took the ground that his compensation received as an officer of the state was exempt from the income tax, and declined to pay the portion of the tax assessed upon that part of his income. The $1,000 exemption, under the law then in force, was deducted from the aggregate amount returned. The government claimed that the salary in question was not exempt from the income tax; and, secondly, that if it were, then the United States could apply $1,000 of it to the exemption clause.

Mr. Stirling, U. S. Dist. Atty.

GILES, District Judge, decided that under the case relied on by the defendant (The Collector v. Day, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 113) his compensation as state's attorney was not liable to the income tax, that the office of state's attorney was established by the constitution of the state, and was one of the means and instrumentalities for carrying on the state government, with respect to which the powers of the state are independent of the general government, and that the United States has no more right to tax these agencies than the state government has to tax the means and agencies of carrying on the federal government.

Judge GILES also held that the United States could not apply the compensation of a state officer to the satisfaction of the exemption alone, because that would, indirectly, make his income from such source liable to the taxation from which it is exempt; that to exhaust the exemption clause by taking the amount out of his official income, would be to make it, in effect, subject to the revenue law, and to deny to a state's officer the advantage of the state's exemption, and that therefore the official income of defendant was not to be taken into consideration in the assessment of the tax. For these reasons Judge GILES held that defendant was entitled to judgment.

UNITED STATES v. RITTER et ux.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.

ADMINISTRATION BONDS—NECESSARIES FURNISHED.

In an action upon the administration-bond, to recover a distributive share of the estate, the administrator may retain for necessaries furnished to the distributee.

Debt on the administration-bond; breach, in not paying Ann Moxley's distributive share of the estate of John Lyon, deceased. The defendants [Peter Ritter and wife] claimed to retain for her board and education.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiffs, contended that if the defendants had been guardians they would not have been allowed more than the income of the estate unless previously authorized so to do by the orphans' court. As administrators, they had no right to make advances on account of the distributive share. The guardian was the proper person to provide for the support and education of the distributee. See the Maryland testamentary law of 1798 (chapter 101, § 12).

Mr. Key, contra, said it was not a set-off; it was payment in advance of the distributive share; and the administrator may in his discretion make such advances, either to the guardian, or to the distributee, and may retain therefor. Dale v. Sollet, 4 Burrows, 2133.

THE COURT said, that as this was a suit against the defendants, as administrators, and not as guardians, the law of Maryland, limiting the expenses of guardians to the income of the estate, did not apply; and that the defendants might retain for necessaries furnished to the distributee, according to her estate, condition, and circumstances.

Verdict for the defendants.

[11 Int. Rev. Rec. 157.]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. May, 1870.

ATTORNEYS — COURTESY IN ARGUMENT — ATTACKS ON WITNESSES—VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS.

[1. It is disrespectful alike to jury and court for counsel to assume that utterly untrue imputations, wholesale abuse of witnesses unconnected with any criticism of their testimony, and attacks upon absent persons unknown to the trial, can by any possibility aid the cause of the defendant.]

[2. The court comments upon the difficulties attending trials for violation of the internal revenue laws, and the demoralizing effects flowing from the evasions of law by reputable business firms and their employés.]

[This was an indictment against John J. Robbins, for violation of the internal revenue laws for the purpose of evading payment of taxes.]

The court first recapitulated the testimony that had been given in reference to the charge of selling tobacco without proper stamps to Sprague, Warner & Co., of Chicago; to Randall, of Grand Rapids; and to Beidelbeck & Miller, of Davenport. As to the sales to Robert Sprague, James F. Rothschilds, and the White Brothers, the court considered the testimony so direct and simple that they would take no pains to recapitulate it.

First, as to the charge of selling to Sprague, Warner & Co. The testimony for the government showed that this firm ordered five cases of tobacco, containing five caddies, each branded "Admiration," from the defendant, and that in the usual course of trade, and in response to their order, they received the tobacco of that description. Subsequently, they received a letter from the defendant, which has been placed in evidence, asking pay for the tobacco. What the jury had to decide was whether it was reasonable to believe from the dray tickets, the bill of sale made out by defendant's clerk, the way-bills, the receiving books, and the testimony of Sprague, Warner & Co., that the defendant did send these goods in compliance with that order. If they thought the defendant did sell these goods, and that the proper stamps were not affixed, it would be their duty to find the defendant guilty on the third count.

Next, as to the tobacco, two cases of plug-tobacco pieces, sold to Randall at Grand Rapids. The testimony seemed to show that upon application from Sprague, Warner & Co., the defendant, by his agent, Charles J. Robbins, caused the bill of sale to be made out in the fictitious name of E. B. Ward, dated it at Danville instead of Cincinnati, and sent it accompanying the tobacco to Sprague, Warner & Co., of Chicago; that defendant subsequently wrote a letter claimed by the government to refer to these goods. in reference to the price to be paid for them; that they were subsequently sold to Randall, and found with counterfeit stamps attached in his possession by the government. If the jury found that the goods were traced from the defendant to Sprague, Warner & Co., from them to Randall, and then to the authorities in Cincinnati, and that they were sold by the defendant without the proper stamps affixed, they would find him guilty under the first count.

In relation to the Davenport transaction and the shipment of two cases of tobacco with counterfeit stamps to Beidelbeck & Miller, the court said: "One caddy of this lot had a very different treatment. Its history is most extraordinary, and important in this case. On the 8th of August, by order of the commissioner of internal revenue at Washington, this caddy was sent by the United States Express Company to General Young, supervisor of internal revenue, at Cincinnati. It arrived here on August 10. In the meantime, the defendant had learned of the seizure, and had instructed his agent, Saunders, to go to Davenport and secure if possible the destruction of the counterfeit stamps. After Saunders had started and before he reached the depot, the defendant learned that his factory had also been seized here, and he therefore detained Saunders a few days for consultation. The defendant shortly afterward learned from Collector Weitzel, in some mode, that the caddy had been ordered from Davenport to Cincinnati. And I wish that Collector Weitzel, and all other collectors who have business to do for the government of the United States, would understand that it is not their duty to make communications of any kind; no matter how severely they may be criticised, no matter how much they may lose the reputation of being clever fellows, they should not communicate in any way with persons charged with crime against the government. If they have not stability enough to be silent when approached by interested parties, they should resign their positions, and give place to others more competent to take care of the interests of the government. The details of this case show the effect of such communication." The court completed the history of the successful attempt to change the stamp on this caddy and the unsuccessful efforts of Robbins's agent to obtain possession of the balance of the caddies at Davenport, and instructed the jury, in case they found the defendant had sold the tobacco to Beidelbeck & Miller, to return a verdict of guilty on the fifth count.

In reference to the sale to White Brothers, the defendant having admitted the fact that the goods, with second-hand stamps attached, were sold as charged, it would be the duty of the jury to return a verdict of guilty on the sixth count.

Wm. Bateman, U. S. Dist. Atty., and B. Storer, Jr., Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., assisted by counsellors, for the United States.

Hollister & Butterworth, for defendant.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge, concluded his charge to the jury as follows: In ordinary cases I should have submitted this cause to you without other comments. But after some consultation, I conclude to say a word or two about some of the incidents of this trial. The character of the discussions degenerated in a few instances into gross accusations and the imputation of bad motives on the part of the officers of the government, such as I suppose, as a general rule, ought not to be tolerated in any case. The uniform courtesy during the trial of the learned counsel for the defendant, made me reluctant to interrupt what, although in my own estimation distasteful and sometimes very extravagant, I thought without a violation of duty I might suffer to proceed. What was said, too, was so interwoven with an apparent good nature and pleasantry, that, as each excess occurred, they came and went before I felt it a duty to interfere. But I desire most emphatically to announce that it must not be cited as a precedent for what in future trials, as a judge, I shall deem it right to suffer. It degrades a public trial. Neither jury, counsel, nor court feel that self-respect, nor can they maintain that condition of mind, necessary for the performance of their duties, if, by the compulsions of the law or the tolerations of the bench, they are forced to listen, in circumstances which assume it is a legitimate part of a public trial, to an angry contest where the decorum and the proprieties of our homes, or an ordinary business intercourse, are utterly wanting. It is disrespectful alike to jury and court for counsel on either side to assume that utterly unproved imputations, that wholesale abuse of witnesses sworn, unconnected with any criticism of their testimony, and attacks upon absent persons who are unknown to the trial, can by any possibility aid a defendant, be he guilty or innocent. It supposes the court so constituted in both its branches as to be incapable of distinguishing between what alone it is sworn to consider on the one hand, and the passionate denunciations of counsel on the other. Although sufficiently intimated already, I take pains to repeat that, although I deem the argument of the learned counsel for the defendant a clear violation of the rule I intend to enforce, still it is not so far from precedent in this and other courts as to authorize any severity of rebuke; on the contrary, the general courtesy of the counsel during the trial so won upon the court, that it had much to do with what it suffered during the argument. There is, however, one portion of it I wish particularly to notice. Counsel in his zeal expressed the belief that in the universal activity of the government assistants to oppress his client, they had actually poisoned the mind of the court, and quite clearly intimated that it was too prejudiced to sit in the trial of the cause. This, I suppose, I ought not to have permitted, and hope I may never again have cause to consider what, in such a contingency, a judge, mindful of the usefulness and power of the court, ought to do. I have concluded, however, instead of rebuking it directly here, to answer it in a mode I am certain will be more effective with the counsel and his client, and as influential as any other to teach new practitioners how in error they are when, in their zeal, they mistake an inflexible administration of the law for partiality and prejudice. To what I say, gentlemen, I ask your attention, as it has a practical application to your duties. You have before you as witnesses, men who are accomplices of the guilty participators in the offence for which the defendant is tried. This goes substantially to their credibility, and, so far as your verdict must rest upon their testimony, is worthy your consideration. Thinking it not impossible that, among the various prosecutions for offences under this law, I might be called upon to enforce its penalties; perceiving that each offence, no matter how many, even twenty in the same indictment, compelled me to inflict a prescribed punishment for each, I felt oppressed by the consequences which might, in certain instances, result. I, therefore, conferred with other able and experienced judges for some mode of mitigating the punishment. I called special attention to the peculiar condition of opinion in regard to offences against the government; that, for some unappreciable reason, although they were in fact among the most injurious and widely corrupting crimes, the fact was still beyond dispute that otherwise reputable men, those who would not steal their neighbor's goods or forge their names, would defraud the government by false invoices, smuggling, and false stamps. I brought forward the extraordinary facts of this case as they are claimed to exist by the government, the procuration of the counterfeit stamps, the employment of so many young men who had been taught to violate the law, and so take the first steps in crime, and found that while I could not look upon the defendant as an abandoned criminal, the public would demand in such a case what I might, in view of these circumstances, think should not be inflicted. I wished it even possible to omit the imposition of a punishment like that due to the hardened criminal who, abandoning all ordinary business, lives a continuous life of lawlessness and crime. It was thought we discovered a mode which in some degree would authorize the court, without a violation of duty, to temper the administration of this same statute to the exigencies of particular cases. I assure this counsel that it was because I entertained feelings wholly at war with, nay, on the other extreme, of those he so erroneously imputed, that I so anxiously sought an interpretation of the law which would authorize a kindly and mild judgment, should an exigency occur in which I should be called on to pronounce it. And although I may have ever so full convictions in this case, either way, resulting from a careful following of the proof, from the fact that I cannot leave behind my intelligence when I ascend the bench, and the necessity of accepting here as elsewhere conclusions which are necessary and inevitable, it is simply unenlightened to impute this necessary consequence to prejudice or hostility, any more than the same conditions should be imputed because, in view of the same facts, you, gentlemen, in the end pronounce the defendant guilty. So far forth as the judge can concede, without transparent affectation, he should do so, but while the jury are informed fully that the facts are for them, I have but little fear of doing injustice by a frank, unprejudiced rehearsal of them as they are proved, whether they defeat or sustain the prosecution or the defence. This I shall always deem it my duty to do. Whether a mild administration of this law can arrest the wrong is uncertain. I may, by and by, quite change my opinions in this regard. That it must in some way be arrested, is most certain. Its injurious consequences will not only damage every department of business in which they are perpetrated, and cruelly disappoint the just expeciations of the upright and fair dealer, but by their effects in familiarizing with crime, work conseqences the most fatal in society. Every father who has a son must feel the danger of such influential and high-positioned tempters to crime. We may save, by good example and high teaching, our boys from the low haunts of vice and crime, but we are compelled to trust them to the leading and more important walks of business life. If they who control these stoop to the cowardly crimes of forgery and counterfeiting, and a degraded and discreditable public insists upon their decency and partial respectability, there is no safety anywhere for inexperience. The first lessons of dishonor and crime will be learned in the first teachings of the storehouse and the counting-room. Look over the vast ramifications of our revenue. See how it pervades all departments of trade, and reflect how innumerable are the occasions and how demoralizing must be the effects if leading, wealthy, influential citizens teach the whole body of their employees that perjury and fraud is justifiable, so long as its object is to avoid a public tax. And when I doubtfully suggest that this anomalous condition of public opinion may in the outset somewhat temper the severity of judgment, I must not be understood as insinuating that I do not most thoroughly believe that the commission of these crimes by prosperous men of wealth and position, with all the corrupting incidents which so generally attend them, are infinitely more injurious and pervading in their consequences than the comparatively trivial evil of a secret midnight burglary, committed by a few degraded, obscure, and uninfluential thieves. And as in this case I have, so in all others I probably shall, yield to an anxiety that there shall be no escape, if, in fact, a defendant has committed a crime which, in its example and influence for evil, is exceeded by no offence of which this or any other tribunal has cognizance.

The jury found defendant guilty on the first, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts.

CRIMINAL LAW—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—FINE AND IMPRISONMENT.

[1. The word "fine," as defined by Coke, Littleton, Blackstone, and Chitty, includes imprisonment, unless the money is paid.]

[2. By the practice at common law, if defendant were absent at the time of conviction, and the offence were finable only, the proper judgment was "quod capiatur"; but if he were present, and did not pay the fine, the judgment was that he stand committed to jail until the fine be paid.]

[3. In cases of statutory crimes punishable by fine or by fine and imprisonment, the federal courts have an inherent power, derived from the common law, to sentence the person convicted to confinement in jail until the fine is paid.]

[Cited in Fischer v. Hayes, 6 Fed. 73.]

[This was an application by John T. Robbins for a writ of habeas corpus.]

In June, 1870, the defendant was convicted of sundry violations of the internal revenue law, viz., the 71st section of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 156]; and sentenced to a year's imprisonment, and to pay a fine of $2,000 and costs, and stand committed until the fine and costs were paid. [Case No. 16,170.] After the expiration of the year's imprisonment, the defendant being still detained in the Hamilton county jail as the fine and costs were not paid, the writ of habeas corpus is sued out of the circuit court on the ground that that part of the sentence which ordered the prisoner to stand committed until the fine and costs were paid, was void in law, and consequently that the detention was illegal.

W. M. Bateman, U. S. Atty., and Henry Hooper, Asst. U. S. Atty.

Durbin Ward and Butterworth & Vogeler, for petitioner.

Before EMMONS, Circuit Judge, and SWING, District Judge.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge, gave an oral opinion, promising the bar at a future time to render a written and detailed decision. The following is a summary of the point decided: That the word "fine," as defined by Coke, Littleton, Blackstone, and Chitty, includes imprisonment unless the money be paid; for, as stated by the former, "to a fine imprisonment regularly appertaineth." That the practice at common law is as stated by Chitty; if the defendant be absent at the time of conviction, and the offense is finable only the proper judgment is "quod capiatur"; but if the defendant be present and does not pay the fine, that he stand committed to jail until the fine be paid. Ex parte Watkins, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 574, distinctly recognises and affirms this doctrine. Kane v. People, 8 Wend. 206; Reg. v. Dunn, 12 Adol. & E. 1241, 12 Wend. 344.

The counsel for defendant urge that although the common law authorized the imposition of imprisonment until the fine was paid, this does not, at least in the states, apply to statutory offences; and that so far as Ohio is concerned, the supreme court of the state, in 11 Ohio Reports, has decided that the common law mode of procedure does not exist here. We find no such distinction as that urged by the learned counsel for the petitioner, which would confine the power of commitment to common law offences. On the contrary, nine-tenths of all the instances of its exercise are those of convictions under statutes. There is a long and unquestioned exercise of this right, both in England and this country. The cases in the Ohio Reports cited above, so far from denying the common law power concede it expressly, and only say, that in Ohio when the offence is statutory, they hold that the sentence should be confined to the letter of the law, and that the common law power is impliedly taken away or revoked. Of course it is readily granted that there is no common law jurisdiction of crimes in this court; which is a very different question than looking to the common law for the mode of proceeding in criminal cases. The power to commit a person convicted of a statutory offence—where the statute imposes a fine—to jail until the fine be paid, is, we think, an inherent power in the court derived from the common law.

The petition is accordingly refused.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—CRIMES COMMITTED IN FOREIGN HARBORS—PIRACY—REVOLT—AUTHORITY OF MATE.

1. Where prisoners were indicted for an endeavor to make a revolt on board of the American packet ship Burgundy, lying at the port of Havre in France, in an enclosed dock into which the tide was let at the will of the owner: Held, that the circuit court of the United States had jurisdiction of the offence. Held, also, that the admiralty jurisdiction, under the act of congress passed March 3d, 1835, was co-extensive with the English admiralty courts in cases when robbery or offences were committed in creeks, harbors and ports in foreign countries, which robbery was done by American citizens, and amounted to piracy.

2. Under the act of 1825 [4 Stat. 115], passed by the American congress, the United States courts had jurisdiction over their own citizens in foreign countries for offences committed on tide waters.

3. The mates of a vessel in the absence of the master had the command of such ship or vessel, and they could direct the whole of the crew to go below from the deck of the vessel to their berths in the night time.

4. Where one of the crew came on deck apparently to see what the cause of a disturbance was that was then going on, when ordered peremptorily to go below and neglected to do so, he was guilty of disobedience of orders and might be punished under the act of congress for disobedience of orders and an endeavor to make a revolt.

Endeavor to make a revolt and mutiny.

A. Nash, for prisoners.

The District Attorney, for the United States.

BETTS, District Judge (sitting as circuit judge). The prisoners in this case were indicted under the act of congress passed March 3, 1835, § 2 [4 Stat. 775], for an endeavor to make a revolt and mutiny on board of the American packet ship Burgundy, on the high seas, where the tide ebbs and flows within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. The vessel was a packet ship sailing from New York to the port of Havre in France. Captain John Rockett was master. The prisoners on their arraignment pleaded not guilty and moved for separate trials, whereupon John Roberts and William Bilson were put upon their trials under one panel of the jury, and Samuel Nicholson was tried under a separate panel, but at the same term of the court. The cause against Roberts and Bilson came on for trial, and the mate of the vessel was first introduced as a witness. He testified that the vessel arrived at the port of Havre, and appeared at the quay, where the harbor master took charge of the vessel under the municipal authorities of Havre, and the vessel was then taken to her station inside of the flood gates. It appeared that the docks at Havre had been artificially constructed by the municipal authorities of the town. That the earth had been first excavated to the proper depth, and then walls had been put up on each side of the excavations, and flood gates erected so that on a flood tide the dock became full, while on an ebb tide, the flood gates prevented the water running out, and the vessels in this manner rode in the water without touching the bottom. The Burgundy lay at a station within the dock, and inside of the flood gates, and discharged her cargo on to the quay, where were stationed several persons night and day, known in France as gens d'armes, who were employed by the French government for police services. Having discharged her cargo, she took in another cargo for the homeward voyage, and having taken in the cargo the vessel was ready to pass out of the dock through the flood gates the next morning at the flood tide. In the afternoon, a box of gold coin, containing between 5 and 6000 dollars, was brought on board as a part of the cargo for the homeward voyage, and was stowed under the lock and key of the first mate, in a stateroom adjacent to where he slept, which appeared to be a cabin under deck. This cabin communicated with the deck of the vessel by a gangway, and a house stood over the gangway which was locked at nights. It did not appear that the crew generally knew that the specie had been brought on board; indeed there was no proof on the trial that any one of the crew belonging to the vessel was cognizant of the fact that specie had been brought on board of the vessel. The mate also testified that that night the captain of the Burgundy slept on shore, and that in the night, after he had retired to his cabin, with the specie locked up in an adjacent stateroom, he heard a noise at the door of the house at the head of the companion way. That some person was trying to burst in. He sprang out of his berth, ran up to the door, and the man outside was kicking in the panels. He unlocked the door, went out, and met at the door the two prisoners and another person who had formerly belonged to the ship, but had left the vessel at Havre. The night was pretty dark. He spoke to the prisoners and ordered them into the forecastle. They did not obey his orders, and upon this state of things he sang out for the 2d and 3d mates. It appeared by this time that most of the crew had rallied on deck. He ordered them all below. They appeared to be noisy and somewhat riotous. He then clenched the men and began with his fists to clear the deck. Being a stout man, one after another was knocked down, and a general melee took place. Finally, he himself, assisted by the 2d mate, succeeded in capturing three or more of the crew, placing them on the quarter deck and tying them. The mate and his comrade then told the crew that no man should come aft upon peril of life, and ordered the crew to go to the berths at the forecastle. They neglected and refused to do so, and he and the 2d mate then took hold of some scantling strips which they found and cleared the decks. The person who was kicking at the door ran on to the quay and escaped into the town, and never was again seen by the witness. This evidence of the mate was confirmed by the 2d mate, and indeed some of the crew who were examined, confirmed the account of breaking in the door, or attempting to do so, but stated that when they heard the noise they came on deck for the purpose of ascertaining what the difficulty was. It did not appear that all of the men were dressed who came on deck, though the prisoners were dressed if the mate testified correctly, when the attempt to break open the door was frustrated by his coming on deck amongst the assailants. Nothing distinct appeared that the two prisoners Roberts and Bilson had attempted or participated in any attempt to break open the door leading to the stateroom, where the specie was stowed. The cause was summed up to the jury, who rendered a verdict of guilty against the two prisoners Roberts and Bilson; and then the other prisoner, Samuel Nicholson, was put on trial under the indictment by another panel of jurors. The testimony in this cause was the same as in the preceding case, except Nicholson proved that he came on deck when he heard the noise at the house door. He was in his night clothes when he came on deck, without coat, vest, pantaloons or hat, and he proved that he went aft to interfere with the mates only to see what was doing, and to protect the men the mates were beating and tying on the quarter deck. The mate testified that the prisoner came aft contrary to his orders, and after he had repeatedly ordered the crew into their berths in the forecastle. The mate appeared to have acted throughout with a heroic courage, and proved himself to be physically competent, when assisted by the 2d mate, to control the whole of the crew of the vessel. The various points growing out of this trial were reserved by the prisoners' counsel with liberty to make a case and move in arrest of judgment. The counsel summed up respectively to the jury, and they retired and brought in a verdict of guilty against Nicholson, the prisoner.

The counsel for the prisoners made a case, and moved in arrest of judgment, and the 1st point was, that this court had no jurisdiction of the offence charged against the prisoners; that it was a case not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, and cited U. S. v. Wiltzburgher, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; U. S. v. McGill [Case No. 15,676], and urged that the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States depends exclusively on the constitution and laws of the United States and is territorial, and that this court had no jurisdiction over the present case, the offence having been committed within the enclosed dock at Havre, in the kingdom of France, while the vessel was fastened on shore to the quay. The learned counsel also cited Livingston v. Jefferson [Id. 8,411], in regard to the question of local jurisdiction, and again cited U. S. v. Hamilton [Id. 15,290], where the prisoner was indicted for a larceny committed on board of an American ship, in an enclosed dock at the port of Havre in France, into which dock the water was admitted at the will of the owners only. The court held in this case that the prisoner could not be convicted. He also stated that in the case of De Lovio v. Boit [Id. 3,776], the court had not claimed jurisdiction so extensive as that claimed in the present case, and stated that the rule appeared to be that offences against the sovereignty must be committed within its territorial jurisdiction, and likened the case to one where two persons go from England into France and fight there, and one kills the other, it is not murder in England by the common law (3 Just. p. 48); but in the present case, the court ought not to assume jurdisdiction, as all parties had voluntarily gone beyond the jurisdiction of the United States.

2d point. The counsel for the prisoner urged that Nicholson had been wrongfully convicted; that he was not an aider or abettor, or accessary in regard to any offence that the other prisoners had committed, nor had he been guilty of any offence under the laws of the United States; that the question of jurisdiction arose in his case equally with that of the other two prisoners, and likened the case to one where several persons were in company together, and engaged in one common purpose, lawful or unlawful, and one of them, without the knowledge or consent of the others, commit an offence, the others will not be involved in his guilt, unless the act done was in some manner in furtherance of the common intention. Rosc. Cr. Ev. p. 167. So where soldiers were employed to arrest a man, and unlawfully broke into a house where they supposed he was concealed, but it turned out otherwise, and then some of the soldiers went to stealing. It was held that the theft was a chance opportunity of stealing after the door was broken open, whereupon some of the soldiers committed a larceny, and others though present did not, and they were held not guilty as aiders and abettors. Id.

To the first point the district attorney joined issue on the question of jurisdiction, and contended that this was a case clearly within the jurisdiction of the United States courts in admiralty, and urged that the offence had clearly been brought within the act of congress of 1825 (section 5).

To the second point, he urged that the prisoner Nicholson had disobeyed the lawful orders of the mate, who was the commanding officer on board, and for such disobedience he ought to be punished, and having been found guilty by the verdict of the jury, he should be sentenced under the indictment.

BETTS, District Judge, at a subsequent day, delivered the opinion of the court, and stated that under the crimes act of 1790 [1 Stat. 112] maritime offences, triable and punishable by the courts of the United States, were mostly limited to those committed on the high seas, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state; that the act of 1825 enlarged the jurisdiction of the courts in this respect, so that offences committed on board vessels belonging to citizens of the United States while lying in any port or place within the jurisdiction of any foreign state or sovereign, by any person belonging to the company of such vessels, should be cognizable and punishable by the proper circuit court of the United States, in the same way and manner, and under the same circumstances, as if committed on board of such vessels on the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of such sovereign or state, provided that if the offender shall be tried for the offence, and acquitted or convicted thereof in any competent court of a foreign state, he shall not be subject to another trial in a court of the United States. The prisoners were indicted under the act of congress passed March 3, 1835 (section 2), which declares that if the offence charged against them in this case, and upon which they have been convicted, shall be committed on the high seas, or any other waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, that the prisoner shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,500, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both, according to the nature and aggravation of the offence; that the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, properly so speaking, extended to all places where the tide ebbs and flows. It has been determined in some of the ancient admiralty criminal decisions, that if persons, who were British subjects, and belonged to British vessels, committed acts of piracy in any bays, harbors, creeks and ports while out of the realm of England, they might be indicted in the English admiralty court, and punished for such offences. This law, laid down by the ancient English authorities, does not appear to have been overruled. A modern case, in effect, adopts and confirms it. "If the robbery be committed in creeks, harbors, ports, &c., in foreign countries, the court of admiralty indisputably has jurisdiction of it, and such offense is consequently piracy." Rex v. Gillott (Feb. 28, 1812; MS. case). The same acceptation of the meaning of "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" would naturally apply to the terms when used in the constitution or laws of the United States. Without the aid of English authority, there would seem to be no reasonable ground to doubt the rightful power and competency of the government of the United States to punish its own citizens for offences committed on board American vessels on tidewaters in any part of the world. Congress, in the act of 1825, intended to exercise that power in respect to the classes of offences there specified. The vessel, in the present case, lay in an enclosed dock in the port of Havre, where she rode at full tide. The tide ebbed and flowed there. This fact is found by the verdict. It was a part of the sea. It does not appear that the prisoners have been tried, convicted or acquitted of this offence in the French tribunals. They belonged to the American vessel, composed a part of its crew, and had been found guilty of the offence charged against them; and they are accordingly subject to punishment under the act of congress. To the second point, Nicholson might not have originally entered into the offence with the other prisoners, or been guilty of disobedience of orders; and it was left to the jury to determine whether he in any manner afterwards countenanced or participated in the riot on board and disobeyed the orders of the mates, given for the maintenance of order and subordination. The jury have found him guilty, and the court is not called upon by this case, if it has the power to review the verdict upon the facts.

The question reserved for the decision of the court is whether the act of congress applies to this offence, and if it does, whether congress had power to pass such act. Upon both these points the opinion of the court was that judgment must be rendered on the verdict against the prisoners. The indictment charges no robbery or attempt to commit one, and is limited to the riotous conduct and disobedience of orders of the prisoners, and their endeavor to make a revolt.

The court affirmed the verdict, and sentenced the prisoners each to pay a fine of $50. and be imprisoned one year.

UNITED STATES v. ROBERTSON.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1836.

LARCENY—FALSE PRETENCES.

It is not larceny in A to receive goods under a false pretence that the owner had sent him for them, although A appropriated them to his own use.

The defendant [John Robertson] went to B, who had sold a parcel of cigars to C, and pretended that C had sent for a box of them; upon which B delivered a box to the defendant, who sold it, and gave a false account of the manner in which he had obtained it.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that it was not larceny. See Chit. Cr. Law, 907; 2 Russ. Crimes, 118; and Rosc. Cr. Ev. 493.

EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF BRITISH TREATY—MURDER ON WAR VESSEL ON HIGH SEAS—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Great Britain, which provides for the reciprocal extradition of fugitives charged with the crimes of murder and forgery, is not in contravention of the constitution of the United States, as violating the right of trial by jury; and it applies to citizens of the United States who have committed those crimes within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, and have afterwards come hither, as well as to foreigners.]

In the absence of any provision in the laws or the treaty in respect to which department of the government shall execute the provisions relating to extradition, recurrence must be had to the general powers vested in the judiciary by law, and by the constitution, which, in the 3d article, declares by express words that the judicial power shall extend to treaties.]

The question before the court was grounded on a habeas corpus, to bring up Jonathan Robbins, who was commited to jail in February, 1799, on suspicion of having been concerned in a mutiny on board the British frigate Hermione, in 1791; which ended in the murder of the principal officers, and carrying the frigate into a Spanish port; and on a motion by counsel, on behalf of the consul of his Britannic majesty, that the prisoner should be delivered up (to be sent to Jamaica for trial), in virtue of the 27th article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, which article runs thus: "Art. 27. It is further agreed that his majesty and the United States, on mutual requisitions, by them respectively or by their respective ministers or officers authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons, who being charged with murder or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other: provided that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition and receive the fugitive." The commitment of the prisoner, and the consequent demand made of him by the consul of his Britannic majesty here, were grounded on the two following affidavits:

"South Carolina District: William Portlock, a native of Portsmouth, in the state of Virginia, upwards of eighteen years old, appeared before me, and being duly sworn and examined, saith that he went out before the mast in the schooner Tanner's Delight, which was commanded by Captain White, who arrived here about three weeks ago; that a person who answered to the name of Nathan Robbins, came also in the said vessel before the mast, with him; that he, the said Robbins, is a tall man, middle size, had long black hair, dark complexion, with a scar on one of his lips; that on or about last Christmas night he was present, and heard the said Robbins talking, in the harbour of the city of St. Domingo, to some French privateersmen who were on board the Tanner's Delight, when and where he informed them, in his hearing, that he, the said Robbins, was boatswain's mate of his Britannic majesty's frigate Hermione, when she was carried into the port of Cavillia, and added that they had no occasion to take any notice of that. And after the above time, sometimes when he was drunk, he, the said Robbins, would mention the name of the Hermione, and say, bad luck to her, and clench his fist.

"Sworn before me this 20th February, 1799, Thomas Hall, J. P. Q. U."

"United States of America, South Carolina District, ss.: Personally appeared before me Lieutenant John Forbes, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposeth, that a person confined in the jail of this district, who calls himself Nathan Robbins, but whose real name this deponent believes to be Thomas Nash, was a seaman on board the Hermione British frigate, in which this deponent was a midshipman from the 8th of February, 1797, until the 30th of August following, during which time the said Nash was personally known to this deponent; that this deponent was removed from the said frigate to the sloop-of-war Diligence, on the said 30th day of August, 1797; this deponent further deposeth, that on the 19th of September following, he was sent on board the said frigate, at which time he saw and left the said Nash in the same station on board that vessel, as he was at the time of this deponent's being a midshipman therein. That on the 22d day of the said month, the crew mutinied on board the said frigate, killed the principal officers, piratically possessed themselves of her, carried her into Laguyra, and there disposed of her to certain subjects of his Catholic majesty. That the said Thomas Nash was one of the principals in the commission of the said acts of murder and piracy, whose conduct in that transaction has become known to this deponent by depositions made and testimony given in courts martial where some of the said crew have been tried. John Forbes.

"Sworn before me this 18th April, 1799, Thomas Bee, District Judge, South Carolina."

The judge had received a letter some days before, from the secretary of state of the United States, mentioning, that application had been made by the British minister, Mr. Liston, to the president, for the delivery of the prisoner under the 27th article of the treaty, and containing these words—The president "advises and requests" you to deliver him up. This letter though not read in court, was shown to the counsel on both sides, and is hereunto appended.

The following certificate and affidavit were produced in behalf of the prisoner:

"United States of America, State of New York, ss.: By this public instrument, be it known to whom the same doth or may concern, that I, John Keese, a public notary, in and for the state of New York, by letters patent under the great seal of the state, duly commissioned and sworn; and in and by the said letters patent invested 'with full power and authority to attest deeds, wills, testaments, codicils, agreements, and other instruments in writing, and to administer any oath or oaths, to any person or persons,' do hereby certify that Jonathan Robbins, mariner, who hath subscribed these presents, personally appeared before me, and being by me duly sworn, according to law, deposed that he is a citizen of the United States of America, and a native of the state of Connecticut, five feet six inches high, and aged about twenty-three years. And I do further certify that the said Jonathan Robbins, being a citizen of the United States of America, and liable to be called in the service of his country, is to be respected accordingly, at all times by sea and land. Whereof an attestation being required, I have granted this under my notarial firm and seal.

"Done at the city of New York, in the said state of New York, the twentieth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

"Quod Attestor, John Keese,

"Notary public, and one of the justices for the city of New York.

"Jonathan Robbins, mariner, a prisoner now in custody of the marshal of the district court of the United States for South Carolina, being duly sworn, saith he is a native of the state of Connecticut, and born in Danbury in that state; that he has never changed his allegiance to his native country; and that about two years ago he was pressed from on board the brig Betsey of New York, commanded by Captain White, and bound for St. Nichola Mole, by the crew of the British frigate Hermione, commanded by Captain Wilkinson, and was detained there, contrary to his will, in the service of the British nation, until the said vessel was captured by those of her crew, who took her into a Spanish port by force: and that he gave no assistance in such capture.

"Jonathan Robbins.

"Sworn this 25th July, 1799, before me, Thomas Hall, federal clerk, and J. R. Q. U."

The signature made by the prisoner to this affidavit in court, appeared to be in the same hand-writing as the signature to the one made in 1795, from which circumstance it is presumable, that Jonathan Robbins is the prisoner's real name. The body of the affidavit made in New York, in 1795, was printed; the names, dates, signatures, &c., were filled up in writing; it had the notarial seal of John Keese, Esq. affixed; and had the appearance of being a genuine paper, deemed at that day by seamen to be a protection. It appears, however, by the result, that these affidavits, and the question, whether the prisoner was an American, and an impressed seaman, or not, were, in the opinion of the court, altogether immaterial; as the court would have felt itself bound to deliver up any respectable citizen of the United States, if claimed under the circumstances of the prisoner.

Mr. Ker, against the motion, expressed his regret that the short time he had given to the consideration of the prisoner's case, did not enable him to pay it that attention which its importance required: that whether it were considered as simply relating to the prisoner, or in a more extensive view as embracing great constitutional principles, in its relation to the citizens of America, in either case it must appear as a question of the highest magnitude, and requiring the most serious discussion. Shall a citizen of America be tried by his country, or be delivered up to a foreign tribunal? He hoped he should be able to show the court, that the prisoner's case was not within the 27th article of the British treaty; and if it were, that it was unconstitutional. The prisoner's certificate and affidavit, he contended, were proof of his having been impressed into the service of his Britannic majesty. By the late president's proclamation of neutrality, the citizens of the United States were prohibited from entering into the service of any of the belligerent powers: that the court could not presume, without the colour of evidence, that the prisoner had violated the laws of his country, unsupported as such a presumption would be by any legal charge of that nature against him. Hence it follows, that the prisoner must have been taken forcibly into the service of his Britannic majesty, in the face of his protection, and in contempt of our neutrality. Let those who make the requisition, that he be delivered up, show by the ship's articles, or by any other legal testimony, that he entered voluntarily into their service, and submitted himself to their discipline. If they cannot, the presumption is strong in favour of the prisoner. Taking the point then as ceded, that he was impressed, he was warranted by the most sacred rights of nature, and the laws of nations, to have recourse to violence in the recovery of that liberty, of which he had been unjustly and unlawfully deprived. These were facts proper to be submitted to a jury of this country; they would well know how to appreciate a defence of this nature, if it were necessary to make it. The court know, that in England a man would be excusable for murder in resisting a press-gang; but here, the prisoner being an American, his rights ought to have been peculiarly respected by a foreign nation, and resistance on his part was not merely the exercise of the rights of an individual, but it was a duty he owed to his country. The principle contended for was supported by the best authorities. It is laid down in Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 3, c. 8, § 139: "An enemy attacking me unjustly, gives me an undoubted right of repelling his violence, and he who opposes me in arms, when I demand only my right, becomes himself the aggressor, by his unjust resistance: he is the first author of the violence, and obliges me to make use of force for securing myself against the wrongs intended me, either in my person or possessions. For if the effects of this force proceed so far as to take away his life, he owes the misfortune to himself; for if by sparing him I should submit to the injury, the good would soon become the prey of the wicked."

The constitution of the United States of America has expressly secured to every citizen thereof the trial by jury, and if the treaty went to deprive him of it, it would be invalid; it is inferior and subordinate to the constitution, and when it unhappily stands in hostility against it, or where there is a collision, it must, of necessity, yield. Treaties, however sacred, with whatever good faith they ought to be preserved, however high their authority, are not to receive a construction hostile to the sound principles of the constitution, and derogatory to the rights of the citizen. It is a general maxim in the construction of treaties, that every interpretation which leads to an absurdity ought to be rejected. Vattel (book 2, c. 17, § 282) says, "that we should not give to any peace a sense from which follows anything absurd, but interpret it in such a manner as to avoid absurdity." Can it be supposed that it was the intention of the contracting parties to deprive the citizens of America of the trial by jury, on which are bottomed the best principles of American freedom? Certainly not; it is an unfair and inadmissible inference. Hence it follows, that a citizen ought not to be delivered up to a foreign tribunal for any offence, which is within the jurisdiction and cognizance of his country. The atrocity of the crime with which the prisoner is charged, has nothing to do with the principle contended for; the requisition could be made with equal propriety, were it of a trivial nature. Piracy and murder is an high offence against all nations, and all nations have an interest in bringing offenders to justice, and all are equally competent to try them. A requisition is made under the 27th article of the treaty, to deliver up a citizen of the United States, on a vague allegation contained in two affidavits, which afford a mere suspicion of the prisoner having been on board the Hermione frigate at the time of the mutiny. If a citizen can be delivered up on ground so slight, in the present general political conflict among mankind, when the violence of party spirit knows no bounds; when vindictive passions are substituted in lieu of reason, justice and humanity; no man, however prominent and respectable among his fellow-citizens, can be secure against the operation of this law. The prisoner is an obscure character, and, although in the bosom of his native country, from the nature of his profession, being constantly removing from one place to another, is as destitute of friends as if he were on the opposite side of the globe.

Mr. Ker next adverted to the words of the 27th article of the treaty, under which the requisition is made. He contended, that the words "murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either," manifestly implied the exclusive jurisdiction of the one or the other power, and not the jurisdiction of the high seas, where the United States have a concurrent one in common with all nations; that the laws of nations provide against offences committed on the high seas, and therefore a particular stipulation was unnecessary; that the apparent object of the article was to bring offenders to justice, and therefore provided against the crimes of murder and forgery being committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of either; but that the law did not apply in the present case, as the United States possessed competent power to try the offender, and bring him to justice; that if the offence had been committed within the kingdom of Great Britain, under the municipal laws of that country, the article affords a remedy, as our laws could not reach the offence; and further, that a construction should not be given to the treaty which abridged the jurisdiction of the United States, and that we ought not to presume that the government of the United States had abandoned any of its judicial rights to any nation, and that neither the letter nor spirit of the article warranted the conclusion.

Col. Moultrie, also for the prisoner, arose. After premising the importance of this case, and stating it as one in which the dearest interests of the Union were involved, he advanced the following grounds for consideration:

(1) On the constitutional ground: That the constitution of the United States contained the constituent principles of our social union as a nation: that it is the compact by which our government was formed, and under which alone it exists; and that from this compact, all civil power and authority, and every constituted branch of our society, as a nation, was derived, and is exercised: that mankind, in quitting a state of nature for that of society, gave up part of their natural rights, which they all possessed in common, to promote the good of the whole, and to secure the remainder which were not surrendered; that the natural rights so given up, were either totally relinquished, or were modified only under restrictions, and became political rights; and those not given up, formed a sacred residuum in the hands of the people, and which are unalienable by any act of legislation: that this was no visionary theory of ancient writers, but is the true and modern ground of all social union: and it is fully recognized in our free constitution; for by article 12th, of the amendments to our constitution, it is declared, "that all powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people." And the 11th section declares, "the enumeration in the constitution of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

(2) On treaties: Treaties and laws made by legislatures, he said, were only acts of the constituted agents and subordinate ministers of the constitution: that they were of derivative authority only, and derived from the primitive authority of the constitution, and therefore must be subordinate to, and could not counteract or control it: and that the treaty making power was derived only from the constitution, is evident from the 2d section of the 3d article, which creates and gives it. He next pointed out the absurdity of the treaty-making power being allowed to counteract or control the constitution; as by that means, by a treaty, our constitution, the very foundation of our government and guardian of our liberty, might be overset and destroyed, and every sacred right of the people secured thereby laid prostrate; and this too at any time, and by combination with a foreign power: that no institution or sacred compact of the people for the preservation of their happiness could be formed, but what thus, by the creatures of the constitution and of the people's power, might be overset; that thus, though the government and nation might be called independent, the people might be slaves, and be in fact without any protection to their liberties. Third. That what the nature or denomination of the offences specified in the treaty were, was totally immaterial; for if the treaty-maker could insert one offence, he may insert as many more as he pleases: but the principle was, whether he had a right, for any offence, to oblige a citizen to be given up as a victim to any foreign power; a citizen, whose very liberty consisted in its being guarded by the sacred trial by jury. Fourth. That the 6th article of the constitution itself, shows that no law or treaty can be the law of the land, that is contrary to the constitution; inasmuch as it says, expressly, that laws only "made in pursuance thereof," and "all treaties made under the authority of the United States," are the law of the land. The question then was put by Mr. M., what was the "authority of the United States?" whence was it derived, and the United States itself created, but only by and from the constitution itself? That the constitution, and laws and treaties of the United States, being the supreme code of the law of the land, was evidently intended by the 6th article (as expressed) to be only as supreme to the local constitutions and laws of each state: but such laws and treaties stand on an equal footing; and both must be made in pursuance of, and under the authority of the constitution. That two supremes are of equal authority, and both must be equal: that two equal opposite forces, or powers, acting in opposition, destroy each other; and if not equal, one or the other must be superior, (either the constitution or treaty;) and that all laws and treaties can only be legal when made in pursuance of, in subordination to, and under the authority of the constitution; but that this treaty was opposite and repugnant to the constitution. Fifth. That in the 7th and 8th articles of the amendments to the constitution, the citizens are secured in all cases the trial by jury, except for naval and military offences by sea and land, in time of actual war, "flagrante bello," (during the rage of war;) and that no treaty could contravene these articles of the constitution: that the trial by jury is a sacred and unalienable right; as all the powers given by the constitution for the privation of the cardinal natural rights of life and liberty, are only a conditional cession of those rights to the care of society, under the advantage of a trial by jury of fellow-citizens, as the mutual safeguard and security of such rights so deposited; and that the exception of courts of militia, and in the navy, during the rage of war, is an exception by the constitution itself, on the necessity of the case, for the people's safety; and that such exception proves its full extent and operation. Sixth. That even if the treaty was legal, the present offence which the prisoner is in custody for, is not within the meaning and construction of the treaty: for the 27th article of the treaty relates to murder and forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either Great Britain or the United States: that is, within the peculiar exclusive jurisdiction of either, where the offence is committed, and to which the jurisdiction of the one or the other, to which the party flies for refuge, or as an asylum, could not extend; that it relates, therefore, only to the respective territories of the contracting powers: but that the offence now before the court was done supra altum mare, (upon the high seas,) where all nations have equal jurisdiction, and no defect of justice could arise from a want of jurisdiction here to extend to the offence: that it was against the law of nations, which style a pirate hostis humani generis, (the enemy of mankind,) and over whom all nations claim a criminal jurisdiction equally, and over whom the United States have a concurrent jurisdiction. Vattel says, on the construction of treaties, that nothing shall be so construed as to make the treaty an absurdity; and it never can be supposed the learned civilians and casuists, who framed this treaty, would have been so absurd as to make our nation of the United States give up her dignity, independence and concurrent maritime jurisdiction, which she holds equally in the great society of nations, with the rest of the world, or that they were ignorant of her holding such jurisdiction; or that Great Britain and the United States, by their own compact, could hold such jurisdiction exclusively; that the ocean is nature's great common, where all nations hold a common interest and authority, as tenants in common. Seventh. That the prisoner is a native citizen of America, and was arbitrarily pressed, contrary to his will, into the British service; and an attestation of his birth in Connecticut, under the seal of the city of New York, and the prisoner's own affidavit of his birth, and of his being pressed, were produced. On this it was remarked by Mr. M. that the notarial attestation appeared on its own face to be genuine, and of an age equal with its date; that by reference to New York its authenticity can be fixed, and by reference to the custom house there, the clearance and list of the crew of the vessel, and name of the prisoner, might be found, as stated in his affidavit; that all this would show his defence is not a false one; and that the signature, Jonathan Robbins, now made in open court to his affidavit, and the one made to the paper signed several years since, before the magistrate in New York, are the exact and indubitable signatures of one and the same hand. Also, that no man was to be presumed guilty of any transgression of the laws of his country, until he was legally charged and convicted thereof; that the laws and proclamations made to preserve our neutrality, and a late one to prevent our citizens going into foreign service, were very severe; that the insolent and daring conduct of Britain, in pressing our seamen and citizens, was an attack on the sovereignty of our nation, and notorious; and the presumption from these laws, and such conduct, was, that the prisoner was pressed contrary to his will, and the onus probandi (burden of proof) to the contrary, lay therefore with the prosecution; that if he was so pressed, it was meritorious, by the laws of God and man, to regain his liberty even by the death of his oppressors, and to avenge the insulted dignity of a free people; that hence the right of killing in war is founded (Vat. Law Nat. lib. 3, c. 8, § 139), and, that the prisoner, instead of being punished, "deserved well of his country." "Quid enim, potior libertate? Quid pejor quam servitute?" And here, Mr. M. added that he knew this motto was imprinted on the hearts of his countrymen; that their liberties, birthrights, and their country's honour and dignity were most sacred to them; that they would only part with them but with their lives; that ignominy and slavery were to them death; and, that they would ever hold an American unworthy the name of such, who would not sacrifice any one who, under the impious authority of any nation, would dare attempt to enslave him and rob him of his national privileges. Eighth. Mr. M. commented on the laws passed by Great Britain in the beginning of her war with us, for carrying American subjects over to England to be tried, and as one of the oppressive evils we fought against, and drew a striking analogy. Further, he observed, that the office of president was an executive and ministerial office, and had no right to control this court, as appeared by the secretary's letter in this case, advising the prisoner to be given up; that constitution and laws only, formed the true sovereignty of the nation, and the judicial was the proper guardian of it; and that the executive in fact, is but subordinate to the judicial, as he is bound to enforce its decrees. Ninth. That sending a citizen from the bosom of his country and friends, and for immolation, like a lamb to the altar, to gratify the ambition or policy of any foreign power or king, was a capital punishment—what could be greater? And, Mr. M. then asked, by what law of this land such a punishment, or any other, could be inflicted here, in time of peace, without a jury or a trial? a punishment by which a citizen was to be tried, instead of by a jury, by a court martial.

(3) Of the jurisdiction: A great number and variety of other striking and forcible remarks were made; but amongst the last, he further submitted, that by the law of the federal judiciary, the district court, before whom this was brought, had no jurisdiction for crimes on the high seas, when the punishment exceeded thirty stripes, six months' imprisonment, or one hundred dollars fine; that in this case, this court, like an inferior court or magistrate, was only competent to commit and retain in custody for trial, by the circuit court, and had no jurisdiction as to the merits; that the circuit court only had the jurisdiction, and that this court undertaking after commitment, to liberate or give up the prisoner, was to intrude on and usurp the jus dicere of the superior court; at least to determine and decide on it, and, if it had any jurisdiction, to abolish it and oust it of it; that in doing so, it would be precipitate and illegal. A further remark was also made by Mr. Moultrie, on the affidavits brought against the prisoner, showing that even in a common case, they were not sufficient to exclude a prisoner from bail; and much less sufficient were they, where a man was to be punished by exile, by so capital a punishment, in the first instance without any trial; that they were vague, uncertain, and ascertained no specific charge against the prisoner; and, in short, amounted to nothing more than mere suspicion, and even that but weakly supported; and that, under such circumstances, no man's life or liberty can be safe under this construction of the treaty. That as to removing a person from one state to another, to be tried where he commits an offence, all this is but like moving from one county to another; for the culprit is still within the jurisdiction and protection of his country: but far different it is to remove him to a distant nation, out of the protection of his country, there to meet a summary trial by a court martial, and in the end, perhaps, be hung from motives of policy, more than from the principles of justice.

Mr. Ward, counsel for the British claim, was alone on that side. The counsel for the prisoner, he said, had addressed the passions of the auditory, which was quite unnecessary in this place, where the citizens were always remarkable for humanity and tenderness to the accused. It was not necessary, at this time of day, to discuss the question of constitutionality—that had been long since settled, in the ratification of the treaty by the proper authorities. It should be remembered, he said, that the cessions contained in the 27th article, now objected to, were mutual to the two nations; if the treaty cedes a portion of the rights of American citizens to the British government, the same treaty cedes an equal portion of the rights of British subjects to the American government. In answer to the argument, that a citizen could not legally suffer under an article of a treaty which contained the rights secured to him by the constitution, Mr. Ward contended, that a treaty made by the powers pointed out for the purpose in the constitution, is co-ordinate with the constitution itself, and even paramount to it; and that the court could not make it a question, whether the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, counteracted the constitution or not; the only question for the court to settle was, is the demand made for delivering up the prisoner conformable to the treaty? He had not a doubt but it was. To prove that the crime charged against the prisoner was committed within the jurisdiction of the British government, he stated, that every action done in a vessel on the high seas comes under the jurisdiction of the nation to which the vessel belongs. In support of this, he instanced the case of a child that should be born in a British vessel on a foreign coast; this child, he said, would be considered as a British subject.

Mr. Ward made a number of other pertinent observations, and quoted several passages of the law of nations, in support of his arguments. He again insisted that treaties are co-ordinate with, and paramount to the laws and constitution, and that the court had only to consider, whether the prisoner is, or is not, comprehended in the meaning of the 27th article of the treaty. In answer to the arguments of the prisoner's counsel, that he should not only not be given up, but be released from prison on his own bail, Mr. Ward remarked, that it would be inconsistent for the court to release a man without trial, after having sanctioned the charge on which he was confined, by suffering him to remain in prison a long time under their authority; and that if the prisoner was really the American he pretended to be, he would have been able, before this time, to have made it appear more clearly.

BEE, District Judge. The question on which I am now to give a decision, is grounded on a habeas corpus to bring the prisoner before me; and on motion by counsel on behalf of the consul of his Britannic majesty, the officer authorized by treaty to make the requisition, that the prisoner, charged with murder committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, shall be delivered up to justice, in virtue of the 27th article of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Great Britain, signed the 19th of November, 1794.

Objections have been made by counsel on behalf of the prisoner to this motion, on a variety of grounds; and this case has been very fully argued on both sides. Two papers have been produced on behalf of the prisoner: one. a certificate from a notary public at New York, dated 20th of May, 1795, that Jonathan Robbins, a mariner, had that day deposed on oath before him, that he, the said Jonathan Robbins, was a citizen of the United States, and a native of Connecticut; the other is an affidavit of the prisoner, made in open court, that he is a native of Connecticut: and that about two years ago he was pressed from the brig Betsy of New York, on board the British frigate Hermione, and was detained there against his will, until the vessel was captured by the crew, and carried into a Spanish port, and that he gave no assistance. The motion before me has been opposed on a variety of grounds. It is contended, that it is a question of magnitude whether a citizen of the United States shall be tried by a jury of his own country, or in a foreign one: that the 27th article of the treaty, on which this motion is founded, is contrary to the constitution of the United States, and is therefore void; that the treaty can only relate to foreigners: that the fact in this case being committed on the high seas, the courts of the United States have competent jurisdiction: that a grand jury ought to make inquest, before a party shall be sent away for trial. It was also contended that this would strike at the root of the liberties of the people: that the constitution secured the right of trial by jury to the citizens; and that treaties and laws altering that, were of subordinate authority; and of course void: that the treaty making power may be abused; and it could never give authority to seize a person and send him away for trial. It was also contended, that this is not an offence within the contemplation of the treaty: the word "jurisdiction," means "territorial jurisdiction"; and that the act must be confined to offences committed within the territory of either; that the sending a person in confinement to be tried in a foreign country, is a punishment not to be inflicted on a citizen: that the treaty is a head without a body, legs or arms: that the affidavits do not come up to the point, and are not sufficient to prevent the party being entitled to bail.

These were the points on which the objections to this motion were argued. In the course of the arguments, warm and pathetic appeals to the passions were made on some of the old grounds of opposition to the treaty, which I endeavoured to check, because, as this treaty has been ratified agreeably to the express provisions of the constitution, and is therein declared to be the supreme law of the land, and I am religiously and solemnly bound by the oath I have taken to administer justice according to the constitution and laws, it is not in my power, nor is it my inclination, ever to deviate therefrom. If we attend to the constitution, and the amendments which are now part of it, we shall find, that all the provisions there made respecting criminal prosecutions, and trials for crimes by a jury, are expressly limited to crimes committed within a state or district of the United States. Indeed, reason and common sense point out that it should be so: for, what control can the laws of one nation have over offences committed in the territories of another? It must be remembered, also, that in the 27th article of the amendments, where it is provided that no person shall be held to answer for a capital offence, unless on a presentment by a grand jury, an exception is made to cases arising in the land or sea service, or even in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger. This shows unequivocally, that trials by jury may be dispensed with, even for crimes committed within the United States; and those observations are at once an answer to all the arguments founded on the right to trials by jury, they being expressly limited to crimes committed within the United States, and even then with some exceptions.

The objections made to the treaty's being contrary to the constitution, have been so often and so fully argued and refuted, that I was in hopes no time would have been occupied on that subject, more especially as that treaty has been recognized by the legislature of the United States and is now in full operation. It is remarkable, that in the midst of all the warmth against the treaty, at its first publication, the 27th article was one of the few that was never excepted to; and I believe this is the first instance in which it had been held up as dangerous to liberty. The crime of murder is justly reprobated in all countries; and in commercial ones the crime of forgery is so dangerous to trade and commerce, that provision has been made in various treaties for delivering up fugitives from justice for these offences; and many instances may be produced of criminals sent back to be tried where the fact was perpetrated. What says the 27th article of the treaty now under consideration? In the first place it is founded on reciprocity: in the next, it is general to all persons, who, being charged with murder or forgery, whether citizens, subjects, or foreigners. It is for the furtherance of justice, because the culprits would otherwise escape punishment; no prosecution would lie against them in a foreign country; and if it did, it would be difficult to procure evidence to convict or acquit. This clause is founded on the same principle with that part of the constitution which declares, that the trial for a crime shall be held in the state where it shall be committed; and the act of congress to prevent fugitives from justice escaping punishment, declares, that they shall be delivered up when demanded, to be tried where they committed the offence, either on a bill found, or an affidavit charging them with the offence. The principle, then, being the same, and the one being expressly founded on the constitution and laws of the United States, no solid objection can lie against this clause of the treaty. Nor does it make any difference, whether the offence is committed by a citizen, or another person. This will obviate the objection made by the counsel on that head. And I cannot but take this occasion to observe, that the two papers produced by the prisoner, are only affidavits of his own, or a certificate founded on an affidavit, which are not evidence; and if they were, prove little or nothing. It is somewhat remarkable, that a man of the name of Jonathan Robbins, with the paper produced in his possession, should continue on board a British frigate for a length of time, under another name, and acting as a warrant officer, which impressed men are not likely to be entrusted with, and that he should afterwards take the name of Nathan Robbins, and lay in jail here five or six months, without the circumstance being made known until now.

All the arguments against delivering up the prisoner seem to imply that he was to be punished without a trial; the contrary of which is the fact: we know that no man can be punished by the laws of Great Britain without a trial. If he is innocent, he will be acquitted; if otherwise, he must suffer. This would be the case here, under similar circumstances.

The objection most relied on against this motion, is to the word jurisdiction, in the 27th article of the treaty, and that the crime being committed on the high seas, the courts of the United States have a concurrent jurisdiction. There is no doubt that the circuit courts of the United States have a concurrent jurisdiction. and this arises under the general law of nations; and if the 27th clause of the treaty in question had not expressly declared the right to demand, and the obligation to deliver over, the prisoner must have been tried here. With respect to the meaning of the word "jurisdiction," I think the case quoted from Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 1, c. 19, § 216, is conclusive, and this is corroborated by Ruth. Inst. bk. 2, c. 9, as to the jurisdiction over the men on board the vessels; and the clause itself seems to have contemplated this, because the word "jurisdiction" is used distinctly from countries in the next line; and this shows, that territorial jurisdiction, as contended for, cannot apply to the present case.

When application was first made, I thought this a matter for the executive interference, because the act of congress respecting fugitives from justice, from one state to another, refers it altogether to the executive of the states; but as the law and the treaty are silent upon the subject, recurrence must be had to the general powers vested in the judiciary by law and the constitution, the 3d article of which declares the judicial power shall extend to treaties, by express words. The judiciary have in two instances in this state, where no provisions were expressly stipulated, granted injunctions to suspend the sale of prizes under existing treaties. If it were otherwise, there would be a failure of justice.

I have carefully reviewed the arguments advanced by the counsel for the prisoner. I have looked into the constitution, the treaty, the laws, and the cases quoted: and upon a full investigation of them all, I am of opinion, that from the affidavits filed with the clerk of the court, there is sufficient evidence of criminality to justify the apprehension and commitment of the prisoner for trial, for murder committed on board a ship of war belonging to his Britannic majesty, on the high seas: that requisition having been made by the British consul, the officer authorized to make the same, in virtue of the 27th article of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Great Britain, I am bound by the express words of that clause of the treaty, to deliver him up to justice. And I do therefore order and command the marshal, in whose custody the prisoner now is, to deliver the body of the said Nathan Robbins, alias Thomas Nash, to the British consul, or such person or persons as he shall appoint to receive him.

The judgment being pronounced, the court was immediately adjourned; the irons were replaced on the prisoner, and he was delivered over by the constables, to a detachment of federal troops, who had before been placed under arms opposite the court house, and had continued there during the sitting of the court. The troops immediately delivered up the prisoner to Lieut. Jump, of his Britannic majesty's sloop Sprightly, then lying in this harbour, and which sailed with the prisoner on Saturday morning for Jamaica.

NOTE. Judge Bee's decision, together with the action of the president that led to it, added a fresh stimulus to the then already too feverish state of public sentiment. The Examiner, the organ of the Virginia Republicans, began by a series of attacks, said to emanate from Mr. Madison, but which unfortunately are not preserved. This was answered in the Virginia Federalist by Mr. Marshall, as follows:

"I observe in a late paper of the Examiner, several strictures on the case of Robbins, who was delivered to the British consul at Charleston, under the 27th article of the treaty of amity and commerce between Great Britain and America, censuring the measure in general, but reprobating the conduct of the president in a particular manner. These strictures, calculated to exasperate the public mind, would probably lose their effect upon a fair explanation of the nature of the business, and therefore I have thought it worth while, for the sake of removing unjust impressions, and satisfying the minds of those who really wish for information relative to the necessary mode of proceeding in cases of that kind, to endeavour to make a just representation of the matter, as far as I am able to understand the case from the mutilated publications which we have seen of it. As to the opinion of the learned judge upon the case, I shall not enter into any arguments in support of it, because they would be useless and unnecessary, as the reasoning contained in his own excellent speech upon the subject is perfectly correct, and must be convincing to every unprejudiced mind. I shall therefore confine myself to that part of the case which respects the president's letter only; which I am induced to do, not because I think it needs any justification with candid men, who know the nature of such proceedings, but because I wish to prevent the effects which are intended to be produced from it upon the minds of those who do not possess the kind of information necessary to enable them to judge impartially on the subject. The case, from the publication which I have seen, I suppose to be this. The British government, having discovered that Robbins was in Charleston, applied to the judge for a warrant to secure him until application could be made to government for him. The warrant was granted, and an application, with the evidences of the charge, were laid before the president, who, being satisfied that it was a case within the treaty, directed the judge, as he was arrested under his warrant, to deliver him up, and the single question is, whether this proceeding in the present case was regular. By the treaty of amity made when the two nations neither did nor could contemplate this, or the case of any other individual, it is mutually stipulated that fugitives from justice who have been guilty of murder or forgery in one of the nations, and have taken shelter in the territories of the other, shall be delivered up to the injured government. Those stipulations are reciprocal, and America, whenever a case shall happen, will have the same right to demand a fugitive of Great Britain that the latter had to demand Robbins of the United States. Nor can either nation refuse, for the words are positive. They are: 'It is further agreed, that his majesty and the United States, on mutual requisitions by their respective ministers or officers authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged of murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other, provided that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or persons charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition and receive the fugitive.' These words contain an absolute engagement to deliver such characters up, and neither nation can refuse or neglect it without a violation of the treaty. It is, therefore, a certain fact, that Great Britain, by the express words of the treaty, had a right to demand Robbins in the present case, who was accused of murder, one of the enumerated offences for which fugitives were to be delivered up. There must, therefore, have been some mode of carrying the provision of the treaty in this respect into execution, or else the articles would be nugatory; and it would be absurd to suppose the parties meant to stipulate for a thing which could not be performed. The question then is, what mode should be pursued when a requisition of this kind is made, and what proceedings should take place in order to comply with it. The treaty has not pointed out any mode, and therefore we must recur to principles and the nature of things in order to discover it. As nations do not communicate with each other but through the channel of their government, the natural, the obvious, and the proper mode, is an application on the part of the government (requiring the fugitive) to the executive of the nation to which he has fled, to secure and cause him to be delivered up. (1) Because the government being the only channel of communication between the nations, the British government, in cases of this kind, has nothing to do with the detail and internal regulations of ours, nor we with theirs. For as the governments have respectively undertaken to do the thing which is required, the injured nation is not concerned any further with the business than merely to exhibit the proofs and call on the other for the performance of the treaty; and the nation called on must attend to the details and internal regulations themselves. (2) Because the government to which the fugitive has fled ought to be informed why an inhabitant is forced away from its territories; and therefore a removal of any person therefrom, without an application to the chief magistrate, would not only be dangerous to the personal safety of individuals, but would be an indignity and an affront which ought not to be offered. (3) Because, without such an application, the injured nation could not complain of an infraction of the treaty on the part of the other government in not delivering up the fugitive. For it would be an irresistible argument to such a complaint, that no application was ever made to the government itself. Nor would it strengthen the complaint, that an application was made to some inferior authority; because an application to subordinate officers who do not represent the general national concerns, would not only be improper on account of the inconvenient practices it might introduce (for by that means a man might be carried off without government having an opportunity of protecting him), but, in case the requisition were not complied with, could not be a just ground of reproach to the government itself, which was never informed of the application. (4) Because, it is manifest from what has been said, as well as from the very nature of things, that government must have a right to decide whether a fugitive should be delivered up or not. For it is a mere question of state, and all questions relative to the affairs of the nation emphatically belong to the government to decide upon. Therefore, in case of a requisition for a fugitive by the United States from Great Britain, the application would be to the executive, and not to the judiciary, or any other inferior department of the government. It follows, therefore, that an application to the government itself is essential; and accordingly, in the case under consideration, such an application was actually made. But surely the business was not to rest there. Some further steps were necessary, or else the application would have been to no purpose.

"The government, as we have already seen, was bound by engagement to cause delivery to be made; and therefore the president was under the necessity of taking some order in the business which might produce the object of the application. For, having been informed that the man was under confinement, upon the charge on which the application was made, until the determination of government upon the subject could be known, he was bound to give some directions in the business, so that the prisoner might either be liberated or delivered up, and those directions could only be given in writing. If the president had said to the British ambassador: 'You must apply to the judge under whose warrant he was arrested, and he will deliver the prisoner to you,' the obvious answer would have been, 'Sir, I cannot do so without your warrant. If I apply to your judge, I shall certainly be told again as I was told before, that he cannot interfere in a business of state without the knowledge of government; and it will be in vain for me to tell him that I have your instructions upon the subject, unless I am able to produce some evidence of them.' It follows, therefore, that the president was bound to give some written instructions upon the subject; because no other would, or ought to have been credited by the judge.

"The only question then is, whether the letter of the secretary of state contained the proper instructions or not? If I am right in my position that the application, in all such cases, should be made to the executive, and that the executive has a right to decide whether the requisition should be complied with or not; it follows necessarily, that when information was given to the judge that application had been made, it ought to have been accompanied with some expression of the will of government upon the subject. For it would have been ridiculous in the president to have ordered a letter to be written to the judge, informing him that such an application had been made, without informing him also what government had resolved to do in the business; because that would have left the judge exactly where he was; and he would have been at liberty to have considered it as a mere private letter from one gentleman to another, and not as an official document, on which he was bound to act. So that, if under that impression he had resolved to have taken no steps in the business, he not only would have stood excused himself, but the British government would have had just cause to complain that our conduct was illusory, and that the stipulations of that treaty were evaded. But, if it be admitted that any declaration of the president was necessary upon the subject, more eligible terms than those used by the secretary of state, even according to the garbled publication which we have of them, could not have been chosen. For they are the usual phrases all over the United States, from the governor down to the county court magistrate. There is not a mandate of any kind in use amongst us, which does not contain the word 'require'; and it will surely be admitted that the word 'advise' is at least as harmless as the words 'command' and 'at your peril,' which are to be found in the warrant of every superior to his inferior officer throughout the United States. Let me now, then, ask any candid man, if the inference drawn by the Examiner from this letter, namely, that the president had endeavoured to influence the opinion of a judge, in a matter depending before him, be a correct one? On the contrary, it is manifest from what has been said, that the matter never was, nor could be regularly before the judge, until he had received this letter, which was the ground and foundation on which he was to proceed. Until then he had no authority to act definitely upon the question; and so the judge evidently appears to have considered it himself. For it was handed to the counsel on both sides, plainly as the authority on which he proceeded. Otherwise, he would not have shown it at all, or else he would have done it in a very different manner. It was, therefore, a mere official paper, and not a letter which was intended to be intruded upon the judge, in order to influence his determination in a matter depending before him. It was itself the very process, if I may use the expression, which brought the case before the judge.

"Perhaps it will be said that the judge himself has denied the authority of the executive; and there is a passage in his speech which looks that way. But this is a part of the opinion of the judge which seems liable to be questioned; and I strongly suspect it is not truly stated in the public prints, or else it comes to this, that the judge was of opinion that everything relative to treaties was to be transacted by the judges and not by the executive; a position which he certainly did not mean to maintain, and, therefore, the passage alluded to ought to be understood with some qualification.

"Perhaps the following solution may reconcile his opinion with the doctrine I have been contending for: The judge probably meant to say, that he once thought it a question which exclusively belonged to the executive, and therefore, that he, as a judge, could not in any manner be required to aid in the execution of the treaty. But finding, by recurrence to the constitution, that the judicial power extended to treaties, he was then satisfied that the judges might be called on, where circumstances rendered it proper, to take the necessary steps, in order to have the treaty carried into effect, as by issuing a warrant to secure the fugitive, until the determination of government could be known, and after that was promulgated, giving the necessary orders for carrying the determination into effect. With this qualification, the opinion of the judge was correct, and I therefore incline to think that he ought to be so understood in the passage under consideration. Upon the whole, the president appears to have done no more than his duty. For suppose it had been said that the British government had applied to the president for a fugitive from justice under the treaty, and that the latter, instead of ordering him to be delivered up, had refused or neglected to do it, without assigning any reason for it. How could the president have justified his conduct in that case? And might it not then have been said with propriety, that he had neglected his duty and omitted to execute one of the supreme laws of the land, which he was bound to observe and have carried into effect? In short, if some men would use but half the industry in examining into the real motives of the president's conduct upon any occasion, that they do in finding out reasons to reproach him, they would soon be convinced that, in no instance of his administration, has he either encroached upon the duty of others, or omitted to perform his own." 1 Hall. Jour. Jur. 28.

The opposition view was fully set forth in the following letter, written, as afterwards appeared, by Mr. Charles Pinckney, then a senator from South Carolina, which first was published in the newspapers, and subsequently was circulated, with one or two others, in a pamphlet, signed—"A South Carolina Planter":

"To the Citizens of the United States: As congress must by law provide, at their next session, for any similar cases which may occur under the British treaty, and as it is of general importance to the citizens of the United States, the following examination of the case of Jonathan Robbins, lately decided in the district court of South Carolina, is with deference submitted to their consideration: Fellow Citizens—As I believe you have not been much troubled with my remarks on any subject, I hope you will more readily excuse the favour I now ask, in requesting your attention to the present. I am induced to make them, because the question is of very great public consequence, and involves the dearest and most valuable rights of every man in the United States. It reaches all situations, as well the elevated and opulent as the most indigent. It affects the knowledge and independence of our judicials in the most important manner; and as I know it has excited the sensibility of the people, and must be so far made the subject of inquiry in congress as to enable them to provide for similar cases; I have supposed some examination of it may be necessary, in that spirit of deference and delicacy in which all such inquiries should be conducted. I shall not go into a definition of the principles of a free government, and the blessings its citizens ought to expect; because few of our own, even amongst the most illiterate, are ignorant of the nature of a representative government, the right of suffrage, and the inestimable privilege of the trial by jury, in all cases in which their characters, lives or property are concerned. To a people so informed, it is scarcely necessary to remark, that to men of feeling the value of character, of honorable fame, is dearer than life or property, or even the most tender connections; that to all men, whether of the nicest honour or otherwise, the love of life is dearer than that of property, and that they would readily sacrifice the one to preserve the other. Hence it follows, that those privileges which guard the character and lives of our citizens are viewed with a more jealous eye, and will be asserted with more firmness and promptitude, than even those which protect their properties, vigilant as they are with respect to these. A number of our citizens, therefore, believing that the inestimable privileges secured to them by the constitution and laws of the United States, have been affected in the case of Jonathan Robbins, that it is one which may if established as a precedent, reach some valuable inhabitants of this country, and to the intent that these privileges should be more carefully guarded by a positive law in future, the following remarks are submitted, with a view to bring this business more fully before the public than it has hitherto been. The following is the statement of the case, with the accompanying affidavits: It appears, however, by the result, that these affidavits, and the question whether the prisoner was an American, and an impressed seaman or not, were, in the opinion of the court, altogether immaterial: the court would have felt itself bound to deliver up any respectable citizen of the United States, if claimed under the circumstances of the prisoner. It appears by the preceding statement, that the judge, under the circumstances of this case, would feel himself obliged to deliver up any respectable citizen of the 'United States.' I do not mention this because he used the words 'respectable citizen'; but I do it to show, that this is a question which seriously concerns every part of the community, and that no citizen whose business may oblige him to go to other countries, is hereafter safe from such demands. It will not depend upon him to say he is not a mariner, or to show proofs or certificates to the contrary. It will depend upon the force with which he is attacked, and the temper or violence of the officer who directs it. Instances, it is said, have lately occurred where not only the seamen but the passengers have been impressed, who, although declaring they were not seamen, were still impressed as such, and obliged to perform their duties. No production of papers, no entreaties availed them: they were compelled to submit. Had these men been enterprising, or an opportunity offered, and they had possessed themselves of their oppressors, and brought them into port; or had they, in the attempt to regain their freedom, been obliged to destroy them, while the world would have applauded the act, the judge must, from the decision, have delivered them to a similar demand; neither influence, fortune, or friends could have saved them. However superior in these, in political privileges they were only equal to the unknown and friendless Robbins. A consistent and inflexible magistrate must view them with the same impartial eye: he must give to them the same construction of the law or constitution; he could not vary them without the immediate loss of character. An enlightened people, therefore, will as attentively, nay, they ought more carefully to guard them in the person of a poor and unprotected than a rich or considerable man. The latter will always find powerful friends to support and protect his privileges; while the rights of the former may in silence and with impunity be unattended to merely because he is unknown, and has not an advocate to assert them. This would probably have been the case in the present instance, had not some gentlemen voluntarily offered themselves to examine and discuss its consequences. The public are obliged to them; it is an excellent example, I hope it will be followed upon every occasion, and that it will make us infinitely more vigilant of our rights than ever. We must never forget that in this country the poor and the rich, the humble and the influential, are entitled to equal privileges; that we ought to consider a violation of the rights of the most indigent and unprotected man, as an injury to the whole; while we have a pen to guide, or a voice to lift, they should constantly be exerted against the exercise of tyranny or oppression, by whatever nation committed or to whomsover the violence may be done.

"I now proceed to examine the case and the nature of the evidence, on which Mr. Bee determined to deliver Jonathan Robbins to the demand of the British minister. I believe it is the first instance which has occurred, of a demand under the British treaty in the United States; certainly, in this state. The law respecting the delivery of fugitives from justice was silent on the delivery of fugitives to foreign powers, therefore the judge conceived himself not only authorized but bound to interfere. By his own statement it appears to have been entirely a new case, in which I should suppose he had considerable discretion, and was not bound by any particular legislative act to deliver on a mere affidavit or any 'trivial surmise or hearsay evidence.' It was his duty to have maturely considered what were the legal import and meaning of the words, 'charged with murder and forgery,' and how far, according to the laws of this country, there was such evidence of criminality as would justify the sending any man, claiming to be a citizen, and not disproved as such, from his country, to be tried by a foreign tribunal, and most probably by a court martial. The judge's auditors must have been surprised when they heard him say 'that no man can be punished by the laws of Great Britain without a trial; if he is innocent, he will be acquitted; if guilty, he must be punished.' This observation was by no means applicable to the present case: the true question before the court was, whether Jonathan Robbins, producing a notarial certificate of being a citizen of the United States, and asserting that he was impressed by violence into the British service, was, from the nature of the affidavits before him, to be torn from his country and connexions, and deprived of all the rights of citizenship, and sent to be tried by a foreign tribunal, acting without a jury, in the most summary manner, and by martial law. I do not pretend to equal legal knowledge with the judge: but I have sometimes attended to points of this kind; and as far as I am able to form, am clearly of opinion that the prisoner, not having been disproved to be a citizen of the United States, there was not such evidence before the court as justified the judge in giving so important an order, as to surrender him to the demand of the British consul. This I will endeavour to prove from the examination of the affidavits, and the nature of the testimony required by our laws, as sufficient even to justify the putting a citizen upon his trial in this country, without adding to it the inexpressible disgrace and danger of sending him to be tried by a foreign tribunal. The first affidavit is William Portlock, on which I suppose the judge could not have rested at all: he appears from his age, and the statement in the affidavit, to have been a sailor lad as little known in this country as Robbins himself, and to have been so illiterate as not to have been able to write his name. This lad says, he heard a person who answered to the name of Nathan Robbins, declare he was boatswain's mate on board the Hermoine, when she was carried into the port of 'Gavilla;' and that sometimes when he was drunk, he would mention the Hermoine, clench his fist, and say 'Bad luck to her.' From this statement it results that this Portlock was an illiterate sailor lad, so ignorant as not to know the name of the port the frigate was carried into. It does not appear that he was shown the prisoner, or that he could swear that Jonathan Robbins was the person he knew on board the Tanner's Delight; he avowedly knew nothing of himself. He does not say the person he spoke of confessed to him that he was concerned in the murder or piracy charged on him. From the youth, ignorance and situation of Portlock; from the vague and uncertain account he gave, I must still be of the opinion that the judge could not have rested at all on his testimony; he knew, that even if Portlock had sworn positively to the identity of Robbins, and the latter had when sober made any confession of guilt to him, that it was the duty of a judge not to have attended to it. Any confession of a criminal must be made in a particular manner, before magistrates, or in open court, to operate to conviction. An elegant writer, treating on this subject, says, 'The confession of a criminal, when taken even before a magistrate, can rarely be turned against him, without obviating the end for which he must be supposed to have made it. Besides, we have known instances of murders avowed, which were never committed; of things stolen, which had never quitted the possession of the owner.'

"The evidence of words alleged to have been spoken by the person accused, and connected with the criminality of the charge, ought also to be received with great distrust. Such words are either spoken in the zeal of unsuspicious confidence, and cannot be repeated without a breach of private faith, which detracts much from the credibility of the witness; or, in the unguarded hours of boasting dissipation, in which case they are not unlikely to be false in themselves, and very likely to be falsely repeated. In every situation, therefore, in which Portlock can be received as a witness, or the testimony he gave examined, it must at once be seen, that it was not such as a grand jury could have found a bill on, or such as will be considered sufficient to justify the delivery the judge has ordered. It must, therefore, have been altogether on the single testimony of Lieutenant Forbes he ordered it, and this remains to be examined. The whole of Lieutenant Forbes' examination says, that a man confined in the jail of this district, who calls himself Robbins, but whose real name he believes to be Thomas Nash, was a seaman for a certain time on board the Hermione; that after he left the Hermione, she was seized by the crew and carried into an enemy's port; and that he has heard from the depositions of others in courts martial, that the man whom he believes to be named Thomas Nash, was a principal in the commission of the said acts of piracy and murder, &c. From this account, Mr. Forbes has confessed that he knows nothing of himself—that he was not sure what the prisoner's name was, but that he believes it to be Thomas Nash, and what is extremely important, he does not attempt to say he is an Irishman, and not an American, or that he was not impressed into the British service. But that from the depositions of others, and what he has heard, he considers him as one of the principals in the said act. He does not explain what is the nature of the testimony he has heard on the subject, as it respects Nash—by whom given—whether by respectable or unprincipled witnesses, by such as were intimidated and forced into a confession of anything, or by ignorant and illiterate men (without a jury to interpose their lenient and impartial decisions) before a court of strict military officers, the severity and despatch of whose decrees they are every moment fearing to experience themselves. His testimony, therefore, being altogether hearsay, ought, in strictness of law, to have operated less forcibly upon the mind of the judge than even Portlock's, for however more respectable as an officer and a gentleman Mr. Forbes is, yet, when he tells you himself he was not on board the frigate when the murder and piracy were committed, and that he knows nothing but by hearsay, either from the relations or depositions of others, he at once comes within that description of testimony, which the laws of England, and the decisions of the best judges, and our laws borrowed from them, forbid either a judge or a jury to receive in any case affecting the life or limb of a subject of the one, or a citizen of the other.

"This being the state of the evidence before the judge, two important questions arise: (1) Whether the judge was strictly authorized, and if there was a doubt, whether he ought to have decided alone upon this question; and, (2) whether in deciding he had any, and what discretion, as to the nature of the evidence to be required, and whether his decision was such as the security of the personal privileges of our citizens, or the policy of the United States demanded.

"To the first question—It appears that, from laws of congress respecting the delivery of fugitives from justice from one state to another being silent, the judge was of opinion, on the application being first made to him, that it was a matter for executive interference; but that upon reconsideration, as the law and the treaty were silent, he was under the necessity of deciding. I think a further view of this subject must have, by this time, convinced him that he was mistaken, and that no possible construction that he can give to the 3d article of the constitution, can justify the opinion he formed of his having a right to decide on this case. The article respecting the judicial, after vesting in congress the right to establish superior and inferior tribunals, defines the important powers they shall exercise, but leaves the boundaries of each to be ascertained by congress. They have accordingly detailed the duties and fixed the limits of the supreme, circuit, and district courts in a manner so clear, that it is astonishing a doubt should have for a moment arisen as to the court really having jurisdiction to decide this question. The district courts have no right to decide on any crime, where the punishment is to exceed thirty stripes, one hundred dollars fine, and six months imprisonment: in any case exceeding these, and particularly for capital offences, however the judge, like any other magistrate, may, on proper testimony, commit for trial, here he has no right to decide: this authority is given to the circuit court. Had, therefore, Robbins been committed for trial in this state, could Mr. Bee have tried him? Certainly not. He must have remained to be tried by the circuit court. With what authority, therefore, could he decide upon a question which not only went to divest the prisoner of his right of citizenship, banish him from his country, and deprive him of the trial by jury, but also to dispossess the circuit court of a right to decide upon as new, delicate, and important a subject as ever came before them: one which I hoped would have been reserved for much more ample discussion and consideration, and in which I should have supposed the public would have been pleased to hear the opinions of all the most experienced counsel at the bar, and to have seen decided by the supreme court. It is no answer to say that the 27th article of the treaty speaks of commitment, because the latter clause qualifies it, and makes this commitment depend upon the evidence of criminality according to our laws; and there is surely an astonishing difference between a mere commitment for trial, and a delivery over to a foreign tribunal. Nor is it more just to say that the law of congress respecting fugitives from justice in the different states makes them deliverable on a bill found or by an affidavit, because they are only removed from one state to another, where the same laws, same right of jury and same forms exist; and what is equal to all, the invaluable right of habeas corpus, where a prisoner, improperly committed, can, after delivery and removal, demand to be brought before a judge, and have the reasons of his confinement examined. But where is the habeas corpus that can, in this situation, reach an unfortunate American? However slight or unfounded the accusation against him, or erroneous the opinion of a single judge who delivered him may be, when once delivered he is forever deprived of this invaluable privilege. The moment the order is given, he is hurried in chains on board an armed cutter, from whence, on his arrival in a distant and foreign port, he is immediately transferred to another vessel, on whose deck, after a summary military trial, he is doomed to meet his fate.

"I will pause here, and ask you, my countrymen, if there is no difference between this and an ordinary commitment by a magistrate for trial here? Your own good sense, and the security you must wish to the rights of your fellow-citizens and yourselves, will best dictate the answer you should give.

"There is another important reason why the judge ought not, upon this occasion, singly to have decided. I think if it had occurred to him he certainly would have postponed the decision until the meeting of the circuit court. It is this: That however all nations may have agreed upon the propriety of delivering up fugitives from justice, in the case of forgery, yet that in times of war, and particularly in revolutions, when different nations hold such opposite opinions upon what are piracy or murder, and what justifiable resistance to tyranny and oppression, when it is so extremely difficult, and requires all the acuteness, and all the knowledge and experience of the ablest judges to draw the line between them, most certainly in this country our judges ought not to have decided in cases that may hereafter be quoted as precedents, without the utmost caution and deliberation. They should have reflected, that in all trials where there was a claim of birthright or citizenship on the part of the accused, and where there was not the fullest and most positive proof of his criminality, that it was safest to try him here.[1] In this instance they ought certainly to have done so. The testimony was slight and trivial; it was nearly all hearsay. It was indispensable, therefore, to justice, that the prisoner should have had an opportunity of sending to New York and Connecticut to prove, if he could, his birthright and citizenship, in the case of such delicate importance, and of such slight proof. Could the British government have censured the procedure? It was as easy for them to send their witnesses here, as to have sent an armed cutter to carry him away. Justice would have been done to all parties; and venerating, as their nation is said to do, the trial by jury, a generous and free people would have applauded the respect that was paid to it here.

"To the second question it has been already observed, that this was a new case, in which congress had not legislated, and the more, that if the judge thought proper to assume the power of deciding, he was bound by no particular act of restriction, but at liberty to declare the nature of the evidence on which, in his opinion, so important a decision should have been made. Supposing him, as the district judge, to have been at all authorized to decide, his discretionary power certainly would have extended to this; and the point then for consideration is, that having the power to determine on what evidence so important an order should be founded, what ought to have been his conduct, and what the nature of the proof he should have required? My own opinion, decidedly is, that, he should at least have required such proofs, as a grand jury would have thought sufficient to find a bill. Perhaps he ought to have gone further, and before he consented to his removal into a foreign country and military tribunal, he should have demanded complete proof of his guilt, such as would have induced a petit jury to convict him. But that he should at least have required the proof necessary to find a bill, no one, I think, will contend. The inquiry then is, what is the proof which the English laws and the laws of this country require to enable a grand jury to find a bill? Although I think there are many defects in the administration of justice, such, for instance, as the dependence of the judges on the crown, from which they receive their appointment, and to whom they may be looking up for further promotion and honour; that of being removable by an address from parliament which a minister can always command, and whose views and wishes, therefore, none else but an inflexible magistrate will dare oppose; and, particularly, in the sheriff's having the power to summon whom they please as jurors, and to pack them, if they think proper. Yet there is one part of their system which I have always admired, that is, the institution of a grand jury. Their laws have wisely and humanely considered, that next to the disgrace of being convicted of an infamous offence, is the dishonour of being charged with one; and therefore, before they would submit a subject to the danger and inconvenience of being publicly arraigned, an impartial jury are on their oaths to declare the just cause for accusation. We have copied their system and improved upon it. Our juries cannot be packed; they are drawn by lot, and, in my judgment, criminal trials in this state, are as perfect as they can be. The nature of the evidence which can alone be properly offered to a grand jury, although not entirely conclusive as to the actual guilt of the prisoner, must be such, as if offered to the petit jury, would be legal evidence. Even examinations taken agreeably to 2 & 3 Philip & Mary, c. 10 (of force in this state), can only be given in evidence before a jury, when the court is satisfied the witness is dead, unable to travel, or kept away by the means or procurements of the prisoner. No other examinations can be given, or ought to be received in evidence; and a presentment founded upon any other, would not be that due presentment, without which a citizen's life should not be put in danger.

"The above opinion is founded on the highest law authorities. A learned English judge, speaking on this subject, says: 'The evidence to be given ought to arise to a high degree of probability. Absolute positive proof is not to be insisted upon before a grand jury, and slight trivial suspicion and hearsay evidence, are not sufficient to ground such presentments upon; for although they are only in the nature of a charge, and do not carry a conviction, yet many inconveniences as well as expense and danger attend a charge of this sort, which no subject ought to undergo, but upon legal and sufficient evidence.' This is the law of England on the subject of legal evidence, sufficient to enable a grand jury to find a bill. Our law is taken from, and founded upon it; and the public can now judge, whether the testimony submitted in this case, was such as ought, in one of so much importance and danger to the prisoner, to have authorized his delivery.

"Some distinctions are attempted to be drawn respecting territory and jurisdiction, the counsel for the prisoner having contended, that the treaty entirely alluded to the peculiar exclusive jurisdiction of each. I have no doubt, in my own mind, that Mr. Jay meant no other than the exclusive territorial jurisdiction of each nation. He seems to have carefully omitted the word 'piracy,' aware of the difficulty I have before mentioned, of distinguishing between what may be called piracy, or what laudable resistance to violence and oppression. This omission, therefore, must at once convince us, that Mr. Jay could only have meant private acts of premeditated and deliberate murder, arising from motives unconnected with any attempts which individuals, coming to be the citizens of this country, might at any time make to free themselves from the tyranny of imprisonment. It is wonderful, however, to me, that Mr. Jay having seen the necessity of omitting piracy, did not also omit, at least during the existence of the war, murder also. For, in attempts to regain vessels or escape from impressment, it is certainly as difficult to distinguish what is murder, as what is piracy. Upon an occasion of such importance to the future safety of his fellow citizens, Mr. Jay certainly ought, and will, I suppose, explain, what was his meaning in that article of the treaty. The quotations from Vattel and Rutherford did not apply at all. They are merely meant to refer to the cases of children born at sea, to ascertain, as Vattel does very properly, the right as subjects or citizens of the nation to which the vessel they are born in belongs. To suppose that Vattel designed to extend the doctrine, so far as to mean that the ships of a nation are, with respect to the space of water they cover on the ocean, its territory as to jurisdiction, as completely as its lands or rivers are, is to prove him not only guilty of an inconsistency unbecoming so well-informed an author, but to make him flatly contradict doctrines expressed in other parts of his work. He then contradicts that neutral vessels do not make free goods; and it is on his authority the British rest, more than any other, their right to search neutrals.

"Among the reasons which should make our judges very cautious in deciding against the claim of citizenship, by persons assuming to be cer; he is only advertised as a common seaman, and not charged as one concerned in the murder of the officers. But the most remarkable thing is this, that while Robbins' certificate says that he is a man five feet six inches high, the other (that is the Antigua advertisement) says he is five feet ten inches. Now, four inches is so conspicuous a difference in the height of a man, that surely it was of sufficient consequence in fixing the identity to have deserved attention.

citizens, there is one peculiar to this country, and which should be carefully attended to; it is, the difficulty of distinguishing between the natives of some of the Middle and Southern states, and the natives of Ireland, Germany, and, in some instances, Scotland. The emigrations from those countries to America were formerly very great. Whole counties have been entirely settled by them, with scarce the intermixture of any other The children hearing nothing but the language of their parents, will as naturally have the German, Irish, or Scotch accent, as if they were born in Europe. Instances of this sort must have occurred to any man, the least acquainted with these states. Indeed, it is well known that, in some places, many native Americans, born of German parents, have been met, who could not speak the English language. If, then, any of these men, born of German parents, have become seamen, will it not be impossible to distinguish between them and Europeans? And can there be a more fallacious mode of determining than from the voice or accent? I know of none more so than that of the countenance; and to neither should an acute or experienced judge ever attend.

"I now come to the policy of the measure in the United States. More than any other nation, except Great Britain, ought the privileges of our seamen to be vigilantly attended to—they are the instrument of our commerce, and to them their country must look up as the true means of becoming an important naval power—of having the ability to protect and guard their rights, and to insure to its citizens the blessings of peace: they are more exposed to the attacks and insolence of powerful and overbearing nations than any other class of our citizens, and are therefore more entitled to the care and attention of our public guardians. Possessing as the United States do, bulky products, every day increasing, and to export which great quantities of shipping and numbers of seamen are necessary, to what portion of their citizens can they look with more anxiety than to them? Numerous as they may become within these ten years, who knows to what extent the parental and fostering hand of government may increase them within the like succeeding period? But to effect this we must value and cherish them. We must recollect that they are not our men, but citizens—that they do not, the moment they become impressed by a superior foreign force, lose their rights or become lost to their country. Can it be supposed, because they are seamen, they have no families, no tender connexions, no comforts to endear their homes to them? Rough and boisterous as is the element they traverse, and laborious as are their lives, among none of our citizens are to be found more true independence and generosity, or more ardent attachment to their country. If, then, they have those passions, that impatience of insult, that invincible thirst for revenge, which indignities like impressment and tyranny never fail to provoke, are they to be punished for using opportunities to exercise them? Are they to submit to the manacle and the lash, without a murmur, because they fear their country, however possessing the means, may not have the inclination to protect them? If so, adieu to your commerce and your navy! Your seamen will fly to other governments more sensible of their value, and more disposed to assert and maintain their rights.

"I will here take notice of the letter which the judge was said to have received from the secretary of state, mentioning, that 'the president advises and requests the delivery of the prisoner,' because it has made some noise, and I do not view it in the same light with others. I believe that neither of them meant to influence the opinion of the judge—that they supposed it was a mere matter of course—that there was no doubt as to the identity or country of the prisoner; and they probably never heard of his claim of citizenship; that they were anxious, on the part of this government, faithfully to execute the treaty, and that the letter to the judge had another intent. This I really believe to be the case; but the noise it has made will show the extreme impropriety of the higher executive officers of our government ever touching, in the most distant manner, on any subjects that may come before the judicial. However innocent the intention, as I think it was in this instance, it is very apt to give rise to unfavourable opinions;—and none more dangerous to a community can be entertained, than that of a wish of the executive to influence the judicial. It weakens the confidence of the public in both; and lessens the respect it is their wish to show them. The present instance will probably operate to advantage; because it is to be supposed that after this our secretaries will be careful to avoid ever writing to a judge on any subject that may possibly come before him. In one thing I perfectly agree with Mr. Bee; and that is, in his avoiding to question the constitutionality of the treaty, although I think it constitutional. On no subject am I more convinced, than that it is an unsafe and dangerous doctrine in a republic, ever to suppose that a judge ought to possess the right of questioning or deciding upon the constitutionality of treaties, laws, or any act of the legislature. It is placing the opinion of an individual, or of two or three, above that of both branches of congress, a doctrine which is not warranted by the constitution, and will not, I hope, long have many advocates in this country.

"I shall here conclude my remarks on this case. They are made in that spirit of deference and respect, which is intended to avoid giving offence, while it examines with candour the subject under discussion. My earnest wish is to draw the attention of congress to the amendment of the act, and to prove to them the necessity of providing in future against the delivery of any fugitives, unless a bill is found against them by a grand jury: to guard them against entering into any articles on this subject in other treaties, unless they assent to it; and particularly to warn them against ever forming any agreements respecting fugitives from justice, except with nations whose citizens possess the right of trial by jury, and are willing to reciprocate so indispensable a provision.

(The following are such of the documents appended to the above letter as are not contained in the president's message of Feb. 7, 1800, given post):

Letter from Mr. Moodie, British consul at Charleston, to Judge Bee:

"Charleston, Nov. 27, 1799.

"Sir: In consequence of the very great opposition made to the delivering up under the 7th article of the treaty of amity, &c. Thomas Nash, alias Nathan Robbins, one of the principal mutineers on board his Britannic majesty's late ship Hermione, and of the numerous publications on that subject, as well in this as others of the United States, I wrote to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, requesting he would send me minutes of the court martial, meaning to communicate the contents to you; but being informed that a compliance with such request would have been contrary to the rules of the British navy, I beg leave to enclose you a copy of the admiral's answer, which I consider fully adequate to the purpose I intended. Whilst on this subject I cannot help remarking, that about the time my counsel moved for a habeas corpus, I happened to be in the court of common pleas, when Mr. Ker, a gentleman of the bar, addressed me, and mentioned his intention to oppose the delivery of the prisoner, under an idea of his being a citizen of the United States of America: on this I expressed some surprise, that a person should at so late a day interest himself in behalf of the prisoner, particularly as his majesty's cutter Sprightly had been here a very short time before for the purpose of carrying him off, and that it was from your opinion of the transaction being an executive one, that he was not then delivered up: he answered that Mr. Sasportas* had spoken to Colonel Moultrie and himself. I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant, Benjamin Moodie.

"The Hon. Thomas Bee, Esq."

Extract of a letter from Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, to Benjamin Moodie, Esq., his Britannic majesty's consul in Charleston; dated on board the Abergavenny, in Port Royal harbour, Jamaica, 13th September, 1799:

"Sir: I have received your letter of 21st of last month, with a copy of another (not yet received) of the 3d of same month; and in answer to both, am to acquaint you that Nash has been executed and hung in chains, agreeably to the sentence of a court martial, and that he confessed himself to be an Irishman: and it further appears by the Hermione's books† that he was born at Waterford; on the 21st of December, 1792,‡ entered a volunteer on board the Dover; received three pounds bounty money, and was removed to the Hermione 28th January, 1793, and with respect to transmitting minutes of his trial, that is not in my power, but rests with the lords of the admiralty only."

"I had the command of the boats of the squadron on the day of his execution, and attended with them to see his body hung in chains, agreeably to an order for that purpose, from Sir Hyde Parker, Kt., commander-in-chief, &c., &c., at Jamaica. Geo. Hans Blake,

Letter from Mr. Moultrie to Mr. Moodie:

"To Benjamin Moodie, Esq., His Britannic Majesty's Consul in Charleston—Sir: Having discharged my duty as a counsellor in the case of Jonathan Robbins, and having but little time to bestow on newspaper altercations, it was neither in my expectation nor my wish to be called forth further on this subject, and especially, as the author of a publication in a newspaper; but, sir, I find I am indebted to your politeness and moderation, or the zeal of your printer, (if he is your commentator,) for this occasion of my coming forth in this publication. In your letter of the 27th ultimo, to Judge Bee, respecting the case of Robbins, you conclude by saying you were informed by Mr. Ker, that Mr. Sasportas had spoken to Mr. Ker and myself as Robbins' counsel, and with an asterism annexed to the word Sasportas, referring to an annotation below, this brilliant note is in italics, as follows:—'Mr. Sasportas was the agent for the French Republic at the time their cruisers were permitted to sell their prizes in this port. The records of the District Court in Admiralty causes will prove this.' If I understand right, and can read right, and if I understand the sentiments and views of the advocates of your nation in this country, (and think I have contemplated them since the dawn of our Revolution,) this bright note and those capitals are intended as an insinuation to the world, that French influence was at the bottom of Robbins' defence, consequently was the mover of his counsellors. If I am mistaken, sir, in my sentiments you will pardon me, and I hope at the same time correct the error; but, sir, these sentiments are the natural impressions of your conduct, and I will hold them till properly effaced. The cry or insinuation, sir, of French influence may be an admirable engine of British policy in this country, and serve to promote many of their purposes, but as to myself or any injury it may work towards me in this case, you have lost your aim, sir. The mens conscia sibi recti defies your attack; your shaft has no sting, sir, its poison is ineffectual; and your own disappointment shall be your own punishment. When I was first called on in Robbins' case I considered it generally and gave my opinion that I thought such was the prevailing influence of opinions and sentiments of those in power, that every effort would be vain; he had not then been represented to me as an American citizen, and I considered the case on the point of jurisdiction only. I gave it but a short consideration, and soon determined, and thought no more of it. Matters rested thus for some days—till the day before Robbins was tried. I was then accidentally informed, in conversation with a friend, that Robbins was an American. I was struck and alarmed to think I had deserted him. I immediately went to Mr. Ker and desired him to prepare himself for the argument next morning. I went home and considered the case, and met Mr. Ker in court the next day. I had never yet seen Robbins, nor had I ever any intercourse with him till he was pointed out to me, and I went up and spoke to him in court, the day of his trial; nor had I till then ever seen one of his papers. On my coming into court, amongst the first things I did, I asked the clerk for the papers, and amongst them found Robbins' certificate of nativity and citizenship. I examined it and found it had every mark of authenticity; no erasure, no obliteration; that its colour and appearance were natural and correspondent with its date, and that the handwriting of the notary was genuine and can be proven here. But one thing further struck me: on inquiring of the clerk if this paper was found on Robbins when first taken, and being informed it was, I was of opinion it was genuine; and was clear if it was not, it was no fabrication in Charleston. Under these circumstances, sir, I undertook the cause of Robbins; a cause, sir, in which the rights of mankind and those of my country were deeply involved; a cause, sir, which I held myself bound in duty, as an American, to defend and support; which pointed at the constitution and vital principle of American independence. And, give me leave further to tell you, that in this cause, I neither undertook it from French influence or an idea of advancing their interest, nor from the promise or expectation of any fee or reward, and that I never have received any such. Every one, sir, who knows me, knows my politics; they have been uniform since 1775, and I hope will continue so to my latest hour. I honour and respect all nations: but I hate tyrants. I love my country and will defend its freedom. I am, sir, with due consideration, your humble servant, Alexander Moultrie."

conduct in the case of Robbins, because the publication bears its own insignificance on the face of it; but, as he has thought proper to arraign the motives which induced me to employ counsel in his behalf, I shall briefly relate the circumstances which brought Robbins under my observation. Being drawn to serve as a grand juror for the district of Charleston, we were requested by the court to visit the jail, in order to make a report of the state of the same. In the exercise of this duty I saw Robbins, confined in irons; who communicated to me the cause of his commitment, and his defence to the charge, viz: that of his being an American citizen, impressed by the English. From his relation, and his certificate of citizenship then shown me, I was induced to employ counsel in his behalf, in order that his innocence or guilt might be established by an appeal to the laws of the country. The world must be at a loss to trace any connection between my conduct on this occasion and my having acted as commercial agent for the republic of France upwards of six years since. Hence, it follows that Mr. Moodie can have no other object in view than a desire to establish a prejudice against me in the eyes of my fellow-citizens. Mr. Moodie states that he expressed his surprise to Mr. Ker, that at so late a day he meant to oppose Robbins being delivered up. The fact is I had spoken to the counsel the very day I saw the prisoner in jail, but his avocations, I presume, did not permit him to attend to the case. The consequence was, that rather than the cause should be wholly neglected, I applied to other counsel, with whose exertions I have no reason to be dissatisfied. But I presume this is the first instance where a prosecutor has assumed to himself the right of dictating to the accused party, when, and how he shall seek redress. I am, gentlemen, your most obedient servant, Abraham Sasportas.

"N. B. No one knows better than Judge Bee that I was agent to the French republic, and no one knows better than myself that Mr. Moodie was agent for the British government; by the repeated vexatious impediments which were raised up by him in every case, without the colour of a legal defence. The numerous decrees of the supreme court of the United States, in favour of the captors, prove the fact."

Immediately upon the meeting of congress a call was made upon the president for papers, &c., connected with Robbins' surrender, to which the following answer was given:

"Message from the president of the United States, transmitting a report of the secretary of state, and sundry documents relative to the requisition for and delivery of Jonathan Robbins, in pursuance of a resolution of the house of representatives of the 4th instant.

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives: In consequence of your request, to me conveyed in your resolution of the fourth of this month, I directed the secretary of state to lay before me copies of the papers intended. These copies, together with his report, I now transmit to the house of representatives for the consideration of the members. John Adams.

"United States, February 7, 1800."

"Report.

"Department of State, February 6, 1800.

"The secretary of state has prepared, as directed, and now respectfully submits to the president of the United States, copies of the papers which probably were contemplated by the house of representatives in their resolve of the 4th instant, although no requisition, as the resolve supposes, has ever been received, nor any communication made to the judge of the district court of South Carolina, concerning any man by name of Jonathan Robbins. But by the proceedings before that judge, as they have been published, it appears that a seaman named Thomas Nash, the subject of the British minister's requisition, did assume the name of Jonathan Robbins and make oath 'that he was a native of the state of Connecticut, and born in Danbury in that state.' The secretary, therefore, besides the copy of the requisition, and the copies of his letter to the judge of the district court of South Carolina, and of the judge's answer, has prepared, and herewith encloses, copies of the certificates of the select men of Danbury, and extracts of letters from Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, satisfactorily proving that the Thomas Nash calling himself Jonathan Robbins, who, on the requisition of the British minister, was delivered by the judge aforesaid, with the assent of the president of the United States, was not an American citizen, but a native Irishman, who, to his other crimes, added perjury, in the hope thereby to escape the punishment due to piracy and murder. The original certificates of the select men and town clerk of Danbury are in the secretary's possession, and he has compared the extract of Admiral Parker's letter to Mr. Liston with the original, and the extract of the admiral's letter to the British consul at Charleston with the passage as recited in the consul's original letter to Mr. Liston. All which is respectfully submitted. Timothy Pickering."

Copy of a note from Robert Liston, Esq., envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his Britannic majesty, to Timothy Pickering, secretary of state of the United States:

"R. Liston presents his respects to Col. Pickering, secretary of state. A seaman of the name of Thomas Nash having beeen committed to jail in Charleston, South Carolina, at the instance of his majesty's consul there, on suspicion of his having been an accomplice in the piracy and murder committed on board his majesty's ship Hermione, and information of the circumstance having been transmitted to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, a cutter was dispatched to Charleston with an officer on board, to whom the man was well known, in order that his person might be identified, and that he should be carried to the West Indies for trial. But, on the application of the consul for the restoration of Nash, in conformity to the treaty of 1794, Judge Bee and the federal attorney were of opinion that he could not with propriety be delivered up without a previous requisition on my part made to the executive government of the United States. May I therefore request, sir, that you will be pleased to lay this matter before the president, and procure his orders that the said Thomas Nash be delivered up to justice.

Letter from the secretary of state to Judge Bee:

"Department of State, Philadelphia, June 3, 1799.

"Sir—Mr. Liston, the minister of his Britannic majesty, has requested that Thomas Nash, who was a seaman on board the British frigate Hermione, and who, he is informed, is now a prisoner in the jail of Charleston, should be delivered up. I have stated the matter to the president of the United States. He considers an offence committed on board a public ship of war on the high seas to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to whom the ship belongs. Nash is charged, it is understood, with piracy and murder, committed by him on board the above mentioned British frigate, on the high seas, and consequently 'within the jurisdiction of his Britannic majesty,' and therefore, by the 27th article of the treaty of amity with Great Britain, Nash ought to be delivered up, as requested by the British minister, provided such evidence of his criminalty be produced as, by the laws of the United States or of South Carolina, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction of the United States. The president has, in consequence thereof, authorized me to communicate to you 'his advice and request,' that Thomas Nash may be delivered up to the consul or other agent of Great Britain who shall appear to receive him. I have the honour to be, &c., &c.

Letter from Thomas Bee, Esq., to the secretary of state, dated:

"Charleston, South Carolina, 1st July, 1799.

"In compliance with the request of the president of the United States, as stated in your favour of the 3d ult., I gave notice to the British consul, that at the sitting of the district court on this day, I should order Thomas Nash, the prisoner charged with having committed murder and piracy on board the British frigate Hermione, on such strong evidence of his criminality as justified his apprehension and commitment for trial, to be brought before me on habeas corpus, in order to his being delivered over, agreeably to the 27th article of the treaty of amity with Great Britain. The consul attended in court, and requested that the prisoner should remain in jail until he had a convenient opportunity of sending him away. I have therefore directed that he remain in prison until the consul shall find it convenient to remove him. I have the honour to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

"November 19th, 1797.

"In consequence of many obstacles I had to encounter in obtaining the delivery of Thomas Nash, late of his majesty's ship Hermione, and of the numerous publications to the northward, and in this place, I wrote to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, requesting he would be good enough to send me minutes of the court-martial; to which he answered under date 13th September—I am to acquaint you that Nash has been executed agreeably to a court-martial, and that he confessed himself to be an Irishman: and it farther appears by the Hermione's books that he was born at Waterford; on the 21st December, 1792, entered a volunteer on board the Dover, received £3 bounty-money, and was removed to the Hermione, 28th of January, 1793. And with respect to transmitting the minutes of his trial, that is not in my power, but rests with the lords of the admiralty only."

The following letters subsequently were produced to the house:

Extract of a letter from the secretary of state of the United States, to the president of the United States, dated:

"May 15th, 1792.

"Mr. Liston informs me, that an information received by Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, of one of the mutineeers and murderers of the officers of the British frigate Hermione, being at Charleston, South Carolina, the admiral sent thither a vessel on purpose to receive and carry the culprit to the fleet to be tried; but that the district judge had not deemed it proper to deliver him up. This question has occurred before, respecting the crew of the Hermione, in consequence of some of them being apprehended in New Jersey, where they were tried and acquitted. One only was detained some time longer, on a suggestion or expectation of decisive evidence against him: but it appeared afterwards that this man was not involved in the offence, and at Mr. Liston's request he was discharged. The only and legal question was, whether an offence committed on board a public ship of war, on the high seas, was committed within the jurisdiction of the party demanding the offender, on a just construction of the 27th article of the treaty. Upon a further consideration of the subject. I am inclined to answer in the affirmative; I supppose the offence committed on board the Hermione to have been a most atrocious act of piracy accompanied with murder: that all nations having jurisdiction in this case, if the pirates be found within their dominions, any of them may try and punish them; but wanting the full evidence for that purpose, it would seem reasonable, and essential to the due administration of justice, that the culprits be delivered up to the government of the country to which they belong; all nations being interested in the punishment of such pests to society. On the point above-mentioned about the jurisdiction, it may be observed, that besides the general concurrent jurisdiction held by Great Britain on the high seas, her officers have, and exercise, a particular jurisdiction on board of their own ships. For these reasons, and as the 27th article of the treaty especially requires the delivering up of murderers, I respectfully submit my opinion, that the judge of the district of South Carolina should be directed to deliver up the offender in question, on the demand of the British government by its minister."

Extract of a letter from the president of the United States to the secretary of state, dated:

"Quincy, May 21st, 1799.

"Your favour of the 15th is received. I have no doubt that an offence committed on board a public ship of war, on the high seas, is committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to which the ship belongs. How far the president of the United States would be justifiable in directing the judge to deliver up the offender, is not clear. I have no objection to advise and request him to do it."

House of Representatives, Feb. 21, 1800.

Mr. Livingston, in consequence of a reference of the message of the president on the case of Jonathan Robbins to a committee of the whole house, and of another resolution proposed by Mr. Bayard thereupon which had also been so disposed of, the amount of which resolution was an approbation of the conduct of the executive in his proceeding on that subject, proposed the following resolutions: "Resolved, that it appears to the house that a person calling himself Jonathan Robbins, and claiming to be a citizen of the United States, impressed on board a British ship of war, was committed for trial in one of the courts of the United States for the alleged crime of piracy and murder, committed on the high seas, on board the British frigate Hermione. That a requisition being subsequent to such commitment, made by the British minister to the executive of the United States for the delivery of the said person (under the name of Thomas Nash) as a fugitive, under the 27th article of the treaty with Great Britain, the president of the United States did, by a letter written from the department of state to the judge who committed the said person for trial, officially declare his opinion to the said judge that he 'considered an offence committed on board a public ship of war to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to whom the ship belongs,' and in consequence of such opinion and instruction, did advise and request the said judge to deliver up the person so claimed to the agent of Great Britain, who should appear to receive him, provided only, that the stipulated evidence of his criminality should be produced. That in compliance with such advice and request of the president of the United States, the said person so committed for trial, was, by the judge of the district of South Carolina, without any presentment or trial by jury, or any investigation of his claim to be a citizen of the United States, delivered up to an officer of his Britannic majesty, and afterwards tried and executed on a charge of mutiny and murder. Resolved, that inasmuch as the constitution of the United States declares that the judiciary power shall extend to all questions arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and also that the trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment) shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the state where such crimes shall have been committed, but when not committed within any state, then, at such place or places as congress may by law have directed; and inasmuch as it is directed by law, that the offence of murder committed on the high seas shall be deemed to be piracy and murder, and that 'all crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought.' Therefore, the several questions, whether the aforesaid crime of piracy or murder was committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain; whether it comes within the purview of the said 27th article; and whether a person stating that he was an American citizen, and had committed the act of which he was accused in attempting to regain his liberty from illegal imprisonment, ought to be delivered up without investigation as to his citizenship, or inquiry into the facts alleged in his defence, are all matters exclusively of judicial inquiry, as arising from treaties, laws, constitutional provisions, and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. That the decision of those questions by the president of the United States, against the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in a case where those courts have already assumed and exercised jurisdiction; and his advice and request to the judge of the district court, that the said person thus charged should be delivered up, provided only, such evidence of his criminality should be produced as would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, are a dangerous interference of the executive with judicial decisions; and that the compliance with such advice and request on the part of the judge of the district court of South Carolina, is a sacrifice of the constitutional independence of the judicial power, and exposes the administration thereof to suspicion and reproach."

The question of a reference to a committee of the whole was taken and carried: ayes, 55.

Tuesday, February 25th.

The house having resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on the message of the president respecting Jonathan Robbins, Mr. Edmond was called to the chair. A short debate took place, whether the committee should take up the business of the resolution first proposed by Mr. Bayard, or on those subsequently offered by Mr. Livingston. Mr. Bayard seemed inclined to withdraw his motion, but the committee seeming of opinion that both resolutions were within their jurisdiction, and that they might proceed on either, the question was taken whether the committee should proceed on the resolution of Mr. Livingston, and carried in the affirmative. Messrs. Bayard, Rutledge, Otis, &c., voting in favour of the question; and, Messrs. Livingston, Nicholas, &c., voting against it. Mr. Livingston entered upon an argument in support of the resolutions which he had some days before submitted to the house, and which now were taken up. Soon after he began the discussion he was proceeding to read a deposition of Jonathan Robbins, and certificates accompanying the same, to prove himself a citizen of the United States, in which the deponent swore, before the court of South Carolina, that he was born at Danbury, in the state of Connecticut, and that he was impressed from on board the American brig Betsey, by the crew of the British frigate about two years before, where he was detained, contrary to his will, until the mutiny occurred: when Mr. Bayard opposed the reference to a fact so incompetently authenticated as the report of a case upon newspaper testimony, especially when, if it had been the desire of the gentlemen to have introduced it as evidence, it was extremely easy to have procured the record of the court before he proceeded on his allegations. If such evidence as this was to be admitted, other, and perhaps more important, might next be introduced to oppose upon the committee. Besides, it certainly must be looked upon as ex parte evidence, which it was impossible to repel. Mr. B. submitted to the house, whether it could be in order to admit any such evidence to support the resolutions when all the documents which had been asked for, and which had come to the knowledge of the executive, had been admitted to the house. Mr. Gallatin, on the question of order, contended for the admission. This document, he said, was referred to as authentic, in his letter. That, by the proceedings before the judge (Bee), as they have been published, it appears that a seaman named Thomas Nash, did assume the name of Jonathan Robbins and make oath that he was a native of the state of Connecticut, &c. Certainly it cannot be improper to refer to the identical document there mentioned. If it was proper for the secretary of state to make the allusion, the house could take it up under the same idea. He did not think it was introduced as evidence before the committee. Mr. Dana said he was very sorry the gentleman had been interrupted; he could not think of admitting it as evidence, but the gentleman might read it as part of his speech, which perhaps might otherwise have a chasm in it. Mr. Bayard was fully of opinion with the mover of these resolutions, that it was a very serious business; he believed that there was a very serious object in view. He believed the affidavit was introduced as evidence, also why should the gentleman have taken this in the rotation, after he had been stating the facts contained in the message.

It was further said that this deposition was referred to by the secretary. Surely then it was introduced as evidence upon that authority, but how had the gentleman been assured that this was the same deposition, an extract of which was taken by the secretary? Did it follow that because the secretary referred to a printed paper, that this was the authentic one? He presumed no gentleman would vouch for the veracity of this paper. The secretary had only extracts from the document of such parts as he deemed necessary for the information of the house, supposing this was the case meant. Mr. Nicholas was surprised that the gentleman should oppose the reading of what he supposed the secretary had authenticated copies of in his office; the secretary had certainly referred to an authenticated affidavit which was published, and it was presumable this was the one. The result of this declaration must be, if the gentleman thinks the house is imposed upon by a reference to a false paper, that the committee must rise, and the house ask for the authentic copies, which may aid their decision. But, Mr. Nicholas thought the information was sufficiently authentic; the house had asked the papers of the president, some papers were sent, and instead of sending this original paper, he had referred to the printed report. This had never been contradicted, and had every appearance of authenticity. He really hoped that the objection would not be insisted on, and the discussion arrested in this stage. Mr. Rutledge hoped the paper might be read, but not for the purpose for which it was introduced; he wished it as part of the gentleman's speech, but he did not think this was the proper time; he did not think the gentleman was come to that chasm in his speech which was supposed by the gentleman from Connecticut. The gentleman had produced facts and stated evidence, among which he was proceeding to introduce this paper. Mr. Rutledge said he was willing to procure all the information, and that other gentlemen should also be possessed of it, on which account, when the subject was first mentioned, he moved its reference to a select committee; in that case, all the facts and every necessary light would have been procured, but it was referred to a committee of the whole. Mr. Sedgwick (as speaker), thought as this was merely a question of order, and as the acts and deliberations of the committee of the whole were prescribed, it could only have been proper to have made it an act of the house. The committee of the whole, he said, were limited to the documents referred to it by the house, and if they found them insufficient, it was their duty to rise and go to the house for more. If it was the intention of the gentleman to read this as evidence, (which we must suppose was intended,) and it was not evidence, it might shed darkness, but it could not illuminate. He was surprised, that gentlemen, who were sitting there in their inquisitorial capacity, should bring forth charges of a serious nature against two officers, of high confidence, and, deservedly so in the public opinion, upon evidence which cannot be deemed authority, when, for merely asking, they could receive that which was authentic. Mr. S. said, he was not afraid of the reading of any papers whatever, on any subject, because he must possess a desire to come at the whole truth. "If there be a man," said he, "who possesses the public confidence unworthily, strip him of that confidence and his power too, but do it not, sir, on bare newspaper publication." Mr. S. said, that his reasons for opposing the reading were, not because that paper was deficient of that formality which courts of justice require; he should, therefore, waive formalities, except the evidence should appear evidently false. But the deposition itself he believed to be perfectly irrelevant to the object of inquiry. It was not, in his opinion, material whether this man claimed to be an American citizen or not, nor was it material whether the paper under question was in the office or not; he thought the only inquiry to be, whether the president had interfered with the judicial authority or not; and, whether the judge had been guilty of a breach of his duty, in obeying the orders given him by the executive of the United States. There were, to be sure, allusions made to a printed trial, but it was by the secretary of state, and not by the president; he had said no such thing, and therefore he was not culpable. The only thing which he believed the president considered was, what must appear a very clear and well ascertained fact, to wit: that a ship or vessel, of any power, was to be considered as the jurisdiction of that power to whom it belongs, and not whether the man was an American citizen or not. Mr. Livingston said, he did wish to read this paper as part of his speech, and he believed it a very material part, because it was a justification of a point which he wished to establish. He wished to show the committee, that Jonathan Robbins claimed to be an American citizen, and that he said he was impressed; this he swore in court, and that he did so he hoped would be admitted. He said he only introduced it with this view. Surely he could not be so far mistaken in his law knowledge as to be thought to have said, that the culprit could be evidence in his own behalf. If he did say he was a citizen, then the matter, upon examination, must appear more serious than gentlemen would be willing to think. "Did the speaker think it was his desire," Mr. Livingston asked, "to criminate the man who stood so deservedly high in the public estimation?" Surely the mere reading of this paper could not contribute to that crimination, since it was with the other papers, furnished to the house, as documents which were asked for by the house. The house received their papers (this among others, for to this the secretary referred the house) to assist them in forming their judgment. If "newspaper evidence" was given to the house, if unauthenticated affidavits, who then was to blame? The house asked for all papers relative to the subject, the president furnished this, and therefore, if any blame attached, it must be to him.

It was said, that this paper was in the office of the secretary of state; that this was not an act of the president, that this was a report of the secretary of state, and that he only was answerable for it. "Sir," said Mr. L., "when the president says, that he, in conformity to the request of the house, had ordered the secretary to bring him the papers, and that he submits them to the house for their consideration, does he not take the act off the secretary and appropriate it to himself? Certainly he does. The conduct of the gentlemen must appear a little strange when it is considered that a part of these papers, such as certain affidavits from Connecticut, that Robbins was not born there, and a letter from the British admiral in the West Indies, stating that he was an Irishman, and entered into the service,—I say it is unaccountable that gentlemen are willing to admit this part of the report, which was never required by the house, and refuse another part which was, and of which it was the duty of the house to be informed, if information could be had. Information is had, but it must not be admitted! Sir, this is to be considered as an act of the president. It is to be considered that this affidavit is quoted and ought to be wholly read, since it is the part upon which we are to proceed to the investigation."

Mr. Bayard had no doubt but it was the gentleman's intention to impress the force of the facts contained in that paper, upon the minds of that committee; and, to suppose it would have no impression, would be absurd. It would afterwards be said that this man was admitted to be an impressed American citizen, and that he was praiseworthy in committing what would then be called the homicide. The decision of the committee would be much affected, he said, by the kind of evidence which was alleged. If this was admitted, it would be impossible to ascertain the extent of the principle. Other depositions may be produced; indeed, he had no doubt but the gentleman could get proof to any point which he might think it material to ascertain. In saying this, he did not mean to insinuate that any improper steps would be taken by that gentleman, but there were volunteers enough to be found who would step forward, in order to answer party purpose, and make oath of anything. But what the gentleman had now acknowledged, his reference to that paper was a work of supererogation; he now said, that he only wanted to prove that the man claimed to be an impressed American citizen. This is admitted in the letter of the secretary of state—"Sir," said Mr. B., "you are about to inculpate the conduct of the president, and of the district judge of South Carolina; and to do this, shall you do it on the affidavit of a man at the hazard of his life; and a man who could commit murder and piracy, for which he was then going to be executed? It was the last resource of the wretch himself." Mr. B. had no doubt, but the gentleman would have brought that paper as evidence, and though derived from the vilest possible source, he would certainly have turned it to serve his point. With this idea, and for the sake of consistency, (for the rules of the house would admit in any other part of the examination, what was now admitted,) and viewing the principle injurious, he had thought it his duty to put a stop to it in time. Mr. Livingston supposed he should increase the astonishment of gentlemen still more, when he declared, that he did not believe a word of the affidavit, but he believed Nash was an Irishman, and that he entered on board and committed all the crimes charged to him. It was clear that the affidavit could not be evidence. In admitting this, he believed he did not surrender one point of the resolutions; he should prove that all he wished to ascertain was that such a claim was made to the court. Mr. Gallatin did not consider the question to be, whether this should be considered as evidence, but whether the gentleman might be permitted to read the paper—whether as part of his speech or whatsoever. It was certainly no legal evidence, and therefore if a trial was holding, or if the ground was an impeachment, refusal would be proper; but upon what ground the gentleman was interrupted at this time was inconceivable, except it was to throw all possible impediments in the way of the investigation. The letter from the British admiral to the British consul was not legal evidence, but yet that was inserted in the report of the executive, that was sent no doubt to disprove some fact which was related. What was that fact? Why, that this man had laid claim to citizenship; and surely, while the gentleman was stating the facts contained in his resolutions, he had a right to elucidate that fact by reading a paper so intimately acquainted therewith. Mr. G. said, he did not know what use the gentleman made of this paper, but it is certainly proper to hear what he intended by the reference, before he ought to have been stopped. There certainly could be no doubt, Mr G. thought, that the secretary of state knew this affidavit to be authoritative, by the reference he made to it. If this paper could not be read for himself, he should wish to procure further information, before he should think it proper to proceed. Mr. Bayard asked, where could be the necessity of proving a fact which every member of the house was willing to admit? No man but would acknowledge that Nash claimed to be an American citizen; but perhaps the will of the gentleman was to have additional light on this subject, on which account he introduced the deposition. Mr. B. said, he was willing only to proceed upon what the house knew from the documents before them, and not take a step on precarious ground. It must be well known what the gentleman wanted to get this admission for: he no doubt wished to prove that upon his own mere suggestion, that he was an American citizen, and that he was impressed, he was entitled to a trial by jury in this country, and on that account, that the act of sending him away was unconstitutional. This would lead to an extensive field of argument. If there was any necessity for more evidence, or to call witnesses to the bar of the house, let proper measures be taken to procure it, but let it not come forward in any other way. Mr. Dana read the resolution first offered to the house for a call of papers relative to Jonathan Robbins.—This was answered, he said, by the secretary of state, that no requisition or proceedings had been had in that name, but he presumed allusion was made to the case of Thomas Nash, concerning whom proceedings were had in the district court of South Carolina in that way, and that only the secretary made reference to the printed report. In this blundering way, Mr. Dana said, the business was begun. (He was called to order.)—In addition to this, he said the proceedings of gentlemen were erroneous, but notwithstanding that, Mr. D. said he would gratify the wish of the gentleman as far as his vote would go, to read it, but only as part of his speech; no doubt he wished to support some point of his argument by it, and in that view he had a right to read it; but that it was evidence, he denied. General Lee said, he did not profess to understand the rules of the house perfectly, but he must indulge a presumption, that they could have but one grand object in view, to encourage and maintain full and fair discussion, on every subject, whatever it might be, that could come before the house. That being necessary, surely a rule must be bad, indeed, that would bar a gentleman from reading anything that might tend to elucidate the subject. He therefore, thought it the duty of the committee to allow the gentleman from New York to read this, and every other paper which might enable him to proceed on so serious a charge as the one exhibited in the resolutions. Were not gentlemen fully adequate to judge what may be wrong, when he should come to the application? If he asked the papers of the president of the United States, was he to be content with those only which should come through his ministers? That could not be the true ground of proceeding. Suppose the gentleman be stopped from reading what he thinks material, and the resolutions which he has introduced should afterwards be negatived; "I pray you to say, sir," said Mr. Lee, "what would be the consequence? Would not the people say that no other possible decision could be had by the house, because the committee of the whole laid their hand upon every effort the gentleman used to substantiate his charges? They certainly will, and no act can more increase the means of the opposition to the measures of the government." Upon this ground he hoped the gentleman would be permitted to proceed, and the whole truth be made to appear. If gentlemen should determine it out of order, he would move that the committee rise in order to get hold of all the authentic papers.

The chairman having stated his reasons, concluded with an opinion that the member could not proceed to read the affidavit.

Mr. Gallatin appealed to the committee from the decision of the chair, when there appeared 39 in favour of the decision, and 48 against it.

Wednesday, Feb. 26th.

Mr. Davis moved, that the committee of the whole house be discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions proposed by Mr. Livingston and Mr. Bayard on the subject of Jonathan Robbins. The small progress, Mr. G. said, which was made yesterday in the discussion, fully convinced his mind that nothing at all would be done in it; besides, were he convinced that the discussion would be impartially conducted, he did not know of any possible good that could arise from the adoption of the resolutions. If there had been any error in the proceedings of the executive, he conceived that error would correct itself. If there was an improper interference, he was certain it could not have arisen from improper motives, and therefore he sincerely hoped he should not be called upon to give an opinion on the subject. Nor, on the other hand, was he at all prepared to compliment the executive, or any officer of the government, for having done what he thought to be right. If he had done right, it was his duty. He did not think it of any great importance, but most assuredly, if the argument was extended, it would be made a case of great importance. It was better, however, to let the case of Jonathan Robbins sleep in the committee of the whole, where it was. He was not prepared to criminate, nor was he prepared to applaud. Mr. D. did not think the evidence before the house was sufficient to form a decision upon, and he professed himself unable to make up a determinate opinion; but if he could form any, the deficiency of evidence furnished must raise his suspicion. Reference was yesterday made to a paper; it might be authentic or it might not: it was impossible to say to what papers gentlemen might be disposed to refer, and for gentlemen to sit there as judges having papers read the authenticity of which it was impossible to know, was to judge in the dark. He hoped that if the house were not prepared to discharge the committee of the whole, they at least were for a call for such authentic papers as could be procured, for from the present documents it was impossible to form a correct judgment upon this very disagreeable and irksome business. He had no doubt but many gentlemen had formed their judgments one way or the other, but he had not. Mr. Randolph said that no gentleman had a higher respect for the motives of the gentleman from Kentucky than himself; but however disagreeable it might be, he must differ from him in his present opinion. He really hoped the gentleman would reconsider the motion he had made, and not stop the gentleman from New York in this early stage of the business. If there were any defects in the papers, and their authenticity was questionable, it must not arise from the gentleman from New York, but from those whose duty it was to furnish all the facts relative to the business. He was obliged to read a printed paper, because those with whom the authoritative copies are, have not thought proper to furnish the house with them. He hoped, if a stop was put to the proceedings, it would not be to discharge the committee, but to call for authentic copies of all the papers within reach of the government. It must be acknowledged that the man whose case the house are considering, did put in his claims to citizenship, and the protection of his country on that account. If that acknowledgment is refused on account of the paper which has been produced being a newspaper, reference must be made to what is within reach of the house—more authentic papers. The gentleman had supposed that most of the members had made up their minds on the business without other papers; where he procured that information, Mr. R. could not tell; but certain it was that his mind was not made up; he professed to be still in a state of incertitude; he therefore was sorry the gentleman had not made his motion until it would be known by the house whether the gentleman from New York had any further evidence to adduce. Could he undertake to say that his mind would not be made up, and the subject appear to him in a very different point of view after a full and fair discussion? Mr. R. thought the very reason which the gentleman had given for his motion would operate as a strong argument against it; with him it certainly had that impression; he thought a discussion was more proper to remove incertitude from the mind, than that, because such a state existed, the committee should be discharged. The public mind, he believed, was very uneasy on the subject, and this inquiry should not be eluded; he therefore ought to have withheld his motion, that a discussion might be had from which the people could draw their deductions. If, after all the evidence that was to be produced, he could draw a conclusion similar to that expressed by the gentleman, Mr. R. said he would cordially join with him, that no expression ought to be made by the house without being well supported by facts. General Lee considered the motion would have the complete effect any gentleman could wish whose desire it was to reprobate the conduct of the administration of our government. How could the motion be necessary—how useful? "If they were to ask more evidence," said Mr. Lee, "I would vote for it to be produced; they have brought the subject before the house; let us see it in the purest colours which it can be placed in. We are ready to meet them here; we are willing that they have every evidence that can be obtained to elucidate their charge, but let not the executive be hung up to reproach without a trial; let not suspicion be encouraged, which must have all the effects of a substantial charge. I wish them to go on with the discussion, that all truth may be disclosed, and every fair light be given which the case will bear, for now the people of the United States have their eyes fixed upon our proceedings on this important question." Mr. Macon was in favour of the motion; if the committee of the whole was not to be discharged, he hoped at least the business would be postponed till the public business of the session was over; there were many public bills, he said, that must be passed. The house was called upon to judge with almost no testimony, and yet upon this uncertain ground, perhaps a whole week might be spent of the most precious time of the house, for if the house was to rise at the time proposed, the loss of this time would certainly be felt. As to the impression it would leave on the minds of the people, they had as many facts to judge from as the house, and they certainly would form an opinion whether the house did so or not. Gentlemen were very much mistaken, he said, if they undertook to lead the people; they would think, and they would show what their judgment was when a proper time came for that purpose. The time the people would take to show their approbation or disapprobation of the measures of the administration, was at elections, and then they would do it. Gen. Smith said if the object of the motion was to get better testimony, he thought it a very proper one; the house certainly ought to be possessed of the documents of the district court of South Carolina, on this case, in an authentic form, and not from newspaper information. He professed himself to be in the precise situation of the mover, and if called upon to vote without more evidence, should be at a loss to know how to vote. Mr. Dana was against the postponement or the rising of the committee. It was to be recollected that the business had assumed its present shape only in consequence of the zeal of the gentleman from New York and his coadjutors, to censure the executive. On the 7th of February it was committed to the whole house; contrary to the opinion of a number of gentlemen who wished the facts investigated by a select committee, thirteen days then elapsed before he had prepared his resolutions—resolutions not calculated to make an inquiry into the conduct of the executive, but expressive of the most pungent censure upon its conduct. These resolutions were produced upon the papers which, at the desire of those gentlemen, were submitted to the house. The only question then is, do the papers upon which those resolutions are based, warrant the censure contained in them, or not? It certainly would be a high reproach to the very idea of a public inquisition to admit more evidence upon those grounds. Still, however, let gentlemen go on in their heterogeneous proceeding; the house would have the wisdom justly to appreciate the various attempts made to clear themselves of a predicament in which their over-arduous attempts to censure had thrown them.

Gen. Shepherd thought the best way would be to let the resolutions take their course; they must be debated sooner or later, and the sooner it was got rid of, the better. He was sorry they had ever been introduced in the house, but as they were, he hoped no postponement would take place.

Mr. Livingston conceived it his duty to answer the observations of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Dana), as to the resolutions being founded upon the facts then before the House. He did not think the facts were precisely sufficient to warrant every idea contained in the resolutions. When the original call for papers was passed by the house, he hoped that something more authentic than newspaper testimony would have been referred to by the executive, and upon that he was called to act, if at all.

"The gentleman had further said that my zeal," said Mr. L., "and that of my coadjutors, to censure the executive, has brought us into this situation. Who, sir, I would ask the gentlemen are my coadjutors? That gentleman himself was my coadjutor, and every gentleman in the house, because the resolution was adopted: the house directed the inquiry and every gentleman must therefore take the burthen in part with me. It was upon the suggestion of the notoriety of the facts that the inquiry was made, and now we are about to enter into the inquiry upon the facts with which we are furnished. We never can act but upon the evidence we have to guide that action; if the facts contained in the resolutions cannot be substantiated, if they shall fail to justify the conclusions we mean to draw from them, we certainly cannot be worthy of blame for not possessing more." "I consider the affidavit yesterday produced," said Mr. L., "as only supporting one branch of the conclusion that may be drawn from the whole. Whatever gentlemen may think as to the folly or hasty zeal of the resolutions, I can assure them that they are the results of many days' most serious reflection; they were not drawn in haste, and I am not afraid to say that they can be well substantiated—every fact contained in them. I am sufficiently prepared to proceed, and therefore hope this motion may be negatived, and a calm and deliberate investigation be had. If the deductions I shall make will not be satisfactory, then let it drop: I am, however, well satisfied of their force." Mr. Craik said that very early in this business he thought the house were entering into it very improperly, either having nothing at all to do with it, or else taking wrong measures; if they had, he thought then, and was yet of opinion, that if the object was to impeach the president, measures ought to have been taken accordingly. He never did look upon the house of representatives as having either the power to censure or to approbate the conduct of the executive, and therefore equally disapproved the resolutions of the gentlemen from New York and Delaware; and upon that ground he felt strongly inclined to vote with the gentleman from Kentucky for giving the whole business the go-by, and getting clear of it by any possible means.

The motion being to discharge the committee of the whole from both questions, was giving an opinion upon neither one nor the other, and therefore it could not be received as a censure agreeably to the apprehensions of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Lee.) Mr. C. believed the people of the United States were too wise and too intelligent to form unjust conclusions upon the conduct of the house on this subject. They had the whole subject before them, they could judge, and they had a right to do it, but the house had not, except the avowed object of impeachment, which was not the case; the house had nothing to do with it, and therefore they ought not, in this unnecessary way, spend time upon it. Mr. Harper agreed with gentlemen that it would be folly for the house to spend time in useless discussion, which could lead to no decision, but viewing this resolution as he did, he must conclude it of more importance; he thought it the direct road to an impeachment of the president of the United States, and if so, surely it must be important. The resolution declared in express terms, that the executive had exercised unconstitutional powers, one of the most dangerous crimes he could commit; if he had so exercised his power, the inevitable consequence must be that the president of the United States must be impeached by this house. Then how could any gentleman say this was a trifling question, and one with which the house had nothing to do? Certainly no question can be more important. If, as it respected the motion of the gentleman from Delaware, no motion had been made to criminate the executive, he should not think it right to approbate his conduct; he should, in short, have been of an opinion that the house had nothing to do with it, but it having been, he should consider it very disrespectful not to express a sense of the propriety of the executive conduct. He was willing, nay desirous of meeting the charge with all its terrors, and never should shrink from a decision on it. He presumed gentlemen had a meaning in what they did; and if they had any meaning, it must be that the house ought to proceed against the executive. He did not think, however, from the total evidence which appeared, that there was one idea in the resolution but ought to be scouted with disdain from the house. He wished to have an opportunity of showing to the world that the house disdained to look with unconcern at a serious and unfounded charge upon the executive of the United States. He wished to give an opinion upon these charges, and treat them as they merited. Mr. Rutledge regretted that he could not join with his friend from Maryland (Mr. Craik) in thinking this consideration useless; he believed the attention of the people had been called to view this subject, and they were anxiously looking for a decision in some way. Neither did he think with his honourable friend that the house had nothing to do with it because no impeachment could grow out of it. It was impossible to say what the gentleman meditated in his motions, but one thing was certain: if the gentleman had wished to promote an impeachment, he could not have taken a more direct means for it, if the resolutions could be carried. He thought the friends of the administration would act a very unfriendly part towards the administration if they should agree to smother the business at this stage. The minds of the people had been raised to the highest pitch of expectation. They had been told, in certain public prints, that it loudly called for the interference of congress; they had also been told so by an honourable member of the other house that congress must interfere. Attempts having been made to lead the public mind astray, and the house having proceeded so far on resolutions calculated to procure the object it would be extremely wrong not to remove that disquiet by a suitable proceeding. It would not be useless to rescue the executive from the very serious charges which had been thrown on him, and prove to the world that his actions had been consistent. Mr. Kitchell thought no good could arise from the investigation of this subject, because he did not know what was to be done in it, let the decision be what it might. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Harper) wished to have an opportunity of showing that every part of the resolution was built on false ground; every gentleman in the house was not so fond of speaking or of hearing as was that gentleman, and he hoped merely on that account the house would not spend time on what (in his opinion) could not possibly lead to impeachment. What effect could a discussion have but to show the world that there were parties in the house, and to raise a rancorous disposition? He did not know what in the resolution could lead to an impeachment; nor did he know what the house, in their censorial capacity, had to do but to impeach—he believed it equally out of the power of the house to applaud. In short, he did not think they had anything to do with it. Mr. Nicholas hoped the discussion would proceed. Although there might not be sufficient ground on which to impeach the executive, he could not agree that, therefore, no inquiry ought to be made into his conduct; there might be an error in his conduct, and no impeachment be necessary to be raised out of it, and if so it would be extremely wrong to suffer it to go out to the world without a decision after the business had once been taken up by the house. Where there might be no bad intention, or wicked design, the actions might be of a dangerous tendency and proper to be inquired into, in order to express an opinion thereon. Mr. N. said he was well pleased that his opinion, that the motion ought to be negatived, accorded with that of the gentleman of South Carolina, because it would afford him an opportunity of showing what he said he could show. Mr. Bayard had no doubt of the competency of the house either to impeach, to censure, or to approbate the conduct of the executive, and of course both resolutions were within their power.

Several gentlemen had intimated that the authentic evidence, and the whole of the documents were not before the house, and that the executive department was to blame for the deficiency. It appeared that the gentleman himself had forgotten the import of his resolution; it called for such documents as might be in possession of the department of state. Now what could possibly be in possession of that department? The president of the United States had his duties to perform, and the judge of the district his duties; each had their separate documents, and as neither interfered with the other, therefore it could not be expected to be in the power of the president to furnish the papers belonging to the court of South Carolina, any farther than they came within the joint duties of both. Agreeably to treaty the British consul made a requisition for the person; a copy of this and the several letters and instructions were sent to the house, but it was not in the power of the executive to order the judge to furnish him with a record of the proceedings; he was not bound to furnish it if the president had called for it; but the president had not required it, and no doubt had furnished the house with every paper in his possession. The idea in the resolutions being to criminate the judge as well as the executive, Mr. B. thought he ought to have had an opportunity to furnish the papers of his department, and those could and ought to have been called for before his conduct ought to have been so deeply implicated. Mr. Otis said, when first the motion was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, he felt for a moment inclined to lean to it; the motives of that gentleman appeared to be so candid and liberal, that, for the moment, Mr. O. confessed, his feelings got the better of his reason. But a short reflection induced him to change an opinion thus hastily formed, and he felt satisfied that to vote with him would be to display, in the conduct of gentlemen who wished to support the administration of the country, worse than censure. He joined that gentleman in regret that it had gone so far, but certainly it was a subject of the most irritating nature possible—a charge the most serious—a breach of the law by the executive magistrate, who is bound to support it and see it carried into effect—it is certainly a charge of much importance, and however disagreeable it might feel to him, Mr. O. said, he must vote that every argument should be used that could possibly tend to substantiate the charge, that nothing of truth might be hidden.

An insinuation was thrown out that the president had suppressed part of the information which ought to be had on the business. Lest this should take hold of the minds of gentlemen, he would observe that the president, in his message, says: "I have directed the secretary of state to lay before me copies of the papers intended, which I now transmit to congress." If, therefore, there is any blame, it is not attached to the president, but to the department of state; but it does not appear that the secretary of state has any more papers in his possession than those the house are furnished with. This may be inferred from the readiness with which he furnished the papers he has given; he says he has no papers respecting any person of the name of Jonathan Robbins; "but, by the proceedings before that judge (Bee), it appears that a seaman named Thomas Nash, the subject of the British minister's requisition," &c. He having been, therefore, asked for papers relative to Jonathan Robbins, expressed his willingness by furnishing what he supposed was intended. Mr. Otis said he did not know to what points the evidence required by the gentlemen from New York could apply, except it was to that of his being an American citizen, and of his being impressed. An affidavit was produced to prove these facts, but it would be found from an examination of the documents, that nothing relating to those points was in the office of the department of state, for the date of the affidavit of Robbins is the 25th of July, but the order of the secretary of state bears date the 5th of July, so that no papers as to his claim can be in the possession of that department. Mr. Otis thought that the documents before the house contained everything that was important to the point. Admitting the position gentlemen had taken to be true, which he positively denied, but admitting that the president had given an opinion upon a judicial question, it was only as respected the delivery up of the man which was, in fact, an executive duty; but if the evidence should prove insufficient to support the charge exhibited against the executive or the judge, he was certain that the gentleman from New York would rejoice as much as himself, to find the charges unfounded and the character of those gentlemen beyond blame. Mr. Craik was sorry that gentlemen who advocated this motion should be charged with an opposition to the administration of the government; he believed his conduct had heretofore evinced a different line of conduct. He still denied that the mode taken by the resolution could lead to impeachment. It certainly did contain a very great censure, and one which the house had no authority to inflict. Gentlemen had supported their resolutions upon the ground of the necessity of the various departments being kept distinct, but the very object of the resolution was dereliction of that principle, since it exemplified an interference on the part of the house with a judge of the United States and with the executive of the United States. When the house undertook to decide upon executive or judicial acts, and call their conduct into review before them not with a view to impeach but to inflict a severe censure, they certainly interfered with the separate powers of those departments, which in his opinion was setting a very dangerous precedent. He thought it ought not to be in the power of any member to lay such a resolution upon the table, or, if it was laid there, it ought not to be discussed, unless it was found to contain principles over which the house had power; it should not be in the power of any gentleman to call the attention of the house to what could not have any good effect, but might have a very dangerous one. The power of impeachment by the constitution was not a power to inflict any punishment; it was only a power to investigate facts to be tried by another tribunal; the house were not to judge, they were only to charge; but by this proceeding they had taken upon them to consider the propriety of punishing as well as charging, for most assuredly to censure, to injure a man's character, must operate as a punishment. Mr. Gallatin considered the motion to be grounded on two ideas, one that there was not sufficient foundation for the house to act upon, and therefore that it was necessary to discharge the committee, or postpone the subject for want of further evidence. It is clear, said Mr. G., that the evidence is not sufficient to impeach the district judge of South Carolina. If an impeachment of him was the object, it would be impossible to carry it forward without an authoritative copy of the record of the court; but if there was no intention to impeach, he did not think there was any material evidence wanted in order to decide upon the resolution, since it only meant an implication of censure upon the executive and the district judge, and not impeachment. The only business being to consider of the propriety or impropriety of censuring or approving the conduct of the president and the judge, all the material facts were before the house. If any censure was due to the president, it was on account of the opinion and advice he expressed by his letter to Judge Bee. This letter was before the house, and nothing more could be wanted to base the resolution upon; the fact was sufficient to form a decision upon. There could be but one thing wanting, and that was the original letter of the president to the secretary of state, instructing him what to write to Judge Bee, and this could not be requisite if gentlemen would not say the letter of the secretary perhaps did not contain the precise opinion of the president. If there should be such an objection, he should certainly wish the house to possess the document. However, he concluded that no such objection could be, since a message of the president contained a full acknowledgment of every sentiment contained in that letter. Mr. G. agreed there was at first sight some weight in the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Craik), that the house had only a power to impeach, not to censure; but certainly, when it was considered that an act might be committed without any ill motive, and yet the act be injurious, it cannot be the subject of impeachment, but it might be of censure. The same act committed with a criminal motive would be impeachable, which without it would be of a nature not to admit of it. Again—Mr. G. thought that the house might have no ground whereupon to censure; but they had exercised that power; they had, in a number of cases, approved of the conduct of the president, and if the act of approbation had been done, they surely had as much power to disapprove and censure. As to the irritation that was apprehended from a continuation of the discussion, that consideration would not induce him, Mr. G. said, to vote with the gentleman from Kentucky: if there was any irritation to be apprehended, it must come from those gentlemen who denominated themselves exclusive friends of the administration; from those who presumed to arraign all the measures of their opponents, and who declared, that they were disposed to support not only that measure, but every measure of the administration. A number of very improper epithets had been thrown out as it respected the resolution, and certainly the distinction must be considered very narrow between those resolutions and the supporters of them; but it was too frequent for those great supporters of the administration to use high tones, and if they chose to do so, let them. Mr. G. said he was not afraid of any inquiry accruing from the high ground they had assumed to themselves.

The question was then taken on the motion to discharge the committee of the whole from the further consideration, and negatived: nays, 76; yeas, 14; majority against the motion, 62. Those who voted in the minority were, Messrs. Baily, Condit, Craik, Davis, Dent. Dickson, Freeman, Goode, Grove, Kitchell, Linn, Macon, Pinckney, and S. Smith.

Thursday, Feb. 27th, 1800.

Mr. Davis said, as the house had yesterday thought proper to negative a proposition to discharge the committee of the whole from the farther consideration of the business, and, as one great motive for that motion was the incompetency of evidence before the house, and as he knew it was in the power of the house to procure that evidence by a proper application, he hoped gentlemen would now indulge him in the adoption of the following, which he moved, viz.: "Resolved — that the president of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before this house a copy of the proceedings of the court held in the district of South Carolina, in the case of Thomas Nash, calling himself Jonathan Robbins." Mr. Bayard said, if he was persuaded, or if the gentleman could convince him that there was any particular evidence in the hands of any officer that would tend to throw such light as to give the least explanation of the case, he certainly would be willing to accord with the resolution; but he believed every necessary fact was before the house, and this had been acknowledged by several gentlemen. If the object was to prove that Nash was an American citizen, and that he was impressed, that could not be necessary as it respected the resolutions of the gentleman from New York, for that gentleman himself had acknowledged that he believed no such thing, but that the whole claim was a falsehood. Would the gentleman then inform the house what point he wished to ascertain, or in what he expected additional proof? He wished information farther: Who was the "proper officer" to whom reference was expected to be made? There are but two officers at all in view, one is the secretary of state, the other is the district judge of South Carolina; the gentleman could not suppose that the judge would be able to transmit the records of that court previous to the adjournment of the house; and if it could be obtained, no evidence to the point could be expected from him. If on the other hand it was meant to call on the secretary of state, it was not to be expected, from the nature of the case, that any more documents were in his hands than those already furnished; he had given copies of the correspondence and requisition, which might be fairly inferred, from the nature of his office, was all of which he could be possessed. But if any gentleman doubted this fact, he could apply at the office of the secretary of state, from whom he could procure whatever was in his possession. If it was the intention of the house to close this very disagreeable business in the present session, they must negative the resolution, and let the discussion go forward. The gentleman who brought forward the resolution ought to have been provided with every document that was necessary to support the charges, before he suffered them to appear. However, he did not think but the gentleman who proposed the resolutions thought his grounds were quite sufficient to support them. General Smith was in favour of the resolution. He considered himself as filling the character of judge of the case, and as such he was inclined to think, from the documents which were laid before the house, that there were other papers which were not yet brought forward relative to the judicial proceedings of South Carolina, that would have a considerable effect on his vote. He said there was a paper, which he had seen published, which ought, in his opinion, to be in possession of the house; he meant that wherein Robbins swore he was an American citizen, and as a proof of it produced before the court a notarial certificate of New York, the date of which went to corroborate the fact. He also swore he was impressed. If this certificate was before the house, gentlemen would be able to compare the date of it with the declaration made by Admiral Parker, and perhaps that comparison might produce conviction some way or other. These he thought very important, if it was desirous to prove the man an American citizen. This was certainly the duty of the judge to ascertain, but it did not appear whether he paid attention to it or not. Mr. S. declared he should be at a loss to go forward in the business without these papers, if he was to decide upon the whole truth. Mr. Nicholas said he always believed that the testimony was incomplete; but when he heard a gentleman get up and mention particular testimony which he considered so important that without it he should not know how to vote, whatever, Mr. N. said, might have been his former satisfaction as to the establishment of the points, he certainly must now be inclined to grant gentlemen every point of evidence that they should think necessary, if within reach of the house.

One particular piece of testimony had been mentioned, viz: that the man filed an affidavit that he was an American citizen, and he was impressed on a British man-of-war. Could any gentleman pretend to say that no inferences might be drawn from this source and the concomitant facts? The gentleman from New York, to be sure, had declared his satisfaction with the facts that had been produced to the house, but did the gentleman from Delaware know that this was the case with any other gentleman in the house? That gentleman's conclusions and impressions were not to be taken as the opinions of others, nor were others obliged to be satisfied because he was; and, therefore, to couple others in a measure to which they were not privy, and to ascribe opinions to them which they had not expressed, was at least unfair. Some gentlemen might feel satisfied with what came out since this unfortunate man's death, but that could be no rule for others. As to this part of the papers, Mr. Nicholas could by no means understand or conceive for what they were collected and sent to the house, except indeed it was to quiet the minds of some gentlemen who thought that the measures of the government were too precipitate, in their having judged the case without proof. That certificates should be collected respecting this man after his death, and when he could not possibly appear to contradict it, or to adduce contrary evidence, was an insult to the common understanding. Suppose this man had claimed to be an American citizen, and the government had known it, he would ask gentlemen how they would justify an act done when no such evidence was known to exist as was now presented from Connecticut. What does it amount to but that there is a chasm in this business which wants to be supplied? It might be supplied to the satisfaction of some gentlemen, Mr. Nicholas said, but it was by no means so to his. Suppose, as was observed before, the certificates had proved the man to be an American, what could gentlemen have then said? From the present state of information, every gentleman must acknowledge it a matter of doubt, and being so, it ought to have been searched into; this doubt might probably be removed by a reference; but the record of the court would prove another thing, and one which the gentleman who moved the resolutions expressed his intention to dwell much upon, that is, whether the judge had caused him to be arrested, and intended him for trial in the circuit court of the United States; and whether the judge had taken upon him to supersede, not his own jurisdiction, but that of the court over which he presided, in the delivery of this man to the British agent. For his part, Mr. Nicholas said, he had no doubt of the jurisdiction of the United States upon this man's trial, and that it was a departure from justice to deliver him up to a foreign tribunal.

Upon a review of these reasons, he must conclude that more evidence ought to be had, if more evidence could enable the house to make a better investigation, and more was attainable; for, although the gentleman from New York thought the business ripe for discussion, he could not say it was, and therefore thought it his duty to vote for the motion. Mr. Otis said he should not, for himself have the smallest hesitation, if that resolution pointed to a particular object, or to a particular officer, who might be under the direction of the president, to agree to it. If the gentleman would modify his motion, so that the president of the United States might be directed to instruct the secretary of state, to lay before the house those papers, he should not vote against it. But he thought it his duty to declare that the secretary of state had received no further authentic or other transcript than he had furnished to the house, of the judicial proceedings on this subject. Mr. O. said he had received this information from the secretary of state in answer to an inquiry of that officer, whether he had any such documents. But in the present form of the resolution, he could not agree to it. If the motion was adopted, the question would be who was the "proper officer?" Even if it was to be some officer under the direction of the president, the president had already furnished the house with every paper within his power. If the "proper officer" meant, was the judge of South Carolina, Mr. Otis would say that the executive could not with propriety furnish it, because it would be to all intents an interference with the judiciary department. He did not think that the president had any right to demand the documents of that court. He thought the house were fully competent to send to that district judge, ordering him to lay before them all the papers they should think necessary; but then the question should be, were the house ready to consent that the proceeding should be postponed until such an application should be made, or, in short, till the conclusion of the session? Besides, to ask for documents which would be made use of in a way injurious both to the executive and to the judge, was a measure which gentlemen who supported the resolutions of the gentleman of New York, could have no right to expect from gentlemen who could perceive nothing improper in their conduct. If then it be true, of which Mr. Otis thought there could be but little doubt, that the judicial proceedings of that court were never before the executive, whether the judge had done wrong or not, he, and he only, would have to answer, and not the president. The conduct of the president grew out of the proceedings of the court; where, then, could be the propriety or justice of having up the president in effigy, and there suspend him until the next session of congress, subject to the thousand alarms, surmises and reproaches of the people, which must carry with it the whole object of the censure! Every man might have had access to those papers; the judge never would have refused any man a copy of all the proceedings that might tend to elucidate a subject which they may think was deficient without it. An honourable gentleman had lately written a pamphlet on the subject; he might have produced the proceedings of that court, if he had thought them of any service, and so might the gentleman from New York. Should, then, the proceedings on this business be suspended merely for the want of evidence, which it was in the power of every gentleman to have brought forward? Gentlemen had with very great deliberation brought forward this accusation before the house—if it was in the power of every gentleman to refer to new evidence at every stage of the business, after the accusation was grounded only on the documents before the house, the evident effect must be to procrastinate beyond all bounds, a business, which the honour of our government requires should be immediately decided. In justice, therefore, to the president, he conceived himself bound to vote against the resolution. Mr. Dana thought this a most extraordinary resolution, indeed. Was the president of the United States the clerk of that court, to keep the records of it? What had the president of the United States to do with that court? It was certainly a total departure from all the forms of judicial proceedings to suppose a thing of the kind. The gentlemen must certainly have mistaken the situation held by the president, or they never would have made so vast a departure from all the forms of judicial proceedings to suppose a thing of the kind. The gentlemen must certainly have mistaken the situation held by the president, or they would never have made such a vast departure from order and propriety of proceeding. The president is not the public accuser—he is not to be called upon for papers with which he has nothing to do. When he found gentlemen outraging everything that belonged to judicial propriety; when he found them stumbling into error after error, and departing totally from all jurisprudential propriety, Mr. Dana said he could not avoid rising to oppose it. So much for the form: he believed it totally wrong, and therefore could not be adopted. But in addition to this, the house would render themselves more ridiculous than they now appeared by the adoption of measures which must make a matter appear important, that in itself was unimportant. Several gentlemen proceeded with the same zeal as though an American citizen was concerned. This was not the case; it was notorious to every man that this Nash was a foreigner; of this the house were fully apprised by respectable testimony. This man contended that he was born at Danbury, but the certificates of the clerk who kept the registers for a number of years back, to whom the annual list of all the births was transmitted and by him registered; and also the certificates of a number of old residents in that town, had incontestably proved that this man was never an inhabitant of that town. He was an Irishman—let any man from Ireland, whatever, declare that he is an American of Connecticut, in vain would he be able to impose that opinion upon the mind of any man who observes his speech; it is entirely impossible to suppose that an intelligent court could be so imposed upon. The fact of country being incontestably proved, how can gentlemen be so earnest in the face of that fact, to charge the executive with any improper influence? Could the gentleman be ignorant how many men who were aliens had taken advantage of the certificates granted to Americans, and as Americans, had procured certificates from a magistrate in attestation of their false oaths? Any gentleman who believed that possible, might account for his having procured an American certificate. Mr. Livingston said he did hope that this motion would not have been brought forward, but as he meant to vote in favour of it, after having declared his satisfaction with the documents, as sufficient to support his resolutions, he should now give his reasons, and lest he should be accused of a desire to keep alive a calumny against the president of the United States, an effect which had been stated, he took opportunity to answer the insinuation by saying that he as much abhorred so mean a principle as any gentleman in the house. Mr. L. said he would again declare that the evidence was sufficient to satisfy his mind upon the points he meant to establish, but that should not preclude other gentlemen from thinking other papers necessary; papers which he must acknowledge would throw an additional light on the subject. Though he thought the message contained all the facts absolutely necessary to establish the points he proposed to dwell on, yet it certainly did not contain all that was asked for, and what they had no right to send, was given. The resolution, Mr. L. said, asked for all the papers relative to the delivery of Jonathan Robbins. We are told that they are not in the office of the secretary of state; the president must know whether they can be procured, and he has it in his power to procure them: they may be in the hands of the district judge of South Carolina. But the house are told the president cannot procure this record, gentlemen say he has no power over that department, and yet this very president has the power to instruct this very district judge to deliver up the person to the British government! How then can gentlemen presume to say the president has not power to call for the records of the court in a case in which himself has acted a principal part! Again. It was said that neither the president nor the judge had a right to deliver up papers that might lead to their crimination. This was the very reason why the house should require papers that would explain any doubtful parts of their conduct; for this very reason the house should demand, not only the documents, but the reasons for their conduct. The president or the judge can only be able to supply the house with those documents, and if they have been wrong, they ought to be required to furnish them. But, gentlemen, supposing the main reason for inquiring is to ascertain whether Nash was an American citizen, or not, how can it be said that the inquiry was extremely unimportant whether he was or was not? Upon that, Mr. L. said, he did not lay so much stress as some other gentlemen; he believed that it was perfectly immaterial, because he believed that the course of proceeding would be precisely the same, whether he was or was not, and because it appeared that the conduct of the executive, and of the judge, would have been the same in either event. The same might be said as to the impressment. And, therefore, though some trouble had been taken to prove that, in addition to the murder, he had been guilty of perjury, he being proved to the satisfaction of some gentlemen, to be an Irishman, was precisely the same in the case. However it had been, he should have been delivered up. Gentlemen had farther said, that he, Mr. Livingston, ought to have known all these facts before he had formed the resolutions. Mr. L. said he did not think so; as he had before declared, he was possessed of satisfactory facts, but he could not prevent himself giving loose to the desires which other gentlemen had expressed, and therefore should now accord with them in the vote. Mr. Marshall said, it was with no inconsiderable regret that he perceived so much of the time of the house, which ought to be devoted to more beneficial purposes, employed in preliminary discussion; he thought that it was impossible the house could agree to a postponement, which the motion under consideration must cause, when it was reflected how much time must be employed in procuring those papers; it could not take less than a month; for they could only be found, he presumed to say, in the court of the district of South Carolina; it was therefore scarcely to be expected that they could be obtained until just before the rising of the house, a period, if they arrived before the house rose, too unfit for their consideration. He, therefore, considered the question precisely the same in principle, though different in form, to that which yesterday occupied the house. The question he believed essentially to be, would the house postpone the business till the next session? In this light he should treat it; and he could not see how gentlemen who voted against the motion yesterday, could advocate the present. Shall the house merely, because two or three members think such documents are necessary, agree to postpone the business? for if two or three members be indulged on this account, two or three may lay claim to the same right on another account, and thus day after day may be spent, and no determination ever be come to. It is a necessary case in every house, and upon every question; there always will be some few found who will express dissatisfaction at proceedings, and claim some privilege; but this can never operate as a general rule for a session. Gentlemen ought not to request this when the general expression of the case is, that there is enough evidence before the house to decide on the resolutions. And most particularly it ought not to be indulged in a case where so much manifest mischief would attend its inevitable consequences —delay. Let gentlemen recollect the nature of the case—the president of the United States is charged by this house, with having violated the constitution and laws of his country, by having committed an act of dangerous interference with a judicial decision of this country; he is charged so by a member of this house. Gentlemen were well aware how much the public safety and happiness depended on a well or misplaced confidence in the executive. "Was it reasonable or right," Mr. M. asked, "to receive this charge —to receive in part the evidence in support of it —to receive so much evidence as almost every gentleman declared himself satisfied with, and to leave the charge unexamined, hanging over the head of the president of the United States, until a distance of time, how long it was impossible to say, but certainly long enough to work a very bad effect?" To him it seemed of all things the most unreasonable and unjust; and the mischief resulting therefrom must be very great indeed. When the evidence now in possession of the house came to be examined, gentlemen would be unable to decide whether more would be necessary than there possibly could be at present; if more should then be wanted, the business might with propriety be postponed. If it was possible to obtain the documents shortly, he should have no hesitation to admit of the motion; but being impossible, he felt no hesitation in declaring he should put his negative on it.

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. Livingston,) Mr. Marshall said, in his opinion, had criminated the conduct of the secretary of state, in supposing that he had withheld some of the documents. The court record was mentioned, but was it to be supposed by the executive that he was to be called upon to furnish papers the property of another department of the government, supposing them material? To procure these papers, he knew was as much in the power of the house as in his power. The house could as well dispatch a messenger as the executive. How was the president then to consider those papers asked for of him? Was he to be a menial to the house in a business wherein himself was seriously charged? Certainly not. There could be no doubt but the executive thought he had fully complied with the request of the house, where he supplied them with those immediately in his power. Mr. Bayard said he could not distinguish between the present motion and one yesterday negatived, because it must act as a discharge upon the committee of the whole house. There could be no doubt but the secretary of state had furnished all the papers relative to the business in his possession; indeed he could assuredly say so. He said he held in his hand a letter from the secretary of state in answer to one from an honourable member of the house, inquiring whether there were any more documents in his office; he answered that he had no certified copy whatever, but those which he furnished the president with from whom they came to the house. Gentlemen must then perceive that the mere operation of this resolution was an absolute and inevitable postponement of the business till another session. Many gentlemen, who were yesterday ashamed to vote for a postponement, would now have a plausible cover for their vote, by calling for additional proof, to accomplish the object of the resolution of yesterday, and thus he feared it would have many advocates; but however specious the pretext, he hoped it would not be carried. Mr. B. then went into an examination of the facts contained in the resolutions of Mr. Livingston, from which he deduced the impossibility of procuring anything that could be material in the prosecution of their discussion, or that could assist the house in drawing their conclusions, except any new facts could be produced, and therefore he concluded that nothing but a postponement could be the issue. He farther contended, in an answer to Mr. Nicholas, that it was not competent for the executive to furnish papers the property of the district judge; as well might the house ask for the executive to bring the proceedings on again at their bar. In the impeachment of Blount, Mr. Bayard said, the house did not apply to the president, but appointed a committee to bring the case and all the papers to view relative to it; so it might have been in the present case. And by what authority, taking the subject in another view, could the house call upon that judge to furnish it with papers? The executive had no right to demand them of him, nor had the house. The power of the judiciary is co-ordinate with the power of the house; it is a distinct branch of the government. He would have precisely the same right to call authoritatively for a copy of the journals of the house, as the house would to call upon him for copies of his record; his proceedings are public, his records are open to view; so are our journals; we cannot call upon him for them, though we may obtain them by paying the clerk for a copy of them, as any individual might do.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Smith) had considered the notarial certificate of New York, in attestation of Nash or Robbins's citizenship, to be important. If that gentleman thought this a material document, Mr. Bayard said he did not, but he thought the observation very material, as it might have an improper impression on the minds of some gentlemen. What could be more easy than for this Thomas Nash, this perjured pirate and murderer, to have got a certificate, either when he murdered some man from whom he might have procured it, or by purchase or favour? But there were facts before the house, that this man was an Irishman, that his name was Nash, and not Robbins; that it was never issued to him, and he was never entitled to it. What farther then can be wanted? Will not this satisfy gentlemen? The next thing will be, that if this objection be admitted, we shall be called upon to send to the West Indies to prove that his name was Nash. Mr. B. said, he was well satisfied that when this subject came to be analyzed, it would be made to appear perfectly clear, that the whole of the evidence necessary was before the house, and it only would be most annoying, and producing extremely injurious consequences, to grant the motion. Mr. Rutledge conceived this motion to be the same as to postpone the business. Further information was wanted, and that information could alone come from South Carolina. He wished the gentleman of Kentucky would read the resolution before he pressed his motion; he would find that the district judge was not charged; no, it was only a charge against the executive; there was not a word of irregularity of proceeding in the court, but the executive was seriously charged. Mr. Davis explained.—He said, his objects were to have the record in order to see whether Robbins did produce a certificate that he was an American citizen; to see a copy of the warrant by which he was committed; and thirdly, to know what stratagem, or what proceedings were used to take him out of cognizance of the court, and he must have remained so, if the president had not interfered.—These things he wished to ascertain, but that would be impossible without the court record. Mr. Rutledge said, he conceived this to be the object; but he by no means thought the gentleman would be satisfied on these points, were he to be possessed of the record. The gentleman might inquire the reasons for the executive and judicial conduct being as it was, but perhaps he should not receive the information. Every gentleman in the house would unite their vote to procure all the testimony within their reach, so as to enable the house to prosecute this business; we know, said Mr. R., what monstrous clamour has been raised about this business; we know that great pains have been taken to make the people believe that their fellow-citizen has been torn from his country; that he has been impressed into a foreign service; that the treaty has been violated; that their fellow-citizen has been taken to a foreign country, and there been tried in a summary mode and executed; we have been told for many months past that this business would be inquired into; we wished not to avoid it; we will by all means in our power assist it; we have done it. Some time since papers were asked for; we agreed with gentlemen that they should be furnished; it was done, and they are now on your table. They have been there many days; so that gentlemen had sufficient time, long before this, to have known whether they were satisfied or not. The gentleman himself who brought forward the resolutions, affected to be satisfied, but in compliance with the wish of some of his friends, he now wishes to postpone it. We want to bring the matters to a decision, and far as we can accommodate gentlemen so as to avoid delay, we will do it. "But," said Mr. Rutledge, "what will be the effect of that motion? Sir, it will hold up to the view of the world the president of the United States as having been grossly delinquent in his duty. We say, if he has offended, punish him; if he has not, discharge him from censure; but by no means expose him to popular suspicion, without an examination. What more can be wanted than the house are in possession of? The secretary of state says he has no further documents; and he cannot be suspected of any design to smother the business, by the readiness with which the call of the house was complied with. He might have said, he would send to the district of South Carolina; but instead of that, so earnest was he to give every possible information, that he trusted to newspaper publications, and this, he tells you, is all he has. What more can be asked?" After the discussion, if the evidence should be found insufficient, and more light should be necessary on which to form a decision, Mr. R. then would agree to send anywhere for evidence; but until he was convinced of a want of such testimony, except the will of gentlemen could be complied with without delay, he should be compelled to vote against the motion.

Mr. Nicholson rose to correct what he considered a mistake in the gentleman last up (Mr. Rutledge) when he said that the executive only was implicated in the resolutions; he conceived that the district judge of South Carolina was implicated, and that the papers of that court were necessary to examine the conduct of that judge. He read the resolution, and contended his deduction was accurate. Mr. N. said he wanted to know whether the district judge of South Carolina had committed this man for trial; this would appear, or be disproved by the warrant. Mr. N. said he could not believe the position laid down by a gentleman (Mr. Dana) that it was utterly impossible that Jonathan Robbins should have been a citizen of the United States. It was worthy of notice that the notarial certificate which the unfortunate man produced in court was dated 1795—the opposite authority to wit, a copy of the books of the Hermione appears to state that Thomas Nash was transferred to that ship in 1792, he, therefore, wanted to know authoritatively, whether this certificate was produced to the court, for if it was produced, it certainly went to prove that the copy of the books of the Hermione was erroneous, because if this man was in New York in 1795, he could not have been on board a British frigate in 1792, and have continued there until the time of the mutiny. That the president of the United States was not to be considered the servant of that house, he was willing to admit, but he thought that the president might with propriety apply to the judge of the district for the documents of the court. And he did not believe that the president would object to make the application. However, the object, he presumed, was to procure the papers, no matter from whom: that being the object, he hoped that the mover of the resolution would withdraw it in order to accommodate it more to the feelings of some members in the house, by adopting something like the following: Resolved, that the speaker of the house of representatives be requested to procure from the clerk of the district court of South Carolina, copies under seal of the proceedings of that court, together with the evidence produced in the case relative to the requisition for Thomas Nash, alias Jonathan Robbins, who was delivered to his Britannic majesty's consul. Mr. Davis withdrew his resolution, and Mr. Nicholas moved the substitute, which was now before the house. Mr. Harper moved a postponement of the resolution for one week. The object of the resolution which was before the committee of the whole was twofold,—a charge on the president, and a charge on the district judge. As to so much as related to the president of the United States, it was manifest that the testimony called for by this resolution could have no effect whatever upon him, because he left the whole to the judge. The president went no farther than to declare that if it should appear, that the acts committed by this man came within the purview of the British treaty, the man ought to be delivered up conformably to that stipulation.

It must be manifest that the testimony to be expected from South Carolina could have no possible effect on the part relating to the president, and therefore the house could proceed with that part of the resolution; but whether the judge, in executing the duty belonging to him, acted with propriety or not, might be more clear from the documents of that court. When the judge entered into the consideration of this business, what questions were open to him? The principle was, whether the man was guilty of the piracy and murder charged to him or not; if this was proved, no further question could arise as to the propriety of delivering him up conformably to the requisition. The consequence of these papers being called for, had been stated to be much delay; it would operate so. "Was it not an established principle," Mr. Harper asked, "that a delay of justice amounted to a denial of justice? If you suffer this charge to hang over the head of your president for eight months for no purpose, you inflict a punishment extremely severe. A charge is here exhibited against the first magistrate of the Union which must be considered as the commencement of an impeachment, for if gentlemen have any propriety of conduct, this must operate as a foundation to impeachment. This is to keep alive the idea of guilt, to hang up suspicion as a party weapon over the head of the executive until an opportunity shall offer to make use of it on a great approaching occasion"—this, he thought, was the main intention of the motion, and this consequence was inevitable. He believed the motion now before the house to be the same in principle as the one negatived yesterday; it was an effort to shrink from a charge, the object of which could better be answered by delay than examination. Mr. Nicholas thought with the gentleman last up, that if the only inquiry was as to the conduct of the president; or if the inquiry was only to respect the judge, the papers might be dispensed with, but it was otherwise; the conduct of both was called forth to view by the resolutions, but how far the conduct of either may be reprehensible, depended on the testimony which might be made to appear before the house. It was impossible to say what the president had done until the documents should be seen. If gentlemen refused the inquiry being made of the court of South Carolina, they, by that act, made the president answerable for every part of the facts, which he believed they would not pretend to do. He really believed it extremely important to know what steps had been taken in this very serious business, to know whether this man was in a course for trial, and whether the president had acted in this hasty and premature manner, in delivering him up, which was stated. Mr. N. then proceeded to prove that the warrant was important to be seen, because the intent for which the apprehension was made, it was explicitly incumbent on the judge to record, together with the court where he was to be tried, agreeably to the provisions of the judiciary act, and, therefore, this information could be obtained by recurring to that record. A gentleman had thought the information could not be obtained from persons, when probably that information may criminate. But were the house to decide upon information short of truth because the result may lead to criminate? That is, they are to be acquitted without materials whereupon to acquit. The objection of gentlemen on account of the time it would take to procure the testimony, which they suppose would be so late that the case could not be acted upon during the present session, he believed not accurate. Mr. Nicholas declared that it was far from his desire to postpone the business; he wished it to go forward without delay, but not unless all the facts were before the house which were necessary. The house were told by a gentleman (Mr. Marshall) that it would be extremely improper to indulge a few gentlemen in their objections. Was the gentleman confident that there would be a majority of his opinion? A few, it must be remembered, could make a decision, and if so, the result of the opinion of those few might guide the question. Much had been said about the introduction of the motion and the motives ascribed to the supporters of it, as though it was a planned object. Mr. Nicholas denied having the least knowledge of it till the motion was made, and, with respect to him, it could not be thought as an attempt to carry into effect the motion yesterday made for postponement, because he yesterday voted against that motion, and by no means would agree to postpone, but for an object which he now thought material: when the object was to obtain important information, and believing, as he did, that it would not put off the decision beyond the power of the present session, he should consider himself justified in voting for the motion. Mr. Gallatin could not help observing the disposition which gentlemen evinced of placing the opinions and sensations expressed by one gentleman to the account of others. To take a fair view of the resolutions, what did they amount to? Nothing more than the deductions which one man had drawn from the message sent to this house by the executive; these deductions, in the form of a resolution, he had submitted to the consideration of the committee of the whole. Now, except it could be proved that that gentleman had made all the deductions of and acted for every gentleman, there could be no ground for saying that every gentleman would be satisfied without the evidence which might be collected from the records of the district court of South Carolina. Was any gentleman in the house bound to be satisfied, with the gentleman from New York, that all the facts necessary to be known were furnished? Was every gentleman in the house bound to confine himself solely to the resolutions before the house? Certainly not. It could not be denied that the evidence now required was essential to a full investigation of the conduct of the judge who was the principal agent of the executive in this case. He did not consider the question to be, whether the resolutions of the gentleman from New York required that evidence or not to support them: but whether, to come to a knowledge of the truth, and the whole truth, relative to the circumstances, it was not necessary? Although Mr. Gallatin observed he could not at present perceive how far it was likely those documents might assist the decision of the house, yet he thought them proper to come before the house; it was very probable they would tend either to criminate more, or to extenuate and perhaps to justify.

With respect to the objections on the ground of postponement, Mr. Gallatin would observe, that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina proved that this was not the proper time to proceed in the discussion: the motion implied that gentleman's acknowledgment of it, or he would rather have at once rejected the motion than moved its postponement for a week. He therefore presumed that gentleman thought additional testimony necessary. Mr. Harper had said that neither the testimony to be expected, nor the postponement could have any possible bearing on the part relating to the president, and therefore that ought to be decided; but as far as related to the judge, evidence might be necessary. Taking this to be the mind of the gentleman, Mr. Gallatin said, he did not know in what manner he could apply his argument to the motion. For himself, Mr. G. said, he was ready to vote on the resolutions without more documents; but as other gentlemen were not, he should not vote without them. He confessed he was the more earnest in this, because on the very threshold of the business a gentleman was stopped while reading a paper he thought useful to bring forward. Gentlemen had now got up and declared themselves compelled to call for evidence which might substantiate a fact contained in that paper, which, though known to be true, was not stamped with that legal credit that was necessary. Let gentlemen then come forward at once and give this fact its legal importance, or prove its non-existence.

Another fact stated was, that the president had undertaken to discharge the man, when the court had already assumed jurisdiction of the case. This it was possible to prove or disprove by the record of the court. That this record, agreeable to law, was to contain the name of the court before which the case was triable, and process upon which the man was arrested, he quoted the judiciary act. 1 Stat. 73. He was, however, well satisfied from the letter of the judge and the nature of the case, that this man was committed for trial before a court of the United States, and what corroborated the opinion was that no power was given by our laws to hold a man in prison on any other ground. On the whole, Mr. G. said, as one fact had been, and others might be, disputed, if produced, it would perhaps be the most expeditious, as it certainly would be the most satisfactory method to procure every fact authentically attested before the proceeding was had. General Lee hoped that the gentleman from South Carolina would withdraw his motion. He would mention some reasons which would induce him to vote differently from gentlemen with whom he usually had the honour to vote. Considering this a question of very great importance not only to the American people, and to the reputation of the house, but also the highly respectable character presiding over our government, he trusted the house would, in its whole progress, be led by principles so fair and candid as not to leave the least room for a charge of derogation from its own dignity, or the great subject it was discussing. He would vote for the motion calling for the papers; but he would do it with an expectation that it would not postpone the discussion of the business, so far as related to the conduct of the president of the United States. It appeared that the conduct of the president, as charged, was fully before the house; there could be no difficulty, therefore, to proceed on it; but as far as it respected the judge, Mr. Lee trusted the record of the court would be sent, for he thought it but fair to gratify gentlemen who considered there was any material evidence wanting.

If the view of gentlemen was to postpone the whole of this business, until a return from South Carolina, he would ask the gentleman from New York, and his friends, whether they could wish any means to be adopted more completely to effect the object of the resolutions than by postponement? "Were I the high character," said Mr. Lee, "to whom this resolution refers, I would infinitely rather have the disapprobation of this house to the full extent which the censure goes, than to have the subject postponed and exposed to the conclusions and surmises of the world. I will not attribute to gentlemen that which the gentleman from South Carolina has expressed; I cannot think the member from New York wishes to suspend the decision of this house until that high character shall be before that tribunal which is to estimate his merits or demerits, for knowing that no baser motive can be cherished, I will not even suspect it of him; but whatever may be the motive which may induce a postponement, it cannot fail of having that effect." He therefore wished to proceed as it respected the president. Mr. Dana acknowledged his very high sense of the opinion of the gentleman last up; but he could not agree with him at present: he did not think it would consist with general justice to delay the case for the time contemplated by the resolution; he well knew that if the inquiry was not made, gentlemen would talk about liberality and about motives, but that he should not in the least regard, assured that his conduct would be guided by the strictest rules of legal propriety and justice. Mr. D. could not admit that much propriety marked the conduct of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Nicholson); that gentleman well knew that the executive ought not to be called upon, and that the speaker of the house was the true medium by which evidence could be obtained for that house, but as the argument was in favour of a complete investigation of the business, Mr. D. could not help calling to the recollections of gentlemen a motion (which was negatived) to put this previous examination in the hands of a select committee; for want of that very necessary measure, gentlemen now found themselves in a disagreeable situation, for, having accused these officers, they could not prosecute their accusation as they wished, and therefore they would fain make further inquiry. He objected, farther, to it because it was unnecessary; he did not believe the least good could spring from it. But it was extremely unreasonable, and highly unbecoming the dignified character of grand inquisitors general, because there was no proof to make the charge appear, that they should suspend the business while gentlemen sought for proof which they ought to have known when the resolutions were proposed, which they ought by no means to have brought upon slight grounds. Did the gentleman know that public officers professed reputation; and that the preservation of that reputation was essential to preserve public confidence in them? He would not stretch a man on the bed of torture, for time unknown, while he searched for proof of a supposed crime. "Sir," said Mr. D., "by this treatment you chain your public officers to a rock, for this spirit of patriotism, like a vulture, to prey on their hearts. This is conduct I abhor, and therefore cannot, for my part, indulge it. Sir, they have brought the charge; we are willing to meet it—we are willing to give full weight to their charge—we are not disposed to vindicate the executive, or any other public officer, if doing wrong—but it is because we respect honest men in public stations, that we are prepared to hear what the tongue of accusation can produce; we are unwilling to leave them exposed to calumny, as they must be unheard and unjustified except it be by clamour, which a suspicion must inevitably raise." Mr. Varnum would vote for the resolution proposed; he thought it was doubtful whether the president had acted with propriety or not, but he believed if there had been any incidental impropriety of conduct it never was done with an evil design, or with a view to interfere with any other department of the government; but certainly to deny this evidence, which several gentlemen stated to be necessary to assist them in making up their minds, would stamp a censure on the conduct of those officers as great as that contained in the resolution. He thought that the gentleman from New York had a right to bring the subject to the view of the house; if he saw any proceeding which to him appeared to be dangerous, it was his duty to commence an investigation; no man ought to flinch from what he thought right. The only way to give public satisfaction, in a matter that had given so much public attention, was to give all the evidence which could be procured, and let the matter be investigated to the bottom; and most assuredly the only way effectually to clear the characters implicated, if they were innocent, was to leave no doubt as to the desire of the house to scrutinize their conduct. But certainly the very great reluctance which gentlemen showed to procure all the evidence, and after all their denial of it, must leave a suspicion much bordering on guilt. Mr. Bayard rose, in answer to Mr. Gallatin and others, and observed that with respect to Nash calling himself an American citizen before that court, an object which it was desired to prove by this call for evidence, they were asked to admit the fact. Mr. B. asked, would those gentlemen admit that Nash was guilty of the dreadful murders committed on board the British frigate; would they admit that he falsely made the claim? However, he had no disposition to rest on that point. Another fact, however, which it was required to admit was as to the jurisdiction of the court of the United States upon the case. Mr. B. denied this, and repeated the former arguments in proof of his opinion. He insisted that the whole arrest and proceeding were had at the instance of the British consul and minister, in proof of which he quoted their letters. The record, he said, could not possibly dispense any light to this fact; the record would only give the warrant and some of the depositions first taken before the judge; but as to the court being designated where the cause was to be tried, he contended that it was not usual to insert it on the warrant, he never saw one so drawn. It was possible that Nash was committed with a view to be delivered up to the British, before the letter was received by the judge from the president, and it was very reasonable to suppose that the whole previous business was at the instigation of the British agent; but it was impossible to prove that jurisdiction had attached before the letter directing the delivery to be made was received. Mr.

Jones said, that finding himself, from the vote he was about to give, implicated in the charge made by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Bayard), that gentlemen who were yesterday ashamed to vote for the proposition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the subject in general and express terms, because it would imply a distrust of sufficient ground to support the principles of the resolutions, were disposed to effect the same object by a decision which would in fact go to evading the question during the present session, he felt himself impelled by a respect for his own conduct to explain the motives which would govern his vote on the present question. He considered the case which had been called into view by the proposition of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Livingston), as one that involved in it the dearest interests and deepest concerns of the people of the United States. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. B.) and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Dana) had indulged themselves in the most violent invectives and unnecessary abuse, against the unfortunate, the obscure, and insignificant character, now dead, who was the subject of this proposition; on this topic they had exercised all their powers of passionate declamation. If this was a grateful theme for the employment of their talents, he did not envy them the enjoyment of it. How that kind of argument could apply to the question he left to the house to determine. For his part he deemed it totally immaterial whether the man was as they had declared, an Irishman, or not; whether he was a Turk, a Hottentot, or a native born American; if he claimed to be an American citizen and produced a certificate in due form, under the signature of a proper officer, of his citizenship, and that claim was slighted by the judge, or declared immaterial, and the fact not inquired into of his being a citizen, then he considered the safety of the citizens of America to be equally put in jeopardy, as if the man had been born and raised in Charleston, in the circle of the judge's own acquaintance. "If," he asked, "a dagger aimed at my breast by an assassin in the dark, should, by mistake or impetuosity pierce the bosom of another, would not the discovery of such an attempt awaken alarm and demand a precaution for my future safety? Certainly it would. So in this case; if this man claimed to be a citizen and bore about him the legal voucher of that claim, and if he was told in the presence of American citizens, 'it is of no importance whether you are or are not a citizen, that is a point of no concern in the case,' notwithstanding it may afterwards be found he was no citizen, yet would it equally involve the safety of every true citizen who might fall into similar circumstances. We may congratulate ourselves that it has not fallen on a fellow-citizen, but we ought still to improve the lesson this case has presented." Mr. Jones hoped that it would be improved, and that at least legislative provisions would be made to prevent this decision from operating on a citizen, if such a case should occur in future; this man was a citizen to all intents and purposes, so far as respects the precedent, if he claimed that right and produced a voucher to testify it, and was entitled to all the privileges of a citizen, till his claim and certificate had been formally proved to be false. Mr. J. said, to ascertain with certainty whether this claim was put in, and how it was treated, it certainly was necessary to procure authentic copies of the record and proceedings in the case from the court, and every ray of evidence that could be obtained; nothing could be more essential in deciding on the conduct of the judge than to have an authentic account of the proceedings. Gentlemen seemed extremely anxious to have the question decided early, on account of the censure hanging over the executive by continuing the business on the table. "It is true," Mr. J. said, "the papers now called for were not necessary to determine on that part of the resolution which charges the executive with interfering with the judiciary; on this point no further evidence was wanted; that was an abstract question, and might be so decided; but there was a probability that the evidence to be obtained from the court in Charleston, might be material as to another charge or implication of the president. If it should by any means be proved, that the president was informed of, or knew the man had claimed to be a citizen, then he was surely as much to blame in not making the distinction, as the judge; it was possible this might appear from some of the proceedings or papers before the court." Gentlemen were sensibly affected for the president's feelings in this case, and if he is blameless, this tenderness was proper, but for his part he considered the case of the judge as equally and more delicate than that of the president. The situation of a judge determining on the life of his fellow creature, was, he thought, the most important and responsible duty mankind could impose on any one; of course to censure a judge for any decision that could affect life, was a severe infliction, and in doing it every possible proof and sight ought to be had. It was said that by the delay which this vote would cause, if carried, the president would be hung up in odious effigy to the people at large. Mr. Jones said he could not conceive how a disposition of the house to receive every light, and go into as ample an investigation as possible, would have that effect; he believed a contrary conduct would be more likely to render the conduct of the president suspicious and censurable. What effect would a dry vote of approbation have in this case after refusing to permit testimony to be brought forward which was thought material. It would seem as if the friends of the executive were afraid to let the matter be clearly sifted, and wished to avoid everything that could throw light on the subject. What value ought to be put on applause obtained in such a way? He believed the president would disdain the approbation of the house on such terms—to make his exculpation grateful to himself and satisfactory to the nation, nothing ought to be suppressed, everything should be produced that related to the subject. The gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Dana, who is always so tenderly concerned for the character and dignity of this house, and so frequently complains of other gentlemen committing that dignity and respect by their conduct and opinions, has, on all occasions, when he has addressed the house, in his style and manner, manifested the most unlimited confidence in the talents and penetration of one member of the house; but what kind of respect he had discovered for every other gentleman in it, he appealed to the observations of gentlemen generally to determine. Some gentlemen had indulged themselves in attributing to the mover and friends of this proposition, unworthy motives; he had on many occasions observed that those gentlemen were partial to that kind of debate; he could not see the use or advantage of such conduct; he thought it very unbecoming any gentleman in this body. There was, however, one motive which these gentlemen had not attributed to him, or those with whom he usually acted in the house; they could not insinuate or pretend that their conduct was designed to throw themselves within the benign beams of executive patronage. Mr. Jones said he would not so far conform to a practice which he condemned as to designate what gentleman would bear an insinuation of that kind; it was not necessary to point them out. He could perceive no other object which could induce gentlemen to declaim so frequently and earnestly on those unpleasant topics.

The question was then taken, on the motion of Mr. Harper, to postpone the consideration of the motion of Mr. Nicholson for a call of the record of the court of South Carolina, for one week, and negatived: yeas, 63; nays, 32.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolutions of Mr. Nicholson, when Mr. Marshall again spoke in opposition to, and Messrs. Nicholas and Randolph in answer. The call for the question being very loud, it was taken as follows: Yeas—Messrs. Alston, Baily, Bishop, R. Brown, Cabell, Christie, Clay, Condit, Davis, Dawson, Dent, Eggleston, Ebendorf, Fowler, Gallatin, Goode, Gregg, Hanna, Jackson, Jones, Kitchell, Lee, Leib, Lyon, Livingston, Muhlenburg, New, Nicholas, Nicholson, Randolph, Smilie, J. Brown, Champlin, Cooper, Craik, Dana, F. Davenport, Dennis, Dickson, Edmond, Evans, A. Foster, D. Foster, Freeman, Glen, C. Goodrich, E. Goodrich, Gordon, Gray, Gresworld, Grove, Harper, Huderson, Hill, Hugher, S. Monday, March 3d.

The house having resolved itself into committee, Mr. Edmond in the chair, on the resolution proposed by Mr. Livingston and M. Bayard—the resolution of Mr. Livingston being first in order. Mr. Edmond said he almost ceased to wonder at anything done on that floor. If the intentions of gentlemen were to lay the foundation of another inquiry, which should bring the past conduct of the president to view, perhaps this motion might then be proper; but calling for papers relative to another transaction and not included in the original resolutions, was unaccountable, except it was to lay the foundation of an impeachment of the president; and if ever that was the view, the house ought first to get rid of these troublesome resolutions. He knew it was very easy for gentlemen to get up and call for this and that testimony; and if they did not receive it to make a handle of the refusal by saying that the evidence was precluded; but, Mr. Edmond said, such excuses would not in the least affect his vote. Suppose the papers in question were obtained, he could perceive no possible application they would have to the present case; for if the president was wrong in what he did, concerning Johnson (or Brigstock), that would not prove him wrong or right in his conduct respecting Nash. The facts respecting Robbins (or Nash), were only now before the house in the resolutions, and no other case ought to be brought to confound it. Suppose this was admitted, if the gentleman should still find himself deficient in his testimony to support the resolutions, he might want the house to send for more testimony from some other parts. This kind of conduct must take up unnecessary time where a decision was very necessary to be come to. He hoped the motion would be negatived. Mr. Macon confessed he was astonished at the conduct he had seen exemplified in the house; it appeared to him that gentlemen were making every possible excuse to prevent that information coming before the house which the friends of the resolution said they wanted. If, Mr. M. said, he was desirous of injuring the reputation of the president, (and that he declared he was not,) he should think himself facilitating that desire by throwing every embarrassment in the way, and refusing every sort of information on the subject; this conduct would effectually tell the public that the truth dare not be seen; that the facts are too bad to be seen. He could not think it was any great mark of friendship to the president to give rise to such conjectures as the people must and would form by the door to investigation into his conduct being stopped. In his opinion, Mr. M. said, this seclusion of the facts went to prove that the opinion of the president, or his conduct in the New Jersey case, was right, and to reveal them would amount to an evidence that the latter was wrong with respect to Nash. If it was otherwise, the papers asked for would speak for themselves; it certainly would have a very suspicious appearance to refuse the papers which were declared by several gentlemen to be important to their forming a decision. Mr. M. wished to have got rid of this business altogether, but as it must be examined, he wished it to be done with all the evidence possible. If there were gentlemen who were enemies to the president, he declared he was not one; he desired to do him justice, which he thought could not be done by hiding any part of his conduct which was open to suspicion. If the president had changed his opinion, give him an opportunity to show that he had acted right. If the papers should prove to be of no use in the present investigation, he could see no harm that could accrue from them. Mr. Shepherd hoped the resolution never would be permitted to go on the journals of the house, because it must lead to inquiry. The object he believed only to be delay. He thought when the resolution was first admitted, in having anything to do with the business, the house committed a very great error, but because the house had committed one blunder, was that any reason they should go on blundering? He hoped the house would get rid of this business with all possible expedition. Mr. Livingston said, if he were really a personal enemy to the president, he should rejoice at such a motion as this being opposed; he thought it a very inconsistent part of the conduct of those gentlemen who called themselves exclusive friends of the president; those gentlemen who boasted of giving up their personal ease in the service of their country in contradistinction to those gentlemen of opposite political opinions, with whom they disdained to be seen in their patriotic labours. His bitterest enemies would not wish to place him in a more undignified situation. What inference can be drawn by the people of the United States, but that there is something rotten in the business, and that will bear too hard on the conduct of the president to be made appear; that he had done in the case of Nash without consideration very differently from what he did in the case of Brigstock, after mature consideration? "It had appeared, in the course of his business," Mr. L. said, "that some gentlemen in the house had been in the habit of corresponding with the department of state on the case of Robbins; might it not be inferred from their subsequent conduct that they had discovered something which they did not choose to have exposed? Whether this was a fair inference or not, it would certainly be made."

"The wretched argument with which this opposition was supported," Mr. L. said, "was almost extraordinary, and would be quite so, could it be supported on better grounds. The distinction of the cases when no perceptible distinction exists—the time that it would waste, when a few hours could procure all that was asked, and above all the miserable excuse of trouble to the clerks in the secretary's office, were too futile for gentlemen to suppose they could palm them upon the public. But miserable as they are, it is a convincing proof that no better are to be found, and these are their last resort." To suppose that no correspondence took place would be an absurdity, and equally so would it be, to harbour the opinion which gentlemen had desired to establish, that it could throw no light upon the present subject if it did appear. Gentlemen had actually presumed to say that these cases were not the same; but what gentlemen had pretended to draw a shade of distinction? It was impossible, and nothing was wanted to prove this fact but a slight examination of the two cases. "If they are the same," said Mr. L., "'tis impossible to suppose the conduct of the executive in respect to this one was right; and the proceedings of the court thereupon will not be laid down as a rule for future proceedings. The opinion of the president in the Jersey case was no doubt given upon a due deliberation, and in a future case, so precisely the same, his conduct ought to have been the same, or not being so, the house ought to be informed why it differed. The result could be obtained; if it should prove favourable to the character of the president," Mr. L. declared, he should be as willing to admit it as those who called themselves his exclusive friends. Mr. Harper said, when the gentleman from New York undertook to direct others in their votes he should be careful to give reasons which must convince their minds; for his part, Mr. H. said, he never chose to accept of advice from his enemy, but if he could get instruction from his errors, and if by viewing his mistaken measures he could improve himself, he was always willing to do it; if he took advice from any man he must know that his motives are good in giving it; if in the present instance, he could believe the design of the gentleman was to preserve the president of the United States from obloquy; if he had not discovered the "pen dipped in gall," he should be more inclined to listen to his advice. He was not afraid that the people of the United States were so stupid as to mistake the true light in which they ought to view the subject. "Was it a common practice," Mr. H. asked, "to exhibit vast charges and then to go and look for testimony? Why, did not the gentleman and his counsel, whoever they might be, know that the testimony from South Carolina, and the testimony from New Jersey, or any other, would be necessary to support the charge? They had plenty of time since the business was first agitated. Had not this business been talked of for eight months past, and paste-board figures of Jonathan Robbins been exhibited at every election ground in the United States? The most ordinary rules of courts of justice in the United States forbade testimony to be admitted at such a period of the proceedings. If any public accuser in the United States was to conduct himself in that way, he would get severely rapped over the knuckles, if not thrown over the bar. The matter has proceeded too far for its admission." "But," said Mr. H., "what can be the use of this testimony? Gentlemen say that the executive has decided on one case in different ways, and that on the present occasion he must be wrong. One gentleman said, the claim of citizenship was important; but this is a wrong idea. The claim of citizenship which was built on falsehood, was not made until after the president had acted on the case, and consequently it must be out of the question. It is scarcely possible that any requisition was ever made by any British agent in the case in New Jersey. Can it be supposed that the president would be guilty of such a boyish trick, of such versatility of conduct in his dealings with a foreign nation, as in a few months to put a different construction upon one and the same action? No, the supposition is absolutely impossible, and gentlemen well knew it." The New Jersey case, Mr. H. said, was an entirely different one; the men were indicted by the circuit court: they were not claimed to be given up to the British; they were indicted for an offence cognizable in that court; bills were found against them; two of them were tried and acquitted, the other the president ordered a nolle prosequi to be enterd upon. Why were the men acquitted? Was it through a defect of testimony? "No, sir," said Mr. H., "but through a defect in the jurisdiction. The jury well knew, being judges of law as well as of facts, that the court had no jurisdiction, and therefore they made a return of not guilty. Inasmuch as there was no demand made from Great Britain, the men were discharged." Mr. H. said, he was opposed to this motion on account of the principle contained in it; it was very wrong to first exhibit a charge and then go to hunt for testimony. It was like hanging a man on a gibbet, and then seeking for his guilt. This principle had been presented to the house in various shapes, but in every one he thought very properly rejected, as he had no doubt this would be. If this were to be acceded to, the next thing would be to search for a piece of evidence in Georgia or in Maine, or anything that would procure the object—delay, and its influence on a certain occasion (election). Here was a criminal charge, dressed up and blazoned out with all the false colours which a stretched imagination could invent, but which was manifestly and totally unfounded, and contrary to facts; it therefore appeared to him necessary, Mr. H. said, to come to a decision speedily and strip the charge of its gloss, in order that its true deformity might appear, and all the world would see that the intention to accused was baffled by an exposure of the truth, and the character accused justified from guilt. Mr. S. Smith said, the gentleman last up had given the most powerful reason why these papers were necessary that could possibly be imagined. He said, in strong language, that no requisitions had ever been made in the New Jersey case to deliver up the men to the British. If this was a fact, most assuredly the case would not apply; but the only way to estimate that fact was to obtain a view of the papers, or know from authority that there were none. Mr. S. said he could not draw that conclusion; he believed that a requisition had been made; that it was precisely the same as the South Carolina case, and that the papers relating to it would be completely in point, to which the house ought to have access, and not to go to British statutes and law books when the country produced a precedent. The gentlemen last up had said that the jury, being judges of law and facts, determined that there was no jurisdiction. How that was he could not say. The verdict was not guilty, which most likely was a verdict upon facts. Suppose it should turn out by the documents that requisition was made for these men, and it should prove that two of them were liberated for want of sufficient proof. Suppose it should turn out that this very lieutenant Foreshaw was sworn to have been killed by Brigstock, and yet now Nash is charged with having killed Foreshaw. Suppose it would turn out that Brigstock was an American citizen, and being such, was liberated from further prosecution, because the president might have thought that an American citizen, impressed on board a British ship of war, was justifiable in getting his liberty. These things might appear. The same claim of citizenship was now made, and in his opinion a jury trial ought to have been had, in order to ascertain facts so material to a man's personal interest.

Mr. Harper explained, that he said the documents did not discover any requisition having been made in the Jersey case. And further, instead of positively saying the jury had acquitted for want of jurisdiction, he said it was presumed so. Mr. Smilie said there was another fact stated by the gentleman which was incorrect. He said the figure of J. R. was hung up at every election ground. This was not truth; for Mr. S. said he was at one election where it was not hung up. (Several other gentlemen also declared that they saw no such thing at their respective districts, but they heard of it in some few places.) One extraordinary feature, Mr. Smilie observed, was easily perceived throughout the whole of this attempt to investigate facts. It appeared that gentlemen were determined to exculpate the president at all events. He was not ready to do so; nor was he ready to accuse him; he only wished to do what was right and lawful; for which purpose he wished every document that could assist him. It was strange that, while there were papers which, it was said, would make the whole of the executive conduct appear free of blame, the friends of the executive should repress them. How could gentlemen say they had not withheld important testimony, when all the world must perceive that facts were yet hidden that would throw a light on the case. Mr. H. Lee said he had hitherto voted with gentlemen who asked for papers. He did it because they themselves said they wanted such papers to guide their decision. He was unwilling that they should have any excuse. Supposing that other information might possibly be procured, and anxious to obtain it, he wrote to the secretary of state, but received for answer, there was none. Mr. L. said he did it in order, if there had been any papers, to have moved that they might be produced. He should have voted on the present question in the same way, but from what he had perceived he found that any attempts to gratify those gentlemen were in vain, and that to encourage it would be wasting day after day, without any hope of settling the main inquiry before the next session of congress. Besides, Mr. Lee said, the session was far spent, and not one public act was yet passed. And should so many days be spent on a matter of so little consequence, as considering the case of an individual who had transgressed the law and very properly suffered for his crimes? He hoped not. From this moment he was determined to stop, by his vote, every attempt to delay a final decision. Mr. Lee contended that the president had a right to change his proceeding according to his opinion, if he should be convinced of the propriety of it. It was a privilege every public character enjoyed, even if it should appear that they had changed his conduct. He would not vote for a postponement, which he must do were he to vote for the motion. Mr. Nicholas thought there was a very great possibility that a requisition was made in the New Jersey case: the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Harper) said there was none; but how did he know it? Did the gentleman believe that the British ministry were not as desirous to have these men delivered as they were of the other? To suppose that they acted understandingly: to suppose they were desirous of pursuing one steady object unremittingly, as they always had done, would warrant a strong presumption that they did demand those men. It was impossible but the papers in question must either add or diminish the construction put upon this case, and solve some important queries. Mr. Dana thought the conduct of the president was consistent, constitutional and proper, and that it was out of the power of any gentleman to prove the contrary. One great reason for his thinking this, was the manner this charge had been conducted from its first appearance, which was contrary to all legal knowledge and constitutional principles; he desired any gentleman to produce a precedent in any public body except it was in the proceedings of the revolutionary government of France. The manner of conducting the business being totally wrong, Mr. D. said he did not expect to receive the least conviction from anything that would be brought forward, or any arguments which would be used. Gentlemen had said it would awaken dreadful suspicions if the motion was negatived. And were the house to be deterred from their duty at the apparition of a demagogue? No, he trusted not, because he well knew that men of understanding would well approve their conduct, and if weak and silly men disapproved he was willing to bear it from them. If gentlemen would look to the record they would find that the cases were different; these men were charged under the statute of the United States, the other was not. The proceeding being different, the case could not illuminate. As well might gentlemen ask for the whole of the state trials in order to discover the law on impeachments. Mr. Gallatin contended that if investigation was the object of the house, they ought to grant the resolution; whether it was admitted or not, it would be impossible to destroy one fact—that the court did admit jurisdiction on that case, which was exactly similar to this, and that also the court of South Carolina did assume jurisdiction—whether the demand was made in the Jersey case or not, it was clear that it was made in the case of Nash, and that it was complied with, and the man by the advice of the president, was taken out of the hands of the judiciary. But to know how exactly the circumstances of the Jersey case corresponded to the latter, the papers were certainly desirable. This was a case in point much better than all which the English authorities could produce, and there being a different decision, it certainly ought to be known why that difference did occur. The gentleman from South Carolina had stated facts; he said that no jurisdiction was admitted by the jury, and therefore the men were acquitted; and that no requisitions were made. To be sure, he afterwards said it was all founded in supposition; now whether these were or were not facts, the papers could tell. By knowing all the circumstances of that case a decision could be formed with more accuracy as to the other case. Mr. Davis said he was desirous of avoiding this very disagreeable subject, but as a majority of the house thought differently, and they determining he should give a vote, however contrary to his will, he certainly wished to meet it with all the information in the power of the house. The gentleman from New York had brought forward certain resolutions which he had defended; the gentleman from South Carolina said they were blazoning with falsehood: now which of these two gentlemen, Mr. Davis asked, was he to believe? How could he form an opinion without the facts being produced? He wished not to be forced to form it upon bare conjectures; he wished to have the truth before him. Certainly if he was refused facts, he must suppose there was some great reason against the disclosure. He asked gentlemen to recollect in what a situation they placed the executive, exposed to such censure! Let everything appear that will do honour to the character of that gentleman, but to afford such crippled testimony never would acquit the president in the view of the American people, if that house should be satisfied that his conduct was honourable. The question was then taken by yeas and nays: Yeas, 46; nays, 46. The speaker decided in the negative.

Thursday, March 4th.

Mr. Gallatin presented to the house the following resolution: "Resolved, that the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this house, copies of any requisition, or any application that may have been made by the British minister, or any agent of his Britannic majesty, for or concerning the delivery up of Wm. Brigstock, otherwise John Johnson, of John Evans, otherwise Michael Campbel, and of Johannes Williams, otherwise Johannes Williamson, or either of them who were tried at the circuit court of the United States, in the New Jersey district, on a charge of piracy, committed on board the British frigate Hermione; and also copies of any communication in the executive department, or any other of the departments relative thereto." Mr. Nicholas, yesterday, just before the rising of the house, mentioned the necessity of this inquiry, but the house adjourned before a motion was made to that effect. Some conversation occurred as to the disposal of this motion. Mr. Bayard hoped the resolution would follow the usual course, and lie on the table for a day. If the idea was to connect the case with that of Nash, or to bring more evidence to the present case, he thought it must fail of its object. It was impossible, he said, that the decision on that case could be the least guide to the house in the present, as it was a very distinct trial, and therefore, he hoped it would lie. Mr. Livingston hoped the resolution would not lie on the table till another day, and for this plain reason—what were we to do in the meantime? He believed it perfectly connected with the business that now occupied the house, and therefore, if it was the desire of the house to proceed, they had better dispose of this resolution immediately. But the gentleman from Delaware had intimated that it could bring no new evidence respecting the case now before the house, because it was a case quite distinct from it. To be sure Mr. Livingston said it would operate for the benefit of the gentleman's argument, if he could make the house believe so. But, Mr. L. thought, they were clearly the same, except it was in men, in place of trial, and in judges who tried them. Both were for precisely the same act, and committed at the same time. It would be remarked in the warrant that it appeared, these men were committed under the treaty with Great Britain, and therefore it was more than probable that it was in consequence of application from some British agent, to the executive, that they were apprehended. How could the gentleman say it could give no new light? Was it possible that the conduct of the executive in the case of Brigstock, and others, in New Jersey, could afford no new light to the conduct of the same executive in the very same case on the trial of Thomas Nash? Mr. L. said, he knew nothing of what passed between the executive and others, but suppose, it should appear, if the house obtain possession of the communication, that application had been made before the trial by some British agent for the delivery up of all or either of these men, and the answer of the president had been that it was a judicial point, and therefore he did not choose to meddle with it? Certainly the gentleman would not say that this case had nothing to do with the present, in which such an extraordinary change of conduct had been evinced. If this result could arise, (which it was impossible to deny,) gentlemen ought to yield to the wishes of others. The plea could not now be that they would have to send to South Carolina for what was asked; because this information might be procured in a few hours, and certainly to obtain what was deemed so important, a small delay might well be borne. A gentleman had said it ought to have been brought forward at an earlier period. How was this possible? Mr. Livingston said, that he did not receive the record of the New Jersey case, till just before the house met yesterday; he then made use of it in the discussion, and it was not till just at the rising of the house, any gentleman could make use of it, and then a gentleman did propose something of the kind. It was a plain inference to be drawn that some communication did occur with a foreign agent, and some answer must have been given; the executive no doubt did act on the subject; he also acted in this case. It was, therefore, very proper for the house to be informed how he acted. Mr. Rutledge trusted that the difficulties gentlemen had to encounter in their present precipitate way of acting, would prevent them bringing forward any crimination of so great a character in future, without being better prepared to substantiate it. Mr. R. said that he had no objection to call for all the information that could conveniently be had previous to the debate commencing, but to do it afterwards was most extraordinary indeed! If these proceedings were to prevail, it would be impossible to say when a vote was taken. Gentlemen, now they are entered into the business, find that facts will not bear them out: they find they cannot substantiate what they would prove. One calls for this, another for that, and there would be no end to their calling. He wished for all possible elucidation of the subject, as long as it could be proper, but after going into the argument, it was extremely improper. But, Mr. R. asked, what had this case to do with the business of Nash? The gentleman supposed that it was considered by the executive as a case within the judicial cognizance, and therefore he refused to act in it; suppose it was so; and suppose the executive afterwards changed his opinion, what he might consider an erroneous opinion; certainly he had a right to do so. The object of this he believed to be, to delay and finally to postpone the decision, but he hoped the house would not now agree to delay the business. If the gentleman should hereafter think proper to promote an impeachment upon the proceedings in the case of Brigstock and others, and on that ground should ask for the papers relative thereto, he should have no objection to an acquiescence; but as this was entirely an independent case, he could see no necessity of yielding to the solicitations of gentlemen at present. Mr. Gallatin said, as to the late period of introducing the resolution, it must be clear that it was out of his power to propose it till the time he offered it to the house, because the facts which gave rise to it were not produced until yesterday; and as to the objects for it, the gentleman last up was quite mistaken. A gentleman had said that it was a last effort, in order to support charges against the president of the United States. As to what would be the effect of these papers if they should be sent, Mr. Gallatin could not tell. He did not know that such papers existed at all, but the inference the gentleman had drawn was upon a presumption that they would criminate the president. This Mr. G. did not know was the fact; he knew nothing about them; they might criminate, or they might have a very contrary effect. The gentleman was extremely mistaken if it was his idea that other gentlemen were determined at all events to discover a charge; he only wished an investigation of the truth, and let that truth as well as the law dictate the proper measures to be used. The affair having been brought before the house, he would say it was their duty to obtain all possible information, whether in favour of or against the president; with this view he made the motion. Contrary to the opinion expressed by the gentleman last up, he must consider this case extremely similar, and he believed the most minute scrutiny could not distinguish between them. There was this difference, however, so far as the house had knowledge of it at present; in one there was a requisition made, in the other there possibly was not, but whether so or not he wished to be satisfied, as well as the ground for which a requisition was made and refused. There had been no law passed since the New Jersey case occurred, to carry this 27th article of the treaty into effect, and therefore the proceedings in every case ought to have been precisely the same, but not having been so, Mr. G. said he wished to know on what rule or law the president had acted. Much had been said as to the claim of Thomas Nash to citizenship. How far the president acted in that case with regard to citizenship would be seen; but there was one remarkable fact as to the New Jersey case. One of the men named Brigstock, it appeared, was indicted by three different indictments; two of them were for piracy, and were much alike, the other was for murder; for the two first he was tried and acquitted, but for the last, a nolle prosequi was left; one remarkable difference was in the last indictment from the two others; in that he was represented as being a citizen of the United States. He thought it was very probable the nolle prosequi was ordered by the president, because the man was a citizen of the United States; the opinion of the president on that case, Mr Gallatin thought, would tend much to elucidate his conduct with respect to Nash's case.

Mr Marshall (whose speech, as given in a note to Bee's reports, 266, was written out by himself, which is said by Judge Story to be among the very ablest arguments on record, and is even admitted by the Aurora to have temporarily silenced opposition, and which is consequently introduced here in full), said, that believing, as he did most seriously, that in a government constituted like that of the United States, much of the public happiness depended, not only on its being rightly administered, but on the measures of administration being rightly understood. on rescuing public opinion from those numerous prejudices with which so many causes might combine to surround it, he could not but have been highly gratified with the very eloquent, and what was still more valuable, the very able and very correct argument which had been delivered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Bayard) against the resolutions now under consideration. He had not expected that the effect of this argument would have been universal; but he had cherished the hope, and in this he had not been disappointed, that it would be very extensive. He did not flatter himself with being able to shed much new light on the subject; but, as the argument in opposition to the resolutions had been assailed, with considerable ability, by gentlemen of great talents, he trusted the house would not think the time misapplied, which would be devoted to the re-establishment of the principles contained in that argument, and to the refutation of those advanced in opposition to it. In endeavouring to do this, he should notice the observations in support of the resolutions, not in the precise order in which they were made; but as they applied to the different points he deemed it necessary to maintain, in order to demonstrate, that the conduct of the executive of the United States could not justly be charged with the errors imputed to it by the resolutions. His first proposition, he said, was that the case of Thomas Nash, as stated to the president, was completely within the 27th article of the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation, entered into between the United States of America and Great Britain. He read the article, and then observed: "The casus fœderis of this article occurs, when a person, having committed murder or forgery within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, and having sought an asylum in the country of the other, is charged with the crime, and his delivery demanded, on such proof of his guilt as, according to the laws of the place where he shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed." The case stated is, that Thomas Nash, having committed a murder on board of a British frigate, navigating the high seas under a commission from his Britannic majesty, had sought an asylum within the United States, and on this case his delivery was demanded by the minister of the king of Great Britain. It is manifest that the case stated, if supported by proof, is within the letter of the article, provided a murder committed in a British frigate, on the high seas, be committed within the jurisdiction of that nation. That such a murder is within their jurisdiction, has been fully shown by the gentleman from Delaware. The principle is, that the jurisdiction of a nation extends to the whole of its territory, and to its own citizens in every part of the world. The laws of a nation are rightfully obligatory on its own citizens in every situation, where those laws are really extended to them. This principle is founded on the nature of civil union. It is supported everywhere by public opinion, and is recognized by writers on the law of nations. Rutherforth, in his second volume (page 180), says: "The jurisdiction which a civil society has over the persons of its members, affects them immediately, whether they are within its territories or not." This general principle is especially true, and is particularly recognized, with respect to the fleets of a nation on the high seas. To punish offences committed in its fleet, is the practice of every nation in the universe; and consequently the opinion of the world is, that a fleet at sea is within the jurisdiction of the nation to which it belongs. Rutherforth (volume 2, p. 491) says, there can be no doubt about the jurisdiction of a nation over the persons which compose its fleets, when they are out at sea, whether they are sailing upon it or are stationed in any particular part of it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Gallatin), though he has not directly controverted this doctrine, has sought to weaken it by observing, that the jurisdiction of a nation at sea could not be complete even in its own vessels; and in support of this position he urged the admitted practice of submitting to search for contraband—a practice not tolerated on land, within the territory of a neutral power. The rule is as stated; but is founded on a principle which does not affect the jurisdiction of a nation over its citizens or subjects in its ships. The principle is, that in the sea, itself, no nation has any jurisdiction. All may equally exercise their rights, and consequently the right of a belligerent power to prevent aid being given to his enemy, is not restrained by any superior right of a neutral in the place. But if this argument possessed any force, it would not apply to national ships of war, since the usage of nations does not permit them to be searched. According to the practice of the world, then, and the opinions of writers on the law of nations, the murder committed on board of a British frigate navigating the high seas, was a murder committed within the jurisdiction of the British nation. Although such a murder is plainly within the letter of the article, it has been contended not to be within its just construction; because at sea all nations have a common jurisdiction, and the article correctly construed, will not embrace a case of concurrent jurisdiction. It is deemed unnecessary to controvert this construction, because the proposition, that the United States had no jurisdiction over the murder committed by Thomas Nash, is believed to be completely demonstrable. It is not true that all nations have jurisdiction over all offences committed at sea. On the contrary, no nation has any jurisdiction at sea, but over its own citizens or vessels, or offences against itself. This principle is laid down in 2 Ruth. Inst. 488, 491.

The American government has, on a very solemn occasion, avowed the same principle. The first minister of the French republic asserted and exercised powers of so extraordinary a nature, as unavoidably to produce a controversy with the United States. The situation in which the government then found itself was such as necessarily to occasion a very serious and mature consideration of the opinions it should adopt. Of consequence, the opinions then declared deserve great respect. In the case alluded to, Mr. Genet had asserted the right of fitting out privateers in the American ports, and of manning them with American citizens in order to cruise against nations with whom America was at peace. In reasoning against this extravagant claim, the then secretary of state, in his letter of the 17th of June, 1793, says: "For our citizens then to commit murders and depredations on the members of nations at peace with us, or to combine to do it, appeared to the executive, and to those whom they consulted, as much against the laws of the land as to murder or rob, or combine to murder or rob its own citizens; and as much to require punishment, if done within their limits, where they have a territorial jurisdiction, or on the high seas, where they have a personal jurisdiction, that is to say, one which reaches their own citizens only; this being an appropriate part of each nation, on an element where all have a common jurisdiction." The well considered opinion, then, of the American government, on this subject, is that the jurisdiction of a nation at sea is "personal," reaching its "own citizens only;" and that this is the "appropriate part of each nation" on that element.

This is precisely the opinion maintained by the opposers of the resolutions. If the jurisdiction of America at sea be personal, reaching its own citizens only; if this be its appropriate part, then the jurisdiction of the nation cannot extend to a murder committed by a British sailor, on board a British frigate navigating the high seas under a commission from his Britannic majesty. As a further illustration of the principle contended for, suppose a contract made at sea, and a suit instituted for the recovery of money which might be due thereon. By the laws of what nation would the contract be governed? The principle is general that a personal contract follows the person, but is governed by the law of the place where it is formed. By what law then would such a contract be governed? If all nations had jurisdiction over the place, then the laws of all nations would equally influence the contract; but certainly no man will hesitate to admit that such a contract ought to be decided according to the laws of that nation to which the vessel or contracting parties might belong. Suppose a duel, attended with death, in the fleet of a foreign nation, or in any vessel which returned safe to port, could it be pretended that any government on earth, other than that to which the fleet or vessel belonged, had jurisdiction in the case; or that the offender could be tried by the laws or tribunals of any other nation whatever? Suppose a private theft by one mariner from another, and the vessel to perform its voyage and return in safety, would it be contended that all nations have equal cognizance of the crime, and are equally authorized to punish it? If there be this common jurisdiction at sea, why not punish desertion from one belligerent power to another, or correspondence with the enemy, or any other crime which may be perpetrated? A common jurisdiction over all offences at sea, in whatever vessel committed, would involve the power of punishing the offences which have been stated. Yet, all gentlemen will disclaim this power. It follows, then, that no such common jurisdiction exists. In truth the right of every nation to punish is limited, in its nature, to offences against the nation inflicting the punishment. This principle is believed to be universally true. It comprehends every possible violation of its laws on its own territory, and it extends to violations committed elsewhere by persons it has a right to bind. It extends also to general piracy. A pirate, under the law of nations, is an enemy of the human race. Being the enemy of all, he is liable to be punished by all. Any act which denotes this universal hostility, is an act of piracy. Not only an actual robbery, therefore, but cruising on the high seas without commission, and with intent to rob, is piracy. This is an offence against all and every nation, and is therefore alike punishable by all. But an offence which in its nature affects only a particular nation, is only punishable by that nation. It is by confounding general piracy with piracy by statute, that indistinct ideas have been produced, respecting the power to punish offences committed on the high seas. A statute may make any offence piracy, committed within the jurisdiction of the nation passing the statute, and such offence will be punishable by that nation. But piracy under the law of nations which alone is punishable by all nations, can only consist in an act which is an offence against all. No particular nation can increase or diminish the list of offences thus punishable. It had been observed by his colleague (Mr. Nicholas), for the purpose of showing that the distinction taken on this subject by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Bayard) was inaccurate, that any vessel robbed on the high seas could be the property only of a single nation, and being only an offence against that nation, could be, on the principle taken by the opposers of the resolutions, no offence against the law of nations; but in this his colleague had not accurately considered the principle. As a man who turns out to rob on the highway, and forces from a stranger his purse with a pistol at his bosom, is not the particular enemy of that stranger, but alike the enemy of every man who carries a purse, so those who without a commission rob on the high seas, manifest a temper hostile to all nations, and therefore become the enemies of all. The same inducements which occasion the robbery of one vessel, exist to occasion the robbery of others, and therefore the single offence is an offence against the whole community of nations, manifests a temper hostile to all, is the commencement of an attack on all, and is consequently, of right, punishable by all. His colleague had also contended that all the offences at sea, punishable by the British statutes from which the act of congress was in a great degree copied, were piracies at common law, or by the law of nations, and as murder is among these, consequently murder was an act of piracy by the law of nations, and therefore punishable by every nation. In support of this position he had cited 1 Hawk. P. C. 267, 271; 3 Inst. 112, and 1 Wood. El. Jur. 140.

The amount of these cases is, that no new offence is made piracy by the statutes; but that a different tribunal is created for their trial, which is guided by a different rule from that which governed previous to those statutes. Therefore, on an indictment for piracy, it is still necessary to prove an offence which was piracy before the statutes. He drew from these authorities a very different conclusion from that which had been drawn by his colleague. To show the correctness of his conclusion, it was necessary to observe, that the statute did not indeed change the nature of piracy, since it only transferred the trial of the crime to a different tribunal where different rules of decision prevailed; but having done this, other crimes committed on the high seas, which were not piracy, were made punishable by the same tribunal; but certainly this municipal regulation could not be considered as proving that those offences were, before, piracy by the law of nations. (Mr. Nicholas insisted that the law was not correctly stated, whereupon Mr. Marshall called for 3 Inst. and read the statute:) "All treasons, felonies, robberies, murders, and confederacies, committed in or upon the seas," &c., "shall be inquired, tried, heard, determined and judged in such shires," &c. "in like form and condition as if any such offence had been committed on the land," &c. "And such as shall be convicted," &c., "shall have and suffer such pains of death," &c., "as if they had been attainted of any treason, felony, robbery, or other the said offences done upon the land." This statute, it is certain, does not change the nature of piracy; but all treasons, felonies, robberies, murders and confederacies committed in or upon the sea, are not declared to have been, nor are they piracies. If a man be indicted as a pirate, the offence must be shown to have been piracy before the statute; but if he be indicted for treason, felony, robbery, murder, or confederacy, committed at sea, whether such offence was or was not a piracy, he shall be punished in like manner as if he had committed the same offence on land. The passage cited from 1 Woodeson, 140, is a full authority to this point. Having stated that offences committed at sea were formerly triable before the lord high admiral, according to the course of the Roman civil law, Woodeson says: "But, by the statutes 27 Hen. VIII., c. 4, and 28 Hen. VIII., c. 15, all treasons, felonies, piracies and other crimes committed on the sea, or where the admiral has jurisdiction, shall be tried in the realm as if done on land. But the statutes referred to affect only the manner of the trial so far as respects piracy. The nature of the offence is not changed. Whether a charge amount to piracy or not, must still depend on the law of nations, except where in the case of British subjects, express acts of parliament have declared that the crimes therein specified shall be adjudged piracy, or shall be liable to the same mode of trial and degree of punishment." This passage proves not only that all offences at sea are not piracies by the law of nations, but also that all indictments for piracy must depend on the law of nations, "except where, in the case of British subjects, express acts of parliament" have changed the law. Why do not these "express acts of parliament" change the law as to others than "British subjects?" The words are general, "all treasons, felonies," &c. Why are they confined in construction to British subjects? The answer is a plain one: The jurisdiction of the nation is confined to its territory and to its subjects.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Gallatin) abandons, and very properly abandons, this untenable ground. He admits that no nation has a right to punish offences against another nation, and that the United States can only punish offences against their own laws and the law of nations. He admits, too, that if there had only been a mutiny (and consequently if there had only been a murder) on board the Hermione, that the American courts could have taken no cognizance of the crime. Yet mutiny is punishable as piracy by the law of both nations. That gentleman contends that the act committed by Nash was piracy, according to the law of nations. He supports his position by insisting that the offence may be constituted by the commission of a single act; that unauthorized robbery on the high seas is this act, and that the crew having seized the vessel, and being out of the protection of any nation, were pirates. It is true that the offence may be completed by a single act; but it depends on the nature of that act. If it be such as manifests generally hostility against the world—an intention to rob generally, then it is piracy; but if it be merely a mutiny and murder in a vessel, for the purpose of delivering it up to the enemy, it seems to be an offence against a single nation and not to be piracy. The sole object of the crew might be to go over to the enemy, or to free themselves from the tyranny experienced on board a ship of war, and not to rob generally. But, should it even be true that running away with a vessel to deliver her up to an enemy was an act of general piracy, punishable by all nations, yet the mutiny and murder were a distinct offence. Had the attempt to seize the vessel failed, after the commission of the murder, then, according to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the American courts could have taken no cognizance of the crime. Whatever then might have been the law respecting the piracy, of the murder there was no jurisdiction. For the murder, not the piracy, Nash was delivered up. Murder and not piracy, is comprehended in the 27th article of the treaty between the two nations. Had he been tried then and acquitted on an indictment for the piracy, he must still have been delivered up for the murder, of which the court could have no jurisdiction. It is certain that an acquittal of the piracy would not have discharged the murder; and, therefore, in the so much relied on trials at Trenton, a separate indictment for murder was filed after an indictment for piracy. Since, then, if acquitted for piracy, he must have been delivered to the British government on the charge of murder, the president of the United States might, very properly, without prosecuting for the piracy, direct him to be delivered up on the murder.

All the gentlemen who have spoken in support of the resolutions, have contended that the case of Thomas Nash is within the purview of the act of congress, which relates to this subject, and is by that act made punishable in the American courts. That is, that the act of congress designed to punish crimes committed on board a British frigate. Nothing can be more completely demonstrable than the untruth of this proposition. It has already been shown that the legislative jurisdiction of a nation extends only to its own territory, and to its own citizens, wherever they may be. Any general expression in a legislative act must, necessarily, be restrained to objects within the jurisdiction of the legislature passing the act. Of consequence an act of congress can only be construed to apply to the territory of the United States, comprehending every person within it and to the citizens of the United States. But, independent of this undeniable truth, the act itself affords complete testimony of its intention and extent. See 1 Laws U. S. p. 10 [1 Stat. 112]. The title is: "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." Not against Britain, France or the world, but singly "against the United States." The first section relates to treason, and its objects are, "any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States." This description comprehends only the citizens of the United States, and such others as may be on its territory or in its service. The second section relates to misprision of treason; and declares, without limitation, that any person or persons, having knowledge of any treason, and not communicating the same, shall be guilty of that crime. Here then is an instance of that limited description of persons in one section, and of that general description in another, which has been relied on to support the construction contended for by the friends of the resolutions. But will it be pretended that a person can commit misprision of treason who cannot commit treason itself? That he would be punishable for concealing a treason who could not be punished for plotting it? Or, can it be supposed that the act designed to punish an Englishman or a Frenchman, who, residing in his own country, should have knowledge of treasons against the United States, and should not cross the Atlantic to reveal them? The same observations apply to the sixth section, which makes any "person or persons" guilty of misprision of felony, who, having knowledge of murder or other offences enumerated in that section, should conceal them. It is impossible to apply this to a foreigner, in a foreign land, or to any person not owing allegiance to the United States. The eighth section, which is supposed to comprehend the case, after declaring that if any "person or persons" shall commit murder on the high seas, he shall be punishable with death, proceeds to say, that if any captain or mariner shall piratically run away with a ship or vessel, or yield her up voluntarily to a pirate, or if any seaman shall lay violent hands on his commander, to prevent his fighting, or shall make a revolt in the ship, every such offender shall be adjudged a pirate and a felon. The persons who are the objects of this section of the act are all described in general terms, which might embrace the subjects of all nations. But is it to be supposed that if in an engagement between an English and a French ship of war, the crew of the one or the other should lay violent hands on the captain and force him to strike, that this would be an offence against the act of congress, punishable in the courts of the United States? On this extended construction of the general terms of the section, not only the crew of one of the foreign vessels forcing their captain to surrender to another would incur the penalties of the act, but if in the late action between the gallant Truxton and the French frigate, the crew of that frigate had compelled the captain to surrender, while he was unwilling to do so, they would have been indictable as felons in the courts of the United States. But surely the act of congress admits of no such extravagant construction. His colleague, Mr. Marshall said, had cited and particularly relied on the ninth section of the act; that section declares that if a citizen shall commit any of the enumerated piracies, or any acts of hostility, on the high seas, against the United States, under colour of a commission from any foreign prince or state, he shall be adjudged a pirate, felon and robber, and shall suffer death. This section is only a positive extension of the act to a case which might otherwise have escaped punishment. It takes away the protection of a foreign commission from an American citizen, who, on the high seas, robs his countrymen. This is no exception from any preceding part of the law, because there is no part which relates to the conduct of vessels commissioned by a foreign power: it only proves that, in the opinion of the legislature, the penalties of the act could not, without this express provision, have been incurred by a citizen holding a foreign commission. It is then most certain that the act of congress does not comprehend the case of a murder committed on board a foreign ship of war.

The gentleman from New York has cited 2 Wood. El. Jur. 428, to show that the courts of England extend their jurisdiction to piracies committed by the subjects of foreign nations. This has not been doubted. The case from Woodeson is a case of robberies committed on the high seas by a vessel without authority. There are ordinary acts of piracy which, as has been already stated, being offences against all nations, are punishable by all. The case from 2 Woodeson, and the note cited from the same book by the gentleman from Delaware, are strong authorities against the doctrines contended for by the friends of the resolutions.

It has also been contended that the question of jurisdiction was decided at Trenton, by receiving indictments against persons there arraigned for the same offence, and by retaining them for trial after the return of the habeas corpus. Every person in the slightest degree acquainted with judicial proceedings knows that an indictment is no evidence of jurisdiction; and that in criminal cases, the question of jurisdiction will seldom be made but by arrest of judgment after conviction. The proceedings after the return of the habeas corpus only prove that the case was not such a case as to induce the judge immediately to decide against his jurisdiction. The question was not free from doubt, and therefore might very properly be postponed until its decision should become necessary.

It has been argued by the gentleman from New York, that the form of the indictment is, itself, evidence of a power in the court to try the case. Every word of that indictment, said the gentleman, gives the lie to a denial of the jurisdiction of the court. It would be assuming a very extraordinary principle indeed, to say that words inserted in an indictment for the express purpose of assuming the jurisdiction of a court, should be admitted to prove that jurisdiction. The question certainly depended on the nature of the fact, and not on the description of the fact. But as an indictment must necessarily contain formal words in order to be supported, and as forms often denote what a case must substantially be to authorize a court to take cognizance of it, some words in the indictments at Trenton ought to be noticed. The indictments charge the persons to have been within the peace, and murder to have been committed against the peace of the United States. These are necessary averments, and, to give the court jurisdiction, the fact ought to have accorded with them. But who will say that the crew of a British frigate on the high seas are within the peace of the United States, or a murder committed on board such a frigate against the peace of any other than the British government? It is then demonstrated that the murder with which Thomas Nash was charged, was not committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, and, consequently, that the case stated was completely within the letter, and the spirit of the twenty-seventh article of the treaty between the two nations. If the necessary evidence was produced, he ought to have been delivered up to justice. It was an act to which the American nation was bound by a most solemn compact. To have tried him for the murder would have been mere mockery. To have condemned and executed him, the court having no jurisdiction, would have been murder; to have acquitted and discharged him would have been a breach of faith, and a violation of national duty.

But, it has been contended, that although Thomas Nash ought to have been delivered up to the British minister, on the requisition made by him in the name of his government, yet the interference of the president was improper. This Mr. Marshall said led to his second proposition, which was: That the case was a case for executive and not judicial decision. He admitted implicitly the division of powers, stated by the gentleman from New York, and that it was the duty of each department to resist the encroachments of the others. This being established, the inquiry was, to what department was the power in question allotted? The gentleman from New York had relied on the second section of the third article of the constitution, which enumerates the cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends, as expressly including that now under consideration. Before he examined that section, it would not be improper to notice a very material misstatement of it made in the resolutions, offered by the gentleman from New York. By the constitution, the judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States; but the resolutions declare that judicial power to extend to all questions arising under the constitution, treaties and laws of the United States. The difference between the constitution and the resolutions was material and apparent. A case in law or equity was a term well understood, and of limited signification. It was a controversy between parties which had taken a shape for judicial decision. If the judicial power extended to every question under the constitution, it would involve almost every subject proper for legislative discussion and decision; if to every question under the laws and treaties of the United States, it would involve almost every subject on which the executive could act. The division of power which the gentleman had stated could exist no longer, and the other departments would be swallowed up by the judiciary. But it was apparent that the resolutions had essentially misrepresented the constitution. He did not charge the gentleman from New York with intentional misrepresentation; he would not attribute to him such an artifice in any case, much less in a case where detection was so easy, and so certain. Yet this substantial departure from the constitution, in resolutions affecting substantially to unite it, was not less worthy of remark for being unintentional. It manifested the course of reasoning by which the gentleman had himself been misled, and his judgment betrayed into the opinions those resolutions expressed. By extending the judicial power to all cases in law and equity, the constitution had never been understood to confer on that department any political power whatever. To come within this description, a question must assume a legal form for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties to come into court, who can be reached by its process, and bound by its power; whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit. A case in law or equity proper for judicial decision may arise under a treaty, where the rights of individuals acquired or secured by a treaty are to be asserted or defended in court. As under the fourth or sixth article of the treaty of peace with Great Britain, or under those articles of our late treaties with France, Prussia and other nations, which secure to the subjects of those nations their property within the United States: or, as would be an article, which, instead of stipulating to deliver up an offender, should stipulate his punishment, provided the case was punishable by the laws and in the courts of the United States. But the judicial power cannot extend to political compacts: as the establishment of the boundary line between the American and British dominions: the case of the late guarantee in our treaty with France, or the case of the delivery of a murderer under the twenty-seventh article of our present treaty with Britain. The gentleman from New York has asked, triumphantly asked, what power exists in our courts to deliver up an individual to a foreign government? "Permit me," said Mr. Marshall, "but not triumphantly, to retort the question. By what authority can any court render such a judgment? What power does a court possess to seize any individual and determine that he shall be adjudged by a foreign tribunal? Surely our courts possess no such power, yet they must possess it, if this article of the treaty is to be executed by the courts." Gentlemen have cited and relied on that clause in the constitution, which enables congress to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations; together with the act of congress, declaring the punishment of those offences; as transferring the whole subject to the courts. But that clause can never be construed to make to the government a grant of power, which the people making it do not themselves possess. It has already been shown that the people of the United States have no jurisdiction over offences committed on board a foreign ship against a foreign nation. Of consequence, in framing a government for themselves, they cannot have passed this jurisdiction to that government. The law, therefore, cannot act upon the case. But this clause of the constitution cannot be considered, and need not be considered, as affecting acts which are piracy under the law of nations. As the judicial power of the United States extends to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and piracy under the law of nations is of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, punishable by every nation, the judicial power of the United States of course extends to it. On this principle the courts of admiralty under the Confederation took cognizance of piracy, although there was no express power in congress to define and punish the offence. But the extension of the judicial power of the United States to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction must necessarily be understood with some limitation. All cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction which, from their nature, are triable in the United States, are submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. There are cases of piracy by the law of nations, and cases within the legislative jurisdiction of the nation; the people of America possessed no other power over the subject, and could consequently transfer no other to their courts; and it has already been proved that a murder committed on board a foreign ship-of-war is not comprehended within this description.

The consular convention with France, has also been relied on, as proving the act of delivering up an individual to a foreign power to be in its nature judicial and not executive. The ninth article of that convention authorizes the consuls and vice consuls of either nation to cause to be arrested all deserters from their vessels, "for which purpose the said consuls and vice consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges and officers competent." This article of the convention does not, like the 27th article of the treaty with Britain, stipulate a national act, to be performed on the demand of a nation; it only authorizes a foreign minister to cause an act to be done, and prescribes the course he is to pursue. The contract itself is, that the act shall be performed by the agency of the foreign consul, through the medium of the courts; but this affords no evidence that a contract of a very different nature is to be performed in the same manner. It is said that the then president of the United States declared the incompetency of the courts, judges and officers to execute this contract without an act of the legislature. But the then president made no such declaration. He has said that some legislative provision is requisite to carry the stipulations of the convention into full effect. This, however, is by no means declaring the incompetency of a department to perform an act stipulated by treaty, until the legislative authority shall direct its performance.

It has been contended that the conduct of the executive on former occasions, similar to this in principle, has been such as to evince an opinion, even in that department, that the case in question is proper for the decision of the courts. The fact adduced to support this argument is the determination of the late president on the case of prizes made within the jurisdiction of the United States, or by privateers fitted out in their ports. The nation was bound to deliver up those prizes in like manner, as the nation is now bound to deliver up an individual demanded under the 27th article of the treaty with Britain. The duty was the same, and devolved on the same department. In quoting the decision of the executive on that case, the gentleman from New York has taken occasion to bestow a high encomium on the late president; and to consider his conduct as furnishing an example worthy the imitation of his successor. It must be cause of much delight to the real friends of that great man; to those who supported his administration while in office from a conviction of its wisdom and its virtue, to hear the unqualified praise which is now bestowed on it by those who had been supposed to possess different opinions. If the measure now under consideration shall be found, on examination, to be the same in principle with that which has been cited, by its opponents as a fit precedent for it, then may the friends of the gentleman now in office indulge the hope, that when he, like his predecessor, shall be no more, his conduct too may be quoted as an example for the government of his successors.

The evidence relied on to prove the opinion of the then executive on the case, consists of two letters from the secretary of state, the one of the 29th of June, 1793, to Mr. Genet, and the other of the 16th of August, 1793, to Mr. Morris. In the letter to Mr. Genet, the secretary says, that the claimant having filed his libel against the ship William, in the court of admiralty, there was no power which could take the vessel out of court until it had decided against its own jurisdiction; that having so decided, the complaint is lodged with the executive, and he asks for evidence to enable that department to consider and decide finally on the subject. It will be difficult to find in this letter an executive opinion, that the case was not a case for executive decision. The contrary is clearly avowed. It is true, that when an individual, claiming the property as his, had asserted that claim in court, the executive acknowledges in itself a want of power to dismiss or decide upon the claim thus pending in court. But this argues no opinion of a want of power in itself to decide upon the case, if, instead of being carried before a court as an individual claim, it is brought before the executive as a national demand. A private suit instituted by an individual, asserting his claim to property, can only be controlled by that individual. The executive can give no direction concerning it. But a public prosecution carried on in the name of the United States can, without impropriety, be dismissed at the will of the government. The opinion, therefore, given in this letter, is unquestionably correct; but it is certainly misunderstood, when it is considered as being an opinion that the question was not in its nature a question for executive decision. In the letter to Mr. Morris, the secretary asserts the principle, that vessels taken within our jurisdiction ought to be restored, but says, it is yet unsettled whether the act of restoration is to be performed by the executive or judicial department. The principle, then, according to this letter, is not submitted to the courts—whether a vessel captured within a given distance of the American coast, was or was not captured within the jurisdiction of the United States, was a question not to be determined by the courts, but by the executive. The doubt expressed is, not what tribunal shall settle the principle, but what tribunal shall settle the fact. In this respect, a doubt might exist in the case of prizes, which could not exist in the case of a man. Individuals on each side claimed the property, and therefore their rights could be brought into court, and there contested as a case in law or equity. The demand of a man made by a nation stands on different principles.

Having noticed the particular letters cited by the gentleman from New York, "permit me now," said Mr. Marshall, "to ask the attention of the house to the whole course of executive conduct on this interesting subject." It is first mentioned in a letter from the secretary of state to Mr. Genet, of the 25th of June, 1793. In that letter, the secretary states a consultation between himself and the secretaries of the treasury and war, (the president being absent,) in which (so well were they assured of the president's way of thinking in those cases), it was determined that the vessels should be detained in the custody of the consuls, in the ports, until the government of the United States shall be able to inquire into and decide on the fact. In his letter of the 12th of July, 1793, the secretary writes: The president has determined to refer the questions concerning prizes "to persons learned in the laws," and he requests that certain vessels enumerated in the letter should not depart "until his ultimate determination shall be made known." In his letter of the 7th of August, 1793, the secretary informs Mr. Genet that the president considers the United States as bound "to effectuate the restoration of, or to make compensation for, prizes which shall have been made of any of the parties at war with France, subsequent to the 5th day of June last, by privateers fitted out of our ports." That it is consequently expected that Mr. Genet will cause restitution of such prizes to be made, and that the United States "will cause restitution" to be made "of all such prizes as shall be hereafter brought within their ports by any of the said privateers." In his letter of the 10th of November, 1793, the secretary informs Mr. Genet, that for the purpose of obtaining testimony to ascertain the fact of capture within the jurisdiction of the United States, the governors of the several states were requested, on receiving any such claim, immediately to notify thereof the attorneys of their several districts, whose duty it would be to give notice "to the principal agent of both parties, and also to the consuls of the nations interested; and to recommend to them to appoint by mutual consent arbiters to decide whether the capture was made within the jurisdiction of the United States, as stated in my letter of the 8th inst., according to whose award the governor may proceed to deliver the vessel to the one or the other party." "If either party refuse to name arbiters, then the attorney is to take depositions on notice, which he is to transmit for the information and decision of the president." "This prompt procedure is the more to be insisted on, as it will enable the president, by an immediate delivery of the vessel and cargo to the party having title, to prevent the injuries consequent on long delay." In his letter of the 22d of November, 1793, the secretary repeats, in substance, his letter of the 12th of July and 7th of August, and says that the determination to deliver up certain vessels, involved the brig Jane of Dublin, the brig Lovely Lass, and the brig Prince Wm. Henry. He concludes with saying: "I have it in charge to inquire of you, sir, whether these three brigs have been given up according to the determination of the president, and if they have not, to repeat the requisition that they may be given up to their former owners." Ultimately it was settled that the fact should be investigated in the courts, but the decision was regulated by the principles established by the executive department.

The decision then on the case of vessels captured within the American jurisdiction, by privateers fitted out of the American ports, which the gentleman from New York has cited with such merited approbation; which he has declared to stand on the same principles with those which ought to have governed in the case of Thomas Nash; and which deserves the more respect, because the government of the United States was then so circumstanced as to assure us, that no opinion was lightly taken up, and no resolution formed but on mature consideration. This decision, quoted as a precedent and pronounced to be right, is found, on fair and full examination, to be precisely and unequivocally the same with that which was made in the case under consideration. It is a full authority to show, that, in the opinion always held by the American government, a case like that of Thomas Nash is a case for executive and not judicial decision. This clause in the constitution which declares that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," has also been relied on as operating on the case, and transferring the decision on a demand for the delivery of an individual from the executive to the judicial department. But certainly this clause in the constitution of the United States cannot be thought obligatory on, and for the benefit of, the whole world. It is not designed to secure the rights of the people of Europe and Asia, or to direct and control proceedings against criminals throughout the universe. It can then be designed only to guide the proceedings of our own courts, and to prescribe the mode of punishing offences committed against the government of the United States, and to which the jurisdiction of the nation may rightfully extend.

It has already been shown that the courts of the United States were incapable of trying the crime for which Thomas Nash was delivered up to justice. The question to be determined was, not how his crime should be tried and punished, but whether he should be delivered up to a foreign tribunal which was alone capable of trying and punishing him. A provision for the trial of crimes in the courts of the United States is clearly not a provision for the performance of a national compact for the surrender to a foreign government of an offender against that government. The clause of the constitution declaring that the trial of all crimes shall be by jury, has never even been construed to extend to the trial of crimes committed in the land and naval forces of the United States. Had such a construction prevailed, it would most probably have prostrated the constitution itself, with the liberties and the independence of the nation before the first disciplined invader who should approach our shores. Necessity would have imperiously demanded the review, and amendment of so unwise a provision. If then this clause does not extend to offences committed in the fleets and armies of the United States, how can it be construed to extend to offences committed in the fleets and armies of Britain or of France, or of the Ottoman or Russian empires? The same argument applies to the observations on the seventh article of the amendments to the constitution. That article relates only to trials in the courts of the United States, and not to the performance of a contract for the delivery of a murderer not tria-ble in those courts. In this part of the argument, the gentleman from New York has presented a dilemma—of a very wonderful structure indeed. He says, that the offence of Thomas Nash was either a crime or not a crime. If it was a crime, the constitutional mode of punishment ought to have been observed; if it was not a crime, he ought not to have been delivered up to a foreign government, where his punishment was inevitable. It had escaped the observation of that gentleman, that if the murder committed by Thomas Nash was a crime, yet it was not a crime provided for by the constitution, or triable in the courts of the United States; and that if it was not a crime, yet it is the precise case in which his surrender was stipulated by treaty. Of this extraordinary dilemma then, the gentleman from New York is, himself, perfectly at liberty to retain either form. He has chosen to consider it as a crime, and says it has been made a crime by treaty, and is punished by sending the offender out of the country. The gentleman is incorrect in every part of his statement. Murder on board a British frigate is not a crime created by treaty. It would have been a crime of precisely the same magnitude, had the treaty never been formed. It is not punished by sending the offender out of the United States. The experience of this unfortunate criminal, who was hung and gibbeted, evinced to him that the punishment of his crime was of a much more serious nature than mere banishment from the United States. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from Virginia, have both contended that this was a case proper for the decision of the courts, because points of law occurred, and points of law must have been decided in its determination.

The points of law which must have been decided, are stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be, first, a question whether the offence was committed within the British jurisdiction; and secondly, whether the crime charged was comprehended within the treaty. It is true, sir, these points of law must have occurred, and must have been decided: but it by no means follows that they could only have been decided in court. A variety of legal questions must present themselves in the performance of every part of executive duty, but these questions are not therefore to be decided in court. Whether a patent for land shall issue or not is always a question of law, but not a question which must necessarily be carried into court. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to have permitted himself to have been misled by the misrepresentation of the constitution made in the resolutions of the gentleman from New York; and, in consequence of being so misled, his observations have the appearance of endeavoring to fit the constitution to his arguments, instead of adapting his arguments to the constitution. When the gentleman has proved that these are questions of law, and that they must have been decided by the president, he has not advanced a single step towards proving that they were improper for executive decision. The question whether vessels captured within three miles of the American coast, or by privateers fitted out in the American ports, were legally captured or not, and whether the American government was bound to restore them, if in its power, were questions of law, but they were questions of political law, proper to be decided, and they were decided by the executive, and not by the courts. The casus fœderis of the guaranty was a question of law, but no man could have hazarded the opinion that such a question must be carried into court, and can only be there decided. So the casus fœderis, under the twenty-seventh article of the treaty with Britain, is a question of law, but of political law. The question to be decided is, whether the particular case proposed be one in which the nation has bound itself to act, and this is a question depending on principles never submitted to courts. If a murder should be committed within the United States, and the murderer should seek an asylum in Britain, the question whether the casus fœderis of the twenty-seventh article had occurred, so that his delivery ought to be demanded, would be a question of law, but no man would say it was a question which ought to be decided in the courts. When, therefore, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has established, that in delivering up Thomas Nash, points of law were decided by the president, he has established a position which in no degree whatever aids his argument. The case was in its nature a national demand made upon the nation. The parties were the two nations. They cannot come into court to litigate their claims, nor can a court decide on them. Of consequence the demand is not a case for judicial cognizance. The president is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations. Of consequence, the demand of a foreign nation can only be made on him. He possesses the whole executive power. He holds and directs the force of the nation. Of consequence, any act to be performed by the force of the nation is to be performed through him. He is charged to execute the laws. A treaty is declared to be a law. He must then execute a treaty, where he, and he alone, possesses the means of executing it. The treaty, which is a law, enjoins the performance of a particular object. The person, who is to perform this object, is marked out by the constitution, since the person is named who conducts the foreign intercourse, and is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. The means by which it is to be performed, the force of the nation, are in the hands of this person. Ought not this person to perform the object, although the particular mode of using the means has not been prescribed? Congress, unquestionably, may prescribe the mode, and congress may devolve on others the whole execution of the contract; but, till this be done, it seems the duty of the executive department to execute the contract by any means it possesses. The gentleman from Pennsylvania contends, that, although this should be properly an executive duty, yet it cannot be performed until congress shall direct the mode of performance. He says that, although the jurisdiction of the courts is extended by the constitution to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, yet if the courts had been created without any express assignment of jurisdiction, they could not have taken cognizance of cases expressly allotted to them by the constitution. The executive, he says, can, no more than courts, supply a legislative omission. It is not admitted that, in the case stated, courts could not have taken jurisdiction. The contrary is believed to be the correct opinion. And although the executive cannot supply a total legislative omission, yet it is not admitted or believed that there is such a total omission in this case.

The treaty, stipulating that a murderer shall be delivered up to justice, is as obligatory as an act of congress making the same declaration. If, then, there was an act of congress in the words of the treaty, declaring that a person who had committed murder within the jurisdiction of Britain, and sought an asylum within the territory of the United States, should be delivered up by the United States, on the demand of his Britannic majesty, and such evidence of his criminality, as would have justified his commitment for trial, had the offence been here committed; could the president, who is bound to execute the laws, have justified the refusal to deliver up the criminal, by saying, that the legislature had totally omitted to provide for the case? The executive is not only the constitutional department, but seems to be the proper department to which the power in question may most wisely and most safely be confided. The department which is entrusted with the whole foreign intercourse of the nation, with the negotiation of all its treaties, with the power of demanding a reciprocal performance of the article, which is accountable to the nation for the violation of its engagements with foreign nations, and for the consequences resulting from such violation, seems the proper department to be entrusted with the execution of a national contract like that under consideration. If, at any time, policy may temper the strict execution of the contract, where may that political discretion be placed so safely as in the department whose duty it is to understand precisely the state of the political intercourse and connection between the United States and foreign nations, to understand the manner in which the particular stipulation is explained and performed by foreign nations, and to understand completely the state of the Union? This department, too, independent of judicial aid, which may, perhaps, in some instances, be called in, is furnished with a great law officer, whose duty it is to understand and to advise when the casus fœderis occurs. And if the president should cause to be arrested under the treaty an individual who was so circumstanced as not to be properly the object of such an arrest, he may perhaps bring the question of the legality of his arrest before a judge by a writ of habeas corpus. It is then demonstrated, that, according to the practice and according to the principles of the American government, the question whether the nation has or has not bound itself to deliver up any individual, charged with having committed murder or forgery within the jurisdiction of Britain, is a question the power to decide which rests alone with the executive department.

It remains to inquire whether, in exercising this power, and in performing the duty it enjoins, the president has committed an unauthorized and dangerous interference with judicial decisions. That Thomas Nash was committed originally at the instance of the British consul at Charleston, not for trial in the American courts, but for the purpose of being delivered up to justice in conformity with the treaty between the two nations, has been already so ably argued by the gentleman from Delaware, that nothing further can be added to that point. He would, therefore, Mr. Marshall said, consider the case as if Nash, instead of having been committed for the purposes of the treaty, had been committed for trial. Admitting even this to have been the fact, the conclusions which have been drawn from it were by no means warranted. Gentlemen had considered it as an offence against judicial authority, and a violation of judicial rights to withdraw from their sentence a criminal against whom a prosecution had been commenced. They had treated the subject as if it was the privilege of courts to condemn to death the guilty wretch arraigned at their bar, and that to intercept the judgment was to violate the privilege. Nothing can be more incorrect than this view of the case. It is not the privilege, it is the sad duty of courts to administer criminal judgment. It is a duty to be performed at the demand of the nation, and with which the nation has a right to dispense. If judgment of death is to be pronounced, it must be at the prosecution of the nation, and the nation may at will stop that prosecution. In this respect the president expresses constitutionally the will of the nation; and may rightfully, as was done in the case at Trenton, enter a nolle prosequi, or direct that the criminal be prosecuted no further. This is no interference with judicial decisions, nor any invasion of the province of a court. It is the exercise of an indubitable and a constitutional power. Had the president directed the judge at Charleston to decide for or against his own jurisdiction, to condemn or acquit the prisoner, this would have been a dangerous interference with judicial decisions, and ought to have been resisted. But no such direction has been given, nor any such decision been required. If the president determined that Thomas Nash ought to have been delivered up to the British government for a murder committed on board a British frigate, provided evidence of the fact was adduced, it was a question which duty obliged him to determine, and which he determined rightly If, in consequence of this determination, he arrested the proceedings of a court on a national prosecution, he had a right to arrest and to stop them, and the exercise of this right was a necessary consequence of the determination of the principal question. In conforming to this decision, the court has left open the question of its jurisdiction. Should another prosecution of the same sort be commenced, which should not be suspended but continued by the executive, the case of Thomas Nash would not bind as a precedent against the jurisdiction of the court. If it should even prove that, in the opinion of the executive, a murder committed on board a foreign fleet was not within the jurisdiction of the court, it would prove nothing more; and though this opinion might rightfully induce the executive to exercise its power over the prosecution, yet if the prosecution was continued, it would have no influence with the court in deciding on its jurisdiction. Taking the fact, then, even to be as the gentleman in support of the resolutions would state it, the fact cannot avail them. It is to be remembered, too, that in the case stated to the president, the judge himself appears to have considered it as proper for executive decision, and to have wished that decision. The president and judge seem to have entertained, on this subject, the same opinion, and in consequence of the opinion of the judge, the application was made to the president.

It has then been demonstrated: (1) That the case of Thomas Nash, as stated to the president, was completely within the twenty-seventh article of the treaty between the United States of America and Great Britain; (2) that this question was proper for executive, and not for judicial decision; and (3) that in deciding it, the president is not chargeable with an interference with judicial decisions. After trespassing so long, Mr. Marshall said, on the patience of the house, in arguing what had appeared to him to be the material points growing out of the resolutions, he regretted the necessity of detaining them still longer for the purpose of noticing an observation which appeared not to be considered by the gentleman who made it as belonging to the argument. The subject introduced by this observation, however, was so calculated to interest the public feelings, that he must be excused for stating his opinion on it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said, that an impressed American seaman, who should commit homicide for the purpose of liberating himself from the vessel in which he was confined, ought not to be given up as a murderer In this, Mr. Marshall said, he concurred entirely with that gentleman. He believed the opinion to be unquestionably correct, as were the reasons that gentleman had given in support of it. He had never heard any American avow a contrary sentiment, nor did he believe a contrary sentiment could find a place in the bosom of any American. He could not pretend, and did not pretend to know the opinion of the executive on the subject, because he had never heard the opinions of that department; but he felt the most perfect conviction, founded on the general conduct of the government, that it could never surrender an impressed American to the nation, which, in making the impressment, had committed a national injury. This belief was in no degree shaken by the conduct of the executive in this particular case. In his own mind, it was a sufficient defence of the president from an imputation of this kind, that the fact of Thomas Nash being an impressed American was obviously not contemplated by him in the decision he made on the principles of the case. Consequently, if a new circumstance occurred, which would essentially change the case decided by the president, the judge ought not to have acted under that decision, but the new circumstance ought to have been stated. Satisfactory as this defence might appear, he should not resort to it because to some it might seem a subterfuge. He defended the conduct of the president on other and still stronger ground. The president had decided that a murder committed on board a British frigate on the high seas, was within the jurisdiction of that nation, and consequently within the twenty-seventh article of its treaty with the United States. He therefore directed Thomas Nash to be delivered to the British ministers, if satisfactory evidence of the murder should be adduced. The sufficiency of the evidence was submitted entirely to the judge. If Thomas Nash had committed a murder, the decision was that he should be surrendered to the British minister; but if he had not committed a murder, he was not to be surrendered. Had Thomas Nash been an impressed American, the homicide on board the Hermione would, most certainly, not have been a murder. The act of impressing an American is an act of lawless violence. The confinement on board a vessel is a continuation of that violence, and an additional outrage. Death committed within the United States, in resisting such violence, would not have been murder, and the person giving the wound could not have been treated as a murderer. Thomas Nash was only to have been delivered up to justice on such evidence as, had the fact been committed within the United States, would have been sufficient to have induced his commitment and trial for murder. Of consequence, the decision of the president was so expressed as to exclude the case of an impressed American liberating himself by homicide. He concluded with observing, that he had already too long availed himself of the indulgence of the house to venture farther on that indulgence by recapitulating or reinforcing the arguments which had already been urged.

Saturday, March 8. The only business which occupied the house was the unfinished business of Friday, on the question to agree with the committee of the whole in their disagreement with the resolution proposed by Mr. Livingston on the case of Jonathan Robbins. Mr. Nicholas spoke in answer to Mr. Marshall; immediately after which the question of agreement with the reported disagreement was taken by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas. Messrs. Bartlett, Bayard, Bird, J. Brown, Cooper, Craik, J. Davenport, Davis, Dennis, Dent, Dickson, Edmond, Evans, A. Foster, D. Foster, Freeman, Glen, Goode, C. Goodrich, Gordon, Gray, Griswold, Groves, Harper, Henderson, Hill, Imlay, Jones, Kittera, H. Lee, S. Lee, Lyman, Linn, Marshall, Nott, Otis, Page, Parker, Pinckney, Platt, Powell, Reed, Rutledge, Sewell, Sheafe, Sheppard, Spaight, Stone, Taliafero, Thatcher, J. C. Thomas, R. Thomas, Wadsworth, Waln, L. Williams, Varnum, Woods. 61. Nays. Messrs. Baily, Bishop, R. Brown, Cabel, Christee, Clay, Conduit, Eggleston, Elmendorf, Fowler, Gallatin, Gregg, Hanna, Heister, Holmes, Jackson, Kitchell, Leib, Lyon, Livingston, Macon, Muhlenburgh, New, Nicholas, Nicholson, Randolph, Smilie, J. Smith, S. Smith, Sumpter, Thomson, A. Trigg, J. Trigg, Van Courtland, R. Williams. 35. A motion was then made to adjourn. Mr. Macon hoped the house would sit and decide the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, so as to have done with the business, and not to enter on another week with it: however, fifty-four rising for the adjournment, it was carried.

Monday, March 10. Mr. Bayard moved that the committee of the whole house, to whom was referred the message of the president relative to Thomas Nash alias Jonathan Robbins, and a resolution submitted by himself to the house, approbating the conduct of the president, and referred to that committee, be discharged from the further consideration thereof. A long debate arose upon this motion, in which Messrs. Randolph, Davis, Jones, Nicholas, Livingston and Eggleston spoke against it; and Messrs. Bayard, Bird, Otis, Kittera, Varnum, Rutledge, Edmund, Shephard and H. Notwithstanding this disposal of the question, so far as its congressional aspect was concerned, Robbins' surrender continued a fertile subject for party declamation.

The views taken by the opposition after the adjournment, may be gathered from the following extract from the Aurora, of June 20, 1800.

Jonathan Robbins.

During the late session of congress we were promised some facts concerning this unfortunate citizen; and we hoped to have had them in time for the discussion upon Mr. Livingston's motion. We were disappointed then. We have been more successful since, and shall now lay before our readers the information we have obtained, literally, as we have obtained it, in a letter addressed by a gentleman residing at Danbury, to the editor of the Aurora. In the view of national independence; as it relates to our character as a nation; as it relates to the character and independence of our judiciary, it is a matter of utter insignificance, whether Jonathan Robbins was a native of the Irish bogs or of the rough declivities of Connecticut. Judge Bee himself declared as much from the bench; but he declared it in a sense different from what we conceive to be the law of the land, or the law of nations. Judge Bee, according to the report published, asserted that it made no difference whether Robbins was a British or an American citizen; the treaty comprehended both descriptions, and he was delivered up. We conceive that, having a law paramount to every treaty, that is the great charter of the federal constitution, to deliver him up, was (1) As a citizen, contrary to the constitution. (2) As charged with the crime of piracy on the high seas, over which the jurisdiction of all nations is common, it was a violation of law and justice. (3) That it was a violation of the constitution to deliver him up without the inquest of a jury.

The principal ground of defence set up to justify the interference of our executive, (and this appears to have been Pickering's act solely,) was that Robbins was an alien born; and the prejudices of the public were called forth to palliate and mitigate the disgrace of the act, under this black subterfuge of inhumanity. It is well worthy of consideration, however, with what nice sympathy in crimes and maxims of government, the angio-federalists and their British friends agree. It was a sufficient palliation of disgrace to say, Jonathan Robbins was a feigned name, and that in truth his name was Thomas Nash, a native of Waterford! It is remarkable that an Englishman was acquitted of murder at Waterford, in Ireland, under the British government, and upon this plea: The accused confessed that he had killed this man, but alleged that it was not murder, because he was a mere Irishman. The Hottentots are less barbarous than such civilized savages. Public weakness having tolerated, in some measure at least by its sullen silence, the delivery of this unfortunate man into the talons of the British, it became a matter of some moment to discover the validity and authority which the certificates procured from Danbury, by the immediate application of Mr. Pickering, carried with them. The certificates of the selectmen stated that they could find no such name as Jonathan Robbins on the records of Danbury. The public will be surprised to find this fact literally true, and yet covering a most gross deception. The records of Danbury were burnt along with the town, by the British, during our Revolutionary war. Consequently, these selectmen could not find his name therein. Thus, we see too, that the barbarity of the British soldiery during our war with them has been accessary to the murder at the distance of twenty years. The selectmen likewise asserted that they did not remember any family of the name of Robbins in Danbury. The matter has passed before the public, and the selectmen have recovered their memories, and they have actually found a family of that name, nay more, a brother of Jonathan Robbins, living within a few miles from that town. Read the letter—whoever wishes to see the original may see it in the hands of the editor. Extract of a letter to the editor, dated Danbury, June 1, 1800: "The delivering up of Jonathan Robbins under the 27th article of the British treaty, (for the furtherance of justice,) cannot, with all its palliation, be palatable to our citizens. On the subject of the certificates from this town, I wish to make a few observations. The gentlemen who wrote those certificates are, I believe, men of common honesty; they are so reported here, but assure yourself they are party men. In the first place the records of this town were burnt with the town in the time of the last war. It is not difficult to suppose a man might forget the record of a person whom he could not have thought of in twenty years, when the records where his name must have been deposited, had been reduced to ashes for that length of time; still less is the difficulty in conceiving that he might be born there, but never recorded. There is no impossibility or improbability that he belonged to an obscure family, then scarcely known, and now long since forgotten Our selectmen have certified that they never knew a person by that name residing in this town for any length of time, but they now acknowledge a person, by the name of Robbins, once laboured somewhere in this neighbourhood, whose age would not altogether disagree with that of Jonathan Robbins, the pirate. But, the following is an important and an astonishing fact, a fact which nonplused many of our certifiers, and which was related to me by one of the number. On making inquiry after the receipt of the secretary's request, they found that a person of the name of Robbins was then residing in the boundaries of New York state, but near those of this town. This person they visited, and the information they obtained was, 'that he once had a brother by the name of Jonathan Robbins; that he had been absent some years, and he concluded dead, as he had not heard from him for a great length of time; that he believed, if his brother was alive, he was about thirty-three years old.' "

In what way the proceeding was made use of at the fall election, may be seen from the following handbill, which, enclosed in black lines, like the "coffin handbills" of later days, was posted throughout the country:

Reader,
If thou art a Christian and a freeman, consider
By what unexampled causes,
It has become necessary to construct
This monument
Of national degradation
and
Individual injustice, which is erected
To commemorate a citizen of the United States,
Jonathan Robbins, Mariner,
A native of Danbury, in the pious and industrious
State of Connecticut,
who,
Under the Presidency of John Adams,
And by his advice
When Timothy Pickering was Secretary of State,
Was delivered up to the British Government,
By whom he was ignominiously put to death Because
He was an American Citizen, who,
After having been barbarously forced into the service of
His country's worst enemy,
And forced to fight Against his conscience and his country,
On board the British frigate Hermione, commanded by A monster of the name of Pigott,
Bravely asserted his right to freedom as a man,
And boldly extricated himself from the bondage of his Tyrannical oppressors,
After devoting them to merited destruction.
If you are a Seaman,
Pause—
Cast your eyes into your soul, and ask,
If you had been as Robbins was,
What would you have done?
What ought you not to do?
And look at Robbins
Hanging at a British yard-arm!
He was your comrade,
And as true a tar as ever strapped a block;
He was your fellow-citizen,
And as brave a heart as bled at Lexington or Trenton;
Like you,
He was a member of a Republic,
Proud of past glories,
and
Boastful of national honour, virtue and independence;
Like him, you one day may be Trussed up to satiate British vengeance,
Your heinous crime
Daring to prefer danger or death
To a base bondage.
Alas, poor Robbins,
Alas, poor Liberty,
Alas, poor, humbled, and degenerate Country.

For an explanation of the present position of the law in reference to extradition under a treaty with a foreign state, it is only necessary to turn to the admirable opinion of Judge Betts, in the late Case of Metzger [Case No. 9,511]. It was there held that, as a treaty is the supreme law of the land, it is entitled, when coming before the courts, to the same effect as an act of congress, though no act has been passed to define the method of its operation; that under such treaty a fugitive is subject to apprehension and commitment for a crime committed against the laws of the country demanding him as a fugitive, whether such crime be an offence in the country to which he has fled or not; and that, whether the casus fœderis has arisen, or whether the compact will be executed, is a political question to be decided by the president, the courts having no power to direct or contravene his decisions in the first instance. Whether the judiciary has authority in habeas corpus, after the fugitive is under arrest, to prevent his extradition, if the president decides to make it, was not decided.

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION IN ADMIRALTY—OFFENCES ON HIGH SEAS.

An offence committed in a bay, which is entirely land-locked and enclosed by reefs, is not committed on the high seas, within the purview of the act of congress of March 26, 1804 [2 Stat. 290] c. 40.

[Cited in Hubbard v. Hubbard, 8 N. Y. 200.]

Indictment [of Ebenezer Robinson] for perjury committed in an examination before a justice of the peace on a complaint against Capt. Dennis, of the ship Margaret, for feloniously burning and destroying the ship, with intent to defraud the underwriters thereon. Plea, not guilty. At the trial it appeared, that the complaint before the justice was, that the offence was committed in a bay, called "Mango Bay," in the island of Bermuda. It further appeared, that this bay is entirely land-locked, and enclosed by a reef and island from the sea; that the ship, at the time of the occurrence, was lying in this bay, about a quarter of a mile from the shore, and that it was about three quarters of a mile from one point of land to the other, constituting the forelands of the bay.

R. W. Greene, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Bridgham & Tillinghast, for prisoner.

STORY, Circuit Justice, said: The court is of opinion, upon these facts, that the place where the offense is alleged to be committed, was not within the purview of the act of congress of March 26, 1804 (chapter 40). That act punishes offences committed on the high seas; and upon the evidence it does not appear, that, in any just sense, Mango Bay can be considered as the high seas. It is entirely land-locked and enclosed. If then the offence was not within the cognizance of the court of the United States, the magistrate had no jurisdiction to inquire into it; and, consequently, the perjury, if any, was committed in a cause coram non judice. Upon this ground the court recommend to the jury to find a verdict for the prisoner.

Verdict for the defendant.

UNITED STATES v. ROBINSON et al.

[1 Sawy. 219.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July 8, 1870.[2]

SALE—USAGE PROVED—BREACH OF ENTIRE CONTRACT.

1. A usage in the grain trade in California to deliver barley in sacks may be shown, when nothing is said in the contract as to the mode of delivery.

[Cited in Balfour v. Wilkins, Case No. 807.]

2. Where a vendor of grain, bound by the contract to deliver from time to time upon requisitions made by the purchaser, refuses to deliver upon requisitions made in pursuance of the contract, and notifies the purchaser that he regards the contract as rescinded, and that he will deliver no more grain under it, the purchaser may treat the contract as wholly broken, and sue for, and recover, the damages upon the entire contract, without making further requisitions.

Action for breach of contract to deliver barley.

The defendants agreed to deliver upon the requisitions of the United States quartermaster, at certain military posts in the vicinity of San Francisco, at such times within the year, and in such quantities as required for the use of such posts, not exceeding in the aggregate one million pounds. The contract did not specify the mode of delivery, whether in sacks, in bulk, or otherwise. It was stipulated that the United States should pay a specified sum per pound in gold coin; and on failure to deliver in accordance with the requisitions made under the contract, that the quartermaster might purchase the required amount in open market, and charge the defendants the difference between the contract price and the price so paid. The requisitions were made and duly filled from time to time for a period of six months, the delivery being always made in sacks. Afterward another requisition of thirty thousand pounds of barley was made, to be delivered at the presidio on the tenth of January following. The defendants brought the barley to the wharf, some six hundred yards from the presidio, in sacks, emptied it into wagons, hauled it to the presidio and tendered it in bulk. The post quartermaster, having no facilities for storing in bulk, declined to receive it in that form, and insisted that under the general usage of the trade in California, he was entitled to have it delivered in sacks. Defendants declined to deliver in sacks, and hauled the barley away. They then addressed the quartermaster a note, stating that they regarded the contract as rescinded, and that they would deliver no more barley under it. The quartermaster notified the defendants, in writing, that he should hold them to the contract, and that if they did not furnish the barley, he would purchase in open market and charge them with the increased cost. Defendants neither delivered, nor tendered any more barley; and the quartermaster, thereupon, from time to time purchased in open market, at a considerably higher price than that stipulated in the contract, barley having, before the requisition to be filled on the tenth of January, risen largely in price. On the trial the defendants objected to any proof of a usage to deliver in sacks, nothing having been said in the contract as to the mode of delivery. They also insisted, that no recovery could be had except for the requisitions actually made; that notwithstanding their notice that they would deliver no more barley, the quartermaster was bound to make requisitions from time to time, as the barley was wanted, and that plaintiff could only recover for the requisitions so actually made.

L. D. Latimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.
J. B. Felton, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. The first question in this case is, whether it is competent to show a usage in the grain trade in California to deliver grain in sacks, nothing being said in the contract as to whether it is to be delivered in bulk or in sacks. I am satisfied from the authorities, that the testimony is admissible. The cases cited in the note to Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. Eq. (5th Am. Ed.) 305, clearly establish this rule. In a case there cited, Baron Parke says: "It has long been settled that in commercial transactions extrinsic evidence of custom and usage is admissible to annex incidents to written contracts, on matters with respect to which they are silent. The same rule has been applied to contracts in other transactions of life in which known usages have been established and prevailed, and this has been done on the principle of presumption, that, in such transactions, the parties did not mean to express in writing the whole of the contract by which they intended to be bound, but to contract with reference to these known usages." So another learned judge cited, in the notes at page 308, Id., says: In all contracts "as to the subject matter of which known usages prevail, parties are found to proceed with the tacit assumption of those usages; they commonly reduce into writing the special particulars of their contract, but omit to specify those known usages which are included, however, as, of course, by mutual understanding. The contract is in truth partly expressed in writing, partly implied and unwritten." So at page 309, note a, Id., the learned editors of the American Notes well state the rule thus: "In like manner, where there has been an express contract about a matter concerning which there is an established custom, this custom is reasonably to be understood as forming a part of the contract, and may be referred to to show the intention of the parties in those particulars which are not expressed in the contract. And it is obvious that the reason of the rule which forbids the receipt of parol evidence of the intention of the parties for the purpose of adding to a written contract, has no application to the evidence of custom." In one case (Smith v. Wilson, 3 Barn. & Adol. 728) the court went so far as to permit the custom of a particular place to be shown—that 1,000 rabbits meant 1,200 rabbits. But it is not necessary to go to that extent here; for in that case, there would seem to be a custom shown contrary to the express terms of the contract. In this case there is nothing in the contract in terms inconsistent with the usage shown. The most that can be said is, that the testimony annexes an incident to the contract in a matter respecting which the contract itself is silent. It merely discloses the circumstances surrounding, and the well known incidents connected with, the subject matter, at the time of entering into the contract, and in view of which it is to be presumed the contract was made. See other authorities cited in note to Wigglesworth v. Dallison; also, Macy v. Whaling Ins. Co., 9 Metc. [Mass.] 363. I think the evidence of usage to deliver in sacks, when not otherwise expressly provided in the contract, admissible, and being admitted, the usage was clearly established, there being no contradictory evidence. The general usage being established, the defendants must be presumed to have been cognizant of it, and to have contracted with reference to it. But I think, also, that the evidence and acts of the parties justify the inference that the contractors well understood the usage. They at least, in fact, voluntarily conformed to it during the first half of the year over which the contract extended. I also think, that the refusal to deliver in sacks, and the subsequent notice to Major Hoyt, United States army quartermaster, that they would deliver no more barley under the contract, but should regard the contract as rescinded, a breach of the entire contract at that time, and that nothing more was required to be done on the part of the plaintiff after the continued failure to deliver the barley referred to, in January, to entitle the United States to recover, than was done in the matter by Major Hoyt. Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 230, and cases there cited. This case is sought to be distinguished from Hale v. Trout, because, in that case, the amount of lumber to be delivered was fixed, while here the defendants, Robinson & Co., might not be called upon to deliver the whole million pounds of barley; and it is claimed that it was necessary to make the requisitions from time to time in order to fix the amount. But this, I apprehend, does not affect the principle. The defendants had notified plaintiff that they "decline to furnish any more barley to the government under the contract," and they never did deliver the barley mentioned in the January requisitions. It would be a vain thing after this to continue to make requisitions. They were to furnish all required for certain posts, not exceeding a specified amount. They had already declined to furnish any more under the contract, and had been notified that they would be held to the contract, and that the necessary amount of barley, etc., would be purchased in open market and the difference in cost charged to them. They did not afterward notify the agents of the government of any intention to recede from the determination not to furnish more barley. I think there was a total breach of the contract. See, also, Withers v. Reynolds, 2 Barn. & Adol. 882; Franklin v. Miller, 4 Adol. & E. 599.

The plaintiff, in my opinion, is entitled to judgment for $4,048.16 in gold coin.

This judgment was affirmed by the supreme court at the December term, 1871. 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 363.

Case No. 16,178.

UNITED STATES v. ROBINSON et al.

[1 Wall., Jr., 161.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. Term, 1846.

EVIDENCE—MARSHAL'S BOND—STATUTORY CERTIFICATE.

Where a statute, dispensing with common law proof of a writing, allows a certified copy to be evidence after certain acts previously performed in regard to the original, a copy certified so as not to shew that those acts have been previously performed is inadmissible.

This was an action of debt against sureties, brought on the official bond of B., late marshal of the Western district of Pennsylvania. The declaration was in the usual form with profert: the plea non est factum. The plaintiff offered in evidence, from the files of the treasury at Washington (where it had been sent in compliance with the rules of that department intended to secure the government against loss) a copy of the bond declared on, with a certificate from the clerk of this court, not under the seal of the court, that the same was "a true and faithful copy of the official bond," &c. but the certificate did not state nor shew that the bond had been filed and recorded in the clerk's office.[2] The competency of the copy being objected to on this account, the point was, whether or not it was admissible under an act of congress on the subject of marshal's bonds, which enacts that "they shall be filed and recorded in the office of the clerk of the district or circuit court," &c. and that "copies thereof certified by the clerk under the seal of the court, shall be competent evidence," &c. Act April 10, 1806 (2 Stat. 372) § 2.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. Where the common law proof of a writing has been changed by statute, and copies substituted in the place of originals, it is settled that the mode of authentication required by the statute should be strictly pursued: and all that the act requires should be made to appear on the face of the new evidence. The legislature may establish rules of evidence in derogation of the common law; but the judicial power is limited to rules laid down in the statute.

The copy here offered has not such authentication as the act requires. The clerk does not certify that it is a copy of any instrument "filed and recorded" in his office. As a matter of fact in the case, it is said that he could not have truly given such a certificate. And yet undoubtedly both filing and recording are pre-requisites to his capacity to give a copy at all. It makes no difference that the copy is the original one filed in the treasury office. If that department chooses to disregard settled rules of evidence, and to take as security against default copies which have no value as proof, it must do so. The court will not follow their precedent.

If the words of the statute, when compared with the form of this certificate, (sufficiently explained by admitted facts in case,) do not satisfy the mind, and a precedent be needed, precedent in point is at hand in a decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. Young v. Com., 4 Bin. 113. A statute of that state requires that official bonds of sheriffs should be "duly recorded by the recorder of deeds," and "when so taken and recorded, shall be by him endorsed as duly recorded, and forthwith transmitted to the secretary of the commonwealth, who shall file the same in his office;" and enacts that "copies thereof, under the hand and seal of office of the said secretary or recorder, shall be admitted as legal evidence," &c. [4 Smith's Laws, p. 47, § 2.] A copy was offered "duly certified by the secretary of the commonwealth to be a true copy of the original which was filed in his office;" and it was held inadmissible on the plea of non est factum; the plea in this case.

The paper is also defective in wanting the seal of the court.

The plaintiff was called.

UNITED STATES v. The ROB ROY.

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1870.

FORFEITURES—REDELIVERY BOND—DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY—FRAUD—DEBTS DUE UNITED STATES.

1. When a steamboat and her cargo of cotton were seized by the United States for condemnation, and delivered to the claimant on his execution of a bond for the redelivery of the property, the amount of the judgment to be rendered in a suit on the bond would be the value of the property, estimated at the highest price that could be obtained for it, between the date of the bond and the date of the judgment.

2. The United States seized and filed a libel against a steamboat and cargo, as liable to forfeiture for violation of the rules of war. The claimant gave bond for the property, and made an unsuccessful defense against the libel, but set up as a defense to a judgment against him on the bond his discharge in bankruptcy. Held, that the debt evidenced by the bond was not created by fraud within the meaning of the thirty-third section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 533)], even though the claimant used the evidence of false witnesses, and swore falsely himself in making his defense.

3. When the claim evidenced by such bond was not reduced to judgment until after the adjudication of bankruptcy and the final dividend, held, that it was not provable against the bankrupt estate, and consequently was not barred by the bankruptcy.

4. A discharge in bankruptcy does not bar debts due the United States.

[Cited in Re Strassburger, Case No. 13,526.]

In this case a decree had been rendered in favor of the government upon the libel, and the court was called on to pronounce judgment against the claimant and his sureties upon the bond executed by them for the redelivery of the property seized, to the United States. Upon this branch of the case several questions were raised which were disposed of in the following opinion.

A. B. Long, U. S. Atty., and J. S. Whitaker, for the United States.

J. A. Campbell, for respondents.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. In this case a decree has been rendered on the merits in favor of the United States, and judgment has been entered against the sureties for the several sums in which, by way of penalty, they were bound for the safe return by the claimant of the cotton which was delivered to him. The true amount due, and the true amount to be paid by each surety, will have to be ascertained by testimony as to the value of the cotton at the time it was bonded and at any time since. Having been taken out of the possession of the government, the latter is entitled to such amount as could, at any time since the delivery, have been obtained for the same.

A question still remaining to be decided is, whether the claimant, A. S. Mansfield, is or is not discharged from liability on the bond, by reason of his having received a discharge in bankruptcy. He has pleaded such discharge, dated June 30, 1869, purporting to be a discharge from all debts due by him which existed June 1, 1868, on which day the petition for his adjudication as a bankrupt was filed. The solution of this question depends upon that of one of two others: First. Is the claim itself such an one as would be affected by a discharge in bankruptcy? Secondly. If it is, will a discharge in bankruptcy bind the United States?

1. Under the first head, it is claimed on the part of the government that this is a debt created by fraud and therefore not entitled to the benefit of a discharge under the bankrupt act. The government seized the steamer Rob Roy and her cargo as liable to forfeiture for acts done during the war. These acts were in violation of the rules of war, as adopted by the United States. The title of the government rested on such unlawful acts. The claimant, when the property was seized, came into court and undertook to defend the suit, and on giving a bond, which was then satisfactory, the property was delivered to him. Now, the appearance of the claimant in court, and his bonding the property, are the transactions on which the present claim is based. They cannot be regarded as fraudulent. Every person is entitled to come into the courts and prosecute and defend his suits in the ordinary way. The government proved the unlawful acts—the claimant failed to make good his defense. It is said that, in making his defense, the claimant used the evidence of false witnesses, and swore falsely himself. That, if true, was more than a fraud; it was a crime. But it is not a fraud by which this debt or obligation was created, and does not bring the case within that class of exceptions. In the next place, it is insisted that the claim was not provable in the proceedings in bankruptcy, and therefore was not subject to discharge. By the 34th section of the bankrupt act it is enacted, that a discharge duly granted shall, with certain exceptions referred to, release the bankrupt from all debts, claims, liabilities and demands, which were or might have been proved against his estate in bankruptcy. The 19th section declares what debts and claims shall be thus provable. A careful examination of the debts and claims here described will show that the claim in question was not one of them. To have been such, it must have been either—(1) a debt due and payable at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, or a debt then existing but not payable till a future day. It was neither of these. Or (2) a demand for goods wrongfully taken, converted or withheld. It was not this. Or (3) a liability as drawer, indorser, surety, bail, or guarantor on a bill, bond, note, specialty, or contract, or debt of another person. It was not this. Or (4) a contingent debt, or contingent liability, where the contingency happens before the order for final dividend, or where the present value of the debt or liability can be ascertained and liquidated. The contingency on which the liability in this case was depending was the final decision of the case, which could not be known, anticipated, or valued by any method of discount or any calculation of probabilities or chances whatever. That decision was not made till the present term of the court. It is not shown when the final dividend of Mansfield's estate in bankruptcy was made; and consequently we can recognize its operation only upon claims which had become liquidated or fixed at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy. The residue of the section is regulative of the claims already described; and it closes with the declaration, that no debts other than those thus specified shall be proved or allowed against the estate.

2. This decides the case, without making it necessary to examine the other question, whether the United States is affected by the discharge of its debtor in bankruptcy. On this point, the case of United States v. Davis [Case No. 14,929] is undoubtedly a precedent in favor of the validity and operation of a discharge, as against a debt due the government, being founded on a bankrupt act similar on this point to the present act. Were it not for that precedent, we should not hesitate to take a different view. There is nothing in the act itself which necessarily implies that a discharge under it was intended to operate upon claims of the government. The 33d section, which declares that no debt created by the fraud or embezzlement of the bankrupt, or by his defalcation as a public officer, or while acting in a fiduciary capacity, shall be discharged under the act, is not sufficient to raise an implication that debts due to government, other than those which arise by defalcation as a public officer, will be discharged. There are public officers of the several states, as well as public officers of the United States; and they are undoubtedly included in this phrase. Neither does the proviso at the end of the 28th section raise any such implication: "That nothing contained in this act shall interfere with the assessment and collection of taxes by the authority of the United States or any state." This proviso has the effect of preventing the assignee from interfering with the process for collecting such taxes. He cannot take the property out of the hands of the tax collector, or other tax officer, and cause them to wait till he is ready to pay over the taxes. He cannot interfere with them in any way. Other claims of the government are to be paid by the assignee out of the proceeds of the property, before he attempts to make any dividend to the creditors. Taxes are to be collected by the tax officers themselves. We do not think that either of these provisions affects the question before us. The general rule is, that the government is not bound by any law which would affect its rights, unless specially mentioned therein. This rule is so imperative as not to be displaced, we think, by any such ambiguous expressions as those which are relied on.

The point, so far as we are aware, having never been decided by the supreme court, we do not feel bound by the decision in U. S. v. Davis, supra, but are of opinion that the federal government is not bound by a discharge under the bankrupt act. The plea of bankruptcy is overruled, and judgment will be entered against Mansfield for the entire amount found to be due.

Since this case was decided, the United States supreme court has held that a discharge in bankruptcy does not discharge debts due the United States. See U. S. v. Herron, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 251.

UNITED STATES v. ROCHE.

[1 McCrary, 385.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Colorado. Dec., 1879.

TRADE MARK—UNCONSTITUTIONAL STATUTES—COMMON LAW REMEDIES—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The decision of the supreme court of the United States holding the trade mark legislation of congress to be unconstitutional and void, does not affect the validity or impair the force of a decree enjoining the use by defendant of a certain label or trade mark, it appearing that the injunction suit wherein said decree was rendered was not a statutory but a common law proceeding.

2. The right of the proprietor of a trade mark to the exclusive use of the same, and to protect and enforce his exclusive right by proceedings in chancery, exists by virtue of the common law, and independently of the statute.

3. The defendant had no right to imitate the trade mark of the plaintiff in the injunction, by using in his label or trade mark any of the prominent or distinguishing words of said plaintiff's trade mark.

McCRARY, Circuit Judge. By decree of this court entered at the June term, 1879, the defendant was, at the suit of the Philip Best Brewing Company and others, perpetually restrained from thereafter using a certain trade mark or label upon bottles of manufactured beer. [Case unreported.] By an order of this court at chambers, made on the twenty-ninth day of September last, it was, after proper showing, ordered that the defendant show cause why he should not be attached or otherwise proceeded against for contempt of the decree aforesaid. In answer to this rule, it is suggested that the supreme court of the United States having in the recent cases of U. S. v. Steffens, and Same v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 82, held the existing congressional legislation on the subject of trade marks to be unconstitutional and void, the decree of injunction above mentioned is a nullity and the defendant is not bound to obey it.

Upon looking into the record we find that the injunction suit was not a proceeding instituted under the statute, but a bill in chancery brought to protect and enforce the plaintiff's exclusive right of property in their trade mark as that right exists at common law. In the opinion of the supreme court above referred to it is said: "The right to adopt and use a symbol or device to distinguish the goods or property made or sold by the person whose mark it is, to the exclusion of the use of that symbol by all other persons, has been long recognized by the common law and chancery courts of England and of this country, and by the statutes of some of the states. It is a property right for which damages may be recovered in an action at law, and the violation of which will be enjoined by a court of equity with compensation for past infringement. This property, and the exclusive right to its use, were not created by the act of congress and do not now depend upon that act for their enforcement. The whole system of trade mark property and the civil remedies for its protection existed long anterior to the act of congress and remain in full force since its passage." It follows beyond all doubt that the validity of the decree heretofore rendered against the defendant is in no wise affected by the decision of the supreme court holding the trade mark legislation of congress to be unconstitutional.

It is, however, further insisted that the label or trade mark now being employed by defendant is not so nearly like that of the plaintiffs in the injunction as to deceive a person of ordinary caution. This point, even if sound, comes too late. By reference to the decree, which was entered by consent, it will be seen that the defendant was, among other things, enjoined from using any label whatsoever bearing thereon the words "Best Brewing Company." These words are placed conspicuously upon the label which the defendant by his own admission has been, since the injunction, and is now, placing upon bottles of beer manufactured and sold or offered for sale by him. He has therefore violated the plain terms of the injunction. If, however, the question was still an open one, we should hold, without hesitation, that the defendant is rightfully enjoined from using a label bearing the words "The Best Brewing Co." or "The Best Brewing Co.'s Export Beer." These are the prominent and distinguishing words upon the label or trade mark now in use by the defendant as they are likewise upon the trade mark or label of the plaintiff in the injunction. The defendant has no right to imitate the trade mark of the plaintiff in the injunction by copying therefrom any of these prominent or distinguishing words. The use by the defendant of a label bearing these words is, in our judgment, well calculated to deceive even the cautious and careful purchaser, by leading him to infer that it is the trade mark of plaintiff in the injunction.

The showing of cause by the defendant is held to be insufficient, and it is accordingly ordered that an attachment issue against him returnable the first day of the next term of this court, and that upon service of the same the defendant enter into bond in the sum of one thousand dollars, with surety to be approved by the clerk, conditioned that he will appear on the first day of the next term of this court and abide such further order as the court may then make, and that in the meantime he will obey the decree of injunction aforesaid.

MEXICAN LAND CLAIMS.

Objections by the board met by the additional testimony taken in this court.

Claim [by Ramon Rodriguez and others] for one league of land in Santa Cruz county [the Rancho Agua Puerca y las Trancas], rejected by the board, and appealed by the claimants.

D. S. Gregory, for appellants.
William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was rejected by the board on the grounds: (1) That there was no proof of occupation and cultivation. (2) No juridical measurement or possession. (3) No proof of the boundaries or of the quantity of land included in the claim. These objections have been met by additional testimony taken in this court. José de la Cruz Rodriguez deposes that he was born within a few miles of the rancho; that its boundaries are well known; that they are, on the north the Sierra, on the east the Cañada of Agua Puerco, on the south the ocean, and on the west the Cañada de las Trancas. He also swears that in March, 1844, which was about five months after the grant, it was occupied by Rodriguez and Alviso, the grantees; that they built houses and corrals, and lived upon it for two years after that time, and that it has remained in their possession ever since. Cornelio Perez testifies to the same effect. And Hiram L. Scott not only testifies to the general recognized boundaries of the tract called "Agua Puerca y las Trancas," but states that the land contained within them is about a league.

No question appears to have been made before the board as to the authenticity of the grant, and the case has been submitted to this court without argument on the part of the United States.

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The boundaries of the tract as sworn to by the witnesses are the same as those mentioned in the grant; and the quantity of land contained within appears to correspond with sufficient exactness to that mentioned in the condition, viz: "one league, a little more or less, as explained by the sketch." I think, therefore, that the claim should be confirmed according to the boundaries mentioned in the grant and as shown on the map.

Case No. 16,181a.

District Court, N. D. California. 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — LOCATION OF BOUNDARIES—OBJECTIONS TO SURVEY.

Official survey of rancho "Butano," one square league, in Santa Cruz county. Approved March 2, 1861.

The following is the history of this claim: "Manuel Rodriguez, claimant for 'Butano,' one square league, in Santa Cruz county. Informal grant, February 19, 1838, by Juan B. Alvarado, ratified November 13, 1844, by Manuel Micheltorena to Romana Sanchez; claim filed February 24, 1853; confirmed by the commission February 8, 1855, by the district court November 19, 1856 [Case No. 16,185]; and appeal dismissed June 12, 1857,—containing 3,025.65 acres."

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This case comes up on objections to the survey filed by the claimant. By the decree of this court there was confirmed to the claimant the land called "Butano," bordering on the rancho of the heirs of Simeon Castro, the serraina and the sea—of the extent of one square league.

The principal point in controversy is as to the location of the boundary of the rancho of the heirs of Simeon Castro. To ascertain that boundary resort must be had to the expediente. In Castro's petition the land is described as the tract called "'Punta del Año Nuevo,' from the boundaries of Hilario Buelna to those of Juan Gonzales, which will be four leagues, a little more or less, and from the sierra to the seashore, which will be one league, as shown on the accompanying sketch." On the diseño attached to the original petition of Romana Sanchez for the land confirmed to the claimant, the Butano creek is represented as the northern boundary of the land solicited, and as the southern boundary of the Gonzales tract—and the same creek is delineated on the Gonzales diseño, and mentioned in his grant, as forming his southern boundary. If, then, the description in the Castro grant be construed as referring to the southern boundary of Gonzales, as shown by the grant of the latter, no location whatever can be made of the league granted to the claimant; for his northern boundary is the Butano creek and his southern boundary the land of Castro. But the northern boundary of Castro is the same Butano creek. Hence the ranchos of Gonzales and Castro adjoin, and the claimant can take nothing.

But it is contended that the northern boundary of the Punta del Año Nuevo rancho, which, by the terms of Rodriguez' grant, constitutes the southern boundary of the land of the latter, is not the Arroyo del Butano, but another creek, called Arroyo de los Frijoles, or Bean Hollow. We have already seen that the Año Nuevo rancho is declared in the grant to be bounded by the rancho of Gonzales on the north, and that the southern boundary of this latter, as shown by his grant, is the Arroyo del Butano—as appears from the Gonzales diseño and grant, and even from the diseño in the case at bar. It is urged, however, that, when the governor, in the Año Nuevo grant, referred to the boundary of Gonzales as constituting the northern limit of the land he was then granting to Simeon Castro, he intended, not the Gonzales boundary, as mentioned in the grant of the latter, but that boundary as delineated on the diseño of the Punta del Año Nuevo rancho. On referring to this diseño, we find a tract delineated lying between the ocean and the sierra, and chiefly contained between two arroyos represented as running from the mountains to the sea. At a short distance to the north and south of these brooks, respectively, lines are drawn, of which the southern is marked "Lindero Hilario Buelna"—and the northern "Lindero de José Gonzales." If the brook near which this boundary of Gonzales is drawn had any name inscribed upon it, the position of this line, and consequently the northern limit of the Punta del Año Nuevo rancho, as indicated by the diseño, could be ascertained beyond controversy; but it is merely marked "Arroyo." But the delineation of the line of the coast affords very important indications as to the particular brook intended. The rancho of Punta del Año Nuevo was made up of two ranchos, one of which had been granted to Bernal, who surrendered his rights to Castro, by whom a final grant for both, under one name, was obtained. These two ranchos were the Punta del Año Nuevo, proper, and the rancho called "Rincon de la Ballena." On the diseño under consideration, these two points, from which the ranchos derived their names, are laid down, and, by comparing the diseño with the official map of the coast attached to the patent obtained by the successors in interest of Castro, they are readily identified. The Punta del Año Nuevo, "New Year's Point," (being its former name translation,) and the Punta de la Ballena as another point near which is a rock marked "Stone House Rock." As to the identity of Punta del Año Nuevo with New Year's Point there is no question, and it is equally clear that the Punta de la Ballena must be the point near Stone House Rock, for there is none other on the coast which could have been intended.

It is stated by one of the witnesses in the Sebastian Rodriguez Case, the record of which has been made evidence in this, that the Punta de la Ballena is about six miles north of the Punta del Año Nuevo, and this is precisely the distance as shown by the map between the New Year's Point and the Stone House Rock Point. If, then, this latter point be the Punta de la Ballena of the diseño the arroyo drawn on that diseño a short distance to the north of it cannot be the Arroyo del Butano—for the arroyo of the diseño is represented as falling into the ocean at a distance from the Punta de la Ballena if about one-third the whole length of the rancho, whereas the Arroyo del Butano falls into the sea at least as far north of the Punta de la Ballena as the Punta del Año Nuevo is south of it. In other words if the arroyo of the diseño be taken to be the Arroyo del Butano, the Punta de la Ballena will be about the middle of the tract, instead of being at about one-third of its whole length from north to south. But to the north of the Punta de la Ballena there is an arroyo called Arroyo de los Frijoles, which, in all respects, corresponds with the arroyo of the diseño. It is at the requisite distance north of the point, and if it be assumed to be the arroyo of the diseño, it makes the rancho about four leagues in length—corresponding, in that respect, with the description in the petition of the tract solicited.

It is also urged that the diseño attached to the original petition of Bernal, who obtained, as has been stated, a grant for the Rincon de la Ballena, and whose rights were surrendered to Pico and by him to Castro, by which latter a grant for that and the adjoining rancho was obtained, show what was intended to be the northern boundary of the original rancho of Rincon de la Ballena, and consequently what must have been intended to be the northern boundary of the consolidated rancho of Punta del Año Nuevo. In the diseño attached to the original petition of Bernal, and which in the record of the Sebastian Rodriguez Case, which was rejected by the board, the rincon or corner is represented as comprised within the Arroyo de la Laguna and the sea. This arroyo is evidently the same as the Arroyo de los Frijoles—which, as appears from the official map, terminates at its mouth in a laguna of some size. On the Bernal diseño it is represented as forming the northern boundary of the Rincon de la Ballena; and on the north of it the land is inscribed as that of the citizen José Antonio Galindo the same person who obtained for himself and his mother the grant in the case at bar. I think it clear, therefore, that the Rincon de la Ballena, petitioned for by Bernal, and delineated on his diseño, was intended to be bounded towards the north by the Arroyo de la Laguna, or De los Frijoles, which was regarded as forming the southern boundary of the Galindo rancho. That these were the limits of the Galindo tract, is also apparent from the diseño in the case; for by comparing the Bernal diseño with that in the Galindo expediente, it will be seen that the two tracts are represented as adjoining each other. The Galindo tract being bounded on the south by the Arroyo de la Laguna or de los Frijoles and the Bernal tract being bounded on the north by the same stream.

An additional argument in favor of the location contended for by the claimants is found in the fact that if the Gonzales boundary mentioned in the Castro grant be the boundary described in the Gonzales grant, to wit: the Butano creek—we must suppose the government to have counseled the absurdity, not to say injustice, of making a grant to Galindo under which he could take no land whatever; for his northern boundary, as shown by his diseño, is the Butano creek, and his southern boundary the rancho of Castro. But if the same creek is the northern boundary of Castro, there will be no land between the two ranchos of Gonzales and Castro to be appropriated to Galindo. That the government may sometimes have accidentally granted the same land to two persons is not impossible; but such an accident is highly improbable, and the clearest evidence ought to be required before we are justified in considering it to have occurred. But, in this case, where the pretensions of Castro were founded on a former grant to another person, whose rights he had acquired—when the grant and diseño of his predecessor in interest showed that the land asked for did not include the possession of Galindo held by him under a provisional concession made long previous to the first application for the Rincon de la Ballena, it is in the highest degree improbable that the government would have granted to Castro the land held by another under so ancient and equitable a title.

The question, then, is: Did the government, when it declared that the land was bounded by the rancho of Gonzales, intend the boundary expressed in the grant of Gonzales, or that delineated on Castro's own diseño? I think it very clear that the latter was intended. And for the following reasons: The land is stated in the grant to be four square leagues as shown in the respective diseño. By that diseño, as we have already seen, the boundary of Gonzales is placed a very short distance to the north of a creek, which is obviously not the Arroyo del Butano but the Arroyo de la Laguna, or de los Frijoles. The tract is described in the petition as four leagues in length and one in breadth as shown in the sketch. The officer to whom it was referred for information reports that the boundaries of the tract are the same as are expressed "in the petition and respective diseño—the demarcation of which does not comprise the land of any other person;" a report which could not have been made if the land had been supposed to embrace the lands already provisionally granted to Galindo, and occupied by him long before the petition of Castro, or even that of Bernal, to whose rights he succeeded. The governor, relying on this report, makes the grant and designates the rancho of Gonzales as the northern boundary; but the tract he meant to grant must have been that delineated on the diseño and comprised within the boundaries there laid down, or the lines thereon marked, as the boundaries of Gonzales and Buelna—notwithstanding that they may not have been the actual boundaries of those persons when their own grants are consulted. Again: The land asked for and granted is four leagues in length by one in breadth. This tract the alcalde reported to be vacant, and this alone the governor intended to grant. But if the Butano creek be taken as a boundary the length of the tract will be five leagues, while the quantity can be restricted to the four leagues confirmed only by making the width of a considerable portion much less than the width expressed in the petition and indicated on the diseño. And, finally, it is in a high degree improbable that Castro intended to solicit, as it is almost impossible that the governor would have consented to grant, any extension towards the north beyond the boundary of the former rancho of Rincon de Ballena, the rights to which Castro represented, when, by so doing, a person would be deprived of land which he had long occupied and enjoyed under a provisional title, and his rights to which had been recognized and respected when the Rincon de Ballena had originally been given to Bernal.

I therefore think that the land of the present claimant has been correctly located as bounded by the Arroyo de los Frijoles on the south, and that the objections of the representatives of Castro to that survey must be overruled.

It is to be regretted that a patent has already been issued to the latter, founded on what I must consider an erroneous survey. But that survey was never submitted to this court, and the rights of the present claimant must now be maintained, notwithstanding that the United States have erroneously patented his land to another. When both shall have obtained patents, they will be in condition to finally settle the controversy before the ordinary tribunals.

The claimant also contends that there should be surveyed to him one league—notwithstanding, that to obtain that quantity, he may be compelled to go beyond the Butano creek. But we have seen that that creek is the southern boundary of Gonzales, who has the oldest grant, and it is clearly designated in the diseño of the claimant as the northern boundary of the latter. Whether he can in any event cross that creek to obtain the required quantity—or whether following the indications of the diseño, the boundary between the claimant and Gonzales, is to be taken to be a line drawn from the mouth of the creek, at right angles to the line of the coast and not following the creek, which enters the ocean at an acute angle, it would be clearly improper now to decide. For the Gonzales claim, though confirmed by the supreme court, has not been surveyed, and the boundary between his rancho and that of the claimant, ought not be fixed until the rights of both grantees can be considered.

An order in conformity with this opinion must be entered.

Case No. 16,182.

District Court, N. D. California. March 15, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — LOCATION OF BOUNDARIES—REJECTION OF SURVEY.

OPINION OF THE COURT. When the first official survey of the land confirmed in this case was before the court (Case No. 16,181), it was excepted to on the part of the representatives of Simeon Castro, the grantee of the adjoining rancho on the south, because the southern boundary of the survey was fixed at the Arroyo de Frijoles instead of the Arroyo Butano. It appeared that the rancho of Gonzales, lying immediately north of the rancho of the claimants, was clearly bounded on the south by the Butano. If, then, the same creek should be taken to be the northern boundary of the Castro rancho, the effect would be to leave no land whatever between the two ranchos to satisfy the grant to the claimants of the Rodriguez or Butano rancho. After fully examining the diseños and grants in three cases, it was decided by the court that the northern boundary of the Castro grant, and, consequently, the southern boundary of the Rodriguez, was the Arroyo de Frijoles. It was also considered that the Arroyo del Butano was the southern boundary of the Gonzales tract; and, as the claim of the latter had been confirmed to a tract one league in length by three-fourths of a league in breadth, he was, when the survey was submitted for approval, permitted to locate his land, running northward from the Butano creek, along the shore of the sea, and eastward so far as was necessary to complete the quantity granted. It resulted that, between his northern and southern boundaries and to the eastward of the line drawn for quantity, a strip of land was left, which, though within the exterior boundaries of the tract, was not included in the survey. It is this strip of land which the claimants in the present case propose to appropriate in satisfaction of their grant for one league. If this location be permitted, no part of the land delineated on the diseño will be included. For the map evidently embraces a tract bounded by the Butano creek on the north and the Frijoles on the south, while the strip of land referred to lies wholly to the north of the Butano creek, and behind the tract, about one league long and three-fourths of a league wide, surveyed to Gonzales.

It is contended that this location is in entire conformity with the language of the grant and the decree. The land confirmed to the claimants being "one square league, bounded by the Rancho de Punta del Año Nuevo (Castro's rancho), the sierra, and the sea." But it will at once be perceived that under no construction of these calls, can the location contended for be permitted. For having ascertained, as was done in the previous decision, and at the instance of the claimants, the line of the Punta del Año Nuevo grant, it only remained to locate one league of land bounded on the south by that line; on the east by the sierra and on the west by the sea. The northern boundary would thus be left to be determined by quantity: provided (and the determination of this point was expressly reserved) the survey could be permitted to cross the Butano creek. It is evident that the southern line of the rancho being determined, the calls for the sierra and the sea become definite and restricted, and must be deemed to refer not to any portion of the sierra or the shores of the ocean, to be arbitrarily selected, but to such portions of them respectively, as would form an eastern and western boundary to a rancho, the southern boundary of which was a line of the Punta del Año Nuevo rancho.

In the brief originally submitted by the counsel for the claimants, in the case at bar, it was insisted that the boundaries of the tract were, on the south, the Arroyo de los Frijoles (claimed to be the line of the Año Nuevo rancho), on the east, the mountain side; on the west, the ocean; and on the north, an east and west line, drawn one league south of the rancho of San Gregorio; that space being necessary to allow the location of the Gonzales tract, one league long by three-fourths in breadth, between the San Gregorio and the rancho of the claimants.

By the claimant's own admission, therefore, the southern boundary of his land must be the Arroyo de los Frijoles, or the line of the Castro rancho; and the eastern and western boundaries must be those portions of the sierra and of the seashore, lying contiguous to his southern boundary.

It remains to be determined whether he can be permitted to cross the Butano creek for the quantity. If the diseño be accepted as a guide, it is apparent that the Butano creek was fixed as the northern boundary of the tract solicited. It is equally clear that the same creek was designated as the southern boundary of the Gonzales rancho, which was an older grant. It is said, however, that the grant was not made with reference to the diseño; and that the claimants ought not to be confined to the tract thereon delineated. The land was originally solicited by Romana Sanchez. In the petition it is described "as exhibited on the accompanying diseño, and as one league in length, and one-half a league in breadth." On the 29th September, 1837, this petition was referred to the administrator of the ex-mission of Santa Cruz for his report. On the 11th October, 1837, Juan Gonzales reports that the land is vacant, and that it may be granted. On the 19th February, 1838, the governor grants to the interested party one square league "in the said locality, provisionally," while the necessary "proceedings are going on." After receiving a further report from the prefect of the First district, the governor, on the 9th September, 1838, makes a more formal grant of the land. In this it is recited that, "whereas Romana Sanchez has solicited, etc., the land known by the name of 'Butano,' as is shown in the expediente, I have concluded to grant her the mentioned location, in extent one square league; said concession being understood to be provisional, and subject to the approbation or disapprobation of the excellent deputation."

On the 8th November, 1844, Jose Antonio Galindo, the son of Romana Sanchez, presented a petition to Governor Micheltorena, in which, after setting forth that, since 1838, they had become possessed of a location known by the name of "Butano," under a provisional document, issued by his excellency's predecessor, he solicits a ratification of the respective title, in order that he might obtain judicial possession, etc. This petition, having been referred to Jimeno, the latter reports, in view of the favorable reports appearing in the expediente, that there is no obstacle to granting the land, "having for boundaries precisely the rancho of the heirs of the deceased Simeon Castro." On the 13th November, 1844, the governor makes his decree of concession, declaring Doña Ramon Sanchez owner of the location called "Butano," bordering on the rancho of the heirs of Don Simeon Castro, the sierra, and the sea. On the 14th November of the same year, the formal title was issued. In this it is recited that, "whereas Doña Ramon Sanchez has solicited the ratification of the provisional title given to her from the year 1838 for the tract of land granted her, called 'Butano,' bordering on the rancho of the heirs of the deceased Simeon Castro, the serraina, and the sea, I have concluded to grant her the mentioned land," etc. The third condition declares the land granted to be one square league in extent.

It is plain from the proceedings and from the very language of the title that that instrument was intended merely as a ratification of the provisional concession of 1838; nor is there any reason to suppose any alteration of the boundaries of the tract provisionally conceded in 1838 was intended, except that it was to be limited on the south by the rancho of the heirs of the deceased Simeon Castro. To ascertain, therefore, what was the land, the title to which was ratified or made absolute by the grant of 1844, we must inquire what land was provisionally conceded in 1838. The provisional concession describes the land as "known by the name of 'Butano,' as is shown in the expediente." As the petition contained no description of the boundaries of the tract solicited, and the reports or informes make no mention of them, the only manner in which the expediente could have shown the tract conceded was by the diseño which accompanied it and formed part of the expediente. We are thus referred, unavoidably, to the diseño to ascertain the limits of the tract known as "Butano," which the governor conceded, in 1838, and the title to which, without changing its name or alteration of boundaries, he granted, absolutely, in 1838. The diseño thus becomes a part of the grant in this as in other cases.

It appears, however, that the extent of the land solicited is stated in the petition to be one league in length by one-half league in width. But the provisional concession and the final grant declare the land granted to be one square league. It appears, therefore, that the governor granted to the petitioner a tract twice as wide as that solicited, and, in view of this augmentation, he may have adopted the sierra as the eastern boundary, thereby including land not embraced within the limits of the diseño. But I see no reason whatever to suppose that he intended, in any manner, to disturb the location of the northern boundary, which was plainly fixed on the diseño at the Butano creek, the same stream having been previously adopted as the southern boundary of the Gonzales rancho. It will be noticed that all the reports declare the land to be vacant. On the strength of these favorable reports, Jimeno recommends that the provisional title be issued. But these reports would not have been made—especially that of Juan Gonzales, who, it is presumed, was the grantee of the rancho on the north—had it been by any one supposed that the grant of Butano would include any part of the land already granted to Gonzales himself.

It has already been observed that by the terms of the grant the sierra forms the eastern boundary. The diseño shows that the Butano creek was intended as a boundary only on the north. But in ascending this stream from the ocean it is found that its course is, for a considerable distance, about southeast; that is, it flows in a northwest direction—but on approaching the sierra it bends to the south, running for nearly half its entire length near the base of the sierra, and nearly parallel with it and with the seashore. This portion of the stream is not represented on the diseño, neither does the sierra mentioned as the eastern boundary appear upon it. If, then, the grant be limited by the Butano, the sierra will not be reached, nor will the quantity be obtained.

It has, therefore, appeared to me on the whole, most just to adopt the Butano creek as the northern boundary only, so far as it is delineated on the diseño, and to permit the survey to be extended eastward for quantity to the sierra, notwithstanding that in so doing it will cross that portion of the Butano which runs near the base of, and parallel to the sierra. I think, therefore, that the official survey should be set aside; and that a new survey should be made, bounding the tract on the south by the Arroyo de los Frijoles, on the west by the sea, on the north by the Arroyo Butano, so far as the same is delineated on the diseño, and thence crossing that stream to the sierra, and on the east by the sierra, so as to include an area one square league in extent.

[There is no principle or authority for decreeing to a grantee an equivalent for a deficiency within his exterior boundaries out of a sobrante (surplus or excess), accidentally found to exist within the exterior boundaries of a neighboring grant.]

BY THE COURT. In the opinions heretofore delivered in this case [see Case No. 16,185 and note] it was considered that the land granted to the claimant was bounded on the south by the Arroyo de los Frijoles, on the west by the sea, and on the east by the sierra. The northern boundary is not mentioned in the grant. But, as that instrument professes to be merely a ratification of a previous provisional concession, and as the provisional concession described the tract as the land of Butano, "as shown in the expediente," the map found in the expediente, and which constituted the only means of identifying the land provisionally granted, was referred to for the ascertainment of the northern boundaries. On this map the Arroyo del Butano is clearly laid down as the northern boundary of the tract, the lands to the north of it being inscribed as those of Gonzales. On the diseño of Gonzales, the Butano is, in like manner, laid down as the southern boundary, and both the decree of concession and the grant describe his land as bounded by the rancho of Buelna, the sierra, the coast, and the Arroyo del Butano.

There was much reason to contend that the grant to Gonzales, which was older than that to Rodriguez, was intended to embrace all the land within his external boundaries. The supreme court, however, seem to have thought that he should be restricted to three-fourths of a league, to be surveyed within his out-boundaries. But there can be no doubt that the external boundaries, within which his land was to be taken, were the rancho of Buelna, the sierra, the sea, and the Arroyo del Butano. On the diseño of Gonzales, the Butano is represented as flowing with a slight curve, from the sierra to the sea. On the diseño of Castro the arroyo supposed to be the Frijoles, is also delineated as flowing in a general westerly direction from the sierra to the sea. It appears, however, that the course of both of these creeks is, for some distance, not far from parallel to the sierra, after which they deflect to the west, and fall into the ocean in such a manner as that their lower portions might be conveniently adopted as the northern and southern boundaries of the rancho. As the grant called for the sierra as the eastern boundary, and the quantity granted and confirmed was one square league, it appeared to me reasonable to adopt the Butano only so far as it could serve as a northern boundary to the rancho; and not, by following its course where it flows nearly parallel to the sierra, make it serve as the eastern boundary, also thus cutting off the grant from the sierra called for as boundary. The diseño of Rodriguez represents neither the sierra nor the upper part of the Butano. It delineates a small and readily identified tract, between the two streams and the ocean. But the petition which this diseño accompanied, was for a tract half a league in extent. The provisional grant was for a tract of one league, and the title which ratified was for one league bounded by the sea, the sierra, and the rancho of Castro, on the south. I therefore consider that in order to meet the call for the sierra, and to obtain, if possible, the quantity, the northern line should follow the Butano so far as it was delineated on the diseño, where it was evidently intended to represent the northern boundary of the half league, originally solicited, and thence in a direct line to the sierra, crossing the Butano at or near the point where its course in ascending it deflects to the south, and becomes parallel with the sierra.

It is now sought to obtain the quantity, not by running from this point easterly to the sierra, but by turning abruptly to the north at nearly right angles to the course of the Butano, and parallel to the sea, to include the sobrante of the Gonzales grant, left vacant by the restriction of the latter to a tract of only three-fourths of a league. The land so included is clearly within the exterior boundaries of Gonzales, and the survey would include a considerable portion of the Pescadero creek, represented on the Gonzales diseño as flowing diagonally through nearly the centre of the tract. It would embrace land always claimed by Gonzales, included within his boundaries delineated on his diseño, and to the whole of which there is much reason to suppose, as contended by his counsel, his title should have been confirmed. That no portion of it could have been intended to be given by a subsequent grant to Rodriguez is manifest. His diseño represents no part of it, but recognizes the land on the north of the Butano as belonging to Gonzales. His grant does not call for it, for it merely describes the land as bounded by the sierra, the sea, and the rancho of Castro. Gonzales reports that the land asked for by Rodriguez is vacant, which he assuredly would not have done if it had been supposed to include any part of the land previously granted to himself.

I am unable to perceive on what principle, or by what authority, I can, in effect, decree an equivalent to Rodriguez for any deficiency of quantity within his exterior boundaries out of a sobrante accidentally found to result within the exterior boundaries of his neighbor. With respect to the southern boundary, it is to be observed that the Arroyo Frijoles was, at the urgent suggestion of the counsel for and owner of the Rodriguez claim, adopted as to the southern boundary of the latter and the northern boundary of the Castro grant.

The lands of Castro unquestionably extended from the sierra to the sea, and from the lands of Hilario Buelna, on the south, to an arroyo on the north. The arroyo was delineated on the diseño as running from the sierra to the sea. After much consideration it appeared to me that the arroyo intended was the Frijoles, notwithstanding that the grant called for the lands of Gonzales as the northern boundary of Castro, and the Gonzales rancho was confessedly bounded by the Butano. Had the latter stream been adopted as the boundary of Castro, the effect would have been to exclude altogether the grant to Rodriguez, for the grants to Gonzales and Castro would have been coterminous.

The Arroyo de los Frijoles having been thus adopted as the northern boundary of Castro, it became of necessity the southern boundary of Rodriguez, as required by the grant, and suggested in the report of Jimeno, who recommends the grant with the express understanding that "it is to be without prejudice to the rights of the heirs of the deceased Simeon Castro." It is now said that the Arroyo Frijoles in its upper portion is indistinctly traceable, and that it could not serve as a boundary in its whole course from the sierra to the sea. If this be so, it affords an argument against the adoption of that stream as the northern boundary of Castro, and it may justify the inference that the court should have taken the Butano as the boundary, thus excluding the Rodriguez grant altogether. But it hardly lies in the mouth of the present owner of both ranchos to make the objection, as the Frijoles was adopted as the dividing line between the ranchos at his suggestion, and in conformity with the agreement strenuously urged by himself.

Assuming the decision of the court to be correct, and any other supposition would prevent any location whatever of the Rodriguez claim, it is clear that the boundary of Castro was a stream flowing from the sierra to the sea, and, as that stream is decided to be the Frijoles, the latter must be adopted throughout its whole extent. The survey should, therefore, be made by adopting, as the true northern line of Castro, the Arroyo de los Frijoles from the sierra to the sea. If it should be found that the sierra cannot be reached by ascending the Frijoles, then the stream is to be ascended to the point where it approaches nearest to the sierra, and the southern boundary is to be completed by a drawing. The eastern boundary is the sierra; his western boundary the sea, and his northern line will be run by following up the Butano as far as it is delineated on the diseño, which is supposed to be not far distant from the point where its course, in ascending it, deflects towards the south, and thence, in a straight line, to the sierra. If, within these boundaries the quantity cannot be obtained, it will be the not very unusual case where the exterior boundaries contain less than the quantity supposed. If such should prove to be the fact, it is no doubt due to the extraordinary and unaccountable circumstance that the governor in this case appears to have granted twice the quantity of land solicited by the petitioner and delineated on his diseño, and in respect to which alone all the informes and reports were given. The survey herein directed will assume, substantially, the form of that certified by the surveyor-general to be in accordance with the opinion of this court heretofore rendered.

The surveyor-general, having made two plats since the opinion heretofore delivered, and the same having been informally submitted for approval, though not filed in the clerk's office, and the interested parties having been informally heard in chambers, the above is intended as a supplemental opinion for the guidance of the surveyor-general, to be taken as a part and explanatory of the opinion heretofore delivered. Anything contained in the order heretofore made, supposed to be in conflict with the views herein expressed, is to be taken as vacated and annulled.

MEXICAN LAND CLAIMS.

No objection to this claim made by the United States.

[Claim by Maria Concepcion Valencia de Rodriguez and others for the Rancho San Francisquito, containing three-fourths of a league of land in Santa Clara county; confirmed by the board of land commissioners, and appeal taken by the United States.]

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.
Stanley & King, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The grant in this case was made on the first day of May, 1839, by Governor Alvarado, to Antonio Buelna, the husband of the claimant. Buelna, after obtaining his grant, appears by the proofs to have occupied and cultivated his land and continued to live there with his family until his decease. The present claimant, his widow, seems to be his sole heir. The United States have taken an appeal in this case, but it is submitted to us as usual without argument, or the statement of any objection to the validity of the claim. The genuineness of the grant seems to be fully proved, and the board have confirmed the claim according to a judicial measurement, which on a resurvey has been found to include less than the quantity mentioned in the grant. We think the decree of the board should be affirmed.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS — ARCHIVAL EVIDENCE — POSSESSION.

[Claim of Manuel Rodriguez to the Rancho Butano, being one league of land in Santa Cruz county, California.]

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.
Jeremiah Clarke, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was confirmed by the board, an appeal having been taken on the part of the United States, but the cause has been submitted to this court without argument, or the suggestion, on the part of the appellant, of any objection to the validity of the claim. The claimant, and those under whom he derives title, appear to have been in possession of the premises in question for nearly twenty years; and though the original title delivered to the interested party has been recently lost, we agree with the board in considering the secondary evidence of its contents as sufficient. In all these cases, the evidence from the archives is perhaps even more satisfactory than that afforded by the production of an alleged original title; for the facilities for the commission of a forgery of this single paper are far greater than are offered for the perpetration of the same crime, when numerous documents have to be forged and subsequently introduced among the archives. A list of the latter has long since been made, and no new expediente could now be placed amongst them without imminent risk of detection. In this case the record of the proceedings is full and minute, and the character of the documents and the number of the signatures afford intrinsic evidence of genuineness. If to this be added the fact of long continued possession, from a date anterior to the provisional grant, we are unavoidably led to the conclusion that the grant must have issued at the time and in the terms alleged by the claimant. We think a decree of confirmation should be entered.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct., 1878.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—IMMUNITY TO PERSON CHARGED WITH CRIME ON CONDITION OF TESTIFYING FOR THE GOVERNMENT—EFFECT OF—PARDON.

1. The court holds that the immunity promise to the "first batch" on condition that they testify fully and truthfully in reference to a conspiracy among certain officials, to defraud the government, must be carried out; that it is full and complete immunity, both civil and criminal.

2. The pardon granted to certain persons of the "second batch," does not relieve them from prosecution for the recovery of taxes assessed against them for violation of the revenue laws. Held, it is not competent for any officer of the government to donate or remit taxes due from the citizen under the laws of congress, for the collection of revenue.

Mr. Justice Harlan has recently disposed of numerous cases, in which the United States is a party, arising under the internal revenue laws. They were spoken of in argument as "first batch" and "second batch" cases. The "second batch" cases were actions of debt on distillery and warehousing bonds; breach, nonpayment of taxes. The "first-batch" cases comprised two actions of debt for the recovery of taxes assessed, six informations for the condemnation of spirits and other property, for alleged violations of the internal revenue laws, and two actions of debt for the recovery of the double tax penalty prescribed by that law for violation of its provisions. In each of the cases for condemnation and to recover double tax penalty, it appears that the defendants filed an amended answer, as follows: "And the said claimants, by, etc., say 'actio non,' etc., because they say that heretofore, to wit: on the 27th of December, A. D. 1875, at Chicago, viz., at said Northern district of Illinois, the said plaintiff and the said claimants entered into an agreement by which it was, among other things, agreed that if the said claimants, Joseph Roelle and Anton Junker would testify on behalf of the plaintiff, frankly and truthfully, when required, in reference to a conspiracy among certain government officials in the internal revenue service, and other parties then known to exist, whereby the honest manufacture of distilled spirits and the collection of taxes thereon had been rendered practically impossible, and should plead guilty of one count in an indictment then pending against them in said district court, and should withdraw their pleas in certain condemnation cases then pending against their property in said district court, for the purpose only of insuring their good faith in so testifying on behalf of the plaintiff, the said plaintiff would recall any and all assessments under the internal revenue law then made against said claimants, and that no more assessments under said law should be made against said claimants and that no more proceedings against said claimants should be commenced on account of violation of the internal revenue laws then passed, and that no penalties or forfeitures should in any manner be enforced or recovered against them and their property, and that all suits for penalties or forfeitures then pending against them and their property should be dismissed, and that full and complete immunity, both civil and criminal, should be granted to said claimants. And these claimants aver that the said Joseph Roelle and Anton Junker, and each of them have fully and faithfully performed said contract on their part; and they further aver that this suit is for the condemnation and confiscation of their property, originally seized by the said plaintiff on the ground of said alleged violation of the internal revenue laws on the part of the said claimants, alleged to have been committed by them prior to entering into said agreement, and is one of the suits which the said plaintiff, under the terms of said agreement, fully kept and performed on the part of said claimants as aforesaid, agreed to dismiss and discontinue; and that the prosecution of this suit is contrary to and in violation of said agreement entered into, as aforesaid, between the said plaintiff and said claimants, and this these claimants are ready to verify; wherefore they pray judgment if the plaintiff ought to have his aforesaid action against them, etc."

Replications were filed by the United States, denying that any such agreement as that alleged had been made, and averring that the claimants had not fully and faithfully performed the said alleged agreement, in manner and form as in their plea alleged. At the April term, 1878, of the district court, it appears that, by leave of court, the replications filed in behalf of the government were withdrawn and a general demurrer filed. At the June term, 1878, an order was entered in each of the six condemnation cases, in which it is stated that "the court doth find, both from the admissions made by said demurrer, and also from facts appearing upon the records and within the judicial knowledge of the court, that said claimants were used as witnesses by the government in criminal cases against their associates, upon the promise and understanding that this case should no further be prosecuted. It is, therefore, ordered by the court that said demurrer be overruled, and this case is dismissed, both by reason of the defence set up in said pleas, and also because of the finding of the court, from the facts appearing on the record and within the judicial knowledge of the court, that the cause ought to be no further prosecuted by the plaintiff." From that order appeals in the "first batch" cases for the condemnation of property were taken to the circuit court.

HARLAN, Circuit Justice, when announcing his decision, said: The demurrer admits the agreement set out in the amended answer. It must, therefore, be taken as true that the authorities of the United States stipulated with the defendants, respectively, that no further proceedings should be commenced against them on account of violations of the internal revenue laws then passed; that no penalties or forfeitures should in any manner be enforced or recovered against them and their property; that all suits for penalties and forfeitures then pending against them and their property should be dismissed; and that full and complete immunity, both civil and criminal, should be granted to them. The consideration for this stipulation was, it must be assumed, that the defendants should testify, frankly and truthfully, when required, in reference to a conspiracy among certain government officials in the internal revenue service, and other parties, whereby the collection of taxes had been rendered practically impossible, should plead guilty to one count in an indictment then pending against them in the district court, and should withdraw their pleas in certain condemnation cases then pending against their property. Upon the demurrer it must be also taken as true that the several defendants have fully and faithfully performed the alleged agreement.

Taking all these facts to be true, the question arises whether the order entered by the district court, that the condemnation causes be not further prosecuted, was authorized by law. The question thus presented is of the highest importance both to the government and to the citizen. It is by no means easy of solution. None of the authorities cited seemed to be directly in point, and the court has found much difficulty in reaching a conclusion entirely satisfactory to its own mind. Some light, however, is thrown upon the question by decisions in American courts. In Com. v. Brown, 103 Mass. 422, it appears that an indictment was returned charging Brown and Drake with assault and battery upon each other. Drake pleaded guilty, and Brown was tried and found guilty. Upon Brown's trial it appeared that the fight was by agreement, when Drake suddenly stabbed Brown with a knife. Brown immediately reported the facts to a police officer, on whose complaint Drake was brought before the municipal court for an assault on Brown with a knife. At the examination before the municipal court Brown appeared as a witness for the commonwealth, and Drake was held to bail for assault with a knife. Brown also appeared as a witness for the commonwealth, before the grand jury. Upon this evidence it was claimed that, as the commonwealth had accepted and used Brown as a witness, its faith was thereby pledged to protect him from harm by reason of his complicity in the offence set forth in the indictment. The attorney general of the state responded that in prosecuting the defendant there was no breach of public faith, since "there was no promise whatever, express or implied, by any person authorized or unauthorized, that he should be exempt from prosecution." Chief Justice Chapman disposed of the case in the following brief opinion: "It does not appear that any express pledge was made to the defendant nor that any implied pledge was made to him by any one having authority to make it." A similar ruling was made in Com. v. Denehy, 103 Mass. 424. In the subsequent case of Com. v. Woodside, 105 Mass. 594, it appears that the defendant was indicted for embezzlement of the property of his employer. He filed a plea in bar relying upon certain facts, connected with his use by the commonwealth as a witness, as entitling him to be no further prosecuted. The supreme court of Massachusetts disposed of the case in these words: "The facts set forth in the plea in bar do not constitute a pledge; nor do they in any way operate as a bar to sentence."

The reports of these cases from the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, do not show what the decision would have been had the prosecution of the defendants directly involved a violation of the pledge of those representing the government, and a breach of the public faith. But since the pleas in those cases were overruled partly upon the ground that there had been no agreement or promise, express or implied, of immunity from prosecution, it is not an unreasonable inference that, had such agreement or promise been clearly established or admitted, the action of the court might have been such as to protect the defendant from the prosecution. Without discussing the matter fully, the court has concluded in view of the circumstances attending these cases, and in order that these questions may be passed upon by the supreme court of the United States, before further action upon the part of the prosecuting officers, to affirm the judgments in the six condemnation cases (Nos. 15,689–15,694). The district attorney can at once take one or all of these cases to the supreme court of the United States where it is not doubted, they will be advanced, if the attorney-general so desires. In case 12,893, for the recovery of the double tax penalty, the same principles should govern as in the condemnation cases. The trial of that case can await the result of the condemnation cases in the supreme court of the United States. The remaining cases of the "first batch," (14,169 and 14,170), being two actions of debt for the recovery of taxes assessed, and all the cases of the "second batch," (Nos. 13,345, 13,346, 13,566, 13,561, 13,804, 13,805, 13,821, 14,167, and 14,173), being actions of debt on distillery and warehousing bonds for non-payment of taxes, rest altogether upon different grounds. In the "second batch" cases, the defendants present a petition averring an agreement between them and the United States officials, conducting the suits, under which they claim exemption from the payment of the taxes sued for. As to four of the defendants, A. C. Hesing, Geo. S. Burroughs, Henry B. Miller, and Simon Powell, a pardon was granted them the 21st of September, 1876, of certain offences for which they were prosecuted under the provisions of the Revised Statutes. It is claimed that the assessments of taxes against those defendants are based upon the violation of the internal revenue laws for which they were indicted. The prayer of the petition is that the court interpose and, to the end that the government may be compelled to keep its said alleged agreement, restrain the further prosecution of these suits for taxes assessed.

The prayer of the petitioners in these tax cases cannot be granted. It is not competent for any officer of the government to donate or remit taxes due from the citizen under the laws passed by congress for the collection of revenue. Disputed claims for taxes may be compromised in the mode prescribed by law. These cases do not belong to that class. The pardon of certain criminal offences granted to the four defendants, heretofore specially named, does not purport to relieve those parties from taxes assessed or due under the provisions of law. The power conferred upon the president to grant pardons or remit fines and forfeitures does not embrace the power to relieve from the payment of taxes. Nor did he assume to exercise such power. Congress alone can do that. It might perhaps confer such power upon some department or officer of the government, but it has not done so.

Let the demurrer of the government to the pleas in Nos. 14,169 and 14,170 be sustained, and the petition of defendants in cases Nos. 13,345, 13,346, 13,561, 13,566, 13,804, 13,805, 13,821, 14,167, and 14,173, is denied.

Case No. 16,187.

UNITED STATES v. ROGERS.

[Hempst. 450.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. 1845.

RELATIONS OF GOVERNMENT TO INDIAN TRIBES—CRIMINAL JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—STATUTES AND TREATIES — ADOPTED WHITE MAN.

1. The United States have adopted the principle originally established by European nations, namely, that the aboriginal tribes of Indians in North America are not regarded as the owners of the territories which they respectively occupied. Their country was divided and parcelled out as if it had been vacant and unoccupied land.

2. If the propriety of exercising this power were now an open question, it would be one for the lawmaking and political department of the government, and not the judicial.

3. The Indian tribes residing within the territorial limits of the United States are subject to their authority, and where the country occupied by them is not within the limits of any one of the states, congress may, by law, punish any offence committed there, no matter whether the offender be a white man or an Indian.

4. The 25th section of the act of the 30th June, 1834 [4 Stat. 729], extends the laws of the United States over the Indian country, with a proviso that they shall not include punisment for "crimes committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian."

5. This exception does not embrace the case of a white man, who, at mature age, is adopted into an Indian tribe. He is not an "Indian," within the meaning of the law.

6. The treaty with the Cherokees, concluded at New Echota, in 1835 [7 Stat. 478], allows the Indian council to make laws for their own people or such persons as have connected themselves with them. But it also provides, that such laws shall not be inconsistent with acts of congress. The act of 1834, therefore, controls and explains the treaty.

7. It results from these principles, that a plea set up by a white man, alleging that he had been adopted by an Indian tribe, and was not subject to the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, is not valid.

At the April term, 1845, of the said circuit court, the grand jury indicted William S. Rogers for the murder of Jacob Nicholson. Both Rogers and Nicholson were alleged in the indictment to be "white men and not Indians." The offence was charged to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the court, that is to say, in that part of the Indian country west of the state of Arkansas, that is, bounded north by the north line of lands assigned by the Osage tribe of Indians, produced east to the state of Missouri, west by the Mexican possessions, south by Red river, and east by the west line of the now state of Arkansas and the state of Missouri, the same being territory annexed to the said district of Arkansas, for the purposes in the act of congress in that behalf made and provided.

The defendant filed the following plea: "And the defendant in his own proper person, comes into court, and, having heard the said indictment read, says, that the court ought not to take further cognizance of the said prosecution, because, he says, heretofore, namely, on the —— day of November, 1836, he then being a free white man and a citizen of the United States, and having been born in the said United States, voluntarily and of his free will removed to the portion of the country west of the state of Arkansas, assigned and belonging to the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and did incorporate himself with said tribe, and from that time forward became and continued to be one of them, and made the same his home, without any intention of returning to the said United States; and that afterwards, namely, on the —— day of November, 1836, he intermarried with a Cherokee Indian woman, according to their forms of marriage, and that he continued to live with the said Cherokee woman, as his wife, until September, 1843, when she died, and by her had several children, now living in the Cherokee Nation, which is his and their home. And the defendant further says, that from the time he removed, as aforesaid, he incorporated himself with the said tribe of Indians, as one of them, and was and is so treated, recognized, and adopted by said tribe and the proper authorities thereof, and exercised and exercises all the rights and privileges of a Cherokee Indian in said tribe, and was and is domiciled in the country aforesaid; that before and at the time of the commission of the supposed crime, if any such was committed, namely, in the Indian country aforesaid, he the defendant, by the acts aforesaid, became and was, and still is, a Cherokee Indian, within the true intent and meaning of the act of congress in that behalf provided. And the said defendant further says, that the said Jacob Nicholson, long before the commission of said crime, if any such was committed, although a native born free white male citizen of the United States, had settled in the tract of country assigned to said Cherokee tribe of Indians, west of the state of Arkansas, without any intention of returning to said United States; that he intermarried with an Indian Cherokee woman, according to the Cherokee form of marriage; that he was treated, recognized, and adopted by the said tribe as one of them, and entitled to exercise and did exercise all the rights and privileges of a Cherokee Indian, and was permanently domiciled in said Indian country as his home up to the time of his supposed murder. And the defendant further says, that by the acts aforesaid, he, the said Jacob Nicholson, was a Cherokee Indian at the time of the commission of the said supposed crime, within the true intent and meaning of the act of congress in that behalf made and provided. Wherefore, the defendant says, that this court has no jurisdiction to cause the defendant to make a further or other answer to said bill of indictment, for said supposed crime alleged in the bill of indictment. And the defendant prays judgment, whether he shall be held bound to further answer said indictment."

To this plea the district attorney of the United States filed the following demurrer: "And the said United States, by Samuel H. Hempstead, district attorney, come and say, that the said first plea of the defendant to the jurisdiction of this honorable court is insufficient in law, and that by reason of any thing therein contained, this court ought not to refuse to entertain further jurisdiction of the crime in said bill of indictment alleged. And the following causes of demurrer are assigned to said plea: (1) That a native born citizen of the United States cannot expatriate himself so as to owe no allegiance to the United States without some law authorizing him to do so. (2) That no white man can rightfully become a citizen of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, either by marriage, residence, adoption, or any other means, unless the proper authority of the United States shall authorize such incorporation. (3) That the proviso of the act of congress relating to crimes committed by one Indian upon the property or person of another Indian, was never intended to embrace white persons, whether married and residing in the Indian nation or not." And, upon the argument of the said demurrer, by S. H. Hempstead, Dist. Atty., for the United States, and E. L. Johnson, for the prisoner, the following questions arose, and were propounded for the decision of the court; but the judges being divided in opinion upon the same, upon motion, ordered that they be entered of record, and certified to the next term of the supreme court of the United States for its opinion and decision thereupon:

(1) Was it competent for the accused, being a citizen of the United States, either under the fourth clause of section 8, art. 1, of the constitution of the United States, or under any act of congress passed in virtue of the constitution of the United States, upon the subject of naturalization, or in virtue of any admission, obligation, or duty, incumbent upon the government of the United States and implied by the said clause, section, and article of the constitution; or any of the said acts of congress in reference to citizens of the United States, or to foreign governments, their subjects or citizens, upon the authority of the will and act of the accused, and without any form, mode, or condition prescribed by the government of the United States, to divest himself of his allegiance to that government, and of his character of citizen of the United States?

(2) Could the accused, as a citizen of the United States, or a resident within the same, possess the right or the power resulting from the nature and character of the civil and political institutions of the United States, or as appertaining to, and inherent in, him as a free moral and political agent, or derived to him from the law of nature or from the law of nations, founded either upon natural right or upon convention, voluntarily and entirely put off his allegiance to, and his character of citizen of, the United States, and transfer that allegiance and citizenship to any other government, state, or community?

(3) Could the tribe of Indians residing without the limits of any one of the states, but within the territory of the United States, as set forth in the pleadings in this prosecution, and designated as the Cherokee Tribe, and also as the Cherokee Nation, and by whom the accused alleges that he has been adopted, be held and recognized in reference to the government and under the laws of the United States as a separate and distinct government or nation possessing political rights and powers such as authorize them to receive and adopt, as members of their state, the subjects or citizens of other states or governments, with the assent of such subjects or citizens, and particularly the citizens of the United States, and thereby to sever their allegiance and citizenship from the states or governments to which they previously appertained, and to naturalize such subjects or citizens, and make them exclusively or effectually members, subjects, or citizens of the said Indian tribe, with regard to civil and political rights and obligations?

(4) Could the accused, by any act or assent of his own combined with the acts, authority, or assent of the above-mentioned tribe, residing within the territory aforesaid, so change and put off his character, rights, and obligations as a citizen of the United States, as to become, in his social, civil, and political relations and condition a Cherokee Indian?

(5) Does the 25th section of the act of congress of the 30th June, 1834, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve the peace of the frontiers," and the proviso to that section limit the operation of the said act, and give effect to the said proviso, as to instances of crimes committed by natives of the Indian tribes of full blood, against native Indians of full blood only; or do the said section and proviso have reference also to Indians, natives, or others adopted by and permanently resident within the Indian tribes; or have they relation to the progeny of Indians by whites or by negroes, or of whites or negroes by Indians, born or permanently resident within the Indian tribes and limits, or to whites, or free negroes born and permanently resident within the Indian tribes and limits, or to whites and free negroes owned as slaves, and resident within the Indian tribes, whether procured by purchase or there born the property of Indians?

(6) Does the plea interposed by the accused in this prosecution, the facts whereof are admitted by the demurrer, constitute a valid objection to the jurisdiction of this court?

The 25th section of the act of 1834, referred to in the fifth point certified, enacts as follows: "That so much of the laws of the United States as provides for the punishment of crimes committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States shall be in force in the Indian country; provided, that the same shall not extend to crimes committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian."

The defendant moved the court for an order to discharge him from imprisonment, on the ground that the court were divided in opinion on his plea to the jurisdiction; but the court overruled the motion, and remanded him to the custody of the marshal.

[Decision of supreme court on the questions certified:]

TANEY, Circuit Justice. This case has been sent here by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, under a certificate of division of opinion between the justices of that court. It appears by the record, that William S. Rogers, a white man, was indicted in the above-mentioned court for murder, charged to have been committed upon a certain Jacob Nicholson, also a white man, in the country now occupied and allotted by the laws of the United States to the Cherokee Indians. The accused put in a special plea to the indictment, in which he avers that, having been a citizen of the United States, he, long before the offence charged is supposed to have been committed, voluntarily removed to the Cherokee country and made it his home, without any intention of returning to the United States; that he incorporated himself with the said tribe of Indians as one of them, and was so treated, recognized, and adopted by the said tribe, and the proper authorities thereof, and exercised all the rights and privileges of a Cherokee Indian in the said tribe, and was domiciled in their country; that by these acts he became a citizen of the Cherokee Nation, and was, and still is, a Cherokee Indian, within the true intent and meaning of the act of congress in that behalf made and provided; that the said Jacob Nicholson had in like manner become a Cherokee Indian, and was such at the time of the commission of the said supposed crime, within the true intent and meaning of the act of congress in that behalf made and provided; and that, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to cause the defendant to make a further or other answer to the said indictment. This is the substance of the plea, and to this plea the attorney for the United States demurred, setting down the causes of demurrer, which appear in the foregoing statement of the case.

Several questions have been propounded by the circuit court, which do not arise on the plea of the accused, and some of them we think cannot be material in the decision of the case, and need not, therefore, be answered by this court. The country in which the crime is charged to have been committed is a part of the territory of the United States, and not within the limits of any particular state. It is true that it is occupied by the tribe of Cherokee Indians. But it has been assigned to them by the United States as a place of domicil for the tribe, and they hold and occupy it with the assent of the United States, and under their authority. The native tribes who were found on this continent at the time of its discovery have never been acknowledged or treated as independent nations by the European governments, nor regarded as the owners of the territories they respectively occupied. On the contrary, the whole continent was divided and parcelled out, and granted by the governments of Europe as if it had been vacant and unoccupied land, and the Indians continually held to be, and treated as, subject to their dominion and control. It would be useless at this day to inquire whether the principle thus adopted is just or not; or to speak of the manner in which the power claimed was in many instances exercised. It is due to the United States, however, to say, that while they have maintained the doctrines upon this subject, which had been previously established by other nations, and insisted upon the same powers and dominion within their territory, yet from the very moment the general government came into existence to this time, it has exercised its power over this unfortunate race in the spirit of humanity and justice, and has endeavored by every means in its power to enlighten their minds and increase their comforts, and to save them, if possible, from the consequences of their own vices. But had it been otherwise, and were the right and the propriety of exercising this power now open to question, yet it is a question for the lawmaking and political department of the government, and not for the judicial. It is our duty to expound and execute the law as we find it, and we think it too firmly and clearly established to admit of dispute, that the Indian tribes residing within the territorial limits of the United States, are subject to their authority, and where the country occupied by them is not within the limits of one of the United States, congress may, by law, punish any offence committed there, no matter whether the offender be a white man or an Indian. Consequently, the fact that Rogers had become a member of the tribe. Cherokees, is no objection to the jurisdiction of the court and no defence to the indictment, provided the case is embraced by the provisions of the act of congress of the 30th June, 1834, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve the peace of the frontiers." By the 25th section of that act, the prisoner, if found guilty, is undoubtedly liable to punishment, unless he comes within the exception contained in the proviso, which is, that the provisions of that section "shall not extend to crimes committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian." And we think it very clear, that a white man, who, at mature age, is adopted in an Indian tribe, does not thereby become an Indian, and was not intended to be embraced in the exception above mentioned. He may, by such adoption, become entitled to certain privileges in the tribe, and make himself amenable to their laws and usages. Yet he is not an Indian; and the exception is confined to those who, by the usages and customs of the Indians, are regarded as belonging to their race. It does not speak of members of a tribe, but of the race generally,—of the family of Indians; and it intended to leave them both, as regarded their own tribe, and other tribes also, to be governed by Indian usages and customs. And it would, perhaps, be found difficult to preserve peace among them if white men of every description might, at pleasure, settle among them, and, by procuring an adoption by one of the tribes, throw off all responsibility to the laws of the United States, and claim to be treated by the government and its officers as if they were Indians born. It can hardly be supposed that congress intended to grant such exemptions, especially to men of that class who are most likely to become Indians by adoption, and who will generally be found the most mischievous and dangerous inhabitants of the Indian country.

It may have been supposed that the treaty of New Echota, made with the Cherokees in 1835, ought to have some influence upon the construction of this act of congress, and extend the exception to all the adopted members of the tribe. But there is nothing in the treaty in conflict with the construction we have given to the law. The fifth article of the treaty stipulates, it is true, that the United States will secure to the Cherokee Nation the right, by their national councils, to make and carry into effect such laws as they may deem necessary for the government and protection of the persons and property within their own country, belonging to their people, or such persons as have connected themselves with them. But a proviso immediately follows, that such laws shall not be inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, and such acts of congress as had been or might be passed regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians. Now the act of congress under which the prisoner is indicted, had been passed but a few months before, and this proviso in the treaty shows that the stipulation above mentioned was not intended or understood to alter in any manner its provisions, or affect its construction. Whatever obligations the prisoner may have taken upon himself by becoming a Cherokee by adoption, his responsibility to the laws of the United States remained unchanged and undiminished. He was still a white man of the white race, and therefore not within the exception in the act of congress.

We are, therefore, of opinion, that the matters stated in the plea of the accused do not constitute a valid objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and that, if he is found guilty upon the indictment, he is liable to the punishment provided by the act of congress before referred to, and is not within the exception in relation to Indians.[2] And we shall direct this opinion to be certified to the circuit court as the answer to the several questions stated in the certificate of division. We abstain from giving a specific answer to each question, because, as we have already said, some of them do not appear to arise out of the case, and upon questions of that description, we deem it most advisable not to express an opinion. UNITED STATES v. ROGERS et al.

District Court, E. D. New York. Dec., 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—WHISKEY TAX.

This suit was brought to recover the amount due on a distiller's bond. The evidence showed that [Henry] Rogers carried on the business of a distiller during the months of October and November, 1868. The assessor's returns showed that his unpaid taxes amounted to $22,517.26. This was not disputed on the part of the defense, and a verdict for that amount was directed to be rendered for the government.

Case No. 16,189.

UNITED STATES v. ROGERS et al.

Circuit Court, D Rhode Island. June Term, 1838.

WHALE FISHERIES—REGISTERED VESSEL—REVOLT OF SEAMEN.

1. By the act of 1793, c. 52 [1 Story's Laws, 285; 1 Stat. 305, c 8], no registered ship or vessel can, while she remains registered, engage in the whale fisheries; but she must surrender her register, and be enrolled and licensed for the fisheries.

2. The act of 1835, c. 40 [4 Stat. 775], provides that "if any one or more of the crew of an American ship or vessel, on the high seas, &c., shall endeavor to make a revolt," &c., he and they shall, on conviction, be punished as provided in the act. Held, that a ship, engaged in a whaling voyage, without having surrendered her register, or taking out an enrollment and license, pursuant to the act of 1793 (chapter 52), was not an American ship, within the purview of the act of 1835 (chapter 40), and that an indictment would not hold, under this act, against the crew, for an endeavor to make a revolt.

[Cited in People v. Tyler, 7 Mich. 225.]

Indictment against the defendants [William Rogers and others] for an endeavor to commit a revolt, on the 10th of May, 1838, on board of the brig Troy, belonging to Bristol (Rhode Island), alleged to be a registered ship, owned by certain citizens of the United States, named in the indictment, and the defendants being seamen in and on board thereof, against the act of March 3, 1835, c. 40 [4 Stat. 775]. Plea, not guilty.

At the trial it was admitted by R. W. Greene, the district attorney, that the brig was, at the time when the supposed offence was committed (May, 1838), engaged in a whaling voyage, and her crew were, by the shipping articles, in the same year shipped for a whaling voyage. The ship's register was dated in 1833, and the voyage was undertaken without any surrender of the register, or taking out an enrollment and license pursuant to the act of 18th February, 1793, c. 52 [1 Story's Laws 285; 1 Stat. 305, c. 8], for enrolling and licensing vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries.

Upon this statement, which was agreed to be the truth of the case, the court suggested a doubt, whether the offence (if any) was, under the circumstances, within the purview of the statute; and the case was spoken to by—

Mr. Greene, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I am unable to persuade myself, that the present indictment is maintainable, under the circumstances. The act of 1835 (chapter 40) provides that "if any one or more of the crew of an American ship or vessel, on the high seas, &c., shall endeavor to make a revolt," he and they shall, on conviction, be punished as provided in the act. To bring the case within the statute, the voyage, for which the seamen are shipped, must be a lawful one, and they must, at the time, be of the "crew" of an American ship or vessel; and of course there must exist a lawful relation between them and the master. The statute of 1793, c. 52, § 1 [1 Story's Laws 285; 1 Stat. 305, c. 8], enacts, that such ships or vessels as are enrolled and licensed according to the provisions of that act, "and none others shall be deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the privileges of ships engaged in the coasting trade or fisheries;" and the whale fisheries are expressly within the purview of the act, as is abundantly seen in the form of the license prescribed by the fourth section. Now, it seems plain to me, that no registered ship is entitled to carry on the whale fisheries, as an American ship, or is entitled to the privileges of an American ship, under the statute of 1793, c. 52 [8]. The third section declares, that it shall be lawful for the collectors of the several districts, to enroll and license any ship or vessel that may be registered, upon such registry being given up, or to register any ship or vessel, that may be enrolled, upon such enrolment and license being given up. And the sixth section treats every ship or vessel not so enrolled or licensed, and found engaged in the trade, as liable to pay the same fees and tonnage in every port of the United States, as ships or vessels not belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States; and, under certain circumstances, the ship or vessel and its lading become liable to forfeiture. My opinion, therefore, is, that this ship cannot be deemed an American ship, within the sense of the third section of the statute of 1835 (c. 40), on which this indictment is founded; and the crew are not the crew of such an American ship or vessel as are contemplated by the act. On this ground the indictment would fail upon the facts. Indeed, my impression is, that, upon the manifest intent of the act of 1793, c. 52 [8], no registered ship or vessel can, while she remains registered, engage in the whale fisheries; but she must surrender her register, and be enrolled and licensed for the fisheries. And that if she should be found engaged in such fisheries without such enrolment and license, at least, if she has on board any article of foreign growth and manufacture, or distilled spirits, other than sea stores, she would be forfeited. The main purposes of the act would be utterly frustrated upon any other construction, and the main securities and privileges of the trade be defeated.

The district judge concurred in opinion that the facts did not support the indictment; and thereupon the district attorney entered a nolle prosequi.

UNITED STATES v. ROLAND.

District Court, N. D. California. 1863.[1]

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — GENUINENESS OF TITULO —EVIDENCE.

[1. Where no map was presented or informes obtained, and the titulo purports to have been issued on the same day that the borrador was drawn, the fact that the description of the land in the former is much more specific than that in the latter is strong evidence adverse to the genuineness of the titulo.]

[2. The fact that the governor's signature to the alleged titulo, testimonio, and order for extension, are in a style rarely, if ever, used by him, and different from his signature affixed to similar documents on the same date, tends to show that such papers are forgeries.]

[3. The fact that the journals of the departmental assembly show that that body was not in session at the date on which the testimonio states that the grant was approved by it is strong evidence that the grant is not genuine.]

[4. Proof that four days after the date of the alleged grant by the governor of eleven leagues he granted another nine leagues to the same persons tends to show that the former grant is not genuine.]

On appeal from the board of land commissioners.

Claim for eleven square leagues at the junction of the San Joaquin and Stanislaus rivers. Rejected, August 4, 1862.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claimant has produced, in support of his title, an expediente from the archives. This document contains a petition, marginal order that the title issue, decree of concession, and the borrador or draft of the title to be issued to the party interested. This expediente is found in the archives, and is noted on the indexes of Hartnell and Mr. Carey Jones. The claimant has also produced the title paper alleged to have been delivered to him—a testimonio or certificate of approval by the departmental assembly—and a petition for an extension of time to fulfill the conditions of the grant, with a marginal order of the governor granting the request. It is not pretended that the land was occupied, or any attempt made to perform the conditions of the grant, until September, 1847, when the claimant caused some cattle and horses to be placed upon it.

The claim was rejected by the board.

It is contended, on the part of the United States: (1) That the title paper produced by the party, the testimonio of approval by the departmental assembly, and the petition, and order for the extension of time, are not genuine; and (2) that the grant was abandoned,—the claimant having, four days after its date, asked for and obtained another grant for a different tract of land.

On examining the expediente we are struck by the circumstance that the petition of Roland, the marginal order that the title issue, the decree of concession, and the borrador of the grant are all dated on the same day, May 2d. The approval of the assembly is dated May 4th, and the order for an extension May 5th. No map was presented with the petition—no informes were required or obtained; and the whole proceeding, from its inception to its completion, was consummated within the short space of three days.

It has not been urged on the part of the United States that the mere fact that no informes were asked for, or investigations made, as to the qualifications of the petitioner, the situation of the land, etc., is fatal to the grant; although the decision of the supreme court in the Case of Cambuston, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 63, might seem to justify the position that the preliminary steps, made requisite by the law of 1824 and the regulations of 1828, must necessarily be taken by the governor to enable him to make the grant. But, at all events, the absence of an important part of such proceedings, and the evident haste, if not recklessness, with which they appear to have been conducted, are fitted to suggest a doubt as to whether the governor was acting in the bona fide exercise of the powers confided to him by the colonization laws. The land was in a remote wilderness, uninhabited by reason of hostile Indians, so little known that the petitioner could only describe it as eleven leagues on the banks of the rivers Stanislaus and San Joaquin, and was unable to delineate it on a map. No inquiries are made as to his intention or ability to occupy so large a tract; and, within three days of the date of the grant, the governor allows him an indefinite extension of time for its occupation and cultivation. The grant purports to have been made by Pico (as was observed by the supreme court, with respect to the grant to Cambuston) "near the time when the government of the territory passed from his hands; and, indeed, during the heat and struggle of the controversy by which his power was finally overthrown." The grantee seems to have had no special claim upon the bounty of the government, and had already obtained, jointly with another, a grant for four leagues of land. All these circumstances render it difficult to believe that the governor, if he made the grant, was bona fide, exercising the powers confided to him, and fairly and faithfully endeavoring to carry out the policy of the Mexican laws of colonization.

But the objections of the United States to this grant are of a more specific nature:

1. In the borrador or draft found in the expediente, the land is described as "eleven leagues, situated on the banks of the rivers Stanislaus and San Joaquin." The title papers produced by the party direct, in the third condition, "that the measurement of the eleven leagues shall be on the banks of the Stanislaus, of the width of one league, commencing where the two rivers join." The fact that the borrador differs in phraseology from the titulo is not, of itself, conclusive; for slight discrepancies of this kind sometimes occur in cases of undoubted genuineness. But, in this case, the description in the borrador is evidently taken from the petition, and, as no map was presented, or informes obtained, and the grant issued on the same day, the governor had neither time nor means to obtain more accurate information. It is a little singular that the titulo, if drawn at the same time, should be so much more specific in its designation of the tract; and it serves to confirm the theory of the United States that the proceedings recorded in the expediente were stopped, that no titulo was issued, and that the paper produced was subsequently prepared when the necessity of a more particular description of the land was well understood. The signatures of Pio Pico to the titulo, the testimonio, and the order for an extension, are in a style rarely, if ever, used by him in public documents of that date. Three documents are produced from the archives of undoubted authenticity, dated respectively on the 1st, 2d, and 3d of May, on which Pico's signature appears, exhibiting its uniform and striking characteristics. The claimant himself produces an expediente and titulo of a grant to Arenas and him, dated May 6th. On these documents, as on those presented by the United States, the signature of Pico is in his usual style. In the case of Luco v. U. S. [Case No. 8,594] this court had occasion to investigate at length the evidence furnished by the archives as to the uniformity and peculiarities of Pico's signature. The fact that his signature to the documents in that case differed from those elsewhere found in the archives was considered a strong argument against its genuineness, and the same argument was used and the conclusion adopted by the supreme court. 23 How. [64 U. S.] 541.

2. The claimant has attempted to weaken its force in this case by the production of four documents, on which the signature of Pico is different from his usual style. But the genuineness of none of these documents is proved—one of them is certainly fraudulent, another probably so, and the two others are open to serious doubt. But, even if authentic, they may serve to impair, but do not overthrow the argument relied on by the United States. For, independently of the numerous signatures (more than six hundred) found in the archives, the proofs in this case show that on the very day when Pico is alleged to have signed the documents produced in this case, he was signing similar documents in his usual handwriting.

3. It is shown by the journals of the departmental assembly, that that body was not in session at the date when the testimonio states the grant to have been approved. The testimonio is dated May 4th. It appears by the journals that the earliest session in May was on the 8th. The preceding session was on April 29th, and the minutes of that session were read and approved, as was customary, at the succeeding session of May 8th.

The counsel for the claimant, sensible, no doubt, of the force of this record evidence thus furnished, has caused the journals of the assembly to be searched, to discover discrepancies or omissions which might serve to impair their value as complete and reliable records of the proceedings of that body. But three such have been found. The first is evidently a mere clerical mistake. A minute of the proceedings of May 8th is found erroneously entitled as of April 8th, on which day there was no session. This is shown by the fact that the acta or minute is left incomplete, and another one is found identical in terms, but correctly dated May 8th. It is also shown by the contents of the minute itself, which commences by a note, that the proceedings of the previous session of April 29th were read and approved. An instance is also found where the proceedings of July 1st were approved at the session of July 3d, without noticing an intermediate extraordinary session on July 2d, which the journals show was held. But the explanation is evident. On recurring to the actas of the session of July 2d, we find that the minutes of the proceedings were read and approved on the same day before adjournment. The minutes of the preceding regular session of July 1st not having been read at this extraordinary session, they were read and approved at the next regular session of July 3d. The only other omission that has been discovered is that of the minutes of the session of April 24th, which the journal shows were read and approved at the session of April 29th. They have probably been lost; but, even in this case, the journal shows that a session was held on that day. In the case at bar the archives not only contained no trace of the supposed session of May 4th, but they show, affirmatively, that no session was, in fact, held on that day,—unless we suppose that the record has been lost and that the minutes of the session were read and approved before its adjournment; a coincidence certainly improbable in the highest degree.

4. But the strongest argument to show that the alleged grant was not issued to Roland is the fact that, on the 6th of May, only four days after its date, Pico granted to Arenas and John Roland nine leagues in the jurisdiction of San Jose Gaudalupe. He had already granted to Roland and Workman four leagues of land. If, then, on May 2d, he granted to him eleven leagues, and, on May 6th he granted to him and another nine leagues, we must suppose the governor to have committed a flagrant violation of the law under which he derived his powers. All of these last grants are claimed to be genuine, and have been presented for confirmation. That of May 6th bears every mark of authenticity. The only hypothesis, therefore, on which we can acquit the governor of a willful departure not only from the spirit but the letter of the colonization laws, is that suggested by the United States, viz.: that the proceedings in relation to the eleven league grant were suspended, the application abandoned, and a petition presented and a grant obtained for another tract of land. We have seen that this hypothesis is confirmed by all the other facts in the case; the discrepancy between the titulo and the borrador, the style of the signatures of Pico and the proof, almost certain, that no session of the assembly was held on the day when the grant is alleged to have been confirmed. Other circumstances, though not so important, significantly point in the same direction. On the very day (May 5th) on which (if the paper be genuine) Roland asked the governor for an extension of time, he presented to the governor a petition for a grant to himself and Arenas, and to one petition he subscribes his name John Roland, to the other John Rowland,—a difference in the mode of spelling his own name not likely to have occurred on two documents written on the same day. The governor, Pio Pico, has been examined at length; but he is unable to recollect any circumstance connected with the grant, or even that it was in fact made. His only reason for believing it to have been made is the fact that the documents bear his signature.

On the whole, my opinion is that the alleged titulo produced, the testimonio, and the order for an extension have been fabricated since their dates, and that the titulo, in all probability, never issued to him, but the proceeding was abandoned in order to obtain a grant in a different part of the country.

The decision of the board, rejecting the claim, must therefore be affirmed.

Case No. 16,190a.

District Court, S. D. Illinois. Feb. 22, 1882.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—RETAILING LIQUORS—CLUBS OR ASSOCIATIONS.

[In order to procure liquors and beer to drink, a number of persons formed a voluntary association, to which they paid an initiation fee. With the fund thus raised a stock of liquors was purchased, and the same were dealt out by an officer of the association to members only, upon paying for each drink a sum fixed therefor; the purpose being not to make a profit, but merely to realize a sum with which to keep up the stock. Held, that the association constituted a partnership for the sale of liquors at retail, without paying the special tax, and that each member thereof was guilty of violating the statute.]

Indictment for carrying on business as retail liquor dealer without paying special tax.

In the summer of 1881 the defendant, Roliger, and about thirty others, in Assumption, Illinois, united themselves in a voluntary association for the purpose of providing themselves with liquor and beer to drink as they wanted it, the village of Assumption refusing to license the sale of liquor or beer. The plan of the association thus formed was that each person, on becoming a member, should pay one dollar, which went into the treasury, and so a fund was raised with which to purchase the first stock of liquor. They rented a room, hired a man to take charge of the room and liquors, and it was his duty to make the purchases in the name of the association, and dispense the liquors to members of the association only, each member paying for his liquor such price as a committee of the association fixed, and the price to be fixed so that no profit should be made, but so that the stock of liquors might be kept up, and room rent and wages be paid. The association paid no special tax as retail liquor dealer, and, on being required to do so, the members, after taking counsel, refused to pay, taking the ground that the association was not selling liquor, as the liquor belonged to the members, and none but the members were allowed to partake of it. Thereupon the individual members of the association were indicted by the grand jury of the district court for the Southern district of Illinois, and this case against Fred. Roliger, one of their number, was selected as a test case, and tried before a jury at the January term, 1882, of said court, the trial resulting in the conviction of the defendant, whereupon all the others indicted pleaded guilty.

James H. Connolly, U. S. Atty., and E. T. Roe, Asst. U. S. Atty.

J. C. Robinson and F. W. Burnett, for defence.

THE COURT (TREAT, District Judge) instructed the jury that under the facts, as stated, each member of the association was liable for carrying on business as retail liquor dealer without paying the special tax, and the fact that the business was being carried on without any attempt to make a profit out of it made no difference, as the law requires those who sell or offer for sale malt or spirituous liquors, shall pay the special tax, without reference to whether the selling or offering for sale is done for the sake of profit or not; and the fact that none but members of the association were allowed to partake of the liquor made no difference. The association was a partnership, in which all the members seem to have been equal partners, and liquors, when purchased in bulk, belonged to the partnership; but when the individual partner went to the clerk of the concern, and obtained from him a drink of the partnership liquor, and paid the clerk for that drink at the price fixed, that was a purchase of so much liquor from the partnership, and it was a sale of so much liquor by the partnership to this individual partner, and for so carrying on business the partnership should have paid a special tax as retail liquor dealers, and having failed and refused to do so, each member of the partnership became liable to the criminal provision of the law.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—BAWDY-HOUSE.

On a prosecution for keeping a bawdy-house, the United States cannot give evidence of the general reputation of the house.

Indictment [against Polly Rollinson] for keeping a bawdy-house.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, asked the witness whether the house was generally reputed to be a house of ill-fame.

E. J. Lee objected.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided that the question was improper.

UNITED STATES v. RONZONE.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 9, 1876.

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—MOTION TO QUASH—NOLLE PROS.

A motion being made to quash an indictment for a misdemeanor, an information was filed setting forth the same charge as that in the indictment, accompanied with an affidavit as to the identity of the offence. A nolle prosequi was entered on the indictment, and the defendant moved to quash the information, on the ground that there had been no preliminary examination before a commissioner nor any order to show cause: Held, that the motion must be denied.

[This was an indictment against Philip Ronzone.]

Benjamin B. Foster, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Louis F. Post and Abram J. Dittenhoefer, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The defendant was indicted for a misdemeanor. Objection being taken to the averments of the indictment, and a motion to quash being made, the district attorney filed an information setting forth the same charge contained in the indictment, accompanied with an affidavit showing that the offence charged in the information had been made to appear to a grand jury, and that the grand jury, upon evidence, had found an indictment against the accused for the same offence charged in the information. Upon filing the information, a nolle prosequi was entered upon the indictment and thereupon a motion was made, in behalf of the accused, to quash the information, upon the ground that he had not been afforded a preliminary examination before a commissioner, nor an opportunity to show to the court, upon an order to show cause, the absence of evidence to justify placing him upon trial.

The case of U. S. v. Shepard [Case No. 16,273] was cited in support of the motion. That case is no authority for holding that an order to show cause and a hearing thereon is a necessary preliminary to a proceeding upon information, for, in that case the court says: "It would certainly be quite foreign to any known practice in the United States courts, to pursue the English practice of requiring a rule for the accused to show cause before the court and there contest the question whether the evidence justified placing him on trial." Nor is that case authority for holding that an examination before a commissioner is, under all circumstances, a necessary preliminary to proceedings by information. In Shepard's Case there had been no preliminary inquiry, either before a commissioner or before a grand jury, and the information was not accompanied with any oath whatever. The question, whether the fact of an indictment having been found for an offence would not justify placing the accused on trial upon an information charging the same offence, was not before the court in Shepard's Case, and was not there decided. There have been many cases where the exhibition of an indictment found in one district has been deemed sufficient evidence to warrant an arrest in another; and there is one adjudged case where the precise question here raised was involved. I allude to U. S. v. Waller [Id. 16,634], where an indictment had been found which was quashed, whereupon the district attorney filed an information alleging the offence charged in the indictment, and the accused then moved that the information be quashed. The court refused to quash the information. The decision in Waller's Case is sufficient authority to support the present proceeding, and the motion to quash this information must be denied.

UNITED STATES v. ROSE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1825.

EXECUTORS—ACTION ON ADMINISTRATION BOND—DEFENSES—JURY—AUDITING ACCOUNTS.

1. An executor, indebted to his testator's estate, cannot, in an action upon administration bond, brought by creditors or legatees, discharge himself by showing payments to his coexecutors.

2. If, after the jury is sworn and impanelled, it appears to be a case in which it is necessary to examine and determine upon accounts between the parties, the court will order the jury to be discharged, and the accounts to be audited and stated by the auditor of the court, agreeably to the Maryland act of 1785 (chapter 80, § 12), and that he report to the court.

[Suit by the United States, for the use of Eliza Balch and others, against John Rose.]

Debt upon an administration bond, given by the defendant and the Rev. S. B. Balch, as coexecutors of T. B. Beall. The breach assigned was in not accounting for, and paying over to the persons entitled to the same, a debt of $4,120, due by the defendant to his testator. In order to show that the whole sum of $4,120 was not due by the defendant, he offered in evidence certificates of his coexecutor, S. B. Balch, that "the defendant is justly entitled to the following credits in his account with T. B. Beall, deceased," &c.

Mr. Jones, for plaintiffs, objected that those certificates are not competent evidence. One executor is not to account with his coexecutor, and cannot discharge himself from the claims of creditors and distributees, by showing that he has paid the money to his coexecutor.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, not sitting) rejected the evidence.

Marbury & Swann, for defendant.

NOTE. After the jury was sworn, and the cause had been opened, THE COURT (nem. con.) made the following order: "In this case, the court being of opinion that this is an action in which it is necessary to examine and determine on accounts between the parties, it is ordered that the jury sworn in this cause be discharged, and that the accounts and dealings between the parties be audited and stated by Joseph Forrest, the auditor of this court, agreeably to the 12th section of the act of November, 1785 (chapter 80), and that he report to this court." The plaintiffs had leave to amend their replication, by stating the names of the legatees, &c., and the defendant to amend his rejoinder.

Case No. 16,194.

UNITED STATES v. ROSE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

EXECUTORS—ADMINISTRATION BOND.

An action cannot be maintained upon the administration bond of an executor, for not giving in a claim against himself, until the claim has been established by the orphans' court, according to the Maryland testamentary act of 1798 (chapter 101, § 20, cl. 8).

Debt on the administration bond of the defendant who was one of the executors of the will of Mr. Brook Beall. The breach assigned in the replication was, that the defendant was indebted to his testator upon bond, as well as upon open account, and that he had not given in or accounted for either of the said debts. To this replication there was a general demurrer, and joinder. By the Maryland testamentary act of 1798 (chapter 101, § 20, cl. 8), it is enacted: "That the bare naming of an executor in a will shall not operate to extinguish any just claim which the deceased had against him; but it shall be the duty of every such executor accepting the trust, to give in such claim in the list of debts: and on his failure to give in such claim, or any part thereof, any person, interested in the administration, may allege the same by petition to the orphans' court granting the administration; and the said court, with consent of the parties, may decide on the same; or it may be referred by the parties, with the court's approbation; or, at the instance of either party, the court may direct an issue, or issues to be tried, and the same shall be tried in any court of law proper for the trial, and most convenient under all circumstances; and the court of law shall have power to direct the jury, and grant a new trial, as if the issue or issues were in a suit therein instituted; and a certificate from such court, or any judge thereof, of the verdict or finding of the jury, under the seal thereof, shall be admitted by the orphans' court to establish or destroy the claim, or any part thereof; and if the executor shall give in such claim, or the same, or any part, be established as aforesaid, he shall account for the sum due in the same manner as if it were so much money in his hands, and, on failure, his bond may be put in suit."

Mr. Marbury, for defendant, contended that no suit could be maintained upon the administration bond against the executor, for not giving in a claim against himself, until the claim should have been established by the orphans' court, in the manner provided by the testamentary act of 1798 (chapter 101, § 20, cl. 8), above recited. At common law the debt would be extinguished; the plaintiff's only remedy is given by the statute; and he must take that or none. Mr. Marbury cited the Maryland act of 1720 (chapter 24, § 2), and the case of Seegar v. Seney, 5 Har. & J. 488.

R. P. Dunlop and Mr. Jones, contra, contended that it was the duty of the executor to give in the claim, whether cited before the orphans' court, or not. That the condition of the bond was general, that the executor "shall well and truly perform the office of executor," "according to law, and shall in all respects discharge the duties of him required by law, as executor aforesaid, without any injury or damage to any person interested in the faithful performance of the said office." The neglect of any duty, is a breach of the condition of the bond, and will support an action. The proceeding provided by the statute is not necessary; the condition is broken, and for every breach an action lies at common law, without the aid of any statute. The proceeding under the statute is cumulative only, and does not impair the common-law remedy upon the bond. The act of Maryland of 1720 (chapter 24, § 2), restraining the right to sue upon the administration bond, until a return of non est inventus, or nulla bona, applies only to creditors of the estate, and shows that, but for that act, a direct and original suit might have been maintained, on the bond, by any person interested. This suit is not brought by a creditor of the estate, but by legatees. A creditor has a legal remedy against the executor, but a legatee has not. He cannot comply with the requisition of the statute by obtaining judgment at law, or even by issuing a capias ad respondendum. But the act of 1720 was repealed by the act of 1798 (chapter 101, § 10, cl. 3), which gives a right of action upon the bond to "any person conceiving himself interested in the administration of the estate;" "and judgment may be recovered, upon such action, for the damage actually sustained." This is an action for damages actually sustained by the legatees. "Actually" stands opposed to "judicially." "Actually sustained," not "judicially ascertained." The case of Seegar v. Seney, 5 Har. & J. 488, is not law; it is contrary to the practice of this court; and is not considered by the court of appeals of Maryland as of any authority upon the point stated by the reporter. The ground of the decision was that the action ought not to have been brought against Benton's administrator but against the administrator de bonis non. The debt due by the executor to his testator was legal assets by the act of 1798 (chapter 101, § 3, cls. 7, 14). Every debt due to the testator is assets.

Mr. Marbury, in reply. Debts due to the testator are not assets until recovered. They may be good or bad; separate or desperate, and the executor is not to be charged with them until they are recovered.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, not sitting) was clearly of opinion that the executor is not liable upon his bond, for neglect of the duty stated in the replication, until that duty shall have been established in the mode pointed out in the Maryland testamentary act of 1798 (chapter 101, § 20, cl. 8).

Judgment for the defendant upon the demurrer.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 197.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1856.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—SUTTER GENERAL TITLE—ABANDONMENT.

[1. One claiming under the "general title" of Micheltorena has merely to show that he is one of those in whose favor General Sutter reported, and need not show that he received a copy of the grant.]

[2. Where one who had purchased land, and had built a house thereon, obtained a grant from the government of adjoining land, his continued occupancy of the former tract extended to the latter, so as to rebut any presumption of abandonment of the grant.]

[3. The fact that claimant was recognized by General Sutter as one of those entitled to the benefits of the "general title" of Micheltorena, which was in terms restricted to "citizens," and that Sutter delivered a copy of the grant to him as such, is sufficient, when accompanied by the oath of the claimant to that effect, to show that he was within the class of "citizens."]

[2] [Reversed in 23 How. (64 U. S.) 262.]

[Claim by John Rose and others for the Rancho de Yuba, comprising six leagues of land in Yuba county; confirmed by the board, and appeal taken by the United States.]

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

Thornton & Williams, for appellees.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case is founded on what is known as the "general title" of Micheltorena. It has already, after full consideration, been determined in this court that that grant was sufficient to convey a valid title to those in whose favor it issued. The only points now open to controversy in this case are therefore: (1) Whether the alleged grantee was one of those persons for whose benefit the grant was made. (2) Has the right (if any) acquired by him been forfeited by such unreasonable neglect to perform the conditions of occupation and cultivation as to authorize the presumption that he had abandoned his land.

First, was he one of the grantees under the original title. The grant of Micheltorena bears date December 22, 1844. It recites: "That the supreme government not being able, on account of other occupations, to extend one by one the respective titles to all the citizens who have petitioned for lands with favorable reports from Señor Don A. Sutter, by these letters grants unto them and their families the lands described in their petitions and diseños to all and each one who has obtained the favorable report of Señor Sutter, without any one being able to question their ownership; a copy of this given to them hereafter by Señor Sutter serving them as a formal title, with which they shall present themselves to this government for the purpose of delivering to them the title in due form and upon paper of the corresponding seal. And for the testimony thereof at all times, I give this present document, which shall be acknowledged and respected by all the civil and military authorities of the Mexican nation in this and all other departments. (Signed) Micheltorena." It having been decided that this grant passed a title to the persons therein referred to as fully and effectually as if they had individually been named in it or had received their separate titles, the only question that remains is, was the claimant one of those who had petitioned the government, and had obtained a favorable report from Señor Sutter? Of this, the most satisfactory evidence would undoubtedly be the production of a copy of the grant delivered to him by Sutter in obedience to the direction contained in it. But this, though perhaps the best, is not the only evidence which could establish the fact that the claimant was one of the intended grantees. If he could show that he had petitioned for the land, and that he had obtained the favorable report of General Sutter, it would clearly be enough to establish his right under the grant, even though Sutter may have neglected or refused to give him the evidence of his title which he was directed to furnish. The fact, however, that such a copy was not delivered to the party, would be a circumstance requiring explanation; for it has not, as yet, been suggested to this court that Sutter neglected or refused to comply with the directions of the general title in this respect, when applied to by any one entitled under it.

In the case at bar, it is alleged that a copy of the title was duly given to the grantee; that it, with other papers, was lost by him while fording the Sacramento river; that on being made acquainted with the loss, Captain Sutter furnished a second copy, which was sent by the grantee to Monterey for the purpose of obtaining the approval of the assembly, but that he has never been able to recover it, or to discover what had been done with it. General Sutter, who was sworn on the part of the claimants, testified that John Smith petitioned the governor for six square leagues of land, accompanying his petition by a map drawn, as he understood, by John Bidwell. The expediente with the usual decree for information was acted upon by the witness, and a favorable report made before the twenty-second of December, 1844. The witness also stated that he remembered having given to Smith a copy of the original title, as he was entitled to have it; that subsequently he was informed and fully satisfied that in the spring of 1845, Smith lost all his documentary evidence or expediente in this case. On his cross-examination he stated that after the petition came back from Monterey for his report he examined it in the presence of Bidwell, who wrote it, and of Smith, the grantee. Major Bidwell confirms the testimony of General Sutter, and states that he saw the latter deliver a copy of the general title to Smith; and that subsequently he prepared a petition to General Sutter, soliciting another copy of the general title, as the first had been lost with the accompanying documents; and that General Sutter knowing that fact, delivered a second copy as requested. The witness also states that the land claimed in this case was granted to Smith by the general title referred to; and he identifies a map as made by himself in 1844, on which the land now claimed is marked as the "Rancho de Yuba." General Sutter was re-examined in this court. His recollection when making his last deposition seems more uncertain and confused than when his testimony was first taken. He repeats, however, his former statement as to the facts we are considering, viz. that Smith applied for the land; that the petition was referred to him; that he reported favorably upon it; that he delivered a copy of the general title to Smith; and that on its being proved to him "by many persons" that the first copy was lost, he gave or sent to Smith a second copy. When asked how the loss was proved, he replied: "When a man like Bidwell told me anything, I believed it like the Gospel."

There can, I think, be no room for doubt under this testimony that Smith was one of those in whose favor the general title issued.

His own testimony has been taken to prove the loss of the copy delivered to him and of the other documents. It is objected that it has since appeared that he has or pretends to some interest in the land, notwithstanding his conveyance to the present claimants. A bill of complaint is exhibited in which he prays that that sale may be set aside on the ground of fraud. The objection was not taken, however, at the time he testified, and besides, his own evidence as to the loss of the documents would clearly be admissible, notwithstanding his interest. His account is corroborated by the testimony of Sutter and Bidwell—witnesses of whom it may be observed that they are of a class, unfortunately too small, upon whose veracity this court can place reliance. It is not to be forgotten that the production of the copy of the general title is only important as showing that the party producing it was one of those intended to be benefited by the original. The interest passed by virtue of the original; and it passed to those persons who are referred to in it, though they are not named.

The only inquiry, therefore is, was the claimant one of those persons? To establish this, no secondary evidence of the contents of the copy delivered to him is necessary. It is the fact that he was one of those in whose favor Sutter had reported which fixes his rights, and identifies him as one of the intended grantees. That he did petition for the land; that Sutter reported favorably on his petition; that a copy of the original grant was given to him at the time, as one of the grantees, is clearly proved. His rights are, therefore, established, whatever may have become of the copy delivered to him—that copy being in no sense the instrument which conveyed the title, but only a means of showing by its production what other testimony has sufficiently proved. But in order to ascertain what lands were granted, reference must be had to his petition; for it was the tract therein solicited which the governor granted, and secondary evidence of the contents of the petition must, of course, in the absence of the original, be resorted to.

That the petition and accompanying documents were lost is, I think, sufficiently shown, not only by Smith's own testimony, but by that of Sutter and Bidwell, and still more conclusively by the fact that a second copy of the grant was delivered to the grantee—a proceeding absurd and without a motive, unless the first had been lost. It is suggested that due diligence has not been shown to obtain this second copy. But the only document as to which secondary evidence is important is the petition, and of this it does not appear that any copy was made. The petition not being produced, the fact that the land now claimed was that solicited in it must be established by other testimony. Major Bidwell testifies that he is well acquainted with the land, and he states its boundaries, and that it was granted to Smith by Micheltorena. A map is also identified by him as made by himself in 1844, on which the land now claimed is delineated under the name of "Rancho de Yuba." General Sutter testifies that John Smith petitioned Governor Micheltorena for six leagues of land, accompanying his petition with a map or diseño, drawn, as witness understood, by Major Bidwell. Smith (the witness says) was in possession by his authority of this land—the boundaries of which correspond with the map referred to in the deposition of Bidwell. The witness on his cross-examination says that he examined the original diseño when the expediente was referred to him for his "informe;" that he was well acquainted with the ground, and that the boundaries as testified to by Major Bidwell, and delineated on the map referred to by him, correspond with those on the diseño which accompanied the petition. When subsequently examined, the witness declared his inability to specify the boundaries of the land petitioned for, or to give a particular description of the diseño which accompanied the petition. He even states that he cannot recollect the quantity of land applied for by Smith.

It is not very easy to reconcile the accurate recollection exhibited in the first deposition of General Sutter with the confusion and forgetfulness shown in his last. Perhaps the lapse of time may in some degree have impaired his memory, though it is strange that two years should have so completely obliterated the recollection of events which in 1855 he so freshly remembered. If we were compelled to rely upon General Sutter's testimony alone to ascertain the land which Smith petitioned for, and which was granted to him, we should, perhaps, be obliged to reject the claim. The testimony of Bidwell, however, is explicit, and identifies the land granted to Smith. Smith himself swears that he petitioned for and obtained the Rancho de Yuba; and that he claimed to own it is evident from the testimony introduced on the part of the United States; for in 1848, he sold out to Nye and Foster, from whom the claimants derive title, his interest in the land now in controversy. The fact that so soon after the acquisition of the country he claimed to own this land under the title derived from Micheltorena, shows that the claim now urged is no recent invention, and corroborates the testimony of Sutter and Bidwell that the tract now claimed was that originally petitioned for and granted to him. Upon the whole, I think it sufficiently proved, not only that Smith was one of the intended grantees under the general title, but that the land petitioned for by him, and by that instrument granted, was the Rancho de Yuba claimed in this suit.

The next inquiry is, was the vested interest so acquired forfeited during the existence of the former government by such unreasonable neglect to perform the conditions as to justify the presumption that the grantee had abandoned his grant. The evidence shows that before obtaining his grant, Smith had purchased from General Sutter one league of land, and had built a house upon it. The land he solicited immediately adjoined this tract, and it would seem from the proofs, that the second house built by Smith was also within the limits of his purchase, and not within those of his grant. This is certainly the case if the boundaries of Sutter's grant be located according to the preliminary survey made of it. It may be admitted, therefore, that Smith never built a house within the limits of the six leagues granted; but that he resided in a house built on the land purchased by him which immediately adjoined it. His cattle, however, ranged over the large tract, and he appears to have claimed and been recognized as possessing both tracts, until 1848, when he sold out to Nye and Foster. It seems to me that this occupation was sufficient to satisfy the Mexican law. When a sobrante or surplus was granted to one who had previously obtained a grant of a portion of the land inclosed within natural boundaries, it was not expected that he should build a second house and reside on both tracts at once. So also where an augmentation or additional grant was made, the additional quantity was added to that first granted, and both formed one whole. If Smith then was residing and had built a house upon the one league purchased, and subsequently obtained from the government an additional six leagues immediately adjoining it, he must be considered from that time as occupying the whole seven leagues, or the whole tract, upon a portion of which he continued to reside. Certainly, such an occupation repels all idea that he had abandoned his grant. And it is only when the neglect to fulfill the conditions has been so unreasonable as to justify the presumption of abandonment, that we are authorized, under the principles laid down by the supreme court, to declare his claim forfeited.

It is further objected that the general title only grants to those citizens who have obtained the favorable report of General Sutter the lands solicited by them respectively; and that it is not shown that Smith was a citizen. It appears that Smith is a native of Canada or New Brunswick; that he came to this country in 1835. He swears himself that he was naturalized, but he does not produce his papers or give secondary evidence of their contents. They were lost with the other documents. It appears, however, that General Sutter delivered to him a copy of the title as one of those referred to in it. General Sutter was at that time military commandant of the frontier, and exercised civil jurisdiction in that portion of Upper California. He was directed to deliver a copy of the title to a certain class of persons described in it. It is to be presumed that as an officer of the government he did his duty, and acted within the limits of his authority. The fact, therefore, that Smith was recognized by him as one of those entitled to receive a copy of the grant, and that he delivered a copy to him as such, should, when corroborated by the oath of Smith himself, be received as sufficient to bring him within the class of persons in whose favor the grant issued.

The claim was confirmed by the board, and I see no reason to reverse their decision.

[The case was taken, on an appeal, to the supreme court, where the judgment of the district court was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition. 23 How. (64 U. S.) 262.]

The prisoner [William Ross] was indicted for being present, aiding, and abetting, in the murder of a colored man, on board of the American schooner Pocahontas, on the high seas, near the Cape de Verd islands. At the trial it appeared, that on or about the 5th of June, 1812, the schooner lay at anchor in an open roadstead or bay, near the isle of St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verd islands, about a half mile from the shore, and about a mile from the town of Praga. There were several passengers on board (and among them the person, who was murdered) who were to have been landed at the island of Fogo; but the vessel had a cargo on board and was bound for Boston. About midnight, the prisoner, who acted as ringleader, and nine Portuguese convicts, came on board, armed with muskets, cutlasses, and long knives, took possession forcibly of the vessel, drove those of the crew, who were on deck, below, wounded two persons on deck, knocked down the mate, who was coming up the companion way, and stabbed the colored man, who was on the deck, in four places, of which wounds he died within a half hour. The ruffians then cut the cables, hoisted the sails, and stood out for sea, intending to proceed to South America. It did not appear precisely where the vessel was, when the death of the colored man took place; but she was adrift, and the sails hoisting with a breeze off shore; and according to the testimony, from two to six miles from the land. The seizing of the vessel was proved to have been by a preconcert, and with a determination to accomplish the enterprise, be the consequences ever so fatal. There was a great deal of evidence in the cause, as to the subsequent proceedings and the final rescue of the vessel by the captain and his crew, aided by the prisoner, whom the captain had brought over to his side by exciting jealousies between him and his companions. But it is inconsistent with the object of this report to state it at large; and therefore, so much only of the evidence, as raised the points of law, in which the court gave an opinion, is presented. There was no evidence, by whom the mortal wounds were given. But all the conspirators were on the deck at the time, engaged in assisting each other; and the prisoner acted as their chief, and was armed in the same manner as the others. The pretence alleged for this piratical enterprise, and insisted on at the trial, as a defence, was that the conspirators seized the vessel, in order to recover their personal liberty, and escape from the control and subjection of the Portuguese government.

It was insisted: (1) That the court had not jurisdiction over the offence, because it was committed in a roadstead or bay, within the jurisdiction of a foreign country, and not on the high seas; (2) that if the court had jurisdiction, the prisoner could not be convicted on the indictment, as it was not proved, that he was present at the time when the wounds were given, or ordered them to be given, though he was on the deck and engaged in the common enterprise; (3) that the seizure of the vessel was a mere marine trespass and not a felony, and therefore the killing in this case was not murder. In support of these positions, Whipple & Searle, for the prisoner, cited Act April 30, 1790, c. 9, § 8; 1 Hawk, c. 31, § 53; 4 Bl. Comm. 195, 200; Plow. 471, 473; 4 Bl. Comm. 231; 1 Hawk. P. Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and HOWELL, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice (after summing up the facts). The first question to be decided is, whether the court has jurisdiction over the offence, as proved in the evidence; or in other words, was the offence committed on the high seas, within the true intent and meaning of the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 9, § 8? From the language of the act I am of opinion, that the words, "high seas," mean any waters on the sea coast, which are without the boundaries of low water mark; although such waters may be in a roadstead or bay within the jurisdictional limits of a foreign government. Such is the meaning attached to the phrase by the common law; and supported by the authority of the admiralty, perhaps to a more enlarged extent. 3 Inst. 113; 1 Rolle, 250; 4 Inst. 134; 1 Inst. 260a; Hale de Port in Harg. 10; 5 Coke, 106; Exton, 80, etc.; Com. Dig. "Admiralty," E (7); 2 East, P. C. 803. The additional words of the act, "in any river, haven, basin or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state," refer to such places without any of the United States, and not without foreign states, as will be very clear on examining the provision as to the place of trial, in the close of the same section.

In the present case, the crime was not completed, until the vessel was standing out at sea under sail. The mortal stabs were given, when the vessel was about a half mile from the shore; but the death did not happen, until the vessel had either drifted or sailed a considerable distance. I do not however deem the difference material. Had the death occurred instanter, I think it would have been a homicide on the high seas.

To constitute the crime of murder, it is not necessary that the slayer should have a particular enmity or malevolence against the deceased; it is sufficient, if there be either a deliberate malice in the act, or circumstances of cruelty and malignity carrying in them the plain indications of a depraved, wicked, and malignant spirit. Fost. Crown Law, 257. Nor is it necessary, to constitute murder, that the party should himself inflict the mortal wounds. It 's sufficient if he is present, aiding and abetting the act. In common sense and reason, as well as law, the ruffian, who stands by and directs or encourages the bloody deed, is equally guilty with him, who applies the poniard.

In the present case, the prisoner and his associates, if the evidence be believed, had entered into a most atrocious conspiracy, in which they were but too successful. The murder (for there can be no doubt it was such in some one of the party) was committed in the course of the execution of that conspiracy. It was a natural, though not a necessary consequence, of the attempt to execute it. The conspirators appear to have armed themselves for the purpose of ensuring success at all hazards; and, indeed, so is the confession of the prisoner himself. It is said, that the original intention of the prisoner and his associates was, not to commit murder, but forcibly to seize the vessel; that such an act was not a felony, but a mere marine trespass, and therefore if death ensued, it would not be murder.

Whether the intention was felonious or not, may not be very material to settle. If by a felony be meant an act punishable with death in the United States, or for which the goods and lands of the party were forfeitable at common law, the conclusion is correct; for the running away with a vessel of the United States is a capital offence only in a captain or mariner of the vessel, and the common law forfeitures do not attach on such an offence. 2 East, P. C. 796. But if by a felony be meant an act punishable by the common law with death, there can be no doubt, that the intention in this case was felonious, for if the evidence be believed, it was a clear case of piracy at the common law. But even supposing the intention was not felonious, still the distinction of the prisoner's counsel cannot be supported.

If a number of persons conspire together to do any unlawful act, and death happen from any thing done in the prosecution of the design, it is murder in all, who take part in the same transaction. Fost. Crown Law, 344, 350, 351; 1 East, P. C. 259. If the design be to commit a trespass, the death must ensue in prosecution of the original design, to make it murder in all. 1 Hale, P. C. 443, 444; J. Kel. 112, &c.; Fost. Crown Law, 351. If to commit a felony, it is murder in all, although the death take place collaterally, or beside the principal design. 1 East, P. C. 255, 256, 258; Fost. Crown Law, 258. More especially will the death be murder, if it happen in the execution of an unlawful design, which, if not a felony, is of so desperate a character, that it must ordinarily be attended with great hazard to life; and, a fortiori, if death be one of the events within the obvious expectation of the conspirators. Fost. Crown Law, 261, 351–353.

If, therefore, the jury believe the evidence, that the prisoner with his associates did conspire to seize the schooner with force, and run away with her, against the will of the master and crew, and meant in the prosecution of such conspiracy, if necessary, to kill whoever should oppose them in executing their project; that the prisoner was the chieftain and actually present on board, aiding and assisting in accomplishing the project by all the means in his power; and one of the associates did, on that occasion, kill the unhappy passenger, in aid of the general design; I hold, that the homicide so perpetrated was murder, and that the prisoner and all his associates then present were principals in guilt. See Fost. Crown Law, 349, 350.

The jury found a verdict of not guilty.

[3 Ben. 157.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Feb., 1869.

COUNTERFEITING NATIONAL CURRENCY—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. Where the accused was convicted, under an indictment charging him with aiding and assisting in the making of a plate to be used in printing counterfeit national currency bank notes, and it appeared that the 11th section of the act, under which he was indicted, did not in terms speak of plates for printing national currency but that the 13th section of the act (13 Stat. 218) provided "that the words 'obligation or other security of the United States,' used in this act, shall be held to include * * * national currency;" but the phrase "obligation or other security of the United States" nowhere appeared in the act: Held, that the 13th section referred to the words used separately, and not as a phrase, and that the quotation marks must be disregarded.

2. Inasmuch as the 11th section of the act used the word "obligation," that word must be held to include national currency, and the accused was rightly convicted.

The accused, in this case [Moritz Rossvally], was convicted, under an indictment under the 11th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 218), of aiding and assisting in the making of a counterfeit plate from which counterfeit national currency bank notes could be printed. The 13th section of the act provides: "That the words 'obligation or other security of the United States,' used in this act, shall be held to include and mean all bonds, coupons, national currency," &c. A motion was made in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the phrase "obligation or other security of the United States" did not occur in the 11th section of the act, nor did that section otherwise make it an offence to counterfeit national bank notes.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court upon a motion in arrest of judgment. The prisoner has been convicted under an indictment charging him with aiding and assisting in the making, preparing and engraving of a certain plate, in the likeness and similitude of certain parts of the plate from which are printed certain parts of a United States national currency note particularly described, and also with having in his control, custody and possession, a certain metallic plate, made, prepared and engraved in the likeness and similitude of certain parts of the plates from which are and have been printed, and which were designed for the printing of, certain parts of the United States national currency notes, particularly described, with intent to use the same in counterfeiting such notes. He now moves in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the act of June 30, 1864, under which the indictment is found, creates no such offence as is charged, inasmuch as the words of the 11th section of the act, which is the section relied upon by the government, only relate to the bonds provided for in the act, and do not include the national currency, and that the provision of the 13th section of the same act, which declares "that the words 'obligation or other security of the United States,' used in this act, shall be held to include and mean all bonds, coupons, national currency * * * which have been or shall be issued under any act of congress," has no effect upon the words of the 11th section, for the reason that the phrase "obligation or other security of the United States" nowhere occurs in that section. The point is untenable. It is true that the phrase "obligation or other security of the United States" does not occur in the 11th section of the act in question, but it is also true that the phrase is nowhere used in the act. If, then, the 13th section is to be considered as confined in its effect to the defining of the phrase "obligation or other security of the United States," which appears there to be quoted as a phrase, the whole 13th section is without effect, and meaningless. No proper rule of construction requires this result. The act declares that the words, not the phrase, "obligation or other security of the United States," used in this act, shall be held to include national currency, and although the words appear inclosed in quotation marks, as a phrase, the fact, that no such phrase is used, indicates clearly that the section refers to the words when used separately, and not as a phrase. This would be the reading of the section, if the quotation marks were omitted; and these marks, if not placed as they are by a proof error, cannot be considered as sufficient to make useless so significant a section, which, without them, has a clear meaning and important effect. They must, accordingly, be disregarded. Under this construction, then, of the 13th section, it is manifest that the 11th section creates the offence here charged, for it uses the word "obligation," which, by the 13th section, is declared to include national currency. This is the only point which has been taken on behalf of the prisoner, and that being held against him, the motion must be denied.

Case No. 16,198.

UNITED STATES v. ROUDENBUSH.

[Baldw. 514.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1832.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE OF SIMILAR CRIMES—GOOD CHARACTER—INTOXICATION—COUNTERFEITING.

1. On the trial of an indictment for passing counterfeit notes, evidence may be given of the defendant passing similar counterfeit notes, in order to prove the knowledge that the note in question was counterfeit. So the passing of notes of a different bank at the same time, or of having them in his possession at the time. But if the indictment is for passing a counterfeit note of the Bank of the United States, evidence of passing a counterfeit note of another bank, at another time, is not admissible, or if given without objection a jury will not consider it.

[Cited in McCartney v. State, 3 Ind. 355.]

2. Good general character avails a defendant only in a doubtful case.

[Disapproved in Kistler v. State, 54 Ind. 405. Cited in State v. Northrup, 48 Iowa, 585.]

3. Intoxication is no defence, if the defendant was possessed of his reason, and was capable of knowing whether the note he passed was good or bad.

[Quoted in Wood v. State, 34 Ark. 344. Cited in Garner v. State, 28 Fla. 113, 9 South. 846; Roberts v. People, 19 Mich. 417; Loza v. State, 1 Tex. App. 488.]

This was an indictment for passing a counterfeit ten dollar note of the Bank of the United States, on the trial of which Mr. Gilpin, Dist. Atty., without objection, had given evidence of the defendant [Adam Roudenbush] having passed a counterfeit five dollar note of the Easton (Pennsylvania) Bank, to a different person and at a different time from what was laid in the indictment.

Mr. Hubbell and Mr. Jack, in their address, requested the court to charge the jury that the evidence was improper, and ought not to be considered by them. Evidence was given that the defendant had sustained a good character before the charge was made against him, and at the time of the alleged offence was in a frolick and intoxicated.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice (charging jury). In cases of this description, the offence consists in the guilty knowledge of the party who passes a counterfeit note, which can seldom be made out by direct proof; the prosecutor is therefore at liberty to prove the scienter by circumstances happening at other times, and in relation to other notes. He may show the whole conduct of the prisoner at the time of passing the note for which he is indicted, his having in possession or passing other counterfeits of the same or a different appearance, every thing he said or did at the time, as part of the res gestæ, indicative of his knowledge of the character of the notes he has about him, or is passing. 2 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 93; 1 Burrows, 645; 1 Camp. 324; 6 Barn. & C. 145; Russ. & R. 375; 1 Leach, 125; 5 Rand. (Va.) 701; 5 Day, 175. Evidence of passing notes of the same manufacture and appearance, at other times, and to other persons, is also admissible, if their general resemblance to the one laid in the indictment is such, that a person who knows the one to be a counterfeit could not reasonably believe the others were genuine. So of the circumstances of passing them, and his whole demeanour at the time (4 Bos. & P. 92; Russ. & R. 120, 531), so as to show that he believed them to be counterfeits and passed them as such (3 Mass. 82; 8 Mass. 110; 2 Cow. 522). But where the notes are so different in their appearance, that the knowledge of the one being a counterfeit, would not be a reasonable ground to believe that the other was so, the evidence is not admissible, unless there is some connection between the act of passing them both. In this case the transactions are wholly distinct, being at different times and places, and there is no legal ground of presumption that the prisoner knew the note in question to be forged, because he had passed the notes of another bank knowing them to have been so. To justify the admission of such evidence of a distinct passing, the notes must be of the same or a similar manufacture and appearance (Car. Cr. Law, 195), calculated to lead to the belief that they were of the same character. A man who passes one counterfeit at one time, and a similar one at another, may well be presumed to have known them both to be so; but not so when the notes are on different banks, or so unlike in appearance, that an honest man might think one good, though the other was known to be bad. The scienter must be brought home to the note laid in the indictment, the scienter as to any other note, however clearly proved, is only a matter of inference, and therefore it ought to appear from an inspection of both notes, that they are so similar that a person in the situation of the defendant could not well be deceived. The evidence was therefore inadmissible, if it had been objected to, and as it was not legally competent for you to hear, ought not to be taken into consideration in making up your opinion on the fact, whether the defendant knew the note laid in the indictment to be counterfeit.

This is the principal question in the cause, as the mere fact of passing a counterfeit note is no offence without a guilty knowledge that the note in the indictment was forged. The evidence of his passing other counterfeit notes is not admitted to prove a distinct offence, but merely corroborative of the crime charged, and as auxiliary proof, if the evidence as to the note in the indictment is doubtful. But while this is an exception from the ordinary rules of evidence in criminal cases, unfavourable to the accused, there is another which operates in his favour. He is allowed to give evidence of his general good character, and to avail himself of it to rebut the presumption of a corrupt and criminal intention in passing the paper. It is one of the great safeguards of innocence, and never fails to have a powerful influence with the jury; where there is any doubt, good character will outweigh ordinary presumptions and circumstances merely suspicious. But if the evidence is clear and convincing that the note was passed knowing it to be counterfeit, then, however bright his character may have been previous to the offence, a jury must look only to the facts and law of the case; on the same principle, evidence is permitted to be given of the character of his relatives and connections in society, and of the situation of his family; but these are circumstances which can avail him in a less degree only in cases of doubt; if the positive or circumstantial evidence of guilt leaves no doubt on their minds, a jury could not suffer such considerations to operate without violating a duty which should be ever held sacred in courts of justice, to judge alike, and by the same rules, the high and low, the rich and poor.

A defendant's standing in society gives him a right to demand from you the most favourable construction of the acts proved upon him, which the law permits to be drawn; but every dictate of public justice, the peace, interest and safety of the community, forbid him to expect, or the jury to grant him a dispensation, if his case comes within the law. If the provisions of the law have been violated, its penalties must be enforced, the arm of public justice must not be arrested in court, merely because its blow may, in reaching a guilty man, strike deep into his social and domestic relations. If there is a punishment which operates severely on the criminal, which is a solemn warning example to others, and produces an impressive influence on society, it is when the effects of crime are visited upon the dearest objects of affection; and if any thing can prevent their commission, if society can have any hold on those who are inclined to disturb its repose, it is in the certainty that the happiness of all around them depends on their conduct. When this hold is loosened, the time cannot be far distant when the feelings of families and friends of an accused, will be deemed more sacred than the laws of the country, and his good character carrying with it an exemption from punishment, become an indemnity for crime.

One of the restraints society has upon men to prevent the commission of crimes, is the consideration they may have for their wives and children; but if these connections are to be a protection for the guilty, so far from being a restraint, they will be an inducement to crime, they will offend, trusting to their family for escape.

If a jury make up a verdict on considerations of character, family connections or wealth, and on this ground acquit where the evidence of guilt is clear, they not only establish a principle of the most atrocious kind, but hold out a most dangerous example to society. The danger and loss to the public from the passing of counterfeit paper, is greater or less according to the character of the person who passes it; you see this exemplified in the case before you, Shive and defendant. If both are equally guilty, who deserves the severest punishment? He who descends from his high character, abuses his means of usefulness, perverts them to the injury of his fellow citizens, and sets a base example to all below him; who sins against light and knowledge and prostitutes every thing to his criminal pursuits, or the poor, the friendless, the low born, low connected, and of low associations, who sees his respectable neighbour commit crime with impunity, and is seduced by his example of detected, but successful crime? The rule of law is in a few words this: Never convict rich or poor, high or low, the good or the bad, without such proof of guilt as satisfies your minds beyond all reasonable doubt. If the character of the accused is bad, and his habits vicious, if the moral principle is impaired or extinct, and the evidence leaves you in doubt as to the motive with which the act is done, you may, and in most instances will, presume, that the intention with which the particular act is done, is in accordance with the general tenor of his character and conduct. So if the character is good, you will apply the rule in his favour; but when the evidence is clear, either way, character is out of the question; you cannot convict without, or acquit in face of, the evidence.

There is another circumstance in this case which calls for some remarks from the court. It is alleged that the defendant was on a frolick, and intoxicated at the time of receiving the counterfeit notes at Shive's. Intoxication is no excuse for crime, when the offence consists merely in doing a criminal act, without regarding intention. But when the act done is innocent in itself, and criminal only when done with a corrupt or malicious motive, a jury may, from intoxication, presume that there was a want of criminal intention; that the reasoning faculty, the power of discrimination between right and wrong, was lost in the excitement of the occasion. But if the mind still acts, if its reasoning and discriminating faculty remains, a state of partial intoxication affords no ground of a favourable presumption in favour of an honest or innocent intention, in cases where a dishonest and criminal intention would be fairly inferred from the commission of the same acts when sober. The simple question is, did he know what he was about? The law depends on the answer to this question. The offence charged against Mr. Roudenbush is not for dishonestly receiving, but for dishonestly passing, counterfeit notes. If he received these notes believing them to be genuine, you must be satisfied that he passed them as true, knowing them to be false. But if he received them as counterfeits, then the act of passing them as true completes the offence without further evidence. If you shall believe that when he received these notes at Shive's, he was in such a state of intoxication, as not to know what he was giving or what he was receiving in exchange, then you may say that he did not receive them as known counterfeits; and before you can find him guilty you will require, besides proof of his passing them as true, proof of his knowledge that they were false. This would be going to the utmost extent which the law would warrant or reason justify, by putting him on the footing of a sober man who innocently should receive forged paper.

The defendant's counsel could not ask you to go further in any case of the highest degree of intoxication. You will decide whether, from the circumstances of this case, you will feel justified in going so far. Should you be of opinion that either from intoxication, ignorance, or the imposition practised on him by artful villany, he received the notes as good, or not knowing them to be bad, and thus make every possible allowance in favour of the accused; you canot extend that allowance to the passing of the notes, when intoxication has ceased, and imposition could no longer be practised upon his ignorance, if he then knew them to be forged.

UNITED STATES v. ROUSMANIERE'S ADM'RS et al.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1821.

BANKS AND BANKING—COLLECTION OF DUTY BONDS—PAYMENT BY FORGED INDORSEMENTS—EQUITIES OF BANK.

Where a bank, in which the bonds for customs were left for collection under the authority of the government, discounted for the principal obligor certain notes for the payment of these bonds, and the proceeds were carried to the credit of the United States by the bank, in discharge of the bonds, and it turned out that the indorsements on the notes were forgeries practised by the principal, it was held, that the bonds were discharged, and there was no remedy in equity to acquire a priority on the assets of the principal.

Bill in equity brought by the United States, as trustees of the Newport Bank, against the defendants as administrators of the estate of Lewis Rousmaniere. The bill in substance states, that the Newport Bank is a bank of deposit of the United States for the revenue collected in that district, and agent for the collection of such revenue. That two custom house bonds, executed by Rousmaniere and some of the defendants as his sureties, were deposited in the bank for collection, which bonds were for $1,576 $^{15}/_{100}$, and payable on the 29th and 30th of April, 1820; that on the 25th of the same month Rousmaniere proposed to the bank to receive in payment of these bonds two notes to be signed by himself, and indorsed by John P. Mann and Andrew Winslow, (two of the defendants) one note for $750, payable in 30 days, and one note for $750, payable in 60 days, he, Rousmaniere, paying the usual discount; that the bank directed their cashier to receive the same notes in payment of the bonds, and to pass the amount to the credit of the United States; and on the next day (the 26th of April) Rousmaniere delivered to the cashier two notes, purporting as above, in payment of the bonds, and he received them in payment, and delivered up the bonds to Rousmaniere, and passed the amount to the credit of the United States; that before the bonds became due, Rousmaniere, out of the money so credited to him by the bank, paid a debt due to the bank of $600, but this payment was not a part of the agreement relative to the payment of the custom house bonds, and Rousmaniere replaced the sum so paid, before he took away the bonds; that when the notes became due, payment was demanded of the administrators of Rousmaniere, he having died in the interim, and also of the indorsers; but payment was refused, and by Mann, because the indorsement of his name was a forgery; that the administrators have refused to deliver back the bonds to the bank, which are in their hands uncancelled, or to acknowledge the debt to be still due on the bonds; that his estate is insolvent; that in fact the signature of Mann was a forgery, made by Rousmaniere to deceive the bank, and that the notes delivered to the bank were delivered by Rousmaniere as true and genuine notes; and upon the faith thereof the bonds were delivered to him by the bank. The prayer of the bill then is, that the notes so received may be decreed not to be a payment of the bonds, and that the debt is still due on the bonds and ought to be paid out of the estate of Rousmaniere in the hands of the administrators, or, that the bonds be delivered up to the plaintiffs, and be paid by the obligors, and for other relief. The answer of the administrators denies, that the Newport Bank is agent of the United States in the manner stated in the bill; and avers, that the custom house bonds were punctually and bona fide paid by Rousmaniere, and being discharged were delivered up to him. It further avers, that the two notes above stated were not received in payment of the bonds, but were discounted for Rousmaniere by the bank, in the ordinary course of business; that the United States have no claim on the bonds, full payment having been made to the collector, and he having been credited with the amount in the settlement of his accounts with the United States; that the bank have no title to obtain a preference by using the name of the United States, and are entitled only to a dividend in common with other creditors. The answers of the co-obligors and sureties on the bonds allege a due payment of the bonds, and that they are discharged; and aver, that they are ignorant how the money was obtained; and also aver, that the bank had no right to accept the notes in payment of the bonds. The answer of Winslow does not admit his indorsement on the notes, averring, that he cannot say, whether he signed them or not, as the bank have refused to let him see them. The answer of Mann denies, that he ever indorsed the notes.

The general replication being filed, and evidence taken, the cause was set down for argument at this term.

does not appear to me to involve any real difficulty. Stripped of the disguise, which the bill attempts to throw over them, the naked facts appear to be these. Mr. Rousmaniere was indebted to the United States on two custom house bonds, which were lodged at the Newport Bank in the usual course of business for collection. Before they became due, and with the avowed intention of paying them out of the proceeds, Mr. Rousmaniere procured two indorsed notes to be discounted at the bank, and paid the discount. The remaining proceeds were applied with other monies of Rousmaniere to the payment of the bonds, which were delivered up to him, and the amount was credited by the bank, first to the collector of Newport, and by him to the United States; and in a final settlement of accounts has been duly credited to the collector at the treasury department. It turns out, that the notes so discounted were not what they purported to be, the indorsement of the signature of Mr. Mann being a forgery. The bank has brought this suit to have these bonds re-delivered to it, they now remaining in the hands of Rousmaniere's administrators uncancelled; and to procure a decree, that the bond debts have not been paid, and ought to be paid by the administrators. What authority the bank has in this case to make use of the name of the United States, I profess not to understand. The district attorney is no party to the bill, and I cannot perceive, that in any legal sense the United States are established to be trustees of the bank. The bonds never were assigned to the bank by the United States, nor is there any equitable ground, upon which the bank can claim any interest in them. If they have been regularly paid, they are extinguished, and their functions are gone; if not so paid, then they remain the exclusive property of the government; and the recovery, if at all, must be for their exclusive use.

The question, therefore, naturally arises, whether these bonds have been paid. And it is most manifest, that they have been duly paid, and credit accordingly given to the public treasury. But it is said, that these spurious notes were received in payment of the bonds by the bank, as agent of the United States, and payment in such notes is utterly void. But in point of fact, the notes were never so received, or paid. They were discounted at the bank in the usual course of business, and the discount was received by the bank; and the most that can be said is, that the proceeds were applied to the payment of the bonds. If the notes had been discounted at another bank, and the proceeds so applied, there would be no pretence to say, that the payment was not good and irrevocable. It cannot vary the case, that the bank here was entrusted with the collection of the bonds. When it applied its own money to the discount of Rousmaniere's note, the money became Rousmaniere's, and, as such, was paid over to the United States; and it matters not how Rousmaniere obtained it. Neither is it true, that the notes were ever received in payment of the bonds for the United States. The United States never had any interest in them, or title to them. They were the exclusive property of the bank, and the discount was for its own profit. It is impossible, therefore, to sustain the position, on which the whole argument of the plaintiff rests. Besides, the bank had no authority from the United States to receive such notes in payment. It cannot be inferred from the nature of such an agency in general; and in respect to the government, it is perfectly clear, that no right exists in any public officer to delegate such an authority; and if it did, it is as clear, that none was given. So that, if the bank had undertaken to receive the notes in payment, it would have been at its own peril, and it would be responsible for the money due on the bonds.

In every view, this bill has not a shadow of right to sustain it; and I think the defendants are entitled to recover costs, to be taxed against the bank, which is the real plaintiff in the case. Bill dismissed.

Case No. 16,201.

UNITED STATES v. ROYALL.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1829.

INDICTMENT—COMMON BARRATRY, ETC.

An indictment, charging the defendant with being a common slanderer, or common brawler, is not sufficient. It should charge the defendant as a common scold, or common barrator, in technical language; these being the only indictable offences of that class.

The indictment in this case contained three counts: (1) The first count charged that the defendant [Ann Royall] "being an evil-disposed person, a common slanderer and disturber of the peace and happiness of her quiet and honest neighbors, on the 1st of June, 1829, and on divers days and times, as well before as afterwards, was, and yet is, a common slanderer of the good people of her neighborhood, in which she, the said Ann, resides, that is, at the county aforesaid, and on divers other days and times, as well before as afterwards, at the county aforesaid, in the open and public streets, in the city of Washington, in the county aforesaid, in the presence and hearing of divers good citizens of the said county, did falsely and maliciously slander and abuse divers good citizens of the said county, to the common nuisance of the good citizens of the United States, residing within the county aforesaid, to the evil example, &c., and against the peace and government of the United States." To this count there was a demurrer. (2) The second count charged her as a common scold. To this count she pleaded not guilty. (3) The third count commences like the first, and charges that, on the 1st of June, &c., she was, and yet is, a common brawler and sower of discord among her honest and quiet neighbors; and on the 1st of June, &c., at, &c., in the open and public streets of the city of Washington, in the county aforesaid, did annoy and disturb the good people of the United States residing in the county aforesaid, by her open and public brawling, and public slanders, to the common nuisance of the good citizens of the United States, residing within the county aforesaid, to the evil example, &c. To this count there was also a demurrer.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court, as follows (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, dissenting): The first and third counts of this indictment seem to us to be clearly bad, because they want that technical description which is necessary to charge the defendant as a common scold or barratrix, which are the only indictable offences of this class. Thus, in the case of Margaret Cooper, 2 Strange, 1246, "she was indicted for being a common and turbulent brawler and sower of discord among her quiet and honest neighbors, so that she hath stirred, moved, and incited divers strifes, controversies, quarrels, and disputes amongst her majesty's liege people, contra pacem," &c. "It was moved in arrest of judgment that the charge was too general, and did not amount to being either a barrator or common scold, which are the only instances in which a general charge will be sufficient. It was likewise objected, that, if the words did amount to a description of a scold, yet it should be laid ad commune nocumentum of her neighbors; for every degree of scolding is not indictable. And the court was of opinion (absente C. J.) that the judgment ought to be arrested on both exceptions, for none of the words here used are the technical words; and it must be laid to be to the common nuisance." So, also, in the case of Rex v. Hardwicke, 1 Sid. 282, communis vicinorum suorum oppressor was adjudged bad, because the word "oppressor" was uncertain; and that in such indictments the word "barrectator" ought to be used, "which is a word of art," "and all the other judges agreed that the indictment is not good without the word 'barrectator;' and their great reason was that all the precedents are so, and that 'barrectator' is a word of art in such a case; but they said that the finding him to be a common oppressor of his neighbors had been good evidence to find him guilty of barratry, and therefore they bound him to his good behavior." So in the case of Rex v. Taylor, 2 Strange, 849, "an indictment was quashed for generality, being calumniatrix et communis et turbulenta pacis perturbatrix, ac lites, rixas et pugnas movit et incitavit, et quendam Josephum Atherton, verbis, contumeliis et opprobriis abusa fuit in domo ipsius J. A." So in Rolle, Abr. "Indictment," K.: "Defamator bonorum nominis et famæ, is not good without showing some particular matter. So defamator, vexator, et oppressor multorum hominum, common forestaller, common thief; so also common disturber of the peace of the lord the king, and that he unjustly excited and procured divers suits and discords, as well between his neighbors as between divers liege subjects of the lord the king," &c. So, also, in the case of Reg. v. Foxby, 6 Mod. 11, "judgment was arrested because it was that she was communis calumniatrix, which is not the Latin word for 'scold,' but 'rixatrix.'"

All these have been decided not to be indictable offences. Upon the authority of these cases, we think that the judgment upon the first and third counts of this indictment must be for the defendant.

Case No. 16,202.

UNITED STATES v. ROYALL.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1829.

COMMON SCOLD — EVIDENCE — BAIL FOR APPEARANCE — NUISANCE.

1. Upon the trial on an indictment for being a common scold, particular instances of scolding may be given in evidence.

2. After conviction as a common scold, the court will order the defendant, if in court, to give security for her appearance in court, from day to day, to hear the judgment of the court, and in the mean time to be of good behavior.

3. The law against a common scold, as being a common nuisance, is not obsolete, although the punishment by ducking may be. It is still punishable, as a nuisance at common law, by fine and imprisonment.

4. Anger is not a necessary ingredient in scolding.

The first and third counts of this indictment [against Ann Royall] having been adjudged bad upon demurrer [Case No. 16,201], the cause now came on for trial upon the general issue on the second count.

Mr. Swann, for the United States, called a witness to testify to a particular instance of the defendant's scolding.

Mr. Coxe, for defendant, objected that particular instances could not be given in evidence, the offence consisting in her being a common nuisance.

THE COURT, however, (nem. con.) overruled the objection.

The jury found the defendant guilty, and her counsel moved in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial; whereupon, at the motion of the attorney for the United States, the defendant was required to enter into recognizance with one or more good sureties, to appear in court from day to day, to hear the judgment of the court, and in the mean time to be of good behavior.

The cause was argued, on the motion in arrest and for a new trial, by Mr. Swann, for the United States, and Mr. Coxe, for the defendant.

Mr. Coxe contended that, by the common law, the only punishment of a common scold was ducking—a mode of punishment which is obsolete in England, and was never inflicted in Maryland, under whose common law this prosecution has been commenced. That it certainly is an unusual punishment, and is therefore forbidden by the bill of rights of Maryland. That as the punishment is taken away, the common law which inflicted it is also abrogated. To show that ducking was the only punishment of the offence, he cited Jac. Law Dict. tit. "Scold"; Rees' Cyclopædia and Webst. Dict. same title; 1 Hawk. P. C. 198, 200; 3 Inst. 219; Jac. Dict. tit. "Castigatory." Upon the motion for a new trial, he contended that anger and turbulence were necessary to constitute unlawful scolding, and that there was no evidence of either. The jury also had taken out with them the indictment containing the two bad counts which had been quashed by the court.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court (nem. con.) as follows: The defendant has been convicted upon the second count of this indictment, which is in the following words: "And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that the said Ann Royall, being an evil disposed person as aforesaid, and a common scold and disturber of the peace of her honest and quiet neighbors, on the first day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, as aforesaid, at the county of Washington aforesaid, and on divers other days and times, as well before as after, was and yet is a common scold, and disturber of the peace and happiness of her quiet and honest neighbors residing in the county aforesaid; and that the said Ann Royall, on the first day of June, in the year aforesaid, and on divers other days and times, as well before as afterwards, in the open and public streets in the city of Washington, in the county aforesaid, did annoy and disturb the good people of the United States residing in the county aforesaid, by her open, public, and common scolding, to the common nuisance of the good citizens of the United States residing within the county aforesaid, to the evil example of all others in like cases offending, and against the peace and government of the United States."

The counsel for the defendant has moved the court to arrest the judgment, and to grant a new trial. In support of the motion to arrest the judgment, it is contended that the law for the punishment of common scolds is quite obsolete in England, and never was in force in this country; that it is a barbarous and unusual punishment, and therefore is prohibited by the bill of rights annexed to the constitution of Maryland, under whose supposed common law this indictment is framed; that the punishment of ducking was the appropriate and only punishment by the common law of England; and that, as that mode of punishment is obsolete there, and never was in use here, the law, which considered scolding as an indictable offence, is obsolete also. That the term "scold" is of uncertain signification; that the offence is not well defined in any adjudged case, or in any elementary writer. Jacob, in his Law Dictionary, says: "Scolds, in a legal sense, are troublesome and angry women, who, by their brawling and wrangling amongst their neighbors, break the public peace, increase discord, and become a public nuisance to the neighborhood. They are indictable in the sheriff's tourn, and punished by the cucking-stool." In order to show that such was the only punishment which could be inflicted upon a scold, the counsel for the defendant cited Jacob's Dict. (Tomlin's Ed.) tit. "Castigatory for Scolds," where it is said: "A woman indicted for being a common scold, if convicted, shall be sentenced to be placed in a certain engine of correction called the 'trebucket,' 'tumbrel,' 'tymborella,' 'castigatory' or 'cucking-stool,' which, in Saxon, signifies the 'scolding-stool,' though now it is frequently corrupted into 'ducking-stool,' because the residue of the judgment is, that when she is so placed therein, she shall be plunged into the water for her punishment." And in the case of Reg. v. Foxby, 6 Mod. 11, the reporter says: "Note, the punishment of a scold is ducking"; and Holt, when the exception was first made, said: "It were better ducking in a Trinity than in a Michaelmas term." And in the same case, in 6 Mod. 178, it is said: "She was convicted by the justices of the peace, at their quarter sessions at Maidstone, upon an indictment for being a common scold, and judgment that she should be ducked; whereupon she brought a writ of error, and hereupon the sheriff let her go at large, there being no fine or imprisonment in the judgment." And again, in the same case, 6 Mod. 213, upon affidavits that she was so ill that, without danger of her life, she could not come up to assign errors, in person, according to the course of the court, "they enlarged the time till next term, to see how she would behave herself in the mean time; for Holt, Chief Justice, said ducking would rather harden than cure her; and if she were once ducked she would scold all the days of her life;" a consequence which the court would hardly have inflicted upon the public, if they could have avoided it by substituting fine and imprisonment for ducking. From these authorities the counsel for the defendant concluded that ducking was the only punishment which could ever have been inflicted upon a scold, by the common law.

And to show that that punishment was obsolete in England, he cited the following passage from Jacob's Law Dictionary, tit. "Castigatory": "Though this punishment is now disused, a former editor of Jacob's Dictionary (Mr. Morgan) mentions that he remembers to have seen the remains of one" (a ducking stool) "on the estate of a relation of his, in Warwickshire, consisting of a long beam or rafter, moving on a fulcrum, and extending to the centre of a large pond, on which end the stool used to be placed."

The only punishment which could be inflicted being obsolete, the counsel for the defendant contended that the offence was no longer indictable, and therefore the judgment ought to be arrested. But it will be perceived that this argument rests upon the proposition that ducking was the only punishment which could be inflicted for the offence of being a common scold; and that that proposition is supported only by uncertain inferences drawn from a few loose expressions in the books, and chiefly from the word "shall," and the word "residue," in the first passage above cited, from Tomlin's Jacob's Dictionary, tit. "Castigatory." That passage, and particularly those words "shall" and "residue," are copied from 4 Bl. Comm. 168, where Blackstone says: "Lastly, a common scold—'communis rixatrix'—(for our law Latin confines it to the feminine gender,) is a public nuisance to her neighborhood, for which offence she may be indicted (6 Mod. 213); and, if convicted, shall (1 Hawk. 198, 200) be sentenced to be placed in a certain engine of correction called the 'trebucket,' 'castigatory,' or 'cucking-stool,' which, in the Saxon language, is said to signify the 'scolding-stool'; because the residue of the judgment is that, when she is so placed therein, she shall be plunged in the water for her punishment. 3 Inst. 219." The authorities, thus cited by Blackstone, do not indicate any opinion that ducking is the only punishment, nor even that it is an indispensable part of the punishment. The argument drawn from the playful expression of Lord Chief Justice Holt, in 6 Mod. 213, does not warrant so grave a conclusion. They were intended, perhaps, only to excite suprise by their exaggeration; for surprise is sometimes an approximation to wit. Nor can such a conclusion be drawn from the language of Hawkins in the passages cited by Blackstone. 1 Hawk. P. C. 198, 200. The first of those passages is this: "Although it hath been said that an indictment of a common scold by the words 'communis rixatrix,' which seem to be precisely necessary in every indictment of this kind, is good, though it conclude 'ad commune nocumentum diversorum,' instead of 'omnium,' &c., perhaps for this reason; because a common scold cannot but be a common nuisance." The other passage is (1 Hawk. P. C. 200)—"As to the third point, namely, in what manner common nuisances may be punished, it is said that a common scold is punishable by being put in the ducking-stool; and there is no doubt but that, whoever is convicted of another nuisance may be fined and imprisoned." And the passage cited from 3 Inst. 219, seems rather to justify a contrary conclusion. Lord Coke is speaking of the different means of punishment; and, after describing the pillory and tumbrel, he says—" 'Trebucket,' or 'castigatory,' named in the statute of 51 Hen. III., signifieth a 'cucking-stool'; and 'trebucket' is properly a 'pitfall,' or 'downfall,' and, in law, signifieth a stool that falleth down into a pit of water, for the punishment of the party in it; and 'chuck,' or 'guck,' in the Saxon tongue signifieth to scold or brawl, (taken from 'cuckhaw' or 'guckhaw,' a bird, 'qui odiose jurgat et rixatur,') and 'ing,' in that language, (water); because she was, for her punishment soused in the water; and others fetch it from 'cuck-quean i pellex.' " This citation does not justify an inference that the ducking-stool was an instrument appropriated to the punishment of scolds only. It says, for the punishment of the party; and it refers to the statute of 51 Hen. III. stat. 6, entitled "Judicium Pillorie; A Statute of the Pillory and Tumbrel, and of the Assize of Bread and Ale," "A. D. 1266," by which it is enacted, that "if a baker or a brewer (braciatrix) be convict, because he hath not observed the assize of bread and ale," "patiatur judicium corporis silicet, pistor collistrigium, et braciatrix trebuchetum vel castigationem" (the old translation in the statute-book is—"then he shall suffer punishment of the body; that is, to wit, a baker to the pillory, and a brewer to the tumbrel, or some other correction.")

It is, therefore, clear, that the punishment of the tumbrel or trebucket, which were the same instrument, was not confined to scolds; and that this citation from Lord Coke does not justify an inference that ducking was the only punishment which could be inflicted upon them. If it should be said that such an inference may be drawn from the etymology of the word "cucking-stool," which he derives from a Saxon word signifying to scold, that inference is rebutted by the more probable etymology given by Burn (3 Burn's Justice, p. 225), who says—"The common people in the northern parts of England, amongst whom the greatest remains of the ancient Saxon are to be found, pronounce it 'ducking-stool,' which, perhaps, may have sprung from the Belgic or Teutonic 'ducken,' to dive under water; from whence, also, probably we denominate our duck, the 'water-fowl'· or, rather, it is more agreeable to the analogy and progression of languages to assert, that the substantive, 'duck,' is the original, and the verb made from thence; as much as to say, to 'duck' is to do as that fowl does." So that the name of the instrument may have been given to it because it is a plunging instrument, and not because it was used for the punishment of scolds only. The words "tumbrel," "trebucket," "castigatory," "cucking-stool," and "ducking-stool," are used synonymously by the old writers, as well as in the old statutes; so that the observations of Lord Coke in the following passage, from the page cited by Blackstone (3 Inst. 219), is as applicable to the trebucket as to the tumbrel—"Now, for that the judgment to the pillory or tumbrel (as hath appeared before,) doth make the delinquent infamous, and that the rule of law is 'Judicium de majore pœna quam quod legibus statutum est non infamum facit, sed per breve de errore adnullari potest'; and again, 'Pæna gravior ultra legem posita æstimationem conservat'; that the justices of assize, oyer and terminer, jail delivery, and justices of the peace would be well advised, before they give judgment of any person to the pillory or tumbrel, unless they have good warrant for their judgment therein. Fine and imprisonment, for offences finable by the justices aforesaid, is a fair and sure way." It is said, however, that this last observation of Lord Coke is confined to offences finable by the justices; and that to argue, from that passage, that a common scold was finable, is to beg the question; as the sentence admits, by implication, that some offences, punishable by the pillory or tumbrel, might not be finable by the justices. In the next sentence, in the same page, however, Lord Coke enumerates many statutes which authorize punishment by the pillory and tumbrel; in some of which the courts are authorized to inflict that punishment in addition to fine and imprisonment, and in others to inflict that punishment alone; which will account for Lord Coke's advice being confined to offences finable by the justices, without admitting that there were any common-law misdemeanors which could not be punished by fine and imprisonment. Mr Chitty (1 Cr. Law, 710) lays down this general rule, that "every description of misdemeanor, or crime, for which an indictment will lie at common law, not subjecting the offender to a capital penalty, is within the discretion of the judges." Thus in the case of Rex v. Thomas, Cas. t. Hardw. 279, convicted of keeping a disorderly house, the wife was in prison, but the husband had run away from his bail; affidavits were made that the prisoner was in so weak a condition that a bodily punishment might kill her: "Per Curiam. The ordinary judgment in this case is pillory; but, for misdemeanor, the court is not tied down to any particular punishment; and being a married woman has nothing to pay a fine withal, the punishment must be imprisonment." The judgment was, that she be imprisoned a year, and then to find security for her good behavior for seven years.

It may be observed, also, in the Case of Foxby, before cited from 6 Mod. 178, that she was a married woman, as appears in page 213 of the same book; which may account for the judgment not being fine and imprisonment, as well as ducking. In Bac. Abr. tit. "Nuisance," D, it is said—"All common nuisances to the public are regularly punishable by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the judges; but in some cases corporal punishment may be inflicted, as in the case of a common scold, who is said to be properly punishable by being put into a ducking-stool Also the offence of keeping a disorderly house is punishable, not only with fine and imprisonment, but also with such infamous punishment as to the court, in its discretion, may seem proper."

We think that, by these authorities, it is clear that Sir William Blackstone, in using the word "shall" in the passage cited, is not to be understood as having used it in its peremptory and obligatory sense, and as intimating that the court was bound to inflict the punishment of ducking upon a common scold, under all possible circumstances; and that, in using the word "residue," it is not to be presumed that he intended to be understood as denying the power of the court to punish any common-law misdemeanor by fine and imprisonment. It is true, that the court, in its discretion, might sentence the offender to be ducked only; in which case, it would be part of the judgment that she should be placed in the stool; and the "residue," in that case, would be, that she should be plunged in the water. And in this sense only can Blackstone be understood, consistently with the general principles of law and the authorities cited. If a part of the common-law punishment of the offence has become obsolete, the only effect is, that the discretion of the court is so far limited. The offence is not obsolete, and cannot become obsolete so long as a common scold is a common nuisance. All the elementary writers upon criminal law admit, that being a common scold, to the common nuisance of the neighborhood, is an indictable offence at common law The court is therefore of opinion, that although punishment by ducking may have become obsolete, yet that the offence still remains a common nuisance, and, as such, is punishable by fine and imprisonment, like any other misdemeanor at common law; and that, therefore, the motion in arrest of judgment must be overruled.

The motion for a new trial rests upon two grounds: (1) That a woman cannot be guilty of scolding unless the words were spoken in anger, and with turbulence; and that the court permitted evidence to be given of insulting and provoking language, uttered by the defendant in an insulting and provoking manner, but not in an angry and turbulent manner; and that there were only two or three instances proved of the language being used by the defendant in anger. (2) That the jury was permitted to take out the indictment which contained the two counts which the court had adjudged to be insufficient, without any information to the jury that those two counts were not to be considered by them.

1. As to the first ground of new trial, the court, at the trial, overruled the objection to the evidence, being of opinion that the insulting and provoking language might be given in evidence, although not spoken in an angry or turbulent manner; which opinion, they still think, is correct, and that its admission is not a sufficient reason for granting a new trial.

2. The second reason is, that the jury took out with them the indictment containing the two counts which the court had, upon demurrer, adjudged to be insufficient. Those counts were not matter of evidence; nor could they have been so understood by the jury; and they could not be separated from the good count, upon which the issue was joined. The indictment was, as usual, delivered to the jury when they retired, without objection by the defendant, or her counsel; and all the facts averred in those counts were matters which, if proved, were evidence upon the issue which the jury was sworn to try. If issue had been joined upon all the three counts, and a general verdict of guilty had been rendered, the judgment could not have been arrested on account of the two bad counts; and yet the jury might have given their verdict, in fact, upon evidence applicable only to one of the bad counts. It is true that it might be the ground of a motion for a new trial; but, upon that motion, the court, before they would grant a new trial, must be satisfied that the evidence was not sufficient to support the good count. So here, although the jury might have supposed they were trying an issue upon all the counts, and may have given their verdict, because they thought one of the bad counts was supported, if the court is satisfied that the evidence was sufficient to support the good count, the court ought not, in its discretion, to grant a new trial. The court is perfectly satisfied that the evidence in that respect was sufficient, and must, therefore, overrule the motion.

The defendant was sentenced to pay a fine of $10, and to give security for her good behavior for one year, and to stand committed until the fine and costs should be paid, and the security given.

Case No. 16,203.

UNITED STATES v. RUCKER.

[1 Am. Law Rev. 217.]

WAR—TERMS OF CAPITULATION—MILITARY PAROL —TREASON.

[The agreement of capitulation between Generals Sherman and Johnston, in 1865, was the exercise of a belligerent, not a sovereign, right. As to persons included in its terms, it was a military parole, which terminated with the war, and such persons were consequently liable to arrest for treason after the war.]

In this case, General Rucker, who had been arrested for treason, moved to be discharged from arrest, on the ground that he was embraced in the agreement of capitulation between Sherman and Johnston, by which it was stipulated that he should not be molested by the authorities of the United States.

THE COURT held, that the granting of these terms of surrender was "the exercise of a belligerent right, sanctioned by the laws of war; and not that of sovereignty, as distinguished from belligerent. The sovereignty of the government did not reside in the president as the military chief of the nation, and he could not delegate to his subordinate officers in the field any right of sovereignty which did not properly pertain to him in his military character, under the constitution and laws of the United States;" that the agreement was a military parole, intended to terminate with the war; that the court would certainly not have permitted the prisoner to have been arrested on its process, during the war; but that the war was now ended.

THE COURT accordingly refused to discharge the prisoner, but admitted him to bail.

Case No. 16,204.

UNITED STATES v. RUGGLES.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 19, 1861.

LANDS UNDER NAVIGABLE WATERS — GRANTS BY STATE—INJUNCTION—RIGHTS OF UNITED STATES NAVY YARD.

1. Under the act of the legislature of New York, of April 10th, 1850 (Sess. Laws 1850, c. 283) authorizing the commissioners of the land office of the state to grant lands under the waters of navigable rivers or lakes, and providing that no such grant shall be made to any person other than the proprietor of the adjacent lands, the grant must be confined to a line starting at the intersection with the shore, and extending at a right angle with the thread of the stream, or at a right angle into the lake, without any regard to the course or direction of the line upon the land

2. A party who has obtained a grant in violation of the statute, as thus interpreted, will be restrained by injunction, at the suit of the proprietor of the land adjacent to the land under water so granted, from erecting docks on the land under water, so granted.

3. Where such adjacent land was owned by the government and used as a navy yard, an injunction was granted to restrain the erection of docks on other land under water properly granted to such party, until it should be shown that such erection would not seriously interfere with the rights of the government as proprietors of the navy yard, and it was referred to a master to inquire into the effect of such erection.

James I. Roosevelt, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Edwin W. Stoughton, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The bill in this case is filed to restrain the defendant [Henry Ruggles] from obstructing the free navigation of the East river, and thereby seriously interfering with ingress and egress to and from the navy yard at Brooklyn. The government purchased the site of the yard on the East river, and obtained from the state a cession of the jurisdiction some sixty years ago, and have since expended upon it millions of dollars, said to amount to five millions, in erections and improvements in fitting it for the uses and purposes for which the purchase was made. The defendant is the owner of a lot of land lying adjacent to and west of the yard, fronting also upon the river, and has procured from the commissioners of the land office of the state of New York, a deed of the land in front, covered with water, extending into the river between six and seven hundred feet. The boundary line of the parties is not at a right angle with the thread of the river, but strikes the shore in an oblique direction. The general course of the river at this place is nearly east and west, and the course of the boundary line, extended into the river, is north forty-two degrees and thirty minutes east, the effect of which is to carry the line thus extended into the water across a part of the water frontage of the navy yard, which, it is claimed, will, when the docks are erected, as contemplated by the defendant, interfere with the free ingress and egress of vessels, and otherwise seriously impair the use of the yard, and will also have the effect to alter the channel of the river, and of the waters of the Wallabout Bay, by deposits of silt and sand, and render access to the yard difficult and hazardous. The grant to the defendant by the commissioners was made under an act of the legislature of the state, passed April 10th, 1850 (Sess. Laws 1850, c. 283), which authorizes them to grant lands under the waters of navigable rivers or lakes, as they shall deem necessary to promote the commerce of the state, or proper for the beneficial enjoyment of the same by the adjacent owner, but provides that no such grant shall be made to any person other than the proprietor of the adjacent lands, and that any such grant that shall be made to any other person shall be void. In my judgment, the true construction of this statute is, that the grant of the water lots, authorized to be made to the adjacent proprietor of the land, must be confined to a line starting at the intersection with the shore, and extending at a right angle with the thread of the stream, or at a right angle into the lake, without any regard to the course or direction of the line upon the land. It is apparent that this is the only construction upon which the intent and purpose of the statute can be carried into effect. The case in hand illustrates the practical difficulty attending any other construction. The government, as well as the defendant, is an adjacent proprietor, within the meaning of the statute, and is entitled to the grant of water lots in front, or, at least, according to the express terms of the statute, no other party is entitled to such grant. And yet, the grant to the defendant, if allowed, has already appropriated a considerable portion of this very water frontage. I shall, therefore, restrain the defendant from erecting his dock upon any portion of the water lots granted, lying east of a line drawn from the intersection of his eastern line with the shore, in conformity with the interpretation given to the statute, as above explained. And, even with this modification, I shall not at present interfere with the provisional injunction, inasmuch as I am not sufficiently advised, from the proofs in the case, that, with the line drawn in conformity with the true meaning of the statute, as above given, and the docks to be erected confined to the remaining portion of the grant, the effect would not be to seriously interfere with the fair and full enjoyment of the rights and privileges belonging to the government, as proprietors of the navy yard. The large amount of money expended in its erections and improvements, as well as its great public importance and use, and the danger of imperilling them, lead to caution and hesitation upon a question involving all these considerations. A mistake might result in a public calamity. Before, therefore, I shall interfere with the provisional injunction heretofore granted, the case must go before a master pro hac vice, whom I shall appoint, to inquire into the effect of the docks to be erected, even with the modifications stated, upon the free ingress and egress of vessels to and from the navy yard.

UNITED STATES v. RUGGLES.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1828.

SHIPPING — AUTHORITY OF MASTER — "FORCING MARINER ON SHORE" IN FOREIGN PORT.

1. Under the 10th section of the act of 1825, c. 276 [3 Story's Laws, 2001; c. 65, 4 Stat. 117], the forcing a mariner on shore must be done, not only without justifiable cause, but also maliciously, to justify a conviction. If done under a mistaken sense of duty, it is not a case for conviction.

2. "Maliciously" in the statute means, with a wilful disregard of right and duty, or doing the act against a man's own conviction of duty.

3. A master of a ship has authority to confine his seamen in a common gaol, in a foreign port, for offences and misconduct, in extreme cases, and where the proper correction or punishment cannot be effectual on ship-board.

the act of 1825, c. 276 [3 Story's Laws, 2001; c. 65, 4 Stat. 117]. Plea, not-guilty.

The cause turned principally on matters of fact at the trial.

Mr. Greene, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Pratt & Searle, for defendant.

Upon the summing up to the jury, the following opinion was delivered as to the construction of the statute:

STORY, Circuit Justice. The words of the act of congress are, that "if any master, &c. shall, during his being abroad, maliciously and without any justifiable cause, force any officer or mariner of such ship, &c. on shore, &c. he shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, &c." To constitute the offence, both facts must concur. It is not sufficient, that there is no justifiable cause for the act; it must also be maliciously done. If therefore the jury should come to the conclusion, that there has been no justifiable cause, still they must be satisfied further, that the act has been maliciously done by the defendant. By "maliciously," in the intendment of the statute is not merely meant a wicked, malignant, and revengeful act, such as in cases of murder constitutes malice, and which flows from a heart regardless of social duty, and fatally bent on mischief. But if the act be wantonly done, that is, with a wilful disregard of right or duty, it is, in the sense of the statute, malicious. It must be a wilful act, done contrary to a man's own convictions of duty. If, therefore, the defendant did the act from good motives, and under a mistaken sense of duty, and not from a spirit of hatred, or with an intention to oppress, then he ought to be acquitted, notwithstanding the want of justifiable cause. But if he did the act contrary to his own sense of duty, as a mere exercise of power, without any sense of its being right, then it was "maliciously" done in the sense of the statute. See Harman v. Tappenden, 1 East, 555, 563, and note, and 564, 565, as to the meaning of "maliciously." See, also, 2 Starkie, Ev. tit. "Libel and Malice," pp. 862, 891, etc.; Robertson v. McDougall, 4 Bing. 670, 680; Looker v. Halcomb, Id. 183, 190. as to the meaning of "willfully and maliciously," in St. 1 Geo. IV. c. 56.

There is another point, on which the court is called to express an opinion. In the present case, the master not only forced the seamen on shore, but he caused them to be confined and imprisoned in the common gaol at St. Pierre's, under circumstances of such great exposure and severity, as cannot be justified. It is said, that the law does not clothe the master with any authority to imprison the seamen for disobedience or misconduct in a common gaol in a foreign port; and that the imprisonment, if necessary or proper, must be on board of the ship. I am aware, that it has been doubted by very able judges, whether the law does authorize such an imprisonment on shore in a foreign port. My opinion, however, upon the most mature deliberation, is, that it does authorize it; but I am also of opinion, that the authority arises, and can be exercised only in cases of flagrant offences, where there is a positive necessity of removal of the party offending from the ship to some place of safety on shore. The authority is of a very delicate and summary nature, and is justified only by the same necessities, which clothe private persons in other cases with extraordinary powers. Cases may easily be conceived, where the authority may be indispensable for the safety of the ship, cargo, and crew. Suppose a mutiny in port, with an intent to murder the officers, or to embezzle the cargo; and the conspiracy be so extensive, that the mutineers cannot be suffered to remain on board, but at the imminent hazard of the lives of the officers, and the property on board. The master must have (as I think) a right, under such circumstances, to remove them from the ship; and to imprison them, as well for punishment as safety, if he does not choose (as he may) to dismiss them altogether from the employment. But in such a case, the imprisonment must be with the intent to take them again on board the ship for the voyage, or to bring them home: and not with the intent merely to punish them, and at the same time to dissolve their connexion with the ship. The master can punish only to promote good discipline, and compel obedience to lawful orders on board of the ship. He is not clothed with judicial authority to sentence seamen to punishment for their offences. The law has conceded that authority to the regular tribunals of the country, acting in the common forms of justice, and upon a trial of the facts by a jury. While, therefore, I admit, that a master may, in extreme cases, imprison a seaman in a common gaol in a foreign port, (for no such authority is pretended to exist in a domestic port,) I think the authority is confined to extreme cases; and cannot be justified, when a more moderate punishment on ship-board would be effectual and safe. The notion, so commonly entertained, that a master may, at his pleasure, for slight offences imprison his seamen in a foreign gaol, is utterly unfounded in law. It is well known, that there is in warm climates great danger to the healths and lives of seamen in these miserable and loathsome places; and a power to imprison them there is often a power of life or death. It is high time, that masters should understand, that they are criminally liable for such wanton abuses of authority. And if a seaman should lose his life by confinement and exposure in such a gaol through the instrumentality of the master, without justifiable cause, the master is responsible, as in other cases of homicide. One of the strongest reasons against the exercise of the authority is, that the seamen are thus put utterly out of the control and supervision of the master. It is his duty to watch over them with parental attention, as long as they belong to the ship; and he has no right to delegate his authority or custody to gaolers and turnkeys in a foreign country.

Verdict, guilty.

[5 Int. Rev. Rec. 93.]

District Court, D. New Jersey. 1867.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—FRAUDULENT RETURNS—INDICTMENTS—EVIDENCE—PREVIOUS TRANSACTIONS.

[1. Where indictments are found, under the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 223), both for making false returns (under section 15) and for perjury (under section 42), the district attorney cannot proceed upon both indictments, but must elect between them.]

[2. On the trial of an indictment against a manufacturer for making false and fraudulent returns for a given month, it is competent to show, for the purpose of proving the fraudulent intent, that in previous months defendant made false returns.]

This was an indictment for disclosing and delivering to an assistant assessor a false and fraudulent return of manufactures, under section 15 of the act of June 30, 1864. The trial was begun on the 21st of February last, at Trenton, and terminated in the conviction of the defendant on the 8th of March, having continued more than two weeks. The case has exhibited almost all forms of opposition to the execution of the internal revenue laws, and therefore a brief statement of the various proceedings connected with it will be of interest. The defendant was a manufacturer of clothing in Salem, New Jersey, and carried on, in connection with it, an extensive dry goods business. Up to May, 1866, he had returned to the assessor manufactures amounting only to about $300 per month. It was believed that his actual sales were more than ten times that amount, and in May last, a revenue inspector, Mr. Wm. H. Van Nortwick, was sent to investigate his affairs. He examined the books and clerks, and became satisfied that great frauds had been committed. After examining the books and making abstracts for one day, he found that about 60 pages had been cut out during the night, with the evident design to conceal the amount of sales. The collector at once seized the store and books, and reported the case to the district attorney. Before information was filed, Rumsey obtained from the state court of chancery an injunction restraining the collector from withholding possession of the store and books, and, under cover of this process, he took possession of the store by duplicate keys, and carried off the books from the collector's office by strategem. He also sued the collector and inspector in an action of trespass, in the state court, laying his damages at $20,000 The United States district attorney, regarding the seizure as complete, and possession of the property involuntarily abandoned by the collector, filed an information, issued process, and directed the marshal to take possession of the property. He also immediately removed the suit in chancery, and the action at law into the United States circuit court. The marshal took possession of all the stock and materials of the clothing manufacture, and on application of Rumsey, appraisers were appointed, and a bond was given for the appraised value of the property, Rumsey still retaining the books. Shortly after the issuing of the injunction, Rumsey obtained from the chancellor an order for the collector to show cause why an attachment should not be issued to punish him for a breach of the injunction, which the collector had refused to obey. Testimony was taken ex parte under this order, and the motion for attachment was made after the removal of the cause. The district attorney insisted that the chancellor had no power to take any further proceeding, and Rumsey's counsel urged that the attachment for a breach before removal was not a further proceeding in the cause, but only a punishment of the individual for contempt committed while the case was in the power of the court. The argument was delayed and the motion was not afterwards pressed. Meanwhile the assessor had summoned Rumsey to appear and produce his books, but acting under the decision of Judge Smalley, his counsel caused the books to be torn in two, and produced only the fragments relating to the last month's business, denying the right of the assessor to examine into any transactions for which returns had been already made. The district attorney then applied to Judge Field for an attachment under section 14, to compel the production of the books. The attachment was issued, and on its return, after some delay, the judge made an order that the books should be produced. They were, however, not actually examined by the assessor, he having in the meantime made an assessment of $6,000 for taxes withheld. In June, 1866, the case was brought before the grand jury, before whom Rumsey's clerks and employees were summoned, and eight indictments were found; three for false returns under section 15, four for perjury under section 42, and one for forcibly obstructing the collector under section 38, of the act of June 30, 1864. Motions were then made to quash these indictments, and the argument was postponed to September term. At that term four additional indictments were found, and motions to quash were also made as to these. After elaborate argument these motions were overruled, and the indictments set down for trial at January term. It was held, however, by the judge, that the defendant must not be tried both for perjury and for false return, as to the same monthly return, and that the district attorney must elect as to which he would try. After various delays on the part of the defendant, the trial of the indictment for making a false and fraudulent return for September, 1864, was commenced on the 21st of February.

The case was tried for the government by A. Q. Keasbey, U. S. Dist. Atty., and E. Mercer Shreeve; and for the defendant by Messrs. Joseph P. Bradley, Abraham Browning, and A. H. Slape.

The defendant's counsel had been notified to produce the books, but they refused. Thereupon the abstracts made by the inspector from the day-book were admitted in evidence, showing sales on credit alone of more than three times the whole amount returned; and it was proved that much the greater portion of the sales were for cash. The clerks, cutters, and sewing women of the defendant were examined, and proved an amount manufactured, at least ten times the amount returned. The only important legal question that arose, was upon the admissibility of the returns made by the defendant for other months than September, on which the indictment was founded. They were offered, not to prove the fact of falsehood in the September return, but to show the fraudulent intent with which it was made. It was earnestly contended that it was not competent to go into proof of other crimes, and that to admit the other returns would be to put the defendant on his defence, for twenty different misdemeanors. But THE COURT held that they were clearly admissible to show the fraudulent character of the September return; that the several returns were parts of a connected series of transactions, forming the general business of the defendant, and therefore admissible on the settled rules of evidence laid down in the books and cases cited by counsel for the defendant; that such proof was competent in order to show that the return for September was not exceptional, but one of a series of frauds; and that so far from being foreign to the case, this proof was what both parties ought to want to produce, as being best calculated to elucidate the truth, and affording the defendant the best opportunity of vindicating himself if innocent of fraud.

When he came to his defence the defendant produced certain books which he insisted were all the books of his business. It was plain by inspection, and also by comparing them with the inspector's abstracts, that the books had been systematically altered by Rumsey, by adding after a charge of different garments sold, the words "cut and trimmed," in order to make it appear that these were not sales of manufactured articles; and in other instances the word "clothing" had been altered to "cloth," by erasing the last syllable. These alterations ran through all the books, and were made in hundreds of places, as shown by visible marks, or by comparing with the inspector's abstracts. A book which was reluctantly produced upon proof of its existence, near the close of the trial, revealed the entry of over 8,000 garments for about two years, and it was shown that another had existed, which he utterly refused to produce, covering the month in question, which at the same rate of production, would have shown over 13,000 garments for a period during which he had returned about 1,200. In fact, it was clearly shown that he had done a business of about $40,000 a year, while returning less than $4,000 for taxation. He was convicted, with a recommendation to the mercy of the court, it being understood that two of the jury refused to find the verdict without such recommendation, desiring to save him from imprisonment. After the verdict he pleaded non vult contendere, as to the other indictments for false return, and the district attorney entered nol pros on the indictments for perjury and obstructing collector.

THE COURT imposed a fine of $1,000 and costs on the indictment tried, and suspended sentence on the others, upon which he may be punished by imprisonment, or fines amounting to $17,000. It is probable that the severity of the sentences on these indictments will be governed by the action of the defendant as to the payment of his taxes withheld, and the amount of his bond for the property seized as subject to forfeiture.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS — CRIMINAL COMPLAINTS—AUTHORITY TO TAKE BAIL—RECOGNIZANCES—DEFAULT.

1. A commissioner, appointed to take affidavits, &c., under the acts of congress, has power to let to bail, one brought before him on a criminal complaint, pending the proceedings; in those states where justices of the peace have a similar power; and a recognizance to appear before him to have the proceedings completed is valid.

3. In New Hampshire, one under a recognizance to appear before an examining commissioner at his office at ten o'clock, a. m., is not in default for not appearing precisely at ten o'clock, nor before the expiration of that hour,—nor is he bound to appear elsewhere than at the commissioner's office.

4. The condition of a recognizance to appear before a commissioner can be shown to be broken, only by calling the cognizor at the time and place, when and where he was bound to answer, and making an entry of his default to appear on the minutes of the commissioner which he returns to the court.

Marston & Emery, in support of the demurrer.

Mr. George, U. S. Dist. Atty., contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an action of debt [against Harrison G. O. Rundlett] on a recognizance. The amended declaration, which is demurred to, shows that one Woodbury Gilman was complained of, before Horace Webster, one of the commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, and therein was charged with the crime of presenting to the commissioner of pensions certain false and fraudulent papers for the purpose of obtaining an allowance of a claim for a pension, and the payment of a sum of money from the United States in satisfaction of such claim. That the said Gilman was arrested and brought before the commissioner at his office in Portsmouth, on the 30th day of August, 1853, and such proceedings were thereupon had that Gilman was ordered by the commissioner to recognize in the sum of $2,500, with three sureties, in the sum of $833 33-100 each, to be and appear before the commissioner at his office in Portsmouth on the first day of September then next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, further to answer to the said complaint, and then and there wait and abide the order of the said commissioner; that the said Gilman and three sureties, of whom the defendant was one, did so recognize. That Gilman did not appear at the office of the commissioner on the first day of said September, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, according to the tenor of his recognizance; and the commissioner adjourned to the court house in Portsmouth, at the same hour, and then and there Gilman was three times solemnly called, and made default, and the sureties were also then and there three times solemnly called to bring in the body of their principal, but did not appear, or bring the principal, and so default was made in the condition of the recognizance, and the same was declared by the commissioner to be forfeited; all which will appear by the record, &c.

Several questions have been argued upon the demurrer. The first is, whether the commissioner had authority to take the recognizance of a defendant, with surety, to appear before himself. It is argued that the powers of a commissioner, in this particular, are the same as those of a justice of the peace; that at common law, a justice of the peace cannot order a prisoner to recognize to appear before himself; that though there is, by statute in New Hampshire, as in other states, authority conferred on justices of the peace to let to bail persons accused before them, while the complaint is pending, and no order has been made thereon, there is no act of congress which confers this power on commissioners. By the first section of the act of August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. 516), it is provided, that the commissioners shall exercise all the powers that any justice of the peace, or other magistrate of any of the United States may now exercise, in respect to offenders for any crime or offence against the United States, by arresting, imprisoning, or bailing the same, under and by virtue of the thirty-third section of the act of September 24, 1789 (5 Stat. 91). To that section we must look for the powers of the commissioners over this subject; and it provides that, for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any justice of the peace, or other magistrate of any of the United States where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state, be arrested and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States, &c.

My opinion is, that it was the intention of congress by these words, "agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state," to assimilate all the proceedings for holding accused persons to answer before a court of the United States, to the proceedings had for similar purposes by the laws of the state where the proceedings should take place; and, as a necessary consequence, that the commissioners have power to order a recognizance to be given to appear before them, in those states where justices of the peace, or other examining magistrates, acting under the laws of the state, have such power; as they have in New Hampshire, by the Revised Statutes (page 564, § 8). It is, perhaps, admissible, to consider the taking of a recognizance, to be strictly, and literally, within the meaning of the word "process." See Beers v. Houghton, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 329; U. S. v. Knight, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 301. But if not so, I consider the words "mode of process," as used in this law, to be synonymous with mode of proceeding, and to include power to let to bail. This must be so, because the law expressly says, the prisoner is not only to be arrested and imprisoned, but bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the state; and though this refers to his being bailed to appear and answer before the court, it shows that the words "mode of process" were not confined to the form of the warrant or mittimus, but were used in the larger sense above mentioned. See Duncan v. Darst, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 306, and cases there cited; and Gwin v. Breedlove, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 29. This objection must therefore be overruled.

The next objection is more formidable. It is that the condition of the recognizance required the principal to appear at the office of the commissioner at ten o'clock; that the legal effect of this was, that he had until eleven o'clock to appear; that he was not bound to appear at any other place; that the recognizance could not be forfeited, without calling him at the commissioner's office, and entering his default for non-appearance there; that the adjournment to the court house, at ten o'clock, did not impose on the accused a duty to follow the commissioner, and make his appearance there before eleven o'clock; and, consequently, when he failed to answer the call at the court house, he was not thereby in default, and so there was no forfeiture.

To maintain an action on a recognizance, the declaration must show a breach of its condition. And as the recognizance is required and taken by the commissioner pursuant to an authority conferred on him by law, and to satisfy certain legal requirements, the nature, extent, and limitations of the responsibility created thereby, are to be determined, not by a mere examination of the terms of the instrument, but also by reference to the rules of law which are applicable thereto. These rules apply themselves to the terms of the condition, and affect their meaning and operation. Beers v. Houghton, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 329; U. S. v. Knight, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 301. One of these rules of law requires the principal cognizor to be called, and his default entered; and the legal effect of the condition is such, that it is not broken by non-appearance, generally, to be proved by any evidence, but only by non-appearance in answer to a call, to be proved by an entry made on the minutes of the magistrate, and returned by him as part of the proceedings. This has been decided in New Hampshire, and elsewhere, upon reasons, which, to me, are satisfactory. State v. Chesley, 4 N. H. 366; Dillingham v. U. S. [Case No. 3,913]; State v. Grigsby, 3 Yerg. 280; White v. State, 5 Yerg. 183; Park v. State, 4 Ga. 329. It is clear also that the declaration must show a default to answer to a call, made at a time and place, when and where the cognizor was bound by law to answer. And the question here is, whether Gilman was bound by law to answer the call made at the court house. By the terms of the recognizance, he was to appear at the office of the commissioner, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon, and then and there further answer to the complaint, and wait and abide the order of the said commissioner. Any lawful order which the commissioner was empowered to pass in the course of proceedings upon this complaint, is within the very terms of the condition. If he had appeared, and the hearing had not been finished on that day, and the commissioner had adjourned the hearing to the next day, the defendant would undoubtedly have been bound by the recognizance to appear on the next day. The commissioner also had power to make an order to adjourn to a more convenient place, for the purpose of hearing the complaint. This power is incident to the power to hear and determine. It includes adjournments both of time and place. Where, as in some of the states, the power is regulated by statute, of course those statute limits must be observed. Where it has not been thus regulated, it must be a reasonable exercise of the power, in reference to the circumstances of the case, for the purpose of more conveniently, or speedily, or safely, discharging the duty of examining the complaint. Morrell v. Near, 1 Cow. 112; Caswell v. Ward, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 374.

In this case no objection is made to the mode of exercising this power, save that the order to adjourn was made in the absence of the defendant, and before he was bound to be present. That the order to adjourn was made in his absence, is averred by the amended declaration. That it was made at ten o'clock in the forenoon is also averred. I do not think he was bound to be present before, or precisely at ten o'clock. I have always understood it to be part of the common law of the New England states, and I believe it is so held in other states, that in proceedings before magistrates, which are notified to begin at a fixed hour, neither party is in default, until the expiration of that hour and the commencement of the next. This is a convenient rule, prevents surprise, and exacts as much promptness as is safe and reasonable. It seems quite clear from the case of Downer v. Hollister, 14 N. H. 122, that it is part of the law of this state.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion the commissioner had not lawful authority to make the order to adjourn, that the order was not binding on the defendant, so as to oblige him to answer at the court house, and consequently that his failure to answer there was not a breach of the condition of the recognizance,—and this for the following reasons: The general rule is, that in criminal proceedings, no action affecting any right of the accused should take place in his absence. In this particular case it might be of no importance to the defendant whether the adjournment took place in his absence or not. In many cases it might be of practical importance. I cannot consent to make a precedent, which might be used injuriously to the substantial rights of persons examined for offences by magistrates. When they have bound themselves to appear before a magistrate and answer to a complaint at a particular place, they must be allowed an opportunity to appear there, and offer such reasons as they may have, why they should not be compelled to answer elsewhere; and those reasons must be considered by the magistrate, before they are required to answer at another place. As has already been said, the power to adjourn is incident to the power to hear and determine. But if the defendant avoids, there is no hearing or determination. Until he appears, therefore, there is no power to hear and determine, and consequently, a power to adjourn, which is merely incidental to the power to hear, and which is to be exercised, if at all, only for the more convenient, safe, or speedy execution of the principal power, not only need not be exerted, but can hardly be said to exist. If the defendant had been in any default, for not being present at the time the order to adjourn was made, it might be urged, perhaps, that he was bound to take notice of the adjournment, and to follow the commissioner to the court house. Adjournments by courts of record thus bind persons who are under recognizance. But, as has already been declared, his appearance at any time before eleven o'clock, at the office of the commissioner, would satisfy the condition of the recognizance; and I can make no distinction between an order of the commissioner to adjourn at ten o'clock, before he appeared, and an order at nine o'clock, or any earlier hour. In neither case, was the defendant bound to be present, or in default for not being present; and I do not perceive upon what ground he could be required to take notice of and obey the order of adjournment, in one case, rather than in the other.

Several cases in the state of New York have been decided upon principles somewhat analogous to those above stated: Wiest v. Critsinger, 4 Johns. 117; Stewart v. Meigs, 12 Johns. 417; Morrell v. Near, 1 Cow. 112.

It was stated at the bar that Gilman, the defendant, actually absconded, and had no intention to appear, and did not, nor would, at any time or place, appear to answer the complaint; that this was well known to his sureties, and that it was of no practical importance to him or them whether the adjournment took place or not. This may be so; but the case must be decided upon fixed principles of law, applicable to all cases of such recognizances taken by magistrates, and whatever the intentions or acts of Gilman may have been, if there was no breach of the condition of the recognizance, no recovery can be had. Being of opinion that there was no breach, the judgment must be for the defendant.

UNITED STATES v. RUSSEL.

[4 Dall. 414, note.] [1]

Circuit Court, D Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1806.

MURDER ON HIGH SEAS—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES.

[One indicted for murder on the high seas is entitled, by the express provision of the statutes, to only 20 peremptory challenges.]

In the case of United States against Russel, on an indictment for murder on the high seas, tried at October term, 1806, the prisoner's counsel, at first, claimed the right of peremptorily challenging thirty-five jurors; but, that being an offence set forth in the penal law, was expressly embraced by the provision limiting the peremptory challenges to twenty; and the claim was, accordingly, overruled.

UNITED STATES v. RUTHERFORD.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.

COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES—RIOT—JOINT INDICTMENT.

1. If three persons be jointly indicted for a riot, and one only be put upon his trial, the other two having forfeited their recognizances, connot be examined as witnesses for the defendant.

2. The offender who has committed an infamous offence, is restored to his competency as a witness, by a pardon.

The defendant [William Rutherford] and two others were indicted for a riot, and also for a simple assault and battery, in separate counts of the same indictment.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, offered to examine as witnesses, the two who had forfeited their recognizances.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused.

Mr. Jones then offered to examine as a witness, for the defendant, one Golding, who had been convicted under the post-office law of 30 April, 1810 [2 Stat. 592], of embezzling letters and stealing bank-notes there from, but was pardoned by the president.

THE COURT (nem. con.) permitted him to be sworn.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW—AIDING IN ESCAPE.

[1. On a prosecution for aiding in the escape of one arrested under lawful process as being a fugitive slave, it is not necessary to show that he actually was the slave of the person at whose instance the process was issued.]

[3] [Published from a scrap book in the clerk's office at Philadelphia. Date not given.]

[2. The fact that the members of a vigilance committee formed to prevent the execution of the fugitive slave law stated that their object was to prevent the "kidnapping" of the fugitive by the officers of justice and the alleged owner, furnished strong evidence of their responsibility for a subsequent riot and rescue of the fugitive from the jail in which he was confined, even though they individually counseled peaceable measures.]

This was an indictment against John Rycraft for aiding, assisting, and abetting in the escape of Joshua Glover, a fugitive slave.

MILLER, District Judge (charging jury). At the commencement of this trial, I remarked, that verbal application had been made, on behalf of a reporter for a daily paper, for leave to report the evidence in this case. After the case is concluded, I have no objections that a correct report be made. I have never consented in any case, that a report be published during the pendency of a trial. The jurors have access to the papers, and feeling an interest in the proceedings, may there read what may not be correct. Jurors should find a verdict upon the evidence as it passed to them from the witnesses, without having their minds disturbed by reading the reports of irresponsible and perhaps inaccurate reporters. In criminal cases, so far as my observation has extended, I am inclined to think, injustice has been done in several instances, by the daily publication of evidence, during the trial. And in case of non-agreement of the jury, a just second trial is rendered uncertain by such publications. For these reasons I respectfully request the editors, to postpone any publication of the evidence, until the cause is finally determined. I do not make a positive command, but a respectful request, which in every instance heretofore has been complied with. This request I believe has been complied with, and you are left to decide this case upon the evidence, as you understood it, from the witnesses.

I also, at an early hour of this trial, cautioned you against outdoor influences, feeling it my duty to protect the purity of the jury-box. In all cases likely to be attended with excitement, I have pursued this course, and gave the jurors to understand that an attempt to influence their decisions, out of court, is indictable, and that it is their duty to make the information. The law throws around a juror, sworn to try an issue according to evidence, a circle, into which no man can corruptly enter with impunity. One object of the provision, in the federal constitution, of a judiciary, was that a tribunal may exist in each state, wherein all persons may appear as suitors, unembarrassed by local prejudices, influences, or interests. This is a court of the nation, open to all persons of every state or country. Residents of our sister states of this Union appear here under the constitutional provision, as American citizens, on an equality with those of Wisconsin; and inhabitants of, or emigrants from foreign states, as suitors, have equal consideration with our own citizens. This being a national court, you are a national jury, equally removed, with the judge, from all local influences. A gentleman occupying the seat of a juror in this court, will feel it a duty, in promoting this object of the constitution, to discard from his mind all local prejudices, or feelings in regard to policy, circumstances, or individuals.

The subject of slavery in the several states of the Union, has been attended with difficulties, both before and since the adoption of the federal constitution. Through the cupidity and avarice of England, slavery was introduced into the American colonies; and it existed in them without regard to their locality, North or South, until the people in the North found by experience that it was unprofitable. At the adoption of the constitution, it existed in all the states; but laws had then been generally enacted in the Northern states for its gradual abolition At the adoption of the constitution of the United States, slavery had been so engrafted into the several states, that a constitutional provision for the surrender of fugitives from labor, became essential to the adoption of that instrument. The constitutional provision upon the subject is this: "No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." What I shall say to you upon this occasion has nothing new or original with me. I shall content myself by following decisions of the supreme court of the United States, and the opinion of the supreme judges, Story and Curtis, of Massachusetts, Baldwin of Pennsylvania, and Nelson of New York.

The mode of delivering up fugitives from justice and labor, is not prescribed in the constitution, nor by any law, until the act of congress, respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters, of February 12, 1793 [1 Stat. 302], four years after the adoption of the constitution. This act being found defective and inoperative, the amendment of Sept. 18, 1850 [9 Stat. 462], was passed. In respect to this amended act: In a charge of the circuit court of the United States, in the state of New York; to a grand jury, Mr. Justice Nelson, of the supreme court of the United States, remarks: "It will, I think, excite some surprise, after the determined opposition to the passage of the supplementary act, and even threatened, and in some instances, actual resistance to its execution in certain quarters, when it is seen that there is not a power conferred upon those appointed to administer it judicially, but what was conferred upon the judges and other state magistrates under the act of 1793 —a law approved by Washington and Adams, and enacted by the fathers and founders of the republic—not one. It is simply, in this respect, a substitution of the commissioners for the state magistrates, who were disabled and prevented from discharging their duties by the state authorities. Full confidence was reposed in them by the general government, so long as they were permitted to act. When thus disabled, other officers were selected, of necessity, to supply their places. This is the only difference, as it regards the judicial authority conferred by the act. Neither is there any power conferred by it, on the claimant, his attorney, or agent, but what is found in the act of 1793—not one. All the additional powers are conferred upon the ministerial officers; the marshal and deputy marshal, who are required to execute the warrants and other process issued in pursuance of its provisions, and which warrants and process are the same as those provided for in the previous act, and none others. Every ground of opposition to this recent act, distinguishable from opposition to the former, is exclusively referable to the powers with which the marshal and his deputies are armed, with a view to its execution." The supreme courts of the several states in the North have sustained this law. And the supreme court of the United States in repeated decisions have sustained it, and we, both judge and jury, are bound by these decisions.

It is said, that this law is unjust, as it allows a master to arrest his fugitive slave, and to bring him before a judge or commissioner for examination. The right of a master to arrest his fugitive slave, is not a solitary one in the laws of this country. A master may pursue and apprehend his fugitive apprentice, whose service and labor he is entitled to demand by virtue of the deed of indenture. A father may compel his errant minor child to return to parental protection, and to submit to parental authority. A surety may pursue and carry back his absconding principal, and commit him to prison in discharge of his recognizance. All these things are done daily without producing excitement, and not one of these persons, except apprentices, can claim, by virtue of any statute provision, an open, fair and public examination upon disinterested testimony before their removal is effected, as in the case of fugitive slaves.—The fugitive from justice may be arrested upon a warrant founded upon an affidavit of the injured or interested party, and removed without a preliminary hearing; and it frequently results upon trial that the charge is unfounded. While the law under consideration is effective in carrying out the provisions of the constitution, it is equally so in protecting free colored persons from secret or criminal deportation.

The marshal is held to the United States for the use of all persons interested, with sureties, in a bond of a heavy penalty for the faithful discharge of his official duties. He is liable in this bond for all acts of his deputies. He is required to execute every process committed to his hands, either by himself or a deputy. This process was handed to Deputy Marshal Cotton, but was directed in the usual way to the marshal. If Glover owed service to Garland in the state of Missouri, and escaped from there, and was apprehended by Cotton upon this process, and was rescued by the crowd that surrounded the jail, the marshal and his sureties are liable to Garland for the full value of the fugitive, in the state of Missouri. The marshal had the alternative, either to receive the warrant, or pay Garland one thousand dollars penalty; and now since the fugitive has escaped, he has no way known to the law, to avoid paying his full value. Such is the law in all cases. The marshal is bound under a penalty to receive all process issued to him, and to endeavor to serve them. If he arrests a man upon a capias, and a rescue is effected, he must pay the plaintiff his damages. If he makes an arrest upon a ca. sa., he is liable to the plaintiff for the full debt, in case of a rescue. If he levies upon personal property under a fi. fa., he is liable to the plaintiff for the value thereof, or for the debt, if it should be taken from his custody even by superior force.

For these reasons. and also to maintain the majesty of the laws, it is the duty of all good, law-abiding citizens to aid this officer, upon all proper occasions, in the service of process. And if the court and jury should refuse him legal redress for the resistance of process, his duty to himself and his sureties will compel him to resort to forcible means; which (in Russell on Crimes, page 666,) may be used even to the taking of life: "Amongst the acts done, by the permission of the law, for the advancement of public justice, may be reckoned those of the officer, who, in the execution of his office, either in a civil or criminal case, kills a person who assaults and resists him. The resistance will justify the officer in proceeding to the last extremity. So that in all cases, whether civil or criminal, where persons having authority to arrest or imprison, and using the proper means for that purpose, are resisted in so doing, they may repel force with force, and need not give back; and if the party making resistance is unavoidably killed in the struggle, this homicide is justifiable. A rule founded in reason and public utility, for few men would quietly submit to an arrest, if in any case of resistance the party empowered to arrest were obliged to desist and leave the business undone." I was pleased to see that the legislature of this state, at its last session, passed a law for the punishment of resistance to state process, similar to the act of congress; and it is no doubt the anxious desire and prayer of every good citizen that these laws may be faithfully administered; and the dreadful alternative of force be avoided. The officers, by whose agency the government of the United States administers the domestic affairs of the country, have a just claim upon the government for protection from assaults or interruption, in the discharge of their several duties and the judiciary, which is a component part of the government, is bound to render them that protection. Attacks upon officers of government, so as to render its laws and authority ineffective, is the first step towards insurrection, and their defence is the protection of the stability and integrity of the government. In all this matter, we have not arrayed ourselves against our fellow-citizens. Having done just what the law required of us, we have a right to expect that confidence and protection which are due to us as citizens. and that respect due a judicial tribunal. In this free country, liberty of action is allowed, while not in opposition to the force or authority of government, and not prejudicial to the peace or happiness of society, or the rights of individuals; but in the discharge of official duties, officers must pursue the course marked out by the law, without regard to personal consequences or considerations.

This court and jury have nothing to do with the opinions of men, disconnected with the case; nor have we anything to do with the opinions of the defendant. We are not here to be controlled by the opinions of men upon any subject. It is not our business to inquire into the opinions of this defendant, or of any man in this community, upon the subject of slavery, or any other subject; nor to compare our opinions with theirs; nor to gratify our own opinions; but to administer the laws of the land with fidelity. The defendant is not upon trial for his opinions, but for his acts. He may believe that a particular law should not be administered, and that the process issued in pursuance of it should be resisted; but if his opinions, ceasing to be speculative, have ended in acts; no morbid sympathy, no false respect for pretended "rights of conscience," or "superior law," can prevent this court and jury from judging him justly, without fear or favor. The constitution and laws of the United States are the supreme laws of the land; and no "higher law" in opposition thereto, can be recognized in a court of justice. If a man willfully violates the laws of his country by the commission of an offence known to those laws, he comes with a poor grace before a jury of honest men, sworn to render a true verdict according to evidence, with the plea of "higher law" or "rights of conscience." In this respect the case is not different from any other known to the catalogue of crimes.

The proposition. that the law, under which this indictment is framed, is distasteful in this community. and should not be enforced, cannot be tolerated in a court of justice. Courts do not make the laws; but to administer them in their purity, is their limited and responsible duty. All constitutional laws are the expression of the sovereign will of the people through their representatives. Every man is represented at the enactment of all laws of congress; and even if any laws there enacted are not according to our peculiar opinions or interests, we are bound, as good citizens to obey them, and as judge and jurors to administer them, while they remain upon the statute book. Upon no other principal can this government exist as a government of written constitutions and laws. If an appeal to courts and juries to disregard acts of congress, because they may be distasteful or unpopular, or because their representative was in the minority, or for any other reason, were allowed, every public act would be annulled in portions of the United States. The law-making power, vested in congress by the constitution, would soon became nugatory, through the imbecility or corruption of courts and juries. To ask the judge to withhold the prescribed sentence, or the jury to find a verdict in disregard of the evidence, because they or the community looked upon a law with disfavor, is asking a commission of moral perjury. Such a corrupt principle can not be advanced without a rebuke commensurate to its enormity.

This court administers laws, that I might not vote for as a representative; and decides causes, in pursuance of decisions of the supreme court of the United States, which individually I might not approve. The organization of our government, and of our judicial system requires this surrender of private opinion, on the part of the judge. Equally so is the duty imperative upon the juror. The jury are called to try the issue of fact submitted by the parties. This they are sworn to try according to evidence. Under the judicial system of the United States, they take the law from the court in all cases both civil and criminal, whether it comports with their individual opinions or not. U. S. v. Battiste [Case No. 14,545]: U. S. v. Morris [Id. 15,815]. The court pronounces the law upon its responsibility; and the jurors find the facts upon their responsibility; and both for judge and jury the law and evidence alone form the rule of action, to which men of sound heads and honest hearts will conscientiously adhere, while judicial tribunals are esteemed courts of justice. The act of congress uses the words, as nearly as may be to those in the constitution in the description of the person. It makes all persons indictable, who may aid, abet or assist the person apprehended, to escape from the claimant, or from the person assisting the claimant, either with or without process. This warrant was issued at the instance of Garland, the claimant, whereby he procured the assistance of the marshal, or a deputy. The marshal's deputy, Cotton, in this instance, was a person assisting Garland the claimant, with a process. The terms "fugitive," "person owing service or labor," are descriptive of the person apprehended, as the words "slave" or "apprentice," would be if used.

The first count charges that the defendant did aid, abet, and assist Joshua Glover, a person owing service and labor to Benami S. Garland in the state of Missouri, from where he fled, to escape. The plea I think puts this whole charge in issue; and as there is no evidence in support of it, what I shall address to you will relate to the second and third counts of the indictment. These counts set forth the warrant, and the arrest by Cotton, the deputy marshal, of the person described in the warrant, and that the defendant did aid, abet and assist in the escape. According to the decision of the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, in the case of U. S. v. Reed [Id. 16,134], and the intimation of the circuit court for the Massachusetts district in U. S. v. Morris [supra], these two counts do not involve the question of the slavery of Glover. The only questions raised by these two counts, are these. Was the warrant issued and served as therein stated, and did the defendant aid, abet or assist in the escape? Glover escaped before the hearing required by the law. Whether he was a slave or not, and had fled from Missouri, had not been determined by the proper officer; nor is it to be upon this issue. If Garland should prosecute the marshal, or the rescuers, for the value of Glover, he would then be bound to prove satisfactorily, by disinterested testimony, in the way prescribed by our rules of practice, that Glover owed him service according to the laws of Missouri, and that he escaped from such state. This is a prosecution for the public offence of resisting a lawful process. "An escape is a violent or privy evasion out of some lawful restraint; as where a man is arrested or imprisoned and gets away before he was delivered by due course of law." The judge has lawful authority to issue this process; and the process is strictly according to law. It was lawfully served by the deputy marshal; Glover was thereby in the custody of the law, from which he escaped before he was delivered. He was in custody, the same as if he had been arrested upon a capias, or any other warrant. Garland might have arrested Glover under the law without process, and brought him before the judge for examination, but he procured this warrant, which the marshal was bound to receive and serve. Glover was lodged in jail by the deputy marshal, and was there placed by him under keepers. From the moment of his arrest by Cotton until he escaped, he was in the possession of Cotton as deputy marshal. He was lodged in jail for safe keeping. The marshal may, before a trial or hearing, lodge a man arrested in jail, or in his own house, or any place else, but he is legally held for the return of his prisoner with his process. It would be absurd to advance any other idea as to the officer's liability, than that he is bound to serve process placed in his hands, to make an arrest and to bring the prisoner arrested before the authority issuing the process. And it is equally absurd to hold that the marshal should not be protected in the execution of his process. The officer must be protected, if the law of the land is to prevail; and any person concerned in the endeavor to obstruct his process, or take the person arrested out of his custody or hands becomes a public offender, and liable to the punishment the law annexes to the offence. The escape in this case is just as complete as if it had been effected from the hands of the marshal; and those who aided in it are equally as guilty as if they had rescued Glover from the manual possession of the marshal.

The indictment charges that the defendant did aid, abet and assist Glover to escape from the custody of the deputy marshal. If the defendant did either aid, or assist, or abet in this escape, he is guilty. The words "to aid," "to assist," mean the same thing; that is, to help another in the commission of some act; to abet, is not only to render help, but to encourage or promote the commission of an act. The mere presence of the defendant when the act was committed, without participation on his part, does not make him accountable. Exciting, directing, consenting to, or encouraging the escape complained of, is abetting it; and if the defendant did either of these acts, he is guilty, whether he applied the axe or battering-ram or not. If the defendant took part in this matter, by inciting, or directing it, or consenting to it, or encouraging it, with others, it is not necessary to prove the particular act of each. Each one is liable for the acts of the others. The law fastens the consequence of any illegal act upon him, which he may have in any manner, as before mentioned, done, brought about, or caused.

It is proven by witnesses on the part of the prosecution, that the defendant was present at the jail, working and assisting to break the door of the jail-yard and the door of the jail. It is also proven by witnesses on his part, that they did not see him commit these overt acts. In such a case the affirmative testimony must prevail. Those who did not see defendant commit these acts, do not contradict those who did see him. Those witnesses who saw the defendant at the tree no doubt speak truly, and still may possibly not contradict those of the prosecution. In such a crowd, excited as that appears to have been, they may possibly be mistaken as to the exact moment of time. It is the duty of the jury to reconcile evidence of witnesses without imputing perjury or false swearing to any, if possible. If witnesses contradict each other, and they are equally credible, the jury should give the affirmative testimony the preference. If a witness was connected with the defendant, his testimony is not entitled to the same weight as that of a disinterested witness. The jury will judge of the evidence for themselves.

These are all the rules of evidence that I now deem necessary for your instruction in regard to the testimony of the witnesses generally. But there is one item of evidence which my duty requires me to notice. Herbert Reed was called by the defendant, and, among other things, he testified that a committee of vigilance was organized on that morning, of which he and the defendant were members. He stated, in substance, some of the acts of that committee; and that one of its objects was, that the kidnappers should not take Glover out of town before a trial; that the kidnappers were Cotton, the owner, and any others who took part. He said that he heard said that Glover should not be taken away. He also said that the defendant suggested to call upon the judge, and assure him, if he would then order the prisoner up for hearing, that he would not be allowed to escape. That the defendant was for peaceable measures. He further stated that the committee did not offer to assist the marshal. Another witness—Stratton, I think—stated that he went to the back door of the jail, as he heard in the crowd that the kidnappers were taking Glover out there. Now, if this testimony is so as stated, it presents one of the worst features in the case. The crime of kidnapping, or feloniously carrying off a free person into slavery, is one of the most heinous in the law; and the epithet of kidnapper is one of the most odious that can be applied to an individual. If this committee organized, in whole or in part, to control the action or the time of the action of the judge, or for treating the officers of the law and of the court as kidnappers, they are responsible for this rebellion. This was the best means that could be adopted to influence the minds of the people, and to cause this riot and escape. The appellation of kidnappers applied to those men, under the circumstances, was to bring that jail down.

If I had ordered the marshal to bring up Glover for hearing, at that time, it certainly could not have been done. Under the cry of kidnapper the rescue would have been effected by that excited crowd, and the personal safety of the officer periled. An offer to the judge of protection would be of little avail, after a mob was got up by the cry of rescue, and inflamed by that of kidnapper. If, as from the defendant's evidence, he was associated with that committee which was engaged in impeding or obstructing the process, he must take the consequences. They are all indictable. This committee was probably the primary cause of that outrage, and if so, each member of it is responsible for the escape, whether he suggested peaceable means or not. The law is "that, if a man does an unlawful act, that is likely to cause an injury, and an injury is actually caused, it is immaterial by what intermediate hand it is inflicted; the first wrongdoer is as directly answerable as the immediate trespasser—as where a man threw a lighted squib into a crowd, it was thrown by one and another, till it struck a person, and put out his eye, the man who first threw the squib was made answerable." The organization and conduct of that committee were more dangerous than the squib, because more likely to be attended with fatal consequences, as no cry or epithet would be more exciting in the most orderly community, than that of rescue and kidnapper. The officers of the law are responsible to the law for their acts, and no committee, or set of men can organize to control their acts, or interfere with the service of process, without incurring the responsibilities of the law. This warrant was in the hands of the officer, and no man can throw obstacles in the way of the officer in making full service by apprehending and delivering the person therein named to the authority who issued it.

Verdict, "Guilty."

Case No. 16,212.

UNITED STATES v. SA-COO-DA-COT et al.

[1 Abb. U. S. 377;[1] 1 Dill. 271; 3 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 113.]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. May Term, 1870.

INDIANS — CRIMINAL JURISDICTION OF NATIONAL COURTS.

1. Indians, though belonging to a tribe which maintains the tribal organization, but occupying a reservation within the limits of a state, if there is no valid statute of congress or treaty to the contrary, are amenable to state laws for murder or other offenses against such laws committed by them off the reservation and within the limits of the state.

[Cited in State v. Doxtater, 47 Wis. 281, 2 N. W. 439.]

2. Query—whether the United States courts have jurisdiction, under such circumstances, of offenses committed by Indians upon the reservation?

3. The court in a capital case against Indians, though neither party asked it, and both demanded judgment, arrested judgment, on its own motion, for want of jurisdiction over the offense charged in the indictment; but, instead of at once ordering the discharge of the Indians, the court made a special order for turning them over to the state authorities.

4. The relations which Indians, residing within state limits, sustain to the state and the United States, and their respective laws, discussed, by Dillon, Circuit Judge.

[The defendants, four in number, and Indians, have been indicted in this court, charged with and convicted of the murder of one Edward McMurty, a white inhabitant of the state of Nebraska. They were tried before Mr. District Judge Dundy, sitting alone in this court, upon their plea of "Not guilty." Prior to the verdict, neither by demurrer, motion, plea, or otherwise, did the defendants make any objection to the jurisdiction of the court. After a verdict of guilty they made a motion for a new trial, and another in arrest of judgment. By the latter motion the question as to the jurisdiction of the court was for the first time presented. These motions were argued and submitted at the last regular term of the court, but before any decision thereof was made, the defendants asked, and the court granted leave, to withdraw them. This was at the adjourned February term, 1870. Whereupon the district attorney, in behalf of the United States, moved for judgment upon the verdict. This motion is not resisted by the defendants, or the counsel who represents them.] [2]

Mr. Strickland, Dist. Atty., and Mr. Baldwin, for the motion.

Mr. Chase, for defendants.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The present attitude of this case is not a little singular. The one party asks, and the other party, acting under the advice of skillful counsel, does not resist a judgment which is the highest human laws or a human tribunal can inflict. It is the court alone which hesitates and deliberates.

In explanation of the course which the counsel for the defendants have taken in withdrawing all questions as to the jurisdiction of the court, a reason has been given, which, for the honor of the people of the state, it is hoped can have no real foundation, viz.: that such is the strength of the tide of local feeling and prejudice against them and their Nation, that they prefer to take a sentence of death and trust to executive interposition, than to run the risk of illegal violence, if discharged from this court, or turned over to the authorities of the state. The court gladly avails itself of this occasion to express its conviction that fears of this character are groundless.

As the defendants have been duly indicted and convicted, it is the duty of the court to pass judgment against them, if it has jurisdiction of the crime charged in the indictment. Whether it has jurisdiction is the only question remaining to be decided. Notwithstanding the withdrawal of the motion in arrest, it is still the duty of the court, before pronouncing the sentence of death, to be satisfied that it has cognizance of the offense which it is proceeding to punish. No act that a court can be called on to perform is more grave and solemn than to render a capital judgment. To the performance of such a duty, a judge is only reconciled by the consideration that it is not he who does it, but the law, of which he is simply the minister. But if the law invests him in the particular case with no such power, he may well deliberate, and must refuse to exercise it. If the court has no jurisdiction, therefore, it is its duty, on its own motion, to stay judgment, although this question may not be made, or may be waived by counsel.

With these preliminary considerations, which seemed proper to be stated, we proceed to examine the question whether the courts of the United States have jurisdiction of the offense for which the defendants have been convicted.

The only allegations in the indictment made with a view to show the jurisdiction of the court are the following: "That the defendants are Indians belonging to the Pawnee tribe, which tribe are, and were, in charge of a United States Indian agent duly appointed by the United States, and were, and are, living upon an Indian reservation, known as the 'Pawnee Reservation,' within the state of Nebraska; that said defendants crossed the boundary line of said Indian reservation and entered into the county of Polk, in the state of Nebraska aforesaid, and then and there unlawfully," &c., did kill and murder by shooting, as particularly described in the indictment, one Edward McMurty, a white inhabitant of the said state. Thus, it appears from the express averments of the indictment, that the place where the offense was committed was within the body of the county of Polk, in the state of Nebraska, and not within the limits of the Indian reservation. The proof, in this respect, corresponds with the allegations. The offense is alleged, and was shown to have been committed on May 8, 1869, which was after Nebraska had been admitted into the Union, and her organization as a state was fully perfected and in operation. The question is, whether the offense thus committed is one of which the courts of the United States have cognizance, or whether it is alone cognizable by the courts of the state of Nebraska. Within the territorial limits of the state just named is a body of people known as the Pawnee tribe of Indians, to which the defendants belong. This region has for many years been their home; but their occupancy is now restricted to a "reservation" of limited extent. Here they reside in a body, maintaining their tribal organization, under the superintendency of agents appointed by the government of the United States. They are already in the midst of a white population, but do not enjoy any of the political, nor many of the civil rights of the latter. They do not vote, are not taxed, and under the decision of the supreme court of the United States their property is not taxable by the state authorities. The ordinary state laws relating to taxation, schools, marriage, divorce, administration of estates, and the like, are not extended to, observed by, or enforced among them. As respects all their internal concerns, they are governed and regulated by the laws and customs of the tribe.

The inquiry is neither uninteresting nor unimportant, as to which, whether the general government or the state, has legislative control over this people; and if both, whether the power is concurrent, and if not, where is the boundary line, marking where the control of the one ends, and where that of the other begins. This inquiry it is our duty to answer, so far as the record in this case requires it. It is necessary to examine into the acts of congress, relating to offenses committed by Indians, into the treaty stipulations of the United States with the Pawnees, and into the acts of congress respecting the powers and jurisdictions of the state of Nebraska. Nebraska was organized into a territory by the act of May 30, 1854 [10 Stat. 277], and by that act (sections 4, 37) the rights of Indians therein are preserved unimpaired, and the authority of the United States to make regulations respecting them, their property and other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, retained. The Pawnee tribe then, as now, resided within the limits of the territory thus created. On September 24, 1857, the Pawnees ceded by treaty of that date their lands in the territory of Nebraska to the United States, reserving, however, "out of this cession a tract of country thirty miles long from east to west, and fifteen miles wide from north to south." 11 Stat. 729. This is the reservation described in this indictment. The treaty provides that United States agents may reside on the reservation; that the government may build forts thereon; that the whites may open roads through it, but shall not reside thereon; that the Indians shall not alienate the lands, except to the United States; that all the offenders against the laws of the United States shall be delivered up, &c.; but it contains no stipulation as to the jurisdiction over it, or over the Indians residing thereon, when the territory shall be admitted as a state. On April 19, 1864 [13 Stat. 47], congress passed an act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a state constitution; in 1866 a state constitution was formed, and in 1867 [14 Stat. 391] congress passed an act for the admission of Nebraska, under its constitution, into the Union, "upon an equal footing with the original states, in all respects whatsoever."

There is no exception in the state constitution, or in either of these acts of congress, of the Pawnee reservation or the Pawnee Indians, from the territorial or civil jurisdiction of the state. So that we have before us the case of Indians maintaining the tribal organization, which is recognized in the treaty by the general government, but living upon a reservation which is now within the limits of the state, and respecting which, or the Indians occupying it, there are no special provisions granting or retaining jurisdiction in favor of the United States, or withdrawing the Indians from the jurisdiction of the state.

It will be observed that the present indictment is not for an offense committed by Indians against an inhabitant of the state upon the reservation, and hence we have no occasion to inquire whether for such offenses the courts of the United States or those of the state of Nebraska have jurisdiction; nor whether it would be competent for congress in such a case (the absence of any cession of jurisdiction by the state) to invest the national courts with cognizance thereof. See, on this point, U. S. v. Bailey [Case No. 14,495], and the case therein referred to against two Indians for the murder of Davis in the Cherokee country, within the limits of a state; U. S. v. Cisna [Id. 14,795]; U. S. v. Ward [Id. 16,639], opinion of Mr. Justice Miller; U. S. v. Stahl [Id. 16,373], opinion of Miller, J.; U. S. v. Rogers, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 567; U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 407. Compare Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 737, and remarks of Davis, J., arguendo, page 755; New York Indians, Id. 761; Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 616; New York v. Dibble, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 366. As to state authority over Indians, see, also, Goodell v. Jackson, 20 Johns. 693, and constitutional provisions and act of April 12, 1822 (2 Rev. St. 881), there cited; Murray v. Wooden, 17 Wend. 531; Swan's St. Ohio 304; Rev. St. Mass. 148; Clay v. State, 4 Kan. 49; People v. Antonio, 27 Cal. 404; Hicks v. Ewhartonah, 21 Ark. 106; Id. 485; Peters' Case, 2 Johns. Cas. 344; [McCracken v. Todd, 1 Kan. 148].[3]

It will appear from these authorities and citations that New York, Ohio and other states have, at different times passed acts declaring that the civil and criminal jurisdiction of these states extended to Indians and to Indian reservations; and that such legislation has been considered valid when not in conflict with some treaty or constitutional act of congress. The locality or place where the homicide now in question is alleged to have been committed, is confessedly within the territorial limits of the state, and the deceased was an inhabitant of, or found within the state. It is settled that there are no common law offenses cognizable by the courts of the United States; that before these courts can take cognizance of an offense, it must be declared such by an act of congress; and that it is not competent for congress to enact a criminal code punishing offenses generally, but those only which relate to the general government, or which are committed by or upon citizens or inhabitants of the United States, upon the high seas, or within the national domain beyond the limits of any state, or in places over which congress has exclusive jurisdiction. The offense charged in the indictment is murder; and we now inquire whether there is any act of congress which confers, or undertakes to confer jurisdiction upon the national courts of a homicide committed under the circumstances of the one under consideration?

There are two statutes relating to murder, cognizable by the United States courts,—the statute of 1790 [1 Stat. 112] and that of 1825 [4 Stat. 115]. The former act provides that if any person shall "within any fort, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or in any other place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States," commit the crime of willful murder, &c., he shall be punished, &c. The latter act declares

"that if any person upon the high seas or any river, &c., within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state," shall commit willful murder, &c., he shall suffer death. It is scarcely necessary to remark that the case at bar falls within none of the provisions of either of these statutes. These do not undertake to punish murder generally, but only when committed on water out of the jurisdiction of any state, or upon land when committed at a place within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If other provisions do not exist, it is evident that the court had no cognizance of the case made in the indictment.

We have been referred to the intercourse act of 1802 (2 Stat. 137, 143, §§ 14, 15), by which congress defined the "Indian country," and provided for the punishment by the United States courts of Indians who left the Indian country, and committed offenses in any state or territory. It must have escaped the attention of counsel, that this act, so far as it relates to Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, was repealed as long ago as June 30, 1834. 4 Stat. 729, § 29. As it will not be maintained that a prosecution can be supported under a repealed statute, we need give it no further attention.

The jurisdiction of the court is also sought to be sustained under the act of June 30, 1834, just cited. By section 1 of that statute it is enacted "that all that part of the United States west of the Mississippi, and not within the states of Missouri and Louisiana, or the territory of Arkansas, shall be taken and deemed to be the Indian country." By a subsequent section, this Indian country is annexed, part to the judicial district of Arkansas, and the rest to the judicial district of Missouri. Section 25 is in these words: "So much of the laws of the United States as provide for the punishment of crimes committed within any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States shall be in force in the Indian country: provided, that the same shall not extend to crimes committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian." At the time this statute was enacted it applied to the locality where the offense in question was committed; but it ceased to be operative within the limits of Nebraska the moment when the latter was admitted into the Union as a state, upon an equal footing with the original states. This is the precise point decided by Mr. Justice Miller in United States v. Ward, supra, and it is quite unnecessary to enlarge upon it, or repeat the reasons by which the conclusion is supported. That was an indictment of a white man for the murder of a white man, committed on an Indian reservation, within the state of Kansas, and it was held that the national courts had no jurisdiction, and the opinion expressed that the state courts had.

In U. S. v. Bailey [Case No. 14,495] a case is referred to in the Tennessee district, where, in 1816, two Indians were indicted in the United States circuit court for the murder of a white man, on a reservation, in the Cherokee country, within the limits of the state, and it was decided that the United States court had no jurisdiction; and this decision in the Tennessee case, was the occasion of the passage of the act of 1817 (3 Stat. 383), which (after the decision of the Bailey Case) was repealed (4 Stat. 729, 734), whereby congress provided for the punishment in the national courts of offenses committed by Indians or others, upon Indian lands, within state limits. This decision referred to would preclude this court from taking jurisdiction in the case at bar, had the homicide been committed by the defendants within the limits of the reservation; but, as before remarked, the court has no occasion to give any opinion on this point. But if it could not take cognizance of offenses committed upon the reservation, it surely cannot of those committed beyond its limits. And it seems impossible to hold that this court has jurisdiction in this case without necessarily implying that the courts of the state have not; and if they have not, then we decide that the state of Nebraska has not the power to make her ordinary criminal statutes coextensive with the state limits, and enforce them against all persons living or found therein. Such a power we are not prepared to deny to the state, in the absence of some conflicting treaty stipulation or valid act of congress.

No statutes, other than those above noticed, have been referred to by counsel, as giving the court jurisdiction in the present case, and these we hold do not confer it. This conclusion is supported by many of the cases before cited, and is opposed to none of them. Of its correctness the court entertains no doubt. In view of the peculiar relations which the general government sustains to the Indian tribes, I think I ought to observe that I am not at present prepared to yield assent to the opinion which Mr. Justice McLean seems to have entertained in Bailey's Case, that congress had no power to pass the act of 1817 (3 Stat. 383); that is, congress could not, if it saw fit, make punishable in the national courts offenses committed by or against Indians upon reservations in state limits. And it might be worth the consideration of congress whether some such legislation would not be expedient.

But if it be conceded that under the power of peace and war, to make treaties, and to regulate commerce with Indian tribes (Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 515), congress could, in the absence of reserved right to do so, withdraw Indians living within the limits of a state entirely from state jurisdiction and the reach of its criminal laws and process for offenses against its citizens committed off a reservation, it would seem most improbable that such a power would ever be exercised. We have seen that, in point of fact, congress has not undertaken to exercise it, and therefore this court, which can take cognizance only of offenses created by some act of congress, has no jurisdiction of the crime charged in the indictment.

The defendants must be discharged.

Under the circumstances of the case, the defendants having been convicted and entitled to be discharged only for want of jurisdiction, and following the course pursued in a similar case (U. S. v. Cisna [Case No. 14,795]), we deem it our duty to enter the following special order:

Ordered, that the district-attorney of the United States notify, without delay, the governor of this state, or the proper district-attorney, of this order: that the marshal retain the custody of the defendants, and safely keep them for the space of twenty days, within which time he will deliver them over to any authorized officer of the state, producing a writ for their arrest. If no such writ is presented within the time limited, he will discharge them from custody, or if they desire it, place them in the charge of the United States Indian agent or superintendent for the tribe to which they belong.

UNITED STATES v. SALENTINE.

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Jan., 1879.

NEW TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JUROR.

1. A new trial will not be granted on the ground of misconduct of a juror, when it appears that the party asking for such new trial participated in and was a party to such misconduct.

[Cited in Harrington v. Worcester, L. & S. St. Ry. Co., 157 Mass. 583, 32 N. E. 957.]

2. The defendant was tried for manufacturing illicit spirits. During the progress of the trial one of the jurors, contrary to express instructions of the court, which were known to the defendant, visited the rectifying house of the latter, and was by him shown through it. Nothing was said concerning such misconduct on the part of the juror until after the close of the trial. The verdict being against the defendant, a motion was made for a new trial because of the misconduct of the juror: Held, that under the circumstances, the motion must be overruled.

3. Discussion of cases, where new trial has been granted for misconduct of jury.

The defendant [Christian Salentine] having been convicted of violation of certain provisions of the internal revenue law, a motion for new trial was made on the ground of misconduct of one of the jurors.

G. W. Hazleton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Murphey & Goodwin, for defendant.

DYER, District Judge. The question bearing upon the right of the defendant to a new trial arises upon the misconduct of one of the jurors while the trial of the cause was in progress. At the beginning of the trial the jury were cautioned against having any conversation with any person about the case, and against allowing any person to approach them for the purpose of having such conversation, and against permitting any conversation relating to the case to be had in their presence. The admonition was pointedly given and must have been well understood by the jury and by all parties present. At a subsequent stage of the case the defendant, through his counsel, made application for an order granting to the jury leave to visit and examine his rectifying house, where it was alleged illicit spirits had been manufactured. His application was denied, and the denial was accompanied with observations on the part of the court, which must have given the jury and all parties interested distinctly to understand that the case was to be heard and determined upon the evidence adduced in court, and that no other sources of knowledge or information were to be consulted. Nevertheless, before the conclusion of the trial, one of the jurors, without the knowledge or leave of the court, visited the rectifying house and made extensive examinations of the same in company with the defendant. The circumstance was first brought to the knowledge of the court after verdict, by affidavits of the facts made by the defendant and certain of his witnesses. Proceedings were at once taken for an investigation of the conduct of the juror, which resulted in the imposition of such punishment as the court at the time thought his misconduct warranted. This act of the offending juror has been earnestly urged as ground for a new trial.

Invoking, as counsel did in support of their view, the rule which limits the inquiry of a juror in the case he is called to hear to the evidence adduced at the trial, unless otherwise ordered by the court, and also those general principles regulating jury trials which are essential to a pure and impartial administration of justice, and impressing also upon the attention of the court the circumstance that there had been such transgression by the juror as merited, and made it the duty of the court to impose, suitable censure and punishment, my mind was at the time strongly impressed by the argument which counsel for defendant made upon this branch of the case. In testing its soundness as applicable to the case at bar, it seems essential that we look closely into the particular circumstances and facts connected with the admitted misconduct of the juror.

The material portions of the affidavit made by the defendant and presented to the court as the basis for proceedings against the juror, are as follows: "That on the 16th day of April, A. D. 1878, at or about the hour of one p. m. of said day, said Horace De Long, juryman as aforesaid, came to the rectifying house of M. J. Salentine, No. 227 Reed street, in said city, which is the rectifying house spoken of in the testimony introduced in the trial of said action, and which contains the tubs and still where the illicit distillation of spirits is alleged to have been carried on; that I saw the said De Long inside of the said rectifying house when I came to the place at said time; he then stated that he had come into the establishment to look over the same and see how things were, or words substantially and to that effect. He then asked me where the barrel of wine was lying that had been spoken of in the evidence during the trial, and I showed him the place; he asked me what the big tubs were for which stood in the rectifying house, meaning the receivers; he then said, in substance, that he wanted to go into the still and see where the mash was alleged to have been made; he then went into the still room; he looked at the dumping holes leading through the still room floor into the tubs, and said: 'That is the place where they said you made your mash,' and I said 'Yes;' he then looked at the still and the other tubs in the still room. * * * Said De Long then went into the stable connected with said premises, and asked me where the place was where the jug of liquor was hid; then the said juryman, saying that he wanted to see the place where the molasses was laid, went to the rear of the store on Virginia street, where it was proven that the molasses was stored; he looked into said store room and examined the side walls in front, and remarked that it was a poor hiding place. The said juryman then returned, as I remember, into the still, and from there the said juryman went up stairs and looked about upon the second and third floor of said establishment; he examined the iron basket of the still spoken of in testimony, and also the top of the column in the still; he and I then went back into the store."

The affidavit of the juror, made in the proceeding against him for contempt, varies in some particulars from that of the defendant, but it is in substance an admission of the alleged misconduct, and shows that the defendant participated with him in the examination of the premises, and pointed out to him various places and objects in the rectifying house referred to in the testimony. For the purposes of the pending question of a new trial, we may accept the affidavit of the defendant as giving a truthful statement of the occurrence.

The facts then being as stated by the defendant, the question is, do they entitle him to a new trial? That the rule touching the effect of misconduct of a juror upon a verdict is a strict one, cannot be denied. That it is also a salutary rule, and one to be faithfully observed as essential to the purity of jury trials, must without hesitation be admitted. The books are full of cases where the rule has been enforced. And, although there is some disagreement in the authorities on the point, I think the weight of authority is, that it is not necessary in order to justify the court in setting aside a verdict for irregular conduct of a juror, to show affirmatively that such conduct influenced the jury or affected the verdict. The misconduct of a juror, if it occurs without the knowledge or participation of the party litigant, taints the verdict; that is, provided it was of such a character that it might have had an undue influence. Says Judge Clifford in Johnson v. Root [Case No. 7,409]: "Irregularity on the part of the party charged or of the jury, must be satisfactorily proved in order to lay a foundation for the interposition of the court, but when the irregular conduct is established, it is not necessary that it should certainly appear that it influenced the jury. In that state of the case it is sufficient that the irregularity appears to be of a character that it might have affected the impartiality of the proceedings." Such was the rule laid down in Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. 520, and it appears to be correct. In that case the court says that where there is an irregularity which may affect the impartiality of the proceedings, as where meat and drink or other refreshments have been furnished by the party, or where the jury have been exposed to the effect of such influence, as where they have improperly separated themselves or have had communications not authorized, inasmuch as there cannot be any certainty that they have not been improperly influenced, the proper and appropriate mode of correction or relief is by undoing what has thus been improperly and might have been corruptly done. Text writers have stated the rule as follows: "That whenever it seems satisfactorily to appear that the jury were influenced by improper motives, or that they acted corruptly or under restraint, and it clearly appears that a fair trial has not been had, the verdict will be set aside and a new trial granted. Any improper interference with the jurors may afford sufficient grounds for granting such a motion, and it is not necessary that the attempt to influence the jurors should be made by one of the parties, nor even by his agents. It is sufficient, if it clearly appear that it was done in his behalf, and it is never necessary to show that the misconduct controlled or determined the verdict, provided it was of a character that it might have had an undue influence." In Knight v. Inhabitants of Freeport, 13 Mass. 218, the plaintiff's son-in-law said to one of the jurors that the cause was of great consequence to him; that he should have to pay the costs if the cause should go against the plaintiff, and that the defense of the action was a spiteful thing on the part of the defendants. On motion of defendants a new trial was granted, the court remarking that "too much care and precaution cannot be used to preserve the purity of jury trials. The attempt to influence the juror in this case was grossly improper, and ought to be discountenanced. It is not necessary to show that the mind of the juror thus tampered with was influenced by the attempt. Perhaps it is not in his power to say whether he was influenced or not. If he was, there is sufficient cause to set aside the verdict, and if he was not, and the party who has gained the verdict has a good cause, he will still be entitled to a verdict upon another trial. We cannot be too strict in guarding trials by jury from improper influence. This strictness is necessary to give due confidence to parties in the results of their causes, and every one ought to know that for any, even the least intermeddling with jurors, the verdict will always be set aside."

As illustrative of the extent to which the courts go in setting aside verdicts for improper attempts to influence jurors, the following cases are in point: Hamilton v. Pease, 38 Conn. 115; Perkins v. Knight, 2 N. H. 474; Bennett v. Howard, 3 Day, 223. See, also, Sargent v. Roberts, 1 Pick. 337; Dana v. Roberts, 1 Root, 134; Farrer v. Ohio, 2 Ohio St. 54; Riley v. State, 9 Humph. 646; Foster v. Brooks, 6 Ga. 287; State v. Andrews, 29 Conn. 100, and many other cases which might be cited.

In this connection it may be observed that in McIlvaine v. Wilkins, 12 N. H. 474, the court, in discussing this subject, say, that "scattered throughout the reports there are far more cases than there should be of applications for new trials, founded upon evidence tending to show sometimes attempts by a party to prejudice a jury in his favor, and sometimes conduct in jurymen indicative of a forgetfulness of the important responsibilities resting upon them." And Mr. Hilliard says in his work on New Trials (Hil. New Trials, c. 10, § 11) that the weight of authority would seem now to be that conversation with jurymen, more especially, unless held when they are together, is not ground for a new trial; citing Davis v. Taylor, 2 Chit. 268; Parke's Case, 2 Rolle, 85; Hall's Case, 6 Leigh, 615; Luster v. State, 11 Humph. 169; Rowe v. State, Id. 491. Visiting the scene of the res gestæ by jurors, without permission of the court, and with a view to obtain information touching the facts of the case on trial, or for explanation of testimony, is ground for a new trial. Such, in effect, was the ruling in Eastwood v. People, 3 Park. Cr. R. 25; Ruloff v. People, 18 N. Y. 179; and Deacon v. Shreve, 22 N. J. Law, 176.

In the light of the authorities to which I have referred, and many others to which reference might be made, if it appeared in the case at bar that the juror held conversations with other parties than the defendant about the merits of the case while the trial was in progress, or visited the defendant's rectifying house for the purpose of examining the same, without defendant's knowledge or cooperation, I should have little hesitation in setting aside this verdict. The question now is, is the defendant in a position to invoke the application of the rule which gives to a party, presumably prejudiced by the misconduct of a juror, the benefit of a new trial. He had knowledge of the refusal of the court to permit the jury to visit the premises. Yet, finding the juror there while the trial was in progress, he conducted him over the premises, and, as appears by his own sworn statement, pointed out localities and objects concerning which testimony had been given. He knew that the court had forbidden the jury to have conversations with persons concerning the case, yet, according to his own affidavit, he held such conversation with the juror while accompanying him through the rectifying house. In view of what had transpired in court in his presence, and in view of the statement in his affidavit that the juror told him that he did not want any one to know he had been at the rectifying house, it is to my mind clear that the defendant knew that the conduct of the juror was a violation of his duty, and was in disregard of the orders of the court. Yet he made no report of the transaction to the court, nor even to his counsel, but sat silent and permitted the trial to proceed without complaint until after verdict when he makes complaint in the form of a motion for a new trial, on the ground that he was prejudiced by the misconduct of the juror, in which he participated, and to which he was a party.

I have examined with care all the cases cited by counsel, and many more bearing upon this question, and I have been unable to find a case in which a new trial was granted for misconduct of a juror, in which the party asking for a new trial participated. The cases in which such misconduct was held ground for a new trial were, so far as my observation extends, where the misconduct was between the juror and a third party, or between the juror and the successful party in the litigation, and of which the losing party was at the time ignorant, and with which he was in no manner connected. Now, although "the utmost precaution should be observed to prevent any attempt to forestall the judgment or to bias the mind of a juror in reference to the merits of an issue which he is called on to decide," and although "all trials by jury ought to be effectually guarded against the exertion of every species of improper influence," the question is, whether, when a defendant makes himself a party to the misconduct of a juror, he can sit silent until verdict rendered, and then if the verdict shall be against him, can be heard to urge such misconduct as a ground for setting aside the verdict. As, for example, suppose a juror communicates a willingness to accept a bribe, and the party pays him a bribe, and the bribe proves ineffectual, and there is an adverse verdict, can the party who has thus dealt with the juror ask for the benefit of a new trial, basing his application upon the corrupt act of the juror? As I understand the rule upon this subject, it is enforced for the benefit and protection of those who are themselves innocent of any participation in the misconduct complained of. It is true that in the present case the juror's visit to these premises was not brought about, nor originally induced, by any act of the defendant. The juror was there of his own volition, and was there when the defendant first met him; but the defendant at once lent his encouragement and co-operation to the act of the juror, and, as I have said, accompanied him over the premises, pointed out different objects upon the premises to which the testimony on the trial related, and conversed with him about particular parts of the establishment which they were then mutually observing. Clearly, both parties—the juror and the defendant—were equally in flagrante delicto. For this offense against the proprieties of judicial investigation, punishment has been inflicted upon one; and now to grant a new trial because of such offense, would be to reward the other, when both are alike culpable. For I cannot but regard both as alike at fault, since the defendant, finding the juror on the premises, actively aided and facilitated him in his examination of the scene of the res gestæ. It is impossible for me to believe that the defendant supposed that the juror had a right at that time to visit and examine the establishment, and his subsequent silence touching the occurrence until after the verdict, looks strongly like a purpose, originally, not to divulge the circumstance unless the verdict should be unfavorable. By his own course of action as a participant in the misconduct of the juror, I think he has foreclosed his right to ask that the verdict be set aside because of such misconduct. No other conclusion is, in my judgment, reconcilable with a regular and proper administration of the law, and I find no authority that supports a contrary determination in such a state of the case.

Motion for a new trial denied.

NOTE. The test of prejudice to a party from misbehavior of a juror is this: Was his misbehavior such as to make it probable that his mind was influenced so as to render him an unfair and prejudiced juror? If the misbehavior appear, the disclaimer of the juror should be wholly disregarded. And it is of no importance whether or not the court thinks the verdict was right. Pool v. Railroad Co., 6 Fed. 844.

Case No. 16,214.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1843.

SEAMEN SENT HOME BY CONSUL — SERVICES ON PASSAGE—ASSAULT WITH DANGEROUS WEAPON.

1. Where a distressed American seaman was sent home on board of an American vessel by the consul from a foreign country: Held, that he was bound to do duty as a seaman when called upon by the mate, although his passage had been paid by the American consul.

2. The mate had a right to order such seaman to do duty, unless directed to the contrary by the master of the vessel.

3. If such seaman was unable to do duty, the onus probandi lay upon the seaman to show his inability when called upon to do duty.

4. A prisoner indicted for an assault with a dangerous weapon on another, on the high seas on board of an American vessel, under the act of March 3, 1825, § 22 [4 Stat. 121], would be guilty of the offence charged if he could have reached the person intended to be assaulted by extending his arm so as to inflict a blow, although no blow was actually given.

5. The person who flourishes or points a deadly weapon at another, intending personal harm, is guilty of an assault within the act of congress, although no battery had been committed.

6. The pointing of loaded fire-arms with an intent to commit injury, is an assault, although the parties stand at a great distance, provided the distance is such that personal injury may be inflicted by the discharge of such fire-arms.

The prisoner was indicted under the act of congress passed March 3, 1825 (section 22), for an assault with a dangerous weapon, to wit: a knife of the length of 12 inches, and of the breadth of 2 inches, done and committed upon the mate of the American packet ship called the "Mediator," on a voyage upon the high seas from the port of London, in the kingdom of Great Britain, to the port of New York. The act in substance declares, that if any person or persons upon the high seas, or in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, on board any vessel belonging to the whole or in part to the United States, or any citizen or citizens thereof, shall, with a dangerous weapon, commit an assault on another, such person shall on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding $3,000, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding 3 years, according to the aggravation of the offence.

It appeared in evidence that the prisoner was a distressed seaman and consular man, sent home by the American consul at London to the United States. The act gives the consul the right and makes it his duty to send home American seamen who are destitute and found in a foreign country. See the act of congress passed February 28, 1803, § 3 [2 Stat. 203]. And it is also made the duty of the seamen so sent home, to perform such service on board of the vessels bringing them to the United States, as they shall be able to perform according to their several abilities. And by the same act the masters of vessels are to receive a sum not exceeding $10 for each person so sent home by the consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and vice-commercial agents of the United States. In this case, two or three days after the Mediator had left London, while on her voyage, the 2d mate, while forward, ordered the prisoner to take up a knife and scrape off the tar from some of the buckets belonging to the ship. The prisoner had not thus far been put on duty, but he had lived in the forecastle, and was sitting down at his ease on the spar on the deck of the vessel, smoking his pipe, when the order was given. The prisoner was directed to proceed aft, man the hatchways, and do the duty. He got up reluctantly; indeed, one witness testified that he refused to do the duty pointed out to him. The 2d mate then seized him by the neck, and gave him a strong shove forward. He appeared to have pushed the prisoner about three or four feet from him. The prisoner then drew his knife and turned to the mate, threatened to stab him, and told him he would do so if he did not let him alone. One of the crew then took up a hand-spike, and threatened to knock down the prisoner if he did not go aft and perform the duty; whereupon the man retreated aft. The witness called for the government was here cross-examined by the prisoner's counsel. He stated that when the prisoner drew the knife, and threatened to stab the mate, he was about three or four feet from him; that he flourished his knife, and told him he would cut him open if he approached him.

The counsel for the prisoner and the United States respectively summed up to the jury.

The counsel for the prisoner submitted that the mate was the aggressor. That he had no right to call upon the prisoner to do duty in the manner he did, unless by the order of the captain. That the mate had assumed to put the man on duty without the captain's orders, and the prisoner in such a case was not bound to obey. The counsel also urged, that it had not been shown that the man was able to do duty, within the meaning of the act of congress. That the prisoner, although he had drawn his knife and flourished it at the mate, yet he was not guilty of having committed an assault upon the mate, within the meaning of the act of congress. That in order to bring the prisoner within the act, he must first have been within reaching distance of the mate, so as to have inflicted the blow upon him if he designed it. That the assault, if committed within reaching distance, must have been made in such a manner as that the jury would be bound to infer circumstances of force and harm, in respect to the mate or the person assaulted. There should be such acts of violence, or such threats, menaces, signs or gestures, as might give ground to the person assaulted to apprehend some injury or danger of his person while standing in the defence of himself. In this case the mate had shoved the prisoner, and the fair inference was that he had shoved him beyond the reach of the knife, when the prisoner turned upon the mate, and it then became optional with the mate whether he would come to closer quarters or not. He certainly was not bound to do so, and that therefore the prisoner was entitled to an acquittal.

The district attorney, for the United States, contended that the prisoner clearly had been guilty of an assault with a dangerous weapon; that he was bound to have done duty when called upon by the mate; that the prisoner should have proved on trial his inability to have done the duty required of him, if that was his excuse.

A. Nash, for prisoner.

The District Attorney, for the United States.

THE COURT thereupon charged the jury that distressed American seamen, who are sent home, are bound by law to render what assistance they can in the ship's service, while on their passage, and this, although their passage is paid by the United States. That in the present case, the order of the mate appeared to have been a proper one, and the mate had the right to call on the prisoner to do duty on shipboard, unless the captain had ordered to the contrary. That in case the prisoner refused to do duty, the officer had the right to remove or send him aft in a mild manner. That the pushing in this case did not appear to have gone beyond the line of duty on the part of the mate. The court said that they would not undertake to lay down any definite rule how near the parties must be to each other, to enable one of them to commit an assault upon the other, within the meaning of the act of congress; and with a dangerous weapon, no battery need be proved to have been committed; the assault alone was sufficient; that if the parties stood 20 feet apart, the prisoner could not have been guilty of an assault in this case, but had he held a loaded pistol or gun, and pointed it at the mate in a threatening attitude and manner, he would have been guilty of an assault within the act, even had the parties stood at a great distance, so long as the distance was such that execution or harm might arise to the mate from the discharge of the fire-arms. He said that, in the present case, the mate had sworn that the prisoner was three or four feet from him; that is, he had shoved the man forward three or four feet when he took him by the collar. The prisoner had committed no battery upon the mate, but if the prisoner was so near the mate as to have been able to have inflicted a blow upon the mate with his knife, had he so intended by extending his arm the length of it, he was clearly guilty in law of the assault, and ought to be convicted; but should the jury be of the opinion, that the prisoner stood at such a distance from the mate when he drew his knife and flourished it, that he could not have possibly reached him, the prisoner was not guilty in law of the offence charged in the indictment.

The jury thereupon retired, and returned a verdict of not guilty.

PRIZE—LIEN FOR SEAMEN'S WAGES.

[Seamen on board a prize captured and condemned as enemy property have no lien for wages, as against the title of the United States and the rights of the captors.]

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The above vessel was seized on the high seas in July, 1861, by a ship of war of the United States, at a time of public war between the United States and the rebel states or Confederate States; and in the term of August following, the said vessel and her cargo were proceeded against in this court, by public prosecution, and a decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and her cargo, as prize of war, was rendered by the court therein, on the first day of the said term of August. [Cases Nos. 12,259 and 12,260.] On the 10th day of August, 1863, the claimants appealed the said cause to the supreme court of the United States, and that court in December term, last past, affirmed the decree of this court in the original cause in all respects. [3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 451.] On the 6th of October last the officers and crew of the aforesaid prize vessel filed their joint petition in this court, alleging they were "loyal officers of the United States at the time they were employed on board of and in the service of said bark, and so continued to the time of her capture in this cause: that they were not knowingly and willingly employed on board the said vessel in hostility to the United States, and that they are advised, and believe, they have an interest in, and lien upon, said bark, her tackle, apparel, furniture and cargo, or the proceeds of the sale thereof, as a security for the wages due to them, respectively, as aforesaid, and the said liens are prior to the claims of the libelants."

No lien for, or priority of right of payment of wages to the crew of the bark in this case, for their services upon the vessel, was imparted to them by the contract of hiring, or accrued by implication therefor. The Sally Magee, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 451; 13 Stat. 306, § 10. The ship and cargo were both enemy's property, and the legal title and interest therein was vested exclusively in the United States, on their seizure as prize in this action, and then passed, absolutely, by force of the prize act, above cited, to the captors. The owners of the ship, after she became enemy's property, could authorize no lien or disposal of the vessel or cargo in derogation of the higher and older title of the captors of her as prize of war, and the crew of her, equally with all outside creditors, must resort to and rely alone upon the individual responsibility of their particular debtors. Upton, Mar. Law (2d Ed.) 153, 158. The petitioners accordingly have no right, of course, against the property for the recovery of their wages, seized at sea and condemned as lawful prize of war, and in no way legally exonerated from liability to such seizure.

The act of congress of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 762), protecting certain liens upon vessels during the war, does not extend to cases of the class embraced in the present cause. The Sally Magee [supra]. Accordingly there is no statutory law authorizing the lien claimed by the petitioners. Petition denied.

Case No. 16,216a.

UNITED STATES v. SAMPERYAC et al.

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Feb., 1831.[2]

EQUITY — FEIGNED ISSUES — BILL OF REVIEW — PLEADING — FRAUD — ADMISSIONS — DECREE PRO CONFESSO — ASSIGNABILITY OF DECREES — CONVEYANCE—INNOCENT PURCHASERS.

1. It rests in the sound discretion of the chancellor to award a feigned issue, or not; and it is done to enable him to obtain additional facts, and to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion on the facts of the case.

2. The verdict of the jury on a feigned issue is not conclusive, for the chancellor may have tried again and again, and may even decree against a verdict.

3. Where there is sufficient proof to enable the chancellor to decide, the parties should not be subjected to the delay and expense of a trial at law.

4. The act of May 26, 1824 (4 Stat. 52), confers on this court the powers of a court of chancery, for the purpose of trying the validity of claims mentioned in that act, and a bill of review may be maintained therein.

5. A bill of review lies either for error in law, appearing on the face of the decree, or for new material matter, that has come to light afterwards, and which could not have been used at the time the decree was made.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in 7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 222.]

6. The bill must be founded on new matter to prove what was before in issue, for a party cannot be entitled to a bill of review on new matter, to prove a title which was not in issue.

7. Where a fraudulent claim was set up, and sustained by false testimony, the decree may be reversed and annulled, on a bill of review, and no rights can be acquired under such former decree.

8. When the allegations of a bill are distinct and positive, they are taken as true, without proof, after a decree pro confesso; which, in its effect, is like a judgment by nil dicit at law.

9. But where the allegations are so defective or vague, that a precise decree cannot be rendered upon them, proof must necessarily be adduced before a decree can be made.

10. A refusal to deny, where a party is legally bound to speak, is equivalent to an admission of the charges against him. What is admitted need not be proved.

11. The general denial of allegations, by one uninformed as to their truth, will not be sufficient to dissolve an injunction.

12. A bill of review will be barred by the lapse of a reasonable time, after discovery of the new matter; but what shall be considered reasonable time, depends upon the sound discretion of the chancellor, under all the circumstances of the case.

13. Fraud, deduced from circumstances, may be sufficient to outweigh positive proof to the contrary.

14. Startling frauds and forgeries proved and commented on.

15. Judgments and decrees are not assignable at law, so as to vest the legal title in the assignee, and the latter takes only an equitable interest, which is subject to every equity and charge which attached to them in the hands of the assignor.

16. A purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, must be clothed with the legal title, and not a mere equity, in order to protect himself.

17. No one can occupy the attitude of an innocent purchaser, under a forged claim and conveyance.

18. Construction of the act of congress of the 8th May, 1830 (4 Stat. 399), and held not to require the observance of all the technical rules in the ordinary course of chancery practice on a bill of review, under that act.

19. Almost every law providing a new remedy, affects causes of action existing at the time the law is passed; but such a law is not for that reason invalid.

[Cited in brief in Rich v. Flanders, 39 N. H. 365.]

20. It is incontestable, that a grantee can convey no better title than he possesses, and hence, those who come in under a void grant acquire nothing.

Bill of review in chancery. Bernardo Samperyac, under the act of congress of the 26th of May, 1824 (7 Laws U. S. 300 [4 Stat. 52]), entitled "An act enabling the claimants to lands within the limits of the state of Missouri and territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," by R. C. Oden, his solicitor, filed his bill against the United States, in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the territory of Arkansas, on the 21st of November, 1827; stating that he, an inhabitant of the province of Louisiana, on the 6th of October, 1789, addressed a petition to the governor of the said province and its dependencies, asking a grant of land in full property, on Strawberry river in Arkansas district, containing ten arpens in front by the usual depth; that on the 11th of October, 1789, Miro, the governor of the province of Louisiana, made the grant as requested, and at the same time issued an order of survey to the surveyor-general of the province, to the end that the boundaries of the grant might be defined for the purpose of making a title in form; that this grant was secured by the treaty between the United States and France of the 30th of April, 1803, and would have been perfected into a perfect title under the government under which it originated, had there been no change of sovereignty; and the bill prayed the court to confirm the said grant, according to the provisions of the act of congress before mentioned, and that process be issued against the attorney of the United States for the territory of Arkansas, to appear and answer the bill.

The petition of Samperyac, and the order of survey, in the Spanish language, attached to the bill as exhibits, translated by James H. Lucas, the sworn interpreter and translator of the court, were as follows, namely:—

Petition: "To the Governor of the Province of Louisiana and Its Dependencies, &c., &c. Bernardo Samperyac, wishing to establish himself on Strawberry river in the Arkansas district, prays that you will do him the favor to grant him ten arpens of land in front by the usual depth, being the lands of his Catholic majesty, and not causing any prejudice; a favor your petitioner hopes to receive from your bounty; and he will ever pray to God for your health. Bernardo Samperyac. New Orleans, 6th Oct., 1789."

Order of Survey: "New Orleans, 11th Oct., 1789. The surveyor of this province, Don Charles Trudeau, will establish this tract, on the ten arpens of land requested, by the usual depth, and will mention the bounds, in order that they may appear at the time that the boundaries have to be defined, for the purpose of making a title in form. Miro."

Process having been executed on Samuel C. Roane, district attorney, on the 24th of November, 1827, he filed an answer in behalf of the United States, denying the facts and allegations in the bill, and alleging that grants could only be made legally to persons actually residing in the province of Louisiana; that Samperyac, in whose name the bill was filed, was a fictitious person without actual existence; or that if he ever existed he was a foreigner, or then dead, and made no transfer, or assignment, of the claim in his lifetime; that he had no legal representative in existence; that there was no one now living, who was authorized to file this bill or prosecute this suit, and prayed that the bill might be dismissed. On the 19th of December, 1827, the district attorney moved to continue the cause until the next term, principally on the ground that there were many cases pending in the court, similar in all respects, and involving the same principles, and with regard to which the United States desired to procure evidence if any existed. The court denied the motion, and the district attorney excepted, and the court signed and sealed his bill of exceptions.

The testimony in behalf of the complainants was the exhibits to the bill already referred to, and the deposition of John Hebrard, of the parish of Ouchita and state of Louisiana, taken in open court on the 19th of December, 1827. He testified that he was about seventy-one years old; that he was alcalde in the province of Louisiana, under the Spanish government, from 1789 to 1791, under the appointment of Miro, governor of said province; that he was commandant in Catahoola from 1797, under the appointment of Manuel Gayoso De Lemos, governor of said province, until the country was transferred to the United States; that he was often in the executive offices of those governors during their administration; had often seen them write, and from his official situation had occasion for a continual correspondence with each of them during the times they were respectively governors of said province, and that he was well acquainted with their handwriting; that he had examined the signature to the grant in this case, and found it to be in the proper handwriting of Miro, governor of said province at that time. He further testified, that the grant in this case was in the most usual form and mode of granting lands by the said governors, and would have been perfected into a title in form under the Spanish government; that lands thus granted were considered and treated by the government and the grantee as established titles, and were to be surveyed or not as the grantee chose; that a concession or order of survey, calling for lands fronting on watercourses, were to be run off, when surveyed, as follows: commencing from forty to sixty feet back from the highest high land, after passing all overflowed land if any in front, and the grantees were authorized to locate the grant on entirely good, arable land, so as neither to include inundated nor barren land, unless they chose to do so. He further testified, that the command of Arkansas commenced on the Mississippi river, at a place called Little Prairie, about forty miles below New Madrid, and fronted on the Mississippi down to Grand Point Coupee, now called Lake Providence, in Ouchita parish, state of Louisiana, and extended back west so as to include all the waters which emptied into the Mississippi from the west, between those points. He stated, on cross-examination, that he knew Bernardo Samperyac; that he resided in the province of Louisiana at the date of the order of survey, 11th October, 1789, and was then living on Red river in Natchitoches parish, Louisiana; that in granting lands to individuals, the consideration frequently was for services rendered the government, but more frequently to induce population; that any man from any quarter could and generally did obtain concessions and orders of survey; that the Spanish governors kept records of grants, but that the destruction of the offices at New Orleans by fire, in 1792 or 1793, destroyed the greater part of the records, and that a great many more were said to have been purloined and taken off, about the change of government by officers who had been attached to the Spanish executive offices; that, as to granting lands, the governors-general of Louisiana were limited as to jurisdiction and quantity. They were authorized and empowered by the laws, usages, and customs of the Spanish government to grant lands not exceeding one league square, in the province of Louisiana, which commenced at the mouth of the Mississippi river, and extended back so as to include all Upper and Lower Louisiana.

On the same day, the 19th December, 1827, the superior court, held by Benjamin Johnson and William Trimble, judges, on the foregoing testimony, decreed the confirmation of the said grant to Bernardo Samperyac, as for four hundred arpens of land, and the decree was recorded, and no appeal taken from it by the United States within one year. One hundred and thirty other cases before the same court, against the United States, in the names of different claimants, were confirmed for four hundred arpens of land each, on the same testimony, and decrees entered and recorded, and from which no appeals were taken. On the 14th of February, 1828, Samperyac transferred his claim by deed to John J. Bowie; and in December, 1828, Joseph Stewart, it was admitted on the part of the United States, purchased the claim from John J. Bowie by deed, for a valuable consideration, and in good faith; by virtue of which purchase, Stewart entered at the Little Rock land-office, on the 13th of December, 1828, the north-east quarter of seventeen, the east half of south-east quarter of seventeen, and the west half of north-east quarter of thirteen; all in township eleven south, of range twenty-six west, containing 320 acres, relinquishing the overplus of twenty acres; and obtained the certificate of entry of Bernard Smith, the register thereof. On the 10th of April, 1830, the United States, by Samuel C. Roane, their attorney for the territory of Arkansas, filed in the superior court, by leave thereof, their bill of review against Bernardo Samperyac, setting out the proceedings in the foregoing case, and alleging that the original decree was obtained by fraud and surprise; that the petition and order of survey were forged; that Hebrard, the witness in the cause, committed the crime of perjury; that the order of survey was never signed by Miro, governor of Louisiana, as it purported to have been, and that this fact had come to the knowledge of the said district attorney since the decree was entered; that Samperyac was a fictitious person, and never had existence; that the district attorney had discovered new and important record evidence, of the existence of which he was not aware, and which was not within his control at the hearing of the cause, and which could be procured, if a rehearing was allowed; and praying that said decree and proceedings might be reviewed and reversed and annulled. Bills of review were filed in each of the other cases, at the same time setting forth the same facts.

On the 8th of May, 1830 [4 Stat. 399], congress passed an act entitled "An act for further extending the powers of the judges of the superior court of the territory of Arkansas, under the act of the 26th day of May, 1824, and for other purposes," continuing in force that act so far as it related to claims within the territory of Arkansas until the 1st of July, 1831, "for the purpose of enabling the court in Arkansas having cognizance of claims under the said act to proceed by bills of review filed, or to be filed, in the said court on the part of the United States, for the purpose of revising all or any of the decrees of the said court in cases wherein it shall appear to the said court, or be alleged in such bills of review, that the jurisdiction of the same was assumed in any case on any forged warrant, concession, grant, order of survey, or other evidence of title; and in every case wherein it shall appear to the said court, on the prosecution of any such bill of review, that such warrant, concession, grant, order of survey, or other evidence of title, is a forgery, it shall be lawful, and the said court is hereby authorized to proceed, by further order and decree, to reverse and annul any prior decree or adjudication upon such claim; and thereupon such prior decree or adjudication shall be deemed and held in all places whatever to be null and void, to all intents and purposes. And the said court shall proceed on such bills of review by such rules of practice and regulations as they may adopt for the execution of the powers vested or confirmed in them by this act." 8 Laws U. S. 297, 298.

Samperyac was proceeded against as an absent defendant, after the return of the process that "he was not to be found in the territory of Arkansas." On the 28th of October, 1830, Joseph Stewart was permitted to file his answer, and become a defendant, which was excepted to on the part of the United States, and a bill of exceptions signed and sealed by the court. On the same day, a decree pro confesso was entered against Bernardo Samperyac, he having failed to appear and answer the bill. The answer of Stewart denied the frauds and forgeries alleged in the bill, and averred that if there was any fraud, corruption, or forgery, he was ignorant of it, and that he bonâ fide purchased the claim, for a valuable consideration, from John J. Bowie, by deed, and had entered the same at the Little Rock land-office, and ought not to be divested of the land so entered; and that the said decree, being for less than five hundred acres, and not having been appealed from within one year, was final and conclusive, and could not be annulled or set aside. The cause was set down for final hearing at the next term; and, on motion of the district attorney, it was ordered that he have leave to withdraw from the record files of the court the original Spanish paper in this case, for the purpose of taking depositions, the Hon. James Woodson Bates, one of the judges, dissenting. The clerk was required to retain a copy of the paper.

On the 26th of January, 1831, the cause came on for final hearing, on bill, answers, exhibits, and testimony; and was argued by counsel until the 1st of February, 1831, and was then submitted, and by the court taken under advisement. On the 4th of February, 1831, the defendants filed their written motion that the court submit the question of forgery vel non, of the order of survey, to the decision of a jury; and this motion was taken under advisement. The testimony adduced under the bill of review is sufficiently referred to in the opinion of the majority of the court, and need not here be recapitulated.

On the 7th of February, 1831, the above motion was overruled by the following opinion of the court:—

PER CURIAM.—We are of opinion that the motion to award a feigned issue in this case should be overruled, for the following reasons:—(1) Because it rests in the sound discretion of the chancellor to award a feigned issue or not; and where the truth of the facts can be satisfactorily ascertained by the chancellor, without the aid of a jury, it is his duty to decide as to the facts, and not subject the parties to the expense and delay of a trial at law. Dale v. Roosevelt, 6 Johns. Ch. 255. (2) Because the chancellor, when he directs such issue, does it upon the ground that the evidence produced before him in the record is not sufficient to enable him to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion; he, therefore, directs the facts to be tried by a jury, for the purpose of collecting additional evidence; which additional evidence, when so collected, the chancellor considers in connection with that already existing in the records of the chancery court. Bootle v. Blundell, 19 Ves. 500; 1 Archb. Prac. 347–349. (3) Because the verdict of the jury upon such feigned issue is not conclusive upon the chancellor; he may have it tried again and again, if these verdicts are not agreeable to his sense of justice, or he may even decree contrary to a verdict, if he thinks proper. Morris v. Davies, 14 Serg. & L. 534. (4) Because the bill in this case has been taken for confessed, and every distinct and positive allegation in it must be taken as true. Williams v. Corwin, 1. Hopk. Ch. 471. Motion overruled.

On the 7th of February, 1831, the court decreed that the former decree in favor of Bernardo Samperyac against the United States, for four hundred arpens of land, pronounced and recorded at the December term of this court in 1827, be reversed, annulled, and held for nought; and that Stewart pay his own costs. Decrees of reversal were pronounced in the other cases.

Samuel C. Roane, Dist. Atty., and William S. Fulton, for the United States.

Chester Ashley, Robert Crittenden, William Trimble, and William Kelly, for defendants.

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, BATES, and CROSS, JJ.

JOHNSON, J.—This is a bill of review, filed by Samuel C. Roane, attorney of the United States for the territory of Arkansas, for and on behalf of the United States, to revise, reverse, and annul a former decree of this court, pronounced and recorded at the December term, 1827, in favor of Bernardo Samperyac, for four hundred arpens of land. The substantial allegations in the bill of review are, that the decree is erroneous, and was obtained by fraud and surprise; that the original petition, or requite and order of survey exhibited in this case, are forged and corrupt; and that the order of survey was never signed by Miro, governor of Louisiana, as the same purports to have been; and that this fact has come to the knowledge of the said district attorney since said decree was entered of record; that Bernardo Samperyac is a fictitious person, and never had an actual existence; that if he ever did exist, he was dead at the time of exhibiting his bill; that John Hebrard, upon whose testimony the decree was made, committed the crime of perjury in giving his testimony; and that the statements sworn to by him upon the hearing of this cause, as set forth in his deposition, are false and corrupt; that the original petition and order of survey in this case, shows upon its face, that it was not made as early as the year 1789, but appears to have been made long since, and that the former decree of this court was obtained by fraud, covin, and misrepresentation, in violation of the principles of equity and of law.

The district attorney, for and on behalf of the United States, avers and says, that since the decree was made in this case, he has discovered new and important record evidence, which was not within his control, and the existence of which he did not know, and had not time to procure at the hearing of this cause; all which he believes he will be able to procure and exhibit upon the final hearing.

The first question made and argued at the bar, which will be considered, relates to the power conferred on this court by the act of congress of the 26th May, 1824, entitled "An act enabling the claimants to land within the limits of the state of Missouri and territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims."

It is contended by the counsel for the defendants that the act of 1824 constituted a special tribunal, with limited and restricted powers; that full chancery powers were not conferred; that this court possessed no greater powers than have been heretofore delegated to boards of commissioners, created by acts of congress, to decide upon claims similar to those now pending in this court; that this court cannot entertain a bill of review, because the authority to do so is not given by the act of 1824. That this court, sitting as a court for the adjudication of French and Spanish claims, possesses no power not delegated and conferred by the several acts of congress upon that subject, we are ready to admit.

To ascertain the extent of the power and jurisdiction of this court, let us examine the act of 1824. That act provides, that it shall be lawful for certain claimants to present a petition to the district court of the state of Missouri, setting forth their claims as pointed out in the act; praying in said petition, that the validity of such title or claim may be inquired into and decreed by said court; and the said court is authorized and required to hold and exercise jurisdiction of any petition presented in conformity with the provisions of the act, and to hear and determine the same on the petition, in case no answer be filed, after due notice or on the petition and answer of any person interested; and the answer of the district attorney of the United States, where he may have filed an answer, according to the evidence which may be adduced by the parties, in conformity with the principles of justice, and according to the laws and ordinances of the government under which the claim originated; a copy of the petition to be served on any adverse claimant, and on the district attorney of the United States when the government is interested in the defence. The act further provides, that any petition which shall be presented, shall be conducted according to the rules of a court of equity, except that the answer of the district attorney of the United States shall not be required to be verified by his oath, and tried without any continuance, unless for cause shown; and said court shall have full power and authority to hear and determine all questions arising in said cause, relative to the title of the claimants, and, by a final decree, to settle and determine the validity thereof, according to the laws of nations, and all other questions properly arising between the claimants and the United States; and the court may, at its discretion, order disputed facts to be found by a jury according to the practice of said court, when directing issues in chancery before the same court; and in all cases, an appeal to the supreme court of the United States is allowed, within one year from the rendition of the judgment or decree, the decision of which court shall be final and conclusive between the parties; and should no appeal be taken, the judgment or decree of the said district court shall, in like manner, be final and conclusive. By the 14th section of the act of 1824, it is enacted, "that all the provisions of that act shall extend to and be applicable to the territory of Arkansas, and for the purpose of finally settling and adjusting the title and claims to land derived from the French and Spanish governments, the superior court for the territory of Arkansas, shall have, hold, and exercise jurisdiction in all cases, in the same manner, and under the same restrictions and regulations, in all respects, as by this act is given to the district court for the state of Missouri."

The question arises under the foregoing act, whether this court has been clothed with full and complete chancery jurisdiction and power, in adjudicating upon these claims; or whether it has been invested with a limited and restricted authority, capable of performing nothing which is not expressly delegated by the act, resembling rather a board of commissioners than a court of equity? Upon the best reflection which we have been able to bestow upon the subject, we entertain little doubt that the act of 1824 intended to confer, and does confer, upon this court, the full and ample power of a court of chancery. Instead of creating a special tribunal, a board of commissioners to decide and report upon claims like these, congress has referred them to the decision of a court, possessed of common law and chancery jurisdiction; a court invested with a part of the judicial power of the United States.

The cases, when brought before this court, are to be conducted according to the rules of a court of equity. This court, then, possessing both chancery powers and common law jurisdiction, is required to try these cases on the chancery side of the court. The fact that the cognizance of these claims is given to a court possessed of full and ample equity jurisdiction, with the injunction to try the cases according to the rules of a court of equity, goes far to prove that congress intended to refer them to the judiciary, and allow the United States to be sued before her own courts, that a final termination might be put to these demands upon her justice. The provision for an appeal from the decision of this court to the supreme court of the United States, by either party, strongly evinces the intention of congress that these claims should receive their adjudication by the judiciary of the United States. If, then, congress intended to refer them to the judiciary, can it be reasonably inferred that they intended to limit the general powers of the court to which the reference is made? We think not. The act, in terms, does not limit the jurisdiction of this court; and we are not to infer a limitation unless it be expressed, or arises from a necessary implication. If we are correct in affirming the proposition that the act of 1824 authorizing certain claimants to bring suit against the United States, on the equity side, possessed of full chancery power and jurisdiction, it follows, that a bill of review will lie in this court, unless there be something in the act itself forbidding it.

It has been urged that that part of the act which says that the judgment or decree of this court, unless appealed from in one year, shall be final and conclusive, necessarily precludes the idea of a bill of review. We entertain a different opinion. The provision just referred to, relates to the time in which an appeal may be taken. It says nothing about a bill of review, or rehearing. Each of these modes of revising the decrees of this court, according to the practice in chancery, is left untouched, and stands precisely as they existed had no time been limited for an appeal. The court entertains a bill of review, in virtue of the chancery jurisdiction conferred by the act of congress by which it was created, and possessing that power previous to the act of 1824, continued to possess it, with the authority to apply it to these cases, for the adjudication of which the latter act was passed. It is, however, further contended by the counsel for the defendants, that, as the bill of review in this case was filed upwards of two years subsequent to the final decree in the original cause, and more than one year after the time allowed for an appeal had elapsed, this remedy is barred by length of time. In the case of Thomas v. Harvie, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 146, the supreme court of the United States held that a bill of review, for error apparent in the decree, is barred by length of time, unless it is filed before the time limited for an appeal; but, in the same case, the court expressly reserved the question, whether a bill of review, founded upon matter discovered since the decree, is in like manner barred by the lapse of the time limited for the appeal. That question is directly presented in this case, and calls for our decision. We have bestowed upon it all the reflection of which we are capable; and the conclusion to which we have arrived is, that a bill of review, founded on the discovery of new matter after the decree, ought not to be barred by the lapse of one year, the time limited in these cases; nor do we think it ought to be barred by the lapse of two years and four months, the time between the former decree and the filing of this bill. The reasons assigned by the supreme court, in the case cited, for applying as a bar to bills of review for error apparent on the face of the decree, the time limited for an appeal, do not, in our judgment, apply to the case of a bill of review, founded on new matter, discovered subsequent to the decree. Judge Washington, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, "that courts of equity, acting upon the principle that laches and neglect ought to be discountenanced, and that in cases of stale demands, its aid ought not to be afforded, have always interposed some limitation to suits brought in those courts;" and the decision was, that, although bills of review are not strictly within the statute of limitations, yet courts of equity will adopt the analogy of the statute in prescribing the time within which they shall be brought.

In the case of a bill of review for new matter recently discovered, no laches or neglect can, we think, be properly imputed to the party filing the bill. It is allowed only on the ground of his ignorance of the existence of the new matter before the former decree; and it is incumbent on him to file his bill in a reasonable time after the discovery is made; all this is alleged in the present bill. The bill could not be filed within one year after the decree, because the new matter had not then come to light, but was subsequently discovered. If, then, laches or neglect are not imputable, has so great a time intervened that it may justly be denominated a stale demand? Two years and four months can scarcely be considered in that light. It would not bar an action of assumpsit upon a parol contract, and cannot be considered an unreasonable delay in bringing a bill of review. In England, twenty years is allowed; and in the case decided in 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 146, before cited, five years was allowed.

We do not think that, to a bill of review for new matter, no lapse of time ought to bar the remedy. Upon the principle of repose, we think the lapse of a reasonable time ought to present a bar; what that reasonable time should be considered, and it is well settled to be in the second discretion of the chancellor, it is unnecessary for us to decide, since we are clearly of opinion that two years and four months is not an unreasonable time for filing a bill of review. Whether the principle settled by the supreme court of the United States, in several cases, that laches are not imputable to the government, ought to apply in this case, we need not decide. The second inquiry which arises in this case, and which has been ably argued at the bar, is, whether a case is made out for a bill of review according to the established principles of equity.

The material allegations in the bill have already been stated, by which it appears that the main and principal ground relied upon for a review, is the discovery of new matter since the making the former decree. The only allegation we deem material to notice is, that the original petition, or requite and order of survey on which the decree was based, is forged and corrupt, and was never signed by Miro, governor of Louisiana; and that this fact has come to the knowledge of the district attorney of the United States since the rendition of the decree, asked to be reviewed; and that he has, since the said decree, discovered new and important record evidence, which was not within his control, the existence of which he did not know, and had not time to procure, at the hearing of the cause.

The objections urged by the counsel for the defendants are, that this is a matter which was put in issue by the pleadings in this case before the former decree was pronounced and recorded; and having been once put in issue, a bill of review will not lie for the discovery of evidence relating to the matter put in issue previous to the decree; that a bill of review will lie only for error apparent in the decree, or for new matter subsequently discovered, which was not in issue between the parties. Let us examine this position. The ordinances of Lord Chancellor Bacon respecting bills of review, are generally referred to as good authority, and have never been departed from. 3 Atk. 26. The doctrine is there asserted that no bill of review shall be admitted except it contain either error in law, appearing in the body of the decree, or some new matter which has arisen after the decree, and not any new proof that has come to light after the decree was made; nevertheless, upon new proof that has come to light after the decree was made, which could not possibly have been used at the time when the decree passed, a bill of review may be granted.

According to the doctrine of the above ordinance, the present bill makes out a good case for a bill of review. New proof, important and material, none could be more so, is alleged to have come to light since the making and recording of the former decree, which could not possibly have been used at the hearing, because it was not known by the district attorney to have existence. This new proof is, that the title papers of the defendant are fraudulent and forged. But this fact is said to have been before put in issue. Admit it, for the sake of argument. What is the doctrine asserted by Chancellor Eldon in the case of Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 348. The ground of a bill of review, the chancellor says, is error apparent on the face of the decree, or of new evidence of a fact material pressing upon the decree, and discovered after publication in the cause. Again, he says: "As far as I can ascertain what the court permits with regard to bills of review upon facts newly discovered, the decisions appear to be on new evidence, which, if produced in time, would have supported the original case, and are not applicable where the original cause does not admit of the introduction of the evidence; as not being put in issue originally." The doctrine is to be found in Coop. Pl. 91. The author asserts "that it must be on new matter to prove what was before in issue, for a party cannot be entitled to a bill of review on new matter to prove a title which was not in issue." For this position he cites Cary, 82; Amb. 293. If these authorities are to be relied upon, they prove conclusively, that in the present bill, a good cause is made out for a review. We are ready to admit, that in the two cases decided by the court of appeals of Kentucky, reported in Hardin's Reports, 342 and 454, a different doctrine seems to be established. But the rule as laid down by Chancellor Eldon, accords better with our views of what the rule ought to be, and accordingly we adopt it as intrinsically correct. But, admitting that the new matter must relate to something not before put in issue by the parties, still we think a case is made out for a bill of review.

It is certainly true that the district attorney, in his answer, denied all the allegations in the petition, and required the petitioner to produce proof of them; but, at the same time that he denied them, he stated that he was wholly uninformed as to their truth. It is like the answer of a guardian, denying the allegations of a bill on the ground of ignorance, whether they are true or false; and such answer has been held insufficient to dissolve an injunction. Apthorpe v. Comstock, 1 Hop. Ch. 143; Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202. By this general denial of the title of the petitioner, no special fact in relation to that title was put in issue. The district attorney made no allegation that the title papers of the petitioner were fraudulent or forged. He could not make such an averment at the time he filed his answer, because he was wholly uninformed as to the authenticity of those papers, and, on that ground, required that they might be proved.

There was no controversy as to the fact whether those papers were genuine or forged; no conflicting testimony was introduced, and all the proof adduced before the court was by the petitioner. This surely cannot be such a putting in issue of the fact of forgery or not, as to preclude a reëxamination of that matter, when subsequently discovered. We suppose the judges of the court of appeals of Kentucky mean to say, that after certain material matters of fact have been put in issue, and evidence adduced by each party to that issue, and a decree rendered, a bill of review will not lie merely upon the discovery of additional testimony to the same point, unless that evidence consists of records, in which event they admit that a bill of review will lie. According, then, to the principles settled in Kentucky, a case is made out for a bill of review; for the present bill contains the allegations that important record evidence has been discovered conducing to prove that the title papers of the petitioner are false, fraudulent, and forged. The court of appeals of Kentucky, in the case of Respass v. McClanahan, Hardin, 346, say: "There is an important difference between the discovery of a matter of fact itself, which, though it existed at the former hearing, was not then known by the party to exist, or which was not alleged or put in issue by either party, and the discovery of new witnesses or proof of a matter or fact which was then known or in issue. In the former cause, the party not knowing the fact, and it not being particularly in issue, there was nothing to put him on the search, either of the fact or the evidence of the fact, and therefore the presumption is in his favor, that, as the matter made for him, his failure to show the matter was not owing to his negligence or fault. They further say, after the most careful search, they cannot find one case reported in which a bill of review has been allowed on the discovery of new witnesses to prove a fact which had been before in issue, although there are many where bills of review have been sustained on the discovery of records or other writings relating to the title which was generally put in issue."

It cannot be affirmed that the forgery of the title papers of the petition was particularly put in issue by the former pleadings. The title only was generally put in issue, and, according to the authority just quoted, as record evidence in relation to that title is alleged to have been discovered, a clear case is made out for a bill of review.

If, then, this court possesses the jurisdiction to entertain a bill of review in the case now before the court, and a case is made out by the bill, according to the principles of equity, the next inquiry is, does the evidence adduced call upon the court to pronounce a decree of reversal? What is the evidence? First, the defendant, Samperyac, the original petitioner in whose favor the former decree was rendered, has failed to answer this bill, and, under a rule of this court, an order of publication was duly published in the Arkansas Gazette; and at the October term, 1830, of this court, the bill was taken for confessed as to the said defendant. The inquiry arises as to the effect of taking the bill for confessed. The doctrine is well settled, that when the allegations of a bill are distinct and positive, and the bill is taken for confessed, such allegations are taken as true without proof. That a decree pro confesso is like a judgment by nil dicit at common law. Williams v. Corwin, 1 Hopk. Ch. 471; 3 Atk. 468. In the case of Hawkins v. Crook, 2 P. Wms. 556, the bill alleged a decree to have been obtained by fraud. The decree assumes that the order to take a bill pro confesso admitted the facts charged as fraudulent, and the court plainly took them to amount to fraud, and without further proof, decreed the appropriate relief. The authorities clearly establish this principle, that if the allegations are of a nature so distinct and positive, that, taking them to be true, the court can make a decree upon them, it will, upon the order pro confesso, decree without proof. Where they are in their nature so defective or vague that a precise decree cannot be made upon them, proof must be adduced from the necessity of the case. No rule can be better founded in reason and propriety.

A refusal to deny where the party is legally bound to speak, is equal to an admission of the charges made against him. What is admitted, need not be proved. The allegations are incontrovertibly established, when confessed by him against whom they are made. This is the doctrine applicable to original bills; and we have, in our researches, been able to find no case where the doctrine has been applied to bills of review. Perhaps it may be because no such case exists, and that this is the first where a bill of review has ever been taken pro confesso. But the principle applies with equal force and propriety to the latter as to the former. The allegations of this bill are, that the title papers are forged and spurious, and that the witness who proved them committed perjury. These allegations, when admitted, destroy the evidence upon which the former decree was based, are distinct and positive in their nature, and justify a decree without additional proof. But admitting that the doctrine applicable to original bills, in relation to the effect of taking a bill pro confesso, ought not to be applicable to bills of review, still we are of opinion that the evidence adduced in this case is full and conclusive to prove that the title papers upon which the former decree was based are forged, fraudulent, and spurious.

Let us advert to the evidence: Hilary B. Cenas, register of the land-office at New Orleans, states, in his deposition, that he has instituted a careful search among the Spanish records under his charge, particularly in a book entitled "Register de los Primeros Decretos de Concesion"; in which book it was customary to enter any order of survey, as it was first made, from the year 1786 up to 1799, inclusive, and could not find any order of survey of lands in favor of, or granted to, Celestine Armon in the district of Arkansas. He further says that he has examined the form of orders of survey, as sworn to by Judge Tessier and Jean Mercier, the register of mortgages in New Orleans, and found it to correspond with the orders of survey of record in his office; that he has compared the signatures affixed to orders of survey, upon which Messrs. Tessier and Mercier have given their depositions in the cases of the United States against the persons named in said depositions, and that he verily believes that they are false and counterfeit. By consent of parties, this deposition was read in this case, to prove the same facts in relation to the order of survey in favor of Samperyac. Isaac T. Preston, late register of the land-office at New Orleans, asserts that he has examined the papers annexed to the depositions of Jean Mercier and Charles Tessier, in the cases in which they have given their depositions before the Honorable Gillen Preval, purporting to be Spanish orders of survey. The signatures are not in the handwriting of Governor Miro or Gayoso, as they purport to be. Deponent is well acquainted with the signatures of those governors, having seen their genuine signatures to many different records. Deponent further says, that said papers are not in the form in which Spanish orders of survey were given, but that the form annexed to the depositions of Mr. Tessier and Mr. Mercier, were adopted in all orders of survey, except when the nature of the place to be surveyed required a different form. He further states, that he has seen the deposition of Hilary B. Cenas, register of the land-office at New Orleans; and that deponent, when register of the same office, made a similar search with the same result. Charles Tessier deposes that he was a clerk in the office of the late Spanish government, from the commencement of the year 1790 to the end of the year 1802; that he was acquainted with the handwriting of Governors Miros and Manuel Gayoso De Lemos, from seeing them write frequently; and says, positively, that the signature of Miro presented to him, and appended to the order of survey in this case, and which has been signed by me, nevariator is not in the handwriting of said Governor Miro; that the decree or order of survey is not in the form used and prescribed in such case, nor is it recorded, as was the usual practice, in granting lands by the governor; that the practice was to insert at the foot of the said order, the word "Reg'd," with the flourish of the recording clerk; further, that the spelling of the said decree is not according to the rules of Spanish orthography, and that the clerks, whose duty it was to write such orders, were all good Spanish scholars, and would not have been permitted to use such spelling in any official business; that the handwriting of the aforesaid order of survey is not that of any of the clerks that were, at that time, employed in that department of the government, the deponent being well acquainted with the handwriting of all the clerks who wrote in the office during the time he was in the employ of the government, and he is also acquainted with the handwriting of those that preceded him for many years. This witness further states, that he has no recollection of John B. Hebrard, Harea Devere, and Lemuel Masters, and is positive that these men were not familiar in the office of the Spanish government, and never known or seen in that office; that he does not know the handwriting of the order of survey in this case; that it is not in the handwriting of any of the clerks that ever were employed in the office of the Spanish government then existing.

Jean Mercier, a clerk in the office of the late Spanish government in Louisiana, from 1792 to 1801, deposes to the same facts, in all respects, testified to by Charles Tessier, and which it is unnecessary to repeat.

Antoine Cruzat, Sen., deposeth, that he was employed as an officer of the regiment of Louisiana, in the office of Governor Manuel Gayoso De Lemos, all the time he was governor of Louisiana under the Spanish government. That he had frequent opportunities to see and examine the signature of Governor Miro, and to see him also sign his name. He further says that he is well acquainted with the handwriting and signature of all the clerks of the office of the said governors; and that he had no hesitation in saying, that the signatures of Miro and Gayoso, appended to the orders of survey in which Charles Tessier and Jean Mercier have given their depositions before Judge Preval, pursuant to several commissions from the superior court of the territory of Arkansas, are not genuine, as well as the handwriting of the orders of survey. That the spelling of said orders of survey is incorrect, and that no clerk would have been permitted to use it; that the form of the orders of survey, as given by Mr. Mercier and Mr. Tessier, is the only true and correct one; that he has never known any men by the name of John B. Hebrard, David Devere, and Lemuel Masters; and that he is confident they have never been seen in the office of Governors Miro and Manuel Gayoso De Lemos, at New Orleans.

The deposition of Martin Durald, late register of mortgages in New Orleans, taken in a similar case to the one now before the court, in which the United States is plaintiff, and Martin Durald defendant, has been read as evidence in this case, by consent of parties. He deposes that he was born in Louisiana, and has never had any grant nor any order of survey for any land in the territory of Arkansas; that his father was of the same name with himself, and that, to the best of his knowledge, his father has never had any land in the territory of Arkansas; that he is well acquainted with all the names of the French and Spanish inhabitants of Louisiana, as having kept a public office in New Orleans; and that he knows no person, except his father and himself, of the name of Martin Durald; that he had a brother by the name of Joseph V. Durald, and that, to the best of his knowledge, his said brother never had any land in the territory of Arkansas.

From the testimony, it is manifest that the order of survey in this case is not to be found recorded in the record book at New Orleans, in which it was usual and customary to record any order of survey made from 1786 to 1799. The same fact is also proved in relation to every case amounting to upwards of one hundred, now pending before this court, upon bills of review.

Tessier, Mercier, Preston, and Cenas, all depose to this fact; Tessier, Mercier, Cruzat, all of them well acquainted with the handwriting of Governor Miro, and having frequently seen him write, swear that the name of Miro, signed to the order of survey in this case, is not in his handwriting, and therefore not genuine. Cenas, the present register, and Preston, the late register of the land-office at New Orleans, both swear that they have seen many genuine signatures of Governor Miro; and from the comparison with the present order of survey, the signature is not in the handwriting of Governor Miro. Tessier, Mercier, and Cruzat, depose that they are well acquainted with the handwriting of all the clerks who wrote in the Spanish governor's office, at New Orleans, and that the order of survey in this case, is not in the handwriting of any clerk who ever wrote in the said office, and that the form of the order of survey in this case, is not in the form used by the Spanish government; Cenas and Preston also swear to this latter fact; Tessier and Mercier swear that Hebrard was never seen in the governor's office, at New Orleans.

The fact that the name of Samperyac, the original petitioner and defendant to this bill, is signed in a good handwriting to the petition to the governor for a grant, and that his mark is used in the deed of transfer to John J. Bowie, is also in proof.

It is further in proof, that the defendant, Samperyac, has never made his personal appearance in this court, nor has one of the original claimants, amounting to one hundred and seventeen, ever appeared here, except by John J. Bowie, their agent, and the counsel employed by him; and the counsel admit that they have never seen one of the original claimants in whose favor the former decrees of this court were made. The evidence upon which the former decree was made, is the deposition of John B. Hebrard. In deciding upon this testimony, we think there is no rational ground to doubt, we are entirely satisfied, and believe it to be abundantly manifest, that the order of survey, upon which the former decree was made, is fraudulent, forged, and counterfeit; and that Samperyac himself is an ideal, fictitious being, and never had an existence except in name. The fact that Samperyac, nor any of the other claimants have ever appeared here, or been seen by their counsel employed for them; that no one of them has filed an answer in these bills of review; that their title papers upon which the former decrees of this court rested, are not to be found of record where such papers were generally and usually recorded; that their title papers are not in the form used at the time, by the Spanish government, in making concessions of land; that they are misspelt, and above all, that they have been proven by the testimony of three or four witnesses, who stand above suspicion, having the best opportunity of being well informed, to be counterfeit, forged, and spurious, speak a language not to be misunderstood, and calculated to produce the strongest conviction, that the order of survey, on which the former decree is based, is a forged and spurious paper, and, consequently, that the former decree of this court ought to be reversed, unless there is some other circumstance in the case to prevent it. There is, however, another defendant in this case, besides the original petitioner. Joseph Stewart, at a former term, appeared, and, on his motion, was admitted a defendant to this bill of review, and has filed his answer. In it he alleges that he is an innocent purchaser, without notice, for a valuable consideration, of the land decreed by a former decree of this court; that he purchased from John J. Bowie, who, he alleges, purchased from Samperyac, the original petitioner, and exhibited the deeds of transfer or assignment. He denies all the allegations in this bill, of fraud, forgery, and perjury, but admits his entire ignorance of these matters, and prays that his interest may be protected by this court.

The question arises, what effect is this answer entitled to have in the decision of this cause? The defendant Stewart, in our judgment, does not occupy the attitude of an innocent purchaser without notice, so as to stand on any higher ground than the defendant Samperyac himself. The interest which he has purchased in the land decreed by this court, is an equitable and not a legal right.

It is well settled, that a judgment or decree is not assignable at law, so as to vest a legal title in the assignee. The act of congress of 1824 does not authorize the assignment or transfer of the decree of this court; and, under that act, the land decreed to the claimant could be entered or located only in his name, or in the name of his legal representatives, in case of his death, and the patent could issue only to the claimant or his legal representatives, not to his assignees. Stewart, then, can only be considered as the purchaser of an equity; and it is an established principle, that a purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, in order to protect himself, must be clothed with the legal title, and not a mere equity. 2 Brown, Ch. 66; 2 Madd. 258; 1 Atk. 571; 3 Atk. 377. The defendant Stewart, having only an equitable title under the former decree of this court, takes it subject to all equity which attached to it in the hands of his assignor. It cannot be asserted that Stewart is a purchaser under the former decree of this court. This can be true only when there has been a judicial sale, in which case the purchaser is protected, though the judgment or decree is erroneous. Upon this ground, alone, we think it is obvious that the defendant Stewart stands on no other or different ground than the original petitioner, in whose favor the former decree was made. 2d. If, however, we are mistaken in this position, still we think the defendant Stewart is not entitled to be protected as an innocent purchaser without notice, on the ground that the transfer from Samperyac to John J. Bowie is a forgery. The evidence establishing this fact will be briefly detailed. The transfer or deed from Samperyac to John J. Bowie, of the land decreed by the former decree of this court, now claimed by Stewart, bears date on the 14th day of February, 1828, and is attested by Henry Hobbs and John Cook, and proved by the said Cook before John Williams, as justice of the peace in Clark county in this territory. By consent of parties, about sixty-six deeds of transfer from the original claimants, in whose favor this court have made decrees, all of which are now pending in this court upon bills of review, and are similarly situated with the case now under consideration, have been filed as evidence in this cause.

Twenty-four of those transfers, from the original claimants, are made to John J. Bowie, attested by John Cook and another name. The first of these transfers bears date on the 29th day of December, 1827, in a few days after the decree was entered of record. The second bears date on the 18th January, 1829; the third on the 19th; the fourth on the 21st; the fifth on the 24th of the same month and year. The sixth bears date on the fourth February, 1828; the seventh on the 6th; the eighth on the 8th; the ninth and tenth on the 9th; the eleventh on the 10th; the twelfth and thirteenth on the 11th; the fourteenth on the 12th; the fifteenth on the 13th; the sixteenth on the 20th; the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth on the 21st; the twentieth on the 22d; the twenty-first on the 23d; the twenty-second on the 28th; the twenty-third and twenty-fourth on the 29th February, 1828. These twenty-four transfers, one of which is the transfer in this case, purport to have been executed by the original claimants, in whose favor the decrees of this court were made to John J. Bowie, are all attested by John Cook and another, and certified by John Williams, a justice of the peace in this territory, to have been proved before him by John Cook, the subscribing witness.

How does it happen that this witness, John Cook, should have been present to witness the execution of twenty-four deeds from different persons to John J. Bowie, and most of them on different days? Could it have been necessary that Bowie should have employed this Mr. Cook to travel round with him to become a witness to their execution? Could Bowie have procured witnesses residing near these claimants to attest their deeds or transfer to himself? How does it happen Bowie is so fortunate as to find these original claimants so soon after the decree of the court was made? One of them he found in a few days after the decree, in a shorter time than would be required to travel beyond the limits of the territory. Having been fortunate in the commencement, his good fortune never seems to desert him until he obtains all the transfers. On the 4th February he finds one of them; one of them on the 6th; he is equally fortunate on the 8th; on the 9th he finds two, and on the 11th his efforts are still crowned with greater success, he finds three; on the 23d of the same month he finds three others; and by the 29th February, he discovers all of them. Thus it would seem that these original claimants, not one of whom can now be found to answer these bills of review, these men whom the counsel employed by John J. Bowie to advocate their rights, never saw; not one of whom are proven to be living, or that they ever did exist. These are the men whom John J. Bowie finds residing so near each other, that he could obtain the deeds of three of them in one day, and find all of them in little more than one month after the decrees. If, however, we could believe all this, is it not passing strange that Mr. Cook, whom nobody knows, should have happened to be present at all these various times and places ready to attest these transfers from the original claimants to John J. Bowie? Unless we indulge the presumption, that Bowie employed this Mr. Cook to go along with him to attest these deeds, for which we can see no reasonable motive, we are unable to account for his presence whenever wanted or called for by Bowie. Bowie must have had a talisman, possessed of the magical power of Aladdin's lamp, by which he calls up, at his bidding, this omnipresent witness. We have no doubt that this witness, like the genius in the Arabian tales, having performed the office for which he was invoked, has vanished into air, and disappeared for ever. In addition to these twenty-four deeds of transfer, thirty other deeds of transfer or assignment from the original claimants to John J. Bowie and other persons, are by consent exhibited as evidence in this cause; all these deeds are attested by Lemuel Masters and other names, and certified by J. Williams, a notary-public in Louisiana, to have been proved before him by Lemuel Masters on the 29th day of February, 1828. The two first bear date on the 10th January, 1828; the third and fourth bear date on the 20th; the fifth and sixth on the 21st; the seventh on the 24th; the eighth on the 25th; the ninth and tenth on the 26th; the eleventh on the 27th; the twelfth on the 28th; the thirteenth and fourteenth on the 29th January, 1828; the fifteenth and sixteenth bear date on the 2d day of February, 1828; the seventeenth on the 9th; four more on the 10th; one on the 11th; one on the 13th; one on the 21st; two on the 22d; one on the 25th; one on the 26th; one on the 27th, and the remaining three on the 28th February, 1828. Lemuel Masters, the witness who proves these deeds, is not an ideal being, but is one of the three witnesses who proves the original claims, and on whose evidence the former decrees of this court were made. This circumstance adds nothing to his credit. Why should one of these witnesses to the original claims, brought here by John J. Bowie, which fact is known to this court, he being the only person who appeared here as agent of the claimants, have been selected to travel round and attest the deeds of transfer from these claimants? All the remarks made in relation to the twenty-four transfers apply with equal force to the thirty just named. Can it be believed that Lemuel Masters could find eighteen of these original claimants in one month, and four of them in one day? If they resided so near each other, why have not one of them answered these bills? Why has no deposition been taken to prove that any one of them ever had an existence? Why, in short, has not John J. Bowie himself, answered these bills in the character of an innocent purchaser?

The defendant Stewart claims through him, and the answer of Bowie might be received upon the same ground. This circumstance is pregnant with proof that these transfers are fraudulent and base forgeries, and that the original claimants never existed except in name. There is another peculiarity about these transfers calculated to throw discredit upon them. It is this: in thirteen of these deeds, it is manifest, from an inspection, that the name of one of the witnesses thereto is written in the same handwriting with the body of the deed, and in the same ink. It is not usual or common for a witness to a deed to be called on to write the deed itself; and as the witness is never after heard of, the presumption is very strong that he, too, lives only in name. There are also twelve other deeds of transfer filed by consent, as evidence in this cause. We will not waste our time in remarking upon them. To pursue the subject further, would be worse than useless. In investigating frauds like these, the mind sickens and the feelings revolt. From a review of all the evidence in this case, we entertain no doubt that the transfer in this case, which purports to have been made from Bernardo Samperyac to John J. Bowie, is false and forged; and, consequently, upon that ground also, the defendant Stewart cannot be permitted to occupy the attitude of an innocent purchaser, fairly and bona fide, from Bowie. But his recourse is upon Bowie, of whom he purchased; and he cannot stand upon other and different ground than Bowie himself. The act of congress of the 26th May, 1824, from which this court derives its authority to decide in these cases, has been continued in force by several subsequent acts, the last of which was passed on the 8th May, 1830. That act has expressly given the power to this court to entertain bills of review in these cases, and to reverse the former decrees of this court, if, upon a revision, it shall appear that these decrees were based upon forged title papers.

From the view we have taken of this case, it has not become necessary for us to consider the question made, and ably argued at the bar, whether congress have not, in the act of 1830, transcended the limits of sound legislation; and we withhold the expression of an opinion upon it, as we are satisfied that the act of 1824 referred the decision of these cases to this court, sitting as a court of chancery; and that, under the system of equity by which this court is governed, a power exists to entertain a bill of review in the present case.

BATES, J. I dissent from the opinion of the court, as delivered in this cause. I part with my associates on the threshold, on the point of jurisdiction; and, therefore, in the brief opinion which I shall give for the grounds of my disagreement, I shall not find it necessary, or even proper, to touch the other points which have been raised and so ingeniously and elaborately argued. Obsta principiis, is a maxim dear to the lovers of sound government. I shall endeavor on this, as on all other occasions, to manifest my appreciation of its value. By the treaty negotiated by the United States, in 1803, with the French republic, for the acquisition of Louisiana, our government became bound, in good faith, to perfect certain obligations which the previous governments, Spanish and French, had contracted with their citizens or subjects. But this treaty guarantee had no stipulation as to mode, and the government does not recognize in the citizen a right to sue without its consent. This consent was given by the act of congress of May, 1824. Tribunals were created in the state of Missouri and territory of Arkansas to adjudicate claims to land founded on French and Spanish grants, of which tribunals this is one; a special and extraordinary tribunal, created by the law referred to. Under this law, and before this tribunal, the claimant instituted his suit, which, at its maturity, ripened to a decree in his favor.

The bill of review has been instituted to annul and reverse the decree, on the ground that the grant is a forgery, and the claimant a supposititious character. It is foreign to my purpose to inquire into the well-foundedness of these allegations, for, whatever the decision, in the view I take of the subject, it could lead to no practical result. I assume it as a postulate not to be questioned, that the government going into the courts, is to be tried only by the same rules, and have the same measure of justice meted out to it, that the law secures to ordinary parties litigant. The law of 1824 gave to the party against whom the final decree of this court should be given the right of appeal within one year from the time of its rendition. The appeal not applied for, the decree became final and conclusive. More than a year had elapsed before the filing of the bill of review in this case. I will not moot the point, whether a bill of review would lie at all: it is rendered more than superfluous from the obvious fact, that no revision of the decree, of any kind, was sought for within the year. But it is said that the congressional legislation of May, 1830, puts this question at rest, cures all defects, gives jurisdiction,—gives it, too, to defeat rights and destroy vested interests growing out of, and based on, a former act of congress. Such, it is true, is the import of the language of the law; but is it so? Can it be that the federal legislature has the constitutional competency so to do? We could expect to find such a doctrine prevailing only in the worst days of the most tyrannical governments. It is a language that Sejanus may have whispered to Tiberius. It is a language that may hold at this day in the meridian of Constantinople and St. Petersburg, where the mandate of the sultan, or the ukase of the emperor, supersedes reason, subverts right, and abrogates law. It is a language repudiated even in constitutional monarchies; and it is a language which, if received here as orthodox, goes convincingly to prove that the liberty, of which we have so proudly boasted, has an existence rather in name than in essence. Yet, highly objectionable as I deem this law, I couple with that objection no ascription of motives. It was probably a work of much haste,—the principles it involves not pushed to their conclusions, and not seen in their practical results. I think I heard in argument that the principles of this act might be inoperative when sought to be brought to bear on the property and rights of the citizens of the states, but that congress had unlimited and illimitable power over the territories. This proposition scarcely requires the show of refutation; it is incompatible with the genius of our government, and is, as it regards this territory, palpably in violation of treaty stipulations. I cannot resist the conclusion that we have not cognizance of this case, and that the bill of review should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Decree reversed and annulled.

NOTE. From the decree in the foregoing case, the defendants appealed to the supreme court of the United States, and the case was argued at the January term, 1833, by Mr. Prentiss and Mr. White, for the appellants, and by Mr. Taney, attorney-general, and Mr. Fulton, for the United States, and will be found fully reported in 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 222. At the same term, after stating the facts and pleadings, Mr. Justice Thompson delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:—

The objections which have been taken at the bar to this decree, may be considered under the following points:—(1) Whether, under the act of 1824, the court had authority to entertain the bill of review; and if not, then, (2) whether the act of 1830 is a constitutional law, and confers such authority. (3) Whether the proceedings on this bill of review can be sustained under the act of 1830. (4) Whether, admitting Stewart to be a bona fide purchaser of the claim of Samperyac, he is protected against the title set up by the United States.

1. We think it unnecessary to go into an examination of the questions which have been made under the first point. Although the act of 1824 directs, that every petition which shall be presented under its provisions shall be conducted according to the rules of a court of equity, it may admit of doubt whether all the powers of a court of chancery, in relation to bills of review, are vested in that court. And as the view taken by this court upon the other points renders a decision upon this unnecessary, we pass it over without expressing any opinion upon it.

2. The ground, upon which it has been argued that the act of 1830 is unconstitutional, is, that a right had become vested in Stewart before the act was passed; and that the effect and operation of the law is to deprive him of a vested right. To determine the force and application of this objection, it becomes necessary to look at the claim as it now appears before the court. It is found, by the decree of the court below, and is admitted at the bar, that Samperyac is a fictitious person. That the petition, purporting to have been presented by him to Miro, governor of the province of Louisiana, and the order of survey, alleged to have been made thereupon, are forgeries. These are the only evidence of title upon which the original claim rests. And it is proved and admitted that the deed, purporting to have been given by Samperyac to Bowie, under whom Stewart claims, is also a forgery. The bill or petition filed in the original cause, alleges that the claim is secured by the treaty between the United States and the French republic, of the 30th April, 1803. This, however, has not been insisted upon on the argument here; and there is certainly no color for pretending that a claim, founded in fraud and forgery, is sanctioned by the treaty. The title to the land in question passed by the treaty, and became vested in the United States; and there has been no act, on the part of the United States, by which they have parted with the title. It is contended, however, that this right of title has been taken away by the original decree in this case, under the act of 1824. By the fourteenth section of that act, all its provisions are extended to the territory of Arkansas; and it is declared that the superior court of that territory shall have, hold, and exercise jurisdiction in all cases, in the same manner, and under the same restrictions and regulations in all respects, as is given by the said act to the district court of the state of Missouri. And by the second section of the act, it is declared that in all cases the party, against whom the judgment or decree of the court may be finally given, shall be entitled to appeal within one year from its rendition, to the supreme court of the United States, the decision of which court shall be final and conclusive between the parties; and should no appeal be taken, the judgment or decree of the district court shall in like manner be final and conclusive. No appeal was taken within the year; and the question is, whether the United States, by neglecting to appeal, have lost their right, and if not, whether the remedy provided by the act of 1830, to assert that right, is in violation of the constitution.

If Samperyac was a real person, and appeared here setting up this objection, it might present a different question, although it is not admitted, even in that case, that the United States would be concluded as to the right. But the original decree in this case was a mere nullity; it gave no right to any one. The title still remained in the United States, and the most that can be said, is, that by omitting to appeal within the time limited by the act, the remedy thereby provided was gone, and the decree became final and conclusive with respect to such remedy.

But the act of 1830 provides a new remedy; and it may be added that the act of 1804 declares the decree to be final and conclusive between the parties. And as Samperyac was a fictitious person, he was no party to the decree, and the act, in strictness, does not apply to the case. But, considering the act of 1830 as providing a remedy only, it is entirely unexceptionable. It has been repeatedly decided in this court, that the retrospective operation of such a law forms no objection to it. Almost every law, providing a new remedy, affects and operates upon causes of action existing at the time the law is passed. The law of 1830 is in no respect the exercise of judicial powers. It only organizes a tribunal with powers to entertain judicial proceedings. When the original decree was entered, there was no person in existence whose claim could be ripened into a right against the United States by omitting to appeal; Stewart was not only no party to the decree, but his purchase from Bowie was nearly a year after the decree was entered.

Had Samperyac been a real person, having a decree in his favor, and Stewart had afterwards purchased of Bowie the right which that decree established, it might have given him some equitable claim; but it would have been subject to all prior equitable, as well as legal rights. Nor would it be available in any respect in the present case, for Stewart, in no manner whatever, connects himself with Samperyac. As it is admitted that the deed purporting to have been given by Samperyac to Bowie is a forgery, Stewart is therefore a mere stranger to this decree, and can derive no benefit from it. It is said, that if this bill of review was filed under the act of 1830, the court had no jurisdiction, the bill having been filed in April, and the law not passed until the May following. But the act, in terms, applies to bills filed or to be filed, and of course cures this defect, if any existed. Such retrospection is no unusual course in laws providing new remedies.

The act of 1803, amending the judicial system of the United States (3 Bior. & D. Laws, 560 [2 Stat. 244]), declares, that from all final judgments, or decrees, rendered or to be rendered, in any circuit court, &c., an appeal shall be allowed to the supreme court, &c. It therefore forms no objection to the law, that the cause of action existed antecedent to its passage; so far as it applies to the remedy, and does not affect the right.

3. But it is objected, in the next place, that this bill of review cannot be sustained under the act of 1830; that it was not filed and prosecuted under limitations and restrictions, and according to the course and practice of a court of chancery in such a proceeding. We think it unnecessary to examine, whether all the technical rules required in the ordinary course of chancery proceedings, on a bill of review, have been pursued in the present case. The act, clearly, does not require it. It authorizes bills of review to be filed on the part of the United States, for the purpose of revising all or any of the decrees of the said court, in cases wherein it shall appear to the said court, or be alleged in such bills of review, that the jurisdiction of the same was assumed, in any case, on any forged warrant, concession, grant, order of survey, or other evidence of title.

If congress had a right to provide a tribunal in which the remedy might be prosecuted, they clearly had a right to prescribe the manner in which it should be pursued. The great and leading object was, to provide for revising the original decree, or granting a new trial. The material allegation required is, that the original decree was founded upon some forged evidence of title; and this is very fully set out in the bill. That it was not the intention of the law, that the court should be confined to the technical rules of a court of chancery, on bills of review, is evident from the provision in the last clause of the first section of the act, which directs the court to proceed on such bills of review, by such rules of practice and regulations as they may adopt, for the execution of the powers vested or confirmed in them by the act.

4. The next inquiry is, whether the appellant, Stewart, has acquired a right to the land, by reason of his standing in the character of a bona fide purchaser. The record contains an admission on the part of the United States, that he purchased the claims of John J. Bowie, by deed, for a valuable consideration, in good faith, some time in November or December, 1828. But this gave him no right to be let in as a party in the bill of review; he was not a party to the original bill, nor could he connect himself with Samperyac, the only party to the bill, he being a fictitious person; and the interest of Stewart, whatever it might be, was acquired long after the original decree was entered. He was, therefore, a perfect stranger to that decree. The deed purporting to have been given by Samperyac to Bowie, is admitted to be a forgery. Bowie, of course, had no interest, legal or equitable, which he could convey to Stewart. But, admitting Stewart to have been properly let in, as a party in the bill of review, the only colorable equity which he showed was the certificate of entry given by the register of the land-office, December 13, 1828; and this certificate, founded on a decree in favor of Samperyac, a fictitious person, obtained by fraud, and upon forged evidence of title.

This certificate is entirely unavailable to Stewart. He can obtain no patent under it if the original decree should remain unreversed; for the act of 1830 forbids any patent thereafter to be issued, except in the name of the original party to the decree, and on proof to the satisfaction of the officers, that the party appying is such original party, or is duly authorized by such original party, or his heirs, to receive such patent. The original party to the decree being a fictitious person, no title would pass under the patent, if issued. It would still remain in the United States. But Stewart acquired no right whatever under the deed from Bowie; the latter having no interest that he could convey. In the case of Polk's Lessee v. Wendall, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 308, it is said by this court, that on general principles, it is incontestable that a grantee can convey no more than he possesses. Hence, those who come in under the holder of a void grant can acquire nothing.

Upon the whole, we think Stewart was improperly admitted to become a party; but considering him a proper party, he has shown no ground upon which he can sustain a right to the land in question.

The decree of the court below is accordingly affirmed, with costs.

[Hoff. Dec. 38.]

District Court, N. D. California. Sept. 5, 1861.

CALIFORNIA LAND GRANTS — CONFIRMATION BY COURT—INJUNCTION AGAINST ISSUANCE OF PATENT.

[One claiming title to a confirmed grant in opposition to the confirmee, but under the same original grantee, is entitled, under the 13th section of the act of 1851 (9 Stat. 633), to enjoin the issuance of a patent to the confirmee, pending a suit in the state court to determine the title as between the two.]

[Petition by Elizabeth Martin for an injunction to restrain the issuance of a patent to the persons to whom the court had previously confirmed the grant of the rancho of Las Animas.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The rancho of Las Animas, which was originally granted to Josefa Romero, and to her children, the widow and heirs of Mariano Castro, was confirmed by this court [Case No. 16,218] to various parties claiming as heirs of José Maria Sanchez, by whom the claim had been originally presented, and who deraigned title, as he alleged, from the original grantees. A petition for an injunction is now presented under the 13th section of the act of 1851, by Elizabeth Martin, who claims title under a conveyance by Carmen Castro, one of the original grantees. The confirmees also claim title under the same person, but the petitioner alleges that at the time of the alleged conveyance to the confirmees, Carmen was the wife of one Soto; that the said Soto neither executed nor had knowledge of the deed, nor did Carmen acknowledge the same on a private examination, apart from her husband, as required by law. It is therefore contended that the subsequent deed by Carmen, under which the petitioner claims, and which was duly executed after her husband's death, conveyed the title to her portion of the rancho, and that the parties holding that title have the right to enjoin the issuing of the patent to the confirmees. The 13th section of the act of 1851, after enacting that, for all lands finally confirmed, etc., a patent shall issue to the claimant, provides that, "if the title of the claimant to such lands shall be disputed by any other person, it shall be lawful for such person to present a petition," etc. It might seem that the language of this provision is sufficiently broad to include every case where the title of the confirmee is contested by "any other person." But it may be doubted whether it was intended by this proviso to permit any person claiming title under an entirely different grant from that confirmed, and who has omitted to present his claim to the board, to come in after the time for presenting his claim has expired, and set up his title as against a confirmee claiming under a grant to another person. The issue between the confirmee and the contestant is to be tried before the ordinary tribunals. If, then, a title derived from an imperfect or inchoate grant never presented to the board can be set up by the contestant as against the confirmed title of the confirmee, the alleged equitable rights of the contestant to a patent from the United States would be, in effect, submitted to the decision of the state courts, instead of the special tribunals vested by the statute with exclusive jurisdiction over the subject.

It has for these and other reasons been generally considered that to entitle the contestant to obtain an injunction he must show a right derived from the original grantee of the land—or, in other words, that the disputed titles which might thus be litigated before the state tribunals were disputed derivative titles, and not conflicting titles under entirely different grants. It must be confessed, however, that there are several dicta by the supreme court which seem to countenance a much broader construction of the statute. U. S. v. White, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 255; Mezes v. Greer [24 How. (65 U. S.) 268.]

But it is contended, that in the case of disputed derivative titles, the contestant can appear only where he has himself presented a separate claim and obtained a separate confirmation. The language of the statute imposed, however, no such condition. "If the title of the claimant to such lands shall be contested by any other person," etc., are the words of the act. That such a condition should not always be imposed is evident. For it may often happen that the confirmee has obtained a confirmation in his own name in fraud of the rights of the true owners. Thus if the alleged heirs of a deceased grantee should obtain a confirmation in their own names, without including their infant brothers and sisters, it would be clearly unjust that the rights of the latter should be lost, when by reason of their tender years they could have had no means and no knowledge of the necessity of presenting separate claim in their own names. So if a guardian, or executor, or any person charged with a trust, either actual or constructive, should obtain a like confirmation in his own name, it is clear that the rights of the cestuis que trustent ought not to be impaired thereby. But to construe the statute as contended for, on the part of the confirmee in this case, would deprive all such parties of any redress. It is urged that the confirmation enures to the benefit of the confirmee, and for this several decisions of the supreme court are cited. The language of those decisions is certainly very broad and explicit. Whether it can be applied to cases arising under California land grants may be doubted, but at all events reason and justice demand that it must be taken subject to the exception of cases of fraud or breaches of trust such as have been mentioned. But even in cases not of this kind the confirmation enures absolutely to the benefit of the confirmee, that fact would seem to afford a reason for the interposition of the judge to stay the patent under the provisions of the 13th section. It may be that congress, aware that all parties would be concluded by the patent, and that the confirmee would thenceforth hold the undisputable title, intended by the 13th section to afford an opportunity for ascertaining whether or not he was the true owner and representative of the original grantee. The investigations of the board, and of the courts, under the act of 1851, in no way extended to an inquiry into the operation and validity of the mesne conveyances through which the claimant claimed title. "The mesne conveyances were also required, but not for any aim of submitting their operation and validity to the board, but simply to enable the board to determine if there was a bona fide claimant before it under a Mexican grant; and so this court having repeatedly declared that the government had no interest in the contests between persons claiming, ex post facto, the grant." Kendricks v. Castro, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 442. On this ground the board and this court steadily refused to allow parties disputing the title of the claimant to intervene in the suit, with a view of showing that they, and not the claimants, were the true representatives of the grantee. The fact, then, that the claim has been confirmed to a particular person, as confirmee, in no way proves that he is the true owner, for an inquiry into that question was not permitted, and there would appear much reason for regarding the 13th section as intended to open the door for the determination before the ordinary tribunals, of those questions of private right, into which, under the law of 1851, the board and the courts did not, and could not, enter.

In the present case the survey has been brought into court, and has not yet been passed upon. The injunction can therefore occasion no delay to the claimant. It is understood to be applied for, in anticipation of the objection that a proceeding of this nature should have been taken, as provided for in the 13th, and that in the absence of it the rights of the confirmee are absolute, and the confirmation enures to his exclusive benefit. It will be for the state tribunals to determine whether the contestant, not having herself presented her claim and obtained a confirmation, can be heard as against the confirmee, and if not, in ordinary cases, whether the fact of having made this application, under the 13th section, and obtained an injunction pending the suit in the state courts, alters, in any respect, her situation.

The question as to the absolute right of the confirmee, as against all persons but those claiming under him, or those who have obtained separate confirmations in their own names, is understood to be now before the supreme court of this state.

On the whole, I think the injunction should be granted.

One other point, however, it is proper to notice. It is urged that this application is manifestly inequitable, for the contestant has by her own admission procured a second conveyance to be made by a party who had already parted with all her rights by a bona fide though informal conveyance. On the other hand it is suggested by very respectable counsel that the contestant has bought up the title in question, with the sole view of attempting thereby to secure her homestead, which it is sought to include in the survey of the rancho of the claimant, and the interest in the latter rancho has been acquired as a precaution in the event that this court may feel obliged to direct the survey of the rancho to be made so as to include the homestead. Whether the homestead should be embraced within the survey of "Las Animas" the court can now form no opinion. It is enough, however, to know that there may exist a state of facts which rendered the acquisition of the title set up by the contestant defensible in morals as in law. It is at all events clear that the prima facie impressions of the court as to the inequitable nature of the transaction afford no solid grounds for withholding an injunction to which the contestant seems to be entitled.

Case No. 16,218.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 133.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

The objection that the boundary of an adjoining rancho is affected by this claim is not tenable, the controversy being between and concluding the United States and the claimants only.

[Claim by the heirs of José Maria Sanchez for the Rancho Las Animas, comprising four leagues of land in Santa Clara county; confirmed by the board, and appeal taken by the United States.]

Thornton & Williams, for appellees.

BY THE COURT. The claim in this case is founded on a title issued by Governor Figueroa to the widow of Mariano Castro. It appears from the voluminous documents contained in the expediente, that Josefa Romero, the widow of Castro, petitioned the governor for a revalidation of the title of her husband, or in case the papers on file did not authorize such a proceeding, then for a new grant to herself. The governor directed a search to be made in the archives for the record of the proceedings relative to the first grant. That record is embodied in a report of the secretary, Negrete, and presented to the governor for his examination. It is unnecessary to recapitulate these documents, or to examine the various reports and records of proceedings before the viceroy of New Spain on Mariano Castro's petition. The governor seems to have been satisfied as to the right of Josefa Romero to have the land which Mariano Castro had occupied for many years confirmed to her. He accordingly issued his decree recognizing the right of the party as ascertained from the archives, and ordered the proper testimonial of her title to the property to be issued to her. In this decree the governor mentions that the rancho of Las Animas has been possessed by Castro and his family for more than twenty years "in public notoriety," and as their right is proved to this tract granted to Castro under the name of "La Brea" by the vice royal government in 1802, he ordered a testimonial to issue for their protection, and inasmuch as the boundaries are not expressly defined in the grant of the viceroy, the parties must confine themselves to those set forth in the petition filed on the part of Rufina Romero, leaving uninjured the rights of any third party who may consider himself aggrieved by the proceedings. The authenticity of all the documents in the case is proved, and the long continued habitation and cultivation of the rancho for nearly half a century by those under whom the appellees claim, leave no doubt as to the validity of the title. It was accordingly unanimously confirmed by the board.

Much testimony has been taken on the part of the claimants of the adjoining rancho of San Ysidro to prove the precise location of the boundaries between that rancho and the rancho of Las Animas. But it has already been determined by this court and the board of commissioners that the rights of third parties cannot be adjudicated in this form, and that the question to be determined in this class of cases is merely the validity of the claim as against the United States. Between the United States and the claimants final decrees in these suits are conclusive, but the act of 1851 [9 Stat. 633] expressly declares that such decrees shall not affect the interests of third persons. All questions between claimants arising out of a conflict of boundaries are by the thirteenth section of that act more appropriately referred, in the first instance, to the surveyor general, but leaving to the parties the right of resorting to the proper judicial tribunals. As the "testimonial" or decree made by the governor mentions the boundaries of the tract of "Las Animas" to be those indicated in the diseño which accompanies the petition, leaving uninjured the right of any third party who may consider himself aggrieved by the proceeding, the rights of such parties would seem to have been intended to be left in the same condition as under patent issued by the United States under the law of 1851. It is clear from the terms of the testimonial that the governor intended to confirm and recognize the rights of the petitioners to the land of which they had long been in possession; and that so far as the government was concerned, he was willing to adopt the boundaries indicated by the petitioners on the diseño. But those boundaries were not intended to be conclusive upon the rights of others, and the reservation made in the decree clearly shows that if, in delineating the boundaries of the tract of which they claimed to be owners, the petitioners had exceeded its true limits or included the lands of others, the rights of such parties were not intended to be prejudiced by the decree of concession.

I think, therefore, that a decree should be entered in this court in conformity with the decree of the governor, and that the title of the claimants should be confirmed to the land according to the boundaries indicated on the diseño, but without prejudice to the rights of any parties who may be injured by such location.

Mr. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Adams & Bliss, for defendant.

WILLSON, District Judge (charging jury). This is an issue, upon a plea of not guilty, to an indictment founded upon the last clause of the 22d section of the act entitled "An act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the post office department," of March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 102]. By this clause of the statute it is provided, "that if any person shall take any letter or packet not containing any article of value or evidence thereof, out of a post office, or shall open any letter or packet which shall have been in a post office, or in custody of a mail carrier, before it shall be delivered to the person to whom it is directed, with design to obstruct the correspondence, to pry into another's business or secrets:—or shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any such mail letter, or packet, such offender, upon conviction," &c. The indictment contains two counts. The first charges that the defendant [John N. Sander], on the 5th day of May, 1855, at Vermilion, &c., did open a letter which had been put into the mail at Coldwater, in the state of Michigan, to be conveyed by post, and directed to Phœbe Sturdevant, Vermilion, Ohio, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, and to pry into another's secrets The second count charges that the "defendant at Vermilion, in the district aforesaid, on the 5th day of May, 1855, did secrete and embezzle a certain letter which had before been in the post office at Vermilion, in said district, before it had been delivered to the person to whom it was addressed and directed, and which letter was then and there directed to Phœbe Sturdevant, at said Vermilion, and which said letter had, before that time, been put into the mail of the United States at Coldwater, in the state of Michigan, and was intended to be conveyed by post to Vermilion aforesaid, and which said letter had before that been conveyed by mail, and was deposited in said post office, at Vermilion, and had not, before the same was so secreted and embezzled by said defendant, been delivered to said Phœbe Sturdevant."

At the commencement of the trial of the cause, the defendant's counsel made a motion to quash the second count of the indictment, for duplicity. The court overruled the motion, with an intimation to counsel, however, that if the court, on reflection, should deem the ruling wrong, they would direct the jury to exclude the testimony, as impertinent to the second count of the indictment.

We are satisfied that the second count is not defective for duplicity. When a statute makes two or more distinct acts, connected with the same transaction, indictable, each one of which may be considered as representing a stage in the same offence, it has been repeatedly held that they may be coupled in one count. Thus, setting up a gaming table, and inducing others to bet upon it, may constitute distinct offences: for either, unconnected with the other, an indictment will lie. Yet, when both are perpetrated by the same person, at the same time, they constitute but one offence, for which one count is sufficient, and for which but one penalty can be inflicted. In describing an offence under this statute, no technical words are necessary. In the case of U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 142, the court say—"The general rule is, that in indictments for misdemeanors created by statute, it is sufficient to charge the offence in the words of the statute. There is not that technical nicety required as to form, which seems to have been adopted and sanctioned by long practice in cases of felony." In the Case of Mills the indictment was substantially, in form, like the second count of this; both charge the secreting and embezzling in one count, and both are founded on the same section of the post office law. The same ruling has been adopted by this court in the case of U. S. v. Lancaster [Case No. 15,556].

But a more serious and grave question is raised by defendant's counsel in requesting the court to charge the jury, "that if they should find the letter in question had been delivered by the post master at Vermilion to the defendant, who was at the time a fully authorized agent of Phœbe Sturdevant, to receive it, that any embezzlement by him thereafter, and before delivery to her, does not constitute an offence under the statute. It is claimed by counsel that a delivery to an authorized agent is a delivery to the principal, and that when this is done the functions of the post office department, and the powers of the federal government, are at an end in the premises.

We believe this position of counsel to be well taken. It is a familiar principle of law, that an act done by an authorized agent, within the scope of his authority, is an act of the principal: "Qui facit per alium facit per se." Hence it is that the delivery of goods by a third person to an agent, and his acceptance of them for his principal, is, in contemplation of law, a delivery to, and acceptance, by the principal. So, payments made by a third person to the agent in the course of his employment, is payment to the principal, and whether actually paid to the principal or not, by the agent, it is conclusive on him. A letter, packet, or other thing valuable, having been committed to the post office department for carriage and delivery, if once parted with by the post master to a person authorized to receive it, from that moment ceases alike to be under the control of the department and the power and authority of the general government. The sanction, by the federal courts, of the contrary doctrine, would be dangerous in its tendency and subversive of reserved state authority. No power is given to congress to legislate upon the subject, except what is incident to, and necessary to carry out, the grant contained in the 8th section of the first article of the constitution. The grant is simply, "that congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads," and while we would not adopt the limited and narrow construction given to this grant by President Monroe, in his special message to congress of 4th May, 1822, yet we would not extend implied powers further than what is necessary to carry out, with safety to the public, the legitimate operations of the post office establishment. When the functions of the department are exhausted by the proper delivery of mail matter (once placed in its charge) such mail matter is then beyond the reach and authority of any legislation of congress. It is for the jury to determine from the testimony, whether the defendant was the authorized agent of Phœbe Sturdevant to take this letter from the post office at Vermilion. If he so received it, without any criminal purpose at the time, you will have done with the case by returning a verdict of not guilty. But on the contrary, if you are satisfied from the testimony, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant at the time he obtained the letter from the post office, did it with the criminal intent of opening it for the purpose of prying into another's business or secrets, then, although he may have had the previous consent of Phœbe Sturdevant to bring her letters from the post office, you will be required, nevertheless, to examine the evidence as to the offence charged in the first count of the indictment; for in that case the offence had its inception at the time of his taking the letter from the office, as that act was, in itself, a larceny.

We do not intend to recapitulate the testimony or comment upon it. We will say, however, that there is in this country a growing unwillingness to rest convictions on confessions alone. Yet it is hardly to be supposed that a man who is innocent, will make statements to different persons, and perform acts at different times, which, taken together, go directly to prove an alleged commission of a crime. When it is a question of intention of the accused, for an alleged violation of law, the jury in no case can have furnished them, by the prosecution, positive proof; when the intent is material, however, it must be shown by the government; and this is to be done by proving overt acts of the defendant from which the intention can be implied, as every man is supposed to intend the necessary consequences of his own acts.

Take the case, gentlemen, and under the rules of law, as given to you by the court, return a verdict according to the evidence.

The jury retired, and after several hours' deliberation came into court and asked to be discharged as there was no possibility of their agreeing upon a verdict. They were accordingly discharged by the court and the case continued.

Case No. 16,220.

UNITED STATES v. SANDERS.

[Hempst. 483.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. April, 1847.

PARENT AND CHILD—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS—WHO ARE INDIANS—MIXTURE OF RACES—PARTUS SEQUITUR VENTREM—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS.

1. The declarations of a father as to the maternity of his child are competent evidence; but the circumstances under which they were made and the weight to be given to them must be left to the jury.

2. The child must partake of the condition of the mother; and if the mother is an Indian, the child will be so considered, for the purposes of the intercourse act of 1834 [4 Stat. 729], whether the father is a white man or an Indian.

[Cited in McKay v. Campbell, Case No. 8,840.]

3. The child of a white woman, by an Indian father, would be deemed of the white race; the condition of the mother, and not the quantum of Indian blood in the veins determining the condition of the offspring.

[Cited in McKay v. Campbell, Case No. 8,840. Disapproved in Ex parte Reynolds, Id. 11,719; U. S. v. Ward, 42 Fed. 322.]

4. The offspring of a free-woman is free, and so on the other hand, the issue of a slave is a slave likewise.

5. The rule partus sequitur ventrem generally obtains in this country.

6. Questions of jurisdiction ordinarily belong to the court as matters of law; but where the jurisdiction depends upon facts to be found by a jury, the latter may, under the direction of the court, as to matter of law, affirm through the medium of a general verdict, that there is or is not jurisdiction.

7. The court has no jurisdiction to punish offences under the intercourse law of 1834 (9 Bior. & D. Laws, 135 [4 Stat. 729]), committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian.

Murder. The defendant [Ellis Sanders], a Cherokee Indian, was indicted for the murder of Billy, a white boy, in the Cherokee country, west of Arkansas, in 1844. The defendant plead not guilty, and on the trial the proof on the part of the prosecution was, that in the latter part of July, 1844, the defendant, without any provocation or excuse, killed Billy by a blow on the head with a large maul, breaking the skull, and of which blow Billy instantly died. It was proved that the deceased was an inoffensive idiot boy, and was reputed to be white. The evidence fully established the fact that it was a wanton and unprovoked murder, and on that point there was no difference of opinion. The prisoner introduced various witnesses, who proved that they knew the father of the deceased, and had frequently heard him say in his lifetime that the mother of this boy was an Indian woman, and on this the prisoner rested his defence. On this point there was some contradictory evidence, but the weight of it was in favor of the position that the mother of the boy was an Indian woman, although it did not appear to what tribe she belonged, or whether she was a full-blooded Indian or not.

E. H. English, for the prisoner, contended that the exception in the intercourse act of 1834 (9 Bior. & D. Laws, 135) applied to this case, and that the evidence sufficiently established the fact that the offence charged in the indictment was committed by one Indian upon the person of another Indian, within the meaning of that exception, and that, consequently, he was not punishable by this court, however enormous the offence, which the counsel was not disposed to palliate.

S. H. Hempstead, Dist. Atty., for the prosecution, in his argument to the jury, insisted that the deceased was a white boy in contemplation of law. The proof was clear that the father was a white man, of the white race, and although the testimony adduced by the prisoner, if believed, favored the idea that the mother was an Indian woman, or had Indian blood in her veins, yet it was not satisfactorily shown, for no one ever saw her,—no one pretended to say to what tribe, if any, she belonged,—whether she was a full blood, half breed, or quarter breed Indian, where she lived, or when she died. Unimpeachable witnesses had sworn that the boy was generally reputed to be white, and this should outweigh the vague testimony for the defence; and that as to the guilt of the prisoner that could not and had not been disputed, for every one saw it was a cold-blooded and shocking murder.

Before DANIEL, Circuit Justice, and JOHNSON, District Judge.

DANIEL, Circuit Justice, charged the jury that it would not be necessary to give any particular direction as to the law of murder, because there was no contest on that point at all, nor had any justification been attempted for the killing of the deceased. If the jury believed the witnesses, who had not indeed been impeached in any way, it was an atrocious and wilful murder. The prisoner did not rest his defence on his innocence, but on the want of jurisdiction in this court to punish him at all. He is charged in the indictment to be a Cherokee Indian, and the deceased to have been a white boy and not an Indian, thus presenting a case, as far as the indictment is concerned, within the jurisdiction of the court. The witnesses for the government, if believed, establish the averment in the indictment, that the defendant is a Cherokee Indian, and also state that the deceased was called and generally reputed to be a white boy, not of any Indian tribe. To rebut this the prisoner introduced witnesses, who have stated that they knew the father of the boy, that he was a white man, lived in the Indian country, and that they had frequently heard him declare that the mother of the deceased was an Indian woman. The declarations of a father as to the maternity of a child are admissible and competent evidence (1 Phil. Ev. 238, 239: 2 Phil. Ev. [Cowen & Hill's notes] notes 463–466, 468); but the circumstances under which they are made, and the weight to be attached to them are matters for the jury to determine.

There has been considerable discussion as to who ought to be considered an Indian within the purview of the proviso of the 25th section of the intercourse law of 1834, which declares, that the laws of the United States, for the punishment of crimes in the Indian country, shall not extend to crimes committed by one Indian against the person or property of another Indian. Gord. Dig. 430. That act does not define an Indian, but uses a general term without embracing or excluding any particular class of persons. On consultation with my brother judge we concur in laying down this rule as the safest: that the child must follow the condition of the mother. If the mother is an Indian woman her offspring must be considered Indians within the meaning of the proviso alluded to, whether the father be a white man or Indian. And so, on the other hand, the child of a white woman by an Indian father, would, for all the purposes of that act, be deemed of the white race; the condition of the mother, and not the quantum of Indian blood in the veins, determining the condition of the offspring. This is substantially following the common law rule, which was borrowed from the civil law. Just. Inst. bk. 1, tit. 4, p. 13. The rule of the civil law was, that one born of a free mother was free, although the father was a slave; and so on the other hand, if the mother was a slave the offspring partook of her condition. Ruth. Inst. 247; Shelton v. Barbour, 2 Wash. (Va.) 67. There can be no doubt that the rule partus sequitur ventrem generally obtains in this country. Hudgins v. Wrights,

1 Hen. & M. 137; Pegram v. Isabell, 2 Hen. & M. 193; Chancellor v. Milton, 1 B. Mon. 25; Esther v. Akins' Heirs, 3 B. Mon. 60.

If the jury believe from the evidence that the mother of the boy Billy was an Indian woman, we are of opinion on the rule just laid down, that her offspring was also an Indian within the meaning of the exception alluded to, and consequently that the court is destitute of authority to punish the prisoner, however guilty he may be, and that the jury ought to return a verdict of not guilty.

Questions of jurisdiction ordinarily belong to and are decided exclusively by the court as pure matters of law; but here it is necessary that certain facts should be passed upon by the jury before that question can properly arise. Where the jurisdiction, however, depends upon the existence of facts, the jury may, under the direction of the court as to matter of law, affirm through the medium of a general verdict that there is or is not jurisdiction.

Verdict not guilty, and prisoner discharged.

Case No. 16,221.

UNITED STATES v. SANDFORD.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1806.

INDICTMENTS—NAME OF PROSECUTOR.

It is no ground for general demurrer to an indictment, for a misdemeanor under the laws of Virginia of 1792 and 1795, that the name of a prosecutor is not written at the foot of the indictment.

[Cited in U. S. v. Helriggle, Case No. 15,344.]

Indictment, for assault and battery. General demurrer, because the name of a prosecutor was not indorsed according to the act of assembly.

E. J. Lee, for the traverser, cited the law of Virginia of November 13, 1792, and read the title of the act to show the intent to prevent vexatious and malicious prosecutions. The 24th section (page 105) requires that "the name and surname of the prosecutor, and the town or county in which he shall reside, with his title or profession shall be written at the foot of every bill of indictment for any trespass or misdemeanor before it be presented to the grand jury." By the 25th section the prosecutor is to answer for costs, and by the 28th section may be compelled to give security for costs. There must be a prosecutor to every indictment for a misdemeanor. The act of 1802 (page 431), by excepting cases where the indictment is sent up by order of court, or found on the knowledge of two of the grand jury, shows this to be the true construction; so also the act of 1795 (page 346), which requires that the names of the grand jurymen upon whose knowledge an indictment is found, and of the witnesses who have been called upon by the court or the grand jury, shall be indorsed on the indictment, declares that they shall not be liable for costs, implying thereby that if not called upon by the court or the grand jury they would be liable for costs. In the cases of U. S. v. Jamesson [Case No. 15,466], and U. S. v. Singleton [Id. 16,293], the objection was taken in arrest of judgment, which was supposed to come too late.

Mr. Jones, for the United States. The law did not mean that misdemeanors could not be prosecuted without a prosecutor. It did not mean to include those of a public nature, such as perjury, conspiracy, forgery, &c., but contemplated only such as result from an injury to a single individual. The construction depends upon the subject-matter upon which the legislature were legislating. The defendant relies upon a negative pregnant, viz., that no indictment shall be sent to the grand jury without a prosecutor. But the true construction is that where there is a prosecutor his name shall be indorsed; but where there is no prosecutor his name cannot be indorsed. The "prosecutor" means a person who prosecutes in the name of the United States, or in the name of the United States and himself. The civil law calls him "delator." The prosecutor is not bound to pay the costs of the United States; he is only liable for the defendant's costs. The only penalty for not giving security for costs is, that the indictment shall be dismissed with costs, that is, costs against the commonwealth. "Prosecutor" means one who shares the penalty. Cowell, in his Interpreter (tit. "Prosecutor"), defines him as one that follows a cause in another's name. He calls them "promoters"—"promotores," who prosecute in their own name and the king's. The oath of a grand juror is, that he shall present things that otherwise come to his knowledge. The practice in Virginia is variable. It has never been settled by the court of appeals. The construction, contended for by the defendant, would submit the whole penal code to the mercy of an individual.

Mr. E. J. Lee, in reply. It does not put the penal code in the power of an individual. It is not necessary that any one should take upon himself the odium of prosecuting. The grand jury or the court may call upon witnesses. The attorney-general, ex officio, may file an information. The court may order a bill of indictment. If the grand jury do not call on the witness, nor the court, nor the attorney-general, and the witness goes voluntarily to the grand jury, the legislature meant that there should be a prosecutor liable for the defendant's costs. As to the 25th section, if the prosecutor fails to give security for costs, the indictment is dismissed with costs against the prosecutor, not against the commonwealth. Affirmative statutes, giving a remedy, are to be construed as implying a negative of other remedies.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. This is an indictment for an assault and battery, to which there is a general demurrer, on the ground that the name of a prosecutor, &c., was not written at the foot of the indictment before it was presented to the grand jury. The words of the 24th section of the law are: "And the name and surname of the prosecutor, and the town or county in which he shall reside, with his title or profession, shall be written at the foot of every bill of indictment for any trespass or misdemeanor, before it be presented to the grand jury." But the act does not say what shall be the consequence of an omission to comply with the command. It does not say that the indictment shall be quashed or dismissed, nor impose any penalty, or create any disability in the indictment; it does not say that such omission shall vitiate the indictment or render it void. But if it is made a necessary part of an indictment, perhaps the want of the name may be taken advantage of on general demurrer. The question, then, will be, whether it be a necessary part of every indictment for a trespass or misdemeanor, that the name of the prosecutor, &c., should be written at its foot. If the words of this section are construed strictly, and if the omission to write the name of the prosecutor vitiates and renders void the indictment, then it is not in the power of government, nor of the grand jury, to prosecute an offender who has been guilty of the grossest misdemeanor, unless some individual person will become prosecutor, and make himself responsible for costs. For the words of the law are, "every bill of indictment for a trespass or misdemeanor." The grand jury could not find a bill even on their own knowledge, although bound to do so by their oath. The court could not order a bill to be sent to the grand jury even for the most aggravated trespass or misdemeanor. It would be, as has been justly observed in the argument, to subject the whole authority of government as to the whole penal code, (excepting the case of felony,) to the will of an individual. The 38th section speaks of the prosecutor in all offences, not capital, and authorizes the court to compel the prosecutor to find security for costs. There seems, therefore, not more reason for supposing that the legislature meant to require a prosecutor in all cases not capital, than in those of trespass and misdemeanor only. The phraseology, also, of the act of 1795 (page 346, § 2) countenances the suggestion, that the legislature did not mean to require a prosecutor to every indictment for a trespass or misdemeanor. It supposes the case that such an indictment may be found by a grand jury, upon the knowledge of two of their own body, or upon the testimony of a witness called upon by them, or by the court, and then goes on to enact that the names of such witnesses shall be indorsed on the indictment, but provides that they shall not thereby be subjected to costs. This shows, that by the first act, a prosecutor was not always necessary, and even if he was, yet by the act of 1795, there were three cases in which no prosecutor was required. If, then, it be not necessary that the name of a prosecutor should be indorsed on every indictment for a trespass or misdemeanor, the mere want of such indorsement is not a good ground of general demurrer. Besides, it does not appear that the witnesses, whose names are indorsed on the indictment, were not called upon by the grand jury, or the court. By their names being indorsed, it is to be presumed that they were so called upon, because it is not necessary that in any other case their names should be indorsed. If they were thus called upon, it seems to be a fair inference, from the act of 1795, that no prosecutor was required.

But it is said that the act of January 28, 1802 (page 431), contains evidence of a legislative construction of the act of 1792 (pages 102, 105), and that such construction is to be respected, although the act of 1802 itself is not in force in the District of Columbia. The answer to this is, that it is the province of the judiciary, and not of the legislature, to declare what the law is or has been. The legislature can only say what it shall be. A subsequent declaration by a legislature of the meaning of a prior law, cannot alter that law as to past cases. It cannot give to the law any other construction than that which would have been fairly given by the judicial department. But the preamble of the act of 1792, says only, that there have been doubts as to the construction, for the removing whereof, &c., which must mean, for the future. If it was intended as an ex post facto, or rather a retrospective law, it cannot operate here, because subsequent to our separation from Virginia; if it is only evidence of a legislative construction, it is not more binding on the judiciary, than if it had been an executive construction. It is not, in fact, evidence of any legislative construction; it is only evidence of the existence of doubts in the mind of some person or persons; and even those doubts cannot be supposed to extend farther than the remedy which the legislature applied, which was only to the case of an indictment founded upon a presentment made on the knowledge of the grand jury, or of two of their members. Nothing, therefore, can be inferred from the act of 1802. The words of the act of 1792, are not that the name of "a prosecutor," but, the name of "the prosecutor." By thus using the definite article, the legislature must be presumed to speak of some particular prosecutor. The question which naturally occurs upon the words "the prosecutor," is, what prosecutor? The answer must be, the person who voluntarily goes before the grand jury with his complaint. Before, therefore, you can require that the name of such a prosecutor should be written at the foot of the indictment, you must show his existence. You must show that there was some person who voluntarily complained to the grand jury. Even then it seems doubtful whether a general demurrer would be the mode of taking advantage of the omission.

A general demurrer admits the fact, that the traverser did assault and beat the person named in the indictment. The offence is legally, substantially, and technically set forth. The facts stated in the indictment are all well pleaded, and therefore are all admitted by the demurrer. It would be a strange construction of the act, which would suppose that the legislature intended that the traverser, after confessing himself guilty, should avail himself of a provision which was only to enure to his benefit in case of his innocence. It seems to the court, that the only mode of taking advantage of the omission, in the case where the advantage could be taken, would be by a motion to quash the indictment, grounded upon the fact apparent upon the record, or supported by affidavit, that some person (naming him) did voluntarily complain to the grand jury of the offence stated in the indictment.

UNITED STATES v. SANTOS.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 26, 1862.

MISDEMEANORS—FORFEITURE OF BAIL—ACQUITTAL.

Where a defendant in an indictment, who was on bail, departed the court without leave, during the trial, and the recognizance of bail was estreated and ordered to be prosecuted, but, the offence being only a misdemeanor, the trial proceeded in the absence of the defendant, and he was acquitted, the court, under the 6th section of the act of February 28, 1839 (5 Stat. 322), the bail being innocent, set aside the estreat, on the application of the bail.

This was an indictment for fitting out a vessel with intent to employ her in the slave trade. One James Murphy, as surety, entered into a recognizance for the appearance of the defendant, to abide the order of the court. The defendant [Joseph E. Santos] appeared and answered to the indictment, but, during the trial and before it was concluded, he departed, without the leave of the court. He was called and defaulted, and the recognizance was duly estreated and ordered to be prosecuted, but, as the offence charged was only a misdemeanor, the trial proceeded, and the defendant was acquitted by the jury. Murphy now applied to the court, to be relieved from the default and estreat.

James T. Brady, for the surety.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The 6th section of the act of February 28, 1839 (5 Stat. 322), provides, that in case of the forfeiture of a recognizance in a criminal case, the court shall have authority, in its discretion, to remit the whole or a part of the penalty, whenever it shall appear that there has been no wilful default of the parties, and that a trial can, notwithstanding, be had in the case, and that public justice does not otherwise require the same penalty to be exacted. This case is rather stronger in favor of the application than those contemplated in the statute. Here the trial has been had, and the prisoner has been acquitted. The condition of the recognizance has been performed in fact, though not in contemplation of law, for the defendant has stood the trial. The case being a misdemeanor, it was competent to proceed with the trial in his absence. Although it must be assumed that the default was wilful, as it respects the prisoner, for aught that appears the bail is innocent, and he is the person most materially interested in the success of the motion. Under the actual circumstances of the case, I think that the breach of the condition of the recognizance is technical, and that it would be unreasonable to impose it. I shall, therefore, direct the default and estreat to be set aside. The bail must pay to the district attorney the costs of any suit that has been commenced.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—GOODS FREE OF DUTY—UNLOADING WITHOUT PERMIT—ACT MARCH 2, 1799.

1. Under section 50 of the act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 665], merchandise free of duty cannot be lawfully unladen and delivered without a written permit from the collector, and naval officer, if any, for such unlading and delivery.

2. The permit required by section 50 is the same as the one mentioned in section 49, and that manifestly is a written permit.

3. If congress had intended that goods not dutiable should be unladen and delivered without the permit described in section 49 of the collection act, evidence of such intention would be found in some part of the act. None such is to be found.

4. Innocence of intention cannot, any more than ignorance of law, afford a defence to the master or owner of a vessel for a violation of the prohibition contained in section 50, of the act of March 2, 1799.

[2] [Affirming Case No. 12,344.]

5. If goods (mackerel) were the property of an American citizen, taken on board an American vessel at a foreign port and consigned to American consignees, were landed at a foreign port for transshipment to the American port, were caught in an American vessel by American fishermen, and shipped to the American port in the American vessel, still they could not be unladen at the American port without a written permit under section 50 of the collection act.

Libel of information against the schooner Sarah B. Harris, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, for a violation of section 50 of the act of March 2, 1799. Goods imported or "brought" in any ship or vessel from any foreign port or place, cannot at any time be lawfully unladen or delivered from such ship or vessel, within the United States, without a permit from the collector of the port, and naval officer of the same, if any, for such unlading and delivery; and the express provision is that all such goods, so unladen or delivered contrary to the said prohibition, shall become forfeited, and may be seized by any of the officers of the customs, and where the value thereof, according to the highest market price of the same at the port or district where landed, shall amount to $400, the vessel, tackle, apparel, and furniture shall be subject to like forfeiture and seizure. 1 Stat. 665; Waring v. The Mayor, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 118.

Pursuant to that provision, the schooner in this case was seized on the 4th of May, 1867, and the allegation of the information was that she was forfeited to the United States, because one hundred barrels of mackerel, of the value of $2,000, were, at the time alleged in the information, imported in the said schooner from Port Mulgrave, in the province of Nova Scotia, and were at the time and place alleged, to wit, at Deer Isle, in the district of Maine, on the 1st day of November, 1866, unladen and delivered from the said schooner, without a permit for that purpose from the collector, and naval officer of the port where the said goods were so unladen and delivered. Full proof was exhibited in the record that the quantity of mackerel described in the information was imported in the schooner, and that the same were unladen and delivered at the time and place therein set forth, and it was not denied that the mackerel in question exceeded in value the sum of $400.

George F. Talbot, U. S. Atty.
Bradbury & Bradbury, for claimants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. American ships are forbidden to bring goods from any foreign port into the United States, unless the master thereof shall have a manifest in writing, signed by the proper person, describing the goods and the vessel, and containing the name of the port where the goods were taken on board and the name of the port for which the same are consigned or destined. 1 Stat. 644. Imported goods may be entered for consumption or for warehousing, but the entry, in either case, must be in writing, and must be made to the collector of the district within fifteen days after the required report of the arrival of the vessel is filed by the master. Id. 649. Such goods are required to be landed in open day, and the same section provides that they shall not at any time be landed or delivered from such ship or vessel "without a permit from the collector, and naval officer, if any, for such unlading and delivery." Id. 665. Authority to grant a permit does not exist until the duties are paid or secured to be paid, and the duties are never paid or secured to be paid before the goods are imported, nor before they are entered either for consumption or warehousing. Masters of such ships or vessels, on their arrival within four leagues of our coast, or within any of the bays, harbors, ports, or inlets thereof, are required, upon demand, to produce the manifest of the goods to such officer of the customs as shall come on board their ship, for his inspection, and it is made the duty of the said officer of the customs to certify the fact of compliance with that requirement and the day when it was so produced. Examination of the entry is usually made by the entry clerk, and if found to be correct, the collector proceeds to estimate the duties "on the invoice value and quantity," and if the estimated amount of duty is paid or secured to be paid as required by law, the collector certifies the invoice and grants a permit in due form for the unlading and delivery of the cargo. Waring v. The Mayor, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 110; Gen. Reg. 1857, p. 145. Congress, therefore, has prescribed the rule of decision, and while that provision remains in force no goods brought in any ship or vessel from any foreign port or place, unless falling within some exceptional rule not applicable in this case, can lawfully be unladen or delivered from any such ship or vessel within the United States without a permit from the collector, and naval officer, if any, for such unlading and delivery.

Three principal defences are set up by the appellants. (1) They insist that the proofs show that the deputy collector assented to the unlading and delivery of the mackerel at the time and place alleged in the information, and they contend that a verbal permit under the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, is sufficient to shield the schooner from the forfeiture demanded in the act of congress on which the information is founded. (2) Suppose the rule is otherwise, and that a written permit is required where the goods unladen and delivered are dutiable, still they contend that the decree of the district court in this case was erroneous, because, as they insist, the mackerel in question were American caught, and not subject to duty, and they contend that the act of congress, even if it does require a written permit for the unlading and delivery of imported goods subject to duty, contains no such requirement where it appears that the goods are not dutiable, but that the purpose of the law, at least in all such cases, is as well answered by a verbal permit as by one in writing. (3) Accessories, other than the master, are not liable to the penalty annexed to the offence, unless they were "knowingly concerned or aiding therein or in removing, storing, or otherwise securing the goods," and the claimants insist that the vessel in this case is not liable to forfeiture, because, as they assume, the master supposed and believed that the mackerel were American caught, and that they were not subject to duty as imported goods.

Goods imported from a foreign country are required to be entered at the custom-house where the vessel voluntarily arrives with intent to unlade the cargo. They may be entered for consumption or for warehousing, but they must be regularly entered, and the duties be paid or be secured to be paid, before any authority exists to grant a permit for their unlading and delivery. Until the permit is received by the inspector, no one has authority to remove the hatches or to break bulk, but the cargo is under the charge of the officer of the customs. By the directions of the principal collection act, the collector, jointly with the naval officer, or alone where there is none, shall, according to the best of his or their judgment or information, make a gross estimate of the amount of the duties on the goods to which the entry of any owner or consignee, his or her factor or agent, shall relate, which estimate shall be indorsed upon such entry and be signed by the officer or officers making the same.

Before any permit can be issued, the amount of the duties so estimated must first be paid or be secured to be paid, and the provision then is that the collector, together with the naval officer, where there is one, or alone where there is none, shall grant a permit to land the goods, &c., whereof entry shall have been so made, and then, and not before, it shall be lawful to land the said goods. Permits are to be "granted" by the collector, together with the naval officer where there is one, or alone where there is none, and as a further evidence that permits are to be made in writing, the provision is that they shall specify as particularly as may be the goods to be delivered, namely, the number and description of the packages, whether trunks, bale, chest, box, case, pipe, hogshead, barrel, keg, or any other packages whatever, with the mark and number of each package, and, as far as circumstances will admit, the contents thereof, together with the names of the vessel and master, in which, and the place from whence, they were imported, and no goods . . . shall be delivered by any inspector or other officer of the customs that shall not fully agree with the description thereof in such permit. Evidence that congress intended that the permit should be in writing is derived from every part of the regulations upon the subject; but if more be needed to make it certain that such was the intention of congress, it is found in the fact that the form of the permit is prescribed by law, and the same section enacts that the form of all permits for the purposes aforesaid, and for deliveries from the public stores, shall be as therein directed and prescribed. 1 Stat. 664. Prior to the granting of the permit, the duties are estimated on the invoice value and quantity, and the amount as estimated being paid or secured to be paid, the collector certifies the invoice and grants a permit in due form for the unlading and delivery of the cargo, first designating the packages, one in ten, to be sent to the public store for examination and marking the same on the entry, invoice, and permit. Gen. Reg. 1857, p. 145.

Dutiable goods, therefore, cannot be unladen or delivered without a written permit from the collector as prescribed by law and the regulations of the treasury department, but the appellants contend that the mackerel in this case were American caught, and that as such they were not dutiable, and that imported goods not dutiable may be unladen and delivered without a written permit for that purpose. Evidently the proposition of the appellants embraces two questions, one of fact and one of law; and it is clear that the defence in this respect must fail unless both are found in their favor. Duly enrolled and licensed for the mackerel fishery, the schooner sailed from Deer Isle, in this district, about the last of August, 1866, on a second cruise for mackerel in the bay of Chaleur, with a license to touch and trade at any foreign port during the trip. They proceeded to the bay, and having caught some two hundred barrels, they touched at Port Mulgrave, and there took on board as freight the one hundred barrels of mackerel described in the information, and arrived on the return voyage at Green's Landing, in Deer Isle, on the 21st of the same month. On the day following, the master reported the arrival of the vessel, and produced to the deputy collector of Deer Isle an "inward foreign manifest," describing the cargo as one hundred barrels of mackerel, shipped by Charles R. McDonell, of the American fishing schooner Olivia Maria, taken on board at Port Mulgrave, Nova Scotia, and consigned to Davis & Co., at Green's Landing, Deer Isle. Although there were more than three hundred barrels of mackerel on board, including those caught by the crew during the trip, still the master made oath that the manifest contained a just and true account of all the goods on board the schooner. He also presented at the same time the certificate of Charles R. McDonell, as importer, certifying under oath that he landed at Port Mulgrave, Nova Scotia, for transshipment to the port of Deer Isle, in the United States, one hundred barrels of mackerel, and that the same were caught in said American vessel by American fishermen, and shipped to the said port of Deer Isle by the said schooner.

Appended to the document is the certificate of Vincent J. Wallace, dated October 15, 1866, that the same was signed and declared before him as comptroller of the customs. Accompanying the certificate there was also the sworn statement of two persons representing themselves as merchants at that port, in which they declare that the statements of McDonell in his certificate were just and true and worthy of full faith and credit. Warren, the deputy collector at Deer Isle, testifies that the master of the schooner came to his office Oct. 22, 1866, and filed with him the before-mentioned certificates, and entered his vessel; that he "made the entry of the one hundred barrels of mackerel before me;" that he gave him no written permit, but thinks that he gave him a verbal one, and that the master asked him if it was all right, and that he told him "Yes, go ahead and land your mackerel." On cross-examination, the witness stated that he did not inspect the cargo nor send any one to inspect it, and that he had no knowledge of the matter, except what he derived from the report of the master and from the papers he filed with him at the time. Beyond doubt, the evidence shows that due report was made of the arrival of the schooner at the port of Deer Isle, and that she brought as cargo one hundred barrels of mackerel, but the vessel was never boarded by an officer of the customs, nor was her cargo ever inspected in any way or to any extent. Informed, as the deputy collector was, that the mackerel were American caught, and that they had been transshipped from an American vessel, he gave the matter no attention, except to say to the master, in answer to his inquiry, that it was all right, and that he might land the goods. Viewed in the light of these facts, as the case must be, several questions arise which must be separately answered. (1) Whether the goods were or were not dutiable; because if they were dutiable, it has already been determined that they could not be lawfully unladen or delivered without a written permit. (2) If the mackerel were not dutiable, whether a verbal permit was or was not sufficient to save the goods and the vessel from forfeiture. (3) Whether the verbal assent of the deputy collector to the landing and delivery of the mackerel constitutes a defence to the charge of forfeiture.

Influenced by the representations of the master that the mackerel were American caught, and believing that a written permit was not necessary for the unlading and delivery of goods not dutiable, the deputy collector admitted the goods to entry duty free, and consented, in the words before mentioned, that they might be unladen and delivered without being inspected, and without any written permit. They were supposed to have been caught by the crew of the Olivia Maria, an American vessel, and to have been the property of her master, Charles R. McDonell, but the district court found that they were British mackerel, the property of one John Moore, a resident of Port Mulgrave, and that the same were exported from that port and that the mackerel were subject to duty under the revenue laws of the United States. Examined in detail as the testimony was by the district judge, as appears by his opinion, it does not seem to be necessary to reproduce the statements of the respective witnesses. Suffice it to say that no doubt is entertained that the weight of the testimony, as then exhibited, fully justified the conclusion formed by the district judge. Some conflict of statement existed in the testimony, but the careful analysis of it made by the district judge showed conclusively that the mackerel were British caught, and that the representations of the master were incorrect. Much additional testimony has been furnished since the appeal, and it must be admitted that the new testimony intensifies the conflict, but the court here is of the opinion that the mackerel were British caught, and that they were exported from Port Mulgrave as the property of John Moore.

Concede the fact to be otherwise, still the court is of the opinion that the mackerel, even under the circumstances assumed by the appellants, could not be lawfully unladen and delivered without a written permit. "Unavoidable accident, necessity, or stress of weather" are not set up in this case, nor is there any evidence exhibited to support any such defence. Authorities founded upon the exceptions in section 27 of the collection act have no application in this case, as the unlading and delivery of the goods were voluntary and intentional, and without any unavoidable accident, necessity, or stress of weather. 1 Stat. 648; U. S. v. Hayward, [Case No. 15,336]; Peich v. Ware, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 358. Forfeiture of property, it is said, is not incurred under the revenue laws, unless the acts of the master or owner are attended with fraud, misconduct, or negligence; and it is insisted that the owner is not to suffer for the fraud, misconduct, or negligence of the revenue officer, in which he did not participate. Fraud is not imputed to the deputy collector, but it is clear that he was guilty of negligence and omission of duty so culpable as to amount to misconduct, and it is clear to a demonstration that the master voluntarily participated in that misconduct. Six Hundred and Fifty-One Chests of Tea [Case No. 12,916]. Only one hundred barrels of mackerel were placed on the manifest, and the master voluntarily broke bulk and landed the cargo before the same had been inspected, and without any written permit. Examined in view of these suggestions, it is apparent that the case before the court depends upon the general question whether goods not dutiable, may be lawfully unladen and delivered without a written permit, and that it does not fall within any of the exceptions contained in the collection act, or any such as are recognized as valid by the decisions of the federal courts. Ignorance of the law furnishes no excuse, nor does it constitute any valid defence that the deputy collector was as uninformed in that behalf as the master. U. S. v. Lyman [Id. 15,647]. Unquestionably the permit required by section 50 of the collection act is the permit, the form of which is given in the preceding section of the same act, and nothing can be more comprehensive or explicit than is the language of that requirement, in which it is provided that no goods brought in any ship or vessel shall be unladen or delivered from such ship or vessel at any time, within the United States, without a permit from the collector, and naval officer, if any, for such unlading or delivery. Had congress intended that goods not dutiable should be unladen and delivered without such a permit as that described in section 49 of the collection act, it must be presumed that some evidence of such an intention would be found in some part of the act; but nothing of the kind appears. Free goods are by that form to be included in the permit, as well as such as are dutiable. Reference is made by the appellants to sections 45–47, as affording such evidence; but it is quite clear that they afford no support to the proposition. Merchandise free of duty is required to be placed on the manifest and entered, as well as that subject to duty, and a written permit for the unlading and delivery of such is just as essential to guard against smuggling and protect the public interest as where the importation is subject to duty.

Innocence of intention will not, any more than ignorance of the law, afford a defence to the master or owner of a vessel, for a violation of the prohibition contained in section 50 of the collection act. They are forbidden to unlade or deliver imported goods brought into the United States, without the required permit, and the provision is that if they do, and the goods so unladen and delivered amount to $400, the vessel, tackle, apparel, and furniture shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

Case No. 16,224.

UNITED STATES v. SARCHET.

[Gilp. 273.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Feb. Term, 1832.

TRIAL—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY—CUSTOMS DUTIES—CLASSIFICATION—EVIDENCE—BOLT IRON.

1. The court have no right to give the jury any direction upon questions of fact, but it is their duty to call their attention to particular points, and to observe upon the tendency, force, and comparative weight of conflicting testimony.

2. In the construction of laws relating to trade and commerce, such as those of May 22, 1824 [4 Stat. 25], and May 19, 1828 [Id. 270], the vocabulary of merchants is to be adopted in preference to that of mechanics.

3. To authorise the entry of small pieces of bolt iron, under the name of "chain links," it must be proved that they have been previously known in commerce by that name.

[Cited in brief in Cutler v. Currier, 54 Me. 88.]

4. Where a piece of bar or bolt iron has been changed by subsequent manufacture, it ceases to be subject to duty as such, although it may not have become a new and distinct manufacture, or assumed a new name or use.

On the 5th January, 1831, John F. Sarchet, imported into the port of Philadelphia, by the ship Alexander, from Liverpool, fifty-six sheet iron casks containing small pieces of round iron, from three to eight inches in length, and about half an inch in diameter. They were invoiced and entered at the custom house as hardware, and the duties were calculated at the rate of thirty-seven dollars a ton, being the rate of duty chargeable on "rolled bar or bolt iron" under the provision of the act of May 19, 1828. The whole amount of duty on the invoice amounted to four hundred and sixty-six dollars and ninety-one cents, for which three bonds were given. The first of these, for one hundred and fifty-five dollars and ninety-one cents, became due on the 5th September, 1831, and not being paid, the present suit was brought to recover that sum with interest. On the return day, at November sessions, the defendant in open court, the United States attorney being present, made an affidavit that an error had been committed in the liquidation of the duties demanded upon the bond. He specified as the error alleged to have been committed, "that the invoice of iron upon which the said duty had been assessed, was estimated as bar or bolt iron, manufactured in whole or in part by rolling, at thirty-seven dollars per ton, instead of being estimated as a manufacture of iron, not otherwise specified, in the act of May 22, 1824, and therefore as paying an ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent.; or as scrap iron and therefore paying a duty of sixty-two and a half cents per hundred weight." Upon this affidavit the court granted a continuance. On the 12th March, 1832, the case came on for trial before Judge Hopkinson and a special jury. Numerous witnesses were examined on the part of the United States, and also of the defendant, with a view to prove the character and designation of the articles mentioned in the invoice, both as an object of commercial traffic, and as the subject of manufacture to a greater or less extent.

Mr. Gilpin, U. S. Dist. Atty.

In this case, an invoice of articles was entered by the defendant at the custom house, in Philadelphia, as "hardware." On inspection they were found to consist of pieces of round iron, perfectly straight, varying from three to eight or ten inches in length, and from less than half an inch to more than three quarters of an inch in diameter. They were appraised as pieces of "bolt or bar iron, made by rolling," and the duty was charged at the rate of thirty-seven dollars a ton, pursuant to the second clause of the first section of the act of May 19, 1828. This prescribes, "that, from and after the first day of September, 1828, in lieu of the duties now imposed by law, on the importation of the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties; that is to say; first, on iron, in bars or bolts, not manufactured in whole or in part by rolling, one cent per pound; second, on bar and bolt iron, made wholly or in part by rolling, thirty-seven dollars per ton." The only question in the case is one of fact, whether or not these articles, which, it is admitted are made by rolling, ought to have been appraised and charged as "bar or bolt iron." They are so considered by the officers of the customs, men experienced and disinterested. To confirm this, the evidence of merchants largely engaged in the importation of iron; of American manufacturers of a similar article; and of practical mechanics, who use it as a material for various purposes, has been produced. This testimony supports the construction given by the appraisers, and is amply sufficient to justify the charge of duty which has been made. P. L. 1828, p. 43. The allegation of the defendant, that these pieces are not to be considered as "bar or bolt iron" because they are now a manufacture of iron, cannot be sustained, unless it is shown that they have changed their character and assumed some new use and name. Every partial alteration is not sufficient; it must be such a one as converts them into some new article, adapted to a specific purpose. It has been decided that round copper bars and copper plates, although turned up at the edges, come within the provisions of the laws by which copper in bars and copper in plates are exempted from duty. More than this, it has been decided that round copper plates turned up at the edges, and invoiced by the specific name of "raised copper bottoms," do not lose that privilege of exemption. Can it then be said, that the mere cutting of a long bar of iron into short pieces, so changes its character as to make it a new manufacture? U. S. v. Kid, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 1; U. S. v. Potts, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 284. But if we were to admit that there had been a change in this article, such as to prevent its being considered any longer "bar or bolt iron," what has it become? According to the defendant's own allegation it has become a "chain link," part of an iron cable or chain; and as such it would be subject to a higher duty than that now demanded. By the fifth clause of the first section of the act of May 22, 1824, the duty to be levied "on iron cables, or chains, or parts thereof is three cents per pound," which is equal to sixty-seven dollars and twenty cents per ton. 3 Story's Laws, 1944 [4 Stat. 25].

Mr. Cadwalader, for defendant.

The first point of view, in which the consideration of this case presents itself, is, as to the construction of the act of congress, under which the right to levy this duty is claimed. That act is to be construed strictly in favour of the defendant. If not altogether a penal statute, it is in the nature of one, because penalties are imposed for its evasion. What is the just construction to be put upon its provisions? Clearly that it means to describe, by its general commercial designation, an article, well known in commerce, which had been frequently before the subject of similar legislative provisions. The act of 1828, is but part of a series of acts relative to the levying and collecting of duties on imported merchandise. In all of them, iron of this character is referred to. In the act of April 27, 1816 [3 Stat. 310], it is referred to as "iron in bars or bolts;" in that of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 460], it is called "iron in bars and bolts;" in that of May 22, 1824, it is designated as "iron in bars or bolts;" and finally in the act of May 19. 1828, it is described as "bar and bolt iron." All these expressions denote one and the same commercial article; they are illustrative of one another; and the term "bar and bolt iron," in the last, means the "iron in bars and bolts" alluded to in the previous acts. It is a well established rule, that words of a general signification in a statute, which are in juxtaposition with other words of a more confined and limited sense, are to be understood according to the more limited sense. If there were no such rule, the words in these several acts of congress, all evidently referring to the same subject matter, would impose it upon us. The law of May 19, 1828, meant to tax an article, namely, bar and bolt iron, which had been more particularly described in the previous laws as iron in bars and bolts; an article well known to commerce. There was no intention to tax a new material, but simply to increase an existing duty. In order therefore to subject the articles, which are the object of the present controversy, to the duty imposed on them, they must be iron in bars or bolts. That they are not so, simple inspection, independent of evidence, sufficiently establishes. 3 Story's Laws, 1589, 1706 [3 Stat. 310, 460]; 3 Story's Laws, 1944 [4 Stat. 25]; U. S. v. Tenbroeck, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 248; U. S. v. Goodwin [Case No. 15,229]; Stradling v. Morgan, Plowd. 204; Wiseman v. Cotton, 1 Lev. 79; Waller v. Travers, Hardr. 309; Stevens v. Duckworth, Id. 344; Crowley v. Swindles, Vaughan, 173; Gale v. Reed, 8 East, 80; Miller v. Heller, 7 Serg. & R. 32. These articles therefore, not falling within the description of "bar and bolt iron," as contemplated by the act, and not being a mere raw material, must be either scrap iron, or a manufacture of iron. They bear more resemblance to the former, than to any among the various articles of iron described in the act, but being prepared for a specific purpose, do not perhaps strictly fall under that designation. They are in fact a manufacture of iron not enumerated, and as such embraced in the fifth clause of the first section of the act of May 22, 1824, which declares that there shall be levied "on all manufactures, not otherwise specified, made of iron, a duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem." The term "bar or bolt iron," is not used in the act of congress as descriptive of a manufactured article; it is not so considered either in commerce or by the mechanic; it is in fact the raw material of the blacksmith. If therefore it undergoes any ulterior process, such as being cut, bona fide for a specific purpose, it ceases to be this raw material, it ceases to retain its former denomination, it ceases to be liable to duty as an article so known and denominated. This would be true whether or not it acquired any other known name. It might remain a nondescript, an article partly manufactured, but having ceased by a process of manufacture, however incomplete, to be what it was before, it acquires a new character, by which the duty chargeable is to be regulated. Such is the fact here. It has been proved that these bars of iron have been cut into pieces, bona fide, for the purpose of making chains or chain cables. This has been done in the regular course of manufacture, and it has therefore terminated their character as bar or bolt iron.

But the evidence enables us to proceed a step farther. They have not merely ceased to be bar or bolt iron; they have become a manufactured article, known in commerce. It has been settled that under the revenue laws, the commercial designation of an article of import, is that by which it is to be taken, in estimating the duties. Now these pieces of iron are known in commerce, and among those who deal in them, as "chain links." They are imported as such. They are to be used for certain purposes of manufacture. It is immaterial whether or not they agree in form or appearance with what is meant by the term "link" out of the trade. It is sufficient that they bear that name, among those who use them. That they do so has been proved. It is no answer to say they are "parts of a chain cable;" for that term is well known also in commerce, as designating not a single link but certain portions, some fathoms in length, into which cables are necessarily divided. The result, therefore is, that these pieces are not bar or bolt iron; but that they are a manufacture of iron not specified, and subject to a duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, which the defendant has been always willing to pay.

Mr. Gilpin, for the United States, in reply.

Admitting the view of the several acts, which is taken by the defendant, to be correct, it does not sustain the inference drawn from it. Although it may be true, that "bar and bolt iron," in the last law, embrace the same article as the "iron in bolts and bars" designated in those previous, yet it does not follow that the former is to be construed solely by the latter. It may be true that more precise words sometimes control such as are general, but it is incumbent on him who would restrain the general words, to show that the particular words do of necessity restrain them, and were used intentionally for that purpose. Now such is not the case here. The act containing the more enlarged description was subsequently passed. The inference is, not that it was to be limited by what went before, but that what went before was to be extended by it; that if the term "iron in bolts and bars" was susceptible of an interpretation, which did not include every species of "bar and bolt iron," then such limitation should be removed. But were it otherwise, what is there to exclude these pieces from the description of "iron in bars and bolts?" The length of the bars or bolts is not specified, and, though short, they are unquestionably bars. If not, they are at least pieces of bars, and of course subject to the same duty as the whole bar would be, unless there is a distinction in the commercial character of pieces of iron, according to their length, which no evidence has established. There is nothing therefore in the construction or comparison of these several acts, which exempts the articles in question from duty, either as "iron in bars or bolts" or as "bar or bolt iron," unless its character has been changed by subsequent manufacture.

The real and sole question therefore is, whether each of these pieces of iron has become "a manufacture of iron" not specified in the law. In the first place it is to be observed that it is not so imported; it is designated in the invoice not as a particular manufactured article, but generally as hardware, a term broader than "bar or bolt iron." But admitting that these pieces were imported to be used for a specific purpose, and had been partially prepared for it, surely that is not sufficient to change their character; bolt or bar iron may be so prepared and so imported, but it continues to be what it originally was, until it is actually converted into a new and specific article. Every alteration does not confer on it a new character as a manufacture; if so every ingredient in every form would be an object of distinct designation and charge. To constitute a new and different article, it must be so changed as to have a positive and specific use in its new state. It must not only cease to be a piece of "bar and bolt iron," but it must be an article completely manufactured for, and applicable to, some distinct and positive use. The force of this seems to be admitted by the defendant, when he attempts to prove each of these pieces of iron to be a "chain link." Whether he has done so or not, is a matter of fact for the jury. That it is not a link in the common acceptation of the word will hardly be denied; and the evidence of the merchants, manufacturers, and mechanics, in our opinion, establishes the same thing. It never has acquired the character of a commercial article designated by a fixed name; it is simply a piece of bolt or bar iron prepared for an ulterior purpose, but until it is used for that purpose it does not assume a new designation, or become a specific object of trade. It continues to be bolt or bar iron until it becomes a "chain link," and the mere fact of importing it for that purpose, or the mere intention of so applying it, does not operate to convert it into the new "manufacture." When it has become part of a chain, or capable of being used as part of a chain, it is then the article which the defendant asserts it to be, but not before. And when it becomes so does it not at once fall within the fifth clause of the first section of the act of May 22, 1824? Is it not to all intents and purposes "part of an iron cable or chain?" The very assertion that it is a "chain link," seems to admit that it must be "part of a chain." The construction, by which it is attempted to limit this expression, has no foundation either in the words or apparent intention of the law. There is no conceivable reason why it should relate to a greater or less number of links; no particular length or number is designated; the object was to lay a duty on chain cables, and chains manufactured wholly or partially abroad; and surely this intention would equally relate to long or short chains, to such as were in one piece, in several pieces to be afterwards united, or in links to be fastened together here. The convenience of transportation, or the difference of profit, may justify the merchant in importing them, in one form or the other, but the manufactured article is the same, and is fully embraced by the broad and general phrase used in the law. If therefore these pieces have ceased to be pieces of "bar or bolt iron," they have become chain links, and, as such, parts of a chain, which are subject to an amount of duty, even higher than that claimed in this suit.

HOPKINSON, District Judge (charging jury): The general question in issue is, to what rate of duty, under the revenue laws of the United States, are certain articles of iron or hardware subject, which were imported by the defendant into this port in January, 1831? The acts of congress impose various rates of duties on iron of various kinds or descriptions, and it is for you to decide under which of these descriptions the importation in question falls. (1) Is it bar or bolt iron? On this article the law of May 19, 1828, lays a duty of thirty-seven dollars per ton, and this is the duty claimed by the United States in this suit. (2) Is it scrap iron? On this article the duty is sixty-two and a half cents per hundred weight. (3) Is it part or parts of an iron cable or chain? On this the law of May 22, 1824, lays a duty of three cents per pound. (4) Is it a manufacture of iron, not specified in the acts of congress? If so it is subject to an ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent; and this is contended for by the defendant. The controversy then is mainly between the first and the last descriptions; between the bar or bolt iron, and a manufacture not enumerated in the law. Scrap iron seems to be put out of the question by the evidence on both sides. It appears to be neither old iron worn by use, nor pieces of new iron which remain of a large bar, cut or divided for some particular purpose, but too small for the purpose intended. As to the iron cable, or chain, or parts thereof, a good deal of contradictory evidence has been given. At present this may be put aside. It is insisted upon by the United States rather as an alternative, than a direct claim. The real demand in this bond and in this action is for a duty on the articles in question, as bar or bolt iron. The substantial and real allegation of the defendant is, that they are a manufacture of iron not specified under any of the descriptions of iron mentioned in the act.

Your inquiry will be, to ascertain whether these articles are embraced by the description of bar or bolt iron, as used and intended by the act, or whether they fall under the general head of non-enumerated manufactures of iron.

You will observe that it is incumbent on the defendant, on the ground he has taken, to bring them under the clause of the law he contends for, and show not only that they are not specified in the act, but that they are a manufacture of iron. He contends that they are so; that they are so known under the denomination of chain links; so known as an article of commerce. You have seen that the pieces of iron produced are of several kinds; some of them are straight, but cut from the bar in certain lengths, and nothing more done to them; some are also straight, but sloped at the ends; and some are twisted or bent, but not closed at the ends. The last kind, however, you are not now called to decide upon; the importation in question being of the straight pieces only. The defendant contends that these are all equally known as chain links; that chain links are nowhere mentioned or specified in our revenue laws; and therefore that they are a manufacture of iron not enumerated, or subjected to a specific duty. Whether these pieces of iron, cut into various lengths, of various diameters and shapes, are, truly speaking, nothing more nor less than bar or bolt iron, cut into short pieces, but not thereby changing their name and character, nor thereby becoming a new and different manufacture of iron; or whether, by this operation or process of cutting, for a particular object, that is, for the purpose of making chain links, they ipso facto become a new and different manufacture of iron; whether, in the language of commerce, they become chain links, and are so received and known by those engaged in the iron trade; these are the questions you are to decide, for they are questions of fact, to be determined by the evidence you have heard.

It is not my right or desire to give you any direction upon such questions, but it is my duty to assist your inquiries as to particular points, to which your attention should be specially directed; to observe upon the tendency and force of the prominent facts given in evidence, and the comparative weight of conflicting testimony. This I shall do briefly and generally, although the witnesses have been unusually numerous and their examination has occupied several days.

(1) The defendant insists, that these pieces of iron are known as an article of commerce, by the name of "chain links." Has he supported this pretension? Has he shown that they have been an article of commerce under that or any other name; that is, under any name descriptive of a known manufacture of iron? Is he not the only person in the United States who has imported them as a distinct, acknowledged manufacture of iron from the bar, as chain links? It is true that one of the witnesses, Amos Noe, a blacksmith and not an importer, says that he knew chain links to be brought from the Peru Iron Works, in the state to the city of New York, and also from England to Philadelphia; but as to the latter, he admitted it was only by Mr. Sarchet. We have no description of what they were, whether like these we have before us, or in a perfect and finished state; nor how they were brought in, whether as a separate article called "chain links"; whether they were so invoiced or not, so entered at the custom house or not. Of all these matters the witness knew nothing. The same remarks may be applied to the testimony of Washington Jackson, who says he never knew an article of commerce called "chain links," but that some were offered to him for sale by an Englishman; the offer was made here and the article was in New York, and Mr. Jackson never saw it. I presume if such importations of chain links were made, eo nomine, or by any specific name of manufacture, other than that of bar iron, the books of the custom house at New York would show it, and would show how they were entered, and received and charged with duty. You will judge whether the articles before you have been known in commerce as "chain links," and have been so imported into the United States by any body but the defendant. I should perhaps notice the examination of witnesses before a committee of congress at Washington, in which chain links are mentioned as a known article; certainly they are; they have been known as long as chains have been known, whose parts have always been called "links"; but the question remains whether the name has ever been applied to such articles or pieces of iron as are now in dispute. That the link of a chain is a manufactured article and has always had that name, cannot be doubted; but you are to inquire whether the pieces before you have or have not been comprehended or classed under that name.

(2) Supposing, however, that the defendant has failed in showing that these things are known in commerce as "chain links," he may nevertheless make out his case and bring himself within the provision of the act of congress, if he has shown that these articles, in their present state, are a manufacture of iron, are manufactured chain links, as he alleges them to be; for when he asserts that they are a manufacture, he must tell you what they are; and he has undertaken to prove that they are, in the language of the trade, or the nomenclature of those who ought to be depended upon for information on this point, manufactured chain links, so considered and known. Upon this subject you have had the benefit of the experience and opinions of three classes of dealers in iron: (1) mechanics; (2) merchants; (3) manufacturers. To which of these classes should you look with the most confidence for information? You have been truly told by the counsel for the defendant, that this is a question of construction of a law relating to trade and commerce; a commercial question. It is certainly so. It would seem to follow from this that the vocabulary of the merchant, of the importer, of the counting house, would be most safely adopted, and not that of the mechanic, of the smith's shop. May you not also put your faith on the manufacturer, the maker of the article, for its appropriate character and name, rather than on the mechanic, who turns it to a new use? All trades have their peculiar names for things, peculiar phrases in their business; a sort of shop short-hand, well understood in the shop, which may be very different from the denomination of the article in the orders and invoices of merchants, or in the usage of the manufacturer, or in common parlance. The shoemaker may say to his journeyman, when he hands him a piece of leather, take this and cut out a shoe; but is it a shoe as soon as cut? The blacksmith may say, take this bar or rod and cut a linch-pin; but is it a linch-pin as soon as the piece intended for the linch-pin is cut off and separated from the bar? So of a horseshoe, and other articles made in a smith's shop.

I. What have the mechanics testified? Seven were called by the defendant: (1) John Sarchet. You will take his testimony with such allowances as his peculiar situation in this cause may suggest to you. He says, he has always heard these pieces called "links"; that they are the raw material of a chain. (2) William Corkley calls them "links." (3) William Pritchett calls those that are bent "chain links"; does not know any other name for the straight ones. (4) Luther Stebbins says when they are cut expressly for links he calls them "links." (5) Amos Noe calls them all "links," and never heard them called any thing else. (6) Samuel Hulse would call all the articles "links," but will not say as to the straight ones. (7) Joseph Riter calls it a "link" when cut. (8) Wesley Blackman says they are links. These are all the mechanics called by defendant. They do not all agree in respect to the straight pieces. I should add that all of them but one have worked or are now working in the shop of the defendant. I mention this, not to impeach their credibility, but that you may consider how far they have derived their knowledge and opinions from the practice or language of the defendant's shop. You will also keep in mind that they, or some of them, speak of their knowing these pieces by this name at other places than his shop, or than this city. On the contrary, several mechanics, one of them largely concerned in chain making, testify that they have never heard such pieces of iron called "chain links." Their names and testimony must be in your recollection. Allowing credit to all these witnesses, the result would seem to be, that the name of a "link," given to these pieces of iron, although used in some shops, and by some mechanics, is not universal; is not known to and adopted by all the trade. We may remark that all these witnesses agree; and, indeed, it is obvious to your own inspection, that these pieces are not in fact links, that is, perfect links; that they cannot be used as links without a further process of manufacture. The straight ones must be bended, and the bended ones must be welded, before they can become links of a chain for the purposes intended. They have passed the first process of a manufactured link, of a manufacture different from the bar from which they were cut. Are they therefore a manufacture, are they links? These are inquiries you are to make, and to satisfy yourselves in the result. It has been strongly argued by the defendant's counsel, that these pieces were exported, bona fide, for the purpose of making chains, and he concludes from this that they may be called links, or at least a distinct manufacture, not specified in the act. Is not the basis of this argument too broad? If a bar of iron should be cut, in England, into pieces suitable to make a horse shoe, and should be really exported for that purpose, could it therefore be a new manufacture, under the name of a horseshoe, for which it is intended, or under any other name?

II. I will next call your attention to the evidence of the merchants, or importers of iron: (1) Joseph R. Evans says none of these articles answer the denomination of bar iron. He should call the bended ones "chain links," but is doubtful as to the straight ones. He does not know what name is to be given to them. They could be made into spikes and so could the crooked ones. He has never imported any cut iron, or any cut into links. But he says there is no difference between the straight pieces and the bars, except that they are cut into pieces. (2) William Welsh never imported any iron, his father occasionally imports it; he never heard bar iron called so, when cut into pieces for a particular purpose; he would call none exhibited to him bar iron, except the long bar. (3) George Handy never heard of such an article in commerce as "chain links." (4) William Thomas sees nothing here that answers the description of bar iron but the long one. The crooked pieces are links unwelded, the others pieces of rod iron cut off. It is iron cut off for links, and he would call it a piece of rod iron. When a rod is cut up, it loses its quality of bar iron and becomes pieces of iron. (5) Edward Carpenter says the long piece is bar iron but none of the short ones. He would call them pieces of bar iron, but not bar iron. (6) Robert S. Johnson would call the flat piece, "a piece of bar iron." He imports bar iron of all lengths, from the shortest pieces to a long bar. The small pieces come with bundles to make up the weight. He never made an importation of small pieces and would not receive them. He does not know chain links as an article of commerce. These are pieces of bar iron, though not bars of iron. (7) Thomas Haven says it requires length to make a bar. A bar that is broken is called a "piece of a bar"; when cut, a "bolt"; if bent, a "hoop." Has never received bolt iron, less than seven feet long; nor bar iron less than eleven. In this country three feet long, and upwards. He never heard such a piece called a link. He would not enter them as chain links, or as bar iron, but probably as pieces of bars. There is no article of commerce called chain links, and he never heard of their being imported. (8) Samuel Spackman understands bar iron to be of the usual length. A small piece would be called "part of a bar of iron." He never heard of these links imported. He should not call the straight ones links, but part of a bar or bolt, and the twisted ones, pieces intended for links. (9) Henry Cope, by bolt and bar iron, understands long bolts or bars which are straight. He should call a short one a piece of bolt iron. So far the witnesses for the defendant. (10) John Steel, a custom house officer, says they do not estimate the duties on bar or bolt iron by the length. It is usually from ten to fifteen feet. It does not lose its character by being short. He does not consider it to be a manufactured article by being cut; he considers it as bolt iron, hoop iron, or prepared for hoops, but not closed and welded. So iron prepared for railroads is punched with holes. (11) Edward Smith considers the small straight pieces to be short bar iron. He would enter them as bolt iron. They might be applied to many purposes. They were sent short because so ordered. Bolt iron is of various lengths. Varieties of articles of various shapes are sold as bar iron.

If a bar of iron were cut into pieces in England, it would still be bar iron. Hoop iron, rolled out thirty or forty feet and cut shorter and doubled up, is still hoop iron and pays the duty as such; it is not considered as a manufacture of iron. He orders bar iron of different lengths, for the fore and hind wheels of a wagon, but they are not therefore a manufacture, because cut for that purpose. (12) Washington Jackson calls the straight pieces, pieces of round iron, of bolt iron, not chain links. He should not call them a manufactured article if not finished for a particular purpose. He never knew them as an article of commerce. If he wanted bar iron of a shorter length, he would order it as bar iron of a certain or required length. (13) Thomas M. Smith calls the straight pieces, bolts of iron; the bent ones, bent bolts. If he was to import straight pieces cut into lengths, he would enter them as bar iron. He has imported hollow tire iron, to an order, and paid duty as common iron. This is all the testimony of the commercial interpretation of the terms bar iron, bolt iron. Some of these witnesses are both importers and manufacturers; you will remember which of them stand in this double capacity, if you shall think it of importance in considering their evidence.

III. The last class of witnesses is the manufacturers of iron, the forge masters as they have been called, who manufacture iron from the ore to the bar; but not beyond that. It is made into pigs, into blooms, and into bars, which is the third state or process of manufacture. The weight and value of the testimony of these witnesses is impeached on the ground, that as they do not manufacture the iron beyond the bar, they know nothing of these links, or of what is or is not a link, which is a process of manufacture beyond or from the bar. You will judge of the efficacy of the argument, but I may remind you that it is to those manufacturers that orders go from the importer, and that the language of the importers, the commercial name of an article, should be known to the manufacturers, or they would not understand these orders. They must have a common vocabulary as to the things in which they deal together; and in this respect, are both separated from the mechanics or blacksmiths, who buy their iron as they may want it for particular purposes, and have their own manner of designating these purposes, and giving their due orders to the workmen of their shops. It is also to be remarked, that if these iron masters are not judges of what may be called a link, because they do not make it, they are specially competent judges of what is considered to be a bar of iron, or bar iron, it being their business and daily experience to make it, and to sell it as a known article of merchandise.

It has also been urged upon them that they have an interest in this question, and are in fact the true and real plaintiffs in the cause; it is at the same time admitted that the blacksmiths have a common cause on the other side, and it is said they are the real defendants. You have seen and heard all the witnesses, both manufacturers and mechanics, and probably know all or most of them, and can therefore judge for yourselves how far their testimony has probably been influenced by the interest they may have.

The manufacturers of iron are unanimous in their allegations, that these pieces of iron are not chain links; that they are not a manufacture of any description, other than bar iron cut into small pieces, which does not change their quality, their character, or their denomination: (1) Edward Smith, a merchant and manufacturer, considers the small straight pieces to be short bar iron; he would enter the round ones at the custom house as bolt iron. They might be applied to many purposes. To show that the mere act of cutting a long piece of iron into smaller pieces, does not change its character or name, he says, that hoop iron is rolled out into pieces thirty or forty feet long, and then at the same factory, cut into such lengths as may be ordered, but it is still hoop iron, not a hoop, although prepared for one. Sometimes, he says, the holes are punched at the end, still it is not a new manufacture, nor as such entered at the custom house. You may remember here what was said of railroad iron, which are bars of iron, cut into the required lengths, and holes punched in them; they were nevertheless considered to be bar iron, or iron in bars, and paid duty accordingly. (2) Samuel Richards would call these things, "pieces of bar iron," both bent and straight; he often sells pieces three or four feet long, each is called a "bar." Many articles are bought and sold as bar iron, which are not in bars. Should he receive an order for a ton of bar iron three feet, and another fifteen feet long, he would suppose they described the same article. (3) Benjamin Reeves calls the small one a "piece of rod" and the thicker one a "piece of bolt iron." He does not know what to call the large twisted pieces. The shortness of a piece of bar or bolt iron, does not change its character. He often sells short pieces as bar or bolt iron. Many articles are considered as bar iron, that are not straight bars. (4) Andrew M. Jones would call the thick one, a "piece of bolt iron"; the thin, a "piece of braziers' rod"; the bent ones, "pieces of bent round iron," but not at all a separate article of manufacture. He should import it as bolt iron. The shortness does not change the character of the article. He has cut several tons into harrow teeth and invoiced them as square bar iron. (5) Clement M. Buckley, calls it a "piece of bolt iron," a "braziers' rod." The bent piece is a piece of bolt iron bent for the purpose of making a link. The shortness of the piece does not change its character, it retains its character of bar iron. He rolls.

bars from twenty to thirty feet long, and then he cuts them. The cost is trifling. He cuts them sometimes to suit his wagon, sometimes into short pieces two feet long, to make sheet iron; it is nevertheless, known as bar iron, although cut expressly to make sheet iron. He would furnish one hundred tons cut into pieces of six inches long, for the same price as long bars.

These witnesses concur in testifying that these pieces of iron are not chain links; that they are bar or bolt iron cut into short pieces, and in no other respect differing from the long bar and bolt iron; and that this difference of length does not change either the character or denomination of the article. And this is what you are to decide, on a fair and intelligent consideration of all the evidence on the one side and the other. If you should be of opinion that they are not chain links, that they are not a new and distinct manufacture, that they have not assumed a new name or use in their present state, but you should also think they are not iron in bars or bolts, or bar iron, they would then be subject to a duty of fifteen per cent. under the general provision of the law of April 27, 1816, unless you can consider them as part of an iron cable or chain. Upon this there has been much contradictory testimony. Literally speaking a link or two links are a part, a constituent part of a chain, which is made up of many links. But it is alleged that, technically speaking, a part of a chain or iron cable, consists of a length of fifteen or twenty feet long, connected by what are called shackles. There is certainly a difficulty under the law in admitting this signification of "part of a chain." The act intends to put a much higher duty on an iron cable or chain, or part or parts thereof, than on bar iron. But if it may be brought in pieces of ten feet long, and without shackles, it will not pay the duty on iron cables because it is neither an iron cable or chain nor part of one. It will not pay even the duty of bar iron, because it is a manufacture of iron from the bar, not enumerated and specified in the act; and thus a manufacture evidently intended to be heavily taxed, will come in for a very low duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

It is for you to decide whether these pieces of iron are chain links, and if so, are they parts of a chain cable, and if not parts of a chain, can they be chain links. If you shall reject them as links, and also as parts of a chain or iron cable, are they bar iron? You will observe that the clause of the act of congress under which the thirty-seven dollars per ton is claimed by the United States, uses the terms "on bar or bolt iron," not on "iron in bars or bolts," as in the preceding clause and in other acts. You will naturally inquire whether this change in the expressions is inadvertent or intentional; is meant to describe the same or a different article. If the same, why is the phraseology changed? If different, in what does the difference consist? By "bar iron," are we to understand, a particular description of iron; in a certain state of manufacture; iron of a certain quality, kind, and character? Should you be told that an article was made of bar iron, would you understand that it was made of iron of a certain character and quality, as distinguished from pig iron, from bloom iron, from cast iron, without any reference to the shape, size or length of the bar or piece of iron from which it was made? On the other hand, should one speak of a bar of iron, or of iron in bars, would you not suppose he had reference to their form, shape, size and length? It has been proved that plough shares and sickles, or other articles of manufacture, are properly called "bar iron"; they are bought and sold by that name; but could we say that they are "bars of iron," or "iron in bars"? If we could not, there would seem to be a difference of meaning in the two forms of expression used in the same act of congress, unless this difference is controlled by other parts of the act. To give you another illustration of the effect of this change of phraseology. If we were to speak of a "pig of iron," or of "iron in pigs," would we not mean iron of a certain known quality or manufacture, in pieces called "pigs"; thus describing both the character of the iron, and the ordinary size and shape in which it is made? But if we were to speak of "pig iron," would we not intend to describe or signify the particular quality and kind of that iron, without any reference to its size or shape? If we had in our hand a piece of iron six inches square, we might say this is "pig iron," but could we say this is a "pig of iron," or, if more than one, "iron in pigs"? These are questions for your consideration so far as you shall deem them to be material, in deciding the issue you are trying. If then the terms "iron in bars," and "bar iron," in truth, in their common and proper understanding, as they are taken by commercial usage, do mean and intend the same thing, I would understand them also to mean the same description of iron, the same article of merchandise, in the act of congress. If, on the other hand, they have different significations, the one meaning merely the quality of the iron, and the other iron of the same quality in a particular form, we must so understand the act of congress; we must presume that congress understood the language they have adopted, as it is properly and commercially used and understood; and therefore that when they changed their expressions from "iron in bars or bolts" to "bar and bolt iron," they intended also the change of description imputed by the change of expression.

The defendant's counsel has endeavoured, with great industry and skill, to navigate his case between the bar iron on the one side, and the parts of an iron cable on the other, and to show you that chain links are neither the one nor the other. It is a narrow strait, but, it may be, not impassable. This you are to determine. He must not have the article to be "bar iron," but a manufacture from it called a "chain link," and intended for a chain cable; and yet this chain link must not be a part of a chain cable, or he falls into a greater misfortune than with the bar iron. It must be neither a bar of iron, which it originally was, nor part of a chain which it is intended to be, but something between them, with a known destination, name, and use. It will hardly meet Mr. Buckley's definition, who says: "An article that is completed and fit for some use, and known by some name, I call a manufactured article."

I submit the whole case to you; the questions in it are questions of fact, to be decided by the evidence you have heard. Your judgment must be on that evidence. Certainly on the construction of the law contended for by the defendant, chain cables may be brought here, in separate links, requiring only to be connected and welded, at a much lower duty than bar iron; while a chain cable or part thereof is subjected to a much higher duty. If, however, this be the fair construction of the act, or if it be a defect of the act, the defendant is entitled to the advantage it gives him. I ought to add that this bond is given for the straight pieces only, and therefore your verdict will have a reference only to them. You are not now called upon to decide upon the bended or twisted pieces.

The jury found a verdict for the United States, for one hundred and sixty dollars and ninety-seven cents.

UNITED STATES v. SAVAGE.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1830.

REVOLT OF SEAMEN—CONFINEMENT OF MASTER—AUTHORITY OF MASTER OVER MATE.

1. To constitute an endeavour to commit a revolt within the crimes act of 1790, c. 36 [1 Stat. 115], it is necessary that there should be some effort or act to stir up others of the crew to disobedience of the master.

[Cited in U. S. v. Peterson, Case No. 16,037.]

2. To constitute a confinement of the master within the purview of the same act, it is sufficient that there is a personal seizure or restraint of the master, although it may be for the purpose of inflicting personal chastisement upon the master.

[Cited in Lander v. U. S., Case No. 8,039; U. S. v. Huff, 13 Fed. 641.]

3. The master has authority to displace the mate, and all other subordinate officers, during the voyage. If he abuses his authority, he is responsible for the wrong.

[Cited in The Exchange, Case No. 4,594; Setzer v. The Sylvia De Grasse, Id. 12,676; The Topsy, 44 Fed. 634.]

4. Semble, that the mate is a seaman, within the crimes act of 1790, c. 36, § 12.

[Cited in U. S. v. Huff, 13 Fed. 633.]

Indictment against the defendant [Samuel P. Savage] who was mate of the ship Plato, Charles Knapp master: (1) For confining the said master, and (2) for an endeavour to commit a revolt on board of the ship, against the crimes act of 1790, c. 36, § 12. Plea, not guilty.

C. G. Loring, for defendant, in the course of the trial contended (1) that to constitute a confinement within the act, there must be an intention to confine the master. If the party seize the waster to inflict personal chastisement upon him, and not to confine him, it is a case not provided for by the act. Abb. Shipp. 141, note. (2) That the endeavour to commit a revolt must be established by some proof of an attempt to stir up others to revolt; for which he cited U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,337]; U. S. v. Hemmer [Id. 15,345]. (3) That the mate is not a seaman within the provision of the act of 1790, c. 36. 7 Conn. 239. (4) He also argued largely upon the facts, to show, that no case was made out against the defendant.

Mr. Dunlap, for the United States, on the first and second points, cited U. S. v. Bladen [Case No. 14,606]; U. S. v. Smith [Id. 16,345]; U. S. v. Hemmer [supra]. On the third point, he cited Baily v. Grant, 1 Ld. Raym. 632. On the fourth point he argued, that the facts were fully made out for a conviction of the defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice, after summing up the facts, said:

The point, whether the mate be a seaman within the reach of the statute, will be reserved for further consideration, if the verdict shall be against the defendant upon the other facts. But for the present trial, we hold that the mate is a seaman, and is to be so deemed for all the purposes of the statute.

As to the definition of an endeavour to commit a revolt, it seems unnecessary, after the numerous decisions in this court, to go at large into the subject. The court adhere to the doctrine, that to constitute an endeavour to make a revolt, there must be some effort or act to stir up others of the crew to disobedience of the lawful commands or authority of the master. However reprehensible in other respects the conduct of the party may be, if it has no such aim or object, he is not within the provisions of the statute.

In respect to the confinement of the master, we do not concur in the argument of the defendant's counsel. If the person of the master is in fact seized, or if he is in fact held in personal restraint, (whether for a long or a short time is immaterial,) it is a confinement within the meaning of the statute; and of course it subjects the party to punishment, unless he can establish, that it was done in justifiable self-defence, or for some other legal cause. It matters not, that the seizure or restraint was principally or wholly for the purpose of inflicting personal chastisement upon the master; that it was to beat, or to wound him, and not to deprive him of his command or authority on board the ship; or that the confinement was a means of personal punishment, and not an end. The law looks to the act, and not merely to the intent. If the seizure is unlawful, it is a confinement. The law esteems the person of the master sacred, and protects him from all restraint, which is unlawful.

There is another point, which has been suggested by the argument at the bar. How far has the master a right to displace the mate? We are of opinion, that he has this authority absolutely; and the mate is in such a case bound to submit. The master is the lawful agent of the owner for this purpose, and the authority is entrusted to him from motives of great public policy, to secure due subordination on board, and to promote the vital interests of navigation and trade. If the master abuses his authority, or exercises it in a wanton or malicious manner, he is responsible for his conduct. But his authority is conclusive upon all inferior officers. If he displaces the mate, the latter is bound to abstain from all future exercise of his ordinary authority on board of the ship. He is bound to deliver up the log-book, and resign the state-room set apart for the officers. He is not indeed to be treated in a harsh or disgraceful manner. He is to have suitable food and lodging, and conveniences assigned to him by the master. But like every other person on board, he is bound to submit to all reasonable commands, and to conduct himself in a quiet and inoffensive manner. Being no longer in office, he is to be deemed a quasi passenger; and his remedy for any grievance lies by an appeal to the laws of his country for redress, and not by any attempts to avenge his wrongs, or to inflict personal chastisement on the master.

Verdict for the defendant.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

The original action was debt by the United States, against the defendant in error [Abner Sawyer, Jr.], on a bond dated on the 17th March, 1809, for $3,746. The defendant craved oyer of the condition of the bond; and upon oyer granted, the condition appeared to be in the following words: "Whereas, the following goods, wares, and merchandize, that is to say, 130 thousand feet of boards, 9 thousand red oak hogshead staves, 100 thousand shingles, 150 red oak hogshead shooks, 15 quintals of fish in 20 boxes, as per manifest, now delivered to the collector of the customs for the district of Saco, are intended to be exported in the said vessel, called the Romeo, burthen 179 tons, to the island of St. Bartholomews. Now the condition of this obligation is such, that if the said vessel shall not leave the port without a clearance, nor shall, when leaving the port, proceed to any port or place in Great Britain or France, or in the colonies or dependencies of either, or in the actual possession of either, nor be directly or indirectly engaged during the voyage in any trade with such port, nor shall put any article on board of any other vessel; and if the certificate and other proofs, required by law, of the landing of the whole cargo of the said vessel at the aforesaid island of St. Bartholomews, or at any other island or place other than Great Britain or France, or the colonies or dependencies of either, or in the actual possession of either, shall be produced at this office within six months from the date hereof, then this obligation shall be void, otherwise," &c.

The defendant then pleaded in bar of the action several pleas: (1) "That said vessel did not leave the port of Saco aforesaid, without a clearance; that when leaving the port, she did not proceed to any port or place in Great Britain or France, or in the colonies or dependencies of either, or in the actual possession of either, during said voyage; that she was not directly or indirectly engaged during the said voyage, in any trade with such port; that she did not put any article on board of any other vessel; that said vessel returned from said voyage, and arrived at said port of Saco on the 26th June, 1809, and not before; he having before that time sold and delivered said cargo at said island of St. Bartholomews, pursuant to the condition of said writing; and then and there presented to the collector of said port of Saco a certificate of the sale and delivery of said cargo at said island; but which being informal, was objected to by said collector and refused; all which he is ready to verify," &c. To this plea the United States replied, "that the said vessel, in the writing obligatory aforesaid mentioned, after having departed, as aforesaid, from the port and district of Saco aforesaid, and touching at the island of St. Bartholomews aforesaid, proceeded to a port or place in a colony, province, or dependency of Great Britain, that is to say, of the king of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, to wit, the island of Grenada in the West Indies, said island not being a permitted port, and there delivered her said cargo, contrary to the condition of said writing obligatory, and the laws and statutes of said states, in such cases made and provided, and this they are ready," &c. The defendant rejoined, "protesting that said vessel did not proceed from said island of St. Bartholomews to said island of Grenada, or to any other island, port, or place within any colony or dependency of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, or of France, contrary to the condition of said writing declared on, and the laws of the United States; for rejoinder said, that the said vessel did pursue her voyage to, and arrived at said island of St. Bartholomews, and in the harbor thereof, and then and there duly entered said vessel at the custom-house, and remained five days; and this he is ready," &c. The United States sur-rejoinded, "that after the said vessel had arrived at the island of St. Bartholomews as aforesaid, viz. on the 1st day of May, 1809, the said vessel did proceed from thence to a port or place in the island of Grenada, in the West Indies, the same island of Grenada being a province, colony and dependency of Great Britain, that is to say, of the king of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, and afterwards arrived at said island of Grenada, and there delivered her cargo aforesaid, viz., at Portland aforesaid, contrary to the condition of said writing obligatory, and the statutes aforesaid, and this the plaintiffs are ready to verify," &c. To this sur-rejoinder the defendant demurred, and the United States joined in the demurrer. (2) For a second plea, the defendant pleaded, "that the writing aforesaid declared on, was demanded and received by said collector of said port of Saco of him the said defendant, by color of his, said collector's, office, and that the condition of said writing is not conformable to, or in pursuance of the statute of the United States in such case made and provided; and this he is ready to verify," &c. The United States replied, "that the condition of said writing, in the form that the same was taken, is conformable to and in pursuance of the statutes of the United States aforesaid, in such case provided; and this the plaintiffs pray may be inquired of by the court." The defendant rejoined, "and the said Sawyer likewise." (3) There was a third plea and replication thereto, which need not now be stated. The rejoinder averred, that said vessel did not depart from said island of St. Bartholomews, and proceed with said cargo to a port or place in said island of Grenada, and tendered an issue to the country, which was joined by the United States. This issue was never tried in the court below. The judgment of the court, as stated upon the record, is: "It appears to the court, that the condition of the writing declared on, is conformable to, and in pursuance of the law in such case made and provided, as alleged in the replication to the second plea in bar; and it is the opinion of the court, that the plaintiff's sur-rejoinder to the first plea in bar is bad and insufficient in law. It is, therefore considered by the court here, that the United States take nothing by their writ."

C. Jackson, for defendant in error.

STORY, Circuit Justice. It is exceedingly to be regretted, that this case comes before the court upon pleadings so informally and incorrectly drawn, and to add to our embarrassment, though a question arises upon the bond, as to its legality, the condition only is spread upon the record. Oyer of the condition of the bond only is prayed, and it is very clear that the oyer of that does not entitle the party to oyer of the bond itself; but it must be demanded of both, if wanted (Cook v. Remington, 6 Mod. 237), for the bond and condition are considered as distinct, the bond being complete without the condition, and oyer may be of one without the other (Cabell v. Vaughan, 1 Saund. 289, 290; 1 Saund. 9b, note 1). The plaintiffs might, indeed, by praying in their replication, that the bond might be enrolled, have relieved us from this difficulty; but they have not so done, and we are left to conjecture what are the contents of the bond itself, unless so far as the declaration states them, though the condition has a manifest reference to them.

I will now consider the various questions, which arise out of the pleadings and record, as they have been presented to the court. The bond is dated the 17th of March, 1809, and the writ was sued on the 18th, and served on the 21st of November, of the same year. Of course more than six months had elapsed before the commencement of the action. I am very well satisfied, that the sur-rejoinder of the plaintiffs to the first set of pleadings is bad, because it contains no matter, that had not been averred before, and was a mere evasion of the rejoinder. But, supposing it to be bad, the court will proceed to consider the other pleadings, and give judgment against the party committing the first fault. 4 Coke, 84; Cro. Eliz. 815; Strange, 302; Doug. 91, 94; 8 Coke, 120, 133b; Moore, 105, 269. It is not necessary to consider the rejoinder (though I have no doubt it is bad) or the replication, whatever may be the unskilfulness with which they are drawn, because, supposing the bond good in point of law, I am satisfied that the first plea is bad. That plea, after negativing any breach of the condition as to other parts, avers "that when leaving the port she (the vessel) did not proceed to any port or place in Great Britain or France, &c., during said voyage." Now this is a plain negative pregnant, and the words of the condition contain no such restriction, as during said voyage, nor is any voyage, on which the vessel was bound, particularly mentioned in the plea, nor otherwise stated, than in the recital of the condition of the bond, where it is said the goods mentioned in the manifest are intended to be exported in the Romeo to St. Bartholomews. The bond, whether well taken or not, is admitted to have been taken under the authority of the 13th section of the act of March 1, 1809 (chapter 91). Now, if by "during said voyage," were meant a voyage from the United States to St. Bartholomew, and back again to the United States, it ought to have been averred in the plea, that such was the voyage, and, perhaps, such a limitation, to wit, to the whole voyage, homeward as well as outward, would be a reasonable limitation of the language of the act. However, as to this, I give no opinion. It is very clear to my mind, that the words of the act, embraced in this part of the condition, comprise a single and distinct provision, and do not connect with the next ensuing clause, so as to make the words in that clause, "during the voyage," ride over both clauses, even if the court should restrict these words to the outward voyage only. On the contrary, each is a single and substantive condition. Any other construction would defeat the manifest intent of the whole act, and I know of no rule, by which a court are authorized to interpose a limitation, where the law has placed none, when the purposes of the law would thereby not only not be furthered, but would be completely frustrated. The object of the act was to interdict all commerce with Great Britain and France, and their dependencies. Now, if the mere proceeding to a permitted port, in the outward voyage stated in the bond, was a complete fulfilment of the condition, although the vessel and cargo ultimately proceeded to a prohibited port, the whole security and purpose of the bond would be completely destroyed. It is, undoubtedly, true, that if the legislative intent were clearly or by necessary inference expressed to this effect, it would be our duty to disregard all subordinate inconveniences. But we are asked to restrain a condition, where the law has used general terms, to exclude cases, which are within the provision, and in manifest violation of the act. I am not bold enough to adopt such a construction. As, therefore, the plea in its most liberal construction only declares, that the vessel, during her voyage to St. Bartholomews did not proceed to a prohibited port, which is too narrow an allegation of performance, and is a flat negative pregnant, it is substantially bad. But even supposing this part of the plea were good, yet the plea itself contains no sufficient answer to that part of the condition, which requires a certificate according to the forms prescribed by law, for it admits that no such certificate was produced, but only an informal certificate, which was no compliance with the law. It follows, therefore, that the plea is bad, in this respect, and if so, then it is clearly bad for every other purpose, for performance should have been shown in omnibus. On this plea therefore the judgment of the court below ought to have been for the United States. And if this were not so, yet the replication alleged facts, which showed a complete breach, standing unaffected by the subsequent pleadings.

I now proceed to the second set of pleadings, which terminates in an issue to the court, praying them to inquire whether the said bond be conformable to and in pursuance of the statutes of the United States in such case made and provided. This is so novel a prayer, and comes in so questionable a shape, that it is difficult to know how it ought to be treated. The rules of pleading are founded in sound sense, and have been relaxed by the courts from time to time as far, and perhaps further, than public convenience has required. Such a relaxation has often tended to negligence on the part of the pleaders, and sometimes to embarrassment in the judgment of courts, impressed as they must be with the desire of doing justice, yet divided by the conflicting and irregular averments in the pleadings. The issue purports to be in form an issue of fact, and in substance an issue in law, to be tried by the court. There is no form or principle, which is known to the common law, that can in the most remote degree countenance it, and we cannot support it here, unless we deliberately assent to the overthrow of all the principles of pleading. I am not prepared for such a determination, and have no hesitation in pronouncing the replication and rejoinder utterly insupportable. Had this been an original suit in this court, we should probably have decreed a repleader. But it has long been settled, that a court of error cannot award a repleader. 2 Saund. 319; Tidd, Prac. 813 The true mode of pleading would have been, to have spread the obligation and condition by oyer on the record, and if no other facts were necessary, to have demurred for the apparent illegality, and if other facts were necessary, to have averred them by way of plea.

As to the second plea, it is certainly very dry of averments. It does not state any voyage to be performed, any occasion on which the bond was required, or any demand made, or right refused under color of office previous to its execution. The allegations are, that it was demanded and received by the collector of Saco, by color of his office, and that the condition is not conformable to, or in pursuance of the statute of the United States in such case made and provided. Now certainly it is no objection to a legal bond, that it is taken colore officii, and it is quite impossible to say, whether a bond is taken conformable to a statute provided for a special case, unless the court can know, from the pleadings and record, what that case is. The present plea states no case, and alleges no illegal execution of the bond. The illegality, as stated in the plea, consists in the demand and receipt after the execution of it. If the bond were therefore good in its inception, and for aught that appears in the plea, it was so, no subsequent demand and receipt by the collector could ipso facto avoid it.

But notwithstanding the insufficiency of this plea to avoid the bond, yet as oyer of the condition has been demanded and had, the condition becomes, not as has been supposed, a part of the defendant's plea, but a part of the plaintiff's declaration. Com. Dig. "Pleading" (page 1); Carth. 513. Being, therefore, a part of the record, if upon the whole declaration it appears to the court, that the bond is void in law, judgment ought to be pronounced in favor of the defendant. 2 Term R. 669. But inasmuch as the bond itself is not on oyer spread before the court, and no specific facts are presented to show the occasion of giving the bond, the court cannot award such a judgment, if by possibility a single case could exist, in which the bond could be legally supported.

It has been argued on the part of the defendant, that the condition of this bond is not conformable to any prescribed by the laws of the United States, and that therefore it is void at law, because to every contract there must be two contracting parties, and the United States can contract only according to the regulations and authorities of statutes. The assent of the United States can be declared only through its authorized agents, and they cannot effectively assent, unless they are clothed with the authority by law. An assent, therefore, in a manner different from that prescribed by the law, is not valid, and consequently does not bind at all.

In the first place, let us consider whether the condition of this obligation is not conformable to the 13th section of the act of March 1, 1809, c. 91 [2 Story, Laws 1118; 2 Stat. 531, c. 24], for under that act it must in all probability have been taken. The 13th section is as follows: "That during the continuance of so much of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and of the several acts supplementary thereto, as is not repealed by this act, no ship or vessel bound to a foreign port, with which commercial intercourse shall, by virtue of this act, be again permitted, shall be allowed to depart for such port, unless the owner or owners, consignee or factor of such ship or vessel shall, with the master, have given bond, with one or more sureties to the United States, in a sum double the value of the vessel and cargo, if the vessel is wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States; and in a sum four times the value, if the vessel is owned in part or in whole by any foreigner or foreigners, that the vessel shall not leave the port without a clearance, nor shall, when leaving the port, proceed to any port or place in Great Britain or France, or in the colonies, &c. of either, or in the actual possession of either, nor be directly or indirectly engaged, during the voyage, in any trade with such ports, nor shall put any article on board of any other vessel; nor unless every other requisite and provision of the second section of the act, entitled 'an act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled "an act laying an embargo," &c. and the several acts supplementary thereto,' shall have been complied with. And the party or parties to the above mentioned bond, shall, within a reasonable time after the date of the same, to be expressed in the said bond, produce to the collector of the district, from which the vessel shall have been cleared, a certificate of the landing of the same, in the same manner as is provided by law for the landing of goods exported with the privilege of draw-back; on failure whereof the bond shall be put in suit, and in every such suit judgment shall be given against the defendant or defendants, unless proof shall be produced of such relanding, or of loss at sea." Now it is admitted, that the condition conforms to that section in all parts, except the last clause, respecting the production of certificates, which it is argued is not authorized by the section. It is to be regretted, that the legislature on any occasion should express themselves in ambiguous terms; more especially it is to be regretted, when the ambiguity arises out of laws highly penal. But courts are bound to take the laws as they find them, and to give a consistent construction, if possible, to every part of them. If the expressions admit of various constructions, they should adopt that which will effectuate the intention of the legislature, and avoid apparent absurdities. By this section, in order to entitle a vessel to depart for a foreign permitted port, it is one pre-requisite, that a bond should be given with conditions: (1) that the vessel shall not leave the port without a clearance; (2) nor shall, when leaving the port, proceed to any foreign prohibited port or place; (3) nor be directly or indirectly engaged, during the voyage, in any trade with such prohibited port; and (4) nor shall put any article on board of any other vessel. Another pre-requisite is a compliance with every other requisite and provision (by which undoubtedly is meant every other than the giving the bond) contained in the second section of the act of January 9, 1809, c. 72 [2 Story's Laws 1101; 2 Stat. 506, c. 5]. Now these requisites and provisions are, the lading the cargo under a permit from the collector, and also under the inspection of the proper revenue officers. Had the section stopped here, there would have been no room for doubt. But it then declares, "that the party or parties to the abovementioned bond shall, within a reasonable time after the date of the same, to be expressed in the bond, produce to the collector, &c. a certificate of the landing of the same," &c.; on failure whereof the bond shall be put in suit, and judgment rendered against the defendant, unless proof shall be produced of such relanding or of loss at sea.

It is here required, that the time for producing the certificate shall be expressed in the bond. Now this can only be in the obligatory part, or in the condition. It is hardly conceivable that it should be put in the former, and it could be proper only in the latter. Further, on failure of producing the certificate of the landing of the cargo, the bond is to be put in suit,—why? If the producing of the certificate forms no part of the condition of the bond, it certainly could be no ground for a suit. Every other part of the condition of the bond may be fully performed, and yet the cargo never have been landed in a foreign port. The suit might therefore be altogether nugatory. But this is not all. The section further prescribes, that judgment in such suit shall be given against the defendant, unless proof is produced of a relanding, or of loss at sea. It would be in the highest degree unreasonable to presume, that the legislature would declare an obligation forfeited by the omission to produce proof of things not at all within the condition of such obligation. It would be equally absurd to suppose them to require something as a discharge of an obligation, which never could affect its terms one way or the other. Now if the goods were relanded, or were lost at sea, there might have been a leaving of the port without a clearance, or a proceeding to a prohibited port, either of which would constitute a forfeiture of the bond. On the other hand, there might have been no departure without a clearance, nor proceeding to a foreign port, and yet the cargo might never have been relanded or lost at sea, and so the bond would be saved. When, therefore, the legislature prescribe, that the production of the certificate shall be expressed in the bond, it must mean, that it shall form a part of the condition of it; and when the nonproduction is declared to subject the bond to suit, and the defendant to judgment, it must mean, that the condition of the bond has been broken, and the judgment may rightfully be pronounced for the breach. I have therefore no doubt, that the condition of the present bond is a substantial compliance with the 13th section, and of course the whole foundation of the argument on this head fails. Judgment on this set of pleadings was therefore rightfully given for the United States.

Whether a bond voluntarily given to the United States can be avoided in any case, where it would be good and valid, if given to an individual? Whether such a bond, taken by a collector, under a general authority to take bonds in revenue cases, would be void on account of any irregularity or mistake in the condition? Whether such a bond, where the condition is partly conformable to, and partly variant from, the provisions of the statute, be void in whole, or good as to that part of the condition, which is conformable to law?—are questions, on which I give no opinion. It will be sufficient to decide such questions, when they arise; though with great deference I must suggest, that the principles, on which such bonds are to be adjudged wholly void, will encounter much opposition from the authority of decided cases. See later cases in courts of United States, and especially those in bonds given by public officers.

The third set of pleadings terminated in an issue to the country, which from the adjudication of the demurrer to the sur-rejoinder against the United States, became unnecessary to be tried in the district court. Tidd, Prac. 676; 1 Saund. 80, note 1. As I am of a different opinion on that point, it becomes an important inquiry, whether the cause can be remanded to be tried in the court below, or whether this court can issue a venire facias for the same purpose.

It has been argued by the counsel for the defendant, that this court, sitting as a court of error, cannot issue a venire facias de novo to try an issue of fact upon a reversal, where justice requires that it should be done. And Street v. Hopkinson, 2 Strange, 1055, and 1

Inst. 227, are cited in support of the position. And it has been farther contended upon the authority of Davies v. Pierce, 2 Term R. 53, 125, that the granting of a venire facias de novo, is of quite modern date, even in England. On examining the citation from 1 Inst. 227, I do not find that it bears at all upon the doctrine; but in the case from 2 Strange, 1055 (which is better reported in Cas. t. Hardw. 330), it was certainly held by Lord Hardwicke and the other judges of the king's bench, that a court of error could not award a venire facias de novo; and the reason assigned is, that no case could be found where it had been done, and it would be inconsistent to continue and transfer the proceedings of another court into a court of error. This reason is certainly by no means satisfactory. When the practice first began is perhaps not exactly ascertained; but about this very time, in Kynaston v. Mayor, etc., of Shrewsbury, 2 Strange, 1051, 7 Brown, Parl. Cas. 396, the house of lords awarded a venire facias de novo on error from the king's bench. The same award was soon afterwards made by the lords in Haswell v. Chalie, 2 Strange, 1124, and has continued downwards, as occasion has required. Lickbarrow v. Mason, 5 Term R. 367. Nor let it be supposed, that this was a peculiar authority, resting in the house of lords, for we have the authority of Lord Mansfield in Harwood v. Goodright, Cowp. 87, 89, that the lords could not as a court of error, have such jurisdiction, unless the court of king's bench had the same. But the doctrine does not rest on these adjudications, well founded as they are. In Grant v. Astle, 2 Doug. 722, on error from the common pleas, the court, on solemn consideration, awarded a new venire, and said, that there was no doubt, but it might be awarded by a court of error, and was not a new practice, and that upon inquiry, a great many cases had been found. The same doctrine has been uniformly recognised and adhered to by the king's bench ever since that time. Harwood v. Goodright, Cowp. 87; Bent v. Baker, 3 Term R. 27. And Davies v. Pierce, 2 Term R. 125, is a very strong authority to show the right, even upon error to a court sitting within another jurisdiction. In the state of New York, the practice invariably obtains (Brown v. Clark, 3 Johns. 443), and it has been deliberately adopted by the supreme court of Massachusetts (Keyes v. Stone, 5 Mass. 391; Wilson v. Mower, Id. 407). See, also, 2 Tidd, Prac. 776, 815; 3 J. P. Smith [Eng.] 39. I take the doctrine to be therefore incontrovertibly established, that at common law a court of error has a perfect jurisdiction to issue a venire facias de novo, whenever upon the record justice requires it.

I should not indeed have deemed it necessary to have examined this point so much at large (for at the argument I entertained no doubt on it) but for the total abandonment of it on the part of the United States. And it was certainly matter of surprise, that a doctrine so fully settled by authority, should have been yielded without an effort. But this authority, does not, as to the circuit court of the United States, depend altogether upon the common law, but is expressly given by statute. By the act of September 24, 1789, § 24 (1 Story's Laws, 63 [1 Stat. 85]), it is provided, "that when a judgment or decree shall be reversed in a circuit court, such court shall proceed to render such judgment or pass such decree, as the district court should have rendered or passed; and the supreme court shall do the same on reversals therein, except where the reversal is in favor of the plaintiff or petitioner in the original suit, and the damages to be assessed or matter to be decreed are uncertain, in which case they shall remand the cause for a final decision." If this court therefore are to render the judgment, that the district court ought to have rendered, then judgment must be, that the first and second pleas be adjudged bad; and that the third plea be tried by a jury. As there is a jury at the bar of this court, I do not perceive any necessity of remanding the cause to the district court, unless we are so required to do by the terms of the act. Now I think it very clear, that the exception in the latter clause of the above-mentioned act, is confined to the case of reversals in the supreme court, and does not apply to reversals in this court. The reason for remanding causes reversed in the supreme court was, that under the act of September 24, 1789 (chapter 20), no jury usually attended at that court; and upon writs of error in causes of equity or admiralty jurisdiction, the court could not examine any new evidence. Wiscart v. D'Auchy, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 321; Jennings v. The Perseverance, Id. 336. Whenever therefore the decision of the court below shuts out evidence necessary for the final decision of the cause, as to the plaintiff, no proper judgment could be given without remanding the cause for further proceedings. But the district court of the United States has no jurisdiction in equity causes; and in admiralty causes from that court, the revising power of the circuit court has always been exercised by way of appeal, which, according to well established principles, removes the cause for a hearing de novo, as well as to facts, as law. Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 281; Clerke, Praxis Adm. tit. 54. And in common law causes, this court can well try a cause at its own bar, as they have a jury for trials.

It has been urged, that the clauses in the 11th section of the act of 1789, which prohibit a person from being arrested in civil actions in one district for trial in another, or held to answer to process issuing from a court of any other district, than that wherein he is an inhabitant or commorant; by implication deny the right of this court to try causes from the district of Maine. But it is a sufficient answer to the argument, that these clauses apply only to original process; and that the same act gives this court appellate jurisdiction by writ of error over the defendants in all such causes.

It has been further urged, that there is no express authority in the act to award a venire facias de novo. But I apprehend, that such an authority is the necessary result of the language of the 24th section. And even in cases not within the words of that section, as on reversals in favor of the defendant, on account of a defective special verdict, (Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 268; Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., Id. 274), or on a bill of exceptions (Hudson v. Guestier, Id. 285, note), the supreme court have awarded a venire facias de novo. This authority must have been exercised upon the construction of the 24th section of the act, or upon the general principles of the common law. In either case, it seems to me that the authority of the court could not be brought into question.

I am therefore of opinion, that the issue of fact, which was omitted to be tried in the court below [case unreported] should be tried by jury at the bar of this court. As the district judges concurs in this opinion, let the judgment be reversed, and a trial be ordered at the bar of this court.

Trial ordered at bar.

A trial on this issue was had at the subsequent term, and the jury found a verdict for defendant. [Case unreported.]

INCOME TAX—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

Under section 6 of the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 257), which imposes a tax on gains, profits and income for the year 1871, and no longer, the amount of a promissory note taken in 1871, on the sale, in that year, of a patent right, but not due until some time in 1872, and paid in that year, is not taxable as income for 1871.

David L. Williams, for defendant in error.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The question on this writ of error is, whether the defendant was liable to an income tax for the year ending December 31, 1871, upon the amount of certain promissory notes. These notes were received by him during the year 1871, upon a sale of certain patent rights, in part payment of the price thereof. They did not become due until some time in the year 1872, and then they were paid. In my opinion there is no ground for this action. The tax was imposed for the years 1870 and 1871, and no longer, upon the gains, profits and income of every person residing in the United States. Act July 14, 1870, § 6 (16 Stat. 257). In the absence of any special provision of law to the contrary, income must be taken to mean money, and not the expectation of receiving it, or the right to receive it, at a future time. In this case, the defendant changed his patent rights for promissory notes payable in the future. Their value was uncertain; they might or might not be paid; but, until they were paid, they were not income, but only the ground of expecting income. The notes were no more taxable as income than would have been other patent rights, if the defendant had received them in payment of those he sold. There are in the next section of the statute (section 7) provisions which confirm this construction. It makes interest received or accrued upon all notes, bonds and mortgages, or other forms of indebtedness bearing interest, whether paid or not, if good and collectible, subject to the income tax. The purpose of this is evidently to prevent a man escaping the income tax, by abstaining from taking that which is due him. On the same principle, had these notes been due, and had the defendant allowed them to remain unpaid, there might have been room to contend that their amount should be regarded as income; but, not being due, when the income had become fixed for the year, they were no part of the defendant's income. The judgment was in accordance with the law and must be affirmed.

INDICTMENT—PLEADING—EXCEPTION IN STATUTE—PARTICULARLY REQUIRED—SPECIFICATIONS.

1. In an indictment under the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 166], for removing malt liquors without affixing and canceling the proper stamps, it is not necessary to negative the cases where the law authorizes a removal without affixing a stamp.

2. The presumption is that the liquor is only to be removed when sold or ready for sale, and if the removal was in a case allowed by law, that fact should be set up by way of defense.

3. Where an exception in an act does not occur in the enacting clause it is not necessary to set it out or negative it in the indictment. It is matter to be set up by way of defense.

Motion to quash an indictment under the revenue act for removing five kegs of lager beer, without affixing and canceling the stamp required by law.

J. O. Glover, U. S. Dist. Atty.

R. G. Ingersoll, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. I have examined the law bearing upon these questions which have been raised on this motion to quash, and shall be obliged under the authorities to overrule the motion. The objection taken against this indictment is that the defendant is charged with having removed five kegs of lager beer without affixing and canceling a stamp denoting the tax on said beer, and that by the internal revenue law lager beer was not subject to a tax until it was removed for the purpose of sale; that it might be removed for various purposes, such as to change the place of warehousing and various other purposes under the various provisions of the act of 1866 (Act July 13, 1866; 14 Stat. 166, §§ 53, 54), without subjecting it to a tax, and that it is therefore the duty of the pleader to negative in his indictment any and all of these innocent removals which a party might perform without subjecting his beer to a stamp duty; that is to say, according to the position taken by the defendant's counsel it was the duty of the pleader on the part of the government to negative all cases where the law authorized a removal without the affixing and cancellation of a stamp.

The case comes within the general rule which is laid down in Wharton (Whart. Cr. Law, § 292), and I think it fully answers the argument of the defendant. The clauses quoted and relied upon by the counsel are all of them in different sections from that which prescribes these penalties, and furnish exceptions to the general rule. The act taken together—the act of 1866, and all the acts amendatory of it—provides that beer is not to be removed from the place of manufacture until it is stamped; the presumption is, it is only to be removed when in condition for sale, and when it is sold. The removal is not to take place, under the general scope of the act, until the kegs are properly stamped and the stamps canceled. All the cases where removal can take place without the cancellation of the stamps are exceptional to the general principle of the act, and therefore the case comes within the principle laid down in Wharton: "It is not necessary to charge in the indictment anything more than is requisite to make out the offense." In other words, it is sufficient as a general rule to charge an offense in the language of the statute. That is a fundamental law of pleading.

The principle is understood by all members of the bar that where the exception does not occur in the enacting clause it is not necessary to set it out in the indictment, but where it occurs elsewhere than in the enacting clause, the exception may come in by way of defense, and it is not necessary for the pleader to set it out. The application of this principle disposes of this objection to the indictment.

The next objection made to the indictment is that it is too general. The language is that defendant on a certain time "did carry on the business of a brewer, and did then and there remove from his brewery a large number, to wit, five kegs of lager beer, and did then and there neglect to affix and cancel on said kegs the stamps required by law." The objection taken to this averment is that it is too general, that it does not point out to the defendant with sufficient particularity the specific offense with which he is charged, that is, the time, place and circumstances under which he committed the offense, so as to enable him to prepare for a trial. If this were an indictment for a felony, or was even a common law indictment, I think the objection would hold good, but coming under a class of offenses known as purely statutory, and a misdemeanor, where the pleading is much more loose, the rule has grown up, especially in the English courts under their revenue law, of requiring with these specific charges a bill of particulars whenever the defendant made it appear to the satisfaction of the court that it was necessary for the purpose of trial that he should have such specifications, pointing out the character of the offense so as to enable him to prepare himself properly for trial.

I shall therefore overrule this motion to quash the indictment, with the statement, however, that in all cases where the charge is general, like this, if the defendant asks for a bill of particulars, or that the prosecutor shall file in the case a detailed statement of the time and place of the occurrence described, I shall make a rule to that effect, in order that no excuse of want of certainty may delay the trial of the cause. The prosecution will then be held strictly within its bill of particulars and specifications.

Motion to quash overruled.

NOTE. The same rule above laid down by Judge Blodgett, was applied by Judge Drummond to a case of information for a forfeiture, where he held that it was not necessary for the information to allege that the case was not within a proviso in the statute; that it was for the defense to set up anything coming within the proviso. CONTEMPT—ATTACHMENT OF WITNESS.

An attachment of contempt, for not attending as a witness, must not be served in the court-house. If the witness arrives before service of the attachment, and makes a reasonable excuse, the court will countermand the attachment on payment of the costs of issuing it.

Three of the clerks in the public offices, being summoned as petit jurymen, were excused on that ground, on affidavit.

Attachment for not attending yesterday as a witness. He attended this day before the attachment was served. The deputy marshal (Pratt) had called the witness out of the room in which the court sat, into the corridor or vestibule adjoining, and which was the common entry into the court-room, and there served the attachment. Upon the witness being called upon to answer on oath to the attachment, and giving a reasonable excuse, he was discharged on payment of costs.

Afterwards, the same day, Mr. Woodward, for the witness, moved that he might be relieved from the payment of the marshal's costs of service of the attachment; and the above facts appearing on oath of the witness himself and admitted by the deputy marshal, THE COURT ordered the return of the attachment to be quashed, and the attachment to be entered countermanded, on payment of the cost of issuing the attachment.

APPRENTICE.

A master cannot bring his apprentice from Maryland and hold him in Alexandria.

Indictment [against Andrew Scholfield] for false imprisonment of James Carter, a mulatto boy.

Mr. Swann, for defendant, moved the court to instruct the jury, that the evidence does not support the indictment. The evidence was that the boy (who was a free mulatto) was bound to the defendant, in Maryland. The defendant brought him into Alexandria. By the law of Maryland the indenture was void if he carried him out of that state. The defendant having brought him to Alexandria, sold his time to Hodgkins.

THE COURT refused to give the instruction.

Mr. Swann then moved the court to instruct them that the indictment could not be supported without proof of a sale by defendant to Hodgkins, that being charged in the indictment.

Refused, the offence of false imprisonment being sufficiently charged, and the sale only matter of aggravation.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 12, 1847.

OFFENSES UNDER REVENUE LAWS — FORGERY OF SUPERVISOR'S CERTIFICATE—INDICTMENT.

1. An indictment for forgery under section 19 of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 120), in altering a certificate issued under section 41 of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 659), alleging that the certificate was issued by the collector ex officio, is bad on demurrer.

2. By the act of 1799, the certificate was to be issued by the supervisor of the revenue, and the indictment ought to allege that the collector was designated by the president to fulfil the duties of supervisor, under the act of March 3, 1803 (2 Stat. 243), and that the certificate was granted by the collector in that capacity.

Indictment [against Raphael Schoyer] for forgery. The 41st section of the revenue act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 659), provides that, in addition to a general certificate to be given to an importer of spirits, wines or teas, the surveyor or chief officer of inspection shall give to him a particular certificate, which shall accompany each cask, chest, &c., wherever the same may be sent within the limits of the United States, as evidence that the same was lawfully imported, and gives the form of such certificate. The 42d section of the same act (Id. 660) provides, that "the supervisors of the several districts shall provide blank certificates, under such checks and devices as shall be prescribed by the proper officers of the treasury, and shall number, sign and deliver the same to the officers who may perform the duties of inspectors of the revenue for the several ports in their respective districts; which blank certificates shall be filled up and countersigned by the inspectors of the revenue aforesaid, who shall be accountable therefor to the supervisors; and the said inspectors shall make regular and exact entries of all certificates which shall be granted as aforesaid, as particularly as therein described." The 44th section of the same act (Id. 660) provides, that every person who shall obliterate, counterfeit, alter or deface any of such certificates, shall, for each and every such offence, forfeit and pay one hundred dollars, with costs of suit. By the act of March 3, 1803 (2 Stat. 243), it is provided, that the president may attach the duties of the office of supervisor, in any district, to any other officer of the government of the United States within such district. By the 19th section of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 120), it is provided, that any person who shall falsely make, forge or counterfeit, or shall falsely alter, any instrument in imitation of or purporting to be a permit, debenture or other official document, granted by any collector or other officer of the customs by virtue of his office, or shall knowingly pass or attempt to pass as true any such counterfeited instrument or any such falsely altered certificate, with intent to defraud, shall be deemed guilty of felony. The defendant was indicted, under the act of 1825, for forgery, in altering a particular certificate issued under the act of 1799. The indictment alleged the certificate in question to have been issued by the collector of the port of New York, by virtue of his office. The defendant demurred to the indictment.

Francis F. Marbury, for the United States.
James R. Whiting, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. The instrument charged to have been forged was one which the supervisor of the revenue was authorized to issue by the act of 1799. The act of 1803 authorized the president to designate any other officer to fulfil the duties of supervisor. The indictment alleges that the collector issued the certificate ex officio. But no act of congress is shown, making him, as collector, supervisor also. If, from the fact of the collector's acting in the capacity of supervisor, it is to be presumed that he was designated, under the act of 1803, to perform the duties of that office, the indictment is still bad, in averring that he issued the certificate ex officio. It should have averred his substitution in place of the supervisor, and the granting of the certificate by him in that capacity.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—VIOLATION OF LAWS—COUNTERFEITING COLLECTOR'S CERTIFICATE.

[1. The certificate which the supervisor (or collector) is required by the 41st section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 659), to give to the importer of distilled spirits, to accompany the cask, as evidence that the same has been lawfully imported, is an "official document granted by the collector," within the meaning of the 19th section of the crimes act of 1825 (4 Stat. 120), which makes it a felony to forge or counterfeit such documents.]

[2. The provision of the statute that the certificate is to be "numbered, signed, and delivered" by the collector, and "filled up and countersigned" by the inspector, does not require that the collector shall affix his manual signature, and the instrument may be the subject of forgery, although his signature was printed.]

[3. But even if an original paper, executed with printed signatures, would not be good under the statute, yet, as it purports to be a genuine certificate, it would still be a felony, under the terms of the crimes act, to counterfeit it.]

BETTS, District Judge. To an indictment under the 19th section of the crimes act of March 3, 1825, the defendant, Raphael Schoyer, demurs generally. On the argument two principal grounds were taken in support of the demurrer: (1) That the instrument set forth, appears upon the indictment not to have been signed and granted by the collector, and is therefore void; and (2) that if properly issued, the indictment shows the original, which it purports to represent, was of no value, and could not be legally the subject of a forgery. The instrument is the special certificate required by the 41st section of the act of March 2, 1799, to be given the proprietor, importer, or consignee of any distilled spirits, to accompany each cask, &c., wherever the same may be sent within the limits of the United States, as evidence that the same have been lawfully imported. By the 42d section it is enacted, that the supervisors of the several districts shall provide blank certificates under such checks and devices as shall be prescribed by the proper officers of the treasury, and shall number, sign, and deliver the same to the officers who may perform the duties of inspectors of the revenue, for the several ports in their respective districts; which blank certificates shall be filled up and countersigned by the inspectors of the revenue aforesaid, &c. No distinct officer of the revenue seems to have been created by the acts of congress under the name of "supervisor," but the act of March 3, 1803, seems to recognize the existence of such officer in authorizing the president to attach his duties to any other officer of the United States within such district (3 Laws [Bior. & D.] 560 [2 Stat. 243]), and it is to be assumed, under the pleadings, that the collector was duly empowered to perform those duties.

The indictment alleges the certificate in question to have been granted by the collector by virtue of his office, in the particular form set forth, the signatures to which are "Edward Curtis, Collector, per N. Olcott," and countersigned "William Taggard, Inspector, by W. R. Grey," and the names of the collector and inspector, it is admitted, were printed, and not written by those officers themselves. The 19th section of the act of 1825 makes it felony to falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, &c., any instrument in imitation of, or purporting to be (amongst many others designated), a permit, debenture, or other official document, granted by any collector or other officer or the customs by virtue of his or their office. This is clearly an official document, granted under the requirement of the law, and one which must accompany the cask, and to which it applies as evidence that the same has been lawfully imported. It is quite unnecessary to consider whether counterfeiting such an instrument would be forgery at common law for the want of any intrinsic value in the genuine document, because the legislature here have created and defined the offence, and made it felony to falsify an official document of this character, without respect to any fraudulent intent in the act. Congress perceived a mischief, which it deemed important to suppress, in the simulation of its official documents, and has declared such acts felony, whether accompanied by a fraudulent use of them, or attempt or intent to use them.

The averments in the indictment are fully sufficient to bring this case within the description of offence given in the act of congress, and must be held sufficient on general demurrer (Archb. Cr. Pl. 27, 28; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 231, 232; Fost. Crown Law, 424), if the instrument was so executed as to become an official document [U. S. v. Turner] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 132. The last point is not without its difficulties. The certificate is to be "numbered, signed, and delivered" by the collector, and "filled up and countersigned" by the inspector. In ordinary acceptation, when a paper is required to be signed officially or by an individual, the manual signature of the person indicated is understood to be necessary. Letters patent must be signed by the president of the United States. Cutting v. Myers [Case No. 3,520]. The more modern decisions in England hold that wills must be subscribed by the testator (1 Wils. 313; 2 Ball & B. 104; 2 Ves., Sr., 459; 1 Ves., Jr., 11; 17 Ves. 458; 18 Ves. 175), though sealing has been sometimes regarded sufficient (1 Show. 68; 2 Strange, 764); and in Lemayne v. Stanley, 3 Lev. 1, it was held that it was a sufficient signature to a will for the testator to stamp his name thereto.

The word "subscribe" in the statute of wills or frauds has never been construed to require the actual writing of the name of the party with his own hand; making his mark or cross is held a sufficient signature (8 Ves. 185, 504); and undoubtedly directing another to write his name, and then publishing and declaring the instrument, would constitute a valid subscription (Rex v. Inhabitants of Longnor, 1 Nev. & M. 576). And also the direct acknowledgment of a testator or grantor of the signature to a will or instrument in writing is sufficient evidence of the authenticity of the signature, without proving the subscription to have been actually made by him. 2 Rev. St. p. 63, § 40; 2 Starkie, Ev. 228; Greenl. Ev. § 569, note 4. This statute should not be construed with any severer restrictions than are applied to the statute of wills, for it has reference to the transaction of the current business at a custom house, where calls for papers of this character may be exceedingly multifarious, and, if to be actually executed by the collector, might divert to that object a great portion of his time. Although the statute calls for attestation of the document by signing it, yet the certificate takes its effect and operation from being granted by the proper officers, and the terms of the statute would very reasonably, therefore, cover any act of the officers recognizing and acknowledging the validity of the certificate, and make it equivalent to proof of subscription. The collector is by the statute required to number, sign, and deliver the certificate to the inspector, &c., and the "blanks shall be filled up and countersigned by the inspector," &c. No doubt could be entertained that the law would be complied with if the collector had the numbering and delivering of the certificate made by a clerk, without any participation of his in those particulars, or if the inspector also had the blanks filled by another than himself; yet the language of the statute enjoined these services in exactly the same terms as that of signing and countersigning.

I am of opinion that a signature, written or printed, recognized and acknowledged by those officers as their own, is a sufficient signing and countersigning of the certificates to satisfy the requirement of the act, and that accordingly the instrument is valid, and operative as an official document. But, further, if an original paper so executed be not good under the statute, it yet purports to be a genuine certificate, and, within the case of U. S. v. Turner, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 132, the defendant would commit a felony by fabricating or attempting to pass it. The indictment charges the false making and counterfeiting, and the uttering, and attempting to utter, the forged certificate, knowing it to be forged, and purporting to be an official document granted by the collector of customs of this district, and on general demurrer I hold these allegations sufficient. Judgment is accordingly rendered against the demurrer, with order that the defendant plead to the indictment.

UNITED STATES v. SCHROEDER.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 29, 1877.

FEDERAL CONVICTS IN STATE JAILS—COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE—STATE LAWS.

1. The sentence of a convicted prisoner, sentenced to be imprisoned for twelve months, did not fix the place of confinement. The sentence was executed in Ludlow street jail. Ten months of the term having expired, the prisoner applied for his discharge, on the ground that, under the act of March 3d, 1875 (18 Stat. 479), he was entitled to a deduction of five days during every month: Held, that, as the state of New York had a system of commutation for its own prisoners, the deduction could not be allowed.

[Cited in Re Terry, 37 Fed. 652; U. S. v. Goujon, 39 Fed. 774; Re Deering, 60 Fed. 267.]

2. The prisoner would be entitled, under section 5543 of the Revised Statutes, to the deduction of one month, there allowed, on the certificate and approval required by that section.

Benjamin B. Foster, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Byron A. Cohen, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The prisoner, upon conviction, was sentenced to be imprisoned for twelve months. The sentence, as has been usual in this district, did not fix the place of confinement, and, accordingly, the sentence has been executed in Ludlow street jail, that jail being the one hitherto used for the temporary confinement of prisoners in this district. Ten months of the term of imprisonment having expired, the prisoner now applies to be discharged, upon the ground, that, by virtue of the act of March 3d, 1875 (18 Stat. 479), he is entitled to a deduction from the time of his imprisonment of five days during every month, no charge of misconduct having been sustained against him during his imprisonment. An examination of the terms of the act of March 3d, 1875, shows, that the deduction there provided for can be allowed only to persons confined in a state which has no system of commutation for its own prisoners. The state of New York has a system of commutation for its own prisoners (Laws 1863, c. 415, and Laws 1864, c. 321), and therefore, the deduction of five days per month, prescribed by the act of 1875, cannot be allowed. The fact that the state system of commutation does not allow any deduction to prisoners confined in jails does not affect the question. There is still a state system of commutation, and the fact of the existence of such a system takes the case out of the scope of the act of 1875, without regard to the particular provisions of that system.

To avoid a second application, I may say, that, although the prisoner is not entitled to the deduction allowed by the act of 1875, I am of the opinion he will be entitled to the deduction of one month, allowed by section 5543 of the Revised Statutes, upon the certificate and approval required by that section. The words, "state jail or penitentiary," used in that section, are not to be considered as intended to limit the provision to jails supported by the state at large, if, in any state, there are such jails, as distinguished from the common jails kept by the counties of the state, by virtue of state laws. They refer to the jails and penitentiaries within a state, whether state, city or county institutions, which are permitted by the state to be used for the confinement of the prisoners of the United States. Laws N. Y. 1847, c. 460, § 16. Ludlow street jail, in the city of New York, is, therefore, a state jail, within the meaning of section 5543.

Case No. 16,234.

UNITED STATES v. SCHULER.

[6 McLean, 28.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1853.

PUBLIC LANDS—REMOVAL OF TIMBER—INDICTMENT—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. The indictment charged the defendant with being employed in "removing from lands of the United States, at the mouth of the river Muskegon, in the county of Ottawa, and district of Michigan, a large amount of timber, to wit: one hundred thousand shingles and twenty cords of shingle bolts." The court held this description too vague and uncertain. That the locality of the trespass was inseparably connected with the offense, and the particular section or quarter section of the public domain must be stated, so as to protect the defendant from another trial, for the same offense, more particularly described according to the designations of the public survey. That the question was not one of jurisdiction; but pertained to the statutory description of the offense.

2. That the United States, as a great land proprietor, had the public lands officially surveyed, platted and designated, by fixed ranges, townships, sections, and quarter sections. These divisions were of record, and notorious, and the defendant was entitled to such a particular description that he might be apprised of what trespass he was called upon to defend. The mouth of the Muskegon might embrace more or less of the land of the United States, and comprehend townships or counties. The being "employed in removing timber from the lands of the United States," had reference to the well known and legally designated parts of the public survey, by which the national domain, other than that reserved, was purchased and sold.

3. The statute under which the indictment was found, constitutes part of the land law of the United States, and was designed for the protection and the preservation of both classes of the national domain by severe penalties. The term "other land" in the statute, has reference to its surveyed divisions, and contemplates the lands known and described in the public surveys as distinct from those reserved for naval purposes. The one was held for a special object; the other, by various enactments as trustee for subsequent purchasers.

4. The term "other lands" being general, and the intention manifestly requiring a specific application, in order to charge the particular offense, a particular description was necessary as to place. The general language, "lands of the United States," not sufficient, as descriptive of the offense.

5. The term "timber" in the statute, signifies, the standing and the felled trees prepared for transportation to a vessel or saw-mill, such as saw logs, or lumber in bulk; but does not embrace any article manufactured from the tree, as shingles or boards. The trees are those, the wood of which is generally used in ship and house building.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

6. It is not necessary in an indictment for removal, to allege that the timber was removed from the land on which it was grown or from which it was cut. But it must be stated that it was removed from the lands of the United States, specially described according to the public survey.

7. The allegation that the defendant knowingly committed the act, is unnecessary.

[Cited in U. S. v. Three Railroad Cars, Case No. 16,513.]

Mr. Hand, U. S. Dist. Atty.

WILKINS, District Judge. This indictment contains two counts. The first charges the defendant with "being employed," and the second with "aiding and assisting" in removing "timber from lands of the United States." The description of the offense is in these words: "That George Schuler, late of the village of Muskegon, in the county of Ottawa, on the 20th of June, 1853, at the mouth of the river Muskegon aforesaid, was employed in removing from lands of the United States, a large amount of timber, to wit: one hundred thousand shingles and twenty cords of shingle bolts, the property of the United States, of the value of one thousand dollars." The description in the second count, is in the same words, with the exception as "to aiding and assisting in removing," instead of "being employed to remove."

The act of congress of March 2, 1831 [4 Stat. 472], entitled "An act to provide for the punishment of offenses committed in cutting, destroying, or removing live-oak and other timber or trees reserved for naval purposes"—defines the offense as follows: "If any person shall cut, or be employed in cutting, or shall remove or be employed in removing, or aid and assist in removing any live oak or red cedar trees, or other timber, from lands of the United States, with intent to export, dispose of, use, or employ the same in any manner whatsoever, other than for the use of the navy of the United States, the person so offending, on conviction thereof, shall, for every such offense, pay a fine not less than triple the value of the tree or trees, or timber so cut, destroyed, or removed, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months."

Several reasons are assigned as causes of demurrer. We will notice them in the order in which they have been presented in the argument.

I. It is objected that the offense is not described in either count with sufficient certainty and precision. This objection, especially, has reference to the locality of the trespass. It is not charged that the timber was removed from any designated portion of the public domain. The language is general, "from lands of the United States at the mouth of the river Muskegon aforesaid." Where the locus in quo is so inseparably connected with the offense,—as in this statutory trespass upon the public lands,—such a description should be given, as would certainly protect the defendant from a second trial for the same offense, in which the indictment contained a more particular description as to township, range, section, or quarter section of land from which the logs were actually removed. It is not necessary to specify any of the political divisions of the state, merely as indicative of the jurisdiction of this court. It is sufficient to allege, that the trespass was committed within the district. Such an allegation is all that is necessary in most of the cases triable in the United States court. But this act of congress, (being part of the land law of the United States,) in the creation of this offense, had reference both to the naval reservation and the surveyed lands of the national domain, with the intention of preserving the timber on them from destruction, by the imposition of severe penalties. And the principal divisions and sub-divisions of the public surveys, being specially directed by statute, and of public record and notoriety, are unquestionably intended by the statutory language "other lands of the United States," in contradistinction to "the lands reserved." The usual fiction of "breaking the close" in actions or indictments, for trespass upon lands, or the necessary description in ejectment, is not designative of jurisdiction, but essentially descriptive of the particular property of the plaintiff on or concerning which the offense has been committed. The principle of the fiction is applicable to the indictment. The United States as a great land proprietor, for their preservation, protection, and sale, has had the public lands officially surveyed, and by various agencies and functionaries has had platted off and designated by fixed boundaries and sections, the national domain.

A description, then, omitting the material averment of the particular division from whence the timber was removed, is too vague and uncertain. A removal from a body of water, is not a removal from land. Such would not answer in an action for civil damages, much less then, in an indictment, which should be specially descriptive of the offense charged. An individual owning several parcels of land in the same township and county, must specify in his action, with distinguishing certainty, which one of his farms has been injured by the trespass for which he seeks reparation. It would not do, to describe the same generally as by county or townships, where such description would not specify, and where specification was necessary. The "mouth" of a river may embrace for many miles land on either side, and the land adjacent may comprehend more townships than one, it may be more or less extensive, and the lands on its banks or borders be varied as to ownership. In a case then, so seriously involving character, property, and personal liberty, the defendant is entitled to a more specific accusation. The river Muskegon may water, and the county of Ottawa may comprehend a large extent of country, and such averment is no notice to a defendant, as to what particular tract of the lands of the United States, he is called upon to defend. It might as well be "the United States lands" in the county of Ottawa, or the "United States lands in the district of Michigan." No doubt, other lands are held in the county, and at the mouth of the river by individual owners, and so far, such description might generally distinguish the government lands from those entered at private sale. But the patent or deed, to an individual, of government lands, describes his purchase by the well known returns of survey, and the marks on the ground, and that which remains unsold is as well known and as easily ascertained. The defendant therefore should be apprised by the indictment of the particular subdivision to which the alleged offense attaches. It is not a question of jurisdiction that the venue settles, but a matter of essential description.

A part of the statutory definition of the offense: material to be proved, and therefore material to be averred. 1 Stat. 465; 4 Stat. 472; 5 Hill, 401; 3 Blackf. 193; 1 Chit. Pl. 234; Cowper, 682; 3 Greenl. Ev. 12; U. S. v. Wilson [Case No. 16,730]. The case of U. S. v. Wilson [supra] does not conflict with this view. The offense was robbing the U. S. mail in the Eastern district of Pennsylvania. Not necessary to prove and therefore unnecessary to aver particular locality, as essentially connected with the crime. But here the offense is not the destruction or removal of timber on wild land, not merely the removal of timber, belonging to the United States, but the destruction or removal of timber on and from the lands of the United States, and (with reference to prior enactments) from the surveyed lands of the United States.

II. But it is urged by the government, that the description of the offense is of sufficient certainty, because such description is in the very words of the statute. The words of the statute are, "employed in removing any live oak, or red cedar trees, or other timber, from any other lands of the United States." The lands of the United States other than those designated and reserved for naval purposes, constitute the premises from which the timber is removed, being employed in which, comprises the offense defined in the statute. What, then, are the essential words of the statute? Certainly those which signify the act, such as "employed in removing;" also its specific character "other timber," and also the place where the act was done, viz: "on other lands." By following, then, the precise words of the statute, is the offense so described as to apprise the defendant with sufficient certainty of the particular matter with which he is charged? If so, the description is sufficient, being in the words of the statute. But, if otherwise, if there be obscurity and uncertainty, the description is not sufficient, although the statute is followed in totis verbis. Such is the rule in [U. S. v. Gooding] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460, the governing case. Mr. Justice Story, who gave the opinion of the court, says: "That where an indictment follows the language of the creative statute, it is as certain as the statute, and in general such certainty is sufficient;" but he further remarks: "There are cases where more particularity is required, either from the obvious intention of the legislature, or from the application of known principles of law. Courts have thought such certainty not unreasonable or inconvenient," but "calculated to put the plea of autre fois acquit, or convict, fairly within the power of the defendant." "The course has been," observes the court, "to leave every class of cases to be decided very much upon its own peculiar circumstances." The case of U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 138, does not conflict with this general rule and exception. And those cited from McLean, Mason and Gallison, would not modify, even if considered in conflict. This court takes the law from the supreme court of the United States, and if the point in controversy has been there adjudicated and settled, it is unnecessary to waste time or strength in protracted commentary upon either English or state authorities. "Ita lex scripta est,"—the authority is conclusive,—so is the law, and the "stare decisis" of the supreme court is mandatory. This case then establishes this rule, viz.:—That in statutory offenses the description of the statute is to be followed, except where more particularity is required from its "obvious intention, and the application of known principles of law." Cases may arise,—cases have arisen,—where it would not be safe for the pleader to follow the statute; as for instance, where the statute uses general terms, which manifestly require a specific application, in order legally to charge the particular offense.

Now, what is the obvious intention of the statute of March 2, 1831, providing for the punishment of offenses, committed in cutting, destroying, or removing live-oak and other timber, or trees reserved for naval purposes? Its title and history exhibit its object.—The provisions of the prior statute, exclusively protecting lands reserved from sale for naval purposes, were by this act extended to other lands, and measurably to other timber, than live-oak or red cedar. Protection and preservation of the surveyed landed dominion of the United States—whether north or south, whether growing timber or not;—preservation from spoliation of the surveyed lands, and keeping them, as ordained by Nature, attractive to purchasers, was the sole object and spirit of this amended and extended law. This is obvious from the consideration that the naval reservation and the unsurveyed lands, are not dedicated either to settlement or sale. Within the territorial limits of the United States, and acquired by treaty from the Indians, the unsurveyed dominions await legislative action, the further fostering care of the government, and the progress of population, in order to be appropriately redeemed from the obscurity and helplessness of the wilderness. Conceived, but not born—in embryo, but not legally in existence, they await the breath of law, to give them legal being and ensure them legal protection. The land law, for the punishment of this description of trespass, does not embrace the unsurveyed tracts of the public land. They may need such legislation, but it is not yet given. When the act of 1831 was passed, the revenue arising from the land sales, formed a prominent item in the treasury, and was an important object of national solicitude. Its annual increase by salutary legislation—holding forth inducements to the settler and purchaser, and its collection, were the leading motives of the land legislation for many years preceding. The government did not seek the preservation of the timber growing on its lands (with the single exception of the naval reservation,) with the motive of enhancing their value for ornament, or special use, or speculation, but singly with the view of inducing speedy sale and settlement, and preserving for the purchaser, at government price, the lands as they stood. If the evil then to be remedied by the statute was the spoliation of the surveyed lands; and the remedy to be applied the preservation, by sufficient penalties, of its valuable timber—if regard is to be had to this manifest intention, certainly, cutting timber on the surveyed United States lands, must necessarily be described with reference to their legal notorious divisions and subdivisions, indicated in statutes pari materia, and of public record. It is true, that cutting timber on lands of the United States is the offense, in the words of the statute. But such description would not indicate on what part of the lands of the United States the trespass was committed. And as the lands of the United States are divided and subdivided—by official surveys and plats—the description required by the statute, and the "application of known principles of law" demand that the indictment should conform to a statutory designation, exhibiting the range, township, section, and quarter section, on which the trespass was committed. This is not inconvenient, certainly. This is not, certainly, unreasonable,—this is certainly calculated to "put the plea of former acquittal or conviction fairly within the power of the defendant." Should the defendant be acquitted, on a charge describing the cutting, or removing, on lands of the United States, at the mouth of a river, in a certain county and district, and be subsequently indicted for the same offense, describing the range, township, section, and quarter section, to what purpose could the record of the first case be evidence? The first description did not necessarily include or cover the latter, and without testimony establishing the fact, it could not be inferred. In the post office case, the offense defined was embezzling and secreting, and not stealing the particular enclosure. The breach of official trust was the offense. The descriptive words of the statute are all that are necessary. The name of the bank, or the genuineness of the note, is only necessary as to corroborative evidence, and may or may not be used in the indictment. The article of value, if stated, is proved by the note taken; but the fact itself is not essential to establish the offense of embezzlement, neither is it necessary to describe the letter by its superscription.

This statute itself, illustrates the point in consideration. For cutting down, or removing naval timber, it would not be sufficient to state merely that the act was on lands of the United States; but on specific and reserved lands. So here; cutting on lands of the United States would embrace the extent of the venue or jurisdiction, and leave the defendant on a wide sea, without chart or compass, to direct him to what particular trespass he must apply his defense. The court considers that the land law of the United States furnishes the chart, and that the government must observe it in these prosecutions.

III. But it is further objected to the sufficiency of this indictment, that it does not describe any offense whatever. The words of the statute are, "being employed in removing timber." In the indictment, the word "timber" is used with a videlicit, explaining it to mean "shingles and shingle-bolts." This explanation is material, for without it, no charge is specially expressed. "Timber" is a generic term. The question then arises as to the interpretation of the word "timber." However the word may be used in common intercourse, or whatever construction has heretofore judicially been given to it, in connection with other legislation, this court will be guided and controlled by the manifest intention of the legislature in its use, and the object of the act of congress. Unless the contrary clearly appears from the context, it will be presumed that the word was employed in its ordinary popular sense. It is not the interpretation of an artistic or technical word, or a word of equivocal meaning. It is a word in common use, and has an enlarged or restricted sense, according to the connection in which it is employed. Keeping in view the spirit of the statute, the evil which it designed to prevent, and the remedy intended, looking to this and other statutes on the same subject, such an interpretation must be given to the word as will effect, and not defeat, the legislative will. As a generic term, it properly signifies, only such trees as are used in building—either ships or dwellings. [U. S. v. Castillero] 2 Black [67 U. S.] 281; 1 Crabbe, Real Prop. § 20; 2 Burrell, Law Dict. tit. "Timber." But its signification is not limited to trees: it applies to the wood, or the particular form which the tree assumes when no longer growing or standing in the ground. Strictly speaking, a tree is that which is growing or standing in the ground whether alive or dead. There are dead and live trees, both standing. But when the trunk is severed from the root, and felled to the earth, it is no longer, properly speaking, a tree. It becomes timber or lumber, according to the use to which it can be applied. A forest of standing trees, if they can be appropriated to building, is called well timbered land, but loses that designation, if swept to the earth by a tornado.

The legislature is presumed to be acquainted with the varied use of the word, and to have employed it in the statute, in an enlarged or a restrictive sense, according to its connection with the subject matter; thus, when used in the act of 1817, in the plural number, "red cedar timber," it signifies "standing or growing trees," and when in the 4th section, (prohibiting its exportation,) it is used in the singular number, "timber," it evidently applies only to the tree cut down, and prepared for transportation in ships. So that in the same act, according to its association, does it bear two different significations; one, enlarged—embracing the trees of the forest, as standing; and the other a restricted, special meaning, applying only to the use to which the wood can be appropriated. And in the act of congress under consideration, the same varied use is made of the word. When the cutting is prohibited, it is synonymous with trees: "Cutting any other timber on—" i. e., felling them to the earth;—when removal is prohibited, removing any other timber "from," it is applicable to the restricted sense of the trees being felled to the earth, and prepared by the labor of man, on the ground where cut for transportation; and where the statute embodies both significations in the phrase "other timber, standing, growing and being." "Standing and growing" mean when alive as trees, erect in the earth; and "being" is applicable to their character, cut and ready for use. That this distinction exists in the statute, and was in the contemplation of the legislature, seems evident from the use of the term in the second section, wherein the timber cut is used with reference to its being taken on board of a vessel. If cut, it was no longer a tree; if to be taken on board of a vessel, it is no longer a tree. Trees are not transported in vessels from place to place; but timber is, and dropping the word tree, in this section, and using the word "timber"—in connection with "red cedar and live oak cut,"—leaves no doubt in my mind, in regard to the legislative use of the word in the first section, prohibiting the being "employed in removing any live oak or red cedar trees or other timber." In this connection it is employed to signify the felled trees, prepared for use and transportation, and embraces the various uses to which timber can be appropriated, either in ship or house building—whether pine logs, square pine timber, or any other form in which the cut trees are prepared, either for the saw mill or transportation. It was not the intention of the act of congress, to punish the removal of any article manufactured from the timber cut upon the public lands; such as masts, bowsprits, oars, breakers, casks, boards, tubs, buckets, barrows or hand-spikes; or, to pursue the felled tree as timber further than such preparation of the wood as was necessary for its transportation to the saw mill, or other place of manufacture. Beyond such purpose the article became transmuted. Its nature and use changed. It was no longer timber. Its character as timber ceased when the labor of the lumberer ceased, and the art of the manufacturer commenced. When the article is once perfected for immediate use, it is only known by its appropriate name; and is no more timber than bread is flour, or flour, wheat, or mutton, sheep,—or beef, oxen;—and such also, are shingles, made of pine timber, because they are perfected by man's art for immediate use. We do not say that a dwelling is timbered, but shingled.

Timber logs or timber bolts are brought from the woodland and converted at the saw mill into boards, or scantling, or laths, or shingles; and the latter has a well known and fixed meaning, known to the legislature, and certainly never meant by their term "timber," in the act of 1831. It is true that "fat oxen" are provision and munitions of war, according to case cited from 2 Peters: there, the genus "provision" covers the species "oxen." But "provision" is not fat oxen—it may consist in something else; and here timber, as a genus, by no means includes a manufactured article, which does not bear to it the relation of a species. Timber is the genus of the various trees dedicated by custom to a particular use—such as the pine, the ash, the oak, the cedar, and the chestnut; but certainly not to the articles manufactured therefrom, or otherwise a frame building might be considered a species of timber. But to make the antecedent terms in the statute limit the word to their specific character as trees, would be unnecessary repetition, and clearly defeat the object in view of inhibiting the principal evil designed to be prevented, viz., the illicit commerce between the cutters and those who traded in timber cut. Such was the object of the act of 1817, and with a like view the provisions of the law were extended to the whole surveyed national domain. The question, then, is not as to the popular meaning of the word, considered as trees growing, or as hewn logs in transitu to the saw mill; but its statutory signification; not its lexicographic, but its signification in the statute, and how it is here legislatively employed. And should such a construction be now given, as to confine the penalty for removal of trees, as such, the act would defeat itself. If applicable to trees only, the preservation of naval timber so earnestly desired by the government, would be extremely precarious; and if the word is used in its enlarged sense as to naval timber, it must have the same meaning when applied to other lands than naval lands.

But it is further assigned as a cause of demurrer, that more of the counts for removing timber, aver that it was removed from lands on which it was grown and cut down. The charge is that the defendant was employed in removing from lands of the United States. Now, if the indictment contains the proper averment specifying the lands by township, range, section, and quarter section, this statement would clearly indicate the character of the lands from which the timber was removed; and keeping the object of the statute in view, and interpreting the term "lands" as employed in the statute, to refer exclusively to the surveyed national domain, held forth by the government for entry and sale, in contradistinction to other real estate belonging to the general government, such as dockyards and arsenals, we must hold the charge contained in the indictment to be sufficient. Taking timber from the United States arsenal without permission, may or may not be a felony, according to the circumstances which surround the act; but it is not the offense described in this statute. Neither is it necessary to aver in the indictment that the timber was removed from the particular section of the United States lands where it was grown and cut. Such a fact need not be proved, to support the specific accusation that the timber was removed from specific lands. The statute, with a view to preserve the lands from being despoiled, has prohibited not only the cutting down, but the removal. The offenses are distinct. As to the former, such proof is necessarily connected with the cutting; for how could the charge be maintained, without the other fact being established, that the trees were growing or standing when felled? But to remove that which has been already cut down from section to section, and across section lines, either direct to the mill, or to an adjacent stream for floating, is another and a distinct offense, to be established by evidence showing the removal to be from that part of the public domain described. One offender may cut the timber, another may convey it across the section lines to a place of embarkation on the water, and if eventually removed from the United States lands appropriately described, the offense of removal, or being engaged in removing, is fully made out. That the timber was not the timber of the United States is a matter of issue. But as Mr. Justice Story observes in the oft-cited Case of Gooding [12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 460], the charge is "the precise language of the statute." "Employed in removing timber from the lands of the United States," communicates to the accused a definite accusation, by which he cannot be misled, and is unequivocally stated, so as to apprise him of the offense charged and what he is to defend. Here the particularity required as to the locus in quo is not necessary; and the ruling of the supreme court in the Case of Gooding is directly applicable.

Another exception is taken to the form of the indictment apparently involving the intention, with which the alleged criminal act was committed. It is not stated in the indictment that the act was knowingly committed. The statute does not require such an averment. If the defendant was employed as charged, he must have known the character in which he acted, and the business about which he was engaged. Besides, the offense described in the 2d section of the law clearly shows the intention of the legislature, that, in the case of freighting a vessel with this timber, the guilty knowledge must be established against the owner or captain; while such proof is not required in the offenses described in the 1st section, but the fact will be presumed, leaving to the defense to rebut such presumption by evidence showing mistake, ignorance of the section lines, and that the trespass was committed under the well-grounded belief that the timber removed was timber removed from other lands than those of the United States. It may be otherwise as to the omission of such terms as would exhibit the unlawfulness of the act, but that point is held under advisement and until further argument, as it is involved in the motion in arrest of judgment in the case of Thompson.

I have thus carefully considered the points presented in the unusually protracted argument as to the validity of these indictments. It is much to be regretted that demurrers were not interposed at an earlier period, before jurors and witnesses were brought to attend this court. Not only would it have been expedient for the interests of the government, but more satisfactory to the court called upon to decide grave questions of law, during the progress of its session, with a jury, and parties, and witnesses awaiting its action. Such should not be the case, and where causes of a criminal character are hereafter continued from one term to another, with the opportunity in the interval of presenting the law involved by demurrer, the court will not permit while a jury is in attendance, the objections to the indictment in this form to be discussed, but will compel defendants to proceed to trial, and reserve for the action of the court, after verdict, all considerations involving the construction of statutes, or the sufficiency of the pleading.

In the case of George Schuler and Paul H. Howard, the demurrer is sustained.

UNITED STATES v. SCHUMANN.

Circuit Court, D. California. 1866.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE—POWERS OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT-ATTORNEY—OF UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS.

1. The district-attorney of the United States has no absolute power to dismiss a criminal charge while an examination of the accused is proceeding before a commissioner.

[Cited in U. S. v. Ebbs, 10 Fed. 373, 49 Fed. 152.]

2. After indictment found, and before trial commenced, the district-attorney has absolute power to enter a nolle prosequi. But while the charge is under examination, either before a commissioner or the grand jury, he attends only as counsel of the government, to present the evidence against the accused; and has no control over the course to be pursued.

[Cited in U. S. v. Ebbs, 10 Fed. 373, 49 Fed. 152.]

3. The powers and duties of commissioners, in criminal cases,—explained.

[Cited in U. S. v. Scroggins, Case No. 16,244.]

Question certified for the opinion of the court by a United States commissioner. One Schumann, having been brought before a United States commissioner at the city of San Francisco, for examination upon a charge of having committed a public offense against the laws of the United States, the district-attorney proposed, before the examination was completed, to dismiss the proceeding. The commissioner applied to Judges FIELD and HOFFMAN, then holding the circuit court, for their opinion as to the power of the district-attorney to do so. The following opinion was rendered in answer to this question.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and HOFFMAN, District Judge.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. We have looked into the question upon which the commissioner has asked the opinion of the court as to the control of the district-attorney over criminal proceedings pending before him; and will briefly state the conclusion we have reached. The district-attorney, we are informed, asserts an absolute right to dismiss any criminal proceedings before the commissioner both before and after the examination of the accused. The commissioner, on the other hand, denies such control, and insists that his authority is independent of any action of the district-attorney, and is to be exercised in all cases as his judgment may dictate upon the evidence presented.

The office of commissioner was created by the act of February 20, 1812, and his duties were at first limited to taking acknowledgments of bail and affidavits. By several subsequent acts his powers have been greatly enlarged. Among other things, he is invested with all the authority to arrest, imprison, or bail offenders against the laws of the United States, which any justice of the peace or other magistrate of any of the United States can exercise under the thirty-third section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 91]. That section provides that "for any crime or offense against the United States, the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any justice of the peace or other magistrate of any of the United States where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by this act has cognizance of the offense." The same act also authorizes the commissioner, upon any hearing before him, when the offense is charged to have been committed on the high seas, or elsewhere within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, in his discretion, to require a recognizance from witnesses for their appearance at the trial. He is thus made a magistrate of the government, exercising functions of the highest importance to the administration of justice. He is an examining and committing magistrate, bound to hear all complaints of the commission of any public offense against the laws of the United States in his district, to cause the offender to be arrested, to examine into the matters charged, to summon witnesses for the government and for the accused; and to commit for trial or to discharge from arrest according as the evidence tends or fails to support the accusation. For the faithful discharge of his duty in these particulars he alone is accountable. He has no divided responsibility with any other officer of the government; nor is he subject to any other's control. The district-attorney may appear before the commissioner, and attend to the presentation of the evidence—but in that position he is only counsel of the government; he cannot direct what finding the magistrate shall make, nor what course he shall pursue. The magistrate will, indeed, in any case, hesitate to continue an investigation after the prosecution has been abandoned by the legal officer of the government. Still, there may be cases where he will be justified, and more, bound to take such a course. While the charge is under investigation, before either the commissioner or the grand jury, the district-attorney has no absolute power over the case. His duty requires him to attend the sessions of the grand jury; to advise that body of the law upon points desired; to examine witnesses; and, when directed, to draw indictments. But he cannot control the action of that body, and, by declaring that the government will not prosecute any particular case, prevent its consideration. The duty of that body is to inquire into all matters charged to be offenses against the United States, committed or triable in the district, and its power is in this respect unlimited. It is only at a later stage of the proceedings that the prosecution comes entirely under the direction of the district-attorney. After indictment found and until trial commenced, his authority may be said to be absolute. He can then abandon the prosecution at his pleasure. He can enter a nolle prosequi, even without the consent of the court. He can do this before the arraignment of the accused; or he may do it after issue joined; he can do it at any time until the jury is impanneled; and after the trial has commenced he can do it with the consent of the defendant. Having power to this extent over the prosecution after indictment found, it might seem to be a matter of little practical importance, whether the proceedings terminate at his instance before the commissioner, or subsequently by a nolle prosequi before the court.

But the question is not as to what course the prosecuting attorney of the government may subsequently pursue in case his direction to the commissioner is disregarded, but how far that officer is bound to act upon the direction; and we are clear that he must act upon his own judgment of the law and evidence, and not upon that of any other person. And it is important that each officer of the government should take his appropriate share of responsibility, without reference to the possible action of others.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1831.

OBSTRUCTION OF PRIVATE WAYS — INDICTMENT — PUBLIC ROADS.

1. The obstruction of a way laid out for the accommodation of the owners of certain lots, by the original proprietor thereof, and not as a common highway, is not properly the subject of indictment; and the circumstance that the public might pass over a road does not make it a public road, although laid off and dedicated by the original owner of the land as a public road, and ever since used as such.

2. There can be no public road in the county of Washington, D. C., out of the cities and towns, unless it be recorded as such in this court or the levy court.

[Followed in U. S. v. Emery, Case No. 15,052.]

Conrad Schwartz was indicted for obstructing a public highway.

Mr. Key, for defendant, contended that it was only a private way for the accommodation of those who purchased lots of General Forrest. There can be no highway in Maryland unless it be of record, and to be repaired by the county; and he cited Act Md. 1785, c. 49, respecting private ways (3 Har. & J. 436), and Act Md. 1704, c. 21, for the marking and recording of public roads.

Mr. Swann, for the United States, contra, cited Rex v. Lloyd, 1 Camp. 260; Daniel v. North, 11 East, 375; and 1 Hawk. P. C. 366.

Several deeds were produced, and read to the jury, from General Forrest to sundry persons, bounded by this road, calling it a public road, as laid out by Archibald Orme.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) instructed the jury, at the prayer of the defendant's counsel, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that the road was laid out or reserved by General Forrest, in selling out the lots of his land, as a road for the accommodation of the lot-holders under his sales, and not as a common highway, then the obstructing of the road is not properly the subject of indictment. And further, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that the road was intended and laid out by General Forrest for the accommodation of the lot-holders who purchased under him, then the circumstance that the public might pass over it, does not make it a public road.

Mr. Swann then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should be of opinion that it was laid off and dedicated by U. Forrest, the original owner of the lands through which the said road passed, as a public road, and has been, ever since, used as such, then it would be competent for the jury to consider it a public road and common highway.

But THE COURT (THURSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to give that instruction; but instructed the jury that there could be no public road in this county, out of the cities and towns, unless it be recorded as such in this court or the levy court. See Act Md. 1704, c. 21.

NAVIGATION OF STEAM VESSELS—SAFETY OF PASSENGERS—LICENSED PILOTS ON OHIO RIVER—VIOLATION OF STATUTE.

1. The act of congress of August 30, 1852 [10 Stat. 61], providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels, propelled in whole or in part by steam, requires that every one connected with the navigation of such vessels, whether upon the rivers, the lakes or the ocean, be held to the strictest accountability.

2. A vessel, with passengers, navigating between ports so distant from each other as Pittsburg and Gallipolis on the Ohio river, having but one licensed pilot on board, the captain acting also as pilot, has not the "complement" of licensed pilots required by the act.

3. If the captain of the boat is deprived of his "complement" of pilots, during a voyage, without his consent, fault or collusion, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied, until others, licensed, can be obtained.

4. But he has no right to begin a new voyage and imperil the lives of passengers, by arrogating to himself the knowledge and responsibility of licensed pilots, whose function alone in the navigation of the vessel the law recognizes.

5. If he does so he incurs himself the penalty of $100, imposed by the act of August 30, 1852, besides subjecting his boat and its owners, under a proceeding in admiralty, to the penalty of $500, under the 1st section of the act of July 7, 1838 [5 Stat. 304].

In admiralty.

M'CANDLESS, District Judge. This is a libel in rem upon information of the United States district attorney, against the steamboat Science, for a violation of the act of congress of August 30, 1852, which provides for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam. It is charged that the said steamboat did carry passengers on the Ohio river, from Gallipolis to Pittsburg, and from Pittsburg to Gallipolis and intervening places, and did leave the ports of Pittsburg and Gallipolis with passengers to perform her said voyages, without a complement of pilots duly licensed by the inspectors, as required by the said act of congress, and did perform said voyage without said complement of licensed pilots; and it is further charged that Wm. Reno, the master of said vessel, who is not a licensed pilot, did perform the duties of one of the pilots, and did assist in navigating said vessel on said voyages. The allegations in the libel being denied by the answer, we must look to the proofs to ascertain whether they have been sustained. It appears from these, that, in the month of April last, this boat, commanded by Wm. Reno, left the port of Pittsburg for Gallipolis with two pilots, and that at Gallipolis, one of them was discharged for drunkenness; that the other pilot and the captain navigated the boat back to Pittsburg, and, on their way up, stopped at Moro Castle, to procure the services of a pilot named Stewart. He could not go, but told the captain if he would call on his way down he would enter his service. On his return, Stewart did go on board, and with Kerr, the other regularly licensed pilot, took the boat to Portsmouth, and back to Pittsburg. At Pittsburg, Stewart stated that his license was about expiring and that he would have to go to Cincinnati to renew it. He made the voyage again from Pittsburg to Gallipolis, and back to Long Bottom or Moro Castle, where he left the boat, and, failing to make the connection with her, either at Pittsburg or Moro Castle, he never returned to her service. The trips made by the boat after the discharge of Franklin Reno, and before the employment of Stewart, and after Stewart left and before Skaggs was employed, were made by Kerr, a regularly licensed pilot, and Wm. Reno, who had no license, operating the wheel which guides the vessel. Here is a plain infraction of the act of congress, for there was not a "complement" of licensed pilots, to navigate a vessel whose trips were between ports so distant from each other.

Although the act imposes a penalty upon those who employ or are employed as unlicensed pilots, yet the very first section of this act of 1852 provides that if any such vessel shall be navigated, with passengers on board, without complying with the terms of this act, the owners thereof and the vessel itself shall be subject to the penalties contained in the second section of the act to which this is an amendment. It only remains to inquire what are the provisions of this section of the act of July 7, 1838, to which we are referred for the penalty. It declares that "for each and every violation of this section, the owner or owners of said vessel shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of five hundred dollars, one-half for the use of the informer, and for which sum or sums the steamboat or vessel so engaged shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against, summarily, by way of libel, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offence." If the captain of the boat is deprived of his "complement" of pilots, during a voyage, without his consent, fault or collusion, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until others, licensed, can be obtained. But he has no right to begin a new voyage and imperil the lives of passengers for whose security this act was passed, by arrogating to himself the knowledge and responsibility of licensed pilots, whose function alone, in the navigation of the vessel, the law recognizes. If he does so, he incurs a penalty himself, besides subjecting his boat and its owners to this proceeding in admiralty. The lives of passengers are of more importance than the loss to the purses of the owners by the lapse of a single trip. The latter may be repaired, the former cannot, and every one connected with the navigation of boats propelled in whole or in part by steam, whether upon the rivers, the lakes or the ocean, should be held to the strictest accountability. And as one of the surest ways to reach them, congress wisely provided that the vessel and its owners should be responsible for any breach of the law. This act of congress is a great public protection. Its value can only be estimated by the number of lives it has saved. In passing it, congress designed to require from all the officers connected with the management of the vessel, the utmost vigilance. The pilot, guiding the boat by his bell, commands the engineer. If the pilot is uninstructed, has not passed an examination, or in the words of the act of congress, is not "licensed," the vessel, cargo and passengers, at midnight or midway, may all go to the bottom. Of what consequence are excuses, under such circumstances, to the owners of the boat, to the consignors or consignees, or to the families whose friends have been lost? Unfriendly as this law seemed at the beginning to those peculiarly affected by its provisions, time, and its proper administration by the supervising and local inspectors, have magnified its value and developed its wisdom. The courts should see that it is rigorously executed; and while I sit here, no trivial or pecuniary considerations shall be admitted as reasons for a refusal to comply with its just and wise conclusions.

The steamboat Science is condemned, to be released upon the payment of $500, and the costs of this libel. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 16,240.

UNITED STATES v. The SCIOTA.

[5 West. Law Month. 29.]

District Court, N. D. New York. June 4, 1862.

SHIPPING — LICENSE AND ENROLLMENT — SALE TO FOREIGNER — VIOLATION OF REGULATIONS — FORFEITURE — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

[1. The provision in the third section of the act of 1831 (4 Stat. 487, which regulates the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers) authorizing vessels not registered, but merely licensed and enrolled for the coasting trade and fisheries, to engage in foreign commerce, without a certificate of registry, provided, however, that in all other respects they shall be liable "to the rules regulations and penalties, now in force relating to registered vessels," etc., does not render applicable to such licensed and enrolled vessels the provision in the sixteenth section of act of 1792 (1 Stat. 295, which relates only to registered vessels) declaring a forfeiture of any vessel sold or transferred to a foreigner, unless such sale or transfer is made known by delivering up to the collector the certificate of registry within seven days from such sale or transfer. A provision for a forfeiture should not be imported into a statute by construction.]

[2. A vessel which has been enrolled and licensed under the act of 1831, but whose license has become void by reason of a subsequent sale, is no longer a licensed and enrolled vessel, so as to be subject to forfeiture by her sale in whole or in part to a foreigner, in violation of section 32 of that act.]

[3. In the act of 1793 (1 Stat. 305), relating to the enrolling and licensing of vessels for the coasting trade and fisheries, the provision (section 2) that the same requisites shall in all respects be complied with as are necessary in registering vessels (under the act of 1792) does not render applicable thereto the provision in the sixteenth section of the act of 1792, declaring a forfeiture of the vessel in case the parties applying tor registration shall knowingly swear falsely in respect to any matter of fact.]

[This was a libel of information against the propeller Sciota (William Williams, Andrew J. Rich, and Henry Martin, claimants), alleging a forfeiture because of a violation of the laws relating to enrolled and licensed vessels.]

W. A. Dart, U. S. Atty., and John L. Talcott, for the United States.

John Ganson, for claimants.

HALL, District Judge. This is a libel of information against the Sciota, founded upon a seizure made by the collector of customs for the port of Buffalo Creek. The libel of information, as amended, contains five counts. The first three allege as a cause of forfeiture that the Sciota was a duly enrolled and licensed vessel; that she was sold and transferred to citizens of Canada, subjects of the queen of Great Britain and Ireland; and that the certificate of enrollment was not delivered up to the collector of the customs after such sale and transfer, or the fact made known to him in any manner within the time in such counts mentioned. These counts appear to have been inserted under the impression that the sixteenth section of the act of 1792, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels" (1 Stat. 295), was applicable to vessels enrolled and licensed under the acts of 1793 and 1831; and that on the sale of an enrolled and licensed vessel to a foreigner the certificate of enrollment must be delivered up to the collector within the time prescribed for the delivery of the certificate of registry, on the sale to a foreigner of a registered vessel. This makes it necessary to inquire whether that section is applicable to enrolled vessels; and the question depends upon the construction to be given to the act of 1793 and 1831, under which the Sciota was, at different times, enrolled and licensed.

The act of 1792 relates to registered vessels only. The sixteenth section provides that, "if any ship or vessel heretofore registered, or which shall heretofore be registered as a ship or vessel of the United States, be sold or transferred in whole or part by way of trust, confidence or otherwise to a subject or citizen of any foreign prince or state, and such sale or transfer shall not be made known in manner hereinafter directed, such ship or vessel together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture shall be forfeited," etc. The manner in which the sale or transfer is to be made known in compliance with the provisions is obscurely indicated, rather than distinctly declared, by the seventh section of the same act. This section provides that, previous to the registry of any ship or vessel, a bond shall be executed containing a condition, among others, that if any foreigner or any person or persons for the use and benefit of such foreigner shall purchase or otherwise become entitled to the whole or any part or share of or interest in such ship or vessel, the same being within a district of the United States, the said certificate (of registry) shall in such case, within seven days after such purchase, change, or transfer of property, be delivered up to the collector of said district, and that if any such purchase, change, or transfer of property shall happen when such ship or vessel shall be at any foreign port or place or at sea, then the master or person having charge or command thereof shall, within eight days after his arrival within any district of the United States, deliver up said certificate to the collector of such district.

The act of 1793, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same" (1 Stat. 305), provides for the enrollment and license of vessels, and authorized to engage in the coasting trade and fisheries during the continuances of their respective licenses; but they were not by that act authorized to engage in the foreign trade of the United States.

American vessels, when duly registered under the act of 1792, could engage in foreign trade with certain privileges and advantages denied to foreign vessels. But enrolled and licensed vessels could not engage in foreign commerce until the passage of the act of 1831, entitled "An act to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontier of the United States, and for other purposes" (1 Stat. 487). The third section of that act provides that, "from and after the passage of this act, any boat, sloop or other vessel of the United States navigating the waters on our northern, northeastern and northwestern frontiers otherwise than by sea shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as may be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury; which enrollment and license shall authorize any such boat, sloop or other vessel to be employed in either the coasting or foreign trade; and no certificate of registry shall be required for vessels so employed on said frontiers: provided that such boat, sloop or vessel shall be in every other respect liable to the rules, regulations and penalties now in force relating to registered vessels on our northern, northeastern and northwestern frontiers." Under this statute, the secretary of the treasury has provided (Regulations 1857, p. 113, arts. 156, 157) that the same proceedings, requirements and forms are to be pursued and complied with as in the case of the enrollment and licensing of ships or vessels under the general law regulating the issue of that description of marine papers, except that the enrollment and license shall be in the form by him particularly prescribed which is substantially the form prescribed in other cases of enrollment and license, with the addition of a particular reference to the act of 1831.

The Sciota had never been a registered vessel, but she had been at different times enrolled and licensed under the act of 1831 (hereafter more particularly referred to); and, while her license continued in force, she was authorized to engage in trade with Canada under the last-mentioned act. She was nevertheless, although authorized to engage in foreign trade, and subject to the rules, regulations, and penalties imposed by the third section of the act of 1831, above cited, an enrolled and not a registered vessel. Wilkes v. People's Fire Ins. Co., 19 N. Y. 184; and the case of The Black Hawk, before Judge Conklin [Case No. 1,469], there cited. Not being a registered vessel, she had no certificate of registry to deliver up, and a sale of her to a foreigner could not, therefore, be made known in the manner required by the sixteenth section of the act of 1792. The provisions of that section, which in express terms apply to registered vessels only, cannot be extended by judicial construction to a case like that now under consideration, so as to condemn a vessel to forfeiture for the omission of an act which it was utterly impossible to perform. But the third section of the act of 1831, above quoted, provides that vessels enrolled and licensed under that act shall be in every other respect (that is except as to their enrollment and license and their requirement of certificate of registry) liable to the rules, regulations, and penalties now in force relating to registered vessels on our northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers. The question whether this provision has extended the provisions of the sixteenth section of the act of 1792 to this case is perhaps not free from doubt.

It may possibly be doubtful whether a forfeiture of the vessel should be held to be included in the term "penalties," used in a penal statute, but the terms, rules, and regulations in the act of 1831 are probably sufficient to include the provisions by which a forfeiture was declared for a violation of such rules and regulations. There are, however, other and very serious objections to a construction which would extend the provisions of the sixteenth section to the present case. The fact already referred to, that in the case of an enrolled vessel a sale or transfer thereof cannot possibly be made known in the manner required by this section, is quite enough to prevent the application of its provisions in a penal action. And as all licensed vessels were already subject to forfeiture under the thirty-second section of the act of 1793 whenever transferred in whole or in part to a foreigner (as will be hereafter more particularly mentioned), it may well be presumed that congress intended the thirty-second section of the act of 1793, and not the sixteenth section of the act of 1792, should give the rule in regard to the forfeiture of vessels enrolled under the act of 1831, in case such vessels should be transferred to a person or persons not being citizens of the United States. Again, the proviso of the third section of the act of 1831 in express terms only applies to the boats, sloops, and vessels mentioned in the preceding portion of that section, and therefore only applies to vessels enrolled and licensed under the provisions of that act; and as the Sciota was not a licensed vessel at the time of the alleged sale (as will be hereafter more particularly stated), this third section of the act of 1831 does not make the sixteenth section of the act of 1792 applicable to that vessel.

For these reasons, no forfeiture can be decreed under the first three counts in the libel of information in this, so far as the same must depend upon an alleged violation of the sixteenth section of the act of 1792.

The fourth count is substantially like the first three, except that it avers that the Sciota was transferred to a foreigner, and that her license was not surrendered or notice given of such sale or transfer. The reasons already given are sufficient to show why no decree upon this count can be based upon the sixteenth section of the act of 1792.

But there is another question arising on these counts. They aver that the Sciota was duly enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and they allege, in substance, that she was sold and transferred to a foreigner, although they contain other averments intended to bring the case within the sixteenth section of the act of 1792. The other averments may be rejected as surplusage; and it was therefore contended at the hearing that the vessel was forfeited under the thirty-second section of the act of 1793, which provides that if any licensed ship or vessel shall be transferred in whole or in part to any person who is not at the time of such transfer a citizen of, and resident within, the United States, or if any ship or vessel shall be employed in other trade than that for which she is licensed, or shall be found with a forged or altered license, or one granted for any other ship or vessel, every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo found on board her, shall be forfeited. In order to entitle the United States to a decree of forfeiture under this section, it is necessary to show a transfer, and that the vessel was a licensed vessel at the time of such transfer. It appeared upon the hearing that although the Sciota had been licensed, before the alleged sale, to a foreigner or foreigners, such license had become void some time prior to such sale, by reason of her sale and transfer from the Western Transportation Company, (her owner at the time of her license,) to the claimants in this suit. She was not therefore a licensed vessel, within the meaning of the thirty-second section above quoted (section 5, Act 1793; 1 Stat. 30; Two Friends [Case No. 14,289]; section 46, p. 30, of Regulations under the Revenue Laws published in 1857); and this was substantially conceded by the learned counsel for the government. There can therefore be no condemnation under the thirty-second section on either of the first four counts of the libel.

The fifth and last count of the libel of information presents other questions, which will now be considered. It alleges in substance that on the 2d of May, 1860, the Sciota was owned by the claimants, and that an enrollment of the vessel was on that day applied for; that one of the claimants thereupon, and for the purpose of procuring an enrollment of such vessel, made oath, as required by law, that the claimants were the sole owners of the Sciota, and that there was no subject or citizen of any foreign prince, directly or indirectly, by way of trust or otherwise, interested therein, or in the profits or issues thereof; that thereupon the vessel was enrolled and licensed; and that such affidavit was untrue, to the knowledge of the party making the same; certain subjects of her majesty the queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and citizens of Canada, being interested in the said vessel, and in the profits and issues thereof, to the knowledge of such party. This count is based upon the fourth section of the act of 1792, which requires, as a condition precedent to the registry of a ship or vessel, that an oath or affirmation shall be taken and subscribed, containing the statements contained in the affidavit referred to, and which further provides that, in case any of the matters of fact in the said oath or affirmation alleged which shall be within the knowledge of the party so swearing or affirming shall not be true, there shall be a forfeiture of the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, furniture, and apparel in respect to which the same shall have been made, or of the value thereof, to be recovered, with costs of suit, of the person by whom such oath or affirmation shall be made (1 Stat. 279, § 4); and also upon the second section of the act of 1793, which provides that, in order for the enrollment of any ship or vessel, she shall possess the same qualifications, and the same requisites in all respects shall be complied with, as are made necessary for registering ships and vessels (by the act of 1792), and the same duties and authorities are hereby given and imposed on all officers, respectively, in relation to such enrollments, and the same proceeding shall be had in similar cases touching such enrollments, and the ships or vessels so enrolled, with the master or owner or owners thereof, shall be subject to the same requisites as are in those respects provided for vessels registered by virtue of the aforesaid act. This act of 1793 does not contain any provision expressly declaring a forfeiture of the vessel in case the oath or affidavit shall be false, but provides for the indictment and punishment of any party who shall knowingly swear falsely in making such affidavit. But it was contended at the hearing that the provision above quoted extended the provisions for forfeiture above set forth to the case of vessels enrolled under the act of 1793.

This raises a question in regard to the construction of those provisions, in respect to which, and to the last count in the libel of information, I shall adopt the language of the late Justice Story in the case of The Two Friends [supra], as follows: "As to the last count I doubt if it alleges any matter to which the law has attached any forfeiture. It is true that the act for registering vessels, in section 4, declares that a false oath by the owner in any matter of fact required to be sworn, in that section, previous to the grant of a registry, shall work a forfeiture of the vessel. And the act for enrolling and licensing vessels in the coasting trade and fisheries, in section 2, provides that, in order to obtain an enrollment, vessels shall possess the same qualifications, and the same requisites in all respects shall be complied with, as are made necessary to the registry of vessels, and the same duties and authorities are given and imposed on officers, and the same proceedings are to be had in similar cases touching such enrollment; and the ships or vessels so enrolled, with the masters and owners thereof, are to be subject to the same requisites as are provided for the registry of vessels. But it is nowhere declared that a violation of these provisions shall be followed with like penalties and forfeitures. On the contrary, the coasting act, in section 30, has substantially declared that the false swearing in any oaths required by that act shall be punished as willful perjury. Now, it is certainly not the duty of the court to seek out new modes of punishment where the legislature has prescribed a specific punishment in its own direct terms; nor can it be proper to pronounce that to be a qualification, requisite duty, or proceeding within the act which is a forfeiture for a willful violation of the same act." This is directly in point; and confirming, as it does, my own impression in respect to the question under consideration, I do not deem it necessary to give other reasons for my conclusion.

To say that there is very great doubt whether there could be a decree for the United States upon the last count in the libel of information in case the affiant's knowledge of the falsity of the affidavit therein referred to had been established is not putting the case too strongly in favor of the claimants. The supreme court of the United States in the case of The Burdett, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 682, declared that no "individual should be punished for the violation of a law which inflicts a forfeiture of property, unless the offence shall be established beyond reasonable doubt"; and it was very properly declared by Mr. Justice Livingston in the case of The Enterprise [Case No. 4,499], that a court has no option where any considerable ambiguity arises on a penal statute, but is bound to decide in favor of the party accused. I shall therefore dismiss the libel in this case, upon the question of law already discussed without inquiring whether the affidavit made on the enrollment of the Sciota was true or false. The libel is dismissed, but there will be the usual certificate of probable cause.

Case No. 16,240b.

[Betts, Scr. Bk. 221.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1851.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — FUGITIVE SLAVE LAWS — EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS.

[1. Congress had power to pass the acts of 1793 (1 Stat. 302), and 1850 (9 Stat. 462), providing for the rendition of fugitive slaves. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. (41 U. S.) 559, followed.]

[2. The rendition of a fugitive slave under the acts of 1793 and 1850 is an executive, and not a judicial, proceeding, and trial by jury is not necessary therein, under the federal constitution.]

[3. The fugitive slave acts of 1793 and 1850 are constitutional, although they provide for rendition by state officers. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. (41 U. S.) 558, followed.]

[This was an indictment against James Scott for the rescue of one Shadrach, a fugitive slave.]

SPRAGUE, District Judge. It does not belong to the judiciary to decide upon the wisdom or expediency of acts of congress. But we must of necessity decide upon their constitutionality. In doing so, however, we must remember that we are sitting in judgment upon the action of another great coordinate department of the government, every member of which was under oath to support the constitution. We must begin the inquiry, then, with the presumption that their legislation is rightful.

Several objections are made to the act of 1850: First, that congress has no right to legislate upon the subject; second, that the act does not provide for a trial by jury, as required by the seventh amendment of the constitution; third, that it gives the commissioners judicial power, which, by the third article of the constitution, can be exercised only by courts of the United States, held by judges appointed by the president and senate. These objections apply with equal force to the statute of 1793, for—First, that was legislation by congress; second, it did not provide for trial by jury; third, it not only authorized judges when not holding court, and out of their district, to hear the cause and grant a certificate, but also state magistrates who were not appointed by the president and senate, and held no office under the United States; and the certificate of such magistrate is made a sufficient warrant for the removal, and could be no more intercepted by habeas corpus, or other process, than can the certificate of the commissioner under the act of 1850.

We are under the necessity, therefore, of inquiring whether the act of 1793 be constitutional. The first objection has been solemnly and unanimously decided by the supreme court of the United States in a case where it was directly in issue, and which will hereafter be referred to. The last two objections are those which have been most strenuously urged, and to them, therefore, I shall more particularly direct my attention. Most of the remarks, however, which I shall make will apply with equal or greater force to the first. These questions are not new, nor do I propose to treat them as such. Still, it may be useful to look at them for a moment, as if now presented for the first time, and afterwards to consider the contemporaneous construction of the constitution by the statute of 1793, the practice and acquiescence under it, and the opinions and decisions of judges and courts, both state and national.

Do the proceedings prescribed by congress for the delivery of fugitives from labor require the exercise of judicial power by a court, or may they be summary before a magistrate? If the latter only, no one contends that there must be a trial by jury. Ever since the profound argument of Chief Justice Marshall in the house of representatives, in the celebrated case of U. S. v. Robins [Case No. 16,175], more than fifty years ago, it has been the established doctrine and practice, that the delivering up a fugitive under a treaty is an executive, and not a judicial, proceeding. Such, also, has been the invariable practice in delivering up fugitives from justice under the constitution. Is not the case of a fugitive from labor to be classed with or governed by the principles of extradition? Compare this with extradition under a treaty. In both there is a claim that the person shall be delivered up as a fugitive, to be carried out of one jurisdiction into another. In both the claim is made under a law established, in the one case by a treaty, and in the other by the constitution and statute. In one, the claim is made by a citizen, under an alleged right given by the law of his state; in the other, it is by an officer or agent, under an alleged authority given by his government. Thus far they are similar. But it is strongly urged that they differ in the purposes for which the delivery is made; that in the one case it is for a regular trial, and in the other as the absolute property of the claimant, who may immediately exact service, and treat the prisoner in all respects as a slave. The objection derives its apparent force from confounding, or, at least, blending two sources of power, that should be kept perfectly distinct. The certificate, of itself, gives no authority whatever to treat the party as a slave. It is merely a warrant to remove him to a certain place. If, while in transitu, or after the transportation, the claimant exacts service, he must find his justification, not in the certificate, but in the laws of the state where the service is required. The certificate is simply an authority for transportation, nothing more. Under this statute, therefore, as well as under a treaty, the party is delivered up, to be disposed of according to the laws of the state or country into which he is carried, without any stipulation what those laws shall be, or whether proceedings shall be there instituted by the government or the individual, or in what manner the law shall be administered, or its protection obtained. In making treaties of extradition, we have confidence that the foreign nation has laws, and that they will be properly administered. So, also, the framers of the constitution, and congress had confidence that our sister states had laws, and that they would be fairly administered. In 1794, the laws of Great Britain, authorising the impressment of seamen, were in full practical operation. Suppose the law of that country had authorized any officer to whom the fugitives should be delivered, at his option, to place him on board any British man-of-war, to serve indefinitely as an impressed seaman, and we had known such to be her law when we made the treaty of 1794 [8 Stat. 116], would a delivery under that treaty have ceased to be a case of extradition, because by the known law of Great Britain, the man would be subject, at the will of the person receiving him, to be reduced to practical slavery? That such might be the fate of the alleged fugitive, might be a reason against making such a treaty, but, if we choose to make it, the delivery would still be extradition. The act of surrender, and the inquiries and proceedings which precede it, are the same, whether the subject be afterwards, by other laws, sent to a court of justice, or service in the navy.

The first case that arose under the treaty of 1794 was that of U. S. v. Robins, above referred to. He had been guilty of murder and mutiny on board a British frigate. Suppose that he was an impressed seaman, which is not improbable, and that the officer making the demand had informed our government that, by authority of law, he should, immediately upon receiving the fugitive, place him again in the naval service, from which he had escaped, and our executive had, thereupon, delivered him up, would that have changed the character of the act of delivery, or of the inquiries which preceded it? Instead of being delivered up to certain death, under the laws of Great Britain, as he was, he would have been delivered up to involuntary and coerced service, on board a man-of-war, at the pleasure of the commander. Still it would have been merely extradition under the treaty; the disposal of the fugitive being left to the laws of the country to which he was carried.

But even if the case of the fugitives from labor be not one of extradition, still we are to inquire whether it is judicial in the sense contended for. That certain facts are to be ascertained, and questions of law solved, does not render the proceeding judicial. This is to be done in all cases of delivering up fugitives from justice under the constitution of a treaty. Magistrates also in criminal examinations must investigate and form an opinion upon questions both of law and fact, and executive officers are often obliged to do the same, and to act upon the conclusions to which they arrive This may be illustrated by the case already referred to. Robins, the alleged fugitive, was claimed on a charge of murder and mutiny on board a British frigate. It involved very difficult and important questions of law and fact; such as his identity. Had he sought an asylum in this country? Were the proceedings for his reclamation regular under the treaty? Was the officer presenting the claim duly authorized? Was the alleged act within British jurisdiction? Being on the high seas, was it not piracy, and to be punished in this country? These questions the president decided, with such legal advice as he chose to take, and issued his certificate or warrant for his surrender. The fugitive was soon after executed, as it was foreseen he would be. But this result had no tendency to change the character of the act of extradition.

A proceeding then is not judicial merely because a magistrate or officer must ascertain facts and law, and act thereon in a particular case. As a general rule, to render the proceeding judicial under our jurisprudence, the tribunal must have the power to render a judicial judgment as to the questions at issue, which, if not annulled by appeal or reversal, will conclude the parties in future controversy upon the same question. The matter in controversy becomes res judicata, judicially settled, and not open for future litigation between the same parties. It has been urged that this is not so, because after judgment upon a writ of entry the same question may again be litigated in a writ of right. This is a mistake. It is not the same question. The matters in issue in those two actions are quite different. The mere right is never in issue in a writ of entry. In a writ of entry on a disseisin, and a plea of .nul disseisin, the only question is whether the defendant did disseise the plaintiff, and that, being adjudged, cannot be again litigated. The mere right may be afterwards tried, because it is legally a different question.

In order, then, to determine whether the proceedings before the commissioner are judicial, let us see what is the result. He is to grant or withhold a certificate. What is the legal force of that certificate? It is merely an authority to carry the person named from one state to another. This is its whole legal effect. What may be legally done with that person in the state to which he is carried depends upon the laws of that state, and not upon anything in the certificate. It is true that the certificate states that certain facts exist, that is, in the opinion of the commissioner. But those facts are not thereby judicially established, but may be controverted, in any future proceeding between the same parties, and the certificate would not be even admissible in evidence. Neither party would be precluded from immediately contesting the same question in any other proceeding. If, for example, a suit for assault and battery and false imprisonment were brought in the circuit court against the claimant, for the original arrest without a warrant, and the justification set up was that the plaintiff was a fugitive from labor, and were this question thus directly in issue, the certificate could not even be given in evidence, any more than the opinion of any other person.

But it is earnestly insisted that the facts to be found in the two cases of fugitives from labor and fugitives from justice are different; that in the latter the executive has only to find that the party is charged and has fled, whereas the commissioner has to find that the party actually owed service and has fled. But it is not the nature or importance of the facts to be ascertained that makes the inquiry judicial, but that a judicial judgment may be pronounced. Suppose the law had required only that the certificate should state that the fugitive was alleged or charged to owe service, would that have changed the legal character of the inquiry? It would have made the law more objectionable, but not have rendered the proceeding more or less summary. Suppose that a treaty, instead of saying that a person charged, should say that a person guilty of a crime in a foreign country should be delivered up. In such case, the president must be satisfied of the party's guilt, but thereupon his action in making the surrender and the consequences that would follow would be precisely the same as they now are, when he has ascertained that the person is charged. So if the law require an examining magistrate to be satisfied that the accused is guilty before he issues his warrant for his commitment. In neither case would the guilt be res judicata, but open to contestation in any future inquiry.

It is said that in criminal cases the person may be arrested and confined without a judicial trial, because, by the social compact, every one has agreed that if suspected of crime he may be so dealt with. In the first place, the social compact is a mere theory. In the second place, it supposes an agreement to abide by all laws which society may make, civil, as well as criminal, besides which, running away from labor might be made a crime. The remark made in the opinion delivered in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539, that a claim for a fugitive from labor was a case within the judicial power, was an obiter dictum, and can be reconciled with what was deliberately decided in the same case, only by supposing that the judge who delivered the opinion intended that congress might legislate for it as within the judicial power, and provide for its being tried by a court, not that they must do so.

Let us next consider what is the force of the contemporaneous construction of the constitution. Here we must remember that in construing the fundamental, as well as any other, law, the sole inquiry is, what was the intention of those who established it? The real intention of the people who adopted the constitution is to be ascertained. If in sixty years language has been deflected or acquired new shades of meaning, still our inquiry is, what was the sense in which it was originally used? How did those who adopted the constitution understand its language and provisions? Had the congress who passed the act in 1793 the means of knowing the views and intentions of those who adopted the constitution and amendments? The convention that framed the constitution closed their labors in September, 1787. The government went into operation on the 4th of March, 1789. Nearly the whole of the intervening time, and especially of the year 1788, was spent in earnest discussions of its provisions by the people and conventions in the several states. The amendments were framed and adopted by the first congress, under the lead of Mr. Madison, and subsequently established by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. The act we are now considering was passed by the second congress in February, 1793. That congress met on the 24th day of October, 1791, and its members must have been elected some time previously. In 1788, therefore, when the constitution was before the people for adoption, and subsequently, when the amendments were submitted to them, every one of these members must have been of sufficient age, ability, and distinction to take a prominent part in the discussion and action which preceded and attended the adoption of the constitution and amendments, and they had been elected by the very people who had adopted both, for the purpose of representing their views and intentions in carrying the constitution into effect by practical legislation. More than one-third of the members of the convention which framed the constitution were members of congress in 1793, and a still greater proportion of the members of the first congress, which adopted the amendments, were also members of the second congress when this act was passed. The act of 1793 bears the signature of Jonathan Trumbull, of Connecticut, as speaker, of John Adams as vice-president, and George Washington as president. Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, and Henry Knox, were cabinet advisers; and among the members of congress at the time were Caleb Strong, Elbridge Gerry, George Cabot, Fisher Ames, Theodore Sedgwick, Artemas Ward, John Langdon, Roger Sherman, Oliver Ellsworth, James Hillhouse, Rufus King, Robert Morris, James Madison, and James Monroe. George Cabot was one of the committee of the senate which reported the bill, and it was subsequently sent to a committee of which Roger Sherman was also a member. Such men were members of the congress which passed the act of 1793 as being in accordance with the constitution. It was immediately sent forth, and put into actual practical operation amongst the same people who had so recently established the constitution. Was it a violation of that instrument? No motion was made nor voice raised for its repeal in either house of congress; no movement against it in any state legislature or popular assembly; no petition or remonstrance from any source whatever. No one appears to have doubted its constitutionality, and it was received, so far, at least, as the public records and the history of the times show, with the general, if not the universal, acquiescence of the generation which adopted the constitution. And it was not until years afterwards, and when a new generation had arisen, that its constitutionality was questioned.

It is now insisted that by this act congress was guilty of an unauthorized assumption of power, and a violation of personal liberty, by subjecting any party to a trial by an unconstitutional tribunal, and by the depriving him of the right of a trial by jury, as secured by the seventh amendment. How could this have happened? Was it a time of apathy and indifference? So far from it, the spirit of liberty was never higher or more vigilant in any people. They had just fought for it through a seven years' war, and endured extreme privations, sufferings, and sacrifices. Apprehension of abuse of power by the national government was not only keen, but almost morbid, producing the utmost vigilance and unsparing scrutiny. Let us recur to a few historical facts. The convention that framed the constitution closed their labors on the 17th day of September, 1787, and it was soon after submitted to the people for adoption by conventions chosen for that purpose in the several states. The states came into it slowly and reluctantly. Eleven only acceded to it when it went into operation on the 4th of March, 1789. North Carolina and Rhode Island did not accept it until November, 1789, and May, 1790. During the whole year 1788 the question of its adoption was pending. Discussions before the people, and in their conventions, were able, earnest, and thorough. The objections to it all arose from the apprehension that the powers conferred on the general government would be so exercised as to endanger the rights of individuals and the states. Many of the states, in adopting it, recommended some further guaranty for liberty, and several would not have acceded to it but for the confident assurance that amendments would be made for that purpose. In this spirit the first congress assembled, and soon afterwards framed and adopted twelve amendments, all designed to be further securities for the rights and liberties of the people, and to make more explicit the powers of the general government. These amendments were submitted to the legislatures of the several states for ratification. The only objection made to them was that they did not go far enough, that there should have been other and further guaranties for liberty. All but two, however, were ratified by the states, and those two related merely to the compensation of members of congress. Ten amendments were thus adopted by congress and the states, and among them the seventh, which it is now insisted was violated by the statute of 12th of February, 1793, passed only a short time afterwards. The second congress assembled on the twenty-fourth day of October, 1791, and most of its members must have been chosen during, or immediately after, the discussion of those amendments in the states, and as true representatives to carry out the intentions of the people in adopting them. The spirit of the times may be still further illustrated: In this very year of 1793, exhausted, as the people had been, by their protracted struggle, prostrate, as they were, without means, without credit, yet a large portion of them were eager to rush into the vortex of the French Revolution, and wage a foreign war for liberty; and it required all the wisdom, firmness, and popularity of Washington himself to maintain his proclamation of neutrality, which was issued in April of that year. Jay's treaty, made in 1794, now so universally approved, was then, from the mere apprehension of its being adverse to liberty, met with the most vehement denunciation, not only by the press, but by public meetings from one end of the country to the other, and in congress produced one of the warmest contests and most memorable debates ever known in the halls of legislation. During the administration of the elder Adams, the single case of extradition which has been referred to, that of Robins, produced violent attacks upon the president, both in and out of congress. The passage of the alien and sedition laws in 1798, intended to protect the government, was deemed an assumption of power so dangerous to freedom as to throw the nation into a ferment, and arouse state legislatures to pass the celebrated resolutions of that year. Soon afterwards the administration was overthrown by one of the most vehement contests for political power that was ever waged, during which every measure of the government from its organization was severely scrutinized, and many of them unsparingly assailed as invading or dangerous to the rights of the people. Yet during all this time, and for many years afterwards, while the love of liberty was most fervid, watchful, and jealous, the constitutionality of this law was never questioned. Indeed, it has been acquiesced in by the whole people for fifty-seven years, during all which time not a movement has been made, in or out of congress, to repeal or impair its provisions. It has been carried into actual practical operation in most, if not all, of the free states which were original parties to the constitution. In this state, one the most remote from the slaveholding, it appears in [Com. v. Griffith] 2 Pick. 11, that both my excellent and able predecessors have had occasion to give construction to the act, and there are those who recollect that Judge Davis, so justly revered for wisdom and benevolence, in several instances, delivered up slaves pursuant to its provisions. This he did, not only by holding a court, for no entry or record was made, and no decree or judgment entered up, but acting as a judge or magistrate, summarily granted a certificate, which was merely a warrant to convey the person to a certain place, and then, being functus officio, had no further legal efficacy.

The intention of those who adopted the constitution must govern. It is their views which we are endeavoring to ascertain, and to that end what can be more satisfactory than such contemporaneous exposition, such practice and acquiescence of the fathers of the constitution, and all those who participated in its adoption, and their successors for more than half a century? Those who, impressed only with the feelings of the present time, find it difficult to believe that our fathers in the North could have intended to render persons of color liable to be carried out of the state as slaves without trial by jury, and with a hearing only before a magistrate, will find it useful to go back to the period when the constitution was established, and see the actual condition of things at that time. Then all the states, with the exception of Massachusetts, were to a greater or less extent slaveholding, and in this state it had been abolished only eight years before by her bill of rights. Connecticut and Rhode Island had in 1784 passed laws looking to its ultimate extinction, by providing that children born after that time should be free. All the men of that day had been born in the midst of that institution, and had been accustomed to its practical operation. Runaway negroes were taken back to their masters generally, it is believed, by mere recaption, without legal process, certainly without trial by jury or formal protracted proceedings before a court of record. Massachusetts ratified the constitution on the 7th of February, 1788. She was the only free state, and the views and purposes of this commonwealth with respect to negroes coming from other states are shown by a statute passed by her on the 26th day of March of the same year, that is, within fifty days of her adoption of the constitution. That act is as follows: "Sec. 6. Be it further enacted," &c., "that no person being an African or negro, other than a subject of the emperor of Morocco, or a citizen of some one of the United States (to be evidenced by a certificate from the secretary of the state of which he shall be a citizen) shall tarry within this commonwealth for a longer time than two months; and upon complaint made to any justice of the peace within this commonwealth, that any such person has been within the same more than two months, the said justice shall order the said person to depart out of this commonwealth; and in case that the said African or negro shall not depart, as aforesaid, any justice of the peace within this commonwealth, upon complaint and proof made that such person has continued within the commonwealth ten days after notice given him or her to depart as aforesaid, shall commit the said person to any house of correction within the county, there to be kept to hard labor agreeably to the rules and orders of the said house, until the sessions of the peace, next to be holden within and for the said county; and the master of the said house of correction is hereby required and directed to transmit an attested copy of the warrant of commitment to the said court on the first day of their said session; and if, upon trial at the said court, it shall be made to appear that the said person has thus continued within the commonwealth contrary to the tenor of this act, he or she shall be whipped, not exceeding ten stripes, and ordered to depart out of this commonwealth within ten days; and if he or she shall not so depart, the same process shall be had and punishment inflicted, and so toties quoties."

Thus it appears that Massachusetts at that time made all negroes from other states, whether bond or free, unless the prescribed certificate of citizenship was produced, liable after remaining here two months, and a notice of ten days, to be sent by a single magistrate to the house of correction to hard labor until the next general sessions of the peace, which was held by justices of the peace, and then liable to be sentenced by that court to punishment by whipping, and ordered out of the state; and if this order were disobeyed, the same confinement in the house of correction and punishment by stripes might again be inflicted; and for every successive neglect of ten days to obey the order to depart from the state, the same proceedings might be repeated indefinitely. The reason why a certificate of citizenship protected the holder from being thus dealt with was, doubtless, because the constitution, which she had just before sanctioned, declared that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." [Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2.] Verily, since the year 1788, when the constitution was adopted, we of Massachusetts and the North have undergone a change, but this cannot alter pre-existing facts. If from the progress of benevolence we have acquired a stronger sympathy for the African, a more zealous desire to aid and protect him, our change cannot retroact so as to change the views and intentions which actually existed at the time the constitution was adopted.

Let us now examine the opinions and decisions of courts and judges, state and national. The state courts have, in several instances, affirmed, and in no one denied, the constitutionality of the act of 1793. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, with Chief Justice Tilghman at its head, in the case of Wright v. Deacon, 5 Serg. & R. 62, after full consideration, decided that the act of 1793 was constitutional, that the party claimed as a fugitive was not entitled to a trial by jury, but the proceedings were to be summary, and that the certificate of a state judge, pursuant to the act, authorised the removal, and could not be intercepted by process from the state court, and a writ de homine repliegiando, which had issued under the state law, was quashed. Here the authority of the state magistrate and the legal effect of his certificate were directly in issue, and the pivot on which the decision turned. This was in 1819, more than thirty years nearer to the adoption of the constitution than the present. The next case was that of Com. v. Griffith, 2 Pick. 11. This was an indictment for assault and battery and false imprisonment against an agent who had seized a fugitive slave in order to carry him before a magistrate, pursuant to the statute. The court unanimously affirmed the power of congress to legislate upon the subject, and the constitutionality of the act of 1793. But Thacher, J., thought that by a true construction of the act, a warrant to arrest was required. The purpose of the arrest was to carry him before a magistrate pursuant to the statute, yet the constitutional authority of the magistrate was not discussed or questioned. This was in the year 1823. In Jack v. Martin, 12 Wend. 311, a certificate had been given by the recorder of the city of New York. A writ de homine replegiando was afterwards sued out. Several questions arose, and among them this question of the authority of the state magistrate. The supreme court of New York, in their opinion, delivered by Nelson, J. (page 328), use this language: "The question of slave or not, according to the laws of the state from whence the fugitive fled, belonged to the magistrate under the law of congress to decide, and his decision is conclusive in the matter so far as the state courts are concerned." And again (page 329): "The decision of the magistrate and certificate is conclusive upon the fact as to the state court." This was in 1834. This case was carried to the court of errors, where an opinion against the constitutionality of the act of 1793 was delivered by Mr. Chancellor Walworth, but it does not appear that any other member of the court concurred with him. In Sims's Case, before the supreme court of Massachusetts, in April last [7 Cush. 285], these very questions of the power of the commissioner, the right of a trial by jury, and the right of congress to legislate, were zealously argued and fully considered, and the constitutionality of the act of 1850 unanimously affirmed. The very able opinion of the court, delivered by Chief Justice Shaw, is so recent that it need only be referred to. The same result is ably sustained by the opinion of Mr. Commissioner Curtis in the same case.

Let us next look at the opinions and decisions of judges and courts of the United States. In Ex parte Simmons, in the year 1823 [Case No. 12,863], Mr. Justice Washington of the supreme court heard an application, under the act of 1793, out of court summarily, without any question of its constitutionality. He refused the certificate, on the ground that the alleged fugitive was free. In Hill v. Low [Id. 6,494], which was error from the district court, the constitutionality of the act of 1793, and the right of the state magistrate to grant a certificate, seemed to have been conceded without question; the points raised being only as to the construction of the act. So in Worthington v. Preston [Id. 18,055], where a certificate had been granted by a state magistrate, no question was raised as to the constitutionality of the act of 1793, but other grounds of defence were successfully relied on. See, also, Johnson v. Tompkins [Id. 7,416], and Jones v. Van Zandt [Cases Nos. 7,501, 7,502]. Judge Story, in his work upon the Constitution (volume 3, p. 677), referring to the fourth article, says: "It is obvious that these provisions for the arrest and removal of fugitives of both classes contemplate summary ministerial proceedings. and not the ordinary course of judicial investigations, to ascertain whether the complaint be well founded, or the claim of ownership be established beyond all legal controversy."

We now come to the decision of the supreme court of the United States in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, in the year 1842, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 559. In this case the court emphatically affirm the act of 1793. In the opinion of the court, as delivered by Mr. Justice Story (page 622), we find the following decisive language: "We hold the act to be clearly constitutional in all its leading provisions, and, indeed, with the exception of that part which confers authority upon state magistrates, to be free from reasonable doubt and difficulty upon the grounds already stated. As to the authority so conferred upon state magistrates, while a difference of opinion has existed, and may exist still, on the point in different states, whether state magistrates are bound to act under it, none is entertained by this court that state magistrates may, if they choose, exercise that authority, unless prohibited by state legislation." The question of the power of congress to legislate was an essential and turning point in the cause. It is true that the question of the power of the state magistrate to act summarily was not necessarily raised by the record, but the court nevertheless purposely and deliberately decided it. What they say is not to be classed among obiter dicta. It was not thrown in arguendo, as tending to the conclusions to which they had arrived, but is itself a conclusion which they take that occasion to pronounce, and mean to establish by all the authority of the court. In this all the judges seem to have concurred. Mr. Justice McLean, in a separate opinion given by him, held that state magistrates were not only constitutionally authorized, but bound, to act under the statute. Since that decision was pronounced, there have been three changes in the members of the court, all in the free states, Justices Grier, Nelson, and Woodbury having succeeded Justices Baldwin, Thompson, and Story. In the Case of Garnett, brought as a fugitive before Judge Grier at Philadelphia, in October last [Case No. 5,243], he expressed his determination in the strongest manner to enforce the act of 1850. Its constitutionality was not discussed. A letter subsequently written by Judge Grier holds this language: "A person held as a fugitive under the certificate of a judge or magistrate under this act is legally imprisoned under process from a court or magistrate having jurisdiction." And, again: "Those who believe that the constitution and laws of their country should be regarded and obeyed have no ground of complaint." Here the constitutionality of the act is assumed as unquestioned.

Judge Nelson, in a charge to the grand jury in March last, takes occasion, in very decided language, to affirm the constitutionality of the act of 1850, without exception, and Mr. Justice Woodbury has also expressed his concurrence in those views.

We have thus not only the decision of the highest judicial tribunal in the United States, which alone would be conclusive upon all subordinate courts, but the opinions of all the members of the court in 1842, and all its present members, in support of the constitutionality of the act. Against all this not one decision of any court, state or national, and not one opinion of any judge of the United States, can be produced.

These questions must now be considered as settled by contemporaneous exposition, by practice, and acquiescence for more than fifty years, by the opinions and decisions of courts and judges, state and national, and especially by the supreme court of the United States. To overturn the construction of the constitution so established would be a most dangerous violation of principle and duty. If a court may do this, it may overturn established rules of property, of personal rights, and of evidence, upon which the community have for a long time acted, and thus shake every man's title, put in jeopardy every man's liberty, and render the law so uncertain that no counsel could advise, and no man act, with safety.

Case No. 16,241.

UNITED STATES v. SCOTT.

[4 Biss. 29.] [1]

District Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1865.

INDICTMENT—MISJOINDER OF COUNTS—DEFECTIVE COUNTS—MURDER.

1. Counts for conspiracy can not be joined with counts for murder.

[Cited in Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. 427; U. S. v. Lancaster, 44 Fed. 894.]

[Cited in State v. Lockwood (Vt.) 3 Atl. 540.]

2. In what cases an indictment will be sufficient, which charges the crime in the terms of the statute creating it.

3. Requisites of a good indictment for murder under an act of congress punishing opposition to the enrollment of the national forces.

4. In the national courts there can be no indictment unless some act of congress authorizes it.

[This was an indictment against George T. Scott for murder.]

John Hanna, U. S. Dist. Atty.

McDonald & Roach, for defendant.

McDONALD, District Judge. The indictment in this case contains three counts. The first count, in general terms, charges that the prisoner conspired with divers persons named, to prevent the execution of three distinct acts of congress, the titles of which it recites. The second count charges a like conspiracy with the same persons with a like purpose, and alleges that, in pursuance of that purpose, the prisoner and his co-conspirators assaulted one Eli McCarty while "in the performance of his legal service" in relation to the due execution of said acts of congress, and murdered him. The third count charges that the prisoner, intending to prevent the execution of said acts of congress, assaulted said "McCarty being then and there a person employed in the performance of service relating to the enrollment of the national forces duly ordered by the proper legally constituted authorities," and that while he was thus employed, the prisoner murdered him.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Counsel for the prisoner now move to quash the whole indictment for a misjoinder of counts. They also move to quash each count as being defective on its face.

I. As to the question of a misjoinder of counts. In examining this question, it is not important to consider whether each count in itself is either good or bad. In civil actions there may be duplicity, though a part be ill pleaded. Gould, Pl. 427. So, though some of the counts be defective in an indictment, there may be a misjoinder. This rule, however, would not prevail, where the part supposed to produce the duplicity or misjoinder is mere surplusage. But that is not the case here. The first count in this indictment charges a mere conspiracy, which is only a misdemeanor, or at most a felony not punishable capitally. The second and third charge murder, a capital crime. At common law, the general rule is, that if the legal judgment on each count would be materially different, as in the case of a misdemeanor and a felony, there can be no joinder. Whart. Am. Cr. Law, § 418. Here the judgment on the first count could only be fine and imprisonment. 12 Stat. 284. On the second and third counts, the punishment, on conviction would be death. 13 Stat. 8. Judged, therefore, by the rules of the common law, there is plainly a misjoinder of counts in this indictment.

The district attorney, however, insists that an act of congress on this subject cures this defect. The act referred to provides that "whenever there are or shall be several charges against a person or persons for the same act or transaction, or for two or more acts or transactions connected together, or for two or more acts or transactions of the same class of crimes or offenses which may be properly joined," the whole may be joined in one indictment. 10 Stat. 162. The latter provision of this act evidently does not alter the common law. Weinzorpflin v. State, 7 Blackf. 186; State v. Smith, 8 Blackf. 489. And, in our opinion, the former part of the statute cited does not help the case. For we can not see from any allegation in the indictment before us, either that all these counts refer to "the same act or transaction," or that they all are "acts or transactions connected together." Indeed, the contrary appears by the indictment itself; for the first and second counts charge a conspiracy between the prisoner and divers other persons; the third charges a murder committed by him alone. The indictment is plainly bad as having a misjoinder of counts. But, as this defect may be cured by a nolle prosequi to some of the counts, we will examine the motion to quash the separate counts.

II. The motion to quash each count as being defective on its face.

1. The first count charges, in general terms, a conspiracy between the prisoner and several other designated persons "to prevent, hinder, and delay, by force, the execution" of three acts of congress relating to the military, and particularly designated in the indictment. The count is on the act of July 31, 1861, which declares that if two or more persons shall conspire together, by force, to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States, they shall be deemed guilty of a high crime, &c. 12 Stat. 284. The count is in the words of the act, which, as a general rule, is sufficient; and we think it sufficient in the present case. We hold the first count good.

2. The second count is, in our opinion, clearly bad. It substantially charges a combination between the prisoner and others to prevent, hinder, and delay the execution of certain acts of congress, and that, in attempting to consummate this unlawful purpose, the prisoner murdered Eli McCarty. In the national courts there can be no indictment unless some act of congress authorizes it. There is no act of congress punishing murder committed under the circumstances stated in this count. Such a killing is exclusively cognizable in the state courts.

3. The third count charges that the prisoner did assault, hinder, and impede one Eli McCarty while in the performance of his legal service, under and in pursuance of, and in relation to the due execution of, a law of the United States, &c., he the said Eli McCarty being then and there a person employed in the performance of service relating to the enrollment of the national forces, duly ordered by the proper and legally constituted authorities, in pursuance and by virtue of the laws aforesaid, and murdered said McCarty in that assault. The indictment states these facts with more formality than we have done; but the above is the substance of them. The act of congress under which this indictment is framed, provides that whoever shall "assault, obstruct, hinder, impede, or threaten any officer or other person employed in the performance of any service in any way relating" to the enrollment of the militia, shall be deemed guilty of murder, if, in such opposition to the officer or other person, death shall ensue. 13 Stat. 8. We think the allegations in this count are not sufficiently particular and definite. In indictments for murder, the utmost certainty has always been required. Here it is not stated whether McCarty was an officer or not, or under what or whose authority he was acting. Nor is it stated what particular duties connected with the enrollment of the national forces he was performing at the time of the assault and murder. The indictment indeed alleges that McCarty was "a person employed in the performance of service relating to the enrollment." But it omits to state whether he was an officer or a mere servant of an officer. It says that he was "duly ordered by the proper legally constituted authorities" to perform these duties. But it fails to state who were those authorities. It avers that certain things were "legally" and "duly" done. But this is merely pleading matter of law. How they were legally and duly done ought to have been averred. All these are very vague allegations in an indictment for murder. Where a man was indicted for stealing coin, the indictment was held bad for not stating the species of coin stolen. Rex v. Fry, Russ. & R. 482. Where an indictment charged that the accused "retarded" an officer in the discharge of his duty, it was held bad for not showing the acts by which the officer was retarded. Rex v. How, 1 Strange, 699. It is true that the third count follows the words of the act on which it is founded. This, we have already said, as a general rule, is sufficient; and we have applied this rule to the first count. But it is a rule seldom applicable to indictments for capital crimes; and it is subject to many exceptions even in lower offenses. It is, indeed, often difficult to determine when such a mode of pleading may be safely adopted. The supreme court of Indiana say, "as an approximation to a test," that where a statute defines the offense generally, and designates the particular acts constituting it, it is sufficient, in charging the crime, to follow substantially the language of the statute; but where the statute defines the crime generally without naming the particular acts which constitute it, it might be necessary to set out the acts done, so that it might appear to the court whether the acts done amount to the crime. Malone v. State, 14 Ind. 219. We are of opinion that this is a distinction worthy to be followed; and we think it applies even in cases not capital, and is strongly applicable to the case at bar. We are clear that the third count is bad.

Upon this ruling, the district attorney entered a nolle prosequi to the second and third counts. The prisoner thereupon pleaded guilty to the first count, and was sentenced to the penitentiary for six years.

NOTE BY McDONALD, District Judge. The prisoner, George T. Scott, and his co-conspirators were afterwards indicted for the murder of Eli McCarty under the 12th section of the act of February 24, 1864 (13 Stat. 8). One of them pleaded guilty, and died in jail before judgment was pronounced on him. The others, on plea of not guilty, were tried by a jury and found guilty. [Case unreported.] On a motion in arrest of judgment on this verdict, and on a certificate of difference of opinion between Judges Davis and McDonald, the case was transferred to the supreme court of the United States. That court held that there was no act of congress reaching the case, and therefore ordered the judgment to be arrested. And it was arrested accordingly. See 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 642. All the conspirators, however, stood indicted for conspiracy under the act of July 31, 1861 (12 Stat. 284). To these indictments they pleaded guilty, and were sentenced to the penitentiary for six years.

An indictment must be certain to a certain intent in general. U. S. v. Forrest [Case No. 15,131]; U. S. v. Watkins [Id. 16,649]. It is in general sufficient to describe a statutory offense in the words of the statute. U. S. v.

Lancaster [Id. 15,556]. And it is sufficient if it be substantially set out, though not in the precise words of the statute. U. S. v. Bachelder [Id. 14,490]; U. S. v. Pond [Id. 16,067]; U. S. v. Wilson [Id. 16,730]; U. S. v. La Coste [Id. 15,548]; State v. Cook, 38 Vt. 437; Harrison v State, 2 Cold. 232; Com. v. Turner, 8 Bush, 1. The federal courts have no common law jurisdiction in criminal cases. U. S. v. Wilson [Case No. 16,731]; U. S. v. Worrall [Id. 16,766]; U. S. v. Hare [Id. 15,304]; U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. Case No. 16,242.

UNITED STATES v. SCOTT et al.

Circuit Court, W. D. Texas. June Term, 1878.

JUDGMENTS—LIEN ON LANDS—EQUITY—PLEADINGS AS EVIDENCE.

1. A judgment rendered by the United States circuit court for the Western district of Texas is a lien upon all the lands of the defendant within the district, without being recorded in the several counties where his lands lie.

[Cited in Cooke v. Avery, 147 U. S. 390, 13 Sup. Ct. 346.]

[Cited in brief in State v. Smalley, 50 Vt. 741.]

2. Where a suit in equity is submitted on bill and answer. the answer must be taken as true, and where it denies the case made by the bill, the bill must be dismissed.

In equity. Heard on bill and answer. This was a bill filed to set aside a deed for fifty-seven sections of land made by the defendant William T. Scott to his co-defendant Hiram G. Austin. The bill alleged in substance as follows: Scott was surety on the bond of the late collector of internal revenue, who had died in default to the United States in the sum of $127,000. The penalty of the bond was $50,000. Suit was brought against Scott, on said bond, in United States circuit court for the Western district of Texas, and on December 11, 1873, a judgment was rendered against him, in favor of the United States, for the full amount of the penalty of the bond. That on October 3, 1873, Scott was the owner of fifty-seven sections of land in Bexar county, in the Western district of Texas. On that day he was largely indebted to the United States, and in failing circumstances. Nevertheless, he made a deed of that date for said land to his son-in-law, the said Austin. This deed was not acknowledged until December 15, 1873, and was not recorded till January 14, 1874. Austin, at the date of the deed, knew of the pendency of the suit against Scott. The deed was without consideration, and was made by Scott and accepted by Austin, as a device to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of Scott, and especially the United States. The bill further averred that, by virtue of its judgment, the United States had acquired a lien upon said lands, and that said conveyance was a cloud upon the title. The bill prayed that said deed might be declared fraudulent and void, and the lands subjected to the payment of the judgment against Scott, in favor of the United States. The answer denied that the judgment was a lien upon the lands, and traversed all the averments of fraud made in the bill. The cause was submitted on bill and answer.

A. J. Evans, U. S. Atty.

C. S. West, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The defendants contend that the judgment was not a lien upon the lands until it was recorded in the county where the lands lie. I do not think this position is tenable. The judgment is a lien upon all lands in the district within the jurisdiction of the court, and within reach of its process.

But whether so or not is not a question in this cause since that is a matter affecting the legal rights of the parties. This suit was brought to remove the cloud on the title which it was supposed the deed created, and was based on an allegation that the deed was made to defraud the United States. The defendants answered the bill fully, denying all fraudulent intent, averring that the deed was made bona fide and for full consideration, and without any reference to the action against Scott, he supposing, as he swears, that there was a good and valid defense to the suit. The plaintiff set the cause down for hearing on bill and answer only, and the answer must be taken as true. The charge of fraud being purged by the answer, and the bill being unsupported by evidence, the bill must be dismissed. Dismissed accordingly.

Case No. 16,243.

UNITED STATES v. SCROGGINS.

[Hempst. 478.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Arkansas. April, 1847.

CRIMINAL LAW—MAIMING—MODE, OR INSTRUMENT USED.

1. To disable or disfigure any limb or member of a person by means of shooting, stabbing, cutting, biting, gouging, or any other means, with intent to maim or disfigure, constitutes an offence under the 13th section of the crimes act of 1790, and is punishable as therein prescribed (1 Stat. 115).

2. The particular mode of effecting this disfiguration or disability, or the particular weapon, or instrument, or means used, are not material, provided the result is maiming or disfiguration with intent so to do.

3. It is not necessary that it should be done by cutting or by the use of some sharp instrument or edged tool. This is one mode, but not the only mode

Maiming. Indictment that [John W.] Scroggins, a white man, shot James Rawles, also a white man, with a rifle gun, in the right arm, with intent to disable and maim.

E. H. English, for defendant, moved to quash the indictment, on the ground that to disable the limb or member of a person by means of shooting, was not embraced by the act of congress. He argued that the act punishing maiming was a literal transcript of the Coventry act, and that the construction of that act in the English courts had been that the maiming or disfiguration must be done with some sharp instrument or edged tool, and that the language of the act seemed to contemplate maiming by means of cutting or stabbing.

S. H. Hempstead, U. S. Dist. Atty., resisted the motion, and contended that the obvious policy of the law was to punish maiming, and that to narrow it down to maiming by cutting or stabbing merely would present a strange anomaly, and would be imputing to the lawmaker the absurdity of attaching a penalty to the means employed rather than the offence itself. Maiming is depriving another of the use of such of his limbs or members as may render him less able in fighting, either to defend himself or annoy his adversary. 4 Bl. Comm. 206; 1 Hawk. P. C. 111. The statute in question among other things, provides in effect, that if any one shall "disable any limb or member of any person with intention in so doing to maim or disfigure." The indictment is founded on this particular part of the statute, and although the maiming was effected by shooting, yet the indictment is believed to be well founded. It would certainly be difficult to assign a sensible distinction between maiming by shooting and cutting; and it cannot be denied that the act of congress is comprehensive enough to embrace a case like this. Gord. Dig., p. 938, art. 3196.

JOHNSON, District Judge. The indictment with requisite particularity of time and place, and by proper averments, charges that the defendant disabled the right arm of James Rawles, a white man, and not an Indian, by means of shooting with intent to maim, and the question is, whether the case is within the purview of the 13th section of the act of 1790, relative to maiming. If it is not, it is conceded that there is no law to punish the offence. I have carefully examined this section upon which the indictment is founded, and entertain no doubt that the motion ought to be overruled. In some parts of that section cutting is contemplated as a mode by which maiming or disfiguration may be effected, but not the only mode; and indeed there could be no reason for confining the offence to that particular mode. Now to "disable the tongue" or "put out an eye" is punishable, but according to the argument of the defendant's counsel, it would not be within the statute unless it was done by cutting, by the use of some sharp instrument or edged tool. The correctness of this position cannot be admitted. No adjudged case has been adduced to sustain it. To disable any limb or member of a person is expressly declared to be an offence, and that is the crime charged in this indictment.

If any person should purposely and maliciously disable the tongue of another by biting, or put out an eye by shooting, striking, gouging, or such like means, or should disable any limb or member of another, by cutting, shooting, or any other means, with intent to maim or disfigure, such person would, undoubtedly, be liable to conviction on this statute. That position is clear enough to my mind. The particular mode of doing it, as by stabbing, cutting, shooting, or striking, or the particular weapon or instrument used, are not material. The real inquiry is, whether a limb or member has been disabled or disfigured purposely and maliciously, and with intent to maim or disfigure; and if so, the offence is complete. This is deemed to be a fair construction of the statute in question, and to give it any other would enable offenders to evade it at pleasure.

It is urged, however, that this section is almost a literal transcript from the statute of 22 and 23 Car. II. c. 1 (Gord. Dig. p. 938, art. 3196; 1 Hawk. P. C. 108), commonly called the "Coventry Act," and that the English courts have put the construction upon it contended for by the defendant's counsel. I can find no case to that effect, nor has any been referred to or produced; and even if there were such cases, I should not feel at all bound by them, for such a construction would, in my judgment, be manifestly absurd, and contrary to the obvious intention of the law. It would be destroying it, by astute construction and unmeaning refinement. It would be carrying technicality much further than it ought to be carried; and it is difficult to perceive any sense or reason in it. Considering this case to be within the act, and the indictment to be good both in form and substance, the motion to quash is overruled, and the defendant ordered to plead to the indictment. Ordered accordingly.

The prisoner was found guilty, and was sentenced to pay a nominal fine and to be imprisoned one year.

Case No. 16,244.

UNITED STATES v. SCROGGINS.

Circuit Court, N. D. Georgia. March Term, 1879.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS AND ATTORNEYS—WARRANTS OF ARREST.

1. A United States marshal, who receives a warrant to be served from a circuit court commissioner, is bound to make return of his doings thereunder.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The United States attorney has no authority to take from the hands of the marshal warrants regularly issued to him by a circuit court commissioner, for the purpose of deciding whether or not such warrants shall be executed.

[Cited in U. S. v. Ebbs, 10 Fed. 373; 49 Fed. 152.]

[3. Cited in Ex parte Perkins, 29 Fed. 911, to the point that a commissioner, as an examining magistrate, has the same powers, and derives them from the same source, as the chief justice or other justices or judges of the United States would have when acting in the same capacity.]

W. H. Smyth, a commissioner of this court, filed his petition, in which he represented that as such commissioner he had issued a warrant for the arrest of one Wesley Scroggins, directed to the United States marshal for the Northern district of Georgia; that this warrant was dated January 17, 1879, and on that day placed in the hands of the marshal for execution; that on February 10, 1879, he, the said commissioner, addressed an official letter to the marshal inquiring what disposition he had made of said warrant; that the marshal replied to said letter, and to other letters of the same tenor, subsequently addressed to him by the commissioner, declining to give the information sought, and refusing to make any return to the commissioner of his actings and doings under said warrant. The petitioner, therefore, prayed for a rule upon the marshal to show cause why he had not executed the warrant, and why he should not make a return thereof to the commissioner.

The court granted the rule prayed for by the petition, and in compliance therewith the marshal answered: (1) That he had not made return of his actings and doings on said warrant to the commissioner, because he was not required to do so by any law known to him. (2) That he had not executed said warrant because, after the same was placed in his hands by the commissioner, it was taken from him by the district attorney for consideration and determination by that officer, whether or not the public interests required it to be executed, and it was still in the hands of the district attorney for that purpose. The matter came on for hearing upon the sufficiency of these answers to the rule.

A. T. Akerman and H. K. McCay, for the marshal.

W. H. Smyth, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. 1. There is no ground for the idea that a marshal can receive warrants, commanding him to arrest parties therein named, and make no return thereon. He is clearly bound to make return, either that he has arrested the party against whom the warrant was issued, or that the party could not be found in his bailiwick, or give some other excuse for not making the arrest. The oath of office prescribed for the marshal requires him to "faithfully execute all lawful precepts directed to him under authority of the United States, and true returns make." Such, also, is the course required by the common law. The officer may retain the warrant for his own protection, but he must return to the justice what he has done in pursuance of his command: 2 Ld. Raym. 1196; Beck. Just. Arrest, 14. So, by the Code of Georgia, constables may be ruled by their respective justices' courts, and compelled to give an account of their actings and doings. Code 1873, § 4170. What they may be ruled to do, it is their duty to do without rule. The idea that a ministerial officer may pocket a warrant issued to him by lawful authority, and refuse to make any return, or give any reason for not executing it, is, in my judgment, without any foundation, at either the common law, or in the statutes of the United States. The marshal may, it is true, make his return to the commissioner before whom he takes his prisoner for examination, but he must make a return to him. If the person against whom the warrant issues cannot be found, a return of that fact should be made to the commissioner who issues the warrant. By a rule of this court, adopted June 10, 1878, every commissioner of the court is required, at the close of every fiscal year, to file in the office of the clerk of the court a report of all warrants issued by him during the year, stating against whom and on whose affidavit issued, and stating how many, and which of said warrants have been executed, etc. Clearly, it is impossible for the commissioner to comply with this rule, if the marshal refuses to make return of the warrants placed in his hands; or if he has made return of the warrant to another commissioner, before whom he has taken the prisoner, and refuses, when officially inquired of by the commissioner who issued the warrant, to state that fact. Under this rule, it clearly becomes the duty of the marshal to give to the commissioner at least a report of his actings and doings under the warrant placed in his hands.

2. The second question presented by the answer of the marshal to the rule, is, whether the district attorney has authority to take commissioners' warrants from the hands of the marshal, in order to determine whether they should be executed or not. I can find no statute law or usage which confers such a power on the district attorney. The Revised Statutes of the United States (section 1014) expressly confer on any justice or judge of the United States, and on the commissioners of the circuit court, power to arrest, imprison or bail offenders against the laws of the United States, agreeably to the usual modes of process against offenders in the state where the arrest is made. This power, conferred on the commissioners by this section, is precisely the same as that conferred on the justices of the United States supreme court and the judges of the circuit courts. It is not made subject to the supervision of the marshal or district attorney. The judge or the commissioner acts on his own responsibility, and is not accountable to, or subject to the control of either of these officers. If the district attorney has no authority to suppress a warrant issued by the chief justice of the United States, he cannot interfere with the warrant of a circuit court commissioner, for both derive their powers from precisely the same law. As well said by Justice Field, in U. S. v. Schumann [Case No. 16,235]: "The commissioner is made a magistrate of the government, exercising functions of the highest importance to the administration of justice. He is an examining and committing magistrate, bound to hear all complaints of the commission of any public offense against the laws of the United States in his district, to cause the offender to be arrested, to examine into the matters charged, and to commit for trial or to discharge from arrest, according as the evidence fails or tends to support the accusation. For the faithful discharge of his duty in these particulars he alone is accountable. He has no divided responsibility with any other officer of the government, nor is he subject to any other's control." And in the case from which this citation is made, Justice Field held that even after the offender was arrested and the case was under examination before the commissioner, the district attorney had no absolute power to dismiss the proceeding. Much less has he power to suppress a warrant before arrest. If the district attorney can suppress a commissioner's warrant after it is issued and before it is executed, he can forbid the commissioner to issue the warrant. If he has this supervision of the conduct of the commissioners, he has the same over the conduct of the circuit justices and the circuit and district judges, and can forbid them to issue warrants, although, in their judgment, the warrants should issue. Such a power will hardly be claimed for the district attorney, and yet such a power is the logical sequence of what is claimed for him on this hearing. No claim that the power is exercised by the district attorney, to prevent abuses or control expenses, can justify it. The power does not exist in that officer, and it would be a most dangerous power, and liable to the greatest abuses, if it did.

We have been referred to sections 838 and 3164 of the Revised Statutes, as warrant for the action of the district attorney in this case. A glance at section 831 will show that it has no reference to criminal proceedings, and an examination of both sections will show that neither confers on the district attorney any supervision over circuit court commissioners, or the warrants issued by them. In my judgment, the answers of the marshal to the rule are insufficient. It is his duty to execute all warrants that lawfully come to his hands, and to make due return thereof, and the officer issuing the warrant is entitled to know what is done under it. As both the marshal and district attorney have acted in this matter in the highest good faith, and from a sense of duty only, it will not be necessary to do more than to pass an order requiring the marshal to make return to the commissioner of his actings and doings under the warrant against Wesley Scroggins. And it is so ordered.

Case No. 16,245.

UNITED STATES v. SEAGRIST et al.

[4 Blatchf. 420.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. March 31, 1860.

REVOLT OF SEAMEN — NATIONAL CHARACTER OF VESSEL—HOW PROVED—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—WHAT ARE "HIGH SEAS."

1. On the trial of an indictment for an endeavor to make a revolt on board of an American vessel in a foreign port, under the 2d section of the act of March 3d, 1835 (4 Stat. 776), it is not necessary to give documentary proof establishing the national character of the vessel, but it is sufficient to prove orally that she is owned by an American citizen.

2. A vessel lying in a harbor, fastened to the shore by cables, and communicating with the land by her boats, and not within any inclosed dock, or at any pier or wharf, is, within the common acceptance of the term, on the "high seas," outside of low water mark on the coast.

[Cited in Ex parte Byers, 32 Fed. 407.]

3. The act of March 3d, 1825 (4 Stat. 115, § 5), giving directly to the courts of the United States jurisdiction over certain classes of offences committed on board of American vessels in foreign ports, was not designed to abrogate or curtail the jurisdiction of the United States over crimes committed at sea, but to remove doubts whether that jurisdiction could be exercised when the locus in quo was a locked harbor, adapted by nature or artificially to protect vessels from the perils of an open coastage.

4. The act of 1825 does not afford the exclusive rule of decision with respect to offences which are not alleged and proved to have been committed on or against the persons of individuals on ship board.

5. The crime of endeavoring to make a revolt on board of a vessel, is one against the master of the vessel; and it is sufficient to charge it in the words of the act of 1835, to give the court cognizance of it, even within the requirements of the act of 1825.

[Cited in U. S. v. Huff, 13 Fed. 637.]

[6. Cited in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 252, to the point that if the different acts mentioned in section 2 of the act of March 3, 1835, constituted different offences, they may yet be united in the same indictment.]

This was an indictment against [Henry Seagrist and others], four of the crew of the American brig Humming-bird, of New York, for an endeavor to make a revolt and mutiny on board of her, in the harbor of Palermo, James Ridgway, for prisoners.

BETTS, District Judge. The ground urged for a new trial, in this case, is the alleged misdirection of the court to the jury, that the port of Palermo, where the offence is charged by the indictment to have been committed, is a place within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States. The objection would have been more appropriately taken in arrest of judgment, but the validity of it may well be determined in either mode of proceeding.

The objection that no documentary proof, such as a bill of sale, or registry, was put in, establishing the national character of the vessel, cannot avail the defendants. The master testified that she was owned in this city, by American citizens, and it was only necessary for the prosecution to prove that she was American property, to support the indictment. It was not, in any way, an issue, on the trial, whether she was entitled to the privileges of an American bottom, under our revenue laws. The only fact 'nvolved was whether she was American property, and of this there can be no doubt. 3 Kent, Comm. 130, 132, 150.

The main point contested on the trial and on this motion, rests on an exception to the jurisdiction of the court. The generic offence of endeavoring to make a revolt, was first declared to be a crime, by the United States laws, in the crimes act of April 30th, 1790 (1 Stat. 115, § 12); and the courts have recognized the offence as sufficiently described and specified under that denomination, to be subject to judicial cognizance. U. S. v. Kelly [Case No. 15,516]; Id. 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 417; U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,337]. It was decided in the First circuit, that the offence, when committed within a harbor of the United States, was punishable under the act, and that it was not a condition to the jurisdiction of the court, that the offence should have been committed on the high seas. U. S. v. Hamilton [Id. 15,291]. In U. S. v. Keefe [Id. 15,509], Judge Story ruled, that an indictment under the act of 1790, for an endeavor to make a revolt, was triable in the circuit court, although the offence was committed in a foreign port, the criminal jurisdiction in admiralty being deemed to be, in a general sense, co-ordinate as to place with the civil jurisdiction. This last decision was made in 1824, and the argument on the present motion maintains that the act of congress of March 3d, 1825 (4 Stat. 115, § 5), in giving directly to the courts of the United States jurisdiction over certain classes of offences committed on board of American vessels in foreign ports, necessarily limits the jurisdiction to those specified cases, and that an endeavor to make a mutiny on board of a ship in a foreign port is not an offence on any person, and is, therefore, not subjected to the cognizance of the courts of the United States, by the provisions of that act. The language of the statute is: "If any offence shall be committed on board of any ship or vessel belonging to any citizen or citizens of the United States, while lying in a port or place within the jurisdiction of any foreign state or sovereign, by any person belonging to the company of said ship, or any passenger, on any person belonging to the company of said ship, or any other passenger, the same offence shall be cognizable and punishable by the proper circuit court of the United States."

In considering this objection, it is worthy of notice, that the place where the vessel lay at the time, although called the port of Palermo, was not within any enclosed dock, nor actually at any pier or wharf. She lay out in what was called the harbor, fastened to the shore by cables. She communicated with the land by her boats. This position of the vessel would leave her, within the common acceptance of the term, on the "high seas," outside of low water mark on the coast. U. S. v. Hamilton [Case No. 15,290]; The Abby [Id. 14]; U. S. v. Kessler [Id. 15,528].

The act of 1825 was not designed to abrogate or curta'l the jurisdiction of the United States over crimes committed at sea, but manifestly to remove doubts whether that jurisdiction could be exercised when the locus in quo was a locked harbor, adapted by nature or artificially to cover and protect vessels from the perils of an open coastage. I do not find any construction given authoritatively by the courts of the United States, which establishes the doctrine, that the act of 1825 affords the exclusive rule of decision with respect to offences which are not alleged and proved to have been committed on or against the persons of individuals on shipboard.

A case occurred in 1834, before the circuit court in Pennsylvania, in which the judges (Baldwin and Hopkinson) adopted that view of the law, but only decided that larceny within a port in the Bahamas, committed on board of an American ship, was not an offence punishable under the laws of the United States (U. S. v. Morel [Id. 15,807]), because it was an offence against property alone; and the court, in illustration of their conclusion, referred to the act of 1825 as omitting to extend the admiralty jurisdiction over any description of offences within foreign ports, not committed on or against some person. If that suggestion of the court offers the true exposition of the act of 1825, the crime charged in this indictment, and proved on the trial, may, without any impropriety of language, be defined to be one against the master of the vessel, and, being charged in the words of the 2d section of the act of March 3d, 1835 (4 Stat. 776), may be deemed sufficiently alleged, without any more pointed averment. Whart. Cr. Law (2d Ed.) 132. The first count of the indictment charges, that the vessel, owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, whereof Joseph Davis was then and there master and commander, being within a foreign port, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, the defendants, being four of the crew of the said vessel, "did then and there endeavor to make a revolt," against the peace, &c. In the second count, after the like preliminary averments, it charges that the same parties "did then and there combine and confederate with each other, to make a revolt and mutiny." The third count, after the like preliminary averments, charges that the defendants "did then and there solicit, incite and stir up each other to disobey and resist the lawful orders of the master of the said ship, and to neglect and refuse their proper duty on board thereof, and to betray their proper trust therein." The first section of the act of 1835 defines, in very precise terms, the crimes of revolt and mutiny, and affixes a specific punishment to them; and the second section particularizes the acts of seamen on shipboard which shall subject them to the same punishment, as an endeavor to make a revolt or mutiny. It is practically unimportant whether the provisions of the second section are expounded as so many instances or methods in which the offence of an endeavor to make a revolt or mutiny may be manifested, or whether they are taken distributively, and understood to be so many separate and distinct offences, each being sufficient of itself to sustain an indictment. The three counts of this indictment are so framed as to secure to the United States the advantage of either construction. It appears to me, therefore, that the court did not err in instructing the jury, that if the acts charged in the indictment were satisfactorily substantiated by the evidence, and if the defendants committed those acts with intent to resist the master in the free and lawful exercise of his authority and command on board of the vessel, they would amount, in law, to an endeavor to make a revolt. I also consider that the court was correct in further instructing the jury, that the offences of mutiny, and the endeavor to make a mutiny, specified in the act of 1835, are, as defined in that law, by necessary implication, offences against the person and authority of the master, and that an averment of the crime in the language of the statute, is all that is required to make the charge of the offence complete, within the supposed requirements of the act of 1825, so as to come within the cognizance of the court.

But, independently of that view of the case, the act of 1835, in subjecting the offences therein created or described, to the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the court, gives to the court, in my opinion, in relation to those cases, a cognizance co-ordinate with what it could exercise under any antecedent law, in causes of like character.

The motion is, accordingly, overruled, and judgment is pronounced against each defendant, that he pay a fine of ten dollars, and be imprisoned for thirty days.

Case No. 16,245a.

UNITED STATES v. SEAMAN.

[2 Hayw. & H. 151.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April 27, 1854.[2]

PUBLIC PRINTING — ACT OF AUG. 26, 1852 — CONTROL BY JOINT COMMITTEE — MANDAMUS.

1. By the terms of the act of congress of August 26, 1852 (10 Stat. 30), the superintendent of public printing is subject wholly to the control of the joint committee on printing, provided by said act.

2. This court has no jurisdiction to grant the relator relief by writ of mandamus, the respondent having a discretion to decide the matter in controversy, and this court cannot control him in the exercise of that discretion.

[This was a petition by Beverly Tucker for a writ of mandamus against A. G. Seaman, printer for the United States senate, to require him to deliver a certain document to the relator.]

The petition sets forth that the relator is the public printer for the senate of the United States, duly elected and qualified, and in the actual exercise of said office; that A. G. Seaman is the superintendent of the public printing, duly appointed and qualified, and in the actual exercise of the said last mentioned office. That the said superintendent hath received and now holds a certain portion of a certain public document to wit: the agricultural portion of the annual report of the commissioner of patents, and that the said document hath been ordered to be printed by both houses of congress, but was first ordered to be printed by the senate; and that such document in such case is by the terms of the act of congress, in such case made and provided, to be printed for both houses by said relator, as printer of the senate, which house of congress first ordered the same to be printed, and that it is the duty of the said superintendent, according to the terms of the said act, now to deliver the matter or copy of the said document to the said relator, as such printer, and that to him, the said relator, it belongs by the terms of the said act to receive and print the same, and to have and enjoy the profits and advantages resulting from such delivery and printing, and that the duty of so delivering the said matter or copy is a merely ministerial duty imposed by the said act. And that the said superintendent hath refused, and still refuses to deliver the same to the said relator, and threatens and intends to deliver the same to the printer of the house of representatives, whereby the said relator will be deprived of his rights and profits in the premises.

The motion to show cause, &c., being argued by counsel, and considered by the court, it is ordered that the motion be granted.

The following is the answer of the respondent: That he was duly appointed to the office of superintendent of the public printing, and that he is in the exercise of the duties of said office; that his duties are defined and prescribed by the act of congress, approved the 26th day of August, 1852; that the provisions of the act in regard to the delivery by this respondent of all matter ordered to be printed have been strictly complied with; that on the 3d day of January, 1854, the commissioner of patents communicated to the senate the mechanical report from his office, which was ordered to be printed and on the 1st of February the same document was communicated to the house of representatives and ordered to be printed, and according to the provisions of the 7th section of the act of congress of August 26, 1852, which provides that "when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both houses of congress the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that house which first ordered the same." The entire printing of this document was required by this respondent to be executed by Beverly Tucker, the senate printer, and the copy was placed in his hands for this purpose. He further shows that on the 20th of March, 1854, the commissioner of patents communicated to the house and senate the agricultural report from his office, which was in each house on motion, ordered to be printed, the order being first made by the house of representatives; and in compliance with the law referred to, this respondent required the entire printing of this last mentioned document to be executed by A. O. P. Nickolson, the printer of the house. And he respectfully submits that the discharge of the duties of his said office of superintendent of the public printing is not subject to the control of this honorable court.

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and George C. Hazleton, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in 17 How. (58 U. S.) 225.]

Mr. J. M. Carlisle commenced for the relator.

Mr. P. B. Key, U. S. Atty., in reply to Mr. Carlisle's argument, contended that the agricultural portion of the patent office report was a distinct document. If it was not a separate document it would have been printed by the first order of congress, and not have been the subject of a separate order. The letter notifying the making up of the agricultural portion from the commissioner of patents was received by the president of the senate on March 20th, and notified on the same day to the senate, two months after the vote upon the printing of the other portion of the patent office report on January 31st. They were, in consequence, two distinct and separate documents. He maintained that the 7th section of the act of 1852 was not in favor of the relator, and quoted the section to prove that the printing would go to the public printer, either of the house or senate, who first received the order. If the two portions of the patent office report had been sent together, Mr. Beverly Tucker would have been entitled to the printing of them both, but when they were, as they are now, separate documents, the printer of the house, if the order was first given, then he was entitled to it. It had been contended that the advantage of time was in favor of the house printer by half an hour, which was sufficient to entitle him to the preference, under the act of 1852, and was bound to distribute it accordingly.

In answer to the inquiry from the court, Mr. Key said the superintendent of public printing still held the document.

Mr. Key resumed, going over the argument that he had already adduced, and referred to the opinion expressed by the court, whether the duties of the superintendent of public printing were purely ministerial, which he maintained them to be by the 3d section of the act, which he then read.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson spoke at some length in favor of his client.

The cause having been heard upon the petition, answer and proof, touching the question, whether or not the different portions of the report of the commissioners of patents for the year 1854 constitute one and the same document.

BY THE COURT. That by the terms of the act of congress, approved the 26th day of August, 1852, entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing and establishing the prices thereon, and for other purposes." The superintendent, as public printer, is subjected wholly to the control of the joint committee on printing, provided for by said act, in the matter complained of by the relator, and that by consequence this court has no jurisdiction to grant the relator relief by writ of mandamus. One of the judges, Judge Dunlop, being also of opinion, that if the court have erred in the above construction of the statute of the 26th of August, 1852, and the joint committee on printing have no control of the superintendent, then the superintendent of the public printing has a discretion to decide the matter in controversy in this case, and this court cannot control him in the exercise of that discretion on this last ground. Also the said judge thinks this court has no jurisdiction to grant to the relator the relief prayed by him; that if the subject was made the ground of an action at law, the court would then exercise its judgment, and would not consider itself bound by what Mr. Seaman did.

It is considered by the court and so ordered and adjudged, that the said writ of mandamus, as by the relator prayed for, be refused, and that the said petition be dismissed with costs.

[A writ of error was subsequently sued out from the supreme court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed, with costs. 17 How. (58 U. S.) 225.]

Case No. 16,246.

UNITED STATES v. SEARS.

[1 Code Rep. 128; 1 West. Leg. Obs. 80.]

District Court, D. Iowa. Jan. Term, 1849.

POSTMASTERS—ACTION ON OFFICIAL BOND—LIMITATION.

A suit was instituted by the United States against the surety of a postmaster on the official bond, nearly three years after the date of the last item charged against him in the accounts with the department. Held, that the action was barred by the third section of act of congress of 1825 [4 Stat. 103].

This was an action of debt against the defendant [Daniel Sears], as one of the securities of Samuel Shuffleton, deceased, late postmaster at Fairfield, in this state. Alleged breach of the bond, that the said "Shuffleton did not well and truly execute the duties of the said office of postmaster, aforesaid, but made default therein, as follows, to wit: At Fairfield, in the county of Jefferson, on the 8th day of October, A. D. 1846, a large sum of money of the said plaintiff, viz. $700, came into the hands and possession of said Shuffleton, in his capacity of postmaster, which large sum of money said Shuffleton hath not paid or accounted for in the manner prescribed by the postmaster-general," &c. Plea of the statute of limitations, to which the plaintiff replied.

C. W. Slagle, for defendant, contended that the third section of the act of 1825 releases the obligor in the bond, if suit is not brought within two years from the time of default; that the thirty-second section of the same act makes it the duty of the postmaster to account with the department at the end of every three months and pay over the balance. Shuffleton's last account was rendered September 22, 1845, at which time he was in default. This suit was commenced September 1, 1848, nearly three years from the time of the default.

J. M. Preston, U. S. Atty., took the ground that the certificate of the auditor of the post-office department, which was dated October 8, 1848, was the true time from which the statute should run; and that two certain drafts drawn on Shuffleton, within two years before the commencement of this suit, brought it within the statute.

BY THE COURT (DYER, District Judge). The act provides "that if any postmaster, or other person authorized to receive the postage of letters and packets, shall neglect or refuse to render his accounts, and pay over to the postmaster-general the balance by him due at the end of every three months, it shall be the duty of the postmaster-general to cause a suit to be commenced against the person or persons so neglecting or refusing." The copy of the account in evidence is for balance due at the end of each quarter commencing ——, and ending September 22, 1845. The last charge in the account is of the date of September 22, 1845. Suit was brought against the defendant on the first day of September, 1848, nearly three years after the date of the last item charged. Defalcation occurred at the time the balances were due, and were required to be paid, to wit, at the end of every three months, and the statute begins to run from that time. The first draft drawn on the postmaster for the balance due was in February, 1846, nearly five months after the date of the last item in the account, when the balance for that quarter was due. If at that time it was unpaid, it was the duty of the postmaster-general to bring suit. Default in the payment of balances was not made at the time of the dishonor of the draft, because they were due and unpaid long before the draft was drawn.

It is contended, on the part of the United States, that the statute begins to run from the date of the adjustment of the postmaster's account of his entire indebtedness, and that the copy filed as evidence of such settlement and adjustment of his account is dated in 1848. The copy of the account is only a statement from the department of such settlement and adjustment at the end of every three months, when it is made the duty of the postmaster to pay what is due; and the postmaster-general must adjust the accounts of such postmaster at the end of three months, to know what is due and unpaid.

This suit having been brought nearly three years after the date of the last item in the account, the court is clearly of opinion that it is barred by the statute.

Case No. 16,247.

UNITED STATES v. SEARS et al.

[1 Gall. 215.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1812.

EMBARGO ACTS — INSPECTION OF VESSEL — GOODS ILLEGALLY LADEN—PROOF OF INSPECTOR'S APPOINTMENT—OBSTRUCTION.

1. An inspector is an officer of the customs, the obstruction of whom is an offence within the 71st section of the collection act of 1st March, 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 633; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22]. An inspector had a right to go on board of any vessel, to discover if any goods, &c. were illegally laden on board, contrary to the embargo acts: and if obstructed in so doing, an indictment lay under said 71st section.

[Cited in Hooper v. Fifty-One Casks of Brandy, Case No. 6,674.]

[Cited in Jones v. Gibson, 1 N. H. 271.]

2. If an inspector be commissioned and sworn, and in the actual execution of the duties of the office, with the knowledge of the treasury department, it is sufficient proof of his being regularly appointed, even supposing (which may be doubted) that the approbation of the secretary of the treasury were necessary to such specific appointment.

[1] [Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

3. On a trial for obstructing an inspector, it is not necessary to produce the commission of the collector who appoints him. Proof that the collector acts in such office de facto is sufficient.

Indictment for resisting Chipman, an inspector of the customs, in the execution of his office, viz. in attempting to enter the schooner Dinah, for the purpose, as was alleged, of ascertaining, first, whether any breach of the law had been committed; secondly, whether goods were on board, intended to be illegally exported. A verdict of "guilty" having been found against all the defendants, Prescott, of counsel for the defendants, moved for a new trial, for the following reasons:—(1) That an inspector is not an officer within the 71st section of the collection law. (2) That no evidence was produced of the secretary's having approved the inspector's appointment, in conformity to section 21. (3) That the collector's commission should have been produced; the United States choosing to rely on documents, not on reputation. (4) That there was no evidence, that the defendants knew Chipman as an inspector, claiming to act as such. (5) That the court instructed the jury, that an inspector had a right to enter for either of the purposes mentioned in the indictment.

The motion for a new trial was argued by Mr. Prescott, for defendants, and by Mr. Blake, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

As to the first reason, Prescott contended, that the collector, naval officer and surveyor, were alone to be considered as officers, within the meaning of section 27 of the coasting act (2 Laws U. S. 191), and section 71 of the collection law. 1 Story's Laws, 633 [1 Stat. 678, c. 22]. The 21st section of the collection law describes the officers' duties, after having first named them, and among the collector's duties is, "with the approbation of the principal officer of the treasury department, to employ proper persons as weighers, gaugers, measurers and inspectors, at the several ports within his district." The inspector is appointed only for a single port in a district. By the 54th section, inspectors are, together with others, authorised to go on board vessels for certain special purposes. By section 71, it is made unlawful to impede, &c. any officer of the customs, or their deputies. Inspectors, &c. are, in all cases but one provided in section 54, to be considered as always acting under the direction and superintendence of the collector.

On the second reason, Prescott did not enlarge.

As to the third reason, he contended, that even though it might be sufficient, as to Chipman, to prove him a reputed officer of the customs, yet as he derived his authority from Otis, the collector, it was necessary to show Otis's right to appoint. Reputation can extend no farther than the agent, and does not apply to the person appointing. The record having been relied on in the first instance, it must be followed.

In support of the fourth reason, Prescott cited Tidd, Prac. 818; 3 Wils. 47.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice, said, that Chipman's boat was not a revenue cutter, there being only ten of those commissioned by the president, and making a part of the naval force. He also remarked, that inspectors were either general or special.

DAVIS, District Judge, referred to the act of April 25th, 1808, § 7 [2 Stat. 501], "Revenue Cutters or Boats."

Prescott. Chipman appeared as cutter-master, not as inspector. There is a distinction between cutters and revenue-boats. The latter must be open row-boats, or sail-boats. Chipman's boat was not of this description.

As to the fifth reason, Prescott argued, that the statute gave no authority to the inspector to enter for the purpose of ascertaining an intended breach, and only in one case, that provided in the 54th section, authorized him to enter for the purpose of ascertaining a breach actually committed, unless under the direction of the collector. By the 68th section authority is given to the collector, naval officer, and surveyor, to search for dutiable goods (obtaining a warrant, if on land), but none to the inspector. By a section of the embargo law, vessels were to be loaded under an inspector, but this must be by direction of the collector on his permit.

STORY, Circuit Judge, suggested the case of a coasting vessel, having a cargo beyond $800, and asked, whether an inspector could not enter to ascertain, whether such vessel was about to sail without a clearance.

Blake, e contra, was told by the court, to confine himself to Prescott's two last reasons, the court having no doubt as to the others. He was also requested to speak to so much only of the fifth reason, as respected goods illegally laden for exportation. He contended, that it would have been enough to allege generally, that Chipman went on board, in the execution of his duty. An inspector may seize, as well as examine. The object of the revenue act is to search as to an offence committed; that of the 11th section of the embargo act, to search as to offences contemplated. In the case of an inspector resisted, but overcoming, and sued for an assault, he would not be required, in his defence, to show his purpose; it would be enough, if he show his authority as inspector. If an inspector may board without any reason assigned, can the indictment be bad on account of the particular fraud alleged? Blake compared this case to that of a sheriff.

In answer to Prescott's fourth reason, Blake contended, that it was not necessary that the jury should have evidence, that the defendants knew Chipman's authority. They resisted at their peril. It was like resisting a sheriff. But, in fact, their behavior to Chipman, and conversation with him, show, they were not ignorant of his character.

STORY, Circuit Justice, referred to Act (Jan. 9) 1809, § 4 [2 Stat. 507], and Act April 25, 1808, § 2. From these acts it should seem, the inspector may enter and report to the collector, whether a vessel is entitled to a clearance.

Prescott answered, that the inspector's authority cannot extend to all cases. It is confined to particular vessels; otherwise, he becomes collector.

In reply to Blake, Prescott contended, that there was not a dictum to support the extent of power, now attempted to be given to the inspector; that it could not be supposed, so large a power was intended to be given to an inferior and irresponsible officer. The 68th section of the collection law is explicit, as to the duties of officers. The collector, naval officer or surveyor, may enter to search for goods subject to duty, and concealed. There is nothing about an intention to offend. It appeared from the evidence, that the vessel was laden before the enforcing act. This act passed on the 9th March, and was received in Boston on the 16th. There was no evidence to show, that on the 20th, when the offence, if any, was committed, this act was known to the collector, much less to the inspector, then absent from the collector. No offence was committed against this act, until, after notice, the owner had refused to unload or give bond. As to the other reason, in civil causes, a verdict will be set aside, if found without evidence; a fortiori, in criminal causes. If the jurors have any knowledge upon the subject, they must disclose it at the trial under oath.

STORY, Circuit Justice, observed, that formerly such a disclosure on oath was not necessary.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The indictment charges, that on the 20th of January, 1809, one John Chipman was "an inspector and officer of the customs for the port and district of Barnstable," and on the same day, with certain assistants, "did attempt to go on board of a certain schooner or vessel called the 'Dinah,' then being at the aforesaid port of Chatham, and laden with a cargo of goods and merchandize, and about to proceed therewith on a voyage to sea; which said vessel was then and there a vessel of the United States, duly enrolled and licensed, according to the directions of the law in such case provided, for the coasting trade; and that the said John did attempt to proceed and go as aforesaid, on board of the said vessel, with the intent, and for the purpose of inspecting, searching and examining the said vessel and her papers, in order to ascertain if any breach of the laws of the United States had been committed, whereby the said vessel, or the goods and merchandize then on board, or any part thereof, was or were liable by law to forfeiture or seizure; and also to discover if any goods and merchandizes had been laden and put, and then were on board of the said vessel, for the purpose of being exported therein from the United States, and from the port aforesaid, contrary to the laws of the United States:" and then charges that the defendants, while the said John and his assistants were "in the execution of the duty aforesaid," assaulted the said John and his assistants, and then and there resisted, obstructed, prevented and impeded them "in the execution of the laws of the United States, and of their duty aforesaid," against the statutes in such case made and provided.

At the trial the jury found all the defendants guilty, and now their counsel has moved for a new trial, as well as in arrest of judgment, upon certain exceptions, which I will now proceed to consider.

The first is, that an inspector is not an officer of the customs; for obstructing whom, an indictment lies on the 71st section of the act of 2d March, 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 633; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22]. The charge in the indictment is, that he was "an inspector and officer of the customs;" and the latter, if properly alleged and proved, would have been sufficient to support the indictment. But we entertain no doubt that an inspector is "an officer of the customs," and so is within the purview of the 71st section. He is an officer known to and recognised by the law; his duties are in many instances prescribed, and the omission of those duties, or any fraudulent conduct in his office, will subject him to heavy forfeitures (see sections 53, 73, Act March 2, 1799 [1 Story's Laws, 664; 1 Stat. 704, c. 23]). In the same act he is sometimes called an "inspector of the revenue" (sections 30, 35, 37, 38, 40–42); sometimes an "inspector of the customs" (sections 38, 46, 53); sometimes an "officer of inspection" (sections 39, 62); and sometimes an "officer of the revenue" (section 53). It seems difficult to raise a doubt, that the officer so named is an officer of the customs. But there is a still more direct expression, which puts the meaning beyond all controversy. In section 73, it is provided, that if "any inspector or other officer of the customs" shall certify the shipment of any merchandize, without inspection, &c. he shall be subject to certain forfeitures, &c. The same act (section 25) provides, that manifests of the cargo shall be produced to such officer of the customs as shall first come on board of any vessel, on arriving within four leagues of the coast, for his inspection: and further (section 54) declares, that an inspector may go on board of such vessel for the purpose of examining such manifests. There can therefore be no possible doubt, that an inspector is, in contemplation of law, an officer of the customs. See Act March 2, 1799, c. 129, § 2 [1 Story's Laws 664; 1 Stat. 704, c. 23.]

A second objection is, that no proof was adduced at the trial, to show that the secretary of the treasury had approved of the appointment of Chipman, as inspector. The words of the act as to this point are (section 21), that the collector "shall, with the approbation of the principal officer of the treasury department, employ proper persons as weighers, gaugers, measurers and inspectors, at the several ports within his district." It may well be doubted, if this clause require an approbation of the specific officer appointed, or amount to any thing more than that the employment shall not be created without the approbation of the secretary. But admitting that it does, the commission of the inspector reciting such approbation was proved at the trial; a copy, from the treasury department, of the oath taken by him, and an actual execution of the duties of the office, which we are satisfied was sufficient evidence to support the allegations in the indictment, and to prove him lawfully an inspector.

A third objection is, that the commission of the collector, who appointed the inspector, was not produced, and therefore there was no proof of his authority. But it is a sufficient answer to this objection, that the commission was not necessary to be proved. It was shown that the party had actually executed the duties of the office of collector for many years; and nothing more is necessary to be proved in cases punishable with the highest of human penalties, even the forfeiture of life. 2 McNal. Ev. 487; Berryman v. Wise, 4 Term R. 366; 1 Leach, 381n.; 2 Leach, 381; Harg. Law Tracts, 225, 226; 3 Camp. 432; Wightw. 67; Doe d. James v. Brown, 5 Barn & Ald. 243.

A fourth objection is, that it was not proved at the trial that the defendants knew that Chipman acted or claimed to act as inspector; and it is said, that if the jury find a verdict without evidence, it is as sufficient a ground for a new trial, as if it be found contrary to evidence; and 2 Wils. 47, and 2 Tidd, Prac. (4th Ed.) 802, are cited to support the position. Admitting the doctrine to be true, (and it may well admit of qualification,) still we are of opinion that there were facts in the case sufficient to warrant the inference made by the jury, that the defendants knew the character in which Chipman acted.

The last objection, and the only one which seemed of much weight is, that the inspector had no authority by law to proceed on board the vessel "to discover if any goods, &c. had been laden, &c for the purpose of being exported &c. contrary to the laws of the United States," according to the charge in the indictment; and therefore, if the officer were attempting to proceed for this purpose, it was not in the execution of the duties of his office: whereas the court directed the jury, that in point of law the officer had such authority. The direction of the court was given, as is supposed in the objection, and with the view of reserving the point for more solemn consideration. No statute has been shown, which directly and explicitly gives the authority to any officer of the customs. If it exists, it is an authority implied from the provisions of the acts regulating the trade of the United States. At the time when the offence was committed, as charged in the indictment, all the embargo acts were in full operation. It will be recollected that this was a coasting vessel, which by the ordinary laws, under no circumstances, could be allowed to engage in foreign trade while her license was in force; and that the proceeding on a foreign voyage, or being employed in any other trade than that for which she was licensed, subjected her to forfeiture. Act Feb. 18, 1793, c. 8, §§ 8, 32 [1 Stat. 305]. By the embargo acts these provisions were sedulously enforced, and new restrictions followed up with successively increasing rigor. A licensed vessel was not allowed to depart from port, or to receive a clearance, without giving bonds that she would not proceed to any foreign port. Act Jan. 9, 1808, c, 8, § 1 [2 Stat. 453]. The departure without a clearance, or proceeding to a foreign port, incurred the penalty of forfeiture. Id. § 3. It was declared unlawful to export from the United States any goods, wares or merchandises whatsoever, under a like forfeiture. Act March 12, 1808, c. 33, § 4 [2 Stat. 474]. No vessel was allowed to receive a clearance, unless laden under the inspection of the proper revenue officers (Act April 25, 1808, c. 66, § 2 [2 Stat. 299]); and if bound to a district adjacent to a foreign country, without the special permission of the president of the United States (Act April 25, 1808, § 6). The collectors were authorized to detain any vessel, ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of the United States, whenever, in their opinions, there was reason to suspect an intended violation of the law. Id. § 11. The putting on board of any ship any goods or merchandise, with an intent of illegal exportation, subjected the property to forfeiture. Act Jan. 9, 1809, c. 72, § 1 [2 Stat. 506]. The lading of goods on board ships was declared illegal, unless made by permission of the collector and under the inspection of the revenue officers. Act Jan. 9, 1809, c. 72, §§ 2, 4. Vessels already laden were required to be unladen, or to give the bonds required by the law. Id. § 3. The president of the United States was authorized to give instructions to the "officers of the revenue" for carrying the embargo into effect (Act Dec. 22, 1807, c. 5, § 1 [2 Stat. 451]); to instruct the collectors as to the detention of vessels, and of goods having an illegal destination (Act April 25, 1808, c. 66, § 11), and as to the refusal to grant clearances (Act Jan. 9, 1809, c. 72, § 10); and to employ the land and naval forces and militia of the United States in suppressing assemblages which should be resisting "the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties" (Id. § 11). And finally, the penalties and forfeitures incurred under these statutes were to be recovered and distributed in general, as under the collection act of March 2, 1799, c. 128.

These are a part of the provisions, which composed the system of restrictions on commerce and navigation. Almost all the provisions were to be carried into effect by the vigilance of custom-house officers. Though not expressly named, it seems quite impossible to presume, that the provisions which I have cited did not presuppose their agency. The collectors could alone grant or refuse clearances. The lading could alone be made under the inspection of the inspectors and other officers of the customs. The authority of interposing to prevent an illegal exportation or departure, or of seizing upon the commission of an offence, could not be exercised without examining the state and condition and papers of the vessel and cargo. In short, without an implied authority, from the nature of their offices and the requisitions of the laws, to enter on board, and, in the language of the indictment, "to discover if any goods, &c., had been laden, &c.,on board of the said vessel, for the purpose of being exported therein from the United States," I do not see that it could have been possible, either to execute the known provisions of the law, or to have avoided infringements of the rights of the citizens. Indeed, the authority in the president of the United States to instruct "the officers of the revenue," in carrying into effect the embargo, and aiding with military force "the custom-house officers," in the execution of their duties, presupposes that the law had already devolved these duties upon them. It is conceded that an inspector had a right to go on board a vessel to examine, &c., if any breach of the laws of the United States had been committed. Now, at the time when this transaction took place, it was a breach of law to lade goods, &c., for the purpose of illegal exportation. It would follow, therefore, that the inspector had an authority to go on board to examine into this fact. If the inspector had not this authority, neither had the collector; for it is no where expressly given; and if it be necessary or proper completely to execute other duties, it would result by implication to an inspector as well as a collector. As I have before observed, the laws seem to consider it already existing, and extend the authority to commanders of revenue boats, which by law are to be appointed for the use of surveyors and inspectors. Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 101 [1 Story's Laws, 633; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22]; and Act April 25, 1808, c. 66, § 7 [2 Stat. 501].

It is certainly not to be inferred from this reasoning, that officers of the customs have an unlimited authority over the commercial property of the citizens. In the nature of things they must have some implied powers. The legislature would, in vain, attempt to enumerate them; and I think it may be safely assumed, that they may exercise all powers necessary and proper to effectuate the manifest intentions of the law connected with the duties of their office. To them is committed the general management of the revenue laws, be they of exportation or importation; and I think it would be dangerous in the extreme to adopt the position that every act of theirs must be shown sub pede sigilli. They act at their peril. If they invade the rights of the citizens under color of office, this court will, I trust, be the last to afford them a shelter or a refuge.

On the whole, after some doubt and much reflection, I am now satisfied that the last objection ought not to prevail; and that the opinion of the court at the trial was well founded in principle. My search in the books has not enabled me to detect a single authority or principle, which is shaken or opposed in coming to this determination.

OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE—CONTEMPTS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—TAKING AWAY AN ATTACHED VESSEL.

[1. The taking away of a vessel by her owner, after she has been attached by the marshal, but while she is not in the actual custody of himself or a keeper, does not constitute the offence of impeding or obstructing justice, within the meaning of the second section of the act of March 2, 1831 (4 Stat. 487), entitled "An act declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court."]

[2. It seems that the act was not intended to create any new offences, but is limited to cases which were recognized as contempts under the pre-existing law, and that the second section relates to those cases known as "constructive contempts."]

[3. But even if it were intended to create a new offence, unknown to the common law, yet in construing the statute the common-law meaning of the terms employed is to be observed.]

[4. The expressions "obstruct" and "impede" the due administration of justice, as used in the act, refer only to direct acts of violence or menace, disturbing the ordinary functions of the court.]

BETTS, District Judge. The defendant, together with three other persons, was indicted under the 2d section of the act of congress entitled "An act declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court." The section provides that, if any person or persons shall corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any juror, witness, or officer, in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or shall corruptly, or by threats or force, obstruct or impede, or endeavor to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein, every person or persons, so offending, shall be liable to prosecution therefor by indictment, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both, according to the nature and aggravation of the offence. The first count in the indictment alleges, in substance, that a suit in rem was instituted on the side of the district court of this district, and that an attachment was duly issued therein, on which the brig Joseph Gorham, her tackle, &c., was arrested on the 4th day of August last, by a deputy of the marshal, the brig then lying and being at Brooklyn, &c., and that on the 7th day of August, whilst the brig was in the custody of the said deputy marshal under such attachment, the defendants, well knowing the premises, but corruptly devising and intending to obstruct and impede the due administration of justice, with force and arms, corruptly and by threats and force, did remove, take, and carry away the said brig, out of the custody of the deputy marshal, and thereby, there and then, corruptly, and by threats and force, did obstruct and impede the due administration of justice in the said district court, &c. The second count setting forth the same inducement, charges the offence, that the defendants, well knowing the premises, but corruptly devising (as before stated), corruptly did take and remove, and thereby then and there did corruptly impede the due administration of justice in a court of the United States. The third count charges that the vessel was removed by the defendants by force and arms, corruptly and against the will and consent of the deputy marshal, and thereby, they did, by threats and force, obstruct and impede the due administration of justice, &c. The remaining three counts set forth acts of the defendants to the same effect, with some variation of averments, so as in that mode to charge a substantive offence against such provision of the statute. To this indictment Albert Seeley demurred and the district attorney joined in the demurrer.

The indictment does not aver that the defendant by force or threats impeded, or endeavored to impede, the due administration of justice, raising thereby an issue open to any species of pertinent proof; but it sets forth specifically the acts done by him, and charges that by those acts he impeded, or endeavored to impede, justice, &c. It becomes then wholly a question of law, whether the acts alleged to have been committed are, of themselves, competent proof of the illegal intent and obstruction of justice, charged by the indictment. First, there is no allegation that the marshal was dispossessed of the property attached, either by force or threats, or was in any way hindered in the execution of his process or the custody of the vessel. It not being charged that the defendants deprived him of the actual custody of the vessel, it must be intended that he had no other than a legal custody, resulting from the due service of an attachment, and that the interference of the defendants consisted in removing the property so circumstanced, and with intent to defeat the arrest. This is also the extent of the intimidation or impeding of the marshal in the discharge of his duty, supposed to be inferable from the facts stated. It must accordingly be accepted, upon this indictment, that nothing was done by the defendants directly operating upon the officer, or the court, to obstruct or impede the due administration of justice; and the argument for the United States to uphold the prosecution is, that the action of the court being in rem, the removal of the res, whilst it was subject to that action, though at the time found derelict, as it avers, brings the parties so proceeding within the spirit and intent of the statute, and subjects them to conviction for a criminal offence.

As the levy of process on property places the property under the legal possession of the officer, and in custody of the court or the law, the deduction is that a wrongful interference with the property so situated, for the purpose of taking it from such custody, becomes a misdemeanor under this act, the same as if the vessel was rescued forcibly or tortiously.

To determine the just scope and application of the statute, it must first be considered whether it is intended to act only on what the law recognized as contempts of court. If its meaning is to be so restricted, then the acts charged against the defendants, however injurious to the administration of justice, would not be subject to indictment, without it is clearly established that they would have been punishable as contempts under the law as it stood previous to this enactment. The act assumes, in taking its name and title, to be a law concerning contempts of court. The first section very carefully defines and limits the power of the United States courts to issue attachment and inflict summary punishments for contempts of court. The second section subjects parties to indictment for impeding, or endeavoring to impede or obstruct, justice in certain methods; and for the defendant it is urged that congress only designed to modify or change the mode of punishment, and that it is still necessary to show that the matter charged as an offence would have been a contempt, and punishable as such, but for the statute.

It is argued for the United States that the second section introduces a new class of substantive offences, and which are to be proceeded against without respect to any construction or remedy the courts might have given in regard to them, independent of the statute.

I am inclined to the opinion that the sound construction of the act would limit the second section to those cases which were reconized by the law as constructive contempts of court. The title is a very significant index to the intent of congress, and, without resorting to the special history of the period which induced the interference of the legislature [Preston v. Browder] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 116, the ordinary principles of interpretation would leave courts to hold that both parts of an act so designated are in pari materia, and subject to like rules of construction. This inference is fortified by the consideration that congress had already provided punishments for offences in hinderance of justice, and if this statute designed to constitute the malfeasances therein referred to, of the same class, it would seem that an equal punishment would be prescribed. Whilst the offences of hindering justice may be punished by imprisonment for a year (2 Laws U. S. 97, §§ 22, 23), the misdemeanants under the act are subjected to imprisonment not exceeding 30 days, and the same grade of punishment they would have received if proceeded against summarily as contempts. Those indirect or consequential contempts, not committed in presence of the court or its officers, by suitors, jurors, &c., and subject to be punished by fine and imprisonment, are enumerated by Blackstone, and comprehend the description of cases designated in this second section of the act of congress. 4 Bl. Comm. 284–286; 3 Burrows, 1564; 1 Wils. 75; 6 Davis, Abr. 528; 7 Davis, Abr. 307–312. The impeachment of Judge Peck, and the trial that ensued, developed before congress the doctrine of courts of all orders of jurisdiction, in respect to contempts, and the usages of the United States courts in taking cognizance of them under the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 [1 Stat. 73]. The final judgment of the court of impeachment was rendered July 31, 1831, (Peck's Trial, 474), and this act was reported by the judiciary committee of ——, on the ——, as finally passed March 2, 1831.

This statute may have been designed to sustain the doctrine of the house of representatives advanced by their managers on that trial, that the power to punish contempts was of common-law origin, and belonged to the body of criminal jurisdiction of common-law courts, but its construction, alike upon its terms, and with a view to the history of the terms, most naturally applies its provisions to those matters theretofore regarded as within the summary jurisdiction of courts, and punishable by them as contempts. It designates, with marked precision, the boundaries of that authority to be thereafter observed, and then subjects to the jurisdiction of criminal courts those acts which may incidentally or consequentially interfere with the due administration of justice, but not falling within the limits of that summary jurisdiction as so defined.

Admitting, then, that the second section of the act embraces all cases of contempt tending to obstruct or impede the due administration of justice, the question arises whether the removal of property on which an attachment or execution had been levied amounts to such contempt, when the property taken was not found in the actual custody of the officer. A rescue of a party or property under arrest will be punished as a contempt (5 Vin. Abr. "Contempt," p. 443, art. 9), for then the process and authority of the court is opposed by violence, but no such violence accompanies the removal of property which the officer, after arrest, leaves without a keeper, and will the law imply that such taking is by force or threats, or in opposition to the authority of the court? At common law there can be no rescue but where the officer has the actual possession of the person or property (Co. Litt. 160; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 226; 1 Hale, P. C. 606); and though more appropriately the proceeding by attachment in case of rescue is in protection of arrests of the person on mesne process (Hetl. 145; 2 Dana, Abr. 352), yet in cases of high treason or felony the king's bench will attach for contempt for rescuing a prisoner in execution (Co. Litt. 161; Co. Ent. 614). But it is not a rescue for a stranger to take goods seized by a sheriff on fi. fa. (Litt. 296; Sheriff of Surrey v. Alderton, Het. 145; Cro. Eliz. 639; 2 Sandf. 343–411); and the supreme court of this state refused an attachment against the defendant himself, for taking his property levied on forcibly from the sheriff (People v. Church, 2 Wend. 262).

If, then, the statute is to be understood as substituting a prosecution by indictment only in cases before subject to attachment as for contempts, it would seem clear, upon authority and principle, that the matter charged against the defendant could not have been cognizable by the court as a contempt previous to the act, and cannot accordingly be the foundation for an indictment under the act. But if the statute is to be construed as creating a new offence, and bringing acts for which the law before had supplied no remedy in the courts of the United States, within the criminal jurisdiction of those courts, it becomes necessary to consider whether the allegations of the indictment describe the offence designated by the statute.

It has been already observed that the gist of the indictment is, that the defendant took away, with force and arms, out of the jurisdiction of the district court, a vessel arrested by warrant of attachment in a civil suit, in that court. It is not charged that any officer or keeper was dispossessed of the property, or that threats, intimidation, or force was applied to any officer having custody of the property for the purpose of taking it away. The indictment alleges that the defendant did the act corruptly, but the corruption is not averred to have any relation to any third person, and must accordingly be understood only as his own purpose of heart.

If the prosecution can be supported upon the facts set forth, it must be on the ground that it is a criminal offence for a person to take away property, his own or that of a third person, being under seizure by process of law, though after the arrest the property is left in the same situation in which it was arrested, and without any officer or other depository for him holding it in keeping.

The allegation that the transportation was with force and arms is mere surplusage, unless there was an actual or constructive force applied to dispossess the arrest of the officer or impede justice (1 Chit. Cr. Law, 198); and the averment is particularly inefficacious here, because the facts constituting the crime are all set forth, and no force, violence, or threats in respect to any third person is alleged to have accompanied them. It may have been technically a trespass, but higher force is requisite to subject the act to an indictment, unless accompanied by circumstances, constituting a breach of the peace. 4 Bl. Comm. 148; 3 Burrows, 1731; Russ. Crimes, 70. Do then the facts spread out upon the indictment constitute the offence of obstructing or impeding, or endeavoring to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice, corruptly, or by threats or force?

Obstructing or hindering justice is a common-law offence, and was, as to various modes of committing it, one already provided against by the crimes act of 1790 [1 Stat. 112]. And if the act of 1831 creates in this particular an offence unknown to the common law, yet, in construing it, the common-law meaning of the terms employed is to be observed and applied to the act. 6 Dane, Abr. p. 598, art. 12. "Obstructing or impeding the due administration of justice" would be of the same character of offence as obstructing or opposing an officer in serving, or attempting to serve, process, and the act constituting either such obstruction or holding should accordingly exhibit the like constituents in both cases. The act or endeavor in the latter instance would necessarily apply to a different state of the proceedings in a suit, but would be comprehended in the general common-law description of the offence of obstructing or hindering justice. 2 Hale, P. C. c. 17, § 1; 4 Bl. Comm. 129; 1 Russ. Crimes, 519. To "obstruct," independent of the acceptation the word has obtained in the criminal law, would seem to stand ex vi termini a direct and positive interposition, which prevented, or tended to prevent, the action of the officer or court in respect to a matter then to be proceeded in. "Impede" must necessarily bear a similar import, and, if there be any discrimination between the two terms, it can only be that the same direct and positive interference may, without amounting to a complete obstruction, become an impediment to the action intended to be intercepted. The intention of the legislature to give these terms an application only to direct acts of violence or menace disturbing the ordinary functions of courts is inferrible from the construction that the endeavor is made equally criminal with the entire completion of the purpose. An endeavor to obstruct or impede, &c., by threats or force, would necessarily imply the effort to put forth some act, which in its natural, if not necessary, consequence, must be attended with an obstruction, and with a forced and compelled, interruption of further progress in the administration of justice. The indictment would seem to assume that any act of trespass connected with a subject-matter in litigation, which may lead to delay in such litigation, is an offence within this statute. The legislature could hardly be supposed to have intended to cover a ground so broad as that. Mere delay or procrastination of a suit, though produced wrongfully or by superior force, could not necessarily become an offence, affecting public justice. A replevy of property under levy; an arrest and imprisonment of the libellant in an action for an illegal seizure or levy of the property in question; or if a quarrel had arisen between the parties in respect to the arrest, and the defendant had beaten the libellant to the degree that he was disabled from attending to and prosecuting his action, these and other instances that might be put would each delay the case, and in that sense impede the immediate administration of justice; but they are not regarded at common law as the offence of hindering justice, nor is there any reason for holding that the language of this should be so extended as to embrace them. The evils in view of the legislature were acts of violence, or improper and corrupt dealings with the officers and ministers of justice, parties, or the process of the law. This is plainly shown by the first section of the act, and the second, in calling in the aid of the criminal court, ought to be understood to refer to that tribunal the cognizance of offences of like quality and bearing, and the remedy should not to be construed to depart entirely from and outrun the evil intended to be punished and expressed. Again, the indictment fails to show that the due administration of justice has been any way obstructed or impeded. The libellant attached the vessel by a proceeding in rem; but that arrest imparted no title or right to the thing other than to have the value of the vessel applied towards the satisfaction of a decree, should one be rendered in his favor, provided the vessel was in law responsible for that demand.

The due administration of justice, on the demand of the libellant, if his right is sustained in court, is not necessarily the condemnation of the vessel; it is only the adjudication and settlement of his right, and as consequent satisfaction of the demand decreed in his favor out of the property seized. The primary question is his right to a decree of damages, and, secondary to that, is that of his right to, or the necessity for, a remedy against the vessel; and it cannot be asserted that the administration of justice is any way affected by the removal or destruction of the thing arrested, without it is made palpable that the specific thing would be subjected to, and was required for, the satisfaction of this demand, and that this consequential decree was a constituent and essential part of the procedure in administering the justice of the case. Further, if this arrest was valid and the vessel was legally responsible in the action, then his remedy is perfect against the marshal because of an insufficient execution of the process. Had the proceeding been in personam, and the respondent after arrest, and before giving bail on stipulation, had been persuaded or forcibly abducted out of the district of the defendant, such act could not have been criminally prosecuted under this statute, because justice is administered upon the right of such libellant just as duly by enforcing satisfaction out of the officer, or out of bail, as from the defendant or his property. To obstruct or impede the due administration of justice upon the ordinary signification of language must be something further than pleading embarrassment or difficulties in the way of a convenient enjoyment of the fruits of a litigation. A trespass or waste committed by one party upon property under litigation would render the property less valuable to his antagonist should it be awarded him, and, in so far as the due administration of justice requires that the entire benefit adjudged a party should be secured him, would to that extent obstruct and impede such administration; and upon like principle any spoliation of part of the tackle or furniture, or destruction of any part or appurtenance of this vessel, by the defendant, would be a criminal offence. But it must be manifest that such remote and contingent consequences, to acts not otherwise criminal, could not be intended by congress to be embraced within the scope of this section, if it is understood as introducing a class of criminal misdemeanors before unknown to the law.

It would seem palpable that the administration of justice which the act intended to defend and protect from being obstructed or impeded consists of that action of the courts, through their officers and other direct instrumentality, essential to the free and full consideration and determination of the matter, and the enforcement of their orders and decisions. To this extent the community has a common concern. The public is deeply interested in maintaining without disturbance, for the court, their officers, processes, and the parties litigant before them; the powers and privileges by means of which questions of right and wrong are investigated and settled. But when the law has by its penal sanctions protected against molestation the action of these agencies, so far as they are direct and necessary to this common good, it may well be supposed that the accidental disturbances or procrastinations an individual may encounter, in realizing the fruits of his success, and which, in their nature, are personal to himself alone, would be left to be redressed by that mode of remedy the law furnishes for particular torts and injuries. But, again, the due administration of justice does not necessarily import that its course must always be expeditious or direct. If by the removal of this property the remedy of the libellant has been less prompt and immediate, his relief is still within the competency of the court by its ordinary course of proceeding. The more circuitous and dilatory method of redress would be the due administration of justice, as much as the most summary and peremptory; and changing the course of the court from one method of remedy to the other, both in the end being the same, would not be obstructing or impeding justice.

If it be conceded that the due administration of justice in behalf of a party who obtains judgment or decree for damages requires that those damages should be satisfied to him, such administration is not necessarily obstructed or impeded because the party fails obtaining the satisfaction in one mode, if it be equally secure to him in another; and it would therefore be necessary in the indictment in this case to charge that, by means of the wrongful removal of the vessel, the libellant was deprived of all remedy for his demand, because if thereby the marshal has become responsible to him for his damages, or he can have direct satisfaction by decree against the respondent, the administration of justice in his behalf is in no way defeated or obstructed by depriving him of recourse against the vessel. The offence is not put upon this ground by the indictment. The subject is susceptible of much more extended illustration, but the discussion has been sufficiently minute to indicate the opinion of the court, that the facts set forth upon this indictment do not constitute a criminal offence, within the meaning of the second section of the act of March 2, 1831, and judgment is therefore pronounced in favor of the demurrer and against the indictment.

Case No. 16,249.

UNITED STATES v. SEGARS.

[16 Leg. Int. 388;[1] 3 Phila. 517.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. 1859.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURES—EFFECT OF SEIZURE—INCREASE OF PENALTIES—DELIVERY BOND—PENAL SUM—RECEIPTS.

1. Upon information filed against goods alleged to be forfeited under the revenue collection act of 1799 [1 Stat. 627], and its supplements, the goods pass out of the hands of the collector who seizes them into the hands of the marshal, whose custody is thenceforth that of the court.

2. No penal increase of duties can afterwards be exacted by the collector from a claimant of the goods, though such a penalty might lawfully have been imposed before the goods were seized as forfeited.

3. If such a penal increase has been received by the collector before the seizure, the goods, though they would otherwise have been liable to forfeiture, are exempt from such liability.

4. His exaction of such an increase after information filed, though an illegal act on his part, does not affect the prosecution against the goods.

5. Under proceedings upon a petition of the claimant for the delivery to him of the goods on his giving a bond, with surety, for their appraised value, he is to pay no greater amount of duties than would have been demandable of him if the fairness of the importation had not been impeached.

[Cited in note to U. S. v. Twelve Thousand Three Hundred and Forty-Seven Bags of Sugar, Case No. 16,555.]

6. If the goods are afterwards condemned, he loses the amount of the regular duties thus assessed, as well as the value of the goods forfeited.

[Disapproved in Four Cases of Silk Ribbons, Case No. 4,986. Cited in note to U. S. v. Twelve Thousand Three Hundred and Forty-Seven Bags of Sugar, Id. 16,555.]

7. The bond, in such a case, is a substitute for the proceeds of the goods which, if it had not been given, would have been sold by the marshal.

8. It must, therefore, be given for the market value of the goods at the place of seizure, without any deduction for the regular amount of duties which are thus payable at all events.

[Disapproved in Four Cases of Silk Ribbons, Case No. 4,986.]

9. If, under such a proceeding, the collector and naval officer should refuse to give a receipt, conformably to the act of 1799, for the regular amount of duties, and require the payment of a penal excess, the court will order the delivery of the goods to the claimant upon the execution of the bond, and payment of the proper amount of duties.

10. Where payment of such an excess had been exacted unlawfully by the refusal of such a receipt, and had been made under protest, the goods having been afterwards condemned, and the amount of the bond paid into court, the excess was, by the court's order, repaid to the claimant out of the fund in court.

11. A case in which such a payment has been thus made after information filed, and in the course of a proceeding under the direction and control of the court is not within the statutes and rules of decision applicable to other cases of duties paid under protest.

Upon a petition of the claimants [Mayoz and others], praying that the segars might be appraised, and delivered to them upon their executing a bond with surety for the amount of the appraisement, a question arose whether the amount of the duties upon the segars was to be deducted by the appraisers from the market value, and the difference to be returned as their valuation, or their appraisement at the market value was to be returned without any such deduction.

CADWALADER, District Judge. The 89th section of the revenue collection act of 1799 provides that when vessels or goods have been seized and prosecuted as forfeited, the court may, upon the prayer of a claimant that they be delivered to him, appoint three sworn appraisers, on the return of whose valuation, if the claimant shall, with one or more approved sureties, execute a bond for the amount of the appraisement, and produce a certificate of the collector and naval officer that the duties have been paid or secured in like manner as if the vessel or goods "had been legally entered" the court shall order the same to be delivered to such claimant. The section provides that the bond shall remain in court, and, upon judgment in favor of the claimant, shall be cancelled, but that if the judgment shall be in whole, or in part, against him, and he shall not, within twenty days thereafter, pay into court the amount of the appraised value of the vessel or goods condemned, with costs, judgment upon the bond may, forthwith, be entered upon motion in court. The 90th and 91st sections enact that vessels and goods condemned for which bond shall not have been given as above shall be sold, under the court's order, by the marshal, and the proceeds, after deducting all proper costs and charges, paid, one moiety to the United States and the other moiety to designated officers of the revenue collection service, with distinct provisions for cases in which there is an informer. The 36th section of this act required the production to the collector and naval officer of the original invoices of the goods imported. The 66th section enacted that if any such goods should be falsely invoiced as to their cost, with design to evade the duties, or any part thereof; the goods, or their value to be recovered of the person making entry, should be forfeited, and that where the collector should suspect the goods to be invoiced below their market value at the place of exportation, he should take possession of them and retain them until their value should be ascertained by appraisement in a prescribed mode, and the duties, according to such valuation, paid, or secured in the manner therein required. The latter provision of the 66th section explains the clause in the 89th section which provides that in a case like the present the amount of duties to be paid by the claimant is the sum that would have been payable if the property seized had been legally entered. These, which may be called regular duties, are, in the case of goods alleged to be falsely invoiced, the duties which would have been assessed if the fairness of the invoice had not been impeached. Had the 89th section contained no such definition of their amount for a case like the present, the collector and naval officer, instead of assessing, in such a case, the amount of duties that would have been payable according to the invoice, might, as in the case of a suspected invoice, have exacted from the party giving bond the payment of the duty assessed upon a higher valuation. This the 89th section prevents. The present question, however, concerns the regular duties only. The question is whether the amount of these duties, which is to be paid by the claimant at all events, is to be deducted by the appraisers in their ascertainment of the value for which he is to give the bond. The question, in other words, is, whether, if judgment of condemnation be rendered, he is to lose the amount of these duties as well as the value of the property forfeited.

A series of subsequent laws has established a system of appraisement under which all subjects of ad valorem duty are valued by sworn public officers. These laws have imposed, in certain cases, a penal increase of the duties upon important merchandize invoiced at a designated rate below the proper valuation. It is also indictable as a misdemeanor to make out, or pass, or attempt to pass, any false, forged or fraudulent invoice through the custom house. In [Wood v. U. S.] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342, [Taylor v. U. S.] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 197, and [U. S. v. Sixty-Seven Packages of Dry Goods] 17 How. [58 U. S.] 86, the supreme court has decided that these enactments have not impliedly repealed the provision in the 66th section of the act of 1799, that where imported goods are falsely invoiced with a design to evade the payment of any part of the duties, the goods or their value are liable to forfeiture. In the last of these cases the court say that if the additional duty of twenty per cent. imposed when the appraised value exceeds the invoice price by ten per cent. has been levied upon the goods by the government, it cannot forfeit them under the 66th section of the act of 1799, but if the collector is satisfied that such an undervaluation in the invoice has been made with intent to evade the duties, then, instead of levying the additional duty, a forfeiture may be declared. The court added that a forfeiture may be declared in cases of undervaluation of less than ten per cent. of the invoice price where the fraudulent design exists. [U. S. v. Sixty-Seven Packages of Dry Goods] 17 How. [58 U. S.] 93, 94. If the court had been of opinion that no duties whatever could be levied upon forfeited goods, they would not have made this remark distinctively as to the additional duty alone. The distinction between the additional and the regular duty was recognized conversely in Stairs v. Peaslee, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 529, in certain remarks of the court upon the case of Bartlett v. Kane, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 263. In this case goods entered at the invoice price had been found by the appraisers to be invoiced ten per cent. below the dutiable value. The penal duty of twenty per cent. had therefore been exacted. A portion of the goods were warehoused, and afterwards entered for exportation. On these goods the regular duty was returnable to the importer. But the court was of opinion that the collector could retain the penal duty upon them, which had been levied. The reason of the distinction had been partially indicated in the previous case of McLane v. U. S., 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 404, 427. There prohibited goods, which could not regularly have become dutiable, were the subject of consideration. The supreme court said that "no duties, as such, can legally accrue upon the importation of prohibited goods," assigning as the reason that "they are not entitled to entry at the custom house." This language implies that the contrary should be the rule as to such forfeited goods as have been or ought to have been entered at the custom house. The liability of the importer for the duties upon goods of the latter class depends upon a personal contract implied in his act of importation. But the implication of such a contract cannot be extended to a penal addition to the duty. It may, for some purposes, be extended so as to include such a simple addition to the invoiced value as the appraisers may make without a penal increase of its amount. But this is not the rule for the purposes of the 89th section of the act of 1799, under which the proper assessment of the duties is upon the invoice as if it were fair and unimpeached. This rule could not here be departed from without prejudging, more or less, the question for ultimate adjudication. A case in which a forfeiture is insisted upon should not be thus prejudged in any degree in a preliminary stage of the proceedings.

The existence and character of the distinction between the additional and the regular duty having been thus ascertained, we may now consider some authorities which bear less indirectly upon the question whether an importer of dutiable goods is liable, personally, for the duties upon them when they are forfeited. Hereafter the word "duties" will be understood as designating what have hitherto been called "regular duties."

Salter v. Malapert, 1 Rolle, 383, was an action of debt for the recovery by farmers of the customs of a statutory duty of twelve pence in the pound for goods imported by foreign merchants and unladen without payment of the duty. The farmers had received the grant of the customs, but not of the forfeitures. These the king had reserved. The importers had compounded for the forfeiture with the king, and pleaded this in bar of a suit against them by the farmers for the duty. The plaintiffs demurred to the plea. Judgment was given for the plaintiffs. The reason of the judgment, as delivered by Chief Baron Tanfield, was that the duty of a shilling in the pound became a debt upon the bringing of the goods into port, when the plaintiffs acquired a vested right of action. Upon the authority of this decision Chief Baron Comyns (Dig. tit. "Dett.," art. 9), under the head of "debt upon contract implied" states the law to be that debt lies for customs due for merchandize, though the goods are forfeited for nonpayment.

In Swinerton v. Wolstonholme, reported by Sir M. Hale in his Treatise on the Customs (Harg. Law Tracts, 214), the reason upon which the above decision is founded was reconsidered. A majority of the barons of the exchequer were of opinion that the "duties grow due by the unlading." The opinion afterwards entertained in England by the crown lawyers appears to have been that the voluntary bringing of goods within the limits of a port of entry with intent that they shall be unladen renders them liable to duty. Reeves. Shipp. 260, 261. In Meredith v. U. S., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 493–496, this rule was recognized as having been established in [U. S. v. Vowell] 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 368, and [Arnold v. U. S.] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 104. The court said that, in a fiscal sense, the right of the government to duties upon goods accrues on their arrival at a port of entry, that, under the credit system then in force, the duty was not extinguished by taking a bond which either did not cover the whole sum due, or was not executed by all the parties liable, and that the amount justly due might be recovered in an action of debt, although no such bond as was then required by law had been given, and might be thus recovered independently of any official or other assessment of the duties. The court said, "An action of debt lies against the importer for the duties whenever by accident, mistake or fraud no duties or short duties have been paid." See, also U. S. v. Lyman [Case No. 15,647.]

In Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 362, and Taylor v. U. S., 3 How. [44 U. S.] 197, goods imported at New York, after having been passed, in regular form, through the custom house there, had been seized in the one case at Philadelphia, in the other case at Baltimore, in the hands of agents of the respective importers. The goods, in each case, were condemned as forfeited for fraudulent undervaluation in the invoices upon which they had been entered. These cases decide that the payment by the importer to the United States of the full amount of duties assessed by the collector and naval officer upon goods passed by the appraisers of the customs at the invoiced value; and delivered under a formal permit, is no bar to such a subsequent proceeding to forfeit the goods. The success of the fraud by which the officers of the customs had been deceived, was, of course, no justification. The importers, in these cases, lost the goods as well as the amount of the duties which had previously been paid. The 66th section of the act of 1799, under which the goods were condemned, imposes, in the alternative, as we have seen, a forfeiture, either of the goods, or of their value to be recovered of the importer. If those goods, instead of being still in the hands of the importers, or of their own agents, had been previously sold in the market, the pecuniary value could, therefore, have been recovered from the respective importers in actions of debt at the suit of the United States. See Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366. The amount of the duties previously paid could not then have been set off as a deduction from the full value which would have been recoverable.

The circumstance that the duties have not been paid when the proceeding to forfeit the goods is instituted is, in reason, attended with no difference in favor of the importer. If the proceeding is groundless, the goods are to be restored to him, but the regular duties are to be paid. If the goods are condemned, he loses them, but this does not exempt him from liability for the duties. In [Meredith v. U. S.] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 493, the supreme court cited with approbation, a decision of the English court of exchequer (Anstr. 558), that where a dutiable article was lost or destroyed by a casualty before it became available to the party personally liable for the duty, his liability nevertheless continued. If the loss of the property by misfortune does not exempt him, his loss of it from his own fraud should not cause an exemption. In the present case, if the goods are not bonded, a personal action for the duties will be maintainable against the importer. He could not plead in bar of it that the goods are the subject of a pending prosecution for an alleged forfeiture. He could not have avoided this liability by omitting to claim the goods. He cannot escape from it by withdrawing his claim, or by confessing the forfeiture of the goods or otherwise abandoning them to the United States. The liability for the duties as a debt may thus be enforced as well before as after their condemnation. If the goods are to be delivered to him upon substituting the proposed bond for them, it should be a substitute for their full value, not for the value less the amount of the duties which are, at all events, to be paid. The bond stands in the place of the property which, in case of condemnation, would, if no bond had been given, have been sold by the marshal. Under such a sale by the marshal, the whole proceeds must be paid into the court, if any question as to their distribution is to be determined. It may be said that as there was a lien for the duties, they must, if not previously paid, be discharged out of the proceeds when they are thus paid into court. It is true that such a lien exists, and that it may, in case of the importer's insolvency, be the only available security to the United States for the duties. But the existence of such an additional security for them cannot alter the rule of law that the importer of goods which are forfeited or forfeitable is personally liable for the duties.

In Hoyt v. U. S., 10 How. [51 U. S.] 137, goods had under a petition like the present been appraised, and a bond given for the appraised value. They were afterwards condemned whereupon the amount of the bond was paid into court. The collector, naval officer and surveyor were entitled to, and received, one-half of this amount, and the United States the other moiety. The collector, suggesting on behalf of himself and his brother officers, that the amount of the duties on the goods had been deducted from the valuation before the return of the appraisement, and that the sum paid into court was therefore less by that amount than the full value of the forfeited goods, insisted that the duties were a part of the forfeiture, and that their amount should be divided by the United States with the officers. In support of the position thus assumed, it was contended that no duties are demandable upon forfeited goods. The opinion of the court contains an abstract of the relevant provisions of the 89th, 90th, and 91st sections of the act of 1799. The decision was, that when the claimant elects, under their provisions, to give a bond and pay the duties, with a view to the delivery of the vessel or goods to him, "the duties thus paid constitute no part of the proceeds of the goods forfeited." The court in arriving at this conclusion, remarked incidentally that if the vessel or goods are condemned, the claimant "loses as well the duties paid or secured, as the property seized and condemned." This would not be the case if the amount of duties had been deducted by the appraisers from their valuation, before its return to the court. The case might have been adjudged without a decision of this question. But the simplest mode of adjudication was to decide the question; and this mode was adopted. The question, therefore, cannot be considered as an open one. Consequently these goods are to be appraised at their market value here, from which there should be no deduction before the return of the appraisement. If the authorities had not furnished a reason and rule of interpretation of the 89th section of the act of 1799, which seem to be decisive of the question, the words of the section could scarcely have been strained so as to warrant any deduction whatever by the appraisers, from the market value.

Case No. 16,249a.

UNITED STATES ex rel. JONES v. SELDON.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1859.

MANDAMUS TO MARSHAL—WITNESS FEES.

A writ of mandamus will be refused to command the marshal of the District of Columbia to pay the petitioner, an attorney of this court, witness fees. Especially will it be the case when the judge of the criminal court decides the petitioner is not entitled to the same.

[This was a petition by Charles L. Jones for a writ of mandamus to be directed to William Seldon, marshal of the District of Columbia.]

Petitioner in person.

Respondent in person.

The petition in substance says: That he was duly summoned as a witness for the United States in the criminal court of the District of Columbia. That he attended as such witness for nine days. That he exhibited to the marshal of the District of Columbia a certificate of the clerk of the said court proving such attendance. That the said marshal has received from the treasury of the United States a sum of money for the payment of the fees allowed to witnesses and persons attending the said term of said court, and has money in his hands applicable to the payment of his demands, but he, the marshal, says that he is advised that your petitioner is not entitled to receive the fees because he was, during the time of his attendance, a member of the bar of said court, and for this reason alone refuses to pay said fees. Wherefore, and for as much as the said marshal is a mere ministerial officer, and the duty of paying is purely a ministerial act, and as your petitioner has no other remedy, prays the court to grant the United States writ of mandamus, &c., commanding him to pay to him according to law the full amount of his demand, &c.

The answer of the respondent: That he is the marshal, and that proper and sufficient funds have been placed in his hands to defray the necessary and proper expenses of criminal justice here. He admits that the petitioner attended as a witness in the trial of Daniel E. Sickles. He refused to make payment, not upon his own judgment, but upon that of the Hon. W. Hartley Crawford, sole judge of the criminal court in which the witness attended. Whether the opinion of the learned judge against the legality of the petitioner's demand was founded wholly or in part upon the law of congress of 1856 (11 Stat. 50) this respondent cannot say; but believes, and therefore states, that his honor drew a distinction between attorneys who had become nominal practitioners and seldom in court and lawyers like the petitioner, who regularly attend the bar; deeming it proper to allow witness fees to the former, on the ground that they were taken from their pursuits, and ought to be paid for the value of their time; but to refuse fees to the latter, who would be in court whether brought there by summons or not. The learned judge placed the regular attendant at the bar upon the footing of public officers, who were, he stated, no better entitled to witness fees than the clerk, the marshal or the bailiffs, none of whom could receive such fees.

Whether the distinction taken by the learned judge be correct or not, it was not the province of this respondent to doubt, since he is himself but a ministerial servant of the court and in duty bound to respect the judges. In cases like the present there is an obvious necessity to conform to the construction which the judge places upon the disbursement of public money in the marshal's hands; for the judge under the laws is required to examine each item of account which the marshal renders and without the approval of his honor, the accounting officers of the treasury will allow the marshal no credit whatever. Now the petitioner is a gentleman of learning and liberality, and cannot expect the marshal to make payment and present vouchers for which he can obtain no credit at the treasury, and therefore without the intervention of a superior power, policy and duty require this respondent to acquiesce in the declared judgment of the learned judge. Having made answer, the respondent submits the matter to the honorable judges, and will respect any decision which they shall think proper to render.

Motion for mandamus refused.

Case No. 16,250.

UNITED STATES v. SEMPLE.

[Hoff. Dec. 14.]

District Court, N. D. California. Sept. 1, 1860.

CALIFORNIA LAND CLAIMS — PROCEEDING TO CONTEST OR REFORM SURVEY—INTERLOCUTORY AND FINAL DECREES.

[1. The act of June 14, 1860 (12 Stat. 33), relating to the settlement of private land claims in California, declares that all cases in which proceedings "are pending" for the purpose of contesting or reforming surveys made and approved by the surveyor general "are made subject to this act." Held, that a case in which an order had been entered rejecting the original survey, and giving directions for a new and reformed survey, was still "pending," so as to be subject to the act: for such an order is merely interlocutory.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The counsel for the claimant [C. D. Semple] in this moves for an order approving a survey made by the surveyor in pursuance of an order heretofore entered, rejecting the original survey, and giving directions for a new and reformed survey to be made. Before proceeding to inquire whether the last survey is in conformity with the directions heretofore given, a preliminary question must be determined.

By the recent act of congress (June 14, 1860), "all cases in which proceedings are pending for the purpose of contesting or reforming surveys made and approved by the surveyor-general, are made subject to the provisions of the act." If, then, in this case, such proceedings are pending, the provisions of the act must be applied to it. To determine whether proceedings are pending within the meaning of the act, the nature of the order or decree heretofore made must be considered. If that decree be a final decree, the case can no longer be said to be pending, and vice versa. It is obvious that, in a large majority of cases, no decree by which one survey is rejected, and another directed to be made, can be deemed a final decree. The directions contained in such a decree must usually be general, and rather determine the principles on which the new survey is made than fix the precise location of the lines. In carrying into effect such directions, new questions, not discussed or considered, may arise, for the previous discussions will naturally have turned rather on the correctness of the original survey, than on the precise location of the new lines directed to be run. In all such cases it is clear that no decree can be deemed final which has not adopted and approved some survey and plat, fixing with precision every line of the land.

It is argued that only one decree is spoken of in the act, viz. the decree determining the true location of the land, and that the order approving such location, when afterwards made, is merely a decretal order, entered after final decree. But from what has been said, it is apparent that in many cases most important questions may arise, upon which testimony must be taken and argument heard, before the court can finally determine to approve and adopt the survey made under its first order. While such questions remain open and undetermined, the decree cannot be said to be final. It may be true, therefore, that the act speaks of only one decree; but if so, it is the decree by which some survey, previously made, is adopted and approved, not the interlocutory order by which a survey is rejected, and directions for the making of another survey given. The language of the act confirms this view. The fifth section provides that "the said plat and survey, so finally determined by publication, order or decree, as the case may be, shall have the same effect, and validity in law as if a patent for the land so surveyed had been issued by the United States." It is obvious that the effect and validity of a patent is here attributed, not to the decree which determines how the survey should be made, but to the plat and survey finally determined by decree or otherwise; clearly showing that a plot and survey must be before the court, and finally passed upon by it, before the provisions of the act can apply. That a decree adopting and approving some survey before the court was, previously to the passage of the act, alone considered by the supreme court as a final decree, is evident from the case of U. S. v. Fossett [21 How. (62 U. S.) 445]. In that case, this court had given directions in its decree for the location of the land, and had determined every question relative to the location referred to it by the supreme court, or raised by the parties. But the supreme court refused to entertain the appeal, because no survey had been made and adopted by the court. The act of 1860 was not intended to repeal the existing law on this subject, but to define and regulate the jurisdiction already possessed by this court. The decision of the supreme court is therefore an express authority as to the nature and essential elements of a final decree of this court on the location of a land claim.

It is objected that the publication, as required by the third section, cannot be made in this case, and, therefore, that that provision does not apply. This is admitted; for it is obviously too late to make a publication "before any testimony shall be taken," as that section requires. But the important provisions of the act relative to the admission of parties to the suit—the effect of the decree of this court, and the time within which an appeal may be taken, are still susceptible of easy application to this case, and must be deemed to apply to it if it be a pending case, unless the provision of the sixth section, by which pending cases are made subject to the provisions of the act, is wholly nugatory. An advertisement for all parties to intervene can therefore be made in analogy to the advertisement required to be made in cases initiated under the act, and mutatis mutandis to suit the difference between the cases. Again, if this be not a pending case, none of the provisions of the act of 1860 can apply to it. The right of appeal must then exist, if at all, under the provisions of the act of 1851 [9 Stat. 631]. But the appeal heretofore taken from the decree of this court, confirming the claim, has been dismissed by consent. It may thus admit of doubt, whether any appeal from the order or decree of this court, determining how the location shall be made, can be taken. For this cause has not been like the cases decided by the supreme court, remanded to this court for further proceedings. If, however, an appeal will lie, it may be taken at any time during five years. The practical effect, therefore, of withdrawing this cause from the operation of the act of 1860, is so inconvenient, that it affords an argument against adopting any view of the case which would involve such a result.

The cause is in other respects peculiarly within the class with regard to which congress intended to make new provisions and afford new remedies. In passing the act of 1860, congress has in view three great objects: (1) to fix and define the jurisdiction of this court over surveys—by authorizing it within a period strictly limited, to order them before it. (2) To permit all persons, whose interests were involved, to intervene in the proceedings. (3) To limit the time within which appeals were to be taken. These important remedial provisions were, by the act, extended to all cases pending in this court.

In the case at bar it appears that the land, as located by this court, is wholly embraced within the survey and location of an adjoining rancho. The survey of that rancho has been ordered into court, and is now a pending case. The claimant in the present case will have the right, which he will, no doubt, exercise, to intervene in that proceeding. But his adversary has not had, nor if this case be held not to be a pending case, will he ever have, an opportunity to intervene in this cause, for the protection of his interest. The court might thus in this cause, where only one side has been heard, arrive at a conclusion wholly irreconcilable with that which it would reach in the subsequent case, where all parties would be heard, and testimony on both sides be taken. It thus appears that this case is one to which the provisions of the act of 1860 should, if it be possible, be applied. As the act of 1860 prescribes a short period within which appeals may be taken, it is important that no doubt should exist as to the time when the final decree of this court is entered, for from the date of its entry the six months within which the appeal may be taken requires to run. If the decree by which a plat and survey actually before the court is adopted and approved be considered the final decree, a clear and uniform rule is prescribed, admitting of no misapprehension. But if the decree determining the mode in which the survey is to be made be considered final or interlocutory, according as the directions contained in it are more or less precise, the date from which the six months are to begin to run will be left open to doubt and dispute.

Various other considerations might be suggested. Enough has been said to show that on principle, as well as on grounds of convenience, no decree of this court with respect to the location of a land claim should be held to be a final decree which does not approve and adopt a plat and survey previously made, and actually before it. All cases, therefore, in which no such decree has been made, are to be regarded as pending cases, and subject to the provisions of the act of 1860.

The motion for a decree approving the survey made under the previous decree of this court in this case is denied, and the cause must be proceeded in subject to the provisions of the act of 1860. A special order will be entered, directing the proper monition to issue, admonishing all parties to intervene for their interest; and the cause must be further prosecuted in conformity with the rules adopted by the court in this class of cases

STEAM VESSELS—INSPECTION OF HULLS AND BOILERS—INTERNAL COMMERCE OF STATE.

A steamboat employed in transporting passengers between ports in the same state is not liable to a penalty for not having the hull and boilers inspected under the act of congress of August 30, 1852 [10 Stat. 61], and the district court has no jurisdiction.

In admiralty.

J. B. D. Cogswell, U. S. Dist. Atty.

W. P. Lynde, for respondent.

MILLER, District Judge. It is propounded in the information, that at the port of Superior on Lake Superior, in this district, the collector of customs for the collection district of Michillmackinac, did seize said steamboat, and now holds her in his custody within the district, as forfeited to the United States for carrying and transporting goods and passengers betwen the ports of Superior and Bayfield, on Lake Superior, within this state, without license, and the inspection of her hull and boilers, required by the act of congress of July 7, 1838 (5 Stat. 304), and August 30, 1852, and in violation of those acts. By the information, this steamboat was employed exclusively in transporting passengers and property, between the ports mentioned in the information, which are located on Lake Superior, and within the state of Wisconsin. It is well settled that the constitutional power of congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states," does not embrace the purely internal commerce of a state. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1; Brooks v. The Peytona [Case No. 1,959]; Whitaker v. The Fred Lorents [Id. 17,527]; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344; Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 244.

The act of congress of July, 1838, provides, that it shall not be lawful for the owner, master or captain of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, to transport goods, etc., or passengers in or upon the bays, lakes, rivers or other navigable waters of the United States, without having first obtained from the proper officer a license under existing laws and without the inspection required, under a penalty of five hundred dollars for each violation of the act. And the act of August, 1852, continues this penalty for transporting or carrying passengers, without inspection. The terms of the act embrace the legal employment of this steamboat; but the act must be construed according to the constitutional provision as expounded by judicial authority. The steamboat was employed between places within this state. The contract of affreightment with the steamboat Fashion, in Allen v. Newberry, was for the transportation of leather on Lake Michigan, between ports in this state. The contract with the steamboat Lorents was for a passage on the Mississippi river, between ports in this state. The license required by the act is for carrying on the coasting trade, and the inspection is for the security of the lives of passengers on board of steam vessels. It is evidently an act for the regulation of commerce under the constitution. From the decisions referred to, it is apparent that this court of admiralty would not have jurisdiction of this steamboat, while engaged as propounded in the information. And it appears very plain that jurisdiction cannot be maintained of this information, for the reason that the steamboat is not alleged to be employed in the foreign or coasting trade, but was running between ports and places within the state of Wisconsin; and she was exclusively within and subject to state regulations and control. The district court for the state of Missouri, in U. S. v. The James Morrison [Case No. 15,465]; and U. S. v. The William Pope [Id. 16,703], hold the same opinion.

The information will be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

UNITED STATES v. SEVELOFF.

District Court, D. Oregon. Dec. 10, 1872.

"INDIAN COUNTRY" DEFINED—INTERCOURSE LAWS—SALE OF SPIRITS IN ALASKA—REVENUE LAWS—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT OF OREGON.

1. The "Indian country," within the meaning of the act declaring it a crime to introduce spirituous liquors therein, is only that portion of the United States which has been declared to be such by act of congress; and a country which is owned or inhabited by Indians in whole or in part is not, therefore, a part of the "Indian country."

2. The act of June 30, 1834 (4 Stat. 729), defining the limits of the "Indian country," and regulating the trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes therein, is a local act, and was therefore not extended propria vigore over the territory of Alaska, upon its cession to the United States.

[Cited in Waters v. Campbell, Case No. 17,264; U. S. v. Williams, 2 Fed. 62; U. S. v. Bridleman, 7 Fed. 896; Kie v. U. S., 27 Fed. 352.]

3. The act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 240), extending the laws "relating to customs, commerce, and navigation," over Alaska, construed not to extend the Indian intercourse act of 1834 (supra) over that territory, although the latter is a regulation of commerce "with the Indian tribes."

[Cited in U. S. v. Leathers, Case No. 15,581; U. S. v. Stephens, 12 Fed. 53.]

4. Section 20 of the act of 1834, supra, as amended by act of March 15, 1864 (13 Stat. 29), making the disposing of spirituous liquors to Indians a crime, is in this respect a general act, and prima facie applies wherever the subject-matter exists—an Indian under the charge of an agent appointed by the United States; but Alaska being acquired by the United States after the enactment of such amendment, it is doubtful whether it was extended over that territory propria vigore, upon its acquisition; and the act of July 27, 1868, supra, having provided for the subject of the introduction and use of distilled spirits in Alaska, by implication, congress thereby excluded such amendment therefrom.

5. The act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 125), imposing a tax on distilled spirits, being a general act, and passed since the acquisition of Alaska, is in force there.

6. The jurisdiction of the district court for the district of Oregon over offenses committed in Alaska is conferred by section 7 of the act of July 27, 1868, supra, and by such section confined to violations of that act and the laws "relating to customs, commerce, and navigation," and therefore it has no jurisdiction over the crime of distilling spirits therein without paying a tax therefor.

[These were indictments against Ferueta Seveloff for unlawfully introducing liquors into the Indian country; and for being a distiller without paying the required tax. On demurrers to the indictments.]

Addison C. Gibbs, for plaintiff.

H. H. Northrup, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. These indictments were found by the grand jury of this district on November 11. The defendant was then in custody, upon a commitment issued by the United States commissioner, he having been before that time arrested in Alaska and brought to this district by "the military force of the United States," under section 23 of the Indian intercourse act of June 30, 1834 (4 Stat. 733).

The first indictment substantially alleges that the defendant, in the district of Oregon, and within the jurisdiction of this court, on June 8, 1872, did unlawfully introduce spirituous liquors, to wit, whisky, "into the Indian country, to wit, the island of Sitka, Alaska, United States of America."

The second one alleges that the defendant, of Sitka, Alaska, in the United States of America, and within the jurisdiction of this court, "on June 9, 1872, and prior thereto, without having paid the tax therefor, did presume to be and was a distiller of spirituous liquor, producing one hundred barrels or less of distilled spirits annually."

The third one alleges as the second one, that the defendant is of Sitka, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and that he, on June 8, 1872, at Sitka aforesaid, did dispose of spirituous liquors, to wit: whisky, to one John Doe, an Indian, whose name is unknown, and who resides at the Sitka Indian agency, and was, and is under the charge of one Major Harvey A. Allen, an Indian agent, appointed by the United States, and in charge of said agency, and commanding the military post at that place.

The defendant demurs to the indictments, and assigns for cause of demurrer to each of them: (1) That it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) That this court has not jurisdiction of the action.

The demurrers were argued and submitted together, on November 29. On the argument the points made in support of the demands, were: (1) The territory of Alaska, whether inhabited or owned by Indians or not, is not, in a legal sense, a part of the "Indian country," because not made so by act of congress. (2) That this court has no jurisdiction over crimes committed in the territory of Alaska, except in pursuance of section one of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 240), and that the jurisdiction thereby conferred is limited to violations of that act and the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce and navigation, then and thereby extended over Alaska.

The district attorney maintained that Alaska is a part of the Indian country, because it is inhabited by Indians, and because the act defining the Indian country, and regulating trade and intercourse with Indians, and all other acts of congress not locally inapplicable, were extended over the country, proprio vigore, as soon as it was acquired from Russia.

"The Indian country," within the meaning of the statute, making it a crime to introduce spirituous liquors therein, is only that portion of the United States or its territories, which has been declared to be such by an act of congress. Because a country is inhabited or owned in whole or in part by Indians, it is not therefore an Indian country, within the purview of the trade and intercourse acts.

This is plain upon the reason of the thing, and has long since been settled by the highest authority. The act of June 30, 1834 (4 Stat. 729), defining "the Indian country," is as much a local act as the donation act of Oregon, or the penal code of the District of Columbia. By its terms, "the Indian country" was limited to "that part of the United States west of the Mississippi, and not within the states of Missouri or Louisiana, or the territory of Alaska, and, also, that part of the United States east of the Mississippi river, and not within any state, to which the Indian title has not been extinguished."

At an early day, a question arose as to whether the territory of Oregon was at the date of the act, 1834, "a part of the United States west of the Mississippi," and therefore within the limits of "the Indian country," as defined thereby. Congress assuming that it was not provided by the act of June 5, 1850 (9 Stat. 437): That the law regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes east of the Rocky Mountains, or such provisions of the same as may be applicable, be extended over the Indian tribes in the territory of Oregon.

In 1853, the supreme court of the territory of Oregon in U. S. v. Tom, 1 Or. 27, held that the act of 1834 was not in force to the westward of the Rocky Mountains, until specially extended over the territory of Oregon, by the act of June 5, 1850, (supra.) In delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Williams says: "Great Britain and the United States made a treaty in 1818, by which the northern boundary of the latter was extended west on the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, to the Stony Mountains; and the territory beyond this was described as country to be held in the joint occupancy of the two powers. The Rocky Mountains were then the western boundary of the United States for legislative purposes, and so continued until 1846. The act of 1834 shows in terms, that it was intended for a country over which the general government had absolute and exclusive jurisdiction. Congress, by express enactment in 1850, extended said act to this territory, for the reason, as must be supposed, that it was not in force before that time. The act of 1834 then has no vitality here, because Oregon is Indian country, but by virtue of the act of 1850, which gives it effect here, so far as its provisions may be applicable." Olney, J., in the same case, speaking of the act of 1834, says: "It was a local statute, and was no more extended by the last clause of our organic act" (9 Stat. 329) "than were the local laws of the District of Columbia." McFadden, J., says: "I concur in opinion that whatever vitality the act of 1834, entitled, etc., may have in this territory, is derivable from the act of congress of June, 1850, which extends the act of 1834, or so much of it as may be applicable to the situation of affairs in the territory of Oregon."

Contrary to this, there is an "opinion" by Attorney-General Cushing, 7 Ops. Attys. Gen. 295, to the effect that Oregon was a part of "the Indian country," because at the date of such opinion, 1855, it was "a part of the United States west of the Mississippi." But this process of reasoning ignores the real inquiry, whether Oregon was such "a part of the United States," at the passage of the act, 1834, defining the Indian country, and within the real purview and intent of such act; and if it was not, being a local act, how and when did it become extended over Oregon, without and prior to the act of congress of June 5, 1850? The opinion also asserts that "the Indian country" in the acts of congress is not limited by any specific boundaries, but includes generally all "such portions of the acquired territory of the United States, as are in the actual occupation of the Indian tribes," while the Indian title thereto is unextinguished. In this conclusion, the "opinion" is in direct conflict with the decision of the supreme court in American Fur Co. v. U. S., 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 358, where it was held, in an action to forfeit an Indian trader's goods, for taking whisky into "the Indian country" for the purpose of disposing of "the same among the Indian tribes," that a country purchased from the Indians subsequent to the act of March 30, 1802 (2 Stat. 139), and therefore no longer within the specific limits of "the Indian country" as defined by section 1 of said act, was not such country within the meaning of the trade and intercourse act, although it was then frequented and inhabited exclusively by Indian tribes. The fact that the Indian title to the country in question had been extinguished, subsequent to March 30, 1802, was only material to the decision, because the act of that date defining the boundary line between the said Indian tribes and the United States, expressly provided that if said line should thereafter be varied by treaty, then the provisions of such act should "be construed to apply to the line so varied," as if it were the original one. Therefore, it appears that the court held that the treaty of purchase of the lands wherein the supposed offense was committed, changed the line between the tribes and the United States, so as to exclude the lands so purchased from the limits of the Indian country.

But the act of 1834, supra, defines the Indian country absolutely by metes and bounds, and no subsequent purchase of lands within these limits would of itself operate to take them out of the category of Indian country, or except them from the laws regulating trade and intercourse with Indians who might be found thereon. Nor can the act of 1834 be held to have extended itself or migrated over Alaska upon its cession by Russia to the United States; for although such act by its terms applied to a large tract of country, and it were even uncertain whether its western boundary stopped at the Rocky Mountains or extended to the Pacific Ocean, still it was purely a local law, and contained no provision by which it should in the future be extended in any direction—as to California or Alaska—upon the contingency of their acquisition by the United States.

Did the act of 1868, supra, extend the act of 1834, supra, over Alaska? By section 1 of that act "the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce and navigation" were extended over that country, and this language, taken unqualifiedly, is broad enough to carry with it the laws regulating "trade and intercourse" with the Indian tribes in Alaska.

The power to regulate commerce is conferred upon the national government by the constitution (article 1, § 8), in the same language, and upon the same terms in the case of "foreign nations," the "several states," and the "Indian tribes." It is under this clause that congress exercises the power to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, as well without as within the Indian country. U. S. v. Cisna [Case No. 14,795]; U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 416. In the leading case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 189, Chief Justice Marshall says: "Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse."

Unless, then, there is something in the circumstances of the case or in the act, from which it appears that congress did not intend to use the phrase, "laws relating to commerce," in an unqualified sense, it follows that the act of 1834 is in force in Alaska, as a regulation of commerce with the Indian tribes therein.

Considering that the laws regulating what is deemed commerce with the Indian tribes are generally confined to intercourse with them, and are mostly of a local character, and intended as a restriction upon commerce in the popular sense of the word, rather than otherwise—as a sort of police regulation to preserve the Indians from the injurious consequences of unrestricted intercourse with the white population, it does not appear probable that congress intended to extend any laws over Alaska, relating to commerce, except those relating to commerce "between foreign nations and the several states."

But in addition to this consideration, it appears that the whole subject of the introduction and use of distilled spirits in relation to all the inhabitants of Alaska, whether Indians or other, is regulated by the act of 1868. Section 4 provides: "That the president shall have power to restrict and regulate or to prohibit the importation and use * * * * of distilled spirits into and within the said territory," and also for the forfeiture of such spirits introduced or used contrary to such regulation, and for the punishment of the persons engaged in the violation thereof.

Under these circumstances, I conclude that the territory of Alaska is not a part of "the Indian country," so declared by law, whatever it may be in fact, and therefore it is not a violation of section twenty of the act of 1834, under which the first indictment is found to introduce spirituous liquors therein.

As to the second indictment, its sufficiency does not turn upon the point whether Alaska is a part of "the Indian country" or not. Section 20 of the act of 1834, as amended by the acts of February 13, 1862 (12 Stat. 339), and March 15, 1864 (13 Stat. 29), makes the disposing of spirituous liquors to any Indian under the charge of any Indian agent a crime, without reference to the locality in which the act was done. U. S. v. Holliday, supra, 418.

In this respect the act is a general one, and prima facie applies wherever in the United States the subject matter exists—that is, "an Indian under the charge of an Indian agent appointed by the United States." But this feature of the act being enacted as early as 1864, before Alaska was a part of the United States, it is not clear upon authority whether it extended proprio vigore, to Alaska upon its cession to the United States. It has been so common a habit of congress upon the acquisition of territory to specially extend the laws of the United States over it, that an impression seems to prevail that without such action these laws would not affect territory acquired after their passage. For my own part, I can see no good reason why any general law of the United States does not become in force at once, in any country acquired by it, without reference to the time of its passage.

Nevertheless, I am inclined to the opinion that if congress had intended this or any other provision of the intercourse act to be in force in Alaska, it would, in accordance with its common practice, have so declared in the act of July 27, 1868. This consideration, taken in connection with the provision already referred to in section four of such act, apparently intended to give the president power to provide by regulation for the whole subject of the introduction and use of distilled spirits in Alaska, points to the conclusion that congress has by implication excluded the amendment of 1864, touching the disposition of spirituous liquor to Indians, from the territory of Alaska, and left the subject to be governed by the act of 1868, supra.

I would not be understood as stating this conclusion without doubt. On the contrary, I have reached it with hesitation, and express it subject to correction. But in this case, it is safer to err, if at all, by declining the jurisdiction than to accept it. If congress should think it desirable that this or any other provision of the Indian intercourse act should be in force in Alaska, it can so provide, beyond doubt.

The third indictment is founded on section 44 of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 142), imposing taxes on distilled spirits, etc. The treaty of purchase was concluded March 30, 1868, and this act being a general one and passed after that date, there can be no doubt that it is in force in Alaska as in any other part of the United States. But, notwithstanding this, it is equally clear that the demurrer is well taken. The jurisdiction of this court over offenses committed in Alaska is conferred by section seven of the act of July 27, 1868, and by such section confined to violations of that act and of the laws "relating to customs, commerce and navigation," thereby extended over that territory. It is only necessary to state, that the crime charged in this indictment is not a violation of either of these acts, and therefore not within the jurisdiction of this court.

The demurrers are sustained.

Case No. 16,253.

UNITED STATES v. SEVEN BARRELS DISTILLED OIL.

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. July, 1868.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS — FORFEITURE OF PERSONALTY BY MORTGAGOR—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE.

1. Where the owner of personal property, mortgaged by him to another person, remains in possession of it after giving the mortgage, and commits acts in respect to such property, which work a forfeiture of it to the United States, under the 25th section of the internal revenue act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483), it must be condemned, even though the mortgagee is not shown to have been concerned in such acts.

[Cited in Boggs v. Com., 76 Va. 994.]

2. Nor can the demand of the mortgagee be paid by the court out of the proceeds of the property condemned.

3. The remedy of the mortgagee is, to apply to the secretary of the treasury for a remission of the forfeiture, as respects his demand.

[4. Cited in Coffey v. U. S., 6 Sup. Ct. 436, 116 U. S. 433, to the point that the circuit courts have original jurisdiction of suits in rem for forfeitures under the internal revenue laws.]

This was an information in rem, against certain crude oil and a still and apparatus for distilling such oil, alleged to have become forfeited to the United States, under the provisions of the 25th section of the internal revenue act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483). The only claim interposed, was by one Clauson, who intervened as claimant, by virtue of a mortgage upon the property, executed to him by one Seeley, the owner. On the trial, it was conceded, that acts and frauds shown to have been committed by Seeley while in possession of the property, as the owner thereof, were sufficient to forfeit it as against him. It was also admitted, that the property had been conveyed by the claimant to Seeley, in good faith, prior to the commission of the acts complained of; that the claimant then, in good faith, took back a mortgage upon the property, as security for the purchase money; and that there was justly due on the mortgage the sum of $2,400. It was further admitted, that the only interest of the claimant in the property, at the time of the commission of the acts entailing the forfeiture, was that derived from his mortgage; and that there was no evidence showing that the claimant had any knowledge of the frauds which were being committed by Seeley. On these facts the court directed a verdict for the government, condemning the property to be sold as forfeited to the United States, reserving the question, whether the fact that the claimant held a bonâ fide mortgage on the property, and was not shown to have committed any unlawful act, would preclude a decree condemning the whole property as forfeited.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The question raised certainly presents a case of hardship, but it must be decided adversely to the claimant. By the 25th section of the act of 1867, which is substantially a re-enactment of the 68th section of the act of June 30th, 1864 (13 Stat. 248), it is provided, that unlawful acts similar to those proved against the owner of this property, shall, when committed by the owner, agent, or superintendent of any still, boiler, or other vessel used in distillation, work a forfeiture of all the spirits made by or for him, and all the vessels used in making the same, and the stills, boilers and other vessels used in distillation, and all materials fit for use in distillation, found on the premises. The provisions of the 25th section are, by the 94th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 265), made applicable to distilleries of coal oil, and are, therefore, applicable to the property in question, which consists of crude oil and a still, with the accompanying apparatus, used by Seeley, the owner, in the distillation of oil. If these provisions of law are to be taken to mean what they say, it cannot be doubted, that the only decree which can be rendered in this case is a decree which shall condemn this property to be sold as the absolute property of the United States, for, nowhere in the act can any provision be found which, by express terms, exempts from the effect of the decree any interest whatever in property condemned, whether acquired by mortgage or otherwise. The articles themselves and every part of them are made to become the property of the government, by operation of law.

But, it is said that the forfeiture is intended to be a punishment for a criminal act, and that, therefore, only the property of the offender is to be considered as intended to be affected by the act. No such intention, however, is disclosed. On the contrary, the statute expressly provides, that the act of the agent or the superintendent, without the knowledge of the owner of the still, shall forfeit it, thus clearly indicating a different intention. By the act, the still itself is treated as the offender, and is seized and sold because of its guilty use. The forfeiture results from the mode of use, and is created to enable the government to put an end to such use, by the apprehension of the thing used. This mode of enforcing obedience to revenue laws is common, and arises from necessity, by reason of the temptation to disregard laws of this class, and the difficulty of securing criminal conviction under them. The effect of such provisions is to make every person interested in any way in apparatus capable of being used to defraud the government, responsible, to the extent of that interest, for the use of the apparatus, and, therefore, vigilant to aid the government in preventing an unlawful use of it. But, if it be held that only the interest of the actual offender is affected, a door for fraud and collusion is open, which would go far indeed to nullify the act. I find no such open door in the law. It is true that this construction of the statute will often work hardship; and the present may be an instance. It is to relieve such cases, while at the same time the efficiency of the law is maintained, that the power of remission is conferred on the secretary of the treasury. To that power alone this claimant can appeal.

I have not arrived at the conclusion above indicated without consulting, with great care, the views expressed by the learned judge of the Eastern district of Missouri, in the case of U. S. v. 396 Barrels of Distilled Spirits [Cases Nos. 16,502 and 16,503], where it was held, that the interest of a qualified owner, to the extent of his interest in the res, is to be protected by the court, but where, as I also notice, the learned judge remarks, that, if the res be in actual custody, a venditioni exponas will issue, and the lien demand will be paid out of the proceeds of the sale. How can this be? If only the interest of the offender be forfeited, how can any thing more than his interest be sold; or, if the court decrees a forfeiture of the res, and sells it as forfeited to the government, under what provision of law is it authorized to pay the proceeds of the sale to other parties than the government? To exempt a certain portion of the proceeds of the sale of the property condemned from the effect of the condemnation, seems to me to be an exercise, by the court, of a power which the law has conferred on the secretary of the treasury alone. With great deference, therefore, I feel obliged to differ with the judge who decided that case, and must hold that, upon the finding of the jury in this case, a decree must be entered, condemning the whole property, as forfeited to the United States, and declaring that the claimant has no remedy in this court for his demand.

UNITED STATES v. SEVEN BARRELS DISTILLED OIL.

District Court, E. D. New York. 1868.

FORFEITURES UNDER INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS — COSTS.

In proceedings in rem against merchandise, under the 48th section of the internal revenue act of 1864 [13 Stat. 248], in cases of adjudged forfeiture to the United States, claimants contesting such forfeiture are subject to costs.

At law.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case presents the question as to what should be the judgment in regard to costs in proceedings in rem, taken to enforce the forfeiture which are provided for by the laws relating to the internal revenue.

The facts are as follows: An information was filed in the circuit court of this district against certain personal property, which was thereafter seized under process issued in rem. Upon the return day of the process, John H. Clausen appeared, and filed a claim to the property, averring that he was the mortgagee of the property, and entitled to the possession thereof, by virtue of the mortgage at the time of the seizure of the property by the marshal. No exception to the claim and intervention of the claimant was filed on behalf of the United States, and thereafter the claimant duly filed his answer, denying that the property in question had become forfeited, as alleged in the information, and at the same time, in pursuance of the rules and practice of the court, the claimant filed a stipulation, executed by himself, with a surety, in the sum of $250, conditioned that the claimant should pay all costs and expenses which should be awarded by the final decree of this court, or upon appeal by the appellate court, the parties thereto consenting that, in case of default of contumacy on the part of the claimant or his surety, execution for the sum of $250 may issue against their goods, chattels and lands. No stipulation for value was given, and the property remained in custody until sold by order of court pending the suit, in pursuance of a consent, and the proceeds paid into the registry.

Thereafter the cause came on to be tried before the court and jury, when it appeared by the admissions of the parties that the act set forth in the information had been committed by the owner of the property while in possession thereof, but no unlawful act had been committed by the mortgagee, who was the only claimant before the court. The court therefore directed a verdict for the government, subject to the opinion of the court, and thereafter ordered judgment to be entered upon the verdict, condemning the goods as forfeited to the United States, reserving, however, the question as to what judgment should be entered in regard to costs. That question, having been argued by the respective counsel, is now to be disposed of by the court.

The proceeding in question is purely a statutory one, and the authority for it is given in the forty-eighth section of the act of 1864, which declares that proceedings to enforce the forfeiture imposed by the act "shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem in the circuit or district court where such seizure is made." According to the act, the proceeding, it is to be observed, is only required to be in the nature of a proceeding in rem. It is left to the courts, by rules and regulations, to establish the practice to be observed in conducting such proceedings, which practice must, however, conform in nature to the well-known proceedings in rem, and which must, of course, be subject to any general statutory regulations which are applicable thereto. Such a statutory regulation in regard to the question of liability for costs is found in the act of May 8, 1872 (1 Stat. p. 277), where it is provided that "in every prosecution for any fine or forfeiture under any statute of the United States, and if judgment is rendered against defendant, he shall be subject to the payment of costs." The word "defendant" as used in this act must be held to include a claimant in action in rem for a forfeiture. No other party is before the court in such a proceeding to whom the word "defendant" can be applied. According to this act, then, in all cases like the present, when a verdict is rendered in favor of the government, a judgment must be entered condemning the property as forfeited to the United States, and condemning the claimant to pay the costs; and such a decree will cover all the costs of the cause. The act makes no allusion to any exceptions, nor does it permit the court to exercise any discretion in the premises. The claimant is made by law subject to the costs and all the costs incurred in the cause. If this view be correct, the court is not only without power in this case to exempt claimant from liability for costs, but it has no power to strike from the costs the items of custody fees incurred previous to the intervention of the claimant, nor the expenses attending the sale of property. These are legal items of costs in the cause, although not caused by the intervention of the claimant.

The effect thus given to the statute does not differ from the effect of an ordinary decree in proceedings in rem. In admiralty, where costs are awarded, the claimant is held liable for the costs, in addition to the value of the vessel and to the items attending her arrest and her sale. The John Dunn, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 160; The Dundee, 2 Hagg. Adm. 142; Coote, Adm. p. 95. In prize cases these items have not in all cases been charged against the claimant, as in the case of The Sally [Case No. 12,258]. In the case of The Langdon Cheves [Id. 8,063], they were allowed; but prize cases are exceptional, and, besides, in admiralty proceedings the costs are always at the discretion of the courts.

The present is a proceeding at common law, in which no such discretion can be exercised, unless given by statute. It follows, therefore, that in this case there must be a judgment in favor of the United States against the claimant for the amount of the costs of the cause, and this amount is not limited to the amount fixed in the stipulation for costs. The fact that the claimant signed the stipulation did not increase his liability, nor can the stipulation have any effect to diminish that liability, which the statute imposes upon him.

As to the stipulator, the case is different. He is only liable by virtue of his stipulation, and that liability cannot exceed the amount of the stipulation. The judgment will accordingly provide that for that sum, which in the present case is $250, execution will issue against the goods, chattels, and lands of the stipulator, according to the terms of the stipulation, in accordance with the practice in this particular in admiralty proceedings in rem (Gaines v. Travis [Case No. 5,180], and Holmes v. Dodge [Id. 6,637]), which, when applicable, are directed by the rules of this court to be followed in cases of seizure on land upon information.

PRIZE—JURISDICTION—CAPTURES ON LAND.

[1. The practice of the federal courts in admiralty is governed by the rules of admiralty law found in the English reports.]

[2. Prize jurisdiction does not depend on the locality of the seizure, but on the subject-matter. A capture by naval, as distinguished from land, forces, of property stored in a warehouse near the shore of a harbor, is a subject of prize jurisdiction, and the property may be condemned as prize.]

Prize. Certain rice was stored in a warehouse close by the river, which communicated with Charleston harbor, and was captured by the launches of the Albatross and her consort.

HELD BY THE COURT (BETTS, District Judge): That the practice of the United States courts is governed by the rules of admiralty law disclosed in the English reports. That in England the prize jurisdiction does not depend upon locality, but on the subject-matter. It is said by Sir Wm. Scott in The Rebeckah, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 227, that "a maritime capture effected by naval persons using a force subject to their use, distinguished from an ordinary land force subject to military persons, was a maritime prize."

Decree, therefore, condemning this property as lawful prize.

gross proceeds of sale; to be paid him, however, after payment out of the fund of the costs of the proceedings.]

At law.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before me upon a motion for distribution of the funds in court. The question is as to the sum to which the person adjudged to be the informer is entitled under the circular of the secretary of the treasury, where property has been condemned, the proceeds of sale amount to not exceed $500. According to the terms of the treasury circular, I am of the opinion that the percentage of the informer must be calculated upon the gross proceeds of the sale of the property condemned. The costs of the proceedings through which the fund in court is realized, and which, moreover, are for services rendered before any right of the informer attaches, are, however, a charge upon the whole fund, and, in the distribution, must be paid out of the proceeds of sale before the share of the informer can be distributed to him.

SEIZURE OF DISTILLED SPIRITS—REV. ST. §§ 3453, 3459, CONSTRUED—INFORMATION OF FORFEITURE.

1. Section 3459 of the Revised Statutes prescribed the notice required and not the previous rules of the court.

2. In an information under section 3453 of the Revised Statutes, it is sufficient to follow the language of the statute and the allegation held sufficient without an express averment that the taxes on the spirits were not paid.

3. The tools etc., found and seized in the place where the distilled spirits were found and seized, were, under the averments, subject to seizure and forfeiture.

J. S. Botsford, U. S. Dist. Atty.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—The seizure of distilled spirits, raw materials, tools, etc., was made under section 3453 of the Revised Statutes. The claimants, as owners, applied under section 3459 of the Revised Statutes for the return of the property seized, and executed the bond therein provided for, which was filed with the proper district attorney. The district court ordered personal service of notice of the pendency of the proceedings to be given to the parties executing the bonds ten days before the term fixed for trial. The required notice was given. A motion was made on a special appearance to quash the notice, because twenty days notice had not been given as required by rule 45 of the United States district courts for the districts of Missouri.

The answer to this objection is that section 3459 of the Revised Statutes prescribes the mode of proceeding in the case as to notice, and not the rule of the court referred to.

The third article of the information was demurred to and the demurrer was overruled and judgment of forfeiture entered. Without going into detail my judgment is that the allegations of the third article using and following the language of the statute are sufficient in substance. Under this article it is specially urged that it should be alleged that the taxes were not paid on the spirits. But the averment is that the spirits "were in the possession and ownership of the claimants for the purpose of being sold and removed by them in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and with the design to avoid the payment of said taxes." This is sufficient.

And it is my opinion that the tools, etc., found and seized in the place and inclosure where the distilled spirits were found and seized, were, upon the averments of this article, subject to seizure and forfeiture. It is my opinion, too, that the fourth article is also good, upon a general demurrer. The court cannot judicially notice and on demurrer decide that the averment that certain materials were "raw materials" were not so in the face of the direct allegation of fact to the contrary.

I have some doubt whether the kind of article subject to tax, into which it is alleged these "raw materials" were intended to be manufactured for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured article with the design to evade the payment of said tax, ought not to have been specifically averred, yet I am inclined to think this generality of statement would not be sufficient ground of reversal where judgment went upon a general demurrer. But, however this may be, the third count is sufficient to support the judgment.

I have no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the district court. Affirmed.

DUTIES PAID TO THE CONFEDERATE GOVERNMENT.

[Payment of duties on goods imported at a place entirely in control of the insurrectionary power during the war of the Rebellion was not a discharge of the duties. The acknowledgment of belligerent rights did not make the rebel power a government, either de jure or de facto.]

[In this case, decided at the March term, 1868, the goods were imported into Brownsville in 1864. The claimant, Juan Rico, paid the duties to the Confederate authorities, the then only existing and de facto government at the place of import, and claimed that such payment was a satisfaction of all liability for duties, and the government of the United States could not rightfully set up any claim for duties; and relied upon the case of U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 246, better known as the Castine Case, and the rulings of the treasury department, in support of his view.

The United States district attorney, D. J. Baldwin, denied the applicability of the Castine Case to the one at bar, and contended, that by the statutes of the United States, as well as by the law of nations, the goods were liable.

THE COURT (WATROUS, District Judge) held, that payment of the duties to the rebel authorities was no satisfaction; that the rebel power was not a government at all, neither de jure nor de facto; that it was a belligerent power, but not a sovereign authority, state, or nation; and that the acknowledgment of belligerent rights was only made in the interests of a common civilization and humanity to take the rebels out of the category of pirates, &c., and subject them to the treatment accorded to prisoners of war by civilized nations.

District Court, S. D. New York. 1867.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS — FORFEITURE OF SPIRITS—PRESUMPTIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

[1. Where spirits seized for alleged violation of the forty-fifth section of the internal revenue law (14 Stat. 163) are claimed by one who asserts that he purchased them in the open market, the fact that the barrels bear all the brands indicating payment of the taxes does not create a presumption that such taxes have been paid.]

[2. The forty-fifth section of the internal revenue law (14 Stat. 163) is not rendered unconstitutional by the provision which requires affirmative proof on the part of the claimant of the payment of the taxes due on the spirits seized.]

This was an action to forfeit the spirits under the 45th section of the internal revenue act [14 Stat. 163]. The goods were seized in different lots, some at the rectifying establishment of Mr. Wechsler, corner of Sheriff and Houston streets, and some in transit thither from the rectifying establishment of Mr. Bunn, the claimant in the case. The government gave testimony to show that the spirits were branded as rectified spirits, when they were in fact raw spirits, and that the claimant offered the officers $500 to let the spirits go, and afterward went to Mr. Blake, the collector, to get him to decide that it was rectified, and said he would send a friend to see him and that the friend intimated that in case of such a decision a $1,000 bill could be left at his house.

The barrels were branded as required by law when seized, and the claimant testified that he bought the spirits in open market of various dealers, and paid over $2 a gallon for it, and that the barrels were properly branded when he bought them. That it was utterly impossible for him to prove the payment of taxes on the identical lot of spirits seized, for the reason that the same had changed hands frequently in the market; that the brands had been frequently erased as required by law, and the identity of the spirits was gone, and that it was impossible for any rectifier or dealer to prove the payment of taxes on spirits bought in the open market. Mr. Wechsler testified to the same effect.

Counsel for claimant then raised the following points, and requested the judge to direct a verdict for claimant. (1) That the presumption in the absence of direct proof to the contrary, if the 45th section is constitutional, is that the taxes on the spirits seized were paid, because all the brands indicating the payment of taxes required by law were on the barrels seized. (2) The only ground on which government can recover is, because the claimant has failed to prove affirmatively in accordance with the 45th section the payment of the taxes on the spirits seized. (3) The 45th section requiring this affirmative proof on the part of the claimant is unconstitutional, because it amounts to a virtual prohibition of the traffic and commerce in spirits. (4) That congress has no power to forbid and prohibit the commerce and traffic in spirits. (5) Congress cannot indirectly do that which it has no power to do directly. (6) That exacting and requiring of a trader or dealer the performance of some impossible thing, as a condition of permitting him to trade or deal in spirits is virtually but an indirect way of forbidding and prohibiting him of trading in spirits at all. (7) That in this case the evidence is that it is utterly impossible for claimants to prove the payment of taxes of spirits seized, or for any rectifier, dealer or trader to show payment of taxes on spirits bought and sold in open market, for the reason that by frequent change, &c., the identity is gone.

Mr. Phelps, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

A. J. Dittenhoeffer, for claimant.

THE COURT overruled these points and directed a verdict for the government.

UNITED STATES v. SEVENTY-EIGHT CASES OF BOOKS.[1]

[2 Bond, 271.][2]

CUSTOMS LAWS—FORFEITURE FOR UNDERVALUATION — INFORMATION — NECESSARY AVERMENTS — INTERCOURSE WITH CANADA—REPEAL OF STATUTES.

1. In an information under section 66 of the act of congress of 1799 [1 Stat. 677], alleging fraud in the importation of merchandise at an undervaluation, it is necessary to aver that the valuation was under cost at the place of exportation.

2. The information in this case not containing this averment is defective, but the district attorney is permitted to amend.

3. In the additional or amended information, based on section 1 of the act of congress of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 737], it is not necessary to allege that the person making the fraudulent entry, was either owner, consignee, or agent of the property, if it appears from the statements of the information that the person making the entry was the owner, or acted as an agent of the owner.

4. An averment that the requirements of the statute have been complied with, which are merely directory to the officers of the revenue and the importer, is not necessary under the act of March, 1863.

5. The acts of 1799 and 1863 extend and apply to commercial intercourse between Canada and the United States as well as to other foreign countries.

6. Section 66 of the act of 1799 is not repealed by section 1 of the act of March, 1863, the latter being in aid of, or auxiliary to, the act of 1799.

Information of forfeiture for violation of customs laws.

Durbin Ward, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Henry Stanbery, for the United States.

Tilden & Stevenson and F. Lincoln, for claimants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The questions before the court arise on exceptions in the nature of a demurrer to the original information, and the first charge in the amended information. The original information alleges as the ground of forfeiture that seventy-eight boxes of books were imported into the United States from the port of Sarnia, in Canada, to the port of Port Huron, in the United States; that on November 4, 1868, some person, to the district attorney unknown, made an entry at the last-named port on an invoice, purporting to be an invoice of all the books contained in said boxes, at their actual cost, as required by the act of congress of March 3, 1799; that it was afterward found that said invoice and entry were false and fraudulent, and that the person who had possession of said books unlawfully, knowingly, and fraudulently entered the same at said port, and invoiced them below the actual cost thereof, with intent to defraud the United States of the duties imposed thereon by law, contrary to the statute, whereby said books became forfeited to the United States. This information is based upon section 66 of the act of March 3, 1799, which provides, "that if any goods, wares, or merchandise, of which entry shall have been made in the office of a collector, shall not be invoiced according to the actual cost thereof, at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties thereon, or any part thereof, all such goods, wares. or merchandise, or the value thereof, shall be forfeited."

It is objected to this information that it is defective in not averring that the alleged false and fraudulent invoice of the books was below their actual cost at the place of exportation. The averment is, that they were invoiced below their actual cost, but it is not averred that it was below their actual cost at the place of exportation. The question is, whether such an averment is not necessary to sustain the information. The courts of the United States, in administering the navigation and revenue laws, have been uniformly liberal in their practice, and in their construction of statutes on these subjects. But I can find no case in which they have held that an information, which did not describe substantially the statutory offense on which a forfeiture was claimed, could be sustained. The case of The Hoppet, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 389 (2 Pet. Cond. R. 542), and the case of The Nancy [Case No. 10,008], have a direct bearing on this subject.

Now, it is clear, as to this information, that there is no averment that the offense defined in section 66 of the act of 1799 has been committed. It is merely alleged that the goods were invoiced below their actual cost, but the important averment, that it was below their actual cost at the place of exportation, is omitted. The statute makes this a material element as a ground of forfeiture, and it should have been averred in the information. In the case referred to, Chief Justice Marshall held, "that the information is not made good by the averment that the offense was committed against the provisions of certain sections of the act of congress." The offense must be specifically defined, that the claimants may know with certainty what are the grounds on which a forfeiture is claimed.

[1] [The proceedings embraced in this and the two following reports (Cases Nos. 16,258a and 16,258b) are comprised in one report in 2 Bond, 271–286.]

[2] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The averment, merely, that the books were invoiced below their actual cost, without alleging that it was below the actual cost at the place of exportation, does not advise the claimant of the charge he is required to meet. If desirous of taking testimony to rebut the charge of a fraudulent invoice, as being below cost, the information leaves it wholly uncertain as to the place and it would be impossible for him to prepare a defense. The exception to the original information is, therefore, sustained on the ground referred to, but the defect is amendable, and the district attorney has leave to amend his information.

And this brings the court to the consideration of the exceptions to the amended, or, as it is called, additional information, filed by the district attorney on the 17th of March.

I. The first ground of exception to the second information is, that it does not allege "that the person who caused the goods mentioned in said information to be imported into the United States, and who made an entry thereof below their value, by means of an undervaluation in a false and fraudulent invoice, was either the owner, consignee, or agent of the owner of said goods." The second or additional information is based on section 1 of the act of congress of March 3, 1863. It avers, in substance, that one Henry J. Shaw, having the custody and control of two hundred and four boxes or packages of books, subject to duty, caused the same to be transported from Sarnia, in Canada, in a boat or vessel, across the St. Clair river, to the port of Port Huron, in the United States, and imported the same at said port, and made, or caused to be made, an entry of the books, upon an invoice setting forth their value greatly below their value at Sarnia, or in said dominion of Canada, or at Port Huron, and greatly below their cost in the country from which they were imported; that such undervaluation was with the unlawful intent of causing an entry to be made to evade the payment of the just and full amount of the duties chargeable thereon; that seventy-eight cases or boxes, of the two hundred and four cases or boxes so entered, were sent to Cincinnati for sale, and were there seized as forfeited, and that said seventy-eight cases were by Shaw, or by his procurement, knowingly and fraudulently invoiced greatly below their true value at Sarnia, or in the dominion of Canada, or at Port Huron, or the principal markets of Canada, or in the country whence they were exported, with intent to evade the payment of duties, and contrary to the statute.

The question arising on the first exception to the first count of the amended information just referred to, is, whether it is necessary to aver in the information that the entry of the books alleged to have been fraudulently invoiced, was made by the owner, consignee, or agent. It is not so alleged in the information, but it is averred that the books were in the custody of, and under the control of Shaw, and that he caused the same to be fraudulently entered at an undervaluation.

Section 1 of the act of March 3, 1863, after prescribing with great minutenes the prerequisites to a legal entry of property imported from a foreign country, subject to an import duty, provides that after July 1, 1863, no goods, wares, or merchandise imported into this country, shall be admitted to entry without a full compliance with the requirements of the statute; one of which is, that the invoice shall be verified by the oath of the owner, or consignee, or an authorized agent of the owner or consignee. And the penal clause of the section declares, "that if any such owner, consignee, or agent . . . shall knowingly make, or attempt to make, an entry thereof, by means of any false invoice, . . . or of any invoice which shall not contain a true statement of all the particulars hereinbefore required, or by means of any other false or fraudulent document or paper, or of any other false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, . . . such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be forfeited," etc.

Does the first count of the second information contain averments of a fraud, which, within the scope of the statute, subjects the property in question to forfeiture, and sufficient to require the claimants to answer the charge of fraud? As before stated, the exception insisted on, to this part of the information, is, that it does not allege that the party making the false invoice was either owner, consignee, or agent. It is true there is no direct averment of this fact. But it is averred that the books were in the custody of, and under the control of Shaw, who is charged with making the fraudulent invoice. This is equivalent to an allegation that he was the agent. He who has for the time being, and for a special purpose, the custody and control of another's property, is his agent. And it would not be a strained construction of the statute, that Shaw, who made the entry of the books, acted as the agent of the owners within the fair import of the law.

But if this view is erroneous, another inquiry pertinently arises, namely, whether it was necessary to allege the fact, that the person making the entry was either owner, consignee, or agent. It is well settled law, that what is mere matter of defense need not be set out in an information. All that is required, is that enough should be stated to show a violation of the statute. The gist of the offense which subjects property to forfeiture under the section of the law referred to, is the procurement of an entry of goods imported from abroad by means of a false and fraudulent invoice. It is distinctly charged that Shaw caused an entry to be made, under such an invoice, with knowledge that the prices were greatly below the actual value of the property, and with the intent thereby to defraud the government of the legal duties imposed by law. This is the substantial charge relied on as the ground for the forfeiture of this property, set forth by clear and distinct averments, and which the claimants are required to meet. Whether Shaw was or was not the agent of the owner is an incidental fact, in no sense affecting the charge of fraud in the entry of the books. If the invoice made by him was false and fraudulent, it is immaterial in what capacity, or under what pretenses he made it. If false and fraudulent, the property entered was forfeited when the fraud was perpetrated, without reference to the capacity in which he acted.

It may be said, also, as showing the sufficiency of the count under consideration, that no skillful pleader would consider it safe to make the positive averment in the information, that Shaw was either the owner, consignee, or agent of this property. If such an allegation had been made, it would be necessary to prove it as alleged. But the person making the entry may have given false information to the collector, and represented himself as owner, consignee, or agent contrary to the fact. It would be unsafe, therefore, to allege as a fact what on the hearing would be disproved, and thus prevent a decree of forfeiture. Or the case may be supposed, that the person making the entry refuses to declare in what relation he stands to the property; shall the object of the law be thwarted by such refusal?

There is still another exception to the first count of the second information strenuously urged by counsel, namely, that it is not alleged that the invoice by which the fraudulent entry was made, was made, or certified to, before a consul, vice-consul, or other commercial agent of the United States. Section 1 of the act of March 3, 1863, before referred to, requires all invoices of goods or merchandise, imported into the United States from a foreign country, to be made in triplicate, and signed by the person owning or shipping the same; and that the invoices shall, at or before the shipment, be produced to the consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent of the United States nearest the place of shipment, and shall have indorsed on them a declaration by the purchaser, manufacturer, owner, or agent that the invoices are in all respects true.

Such are the plain requirements of the statute, but it does not follow, that in a proceeding to condemn property for a fraudulent entry by means of a false invoice, it is necessary to aver in the information that all the formal requirements of the statute, as to the verification of the invoice prior to the shipment, are to be specially set out, with an averment that they have been complied with. These provisions are directory to, and obligatory upon, persons importing goods from a foreign country, and on all officers of the United States intrusted with the execution of the import laws. They are intended to insure the payment of all lawful duties imposed by law, and to guard the government against frauds in the collection of its revenue. But in a proceeding to condemn property for frauds in its importation, it is surely no defense that the owner or importer has failed in any particular to comply with the law; nor can it be tolerated that neglect of duty by an officer of the United States, whether resulting from his ignorance or corruption, shall shield property infected with fraud from the condemnation to which it is subject by law. It would be strange, indeed, if the default of the foreign owners or shippers of the property in question, in not having made out and authenticated triplicate invoices of the property shipped, could be a vindication of a fraud committed at the port of entry in this country. If it were so, the government would have a beggarly account of import duties, as it would be a facile way for a foreign owner or shipper to evade the payment of duties, and secure himself against a forfeiture of his property, by willfully neglecting to comply with a prerequisite of the law. It seems clear, therefore, that any irregularities or omissions, on the part of the importers or owners in doing what the law required, is no answer to the charge of fraud in causing the goods to be entered at an undervaluation, with intent thereby to evade the payment of the lawful duties.

From these considerations, without enlarging on this point, the court is led to the conclusion that the second ground of exception to the information must be overruled.

But there is a further ground urged in argument, though not set forth in the exceptions filed, that as the importation alleged in the information was from a port or place in Canada, the acts of March 3, 1799, and March 3, 1863, do not apply, and that no legal ground of seizure is therefore stated. This point not being presented in the exceptions filed, might perhaps be passed without notice. The argument is that the acts of 1799 and 1863 refer to, and embrace only, ocean commerce, and do not extend it to commercial intercourse with countries adjacent to the United States, under foreign dominion. And the acts of 1821 and 1823, and perhaps other statutes regulating trade and intercourse between the United States and Canada, as applicable to the importation of the books in question, are referred to. Without stopping to examine and analyze these acts, it seems to the court that the exception under consideration is fully answered by a reference to the first section of the act of 1863. That act, being the latest in date on the subjects embraced in it, must be regarded as superseding any prior legislation in conflict with its provisions. The first clause of the first section of that act in terms applies "to all invoices of goods, wares, and merchandise imported from any foreign country into the United States." And in a subsequent clause, before recited, specifies and denounces the penalty for any fraudulent practices, in invoicing and entering property subject to duty, with intent to evade the payment of duties. Among these the act of knowingly making, or attempting to make, an entry by means of "any false invoice" is mentioned, and a forfeiture provided for, as the penalty for the act. Now, if an importation from a port in Canada is an importation from a foreign country, which can not, of course, be controverted, it follows that it is not only within the scope and intention of the act of 1863, but within its terms. And this remark applies with equal force to the act of 1799, so far as it is not repealed by repugnant and conflicting provisions of subsequent acts.

It is perhaps not material to notice the argument of the learned counsel for the claimants, intended to prove that the act of 1799 is wholly repealed by the later legislation of congress. On that question there is an authority, which, I think, is applicable and decisive. I refer to the case of Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342. It is true the case was decided in 1842, and could, therefore, have had no reference to the act of 1863. But the principles laid down by the learned Judge Story, in giving the opinion of the court, have a direct application to the question of the repeal of section 66 of the act of 1799. After referring to the fact that there had been legislation on the subject of foreign importations, subsequent to the passage of that act, the court say, at page 362: "The question then arises whether section 66, of the act of 1799 has been repealed, or whether it remains in full force. That it has not been expressly or by direct terms repealed, is admitted; and the question resolves itself into the more narrow inquiry whether it has been repealed by necessary implication. We say, by necessary implication, for it is not sufficient to establish that subsequent laws cover some, or even all, the cases provided for by it; for they may be merely affirmative, or accumulative or auxiliary. But there must be a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new laws and those of the old; and even then the old law is repealed by implication only pro tanto, to the extent of the repugnancy. And it may be added, that in the interpretation of all laws for the collection of revenue, whose provisions are often very complicated and numerous, to guard against frauds by importers, it would be a strange ground to assert that the main provisions of any such laws sedulously introduced to meet the case of a palpable fraud, should be deemed repealed, merely because in subsequent laws other persons and authorities are given to the custom-house officers, and other modes of proceeding are allowed to be had by them before the goods have passed from their custody, in order to ascertain whether there has been any fraud attempted upon the government. The more natural, if not the necessary inference in all such cases, is that the legislature intend the new laws to be auxiliary to, and in aid of the purposes of the old law, even when some of the cases may equally be within the reach of each. There ought certainly under such circumstances, to be manifest and total repugnancy in the provisions to lead to the conclusion that the latter laws abrogated, and were designed to abrogate the former."

This reasoning certainly applies to the question before the court, and sanctions the conclusion that section 66 of the act of 1799 is not repealed, so far as it contains provisions not repugnant to the act of 1863. While the latter act changes and makes more specific the duties of importers and collectors of customs, it leaves unrepealed many of the provisions of the old law, showing, in the language of Judge Story, that it was intended the later law "should be auxiliary to, and in aid of the purposes of the old law."

I have only to add, that with the amendment indicated as necessary to the information originally filed, it may be sustained under section 66 of the act of 1799.

The exceptions to the first count of the additional or amended information are overruled.

Case No. 16,258a.

UNITED STATES v. SEVENTY-EIGHT CASES OF BOOKS.

[2 Bond, 281.] [1]

CUSTOMS LAWS—FORFEITURE FOR UNDERVALUATION—EVIDENCE—RULE OF VALUATION—PROVINCE OF JURY.

1. The first count in the information is based on section 66 of the act of 1799, and the second on section 1 of the act of March, 1863, but they both contain substantially the charge of fraud in entering books at the custom-house, at a fraudulent undervaluation. Both counts charge that the entry at a false valuation was with an intent to defraud the United States of the full legal tax or duty.

2. The evidence must satisfy the jury that the books were invoiced below their value, and also that this was done with the intent charged in the information.

3. The entire entry at Port Huron embraced 204 boxes, but of these, 78 only were sent to Cincinnati and seized there, and are all now proceeded against for forfeiture; but in considering the question of undervaluation, the jury may look to the entry of the 204 cases. Eight of the 78 cases having been released from seizure, there are but 64 cases to which the question of forfeiture applies.

4. The books were purchased in London and Edinburgh, were shipped to Montreal, and there the invoices were made out, and were verified before the vice-consul of the United States at that place, and the invoice prices should have been the value of the books at that place, but in determining the value at Cincinnati, the cost of transportation from Montreal to that place is to be added.

5. The question in the case is one of fraud, which is partly a question of fact and partly of law. It is for the jury to find the facts proving the alleged fraud, and for the court to determine whether the facts proved import a fraud in law.

6. There can be no question, if the jury are satisfied that the claimant entered the books knowingly at a false valuation, it is a legal fraud, and subjects the books to forfeiture.

[This was an information of forfeiture against seventy-eight cases of books, under the customs laws, on the ground of a fraudulent undervaluation. Certain exceptions to the information were heretofore overruled. Case No. 16,258.]

Warner M. Bateman, Dist. Atty., and Henry Stanbery, for the United States.

Lewis H. Bond, for interveners.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging the jury). You will have understood from what has taken place in your presence, since you took your places as jurors, the nature of this proceeding and the questions on which you are to pass. It is a suit prosecuted by the United States for the forfeiture of a large quantity of books, alleged to have been fraudulently imported, in violation of law. In the information filed by the government, which presents the issues you are to decide, there are two counts or charges, on which a verdict of forfeiture is claimed by the counsel for the United States. The first is based on section 66 of an old statute, passed March 3, 1799; and the second charge is framed under section 1 of the act of March 3, 1863. As these sections are of great length and somewhat complicated in their provisions, I will not recite them at length to the jury. They are evidently intended to provide for and punish, by forfeiture or otherwise, every possible fraud in the importation of goods or merchandise from a foreign country, entered at a false valuation, with an intent to defraud the government of the legal tax or duty. Without attempting to dissect or analyze separately the charges stated in the two counts of the information, it may be stated that they both aver substantially, that seventy-eight cases of books were imported from Sarnia, a port in Canada, into Port Huron, a port in the United States, and fraudulently entered at the custom-house at the latter port, at a price greatly below their actual value, with the fraudulent intent of evading the just and legal duties to which they were subject; whereby, it is averred, the books are forfeited to the United States.

This brief statement exhibits the case which you are to decide by your verdict. The inquiry for your consideration is whether the fraud charged is proved to your satisfaction by the evidence adduced. The alleged fraud is denied by Thomas J. Shaw, who is before you claiming the books in his own right, or as agent for others, and denying, by his answer duly filed, all the allegations of fraud as set forth in the information.

It is claimed by the United States that the proof shows that there were 204 cases of books entered at the custom-house at Port Huron, at a false valuation, by the claimant Shaw, as to which the charge of fraud applies. But, of these 204 cases imported, only 78 were sent for sale at Cincinnati, and were all that were seized here. It is only, therefore, the 78 cases that are in controversy in this proceeding, but in the consideration of the question of undervaluation, it will be competent for the jury to consider the entire importation of the 204 cases. It may be proper here to remark, that of the 78 cases sent to Cincinnati, which are brought by the seizure within the jurisdiction of this court, eight cases have been released by order of the secretary of the treasury, upon the application of Bell & Dolby, booksellers of London, as to these the charge of fraud in their importation does not apply, and the counsel for the United States do not claim a forfeiture as to them. There are, therefore, 64 cases only now in controversy, and which are claimed as forfeited. But it is claimed by the United States, that there was fraud in the entire importation; and that, if the jury is not satisfied of the fraud as to all these books, the proof as to the 64 cases is clear.

It will be obvious to the jury that their principal inquiry will be, whether these books were imported and entered by Shaw at a false or undervaluation, with the design of evading the payment of the 25 per cent. ad valorem duty imposed by law. If the jury find that the evidence justifies the conclusion that the books were knowingly entered at an undervaluation, with the fraudulent intent charged, the verdict of forfeiture is an unavoidable result. The law is clear either that there must be a forfeiture of the books, or a recovery of the value of the property infected by the fraud. The government proceeds in this case for the forfeiture, and your verdict must respond to that claim.

There has been a very protracted investigation in respect to the value of these books, and their importation. It seems they were purchased in London and Edinburgh by the claimant Shaw, and have been traced to Montreal, where they were landed early in October, 1868. The invoices for the purpose of entry at the custom-house at Port Huron were made at Montreal. It is proved that the invoices embraced 204 cases of books, and were made out in triplicates, as required by our law. Were the prices fixed in the invoices below their true value? These invoices were submitted to and verified before the vice-consul of the United States at Montreal. In fixing their value, the market prices at Montreal should have been the rule of value; and in order to determine their value here, the cost of transportation from Montreal to Cincinnati should be added.

As to the market value of the 78 cases sent to Cincinnati, the testimony is very clear and explicit. Two witnesses, Hill and Rickey, both booksellers in this city, acted as appraisers of the books, and examined them critically, with a view to an appraisement to be returned under oath. Clarke, also a bookseller, and of long experience in the business, inspected the books, with a view to their market value. These intelligent and perfectly reliable witnesses unite in saying the books were invoiced greatly below their value. If the jury give credit to this testimony, their only inquiry will be, was Shaw, who made the invoices, aware of this undervaluation, and was it with an intent to defraud the government of the legal tax? This inquiry is submitted to the jury, to be answered in the light of all the facts in evidence in the case.

It has been often held by courts and judges, that fraud is partly a question of fact and partly a question of law. It is the province and duty of a jury to decide what facts are proved, sustaining the allegations of fraud, and for the court to determine whether such facts are sufficient in law to constitute a fraud. The fact of fraud is not to be presumed without evidence sustaining the charge. In this case the jury must be reasonably satisfied that Shaw was actuated by a fraudulent purpose in valuing these books, and in their entry at the custom-house, but if they are convinced the invoice rates were greatly below the true value of the books, the fraudulent intent might well be presumed. And I may remark in closing, that this not being, in a legal sense, a criminal case, it is not required that the evidence should be such as to exclude all doubt, and the jury may properly decide according to the preponderance of the evidence.

The jury returned as their verdict that the books were forfeited to the United States.

Case No. 16,258b.

UNITED STATES v. SEVENTY-EIGHT CASES OF BOOKS.

CUSTOMS LAWS — FORFEITURES FOR UNDERVALUATION—BONA FIDE ADVANCES BY AUCTIONEERS—LIEN.

1. Where packages of books were fraudulently imported into the United States and placed in the possession of auctioneers to be sold, and advances were made by them on said books without knowledge of or reason to suspect any fraud in such importation, and before the United States had made its election to proceed for a forfeiture, or to sue for the value of the property: Held, that such advances were a lien upon the proceeds of the sale of the books in the registry of the court, and that an order for payment should be made.

2. Where such lien exists, and the fund from which it ought to be paid is within the jurisdiction of the court, there is no necessity for requiring the person having such lien to apply to the secretary of the treasury for payment.

[This was an information of forfeiture against certain cases of books, for fraudulent undervaluations on importation into this country. Exceptions to the information were overruled (Case No. 16,258); and, after a trial, the jury returned a verdict of forfeiture (see Case No. 16,258a).]

After the sale of the books forfeited, and the payment of the proceeds into the registry of the court, the attorney for Hubbard & Heaton, auctioneers in Cincinnati, moved the court for an order for the payment to said Hubbard & Heaton of $3,000, for money advanced by them to the claimant Shaw, after the books were in possession of the auctioneers for sale in Cincinnati, and before the seizure. But the counsel for the United States urged, that it was not competent for the court to order the payment of Hubbard & Heaton's claim from the proceeds in the registry, and that the entire amount must be deposited to the credit of the United States, and that the claim of Hubbard & Heaton could only be paid on the allowance and order of the secretary of the treasury.

Warner M. Bateman, Dist. Atty., and Henry Stanbery, for the United States.

Lewis H. Bond, for interveners.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The claim of Hubbard & Heaton, for the sum advanced by them to Shaw, is admitted to be just and equitable, and that when made they had no knowledge of or reason to suspect any fraud in the importation by Shaw. It was paid to Shaw after the employment of Hubbard & Heaton as auctioneers, and after the books were placed in their possession for sale, and before their seizure for the fraud in their importation. There would seem to be no doubt that Hubbard & Heaton have an equitable lien on the fund in the registry, and that the order for its payment should be made. The case of Caldwell v. U. S., reported in 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366, decides that a bona fide claim upon property before seizure, or before the government has made its election to proceed for a forfeiture, or sue for its value, may be paid out of the proceeds. Hubbard & Heaton's claim is within the principle decided by the supreme court in the case referred to.

But it is insisted by the counsel of the United States, that under an act of congress passed in 1867 [14 Stat. 546], that the entire proceeds must be paid into the treasury, including all charges and expenses incident to the proceeding. This provision applies only to the legal charges and expenses incident to the case, and does not extend to a private claim on the proceeds, based on a legal lien. That Hubbard & Heaton's claim is such a lien, there can be no doubt. And the fund from which it ought to be paid being within the jurisdiction of the court, the order for its payment may be entered. There would seem to be no necessity for requiring them to be at the trouble and incur the expense of an application to the secretary of the treasury for payment.

Case No. 16,259.

UNITED STATES v. SEVENTY-EIGHT CASKS OF WHITE WINE.

District Court, D. Louisiana. March, 1869.

VIOLATIONS OF CUSTOMS LAWS—FORM OF OATH—FALSE DESCRIPTION—FORFEITURES.

1. Where a party in making an entry of imported wines took the oath prescribed by the act of March 1, 1823 [3 Stat. 729], not so modified as to conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 737], held, that it was not the requisite oath, but that the entry or attempt at entry was in violation of the said act of 1863, and worked a forfeiture of the goods.

2. A false description in the invoice of the goods so sought to be entered, subjects the same to forfeiture.

[This was an information against seventy-eight casks of white wine, forty half casks of red wine, and five hundred cases of red wine, on the ground that the same were imported in violation of the customs laws.]

DURELL, District Judge. The libel of information in this case is framed under the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 737). That act changed the method in which importation should be made, both as to the forms to be observed abroad and the forms to be observed at the port of entry. The importance of that change is shown by an examination of the acts touching importations, passed prior to the statute of 1863.

Under the acts of 1818 and 1823 (3 Stat. 435, 733), all invoices of goods imported into this country by persons residing out of the United States were required to be verified, by oath before a consul or other officer of the United States residing abroad. By the act of 1862 (12 Stat. 558), all invoices, whether by persons residing in the United States, or otherwise, were required to be verified, by oath, before the consul or commercial agent of the United States, in the district where the goods are manufactured, or from which they are sent; and if there be no consul or commercial agent of the United States, in the said district, the verification shall be made by the consul or commercial agent of the United States at the nearest point, or at the port from which the goods are shipped; in which case the oath shall be administered by some public officer duly authorised to administer oaths, and transmitted, with a copy of the invoice, to the consul or commercial agent for his authentication. The act of 1863 changed the entire system with regard to invoices. The verification abroad, by oath, was dispensed with, and it provided that the owner should present to the nearest consul of our government invoices in triplicate, giving the cost, or actual market value of the merchandise sought to be imported; and that these invoices should have thereon endorsed a declaration that "they were in all respects true," and that they contain a true statement of the actual cost or market value of said merchandise at the time when, and at the place where, the same was purchased, or produced. It further requires that if any owner, etc., shall knowingly make, or attempt to make an entry of merchandise by means of any false invoice, or by means of any other false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatever, the said merchandise shall be forfeited. The act also requires that the form of the oaths required by the act of 1823 shall be so modified as to conform to the provisions of the act of 1863.

This statute appears to me to have been most ably devised to secure true and complete information as to all importations, thus to enable the officers of customs to collect the just revenues of the government; and it is the duty of the court to apply it firmly and strictly in aid of so important an object of legislation. The violations of the statute charged in the libel, and which it will be necessary for me to consider, are three; first—the entry of the wines made by Piaggio without taking the requisite oath; second—an entry made knowingly with an invoice and declaration containing false and fraudulent undervaluations; and third—an entry made knowingly with an invoice and declaration containing false and fraudulent statements touching the character of the merchandise imported.
